Mr. WELDON. In reply to the suggestion made by the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Joncas), I would like to repeat what I said in the House last year when a criticism of the same nature was made by the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies). In the first draft of the Bill I had made it read as the hon. member for Gaspé suggests, so as to punish both him who gives as well as him who takes a bribe. But it was pointed out to me afterwards by some members of the House that that was an illogical provision, which I quickly saw myself. In other words, we say to the man who takes a bribe: You are a man who does not value your franchise, and we will take it from you. Of course, we cannot say that to a man who gives a bribe; the law does not say of such a man that he does not value his franchise, and it is not quite clear that it would be logical to deal with him. However, I share the general statement made by the hon. gentleman, and for my part I would heartily support it now, and would ask this committee to support it with that amendment, were it not for another difficulty, and that is the difficulty of getting at evidence. However, I think a good many members of the House agree with the hon. member for Gaspé, and I am not quite clear that my own views are shared by the majority of the committee. I would prefer, for my own part, that that provision were not added, but I shall not resist that provision. I heartily share in the idea expressed by the hon. gentleman; I heartily agree that in very many places the briber is very much more blameworthy than the poor man of less intelligence and standing in the community who accepts the bribe. I apprehend difficulty would arise in regard to getting at the evidence and putting the Act in operation, going as it were, with a comb through the county. This suggestion will be in order when we reach sections 6, 13, 14 and 20, and I leave it to the House, expressing my own personal wishes in regard to the matter, but at the same time not interfering or opposing, or asking those who think with me in regard to this Bill, to offer opposition to the hon. gentleman's proposition. I think the work of getting out the evidence and making the Act really effective, when the money is put up and the judge is obtained, will be jeopardised if the committee insists in striking down the man from whom I think it is most likely that evidence will be obtained—that is the briber. As to whether I am wrong or not in this opinion I leave to the judgment of the House, but I will not offer any determined opposition to the suggestion of my hon. friend.

Mr. JEANNOTTE. I will endeavour to address the committee for a few moments in English, and will then proceed to address hon. members in my own language. The Bill now under consideration is similar in its terms to a Bill passed by the Imperial Parliament in 1852. Under that Act the briber is placed in the same position as the man who receives a bribe. That year a commission was asked for. The proposition passed the two Houses, and commissioners were appointed to go round and visit any borough or city where it was supposed that corruption had prevailed. The commissioners were instructed to report to Parliament, if in session, and if not to report fourteen days before the opening of a parliamentary session. Authority was given to disfranchise any constituency in which gross corruption had taken place. Up to 1883 it appeared that the law had proved entirely useless. It was subsequently amended, and it is now designated "An Act for the Better Prevention of Corrupt Practices at Parliamentary Elections." This Act was sanctioned on 25th August, 1883, and our Act respecting contested elections has some analogy with that law. A distinguished author, expressing his opinion on the old law, says :

The English people have had the same evil to contend with, and they have mastered it. When they rid themselves of the "Rotten Borough" system they began a course of legislation which continued until a few years ago. The Corrupt Practices Prevention Acts of 1854, 1863, and 1879, the Representation of the People Acts of 1867 and 1868, the Parliamentary Elections Acts of 1868 and 1875, and the Ballot Act of 1872 (Australian System) were all directed towards securing the purity of elections. Yet all of these enactments were found insufficient to prevent fraud, intimidation and corruption. The expenses of a parliamentary election were still enormous, and were variously estimated at $15,000,000 to $20,000,000. But the keystone of the election-reform arch was added when the

Mr. WELDON.

Corrupt and Illegal Practices Prevention Act of 1883 was adopted. A marvellous success has attended the introduction of this law. Since then elections in England have been peaceably and honestly conducted, and the total expenses have fallen from $20,000,000 to less than $3,000,000.

The Bill now before the House, if adopted, would not prevent corruption at any future election. If a similar law passed by the Imperial Parliament in 1852, and which remained in force up to 1883, was, as this author says, insufficient to prevent fraud and corruption at elections, how can we expect that the present Bill will prevent electoral corruption? We have experience to guide us, and we have a pretty long experience, too. We have had experience extending from 1852 to 1883, and we know that many amendments have been passed to amend the law, and yet they have been ineffective in preventing political corruption. Starting from that experience, I am prepared to accept the proposition made by the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Joncas), but I will not accept the Bill even if that proposition is embodied in it, because I am perfectly convinced that if this Bill should become law it would not prevent corruption at any election. I desire to answer what has been asserted by the hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon), that the bribe-giver should not be punished as severely as the bribe-receiver. The same author from whom I have already quoted, referring to this point, says :

Some suggestions, therefore, may not seem out of place at this time, as to the elements which ought to enter into this sort of legislation. Among these elements may be stated the following:—1st. A careful definition of what constitutes "corrupt practices" including bribery, personation of real or fictitious persons, undue influence or intimidation; and "treating," i.e., giving or receiving food or drink corruptly for votes or political influence. 2nd. Punishment of personation as a felony; this being one of the most vicious forms of election fraud. 3rd. Punishment for bribery:—(a.) Of the bribe-taker, for a misdemeanour; because the recipient is usually guilty of but a single act, and likely to be poor, ignorant, wretched, and under great temptation. (b.) Of the bribe-giver, for a felony; because he who bribes one will try to bribe many, and becomes a tempter, and the perverter of public morals. 4th. Liability of the briber to civil action for a sum certain on the suit of any person. This is to reach those who guard their pockets more closely than their morals and fear the cupidity of individuals more than the consciences of apathetic prosecuting officers. 5th. Punishment of other offences as misdemeanours because of less gravity than those mentioned.

From this point I am obliged to oppose the Bill, and endeavour to prevent its passage by the House. In the Blake Act we have a law to prevent all manner of corrupt practices that can be committed at any election. The contestation of election allows that. I think the more law we have on the subject, the more corrupt we appear to be.

A writer in Blackwood's Magazine, No. 134, has very truly said :

If it be that the age of election purity is dawning upon us, it is sad to think, from the safeguards that have now become law, how bad we must have been in former years,—how demoralized the constituencies, to require such rude discipline as is provided by the new Bill. Is it a proof that we are so much wiser and better than our fathers? Is our sense of purity clearer? Do we so entirely sympathize with the spirit of the poet's lines—

Cursed is the man who's bought and sold,
And barter's liberty for gold ;
For if election is not free,
In vain we seek for liberty,
And he who would sell his single right
Would sell his country if he might.

If Tacitus is correct—'In corruptissima Republica plurimæ leges'—we must be worse off now than at any former date, for every session is esteemed in proportion to the number of Bills that are passed. Is it again, let it be asked, true, that we look on our parliamentary history with feelings of shame? Is all this anxiety for purity of election an honest expression of our sentiments? Or is it not the case that this new Act, while it is regarded with something like alarm by the novices, gives rise to feelings akin to regret on the part of the old stagers who have lived through what may literally be called the "golden" age of elections, and is viewed with intense dislike by all the lower classes, who looked forward to a general election as to a Bacchic revel, and regarded it as a part of our English constitution.

That was written in 1883, commenting on the election law passed, in place of the former law in England. My ideas are these : That in the first place this Bill will be useless, and in the second place, that Canadians will be looked upon as a people so corrupt that we had to pass a law which existed 30 years ago, and which law was proved to be insufficient. I will, therefore, fight this Bill to the utmost extent that I can. I am in favour as much as any member of this House of finding means to prevent corruption. The hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Joncas) has said, that we do not like corruption in the province of Quebec any more than do the people of any other province. We do not have any more corruption in the province of Quebec than in any other province, and I go further and say : I do not think we have just as much corruption as in some other provinces ; I won't mention any names. We cannot deny that in Quebec, however, there are some constituencies which need money.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Oh.

Mr. JEANNOTTE. That is not the correct expression in English, but what I do say is that money is wanted for what we call legal expenses. I know that in some counties they want money, but the premier fault is not with the electors, but with the candidates themselves. When the two candidates start out for election they will meet and they will laugh together, and one of them will say : Don't spend more than two or three thousand dollars, for that is all I have got ; or one will say to the other : I cannot spend a cent, and do you not spend a cent either. If the candidates agreed amongst themselves not to spend any money and carried out that agreement, there would be no necessity for this law at all. Therefore, the remedy is with the candidates themselves. If it rests with ourselves not to make any expenses, then what is the use of enacting such a law as this, which will only give us bad fame. (Translation.) Mr. Chairman, before this section is passed, I wish to offer a few remarks. The Bill now before the Committee is a copy almost word for word of an English law, 14-15 Victoria, passed as far back as 1852. This legislation had been brought about by the extensive bribery then prevailing in England, and which they did not know how to oppose. The fact is, electoral bribery was practised on a very large scale. But, by the way, I will ask the promoter of this Bill whether he thinks we have come to that ; whether he thinks the state of affairs is as deplorable as it was then in England. But I pass on to an analysis of the English law of 1852. In England, there are two classes of citizens, each of which has much influence on the extent of electoral bribery. These two classes are : the wealthy, very wealthy people, and the poor, very poor people. The former, I refer to the wealthy people, have such wealth as not to know what to do with it. Now, in order to be raised to honours, they practice bribery to the utmost extent, which gives them considerable influence. Indeed, what is to be thought of a candidate who can afford to spend even a million to get returned? There is nothing the like of that in Canada. We have no such class of wealthy citizens, of citizens who have nothing to do but spend their money to their fancy, or even, if they choose, in practicing electoral bribery. In England, there are to be found a class of very poor, destitute citizens, who have not even five cents to get a piece of bread. It is easy to understand that such a class of people should be very accessible to the temptations of the rich, that is to say, to offers of money for their votes. Fortunately, we have in our country no such class of poor, destitute votes, which prevents electoral bribery from causing as great a mischief here as in England. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, there is no comparing the state of affairs in Canada with respect to electoral bribery to the state of affairs which existed in England in 1852. Yet that law of 1852 was repealed in 1883.

Mr. AMYOT. (Translation.) Would the hon. member kindly give us some particulars in connection with that law of 1852 ?

Mr. JEANNOTTE. (Translation.) The text is in English. I only read it a moment ago.

Mr. AMYOT. (Translation.) You could easily translate it.

Mr. JEANNOTTE. (Translation.) In order not to delay the work of the committee. I will not undertake such a translation. But I will read again such parts of the law as I quoted a moment ago. The chapter is intitled : Chapter LVII. :

An act to provide for more effectual inquiry into the existence of corrupt practices at elections for members to serve in Parliament.

The Act reads as follows :—

Whereas it is expedient to make more effectual provision for inquiring into the existence of corrupt practices of elections of members to serve in Parliament : Be it therefor enacted by the Queen's most Excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons, in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same as follows :

1. Where by a joint Address of both Houses of Parliament it shall be represented to Her Majesty that a Committee of the House of Commons appointed to try an election petition, or a committee of that House appointed to inquire into the existence of corrupt practices in any election or elections of a member or members to serve in Parliament, have reported to this House that corrupt practices have, or that there is a reason to believe that corrupt practices have extensively prevailed in any county, division of a county, city, borough, university, or place in the United Kingdom electing or sharing in the election of a member or members to serve in Parliament, at any election or elections of such members or member, and the said Houses shall thereupon pray Her Majesty to cause inquiry to be made under this Act, by persons named in such Address, such persons being (where the inquiry to be made relates to a place in England or Ireland) barristers-at-law of not less than seven years standing) or (where such inquiry relates to a place in Scotland) advocates of not less than seven years standing, and not being members of Parliament, or holding any office or place of profit under the Crown, other than that of a Recorder of any city or borough, it shall be lawful for Her Majesty, by warrant under Her Royal Signed Manual, to appoint the said persons to be commissioners for the purpose of making inquiry into the existence of such corrupt practices ; and in case any of the commissioners so appointed, die, resign or become incapable to act, it shall be lawful for the surviving or continuing commissioners or commissioner, to act in such inquiry as if they or he had been solely appointed to be commissioners or a sole commissioner for the purposes of such inquiry, and (as to such sole commissioner) as if this Act had authorized the appointment of a sole commissioner, and all the provisions of this Act concerning the commissioners appointed to make any such inquiry shall be taken to apply to such surviving or continuing commissioner or commissioners.

Mr. AMYOT. (Translation.) To whom was the inquiring commissioner to report ?

Mr. JEANNOTTE. (Translation.) I am coming to that section. Sections 6 and 7 reads as follows :—

Mr. JEANNOTTE.

VI. Such commissioners shall, by all such lawful means as to them appear best, with a view to the discovery of the truth, inquire into the manner in which the election in relation to which such committee as aforesaid may have reported to the House of Commons, or where the report of such committee has referred to two or more elections, has been conducted, and whether any corrupt practices have been committed at such election, and if so, whether by way of the gift or loan or the promise of the gift or loan of any sum of money or other valuable consideration to any voter or voters, or to any other person or persons on his or their behalf, for the promise or the giving of his or their vote or votes, for his or their refraining or promising to refrain from giving his or their vote or votes, at such election, or for his or their procuring or undertaking to procure the votes of other electors at such election, or whether by the payment of any sum of money or loan or other valuable consideration whatsoever to any voter, or to any other person on his behalf, before, during, or after the termination of such election, by way of head money, or in compliance with any usage or custom in the county, division of a county, city, borough, university, or place to which the inquiry relates, or how otherwise, or whether any sum of money or other valuable consideration whatsoever has been paid to any voter, or to any other person on his behalf, after the termination of such election, as a reward for giving or for having refrained from giving his vote at such election ; and in case such commissioners find that corrupt practices have been committed at the election into which they are hereinbefore authorized to inquire, it shall be lawful for them to make the like inquiries concerning the latest previous election for the same county, division of a county, city, borough, university, or place ; and upon finding corrupt practices to have been committed at such election, it shall be lawful for them to make the like inquiries concerning the election immediately previous thereto for such county, division of a county, city, borough, university, or place, and so in like manner from election to election, as far back as they may think fit ; but where upon inquiry as aforesaid concerning any election such commissioners do not find that corrupt practices have been committed thereat, they shall not inquire concerning any previous election ; and such commissioners shall from time to time report to Her Majesty the evidence taken by them, and what they find concerning the premises, and especially such commissioners shall report, with respect to each election the names of all persons whom they find to have been guilty of corrupt practices at such election, and as well of those who have given bribes for the purchase, or for the purpose of purchasing the votes of others as of those who have themselves received money or any other valuable consideration for having given, or having given, or having refrained from giving, or for the purpose of them to give or to refrain from giving their votes at such election, and also the names of all persons whom they find to have given to others, or to have received themselves, payments by way of head money, or as a reward for giving or refraining from giving their votes at such election, and all other things whereby in the opinion of the said commissioners the truth may be better known touching the premises.

VII. Every report which such commissioners make to Her Majesty in pursuance of this Act shall be laid before Parliament within one calendar month next after such report is made, if Parliament be then sitting, or if Parliament be not then sitting, then within one calendar month next after the then next meeting of Parliament.

XVI. The said commissioners shall have power, if they deem fit, to award to any witness summoned to appear before them a reasonable sum for his or her travelling expenses, and for his or her maintenance according to a scale to be determined and approved of by the commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury, and the said commissioners shall certify to the said commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury the names of the said witnesses, together with the sums so allowed to each, and the said commissioners shall pay to the said witnesses the said sums so allowed as aforesaid, out of any money which may be provided by Parliament for the purposes of the said commission.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. (Translation.) I would like to know, Mr. Chairman, whether the hon. gentleman is in order when thus reading old English laws. I raise the point of order.

Mr. AMYOT. (Translation.) On the point of order, I wish to say that we must obtain information with respect to the English legislation, as, in anything that relates to parliamentary institutions, England affords us valuable precedents. We find in the English laws a lot of information which cannot but guide us, especially in a matter such as the Bill we are now discussing. They have had much experience in England with respect to popular institutions, and if we can find precedents there, we will be sure to be enlightened as to what we ought to do. Therefore, I think the point of order raised by the hon. member for Montmagny did not hold good.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. (Translation.) I ask for your ruling, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Mills, Annapolis). The hon. gentleman must confine himself to the section as far as possible.

Mr. JEANNOTTE. Yes, I am always at the section; but if I am not to be permitted to interpret the section, then it is useless to discuss it. This clause is the same as the clause in the Bill that I have been reading, and I am explaining that this law must be a failure, because its wording is similar to that of the law passed in England in 1852, which was completely useless and insufficient for the prevention of corruption. If that was the case in England, where they are so well versed in laws regarding corrupt practices, and where they were so desirous of preventing corruption, how can we say that this law will prevent corruption? The experience of England has shown clearly that it will not do so.

Mr. WELDON. The suggestion was made the other night, during the debate, that this Bill might be used, in the case of an election petition under the Controverted Elections Act, as a means of fishing out evidence. That certainly is not meant to be done, and to make that use of the thing quite impossible, I would move to strike out the words "within sixty days" and provide instead that the petitions under this Act shall not be filed until forty days have run, so that we would know whether or not an election petition had been filed, and I would provide also to leave a margin of twenty days, within which a petition could be filed under this Act, the object being to keep clear of election petitions altogether, so as to avoid making this Bill available to a petitioner for the fishing of evidence in order to unseat the unsuccessful candidate. I hope the committee will vote down the amendment proposed, and then I will move the one I have just explained.

Mr. JEANNOTTE. (Translation.) As the hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon) states that he is willing to change his Bill and amend it so that the petition could not be presented within forty days or after sixty days following the polling day, in order that this law might not be used as a ground or a means to protest an election—I have no objection to that—I will, if allowed by the Committee, withdraw my amendment.

Amendment withdrawn.

Mr. WELDON. I will ask to have the words "within sixty days" in the Bill struck out, and the following words substituted therefor in the ninth line:—

On a day not less than forty days and not more than sixty days.

Mr. BERGIN. The objection I make to this amendment is that, under the present law, a petition may be filed within thirty days against the successful candidate. The law also provides that after that thirty days has elapsed, the candidate is entitled to hold his seat without further contestation. But if we pass this amendment, parties who are disappointed may combine to wreak private vengeance upon the successful candidate by raking up such evidence as may support an application for the reopening of the case. Under the law as it stands, if evidence is discovered within, I think, two months, which would serve to unseat a candidate, such petition might be filed based on the discovery under this amendment. If the judge stated that extensive bribery prevailed, as provided in this Bill, I believe, under the Revised Statutes, it would be the duty of the Speaker, on receiving that report, to disfranchise that constituency. These are the dangers involved in this amendment, and I think the House should be cautious before passing it.

Mr. WELDON. The amendment is due to a suggestion made by the Minister of Railways (Mr. Haggart) the other night. I saw the danger, and have undertaken to cure it. I might have made a fuller statement when on my feet, and said that, to give the highest protection and prevent this Bill being made use of, in case an election petition has been filed. I will offer another section, which will be the last section in the Bill, providing that where an election petition has been filed, this Act shall not operate until that election petition has been abandoned or disposed of. Let that thing go by itself, and if the election trial goes on, this Bill will not operate until such election petition has been disposed of.

Mr. BERGIN. Under this amendment, there will be no such thing as finality to these charges. Any man, no matter how pure his election may have been, may be subjected, under this Bill, on the discovery of a single case, to increased persecution, although, on the trial of the election petition, his election may have been declared pure by the courts. This thing will still hang over him, and I do not think members of this House ought to be exposed to an increase of the persecution they are very often subjected to, when election petitions are filed, without any foundation, merely for the purpose of gratifying the personal vengeance of a disappointed candidate.

Mr. LAURIER. It seems to me that the argument just made by the hon. member for Stormont (Mr. Bergin) does not at all apply at this moment. It might have applied two years ago, before the Controverted Election law was amended, but since that law was amended I do not think it can apply. Previous to 1891, a single case of corruption was enough to annul the election, but in 1891—I do not remember whether it was at the suggestion of the Minister of Justice, but at all events it was with his approval, and, for the matter of that, with the approval of the whole House—the law was amended in that respect, and now a single case, or two cases of bribery are not sufficient to annul an election, but the judge must report that there has been bribery of such a character as to influence the election.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. JEANNOTTE moved :

That after the word "belief" in the twentieth line, the following words be added :—Certain cases of corruption are to his or their own personal knowledge.

(Translation.) I was stating, Mr. Chairman, that section 2 defines the means to be taken to obtain an inquiry after the election, if a complaint was made signed by twenty-five voters stating that they have good reason to believe that bribery prevailed, without any other formality. In the English version of the Bill, it is stated that they will have to give their affidavit stating that they are voters. That is not to be found in the French version ; so that such a petition, according to the French version, could be signed by a stranger, even a man living in the United States. The French version reads as follows, in section 2 : "Sworn by all the petitioners, stating that they are such voters, and that the allegations in the petition are true. &c." I would like to know whether it is the English or French version we have to follow in the discussion of this Bill, and what version will be the law ?—(English.)—I would like to know, Mr. Chairman, whether the English version or the French version of this Bill is the correct one, because section 2 is not the same in both. By the English version the parties signing the petition are obliged to swear that they are voters, while in the French version it is provided that any parties living in the place may sign a petition and have an inquiry made. I want to know which version is the correct one ? I await an answer.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Whatever version is passed, the other will have to be made to conform to it ; and it is the English version that the committee is considering.

Mr. JEANNOTTE. Then I suppose the French version will have to be amended. (Translation.) Wednesday last, when I offered a few remarks in connection with this Bill, I stated—and it was found rather strong—that the adoption of section 2, such as it is, would give us a bad report in foreign countries. It is proved by the authors I have just quoted, Tacitus, who lived at a time when bribery was unknown, but who, nevertheless, saw far beyond his age, said that the greatest number of laws were made in the most corrupt commonwealths. I could well have quoted such authors the other day, but I did not want to weary the House by taking too much of its time.

I move in amendment that the word "sixty" in the first line be struck out and the word "thirty" be inserted in place thereof.

That amendment is explained by itself. We have thirty days to protest an election. By this Bill sixty days are allowed to ask for an inquiry into cases of bribery. In other words, thirty additional days are required for blackmailing, and we all know that blackmailing carried on during thirty days is quite expensive. It may come up to heavy prices. This is why my amendment requires that the time should not be longer than the time allowed to protest an election. If this Bill should be adopted such as it is, here is what will happen : a petition for the protest of an election will be presented on the 29th or 30th day, and the returned candidate who will have received it will not fail to take any means in his power to have a petition signed asking for an inquiry into the cases of bribery practised by his opponents. It will be the means to prevent the truth being known by any one. The defeated candidate who will have against him such a petition will be exposed to a tolerably large expenditure. The returned candidate will think of settling his protest as best he can : then both parties will agree to pair off, and no one will ever know how many cases of bribery there were. To prevent this, and in order that cases of bribery may come to light, the twenty-five petitioners, if they are in earnest, should not wait till the 59th day to make their petition. For, as I stated a moment ago, it is giving a premium to blackmailing, it is placing the returned candidate in the painful necessity of paying not only the costs of the protests in course of being tried, but also exposes him to the risk of paying the costs of such an inquiry. I think, Mr. Chairman, that what we all aim at is the most expeditious way of preventing bribery at elections. If we allow sixty days to present a petition, if, after the judge is appointed, he has thirty days to give his notices of summons, that will make three months. Well, here is a member against whom no protest was filed within the thirty days required by law. On the thirtieth day following the election, a feeling of joy appears in his features, his uneasiness is over. Should this Bill be adopted thirty more days will elapse before it is known whether an inquiry into the cases of bribery, probable or improbable, will or will not be made: and if thirty additional days still elapse before the judge should open his proceedings, one can see in what unpleasant position that man will be placed, should he not be rich especially. But I will be told: If he has no means, let him not run. We know that when a candidate is put in the field by one or the other party, it is because he stands a chance of being returned, and he is then told: You are the only man in the riding who can help us remaining into power or coming into power, in order that we may work for the good of the country. Your election will not cost you a cent, you will be helped and it will not cost you a cent. It is very hard for a man to resist, and, as a rule, he accepts. The election is hardly over when means are taken to ruin him and, if he lost his election, friends become rare. And then it is very soon done with the liberality of friends. Very few persons are found who are willing to turn towards a defeated candidate and stretch out a helping hand to him. By adopting this Bill, we should certainly not take the means to reach the desired end. Before finally becoming law, it will, of course, have to undergo many amendments. Cases of blackmailing must be punished, and candidates not be exposed to fall victims to them. Purity at elections must be assured, but we must not, on the other hand, fall in any excess. Mr. Chairman, I hope my amendment will be adopted, as it improves the Bill.

Mr. BELLEY. (Translation.) I am quite in favour of the proposed amendment. It is based on the principle acknowledged in the Controverted Elections Act. The hon. member for L'Assomption (Mr. Jeannotte) wants to have the same time fixed as is allowed in protested election cases. Now, allow me to observe, Mr. Chairman, that this amendment does not quite reach the end in view. The hon. member ought to state by his amendment that the petition should be presented within thirty days from the polling day. It will be remembered that, under the Act of 1891, the time for protesting an election is computed from the polling day. He will allow me to suggest his amending his motion in that direction. This amendment ought to be agreed to by the committee, as it is the principle laid down in the Act of 1891.

Mr. JEANNOTTE. (Translation.) Indeed, my amendment is quite in the same direction as the Act of 1891, referred to by the hon. gentleman.

Amendment negatived. Yeas, 25; nays, 50.

On section 2,

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have that clause read, because I think an amendment made the other day, is not inserted in the motion as read just now, and would it not be better, Mr. Chairman, that the clause should remain as it is now, and when we come to the schedules to amend these in accordance with the second clause.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The more so as this clause has been adopted just as it is. We can deal with the schedules when we come to them.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. This clause only indicates that there will be a schedule containing the affidavit.

Mr. FREMONT. (Translation.) I wish to call the attention of the committee to a contradiction there is in this clause between the phraseology of this section and the text of some schedules to which reference is made therein. The text of the schedules is very indefinite; it is worded in general terms. No mention is made therein of any particulars. It must not be forgotten that great discretion is left to the judge. He must be satisfied, from the affidavits filed before him, that there was a sufficient number of cases of bribery to make an inquiry. Thus this section states:

Whenever, within sixty days after the day on which an election is held under The Dominion Elections Act, a petition in the form or to the effect set out in Schedule A to this Act, has been presented to the court, signed by five or more voters of an electoral district (the postal address of each voter signing the same being added to his name), stating that bribery has extensively prevailed at the election, and having annexed thereto an affidavit or affidavits, in the form or to the effect set out in Schedule B to this Act, sworn by all the petitioners, stating that they are such voters, and that the allegations in the petition are true, to the best of their knowledge and belief, the court shall within thirty days assign one of its judges for the purpose of making inquiry under this Act.

I think we should strike out all that which relates to the schedules and leave the whole thing to the discretion of the judge.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. (Translation.) The schedules may be modified when the committee will take them into consideration.

Mr. JEANNOTTE. I want to know if the officers of that court will be paid extra for their services, as is done in cases of contested elections. If so, $500 would be exhausted in two or three days.

Mr. WELDON. The provisions for money and the like of that, come later on in the Bill.

Mr. AMYOT. If you want to make the law operative, we must inquire how it is likely to operate. There is no use passing a law which we cannot put into execution. The hon. mover might tell us how these officers are to be paid.

Mr. WELDON. They will be paid out of the deposit.

Mr. JEANNOTTE. (Translation.) This deposit of $500 is not sufficient. If it is intended to pay the witnesses out of it, it cannot be affected to the other costs which will necessarily be incurred. Who is going to pay the officers of the court? If you do not provide for the payment of these, your law could never be carried out; never would an inquiry be made. In controverted election cases, the judge, the clerk, in short, all the officers of the court are paid extra, in addition to their ordinary salary. Therefore, we must state out of what funds these officers will be paid. Besides these officers, there are the stenographers, and they entail a very large expenditure. I think the committee ought to be fully informed in this respect before this section should be passed. Out of what will you take the money required to pay all these expenses?

Mr. BELLEY. (Translation.) Out of the deposit of $500.

Mr. JEANNOTTE. (Translation.) Then, you will not go far.

Mr. AMYOT. I ask the hon. mover if the officers of this court are to be paid extra. Will the judge be paid his travelling expenses? How much will his clerk be paid? How much the bailiff? What will be the tax of the witnesses? The Bill makes no provision for these things, and it would be impossible for a judge to establish a regular court without these provisions. When the $500 are exhausted, where will be the funds to go on with? The hon. gentleman must know that opposing parties will do their best to accumulate costs, and very soon the stenographer, the bailiff, the clerk of the court, travelling expenses of all concerned, and so on, will have eaten up the whole $500. The great mistake in this Bill, I think, is in not providing for eventualities. Chapter 10 of the Revised

Mr. FREMONT.

Statutes, to which I have referred, provides that the enquête shall be conducted by Parliament, or under the control of persons appointed by the Governor in Council, and, of course, at the public expense. Under that provision, all the necessary costs would be provided for, and the laudable object which the hon. mover has in view would be attained, but it certainly would not be attained by this Bill. I admit that it is very desirable, whenever there is corruption to an extent sufficient to influence the result of an election, that we should punish those guilty of that corruption. That principle seems to be admitted all round. Why not, then, make a law that will render that object attainable? I know how the things will operate. Parties will go before a judge, and he will reluctantly undertake to make an enquête. Obstacles will be thrown in his way, which he will use as a means of avoiding the trouble of going on with the enquête. I think the Bill should provide that when a judge is satisfied by the preliminary evidence he would take, that a case exists such as contemplated by this Bill, then he should report to the Governor in Council or to Parliament, and upon that preliminary evidence, an investigation could take place at the expense of the country. In that way, we would attain the object we all have in view. It would be easy to establish corruption if it existed to any extent, whether by treating, or by giving money, or by intimidation, or by promises publicly made to few or many people. These things could be ascertained by the judge in a preliminary enquête, and then the case could come before this Parliament, or before the Governor in Council, and these authorities, having gone over that preliminary evidence, would then order a regular inquiry at the expense of the country, and the object we all desire to attain, would be secured.

Mr. WELDON. I would suggest to my hon. friend, who is in accord with the principle of the Bill, that this question of the payment of costs be raised again on the 16th clause, and let us go on with the intervening clauses. We will have the question of the payment of costs raised on the clause where the $500 is spoken of.

Mr. AMYOT. It might be objected then that we had admitted the principle, and we would be called to order. I think we should come to an understanding at once.

Mr. WELDON. That is only a routine clause.

Mr. AMYOT. The hon. gentleman will understand the suggestion I made, which is that these proceedings should only apply to the preliminary enquête, without there being any necessity of calling the guilty parties in the case. The case would proceed ex parte under the guidance of the judge to inquire into the general feature of corruption, if such should exist. Then the report would be made, and the duty of the judge would be concluded. His report would come before Parliament and another stage of the proceedings would be entered upon, because it would then be found indispensable to proceed further with the enquête, without which this Act would become a dead letter.

Mr. JEANNOTTE. Under the Imperial Act of 1852, the Government itself conducted the enquête and paid all expenses, and yet, after ten years' experience, the Act proved to be completely useless. Here there is no money available, except $500. Who is going to pay the judge? I do not know the practice in other provinces, but in the province of Quebec when a judge holds sittings outside of his jurisdiction he charges $10 per day and expenses. The clerk of the court, the stenographer, the bailiff, and the crier would also have to be paid. When this question was up last year it was suggested that the witnesses should pay their own expenses. This proposition was held to be impracticable, and, accordingly, $500 was provided for the payment of witnesses. But the judge, the clerk of the court, the stenographer, would all have to be paid before they entered upon their duties, and there would be nothing left for the witnesses. If we are going to have a new law against corruption at elections, let it be framed so as to prove efficient to meet any case of corruption, and have the necessary funds provided. Under the present conditions, the enquête, under the present Bill, would only last a few days continuously, as there would be no funds available. If the judge adjourned the court for a week for lack of money to pay running expenses, parties who were accused of having done corrupt acts would not have an opportunity to prove their innocence. What would become of men unjustly accused of having received one or two dollars for their votes? They would not have a chance of proving their innocence. The hon. gentleman who introduced the Bill should explain where the money is to be obtained beyond the $500, because that sum would not go far in conducting an enquête before a court. Suppose the enquête lasted fifteen days, about $250 would be needed for the judge, $60 for the clerk, besides the stenographer and balliff's fees. It is thus evident that the enquête would not continue more than three or four days and would not be concluded.

On section 5,

Mr. AMYOT. Would it not be wise to give notice in the newspapers?

Mr. WELDON. The plaintiffs get notice, and any party whose vote is attacked must get a special notice, and proceedings cannot go on unless it is proved to be impossible to serve the party.

Mr. AMYOT. So the accused parties will not have any notice, and the proceedings will go on ex parte. So only when the opinion of the court has been formed on the evidence taken ex parte, these persons will be called upon. There is something unfair about that proposition. I think the petition should give the names of the parties whom it is pretended have been corrupted, and those accused parties should receive notice, too. It is not fair, as the Bill stands, to start the inquiry without the knowledge of those whom it is intended to accuse. In many cases before judicial tribunals, particulars are furnished. In this instance, the particulars at least should consist of the names of those whom it is intended to accuse, and the parties should be notified that they would be proceeded against at a certain time and place.

Mr. WELDON. If the hon. gentleman will read section 13, he will observe that great care is taken that a voter whose vote is attacked, cannot be struck at without notice. The court will adjourn, and notice will be served, and thus the parties will have time to prepare a defence.

Mr. AMYOT. The section does not meet my objection, because the witnesses are heard first, and after the enquête has proceeded ex parte, the parties are brought forward. They have not been there to watch and see if the enquête has been regularly proceeded with. You proceed ex parte against them, and when that is done then we send for them and say: What have you to answer?

Mr. WELDON. It is the very essence of the Bill that there should be a thorough investigation. The Bill cannot work if you hamper the thing at this stage with many restrictions. It seems to me that all that is reasonable is secured, when you say that the man has proper notice, and we must trust to the judge of the higher court to exercise a good judicial discretion and give them ample time to prepare for their defence. I think the Bill may be safely trusted to secure that. No one desires anything else.

Mr. AMYOT. The hon. gentleman will soon see that he will not succeed with that paltry sum of $500. If he adopted the plan of having a preliminary enquête which would be the basis for an order to have a general enquête, having at our disposal the money provided by Parliament, then we would be all right. But he wants to bring to conviction the guilty parties at once, and he will not succeed, because he does not provide the ways and means.

Mr. JEANNOTTE. (Translation.) Mr. Chairman, I ask what is meant by the word "district," in section 5? Is it an electoral district or a judicial district? The judicial district sometimes includes two, three or four counties.

Mr. WELDON. We will add the words "electoral district."

Mr. JEANNOTTE. (Translation.) The suggestions just made by the member for Bellechasse are important. Section 6 states :

It shall be the duty of the judge to endeavour by all lawful means to ascertain the persons who have taken bribes at the last election.

And section 13 reads :

The judge shall report the names of all voters whom he finds to have taken bribes ; but he shall not report that any voter has taken a bribe unless and until he is satisfied that such voter has been served with a notice of the charge against him, and has had an opportunity of meeting it, or that it was impossible to give him such notice by reason of his intentionally evading service.

The inquiry being taken down in stenography, the accused party will have to wait till the notes of the stenographer are transcribed to look into the position taken against him. In the first place, who will pay the costs of the stenographer ? And then, when will the accused party have to come and offer his defence ? After examining the deposition, he will have to confer with a lawyer. It is a great waste of time ; who will pay for all those costs ? The hon. member for Albert stated a moment ago, in answer to my hon. friend from Bellechasse : " If you put too many conditions, you won't have any enquête." Well, we are taking every possible means to prevent corruption ; but we intend to put into this Bill as many means as are necessary to carry out the law. If we should pass a law that will remain a dead letter, as that passed in England in 1852, it is useless to put such a law in our statutes. I think the hon. member for Bellechasse was right in the observations he made, and that the hon. member for Albert should explain his Bill and not refer us from one clause to another.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. (Translation.) This does not apply to this clause. The clause now under discussion has for its object to inform the voters of the coming and moving from one place to another of the judge who makes the inquiry.

On section 6,

Mr. JONCAS moved to insert after the word " have " on the second line, the words " offered and given."

Mr. DICKEY. The last time this Bill was before the House I opposed this amendment, and I do not wish it to pass now without entering a protest. It seems to me it is objectionable on two grounds. In the first place, it changes the whole principle of the Bill. The principle of the Bill is to furnish machinery that will remove from the electoral lists the names of certain voters who are not fit to exercise the franchise. That unfitness is assumed by the Bill to be established when they are willing to accept a bribe for their vote. That unfitness is supposed to exist because they are willing to change their convictions for moneys, and everybody thinks it is quite proper that men of that class should have the franchise taken from them. I am not here to say that the briber is not as guilty as the man who is bribed. He is probably more guilty in some aspects, but the question that strikes me is this : Is the briber a man who should not exercise the franchise, is the briber a man whose opinion upon public questions we do not want ? Now, every hon. gentleman who sits in this House knows that unfortunately for the country, there are men of the very highest intelligence, men who are able to intelligently discuss public question on the platform, who will, in the heat of an election, bribe a man who is base enough to sell his vote. What we wish to get at, as I understand through this Bill, is to secure an intelligent majority of the electors. A man may be blameable in many walks of life, but his opinion on public questions may be valuable, and it does not follow that we should refuse the opinion on public questions of the man who bribes. This Bill does not intend to punish anybody at all, but it is simply and solely intended to expunge from the voters' lists certain persons who are unworthy of expressing any further opinion through the franchise. I say that even the putting down of corruption is a secondary matter in this Bill ; its real object is to wipe out certain classes of voters who are unfit to exercise the franchise. That is the elementary principle of the Bill, and it is violated by this amendment. The amendment also hampers the Bill in its operation. Suppose, for example, that the hon. member for Albert wants to put this Bill into operation in his constituency ; what does he do ? He calls a man who he supposes has used large sums of money against him in the election, and puts him into the box. If that man is free, the hon. member can get some evidence from him. If you can set the bribing class against the bribed class, if you can let these two classes of rogues fall out, there will be some chance for honest men to get their due ; but if you mass them together, and say that both are equally guilty, they will continue their conspiracy in roguery, and you will be able to get very little satisfaction from either. I ask any man in this House who wants to make this a workable Bill, not to render it unworkable by voting for this amendment.

Mr. FORBES. Last year I had the honour of moving an amendment similar to the one now moved, and it was very nearly carried in the House. Since then I have talked on this subject with the promoter of the Bill, and I am led to believe that he is not in his heart opposed to this improvement. I am sorry that I cannot agree with the principle laid down by the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Dickey). He would have us believe that the person who offers a bribe to voters is not doing a wrong—in other words, that he is a proper citizen to control the affairs of this country. By such a remark the hon. gentleman is making a direct stab at the principle of responsible government. If you are going to remove from the voters' lists the names of nine hundred and ninety-nine persons who are possibly weak enough to subject themselves to the influences of bribers, and leave the thousandth man free to exercise his franchise, you will very soon have your voters' lists reduced to such an extent as to sap the very principle of responsible government. This Bill, if it is correct, should, in my opinion, be directed against both classes of criminals—the man who gives the bribe, as well as the man who takes it. Why should a man who is held by the laws of this Parliament to be a criminal, punishable by a fine and imprisonment, be allowed by another law to have the right to control our legislation? I also take exception to the argument of the hon. member for Cumberland, that we shall only get our just dues by setting the two classes of rogues against each other on the witness-stand. If you put under oath a man who has been guilty of bribery, he is not going to admit that he has bribed another man, and thereby have him disfranchised. There is always a tacit understanding between the guilty parties that they will protect each other. The only way to get at the truth is to put on the witness-stand the man who has been bribed, and ask him if So-and-so did not affect his vote. If he says that he did, in such a way, the judge is forthwith bound by the Bill to disfranchise that man, while letting the man who tempted him go scot free. The promoter of the Bill stated that its object was not to punish, but to take away from persons who are weak enough to take bribes, the power of controlling the public affairs of this country—to treat them as children and weaklings, and remove their names from the list of voters. We are equally bound to say that the man who offers a bribe is weak in doing that, and as little entitled to exercise the franchise as the man who accepts a bribe. For that reason the amendment should carry, and I will most certainly support it.

Mr. JONCAS. I am surprised at the views expressed by my hon. friend from Cumberland (Mr. Dickey). He says the principal object of the Bill is not to punish corruption. I understood that that was its object. He says that the promoter of the Bill only aims to strike from the voters' lists the names of men who take bribes. The man who offers a bribe is equally guilty, in my opinion, with the man who accepts it, or more guilty, because he has more intelligence. If we are against corruption, we must admit that the man who goes through a country at election times bribing the electors should be punished equally with the man who accepts a bribe. My hon. friend from Cumberland argues that he ought not to be punished, because he has more intelligence. I do not see the force of that argument; I think that for that reason he ought to be punished all the more. This country would have much fewer electors who would sell their votes if there were fewer men going through the counties at election times offering bribes. Furthermore, the hon. member for Cumberland said that it was a secondary matter to put down corruption. If the putting down of corruption is only a secondary affair, we do not want this Bill at all. I always understood from the promoter of the Bill that his intention was to put a stop to bribery, and in order to do that he ought to punish as severely and even more severely the man who offers a bribe than the man who takes it.

Mr. JEANNOTTE. This Bill has not for its object the prevention of corrupt practices, as I can prove by the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Dickey), a promoter of the Bill, who comes forward and says, in a straightforward manner, that the object is not to prevent corruption, but only to punish the bad men who allow themselves to be corrupted. The man who distributes the corruption is, according to the hon. member for Cumberland, an intelligent man, much more so than the poor creature who takes a dollar from him to keep his family from dying of starvation. The gentleman who goes around buying votes and making promises and corrupting the people is an intelligent man, according to the hon. member. I say that he may be an intelligent man, but that no honest man would do that dirty work, and as a matter of fact, it is generally strangers, parties unknown in the locality, who are capable of everything, who go around corrupting the people, and these are the parties whom the hon. member for Cumberland pictures as intelligent men. According to that theory, the thief is an intelligent man, much more so than the receiver, and while the receiver deserves to be punished, the thief, because of his superior intelligence, ought to go scot free. Last session I understood that the hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon) had given his word that he would agree to an amendment punishing the briber as well as the bribee, and on that understanding, I ceased then opposing the Bill. But I do not see any such provision in the present measure. I would refer my hon. friend to volume 3 of 'The Arena,' in which he will find a very ably-written article setting forth that the man who bribes ought to be much more heavily punished than the one who accepts the bribe, because the latter is generally a poor ignorant man, and in any case his offence is but a single one, while the former is, as the hon. member for Cumberland said, an intelligent man, and his offences are numerous.

Mr. AMYOT. I fully concur in the remarks of the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Dickey). The object of this Bill is to reach that class of electors who are always ready to go to the agents of the candidate in any county, if not to the candidate himself, and ask for some consideration for their vote. Those who do the bribing are of course equally guilty, but with regard to them we have ample provision in our present election law, clause 84 of chapter 8 of the Revised Statutes.

Committee rose, and it being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

House again resolved itself into Committee.
(In the Committee.)

Mr. AMYOT. To provide a new punishment for the bribery would be to add a new provision to the law, and one which already exists in stronger form, I will refer you to sections 84 and 87—as well as others—of the Act concerning the election of members to the House of Commons. Section 84 describes many offences by the briber, such as giving money, promising money, promising to procure employment, and so on. And it provides that such an offence is to be a misdemeanour, which means now that it is an indictable offence, and involves a penalty of $200. Section 57 provides that threats of violence, etc., shall be treated as a misdemeanour, and, in this case also, a penalty of $200 is provided. If we look at section 117 we shall see that these penal actions may be taken at any time within one year after the election. Now, if we take section 98 we shall see that a disqualification for eight years is provided for all those, other than the candidate, who have been found guilty of any corrupt practice in any proceeding in which, after notice given of the charge, he has had an opportunity of being heard. Section 110 provides that some of the prosecutions may be taken even before the criminal court. So these offences are already provided for so far as concerns those who are guilty of corrupting the electorate, and provided for more completely than under this Bill. These are treated as a criminal offence, and the limitation of the action is not in this instance 60 days, but one year. The disqualification provided for is not limited to seven years, but to eight years. So we do not want any new law to provide for the case of offences by bribers. This being settled, what is the object to be attained by bringing this offence by the bribing party within the Bill? I cannot see any object. The effect of bringing the bribing party under the operation of this Bill will be to deprive the prosecuting party of the best witnesses we may find under the circumstances. It is very seldom that corruption is practised in open daylight. We see the effect of corruption in the open daylight, but the act of corrupting is generally carried out in the dark. If you expose the bribing party to the same penalty, and subject him to the same mode of punishment by this Bill as the bribed party, then you give a strong inducement to the bribing party not to tell the whole truth under oath when he can avoid it. So you deprive yourself of the best witness you may have. Thus, not only would there be no object whatever in making such provisions against the bribing party, but the result would be actually injurious. The object of this Bill is to reach a class of electors who are a great nuisance to everybody in the elections, men who go around among the election agents seeking to be corrupted. That is what we want; and the rest is already provided for. We need not complicate the present Bill by adding provisions, the effect of which can only be to interfere with its working. That is the reason I am opposed to the amendment. But, as I said, I do not believe the Bill as framed will carry out the object of its promoter. I believe that some amendments are necessary, so as to provide under the present Bill for a preliminary ex parte enquete, which would be reported to Parliament, and then we would have a general and regular enquete which would bring the guilty parties to punishment. If we have such a law, and carry out a series of these enquetes, thereby reaching this class of corrupt people, then disqualify them, and saddle them with the costs, it will only be necessary for us to deal with two or three counties in order to teach such a lesson to this corrupt class of electors that, in future, we may expect to have elections pure and honest, and reflecting the real opinion of the people.

Mr. JONCAS. Before six o'clock I expressed the opinion that the real desire of the promoter of this Bill was to prevent bribery and corruption. My hon. friend from Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot) says that there is no object in providing punishment for a man who bribes. Well, Sir, I quite admit that the present law severely punishes the briber, but we must not forget that the same law also provides for the punishment of the man who accepts a bribe. Section 85 of chapter 8 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, provides :

The following persons are also guilty of bribery, and shall be punishable accordingly :—

(a) Every voter who, before or during any election, directly or indirectly, himself or by any other person on his behalf, receives, agrees or contracts for any money, gift, loan or valuable consideration, office, place or appointment, for himself or for any other person, for voting or agreeing to vote, or for refraining or agreeing to refrain from voting at any election.

(b) Every person who, after any election, directly or indirectly, himself or by any other person on his behalf, receives any money or valuable consideration for having voted or refrained from voting, or for having induced any other person to vote or refrain from voting at any election.

And every person so offending is guilty of misdemeanour and shall also forfeit the sum of $200 to any person who sues for the same with costs.

So that by the law now existing the man who receives a bribe is guilty of the same offence as the man who offers it, he is guilty of misdemeanour which is punished the same as theft. We feel the need of a new law to prevent and stop bribery—I am not going to discuss now the utility of such a law—is it not also necessary, in order to make such a law effective, to punish the man who gives the bribe, as well as the man who takes it. Now, it is said that the intention of the promoters of this Bill is to strike from the electoral list the names of a few men who are not intelligent enough to appreciate the value of their franchise. Mr. Chairman, it is no use to attempt to conceal what is going on during an election. The men who offer bribes are generally men who have votes. They are more intelligent, perhaps, than the man who accepts the bribe, but they are electors in the riding, they are electors in the parish. In every parish and township in Canada there is what we call a head canvasser. The parish is generally divided up, as we all know, the county is generally divided up, and apportioned among ten, or fifteen, or twenty canvassers. These men are all electors, they are all responsible. I think the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Dickey) said that the man who offers a bribe has an opinion of his own, whereas the man who accepts it has none. Unfortunately, in too many instances the man who sells his vote is almost as respectable and as intelligent as the man who offers the bribe; and I say that if we feel the want of a law of this kind, in order to make it efficient, we must punish the man who offers the bribe with equal severity to the man who takes it. All these canvassers who go around through the parishes and counties have their pockets full of money for the purpose of buying votes. If these men are threatened with the loss of their franchise for a number of years, they will hesitate before offering bribes. I do not discuss the strict legal point of this question, but I say that if the intention of the promoter of this Bill is really to prevent corruption and bribery, if he does not limit himself to striking off the electoral list a few names, then he must admit that the best way to attain his object is to punish the man who offers the bribe and who, in my opinion, is much more guilty than the man who accepts it.

Mr. JEANNOTTE. The real question just now before the committee is whether the party who is guilty of corruption ought to be punished. The hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Dickey) says that the party who offers the bribe is usually a very intelligent gentleman, whereas the man who sells his vote is of no political party. Well, I think experience has proved the contrary. There is in every county or riding a man whom I will call an election broker—that is the name he is called in the United States—who takes charge of an election. These men have no politics at all. Their first object is to get money from the candidates. If the Conservative candidate, we will say, is able to hand them for distribution two, five, or ten thousand dollars, they are of his politics; but if the candidate of the Liberal party is able to make a still higher offer, they will leave the Conservative party and attach themselves to the Liberals. They have no more sense of honesty than the man who sells his vote for 50 cents or one dollar. They are no more intelligent, and they are worse, than the man who sells his vote. The man who sells his vote sells only one vote, and is not the inciter of corruption; but the man who goes around through the parish from door to door, trying to buy votes, is by far the more guilty man of the two. Now, I am surprised to find some Liberal members in this House opposing an amendment to punish the briber as well as the bribe-taker. It is said that the man who buys votes can be reached by the law now in existence, as well as the man who takes bribes. If the party who sells his vote is reached by the law, it is only in the case of a contested election. If there is no contested election, neither the man who buys nor the man who sells his vote are troubled at all. If an enquête takes place in an electoral division where there is no electoral trial, neither the man who gives the bribe nor the man who takes it will be troubled at all. But if there is a contestation, and it is proved that a man has bought votes, he is fined and disqualified, and the man who sells his vote is punished just the same. Now, if you make a new law especially for the party who sells his vote, why not make it applicable to the party who gives the money to buy that vote? Let me repeat that if there is no contestation of the election, if there is no protest, the man who gives bribes is not troubled at all. That is not the way to stop corruption. It seems to me that no man who is sincerely desirous of ascertaining the true sense of the electors in any division, can object to the punishment of the man who is guilty of offering bribes as well as the man who sells his vote. If the bribe-giver is more intelligent, he is ten times more corrupt than the man who sells his vote for 50 cents or $1. I do not think that this Bill if it should become law would prevent corruption. If the amendment is not adopted the Bill will cover corruption and give a chance to any candidate who wants to be elected, to buy as many votes as will be necessary to elect him. As soon as he has been elected he will allow a certain period to elapse in order that his election may not be contested. If a petition has been filed it may be proved that 200 or 300 electors were bought, but at the same time it may be proved that the candidate so elected does not represent the majority of the constituency. But if the law should provide that after an enquête has been held and a report made to this House there were more votes disqualified than the majority obtained, the candidate reported to be elected should lose his seat, I would favour such a provision. The effect would be apparent, because the candidate would be exposed to lose his seat if he were declared elected. That would be proper means to adopt to prevent corruption. I do not thoroughly understand how the hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon) holds such strong opinions against corruption when his Bill does not provide means to prevent it. There is nothing contained in the Bill to disqualify the party engaged in corrupt practices. No election broker will go round and spend money if he has not first obtained it from a candidate, agent, or committee. If he receives $2,000 from the candidate, he is apt to keep $1,000 for himself and spend the balance. He will buy votes for one, two or ten dollars, and for his own vote he will keep $200 or $300. It is difficult to believe, when as high a sum as $45,000 has been expended on an election, that the agent has not kept in his pocket $10,000. This does not represent his own labour or his use to the candidate, but it is largely retained for his own vote. That party who received $10,000 for doing the work, who would no doubt be considered an honest and intelligent man, would not be reached by this law, although he was the man who corrupted the constituency. I do not understand such a policy. I am against corruption, but I want to adopt the correct means to prevent it, and to punish the parties who buy votes, and more especially the candidate who has given money for corrupt purposes. I hope the hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon) will accept the amendment. The experience of the Imperial law, passed in 1852, showed that the law had been without avail, and that it did not prevent corruption, and even although the bribe-giver was punishable, the law was so framed that no one could be reached. In 'Hansard' of May 24th, 1852, I find that Col. Sibthorp, in the House of Commons, said :

He warned the Government against the man-traps and spring-guns set by the other side, for they would get caught if they did not mind. The Star Chamber was a farce compared with the tribunal which this Bill would create. It would send down commissioners, briefless barristers, he supposed, into various parts of the country and like poachers they would lie waiting for their prey in the darkness of the night, and endeavour to entrap innocent and unwary persons—persons less likely to be guilty of corruption than the noble lord himself.

I think the amendment should be accepted, and I understand the hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon) has given his word that he will accept it.

Mr. WELDON. I made a statement during the afternoon as to my views. The hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot) in the speech he made a few moments ago, and the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Dickey), stated my views on the matter. Any one who is eager to see bribery punished in this country could hardly ask for a more drastic law than section 84 of chapter 8 of the Revised Statutes, which makes the Act of giving bribes a misdemeanour punishable by five years in the penitentiary, and it also provides that any person who chooses to bring an action may recover $200. If hon. members ask for a law to punish bribery in dead earnest, what law can be more clear or direct than that. I am not trying to punish the briber or the bribee, but as the leader of the House said last year in stating the purpose of the Bill, and as I endeavoured to state last night in bringing the measure before the House, our object is purely and simply to take another way, a different way, to deal with this old difficulty. It is no answer to say that we are not covering the whole ground. If you are covering some part of the ground with reasonable hope of enacting useful legislation, surely that is worth while endeavouring to accomplish. It is no answer to say that you are not doing this and not doing the other, if you are adopting correct measures. I did say to the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Joncas) that I would not resist the amendment, or ask my friends to resist it. I did say to him as I say now. I must leave it, of course, to the judgment of the committee; but my own mind is against the amendment for the reasons which are given by my hon. friend for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot).

Mr. DUPONT. (Translation.) Mr. Chairman, no one more than my hon. colleagues and myself wishes to take any possible means to oppose bribery. There is no one among those who take part in political contests, but is anxious that bribery should be rooted out. And of all such people, no one is more interested than the candidates or members in the doing away with such an evil. Among the members particularly, and among those at large who take any part in electoral contests, there is no one that I know of but is anxious that bribery should cease its work of electoral devastation among the electoral body. Up to now, any action taken against bribery was grounded on what was done in England, in France and in every country where the parliamentary system is in force. Here, as in all other countries, bribery never ceased to be practised to a more or less large extent. Was that due to the laws that had been passed? No. Were laws wanting for the repression of bribery? Not that I know of, if I consult some authors who have written on this subject. The laws that were passed in relation to this question were never wanting in severity, and their numbers bear witness to the desire of those who made them to check this evil inherent to representative institutions. To only mention Canada, the laws contained in our statutes, and which tend to oppose bribery and punish it are not wanting. But what is wanting is good, efficient laws. I much praise the efforts of the hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon). I admire them and I praise his courageous attempt at punishing electoral bribery, but I think his Bill, at least such as it is, will never reach the end he has in view, and that it is not calculated to lessen in any way whatever bribery at our parliamentary elections. It is not the first time that such an attempt has been made. We have the Blake Act, which seems to me to be more perfect than the one now proposed; yet, although it has now been on our statutes for a good many years, no one that I know of ever asked the assistance of that law to do away with electoral bribery. No electoral riding ever thought of using it. What I would have, Mr. Chairman, is a good law, a law that would afford means to void the elections tainted with bribery, a law that would be more perfect than the one we now have, and that would reach the guilty candidates and members, the agents and all those people who offered bribes and depraved the moral sense of the voters, a law that would not only punish the candidates or members who are wholly innocent of any reprehensible action, when bribery was practised against their will and without their consent, to the detriment of their purse. What I would have is a good law that would reach the guilty ones, and would not cause innocent people to suffer. My hon. friend the member for Albert (Mr. Weldon) forgets that the real guilty party is the one who seduces the voters, who furnishes the money, the one who, by his mischievous actions, debauches the electoral body, the one who pays the agents to go and offer bribes and buy the voters. The real bribe-givers are the agents who go through the rural districts, go from door to door calling upon the most ignorant voters—for it is with them they stand the best chance of succeeding in their secret work—the agents, I say, who go and offer temptations to the voters the least cognizant of the law and political matters, who do not appreciate, therefore, the enormity of the social crime they commit, and who by listening to the mischievous advice of those agents of bribery, pervert the popular verdict and send to Parliament men who do not represent the majority of the county. This is due, no doubt, to the ignorance of the voters, guilty ignorance, I own, but is it not true, on the other hand, that this evil is the direct work of the agent who went and solicited and induced the voter to pervert the electoral verdict by selling his vote and accepting money to give it to a candidate who does not represent his political opinion. But there is more than that. There are such men as have political opinions; there are such voters as are for one or the other party, and they are not those who lend the most reluctant ear to the alluring promises and money offered by such agents of bribery. In all electoral bodies, however educated and intelligent they may be, there is also another class of voters whom such agents reach, and they are the individuals who have no political opinions. These ignorant voters accept money for their votes and they pervert the result of an election. Is it not reasonable to think that such individuals are less responsible for the wrong they do the electoral body than those who pay them for their votes, and the latter—I refer to the agents—will exercise their influence to propagate bribery. Those agents, as stated by the hon. members who preceded me, are as a rule more intelligent men than the generality of voters who forget themselves to the extent of selling their votes; they are, as a rule, men whose intelligence is superior to the intelligence of those they go and offer temptations to. They are certainly the most guilty ones, and therefore it is such people that the law should reach and severely punish. In setting forth these views, I am not relying merely on my own authority. It is the principle acknowledged by all the authors who have studied and written on this question of electoral bribery. The authors who made studies on bribery and representative institutions in general proclaim the principle of the greater responsibility of the agents and insist on their greater culpability. It is the opinion expressed by Mr. Antoine Lefèvre in his book, wherein he discourses on electoral laws and customs in France and England. That writer expresses very distinctly the opinion just mentioned by me. Mr. Lefèvre, referring to the degree of culpability of the bribe-giver and the bribe-taker, writes as follows, and it is the opinion of a writer who has given much study to the question, and who, therefore, deserves the full consideration of the committee. The lines I am about to read seem to have been written in view of this Bill, so much do they seem to distinctly apply to it:

It is to the honour of the legislation of Great Britain that it has extended in that path and has followed it to the end without any failing, never receding but always moving forward in that just fight for the purifying of elections, which was the siege of Troy, but also the conquest of Troy.

The question was not merely to add new laws to those already in force, it was applicable laws that were required. The powerlessness of the old laws had discredited them; they could hardly reach any but the least guilty people, while they allowed the more guilty ones to escape, and they were therefore at variance with that permanent need of equal justice of which the English people never disaccustomed themselves. Owing to the difficulties of the evidence, not only did the principal agents know how to escape the exorbitant fine which was to reach them; but the candidate himself on whose behalf the voters were bribed, and to whom one could have said with the great poet:

La faute en est... à toi, riche, à ton or, was almost sure of impurity. Of course, the law did not shield him with its indulgence.

Further on, he writes:

Mr. AMYOT. (Translation.) In what year was that written?

Mr. DUPONT. (Translation.) In 1870, I think.

Mr. AMYOT. (Translation.) The law he refers to was repealed since.

Mr. DUPONT. (Translation.) I know that.

Bribery has met so far with more intelligence, it knows how to conceal itself under more harmless appearances. Indeed it does not exert itself to the detriment of opinions, it rather works upon the indifference of voters. Therefore it will continue to intrench itself behind extenuating circumstances, so long as the opposition seems to attach to the one who sells his vote rather than to the one who buys it. In order that dishonour may do justice on bribery, the offence against honesty must appear as being committed much more by the one who gives than by the one who receives the gift. It is the feeling that now begins, if not to prevail, at least to be propagated, and it is easily found that the evil, if not yet found, is felt at all events. It is the first condition for a cure.

Thus, in England, as well as here, the public men who intended to put a stop to electoral bribery and who, indeed, worked in that direction, have thought of eradicating the evil by striking at the bribe-giver, at the one who supplies the money. My hon. friend considers that the law we now have in our statutes is sufficient against the briber. Well, if such be the case, it is equally sufficient against the bribee, since it is the same law. He wants to inquire into those who sell their votes. Why not inquire into those who buy them? The moment you know the one who buys the vote, you are in a position to trace his steps and discover those whom he called upon. It is just as important to make an inquiry in order to discover those who buy the votes than to make one against the wretched beings who sell their franchise. Bribery is practised in various ways. It is not only money that works as a bribery agency at elections. There is the undue influence. In England, leagues were formed among people of fashionable society. Ladies moving in the highest circles take a hand in electoral contests in favour of certain candidates or certain parties. They go to the great stores and threaten their owners to withdraw their patronage from them if they do not support the candidate of their choice. It is a manner of bribery. On other people, as stated by the author I have just quoted, this bribery influence takes the form of a gentle smile; gentle smiles are hard to catalogue. There are many ways of influencing the electorate. I think, therefore, that the amendment moved by the hon. member for Gaspé would improve this Bill. If the House is of the opinion that it should pass the Bill of the member for Albert, I think it should adopt the amendment of the hon. member for Gaspé. I would rather have the Bill put aside, though, and the Government take upon themselves, with the consent of the House, to pass a good controverted election act which would reach the guilty parties.

who are the suppliers of money, those who engage the agents who go and bribe the electorate. So long as you will not strike at these, you will to no purpose punish the miserable fellow who frequently believes he does not sell his vote, but merely gets paid for the time he takes in going to the poll. The amendment of the member for Gaspé has for its object to find out such buyers of votes and punish them. The punishment will be much more efficient with them than the one inflicted on those who are willing to receive money. For, as stated by the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Dickey), such men are more intelligent than those who are bought, and the moment they will find the law laying heavily upon them, they will become more cautious. When there will be no more agents to practise bribery, we may feel satisfied there will be no more bribery. I beg the hon. member for Albert and the supporters of his Bill to yield to evidence; if they wish to eradicate the evil, they must first crush down the recruiters of votes, and when they will have done that, electoral bribery will have disappeared from our habits.

Mr. AMYOT. (Translation.) The reasons just given by the hon. member for Bagot (Mr. Dupont) do not at all meet the arguments set forth. By striking at the corrupt people, we wish to reach the real guilty parties; and by corrupt people, I mean that class of men who, on polling days, prowl about the polls, waiting for money to go and vote. Unfortunately, one or the other of the candidates, or their agents, desirous of securing victory, finally yields to the temptation such a class of men offer them, and they offer them money or make promises to them in order to induce them to vote for the man whom they are working for. It is such people whom it is necessary to punish, for they vote for one or the other party without distinction as soon as they receive the bribing money they are fishing for. As for bribes, their punishment is already provided for, and fully, in the laws we now have. By this Bill, we intend to get at these political debauchees, and for that purpose we think it necessary to pass a special legislation. To reach that end, some evidence has to be made. Now, if you strike at the briber, you will not be able to make such evidence for want of the principal witness. It is a very important, if not an essential point in order to succeed in ascertaining the offence, as you will find no voter willing to inform against himself. That is the point that has to be answered. Were the amendment relating to the punishment of the briber adopted, there would not be a single witness to attest under oath that such and such a voter was bribed. We intend to punish that class of voters who try to sell their vote at every election. We want to put their names on a black list, for it is always such people who are an obstacle to electoral purity. We are all anxious that our elections should be carried on in the most proper and purest possible way. We are all tending to the same thing, but we are at variance as to the means that should be taken to reach the end.

Mr. DUPONT. (Translation.) I am pleased to reply to the observations of my hon. friend the member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot). We wish for election purity, and that is why we want to get at the briber, because he is more guilty than the bribee.

Mr. AMYOT. (Translation.) It is already done by existing laws.

Mr. DUPONT. (Translation.) No, you will come short of your purpose. The evil must be eradicated. As for witnesses, it will be very easy to turn the difficulty pointed out by my hon. friend. When it will be understood that we have eradicated the evil by getting at the briber, the voters will know that electoral agents can no more give them any money; they will ask for none and will no more try to sell their votes. Let it be known once for all that there will be no more buyers and there will be no more bought people.

Mr. AMYOT. (Translation.) Yes, when two Sundays will come together.

Mr. DUPONT. (Translation.) I think the bribers must be punished first, so as to prevent them making any victims. When they will be all crushed down, the bribees will next disappear. Therefore, we must apply ourselves to the removing of the bribers, because they are the most clever and intelligent people among those who take part in electoral corruption.

Mr. RINFRET. (Translation.) Does not the existing law provide the means to get at the briber?

Mr. DUPONT. (Translation.) It also punishes the bribees.

Mr. AMYOT. (Translation.) Very leniently.

Mr. DUPONT. (Translation.) I want electoral bribery to be eradicated; that is why I want a law that should look for and severely punish the one who buys the voters. There is the capital point of the evil. We must punish those who use their money in making victims, in sowing perjury and dishonour. If my hon. friend from Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot) intends to oppose bribery, let him join with us to root it out by removing its most active, clever and intelligent agents; I mean the bribers. And, when we will have succeeded in that undertaking, we will then be in a position to say that all those who will come and sit here do really represent the will of the majority of the voters, freely and independently expressed, and never could a doubt be cast on the honesty and purity of their election.

Mr. JONCAS. (Translation.) If my hon. friend from Albert is earnest—and I have no reason to doubt that he is—I am sure he will yield to the arguments of my hon. friend from Bagot. The hon. member for Bellechasse used a rather queer argument in opposing my amendment. He says he intends by this Bill to reach the bribee, but he wishes to protect the briber, because he wants him as a witness. Should the existing laws be inadequate to stem the tide of corruption which threatens us and is rising from year to year, then let us pass the Bill now before us. But, if this new law is necessary, let us punish both the briber and bribee. As just stated by the hon. member for Bagot, the root of the evil lies in the fact that there are agents in every county who, well furnished with money, go over the parishes for the purpose of bribing the voters. I grant that there are in every parish, in every county, a certain number of voters forming a nucleus, who have no political convictions, or, if having any, are always ready to sell them. I grant that in many cases this nucleus of voters holds the balance of power, and that it is important that measures should be taken to check this ever-increasing evil. But you will agree with me that as soon as the required measures will be taken to cause the briber to understand that he can no more carry on his operations with impunity, a longer step will have been taken in the way of a remedy to the existing evil than by striking a few names out of the list of voters. The strongest argument made against my amendment is this: they say: The existing law provides for the severe punishment of the one who buys the votes. I grant it; but they forget to say that the same law also provides for the severe punishment of those who sell their votes. Under the existing law, bribers and bribees are put on an equal footing. Then, why not put in this Bill the briber and bribee on an equal footing? All our existing laws punish both the briber and bribee. It is contended that the laws already extant are inadequate to stem this tide of corruption, and they propose a new law. I wonder why they decline in this new law to punish briber and bribee in the same way. I have just read clause 85 of chapter 8 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, which declares guilty of misdemeanour the person who sold his vote. But it goes further; it declares that the person who will have sold his vote will be disqualified, will lose his civil rights. That is what is inferred from section 98. I may be allowed to quote that section in full:

98. Every person other than a candidate, found guilty of any corrupt practice in any proceeding in which, after notice of the charge, he has had an opportunity of being heard, shall, during the eight years next after the time at which he is so found guilty, be incapable of being elected to, and of sitting in the House of Commons, and of voting at any election of a member of the House of Commons, or of holding any office in the nomination of the Crown or of the Governor General in Canada.

Well, is not that provision severe enough with respect to the man who sells his vote? It is as severe with respect to him as it is with respect to the one who buys a vote; and if my hon. friend from Albert refuses to accept the amendment made by me, I will feel justified in saying that the law he proposes is quite useless, since the existing law punishes both briber and bribee. I cannot understand why those who are earnestly willing to check corruption refuse to punish the briber. It seems plain to me that, if you first punish the bribe-giver, and punish him more severely than the bribe-taker, you will have found the means of checking electoral bribery more effectually. For these reasons I hope the hon. member for Albert will not object to the amendment I have moved.

Mr. JEANNOTTE. (Translation.) Mr. Chairman, I thought the hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon) was going to accept the amendment of the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Joncas). The hon. member for Bellechasse has just stated that the bribe-giver must not be punished, because he has to be kept as a witness. It is a principle he very likely never used in arguing his cases before courts of justice, for he is too expert a lawyer not to admit that this is a principle which would not be accepted by any court. Under this new doctrine, in order to have a good witness, one would only have to secure the services of a briber, of a man whose reputation is ruined. The law ought also to enact that the thief will not be punished, but only the receiver of stolen goods. It would not be the principal criminal, but his accomplice, who would have to apprehend the law. This is very unsound morals. It shows to me that the Bill is worse still than I thought. No, Mr. Chairman, we must not think of securing impunity to the principal culprit in order to have him as a witness. We must, on the contrary, have none but honest and respectable witnesses, men who never were liable to any of the punishments or penalties inflicted by law. I already stated, in the course of the debate on this Bill, that it did not tend to prevent corruption, but, on the contrary, to promote it. All that which is going on now, all that which is stated is to me new evidence that I was right. Therefore, it will be admitted that I am doing my duty in opposing it with all my might. I need no bribery to be returned, and I will never come back in this House if such fraudulent means have to be used to win over a majority in my county. I do not want to be returned by having recourse to the buying of votes or distribution of whisky. Proceeding from that principle, I say that the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot) was wrong, and that the reason he gave was not an earnest one. In support of his contention, the hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon) read section 84 of the Elections Act. Why did he not read section 85? I am compelled to read that section 85, since the hon. member did not deem it proper to read it. It enacts:

Mr. JONCAS.

The following persons are also guilty of bribery, and shall be punishable accordingly:

Every voter who, before or during any election, directly or indirectly, himself or by any other person on his behalf, receives, agrees or contracts for any money, gift, loan or valuable consideration, office, place or employment, for himself or any other person, for voting or agreeing to vote, or for refraining or agreeing to refrain from voting at any election.

Every person who, after election, directly, or indirectly, himself or by any other person on his behalf, receives any money or valuable consideration for having voted or refrained from voting, or for having induced any other person to vote or refrain from voting at any election;

And every person so offending is guilty of a misdemeanour, and shall also forfeit the sum of two hundred dollars to any person who sues for the same, with costs.

That is severe enough. We who are for the amendment, we want it because we are desirous to put a stop to corruption. We do not intend to protect the larger to the detriment of the lesser guilty parties, we do not intend to protect the bribers to the detriment of the people they bribed. We want to strike at those who with their money go and buy fifty or a hundred voters and thus carry the section for the candidate who does not enjoy the real confidence of the majority. We do not want to protect the gentleman, the intelligent man, as stated by some, because he is the greater culprit. He is the father of the evil and he deserves a severer punishment than the other. The Bill now before the committee enacts that the one who sold his vote will be disqualified for seven years. Why should not the one who bought such a vote be punished likewise? Under the Elections Act, the person disqualified for seven years cannot be a member nor hold any position under the Government. Does this Bill go to that length? Not at all. It merely states that the voter will be deprived of his franchise, but he may hold a position under the Crown, be a member and come and sit in this House, for there is nothing in the Bill to the contrary. He may come and sit here and satirize those who have passed such a law. He may even be appointed Lieutenant-Governor of a province, or collector of customs at Montreal, for instance, a position now vacant, for there is nothing that forbids it. So that the hon. member for Albert and the supporters of his Bill are in favour of corruption. Some papers will vainly cry out that we are in favour of corruption because we oppose this Bill. It is quite the contrary. We are so much against corruption and so anxious to protect the good name of Canada and that of the Canadian people that we do not want a law which would result in its lessening. An English member, Col. Sibthorp, referring to the Bill against electoral corruption proposed in the English House of Commons in 1852—and the Bill now before the committee is but a copy of this English Bill—stated, as reported in 'Hansard Parliamentary Debates,' volume 70 :

Mr. SCRIVER. (Translation.) In French.

Mr. JEANNOTTE. I shall translate it in French after. I will give you a little lesson in French ; I know you want it. After this debate I think you will understand French as well as I understand English. (Translation.) I will now resume the quotation from Colonel Sibthorp :

He thought the measure was utterly indefensible as to its mode of operation. The pure paid Commissioners it appointed were to go down into the boroughs and cities from time to time to seek for corruption. He conceived the bill was meant to encourage a class of men going about as spies in every city and borough in the Kingdom. It was a cowardly, dastardly measure, and full of meanness. Nobody, of course, would call that influence corruption which was used by government in certain seaports and other places where there was a great expenditure of public money ; but if an independent member, happened to go into a miserable cottage in the place he represented and finding a man lying in sickness and want, and perform toward him those christian duties of charity and kindness which, he thanked God, had been early impressed upon his mind, and which he had never forgotten, that, he supposed, would be made a corrupt practice, and the member would jeopardise his seat. Indeed it was highly dangerous nowadays to give a voter even a pinch of snuff. He knew that to oppose such a bill as this was difficult ; but he could not allow it to be read a second time without expressing his deep regret that its provisions should be such as would prevent the slightest exercise of Christian charity by a member towards his poorer constituents. Let the bill pass, however, and he would go on as he had ever done. He had never been guilty of any malpractices at elections ; and he wished every member had as clean hands as he had. He feared it would take an enormous quantity of soap to purify some of them. He had never controlled or restricted in any degree the humblest labouring man in his employ ; and let the consequences be what they might, he should never forget the duties every man ought to perform in this world toward his poorer neighbours.

(Translation.) Since the Controverted Election Law was passed, how many elections were protested before the courts ? One-fourth ? No. A twentieth part ? I doubt it. It is the few whose fate was decided upon by courts of justice.

Mr. AMYOT. (Translation.) Let the hon. member read section 106 of the Controverted Elections Act and he will find that this is provided for.

Mr. JEANNOTTE. (Translation.) I have read that section 106. It is well known. Here it is :

106. All penalties and forfeitures (other than fines in cases of misdemeanour) imposed by this Act, shall be recoverable or enforceable with full costs of suit, by any person who sues for the same by action of debt or information, in any court of competent jurisdiction in the province in which the cause of action arises, and in default of payment of the amount which the offender is condemned to pay, within the period fixed by the court, the offender shall be imprisoned in the common jail of the county or district for any term less than two years, unless such penalty and costs are sooner paid ; but no action or information for the recovery of any such penalty or forfeiture shall be commenced unless the person suing for the same has given good and sufficient security, to the amount of fifty dollars, to indemnify the defendant for the costs occasioned by his defence, if the person suing is condemned to pay the same. 37 Vict., chap. 9, sect. 109 ; 46 Vict., chap. 4, sect. 1.

I think the hon. member for Bellechasse intended to play me a trick, for this condemns his own contention. That section 106 condemns the Bill of the member for Albert (Mr. Weldon). If this section 106 punishes all those who practised bribery, why should he introduce a Bill stating that hereafter the bought voter will only be disqualified for seven years, while the existing law condemns such a voter to an imprisonment for two years and to pay a fine ? Any one may take proceedings against that elector before a criminal or civil court and have him punished. The hon. member for Gaspé stated that electoral corruption is now prevailing more than ever. I think he is mistaken. It is a well known fact that there is now less corruption at elections than twenty years ago. Thus, for instance, I know of counties where, twenty or twenty-five years ago, a candidate had to spend $17,500 to get returned, while now he gets returned there by acclamation, without spending a single dollar. People are so moral that they even think no more of such corrupt practices. They select men whom they trust and send them as their representatives in Parliament. I wonder if this is the way they intend to deceive the electorate. Yesterday I heard some gentlemen opposite state, in connection with an increase of three cents per pound upon woollens : You intend to deceive the people, but the people are enlightened, they will not allow themselves to be deceived by such humbug ; three cents per pound will not protect them, for they want foreign wool and you are going to increase the manufacturer's price. This argument, in my opinion, did not hold good, because it is the farmer who will be benefited by that increase of three cents per pound. If the Bill now before the House had such an object in view, if at least its provisions were more severe against bribery than the existing laws, I would say : They wish for the good of the electorate, they wish to prevent corruption. But such is not the case. There may be extensive bribery in the province of the hon. member for Albert ; maybe they give out $10,000 to get returned there ; but they give it to an election broker. That election broker is a gentleman whom they must protect he is an innocent man. Then it would come to this: that the devil is more cunning than God Almighty and he should be rewarded; he is a gentleman. This Bill is therefore subversive of all the principles so far admitted as true. I therefore repeat, and it will be my concluding observation, that this Bill tends to protect corruption. It will enable a person to get returned through bribery. I could very easily show before concluding that the reasons given against the amendment are very poor indeed. One has only to read the law to see the futility of the contention set forth. Section 107 of the Revised Statutes I have already quoted, enacts as follows:—

It shall be sufficient for the plaintiff, in any action or suit under this Act to allege in his pleading or declaration that the defendant is indebted to him in the sum of money thereby demanded, and to allege the particular offence in respect of which the action or suit is brought and that the defendant has acted contrary to this Act, without mentioning the writ of election or the return thereof.

Thus the plaintiff has only to claim the sum and he at once obtains judgment, the court decides in his favour. It is much more expeditious. Under this Bill, the judge may summon before him any one he likes. But, as he cannot sit during the regular terms, he will be forced to adjourn his inquiry. The proceedings will be put off from week to week, from month to month, and will, perhaps, last a whole year. There are complaints already made that judges indulge in politics on the bench. We know what complaints were raised in the province of Quebec. They were referred to in the press. The hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte) even made much fuss about that. How could the judge, appointed to make such an inquiry, succeed in giving satisfaction to everybody? You compel him to come down from the bench and condemn political opponents. Should he disqualify Conservative voters, the people will not fail to say: Had it been a Conservative judge it would not have happened. Should he disqualify Liberal voters, they will say: Ah, had the judge been a Liberal, the result would have been quite a difference. In the inquiries which were made by certain judges of the province of Quebec, some people were scandalized to see judges coming down from the bench to conduct such inquiries. What would it be should this Bill be passed? The election jobber, the broker, will always know how to protect himself and get sheltered from the punishment inflicted by law. You will not succeed in reaching him. The existing law is much more efficient than the one proposed. Under this Bill, a voter will simply be asked whether he received any money for his vote, whether he sold his franchise for a mess of pottage. The election jobber, in order to conceal his designs, will say to the voter: Vote as I tell you, and we will settle that when the election is over. The voter, in such a case, will be able to swear that he received nothing for his vote. The hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot) contends that we must not get at the briber, because he is necessary to make evidence. But how will we know whether he is necessary if he is not examined? We will have to summon all the agents of the candidates and to ask them whether they practiced bribery. These agents will say: What do you want to know of me? Do you want to know whether Peter received any money, whether James sold his vote. But, however, before answering, he will require from you that you should give him some particulars. The election jobber, with such a law, will be perfectly safe. He will give no money to the voters, but will hand it over to a sub-agent, and he will be able to say: I have indulged in no corrupt practices. If the promoter of this Bill was earnestly desirous of preventing corruption, he would, as stated by the hon. member for Bagot, begin by the beginning, that is to say, by punishing those who supply money to carry on the elections. As stated by the hon. member for Bagot, if there was no one willing to give any money, no voters would sell his vote. This Bill is neither more nor less than an indirect way to lure the voters and to shield, through legal means, the election jobbers, such people as undertake, for a money consideration, to do the dirty work of an election. A man who sells his vote is a criminal and deserves to lose his franchise, and also deserves to be driven out of society, as he actually is. But the man who buys his fellow-citizen commits as great a crime; he buys political liberty, he prevents a voter from using his intelligence and his free will. It was stated that the poor labourers were the only people who sold their votes; I deny that. No doubt it sometimes happens that the poor fellow who is in need of a dollar to provide for his family, sells his vote. But it is not a single dollar, but a hundred dollars that is required by the man who has sufficient means to live by himself; and if this Bill should become law, that man will become an election jobber. That is to say, instead of buying others, he will buy himself with the $100 he will have received, and, to cover himself, he will say: I did not sell my vote, but I had charge to buy votes. Peter, who will receive $10 of election money, will say: Here now, it is not for my vote that I receive this, but it is to buy my neighbour Lewis, and my other neighbour, Paul. He will go to these and say to them: You know, we vote on the same side. Here is a dollar for you, Lewis, and here is fifty cents for you, Paul; it is not to buy your vote, it is to pay for your time. And Peter will keep eight dollars and a half in his pocket, and it will be impossible to get at him. Another man who will receive $5 of election money will say: I am not selling my vote for $5, but to help you carrying your election—because I know that you belong to the Government party, that you are an honest man, and that your candidate will give good votes in the House—I accept the $5. Well, that man is covered again. Should any one come and tell him that he sold his vote, he will answer: No; I am an honest man, I am an intelligent man, I read the papers, I go and hear the great political speakers, such as the hon. leader of the Opposition; oh! my neighbours may have sold their votes, but I have not. This Bill is just the Bill to enable a candidate to get returned who could not get returned otherwise than by practicing bribery. We know the ways of bribers at election times. They do not go to a voter and propose to him bluntly to buy his vote. They say to him: Here is a dollar, two, five, twenty dollars; it is not for your vote it is for your influence. Go to your neighbour and induce him to vote for my candidate. Such a voter will swear before the committee of inquiry that he never received any money for his vote, but that he was paid as an agent. Of what use, then, will be this Bill? It is what I cannot see. Why, then, drag the judges into politics?

Mr. CHOQUETTE. (Translation.) The little Bench.

Mr. JEANNOTTE. (Translation.) Yes, it will be the worst little Bench that ever existed. They much criticised the inquiries made by the Government into certain facts made by the judges at the request of the Government of the province of Quebec. However, in these cases the charges or facts were such that the whole province of Quebec was stirred up. But here the case is much more objectionable. They seek to establish hundreds of little Benches. In the case I have just referred to, the whole population of the province of Quebec rose in a body against the guilty parties. There was therefore justification. Both parties were represented at the inquiry, and if part of the inquiry was carried on 'ex parte,' it was because the accused parties were unwilling to appear before the court and defend themselves. I will sum up, Mr. Chairman, for I do not wish to detain the committee any longer, although I would still have much to say. I will sum up by saying that I support the amendment now before the House for the following reasons: First, because sections 84, 85 and 106 of the Controverted Elections Act give us all the necessary means to prevent corruption and punish the party who becomes guilty of it, either by offering or taking bribes, for our law punishes the briber as well as the bribed. It is a plain, clear, definite law. We have only to use it to thoroughly succeed in purifying the political atmosphere. Secondly, because this Bill does not tend to prevent corruption, but rather to protect the briber. Thirdly, because this Bill is not an earnest one either in its means or its object. Under existing laws, the voter who accepted money may be fined $200, and, in default of payment, condemned to an imprisonment for two years and disqualification for eight years. Under section 98, already quoted by me, he loses his political rights and cannot accept any position under the Government, not even that of messenger. Under this Bill now before the House a man having sold his vote will be disqualified, but he can accept any charge under the Crown. He may be appointed Collector of Customs, Post Office Inspector, with a salary of $4,000 or $5,000 a year. He can even be returned as a member of Parliament.

Mr. WELDON. My hon. friend (Mr. Jeannotte) appears to have thoroughly exhausted the subject now. Might I ask that in justice and in fair play, he would allow the sense of the House to be taken on the question?

Mr. JEANNOTTE. (Translation.) Mr. Chairman, there is one thing certain, it is that when I spoke on that question the other day, I was in earnest, and that what I said was perfectly true and to the question. I showed the injurious effects of this Bill, not only for three or four voters, but for the whole Dominion of Canada. I am now considering another question, having as much importance. I exceedingly regret that the hon. member for Albert should lose patience. If he is only willing to listen to me, he will learn French in a very short time, and when familiar with it, he will enjoy it. My object is to come to practical means whereby corruption may be prevented. But I am told: You have discoursed on that during two sittings already. It is true, but we have already spent two months discussing the tariff. In my opinion, it was a less important question than the one we are now discussing. The hon. members spoke on the tariff from twenty to thirty times in a single day. It was all very well for them; they spoke in English, while I am speaking in French. If my hon. friend from Albert had been willing to accept the amendment proposed, the discussion would have been finished long before this.

Mr. WELDON. I rise to correct the hon. gentleman most emphatically. I made the statement that I would not resist the amendment, but it is not for me or any one else to say that the amendment would be accepted. I said I would prefer the Bill as it stands, but I would not resist the amendment; but whether it will be accepted or not rests in the judgment of the committee.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. (Translation.) The hon. member (Mr. Jeannotte) ought to allow the Committee to divide on this question.

Mr. JEANNOTTE. (Translation.) But, Mr. Chairman, after the division I will have no more right to speak. I am not speaking for the mere sake of the thing. I am discussing an important question. When some hon. members spoke no less than 20 times on a question of 2 cents per pound upon wool, I did not blame them. Every one has a right to express his opinions, and it is hard to please everybody. I want to prevent corruption, and I am told: You speak too long, you make yourself disagreeable to the House. I do not want to be told at the next general election: You were in the House in favour of bribery; a Bill was introduced which had for its object to favour corruption, and you, Jeannotte, you were wanting in your duty; you did not oppose such a Bill. There is one thing, Mr. Chairman, that must not be lost sight of. It is that the Bill now before the Committee is not as good as the provision embodied in section 108 of the Revised Statutes. I will show that the existing law is a hundred times more severe for the bribe-taker than the Bill we are now discussing. That section reads as follows:—

108. In any such civil action, suit or proceeding, the parties to the same and the husbands or wives of such parties respectively, shall be competent and compellable to give evidence, to the same extent and subject to the same exceptions as in other civil suits in the same province; but such evidence shall not thereafter be used in any indictment or criminal proceeding under this Act against the party or person giving it. 37 Vic., chap. 9, sec. 111.

Under this section, the wife or children of the voter suspected of having taken bribes can be summoned as witnesses. We all know that it is the wife who receives the corrupting money, but she is very intelligent, and she says to her husband: Go and vote and do as told by that gentleman, it is all right. It will be the husband who will be summoned to give evidence at the inquiry made under this Bill. He will simply say that he never received any money for his vote, and he will tell the truth. What will be the result of your inquiry? The election jobber will address himself to the wife, sister or daughter of the voter, he will give them the sum agreed upon; but as the voter will know nothing of that or will ignore it, he will go and vote as told by his wife, and he will swear that he never was bought. Whatever may be said to the contrary, the voter is intelligent enough not to receive anything directly, it is through the wife that bribery is practised. The election broker pockets the most of the money handed to him, but he does not boast of it. Section 109 of the Revised Statutes enacts thus:

109. No person shall be excused from answering any question put to him in any action, suit or other proceeding, in any court, or before any judge, commissioner or other tribunal, touching or concerning any election, or the conduct of any person thereat, or in relation thereto, on the ground of any privilege, or on the ground that the answer to such question will tend to criminate such person; but no answer given by any person claiming to be excused on the ground of privilege, or on the ground that such answer will tend to criminate himself, shall be used in any criminal proceeding against such person other than an indictment for perjury, if the judge, commissioner or president of the tribunal gives to the witness a certificate that he claimed the right to be excused on either of the grounds aforesaid, and made full and true answers to the satisfaction of the judge, commissioner or tribunal. 37 Vic., chap. 9, sec. 99.

The court is bound to answer any question that may be put to him. The wife herself is bound to answer, though her answers might criminate her husband. There is no such thing in this Bill. There is nothing to compel a witness to answer questions that might criminate him, for the judge will not be empowered to extend the meaning of the law beyond what is involved in its wording, and then what will you come to? The witness will say: I decline to answer, because I do not wish to criminate myself, and there is nothing whereby I am bound to answer. Who can tell whether the answers would not cause some prosecution? Neither is there anything stated in the Bill with respect to the wife. It is not stated that she will be bound to answer the questions put to her. But the briber is left alone; he is allowed to prowl about his prey, like the raven about a mass of nauseous refuse. He is a gentleman, he is an intelligent man, do you see; you must not touch him. We are opposed to corruption, we want the voter not to sell his vote, that is why we are anxious to do away with the bribe-giver. The Blake Act was more definite and earnest than this Bill. Who ever used it since it was passed? Nobody. Yet under it the party asking for an inquiry had no deposit to make. If I oppose the Bill of the hon. member for Albert, it is to show to the country that those who are opposed to it are earnest men, who repudiate bribery. Now, in order to show that the Election Act now in force is more fair to the party unjustly accused than this Bill of the hon. member for Albert, I will quote section 111, which reads:

111. In case of an indictment or information by a private prosecutor for any offence against the provisions of this Act, if judgment is given for the defendant, he shall be entitled to recover from the prosecutor the costs sustained by the defendant by reason of such indictment or information, which costs shall be taxed by the proper officer of the court in which the judgment is given.

So that if the party unjustly accused before the court proves his innocence, he recovers all his costs from the prosecutor. This is an earnest provision which at once prevents corruption; such a law was not intended to favour the bribe-giver. I did not intend, Mr. Chairman, to detain the House so long; but the question in which we are interested is such an important one that I am compelled to explain it rather fully. As I stated a moment ago, I consider it as much more important than a tax of three cents on wools. A tax of three cents per pound is not much, compared with the honour of a citizen. I am, therefore, justified in dwelling upon this point, in order to show to the Committee that they should not adopt this Bill. The citizen unjustly accused will be dragged before the court and compelled to prove his innocence. But even though he should succeed in proving that he is in no wise guilty, backbiters and jealous people will always contend that there was something in it. Had he not been guilty, will they say, he would not have been compelled to defend himself. That citizen will see his honour wane through the prosecution legalized by this Bill. Do you think that the accused party, cleared by the grand jury with a verdict of "not guilty," comes out of the court as white, in the opinion of his fellow-citizens, as he was before? Unfortunately, such is not the case. By passing this Bill, you will, therefore, assume an enormous responsibility, by enabling envious people to unjustly accuse honourable citizens, who will be compelled to spend their money to defend themselves. Should the accused person only have $100 at his disposal, he will be compelled to spend them to protect his own honour and that of his wife and children, children who are the new generation and the voters of to-morrow. I shall conclude, Mr. Chairman, and I hope I have not abused the patience nor hurt the feelings of any one. I will here conclude my observations, reserving my right to discuss the other sections of the Bill, in order to explain my views with respect to this legislation.

Amendment negatived: yeas, 19; nays, 32.

Mr. JEANNOTTE moved that the committee rise.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. On that motion I want to call the attention of the committee to the state of this Bill. Of course, it would be highly improper for me even to doubt the sincerity of the discussion which has lasted so many days, and, therefore, I will say that this is obviously a bill that requires a vast amount of consideration and discussion by the House. The number of days at the disposal of the House to finish the Bill is very small, and it will be obviously necessary, if we are to preserve the credit of the House, that we should sit up all night for the purpose either of completing the passage of the Bill or defeating it. Because, surely, after four or five days' discussion, the House ought to be able to make up its mind whether to pass the Bill or not, and this decision it must, for its credit, arrive at if it has to sit all summer in order to do so. Therefore, I hope the committee will not consent to the motion to rise.

Motion negatived.

On section 7.

Mr. AMYOT. I have an amendment to clause 6.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I declared clause 6 carried; we are now on clause 7.

Mr. AMYOT. That is not the best way to make progress with the Bill.

Mr. SCRIVER. I think you are mistaken, Mr. Chairman. The amendment was defeated, and immediately after you declared the result of that, the hon. member for L'Assomption moved that the committee rise.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. After the amendment was declared lost, I asked if clause 6 should pass, and I understood that it was agreed to, and I declared it carried.

Mr. CHARLTON. Hon. gentlemen have failed to watch closely the proceedings of the committee. You did ask, Mr. Chairman, whether section 6 passed, and you declared that it was carried.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I think that was a mistake. The question was about the amendment first. That was lost. Then the hon. member for L'Assomption moved that the committee rise. On that the First Minister rose and made the statement he did just now. As soon as he sat down the question was put on the motion that the committee rise. That was lost, and the sixth clause was not put to the committee.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I suppose I may give my version too. The amendment of the hon. member for Gaspé was put and lost, the yeas and nays being taken. Immediately after I declared it lost, I asked whether clause 6 should be adopted, and I declared it carried. The hon. member for L'Assomption then rose and moved that I leave the Chair, and I called for the votes of the committee and I declared the motion lost. Now we are on clause 7. That is my view.

Mr. AMYOT. We are on clause 6. It is only the Chairman who is on clause 7. All the rest of us want to be on clause 6.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. We must sustain the Chair.

Mr. AMYOT. I beg to appeal from your decision, Mr. Chairman.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I understand that the hon. gentleman desires to move another amendment. There will be other stages of the Bill at which that may be done, and it would be better to move it at another stage, after the Chairman's ruling.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) But the mere fact of the Chairman ruling does not settle the matter. I have no interest in stopping the Bill ; I am rather the other way ; but I like to see fair play. There was no question put as to the adoption of clause 6.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I submit that we cannot discuss that after the Chair has decided. We can only have an appeal from his ruling.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) It is a question of fact, and if I contested it as the hon. member for Bellechasse does, I would appeal to the committee. It is absurd to say that the dictum of the Chairman shall control the whole House.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. That is the remedy.

Mr. LAURIER. For my part, I did not know that the question was put at all. If the Chairman says it was, we must take his statement ; but the Chairman must see that he could not have put the question, because otherwise the amendment would have been moved.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. After the motion of the hon. member for Gaspé was defeated and I said lost, I said : " Shall clause 6 be adopted ? " and my decision is that clause 6 has been carried. The only remedy for an hon. member is to appeal to the House.

Mr. FREMONT. I remember perfectly well that when the amendment moved by the hon. member for Gaspé was declared lost, you asked whether the clause should be adopted, and I remember myself calling out " carried ; " and you declared the clause carried. There are a certain number of members of this House who state that they were not cognizant of the fact ; but there are other members who say that they do recollect it, and I should think that their evidence is worth a great deal more than that of those who did not notice it. As a matter of practice, if the committee desire to reconsider their decision, they might do so ; but as a matter of fact, the clause has certainly been carried.

On section 7,

Mr. AMYOT. Before this clause 7 is adopted, I move, in amendment, that the following words be added :—

It shall also be the duty of the judge to be satisfied that the parties implicated in the charges of corruption have been served with a notice of the charge, and have had the opportunity of offering their own evidence.

I would have offered this amendment to clause 6, but as that clause was carried before I had an opportunity of offering it, I now move it in amendment to clause 7. This amendment is also preliminary to another clause, which I will propose latter as clause number 13.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.)

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman cannot move this amendment to clause 7, as it is not relevant to that clause. He may make it a special clause when we come to the foot of the Bill. It has no relation to clause 7, which is under discussion.

Mr. AMYOT. We must find some means of expressing our views. I understand the rule is that this motion is not in order.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. It is not relevant, and can only be brought down as a separate clause.

Mr. AMYOT. Clause 7 has relation to the rules of practice to be made, and I will move the following amendment :—

It shall also be the duty of the judge to be satisfied that the parties implicated in charges of corruption have been served with a notice of the charge, and have had an opportunity of offering their own evidence, and the judges will make rules of practice to that effect.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The amendment falls under clause 7 by the few words the hon. gentleman has added to it, but it is perfectly ridiculous. If the committee choose to adopt it they can do so.

Mr. AMYOT. Is it the ruling of the Chair that the motion is ridiculous ?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. AMYOT. This is a serious matter. Here we are subjected not only to see the legality of a question decided by the Chair, but even its propriety. Even if it is declared nonsensical by the Chair, we have to submit to that decision or appeal from it, and I want to know if that is the decision of the Chair ?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Yes, it is the decision of the Chair. The amendment of the hon. gentleman was made after clause 6 had been carried, and was intended as an amendment to clause 6. But when the hon. gentleman found that his amendment was not in order, as we were on clause 7, he added to it the words : " and the judges will make rules of practice to that effect," which brings his amendment under clause 7, although the two clauses have no relation whatever to each other. And that is why I say the amendment is perfectly ridiculous, but is still in order.

Mr. AMYOT. I need not say that I will defend my amendment, though it be ridiculous. The decision of the Chair is so bright, so within the rules and the spirit of the rules of the House that I will not say a word about it. I can only congratulate the House and the committee on having so well-enlightened a Chairman.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Order. The hon. gentleman has not the right to pay compliments to the Chair.

Mr. AMYOT. As my motion is ridiculous, I may make a ridiculous speech, and have the right to continue in the same strain as my motion. I am only praising the Chair, and I cannot see why the Chair should stop me. I am defending my ridiculous amendment, and surely I must have some rights. I understand that the amendment has been decided in order, and, as I want to test the sense of the House, I beg to submit my ridiculous motion to the committee.

Mr. DUPONT. (Translation.) I think you have no right, Mr. Chairman, to make any remarks on the motions put into your hands, nor to qualify them, nor pronounce on their worth.

Mr. BELLEY. (Translation.) I fully agree with the hon. member for Bagot (Mr. Dupont); it seems to me we ought to be allowed to express our views as we like, without being exposed to the censure of the Chairman of the Committee. The amendments we propose are made with good faith, and I must ask the Chairman to be pleased to accept them as such.

On section 11,

Mr. JEANNOTTE. (Translation.) Mr. Chairman, before you declare this section passed, I wish to make a few observations, at the risk of having them qualified as absurd and ridiculous. What will happen if I succeed in showing that there are only twenty-two voters? Yet the petition is stated to be evidence by itself. It might very well happen that two or three petitioners should die in the interval, and how will the judge be able to proceed, if he has not the required number of petitioners? I think it is a most arbitrary measure. Therefore, I will deem it my duty to move an amendment if this clause is not changed.

Mr. AMYOT. (Translation.) The words "prima facie" will not prevent the giving of the evidence referred to by the hon. member.

Mr. JEANNOTTE. (Translation.) If that is the meaning the House gives to that section, very well.

On section 12,

Mr. JEANNOTTE. (Translation.) The deposit of $500 will be there to pay the expenses of the court, but who will pay the witnesses; I mean the travelling expenses and maintenance?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. It is proposed to strike out section 12 and replace it with the following:—

The judges shall award for every witness summoned a reasonable sum of money for his travelling expenses and his subsistence, which sum of money shall be paid to him at the same time as service is made upon him by the bailiff.

Mr. JEANNOTTE. (Translation.) I have a few words to say with respect to that question of witnesses. Since they wish by this Bill to have a right, I will not say to find out cases of bribery, but to play the tyrants over honest people, let them at least enable such parties to come up to the court. In ordinary cases, the witnesses are not bound to come to the court before being paid their travelling expenses. In this Bill they say: The judge "may." Suppose a witness living in Montreal is summoned to St. Lin; he has fifteen leagues to travel over. The railway fare is $2.50. He spends two days at St. Lin, which costs him $2.50. He will have spent $5 in all. Should the judge find out that he has nothing to say, he will be entitled to nothing for his expenses. Is not that an iniquity? It is an abomination. Section 12 is so obscure that no one can understand it, not even the hon. Solicitor General (Mr. Curran). My amendment would make it clear.

Mr. BELLEY. (Translation.) Section 12, as printed, reads as follows:—

The judge may award to any person who appears before him, and who is in his opinion a necessary and material witness, a reasonable sum for travelling expenses and maintenance.

If he is a material witness, the judge may not only tax him, but also order the payment of his disbursements. Will it be left with such a witness to come or not to come and give evidence? Will he himself decide whether he ought to appear or not? The judge is empowered by another section to summon all the voters of a county; could a witness say: I will not appear, as I am not a necessary and material witness? If such is the true meaning to be given to this section, I see no objection to let it pass, for it will make the Bill illusory. If this is not the meaning to be given to it, if the witness should be bound to appear, then the judge may order, or not, the payment of the expenses of such a witness. Will a judge be empowered to tax a witness because such a witness will have answered that he has nothing to say? A witness is not taxed because he gave a material evidence, but because he was summoned. I think no Parliament should sanction such an injustice as this, for the witness could always say: You refuse to give me the sum to which I am entitled to, because I knew nothing; is it my fault if I have nothing to say? For these reasons, I think the amendment of the hon. member for L'Assomption (Mr. Jeannotte) should be accepted.

Mr. JEANNOTTE. (Translation.) I wish to say a few words. This Bill has not for its object to prevent bribery, but to allow of perjury. The witness is told: You will be paid if you swear to such and such a thing. I am right in saying that this Bill is intended to promote bribery, and not to prevent it, for it lets out corruption from head to tail. If it was brought before a court of justice, it would be rejected at once.—(English.)—I think, Mr. Chairman, that everything should be stated in the law, and that there should not be an opportunity for any person to offer a witness a bribe to perjure himself. He may say to a witness : If you do not give a good deposition, sufficient to condemn the man accused, you will not be paid, you will lose your five or ten dollars ; but if you will give good testimony against him, we will pay you. That is the greatest instance of corruption I have ever seen, and it is put in a Bill intended to prevent corruption.

Mr. JONCAS. I may, perhaps, be allowed to call the special attention of my hon. friend from Albert (Mr. Weldon) to this :

The judge may award to any person who appears before him, and who is in his opinion a necessary and material witness, a reasonable sum for travelling expenses and maintenance.

The hon. gentleman will see that this clause is an injustice to witnesses that have been called to appear before a court of justice and who have been heard, though their evidence may not be considered by the judge necessary and essential. The witness should get his travelling expenses and indemnity for his time, in any case, and I think the amendment proposed by my hon. friend from L'Assomption (Mr. Jeannotte) is a just and fair one, and should be accepted by the promoter of this Bill.

Mr. DUPONT. (Translation.) I would like to know who are the parties who have a right to summon witnesses ?

Mr. CURRAN. (Translation.) The petitioners.

Mr. DUPONT. (Translation.) It is stated nowhere in the Bill, and, moreover, they are not interested in the payment of witnesses.

Mr. WELDON. It seems to me better to allow the judge some discretion in this matter. In case any one should undertake to load the trial down with expenses deliberately, the judge should be allowed to say whether a witness has been called for the proper purpose. I think "may" is a better word than "shall" in this case.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The object of the clause is clear, but the clause may require a little amendment in order to carry out the object. It is intended that the witness is to be paid his expenses and maintenance by the party summoning him, and the judge may allow these costs to the party if he thinks the witnesses were material.

Mr. MONCRIEFF. I would like to ask the mover of the Bill : when the judge allows to the witness his witness fee, to whom is it allowed ? In an action in any of our courts it would be allowed to the successful party and not to the witness. What does this clause mean in that respect ?

Mr. CURRAN. It will be allotted to the witness out of the deposit, inasmuch as the judge would consider he was worthy of taxation. The deposit is for the purpose of paying those costs.

Mr. JEANNOTTE.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I agree with the Solicitor General about that. The $500 is all we have in view for the present, although that sum may be increased. The petitioners in the first instance will hand in a list of the witnesses whom they desire to have summoned, and they must, before these persons are required to move, tender them their ordinary witness fees. The hon. member (Mr. Dupont) is right in saying that the petitioners have no interest in the taxation. We can, however, very well conceive that those whose honesty has been attacked, may have to call witnesses in their defence and the judge may allow them fees out of the funds, and that I take it is the operation of that part of the section which enables the costs to be taxed in favour of the party who desires to call the witnesses.

Mr. DUPONT. (Translation.) There is nothing in the Bill to the effect that the accused parties will have a right to summon witnesses and make a counter-evidence.

Mr. JEANNOTTE. (Translation.) I think we might as well pass over this section.

Mr. MONCRIEFF. The petitioners deposit a certain amount of money. That fund may or may not be sufficient to meet the expenses of the trial. I think that all witness fees should first be paid by the party calling the witnesses, and the witness then has an indemnity or protection, who may not have had any of the fees after he appears in court. I move this amendment to meet the case, in place of clause 12 :

All witnesses shall be entitled to be paid in the first instance by the party by whom they may be summoned, witness fees or conduct money as in an ordinary action in the Supreme or Superior Courts of the province in which the proceedings are being carried on, and the Judge shall allow the witness fees of all material witnesses so called before him out of the money in court, if not already previously paid to such witness.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I do not understand that there is any clause giving a party who has been summoned as a witness the right to summon other witnesses in his defence, and it is only on that hypothesis that the suggestion made by the Prime Minister can be adopted as a possible meaning of the section. There is no clause to provide for witnesses summoned by the original witnesses whose character has been attacked and who desire to call witnesses to defend it.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. That may be provided for in another section.

Mr. JEANNOTTE. I understand that the parties who sign the petition will have nothing to do with the enquête. They only ask that an enquête shall be held in such electoral district, and then the judge himself holds the enquête. But he will give notice to the parties who have signed the petition, to be there at such a day and to give him the names of the parties whom they wish to be interrogated. There is no one accusing them. The judge himself, following the advice given by the petitioners, will send subpoenas to the parties, but no one will accuse them but the judge himself, who will be lawyer, judge and commissioner.

Mr. WELDON. The suggestion of the leader of the House can be carried out by altering the clause. I move in amendment to the amendment that the clause be altered so as to read in this way :

The judge may allow a reasonable sum for travelling expenses and maintenance of any witness who, in his opinion, is a necessary and material witness, such sum to be paid in the first instance by the parties summoning the witness.

That would make it clear that the witness gets his fees, and the judge has discretion.

Mr. LAURIER. Do you mean that only those witnesses should be paid who are material witnesses ?

Mr. WELDON. They are all paid. In the first instance, they are paid by the parties who summon them, but in the long run it will come out of the court unless the judge decides they were not material witnesses.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Does the Bill provide that a witness shall be paid before he comes ?

Mr. WELDON. Yes, and the court has discretion when they come up, to say whether they were properly summoned or not.

Mr. AMYOT. I would draw the attention of the mover to this fact. Clause (a), which we have adopted, binds every witness summoned to come to court. Now, we are asked to pass another clause, in which he says that the material and necessary witnesses shall be paid beforehand. I want to know, if witnesses are not tendered their costs, travelling expenses and maintenance beforehand, are they bound to come ? There is a distinction to be drawn there. You summon witnesses, and they are all bound to come by clause (a) ; now, by clause 12, you say some of the witnesses shall be paid beforehand.

Mr. WELDON. They are all paid beforehand.

Mr. AMYOT. Then your $500 would be very soon exhausted. The hon. gentleman promised that on this clause he would tell us how he was going to provide for the costs.

Mr. WELDON. That will come up on clause 16. As the amendment is drawn, it does not say that these witnesses' fees are all to come out of the funds of the court ; it simply says that the witnesses are to be paid by whoever summons them.

Mr. AMYOT. Who summons them ?

Mr. WELDON. Whoever wants to.

Mr. AMYOT. Is it the judge, or the twenty-five petitioners ?

Mr. WELDON. Whoever has put up the money and set the machine agoing. It would be the petitioners, of course.

Mr. AMYOT. Are they responsible for the costs or is there a limit ?

Mr. WELDON. We are now discussing the question of the witnesses' fees, we will take up the costs in a subsequent section. The proposal is that the witnesses' fees be paid by whoever summons them. Then they come to court, and if the judge says they are overloading the case by unnecessary witnesses, they will be paid by the parties who summoned them ; if, on the other hand, the judge says they are reasonable and necessary witnesses, they will be paid out of the funds.

Mr. AMYOT. There is no plaintiff in this instance. You have the twenty-five petitioners, who deposit $500, their responsibility is limited to that sum. Out of this $500 you must take the whole of the expenses, and when that sum is exhausted, if the enquete is not finished, what do you propose to do then ? Now, you say you will pay beforehand the travelling expenses of the witnesses whom the judge believes to be material. Well, when the money is all gone, where will you get more money to pay those material witnesses ? It is all very well to say they should be paid by the parties who summoned them, but when there is no party summoning, what will you do ? The twenty-five petitioners are no longer there ; when they have lodged their petition and the $500, off they go. The duty of the judge begins then ; he goes on with the $500, and when that is exhausted, what do you intend doing ?

Mr. WELDON. There will be no trial.

Mr. AMYOT. A moment ago a motion I made was characterized as ridiculous, and I do not want the whole Parliament to be put in a ridiculous position by passing a Bill which will not be workable. Does the hon. gentleman intend making the amount larger ?

Mr. WELDON. I said that we would discuss the question of costs on section 16 when we reach it.

Mr. LAVERGNE. I think we should provide for a clause, as in ordinary procedure, by which a certain sum of money would be tendered to each witness to cover his travelling expenses. There is no clause to that effect provided in the Bill. It says that the judge shall grant a certain sum, if he considers it necessary to do so, but this is left conditional, and if a witness is in poor circumstances he may be unable to come. In the province of Quebec it is provided that a witness is not bound to attend unless a certain sum of money is tendered him with which to pay his travelling expenses.

Mr. WELDON. The section provides for that.

Mr. MONCRIEFF. No. I understand that the required deposit of $500 is simply put up as a bond of part security for costs. The section under discussion is not framed as it should be. It should read that all witnesses shall be entitled to fees as in ordinary actions in the Superior Courts, to be paid in the first instance by the party by whom they were called, and the judge should have discretion to tax a further allowance.

Mr. WELDON. That provision is already in the Bill.

Mr. CURRAN. It is not there. If it is there, and the hon. gentleman will read it, the present difficulty may be avoided.

Mr. MONCRIEFF. I have not found it there.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I have already asked that the hon. gentleman point it out in the Bill.

Mr. WELDON. The clause reads :

The judge may award to any person who appears before him and who is in his opinion a necessary and material witness, a reasonable sum for travelling expenses and maintenance.

I am willing to add : "Such sums to be paid in the first instance by the parties summoning the witnesses."

Mr. AMYOT. How can the judge know beforehand whether the witness is a material witness or not ?

Mr. WELDON. I accept the suggestion of the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Moncrieff).

Mr. WELDON. I move the following amendment, which I think will cover the ground :—

The ordinary fees of witnesses for their attendance, travelling and maintenance shall be tendered to them by the person or persons who have applied to have them summoned ; it shall also be in the discretion of the judge to allow the costs of witnesses that are necessary on taxation.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The rate of payment would depend on the witnesses. Let the judges provide the rate in each province if they are going to make rules.

Mr. CURRAN. This amendment meets the main objection urged, that there was no provision made for the payment of ordinary witnesses and for tendering them a sum for payment of travelling expenses.

Mr. JEANNOTTE. There is no party applying to have witnesses called, except the judge himself.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The witnesses certainly will not attend under section 6. Section 5 deals with the procedure at the commencement of the inquiry.

Mr. LAVERGNE.

5. The judge, shall upon his appointment, or within a reasonable time thereafter, from time to time hold meetings for the purposes of the inquiry, at some convenient place within the district, and may adjourn such meetings from time to time and from place to place within the said district ; and the clerk or the prothonotary of the court shall give notice of the time and place of holding his first meeting, by mailing such notice to each of the electors who have signed the petition, at least fourteen days before the first meeting is held.

He will have the twenty-five persons who have signed the petition before him, and he will have to get from them the names of the witnesses to be summoned to prove the charges made ; and the way in which the particulars of the charge shall be handed in and other matters are dealt with under section 7. But the judge cannot possibly order the clerk to summon witnesses without having their names before him.

Mr. DUPONT. (Translation.) We are in a state of legislative chaos, unintelligible to any one. Every one is proposing his own amendment. We cannot make out any of the amendments brought before the committee. It is a real confusion which indicates the worth of the Bill now before us. In all the amendments moved it is stated that the judge may allow a witness his travelling expenses, if he deems such a witness to be necessary in the case ; why not state that any witness summoned before the court will be entitled to all his expenses ?

Mr. CURRAN. (Translation.) It is what is proposed by the amendment now before the committee.—(English.)—The first point is covered by the amendment, namely, that the ordinary fees of witnesses for their maintenance, travelling and attendance will be tendered them by the person or persons who have applied to have them summoned. The witness, on receiving his subpoena, will be tendered that amount for travelling expenses, and his maintenance while in attendance. Then the judge has the discretion to disallow necessary cost to witnesses, on taxation.

Mr. DUPONT. Against whom ?

Mr. CURRAN. Against the $500 deposited.

Mr. AMYOT. Then I accept the amendment, which is clear. Is it to be read in connection with clause 8. and if so, will witnesses who have been tendered the amount specified be obliged to attend ?

Mr. CURRAN. No.

Mr. AMYOT. The explanation we have now will no doubt guide the tribunal, but if we had not received that explanation, there is a positive clause which states that witnesses shall be bound to attend.

Mr. MONCRIEFF. I move the following as a subsection to clause 12 :—

All parties giving evidence in their own behalf shall be paid the like witness fees as recorded in the preceding section

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I think we ought to consider that subject in connection with the section dealing with the fund. We ought to provide that whatever expenses are incurred by any persons charged with corruption under this Bill or in testifying on their own behalf, shall come out of the fund. This is hardly the place for such a provision.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) There is a rule in the English courts on election petitions, which has been adopted by most of the provincial courts, providing for the payment of witnesses out of the fund paid in by the petitioner. It seems to me that would cover the ground. If the promoter of the Bill will look at the English text-books on elections, he will find there a rule which will meet the case.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. That is in the line of my suggestion, and that is the reason why I thought it would be better to deal with the question when we come to the question of the fund.

Amendment negatived : yeas, 20 ; nays, 26.

Mr. MONCRIEFF. It seems that the sections of this Bill are very crude ; indeed, the one I moved in the way of amendment does not please myself. I would move that the committee rise and report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

Motion agreed to : yeas, 39 ; nays, 17.

Committee rose, and reported progress.

ADJOURNMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. MULOCK. Before this motion is carried, I think it would be well for the House to understand whether the business of this country is to go on or not. I think that the scenes we have just witnessed are not creditable to this House. There is a large amount of public business awaiting the consideration of the House, and there does not seem to be that honest disposition to proceed with the affairs of the country that I think the situation warrants. Where the responsibility rests I do not propose to discuss to-night ; but I think the time will soon come when the House and the country will have to know whether the proceedings of this House are to degenerate into a farce, or whether the affairs of the country are to go on properly.

Mr. TAYLOR. We were kept here for three months in this way in 1885.

Mr. MULOCK. I only make this remark. I think the country will disapprove of the proceedings of this day. If I can judge rightly, there is no disposition to proceed with the business on the paper.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I do not think the hon. gentleman's remarks are quite called for in this instance. I do not think the public will find fault with the proceedings of to-day ; I think it will rather be with the want of proceedings. It would have been much more in accord with my own feelings if the committee had disposed of this Bill and made way for some others on the paper which are quite important likewise. I had to express to the committee my views, which I beg to repeat, that the dignity of the House calls for the final disposition now of a Bill of this kind, after so protracted a discussion has taken place. I think the discussion was very tedious, but I do not think that any of us are justified in saying that it was prolonged unduly with a desire to obstruct business. The Bill is one of great importance, and has evoked the earnest opposition of members of the House. For my part, I am anxious to see it pass and have a fair trial ; but members who are within the rules in opposing its passage, can hardly be reproached with insincerity or a desire to make the proceedings of this House degenerate into a farce. I hope the House generally will see the propriety of coming to the conclusion which I ventured to advise, that we should for our own sake, as well as for the principle involved, endeavour to make a final disposition of the measure as soon as possible. We shall not have an opportunity of adopting the Bill until this day week, but I hope that then the House will come to some conclusion concerning it.

Mr. LAURIER. There is some cause for the remarks of the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock.) They are justified, to some extent, by what has taken place, and I would remind the First Minister himself that, at an earlier stage, he said that he hoped those who opposed the Bill were serious. Having spoken in this manner, the hon. member for North York had reason for saying that the proceedings have not added to the dignity of the House, and that it was questionable whether or not those who had spoken were serious.

Mr. DUPONT. (Translation.) I protest against the words just uttered by the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock). If he meant to say that the members who oppose this Bill as proposed, are obstructionists, I think he was quite wrong. We are making no factious opposition to this Bill, which is one of the most important brought before the House. We have no intention whatever to prevent the business of the House from going on. I think, moreover, that the hon. gentleman should have been of the last to criticise those who oppose a measure brought before this House, when such an opposition is earnest and comes from men having strong convictions. I think the hon. member should be the last to speak as he did, for he himself and his party have more than once obstructed the parliamentary business of this House.

Mr. AMYOT. I think it is but right to reply in English, so that the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) may understand our opinion of the remarks he made a moment ago. He complains because a most important Bill has been discussed during two sittings of the House. It has been discussed in a language he does not understand, and he takes occasion, therefore, to presume that the discussion was in the nature of obstruction. I would remind him that in our province we do not happen to attach perhaps sufficient importance to questions of finance, but we respect the sentiment of the other provinces, who do attach importance to that subject, and we have been patiently listening here, night after night, and month after month, to a repetition of the same theories and arguments over and over again, without a word of complaint. But because we think it proper, in the interest of our electors and justice, to discuss the Bill we have just left, the hon. gentleman takes upon himself to impugn our motives. I protest against his course as one calculated to disturb the harmony and dignity of the House. The hon. gentleman does not know the strength of resistance we possess when provoked. We want peace and harmony, but we want to be respected, and when we desire to speak in French, if the hon. gentleman does not understand, let him remain silent, and not impute our motives. We have as much right here as he has. If we wanted to obstruct we could easily do so, and keep the hon. gentleman here for months longer, but the lengths of our session have never been increased one day by the French speaking in this House. Because this is the first French debate, the hon. gentleman wants to make the House and the country believe that we are obstructionists. That is most unfair and unjust, and a repetition of such conduct will not tend to promote the harmony of the House.

Motion agreed to ; and the House adjourned at 12.35 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, 17th May, 1894.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

PRIVILEGE—MR. TURCOTTE, M.P.

Mr. BRUNEAU moved :

That Mr. Arthur Aimé Bruneau, member of this House for the Electoral District of Richelieu, having stated in his place in the House, that he is credibly informed and believes that he can establish :

1st. That Arthur Joseph Turcotte, Esquire, a member of this House for the Electoral District of Montmorency, and while he was a member of the

Mr. DUPONT.

House, to wit : from the eleventh day of March, eighteen hundred and ninety-three, was a partner in the firm of Turcotte & Provost, which said firm, during said period, held, enjoyed and executed a contract with or for the Government of Canada, on behalf of the Crown, in the name of Jean Baptiste Provost, one of the members of the said firm, for which public money of Canada has been paid to the said firm and to the said Arthur Joseph Turcotte, a member of said firm, which said contract was for the supply of groceries and similar goods for the use of the Militia Department at Quebec ;

2nd. That the said Arthur Joseph Turcotte, while a member of this House, to wit : from or about the first day of February, eighteen hundred and ninety-three, until the first day of February, eighteen hundred and ninety-four, was carrying on business for his own benefit in the city of Quebec, under the firm name of "Turcotte & Provost," and during said period he held, enjoyed and carried out a contract with or for the Government of Canada, on behalf of the Crown, which said contract stood in the name of Jean Baptiste Provost, but was in reality held for the sole use and benefit of the said Arthur Joseph Turcotte, and large sums of the public money of Canada were paid under said contract to the said Arthur Joseph Turcotte, and although the cheques were issued therefor to the said Jean Baptiste Provost, the proceeds thereof were received by the said Arthur Joseph Turcotte, which said contract was also for the supply of groceries and similar goods for the use of the Militia Department at Quebec ;

3rd. That the said Arthur Joseph Turcotte, while a member of this House, to wit : from on or about the first day of February, eighteen hundred and ninety-four, to on or about the first day of April, eighteen hundred and ninety-four, was carrying on business for his own benefit at Quebec, under the firm name of "A. J. Turcotte & Co.," and during said period he held, enjoyed and carried out a contract with or for the Government of Canada, on behalf of the Crown, which said contract stood in the name of Jean Baptiste Provost, but was in reality held for the sole use and benefit of the said Arthur Joseph Turcotte, and large sums of the public money of Canada were paid under said contract to said Arthur Joseph Turcotte, and the benefit thereof was received by the said Arthur Joseph Turcotte, which said contract was also for the supply of groceries and similar goods for the use of the Militia Department at Quebec ;

4th. That the said Arthur Joseph Turcotte, while a member of this House, sometime in the year of eighteen hundred and ninety-three, was interested in contracts and agreements with the Department of Marine and Fisheries for the Government of Canada, on behalf of the Crown, and large sums of public money of Canada were paid under said contracts and were received by the said Arthur Joseph Turcotte, which said contracts were for the supply of groceries and similar goods for the use of the Department of the Marine and Fisheries :

Be it therefore Ordered, That the matters therein stated be referred to the Select Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections, to inquire fully into the said allegations, with power to send for persons, papers and records, and to examine witnesses upon oath or affirmation, and that the said Committee do report the result of their inquiries and whether the said Arthur Joseph Turcotte has vacated his seat.

Mr. TURCOTTE. Mr. Speaker, I deny in the most formal and complete manner the charges brought against me by the member for Richelieu. Since I have had the honour of a seat in this House, I have not been a contractor with the Government. In so far as the present charges are concerned, I will, with the permission of the House, read a declaration published by Mr. J. B. Provost, the contractor at that time and at present, for supplies furnished the citadel at Quebec and the Marine Department in that city, and who is mentioned in the charges :

QUEBEC, 21st April, 1894.

To the Editor of 'l'Événement'.

Having been confined to the house through illness for seven or eight days, I only yesterday read the parliamentary correspondence which appeared in 'l'Électeur' of the 16th of April.

In that correspondence it is stated that Mr. A. J. Turcotte, M.P., had the contract given to his partner, Mr. Provost, for the supplying of groceries to the citadel, and that after the dissolution of the partnership Turcotte & Provost, I had claimed the profits arising from the contract amounting to something like $1,600. I must here declare that I obtained this contract in a regular manner, by tender, and when I obtained it I was no longer a member of the firm Turcotte & Provost. I may further add that at that time as I had no business place of my own, I arranged with the Turcotte firm for the delivery of my goods. As to the contention that I claimed $1,600 from Mr. Turcotte for the execution of my contract, this assertion is completely false. I did not make any claim of this kind, and I had no such claim to make as I was paid in person by the Government through cheques payable to my order.

(Signed) J. B. PROVOST.

I must further state, in order that this House may have official information of the same, that I am the defendant in a lawsuit, taken the 30th of April last, by which I am asked to pay the penalties to which I might be liable for having sat in this House in contravention of the Act concerning the independence of Parliament on account of the contracts mentioned in the present charges. The action before the court and the charges before this House cover exactly the same grounds.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The statements which are made in the declaration of the hon. member for Richelieu (Mr. Bruneau), taken in connection with the statements of the hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Turcotte), undoubtedly appear to warrant a reference to a committee for inquiry into the facts, and it seems to me, therefore, that there can be no objection to the inquiry taking place. I would take exception, however, to one phase of the resolution, which I take to be unimportant, but which I would ask to have struck out, because it may appear to indicate the desire of the House as to the specific nature of the judgment by the committee itself. Of course, the desire of the House is that the committee shall report the result of the inquiry. Undoubtedly they are to report the facts, and if in their judgment it is proper to do so, they should undoubtedly report their opinion upon these facts. The resolution is :

That the matters stated in the declaration be referred to the Select Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections, to inquire fully into the said allegations, with power to send for persons, papers and records, and to examine witnesses upon oath and affirmation, and that the said committee do report the result of their inquiries.

I think the resolution should stop there, and that the last part of it should be left out, namely : "and whether the said Arthur Joseph Turcotte has vacated his seat." The resolution requires the committee to state their judgment upon the question. Besides, it might well be, under the circumstances mentioned by the hon. member for Montmorency as to the existence of a suit, that if it be ascertained that the suit is about to come to judgment, the committee would prefer to wait for the decision upon that matter if there are questions of law involved. But without intimating at all that that would be a result to be desired—on the contrary I would prefer, and I think the House would prefer to have an opinion upon the facts—still I think the committee ought not to be precisely bound to state whether Mr. Turcotte has vacated his seat or not. I take it for granted that it will make no material difference in the resolution ; and I move that all the words after "inquiries" in the resolution, be struck out. I am told the practice is to refer also the statement of the hon. member implicated, to the committee, and I have no objection to that.

Mr. LAURIER. I must say that I cannot see the force of the objection raised by the hon. gentleman to the concluding portion of the resolution. It is a question of fact that is to be referred to the committee, and taking it for granted at this moment, without at all prejudging the case, that the statements in the declaration are true, then certainly the committee will have to consider whether Mr. Turcotte has vacated his seat. That will be the very object of the inquiry, and upon this question the committee can give their opinion. If they choose, they can report only the evidence, but undoubtedly they can give their opinion as to whether Mr. Turcotte has vacated his seat. The House would not be bound to concur in that opinion, they might dissent from it, but I cannot see for what reason the committee should be refused the power of expressing their opinion on the result of the inquiry. I may be told that the committee would not be deprived of that power, I do not think it would, even if this amendment were carried ; but I ask : What is the object of the amendment if it is not to deprive the committee of the power of expressing their opinion upon the evidence adduced before them? I cannot see the force of the objection raised by the hon. gentleman. Either it is serious or it is not; if the objection is serious, then I think we should insist that the committee should have power to pass an opinion upon the result of the evidence, if they so choose; and if it is not serious, I do not see any reason for the amendment. I would not say anything at this moment as to the merits of the case, they will be discussed by the committee. As to the suit now pending before the courts, surely the House of Commons will not be bound by any proceedings in a court of law. The court of the House of Commons is the sole judge of its own dignity and of its own independence.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The objection is serious, and I think my hon. friend has misapprehended it. Undoubtedly, on the statement of facts alleged by the hon. member for Richelieu, the member's seat will be forfeited. But the committee may find the facts to be otherwise; they may find them to be as the hon. member for Montmorency has stated, or they may find them to be different from either statement. In that case, and in any case, I think the committee can report its opinion on the evidence if they choose to do so, and I should strongly deprecate an amendment to the resolution that would in any way prevent their having full power to do so. I merely want to guard against their being compelled to express an opinion as to whether Mr. Turcotte has forfeited his seat, if the committee should desire not to make a report on that question. Undoubtedly the House is not bound by the proceedings of a judicial tribunal on the liability of the member involved for penalties or otherwise. The court may decide that the hon. member is liable for penalties, and this House may decide that he has not forfeited his seat; but I take it for granted that this House will pay great respect to the decision of the tribunal in the province of Quebec, whatever it may be. It would be a lamentable state of affairs if, on a question of law involving the title of a member to his seat, we should refuse to be guided by the decisions of the courts of law. I merely want the committee to be entirely free to express an opinion, and it would be greatly to the convenience of the House that they should do so.

Mr. EDGAR. I think that in cases where the privileges of members are involved, it is much safer, as a rule, to follow the precedents which we have in the English Parliament, and in this Parliament. I can find no precedent where these words which the First Minister desires to have struck out, have been left out from a motion of this kind. On the other hand, our journals are full of precedents to the contrary. For instance, in 1877, I find in this volume which I hold in my hand, that on the 10th April, in the case of the Hon. T. W. Anglin, who was charged with being interested in a contract, and having thereby forfeited his seat, the reference to the committee ordered them to report the result of their inquiries "and whether the said T. W. Anglin has vacated his seat." "I find that on the 25th April, the Hon. Mr. Mousseau moved for a similar reference and inquiry in the case of Mr. Thomas Workman, a member of this House: and that reference concluded with an Order to the committee to report the result of their inquiries "and whether the said Thomas Workman has vacated his seat." On the same day the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey) moved a resolution, which was carried, with reference to the present Senator Desjardins, and the committee were ordered to report the result of their inquiries "and whether the said Alphonse Desjardins has vacated his seat." The reference asked by the hon. member for Richelieu (Mr. Bruneau) does not limit the inquiry. It proposes that the committee report the results of their inquiry, and it does not ask the committee to state that Mr. Turcotte has vacated his seat, but to inquire whether he has vacated it. I think that is a matter covering most material information for which the House should ask, and I hope the House will obtain it, and, in my opinion, it is a great pity that the House should be asked to depart from the precedents already established.

House divided on amendment:

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. TAYLOR. The hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot) has not voted.

Mr. FORBES. The hon. member for Russell (Mr. Edwards) has not voted.

Mr. AMYOT. I was detained in the Supreme Court too late to hear the whole of the motion read. Had I heard the whole of it, knowing its contents as I do, I would have voted for the amendment.

Mr. EDWARDS. I was not in my seat when you, Mr. Speaker, put the motion to the House.

Main motion, as amended, agreed to.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 109) for the relief of Joshua Filman—(from the Senate).—(Mr. McKay.)

ELECTORAL LISTS OF LAPRAIRIE-NAPIERVILLE.

Mr. MONET asked, Is it the intention of the Government to appoint at an early day a revising officer to prepare the electoral lists of the county of Laprairie-Napierville ; or to retain in their positions the two revising officers who have hitherto prepared the lists for Napierville and Laprairie respectively ?

Mr. COSTIGAN. It is the intention of the Government to fill all vacancies of revising barristers, but in districts affected by the Redistribution Act, appointments of revising barristers will be made subject to an Act of which the Prime Minister gave notice some days ago.

BREWERIES AT NEUSTADT AND CARLSRUHE.

Mr. LANDERKIN asked, What revenue was derived from the brewery at Neustadt during each and every year from 1886 to 1893 ? What was the officer's salary, and what were the total expenses connected therewith in every year of the same period ?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). The revenue derived from the malt used in the brewery at Neustadt, the surveying officer's salary, and the expenses connected therewith each year from 1886 to 1893 were as follows :—

| Year. | Revenue. | Salary. | Expenses. |
|---------------|------------|---------|-----------|
| 1886-87 | $1,024 00 | $720 | nil. |
| 1887-88 | 1,100 00 | 750 | nil. |
| 1888-89 | 842 30 | 750 | nil. |
| 1889-90 | 946 65 | 750 | nil. |
| 1890-91 | 999 62 | 750 | nil. |
| 1891-92 | 2,231 00 | 750 | nil. |
| 1892-93 | 2,596 00 | 750 | nil. |

The officer supervising this brewery likewise supervised the malt-house and brewery at Carlsruhe and the malt-houses at Neustadt.

Mr. LANDERKIN asked, What revenue was derived from the Carlsruhe brewery during each and every year from 1886 to 1893 ? What was the officer's salary, and what were the total expenses connected therewith in every year of the same period ?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). The revenue derived from the malt used in the brewery at Carlsruhe, the surveying officer's salary and the expenses connected therewith each year from 1886 to 1893 were as follows :—

| Year. | Revenue. | Salary. | Expenses. |
|---------------|------------|-----------|-----------|
| 1886-87 | $1,023 75 | $ 750 00 | $128 62 |
| 1887-88 | 911 55 | 750 00 | 154 74 |
| 1888-89 | 727 60 | 750 00 | 166 75 |
| 1889-90 | 849 09 | 945 80 | 164 25 |
| 1890-91 | 1,048 10 | 1,000 00 | 159 75 |
| 1891-92 | 2,018 00 | *750 00 | 100 50 |
| 1892-93 | 1,638 16 | *750 00 | 90 30 |

*This brewery was supervised from 1886 to 1891 by Officer Nicholls, who, in addition, surveyed the brewery and malt-house at Formosa, the breweries at Walkerton and Chepston, the cigar factory at Walkerton and the malt-house at Carlsruhe. From 1891 to 1893 the brewery was supervised by Officer Lang, of Neustadt, whose salary is shown in answer to previous question. From 1886 to 1891, probably one-fourth the officer's salary might fairly be charged against this survey, and from 1891 to 1893 one-half.

DREDGING OF SPANISH RIVER.

Mr. DEVLIN asked, Is it the intention of the Government to proceed this summer with the dredging and other improvements of Spanish River, Algoma, and to place in the Estimates a sum sufficient to carry out the work?

Mr. OUMET. It is not the intention of the Government to proceed this summer with that work.

CERTIFICATES TO MASTERS AND MATES.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Having obtained the consent of the Crown, I move that to-morrow the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to consider the following resolution:—

That instead of the fees provided by sections six and eight of the said Act, the Governor in Council may establish a scale of fees to be charged for certificates to masters and mates; and until so established the fees to be charged shall be the following, that is to say:—For a certificate of competency as master, fifteen dollars; for a certificate of competency as mate of a sea-going ship, eight dollars; for a certificate of competency as mate of a ship trading on the inland waters of Canada, or on the minor waters of Canada, or on coasting voyages, six dollars; for a certificate of service as master, eight dollars; for a certificate of service as mate of a sea-going ship, five dollars; and for a certificate of service as mate of a ship trading on the inland waters of Canada, or on the minor waters of Canada, or on coasting voyages, four dollars.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Are these increases?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The fees proposed are increases. The fees are regulated now by the general statute relating to the certificates of masters and mates, and the fund connected with these certificates has about $41,000 in it. It is considered that the fees at present, which are about $5 for masters and $3 for mates, are entirely too low for the service.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) You are trebling them in the case of the masters.

Motion agreed to.

THE LATE HON. JOHN HEARN.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Mr. Speaker, I regret to have to announce to the House the death of the Hon. John Hearn, who represented Quebec West. The news has just reached us that he died, after a protracted illness, to-day—about noon; and I am sure the House will regret very much to hear this announcement. Although the hon. gentleman was a member of the Commons for only three sessions, he had endeared himself to us all by his warm heart and his genial manner, and his courtesy in all the transactions which he engaged in as a member of this House. While for so short a time he was a member of this Assembly, we all knew him by reputation as a very active member of the Legislative Council of his province for many years, and I likewise learn that he was a most patriotic and devoted citizen of Quebec, whose public services were of great importance to that city for the welfare of which he always loved to labour, and laboured successfully.

Mr. LAURIER. Mr. Speaker, it is to me a very melancholy pleasure under the sad circumstances to add my voice to everything that has just fallen from the lips of the right hon. the Prime Minister. Though it was not my privilege in any part of my life to be associated with the late Mr. Hearn in political sympathy, it was my privilege to have intimate acquaintance with him for many years, and I can certainly testify as to the high and I may say unique position which he occupied in the city of Quebec. He distinguished himself not only in the Legislative Council of Quebec, but before that in the Legislative Assembly of his province, and for a great many years, I may say in a sense, he was the leader of the municipal council of his city. All those who knew him could appreciate his perfect qualities, to which the Prime Minister has just referred. I can say more; I can testify to his very great abilities also. He was a man certainly of exceptional mental power, and although he came to this House at a period of his life when he was broken in health and could not do justice to himself, yet on the few occasions he addressed the House he impressed every one who had the privilege of hearing him with the fact, that they were in the presence of one of the master minds of the House. If he had come to this Parliament at an earlier period he undoubtedly would have had a most successful career here.

ADJOURNMENT—QUEEN'S BIRTHDAY.

Mr. TAYLOR. I wish again to refer to the question of adjourning the House from next Wednesday evening until the following Monday. Since the discussion took place yesterday, many members on this side of the House particularly have requested me to bring the matter to the attention of the Government again to-day. One or two members of the Opposition have mentioned the same matter to me, and I promised that I would bring up the question and have it discussed. A great many of the members feel disposed in favour of the adjournment, and they trust that an arrangement can be come to.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I can only repeat what I said yesterday, that we cannot consistently with our views as to the state of public business lose two days of next week for Government measures. If members, therefore, generally desire an adjournment, I can only venture to move it on condition that they give the Government next Wednesday.

Mr. CHARLTON. I feel called upon to make the same objection as I did yesterday with regard to that arrangement. While these adjournments may suit the convenience of the Government, some members, of whom there are a large number in this House, should in all fairness have their interests considered. Gentlemen who are unable to reach home, lose time enough by statutory adjournments, and days when there is not a full session, without an adjournment of this kind. The condition proposed by the First Minister, that the Government should take next Wednesday, would be a very great injustice to members of this House who have been promoting public Bills. The right hon. gentleman very well knows that we have practically reached no public Bills this session. We reached none last session, as that kind of business was entirely unperformed in this House in consequence of the desire of the right hon. gentleman to have private members waive their rights in view of his desire to leave for Paris. We permitted him to do so, and not a single public measure was reached. From various causes this session we have reached no public measures practically, and the rule of the House that notices of motion under debate at 6 o'clock should go to the head of Bills and Orders, a place they are not entitled to, has helped to prevent public measures coming up. Those who have public Bills to promote have lost five days this session in consequence of this rule. We have since then had an order under consideration for two days, owing to obstruction, and goodness knows how long it may be under consideration after this. The proposition to take next Wednesday for Government business, I deem to be in the highest degree unfair; unfair to the members of this House who have public business in charge, unfair to the interests of this country, because, Sir, it cannot be understood, I imagine, by the people at large that the duty of this House is merely to come here and register the decrees of Government. We have other business to perform besides the business of the Government. We have on the Order paper a number of important Bills, and we certainly should take time to consider the business of the country properly. I must, therefore, protest against the proposition made by the First Minister.

Mr. LAURIER. Mr. Speaker, I had supposed that by this time the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Taylor) would have been able to mollify the Prime Minister, but I am sorry to say that his efforts seem to have been unavailing. Do I understand that the Prime Minister will consent to the adjournment, if the House will consent to give him Wednesday of next week.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Yes.

Mr. LAURIER. Well, I would remind the right hon. gentleman that whether we have an adjournment or no adjournment, the Government is pretty sure to pass their measures if they retain their present majority, and until the next election I do not hope that the majority of the Government will be reduced very much judging from the experience we have had this session. Therefore, the only effect of private members keeping next Wednesday to themselves will be simply to postpone prorogation by one day. I think the hon. gentleman might consent to the adjournment, and at the same time give us the Wednesday, of which such bad use has been made so far.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) It has been my misfortune on many occasions to offer opposition to these adjournments, and of course personally my interests and those of my friends who come from the outlying sections of the country where they cannot go home, lie in the direction of continuing that opposition. But I have been informed that there is such a strong general feeling in favour of a short adjournment that I do not feel myself justified in offering any opposition to it. I merely wished to make that remark, because heretofore I have always strenuously opposed these adjournments, and I do not wish to be constantly in opposition to the general sense of the House.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I am glad to find that my hon. friend from Queen's (Mr. Davies) is not one of those distant members who become irritable at these long absences. I appreciate what the hon. leader of the Opposition has said to the effect that we are pretty sure to pass Government measures. I entertain a strong opinion on that; I have a strong confidence that we will. We would like to pass some of them, however, next week; but as his courtesy in making the suggestion to me demands equal courtesy on my part, perhaps, instead of accepting my proposition, he would be willing we should allow next Wednesday to remain for private members, and that we should take the Wednesday following for Government business.

Mr. LAURIER. That will come up in due time.

Mr. EDGAR. If the hon. gentleman likes to use his majority, we shall, of course, have to submit.

THIRD READINGS.

Bill (No. 88) further to amend the Acts respecting the harbour of Pictou, in Nova Scotia—(from the Senate).—(Sir John Thompson.)

Bill (No. 5) further to amend the Northwest Territories Representation Act.—(Mr. Daly.)

WAYS AND MEANS—PRIVILEGE—NEWSPAPER CRITICISM.

Mr. FOSTER moved that the House again resolve itself into Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. MULOCK. Mr. Speaker, before that motion is carried, I desire to rise to a question of privilege. In to-day's Ottawa 'Citizen' appears an item headed, "Mr. Mulock grossly insults some of the French-speaking members," and it goes on in a similar strain. In like manner, in the Montreal 'Gazette' of to-day appears an item in reference to the interesting Bill that was under discussion yesterday, in which the correspondent says:

Up to this point the debate, although at times wearisome, had at least been conducted with good temper and good feeling, but so soon as the motion to adjourn was put, Mr. Mulock felt called on to rise and insult the French members, to whom the day's discussion had been mostly confined, and who, for the most part, spoke in French, by calling the proceeding a farce and threatening in a vague sort of way the dire vengeance of "the people" on those who had "obstructed important public business," as Mr. Mulock put it. This was both unfair and untrue, and came with particularly bad grace from Mr. Mulock, who, every session, wastes more time in useless and senseless obstruction than almost any other member of the Opposition.

The paper then goes on to say that I was very well replied to by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot). I rise to say that I do not think my remarks were fairly open to the construction placed upon them by the papers in question, and I do not think that any hon. member who gave a deliberate consideration to my remarks, could draw such a conclusion from them. In order that I may not be misunderstood, I venture to read the remarks that I made.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. MULOCK. I know it is a severe trial to my hon. colleagues. These are the remarks which I made:

Before this motion is carried, I think it would be well for the House to understand whether the business of this country is to go on or not. I think that the scenes we have just witnessed are not creditable to this House. There is a large amount of public business awaiting the consideration of the House, and there does not seem to be that honest disposition to proceed with the affairs of the country that I think the situation warrants. Where the responsibility rests I do not propose to discuss to—night; but I think the time will soon come when the House and the country will have to know whether the proceedings of this House are to degenerate into a farce, or whether the affairs of the country are to go on properly.

Mr. TAYLOR. We were kept here for three months in this way in 1885.

Mr. MULOCK. I only make this remark. I think the country will disapprove of the proceedings of this day. If I can judge rightly, there is no disposition to proceed with the business on the paper. These were the remarks I made. I disclaim wholly any desire to offend any of my countrymen, and I can say with the utmost frankness that I had nothing in my mind with reference to any particular class. There is a large amount of public business on the Order paper demanding attention, and I think that when a reasonable time has been given to the consideration of one measure, it is only due to the House and the country that hon. gentlemen should have some regard to all the exigencies of the situation. I had not an opportunity yesterday to reply to the criticisms directed against me by the hon. member for Bellechasse, because I was not permitted under the rules to do so. Moreover, perhaps I would not have deemed it my duty under any circumstances to reply to him, because his opinions perhaps change a little, and he may have spoken more hastily than he intended. At all events, I viewed his remarks with charity; but when they are taken seriously, I deem it my duty to call the attention of the House to the matter, and again to say that while asking that the affairs of the country be conducted deliberately and with due despatch, I do not, of course, wish to interfere with the strict rights of any member of the House.

Mr. AMYOT. Mr. Speaker, I am very glad the hon. gentleman declares that what he said does not apply to any special class of individuals, more especially to those who thought last night that they applied to them. So far as that is concerned, I have only to say that if they did not apply to them in connection with the proceedings of the two last Wednesdays, they applied to nobody at all, and if they applied to nobody, he might as well not have made them—he is losing his own time. As to my changing my opinion, it is known to this House and the country, that, in 1885, I changed my mind for known reasons, and left my party to form the national party. The hon. gentleman at that time admired very much my changing my mind; he thought it was a great thing in the interest of the country; he thought that my mind was clear, and that I was patriotic. But after spending a few years next to him, I concluded that I was losing my time and my energy and getting into waters that were not agreeable to me; and I was very happy when political changes allowed me to go back to my natural party and my old friends. That second change the hon. gentleman finds very much against the interest of the country, and from that he draws the conclusion that my opinion is not worth noticing. At all events, his speech of a moment ago, which he delivered only on account of the words I uttered last night, proves that he attaches some importance to what I say. He may speak of my changes as often as he likes, but I can tell him this: that I will always thank Providence for having allowed me to stay as far as possible from him.

Motion agreed to, and House again resolved itself into committee on Ways and Means.

(In the Committee.)

Firewood, handle bolts, heading bolts, stave bolts and shingle bolts, hop poles, fence posts, railroad ties, ship timber and ship planking, not specially provided for in this Act.

Mr. MACDONELL (Algoma). Before that item passes, I would like to say a few words in connection with a subject of great importance to the western part of Ontario, particularly the section I have the honour to represent. I wish to draw the attention of the committee to two pictures in connection with the subject of the export duty on saw-logs. Four years ago we charged an export of $2 a thousand feet on saw-logs. Shortly afterwards it was considered advisable to do away with that duty, in consideration of our getting what was supposed to be an equivalent. We took off the $2 export duty per thousand feet on saw-logs, and we got in return from our friends to the south of us a reduction of duty to $1 a thousand feet on pine lumber, pine shingles and pine clapboards, while the duty on spruce lumber and products of other kinds of lumber remained unchanged. It is not for me to discuss the question whether we got a compensating advantage or not, but we find that when this went into force, a great change came over the prosperity and welfare of north-western Ontario. Where the wholesale merchants of Toronto, Hamilton, Owen Sound, Collingwood, Sarnia, and all the ports to the east, had been selling large quantities of goods that went to the shores of Georgian Bay and were consumed in the lumber camps in the production of pine logs, that trade disappeared from our shores altogether, as far as the lumbering interests is concerned, after the export duty was taken off. Instead of employing thousands of men, of our own race and nationality, in the lumber woods, we found that the owners of the limits brought over their own men from Michigan and their own supplies. I do not say that they brought all their own men over, but they certainly did a very large portion. They brought their own supplies into the country, and I am credibly informed that a great many of those supplies never contributed anything to Her Majesty's revenue. If it were necessary to give an instance the time has now passed in which those guilty of the offence could be prosecuted, because, in a mysterious manner, the documents to prove the offence against the lumber company which, I am told, was charged with it, disappeared mysteriously by fire and cannot be found. However, we found that supplies of all kinds came in from the other side. And, when speaking about the supplies that come in, I notice that the lumbermen from the south shore who go over there to do their rafting, and who bring over their own tugs to tow out the logs, appear to be highly indignant because they are charged a duty on the booms and chains that they bring over to our side in which to boom the logs and take them out of the country. If you look over the north shore of Georgian Bay and Lake Huron, from Penetanguishene to the west, you will see fifteen to twenty saw-mills there which were constructed by our people for the purpose of cutting our lumber, when the export duty was in force. Now, what is the result? About 25 per cent of these saw-mills only are operating to-day. Can this state of affairs be remedied? I think it can. I think it is the duty of a paternal Government to give us the relief we ask. My hon. friend from North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) said the other evening that there were various reasons why saw-logs could not be manufactured in this country. Sir, I failed to find one sensible reason adduced by the hon. gentleman, but there are a hundred reasons to advance in favour of the sawing being done in our own country. The statement was made that we could not get logs sawn at Little Current on account of the price asked. Now, I am credibly informed that the hon. gentleman did have saw-logs sawn there, and the logs were sawn, not for export to the United States, but for sale in Canada. I am also credibly informed that they were sawn at the very cheap rate of about $2 per thousand feet board measure. If these mills along the shores of Georgian Bay and Lake Huron are idle, what do we see on the other side of the line? We see that the prosperity which we formerly enjoyed has gone to the United States altogether, and is helping to build up cities on the shores of Lake Michigan. I will quote an authority, which will not be disputed by this House, to show what is taking place on the south shore. Now, Sir, in 1892 the Saginaw Board of Trade published an annual review. I suppose this ought to be good evidence to gentlemen who may not be disposed to take the enthusiastic view of this subject that I do. That review says:

The repeal of the export duty on logs recently by the Canadian Government has greatly stimulated the rafting of logs across Lake Huron to American mills for the last two years. In 1891, no less than 80,000 feet were brought to the Saginaw River, and in 1892, a much larger quantity came over as figures below will show.

The figures given are 184,500,000 feet. The document goes on to say:

Those acquainted with this industry assure us that it is only in its infancy and that the Saginaw River mills will be supplied for many years to come in this way.

We hope, Sir, that that prophecy will prove erroneous, and that the Government may be induced to do something in the way of giving us that protection which we believe to be in the lines of the policy of the Government. This review further states that twenty-six saw-mills, operated at Saginaw, in 1892 gave employment to 1,890 men, and produced 321,831,312 feet of lumber, valued at $4,824,826; the eighteen planing-mills employed 2,302 men, and turned out products valued at $5,208,634; the fifteen shingle-mills employed 292 men, and turned out products valued at $330,592; the eighteen furniture factories employed 296 men, and their products were valued at $374,500. This makes a total of men employed in sawing and working up logs brought over from the north shore of Lake Huron and Georgian Bay, of 4,780, the industries in which they are employed turning out products valued at $10,738,552. Thus we see a vast trade which should be adding to our national wealth and prosperity carried away from the north shore of these waters for the benefit of great lumber owners. Sir, what have we got in return for that? The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), during the course of his remarks the other evening, said that there was a mocking bird whistle in use there. Well, we get the mocking bird whistle on the north shore, and that is about all we do get. The same hon. gentleman spoke of the wail of a lost soul; we get there the wail of lost prosperity which, however, we hope to regain in a very short time. Now, Sir, the question of the quantity of logs exported appears to be of interest to the hon. gentleman who has defended the course which has been pursued, so I may say a few words upon that point. The hon. gentleman read a return, said to be authentic, from the Ontario Government cullers. We all know that when lumbermen go into the woods they are furnished by the Crown timber agent with certain books in which the number of logs and the quantity of lumber in feet must be entered, and these figures must be sworn to. The quantity so given may be correct, but it does not agree with the statements we find made by these very individuals who derive their prosperity from cutting up this timber. But, before I go to that subject, I would like to draw the attention of the committee to a return published by the Customs Department. With regard to that return, I may point out that there is no duty charged, there is no law under which any individual taking a raft of logs out of the country is obliged to pay a certain sum according to the quantity exported. Therefore, it is immaterial to him whether he states that he takes out a million feet, or double or treble that quantity. Take, for instance, the return from Little Current. I find that about sixteen rafts left Little Current during the season from the 10th of May to the 11th of September, 1893. In every case, the number of feet is shown in round numbers. The first seven rafts contained each an even million feet of lumber. The next contained exactly half a million feet, not one foot more or one foot less. The next two were of exactly a million feet of lumber, the next was half a million feet, the next four were exactly a million feet each; and the last one of the season contained exactly three million feet of lumber, according to the return. Now, can any practical man believe that that is true? Any man who ever handled a log or a stick of timber, or even a stick of cordwood would decline to regard such a statement as correct. Wherein is the discrepancy? It comes here: The individual who reports to the Customs simply goes to the officer and says, I have a raft with a million feet of lumber, which I am taking away; he gets his clearance papers and away he goes. One would think that if he was sharp he would put in a few odd feet, one way or the other. But the object in putting it in this way is to avoid showing the quantity of timber actually taken out of the country, because, I am credibly informed, as a matter of fact, instead of a million feet, the quantity taken out by each tug is nearer that given in this last entry—three million feet. I find that five rafts went out from the port of Algoma Mills on the north channel of Lake Huron. It is a peculiar fact that each of these rafts contained an even number of feet. Four of them contained three million feet, and one of them five million feet. It is the same all through. There are a number of returns, and I do not propose to trouble the committee with them, or put them on 'Hansard.' We find that at Spanish River, where a large quantity of logs were carried out, there were twenty-one rafts, of which fourteen contained an exact number of feet in round numbers. Now, the other night the statements which are contained in the Chicago 'Timberman' were disputed. I do not think any hon. gentleman in this House, I do not think any one who is engaged in the lumber business, will dispute that the 'Timberman' is a paper of standing and respectability. I do not think any of us here wish to impute motives to Mr. Weadock, the Congressman, whose statements are reported in that paper. Now, according to the Chicago 'Timberman,' Mr. Weadock, who is also the representative of Bay City, Michigan, a town of no mean importance in the lumber trade just now, thanks to the logs that go from Canada, is reported to have said:

There is brought into this state annually for manufacture probably—

He does not say exactly.

—probably 500 million feet of Canadian timber. It is owned by Americans, it is lumbered by Americans, it is towed over the lakes by American tugs, manned by Americans, and it is made up by American mills.

Now, should this state of affairs last longer? I think myself that it should not. Referring to the quantity that goes over there, I may just add that the Saginaw Board of Trade estimated it, in 1893, as 455,000,000 feet of saw-logs. That quantity, it says, was towed over to Michigan, and it is really about 40 per cent more than the entire cut of the Saginaw City mills. Consequently, if all this quantity was cut in our own country it would furnish employment for a very large number of men. The number of men required to cut this timber would be about 7,000. These, with their families, mean about 35,000 inhabitants, which would add to our national wealth $15,000,000 or $20,000,000 a year. Now, Sir, is it advisable that this amount of money should be thrown away? I think it is not. I think it is the duty of the Government to take this subject into consideration, and give us the relief that is asked for. Now, I find that the hon. member for North Norfolk, in his remarks the other night, criticised somewhat the power that the Government took to itself to regulate the export duty on logs. Well, I know that the hon. gentleman is a good old-fashioned Grit, and undoubtedly he ought to stick to Grit principles. His friends in Ontario do not argue as he does. The hon. gentleman is not a stranger to the members of the Ontario Legislature, nor is his name unknown in the Public Accounts of that province. The hon. gentleman knows that his friends in the Ontario Government have contended that the Local Government, as a Government, had the right, when they saw fit, to deal with the timber resources of the province of Ontario. If they saw fit to put a certain number of miles of limits of timber berths on the market they did not consult the Legislature of the province; by an Order in Council they did practically the same as the hon. gentleman contends this Government cannot do here. Well, I am glad to know the Government has the power, and I would be much pleased to see the Government use it. There is another matter in connection with this export duty on logs which constitutes a very serious grievance in my part of the country. It was mentioned the other night by the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule), and I cannot do better than repeat almost all he said. We find that from the towing of these rafts of logs through the waters of the North Channel and the Georgian Bay there is a friction going on all the time, as a result of which the coarse bark of the logs is first rubbed off, and then the inner bark gets loosened. The bark so loosened being water-logged, sinks in the water, and entwines itself with the meshes of the nets of the fishermen. It not only destroys those nets completely, an example of which was shown us here the other night, but it is also deposited on the bottom of the fishing grounds where the fish are accustomed to feed. The consequence is that not only are the nets of the struggling fishermen destroyed, but the fishing grounds themselves are destroyed, because the fish require food, and if the feeding grounds are obliterated, as they are by this deposit on the bottom of the lake, the fish must go elsewhere to seek for food. Now, when a fisherman gets a lease for a certain portion of the lake, into which he puts his nets, and from which he has to make a living for himself and family, by the passage of those immense rafts over those waters, his fishing is actually destroyed. Now, the hon. gentleman the other evening, in excuse for this practice, said that it would be all the same if the logs were towed to Midland, or if they were towed to any other place. Sir, I beg to differ with him, and I will tell you why. As a matter of fact, if the logs were towed from where he himself booms his logs, to one of the mills that are idle now, such as those at Little Current, there would be no deposit on the bottom of the lake. On account of the short distance of towing, the friction of the logs would amount to nothing, so far as the booms are concerned. It is probably true that if the logs were towed from the upper part of Lake Huron down through the North Channel and across Georgian Bay to Midland, there might be some deposit. But that would not take place when the logs were towed a short distance, as they would be if brought to Midland. Now, there is no part of those shores with which I am familiar, in which fishing would be injured, provided the logs were sawn on those shores, and the question to be considered by us, as reasonable, sensible men, is this: does the whole lumber industry of the country warrant us in sacrificing an immense portion of the province of Ontario? and for what, forsooth? Because, as the hon. gentleman stated, this very discussion in the House might have an injurious influence on the framing of the Wilson Bill. Is there an hon. gentleman on either side of this House who is so gullible as to believe for one moment that the Wilson tariff is framed in our interest? Is there one hon. gentleman, either Conservative or Liberal, who deludes himself for one second with the belief that the people of the United States, that their representatives in Congress and in the Senate, are going to give us anything out of which they do not get a great deal more than their quid pro quo? No. For every dollar of benefit they give us, they are going to have two dollars in return, and they have obtained that return so far as regards the imports of saw-logs. How long is this privilege to continue? We feel very strongly on the subject, and I am surprised that hon. gentlemen opposite have not backed up the champion of the United States saw-mill men who come to this country for their logs. We had a very interesting discussion the other evening, and only one hon. member took the floor in defence of what we are now arraigning. If the Government see fit to reimpose the duty, and we hope it will see fit, for we will not stop now in urging the reimposition of the export duty, we shall be gratified. The hon. gentleman called attention to a notice that appeared in the newspapers with respect to a deputation coming here to urge on the Government the reimposition of the import duty, and he thought it was almost a grievance that such should take place. Well, Sir, I contend, and I think all hon. gentlemen in this House will contend, that if a grievance exists it is not only the right and privilege of the citizen, but it is his duty to come here to the fountain head, and represent what that grievance is, and, if possible, have it removed. I may intimate for the information of hon. gentlemen opposite that if we do not get what we ask for to-day, to-morrow or next week, we will still keep pegging away until we secure what we believe to be justice to the north-west part of Ontario, and more particularly to the district which I have the honour to represent in this House.

Mr. O'BRIEN. There is no member of the House who naturally feels more deeply interested in this question than I do, representing as I do a portion of the country, perhaps, more interested in the lumber question than even the hon. gentleman who has just spoken. Desirous as I am of seeing all our raw material manufactured, as far as possible, in this country, especially with respect to timber, desirous as I am that our saw-logs shall be cut here and not elsewhere, I cannot, nevertheless, shut my eyes to the fact that there are interests concerned, and vast interests to which the Government are perfectly justified in giving due attention. I think the Finance Minister is to be commended for having prevented the duty being charged on chains and booms which was hastily imposed and as hastily withdrawn a few days ago. The hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) and others who have spoken on the question have made a charge against the administration of the Customs Department to which that department, I think, should pay attention. They have asserted as regards that departmental administration, that a larger quantity of logs was exported than was returned.

Mr. MACDONELL. I rise to make an explanation. I quoted figures from the Department of Customs, but I never intimated for one moment any charge of mismanagement against the department; on the contrary, I took particular pains to point out how these figures came into the Department of Customs. There was no charge whatever made, and I will venture to say that hon. gentlemen who quoted the figures as well as myself, will repudiate the statement.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I have no doubt that the hon. gentleman who made the statement to which I refer would be the very last man in this House to make any charge against the administration of Customs. That is not the role of the hon. gentleman. But they have stated facts which themselves constitute a charge against the administration. They have said that a large quantity of saw-logs are exported which are not reported to the Department of Customs. With whom does the fault lie? If it does not lie with the Customs Department, who should be blamed for it? They have also stated that large quantities of supplies are brought in on which no duty has been paid. If that statement is correct, that is another serious charge against the administration. Surely there are sufficient collectors in the Georgian Bay and Algoma districts to look after importations of this kind, and see that the duties are paid. But the real fact is, I believe, that in order to make a strong case for the reimposition of the export duty, those hon. gentlemen, I will not say wilfully, but ignorantly, have been guilty of great exaggeration in the statements made by them. I desire to speak only of what I know, and I do know something of the Parry Sound district from which a very considerable portion of the timber is exported, and I do not believe that any large quantity of supplies have been brought into that district from the other side of the line. In the first place, it would not pay to bring in flour, and as a matter of fact the pork used by the lumbermen of the Georgian Bay district is not Chicago pork, but is in the main, Canadian pork. The pork they use is a long clear, grown in this country and made in this country, and it does not come from the other side. It may be different in the Ottawa district, but in the Parry Sound district, and all through that country the only pork used, except on special occasions, is Canadian pork, and that, therefore, is not brought in as supplies. As to what other supplies are imported. I am at a loss to know. Then with respect to the number of men employed: one of the alleged grievances is that Americans have been employed in getting out the timber in place of Canadians. As a matter of fact, I may say that in the Parry Sound district during the last two or three years wages were never so high, employment was never so abundant and constant. There has not been a man or a team that could not get employment, and if Americans were employed it was because the firms could not obtain sufficient Canadian labour. I do not say that no manager or foremen have been brought from the other side, but the vast bulk of the labour employed has been Canadian labour. Passing aside the question as to whether logs should be imported or not, so far from the country being injured from the extra quantity of logs taken out, this increased exportation has given great impetus to business, and has increased the employment of labour and the money expended in the country. The statement made that American labour has supplanted Canadian labour is not in accordance with the facts. Next we come to the really important question, as to how far the Government will be justified in interfering with the present condition under existing circumstances. I think the Government took a false step when they took off the duty in the first place—they should have left it on; but the reimposition of the duty now under present conditions is a totally different matter from taking off the duty under the conditions then existing. What would be the condition of the trade supposing the duty were reimposed? As has been pointed out in previous debates, without any action of Congress, merely on the operation of the law, the States would impose a duty on Canadian lumber, and thus paralyze the trade from one end of the country to the other. I should like to ask those hon. members, what would be the effect in the Parry Sound and Algoma districts if the lumber trade were paralyzed, as it would be, by an imposition of a duty of $2 or $3 per thousand?

Mr. MACDONELL. The answer is this: the Americans must have our white pine lumber.

Mr. CHARLTON. Humbug.

Mr. MACDONELL. Whether they impose a duty of $1, $2 or $4, the Americans must have our white pine lumber, and they are going to buy it. Who pays the duty? The consumer.

Mr. O'BRIEN. That is one of the points on which information is very much wanted, and I would suggest to the Finance Minister that it would be a wise course to adopt in the interest of the country to appoint some person or persons who would give this House reliable information as to the extent to which the Americans are dependent on us for their lumber. I have never yet been able to get any reliable information on this point. I have heard statements of a most contradictory character from persons who might be supposed to be well informed, and I am not satisfied from any information I can obtain that the Americans are so dependent on our white pine that they must obtain it no matter what it might cost them. The great trouble with the lumber trade has always been this: that the better qualities of pine having been exhausted, there is a very large quantity of inferior pine which, under a duty of $2 per thousand, it will not pay to ship to the United States. There was not sufficient market for it in this country, and they have had upon their hands for years and years back large quantities of this inferior pine, which they had the greatest difficulty in disposing of at any price. The consequence was that the lumbermen only tried to cut pine which could pay them for export, and in going through the woods they would take those trees which were likely to give a quality of pine fitted for export, and leave the rest behind. Often when the lumberman cut down a tree which promised fairly well, yet, in spite of the best judgment he could use, he would only get one log that would pay him for export; and the remainder was left in the woods to rot or burn. Under the present condition of things, with an import in the United States of $1 per thousand, lumbermen are able to get rid of large quantities of inferior timber, which previously it did not pay them to get out, and which was left in the woods to waste. Were the United States duty taken off altogether, as we have reason to think it will be by the Wilson Bill, not only will they be able to dispose of all the lumber which they make, but the advantage of towing logs across the lakes will be so entirely done away with that it is the opinion of those best capable of forming an opinion that there will be no towing across, because, notwithstanding all the precautions that can be taken, there is a very considerable loss upon the export of logs, and the slightest thing would turn the scale in favour of having them cut in this country. Some hon. gentlemen have also very much exaggerated the loss to this country by the export of logs. The principal mills upon the Georgian Bay, so far as the Parry Sound district is concerned, are still running at full speed. There are but a few of them closed and some of these towns in which the hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) is specially interested, are places from which the lumber trade has departed, in any case. They will never, under any circumstances, tow logs again to some of these places. They can just as well tow them across the lake as tow them from Little Current or French River down to Maitland or Penetanguishene. The people who own some of these mills have no limits of their own, nor have they had any limits for years, and, under existing circumstances, it is useless to try, by any system of legislation, to force the trade back to places where there are no natural facilities for carrying it on. The result of our reimposing an export duty now, would simply be to put such a barrier in the way of our trade that the only lumber which it would pay to export would be that of the very first quality; the remainder would simply lie in the woods, as it used to do, to burn or rot. Not only that, but the whole lumber trade would be so paralyzed that there would be far less cut in the mills on the Georgian Bay than there is to-day under the present system. When one speaks of paralyzing the lumber trade, does he realize what that means and what the effect of such a thing upon our financial standing in the country would be. Does he realize the amount of money which the banks and other capitalists have invested in the trade? Does he realize what the generally paralyzing effect on the whole trade of the country any serious blow to that industry would be? I have no particular friends among the lumbermen, and the lumbermen have never been particular friends to me, but I must say that I would look upon any serious paralysis of the lumber trade as a most dangerous thing for the interests of the country. The Government are bound, as trustees for the whole population, and for all the commercial interests of this country, seriously to consider whether it would be advisable under existing circumstances to yield to the remonstrances of those who, I fully admit, very naturally feel keenly the ill-effects of what is now going on. I hope the Government will be careful not to allow statements which, I think, are very much exaggerated, to influence them in dealing with this question. They have the means of arriving at, and I have no doubt can arrive at, much more satisfactory results as regards the facts of the case, than from anything that can be stated in this House. I believe that the statements of some hon. gentlemen are exaggerated, as regards the amount of logs exported, as regards the amount of labour which is supplanted in this country, and as regards the supplies which are brought into this country. So far from there being any serious loss to the general population, I believe that those people whom I represent in this House, instead of having experienced a loss, they have really, on the whole, benefited by the export of these logs. I do not mean to say that this is a desirable thing. I am as much opposed to it as any one can possibly be, but I do not like to hear the case presented to this House in terms which seem to me exaggerated and unfair. I certainly think that the Government are justified—at any rate until we have some final conclusion reached on the question in the United States—in not taking any steps such as is desired by those gentlemen who have spoken in favour of an export duty. The case is one which should not be dealt with in the interest of any particular localities. It is a question affecting the general welfare of the commerce of the country, and any serious blow to the lumber trade would be severely felt all around. I go with these hon. gentleman so far as this: If we cannot get free lumber, then I am prepared to accept the alternative of whatever may arise from the export of logs. So long, at any rate—viewing the question as we must view it today—so long as there is any possibility of the import duty in the United States being taken off. I say it would be folly on the part of this Government, and folly on the part of members of this House who advocate it, to do that which, for the present at any rate, would result in most serious loss and disaster.

Mr. MASSON. This question has been regarded by the hon. gentleman (Mr. O'Brien) as a very important one, and as one that should be approached with care and deliberation. When this subject was discussed in the House last year, I thought with the hon. gentleman (Mr. O'Brien) that it would be an inopportune time to interfere, but we must consider that the longer this matter is delayed, the greater is the injury done to the country, if the view that is taken by those who are in favour of the export duty on logs is at all correct. I do not see how it can for a moment be questioned but that the export duty would have the effect of causing many millions of feet that are now towed across our lakes, manufactured into lumber in this country, a business which would inure to the employment here, of a large amount of labour, and the expenditure of a large amount of capital. That that would be a benefit, not only to the locality where the mills are situated, but to a very large stretch of the surrounding country, must be admitted by every one. I am a little surprised to hear the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) say that the statements of hon. gentlemen who have spoken in favour of the export duty have been exaggerated. To my mind, it is almost impossible to exaggerate statements as regards the towing of logs across the Georgian Bay and the North Channel. I have frequently, in the last few years, passed up and down that bay, and I have hardly ever passed during the towing season without seeing one or more immense tows. Now, the estimate with regard to the tows, is that they contain about a million feet of lumber, sometimes two or three million feet, I am told; and that towing business goes on for several months in the year. It must be admitted, too, that many mills that used to employ a large number of men are now idle. That is largely brought about by the fact that the logs are towed across, entered free into the United States, and there manufactured into lumber, employing men and capital that, by right, should be employed in Canada. On the other hand, I admit that the importance of the lumber trade must not be lost sight of. If the imposition of that duty would paralyze the lumber trade throughout the length and breadth of this country, the injuries sustained might be greater than the benefits which would accrue. That is a matter to be calmly and carefully considered. But what right have we to assume that the lumber trade would be paralyzed? The hon. gentleman says that information is required as to whether the United States want our lumber or not. Speaking of the United States as a whole, there may be a question whether they want our lumber; but, so far as the eastern markets of the United States are concerned, there can be no question whatever. The only class of men in the United States that are opposed to free lumber are those interested in the lumber fields. Now, it is stated that the lumber fields of the United States have fallen into the hands of a few men; and I think it will be admitted that the very men who hold the Michigan and Wisconsin lumber tracts are the men who are coming into Canada and buying up our timber limits and exporting the logs and sawing them at their own mills—preserving their own forests while depleting ours. In nearly all our timber sales the lively competitors for limits have been American lumbermen with mills and timber limits of their own. If they want our lumber, it is not for the west, but for the east; and the fact that they are coming here to buy shows that if an import duty is put on lumber in the United States, they must necessarily pay it. The duty would naturally for a while affect the quantity of lumber exported from Canada to the United States; but if it is admitted, as I think it must be, that if they do not absolutely need our lumber, they at least desire to have it, it follows that the duty would soon be removed. No person can for a moment suppose that the United States senators and representatives are legislating for the benefit of Canada, or that they would legislate against the interests of the United States simply for the sake of injuring Canadian lumbermen. The Michigan and Wisconsin lumbermen who are now clamouring for the duty on lumber wish to get the logs in free. They are able to satisfy their representatives that it is in the interest of the United States as a whole to have the logs brought in and manufactured in the United States. But if the Government of Canada, for the sake of protecting the interests of this country, conserving our own forests, developing our own resources, giving employment to our own people, and causing capital to be expended in our own country, choose to prevent this export of logs would not the United States, who want our logs and are willing to admit them free, as willingly admit the lumber? The eastern markets certainly would desire it. But the hon. member for Muskoka has introduced other questions. He not only says that the quantity of logs exported has been exaggerated, and that the number of mills closed has been exaggerated, but he says that charges have been made that the Customs Department have not made correct returns. Well, considering the manner in which these logs are gathered up in small tows and started off, the entry being made many miles from where they start, it is absolutely impossible for the Customs Department to give a correct return of the logs shipped.

Mr. O'BRIEN. Then I would ask the hon. gentleman how he is going to get at it if there is an export duty?

Mr. MASSON. There would then be many reasons for closely watching it. There would be revenue to be collected, which would demand much greater efforts being put forth in that direction. It is also said that a charge has been made against the Customs Department of allowing large quantities of produce to be brought in without paying duty. Well, I have heard lumbermen charge their fellow-lumbermen with that; but whether there is any truth in it or not, I do not think it is for us here to inquire. The same difficulty of enforcing the customs laws, the same facility of evading them, exists with regard to imports as with regard to exports; and, with vessels carrying lumber to the United States and returning from ports from which provisions could be brought in, it is very hard to prevent a certain amount of smuggling. But that is aside from the question altogether. The statement of the hon. member goes farther; he says that they do not use Chicago or American pork. The hon. gentleman may not have seen it; but I have seen on the docks tier upon tier of American pork brought from Chicago waiting for boats to take it to the hon. gentleman's own constituency. He did not visit the places where the pork was landed, but I have seen it in transit. I do not know that the putting of an export duty on logs would stop that. I do not know that it enters into the discussion at all. But, of course, with the employment of labour in our own country to saw these logs, the tendency would be towards the consumption of more of our own pork and other products in our own country than at present. If the hon. gentleman is correct in saying that in some places the lumbermen use Canadian pork entirely, it is clear that the employment of that labour would result in a larger market for Canadian pork. I do not wish to occupy the time of the committee any longer. I only wish to add my word to what has been said on behalf of an export duty. I believe that such a duty would be a great benefit to the country. Certainly, in the Georgian Bay district, and even west of that, it would be a very visible and immediate benefit. I do not think it would have the disastrous effect on the lumber trade that the hon. gentleman has stated. I do not believe that it would for any length of time seriously affect the lumber trade. Possibly it would for a short time, but on a whole I believe the lumber trade would survive the imposition of the duty, even if the Americans did impose a higher duty than they now do. It is stated, however, that the men employed are all Canadians and that the material used is all Canadian. I cannot speak for Parry Sound, but I can speak for a locality of which I have personal knowledge, where there are several lumber camps, and there, not only the men, but the horses and all the plant are transported across the St. Mary River. And that has been going on for a number of years.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. By permission of the Customs Department?

Mr. MASSON. The horses sometimes, I believe, pay the duty, but sometimes they swim across. I believe on one occasion they swam over. However, the question whether the men or the horses are brought over by American lumbermen is only incidental to the matter. I believe that if they had their mills established on our side, constant employment would be given to the men, and there would be more Canadian labour employed. No doubt they would still continue to bring over many of their lumbermen, especially from Michigan. We know that a lot of these men come over every winter and a lot of our men go over there for the winter, but they go for the winter's job and return. Now, if constant employment were given in the woods in winter and in the mills in summer, far more Canadians would be employed than at present. On the whole, I am strongly in favour of an export duty on white pine saw-logs.

Mr. SPEAKER (Hon. Peter White). May I be permitted to say a few words with regard to this matter? I frankly confess that I feel a great deal of sympathy for hon. members representing constituencies on the north shore of Lake Huron and Georgian Bay, in their appeals to the Government to impose an export duty on logs. But we must remember that the evil effects which these gentlemen depict are, to a great extent, local in their character. They are confined almost exclusively to the north shore of Lake Huron and the Georgian Bay. We must remember also that the interest of British Columbia and of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia and Quebec and a large portion of Ontario lie in the direction of obtaining free entry of lumber into the United States. If the views of those gentlemen (some of whom have advocated the imposition of a prohibitive export duty) were to prevail, we might be prevented from obtaining that which I think every member of the House will agree with me would be of great advantage to the different portions of the Dominion to which I have referred; and it seems to me, that whilst it would be quite proper for the Government to obtain the power that existed before, of imposing an export duty on logs, that power ought not to be exercised, at all events until we ascertain whether the Senate of the United States will continue lumber on the free list, as proposed in the Wilson Bill, and if lumber should remain on the free list, I submit that it would be detrimental to the interests of the whole Dominion for this Government to place an export duty on logs. As has been said in this discussion, there is a great divergence of opinion as to whether the people of the United States absolutely require our lumber or not. I am of opinion that they require it within a certain limit of cost. But if they were to put up their import duty to $4 or $5 per thousand feet, our trade with the United States, with regard to a very considerable portion of the lumber we produce, would be almost entirely destroyed. And the kind of lumber to which I refer is the kind we are most desirous of getting rid of—that is the commonest grades, which we cannot get into the United States at all, except under the most favourable circumstances and conditions. I would therefore ask these hon. gentlemen not to press the Government to impose an export duty upon logs until we ascertain definitely whether the United States will continue lumber on the free list or not. I do not at all say that it would not be quite proper for us to impose an export duty upon logs, if the Americans should impose an import duty on our lumber going into that country. But I do say that it would be eminently in the interests of a very large portion of the Dominion, if this Government stayed their hands, at present at all events, until we know what course will be taken by the United States.

Mr. MASSON. In answer to the hon. Mr. Speaker, let me say that the locality we represent is a very large locality. Georgian Bay and the north channel to the St. Mary River command the outlet of Ontario's pine. Outside of that the fields are small, so that if it is only a locality it is a very large locality, as far as Ontario is concerned.

Mr. BENNETT. I am pleased to know that in this House, composed as it is of a large number of representatives, no one has risen against this export duty except those who are directly concerned in the matter. On the one hand, we have arrayed against us the solid lumber interest, with whom it is simply a matter of dollars.

Mr. CHARLTON. Are there any dollars in yours?

Mr. BENNETT. I am speaking for my constituents and not for dollars, and if the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) thinks he is going to override me in this House he is greatly mistaken. If he thinks I am going to attempt to enter into a discussion with him, on his own standard, he is much mistaken. I may not know much, but I know enough not to rush in where angels fear to tread, or to attempt to cope in Billingsgate with the hon. gentleman, for that would be something beyond my power. Let me read, for the edification of the House, some of the choice epithets which the hon. gentleman applied, when introducing his Sunday Bill the other day.

Mr. CHARLTON. Order. That is not pertinent to saw-logs.

Mr. BENNETT. The hon. gentleman has seen fit on different occasions, to use his unlimited Billingsgate to best advantage. The delicate and refined manner in which he refers to others, whose views are not in accord with his, is shown by the epithets of hoodlums, anarchists, and thieves, which he so freely bestowed on them—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. BENNETT. If it is out of order to quote the hon. gentleman's language, then I must submit.

Mr. LAURIER. The hon. gentleman is referring to a past debate.

Mr. BENNETT. I am referring to the hon. gentleman's own statement. All I can say is this: that as long as I am in this House I will never attempt to enter into a controversy with the hon. gentleman and compete with him on the use of Billingsgate, for that would be a very unequal contest. I ask the Government to consider at whose instance lumber is made free in the Wilson Bill. It must be at the request of the consumer of lumber. And I say here—and I make the statement without reservation—that the clause in the Wilson Bill providing that in the event of our imposing an export duty on logs, an import duty of $2 per thousand should be imposed upon our lumber was introduced at the request of the American lumbermen who own limits in Canada. And if to-day this Government proposed a prohibitory tariff, this very night we should find the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) and these American speculators, who hold limits in Canada, on their way to Washington to ask that lumber from Canada be admitted free. Every man of common sense knows this; it is patent on the face of it. In reference to the remarks of the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) I can only say that I presume he has been pronouncing his political valedictory. For a man representing a district in which are saw-mill towns, which formerly had 1,200 and 1,500 people, and now contain a bare 100, to declare himself in favour of this policy can only lead to the assumption that the hon. gentleman is going out of politics, whether by or against his own will. I beg to call the Premier's attention to the memorable statement he made on one occasion. In Toronto he declared that the National Policy would stand the lopping-off of some of the mouldering branches. Let me remind the hon. gentleman that a good gardener does not continue lopping off branches alone, he does something more—he grafts. Here is an opportunity for him to graft a new branch on the National Policy, and if he puts one good Canadian graft on the National Policy to-day, by declaring that the timber trade policy shall be for the masses, and not for the few men that have made themselves wealthy out of these limits, he will be doing a kindness to the people of Canada, and will be introducing a measure of a most patriotic character. The Government are fully conversant with this matter. I hope that before this discussion ends that the Finance Minister will give us who come from the districts, which are seriously affected, the satisfaction of going home and telling our people the why and wherefore of this case. Is the reason for no action being taken that the Government have not sufficient information on the subject? If so, then in the name of goodness let us know it, and we will see to it that they are given whatever information they require. If there are other reasons let us know. But to-day we have to go home, as we have done before, with nothing more to say than that the Government has the question under consideration. A year ago the Finance Minister gave us a glimmer of hope. I do trust that before the session passes away the clouds will be lifted altogether, and that the lumber industry of the North Shore will be revived, and thousands of men who to-day are expatriated in Michigan as a result of this policy will return. If this is done a graft will have been added to the National Policy that will be enduring, and will be worthy of a patriotic and progressive Government.

Committee rose, and it being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

House again resolved itself into Committee on Ways and Means.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. DEVLIN. I do not wish to prolong the discussion, but I can hardly allow a great deal of what has been said during this debate to pass without at least entering my protest against the proposition that an export duty shall be placed upon logs. It will be within the recollection of this committee that some two years ago there was considerable discussion upon this subject in the House. At that time, in the discharge of my duty as the representative of a district in which the lumber interest is a very considerable one, I placed myself in communication with some of the most important lumbermen of the Ottawa Valley, regardless entirely of their political opinions. I obtained from those gentlemen a number of letters which I read—if not entire, at least the important portions of them. Not a single gentleman, except one, whose name has been mentioned, I think by the hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett), was in favour of the proposition that this export duty should be imposed. I will refer later on to the gentleman—Mr. Eddy. I must say that I for one was astonished to hear that such desolation existed in certain districts of Canada as was pictured before this House in the course of the speeches delivered by the hon. member for Simcoe and the hon. member for Grey (Mr. Sproule). Up to this debate we had been accustomed to hear from hon. gentlemen supporting the Government the delightful tale of prosperity existing in every part of Canada. In fact, the great charge made against members of the Liberal party has been that they have been in the habit of decrying their country. But in this debate we see gentlemen like the hon. member for East Simcoe predicting every possible calamity, if the proposition which he offers is not accepted. We find the hon. member for Grey also saying that in the section which he represents there is a great deal of distress, owing to the fact that the export duty is not imposed. These gentlemen tell us that 18,000 Canadians have gone from their section to Michigan, and that a great many others will follow if the policy they advocate is not adopted. In fact, if you read the speeches they have delivered you will find stronger expressions with regard to the depression existing in these localities. I venture to say, than any that have fallen from the lips of hon. gentlemen on this side. And, bear in mind, Mr. Chairman, all this exists under this great and glorious National Policy, which was to have brought prosperity to every part of the country, the National Policy which was to have given increased population and renewed prosperity to every county in the Dominion. Now we are told that, notwithstanding this National Policy, which exists in these districts as well as in every other part of the country, Canadians are being driven, not by the hundreds, but by the thousands, out of these districts into the United States. The hon. member for Grey, insisting on the fact that this export duty should be imposed, gave two principal arguments, and with these arguments I may deal briefly. He gave these arguments with illustrations. He also stated as another reason why this duty should be imposed that the towing across Georgian Bay causes a great deal of inconvenience to navigation. If, on the other hand, you consider the enormous interests that are at stake, and that would be sacrificed, in all probability, if this export duty were reimposed, I do not think the arguments put forth by the hon. member for Grey will counterbalance the disastrous effects that would follow from the imposition of this duty. It has been very well said by the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) that it is only in certain localities that this depression exists, that it is only in a certain portion of Ontario that any fear is entertained that the lumber interest would be injured by the duty remaining as it is. We have been told, and I agree with the view, that it would be well to consider the interests of every other portion of the Dominion. Sir, the lumber interest is not confined solely to the districts which are represented by those hon. gentlemen who advocate the imposition of an export duty. One has not far to look to behold the magnitude of the lumber trade in this district. We have the Ottawa River, with its magnificent tributaries, the Gatineau River, the Lièvre River, and if you go down the St. Lawrence River you will find on many of its tributaries that the lumber industry is active; indeed, in almost every section of the province of Quebec the lumber interest to-day is thriving, owing to the fact that there is no export duty. In fact, I think one hon. gentleman who advocates the imposition of an export duty admitted that to-day there is great prosperity in the Ottawa Valley, owing to the fact that we have comparatively easy access to the American market for our lumber. But, for the sake of a little local benefit to be conferred on a few mills, the hon. member for Grey would have all this trade of the Ottawa Valley placed in danger, he would have thousands and thousands of men who are engaged in this industry in both summer and winter, bringing happiness and contentment to their homes—he would have them thrown out of employment by the reimposition of a duty. I think that their interests should be just as carefully considered as the interests of the locality represented by the hon. member for Grey. Now, with regard to Mr. E. B. Eddy, whose name has been mentioned, I must say that any representations that gentlemen may make to the Government, should certainly carry weight. I am willing to admit that. I know what the strength of Mr. Eddy is, I have felt his strength in the past, and I have no doubt I will feel it in the future. Mr. Eddy is one of the pioneers of the lumber industry on the Ottawa. He does not personally look to dollars and cents. As soon as he had earned a dollar, as soon as he had amassed a fortune, he was ready to spend that fortune in building up the lumber industry of the Ottawa Valley. Perhaps there is no Canadian to-day who is deserving of more credit for the enterprise he has displayed than Mr. E. B. Eddy, of whom the hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) spoke. Mr. Eddy has ever been a consistent Conservative, and his representations should carry weight with the Government. I am willing to admit that, and I am willing to admit it, also, in view of the services which he has rendered to the cause which has been advocated here on so many occasions by the hon. member for Simcoe and the hon. member for Grey. I am willing to go even further, and to admit it in view of the services which he is likely to render to the Conservative party in future campaigns. I may remark here that his name was mentioned recently in connection with the succession of the late Prime Minister in the representation of the division of Inkerman in the Senate. The moment that gentleman's name was mentioned there was hardly a paper in the country, whether of Liberal or Conservative proclivities, which did not speak in the highest possible terms of Mr. Eddy, and which did not admit that certainly no gentleman would confer greater honour on a seat in the Senate, than Mr. Eddy.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. DEVLIN. Yes, I can prove it all. I am willing to go that far, and I may say that in taking the stand I do to-day, I am not going to gain the sympathy of Mr. Eddy. I did not have his sympathy with me in the last election, and I am not likely to have it again when I shall offer for re-election in that county. I am not, therefore, speaking with the hope of gaining one vote or several votes, I am speaking simply in accordance with my own belief, and the principles of fair-play which I entertain. I believe in the policy of freedom of trade. I believe that we should advocate to-day the emancipation of trade, that we should not look solely to the interest of one locality, but that we should look to the interest of every county, and every province in the Dominion. In accordance with that belief, I protest to-day against chains and shackles being placed on any branch of trade; I protest against the policy of legislating for the benefit of the few to the detriment of the great majority of the people. The hon. member for East Simcoe said that in advocating this policy he did it with the view of obtaining the benefit for the many, against the interests of the few. But, Sir, what has been his course in this House ever since he has had a seat here? His course has been to support the very policy that has made millionaires of the few, and impoverished the great many in the country. On all occasions he has been ready to vote and to speak with all his force in favour of the miserable policy that they call the National Policy—the miserable policy of protection for the few against liberty and emancipation for the many. And, Sir, actuated, no doubt, by that same belief, and thinking that certain parties have not got enough, he stands up in this House and utters a threat to the Government and to the Prime Minister, and says that he is, along with many others, ready to cross over to Michigan if this export duty is not imposed. Sir, I believe that we should not tax any portion of this community for the benefit of the few, and I believe that the taxes should be levied in such a manner that they shall contribute solely to the revenue that is required to defray the cost of carrying on the government, economically administered. That is my belief, and it is on that ground that I rise to-day to say that it will be a shame if the Government shall impose another additional burden upon a trade which is of great benefit, not only to the lumbermen who have invested millions of dollars in this interest, but to thousands and thousands who are depending upon the successful prosecution of that trade, and who desire to see no further barriers placed between this country and the great country to the south of us, who are anxious to see existing barriers taken down, who are anxious to see the natural channels of trade which exist between the two countries left free as they were intended by Providence to be. Why, we were told in this debate to-day that the Congress of the United States legislate in the interest of the United States. Admit it. We are here to-day, also, not to legislate in favour of the United States, but to legislate in favour of the whole Dominion. How many counties in the Dominion have sent in petitions asking for this export duty? How many provinces represented in this Chamber have asked for the imposition of this export duty? I think if you will exclude the locality from which those hon. gentlemen come, you will not find another district in the Dominion earnestly and loudly clamouring for the re-imposition of the export duty which would do so much harm to the great lumbering industry of the country.

Mr. SPROULE. Allow me to ask a question. As a representative of the Ottawa Valley, what would the hon. gentleman say if all the timber in this valley were carried down the river to the United States and sawn there instead of here? What would be said in his own riding?

Mr. DEVLIN. I would be sorry indeed for it.

Mr. SPROULE. That is our position; and why blame us?

Mr. DEVLIN. I would be very sorry if that were done; but believing in freedom of trade I stand by my principles, that you have no right to place any shackle or chain on any industry. What is the distance from here to the United States? The hon. gentleman knows it. Besides, we have means for carrying our logs to the United States by river and by railway, and the hon. gentleman knows it. But we in the Ottawa Valley are not afraid of the Americans. We have our Canadian brains and arms, and we are ready to defy American competition. We only ask for fair-play and for a fair field; we are ready to go into competition with any body of men in the world. The hon. gentleman knows there is not a great distance between the Ottawa Valley and the United States, and our logs are not brought 50 miles, but many hundreds of miles.

Mr. SPROULE. I was not speaking about distance.

Mr. BENNETT. Will the hon. gentleman answer a question? If the export duty were placed on logs to-day, what duty would there be against logs going from Canada to the United States, under the McKinley Act, and also under the proposed Wilson Bill?

Mr. DEVLIN. I think that question has already been very fully answered by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), but as the hon. gentleman's memory is so short I will read again from the remarks of that hon. gentleman. The hon. gentleman knows that in the McKinley Bill there is a provision that if we place an export duty on our logs the import duty will be at once increased.

Mr. BENNETT. To how much ?

Mr. DEVLIN. Let me read. The provisions of the Wilson Bill are to this effect :

" 672. Logs, and round unmanufactured timber, not specially enumerated or provided for in this Act.

" 673. Firewood, handle bolts, heading bolts, stave bolts, and shingle bolts, hop poles, fence posts, railroad ties, ship timber, and ship planking, not specially provided for in this Act."

Under the tariff now in force ties are charged 20 per cent, ship planking $2 a thousand feet, and some of the other articles enumerated bear a duty.

" 674. Timber hewn and sawed, and timber used for spars, and in building wharfs.

" 675. Timber, squared or sided."

This now bears a duty of $1.50 per thousand feet.

" 676. Sawed boards, planks, deals and other timber."

These are the articles put on the free list under this Bill, subject to the following proviso :

" Provided that all of the articles mentioned in paragraphs 682 to 683 inclusive, when imported from any country which lays an export duty on any of them shall be subject to the duties existing prior to the passage of this Act."

I am reading from the Wilson Bill and am pointing out what the effect would be of placing an export duty on our logs. Two years ago I read the opinions of men, at least as competent to deal with the subject as the hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett), and having as much interest in the country as that hon. gentleman, and they pointed out that the effect of the reimposition of the export duty would be at once to increase the import duty on the American side, and that would involve an immense danger and loss to the whole lumbering industry, not only in the Ottawa Valley, but of the whole Dominion.

Mr. BENNETT. Two dollars ?

Mr. DEVLIN. That is what I said.

Mr. BENNETT. The hon. gentleman did not say so.

Mr. DEVLIN. The hon. gentleman does not mean to intimate that I did not know what it was. I simply pointed out that I was glad to have had the opportunity of reading the provisions of the Wilson Bill, and perhaps they will have had the effect of bringing back the hon. gentleman to a more reasonable view of the situation. I am not making any threat as the hon. gentleman did ; I am not decrying my country, as the hon. gentleman decried it ; I am not telling the House that 18,000 Canadians had cleared out to Michigan, and that I would clear out if the duty was imposed. The hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Macdonell), however, thinks that he can find a solution of the difficulty. He said, and this is one of the reasons why I rose to speak, that no one would support the proposition put forward by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton). I rise to support those propositions. I endorse most heartily his attitude on this question, and I am very glad to be able to do so. We have in the whole proposition laid down by the hon. member for Algoma the most complete essence of protection. The hon. gentleman said : Make the duty so high that no logs can go into the United States. We are very anxious, however, to get raw material from the United States for our various manufactures. We are also very anxious to get the products, not only of our forests, but of our mines admitted into the United States free of duty. Why is it to-day that our ore is not exported as freely as it should be ? The hon. gentleman will be able to explain that matter, no doubt.

Mr. DEVLIN.

Mr. MACDONELL. Did you say ore ?

Mr. DEVLIN. Yes. I thought the hon. gentleman was going to offer some sensible interruption, but perhaps it would be too much to expect it from him.

Mr. MACDONELL. I did not intend to interrupt the hon. gentleman. I merely asked the question to know if I caught the word. I will answer the question when the hon. gentleman is through.

Mr. DEVLIN. I am very much surprised to hear these professions from the hon. gentleman opposite. He knows that on certain occasions they say they are very anxious to obtain reciprocity with the United States, and yet for this very article which is an important one for the American market, they are prepared to ask the Government to close our market. They are ready to insist upon the adoption of a policy that would prevent almost any measure of reciprocity being hoped for from the United States. I endorse the position taken by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) in regard to this question most heartily. In doing so I know I am expressing the feelings not only of the people of the county which I represent, but of almost every county, if not every county bathed by the grand Ottawa River, by the Gatineau, by the Lièvre, by the St. Maurice and the tributaries of the St. Lawrence. Impose an export duty, and you will hurt the lumber trade of the country enormously, and instead of a few establishments closing up in the Georgian Bay district thousands of people will be seriously injured, not only in the province of Quebec, but in many portions of Ontario, along both shores of the Ottawa, and many industries will be affected which owe much of their vitality to the distribution of money made by the lumber trade of the Ottawa Valley. I desire to impress on the Government the proposition that the export duty should not be reimposed. No necessity at this moment demands it ; no strong interest at this moment desires it. And, Sir, it is not in the interests of the country, not even in the interests of any very important portion of the country, that the duty should be reimposed.

Mr. KAULBACH. Mr. Speaker, the lumber industry of Canada is one of great significance and should be encouraged, fostered, and protected with the utmost care, and by the very best possible legislation. It has been brought to the notice of Parliament on various occasions that the free export of logs to the United States was resulting most injuriously to the lumbering industry of Canada. This was shown very fully and clearly by previous speakers on this subject, by the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) and the hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett), and others, who stated that the large lumber mills on Georgian Bay, with their tall chimneys were standing idle, as monuments of the past, and the logs which should be sawed in them, are taken past them, over the bay, across the border and cut in the United States, owing to the export duty on logs having been removed. Now, the only way to recuperate the lumber industry of Canada in this particular is to reimpose the duty on logs. A further proof of the injury done to this industry in Canada under present conditions is shown by the utterances very recently of a member of Congress, that in the state of Michigan alone there has been and still is imported into that state annually from Canada for manufacture or cutting into lumber upwards of 500,000,000 feet. Again, in one of our city papers this morning I observed the following, as a further proof of what free logs is doing :

The Hon. Mr. Weston, a Michigan man, stated the case clearly last year when he said : "On the north shore of Lake Erie the Canadian saw-mills are in ruins, but the mills at Tonawanda, N.Y., are employing thousands of American workmen, manufacturing Canadian logs towed from the Erie north shore. The Saginaw mills are running out of American stock, and already they are looking to Georgian Bay for Canadian logs to cross Lake Huron and keep their mills and men at work." The Americans must have our lumber, but even were it otherwise it would be wise to prevent the depletion of our forests which is now going rapidly on.

Mr. CHARLTON. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to correct a mistake in that statement ?

Mr. KAULBACH. I am reading from a statement that I saw in a newspaper this morning.

Mr. CHARLTON. I am aware, and I would like to make the hon. gentleman aware of the true state of facts. The statement is made there that the logs are towed from the north shore of Lake Erie, and that thousands of men are employed in the mills at Tonawanda, N.Y. The fact is that logs have not been towed from the north shores of Lake Erie for the last fifteen years, and there are but two small mills at Tonawanda, that saw about 3,000,000 feet a year, which is brought from the state of Michigan. The statement is entirely untrustworthy and misleading.

Mr. KAULBACH. Probably this person is mistaken in the name of this place, and he evidently intended, instead of Lake Erie, the north shore of the Georgian Bay. The timber limits of Canada in many instances, as I learn, are bought by Americans, lumbered by Americans, towed over the lakes by American tugs, manned by Americans, and manufactured or cut in American mills, and all the labour lost to Canada, most unsatisfactory to Canadians. The United States people readily see that free lumber would very readily shut up their mills, and render the industry profitless, so far as their mills are concerned, and necessarily have the tendency to transfer the milling industry to Canada, hence the offer some years ago by Congress to abate the duty on lumber $1, providing Canada would remove the export duty then imposed on logs, which should not have been conceded by Canada, as it is well known that the timber limits in the United States were at the time, and are now, greatly depleted of timber and not affording sufficient for their home demand, and consequently all the duty placed upon lumber by Congress, the people of the United States would have to meet themselves as the consumers of the article. This appears very clear. The free export of logs affects not only the lumbermen of Canada, but those engaged in the manufacture of wood pulp as well, of which we have not a few of them in Nova Scotia, and some in the county I have the honour to represent, both which industries—lumbering as well as pulp—I want to have encouraged and protected. Pulp manufacturers would be interfered with in the Maritime Provinces more than lumbermen, as the wood could be transferred in vessels seawards, across the border, when saw-logs would be too cumbersome for that mode of transit, hence the necessity for remedial legislation to protect these industries in Canada, which can be done by reimposing the export duty on logs. I certainly see the necessity for the export duty on logs being restored, and the National Policy as it were, characterized—not by expatriating Canadians from the land of their birth or adoption by denying them the benefit of labour which could be employed at home, which the free export of logs from Canada had been, and is now doing—but by having our mills in Canada kept moving, and Canadian hands employed to operate them. I believe in Canada first, and Canada at all times for Canadians. I repeat, reimpose the export duty on logs, with the understanding that if the United States Congress will allow free entry for Canadian lumber, this Government will remove the export duty on logs. In other words, free lumber, free logs. This might be arrived at by restoring the duty and adding a reciprocity clause to the item to the effect, giving the Governor in Council power to remove the export duty on Canadian logs on getting in return free lumber into the United States.

Mr. FORBES. If the hon. gentleman refers to page 30 of the tariff he will find the very provision there that he now asks the Government to make.

Mr. KAULBACH. It is not what I advocate. There is no export duty placed on logs there. I ask the Government to place the export duty on logs and then add a clause to the effect, that if the United States will allow our lumber to go in free, we will only be too happy to allow our Canadian logs to go into their country without an export duty.

Mr. McNEILL. I do not intend to take up the time of the committee longer than for a moment or two, but with regard to this matter I wish to say: that my own constituents are very much interested in this question, not only from the point of view of the lumberman, but also from the point of view of the fisherman. On the face of it to those on this side of the House, I think there ought to be a very strong case made out before we depart so entirely from the principles of the National Policy, as to send out of the country our raw material to be manufactured in a foreign country. If I had heard a very strong case made out to the effect that the imposition of the duty upon our lumber would be destructive of the lumbering interests of this country, I should be inclined to pause a good deal before I supported the proposition of my hon. friends who have been advocating the imposition of an export duty upon logs. I have no doubt that in the first instance the imposition of such a duty would affect to a certain extent the lumbering industry here, but I was very much impressed by the argument of my hon. friend from East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett), when he said, that those who had induced the placing of this clause in the Wilson Bill which threatened us with a duty upon our lumber if we imposed an export duty upon our saw-logs, were the very men who had purchased our timber limits and who were carrying our logs to the other side. Now, it is quite evident that it is very important for them in the meantime that they should get their logs in free of duty; but it seems to be just as clear that in the event of our placing an export duty on logs, so soon as a duty was imposed on lumber on the other side, it would be quite as important for them to have that duty taken off, because, as a matter of course, as soon as we prevented their exporting logs to any considerable extent by imposing an export duty upon them, they would find that they could not sell their lumber to advantage with a duty upon it on the other side, and they would at once desire to have that duty removed, because they would be obliged to make their lumber here. So that the very influence which is threatened to be brought to bear to have a duty put upon our lumber would then be brought to bear to have any duty which was imposed taken off. I must say, for my part, that I would like to hear a much stronger prima facie case established in favour of the argument that our lumber interest is likely to be seriously affected by the imposition of an export duty on logs than I have heard yet. I confess that the statement made by the hon. the Speaker of this House had a very strong effect upon me, because I know him very well indeed, and I do not at all sympathize with the view that gentlemen who are engaged in the lumber industry and who happen to have seats in this House, should not be perfectly free to express their views on this subject. I think it is quite right that they should do so. Of course, we must recollect that to a certain extent their minds are likely to be, unconsciously perhaps to themselves, biassed in a certain direction; but, on the other hand, we must recollect that they are probably better informed on this subject than most of us who venture to speak upon it; and, from my knowledge of my hon. friend the Speaker of this House, I am quite sure of this, that the very fact that he was in any degree connected with the industry would make him very reticent about expressing his opinion upon the floor of the House on the subject at all; and unless he was satisfied in his own mind that the case was a strong case, he would not have spoken on the subject. Therefore, as I said, I feel very considerably impressed by what he said. At the same time I cannot say that there has been a sufficiently strong prima facie case made out in favour of his view to satisfy me that it would not be a good thing to impose an export duty upon logs. I wish to call the attention of the committee to this fact, which has already been spoken to by my hon. friend from Algoma (Mr. Macdonell), that we are not considering the lumber industry alone, but a second and most important industry, that is, the fishing industry. There is no doubt whatever that the towing of these logs across the lakes is injuring the fishing industry to a very material extent. The debris which falls from these logs, the bark which is rubbed off in the course of towing them across the lakes, is destroying the feeding beds of the fish, and their spawning beds also; and our fishermen find that even their nets are destroyed by the amount of bark which is accumulated in them in the course of this traffic. So that we have these facts to bear in mind. In the first place, this side of the House must recollect that allowing our logs to go into the American market free of duty is entirely contrary to the principles we advocate, the principles of the National Policy; in the second place, we have to recollect this very important fact, that by doing so we are allowing the Americans to deplete our forests, after they have pretty well depleted their own; and, thirdly, we have to remember that we are to a large extent allowing the fishing industry of the Georgian Bay and Lake Huron to be destroyed.

Mr. EDWARDS. Mr. Chairman, I must say that for various reasons I think this is one of the most unfortunate debates that has taken place in this House. When the matter of the importation of lumber from Canada into the United States is under discussion in the Congress of the United States, I think it behooved this Parliament to have nothing at all to say about the matter. I think this discussion is a very serious mistake, and I think no hon. gentleman understanding the lumber trade would have introduced it at this time.

Mr. SPROULE. What are we sent for? To be dummies, when our interests are at stake?

Mr. EDWARDS. The hon. gentleman asks what we are sent here for. Some hon. gentlemen are sent here to speak for very small and limited localities, of which we have an example in this very instance. The district which I understand is alleged to be injured by the absence of an export duty on saw-logs, is a district of country embracing altogether some 5,000 square miles.

Mr. SPROULE. There are 19,000 square miles under license now, and 20,000 more.

Mr. EDWARDS. Well, Mr. Chairman, some hon. gentlemen think that this district is the world. But this country borders on the United States for a distance of between three and four thousand miles. Over this entire length of country the lumber trade is more or less an important trade, and I venture to say that no hon. gentleman in Canada who does not come from the district of country from which these hon. gentlemen come, would stand up here, if he understood the question at all, and contend for one moment that an export duty on saw-logs would be a benefit to Canada or the lumber trade of Canada. Now, it is almost unnecessary for me to say more than that the hon. the Speaker of the House has voiced my views on this subject.

Mr. SPROULE. You are both lumbermen.

Mr. EDWARDS. The hon. gentleman says we are both lumbermen. I understand that he is a doctor, and I understand that he thinks that he knows more about the lumber trade than we do.

Mr. SPROULE. And you have your mills and cut your lumber; but we do not do that.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. EDWARDS. As I said at the beginning of my remarks, I think this is a very inopportune time for discussing this question. Under the McKinley tariff, which is now in force, white pine lumber going into the United States pays an import duty of $1 a thousand, and spruce and red pine a duty of $2 a thousand. The conditions of the Wilson Bill are that the duty shall be removed on white pine, spruce and red pine. Heretofore gentlemen interested in spruce were in favour of an export duty on saw-logs. I think that to-day their views have entirely changed. And why? Because the removal of the duty upon spruce going into the United States will be a very great benefit to the spruce producers of this country. Not only will it benefit spruce, but it will enable our red pine to go to the United States, as it cannot do to-day to any extent, because of the prohibitive duty. As I understand, under the Wilson Bill, the lumber products of any country which does not impose an export duty on saw-logs will be admitted free into the United States. This, I will say at once, is perhaps not so important to the pine interest as to the spruce interest. It is of greater importance to the eastern portion of Quebec and to Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. But all the same, it will be of some benefit to the producers of pine and to the country generally, because the lumbermen themselves will not reap the whole of the benefit, but only a portion of it, and the people, as a whole, will reap their share. Now, the hon. gentleman from Muskoka, the district which is interested in the export duty in saw-logs, would jeopardize the lumber interests of the entire Dominion for the sake of having a certain quantity of lumber manufactured in that region. I believe that no greater mistake could be made than to reimpose the export duty on logs, and thus continue the import duty on our lumber going into the United States.

Mr. SPROULE. If the hon. gentleman's mill at Rockland were lying idle while all the logs went past it into the United States, and his men were thrown out of employment, would he say the same thing?

Mr. EDWARDS. If it were in the interests of the country that my mill at Rockland should shut down and never saw again, that condition of things should be brought about. I am one of those who believe that if the lumber of Canada goes free into the United States, no greater inducement could be offered to bring about the sawing of the lumber in this country. Now, as to the need of the Americans for our lumber, there are many hon. gentlemen who believe that our lumber is an immediate necessity to the people of the United States. Such is not at all the case. It is true that we have yet in this country a very considerable quantity of lumber, but the United States could do without our lumber for ten, twenty, perhaps thirty years, and that portion of our lumber which goes into the United States has to compete, handicapped by a duty, with the lumber of that country. It would be in the interests of lumbermen and of this Dominion that our lumber should go in free. There are those who believe that the profits on sawn lumber in this country are very great.

An hon. MEMBER. Hear, hear.

Mr. EDWARDS. I would like the hon. gentleman who says "Hear, hear" to be a lumberman for a few years, and he would understand what the profits are sometimes. I notice that he said here a few days ago that 75 per cent of the lumber in the Ottawa Valley was sold. Well, I am a manufacturer of lumber, and the United States is my largest market, and I can tell the hon. gentleman that I have not $5,000 worth of this year's product sold to go to the United States, and I do not expect to be able to sell any until the question of the Wilson Bill is settled. And I will tell him this also: that no more injurious blow has been struck at the lumber interests of Canada than the bringing up of this discussion at the present time. But when the discussion is brought up, we are compelled to tell the truth about the trade, and the lumber trade has not been in so depressed a condition for some years as it is to-day. Gentlemen who bring up a debate of this kind know nothing of the conditions, or they would not for one moment act as they do. I do not believe that they wish to injure the lumber trade, but they are injuring it and injuring the country, because it is the industry that comes next to the farming industry. And how is the lumber trade treated? It has to compete in the markets of the world, just as the agricultural industry has, and it has to pay a high tariff on almost all the materials it has to buy. Narrow-minded protectionists, who know nothing of the interests of the lumber trade or this country, would tax that trade at both ends. They would hamper us in the purchase of the articles used in our production, and also impose such conditions upon us as would kill our lumber trade. I speak feelingly, because I know the facts.

Mr. FOSTER. You will make out a good case for a bounty if you go on.

Mr. EDWARDS. The hon. gentleman says I will make a good case for a bounty. I can tell the hon. gentleman that if he will place the farmers and the lumbermen and the miners and the fishermen and all those who develop the natural resources of the country—if he will place us in the same position as the protected manufacturers, by giving us a bounty on everything we produce and that is used or consumed in the country, then we will all be on an equal footing. The only difference in opinion between Mr. Speaker and myself on this subject is this: He advocates, in the event of our lumber not being made free by the United States.

the imposition by us of an export duty on saw-logs. Well, as a matter of policy, and as a matter of principle, I am opposed to any such imposition. No matter whether the Americans impose a duty or not I would be opposed to our putting an export duty on saw-logs. And why? Because I believe in freedom of trade; I believe that the American who comes into this country and bids at our public auctions for limits, and buys them under the conditions imposed by the various provinces, has a perfect right to take his logs out of this country, so long as he conforms to the provisions of the Local Legislatures, just as he pleases. I may as well say at once that I would very much prefer to see the logs manufactured into lumber in this country. Yes, Mr. Chairman, and I would very much prefer to see our wheat and all our raw products manufactured before they are exported. But is this done? No, Mr. Chairman, our wheat is exported in an unmanufactured condition and so are many of our products. Yet, are there any suggestions that an export duty should be placed upon these? Why should an export duty be placed upon saw-logs any more than on wheat? The timber of this country is the property of the various provinces and it is for the provinces to deal with the question, it is for them to impose such conditions as they please. If hon. gentlemen desire to promote forestry in this country, they would employ themselves very much better if they would set themselves about protecting our forests from the ravages of fire. I honestly believe, as a lumberman having some considerable experience, that, up to this moment, twenty times as much of our lumber in this country has been destroyed by fire as has been cut by the axe of the lumberman.

Mr. SPROULE. What are Mowat's fire rangers doing; there is an army of them?

Mr. EDWARDS. Well, Mr. Chairman, I am not speaking for the Ontario Government; I am speaking now upon the question of an export duty upon saw-logs. As I understand it, the various provinces are now beginning to wake up and are doing a great deal in the direction of forest preservation. The lumbering industry of this country is not going to become extinct in a few years, but, with proper care, our forests will continue for many years, and those who believe that we near the end of the production of lumber in this country do not understand the greatness of our resources in this respect. Without taking up further time of the committee, let me say that I believe it will be a most dangerous and imprudent thing for this Parliament to authorize the Government to impose an export duty upon saw-logs by Order in Council. This is a matter of great interest to the entire country, and I do not think affairs should be left in such a condition that upon strong representations made by a few counties in western Ontario a great matter of this kind should be dealt with without consulting the House. This is not a matter that should be relegated to the Government, but is one that Parliament should keep in its own hands. In any case the country could not suffer by allowing the matter to stand until next session, when it can be dealt with if Parliament thinks it necessary.

Mr. BRYSON. Mr. Chairman, this discussion having lasted for several days, I feel quite certain that the members of the Government, as well as many members of the House, are anxious that it should come to a close. I quite agree with the hon. gentleman who has just sat down that, at a time like this, when every word that is uttered by hon. gentlemen in this House is closely scanned by our neighbours across the line and considered in the light of the speaker's political convictions, we should be very careful what we say and how we act. At the outset, I cannot but express my admiration for the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. Bennett), the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule), and the hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Macdonell) who have so zealously advocated the interests of the north-western portion of the province of Ontario, which they represent. I believe these hon. gentlemen are in earnest in their conviction that if the export duty were placed upon logs it would be beneficial to their particular section and that in what they say they voice the feelings of the constituents they represent. Sir, many hon. gentlemen in this House think it their duty to represent their constituents, while others think it their duty to represent themselves. I have no doubt, as one engaged in the lumber trade, that it will be insinuated, as it has been insinuated, that the lumbermen are arrayed on one side against the export duty, because it is to their own interest—that they are talking for dollars. Sir, I think that no greater insult can be offered to any great interest in this country than to say that those who speak on its behalf are speaking for dollars. It will surely not be denied that the lumber interest in this country deserves fair consideration at the hands of the Government. Sir, if, when the welfare of a great industry like this is in question, it would ill-become those who are engaged in the business and who are acquainted with the needs of the industry to remain silent, when those who are not lumbermen seem ready to declare that they are better able to represent the interests of the business than those who are engaged in it. Coming, as I do, from a lumbering district, and representing a large lumber interest, I am satisfied that I speak for over seven-eighths of my constituents when I say that the policy they would adopt to-day would be that of giving to the Americans free logs, provided they were willing to give us, in return, free access to their markets for our lumber. When I heard the hon. member for Simcoe advocate the putting on of an export duty at this moment, I was obliged entirely to disagree with him. Sir, we are not here to legislate in the interests of any particular section of Canada; we are here to legislate in the interests of the Dominion at large. It is our duty to do this, not from the particular standpoint of the province of Ontario or the province of Quebec, or any other. We look at the exports and imports of our logs in the whole Dominion. In the western portion of Ontario the logs are taken from the United States to our mills in the Rainy River region. We look further west to the province of British Columbia to ascertain how the question stands as to the exchange of logs and lumber with the United States. We find that altogether, up to within the last few years we have been importing quite as many logs as we have been exporting from Canada. And if to-day they have a slight advantage over us in lumber interests it would ill-become us for that reason to take the step that is proposed to-day. We have been taunted by members on the Opposition side on several occasions with having been unable to arrange better trade relations with the United States, because we are constantly building up barriers against this trade. To-day, as a Conservative and a protectionist, I am prepared that we shall continue to have no export duty on saw-logs if the Wilson Bill comes into effect. But, in saying this, I still agree with what has fallen from the lips of the hon. gentleman that until the Wilson Bill is passed the Government shall have the right to reserve by Order in Council the power to impose an export duty on logs. Sir, I disagree entirely with the remarks of the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) in the statement he made when he was about to resume his seat, and, in order that I may not misquote him, with the permission of the House, I shall read what he said:

I hope that when we come to the consideration of the proposal that the government shall have the power to impose export duties, the government will withdraw that request, and if not, the House will deny them the power.

Sir, I entirely dissent from that. We have had a surplus of logs taken last year from the Canadian side, and there will be a surplus of logs taken away this year, and if the Wilson Bill is not carried next autumn in its present shape, I shall be one of the first to advocate the placing of an export duty upon logs. We have heard something of the depression of the lumber trade in Ontario. This is the first time that I have heard that the lumber trade in Canada is depressed, that only a portion of the large amount of lumber that will be sawn in the Ottawa Valley this year, has been sold. Sir, I am not so familiar with the facts as the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat, but I have been told on good authority that fully 75 per cent of the cut of this year's logs is now sold. I shall not say that that lumber is sold to the United States market, because I am not entirely satisfied that such is the case, but I will say this, that the lumber which has been sold this year has not been sold in a declining market, nor has it been sold at a reduced figure on last year's prices. We all know that the prices obtained last year were considered fair prices, we know that the lumbermen generally have said that last year was as good a year as they have had for many years. I am prepared to say that the prices obtained this year have not been less than last year, and, in many cases, they have been a slight advance on last year. I object to the imposition of an export duty if the Americans are willing to give us reciprocal trade relations. We are willing to accept the proposition now before their Congress, but if they are unwilling to do more than merely place that proposition on paper, in order to hoodwink the Canadians, if possible, why should we not stand up for our rights, and foster this industry? Now, we are told that certain portions of western Ontario are suffering on account of the mills being idle, and a very good illustration of that fact was given by the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien). He said that the lumber in the section where that mill was placed had nearly all disappeared, that the forests had become depleted, and that it was impossible now to get logs to the point where that mill is situated. I think there are other similar cases. You might go to British Columbia, you might go to New Westminster, and there you will find mills which formerly did a very large business, but are now without logs to cut. Those are circumstances over which the Government have no control. The position I take here to-night is, that if the American Government are prepared to give us free lumber, I shall not ask the Government of this country to place an export duty on logs. My earnest desire is that the Government shall not be influenced by representations from any particular section, but that they shall hold the ground which they have taken up before the House, and stand firmly to it, irrespective of what any particular section may advocate to the contrary, because I believe that if we have any chance of ever getting free lumber, our chances would entirely disappear were an export duty to be placed upon logs at this moment.

Mr. MACLEAN (York). It is evident, from this discussion that there are many diverse interests affected, and that these interests are so wide that the different provinces cannot agree. Well, there is one way of reaching a settlement of this question, and we in Ontario have the cure in our own hands. After the election takes place, next month, we hope to have a Government in power which will place such restrictions on the production of lumber as will secure its cut in our own province. To that end, I advise my hon. friends here who are advocating this export duty, to turn out and support Mr. Meredith in the coming contest, because not long ago Mr. Meredith placed himself on record, and his followers placed themselves on record in Toronto, as favourable to such restrictions as will secure the cutting of our own lumber in our own country. Another point for the information of the hon. member for Russell (Mr. Edwards) is this, that the highest duty put on lumber by the Wilson Bill will be $2. If that duty is put on, our lumbermen can still make money, because before the McKinley tariff came into operation, the duty was $2, and they made money then. If they could make money then they will continue to make it even if the Americans again put the duty at $2 a thousand. If that is the case, both the arguments of the hon. member for Russell, and the argument put forward by the hon. the Speaker (Mr. White), speaking as the representative of his county, fall to the ground. The lumbermen did make money when the duty was $2, they are making money now, and they can make it if the duty is put up to $2, as the Wilson Bill threatens to do.

Mr. EDWARDS. Supposing we should ask them to put it up to $4 a thousand?

Item agreed to.

Sawed boards, planks, deals, and other lumber, free.

Mr. FOSTER. I want to add the words, "undressed or dressed on one side only."

Mr. MARTIN. I must say that the amendment proposed by the Finance Minister is certainly a great improvement on the item as it stands. Still, I think the committee is entitled to an explanation as to why the Finance Minister does not include all dressed lumber, instead of saying, lumber dressed on one side.

Mr. FOSTER. In the first place, the hon. gentleman quite understands that we have made a large concession on lumber, which is an important industry in this country, where there are diverse interests, as in most other things. The sawed boards, planks, deals, and other lumber which were placed in the free list at first, would simply allow lumber to come in free in the rough, and that was not so much a concession to Manitoba and the North-west, especially as it was meant to be. Owing to the fact that unless it is planed on one side or dressed on one side, the larger amount carried in the rough, adds very much to the freight, and made that a concession which, though useful in some degrees, was not as useful as we intended it to be. So we propose by this addition to give Manitoba and the North-west Territories, their lumber in the best available form considering the freight, for rough use, without entirely making lumber free, and without trenching too much on the large interests of dressing and preparing lumber towards its use in various forms.

Mr. MARTIN. I understood the hon. gentleman to say: "without trenching too much on the large interests for dressing and preparing lumber." Where are they located?

Mr. FOSTER. Throughout the Dominion.

Mr. MARTIN. I thought the hon. gentleman was referring to Manitoba.

Mr. FOSTER. I had reference to the Dominion as a whole, of which Manitoba forms a part.

Mr. MARTIN. I understood the hon. gentleman in his remarks was referring to the dressing of lumber in Manitoba. I do not understand the hon. gentleman's remarks, and he has given no explanation except one, as to why lumber dressed on both sides should not be free. The hon. gentleman entirely misapprehends the question if he thinks it is a question of dressing lumber, or that it is a question only of freight. The reason free lumber in the rough would be no advantage to Manitoba is this: there planing mills are found in the country at very few places. The result is on that account that the expense of stopping lumber in transit and taking it from the cars to the planing mills and back again almost entirely precludes the importation of undressed lumber. I admit at once that the permission to allow lumber to come in dressed on one side adds very much to the concession. Formerly it was practically no concession. It is necessary to have lumber planed. There are no planing mills throughout the country, except at very few points, and so lumber imported from the United States for the use of farmers and settlers must be planed at least on one side. Very considerable quantities imported are planed on both sides. I understand the Finance Minister to say that he has refused to grant the full concession to the farmers in the North-west of allowing lumber to come in planed on both sides duty free, in order to conserve and not entirely wipe out the industry of planing lumber. I asked the hon. gentleman where that industry was located, and he put me off by referring to the Dominion of Canada. I know of no particular industry in Manitoba that amounts to very much as regards planing lumber. The whole question is not one of planing lumber or protecting the interests of those interests, but it is a question of protecting the manufacturer of lumber in Manitoba, and especially one particular manufacturer in Winnipeg, who is a very ardent supporter of hon. gentlemen opposite, a gentleman who has been here as a delegate with respect to this very matter. I am very sorry indeed to see that he has been able to persuade the Government to act in this matter in the interests of a single individual and a few other manufacturers of lumber in Manitoba, because there are very few indeed, as against the interest of the farmers of Manitoba and the North-west Territories.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman sees something which no other living mortal sees.

Mr. MARTIN. I can see, and every settler in Manitoba can see it.

Mr. FOSTER. No single settler can see what you have stated. You say you never saw it, but you simply stated it.

Mr. MARTIN. Saw what?

Mr. FOSTER. You have made your statement.

Mr. MARTIN. The hon. gentleman is simply protecting Mr. Sprague and a few manufacturers of lumber as against the interests of the settlers.

Mr. FOSTER. That was not the statement at all.

Mr. MARTIN. It was the statement I made.

Mr. FOSTER. You made another statement.

Mr. MARTIN. I made no other statement whatever.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman did make another statement. His statement in plain English was this: He was very sorry that something happened, which he saw happened, which was that Mr. Sprague came down and prevailed with the Government, or with the Finance Minister, to put the item in this way. I say the hon. gentleman never saw that, and no mortal living ever saw it.

Mr. MARTIN. I have no doubt that the hon. gentleman's contention is to a certain extent correct. I have no doubt that Mr. Sprague's contention was—and I am willing to give the hon. gentlemen some credit—was not to allow lumber to come into the country dressed on one side, but not to allow lumber to come in dressed at all.

Mr. FOSTER. There was no need for any such a contention; it was already proposed in the Budget.

Mr. MARTIN. But the country was speaking out. The hon. gentleman has other supporters from the country besides Mr. Sprague, men who are not in the lumber business, and they were demanding from the Government that this pretended concession should be made a real concession, and Mr. Sprague, who is a most prominent Conservative—suggested by my opponent at the recent election—came here and asked the Government to give us something which formerly amounted to nothing, and was simply no concession whatever, for it did not apply to more than ten per cent of the lumber imported into Manitoba from the United States. The hon. gentleman is now giving us some concession, a very valuable concession, but it does not go far enough, and the reason given by the hon. Minister for refusing the full concession is that some interests will be affected. It is not a question of protecting the planing mill industry, but of protecting Mr. Sprague and a few other manufacturers of lumber, because they are interested not in the planing of lumber but in the manufacture of lumber, and they are able to retain very high prices, which the hon. gentleman noticed when he was in Manitoba, and when he was made aware of the combination in the lumber business there and the high prices exacted from the settlers, and Mr. Sprague and a few other manufacturers in Manitoba, although most of the manufacturers are in Ontario, are anxious to maintain the prices as high as possible. The hon. gentleman, by refusing to allow lumber planed on both sides to come in free, is making a concession to them instead of a concession to the settlers. While I compliment the Minister for changing what was a mere pretense of a concession to us into a real and valuable concession, I regret he has not gone the full length and allowed all lumber, whether planed on one side or both sides to come in free, because in doing that he would have gone as far as possible towards meeting the Wilson Bill on this item.

Mr. FOSTER. It would have been too bad not to have left you something to regret.

Mr. HASLAM. I desire to point out the unreasonableness of the argument of the hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat. The hon. gentleman contends that the concession just made by the Government in the matter of lumber is almost no concession.

Mr. MARTIN. No; I did not. The hon. gentleman misunderstood me.

Mr. HASLAM. I do not suppose there is a member in the House so foolish as to believe any such statement.

Mr. MARTIN. I rise to an explanation. I say that the hon. gentleman is quite mistaken. What I said was, that the item as printed in the proposed tariff resolutions was practically no concession whatever, but I added that the change the hon. gentleman has made in the proposed amendment is a very valuable concession to the country.

Mr. HASLAM. And the hon. gentleman wants the concession to go further. The concession amounts to this, that the flooring, casing and everything of that description used in houses will go in free. The hon.

gentleman wants to know what interests are to be protected. I will tell you one industry that ought to be protected. The lumber industry of British Columbia ought to be protected, and I believe that in this instance it is worthy of a good deal of protection and a good deal of consideration. We buy the principal part of our supplies from Manitoba, and for these supplies, for the benefit of the Manitoba farmer, we pay 75 cents a barrel on Hungarian flour. That flour costs us $3.74 per barrel laid down in Vancouver at wholesale price, while our competitors in the lumber trade on Puget Sound get that same flour for $2.65 a barrel.

Mr. MARTIN. If the hon. gentleman will propose to take off that 75 cents a barrel on flour I will support him.

Mr. HASLAM. I can say as a lumberman of British Columbia, that we will be very well pleased to allow you all lumber free, provided you allow us our supplies free; but as it appears to me, according to the hon. gentleman, the farmers of Manitoba want the whole earth and a fence around it. In their estimation there is nothing in the Dominion of Canada but Manitoba. Now, we have to pay a duty on everything that is used in the product of lumber, and the farmers of Manitoba reap over seven-eighths of the benefit of the duty that we pay. That being the case, I think they should allow us some consideration in the matter. The hon. gentleman complains that he has not got the concession of getting lumber dressed on both sides free, but I tell him that I am positive, because I happen to know a little about the building trade as well as the lumber trade, that there is not 2½ per cent of the lumber used in the ordinary buildings in Manitoba that is dressed on both sides. To all intents and purposes there is 97½ per cent of the lumber going into Manitoba which will be free of duty. The request of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Martin) is one of the most unreasonable that any man could make.

Mr. MARTIN. I want to ask the hon. Minister of Finance, if this free list will include matched lumber? One of the most important articles that we import is what we call ship laths for buildings which goes through a planing-mill, and is to some extent tongued.

Mr. MACDONELL (Algoma). The question asked by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Martin) is in keeping with his statement in reference to lumber dressed on both sides. I enter a protest against admitting free of duty, lumber dressed on one side. When I read the free list in the tariff as originally proposed, it was bad enough to see lumber come in free, but to have that lumber come in free when dressed, is to my mind adding insult to injury. The hon. member (Mr. Martin) says, there are no large interests interfered with by admitting dressed lumber free.

Mr. MARTIN. I did not say that.

Mr. MACDONELL (Algoma). Pardon me, you stated distinctly that there was one small industry in Winnipeg, and you not only insinuated, but stated that that industry was owned by a gentleman who was a supporter of the present Government, and a possible candidate against yourself, and that on account of his political allegiance this concession was granted to him. If the English language conveys any meaning at all, the words that were uttered by the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) convey that meaning to my mind. Instead of the Government granting any concession to the gentleman spoken of as residing in Winnipeg, the present proposition of the Government will be of the most vital injury, not only to the planing-mills in Manitoba, large or small, but to the industry that has been established by the investment of thousands and thousands of dollars at Rat Portage to supply this lumber. To such an extent is it an injury to them, that the lumbermen there tell me, that there is but one thing for them to do if dressed lumber is allowed to come in free, and that is to close up their mills. There might be some satisfaction in it if we took the same view as the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin), because the majority of these gentlemen are not supporters of the present Government, but usually, and in fact invariably vote the other way. I feel so strongly on this question that I cannot but mention the fact: that if there be free lumber it will effectually close up these mills of which the usual output is about sixty millions feet a year. It not only affects the mills in Manitoba and north-western Ontario, but it affects the planing mills in every part of Canada where the mills on the opposite side of the river are as convenient as they are at a point like Sarnia for instance. The effect there is going to be: that this dressed lumber will come in and undersell our own lumber. As the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Haslam) has stated, there is only about 2½ per cent of dressed lumber entering into the construction of an ordinary house. Any practical man who knows anything about the business will substantiate that statement. The hon. member (Mr. Martin) asks, is matched lumber to be free? As you all know, matched lumber is dressed lumber. If that comes in free, it will be a great misfortune to the lumbering industry in Canada, and I should be very sorry to see the Government going any further than they have already done in this direction.

Mr. MARTIN. If this does not include matched lumber, it is no concession whatever. The Finance Minister can understand that the two classes of lumber we use most of, is that which goes on the outside of the house and on the floors. The floors are planed and matched on one side and tongued and grooved, and the lumber on the outside is ship lath, which is run through a machine which takes off a part of the edge, and to some extent answers the same purpose as if tongued and grooved. If the Finance Minister does not include these two classes of lumber in his concession, then he might almost as well accept the suggestion of the hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Macdonell), and leave the item the way it is.

Mr. FOSTER. Is that the hon. gentleman's suggestion?

Mr. MARTIN. No; my suggestion is, and I move:

That the words "and including matched lumber" be added to this item.

Mr. TAYLOR. Before the motion is put, I just want to say this. If I understood the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) aright, he said that if the hon. member for Vancouver Island (Mr. Haslam) would have his friends introduce a motion removing the duty of 75 cents a barrel from flour, he would support it. Now, he may speak for the farmers of Manitoba and the North-west on that question, but I know he does not speak for the farmers of Ontario. I do not know what the hon. members representing Manitoba and the North-west may say on this question, but I do most emphatically protest against the duty of 75 cents a barrel being taken from flour, as suggested by the hon. member for Winnipeg.

Mr. McMULLEN. It is a good thing that we have even one member among hon. gentlemen opposite who is prepared to advocate the cause of the farmers. I wish to say that the proposition to admit matched lumber free is a very important one, and I think the hon. Finance Minister should carefully consider it. It is well known that lumber going into the North-west dressed on one side is used for the purpose of sheeting and siding for homes, and it is made with lapped joints, one board being lapped over another. In that way it makes a neat joint and a rather comfortable house. If the lumber is not admitted as dressed and matched, the matching will have to take place in Manitoba, and I do not think there are mills there suited for that work, so that an increased cost will be entailed upon the settlers.

Mr. McDONALD (Assiniboia). The hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) may represent the farmers of the city of Winnipeg, but I represent farmers who raise wheat; and I believe that I am speaking in the interest of the farmers both of Manitoba and the North-west, when I say that we as a class decidedly object to having the duty of 75 cents a barrel on flour or the duty of 15 cents a bushel on wheat removed. I may say, as a representative of a farming district in the North-west, that I am glad that the Government have given us the concession of lumber dressed on one side. I would like to support the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Winnipeg; but, as my hon. friends from British Columbia wants some concessions, and we don't expect the earth, I shall take the opportunity of voting against the amendment of the hon. member for Winnipeg, feeling that the people of my district are satisfied with the concession the Government makes in favour of lumber dressed on one side.

Mr. ROSS (Lisgar). Representing as I do a farming district of Manitoba, I wish to say that if the hon. member for Winnipeg advocated before a farming community the views which he advocates in this House, he would have the same result that he had in Selkirk when he ran against the hon. Minister of the Interior. Every farmer in my county at every meeting I held was strongly in favour of the duty on flour. They supported us as a party because they wanted that duty, and I know that to-day they wish it continued. The hon. gentleman would not dare to go before a constituency of Manitoba farmers to-day and support the proposition to do away with the duty on flour. I also wish to correct the statement that Mr. Sprague came down here and influenced the Government to make this limited concession in regard to lumber. Mr. Sprague's views are entirely opposed to what the Government is doing now. No concession whatever is made to Mr. Sprague or to any other lumberman in Manitoba or in the district of Rat Portage. I have received letters from a number of farmers in my district, and every letter expresses the view that they would be perfectly satisfied with lumber planed on one side being admitted free. Every lumberman in my district—and there are a number engaged in that enterprise on Lake Winnipeg—is entirely opposed to the free admission of lumber planed on one side only. Even that concession is against their wishes. The farmers of my district are satisfied with it.

Mr. MARTIN. The hon. gentleman misunderstands me entirely. I admit at once that Mr. Sprague is not favourable to this change; but I say that the influence of Mr. Sprague and others like him, the manufacturers, has prevented the Government going the whole distance and making all lumber free. I say that the Government, if they desire to do justice to the farmers of Manitoba and the North-west, should make all lumber, whether dressed on one side or on both sides, free; and Mr. Sprague and others engaged in the manufacture of lumber there, have been able to induce the Government to stop short of that and only give us lumber dressed on one side. The hon. gentleman knew very well that I did not suppose that Mr. Sprague was in favour of having lumber dressed on one side admitted to Manitoba free; he would, of course, prefer the present law, which imposes a duty on all lumber, whether dressed on one side or on both sides. But I am satisfied that if the hon. gentleman put the question to the farmers whether they would be satisfied with the free admission of lumber dressed on one side, but not matched, they would emphatically say no, because the kinds of lumber most important to the farmers are those which are matched either as sheeting or flooring; and I am surprised to hear the hon. member for East Assiniboia (Mr. McDonald) say that he is going to vote against an amendment to give the farmers these kinds of lumber free, because the admission of lumber dressed on one side, without including matched lumber, will be practically of no use at all to the farmers of Manitoba. Now, one word with regard to this question of the flour duty. The reason I say I am prepared to support a revocation of the duty of 75 cents a barrel on flour, is that the millers of Manitoba are taking an unfair advantage of that duty as against the farmers of Manitoba. It is an advantage to the farmers of Manitoba to have their wheat ground into flour in the province; but under the system of milling that at present obtains in that province, under which the farmer sells his wheat and buys his flour, the millers, by increasing the price of the flour sold to the farmer to the extent, or nearly the extent, of the duty, charging that much more in the province of Manitoba than they get for the same flour in the city of Montreal, are taking an undue and unfair advantage of the protection, which they solemnly promised at the time it was imposed they would not do. For that reason I am prepared to vote for the removal of that duty.

Mr. SPROULE. What has that to do with dressed lumber?

Mr. MARTIN. I would not have referred to it if the hon. gentleman had not brought the matter up himself; and it is certainly very strange that he should object to criticisms in reply to a matter that he himself introduced.

Mr. CHARLTON. My hon. friend from Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) is to a large extent right in the strictures he makes with regard to this concession. The resolution makes free, lumber planed on one side. Now, lumber planed on one side, if used for the sheathing of a house, does not need to have dressed edges; but flooring is planed on one side and matched, that is, tongued and grooved. Siding is planed on one side, and matched and grooved. In the case of flooring and siding, if the resolution of my hon. friend passes, that lumber will have to be milled again. It may be brought in from the United States planed on one side, and before it can be used for flooring or siding it has to be milled again, and the expense of doing that would be practically the same as planing and matching. If the hon. gentleman wishes to make any concession at all to the farmers of the North-west, he must allow not only the planed surface on one side, but the fitting for that lumber to go in free also. The concession made in this amendment is of a very trifling character, if it is of any advantage whatever to the settlers of the North-west.

Amendment negatived, and item agreed to.

Pine clapboards, free.

Mr. MARTIN. Will the hon. gentleman's amendment apply to that?

Mr. FOSTER. There is no limitation to it.

Mr. MARTIN. Does that item include dressed pine clapboards?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Item agreed to.

Hubs for wheels, posts, last blocks, wagon blocks, car blocks, gun blocks, heading, and all blocks or sticks, rough, hewn or sawed only, free.

Mr. CHARLTON. This is a literal copy of the Wilson Bill.

Mr. FOSTER. Not now, I am afraid.

Mr. CHARLTON. And the Wilson Bill puts dressed pine clapboards on the dutiable list and draws a distinction between rough and dressed pine clapboards. My hon. friend will find that the interpretation of the customs law will only admit free, under this provision, undressed pine clapboards.

Mr. TAYLOR. Why should we go better than they?

Mr. CHARLTON. They find it necessary to make that distinction.

Mr. TAYLOR. They want the work done in their country.

Item agreed to.

Staves of wood of all kinds, wood unmanufactured, free.

Provided that if any country shall impose a duty upon the articles in this Schedule enumerated, or any of them, when imported into such country from Canada, it shall be lawful for the Governor General in Council, from time to time, by Proclamation published in the Canada Gazette, to declare that the following Export Duties, or any of them, shall be chargeable upon logs exported into such country from Canada.

Mr. CHARLTON. I hold that the Government in asking this House to place in the hands of the Governor in Council this power, is asking that a power that it is not proper they should have. The imposition of an export duty is a matter that will involve a great many interests, and the Governor in Council is liable to take action without that ample and full discussion and sifting of the matter that is necessary, and which it would naturally receive in the House of Commons. The Government may be waited upon by a delegation representing special interests, and may fail to realize the full scope of its action. An Act of this kind, affecting as it would the entire lumbering interests of the Dominion, millions of dollars in value, is a matter of such importance that Parliament ought not to abdicate its power, but insist on being consulted before any imposition of export duty is decided upon. It is possible that the Wilson Bill may pass with the duties on lumber largely reduced. Suppose the Wilson Bill passed with a duty of 50 cents per thousand feet on pine lumber instead of $2, and a similar duty on spruce, and supposing the same proviso were attached to these schedules, imposing reduced duties, as are now attached to the free schedules, namely, that if any country imposes an export duty on any article enumerated in the schedule, the duties, as regards the imports from that country, shall be restored on all the articles to what they were before the passage of the Bill. Suppose that were the case. Our lumbermen reap a large benefit from the reduction of the pine duty to $1, and if the Wilson Bill should pass with largely reduced duties on lumber, our Government would have power to impose an export duty without consulting Parliament and without giving to the question the consideration it ought to receive. I repeat that this is a power too great in its scope, too likely to affect important interests, to be placed in the hands of thirteen men. We have in the past plenty of instances where action has been taken by the Governor in Council without due consideration, as it is liable to be still taken. Undue influence may be brought to bear on the Ministers. There may be members of the Government who have strong prejudices, and whose prejudices may override their judgment, and I can readily understand that we might be brought face to face with a condition of things where it would be highly inexpedient to impose export duties. I repeat it is a matter of such vast importance that it requires the careful consideration of the representatives of the people in this House. If this is insisted on, I shall take action at the proper time to divide the House upon it, for I have the strongest views with regard to the impropriety of placing in the hands of the Government such arbitrary powers as might be exercised under this provision.

Mr. SPROULE. I am surprised at the hon. gentleman, who has always been such an ardent admirer of the gentlemen who framed the Wilson Bill, objecting to this proviso, which is almost identical with that in the Wilson Bill.

Mr. CHARLTON. Theirs is a statutory provision.

Mr. SPROULE. He thinks it is a very good proviso in the Wilson Bill, but a very bad one in the Canadian tariff. This proviso is the one thing that gives us any hope of getting justice done in the future, in the event of the Americans not giving us a free market for our lumber, as they propose to do in the Wilson Bill. We have fought this question out fairly, in the interests of our constituents, though we have been twitted with knowing nothing about the business. Now that is the only provision ; it allows the Government in the event of the Americans imposing a duty upon our lumber, not giving us what the hon. gentleman claims is a very desirable thing for this country—the freedom of the American market for our lumber—to impose an export duty upon Canadian logs.

Mr. CHARLTON. The hon. gentleman tells us that this is an exact copy of the Wilson Act, and that this gives the Governor in Council precisely the same power as the Wilson Bill places in the hands of the American executive.

Mr. SPROULE. I did not say exactly the same ; I say it is the same principle.

Mr. CHARLTON. Mr. Chairman, this does not give at all the same powers as the Wilson Bill. The Wilson Bill, as passed by both Houses of Congress makes an explicit provision which is to be carried into effect without the intervention of the executive. It declares that certain articles shall be placed upon the free list, except when imported from countries that impose an export duty on any one of these articles, and where a country imposes such a duty upon any one of these articles, then all these articles when imported into the United States from that country shall pay the duty fixed by law before the passing of the Act. That leaves to the executive of the United States no discretion whatever ; it lays down very distinctly what is to be the law ; it makes a statutory provision as clear and as distinct as it can possibly be. But we propose to give to the Governor in Council a class of powers that will enable them, of their own motion, to impose export duties or refrain from imposing them, power to impose them and repeal them, in fact, power that may work the utmost mischief with the trade. I know that the lumber trade in this country has stood in dread of this principle heretofore. Such a provision gives a feeling of uncertainty in the lumber trade. It is not in the interest of the lumber trade, my hon. friend from Pontiac (Mr. Bryson), notwithstanding, that it should be left with this sword suspended over it by the thread of the will of thirteen men meeting in secret conclave, and possibly influenced by interested deputations, who seek changes in our fiscal system for the purpose of fostering this industry or that. We want great questions like this debated in the House of Commons, where the proceedings are reported, where the people can know what is going on, and where all those interested can have their cases presented through their representatives with regard to this important matter of fiscal legislation. We do not want to abdicate our functions as a House of Commons ; we do not want to ask thirteen men to undertake our duties and legislate for us, to dictate to this country what its policy shall or shall not be with reference to any matter in the whole range of fiscal legislation. I repeat that this proposal is to place in the hands of the Governor in Council powers that they may or may not exercise judiciously, powers that should receive most careful consideration at the hands of all representatives of the people, because they will affect the whole country. This is a much different matter from a question of custom-house regulations or some trifling matter that requires attention for the time being. This involves interests spreading all over the country, and involving millions of dollars of capital, and I protest against placing in the hands of thirteen men, who may be influenced by representations made by special interests, who may fail to give to the question the attention and consideration it deserves, who may not have the qualifications to deal with the question intelligently, such an extensive and arbitrary power as this.

Mr. BRYSON. If there is one thing more than another which induced me to take the ground I did in the few remarks I addressed to the House, it was that in this proposal the Government reserved the special right to impose this duty. If the hon. gentleman, instead of making the appeal he has made, would say frankly that he has no confidence in the present administration, we would understand the matter at once. Let it be understood once for all that we on this side have confidence in the administration, and are prepared to leave a matter of this kind in their hands, and to declare that if the United States do not place our lumber on the free list and give us access to their markets, the present Administration shall have power to impose an export duty upon logs.

Mr. SPROULE. If I understood the hon. gentleman's argument, he not only drew a distinction between the provision here suggested and the provision in the Wilson Bill, but he declared that the provision in the Wilson Bill was superior to this. As he says, one is a statutory provision, that of the United States, which comes into force just as soon as the export duty may be placed upon logs, while the other leaves it optional with the Government to impose an export duty at any time. We who are agitating for an export duty would be better pleased if the Government would do away with the proviso, and have the clause declare that if and when a duty is charged upon our lumber, an export duty shall be collected upon logs. The clause would then read :

Provided that if any country shall impose a duty upon the articles in this schedule enumerated, or any of them, when imported into such country from Canada, the following export duties or any of them shall be chargeable upon logs exported into such country from Canada.

Make it a statutory provision, and we will be better pleased. But the hon. gentleman will oppose that. He has no confidence in the provisions of the item, and does not want it in any form in which it could be offered.

Mr. FOSTER. After "cedar," and before "hemlock," insert "elm."

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Is this a proposition to impose a tax on elm logs?

Mr. CHARLTON. It is left to the sweet will of the Government.

Mr. FOSTER. It includes elm logs with other logs and lumber upon which, in the event of certain things, an export duty may be imposed by Order in Council.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Upon what conditions?

Mr. FOSTER. The conditions are as stated.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). We are not importing any elm logs from the United States, and a great many of our people in the west have been engaged in selling elm timber, both to the home manufacturer and for manufacture on the American side. The present regulation is highly in the interest of the owner of the land. Take, as an illustration, the townships of Sombra and Dawn, which, though having excellent soil, are flat, level country, and, until some efforts are made to drain them, could not well be settled. Lands in these townships were largely in the hands of speculators. They were covered by a very heavy elm forest, and a great many settlers from the eastern country, from the vicinity of Kingston and other places in that neighbourhood, have gone west during the last fifteen years and settled in that district. They have purchased the land, and, almost altogether, they are paying for it out of the timber growing upon it. They engage in the winter season in cutting this timber, and it is sold both in the American market and to the mills on this side. Those who buy for the American markets, of course, are mostly tug owners who own vessels and engage, during the whole of the summer season, in taking these logs over to the American mills on the opposite side of the lake. I think it would be greatly to the disadvantage of the new settlers in those districts if anything were done which would put it out of their power to make the most advantageous sale they can of this timber for themselves.

Mr. CHARLTON. The same objection would exactly apply to all the others. If there is any objection to the next export duty on logs, the same objection will apply in principle and in detail to all the logs on this list.

In case of the export of any of the above enumerated logs in shorter lengths than nine feet, then a rate per cord may be levied in the same way, equivalent to the above enumerated rate per thousand feet, board measure.

Mr. SPEAKER (Hon. Peter White). I would like to inquire on what basis the export duty on pulp wood would be calculated? There are 128 cubic feet in a cord of pulp wood, and there are only about 83 cubic feet in a thousand feet, board measure, of logs. It appears to me from the terms of this resolution that under it a duty exceeding $3 per cord would be imposed on pulp wood exported from the country, and that would be a very large duty when you take into consideration the value of the pulp wood, which is not worth more than $3 or $4 per cord, and compare it with the value of a thousand feet, board measure, of lumber in the logs. I point this out for the reason that there is a very large quantity of pulp wood exported from the county I represent, a considerable proportion of it is spruce, and I am certain that the Government will find the duty entirely out of proportion to the value.

Mr. FOSTER. That is, however, a maximum limit.

Mr. SPEAKER. I am trying to point out that under this clause the Government would be compelled to charge a higher rate, proportionately, upon pulp wood than they would upon logs exported from the country, there being only a little over 83 cubic feet of lumber in a thousand feet board measure, and there being 128 cubic feet in a cord of pulp wood. The value of the cord of pulp wood is about $3 or $4 at the outside, while the value of the lumber would exceed that considerably, would probably be $5, or $6, or $10.

Mr. FOSTER. It would be too heavy a rate.

Mr. SPEAKER. Too heavy a rate on pulp wood as compared with the logs?

Mr. FOSTER. But does not this simply give what is the maximum, beyond which a rate shall be levied, leaving it entirely optional to levy a rate which does not go beyond that?

Mr. SPEAKER. No. It is true that in the first clause you limit the amount to $3 per thousand feet, board measure, upon logs, but I take it that under the reading of this resolution the same rate that you impose upon logs will have to be imposed upon the export of pulp wood.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It seems to me Mr. Speaker is quite right. If you levy a duty of $3 in the one case you must levy a duty in the other case of $4.50. I think Mr. Speaker is perfectly correct in his interpretation.

Mr. FOSTER. I think Mr. Speaker is correct. The maximum is put in the clause above, so I will amend that, if the committee will allow me, by saying "not more than, or not greater than."

Mr. BOWERS. There is a large quantity of pulp wood exported from the county I represent, thousands of cords per year. Under this clause a cord of wood would represent about 1,500 superficial feet, which would be equivalent to about $4.50 a thousand. I think myself that an export duty put on pulp wood at all will just kill the whole trade in pulp wood in Nova Scotia.

Mr. CHARLTON. There is just one thing to be said in its favour. Its natural tendency is to put an end to the trade between the two countries; and this would do it, perhaps, quicker than any other means.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think if the Minister would make that read: "in proportion to the value" it would be clearer.

Mr. FOSTER. This gives us the power to do that.

Mr. CHARLTON. You had better define it, if you possibly can.

Mr. FOSTER. I think you must trust something to our judgment.

Mr. SPEAKER. Does this include poplar pulp wood?

Mr. FOSTER. No; poplar is not on the list.

And export duty shall be chargeable accordingly, after the publication of such proclamation.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Waiving for the moment the point raised by my hon. friend, and in which I concur, that it is extremely inexpedient to give the Government the right to impose these duties at all by Order in Council. I think there is no doubt whatever that it is contrary to all sound principle, to all constitutional principle, to allow a Government one day to take off a duty and another day to reimpose it, then to remove it again and reimpose it again. The hon. gentlemen, I think, are only breeding trouble for themselves. We have had examples of the extremely indiscreet manner in which this power was exercised some years ago, when, if my memory does not fail me, the Government put a duty on and were obliged shortly afterwards to take it off. Now, it is not at all desirable that the Government should be encouraged to trifle with these questions. The act of putting on a duty by Order in Council is a very grave departure from our usual custom, and to take it off and reimpose it, and perhaps repeat the same thing over two or three times, can only bring the most intolerable confusion in the trade. I do not wonder that the lumber interest generally object in the strongest fashion to these things being tampered with as they have been. It seems to me this is particularly objectionable, and although I do not care to detain the committee now, I think that this is a provision on which the attention of the House ought to be challenged.

Item agreed to.

Books, printed paper, drawings, paintings, prints, photographs or representations of any kind of treasonable or seditious or of an immoral or indecent character, prohibited.

Mr. BOWERS.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Under which of these particular clauses did the Government take on themselves to exclude copies of Henry George's "Protection and Free Trade." As I understand when they were attempted to be circulated throughout this country, the Government excluded them, under schedule "C." I suppose.

Mr. FOSTER. No; under a post office regulation.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The Government excluded Henry George's "Protection and Free Trade," under which class did it come?

Mr. FOSTER. Under neither.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Then I do not think it was legally done.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Gentlemen who desired to circulate Henry George's book in this country wanted it carried free of postage.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. When it was franked?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. They had no more right to frank that book than hon. gentlemen opposite would have to frank the Table.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Does the hon. Minister mean to say that if we were to frank a copy of our debates, under the regulations now prevailing between the two countries it would not be carried free?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. No; I do not mean to say that. But Henry George's pamphlet was not a debate.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I beg pardon: it was part of the 'Hansard' of Congress.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I beg pardon; it was refused, because it was not.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It was read in Congress and printed in their 'Hansard.'

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Yes; but the book sent into Canada was a reprint. Only copies of the Congressional Record are admitted free, and this was not that publication.

Item agreed to.

Lumber and timber planks and boards of amaranth, cocoboral, boxwood, cherry, chestnut, walnut, gumwood, mahogany, pitch pine, rosewood, sandalwood, sycamore, spanish cedar, oak, hickory, whitewood, African teak, black heart ebony, lignum vitae, red cedar, redwood, satin wood and white ash, when not otherwise manufactured than rough sawn or split or creosoted, vulcanized or treated by any other preserving process; the wood of the persimmon and dogwood trees, hickory billets, and hickory lumber sawn to shape for spokes of wheels, but not further manufactured; hickory spokes rough turned, not tenoned, mitred, throated, faced, sized, cut to length, round, tenoned or polished, free.

Mr. TAYLOR. I suggest to the Finance Minister the desirability of dropping out the words "to shape, or rough sawn, and bent to shape." We have a great many factories in this country bending felloes for wheels, and it is quite sufficient if they are allowed to import free the rough lumber sawn.

Mr. BORDEN. I do not think it would be in the interest of the carriage manufacturers in the Maritime Provinces to make the changes suggested. I know they do not saw their rims, but they import from the United States most of the stock used.

Mr. TAYLOR. I know that the manufacturers west of Chatham and in that locality ship an immense quantity, car-loads, to the Maritime Provinces. There they have bending plants and have their own material. They import black hickory from the United States. The bending for all carriage manufacturing is done at Chatham, Hamilton, Galt and Norwood. There are several large bending factories in the country, and it is unfair to them to have the manufactured article imported free.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Then the Maritime Provinces should suffer in order that the western factories should benefit?

Mr. TAYLOR. The bending factories of the United States are in Ohio, and if the goods are brought from the United States they are supplied from that state.

Mr. FOSTER. Let it remain as we have it for the present.

Rolled iron tubes not welded, under 1½ inch in diameter, angle iron, 9 and 10 gange, not over 1½ inch wide, iron tubing, lacquered or brass covered, not over 1½ inch diameter, all of which are to be cut to lengths for the manufacture of bedsteads, and to be used for no other purpose; when imported for the manufacturers of iron bedsteads to be used for these purposes only in their own factories, until such time as any of the said articles are manufactured in Canada, free.

Mr. CHARLTON. Why would it not be just as proper to permit the farmer to import iron tubes of 1½ inches, or less, in diameter for hydraulic rams, and conveying water, as to allow them in free in this clause? The farmer has just as good a claim on the Government as the bedstead manufacturer.

Mr. FOSTER. There would not be many farmers who put in hydraulic rams.

Mr. CHARLTON. There are a great many.

Mr. TAYLOR. He could not weld the pipe. This piping has a lot of work to be done on it.

Mr. CHARLTON. You do not pay enough attention to the wants of the farmer.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. All over the country, farmers are introducing wind-mills for convenience in watering their stock, and other purposes, and it is especially valuable in such places as the North-west, and on ranches. Why should not the farmer, who wishes to improve his farm, have the same privilege as the bedstead manufacturer in importing his iron tubing free? I should like to have some satisfactory reason from the Finance Minister why that concession is not granted to the farmers, and for that matter, to all classes?

Mr. FOSTER. We are indirectly helping the farmer in this. He sleeps on the bedstead, and will possibly get it cheaper.

Mr. McMILLAN. There is not a farmer in the country to-day who is anxious to have a first-class barn, who does not use a large amount of this tubing in order that he can water his cattle inside, rather than turn them out in cold weather. Why should not the farmers have this tubing free as well as the bedstead manufacturers? This is one of the most delusive tariffs, as far as the farmers are concerned, that could be imposed on the country. The Government tell us that it is a farmers' tariff, and that farming implements are put at 20 per cent. Let me read the implements that are 20 per cent: Binders, reapers, ploughs, harrows, cultivators, seed drills, horse rakes. The articles upon which there is 30 per cent duty are: Crowbars, sledges, ropes, picks, sleighs, cutters. There is 25 per cent duty on wagons. There is 35 per cent duty on hay loaders, hay tedders, horse-powers, tread-horse powers, straw cutters, threshing machines, fanning mills, rollers, grain crushers, root cutters, pulpers, scufflers, horse forks, carriages for fork pullies, disc harrows, turnip sowers, hay knives, hay forks and dung forks, democrat wagons, buggies, spades, shovels, axes; and 32½ per cent on saws. So that the articles coming in at 20 per cent are, in reality, a very small portion of the agricultural implements; and yet the Government are attempting to lead the farmers of Canada to believe that agricultural implements are all admitted at 20 per cent. Now, if, as was contended the other night, 14½ per cent, or thereabouts is sufficient protection for the agricultural implements bearing 20 per cent duty, why do the 35 per cent articles require 20 per cent protection? Because the duty on raw materials required in the manufacture of these articles is just as low as the duty on the raw materials used in manufacture of the 20 per cent articles. I would like the Government to explain to me why the manufacturers of such articles cannot do with 14 per cent protection as well as the others? I state positively that not one-third of the agricultural implements used by the farmers are reduced to 20 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Fertilizers, &c., free.

Mr. BORDEN. I would like to ask the Finance Minister with reference to the first item on the top of page 25, whether phosphate rock, imported from Florida for the purpose of manufacturing fertilizers is admitted free. The question has been asked me by a manufacturer in the Maritime Provinces

Mr. FOSTER. It is not included under this.

Mr. BORDEN. Would it be included under "ores."

Mr. FOSTER. I should think it would, but I cannot answer the question definitely. I will make a note of it and find out.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Why not make that clear by adding to "fertilizers," "phosphate rock, to be manufactured into fertilizers." ?

Mr. FOSTER. We can come back to that, if necessary.

Item agreed to.

Salt n.e.s., imported in barrels, bags, or other packages, the bags, barrels, or other packages, to bear the same rate of duty as if imported empty, free.

Mr. FOSTER. Drop that item.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Have you the consent of the Minister of Militia to drop that item on salt ?

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). I will tell the hon. gentleman and his constituents during the next general election.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I guess the omission of the duty had a good deal to do with the chances of the Minister of Militia in the next general election. I do not think he need have gone up to Huron if that item had continued.

Mr. MARTIN. I would ask the Minister of Finance what the duty on salt would be ?

Mr. FOSTER. There is no duty, so far as the items go, but I may put on the notice paper to-night an item with reference to salt. The hon. gentleman will see it in the Votes and Proceedings in the morning.

Mr. GIBSON. I may say that I have had a good deal of correspondence from different sections of the country regarding this matter, and they have no objection to salt being put upon the free list, so long as they get fuel and slack coal to make salt with, free. But if salt is to be free, and a duty still retained upon coal, they think that an injustice would be done to this industry. They are quite willing that a duty should be put upon salt coming into the country, so long as the Minister of Finance will keep the duty upon coal.

Sugar, not above 16 Dutch standard, free.

Mr. FOSTER. I desire to add n.e.s. after sugar.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. Minister has never made it very clear to the House up to the present time what he means by admitting sugars not above 16. There has been a great deal of doubt expressed by the trade and by hon. members as to what really constitutes sugars not above 16, under these specifications. One of the hon. members for Halifax gave a certain definition, and the Minister of Finance did not appear to know whether that definition was to be accepted or not. I want to know what the hon. Minister means by refined sugar and by unrefined sugar, and what particular grades are admitted under the clause as framed.

Mr. FOSTER. There has been no change made in the definition.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What we want to know is what the hon. gentleman considers refined sugar and what unrefined. The addition of n.e.s. may materially affect the clause unless the hon. gentleman is prepared to add some reasonable definition of what constitutes refined and unrefined sugars.

Mr. FOSTER. The words n.e.s. must be inserted, for this reason : that at page 18 it is provided that all sugars above 16 Dutch standard in colour are dutiable, and also all refined sugars of whatever kind.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That is precisely the point on which we want further information. We want to know what constitutes in the hon. gentleman's judgment refined sugar, and in particular, we wish to know whether centrifugal sugars are to be considered refined or not. That subject has been before the House for many weeks, and hon. gentlemen opposite should know what definition they can give.

Mr. WALLACE. Centrifugal sugars are not refined sugars.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That, I suppose, would admit a considerable number of a superior class of West India sugars ?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, that was the purpose.

Item agreed to.

Tea and green coffee imported direct from the country of growth and production.

This item shall include tea and coffee purchased in bond in any country where tea and coffee are subject to customs duty, provided there be satisfactory proof that the tea or coffee so purchased in bond is such as might be entered for home consumption in the country where the same is purchased.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Does the hon. Minister know how that will affect the trade so far as England is concerned ?

Mr. FOSTER. The item is very clear. The object is to make a distinction between the teas that are considered fit for home consumption and which, being of inferior quality, are not allowed to be consumed in a country like Great Britain, and are marked "for export only," and which should be returned to the original country from which they came.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Another country by changing its tariff, even to the extent of one-half cent per pound, might affect this tariff.

Mr. FOSTER. This item will depend on legislation in other countries.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It is the queerest clause ever put into a tariff. What my hon. friend says is perfectly true. Supposing our American friends were to attach an absolutely nominal duty on tea, no matter how insignificant or how slight, it would have an affect on our customs tariff and trade. It seems utterly absurd to have such a provision in the tariff.

Item agreed to.

Wire, iron or steel, Nos. 13 and 14 gauge.

Mr. BERNIER. I desire to draw the attention of the Minister to the item, wire of iron and steel, No. 13 and 14 gauge. Provision is made in regard to wire used by a machine called the wire grip machine. I am informed by the boot and shoe manufacturers that many of them now use a machine called the Champion nailing machine. I ask the Minister to add this machine.

Mr. FOSTER. I will make a note of it, and will come back to it.

Mr. BORDEN. What about phosphate rock?

Mr. FOSTER. I will find out later on.

Mr. BORDEN. When the hon. gentleman admits lava and oces, etc., free, I should think he might very properly admit phosphate rock free, which is used in the manufacture of fertilizers.

Mr. WALLACE. Why, we have plenty of phosphate here.

Mr. BORDEN. That does not make any difference. We in the Maritime Provinces prefer to bring our phosphate rock from Florida, because we can get it there very much cheaper, and bring it by ships at a lower rate than we can from Ontario or Quebec. At any rate we should have the privilege of doing so if we wish. I have already pointed out to the committee that by the changes in this tariff the manufacturers of fertilizers in the Maritime Provinces have been put at a great disadvantage compared with those in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec, because of the keeping up of the duty of sulphuric acid and the lowering of the duty on the manufactured article. I have a letter here from a manufacturer of fertilizers asking me to ascertain what the duty is on phosphate rock, and pointing out that it is their intention, if phosphate rock is admitted free, to bring phosphate rock from Florida to Windsor, N.S., in order to manufacture it into fertilizers. They hope in that way still to be able to continue their business. That is their statement, and I think it is one worthy the consideration of the Administration.

Malt (excise) 1½c. per pound.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What reduction are you making here?

Mr. FOSTER. Half a cent.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What revenue does it involve?

Mr. FOSTER. On last year's, about $230,000.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. So that practically the only important reduction made is on the article of malt, for the benefit of the brewers, I presume.

Mr. FOSTER. Oh, no; that is not the only important one.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Yes, the only important reduction made in the tariff is in favour of cheap beer.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). I can only say, in reply to the hon. gentleman, that the duty of 1½ cents per pound is higher than the duty either in Great Britain or in the United States.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. All the same, it does not affect the fact that the only important reduction of taxation made in the tariff is in favour of cheap beer.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, there is a million and a half of taxation taken off.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Not a bit of it. I doubt if there is $50,000 deducted on all other articles.

Mr. ROOME. I cannot find anywhere in these resolutions any mention of antiseptic surgical dressings, such as absorbent cotton, cotton wool, absorbent lint, absorbent lamb's wool, tow, jute, gauzes, oakum, etc., prepared for use as surgical dressings, plain or medicated. These are very important articles, and it is very difficult for druggists to know under what head they are placed or what duty they bear. I think they should be classified by themselves in a separate list.

Committee rose and reported progress.

REPORT.

Trade and Commerce, for the year ended 30th June, 1893.—(Sir John Thompson.)

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and the House adjourned at 12.15 a.m. (Friday).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, 18th May, 1894.

PRAYERS.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 115) for the preservation of game in the unorganized portions of the North-west Territories of Canada—(from the Senate).—(Mr. Daly.)

Bill (No. 116) further to amend the Indian Act—(from the Senate).—(Mr. Daly.)

THE HARD PAN CASES.

Mr. BAKER moved that all the accounts of expenditure and all other papers connected with the Hard Pan cases ordered by the House to be brought down, be referred to the Select Standing Committee on Public Accounts, in accordance with the recommendation contained in the eighth report of said committee.

Motion agreed to.

UNITS OF ELECTRICAL MEASURE.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville) moved that Bill (No. 117) respecting the Units of Electrical Measure be read the first time. He said: In moving the first reading of this Bill, I desire to say that the measure is one of such a technical nature that I shall not affect a knowledge of its details to any considerable extent. I may say that it is a subject that has received the consideration and the approval of the hon. Secretary of State, who was Minister of the Department of Inland Revenue before my connection with it. Briefly, the intention of the Act is to establish the standards of measurements now in use by the electric companies. The Bill itself in this respect is in line of the legislation that has already taken place in regard to weights and measures and the inspection of gas. It is claimed by the gas companies that there is no argument which makes for the inspection of gas that does not in like measure make for the inspection of their competitors, the electric light companies. It has received the consideration of experts and of the best minds that we could consult with upon the subject, and is considered by the Government a measure desirable in the public interest. I shall say no more about the Bill now, but on the second reading I will be prepared to go into the details, with some assistance.

Mr. GIBSON. I would ask the Controller if it is the intention of the Government to place the inspection of electric lighting under the Gas Inspection Act, with the same inspectors?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). Yes, the same. It is not the intention of the Government to make any new appointments. We have inquired into that matter, and believe that our present gas inspectors and officials can, with some instructions, do the necessary work of inspection.

Motion agreed to.

INSPECTION OF ELECTRIC LIGHT.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville) moved that Bill (No. 118) respecting the Inspection of Electric Light be read the first time. He said: This is a Bill relating to the inspection of electric light plants throughout the country, and has nothing to do with the standards of measurement, a subject dealt with in the preceding Bill just introduced. As explained in introducing that Bill, there appears to be no argument which makes for the inspection of gas companies the competitors of the electric light companies, which does not apply with equal force to the inspection of the electric light systems. Even under the contract system, which prevails at present largely, there is no regulation of these measures. That was the Bill first introduced; now the second Bill relates entirely to the supervision of electric meters.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

ADJOURNMENT—QUEEN'S BIRTHDAY.

Mr. TAYLOR. A number of members purpose leaving for home to-night, and some of them will not return in case it is settled that adjournment takes place from Wednesday until Monday of next week, and I see by the Notice paper that it is the intention of the Government to do this. These hon. gentlemen have requested me to ask the leave of the House to move that motion to-day with the permission of the House, and to have the matter finally settled. Other hon. members who intend going to-night and returning on Monday, would not go until Wednesday if the adjournment is to take place.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am afraid we cannot agree to that, as several hon. gentlemen on this side of the House raise strong objection.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. So far as I can gather the feelings of the members on this side of the House, a great majority are in favour of adjourning over Friday. Having been here for some time, and being likely to remain for some time to come, a great many are anxious to go home, but they do not wish to return for the one day. There seems to be some objection on the part of those who have public Bills in charge, but the great majority of the members express their desire for this adjournment.

Mr. TAYLOR. With the consent of the House the motion might be made now.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I can only move it to-day with the unanimous consent of the House.

Mr. LAURIER. Leave it until Monday.

THE INSURANCE ACT.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved second reading of Bill (No. 111) to amend the Insurance Act. He said: Although the practice is not to send Government Bills to a committee, yet in this case I think it would be expedient that this Bill should go to the Committee on Banking and Commerce, as some of those interested in the business desire to be heard on the provisions of the Bill, and especially so as the Bill has been altered since its introduction in the Senate in a way that might affect their interests somewhat.

Mr. MULLOCK. I suppose it is understood that the Banking and Commerce Committee will be wholly free to deal with the matter and not be trammelled by any of the features of the Bill. Being a Government measure the question is: whether they are bound to adhere to the principles of the Bill, or whether it might be considered an open Bill.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The Government will adhere to it as a Government measure, but they must take their chances in committee, as they desire to take the opinion of the committee upon it.

Mr. MULLOCK. That is what I mean.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE TARIFF—GOVERNMENT BUSINESS.

Mr. FOSTER moved that the House again resolve itself into Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Mr. Speaker, it was on the 27th of March that the Finance Minister first moved that the House should resolve itself into Committee of Ways and Means when he announced his tariff changes. They, of course, became law on that day. We have now reached the 18th day of May, nearly two months after, and we have to-day again a motion made that the House resolve itself into Committee of Ways and Means. I think the House will agree with me that the slow progress that has been made in this measure is one that is deeply to be regretted in the interests of the country, and if we were to seek the causes for it I think members of the House who have watched the proceedings would not differ with me if I should say: it was caused by the unpreparedness of the Ministry to deal with the question. This is the more remarkable as these tariff changes were contemplated a year ago, and that a commission of four members of the Government had the whole of one year to satisfy themselves with reference to what changes were necessary. They took tours through the country (expended public moneys, the amount of which we do not know), accompanied by private secretaries, taking their memoranda. We expected, as was stated last year, that when the House opened this session they would come prepared with a measure that should become law. Well, Sir, what has been the result? Nothing like mature consideration; nothing like definite resolve or purpose on the part of the Government, and I think the House will agree with me that that has been sadly lacking. We find ourselves to-day on the 18th of May, with amendments on the Notice paper, put there by the originator of the tariff himself, asking the House to agree to further changes in this Bill, which he had so much time to consider and prepare. We went into committee on these tariff items on the 13th of April, and, I think, on every Government day since we have spent a portion, if not the whole of the day, upon their consideration, having early adjournments sometimes, and I think the House will agree with me if I say: upon many of these occasions, if not all, the adjournment was not asked for upon the Opposition side of the House, but was suggested by the Minister himself, because at the moment he was not prepared to go any further with his Bill. After we had been in committee seven days, on 20th April one of the Government supporters made what may be almost termed a pathetic appeal to the Opposition to cease discussing the measure, because delay in its passage would be fraught with great injury to the country. I will read an extract from the remarks of the hon. member from South Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale) on that occasion. The hon. gentleman said:

I took up no time in the House in the general tariff discussion, and I want to appeal to these hon. gentlemen opposite as good, sound Canadians—and I believe a good many of them are such—to allow us to get this tariff through, so that the people of this country may know where their business interests stand. We on this side are prepared to take the responsibility of this tariff. We know that if we are wrong the people will condemn us. Load us with the responsibility, if you call it such, and do not keep this House, day after day, and week after week, discussing these matters, with the country all this time in suspense. If the hon. gentlemen will not do this, then I say—and I say it with no desire to gain any political advantage—that they will compel many to form the opinion—which I have not formed yet, but which I must form if they continue their present policy—that they are trying to delay the tariff so as to produce, if possible, disaster and loss to the business men of the community.

That was the position taken by the hon. gentleman in regard to delay in passing these resolutions. Nearly one month subsequently, namely on May 18th, we have a motion made by the Finance Minister to the House to resolve itself into Committee of Ways and Means—for what purpose? Not on account of objections raised by the Opposition. I think the House will see, and the House will agree, that if the member for South Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale) at that time saw cause for alarm when only seven days had elapsed, and when even then he saw that the interests of the country were being jeopardized by delay. I should like to hear from the hon. gentleman to-day as to what he thinks of the present position. A month having gone by, owing to what I claim to be the unpreparedness of the Ministry and their inability to deal with this question, we have as a result the existing dissatisfaction and unrest in unknown quantities in the country. For nearly two months a certain set of regulations with respect to customs duties were the law of the land, and since that date alteration, not in one item, two items, or ten items, but very many alterations, made at every sitting of the committee, have been made, and hon. members can easily understand that there must be thousands, if not tens of thousands of amended entries to be subsequently made. Moreover, goods were imported by merchants on this code of regulations, which was considered to be practically law, the Government having introduced the tariff Bill after taking a year to consider it, and having had Ministers wandering up and down the country, considering they had a reasonable assurance that the basis of the tariff submitted would prove to be the law of the land, but they find in case after case, and these cases continue down to the present sitting of the committee, that the goods will not be passed on what they consider to be the law, but on an entirely different basis. During those two months, as any business man can understand, goods have been handled by merchants and have been placed in warehouse, and their value estimated according to the customs duties as submitted by the Government, and they now find themselves in the position of having to make new entries for goods that have been sold and passed out of their possession, and in some cases they may fail in realizing the fair value of their goods on that account. I trust when the Finance Minister carries this motion to-day, as he will do, and I have no desire to prevent the hon. gentleman from doing so, and the House again resolves itself into Committee of Ways and Means, he will find himself in a position to close up this matter and let the business men of the country know where they stand. I have thought it proper that these remarks should be made, and I have made them so that the country may understand thoroughly where the responsibility for the present position rests. It rests upon the Government, because they were not prepared with their measure, because the Government had not a stable policy, because they did not comprehend the position in which the country occupied, and that the Government have not stood by the resolution they themselves introduced. On May 8th the House adjourned at 11.55, on May 10th at 11.20. Why? The Minister was not ready to proceed. On May 11th the committee rose at six o'clock and the House afterwards went on with some Government Bills, but the Government were not prepared with more, and so the House adjourned at 9.10; and on May 15th the House adjourned at 11.40, Sir John Carling moving the adjournment, no Minister with portfolio being in the House at the time. Yet hon. gentlemen opposite think it necessary, in order to expedite public business, to take one of the few days left for the general business of the House, and they think it necessary to do so in order to get on with the work. That argument will not do. The business of the Government is not in a prepared state, and when we think that the House was summoned two months later than usual, and the probability exists that it will remain in session until the middle of summer, and we still find the Ministry in this unprepared state, it is enough to tax the temper of the House, and the effect of it so far as this measure is concerned on business interests, I am sure every man acquainted with business, understands, will be very serious indeed.

Mr. FOSTER. I did not know what the hon. gentleman proposed to do when he rose, but I know what he has done and done most effectually. I do not wish to bring Scripture parallels into the discussion, but the hon. gentleman very much reminded me of the old scriptural character who was taken to a certain place at a certain time to curse a people, and instead of that he blessed them. The hon. gentleman evidently rose for the purpose of cursing the Government and blessing his own party; but there is no vice versa in this matter, and he ended by cursing his own party most effectually and by blessing the Government. The hon. gentleman undertook to say that we had these tariff changes announced on March 27th. We had. The hon. gentleman then went into a long statement as to the Ministry being unprepared, having had a year to be prepared and having taken excursions throughout the country, their private secretaries with them, to try to find out the state of feeling in the country in regard to the tariff. They did so. It is evident they benefited by that from the fact that the House had been in session not more than ten days before the tariff was presented and the proposals of the Government were brought down. The country knows enough to be aware that that was not delay on the part of the Government.

Mr. LISTER. The country does not now know that tariff.

Mr. FOSTER. On March 27th the Budget propositions were brought down. What was to prevent the House going into a discussion and settlement of the items? Not unpreparedness on the part of the Government; it was because the Opposition proposed to travel over the ground they had traversed half a dozen times every session since I have been in this House, and which they travelled over at no better gait and in no better shape than on all preceding occasions. The discussion was one which struck everybody in this House as being particularly old-fashioned, particularly stale, and not coming down to the live question of the tariff issue raised by the propositions placed before the House by the Government; but going over the old principles and the old methods which have been discussed in this House from year to year for the last five, six or seven years. If that discussion kept the House for a fortnight from going into the consideration of the items, and kept the business of the country perturbed and in a state of uncertainty for that time, it was not the fault of the Government; it was solely the fault of the Opposition. When we entered upon the discussion of these items, as soon as the Opposition would stop talking, and allow the House to get down to business, I make this assertion, that there never was a single day in which the Government were not prepared to go on with the tariff business, and did not go on with it as long as the House was willing to carry on the discussion. There was only one instance in which that was not so. That was the instance when we left off the discussion at six o'clock—not because there were not a very large number of items yet to be discussed and settled, which the Government did not change, and made no proposition to change, and which simply wanted the attention of the House, and the vote of the House if necessary; but because, unfortunately, I was unwell myself, and went home at six o'clock, and other Government business was taken up in the evening. Mind you, there was Government business to be taken up, and it was taken up for that sole reason. The hon. gentleman cited another case which he thought was in point—the case of a night or two ago, when he said Sir John Carling moved the adjournment of the House at 11.40 o'clock, no Minister holding a portfolio being present. That was the night the House engaged in the discussion on the export duty on logs—a discussion which lasted all that evening, and which I had a full knowledge when I left the House at eleven o'clock would take up the remainder of that session and a large part of the next, as it did; and I asked Sir John Carling if he would be kind enough to move the adjournment of the House so that I could go home. Nothing was lost, although we did not sit till three or four o'clock in the morning; and for my part, I do not wish to sit that late. I think that the way we have been doing business this year is the far more sensible way—to sit till ten or eleven o'clock, and then go home and take our rest. Let the hon. gentleman look at the adjournments of the House, and he will find that in all these tariff sessions we have sat, on the average, till about 11.30 o'clock; and the reason we did not go on last night longer than we did was because gentlemen on the Opposition side suggested that we had done enough and had better go home, as my hon. friend who sits opposite me (Sir Richard Cartwright) did. Last night, however, I was prepared to take a dozen more items. If the hon. gentleman expected to make it appear to the country that the Government were to blame for the perturbation of business for two months, he calculated without his host. The people in the country read the papers; the people in the country follow the discussions; and the facts are entirely on behalf of the proposition—and the country knows it—that the Government have been prepared every day to do business, and have gone just as far as the Opposition would allow them to go. Sir, the path of reciprocity was travelled over for days in the fortnight's discussion that took place between the time the Budget proposition was brought down and the time when we were allowed to go into committee; and we had not more than got into committee when, on the very first items, the agricultural class, hon. gentlemen took up the same weary round in the discussion of reciprocity, and kept it up for two days. Now, Sir, I deny the charge—and was surprised that the hon. gentleman had the temerity to make it, in face of the gentlemen who have sat on the two sides of this House ever since this discussion began—that we are not farther ahead because the Government were unprepared to do their work. I challenge him to point out a single instance in which the Government have not been prepared to go on with their work, or any time when there was not work for the House to take up. If hon. gentlemen opposite can point out these instances, let them point them out.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). The notices on the paper to-day.

Mr. FOSTER. The notices on the paper to-day are beside the point entirely, because last night when the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) objected to go any further, there were a dozen items still left which would have provoked discussion, and which the Government were prepared to go on with if the Opposition were. Now, let us be definite; let us stop arguing on generalities, as hon. gentlemen opposite are so fond of doing. Let them show one single case in which the Government were not prepared to go on with business. I grant you, business has been disturbed. Under our form of government, you cannot undertake to revise a tariff without disturbing business. For years, hon. gentlemen have been crying out for a reform and revision of the tariff. They got a reform and a revision of the tariff this year. How can they expect a revision of the tariff to take place without a certain derangement of business? It cannot be done, under our modes of procedure and forms of government. But there has been a minimum of disturbance, and if it has been greater than it needed to have been, that has been because of the long-winded nature of the harangues which the Opposition have given us, and not because we were not prepared to carry on this business.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I do not intend to prolong the discussion at any great length; but I am not disposed to let the hon. gentleman's statement pass unchallenged. The hon. gentleman's knowledge of Scripture is pretty much on a par with the knowledge of himself and his colleagues in the matter of political economy. They have the most ingenious methods of absolutely reversing the exact state of the case, of which we have seen a great number of instances, and never more so than in the remarks the hon. gentleman has just made. Now, I do not at all object to one thing that the hon. gentleman has done; I hold that he is right enough in this, that when we are called upon to discuss the items of the tariff, it is better that we should do it in reasonable hours, and not attempt to force them through in a very thin House at very late hours in the morning. I hold that the hon. gentleman is quite right in asking that these important questions should be considered at a time when we shall have at least a fair number of the people's representatives to consider them. But the hon. gentleman tells us that it has been necessary for us to remain in session two mortal months to consider this tariff, and further, that that has been caused by—what? By the desire of the Opposition to learn what possible reasons the Government had for coming down to us very nearly every second day with a proposition to undo their own work. Surely we had some right to know—although we find it very hard, indeed, to get at the facts—why it was that, after taking a year or thereabouts to consider these propositions, the hon. gentlemen in almost every third or fourth case, after having formally announced them to the House, sprang upon us a complete change. I have, in my time, seen a fair number of tariffs put through, and have watched similar proceedings in other countries having forms of government like ours—I do not know that the United States, for various reasons, affords any fair comparison—and I do not remember a case of a Government bringing down a tariff, supposed to have been carefully considered, and then, as hon. gentlemen have done up to to-day, proposing to alter from sixty or seventy of the items which they had so carefully considered.

Mr. FOSTER.

Mr. FOSTER. Out of how many?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Between sixty and seventy items the hon. gentleman has proposed to alter, according to my calculation, not taking into account some sixteen items, occupying very nearly a page of our Votes and Proceedings, to which now, on the 18th May, he invites our discussion. And I fear the end is not yet. It is simply absurd to tell us that, under such circumstances, anybody is to blame for this delay except the Government, who came down with a tariff so ill-considered that they have been obliged to alter it completely in about seventy-seven different cases. Out of their own mouths, to quote Scripture to the hon. gentleman, they stand condemned. They had no business whatever to come down here with their tariff in such a state. They delayed calling Parliament together until a very late and a very inconvenient period to every member of the House and every business man, and they had still well-nigh a hundred changes to make in their own propositions. The thing is absurd. As regards the revision of the tariff, every change almost which the hon. gentleman had made has been to go back, to wallow in the mire, to return to the evil practices which his calmer and better judgment had amended. There is scarcely one of these changes that is not a departure from the comparative small improvement which the hon. gentleman made, but which was still some improvement on the old system. Not merely has he failed to lop off the mouldering branches, but I do not think he has pruned them in the slightest degree. He has rather, in many cases, increased and augmented their mischievous character. I am willing to give the hon. gentleman credit for some good intentions in coming down with the tariff as originally submitted; but it is perfectly clear to every one who has followed the debates in this House and watched the various deputations trooping from one end of the country to the other, that the business of arranging a bargain and sale has been going on between the hon. gentleman and a number of those protected manufacturers, and that all these subsequent changes are changes, not made in the interests of the people, but for the purpose of obtaining support for the Government, in one shape or another.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I am sure that no one can be in the slightest degree surprised to hear that the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) feels profound distrust in our political economy and in the principles on which the tariff is based. The only uneasiness that we on this side ever experience on that subject, is lest some day the hon. gentleman should feel called on to approve of our policy. We feel perfectly safe in the confidence of the public at large, from one end of the country to the other, while we enjoy the good fortune of having the hon. member for South Oxford disagree with us. But I wish to call attention to what is now shown to be the object of this demonstration to-day. The Opposition have been under the stress of public opinion and public censure for the way they have obstructed the business of this House from the first day of the session, and the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Paterson), being one of the most sensitive members on that side, found that, for the sake of his party and his own credit, it would be necessary to resort to some expedient in order to divert, if possible, public censure from his own party to members on this side, even though he had not the slightest justification in so attempting. The hon. member cited the sittings of this House on several days and gave the hours of adjournment. Members who have watched the discussion in the Committee of Ways and Means know that never once did the committee rise and report progress, until repeatedly urged to do so by hon. gentlemen opposite, whose long-winded and oft-repeated stories had given out, and who wanted the night to prepare to reel them out again the next day. There was but one day when the Committee of Ways and Means rose at six o'clock, and that was in consequence of the state of health of the Finance Minister, who, in addition to the labours, the unprecedented labours, cast upon him for the past twelve months, had sat for three hours that afternoon, leading the Committee of Ways and Means in a discussion which filled thirty columns of 'Hansard' before the committee rose. Yet, forsooth, the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Paterson) states as a grievance that the House adjourned at ten minutes past nine that evening. Was the tariff delayed? It had been under consideration for three hours before six o'clock, and if the hon. gentleman will take the trouble to look at the record, which, unfortunately for himself, he cited in support of the singular demonstration to-day, he will find that, in addition to the private Bills which passed that evening after recess, no less than five Government Bills had passed when the House adjourned at ten minutes past nine. And yet the hon. gentleman undertakes to make the plea that we adjourned at that hour because even the public Bills were not ready which were in the hands of the Government. He will have to contradict a great deal of cold print before he will discover anybody in the country who has been convinced, by the sham fight of this afternoon, that the blame for any delay which has taken place is on the Government side. The hon. gentleman indicated that he would have great pleasure in hearing what the hon. member for South Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale) thought on this question, because that hon. gentleman had appealed to the Opposition to expedite business. What he did was to protest against the utter waste of time by the Opposition in keeping up a debate for three weeks before going into committee. The hon. member for Brant (Mr. Paterson) undertakes to make the public believe, in spite again of what really did occur and what appeared in print, that the remarks of the hon. member for South Norfolk had reference to the conduct of the Government in putting through the items in committee, whereas what the hon. gentleman desired, and what he expressed, was that the Opposition should withhold from further continuance of the fifty-times-repeated advocacy of unrestricted reciprocity and commercial union, and allow the House to get into Committee. With the facts, as they are upon record, I beg to repeat, so that there shall be no misapprehension, that every day the Government have been prepared, and the Finance Minister has been prepared, in spite of the state of his health, with more items ready for the consideration of the committee than the committee has been prepared to deal with in the course of each day's session. Under these circumstances, I must also call attention to this fact: that the records of Parliament will be searched in vain, back to the first day of the first session, and the parliamentary history of the province of Canada will be searched in vain, to find a session in which the Government business was so rapidly brought forward and in such a prepared state when the House opened. In the face of that, to have this accusation made, in the tones in which it was made this afternoon, leads one to believe that the Opposition, in view of the course it has taken in the discussion of the tariff, feels under the necessity of misleading public opinion as to the events proceeding in this House from day to day.

Mr. LAURIER. Both the hon. gentlemen who have spoken on that side have endeavoured to mislead the House as regards the position stated by the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Paterson). The question is not at all whether the House sat at undue hours or adjourned at too early hours, but the accusation is that when the Government called Parliament together, and for weeks afterwards—even after he had brought down his Budget speech—the Finance Minister did not know his own policy. It is true that two weeks after Parliament met the House was moved into Committee of Ways and Means, but will the hon. gentleman pretend, in the face of the records, that the Finance Minister had made up his mind as to his policy at that time. A certain policy was announced on the paper, but what is the policy we have at this moment? The hon. gentleman knew his own mind so little then, that up to this day we have had notice from him of sixty items in his original proposition, to be amended. Day after day, week after week, the hon. gentleman undid his own work. He proposed to furnish us with a revision of the tariff. The proposition was, forsooth, that taxation had been too high, that at last the Government were going to go back upon their record and give the people some relief from taxation. No doubt that was the intention at the moment, but for reasons upon the consideration of which I shall not now enter; the hon. gentleman went back on his own record, and reimposed almost every high duty which he had proposed to cut down. This is what we complain of; this is the charge made against hon. gentlemen by my hon. friend from Brant (Mr. Paterson). The business of the country has been impaired because of this uncertainty; the operations of business men have been interfered with because they do not know where they stand. What is the tariff to-day? What will it be to-morrow? These are the questions that people are asking, and they are given no satisfaction. The ground is well taken that the business of the country would be in a better state to-day and business men would be better satisfied if they knew that the changes brought before the House would become law. But they have not this satisfaction and business is disturbed everywhere throughout the country because business men do not know but that duties so often changed may be changed again. Now the hon. gentleman says that we obstructed the progress of public business, because for two weeks we debated the general principle of the measure. Was the discussion all on one side? Is it not true that for every man who spoke on this side a man spoke on the other side, that the question was debated just as much on that side as on this? And the hon. gentleman tells us that four or five times we discussed the question of reciprocity. Is it not true that for every assertion on this side a contrary assertion was made by hon. gentlemen opposite? As I said, we do not complain of undue hours of sitting. I think the hon. gentleman's practice in that respect is commendable, for the House should not be asked to sit beyond a certain hour. But what I complain of, and what we must hold the hon. gentleman responsible for, and what the country will hold him responsible for, is that he does not at this moment know what his own tariff will be, and that we have no assurance that amendments already made will not be again amended. That is the charge made by my hon. friend from Brant, and that is the charge upon which the country will hold him accountable.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Mr. Speaker, there is a comical aspect to this discussion. At first one was filled with wonder at the object of the hon. gentleman from Brant (Mr. Paterson), but I think his object is disclosed, and that it shows that this is an hour of repentance for hon. gentlemen opposite. When we began this session some time ago, we found the most determined spirit of obstruction that, at least, I have ever seen on the part of an Opposition in this House since 1882. I am in the judgment of the House when I say that gentlemen opposite began the session in a determined and defiant attitude, which signified that they would prevent or postpone the very introduction of the tariff Bill. In the debate on the Address they surprised the country by singling out one particular topic, the Behring Sea arbitration, displaying an extent of ignorance upon the question that must have astonished the people from one end of the Dominion to the other. They misrepresented all the facts connected with the case—

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. But you did not dare to answer.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentleman says we did not dare to answer. Sir, we had too much respect for the intelligence of the people of Canada to take the time necessary for an answer, and, besides, we were most anxious to get to this tariff, and we were willing to sit silent and allow those speeches to go to the country for what they were worth, after the answer the Prime Minister had given very early in the debate, because, as every man in the House could see, we wanted to push on with this business question. Why, it was discussed among the members of the House, it was common talk in the country, every one could see the transparent game being played. The Opposition, whether it was anxious that the business of this country should be plunged into a most unhappy condition, or however they choose to explain it, determined to follow up this policy of obstruction which had already been adopted. The Finance Minister pressed hard time and time again to reach this order which the hon. gentlemen now say should have been hurried forward. But the Order paper was filled in the most rapid manner in the history of Parliament with all kinds of motions, senseless and otherwise; ridiculous questions were put here day after day; papers were ransacked to find subjects for questions and motions, which, when reached were found to have nothing in them. All these fireworks were displayed by the Opposition and the Government had to plod steadily on and force the position in order to get the attention of Parliament directed to the main object of this session. Contrast the position of the Government to-day with the position of the Government of gentlemen opposite in 1874. Search the records and you will see that these gentlemen came down in fear and trembling and laid upon the Table of the House their tariff proposition. Did they go on with it? Did they think the business of the country demanded instant and immediate attention to the question? For two weeks, if my memory serves me right, they dangled this policy before the House and the country, and then withdrew it and changed it in most important items. The position which they say the Government of the day should take is not a position which commends itself to the minds of business men—that of coming down with a hard and fast statement of details of the whole tariff and sticking to them right or wrong, forcing them through at the point of the bayonet or by virtue of the majority which hon. gentlemen say we possess, turning a deaf ear to the representations of the business men, sending them to the father of evil as this Finance Minister of long ago would have done had he control and responsibility in this matter. When a delegation of business men visits the capital and asks to be received by the Government, notwithstanding the great difficulties of the position of the Finance Minister on an occasion like this, it is received. No delegation that has visited this city can say that it received other treatment than courtesy and a respectful hearing by the Government, and the Government is not ashamed to say that from many of the deputations they learned much that was of advantage to the interests of the country and they were not too proud to put into the tariff such corrections as seemed to be justified by any new light that was thrown upon the question at any time. And I believe that the Government in taking that position have commended themselves to the business men of this country and have obtained even more of the confidence of the people than would otherwise have been possible in regard to the manner in which they dealt with these important, varied, and often complicated questions. And, Sir, I hope the day will never come when the Finance Minister of this Government or his successors will assume the attitude of the Finance Minister when gentlemen opposite were in power—that he already knows enough, that he can learn enough within his sanctum from works on political economy to propound a fiscal policy which must be enacted, regardless of all protests and representations. This Government does not desire to go on, Mr. Speaker. What were we discussing five minutes before this debate was forced upon us? We have been trying to obtain the consent of the Opposition to give us an extra day for Government business. We were discussing whether hon. gentlemen opposite were sufficiently anxious to expedite this one great question now before the House and the country as to give us another day. How was that proposition received? Has there been any disposition to give up private business so that the member for Brant may have an opportunity to rest easy and see this tariff moving on to a conclusion? I say we have witnessed other scenes besides obstruction. When the tariff was under discussion we saw most extraordinary developments on the other side of the House. The leader of the Opposition said we did not know our policy when Parliament met. We did know our policy, we knew the principle upon which we are standing in this House and in this country to-day, the principle from which we have never flinched, the principle of protection. Do those hon. gentlemen know their policy? Have those hon. gentlemen ever been willing to give us even a skeleton of their policy that it might be dissected here and elsewhere? Did not those hon. gentlemen after talking theoretical free trade for a week, let out the secret the other day that in the matter of agricultural implements they were protectionists, and higher protectionists than we are? There have been many things we did not know at the beginning of the session, but we did know the policy of this Government. But in view of the details and the many conflicting questions connected with the various items, no one supposes, no business man in this country ever supposed, that you could introduce a tariff composed of five or six hundred items, and arrange the percentages and the various kinds of duty without making some changes. Take the question of oil. Did we obtain much assistance from hon. gentlemen opposite? Why, we witnessed an open disagreement between two members of the Opposition, and one who has taken up an immense amount of time, the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey) was told by the hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Lister) that he did not understand the subject he was discussing. And it is from critics of that character that we learn to-day that we are guilty of delaying the business, and of failing to make that progress with the tariff we should have made. The hon. gentleman complains that we have made a great many changes. Well, as long as they were necessary, and as long as we stand to the principle upon which our tariff is based, there should be no objection to that. But it is a significant fact, and all the more significant because it is a fact that upsets the whole of their grievance to-day, that there never has been in the history of this country, if my memory or information serves me right, a tariff propounded and in which there were so few changes in proportion as there are in this case.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Hear, hear.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Is he able to contradict that statement?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Certainly, at all points.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Is he able to point out a tariff in which there were fewer changes made, in proportion, than have been made in the present tariff since it was brought down?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. There never was a case in which so many changes were made.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentleman, like his party, deals in generalities, toothless and ineffectual generalities. I have given the opportunity, and he contradicts me in general and in the rough, as he always contradicts any person. But he cannot point out an instance—and I will give him to the end of this debate to look one up—in which so few changes have been made as have been made in the tariff now under consideration.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. There is not a single case in which you can show so many changes.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Exactly, he answers my challenge with another. Perhaps this is the opportunity for me to sit down and allow the hon. gentleman to obtain that information, or some other hon. gentleman to do it for him.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). My hon. friend, the Minister of Marine and Fisheries has addressed the House in a very excited state. It is obvious that he feels that he has a very weak case, and that he must make up in energy and in noise what he fails to supply in argument. Now, the hon. gentleman overlooked this important fact, that we have been considering the tariff on almost every Government day for several weeks, and I do not know a single occasion when the Minister of Finance did not ask that certain items should stand over. Stand over for what purpose? Why, in order to give the Government an opportunity to consider those matters, to discuss them with those parties who were discontented, before determining the precise rate of duty that the Government would propose in regard to those matters. Now, granting that everything is true that hon. gentlemen have said, let us suppose for a moment that the Opposition did what the First Minister says they did—but the First Minister, in that particular, has been depending on imagination and not upon facts as they occurred in the House—let us suppose for a moment that the First Minister was correct in that view, what use would the Government have made of the time if the Opposition had remained silent? Why, the Government were not ready to go on. Last night they were not ready to go on with certain items; I do not know that the Finance Minister is prepared to-day to say ultimately what the rate of taxation shall be on certain imported articles. That being so, is it not clear that up to this moment, at all events, the Government have delayed the consideration of the tariff? The Minister of Marine and Fisheries has informed the House that there were a far greater number of changes in former tariffs than there have been in this one. I deny that statement. The hon. gentleman, before he made that statement, ought to have been able to give to the House the particular tariff, and the number of changes that were made in it, in order to show that his statement in that respect was accurate.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I said the percentage of changes.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Well, I say that the percentage of changes in this tariff is greater than in any other tariff that has been proposed before. The Government announced last session that they proposed to deal with this subject of the tariff, they proposed visiting various parts of the country in order to make inquiries and ascertain from the people what the rate of taxation should be on certain articles. They did what they said they were going to do in that respect; they visited various portions of the country, they entered into communication with the people, they obtained what information they could in that way and they delayed calling Parliament together until nearly two months after the ordinary period at which Parliament should have met. One would suppose that they would have employed those two months for the purpose of perfecting a tariff, based upon the information which they had obtained. Then a fortnight after Parliament was called together the Finance Minister made his Budget speech and stated the general policy of the Government, and submitted the specific tariff which he had matured after these interviews, after this consideration, after the long period allowed him for the purpose of deliberation. That tariff was submitted to us, and we have been considering it ever since. Why have we discussed this matter so much in committee? Why, Mr. Speaker, we have discussed the subject in committee in consequence of the departures which the hon. gentleman has made from the tariff which he submitted to us at first. The Minister of Finance complained that we discussed general principles. Why, Sir, what did the Finance Minister do in his Budget speech? What was the whole character in that Budget speech? I have pointed out before in this House, and I repeat it again now, that the hon. gentleman will look in vain in the Budget speeches made for the past century in the United Kingdom, for one such as he delivered to the House. It was the business of the hon. gentleman to have told the House, in making his Budget speech, not merely the mode of taxation which he intended to adopt, but what revenue he expected to derive from each tax which he imposed, and what he expected would be the gains or losses in consequence of the changes which he made. Well, Sir, down to this hour the information which every Minister of Finance, every Chancellor of the Exchequer, feels it his duty to give to the House of Commons in England the hon. gentleman has not given to the House. Then let us look at the changes which the hon. gentleman has made since the tariff has been before us. The hon. gentleman has proposed specific duties in place of the ad valorem duties which he at first proposed. The hon. gentleman has proposed an increase in taxation on a large number of articles. I suppose out of seventy odd articles—

Mr. HAGGART. Not one.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman has proposed an increase of taxation in at least sixty of those seventy odd articles.

Mr. FOSTER. Not one.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). In those changes which he has made, I say he has proposed an increase in the rate of taxation, and he has proposed the substitution of specific duties for ad valorem duties. Well, Sir, the hon. gentleman did not deign to tell this House what was his object in making those changes, why he had changed his mind, what reason he had for submitting certain propositions in the first instance. We were entitled to that information. The hon. gentleman did not tell the committee what advantage he expected to derive from those changes, or what loss of revenue would be sustained, and a large portion of the time taken in discussion in committee has been occupied in endeavouring to obtain from the hon. gentleman that information which he ought to have given spontaneously. I say, then, that the hon. gentleman has himself wasted the time of the committee.

Mr. FOSTER. Wasted what?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The time of the committee.

Mr. FOSTER. You can say anything after that.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I say it. I have noticed half a dozen question put on various matters which the hon. gentleman should have answered and given information concerning spontaneously, but all that was done was to declare the item carried. That is the extent of the information given in many instances.

Mr. FOSTER. I could not foresee anything but sensible questions.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Is it not a sensible question to ask why the hon. gentleman proposed a change? Is it not a sensible question to ask why the hon. gentleman, after having substituted ad valorem for specific, returns to specific again? Is it not a sensible question to ask why the hon. gentleman proposed in some instances to increase the tariff, when he had previously proposed a reduction?

Mr. FOSTER. You have always got your answer.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Yes; after an hour bandying with the hon. gentleman an answer would be obtained sometimes, and sometimes no answer at all. In regard to all these matters it was the duty of the hon. Minister to have informed himself, he should have come down to the committee and stated what his views were on those items, and have clearly explained to the committee the reason why he proposed a change. But the hon. gentleman was in the hands of masters who were outside of Parliament. The hon. gentleman, after having made up his mind and submitted his proposition was compelled to change that proposal. He was told that it would not suffice, that more taxes were required, that that mode of imposing taxes would not be advantageous to the manufacturers, and so the hon. gentleman came down to the committee and asked to have them give their consent to certain changes in some instances, perhaps not knowing what would be the effect of those changes, but having resolved to make them sooner than battle with his friends, and so we were delayed in consequence of want of information or reluctance to give information on the part of the hon. Minister. But again I say this: that the hon. gentleman has not been prepared to take the House out of committee, and so far as I know he may not be prepared to do so at the end of to-day. That being the case, the delay up to this moment, whether we were speaking on an item or whether we were silent, was the delay of the Finance Minister, because he was not prepared to state what rate of taxation should be adopted on the various items of the tariff.

Motion agreed to; and House again resolved itself into Committee on Ways and Means.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. FOSTER. I desire to take up the leather duties. Under the old tariff leather and skins, not otherwise provided for, were 20 per cent.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. By the old tariff you mean the tariff two months old.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes. Sole leather was $\frac{1}{2}$ cent a pound and 15 per cent. Upper leathers, 20 per cent; dongola, 20 per cent; cordovan, 25 per cent, and kid 20 per cent. The proposition, as it was placed at first before the committee, was to place all of these at 15 per cent. It was ascertained, however, on looking more thoroughly into the question, and taking into account the very strong competition from the United States, that with regard to black leathers, in respect of which I made the amendment, the cut from 20 per cent to 15 per cent would be too heavy, and subject the manufacturers to a competition which, at the present time especially, would be greater than they could well bear. Therefore, what we propose at present is to place these leathers at $17\frac{1}{2}$ per cent, which will be a reduction of $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent from the old tariff, and certainly levies a very moderate duty. I think this is nothing more than just to the manufacturers of these leathers, which are largely made in this country, and I can speak of one, of the dongola leather, which is being very extensively made now, and of very excellent quality. The belting and sole leather remains as proposed, at 15 per cent.

Mr. MULOCK. When we had the subject of leathers up some time ago I asked the Finance Minister if he would allow the item to stand for a short time, while I read some correspondence on the subject. I have since read it, and it deals with the subject of sole leather, and my correspondent, I may say, is not a manufacturer, but, I fancy, a dealer in sole leather. He points out that hemlock tanned sole leather is the leather from which principally are manufactured the boots and shoes of the poorer classes. I would ask the Minister if he has fully considered that this tariff of 15 per cent is a burden upon the poorer classes, and I wish to know if he is prepared to make any reduction?

Mr. FOSTER. I have considered that aspect of the case, and in reducing the duty from what it was in the old tariff, I have to that extent given relief, if a diminution of duty would give any relief in a matter like sole leather, to the consumers of that article in this country. The tanners of this country makes that leather and the consumption is almost entirely native production. The oak sole leather is brought in from abroad, and that of course will pay a duty, but, as my hon. friend says, that goes into the finer kind of shoe. I am certain no one can quarrel with a protection of 15 per cent on sole leather. It is a reduction of from 17½ per cent on the average value, to 15 per cent, and it makes it no longer a protective, but simply a revenue tariff.

Mr. MULOCK. My correspondent calls my attention to the fact that we have become large manufacturers of sole leather for export, and that our sole leather finds its way to the markets of the world in competition with leather made under more favourable circumstances perhaps, and that the time has arrived, in his judgment, when it is no longer necessary to protect the Canadian manufacturer. According to the Trade and Navigation Returns, we exported for the fiscal year, $865,000 worth of sole and upper leather. The two classes are not divided in the returns, and therefore one cannot satisfactorily argue the question as to sole leather. But it would appear that when we can export nearly $1,000,000 worth of leather to compete with the manufacturers of free trade countries and the manufacturers of the United States, that the Canadian manufacturers hardly need such protection.

Mr. FOSTER. And they are not getting a large protection.

Mr. MULOCK. As the item is passed, and as I am only perhaps speaking out of courtesy, I won't press it any further. I suppose the Minister has made up his mind on the subject.

Mr. FOSTER.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not think we will make any change.

Mr. MULOCK. Does the Minister think that the 15 per cent duty adds to the cost of shoes?

Mr. FOSTER. I do not think so. Boot and shoe men have the 25 per cent protection, and on your own theory it is that which would put up the cost.

Mr. MULOCK. My correspondent tells me that there is a very effective combination in Canada between the manufacturers of sole leather.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not think there is what you could call a combination amongst them.

Mr. MULOCK. I presume what is meant is: an arrangement by which prices are maintained. Has the Minister informed himself on that point?

Mr. FOSTER. That question was brought to my attention, and I found nothing that you could call a combine in the leather business.

Mr. MULOCK. Was there any understanding among them as to limiting the production or the price?

Mr. FOSTER. They sometimes limit production in order not to overstock the market.

Mr. MULOCK. You found no combination as to maintaining prices at minimum figures?

Mr. FOSTER. No.

Item agreed to.

Plumbago, 10 per cent ad valorem.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the object of that tax at all?

Mr. FOSTER. We have always had a tax upon it of 15 per cent, and the proposal is to make it 10 per cent. We have large deposits of it which are now being developed, and it is in a better position than ever it has been before for output and refining. A large plant worth $250,000 has been put in which is most complete in every respect, and they are prepared to turn out a large quantity of the refined plumbago every day.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What plumbago did we import?

Mr. FOSTER. Three thousand two hundred and ninety-one dollars worth.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I do not suppose it matters much one way or the other, but it is because we have such large deposits that it is an absurdity to tax it.

Mr. BORDEN. This is an appropriate time to repeat the question I asked last night as to the duty on phosphate rock. The hon. gentleman promised to inquire.

Mr. WALLACE. That would come in free of duty as a fertilizer. All fertilizers in the crudest state are free, and that is a fertilizer in the crudest state.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Has the hon. gentleman had a legal opinion on that point, or is he making the law?

Mr. WALLACE. We are carrying out the law.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Reading that article respecting fertilizers, I doubt whether it would bear that construction.

Mr. FOSTER. It has been coming in free all the time under the old tariff.

Mr. BORDEN. Does the hon. gentleman say that it will be admitted free now?

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. colleague said so.

Item agreed to.

Lumber or timber manufactured, n.e.s., 20 per cent.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the exact effect of that change?

Mr. FOSTER. What we did last night was to make certain lines of timber and lumber free. To sawed lumber and the like of that we added lumber undressed or dressed on one side only; and this item will include all lumber and timber not enumerated in the free list, and further manufactured than dressed on one side. I want also to call the attention of the House to the fact, which they may not have noticed, that lumber and timber further manufactured than rough sawn or hewn was before 25 per cent, and, besides putting a part of that on the free list, we have reduced the rest to 20 per cent.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Good, as far as it goes. It depends upon how far that will be modified by customs regulations affecting the valuations.

Item agreed to.

Shingles, 20 per cent.

Mr. FOSTER. These were 20 per cent before; but I intend to put them with wood pulp into a reciprocal clause, providing that they shall be made free in Canada when they are made free in the United States. As I explained to the House with reference to shingles, we shall have reciprocity in that if the Bill as proposed at Washington passes, because it places that article on the free list.

Item agreed to.

Blasting and mining powder, 2 cents per pound.

Mr. FOSTER. In the old tariff blasting and mining powder was 3 cents per pound, canister powder, 15 cents per pound, cannon and musket, 4 cents per pound; giant powder, 5 cents per pound and 20 per cent; gunpowder, 5 cents per pound, and nitro-glycerine, 10 cents per pound and 20 per cent. Instead of all these we propose to have three items. Blasting and mining powder is reduced from 3 cents to 2 cents per pound.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the supposed value of blasting and mining powder?

Mr. FOSTER. From 6 cents to 8 cents per pound. I suppose the average value is about 7 cents.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. So that the duty would amount to about 30 per cent.

Mr. EDGAR. Is that the Hamilton factory?

Mr. FOSTER. There are two factories, the Hamilton Powder Company and the Acadia Powder Company.

Mr. EDGAR. What is the factory in Hull?

Mr. FOSTER. That is for nitro-glycerine explosives.

Mr. MULOCK. What is the raw material for the makers of blasting and mining powder?

Mr. FOSTER. With the exception of sulphuric acid and glycerine, their raw material is free. They make the powder and explosives out of saltpetre, sulphur, charcoal, glycerine and sulphuric acid.

Mr. MULOCK. What amount of protection is on the raw materials?

Mr. FOSTER. Not a great deal. Most of them are free.

Mr. MULOCK. So that they have nearly 30 per cent clean protection.

Mr. FOSTER. They have 25 per cent clean protection.

Item agreed to.

Cannon, musket, rifle, gun and sporting powder and canister powder, 3 cents per pound.

Mr. FOSTER. In the old tariff the duty on canister powder was 15 cents per pound and on gun and sporting powder 5 cents per pound. These are reduced to 3 cents.

Item agreed to.

Nitro-glycerine, giant powder and other explosives, 4 cents per pound.

Mr. CASEY. What are they supposed to be worth a pound?

Mr. FOSTER. The former duty was 10 cents a pound and 20 per cent. Their value is according to the percentage of nitro-glycerine they contain. Pure nitro-glycerine is worth about 30 cents a pound. A good explosive contains about 40 per cent of nitro-glycerine.

Item agreed to.

Salt in bags, barrels salt fine, in bulk, and coarse salt, n.e.s., 5 cents per 100 pounds.

Mr. FOSTER. That was proposed to be put on the free list.

Mr. CASEY. What was the reason for putting it back?

Mr. FOSTER. After further consideration, it was thought better to put it back at the old duty, which was very small. The salt manufacturers from western Ontario have suffered competition from the Michigan salt works, which have large deposits, and use the slabs and refuse of their mills for fuel, and enjoy extremely low freights in the distribution of their products. The protection is very small, 5 cents per 100 pounds, or $7\frac{1}{2}$ cents in packages.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. If the hon. gentleman would only give these people who manufacture salt, their coal and their raw materials and the tools they use free, he could keep the item as it is.

Mr. FOSTER. Does the hon. gentleman know what difference free fuel would make?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. But he will not do this, and therefore the farmers who use the salt have to pay. There is no doubt that the salt manufacturers were being treated with injustice. It is in no respect a contradiction to the principles of free trade to lay down the proposition which I have laid down with respect to other industries, that when you are taxing a man's raw material or tools, you undoubtedly ought either to leave the tax on his products as it was or give him free raw materials. The proper way is to give free raw material.

Mr. FOSTER. If the hon. gentleman would gather the salt manufacturers together and talk to them on the line of that proposition he would get a little more light.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I have conversed with them.

Mr. CASEY. The hon. gentleman no doubt has seen the salt manufacturers. Will he please give us some information concerning his interviews?

Mr. FOSTER. I have not seen one of them.

Mr. CASEY. Or heard from them.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, I have heard from them.

Mr. CASEY. If the hon. gentleman has obtained information in any way from salt manufacturers he ought to lay it before the House. I have always understood that free fuel would about make as much difference to the salt manufacturers as this tax. They would be about as well off with free fuel, leaving salt free, as with 5 per cent per 100 pounds duty and coal not free.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman needs some light.

Mr. CASEY. Give us the light.

Mr. FOSTER. I gave it by saying that such is not the case.

Mr. CASEY. That is not giving us light. It is the hon. gentleman's simple statement. Was he so informed by the salt manufacturers and did they submit figures?

Mr. CASEY.

Mr. FOSTER. Perfectly. Does the hon. gentleman know how much they pay for the coal they use in the refining of salt.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. But there are other things that go into the manufacture of salt.

Mr. CASEY. The duty on coal does not depend upon what they pay, for it is a duty per ton.

Mr. FOSTER. On coal dust it is a percentage duty.

Mr. MULOCK. My impression was that the old duty on salt was 10 per cent per barrel of 280 pounds.

Mr. FOSTER. No. This is the old duty exactly. A change was made two years ago, by which one-half the protection was taken off, at the time of the salt combine, and this is the reduced duty.

Item agreed to.

Salt in bags, barrels, or other packages, the bags, barrels or packages to bear the same duty as if imported empty, $7\frac{1}{2}$ cents per 100 pounds.

Mr. BOWERS. Why make the tax higher on bags than on salt in bulk? A great deal of salt comes from the English market, and is sold in the Maritime Provinces for use of the farmers.

Mr. FOSTER. The fishermen get their salt free of duty.

Item agreed to.

Manufactures composed wholly or in part of wool, worsted, the hair of the alpaca goat or other like animal, viz.: blankets and flannels of every description, cloths, doeskins, cassimeres, tweeds, coatings, overcoatings, and felt cloth, n.e.s., 5 cents per pound and 25 per cent ad valorem.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That is to say, the hon. gentleman has gone back on the declaration he made in favour of ad valorem duties on textiles, and is going to tax the cheaper kind of goods very much more than the more expensive kind.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman may put it in that light, but if he will notice what I said at the time I brought down the proposition, he will see that I said I found very great difficulty in coming to a decision as to the duties to be put on manufactures of wool. There is such a diversity in fabrics made from wool that it is impossible to find any one rate of duty which will equally protect all. Two things had to be observed: first, not to give a larger protection than was reasonable upon the better class of goods, and yet to give a large enough protection to keep within the country the very widely distributed and varied manufactures of coarse wool. I came to the conclusion, after having very thoroughly gone into the subject with the representatives of this woollen industry, that, on account of the extreme cheapness with which these coarse or shoddy goods, which purport to be woollen, but are partly or wholly shoddy, can be made in Great Britain or other countries, that it required an extremely high rate of protection to keep them out. You remember that the old tariff imposed upon some of these goods, duties equivalent to an ad valorem rate of 50, 60, or 70 per cent. In the conferences that we had and in the investigations that took place, I understood from the manufacturers of the coarser woollens, and the manufacturers of the shoddy goods, that no protection less than that which had been given before would be efficacious in enabling them to keep their business. On that point, we had to part company. I told them that I could not bring down to the House a duty so large as that which had been imposed, that if, after thinking it over, they came to the conclusion that nothing less than that would do them, all I could do would be to put on what seemed, under all the circumstances, a reasonable protection to the better goods, and let them take the chances. With that view, we brought down the 30 per cent rate, knowing full well that it would inevitably cut out a large proportion of the coarse woollen industries, particularly the smaller ones. However, after the promulgation of that proposition, other conferences took place, other investigations were made, and the people who are engaged in this industry gave still closer attention to this matter, and, as a result, it was represented to the Government that with the duty as it is proposed here, the larger part of the woollen industry of the country could be conserved, and, at the same time, the inordinately high protection could be avoided. This duty of 5 cents a pound and 25 per cent ad valorem, while it does not raise the duty upon what you may call a fair class of woollen goods, while it lowers the protection to a certain extent, upon the higher class, yet gives to the coarser wool products of the small mills a specific and ad valorem duty combined which will have the effect, as they tell me, of keeping the larger part of their business, although necessitating very careful management on their part. Now, what we had to look at was this: This woollen industry is different from almost every other industry in Canada; it is one of the largest industries in the country and one of the most widely distributed. Small woollen mills are found in almost every part of the country—

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). And have been for years.

Mr. FOSTER. And have been for years. They buy the wool direct from the farmer, and, in many cases, sell him the manufactured goods in return, a practice which has, to a large extent supplanted the old practice of carding the wool and making garments at home. These mills, in their several localities give employment to the people, keep up business and are in close touch with the farming community, to whom they are of a great benefit in the way of affording a market for the products of the farm. The employment given in the smaller coarse woollen industries and in the larger fine woollen industries may be given as a proportion of about two to one, that is two are employed in the coarser small mills, taking them in the aggregate, to one employed in the larger mills. All these considerations had weight, and the Government has come to the conclusion that, though in respect of uniformity it is not so good a duty as that which he had arranged on cottons and woollens all through, although it subjects us to the charge by gentlemen opposite that we are putting on double duties, mixed ad valorem and specific, still the good to be obtained is more than commensurate, for the industries will be, in the main, retained and the employment given. And, whatever hon. gentlemen opposite may say with regard to combines in other trades, no man can successfully maintain—and I do not think that any man pretends—that there is any such thing as combine amongst the woollen mills. Such a thing is practically and actually impossible. These industries are very strong competitors amongst themselves, and the prices of woollen fabrics have been kept very low and have been cut down in larger proportion even, than those of the foreign manufactories, with the exception, maybe, of those of one or two countries. At the same time, the industry has been kept up, the people have had the benefit of cheapened goods and, what is still more important, they have got a better class of goods. Under the old duties, the coarse woollens were not all kept out, I suppose it is impossible to impose any duty which will keep them out—only prohibition would do that. That shoddy will come into this country. But this duty keeps out the major part of it, and gives to the wearer in this country the advantage of first-class woollen goods. And, where they make shoddy, a stronger and better and purer shoddy—I will not say purer shoddy—

Mr. CASEY. What is pure shoddy?

Mr. FOSTER. I will take that back, because my hon. friend would interpret it to mean shoddy that is all shoddy. What I speak of is a mixture of wool and shoddy.

Mr. CASEY. A sort of mixed specific and ad valorem.

Mr. FOSTER. If you examine samples of shoddies which are brought in from Britain and those made in this country, it requires but a casual observation to inform one that even in shoddy goods we have the strength and fibre in much greater degree than when the goods were imported. Now, I do not want to make a long story of this. I have stated simply the ground upon which the Government has gone, and we think we are justified on business grounds in making this change in order to conserve a very large, a very widely distributed and a most important industry in this country.

Mr. MACLEAN (York). Mr. Chairman, I desire again to congratulate the Government on their return to specific duties. As a protectionist, I have to repeat that specific duties involve a sound principle. Hon. gentlemen in this House have been ridiculing and deriding specific duties. On what ground do they base this ridicule? Specific duties are the rule, the world over. I have here a table showing the facts with reference to the various tariffs of the world: England imposes duties upon thirty-eight articles; France imposes duties upon 619 articles; Austria imposes duties upon 357 articles; Russia imposes duties upon 440 articles; Sweden imposes duties on more than 300 articles; Denmark imposes duties on 63 articles. All these duties are specific. Are hon. gentlemen aware of that fact?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Perfectly—and the reason for it.

Mr. MACLEAN (York). Germany's tariff makes 434 articles dutiable, and imposes specific duties on all but two. Italy's tariff covers 837 articles, and on all but one the duties are specific. Norway collects customs on more than 500 articles, and the duties are specific, except in six instances. Spain, with 339 articles on its tariff, imposes an ad valorem duty on but one. The above shows that out of 3,957 duties, only ten are on an ad valorem basis. Now, surely that goes to show that in Europe, where they have had tariffs for centuries, and where they have given the greatest attention to these questions, the entire tariff system is based on specific duties. Moreover, in the United States, where the tariff issue is now up, the tariff reformers set out to abolish specific duties: the Democratic party which is a free trade party, set out to abolish these specific duties, and they gave as a reason that these duties were unjust to the poor man who bought an inferior class of goods. But they have been compelled by the logic of facts laid before them to return to specific duties, and all the changes now proposed in the Senate are in this direction. If the Democratic party which is a free trade party, are compelled to recognize the advantage of specific duties, why should not a Conservative party and a protectionist party, as we have in this country, maintain them and insist upon them? I am glad to see the Government upholding specific duties, and returning to them, and I hope they will be prepared to defend them throughout. Now, in regard to woollens and specific duties, I wish to read an opinion from a paper which ought to speak as an authority, namely, the 'American Woollen and Cotton Reporter,' of April 19, of this year. In a recent issue, discussing tariff reform in the States, it speaks as follows:—

We have purposely refrained heretofore from mention of the petition, which is being circulated for signatures of commission merchants and manufacturers, asking for a change from ad valorem, as proposed in the pending tariff Bill, to specific duties as we did not care to discount its effect upon Congress. The petition has been before the goods district for a number of weeks and the wide publicity given it seems to absolve us from silence regarding it. The petition was suggested by representative men who are in touch and sympathy with the dominant party, and it is essentially a protest against the radical cut in duties as proposed and also against the adoption of simply ad valorem duties as pertains to the woollen schedule. The petition names no rate which would be acceptable to the signers, but contents itself with the brief statement that the proposed rate would be ruinous to a considerable portion of the woollen industry. The main feature, and the one which is specially emphasized, is that relating to the wrong which would be inflicted upon the industry by the change to solely ad valorem rates.

The petition is gaining signatures rapidly, and among them are many names which should command respect of Congress, and influence its action. The pros and cons on the questions of relative merits of ad valorem and specific duties have been so clearly set forth, time and again, that it would seem as though an advocate of the former must be more or less controlled by malice against the woollen industry.

That is the opinion of the entire woollen industry in the States, namely, that only those who are moved by malice can maintain that ad valorem duties should prevail instead of specific duties. I would also like to read, for the information of hon. gentlemen opposite, a telegram I have just received from Alderman John Hallam, of Toronto, who is a Liberal in politics, as the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) can testify. Mr. Hallam is a very large dealer in wool, and he is thoroughly conversant with the woollen industry of this country. He says:

Canadian manufacturers cannot compete with foreign goods at less than 25 per cent ad valorem and 5 per cent specific duties.

In a letter which he wrote the other day, or a circular which his firm issued in regard to the woollen industry, he speaks as follows:—

The delay at Ottawa in settling the tariff on woollen goods has created an industrial uncertainty, and a want of confidence in the future of the trade.

That may suit the discussion that occurred in the early part of the day.

The proposed change in the tariff from compound to purely ad valorem duties, will seriously embarrass the tweed, blanket and yarn manufactories. They will not be able to successfully compete with the shoddy goods of Huddersfield and Dewsbury under the proposed changes unless the Government take the duty off coal, machinery and other articles now taxed and used as raw material. This is having a very depressing effect on the price of our domestic wools and on the woollen trade in general. Home competition has reduced the price of Canadian tweeds, blankets and yarns to the lowest possible point, and if the Canadian mills are subjected to the keen competition of these goods under an ad valorem duty with England, France and Germany, where machinery and all raw material are free of duty, it simply means shutting up some of the mills in this country. In my opinion, this change in the tariff will only benefit the importing and ready-made clothing trade.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The ad valorem duty is equal to the whole of the wages.

Mr. MACLEAN (York). That is not the issue.

The Americans are not changing their tariff on wools to give the Canadian wool growers more money for their clip, but simply to give the manufacturers of the United States free wool at the lowest possible price in competition with English and foreign wool markets.

Then, Long & Bisby, another large house doing business in woollens, in their circular say :

Australia, Argentine, and the United States are the largest wool producers. When reviewing the affairs of these countries, and noting the financial depression and the great shrinkage of values, it is a matter of pleasure—one may say surprise—to know that Canada has been so little affected. Her financial institutions have proved to be of the best, willing and able to take care of the business of the country. Money is plentiful and easy to obtain by those worthy of credit. Under a moderate tariff her factories for some years have been busy. While not producing millionaires, she has been furnishing employment and happy homes to thousands of wage-earners. That this state of affairs could continue, while the whole world was complaining of dulness and loss of trade, could not be expected.

Which is clear testimony that our woollen industry is not over-protected, or making anything but a fair profit. Then they go on to take the same view as Mr. Hallam, that a specific duty is necessary for the continuation of that industry in this country. Now, in the tariff debate at Washington, now running, this issue with regard to specific and ad valorem duties is under discussion, and the Government sent out a circular to ascertain the views of their chief collectors in regard to the two kinds of duty, and the evidence they received is almost entirely in favour of the maintenance of specific duties, and against ad valorem duties. You will find a summary of this evidence in the Montreal 'Gazette' of two days ago. I wish to read one sentence from the collector at Philadelphia :

—namely, the view in favour of ad valorem duties—

This view, however, loses its practical feature in the face of tests which develop fraud and undervaluation, dishonest methods of concealing the quality of materials used in manufactures, the employment of bribes in some instances to corrupt public officers, to which may be added, what is, perhaps, the greatest objection of all to ad valorem rates, the tendency to place the control of the most valuable imports in the hands of foreign manufactures having agents in this country to whom they consign the products of their factories at cost of production, or perhaps less—a method which has been carried to such an extent as to force a large number of merchants in our chief commercial cities out of the importing business, compelling them to buy their goods from such agents, who are enabled by the ad valorem system to sell the goods, duty paid here, at lower price than an importer could buy them at the foreign point of manufacture.

Now, when hon. gentlemen in this House argue against specific duties, and in favour of ad valorem duties, they are constantly arguing in favour of the importer, and trying to make out that the enemy of this country is the manufacturer. They say the manufacturer is bleeding the people white, that he is becoming a monopolist, and so forth. On the contrary, they set up the importer, who wishes ad valorem duties as the great friend of the consumer. Now, I contend, and protectionists contend, that the manufacturer is a much superior citizen to the importer, and that if it is necessary in the interest of the manufacturer to have a specific duty as against an ad valorem duty in favour of the importer, then protectionists generally, and especially a protectionist Government, as we have in this country, are bound to maintain these specific duties. When the Government go back to the country, it will be a source of satisfaction to the protectionists to know that specific duties are to be maintained, and that there is not likely to be any departure therefrom.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think, in all conscience, the Minister of Finance must admit that a considerable amount of the time occupied in this discussion cannot be chargeable to the Opposition. He has been instructed for two days on end by the hon. gentlemen who advocate an export duty on saw-logs, and I do not think two men on this side expressed an opinion about it. He has also been instructed at considerable length by his guide, philosopher and friend, who has just taken his seat, and who is perfectly right in saying that all sound protectionists like specific duties. Sir, we do not doubt that in the least. I never knew a protectionist who knew his business who was not profoundly impressed with the truth of the French maxim, "Plumer la poule sans la faire crier." We all know why specific duties are preferred by protectionists. The last thing those gentlemen desire is to let the public know to what extent they are fleecing them. It is more difficult to shield duties under the guise of ad valorem duty than it is under specific and ad valorem combined. Not one man in fifty will take the trouble to ascertain what a certain specific and ad valorem duty will represent. It is difficult to ascertain the result, for it often varies, as in cases like this now before the committee, from 27½ per cent to 50 or 52 per cent. Therefore, protectionists and Governments all round are most desirous to have specific duties in order that they may, I will not say plunder the people, whatever I may think, but exact taxes from the people without the people knowing how far they are taxed by the duties. With regard to the woollen manufacturing industry it is a fact, whether the hon. Finance Minister knows it or not, that taking Canada all through it was quite as prosperous under a 15 per cent and 17½ per cent tariff on woollen goods as ever it has been since. I will not contend that there may not have been some alterations in the country since, which affected it more or less, but it is well known, and I think it was admitted by the committee over which my friend the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) presided, that while we had a moderate ad valorem tariff those manufacturers and manufacturers generally were on the whole more prosperous than they have been since. And the reason is obvious. They were allowed to develop naturally and fairly, and in accordance with the growth of the country. Capital was not diverted by ill-considered tariffs, with the result that extreme competition has been created in a good many cases to the injury, not merely of the woollen manufacturers, but generally in regard to the other manufacturing industries of the country. The Government, however, chose to interfere, and I do not think they have benefited the woollen manufacturers on the whole to any great extent; some large concerns may have benefited, but I do not think on the whole woollen manufacturers generally have been benefited. But what the Government have done is this: they have to an enormous extent deprived the people of Canada of the benefit which would otherwise have accrued to them from the enormous improvements in manufacturing and from the various inventions which have been perfected during the last sixteen or seventeen years. But all this time the Government, although they benefited the manufacturers, utterly failed to add to the prices of the products of the agricultural class, or even to prevent the prices of their products from falling. To-day wheat is scarcely more than one-third, and barley is scarcely more than one-third the price actually paid for it sixteen or seventeen years ago. So it is with respect to other articles; but the Government by means of the tariff and specific duties, step in and prevent the farmers and other large producers, who are being injured or whose incomes are being reduced by the great fall in the values of their products, from compensating themselves in the least degree by the fall which would have taken place had the Government not interfered with the prices of the articles obtained in exchange for agricultural and other products. There is no better proof of the extreme injustice done the consuming class wanted than what the hon. gentleman has just told the committee. The hon. gentleman was prepared to give 30 per cent, a monstrous protection for any industry, I do not care what it is; but that was not enough. Those men descended on them, and on a good many of the coarser articles they have wrung from them a duty which will be equal to 45 per cent or 50 per cent. On articles representing a value of from 20 cents to 25 cents per yard, this duty will be equivalent to 45 to 50 per cent. On articles largely used by the wealthy class the duty may not reach more than 27½ per cent, and 5 cents per pound is an utterly insignificant matter on goods of high values. All through the consideration of these items the Minister of Finance is making it evident, as indeed he is making it more clear every day, that as regards the producing and consuming classes this Government are entirely opposed to their interests, that they are prepared to make any sacrifices for the purpose of maintaining their hold on a certain section of the community, which is no doubt a valuable and important section, to whom to appeal in certain contingencies and emergencies. Those gentlemen can obtain the greatest concessions, but the classes on whom more than all other the welfare of the country depends are being sacrificed all through the tariff and in every change proposed by the hon. Minister. In a great many cases the value of the raw material in these articles approaches very nearly half the cost of the finished product. What follows? The hon. gentleman is giving protection in some cases almost equal to the whole cost of manufacturing. We should be able to obtain wool and other articles which enter into the manufacture of woollen goods almost as cheaply as the manufacturers in any other country. We ourselves produce a good deal of wool, and nowadays the cost of transportation is so small that there should not be, and I do not know whether there is, any material difference between the cost of the raw material as laid down at our mills and elsewhere, and if it equals, as I believe it may in many cases, 40 or 50 per cent of the value of the finished products, it follows that under pretense of developing and increasing those industries all the cost—not merely the wages—of manufacturing is to be defrayed out of the tariff. It is perfectly clear that if the raw material can be laid down here almost as cheaply as in other countries, and if it represents nearly one-half the value of the goods, and on coarse goods I believe it is very often the case, a duty which amounts as in this case on the coarse article to 50 per cent will be equivalent to the entire cost of manufacturing the raw material into the finished product. That is in every sense a gross abuse, and at the same time a gross injustice to the people in Canada. It is one of the many results and the many acts of injustice which follow from the policy that the Finance Minister and his friends behind him have been advocating. The one point in regard to which I believe the hon. gentleman and his friends are tolerably correct is this: that his false policy, his policy of forcing a large number of persons into this position by the bait held out a few years ago has produced such competition that I do not believe those prosecuting manufacturing to-day are at all as well able in most cases to make an honest living as they were under the ordinary revenue tariff which existed from 1867 to 1878.

Mr. CURRAN. The last speaker evidently imagined the deeds of his regime have been forgotten, and that he can make the people of Canada believe, the new generation that has sprung up since his Government was in power, that this Dominion was as prosperous during that period as it is now and has been under the policy carried out by this Government and its predecessor. I would not have risen to reply to the hon. gentleman's remarks, which have been anticipated in argument by the statement made by the Finance Minister, were it not that I desire to express my hearty concurrence in what has been done by the Finance Minister in bringing down the item which is now under consideration. I do so because I have been addressed from various quarters in connection with this industry which has been attacked by the hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat. I will not occupy the time of the committee by reading many of those communications, but in order that the hon. gentleman may have brought to his mind in as forcible a manner as possible what was the state of affairs during the time he refused to listen to the representations made from various quarters, I will read just one letter, which was addressed to me by the Rev. J. H. Dixon, rector of St. Jude's church, Montreal. When the tariff was brought down originally, he wrote me in this strain:

132 FULFORD STREET,
MONTREAL, 5th April, 1894.

HON. J. J. CURRAN, M.P.,
Solicitor General.

DEAR MR. CURRAN.—I am sure you will excuse me as one deeply interested in the West end of Montreal, and indeed in the whole Dominion of Canada, if I address you on a subject which may not seem to belong to the province of the clergy, and yet which when better understood will readily be admitted to be of deep interest to every citizen and to any clergyman labouring as I am in a manufacturing district, as much as to others.

I heard to-day with deep concern that the Montreal Woollen Mills Co. would be forced to close down their mills unless there was some modification of the tariff. I am a Church of England clergyman, as you know, and as many of the men and women working in the woollen mills are English, and members of the Church of England, and are members of my church—the matter of the shutting down of the mills touches me very closely, and I sincerely trust you will use your great influence with your colleagues, both as a member of the Government, and as one of the members for Montreal to have such a modification of the tariff made as will enable the manufacturers in the said woollen mills to carry on their business.

I have now lived nearly nineteen years in the manufacturing West end of Montreal and can speak with experience of the disastrous effects of shutting down factories.

When I first took charge of this parish a number of the operatives of iron works beyond the canal had just shut down under circumstances somewhat similar to the case under consideration—it was hoped relief would be given in the way of protection, but it never came, and I saw the men impoverished by waiting—saw them sell their furniture and at last weep bitter tears as they begged for food, and I had to share my food with many parishioners, to my very great hurt.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). When was that?

Mr. CURRAN. That was when the hon. gentleman was in power with his colleague beside him; that was during the time that the deputations were coming to Ottawa to represent what was necessary for the interests of the country, and when they were told by the colleague of the hon. gentleman: To go to the Father of all Evil.

Mr. CASEY. I understand the hon. gentleman to say that they were told to go to the Father of all Evil.

Mr. CURRAN. Yes, by the then Finance Minister.

Mr. CASEY. And they went to the Conservative party.

Mr. CURRAN. They came at all events to those who gave them the protection they required, those who brought back prosperity to Canada, and who put our people in a position so as they were not obliged to sell their furniture and not be obliged to weep bitter tears as they begged for food. This letter goes on to say:

I saw the sugar refinery shut down for a time. I am not so sure for what cause. I believed at the time that it was from some similar cause, and I paid retail, 11 cents per pound for brown sugar which I paid 7 cents per pound for before when we had competition from our home production. In the interests therefore of Montreal, in the interests of the Dominion of Canada, in the interest of my parishioners, I hope you will succeed in preventing the closing down of this factory and of others in similar positions.

Yours very truly,
JAMES H. DIXON,
Rector of St. Judes, Montreal.

In face of those facts which we all know, in face of the fact that the people were crying for bread, that the black flag was being carried, that the soup kitchen was the only industry that thrived; the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) would listen to no representation from those who knew the state of the country, would make no change in his policy; and yet he stands up to-day, and in presence of those sad memories which are written in the history of the country, he tells us that the Dominion of Canada is not more prosperous now than it was then.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Not by any means as prosperous.

Mr. CURRAN. Not even as prosperous, he says, as when the sugar refineries were closed, when the iron works were shut down, when under his regime the whole country was clamouring for that protection which was afterwards given by the Conservative party, and the promise of which by the Conservative party caused these hon. gentlemen opposite to be swept nearly off the face of the earth. The people of Canada, knowing better than the hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) what the country wanted, gave the Conservative party an immense majority, not only in that election of 1878, but in each subsequent election the Conservative party carried their banner triumphantly, as they will carry it to victory when they next appeal to the people, because they have not abandoned the policy that has made Canada prosperous. It is true that we have modified this tariff in such a way as to meet the new condition of affairs which has grown up in the Dominion and which it was necessary to expect after fourteen or fifteen years' experience under the tariff as originally introduced and modified from time to time since. I can tell the hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) that if he wishes to remain in opposition until the day of his death, the best thing he can do to retain his position is to go on telling the people of Canada that they are not more prosperous to-day than they were in the days of the poverty and destitution and beggary which existed during the reign of himself and his colleagues. I wish for no better augury for the future of the Conservative party in Canada than that the hon. gentleman should continue to make the sort of speeches he has made to-day, and in which he has revelled since the beginning of this session. The letter which I have read, written as it is by a clergyman who enjoys the respect of every one who knows him in the community in which he lives, shows that the dark days of Liberal power in Canada are not forgotten much as the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) may desire that they should be. For my part, I am satisfied that our people do not fail to remember their sorrowful experience between the years 1873 and 1878, and I am confident that they will not place their interests in the keeping of men who learn nothing from experience, no matter how bitterly taught them, and who voluntarily close their eyes to what is going on around and about them in Canada to-day.

Mr. EDGAR. After the lecture which the Finance Minister read to the House against discussing general principles and enlarging on the whole subject of the tariff, it was very inconsiderate for the junior member of the Administration to delay the serious business of the country by discussing these general principles as he has done.

Mr. FOSTER. He has to counteract your bad example.

Mr. EDGAR. Two wrongs cannot make a right, even in the eyes of the Minister of Finance. Surely after the hon. Minister had submitted to the long recitation of the hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean), it was adding insult to injury that his junior colleague should waste more of his valuable time. I must say that if there is anybody in this House who ought to be proud of the influence he has exercised over the Minister of Finance and over the Government it is the member for East York (Mr. Maclean). From the beginning of the tariff discussion he has come out like a man and stated that he is a protectionist right through. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Maclean) believes in specific duties and lamented the backsliding of the Minister of Finance who, in his Budget speech, told the House and the country that he was going to reform the tariff, largely in the line of abolishing specific duties. What a comfort it is to the member for East York (Mr. Maclean) now to find that in these sixty or seventy reconsiderations of that reformed tariff, nearly every one of them is going back to that principle of specific duties, which, a few weeks ago, was a wrong principle, at least in the eyes of the Minister of Finance. As it so happens, we are now discussing the item of "woollen goods" in which the Minister of Finance had proposed to put on an ad valorem duty, but on which the hon. gentleman now goes back again to specific duties. Would you believe it, Mr. Chairman, that in the Budget speech of the Minister of Finance, he gave the duty on these coarse woollen goods as an instance of the evil of specific duties, notwithstanding that he returns to that evil before we have got out of Committee of Ways and Means. That there may be no argument about that, I will take the liberty of reading a few words from the Budget speech of the hon. gentleman. He said:

The chief argument to be used against specific duties is where they are applied to a wide range of articles varying in price.

Then the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) interjected this remark:

Well, call it woollen goods.

And the hon. the Minister of Finance replied :

If the hon. gentleman thinks that is one article, we will say, woollen goods.

Of course, he had in his mind the fact that he was going to put an ad valorem duty on them. He went on to say :

And where the specific duties act so as to raise the prices realized upon the cheaper though good articles, thus discriminating against a class of consumers in the country, in a case of that kind, the argument for ad valorem duties is strong.

I should think it was strong ; and the Finance Minister asks the House to-day to allow him to swallow his own argument, and to alter these woollen duties. I think that the capital which the Government had hoped to make out of what they called the tariff reform is a minus quantity to-day.

Mr. FOSTER. We are satisfied with it.

Mr. EDGAR. They are very, very sorry they ever attempted any such thing as a tariff reform.

Mr. FOSTER. Not in the least.

Mr. EDGAR. Well, the country understands what their reform was, and, when we apply the language of the hon. gentleman in his own Budget speech to these new changes it understands how little the Government knew what they were going to do about it when they brought down that speech, and how little they have been allowed to do by the hon. gentlemen who sit behind them, and by the protected manufacturers who elect so many of those hon. gentlemen. There is no use of our disguising the fact ; we all know, and the country knows very well, that while they attempted to make some reductions, for which we were quite willing to give them credit, they have not since had an hour's peace by day or by night, but have been pressed and bullied by deputations from all parts of the country, who, when they could not get at the Finance Minister, have got at the members, and have forced them to retrace the steps they took in the direction of tariff reform. The hotels in this city have never done such business as they have done this session by boarding the deputations of manufacturers that have come here to force the Finance Minister to swallow his words, and to change his tariff until he can scarcely recognize his own offspring. I am sure that the House will be sorry to keep the hon. gentleman much longer from closing up this tariff, and will be glad to let him out of the agony he is suffering from his own supporters.

Mr. CASEY. The hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean) congratulated the Government on the reactionary steps they have taken in regard to the tariff. Now, Sir, I belong to a church—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. CASEY. Yes, and I believe the hon. Finance Minister himself, who laughs, belongs also to a church which believes in the possibility of back-sliding and falling from grace.

Mr. FOSTER. No ; I am a good Baptist.

Mr. CASEY. But I never heard any good Methodist congratulated before upon falling from grace, as the hon. Finance Minister has been to-day.

Mr. MACLEAN (York). He returned to the fold.

Mr. CASEY. In his Budget speech the hon. Minister did approach very nearly to something like reasonable doctrines in regard to the taxation of cheap goods. He admitted that the specific tax was a bad one, in that it imposed 50, 60 and 70 per cent on the clothing of the poorer classes. But he has back-slidden, and he admits that on the representations of the woollen manufacturers themselves he has been induced to reimpose this tax, which in his Budget speech he denounced as unfair and injurious to the poorer class of people. The method of imposing taxes by specific duties reminds one very much of the patent medicines that one sees advertised—specifics for this, specifics for that, specifics for everything. The hon. gentleman seems to have found that the only medicine that will tone up the constitution of our poor, weakly, infant manufacturers, is a specific tax or so much a pound or so much a ton, as the case may be. That is the remedy on which he unfailingly falls back upon, without regard to the claim he has made on public credit for having abandoned that and returned to the ordinary method of cure. Then, Sir, when he came to discuss the reasons given by the manufacturers for requiring this specific medicine, he urged the old story that under a protective tariff the people of this country got a better article, and got it much cheaper, than they would get it if our manufacturers were subjected to the competition of foreign manufacturers. Well, if Canadian manufacturers can make a better and cheaper article than is made abroad they do not need any protection. Everybody knows that that argument in favour of protection is just as shoddy as the worst class of woollen goods which the hon. Minister wishes to exclude. He says that not only are tweeds and woolsens made better in Canada, but that even the shoddy made in Canada is purer than that imported. He saw that he had laid himself open to ridicule in that remark, but he is not going to escape ridicule because he admits his liability to it. The idea that pure goods can be made out of shoddy is the height of absurdity in its essence.

Committee rose, and it being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

WELLAND POWER AND SUPPLY CANAL COMPANY.

House again resolved itself into committee on Bill (No. 49) to incorporate the Welland Power and Supply Canal Company (Limited).
—(Mr. McKay.)

(In the Committee.)

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). This Bill is beyond our jurisdiction. In the very nature of things, it is a local undertaking. It is not one which can be declared for the general advantage of Canada. If such a declaration were made, it would not bring the Bill within our jurisdiction. In the distribution of powers under section 92 of the British North American Act, certain powers remain exclusively to the provinces, and this exclusive jurisdiction in the provinces excludes all jurisdiction in this Parliament. The provinces had an autonomy of their own before the union, and reserved certain powers to themselves, and all these powers are exclusive of everything in section 91, except the matters referred to in subsection 16 of section 92. According to the concluding parts of section 91, those matters which are matters of a local or private nature, if comprised in the enumerated portions of section 91, would not fall under subsection 16 of section 92. We find by subsection 10 that local works and undertakings are under the exclusive jurisdiction of the provinces, but, with the exception of certain classes, such as :

Lines of steam or other ships, railways, canals, telegraphs, and other works and undertakings, connecting the province with any other or others of the provinces, or extending beyond the limits of the province.

Lines of steamships between the province and any British or foreign country.

Such works as, although wholly situate within the province, are before or after their execution declared by the Parliament of Canada to be for the general advantage of Canada or for the advantage of two or more of the provinces.

This is not a work coming within any of these classes of exceptions. I call the attention of the Minister of Justice to paragraph (c) of subsection 10. "Such works" do not, when you carefully examine this article, refer to such local works and undertakings as are mentioned in the chief part of the section, but in the two preceding subsections, because you cannot make an exception of such a character as to destroy the grant. If you were to construe the words "such works" to mean such local works and undertakings as are mentioned in the exclusive jurisdiction given to the provinces, you would be conferring on the Parliament of Canada a power that would absolutely destroy the grant to the province. That would be contrary to the well-established canons of construction. You are to so construe the whole subsection 10 with its exception so as to enable every portion to become operative. You are not to construe the section in such a way as to take away the entire grant. So, while you would have the power to construct a local work or undertaking, wholly situated within the province, by declaring it to be for the general advantage of Canada, you could not validly make that declaration unless the work, when constructed, became part of a work which would connect two or more provinces or a province with a foreign country. The construction of a canal from Georgian Bay to Lake Ontario would be a work wholly within the province of Ontario, which might be declared to be a work for the general advantage of Canada, because, when constructed, it will make a continuous waterway which will extend, not simply through Ontario, but connect Ontario with all the other provinces. The same thing might be said of a railway. There might be a missing link of railway which might be wholly within the limits of one province, but which, if constructed, would be a part of a continuous railway system, connecting one province with another, and could be declared for the general advantage of Canada. But the simple declaration of its being for the general advantage of Canada, standing alone, would not be sufficient. It would require the other conditions enacted in subsections "A" and "B." There is nothing in this Bill which makes it come within our jurisdiction. Generally, all matter of a merely local or private nature are within the exclusive jurisdiction of the province. What is there in this measure that makes it other than a work of local or private nature? It is not the incorporation of a company having jurisdiction and extending all over the province. It is not for the purpose of carrying on business all over the Dominion. It has a local habitat. In the very nature of things, it cannot be removed further. Its business is confined to where the work is constructed. There is the field of its operations, and that field is within the province of Ontario, and the company must look to the Ontario Legislature for an Act of incorporation. It has not any right to come here, and ought not to come here; and it seems to me that it is very unfortunate for the parties who are undertaking to invest money in enterprises of this sort, that we should go on and incorporate and perhaps permit invested interests to grow up, and then, after they have been called into existence, it may be found, in some suit that comes up, that we have no power to incorporate the company. That the Local Legislature has power to incorporate it is beyond all doubt, and we ought to bear in mind that our jurisdiction is an exclusive jurisdiction and so is the jurisdiction of the provinces. There may be differences of standpoint which will bring us, to some extent, into the same field for different reasons, but this is not a Bill involving any consideration of that sort, and it seems to me that this House ought not to undertake to legislate on a subject of this kind. And I press the matter upon the attention of the Minister of Justice because it is very much better that these measures should be excluded than that our time should be taken up with their consideration when it will only have the effect of misleading parties, and perhaps contribute ultimately to imposing very serious losses upon them.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I understand, Mr. Chairman, that this point was pretty fully considered by the committee and that the committee came to the conclusion that this was a Bill which should be recommended to the House to be proceeded with, and also that it was within the jurisdiction of this Parliament. The hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies), called attention to the question of jurisdiction the other night, and I promised to consider it. This I have done. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) has not dealt with one feature of the Bill on which, I understand, the committee laid some stress, as affecting the question of jurisdiction, namely, that this Bill authorizes the construction of a work on Dominion property—a river, which is mentioned in the second section.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I do not see that that would make any difference.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The Bill provides :

The company may construct, equip, maintain and operate a canal and hydraulic raceway from some point in the Welland River within five miles from its junction with the Niagara River, to a point or points on or under the Niagara escarpment.

The committee came to the conclusion, I think, that, inasmuch as rivers are Dominion property, an Act which enables a company to deal with a river might be passed by this Parliament.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). If I might interrupt the Minister for a moment : even though this might be a reason why they should obtain leave to carry on their operations from this Parliament, I do not think that is a reason why this Parliament should give them a corporate existence.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. There are two views to take of a Bill of this character. One is that it is not a Bill giving leave to make the canal, or whatever the work may be, but to give corporate powers in case the promoters may obtain the right to carry on the work. I confess that the view I have taken with regard to this matter is that such Bills do not confer any right or title with regard to the work, but confer the corporate powers which are specified in the Act in case the right should be acquired by the company, in other words, they put an aggregation of persons in the same position as a private person would be, namely, that they would have the powers to construct the canal, provided they obtained the right to the property. I think that, generally, it would be safer to adopt that rule, lest it should appear that in private Bills we are giving rights which would require the assent of the Crown in order to pass them. I confess I am not able to agree with the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) as regards the company not being within our jurisdiction, as not being engaged in a work for the general advantage of Canada. It struck me, Sir, that the interpretation of paragraph (c) of subsection 10 of section 92 of the British North America Act was so wide as to enable us to make that declaration with respect to any works which otherwise would be of local character.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). That would destroy the whole grant.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I am not so sure of that, and I will express the difficulty I find in arriving at that conclusion as well as I can. The paragraph reads :

Such works as, although wholly situated in the provinces, are before or after their execution declared by the Parliament of Canada to be for the general advantage of Canada or for the advantage of two or more of the provinces.

I do not think that that paragraph, interpreted in the wider sense as enabling us to make that declaration with respect to any local work or undertaking, would destroy the effect of the subsection, but it would have the effect of placing within the jurisdiction of the Provincial Legislature all works in respect of which this Parliament did not make that declaration. But, I think, with all respect, it is clear that it bears that interpretation, because it gives that power to this Parliament, and, in case the power be exercised, it takes away the authority of the Provincial Legislature with respect to works even though they are wholly within the province. Therefore, it seems to me it would not bear the construction put upon it by the hon. member for Bothwell, namely, that the work must be one which, when finished, connects one province with another, or any province with a foreign country. In respect of works of that character, I should say from the outset that they could only be dealt with by this Parliament, and with the declaration that they are for the general advantage.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Perhaps I did not make myself clearly understood. My contention is this : Suppose you had one railway wholly within the province of Ontario, incorporated by the Legislature of the province of Ontario, and another wholly within the province of Quebec and incorporated by the Legislature of that province. A distance of 100 miles intervenes between these railways. There would be a work wholly within the province of Quebec or Ontario which you might declare for the general advantage of Canada, and that declaration would give you jurisdiction over two provincial corporations that were separate before. The Minister will see that whether paragraph (c) bears the construction he puts upon it or the construction I put upon it depends on whether "such works" means such works as are mentioned in paragraphs (a) and (b), or those mentioned in the principal part of subsection 10.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I confess that the illustration the hon. gentleman has given would be a happy one as indicating a class of cases which clearly call for the exercise of our power to declare the work one for the general advantage of Canada, and that, in such a case, the exercise of that power would be plainly justified, even though the work were wholly within a province. But it does not seem to me that the illustration, though a forcible one, in any way indicates that the clause is confined to that class of cases. Now, if the hon. gentleman will allow me, "such works," I contend—and I would ask the hon. gentleman, on reflection, to agree—are not the works referred to in the two preceding sections or any other sections, but that class of works, which, "although wholly situated within the province, are, before or after their execution, declared by the Parliament of Canada to be for the general advantage of Canada, or for the advantage of two or more of the provinces." On one point I think there can be no dispute at all, namely, that this is the view which has been taken by this Parliament for many years. From time to time we have had that declaration made with respect to works which were, beyond all question, purely local, such, for instance as railways, of three, four, or five miles in length, and not forming part of any line of communication whatever connecting one province with another. I think it would be wise, until there is some judicial determination of the question, that we should not consent to give up the interpretation so freely acted upon in this Parliament. I think it would be quite legitimate to make that declaration with respect to a work which, though wholly within the province materially tended to increase the trade of the province, facilitated communication between different parts of the province or between the province and a foreign country. And if, with respect to this work, Parliament came to the conclusion that it facilitated trade and communication between distant parts of the province and thereby facilitated communication with the other provinces, it might be declared to be for the general advantage of Canada, and that declaration would be conclusive. But what I thought of suggesting with respect to the objection raised by the hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies), is that this committee ought to be asked to con- cide the Bill by making this declaration. Certainly, whatever interpretation be adopted by the House with regard to our powers under the British North America Act, that declaration would remove the question as to jurisdiction, and it is advisable to remove that question. It would not be using the powers which are mentioned in paragraph (c) of subsection 10 to any greater extent than has been customary in this House from time to time. I grant that this feature is worthy of consideration by this committee. The committee to whom the Bill was referred seems to have thought that clause unnecessary or inexpedient, because, I am told, it was in the draft Bill and was omitted in consequence of the committee, perhaps, being of opinion that it was unnecessary and that the fact that the Bill dealt with a public river, a river which is claimed to be the property of Canada, was sufficient to give jurisdiction to this Parliament. Supposing that point to be open to question, I would think it better that this declaration should be made. I would not go so far as to contend that this declaration ought to be made by this committee, if the committee who had the Bill under consideration had investigated the matter and had come to the conclusion that the declaration ought not to be made with respect to this work. But from what I am informed, I am inclined to the opinion that the committee omitted this clause merely because they thought it unnecessary, and that there was ample jurisdiction on the face of the Bill without it. I find that I was under some misapprehension. It was not in the draft Bill, but what I had in my mind was that the suggestion was made to the committee that a clause might be added making our jurisdiction apparent. If the committee acted on the supposition that jurisdiction was amply apparent without such a clause. I think we might, with propriety, insert it here. But if the committee, on the other hand, thought that such a clause ought not to appear, it would be more courteous and a more careful way of proceeding to discharge the present order and refer the Bill back to the committee with instructions to inquire whether such a clause would not be appropriate.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I differ from the view expressed by the Minister of Justice in this, that this House ought not to undertake to give to any private company or corporation, jurisdiction by declaring a measure to be for the general advantage of Canada; if the intention is simply to create jurisdiction by such a declaration. I do not admit, either, that we can give jurisdiction by that declaration alone, and I would ask the attention of the committee for a moment to the construction of these two sections which, it seems to me, go a long way to answer the argument of the Minister of Justice. In the first place, I ask the committee to notice that in section 91 of the British North America Act it is stated, in general terms, that it shall be lawful to legislate with regard to the peace, order and good government of Canada, except with regard to those matters that are placed by the following section under the exclusive jurisdiction of the provinces. Then, as was pointed out by a very able lawyer in England, on a certain occasion before the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, this fact must be borne in mind, that the provinces have in the first instance, a grant made to them, or powers allowed to remain with them. In the second place, the powers enumerated in section 91, and which are barred out of the general grant, embraced in that section, stand second in order. The concluding part of section 91 declares that any matter coming within any of the classes of subjects enumerated, that is in section 91, shall not be deemed to come within the class of matters of a local or private character comprised in the numerous classes of subjects by this Act, assigned exclusively to the Legislatures of the provinces. Now, what are excepted out by this concluding portion. It is this. That generally all matters of a merely local or private nature in a province are declared to be within the exclusive jurisdiction of the province. But if you can show that any matter of a local or private nature is within the enumerated powers of Parliament, as set out in section 91, then it shall not be held to fall under that subsection. But those concluding words of section 91 apply to no other portion of section 92 than this subsection 16, because you will see from examination it uses the express words employed in that subsection, and speaks of a class of matter and not classes of matters. If the Minister of Justice is right in his contention, there is no subjects of a local or private nature over which this Parliament might not obtain jurisdiction by the simple declaration that it is for the general advantage of Canada. You could not go behind that. You could declare the street railway from the Queen's hotel down to the Union station in Toronto to be for the general advantage of Canada, and that would bring it within our jurisdiction, so that although a general declaration would not bring the whole of these matters within our jurisdiction, we might take up every one in detail and declare that every public work existing at this moment, every private corporation dealing with public works of the character mentioned in this section, is for the general advantage of Canada, and thus put an end to all the powers of the Local Legislature for the moment existing. I maintain, therefore, that you cannot interpret an exception from a grant in such a way as to destroy the grant itself, and you do that if you declare there is nothing in the exclusive jurisdiction of a province that you could not take from it by a general declaration. That is not reasonable. You are to look to what the section itself says. You are to bear this in mind, that where you carve out of a general grant a specific reservation you are to interpret the general grant liberally and interpret the exception in the most restricted way. The exception is to receive a restricted interpretation, and the general grant is to receive a broad interpretation. Now, the general grant is to the province. The province shall exclusively legislate on any local works or undertakings other than such as are of the following classes. Now, they are classified, and are not intended to be works incapable of being classified. You have first, a class mentioned, lines of steam or other ships, and so on. You have, second, lines of steamships between one province and another. Then you have this statement: Such works as, although wholly situate within the province, and so on. I take those words to mean such works as are mentioned in A and B, such works as are a noticeable exception to the general grant; and, being so, it seems to me that you cannot bring these, by a general declaration, within the jurisdiction of this House. Then you have this further statement:

Generally all matters of a merely local or private nature in the province are within provincial jurisdiction.

There is an exception to that, and that exception is contained in the concluding part of the preceding section. All works of a local or private nature, comprised in the enumeration of the preceding subsections. Now, you take the enumerations of subjects coming within the jurisdiction of this Parliament:

The public debt and property; the regulations of trade and commerce; the raising of money by any mode or system of taxation; postal service; the census and statistics and so on.

These are specific grants, and if you say any matter falls within any one of these specific grants, it cannot then fall within: "Generally, all matters of a merely local or private nature." There is no attempt to show that this Bill falls within any of these enumerations; and if it does not, it cannot be dealt with, because it cannot be dealt with under subsection 10 at all. We have nothing whatever to do with the subject; it is a work of a local or private nature, and being such, and not being found within any one of these subsections of the preceding section, this House can have no jurisdiction, and there is no way provided by which jurisdiction can be given. That being so, we ought not to legislate. If I understood the Minister of Justice, he agreed with me in my contention that the mere fact that this Bill deals with, or proposes to appropriate, the water of a river which is navigable, which is under the jurisdiction of the House and of which this House has an easement, would not give this Parliament jurisdiction. It is proposed by this Bill to incorporate a private company and authorize it to use the water, but this Parliament cannot give that power when it is within the power of the Local Legislature. It is provided by law that the property of an individual cannot be taken unless it is wholly distinct matter from the incorporation must be obtained to expropriate the water of a navigable river. That, however, is a wholly distinct matter from the incorporation of this company. It must first get its corporate existence from the body having jurisdiction over the subject matter, and that I submit is not this Parliament. I do not propose to discuss the subject further, and I simply wish to put my views with respect to this measure and every other measure of the same sort that comes before Parliament on record.

Bill reported, and Bill read the third time and passed.

IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READINGS.

Bill (No. 60) to incorporate the Cariboo Railway Company.—(Mr. Mara.)

Bill (No. 65) to confirm an agreement between the Ottawa City Passenger Railway Company and the Ottawa Electric Street Railway Company, and an agreement between the said companies and the corporation of the city of Ottawa, and to unite the said companies under the name of The Ottawa Electric Railway Company.—(Mr. Robillard.)

Bill (No. 105) for the relief of Caroline Jane Downey—(from the Senate).—(Mr. Taylor.)

Bill (No. 84) to incorporate the Alliance of the Reformed Baptist Church of Canada and the several churches connected therewith.—(Mr. Colter.)

Bill (No. 75) respecting the Chaudiere Electric Light and Power Company (Limited), and to change the name thereof to The Ottawa Electric Company.—(Sir James Grant.)

Bill (No. 27) respecting the Dominion Burglary Guarantee Company (Limited).—(Mr. Sproule.)

OTTAWA ELECTRIC LIGHT COMPANY.

House resolved itself into Committee on Bill (No. 74) to incorporate the Ottawa Electric Light Company.—(Sir James Grant.)

(In the Committee.)

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Before you report the Bill, Mr. Chairman, I may say that I object to legislation of this sort in this Parliament. Companies of this kind have a local habitat, a fixed place of existence. They differ from companies carrying on mercantile operations. The 'lex loci rei sitae' applies to all Acts of this kind; if the company is wholly within the limits of a province as this one is, it is also wholly within the jurisdiction of the provincial legislature.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell).

Mr. LANGELIER. What will remain of the powers of the local legislatures in regard to public works if we go on incorporating companies like this? I do not think it was ever contemplated, when the words "for the general advantage of Canada" were put in the British North America Act, that they would be used to declare all works to be for the general advantage of Canada. I suppose it was contemplated that when such a declaration would be made by the Parliament of Canada, it would be made because it was true; but who can say truly that it is for the general advantage of Canada that an electric light company should be incorporated, having its location and its exclusive business in the city of Ottawa? If we go on incorporating companies of that kind in this Parliament, we might just as well give up the powers of the local legislatures in such matters.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. This company extends its operations to the province of Quebec—to Hull.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Even if it does, it might do so under a provincial charter, just as any corporation might carry on operations in the East Indies or in China.

Bill reported, and read the third time, and passed.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE TARIFF.

House again resolved itself into Committee on Ways and Means.

(In the Committee.)

Manufactures composed wholly or in part of wool, worsted, the hair of the alpaca goat or other like animal, viz.: blankets and flannels of every description, cloths, doeskins, cassimeres, tweeds, coatings, overcoatings, and felt cloth, n.e.s., 5 cents per pound and 25 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I propose to discuss this item from the point of view which engaged the attention of the House for a short time this afternoon. You will not fail to have observed, Sir, that this resolution covers a very wide range of articles. Any hon. gentleman who will consult the Trade and Navigation reports will see that these are articles which are very largely imported into Canada. I have to recall to you again, Sir, that nearly two months ago the Finance Minister announced that the duty on these articles would be 30 per cent. To-night he comes down with a proposition to change that and add to the duty on these articles 4 per cent, 5 per cent, 10 per cent, and in some cases 30 per cent, entailing upon the importers, who no doubt relied upon the statement of the Finance Minister that 30 per cent might be depended upon as the tariff in future—more especially as the articles of woollens was mentioned at the time, when dealing with the subject of specific duties in his Budget speech, as an illustration of an article in respect of which it was not desirable to introduce specific duties. These importers, relying upon that statement, undoubtedly have passed their entries through the custom-house and sold the goods, as it is not likely that they would keep them in stock during two months. Their selling price, of course, would be based upon the rate of duty then announced by the Finance Minister, but when this resolution passes, as I suppose it will, these importers will have to amend their entries, pay the extra duties imposed, and be out of pocket the difference, without any chance of recouping themselves, as the goods must have, in most cases, passed into the hands of their customers. They are, therefore, without redress. The hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean), in advocating specific duties to-night—in doing which he is consistent—was pleased to institute a comparison between the manufacturers and the importers, to the disparagement of the latter. I think that was unnecessary. I do not undervalue the manufacturers and their work in the country, nor do I think we are called upon to undervalue the work and services of the importers. We are all useful citizens in this country but holding the views the hon. member for East York does of the importers, even admitting their interests as not to be mentioned in comparison with those of the manufacturers, I would ask him if the importers were not, at any rate, entitled to be made aware of the views of the Minister of Finance within a shorter date. The First Minister was pleased to tell us this afternoon, speaking, as I charitably suppose, in a moment of haste and without due consideration, that the whole country knew that the delay in these changes of the tariff was due to the Opposition. But we are face to face with a statement which it will be hard for this gentleman to get around. Are the Opposition to blame for the delay in making known these changes, which are to add 5 and 10 and, in some cases, 30 per cent to the duties these importers have paid weeks ago, and which they will have to make good by amended entries. What have we to do with that? If the Opposition, as was charged against them but without foundation, had delayed the progress of the tariff measure through the House, the importers of these articles would not be in any better position. If the Opposition had neglected their duty and had not criticised the various articles at all, the importers would have been no better off, because certainly there has been no delay caused by the Opposition in the announcement of these changes. If the Minister of Finance did not make up his mind until last night, the Opposition are not accountable. Or if he had made up his mind, the Opposition can not be blamed for the grievous injustice he has done in not making his decision known sooner. When the hon. member for South Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale) pointed out how disastrous it would be to the interest of the country to have this tariff dangling over people's heads a long time, without any conclusion being come to, I ask him why the Finance Minister did not follow the course suggested by me then and give notice of the proposed alterations in the tariff, so that the trading community could take cognizance of it. The hon. member for South Norfolk could not expect the Opposition to refrain from a fair criticism of the items of the tariff, but there was no need why the business of the country should suffer on that account, because all that was necessary was for the Finance Minister to give prompt notice of the alterations he intended to make in the tariff and not mislead importers in the way he has done. But the month of April passed and we came into May, and now in the third week of May, the Finance Minister comes down and proposes these changes. Yet, in the face of that, hon. gentlemen opposite have the temerity to say that the trading community are annoyed with the Opposition because the tariff measure has not been completed sooner. In the instance before us, we have conclusive proof of what I stated before, that vast injury has been done to the business interest of the country through the want of preparedness of the Finance Minister; and I think the hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean), however little he may think of the importers, must admit that they certainly deserved to have had intimation of the changes now proposed by the Finance Minister long before this, so that they might have governed themselves accordingly and avoid the losses which they are now suffering. It is a heavy item you are dealing with; it will require I do not know how many renewed entries in that one article alone, and it will be an immense loss to these importers, who may not stand as high in the estimation of the hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean) as I think they ought to stand, but who are at least worthy of a little fairer treatment than they are now receiving at the hands of the Finance Minister who is proposing this change. And, let the country read, and let the country note, that it is only on the 18th of May that we are considering these changes, and whether more are to follow or not we do not know. I again express the hope I did before, that to-night, before the committee rises we may settle upon this tariff, so that the business interests of the country may go on, and business men may know where they stand with reference to this important matter.

Mr. MULLOCK. I would like to ask the Minister of Finance what representations have been made, and on behalf of what classes, to cause this recommendation to be made to the House?

Mr. FOSTER. I gave that at length this afternoon.

Mr. MULOCK. The hon. gentleman said that representations had been made, but from what source, I think, he did not state.

Mr. FOSTER. I stated from what sources.

Mr. MULOCK. I do not think the hon. gentleman gave us particulars. I understand, Mr. Chairman, that there were conflicting representations made as to these changes. I understand that a section of the manufacturers asked for increases in the duties on these woollens, and that another section asked that these changes should not be made. Is that correct?

Mr. FOSTER. That is not correct.

Mr. MULOCK. It is not correct then that certain classes, for instance, a large body of importers from the city of Toronto, waited upon the Government to ask that the changes should not be made?

Mr. FOSTER. That is correct. These are not persons interested except as importers.

Mr. MULOCK. Then that is confirmation of the attitude of the hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean).

Mr. FOSTER. That is unfair. I understood the hon. gentleman to speak of persons interested in the business, and I interpreted that to mean persons engaged in this industry.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Importers and consumers are just as much interested as the manufacturers are.

Mr. FOSTER. But I have a perfect right to say how I understood it. My hon. friend will not attempt to cram it down my throat that I have not the right to say what I understood.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Very well; you are not going to get this item through—don't disturb yourself.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes; this is carrying out the policy of obstructing that you have been carrying out for two months.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. We will carry it out at our own pleasure.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman was speaking of representations made. I stated that I had detailed that this afternoon. I stated at some length the situation as regards the different classes of woollen manufactures and the representations that have been made. I understood that his question referred to those engaged in the different branches of this industry, and I answered him accordingly. I did not mean that the importer had no right to be heard, but I meant what I said, interpreting his question as I did, that there was no difference in the representations made by those engaged in the woollen industry.

Mr. MULOCK. The hon. Minister is quite right to correct any misunderstanding arising.

Mr. MULOCK.

ing. I only wished to know as to whose opinions were given weight by the Minister in reference to these recommendations, because I believe it is no secret that conflicting representations were made to the Government on this point. Now, Sir, my information is this: a number of manufacturers, engaged in the production more particularly of shoddy goods, waited upon the Government and asked for an increase of the proposed duty to 35 per cent or to 25 per cent ad valorem and 5 cents per pound specific. I understand that these representations came solely from a class of manufacturers who have formed themselves into a very substantial combine. And, Sir, I am told that these representations having come to the knowledge of the importers and men engaged in the trade—not being the particular class to whom the Minister appears now to have listened—these gentlemen attended before the Government and made certain representations. I suppose it is said that this is proposed in order to protect the Canadian manufacturer, and in order to supply the consumer with a pure article.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Pure shoddy.

Mr. MULOCK. Pure woollen goods. But, in order to understand this item properly you must read it in conjunction with the other clauses of the tariff. Turning to the other clauses of the tariff you find rags are admitted free. With rags free, and a high, almost prohibitory, duty upon pure woollen goods, you are offering a statutory premium to the production of shoddy goods. And the manufacturers who have asked for this are the manufacturers of shoddy goods. If this is the case, what is the Minister now accomplishing by his tariff? In the first place he is playing into the hands of a gigantic combine, five manufacturers being the constituent elements of that combine. Then he is discriminating against honest trade; he is promoting the manufacture of an inferior article, shoddy with a cotton warp, an article which, for the time being, may look even better than the genuine, that it may be passed upon an unsuspecting public to their ultimate loss. In whose interest is this proposition made? It certainly is not in the interest of the consumer that goods of an inferior character should be palmed off upon the public in this way, and that their manufacture should be directly promoted by the legislation now proposed. Yet that must be the result of this legislation. The information I have on this point comes to me from thoroughly reliable sources, from men high in their business, who have no political object to serve, some of them being very strong, staunch supporters of the Administration, but certainly opposed to this scheme as unfair to the community, and in every respect unpatriotic. It cannot be defended, Mr. Chairman, when you interpret this proposition in the light of the other provisions of the tariff. Moreover, I am surprised that this scheme is only made known to the House to-day; because I have in my hand a memorandum given me as much as a month ago, foreshadowing this change. This memorandum I obtained from a deputation of importers who came to Ottawa to interview the Government, it seems to me weeks ago—the Minister will remember the exact time—and in it is given the proposition now placed before the House for the first time. I was told at the time that this was the proposition that was to come before the House, but it had escaped my memory until I was reminded of it by the Finance Minister bringing forward the proposal to-day. This memorandum states that in regard to these woollens the Government had under consideration the increase of the duty either to 35 per cent ad valorem or to 25 per cent ad valorem and 5 cents per pound specific. Well, that is what these gentlemen understood at the time of the deputation was likely to be the determination of the Government; whether the Government had absolutely so decided, is another matter. But it was in a half way public information, and it does seem extraordinary that if it was not more than a guess, it should only be made known to the community within 48 hours of the 18th of May. I think there is immense force in the criticism of the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Paterson), that at this stage, trade should be disturbed in this way for the purpose of promoting legislation, which certainly appears of a most indefensible character.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It is, perhaps, not surprising that a shoddy Government should favour shoddy manufacturers, and the manufacture of shoddy generally. That is entirely in accordance with the eternal fitness of things, and entirely in accordance with the general principle and policy which has distinguished the present Government since its formation. But whatever their policy may be, however desirous they may be of providing us with a stronger shoddy and a purer shoddy, as the hon. gentleman stated before Recess, there is no doubt whatever that they have acted very badly indeed towards the trade; there is no doubt whatever that it was quite within their power, and they ought to have announced long ago that they were disposed to make an important change in the tariff on textile goods. Now, it is not a case of hundreds, it is a case of thousands of people scattered all over this country who will be put to great inconvenience and great loss, and most unjustly so, by the action of the Government. We will pass over the question whether the Government, on a question such as the rate of duty on textiles, could not make up their minds in the period of 12 months they had at their disposal. I venture to say that any Finance Minister who knew his business ought to have come to a decision upon that matter many months before the tariff was declared. Whatever policy they chose to adopt, they had ample opportunity of reasoning it out, and ample opportunity and ample means of ascertaining to the fullest extent what the effect of the proposed changes would be. If the hon. gentleman had done his duty, there was no difficulty whatever about his obtaining information from the trade on a matter of that kind. Now, two months ago he came down with a proposition to levy an ad valorem rate of 30 per cent. He explains, as is perfectly true, that this is one of the very things in which the specific duties were sure to work a grievous wrong to a very large class of the community, and on that ground he proposed to alter his duties, having had, as I say, ample opportunity of knowing how they would affect any particular class of men engaged in that business. Now, if he chose, after the two months, deliberately to reverse his policy, and in many cases to double the duty which he had previously put on, in many cases to add 30, or 40, or 50 per cent to the amount of the former duty—because, as he will easily see, if you raise the duty from 30 to 40, or 45, or 50 per cent, or even higher, as you may in some of these cases, it is equivalent to a difference of 40, or 50, or a 100 per cent on the duty previously proposed—the least he could do, seeing that as a result of his own deliberate conduct, all these parties which have been engaged in importing these goods or in having transactions with them, have been put to inconvenience—I say that it was his duty, under such circumstances, to make some provision to compensate these people. It can be very easily done, there is no objection in point of principle. It is clear that the hon. gentleman cares nothing for the consumer, he cares nothing for the importer, he cares only for a certain class of manufacturers from whom he and his colleagues and their supporters expect to obtain political support. Sir, it is well that the people of this country should understand that this tariff, to all intents and purposes, has been put up to auction—put up to auction, Sir, and that every one of these emendations are a bribe and nothing else.

Item agreed to.

All fabrics composed wholly or in part of wool, worsted, the hair of the alpaca goat or other like animal, n.e.s., 5 cents per pound and 30 per cent ad valorem.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Is that exactly the same as it was?

Mr. FOSTER. Exactly.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I thought that those in the old tariff had some specific duties.

Mr. FOSTER. In the old tariff these were under different rates of duties. This is the same as was brought down. I have divided the clause into two.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. How does this compare with the former tariff?

Mr. FOSTER. It is a little higher than the original tariff, on the average. The original tariff had three divisions, according to the value of the cloth. It is proposed to put them all in one at 30 per cent.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Could the Minister mention some of the articles that will come in under that head?

Mr. FOSTER. Chiefly dress goods.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Will winceys come in under that?

Mr. WALLACE. They are really cotton goods; they come under the cotton class at the same rate of duty.

Item agreed to.

Yarns, woollen or worsted, n.e.s., 30 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. HENDERSON. It seems to me the drop on this article of yarns is somewhat remarkable—from 10 cents a pound and 20 per cent ad valorem. I hope the Minister of Finance will not entirely destroy this industry by such a tremendous drop, but will kill it somewhat gradually, if he has decided to destroy it. I trust, however, he will see his way clear to giving at least a specific duty of 5 cents a pound, it having been 10 cents before. It seems to me this is one of the most remarkable changes that has been made in the whole tariff. I fail to see why the manufacturers of cloth should be restored 5 cents per pound duty and 25 per cent, and the article of yarn left simply with an ad valorem duty. I am one of those who believe that a strict ad valorem duty is not a protection. If you want to protect an article—and we have decided upon the policy of protection—we must add in these low-priced goods something of a specific duty. The woollen industry throughout the country was referred to by the Minister of Finance this afternoon. It is a very important industry; it is scattered all over the country. These men are buying wool from the farmer, and they are doing an important work in the country, employing a great deal of labour. It is desirable that these industries should have ample protection in order that they may do their business profitably and be able successfully to compete with foreign manufacturers. I hope the Minister of Finance will see his way clear to make a change in this item to the extent, at least, of 5 cents a pound and 25 per cent ad valorem.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Perhaps it would be as well. It is highly desirable that the last flimsy rag of appearing to consult the consumers should be removed, and for that reason I would be rather inclined to support my hon. friend opposite in saying that after what you have done you need not stick at so trifling a thing as this. It is better on the whole that the public should understand that the consumer or the producer in Canada is not going to get any consideration at all from the hon. gentleman, and that even these little trifling benefactions which he was throwing out to them in the early part of the session are going to disappear. Therefore I think there is a great deal in what the hon. gentleman has said.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Even if I were a protectionist I would say 20 per cent was a very extravagant amount of protection. If I were to come down with a proposition asking that the cost of manufacture should be paid out of the public treasury, I would not make a more extravagant proposition than the Minister of Finance is making at this moment, 30 per cent will far more than pay the manufacturer the wages required for the conversion of wool into yarn. Yet the hon. gentleman proposes to ask for something more. The Finance Minister has submitted a proposition that is equivalent to asking the House to pay the cost of combing and spinning this wool into yarn out of the public treasury. If this were all, he would not ask 30 per cent of the merchantable value of the imported article, yet that is what he is doing. He has proposed that the people who purchase the yarn shall pay the whole cost of spinning, in addition to the merchantable price of the article, but with that proposition the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Henderson) is not satisfied, and he asks Parliament to make a further appropriation for the conversion of wool into woollen yarn. There is nothing that will surprise any member of this House after such a declaration has been made. These parties are not satisfied with having the whole of their employees' bills paid, that proposition is not enough. It is declared that if that is done, if Parliament pays the employees for carding, combing, and spinning the yarn, that is not sufficient, and the people want protection, encouragement, something more. But the ninety-nine men out of one hundred in the country who form the consuming class are of no consequence. The parties of consequence are those who choose to invest their money in carding mills and spinning machinery, and the Government should pay their labourers' bills and do something more, and then give them a fair market price for the article besides.

Mr. HENDERSON. I am afraid the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) never ran a woollen mill, otherwise he would probably possess a more familiar acquaintance with the profits on yarn than he has displayed. There are yarns manufactured in England and imported into this country at as low a price as 5 cents per pound. A protection of 30 per cent on these is very small indeed, not more than 1½ cents per pound. When we take into consideration the value of money, the difference in the price of labour, the greater opportunities and facilities they enjoy in England for purchasing wool or stock used for the yarn, we can readily understand that it is impossible for Canadian manufacturers to compete with British manufacturers in yarn of this kind. It is necessary in any line of business that the Canadian manufacturer should be able to produce low-priced articles as well as high-priced articles, in order to compete with the importations from other countries, and it is more particularly in the interest of the low-priced goods that I ask this additional protection to be given. On high-priced goods I grant the protection might be ample, but in order to enable our manufacturers to compete with low-priced goods imported, and I will say not to compete with those goods, but to keep those goods out of the country in order that they may not destroy our markets, it is in the interests of the people to have a high duty imposed—in fact, a prohibitive duty might be very advantageous. The duty I speak of would probably be prohibitive, but even if it were made prohibitive on these low-priced goods, I do not think it would injure this country. I fear that great injury is being done, because cheap German and British goods will take the place of cheap tweeds and woollen goods manufactured here. Never have we had such excellent goods and cheap goods as have been produced during the past few years in our own Canadian factories, and I only fear that the Government have made a mistake in interfering with the specific duties on woollen goods, and that they are opening the door to cheap foreign goods, which will be sold as substitutes for the good cloths which our Canadian mills are producing, and that it may prove to be a god-send to the shoddy peddler. I trust that will not be the case. I trust also that in this matter of yarn the Finance Minister will further consider the matter, that he will not allow the item to go through to-night, but will reserve it until Monday, and that he will then have decided to give the additional protection which I think is necessary in order to keep cheap German and English yarns out of the country and protect the Canadian manufacturer.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell.) We now see why the Finance Minister has not been able to go on with the tariff, we now understand the cause of the delay. The Finance Minister tried to-day to cast the responsibility for delay on the shoulders of the Opposition, but the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Henderson) has shown where the difficulty lies. The hon. member is not satisfied with the tariff, and he asks for further time in order that the Finance Minister may have an opportunity to change his mind. So the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Henderson) at all events, does not think we are getting on too slowly, but too quickly, and that we should pause and not deal with this item until Monday, and before then he hopes the mind of the Finance Minister will have shown some signs of improvement. I thought shoddy was elsewhere dealt with and that it did not come under this particular item, and it is rather remarkable that after supporting a proposition to increase the duties in order to promote and encourage the manufacture of shoddy here, the hon. gentleman should now undertake to propose an alteration in the tariff which he says will exclude shoddy yarns. Of course it is not the interest of the consumer that the hon. gentleman is considering. If he had any regard for the consumer he would discourage the manufacture of shoddy goods. During this session propositions have been submitted to prevent the importation of oleomargarine and half a dozen other articles, because it was said they came into competition with genuine articles, but when the hon. gentleman proposes to discourage the use of shoddy it is only foreign shoddy to which he is opposed. It is all right if the Canadian manufacturer produces from the rags picked, goods that you can run your finger through, so long as the manufacturer gets his price; the interest of the consumer is of no consequence. But in the case of foreign yarns coming into competition with good worsted yarns produced here, the hon. gentleman said, put on the duty to exclude those yarns, although it would have the effect of excluding excellent articles produced abroad. The hon. gentleman began his observation by a reference to the importance of protecting worsted yarns, because they furnished a market for the wool produced in this country. What greater convenience can the manufacturer have than getting it produced in his own neighbourhood? Cheap worsted wools and yarn are produced in England from the wool grown on the sheep in the United Kingdom, and in that respect the English manufacturer and the Canadian manufacturer stand on an equality. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Henderson) having been promised 12½ per cent more than the cost of spinning these yarns, ought to be satisfied with that instead of asking the Minister of Finance to put further burdens on those who are obliged to consume them.

Mr. HENDERSON. I am not asking this protection in the interest of the manufacturer alone. I believe it is our duty to protect the consumer against inferior articles, and in that interest I ask for it as well.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell.) You did not do that in the case of shoddy goods?

Mr. HENDERSON. Yes. I make this request to protect the people of this country against an imposition which is often perpetrated of offering inducements to purchase goods that are really not of any value. I think it would be a blessing to the people of this country if that class of goods were excluded altogether, and in the interest of the consuming classes. I ask the Minister of Finance to consider this matter and give a larger amount of protection against that class of goods than he proposes to do.

Mr. FOSTER. If anything would move me it would be the persuasive eloquence of my hon. friend (Mr. Henderson). I shall, however, have to say to him, that we have given thorough consideration to this matter and the duty of 30 per cent on yarns seems to be a reasonable protection.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. There is one curious thing about this, and that is: the more you protect, the bigger importations we have in the matter of woollens. Last year, according to the Trade and Navigation Returns, we imported $11,000,000 worth of woollens, which I think is the largest importation that we have. It seems to me that in all this business the hon. gentleman is endeavouring to make water run up hill, and that the consequence of the enormous taxes he has laid upon the people of this country, in their indirect operation, are such as to make manufacturing unnecessarily expensive. I believe the hon. gentleman (Mr. Henderson) is not altogether wrong in saying that it is entirely impossible in a great many of these cases for the Canadian manufacturer to manufacture these woollen goods as well as he did under a moderate tariff. There is no doubt that this exorbitant and outrageous tariff does strike indirectly at a great many of these manufactures. It undoubtedly adds to the cost of production in a great number of ways, and the fact that we should have imported $11,000,000 worth of woollen goods is a pretty clear proof of the utter folly of the attempts the hon. gentleman is making to encourage certain classes of these manufactures in Canada. The only thing he has succeeded in doing, and the only thing he can succeed in doing, is to add enormously to the taxes of the people of this country. It is a curious illustration of the results of excessive protection defeating itself.

Item agreed to.

Clothing, ready-made and wearing apparel of every description composed wholly or in part of wool, worsted, the hair of the alpaca goat or other like animal, n.o.p., five cents per pound and thirty per cent ad valorem.

Mr. FOSTER. This is simply giving to the ready-made clothing 5 per cent for the manufacturing. The cloth is 5 cents and 25 per cent, and the clothing is 5 cents and 30 per cent. I think that is very moderate.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. There is no possibility of reconciling our ideas of moderation with those of the hon. gentleman.

Mr. FOSTER. The boards of trade both of Toronto and Montreal asked that 10 per cent be made the difference between the material and the ready-made clothing.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). How do you reconcile that with the duty on yarns, because this is a very partial manufacturing operation. The hon. gentleman has made yarns 30 per cent, and according to the rule he has now mentioned, that the amount of labour and capital expended should be taken into consideration in fixing the amount of duty, the yarn should be lower.

Mr. FOSTER. It is just the opposite, because if the hon. gentleman will look into the matter he will find that the major part of the expense of investment and labour is on the making of the wool into yarn.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The dressing, dyeing and finishing of the cloth takes place after it is made into yarn.

Mr. FOSTER. As far as investment and labour goes, the weaving of the cloth is not so great.

Item agreed to.

Shirts, n.e.s., 35 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. FOSTER. The proposition was 25 per cent, which of course is less than the material out of which the shirts are made. This applies to shirts costing less than $3 per dozen.

Item agreed to.

Window shades in the piece, or cut and hemmed, 35 per cent, but not less than 5 cents per square yard.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What may the value of these be per square yard?

Mr. FOSTER. The range of prices is from 12½ to 20 cents.

Mr. MULOCK. So that a window-shade worth 12½ cents will have a protection of 40 per cent?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes; a very, very cheap shade.

Mr. MULOCK. That is a very high protection on a very cheap shade.

Mr. WALLACE. That is not a normal price; it is a slaughter price.

Mr. MULOCK. It is the class of shades that goes into the houses of the poor. The duty may amount to 50 per cent. I would ask the Minister if he would reconsider that, and make it reasonable.

Mr. FOSTER. I think this is reasonable.

Mr. MULOCK. The Minister reminds me of a character in Dickens' "Christmas Carol"—Marly, who had had no bowels, so that it was said you could see the buttons through his body. That was made perfectly clear on his death, because a spirit came one day, in a fog—just as I suppose the Minister is now—and there was a doubt whether it could be Marly at all; and it was decided that it was, because it was quite clear that he was devoid of bowels, it being possible to see the buttons through his body.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Does that come under window shades?

Mr. MULOCK. Yes, because the Minister has no bowels for the poor, but thinks that 40 per cent is a perfectly reasonable rate of taxation to impose upon them.

Item agreed to.

Two-ply and three-ply ingrain carpets of which the warp is composed wholly of cotton or other material than wool, worsted, the hair of the alpaca goat or other like animal, 3 cents per square yard and 25 per cent ad valorem.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What does that amount to ad valorem?

Mr. WALLACE. Thirty-two and a half per cent on a 40 cent carpet, 33 $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent on a 36 cent carpet, and 31 per cent on a 50 cent carpet.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What on a 30 cent carpet?

Mr. WALLACE. On a 30 cent carpet, if there were such a thing, it would be 35 per cent.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Curious enough—and it certainly sheds some light on the success of the hon. gentleman's methods—I was looking up the total amount of our woollen imports in 1878, and I find that all we imported under a 17 $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent tariff were just about eight and a half millions.

Mr. FOSTER. The people were not able to buy them then.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. They were a great deal better able to buy them then than they are to-day. I am perhaps better aware than the hon. gentleman that in a comparatively few isolated spots and in some cities there was some distress, owing to the world-wide depression that prevailed from 1874 to 1878; but I say here deliberately and with knowledge—and any man who has any acquaintance with the condition of the farming population and the value of lands in Ontario knows, whether he chooses to admit it or not—that the condition of the vast mass of the agriculturists of Canada was very greatly better in 1878 than it is to-day. Their lands were very much more valuable, their profits were very much greater, the annual amount which it was possible for them to expend in purchasing articles of general utility, was very much larger than it is to-day—quite double, if not more than double. There is no doubt whatever that the condition of the vast mass of our people has been far worse during the last fifteen years than it was during the whole period from confederation up to 1878. If the hon. gentleman disputes that, he has only to consult the officials of the various granges and agricultural associations throughout Canada to find that they fully confirm the position I take, that the value of their farms has depreciated immensely, that the value of the products of their farms has depreciated immensely, that the agricultural population throughout the older provinces at any rate, has come to a standstill. Why, Sir, in our time the rural population was increasing in Ontario, at a rate something like twenty-fold as fast as they have increased since, as the records of the various municipalities of Canada abundantly show. But it is a curious fact that the whole result of all this tampering with and petting of the woollen industry, has been that we are to-day importing several millions more of woollen goods than we were before. I believe the reason is largely because the system is utterly and radically false, and because what he gives with one hand he practically takes away with the other. There is no doubt whatever that the operation of this system is largely to increase the cost of production, even to the most favoured manufacturers.

Item agreed to.

Treble ingrain three-ply and two-ply carpets composed wholly of wool, 5 cents per square yard and 25 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. MULOCK. What is the value of that quality of carpets?

Mr. WALLACE. Sixty to seventy cents, 65 on the average.

Mr. MULOCK. As low as 50 cents?

Mr. WALLACE. No.

Mr. MULOCK. That is the manufacturer's price, is it not?

Mr. WALLACE. Yes.

Item agreed to.

Women's and children's dress goods, coat linings, Italian cloths, alpacas, orleans, cashmeres, henriettas, serges, buntings, nun's cloth, bengalines, whip cords, twills, plains or jasquards of similar fabrics, composed wholly or in part of wool, worsted, the hair of the camel, alpaca goat, or like animal, not exceeding in weight six ounces to the square yard, when imported in the gray or unfinished state for the purpose of being dyed or finished in Canada, under such regulations as are established by the Governor in Council, 22 $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent ad valorem.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I do not think that has occurred before in our tariff. What is the reason?

Mr. FOSTER. When these goods are finished they are dutiable at 30 per cent, and it allows them to be brought in in the gray at 22 $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent, so that they may be dyed in this country.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). But you cannot make a fast colour here.

Mr. FOSTER. You can make colours just as fast and as bright here as they make them in the old country. There is an establishment in Toronto which has learned the business by actual experiment and practice in the old country, and the parties have been successful in their dyeing. This adds nothing to the price the consumer has to pay. For the finished goods that are brought in, the duty is 30 per cent.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It might cost a great deal to the revenue.

Mr. FOSTER. If it were successful it might cost something to the revenue.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. And therefore to the consumer, because that loss of revenue must be made up from other quarters.

Mr. FOSTER. But it will also add to the number of hands employed. In the old country those two operations are generally carried on in separate establishments. The dyeing is one thing, and the making is another.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I should like to know the number of people that are employed in any of these dyeing establishments at present. This half-and-half sort of affair does not strike my mind favourably. All through our tariff there are cases in which we allow goods very nearly manufactured to be brought in on somewhat similar terms; and for the sake of employing a very small number of hands, either the revenue loses or a heavy tax is inflicted on the consumer, as the case may be. Now, I have very grave doubts myself as to whether it is possible for our people here to dye as well as they do in England. I believe that we can manufacture a very fair quality of tweed and certain articles of that kind, but I have never seen a single case in which the dyeing was at all equal to the English dyeing, and I greatly doubt whether the thing can be done. I greatly doubt whether our climate is at all as favourable for that operation as the English climate. In any case I would like to know what the number of hands employed in these dyeing factories may be.

Mr. FOSTER. This is largely an experiment. This system of dyeing in fast dyes has been established in Toronto within the last year. Of course, having no margin as far as duties were concerned, but very small progress was made, and the object of this is experimental to a large extent, in order to ascertain whether this operation can be successfully carried on in this country. The experiment of last year seems to prove that it can be successful, and larger importations will constantly take place. This gives a margin sufficient for the dyeing and the finishing, but none too great for that. If it is not successful, if these fast colours and bright colours cannot be imparted, then, of course, the importations will not amount to very much.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I remember seeing a discussion on this subject in some of our newspapers a few years ago. It was there stated that there had been no success in making perfectly fast colours in woollen goods on this side of the Atlantic, and I think the reason stated was that certain qualities were wanting in the water on this side of the Atlantic which would always make that operation unsuccessful so far as the eastern states and the British provinces were concerned. It was also stated that there was a certain rock formation, I think, somewhere on the Georgian Bay where waters similar to those found in the west of England might be had, and where, possibly, fast colours might be obtained by dyeing there. On account of chemical reasons, which were stated, water of a peculiar quality is an indispensable requisite. There are also required certain conditions with regard to light that cannot always be had here. I suppose the hon. gentleman is aware that in the manufacture of the finer varieties of woollen goods, with the same workmen, the same machinery, the same appliances and the same raw material, they have been unable to spin the same number of yards of thread from a pound of wool in the New England states, that can be spun in the west of England. I have seen it stated that except in certain portions of British Columbia, and near the coast, where the necessary atmospheric conditions and rainfall can be had, there is no portion of North America where the same conditions can be had for producing fine goods from fine wools, that exists in the United Kingdom. Why, Sir, in the case of the manufacture of worsted, there are certain worsted goods manufactured in Bradford that, I understand, are sent to France to be dyed in order that they may be given the exact shade desired. I must say that I have never seen any Canadian woollen goods of perfectly fast colours yet produced.

Mr. FOSTER.

Mr. FOSTER. But they are produced I think.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I understand that the hon. gentlemen are going to construct a canal through the Trent Valley with all possible expedition. They might extend it to Georgian Bay and bring water down that way.

Item agreed to.

Cocoa paste and chocolate, and other preparations of cocoa, 4 cents per pound.

Mr. FOSTER. There was a change made in the confectioners' chocolate, and I want to add another article which is used by the confectioners namely, "cocoa butter."

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Why do you strike out your original proposition—other preparations of cocoa?

Mr. FOSTER. The two are distinct. One is used for the coatings of confectionery, and the other is the preparation for drinking. The whole of them were 25 per cent. That made too heavy a duty upon the confectioners' coverings.

Item agreed to.

Slates, roofing slate, when split or dressed only; also slate pencils and school or writing slates, 20 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. FOSTER. I want to add "roofing slate, not to exceed 75 cents per square, for black or blue slate." This change is in order to prevent the duties from running too high.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Do you mean the 30 per cent duty must not exceed 75 cents on the square ?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. WALLACE. It was 80 cents before.

Item agreed to.

Steel rails weighing not less than 45 lbs. per lineal yard for use in railway tracks. Free.

But this shall not extend to railways for private purposes, nor extend to rails not intended to be used in the common carrying of goods or passengers, nor shall it extend to rails to be used on street railways or tramways.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). If a railway company lays a track to a gravel pit, I presume it will have to pay duty on the rails. How is the Government going to distinguish in these cases ?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. A railway constructed for the purposes of a common carrier will get its rails in free, although practically the rails would not in the instance cited be used for carrying purposes.

Mr. FOSTER. The item will be printed, and if there is any amendment to make, it can be made by the committee.

Item agreed to.

Mining and smelting machinery imported prior to the sixteenth day of May, 1896, which is at the time of its importation of a class or kind not manufactured in Canada. Free.

Mr. MARA. When the Government in 1890 decided that mining machinery not made in Canada should be placed on the free list, the Minister of Finance stated that the object was to encourage the mining industry by offering the freest market for procuring the most modern machinery, and he also stated that the most liberal construction would be placed upon the wording of the Act. So far as British Columbia is concerned I am sorry to say that the benefits that were expected have not been realized. We feel that a liberal construction has not been placed on that Act in many cases; instead of a free and liberal construction, we feel that a harsh and restricted interpretation has been placed upon the Act, that it has not stimulated the development of our mines and only to a limited extent have we been afforded a free market for the purchase of modern mining machinery. From a return laid before the House a few days ago, I find that during the three years, 1891, 1892, 1893, the total value of mining machinery admitted into Canada free of duty was $227,488, of which $79,847 was received by Ontario, $55,909 by Quebec, $53,081 by Nova Scotia, $46,043 by New Brunswick, $20,425 by Manitoba, and only $16,199 by British Columbia. I believe a considerable portion of the machinery credited to Manitoba was entered for British Columbia, but even taking the whole it only amounts to $36,000, or an average of $12,000 a year. I am not in a position to state how many applications were made during those years, but from the many communications I have received. I am satisfied that the machinery admitted free of duty was small compared with the applications made. I believe at the time it was the intention of the Government to place a liberal construction on that Act, but difficulties arose in interpreting it, and unfortunately I think the Government applied to the manufacturers to provide them with a list of mining machinery made in Canada. In that list they enumerated almost every article of mining machinery under the sun. For instance, take concentrating machinery for iron and other metals. I am informed that in the Dominion there is no foundry or manufactory that can or has made complete concentrating machinery for the treatment of gold, silver, and copper ore. It is true they have manufactured such machinery that will treat iron ore, but none that will treat the precious metals; but this list, which was placed in the hands of the collectors, and is an instruction to them and is for their guidance, covers concentrating machinery for the precious as well as the base metals. That the view I now present is not an exaggerated one will be apparent to the committee from the proceedings of the Quebec Mining Association. I find that in the eastern provinces mining men have had the same difficulties to contend with that we have experienced, but they are fortunate in the fact that they are nearer the capital. They can get the ear of the Controller of Customs, their grievances can be more easily made known to him than ours at a distance of 2,500 or 3,000 miles, and their difficulties are more easily adjusted. At this late hour I feel it almost necessary to apologise for reading extracts or quotations, but I will make them as brief as possible, and I only do it to make the point I wish to emphasize that this grievance is felt all over the country, and in British Columbia there is at the present time no more important question than that of having mining machinery admitted free. At the adjourned meeting of the annual general meeting of the Mining Association of the province of Quebec, Mr. Bell, the secretary, stated :

One of the resolutions left over from the annual meeting yesterday was that relating to the Customs tariff on mining machinery. As you know, the Dominion Government, with the object of encouraging the mining industry, amended the tariff in 1890 so as to admit the machinery for mining purposes of such class or kind as is not manufactured in the Dominion free of duty. The period was three years, and it expires next month. The Government have renewed the provision until May 1896. The Act is in the main liberal, but difficulty seems to have been experienced in its interpretation by the collectors at some of the ports of entry. While in several districts no difficulty has been experienced in passing mining machinery free of duty, at others the duty has been imposed on machinery which distinctly was not made in Canada. The collectors seemingly were not instructed what class and kind of machinery should come in duty free. It has been thought that some representations might be made to the Government on the subject.

CAPT. R. C. ADAMS.—This is one of the questions I desired to speak about. As it is the law is a perfect farce. I inquired when in British Columbia, how it worked there and found that it created a great deal of bother. An importer brought in some piece of machinery which the collector often held for duty pending investigation, and then as likely as not some country blacksmith was found to claim that he could manufacture the machinery.

Mr. J. BURLEY SMITH.—The mining industry is quite as important, if not more so, than any of our other industries, and it seems to me an unwise policy to hamper its developments by any tariff restrictions. At present we are only partially relieved of the duty. I refer to the stipulation in this Act whereby only machinery that is not manufactured in Canada shall be admitted duty free. It opens a question as to what machinery is free. For instance, while rock drills as a class are manufactured in Canada, only two particular kinds are made—the Rand and Ingersoll. Yet in Europe, at the present moment, there are actually 34 distinct types of rock drilling machines, some of which contain improvements which were not even dreamt of at the time the Rand and Ingersoll Sergeant were patented. Now does the law permit me to import any of those other kinds of drills, duty free?

Mr. B. T. A. BELL.—Certainly; I do not think there can be any doubt about it. The Government provides you with a form of declaration in which you simply swear that the machine you are importing is of a class and kind not manufactured in this country, and the collector is bound to pass it. The law is good enough of itself; it is its operation at some of the ports of entry that is defective.

Mr. W. H. IRWIN.—Mr. Bell's conclusion is that the Act is liberal. The experience of my company has been different. The meaning of the Act is vague and ambiguous—it is so loosely worded that almost anything we use in asbestos mining can be construed by the collectors to be either directly or indirectly manufactured in Canada. Can Mr. Bell tell me just what machinery can be brought in free under this Act.

Mr. B. T. A. BELL.—That would be a big contract. The whole essence of the Act lies in the words "class or kind." For instance, rock breakers as a class are made in Canada, but the types known as the "Forster," "Wiswell," "Cyclone," and numerous other kinds of crushers are not manufactured. Then we are entitled beyond a peradventure to bring in these free. The same applies to pumps, and all the various kinds of specialities not manufactured here. The Department evidently is not posted on the details of the subject.

Mr. JOHN E. HARDMAN, Halifax, said he had had considerable experience in the operations of the Act, particularly with reference to the importation of machinery for gold mining. At first they had found some difficulty in getting the collectors to arrive at a proper interpretation of the meaning of the Act. As an example, copper plates were admitted free of duty, but when silvered for amalgamating purposes, the Government in order to protect the few silver plating works—two as a matter of fact had no bath large enough to take in these plates—charged the duty. Representations were made by the Gold Miners' Association, with the result that a clear understanding now existed in Halifax, and there was comparatively little difficulty now in getting free entry for machinery. In every case, where the form of declaration had been filled in, the importer never failed to get his machinery in free of duty.

Mr. W. H. IRWIN.—Unfortunately our experience at the port of Sherbrooke has been very different.

Mr. HARDMAN.—In Nova Scotia we have no fault to find with the Act

Then a committee was appointed to wait on the Controller of Customs and at that interview, Mr. Franchot, who introduced the deputation, addressing the Controller, made the following statement:—

We have come to see you, sir, as representatives of the General Mining Association of the province of Quebec, regarding the present law relating to the importation of mining machinery. As you are aware the Act admits free of duty, all mining machinery of a class or kind not manufactured in the Dominion. The law in itself, as at present is perfectly satisfactory, but its interpretation by some of the collectors has not been satisfactory.

There are several other extracts that I had intended to read, all of which are in the same direction, but at this late hour I am rather afraid that I might tire the patience of the House. It occurred to me that there are three plans by which we might get over the difficulty. One is: To ask that all mining machinery be admitted free, but in interviews which the British Columbia members had with the Minister of Finance, we were clearly told that the Government could not permit that, and I am free to admit that there are many objections to it. One is: That it would be almost impossible to define what is mining machinery. A hammer or a saw would be entitled to free entry just as much as a boiler; or a pick or shovel as a steam engine. I can also see where it would be difficult to arrange this, because the local merchant or trader would have to pay the duties on everything he kept in stock, while the mining man, by making a declaration, would be able to get the same articles in free of duty, and that would not work. Another course that suggested itself to my mind was that mining machinery that is not manufactured within the province where it is to be used should be admitted free; but that is objected to also, on account of sectionalism. Then a third plan suggested itself, and that is, to append a list of articles of mining machinery that will be useful in the development of gold or silver and copper mines. I have made out a list of this machinery which I intend to submit to the committee and to ask them whether it would not be advisable to amend the item as it stands at present by adding these articles. I have placed on this list, "The Bridgeman ore sampling machine," a machine that is not made in Canada, but is suitable for prospecting and developing mines not already open. Also, "All concentrating, refining, and amalgamating machinery and appliances for the treatment of gold, silver and copper ores." I may state that none of these are manufactured in Canada, and I suggest that they should be made free.

Mr. WALLACE. Are there none of the ore sampling machines made in Canada?

Mr. MARA. From the best information I can obtain, I believe that no machines for sampling galena or gold quartz ore are made in Canada. Then there is the "Tremaine stamp mill," a small and cheap machine which is very useful; also, "Forster's ore breakers," which are peculiarly adapted to gold mining, and which have introduced many economies in the treatment of ores. That is not made here. Then there are "Water jacket furnaces for galena and silver ores," none of which are made here. I believe there is a furnace for copper ore manufactured in Sherbrooke, but none for galena or gold ores. Then, again, "Root's patent spiral rivetted water pipe, and all special lines of piping, manufactured for hydraulicing, and steel plates and rivets used in the manufacture of hydraulic pipes." My object in putting steel plates and rivets used in the manufacture of hydraulic pipes on the list is this: That it would be unfair to admit all piping free of duty, and not admit the raw material. In British Columbia considerable hydraulic piping has been manufactured, and the manufacturers, I am informed, are not afraid of competition if they can get the raw material, the plates and rivets admitted free of duty. I have also put on this list, "Hydraulic motors, Bleichert, Hallidies and Lidgerwood wire rope, tramways and cableways, and diamond prospecting drills." Now, it is unnecessary for me at present to go over the arguments that have been advanced from time to time in this House in favour of admitting mining machinery free. The justice of that was conceded three or four years ago, when the Government placed mining machinery of a class or kind not manufactured in the Dominion of Canada, on the free list. But I will state this: that at no time in the history of British Columbia will the enlargement of the free mining list be of as great service to our province as to-day. In the Kootenay country, in the Tead Mountain, Slocan and Ainsworth districts, the mines are past the prospecting stage; many of them are developed, and I am happy to say are shipping ores. During the last winter over 3,000 tons of ore were hauled on the snow and shipped to American smelters at a cost of from $25 to $40 a ton. This year, when railways will tap that section of country, I believe that shipments will increase tenfold. To illustrate the value of some of these mines I will give the returns from a few of the companies. The Mountain Chief Company shipped over 300 tons, averaging 130 ozs. in silver, and 70 per cent lead; the Blue Bird Company shipped 300 tons, averaging 134 ozs. in silver and 71 per cent lead; the Noble Five Company shipped 350 tons, averaging 150 ozs. in silver and 69 per cent lead; the Dardanelles Company shipped 150 tons, ranging from 284 to 322 ozs. in silver, and from 26 to 30 per cent lead. Of course, these mines shipped only what is called shipping ore, in many case hand-picked; but for one ton of shipping ore now in sight in these claims, there are 100 tons of concentrating ore. In one claim, the Slocan Star Mine, there have already been proved to be over 12,000 tons of concentrating ore. When we have such valuable deposits of concentrating ore in this Slocan district, I think it is the duty of the Government to assist in every possible way the development of these mines by admitting mining machinery free. When we find that $227,488 worth of mining machinery was admitted free of duty in the last three years, we can see that the manufacturers on the one hand have not been injured, nor on the other hand has the revenue suffered to any great extent. We may reasonably assume that of this amount a large proportion would not have been imported if mining machinery had not been on the free list. I submit to the committee this proposition, for which I ask a favourable consideration, namely, to add the following articles, without restriction or limitation, to the free list:—

The Bridgman ore sampling machine.

All concentrating, refining and amalgamating machinery and appliances for the treatment of gold, silver and copper ores.

Huntingdon's centrifugal roller quartz mill for gold and silver ores.

The Tremaine stamp mill.

Forster's ore breakers.

Water Jacket furnaces for galena and silver ores.

Root's patent spiral rivetted water pipe, and all special lines of piping manufactured for hydraulicing. And steel plates and rivets used in the manufacture of hydraulic pipes.

Hydraulic monitors.

Bleichert, Hallidies and Lidgerwood wire rope, tramways and cableways.

Diamond prospecting drills.

Mr. IVES. Do you claim that wire rope is not made in Canada?

Mr. MARA. Wire rope is made in Canada, but there are aerial tramways suited for mountain districts that are not made in Canada, and no mountain company would purchase an aerial tramway made in Canada when they can get one that is peculiarly suited for their work.

Mr. IVES. Are not diamond prospecting drills made in Canada?

Mr. MARA. Some are, but there are modern inventions for prospecting that are not made in Canada. Only a short time ago one was imported, and the party who imported it would not have gone to Chicago if he could have got what he wanted in Canada.

Mr. WALLACE. The Government's policy has been to put the most liberal construction on the item in the tariff, admitting free mining machinery of a kind or class not manufactured in Canada, while, of course, safe-guarding the revenue as much as possible. There are a great many implements used in mining operations which, of course, are made in Canada, and upon which a duty has to be levied if they are imported. For instance, steam engines are required for operations at the mines, and those steam engines of almost every class and character are made in Canada, and are dutiable if imported, and I believe they can be made as cheaply in Canada as in almost any other country. Then, all such implements as picks, shovels and spades are of course made here. Of the articles which the hon. gentleman has mentioned, a large proportion will, I think, come in free of duty; for instance, ore sampling machines, concentrating and amalgamating machinery, stamp mills, ore breakers and water jacket furnaces; these are not made in Canada, I think. But when it comes to piping and articles of that kind that are made in Canada, and which can be made probably of a superior kind, that would be in contravention of the Act as it now stands.

Mr. MARA. Is there any hydraulic piping made in Eastern Canada?

Mr. WALLACE. It would be more likely to be made in British Columbia, because that is the place it would be in demand. The department has decided, on the advice of the Department of Justice, that the machinery for extracting ore from the rock will be correctly classified as mining machinery. Also the machinery that conveys the ore to the surface, and also the machinery for treating it when it arrives. Those three classes of machinery having been declared free, under this clause as mining machinery, I think a very liberal construction has been placed on the Act; and the fact that, during those three years, a quarter of a million dollars worth of machinery has been imported, and last year about $88,000 worth, shows that mining operations are being more vigorously prosecuted and that advantage has been taken of this free importation.

Mr. FOSTER. I would suggest to the hon. gentleman whether the amendment he proposes would not tend to narrow the scope of the resolution. I would suggest to my hon. friend that he could have the very same certainty, with out narrowing at all the application of the free clause, if the Controller of Customs would make a list of those items of machinery, as to which there is no doubt, and some of which the hon. gentleman has mentioned in his amendment, and forward such list to the different collectors. This list would include all those articles which it is certain are not made in the country and be forwarded to the different collectors, so that the instructions to the collectors would be positive and not negative, and whenever a piece of machinery of the kind mentioned was imported, the collector could be in no doubt as to its right to free entry. The hon. gentleman would gain everything he desires to gain, and would not narrow the scope of the resolution by attempting to define, in the law itself, the particular articles which it covers. I think the Controller of Customs would have no objections at all to make out a list and if the hon. gentleman will submit any others that are used in his portion of the country, the Controller could go into the matter with him, and arrive at a positive list of those which could be admitted free.

Mr. MARA. My object was not in any way to limit the scope of the free admission of mining machinery, but rather to let the miner and the capitalist see at a glance that the articles I have enumerated would be admitted free of duty. The trouble heretofore has been that a list was furnished to the collector which was issued by the manufacturer, and that list was so cunningly worded that it covered nearly every article of mining machinery made. When an application was made for free entry, the collector would refer to this list, and ten to one he would find in it an article of the class, but not of the kind which the importer wished to pass free of duty. I therefore thought that by making out a list, the miner could see at once what machinery he could bring in free of duty and so would the capitalist, and both would be saved the uncertainty and expense they have been subjected to in the past. However, if the Government will allow a list to be sent to the different collectors, embracing all classes of mining machinery, not made in Canada, and substitute that list for the present one, I think the proposition is better than mine and would most gladly withdraw my amendment.

Mr. WALLACE. Why not send both?

Mr. MARA. The present list is misleading. For instance, it says in one case machinery for iron and other minerals. If that means anything at all, it means all other minerals.

Mr. FOSTER. A positive list would be far more satisfactory.

Mr. IVES. Would you not meet with this further difficulty, if you mentioned the machines made by these particular makers. This tariff is made, I hope, for a good many years to come, and you will simply have the power to bring in these certain machines, whereas something a great deal better might be made by some other maker and this would be excluded.

Mr. MARA. I simply asked that these articles be added, without restricting or limiting, or in any way affecting the preceding paragraph, admitting mining machinery of all kinds, not manufactured in Canada.

Amendment withdrawn.

Committee rose, and reported progress.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to : and the House adjourned at 11.30 p.m.

Bill (No. 114) to incorporate the Colonial Mutual Life Association—(from the Senate).—(Mr. McKay.)

DOMINION GAS AND ELECTRIC COMPANY.

House resolved itself into committee on Bill (No. 77) to incorporate the Dominion Gas and Electric Company.—(Mr. Boyd.)

(In the Committee.)

On section 9,

Mr. MARTIN. I would draw the attention of the committee, and also of the First Minister to the 9th clause of this Bill, which provides :

9. With the consent expressed by by-law of the municipal council having jurisdiction over the roads and streets of any city, town, village or municipality in Canada, and subject to such regulations, privileges, conditions, powers, rights and terms as are agreed upon between the council of any such city, town, village or municipality, and the company, the company may lay down pipes for the conveyance of gas under all or any of the roads, streets and public places of any such city, town, village or municipality, and supply gas through the same ; and may construct, erect, maintain and operate wires along the sides of and across or under any public highways, streets, public bridges, watercourses, or such other places in Canada and supply electric current thereby ; and may by its servants, agents and workmen enter upon any street, public road, public bridge, watercourse or highway, in any city, town, village or municipality, for the purpose of laying and maintaining such pipes and erecting and maintaining its wires along the sides of or across or under the same ; and may construct, erect and maintain such and so many poles or other works and devices as the company deems necessary for making, completing and supporting, using, working, and maintaining its pipes and systems, and may stretch wires on such poles ; and from time to time as often as the company, its agents, officers, or workmen think proper, may break up, dig, trench and open any part whatsoever of the said roads, streets, highways or watercourses.

This company is intended to carry on its operations in the province of Manitoba and also in certain specified places in the province of Ontario. So far as the province of Manitoba is concerned, the council of no city or town has any authority to give a gas company permission to lay down pipes upon the streets ; so that by this section we are attempting to give control of the streets for certain purposes to the council of a city or town. It occurs to me that the whole section is one which this Parliament should not pass, because, clearly, the control of the streets is vested in the Legislature of the province. In some respects the Legislature of Manitoba has given power to municipal councils to deal with the streets in certain ways by by-laws. For instance, it has given power to the city of Winnipeg to make by-laws in connection with the erection of telegraph and telephone poles upon the streets, but the Legislature has never parted with its control over the streets so far as the putting down of gas-pipes is concerned. It appears very clear that this Parliament has no power to say that any company shall put down gas-pipes upon the streets, and certainly it has no power to give any jurisdiction to a municipality, if that municipality has not already received authority from the Local Legislature with regard to a matter over which the Local Legislature has exclusive jurisdiction. For that reason, I would suggest that this whole clause is not a proper one for this Parliament to pass. It is dealing with a subject that is entirely within the control and jurisdiction of the Local Legislature, and it is a subject which can be very much better dealt with by the Manitoba Legislature than by this House. I do not wish to oppose the incorporation of the company in any way. I have no objection to the company being incorporated, but it appears to me that, having secured its incorporation, it should be left as any other company or any other individual to apply to the Local Legislature for any powers that it may desire with regard to tearing up the streets and laying down gas-pipes.

Mr. DALY. I notice that section 9 of this Bill says : "With the consent, expressed by by-law, of the municipal council having jurisdiction over the roads," and so on ; and subsection (p.) of section 593 of the Municipal

Act of Manitoba, the Revised Statutes, provides, amongst other things :

The council of every municipality may also pass by-laws, &c., for authorizing any corporate gas or water company to lay down pipes or conduits for the conveying of water or gas under streets or public squares, subject to such regulation as the council sees fit.

Mr. MARTIN. I was under the impression that that power had not been delegated by the Legislature of Manitoba, but, apparently, I was in error. However, I would point out that there is nothing to prevent the Legislature of Manitoba taking away that power to-morrow from the municipal councils; and we are undertaking here practically to give jurisdiction to a municipal council whether the Local Legislature give it or not. It may be that that is in force to-day, and it may be that next session the Local Legislature may take that power away from the municipal council. The reason I pointed this out is: that it is a matter entirely for local jurisdiction and the company can really get no power from this Parliament. It gives it no rights, then why should we undertake legislation of that kind? The jurisdiction must come from the Local Legislature, and if the municipal council has the power, as the hon. Minister points out by the section as they appear to have to grant the right to lay down pipes, then they can give to this company that power without any authority from this Parliament.

Mr. DALY. Section 9 reads: "With the consent expressed by by-law of the municipal council having jurisdiction"; so that it must have jurisdiction before it can pass the by-law.

Mr. MARTIN. It appears to me that it would be much better to strike out this clause, but, if it is intended to allow it to stand, I would ask that the following be added to it:—

Provided, however, that this Act shall not affect in any way, any rights, powers or privileges, heretofore conferred on any person or incorporated company, by any Act of the Legislatures of Manitoba or Ontario.

I may say that I have been communicated with by persons interested in the present gas company of Winnipeg, who claim that they have certain powers and privileges under their Acts of incorporation from the Local Legislature. I believe that there is a dispute as to that. They claim certain powers, and it is claimed as against that that their powers are not at all a monopoly. It does seem to me that it would be of no injury to this company, and would be a fair thing to do, to insert a clause of the kind I have mentioned protecting any rights that the others have. Of course if they have no rights there would be no harm done.

Mr. BOYD. As promoter of the Bill I must object to the clause the hon. gentleman proposes. I may say that the parties he refers to have no rights or monopoly as is proven by their charter. In their Act of incorporation, there is a clause which says :

Nothing in this Act contained shall be deemed to give the said company any exclusive right to supply any portion of the Territory aforesaid with gas or electricity; but notwithstanding anything contained in this Act, any other person or persons, body or bodies corporate, shall be entitled to acquire and exercise any similar powers to those hereby conferred as if this Act had not been passed, subject only to such limitations as shall be imposed by law.

They hold no monopoly, and I presume the parties referred to by the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) are the bondholders. I may say that I hold a communication from the secretary of the company and the directors, showing that the interest on the bonds held by these gentlemen is paid up, and they have no right to complain. The letter says :

OFFICE OF THE MANITOBA ELECTRIC AND GAS LIGHT COMPANY,
WINNIPEG, 10th May, 1894.

N. BOYD, Esq., M.P.,
House of Commons, Ottawa.

DEAR SIR.—At a meeting of the directors of the Manitoba Electric and Gas Light Company, held this day, the following resolution was passed:—

"The Bill incorporating the Dominion Gas and Electric Company, as the same passed the Private Bills Committee of the House of Commons, and as amended by such committee, having been examined by the directors of the Manitoba Electric and Gas Light Company, it is hereby resolved by such directors that no opposition be offered to the passing of said Bill by the House of Commons, it appearing therefrom that there is nothing contained in said Bill which in any way interferes with, affects, or prejudices the rights, powers or privileges of this company, and that the managing director of the company be authorized to forward a copy of this resolution to N. Boyd, M.P., at Ottawa, as a reply to his communication respecting the effect of said Bill upon this company's affairs."

Pursuant to the direction contained in the said resolution, I have the honour to communicate the same to you. I may add that a copy of the letter sent by Mr. Crane and Mr. McLean to the Hon. Mr. Martin, dated 27th April, was also considered by the directors, and I have been requested by the directors to say that the fear expressed by those gentlemen is quite groundless, and it has occurred to the directors that the action of those gentlemen is somewhat strange, in view of the fact that there are no arrears of interest on the bonds of the company, and there is no default in respect of the same.

Yours very truly,
WILLIAM BATHGATE,
Secretary-Treasurer.

In view of this letter, I object to the clause which the hon. member for Winnipeg proposes to add to the Bill.

Mr. MARTIN. If the company has no monopoly, my proposition cannot affect it.

I simply ask that it be subject to any powers, rights or privileges the bondholders may have. I do not propose to give them any.

Mr. BOYD. I can see no object in doing it.

Mr. MARTIN. So far as the resolution of the company is concerned, I understand that these bonds have been in default. If the interest has been paid, it has been done very recently. Under these circumstances, the bondholders have a very direct interest in the rights and privileges of the company. Of course, it is a matter entirely for the committee. I bring forward the resolution as requested by the bondholders, and if the committee wishes to vote it down, of course I cannot help it. I would move that the following words be added to this section:—

Provided, however, that this clause shall not affect in any way, any rights, powers or privileges heretofore conferred on any person or incorporated company by the Legislature of Manitoba or the Legislature of Ontario.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. As no notice has been given of that motion, it cannot be put.

On section 13,

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). It seems to me that this measure generally is one that falls within the jurisdiction of the province and not within the jurisdiction of this Legislature. I would again call the attention of the committee to the principle I referred to the other evening. I would ask its attention to subsection 16 of section 92 of the British North America Act, which says: "Generally all matters of a local or private nature in the province" are within the exclusive jurisdiction of that province. Now, is not this a matter of a merely local or private nature in the province? Look at the character and the object of the corporation. Then, in the concluding part of section 91 it is declared that "any matter coming within any of the classes of subjects enumerated in this section shall not be deemed to come within the class of matters of a local or private nature" comprised in the succeeding section. Now, I would ask the hon. gentleman who has charge of the Bill to look at any one of the twenty-nine enumerations in section 91, and say whether this measure comes within any of those enumerations. I do not think he can say so. If it does not it comes under subsection 16 of section 92, referring to matters under the exclusive jurisdiction of the province, and, therefore, it cannot be dealt with by this Legislature.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I understand this to be the case of a company upon whom powers have been conferred for doing business in several of the provinces and in the North-west Territories. Therefore, I think it differs from the class of cases as to which the hon. gentleman has raised the objection.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I ask the hon. gentleman to consider whether this corporation, when created, does not savour of realty, and whether it does not have a local habitat to which the rule 'lex loci rei sitae' would apply?

Bill reported.

CONSUMERS' CORDAGE CO.

Mr. ROSAMOND moved that the House resolve itself into Committee on Bill (No. 31) respecting the Consumers' Cordage Co.

Mr. LANGELIER. The company in question was incorporated in 1890 with a capital of one million dollars, and subsequently that capital was increased two million dollars, making a capital of three million dollars. The committee were told that the whole of the capital had been paid up, but it was impossible to find out how it had been paid up. The promoters of the Bill would never say how. And it is well the House should be informed of the way it has been paid up. The capital was not paid up in cash. We were told that it had been paid up in properties. Well, we have an instance in the city of Quebec of the way in which that capital was paid up. We had a large cordage factory there, at one time owned by Mr. Brown, and situated in the division of my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition. When the capital of this company was increased in 1891, Mr. Brown's cordage factory in Quebec was closed up and has been allowed to rot ever since. About a hundred people, who used to obtain employment in that factory for about 30 years, were thrown on the highway and had to leave the country. They are now to be found in the United States, or at all events they are out of Quebec. That is one of the results of the cordage combine. The incorporation of this company was made the means for forming the hugest combine in the Dominion. Instead of extending manufacturing operations and giving employment to more people, it used its corporate powers to close up factories. It has been stated here, without contradiction, that other factories have been closed up. What did that company do? The $2,000,000 capital which were authorized in 1891, were not issued to the general public, but to the original shareholders, and after having got that capital these original shareholders began to sell it to the public. It appears that they sold about $500,000 of it. That is to say, they got $500,000 good, hard cash for capital for which they had given absolutely nothing, and which they obtained through the duty on cordage and the charter they had succeeded in obtaining from the Government. Now they desire to be authorized to issue guaranteed stock for $1,000,000, and it was stated that they intended to give that stock, not to the general shareholders, but to those who got the capital. I would have opposed the Bill, had it not been amended as it has been. There was not a word in it to compel the company to give that new guaranteed stock to the bona fide shareholders who paid good money for their shares. The Bill now, however, is in proper shape, and that is the only reason why I do not oppose it. It offers a guarantee to those unfortunate shareholders who bought on the expectation that the duties on cordage would not be reduced, and whose prospects of dividends very much diminished by the reduction in the duty. They now stand a chance of getting reasonable dividends on their money. This Bill is only one instance out of many of the effects of the present tariff in the formation of combines and trusts.

Motion agreed. Bill considered in committee, reported, and read the third time and passed.

CANADIAN RAILWAY ACCIDENT INSURANCE COMPANY.

House resolved itself into committee on Bill (No. 36) to incorporate the Canadian Railway Accident Insurance Company.—(Sir James Grant.)

(In the Committee.)

On section 10,

Mr. EDGAR. I would like to call the attention of the leader of the House to one condition in this clause which is similar to that in another Bill which will come before this House, probably to-day. The hon. Minister will know nothing of the clause by reading it from the printed Bill; it is in the clause as it appears in the Bill in the hands of the Chairman that the difficulty arises. There is a provision here that the affairs of the company shall be managed by a board of not less than seven nor more than twenty directors, and that five shall be a quorum of the board. I think, Mr. Chairman, that is a very dangerous precedent for us to set. Of course, the promoters of the Bill claim that this is an exceptional case, that this is an insurance company, largely for the benefit of railway employees, and they wish to have a large board spread all over the country, of whom five may be a quorum, sitting at Ottawa for the transaction of business. If we make such a precedent in this case it will be hard to refuse a similar concession to others. If no provision was made in the Bill, this would come under the general law, which provides that when more than two persons are authorized to do an act, the majority may decide it. Of course, that is the rule we apply to the directors of limited liability companies, though in some cases the number is reduced. But I think that out of a possible board of twenty, five is altogether too small a quorum, and I would like the Minister of Justice to consider that matter, for I would not like to take the responsibility of having such a clause go through without the careful consideration of the House.

Mr. MONCRIEFF. This matter was very fully ventilated in the committee. It was represented that the stock of this company is to be widely distributed in small amounts—in fact, the shareholders are limited in the amount of stock they may hold—and it is expected that the stock will be subscribed from one end of the Dominion to the other. It is held to be desirable that men engaged in the railway service in different parts of the country should be represented on the board, and that is the reason why the request was made that the board should consist possibly of as many as twenty members. It was also asked that provision might be made for the directors voting by proxy, any director being authorized to hold two proxies. That, also, was thoroughly considered by the committee, but the sense of the committee was against such a provision, and it was thought better to limit the number of the quorum rather than give any of the directors the right to vote by proxy. Therefore the clause, as at present, was adopted. The shareholders themselves, of course, will have to fix the number of directors, and if they have not more than ten directors, five will be a quorum at any rate. Taking everything into consideration, the committee considered that five directors would be amply sufficient to manage the affairs of the company. Of course, it must be remembered that, though five may constitute a quorum, all the regular meetings of the directors are fixed by by-law, and every director must have notice of the same. There is nothing to prevent more than five attending, for every director has the right to attend. It was thought, as these directors might be scattered, a quorum of five would be sufficient to safeguard the rights of the shareholders.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I understand the point raised by my hon. friend (Mr. Edgar) to be that you are enabling a certain fixed number who may, under certain conditions, be a minority of the board, to act for the board. That is a novel principle, and I would venture to say, one of very doubtful utility. The hon. gentleman says the committee were entirely opposed to allowing the directors to vote by proxy. Of course, the directors are supposed to exercise a proper personal discretion, and they would not delegate their discretionary powers. Just as a trustee is not allowed to delegate his power in an act of discretion; he may delegate a ministerial act, but not one involving discretion. So I take it that the committee decided very properly in this case. If the directors were limited to nine, five would properly be a quorum. But if you authorize the creation of a board of twenty members, a clear majority of the board—I would not say are deprived of their rights, because, as the hon. gentleman says, notice must be given of meeting—but you make it possible for a minority of the board to decide for the whole body. This, no doubt, will be cited as a precedent, and I doubt very much that it should be adopted without stronger reason than has hitherto been given. It is said we want directors all over the country. For what purpose? Is it a good thing to have directors at many points so distant from each other that, in the practical working of the company, they cannot meet to act upon the discretion which the Act vests in them? If you do, you disregard a principle which heretofore has been jealously watched, that, whatever number of directors there may be, they must act by a majority, that is a majority of the number must be present in order to constitute a legal meeting.

Mr. TISDALE. I think the greatest objection is to the great number of directors. A board of twenty directors would be unwieldy. I agree with the hon. gentleman as to the question of majority. The only case where the minority is allowed to form a quorum is where the stock of the company is owned abroad. In such cases, we have allowed a minority to form a quorum, if they have a certain number of proxies.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I did not know we had ever allowed that.

Mr. TISDALE. Yes; I think in the case of some railway companies. But where the proprietors are all to be in this country, the reasons which have heretofore held good for such a provision would not exist. I think we should reduce the board, and then the number of five would be sufficient. At first sight it may be thought that a larger number in such a company as this, might be advisable, but it produces looseness. What is everybody's business is nobody's business. With ten or eleven directors, every part of the country can be sufficiently represented. Otherwise, I think we ought to apply the rule, and say that the majority of the board shall be present. The whole object of supervision by Parliament is to see that those who pay in their money shall be properly protected; therefore, if they are to have so large a board as that—and it is their desire that they should have—I think we should apply the rule that a majority of the directors should be there, or else we should lessen the number. In my view there could be no objection to letting the number run from seven to twenty, and say that a majority shall form a quorum; then let them suit themselves as to whether they shall make it a less or a greater number.

Mr. DICKEY. I may say on the part of the promoters of this Bill that they felt very strongly that the larger number of directors would be necessary on account of the character of the company. It is proposed, as I understood them, to form a company embracing all the railway interests from Halifax to Vancouver, a sort of co-operative company among the men connected with the railways as employees or otherwise. The object commended itself to the committee as extremely desirable, and we were anxious to meet, as far as we reasonably could, all the wishes of the promoters. They represented that they would require directors at distant points in order to excite interest and obtain the active co-operation of influential men at these different points. With regard to the directors being represented by proxy, that seemed so objectionable that the committee was against it, and we took the largest number of directors that they thought could reasonably be expected to be present at the head office, and gave them the authority of the whole board. Of course, I have myself no interest whatever in the matter; but as the question seemed likely to be dealt with by this committee, I thought it was fair not only to state to the committee the merits of the Bill itself in the opinion of the Committee on Banking and Commerce, but also the real practical difficulty that the promoters of this legislation feel they would have if the general rule were insisted on. I felt myself, and stated in the committee, that the departure from the rule with regard to the majority of the directors, which might be justified on account of the special circumstances of this case, was not to be a precedent unless a company was in an exactly similar position. As members of the committee well know, the practical difficulty of a railway company, when stock is owned out of the Dominion, has led to a representation of their wishes in exactly the same way. It has not been made a precedent in other companies for the reason that they were not in the same circumstances. That rule has worked fairly well, and we propose to apply it here.

Mr. FRASER. I think there is a good deal in what the hon. gentleman has said, were this a Bill in the interest of railway people. But it is simply, like every other Bill of this kind, a Bill enabling a number of capitalists to form an association for the purpose of taking risks.

Mr. DICKEY. I did not so understand it.

Mr. FRASER. It is well known, for example, that on the Intercolonial Railway they have an insurance of their own.

Mr. TISDALE. It is purely a commercial venture, as I understand it.

Mr. FRASER. There is an association for insuring the lives of engineers and others on the Intercolonial Railway. Now, were the employees of railways asking for this Bill, I could see a good deal in favour of the argument of the hon. gentleman. But I see difficulties that might arise from so small a number of directorate sitting as a board. Five men may plunge the whole company into bankruptcy. They may impair the credit of the company. While there is a good deal in what the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Dickey) has said, I do not think he has established a case for making one-quarter of the number of directors a quorum, because the company may want directors in various parts of the Dominion to work up the business, and I do not think that is a good reason for appointing a director. That is a rule that ought to apply to every other company. Directors are not appointed for the purpose of getting a company well advertised in any particular locality; that is the work of agents who will present the worthiness of the company. Therefore, as this Bill refers to a class of persons who ought to be protected, I would like that the usual rule should not be so largely departed from. I agree with what the hon. member for South Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale) said, that except in very special cases, as in case of shareholders living outside the jurisdiction of this Parliament, I do not think we should depart so largely from the general rule which prevails in this country.

Mr. EDGAR. It will be observed, as my hon. friend who has just spoken points out, that this is a general company, a general accident company. It has a capital stock to start with of $500,000, with power to increase it to a million dollars; therefore, on the face of this Bill, I think we can scarcely find any excuse for treating it exceptionally. Another thing which I think will answer the exceptional position taken by the promoters of this Bill, is this: They say that it is desirable to strengthen this company by appointing directors in different portions of the country, at different points of the railways. If they will look at section 2, which we have already passed, they will find that there is full and ample provision for that purpose. That section says:

The head office of the company shall be in the city of Ottawa, in the province of Ontario, and branches, sub-boards or agencies may be established and maintained either within Canada or elsewhere in such manner as the directors from time to time appoint.

Now, there is no difficulty whatever in this company appointing sub-boards or agencies at any point in Canada. These sub-boards, of course, are not like other boards. They are for the purpose, no doubt, of giving local strength, a sort of agencies, and surely it will be a very proper thing to treat this company like any other insurance company. A board that is responsible to the shareholders, to the policy-holders, and to the public, ought, I think, to be treated as any other board is treated. I do not care whether the quorum is five or fifteen, so long as the majority of the directors—

Mr. TISDALE. I understand the promoters are willing to accept that.

Mr. FRASER.

Mr. EDGAR. If the promoters will agree to that, that will settle the whole difficulty.

Sir JAMES GRANT. I am satisfied that the suggestion thrown out is a wise one, and I agree that the majority of the directors should form a quorum.

Bill reported, and read the third time and passed.

IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READINGS.

Bill (No. 38) respecting the Ontario Loan and Debenture Company.—(Mr. Moncrieff.)

Bill (No. 42) to incorporate the Canadian Railway Fire Insurance Company.—(Sir James Grant.)

MANITOBA AND NORTH-WESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. TAYLOR moved second reading of Bill (No. 108) respecting the Manitoba and North-western Railway Company.

Mr. MARTIN. I would like to say a word or two with regard to this amendment of the charter of the Manitoba and North-western Railway Company. I have no objection to offer to the company getting a reasonable extension of time to build its railway. I quite recognize the fact that the present time is not one during which railway companies are likely to extend their operations, but it does seem to me that the extension of time for the completion of this railway for the long period of ten years is a mistake. This railway is built now to a place called Yorkton, and their charter provides that they shall extend the line to Prince Albert. In addition to their corporate power for building the railway, they have a very valuable land grant, and under their present charter they are bound to build at least 20 miles each year. It appears to me that it would be a proper concession to make them, that the Governor General in Council might in any year relieve them from the necessity of building the whole or any portion of that 20 miles; but it is not very encouraging, indeed, to those settlers who have gone into the country through which this railway is to pass in anticipation of an early construction of the line, to be told that they may have to wait for the long period of 10 years before the railway will be built. Of course, generally speaking, it makes very little difference about the time for the construction of a railway, because there is nothing to prevent another company from getting charter powers and building over the same territory. But in this case it is practically prohibitory so far as any other railway company is concerned, because the Manitoba and North-western Railway Company have a land grant without which, I fancy, it would be hopeless to expect to build a railway in that part of the country. If the Bill is allowed to pass in its present shape, I do not see myself that would be any special advantage to the railway company, and it would certainly be very discouraging indeed to those who are dependent on the railway being extended. I may say that there is a considerable settlement—not very large possibly, but some settlement—between Yorkton and Prince Albert; settlers who have been in there for some time and are expecting to see this railway built. The desire of the company not to forfeit their privileges on account of the pressing hard times through which we are now passing, would be quite met by an amendment, which is also contained in their proposed amendments: that the Governor General in Council might in any year relieve them from the construction of their 20 miles, or some part of it, without putting in a clause to extend for 10 years the completion of the railway.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (No. 107) to again revive and further amend the Act to incorporate the Red Deer Valley Railway and Coal Company—(from the Senate.)—(Mr. Davis, Alberta).

Bill (No. 102) to incorporate the Wolseley and Fort Qu'Appelle Railway Company—(from the Senate.)—(Mr. Davin.)

THOMAS ROY, OF ST. JOHNS, P. Q.

Mr. MONET asked, Whether the Government has in its employment, in the capacity of an officer of customs, one Thomas Roy, of the town of St. Johns, P.Q.; if so, when was he appointed?

Mr. WALLACE. In reply to the hon. gentleman I may say no.

LANDSLIDE AT STE. ANNE DE LA PERADE.

Mr. LOWELL (for Mr. Delisle) asked, 1. Whether the Government have learned through the public press or otherwise, that on the 27th April last, on the 4th May instant and the following days, the parishes of St. Christine, St. Alban and St. Casimir, in the county of Portneuf, and the parish of Ste. Anne de la Pérade, in the county of Champlain, were the theatre and the victims of a cataclysm involving widespread ruin and devastation, along the course of the Ste. Anne River, in the province of Quebec? 2. Are the Government aware that whole farms have been engulfed by the waters, and that many of the farmers are completely deprived of their means of subsistence? 3. Whether it is the intention of the Government to despatch to the localities devastated by this disaster, a geological engineer, with instructions to ascertain the cause of this sudden subsidence of the soil, the nature of the formation in which it occurred, and the losses incurred by the several occupants of lands along the said river? 4. Are the Government aware that a whole family named Gauthier lost their lives on that occasion? 5. Is it the intention of the Government to insert in the Estimates for this year, 1894-95, a sum of money sufficient to repair, as far as possible, the losses sustained by those who have thus been deprived of their property and effects?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. We have heard with very great regret of the calamity mentioned in the question put by the hon. gentleman. We understand that the locality has been carefully examined by eminent geologists. I am not aware at the present time, of any reasons which would call for a vote of Parliament.

DOCK AT HILTON.

Mr. LISTER asked, When was the work of extending the dock at Hilton commenced by the Government? When was it completed? Does the Government own the land, and land covered by water upon which the dock was constructed? If not, who is or are the owner or owners of the same?

Mr. OUMET. The work of extending the dock at Hilton was commenced by the Government on the 1st of May, 1887, and completed on the 24th August, 1887. The information received from the Department of the Interior would show that the land is either under the control of the Ontario Government, or the Dominion Government. The question is now in litigation.

CAMPBELLFORD SUB-COLLECTOR OF CUSTOMS.

Mr. McMULLEN asked, Has H. Dunham, one of the securities for Morton, collector of Customs at Campbellford, paid any money on account of his bond? If so, to whom was the money paid? Was there an action commenced against Dunham? If so, why have proceedings been stopped? Has Dunham been appointed collector of customs at that place? Was he so appointed while his bond was in default? Are the Government aware that the duties of the office are performed by one James Donald, a clerk in the post office, for about one-fourth of the salary, while Dunham lives six miles out of town and in point of education is totally unfit to perform the service?

Mr. WALLACE. Mr. Dunham has paid the amount of his bond. The money was paid to the collector of customs at Belleville. Upon the amount of Morton's defaultations being ascertained, the case was referred to the Department of Justice, who communicated with their agent in that district with regard to the recovery of the sum mentioned in the bond. Upon Mr. Dunham hearing of this, he stated that there was no need to take legal action—that he would at once pay the amount. That is why proceedings were stopped. Mr. Dunham has been appointed sub-collector of customs at Campbellford temporarily, though not until after the Department of Justice had stayed proceedings. The Government are not aware of the matters mentioned in the last question, but they are aware that some of the statements there made are not correct.

Mr. McMULLEN. What ones?

Mr. WALLACE. That in point of education Mr. Dunham is totally unfit to perform the service. I know Mr. Dunham somewhat, and I think that in point of education he is quite fit to perform the service. Further, that he lives six miles out of town is not correct.

Mr. McMULLEN. The Minister is not correctly informed.

UNIVERSITY OF MANITOBA LAND GRANT.

Mr. MARTIN asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to issue immediately the patents for the land grant of the University of Manitoba? If not, why not? What has been the cause of the great delay in issuing these patents?

Mr. DALY. The matter is under consideration. The delay has been occasioned by reason of a dispute on the subject.

WELLINGTON STREET AND GRAND TRUNK RAILWAY BRIDGES.

Mr. MULOCK asked, What is the total amount of claims against the Government in respect of the works known as the Wellington Street and Grand Trunk Railway bridges, from the commencement of the works till their completion? What amount has been paid on account of such claims?

Mr. HAGGART. The total amount of claims presented against the Government in respect of the works known as the Wellington Street and Grand Trunk Railway bridges from the commencement of the works till their completion is $490,724.57. The amount paid on account of such claims is $394,796.96.

OTTAWA MAIL SERVICE.

Mr. McMULLEN asked, Has a contract been entered into with the Ottawa Street Railway Company for the carriage of the mails from the railway stations to the post office? If so, for what length of time has the contract been entered into, and what is the annual amount paid for the services? Why was the mode of carrying the mails changed from a horse vehicle to a street car? What was the annual cost of carrying the mail by horse service?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. A contract has been made with the Ottawa Electric Street

Mr. WALLACE.

Railway Company for the carriage of mails between the railway stations and the post office at Ottawa. The contract is for four years from the 1st November, 1893, and is for $4,000 per annum, which includes all additional trips required during the contract period. The service by the cars is much superior to that by wagon. The cars offer greater certainty and promptitude in the delivery of the mails, and greater safety en route. Owing to the large amount of space in the cars, all the mails to be carried on a trip may be put in one car. Mail clerks from the night trains are also less exposed to the severity of the weather than in open wagons. The cost last year was $3,882.24.

MAIL SERVICE IN NORTH HASTINGS.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (for Mr. Macdonald, Huron) asked: 1. Who has the contract for carrying the mail between Belleville and Tweed, in North Hastings? 2. What amount is paid for the service? 3. When was the contract given? 4. Was the contract let by tender, and if so, who were the tenderers, where their post office address, and what the amount of each tender? 5. If the contract was not awarded to the lowest tender, why not? 6. If the contract was let by private arrangement, by whose recommendation and for what reason?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The contractor is Mr. Joseph Jackson. The amount of the contract is $666.70. It was authorized to be made on the 21st of April, 1894. It was not let by tender. It was renewed under authority of paragraph 2, section 61 of the Post Office Act.

FISHING BOUNTY FRAUDS.

Mr. DYER (for Mr. Bowers) asked, 1. What was the termination of the cases pending against John P. McNeil and R. A. McNeil, of Victoria County, N.S., for frauds in connection with bounty claims, as stated in Minister's report of 1892? 2. Were Alex. Maillet and Sylvain Babin, justices of the peace, proceeded against for forgeries and putting in the names of fictitious claimants for bounties in Kent County, N.B. (Minister's report for 1892), and with what result? 3. In what manner did the criminal proceedings commenced as stated in Minister's report of 1892 against fishery officers Jno. Delegarde and Alex. Boyd, for frauds in connection with bounty claims, terminate? 4. Were Hugh J. Larkin, of Gloucester, N.B., and J. H. Gaudet, a justice of the peace, of Tignish, Prince County, P.E.I., proceeded against for defrauding the Crown and executing false claims for bounties, and with what result? 5. What was the result of the criminal proceedings commenced against D. J. Kavanagh of Grandique, Richmond County, N.S., for bounty frauds as stated in report for 1892? 6. If any of these parties were convicted, were they fined or imprisoned?

7. If not, why not, and on whose representations were they pardoned?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. In reply to the first question, John P. McNeil and R. A. McNeil were committed for trial before the Superior Court of Nova Scotia, and the grand jury found no bill. 2. Alexander Maillet, of Kent County, N.B., was proceeded against for receiving cheques on orders knowing them to have been forged. He was found guilty. Sylvain Babin was not tried. Indictments were preferred against him, but having been admitted to bail he left the country and has not yet returned. 3. The case against John Delegarde and Alex. Boyd, of Gloucester, N.B., are still pending. The department is not aware how these cases stand at present. They are in the hands of the agents of the Department of Justice. 4. In the cases of H. J. Larkin and J. H. Gaudet, of Prince Edward Island, the department has not yet been advised of the result of the prosecutions which are in the hands of agents of the Department of Justice. 5. D. J. Kavanagh, of Richmond County, N.S., was committed for trial before the Supreme Court, but the grand jury found no bill. 6. Alexander Maillet was imprisoned for a term of two months.

CANADIAN MILITIA—PERMANENT CORPS—PENSIONS.

Mr. PRIOR moved :

That in the opinion of this House, it is expedient that a scheme should be devised by the Government whereby the permanent corps of the Canadian Militia, and the headquarters and district staffs of the same, may after a certain number of years' service, become entitled to receive from the Government adequate pensions, and thus be placed on a more equal footing with similar organizations in other countries and with members of the Civil Service in Canada.

He said: Last session I had the honour of moving a similar resolution to this, and the reception my remarks received from several Ministers of the Crown, and from members on both sides, embolden me to again bring forward this resolution, in the hope that I may be more successful this year than last. Knowing how very certain I. in common with other members are of success in any matter, when we have got a Minister to say that he will take it into consideration, I am somewhat surprised to find that up to now no Bill has been brought forward to carry out the proposition embraced in this motion. I am afraid that the hon. gentleman who is at the head of the Militia Department (Mr. Patterson), has found that his eloquence was not sufficient to soften the hearts of his colleagues in Council, but I trust he will not be discouraged, but will return to the charge again. I was also greatly encouraged by a word which fell from the lips of the Postmaster General. That hon. gentleman was for many years at the head of Militia and Defence, and administered that department through some of the most trying times we have ever had in this country, and I, therefore, think that he is an authority which can be quoted without any fear of question. I was very glad, therefore, to hear him state that he was fully in accord with the motion I presented. Even at the risk of being wearisome, I feel obliged to reiterate some of the arguments I put forward last year, when I gave, I think, a very clear statement of the case. I trust, however, that this time I will meet with different treatment, as I hope to hear several gentlemen back me up in the request I am making. The permanent corps of Canada is, as we all know, a corps of Canadian regulars. It is supposed to form a nucleus of the whole militia force, and its duties are to act as schools of instruction for the local corps. The men enlist for three years, and there is really no difference between them and the Imperial regulars. They do the same work, they follow out the same routine, they are amenable to the same discipline, and to a certain extent they receive their pay at the same ratio. But there, I am sorry to say, the similarity ends. The British regular gets far more pay than the Canadian, and at a certain time he has the option of retiring with a good pension. Our men get far less pay than the Imperial troops and have no pension to look forward to. Last year I gave full comparisons between the rates of pay to the Imperial army, the United States army, the North-west Mounted Police, and our Canadian permanent corps. So that this year I do not think it is necessary for me to repeat all the comparisons I made last session, but I must give some of them. I find that in the British army, a lieutenant-colonel of 12 years standing, receives $133.25 a month, and is allowed to retire, after his 12 years service, on a pension of $101.25 per month. A lieutenant-colonel in the United States army gets $225 per month, and a pension at the close of his service of $120 per month. A commissioner in the North-west Mounted Police gets $216.80 a month, and can retire after 12 years on a pension of $52 a month. Whereas a lieutenant-colonel in the Canadian militia receives but $120 per month, and is allowed no pension on retiring. A lieutenant-colonel in the British army of 20 years service, gets $133.25 per month, and at the end of that term may retire on a pension of $121.50 per month. In the United States army, a lieutenant-colonel, of 20 years service gets $333 per month, and is allowed a retiring pension of $250 per month. A commissioner in the North-west Mounted Police gets the same pay, $216.80 per month, but is allowed, after 20 years, a retiring pension of $86.64 per month. Whereas a lieutenant-colonel in the permanent corps, of 20 years service, still receives the same pay of $120 per month, and is still allowed no pension. And so on through all the different grades of major, captain, lieutenant, down to private. The same comparisons hold good with regard to the staff appointments. Men holding those positions in the Imperial service have far larger pay than ours. In fact in some instances the difference is quite absurd. Not only that, but our men have no pensions to look forward to; and as they are generally men getting on in years they have nothing to look forward to, except to being turned out without any means to support them in their old age, their pay being altogether insufficient to allow them to put anything by out of it.

Mr. EDGAR. The hon. gentleman does not tell us about the pay of the privates here compared with the pay in the British army.

Mr. PRIOR. The private in the Canadian militia has more pay than the private in the Imperial army. I do not want to say anything against the North-west Mounted Police. Far from it, because I believe they are one of the finest bodies of men in the world, but they were brought into existence four years later than the permanent corps of Canada, and yet the Government has seen fit to give them pensions. It seems to me that it is an injustice to the permanent corps, who have just as hard work to do and incur the same risks. When hon. gentlemen look at the case in its proper light, they will see that if our mounted police are entitled to pensions, our permanent corps are equally entitled to the same treatment. When you compare the pay given to our permanent corps, both officers and men, with what civilians get, occupying the same station, you will find it is extremely small. The same comparison holds good with regard to the civil servants—men who have not any hard work to do, who have no dangers to encounter, but who get larger pay out of which they contribute to the superannuation fund, and thus make some provision for their old age. Now, in regard to the non-commissioned officers and men of the permanent corps, they are far worse off than the constables in the mounted police; they have no future, they have no pension. The constables have a pension, small, it is true, but still an incentive to men, and something for them to look forward to when they drop out of the force. The strongest argument in support of this proposal, as I said last year, is that by its means a better class of men would be induced to join, and when they joined they would be far more diligent in their duties; they would stay longer, and they certainly would become more proficient. In a very short time after the pension scheme had been inaugurated it would result in a splendid force of non-commissioned officers, and the non-commissioned officers, hon. gentlemen will agree, are really the backbone of any service. The evils of desertions and crimes would be decreased by reason of the fact that it would be only by continuing in the service and by good conduct that the men could possibly gain a pension. Although they would expect hard work, they would still look forward to a reward, and not have the same hopeless lookout they have now. There is a general cry for good non-commissioned officers, as officers generally complain that they cannot get enough really good reliable men for these positions. The expense incident to desertion and crime amount in the aggregate to a great deal. The transport of prisoners, the loss of kits and other little items must amount to a great deal of money in a year. And, as the greater part of that sum would be saved, I believe that fact should be taken into consideration when this scheme is taken up, if it is taken up. Now, I do not want hon. gentlemen to think that I wish to have a lavish expenditure on these men; far from it. But I do know that in the ordinary affairs of life if you want to get a good article you must pay money for it. Sir, it is the same in regard to men; if you want good men you must give them an equivalent for their services, and that these men are not getting at the present time. I believe most heartily in the Government being carried on with economy, but in this case I think that the present policy is one of pennywise, pound foolish—it is not economical, to my thinking. Some people may say: If these men don't like it they can leave. That is a fact; they can leave. The fact is that men join young. Being taken with the glitter of military life they join without thinking much about it. But when they have been in the service three years, and have found what a hard life it is, they begin to think of their future, and to consider what the end of it all is to be. They then find that, although they are living a pretty good sort of life in some ways, they have no prospects for the future, and so the most sensible of them, after they have served a term or two leave, and the instruction they have received and the discipline which has been instilled into them is in great measure lost to the country. I was up in Toronto last Saturday, and it astonished me to see the pride the people took in the military tournament there. If the local corps can do as well as they did there, what should we expect from these men in the permanent corps, who are supposed to be the teachers of the others. If the service is to be carried on in a proper manner, these men who are really the schoolmasters of the local corps should be men of long experience and long service, and I contend, Sir, that this can only be brought about by giving these men a pension. I have, perhaps, no right to say to the Minister of Militia what I intend, nevertheless, to say. The Government should prepare for war in times of peace. We have had peace so long, that the idea of having war, of having any civil insurrection, has almost dropped out of popular thought. But it will come sooner or later. It has always come after a term of peace, and the same state of affairs will recur again. If the Government, from any false ideas of economy, fail to keep the force up to a state of proper efficiency, and are thus found wanting when the time comes, public opinion will condemn them. If they wish to economize let them economize in some other direction, but not at the expense of the efficiency of the force, the force to which Canada must look for protection when the day of danger draws nigh. This is a motion, I am glad to say, which can be backed up by both sides of the House, independent of party politics. I look with a good deal of certainty for assistance equally from the Opposition benches as from those on this side of the House. I do not ask for a scheme to be brought forward by which these men should earn an easy provision for their old age. I say: get good men, work them hard, and, if they have not acquired efficiency in due time, kick them out. They are the last men in the world who will object to hard work; but when they have served their country so long that they have arrived at an age when they cannot turn their hands to any other occupation, then this Government and this country are in duty bound to make some provision for their old age. There are only 1,000 of these men, and, out of these, a very large majority will never remain in the force long enough to draw these pensions. Say you have to provide for 25 per cent, which, I think, is above the mark, the money will be well spent in securing efficient men who will remain in the service. Now, Sir, I wish to say a few words in regard to the gentleman who now holds the position of general officer commanding the militia of Canada, and I hope what I say will not be taken as fulsome flattery, because I believe it would be as distasteful to him to receive such flattery as it would be impertinent on my part to offer it. I am convinced, from what I have seen, and from what I have heard from the best men in the service, that the General is heart and soul in his work, and that he is unflinchingly determined to bring the militia of Canada to the highest state of perfection possible. There is no doubt about it, he is a terror to the laggards, to the men who want to wear the uniform for ceremony only; but he is cordially supported by the men who have the welfare of the force at heart. He is a strict disciplinarian, too strict, perhaps, though not so to my thinking. Some of the measures he has brought forward are drastic, but I think he has done more to wake up the militia of Canada to a proper sense of its duty than any man we have had for many a long year. I mention this because I know that the General is anxious that the permanent corps should be brought up to the highest pitch of perfection, and I think the members of this House should do everything they can to help him in what he is trying to do. The Minister of Militia has repeatedly told us that he is in full accord with the General, and I feel sure that he will give us his hearty support. As I said last year, it is not for me to formulate any scheme; the Minister of Militia and the General can do that if they wish, and I hope they will. At the same time I would suggest that no pensions should be granted to men who have served for less than 12 years, with good conduct, unless disabled by accident or disease contracted in the discharge of their duty; also that those who have held staff appointments, and who have served 12 years in the militia force in any paid capacity, whether as hospital surgeon, district orderly-room clerk or any similar position, should be allowed to participate in the pension scheme. I have not spoken so fully on the subject as I might have done, but any one who is interested in this question can look up my remarks last year where they will find, I think, almost every detail fully explained. I would again express my sincere hope that the Government will take the matter in hand this session; and I also hope that after I sit down, hon. gentlemen on both sides of this House will rise and state what they think of the scheme, and if they can do so, that they will back me up in my efforts to obtain a pension scheme for these men.

Mr. DAVIN. It was with alacrity, and, at the same time, although it may sound paradoxical, with diffidence, that I consented to second this motion; with alacrity, because I had seen the beneficial effects of a similar scheme in a somewhat similar force in the North-west Territories, the North-west Mounted Police. My colleagues and myself had sought, year after year, to impress on the Government the necessity of providing pensions for the North-west Mounted Police, and in 1889, the late Sir John A. Macdonald brought forward a measure which is now on the Statute-book; and, from what I have observed of the effect of that measure, I can reason from analogy as to what consequences would be likely to flow from such a measure as is contemplated by the motion of my hon. and gallant friend from Victoria, British Columbia (Mr. Prior). One does not need to be a military man to realize that providing pensions for the very small portion of the permanent force which his scheme has in view, as the hon. gentleman has explained to us, would be a cheap means of giving efficiency to the whole force. That being so, and it being desirable that those who are not men of war should give their support to this proposal, if their judgments point in that direction, I am very glad here to-day to second the motion, and to express my hope that the hon. gentleman who is at the head of the Militia Department will do something in the direction aimed at by my hon. and gallant friend.

Mr. TISDALE. I regret that, labouring under a severe cold, I cannot say as much in favour of this motion as I would like to do. I am in hearty accord with my hon. and gallant friend who made the motion, and I will go a little further and say that I believe Parliament should take steps to pension the volunteers who are injured and disabled, as well as those who are in active service. I think Canada has now arrived at such a position in her international development where she might well take this step. She has had the service of her militia for such a length of time as to entitle them to recognition. I add my endorsement to the remarks of the hon. gentleman, and I would like to see the Government take hold of this subject seriously, and work out some scheme of that sort. We should do all we can to encourage the young men of the country to train themselves and prepare themselves for eventualities. As the hon. gentleman has said, they do not know when they may be called upon to go out and risk their lives, and perhaps suffer injuries that would incapacitate them for supporting their families and those dependent on them. I hope the Government will take the earliest occasion to do something in the direction he has advocated.

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). My hon. and gallant friend from Victoria, B.C. (Mr. Prior), needs no apology for addressing the House upon this important subject. His speeches, indeed, are too infrequent in this Chamber, and when he does favour us with any remarks, his statements are always interesting, and never wearisome. The lucidity of his style attracts the favourable attention of the House, and in whatever he has to say he is listened to with respect by both sides of the House. I may say that there is much force in many of the statements he has made to-day on this important question. Nevertheless, I do not wish the impression to go to the country that the Government are indifferent to the interests of the permanent force. Such an impression would be unjust to the Government, and unjust to this House, because this House, irrespective of party, has dealt liberally with retired officers of the permanent force. We have repeatedly granted large gratuities to officers who have retired from the permanent force, and it is the intention of the department to deal in a similar spirit with the non-commissioned officers and privates of the permanent force. Such appointments as caretakers of drill halls, caretakers of rifle ranges, positions in the military stores in various parts of the Dominion, it has been the object of the department, under my predecessors, and also of myself, to give to old soldiers, to non-commissioned officers, and soldiers of the permanent force. In that way we have made, perhaps inadequately, but to some extent, provision for their maintenance, and generally we take an interest in their welfare, showing that we are not unmindful of their services. The House, on several occasions, has granted liberal gratuities to retiring officers of the staff, and officers of the permanent force, showing that although we are not yet prepared to adopt a system of pensions, still, members of the House, irrespective of party, appreciate the services of those who have devoted themselves to the military service of the country, and are prepared to recognize any reasonable recommendation which is brought down by the Minister of Militia on that subject. I would ask my hon. friend to oblige me by withdrawing this motion to-day, and I promise him that the matter will receive consideration, and that I will lay it before my colleagues with a view, on a future occasion, to giving him a more definite reply than I am able to give to-day.

Mr. MULOCK. Will the hon. gentleman let us know what his opinion is now?

Mr. PRIOR. As I have been asked by the Minister of Militia to withdraw my motion I will do so, as I think, perhaps, there will be more chance of getting it through on a future occasion than there is at the present time.

Motion withdrawn.

LOANS TO SETTLERS IN MANITOBA.

Mr. LaRIVIERE moved for :

List of persons in Manitoba who have not as yet repaid the loans made to them, in or about the year 1876, for seed-grain, &c., &c., with statement of the amount owing by each person and the interest claimed, up to 1st January, 1894, on each such amount. Also, a list, showing the amounts of mortgages received as collateral security for each loan, with description of land mortgaged, with name of proprietor and name of borrower if he be another person.

He said: In making this motion I desire to offer a few remarks. In 1876 a claim was made on the Federal Government in favour of settlers in Manitoba who on account of the grasshopper plague which prevailed at the time were in a needy condition and sought assistance. Whether the loan that was made to those settlers at the time was a wise proceeding or not, I am not here to discuss to-day, but it was carried out in such a careless manner and in such an unsatisfactory way that to-day we are in many instances troubled with the mortgages that appear to rest on some of the properties involved. The fact of the matter is that the descriptions of some of the properties are so vague that in many instances estates that are appearing before the office which is now settling the question of titles appear to be clouded as regards their title by these mortgages, while holders of real estate are very positive, in some instances, that those properties should not be affected by the mortgages drawn against the properties borrowing at that time. It would be fair that a proper list of all those mortgages should be drawn up and published, so that those who are interested in some of the estates which are involved would know whether the claim against their property could be maintained or not. In fact, I believe it would be an act of justice on the part of the Government if all those mortgages were wiped out. To-day not only the amount that was supposed to have been borrowed at the time is demanded, but the interest that has accrued, so that the amount is almost doubled; and I am aware that in some cases the amount of the mortgage does not tally with the value of the supplies received by the party who consented to give it. In fact this loan which was made at the time was so mismanaged that in many cases fraud was committed, and to-day the parties not knowing of the existence of those mortgages are finding their properties affected by claims which create a cloud on their titles, and every time they go before the Land Titles office their titles are tested and the whole matter is left in such a condition that those parties have no recourse but to pay a very considerable sum of money in order to clear their titles. I hope the Government will see their way to have that list perfected and published so that the parties interested may ascertain to what extent the mortgages standing against them are of any value whatever. On the other hand, I should like the Government to take into their serious consideration the whole subject and decide whether it would not be proper to wipe out that claim which has existed so long, and it would be an act of justice, because in many instances the properties have been transferred to other parties, and few of those holding them to-day had anything whatever to do with the loan in question.

Mr. MARTIN. I desire to add that not only should the Government prepare the list as suggested by the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. LaRivière), but that list should be placed in the registry office. Under the provisions of the provincial Act, passed at the time the loan was made, the Government did not require to register the mortgage, and it has been found very inconvenient indeed in dealing with properties to have these outstanding mortgages, which are an incumbrance on the property, but which are not to be found except by making application to the department at Ottawa. I may say that the department has helped in the matter as far as possible by withholding the patent, so that if the patent had not been issued it was generally inferred that there was a seed-grain mortgage against the property, but even in this particular, through errors, a number of patents have been handed out for lands on which seed-grain mortgages remain undischarged, and this, of course, caused much confusion. If the hon. gentleman's suggestion is adopted by the Government, and they go further and place the list in the registry office, the local registrars will be very glad to enter up the mortgages against the particular properties affected, and thereby it would be definitely ascertained what the Government claim is, and the Government should abandon any claim except for those mortgages mentioned in such lists.

Mr. DALY. This question of land mortgages in connection with the seed-grain loan made in 1876 comes under the Department of Agriculture. So far as the Department of the Interior is concerned, all we have to do with it is to see that when such mortgages were given on the land by people getting advances from the Department of Agriculture, the patents were not issued until the balances were paid. So far as my knowledge goes, the list is a limited one, and the outstanding claims at the present moment are not very large. I agree with what the hon. gentleman has said in regard to the difficulty which obtains as to ascertaining whether or not land is encumbered with seed-grain mortgages owing to the defects that appeared to surround the advances at the time they were made. There is no objection to the adoption of the motion, and I agree with the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) that it would be well to forward the list to the Land Titles offices at Winnipeg and Portage la Prairie in order that the people may have notice as to the land covered by these mortgages. In reply to the suggestion made by the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. LaRivière), that the Government should release these people from the payment of their mortgages, it seems to me that it would be very unfair to those who have paid up the money and interest if those who have failed to do so up to this moment should be relieved of their obligation, and I do not think that my hon. friend can look for any relief so far as that portion of the motion is concerned.

Motion agreed to.

SETTLEMENTS OF DISPUTES BY ARBITRATION.

Mr. EDGAR. I rise to move the following resolution:—

That it appears on the 16th June, 1893, the following resolution was proposed by the First Minister, the Right Honourable W. E. Gladstone, and was unanimously adopted by the British House of Commons, namely:—

“Resolved, that this House has learnt with satisfaction that both Houses of the United States Congress have by resolution requested the President to invite, from time to time, as fit occasions may arise, negotiations with any Government with which the United States have, or may have diplomatic relations, to the end that any differences or disputes arising between the two Governments which cannot be adjusted by diplomatic agency, may be referred to arbitration and peaceably adjusted by such means; and this House, cordially sympathizing with the purpose in view, expresses the hope that Her Majesty's Government will lend their ready co-operation to the Government of the United States upon the basis of the foregoing resolution.

Therefore this House believing it to be in the interests of Canada that the present friendly relations between Great Britain and the United States should be cultivated and maintained, views with the highest satisfaction the disposition shown by both countries to promote the peaceful settlement by arbitration of any disputes or differences between them which cannot be adjusted by diplomatic agency.

I would like, Mr. Speaker, at the outset to disclaim any belief that the millenium has arrived, and although we are now in the last years of the nineteenth century, I am sorry to say that I do not think the millenium is within measurable distance of us. In fact, I am rather inclined to fear that the reverse is the case, because when we look at the continent of Europe and see the vast armaments there, we cannot, I am afraid, hope for anything like immediate peace in the world. Indeed, I do not think that these armaments will cease until that great struggle has come which has seemed to be impending for many years back. Perhaps, we may revert to that branch of this question, but in the meantime I do not propose to introduce to this House any notions which might be considered sentimental about universal peace, or about those dreams of the Parliament of Man and the Federation of the World which have been indulged in. But, Sir, what I do think is reasonable, is to point out to the House that the time has arrived for some practical action by Canada, not to initiate, but to promote the movements already made by Great Britain and the United States in the interests of permanent peace between these two countries. Our position as a dependency would probably forbid us from initiating such a movement; but it has been already initiated by the chief parties concerned, and I assume there is nothing to prevent our helping it forward. Some thoughtful Englishmen believe the influence of Canada in a matter of that kind to be paramount. I listened a few months ago in Toronto to a lecture delivered there by Mr. W. T. Stead on the destiny of Canada. He, of course, did not undertake to look at it from a Canadian point of view, because he was a stranger, and he said that he looked at it only from a London standpoint. Whatever we may think about some of Mr. Stead's views, we know perfectly well that he represents the opinions of a very large class in England, that he controls some very important publications, and whatever Mr. Stead says on a question like this is certainly worthy of our consideration as Canadians. His lecture was republished in the January number of his magazine, "The Review of Reviews," and I will take the liberty of quoting some passages from that lecture as so published and revised by himself. He says:

Looking from the standpoint of London it seems to us that the great question which lies before us as a race is the great question as to what are to be the future relations between the British Empire and the American Republic. * * * * This being the case, you can see how immensely important a position Canada holds in our outlook over the universe. Canada is the pivot state, she holds the pass. It depends upon you in Canada what these relations will be. Your destiny, your manifest destiny, is to decide whether the British Empire and the American Republic are in the future to be friends or foes. No, not foes. That is out of the question. I never, even in a nightmare, think of the possibility of an actual war between America and Britain. But we may be a great deal short of friends without being at war. It depends upon you in Canada more than upon any other population in the world whether the Empire and the Republic are to be jealous, nagging neighbours or cordial friends and allies all the world over. The future of civilization and the hope of the world depend upon the answer you will give. It is a great position which you hold. We, in our own country, may be as anxious to be friends with our American kinsfolk as it is possible for mortals to be. We might even make it the great object of our state policy, but you could paralyze and render abortive anything that we might attempt to do. You are the man on the horse in the present instance; we have to take the back seat. You are face to face with the actual questions—questions which arise and constantly will arise, which create friction between the two sections of the English-speaking people. * * * If I could speak so as to be heard by all your politicians and all your voters, I would implore you to remember that it lies with you to decide whether you will be the angel of peace, helping to unite into one the English-speaking people, or whether you will be like another Cadmus sowing the dragon's teeth, from which will spring up armed men to desolate the world. This is the great question which it is your destiny to decide.

Those were the views of Mr. Stead, and if we do not agree with him in all that he says there, we certainly must believe that there is some weight in his statements, and as Canadians we have no reason to be ashamed of the high position and great destiny which he has portrayed for this country. I do not think, after those views expressed by him that it would be presumptuous for us to pass the resolution which I have introduced. But, Sir, only on Saturday last, the American and Canadian papers published in full, an extract from the London 'Times' of the previous day, and I believe that the statements in that article bear very much upon this question. I do not believe that the London 'Times' is to-day the great paramount and unique organ of opinion in England and in the world that it was some decades ago, but at any rate it occupies this position: that it tries always to follow public opinion, if it does not lead it. It watches the drift and trend of public opinion, and it has a vast influence still in the country by following in the wake of public opinion. Therefore, I think that upon this question we may consider that the voice of the 'Times' represents the opinion of a large proportion of Englishmen. This is the language that the 'Times' used on the 18th of this month :

It seems manifest that of the large problems on the successful solution of which the future of the British Empire will depend, there are very few which are not more or less directly illustrated by Canadian experience, and the probable solutions that Canada will find, whether for good or evil, will largely affect the organic structure of the Empire. It is certain that the influence of Canada on the international relations of Great Britain and the United States have tended more than anything else to a peaceful settlement by arbitration of questions which, under less favourable conditions, might have proved intractable to diplomacy. It is not perhaps altogether fanciful to surmise the beneficent results achieved in this direction. Possibly they will be the germ of future developments almost too vast and far-reaching for the political imagination of living men to conceive. What may be the future of Canada's relations to the United States on the one hand and to Great Britain on the other, no man can yet say ; but none can doubt that the problem here propounded is big with the fate of untold generations.

When we see language like that in the London 'Times,' Canadians can at least feel that at last we are appreciated. How different that language is from what was to be found in the 'Times' and many other English papers shortly after Confederation. We were told plainly enough then that Canada and the other colonies were burdens to the Empire, and that we might leave it if we pleased; and I do not know what might have happened if that sort of sentiment towards the colonies had gone on until this time. Possibly we might have been disposed to take the hint. But it has not gone on; the reverse is the case now. Even when that depreciatory language towards Canada was being uttered, thoughtful Canadians were so confident in the resources and the possibilities of Canada, that they were not unduly depressed by it; and I think that to-day they will not be unduly elated either by the very flattering eulogies we are receiving—because, Sir, nobody knows better than Canadian public men do, the great difficulties that are in our national pathway. I would like, with the permission of the House, to sketch for a moment the position which this question of international arbitration between Great Britain and the United States occupies; and also incidentally the position of the larger question of international arbitration between other nations, which more or less, at any rate by sympathy, will affect our judgment in this case. Now, in October, 1887, an address was presented to President Cleveland and to the United States Congress, signed by 234 members of the British House of Commons; and as that address was the basis of the action that is suggested to-day, I would like to read an extract from it. The address said :

The undersigned members of the British Parliament learn with the utmost satisfaction that various proposals have been introduced into Congress urging the Government of the United States to take the necessary steps for concluding with the Government of Great Britain a treaty which shall stipulate that any differences or disputes arising between the two Governments which cannot be adjusted by diplomatic agency shall be referred to arbitration. Should such a proposal happily emanate from the Congress of the United States our best influence shall be used to ensure its acceptance by the Government of Great Britain. The conclusion of such a treaty would be a splendid example to those nations who are wasting their resources in war provoking institutions, and might induce other Governments to join the peaceful compact.

That action was not without its fruits, because early in 1890, after action by the President and by the Committee on Foreign Relations in the United States Senate, joint resolutions were passed by the Senate and the House of Representatives in terms the substance of which is contained in Mr. Gladstone's resolution which I recited in my proposals to-day, and which is not necessary for me to trouble the House with again. Then, on the 18th of April, 1890, a treaty plan for arbitration was adopted by that remarkable assemblage of nations which was held at Washington—the International American Conference. There were represented on that occasion 17 independent nations of the western hemisphere. Every country in North America or South America, except Canada and Greenland, was represented. Of course we could not be there, as we are not an independent nation; but all the rest of our neighbours on this continent were there; and, as our destiny is absolutely bound up with the destiny of this hemisphere, it is at least of great interest to us to see what those nations did when they met together on that occasion. Sixteen out of the seventeen nations unanimously adopted a plan of arbitration for the settlement of disputes amongst themselves. I will trouble the House with three short extracts from that treaty plan of arbitration which I think will have an important bearing upon our questions. Article 2 provides :

Arbitration shall be obligatory in all controversies concerning diplomatic and consular privileges, boundaries, territories, indemnities, the right of navigation, the validity, construction and enforcement of treaties.

Article 3 provides :

Arbitration shall be equally obligatory in all cases other than those mentioned in the foregoing article, whatever may be their origin, nature, or object, with the single exception mentioned in the next following article.

Now I draw the attention of the House particularly to the exception mentioned in the next following article as being one of vast importance to all treaties of the kind which might affect Canada. Article 4 is as follows :—

The sole question excepted from the provisions of the preceding articles are those which, in the judgment of any one of the nations involved in the controversy, may imperil its independence. In which case for such nation arbitration shall be optional, but it shall be obligatory upon the adversary power.

Having entered into that compact among themselves, these American nations thought it would not be out of place for them to make a recommendation, which they unanimously did make, to European powers having dealings with American countries; and this was adopted at a later meeting as a recommendation from the conference:

That this conference, having recommended arbitration for the settlement of disputes among the republics of America, begs leave to express the wish that controversies between them and the nations of Europe may be settled in the same friendly manner. It is further recommended that the Government of each nation herein represented communicate this wish to all friendly powers.

They did not rest satisfied even with that important work; but before they parted they expressed their opinion upon a matter which is of very great concern to Canada. Remember, Mr. Speaker, that among these nations represented was the United States. They agreed to these resolutions of the conference, which were as follows:—

Resolved by the International American Conference, that it earnestly recommends to the governments therein represented the adoption of the following declarations:—

1st. That the principle of conquest shall not, during the continuance of the Treaty of Arbitration, be recognized as admissible under American public law.

2nd. That all cessions of territory made during the continuance of the Treaty of Arbitration shall be void if made under threats of war or in the presence of an armed force.

3rd. Any nation from which such cessions shall be exacted may demand that the validity of the cessions so made shall be submitted to arbitration.

4th. Any renunciation of the right to arbitration, made under the conditions named in the second section shall be null and void.

It is very satisfactory for us to see that, so far as treaties can do it, the independent nations in the western hemisphere have decided to disown the right of conquest, and whatever effect those treaties may have we find that treaties entered into in time of peace are very seldom broken. Treaties that are broken are those imposed after war upon a conquered people. But when nations meet together, as those American Republics met, formally and in time of peace to frame a treaty, surely we may hope that their decision will be permanent and lasting, and I am sure it is a great blessing for Canada that all the other powers, on this continent at any rate, have discarded the old doctrine of conquest and of appropriating territory the one from the other. Then there was the vote which I have recited, in the British House of Commons on the 16th of June, 1893. The resolution was moved on the motion of the First Minister and carried unanimously. That resolution, before it was moved in the House of Commons, had received the support of 2,000,000 of the British people, who had petitioned or passed resolutions at meetings specially called for the purpose of approving it. So that it has not only the moral weight of a resolution passed by the House of Commons unanimously, but the moral weight of the backing of this great mass of people of Great Britain. Then, Sir, we also have something else in this line to encourage us to go on. At the World's Fair in Chicago, a remarkable document was signed on behalf of the forty foreign nations who were, in one way or another, represented at that Fair, and this, if you will allow me to read it, is the most important portion of that memorial:

The undersigned citizens of many countries gathered at the World's Columbian Exposition in Chicago, in the United States of America, recognizing the advantages accruing to those nations which have pursued the policy of arbitrating international disputes and desiring that the like benefits may in the future be enjoyed by all nations, and deeming this a fitting opportunity, do hereby join in this memorial to all our various governments, praying that they will unitedly agree by mutual treaties to submit for settlement by arbitration all such international questions and differences as shall fail of satisfactory solution by the ordinary peaceful negotiations.

And I may say that all the Canadian commissioners appended their signatures to that document. I may say that the Finance Minister of this Government also signed that memorial, as well as some other Canadians of distinction, and last, but not least, it was signed also by one of our most recent and most distinguished citizens, Her Excellency the Countess of Aberdeen—that distinguished lady who is the very embodiment of the spirit of the broadest philanthropy, and whose efforts in the interests of toleration and of charity will do much, I hope, in the future to promote, as they have promoted in the past, feelings of peace and good-will among all nations and all creeds and races with which she may be brought into contact.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. EDGAR. When you left the Chair at six o'clock, I had pointed out to the House how very far mutual approaches had been made between Great Britain and the United States towards arriving at the settlement of their differences by peaceful arbitration. I showed, too, the adoption of a treaty to that effect by all nations on the continent of North America. I showed also the tendency among all the nations on this continent to propose a settlement of that kind.

of difficulties between themselves and the nations of Europe. I had shown that all of America and Great Britain were moving steadily to-day in that direction. Now, I think, we ought to be hopeful that out of that something practical may be achieved. All the great wars that Great Britain has indulged in or been driven into, at least most of them, have been characterized by her most recent statesman as wars which could have been avoided, and we now see, in looking at the position of Great Britain, how anxious she has been to avoid European wars, because I think I am right in saying that since the battle of Waterloo, Great Britain has not made a declaration of war against a European power except in the one instance of the Crimean war. Since 1822 Great Britain has had eighteen arbitrations with different nations of the world on important international cases, which would otherwise have probably led up to war, and eight of those arbitrations were with the United States. That also is a very encouraging state of affairs. I think that the importance of the position of Canada, in itself entitles us to have a voice, at least so far as it is suggested by this resolution, in this matter. In respect of territory, population and material resources we rank among the very first of the nations of the western hemisphere, because if we take those nations that were represented at the international American congress, seventeen in number, among them, apart from the United States, we find that Canada as to population ranked third. As to revenue she would rank fourth, and as to territory she would rank first. She is ahead of even Brazil in territory, and is only inferior to the United States when you add Alaska to the territory of the United States. We have all these elements of nationality, and we have aspirations for nationality, too, but there is no appreciable section of our people to-day who are now seeking separation from the mother land. I think we are perfectly safe in making that statement. As our strength becomes greater, and our self-governing powers are developed side by side with our strength, we may be well satisfied, for many years to come, with the practical independence which we possess. We are rather the allies than the subjects of Great Britain. We are subjects, it is true, of the same Queen; but we no longer admit that we are subjects of any other British subjects who live in England, Ireland, or Scotland. We use the name of the same sovereign wherewith to govern ourselves and we also use the prerogatives of the Crown to represent the will of the majority of the Canadian people. I think it is difficult to conceive of a better system under which to develop a free and prosperous nationality than the one we have. We will be able to fulfil, after a time whatever destiny the womb of the future enfolds for Canada. We have practically, Sir, no foreign or external relations but those with the British Empire and the United States. Just look at our foreign trade. Our foreign trade with the whole world during the last year amounted to $247,000,000. The whole of that foreign trade, except $30,000,000, was with the British Empire and the United States. We had a trade of $115,000,000 with the British Empire; and, with the United States, $102,000,000. Therefore, our commercial intercourse with the whole of the rest of the world outside of these two is comparatively a trifle. And, of course, Sir, it would be hypocrisy of the rankest kind for us to deny our deep interest in the permanence of peace between Great Britain and the United States. A war between England and any other power would enlist our sympathies for the mother land, and, probably, our practical support; and it would be at a cost of some loss to our commerce. But, so long as England shall maintain her naval supremacy, the tide of war cannot roll upon our shores or devastate our homes. Therefore, to give Canada scope for a great development of all the arts of peace such as no country so large and so rich as Canada ever had before in the history of the world, there are two cardinal requirements and two only. One is that peace and friendship between the United States and England should be maintained, and the other is that the British naval supremacy should be maintained. To secure the first all Canadians of course will be of one mind, though we may differ somewhat widely among ourselves as to the best methods of taking full advantage of our commercial relations with the United States, and even with the mother land. How to assist in maintaining the second, the British naval supremacy, is a problem which will some day be of a practical kind for us Canadians, but I do not propose to discuss it at all to-night. I do not propose, either, to take up the time of the House in showing the great interests that England has at stake in maintaining peace with the United States. She can safely be trusted to discuss those interests and look after them. But I would merely point out, in a cursory way that, of the whole trade of Great Britain with all the world—that unparalleled vast commerce—28 per cent of it is with the United States, in spite of the great restrictions that have been placed by that country upon foreign trade; and most of the United States carrying trade also is done by English shipping, for we know that the United States now only do about 12 per cent of their own foreign carrying trade. But, after all, what unites these people as much as anything else is the fact that in language and literature they are almost the same. It is a curious thing, Mr. Speaker, but I believe it to be an undoubted fact that, to-day, the great American magazines have a much larger circulation in Britain than any British literary periodicals have. That shows how these two peoples are bound up in literature as well as commerce and trade and every other way. I said that to maintain the British naval supremacy was a matter of vast importance to Canada; but it will be observed that, given a permanent peace between England and the United States, the United States then also will be interested in maintaining British naval supremacy, which would confine European wars to the continent of Europe, and would keep the peace on the seas that sweep the shores of the United States as well as those of Canada. I think, Mr. Speaker, that in the interests of Canada and the interests of the Empire, it would be very well for this Canadian Parliament to pass the resolution which I have submitted here to-night.

Mr. DICKEY. I do not intend to go beyond the terms of the resolution itself in the few remarks I shall address to the House. I shall simply direct my attention to the question whether or not it is advisable that this House should pass a resolution of this character. I do not think, Sir, that any person in the House can have any doubt that the passage of a resolution of this kind by the British Parliament or the Congress of the United States—bodies having sovereign powers—would be a highly proper and desirable thing. At the best, or at the worst, it is an expression of good-will between two great peoples. An expression of this sort marks an advanced post of international friendship between two great countries, and makes that a point of departure in any future negotiations between the countries. It also places in the hands of those of the two peoples who are lovers of peace, a very strong precedent and argument in the case of trouble between the two countries, with the attending consequence of inflaming public sentiment. It furnishes them with an appeal from Caesar drunk to Caesar sober, from the judgments of a people roused by passion to the judgments of that people expressed in their calmer and more sober moments. A resolution of this sort is far more practical, and at the same time far more necessary, in a democratic country than in an autocratic country. Democracies of the present day are ruled by precedents, and a precedent such as this, testifying in the most public way to the amity between the two countries, is of vast importance in future dealings between the two nations. It is far from being a matter of mere sentimentality; it is an actual vantage ground, gained by the lovers of good-will among both people. Therefore, I say that the words of Sir William Vernon Harcourt, in the British Parliament, with reference to the resolution quoted in the motion now before the House, were fully justified when he said that the motion was one of the most important that could be proposed to the British House of Commons. But, Sir, it does not follow that because the British House of Commons passed a resolution of this sort, the Canadian House of

Mr. EDGAR.

Commons should do the same. But I must say to my hon. friend, the mover of this resolution, that he and I have, I fear, laid ourselves open somewhat to the lash of ridicule in supporting this motion. I think he has offered, and I am offering now, a very fair field for the satirist and humorist. Canada has no diplomatic status whatever; she has no sovereign powers; she has no control whatever over the foreign policy of England, and it is quite open for some humorist of an American paper to represent this motion as either an impudent assumption on the part of Canada, or an ebullition of colonial vanity and arrogance, whichever they please. Canada has no strength whatever. In spite of the assertion of my hon. friend from Victoria, B.C. (Mr. Prior), who addressed us this afternoon, Canada has no strength whatever for offence; she is practically powerless for offence, and therefore it seems to me that for Canada to propose to the American people that they should lay down their arms, is very much like the lamb proposing to the lion that they should enter into a truce and have no more war between them. But it seems to me that in spite of all the humour that can be got from this resolution, views of this sort are in reality superficial. In the first place, Canada occupies now no mean position. She has a population of 5,000,000, which, I am safe in saying, are equal, man for man and woman for woman, to any 5,000,000 on the face of the earth, and not only is that the case now, but we look forward to a very much greater development in the future. More than that, our position is very peculiar at the present time. We are the point of contact, and the only point of contact, between England and the United States of America. Our interests in the past have been matters of controversy between them, and in the future I might almost say that no trouble could arise between England and the United States except on questions in which Canada is concerned. The other colonial dependencies of England are too remote for their interests ever to come in conflict with those of the United States, and therefore on Canada alone a peculiar responsibility devolves in regard to relations between the two countries. Then we must remember that though we are technically only a colony, and though we have no diplomatic status, as I have before mentioned, practically our wishes are respected by the mother country in all that concerns our interests with regard to other powers. I think it is not only seemly, but it is almost necessary, that when the British Parliament, our mother Parliament, and the mother of many Parliaments, lays down a general principle for dealing with affairs of this kind relating to the whole Empire, we, representing that colony which stands between her and the United States, should declare that in all her dealings in foreign matters with the United States, our hearts are with her so far as the question of arbitration is concerned. It is for that reason that I think this Parliament should not hesitate to adopt a resolution, the principle of which is so good as the one before us. It is also important that we should speak at this time for another reason, namely, that we have just come through an arbitration with regard to the Behring Sea. I suppose some features of that arbitration, some details of it, may not be as satisfactory to Canadians as could be desired, and I think it is most important that in view of that very fact we should reaffirm in the clearest manner our adherence to the principle out of which the Behring Sea arbitration grew. Therefore, I think this time is particularly opportune in which to deal with that question. It should be understood, however, that any resolution of this sort is subject to some limitations. There may be questions upon which no compromise can be made with any power. There are questions that arise between nations similar to those involving personal honour in the individual, and on which no compromise is possible, no arbitration is possible. I say that, Sir, only to guard myself against the supposition by the House that I would consent to submit every question to arbitration. It is not necessary at the present time to point out what those questions might be, but they will suggest themselves to the mind of every hon. gentleman. Personally I should have liked this resolution to be limited entirely to the interests of Canada; I should have liked it to express the view that England, in dealing with the interests of Canada, should adopt the principle which she has adopted for the rest of the Empire. But although the resolution is not exactly worded as I should have liked, I shall not quarrel with it on that ground, but shall have great pleasure in seconding it. I hope the resolution will be passed unanimously, and I hope the leader of the House will see his way of adopting it. It is quite fitting that in the middle of a busy and sometimes acrimonious session, we should lay aside our party differences for a time, and unite in expressing the wish, which I know we all feel, that peace between the two great English-speaking democratic countries in the world, should be long maintained.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I do not quite agree with the hon. gentleman who addressed the House in seconding the resolution, because, while I think the resolution is open somewhat to criticism on the ground that it invites the House to express views upon a question which is at present, for this country, one of sentiment rather than of practical utility, I do not at all admit that it is a resolution which will justly subject the House to any satire or criticism of the character to which the hon. gentleman seemed to think it would be open to. I agree rather with the observations that were made by the hon. gentleman who moved the resolution, that the great interest which Canada has in the maintenance of peaceful and harmonious relations with the United States amply justifies this Parliament in expressing any opinion whatever upon questions touching the maintenance of those relations. I am sure, Sir, that anything like satire upon a subject of this kind will be exceedingly misplaced. The interest which Canada has in the maintenance of those relations which I have mentioned with the United States covers all the interests of this country, and it is impossible to imagine any interest that this country could have otherwise than in the maintenance of peace with our great neighbour to the south. But in addition to that, there is a great deal of force in what has been said both by the mover and seconder of this resolution in alluding to the fact that the questions in relation to which irritation may possibly arise between Great Britain and the United States are Canadian questions. Therefore, Sir, considering the position in which Canada stands to the mother country, the obligation which the mother country is under from day to day to consult Canada with respect to questions which affect her interests, considering the position of Canada under the circumstances, Canada has a right to be heard, the first right to be heard, with respect to any matter touching the peace of the two countries. The hon. gentleman who moved the resolution, Mr. Speaker, I thought put the matter very modestly and appropriately before the House, especially as he indicated to the House that he formed no rash expectations with respect to this resolution or with respect to the sentiment which it conveys, in so far as this principle has been adopted by other nations. The hon. gentleman was amply justified in forming an exceedingly modest estimate of the results of a declaration of this kind, modestly made in this resolution before this House, but much more forcibly and ostentatiously put forward by some of the other states that have laid down the maxims of peace for the whole world and violated them before the ink was dry. One circumstance that was referred to casually in the debate in the British House of Commons on this question was significant in that point of view. It was remarked that the President of the United States, that is to say, the late President, having on one occasion received a deputation representing a great multitude of Christian ministers in the United States, endorsed very heartily all their sentiments with regard to peace and with regard to arbitration which they had uttered, and after a gentle reminder at the close of his address that the devil was still unchained and roaming about the earth, he got into his carriage and drove off to the United States arsenal, where he inspected the guns of the Government very earnestly for four or five hours. Another circumstance I remember which indicated that one should form an exceedingly modest view as to the results likely to follow the adoption of a resolution of this character was the fact that while the United States was conferring upon her President ample power to make a treaty of peace, and not only a treaty of peace, but a treaty of perpetual peace, because it was to secure arbitration between all the nations of the earth, while those tidings were being sent across the Atlantic and the co-operation of Great Britain was being invited therein, the agents of the United States were seizing our vessels on remote seas, and extending to our subjects the most cruel treatment to which subjects of a friendly power could be subjected. Another circumstance which makes one a little doubtful about the practical utility of a measure of this kind is, that when the representatives of eighteen states gathered together in the great conference which the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Edgar) mentioned, when they were received by the United States as a peace-loving power welcoming her sisters assembled within her territory to consider how peace could be, not only best promoted, but forever established on this earth, and to frame a treaty of arbitration which was to be the model of treaties which all the nations on the earth should sign, that treaty was never completed, for before it was actually signed they broke up the conference to engage in war, and have been shedding each other's blood ever since. These circumstances make us not very sanguine as to the results of a measure of this character. But that is no reason why this country, loving peace as this country does, should not declare to the nations of the earth that in relation to those questions in which she is interested, she is willing at any time to submit her interests to the fair judgment of impartial men. It is a pledge, it is the expression of a pledge that in her relations with other countries this country desires and intends to pursue a course which invites the fair judgment of the public men of other countries, and, therefore, I think it not inappropriate that this House should express that sentiment to-night, and should express it despite the opinion of those who undertake to treat this subject with satire or derision as coming from a country not strong in arms, although some day it will be one of the great nations of the earth. I think it not inappropriate at all that such an expression should be made by this House for another reason, and that is with regard to the future. While to-day this country is to a great extent in the position described by the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Dickey), Canada constitutes a country having a future in which it will be called upon to play a most important part, for every one who entertains the view generally held by patriotic Canadians believes that the time is coming when this country will be second to none on the continent of America, either in strength or in national importance. It is worthy, too, of consideration as regards our right to express an opinion on this subject that we have from time to time practically acted upon the principle which this resolution expresses. With respect to other nations which have pledged themselves so ostentatiously to it, to quote for a moment the words of Mr. Gladstone on the subject: "their professions have greatly outrun their performances," but with respect to Canada our performances have fully equalled, if they have not outrun our professions. We have had it mentioned to-night that no less than eight great international arbitrations have taken place between Great Britain and the United States, and most of those have related to Canadian interests. Not to go back beyond the examples that Canada has given in that regard since the period of Confederation, we have had the arbitrations which arose out of the Washington Treaty, we have had the arbitration with respect to Behring Sea, and we are probably on the eve of another with respect to the compensation which shall be given to the sealers who were injured by the action of the United States Government, and whose rights have been vindicated by the Behring Sea award. Irrespective of those, which are immediately in view, the Canadian Government has indicated as regards other vexed questions which are under investigation a willingness to submit to a tribunal or arbitration for the settlement of disputes which may arise under them. We have in regard to the Alaskan boundary a question which in all probability it would be impossible to settle by any mere construction or interpretation of the treaty itself, no matter whether that interpretation should be strict or liberal, for no man would venture to say where the boundary between Alaska and Canada should be, if it were merely a question to be decided on the treaty itself, even if it were to be decided by a judicial tribunal. And, Sir, it is peculiarly one of the questions which an arbitration may settle, and in respect of it three years ago, an offer of arbitration was made by this country to the Government of the United States. That offer was entertained by the Government of the United States to the extent of agreeing that a close examination of the facts with regard to the two countries should be made by officers representing the two Governments, with a view to the ultimate settlement of the question by negotiation or by arbitration. We have had likewise an attempt to settle in the same way, the boundary line between the two countries in Passamaquoddy Bay: a place where the area in dispute is of far less importance, but where a conflict of interests has already keenly arisen. We have, therefore, the justification that in expressing our views in a resolution of this character we are but enforcing a principle which we have already acted up to. There is one other reason why, in response to what the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Dickey) has said, I would urge the House to accept this resolution and to pass it unanimously, and that is: we have recently come out of an arbitration in which there has been, outside of an exceedingly small circle of dissatisfied persons, a unanimous expression of opinion throughout this Empire as to the satisfactory results that have attended it. It would be a matter of surprise to those outside of this country to have read—I presume they will never have the misfortune to read—some of the expressions which have been made use of in this country, for insincere political purposes, with regard to that arbitration and with regard to that tribunal. If it were possible for me to believe some of the expressions which have been used in this regard I would indignantly ask this House to spurn this resolution to-night. If it were true that we would be justified in treating—as was attempted to be done on one occasion—with the grossest insult, the British Government for its action with regard to this question, Her Majesty's agent who conducted the affairs of the arbitration for Great Britain, the arbitrators, and especially the neutral arbitrators, who, it was said on that occasion, stripped this country of her rights because she was feeble in the assembly of nations; if it were possible for me to believe that the other language of that character which was unworthily used on a public occasion, had a particle of truth or sincerity in it, this resolution ought to be flouted by the House. But I think it appropriate, Sir, in connection with that arbitration that this House should pass and adopt this resolution, if for no other purpose, for the purpose of showing the country with what scorn and contempt it treats observations of that character.

Mr. LAURIER. Mr. Speaker, I am sorry that the concluding portion of the speech of the right hon. gentleman was not in the same spirit in which his first observations were couched, and in the same spirit which animated the observations of the mover and seconder of this address. I am sorry that the good wishes of the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Dickey) were not carried out, when he expressed the hope, that in a matter of this kind it would be pleasant for all to have a sort of truce upon our party strifes in order to agree upon one question as to which there should be unanimity of opinion. As to the main subject of this motion I have no observations at all to offer, because it is manifest, from the observations of those who have addressed themselves to the House upon it, that there is unanimity of opinion upon the question, and indeed it would be difficult to conceive that it should be otherwise. But I take exception to the remarks which have just fallen from the lips of the right hon. the Premier in the concluding portion of his speech. Exception has been taken to the award that has been given at Paris on the Behring Sea question. I may say, however, that if all the criticisms which have been made against this award were justified—and those that have been made within my hearing were justified—even more, if we had failed to obtain in that award the measure of justice that we were entitled to—and I believe to some extent we did fail to obtain it—still unsatisfactory as the award has been; if it had been ten times or a hundred times or a thousand times more unsatisfactory, it would be preferable to the arbitrament of war. There is nobody in this House who, while taking objection to the result of this arbitration, would for a moment suggest, as the words of the Prime Minister would imply, that it would be better to have under certain circumstances the arbitrament of war, rather than the arbitrament of reason such as we have had in that matter. I do not impugn the motives of the court which rendered that award—nobody ever did impugn their motives—nor even would I impugn the conclusions which they came to generally; but there is one thing which cannot be denied, and which the Prime Minister himself must admit: that if we succeeded in that award in maintaining our propositions of law, in scouting at once the United States propositions, not only that the Americans had jurisdiction over Behring Sea, but that they had the right of ownership in the seals which were born on the Pribyloff Islands; if all this is true, on the other hand it is equally true that we signally failed in the latter part of the questions which were submitted to the court. That is to say, we signally failed in this: that upon the regulations which were made, the propositions of the Canadian Government were set aside and the propositions of the American Government were adopted. In this we failed. No one can gainsay that, and the right hon. gentleman cannot find fault if we complain on this side of the House—and we sometimes have complained—that the propositions which were laid down by the Government of which he is the head, and by the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, who was the official exponent before that court, were not carried out as they were laid down before the court. Everybody would be more satisfied—the Prime Minister himself would be more satisfied, I am sure; the Minister of Marine and Fisheries would be more satisfied, I am also sure—if the propositions which he himself laid down before the court had been adopted, and not the propositions which were laid down by the American Government. I have this only to say—not certainly to impugn the result of the arbitration, not to impugn the motives of the arbitrators, for far be it from me, not even to impugn their deliberate judgment, I will not go to that length, I do not pretend to know enough of the case, because there are many matters involved in this which would have to be gone into; I do not pretend to know enough of the details of the case in order myself to pass judgment; but I simply say this: that I know what our contention was, I know what were the propositions of our Government, and no one can contradict me when I say that the propositions which were laid down before the court by our Government were not adopted. I therefore take exception to the language of the right hon. gentleman, but I repeat: even had the decision gone altogether against us, still I would not see in that any objection to such a resolution as is now before the House. But every man in this age of light, in this nineteenth century, must admit that in all circumstances the arbitration of such a court as sat at Paris is, even for the party that loses, preferable to the arbitration of war.

Mr. GILLMOR. I had hoped, Mr. Speaker, that we were going to have a calm and pleasant discussion of this resolution, without reference to party feeling. I always have been and am opposed to war, and I expected that the Prime Minister and the leader of the Opposition would make some remarks upon so important a resolution. I have been very much pleased indeed with the speeches that have been made; but I regret a little that anything should have occurred to mar the harmony that should characterize such a discussion. However, it has not been much of an interruption. The subject of this resolution is an interesting subject indeed. I have always looked upon war with the greatest horror, and I think that this Parliament need not hesitate to express itself on this question in view of the fact that the Congress of the United States has adopted a similar resolution, and that the Parliament of Great Britain has done the same. Those two nations know something about the evils of war. How much better it is to settle the disputes between nations by arbitration than by the sword. Mr. Speaker, I consider it not only an honour to this Parliament and to Canada to adopt this resolution, but I think it is in the path of duty to do so. It does not require a very extended knowledge of history to know something of the evils of war. Notwithstanding that there has now been peace in Europe for a long time, Europe is to-day one vast military camp. Notwithstanding that we are living in an age of peace, yet the preparations for war are going on and the public debts are rolling up to an enormous extent, and the people of all the civilized nations are loaded down with them. I do not think these national debts would have been so large if the wars had been fought out as they used to be in feudal times. Then the rich did their part of the fighting and paid the bills; but since the nations have discovered that they can borrow enormous sums of money and tax the people indirectly, so that they will not understand it, to pay for these wars, the debts have gone on rolling up. When the barons had to do the fighting and the paying, there were no great national debts for war; but since they have discovered how to make the people do the fighting, and pay the bills, too, there have been no end of wars, and no end of burdens heaped upon the people, and that too in the most civilized nations of the earth, and where the Christian religion, the religion that proclaims peace on earth and good-will to men, most widely prevails. Now, this is a movement in the right direction, and it has originated, I am glad to say, with the English-speaking nations of the earth—the United States on this North American continent, and Great Britain in Europe; and if there is any desire in my heart, it is that Great Britain and the kindred nation on this continent—a nation that contains more than half the English-speaking people of the globe—should always settle their disputes by arbitration. And what does it matter which side wins? I have no doubt that the arbitrators, no matter who they may be, whether Tory or Liberal, will always make the best effort they can to secure justice, and, perhaps, sometimes a little more, for their own country. But at any rate there is no comparison between the results of arbitration and the results of war, and I trust that the time will never come when a war shall be declared between these two nations. They have, during my recollection, settled their difficulties by arbitration, and the awards were matters of no particular importance to either compared with what the results would have been if the difficulties had not been settled in that way. With regard to the burdens that war entails upon the nations, I was looking the other day into some statistics, and I find that when all the nations of Europe are fully equipped and ready for war they will require a force of 20,000,000 of men at a cost of $10,000,000,000 annually. When we think of that, and then think of the toiling masses in Europe, and the taxes imposed upon them everywhere, does it not behoove us to lend our humble aid to encourage the nations to adopt this good suggestion coming from the two nations that must lead the world—that are leading the world in commerce, and in all that makes life agreeable, and in all that makes men free. I think it is a credit and an honour to Canada, and I am glad indeed, that my hon. friend has seen fit to introduce this resolution. I wish I could say something more interesting on the subject. It is, perhaps, presumption in me to speak at all on an occasion of this kind, but I felt that it was a subject in which every philanthropist, every lover of his kind, was interested, and I was in hopes that more hon. gentlemen on the front benches would have expressed themselves on this subject, and that the resolution would have passed unanimously and harmoniously.

Motion agreed to.

FREE ADMISSION OF CHURCH ARTICLES.

Mr. McCARTHY moved for :

Return of the order, minute or direction authorizing the collector of customs at Woodstock, Ont., to admit free of duty certain goods consisting of vestments or other church articles for the use of the Roman Catholic Church at Woodstock, consigned to the Rev. Father Brady of Woodstock, in the month of February, 1894. 1. The decision upon which the collector acted in admitting such goods free of duty. 2. All correspondence between the Controller of Customs or other person in the Department of Customs relating thereto. 3. Copies of the letters and correspondence which passed between the Rev. J. C. Farthing of Woodstock, and the Controller of Customs, with reference to the admission of such goods and the alleged unfairness with which Mr. Farthing had been treated on the importation by him of a similar class of goods for the use of the Anglican Church at Woodstock, of which he is rector.

He said : The matter to which I desire to invite the attention of the House has reference to the entry of certain goods at the port of Woodstock. Complaint was made to the Customs authorities by the Rev. Mr. Farthing, rector of the Church of England at Woodstock, that certain goods consigned to the Rev. Father Brady, priest of the Roman Catholic Church at Woodstock, had been admitted free, notwithstanding the fact that these goods were dutiable. The correspondence has been partially published, and I am now moving to have the whole of the correspondence brought down. It seems that some years ago, Mr. Farthing had a consignment of the same class of goods made to him, and that he had applied—under the very common opinion which seems to prevail that goods intended for church purposes should be free—for their admission free of duty. He was told that the law did not permit any discrimination of the kind, that these goods were dutiable, and the duty was very properly exacted. It came to his knowledge, however, that in the month of January last, the rival church in the same place had been permitted to take a larger consignment of goods out of the Customs without the payment of duty, and he commenced a correspondence with the Controller of Customs, which I see has been partially, or altogether, as far as he is concerned, published. The correspondence that took place between the Controller and the Customs officer at the port of Woodstock has also been given to the public. Now, this, Mr. Farthing says, is not, by any means, the first time that entries of this kind have been made ; but he explains that on other occasions, vestments and articles for the Roman Catholic Church have been admitted free of duty, while the same indulgence has not been permitted to other churches. And, in point of fact, so far as I understand, there is no justification for their free admission, in any case. There is no authority for the Controller or the Customs officials to violate the law to permit the admission of goods, except on the terms specified in the Customs Act. In this matter, it appears to me, from the correspondence given to the public that the Controller of Customs seems to cast the blame, if blame there be,—and blame there must be somewhere—upon the Customs officer. I do not know, I am not here to say, whether any blame attaches to the Customs officer or not, but it is hardly fair for the controller of Customs to publish only a portion of the correspondence, and leave the blame upon the Customs officer, without giving the whole of it so as to enable the public to judge whether that blame properly belongs to him or not. I will draw attention here, so that there can be no possible mistake—if the hon. gentleman now thinks proper to make any observations in explanation of this—to what appears to me to call for explanation. It was on the 20th of December last that the Rev. Father Brady applied to the Controller of Customs for permission to allow the entry of these goods free of duty, which goods, I believe, are supposed to be of the value of about $500. On the 27th of the month, the Customs officer at Woodstock, Mr. Van Ingen, was instructed as follows by this letter from Ottawa :

I inclose you a communication from the Rev. M. J. Brady, of Woodstock, and have to ask you to examine into his application, and admit free of duty such of the articles as are so provided for under the law—communion service is free. Kindly inform Rev. Mr. Brady.

I am, yours faithfully,
N. C. WALLACE.

What Father Brady had asked for permission to enter free, were church goods, namely, a set of mass vestments, one chalice, and one missal. Some correspondence, I should judge—and I invite particularly the attention of the Controller of Customs to my statement—must have taken place between the collector of the port of Woodstock and the department here. That is abundantly clear from the subsequent letters, but nothing further appears to have been done or published, at all events, until the 28th of January. And on the 26th of January, Mr. Farthing, having heard that these goods had been admitted free, remonstrated in a letter which he wrote on that date to the Minister of Customs. After referring, in the first place, to his own application made in 1888, he then goes on to say :

I have often heard of Romanists receiving articles for their church duty free, and during the last few days have learned that the Rev. Father Brady, of this town, has received a number of articles valued at about ($500) from England, via Hamilton, duty free. These things were shipped in bond to Hamilton. Could it be because our local collector would not sanction Roman favours ? There is presumably but one law in this country, and there are supposed not to be any religious privileges. Why then, must I, as an Anglican priest, be compelled to pay on things which a Roman priest receives duty free? The day for Protestants to see Roman favours shown has passed.

That letter brought the following reply from the Controller of Customs on the 1st February :—

Your letter of the 26th inst. is carefully noted, and with regard to the articles said to have been admitted free at Woodstock that were imported by the Rev. Father Brady, I shall at once make inquiries. The tariff free list simply mentions "communion plate when imported by and for the use of churches," and "bells imported by and for the use of churches." I may add that these are provisions that apply to every religious sect, and that nobody has an advantage over another.

I would just draw attention to the fact that the Controller must have understood that Mr. Farthing was referring to the entry that had been made at Woodstock, because he says so distinctly. Now, there is a letter, no doubt from Mr. Van Ingen, because it is acknowledged in the letter of the Controller, but this letter has not been produced, and its date is the 10th February. I rather gather that that letter was written from a communication from Ottawa after this remonstrance had been made by Mr. Farthing. That, of course, is a matter merely of surmise. I only suppose it must have been so, for there seems to have been nothing to correspond about from the time of receiving this letter and the 1st of February, except Mr. Farthing's remonstrance. No written document is published until a letter written on the 14th of February, and this letter has been given to the press as having been written by Mr. Wallace, the Controller of Customs :

OTTAWA, February 14th, 1894.

MY DEAR SIR,—Referring to your letter of the 1st ult., returning correspondence forwarded you with my letter of the 27th December, relative to the application of the Rev. M. J. Brady, of Woodstock, for permission to enter free of duty certain communion service. From a complaint that has been addressed to me on this subject, I am reminded of my letter to you above referred to, and upon calling for the file of correspondence touching the case and looking over your letter, I find, what was not previously observed, that the application refers in part to church vestments as well as to communion service.

It was, no doubt, perfectly plain in Father Brady's letter that the articles were "one set of mass vestments, one chalice, and one missal."

The communion service only is provided for free entry. Church vestments are dutiable at the rate of 20 per cent ad valorem under the provision of item 547 of the tariff.

The Controller then goes on to refer to the other items of the tariff :

If you have not communicated your erroneous understanding of the terms of my letter above referred to Rev. Mr. Brady, kindly consider it cancelled. If the matter has gone further than this, be good enough to explain particulars to this gentleman and have the matter adjusted.

I am, faithfully yours,

N. C. WALLACE.

To W. H. VAN INGEN,
Collector of Customs, Woodstock.

Now, Sir, I cannot help saying that it does appear to me most extraordinary that on the 14th of February the Controller should have imagined that these goods, which had been received in the latter part of December, or early in January, had not been entered on the terms of that letter. However, this is the language of the communication. Two letters followed, one from Mr. Farthing on the 15th of February, in which he draws attention to the fact that his letter of the 1st remains unanswered, and, again, on the 22nd of February he writes to remind the Controller that no notice has been taken of his letter of the 26th of January. On the 27th Mr. Van Ingen writes to the Controller, but this letter also is not produced. But I know there is such a letter, because I see it referred to in the communication of the Controller of Customs of the 5th of March. Then, on the 28th of February the Controller of Customs writes in these terms. This is the first answer to the letter of Mr. Farthing since the 1st of the month :

OTTAWA, 28th February, 1894.

MY DEAR SIR,—I have to hand your postal card of the 22nd inst., and if the statement you make in effect that your request for refund of duty paid has not been attended to, refers to the question of duty on materials brought in for church purposes, I would say, that from all that has been represented to me on the subject, I do not see how refund can be paid. Only communion services and church bells are free of duty, and consequently any duty paid on other articles cannot be refunded.

I am, faithfully yours,

N. C. WALLACE.

Rev. J. C. FARTHING,
Woodstock, Ont.

It is quite plain that at this time the hon. Controller had quite lost the point of Mr. Farthing's correspondence. That is answered on the 3rd of March by Mr. Farthing in these terms :

THE RECTORY,
WOODSTOCK, ONT., 3rd March, 1894.

To the
Hon. N. CLARKE WALLACE,
Ottawa.

DEAR SIR,—Your favour of the 28th ult. came duly to hand. I note that you refuse to refund the duty paid on articles for my church. In my letter of the 26th of January last, I called your attention to the following facts :—On the 8th December, 1888, I paid for certain articles for my church, duty, $51.09. On the 8th November, 1889, I paid duty on my hood for my degree ordered to be worn in the public service of the church, $3, so that I, as an Anglican clergyman, paid a total of $54.09, while you admitted over $500 worth of things, vestments, etc., for the Roman Church here this winter free of duty. The duty would amount to about $170.

I know perfectly well whereof what I speak, when I say that the Rev. Father Brady received those things through the "Woodstock Custom House free of duty." This is not fair either to me, to my church, or the country at large. You have promised to make inquiry and I have no doubt you have done so, and are therefore aware that this is a fact. As you do not deny it, I presume you admit it is true.

You have much mistaken your man if you think such a letter as yours can silence me. I demand what the law gives me, equal rights with my Roman Catholic fellow-citizen. The same law which compels me to pay duty should compel Father Brady; and the law which now admits his things free should admit mine free or return the duty wrongfully charged. I have given you the opportunity to deal in the matter fairly by me. Since you decline to do so, I have no alternative but to demand through our local member a full parliamentary inquiry, and the whole matter shall be laid before the country through the press. There is but one law, and the day for such favours has passed. The law must be administered to Roman Catholics as to Protestants.

Yours truly,

J. C. FARTHING,
Rector of Woodstock.

It was impossible after this for the collector any longer to misunderstand what Mr. Farthing was driving at, and accordingly, we find that on the 5th of March the following letter is written to Mr. Van Ingen by the Controller:—

OTTAWA, March 5th, 1894.

To W. H. VAN INGEN,
Collector of Customs, Woodstock, Ont.

MY DEAR SIR,—I have your letter of the 27th ult.—

That is the letter I have already referred to as not being produced. If we had it we could tell to whom the blame was to be attached.

—relative to the demand you have made upon Rev. Mr. Brady for payment of duty on church vestments. As church vestments are properly subject to duty, as pointed out to you in my letter of 14th February, the amount exigible must be collected. Kindly have the duty paid.

Yours faithfully,
N. C. WALLACE.

On the 8th of March—though the letter is, evidently by mistake, dated the 8th of February—this letter was sent by the Controller to Mr. Farthing:

OTTAWA, 8th February, 1894.

REV. J. C. FARTHING, M.A.,
The Rectory, Woodstock, Ont.

DEAR SIR,—Your letter of the 3rd instant further with reference to the duty required of you in 1888 and 1889 on articles forwarded you from the Old Country, in the year first mentioned for the use of your church, and in the other for your own personal use, came duly to hand, and upon calling for the correspondence I had previously had with you on the subject, I find that my reply of the 28th ult. does not give us complete information regarding the action I took upon your letter of the 26th January last, as it should have. In such letter you stated that Rev. Father Brady of this town [Woodstock] had received a number of articles valued at about $500 from England via Hamilton, duty free. These things were shipped in bond to Hamilton.

As you advised me that the goods in question had been shipped in bond to Hamilton, I concluded that entry, therefore, must have been passed at that port instead of at Woodstock, so wrote Mr. Kilvert, our collector at Hamilton, enclosing him your letter and asking for a report as to whether or not free admission had been allowed.

Then, he gives Mr. Kilvert's letter, which I need not trouble the House by reading. It turned out, of course, that the goods were not entered at Hamilton.

Subsequently, however, Mr. Kilvert again wrote me saying he had been making further inquiries into the matter, and found that the Rev. Father Brady who had passed the entries at Hamilton was not the Father Brady you had reference to. Accordingly, I at once instituted inquiry at Woodstock, Ont. The result is, that I found the goods referred to were released at that point under a mistaken interpretation of an old decision, based on the working of the tariff prior to the last general revision, but the collector was immediately instructed to exact duty, and this, I believe, has been done ere this. I am writing him, however, by concurrent mail, asking if no action has been taken upon my specific directions. The matter shall, of course, be adjusted at once, and while I feel that I should thank you for having brought the facts to my attention, I have at the same time to state that I am sorry you have so poor an opinion of one as is indicated by your letter of the 3rd inst. I can, of course, understand the impression that might be formed by you as the result of my letter of the 28th February not being more explanatory, but at the time of dictating it I only had before me your postal card inquiring regarding a claim for refund that you had made, and did not associate with it the other matter that had been dealt with in your letter of the 26th January.

Now, I cannot help but observe that it does appear to me extraordinary that this inquiry should have been made at Hamilton, because in the very first letter we have here written to Mr. Van Ingen, on 27th December, we find that the Collector of Customs had at that time, at all events, clearly before him the fact that the application came from Rev. Mr. Brady, of Woodstock, and it was to the Collector at Woodstock the instructions were given. In the letter of 1st February, following immediately after the first complaint made by Rev. Mr. Farthing, the answer made by the Controller of Customs shows that he perfectly knew to what Mr. Farthing was referring. That letter says:

Your letter of 26th instant is carefully noted, and with regard to the articles said to have been admitted free at Woodstock, that were imported by Rev. Father Brady, I shall at once make inquiry.

For my part I have no desire to prejudice either Mr. Van Ingen or the Controller of Customs. I think we must all agree that in a country like this, the Customs laws, at all events, ought to be administered with fairness and with strictness, and at all events with impartiality. I may say of the gentleman who for so many years was the Minister of Customs, that we all recognized that in the administration of the law he knew neither friend or foe, that while his administration may have been, and I think at some time it was, a little harsh, certainly it was always a fair administration. Now, on this occasion we have, apparently either through the fault of the official at Woodstock, or the fault of his superior here, and upon the expressed wish of the superior here, the free admission of goods to one denomination which were very properly refused free admission to another. I trust that when the correspondence comes down it will be sufficiently clear and explicit, and that we will be able to judge exactly to whom to attach blame; because, either to the official at Woodstock or to the authority here, certainly there is blame to be attached. I do not trouble the House with reading the indignant reply of Mr. Farthing, because it adds no new facts to those which have already appeared. I have merely stated what those facts are, in order that the Controller of Customs may see exactly where I think the publication, so far as made, is short of being satisfactory. I trust that when the papers are brought down we will be able to see, as I have said, to whom the blame is to be attached.

Mr. WALLACE. I notice an extraordinary change, Mr. Speaker, in the style of the address of the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) to-night, and the style of the address which he gave the 'Mail' newspaper some few short weeks ago on this same subject. I presume I am doing the hon. gentleman no injustice when I charge him with being the author of that address given in the 'Mail,' in an article inspired both by craft and malice, an article which was untrue in its wording, untrue in fact, and which was not borne out by the correspondence which was quoted therein. In the well known language of the hon. member for North Simcoe, that article referred to it as the "well sustained charge," the charge that I had given orders to the collector at Woodstock to admit free of duty certain articles which the Rev. Father Brady of that town asked to have admitted free of duty. Sir, the correspondence of the collector shows that there was not a particle of foundation for that charge. That correspondence has already been given, but I shall trouble the House with once more reading the letter received from the Rev.

Mr. McCARTHY.

Father Brady, dated 20th December, 1893, and the whole of the correspondence in connection with that matter:

WOODSTOCK, ONT., December 20th, 1893.

To the Controller of Customs, Ottawa,

DEAR SIR,—A few days ago I received a present to my church here from Lady Herbert, London, England, a package of church goods, namely, a set of mass vestments, one chalice and one missal. I write to you for permission to allow these entrance free of duty. They will be used in this church always for the benefit of my people, and since they are a present, I feel sure you will grant me this request.

I am, dear sir,

Yours most respectfully,

M. J. BRADY,

Parish Priest, Woodstock.

A copy of the letter—and perhaps I should have been a little more courteous to the Rev. Father Brady—I handed over to the collector, with the following:—

December 27th, 1893.

W. H. VAN INGEN, Collector of Customs,
Woodstock, Ont.

DEAR SIR,—I inclose a communication from Rev. M. J. Brady, of Woodstock, Ont., and have to ask you to examine into his application—admit free of duty such of the articles as are so provided for under the law. Communion service is free. Kindly inform Rev. Mr. Brady.

The hon. member for North Simcoe said: It is well known what those articles were. I presume the hon. gentleman himself does not know what portion of those articles are free of duty by the statute, free of duty to every church, and what articles are dutiable. I had not the articles before me for examination; I did not need to point out the law to the collector, so far as I did, because a collector who has been in the service for 37 years is presumed to know what the law is on that subject. But I did so in these words:

Admit free of duty such of the articles as are so provided for under the law. Communion service is free. Kindly inform Rev. Mr. Brady.

The hon. member for North Simcoe states to-night what he stated before, without a shadow of foundation or proof, that those articles were worth $500.

Mr. McCARTHY. Will the hon. gentleman allow me? The hon. gentleman says: "I stated before." Has he any authority for that? I can assure the hon. gentleman that I never saw, heard or knew of the publication in the 'Mail' until some days afterwards, when I read it there.

Mr. WALLACE. The Rev. Mr. Farthing makes the statement that he had only given out one copy of these letters, and the hon. member for Simcoe held those letters.

Mr. O'BRIEN. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to say a word with regard to—

Mr. WALLACE. No. I think it is too much to have a whole party speaking at once. One at a time is a very good rule. Now, I was saying that the hon. member for North Simcoe declared that these articles were worth $500, a statement which was without one particle of foundation. He does not give the evidence of any man who ever saw them, he makes a false statement and sends it broadcast through the country. I never saw the articles, it is not my duty to see those articles; the collector at Woodstock sees them. Those goods usually require an invoice, and as these were a present there was consequently no invoice to be had, and the collector had to use his own judgment in valuing those goods. He valued them at $100, $60 dutiable and $40 under the law free. So I am informed. It is a matter with which I had nothing to do, and I did not know about it until recently. The hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) made a broad statement without having a particle of proof, with the evident desire, shown by him on many occasions, to injure those with whom he had worked in the past. What is the reason? Was his action from a high or patriotic motive, or from the lowest? With respect to the correspondence that took place, the hon. gentleman lays great stress on the fact that certain other letters are required. He wants to see the letter of February 27th. That letter I will furnish him, for I have it here.

Mr. McCARTHY. There is first the letter of January 1st.

Mr. WALLACE. We will oblige the hon. gentleman with that, too, if I have it here. That letter, dated January 1st, 1894, is as follows:—

WOODSTOCK, ONT., 1st January, 1894.

N. CLARKE WALLACE, Esq.,
Controller of Customs
Ottawa, Ont.

SIR,—I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of December 27th, 1893, enclosing a communication from Rev. M. J. Brady, Catholic priest at Woodstock, Ont., asking for free admission of several church vestments.

In reply, beg to say that I informed Father Brady that church vestments were dutiable at 30 per cent as there was nothing in the tariff exempting such articles from duty.

I have a ruling from the Minister of Customs dated November 5th, 1889, to the Rev. J. C. Farthing, rector of Woodstock, that chasubles, albs and other church vestments are subject to duty.

I have not yet seen Father Brady to inform him of your decision, but will do so as soon as possible.

I have the honour to be, sir,

Your obedient servant,

W. H. VAN INGEN,
Collector.

Then the hon. member is anxious to get a letter of February 27th, and he said that that letter would clear up all the difficulty.

Mr. McCARTHY. Let us have them in order. There is the letter of February 1st.

Mr. WALLACE. I have no letter of February 1st.

Mr. McCARTHY. You acknowledged receipt of it.

Mr. WALLACE. Nothing of the kind. I have a letter dated February 14th, which mentioned, "Referring to your letter of the 1st ult." I submit the letter of February 22nd, which the hon. gentleman appears to be very anxious to see and which he had the unfairness to refer to all through the country before he came to Parliament and asked for its production. I only received one letter from Father Brady, it being the first and the last. I turned over the correspondence and the business to the collector at Woodstock, and I had no further communication with the Rev. Father either directly or indirectly. Does any part of the correspondence or a single line of it bear out the charge made by the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) that I was incapable of doing him justice and that I was willing to give a favour to one man which I refused to another.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. WALLACE. There is not a hint to bear out the hon. member's charge. Then the hon. member further said that I made inquiry at Hamilton, although I knew that the goods were brought in at Woodstock; and he asked why did I go to Hamilton to make inquiries—and he repeated that statement two or three times. The reason I went to Hamilton was this: Mr. Farthing wrote to me from Woodstock. He did not say that goods had been entered at Woodstock; on the contrary he led me to believe that the goods had been entered at Hamilton. Here is a portion of his letter:

Father Brady of this town (Woodstock) has received a number of articles valued at about $500 from England via Hamilton, duty free. These things were shipped in bond to Hamilton.

The correspondence shows that I wrote to Mr. Farthing and to the collector at Hamilton on the same day. I wrote to Mr. Farthing as follows:—

Your letter of the 26th instant is carefully noted, and with regard to the articles said to have been admitted free at Woodstock that were imported by Rev. Father Brady I shall at once make inquiries. The tariff free list simply mentions Communion plate when imported by and for the use of churches, and bells imported by and for the use of churches.

On February 8th, I wrote to the collector at Hamilton, as follows:—

I inclose you a communication that has been addressed to me by the Rev. J. C. Farthing, of Woodstock, Ont., attached to which is a carbon copy of my reply. Please let me know whether the goods referred to as having been imported by the Rev. Father Brady have been passed through port or any of your outports, and if so, on what authority was free entry permitted.

Here is a copy of his reply :

HAMILTON, 12th February, 1894.

HON. N. C. WALLACE,
Controller of Customs, Ottawa, Ont.

DEAR SIR,—I beg to acknowledge receipt of your letter of the 8th inst., with correspondence inclosed, respecting the Rev. J. C. Farthing's statement that Rev. Father Brady had received a number of articles valued at about $500 from England via Hamilton, duty free, and in reply, would say that I have caused to be drawn all the invoices and entries put through at this port by Rev. Father Brady (none of which were free entries), and here give you the entry numbers and dates of entry in order in which they were made: No. 7139, 12th November, 1892; No. 9626, 21st December, 1892; No. 11329, 31st January, 1893; No. 12710, 28th February, 1893; No. 13965, 22nd March, 1893; No. 8137, 6th December, 1893; No. 8941, 22nd December, 1893. I have no entries by him from any of my outports, which is proof that no entries have been made there by him. There must be a mistake somewhere, as I cannot conceive it possible for Father Brady or any person else to obtain free entry for $500 of dutiable goods.

I have the honour to be, sir,
F. A. KILVERT.

That is the correspondence. Does it bear out the alleged well-sustained charge that I had violated the law? There is not a word of truth in that charge. Yet the hon. gentleman paraded the country with this charge and filled the newspapers with it, and came to this House, and repeated it in a very mild way, it is true. Then he said the collector has to be heard from. The collector has written to me and explained his position in the matter :

WOODSTOCK, 20th March, 1894.

SIR,—I have the honour to inform you that I have taken a post entry from the Rev. M. J. Brady for duty on vestments. The only excuse I am able to offer for misreading and misinterpreting your letter of 27th Dec., is that I was alone in my office owing to my officers being sick, and very much worried trying to do three mens' work. Trusting the Department will overlook this, I may say first offence during many years' service.

I have the honour to be, sir,
Your obedient servant,
(Signed) W. H. VAN INGEN,
Collector.

The Hon. N. C. Wallace,
Controller of Customs,
Ottawa.

That is quite true. One clerk I brought to Ottawa, and the other was ill, and therefore the collector, who is an old man, had too much work to perform. Now, Mr. Speaker, I shall leave it to the judgment of this House, and to the judgment of the country whether, in this particular instance, at any rate, the duties of the Customs Department have been neglected here in Ottawa, and whether injustice has been done to any one by me. I can say this, Sir: That the Rev. Mr. Farthing himself in an apology which would seem to have been inspired, partly by the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) and partly by his own desire to honestly state the case, says as follows, in his last letter :—

It is certain if I had not been persistent in pushing the inquiry the duty would never have been paid to this day. While this is so, it would appear from Mr. Wallace's letter of 27th December, to Mr. Van Ingen, as published in the "Mail" that the blame for this violation of the law does not rest upon him, but upon the collector here. This letter is certainly clear, and I feel in the face of this, that I must apologize for having wronged him by thinking he had done so. But if this letter contains his only instructions to the Collector of Customs he is certainly not to blame. * * * However I regret any wrong I have done Mr. Wallace in laying any blame in the matter to him.

So, Sir, I say that I can appeal to this House and to the country as to whether I have acted fairly or not. I can appeal to this House more than that, Mr. Speaker, and I can say: That I never deserted my party when I found that the loaves and the fishes were sliding away. An hon. gentleman in this House was a steadfast member of the Conservative party so long as he could draw immense fees for his firm, and more particularly for himself; but the moment his fees are stopped, and the moment it had been discovered that in all the lawsuits he conducted, directly or indirectly, on behalf of the Dominion Government he had the faculty of losing every time, he turns round and opposes that party. Every lawsuit that he undertook for the Dominion Government in the old country, and, so far as I can hear, that he undertook for anybody else, he lost, and his record of last year in that line is before the people of Canada to-day and it is a record of the great lawyer, an unbroken record of defeats. That is the history of the hon. gentleman; and because the Dominion Government found out that, and another man of ability was preferred before him, we have now, Sir, the gentleman who was a strong advocate of the National Policy turning around and attempting to pick holes in it. We have the hon. gentlemen saying the National Policy is all wrong now, although he said it was all right a year or two ago.

Mr. SPEAKER. I should like to know if this has anything to do with the question before the House?

Mr. WALLACE. It has, in this way, Mr. Speaker. I am comparing my record with the record of the man who is charging me with wrong-doing, and, therefore, I am justified in inquiring into the matter to see whether the man who makes these charges is one who would be justified in wrongfully charging other members of the House. We are justified, I think, in looking at his own record, in this regard. I was going to say, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) told us a year or so ago, the reason he left the Conservative party.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think the hon. gentleman had better confine himself to the question before the House.

Mr. WALLACE. Mr. Speaker, I bow to your decision. I have no desire to transgress, and would not willingly transgress any rule of the House, and I shall reserve some more remarks I have to make about the hon. gentleman for a future occasion. I shall not make charges behind the back of the hon. gentleman, as he has made charges behind my back; but I will endeavour to meet him face to face, to prove all the charges that I make against him, and to prove them by documentary evidence that he cannot deny. I thank the House very cordially for the opportunity they have given me of making the explanation in this matter. I also wish to say that my collector, Mr. Van Ingen is a gentleman whom I do not know, personally, but his record has been a good one in the past, as a collector, and as he states in his letter, he has been deprived of one of his assistants by illness, and of another, previously, who was transferred, so that the business of the port of Woodstock, therefore, was not looked after as carefully as I had given instructions it should be.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I understood the hon. gentleman (Mr. Wallace) to say—but I, perhaps did not catch his meaning exactly—that there was only one copy of the correspondence which could have been published, the inference being that the correspondence being in the hands of the member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy)—

Mr. WALLACE. I think that when some hon. gentlemen would get hold of the correspondence they could make a good many copies of it.

Mr. O'BRIEN. The hon. gentleman's insinuations are worthy the source from whence they come. I may tell him that the copy of the correspondence was placed in my hands in the first instance by the member for Oxford (Mr. Sutherland). I did not do anything with it myself, as it was not a matter which concerned my constituents, and I had no particular desire to interfere in it. It remained in my hands until, at the request of Mr. Farthing himself, it was taken up by the member for North Simcoe. It never left my possession, and no copy of it was ever made, and therefore the correspondence which appeared in the 'Mail' newspaper did not come through any copy of the correspondence which was placed either in my hands or in the hands of the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy). When the Controller of Customs repeats this statement, that the member for North Simcoe had published this correspondence, in advance of dealing with the matter in the House, he is making an assertion which is, to my knowledge, absolutely without foundation. He boasts of his own innocence in the matter. Well, Sir, who charged him with anything? The charge was made and the charge was established that a discrimination had been made at the port of Woodstock.

Mr. WALLACE. That was not the charge at all.

Mr. O'BRIEN. That was the charge.

Mr. WALLACE. The charge was made that I had discriminated.

Mr. O'BRIEN. The hon. gentleman will please not interrupt me. He would not allow me to give him an explanation when he was speaking. I say that the charge that was made was: That there had been partial dealing between these two gentlemen, and that charge was established, and that charge is admitted by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Wallace) himself, and the only question which remained was: Who was responsible for that? Therefore, a prima facie case was made out, and there were certainly gaps in the correspondence which justified inquiry and justified a demand that the whole correspondence should be brought down. I say the charge was made and established that there was this partial dealing, and the question as to who was responsible for that was a matter that could only be shown by the correspondence. If, in spite of denials that have been made, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Wallace) means to say that the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) was responsible for what appeared in the newspapers, then the Controller of Customs is violating the rules of courtesy which should exist, not only between members of this House, but between one gentleman and another. The question is: Who was responsible for what was admittedly a wrong doing? I must say that at first sight it did seem an extraordinary thing, a thing which needed careful and full explanation, that a collector who, under the administration of the hon. gentleman's predecessor in the Customs Department had refused the Rev. Mr. Farthing to have any allowance made upon the articles which he imported, should have assumed this responsibility at a subsequent period, having the ruling of the head of the Customs Department in his possession, and the ruling of a gentleman more versed and better acquainted with the department that the Controller of Customs from his short experience could possibly be. It certainly did seem to be a thing requiring an explanation, that this experienced officer should admit these things free of duty in one case on his own responsibility and under the ruling of the Customs Department, and should in another case and on another occasation act upon an entirely different interpretation of the law. I say that was a thing which required an explanation, and that explanation is what the hon. gentleman has endeavoured to make. How far he has succeeded is, as he says, properly a question for this House. But all who read the correspondence and who heard the hon. gentleman's statement will say in the first instance that it was a very extraordinary thing that a collector of customs should in one case have given, under direction, one ruling, and in another case, without any direction from any quarter, have given an entirely different one. I say that there is a prima facie case made out against the hon. gentleman on his own statement. How far the case will be fully made out by the correspondence it will be for this House to judge when the correspondence comes down. I hope the House will believe that the hon. member for North Simcoe was not in any way responsible for the publication of that correspondence. I only handed it to him this morning; I did not know that any copy was made of it; neither he nor I was responsible for its publication, and, so far as I am concerned, I knew nothing about it until I saw it in the 'Mail.'

Mr. WALLACE. I accept your apology, then.

Mr. McCARTHY. I am really astonished at the heat of the Controller of Customs, because my statement certainly was not unfair. There is not a single word I said that is not borne out by the correspondence. I think that the House will agree with me that it was not an unfair demand I made that the whole of these letters should be produced, so that the blame should be put upon the proper shoulders. If the Controller of Customs took the opportunity—while his subordinate had not that right—in answer to the charges that appeared in the 'Mail,' to publish certain of the correspondence, while he might deem that to be quite proper, it does not seem to me to be fair play to the subordinate by inuendo to seek to attach blame to him without publishing the whole of the correspondence, which would show where the blame really rests.

Mr. WALLACE. I would like to ask the hon. member for North Simcoe if anything that was published in the 'Mail' misrepresented the position of Mr. Van Ingen, or if there was anything in which I did him an injustice?

Mr. McCARTHY. The hon. gentleman will allow me to say, in the first place, that I had nothing whatever to do with the 'Mail'—that Mr. Farthing in his own letter accepts the responsibility for the publication of the letters in the 'Mail.'

Mr. WALLACE. He disclaims all responsibility for the introduction.

Mr. O'BRIEN.

Mr. McCARTHY. So he does—quite right; but he admits the correctness of the letters, and he at the same time says that he is not responsible for the introduction. I can only say, Sir, that it is a matter of the most perfect indifference to me whether the Controller believes me or not. I think I can put my veracity against that hon. gentleman's anywhere where we are both known. I can only say that I never read a word or heard a word of the matter until some days after the publication. It was the reply of the hon. gentleman that first reached my attention, and I then looked back to see the other documents that appeared in the 'Mail.' I have not referred to the matter elsewhere, but I have referred to it here in the presence of the hon. gentleman, which I suppose I have a right to do, and certainly I have not done so unfairly to the hon. gentleman. I have given the hon. gentleman an opportunity of clearing himself, if he can do so, and I trust that when the papers come down we shall have an opportunity of seeing where the blame rests. The hon. gentleman is very angry with me; he says I have attacked him behind his back. I can assure the hon. gentleman that my time is too valuable, and the time of the different meetings which I have addressed is too valuable, for that. I never thought him worth mentioning at any of those meetings, and I am sure his name never passed my lips while I was addressing the electors. When the hon. gentleman attains a more important position in the Cabinet than he occupies at present, he may require more attention at the hands of the members of this House; but at present he occupies a very humble and subordinate position—

Mr. WALLACE. A higher position than you ever occupied.

Mr. McCARTHY. I hope I never shall emulate the hon. gentleman by occupying the position he does, or any such subordinate position in any Cabinet. If his ambition is gratified by it, I suppose nobody else has any right to find fault. If the hon. gentleman will be kind enough to send me that letter of the 1st of January, I would like to read it, and see exactly what it says. Now, here is the letter:

SIR—I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of December 27th, 1893, enclosing a communication from Rev. M. J. Brady, Catholic priest at Woodstock, Ont., asking for free admission of several church vestments.

In reply, I beg to say that I informed Father Brady that church vestments were dutiable at 30 per cent, as there was nothing in the tariff exempting such articles from duty.

I have a ruling from the Minister of Customs dated Nov. 5th, 1889, to the Rev. J. C. Farthing, rector of Woodstock, chasubles, albs and other church vestments are subject to duty.

I have not yet seen Father Brady to inform him of your decision, but will do so as soon as possible.

Now, I ask the House whether the collector here did not perfectly understand his duty? He was wrong, it is true; he thought the rate was 30 per cent, while it was only 20 per cent; but are we to gather from this letter that without instruction this gentleman, who had informed Father Brady that these goods were dutiable at 30 per cent, afterwards admitted them free? Are we so innocent as to accept that statement, even from the Controller of Customs? Now, I do not think we have all the correspondence yet. Here we have the instructions of the 27th of December from the Controller, properly enough leaving the matter to his subordinate at Woodstock:

I inclose you a communication from Rev. M. J. Brady, of Woodstock, Ont., and have to ask you to examine into his application and admit free of duty such of the articles as are so provided for under the law. Communion service is free. Kindly inform Rev. Mr. Brady.

The officer says in reply:

I beg to say that I informed Father Brady that church vestments were dutiable at 30 per cent. * * I have not yet seen Father Brady to inform him of your decision.

Where is the decision? because it is upon that decision that these vestments were admitted free. I think, Sir, that we have not got all this correspondence yet, and I hope the Controller of Customs will not fancy that I am unduly suspicious in saying that, because certainly there is a lapse in this part, as there is in the further part, to which I will draw attention. On the 14th of February the hon. gentleman writes:

Referring to your letter of the 1st ult., returning correspondence forwarded you.

I think the Controller of Customs probably meant the 1st of February, although he says the 1st of January.

Mr. WALLACE. Why so?

Mr. McCARTHY. I will just tell the hon. gentleman why, and leave him to judge of my reason. Now, this letter does not return that correspondence, so again we have a letter which has not been produced, and therefore I do think that it is almost impossible to understand how this officer, with the knowledge that these goods were dutiable, referring to the decision of the predecessor of the Controller on that very point, should afterwards have admitted these goods, unless there be a decision, of which, he tells, in one of the letters, he has not yet seen Father Brady to inform him. Let me draw the attention of the Controller of Customs to another fact which is not satisfactory. In his effort to abuse me, he neglected to do what is much more important, clear up some of the discrepancies in the correspondence. Here, in one of his letters, he tells Mr. Farthing that:

The result is that I found the goods referred to were released at that port through a mistake in the interpretation of an old decision.

When was that found? He tells us he has given us all the correspondence. Is there a word in any letter published that the Collector of Customs had allowed this entry to be made under a mistaken interpretation of some old decision. Where is that again? Where is that apology and that explanation from the collector. Now, Sir, for my part, I am perfectly free to say that I thought, from the suppression of part of the correspondence by the Controller of Customs, that if the true facts and all the facts were known the blame would be found to rest on him, and not on the local officer, and I have only to say this, that I am confirmed in that opinion by the halting and lame explanation we have just had, and by the suppression which I think still exists, and I have pointed out why I think so. And until this whole correspondence is brought down, I will rest in that belief. On the other hand, I have no desire at all to blame the Controller of Customs. I quite admit that he is not responsible for the acts of his subordinates. It is quite impossible that he could be held personally responsible here because an officer at Woodstock or elsewhere was mistaken in his duties, but if the violation and misinterpretation of the law was not due to the fault of the collector, why all I have to say is that it is a matter so serious that the country will know how to deal with it. I am not concerned to defend my reputation, either as a lawyer or in any other respect, from the imputation this hon. gentleman has thought fit to make. At the fitting time and place, he promises to renew the charges. All I can say is that when the hon. gentleman is ready to renew the charges, I am quite ready to meet him, either here or elsewhere, wherever he thinks proper to make them, but I shall not interrupt the course of this debate to reply, on a matter concerning which, you, Mr. Speaker, called the hon. gentleman to order, in defence either of my reputation as a public man or still less my reputation as a professional man.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I am sure the hon. member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar) will agree with me that this is one of the questions to which we ought to apply the principle of his resolution on arbitration. It is quite evident from the range the discussion has taken that it is one of those matters which cannot be adjusted by diplomatic agency.

Mr. EDGAR. That is quite clear.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It is, I think, but if we have to decide the question by the documents before the House and confine ourselves to the discussion of the resolution before the House, it does seem to me that, if there has been heat on one side, there has been an extraordinary amount of suspicion on the other. Now, here are the simple facts. A case has been discovered and brought to the attention of the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) in which the collector of Customs charged something like $40. I think it is—

Mr. McCARTHY. No; the first entry free was the complaint.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Yes; but the facts appear to be that he charged $40 less than he should. I admit that that is a very rare offence by a Customs officer; but why should any one suppose that that must have been by the direction of the Controller of Customs?

Mr. McCARTHY. Will the Prime Minister allow me? We do not know to this moment, anything at all about the collection of duty. The complaint that the Rev. Mr. Farthing made was that these goods were admitted free. The Controller has said, and this is the first time it has been said, since this correspondence has taken place, the Customs officer had imposed a duty of $40 or $60, but that was unknown to Mr. Farthing or myself. It is the first time I have heard it.

Mr. WALLACE. It was stated in an interview with me that the duty had been collected.

Mr. McCARTHY. Not the amount.

Mr. WALLACE. That is immaterial.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I am endeavouring to call attention to what now appear to be the facts. The collector of customs at a port in Ontario collected $40 less than he ought, and the suspicion of the hon. gentleman is immediately aroused that this must have been done by order of the Controller, simply because the individual who imported the goods was a Roman Catholic priest. I do not see the logical sequence of that at all.

Mr. McCARTHY. You should have added that the Controller of Customs was the Grand Master.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. That, I dare say, has a great deal to do with the offence of the hon. gentleman in the eyes of the hon. member for North Simcoe, but to my mind it has nothing to do with the question at all, nor does it suggest to any one who is not exceedingly anxious to fasten some charge of impropriety on the Controller, that because the collector at some port may have charged less than he should, the Controller must have set his agency to work for the purpose of inducing a remission of the duty. I think, therefore, that the suspicion which attached to the case in the mind of the hon. member for North Simcoe, and which induced him to contrast the administration by the late Minister of Customs (Mr. Bowell) with the administration of that department by the present Controller, was a little overdrawn, and altogether unwarranted by the circumstances of the case, even if the hon. member for North Simcoe, as I must assume to be the case, had not read the explanations which appeared in the Toronto papers in which the whole correspondence is detailed. But the case was presented to the House furthermore as an attempt on the part of the Controller to shift the blame from himself to the local officer and to leave the officer under the suspicion that the fault was his, whereas that fault was probably with the Controller himself. Now, it was not a case of shifting any blame, because no blame whatever had been traced to the Controller; but, furthermore, we have had published in the papers and read to the House the confession of the officer himself, that it was he who made the mistake and that he made it through being overworked, and overhurried and by inadvertence, and he goes so far as to say, in substance: "I admit that my offence is all the greater because I had a ruling of the late Minister of Customs on this very subject." He adds:

Sir JOHN THOMPSON.

I have the honour to inform you that I have taken a post entry from the Rev. Father Brady for duty on vestments. The only excuse I am able to offer for misreading and misinterpreting your letter of 27th December is that I was alone in my office, owing to my officers being sick and very much worried trying to do three men's work. Trusting the department will overlook this, I may say my first offence during many years' service,

I remain your obedient servant,

W. H. VAN INGEN.

Under these circumstances the House ought to be perfectly satisfied that there was no attempt on the part of the Controller to shift the blame on to the local officer, for we find that officer admitting that it was entirely his fault and explaining how he came to overlook that fact.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). How does the Minister reconcile that with the letter of the 1st January?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The letter of the 1st of January is this:

I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of 27th December, 1893, inclosing a communication from the Rev. M. J. Brady.

This is the letter of the 27th of Dec.—

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The goods were still being held awaiting the Controller's answer.

Mr. WALLACE. The Controller's answer was given on the 27th of December.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. This is the Controller's letter:

I inclose you a communication from Rev. M. J. Brady, of Woodstock, and have to ask you to examine into his application and admit free of duty such of the articles as are so provided for under the law. Communion service is free. Kindly inform Rev. Mr. Brady.

This was in reference to Rev. Father Brady's application to have the articles admitted free of duty. The collector did not distinguish between the communion service, which the priest uses, and the vestments which he wears.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. His letter distinguishes very clearly.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. This is the letter of the 1st of January :

WOODSTOCK, ONT., January 1st, 1894.

SIR,—I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of December 27th, 1893, including a communication from Rev. M. J. Brady, Catholic priest at Woodstock, Ont., asking for free admission of several church vestments.

In reply, beg to say that I informed Father Brady that church vestments were dutiable at 30 per cent, as there was nothing in the tariff exempting such articles from duty.

I have a ruling from the Minister of Customs, dated November 5th, 1889, to the Reverend J. C. Farthing, rector of Woodstock, "that chasubles, albs and other church vestments are subject to duty."

I have not yet seen Father Brady to inform him of your decision, but will do so as soon as possible.

I have the honour to be sir,

Your obedient servant,

W. H. VAN INGEN.

Collector.

N. CLARKE WALLACE, Esq.,

Collector of Customs, Ottawa, Ont.

The decision he refers to is that of 27th of December. Now, the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) asks me now to reconcile that with the letter which I first read from Mr. Van Ingen, stating that he had made a mistake. I tell the hon. gentleman they are perfectly reconcilable to him who reads them, because the letter of 20th March, which admits he made a mistake, is an apology for having overlooked the law which he knew, when he wrote that letter on 1st January. He says in his letter of 1st of January that he knew the law, that he was aware of the previous ruling, and that the information had been given to the Rev. Mr. Farthing. In the meantime the goods had come; he had admitted all free, communion service and vestments, and the only piece of evidence showing that the Controller interfered at all is when he interfered to tell Mr. Van Ingen that he had improperly decided the matter, and did not charge as much duty as he should have done. That was on the 14th of February.

Referring to your letter of the 1st ult., returning correspondence forwarded you with my letter of the 27th December, relative to the application of the Rev. M. J. Brady, of Woodstock, for permission to enter free of duty certain communion service. From a complaint that has been addressed to me on this subject I am reminded of my letter to you above referred to, and upon calling for the file of correspondence touching the case, and looking over your letter, I find what was not previously observed, that the application refers, in part to church vestments as well as to communion service, the communion service only is provided for free entry. Church vestments are dutiable at the rate of 20 per cent ad valorem under the provision of item No. 547 of the tariff. As you will see by the provisions of item No. 221 of the tariff, they are specially excepted from 30 per cent classifications. If you have not yet communicated your erroneous understanding of the terms of my letter above referred to to Rev. Mr. Brady, kindly consider it cancelled. If the matter has gone further than this be good enough to explain particulars to this gentleman and have the matter adjusted.

Mr. McCARTHY. Surely the right hon. gentleman must see that that must refer to some letter not produced. "If you have not yet communicated your erroneous understanding of the terms of my letter above referred to."

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I do not know why it is not consistent to read this communication with the ones I have already read, and as referring to them. But if this makes a perfectly clear case, exonerating the Controller even from suspicion—and nothing more was suggested—that, of course, is enough to prove that there must be some other letter, some means by which blame can be made to attach to the Controller of Customs. These fail, I admit, and, as they fail to show the Controller of Customs guilty, of course there must be something else. But we will indulge the suspicion or the belief that the Controller has been wrong when we see some proof of wrongdoing brought to his door. Of course, the correspondence will be brought down. We will see if there is any other letter, and if there are other letters we shall have them here for the purpose of seeing who is to blame in this matter, and for the purpose of seeing whether an officer who made the mistake, who admits in writing that he made the mistake, says it was his first offence, and in view of his previous letter of 1st of January, had no excuse except that he was so hurried as to be doing three men's work—we shall see whether that is genuine or not, or whether there was a dark and bloody scheme on the part of the Controller of Customs to set race and race, religion and religion at war with each other in pursuance of a diabolical plot, which the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) seems to believe him engaged in, as being Grand Sovereign of some order.

Mr. McCARTHY. If the House would pardon me for a moment—would there be any objections if I were to move to add to the resolution :

And if duty has since been exacted upon the said articles or any of them, a copy of the entry or minute in respect thereto, with the amount of duty paid thereon.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman cannot amend his own motion.

Mr. McCARTHY. Except by consent.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. If you will allow me, I will move it myself.

Mr. SPEAKER. Better have one who has not taken part in the debate.

Mr. DALY. I beg to move this amendment.

Amendment agreed to, and motion, as amended, agreed to.

DISFRANCHISEMENT OF PROVINCIAL OFFICIALS.

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis) moved :

That it is expedient to amend the Electoral Franchise Act, so that it shall not be lawful for any person to vote at any election for a member or members to represent the people in the Parliament of Canada, who, at any time within twelve months before the day of such election was an employee, an appointee, receiving pay or emolument, a holder of a commission for the expenditure of money, or in the receipt of wages or emoluments of any kind, of or from any of the Provincial Governments of Canada which have enacted or many hereafter enact a similar disfranchisement, as to their election, of employees, etc., of the Federal Government.

He said : In making this motion I will be frank enough with the House to say that I would not appear to take this step had not other motions of this kind been already made in several of the provinces of the Dominion of Canada. In fact this is purely and simply a retaliatory motion. I do not believe in curtailing the franchise. I am second to no one in this House in my desire to extend the franchise. I will go to almost any length to give the government entirely into the hands of the people—even to the ladies of our country. Therefore, it is not a principle with me to curtail the franchise from any person in Canada. But when you take all the circumstances into consideration, when you remember that we have Provincial Governments in Canada who have disfranchised certain officials of the Dominion of Canada, I think you will agree that it is not only right, but that it is necessary that this Government should also do something of the same kind in order to bring these Provincial Governments to a sense of their iniquity. "Similia similibus curantur." Now, what are the facts with reference to the disfranchisement of Dominion officials? The Government of United Canada placed a law upon the Statute-book disfranchising certain officials. They did that, I presume, copying the English statute largely. I am not in a position now to say what the object was, but we will take it for granted that it was simply for the purpose of relieving officials from the impression that they were under an obligation to vote for the power which placed them in their positions. After Confederation that Act was copied by the Government of Ontario, of which Sandfield Macdonald was Premier. Then in the Ontario Revised Statutes of a later date, chapter 9, the Act respecting Elections of Members of the Legislative Assembly, declares who shall not vote. It is enacted as follows :

Judges of the Supreme Court of Judicature for Ontario, County Judges, Officers of the Customs of the Dominion of Canada, Clerks of the Peace, County Attorneys, Registrars, Sheriffs, Deputy Sheriffs, Deputy Clerks of the Crown, and Agents for the sale of Crown lands, Postmasters in cities and towns, Stipendiary Magistrates and officers employed in the collection of duties payable to Her Majesty in the nature of duties of excise, shall be disqualified and incompetent to vote at any election. Then it goes on to state the penalties, and it also says :
Sir JOHN THOMPSON.

No woman shall be entitled to vote at any election under this act.

That is the Disfranchisement Act of Ontario, enacted in 1869, and it remains law to this day. The next Provincial Government to disfranchise Dominion officials, was Nova Scotia, which passed an Act in 1871, intituled An Act to secure the Independence of the House of Assembly. It reads as follows :

Be it enacted by the Governor in Council and Assembly as follows : It shall not be lawful for any person to vote at an election for member or members to represent the people in the General Assembly of this province, who at any times within 15 days before the day of election, was an employee or in the receipt of wages or emoluments of any kind of such employee, in the post office, the custom house, the Inland Revenue Department, the Light House service, on the Government railroads, in the Crown Land Office, or the Local Public Works and Mines.

These persons were disqualified. Then it gives the penalty and states how it is to be recovered. The names are not to be registered, and it also provides for the oath. The circumstances which attended the passing of this Act are, no doubt, well-known to Nova Scotian politicians, but it may be well for me to refer to some of them here. In 1871 the Annand-Vail Government was in power in Nova Scotia. The Attorney General at that time was Mr. Smith, who represented Queen's, and was afterwards a judge of the Supreme Court. The Bill was brought down in 1871, and the Attorney General made the following remarks, in which he stated his reasons for introducing the Bill. I quote from Nova Scotia debates :

Honourable Attorney General said the simple reason for passing the present Bill was that the servant was always under the authority of his master. The man who paid another wages had a right to control his actions as a general rule, and this applied more particularly to persons in subordinate situations such as the officers in the Custom House and Railway Departments and in the other departments mentioned in the Bill. It was for the protection of these men that the Act was passed. It was assumed that these men were Nova Scotians, and would not wish to be driven to the hustings to vote for Canadian interests against the interests of their own country.

The bill was intended to protect them from the tyranny of their masters. * * * Before the session closed such laws should be passed that every person who had the smell of Canada upon him would be excluded from this House. * * * The bill would simply prevent any person in the employ of the Canadian Government, which was foreign to this country, from being walked up to the polls and voting whether he liked it or not.

At that time, Nova Scotia did not consider that the interests of the province were identical with Canadian interests. The extract I have read will give hon. members an idea of the feeling that prevailed at the time of the passage of the Act in 1871. I could quote from a number of other speeches. Mr. Purdy, the leader of the opposition to this bill at that time, who represented Cumberland, and the hon. member for Colchester, raised their voices against the measure, which was also opposed by Mr. Townsend, then another representative of Cumberland, who subsequently became a judge. But frequent appeals were made to the manliness and patriotism of the legislators of Nova Scotia at different times subsequently. It was publicly stated that the Act was a disgrace on the Statute-book, and the Opposition to the Government which put it there frequently brought it up in the House and endeavoured to have the Act repealed, but they were not successful. In 1872, Mr. Allison brought it up and endeavoured to secure its repeal, but it was defended on the same line as its adoption had been advocated by Attorney General Smith. Hon. Mr. Robertson, at that session, when an attempt was made to repeal the Act, spoke as follows:—

As soon as the question of repeal was settled, it became the duty of the people of Nova Scotia to make the best of the Act of Confederation. The local government immediately communicated with the Dominion authorities in reference to financial matters. The central Government at once assumed a position of hostility, and in the election of 1867 the members of the Government went so far as to throw whatever power they had against the local government. The Minister of Customs had even admitted on the floor of the House of Commons that he had requested the men under his control to vote in opposition to the local government of this country. In consequence of this influence being exercised by the Dominion government, it became necessary to pass the Disfranchising Act. It had been stated that so long as an elector was protected by the ballot, he was sufficiently secured against the influence of the government that employed him.

Hon. Mr. Flynn was in the Legislature at that time, who not very long ago held a seat in this House, and he also advocated the non-repeal of the Act. In 1882, the Holmes-Thompson Government came into power. A Bill was then introduced for the repeal of the Act, and it was carried by twenty-eight to seven; but when it came before the Legislative Council, which was a part of the Liberal political machinery in Nova Scotia at that time, the Bill was thrown out. It was urged by those who advocated the disfranchisement of Dominion electors that the electors themselves desired it, and it was said that they had never petitioned the House to have the Act repealed. But it was in consequence of a largely-signed petition being presented in 1882 that the Government of the day repealed the Act. That petition was signed by members of both parties, and by Dominion officials themselves who desired that their rights and liberties as British subjects should not be taken away from them. But the Legislative Council of that day, being, as I have already said, part of the Liberal political machinery, threw out the Bill, and the Act still remains on the Statute-book. It has, however, always been opposed by Conservatives. In 1883, the question of its repeal was again brought forward, the present Liberal Government being then in power, and Mr. Blair, of Colchester, presented a petition from the rate-payers of Colchester and Pictou, asking that the Act of 1871 and 1872 for the disfranchisement of Dominion officials, should be repealed. It came up for discussion in the Legislature, and Mr. Blair moved the second reading of the Bill. The Act was defended by the Liberal Government, and the motion for the second reading of the Bill was defeated by that Government. The Act remained, and it is now upon the Statute-book. The next provincial government in Canada to take up the disfranchising business was the Provincial Legislature of Manitoba. In the Revised Statutes, pages 9 and 10, it is enacted:

The following persons shall not be entitled to be registered as electors:—

(e.) All officials and employees of the Dominion and Manitoba Governments, in receipt of a salary to the amount of $350 per annum or upwards, and all regular soldiers and persons enrolled in Military Schools and also all registrars, sheriffs, county court clerks and bailiffs in receipt of fees to the amount of $350 per annum or upwards, provided that nothing in this section shall apply to Ministers of the Crown or Members of the Dominion Parliament or of a Provincial Legislation.

The Government of Manitoba does not go nearly so far as the Nova Scotia Government did, as the latter disfranchised in the city of Halifax alone nearly 400 persons. Then the Government of Prince Edward Island comes upon the carpet with its Act, which they passed in the Legislature of 1893 after quite a contention in the House. It is as follows:—

An Act to amend an Act passed in the 53rd year of Her present Majesty's reign, intituled: "An Act respecting the Election of Members of the Legislature."

Be it enacted by the Administrator of the Government, Council and Assembly as follows:—

1. It shall not be lawful for any person to vote at any election to be held for the election of a member or members to represent in the Legislative Council or House of Assembly of this province, any electoral district, who at any time within thirty days before the day of election was an employee of or in receipt of wages or emolument of any kind as such employee from any of the following departments of the Government of Canada, that is to say: The Department of Railways and Canals; the Department of Marine and Fisheries; the Department of Customs; the Department of Inland Revenue; the Department of Justice; the Department of Finance; the Dominion Government Savings Bank; the Department of Public Works and the Post Office Department.

In 1893 they saw what good work had been done by the disfranchising of the electors in the province of Nova Scotia, by the gross iniquity of the Legislature of that province, and they thought they would see the Legislature of Nova Scotia and go them one better. They therefore took in all the departments of the Dominion Government and made a sweeping disfranchisement of all the officials of those departments. The debates which led up to that Act of Prince Edward Island show the grossest unfairness, and if I had time I would read them to the House. They show that the Act was passed purely and simply to keep the Prince Edward Island Government in power. It was not to protect the officials, not to do any public good, not to advance the liberty of the people, not to advance the country, but simply to keep themselves in power, precisely the same as the Government of Nova Scotia did, and precisely the same as the Government of Ontario did, who by their last Act also made this effort to retain power. Now, in order to show the extent of the operations of the disfranchising Act in Nova Scotia, I will give you a sample of its working in one county only, although it would be interesting to show its effect in all the counties of that province. I have here a list of Intercolonial Railway employees resident in Pictou County who have been disfranchised by the Local Government of Nova Scotia. The largest number of Dominion officials are disfranchised in Halifax, and then the county of Colchester, the county of Cumberland, the county of Pictou and the Island of Cape Breton comes next in order. The other counties, not having any Government railway through them, have not so many disfranchised as have these counties, but the remaining counties, however, have an average of about fifty or sixty disfranchised, which in a large number of local elections that have taken place in these counties would have turned the tables in the other direction. The hon. the Attorney General of Nova Scotia in his two first elections, had it not been for this disfranchising Act, would have been defeated.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). That would depend on how they would vote.

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis). Considering that they all voted in the way the Local Government thought they would vote when they put this Act upon the Statute-book.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). You are assuming that the Dominion Government own the votes?

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis). I assume what I read in the debates of the Assembly to be correct. In order to place this upon record I shall read the entire list of disfranchised officials in the county of Pictou, giving the name, the occupation, and the address of each. They are as follows:—

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis).

Added to the names which I have given are about 25 or 30 lighthouse-keepers and custom-house officials, the total in the county of Pictou being 215. I read this simply as a sample of what took place in all the counties. The disfranchisement affects the county of Halifax the most, to the number of some 350 or 400. In Colchester the number affected is about 320, and in Cumberland about 200. The county of Antigonish and the other counties in Cape Breton are also affected, by the disfranchisement of not only customs, excise and post office officials, but also railway officials similar to those I have referred to in the county of Pictou. Now, these disfranchisements take away the liberty of the subject from a large number of officials; and if the arguments were good with the Provincial Governments at the time these Acts were placed upon the Statute-books of the different provinces, the very same argument will apply here for the disfranchising of officials of Provincial Governments who have placed these Acts upon their Statute-books. What are the facts with reference to that? They argued, when they placed these Acts on the Statute-books, that the servants should be free from the pressure of the master, that the Dominion officials should not vote in local affairs, because they were under the control and at the beck and call, so far as their voting was concerned, of the Dominion Government—that the Dominion Government took part in the local elections, that they influenced the local elections, not only by calling on the officials to vote, but also by going down to the different counties and endeavouring to influence their vote. What have we now in 1893, with reference to the Local Governments of Nova Scotia, Ontario, the Opposition in Quebec, the Governments of Prince Edward Island and Manitoba, and in fact throughout all the provinces in Canada. They all assembled in convention in Ottawa and pledged themselves to support the leader of the Opposition. They pledged themselves to do their utmost to overthrow the Dominion Government, and passed resolutions, one of which reads as follows:—It was moved by the Hon. A. G. Jones and seconded by D. Monet, M.P., a member of this House:

That the Franchise Act, since its introduction, has cost the Dominion treasury over a million dollars besides entailing a heavy expenditure on both political parties; that each revision involves an additional expenditure of a further quarter of a million dollars; that this expenditure has prevented the annual revision as originally intended, in the absence of which young voters entitled to the franchise have, in numerous instances, been prevented from exercising their natural right; that it has failed to secure the uniformity which was the principal reason assigned for its introduction; that its provisions are less liberal than those already existing in many provinces of the Dominion; and that, in the opinion of this convention, the Act should be repealed and we should revert to the provincial franchise.

How very solicitous they were for the young men of the provinces in that resolution. How very solicitous they were, in this convention of 1893, that all the young men of the provinces should have the freedom of the franchise. Were they as solicitous when the Hon. A. G. Jones, by his votes and his speeches in the county of Halifax, did, time and again, advocate the disfranchisement of all the railway officials, all the young men who happened to earn their living as officials of the Dominion Government in the city of Halifax and county of Pictou, or the other counties, to which I have referred, in Nova Scotia. Every one of these officials in the province of Prince Edward Island has been disfranchised by an Act of the Local Legislature of that province. The so-called Liberals—Liberals forsooth—have gone on to deprive people of their franchise in the manner in which these men have been deprived of it. Some hon. gentlemen will say that my resolution is in direct opposition to my remarks. In answer let me say this, that I know well that the best way to make any farmer realize, in the keenest manner, the pungent pestiferous odour of the skunk, is to have that animal in his own barn and not in that of his neighbour. By my resolution we will put that political skunk, the disfranchising of the electors of the Dominion, right under the noses of the Liberals themselves, and see how they will like the smell of it. I do not believe in curtailing the franchise of any man, taking away his right to vote, but the only way which you can drive these men to realize the position they have taken, is by giving them a dose of their own medicine. In my resolution, I think I have made it plain that it is a retaliatory measure. If it ever comes to a Bill, which I hope it will, I will do my best endeavour to incorporate in it the proviso that whenever a Provincial Government repeals its Act disfranchising Dominion officials, our disfranchisement of the provincial officials of that particular province will be repealed. I would like to hear if there is any opposition from the hon. member for Guysboro' (Mr. Fraser), or the hon. member for Yarmouth (Mr. Flint) or the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies). I should like to hear their arguments against this measure and compare them with the arguments of their colleagues in the provinces, and see how the deadly parallel would treat them. They must of a necessity support my resolution, if they vote at all upon it, or else go back upon the record of the Liberal party in the provinces; and I know they will hesitate a long while before doing that. But if they should support my resolution, they will have to go back upon that record. The hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) will have to desert his friend, Mr. Laird, who introduced the Bill in 1893 to disfranchise all the Dominion officials in that island. A great deal could be said with reference to this matter, but I do not intend to weary the House. My own object I believe to be worthy the consideration of this House. I do not believe in picayune politics. I believe, as near as we can possibly get at it, in broad-minded statesmanship in all these matters, particularly in the matter of the franchise. I believe that every intelligent person in Canada should have the right to vote. But we cannot accomplish everything at once; we have a great many circumstances, and a great many stumbling blocks to overcome, and one of these I have endeavoured to show the House to-night. The patriotism, the manliness of the Liberals of the provinces have been appealed to time and time again, and appealed to in vain; and now, I believe, the only way to accomplish what we desire is to put a retaliatory measure, such as this on our Statute-book. I have other minutes of other things, and intended to make a longer speech, but I do not wish to weary the House. I think I have given the House an idea of my meaning in this resolution, and I consider that the subject is worthy its attention.

Mr. FRASER. Mr. Speaker, I did not know which most to admire, the hon. member's medical quotation or his classical and elegant remark about the character of the legislation. It is well known among medical men that the motto 'similia similibus curantur' is only used by the practitioners of a certain school. I hope the hon. gentleman does not intend to found a new school of political discussion. Let me say at once that I concede the point that every legislature has the right to decide what shall be the franchise of the men who vote to elect its members. The Local Legislature has the right to do so, and this Parliament has the right to do so. But it does seem to me very strange when the hon. member appeals to Liberals and mentions particularly myself and other members from Nova Scotia, and wants us to join him in repudiating what he conceives not to be a liberal doctrine. If we followed the hon. gentleman we should certainly be in a strange position, for it would amount to repudiation of the right of the Local Legislature to regulate the franchise in its own elections. The hon. member has been—I do not say wilfully—quite unfair. Let me read the Act passed by the Nova Scotia Legislature and then let me read his resolution:

It shall not be lawful for any person to vote at any election for a member or members to represent the people in the General Assembly in this province who at any time within fifteen days before the day of election was an employee, or in the receipt of wages or emolument of any kind as such employee—

It will be noticed the Act only refers to employees.

—in the Post Office, in the Custom-house, in the Inland Revenue Department, the Lighthouse service, on the Government railways—

Now, these are five positions in which there are employees under the Government of Canada, and the hon. gentleman forgot to mention that this very Act puts in the same category the only employees of the Local Government, the employees of the Crown Lands Office and the local public works and mines.

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis). I mentioned that.

Mr. FRASER. It puts employees of the Local Government in exactly the same position as those of the Dominion Government.

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis). And the Local employees number thirty or forty.

Mr. FRASER. They are not so fortunate as the Dominion Government in having so many officers at their disposal, but no matter how many there might be, they would be in the same position. If they had ten thousand men as employees the effect of the law would be the same. If the hon. gentleman will hold his breath for a minute he will hear what I have to say and will learn how unfair he was. I say if they had ten thousand men—

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. They would never have touched it.

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis). They would repeal that clause.

Mr. FRASER. Oh, that is generous. It happens that the Local Government have no other employees except the judges of probate, who have no vote.

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis). How about surveyors?

An hon. MEMBER. And registrars of probate?

Mr. FRASER. Would you cut off a country surveyor?

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis). He is paid by the Local Government.

Mr. FRASER. When he is employed to survey a lot of land the party who employs him pays him. Would you cut off a man because he happens to be engaged in work which is under the general direction of the province?

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis). He is an employee of the Government.

Mr. FRASER. I beg your pardon. He may be for certain work; but if he is employed to survey a piece of land the party who employs him pays him. Let us see what is said further in this Act:

But nothing in this section contained shall be construed to extend to any elector who may have contracted to furnish materials of any kind for the Government railroads, or to perform any other specific contract in respect of the same or to any person who may have been employed by the day temporarily to repair the railroad; or to any postmaster, post office keeper, way office keeper or mail courier under the post office.

Look at the breadth of the Act.

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis). How generous they are.

Mr. FRASER. The hon. gentleman would make out that they were skunks. I think that is generous, for a skunk.

An hon. MEMBER. A little high.

Mr. FRASER. I am quoting the language of the hon. member for Annapolis (Mr. Mills). If the hon. gentleman were to meet a real skunk and get off so easily, I think he would regard the animal as generous. Look, by contrast, at the resolution the hon. gentleman wants us to pass:

That it is expedient to amend the Electoral Franchise Act, so that it shall not be lawful for any person to vote at any election for a member or members to represent the people in the Parliament of Canada, who, at any time within twelve months before the day of such election was an employee, an appointee, receiving pay or emolument, a holder of a commission for the expenditure of money, or in the receipt of wages or emoluments of any kind, of or from any of the Provincial Governments of Canada which have enacted or may hereafter enact a similar disfranchisement, as to their election, of employees, etc., of the Federal Government.

That means that any person who in any way does any work for the Local Government must be disfranchised, while under the provincial law those who work for the Government railways are not disfranchised.

Mr. INGRAM. Would that apply to railway men employed as extra hands?

Mr. FRASER. Let me read it again:

—but nothing in this section contained shall be construed to extend to any elector who may have contracted to furnish materials of any kind for the Government railroads, or to perform any other specific contract in respect of the same or to any person who may have been employed by the day temporarily to repair the railroad.

So you see it only refers to those who are employees.

Mr. INGRAM. Why does it not apply to the others.

Mr. FRASER. The hon. member for Annapolis (Mr. Mills) furnished the reason when he said that if these men had voted there would be no Liberal Government in Nova Scotia. He gave us the reason when he said that every man in the two hundred in the county of Pictou to whom he referred would vote Conservative. All he wants is to have the votes of these men overturn the Local Government.

Mr. COCHRANE. That is not the reason.

Mr. FRASER. The hon. gentleman knows nothing about it. He has never been in Nova Scotia and he does not understand what we are talking about.

Mr. FRASER.

Mr. COCHRANE. I want you to explain, and then we will know something about it.

Mr. FRASER. The hon. member for Annapolis has given the reason which I have given.

Mr. COCHRANE. Not at all.

Mr. FRASER. The hon. member for Northumberland is right; there is no reason. Then he answers the hon. member for Annapolis himself that that is no reason at all why these men should be appointed.

Mr. COCHRANE. You give us one.

Mr. FRASER. I will give the very one the hon. member for Annapolis has given, namely, that if every man of them vote against any local government because they are in the employ of the Dominion Government, then they should have no vote. Let me say that so far as I am concerned, I believe no man employed by either government should vote. I believe the best thing Parliament could do in the interest of Canada would be to enact to-morrow that not a single man employed by this Government should have a vote in this country. Our public service would then be somewhat like that of Great Britain before competitive examinations were compulsory, we would have men in our service who would be absolutely free, who would feel that their position did not depend on any government. We would not have men such as I have in my own county, collectors of customs, going to meetings and speaking at meetings. In one case, when I said that it was not seemly, he answered: I am an employee of the Government, I will do this, I will take my office in my hand. That is not an isolated case. I say you will find that men who are employed by the local government will feel the same interest in the local government as the men who are employed by the Dominion Government feel in the Dominion Government. It will always be the case until you apply the principle that no man employed by a government should be allowed to vote unless he gets the position as is done in England. They were not allowed to vote in England, and for the best of reasons. If you wish to have in the civil service men who will do their work well, who will study the business of the department in which they are placed, who will strive to become more efficient in order that they may commend themselves, not only to the Government who appointed them, but to every government which may be in power for the time being, then you must remove them from political struggles and deprive them of the power to vote. Let it be granted for a moment that the hon. gentleman's argument is a good one, let it be granted that if the Attorney General when he first ran, and the Dominion employees were allowed to vote, would be defeated, would that be a good thing for Annapolis?

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis). Certainly.

Mr. FRASER. I will tell you what the people of Annapolis themselves thought of him, for they returned him at the last election by over 200 of a majority.

Mr. PATTERSON (Colchester). Yes, by road boodle.

Mr. FRASER. If a man was returned at first by a small majority, and gained upon the electorate of the county to such an extent that he was returned by over 200, and if there was a body of electors in that county in the pay of any government who could keep out a man like that, I say it would be a calamity to the county, and such a body of electors would be a dangerous element to have voting. I am sure there is not an hon. gentleman opposite who will not admit that. The proper course for us to take is to adopt the correct principle of not asking any of these men to vote. I am sure there is not a man in the civil service who does not wish to excel in that service; there is no man in the service, except those who have been put there for political purposes, who does not wish to do honest and efficient work for the government. Hon. gentlemen opposite may say that that is not the case. Well, I can say that I know some of the best employees in the various departments in Nova Scotia, and they are glad that they have not an opportunity of voting. Nay, more, I think I will say that there is not a young man who wishes to advance in any of the departments in which he is placed, but will do better work when he knows that he cannot vote. What is the history of our civil service in general? It is that political favouritism is at the bottom of many advancements. Now, if these men did not vote at all, if they understood that their preferment depended entirely upon the manner in which they did their work, and the skill they showed in their respective positions, you would have a better civil service than you have to-day. Our neighbours across the border, who had a whole board of these men controlling the elections, are now doing all they can, both Republicans and Democrats, in the direction of taking away votes from men who are employed in the civil service, because they find that they control caucuses and nominate their own men—200,000 of them, just like those 250 in the county of Pictou, and the 400 in the county of Halifax. I am not saying that one party is worse in this respect than another, but it is entirely natural, whatever government is in power, that the officials, even if the government themselves say nothing, will so influence their subordinates that they shall well understand that they must vote for the government.

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis). Does not the ballot protect them?

Mr. FRASER. In a district where party lines are closely drawn, and you know exactly who your friends are and who your opponents are, when there are thirty or forty Dominion Government officials in the county, you can tell pretty well how they voted when the ballots are counted.

Mr. PATTERSON (Colchester). Tell us about the road commissioners appointed by the local government? How did they vote?

Mr. FRASER. If a man holds a road commission this summer, or does work for two or three weeks, are you going to disfranchise him for that? Would you disfranchise that man because he takes public money and disburses it? He does not by any means live on that employment.

Mr. PATTERSON (Colchester). He generally holds it on the eve of an election.

Mr. FRASER. It would look very nice to spend money on the roads in winter. Does the hon. gentleman mean that the elections only take place at a time when these men can do the work? However, I do not deny that there are evil incidents to both the Local and the Dominion Governments in this respect. I do not say that there are not men representing various counties who make the electors believe that they are going to get road commissions if they vote for them. I know it is the case that men on election day are paid their fishing bounties. In the Local election last year officers were going round on election day and paying out fishing bounties, and telling the fishermen to vote against the Local Government if they wanted to get their fishing bounty. That is evening up the thing, as the hon. member says. But even admitting for the sake of argument that this Act of the Provincial Legislature is wrong, is the hon. member for Annapolis going to perpetuate another wrong? Do two wrongs make one right? As representatives of the whole people of this Dominion, I think we should rise above the prejudices of the local governments and take a broader view of this question than they do. Because the local governments do wrong, are we to follow in their footsteps? Is this great Dominion going to engage in a petty warfare—admitting that the whole thing is wrong—with the various provinces, and do a thing which the hon. member himself admits is wrong, simply in retaliation for the acts of the local government? That is statesmanship, is it? There is a good deal to be said in favour of the local government when they passed that Act, because the political feelings to which the hon. member referred, were strong in Nova Scotia at that time, and it was found that every man who was appointed by the Dominion Government was a strong friend of the Conservative candidates.

Mr. PATTERSON (Colchester). If those feelings do not exist now, why not repeal the Act?

Mr. FRASER. Because those feelings continue to this day, they have been nurtured until now. My principle is that the Act is right from a provincial standpoint, and that it covers a principle which should be more largely applied, namely, that neither the employees of Provincial Governments nor of the Dominion Government should be allowed to vote. In Nova Scotia, sheriffs and judges of probate have no vote.

An hon. MEMBER. And what about the County Attorneys?

Mr. FRASER. They are appointed from year to year to conduct the business; but there is no business for them to conduct unless true bills are found by the grand juries of the counties.

Mr. COCHRANE. In Ontario, bailiffs are appointed by the Local Government, and also license inspectors.

Mr. FRASER. We have no license inspectors in Nova Scotia, and our jailers are appointed by the sheriffs. We are a temperance people, and do not require license inspectors to keep the people sober.

Mr. PATTERSON (Colchester). Does the hon. gentleman mean to say there are no license inspectors in Nova Scotia?

Mr. FRASER. They are appointed by local councils, and by town councils.

Mr. PATTERSON (Colchester). The hon. gentleman had better read up recent legislation, and he will find that the appointment of license inspectors is confirmed by the Local Government, and they are beyond the power of municipal authorities.

Mr. FRASER. I beg pardon. The men appointed to carry out the Scott Act in the counties are appointed by the County Councils, and are not subject to the Local Government.

Mr. PATTERSON (Colchester). Will the hon. gentleman tell me what happens in counties where the liquor law is in operation?

Mr. FRASER. Halifax appoints its own inspector.

Mr. PATTERSON (Colchester). Take other counties.

Mr. FRASER. In almost all other counties the Scott Act is in operation.

Mr. PATTERSON (Colchester). I name Colchester, where the license law is in operation, and I refer to the appointment of the inspectors. I challenge the hon. gentleman to deny my statement.

Mr. FRASER. Where the provincial license law is in operation, I do not deny that such is the fact; but it is in operation only in two or three counties. Where the Scott Act is in operation the Government have nothing to do with the appointment of the officers.

Mr. AMYOT. In the province of Quebec they appoint them all.

Mr. FRASER. They need many officers there to keep the people in order. But so far as license inspectors are concerned, I should not object to both inspectors and persons holding licenses being debarred from voting. The Local Government in Nova Scotia placed itself in exactly the same position as is occupied by the Dominion Government. The adoption of the Bill submitted would simply lead to reprisals, and the local governments can use their powers with greater advantage than the Dominion Government. The Provincial Governments can pass an Act so that no man in the province of Nova Scotia who receives a dollar from the Dominion Government, shall have the right to vote. The Local Government, in fact, can act with ten times more force than the Dominion authorities, and if this Parliament takes action in the direction suggested by the present Bill, the Local Government will, no doubt, retaliate. The adoption of this Bill would not cause the Local Government to repeal their Act, and the only course to be pursued by this Parliament is to make its own franchise as wide as possible, without regard to the methods adopted by the Local Government. If hon. gentlemen opposite imagine they are going to coerce the Local Government they are much mistaken. They are made of the same metal, and will act in their own interests just as they have done heretofore, and the only thing to bring them to repentance—if that is necessary in the hon. gentleman's view—is for us to go on our way, and if they are wrong to show them that we, in a larger sphere can afford to be right and can set them a better example. This resolution is not founded on correct principles. It is a different resolution altogether from the section of the Act it is meant to strike at. The Act itself is clear, and it places whatever officials they have, whether they be few or many, in the same position as the officers of this Government. I, for my part, believe that no official of the Government should vote. I believe that if officials do not vote we would have better officials, men who would attend to their business better, men who would rise in the several departments better, men who would feel that when the storm raged and the flutter of ballots was over that it made no difference in their position, men who would feel on the day of election as they would on the day after election, whether their friends were returned to power or not, that their position was safe—I am sure this Parliament will not for a moment consider a resolution of this kind, and I am satisfied that we will not crystallize it into law. There are those who may think differently, but I am sure a moment's reflection will show them, that this resolution is neither correct in principle, nor would it lead to beneficial results. Anger is not the best way to remedy an evil, and retaliation certainly never did. There are no two nations in the world who have retaliated one on the other who ever came nearer on account of that retaliation. If a wrong does exist, this central Government will never remedy it by retaliation. For myself I can only speak for Nova Scotia, and I think that the Act as passed is good so far as that province is concerned, and has not been productive of wrong. The argument of the hon. gentleman, that it has prevented one government from coming into power, and another government from going out, is not a good argument. The people themselves have a right to choose, and certain am I that 50 persons all around in the various countries would not turn out the present Government and put in the Opposition.

Mr. DALY. I was going to address some remarks to the House in reference to the resolution of the hon. gentleman, but as the hour is late and as the House is weary, I will simply move the adjournment of the debate by saying that I would like to have referred to the iniquity,—as the hon. member for Annapolis (Mr. Mills) has termed it,—of the Manitoba Legislature in reference to the disfranchisement in that province, of not only the Government employees, but of regular soldiers and persons enrolled in military schools. I regret to have to say to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mills), however, that I do not agree with the terms of his resolution. I do not agree with the idea, that because an iniquity has been perpetrated by the Government of Manitoba, or the Government of Nova Scotia, or the Government of Prince Edward Island, that this Government, or this Parliament should retaliate upon these different provinces. On the contrary I would give the advice to the hon. gentleman to turn the other cheek, and to let pass at present any idea of his getting back at the Governments of the different provinces who have seen fit to disfranchise so many of our fellow-citizens who are as well entitled to vote as any person. One remark with reference to the legislation of Manitoba. This clause contained in the Election Act, as cited by the hon. gentleman, is within the provisions of the law, that first gave manhood suffrage to the people of that province. During our local elections we heard on every hustings that the Government of Mr. Greenway were going to give the people manhood suffrage. It is true they said that there should be one man one vote, but on the other hand they disfranchised a large number of people who were entitled to exercise the right of free men. It seems to me an extraordinary thing that these men who expressed a desire to give our people manhood suffrage should at the same time say that certain men, because they were employees of the Dominion Government, and because they wore the uniform of Her Majesty the Queen, should be deprived of voting, and should be placed in the same category as those mentioned in subsection "b" of the Act, namely: "lunatics, idiots, and persons of unsound mind, and persons confined in any jail, penitentiary or asylum, or other public institutions as convicts or prisoners." To include the officials of the Dominion Government, and the soldiers of the Queen in such a category as that, was simply adding insult to injury. With reference to the remarks of the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Fraser) as to the motto, 'similia similibus curantur,' quoted by my hon. friend from Annapolis (Mr. Mills); I can only say, that the hon. gentleman from Annapolis (Mr. Mills) merely meant to give our friends of the Opposition a little retaliation in homeopathic doses. I am, however, of opinion that no good purpose could be served by this Parliament placing on its statutes, what the hon. gentleman has declared to be, and what I think he was right in declaring to be, the iniquitous enactment of some Local Governments. At this late hour, Mr. Speaker, I move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. INGRAM. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman if this debate is adjourned now, where will it put the motion?

An hon. MEMBER. It will come up after prohibition.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. At the foot of Public Bills and Orders.

Mr. INGRAM. Then, that will be the last of it. If the hon. the leader of the Government were to move the adjournment of the House it would allow this matter to remain where it is, and several hon. members who wish to discuss it would have an opportunity of doing so.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Then it would go off the paper altogether.

Mr. INGRAM. In that case I would prefer the other evil.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

RETURNS ORDERED.

—Address to His Excellency the Governor General for copies of all correspondence that has passed between the Post Office Department here, or any other Department of the Canadian Government and the Government of the United States on the subject of certain packets of printed papers franked by a member of the United States Congress which were received in this country from the United States, and which, according to a statement made in the House by the Postmaster General, 2nd April, were sent to the Dead Letter Office as not being prepaid by stamps and not being legislative papers or documents. Also, copies of all correspondence that has passed between the Canadian and United States Governments on the subject of franked matter through the mails from one country to the other. Also, copies of all correspondence that has passed between the Post Office Department and individuals

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved the adjournment of the House.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 120) for the relief of Joseph Thompson—(from the Senate).—(Mr. Northrup.)

Bill (No. 119) for the relief of William Samuel Piper—(from the Senate).—(Mr. Northrup.)

ADJOURNMENT—QUEEN'S BIRTHDAY.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved :

That Government Orders have precedence over other business on Wednesday, 23rd May next, after questions to be put by members, and that when the House adjourns on said day it shall stand adjourned until Monday, the 28th May, at 3 o'clock.

Mr. LAURIER. Mr. Speaker, I understand that there is a very general desire that the House should be adjourned from to-morrow until Monday next, and under such circumstances I do not think it would be advisable on my part to offer any opposition to this part of the motion. I see, however, that the hon. gentleman still couples with his motion the taking of to-morrow, Wednesday, for Government business, but I see also that he limits this provision to to-morrow, and that the following Wednesday will be still devoted to private members' business. I suppose the attendance will be rather small to-morrow, and perhaps the hon. gentleman may take his whole motion.

Mr. MULOCK. It may be that to-morrow may not be a convenient day for considering many of the matters on the Order paper, and I should be glad if it were possible for me to agree with the mover and with my leader in this matter ; but I am not able on this occasion to quite recognize the discipline which, perhaps, ought to obtain. Before this motion is carried I wish to see if it is not possible for the Government to manifest some degree of liberality towards private members, in order to enable them to make some progress with the public Bills that they deem it their duty to submit to the House. I myself feel deeply interested in one measure, and I think that the interest involved in it will not justify any action in regard to legislation on the measure being deferred to another session. I refer to the Bill dealing with ocean freight rates on cattle. This Bill has been before the House since almost the commencement of the session, and not yet has there been an opportunity for me to proceed with it. The whole of private members' days have been occupied up to the present time by a discussion of one or two motions that have been passed over from Monday to Wednesday, and by the Bill respecting the purity of elections, which appears to be of considerable concern to some members of this House. The result has been that a great mass of legislation in the hands of private members, and I would say, so far as my knowledge of that legislation goes, the most important part of it has not received the least attention at the hands of the House. If the Government is determined to deprive members of the power of pressing the Bills that stand in their name, it is due to them that the Government should go through the Order paper and say whether they will take charge of any, and if so, of what Bills. For instance, I do not think you can for a moment say that the matter I refer to, of ocean freight rates on cattle, is one that should be allowed to stand over for another session. When I introduced the Bill on that subject, I specially requested the Government to consider the matter, with the view either of accepting the Bill or dealing with the subject. I was careful to say at the time, and I repeat now, that I presented my proposition with some degree of diffidence, and with the hope that it might result in the Government dealing with the subject. I felt then and I feel now that it is a most difficult thing for a private member, with, I will not say the obstruction, but with the 'vis inertiae' of the House, to press a measure to a conclusion, if the House is not sufficiently interested in the matter to assist him in pressing it forward. Now, I will not take up the time of the House in pointing out the necessity of this legislation. That duty has been done for me by others. It has been made clear to the House and also to the Government, by representations from very many sources, that the matter of freight rates on cattle is a standing grievance. It is an evil that must be remedied, and I presume that Parliament will not admit that it is not all-powerful to deal with a matter so greatly concerning our national interests. There is in Canada to-day a surplus of stock, owing to the state of the trade last year. We did not export all the cattle we would have exported under more favourable conditions; so that we have not only the crop of this year, but the surplus crop of last year. The country is full of cattle waiting for shipment to Great Britain, the only market for it; and unless before the House rises guarantees are given or some security is afforded that the freight rates will not be increased, the very moment Parliament rises you will have the combination in Montreal repeating the practices they have been guilty of for several years, as I will prove when we come to discuss this question, in order to wring out of the farmers a large portion not only of their earnings, but of their capital, by excessive freight rates. The hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries stated to a member a short time ago that he was waiting to receive from the cattle men comparative statements of the rates at Montreal and the rates at American ports. I presume that he had not been informed of the exact state of the evil. If the information has not been furnished to him by any persons engaged in the cattle trade, I presume it is because of their inability to obtain exact statements from the Montreal shipping agents. But I presume the Government, all-powerful as they are, could have obtained that information, if they so desired. Possibly they have it at the present moment. If they have, they will know, as I know, that there has been a gross discrimination at the port of Montreal against the cattle trade of Canada for at least four years. I have not statistics further back than 1890; but I have them from 1890 forward—though not as complete as I would like to have them, because some of the Montreal vessel agents declined to give me the information. The information I have enables me to state that for the years 1890, 1891 and 1892 gross discrimination has existed against the cattle interest at the port of Montreal as compared with the rates prevailing in favour of American cattle men at American ports. In fact, I can establish by figures—and I will give the tabulated statement when I have an opportunity of going into this matter thoroughly—that in the four years from 1890 to the present time the Canadian farmers have paid to the agents of Canadian vessels plying from Montreal, in excess of what they would have paid if they had got competitive rates, not less than $1,500,000. If that is true, I challenge the fairness of the Government in taking away from private members the only day on which this matter can be threshed out, except on the understanding that they propose to take it up themselves. That is one great reason why I am not able to assent to the motion now made. There are many other measures on the Order paper in which I feel an interest, but I press this one specially, and I speak with all anxiety in regard to it. I would beg the Government either to give the House an assurance before we assent to this motion, either that they will themselves take charge of this matter and deal with it, or else that I shall have an opportunity of taking the sense of the House upon my Bill during the present session. I think that is a fair proposition to make, and I trust that I am pressing my case in a fair and conciliatory spirit. It is in that sense I desire to present it; for I feel that it is a matter of that gravity and importance that demands the unbiassed judgment of every member of this House. I would, therefore, beg the Government to undertake to deal with the matter in one or other of these ways before they insist on taking this day. I would be glad to let the Government business go forward. If the desire of the Government is to take to-morrow in order to finish their tariff, that is an excellent reason for taking it; but the reasons I have advanced ought to induce the Government to make restitution to private members by giving us as much time in the future as they will have lost by the Government taking Wednesday. The Opposition have, without any demur, allowed the Government to take several private members' days at the commencement of the session, and for that reason I think we have established an extra claim to restitution, in order that we may have an opportunity to press the Bills in our hands.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) has been dwelling on one particular Bill on the Order paper, the Bill relating to ocean freights; and his mention of my name gives me an opportunity to make my position clear in so far as I have had any connection with that measure. I said across the floor of the House a few days ago to the hon. member for South Grey (Mr. Landerkin), that on the last occasion on which I had the pleasure of meeting the shippers of cattle who were interested in some such legislation as that in charge of the hon. member for North York, that they had promised to furnish me—

Mr. MULOCK. Only one promised.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I understood that gentleman to speak, as each member of the delegation seemed to be speaking, for them all. At any rate, one of those gentlemen representing the shippers of cattle promised to furnish me with very important information—in fact, information on which the hon. gentleman proposes to base this legislation; and we discussed the subject very fully in an informal way. That was the second occasion upon which the question came up. I met, in conjunction with the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock), these gentlemen on a previous occasion, and we discussed generally the subject. And I am glad to say they appreciated the extraordinary difficulties that surround their own proposition. It was pointed out by myself, and on the whole concurred in by these gentlemen, that it was of great importance that this Parliament should take no action interfering with the business of those conducting these big ocean steamers at the port of Montreal, which would, in the slightest degree, embarrass the shipping interests of that great port, or tend in the slightest degree to injure the port itself by creating the impression that Montreal alone, of the great ports of the world, had a system under which a vessel reaching that port was not free to do business on the best terms possible, according to the ideas of the ship-owners and the condition of the market. That very fair proposition, those interested in the shipping of cattle practically conceded.

Mr. MULOCK. If my hon. friend desires to discuss the proposition I am quite prepared, but I would respectfully submit to him that that is not the whole case, and to make his statement of the case without giving me the opportunity to reply would hardly be fair. I think, therefore, the hon. gentleman ought to confine himself to the subject I alluded to and not to the remedy.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentleman need not be in the slightest degree alarmed. I am putting the position, as I understand it, so that early in the day, if I am under any wrong impression, I may be corrected. I am not arguing the case at all—far from it. I am not prepared at the moment to say what my conclusions, on examination of the case, will be, as a member of this House and Government, but I seize the opportunity, as the hon. gentleman is pressing on the House the importance of hurrying on with that legislation to suggest certain facts which, in my humble judgment, involve this consideration. Is it wise to press, under present circumstances for legislation of this character? Those interested take the one ground, as I understood them, for this exceptional and extraordinary legislation, interfering with this important interest, that, owing to the peculiar regulations now obtaining, touching the shipment of cattle, which do not surround other branches of commerce—owing to the fact that they are not free to resort to the ports of Boston and New York for the purpose of shipping the cattle—they are placed by legislation as they put it, and by the laws of this country, in such a position that they are at the mercy of the ship-owners in Montreal. That seems to be the chief feature of their case, and the hon. member for South Grey (Mr. Landerkin), I am sure, will confirm me in the statement, which he did not dispute the other day, when I said that it would be very important for the full consideration of this question that we should know exactly what are the rates charged at one port and the other. That would involve the question as to whether the charges were comparatively higher at one port than at another, because all those questions of charges—port dues and shipping charges generally—must be considered by this House before we can entertain such an extraordinary proposition as is contained in the Bill fathered by the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock). All I am saying now, without taking up a position upon any side of the question, is this, that that information has not been forthcoming. These gentlemen have had ample opportunity to produce it, and I take it for granted they are endeavouring to obtain it, but from that day when we met in friendly conference, and when, speaking for the Government, I said we were most anxious that the interests of all parties interested should be safeguarded, but that was before I could bring the subject before the Government—and they singled me out to do so—I would require to have particular and specific information, from that day to this, the information has not been given. I am not complaining that I have not received it.

Mr. MULOCK. Why cannot you get it yourself?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentleman puts an extraordinary question. I am dealing with the men directly interested, who are now shipping their cattle and anxious to see legislation pushed on if necessary, and I have every reason, as a business man, to believe that these points are not so exceedingly intense in the opinion of those interested in the shipping of cattle as they were a few weeks ago. But I have said it in Parliament before, and repeat it now, that I, as a member of this House, am waiting for the information which is promised, and which is information the hon. gentleman knows must be in the possession of this House, before we can pass the legislation covered by this Bill. The hon. gentleman knows that this Bill—however, it would not be fair to enter upon that, which would be a point of difference; but I do not think the hon. gentleman stands by any particular clause of the Bill, and has merely brought the subject up in order that it may be dealt with. But we do want the information promised; and as it has not been supplied, there does not seem to be that urgency in connection with the measure that should induce this House to hurry it on a stage.

Mr. McMULLEN. The hon. Minister appears to be quite unaware of the necessity for immediate action in connection with this very measure. Representations have been made to the Government by deputations, backed up by members on this side, and no doubt by members on that side, urging immediate action. Why does that urgent necessity exist? It is because there are in this country at present in the stables of farmers, not less than from seventy-five to ninety thousand head of cattle ready for shipment, which they are looking for a favourable opportunity to ship to the other side. Is not that a reason why the hon. Minister should secure at once the information he refers to? Why should legislation be retarded because he is dilatory in procuring the necessary information, which, he says, he requires before he can permit this Bill to come before the House? Every day we have petitions from all classes urging upon the Government the necessity for immediate action. I am not going now to criticise the course of the steamship companies. I am not going to say whether they have been exorbitant in their rates or not. I will leave that to the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock), who no doubt will deal with it in a manner to convince the House that, whatever the rates may be for the moment, they have in the past been exorbitant. I am not going to charge the Government with being entirely responsible for the present conditions, but unquestionably it is very unfortunate for the farming interests that the whole shipping trade of the Dominion should be cornered at the port of Montreal. Why, Sir, it is very true that there is no other place from which to ship live cattle.

Mr. FREMONT. Bring them to Quebec.

Mr. McMULLEN. Yes; you may send them to Quebec, but that is like sending them to another door in the same house, for Quebec is controlled by the same shipping companies, and the same cattle dealers that control Montreal. I speak from information which is authentic when I say that cattle dealers have been able to extort from shippers excessive prices by buying up the space in the vessel. It is, perhaps, quite reasonable, from their standpoint, to speculate in that way, but the men of whom the excessive prices have been demanded would have been able to avoid this extortion if they had had the port of Portland, or the port of Boston open to them. These facts have been made known to the Government by deputations who have waited upon them. Still, the Minister of Marine and Fisheries says he has not the information to legislate, while the farmers are at home with their herds in their stables waiting for relief from the present condition of affairs. The Government have been exceedingly tardy in this whole matter. It has been pressed upon them ever since Parliament met. It has been pressed upon them by the hon. member for North York; it has been urged upon them in speeches, not only on this side of the House, but from their own supporters—the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) made some reference to this unfortunate condition of things in the speech he made. I say it is a most unfortunate condition of things that the farmers are hampered in this way. This is one of the best branches of the agricultural industry in the province of Ontario. It has been an important trade, it has been a desirable trade, it is one at which the farmers can make money if they are not hampered and fettered by restrictions or by the action of any combination of buyers that control vessel-space, and so extort from them money which should form part of the profits of their industry. I exceedingly regret that the Minister of Marine has again evinced his unwillingness to go on. Has he pressed and urged for this information which he thinks so necessary, so that action may be taken and the present unfortunate situation relieved? Unless action is taken soon the opportunity to relieve the farmers from the present condition of things will have passed for this season. The cattle will have been shipped under the present unfavourable conditions, or will have been returned to the pasture. I again express the hope that the Government will not longer permit any delay in this matter.

Mr. SPROULE. I think no hon. member of this House will deny the importance of this question to which reference has been made; nor will any deny the urgency of the present condition of things owing to the advanced season of the year we have reached. But I must confess that I rather agree with the remarks made by the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries with regard to the information that was intended to be supplied by the cattle shippers. If the allegations made by them are correct—and the impression made on the minds of those who heard them must have been that those allegations were correct—they showed a very undesirable state of things at Montreal. When the Minister asked that they should present the information in some specific shape and they agreed to do so, he understood, and I certainly understood, that that information was to be furnished at an early day. I had occasion within two weeks to write to one of these gentlemen in connection with the same subject and called his attention to the fact that I had had a conversation with the Minister with a view to inducing him to introduce legislation to remove the evils that existed, and the Minister's reply was that until the information promised by the cattle shippers was furnished he did not want to go on. I reminded the gentlemen that there was the greatest urgency in the situation, and that it was most desirable that the information should be furnished. I received a reply to the effect that the information had not yet been forwarded, but would be given in due time. It does look a little suspicious, to say the least of it, that this information has not been furnished, though we have had two interviews with the cattle men and some communication with them since that time. If the condition of things exists that they represent as existing, it is most important that some legislation should be enacted to meet the situation. We have the allegation on one side and the emphatic and distinct denial on the other as to the existence of this condition of things. I know it is very hard for a private member to get the information, and it may be equally hard for the Government to get it. I know that in my efforts to secure it I failed. I do not know who can supply that information better than the cattle men, if they chose to do it. The fact that they have not done it is, to my mind, likely to give rise to the suspicion that there is something in the facts which does not square to the allegations made to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The earnest representations which were made by the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) are entitled to great consideration indeed. When an hon. member has a Bill upon the paper which relates to an important public interest and presses as strongly as the hon. member for North York does for time to consider it, I am sure the House is willing to lend its attention and to give every possible facility for having the Bill discussed. I understand that the hon. gentleman's request is that one of three courses shall be taken. One is that we shall make restitution for the day that we take to-morrow, and without quarrelling about the phrase, I would say that we would do that by leaving him the following Wednesday.

Mr. MULOCK. That we have, I understand.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The hon. gentleman will agree with me that that would not give him satisfactory assurance that his Bill will be reached, because I take it for granted the day will be occupied by other Bills now standing before it on the Order paper. In the second place he asks that we should see to it that the Bill gets a hearing and comes to a vote in the House. I think it is too early for the hon. gentleman to ask an assurance upon that question. I am not in a position to say what time we will move to take Wednesdays, but when we do take Wednesdays, it may be that a portion of Monday will be allowed for public Bills and Orders. But the hon. gentleman will see that he can make his representations on that subject when we come to move that Wednesdays shall be taken, if, in the meantime, his Bill shall not have been reached. But we will give due consideration to the hon. gentleman's earnest desire to have his Bill dealt with this session. The other alternative the hon. gentleman suggested was that the Government should take up the Bill themselves. I am not prepared to give an assurance upon that subject. What I would prefer is that the hon. gentleman should have an opportunity of moving the Bill, and that it should be in his charge, because I know the deep interest he has taken in the question. I am not prepared to agree with one word the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) has said upon this subject, I am sorry to say. I listened with astonishment while he attempted to cast reproach upon the Government for having delayed the Bill, when he is perfectly well aware that the Government have not delayed it by one half hour. As I said before, to the hon. member for North York, without promising to treat it as a Government measure, we will do what we can to leave Wednesdays open until his Bill is disposed of, but, even if it should not be reached in that way, to see that an opportunity is given for the discussion of it.

Mr. SPROULE.

Mr. McMULLEN. The right hon. gentleman misunderstood me if he thought that I said the Government had delayed the Bill. What I said was that they were tardy in securing the information necessary to proceed with the Bill.

Mr. MULOCK. I am glad the First Minister has given these assurances, which I know are given in good faith, and I think I will be safe in saying that I can rely upon his assistance to get the Bill before the House, and to take the sense of the House upon it. I am sure he is speaking with utter frankness and honesty of purpose, and does not intend, by securing my acquiescence in this motion to-day, that the measure in question shall be prejudiced. I accept his utterance in that spirit.

Mr. McCARTHY. The question is as to whether the House should consent unanimously to surrender one of the few days that it has for the disposal of public Bills and Orders.

Mr. LAURIER. For to-morrow only.

Mr. McCARTHY. I understand that; but still, in the early part of the session we all acquiesced in the proposition of the First Minister that all the days belonging to private members should be given up to the discussion of the tariff. Now, the result has been that although the session is two months old, of the public Bills and Orders which are in the hands of private members, practically but three have been reached. One of them has been in committee, and another has not yet even reached that stage. Now, it is useless for any of us, after the assent which has been given by the hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition, to seek to divide the House as to the propriety of giving up to-morrow. I desire to add to what has been said by the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock), and to what has fallen from hon. gentlemen who have already spoken on this subject, that the Bill the hon. member has in charge is one which, whether it is possible for this House to deal with it or not, is certainly of the greatest importance, one that this House should not separate without hearing fully discussed, and if the grievance to which it relates exists to the extent which we are led to suppose, the House should certainly endeavour to find some remedy for it. I desire to withhold any opinion one way or the other as to the possibility even of dealing with this question. I see its enormous difficulties. We must be very careful, in any action we may take here, not to interfere with the shipping of the port of Montreal. The port of Montreal, or the port of Quebec—at all events, the St. Lawrence route—is the great means of exit from this country, and we ought and must encourage the shipping interests in every way we can. But if it be true that any combination or arrangement at Montreal is dealing unfairly with the farmers or the cattle-shippers of this country, we ought if possible, on the other hand, to see and have that remedied. But there is another matter. The Government cannot be unaware—I do not make any charge, because I might arouse my hon. friend who is sitting opposite me—but we know one Bill which is in charge of the hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon) has already taken two days to discuss. To many of us—I dare say quite erroneously—but still to many of us it does appear that there has been an apparent design to protract discussion on that measure so as to prevent, possibly, the other measures that are below it on the list, from being reached, and the Government cannot be unaware of the fact that the press have almost unanimously come to the conclusion that one of the Bills which it is intended to block is the Bill which stands in my name.

Mr. OUIMET. Is it in order to say that hon. gentlemen have protracted certain debates in this House in order to obstruct the business of the House?

Mr. LAURIER. The charge was made by the Government themselves.

Mr. SPEAKER. If the hon. member is charging any member with obstructing the business of the House he is clearly out of order.

Mr. McCARTHY. I was particularly careful to say that it was the press who made that charge, and I do not see how we can stop the press from saying so. I do not dread my hon. friend to the left, but I do dread my hon. friend opposite, if I make any charge of that kind. I am glad to see, however, that the hon. Minister is so careful about points of order. He does not always indicate so great a care for the observance of the rules of order of this House.

Mr. OUIMET. I may have some care for the honour and dignity of members.

Mr. McCARTHY. Then all I have to say is that the Government, having full knowledge that this is supposed to be the object, I think it only fair to draw their attention to the fact that a conclusion will be drawn not adverse to that view, if this course is persisted in of taking from us day after day on every pretext. Surely we have a right to introduce these Bills with some hope of reaching them in an ordinary session, or we have not. This is an ordinary session. The last session, of course, was not an ordinary session, owing to the absence of the First Minister for causes which I do not blame at all, and which I perfectly understand, and therefore it was impossible for measures of this kind to be dealt with. But this is an ordinary session, and I am in charge of a Bill which excites a good deal of interest in the country, and which I shall endeavour to press to a conclusion. I just rise for the purpose of drawing attention to the probable conclusion that the public will draw from the conduct of the Government in abridging the time at the disposal of private members.

Mr. AMYOT. I presume I am the member designed by the hon. gentleman who has just spoken. I do not see why he draws attention to my humble individuality. I may tell him that for my part I do not intend to obstruct the business of this House in any way, and I do not feel open to the charge of having done so.

Mr. McCARTHY. I did not at all mean to charge the hon. gentleman with having obstructed the business of the House in any way. I felt sure that if I suggested that any member did that, I would bring down wrath on my devoted head.

Mr. AMYOT. The hon. gentleman, says he meant nothing, he only got the press to speak for him. I suppose he means now that the press insinuated that I was obstructing.

Mr. McCARTHY. No, no.

Mr. AMYOT. I wish to say that I was not obstructing, and I defy the hon. member who has just spoken, or any other hon. member, to quote one word of what I said in that discussion which was useless and not pertinent to the subject. Now, let me say to him—and I speak in the name of a great many members of this House—that we have great respect for the sentiments of our confrères. We respect the sentiments of any hon. member who is elected to represent a county in this House, and who makes a sacrifice of his personal affairs to come here and sit daily and deliberate with his fellow members; but with respect to those who attend to their personal affairs out of this House, and who only come here when they have mischief to make, if their measures fail to pass, we do not care, and that is the position of the hon. gentleman. He goes and attends to his private business throughout the country, and when he comes here it is for the purpose of introducing mischievous motions and trying to press them upon the House—motions that are calculated to breed disorder and destroy the harmony that prevails in this country. Whenever there is a chance for his motions to come before the House, then we see him in his place, but at no other time. So he may be sure that although we do not resort to obstruction, when we see that his measures fail to reach maturity, a great many of us are happy.

Mr. CURRAN. The hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) intimated that it might be supposed that there was some desire on the part of some persons in this House that his Bill should not be reached. Now, I would call the attention of the House to the fact that his Bill was called a few days ago, and his hon. friend from Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) asked that it should stand, although that was not necessary. But still, the Bill was called, and if the hon. gentleman had been in the House here attending to his business like the rest of us, his Bill would have gone on. But he being absent, of course, he cannot blame anybody but himself if he has lost his turn.

Mr. McCARTHY. Just allow me to say—although I know I am out of order in speaking again—that on the day referred to I was absent on account of sickness in my family, which prevented my attendance here.

Mr. McMILLAN. I desire to urge on the Government that they should take as broad a view as possible of all questions connected with the cattle trade. What should be done is to place immediately at rest the cattle interest, and to remove the state of uncertainty at present existing. So far as the steamship lines are concerned, I may say that I have shipped cattle during eight or nine years by one line; I have always received a decided answer and practically have never failed to get space when I wanted it. We always ship by the Donaldson line, and I repeat that I have never failed to get space during eight years, except on one occasion. It may be that private individuals would not be able to obtain the information referred to, the amount steamships have charged in times past. The companies might not feel inclined to furnish that information to private individuals, and it should be the duty of the Government to collect it, especially as it would be a matter of interest and importance to those engaged in the trade. I think the Government should, as early as possible, set the question at rest, either by taking action immediately or by stating definitely that they would not take any action in the matter.

Motion agreed to.

SUPPLY.

Mr. FOSTER moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of Supply.

Mr. LAURIER. I was under the expectation that the Minister of Finance would ask the House to resolve itself into Committee of Ways and Means in order to dispose of the tariff, and I think the extra day, tomorrow, was given to the Government in order that the consideration of the tariff might be concluded this week; otherwise, the House might have arrived at another conclusion. There was no other reason than that for giving the Government another day.

Mr. AMYOT.

However, the hon. gentleman has moved the House into Committee of Supply. Before we proceed into committee, we are entitled to know what is the intention of the Government with respect to the business of the House. I observe that the Prime Minister has given notice of four Bills which he intends to bring up to-morrow: an Act to amend the Criminal Code, 1892, an Act to amend the Revenue and Audit Act, an Act to amend the Dominion Elections, and finally, an Act to amend the Electoral Franchise Act. I think we are entitled to know, before we proceed further, if these are the only measures which the Government intend to introduce during the present session. There has been a rumour in the press that the Government contemplated a redistribution of seats in the province of Quebec. We had a redistribution two years ago, but this report has been current in the newspapers for some time, and we wish to learn whether the Government intend to bring in a new Redistribution Bill. I will not say anything as to the propriety of introducing such a measure, but I desire to obtain from the Government information on these two points, whether they have any other measures to bring before the House, or whether the measures of which notice has already been given are the measures they intend to submit, and especially whether they intend to introduce a measure for the redistribution of seats in the province of Quebec.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I do not like to hear the hon. gentleman's question put in that way, because it implies that he is tired of remaining here and wishes to have the end of the session in view. I am sure that that is not the feeling we entertain, for we desire his presence, and the presence of his friends for a few weeks yet. The Bills of which the Government have given notice are not the only Bills we propose to introduce. We intend to submit a Bill respecting the French treaty, a Bill respecting the ocean steamship service on the Atlantic, and a Bill respecting joint stock companies, to come from the Senate. I have not in my memory, at the present moment, any other Bills which we have formed a definite intention of introducing. The subject respecting which the hon. gentleman has desired information more especially, is a very interesting one, and one we should like to deal with if the session were long enough, but it depends on the length of the session.

Mr. LAURIER. I understand now.

Mr. CHARLTON. I think it is to be regretted that the Government have not proceeded with Ways and Means. There is a feeling in the country that the tariff should be settled, and the course of the Government with respect to this measure is certainly one which does not reflect the very highest degree of credit upon the Administration. The Government met the House, and in the Budget speech, the Finance Minister pronounced the policy of the Government with respect to the tariff, and it is evident, by what has since transpired, that the hon. gentleman had arrived at a conclusion without due consideration, and without having sufficiently consulted the interests of the various manufacturing lines in the country. Sir, the conduct of the Government since that time has been marked by irresolution and indecision. Great changes have been made in the tariff. Generally, the Government have gone back from the position taken by the Finance Minister when he delivered his Budget Speech, to the position of the Government before the tariff was introduced. The Government and the Finance Minister by this time should be ready to tell the people the reason of the delay. They surely have been waited upon by all the deputations required in order to be able to know what measures should be definitely adopted. It is unnecessary to inform the hon. member that the business of the country suffers to-day in consequence of this state of indecision in which the Government seems to be, and the state of uncertainty which exists as to what the character of the tariff finally shall be. We have an instance of the effect of this kind of dilly-dallying with an important question like this in the United States, where the business of the country is totally prostrated, awaiting the settlement of the tariff measures, and we have the fiercest denunciation of the United States Senate for the delay that has occurred in that body in arriving at a decision in respect to the Tariff Bill. The effect of this indecision and uncertainty has been most disastrous in a lesser degree from the delay of the Government here with respect to the tariff. It was suggested that when the Government asked that to-morrow should be taken, on the eve of the adjournment for the Queen's Birthday until Monday, that the Government were anxious to complete this measure, and did not desire that the country should wait until after the adjournment in a state of uncertainty. Why are not the Government ready and prepared to complete the tariff? Why do they propose to go into Committee of Supply, with the tariff dangling between heaven and earth? I repeat the country wants this measure settled, the Government should be able to settle it, the Government should know their own minds and have resolution and firmness enough to finally and definitely decide what the tariff should be, and let the country know the result; and I look upon this move of the Government to postpone the consideration of the tariff and allow the House now to resolve itself into Committee of Supply as an indication of irresolution, lack of knowledge on their part, and every circumstance connected with the postponement will have a most prejudicial effect on the country. The people will take it for granted that the Government are still unable to decide what shall be done, waiting for more light, for more influence to be brought to bear, waiting to see what the pressure will be, and, in view of this action, the people of the country will expect further changes to be made. The Government should go forward with the tariff measure and complete it.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not think the outlook as black as the hon. gentleman would make it appear. I do not propose to go over a second edition of the little history recited a day or two ago; there is no occasion for it. The hon. gentleman seems to-day to develop all the zeal of a new convert. After having made every effort to prevent items being discussed and dealt with—and no member has engaged in more useless discussion than the hon. gentleman, especially by dealing with reciprocity, which is dear to his own heart—the hon. gentleman now finds that a mistake has been made, and he cannot bear any delay after the tariff is practically settled. Let me set the hon. gentleman's heart at rest, and the country's heart at rest, if that palpitates now with uncertainty and dread—the tariff is practically decided. We have gone through committee, there are one or two items yet to be discussed, which are not of very great moment. There is, however, something which is of some moment, and I propose to take sufficient time to see that it is properly done.

Mr. LAURIER. Hear, hear.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, that is, that the various items, numbering 800, or 1,000, or more altogether, which we have gone over in committee shall be reprinted and shall be carefully gone over to see that they expressed themselves as they ought to do, and to see that there is no inconsistency, and that there are no errors in them. I am engaged at that work now. My hon. friend need not have any very great anxiety, and I am sure the country will not have any very great anxiety, for the amount of change which will be made in the tariff after this is very little indeed.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Are we to understand that the hon. gentleman does not propose to introduce any further changes of moment in the tariff?

Mr. FOSTER. Of no great moment.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I would rather hear a more definite assurance, because what he may consider of great moment, and what the people engaged in business may consider of great moment, may differ very considerably.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not think they will.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It is so far satisfactory to have that assurance, but I am bound to tell the hon. member that the fact that he requires at least another week before he is prepared to finish his tariff, and that after it has been revised and re-revised and re-revised, goes conclusively to prove the injustice of the charges made by himself and some of his friends and his press, that it was the fault of the Opposition that the tariff could not be put through several weeks earlier. Why, he wants a whole week now to make sure that there are no more clerical errors, and that the various changes that he has introduced really express his meaning. Considering the enormous amount of changes that the hon. gentleman has made, I am not quite sure but that there is a good deal to be said for that view of the case. But most assuredly one thing is clear, and that is: that any delay in bringing the tariff to completion has been due to the immense number of changes the hon. gentleman has introduced, and in no way to the examination which we were obliged to subject him to, in order to ascertain what he really meant or really thought. We know very well that the hon. gentleman's second thoughts or his third thoughts or his fourth thoughts vary enormously from his first thoughts, and we all know the reason why. However, I am glad to hear, and I take special note of the assertion, that the hon. gentleman proposes no more changes of what he calls great moment, and that they will be very few, did I understand him to say?

Mr. FOSTER. Very few.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Well, that is good as far as it goes.

Motion agreed to, and House resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. McMULLEN. It is well, before we start in Committee of Supply, that we should distinctly understand from the Government and from the Finance Minister the course which shall be adopted. For the last two or three years when questions were put, we have frequently got answers from members of the Government that the information would be given in concurrence. We know very well that concurrence in this House has virtually been turned into a farce, and that the items are rushed through at the end of the session and little or no information given. For my part I want it to be understood by every Minister of the Crown, that where just and reasonable information is asked for, we shall expect that information on going through the items in committee, and I hope that the request shall not be made that it shall stand over for concurrence. Last year there was some little sympathy for the Minister of Militia, who was newly installed in his department, and we did not wish to be arbitrary in requiring minute replies as regards the public expenditure of that department. This year there are none of the Ministers very green in the business of the department over which they preside and they ought to be able to give the information.

An hon. MEMBER. Some of them are orange.

Mr. McMULLEN. It does not matter whether they are orange or green, if we get the information we ask. We certainly shall insist this year that we must have at least a courteous answer.

Mr. FOSTER. You always get that.

Mr. McMULLEN. And an intelligent answer, which we do not always get to questions which are put. It is just as well to have that understanding before we start with Supply.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Question.

Mr. McMULLEN. I am debating the question.

Mr. FOSTER. You are laying the foundation, as it were?

Mr. McMULLEN. Personally, I do not want to be charged with keeping this House sitting in the dog-days. I do not think there is a member on this side of the House that wants that, but the Opposition have a duty to perform here. The country expects that we shall fully criticise the Estimates, and see that explicit and clear information is given to the House as to the public expenditure. We would be recreant to the duty we are supposed to discharge to the country if we neglected to extract from the Government, even if it does take some little time and some little trouble and a considerable amount of patience, the information that the country is entitled to. I hope that as we proceed with these items the members of the Government will be ready to give every information which is necessary, and I hope that no request will be made to defer that information until concurrence.

|----------------------------|-----------|
| Charges of management..... | $164,550 |
| Inspector | 1,700 |

Mr. McMULLEN. Who is the inspector?

Mr. FOSTER. The inspector is Mr. George Crookshank, who goes from one end of the country to the other and investigates the books and the management of the different offices of the Receiver General and the Dominion savings banks. We formerly had an inspector and an assistant inspector, and we now have simply an inspector.

Mr. MULLOCK. What is the cause of the difference in the expenses between the offices of the Receiver General at Toronto and at Montreal?

Mr. FOSTER. Montreal is a very important office in the first place, and it is carried on in a little different way. We have in Montreal an arrangement with Mr. Barbeau by which we pay a certain sum for the whole office. In Toronto we have a set of officers.

Mr. MULOCK. You have an inspector for Ontario. Is there also an inspector for Quebec ?

Mr. FOSTER. No ; an inspector for the Dominion. He is stationed at Ottawa, but travels over the whole Dominion.

Mr. McMULLEN. How many clerks are now in the office at Toronto ?

Mr. FOSTER. I believe four.

Mr. McMULLEN. Who is the head ?

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Campbell.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Is the amount paid to the Assistant Receiver General at Montreal the same as the amount paid to the City and District Savings Bank ?

Mr. FOSTER. It is the same. The City and District Savings Bank does our business.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) How do you pay it ?

Mr. FOSTER. By a lump sum arrived at by agreement years ago. The business there is very large, and costs us less than the Toronto business.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) That might be a reason for altering the arrangement in the other place.

Mr. FOSTER. No.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What precise functions do you assign to these gentlemen now ?

Mr. FOSTER. They have just the same duties as they always have had—to keep the cash and take in the official notes. There has been no change.

|--|---------|
| Assistant Receiver General's office, Halifax..... | $8,300 |
|--|---------|

Mr. FORBES. Who is acting as receiver there ?

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Wallace.

Mr. FORBES. Do the Government propose to superannuate him ?

Mr. FOSTER. There is no proposition before the Government for that purpose.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. How does it come that you require so much more for Halifax than for either Toronto or Montreal ?

Mr. FOSTER. The Halifax office is not in our own building ; we have to rent a building there.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Surely there is room enough in the public buildings at Halifax. I see that at Toronto, besides the Assistant Receiver General, there is an accountant, a teller and one clerk, while at Halifax there is the Assistant Receiver General, two accountants, two tellers and a clerk. Now, if four officers can discharge the work at Toronto, I do not see why six are required at Halifax. I imagine that it cannot be that it takes six Nova Scotians to do as much as four natives of Ontario ? and yet this is the apparent inference to be drawn.

Mr. FOSTER. If the hon. gentleman will look at the Public Accounts he will find that the transactions are very much larger in Halifax and St. John than they are in Toronto. At the end of 1892 the balance at Halifax was $2,632,000, and the cash deposits in the year $452,000, and the total at the end of the year $3,164,000. In Toronto the cash balance was only a little over half a million, and the deposits $130,000. The transactions are innumerable more.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) That must necessarily be so, because in Halifax and St. John these offices have the savings bank business. For $5,000 the business of the Receiver General is done in Montreal. What is the nature of the business that would justify the expenditure of $7,000 or $8,000 in Toronto ?

Mr. FOSTER. They have there a much larger business transaction with the banks in specie.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Outside of the savings department, I should imagine the business would not require much clerical assistance.

Mr. FOSTER. There are a great many transactions in notes and specie, whilst in Halifax and St. John the larger part of the business is the receipt and paying out the deposits.

Mr. MULOCK. The Minister may have good reasons for the cost at Halifax being greater than the cost of Toronto, but when we turn to the Halifax and St. John's returns, the discrepancy is extraordinary. The cost of managing the Halifax office exceeds that of managing the St. John office. The Minister implied that the cost of management is in proportion to the volume and the character of the business, and I presume it is reasonable to conclude that the transactions at Halifax and St. John are very much of a like character, and yet it takes less to run the St. John office than the Halifax office. In round numbers, the balance to the credit of St. John's office last year was $3,564,000, while that at Halifax was only $2,600,000, and the deposits in St. John last year were $130,000 more than those at Halifax. In fact, according to these returns the volume of business of all kinds done at the Receiver General's office in St. John last year was very considerably greater than that done at Halifax, although the cost of running the Halifax office is 20 per cent greater than that of running the St. John office.

Mr. FOSTER. The number of depositors in Nova Scotia was 23,818, in New Brunswick 16,372, and in Manitoba 3,726. Ontario, on the other hand, has 1,632 depositors, British Columbia 3,009 and Prince Edward Island 6,482.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) You see that the disproportion of Winnipeg to the others is most enormous. This seems to require some examination on the part of the hon. gentleman with a view to reduction of expenditure.

Mr. CHARLTON. I know that the Minister of Finance has economical characteristics, and desires to carry on the business of the country without undue expense, but it does strike me that the clerical force in these offices is very much in excess of what it would be in any private business of similar proportion.

Mr. FOSTER. That may be true; it is true of all Governments.

Mr. CHARLTON. But in view of the present state of affairs, in view of the depression existing and the amount of debt and taxation we are carrying, there is great necessity for curtailing expenses. In case of our obtaining reciprocity with the United States or passing a prohibitory liquor law we should be deprived of part of our revenue, and we ought to reduce our expenses so as to be prepared for such changes. Men should be engaged who are competent for their work, and no more of them than are necessary should be employed. I believe that this principle is not sufficiently studied in any department, and this is a good time to commence.

Mr. FOSTER. These offices have special attention, and I believe they are run economically. It is sometimes difficult to make disposition of the officers who are already there. Take, for instance, St. John. Since one of the officers went out we have done with one clerk less. In Prince Edward Island a vacancy occurred a few weeks ago; I do not propose to fill that office. Those who are there, I think, can very well do the work, and I am making that disposition of them. When we made the change in British Columbia, and promoted the present officer, we did away with one clerk, and did not appoint any one in the place. I may say that if a vacancy occurred in Halifax or Winnipeg, I would not fill that vacancy. But the officers now there have been there for a long time, and, as my hon. friend knows, we do not like to be violent in these matters.

Mr. CHARLTON. If we have men in any office more than are needed, our system ought to allow of their being provided with employment elsewhere. Our superannuation system and the Civil Service regulations stand in the way, I know. Still, there should be some system by which every man should yield a return for the salary that is paid him.

Mr. McMULLEN. The Finance Minister has made two very important admissions. He has admitted that where vacancies have occurred in these offices he has been quite able to carry on the business of the country without filling those vacancies—in other words, that more men were employed than were required. He has admitted also that in some offices, if vacancies were to occur, he would make no new appointment. This was an admission that we still have more officers than are necessary. For years past we have complained of the increase of clerks in the different departments and Government offices throughout the country. We have reached a stage now where it is most necessary that we should cut down the number of clerks to the actual requirements of the service, and not appoint men because they assert some claim on political grounds upon the Government. I quite agree with the remarks of the hon. member for North Norfolk that we must cut down expenses. We have heard the Finance Minister say in former years in justification of this or that expenditure, that it involved no increase. The time has come when we should insist upon a decrease. In view of the outcry for tariff reduction and the cutting down of taxation, we should begin to prepare to meet that public demand by cutting down the annual expenditure—that is the best way in which to relieve the people. We should reduce the number of officers by cutting off those men who are unnecessary, and I believe there are hundreds of them, and these admissions of the Finance Minister confirm me in that opinion.

Assistant Receiver General's Office, Winnipeg..... $6,000

Mr. MULOCK. I asked the Finance Minister to tell us what public services were rendered by these offices. Take Winnipeg as an example—what business is done there?

Mr. FOSTER. The business, in the first place, is that of receiving moneys from those who wish to deposit, and paying it to those who wish to withdraw—a savings bank business. The other part of the business is that done by the Assistant Receivers General.

Mr. MULOCK. What is that?

Mr. FOSTER. They supply notes and specie when called for by the banks. They take in the old notes and return them to us, and give out new ones. They are the medium of communication between the Government here and the banks in the various cities, and they save time in this communication.

Mr. MULOCK. With regard to the latter branch of the business, namely, giving out legal tenders, it appears to me that can be managed through the banks of the country. I fail to see the necessity for the Government maintaining a separate office for any such work as that. In fact, I think the public would be infinitely better served if the Government could make arrangement by which that branch of the business could be done through the several banks. As to the savings bank business, is that business carried on for the benefit of those who deposit, or is it to enable the Government to borrow money cheaply? The Minister says the offices are conducted cheaply. I venture to question the accuracy of that assertion. For instance, Winnipeg received last year deposits aggregating $238,000, while the withdrawals were $299,000. Do you think any joint stock company could exist by conducting that volume of business at an expense of $6,600 a year, with, I suppose, other expenses, such as office rent, and so on?

Mr. FOSTER. Everything is included in that.

Mr. MULOCK. Well, I will venture to say there is not a branch of business of a monetary character that could carry on successfully a volume of business amounting to $200,000 both ways, and pay interest on that fund, in addition to this $6,600 for expenses, and there is not a person versed in monetary institutions who would for a moment acquiesce in the statement that that business was done economically.

Mr. FOSTER. It is a charge of about 1 per cent.

Mr. MULOCK. Don't you pay 4 per cent on the money?

Mr. FOSTER. 3½.

Mr. MULOCK. So it costs the Government 4½ per cent?

Mr. FOSTER. Not for the whole. That is this particular office.

Mr. MULOCK. Well, it will average 1 per cent. Now, I question the wisdom of maintaining an office for any such purpose as that.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) It is 2½ per cent on the cost.

Mr. MULOCK. What interest does it cost the country? Take Winnipeg, for instance. What interest does it cost the country for the $238,000 deposits which you pay 3½ per cent interest upon, and in order to get which you have to pay in working expenses $6,600 a year besides? If that is business, I should be very sorry to have any interest in it.

Mr. FOSTER. The interest paid was 3½ per cent.

Assistant Receiver General's Office, Charlottetown $4,800

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I understood the Minister did not propose to take so much this year on account of the death of the first assistant.

Mr. FOSTER. That was Mr. Foley; his salary was $1,100. We will reduce that item to $4,000.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Is that a sufficient reduction?

Mr. FOSTER. I think it is only fair to give an increase of salary to the others who do the work.

Mr. MULOCK. That means that because an officer drawing $1,100 dies, the survivors are to get nearly half of that.

Mr. FOSTER. I did not say I was going to increase the salaries of the survivors to that extent; I said I was going to increase them. The hon. gentleman is altogether too suspicious.

Mr. MULOCK. If the hon. gentleman cannot tell us what he wants the money for, he ought not to vote it.

Mr. BERGIN. You are taking up more time than the $500 are worth,

Country Savings Banks, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island—salaries $11,350

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I thought they were going to be gradually dispensed with?

Mr. FOSTER. So they are. There is a decrease here, owing to two having been transferred. As they fall in, by death or resignation of the officer, they have been transferred to the Post Office Department.

Mr. McMULLEN. Is the business in the savings banks increasing or decreasing?

Mr. FOSTER. If the hon. gentleman will look at the transactions he will see that in the whole of Nova Scotia the balance held was $7,200,000, and the balance held on the 30th June, 1893, was in excess of the balance held on the 1st July, 1892. The transactions were $2,700,000 in deposits and withdrawals.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Only an increase of about $100,000?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Looking at the question generally, it seems to me that the time has come when the hon. gentleman ought to consider the propriety of reducing the rate of interest, at any rate, on the large deposits. I notice from the returns which I moved for some time ago, taking, for instance, the Government savings banks, that we had 4,607 depositors holding deposits to the amount of \$8,676,586, which is about half the total amount of deposits. The result of that is that one-half of our deposits are held in sums very nearly averaging \$2,000. It is quite clear that parties who are able to hold \$2,000 in cash available at 10 days' notice, or whatever notice the hon. gentleman now requires, are not a class of persons in whose behalf any plea can be advanced that they are in need, and our dealing with them ought to be regulated on business principles. It does appear to me that when we can borrow money at about 3¼ per cent it is not good business to borrow from these persons at 3½ per cent. I am disposed myself to make considerable concession in favour of small depositors holding under \$500, if the Minister chooses to take that standard. It does appear to me that in the case of these large depositors there is good ground for placing the interest at some rate fairly commensurate with what the Government can borrow. Now, the Government say that they can borrow at $3\frac{1}{4}$ per cent, or thereabouts, on long time, without the necessity of keeping any reserve, and it is to be remarked in connection with all these savings banks, that if the Government conduct their business on proper principles, a certain amount, more or less, ought to be held in reserve to meet such contingencies as have occurred several times within our recollection, and even within the last two or three years. I should like to know what the hon. gentleman's view is on that subject. It appears to me that on the larger deposits we are paying more than the money is worth in open market, and that it is not a very prudent thing on our part to be doing that which would encourage people to hold large sums in that particular fashion.

Mr. FOSTER. It must be borne in mind that even those depositors of whom the hon. gentleman has spoken as having somewhat large amounts have secured them by making repeatedly small deposits. Each depositor is allowed a maximum of \$3,000, and I have no doubt that the large proportion of those depositors are persons receiving wages, who have gradually added to their deposits for a series of years until they hold the amount opposite their names. You could not call them rich people. These banks are not the media by which wealthy people aggregate their savings. So if the matter is looked at in that way, it is hardly fair to say that these are not the deposits of people making small savings. As regards the rate of interest the hon. gentleman will remember it was reduced from 4 to $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent three years ago. I think it is only fair we should keep the present rate of interest on savings deposits as an incentive to thrift and to safety, and give a little more interest than that at which it is possible to borrow money abroad. Of course if you borrow abroad there are expenses in connection with the loan, the payment of interest and the sinking funds on the old loan; so that the disparity is not very large between the rate at which we are able to borrow money and the amount paid as interest in savings banks. Of course there is the cost of management to be calculated, but at the same time it must be remembered that these banks have a good effect on our people in giving them a sure place in which to deposit their earnings, and as contributing to thrift and stability in that way. The margin between what the money has hitherto cost in Great Britain and the rate we pay, taking all the cost of charges into account, is, under present conditions, about one-quarter per cent. I do not think it would be wise at the present time to lower the rate of interest. We have reduced the amount of deposits, and no doubt have kept out a certain amount in that way. We are under no obligation to maintain a place for safe keeping of savings or for exchange, as the savings bank was at one time for people of comparatively large means.

Mr. MULOCK. What is the amount allowed to be deposited?

Mr. FOSTER. The maximum amount is $3,000.

Mr. SPROULE. The hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) has expressed himself in favour of reducing the rate on deposits in the post office and other savings banks. I think it should be allowed to remain at the highest figure the country could afford, because the return shows that the amounts of deposits held are the results of small savings placed in the bank at different times. Although in some cases the amounts that have accumulated for a series of years may appear to be somewhat large, they represent the savings of poor people. We are acting in the right direction when we make it an object for the poor people to economize and save their money. No doubt many of them have difficulty to know how to invest their money with safety, and at the same time procure a good return. The reduction from 4 per cent was, I think, an error, even though the country may be able to borrow money at a lower rate. We should always hold out strong inducements to poor people to put their money away in savings banks.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I call the attention of the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) to the fact that I expressly excepted the vast bulk of the depositors. Perhaps the hon. gentleman does not know that fully nine-tenths of the deposits are those of persons who deposit a sum from \$100 to \$500. Those I did not propose to interfere with. I notice that out of 114,000 deposits in the post office savings bank, 99,657 are below \$500, and the average is something like \$100. I also notice that in the Dominion savings banks, out of 55,000 deposits, 45,000 deposited from \$100 to \$500. The point which I take, and which has not been answered, is this: that in the case of parties depositing on an average \$2,000 each, which appears to be the amount in the Government savings banks at all events, it was very questionable whether they were parties who should obtain a larger rate than that at which the Government could borrow money. I know of no case in which a larger rate is allowed for money borrowed at very short notice, ten days or thereabouts, than for money borrowed for periods of 30, 40 or 50 years, as has been the case of most with our new loans. While I have no objection whatever that the Government should borrow here as cheaply as they can in England from parties having considerable sums of money to invest, it is very questionable policy to pay persons of the character to which I have referred, a larger sum than they could obtain otherwise on the open market. I must mention further that beyond all question so long as $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent is the rate of interest in the Government savings banks, it will be quite impossible for men of business dealing with the banks to obtain money at a low rate of interest. The banks in the country are obliged to pay as much as the Government pay, and in that way the Government may be the means of keeping the rate of interest all over Canada at a higher rate than it otherwise would be. It is true that it is in the general public interest that parties of slender means should have a perfectly safe place in which to deposit their money, and I am willing to make very considerable concessions in that direction, but it is not in the general public interest, not in the interest of the agricultural or mercantile community, or of the public at large that the rate of interest all over the country should be artificially maintained. It would greatly benefit our manufacturers, in whom the hon. gentleman take an interest, and I take an interest, although from a wider standpoint, if they were able to obtain money at a lower rate of interest than at the present time. One of their complaints has been that they were charged so high a rate of interest that they were unable to manufacture as cheaply as the people of other countries who obtain money at low rates. That is true. The rate of interest is an important factor in the cost of production, and it is on these grounds that I considerably doubt the wisdom of the Government borrowing \$25,000,000, \$30,000,000, or \$35,000,000 at a considerably higher rate than money is worth in the open market, according to the statement of the Finance Minister himself. All through I find that a very large percentage of the money we borrow is held in sums averaging \$2,000 or \$1,500. With respect to one thing the Minister stated, I may observe, it is not a very uncommon thing for persons to avail themselves of this \$3,000-limit to a much greater extent than he supposes. It is not very difficult for a man, if he chooses to do so, to place money in the names of separate members of his family, and so have a very large sum on deposit. So long as we maintain this rate, irrespective of other considerations, there is no doubt we are raising the rate of interest all over the country more or less. We are disturbing the natural course of trade and increasing the cost of production. That is a more serious matter than the additional half per cent which we may find it expedient to pay to these depositors. The Minister knows that his action must control the banks at large; and looking at the difficulty of making good investments in Canada now, looking at the well-known fact that the price of our best bank stocks is such that the return on investments in banks, where there is always a more or less appreciable element of risk, hardly exceeds $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent, if my memory is correct; it does appear to me that the question deserves the serious consideration of the Finance Minister; as to whether for large deposits—I am not raising the question of small deposits at all—the rate of interest should not be reduced to at least 3 per cent, which I think is about what the money is fairly worth.

Mr. SPROULE. How is the hon. gentleman going to draw a distinction between a small deposit and a large one?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It certainly is a little irregular in one sense, but there is no reason in the world, that for reasons of public policy the House could not decide to give $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent on deposits up to \$500 or even \$1,000 and 3 per cent on those that exceed that sum. That could be done by a regulation of the department.

Mr. SPROULE. I do not know by what mode of reasoning the hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) comes to the conclusion that the giving of $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent is likely to keep up the rate of interest in the banks. The Montreal Bank, or other banks, will not allow more for deposits than $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent, but if you come to borrow from them they will charge you 6 or 7 or 8 per cent. You give them the liberty of charging whatever they like to borrowers, while at the same time you want to compel those who are depositing money in the Post Office savings banks to accept a low rate of interest. Supposing that that might be accomplished by the means propounded by the hon. gentleman, it would be a very unfortunate thing if we were to attempt to accomplish it in that way. We would be only putting a greater power in the hands of the banks, and we would be doing away with that which ought to exist in every country, namely: offering a strong inducement to poor persons to lay by a little money when they have it in some safe place, where it may realize interest to them or their heirs in the future.

Mr. COCKBURN. I think it would be a pity that we should regard these banks of deposits and savings banks as pauper institutions. It never was the intention of the Government that we should so regard them, but when the hon. gentleman speaks of doing an act of charity to the poor man and paying him more for the use of his money than it is currently worth, then we are entering on a very dangerous principle indeed. The member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) has very plainly explained the situation: that if we are to give more for the money than it is worth, we have to take it out of the pockets of other people, and we have to visibly appreciate the cost of manufacturing and the rate of mortgages. We have had brought before us this session in various speeches, the difficulties under which manufacturers labour in Canada in having to pay a comparatively increased rate for the money which is invested in their business. Money to-day is only worth 3 per cent in the banks of Canada, and if we give interest at the rate of 3½ per cent, we insensibly force the banks to pay the same amount. They will pay the 3½ per cent, but they have to take the extra half per cent out of the pockets of the manufacturers and the farmers. I trust that some such scheme may be adopted as proposed by the hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) with regard to sums which clearly do not belong to the poorer classes. Where we are not really dealing with a class who require incentives to save, we should place them on the footing so as to accept the bank rate of interest at the time, which happens now to be 3 per cent. Even for the poorer classes I do not know that there is justice in treating them as we are treating them, and giving them more for their money in the savings bank than they could obtain elsewhere. However, that amount is so small that I am not prepared to dispute it. It is a question, to my mind, whether it is in the interest of the commerce of the country that the Government should maintain institutions of this kind at all. As far as I can see they are interfering more or less with the banking institutions and the industries of the country. As banks are now situated, they have enough difficulties to contend against without having the rate of interest forced beyond what is really the level, as determined by the amount of money in the market at the time for disposal and the active demand for its use.

Mr. SPROULE. The logic of the hon. gentleman amounts to this if it amounts to anything: that you would compel the poor man to lend his money at 3 per cent, when the bank with which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Cockburn) is connected, will not lend money at less than 6 per cent. We, in this Parliament, give the bank a charter and power, and it lends its money at not less than 6 per cent, but he as the representative of a banking institution would compel the poor man to lend his money at 3 per cent while the banks, by the power we give them, could compel the borrower to pay 6 per cent.

Mr. COCKBURN. My hon. friend (Mr. Sproule) is asking a most extraordinary question. He wants to put the bank in the same position as the Government. The Government has no discount business, but if the bank accepts a note of my hon. friend, or any other gentleman in the House, it takes all the attendant risks of commerce and trade. Look at the various banks and you will find how heavy have been their losses within their history, and again and again they have had to trench on the capital originally contributed. The Government has no risk whatever. It pays the 3½ per cent, but it does not lend this money to the trade and commerce of this country, and it does not develop the industries of the country with that money. It is not a business which the Government have a right commercially to embark in. They are, however, in it, and I am perfectly willing they should remain there, but I deny their right altogether to give to people who have $2,000 or $3,000 or more in the savings banks one cent above what is the current rate of interest. It is not a commercial transaction, and any business of this kind should be dealt with simply and solely on the basis of a commercial transaction. It ought to be commercial in its management and in the whole dealing with it. If we are to get into the idea that every man or every woman who puts money into a Government savings bank is a pauper, and is to get more for his or her money than it is worth, then I would rather see the extra money-interest doled out as a charity.

Mr. SPROULE. The hon. gentleman was unfortunate in drawing attention to the position of the banks. He says that the banks run great risks and loss, but I would ask him, what are bank stocks standing at to-day in Canada? Some of them, if I remember right, are 214 per cent and others between 150 and 200 per cent, appreciated, showing that they are making out of their money by virtue of the very power which we give them in this Parliament, and the manner in which they are able to exercise that power. They are paying much higher dividends than the poor man is getting for the money he puts in the post office savings banks. They are satisfied with that, but they are not satisfied that the poor man should get any more than 3 per cent, although they themselves are receiving dividends of 6, 7 and 8 per cent. I say that the proposition made here would compel the poor man to lend his money at a low rate of interest. This is the only inducement held out to him when he can save a little, to invest his money in good security and to exercise economy. If you take away that premium on economy he would not have the inducement to put his money by so that it shall earn a little return for him, even though that return be smaller than is earned by the banks of the country.

Mr. COCKBURN. The poor man is not debarred from making a deposit in a regular savings bank.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think the hon. gentleman does not quite understand the point I was bringing up. It is one that requires a good deal of attention at the hands of the Government and the House. We have borrowed about $40,000,000 at call, from the people of Canada.

* That money is not in the hands of the Finance Minister. It has been used for a great variety of miscellaneous purposes, including the putting down of the North-west rebellion, the construction of the Tay Canal and other matters which are not particularly productive assets. Whereas, in England, unless my memory is at fault, anything borrowed through savings banks is invested by the Government and held as a trust, we use the money, we spend it, and we have nothing to show for it, except a number of entries on our books. If this money were demanded of us, the first thing the Finance Minister would have to do would be to go and borrow it in the English market; there is no other place where he could get it. Now, it is a matter of very great interest to the farmers of this country, particularly in the present depressed state of things, that they should obtain as low a rate of interest on the great amount of mortgages they are obliged to pay interest on as possible; and there is no doubt whatever—there is no use of hon. gentlemen denying so plain a fact—that if the Government raise the rate of interest on deposits beyond its legitimate figure, in so doing, whether they intend it or not, they raise the rate of interest on mortgages all through the country, or prevent it falling, which is pretty much the same thing. My own impression is that if we had not gone into this business, money might be borrowed a good deal cheaper at present by the farming community, and also by the manufacturing community, than it can be to-day. We are not concerned with the effect on the banks so much as with the effect on the great producing classes of the country. That is the reason that I have called the attention of the Finance Minister to the fact that the large amount of money now deposited is deposited by persons who cannot be described as very needy persons. I do not believe that persons who have, on the average, $2,000 or $1,500 of cash to their credit come exactly within the class whom the hon. gentleman desires to encourage. But, apart from that, I do say that in order to have a low rate of interest on mortgages and on money lent to the manufacturers, the Government will have to lower the rate they are now paying on the money deposited in the savings banks.

Mr. McMULLEN. The Finance Minister intimated last year and the year before that as the people now in charge of the savings banks in the Maritime Provinces dropped off, or resigned, the business would be transferred to the post office savings banks. Now, I notice that a number of those in charge of the savings banks in the Maritime Provinces are getting very liberal salaries already for other purposes. For instance, Mr. D. Ferguson, in New Brunswick, gets $1,200 as collector of customs, and $400 as savings bank agent; Mr. C. M. Brough, at St. Andrews, gets $1,200 as collector of customs, and $400 as savings bank agent; Mr. Street, at Fredericton, gets $1,500 as collector of customs, $400 as savings bank agent, and $250 of commission on excise collections.

Mr. FOSTER. It might be well just to refresh the memories of hon. gentlemen opposite by turning to 1878 and seeing what the expenses of these different Assistant Receiver Generals' offices and savings banks were at that time, when there certainly were not one-half the transactions involved that there are at present. Among the amounts voted in 1877, I find that there was a financial inspector at $2,600; we have a financial inspector at $1,700. At Toronto they paid $8,000; we pay $7,100. At Montreal they paid $5,500; we pay $5,600. At Halifax they paid $10,000; we pay $8,300. At St. John they paid $11,000; we are paying $6,600. At Winnipeg, or Fort Garry as it then was, they paid $6,500; we are paying $6,600. At Victoria, B.C., they paid $7,000; we are paying $4,000. At Charlottetown they paid $4,000; we are paying $4,000. The savings banks in Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and British Columbia cost them $12,000, while they cost us, with a great many more, and much larger transactions, a little over $11,000. The talk about economy is good in its way, but the proof of the pudding is in the eating of it; and with transactions very much less, they spent on this service, in 1877, a great deal more money by thousands of dollars than we spend to-day.

Mr. McMULLEN. There are members in this House who were not in the House in 1878, and the hon. Finance Minister cannot expect that we are going to accept as a justification of the present expenditure a statement of what the expenditure was in 1878. Whether the expenditure of 1878 was extravagant or not, I do not know. We are dealing with matters as we find them to-day, and in the present condition of this country, in the face of the fact that wheat sold in 1878 at $1.25 a bushel, whereas it is selling to-day at 60 cents a bushel; in view of these things, the people of this country are crying out loudly for a reduction of taxation, and we hold that the Finance Minister, in order to meet that demand should apply the pruning-knife and cut down the expenditure. If he does not do so, the people will hold him to account. In past years the prospects of this country were very much brighter than they are to-day. In 1878 we had not the National Policy that has restricted and crippled the trade of the country, and brought the people into the extraordinary condition of depression they are in to-day. They were not subjected to the extortions of the National Policy for fifteen years at that time. The National Policy was brought into existence after that time, and the result is that the people feel the debt under which they are suffering and the burdens to which they are subjected. Take the condition of the country to-day, one-half of the entire customs revenue goes to pay interest on borrowed money, a hundred millions of which the Government have borrowed within the last fifteen years. That is the condition of things under which we are suffering, and we are now asking on behalf of the struggling masses, for a reduction in our taxation, and because we do that the Finance Minister gets up and jauntily tells us look back to 1878 and see how things were conducted then, and what money we spent then. I am not here to defend those who were here in 1878—they are well able to do that for themselves—but to criticise public expenditure and deal with the matters as they are to-day, and to call upon the Finance Minister for a reduction in taxation, and to relieve the people by cutting down the expenditure where that can be done. I contend there is ample facility in these items to make considerable reductions.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. So far as the people of Canada are concerned, if they could get back to the expenditure of $23,500,000 per year, which was the expenditure in 1878, they could exceedingly well afford to spend a matter of $8,000 or $9,000 more on the various items the hon. gentleman has referred to, always supposing that those who held office in 1878 were responsible for the putting into offices the parties who are drawing those salaries. My recollection of the matter is this: When we came into office, we found those various salaries existing. There was very little increase, if any, in the period from 1874 to 1878, and that is a matter which I shall look up presently. All I can say is this, that had the Administration of which I was a member remained in office, the total expenditure of Canada would be less by ten million dollars a year than it is to-day, and the general condition of the people would be immeasurably better. It was not our policy to give any citizens of Canada the opportunity of heaping up huge fortunes at the public expense. But it was our policy to see that every man in Canada had a fair chance and a fair field. The value of lands in Canada was at least 30 per cent greater then than it is to-day. The condition of the general public in Canada, speaking of the agricultural and producing classes, was immensely better than it is to-day. I dare say it is true that you will find a considerable number of towns and villages in Canada, in which, under the stimulus of a much larger rate of interest than could be obtained elsewhere, a certain portion of the population put money on deposit; but you could not, in our time, see the spectacle of half a score of farms put up in any country town in Ontario without a single bidder, while there were hundreds of thousands and sometimes millions of dollars lying available in the various banks and savings institutions in the vicinity. Nor did we see in those days the absolute and complete cessation of increase in population in the most prosperous sections of what ought to be one of the most prosperous countries in the world. We did not find then the population of New Brunswick—to bring matters home to the hon. gentleman—increased at the rate of sixty souls in ten years. We did not find the population of the county he represents decreasing by eight or nine thousand in the course of ten years. Nor did we see the rate of expenditure increasing on an average at the rate of one million dollars a year. And yet hon. gentlemen tell us to go back to the expenditure of 1873-74. If we could, none of us would be in a position to complain of any increase that may have taken place in these small institutions to which he is referring.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. How does the hon. gentleman explain that large charity to Fort Garry?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I will explain it, perhaps not to the hon. gentleman's satisfaction, but easily enough. There was no doubt that in Manitoba and in British Columbia, in those days, the expenses of living were vastly greater than in the older provinces.

Mr. FOSTER. How about St. John?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. And a superior allowance no doubt was made and continued for some years to equalize the expenses of the office. In Halifax, in 1873, the expenses actually paid, according to the Auditor General's Report, for the Receiver General's office—

Mr. FOSTER. What is the total?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am endeavouring to make it out, because the expenditure is not put down in precisely the same shape. It appears to be $9,000 in 1873. It was $10,000 in 1878, and I remember that the hon. gentleman's predecessors, before they left office in a hurry, for certain reasons, at or about October, 1873, added most enormously to almost all salaries. They added 15 per cent all round. If the hon. gentleman will add 15 per cent to $9,130, or thereabouts, he will see that they added, before they left office, an increase quite equal to that which he states. I find some difficulty in ascertaining from this, because it is not made up precisely in the same way, exactly what the expenses were, but apparently they were not greater in most of these cases. I take Halifax as a sample brick. The expenditure was not less than what we actually incurred in 1878. I forget what the hon. gentleman stated the expenses were in Victoria.

Mr. FOSTER. Seven thousand dollars. I see here, apparently, and they seem to cover about the same matters, that the expenses in 1873 were $6,969.13, so that apparently, in 1873, without taking into account this 15 per cent increase I have referred to, the expenditure in Victoria was within the nearest fraction of whatever the expenditure may have been in 1878. I suppose the hon. gentleman taking the actual expenditure, and not the sum for which the vote was taken.

Mr. FOSTER. I have given votes in both cases, under the impression that, of course, you would not ask for more than you spent.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. As a rule we undoubtedly did not ask for more than we spent, and, as a rule, we kept the expenditure well within the Estimates. But I do not see that there is any material difference, judging from the specimens I examined between 1873 and 1878. In one case I find $6,969, to which you may add 15 per cent under all the circumstances I have described. And in another case the amount is $9,000, to which you may add a similar proportion.

Mr. FOSTER. For these services you had more than $10,000 in 1878, about what we now ask.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. There may have been a larger vote, and possibly there may have been a larger expenditure. What I say is that the expenditure had been fixed for us in 1873, and we did not add to it during our four or five years of office. If the hon. gentleman wants to compare expenditure in 1873 or 1878 or any years between with those of to-day, and carry that to comparison upon broad lines, he will find the figures interesting. Our total expenditure for civil government in 1878 was $823,369. The hon. gentleman is asking in these present Estimates for $1,475,425. If he wants to make a comparison there is a very fair test of general economy and desire to save the people's money, as manifested in the period he refers to. Let the people compare these figures, and let them likewise compare the sum total which the hon. gentleman finds it necessary to ask for, and the total of any year during our term of office. The fact is it was necessary, in British Columbia and Manitoba, to spend a little more money in those days than it is now. We had determined, as soon as it was possible to reduce that expenditure, but it was not possible, while doing justice to our officials, to reduce it at that particular moment. If the people will compare the figures they will not find that they have profited much by the exchange they have made, so far as regards either the general wealth of the people or the average amount of the expenditure.

Mr. FOSTER. I am sorry I gave the hon. gentleman so bad a quarter of an hour trying to wiggle out of a position which he finds so uncomfortable. These figures throw an instructive side-light upon the hon. gentlemen's management when in power, as contrasted with their professions when out of power. The hon. gentleman went to Fort Garry and met on a trip across the mountains in their efforts to explain away the figures, and said that living was a little higher there. But he took good care not to go down to Halifax and St. John, where his expenditures then were $2,000 and $3,000 more than they are under the present Administration to-day, and where the expense of living certainly was not higher. The hon. gentleman spent, for the management of infinitely smaller deposits and transactions, about $12,000 or $13,000 more than we spend to-day. The hon. gentleman wishes this country to go back to the period of 1878. He would give us to understand that by that change he would lead us back into some beautiful Eden, where all is peace and prosperity, while now we are travelling in the shade and darkness. I want to draw his attention to the utterance of a celebrated authority describing those times :

There has been an enormous shrinkage in the lumber trade from $28,000,000 to $13,000,000 in another. There has been a great shrinkage in bank stock and some of these institutions have gone altogether. The depression in real estate has been general and long-prevailing and entails an enormous loss. Our exports have fallen off because we have been so poor that we have not been buying much.

I spare the hon. gentleman the affliction of reading more. But every phrase here is a picture of that time, and they were uttered by no less an authority than Sir Richard Cartwright.

Mr. McMULLEN. The hon. gentleman opposite criticised the Government of that day as being flies on the wheel, and what are they now? Look at the condition of the country, and how are the men now in power trying to help those who are struggling in difficulties?

Committee rose, and it being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

|---|---------|
| Country Savings Banks, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island—contingencies..... | $1,750 |
|---|---------|

Mr. McMULLEN. What is that supposed to cover?

Mr. FOSTER. That is in connection with all the savings banks throughout the country—stationery, a little postage, and that sort of thing.

Mr. McMULLEN. It appears to me that some of those people are anxious to pick up every little item they can. In some places they charge as much as $10 for winding a clock, when they get salaries of $1,700 or $1,800 a year.

Commission for payment of interest on public debt, purchase of sinking funds and transfer of stock $30,350

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. How are you going to divide that up? Does that all go to the Bank of Montreal?

Mr. FOSTER. Most of it goes to the Bank of Montreal.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Does any of it go to the old house of Glynn, Mills & Company?

Mr. FOSTER. That is all transferred to the Bank of Montreal.

Brokerage on purchases for sinking funds. $5,200

Mr. FOSTER. There is an increase of $100, as the sinking fund is larger each year.

Mr. McMULLEN. Who receives this amount?

Mr. FOSTER. That is a payment to the brokers who purchase for the trustees of the sinking fund, in London.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Who are the trustees just now?

Mr. FOSTER. I do not remember their names; they were appointed two years ago.

English Bill stamps, postage, telegrams, &c. $4,000

Mr. FOSTER. There is an increase of $1,000. There was a short estimate last year, the amount paid out was just about $4,000, and we estimate for the whole this year.

Mr. McMULLEN. Who handles this?

Mr. FOSTER. Those stamps are the Government stamps that have to be paid on the transaction, under the English laws. It is our agents who pay that out.

Mr. McMULLEN. Does a part go to the Bank of Montreal, and a part to the other agents?

Mr. FOSTER. We have only one agent, the Bank of Montreal.

Printing notes. $50,000

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Where are those printed?

Mr. FOSTER. They are printed by Burland, on Wellington street, in Ottawa.

Mr. McMULLEN. I think the Minister stated to the House last year that he had entered into a new arrangement with these people.

Mr. FOSTER. The contract was entered into two years ago.

Mr. McMULLEN. Then the same contract is running. Is it under that contract that this increase has been made?

Mr. McMULLEN.

Mr. FOSTER. The increase is due to the fact that the number of notes to be printed has run up from 18,000,000 to 20,000,000.

Civil Government. $1,265,831
Governor General's Secretary's Office. $10,862 50

Mr. McMULLEN. There is $200 of an increase here.

Mr. FOSTER. There are three statutory increases, and one short estimate for last year.

The Office of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada. $32,375

Mr. McMULLEN. There is considerable increase here.

Mr. FOSTER. There are three statutory increases and six additional third-class clerks, two at $800, one at $600, two at $450, and one at $400, less one second-class clerk. This is not really an increase in the force, but it is taking those who were on temporary for a number of years and putting them upon the permanent list.

Mr. McMULLEN. I see there is a draughtsman and accountant; what does he do?

Mr. FOSTER. The draughtsman is there for the purpose of draughting Orders in Council in which plans and the like of that occur. Copies have to be made of these, and a draughtsman is necessary.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The plans required should be prepared by the draughtsmen in the department from which the plan emanates, and not by a draughtsman in the Privy Council office.

Mr. IVES. In many cases two or three duplicates are required. Frequently copies are asked for by the public. The draughtsman is also the accountant of the department, and issues all requisitions for stationery.

Mr. McMULLEN. Is $1,400 all the salary he receives as accountant and draughtsman?

Mr. IVES. Yes.

Department of Printing and Stationery. $27,429 50

Mr. FOSTER. There are fifteen statutory increases, and the salary of an additional third-class clerk, F. J. Farrell, at a salary of $800.

Mr. McMULLEN. What are the duties of the additional clerk?

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Farrell has been on the temporary list for a series of years. He is a good clerk, and has been made permanent at a salary of $800.

Department of the Interior. . . . $102,344

Mr. FOSTER. There are forty-seven statutory increases, and two additional third-class clerks, at a salary of $400 each.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Were those parties brought from the North-west?

Mr. FOSTER. No. There are decreases amounting to $1,950, leaving the net increase $1,197, which is less than the statutory increases.

Mr. McMULLEN. Has any change taken place with respect to the Land Board in Winnipeg? I cannot understand why it is necessary to keep up such a large staff in connection with the department. There could be a very considerable saving effected if the Minister set to work to cut down the expenses. The business of the department cannot possibly be as large as it was some time ago, when there were large sales of land in the North-west. It is true the department has land matters in Manitoba and the North-west, Indian matters and immigration under its charge, but immigration expenditure has been so unsatisfactory for years past that it should be cut down. The idea of spending money with this object to the extent it was expended in years past is the grossest piece of folly that possibly can be perpetrated. Our last census proved that to a demonstration. That portion of the expenses of the Department of the Interior should be unquestionably cut down. The disposal of the lands in the North-west have been very, very slow, and I should fancy that the duties of the officers are not so extensive in this branch as they were some years ago. Why are not the expenses cut down here, and if there are clerks wanted in other departments let them be sent to work there. I would like to know if it is a necessity—I suppose the Minister will get up and say it is—to keep all these men employed and to give them increases of salary in view of the falling off in the work of the department. Here we have, in connection with the Indian Department, Hayter Reed taken down from the North-west, who occupied a kind of go-as-you-please-high-dandified-with-coach-and-four-and-servants-to-attend-upon-him position up in the North-west. The man whose place he filled has been removed to make way for him, but we will come to that later on. In my opinion, there should be some effort made to cut down the expenditure in the Department of the Interior. I would like to have some explanation of how it is that in the face of the decreasing amount of business in that department, it is necessary to keep up the present large staff.

Mr. DALY. The hon. gentleman (Mr. McMullen) has gone over such an extent of ground that it would be impossible to answer him in any limited time.

Mr. McMULLEN. We will give you all the time you want.

Mr. DALY. He has mixed up the Department of the Interior with the Indian Department, and the Indian Department with the Department of the Interior. I can say in answer to the hon. gentleman's query, that in 1887-88. there were 161 clerks in the Department of the Interior at Ottawa. Since that time we have added to the department the immigration branch, and four clerks were brought over from the Agriculture Department; but, notwithstanding that, there are only 129 clerks in the Department of the Interior to-day as against 161 in 1887-88, or a reduction of 32 since that year. I can also tell the hon. gentleman that the business of the department is increasing all the time, and if he looks at the departmental report, page 15, he will see that the letters received last year in the department at Ottawa, were 50,794, the letters sent, 48,155—total, 98,939, an increase of about 14,000 over the year before that. Notwithstanding what the hon. gentleman (Mr. McMullen) said, the business of the department in the North-west is increasing, year by year, but we are not increasing the staff, and as the business increases the work of the officers of the department is doubled. I do not think that any person who has any idea of the amount of work that is being done can complain of the staff as at present. There was, no doubt, room for complaint some years ago, but the staff having been reduced by 32 since 1888, the hon. gentleman will see that every effort is being made to make such a reduction as will permit of the work of the department being carried on. The hon. gentleman has referred to Mr. Reed having been brought down here from Winnipeg. Mr. Reed is not an officer of the Department of the Interior at all. He is Deputy Superintendent General of Indian Affairs, and is head of that department. Mr. Reed's office was abolished, and, by reason of his being brought down here, we have saved some $12,000 to the people.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) How?

Mr. DALY. It is not in these Estimates, but as I expected to be questioned in reference to it I will explain it. The difference between Mr. Van-koughnet's allowance and salary is $1,000. The difference between the allowance and salary of Mr. Sinclair, who is also retired, is $800. The saving in civil government by such, as per estimate, is $1,385. The saving in the Regina office in salaries is $7,960. The saving in travelling expenses is $700; and the saving in the commissioner's allowance, $600, which gives a total saving of $12,445. That saving has been made since we met here last year, so that I think the hon. gentleman will understand that during the short time I have had an opportunity of administering the affairs of the department I have endeavoured to cut down the expenses as much as possible. He will find that in every increase in the estimates of the Department of the Interior, they are statutory increases. Every member of this House is as much responsible for these increases as the Minister who is in charge of the department, and these men having become members of the civil service they are entitled, from year to year to the increment allowed under the Civil Service Act.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). It is interesting to compare the year 1878 with the present year, and to see how the departmental expenses of that period contrast with the departmental expenses of the present time. Hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches cannot show that there has been any very great change in the circumstances of the country, or any additional duties imposed upon the various departments of the public service at the present time, compared with the departmental services in the period I have mentioned. I will begin with the office of the Governor General. The Government, in these Estimates, are asking for $10,862 for that office, and the expenditure for the year 1878-79, was $7,950, a very considerable increase now. In the Privy Council Department the Estimates ask for $32,375 for the coming year, while the expenses in 1878-79 were $15,000, so that there is $2,375 over and above double the expenses that existed in 1878-79. The Prime Minister asks for the Department of Justice at the present time—not including the penitentiary branch—$24,055, and in 1877-78 the expenses of that department were $11,600, or less than one-half of the expenses to-day. In the penitentiary branch, the amount estimated for is $6,525, and the amount asked for in 1877-78 was $3,850, so that the record of that branch is very nearly double the amount asked for at the former period. In these Estimates, the hon. Ministers are asking for the Department of Militia and Defence, $43,850, and in 1877-78, the amount required was $35,750, an increase now of nearly $8,000. In the Department of the Secretary of State, the amount now asked for is $43,100, and the expenditure in 1878 was $31,990, and that, I think, included the Mounted Police force. The Department of Printing and Stationery, which hon. gentlemen opposite organized, costs $27,429; the cost of the stationery branch was included in the $31,900 asked for by the Department of the Secretary of State. The Department of the interior, including the Department of Indian Affairs, cost in 1877-78, $42,760, and the Government are now asking $153,701, or very nearly four times as much. For the Department of Finance the amount asked for in 1877-78, was $49,800, and the amount asked for now is $49,742, very nearly the same amount, or a difference in favour of the present period of less than $60. The Department of Customs in 1877-78, cost $28,450; now it costs $37,812, a difference of nearly $10,000. The Department of Inland Revenue in 1877-78 required $26,967; hon. gentlemen are now asking in round numbers $40,000. For the Post Office Department in 1877-78 the sum required was $85,950; to-day $212,850 is required, an increase for that department of very nearly threefold. The Department of

Mr. DALY.

Agriculture, which in 1877-78 included the immigration branch, in that year cost $28,290; to-day the amount required is $53,512, or very nearly double. The Department of Marine and Fisheries in 1877-78 cost $25,000; to-day the hon. Minister is asking $52,952, or a difference of more than 100 per cent. The Department of Railways and the Department of Public Works in 1877-78 were joined, and their combined cost was $48,884; to-day the cost of those two departments is $51,055 and $50,512 respectively, or a little over $101,000, an increase of more than 100 per cent. So that when the hon. Minister of Finance declares, as he did in the early part of the evening, that the Government to-day is more economical than the Government in 1878, citing a particular instance as an evidence of that greater economy. I refer to all these matters in detail to show that there has been an increase in the inside service of something more than 100 per cent. The committee will, therefore, see that the affairs of this country are not economically managed. I have no doubt that economy could be practised to such an extent as to bring down the expenditure very nearly to the position it occupied in 1877-78. The only difference, perhaps, would be in the Post Office Department, postal services having been extended over a very considerable extent of country where post offices did not exist before. It may be also that additional expenditures to a small extent would be required on account of certain land offices in the North-west. But there is no justification for this enormous increase in every branch of the public service, and I call the attention of the House to these figures to show hon. gentlemen that there is very great room for economy, and that that economy might be practised without any diminution in the efficiency of the public service. If we were to compare the expenditure of 1873 with the expenditure of 1878, we would find that, although in the meantime the province of Prince Edward Island had been brought into the Union, treaties had been made with the Indians, our authority had been extended over the whole of the North-west, and the means of communication became far more expensive on that account, there was no increase at all in the expenditure in 1878 as compared with that of 1873; and yet, when you compare 1878 with the present year, although there has been no corresponding increase in the wealth, the population or the territory of the country, the cost of government has grown in an enormous ratio. If the expenditure bore the same ratio to population that the expenditure did at the former period, we would require to have ten millions of people in the country to justify the expensive organization that exists in this city at this moment. I call the attention of the Minister to this fact, and I say that every department of the Government in this city requires careful supervision. It is evident that there must be an enormous number of persons engaged in the public service whose services are not required, that the Government have yielded to the importunities of parties from time to time and have added persons to the public service who are not required, and who are simply in the way of those who are capable of and willing to perform the duties that devolve upon them. And it does seem to me that, looking at the circumstances of this country, bearing in mind the large number of people who are leaving to better their condition elsewhere, bearing in mind the great diminution that has taken place in the value of real estate everywhere, and which has tended largely to straiten the circumstances of those who were involved, and who find, in consequence of increased taxation and diminished incomes, their difficulties greatly increased—it does seem to me, in view of these circumstances, that the Government itself should set an example of economy which every class of our population at present, except those under the fostering care of the Administration, are obliged, in their own interest, to exercise. And the people will never be contented, when they become aware of the fact that the cost of government in the city of Ottawa, while the wealth of the country has been very nearly stationary, while the population has been very nearly stationary, while the circumstances of the large number of the population have become more straitened, that the cost of Government should continue to increase, as it has during the past fifteen years. It is time to call a halt. Hon. gentlemen are proposing in certain cases to add enormously to the public debt at this moment. Great public enterprises that will cost an untold sum are in contemplation, while the country finds the greatest possible difficulty in meeting existing obligations. My hon. friend has said that one-half of the customs revenue collected under this very burdensome tariff is required to pay the interest on the public debt. That is the condition of things. You are producing in Canada a condition of things that does not much differ from that of Ireland, when a large portion of the income of the population was sent to pay an absentee landlord class. You are collecting over ten million dollars of money a year to send abroad to pay the interest on public works that are unprofitable, that have added nothing to the wealth of the country, that have not increased the value of real estate which the farmers and others hold. And that being the case, instead of persisting in a policy of extravagance indicated by the condition of the public departments, we ought to begin, and begin seriously, to practice economy.

Mr. DALY. I just want to say a few words in reply to the hon. gentleman's statement with reference to the cost of carrying on the Department of the Interior in 1878 and at present, and I have no hesitation in making a comparison, as the hon. gentleman has seen fit to do so, and show him that if there is a large increase in the civil list of the Department of the Interior in Ottawa, that increase is justified by the increase of business. For instance, taking from the years 1874 to 1878, inclusive, the total number of letters received in the Department of Interior was 34,613, as against 98,939 received last year alone. That is one evidence of the increase. In 1874, 13,076 entries were made; in 1875, 499; in 1876, 347; in 1877, 845; in 1878, 1,778, as against 4,067 in 1893 alone, or as many entries in 1893 as were made from 1874 to 1878. In addition, the total cash sales from 1873 to 1877 amounted to $57,000, as against $93,000 in last year alone, being a difference of $36,000 last year over the total sales from 1872 to 1878. In addition, the timber dues from 1872 to 1878 amounted to $5,862, as against $105,000 last year. In 1875-76, the net revenue of the Department of the Interior was $8,867, as against $374,000 last year. It seems to me these figures would illustrate to any person that the business of that department has materially increased, and having increased in that ratio necessarily more people are required to carry it on.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). What is the revenue from?

Mr. DALY. That is from Dominion lands. Homestead fees, $37,689; improvements, $7,000; cash, $93,000; scrip, $77,000; map sales, $975; surveyors' examinations fees, $82; miscellaneous, including trust, $18,000; inspection and cancellation of entries, $79,000; timber dues, $105,000; grazing lands, cash, $7,000; Rocky Mountain Park, $8,493; and several other items, giving a gross revenue of $392,000, from which we must deduct refunds, $18,000, leaving $374,000 as the total receipts of the department.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. In any case it appears to be a very remarkable thing that we require an expenditure of $102,000 when $380,000 are the total receipts from all the property remaining to us in the North-west, from which I may remark there ought in all reason to be deducted two items I find here, namely, Dominion lands chargeable to income, $137,000, and Dominion lands chargeable to capital, $100,000. If you add together and include the Minister's salary which does not figure here, the three items of the Department of the Interior, Dominion lands chargeable to income, and Dominion lands chargeable to capital, you get a total of about $350,000 annual expenditure on Dominion lands alone, from which we receive the enormous amount of $374,000, so that the net profit at present obtainable from the administration of the North-west are about $28,000. Now, the hon. gentleman will recollect that he is bound by the solidarity which ought to prevail between himself and former members of the Administration to which he belongs, to account to us for $58,300,000, with interest from the 31st December, 1890, which we will put at 3½ per cent to please the Finance Minister. How long will it take, at the present rate of annual profit, to recoup the people of Canada for the $58,000,000 promised them four years ago? I must say it appears to me that if ever a department showed the way how to destroy a great inheritance, it is the Department of the Interior, whether under the hon. gentleman's administration or that of his predecessors does not matter much to us. We ought to be in receipt, I believe, of a very considerable income from this source if the property was administered as such a huge territory as is still retained should be administered. But the actual fact is that it is as much as the hon. Minister can do to show such an amount received from all sources—many of them receipts on capital account which should be credited to capital—as will equal the amount of the annual expenditure. I cannot for the life of me see how $102,000 can be required for the Department of the Interior. The department must have been brought to a fine point in the noble of circumlocution. I cannot at all understand what on earth is the necessity, looking at the amount of business done and looking at the number of people whom, unfortunately, we know to be the total settlement in the North-west for 98,000 letters, if that be the number, can be written for any real business purpose. This number might be made up if a vast proportion of them are written, if I suspect they are, from clerks in one branch of the department to clerks in other branches, and so on round and round. But that there should be a correspondence of a hundred thousand letters a year, or thereabout, for any useful purpose, does appear most incredible, particularly when we remember that the hon. gentleman has scattered through the country a number of officials with whom such settlers as there are ought to be able to communicate without the trouble of writing letters. I would like to know from the hon. gentleman how many settlers, according to his estimate, were really brought into the North-west altogether last year.

Mr. DALY. According to the statement which the hon. gentleman will find on page x. of the report of the department, from the States alone there were 1,269 families, representing a total of 3,279 souls, who made 810 entries. These are from the United States alone. If the hon. gentleman will wait for a moment I will give him the full information. I did not expect to be interrogated on a matter of this kind in the discussion of the estimates of civil government. The information is all contained in the Department of the Interior.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. gentleman will see that my inquiry is pertinent to this subject.

Mr. DALY. Yes; but it is not an inquiry that one would expect under this particular item. The total number of entries—and that is the only estimate we undertake to give—was 3,890, and the total number in the families of those who made the entries was 14,688, that is on page xii. of the report of the Department of the Interior.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. How many of these does the hon. gentleman estimate to have come from the older provinces?

Mr. DALY. From Ontario, 844; from Quebec, 121; from Nova Scotia, 42; from New Brunswick, 9; from Prince Edward Island, 7; from British Columbia, 29; from Manitoba, 246; from the North-west Territories, 86; provinces not given, 238.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That would be about 1,500, as I understand, from the older provinces, and 2,300 from elsewhere.

Mr. DALY. The total from the other provinces was 1,850 entries.

Mr. McMULLEN. How many from the United States?

Mr. DALY. From the United States 580. English 380, Irish 50, Scotch 94, French 151, Belgian 67, and so on. The information is all in the report.

Mr. McMULLEN. While we are on this branch of the subject, respecting these 580 entries from the United States, I am under the impression that a great many of the agents that were supposed to be at work in the United States made up a good deal of this immigration in order to show that they had been at work. They had to do something that would look like justification for the department in paying them their money. I have had communication from some parties in the North-west with regard to this immigration from the United States, and they declared that it was a positive farce. These immigrants were brought in from the United States, they were supposed to homestead, and they did make entries under the pressure brought to bear by these agents. The agents had been in the United States living comfortably and enjoying a fine time, and, to show that they were doing something for their money, they got a few people to go in and make homestead entries and become nominal residents of the country. Then they turned around to the department and said: See what fine work I have done; here are people I have brought in from Illinois, Missouri, or other states; I have located these as settlers, in proof of which I show you their homestead entries. And many of these so-called settlers were not forty-eight hours in the country; they had a good time and a free ride; they had an opportunity of seeing the country, had plenty to eat, and, probably, were helped back afterwards. It is unfair that the money of the country should be spent in that frivolous way. There is one of these immigration agents concerning whom I shall take the opportunity to say a word at a more fitting time. This man is supposed to be in the United States to work up immigration. He is paid $3.50 a day as travelling allowance as well as his salary. I can prove that one-third of his time he was here in Ontario driving his family around and enjoying himself, and he drew for salary and travelling expenses last year over $3,300. This man has made a great flourish of trumpets of the work he has done. He got a train covered with evergreens, and with a great display of flags and a great hurrah about the enormous influx of the people from the United States, and so he goes to the Government and says: Don't I deserve to be kept in my situation; just look at the homesteaders I have brought in. And these homesteaders simply laugh at the whole thing. It is folly to spend the public money in this way. The hon. gentleman should make inquiry, because I think I can bring cases under his notice to show that this farce about a large influx of settlers from the United States has been played exactly as I said. Some have come in, I dare say they have, but I say that in many cases those fellows have been picked up, miserable, good-for-nothing tramps have been picked up, put on the trains, brought in here and settled as homesteaders, and in a few hours they are out of the country and away. We will have an opportunity later on of discussing this whole business when we get into the emigration items, when I shall draw attention to this case, and to other similar cases. There is one man who lives in Chatham, who has been drawing a yearly allowance as an immigration agent, and enjoying himself splendidly. Of course he will say he has been doing something, he will say that he has been to the United States. One man made the grand tour to the Chicago Exposition. He drew his mileage there, and his living allowance, and all the rest of it, and took advantage of the opportunity to see the exhibition and have a good time generally under the guise of an immigration agent. I say it is a farce, and a folly, and nonsense to conduct affairs in this way.

Mr. DALY. I can only say that I cannot see anything of a farce, or a folly in connection with the work that has been carried on by the Government through the Department of the Interior in bringing back to this country, as we are bringing back in thousands, Canadians and old country people who desire to return and live in this country of ours. Now, Sir, I flatly contradict the statement the hon. gentleman has made as to our bringing in tramps, or people of that class. On the contrary, the men that we have brought in here are men who, if their circumstances are inquired into, will be found to be men of very respectable character. I venture to say that not a single man has gone into Alberta from the states of Washington, Idaho, Oregon, or any of those western states, who has not been perfectly able to support himself and family for from a year to two years, at all events. People who have seen them coming in upon the trains, and those who have visited them in their homes after they have got there, say that they are a remarkably fine lot of people; and I am sure they will be delighted to hear the character the hon. gentleman has given them. I want to say on behalf of these people who are not here to speak for themselves, that they are just as respectable in every way as the hon. gentleman himself. I want also to state that this work has been carried on by us as vigorously as possible with the means at our disposal; and as the officer in charge of the department, I would be derelict in my duty were I not to encourage those people to come back here who are only too anxious to come. I regret that the condition of most of the people over there is such that they have not the money to leave, otherwise we would have thousands more of them. But I say here emphatically, and I court inquiry into the matter, that the class of men who have made the homestead entries of which I speak are thoroughly respectable men. In speaking before I made a mistake in my figures. There were 818 entries made last year by people from the United States, and you will find every one of these men upon their homesteads to-day, unless they have died in the meantime. The idea expressed by the hon. gentleman that men are brought over here by agents, and make their entry and then turn around and go back again, is, in the words of the hon. gentleman himself, a farce. No such instances have occurred. The hon. gentleman has been misinformed by some person who is desirous of doing an injury to the Government, and of doing an injury to my department. I want to say again that there are no better settlers in that country to-day than the people whom the agents of this department, and the agents of the Canadian Pacific Railway have induced to come over and take up homesteads in our far west and become citizens again, as many of them are doing under the flag of Great Britain.

Mr. McMULLEN. Any statement that I have made I think I shall be in a position to prove when we come to deal with the items on immigration. If you will turn up the Auditor General's Report at page 369, you will see that we have spent, in trying to repatriate people who have gone to the United States, over $55,000, which money has been paid to men to travel through the United States. Take, for instance, the state of Michigan, a very large amount was paid out in this state, a large amount was paid in the state of Minnesota, and a large amount in Nebraska. An agent is appointed in each one of those states to travel up and down and see if he cannot get men to come back to Canada. There have been agents in North Dakota, South Dakota, Washington, Idaho and Wisconsin, who have been appointed for the purpose of trying to get people to come back to Canada. I say there have been cases that will bear out the identical statement I have made to the House, that men were brought in here and stopped a few days and returned to their own country, and looked upon the whole thing as a farce.

Mr. DALY. I would ask how the hon. gentleman expects us to get these people to come over here unless we have agents to go there and do the work they have been doing? Does he imagine that these men are aware of the fact that we offer free homesteads in that country to whoever will settle upon them? They are in utter ignorance of these things, and the only way we can inform them is through agents. We propose to keep this work up in the future and send agents over there who will endeavour to reach these people. But we do not expect to expend as much in the United States in the future, for the reason that the people there are now becoming aware of the facts through the work of these agents. I want to say, however, that we have really not had as many agents there as we ought to have had, because, from inquiries that are constantly being made to the department, it would be almost necessary to fill every county of the western states with agents in order to give these people the information that they are continually asking for by letter in reference to the conditions we offer them of homesteading in the North-west.

Mr. McMULLEN. What has been the experience of this country with immigration in the last ten years? We have expended over three millions and a half of money in trying to bring people into this country, and when we take our census, we find that these people are not here, they are not to be found. We have not even kept our natural increase, and the idea of spending three to four millions of the people's money in trying to bring in men that will not stay here, is a farce, and is something that the people will not much longer tolerate. We should abandon our policy of immigration if we cannot show any better results than are shown during our experience of the last ten years. Still we are going on spending $250,000 or $300,000 a year with the results I have mentioned. We have been sending men across the line as immigration agents who have been dancing around, having a good time travelling from one place to another, and not only that, but many of them remaining at their homes in Canada while they still draw their $3.50 a day for living allowance. They are not in the States, they are here drawing that money under the guise of repatriation agents. I say that our whole immigration policy should be recast from top to bottom. Stop this farce, and let the people come here through the inducements we offer them when they get here. If the hon. gentleman had adopted a land policy in the North-west that would have encouraged actual settlement, that would have kept the lands out of the hands of land-grabbers, men who take up land and hold it, but will not sell unless at advanced prices—if the Government had kept the land for the settler, and the money for the treasury, instead of dividing it up among their camp followers, we would have more people there to-day than we have got.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I was going to call the attention of the House to the defence made by the Minister of the Interior to the charge made against him that extravagance reigned in his department. The hon. gentleman thought it sufficient to say that there had been a small reduction made in the staff during the last year. So far, so good. But has the hon. gentleman attempted to grapple with the main charge made against his department by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills)? The charge is a very serious one when we come to analyze it, for we find that the Indian Department, and the Department of the Interior together cost, in 1878, $42,000, while it has now increased to $153,000, or four times as much. To-day, the cost of the Indian Department alone is $14,000 more than the cost of the Interior Department and Indian Department together in 1878. We do not want to enter into details in order to convict the hon. gentleman and his Government of crass extravagance. The hon. gentleman will contend that he can justify such an increase in the Indian Department on the ground of increased work.

Mr. DALY. I do, most assuredly, and I will give the hon. gentleman the facts.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) There may be a few more Indian bands receiving treaty money than did then. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) questions, however, whether that excuse can be offered. The fact that in 1878 the Indian Department and the Department of the Interior together were run for an expenditure of $42,000, and now cost $153,000, calls for more than a passing answer such as that given by the hon. Minister. I had not examined the figures as the hon. member for Bothwell had done, he having carefully collected and compared the expenditures of 1878 and 1893, but I listened very carefully to his statement, and I found that with the exception of one department of the public service, every department has increased from 40 per cent to 150 per cent during that time. Can that increase be explained by any advancement in wealth and population in the country? We know that our population has not increased in anything like the ratio that was expected, and there is, in fact, no justification whatever for the enormous increases made. Take the Department of Railways and the Department of Public Works. A few years ago we were told that the time had come when the Government would cease building railways as public works, and I believe the Government have practically ceased to do so now. But what is the fact in regard to expenditure? The Railway Department and the Department of Public Works spend $110,000 on the civil service at Ottawa, as against $48,000 in 1878. Can that be justified, palliated or excused? It is a part and parcel of the unbridled extravagances on which this country entered about 1881-82, and has been carried on ever since. I admit that spasmodic attempts have been made in one or two departments to retrench expenses, and for those efforts I commend hon. gentleman opposite. A year ago, the Government appointed a commission, and I call attention to the conclusions at which the commissioners arrived in their report. They assert:

In concluding their criticism of the public expenditures, your commissioners beg to mention one of the most striking features of the whole subject, and that is the large number of officials employed by the Government, apparently out of proportion with the resources and population of the Dominion.

Then they proceed to say:

This number is constantly on the increase, and the increase of course is largely in newly developed territories. Your commissioners view with pleasure the contemplated transfer of the immigration service to the control of the Department of the Interior, whereby no doubt a great reduction of expenditure will be effected.

They go on to suggest that instead of each department having its own officers in districts newly opened up, one officer should discharge land, immigration, Indian and other business. I have never heard that the Government intend to carry out either this or any other suggestion made by the Civil Service Commission. With the exception of the Department of Finance there has been no department of the Government which has retained its expenditure at anything like the amount which sufficed in 1878. That is surely a proper and fair test to apply. If there is a department in which a small increase might be justified, it was that of Finance. The new policy involved extra expenditure, but, notwithstanding the increase of work since 1878, the department has been so conducted on business principles that to-day we find the expenditure is not largely in excess of 1878. If that is the case in the Finance Department, it should be the case in other departments, and the Minister who largely took charge of Interior and Indian Affairs has hardly justified his appointment by the paltry reduction which he explained to us has been made by the transfer of Mr. Hayter Reed from Winnipeg to Ottawa and the consequent economy which has resulted from the change. The figures given by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) are startling, and the Government have not attempted to offer the vestige of a defence, except in regard to the Post-office Department, where we acknowledge there must be an increase, but every increase in the Post-office service is for the benefit of the people and must necessarily involve certain increases. To that extent the increases in the Post-office Department can be justified. Other increases cannot be justified, and the Government have not attempted to justify them, and they appear to be following, although not quite at the same rate, the extravagance that prevailed from 1880 to 1890.

Mr. DALY. If the hon. gentleman had listened with the same attention to the remarks I made as he devoted to the remarks addressed to the committee by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), he would have been a little enlightened.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I paid very close attention to your remarks, but you evaded the issues.

Mr. DALY. I pointed out that in 1878, when the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) presided over the department, which was then a twopenny halfpenny affair, with about twelve clerks, there were 845 entries.

Mr. MULLOCK. You seem to think that spending money adds to the dignity of the department.

Mr. DALY. While in 1893 there were 4,067. In 1877, when the hon. gentleman presided over the department, the number of letters received was 3,137; number sent, 3,677; total, 6,814, as against 50,794 received last year, and 40,874 sent; or a total of 98,938. From 1872-73 up to 1878, the total cash received from sales of land was $57,000 as against $93,000 last year. I also showed that the total timber dues received from 1872 to 1878 was $52,000 as compared with $105,000 last year. I would ask any hon. gentleman listening to these figures whether they do not indicate increased work. In addition, I desire, in reply to the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) to say, that although the total receipts, $374,000 do not appear to be large, it must be remembered that we have not received any money from pre-emptions for three years. In 1890 we abolished the pre-emption system, from which a large revenue was received yearly. The pre-emption fees in 1888-89 amounted to $10,000; in 1882-83 to $54,000. We only received $93,000 last year on cash sales as against $108,000 the year before, because, as I said, we have abandoned the pre-emption system. In regard to the Department of Indian Affairs, in 1884 the total expenditure was $92,000. In that year, the department only paid $47,000 in annuities. In 1878 the annuity payments ran up to $148,000. In 1892, it ran up to $124,000, and last year it was $123,000. That is regulated by our treaty with the Indians.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) It ran down apparently.

Mr. DALY. Yes; it ran down because there has been a decrease in the Indian population. Then, as to implements and tools, no such things were purchased from 1874 to 1881, at all. The first expenditure was 1882, when the department expended $11,279, and that expenditure now is $10,738. In 1874, the department only expended $3,647 for cattle; in 1875, $21,000; in 1876, $19,000; in 1877, $16,000; and 1878, $31,000; and it ran up in 1881 to $76,000, but all we expended last year for cattle was $1,490. Then, as to destitute Indians, we expended only $18,000 in 1874, which ran up in 1878 to $48,000, and that expenditure has run up as high as $570,000 in 1886, but it is now down to $202,000. For clothing in 1877, only $1,930 was expended, against $3,629 in 1893.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman has mentioned the year 1874 several times. Is he quoting the figures for 1874, or 1878?

Mr. DALY. I gave the figures for 1874 in four instances.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I do not see the object in comparing the year 1874.

Mr. DALY. I want to show you how the expenditure increased from 1874 to 1878. As to schools in 1874, there was expended only $1,460, and in 1877, $1,341, but that ran up in 1886 to $66,000, and last year to $218,000.

Mr. DEVLIN. Is that the total grant for education?

Mr. DALY. The total grant for education for Indian children in Manitoba and the North-west. The surveys in 1879, cost $31,000, and that was reduced to $3,921 in 1893. The general expenses of the department in 1878 were $124,612, as against $144,000 for the last year, showing the period from 1878 to 1893—although the expenditure had risen between the years 1878 to 1886—it is on the decline for the years 1887, 1888, 1889, 1890, 1891, 1892, and 1893, until it is below the items I have mentioned in almost every instance. I do not wish to weary the House with any more figures, but I am satisfied that if these were published in full in 'Hansard,' hon. gentlemen would see that the strictest economy has been exercised in the department, consonant with carrying out its obligations, and they would also see that the business of the department has increased one hundred-fold since the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mills) presided over it.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. Minister might have saved himself the trouble of referring to the particulars of the year 1874, because in that year we had next to no dealings with the Indians in the North-west Territories.

Mr. DALY. They cost $92,000 that year.

Mr. DALY.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman knows too, that since 1877 no treaty has been made with the Indian population in our North-west Territories.

Mr. DALY. Except one.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Merely the bringing in of a small number of Indians, but the last treaty of any consequence was that made by Mr. Laird in the year 1877. I took the year 1878 as a year when the expenditure on Indian account extended to the same Indian population as to-day, and we had the same Indian communities to deal with then as we have at the present time. I have not undertaken to deal with the outside work at all, because I shall have an opportunity of doing that later. I pointed out two years ago that so far as the Indian population in the North-west Territories is concerned it was costing the country $7 to pay an Indian $5. That is, that we appropriated $12, $7 of which went to certain officials and $5 of which went to the Indians. I do not consider that a successful operation, but I will not discuss it until the Estimates come on. But, Sir, I was calling attention to the actual cost of the department here. No doubt the establishment of schools amongst the Indians, and getting the Indian population on their reserves, and the appointment of a large number of agents, will multiply the number of letters and communications sent to the department, but that is not after all, a test of the amount of work that is being done in the department. So far as the lands branch is concerned the hon. gentleman knows that for years the Government boasted of the number of acres which they every year surveyed, that some of these lands have been surveyed three or four times, and that men were employed for that purpose.

Mr. DALY. Are you referring to the Department of the Interior or to the Indian Department, because you are getting them mixed?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I am referring to the Department of the Interior. I am speaking of the whole of the department under the hon. gentleman now.

Mr. DALY. They are separate departments.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). They are at the present time, but they were not in 1878. The hon. gentleman knows well that at the present time the work in the department of mapping and of making plans of surveys made, is not greater than it was before, unless the hon. gentleman is doing the work over again, but that I supposed was long since abandoned. I have called the attention of the House and of the Government to this fact: that the Indian branch to-day cost $51,000, while in 1878 it cost only about $14,000—I am speaking of the inside service—and that the whole Department of the Interior for Lands and Indians cost in 1878, $42,760, but that to-day it costs $153,701. Now, I say there is no increased work in the department to warrant so large an expenditure. I am not finding fault with the hon. gentleman. I am undertaking to do him a service and the country a service in calling attention to what I regard as a most unnecessary expenditure, and I also call attention to these facts in consequence of the observations on comparative expenditure and of economy made by the Finance Minister at an earlier period. If the hon. Minister will compare the work of the year 1878 with that of the year 1873—and there was a great difference in the increased population, and in the area over which the administrative work of the Government extended during these two periods—he will find that in almost every instance there was a diminution in the expenditure of almost every department. Thus in 1873 the Privy Council office cost nearly $16,000 and in 1878 $15,000. The Department of Justice in 1873 cost upwards of $17,000, and in 1878 $11,600. The Department of Militia and Defence, in 1873, cost $37,000, and in 1878 a little less than $32,000. And so I might go on with other branches. I call the hon. gentleman's attention to this fact, that in 1878 the maintenance of the North-west Mounted Police branch at Ottawa cost $2,700, while to-day it costs $9,912.50. I say there is no justification for that increase; there is no reason why the expenditure should be larger to-day than it was in 1878. In every one of these instances, while the cost of the Administration of government here was less in 1878 than it was in 1873, it is to-day more than double what it was in 1873, and I mention that one branch because the nature of the service is such that the work must be very nearly stationary. Does not every hon. gentleman on the Treasury benches see that in this matter a very great economy might be practiced with great gain to the public and no diminution in the efficiency of the public service?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I just want to call the attention of the committee to the authority that the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) quoted, I do not think he has carefully examined the report of the Civil Service Commissioners, for it does not help him in his contention, which is made I think in a rather superficial manner; because he says he wants no details, he wants to look simply at the bulk figures of 1878 and the bulk figures of 1894, from which he finds that the cost of civil government has doubled; that is enough for him, that shows the extravagance, the waste of public money, and so on. If I understood him, he said that the Civil Service Commissioners in their report attested to the large number of officials in the departments, out of all proportion to the resources and population of the Dominion. That was his point, and citing this report, he seemed to make it, so far as their authority seemed to substantiate it. But what did the commissioners say? I call the attention of the committee to this, because their report punctures most decisively the whole argument of the hon. gentleman, so far as it is based on bulk figures. This is the passage to which I think the hon. gentleman referred:

In concluding their criticism of the public expenditures, your commissioners beg to mention one of the most striking features of the whole subject and that is the large number of officials employed by the Government, apparently out of proportion to the resources and population of the Dominion.

The commissioners were showing that that was merely the view obtained on the first blush of the investigation into the subject; for they go on to say:

This number is constantly on the increase and the increase of course is largely in newly developed territories. Your commissioners view with pleasure the contemplated transfer of the immigration service to the control of the Department of the Interior, whereby, no doubt, a great reduction of expenditure will be effected.

I take it from that passage that the commissioners do not support the argument the hon. gentleman based upon it. But there is another passage which seems to make my view the correct one. At the beginning of this subject the commissioners say:

The expense for Civil Government is the next in order. But as this has been fully dealt with in another report, in which this service formed the chief topic, your commissioners have only to note that the main source of the increase in the vote for Civil Government arises from the annual statutory increases of salary authorized by the Civil Service Act, and that there does not appear to be any disposition to increase the staff. In fact, in some cases the staff has been reduced.

One reference more to this report, and I shall sit down, because I have no desire unduly to hasten my own bad quarter of an hour; I refer to it to show that fallacy of the hon. gentleman's bad reasoning. The hon. gentleman says that the item of civil government has doubled, and that settles the matter. Take, for instance, the appropriation for my own department. It has doubled over that for 1878; and the hon. gentleman, while he had an excuse to offer for the Post Office Department, did not strengthen his position by showing that there was one for the Department of Marine and Fisheries. Now, let us see what the commissioners say about this department. Under the heading of "Ocean and River Service, Lighthouse and Coast Service, Marine Hospitals, and Steamboat Inspection," they say:

All under the control of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries and involving an expenditure of $749,000. Your commissioners, in looking over the outlays for some years back, are pleased to mention that they find a large measure of effectiveness has been introduced into these services, and expenses that have been found of little advantage to the department have been dropped. All the supervision for the whole outlay is exercised at Ottawa.

And so on. Now, I am not arguing that any undue credit should be given for that; but there is a case where the commissioners find that the expenditures of the department are well in hand, and that there is no reflection at all for this increase of staff. It may be that the work in that and other departments could be done for less; it may be that a close examination would show that it could; but I take issue with these hon. gentlemen in saying that in this or any other country any just complaint can be grounded upon a glance at the bulk sum of cost of management, either of a department on any other business.

Mr. IVES The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), I think, made a very unfair comparison in speaking of the expenditure at Ottawa for the North-west Mounted Police for 1878, and the expenditure for the current year. In 1878 the force consisted of some 300 men, under the command of Col. McLeod, in a country that was comparatively inaccessible, and the whole management of the force, the purchase of supplies and everything else, was done in the west. The only work done in Ottawa was done by Mr. White, the present Controller, at a salary of $1,700, with one clerk. He was simply the means of communication between Sir John Macdonald, the head of the force, and Col. McLeod, who had the control and management of the force in the North-west Territories. At the present time, I need not say, the force is considerably increased above what it was in 1878; but that is not the point. Now, the whole business is managed in Ottawa, the supplies being kept here and distributed from here. The books are kept here. Every account is kept and audited here. Every account and voucher is authorized to be paid here, and the whole business of the North-west Mounted Police Department is transacted in Ottawa. So there can be no possible comparison as to the expenses of Civil Government then and now. And I venture to say there is no expenditure of the same amount of money more carefully watched or more prudently and economically managed than that of the North-west Mounted Police, and I fancy when the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) looks into the matter, he will find that he lighted on a very unfortunate example to illustrate the extravagance of Civil Government now as compared with 1878. Coming to the Privy Council, it is impossible to give comparisons very far back, but comparing 1891 with 1893, the last year of which we have an authentic record, the clerical work of the office has nearly doubled.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Other work transferred to it.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER

Mr. IVES. No; not to a very great extent. The work has increased by reason of the increased work done by the Privy Council. Whether a larger amount of work comes to the Council now than formerly, I am not able to say. Whether the work done formerly by departmental order is now done by minute of Council, I cannot say from my experience.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). There is a clear distinction between the two.

Mr. IVES. But I can tell the hon. gentleman that the number of entries in the register in 1891 was 3,600, and in 1893 4,200. The Orders in Council increased from 2,800 in 1891 to 3,700 in 1892. The number of folios of Orders in Council in 1891 was 11,300, and in 1893 nearly 16,000. The number of folios copied by the clerks increased from 70,000 in 1890 to 84,470 in 1893. And in the first four months of this year, the number of folios copied in the Privy Council amounted to 50,000. So far from there being an excess of clerks, I had during the past year to keep that part of the staff which does the copying at work until six o'clock every evening, and they have not even had the usual Saturday half holiday, which other members of the service enjoy. So far from the force of the Privy Council office being too large, it is a question whether, if the work continues to increase, as it has done, additional aid will not be required. Since I have had charge of the office I have either dismissed or made permanent all of the so-called permanent temporaries that I found there, who had been there for years, and were familiar with the work, but were still temporary clerks. Their services have either been dispensed with or they have been made permanent at a smaller salary than they were receiving per day. So far as I can see, as a business man accustomed to business management, I do not think the service could be performed with a man less than we now have.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Possibly not a bad way of getting at the real merits of the question in dispute, which is, I take it, whether we are employing more civil servants than we require or not, would be to compare the number of men in actual employ in the permanent civil service in 1878 and 1894. The total number of servants required for all purposes in 1878 was from 385 to 390, and the total number now required amounts to 823, more or less. It does appear to me that the difference between 387 and 823 permanent employees—and I observe there are allowances for extra clerks, rather particularly in the Privy Council, by the way—is not to be accounted for on any possible ground except that there has been a most unfortunate multiplication of civil servants in Ottawa. There might be an excuse for an increase of a 100 or 150 possibly, although I doubt it, looking at the work now done and comparing it with that formerly done. But to tell us that it has been necessary to increase the number from 380 to 820 is to tell us what no man who knows anything about the relative position of the country then and now can possibly believe. The plain truth is this: that everywhere there has been for years back a disposition to increase without reason the number of officials. I do not believe that there is any other English-speaking country where such an enormous number of men is employed for so comparatively a small amount of expenditure, because after all the actual amount of expenditure that goes to these various departments is not very large when you come to deduct the fixed charges. You are required to expend $1,475,000 a year and to employ 800 men to assist you in doing that, not to speak of the fifteen or sixteen gentlemen at the head of departments, who contribute certainly to increase the expenditure, if they do nothing else. The actual fact is this: that from first to last we have been guilty of very great extravagance, based on the expectation that this country was going to increase in a much bigger ratio than it has. For a population of barely 5,000,000, we have a larger expenditure than any English-speaking country of equal population. We have a larger number of civil servants than I believe would be tolerated in any other country having a federal system like ours, because it must be remembered that, in addition to all employed in Ottawa, there is not a province which has not its own civil staff besides, doing a great deal of the work that in other countries devolves on the central Government. The mere fact that nearly 500 men have been added to the permanent civil list of Canada within the last fourteen or fifteen years is by itself the strongest possible demonstrative evidence that the departments are enormously overcrowded, and that under any proper business administration we could get along with certainly one-third less.

Mr. CAMPBELL. In my opinion the remarks of the last speaker and of the hon. member for Bothwell are quite to the point. There is no doubt at all that we, 5,000,000 of people, are expending altogether too much money for the work done. I find that in the last fourteen years the expense of running the country has increased by about 70 per cent. In other words it has cost us $170,000,000 to carry on the affairs of the country in the last fifteen years more than it would have cost us had the expenditure remained as it was in 1878. In round numbers, $170,000,000 have been spent in simply carrying on the affairs of the country, more than would have been spent had the expenditure remained as it was in 1878. Now, I do not mean to say for a moment that the expenditure should remain stationary. We do not expect that. The expenses must increase somewhat as years go by. But it seems to me that the expenditure in every department has gone up at too high a rate altogether. Take any department and you will find that the expenditure has almost doubled in the last fourteen years, and I believe a great amount of money is wilfully wasted. If proper supervision was exercised by the Ministers in charge, if the account were properly checked over by those who are paid for this service, a vast amount of this money would be saved. For instance, in reference to immigration agents, the Minister of the Interior told us that he had many of them in the United States. Hon. members will recollect that two or three years ago we had a case before the Public Accounts Committee. A former member of this House had been sent as an immigration agent to the United States. He sent in his account to the department and was paid. Yet, before the committee it was proven by his own evidence that not one solitary dollar's worth of work had been done to represent this account. The very days when, according to the account, he was supposed to be in Dakota seeking to get emigrants for the North-west, he was actually in the town of Chatham. And so it was proven that the country had not received a dollar's worth of value for the $1,800 paid to him. I believe that in the cases of a great many more agents, nominally travelling over the United States and other countries endeavouring to bring emigrants into the North-west, if their accounts were properly audited, it would be found that the department was being imposed upon, and was not receiving value for the moneys spent. I am not much in favour of spending hundreds of thousands of dollars every year in promoting immigration to this country. I think there are so many people in this country now out of employment and unable to obtain a day's wage for a day's work, that it is wrong to spend the people's money to bring immigrants in to compete with those who are here. We find that the $3,500,000 spent to promote immigration here has been literally wasted. If the immigrants ever came they did not remain. I object to spending any more money for immigration, and I believe it would be a wise thing for the Government to lop off these mouldering branches and stop this wilful waste of money upon immigration agents in England, Scotland and the United States. The whole expenses of this Administration should be reduced. I do not see why, with 5,000,000 of people, $37,000,000 is required to govern and carry on the affairs of the country. I think that one way in which expenditure could be reduced is by having a smaller number of heads of departments.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I do not propose to continue the discussion upon the line it has so far taken. But I rise to take exception which the twist the hon. Minister of Marine tried to give my remarks. The hon. gentleman tried to make out that I was unwilling to go into details, and relied upon generalities. I think it is impossible for a member of the Opposition to criticise intelligently and successfully individual items of expenditure in a department. If you take exception to the salary of John Smith or Wm. Brown, the debate is concluded when the Minister says that in his opinion he cannot get along without this officer.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. My difficulty is that that does not conclude the debate.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I did not rely upon any information I possessed myself; I did not rely upon what was stated to me by any political friend to prove that the allegations of the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) in the comparison he made of the expenditure on civil service at Ottawa in 1878 and 1893 were thoroughly borne out by the facts. But I quoted the opinions of the commissioners appointed by the hon. gentlemen opposite themselves. I read the concluding paragraph, and that paragraph furnishes a complete answer to everything that has been said by the Minister of Marine or the Minister of the Interior. I will read that one sentence again:

In concluding their criticism of the public expense, your commissioners beg to mention one of the most striking features of the whole subject, and that is the large number of officials employed by the Government apparently out of proportion to the resources and population of the Dominion.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Read the next sentence.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I did read it. I read the whole paragraph. It goes on to say:

This number is constantly on the increase, and the increase of course is largely in the newly developed territories.

That does not alter the fact that "the most striking feature of the whole subject" is "the large number of officials employed by the Government, apparently out of proportion to the resources and population of the Dominion." The commissioners go into details and point out how expenditure can be reduced. They recommend, for instance, the abolition of the land office in Winnipeg, and there are other suggestions that I need not dwell upon. I am showing that, while the Government have increased the civil service expenditure 50 or 100, or, in some departments, 150 per cent, the commissioners appointed by themselves declare that this employment of officers apparently out of proportion of the resources and population of the Dominion is the most striking feature of the whole subject. That report is the most severe condemnation of the expenditure of the Government that possible could be contrived.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. What do they say is the main cause of the increase? At page 60 they say that the increase is mainly due to the annual statutory increases of salary.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman is not serious in contending that.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I never was more so.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Take a case like that of the Department of the Interior and Indian Affairs combined, where the increase has been from $47,000 in 1878 to $153,000. Surely it will not be suggested that the main cause of this is a statutory increase.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I was only answering the hon. gentleman. It will not do to read a few sentences on page 70 alone. The report, including the declaration on page 60, must be taken as a whole. This is given as the opinion of the commissioners, but, of course, it goes for what it is worth; I do not say it is conclusive. But they make the statement that the result of their examination is that the main source of increase in the vote arises from the annual statutory increases in salary.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I am pointing out to the hon. gentleman that while he cannot be responsible, and is not held responsible, for the statutory increases, those statutory increases have no appreciable proportion to the enormous increases which we have pointed out in every one of the departments except in the Department of Finance. I say that the fact that that department stands out in bold relief, is the strongest rebuke which can be given to the other departments of the public service, because, owing to the enormous increase in the financial receipts and expenditures of the Government since then, if there was a department in which a small increase of the civil service expenditure might be justified, it was that department. That department has remained almost stationary.

Mr. DALY. It is the smallest department in the service.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) It may be the smallest in numbers, and I would advise the hon. gentleman to bring his department into lines with it.

Mr. DALY. There is but little business done in the Finance Department compared with the Department of Interior.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Well, if the Minister of Finance and his deputy are drones, the Minister of the Interior will have to settle with them. The general impression in the House is that there is some work to be done in the Department of Finance, at least while the tariff is on. But I was pointing out the fact that while in that department, which is one of the first departments in the public service, by judicious management and economy, the expenditure has been kept almost at the figure it was in 1877, the hon. gentleman presides over a department where the expenditure has been more than trebled. The hon. gentleman has given no justification or excuse for that expenditure, and all he has said was that he himself was trying to cut it down, that he had made an effort in that direction by reducing the number of employees from 161 to 129 in one branch of this department. So far so good; but he has not attempted to grapple with the true inwardness of the figures which are given in the Public Accounts, with the conclusion which his own commissioners drew and published and which is in the public records. The striking feature of the whole subject consists in the disproportion which exists between the expense of that department and the resources and population of the Dominion.

Mr. DALY. I do not like to weary the House, but as the hon. gentleman has directed his remarks to me, I must say a few words more. I am sorry to think that no matter what I might say, I could not convince the hon. gentleman; he does not want to be convinced. But I will tell him for his information that one small branch in my department, called the timber branch, where the salaries do not aggregate, I suppose, $10,000 a year, does more work than did the whole Department of Interior in 1878. There are more letters being received, more actual clerical work being done, and more money being received, than at the time the hon. gentleman from Bothwell was Minister of the Interior. The facts and figures are here, showing that the timber lands and grazing branch of the Department of Interior, with salaries that do not run, at all events, to $12,000 a year, do more work today and take in more money than did the whole department at the time the hon. gentleman from Bothwell was Minister of Interior.

Mr. DEVLIN. The cost of the department is 100 per cent more.

Mr. DALY. I think the work of the department has increased in a greater ratio than that, and it requires so many more people to conduct the business. In answer to the hon. member for Kent (Mr. Campbell), and to the hon. member for North Wellington, I want to say, that I think it would have been well for them to make inquiry before making the charge they have made against the Department of Interior, namely, that a Mr. Smith of Chatham was engaged in immigration work. I want to say to the hon. gentleman that Mr. Smith of Chatham has never been employed in the Department of the Interior at any time. He was not employed as immigration agent.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Yes, he was.

Mr. DALY. He may have been employed by the Department of Agriculture some two or three years ago. The hon. gentleman and the hon. member for North Wellington tried to convey to the House and to the country the idea that a Mr. H. H. Smith, whose name appears in the Auditor General's report last year, was Mr. Smith of Chatham. The member for North Wellington said this gentleman, instead of doing the work in Nebraska for which he was being paid, was driving his team around Chatham. Now, I want those gentlemen to understand that Mr. Smith of Chatham was never in the employ of the Department of Interior, that he never did any immigration work for that department, and never received a dollar of public money since I have been Minister.

Mr. CAMPBELL. He received $1,825.

Mr. DALY. That was three years ago. Now, these hon. gentlemen are bringing up a question that was ventilated in the Public Accounts Committee three years ago, in order to make a charge against the present administration of the Department of Interior. Let me say that I am prepared to give them any information they want, but I ask them to take pains to inform themselves a little better before making an attack upon my department such as they did make a few minutes ago.

Mr. McMULLEN. The remarks of the hon. gentleman are quite uncalled for. He knows perfectly well that Mr. Smith was then an immigration agent.

Mr. DALY. But you said that the name of Mr. Smith, of Chatham, was in the Auditor General's Report of 1894, as an immigration agent.

Mr. McMULLEN. The hon. gentleman has got a little agitated to-night, but I hope he will try and keep cool. I mentioned Mr. Smith's case as an evidence of what had transpired in years past, and as showing that the hon. gentleman is repeating that experience in the case of the men that he has now. The hon. gentleman says I tried to show that Mr. Smith had been employed in the Department of Interior. Now, I would advise him to be careful and not get outside the traces, because we are not through with his department yet. When we get to the immigration items I shall be prepared to give him some more figures. My reason for referring to immigration matters was based upon the experience we had with an immigration agent three years ago, who claimed to be doing work in the United States when he was actually at home, and I said I would be able to point to another gentleman now engaged in his department, and who is repeating the same dodge. I do not wish the hon. gentleman to convey the idea to the committee that I was in total ignorance of matters connected with immigration in his department, and I think by the time we have got through with those items he will acknowledge that I know something about it. I give the hon. gentleman credit for making an effort to reduce the expenditure in respect to the number of clerks, and I hope he will continue in that course. If there is any department in which considerable reduction can be made it is in the Department of Interior, and the more so since it has had the immigration branch attached to it. I think the expenses in that department can now be cut down one-half.

Mr. HAGGART. As there has been an attack directed against the Public Works Department and the Railway Department, I will take this opportunity of saying a few words in reply. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) states that the comparative expenditure in my department cannot be known, because in 1878 it was included in the Public Works Department. He says that the expenditure in the Railway Department is now in excess of the total expenditure in Public Works and Railway Departments at that time. That is a very misleading statement, and the hon. gentleman, as an old member of this House, ought to have known better than to make it. Now, I state that the civil service expenditure in headquarters here, even the larger amount that is expended this year, is less than it was in 1878. The hon. gentleman knows that the total amount I ask for the inside work of my department this year is $50,000. He knows again that I ask for $17,000 for extra service clerks. Does he mean to say that the expenditure in 1878 at headquarters here in the Department of Railways and Canals was less than $67,000? Does he not know that in 1878 the expenditure at headquarters was a charge to the particular work that was being done in different parts of the country? That system has been altered. I have not the figures at hand, but I venture to say that the expenditure of my department is less now than it was in 1878. I will have the figures prepared, and will submit them when the item of canal expenditure comes before the committee, and I will show the country that neither in 1878, nor at any time in the history of the department, was it as economically managed at headquarters as it is at the present time.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. When we come to the hon. gentleman's department we can get the figures and analyze them. My recollection is that the department formerly included public works, and that Mr. Mackenzie was carrying on the construction of the Intercolonial Railway.

Mr. HAGGART. Not at all.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Yes he was at that particular time. Further, that a very considerable number of other matters were at that time included in the department, which are not now connected with it. The people will judge for themselves whether a set of gentlemen who required the services of 826 men, which I find to be the exact figure, to do work done quite as well, if not better, by 380, or 390 in 1878, can claim the title of an economical Government. They require about 500 more permanent employees to do the work we did, or something like two and a half times as many. As the Minister of the Interior seems to be in a disposition to give the committee an insight into his methods of economy, I should like to know how he economized in granting $2,200, or $2,400 as a superannuation allowance to Mr. Vankoughnet? As I understand Mr. Vankoughnet had not attained 60 years of age, I think he was 57 or 58, and we have every reason to believe that he was in full possession of all his faculties. It appears to me a very extraordinary action that the hon. gentleman should have compelled his resignation, or dismissed him, or induced to resign an officer considerably under 60 years of age, and thereby saddled the country with an annual expenditure of $2,200 or $2,400 as a superannuation allowance. I think this is the time when the hon. Minister should explain why he made that change as regards an important officer in his department.

Mr. DALY. I do not think the hon. gentleman could have been in the House a short time ago when I gave figures showing the saving effected by the superannuation of Mr. Vankoughnet. But what I presume the hon. gentleman wants to know is, why Mr. Vankoughnet was superannuated? The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), by an order of the House, had the correspondence brought down, which passed between Mr. Vankoughnet and myself, and it speaks for itself.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Has it been printed yet?

Mr. DALY. It has been laid on the Table. It consists of a letter from myself to Mr. Vankoughnet, and his reply, also an Order in Council superannuating Mr. Vankoughnet, and a supplementary Order in Council giving him two days pay. It was short, sweet, and to the point. I requested Mr. Vankoughnet's resignation for the reason stated in the letter. He saw fit not to place his resignation in my hands, and consequently he was superannuated. The reasons were apparent to myself, that the administration of the department had not been carried on in the way it should have been carried on, under Mr. Vankoughnet as the executive head. In addition, I came to the conclusion that as the greater portion of the work of the department is confined to the Indians of Manitoba, the North-west and British Columbia, it would be well, in order to save the expense that was being entailed by keeping on the Regina office, that a gentleman who was as conversant as Mr. Reed was with the policy pursued by the Government towards these Indians, should be placed at the head of the department. Mr. Reed had previously occupied the position of Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and had been connected with the department for thirteen years. From a large experience in the department, and from his position as Assistant Commissioner for some years, and Commissioner for a number of years, and as having inaugurated the policy carried on in the North-west and Manitoba in respect to the Indians, and the principal work of the department being connected with North-west Indian matters. Mr. Hayter Reed was peculiarly fitted to fill the position. He was brought down here, and now occupies the position of Deputy Superintendent General of Indian Affairs, and the affairs of the department are being well carried on under his administration. By the removal of Mr. Reed to Ottawa we have saved the difference between Mr. Vankoughnet's superannuation allowance and salary, say $1,000, the difference between Mr. Sinclair's salary, he being chief clerk of the department, and being succeeded by the gentleman who occupies the present position, of $800, saving in civil government payment $1,385, saving at the Regina office of salaries amounting to $960, travelling expenses incurred by the Commissioner, $700; the Commissioner's allowance, $600, making a total of $12,445 saving by the superannuation of Mr. Vankoughnet and Mr. Sinclair, and doing away with the office of Commissioner, and bringing Mr. Reed to Ottawa. I may say in justice to Mr. Sinclair that he was superannuated at his own request, after 35 years service. He would have been continued in the department if he had so desired, but he retired voluntarily. We have not only saved $12,445, but in my opinion, from time to time as the work of the department will admit, we will save additional amounts by reducing the staff at the Commissioner's office. It will be patent to any one, who has to do with the Indians, that in order to properly conduct their affairs, there must be some person in authority at headquarters at Regina in case of emergency. The Assistant Commissioner, Mr. Forget, remains there, at his former salary. The department is at the present moment being well conducted under the administration of Mr. Reed, of whom I cannot speak too highly as an administrative officer, and one who has not only the interest of the Indians at heart, but one, who during his long administration of affairs, has manifested his desire to secure every economy consistent with carrying out the policy of the Government. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) stated that he had called the attention of the House two years ago to the fact that it took so many dollars expenditure as agents' salaries to make the expenditure of so many dollars more to the Indians. The hon. gentleman must know that we have not different agents appointed for the simple purpose of spending money, and that our agents in the North-west are not appointed for the purpose of paying annuities, but for watching over the affairs of the Indians, who, like children, require all possible supervision, and if they are left to their own desires they soon return into the uncivilized condition in which they were before the department undertook to bring them into the condition which I am glad to say they occupy now, as near a state of civilization as possible. I think I have explained to the House, as succinctly as possible, the reason that Mr. Vankoughnet was superannuated, and the economy effected by that superannuation.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I am not going to discuss Mr. Vankoughnet's case at the present time, because I propose to submit a motion to the House respecting Mr. Vankoughnet's superannuation at a fitting opportunity; so I defer that discussion. The hon. gentleman has undertaken to show how $12,000 have been saved by superannuation; but he will have some difficulty in substantiating that statement. On the contrary, the saving could have been effected wholly independent of Mr. Vankoughnet's superannuation. The question that the House has to consider is this: whether one occupying the position of Mr. Vankoughnet, at Mr. Vankoughnet's time of life, and with Mr. Vankoughnet's experience, and against whom no charges were made, was fairly treated in being dealt with as he has been dealt with by the department. Then the Minister of Railways and Canals says, that he will undertake to show, so far as his department is concerned—although his department and the Public Works Department to-day are paying $101,000 to the inside service for clerks, exclusive of the pay for extra clerks—that nevertheless his own particular branch is paying less for its management than was paid in 1878 when the two departments combined were charged with $48,000. I am not going to combat the figures which the hon. Minister has not on the present occasion given. He says his contingencies were $17,000, but he will see that the appropriation for contingencies for the whole Department of Public Works in 1878 was $11,000, so that if the whole of that contingency sum was expended in the payment of extra clerks for extra work there would still be $6,000 less than his department requires to-day. The hon. Minister says that Mr. Mackenzie charged to particular public works the service that was being performed in the department by officers belonging to the department, and which he now pays out of the salaries that are specially appropriated. When the hon. gentleman submits his figures we shall have an opportunity of making a comparison. It must be remembered that Mr. Mackenzie was engaged in the completion of the Intercolonial Railway, that he was engaged in making exploratory surveys in connection with the Canadian Pacific Railway, that he was engaged in the construction of certain portions of that railway under the supervision of the department, and the officers that were employed in connection with these works would be officers who, if it were a private corporation engaged in the construction, would have to pay them out of the moneys appropriated for the public work and undertaking, and there is nothing of that sort so far as I know that the hon. Minister is engaged in at the present time. However, I shall not anticipate the figures of the hon. Minister. I will follow his example and I will say, that so far as he is concerned, sufficient for the day is the evil thereof. If the hon. gentleman can show that he has incurred no larger expenditure than was incurred before, he will show that there has been no increase in the cost of his department, but I must say that as a matter of experience my confidence is of slow growth, and until he establishes that fact, I will be inclined to question—not the accuracy of his intention—but the accuracy of his statement, because I think he will find that he is undertaking to charge to the period of 1878 expenditures against the department that are not charged against the department at the present moment.

Mr. HAGGART. The hon. gentleman is mistaken, because it was not the contingencies of my department that I mentioned at all, but the vote for paying the clerks who are not in the civil service. I will remind the hon. gentleman that the Intercolonial Railway was running in 1878, and I will remind him, too, that one of the items charged to my account last year in the civil service estimates was $6,000 for the salaries of the chief engineer of the Intercolonial Railway. In Mr. Mackenzie's time that was not charged to the inside service, but to the Intercolonial Railway.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) He had a general superintendent in the Maritime Provinces then, as you have now.

Mr. HAGGART. The salary of the engineer in 1878 was not charged to the civil service.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Not Mr. Pottinger's salary.

Mr. HAGGART. I am saying that Mr. Schreiber's salary as chief engineer of the Intercolonial Railway, or a portion of his salary, is charged in last year's account to the civil service. There was the same expenditure upon the canals, and the amount that is charged at headquarters here is charged out of that $17,000 that I received for paying my clerks. In Mr. Mackenzie's time it was charged to a particular vote. I will not anticipate, but I am certain—I am more than certain—that the expenditure during Mr. Mackenzie's time—

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Do not anticipate.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell).

Mr. HAGGART. I am certain that in 1878 the amount of money expended in the Railway and Canals Department at headquarters was away in excess of what it is in the present year.

Mr. McMULLEN. Can the Minister inform me as to whether Mr. Reed, when in the North-west, contributed to the Superannuation Fund or not?

Mr. DALY. I think so. He was a permanent officer at the same salary that he has now; in fact a larger salary, because he had $600 in addition.

Mr. McMULLEN. Did he contribute to the Superannuation Fund?

Mr. DALY. I think he must have done so, he has been a member of the civil service since 1880 or 1881.

Mr. DEVLIN. Did I understand the Minister of the Interior to say to-night that through the means of these immigration agents thousands were coming back annually into Canada?

Mr. DALY. I said thousands came back last year, and thousands are coming back at this present moment. There is not a train that arrives at Calgary that does not bring many immigrants.

Mr. DEVLIN. In what province are they settled?

Mr. DALY. In the North-west Territories.

Mr. DEVLIN. Are they all Canadians coming back from the United States?

Mr. DALY. I said that there were a great many Canadians and old-country English, Irish, Scotch, Germans and Scandinavians, and very few Americans; the very best of settlers.

Mr. DEVLIN. Can the hon. gentleman say from what European country the largest proportion of immigrants is being received now?

Mr. DALY. As far as my memory goes, we are getting this present year, so far, more from England and Scotland than from any other country.

Mr. DEVLIN. Did I understand the hon. gentleman to say that this Government gives the North-west Government $220,000 annually for education?

Mr. DALY. No. The question of education was not under discussion. The sum I mentioned was expended for Indian schools.

Mr. DEVLIN. I understood the hon. gentleman to say that that sum was voted generally for education in the North-west Territories.

Mr. DALY. Oh, no. I was quoting figures in connection with the management of the Indians in the North-west Territories, and in Canada generally; and in answer to the hon. gentleman I said that that was the total amount for Indian schools. There was no reference to North-west schools. We have not had North-west schools under consideration at all to-night.

Department of Agriculture....$53,512.50

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Who are these whose names are mentioned?

Mr. FOSTER. These are the temporary employees who have been in the department for eight or ten years, and who are put on the permanent list to fill death vacancies.

Mr. DEVLIN. Who is the deputy of that department?

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Lowe.

Mr. MULLOCK. Is it not time that you superannuated him?

Mr. FOSTER. Oh, no; he is young yet.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I do not think trouble will arise from this side of the House when you make up your mind to do it.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. He has all his faculties.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Are you sure of that?

Department of Public Works.. $51,055

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I wish to ask the hon. Minister of Public Works with reference to the dismissal of Mr. Barclay Snow, who, I understand, was a civil engineer in his department—when he was dismissed, and why?

Mr. OUMET. The services of Mr. Snow were dispensed with last summer. He had been employed until then, and his official work being completed, no more was given him.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) What was his special work?

Mr. OUMET. It was making copies of plans of River St. John, and that work being completed there was nothing for him to do.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Was there any charge made against him as regards his efficiency?

Mr. OUMET. No.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The department was satisfied of that?

Mr. OUMET. The department were satisfied that the work he was doing was of no use.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) How many years had he been engaged in this useless work?

Mr. OUMET. I could not say, exactly.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Some ten or twelve years?

Mr. OUMET. I do not know that he had always been doing the same work; but at the time the chief engineer advised me that there was no use continuing the work, and it was terminated.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I have had submitted to me a certificate which this dismissed official received from Mr. Perley, who was, for many years, the chief engineer of the department, testifying to the efficiency with which he discharged his duties. I would like the hon. gentleman to give an idea of how long he was employed on that useless work.

Mr. OUMET. I do not say that the work he had been doing was useless, but at the time his services were dispensed with, it was deemed useless to proceed with the work he was engaged upon.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Has the staff of the department been reduced in consequence of his dismissal?

Mr. OUMET. Yes; his place was not filled.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) But a place was filled?

Mr. OUMET. By whom?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Was not a person named Desrosiers appointed?

Mr. OUMET. No; Desrosiers was employed as an assistant on the ship-channel work. He is a draughtsman. The work is not of the character which the other gentleman was doing. Charts had to be prepared for the ship-channel, for which a special survey was made, and he was attached to that staff, and has been employed as a draughtsman on that staff ever since. He has gone back to that work in the ship-channel.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I am instructed that he is doing the same work that Mr. Snow did. Mr. Snow is a draughtsman, and I have had submitted to me quite a lot of his work. As far as my inartistic eye could judge, it is very well done, and I understand from gentlemen in the profession that, as a draughtsman, he was a very efficient officer. He has certainly very high testimonials from Mr. Perley, formerly his chief engineer. And I understand the hon. gentleman has employed another man in his place, Mr. Desrosiers, who is doing the same work.

Mr. OUMET. It is not work that Mr. Snow could be sent to do. It is work that has to be done by a young man. It is very hard work, and I do not think Mr. Snow could be sent down there.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Why not?

Mr. OUMET. Because he is an old man, too old to do that kind of work.

Mr. DAVEIS (P.E.I.) Mr. Desrosiers. I am instructed, is an official who was dismissed from the Railway Department.

Mr. OUMET. I think he had been discharged by the Department of Railways and Canals.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) He was taken on by the hon. gentleman, and Mr. Snow was dismissed to make room for him.

Mr. OUMET. That is not the case. The services of Mr. Snow were not dispensed with in order to give work to another man.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) As a matter of fact, he was dismissed, and following on his dismissal, Mr. Desrosiers, an official who had been dismissed from the Railway Department, was taken on, and is now doing the work which Mr. Snow was doing. Why was Desrosiers dismissed?

Mr. OUMET. He was discharged, with a large number of others temporarily employed as engineers. Mr. Desrosiers was not dismissed for incapacity, but his services were dispensed with just the same as Mr. Snow's were.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) He seems to be a man, whose services, in the opinion of the head of the department could be easily dispensed with. He was evidently not one of the most efficient officers or he would have been retained.

Mr. OUMET. Mr. Perley is not now the adviser of the department, as the hon. gentleman must know better than anybody else, for he had more to do with that than anybody else.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) That has nothing to do with the question. The only introduction that I made of Mr. Perley's name was this: that he gave to Mr. Snow a certificate testifying to the efficiency with which he discharged his duties. The hon. gentleman's own adviser also gave a letter to Mr. Snow when he was dismissed, testifying to the fact he had discharged faithfully the duties of his office. If the hon. gentleman had not taken on another man immediately afterwards, no complaint would be raised here. But here is a man dismissed, without any charge against him, and his place is immediately filled up by an official who was dismissed from another department.

Mr. OUMET. I do not think the facts have any connection with each other. Snow's services were dispensed with when they were no longer needed, he being in the temporary employ of the department, and the other man was taken on later, as temporary employees are taken on for special services of that kind, and he is attached only temporarily to the department.

Mr. McMULLEN. I have heard around the streets in Ottawa, on more occasions than one, rumours with regard to changes taking place in the Department of Public Works since the hon. gentleman was put at its head. It is charged that men, such as Mr. Snow, who, I believe, is an Englishman, have been weeded out, and the political and national friends of my hon. friend put in. That is to say, friends of his own take the place of the men dismissed from the department, and we have in this case an evidence of the report being true.

Mr. OUMET.

Mr. OUMET. I can assure the hon. gentleman that nothing of the kind has happened in my department, and I may say, moreover, that this gentleman has no connection with me, politically or otherwise, and I may add that I do not think I know him by sight. He was recommended to me as a fit person to be attached to that survey, which survey is under the supervision of a permanent employee of the department, Mr. Cowie, who is the special engineer in charge of the work. He is not employed because he is a friend of mine, political, national, or religious.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Did the hon. gentleman give Mr. Snow the opportunity to refuse to engage in this service?

Mr. OUMET. I am not aware that that was done.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) How many years was Mr. Snow in the public service? Twelve years, I believe. Is it the practice of the department to give any consideration to these temporary officials when they are discharged?

Mr. OUMET. Not that I know of, and the law does not warrant anything of the kind. If any indemnity or gratuity is given to any of these officers by reason of age or otherwise, it must be made by a special vote of the House. I may say that three other engineer's services were dispensed with at the same time—Mr. Michaud, Mr. Raza and another, and for the same reason—not that they were not fit to perform their duties, but that the department did not require their services any further.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Were any of these taken back?

Mr. OUMET. No.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Had any of them been as long as twelve years in the service?

Mr. OUMET. I am told that Mr. Raza had been over twenty-five years in the service, and was incapacitated by age and infirmity.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I know that under a former Minister the services of Mr. Kingsford, who had been in the service for many years were dispensed with in the same way.

Mr. OUMET. I am not aware of that.

The Department of Geological Survey..... $51,925

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. There is considerable increase here.

Mr. FOSTER. Statutory increases only—there is the same number of employees.

Mr. FLINT. What work does the Geological Survey intend to take up this season? Has the Minister any memoranda on that subject?

Mr. DALY. I will give the hon. gentleman that information on the main vote. This is for the headquarters' staff only.

Mr. FORBES. Has the report been made yet upon the explorations in the North-west by Mr. Tyrrel?

Mr. DALY. That will not be printed until next year.

Department of Trade and Commerce. $7,450

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I observe, as I expected, that this department is gradually assuming the proportions to make it a considerable charge upon the public revenue. It began with $6,000; now we are up to $7,450, and this, no doubt, is one of those infant industries which the Minister will find it highly necessary to protect.

Mr. FOSTER. This involves no extra charge on the revenue; the man who goes to the Department of Trade and Commerce is from my department.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Who is he?

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Nutting. There is one less in my department.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That department was the one I organized myself, so I can understand that it is very economically managed and not likely to increase. But whether this officer came from the hon. gentleman's department or not, it is very clear that the Department of Trade and Commerce is following the custom of its predecessors—it is growing and growing pretty rapidly. What does this department do? I should like to have a little explanation on the subject.

Mr. FLINT. I would like to know if this department knows what its duties are yet? At the last meeting of the committee it was understood that the main of the work of the department would be to discover what its duties were. I think that this would be a good time for the Minister to explain what those duties have been found out to be.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Perhaps it is making clerical errors.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not think that is its chief occupation. I scarcely know what the hon. gentlemen want. It is a very modest estimate—there are only five clerks and one of these lent by my department. The duties of the Minister are very onerous and his indefatigable deputy is at work as usual with not a very large staff. They have the whole of the steamship subsidies under their charge, and this is no small matter. They have also the statistics of trade and commerce, a very elaborate volume, a copy of which has just been laid on the Table, containing most useful information of a very varied character. This and the general outlook upon the extension of trade and commerce—

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) "General outlook" is good.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. If the Minister has charge of the general outlook in regard to trade and commerce he has much to account for, as the general outlook now is far from satisfactory.

Mr. FOSTER. It is getting better.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Owing, I suppose, to the exertions of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I should like to know in what respect. I shall not object to this item passing after the very lucid explanations of the hon. gentleman; but the High Commissioner, whose vote comes next, is a choice morsel which our friends, no doubt, will like to roll under their tongues.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) On one occasion an inquisitive man asked what an archdeacon's duties were, and received the reply that they were to discharge archi-diaconal functions. The hon. gentleman has given us about as lucid an explanation of the duties of the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Mr. Chairman, I suggested, when this item was under consideration before, that if the Government were to make arrangements for the distribution amongst the members of a few copies for each of the report of the consuls in the English service to the Foreign Office, they would do a great deal towards extending the foreign commerce of this country.

Mr. FOSTER. I will mention that.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). These reports are most valuable. They contain an immense amount of information and, put into the hands of manufacturers, they would suggest to many of these gentlemen markets for the products of their industries which they would not be likely to learn of otherwise. If three copies of each one of them were put in the hands of each member, he could distribute them where they would be of great service.

Mr. McMULLEN. The hon. Minister said that the report of the Minister of Trade and Commerce had been circulated.

Mr. FOSTER. It was laid on the Table three or four days ago.

Mr. McMULLEN. We have not seen it yet. Upon this item I must take exception, in the first place, to the office ever having been created. I do not see why it was created unless it was for the purpose of giving a resting place for the balance of his life to the hon. gentleman who now occupies the position, drawing $7,000 a year for virtually doing nothing. He took a pleasant trip to Australia, he came back and made a speech to the Board of Trade in Toronto, the whole purport of which was that there was an opportunity of opening up a market for Canadian machinery in Australia. He did not appear to have any anxiety to do anything in the interest of the farmers when he was in Australia. The hon. gentleman has been an unswerving supporter of the Government for the last fifteen years, and it looks very much as if this office had been created expressly for the purpose of affording him a resting place for the balance of his life. He has not done anything that we have heard of, except to make this visit to Australia. We will see, however, when we get his report, but if his report bears no more evidence of work being performed than we have seen before us for the last year, we are getting a very poor return for the salary we pay him.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Has the report of the High Commissioner of this year been brought down?

Mr. FOSTER. There is a full report in the Report of the Trade and Commerce, which has been laid on the Table.

Committee rose, and reported resolutions.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON moved the adjournment of the House.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What business do you propose to take up to-morrow?

Mr. FOSTER. The Estimates.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I suppose there are a large number of gentlemen on both sides of the House who are anxious to go away to-morrow after six o'clock. Perhaps we had better have an understanding that they may do so.

Mr. FOSTER. The leader of the House is away, but I think I may say that that will depend a good deal upon the diligence with which we work to-morrow. I am willing to work very hard to-morrow afternoon for the sake of getting off after six o'clock.

Motion agreed to; and the House adjourned at 11.35 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, 23rd May, 1894.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

REPORT.

Report of the Department of Printing and Stationery for the year ending 30th June, 1893.—(Mr. Costigan.)

Mr. McMULLEN

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 121) to amend and consolidate the Acts respecting the North-west Mounted Police Force.—(Mr. Ives.)

Bill (No. 122) further to amend the Petroleum Inspection Act.—(Mr. Wood, Brockville.)

Bill (No. 125) further to amend the General Inspection Act.—(Mr. Wood, Brockville.)

FRAUDULENT SALE OR MARKING.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 123) in restraint of fraudulent sale or marking.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Will the hon. gentleman explain what that Bill is for, and how far it goes?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). This Bill simply adds a section and a schedule to the Act of 1891. It adds to the list of articles coming under the Inspection Act. The schedule to the Act embraces, in addition to the articles already enumerated, Paris green, honey and vinegar. It is not proposed to prohibit the sale of the article of so-called honey, which, it is said, is made of glucose, a cheap kind of food fed to bees in the United States and imported as honey; but it is proposed to prohibit its sale as honey. With regard to Paris green, it is felt, after some communication with the parties interested, that it is an injustice to those who have to purchase—especially poor people—Paris green, to find that they have bought an adulterated article which is useless for the purpose intended. It is proposed to place that also in the list of articles, as to what specimens or samples may be had to send to our analysts for the purpose of being analysed. Vinegar also is included.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

THE CULLERS' ACT.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 124) further to amend the Cullers' Act. He said: This is a very simple amendment to the Act of 1889. It was found that in the Act of 1889 the word "counted" was included. It should not have been included, because the word itself has no reference to the culling of square timber. It left a doubt in the Act which was seen by the exporters and taken advantage of. It is proposed to remedy that defect.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

CRIMINAL CODE.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 126) to amend the Criminal Code of 1892. He said: Some of the amendments are not important as regards their effect, but arise in consequence, sometimes of typographical errors and sometimes of that very objectionable class called clerical errors; and in addition there is a provision with regard to the province of Quebec, authorizing a change of venue in cases coming before the court, in terms which are postponed, and one or two provisions of that character not necessary to explain at any length.

Mr. EDGAR. Would not this be a fit Bill in which to introduce whatever changes the hon. gentleman may think necessary in connection with the criminal procedure, as to grand juries, because there is a Bill on the Order paper relating to that subject which may not be reached?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I should be very glad if any amendment of that kind be considered in the progress of the Bill.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

REVENUE AND AUDIT ACT.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 127) to amend the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act. He said: The fact is that the revenue was collected hitherto, until a very recent period, by officers of the Inland Revenue and Customs, and enactments were made for the protection of officers who were engaged in the collection of that revenue. By legislation portions of the revenue have since been assigned, for their collection, to other departments and the officers of these are without the protection which they would have if they were acting as officers of the Customs and Inland Revenue Department. It is proposed to give them the ordinary protection which officers engaged in the collection of revenue and the administration of the law generally are given.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

DREDGE 'PRINCE EDWARD.'

Mr. PERRY asked, Has the Dominion dredge 'Prince Edward' left Murray Harbour, Prince Edward Island? Has she commenced dredging? If so, where is she working?

Mr. OUMET. The Dominion dredge 'Prince Edward' has not left Murray Harbour yet, but is under orders to proceed to Grand River, in King's County.

REVISING BARRISTER, PRINCE COUNTY, P. E. I.

Mr. PERRY asked, Has a revising barrister been appointed for Prince County, P.E.I., instead of Judge Kelly, deceased? If so, who is he, and what is the date of his appointment?

Mr. COSTIGAN. No one has been appointed. It is the intention of the Government to appoint a revising barrister immediately.

SHEIK'S ISLAND DAM.

Mr. LISTER asked, Has a contract been made by the Government with Messrs. M. P.

& W. H. Davis or any other person for the construction of a dam or dams at Sheik's Island in the St. Lawrence River for the purpose of making the Sny Channel navigable? Were tenders by advertisement invited, for the construction of the work? If so, who tendered? Did M. P. & W. H. Davis tender for the work? If so, were they the lowest tenderers? What is the estimated cost of the said works, and was authority obtained from Parliament for their construction before a contract was awarded? How much work has been performed, and how much money paid out by the Government on account of the dam or dams? Did not the Chief Engineer of Canals, Mr. John Page, report against the proposed blocking of the Sny Channel, and if so, what engineer or engineers recommended the construction of dams at Sheik's Island? Has any information or communication been received, directly or indirectly, by the Government from the Government or War Department of the United States with respect to the probable disturbance of the level of the St. Lawrence River by the blocking of the Sny Channel?

Mr. HAGGART. A contract has been made with Messrs. William Davis & Son for the construction of the dams at Sheik's Island in the St. Lawrence River for the purpose of making Sny Channel navigable. Tenders were not invited by advertisement. By invitation Messrs. William Davis & Son offered to do the work at his prices under contract 4, Cornwall Canal. The estimated cost of the work is:

|--------------------|-----------|
| Land | $ 30,000 |
| Construction | 384,000 |

|-------------|-----------|
| Total | $414,000 |
|-------------|-----------|

Authority was obtained for the enlargement of the canals before this contract was awarded, and this work forms an important part of the enlargement of the Cornwall Canal. The work performed consists of:

|-------------------------|----------------|
| Excavation earth..... | 10,540 c. yds. |
| " rock..... | 561 " |
| Stone filling..... | 4,376 " |
| Materials delivered.... | 3,390 " |

The amount of money paid out, $11,440. Mr. Page did report against the proposed damming of the Sny Channel. Walter Shanty, Samuel Keefer, Collingwood Schreiber, and Tom Rubidge reported in favour of the construction of the dams. No correspondence or communication has been received, directly or indirectly, by the Government from the Government or War Department of the United States with respect to the probable or improbable disturbance of the level of the St. Lawrence River by damming the Sny Channel.

BOARD OF CUSTOMS.

Mr. RIDER asked, 1. Is there a duly constituted Board of Customs, and how often does the said Board meet? 2. Who constitute the Board of Customs; what are their individual duties, and what are the salaries of each of those engaged in that particular service? 3. Has the Board of Customs ever rendered any decisions, and has any of its decisions ever being appealed from?

Mr. WALLACE. There is a duly constituted Board of Customs. 2. At the present time it is meeting daily. 3. The members of the Board of Customs, their individual duties, and their respective salaries are as follows. I may say that these are the salaries which these gentlemen receive, not as members of the Board of Customs, but for their other duties as Custom-house officers of the department. For being members of the Board of Customs they received no additional salary, and no payments are made to them on that account, except for their travelling expenses and necessary disbursements:—Thomas J. Watters, Chairman of the Board, also acting Commissioner of Customs, salary, $2,900; George W. Jessop, Assistant Dominion Appraiser and clerk to the Board, salary, $1,200; Thomas Macfarlane, Chief Analyst, salary, $800; James J. Bremner, Customs Inspector of sugars and groceries at Halifax N.S., salary, $2,000; Allan McBeath, Appraiser of dry goods at St. John, N.B., salary, $1,200; J. D. L. Ambrose, Appraiser of drugs, &c., at Montreal, salary, $1,800; Thomas F. Blackwood, Hardware Appraiser at Toronto, salary, $1,700; A. R. Milne, Collector of Customs at Victoria, B.C., salary, $2,000; George H. Young, Inspector of Customs at Winnipeg, salary, $2,000. All the members of the Board are at present meeting, except the last two, Mr. Milne, of Victoria, and Mr. Young, of Winnipeg. 4. Yes, the Board has rendered decisions, and in some cases there have been appeals made therefrom.

GOVERNMENT RAILWAYS.

Mr. McMULLEN asked, What was the number of miles of Government railways operated by the Department of Railways during the fiscal year ending the 30th June, 1893; the number of stations, the number of station porters, the number of station masters and assistants, the number of telegraph operators and assistants, the gross number of employees engaged in the operating of the lines, including all labourers, mechanics and all classes of employees, including the railway staff at Ottawa?

Mr. HAGGART. The number of miles of Government railways in operation in the year 1892-93, was the same as in the previous year, 1,375 miles. The number of stations was 256, also the same as for the previous year. The number of employees was somewhere in the neighbourhood of 3,600, being considerably less than a few years ago. The service continues to be well performed, and the road and rolling stock are being well maintained. It is my full expectation to be able to report the earnings as fully covering the expenses for the fiscal year, which will close on the 30th of June next.

NORTH-WEST MOUNTED POLICE.

Mr. IVES moved:

That the House will, on Monday next, resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to consider the following resolution:—

That it is expedient to provide, with respect to the North-west Mounted Police Force, that the maximum pay of veterinary surgeons shall be $1,000 instead of $700 per annum, that the maximum pay of four staff-sergeants shall be $2 instead of $1.50 per diem, and that twelve buglers may be appointed at a rate of pay not exceeding 40 cents per diem; and also to provide that all pay due to deserters at the time of their desertion from the force shall form part of the fund applicable to the payment of rewards for good conduct or meritorious services, to the establishment of libraries and recreation rooms and such other objects, for the benefit of the members of the force, as the Minister approves.

Motion agreed to.

SUPPLY—THE CATTLE TRADE.

Mr. FOSTER moved that the House again resolve itself into Committee of Supply.

Mr. MULOCK. Mr. Speaker, before the motion was put I was going to ask the Controller of Customs to give information as to which of the returns is correct in regard to the cattle trade. The Controller of Customs will remember that some time ago I called the attention of the House to a discrepancy in these figures. It is now a month ago that the Controller of Customs promised to explain away this discrepancy, which is one of very considerable magnitude. For example, the report presented by the Department of Agriculture declares that the number of head of cattle exported to Great Britain in 1890 was 122,182, while the Trade and Navigation Returns state the number exported at 104,133, a discrepancy between the two of 18,049. For the year 1891 the report of the Department of Agriculture show exports of 108,947 head of cattle sent to Great Britain, while the Trade and Navigation Returns for that year give the number as 99,967, a discrepancy for that year of 8,980. Again, in the year 1892, the Department of Agriculture gives the exports of cattle to Great Britain at 98,755, the Trade and Navigation Returns for the same year giving 93,206, a difference of 5,549 head. For 1893 the Department of Agriculture declares that the number exported was 83,322, while the Trade and Navigation Returns place the number at 89,572, a discrepancy of 6,250. For these four years the differences between these two accounts aggregate 38,814, an inaccuracy somewhere of 10 per cent. If this is an indication of the way in which the Trade and Navigation Returns, as a whole, are made up, it is quite clear that they are practically valueless.

Mr. FOSTER. Which of the reports is wrong ?

Mr. MULLOCK. I do not know which is wrong. Surely these figures are reconcilable. The facts must be the same.

Mr. FOSTER. Is the hon. gentleman sure that one is not for the calendar, and the other for the fiscal year ?

Mr. MULLOCK. Perfectly sure, if one may depend upon the statements in the reports themselves. I have not the report of the Department of Agriculture here, but that report was presented at the beginning of the session, and it was stated that the figures given were for the calendar year.

Mr. DALY. I beg your pardon—it says for the fiscal year. I will send the report across to the hon. gentleman.

Mr. MULLOCK. This is not the page to which I refer. If you will look at page x you will see, under the heading "Exportation of live stock" the following :—

The exportation of live stock for 1893 to the United Kingdom from Canadian seaports inspected before sailing by the veterinary officers of my department was : cattle, 80,899 ; sheep, 1,781. Of the above cattle, 80,495 were shipped from Montreal, &c.

Then comes what I particularly refer to :

The following table gives comparisons for the last ten calendar years.

On the 12th of April I put this question to the Ministry :

What was the total number and value of live cattle exported to the United Kingdom in the calendar years 1890, 1891, 1892 and 1893 ?

Mr. FOSTER. To what Minister was that question put ?

Mr. MULLOCK. I asked the question in the House on the 12th of April last, and it was answered by the Controller of Customs. My question was : What was the total number exported during each of these calendar years, and I received from the Controller of Customs the figures I have quoted. So that these figures presented by the Minister of Agriculture in his report, and by the Controller of Customs in answer to the question put on the floor of this House, are for the same period of time, for the calendar years 1890, 1891, 1892 and 1893. This is the information required ; I want it for purposes of computation. I am in an embarrassed position, not knowing what set of figures to take. It is not creditable to the department. I do not wish to be unreasonable, but I must say that it is not calculated to create confidence in the accuracy of the statistics emanating from the department, when discrepancies of this magnitude exist, and which now, after months of delay, have not been explained away. As I want to deal with this question later on, I now press this upon the attention of the House.

Mr. DALY. What is the page of 'Hansard' ?

Mr. MULLOCK. Page 1266, April 12th. I think the Controller of Customs will agree with me that the figures do not tally, in fact I believe he is trying to explain away the discrepancy. But I want him to hurry up or else the session will be over before the explanation comes. Before I take my seat I wish to ask when we may expect the return that was granted on 7th May, asking for all papers connected with the fast Atlantic service ? That return has not yet been brought down. I would like to ask the Minister of Justice if the return presented in respect to the Kingston penitentiary contains all the reports and correspondence in connection with that matter ?

Mr. WALLACE. In reply to the hon. member for North York, I wish to say that we are not endeavouring to explain away anything, we are endeavouring to ascertain what are the exact facts of the case. I told the hon. member that I would communicate with the Department of Agriculture and have a joint investigation made at the port of Montreal, where almost the entire export of cattle takes place, and that I would inform the House as to the result of that investigation. Officers were appointed to make this investigation by the Department of Agriculture and the Department of Customs jointly. That report has not yet been received, but I expect it daily, and when it is received, I will submit it to the House.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. In reply to the question asked me, I understand that the returns presented with regard to the Kingston penitentiary include all the papers on the subject of the investigations there, but if the hon. gentleman finds anything missing, or will direct my attention to anything which may have been overlooked, I would be glad to supply it.

Motion agreed to, and House again resolved itself into committee.

(In the Committee.)

|--|----------|

Mr. McMULLEN. Before voting this resolution, I think we should have some statement of the services that have been performed by Sir Charles Tupper during the last year. If the High Commissioner is really intended to give a return in the way of services to this country for the enormous amounts that are paid to him from year to year, we ought to know what he is doing there. In the matter of immigration, we do not find that he is rendering any very desirable service; we do not find that in the matter of negotiating treaties he is rendering any very desirable service. We know that in connection with the French treaty, the hon. gentleman danced across the sea from England to France several times, and eventually, after a long and protracted effort, he accomplished the negotiation and completion, so far as he was concerned, of a treaty, and sent it over here for ratification. The Government have thought so little of that treaty that from that time to the present, they have taken no notice of it; although, I believe, the First Minister did once intimate to the House that they intended, at some future day, to ratify that little treaty. That is the only thing I know of that the hon. gentleman has done in the way of service to this country. Now, I can remember well that when the proposition was made to send Sir Charles Tupper home to England, and to buy an official residence for him in London, at a cost of some $50,000, we were told that he was going to render very desirable service to this country as financial agent. It was said then that the contract with our financial agents was not terminable by the Government at notice, and that it was only after the arrangement that then existed had expired, that we could utilize the services of the High Commissioner in London. We were told that in this respect he was going to render considerable service to the country, and that he would far more than recoup the country for his salary by the services he would render in the position of financial agent, the amount he would save the country by way of commissions. Now, we have been completely disappointed in reaping any advantages from his appointment in that capacity. The Finance Minister admitted to the House two years ago, after visiting Europe, and after trying to make arrangements, that he was forced to make an arrangement with the agency there of the Bank of Montreal, and that he was not able to utilize Sir Charles Tupper in the slightest degree as financial agent in London. Afterwards we were told that it was desirable to have him there in connection with the cattle trade. Well, we know he has been an absolute and utter failure in that respect. Whatever efforts he has put forth to secure to Canada a continuation of the privileges we enjoyed of having free access to the English market for our cattle, and the privilege of sending them freely from place to place in that country where they might bring the best prices, we know that, even with Sir Charles Tupper on the ground, and notwithstanding the great necessity that existed for carefully guarding that particular privilege, our cattle were scheduled, and remain so to this day. We occupy no better position in that respect than the United States. Cattle from the United States are just as free to the ports of Great Britain to-day as Canadian cattle, notwithstanding the fact that we have Sir Charles Tupper there, and notwithstanding all the promises that were made to us that he would secure and preserve to us those advantages. I have carefully read over a report that has been recently submitted to this House by the Minister of Agriculture, outlining the incidents that led up to the scheduling of our cattle. Any person that will read over the different Orders in Council, and will remember the action taken by the Government, and the indifference displayed by the High Commissioner must agree that we are ourselves responsible for the condition of things that now exists. On turning to the report I find one or two cases in which the animals were supposed to have been diseased, and samples of their lungs were taken and sent to Canada, but they arrived here in such a decomposed condition as to be totally unfit for investigation. There was no possibility of making such an analysis as to enable any veterinary to decide whether the animals were affected with pleuro-pneumonia or not. These were Canadian animals supposed to be diseased, and such carelessness had been displayed in putting up the samples that the spirits had evaporated. With Sir Charles Tupper in London, there should have been a more determined and zealous effort made to continue the privilege we enjoy in regard to the cattle trade than has been put forward up to the present time. I have carefully gone over the expenses connected with the office of High Commissioner, and also those connected with his relations. I do not want to say but that a High Commissioner may be a necessity, but the present High Commissioner, with all the expenses connected with him, makes the office cost too much. I can give to any hon. member the page in the Auditor General's Report which will prove the statements I am about to make. In 1889, Canada paid the High Commissioner and members of his family $33,780.26; in 1890, $31,434.17; in 1891, $42,044.83; in 1892, $28,872.42; in 1893, $20,338.50, or in five years the country paid the High Commissioner, the Commandant at Kingston, the Minister here and the relatives of the family, so far as I can trace them, $165,270.80. The High Commissioner is, no doubt, in a position to dictate to the Government and the people of the country the amounts to be paid. It would not be so bad if, while we are paying these magnificent sums, if the country were getting full value for the outlay, but it is not getting value. The Auditor General's Report of the present year shows an expenditure under this head of over $32,000, including claims fairly chargeable to the Tupper family. I admit it was quite a difficult thing to find these items, for they are scattered up and down the report under different heads, such as emigration, Behring Sea, and in every corner of the volume, and this is done apparently for the purpose of confusing the public so that the public eye may not possibly catch and gather together the enormous amount the family costs the country. We are keeping Sir Charles Tupper in London at an enormous expense, and we are paying those who are related to him, and we should obtain better service in the future than we have in the past. It is a mere farce keeping the High Commissioner virtually doing nothing. Nothing has been done by him with respect to the cattle trade—the whole matter has been bungled. As a financial agent, nothing has been done by him. The people of Canada cannot afford to keep in London a Canadian political Beshazzar, drawing from $16,000 to $18,000 a year. I am not including expenses of the London office, and have only taken the sums drawn by him, paid for travelling expenses, for taxes on official residence and other items directly chargeable to himself and his relatives. We must commence and cut down the expenses of the London office, and if we obtain no better services from the High Commissioner than have been rendered by him during the last few years, Parliament had better abolish the office, sell the residence, bring the money to Canada and let us try and pay our debts with it, instead of keeping the High Commissioner there when he is virtually no use, and the country is receiving no benefit.

Mr. MULOCK. The hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) has given the committee some very large figures, and if they are correct, and the hon. gentleman's quotations of figures are generally correct, they suggest a field for inquiry, and perhaps for economy. It appears that the High Commissioner has cost this country $165,270 in five years.

Mr. McMULLEN. I refer to the High Commissioner and his family.

Mr. MULOCK. So in fifteen years the High Commissioner and his relations will have cost this country about $500,000. Under these circumstances there is no wonder that those interested consider the country prosperous. I should like to ask the member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen), if he could tell us, with his skilfulness in handling figures, how much this sum averages every day of the year?

Mr. FOSTER. Or every hour of the day.

Mr. McMULLEN. I can give it to the hon. gentleman. I carefully calculated the average during five years, and excluding Sunday, the amount is $105.60 per day.

Civil Service Board of Examiners..... $4,000

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Considering the Government do not appear to provide offices for those who pass the civil service examination, this item appears to be a very questionable expenditure.

Mr. FOSTER. You said last night that we were doing so.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am afraid a considerable number of those individuals did not pass the civil service examination, nor could pass it, and probably the only really practical use for this board would be to turn the members loose in the departments and pass the 826 clerks through a course of examination. My impression is that this would weed out a considerable number of gentlemen now engaged, either in serving the country or drawing their salary, after the pattern of the High Commissioner. I do not myself think that there is any great use keeping up this system so long as it leads to nothing. There are an enormous number of persons who are said to have qualified but who will never be appointed, and it seems to me that the Government by maintaining this, without giving, as they do in other countries, a number of commissions to those who distinguish themselves in these examinations, is simply throwing away the money. I fail to see what good service is rendered by this Civil Service Commission, and as the hon. gentleman has more experience now than he had at one time about it, I would like to know what useful purpose he supposes it does serve.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman knows as well as I do the law of Parliament under which we have been acting for a number of years governing the conditions for the appointment of officials in the service of the country. Parliament came to the conclusion that the entrance door to the civil service should be through examination, and the Civil Service Commissioners are the persons appointed to carry out these conditions of Parliament. It is true that we do not furnish offices for every person who passes the examination, but Parliament never contracted to do that, and I dare say there are some thousands upon the list who have passed who have not received appointments inasmuch as it is only necessary to appoint those who from time to time are required to fill vacancies or to take up the extended service of the country. These commissioners are the machinery to carry out the law, and so long as it is necessary to carry out the law of Parliament we must have that machinery. These gentlemen also conduct the examinations in the public departments to certify to the capability of clerks for promotion. It is scarcely fair to say that because there are a large number who have passed and who have not been appointed, that persons who may wish to enter the service at the present time should be debarred from the privilege of passing their examination. A large number who have passed and who have not received appointments are not now eligible because numbers of them have drifted off into every other conceivable profession in life. I may say that the fees go a long way to pay the expenses of this board.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) How many thousands are there on the list who have passed the examinations?

Mr. FOSTER. I cannot tell exactly, but I should think there are a couple of thousand or more.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I should think there are three times a couple of thousands. Can the Minister assure the House that all the parties who have been appointed to commissions under Government within the last year have passed the civil service examination?

Mr. FOSTER. In all cases the law has been strictly complied with.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. And none have been appointed to the civil service except those who have passed this examination?

Mr. FOSTER. Either those who have passed or whom Parliament has declared to be eligible otherwise.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. In what way has Parliament declared that? There are examinations in the first place, and there are also appointments that are made by Parliament in passing the Estimates, and which are explained to the House.

Mr. FOSTER. There are cases in which the law expressly provides for the appointment of technical officers, without examination, and graduates of universities are exempted by law. The hon. gentleman will find that the law has been strictly observed.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. gentleman says that Parliament has sanctioned all these appointments made in the Estimates. I do not understand that Parliament has done anything of the kind. We have no means of knowing whether men who may be appointed have or have not complied with the regulations of the law.

Mr. FOSTER. If they do not come under the law they must be expressly named or the salaries will not be paid to them.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Is the hon. gentleman prepared to say that that has been done? What particular gentlemen have been appointed during the past year that have not passed the civil service examination?

Mr. FOSTER. None, except those who are named in the Estimates of last year, and who are consequently eligible, or those who come under the conditions of the civil service law.

Mr. FOSTER.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Are we to understand that all these gentlemen whose names I see in the Estimates would not be eligible under the civil service examinations? In the Customs Department there are two or three names.

Mr. FOSTER. We dropped them out, but had we not done so, it would have been a case in point. There are not many names in the Estimates; there are two in the Agriculture Department, James Skead and J. R. Dewhurst, and they have to be named in order to get their salaries. I explained before that they were on the temporary list for a number of years, and being good officers they were put on the permanent list. Unless they were named the Auditor General would not pay their salaries without seeing that they had a civil service certificate, and then he would only pay them the minimum salary.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Is it part of the Auditor General's function to make certain that every person appointed has a civil service certificate?

Mr. FOSTER. Certainly, and it is the function of the Treasury Board.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Of course it would be a function of the Treasury Board, but I was not aware about the Auditor General. I am glad to hear it, because I think there is a much better chance of right being done.

Mr. FOSTER. It would be sure if it passed the Treasury Board, but that makes the assurance greater.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Yes, I should think so, very considerably greater, judging from the operations of the Treasury Board in other cases. We all understand that in the case of technical officers and men appointed for special qualifications we could not expect this to apply. How many passed the civil service examination last year and how many were appointed?

Mr. SPROULE. I would like to say a word or two in connection with this item. The Civil Service Act was devised for the purpose of ensuring the qualification of those engaged to do work in the service; and, partly under the provisions of the Act and partly under regulations, it was provided that when promotions took place in the various departments, they should be made according to the seniority of those who have passed the examination and who have been recommended by their senior officer. I have been informed that that is not always done. It is very unfair to those in the service if they are not put upon an equal footing in regard to promotion when they are equally eligible and competent. I know that from time to time, when we write to the various departments in the interest of young men, we are met by the objection that there are many seniors whose claims must be met before those in whose behalf we wrote can be considered. But we find afterwards that juniors are promoted over their heads, while if the rules were strictly carried out that would not be done. That is unfair to the young men in the service, and should not be done. If such a regulation is in existence it should be strictly carried out.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I understand that these gentlemen for whom this money is voted reside in Ottawa. How are the examinations conducted in the other cities of the Dominion?

Mr. FOSTER. In the first place, a list of the places where examinations are to be held is advertised and well known. In each of those places an examiner is appointed, and to him the papers prepared here are sent. He receives the sealed papers, and on the day of the examination he gives out the papers, supervises the examination, and after the examination collects the papers and returns them to Ottawa, where they are examined by the board. That is found to be much more economical than to have members of the board travelling to different places.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) That is as I understand. I believe that these scrutineers appointed at outside places are paid four or five dollars per day each?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, $4 or $5.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I heard that it was stated in the House that at the last examination at Montreal some of these scrutineers had accepted bribes from some of the parties being examined. I would like to know if that is so, and who they were?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I do not think that was stated.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I do not make the statement that it was. The information was given to me that it was stated across the floor of the House; I was not present.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I think the statement was that certain candidates were personated.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I beg to ask upon whose recommendation these scrutineers at Montreal were appointed, and who they were?

Mr. MULOCK. While that information is being sought, I desire to ask a question or two with regard to the personation that took place at Montreal, and what steps the Government propose to take in order to prevent a repetition of it. I remember observing the results of the investigation, and I thought that the guilty parties were let off very lightly. I think we had a clause inserted in the Criminal Code a couple of years ago expressly with reference to such cases. Personation amounts to forgery; it means, of course, that one man signs another man's name to the answers. As the candidates are gathered together from all parts, there ought to be some means of permanently identifying them. For instance, we might require a very substantial exhibition of each candidate's handwriting, which might be filed, and with which, if need be, the answers might be compared. But, beyond that, should the candidate afterwards apply for a position in the service, his handwriting should be compared with the handwriting given before his examination. All these safeguards ought to be adopted to prevent any one profiting by fraudulently obtaining a certificate of having passed the examination. Will the Government say what steps they took to have the guilty persons tried, and, further, whether some of these persons were not in the service of the Government, and whether they are not still in the service of the Government?

Mr. COSTIGAN. During the examinations at Montreal proceedings were taken against the persons charged with personating, and fines were imposed upon them by the authorities, except, I think, in two cases, in which the parties had left the country. If men in the service are affected, I presume they are not longer in the service. The board sends to the Secretary of State information as to the facts they have found. Then the other departments are notified of the facts by the Secretary of State's Department so that they may govern themselves accordingly. The information is sent to the departments, with the view of no applications being entertained from these men for positions, or, if they are employed, that they may be removed from the service.

Mr. MULOCK. I would ask the hon. Secretary of State to give us the information at a later date. I understand that some of those who personated candidates were at that time in the actual employment of the Government. If that is the case, I would ask if they have been dismissed, or if any of them are still in the service of the Government?

Mr. COSTIGAN. I could not answer that.

Mr. MULOCK. It occurred to me, when I saw it stated in the press that that discovery ought to terminate their employment, but I saw it stated in a paper that they were not dismissed or fined.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The persons who were prosecuted were not in the employment of the Government. They were students outside who accepted a fee for personating.

Mr. MULOCK. In connection with the item itself, I see that Mr. Keyes, as clerk, is down for $800 or $900. A few years ago his salary was much less—$200 or $300. I would like to know why that is increased? The board consists of three examiners, one of whom, Mr. LeSueur, is the secretary, and receives a salary as such. Why, then, should a clerk be required in addition? The board has duties to perform only for a short period of the year, the examinations are held but once a year, and it seems to me you are manning this board rather extensively. The secretary, I believe, is a superannuated officer, and this is a little douceur—

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. LeSueur, not douceur.

Mr. MULOCK. I do not see why you want a clerk at $800 or $900 a year, when during nine months there is probably nothing whatever for him to do.

Mr. FOSTER. He is in the civil service and his salary is increased by the statutory allowance. He has not had any increase of salary of late.

Mr. MULOCK. In the Auditor General's Report for 1884-85, Keyes, as clerk of the board, is put down for $249, and this year is $900.

Mr. FOSTER. You go back to 1884?

Mr. MULOCK. Certainly, to show how these increases pile up.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I made a statement a moment ago, rather serious in its nature, concerning a fact which was brought to my notice, but of which I have no personal knowledge—not having been in the House at the time. I said that I understood that one of the Ministers had acknowledged that one, if not more, of the scrutineers appointed in Montreal had accepted bribes.

Mr. FOSTER. I never heard that.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Of course, I did not pledge myself to it, but at page 2202 of 'Hansard' I find the following question and answer:—

Mr. SOMERVILLE asked, What are the names of the candidates who went up for examination at the recent civil service examinations at Montreal, who have been disqualified for irregularities; giving the nature of irregularity in each case? What are the names of the scrutineers at said examinations, and is the Government aware that the scrutineers accepted bribes for overlooking irregularities?

Mr. COSTIGAN. 1. Edwin A. Morse, G. U. Rondeau, J. A. Forbes, Alphonse Bourassa, Rudolph T. Germain. The offence proved against each of these men is that of being impersonated by persons whom they employed for that purpose. 2. J. A. Desilets and Joseph A. Beaulieu. Desilets acknowledged that he received money from Rondeau to keep silence. Beaulieu did not appear when called upon for evidence.

Mr. FOSTER. Were those scrutineers?

Mr. MULOCK.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Yes, they were the two scrutineers, and one is stated by the Secretary of State to have acknowledged that he received money from one of the candidates to keep silent. I want to know on whose recommendation these two scrutineers were appointed, whether it is true that they received bribes, and what action the Government have taken in the matter?

Mr. COSTIGAN. The scrutineers are appointed by the board of examiners on their own judgment. The board have to hold examinations throughout the Dominion, and it is quite impossible that they should be able to attend all the examinations. Therefore, after dividing themselves up as far as their numbers allow, they arrange for people to appear for them where they cannot be present, and appoint scrutineers to assist in the examinations. I instructed the board to prosecute these men implicated in the fraud, and I presume that proceedings are going on against them.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman does not know if proceedings have been taken?

Mr. COSTIGAN. I take it for granted they have, because I know that the chairman of the Civil Service Board was most anxious that proceedings should be taken to put a stop to these irregularities, and he had instructions from my department to go on and take proceedings.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I assume, after what the hon. gentleman has said, that proceedings have been taken, because it is disgraceful in the extreme that a gentleman appointed to act as scrutineer should have accepted a bribe. Does either of these men hold any Government appointment?

Mr. COSTIGAN. Not that I am aware of.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I must ask the hon. gentleman to obtain information whether any, and what steps have been taken?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). And I would ask the hon. gentleman to write to the chairman and ascertain how these parties came to be appointed, and upon whose recommendation they were appointed.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. We ought also to understand distinctly what the Government propose to do, because it appears to me that is just about as grave an offence of a minor kind has been committed by the sub-examiners as can well be imagined. It was unquestionably the duty of the Government to have taken action at once. These civil service examinations will be very much worse than a farce if such things, as are said, are permitted to exist, without the Government, in its official capacity, punishing the parties.

Mr. MULOCK. Mr. Chairman, I asked the Government what steps were taken to punish the personators and others implicated in these frauds at Montreal. The Secretary of State and others say that the local authorities took proceedings. It appears to me that it was the duty of the Government to set the law in motion, and to see that the law was effectually vindicated by the punishment of the guilty parties. I have never yet been able to discover whether the Government took any active steps in this matter, or whether the local authorities, of their own motion, took the proceedings in question. There is no doubt in my mind that the duty of the Government in such a case is to be the active prosecutors of the offenders. Was that the attitude of the Government, and, if so, what steps did they take to see that the charges were thoroughly investigated and justice done?

Mr. COSTIGAN. I do not see how I can give the hon. gentleman any more information than I have already given.

Mr. MULOCK. You have given me none yet.

Mr. COSTIGAN. I stated that the Civil Service Board reported to the Department of the Secretary of State that these illegal proceedings had taken place during the examinations at Montreal, and urged very strongly that steps should be taken to prevent the recurrence of such offences. Instructions were at once given to the board to have all the parties prosecuted, and I presume prosecutions are going on in all these cases.

Mr. MULOCK. The Secretary of State has not a very extensive department to preside over, and I think he ought to have given more attention to the matter than he appears to have done. He is the responsible head of the department, and the board are his executive officers. When a crime of this kind was committed against the public service it was his duty to have taken active steps to vindicate the law, and to see that proper punishment followed the discovery and conviction of the offenders. But he is not able to tell us what was done. The action of the civil authorities resulted in most insufficient punishment, and this result could hardly have been arrived at except by a colourable prosecution. Steps must have been taken to let the parties down easily, or the local authorities would not have allowed men guilty of forgery and fraud to escape with a mere pecuniary fine. The public were shocked at the idea of forgery and fraud being punished by a mere pecuniary fine, and a small one at that. Such a result is explicable only on the theory that the Government took no earnest steps to have proper punishment meted out. Can the Minister say what steps were taken to impress upon the proper authorities the desire of this Government that these cases should be carefully tried and the guilty parties properly punished?

Mr. COSTIGAN. I do not know that I can satisfy the hon. gentleman with the discharge of my duties as Secretary of State. I think it likely he would expect me to go further than I would consider it my duty to go. In the first place, not being a lawyer I could not take upon myself—

Mr. MULOCK. But there are eight or nine lawyers in the Government.

Mr. COSTIGAN. That is true, but the hon. gentleman is speaking of my action as Secretary of State. I think it likely I could not satisfy the hon. gentleman with what I did. I do not understand that it is any part of the duty of Secretary of State to attempt to impress upon the courts that they should carry out their duty in a certain way. My duties ceased when steps were taken to try the case, leaving the courts of this country to carry on their own proper work, to reach a conclusion and punish the guilty parties. It seems to me it would be very improper for me to indicate to the courts how the case should be tried.

Mr. MULOCK. I asked the hon. gentleman, did the Government of Canada retain counsel to prosecute the offenders?

Mr. COSTIGAN. I am not in the position to give the hon. gentleman any information with regard to the proceedings in criminal matters. That is no part of my duty; it does not belong to my department.

Mr. MULOCK. It must belong to some department. Perhaps the Minister of Justice will take the responsibility.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The responsibility of what?

Mr. MULOCK. I was asking the hon. Secretary of State if, in these investigations before the Montreal courts, the case was fully presented to the court. I am asking for information, because the sentences passed upon the offenders seem to me extremely light. The offence of impersonation is forgery, which is certainly not a venial offence, yet, in some cases, it was punished by a merely trifling pecuniary fine. I am not saying that we can have a system of examination that will be actually effective against fraud. I know something of examinations, and I know that there are difficulties in the way. But I do not think that the department is being as carefully watched over as it ought to be. I would make a suggestion with regard to the appointment of sub-examiners. I have had something to do with the appointment of sub-examiners for the last fifteen years, and in that time impersonation has taken place at only one place outside the main centre, and I do not think that in all that time, in connection with the institution to which I refer, there have been as many questions of fraud as arose in this one examination in the city of Montreal. We recommend the appointment, as sub-examiners, of persons who have themselves been examined. We secure, if possible, the services of teachers who are familiar with examinations and understand the requirements of them, and who are, as a rule, very accurate in the discharge of their duty. I believe the appointment of that class of men will be found one safeguard against fraud. As to the question I have asked the Secretary of State, I would like to know if the Minister of Justice can give details of the action of the Government with reference to the prosecution of these offenders?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The practice of my department in prosecuting in cases of this description is this: The cases are reported to my department from the department in connection with whose operations the offence has been committed. Immediately the matter is put in the hands of our agent in the locality with instructions to proceed according to the law applicable to the case. The cases under discussion were reported to my department by the Secretary of State, and the offenders were prosecuted by our agent in Montreal. I know that the cases were fully presented. I know also that when sentence was suspended efforts were made by the friends of the accused persons to obtain lenient sentences, and intercession was made with the Government to obtain its assent that such should be the case. In justice to those who made intercession, I have to say that they discontinued any effort of that kind when the gravity of the offence was described to them. The case went to the magistrates with the agents of the department insisting upon the offence being as severely dealt with as the authority of the magistrates would allow. I think the penalties were unduly light; I think the offences should have been punished in every case by imprisonment. That was our desire and the contention of our agent. I do not remember whether instructions have come for the prosecution of the others or not, but I presume they have from the statement of the Secretary of State the other day. With regard to the examiners or scrutineers, I agree with what the hon. gentleman has said. Certainly, if it be a fact that these scrutineers received money, or connived in any way at the suppression of the offence, they are the last persons in Canada who ought to be intrusted with any examinations in future, and they ought to be the first to be prosecuted. The hon. gentleman will see that there is a greater difficulty on the part of the scrutineers than in the examinations to which he referred, where, I presume, the candidates are pretty well known; whereas in a city like Montreal, hundreds of persons may present themselves who are totally unknown to the scrutineers. But that is all the more reason why, when scrutineers connive at fraud, they should be severely dealt with.

Mr. MULOCK.

Mr. MULOCK. I am satisfied with the information the Minister has given, and if the Secretary of State had been good enough to say that he had handed the matter over to the Department of Justice, I would not have made the observations I did. I am satisfied now that he has taken the proper course in transferring that branch of the trouble to the Department of Justice; and I am satisfied now that the action of the court was not attributable to any lack of vigilance on the part of the Government, but rather to an error of judgment, perhaps, on the part of the convicting magistrate.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) There is just this remark I wish to make. I can hardly think the civil service examiners can be held absolutely free from blame in this regard. It seems to me that in this grave and important matter where, I am told by the Secretary of State, the duty and responsibility of appointing sub-examiners rested entirely with themselves, and not upon the recommendation of any member of the Government, or supporter of the Government, when those appointees on their part were found to be guilty of conniving with the parties being examined, and when they were found to have admitted the fact that they had received bribes for the purpose of covering up the offence of personation, that fact should have been reported to Parliament by the civil service examiners. I have no hesitation in saying that in suppressing that fact, the civil service examiners have neglected their duty, and are open to severe reproach. I hope, now that the hon. member for North Brant (Mr. Somerville) has succeeded in unearthing this fact—which would not have been known to Parliament if he had not put a formal question—the Secretary of State will take care and hand over to the Minister of Justice the names of those two parties who have been guilty of an offence equally as gross and deserving of as much punishment as those who personated the candidates.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, but my hon. friend should be more careful, before he makes a statement of that kind, to read the report of the examiners in question.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I have read it.

Mr. FOSTER. If my hon. friend had read the report of the examiners, which has been laid on the Table of the House, he would have found the deputy reporting to Parliament in this language:

IRREGULARITIES.

The board regret being under the necessity of stating that the disposition on the part of some of the candidates to use improper means of insuring success at the examinations was again markedly exhibited at that of last November. At two places attempts at personation were discovered and frustrated, but in another case the fraud was accomplished—though afterwards detected, and in some measure punished. The matter is not, however, fully disposed of, but is in the hands of the Department of Justice for further action. It is now evident that in order to check the evil the penalties provided by the Civil Service Act should be inflicted.

That is really a presentment of the case to Parliament, not in detail but in brief; and the statement is there made that irregularities occurred, that he had reported these irregularities, and that the case was in the hands of the Department of Justice.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The Minister of Finance will see that he has not caught me tripping in the slightest degree. I was very careful to read the report over once or twice, and after having read it through once or twice. I saw that the civil service commissioners did report irregularities, but they took care to limit the irregularities to cases of personation, whereas now we find that the irregularities did not consist simply in cases of personation, as they reported to Parliament, but they consisted in a further and a graver irregularity, namely, that the sub-examiners appointed by themselves, had accepted bribes to cover up the irregularities. This grave offence committed by their appointees, was never brought to the notice of Parliament until the hon. member for North Brant asked the question on the 30th day of April, from private information he had received, and got an answer from the Secretary of State. Therefore, I repeat that the civil service examiners, in reporting that irregularities had occurred in the matter of personation, and in concealing the fact that their own appointees had accepted bribes to cover up those irregularities, have been guilty of a grave dereliction of duty.

Mr. FOSTER. That point certainly was not mentioned, and could not be taken from the paragraph.

Mr. FLINT. Before that item passes there is a matter in connection with it to which I would like to call the attention of the Minister of Finance. It seems to me it would be convenient for these young men to pass their examinations in other centres than those mentioned in the Auditor General's Report. Now, in the case of Nova Scotia, Halifax is the only place, I believe, where the civil service examiners hold their examination, and the expense of the deputy examiner at that point is put down at something over $50. I do not know how many persons were up for examination, but presumably quite a large number from the whole province, and the expense seems to be quite reasonable.

Mr. MULOCK. How long did it last?

Mr. FOSTER. One or two days.

Mr. FLINT. It seems to me the Government might very well permit an examination to take place in Yarmouth and another in Pictou. I know that these young men have complained lately of the expense they are put to in going to Halifax, and the loss of time, &c. If examinations were held at these two places I have mentioned, I think the extra expense would be very trifling, while it would be a great convenience to persons who cannot afford the time and expense of going so far from home as Halifax to attend these examinations. I think the usefulness of the examinations would be increased, and a favour would be conferred on those who aspire to positions in the civil service by permitting examinations in other places besides the capital of the various provinces. I speak of Nova Scotia, because I am more familiar with that province, and I should think that an examination at Pictou and another at Yarmouth would be no disadvantage, and would entail no extra expense. Now, in some cases the candidates have to take a second examination in some branch in which they have not come up to the standard, and for that purpose they have to go all the way to the capital, at a considerable expenditure of time and money. Now, if the Government were to appoint for that purpose some judicious person from Yarmouth, say the Inspector of Education for the district, or some other person of high standing as an educationist, I think it would be an improvement, and very much in the interest of those who are seeking these examinations. I would respectfully ask the Minister if he would make a note of this, and see if some such arrangement could be made for future examinations, holding them in some other places besides the capitals of the various provinces.

Mr. FOSTER. There are difficulties in extending the places for examination, as my hon. friend will readily see on reflection. There are now 14 such places in which examinations are held. If examinations are to be extended to Pictou and Yarmouth, in Nova Scotia, claims will be made to have them extended to other towns in Nova Scotia, and to other towns in the other provinces. I think the Government has done about what is best when it places facilities for examination within the reach of each province by taking the capital of the province. In the case of the larger provinces, other towns are taken; in the province of Quebec we take Montreal and Quebec, and in Ontario there are four places. Of course, it would be more easy for the aspirants, but we must have regard to the question of expense, and I think that very fair facilities are afforded already at the places we have chosen. Of course, there is some expense in connection with attending these examinations, but people must consent to it unless you have an examination at every door.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) If the Government determine to continue this system of examinations—which now has reached such proportions that I would almost say it need not go any further—but if they do determine to continue it at this large expense, it seems to me there is an improvement demanded. They return a list of candidates who have passed the preliminary examination and also list of candidates who have succeeded at the qualifying examination, but they give not the slightest idea as to what percentage of marks the candidates have obtained. I do not know what percentage is adopted as necessary to pass. Suppose the percentage is 60: a candidate may obtain that percentage while others may get 85 or 95, and neither the Government nor the public have the slightest idea that there is any difference between the candidates. Everybody knows that the practice in schools and colleges is to publish the results of the examinations in such a form as to classify the successful candidates.

Mr. FOSTER. They are not given here, but the Government know the percentage of marks obtained in every case.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Would it not be fair to publish them?

Mr. FOSTER. It might be.

Mr. MULOCK. How does the hon. gentleman account for the increase from $248 to $875 paid to Mr. Keyes?

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman went back to 1884, and I cannot answer him in regard to that year. Mr. Keyes is a member of the civil service, and for five or six years has been simply getting the statutory increase. The probabilities are that before that time, when he was receiving the small amount referred to, he was not on the civil service list. He has been made a clerk since then; he no doubt entered at $400, and the sum in question represents the accretions every year.

Mr. MULOCK. Has he any position outside the civil service?

Mr. FOSTER. I think not.

Mr. MULOCK. There is already a secretary of the board, and for what purpose is a clerk required?

Mr. FOSTER. There is a great deal of correspondence to be carried on. No less than 990 candidates presented themselves for examination, and this fact indicates the volume of the correspondence.

Mr. MULOCK. What duties does the secretary discharge?

Mr. FOSTER. There is, as I have said, a vast amount of correspondence, and there are other matters to be attended to.

Mr. MULOCK. I know a little in regard to work of this class. The charges for salaries of staff for this little trumpery work are out of all proportion to the labour performed. A clerk is added to the secretary to look after examinations which occupy two or three months in the year. This expenditure cannot be defended. The secretary is a superannuated officer, and a clerk is appointed to do the work for him. That is the way public money is thrown away. I submit that here is a waste of public money established, and a transaction that is not defensible, and in fact the Minister has not defended it.

Contingencies—Governor General's Secretary's Office $13,500

Mr. FLINT. I think a great improvement could be made in the arrangement in the Auditor General's Report, and in the indexing of it. It has grown to be an enormous volume, containing not only the details of expenditure, but a large amount of correspondence. I think it is obvious to any hon. member undertaking to search the work that some of the arrangements might be made to facilitate the work of the committee. I have no plan in mind, but I think the correspondence might be put in a separate volume, and the index much enlarged and made more full. This would facilitate the labours of the committee, and the efforts of those undertaking to understand the details of the accounts. A short time ago I was a long time finding an item, owing to the way in which the book was indexed, but at last I found it. I throw out the suggestion to the First Minister, and I hope next session we will have an improvement in the arrangement of the volume.

Contingencies—The Queen's Privy Council for Canada . . . $10,500

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I observe that a huge amount was required a year ago for extra clerks and messengers in the Privy Council Department, the cost amounting to $8,000. Looking at the sum which is required for the Privy Council, it appears to me that allowances of that kind are considerably in excess of what is required. We are to pay $32,000 for the work of the Privy Council, and that should be sufficient without spending $7,000 or $8,000 more for extra clerks, as appears to have been done last year.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The work of the Privy Council has been greatly increased, and is greatly increasing from year to year. As those hon. members who have been members of the Cabinet know, a great many matters which might be disposed of by the departments come to the Privy Council to receive the consideration of the whole Cabinet.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). That is bad practice.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It is an indispensable practice, I think. We cannot expect it to be otherwise with a Cabinet formed of representatives of different provinces, who are expected to account to their constituents and to the whole people of this province for every branch of the public service. If we were a closely combined community, of course the Ministers would simply represent departments and not provinces, but, as the hon. gentleman can well imagine, in the province of Nova Scotia we are expected to explain to our people the policy of every one of the departments of the public service. We are continually written to about every department, and not merely in relation to our own departments. For that reason there is a natural desire on the part of the Ministers to know all the important business that is being transacted in the different departments. That has caused a very great increase in the work of the Privy Council office, and increased contingencies in regard to the employment of clerks have been found to be indispensable.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. In what particular way does that come about?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Principally in making copies of Orders in Council for transmission to the Colonial Office, the High Commissioner's office, and also for the Auditor General, when they relate to money matters, and the prompt transmission of those is always a matter of great importance, especially those relating to matters of finance dealt with by the Auditor General.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The practice to which the hon. Minister has referred is not good practice. The work which requires the consensus of the whole Government, and that which can be done departmentally, ought to be kept distinct. How far a Minister of a department may consult his colleagues with respect to matters which he can deal with, but are of such importance that the Government as a whole should be informed of them, is a wholly distinct question. The practice in England, as I understand it, is, that by the use of despatch boxes everything that a Minister can deal with that is a matter of general importance but which he, nevertheless, can dispose of departmentally, he puts his report in a despatch box, sends it to the next Minister, and it goes around the entire Cabinet. It is open to the criticism and observation of his colleagues, and he may make it a subject of discussion in Council, with a view of getting their advice and assistance, but not with a view of having them deal with it as a Government, instead of departmentally. The responsibility of it is still with him, and it should be dealt with by him, and it certainly would be a very unfortunate practice if we were to depart so widely from the departmental system which prevails in the United Kingdom. I think that what belongs to the Government as a Government, and what belongs to each Minister to be dealt with departmentally is wholly distinct, and while it is very important that all his colleagues should be informed with regard to important matters which might be made a subject of discussion as affecting the general public policy of the Government, departmental matters could be transacted by following the English practice in the particulars I have mentioned without undertaking to deal with them officially in the Privy Council office. If that practice were adhered to there would be nothing to be done clerically in the Privy Council office. It would be there simply as a matter of informal discussion.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. There are two sides to the question the hon. gentleman has raised; but it does appear to me that the public service would be much better served in reality by allowing a wider latitude to individual Ministers and holding them individually responsible. I am aware that in certain places it may be necessary for some hon. gentlemen to keep a very sharp supervision over some of their colleagues, but I do not know that it is entirely calculated to increase the efficiency of the public service that that should be elevated into a regular right and a regular form of procedure. It appears to me that the duty of the Privy Council is in danger of being diverted with the consideration of a multitude of petty details, and that matters of grave importance affecting the whole nation would receive much less attention than they ought to receive if the practice that the hon. gentleman has just sketched out for us is adhered to to the extent that he appears to indicate. For my part I greatly prefer the idea of holding Ministers responsible in a higher degree than they have been held responsible for the administration of their departments. In bringing every little petty affair before the fourteen or fifteen gentlemen who compose the Cabinet, for formal decision, it does not strike me as likely to conduce to good government in the long run.

Mr. McMULLEN. I see that there is $172 charged in the Auditor General's Report for goods supplied from Kavanagh Bros. I would like to know what kind of goods they were. There is also $240 for lunches for the Cabinet.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That is not very excessive.

Mr. McMULLEN. I suppose they must work and eat at the same time, but I think we ought to change the name of this item and call it charity.

Mr. FOSTER. There is not much charity about it on Mr. Kavanagh's part.

Mr. McMULLEN. We know that the Good Book says that charity should cover a multitude of sins.

Mr. FOSTER. It says it does cover a multitude of sins.

Mr. McMULLEN. Well, I would like to have some explanation of these items.

Mr. FOSTER. Members of the Government have a great deal of work to do in the Privy Council, and it takes a great deal of time for them to disband on these occasions and go away for lunch. The custom of our predecessors has been kept up by the present Government in this respect, although we follow them a long way off. As my hon.

friend (Sir Richard Cartwright) has said, this is not a very extravagant amount. There must be mustard and pepper.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Strictly temperance lunches, I suppose ?

Mr. FOSTER. Strictly temperance. I never take anything else.

Mr. McMULLEN. Well, that is all right.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman (Mr. McMullen) gives you absolution in that case.

Mr. FLINT. The whole charges for the Privy Council amount to $12,656 for contingencies, and of that $7,913.99 is charged for extra clerks and messengers. That is by all odds the largest amount in the whole appropriation. It seems a large amount to pay for extra clerks and messengers, and it appears to me that these might be put on as permanent, and have a regular appropriation for them.

Mr. FOSTER. We have taken six of these off the temporary list and have in the present estimate put them on the permanent list, so that will be diminished next year.

Contingencies—Department of Justice—Penitentiaries Branch $9,000

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I see a charge here for a private secretary for the Solicitor General. Is it possible that the Solicitor General has a private secretary ?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Yes.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Would the Minister of Justice tell us what duties are assigned to the Solicitor General that he needs a secretary ?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The duties of the Solicitor General are those which were explained when the office was brought into force. He assists in the administration of the department and he attends to the cases the department has, as counsel, in so far as is practicable. In a great many cases, provision had been made for counsel when the Solicitor General took office. In many cases, it is required that provision be made for local counsel ; but the Solicitor General has already attended, in the last year, to several of our most important cases in the Supreme Court of Canada.

Contingencies—Department of
Secretary of State..... $7,000

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Here is a charge of $1,600 for extra clerks. We are allowing $43,000 for the Department of the Secretary of State, and are employing thirty-five persons to do the work, and I fail to see why they should not be able to discharge all the work of that department without extra clerical assistance.

Mr. FOSTER.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The practice, ever since I have know anything about the Department of the Secretary of State, has been to have a great deal of the merely clerical work done by extra clerks ; and I may say for the present Secretary of State that since his appointment to the office I believe he has not added one to the staff.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That may be, but it appears to me that thirty-five persons ought to be amply sufficient to discharge all the work. I do not think that the head offices of very important banks require more than thirty-five persons, and they certainly would have as much work to do as the Secretary of State's Department.

Mr. COSTIGAN. This is just the amount that has been voted for several years to pay officers who have been in the department as extra clerks for eight or ten years, and some of them for a longer time. They are not temporary clerks in the ordinary sense, hired for two or three months, but they are really a part of the staff who have never been appointed upon the permanent list.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That simply explains nothing. What we wanted to know was, why, with thirty-five gentlemen on his staff, the Secretary of State should be obliged to have besides men who are not on the permanent list ? This fashion of having men, one foot in and one foot out of the service, is not a good one. If they are required permanently, it were better that they should be appointed on the permanent staff, or we ought to know what special reason there is for utilizing them. The hon. gentleman has thirty-five people on his permanent staff to whom we pay $43,000. That ought to be sufficient to get through with the work of the department.

Mr. COSTIGAN. The hon. gentleman might just as well ask why I could not get along with twenty-five instead of thirty-five. There are thirty-five permanent officers, and this $1,600 is paid in addition to men who have never been put on the permanent staff, but who work regularly the year round, and have been doing so for years. The hon. gentleman asks why not put them on the regular staff. Well, some have never passed the examination, some are over the age of 35, and, therefore, not eligible for permanent appointment, according to the strict interpretation of the Act, but all are part and parcel of the department, doing regular work.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Does this $1,600 include the $1,297 which we see in the Auditor General's Report as outside vote ?

Mr. COSTIGAN. The $1,600 covers the whole payments made to clerks, outside of the regular salaries voted.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) On page 50 of the Auditor General's Report we see $41,534 spent for civil government, and then there in an outside vote of $1,297 consisting of payments to extra clerks. Is that $1,297 in addition to the $1,600, or included in it?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It is not outside service, but an outside vote, and is for the collection of old records.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) If the hon. gentleman will take the Printing Bureau, he will see what I mean more clearly. For civil government there is $23,704, and outside vote in addition, $12,190, consisting to a large extent of extra clerks.

Mr. FOSTER. The item of civil government contingencies shows what is paid out for extras under civil government. But there are other outside votes in cases where there are extra clerks employed, which do not come under civil government.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) What is the difference?

Mr. FOSTER. They are not paid out of civil government contingencies, but out of the vote for the Printing Bureau. The Printing Bureau must be run, and they have clerks to run it, but that is not paid out of the sum voted for civil government, but out of the general vote.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) It ought to be paid in such a way that one can tell what extra clerical assistance is paid for in the department, whether it comes out of civil government or an outside vote.

Mr. FOSTER. Here you have a vote which Parliament analyses and passes for carrying on the work of the Printing Bureau. We pass an amount for the printers, the typesetters, the binders, messengers, carters and the whole staff. That is included and paid out of the vote for the Printing Bureau. But we are now discussing an amount for civil government contingencies, which is quite different. These $1,600 shows the extra work for civil government contingencies, but does not show the number of men employed to run the Printing Bureau. To run that bureau we must have hundreds of men. But the Auditor General puts parallel lines, and gives you what is paid out by each department under each head. Take the Secretary of State Department: first, out of civil government contingencies, and second, what is paid for clerk hire, carters, &c., in running the Printing Bureau. He gives the two, side by side. One is civil government, and the other is an outside vote.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Take the Department of Printing and Stationery, which has a vote of $4,200. The Auditor General subdivides that to show the different services. One of these is clerical and other assistance, $1,200, and the supposition of the House would be that this shows the total number of extra clerks required in the department, and the total cost of that work. But, when we turn to the report under the head of printing and stationery, we find no fewer than eight extra clerks employed in that department.

Mr. FOSTER. That is in the Printing Bureau.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I am speaking of the Printing Bureau as an example. What I say is that this $1,200 for clerical and other assistance does not cover, as one would suppose it did, the whole expenditure for clerical assistance in the department.

Mr. FOSTER. That is in the department, and not what is spent in the Printing Bureau.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). If the hon. gentleman will take pages "l" and "li," he will see that there are two columns, and in the outside one appears the item: Campeau, L. M., extra clerk, one month to July 31, $33.33. That is not included in civil government.

Mr. FOSTER. Certainly not.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). But what can a clerkship be if the expenditure upon it is not included under the head of civil government?

Mr. FOSTER. That is for a different work, as I understand it—for classification of records.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). But I do not see why this should not be included under civil government.

Mr. FOSTER. There is a special vote by Parliament for the classification of records, and two men have been put upon that work. But the Auditor General groups this item with others under the head of the Secretary of State's Department.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). But why are these not under the charge of Mr. Brymner?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Mr. Brymner has charge of the archives.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). You distinguish between archives and records. These are legal documents, I suppose?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Some are legal and some historical.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). These historical documents ought to be in the archives, but if they are legal records by which any title or interest is affected, it is quite right to have them in the Secretary of State's office.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. But they have to be classified to discover what they are.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I should have thought that that would have been done before they reached the department.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. They are, sometimes, in great confusion.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Then this charge should be made partly to the Secretary of State's office, and partly to the Archives office.

Mr. FOSTER. The work is carried on in the Secretary of State's offices, and the records are there.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) This example from the Secretary of State's Department only confuses the issue, because here you have a specific vote for a special purpose—the classification of records.

Mr. FOSTER. You are looking into the Auditor General's Report. We are not responsible for the way he arranges his report. If he chooses to group a number of things in order to give a general view of the expenditure, that is his business.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) But that is not the point. When we vote a certain sum for clerical and other assistance, the House is led to suppose that this covers the cost of such work in the department. But when we turn to the expenditure, we see that this is not the total sum paid out for clerical assistance, that it is not more than one-third of it. Therefore, you have this service of extra clerical work appearing in such a form in the record that we cannot tell how much the service costs us.

Mr. FOSTER. It appears to me as clear as the nose on a man's face. We put in the estimates so much for extra clerical work in the Secretary of State's Department. But Parliament finds that there are some old records in the Secretary of State's office and they give a vote of $2,000 to have those records classified and put in shape. That is done under the supervision of the Secretary of State, and the Auditor General puts this expenditure down here because he wants to show every man who is employed, whether under civil government, on the classification of records, or any special vote—everything. The proper way to correct this is to have this item classified, not under the head of the Secretary of State's office, but under the head of the classification of old records.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) You are going back to the Secretary of State's Department.

Mr. FOSTER. I take an example to show that you are wrong.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) But take the example I have given. There is no question of the classification of old records in the case of the Printing Bureau. You have $1,200 for clerical and other assistance, and you have charged here one extra clerk, $912.50; another, $936, and so on. So that the money from which these men are paid must be voted under some other head.

Mr. FOSTER. This case is on all fours with the other. Here is an establishment that carries on printing and stationery as a branch of civil government. It has twenty-four clerks whose salaries appear under the head of civil government. Parliament says: You may employ $1,200 worth of extra clerks for the necessary work of the department. The Queen's Printer has an immense establishment in which the Government documents are printed, and from which they are largely distributed, and there is a vote given of so many thousand out of which the Queen's Printer has to pay the printers, the clerks, the messengers—the whole expenses of running the establishment. It is not at all right that this should be debited to the item of civil government; it should be under the head of printing and stationery, which is an outside vote. To have these items appear as they do is the Auditor General's way of making up his report. But were they to appear under their head, they would not be misleading. If you take the expenditure under the head of Printing Bureau, you see exactly what is paid for paper, what is paid for printing, what is paid for carters' work, what is paid for messengers' work, and what is paid for each clerk hire. They must have clerks there as well as in other departments.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). But this is quite a distinct case, as the hon. gentleman will see, from that of the clerks engaged in the classification of records, for in that case you have a special vote. But the expense that the hon. gentleman mentions, that of the distribution of the statutes and papers from the department of the Queen's Printer, is a work which is going on continually, and the salary of any clerk employed there would naturally appear as an item under civil government.

Mr. FOSTER. Not at all; they are not on the civil service list.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman will see that there ought to be no distinction.

Mr. FOSTER. That is an argument as to whether they should all be on the list or some be temporary.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). It is not a question of being temporary. There is a part of the cost of civil government being charged against some other than its own proper item, and I think that is done where you put a clerk, as, for instance, in the case of Laberge, in the outside service, if he is employed within the Queen's Printer's office for the purpose of doing clerical work. That is permanent work, and he must go on for ever.

Contingencies—Department of Interior..... $19,800

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) There is an increase here of $1,800.

Mr. DALY. If the hon. gentleman will look at page 86 of the Estimates, he will see a decrease—to pay salaries of extra clerks at head office, $1,000. They have put it in the increase column, whereas it should be put in the decrease column. We have taken $1,000 from that vote and added $800 to it, and placed them together here. That accounts for the increase.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) It accounts for part of it.

Mr. DALY. That accounts for the $1,000. I may say that the contingencies of the department are the same as they were three years ago, notwithstanding the fact that immigration has been added to that department. The total of $19,800 is less than the contingencies were three years ago.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) But you asked for $1,800 more than you asked for last year.

Mr. DALY. It is actually only $800 more than was voted for the same service last year. That accounts for the $1,000, but we found that we required $1,800 for extra clerical assistance. We may not use it, it may not be required, but there was no item last year in the Estimates for it at all.

Contingencies—Department of

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) What is this $1,000 increase for?

Mr. FOSTER. They were short last year, I think, and we had to add an extra $1,000 to get them through.

Contingencies—Department of Inland Revenue..... $7,000

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) There is an increase of $1,000 here.

Mr. FOSTER. The contingencies were, as I said, short last year, and there will be a little more expense in connection with the electric light Bill.

Contingencies—Department of Marine and Fisheries..... $10,500

Mr. McMULLEN. I see an increase of $500 here. At present I am merely going to remark that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries took some members of this House to task in the Public Accounts Committee for not having inquired into the expenditure under the head of Railways, and we must not allow items to pass in the future without inquiring about them. The Minister of the Interior, along with the Minister of Railways, taunted the Opposition with not discharging their duty. After this, we must try and discharge our duty by inquiring into every expenditure of this kind.

Mr. FOSTER. I will call the attention of the Minister of the Interior to the remarks of the hon. gentleman, and doubtless he will explain on concurrence.

Committee rose, and reported resolutions.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and the House adjourned at 6 p.m.
