that we belong to the one country and are Canadians. A great deal of money has been spent by this Government in improving the navigation of the St. Lawrence River on the one hundred and eighty miles between Quebec and Montreal. I think the country has expended about three and a half million dollars for the purpose of deepening the channels through Lake St. Peter, in order to save a railway carriage of about 180 miles. Now, that is a very small proportion of our thousands of miles of railway traffic; and if, by spending what may be considered a large sum of money, we can utilize, as a through route to the ocean, probably fifteen hundred or nearly two thousand miles of our magnificent waterway, which we cannot do now, we can save that much of railway carriage. Everything that tends to cheapen the transport of the products of the country must certainly increase the price to the producer. Every cent saved to the farmers of the west in bringing their products to market increases the price they receive by that much. I believe I am giving the correct figures when I say that the surplus wheat from the North-west for the last year was over twenty million bushels. One cent per bushel saved on that would make $200,000 put into the pocket of the farmers. Our canal system is something like a chain, its strength has to be gauged by the strength of the weakest link. Its efficiency and usefulness must be determined by the depth of water and length of locks at the shallowest and smallest part. To make the system perfect, it should be of one uniform depth and size throughout, and until it is, it cannot be utilized as a waterway to the ocean. It strikes me there is another question which might be solved by the perfecting of our waterway system and of our canal system—a question that has been up for discussion in past years. I refer to the question of the rebate of canal tolls. By the adoption of the policy advocated by the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Denison), we might settle that question, making our waterway so much the cheaper and superior to any other one that there could be no question of a rival. I will not take up the time of the House, as other gentlemen are going to follow, by adding anything further, except to express the hope that the Government will adopt the policy indicated by the hon. member for West Toronto.

Mr. SPROULE. I am glad to have the opportunity to support the proposition made by the hon. member for Toronto (Mr. Denison), because I consider the work to which he has called attention one of the great requirements of the age. These great water-stretches seem to have been designed by nature for man's use; but in order to gain the full benefit of them we must connect the various links by canals and channels deep enough to accommodate ocean-going vessels. There are hundreds of miles of navigation between the ocean and Port Arthur that might afford the best means of communication among the various towns and cities and villages in the interior of this vast country, but which can only be partially used to-day on account of the disadvantages we labour under through the smallness of some small links in the great chain. Vessels that are able to pass through a canal where there is only fourteen feet of water are very few compared with the great number of ocean-going vessels that carry freight to every part of the world. The demand at the present time appears to be to cheapen the cost of transport; and in no other way, in my opinion, can it be so effectively done as by increasing the facilities for the navigation of the rivers and lakes of the Dominion. We are already able to pass from the ocean to Quebec, and thence to Montreal, a distance of 200 miles. Between Montreal and Lake Ontario ports there are only a few links which require to be a little deepened. This accomplished, Toronto would be one of the ocean ports of Canada. That would be a great consideration; but it would be a still greater consideration to continue the system westward by increasing the depth and width of the Welland Canal so as to allow the same ocean vessels to pass on to Port Arthur, making the head of navigation there. One of the great requirements of the day is to cheapen freight rates and, in order to do this, competition is necessary. At present the freight rates, we may say, are virtually controlled by two railway corporations; and we do not know how soon these may be amalgamated under one management which would practically be able to dictate terms to the world. Should that result be brought about—and I think we may reasonably expect it to happen before long, seeing what has taken place within the last few years—how important will it be to have competition with these railways to keep down freight rates. The only perpetual competition we can have is through the agency of the waterways of the country, and, to make this competition effective, we must deepen the canals. I think it is not too much to say that we have spent some hundreds of millions of public money upon our railways. These great works are valuable; they are useful; they perform a most important function. But by the expenditure of a small fraction of the amount of money put into the railways, we should be able to use our waterways to great advantage, to quite as great advantage as we use our railways at the present time. Why, then, should we not do it? One of the great causes of high freight rates is transshipment. In our section of the country we had practical experience of that. We assisted to build a railway of a gauge of 3 feet 6 inches, which was not the standard of the gauge of the country. The result was that, when a car of through freight reached Toronto over that railway, it had to be transhipped. This was a very serious drawback to our trade and resulted in so much less being given to the producer for his goods.

We know it costs 50 cents a ton to unload coal from a vessel or car. If that be so, it is not too much to say that it will cost an equal sum to tranship from one vessel to another, and as much also to tranship from vessel to railway car. If our canals were deepened, this cost of transshipment would be in a large degree saved; and the saving would undoubtedly be shared between the producer and the consumer; because, if it pays to carry freight at the rate at which it is being carried to-day, there would be no necessity to take a larger margin out of the price of the product for the purpose of carrying that freight, when you reduce the cost by the economy of deepening the canal. This great improvement will be required more and more as time goes on. It is only a few years since the vessels navigating our inland waters had a draught of only from 10 to 14 or 15 feet. Now, we find many of them drawing 20 and 22 feet; and, in some cases, I believe the draught is as much as 23 feet. The trend of the age seems to be towards the building of larger vessels, vessels which will carry more, but that will also require a greater depth of water. Many vessels are now fenced in in our inland waters, not being able to reach the ocean, because of the impediments offered by these narrow and shallow channels; and thus they are only partially able to do the work which they could do most effectively and profitably but for this embargo. Vessels that would come from the ocean to inland towns are prevented from coming. They have to break bulk and tranship at Quebec or Montreal, adding to the cost of transportation as I have said. If it were required, a hundred millions of dollars would be a small consideration to the country, when you take into consideration the saving of freight rates and the advantages that would accrue in the increased facilities for navigation. Two things are required in our country to-day perhaps more than any other: first, rapidity of transportation; and, second, the facility to carry larger quantities in a train or vessel. Now, we are proposing to give a very respectable sum for the purpose of getting a fast steamship line from Canadian ports to England and other European countries. We are doing this for a purpose. We believe that compensating advantage will accrue from it to our own people on account of the increased rate of speed and the improved facilities for carrying our goods to these eastern countries. If this principle holds good for that portion of navigation between Europe and our Atlantic seaboard, it must be equally true of that very large stretch of navigation which might be utilized from Quebec to Port Arthur. We should then have not only the advantage of carrying very much larger cargoes, such as the ocean-going vessels carry to-day; we should also have the advantage of quicker transportation. If this were done we could introduce the refrigerator system so successfully inroduced in ocean navigation, and thus we could carry cheese, butter, fresh meat, and other perishable articles and land them in Liverpool in much shorter time, in much better condition and at a cheaper rate than at present. Another great advantage—I believe that in the transportation of cattle it is admitted that the animals sustain less injury when carried by boat than when transported in cars. If you reduce the number of miles over which they must be taken by railway, and increase the number of miles over which they can be taken in vessels, you introduce a system that carries them with less damage, and lays them down in the markets of the world where they are to be sold, in a much better condition than they are by the present system. We have lately finished our great transcontinental line of railway, and I think there is no person in this country but will admit that the expenditure incurred in building that great line of railway was a wise one, that we have received great benefits from it, and that the country could scarcely get along without it to-day. But while these advantages are great, there is no doubt whatever that there are still great defects in the transportation system that we cannot overcome by the railways of our country, and that might be overcome by deepening the canals so as to allow ocean-going freight from the east to pass at least through the centre of the country, up to the west. And not only would we reap that advantage in respect to ocean-going freight, but if these canals were deepened as they ought to be, so as to allow ocean vessels to pass up, I am quite sure that we would attract very heavy freight from the northern fringe of those of the United States that lie along the Canadian border; and not only would we carry the freight of our own country, but we would carry a very large portion of the freight of the northern part of the United States, which, by the advantages of these cheap waterways, could reach the ocean much cheaper, by a shorter route and in a better condition, than it could by passing over the railways of their own country; and this traffic, in a measure, would partly repay the expense that would be incurred in deepening these canals. This question has been discussed from time to time by members of this House, and it has been written upon by the press of the country; but I am of the opinion that there never was a time in the history of the country that this enterprise could be undertaken with better chance of success than at the present time. All the great schemes we have had in hand that have involved heavy expenditure, are comparatively finished to-day, and we are in a better position than we ever were before for commencing some larger enterprises which, though they might incur heavy outlays, are enterprises which would afford compensating advantages for the heavy expenditure they would entail. We have nothing else now on our hands except this project of getting a fast steamship line; and as I said before, to get the best advantages from that fast steamship line, and to bring the large exporting towns and cities within reach of the centre of the country, can be accomplished in no other way than by deepening these canals. Therefore I think that wherever work is projected and carried out in the future it should be done with the view of accomplishing at some time that very desirable aim, and the money should be so expended that we shall have gradually a depth of at least 20 feet—and in my opinion we ought to make it even more than 20 feet, in fact, if we had a depth of 20 feet it would give us more advantages than we have to-day. For these reasons I, for one, would heartily support the scheme proposed by the hon. member for Toronto. It is a very important one in the interest of the province of Ontario, and for all the western country; and in my opinion it is equally important for the province of Quebec and the provinces down by the sea, because it would cultivate an interprovincial trade that we have not realized to the extent we should, up to the present time, and that we never shall realize until we have the advantage of these deep waterways. As I said before, it would reduce the cost of transportation, it would give us a fast conveyance, and it would give us perpetual competition with the railways of the country, and in these various ways I think it would pay us very well to incur the expenditure that would be required for the purpose of deepening these canals.

Mr. COATSWORTH. I am glad to see the receptive and responsive attitude of the Minister of Railways and Canals on this subject, and I trust it may be a good omen for those who are pushing this project, and that something definite may be accomplished by the discussion which took place last year and the discussion which is taking place this afternoon. It appears to me that the deepening of these canals is the logical development of the policy which the Government has been pursuing for a great many years. When we realize the fact that between Montreal and Port Arthur and Duluth there are from 100 to 150 ports at the present time open to navigation, besides innumerable ports that are not yet opened and made into harbours, we may understand that there is a vast extent of country to be affected by the project, and that the more we can develop the shipping trade, when we have so many ports into which ships can run, the better it will be for our country. Now, the development of the St. Lawrence route between Montreal and Quebec in order to allow ocean-going vessels to run up to Montreal, began in 1841. I wish to say at the outset that I do not intend to draw any invidious comparisons between what the Government did down there and what we want them to do up here, because

I think there is no one in the country but will approve of what the Government has done east of Montreal, and all we wish them to do now is to extend the same policy west of Montreal for the fuller development of the shipping of our country. In 1841 ninety-seven sea-going vessels came up to Montreal, at a time when the depth of water in the shallowest part of Lake St. Peter, was $11\frac{1}{2}$ and 12 feet. After an investigation it was decided that the channel of the river should be deepened so as to allow the passage of vessels drawing 16 feet of water, and in 1849 the channel was so deepened, so that vessels drawing 16 feet could come up to Montreal. But the policy of development was found so satisfactory that the Government went on with it, and in 1854 the river was again deepened so that vessels drawing 18 feet of water could come up to Montreal. In 1865 the channel was again deepened so that vessels drawing 20 feet of water could come up to Montreal. In 1877 it was again deepened to allow the passage of vessels drawing 22 feet of water; and in 1886, when the last work was done in this respect, the channel was deepened to $27\frac{1}{2}$ feet, so that vessels drawing $27\frac{1}{2}$ feet of water can now pass up from Quebec to Montreal. This result was not obtained without the expenditure of a considerable sum of money. I observe, in reading the 'Debates' of last year, the objection was raised that the harbours on Lake Ontario, Lake Erie, Lake Huron, Lake Superior, and the Georgian Bay, were not sufficiently deep to allow ocean-going vessels to get into them. It may be that at the present time these harbours are not sufficiently deep for that purpose; but we know very well that when sea-going vessels first came to Quebec and Montreal, those harbours were not in a satisfactory condition for such vessels to enter them, and it was found essential in the development of navigation to enlarge and deepen the harbours at both those cities, and this has accordingly been done, with the result that vessels of a very large tonnage can now enter those harbours. I do not know much about the depth of the harbours in many parts of the lake, but I know that in Toronto, the place in which I am particularly interested, even if there is not a sufficient depth of water at the present time, yet, owing to the magnificent entrance that the Public Works Department have given us at the eastern end of the harbour, we can obtain a depth there of almost 60 feet by satisfactory dredging; and I am sure that when the canals are completed the Minister of Public Works will see that proper dredging is done, so that the entrance to our harbour and the harbour itself may be all that can be required to accommodate shipping. Now, while I draw no invidious distinctions as to the St. Lawrence route below Montreal and above Montreal, yet, when it pays the Government, for the purpose of accommodating shipping at Montreal, to expend not less than ten millions—because I feel certain that the expenditure on the harbours and the St. Lawrence below Montreal has not been less than ten millions—when it pays to expend that much to bring sea-going vessels up to Montreal, then I say the logical conclusion is that it will pay very well for the Government to extend these works up into Lake Ontario and the other lakes, where, as I said before, we will have from 100 to 150 harbours open for the reception of vessels. Nearly all the harbours to which I have referred are at the present time capable of accommodating all the shipping running on the lakes. Some of these harbours are Brockville, Kingston, Toronto, Hamilton, St. Catharines, Windsor, Sarnia, Goderich, Owen Sound, Collingwood, Sault Ste. Marie, Port Arthur. And we have the American ports of Rochester, Oswego, Buffalo, Cleveland, Sandusky, Toledo, Detroit, Bay City, Milwaukee, Chicago, Duluth. So if it was a wise act, and there is no one who doubts it, and none who would not approve of it, to spend so much money in order to enable sea-going vessels to reach Montreal, it would be a wise policy, and one that would meet the approval of the people of the country, if the Government were to formulate a policy for 20 feet or 22 feet navigation for the purpose of accommodating sea-going vessels ascending the St. Lawrence and the Welland canals. It may be that if the Government does not see its way clear to deepen the Welland Canal, a private enterprise which has been started near Toronto, will enable us to have a ship canal from Georgian Bay to Lake Ontario, and I am sure it will not be very satisfactory to see the Government canal running dry, I observe the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Gibson) smiles at the idea of the Government canal running dry, as it is in his constituency, but it surely will not be proper to allow a private enterprise to step ahead of the Government, and so I trust the Government will take the matter into consideration. This policy of canal enlargement is one that was contemplated at the time of confederation. When the gentlemen who were interested in carrying out the project of confederation visited the various points in the Dominion, at places where the people were most interested in canals, the canal question was referred to, and there was a clear understanding at that time that such steps should be taken as in process of time would result in the enlargement of the canal so as to allow sea-going vessels to enter all our lakes. We are now met with a great many objections to this development, and many of the objections have foundation only in the want of credence which possesses many men as to the possibility of carrying out large public works. But we have in Canada at the present time a standing answer to those who decry the construction of great public works, and which are ready to speak of the impossibility of such works being carried out, because we can refer them to the stupendous works connected with our railway system, and to the engineering difficulties connected with the building of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and the skill by which these were overcome affords a sufficient answer to those who doubt the practicability of deepening the canals, and as far as may be necessary the St. Lawrence, to allow sea-going vessels to ascend the lakes. As the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Denison) said: The policy we are now pursuing and the policy upon which the Government is proceeding as regards the deepening of the canals to 14 feet, is one that was adopted twenty years ago. During these twenty years there has been far greater developments, not only in our country, but in the country to the south than took place during the fifty years previous, and if those who were in charge of our affairs and in charge of our public works twenty years ago, deemed it at that time necessary for the proper conveyance of the lake and river traffic to have the canals deepened to 14 feet, surely with the prospect of increased shipping and in view of the large vessels now being built it is essential that the policy should be revised and we should take into consideration the advisability of deepening our canals so that ships from the ocean and from the lower provinces can reach our harbours on the lakes of Ontario and Manitoba. In fact it appears to me that the lake carrying trade is bound to burst its barriers in some way. During recent years the traffic on the northern lakes has so largely increased that while 14 feet navigation was previously sufficient to accommodate all vessels then, at the present time fully one-third of the vessels built since then are so large that it is impossible for them to pass through the Welland Canal. A year or so ago when it was desired to take one of the whalebacks down to the sea in order to make a trial voyage across the ocean the vessel had to be cut in two in order to get it through our canals. During a former debate on this subject it was stated that one of the reasons why our people are not prepared to enlarge our canals is that only one-third of the commerce passing Detroit actually reaches Buffalo. I think if we should wait until the commerce passing Detroit reaches Buffalo we would come to a condition that it is almost impossible to realize. Buffalo could not possibly accommodate the traffic which passes Detroit; so it is no argument to say that because only one-third of the traffic passing Detroit reaches Buffalo, therefore, we are not prepared to enlarge our canals. The very fact referred to by the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Denison), that so many vessels are tied up west of the Welland Canal, is one of the strongest reasons that should influence the Government in desiring to carry out the enlargement of the canals. In 1841 when only 96 sea-going vessels were able to reach Montreal and that by reason of lightering, the argument for deepening the river gained force when the point had been reached that lightering became necessary, and from that time the improvements on the St. Lawrence proceeded. By the same reason when we have so many vessels tied up west of the Welland Canal, which cannot pass through that canal, the time has come when the Government should carry out canal enlargement to enable the vessels to pass through the canals. Those large vessels, moreover, are compelled to tie up through the whole of the winter because it is impossible for them to reach the sea and take part in the winter ocean trade, which is shared by vessels plying east of Montreal. One of the arguments referred to by an hon. member last year was that it was not desirable to have large cargoes of wheat in vessels as there was danger of the grain heating. I was glad to hear the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. McKay) speaking on the resolution this afternoon, addressed the House as one who had had experience in shipping cargoes of wheat, and I am very sure that if there is any weight to be attached to the argument that there was danger of wheat becoming heated he would have given due weight to the argument and drawn the attention of the House to it. But I understand, as a matter of fact, that this only applies when the wheat is not in proper condition before it is shipped, and that if the wheat is shipped in good order it is not likely to be heated in transit, and the question of 10, 20 or 30 days on board makes no difference. Among the other reasons which might be mentioned to convince this House and to convince this Government that the time has arrived when we should enlarge our canals, is the policy that has been adopted by the United States. We all know very well that the greatest competitors that we have for the carrying trade of the west will be our neighbours to the south of us, and as my hon. friend from Grey (Mr. Sproule) suggested, there is already a tendency, owing to their immense shipping and to their great railway system, that the traffic may be diverted in a southeasterly direction instead of coming east along the St. Lawrence. Our friends on the other side of the line are in advance of us in their canal policy. They have already adopted a standard of canal locks 600 feet long, 85 feet wide and 20 feet on the mitre sills, which, I understand, gives about 22 feet, with a depth of 24 feet in rivers and in slack waters. It appears to me that the question for us is purely one of expense. I believe that the Government should take into consideration whether or not the interests and the demands of the people to the west of Montreal and to the west of Ontario should not be complied with, and whether some plan cannot be formulated by which we can at least arrive at an idea of the expense of the work, and of the profit to be realized from the enterprise. We will then be able to determine with some degree of intelligence whether or not our canals should be enlarged. I trust, as a result of this discussion to-day, and also the discussion in the House last year, that if we are not able to accomplish anything more, we will at least inspire the Minister of Railways and Canals with the necessity of having a survey and plans made of this route, and of obtaining an estimate by his skilful engineers in order to ascertain what the exact cost would be. It is very easy to speak about \$100,000,000, but we do not know whether it is going to cost \$50,000,000 or \$100,000,000, because I do not understand that any practical survey or estimate has yet been made. I sincerely hope that the Minister will make it his business to see that there is a proper survey, proper plans and proper estimates, so that we may be able to arrive at an idea of what the cost of the extension will be. I suppose that we will have to submit to some opposition from the railways, but I would point out what has been the experience in the past of the effect of canal enlargement upon railways. It was said in the early days of the Erie Canal that it would destroy the railway traffic; but it was found after the railways were established, which I believe was subsequently to the building of the canal, that not only did the railways carry two or three times more traffic than the canal carried before the railways were built, but that the traffic on the canal itself increased two- or three-fold, so that it seemed as though the effect of the railways and the canals together caused such a development of the country as to promote so extensive a traffic that both railways and canals had enough to do to accommodate it. I therefore think that the canals, instead of being a hindrance to our railways, instead of entering into active opposition to them, which even my hon. friend from Grey (Mr. Sproule) seems to anticipate, would on the contrary tend to open up the country and promote such a degree of commerce as would not only benefit the canals themselves and benefit the people of the country, but I believe in the long run benefit the railways as well. I sincerely trust that if we do not accomplish more this session we will at all events be able to obtain from the Minister of Railways and Canals a promise that he will bring down an estimate of the cost of deepening our canals as we think they should be deepened.

Mr. DAVIN. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a few words in support of the motion of my hon. and gallant friend from Toronto (Mr. Denison). I shall look at the question entirely from a North-west standpoint, because from other standpoints it has been very fully dealt with by hon. members of this House. I believe that it would be of great advantage to the people I represent if our canals were so deepened as to admit of the passage of vessels drawing 20 feet of water. Let me dwell on this point for a moment, so as to bring it to the attention of this House and of the Government. We must do everything in our power to lower the cost of carrying our produce to the seaboard. My hon. friend from Grey (Mr. Sproule) touched on the danger lest the two great railways should amalgamate, but whether they amalgamate or not, we in the North-west at the present minute feel that we pay a great deal too much to carry our produce to Montreal. We know from statistics of the cost of transport in the states, and from the comparative cost of transport by water and by rail, that if we had the advantages that the proposal of my hon. friend from Toronto (Mr. Denison) would give there is not the least doubt that we in the North-west would get our produce cheaper to the seaboard. When this question was before the House in 1892 I supported a similar proposal by my hon. friend (Mr. Denison), and at that time we went into statistics as to the immense value of our lake carrying trade. The Minister of Railways and Canals, in dealing with the question, pointed out that the trade passing Detroit exceeded by some 10,000,000 tons the whole ocean-going trade of the United States, and exceeded by 3,000,000 tons all the exports from Liverpool and London. That one fact gives some idea of the vast value of the lake-going commerce to the United States. What we are chiefly interested in in the west is the cheapening of transport. The hon. Minister on that occasion pointed out that only about one-third of the trade passing Detroit arrived east, and that some two-thirds of it was practically consumed in the west. If we analysed that one-third of the trade which arrived east it would probably be found to consist of the very things that we export from the west: animals, cereals, &c., which we find a market for in Liverpool. Of course the motion of my hon. friend, which I cheerfully endorse, is merely with a view of pressing the project on the attention of the Minister, but whenever it takes a practical shape it shall have my strongest and heartiest support.

Sir JAMES GRANT. Mr. Speaker, it was not my intention to have entered into this discussion until I listened to the observations graphically given to the House by the hon. member for Toronto (Mr. Denison) upon this very important subject. We know perfectly well that at the present time there is a great responsibility in asking the Government to undertake the enlargement of our canals, notwithstanding how strongly we may wish to meet the growing trade of our country. We know that just now we have undertaken the responsibility of cutting down our tariff and lessening our revenue very materially, and notwithstanding the desirability of having our canals deepened and enlarged, under the circumstances I would not ask the Government too energetically for the expenditure of a very large amount of money at this present period. However, as the subject has been so ably brought before this House, I feel, as a representative from the valley of the Ottawa, that I cannot allow this opportunity to pass without offering a few observations on a very important subject submitted to the Government and the country as far back as 1838. At that time an address was presented to Sir John Colborne by a large deputation, in which were several of the leading men of Canada at that time, in favour of the construction of a canal between Lake Huron and the port of Montreal. The subject was also brought up in the Commons of Canada in 1872, and was discussed at considerable length by the gentlemen then representing this portion of the Dominion. We know very well that no more important subject can be brought before the country than that of the construction of a canal to connect Lake Huron with Montreal, inasmuch as large vessels passing through that portion of the Dominion would be accommodated by the natural waterways of the country, the rivers and lakes between those two points, so that a very moderate expenditure indeed on actual canal construction would be necessary. Under these circumstances, when the Government of this country see, from the growing requirements of the country and the development of our trade, that the time has arrived for increased canal accommodation, I say that the Ottawa Ship Canal is one of the first projects that should receive their full and timely consideration. I will not enter into a full discussion of the subject at the present time. In regard to it we have had the report of Mr. Loranger, presented to the Government in 1858, and the report of Mr. Thomas C. Clarke, presented in 1860; and I say that, either on the part of the great French nationality or on the part of the English people, no two engineers have presented better reports to this country than those presented by those two gentlemen with reference to the Ottawa Ship Canal, also the able and exhaustive report of Walter Shanly, ex-M.P. So important was that project considered that it occupied the attention of the leading men of this country for many a day; and why was the canal not constructed? So much money would be required to carry out the work, and so many gigantic works for the development of the country were going on at the time that the people of the Ottawa valley felt that this project was so vital to the development of the country's trade, that the time would come when it would be looked upon as absolutely necessary and then the Government would take hold of it energetically. Under these circumstances they felt that they could well afford to let it rest for a while. At present the Soulanges Canal is under construction, and if the Government saw the desirability of deepening that canal to 20 feet, it would probably not be possible now for them to stop the work to have that done. After a while they may see the necessity of deepening these canals, just as they are now deepening the Cornwall Canal. We know that the Minister of Public Works handles the projects that he has on hand with a masterly spirit; and when the Ottawa Ship Canal is to be taken into consideration, I know that the head of that department will not allow so important a project to be passed over in silence. Under these circumstances, I ask the members of the Government and the House who have the good of the country at heart, when the time arrives for the increased enlargement of our canals in order to meet the requirements of our rapidly-growing trade, to remember that one of the first projects entitled to receive their consideration is the Ottawa Ship Canal.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). Mr. Speaker, I am quite sure that any proposition put before this House for the purpose of improving the means of communication from the Canadian North-west and the American North-west to the seaboard will have the sympathy of the members of this House. I do not rise, however, for the purpose of participating in this debate, but rather to correct a misconception which the hon. member for East Toronto (Mr. Coatsworth), and I fear many other hon. gentlemen have with regard to the relation of the harbour at Montreal to the Government of Canada. Now, Sir, it is a fact that not one dollar of public money has ever been expended on the harbour of Montreal by the Government of Canada, and Montreal, of all the ports in this Dominion, occupies a unique position in that respect.

Mr. COATSWORTH. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to ask him a question? Did the Government refund the money the people of Montreal spent on the harbour?

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). Not one cent of the money expended by the people of Montreal upon their harbour has ever been refunded by the Government of Canada, nor has any request ever been made to the Government of Canada for the refund of any portion of that money. I am coming to the point on which, I think, my hon. friend has been somewhat confused. It is with regard to the assumption by the Government in 1889 of the debt incurred by the harbour commissioners of Montreal for the deepening of the channel between Quebec and that port. Why did the Government assume that debt? What was the strong impelling reason? Was it in the interest of the harbour of Montreal? It was no more so than the proposed deepening of the canals which the hon. gentlemen have advocated to-day would be in the interest of the port of Toronto, or the port of Hamilton, or any other port on the upper lakes; but in the interest of Canada as a whole.

Mr. DENISON. Nobody objects to the expenditure.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). No, but there seems to be a misconception as to the position of Montreal in relation to that expenditure. If there is any competition with regard to the traffic on the St. Lawrence River, it is between the port of Quebec and the port of Montreal; yet, notwithstanding the fact that vessels entering the port of Montreal were subject, down to 1889, to wharfage charges on goods and to tonnage dues, which were rendered necessary for the payment of interest on the expenditure for deepening the Lake St. Peter Channel, practically the whole foreign commerce of the St. Lawrence had centred in the port of Montreal as against the port of Quebec. Now, it is well known that the imports at the port of Montreal are not for local consumption. Practically the whole import trade of Ontario and of the North-west passes through the port of Montreal; and my point is that if wharfage dues are imposed on goods landed at the port of Montreal, or if a tonnage tax is levied on vessels entering that port, these taxes fall, not on the local trade of the port, but on the commerce of western Canada as a whole, and that the Government assumed that debt, not in the interest of the port of Montreal, but with the view of promoting the commerce of the country at large. When I stated that not a dollar of public money went to the port of Montreal, I referred to the harbour proper, and my statement in that respect will be found to be absolutely correct. Now, the competition which the St. Lawrence route has to-day is a competition with American routes, and I regret to say that up to this time we have not succeeded nearly as well as we had reason at one time to expect, in meeting the competition of the Erie Canal and the American lines of railway. I should be delighted, if the expenditure were not too large, to see our canals deepened to 20 feet. In the meantime, however, I have a more pressing and practical proposition to make—that is the speedy completion of the deepening of the canals to a depth of 14 feet, and the immediate cheapening of the cost of transportation from the vast lakes of the north and west, to the ports of Montreal and Quebec. Even if this Parliament should approve of the undertaking to deepen our canals to the depth of 20 feet, it would, according to the experience of the past, take fifteen or twenty years before we could hope to achieve that result. But the proposal to cheapen the cost of transportation, besides entailing an infinitely less charge on the Government than is involved in the larger and more important scheme, if you will, has this other advantage, that it can immediately be put into effect. If canal tolls were abolished, if the harbour of Montreal were treated with the fairness accorded to every other harbour in Canada, the Government would have to refund to the Montreal Harbour Commissioners a sum of money or make allowance to them of an amount which would put that Commission in a position to remit practically all the wharfage dues. When the Government assumed the Lake St. Peter channel debt, the Montreal Harbour Commission abolished all the tonnage dues—and if the wharfage dues, which constitute a charge, not so much to the detriment of Montreal as a city, as a detriment to the commerce of Canada and the St. Lawrence route, were removed, the cost of transportation would be appreciably lessened. That would relieve the St. Lawrence of a very serious handicap and be of incalculable advantage to Canada in her efforts to successfully compete with the Erie Canal for the traffic which goes out in such enormous quantities from Lakes Superior and Michigan. I have no desire to prolong discussion, but simply arose to remove a misapprehension as to the relations of the port of Montreal towards the Government in the matter of expenditure, which seems to exist in the minds of hon. gentlemen.

Mr. MARTIN. This question of deeper canals is certainly one of very great importance to Manitoba and the Territories. The present low prices for grain necessitate a consideration of the question of how the people of that portion of Canada are to continue growing grain. We have already discussed the question whether, owing to the low prices of grain, they should not give up growing it to so great an extent, and go into mixed farming. However, it has not transpired that any product can be grown in Manitoba or the Territories, which will not, in the end, have to find its market in the old country, so that no matter whether our people continue to produce wheat or whether they breed cattle, the transportation problem still faces them. No doubt, efforts have been made, and will be made, to diversify farming, but, after all, under present conditions, we shall have, for some years, to depend very largely on the growth of wheat. Therefore, every question which respects the cost of transportation is one of very great importance. I may say that at present a large proportion of the wheat that goes to Liverpool from Manitoba and the Territories goes via the port of New York. The price of wheat in Liverpool at present is nearly twice as much as that obtained by the farmers in the North-west. About 45 cents per bushel may be considered the average price this season for wheat, but the average price for the same kind of wheat in Liverpool has been 90 cents. So that it has cost the farmer just exactly as much more as he has been able to get for his wheat to transport it to Liverpool. The people there are under the impression that even under present circumstances and with the present transportation facilities, the cost of transportation is too great. They are convinced that 45 cents a bushel is too much to pay for taking wheat from that country to Liverpool. I believe that a part of this enormous freight charge is caused by the wheat being shipped via New York. It is well known that the standard of wheat grown in Manitoba and the North-west is very considerably higher than the ordinary standard adopted in the American market. Our wheat which passes through New York and is handled by the grain men of New York suffers from being traded in on the basis of the lower grades of American wheat, so that we do not get that benefit from our better quality which we ought to get, and which we would get if we could send our wheat to Liverpool direct. Now, nothing would probably have a more beneficial effect than the transportation of wheat in ships from our Lake Superior ports direct to Liverpool. This cannot be done without involving the question which the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Denison) has brought before the House. It has always been one of the complaints of the farmers of the North-west that their wheat does not reach Liverpool in its natural state, but is always more or less mixed with inferior grades, grown either in eastern Canada or the United States; and in that way, while the quality of the wheat is used in order to bring up the average of the inferior grade with which it is mixed, the result is that the speculators, the dealers in wheat, get the advantage of the better quality rather than the farmer who grows it. Special attention has been drawn to this feature of the trade in very recent times by the construction of what are called whaleback steamers. It is known by experiment that those steamers are a great success, that they are very advantageous in carrying articles in bulk like wheat, and that if a whaleback steamer could leave a Lake Superior point and go direct to Liverpool without transshipment, there would be a very great saving in the cost of transportation. In this connection, the question of our present transportation facilities naturally comes to the front. It is the very strong impression of the people of Manitoba and the Territories that the present cost of transportation by railways is greater than it ought to be. The Canadian Pacific Railway Company contend that they have reduced the rates to the lowest possible point. Of course it is true, Mr. Speaker, that very considerable reductions have been made from time to time, since the Canadian Pacific Railway was completed from Manitoba to Fort William, in the price of carrying wheat from that country to the Lake Superior port. A reduction was made very recently. Still, in spite of that, we continue to feel that the prices are greater than the wheat will stand; that, unless the cost of transportation can be reduced and reduced very considerably, it will not pay the farmers of that country to produce wheat for export. Unfortunately, in this matter of freight rates, we have to deal entirely with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. It must be admitted at once that they more, perhaps, than any one else, except the people who are actually resident in Manitoba, are deeply interested in the development of that country. If we could get, as Canada has expected we would get, a large and comparatively sudden increase in our population in that portion of Canada, it would be a very great benefit indeed to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. They have told us in the most emphatic terms that they are unable to reduce the rates below the present figure. I say, Mr. Speaker, that it is unfortunate in the interests of the people of Canada generally, that we are compelled, in this matter, to deal with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and to accept as final the statements and decision of that company. I would draw the attention of the House to the fact that this matter was discussed in this House at some length when the Canadian Pacific Railway charter was before it for ratification, and to the fact that a gentleman sitting on this side of the House, a member of the Liberal party of Canada, took the stand that there should be inserted in the Canadian Pacific Railway contract a clause which would give the Government the control over the freight rates of this company. On the 26th of January, 1881, a resolution was moved by Mr. Béchard covering a number of points, but including this one:

That it be resolved that the Governor in Council should have the unrestricted right from time to time to regulate the tolls to be taken and to prescribe the accommodation to be given.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if that clause had been inserted in the contract made with the Canadian Pacific Railway syndicate in 1881, we should be in a position to-day to lay our case before the Governor in Council and thus have an appeal to a body which, it is to be hoped, might consider independently and decide as between the conflicting claims of the settlers in that country and the railway company. As it is there is no such appeal. The contract contains a clause which practically puts it out of the power of the Parliament of Canada or the Government of Canada, for all time to come, to interfere in any way with the question of freight rates upon the Canadian Pacific Railway, unless we are prepared to violate that contract. One of these clauses makes this provision—that the Governor in Council may control the freight rates of the company, but only after a dividend of 10 per cent has been paid upon the capital of the company. Now, Mr. Speaker, it is well-known to this House that the stock of the company was issued at 25 cents on the dollar; and, therefore, under that clause, the company must make the profit of 40 per cent upon the money which actually went into the railway before the Governor in Council can interfere in this question of freight rates. Thus it seems very clear that Parliament, by its own action, has for ever placed the question of governmental interference with the rates of this company beyond its powers. Therefore, I say—unfortunately for us and unfortunately for Canada—in considering this question, we must accept as final the decision of the company. That decision has been given to us finally, and it is one in which we see little or no hope for ourselves. In this connection, I might draw attention to the fact that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company have, to a very considerable extent, abandoned the great international line through Canada and have constructed and are now operating, practically as their main line from ocean to ocean, a line which, coming east, leaves Canada at a point south of Regina and does not again enter Canada until Sault Ste. Marie is reached. This is a matter of very great importance in connection with the question of freight rates and in connection with the question of developing the North-west. The Sault line, which is controlled by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, is now fully constructed and in operation. The branch which connects with the Sault line leaves the main line at a place called Pasqua, within a few miles of Moose Jaw, which is west of Regina; and the line with which it connects passes on down through the states of North Dakota and Minnesota to Minneapolis and St. Paul, and thence, through Minnesota, Wisconsin and Michigan, to Sault Ste. Marie. I think I can safely say that the great bulk of the through travel, the China and Japan travel which has been so much spoken of in this House and in the country as one of the great benefits the people of Canada were to derive from the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, now passes down through the United States over this Sault line. I may say that in Winnipeg we find a very considerable difference in the traffic passing over the Canadian Pacific line. It is stated, Mr. Speaker, and not denied, that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company give very much lower rates to the people of these states through which the Sault road passes than they give to the people of the North-west. Practically the Canadian Pacific Railway Company has been enabled to purchase, control and extend the Sault line by reason of the position in which they have been placed and the credit given them by the large bonuses given them by the people of Canada. It is, therefore, most unfortunate and most discouraging to those of us who have gone to the North-west and to Manitoba to endeavour to develop that portion of Canada, to find that, after all the immense sums in money, in land and in completed railways, that have been given to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, we are at a disadvantage as compared with those states to the south of us in this matter of freight rates. Coming back, however, to the question of deepening the canals, I may say that I shall have great pleasure in supporting the resolution of the hon. member for West Toronto. I may draw the attention of the House to this fact: that not only are we in Manitoba and the Territories vitally interested in a question of this kind, which is likely to give us cheaper transportation, but the people of the northern states are also vitally interested in this question; and it appears to me that in view of the immense expenditure that will be necessary, our Government should endeavour to obtain co-operation and a joint expenditure with our friends to the south. I may say that conventions were held in 1891 and 1892 on this subject. The first one was held at Grand Forks, in North Dakota, and the second one in St. Paul, Minnesota. I have already referred to them in this House in connection with the subject of reciprocity. While reciprocity was the prominent question discussed at those conventions, this question of deepening the canal highway from Lake Superior to the Atlantic Ocean was also discussed, and resolutions on the line of the one now presented by the hon. gentleman from Toronto were carried almost unanimously. I may mention that one gentleman, Mr. S. A. Thompson, of Duluth, who has made this question of canal development a special study, was not able to agree with the resolution which, however, met with the otherwise unanimous approval of the convention. Mr. Thompson was of the opinion that it was the duty of the United States to provide a canal system through its own territory from Lake Superior to the Atlantic Ocean, but he was the only delegate at either of those conventions who took that view. The rest of the delegates representing cities and country districts over the north-western states, were quite willing that a joint arrangement should be made between the two countries for the development of this great trade. It is true that the figures mentioned by the hon. gentleman are somewhat alarming, considering that Canada is already so much in debt; but if it were possible to bring about the joint construction of a system of canals, utilizing those that have already been constructed, the cost to the people of Canada would be very much lightened indeed. It does seem to me that there are really no other objections in the way. At any rate, the people of Manitoba and the North-west are certainly in this position to-day: that unless some relief can be obtained, either in the direction of increased prices for their grain in the markets of the world, or in the increased net prices to them by a reduction in the present heavy cost of transportation, we will have to consider very seriously whether we can continue to raise wheat for export in that country. Therefore, the hon. gentlemen will find that the settlers of that country are with them unanimously upon this question.

Mr. DALY. I would not take up the time of the House in discussing this matter were it not for some remarks that have dropped from the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Martin). We had this question under discussion in this House some two years ago, and in reply to the hon. gentleman who has made this motion to-day, the Minister of Railways and Canals stated, as I have no doubt he will state to-day, that the Government were unable to meet his wishes and the wishes of those who advocate the enlargement of these canals, simply on account of the large expenditure that the scheme would require. If I recollect aright, the Minister of Railways and Canals stated last year, I think, when we were discussing the estimates, that according to the report of his engineers it would take from $130,000,000 to $140,000,000 to enlarge these canals in the way that is advocated by the hon. gentleman who has made this motion, and those who support it. There is no question, as has been stated by the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin), that our people in Manitoba and the North-west are vitally interested in the question of cheap freight rates. I suppose that there is no gentleman in a public position in Manitoba who can speak with more authority upon that point than the hon. member for Winnipeg, as it is a matter of public notoriety that the question of freight rates was discussed from one end of the province to the other some years ago while the hon. gentleman was in opposition to the then Norquay Government. At that time it was stated that the only panacea for our troubles, the only way by which the farmer of Manitoba or the North-west could get out his wheat cheaply was the building of the Hudson Bay Railway. The people of Manitoba are of the same opinion to-day. The hon. gentleman himself was of that opinion, because during the agitation that was then carried on, he and his leader, Mr. Greenway, while in Opposition, advocated on the platforms throughout the length and breadth of the province, and in the Legislature, that the people of Manitoba should burden themselves to the extent of guaranteeing the interest upon $4,500,000 of bonds for the purpose of constructing a railway to Hudson Bay. The hon. gentleman moved a resolution to that effect in the Local House of Assembly, and upon that resolution was based an Act of the Legislature whereby the province of Manitoba undertook to guarantee the bonds of that road to that extent. But I regret to say that when the Harrison Government fell, and the Greenway Government, including the hon. member for Winnipeg, came into power, that hon. gentleman was not so great an advocate of building the Hudson Bay Railway as he had been previously, and he went so far as to say, or to indicate, to the country that the Hudson Bay Railway was not of so great a necessity to Manitoba and the North-west as it was while he was in Opposition, and the reason was that some capitalists in

Mr. DALY.

Winnipeg had become interested in building what was known as the Winnipeg Central Railway. Those men were in negotiation with Mr. Oakes and others, of the Northern Pacific Railway, for the purpose of building this railway. Their idea was that they should have an independent outlet from Winnipeg to the boundary, and that independent line would afford free ingress to the Northern Pacific Railway and the other lines of railway coming there, and by that means they would meet what was then called the excessive freight rates of the Canadian Pacific Railway; that is, this independent line of railway would allow the Northern Pacific and the Great Northern to come into our country, and by that means the freight rates would be decreased. Well, Sir, Mr. McNaught and other members of the Northern Pacific directorate came to Winnipeg on a certain morning when it was not known to the people of Winnipeg that they were about to arrive, and the hon. member for Winnipeg interviewed those gentlemen in their car at 9 o'clock in the morning, and the consequence was that from that day to this the hon. gentleman has not been so zealous an advocate of the Hudson Bay Railway as he was previously. I believe that during the day those gentlemen arrived in Winnipeg they went, in accordance with the request of the men who had brought them there, that is, Manitoba Central people, and interviewed the Government of which the hon. gentleman was a member, and these gentlemen representing the Northern Pacific Railway and the gentlemen representing the Manitoba Central, were in conversation with Premier Greenway in his room, and while they were in course of conversation, the hon. member for Winnipeg, then Commissioner of Railways for Manitoba, entered the room, and was about to back out, expressing his surprise at Mr. Greenway being in conversation with strangers. Mr. Greenway called him back, and said: "Mr. Martin, allow me to introduce you to Mr. McNaught; allow me to introduce you to Mr. Kendricks; allow me to introduce you to Mr. So-and-so." Mr. Martin expressed surprise—

Mr. SPEAKER. I do not understand what connection this has with the motion before the House.

Mr. DALY. I will show you and the House, in a few minutes, what connection it has.

Mr. MARTIN. I may say that the statements the hon. gentleman is making at present are quite untrue.

Mr. DALY. And I say these statements are true, and have been sworn to be true in a court of law.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. DALY. If I am out of order—

Mr. MULOCK. Did not the people of Winnipeg elect him afterwards?

Mr. DALY. The people of Winnipeg are probably sorry they ever did so. The connection that my remarks have with the question before the House is involved in the statement the hon. gentleman made in his speech with regard to the reduction of freight rates, and I want to establish the fact, by the statements I am about to make, that the hon. gentleman is not a sincere advocate of the reduction of freight rates.

Mr. LAURIER. Order.

Mr. DALY. Well, Mr. Speaker, if I am out of order I will come back to where I was.

Mr. SPEAKER. I allowed the hon. gentleman to refer to freight rates on the Canadian Pacific Railway, because I understood him to advocate the motion before the House as a remedy for the high rates now existing over that road, and that operate prejudicially to the interests of the people of the North-west.

Mr. DALY. It was exactly on that line that I was about to continue my remarks. The people of Manitoba were desirous, as they are now, to secure a reduction in freight rates, and they thought they were about to secure that reduction by the construction of an independent line of railway into the province of Manitoba. The hon. gentleman advocated the building of the Hudson Bay Railway up to a certain point, and he then dropped the scheme. That scheme was supposed to give our people lower freight rates, but he drops that scheme, and he enters into negotiations with other gentlemen whereby they make a contract with the Government of Manitoba, of which he is a member and he and the principal other members of the Government give the people of Manitoba distinctly to understand that the negotiations they had entered into with that railway are such as would give lower freight rates to the people of Manitoba and the Territories. I was going on to say that, notwithstanding the statement made by the hon. gentleman to the people of Manitoba, notwithstanding the fact that Mr. Greenway, the leader of the Government of which he was a member, stated from his place on the floor of the Legislature that he had a letter in his desk from Mr. Oakes, president of the Northern Pacific Railway, to the effect that the rates of freight would be reduced, it appeared from the letter, which was subsequently produced, that no such reduction would be made, and that the full promise which Mr. Greenway could make for Mr. Oakes was that the rates on the Northern Pacific would be identical with the rates on the Canadian Pacific. I regret if I have, in the slightest degree, travelled out of the bounds of debate and have been out of order, but I have been showing that the hon. member for Winnipeg was not as sincere in times past in his advocacy of a reduction of freight rates as he has been to-day.

Mr. LAURIER. I rise to a point of order. I ask your ruling, Mr. Speaker, whether it is in order to charge an hon. member with insincerity.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman should not charge insincerity against any member of this House for his action in this House. He has no right to do that.

Mr. DALY. I am not charging the hon. member with any insincerity in his statements made in this House.

Mr. LAURIER. Do I understand that an hon. member can charge insincerity against another hon. member in this House, whether it is in regard to matters in this House or out of it?

Mr. SPEAKER. I draw the attention of the House to this fact, that the line of argument which the hon. Minister of the Interior was following seemed to me to indicate that the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) in view of the opinion he held, was insincere on a former occasion in his action, and it might be implied that he was insincere on the present occasion. If that is the line which the hon. Minister is following, it is out of order, in my opinion.

Mr. DALY. I have not said so. I did not desire to convey any insinuation as to the hon. gentleman's action to-day. I said that on former occasions he had not shown himself so sincere as he had shown himself on this particular occasion.

Mr. SCRIVER. I understood the hon. gentleman to be endeavouring to show that the hon. gentleman was not sincere in his advocacy to-day.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I venture to submit that the observations of the Minister of the Interior are directly in the line of the discussion adopted by the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin). The hon. member for Winnipeg sought to call the attention of the House to the urgency which exists for the adoption of such resolutions for the construction or enlargement of the canals, in order to meet the wants of the people of Manitoba and the North-west. The Minister of the Interior called attention to the fact that this grievance might have been remedied by carrying out a feasible scheme that was before the people in Manitoba, of whom the hon. gentleman was one of the representatives, and that the scheme was frustrated by want of zeal on the part of, or opposition offered by, the hon. member for Winnipeg. It seems to be that his remarks are strictly in point.

Mr. LAURIER. But the hon. First Minister forgets that the hon. Minister of the Interior did not accuse the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) with want of zeal or offering opposition, but he accused him of absolute insincerity, which is quite different.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It is a mere word.

Mr. SPEAKER. My reading of the authorities, and hon. gentlemen will recall them, although I cannot lay my hands on them at this moment, is that the actions of any member outside of the House in his private capacity, or in his capacity, for example, as a justice of the peace, may be referred to, and such reference is not a breach of parliamentary decorum; and from that point of view, as the hon. Minister of the Interior was referring to the hon. gentleman's action in another capacity, and not as a member of the House, it may perhaps not be proper for me to interfere. I will look up the question a little further, and express my opinion a little more explicitly on it on a future occasion.

Mr. McNEILL. The hon. member for Winnipeg was not a member of this House at that time. Would it be out of order to suggest insincerity on the part of a private gentleman twenty years ago, who happens, however, now to be a member of this House?

Mr. LAURIER. My understanding of the rule is, that while reference may be made to the conduct of members outside of this House, it is out of order to charge insincerity against a member of this House.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I think that is the rule, and it will be found to be so laid down in the authorities, and hon. members will find numerous instances of members of Parliament applying for committees with a view to inquiring into charges of that sort. Take the case of Mr. Isaac Butt. Certain charges were made against him and he insisted on an inquiry being held. Then there are similar cases on the part of Mr. O'Donnell and Mr. Parnell. It is a question how far a reflection on character or motives must go to constitute a charge for reference to a committee. If the charge contains no reflection on which to complain, well and good, but if the charge involves a serious reflection on the motives or actions of an hon. member, the House has a right to inquire into it, for, to use the words of Mr. Gladstone, the leader of the House is the guardian of the character of every hon. member, and every reflection on the character of an hon. member reflects on the character of the House.

Mr. McNEILL. I never heard it was out of order to refer to the actions of Mr. Butt before he was a member of the House.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Yes. Take the case of Mr. Mitchell. He was elected, and was expelled, not for anything he did in the House, but for what he had done before he became a member.

Mr. McNEILL. I understood the hon. gentleman to say that the cause of the inquiry was Mr. Butt's character before he entered the House, that it had not been all it should have been. Was that allegation held to be out of order?

Mr. LAURIER. It cannot be out of order to refer to the actions of a member outside of the House, but it is a different matter to attribute to an hon. member, deceit or want of sincerity. It is quite right, however, to say that the hon. member has done this or that, and leave the House to draw its conclusions. What I object to is a reference to the actions of a member in a manner injurious to him.

Mr. DALY. I was pointing out that the conduct of the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin), at the time when he was a member of the Provincial Government, was not consistent with the hon. gentleman's demand to-day that the people of Manitoba and the North-west should have cheap freight rates. That time, when the people of Manitoba had the opportunity of getting a line of railway into that country which would cause competition to the Canadian Pacific Railway and would give lower freight rates, has passed by. The hon. gentleman, as a member of the Greenway Government, had then an opportunity of making an arrangement with the Northern Pacific Railway people or with the Great Northern Railway, that would have enabled our people in Manitoba to obtain lower freight rates. But the hon. gentleman did not see fit, nor did the Government of which he was a member see fit, to take advantage of their opportunity. I say that his conduct is not consistent with that of a person desirous to obtain the cheaper freight rates of which the hon. gentleman has spoken to-day. I regret, Mr. Speaker, that any remarks I may have made have been construed into a desire to evade the rules of this House, because no person is more anxious than I to act in conformity with those rules. It may be, however, as it has been indicated in other places, that some difficulty may arise in connection with the career of the hon. gentleman in Manitoba which may necessitate discussion in this House, and at such times one may seem to be out of order when there is no wish on his part to controvert the rules. I repeat that the one and only opportunity which in my mind the people of Manitoba or the North-west have of getting cheaper freight rates, or of obtaining that competition in railroads which they should have; is in the building of the Hudson Bay Railway. I say that the Government of this country, and the members of this Parliament have shown their sincerity in their endeavour to procure the building of that line of railway. I hope and trust sincerely that in the course of a few months the promoters of that railroad will be in a position to announce that they have acquired the necessary capital for its building. I appreciate the fact, however, that if the canals were deepened in the manner indicated by the motion of the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Denison), that that would be a measure of relief to our people ; but as the cost is estimated at $100,000,000 or $130,000,000 or $140,000,000, I am afraid that the time is far distant when we will be able to undertake that project. In the case of the Hudson Bay Railway, this Government has already given a land grant and has subsidized that road to the extent of $80,000 a year for twenty years, and the Local Government has upon its statute-books to-day an amended offer of aid to that railway. I believe that with the aid which has been voted by this House, and with the aid which has been given by the Local Government, according to its amended offer, there is now an opportunity for that railway to be built.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. COCKBURN. I regret, Mr. Speaker, that I was unavoidably prevented from being present this afternoon and of having had the pleasure of listening to the speech by which the motion now before the House was introduced by my hon. friend who has the honour to represent the constituency of West Toronto (Mr. Denison). I have no doubt that he did full justice to the subject, and I am placed in a rather embarrassing position, in not having had the pleasure of hearing his remarks nor the remarks of those gentlemen who so ably followed him ; I am accordingly in the predicament of perhaps being obliged to repeat statements or arguments with which the House may be already familiar. At the same time, I believe the subject to be so important, that even if I should be guilty of repetition, I trust the House will pardon me, believing as I do, that on so important a subject the arguments cannot be too often brought home to our minds. The motion before the House is :

That whereas the canal now in course of construction by the Government of the Dominion, at Sault Ste. Marie, is to have a depth of twenty feet, which is the depth of navigable water from Port Arthur to Port Colborne, it is, in the opinion of this House, expedient that the same policy should be adopted as regards the St. Lawrence and that the Soulanges Canal now being constructed, together with the St. Lawrence Canals and the channel of the river, where necessary, should be deepened to a uniform depth of twenty feet.

This is apparently a very large motion, and it might involve a very large expenditure. However, we are not asked now to incur that expenditure, but simply to pronounce upon a policy ; and perhaps if we had adopted such a policy earlier than the present day, the country might have been saved several millions of dollars which it has already expended on these canals. The question for us now is : would it pay to incur such a large expenditure as may be necessary to carry out this great project ? Before we can come to any definite conclusion on such a matter as the interest which may be received from the investment, it becomes necessary to look at what is the traffic, present or prospective, on the waterways which we propose to deepen. Taking the season of navigation for the year 1891,—and I will quote particularly from the statistics of the United States as I have been able to avail myself of these, and they seem to be more complete and minute than ours,—there were carried on the great lakes some 30,299,000 tons of freight. This, Sir, seems a colossal amount and when we think of thirty millions of tons the imagination fails to conjure up the vast quantity of freight which was so carried. If we were to take the whole of this freight and load it into railway cars of the capacity of fifteen tons each, it would represent four tracks of railroad covered in continuous line with freight cars from New York to San Francisco ; and not only that, but it would leave over sufficient cars to cover a double track from New York to Chicago. The value of this thirty millions tons of freight was $342,522,290 ; the average distance that this freight was carried on the lakes was about 566 miles, making the total mileage of our lake traffic for the year of seventeen billions one hundred and fifty millions. The total freight service rendered to the public by all the railroads in the United States, as certified to in the second annual report of the Interstate Commerce Commission for that year, was almost exactly four times the amount—68,727 million—in round numbers, 69 billions of ton miles. So that the freight service rendered to the people of the United States by the traffic of the great lakes during that year, 1891, was one-fourth of the whole traffic rendered by all the railroads of the United States combined. We find accordingly that the number of vessels built to accommodate this traffic has been immensely increased. I find that there were only six steel vessels on the lakes in 1866, with a total tonnage of 6,459 tons, with a valuation of $694,000, whereas five years afterwards there were 89 steel vessels, with a total tonnage of 127,624 tons and a valuation of $14,502,500, with 32 being built, to be completed that year. Now, Sir, the question is as to the saving ; because, of course, unless we can show that there is some probability of there being a fair return to the country, I do not think my hon. friend would be disposed to push the question. The saving to the public by lake transportation is best shown by comparing it with the cheapest transportation to be had by rail. According to the report of the Sault Ste. Marie canal, 9,041,213 tons of freight passed through that canal in the year 1890, which was carried at an average cost to the shipper of 1.03 mill—say 1½ mill—per ton per mile. The average cost to the shipper, by rail transportation, is put in the report of the United States Interstate Commerce Commission at 9·22 mills—say 9¼ mills—per ton per mile. But in looking at the reports of the Erie railroad, which does a large business in carrying coal, I find that its lowest rate per ton per mile is 5·4 mills. So you may say that 5 mills per ton per mile is the lowest rate charged by one of the largest and best equipped lines in the United States for through freight. If, then, I take the amount of freight that was carried by water through the St. Mary's canal, and suppose that it had been carried by rail, not at 9¼ mills, the average rate, but at the very lowest rate, 5·02 mills per ton per mile. It would have cost the shippers $36,182,428. Therefore, the saving to the public in a single year on the Lake Superior traffic alone was some $26,710,213. If I apply the same comparison to the entire freight traffic on the lakes, I find that if all that was carried by the vessels on those lakes had been carried by rail at the low figure of 5·02 mills per ton per mile, it would have cost the shippers $86,088,171; but the entire cost of carrying that freight by water was $22,294,008; so that there was saved to the public in one year no less than $63,792,163, a sum declared by engineers to be about sufficient to make all the alterations and repairs to the canal system, which are demanded by my hon. friend. These are startling facts, Sir, and they are facts which we must take into cognizance. When we look at that immense traffic we find that there is a stoppage of two-thirds or more of it hanging, so to speak, over the Falls of Niagara; the vessels are unable to proceed further. The canal accommodation provided is not such as to allow them to pass, and accordingly we find, when we look at the lakes, a contrast in the size of the cities. On Lake Ontario we have Rochester and Oswego on the American side; but when we go to Lake Erie, where the large ships are able to move from lake to lake, we find such large cities as Buffalo, Cleveland, Detroit, Sandusky and Toledo, and in the other lakes, opening up to new life, such cities as Bay City, Milwaukee, Chicago and Duluth. These facts show us how much can be done by river or canal navigation in the way of cheapening the transportation of products to markets. We have spent millions and millions of dollars in opening up our great North-west, and so far, comparatively, we have not achieved any very signal success. The difficulty in which the farmer is placed at present in the North-west is a very simple one. The price of his products is very low, lower than it has ever been before. He has to bear the competition of the cheap labour of the Argentine Republic, of India and of Russia; he is very far indeed from the ultimate market of Europe; he goes into partnership, as one gentleman puts it, with the Canadian Pacific Railway, or some other railway, and gets his 35 cents a bushel for his grain, and gives 35 cents to the railway to take it to the seaboard. It is worth double at the seaboard what it was when it left his farm. Now, the question I want to put to the House is: are we not able to lighten the burden of the farmers and to enrich our own country by framing a policy which will eventually open up a cheap means of bringing the farmers' produce to the seaboard? I do not at present calculate on the celebrated and traditional 640,000,000 bushels of wheat, though I think I can see far enough into the future to indulge in that fancy. I have no doubt that once we can materially cheapen the freights, we will give such an impetus to the growth of wheat and to the development of our North-west that places that are now comparatively deserted, will gradually be filled up; because, owing to the great difference in the cost of transporting grain or other products by water—at one-eighth, certainly one-seventh of the price by rail—I think the farmers or would-be farmers would flock into that country. To take an illustration: here is a wheat farm, we will say, of 160 acres, yielding an average of 15 bushels to the acre. I might say 20 bushels, but as my hon. friends opposite are sticklers in regard to the development of the North-west, I will put it moderately, and say 15. Well, by the water course the farmer will certainly be able to save 5 cents per bushel in the transport, including something in return freights, besides two or three rehandlings.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Will my hon. friend be good enough to tell what is the present rate of freight from Duluth to Montreal, if he knows?

Mr. COCKBURN. I regret very much that I am unable to tell the hon. gentleman.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). And how much we would save.

Mr. COCKBURN. I will say this much, there is no doubt that grain or merchandise can be carried by water at one-fifth of what it can be carried by land, and I say that if a farmer in Manitoba with 160 acres of wheat raises an average of 15 bushels to the acre, and in the whole he saves 5 cents per bushel, on this computation he would make 75 cents per acre, which for his 160 acres will leave in his pocket $120, or 12½ per cent added to his profits.

Mr. MILLS. (Bothwell). The whole 160 acres under crop every year?

Mr. COCKBURN. I am supposing that he has 160 acres of his farm under wheat. Others may have 320, others 480, others may have less. Whatever quantity they have, if they are making 5 cents on every bushel, they are adding 12½ per cent to their profit, and are doing well. And we will be opening up a market, not only to the North-west, but to the Ontario farmer for his fruits, and meats, and vegetables, by steamers with cold storage. We will be also opening up a market to the Maritime Provinces by furnishing them with a cheap and speedy means of sending to Ontario their coal, minerals and other products.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman says there will be a saving of 5 cents a bushel. Does he mean as against the present navigation?

Mr. COCKBURN. I mean the saving altogether, as I have just explained, by water communication and the enlargement of the canals. I am speaking of a vessel going from Fort William or any other harbour on Lake Superior direct to Paris or London or Liverpool or anywhere else in Europe, and I am contrasting that system with the present one, with no return freights and the expense of two or three rehandlings. I say that under this deepening of the canal and river system, the advantage given to the farmer in freight would altogether be about 5 cents per bushel, and if you take every wheat farm at 160 acres, there is a gain of $120. And as my hon. friend is given to calculation, let him, if he pleases to indulge his fancy and take the proverbial 640,000,000 acres, and multiply them by the profit per acre, and he will find what a bonanza he would have. I say that such a canal and river and lake system would be the means of binding the provinces of the Dominion more closely together. It would enable us to get from the Maritime Provinces their coal and other minerals and products, and in return we could send our shipping down there with our goods. More than that, it would enable us to greatly cheapen freights—and I draw the attention of the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) to that fact—because those same vessels that are now locked up all winter in our frozen ice-bound ports, would then be free to earn their livelihood in the West Indies or the Mediterranean or elsewhere. So that instead of having our capital locked up six months of the year, we would have it free and earning a revenue during the whole twelve months. We would then be able to make our freights so much cheaper from Fort William or Duluth, as to rejoice the heart of my philosophical friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills), when he would see the enormous reduction; and instead of quarrelling with me about a petty 5 cents per bushel, you would perhaps find him insisting on a still greater reduction. We are all aware of the enormous development which has taken place, and is daily taking place in the traffic on the lakes. So great is this development that during the four years, 1888-1892, there were as many vessels built on the upper lakes as were then plying on these lakes. And this is a progression which is not going to stop. But unfortunately, when these vessels come to Canada, they have to stop there. They cannot jump the Niagara Falls, and the canal offered to them is so narrow and small and incomplete that they find it cheaper to disperse their produce other ways. The sum required will, as no doubt we will be told by the Minister of Railways and Canals, be a very large one. We do not propose to ask that that money be spent at present. We simply desire that a policy be formulated, so that in future the House will avoid repeating the blunder of building canals and then having to deepen them no less than three or four times. I should say our canal system should be so deepened that eventually there would be free room for ships drawing 18 to 20 feet of water. We must not approach this matter in a narrow or sectional spirit. I am speaking now, not simply for Toronto or the interests of Toronto. I am taking a larger view of the subject. I have shown how this would benefit the North-west. I have shown how it would open up a closer communication with our dear brethren in the Maritime Provinces. I have shown how it would tend to build up along Lake Ontario cities of a size somewhat similar to those we see lining the great Lake Erie, such as Buffalo, Toledo, and Cleveland. And apart from all that, really lake Superior has now become a lake in which we have a more particular interest. The Canadian Pacific Railway has opened this vast water-shed—a water-shed draining 475,000 square miles of territory; and I trust that no pessimistic or despairing spirit, that no anticipation of blue ruin, will prevent us from entering on this discussion in a fair and candid spirit. Happily it is one of those discussions in which politics should certainly be altogether absent; and I have no doubt that when my hon. friends opposite rise up to discuss this question, they will join with me in thinking that instead of doing, as we have done in the past, spending our money in making little canals and then enlarging them every few years, we should rise to the conception of our own position and nobility of purpose and the great future that awaits us, and build our canals in such a way that they shall be second to none. So that when our great North-west is filled up and we have these canals opened up to bring our coal and other minerals and products from the Maritime Provinces, we may feel that we are indeed one people, bound to secure for ourselves a heritage and a future of which we may all be proud.

Mr. HAGGART. The House must have derived considerable instruction from the interesting debate which has arisen on the motion of my hon. friend from East Toronto (Mr. Denison). Anything which will tend to decrease freights from the great lakes to the St. Lawrence must increase the value of all property from a line a good deal south of Chicago over to the Pacific slope and thence to the Atlantic coast. The decreasing of freights in any manner by a legitimate expenditure, or an expenditure which could be justified, would tend to the benefit of every piece of property in that district which I have described. The first thing to be considered is the amount of the expenditure necessary to accomplish that object. In reply to the hon. member for Grey (Mr. Sproule), I agree with him that there is no work of public improvement in the country which tends more to keep down and regulate the prices of railway transport than the building of canals. The figures which the hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Cockburn) has given—the comparison of prices between the cost of transport by water and rail shows at a glance how much cheaper it is to send material by water than by railway. The comparison of figures from United States statistics, produced by my hon. friends, shows that the average per ton per mile is only one and a third mill for water navigation and over nine mills for carriage by rail. This shows the enormous decrease in the cost of transportation by water as compared with the cost by rail. That fact alone would seem to be sufficient to induce us, if we could by a reasonable expenditure, to reduce the cost of carrying freight upon those great waters, the immense traffic upon which has been so graphically described by my hon. friend from West Toronto (Mr. Denison), who has shown the immense quantity of material transported from the upper lakes to Buffalo, a large portion of which traffic perhaps might be diverted to our own waters. The hon. member for East Toronto (Mr. Coatsworth) stated that it would be a benefit to Toronto and the upper lakes to deepen the canals to a depth of 20 feet on the mitre sills, and that if this were done it would induce the ocean vessels to carry their freight up to the ports of the lakes. I rather differ from my hon. friend, because I think most of the vessels carrying freights to Montreal have a greater draft than 20 feet, so that they could not use the canals even with the improvements suggested by the hon. member for West Toronto. If the hon. gentleman from East Toronto had looked more carefully at the report which he quoted so extensively, he would have seen enough to convince him that it is cheaper for those large ocean vessels to transfer their cargoes to smaller vessels, making their way up through the canals than for them to carry their cargoes, even if they had the necessary depth of water, because of the large spars and the great number of men employed in these great vessels.

Mr. GIBSON. Besides the dangers of navigation.

Mr. HAGGART. And the dangers of navigation also. The vessels making use of the canals have lighter spars and few men to manage them, and, all things considered, it is cheaper for them to transfer their cargoes than it would be for them to carry them to inland ports even if the necessary depth of water would be supplied.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Where then would be the gain as against the present navigation?

Mr. HAGGART.

Mr. HAGGART. I will speak of the point raised by the hon. gentleman in a moment. My hon. friend from West Toronto quoted from the remarks of the president of the Great Northern Railway, showing the advantages of completing the 20-foot navigation from the upper lakes to the port of Montreal. That gentleman seems to have understood the question thoroughly well. His object of deepening the channel was to allow the vessels plying between Buffalo and Duluth or Port Arthur to get to the port of Montreal for the purpose of unloading their freight and transferring it to the ocean vessels. I think that the report of the commission as well as the remarks of the president of the Great Northern Railway make it clear that there is no probability that the attempt will be made to deepen the channel so as to induce ocean vessels to navigate the lakes. In fact there is no commercial use in building a canal to a depth of more than 20 feet to the port of Montreal, for the simple reason that it could not be used by ocean vessels and its only purpose would be to enable the vessels on the lakes drawing 20 feet to get access to the port of Montreal. The question then is simply whether it would be a sufficient benefit to this country to induce us to make the large expenditure that would be required in order to deepen the canals to the extent I have mentioned. First, in order to carry out the works already designed to provide a 14-foot navigation to Montreal, it will require an expenditure of ten or twelve million dollars. This expenditure would not be necessary if the project of the hon. gentleman were carried out and the canals made of a depth of 20 feet on the mitre sills. I have not heard in the present debate anything of the size or construction of the locks that would be necessary with this system of navigation. I am quite in the dark as to what would be required if ocean vessels were making use of the 20-foot navigation. Our present locks are 225 feet long, 45 feet wide, and 14 feet deep on the mitre sills. With a 20-foot navigation, it would require locks of between four and five hundred feet long, with a breadth of 60 feet, and, of course, 20 feet on the mitre sills in order to insure perfect navigation between Montreal and the upper lakes. In the different stretches on the canal it would require a depth of water of from 22 to 23 feet; for a vessel drawing 20 feet of water, even if she is not going at speed, has a tendency to lessen the depth of the water, and would strike with anything less than 22 to 23 feet. Such a system would require a prism of water much greater than at present. There would have to be a width at the bottom of 100 feet, and, at the top from 150 to 160 feet. A great many things must be considered besides the mere depth if we are to arrive at a fair estimate of the cost. What effect would the enlarging of that prism have upon Lake Ontario? Engineers tell us that one reason for the decrease of water at Chicago and Milwaukee is the deepening of the stretches on the Detroit River.

How much greater would the effect be upon the waters of Lake Ontario by making the prism we have spoken of on the St. Lawrence route? That is a matter that can be calculated. So far as the cost is concerned, the engineers of my department calculate that a system of 20-foot navigation from Lake Ontario to Montreal would cost $60,000,000. From that deduct $10,000,000 or $12,000,000, the amount required for the system of 14-foot navigation, and you find the net expenditure, say $48,000,000. After the canal was deepened to the depth of 20 feet, and the vessels got into Lake Ontario, you would have to deepen every port on Lake Ontario from Kingston up to the mouth of the Welland Canal. The present depth of water at most of those ports, and we have to expend more money for the purpose of completing that depth in some ports, is in the neighbourhood of 14 feet. To increase the depth to 23 feet, which would be necessary in order that the canal could be of any use whatever to the ports along Lake Ontario, would entail an enormous additional expenditure. The hon. gentleman who has introduced the motion intends at present to stop at Lake Ontario; I suppose he is leaving it a moot question for the Government to decide whether we will make the Georgian Bay Canal and follow a system of water stretches into the port of Toronto, or whether we will deepen the Welland Canal. I do not know what expenditure would be required for the purpose of making the Georgian Bay Canal, but there is another rival in the scheme, as we have heard tonight from the junior member for Ottawa (Sir James Grant). He contends that the Ottawa line is the proper one to adopt for the purpose of tapping the upper lakes, that the distance is a great deal shorter, and the advantages for navigation, he says, are all in the direction of the Ottawa Ship Canal. However, leaving that aside for the present, the deepening of the Welland Canal to 20 feet on the mitre sill would require another expenditure of $30,000,000. Then you get into Port Colborne, and from there up to Port Arthur there is not a single port in which a vessel could enter drawing 20 feet of water. The expenditure for deepening the canal to a prism of 20 feet would entail an expenditure of $90,000,000, or, deducting the amount which is at present to be expended on the St. Lawrence Canal, an expenditure in the neighbourhood of seventy-eight million dollars. As I stated last year, and the year before, the whole scheme of deepening the waters to the requisite depth of 20 feet prism would entail an expenditure of 130 or 140 million dollars. That would still be independent of the expenditure that would be required in the different harbours along the route. A gentleman who promoted a scheme of constructing a canal, making use of a portion of the Welland Canal, or the upper stretch of it, and going into the Niagara River, completing 21 foot navigation from there to Montreal, estimated the expenditure in the neighbourhood of $150,000,000. Well, in view of the present reduction in the tariff, and the present expenditures by the Government, I do not know where we are to find $100,000,000 for this undertaking. It is true, the hon. gentleman tells us, that this is only for the future, that we should begin first of all to build the Soulanges Canal to a depth of 20 feet on the mitre sill, and afterwards proceed from year to year until the whole navigation was completed to a 20-foot depth. As I said before, I do not see any necessity for it, I do not think that an expenditure of that kind would be justified. The only justification for deepening the canals to that depth would be the utilization of these stretches by ocean-going steamers; but, from the report of the commission, and from the testimony of parties who are engaged in seafaring life, we come to the conclusion that, after shippers get to the port of Montreal, it would be better in all respects to unload their cargo and transfer it to the vessels of which I have spoken. I have not been able to see, after listening attentively to the hon. gentlemen advocating this scheme, in what material manner we would be expending this large sum of money. The hon. member for Centre Toronto says we would save 50 cents a bushel in the transfer and handling of our wheat from Port Arthur to Montreal.

Mr. DENISON. To Liverpool without transshipment.

Mr. HAGGART. Well, I have shown the hon. gentleman that in case of a vessel loading with wheat in Port Arthur, it would cost a great deal more to take it all the way through the St. Lawrence and over to Liverpool, than to unload at Montreal. The channel of the St. Lawrence has been deepened until vessels drawing 20 feet of water are able to sail up to Montreal. Why does not the hon. gentleman propose a scheme by which ocean vessels, drawing 20 feet, could navigate the inland waters. The report of the commission justified, I think, the expenditure for the purpose of constructing those waterways to the depth of 14 feet, or, at most, 16 feet on the mitre sill of the locks. I think that any greater depth than that would cause the lowering of the lakes so that it would be impossible to utilize the existing navigation over the whole route. We could not retain sufficient water unless, perhaps, by damming a portion of the St. Lawrence, and that would render us liable to damages which, after the experience we have had of making a dyke at the foot of Lake St. Louis, would be enormous; in fact, the whole cost of the canal would be nothing compared with the constructive damages to which we would be liable. On these grounds, I do not see my way clear to recommend any large expenditure of this kind. The question of lowering the lakes by deepening the river itself is a point which has to be carefully considered. It is a question whether the reduction in the freights would be sufficient to justify any such expenditure. As I have already remarked, we have made a reduction by our new tariff of the burdens upon the people in the way of taxation, we have promised an era of economy, and I think the Finance Minister would almost faint at the prospect of increasing the debt by 80 or 100 million dollars. While upon this subject, I may refer to some remarks of the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin). He says that if the Government had properly looked after the interests of the country when they entered into a contract with the Canadian Pacific Railway, we might have remedied all the ills of which the western people complain in the way of heavy freight rates which they have to pay at present. I would remind the hon. gentleman that there has been on the Statute-book from 1868 to 1888, a promise made to every railway company, and to every person investing money in a railway enterprise, that there shall be no lessening of the tolls charged by that railway until after 15 per cent upon the capital has been paid, and that was reduced from 15 to 10 per cent in the contract made with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. Does the hon. gentleman propose to throw upon the Government the whole responsibility for that state of affairs? Does he not know that from 1870 to 1878, there was an offer to any company constructing a railway in Canada, that they would be entitled to 15 per cent on their investments, before the Governor in Council could make a reduction of their tolls? Did not his own friends make that offer? They offered capitalists throughout the country who would construct this railway, not only a certain number of millions of acres of land in excess of what the Canadian Pacific Railway Company ever got, but a large sum of money besides; and I suppose they held the promise out to that company as it remained upon the statute-book all the time—that the Governor in Council could not interfere with the tolls until after 15 per cent had been paid to the stockholders in the shape of dividends. Instead of blaming the Government of the day for entering into a contract with the Canadian Pacific Railway, he should have complimented the Government for having decreased the statutory offer, which had been on the statute-book from 1868 to 1888, allowing the right to reduce the tolls after the company had earned 10 per cent on the capital expended.

Mr. MARTIN. I do not understand that that referred to a Government subsidized railway.

Mr. HAGGART. It referred to all railways. This is the clause:

The Government of Canada may, from time to time, reduce tolls on the railways, but not without the consent of the company or unless the company has earned profits of not less than fifteen per cent per annum on the capital actually expended on its construction, nor unless an examination has been made by the Minister of Public Works of the amount really expended by the company, and not until the income from all sources for the year is found to have exceeded fifteen per cent on the capital so expended.

The expenditure proposed is one which would require much consideration by the Government, the question of the actual route to be adopted would also require careful consideration, and before the Government could incur such a large expenditure details would be required, which are at present neither before the House nor before the Government, and no arguments I have heard presented would justify the Government in entering on such a large expenditure, especially when the system of canals which the country is pledged to carry out has not even yet been completed. It will be time enough when the resources of the North-west have been so far developed as to show a probability of some return being obtained for the immense expenditure which would be required for the purpose of building such works as are suggested and carrying out such an undertaking as that proposed. As the resolution is introduced, no doubt, mainly for the sake of bringing the subject before the House and for the purpose of discussion, I move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. DENISON. Reference has been made to a reduction in the depth of certain rivers being likely to follow the deepening of the canal. I hardly think that argument is a very strong one, for this reason: That wherever the waters of the river are flowing down in the natural water course, but parallel with the canal, the same obstacle would exist in the natural channel in the river as exists now. No change would be made there whether the canal alongside was 14 or 20 feet deep. I suppose it would not make very much difference if the body of water passed through double the depth and half the width. The main point I want to make in regard to the passage of the water is, that the same obstructions, for example, opposite the Cornwall Canal, would exist at present, and these obstacles now act more or less as a dam. The last speaker referred to the difficulty of shipping direct to Europe, and I have no doubt he was correct in his remarks. That difficulty has arisen on account of the small class of vessels used. But I notice in this evening's paper, a paragraph to the effect that eight Canadian vessels are to be loaded with wheat for direct shipment to Europe. This shows that although it is difficult, it is not impossible, and if vessels of three thousand, four thousand or five thousand tons could be used, the trade would be placed on a paying basis, which is not now the case.

Mr. MULOCK. We have listened to a most interesting debate, and it is a singular feature, perhaps, and one that does not augur well for the success of the scheme, that the godfathers of it are not altogether unanimous in recommending it. It was introduced, I must say, and supported by the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Denison) with some degree of pertinacity. I regret that the hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Cockburn) under cover of advocating it, really endeavoured to slay it. They dealt in a grand way with the question of finance. It is singular that they have not arrived at anything very definite as to the cost. I presume that was a detail not worthy of consideration. The hon. members said there are those who declared the scheme would cost two hundred millions.

Mr. DENISON. One hundred and twenty millions.

Mr. MULOCK. I will accept the one hundred and twenty millions. The hon. gentleman was supported by the hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Cockburn), who was quite satisfied with a canal scheme that would cost eighty millions. The member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule), with modesty characteristic of a bucolic representative, estimated the cost at $100,000.

Mr. SPROULE. I made no estimate whatever of it.

Mr. MULOCK. I quite thought the hon. gentleman had made no estimate. I only stated that that was the figure he gave to the House.

Mr. SPEAKER. No. The hon. gentleman said he did not, and his statement must be accepted.

Mr. MULOCK. The hon. gentleman said he did not make an estimate. I accept his statement that he did not make an estimate. I am willing to say that none of them made an estimate. The matter of cost appears to be of no importance. But the member for Centre Toronto went into details as to the revenue. If he is strong on anything, it is on figures. Figures in his mind establish anything, and I am surprised, therefore, that he advocates postponement to the distant future of a scheme which he declares will be a grand success having regard to the illimitable resources of the North-west. You will remember, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member for East Toronto followed with the statement that this policy was but the logical sequence to the National Policy. I trust the National Policy has a more sensible foundation than this scheme. But the hon. member for Centre Toronto referred to the financial aspect, and alluded to one great source of revenue which was wholly undeveloped because of the non-existence of this scheme. He referred to the possibility of the North-west being ready to pour out to the starving people of Europe six hundred and forty million bushels of grain annually. The Minister of Railways had at one time a lingering appreciation of the advantages of canals.

Mr. HAGGART. And I have yet.

Mr. MULOCK. The hon. gentleman favoured a canal scheme which cost the country $450,000. The hon. gentleman says that canals lower the rates of freight, and that is an advantage. How did this canal lower the rates, when according to the last statement submitted to this House, there was only one vessel, the 'John Haggart,' that traversed it, and the tolls during one year amounted to $135. I regret, therefore, that the hon. gentleman, having got his own canal system completed, should forget the interests of the whole Dominion of Canada. Why did he turn a deaf ear to the hon. member for East Toronto (Mr. Coatsworth) when he was pointing out that which alone was necessary to make the scheme a success? Build a canal, he said, and then 640,000,000 bushels will be poured out by the people of the North-west to feed the people of Europe. With this source of revenue in the North-west, why should the hon. gentleman adopt the halting advocacy of the hon. member for Centre Toronto and defer it? Six hundred and forty million bushels is the estimate of the hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Cockburn). Now, taking the 640,000,000 bushels of wheat and following the example of the member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Cockburn), estimating a train load of twenty cars to measure about one-fifth of a mile; one train load would carry about 10,000 bushels; five train loads, in length about one mile, will carry 50,000 bushels; multiply by ten and you have 500,000 bushels and your trains are just ten miles long. Multiply it by another ten and you have 5,000,000 bushels to carry, and you have a train system of 100 miles long. Multiply it by another ten and you have 50,000,000 bushels on board, and you have a train service of 1,000 miles in length. But you have not one-tenth of the wheat out yet. Multiply it by another ten and you have 500,000,000 bushels and a train service 10,000 miles long, but you are not at the end of the 640,000,000 bushels of the hon. member (Mr. Cockburn).

Mr. COCKBURN. Let me inform my hon. friend that I had no intention of taking out 640,000,000 bushels in one day.

Mr. MULOCK. I have not the slightest doubt about that, nor in very much longer than one day either. I presumed the hon. gentleman was going to take away the crop of the year, before the next 640,000,000 were produced, and so he has his year's work, and as he won't do it in one day I will give him a year. Now, let us see how he will get rid of one year's crop before the next year's crop is ready for the people of England. This 10,000 miles of train has to be moved, and we will suppose the cars are moved day by day throughout the whole year. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Cockburn) seems to like that idea better. We will divide, therefore, his 640,000,000 bushels into a daily output of say 2,000,000 bushels. This 2,000,000 bushels will have to be moved every day for 320 days, but I am afraid you will have to violate some of the regulations of my hon. friend beside me (Mr. Charlton) as to Sabbath observance, or you will not have quite that number of working days in the year. However, we will suppose that you can move 2,000,000 bushels a day every day in the year, by this canal system from the North-west to the seaboard.

Mr. GIBSON. You have only six months navigation.

Mr. MULOCK. Oh, we will have no cessation of navigation throughout the year for the hon. gentleman (Mr. Cockburn) will likely have a hot water system all the way through. Then, when these 2,000,000 bushels a day get to the seaboard, they will have to cross the Atlantic, and if each vessel carries 100,000 bushels, there must be 20 steamers a day.

Mr. IVES. Let me ask my hon. friend, if instead of applying the hot water system, he might not propose a Bill to prevent the river freezing?

Mr. MULOCK. I will allow my hon. friend the President of the Council to propose any amendment he likes. I have no doubt that he fancies that the Government can accomplish anything by an Order in Council, and, therefore, he can submit that matter to his Council. There is one other point to which I would draw the attention of the hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Cockburn), and that is: that it will be rather difficult for him to ship all this wheat to Great Britain unless he has arranged in advance for its consumption. There are between thirty and forty million people in Great Britain to consume this wheat. Now, we will suppose that they raise enough in that country to feed one-fifth of the population, and this remaining thirty-two millions of people will have to eat this 640,000,000 a year. Let the hon. gentleman remember what an extraordinary feat that would involve. Every man, woman and child in Great Britain has got to eat 20 bushels of wheat a year. The hon. gentleman will have to direct his attention to that. He must first of all arrange that the 32,000,000 of people shall chew wheat every day in the year, so as to consume this 20 bushels, or 1-320 pounds. When the hon. gentleman has accomplished that, perhaps then he will have an output for his 640,000,000 bushels, and he will then find something for this canal to do.

Mr. COCKBURN. Let me correct my hon. friend. I wish to inform him first: that I never said I had 640,000,000 bushels; second, I never said I was going to take them to England, and third, his whole argument is therefore lost.

Mr. MULOCK. If my hon. friend does not propose to take them to England I presume he proposes to pass them up and down the canal for amusement. I took up the census returns this afternoon and I find there, an alarming increase recorded in the number of the inmates of our lunatic asylums. There are those who are sufficiently far advanced to become absolute inmates, and there are others that are only undergraduates. The province of Ontario unfortunately has a very high percentage as compared with the other provinces, and it looks almost if that high average in respect to the inmates was to some extent represented by those, who from that province are advocating this scheme in the House. A more wildcat scheme I presume was never presented to Parliament, or a scheme in which there was less sincerity; and it is only to be regretted that the time of this House should be taken up with misleading the public to think that there was anything in this project. We have the member for Ottawa (Sir James Grant) asking for a canal which would involve $50,000,000 I am told; we have the Minister of Railways reminding us that there is the Soulages Canal scheme; we have our existing Welland Canal scheme; and we have the member for North Victoria (Mr. Hughes) taking off his hat in tribute towards the Trent Valley Canal. All of these are schemes to accomplish the same thing: to deceive the public, but this one now proposed is, I fancy, the most notorious of them all.

Mr. COATSWORTH. How would you like to make that speech in Toronto?

Mr. MULOCK. I would make it anywhere. It will get to Toronto.

Mr. CALVIN. Mr. Speaker, before this debate closes, I wish to say a few words in approval of the stand taken by the Minister of Railways upon this matter. Our present system permits in practice of a cargo being carried from Kingston to Montreal on an average of 25,000 or 30,000 bushels; 35,000 bushels has been carried, but 25,000 or 30,000 is the average; and after the completion of the improvements which the Government have now in hand, a cargo of from 1,800 to 2,000 tons may be taken safely. This improvement, therefore, must reduce the freight rate very materially as we can take so much larger cargoes. As one interested in this line of trade, I would rejoice, as I believe all engaged in the same trade would rejoice, if it were possible to have a vessel drawing 20 feet of water carrying a still larger cargo. I believe, however, that the expense of deepening our canal system to the extent proposed by the resolution of the hon. member for Toronto (Mr. Denison) is so enormous as to be beyond the capacity of this country at the present time. What I think would suit the interests of the trade and of the country best just now, is that the system of enlargement, to which the Government is already committed, should be completed with all the expedition possible. There are only a few little links necessary to complete this upon which so many millions of money have been already spent, and we would rejoice in seeing that finished so that we might reap the full benefit of the money already expended. At present the depth of water is only 9 feet, and as we expect to have 14 feet, we would then have an opportunity of carrying a very much more satisfactory cargo through to Montreal, and as I have said the freight would in consequence be decidedly cheaper. Let us now see how this will compare with the ocean tonnage. I do not say that it will be carried without transshipment. I think transshipment will continue to be made at Montreal. As regards the item read from the 'Empire' by the hon. member (Mr. Denison), I think there must be some error in it, because I believe that the grain will be transhipped at Kingston. I am acquainted with the vessels which have gone up from Kingston. I have an idea of the vessels at Toledo. I believe they have gone there for grain, which will be transhipped at Kingston and transhipped into ocean vessels at Montreal. How will the tonnage of the vessels that will come through the improved St. Lawrence and Welland canals, compare in size with the tonnage of the average craft built on the Clyde? The average-sized steam craft built on the Clyde last year was, I think, 1,100 or 1,200 tons register, the sailing vessel a trifle larger than the average steam vessel. I think that the craft which will use the improved St. Lawrence canals will be about the same capacity. I heartily approve of the stand taken by the hon. Minister of Railways.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

QUESTION OF ORDER.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. leader of the Opposition raised a point of order this afternoon on which I think it desirable that I should express my opinion. It was in reference to a statement made by the hon. Minister of the Interior that the hon. member for Winnipeg was insincere in his action on a certain occasion. I am of opinion that the expression made use of by the hon. Minister of the Interior was not in accordance with the rules of parliamentary order, and my reasons for that opinion are these: Mr. Speaker Addington on one occasion stated:

There is no rule better established than that qui digreditur à materiâ ad personam is disorderly, that whatever wanders from the subject in debate and is converted into a personal attack, is contrary to order.

The hon. Minister of the Interior, it is true, referred to a matter which occurred in another place; but by referring to it in this House he brought himself, with regard to the discussion of that matter, within the rules of order.

BUREAU OF LABOUR STATISTICS.

Mr. LEPINE (translation) moved for:

Copies of all communications received by the Minister of Agriculture in relation to the establishment of the Bureau of Labour Statistics for the Dominion.

He said: In connection with this motion, I wish to call the attention of this House to the fact that, since four years, the Government has not yet found the means of establishing the Bureau of Statistics which, in 1890, they considered so necessary, so indispensable to the well-being of the labouring classes. Indeed, it is calculated to get it believed that they had another object in view than the interest of the workingmen when they proved, as they did, the passing of a Bill establishing a Bureau of Statistics. Since four years, the Government must have received many communications in relation to this matter, but it seems they have not thought much of them. I, myself, since 1890, repeatedly requested the Department of Agriculture to put into force the law establishing a Bureau of Statistics. The answer I received was invariably that the department had the matter under consideration, or that they were waiting for the results of the census, or other reasons of no great weight. In the month of August, 1892, I again addressed myself by letter to the hon. Minister of Agriculture, now the hon. member for London (Sir John Carling), explaining to him, among other things, that the people were about putting a bad construction on the tardiness with which the Government dealt with the organization of the bureau and that they entertained doubts as to the good faith of the Government. The answer I received was very much like that which the hon. the First Minister made, last year, to a question put by the hon. member for Hamilton. The hon. Minister of Agriculture informed me that he was leaving for an errand of a few weeks in the North-west, and that when he would be back, he would bring the proposal before the Privy Council. The House will still remember the answer made by the hon. the Prime Minister to the hon. member for Hamilton. The Trade Department, he stated, was just considering the matter and it would soon bring up its report. From these answers it is easy to infer that the Government were never much concerned about the Bureau of Statistics. They even never gave any consideration to the answer to be given to the hon. member for Hamilton. For, after all, what had the Trade Department to do with the establishment of a Bureau of Statistics? What need had the hon. Minister of Agriculture to apply to the Privy Council? Did he not know that Parliament had authorized the establishment of such a bureau, for which it had voted a sum of ten thousand dollars? Had he forgotten that under the law, he was himself general commissioner of that bureau, and that to establish it, he needed no other authorization than that given by Parliament? Mr. Speaker, there is surely in all that something that is not clear, something I cannot make out. The reason as to the census not being completed could, at the worst, be accepted; but the others had not a shadow of common sense. I would not doubt the good faith of the Government nor presume that the ten thousand dollars were used for other purposes than the ones to which they were to go, immigration for instance; but it is strange, for all that, to find that nothing was done towards the establishment of that bureau, and that they seem, which is worse, to have even forgotten that there is a law in our Statute-book with respect to it. Yet, if my memory serves me right, the Government, in 1890, considered as an urgency the establishment of that same Bureau of Statistics; the workingmen, they said, had been claiming that institution for several years past, and it was unfair to keep them waiting any longer. It is hard indeed to reconcile the stand taken by the Government three years ago, with the course followed since. And certainly the labouring classes cannot be charged with entertaining doubts as to the feeling of those who proclaimed themselves their friends, their defenders. It will be shown by the correspondence I have the honour to move for, that the Government were frequently urged to establish the Bureau of Statistics. Besides, were they not, it was the duty of the hon. Minister of Agriculture to establish such a bureau. There is room but for one opinion as to this matter. If the Government were not acting in good faith when they caused that law to be passed, let them have the courage to ask for its repeal. If they were acting in good faith, then let them set these offices in motion. I would understand the tardiness, the hesitation of the Government, were not that institution a thing of absolute necessity, or were they even entertaining doubts as to its usefulness. But how can one not feel satisfied as to the benefits to be derived from such institutions by the operatives, when one knows that in several great countries, in England and the United States, for instance, such institutions have had very good results? Why should we concern ourselves with gathering with so much care statistics relating to trade and industry, and with making annual comparative statements, if not the better to co-operate to the development and growth of these two great sources of public wealth? Now, why should not the labouring classes be granted the same advantages? Why should we not put on an equal footing that important class of our community? The benefits of the Bureau of Labour Statistics are acknowledged everywhere. In the country to the south of us, not only have they instituted a general Labour Department, but the various states have established Bureaus of Statistics the same as that the establishment of which was authorized by the Canadian Parliament four years ago. There are on the shelves of the Library hundreds of reports which show the usefulness of such institutions. These works have furnished information to many a member of this House in the course of certain debates. At all events, this House, the Government, the whole press of this country have acknowledged the necessity of a Bureau of Labour Statistics. It was admitted that there was the means of collecting and organizing all informations relating to labour in the fullest meaning of the word. The informations which the bureau was to collect were calculated to give to employees, as well as to the public powers, the means of solving many problems the solution of which they dare not undertake now. I repeat that one can scarcely realize all the importance of such bureaux. The statistics they prepare include all that relates to the conditions and growth of production, the organization and remuneration of labour, its relations with capital, the economical, moral, and social condition of the workingmen, the comparative conditions of labour in the Dominion and in foreign countries. They also show, as far as possible, the causes of the hastening or slackening of production in the various branches of industry, the results of the tightening or expansion of capital, the effects of labour societies, the causes and effects of industrial depressions and conflicts between employers and wage-earners, the variation of demand and supply of labour, the actual fluctuation of wages, as compared with the cost of living, the workings of savings and provident institutions and co-operative societies, in short all the elements indispensable to the rational bringing about of reforms, and which form a kind of observation of the conditions of labour. Therefore, in the face of all these advantages, we had some reason to expect that the Government would establish without any delay the Bureau of Statistics which was to give to the workingmen elements likely to help them in solving some of the labour questions. It was all the more easy, as they would have found, at the initial stage, a quantity of important elements in the report of the Labour Commission, the consideration of which, I think, never tired the hon. law-makers of this country.

Mr. LANGELIER. (Translation.) It is too voluminous.

Mr. LEPINE. (Translation.) They could afterwards have followed the progressive course of our industry and obtained, from time to time, information as to the kind, number and importance of industrial establishments, their plant and implements, the capital invested, the raw materials used, the number, sex and age of operators, the amount and kind of wages, the cost of the necessaries, the quantity and value of manufactured products. These statistics would have been published periodically, so as to give to the world of labour as reliable and regular information as possible. Lastly, the bureau would have been the official source where any one could have found information in connection with organization and regulating of labour, insurances against accidents and a great many other matters. The steady relations it would have had with local authorities, labour associations, boards of trade, councils of arts and manufactures, provident societies, farmers' clubs, and other corporations, and would have had beneficial results for every one. Lastly, that bureau would have rendered to the Canadian workmen the services rendered elsewhere by institutions of the same kind which they try to improve every year by extending their powers and voting in their behalf large appropriations. It is therefore to be regretted that we should see the Government so indifferent towards such an important institution, which they themselves acknowledge as indispensable. It is, from my point of view, an evidence of the little regard, the little attention public powers in Canada generally pay to the labouring classes. It cannot be disguised that in this case the Government have not done all what they should have done for the workmen. The latter have a right to the Bureau of Statistics, and to deprive them of it is to do them a great injustice. The Government ought therefore to fulfil their promises without any further delay; or rather, let them put the law into force. If they should be unwilling to do so let them give explanation. This House has a right to know why the laws it enacts are not carried out. If the Government are empowered to take no notice of them, let us leave to them alone the care of making at their own free will the laws they wish. If they are not, let them respect the laws passed by this House. It was contended by some papers that the opposition to the Bureau of Statistics came from certain public officers. It is possibly true; but as these gentlemen are not responsible to the people, it is from the Ministers of the Crown that the people will ask for an account of it. In support of my observations, I could quote from editorials published by several of the most influential papers in this country in order to show how much the public sentiment is concerned about that institution, and what hopes the labouring classes based on it. But I do not wish to weary this House, and, besides, most of the hon. members have read these editorials, and I suppose the hon. Minister also took notice of them. I will now bring my remarks to a close with the statement that I feel satisfied they are the true expression of opinion of the labouring classes in Canada.

Mr. DEVLIN. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, I am happy to support, to the full extent of my abilities, the strong speech just delivered by the hon. member for Montreal East (Mr. Lépine). The hon. gentleman, as we all know, represents here a centre where the workmen are very numerous. I feel satisfied that he is in a position to judge of the opinions held by these working classes. There also happens to be a labour centre in the county I have the honour to represent here, and I have a personal knowledge of what importance such a Bureau of Statistics, as that which the hon. member for Montreal East referred to this evening, would be to these labour classes. The Government by causing that law to be passed, a few years ago, have themselves acknowledged the usefulness of this measure. The labour associations, generally, also claim the establishment of such a bureau. We know that, at every session, the workmen present a certain number of petitions to that effect. Unfortunately, I think, the House thinks too lightly of the clauses contained in such petitions. I rise, Mr. Speaker, simply to support the motion of the hon. member for Montreal East, which claims for the workmen what they have a right to expect from the Government, and I repeat it affords me much pleasure to support what the hon. gentleman has just stated.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The hon. gentleman may rest assured that the subject has not been neglected, as might be inferred from his observations. When the papers which are available are brought down it will not appear that the establishment of a bureau of statistics at the present time would tend to the benefit of the working classes to any such material extent as the hon. gentleman seems to suppose.

Mr. LAURIER. I hardly believe that the hon. member for Montreal East (Mr. Lépine) will be satisfied with the explanation given by the hon. leader of the Government why the statute which has been on our books now for four years has not yet been put in force. The Prime Minister says that there has been no negligence, though four years have elapsed since that measure became law. If there has been no negligence, what would have happened if there had been negligence? If it takes the Government four years to carry out, not an intention, but a law passed by Parliament at their own suggestion, what must the workmen of the Dominion believe of the care the Government take for their interests? When the measure was introduced four years ago by the then Secretary of State, it was stated that such a law existed in the neighbouring republic and in all civilized countries of Europe, and it was only to bring up the labouring classes of the Dominion to the same standard that they occupied in other countries that the law was proposed, and yet, after four years, the Government have no excuse to offer, but say they have not been guilty of any negligence whatever. I believe, perhaps, they are right, after all. Perhaps there is more truth in the statement than the hon. gentleman intended; but if that be true I think the hon. member for Montreal East will have his satisfaction if he remembers that in 1890, when the law was passed, we were on the eve of a general election. The election is over, the matter has been forgotten since, and that is all there is in the matter.

Mr. INGRAM. I regret very much that I have not been able to understand the remarks of the hon. gentleman who moved this motion; but I understand the remarks of the hon. leader of the Opposition. He seems to think that the Government have been negligent in not establishing a bureau of labour statistics. Well, there may be negligence; it depends a good deal on how we view these matters. I believe the workmen of this country have taken a very great part in the collection of statistics in the preparation of the census, and the figures that most of the labour organizations of the country are looking for they can obtain in the census. While I say that much—while I say that the Government, believing that the labouring men of this country could obtain the statistics in that way, thought it was not necessary for them to establish a bureau of statistics any sooner than the present time, now that the resolution is moved in this House I trust that the Government will see their way clear, within the next year or two at all events, to establish a bureau of labour statistics. As regards the negligence of the Government, I believe they have the interest of the working classes as much at heart as the hon. leader of the Opposition or his party. I have listened on several occasions to boasts of the great friendship that hon. gentlemen opposite bestow on the labouring classes of this country. While they do that in theory, I have yet to find in what respect they have done it in practice. Now, I cannot enter into a discussion of this question, which involves greater considerations, perhaps, than simply moving for these papers; but when the papers are brought down and when another opportunity presents itself I will speak more fully on what I believe to be the best interests of the working classes of this country.

Motion agreed to.

POST OFFICE AT ST. FRANCOIS DE SALES, COUNTY OF LAVAL.

Mr. TARTE (translation) moved for:

1. Copies of all correspondence with the Post Office Department, since 1st January last, respecting the post office of St. François de Sales, county of Laval;
2. Of instructions issued to the post office inspector, in relation to the said office, and of the report of the inspector;
3. Copies of any contract awarded for the carrying of the mail from St. François de Sales to Terrebonne, since the date aforesaid;
4. Copies of contract for carrying the mail aforesaid during the past three years;
5. Copies of all petitions or representations presented to the department or to any Minister, in relation to the said post office.

He said: Mr. Speaker, influential citizens from the county of Laval have requested that I should obtain the bringing down of the correspondence respecting the matter of the post office of St. François de Sales. They complain that justice has not been done to them. The post office of St. François de Sales is not in the centre of that locality. I even think it is three or four miles away from the village. They, therefore, made some complaints and were granted an investigation. The county of Laval is under a special rule, a very particular one, as far as I could see. I spent there seven or eight weeks last year. The supreme rule in the county of Laval is that the hon. the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Ouimet) must have the control of everything. Those who applied to me were under the impression—which, I think, is founded—that had not the hon. the Minister of Public Works interfered, the investigation held in the month of January would have led to quite a different result. The post office inspector who had charge of the investigation did not even take the trouble to go to the village. I had this information from quite a reliable authority. Therefore, it is easy to see what kind of investigation was held. That is to say, there was no investigation at all. An officer was sent there as a matter of form, and the result is that the people are now suffering as they were before. I will, perhaps, be told that this is not an important issue; but, for one who knows the actual state of affairs in the county of Laval, I think I am doing my duty in calling the attention of the Postmaster General to the injustice then perpetrated and which still prevails. By doing this I may possibly cause others to be avoided. The hon. Postmaster General was not in his seat when I entered into these observations. I will, therefore, repeat them for his information. In the month of January last, he gave instructions to an inspector to go and hold an investigation with respect to this post office of St. François de Sales. That inspector did not even take the trouble to go to the village where he could have had information. He came back here after conferring with one or two friends of the hon. the Minister of Public Works. I am sure to state the truth when I say that the result of the investigation did not do justice to those who had made complaints. I am not acquainted with all those who made these complaints. The hon. Minister knows them; but, I am sure there are among them men who do not care for political parties and whose complaints should have been listened to. Therefore, I think it my duty to suggest to the hon. Postmaster General (Sir A. P. Caron) the expediency of holding a new investigation. Let him give special instructions to the inspector he will send there, and he will find that I am stating the truth when I state here, in his presence, the complaints which he has not taken into sufficient consideration. If I am well informed, and I think I am, there are but thirteen families in the place where the post office is located, while there are twenty-eight in the village where it should be. Now, the carrying of the mail is much about the kind or the order of thoughts which presided to the selection of the place where the post office is located. It is made in a quite irregular way, and a letter mailed at St. Francois de Sales only reaches Montreal twenty-four hours later. I think the Postmaster General, who habitually does justice to those who make complaints when such complaints are founded, will consider it his duty to take this matter into consideration. I beg that he should be willing to order a new investigation with respect to it.

Mr. LAURIER.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, in answer to the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte), I can assure him that all the papers that can possibly be brought down and placed on the Table of the House will be brought down. I may say to the hon. member that the information he has given this evening and which he presented to me in my capacity as head of the Post Office Department, will be given by me all the attention it deserves. I am not prepared to say that the same is quite correct, but I think it is of a kind to call for the attention of the department. As for opening a new investigation, I am in a perfect position to say to the hon. gentleman that should I think it expedient, after the information given to the department and after considering the record which will be handed to me, to cause this new investigation to be held, I will order it without the least hesitation. I think all such matters should be viewed from the standpoint of public interest and, as head of the department, I may tell the hon. gentleman that he gave me this evening some information that I will make it my duty to verify. If, after taking due precautions and attaining information to the extent the means at the disposal of my department will allow, I should think it necessary to cause a new investigation to be held, it will be so held.

Motion agreed to.

REDUCTION ON LETTER POSTAGE.

Mr. COATSWORTH moved :

That it is expedient to reduce the general rate of postage on letters from three cents to two cents.

He said : I do not propose to say very much on this subject, although representing a constituency largely interested in the question. We are suffering from the effects of the change made in the postal rates several years ago. At that time letters up to half an ounce were subject to 3 cents postage; drop letters, that is, city letters, were charged 1 cent postage, and on registered letters there was an additional charge of 2 cents for registration. A change was made by which the 3 cent letters were left as they were, except that the allowance of weight was increased from half an ounce to an ounce; the charge on city drop letters was increased from 1 cent to 2 cents, and the charge for registration was increased from 2 cents to 5 cents. These changes bear very hardly on all parts of Ontario, and especially the cities. Of course the same remark would apply to other parts of the Dominion. The increased cost of drop letters was expected, I believe at the time by the department, to be compensated by the increased weight allowed on the 3 cent letters. I do not think the expectation was at all fulfilled. We do not object so much to the 5 cent charge on registered letters, although I doubt very much if the same income will, in the long run, result from that change, as resulted from the 2 cent charge for registration. About the same time, however, or perhaps a little prior to that time, a change was made in the case of newspapers, and for several years back newspapers have been carried through the mails free, at a cost, according to an estimate made in the present Postmaster General's report, of about $100,000 a year, or at any rate $100,000 for the past year. Now, there are two objections to the change which has been made. First, as regards the drop letters and registered letters, the change was reactionary, and I think the result will show that these letters have very largely decreased in number, and that ultimately there will be a very considerable loss to the revenue by reason of the change. I do not think we can afford to increase the postage on our letters, because the tendency of the times is in favour of a reduction and has been right along. And the other objection is with regard to making newspapers free. I suppose it takes one of some boldness to speak in that way, in the face of so many newspapers, and I do not wish to reflect on the newspapers in any way; but still it seems like class legislation. No doubt it was intended in good faith that the relief should be to the advantage of the subscribers, but I think, after several years' experience, we must come to the conclusion that the publishers, and not the subscribers, have benefited by getting their newspapers passed through the mails free. In fact, it has been elicited that to some extent—of course that is not the case with many of our best newspapers—the privilege of posting papers through the mail free has been availed of for the purpose of distributing a large quantity of advertising matter, and also bonus magazines and pictures given to the subscribers. The Postmaster General, in his report, says :

That the effect of reducing the postage on letters to two cents, even if postage were charged on newspapers, would result in a loss of about $650,000 a year.

This, of course, is based on the actual carriage of the letters, according to the number carried during the past year. The effect of that—without, of course, any intention on the part of the department to mislead—is rather misleading, because we must take into consideration the fact that there would be a very large increase in the number of letters passing through the mails should the postage be reduced from 3 cents to 2 cents. Now, with regard to the class of letters on which the postage has been increased, as I said before, there has been a great falling off in the revenue, and we will find, on the other hand that a decrease in the rate of postage charged on the letters would result in a large increase in the number passed through the post, so that I believe ultimately the decrease in postage from 3 to 2 cents on letters would be a very great advantage, and possibly produce a larger income. Certainly it would not be fair for us, in making the calculation as to the effect of the decrease from 3 cents to 2 cents, to base our estimates entirely on the number of letters that have passed through the mail the last year, because, as I have said, the number of letters would, no doubt, be very largely increased. Now, the increase of the limit of weight of the 3-cent letter from half an ounce to an ounce was of very little advantage to us in the cities, because the great proportion of letters which pass through the mail, the ordinary business letters, weigh less than half an ounce. From my own experience I judge that business people have received little or no benefit from this change; certainly the advantage, whatever it may have been, was no compensation for the increase in the charge for drop letters from 1 cent to 2 cents, and on registered letters from 2 cents to 5 cents. My own impression is that if we were to go back to the half ounce limit and fix the charge for a letter of that weight at 2 cents, we might make such a rearrangement of the rates of postage on different classes of mail matter as would enable a 2-cent rate for letters to be adopted without any diminution of revenue. Such a rearrangement was made in Great Britain when the postage there was reduced to the penny rate. In this respect, Great Britain and the United States proceeded upon different plans. In the United States, as I understand it, they simply reduced the letter rate from 3 cents to 2 cents without regard to the other rates. In Great Britain they rearranged their general rates of postage, so that they are able to give the mass of the people the advantage of reducing the letter rate to a penny, while, at the same time, not diminishing the revenue. It seems to me that there are many ways by which we might rearrange our rates so as to produce a satisfactory revenue, even with a decrease in the letter rate. There are some features of our system in which it seems to me there is a possibility of improvement. For instance—I suggest it with a great deal of diffidence—the newspapers might pay part of the postage? I do not know what the Postmaster General will say to that, but there is a suggestion of that kind in his report. As I said, I would not like to say anything that would arouse the animosity of the newspapers; but I fail to see why we should allow such anomalies in this country as the right on the part of one class of the community to use the mails for business purposes free, compelling the community in general to pay a higher rate of postage than is paid in the neighbouring countries. I am not prepared myself to suggest any re-arrangement of our postal rates, because I have not had experience in connection with our postal regulations; but there are two or three features of the system that have come under my notice, and which doubtless have been considered by the Postmaster General, which might possibly be changed to advantage. In the first place it seems to me that we might utilize our parcels system to a greater extent than we do. We know that in the old country the postage on parcels is cheaper than in this country yet the revenue is relatively greater and has been found to be capable of being developed to a very great degree. Then our money order branch, the revenue from which seems to be decreasing, might be improved by the adoption of the postal order now in use in Great Britain and the United States, postal orders there being issued in the form of bank bills not only at a low rate of expense to the public but at a low rate of cost to the Government. So, if statements I have read are correct, I am inclined to believe that great benefit might result to the revenue from the adoption of that system. Above all, it would assist in enabling us to meet the demand on the part of the masses of the people for a reduced rate of letter postage. It is very difficult, Sir, for our people to understand that there should be a 2-cent rate of postage in the United States and a 3-cent rate in Canada. There is another item I would like to refer to which does not seem to be quite clear to the ordinary mind, but which may be susceptible of explanation by the Postmaster General—that is, the contracts for the carrying of the mails. I have been looking through the report and I find that our country is divided, for the purpose of carrying the mails, into fifteen divisions; and, in the record of each of these divisions, are set out the names of the contractors for the carrying of the mails, the distance each has to carry the mails and the amount he is paid for the service. And I must say that when one looks through the report and finds the short distances that have to be travelled by some of those who carry the mails, one cannot but think that possibly this system of contracts might be re-arranged to advantage. Just for the purpose of making a calculation, I have gone through the Barrie division—which I think is a fair one for comparison—to ascertain the number of cases in which the mails were to be carried short distances. I find that in that division there are 404 contractors. Out of these 404 there are 113 who carry the mails less than a mile. Of course, as we all know, in the most of these cases it means that the mails are carried between the railways station and the post office. In looking through the list I find most of those 113 contractors carry the mails about an eighth of a mile. In one case the contractor carries the mail ten rods—not a very long distance—and for this service he receives $208.58 per annum. The very shortest route is one of four rods, and the amount paid is $20. There is one route of thirty rods at $35. One contractor carries the mails two hundred yards and receives $30 a year. On one route of fifty rods the contractor receives $6.25, while on another the contractor receives $21.74. Of course, these are the shortest distances, and the distances vary. Those 113 that I have taken out of the 404 are all under a mile, only about a dozen of them are over half a mile, the great bulk run from one-sixteenth to one-eighth of a mile; and the total amount paid for the carriage of the mails these short distances in that division is $10,135.07. Now, it may be that the Postmaster General can see a necessity for this, but to me, looking at it from a purely business point of view, I do not see why the postmasters cannot meet the trains where they come in so near the post office, and carry the mails to the post office. Now, if it be true that upwards of $10,000 might be saved in that division, and if there are fifteen divisions, and if I have taken a fair average division, as I believe I have—because I find in some other divisions the number of instances where they carry the mails but a few hundred yards, or a few hundred rods, is very much greater than in the Barrie division—then if my calculation is correct, it seems to me that a very large saving, possibly from $100,000 to $150,000, might be effected by a reform in this direction. However, I merely throw that out as a suggestion that occurs to myself. I have had no experience in the carriage of the mails, and I simply speak as one who cannot understand why we should pay so much for carrying the mails from the railroad stations to the post offices. I suppose it is hardly to be expected that the Postmaster General should accede to my motion to-night; I do not see in his face, as I look at him, that responsiveness I would like to see. At the same time, I felt it my duty as a member representing a constituency in the city of Toronto, which pays the largest postal revenue of any city in the Dominion, to bring this subject to the notice of the House; and also because the number of letters sent in Toronto is very much greater, I believe, than in any other city in the Dominion. I think this matter affects all parts of the Dominion equally, and I feel assured that if the Postmaster General can see his way clear to reduce the rate of postage from three to two cents, even if he reduces the weight of the letter down again to half an ounce, there is hardly a person in the Dominion who will not fully appreciate his decision on that point.

Mr. SCRIVER. I do not propose to speak on the general question; I take it for granted that the reply of the Postmaster General will be based upon the financial conditions of the department. If the expenses are already far from being met, if there is a considerable deficit in connection with this service, he will not be likely to consent to any recommendation to reduce the rates. However, I rose simply for the purpose of expressing my dissent from the view of the hon. member for East Toronto (Mr. Coatsworth) in regard to the compensation given to men who carry the mails for the very short distances he mentions; and I dissent, also, from his suggestion that the postmasters themselves might perform this service. Now, from my knowledge of what postmasters receive in country districts, I have no hesitation in saying that he will not find any of them willing to undertake this service unless they are given a larger compensation than the men receive who now perform it. If he had as great a knowledge as I have of the compensation that is given to postmasters generally, he would come to the conclusion that there is no class of officials so inadequately compensated as postmasters, either in country districts or in the larger villages. In regard to the compensation given to some of the carriers mentioned by him, I confess I do not understand how it happens that any man who carries the mail for only ten rods—I suppose it must be a daily service—should receive $200 a year for it. I know the carrier who conveys the mail from the station to the village where I live, a distance of about half a mile, receives $100 a year; he is certainly not adequately compensated. But I do not see that it is possible to make any reduction, either in this direction or in the compensation given to country postmasters. If any reduction of the expenses connected with the postal service can be effected, it is certainly not in this direction. It cannot be done with any justice to hard-worked officials in country post offices.

Mr. SPROULE. The hon. member for East Toronto (Mr. Coatsworth) appears to have taken some trouble to devise ways and means to overcome the deficiency in the revenue that would naturally result from a decrease in the postage from three to two cents, but he seems to have overlooked what to my mind would be the most likely way of providing a revenue, and that is to do away with the free delivery in such places as Toronto, and let the people there be good enough to walk to the post office to get their mails. He seems to forget that in the outlying districts of the country where he proposes to make the saving, a great many people walk three, four and five miles to the post office, for the purpose of getting the accommodation that the people of Toronto might have by walking one-tenth of the distance. As to his suggestion of doing away with the expense incurred for carrying the mails from the post offices to the railway stations, I think a more unreasonable thing could scarcely be suggested by any member of this House. He seems to forget that many of these postmasters who keep the office the year round, are doing that work for a compensation of from $12 to $25 a year, and he would put upon them the additional work of carrying the mails to the railway station, obliging them, in many instances, to get a horse and conveyance, at least upon certain days, when the mail would be unusually heavy. I think his suggestion very unreasonable. I am of the opinion that it would be much more in harmony with reason to do away with the cost of free delivery in towns and cities, and at the same time to give to the people of the country a little more accommodation than they get at present. But I apprehend that as long as we have a deficiency in the revenue of between $600,000 and $700,000 for the postal service, it is not likely the Postmaster General will adopt the suggestion thrown out by the member for Toronto. My experience with regard to the reduction of postage, or rather the increase in the weight of the letter that may be carried for three cents, is that it is a very valuable consideration to men who write many letters. I do not know that it would be to lawyers, because they usually make their letters very brief, and they charge so much for a letter; they charge about 55 cents for every letter, usually containing five or six lines each. It is not much of an object to them, because their profits are in proportion to the number of letters written, and, therefore, to increase the number they are necessarily made shorter, but it is to people who have to write many letters without compensation.

Mr. JEANNOTTE. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, I was happy to hear the statement made by the hon. members from Ontario, who preceded me, that in their province the postmasters are well paid. In the province of Quebec, at least in my county, as regards the remuneration allotted to mail carriers, I know some of them who carry the mail bags over a distance of from one to two miles for the small sum of $35 a year, and that for a daily service. As it rather frequently happens that the incoming mail does not arrive at or about the same time as the outgoing mail starts, they have to wait for an hour or else make two runs. To perform that service they are bound to have a horse and carriage, and all that, I repeat, for the ridiculous sum of $35 a year. I hope that the hon. Postmaster General will see his way clear to give to those people who perform the postal service in the province of Quebec a remuneration equal at least to that granted to the same officers in the province of Ontario. As regards the question of the decrease in the rate of postage from 3 to 2 cents, I think that in great centres like Montreal, for instance, 2 cents is too high a rate, and that one cent, as formerly, would be enough. I will perhaps be told that if such a reduction should be made, the revenue would be decreased. No, the revenue would not be decreased on account of that, and here is why I came to such a conclusion: I am taking a fact based on experience. I refer to the reasoning of the Street Railway Company of Montreal when they were asked to reduce the rate of 5 cents they charged from the very moment you had a foot on the cars. They contended that should that decrease be made they would lose money. Well, the decrease was made, and the company are making more money than they ever did, although you can now buy six tickets for 25 cents. Proceeding from that principle, and it is experience that speaks out, its results, I say, in a city like Montreal the rate should be reduced to what it was formerly, that is to say one cent on each letter. The number of letters sent through would be doubled and the department would lose nothing, while giving the greatest satisfaction to the public generally. I also notice, according to the observations made by some hon. members from Ontario, that the postmasters of that province are by far better paid than those of the province of Quebec generally speaking. Thus, in my county, there are postmasters who are only paid $22 a year for their services, and for the sum of $22 they have to answer to parties who come in at any time in the day and even at night time, either to know whether some postal matter has arrived for them, or to mail a letter. Besides, they have to give the use of their house, to heat the office—all that for $22 a year. Not only are those people not sufficiently paid for their services, but they have to bear considerable annoyance consequent on the management of the post office, and I say that to accept such a burden, a man must be in quite a need of those few dollars for his living. I already spoke about this to the hon. Postmaster General on various occasions. He knows, after the information I had the honour to give him, that there are various cases of this kind in which the remuneration should be increased a little. Thus, Mr. Speaker, I know of a mail-carrier in my county who goes over a distance of nine miles in the performance of his service, and who only receives the sum of $120 a year; that is to say, that each run gives him 33½ cents. If it is to be said that that man is well paid, well, I understand nothing whatever about the question of a fair remuneration for services performed. One thing I well know, and it is that no man would do such a run every day for 33 cents; one must be in quite a need of earning a few cents to accept such a contract as this. I will now come to the question discussed by some members. They fear that the Post Office Department, after that decrease of from 3 to 2 cents, should not have as large a revenue as before. Supposing such a decrease should bring about a larger deficit than the one there is now between the revenue and expenditure of the Post Office Department, the people would not complain, even though the deficit should be increased by seven or eight hundred thousand dollars a year, if the service comes cheaper to them in the purchase of stamps, and if those who are employed in the performance of that service are fairly remunerated. I am not prepared to say that the proposed reduction in the rate of letter postage from 3 to 2 cents should be adopted at once. However, if the Government could grant the decrease asked for, it would surely be a benefit to the farmer, who, more than any one else, deserves the protection of the Government. It may be, for instance, that in the rural districts 3 cents should not be too high a rate, but in the centres, I think one single cent ought to be charged, instead of two, as now, for there it is for transmission of letters within the limits of the same locality or in localities in the immediate neighbourhood. I trust the hon. Postmaster General, who seems to me to be good-humoured this evening, will be willing to give this matter his earnest consideration and take measures whereby he will the better further the interests of the public in this respect.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I desire to urge with all my might the importance, if it is possible, of making a reduction in the postal rate. I believe it would be best for the service, and that it would add to its efficiency and cause no loss of revenue. This was the result in Great Britain. Speaking from memory, I think the revenue is very largely increased with the reduction in the postal rate. There is another matter in connection with the postal question which I think is of very great importance, and is one which the Government should consider, and that is the propriety of reducing the charge of registration. It is altogether excessive, considering the fact that although it was increased a few years ago, there is no greater security given than before that the letters will be delivered to the parties to whom they are addressed. If the Government had guaranteed when they increased the rate of the registration fee to insure the safe delivery of the letters, there would have been some justification for the increase; but they did not do so, and I observe by the departmental report that a very large number of letters were lost and many of them were not registered. People objected to this fee and did not register money sent in letters, many of which were lost or tampered with by dishonest officials. It would be well likewise if the Government kept a very close eye over the officials, and when any of them were discovered tampering with letters in any way they should be instantly dismissed from the service and receive the punishment which they deserve. It should be understood by the people of this country that whenever they post a letter the officials shall honestly and faithfully deliver it without tampering with it or investigating its contents. This is one of the matters which should be carefully looked after, and there should be no palliation by the Government of offences of that character. I understand the Government will submit amendments to the Franchise Act. I call the attention of the Minister of Justice to the desirability of reducing the postal rate, because when objections are filed under the Franchise Act all letters have to be registered. This is a serious drain on every one connected with the division of the lists, it is a very heavy impost, and one which the Government should deal with in the Bill. If they cannot reduce the rate from 3 cents to 2 cents, although I believe it would be advantageous, the Government should reduce the registration fee below 5 cents, now charged, and if they cannot do that, they should undertake to guarantee the safe delivery of every registered letter.

Mr. CASEY. I also am very glad this subject has been brought before the House. The arguments for a low rate of postage have been so well known in the old country for a length of time that no one would dream of increasing the penny rate. The usual argument adduced against a reduction in the rate of postage here has been that the population of Canada is more widely scattered than that of the United Kingdom, where the population is very much condensed and where postal matter can be more easily handled. But it is forgotten that in the United Kingdom, not only in cities but in country districts, there is a house to house delivery for the penny rate. But our circumstances as a country with a scattered population resembles more closely those of the United States. There the 2 cent rate has been in operation for a considerable number of years, I do not remember how many, but I have heard of no protest against that rate, or the statement made that it did not produce sufficient to meet the cost incurred in carrying the mail.

Mr. SCRIVER. The deficit last year was $7,000,000.

Mr. CASEY. My hon. friend says there was a deficit of $7,000,000; but that is a small amount distributed over 65,000,000 people for having a low rate of postage. The argument that this involved a small expenditure per head has been used in other connections, and it is specially applicable in regard to postage. The postage service is not a revenue producing service, although at the same time it should be made if possible to meet its own cost. I believe that Canadians, per head, send more postal matter than the people of the United States, for there are a large number of uneducated people in the southern states who seldom transmit letters. I have not seen the statistics, but in my opinion Canadians receive more letters per head than the population of the United States. I have every reason to believe that the increased business would very largely make up the temporary loss of revenue. At present the Government send free newspapers from the offices of publication and only charge 1 or 2 cents when they are mailed otherwise. It is about as much trouble to handle newspapers as letters, they are perhaps not handled with quite as much care, but they are more bulky and heavier and impose more labour on the transport service than an equal number of letters. Yet we carry one free in most cases and at a very low rate in the others. I notice in the newspapers to-day an argument introduced by Mr. Henniker Heaton, of England, in favour of an Imperial penny postage, to all parts of the Empire. He states that the newspapers sent to Australia are about 9,000,000, which go for one penny each, whereas only 2,500,000 letters are sent, which are charged 2 pence half penny each, and a great many poor people send newspapers to Australia with messages enclosed to serve the purposes of letters. Although this fact is not found out in many cases, great trouble is occasioned in handling the newspapers to ascertain whether such messages are enclosed. No doubt this practice prevails to some extent in Canada. I myself have known newspapers received containing messages to the effect that the sender was alive and well. One cent does not seem to be a matter of much importance, but it means a reduction in the rate of 33 per cent, and that in the case of persons who send many letters represents a very considerable saving in the course of a year. The hon. member for South Grey (Mr. Landerkin) referred to the registration fee and declared it was unduly high. This is no doubt the case. We are charged two and a half times as much for registering a letter as was charged formerly, and it was not pretended that any greater care is given than when 2 cents was charged. The hon. gentleman alluded to the cost involved in sending out notices in connection with voters' lists. There are also other large classes of the community on whom the present rate bears very heavily, and among these may be mentioned the different friendly societies and other insurance societies which work on the assessment principle. The amount to be sent usually is $1, and in order to send it the individual has to pay 3 cents for postage and 5 cents for registration of letter. That is to say, you tax the entire revenue of these friendly societies about 8 per cent per annum, which is a tremendous tax upon the members of those societies, who are increasing in number very rapidly throughout the country. There is no doubt that if there would be a loss of revenue from the reduction in postage, a very considerable amount could be made up by a system of insurance of letters. Even with the present not very careful system of handling registered letters, the loss is comparatively small in Canada. In Great Britain letters are insured as parcels are, by an express company, at a fixed scale of payment on the amount enclosed. I have never heard of any complaints on account of that system; in fact, it is spoken of by the English papers as being a great success, and I am satisfied it would be taken advantage of in this country very largely, to the exclusion of forwarding money by express or telegraph or in other ways. At a very slight increase of cost, or, perhaps, none at all, we could draw a considerable revenue from the payment of insurance on registered letters. There is no reason now for charging any more for the simple registration without insurance, than it was two years ago, when it used to be 2 cents, and when we had as many safeguards as we have now. I hope that the Postmaster General and the Government will consider this matter very seriously so as to see if we can not come into the van of progress along with the mother country and our great neighbours to the south in the matter of cheap transport through the mails.

Mr. PRIOR. I am very glad, Mr. Speaker, to have an opportunity of saying a few words in regard to this matter. Although there seems to be a diversity of opinion amongst some hon. gentlemen who have spoken with reference to the pay given to contractors for carrying the mails in country places, I agree with the hon. member for Huntingdon (Mr. Scriver) that, taking it all round, it is very small pay; but there is one thing in which I am sure hon. gentlemen will agree with me, and that is in regard to the meagre pay given to city postmen. Before a man can obtain employment as letter carrier, in a city, he must prove that he is a man of good muscle, for he has sometimes to travel 12 or 15 miles a day on his rounds; he has also to pass a qualifying examination that I should be very sorry myself to have to pass at short notice, and he must further be a thoroughly honest man and a man of good character. It is also necessary for him to be civil and polite, because often he has to soothe down an irate female who does not get a letter she thinks she ought to receive. I think, on the whole, a man who has to possess such qualifications as are necessary for a city postman, ought to be paid more than a miserable stipend of about $33 a month. Any illiterate man working as a labourer could earn more than that wage all the year round, and I do not think it is fair that the Government should ask men who are, to a certain extent, educated, and who must be thoroughly honest to do such responsible work for so small pay. I do not believe it is the fault of the Postmaster General, because every one who knows him knows that he would give everything he could to the men in his department, but I am rather inclined to believe that the Treasury is responsible for it. I trust that the Postmaster General will be able to see his way to give larger pay to these men, because I feel convinced that their work is a great benefit to the community at large, and that taking them all round, they give satisfaction. Their salary at present is entirely inadequate to the services they render the country.

Mr. DENISON. I wish to refer to one remark of the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule). He seemed to be under the impression that the city people were getting a great advantage over those living in the country because of the free delivery of letters. The hon. gentleman must not forget that last year the city letters delivered in Toronto were 4,000,000, which, at the one cent per letter we have to pay for city drop letters in the city over the rate charged for drop letters in rural post offices, would amount to $40,000. Consequently, the people of Toronto have paid for the service rendered to them in delivering the letters.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for East Toronto (Mr. Coatsworth) has brought to the notice of the House a question of very great national interest. In every country the question of transporting the mails, and of putting the commercial community in the most convenient relationship possible, has always been considered of the greatest importance. The question which the hon. member has brought under the notice of the House is a most interesting one, and he has made it more interesting still, because, under his motion, I could hardly have expected that he would have referred to the sums which were paid to the various carriers or contractors who convey the mails over certain distances. I do not for one moment question what the hon. gentleman has said; but, without having before me the records of the department, showing the pay which was given for these different services, it would be impossible for me to discuss that point. My only excuse for not discussing it is that under the motion of the hon. gentleman I could not possibly have expected that he would have gone into details of that kind. Now, as Postmaster General, I am not responsible for the introduction of the policy which permitted newspapers to be carried free throughout the Dominion. But I would not like to reverse that policy. It may represent a loss of revenue, but it also represents the conveyance of organs of opinion which it is right and proper to convey to the people in a country like Canada. I am at one with the hon. gentleman in wishing that it were possible for Canada to reduce the postage on letters from three cents to two cents; but, Sir, Canada is a young country, and it is utilizing its revenue for the purpose of developing the great resources which Providence has placed in the hands of the Canadian people. We have been building up our country by the construction of great national works which have caused Canada to be looked upon, not only at home, but abroad, as one of the most progressive countries.

The proposition of my hon. friend from East Toronto (Mr. Coatsworth) would represent a loss to the revenue, not of $650,000 per annum, but of $800,000. Although my hon. friend has, no doubt, looked carefully into the figures which he has submitted to the House, at the same time, if he goes into the question, he will see that the experiment as tried in the United States has resulted in a large deficit in the revenue of the Post Office Department of that country. Those who advocated the reduction in the United States used the same arguments that my hon. friend has used here to-night. They said that the loss of revenue would be more than made up by the increase in the mail matter, as the reduction would induce more letters to be written than before. But experience, which is the great teacher after all, has contradicted that prediction, and the deficit following upon the reduction of postage has never been made up. We are all at one in this country in our desire to place the charge for the conveyance of letters at the lowest possible figure. In reading the pages of history, we remember well when letters were carried at rates that were next to prohibitive; but, still, at that period, when commercial necessities required it, the high tariff was paid, and gradually the rates were reduced. But, we must not forget that the Government have been reducing the calls made on the people of Canada under the tariff, by a million and a half of dollars.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The Finance Minister has got it back again.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The Finance Minister need not be here to say what is exactly true, in so far as that is concerned. But without attempting at all to discuss the financial question, I think we shall all admit that by reducing the tariff we have been relieving the people of some of their obligations, and, therefore it seems to me this is hardly the moment when any of the friends of this country, or any who wish well for its future, should expect the Government again to reduce the revenue by $800,000 more. The hon. gentleman has spoken of the contracts which were given for the conveyance of the mails from point to point. I can say that in most cases these contracts are given by tender. As to a man getting $200 for conveying the mails over a few rods of territory, it may be that I do not know the case to which the hon. gentleman refers.

Mr. COATSWORTH. It is in Barrie.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I must say that the department is not very apt to be liberal in the distribution of these contracts, in so far as pay is concerned. I call for tenders, and the lowest tender gets the contract, under the statute. If, under special circumstances, in the province of Ontario, it is possible for a contractor to get two hundred dollars for conveying the mails over one route, I am surprised at the statement and shall look into it. As regards the parcel system, that question has aroused attention, not only of Canada, but of England and the United States. I can tell the hon. gentleman that the specialists of the department have had the matter under their consideration for some time, with the view of making the system as efficient as possible. We have had propositions from various sources to introduce changes into the present system. These propositions may be right or wrong, but they have to be carefully gone into by those conversant with the subject. My hon. friend from South Grey (Mr. Landerkin) spoke of the increase of revenue under the change. Those who have looked into the matter will not agree in the statement. I know that the increase of revenue in Great Britain has not been caused so much by the increase of letters written and mailed, as by the amalgamation of the telegraphic and postal systems. There is, practically speaking, no large revenue from the postal system, but taking the telegraphic and postal services together, there is a surplus. The conditions of the two countries cannot, therefore, be compared. In England, you have a compact, small country, with a dense population.

Mr. CASEY. They have a general delivery everywhere.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The hon. gentleman is wrong in stating that all over England there is a general delivery. But, supposing he should be right, still the conditions are entirely different in the two countries. In Canada you have an immense territory and a sparse population. You have to traverse miles and miles with letters where you cannot get an adequate contribution, owing to the sparseness of the population. The matter has been discussed in the press. The differences between the two countries have been pointed out by gentlemen who took an interest in the question—

Mr. LANDERKIN. I have got the returns here of Great Britain, and if the hon. gentleman will allow me, I would like to read a statement from the return. The revenue in Great Britain from the post-office last year was £10,400,000 sterling, and from the telegraphic service, £2,480,000 sterling. The expenditure in connection with the post-office was £6,513,000 sterling, and in connection with the telegraphic service, £2,595,000 sterling. This is taken from the returns printed in 1894, and is no doubt for the fiscal year of 1893.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I merely spoke from memory, but I can tell the hon. gentleman who has introduced this motion, that I am just as anxious as he to make the charges for carrying the mails as small as possible. But it would be absurd to hold out any hope of making a reduction, under existing circumstances. When the time comes when Canada can afford to be liberal, the proposition to reduce the rates of postage will be acceptable; but, under the circumstances, such a reduction would entail a loss of revenue of $800,000, and it is impossible to hold out any hopes of granting it.

Mr. LANDERKIN. What about registration?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. That is a question which is being considered by the department, and which involves very much more than those who look into it superficially, believe it does. In England, registration represents insurance up to a certain amount. That system would involve, in Canada a large increase of the burdens of the department, and, though theoretically I am free to admit it would be a great improvement, we cannot at present afford to introduce it.

Mr. CASEY. What would be the loss on reducing the registration fee?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I could not tell the hon. gentleman from memory.

Mr. TYRWHITT. We must all feel grateful to the hon. member for East Toronto (Mr. Coatsworth) for his desire to promote efficiency and economy in the postal service, but I regret that he should have selected the Barrie division of all others for practising economy. Under the contract to which he refers for carrying the mails from the post-office in Barrie to the railway station, a distance of about a hundred yards, the mail is carried fourteen times a day, backwards and forward. The service is performed at present by a lady for the sum of $140 a year, and the contract was let last autumn, after some fourteen tenders were put in, of which hers was the lowest. I think if there is an underpaid class of officials in the country it is the postal carriers, and more especially in the Barrie division. I can cite one instance with reference to which the hon. member for North York can bear me out. Between the villages of Aurora and Schomberg, a circuit of fifteen miles, the mail is carried for the sum of $350 per year. For that service, the country formerly paid something over $1,000; but owing to competition it has been reduced to $350. I can quote numerous instances in the Barrie division where mails were carried for less than a dollar a mile. For instance, a round trip of thirty or forty miles for $300 to $400 a year.

Mr. LANDERKIN. How many times a week.

Mr. TYRWHITT. A daily mail. As to the service being performed by the postmaster, take for instance the village of Allandale, where the mail is carried from the station to the post office, a distance of possibly one hundred yards. The carrier has to attend at the station about six or eight times a day. The trains are often, or at least occasionally late, and sometimes the carrier must lose an hour in waiting. It would be ridiculous to suppose that he should attend to the mail and attend to his own business for the sum paid. Now, many country postmasters receive from $10 to $25, as already stated by a previous speaker; and when we wait on the Postmaster General and ask for an addition of $2 to a salary, we have great difficulty in getting it. We find that in the new order of the Patrons of Industry, one of the great subjects of discussion is the salaries paid to post office officials. I have attended meetings of the order where the whole subject of debate was the salaries paid to the post office officials at Toronto, the unnecessary salaries paid to postmen for delivering letters in the city. In the country we are satisfied to pay the 3-cent postal rate, and some of us have to walk five or ten miles for our mail; whereas in the city these gentlemen have their mails delivered four or five times a day by officials whom the country pays.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). From a statement read by the hon. member for Grey (Mr. Sproule), it appears that in England the revenue from the Post Office Department amounts to between 5 and 6 shillings per head of the inhabitants. I do not think the revenue from our people reaches that figure. I do not suppose we should be able for some time to come to make the revenue of the post office system pay the expenses. Of course, the large portion of the service is new, as the Postmaster General has said. People are sparsely settled throughout the country and they require postal service; and the expense of serving them is, of course, very much in excess of the revenue derived from these districts. But the Postmaster General, I judge from what he said, undertakes to make those who send the letters bear not only the burden that legitimately falls upon them, but also the loss through the free carriage of newspapers. Now, this latter charge legitimately should fall upon the entire public and not upon the letter-writers. If the hon. gentleman will bear in mind that the public are contributing something towards the general education of the community by carrying newspapers free and make the necessary allowance for that carriage, he will find that the letter-writers pay more than their fair proportion of the cost of carrying the mails and the management of the Post Office Department. And, if so, I think that, especially at a time when the hon. member looks for a surplus of revenue, a fair opportunity is offered for the further reduction of the rate of postage. Now, if there were not an increase in the number of letters sent, owing to reduction of rates, that would justify the department in refusing to reduce the postage. I do not suppose there would be in one year a sufficient increase to make up the deficit, but there would be a larger number sent, and, in the course of time, the increase in the number of letters would more than make up the deficiency caused by the diminution in the charge. That has been the experience in England. I have not looked up the American returns during the last year or two, but there certainly was a considerable increase in the number of letters sent immediately after the reduction of the postage in that country from 3 cents to 2 cents.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. There is a deficit.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Still there has been a large increase in the number of letters sent. The United States are somewhat in the same position as we are. They have extended their railway system into new districts that were partially settled and thus have increased the cost of the department. But I do not think the hon. gentleman ought to make that the reason for keeping up the rate of postage, if the experience of the world generally is that the reduction of the postal rate is accompanied by an increase in the number of letters sent; because there is not only an educating process going on from reading the newspapers but there is an educating process quite as great through the use of the mail for letter communication. People have their friends and relations scattered all over the continent and they will be more likely to communicate with them with a low rate of postage than they would if the rate was high. I would not press consideration of that sort in a year when trade was very stagnant and there was a probable deficit in the revenue, but the hon. gentleman himself has said that he hopes for a surplus, so that he may very well diminish the postal charge, the more especially so when we find that the Minister of Finance has, in a large degree, restored the duties which, in the earlier part of the session, he was disposed to remit. There is another matter, Mr. Speaker—the charge for registration. Now, that charge was formerly 2 cents, so that the total postage of the registered letter was 5 cents. Now, the charge for registration alone is 5 cents. I do not think that is a fair charge for registration. The Government does not make itself absolutely liable for the contents of the letters sent; it has not converted itself into an insurance company for that purpose. It seems to me that, looking at the state of the revenue, 5 cents would compensate the Government for any risk that it would incur from giving this insurance. Yet all the Government do in the matter of registration is to exercise due diligence in tracing a letter that may have been lost. Now, I think that is a great charge, and I venture to say that the hon. gentleman, if he looks at the first year when that increased charge was imposed, will find that he did not derive much more revenue than he did when the charge was less than one-half. Whatever the Postmaster General may be inclined to do with regard to the rate of letter postage, I believe he could, with advantage to the revenue of his department, recur to the old charge for registration.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. As it seems to be the wish of the House to discuss this matter further, I move that the debate be adjourned.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to ; and the House adjourned at 11.15 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, 1st May, 1894.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 96) to incorporate the Trust Corporation of Canada.—(Mr. Davis, Alberta.)

Bill (No. 98) to further amend the Revised Statutes of Canada, chapter 77, respecting the safety of ships.—(Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper.)

Bill (No. 99) respecting the St. Lawrence Insurance Company.—(Mr. White, Cardwell.)

Bill (No. 100) to incorporate the French River Boom Company.—(Mr. Coatsworth, for Mr. Maclean.)

Bill (No. 101) to incorporate the Alberta Southern Railway Company.—(Mr. Davis, Alberta.)

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS COMMITTEE.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON moved :

That Mr. Dixon Craig be substituted for Mr. Tisdale on the Public Accounts Committee; and that the name of Mr. McInerney be added to that committee.

He said : The House will remember that we did not fill Mr. Burns's vacancy, and it was understood that it was to be kept open.

Mr. LAURIER. We had better wait till after the Gloucester election.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. COATSWORTH moved :

That in accordance with the recommendation contained in the report of the Select Standing Committee on Public Accounts, that committee be authorized to examine on oath George Bailey and others, touching the supply of street letter boxes.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell).

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved :

That when the House adjourns on Wednesday next, it shall stand adjourned until the following Friday, at three o'clock in the afternoon.

Motion agreed to.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved :

That the Order of business for Wednesdays do include the hour usually devoted to private Bills from half-past seven o'clock, p.m., under Rule 19.

Motion agreed to.

REPORT.

Twenty-sixth Annual Report of the Department of Marine and Fisheries, 1893, Marine.—(Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper.)

CATTLE EXPORT TRADE.

Mr. MULOCK. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I desire to ask the Controurer of Customs if he is yet prepared to give to the House correct statistics in regard to the cattle trade ?

Mr. WALLACE. I have not yet received the report from the Government officer in Montreal, but I hope to do so shortly.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Has any application been made in regard to the cattle shipping interests from Montreal ? Some time ago a deputation waited upon the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, when I was present, in regard to this subject, and I desire to inquire whether any steps have been taken to provide the shippers of cattle with additional facilities to those which they have hitherto enjoyed ?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Touching the subject to which the hon. member has referred, I desire to say that the gentlemen interested in the cattle trade made certain statements as to the charges made by the ship-owners in Montreal and Boston respectively, and they promised on that occasion to supply me with information as to the exact rates charged, in order that I might submit them to the Government. I have not heard from the members of the deputation since that date.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE TARIFF.

House again resolved itself into Committee on Ways and Means.

(In the Committee.)

Stearine, 2 cents per pound.

Mr. FOSTER. There were four or five items that remained to be arranged, of which notice of amendment had been given, and with the consent of the House we will take them up, so as to be able to proceed with the oil items and finish up, if possible, to the metal schedules. The first amendment is in regard to stearine. Stearine had a duty of 3 cents per pound under the old tariff. The duty was changed to 20 per cent, under the impression that it was not manufactured in this country. There has, however, been a manufactory producing this article in operation in Montreal for some little time and has capital invested in the industry, and it is a useful enterprise because it gathers up this matter and places it in a utilizable form and so prevents waste of material. The only industries that would be affected by this change are manufactories of lard compound and cottolene, and the manufacturers of those articles have not interposed any objections to the duty on stearine being made a little higher; and I, therefore, propose that the duty on stearine be 2 cents per pound.

Mr. McMULLEN. Can the hon. Minister inform the House whether the proprietors of the stearine manufactory are old residents of Montreal or of Canada, or whether they have come in from the United States and established that industry?

Mr. FOSTER. I think they came from the United States. I believe they are a branch of the New York house.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Then this is going back to specific duties?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, in regard to this item.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. To what is this duty equivalent?

Mr. FOSTER. The value of stearine at the present time ranges from 6 to 9 or 10 cents per pound. Taking the average at 8 cents per pound, the duty is equal to about 30 per cent.

Mr. MULOCK. What is the composition of stearine?

Mr. FOSTER. It is animal fat fibre.

Mr. MULOCK. Why not apply the ad valorem system to both tallow and stearine; otherwise the tariff will be an arbitrary one?

Mr. FOSTER. It is not so.

Mr. MULOCK. I understand that stearine is composed of the hard part of the tallow of beef.

Mr. FOSTER. The oil is entirely pressed out.

Mr. MULOCK. Why should there be a specific duty of 2 cents a pound on stearine and an ad valorem duty on tallow?

Mr. FOSTER. Because it is further prepared.

Mr. MULOCK. Is there not any labour on tallow; it does not grow?

Mr. SPROULE. There is no labour if it is not rendered, but in making the stearine there must be labour, because it is one of the three constituent parts of fat.

Mr. MULOCK. Does the tallow grow, then, without any labour to produce it?

Mr. SPROULE. I fancy it grows on the inside of animals.

Mr. MULOCK. Is it found in cakes or pots there?

Mr. SPROULE. I am referring to it in its natural condition.

Mr. LAURIER. The Finance Minister has stated that there has been a factory started in Montreal and that capital has been invested in it. Has he any idea of the amount of capital invested in this new industry?

Mr. FOSTER. I think about $30,000.

Mr. LAURIER. How many hands are employed in it?

Mr. FOSTER. I do not know. It has not been in operation for more than six or nine months, but it promises to be a very large and useful industry. It has largely developed in the United States, and there is no reason why it should not develop in this country.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That is not a reason why we should have a specific duty on the article?

Mr. FOSTER. This specific duty puts it on the level of lard and cottolene.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Why could not the hon. gentleman find out all the information about it during the whole year that he had to concoct this wonderful tariff? There is not a day passes here that we have not half a dozen alterations in the tariff, all for the worse, and all going back to the vicious system of specific duties.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The extent of the manufacture of this article is about equal to the ordinary cheese-press.

Mr. MULOCK. I see that on beeswax the Finance Minister has an ad valorem duty, and I presume beeswax is a product after squeezing out the honey, and requires about the same labour as the production of stearine, and yet he puts a specific duty on stearine.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Is this tax for development or for revenue?

Mr. FOSTER. This is for development purely.

Mr. LAURIER. Has the Finance Minister given attention to the statement that there is as much labour involved in this process of making stearine as in cheese-making?

Mr. FOSTER. I think there is more.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. When we are asked to tax the whole community for the sake of some monopoly the least the Minister of Finance ought to do is to acquaint himself with some details as to what capital is employed in this factory, what number of hands it is likely to employ, and what reason on earth there is for making this alteration. The hon. gentleman proposes to go back on his own former propositions, and to make an important alteration, and he should tell us what has led him to do that. While I entirely repudiate the principle upon which he goes, still there is, I suppose, some sort of principle which he has in his own mind, and most assuredly it is his duty when he proposes a tax, not for revenue, but for what he pleases to call development; in other words, for the creation of a new monopoly to squeeze the people of Canada; surely he ought to tell us what these manufacturers promise to give in return. It is not that I attach any value to their promises, but it is as well to have them on record so that we may hereafter find exactly how far the Minister of Finance and his friends have been deluded in this case, as they have been evidently deluded in many others. All through this discussion the Minister of Finance does not pretend to tell us what is good for the consumers; but he tells us that this duty is enough for the manufacturers, that it is all the manufacturers have asked, and therefore there should be no objection. Well, if the Government is going to insist upon that policy let us at least know what the manufacturers offer. We have a right to know how many hands they promise to employ.

Mr. FOSTER. That will depend upon the development of the business.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Are we to understand that the principle upon which this tariff is being framed is that any man can choose to come to the Minister of Finance and say: I am going to put a few thousand dollars into a factory, and therefore ask you to put a new tax on the people. Does the hon. Minister accept that as sufficient ground for adding a new tax without making the slightest inquiry into the truth of the statement or as to the extent to which it is possible to develop such industry? What will this factory be worth to this country? Will it employ 10 hands, or 100 hands, or 300, as promised in another case?

Mr. IVES. The article in question is a product, the development of which interests the farmers more than it does the manufacturers or any other section of the people of Canada. It is a by-product of the animals which the farmers raise, and which they desire to sell. The hon. member for Peel (Mr. Featherston) the other night, I thought with very great force, argued that it would be infinitely cheaper and better to develop the slaughtering of the beeves in this country and the shipping of the carcasses by cold storage rather than the shipping of the live animals. He contended that it would be a saving in freight, that it would be a saving of commission, and that it would be a saving in expenses generally. Now you cannot slaughter animals here as is done in Chicago, until you get into the way of utilizing the by-product. You cannot waste the tallow and offals and hoofs and horns, which so largely pay the expenses of the freight and slaughtering of animals in the United States. However, the very first effort that is made by the Government to give a new line of protection to the agriculturists of Canada is met by hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House with the usual spirit of opposition. They call it a protection to manufacturers. It is not a protection to manufacturers at all. It is an encouragement to farmers to commence the utilization of a certain by-product in which the agriculturists of this country are very greatly interested; and until this and other by-products following from the slaughter of cattle are utilized, it is utterly useless to talk about adopting the cheaper and more economical plan of slaughtering in the country, and shipping in cold storage. One hon. gentleman compared this industry with the cheese industry, saying that it was no more important than a cheese factory. That may be. It may be as yet in its infancy. I hope it will develop; I hope the time will come when all such by-products will be utilized, and it will be possible to slaughter our cattle here and avoid the undoubted waste of shipping live animals. If this industry is no more important than a cheese factory, it has no more protection than cheese. The farmers are as much protected on cheese as on this by-product. The hon. member for South Oxford is entirely beside the mark when he supposes that this protection is imposed in the interest of the manufacturers. It is really a farmer's protection.

Mr. McMULLEN. Will the hon. gentleman carry out the proposition he now makes with regard to encouraging the slaughtering of cattle in Canada? He says it is necessary to have a duty to protect this particular commodity. Does he propose also to put a duty on hides?

Mr. MULOCK. The hon. Minister of Finance offered as one argument for the adoption of this resolution, that the manufacturers of cottolene had not raised any objection, and had given their consent. Would the hon. gentleman give the names of the manufacturers of cottolene who have given their consent?

Mr. FOSTER. I am afraid our hon. friends are a little hypercritical this afternoon on a small question like this.

Mr. MULOCK. It is a very important question.

Mr. FOSTER. They have rung the changes on putting a new tax on the great body of the people. I do not understand that this is a new tax, or one put on the great body of the people. The tax on stearine was 3 cents a pound before. The tax of 2 cents a pound which we now propose is equivalent to what it was before, relatively to the reduced duty on the other compounds. Stearine is used for no other purpose that I know of than in the manufacture of leather, for which it is free. My hon. friend will not on that account pay any more for his boots. The lard compound and cottolene men will have their protection left at 2 cents a pound. They do not get any added protection, and, as I said before, they have no objection to this change because they say that the 2 cents a pound will be exactly equivalent to the present duty on cottolene and lard compound.

Mr. MULOCK. Who are those men?

Mr. FOSTER. The lard compound makers in Montreal and Toronto, and the cottolene men in Montreal.

Mr. LAURIER. The hon. gentleman is not consistent with himself. In his Budget speech, he stated in his zeal that he was determined to lower the taxes on the people, but now he is putting them back. This is why we find fault with him—because he is not consistent with himself and with the spirit with which he moved his resolutions.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The inconsistency is not confined to this side, because my hon. friends were not pleased when that announcement was made in the Budget speech, and they were not at all pleased when the Finance Minister changes his mind.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The Finance Minister did not go as far as we desired, and because he did not the hon. gentleman says he is quite consistent in going back to where he was before.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It is impossible to satisfy hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. MULOCK. The hon. President of the Council has told us that this is the first time the Government have sought to encourage the farmers—that this is their only protection.

Mr. IVES. I did not say it was the only farmers' protection at all.

Mr. MULOCK. The hon. gentleman said this was the carping spirit in which the first effort made by the Government—these were the words, which I took down—to encourage the farmers, was met.

Mr. IVES. What I said was that it was the first effort to utilize this by-product.

Mr. MULOCK. I see. The first effort to deal with stearine. Then, perhaps the hon. gentleman will explain how this effort to reduce the duty from 3 to 2 cents is going to be of such advantage for the development of this by-product.

Item agreed to.

Tomatoes and other vegetables, including corn and baked beans in cans or packages, n.e.s., 1½ cents per pound.

Mr. FOSTER. The duty was formerly 2 cents per can or package and 2 cents additional for each pound or fraction of a pound over one pound in weight. It is reduced to 1¼ cents per pound, not taking the fraction into account. It is thought that this is a little too much of a cut probably, and the proposal is to put it at 1½ cents per pound. The industry is a large one, and this will give it a little more adequate protection.

Mr. CHARLTON. I would ask the Finance Minister if that change is satisfactory to the canning interest of the country?

Mr. FOSTER. I think it is the best we can arrive at.

Mr. CHARLTON. In speaking of protection to the farmers, it should be borne in mind that the canning interest is really a farmers' interest. The canning establishments of this country consume small fruits, vegetables, poultry, and so forth, and the whole of their raw material is drawn from the farmers around them; and if the policy of the Government is to be a protective policy, there is no manufacturing interest in the country so thoroughly deserving of consideration as this. I have received communications from canners in my riding, in which they complain of the changes made in the tariff as very detrimental to their interest. When we reach the resolution regarding fruit in air-tight packages, I will take occasion to read a letter from one of these canners.

Mr. SPROULE. I think we are entitled to congratulate the hon. gentleman on coming round so nicely to the protective principle for the farmers.

Mr. CHARLTON. Not at all. I say that if the Government have adopted the protective policy, the people I represent deserve fair consideration in the distribution of favours.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. They want their share.

Mr. CHARLTON. Precisely.

Item agreed to.

Fruits in air-tight cans or other packages, 2 cents per pound, the weight on which duty shall be payable to include the weight of the cans or other packages.

Mr. CHARLTON. I will take the liberty of laying before the Finance Minister a statement made by the manager of one of the largest establishments in this line in the Dominion—the Delhi Fruit and Vegetable Canning Company. This gentleman says:

The reduction of the tariff on canned goods has enabled Americans already to ship into our market a low grade of jams and canned peaches, and will almost deprive us of the markets of British Columbia and the Maritime Provinces. The Canners'

Association are now asking their members to see the Finance Minister and have this matter readjusted by reimposing the old tariff. It would seem, at first sight, that the present tariff is sufficient, and it would be if the quality of the goods were equal. But as the goods are not equal, and as there is no way of testing them except cutting open the jams, the supposition on the part of the buyers is that peaches are peaches; and until the can is served on the table, the buyer supposes that one can is as good as another, and even then he may hold that opinion, if his attention has not been called to some other brand. Standard fruit, according to Battemor standard, is a can reasonably full of fruit, sweetened ten degrees, cold corn syrup. Canadian standard canned fruit is canned reasonably full of fruit, sweetened with syrup made from granulated sugar, ranging from 30 to 40 degrees, so that the difference in cost of preparing the syrup is 25 to 30 cents per dozen cans. Then, you know that our peaches cost nearly double and often more than double the cost of American peaches. Jams are sold in the United States from 2½ cents per pound to 10 cents. The cheap stuff is a vile mess and should be prohibited from being made, let alone being imported into a Christian community. It may be said that the canners have formed themselves into an association or combine. We have always had an association, and we are now trying to sell all the goods to a selling committee, of which the writer is a member. This committee has not advanced the price one cent. In fact, the prices and quotations are lower than the prices at which the Delhi Canning Company was selling before the arrangement was entered into. Our object was to properly distribute and reduce the cost of freight and selling of the goods. Competition is sufficiently keen among us to keep prices low. Our market is limited; freight rates to the seaboard prevent competition with American goods for export, so that we require all the Canadian market for Canadians. The policy of the United States has been special legislation. So soon as we shipped any goods into that country, immediately up went the duty on canned goods. This, the writer knows, and I feel we have a right to demand from our Government ample protection in this particular line.

One of the most important points this gentleman makes is that with reference to the cost of fruit. The duty on peaches is 1 cent a pound, including the weight of the case, and a protective duty of 2 cents a pound on canned peaches is not equivalent to the duty on the raw material.

Mr. FOSTER. We grow our peaches.

Mr. CHARLTON. Not in sufficient quantities. We have to import American peaches, which, being carried a long distance, often arrive in bad order; and I think I am safe in saying that a hundred pounds weight of peaches with the packages will not make more than 35 pounds of canned fruit. A 2-cent per pound duty on canned fruit, when 1 cent a pound is charged on an article of which it takes a hundred pounds to make 35 pounds of canned fruit, is no protection. I feel bound to present this case in the interest of these people, as I feel they are not being dealt with fairly by the Government. They produce a superior article. I believe the assertion to be correct that a lot of vile stuff is imported from the United States, not equal to the standard of Canadian canned goods, and it is desirable that such stuff should not be allowed to compete against our superior quality in our own market. If the policy of the Government is to be protective, this is an interest in which our farmers are directly interested, and which is entitled to consideration. I do not believe that the duty of 2 cents a pound is sufficient under the circumstances.

Mr. SPROULE. I think the hon. gentleman is perfectly correct. It is a pity that the duty has been reduced to 2 cents a pound. All the information we have from men in the business goes to prove that the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) is correct, and that a class of goods from the United States of an inferior quality is driving our superior quality out of the market.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I suppose the people who use both goods can find by experience that the imported are inferior and cease to buy them. With regard to the character of the goods, which largely depends on the time the canning is done, and the canning is likely to be done at the proper season in the places where the peaches are grown, they are not likely to wait for the peaches to decay before putting them up in cans. I would like to hear the statement of those not engaged in the business rather than the statement of those specially interested. I am ready to accept a reduction in the tariff on any article, as far as I can get it. I would like to go very much further than the hon. gentleman is disposed to go, both in the amount of reduction and the number of the articles to which it is extended, or even extended to the small extent it is.

Mr. SPROULE. The hon. gentleman appears to have little respect for the opinions of those in the business, and who know what they suffer from. He knows a little more about philosophy, but he does not know more about canned goods than men in the business. And the representations of truthful men should be considered when dealing with the question.

Item agreed to.

Earthenware and stoneware, demijohns or jugs, churns or crocks, 3 cents per gallon.

Mr. FOSTER. We propose to tax these 3 cents.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Why, cannot the hon. gentleman tell us why he came down in the first instance to 2 cents per gallon? Surely we ought to know what brought him to 2 cents and then what brought him back to three. We have more respect for the decision arrived at in Council by the hon. gentleman than he has himself. We think his original decision ought not to be gainsaid, unless good reasons are shown, and we want to know what are the good reasons that induced him to reduce to 2 cents and afterwards increase to 3 cents ?

Mr. LAURIER. My hon. friend asks for good reasons. He cannot expect an answer.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Let him give us some reason, even as little as the Prime Minister says it would require for the administration of the oath.

Mr. FOSTER. The factory in which these goods are produced has been making earthenware and stoneware for some years. They found it impossible to make the industry successful, and came to us about three years ago when the tariff was being revised, and we thought it best to put a duty of 3 cents per gallon holding capacity upon these articles. Since that time the industry has been holding its own and enlarging to some extent. A duty of 2 cents per gallon, I think, would have the effect of shutting up the industry, and, as it is a valuable one, and making a very good class of goods, I thought it would not be inadvisable to put the duty back to the old figure.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). This infant cannot walk yet ?

Mr. FOSTER. No ; its legs have not got their full strength yet.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What are the lowest grades in value of these articles ?

Mr. FOSTER. Prices are according to the capacity of the vessel, and the average is somewhere about 8 or 10 cents per gallon.

Mr. McMULLEN. The hon. gentleman knows, of course, that there is a difference between stoneware and earthenware. There is a kind of crockery ware made which is used for milk pans, etc., in making butter. I would like to know if this item includes that class of goods.

Mr. FOSTER. No ; if my hon. friend will read the item he will see what it includes.

Mr. McMULLEN. It says " earthenware."

Mr. FOSTER. Yes ; but it defines the items " demijohns or jugs, churns or crocks."

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I can understand the hon. gentleman's objection to demijohns ; but I do not see how churns and crocks are enemies of his.

Mr. FOSTER. Wooden churns are generally used ; stoneware churns are a sort of luxury.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I have been informed—I am not sure whether the information is correct—that there are a considerable number of these articles which do not sell for more than something like 5 cents per gallon of holding capacity. That is to say, these vessels are obtainable in 2, 3, 4 and 5-gallon sizes at 10, 15, 20 and 25 cents each.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes ; but the duty grades down.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. But you are putting on a specific duty, and, if it is true, as I am informed that these goods sell at 5 cents per gallon, this duty of 3 cents per gallon is a duty of 60 per cent, an outrageous duty, particularly on an article which goes into common use in every household in the country. It is too high a duty, even admitting, for argument sake, the propriety of the hon. gentleman's development theory. I think he will find that on the coarser description of these goods 5 cents per gallon of holding capacity is not too low a price. Of course, there are finer grades, and upon these the rate of duty would be lower.

Mr. WALLACE. Firsts cannot be had at that rate. If there are any goods of this kind sold so low, they are seconds and thirds, which are inferior goods of the same pattern and class.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am speaking of the lower class of goods.

Mr. WALLACE. But firsts are the only ones that are fit to be used. If the others are sold they are sold virtually under false pretenses. The price of firsts is from 8 to 10 cents per gallon of holding capacity, so that this would be of 30 to 35 per cent. The returns show this to be about the percentage put upon these goods.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). You are including stoneware.

Mr. WALLACE. I am speaking of stoneware. There is no earthenware of this kind imported.

Mr. McMULLEN. The duty will not allow it to be imported. These goods are manufactured in this country.

Mr. WALLACE. We have earthenware manufactories in almost every county, in almost every riding, throughout the whole Dominion. We also have many manufactories that make the stoneware. They have to import their raw material, the stone which is ground up to be formed into these goods.

Item agreed to.

Plaster of Paris, calcined or manufactured, 20 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. FOSTER. Make that 40 cents per barrel of 300 pounds, instead of 20 per cent.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Is the weight of that barrel fixed by statute ?

Mr. FOSTER. It is the recognized weight of a barrel of calcined plaster. The former duty was equal to 45 cents per barrel of 300 pounds.

Item agreed to.

Slates, roofing slate, when split or dressed only ; also slate pencils and school or writing slates, 20 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. FOSTER. I want to take out of that item slate pencils, and to put them by themselves at 25 per cent, and to change the other to 30 per cent.

Mr. McMULLEN. Are you altering the item ?

Mr. FOSTER. No ; leaving slate pencils as before.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The items, then, will read as follows :—

Slate pencils, 25 per cent ad valorem.

Item agreed to.

Slates, roofing slate, when split or dressed only, and school or writing slates, 30 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. McMULLEN. I think a duty of 30 per cent on roofing slate is excessive. The material for shingles is getting scarce in this country, and, if you are not going to discourage building, roofing slate is something that ought to be admitted at a reasonably low duty.

Mr. FOSTER. The quality of slate mined in Canada is very excellent, and gives good satisfaction. The green or coloured slate that comes in from the United States is of a poor quality, and the roofers are altogether in favour of the Canadian material. The duty we propose on slate is not as high as before. It was 80 cents and $1 per square before, this would be equivalent to about 75 cents per square, and is about the equivalent of the United States duty. I think my hon. friend is not right in saying the slate quarries are showing signs of decadence, because new ones are being opened, and a very excellent variety is being mined.

Item agreed to.

Oils, coal and kerosene, distilled, purified or refined ; naphtha and petroleum, n.e.s. ; products of petroleum, n.e.s., 7½ cents per imperial gallon.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) When the resolutions of the hon. gentleman were first proposed, before we went into committee, I called attention to this special resolution as it particularly affected the Maritime Provinces in a way which I did not appreciate fully until I had examined the Trade and Navigation Returns. I would ask the hon. Finance Minister to look at those returns for a moment, because I really cannot understand them. The difference in the duties paid in the different provinces is something extraordinary. For instance, the province of Ontario last year imported $153,650 worth of kerosene oil, which paid a duty of $148,652.08, or 96 per cent. Quebec imported $52,777 worth, on which they paid a duty of $56,437.77, or 100 per cent. So that Ontario and Quebec are not very far apart in the percentage of duty that they pay upon this article. When we come to the Maritime Provinces, we see a very marked and strange distinction. Nova Scotia imported $59,583 worth, on which she paid $73,772.84 of duty, or at the rate of 123 per cent ; in other words, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick—I do not mention New Brunswick separately, because the rate is about the same—pay about 25 per cent more duty on the value of the kerosene oil that they import than does either Quebec or Ontario. When we come to the unfortunate little province which I have the honour to represent, she stands in the position she generally does in all these matters, of being thoroughly fleeced. While she imported $11,544 worth of oil, she paid $18,360.40 of duty, or 160 per cent. Anybody can see at once the gross injustice and unfairness of this tax. I want to call the hon. gentleman's attention to it, because I have received from one or two very large dealers in the Maritime Provinces, communications on the subject in which they present the matter in rather a forcible light. In the first place, they point out that while up to 1877 there was a customs duty of 15 cents per gallon, and an excise duty, on petroleum, the excise duty in 1877 was abolished, and the duty was reduced to 6 cents per wine gallon. Now, it is contended time and again that the 7 1-5th cents per imperial gallon, which has been imposed and at present exists, upon kerosene oil, is the equivalent of the 6 cents per wine gallon which was imposed in 1877. Looking at it as a specific duty, that is correct ; but if you look at the percentage that it represents as an ad valorem duty, you see how totally the changed conditions change the percentage. I am instructed that at that time the same quality of American oil which is now imported, was selling at 20 cents per gallon, and the duty being 6 cents per wine gallon, is equal to 30 per cent ad valorem duty. Since then refining has so changed the selling price of this oil that to-day, that same quality of oil which was then sold at 20 cents per wine gallon, is now sold at 3½ cents per wine gallon, while the duty remains the same, at 6 cents, which is nearly 200 per cent. So that while a duty in 1877 was placed upon this oil of 6 cents per wine gallon, equivalent to a 30 per cent duty upon its cost, and which has been retained at the same rate ever since, in consequence of the extraordinary facilities which have been since introduced for refining oil, and the cheapness at which oil is now produced and sold, the duty now amounts to 200 per cent upon the cost of that oil. Now, I have had sent to me in order to submit to the committee, several invoices of this oil which have been lately imported. For instance, here is one imported into the port of St. John, N.B., on 30th March last, from Buffalo. There were two tanks of refined oil. The invoice price was $396 ; the quantity, 10,908 gallons ; the rate of duty at 7 1-5th cents, amounted to $785—$785 duty on $396 worth of goods. Now, this statement only need be made to show hon. gentlemen how atrociously unjust the thing is, how intolerable such a tax is on an article that enters into the consumption of every poor family. The duty at that rate is almost equivalent to 200 per cent. In the same invoice there were two tanks more, the invoice cost of which was $405 ; quantity, 9,643 gallons ; duty, $694. So that the total cost of this invoice was $901 ; quantity, 21,082 gallons ; and the duty paid was $1,517.90. Now, that is intolerable, it is vexatious, it is unjust, it is unfair ; I do not think anybody can defend it. There is no industry in this country which can possibly justify such an enormous robbery under the shape of protection. The same gentleman forwards me another invoice, a larger one. I need not go through the items, I will take the totals in order to save time. There were eight different tanks of oil imported, of which the invoice cost was $1,974 ; the duty paid was $3,454. This is a certified invoice under the customs law. I note specially these invoices, because it is frequently charged that the allegations made with respect to coal oil are unfounded, and I desire to obtain an accurate record of a special importation, the amount of duty paid and a certified invoice from the Customs Department, so that we might have some basis on which to argue the facts of the case. I submit that the statements I have presented prove conclusively that the continuation of the proposed duty is intolerable and indefensible. It is stated, and I suppose it affects manufacturers of oil in Petrolia, that the manufacturers are now reducing their prices in order to satisfy the public demands, and I presume there are very few hon. members who have not received, as I have received, large bundles of newspapers containing copies of advertisements published in different parts of Canada showing that oil is sold at 15 cents per gallon. An hon. friend near me says that the oil is not fit to use, and that is the remark I was going to make under instructions I have before me in these letters. I am told that the only Canadian oil fit to use is water white oil, and it sells at 1 cent or three-quarters of a cent less than oil imported from across the border with all the duties and charges on it ; so that while American oil sold at 20 cents Canadian oil would realize 19½ cents or 19 cents. The hon. Minister of Finance is making a slight change in the direct charge on the barrel, he is charging 20 cents per barrel instead of 40 cents. But the gentleman on whom I am relying to a large extent for my information and whom I know is thoroughly conversant with all the facts, states that this change will not amount to more than one-half a cent per gallon, and that the retailer will not be benefited. I want to point out to the Finance Minister and to the committee the very great injustice under which we in the Maritime Provinces are labouring. The hon. gentleman sought to meet the demand of public opinion in the provinces of Quebec and Ontario by allowing the importation of oil in tanks ; but that privilege has not been exercised in the Maritime Provinces, because the oil has to be carried over 1,300 miles by railway from Buffalo. What the people of the Maritime Provinces demand is the right to import in ship tanks. The hon. Finance Minister would not concede that request. I have had a paper sent to me containing a statement from Mr. DeWolf submitted to the Halifax Board of Trade, and with the permission of the House I will quote from his remarks. He stated before the board as follows :—

Oil under the present law, is protected in two ways. First, in the matter of importing ; second, by the duty. It is well known that the law introduced in the last session of Parliament permitted the importation of oil in bulk, in tank cars only. This, of course, is a species of protection, accorded to the Petrolia refiner, in addition to the duty of 7½ cents per imperial gallon. This restriction increases the cost of oil laid down in two ways : First, by the high rate of freight, and second, by forcing importers to buy oil at a point best suited for railway accommodation, instead of at a seaport, where if the privilege of importing by tank steamer were allowed, oil could be purchased cheaper. Now, see what this protection amounts to per gallon :

Total protection per wine gallon.. 7 80

The newspaper from which I have quoted this extract from Mr. De Wolf's statement before the Halifax Board of Trade, goes on to say :

Now there is another circumstance connected with this duty on oil, that increases the cost of oil to the consumer. Every cent invested in a gallon of oil by the retailer becomes subject to profit. The retailer's average profit is 30 per cent, the nature of the goods render this only a fair profit to him, and has to cover leakage and other loss, etc. We find the above restrictions on importation and duty amount to 7·80 cents per wine gallon, or 9·36 per imperial gallon, as it is sold in this country. Now, as the retailer pays above, he accordingly looks for profit thereon ; therefore we add 30 per cent to the 9·36 and we have 12·17 cents, the consumer of imported oil has to pay on every gallon of oil he consumes, because of the protection afforded the Petrolia refiner. Now see what this aggregates per annum. From the latest Trade Reports we find the Maritime Provinces import 57,000 barrels of oil per year, or 2,280,000 imperial gallons, which multiplied by 12·17 equals $277,476, the oil consumers of the Maritime Provinces pay each year because of the restrictions and duty on oil, all for the protection of the Petrolia refiner.

It is perfectly plain from these figures, and I do not think their accuracy will be questioned by any one, that if the duty were removed, the people of the Maritime Provinces would gain to the extent of 12 cents per gallon. I attack this duty, first, on the ground that if protection is to be continued, this duty is abnormal, unnecessary and unfair. I attack it, in the second place, because the manner in which the Government allow oil to be imported in car tanks and prohibit its importation in ship tanks is unfair and unjust to the Maritime Provinces, and I prove the injustice by the Trade and Navigation Returns, which show that the people of the Maritime Provinces pay 60 per cent more duty on the oil they consume than do the people of the other provinces. I want to know on what grounds these duties can be defended by any hon. gentleman opposite?

Mr. FOSTER. I have listened to the hon. gentleman's presentation of his case. I do not propose to say there is not a great deal of truth in the presentation of a strong case against the present duty on coal oil; it would be useless for me to state that. I propose in the few remarks I shall offer to be plain and brief, and frank as well. This is an article the production of which, unfortunately, at present, is confined to a very small area of the country, taking into consideration the large extent of the Dominion. It is a fact as well, that this article or that imported of a cognate character is used all over this country from one ocean to the other. It is true that most of the people, probably all of the people, consider they pay a very high duty upon oil; and it is also true, and there is no use attempting to burk the issue, that a large majority of the people would be glad to see the duty removed. This is the state of the question presented from the side of one who opposes the duty on coal oil. We must, however, take into account some other points before we come to a final decision on the matter. One is, in the first place, the peculiar position which this industry has held in this country from Confederation to the present time. Without going into the history of it at any great length I may say that it has been a favoured industry, because it was recognized that it has a hard task to develop itself, and it was accorded a special favour. The Government which preceded this, as well as this Government, have both of them done that; and the present specific duty which is upon the oil is the specific duty which was placed upon it by the preceding Administration of the hon. gentlemen opposite. It is equally true that taking into account the lowered prices of oil, a specific duty of 7 1-5th cents, ten or fifteen years ago—bears differently as compared with the present time, so far as the ad valorem equivalent is concerned, and the ad valorem equivalent becomes much higher now than it was at that time, as my hon. friend has fairly argued. Well, last year we came to the consideration of this question with the facts as I have stated them; first, that the area was limited; second, that the consumption was wide; and third, that there was a general call for the lowering of the duty, and, that added to the 7 1-5th cents of a straight duty there were other safeguards which had the aspect of protection (although they may not have been designed for that purpose), which materially increased even that rate of 7 1-5th cents. These were: the higher inspection fees upon the foreign oil, the limitation upon carriage through the country, and the limitation as to means and methods of distribution. Part of these were due to the fact that a safe oil must be had by the people of this country, and that for inspection and proper supervision these restrictions had to be placed about it. After carefully considering the question last year the Government came to the conclusion to afford a certain measure of relief. It took off the higher inspection fees upon foreign oil, and made the inspection fee equivalent to that upon the native product. It took away the limitation of carriage as far as tank cars are concerned, which subtracted to a certain extent from the cost of distribution. Altogether a relief absolutely certain to an amount varying from 1 to 2 cents per gallon was afforded by these measures that were taken last year. That, however, was not so great a measure of relief to the consumers as was afforded by the action taken by the producers and distributors of oil themselves. Without doubt the people in the Dominion of Canada, previous to a year ago, were paying from one end of the country to the other, a very much higher price for the oil than either the cost of the product at the wells, or the cost of carriage to these parts of the country warranted. The attention of these companies was called to that, and they set about remedying it and by improved methods of distribution, apart entirely from the reduction which was made in the protection in the way mentioned; it has made it so that during the past year the consumers of oil in this country have received their oil at a very much less cost than formerly. I hold in my hand a paper which goes to show this, and which it may not be uninteresting for the House to notice. It is a comparison of the prices of oil in the years 1891-92 and last year. In the province of Ontario at Alliston, the price of oil for a single gallon in 1891 and 1892 was from 18 to 20 cents, at the present time it is 14 to 15 cents; at Almonte, the former price was from 20 to 25 cents per gallon, and it is now 15 cents. I am just taking certain places in different parts of the country.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Has the hon. gentleman got the quality of the oil mentioned there?

Mr. FOSTER. The prices are for a similar quality of oil. At Beaverton, the price in 1891 and 1892 was from 15 to 20 cents, present selling price, 12½ cents; at Belleville, 20 cents a gallon, present selling price, 15 cents; at Bowmanville, 20 cents a gallon, present selling price the same; at Bradford, 20 cents a gallon, present selling price,

15 cents a gallon ; at Brockville, 25 cents a gallon, present selling price, 15 cents a gallon ; at Campbellford, 15 cents a gallon, the present selling price the same ; at Chatham it was 20 cents a gallon, present selling price, 10 to 12½ cents ; at Deseronto, 25 cents a gallon, present selling price, 15 cents a gallon ; at Fergus, 20 cents a gallon, present selling price, 15 cents a gallon ; at Gananoque it was 25 cents a gallon, present selling price, 15 cents a gallon ; at Glencoe it was 18 cents a gallon, present selling price, 12½ cents per gallon ; at Havelock, 15 cents a gallon, present selling price the same ; at Madoc, 25 cents a gallon, present selling price, 15 cents a gallon ; at Maxville, 15 cents per gallon, present selling price, 15 a gallon ; at Orangeville, it was 18 to 20 cents per gallon, present selling price 15 cents a gallon ; at Parkhill it was 18 cents a gallon and is now selling for 15 cents a gallon ; at Pembroke it was 20 to 25 cents a gallon, and it is now selling from 18 to 20 cents a gallon ; at Penetanguishene it was 25 cents a gallon, and is now selling for 15 cents a gallon ; at Peterboro' it was 25 cents a gallon, and is now selling at from 13 to 15 cents a gallon ; at St. Mary's it was 15 cents a gallon, and is now selling for 12½ cents to 15 cents a gallon ; at Simcoe it was 25 cents a gallon, and it is now selling at from 10 to 15 ; at Walkerton it was selling from 15 to 17 cents a gallon, and now it is selling at the same price ; at Wlarton it formerly sold for 15 cents a gallon, and now it is sold for 10 cents a gallon. It is the same all through. If we take some points in the province of Quebec the same comparison will hold. At Bedford, it was selling at from 20 to 25 cents a gallon, and at the present time it is selling from 18 to 20 cents ; at Drummondville, it was selling at 18 cents a gallon, and now it is selling at from 15 to 16 cents a gallon ; at New Glasgow it was selling for 18 cents a gallon and it is now selling for 16 cents ; at Roxton Falls it was selling for 16 cents a gallon, and is now selling for 15 cents ; at Somerset it was selling at from 17 to 18 cents a gallon, and it is now selling at from 15 to 17 cents ; at Three Rivers, it was selling at from 17 to 18 cents a gallon, and it is now selling at 15 cents a gallon ; at Valleyfield it was selling at from 20 to 25 cents a gallon, and is now selling from 15 to 20 cents. I have also a list here of the comparative prices of places in the provinces of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia. In Moncton it is now selling at 15 cents a gallon ; in St. John, 15 cents a gallon ; in Amherst, N.S., at 15 cents a gallon ; in Halifax, at 15 cents a gallon ; in Kentville, 17 cents a gallon ; in North Sydney, 15 cents a gallon ; in Truro and Yarmouth, N.S., 15 cents a gallon ; and in Prince Edward Island it is selling at the same price, at 15 cents a gallon. In the North-west, where coal oil was selling in the years 1891 and 1892 at 45 cents, 50 cents and 55 cents a gallon, it is now selling in Brandon at 25 cents ; in

Moosomin, 25 cents ; in Stonewall, at 25 cents ; in Winnipeg, at 21 to 25 cents ; in Qu'Appelle, at 25 and 35 cents ; and in Portage la Prairie, at 20 and 25 cents per gallon. All these instances go to show the extremely large reductions which have been made in the price of oil owing to the improved methods of distribution ; a reduction, which, although not due altogether to the reduction of duty upon it, has yet inured to the benefit of the consumers of this country, owing partly to the reduction of the duties and fees, and partly to the improved methods of distribution, undertaken at large expense and carried out very faithfully and very thoroughly by the companies who are at present engaged in producing and selling oil. Now, Sir, after having had these different reliefs, we come again to the question this year, and again the discussion arises, and consideration has to be given to it. There is no doubt whatever that our native oil industry has difficulties to contend with. In the first place, look at the difficulty it has to contend with in the different flow of oil in our country from that of the United States, its great competitor. Here, if oil flows or is pumped at the rate of one to three barrels a day it is a good average yield ; probably a little above the average. In the United States it flows sometimes from spouting wells at from two to three hundred barrels a day, down to forty or fifty barrels or along in that vicinity. That places our industry here upon a very different footing, and gave it, and still gives it the sympathy of the people of this country in its endeavour to establish and develop itself. It has other difficulties as well. Oil is found in only one locality in Canada. The crude oil is not of so good a quality in certain respects, so easy to manage, and does not show so large an illuminating percentage as the American oils ; in fact, I think that 40 per cent of illuminating oil is about the maximum of what can be obtained from the crude at Petrolea. That leaves a very large margin of disadvantage against our refiners. They have to utilize the by-products, as the refiners do on the other side of the line, but our refiners are put at an additional disadvantage on account of the lower percentage of illuminating power, and, consequently, in the price of the oil. Taking these things into consideration, with the fact of the great extent of our country, and the cost of distribution, you arrive at the circumstances that have weighed with both Governments, and that I am sure weigh with the people of this country when they face the rather serious question whether or not this industry should be blotted out of existence by the withdrawal of the protection which is necessary to keep it in existence. Now, Sir, let me call the attention of the House to one more fact. It is a fact to-day that this oil industry is not taking advantage of the protection which is given to it. The duty is 7 1-5th cents per imperial gallon. The producers at Petrolea are selling oil—a good usable refined oil, which is used by the farmers of this country in very large quantities—at from 6¼ to 6½ cents a gallon in tanks. Go to the other side of the line and you will find oil of a similar quality quoted at about 3 cents per wine gallon. Add one-fifth to that to make up an imperial gallon, and it brings the price to 3 3-5th cents per imperial gallon. To bring the oil to a certain point in this country will cost, say 1 cent per gallon, which will bring the cost to 4 3-5th cents. Add to that the duty of 7 1-5th cents, which will bring it as nearly as may be to 12 cents a gallon, whereas, at Petrolea it is sold in bulk at 6½ cents a gallon. Take a better class of oil, the Canadian water white, which is sold in bulk at Petrolea at 9 cents per imperial gallon. You can get the equivalent of that oil on the other side of the line for 5 cents per wine gallon. Add one-fifth to make up the imperial gallon, which brings it to 6 cents. Add 1 cent for transportation, which brings it to 7 cents. Add the duty, which brings the cost to 14 1-5th cents a gallon, while it is sold in quantities at Petrolea at 9 cents a gallon. That is proof that the people of this country are not paying the whole duty on the native product or on the imported oil. Hon. gentlemen will say to me, I come from a place where we have to pay 25 cents a gallon for American oil; I do not choose to use Canadian oil; I do not like the smell of it; my olfactories are so toned that I do not like to disturb them with it; and owing to this duty I have to pay for American oil 25 or 30 cents a gallon. The hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) read quotations to show that he could get that oil for 4 cents a gallon on the other side. Add one-fifth to that, and it will make 4 4-5th cents per gallon. Add a cent a gallon for the cost of laying it down at Halifax.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Fifty cents by water to Halifax; but you will not let me take it by water.

Mr. FOSTER. The 1 cent for freight added to the 4 4-5th cents makes the cost 5 4-5th cents at Halifax. Add the duty, which brings it to 13 cents; so that, if you pay 25 cents or 30 cents for the American oil, you do not pay it because there is a duty on it, but you pay it because of the cost of distribution. I am not going to say whether that is too great, or whether it is legitimate or not. I know that last year those who retailed the oil were getting, as their profit, much more than the cost of the oil, and, in some cases, they took more than the cost of the oil, plus the duty. That, however, has been changed, and if 25 or 30 cents a gallon is paid for the American oil, it is paid for the purpose of getting American oil by name, and not because its original cost, plus the duty and carriage, brings it up to that amount. To-day, the Patrons of Industry, from Petrolea down to the city of Quebec, get their oil in barrels delivered to them at the different stations, where they live, at from 9 cents to 11¼ cents a gallon. That is not an excessively high price for oil; and when hon. gentlemen opposite sometimes make the argument that on every gallon of oil used here by the farmer, he has to pay 7 1-5th cents, and when they multiply the number of gallons of oil used by 7 1-5th, and say that the result represents the burden that the farmers have to carry, my own opinion—and I base it on the facts that I have stated—is that on the average there is not more than 3 or 4 cents of duty paid. Now, Sir, what is the weight of the incidence of this duty? In the first place, we must have a revenue from something. We get a revenue of about $420,000 or $430,000 from oil. By the fact that we get nearly half a million of revenue from that, we are enabled to let in at lower rates other things which come into consumption in the farmers' and the artisans' families. In that way they get the advantage of the cheapness of those articles. Now, let the farmers count up and say how much oil they use. That question has been put them at public meetings, and we have got various answers. One man says he uses ten gallons a year, others say twenty gallons, and some thirty. Suppose we take the average at twenty gallons a year, and put the duty paid at 5 cents a gallon. There is a dollar which the farmer pays in duty by way of supporting the revenue and keeping up the industry in this country. It would be a pretty harsh thing for us to destroy this industry, in the face of the fact that it is the means of living of hundreds and thousands of people, and that it has been planted and fostered, and has had a helping hand from every Government from 1867 to the present time. It is not one great monopoly. A large proportion of the wells in the oil region are worked just as a man works his vegetable garden. A man owns his plot of ground, sinks his well, has it connected with the pumping machinery, and the three-fourths of a barrel, or the barrel of oil pumped out each day is his living; and unless we have very excellent reasons, we must pause before we destroy an industry of this kind. But I think there is one other point to be considered. This country is not very old. Some twenty-five years it has passed since confederation. These are not all the oil regions in this country. Others are being prospected and developed, and it may be—everything points in that direction—that down in the far east, and away up yonder in the far west, there may be almost inexhaustible supplies of oil waiting for the explorer, waiting for development and distribution to the people who need oil and light. What is the great competitor against which our own oil industry has to pit itself? And it has my sympathy in being pitted against such a competitor. It is the Standard Oil Company of the United States, one of the most gigantic trusts and corporation in the world—a corporation which pursues with relentless vigour and animosity every opposing interest until it succeeds in wiping it out. That gigantic corporation has its pipe lines laid up to our own Canadian territory, so that the very moment we take off the necessary protection we give our oil regions, now being developed, into the hands of that gigantic trust—that very moment we give our whole future oil development into the control of that same trust, with all its wealth and power. And once possessed of the oil wells and regions now being developed, they will have the leverage, and they will control the development of whatever there is to develop in the oil resources of this country from this time out.

Mr. GILLMOR. Is the hon. gentleman aware that this Standard Oil Company has a hold on these oil lands now?

Mr. FOSTER. I am not.

Mr. GILLMOR. I have been credibly informed that they have.

Mr. FOSTER. I think my hon. friend must give the House his proof if such is the case.

Mr. GILLMOR. I have been so informed.

Mr. MONCRIEFF. I can say positively that such is not the case.

Mr. FOSTER. Perhaps if my hon. friend would put the question to the hon. gentleman beside him he may get exact information.

Mr. LISTER. There is no truth in the statement.

Mr. FOSTER. I had always been under the impression that there was no truth in that statement. I know of nothing to justify it, and I think the converse is true. But I was going on to say that this Canadian oil industry has my sympathy because of this fact I have mentioned. We may be on the eve of large oil developments in this country, and I think it is worth while to keep our present oil industry alive and going, so that if, within a few years, other oil fields are explored, and opened up, we may have in our own hands the developing of our own Canadian oil industry. I do not wish to inflict a speech on the House. I just wanted to state frankly what there is in the whole matter. It is a large duty, I acknowledge. It is a duty, however, which, under present conditions, does not bear very hardly in amount on the individual consumer. And the industry is one that I would not like to see wiped out of the country. We have given a little relief this year with reference to the duty on the barrels, which makes it less onerous on the people of the Maritime Provinces. I think that the greater number of our people are reasonable on this point, and will hesitate to strike down an industry of this kind. We pared the duty down last year, we have already given some relief this year, and I propose, with the consent of the House, to ask the chairman to change the present reading of the item by substituting 6 cents for 7 1-5th. In doing that, I hope the House, and I believe the country, will consider that all it was possible to do has been done.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) My hon. friend and leader asks a question which I would like to have answered, and that is: What is the reason of the applause which greeted the announcement of the Finance Minister that he had determined to reduce this duty 1 1-5th cents? The hon. gentleman is most ingenious. He can make a most ingenious statement, but it will tax all his ingenuity to give any explanation of those cheers.

Mr. FOSTER. They cheered because they saw the hon. gentleman's face light up with a smile.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) When the hon. gentleman refused to take off the protection, on the ground that it was necessary for the development of the oil industry, and when he insisted on retaining the obnoxious restrictions, hon. gentlemen behind him cheered right lustily. Now, when the hon. gentleman announces a reduction in the duty, they cheer him again.

Mr. FOSTER. Because the duty is still to be retained.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) When public opinion compels the Finance Minister to cut down the duty still further, the hon. member for Annapolis (Mr. Mills) will cheer louder than anybody, because his constituents are among those who suffer as largely from these obnoxious and impolitic restrictions as anybody else. What does the hon. gentleman say in his apology, and I think it is a very lame apology? He says, in the first place, there has been a vast and sensible reduction in the price of these articles throughout the Dominion. Is that true? We will try the issue of fact. The hon. gentleman has read the extracts which were sent to him in common with other members of the House—the advertisement that oil was selling in this and that village and town at reduced prices. It appears, therefore, by the acknowledgment of the oil producers themselves, the public have been fleeced to an enormous extent heretofore. But when the agitation against these duties became too serious, the Petrolea company took measures to have this oil sold at a much reduced price, compared with previous rates. I am informed from a very reliable source, of the inner working of these sales. A gentleman writing to me from the Maritime Provinces, says:

We observe that Hon. Mr. Foster says the reason he will not touch the duty is because the Canadian refiners have compelled the retailers throughout the Dominion to reduce their selling price to 15 cents per gallon, thereby forcing the retailer to gain a smaller profit. If Mr. Foster knew how the refiners have misled him, we do not think he would use this argument for keeping up the duty. The facts are simply these: Last session the refiners promised the Government that if the Government would let the duty remain, they would guarantee that the people would get cheaper oil, and to show you how they accomplished this, they would take their cheapest and more inferior oil, or such an oil that very few people would use and go into a town and make some special agreement with a dealer by which they would get him to advertise their oil at 15 cents per gallon, they agreeing to compensate the dealer and protect him. In fact, they paid for such advertising for the dealer. When this was done, all other dealers in that town would be forced to keep some of this poorer oil to sell, and at the same price, which left the retailer without a living profit, but the refiners took good care to get their price.

As a matter of fact, the hon. gentleman, I think, acknowledged that the Petrolea refiners had not reduced their prices at Petrolea. And as a matter of fact, other hon. gentlemen who sit behind me, and are in the trade, and who know what they are talking about, confirm the statement made here that the quality of the oil offered for sale, in the Maritime Provinces at any rate, is of a most inferior description. The hon. gentleman, whose aristocratic olfactory organ has not to submit to the stench from this oil, but who can afford to use electric light and gas, is astonished that anybody would hesitate to burn stinking oil. I do not think the poor people should be insulted in this way. Their olfactories are as good as the hon. gentleman's, and while they have not the privilege of using gas and electric light as he has, neither have they the fine salary which enables him to enjoy these luxuries. We have to deal with things as they are. People, in order to get good oil, have to pay 25 to 30 cents per gallon for it. The hon. gentleman now has the statement before him and he will see, before this debate ends that it will be shown from many quarters that the character of the oil which the Petrolea oil refiners are endeavouring to make the public believe can be sold for 15 cents per gallon, is of such an inferior description that no man would buy it who can avoid it.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Not at all.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I hear two dissenting voices, those of gentlemen who come from that part of the country where the oil is produced. I for one object to the mass of the community throughout the length and breadth of Canada being made to pay double prices for their oil for the protection of this industry. This is one of those infants that never seem to be satisfied. Nobody seems to suggest that there is ever going to be a time when this exaction upon the mass of the people will cease and these restrictions be removed. This, apparently, is to be a protected industry to the end of time. They have had this protection for fifteen years or more and they are not as able to compete with the oil we can purchase abroad as they were at first. Let me tell the hon. gentleman that, with regard to the best class of American oil, his calculations are all wrong. We need not deal with this question upon theory at all; we can get down to the actual facts. I passed across the floor of the House the two invoices of importations into the city of St. John from which I read. Does the hon. gentleman question the accuracy of those figures? Is it true that the Maritime Provinces pay 160 per cent on the total importations, and, upon many of the importations, nearly 200 per cent, when all the charges are added? Take a barrel of the best oil—forty-eight gallons of wine measure, or forty gallons imperial. I am told that the very best oil can be bought in the United States at 6 cents per imperial gallon. That would be $2.40 per barrel. The cost of the oil, duties, fees, and other costs will be as follows:—

| 1 brl. oil..... | $2 40 |
| Duty | 2 88 |
| Barrel duty..... | 0 20 |
| Inspector's fee..... | 0 10 |
| Freight.. | 0 40 |
| Barrel..... | 1 50 |
| Total..... | $7 48 |

This, for a barrel of forty gallons would be 18 7-10ths cents per gallon. Now, allowing the general importer 1 cent per gallon profit, he could afford to sell it for about 20 cents per gallon to the retailer. I see my hon. friend from Westmoreland (Mr. Wood) following these figures. If they are inaccurate I expect him to challenge them, as he is well informed upon these matters. I have these figures from a gentleman in the trade. The Government not only fixes a duty of so much a gallon, but compels us to import a barrel which costs $1.50, puts 20 cents duty on the barrel, adds an inspection fee of 10 cents, and makes us pay 40 cents a barrel freight; whereas, if we were allowed to import in ship tanks our freight charge would be diminished about one-sixth, and the duties and exactions which so enormously increase the price of the commodity would be practically swept away. I plead on behalf of the mass of the people; not on behalf of the rich people in the cities and towns who have their electric lights and gas, but for the great mass of the people who are obliged to buy this oil. This is class legislation of the worst kind. It bears most seriously upon the Maritime Provinces, and it bears with enormous weight upon the poorer classes in the Maritime Provinces. The sop which the hon. gentleman has given by his change of duty goes but a little way to offset the exactions to which the people are subjected. The duty upon the barrel, the cost of the barrel and the inspector's fee are still there. By the change he is making he may give us relief of 1 cent per gallon; but that is infinitesimal. When the hon. gentleman determined to grapple with this question, he might have grappled with it like a statesman and not in this pettifogging way.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. gentleman has not given any explanation of the extraordinary discrepancy in the duty levied on oil coming into the Maritime Provinces as compared with that coming into Ontario. If the duty ranges, as my hon. friend (Mr. Davies) put it, from 160 per cent in the case of Prince Edward Island, to 125 per cent in the case of the other Maritime Provinces and 100 per cent in the case of Ontario, we ought to know why this extraordinary discrepancy exists. I do not suppose that these amendments will affect that materially. On the value $11,000 in one case, $18,000 is taxed; on the value of $153,000 in another case, $148,000 is taxed. The hon. gentleman ought to tell us how that discrepancy arises and what he proposes to do to prevent it in future. Especially is it his duty to do so as he himself comes from the Maritime Provinces.

Mr. FOSTER. The explanation is a very simple one. The ad valorem duty would be higher in proportion as the invoice price is lower. If Prince Edward Island buys an oil for 2½ cents per gallon, the oil, duty and all, will be cheaper, but the ad valorem duty would be higher. There is no other explanation possible.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That simply means that the hon. gentleman's tax is so exorbitant that it compels the unhappy inhabitants of the Maritime Provinces, and especially the most unhappy inhabitants of Prince Edward Island to burn an extremely inferior quality of oil.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Does the hon. gentleman lose sight of the fact that oil is imported into Quebec and Ontario in car tanks, while, from the nature of the case that is impossible in the Maritime Provinces, or, at any rate, in Prince Edward Island.

Mr. FOSTER. Does the hon. gentleman mean to say that the returns for 1893 and 1892 take in that?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Do they not?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. There is no explanation except that the tax compels the people of Prince Edward Island to use the worst quality of oil.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) We do not use the worst quality.

Mr. FOSTER. It may be that these Maritime Province people have some wily means by which they get oil at cheaper rates from the people of Ontario.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I remember that in my time it was almost impossible to get the people along the New Brunswick border to pay duties at all, even under a moderate scale of duties.

Mr. FOSTER. That is all changed since the hon. gentleman's time

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Not at all; I know that while many of the hon. gentleman's friends and supporters are the very best protectionists by day, they are most enthusiastic free traders by night.

Mr. TAYLOR. I understand that the Finance Minister a few moments ago gave a statement of the prices of oil in different parts of Ontario, and that he quoted the price in Gananoque at 15 cents per gallon. I sent out for the Gananoque 'Reporter,' which I may say is not a Conservative organ, and I now read from the advertisement of Messrs. Britton & Donovan:

Canadian coal oil was never so good as it is to-day. Price 15 cents per gallon, or seven gallons for a dollar—and lots of it.

I made inquiries among the consumers of oil at Gananoque—and we live right on the American border. One gentleman, Mr. Robert Byers, told me two or three weeks ago that he had been using Canadian oil and that it lasted much longer and was otherwise very much superior to the American oil. I give the name, that of a gentleman of high standing in Gananoque.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Has the hon. gentleman used Canadian oil himself?

Mr. TAYLOR. No; I use the electric light altogether in my house. The imperial gallon is given for 15 cents, or seven gallons for a dollar, and those who are using it in my town say they prefer it to the American oil, that it lasts longer and gives a better light.

Mr. FLINT. It may seem somewhat ungracious on the part of representatives from the Maritime Provinces to make any complaint, in view of the reduction which the Government has made in the duty on American oil; but at the same time I think we have a reasonable right to complain, of the high protection still given to illuminating oil. The figures quoted by the hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies), are in themselves conclusive proof of the fact that the people in the Maritime Provinces are paying more revenue, and more profit to the Canadian producers of oil, than people in the other portions of Canada. But in most of the quotations that are given by hon. members on the other side of the House as to the respective prices of Canadian and American oil, no account is taken of the relative quantities of imported and Canadian oils consumed. I presume this feature might be ascertained by a careful study of the statistics, but I am not aware at present just how it could be worked out. I do know this, however, and I state it as one of the facts which has not yet been stated in committee, that the relative proportion of the quantities of imported and Canadian oil used in the Maritime Provinces is as one to five. I have been informed by several large importers that those figures would represent the average proportions of Canadian and imported oils consumed by our people, that is to say, that we import into the Maritime Provinces of oil upon which we pay the high duty, and inspection fees, and all the other charges, five times as much as we use of Canadian oil. Now, this fact alone is sufficient, it seems to me, to convince any impartial mind that, altogether apart from any 'a priori' reasoning, American oil must be intrinsically the best and the most satisfactory to the people who consume it. No test of the quality of oil is so good as the extent to which it enters into the general consumption of the people; and if in the Maritime Provinces, where a large majority of the consuming population represent people of moderate means, they deliberately use five times the quantity of imported oil that they do of oil of home production, that fact in itself, it seems to me, is an irrefutable proof that the imported oil is intrinsically the better for all the purposes required of an illuminating oil. Now, if we look at the duty paid by the people of the Maritime Provinces, we find that in Nova Scotia we import something over one million gallons of oil, for which we pay about $60,000, and the duty upon that, I presume exclusive of the inspection and other fees—I would ask the Minister of Finance here if that includes the inspection fees?

Mr. FOSTER. No.

Mr. FLINT. Then that is exclusive of the other fees, which have to be added. We paid last year on $60,000 worth of oil, nearly $74,000 of duty. In the province of New Brunswick the imports are about the same, one million gallons, for which they paid $56,000 in round numbers, and the duty upon that quantity was about $73,000. The province of Prince Edward Island imported a much smaller quantity, although, perhaps, no smaller in proportion to the population. She imported 255,000 gallons, at a value of $11,544, the duty upon which was $18,360. In other words, the three Maritime Provinces imported oil to the value of $127,544, upon which they paid a duty of $164,870, apart entirely from the inspection and other fees, which would somewhat increase that amount. I think, perhaps, some of these fees are not to be complained of, as they may be necessary in order to secure safety in the quality. Those figures represent an average rate of duty of 130 per cent upon an article which the people find absolutely necessary for their comfort and convenience, and of which they use five times as much as they do of the Canadian article. Now, until the Canadian refiners of oil can produce an article more in accordance with the wants of the consuming classes, it seems to me this duty is not only an enormous protection, but it works an outrageous injustice to the people of the Maritime Provinces. At the close of the last session of Parliament, just before prorogation, this question came up in the House, when many members were absent, and I took it upon myself to ask the Government to allow imported oil to be introduced in tank vessels as a peculiar concession to the Maritime Provinces, inasmuch as the Government had conceded the privilege of importing this kind of oil in tank cars as a concession and a relief, as the Minister of Finance has said, to the people of the upper provinces. But my request was refused, and I cannot for the life of me see upon what principle of reason, or fairness, or justice, the people of the Maritime Provinces, who are paying so much more duty in proportion to the quantity of oil they consume, should be refused the relief which was given to the people of the upper provinces. I think before this session ends we will have to press this question again in some shape upon the attention of the Government, with a view to inducing the Government to allow those who are common carriers to bring oil into the Maritime Provinces in tank vessels, as the people of the upper provinces are allowed to bring it in in tank cars. The reduction of duty now given by the Government is very trifling, and I have no doubt that had the Government concluded to reduce the duties still more, they would have received the warm approval and cheers of many hon. gentlemen opposite. I have observed that, no matter how strongly they insist upon retaining the protective principle in this tariff, no sooner does the Government reduce the duty upon any article whatever, than they receive hearty cheers and support from hon. gentlemen opposite, showing that even they are influenced by the feelings of their constituents, they are influenced by the feeling which is in the air that the duties hitherto imposed upon all the necessaries of life required by the people, have been to a large degree excessive. Now, while, perhaps, the figures relating to the duty may be somewhat changed within the past few months, owing to the circumstances referred to by one or two gentlemen on the other side of the House; yet, notwithstanding the fact that we pay so very high a rate, all the oil sold in the Maritime Provinces last year, was sold to the wholesale dealers at about a cent per gallon difference between the imported American oil and the best quality of Canadian oil; and still the sellers of Canadian oil could not, even with that difference per gallon, force their goods into the market except in the proportion of about one to five. I have before me an invoice which represents the usual proportion of the importations into the town of Yarmouth from the city of St. John, whence a large part of our importations of oil at present come. This invoice contained one lot of 50 barrels of the best American refined oil, which was delivered, duty paid, at 17½ cents per gallon. Another lot of 10 barrels of the best Canadian oil was delivered at the wharf in St. John, at 16¼ cents; and this, I am informed, represents the difference between those two oils at the present time, notwithstanding the reduction made by the refiners. I presume that all that can be said on this side of the House will not induce the Government to make any further reduction, but even from their own standpoint, and in view of the fact that the Government have already assumed the privilege of introducing oil in tank cars as a substantial measure of relief to the consumers of the provinces of Quebec and Ontario, and to a small degree to the province of New Brunswick, where I believe tank cars are coming in in small numbers at the present time, I think the Government should listen to the appeals of those who ask that the privilege be allowed to the common carrier by vessel of bringing in oil in tanks to the seaports of Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick. This would be a substantial relief in connection with the relief we have already received, and I respectfully ask the Finance Minister if this matter is under consideration. I should like to ask the Finance Minister this question, Has the Government positively closed its consideration of this phase of the subject as regards tank vessels and tank cars, or will the Government be prepared to take up this question at a later period of the discussion?

Mr. HAZEN. Would not such an arrangement as that of transporting oil by tank steamers interfere very considerably with the coasting trade?

Mr. FLINT. That question is one which was raised during the short discussion we had on this subject at the close of last session, namely, that allowing the privilege of transporting oil in tank vessels for the benefit of the people of the Maritime Provinces would interfere with the coasting trade. This is one of the difficulties of the system. It says: we appeal to the cupidity and selfishness of a particular class, as if the rights and benefits which were to accrue to the whole consuming population of the Maritime Provinces were to be set aside as naught for an assumed benefit to be derived by a small class. Although we have a certain number of packets in our community, yet I would not be prepared for one instant to concede the principle that they had any peculiar claims as against the great consuming classes of the people. If this privilege were granted to the people of the Maritime Provinces, thereby reducing the duty to the consumers of oil to the extent of about 1 cent per gallon, the consideration as regards freights by the small number of people who engage in the business would not possess any weight. I believe a very small proportion of the oil brought into the Maritime Provinces is conveyed there in sailing vessels. The largest quantity is brought by the steamers which ply daily between the United States ports and the provinces. Such an arrangement as is suggested would very slightly interfere with that trade. But even if it did, the rights or the assumed profits in connection with that trade should not weigh against the general interests of the consuming classes.

Mr. WOOD (Westmoreland). I did not intend to take part in this discussion, but the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) has presented some figures to the House, and has asked me, mentioning me by name, to challenge their accuracy if I did not entirely concur in them. I was not able to follow the hon. member in all the figures he presented to the House, but I should not like the impression to be received by the House that I entirely concur in the figures which he submitted. The rate of freight quoted by the hon. gentleman, if I remember correctly, was 40 cents per barrel. So far as my knowledge goes, and I have had some experience in regard to importing American oil, the freight rarely, if ever, exceeds 20 cents per barrel, which represents only one-half a cent per gallon, instead of 1 cent per gallon. Then the hon. gentleman, in making up an invoice of American oil, charged the barrels at $1.50 each, which, on an average of 40 gallons to the barrel, would add nearly 4 cents or 3½ cents per gallon. If the hon. gentleman was making a calculation of actual cost of oil, including barrels, he should have credited the value of the barrels after the oil had been taken from them. I think the market rate of such barrels, even in country places, is one-half the original cost. These two items alone will effect a material reduction in the cost of the oil, according to the figures which the hon. gentleman presented.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) What does the hon. gentleman calculate as the value of the barrel afterwards?

Mr. WOOD (Westmoreland). About one-half. I know in Sackville, where I live, buyers of these barrels pay 60 cents for them and take them away. I do not know what they pay in other places, but that is the price where I reside. I am told by some Ontario people that in certain towns in Ontario they pay as high as 80 cents; so one-half of the original cost is a fair price. I desire to say a word or two in regard to what the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) and the hon. member for Yarmouth (Mr. Flint) have said with respect to the injustice done to the Maritime Provinces by not permitting the importation of American oil in tank steamers. My own opinion is that no injustice and no hardship have been done to the Maritime Provinces whatever. I believe this regulation is framed, not in view of any effect it would have in the Maritime Provinces, but for the benefit of the oil refiners in Ontario. It is the competition they would have to meet if this oil were carried across the lakes in tank steamers they fear more than the competition they would have to meet in the Maritime Provinces, if oil were permitted to be brought in by tank steamer.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) As the hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Wood) is conversant with the trade, I should like to ask him, for information, if there is any such substantial difference in the cost of oil in Philadelphia or New York when sold in tanks or in barrels?

Mr. WOOD (Westmoreland). I cannot answer that question.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The reason I ask is because I read in a trade journal the following :—

The price of barrelied oil has remained nominally unchanged at $5.15 for New York loading and at $5.50 for Philadelphia loading. Bulk oil has also been steady at $2.65 here and at $2.60 at Philadelphia. The principal foreign markets are steady.

All these quotations refer to refined oil. If they are correct they should settle the whole question.

Mr. WOOD (Westmoreland). If the one price included the barrel, and the other did not.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I assume it would.

Mr. WOOD (Westmoreland). I do not know how the quotations are, but that may account for the difference. With regard to oil for export to foreign countries in bulk I have very little knowledge of that business, because our knowledge of the oil trade in the Maritime Provinces is principally confined to the importation in barrels of the American oil for illuminating purposes. To come back to the question: would there be any advantage resulting to the Maritime Provinces from the importation of oil in bulk; I think if we just fix our attention on a few facts which we are all familiar with it will be evidence to the House that no material advantage can result even if that permission were given. The schooners that are accustomed to bring this oil to New Brunswick carry it for one-half a cent per gallon. They bring it in small quantities, they deliver at all the outports wherever it may be required, and if the oil were brought in tank steamers they certainly could not carry it at a less rate unless they brought an enormous quantity at a time. For my own part, I can hardly see how a tank steamer could afford to bring the oil at even so low a rate as that charged by the schooners. At all events, the steamers would be obliged to land their oil at some central seaport. The importers would be obliged to have their tanks there to receive it, and when they distributed it through the country they would have to add, to whatever the freight by the steamer was, the cost of barreling in this principal seaport the freight to the outport, and the cost of tankage, so that the cost when it reached the consumers in the country places—however it might be with the consumers in the principal centres—would certainly, in my opinion, be greater than it is under the present system. Then the points which are raised by my hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Hazen) are important points. If this permission were given and it proved successful, it would only be favouring some foreign steamships, to the detriment of our own sailing schooners. The hon. member for Yarmouth (Mr. Flint) made the statement that in his opinion the oil at present imported was principally imported in the steamers.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) It nearly all comes to Charlottetown by steamers.

Mr. WOOD (Westmoreland). It may come to some cities, it may come to Charlottetown in steamers, but I know it is not carried by steamers to the smaller ports.

Mr. McLEAN (P.E.I.) I think the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) is not correct in saying that the oil comes to Charlottetown in steamers. None whatever comes in steamers.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) How does it come, then?

Mr. McLEAN (P.E.I.) It comes in sailing vessels from New York.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I will take the hon. gentleman's statement, as he understands the trade better than I do.

Mr. WOOD (Westmoreland). I know that in regard to St. John a very large proportion of the oil imported there comes in schooners. I was not aware before that any came by steamers, and I am very doubtful if any does. How it is in Halifax I do not know; but in the outports of Moncton, Sackville and Dorchester, with which I am best acquainted, I know that the American oil is all carried by schooners and is brought in for the very low rate of freight to which I have referred. The reduction of 20 cents duty on the barrel will, of course, help the people in this. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Davies) expressed some surprise that we on this side should be able to applaud the very excellent speech, as we regard it, of the Minister of Finance, and that we should be able to applaud the second time when that hon. gentleman at the close of his speech found himself able to reduce the duty on oil. It does not appear to me, at all events from my point of view, that it was at all strange or that it need excite the least surprise that we were able to do this. In the address of the hon. Minister he stated that it was the policy of the Government to retain a duty sufficient to preserve the industry which existed at the present time in Canada, and also to provide, if possible, for the future development of this industry when the other important oil fields to which he referred were found capable of being developed. At the close of his speech we were a second time glad to learn that he was able to accomplish this object, and at the same time to reduce the duty on the imported oil which we in the Maritime Provinces so largely consume.

Mr. HAZEN. When I asked the hon. member for Yarmouth (Mr. Flint) if in his opinion the allowing of the bringing in of oil in bulk in tank steamers to the lower provinces would not have a prejudicial effect on the shipping interests of these provinces, I think that he tacitly admitted that that would be the case to a certain extent. If we are to believe the evidence that was laid before the House last year there can be no doubt about it, that so far as the port of St. John is concerned, it is practically the unanimous opinion of all who are engaged in the shipping trade there that if oil were allowed to be brought in in bulk in tank steamers it would have a prejudicial effect upon the shipping interests. That is the evidence laid before this House, and submitted to the Governor General in Council by almost all the coasting owners, both Liberals and Conservatives, in that city. Last session a memorial was presented to His Excellency the Governor General in Council from a number of gentlemen in the city of St. John, and when I read their names my hon. friend from Yarmouth (Mr. Flint), and I think my hon. friend from Queen's (Mr. Davies), will agree, that there was no party advantage sought, as they will find the names of gentlemen belonging to both political parties equally on that memorial.

Mr. FLINT. Will the hon. gentleman read the prayer of the memorial?

Mr. HAZEN. I shall be most happy to. I will read the prayer of the memorial and the names of the petitioners. It is as follows:—

St. JOHN, N.B., 3rd June, 1892.

To His Excellency the Right Honourable Sir Frederick Arthur Stanley, Baron Stanley of Preston, Governor General of Canada, etc.

The memorial of the vessel owners, lumber shippers, lime shippers, and others of the Maritime Provinces.

Respectfully sheweth,—

That the foreign illuminating oil imported into the Maritime Provinces has been carried exclusively by our coasting vessels in barrels from New York and Boston to the Maritime Province ports up to the present time, to the extent of about seventy or eighty schooner cargoes per year, being a source of very considerable income to our coasting trade.

That if the Bill now before Parliament, promoted by an agent of the Standard Oil Company of the United States, asking for the admission of foreign oil in bulk, be made, it will result in serious loss to our coasting trade, as that oil would then be carried in tank steamers, the property of the said Standard Oil Company, who would not only obtain all the profit from the sale of the imported oil (at the expense of the established local dealers) as a monopoly of that business by them must inevitably result, as has been the case in all other places where they have obtained the facilities, which the said petition would give them, for destroying all competition, but they would also derive all of the benefit from the transportation of oil in bulk at the expense of our coasting vessels.

That it would furthermore seriously affect the shipment of lumber from the Maritime Provinces, as where our schooners which carry cargoes of lumber to the United States ports are enabled to obtain return cargoes of oil, under the conditions, they can afford to carry the lumber at a less rate of freight than if they had to return in ballast, as would be the case if they lost the oil traffic, and the advance in rate of freight on lumber which would thereby be necessitated, would add to the cost of the lumber delivered in American markets, and make competition in those markets with that commodity the more difficult, which at present is only too formidable.

That it would also add another burden to the lime industry, which our vessels are enabled to carry at a comparatively low rate of freight at present, in consequence of their obtaining deck loads of empty oil barrels for United States ports, which traffic would be destroyed were foreign oil imported in bulk,

Your memorialists would, therefore, earnestly and most respectfully pray that this Bill be not passed, the passing of which would result in a serious loss to the local capital, and to the advantage of a foreign corporation.

Some hon. gentlemen opposite will know some of the people whose names I have read, and will know that half of them are not supporters of the present Administration. In addition to that memorial, a telegram was sent to the representatives of the city of St. John, signed very largely by the same gentlemen, to this effect:

We strongly deprecate any change in regulations to permit importation of oil in tank vessels, or steamers, as it would be prejudicial to the interest of the trade of the Maritime Provinces, and would urge all opposition possible on your part.

It appears that these gentlemen, engaged in this important business in the city of St.

John, rightly or wrongly, believe that it would not be for the benefit of that part of the Maritime Provinces at least to allow, as my hon. friend from Yarmouth (Mr. Flint) would allow, oil to be imported from the United States in tank vessels. I would like to say one word with regard to a remark made by my hon. friend from Queen's (Mr. Davies). He alluded to the fact that our people in the Maritime Provinces prefer using American oil, because they believe it to be better than Canadian oil. My own personal experience would lead me to conclude that that feeling is to a considerable extent a matter of prejudice. Until about a year ago I was in the habit of buying for my own household use in St. John, American oil for which I paid 22 cents a gallon by the barrel. Some months ago I thought I would make a trial of Canadian oil, which I purchased by the barrel for 16 cents a gallon; and my experience and that of the other members of my household was that we had never used a better quality of oil than that Canadian oil.

Mr. BOWERS. Did that price include the price of the barrel?

Mr. HAZEN. No, it does not; it is fair to say that; but when I returned the barrel I was allowed 80 cents for it. My recollection is that the price I paid for the American oil did not include the price of the barrel either. That oil which I got for 16 cents a gallon was as good as any oil I ever used.

Mr. FLINT. How does the hon. gentleman account for the fact that the people of the Maritime Provinces use so much more imported oil than they do Canadian oil, even though the price is somewhat higher?

Mr. CAMERON. Is that a fact?

Mr. FLINT. It is a fact.

Mr. CAMERON. I doubt it very much.

Mr. HAZEN. I am not conversant with the trade. I simply rose to give my personal experience. But I think the reason may be that in the years gone by the same care was not taken at Petrolea with the refining of the oil that is taken now. I do not know whether that is the reason or not; but years ago the oil sent from the upper provinces down to the provinces by the sea was not of as good a quality as the oil sent at the present time, although at that time the oil had the same protection from the Administration of hon. gentlemen opposite that it has to-day from the present Administration. With regard to the oil advertised in the city of St. John at 15 cents a gallon retail, I am not in a position to speak from personal knowledge; but I have been told that oil bought there is giving a fair degree of satisfaction, though I do not say that with any degree of authority. But this I do say: I was talking the question over a short time ago with a New Brunswick dealer in oils, who gave me to understand that the feeling against Canadian oil existing in our province was to a considerable extent a matter of prejudice. He told me that on several occasions people had got Canadian oil at his store, thinking that they were purchasing American oil, and that they had made no complaint at all after they had used it.

Mr. CASEY. This matter has been reasonably well discussed—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. CASEY. But very little on the part of those gentlemen who raise the frog-like chorus of "hear, hear," whenever any allusion is made to the length of the discussion on this side, I do not rise to croak or to excite croaks; but I cannot let this matter pass without saying something about it, and the more so because I had occasion to discuss this matter some twenty years ago when my hon. friends on this side of the House were in power. I will begin by saying that this is one of the cases in which it would be specially useful to the House to know on what ground the men who have this outrageous protection of very much more than 100 per cent, demand its continuance. It is one of those cases, in which it would not only be right but should be obligatory to put the Finance Minister and the representatives of the oil combines upon their oaths, and make them tell the House and the country honestly and straightforwardly on what ground they propose to retain this outrageous duty. The hon. Finance Minister laughs at the idea of being put upon his oath, or having his colleagues the manufacturers put upon oath. I call them his colleagues, because they are undoubtedly his colleagues and his coaches in the production of this tariff and the statement he has presented to the House. We had a little breeze the other evening about one member of the House, and a Minister at that, being coached by another member. The Minister of Finance has shown that he was coached on this subject, not by a colleague in the House, but by those in whose interests and on behalf of whose bank accounts he has been legislating. That is how he has got his opinions and his arguments on this question of coal oil. There was a strolling committee or commission of inquiry going around the country last summer and fall ostensibly to see what changes the farmers wanted in the tariff. We do not know what that expedition cost. The Finance Minister says he has not footed up the amount, but he would not tell us the amount even if he had, in answer to a question from this side of the House. We shall have to fish it out of next year's Auditor General's report or out of the papers; but we will get at it somehow. We know that it has cost a considerable amount. Farmers came before that commission, and although they were met as opponents by the two Controllers who conducted the inquiry, and although they were brow-beaten and resisted by those two hon. gentlemen, they did make their views known on some points. Upon none so emphatically as this article of coal oil were they bound to have a very considerable reduction in the duty. After going to all this expense to find what the farmers want about coal oil, the Minister refuses to make any material reduction. He has been wasteful in two ways—wasteful of the money of the public generally, taken from the country to pay the expenses of a hippodrome commission not intended to accomplish anything, and wasteful of the money of the consumer by retaining this tax. In view of the two facts: the well-expressed opinion of the farmers on the subject, and the refusal of the Finance Minister to take any notice of their opinion, I am compelled to speak on a subject which I might otherwise have passed over in silence. We have a lot of petty disputes and local points raised as to whether the importation of oil in tank steamers would imperil the interests of a few coasting schooners in New Brunswick or elsewhere. That is all beside the question. What interests the country is the fact that, according to the Minister's own admission, a tax of 100 per cent is imposed on one of the prime necessities of life, even after this reduction of 1 1-5 cents per gallon. The hon. gentleman tells us that this oil can be sold at Petrolea, and is sold at 6 cents a gallon, and that, if it costs much more anywhere else, it is the fault of the swindling retailers, who will go on charging too much for it. We have to hear from the retailers yet more fully on this question. We have the coaches of the Finance Minister—one sitting in this House here—I do not know but that there are two in that matter. But we have at least one sitting in the House, representing this combine which should be illegal, and would have been made illegal, I believe, by the Act which passed this House some years ago, if that Act had not been emasculated in the Senate.

Mr. LISTER. The hon. gentleman made a statement here, whether jocularly or not, I do not know. But I desire to state here that I never approached the Finance Minister, either directly or indirectly.

Mr. CASEY. My hon. friend understood quite well that I made the allusion jocularly. If he did not know it before, I tell him so now, inasmuch as he represents a constituency largely interested in this industry.

Mr. LISTER. Many of the hon. gentlemen who have spoken, and are now speaking, know very little of the subject.

Mr. CASEY. It may be true that many of the hon. gentleman who have spoken know very little of the subject. The difficulty seems to be that the only ones who know the subject thoroughly are those whose constituents are interested in producing an erroneous impression on the minds of us poor ignorant people who know nothing about it. In 1866, when Mr. Colby, formerly President of the Council in this Government, was urging the reduction of one-half in the duty on coal oil, I had the pleasure of going through a series of experiments, carefully conducted by coal oil manufacturers, in the presence of various members of the House and the Government. And at that time I certainly did acquire a very passable knowledge of the method of refining coal oil and the whole coal oil question. Perhaps my knowledge is not so very ready now, but I feel some interest in the question, and I think I can show the House that I know something about it before I get through. My hon. friend need not imagine that he can check criticism by insinuating that those who differ with him know nothing of the subject.

An hon. MEMBER. We will leave that to those who hear us and the country.

Mr. CASEY. The fact remains that, on the Minister's own assertion as to the prices of coal oil at Petrolea he proposes to charge a duty of 100 per cent on this necessity of life. He has shown no good reason for such a tax, so disproportionate to any other he imposes. He told us he was going to tax lightly the necessities of life, yet coal oil is a necessity of life, and he taxes it about three times as high as the average duty imposed on other articles. Let us see what Mr. Colby said, in 1876, with regard to the reduction of duties on coal oil at that time. We often hear of quotations from what has been said by some gentleman on this side at some period of his parliamentary career in favour of protection. Let us see what a late member of the Government said, not so long ago, with regard to a low tariff on coal oil. In moving for a reduction of the duty, he pointed out that:

When the duty of 15 cents a gallon had been imposed, refined petroleum was worth about 40 cents a gallon. At that time there was also an excise duty of 5 cents a gallon so that there was a protection to the infant manufacture of that day of 10 cents a gallon, which would be 25 per cent on the product.

He admitted that the duty then had not been disproportionate, and went on to show that at the time he spoke, in March, 1876, the price of coal oil had fallen in the United States to 10 cents a gallon, United States currency, which was then not quite at par. On that basis of 10 cents United States currency, the refiner, under 7½ cents duty, which was the duty Mr. Colby proposed to levy upon coal oil, would receive a protection of 20 to 25 per cent, while other manufacturers in the country had to be content with 17½ per cent. Mr. Colby thought if they had a protection a few per cent higher than ordinary manufacturers it would be quite sufficient, and I think he was right, and the Government evidently afterwards thought he was right, for the reduction took place ultimately. After these specific remarks, he went on to mention a few general considerations. He said :

This tax fell very seriously on the individual consumer as well as on the whole country. The man who consumes a gallon of oil per week—and thousands do that and more—pays five dollars a year as a tax to support the refiners who control the prices in Canada.

Instead of $5 we would pay about $3 per year under the proposed tax.

If a new Budget were coming down it might be urged with great propriety that light should be placed on the same basis as other necessities of life. There is nothing that contribute more to the comfort and happiness of our people, especially the poorer classes, than cheap light during the long winter evenings. A duty of $7\frac{1}{2}$ cents would be almost 100 per cent on its market value of 10 cents United States currency. If a tax of 80 or 100 per cent were imposed on articles of food it would be considered preposterous.

This is a statement of a strong protectionist, at a time, however, when he wished to take a different line with regard to one item.

Committee rose, and it being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

House again in Committee on Ways and Means.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. CASEY. Mr. Chairman, when you left the Chair at six o'clock, I was quoting some remarks of a late colleague of hon. gentlemen opposite, Mr. Colby, with regard to the unwisdom of imposing a high tax on coal oil. I would quote further :

The present condition of the trade is due to what is called the London combination. It is well known there exists a combination of gentlemen who have taken advantage of the liberality of the Legislature and the high rate of tariff to control the entire market in this country. In order to accomplish this they have subsidized and closed up all the refineries in the country, but the very few which are in operation in their interest. Of forty-four refineries only about four are in operation, and the rest, which are closed up, are paid from two to four thousand dollars a year. They have bought off all competitors and organized a system of extortion upon the people of this country. There they stand between the producer and the consumer, dictating to the producer on the one hand, what he shall receive for his crude oil, and to the consumer, on the other hand, what he shall pay for his refined petroleum.

So far the hon. gentleman's remarks, made in 1876, are equally applicable now. I do not know the exact number of refineries in operation, but I know the number is very much less than it used to be twenty years or more ago. I know there is a combination amongst the refiners of coal oil ; I know that, as Mr. Colby said, that combination dictates not only to the consumer of refined, but also to the producer of crude oil. The hon. Minister of Finance has drawn us a very touching picture, I might almost say a pastoral picture of the small producer of coal oil for whom he has so much sympathy, the man who owns but a few acres of land upon which he has a well bored, the produce of which well he sells to the refiner. He has drawn for us a pastoral picture of this poor elector of East Lambton milking his little well, and every evening carrying the produce over in a couple of patent pails to the refinery. I do not say that is how it is done, but from the tone in which the hon. Minister talked about it, one might almost imagine that the production was on that scale. No doubt the hon. gentleman knows that the oil combine makes regular contracts with these people, giving them practically the combine's own prices. They have the owner of the well completely at their mercy, for he cannot sell his oil except to the combine. The owner of the well is not benefited by the advantage that is given to the combine by this high tariff. Now, Mr. Colby goes on, and in what he says next, I am sorry to say we cannot apply his language to the present condition of the country :

For the first time in Canada a ring has been organized for the purpose of regulating and controlling prices. This arises out of the exceptional condition of the tariff—the fact that it is made a specific instead of an ad valorem duty. Owing to the rigidity of the rate they could see, no matter what the cost of production might be, precisely the margin of profit, and avail themselves of it to dictate to the consumers what they should pay.

The last few words I have quoted still apply. We have still a specific duty and it operates to the full extent of the duty to increase the price of the refined article. But Mr. Colby's remark that "for the first time in Canada a ring has been organized for the purpose of regulating and controlling prices," is a statement to make us sigh and think of the good old times that are gone. I saw Mr. Colby in the city the other day. He must often think of the time when he was able to make the statement to the House : "For the first time in Canada a ring has been formed." We who have to bear the burden and heat of the day in Parliament at the present time know that, instead of only one ring being formed, the whole country is governed by rings ; the Government is run by rings and is conducted in the interests of rings ; tariffs are formed at the dictation of rings ; and, instead of there being, as in the good days of 1876, only one ring, we are now all covered with rings from head to foot like a South Sea Island princess, and, like her, we find our rings very heavy to carry. The fact that a ring has been formed seems so startling to Mr. Colby that he continues :

Under the circumstances it is the duty of the Government and of Parliament to administer a lesson, quick, sharp and decisive, to those gentlemen who, for the first time in the history of Canada, have organized a ring for the purpose of preventing competition and monopolizing the market.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). That is the fruit of protection.

Mr. COLBY admitted it was the fruit of excessive and undue protection and not of the reasonable policy which has been advocated by the Opposition in this House.

The Opposition at that time being the same gentlemen who now sit on the Treasury benches.

It was the fruit of the protection which he had repudiated, and the protectionists were consistent with their principles in denouncing this libel on a sound policy.

Mr. Colby claimed to be a protectionist; he claimed that we ought to encourage and develop home industries; yet from the point of view of consistency with sound protective policy, he denounced the duty on coal oil at that time as being excessive and burdensome. And, mind you, Mr. Speaker, the duty he found fault with at that time was not as excessive as the duty now imposed. The protection afforded was only 10 cents per gallon, and that on oil that was worth about 10 cents a gallon in the United States. There was a customs duty of 15 cents on foreign oil imported, and an excise duty of 5 cents per gallon on oil manufactured in Canada, so that there was a protection of 10 cents per gallon. Now there is a protective duty of 6 cents a gallon on oil that can be bought in bulk, as quoted in this debate, at 2.6 cents per gallon in Philadelphia, or $2.60 per hundred gallons, making a duty of over 200 per cent upon that grade of oil. Mr. Colby went on to prove that the revenue would not suffer from the change he proposed. He alluded to the trouble in smuggling which we know must go on under such a high duty, and with such an extended boundary line as we have, and he stated that if the duty was reduced, he believed the imports would be doubled. Events have proved that he was right in that prediction. At that time we received in customs duties on oil, with a tariff of 15 cents per gallon, $103,665; whereas now, as I understood the Finance Minister, we receive $400,000 this year on duties on American oil. The reduction in duty that Mr. Colby advocated, and which afterwards came about, has resulted in quadrupling the amount of revenue received from it. If the duty were reduced now to one-half the present amount, or even less, it would still be an extremely productive revenue tariff. It would put a great deal of money into the treasury, instead of putting it into the pockets of the combines who control the coal oil interest. But since Mr. Colby's day as a coal oil reformer, the idea of revenue has been dropped out of sight in settling the taxes. The present Finance Minister says that revenue is not in question; what he aims at is to develop certain manufactures in the country. Now, if he wants to develop the coal oil industry, there is an easy way open to him. While he is giving this tremendous protection to the refiner, let him follow out his alleged principle by letting raw material come in at low rates, let him reduce the duty on crude petroleum, or knock it off altogether. That is taxed by the present tariff at 3.5 cents per gallon, which amounts to a duty of about 150 per cent on the crude oil, taking a barrel of crude to be worth a dollar, which I understand has been about the average value of Canadian crude. American crude oil is not worth quite as much, so that the present duty is really a stronger protection against that oil; it is a protection of 150 per cent, taking the average price of the more valuable Canadian oil as a basis of calculation. Now, if he would seriously reduce, or altogether remove, that duty on crude oil, and let us have the raw material free, refineries would spring up all over Canada, and hundreds and thousands of men would be employed in refining American imported crude, not only for use in Canada, but for export. We can refine here as cheaply as they can in the United States, and why should we not import American oil and refine it here, and send it to the ends of the earth, thereby giving employment to men at good rates of wages, as the Government claim they wish to do? But no, that would disturb the combine which regulates, not only the price of refined, but the price of crude, which forces the oil producer to accept their price, and compels the oil consumer to pay the price they ask. For the sake of this one combine the whole country is taxed to this enormous extent. I cannot do better than to quote a few more remarks from Mr. Colby, to emphasize the fact that the general public are suffering for the benefit of a very few. He says:

In bringing forward this resolution he did so purely in the public interest, and with no desire to embarrass the Government. Could any one doubt it was in the interest of the country to have this inordinate tax upon one of the necessities of life, and the cost of it to the consumer reduced one-third? How could hon. gentlemen decline to remedy this unmitigated evil?

And the evil is now as unmitigated as it was then, even greater than it was then, on account of the fall in coal oil elsewhere.

Could they go to their constituents and say they had voted to allow this abuse to continue twelve months longer?

And so he proceeded to emphasize the resolution. The country had reason to thank Mr. Colby then for calling attention to this matter, and to thank those who reduced the duty and removed the excise; but, Sir, they have no cause to thank the Government for the present proposal to reduce the taxation 1 1-5th cents per gallon, leaving it, as I said before, even after that reduction, a tax of at least 100 per cent. The combinesters pretend that a reduction of, say, one-half in this duty would kill the industry in the one neighbourhood where it exists; well, even if it did, I think it would be very hard for us to defend, before the whole country, our course in saying that we preferred the interest of that one neighbourhood to the interest of all the rest of the Dominion. But it is simply false to allege that a serious reduction in the duty would kill the trade. I know enough of the coal oil refining, from the experiments I have seen and from observing the operations of refining on a business scale, to know how much is made out of the by-products. I am quite aware that we cannot make as good illuminating oil out of Canadian crude as we can out of American crude, at the same expenditure of money; but by reducing the percentage taken out for illuminating purposes so that you will not bring over too much paraffine in the distillation, you can greatly improve the quality of the distilled product; and then, by developing the trade in lubricating oils and in the solid products left in the oil after the first quality of illuminating oil is distilled from it, you can find a very large and profitable market. Even now, our lubricating oils are sold in the States; they cannot make lubricating oil to compare in quality with our own, any more than we can make illuminating oil to compare with theirs at the same cost of money. Yet the fact remains that our crude oil is worth on the market more per barrel than theirs, because it contains more of these other valuable ingredients. The effect of a reduction in this duty would be, in the first place, to curtail somewhat the profits of the combine on the higher classes of illuminating oil; and in the second place, to force them to develop more thoroughly the manufacture of, and the trade in, the other products of the Canadian crude oil. They would have to take their place as progressive manufacturers, without the Chinese wall of protection which shuts them out from outside competition; but they would still have a very valuable property, even if the trade in illuminating oil of the higher class was entirely done away with. Now, as to the quality of the oil itself. It is absurd to pretend that the Canadian oil which is sold at 12 and 15 cents a gallon, is as good as the American oil at anything like the same figure. Everybody who has used the two, knows better than that. Canadian oil will burn as long, perhaps a little longer, quantity for quantity, and keeping the blaze of the same size in the two lamps. I have seen that experiment tried, one lamp filled with American oil and another with Canadian oil, and the Canadian lamp being turned up to the same point, burned somewhat longer than the other, but it burned with an inferior flame, it burned with a yellow flame, it burned with a flickering flame, as compared with the other, and was altogether an inferior quality of illuminating oil. In the second place, even at these rates of 12 and 15 cents per gallon, note the tremendous difference with the prices of American oil. Why, Sir, American oil is quoted by the hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I., at $5.05 per 100 gallons, in the barrel, at Philadelphia. Compare that price, with the freight and the fair profit of the retailer added, with the 12 to 15 cents at which our cheap Canadian oil retails here, and you will see there is a vast difference. Again, as to these low prices. We know they only began lately, that we never heard of such low prices for Canadian oil until the agitation was started last year. We know that the refiners have made special arrangements to have their oil sold in different districts at low rates; we know it, because the Finance Minister so informed the House. The hon. Minister said:

A year or more ago, very large prices were paid for oil, whether they were Canadian oils or American oils. That was not the fault of the producer at Petrolia. At the very time the Canadian oils were selling from 25 cents to 45 cents per gallon in Canada, they were being sold in bulk at Petrolia from 9 and 11 cents per gallon. It was pointed out to the producers last year that it was necessary for them to take measures by which oil should be reduced in price to the consuming public, and with an expenditure of commendable energy, and an expenditure, I am sure, of a large amount of money, they have perfected arrangements by which to-day, instead of the prices which I have quoted, oil is being distributed now from Calgary to Cape Breton and sold at no place at a cost greater than 25 cents per gallon, and coming down to a cost of 10 and 12½ cents per gallon.

This is the whole matter in a nutshell. The manufacturers inaugurated an era of low prices when they knew the tariff provisions were coming before Parliament. We have, however, no guarantee that these low prices will continue longer than for the time being. What proof have we that the coal oil manufacturers will not put up the price the moment this session is over and all danger of wiping out the present high protection has passed? If they are able to spend large sums of money in order to be able to sell their oil cheaper than before, that fact alone shows that previously they were making undue profits. It would be endless to enter into all the arguments and considerations that occur to any one in regard to this tax, which is outrageously high, and one levied, not for the benefit of the producers, of crude oil, as pretended by the Minister, and not even according to the basis of protection afforded to other industries. If we take the price of oil at 6 cents per gallon, a duty amounting to 2 cents per gallon would be equal to 33⅓ per cent protection, which would be a duty on the same basis as that given to great manufacturing industries of this country, and it is going a little too far to ask Parliament to give this industry special protection for the benefit of the oil refiners, or even for the benefit of those who produce the crude oil.

Mr. McNEILL. I cannot agree with the hon. gentleman in the statement that we have no cause to thank the Government for what they have done in regard to this matter. For my part, personally, I thank them very much for what they have done, and I think the people of the province to which I have the honour to belong will also thank the Government for their action. I believe the people of Ontario have no desire to see the industries of this country destroyed. Personally, I object to excessive protection, but I object still more to the murder of our native industries, and I am quite sure from what has come to my knowledge in regard to this matter, and I have taken a good deal of interest in it, that the Government desired to go just as far as they could to meet the wishes of the consumers of coal oil in this country without destroying the industry. They have only been checked in the amount of reduction of duty by the consideration that if they reduced it further, according to the best judgment they possessed, after they had given the matter the most careful consideration, they would destroy the industry. Although the hon. Finance Minister has said this is a somewhat peculiar industry, I will go so far as to say that, personally, I believe, on the broad principles of protection, there is perhaps as little to be said in favour of the protection of this industry as could be urged in favour of any industry that might be mentioned, still I am quite sure the people of the country desire that this industry should survive. They desire it should survive for two reasons: First, because they have no wish to see all the capital invested in this industry lost, and they have no desire to see all the people who have been induced by the action of Government after Government to embark in this industry, ruined. And, second, because they desire to avoid placing themselves in the power of one of the most crushing and cruel combines existing in the world to-day, and we must remember that if we destroy our coal oil industries in Canada, we are simply handing ourselves over bound hand and foot to the tender mercies of that great combination which exists on the other side of the line.

Mr. FLINT. Is it worse than ours?

Mr. McNEILL. It is a great deal worse, because it is a great deal more powerful. It is also more dangerous, because when we kill our own industry, it will be a combine over which Parliament can have no control whatever. And as the Minister of Finance has pointed out, there is every probability that hereafter this industry may assume very different proportions in Canada from its proportions to-day. If we had the Standard Oil Company controlling the whole of the oil products of this continent, I should like to know what probability there would be of Canada developing its oil industry to a greater extent than at present, what opportunity there would be to open up new fields.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Does it control the United States at the present time?

Mr. McNEILL. If the hon. gentleman will look into the matter, he will find that the Standard Oil Company of the United States act in the most tyrannical manner, that in some places they sell oil at very low figures for the express purpose of killing out competition, while at other places, where there is no competition, it runs prices up to very high figures, twice and perhaps three times as much as the price oil is selling in other parts of the country.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman will see that the prices quoted were at New York, Philadelphia and Baltimore, and at all events at those places the price was under 3 cents. How does the hon. gentleman account for the low price if there is a great monopoly?

Mr. McNEILL. I think evidence can be produced to show that the prices charged by the Standard Oil Company of the United States are in many places very high indeed. The company charges prices to suit themselves, they have the whole market in their own hands, and as soon as we kill our own industries here we shall be placed under the heel of that combine, and the people of this country do not want to see that result. For these reasons, and because I believe that the Government has gone as far as in their judgment they could go in reducing the duties on coal oil, I desire to say I do not at all agree with the hon. gentleman, but on the contrary, hold that we have cause to be grateful to the Government for the careful consideration they have given to this matter and for the conclusion at which they have arrived.

Mr. FLINT. In the remarks which I have made on this question upon previous occasions, as well as in the remarks which I will make to-night, I assumed as a basis for discussion, that for the present at any rate a certain amount of protection on coal oil was to be taken for granted. In other words, I was not arguing the matter upon the principles of a revenue tariff or upon the principles of free trade, but upon the assumption which I have mentioned when my arguments were made. All that we have pressed for—at any rate all that I as a representative of the Maritime Provinces have pressed for—was justice, equality and fair-play as between different portions of the Dominion. No question of protection or free trade, or revenue tariff, or no question as to striking down the industry at Petrolea, can fairly enter into that phase of this discussion. I ask the House, and I ask the Government, to make some provision for the importation of refined oil in bulk, to enable the consumers of the Maritime Provinces to obtain that relief which this concession is said to have given to the consumers in Ontario and Quebec. I have been met on former occasions by my hon. friends from the city of St. John (Mr. Hazen and Mr. Chesley) with a quotation from a petition to the Government sent by representative men of the city of St. John. Now let us see to what extent that petition affects this question, and to what extent the Government has complied with the request made by these very respectable gentlemen. They petitioned the Government and the House: to refuse their assent to any measure looking to the importation of oil in bulk, either by tank cars or steamers, and the whole weight of the argument which they brought to bear upon the Government and upon the House was: that by permitting the importation of this oil in bulk, either by tank steamers or by tank cars, they were striking a blow at the traffic in this commodity by sailing vessels. Upon this one-sided ground alone, which, as I conceive it a narrow and selfish ground, they appealed to Parliament not to permit at all the importation of oil in bulk. I presume that these hon. gentlemen supporting the Government cheered when the Government deliberately ignored this petition and paid no attention to its prayer, and permitted oil to be imported in bulk, with the reservation only, that it should be imported in cars and not in vessels. The effect of this has been, as any one might have predicted, to enable the merchants of the city of St. John, a city which is a convenient distributing point for all the Maritime Provinces, to import the refined oil and to distribute it to the Maritime Provinces. All the fearful consequences that were predicted to result from such a wide departure from fair-play and fair dealing, must have in consequence resulted from the action of the Government. In other words, by the permission of the importation of oil in bulk by tank cars, all these evils to the carrying trade of the smaller vessels of the Maritime Provinces must have been realized. I understand from very good authority that about 75 per cent of all the oil imported into St. John is now imported in tank cars, and consequently the whole argument based upon the representations of those very respectable gentlemen of the city of St. John, falls to the ground, because the oil comes in at the present time in tank cars, and vessels cannot carry it in competition with the railways. I appeal to the Minister to do the same justice by the people of Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island, and the more distant portions of New Brunswick, that he is doing to the distributing centre of the city of St. John, and allow us to import into Yarmouth, or Halifax, or Sydney, or any of the larger ports of Nova Scotia, this refined oil in bulk, so as to make these places distributing centres, deriving all the advantages from the making of barrels and the handling of this oil, which would result if it were imported there in bulk. I am arguing this question without any interference whatever with the protective principle. I am asking it solely on the basis of fair and equal justice to all portions of the Dominion. I am asking that the consumers, and that the handlers of this expensive article in one portion of the Dominion, should have precisely the same privileges as they have in other portions of the country. If it is, as I believe it to be, a benefit to the consumers to be near the distributing point, then our people in Nova Scotia should have that benefit as well as the people of St. John. At the present time I understand a large quantity of oil is brought in bulk to St. John, and the petition which my hon. friend (Mr. Hazen) quoted with so much gusto against me, has been ignored by the Government. I presume, however, that the action of the Government meets with his approval, as any action that the Government might take would likely receive his approval, whether that action was for a restriction or an extension of these privileges. I say that the time is coming when hon. gentlemen opposite will just as loudly cheer the next step taken by the Government, and that step will be to permit the importation of oil by tank vessels as well as by tank cars. As to the talk about the terrible crushing, grinding monopoly of the Standard Oil Company of the United States, I believe the people of this country will take these diatribes for about what they are worth. It is true that the Standard Oil Company is an immense corporation, that to a certain extent it does control the oil trade of the United States; but yet it is within the knowledge of every gentleman in this House that in consequence of the application of this enormous amount of capital, in consequence of the business ability brought to bear upon it by the minds at the head of that corporation, and in consequence of the circumstances surrounding the oil trade and the competition elsewhere, the price of refined oil has fallen steadily year by year almost ever since the formation of the Standard Oil Company. The prices of oil in the United States as quoted here to-day, show conclusively that the Standard Oil Company is not to be compared as a grinding, crushing monopoly, to the monopoly which the Government of this country has enabled certain refiners of the Dominion of Canada to create. We have a combination in Canada which, for its own benefit, is taking out of the people of the Maritime Provinces from $150,000 to $160,000 more than ought justly be taken. When this question is again approached by the Government, I believe that they will do well to still further reduce the tariff upon this great necessity of life, or at any rate, that they will bring their minds to bear upon the problem of doing fair and equal justice to all portions of the country by allowing the people to import in bulk or in any way they please.

Mr. GIBSON. I wish to say a few words with regard to the duties on coal oil. During last winter a gentleman living in the town of Niagara, sent me an invoice in which, on $30 worth of coal oil he had been charged duties amounting in all to $37.62; made up of the duty on the oil, the duty on the barrels, and the inspection fees. It will be seen therefore that the duties amounted to $7.62 more than the actual price of the oil. Yet, to-day the Government supporters clap their hands with joy at the remarkable reduction that the Minister of Finance has made upon the coal oil duties, when he is only drawing a sprat across the track, when we find that his proposed reduction on an importation of 400 gallons of oil would amount to the handsome sum of $4.40. Taking that from the invoice price, $37.62, that my hon. friend in Niagara paid, they will still have to pay $33.22 on $30 worth of coal oil, a duty of over 100 per cent. The hon. Finance Minister this afternoon mentioned a number of towns and cities in the Dominion where he said the price of coal oil had been materially reduced. I can tell him that where I live the people have to pay $1 for 5 gallons of coal oil, while across the river in Buffalo they could get the same for 25 cents. The Government have not gone so far in the reduction of the duty on coal oil as they should have gone. I agree with the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey) when he says that in all fairness the producers of coal oil should be put on the same level as the manufacturers, and that if they were they would be well protected by a duty of 2 or 3 cents a gallon.

Mr. GILLMOR. I will not quote any statistics in connection with this matter, but a thought or two have occurred to me during this discussion which I would like to express. I suppose we ought to be thankful for the reduction, because I am pretty well acquainted with the Finance Minister, and—

He will if he will, you may depend on't;
He won't if he won't, and there's an end on't.

If he takes off one cent, he will not go any further. In this case he takes off a cent and a fifth, and I suppose we ought to be thankful for small favours. While this discussion has been going on, I have just been thinking about taxation generally. In the first place, the gentlemen who seem to delight in rolling this protective tariff under their tongues as a sweet morsel, do not like to pay their own tax bills. I am sure there is not one of them who does not grumble at his county rates when the tax bill is presented to him. No one likes taxation. It is an evil anyway, and we only put up with it when it is for the public good. Taxation is bad enough when it is for the public good and when it is spent honestly; how much worse is it when it is not for the public good, and is spent dishonestly? If the Government want to keep out American coal oil, why in the name of common sense do they not keep it out? They have the power to do so. But they do not exactly want that. They want a protective tariff, and they want a revenue tariff; they do not know exactly what they want. With regard to this tax on coal oil, I think the Government ought to issue a proclamation asking all the churches in the Dominion to pray next Sunday that nobody should ever discover any more oil in Canada, because the moment it is discovered they will want to make it as scarce and dear as possible. The Lord has evidently made a mistake in giving the people coal oil in Canada, because for twenty years we have been taxing it. The Finance Minister got up this afternoon and made a most pathetic appeal on behalf of the poor people who had discovered the oil in the earth, and spoke of the Standard Oil Company of the United States, the great combine that was going to spread its upas branches all over Canada and destroy everything and everybody. But he is working to establish in Canada a combine just like it. That is the object of the whole system. If the Government want to keep out American oil they can do so. But they want revenue, and they are getting $300,000 from the duty on coal oil. But there are plenty of ways of getting revenue without taxing coal oil. This is one of the worst ways in the world of getting revenue. If you want protection, keep things out; a revenue tariff is for bringing things in. The whole system is contradictory. It is like what an hon. friend of mine says of one kind of theology:

You shall and you shan't,
You will and you won't;
You'll be damned if you do,
You'll be damned if you don't.

Take them on one tack, and they say we want revenue; take them on another tack, and they say we want protection. Why, you do not know what to do with them. I am very thankful to the Minister of Finance, so far as my constituents are concerned, that he has taken off one and a fifth cents. That is a wonderful thing, and no doubt they ought to be thankful for small favours. The hon. gentleman need not think that this duty will compel the people to use Canadian oil. I never had more than one or two gallons of it in my house, and it smelt so badly that I thought there must be a dozen polecats about my yard; I do not want any more of it. It is possible that he may compel the people to use it, but I think they would prefer using American oil, even if they had to pay a great deal more for it. I was glad to hear my hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Hazen). It seems that he is anxious about the shipping industry. He wants to encourage the coasting trade, and he thinks that by allowing coal oil to come in, in tank vessels, the Government could help that trade. I do not wonder that the hon. gentleman is anxious about that trade, because it has almost been destroyed. If the hon. gentleman wants to get the vessels something to do, let him advocate free trade. If he wants to encourage the city of St. John, and make it what it was 40 or 50 years ago, let him advocate free trade, and go against this system of protection that has caused grass to grow on the wharfs and made the warehouses empty. There is no place in the Dominion of Canada that has been so injured by this system as St. John. Formerly we could send our lumber and other produce to Boston, New York and other markets of the United States and bring back cargoes of flour, corn, oil and everything else that the people wanted. In those days St. John had vessels and warehouses and merchants, whereas, comparatively speaking, it has none now.

Mr. McMULLEN. I hold in my hand a carefully prepared statement of the quantity of oil imported during 1893, the duty paid on the oil and the barrels, the cost of inspection and so on. The oil imported amounted to $437,563 worth, the duty on which was $430,506.81. The barrels inspected numbered 228,348; the duty on these amounted to $58,309.45, and 30 cents a barrel for inspection amounted to $68,504.40. In all, the duty on the oil and the barrels and the cost of inspection amounted to $557,320.66. Deduct from that the value of the oil, $437,563, and you have left $119,756.66 over and above double the amount of the cost of the oil, or in all, 127¼ per cent. Now, I want to draw the Finance Minister's attention to one or two points. To prove that the oil men do not charge the people for oil up to the point that they might under the protection they have, the hon. gentleman said that they sold it for 3 or 4 cents a gallon below the price at which the duty would enable them to sell it. I would like to put this conundrum to the Finance Minister. What is the object of keeping the duty on if the coal oil refiners of Canada do not take advantage of it? The Finance Minister has stated to the committee that the producers do not sell their oil up to the point at which they might sell it under the tariff. What, then, is the use of keeping up the protection? That is a question the Finance Minister ought to be able to answer. He claims that the duty is necessary. If the sellers of the oil declare it is not, as they do, when they declare that they sell it from 3 to 4 cents a gallon below what they might extract from the people, the hon. Finance Minister ought to explain what peculiar consideration there is which causes him to keep up the rate of duty. If it be really considered a national necessity to encourage the production of coal oil, the proper way to do that would be by means of a bounty, and not by taxing the poor people to the enormous extent to which they are taxed by the operation of this tariff.

Mr. GILLMOR.

An hon. gentleman opposite said he uses electric light in his house, and not coal oil. No doubt most hon. gentlemen opposite use electric light or gas, and very few lose anything by this tax. But the duty strikes the poorer classes and the farming community particularly, who use a very large amount of coal oil in their houses and stables, and every other way. The Finance Minister, in his calculations this afternoon led the committee to understand that about twenty gallons would be the outside amount used by a householder in a year. Well, we are supposed to have a million householders, which would make an annual consumption of twenty million gallons, on which last year's duty of 7 1-5 cents would amount to $1,400,000. The duty actually collected by the treasury last year was $430,000, which leaves a balance of $989,494 that went into the pockets of, and was divided among the refiners of coal oil, or very nearly a million dollars paid by the people last year to the refiners in Petrolea. That is, taking it for granted that the refiners availed themselves of the full protection granted them. Now, the American white oil sold to-day is worth 4 cents per gallon, wine measure, or 4.80 per Imperial gallon, f.o.b. at Buffalo. The same quality of oil is sold at Petrolea at 12 cents a gallon. That is the best quality of oil, and the second best is sold at 7½ cents per gallon. So that the difference in price between American and Canadian oil of the best quality is 7.20 cents, which is virtually selling Canadian oil at the highest point, and taking the utmost advantage of the protection now enjoyed. It is very singular that, notwithstanding the urgent appeals of the Patrons of Industry and the Farmers' Institutes throughout the country, this odious tax should be retained. By resolution after resolution, they sought to impress upon the Government the necessity of remitting this tax. In every lodge, in every gathering, in every public demonstration, they have declared most emphatically that the duty on coal oil must be abandoned. What has the Minister done in reply? He knows that on the 21st February, 1893, an important and representative deputation came to Ottawa and waited upon him. What was the first item in their appeal? It was to take off the duties on coal oil. What they wanted was a remission of the duties on coal oil, binder twine, corn, and wire used for fencing purposes. In response, the Finance Minister has taken 1 1-5 cents off coal oil; corn remains as it was at 7 cents; binder twine is unchanged; and he has reduced the duty upon fencing about one-half. To all the appeals and remonstrances of those people, his only response was the reduction of 1 1-5 cents in the duty on coal oil. We know perfectly well that if there is any class which requires some consideration at the hands of hon. gentlemen opposite, it is the farmers. But since this committee has been engaged in the reconstruction of this tariff, although they are disposed to call it a poor man's tariff, the interests of the agricultural community have occupied a very secondary place. It would be a mockery to call this thing a poor man's tariff. There is not one change that has been made in the direction of meeting the demands of the farmers, except the one reduction on agricultural machinery, which the Government could not, for very shame, refuse to make. They have reduced the duty from 35 to 20 per cent, in the face of the offer of the Americans to admit our agricultural implements free if we will reciprocate in a like manner. The statement of the hon. member for Elgin (Mr. Casey) is true. We are living under a regime of combines—the cotton combine, the starch combine, the glass combine, the lamp chimnies combine, the cordage combine, and others. We are ruined by combines, and all these combines, including the combine in coal oil, get the ear of the Minister. I suppose they load him up the right way, with all the stock arguments they have, and he comes here and very plausibly recites to us the arguments he receives from them, and appears to be really convinced of their soundness. Well, the hon. gentleman may be able to carry his followers with him in this House, but he will find great difficulty in carrying the people throughout the country, who are the victims of this tariff. To convince the people that the duty of 6 cents a gallon on coal oil is a blessing to them in disguise, will be more than he is able to accomplish. I do not wish further to detain the committee, but would like the Finance Minister to answer the conundrum I have put to him.

Mr. FOSTER. I will not answer conundrums.

Mr. McMULLEN. No; the hon. gentleman will not dare to reply. He cannot explain to this House or the country—I defy him to explain why, when the manufacturers of coal oil, as he tells us, do not charge the full price they might extract under the tariff from the consumers, but in some cases sell at 3 to 4 cents a gallon less, it is necessary to keep up the protection to the point it is? We must only conclude the Finance Minister has been mislead.

Mr. MONCRIEFF. Perhaps, on account of my not having troubled the House very often this session, I may be pardoned if I ask you, Sir, for a few moments longer than speakers generally have taken in discussing this matter. Now Sir, when the Finance Minister brought down his Budget a few weeks ago, it gave this side of the House, at any rate, a great deal of satisfaction; and I believe that the reports that are coming in from all parts of the country since that tariff has been made known by the newspapers show that its new arrangement generally gives universal satisfaction throughout the Dominion. I do not mean to say that it will satisfy every Reformer in the country—it would be impossible to do that; but I think the people at large are perfectly satisfied with the new tariff, and I believe that when the next election comes off the people will uphold the Conservative party in what they have done, and will return them by, I hope at any rate, as large a majority as they have here to-day. The item before us just now is one that particularly interests the community in which I live, as well as that represented by the hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Lister). Now, when the Finance Minister announced a few days ago, that the duty upon oil was to remain at 7 1-5 cents with some changes in the regulation, and that the duty on the barrel had been reduced by an amount equal to about 1½ cents per gallon, I felt that our industry was being protected quite satisfactorily. I regret very much that the hon. gentleman has seen fit to make a change. That change, I have no doubt whatever, has been made by the Government after full and serious consideration of the question. But I rather think, Mr. Chairman, that if the Finance Minister's ears had been turned to the producer and manufacturer alone, he would not have made the change that he has made. This instance alone, I think, is sufficient to disprove the very unkind remarks that have been thrown across the floor at the hon. Finance Minister—such as that he has been “filled up by his coaches,” and that he has been “loaded up by the manufacturers.” I think, Sir, that when these words were used in the House the disapprobation that was expressed was a fitting rebuke to the hon. gentleman who used them. Is it possible for the Finance Minister to become acquainted with the needs of the country unless he can come in contact with the people, with manufacturers, if it be a manufacturing question, with farmers, artisans, labourers, and all other classes? I believe this Government has received deputations of every class of the community, and it is only after hearing these deputations that they are enabled to decide what should be done in relation to the tariff that we are now discussing. If the hon. Minister should refuse to hear a deputation, if he should refuse to hear a manufacturer or any other person who had his case to lay before him, he would be deserving of the disapproval of the House. Now, Sir, coming to the question of oil—I desire to answer a few of the statements made by the last three speakers. The hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey) amused me very much. He gave a lecture to the oil refiners of this country about the best means of manufacturing refined oil and what disposal to make of the by-products, and I rather think the hon. gentleman found himself in very deep water indeed. An hon. gentleman behind him remarked that some people talk a good deal in this House about what they don't understand. I fancy that applies particularly to the hon. member for West Elgin. The hon. gentleman also stated that there were combines in the country. I give this House my word that I know nothing of any combine. I do not believe there has been a combine in refined or crude oil for years before I had the honour of a seat in this House. The hon. gentleman says that the combine fixes the price. My answer to that is, that, as there is no combine, the combine cannot fix the price. He further said that the prices throughout the country had been reduced by the combine during the last twelve months and he emphasized that by referring to the great drop that had taken place in refined oil within the past year. I think this House will remember that a year ago I explained as well as I was able that it was not the manufacturers of oil or the producers who were accountable for the high prices at which oil was being sold. It was as ridiculous to blame the producer of oil in the county of Lambton for the price of refined oil in Montreal as it would have been to blame the man who is working a thousand feet under ground in a Maritime Province mine for the price of coal in Montreal. I also showed to the House the absurd prices the consumer was being charged through the country. I am not going to repeat those figures, it would take up too much time; but I may say that the average price was from 20 to 25 cents per gallon in the various towns and villages whose names I gave. At the same time American oil was being sold at ridiculously high prices—30 to 35 cents a gallon. I believed that the life, so to speak, of the oil industry depended upon these prices being broken. I assured this House that I was fully aware of the condition, that the producers of Lambton were thoroughly alive to it, and that steps would be taken to reduce these prices. The hon. member for West Elgin would give the House to believe that the producer and manufacturer had the prices so high that the retailers had to sell correspondingly. I think that if you will refer to my speech, in which I gave the prices in every part of the Dominion, you will see that I stated that the price of refined oil in bulk at Petrolia was 7 cents per gallon, a fraction of a cent higher than it is at this moment. I wish it to be distinctly understood that the high prices referred to by the hon. member for West Elgin only applied to the retail trade and not to the producers or the manufacturers. What has been done during the past year? I assured the House last session that steps would be taken to lower the prices. Is it correct that prices have been lowered all over the Dominion? The hon. Minister of Finance read you quotations from one end of the Dominion to the other showing a reduction from an average of 20 and 25 cents to 10 and 15 cents a gallon. That does not affect the producer's price; it does not affect the manufacturer's price. The whole fact is that the middleman is being brought to take a fair and reasonable profit for the article he sells. The hon. member for Wellington asked the question, what is the use of this protection? Now, that is a very proper question to ask, and I will endeavour to answer it. Take first, the case of the lower provinces. They are at a long freight distance from the place of manufacture and production, and in addition to that, in the earlier years, the quality of our oil not being nearly as good as it has been for the last few years, the people in that section of the Dominion became prejudiced against Canadian oil. There is no doubt that ten or fifteen years ago, our oil was nothing like as good in quality as it is to-day. But I can assure this House that at present we make just as good an article of oil in Canada as any one wishes to use, and I will in a short time refer you to the certificates of dozens of Patrons' lodges as to the quality of our oil. Owing to the prejudice existing against Canadian oil, it was very easy for some people to get out of the habit of using Canadian oil altogether; and for years past that prejudice has been so strong that American refined oils have held about one-third of the market, and we have had the other two-thirds. Now, just such remarks as were made by the hon. member for Queen's in speaking about the quality of our oil, and just such remarks as were made by the hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Gillmor), when scattered through the country, will certainly not have the effect of inducing the people to lay aside the use of American oil, and take up Canadian oil. I found an article in a Halifax paper the other day, which I will read you:

Why, anybody would rather pay 30 cents a gallon for American oil than have the Canadian for nothing. All I know of its being used for is cleaning iron, rust, etc., for which I believe it is noted, for I knew a man who cleaned up an old rusty shot gun with it once, and he is prepared, he says, "to take his solemn David" that that gun has killed sixty yards dead shot ever since.

Now, that is the kind of articles which, taken in connection with the speeches of hon. gentlemen opposite, will not have the effect of rendering Canadian oil more popular.

Mr. CAMERON. What is the name of the paper?

Mr. MONCRIEFF. The Halifax 'Chronicle.' I may say it is not an editorial, it is a contribution which appears in the paper, but, at the same time, it is very injurious to Canadian trade, as the speeches of the two gentlemen I refer to are also injurious to Canadian trade. Now, the hon. member for Wellington asks, What is the use of protection? If the hon. gentleman had his way, he would reduce the protection to 4 or 5 cents. He says you can get oil on the other side for 4 cents a gallon; well, if you add 5 cents duty to the 4 cents cost, you would have 9 cents; and I suppose that freight rates would be about the same to bring it from the States into this neighbourhood as they would be to bring oil from the place of production in Canada to this neighbourhood.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Would the hon. gentleman, before he leaves that branch of the question, give us information as to the amount of capital invested in wells now in operation, and the amount of capital invested in refineries?

Mr. MONCRIEFF. I will do so before I sit down, and I will also be pleased to give you a copy of the speech I made in the House last year upon the subject, and which I think was a very good one. Now, coming back to the question of the hon. member for Wellington (Mr. McMullen), he would have the duty reduced to 4 cents a gallon. The price of the article in the States, he says, is about 4 cents, which, added to a 4-cent duty, would make cost of oil 8 cents. We will suppose that the freights would be about the same from the States to this neighbourhood as from the oil regions of Canada to this neighbourhood. So he would have American oil laid down in this country for 8 cents a gallon, and he would have Canadian oil laid down here for 6 or 6½ cents a gallon. That would only be about 1½ cents difference between the two. Now, were you to believe just such letters as I have read, scattered through the country, and just such speeches as you have heard from hon. gentlemen opposite spread broadcast, and you were asked to choose whether you would take American oil for eight cents or Canadian oil for 6½ cents, which would you take? You would take American oil every time. And it is to keep the prices of the two oils separate, as far as possible, that protection is wanted. It is not wanted to give the Canadian producer or manufacturer anything more for his produce. As the Finance Minister said, they do not use the protection at all. All we want of protection is to prevent the industry from being destroyed. I will now answer the question of the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills). There are to-day in the neighbourhood of 6,000 wells pumping in the oil regions. Every one of those wells, with their concomitant machinery, pumps, and so on, must cost in the neighbourhood of $600 or $800 each. They have to be ironed, they have to be tubed off, they have to be drilled, and if you multiply those 6,000 wells by even $500 each, their cost, which is a long way below the mark, you will have three million dollars as the value of wells pumping to-day. Then if you take the refineries and the capital engaged in them, you have two or three millions more. There are twenty square miles of land, some of which is worth from $200 to $600 an acre, and a large portion of it is worth $200 an acre over and above its value for agricultural purposes. Then there are hundreds of thousands of dollars invested in digging large holes in the ground as reservoirs; there are miles of pipe lines laid down throughout the country to bring the oil from different wells to the factories. Putting all these things together,

I think I have shown you in the neighbourhood of fifteen millions of dollars as the amount of capital invested. I may also add for the information of the House, that I think there cannot be less than 500 individual proprietors of wells. I have a list in my hand containing the names of some 400 individual owners. That list was made out in 1892, and I know the number has greatly increased since then. There were then at least 400 separate individuals and firms, and the total number of wells then pumping was 5,345. At the present time there are, I should think about 6,000 wells pumping and there are refineries manufacturing oil and supplying two-thirds of the market of the whole Dominion. Many of those proprietors are active workmen, and those who are not working themselves, employ engineers. Then there are teamsters drawing the oil, there are coopers, machinists, boiler makers, and so on, all forming one hive of industry, and all exhibiting pluck and perseverance. Now, I will proceed to answer the charges that our oil is not a good oil. I am aware that the majority of hon. members of this House know to the contrary, from the statement made by hon. gentlemen who have preceded me; but I have here a number of letters from Patron lodges of the country, which purchased oil last fall and winter. Oil was bought from an enterprising firm in London, not refiners, but a firm of grocers and dealers in oils, who sent out circulars to the public and to the different Patron lodges, with the gratifying results that many orders were received. I will read a few extracts from these letters. The secretary of Lodge No. 135 says: "Received your oil last week, and gives good satisfaction." Another letter is dated November last, from Lodge 734, Scotland, the secretary of which says: "Your oil was satisfactory." Here is another one from Hanover Lodge 568: "The oil gives the best of satisfaction." A further letter from Hanover, same lodge, after they had used the oil and on sending another order, is to this effect: "The quality of the oil gives the best satisfaction." Here is another, dated Genoa, Lodge 1884: "The oil is at hand and gives satisfaction." Another letter is from Norwich: "We received your oil all right, and full measure, and enclose post office order in payment." Another letter is from Norwich, of a later date: "Your oil gives good satisfaction." Another is from Morrisburg, Lodge No. 564, in which the secretary says: "We find it very satisfactory." Another is from Kemptville, Lodge No. 909: "We are pleased with the price of your coal oil." Another is from Lodge 1193: "We are well pleased with your oil and the price." Another is from Lodge 728, at Crown Hill: "Send oil the same as last." Another letter is from the lodge at Purple Valley: "We are pleased with the barrel of coal oil got from you." Another is from the lodge at Alma: "Send oil the same quality as the last." Another is from the secretary of Lodge 425: "The oil gives universal satisfaction, and in all likelihood you will receive further orders." Another is from Lodge 311, Forestville: "The oil received is very satisfactory in every respect." Another is from Lodge 764, Scotland: "The two barrels were satisfactory." Another is from Lodge 1086, from Brantford: "You may ship another barrel of the same quality in reply to this order." Another is from Lodge 1912, in which the secretary says: "We are satisfied with the quality of the oil." Another is from Townsend Centre: "We are pleased with the oil." Another is from the lodge at Mount Hope, in which the secretary says: "All are satisfied with the oil." I have several other letters to the same effect with which I will not trouble the House. These are letters from Patron lodges, in which they express perfect satisfaction not only with the quality but with the price at which it is obtained. I stated last year that I had been assured that if the selling price of oil was 12 cents or 15 cents per gallon, no complaint would be heard. From figures given by the Minister of Finance it is apparent that a low price has been reached. There is hardly a prominent point on the line between Western Ontario and Prince Edward Island where oil is now selling at more than 15 cents. At Hamilton it is 10 cents, Stratford it is advertised at 10 cents, or five gallons for half a dollar, and I could mention place after place where oil is selling nearly as low. In the county of Glengarry it is selling at 10 cents, at two or three of the most prominent places in the county. So the promise I made a year ago that this state of things would be brought about has been actually realized to the letter, and at the risk of being considered egotistical, I think the exposure I made in this House a year ago as to the prices at which oil was retailing and the profits realized has had the result of saving to this country hundreds of thousands of dollars. I admit that the steps taken by the Minister of Finance last year to a certain extent reduced the price, at that time oil was selling in bulk about 7 cents and to-day it is selling at 6 and 6½ cents, wholesale; every hon. member can arrive at the proportion by looking at the difference in the wholesale price. The hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Gibson) made the statement that oil in Buffalo was selling at retail for 5 cents. If the non. gentleman says he knows that of his own knowledge I certainly will not contradict his statement, but I can tell that hon. gentleman that I have been making inquiries during the last few days, and I wrote to a gentleman in Buffalo for the retail price of ordinary oil to the consumer, and in his letter, which I have in my desk, he says that ordinary oil is sold to the consumer at 10 cents per wine gallon, and that is not "water white." I, therefore, think the hon. member for Lincoln has been misinformed, as I am certain my information is correct. Buffalo of all places in the United States is the point where oil should be the cheapest, because it is at the mouth of delivery pipe lines from the refineries without any cost of freight, and yet the people of Buffalo are paying higher per gallon for their oil than are people in Glengarry, Hamilton, and other places I have mentioned. The people in Buffalo are paying 12 cents per imperial gallon, and at very many points in Ontario an equally good oil can be obtained at less price. In Detroit the selling price of oil is 9 cents per wine gallon, which is certainly higher than in many of our towns and cities to-day. In Port Huron it is selling at 9 and 10 cents per wine gallon. I had occasion to refer to Port Huron during the debate a year ago. Then oil there was selling at 6 cents, whereas it is selling at 10 cents to-day. The Standard Oil Company then was endeavouring to suppress all competition and was endeavouring to run competitive dealers out of the town. They succeeded in doing that, and to-day oil is 10 cents a gallon, or 12 cents an imperial gallon, and is dearer in Port Huron than, I believe, it is in Sarnia on the Canadian side. - These are facts for some hon. gentlemen to consider. Let me mention another circumstance. In this very city to-day what do we find? We find oil peddled through the streets in carts at prices that are strange to me. They sell American oil at 30 cents a gallon, and Canadian oil at 18 or 20 cents a gallon. Is not that very strange, when at the present time there are two standing advertisements in the newspapers, and when there are several merchants in town selling oil at 12½ cents a gallon delivered to their customers. Let me give another reason to the hon. member for Wellington (Mr. McMullen) why we want protection. It is this: we want to keep the points as far apart as possible, so as to endeavour to get our own people to use our own oil. The interests of the retailer who sells an American gallon of oil and can make on it from 10 to 15 cents per gallon profit is to sell the American gallon to the prejudice of the Canadian gallon on which he is only making 25 per cent. You will find that state of things all over the country. The Halifax 'Herald' of the 5th of April, in an article on coal oil duties, makes some very interesting observations in connection with this matter, which I will read to the House:

What now is the wholesale price of oil from the importer to the retail trade? We are informed that it varies from 19½ cents to 20½ cents per gallon as an average price. This, it will be observed, gives the importing oil dealer a profit of nearly 50 per cent. This seems to be a very large profit to be charged on such a staple article as illuminating oil. Articles of such extensive and general use are usually sold at a very small wholesale profit. It does not appear likely that there are many importations that are sold at an advance of 50 per cent. Oil seems to be a peculiar commodity in this respect. How can any importer who adds 50 per cent to the duty paid cost of his goods, contend that it is because of the duty that he is compelled to keep up the price of oil to this high rate?

But if the importer's profit seems extraordinarily high, for a staple article, the retailer's profit will be found to be higher still. Every one knows that American oil is retailed at the rate of from 30 to 36 cents per gallon. A great deal of oil is sold at 9 cents a quart. Now if the retailer buys at 20 cents and sells at 30 cents his margin is 50 per cent; and if he sells at the rate of 36 cents a gallon, his margin is 80 per cent! This surely must be admitted to be a most extraordinary rate of profit, something that is unparalleled in the case of any other staple article.

Now it must be apparent that with importers' profits of about 50 per cent and the retailers' profits ranging from 50 to 80 per cent, the price of American oil to the Canadian consumer is very little determined by the duty, and a great deal determined by the dealers.

When the conditions of trade are such that profits of from 50 to 80 per cent can now be added by the importer and retailer, will any one tell how much the consumer is likely to profit by a couple of cents being taken off the duty?

There was an agitation down there to take a couple of cents off the duty on coal oil, and this was an article written regarding that. If that oil in the city of Halifax cost from 30 to 35 cents a gallon, how much would the consumer benefit if there were 2 cents a gallon taken off the duty? A good deal has been said with reference to the Standard Oil Company of the United States, and I wish to say something with reference to that concern. It seems to be questioned by the hon. member for Yarmouth (Mr. Flint) that there was any oil monopoly in the United States that is doing injury there, or that would be likely to do injury if it were allowed full swing in this country. I certainly do not pretend of my own knowledge to know anything about the Standard Oil Company, but I have an opportunity of reading what the New York and Chicago papers say with reference to it. Let me give one or two extracts from the United States press, which deal with the Standard Oil Company, which will probably astonish the hon. gentleman. About a year ago the Standard Oil Company, although they had millions upon millions, aye, billions of gallons of oil, would not sell a gallon of it at any price to take across the Atlantic. Why was that? It was because they had control of the market, and they did not propose to sell any oil on this continent for a European port, and the only way you could buy it was to cross the Atlantic and purchase it from their agents on the spot. Ships were lying idle waiting for freight, and it was causing consternation, so to speak, among the oil trade and shipping interests, and here is what the 'Oil and Drug Review' of Chicago says upon the subject:

Shippers of refined oil at New York, says the Times of that city, are disturbed over the refusal of the Standard Oil Company to sell them this product. Without it they cannot fill their foreign orders, and vessels fitted for carrying oil lie idle in the docks. Refined oil is quoted at 5:30, but offers for it at 15 points advance have been declined at the Standard offices with the invariable reply that this company has no oil to sell.

The facts are thus set forth in the circular of Cornish & Mead, brokers:

Barrel and case petroleum freights have dwindled to comparatively small proportions, and as if to complicate and make matters worse, the Standard Oil Company, for some occult purpose, is understood to have for an indefinite period refused to sell refined for export to Europe, thus narrowing the field of employment for vessels in the trans-Atlantic oil trade to crude and naphtha, which goes chiefly to French ports.

This course of the Standard Oil Company has become so oppressive to shippers, however, that they are looking below the surface for causes and motives. It looks to many of them as if the Standard Oil Company had set out to monopolize the markets of the world by wiping out the middlemen, or shippers.

That is an instance which will show you what a large monopoly and a powerful corporation of this kind can do. Now, will the hon. gentlemen be surprised if I tell them that in a place in the state of Michigan, I read that refined oil is selling at 2 cents a gallon? There is a war there between the Standard Oil Company and the other refiners, and so the price is reduced to 2 cents. But just as sure as it is reduced to that low figure to-day in Zeeland, Michigan, just as sure as I told you a year ago that it was 6 cents in Port Huron and is 9 or 10 cents a gallon to-day there, just as sure will you find that a year hence, if I have an opportunity of speaking in the House on this same subject, I will be able to report that the price in Zeeland, Michigan, will be 10 or 12 cents. At Aberdeen, in Dakota, the people are objecting to pay the Standard Oil Company 15 cents per gallon for their oil, and some independent citizens are starting in business in competition with them. The Standard Oil Company will run down the price upon them very shortly, they will be driven out of the market, and next year you will find again that the old standard price of 15 cents a gallon will prevail, and that no person dare face the music and compete against them. In this connection I wish to refer to an article taken also from the 'Oil and Drug Review,' which appeared in that newspaper on the 28th of February last, only a few months ago:

Reports are now frequent from numerous points in the North-west that the Standard Oil Company is making unusual effort to drive out all competition and monopolize the trade. The fact of the Standard's ambition being to tolerate no rivalry in the oil trade causes no surprise, its aim has always been in that direction, and it has the power and resources to accomplish that end. The monopoly, however, deserves the keenest reproach with which it exercises its power to crush competition, it pays no heed to the means employed in satisfying its insatiable greed, the game is none too large or small to bag. The pedlar with his barrel of oil must succumb, albeit it is his dependence, the Standard must not be interfered with in its invasion, scruples cannot be considered. Even the barrel man who at the best ekes out but a precarious living must be deprived of his business. The Standard possessed of the empty barrels that may accumulate in a town, handicaps the independent oil dealer, as he has no container for his oil, he is barred the delivery of a sale. Such tricks are not uncommon to the monopoly, it plays the cards to win. Consumers in most instances pledge their support to the Standard, but it avails nothing, the battle as it were, is short and decisive, the tentacle has got its grip and up goes the price of oil, the consumer is mulcted for being in sympathy with the oppressed and there is no help. The monopoly is relentless when it come to business.

Now, I think I have satisfied hon. gentlemen, from American newspapers, that what I state in regard to the Standard Oil Company being a grasping monopoly represents the true state of affairs in the United States. The same paper, on the 28th of February, refers to an evident effort made by the Standard Oil Company to crush out competition in Utah. This is what it says :

The refined oil war has opened at Salt Lake, Utah. The Florence Oil and Refining Co., from Denver having shipped several cars of oil and put their tank wagon on the streets, the Continental Oil Co., at once reduced the prices wholesale to 12 cents, arranged with the retail wagons to sell at 15 cents thus cutting the price nearly one-half from what it has been and what it will be as soon as they succeed in showing their competitors there is no money to be made by marketing their own product.

It is very easy for a powerful body like the Standard Oil Company to act in that way; and if that corporation had control of our markets, we might expect that that company would play the same trick here that it has played in every place where it has operated across the line. I also find in the same paper an interesting article on the discussion that is going on in this Parliament at the present time. In its issue of the 7th of March last it says :

Canadian oil producers and refiners are alarmed over the agitation prevailing in the Dominion to place petroleum on the free list. It is now highly protected, which effectually prohibits importation of American oil except for a limited quantity of high grade refined. The desire to have the tariff removed emanates with the consumers, who contend they are charged unreasonable prices for oil, viz. : 15 and 20 cents per gallon. The well-owner or oil producer claims the dealer or distributor of the oil is responsible for the prices exacted of the consumer, and supports his position by denying that 6½ cents at the refinery nets him more than a fair profit on his investment.

The editor of this paper certainly posted himself well in regard to the position of the Canadian oil market, giving the correct prices and a pretty fair estimate of what the retailer had been charging for oil by the gallon. Here is his solution :

American refiners can give relief to Canadian consumers were they not barred by a tariff duty, but it is probably as well that Canadian oil interests should be protected, for should competitive trade occur, the great American octopus would rapidly intrench itself by methods that has made it an unscrupulous monopoly in the States.

This is very valuable indeed, coming from an authoritative paper in the United States, and it contains a lesson for us. It candidly advises us to keep the protection which we have, because if the monopoly ever secures a foothold here, it will certainly be to the disadvantage of our consumers. Now, Sir, it is owing to the knowledge which I have acquired in watching this oil industry here and on the other side of the line that I have dreaded any interference with our protective duty, because there can be no doubt that the more you lower our protection the greater percentage of American oil is likely to come into the country, and that is what we do not want. As long as we have crude oil in abundance; as long as we make a good article, fit for any lamp in the country; as long as we do not charge an exorbitant price; as long as the oil is furnished to the merchants of the country at only a fair and reasonable profit; as long as there is no combination existing, we ought, I say, to keep up the wall which for the last fifteen years has been protecting us against the American oil producer and manufacturer, for the purpose of securing to ourselves our own trade, and giving employment to the hundreds of men who are engaged in the industry in this country. The whole oil business, from first to last, is a matter of labour. It is labour from the time the workman chops the timber for the well rigs; it is labour in making the tools; it is labour in drilling the well; it is labour that takes the iron out of the pits for the tubing in which the wells are cased and by which they are pumped; it is labour that makes the tubing; it is labour that pumps the wells; it is labour that takes the oil to the refiners; it is labour that manufactures it into refined oil; it is labour that makes the barrels into which the oil is put. I suppose, speaking truly, that the labour applied in distributing the oil throughout the country would be also required if American oil were let in free; but up to that point everything connected with the production of Canadian oil is a question of labour. It is simply wages and labour from the moment the tree is first struck with the axe until the oil is put in the cars for distribution throughout the country; and I understand that the policy of this Government is to protect the industries of this country, in order to furnish Canadian labourers with work in their own country, so that they shall not have to look for employment elsewhere. It is with the knowledge that I have obtained by reading of the working of those monopolies in the United States, and with a pretty good knowledge of the trade, both producing and refining in our own country, that I dread to see our tariff reduced as it is. I cannot exactly prognosticate what the result will be. I think I can establish, from the information I have here before me, that oil is being distributed in this country to-day to the general consumer, better in quality, on the whole, a safer burning oil, and at a price not higher than the consumer pays on the other side. I think I might almost go the length of saying that, so far as Ontario is concerned, I believe it is better served with oil to-day than any state in the union. In addition to the labour which this industry supports, it is surrounded by a beautiful agricultural country. For a radius of 25 miles the oil region is the central market for innumerable farms. It is acknowledged in that part of the country that our market—and I suppose that is the case with most mining towns—is perhaps a better market for farm produce than any other place of the same size in western Ontario, if not in the whole of Ontario. I do hope with all my heart that the lowering of this tariff may not have any prejudicial effect on this industry; but if it should it will be a sad day indeed for the farmers and oil producers of that district. I am not speaking from an interested standpoint, because I have no personal interest whatever in the refining business, but I am simply speaking as representing the district, and as one who ought to have a little more knowledge of it than people living at a distance. There are hundreds of people there, every dollar of whose capital is invested in that business. For myself politically I care not. My whole heart is with those people engaged in that business, and if it should happen that the reduction in the tariff to-day will affect them prejudicially, I should feel, I know that the Conservative party would feel, and I believe that this whole House would feel sorry indeed that the duty had been interfered with to the injury of that particular neighbourhood. It is asked: why should it be supported at all? One reason is that the business was encouraged by a high tariff to begin with—by a tariff of some 15 per cent. At the same time the Americans, when we discovered our oil, put on a tariff of some 500 per cent, and about 3,000 to 4,000 per cent upon the crude oil at its present value.

Mr. McMULLEN. The hon. gentleman says that the quality of Canadian oil now manufactured is equal to that of American oil?

Mr. MONCRIEFF. Yes.

Mr. McMULLEN. If the hon. gentleman would turn up to page 35 of the Marine and Fisheries report he will find that last year 18,800 gallons of American oil were imported for our coast service. Can the hon. gentleman explain how that took place when the Canadian oil is equal to, if not superior, to the American oil?

Mr. MONCRIEFF. I could not tell the hon. gentleman that unless the tender happened to be lowest. Perhaps the Minister of Marine can explain that. I fancy everything is done by tender. It has been suggested by a gentleman behind me that it comes in free for fishing purposes.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) For fishing purposes?

Mr. MONCRIEFF. For Government purposes in the light-house districts. The question was rather a fishy one.

Mr. BOWERS. Is the oil they sell at 7 cents in Petrolea the best quality of oil they make?

Mr. MONCRIEFF. It is not. If the hon. gentleman will refer to my previous remarks he will find that the quotations I gave were for prime white oil. The water white oil is sold 2½ or 3 cents more. Prime white oil is what is generally used throughout the country, and is approved of to such an extent that it is almost the only oil used. At the same time, there is not as much percentage of water white oil in Canadian crude as in American crude, but the quality of prime white is certainly good enough to be used in any lamp in the country. It is the same oil that I use at my own table. I never think of using the water white oil, but always use the prime white.

Mr. BOWERS. The tendency of the hon. gentleman's speech is to make the country believe that the best oil we use sells at 7 cents in Petrolea.

Mr. MONCRIEFF. I did not intend to convey that idea. I take it for granted that the House knows that I was speaking of the prime white, because I have always so emphatically referred to the price of that quality, and whenever I quoted the price I gave it as the quotation for prime white, and the House knows well that the other quality of oil is always higher. But the prime white is of such quality that I have dozens of certificates from lodges approving of it, and I can refer to hon. members in this House who use it, and who will acknowledge that it is a first class oil. In fact, except to experts, the difference between it and the water white would hardly be observed. And the oil referred to in every one of the letters from Patrons was the oil of which I quoted the wholesale price, 6 to 6½ cents for first quality prime white oil.

Mr. McMULLEN. Has the hon. gentleman any positive authority that oil is retailed at Buffalo at 12 cents?

Mr. MONCRIEFF. Nothing further than this, that I communicated with a gentleman of very high standing there, saying I wished particularly to know the price of oil charged by the retailers in Buffalo. And I would be pleased to show the hon. gentleman the letter I received in reply. His answer was that the price of ordinary oil by the gallon to the consumer was 10 cents per wine gallon. As regards the other places, Detroit and Port Huron, I know of my own knowledge.

Mr. McMULLEN. A letter has been put into my hands from Buffalo, dated the 11th April, in which it is stated :

Your favour of the 6th addressed to the Standard Oil Company, referred to us as we handle such goods in your territory. We quote you present price on water white oil in tank car lots at 4 cents per gallon, f.o.b. cars here, in barrels at 6½ cents same place. Prime white oil in either case ½ cent per gallon less.

Mr. MONCRIEFF. I am not disputing the hon. gentleman's figures ; I am not disputing that the price of coal oil in the United States wholesale is very low indeed. But, if you take the trouble to inquire at many points in Michigan, Illinois, Ohio or any other of the states, you will find that the price of oil is from 10 to 15 cents per wine gallon to the consumer.

Mr. MONTAGUE. It is 10 cents in Buffalo.

Mr. MONCRIEFF. My hon. friend says it is 10 cents in Buffalo. And, remember, that it is for the wine gallon, which is equal to 12 cents for the imperial gallon. Now, all this cry about American oil being so cheap is perfectly true, so far as it relates to the wholesale prices; but it does not apply at all to the consumer. If hon. gentlemen who desire the information will look over the speech I made a year ago, they will find the facts there set forth. I made careful inquiry on the subject. To ascertain the price of oil in the United States, I sent out an affidavit to officials and others in dozens of places, asking them to fill up according to the facts and make the necessary declaration before a magistrate. The prices ran from 12 to 15, 18 and 25 cents per gallon; and, at the same time, the wholesale price was 4 cents in the city of Buffalo. If you will investigate the matter carefully you will find, I believe, that the Canadian farmer is getting a better quality of oil at a cheaper price than is the general consumer in any state of the American union. I have just one word more to say and then I have done. The hon. member for West Elgin seemed to urge the total abolition of the duty upon crude oil. I do not believe that he thought for a moment what the result would be when he advocated the abolition of this duty and the importation free of American crude for use by our refiners. The refiners of the country are a very small element as compared with the producers. The producers, as I have told you, number about five hundred. This interest, in fact, has created a small British colony in Western Ontario, whose entire business is that of oil. The refineries are small in number—some eight or ten altogether. If there was no crude oil in our own country, the refiners would bring in the American crude and manufacture it here; and, if necessary, a reasonable protective tariff might be imposed upon the finished product. But it is to protect the oil-producing territory and the oil producers of the country that it is necessary to keep the duty on crude oil, so that the refiner may use our own crude instead of that produced in Ohio and other parts of the United States. I have occupied the attention of the House longer, perhaps, than might be expected upon a subject of this kind. My excuse is that I am in a position to realize how large this industry is and the danger of doing anything that would have the effect of letting a larger percentage of American oil come into this country. If, instead of one-third of American oil, our consumption should be two-thirds of American oil, that would mean the displacing of so much of the Canadian product, the result would be simply slow death; there is no doubt about that. The oil would be pumped up, but there would be no place to sell it. The result would be to make a deserted village of that district and to effectually destroy the $15,000,000 of capital directly and indirectly invested in the business. The result would be one of the most painful things to any man who had the interests of his country at heart. Under these circumstances, you will hardly be surprised, Mr. Chairman, that I have occupied the time of the House in discussing this matter at some length.

Mr. SCRIVER. Mr. Chairman, though I have no doubt the patience of the House has been pretty sorely tried by the protracted discussion that has taken place on this item, yet I do not wish to see the item adopted until I have had the opportunity to say a few words on the subject. I undertake the discussion with some hesitation after the very pathetic appeal that has been made to the sympathies of the House, first, by the Finance Minister and afterwards by the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Moncrieff). Surely an industry of this country, for whose support the sympathy, and, I might almost say the pity, of hon. members of this House must be craved, must be in sore straits. And yet, after all, what does that appeal amount to? It means that the House should consent to give this industry an advantage of more than 100 per cent. Well, my own opinion is that an industry that cannot live in this country without being sustained by such an exorbitant impost, such exorbitant taxation levied upon the great body of the consumers of this country, does not deserve to exist. In fact, my belief is, from all I had learned by reading and by the discussions in this House, that this is an industry that can only be sustained in competition with the similar industry in the United States, by a duty which is an unreasonable one, a duty which presses sorely upon the great body of the consumers of this country and especially upon the labouring and farming population of the country, and my further belief, founded upon personal knowledge and observation is that there are some natural defects in the oil as it flows from our soil which cannot be carried off by the process of refining employed. The process of refining here, no doubt, is the same as in the United States; and yet, in my opinion, the result is an inferior Canadian article as compared with the American product. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Moncrieff), if he were to travel in the part of the country in which I live—that borderland on the frontier of the United States from the rivers St. Lawrence and Richelieu and on to Lake Memphremagog—would find great difficulty in convincing the hard headed farmers of that country that the Canadian oil is equal to the American. The store-keepers have made the experiment repeatedly, particularly during the last year, after the statements made on the floor of this House, of bringing the Canadian oil to their places of business and attempting to sell it to the people of that country, recommending it as fully equal to the American product; and the result in every instance, so far as my knowledge goes, is that the consumption of Canadian oil has not increased in all that border land. As to the hon. gentleman's figures, I confess I do not understand them. I live on the border myself, I have had opportunities of knowing a good deal about the trade on both sides of the line, all through the northern part of the state of New York and portions of the state of Vermont, and it is within my knowledge that water white oil of an excellent quality has been sold during the past ten years, all through that country, in no instance at more than 10 cents retail per gallon, and for several years past it has been sold at 8 cents. Our own farmers, as I know, go across the border with their five gallon cans, and get them filled with five gallons, wine measure, it is true, for 40 cents. Whether they pay the duty on it, I do not profess to know; perhaps they do, and perhaps they do not. I know that I buy my oil over there, and I pay the duty on it. I buy it by the barrel, an excellent quality of oil, oil that would not offend the sensitive olfactory nerves of the class the Finance Minister speaks of, or the olfactory organs of the Finance Minister himself—I cannot say that of any Canadian oil that I have ever used—and I buy that oil at seven and a quarter cents per wine gallon. The last barrel I bought cost me about $3.20, and I paid $3.60 duty on it, something like 125 per cent. Under these circumstances, having the matter brought to my attention in the way it has been, and having heard the general expression of opinion on the part of intelligent people in that part of the country, I am of the opinion that this tax is an unreasonable one, one that perhaps does not press so sorely upon an individual when he comes to think of the amount he is called upon to pay year after year, and yet he does feel it when he makes a comparison between paying 20 cents at home for the imperial gallon, and getting it for 8 cents a gallon just across the border, five or six miles away. I say that this is an improper and an unreasonable tax. Though I dare say the taxpayers of this country may feel grateful in a certain measure for the reduction which the Finance Minister has made, I am sure they will not be satisfied with it; they will feel, probably, as I feel, that the Finance Minister ought to have gone still further, that he ought to have removed the objectionable inspection fee and the duty upon the barrel, and have reduced the tax to 5 cents a gallon.

Mr. TAYLOR. I merely wish to reply to a question asked by the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen), and which the Finance Minister did not reply to, nor did the hon. member for East Lambton (Mr. Moncrieff) reply to it. I understood the hon. member for North Wellington to say that the refiners of this country took full advantage of the duty, and I think he answered the question that he asked the Finance Minister, by a letter which he read to this House, giving quotations for oil in Buffalo at 4 cents per gallon in tank cars. That quotation is for the wine gallon, which, if made equivalent to the imperial gallon here, would be equal to about 5 cents per imperial gallon. The duty is $7\frac{1}{2}$ cents per gallon, which, when brought into this country, would cost $12\frac{1}{2}$ cents. The same oil is being sold wholesale at Petrolea in tanks at 6 cents. That is an answer to his question. Do the oil men take advantage of the duty of $7\frac{1}{2}$ cents when they are selling it at 6 cents a gallon?

Mr. McMULLEN. Not the same oil.

Mr. TAYLOR. The same quality you quoted.

Mr. RYCKMAN. It is not my intention to take part in the discussion on this question, but I only want to reply to a remark of the hon. member for Huntingdon (Mr. Scriver), who stated that the coal oil which is produced in our country is not a good quality. I am interested in a firm who handle about 2,000 gallons of coal oil per month, and during the last four months I do not know of a single person coming back to our place of business and saying that the coal oil was not good. We retail coal oil for 11 cents a gallon, and we make about 20 per cent on it. Therefore, I think that the people in my part of the country, at least, are well satisfied with the Canadian oil.

Mr. BRYSON. Before this item is carried, I would like to say one word. I listened attentively this afternoon to the statements made by the Finance Minister, and he certainly impressed me with the view that this industry should receive protection at the hands of the Government. Now, I desire to be frank, and I will say that while I am a protectionist, I am of the opinion that even a protection of 6 cents is more than that industry should receive. I believe that any industry like that at Petrolea should receive a comparative protection, a protection as compared with other articles; but I think the protection which this industry has been receiving up to the present time, has been in favour of the few and has discriminated against the masses of our agriculturists. The hon. member for Huntingdon (Mr. Scriver) says that in his opinion the oil that is produced at Petrolea is not of as good quality as the oil we import from the other side. I am in accord with that view of the hon. gentleman, and I regret to be obliged to say so. I regret exceedingly, as a Canadian speaking in Parliament, to be obliged to say that the oil produced at Petrolea is not of as good quality as that we import from the United States. I must say this, because I think it is a mistake for members of this House to stand up and say that the Canadian oil is as good as the American oil, when we know, as a matter of fact, that it is not. I believe those members thereby do an injustice not only to the people they represent in Parliament, but to the manufacturers of coal oil at Petrolea, because when these manufacturers know that the prevailing sentiment of the people is that the coal oil produced at Petrolea is not of as good a quality as that we can procure on the other side, they will naturally endeavour to improve the quality of the oil that they send out to people of this country. Now, the revenue that we derived from coal oil last year was something like $430,000. I think the Finance Minister might have reduced that tax very materially, and have made up the revenue lost on coal oil by putting it upon tobacco and liquor. I think the people could stand a little more tax on tobacco, and liquors for the sake of having their oil a little cheaper. The agriculturists and labourers of this country have not the advantages of either gas or electric light, and it appears to me clear from the statements we have heard to-night, and even from the statement of the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Ryckman), who has just spoken, that the amount of protection afforded to the coal oil industry is not less than 100 per cent. I believe that an industry that has been fostered for at least thirty years, should not enjoy so high a protection, when it works as a discrimination against the agricultural and labouring classes of this country. The farmers of this country are a class who up to the present have had very little protection. The farming community are making money by the sweat of their brow; they understand how to lay by every cent made by them, and when I hear hon. gentlemen rise in Parliament and say that the ordinary farmer uses only from ten to twenty gallons of oil annually it is a mistake. But that is not the principle on which we should consider this matter; the question is, are our farmers obtaining their coal oil as cheaply as they should get it; is the protection afforded to the refiners at Petrolea not an excessive protection? In my humble judgment, and I have looked at the figures, even the protection to-day of 6 cents per gallon is really more than the manufacturers deserve. While I appreciate the reduction made, I believe discussion emanating from both sides of the House will have a tendency to reduce the price of coal oil to the farmers, because now they will be able to ascertain exactly what they should pay for it. The profits of the middlemen will be brought down and the price reduced to a uniform basis throughout the country, and these facts will enable our farmers to obtain coal oil at least 3 or 4 cents per gallon cheaper than in 1892.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I am not going to enter into a discussion of the merits of the tax on coal oil. There is, however, one feature which must have struck every member of the House both in the speech of the hon. Finance Minister and of the hon. gentleman who represents the constituency in which the refining operations are carried, and that is a declaration that in this industry we can never compete with the coal oil industry of the United States, that there oil can be obtained from which a larger percentage of refined oil can be produced than we can produce in this country, and so the price here can never be quite so low as it is on the other side. I believe experiments so far as they have been made with oil obtained in Canada, go to show that, if the oil refiners of Canada had the American market, by manufacturing a lubricating instead of an illuminating oil they would produce a better lubricating article for both the Canadian and American market than can be produced from the American oil, while the American oil is superior in another particular to the oil obtained in Canada, and so if there was reciprocity in this particular article it would be advantageous to both countries. I was disappointed in the remarks which fell from the hon. gentleman who represents the oil producing constituency. I think he should have given the House more information in regard to this industry, including facts as to the amount of capital invested, the quantity of crude oil raised, the value of the refined material, and the cost in connection with manufacturing operations.

Mr. MONCRIEFF. I gave all that information, but the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) was busily engaged listening to an hon. member and probably did not hear me.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I heard the hon. gentleman speak about one million of capital being invested, but I understand there are five thousand wells, and that an expenditure of about five hundred dollars has been incurred on each; so that there has been an expenditure equal to about two and a half millions dollars.

Mr. MONCRIEFF. Three millions.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The House would be glad to learn how many engines and boilers are employed, the cost of refining, and also the number of men employed. These facts would have proved valuable in enabling hon. members to form an opinion on the subject, because according to the statement of the Finance Minister and the remarks of the hon. member for East Lambton (Mr. Moncrieff), our coal oil industry can never be made economically a success. The ground of defence alone must rest upon principles of sociology not on principles of political economy. But I am not going into any discussion of the subject. I am simply calling the attention of the House to this fact, that there is a very great inequality in the rate of taxation in connection with this article. We find in Ontario and Quebec that the tax is about 100 per cent, while in the Maritime Provinces it is 160 per cent. There is a serious departure from equitable principles of taxation when on the same article you impose a very much higher tax on the people in one section than those in another. Whether the hon. Finance Minister—if he is going to continue his reductions to the amount which is indicated—has acted fairly in the mode of reduction is a question which the committee should seriously consider. Hon. gentlemen opposite have favoured the principle of protection. I am not going to argue that question; I am not going to say whether that principle should be applied to this specific industry or not. From my point of view there are no exceptions to a sound principle as regards economic reasons, but I wish to call the attention of the committee to this fact, that the Minister of Finance has in connection with this matter interfered with freedom of commerce, and I should like to know whether the hon. member for East Lambton (Mr. Moncrieff) favours that action, whether he thinks it right and proper for the Finance Minister to say that refined oil shall not be imported from a foreign country except in a particular way. I can understand why the hon. Minister imposes the duty of 6 cents per gallon or even 7½ cents, I can understand why he might go higher from his view of political economy, but I do not understand that he should interfere with freedom of transportation. For instance, the hon. gentleman permits refined oil to be brought into St. John in tank cars; he prohibits it being brought into Halifax or Charlottetown in tank vessels. Why should that be done—what is the object? Is it not for the purpose of imposing a heavier tax on all refined oil consumed in the Maritime Provinces than in any other portion of the Dominion? Is it not establishing the principle of inequality in taxation? Let me suppose, for instance, that a man engaged in the wholesale business should purchase illuminating oil, that he owns a steamer fitted up for carrying oil in tanks. Does the hon. gentleman mean to say that the owner should be prohibited from using his vessel in that trade? Why, if the hon. gentleman were to prevent importation altogether I could understand it, if he were to increase the duty I could understand that, but that he should say that with a view to putting impediments in the way of trade: While I have not the courage to increase the duty, and will not place myself in opposition to the people, I will put impediments in the way of trading and I will declare that the ship-owners shall not bring oil in in tank vessels, I say that is an attempt to apply the principle of protection in a way it has never been applied with respect to trade in any other article imported into Canada. There are some articles we prohibit being imported. We prohibit the importation of obscene literature. We know the ground upon which that is done. We seek to develop the industries of the country, as the hon. the Minister of Finance says, by increased taxation. That proceeds upon an intelligible ground; but the hon. gentleman has, for the first time in connection with this trade introduced a new principle, and that is putting impediments in the way of this commerce being carried on in a particular manner. That principle is highly objectionable. If the hon. gentleman wishes to keep up high taxes with a view of helping those engaged in this particular business, it would have been better to have left his tariff as it was and to remove this impediment. It would have equalized the taxation more than the course he has pursued.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What does the Minister of Finance compute to be the consumption of our own petroleum in Canada?

Mr. FOSTER. About two-thirds of the consumption is supplied by the home wells, and about one-third from abroad.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Then in all, our total consumption would be about 20,000,000 gallons. I have had, and I suppose other members of the House had, a document, apparently authoritative from the Geological Survey furnished us, in which the total production of petroleum is given at 800,000 barrels, and I find that a barrel of refined is taken to be 42 imperial gallons. Judging from the valuation which is put down at $834,000, I should imagine that it was too high a price if these 800,000 barrels were absolutely raw. The matter bears very decidedly upon the question, and we ought to know what the consumption is.

Mr. FOSTER. I have not seen that calculation.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am afraid in this, as in a great many other items, the hon. Minister has not taken the trouble to acquaint himself with the actual facts.

Item agreed to.

Crude petroleum, fuel and gas oil, other than naphtha, benzine or gasolene, when imported by manufacturers other than oil refiners for use in their own factories for fuel purposes, also the manufacture of gas, 3 cents per gallon.

Mr. COCKBURN. I must say that even with this reduction of 3 cents a gallon, it seems to me rather a heavy price to pay for raw material. I have swallowed the 6 cents on the refined oil, a high figure, I think, but inasmuch as it was a protection to Canadian labour, and inasmuch as there had been already a material reduction on it, I would not consider it a very wise proceeding at once to deal summarily with the manufacturers of oil at Petrolea. I was willing enough to consent to the 6 cents on refined oil, but when I find 3 cents charged as a protection on this crude article, I must say that I am somewhat staggered. Three cents per gallon is equal nearly to a duty of 200 per cent ad valorem on the crude article; and while we have been talking on both sides of this House on the duties that we owe to the farmer, and have considered the various aspects in which this question might affect him, I think we might also think of the duties we owe to the manufacturer. In the city of Toronto this crude oil is very largely used in the manufacture of gas, and we have in the Dominion some 48 gas companies using it. The capital of these companies is, I think, about nine and a quarter millions, or, at least twice the amount of capital invested in the oil wells at Petrolea. Therefore, it would be well to consider what we owe to the large amount of capital invested in these gas companies, and what their interests may demand with reference to this question of crude oil. This oil is used also very largely for manufacturing purposes. A year ago, we had, in the city of Toronto, sixty-eight consumers for manufacturing purposes, and forty-nine gas engines, and we sold last year over 75,000,000 cubic feet of gas. A large amount of this 75,000,000 cubic feet is consumed by what I would call the smaller tradesmen, who are working, as they do in France or in England, along Adelaide Street and other streets in Toronto in their own homes. I refer to tinsmiths, workers in stained glass, and book-binders, who are all very much interested in cheap gas, and who will feel, no doubt, strongly opposed to this high duty of nearly 200 per cent on their raw material. It is virtually their raw material, because if the gas company has to pay this duty on the crude oil it imports, it, of course, must charge it to the consumer. The tariff was absolutely prohibitory on the importation of crude oil from the United States, and it remains absolutely prohibitory at this amended figure. It is an unnecessary charge for the inspection of this oil, because it occurs to me that there is no necessity for inspection. This oil is not coming into the country to be sold to the public, but is simply imported for the use of the manufacturers of gas. I hope therefore that the Minister, if he does not feel at liberty at present to give us free oil, will consider whether he cannot give it, at any rate, to the gas companies.

An hon. MEMBER. And the farmers.

Mr. COCKBURN. It is a case in which, unfortunately, the farmers are not concerned. I almost feel ashamed to speak on behalf of any other class than the farmers in this House, where they receive so much consideration. Both political parties have been taking the farmers to their bosoms, and have been coddling them in every possible way. I want to say a word for the poor workingman, and, therefore, I suggest that if the whole duty cannot be taken off this crude petroleum, the same policy should be adopted with regard to refined oil that has been adopted with regard to other manufactures, and that it should be provided that the duty of 3 cents should next year be reduced to 2 cents, and the following year to 1 cent, and ultimately abolished altogether. I may be told that by proposing this I am striking at the refining of oils; but I do not see why the producers at Petrolea should not take the crude oil that comes from the United States and do the refining of it. Thus we might have established there a large refining interest. Looking at the National Policy as a policy for giving our manufacturers their raw materials at the lowest possible cost, I cannot see how we are consistently to support a duty of nearly 200 per cent on what is the raw material of the gas companies. It is pretty hard on these gas companies at present to have to pay this duty, inasmuch as they are entering on a hard struggle with the electric light companies; and, under all the circumstances, with a view to helping the smaller trades, such as jewellers, tinsmiths, bookbinders, and others in the cities, I trust that the Government may yet consider this question and, if they cannot take the duty off altogether, see whether they cannot hold out the hope of reducing it next year to 2 cents, after that to 1 cent, and then letting the crude petroleum come in free.

Mr. AMYOT. What is the dividend of the gas companies?

Mr. COCKBURN. If my hon. friend buys stock at the present value, it will be about 5 per cent.

Mr. MONCRIEFF. What is the present value ?

Mr. COCKBURN. The stock, I may state, is limited, as to the amount of dividend it can return. The dividend is limited to 10 per cent. The company is unable to pay more, and I may state for the company with which I am more particularly connected, that considering all the circumstances, it has the cheapest gas in the Dominion. It has now been reduced under able direction, to $1 per thousand feet.

Mr. MONCRIEFF. The hon. gentleman did not answer my question. Would he be kind enough to tell me what a $100 share in the gas company is worth ?

Mr. COCKBURN. What the worth of a share may be will depend on the quotation for the day. It varies, just as your coal oil does, only it is not so seldom quoted. When you have the gas, you have it.

Mr. MONCRIEFF. I think it is worth $200.

Mr. COCKBURN. If the hon. gentleman would like to purchase some at $200, he will no doubt be able to get it.

Committee rose and reported progress.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to ; and the House adjourned at 11 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, 2nd May, 1894.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 102) to incorporate the Wolseley and Fort Qu'Appelle Railway Company—(from the Senate).—(Mr. Davin.)

Bill (No. 103) to amend the Acts relating to the Moncton and Prince Edward Island Railway and Ferry Company—(from the Senate).—(Mr. McInerney.)

HOMESTEAD EXEMPTIONS IN THE NORTH-WEST TERRITORIES.

Mr. DALY moved to introduce Bill (No. 104) to repeal the Homestead Exemption Act in the Territories. He said: The Bill provides for the repeal of chapter 52 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, an Act respecting Homestead Exemption in the Territories, and chapter 19 of 1893, an Act to amend the Homestead Exemption Act. It further provides :

Such appeal shall not affect any act done or any right of action existing, accruing, accrued or established, or any proceedings commenced in a civil action before this Act comes into force, and that all the provisions of the said Act shall continue in force so far as they apply to or affect any homestead heretofore registered under the said Act.

Any provisions heretofore enacted by the Legislative Assembly of the North-west Territories and which have not been repealed, purporting to exempt real property in the North-west Territories from seizure by virtue of writs of execution, the validity of which has been questioned or may be open to question by reason of their repugnancy to the provisions of the Act hereby repealed, shall hereafter be deemed to be valid, and shall have force and effect as law.

It appears that when the Exemption Act was passed in 1878 the present condition did not exist in the Territories, because at that time the Real Properties Act was not in force, and the Territorial Real Properties Act conflicts with the provisions of the Homestead Exemption Act ; and the North-west Assembly, by the ordinance passed, chapter 45 of the session of 1888, provided the following exemption, that :

The homestead of the defendant, provided the same be not more than 160 acres ; in case it be more, the surplus may be sold subject to any lien or incumbrance thereon ; the house and buildings occupied by the defendant, and also the lot or lots on which the same are situated, according to the registered plan of the same, to the extent of $1,500.

It has been held by the courts of the Territories that these clauses of chapter 45 of the Ordinance, exempting certain property, are not within the jurisdiction of the Territorial Assembly, and consequently it is necessary that the Territorial Assembly should obtain authority from this House to pass legislation such as they attempted to pass by this ordinance 45. It is in order to carry into effect the wishes and desires of the people as expressed by their representatives in the Territorial Assembly, that this Bill is introduced.

Mr. MARTIN. Then the matter will be entirely in the hands of the Territorial Assembly.

Mr. DALY. The whole matter will be entirely in the hands of the Territorial Assembly.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

THE QUARTERMASTER GENERAL.

Mr. MULOCK asked, Has a Quartermaster General been appointed to the Canadian militia ? If so, what is his name ? When was he appointed ? Is he a graduate of the Royal Military College ? What are his duties and salary ?

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). Provision having been made during last session of Parliament for the pay and allowance of a Quartermaster General, Lieut.-Col. Percy H. N. Lake, H. M.'s East Lancashire Regiment, has been appointed Quartermaster General. He was appointed by Order in Council, 15th August, 1893. He entered the army from the Royal Military College, Sandhurst, of which he is a graduate. He is likewise a graduate of the Staff College. His pay, including allowances, is $3,200 per annum. The duties of a Quartermaster General may be defined under the following heads:—

- "A," Transport of Troops ;
- "B," Quartering of Troops ;
- "C," Remounts ;
- "D," Military Intelligence ;
- "E," Military Topography ;
- "F," Mobilization.

Transport of Troops:—This includes the arrangements necessary for the movements of troops by land or water, both for the annual training of the militia and the preparation of such arrangements as would be rendered necessary in case of a sudden emergency.

Quartering of Troops:—This includes the elaboration of schemes connected with the permanent camping grounds for use by the militia at their annual training. The preparation of estimates of expenditure in connection therewith; the supervision of all details connected with the housing of men and horses in the permanent barracks, and the preparation of estimates in connection with that service; the allotment of rations, of fuel, light and forage, of the permanent force, and allowances in lieu thereof, and further, the preparation of detailed arrangements for the quartering of the militia at various points at any season of the year, in the event of an emergency which would necessitate their embodiment.

Remounts:—The supervision of the purchase of horses for use in the permanent force, their allotment to the various units and the casting of horses in the service, likewise the arrangements for the supply of horses which would be required on an emergency.

Military Intelligence:—Includes the collection and compiling of information relative to the military circumstances of this and other countries.

Military Topography:—This includes the preparation of the maps, plans and detailed topographical information necessary for the successful carrying out of military operations in the event of an emergency.

Mobilization:—This term may be broadly taken to include the drawing up of detailed plans for the defence of Canadian territory in any emergency which may arise; the placing in the field of a part or of the whole of the available forces of the country, either separately from or in connection with Her Majesty's Imperial forces. It further includes the arrangements which must be carried out in time of peace for the preparation, localization and system of distribution of the arms, equipments and munitions of war, and other stores which would be rendered necessary by an emergency such as would call out the whole armed strength available in the country.

The correspondence passing through the hands of the Quartermaster General daily is detailed in general order 62, for the 13th October, 1893:

Correspondence:—Correspondence of the following subjects will be addressed to the Quartermaster General at headquarters:—

- (a.) Transport and quartering of troops ;
- (b.) Appropriation of barrack accommodation, and question as to barracks, hospitals and all buildings in military charge ;
- (c.) Hire of land and buildings for military purposes, gun and rifle ranges ;
- (d.) Field and lodging allowances ;
- (e.) Remounts ;
- (f.) Information relative to military defences ;
- (g.) Military geography and maps for military purposes ;
- (h.) Localization and mobilization of the militia.

I may say, in further explanation to the hon. gentleman, that none of the work detailed above has ever been attempted since the Imperial forces left Canada. It is of a nature which in Her Majesty's Regular Army is only confided to officers who have been specially trained, and who have shown special aptitude for it. There is no officer in the Canadian militia who has had any means of acquiring even a rudimentary knowledge of the matters detailed above.

Mr. MULOCK. Would the hon. gentleman be good enough to answer one of the questions which has not been answered? It is: What are the duties of the Quartermaster General who has been appointed to the Canadian forces? The hon. gentleman has given us an essay, and perhaps he will now state whether the officer in question is expected to discharge those duties which he, in his essay, says are attached to the office. Has the appointee to discharge the duties named in this paper?

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). Certainly.

Mr. MULOCK. He seems to have his work cut out for him.

I. C. R.—FREIGHT RATES ON GRAIN.

Mr. BOWERS asked, What is the rate of freight on the Intercolonial and connecting roads on grain per ton, or car on shipments: (a.) To St. John, N.B., from Montreal? (b.) To St. John, N.B., from Toronto? (c.) To Halifax from Montreal? (d.) To Halifax from Toronto? What is the rate of freight on the Intercolonial and connecting railways on coal per ton or car: (a.) Sydney to Montreal? (b.) New Glasgow to Montreal? (c.) Spring Hill to Montreal?

Mr. HAGGART. Rate on grain in car-load of 30,000 pounds: To St. John from Montreal for export, $3.60 per ton. To St. John from Montreal for export, $4 per ton. To St. John from Toronto for export, $4.30 per ton. To St. John from Toronto for export, $4.50 per ton. To Halifax from Montreal for export, $3.60 per ton. To Halifax from Montreal for export, $4 per ton. To Halifax from Toronto for export, $4.30 per ton. To Halifax from Toronto for export, $4.50 per ton. Rate on coal: Sydney to Montreal, $3.51 per gross ton. New Glasgow to Montreal, $2.80 per gross ton. Springhill Junction to Montreal, $2.49 per gross ton.

"DRAWBACKS" TO SHIP-BUILDERS.

Mr. AMYOT asked, 1. Did the Government pay sums of money to ship-builders in Canada, in the form of drawbacks, during the following years, for vessels built in Canada: 1865, 1866, 1867, 1868, 1869, 1870, 1871, 1872, 1873, 1874, 1875, 1876, 1877, 1878 and 1879? 2. During the same years, did the Government pay moneys to such ship-builders, under the form of bounties, for such ships? 3. In what year did the Government cease to pay moneys, by way of remission of duties (or drawbacks), and begin to pay money, in aid of such ship-building, under the form of bounties? 4. In what year did the Government cease to pay moneys in the form of bounties? 5. In what year was the last payment made, for vessels so built from 1865 to 1879, inclusively?

Mr. WALLACE. 1. Drawbacks on duty paid on material used in ship-building were paid from 1865 to 1872, inclusive; none were paid during the fiscal years 1873 to 1879, inclusive; but during the calendar year 1879—that is to say, for the fiscal year 1879-1880, drawbacks were paid under the provisions of the Order in Council of the 12th November, 1879. 2. No. 3. Answered by first question. 4. Answered by reply to second question. 5. 3rd June, 1880, under Order in Council of the 12th November, 1879.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE IN ARTHABASKA.

Mr. DESAULNIERS asked, Whether the Department of Justice have received complaints with reference to the manner in which Hcn. Marc Aurèle Plamondon, one of the judges of the province of Quebec, administers judicial matters in the district of Arthabaska? If so, what action do the department propose taking against that state functionary?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I find nothing of that character in my department.

ST. THOMAS POST OFFICE.

Mr. CASEY asked, Is the post office at St. Thomas, Ont., now conducted as a city post office? What is the salary of the postmaster, and of each of the employees? Does the postmaster receive any commissions, allowances, box rents or other revenue over and above his salary? If so, how much from each source?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The post office at St. Thomas, Ont., is not now conducted as a city post office. The postmaster's salary is $2,000 per annum, in addition to which he is allowed $1,020 for the assistant postmaster, Mr. O. C. Boughner, and $1,380 for the other employees. The postmaster does not receive anything over and above his salary of $2,000.

SHIPPING MASTER OF MONTREAL.

Mr. CASEY asked, Have the Government received a copy of the following resolution, alleged to have been passed by the Montreal Board of Trade, on or about the 26th April instant:—

The following resolution was moved by Mr. Andrew Allan, seconded by Mr. T. B. Brown, Mr. John Torrance and others: "That the position of shipping master of this port is one requiring from its incumbent for the proper discharge of his duties, experience and familiarity with the shipping matters and customs, and should, in the opinion of this board, be filled in accordance with the wishes of the shipping and commercial community; that it appears that the shipping interests of this port have unanimously recommended to the Government the appointment of a person who, in their opinion, possesses the qualifications necessary for the proper discharge of the duties of the post, and their recommendation has been approved by the council of this board. This Board, under the circumstances, has learned with surprise that the Government have decided to appoint to the position Mr. Fabien Vanasse, whose qualifications are not known and whose candidature has in no respect received the support or approval of those classes whose interests are intimately connected with the office and who are called upon to maintain the same. Under these circumstances, this board strongly urges the Government to reconsider its decision in the matter and to make the appointment suggested and approved of by the shipping interests and the council of the Board of Trade."

If not, have they received any communication directly or indirectly from the Montreal Board of Trade, or from any person or persons on their behalf regarding the appointment of Mr. Vanasse as shipping master at Montreal? If so, what was the nature of the communications?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The answer to the first part of the question is yes. The last part drops.

Mr. CASEY. It does not drop. The Minister must answer it.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The only answer I have to the question is yes, and it is a complete answer.

Mr. CASEY. I rise to a point of order. It is open to discussion whether that is a complete answer or not. The hon. Minister takes advantage of a technicality—

Mr. SPEAKER. What is the point of order?

Mr. CASEY. The point of order is that the answer given by the Minister is not a complete answer to the question.

Mr. SPEAKER. That is not a point of order. If any hon. member wishes to discuss an answer which he has received from a Minister, he can only do so by moving the adjournment of the House.

Mr. CASEY. I beg to ask for information on the point. Is it too much, when a question is asked of the Minister, to require answers to all the points contained in the question, or some reason for not answering them?

Mr. SPEAKER. Order.

Mr. CASEY. I am asking for information whether it is not possible to discuss a point of order at this time as well as at any other time?

Mr. SPEAKER. Really, I do not see that any point of order has been raised by the hon. member. The Government may decline to answer a question altogether if they so choose. Then, as I have stated, the only remedy open for a member who wishes to discuss the matter is to move the adjournment of the House.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The only difficulty is that the hon. gentleman did not read his question; but to save time he very properly dropped thirty or forty lines. If he takes the trouble to read the question quietly over to himself, he will see that yes is a complete answer to it, and that not another word is required.

Mr. CASEY. As the hon. Minister has discussed the question, I suppose I am at liberty to reply. I do not see that dropping—

Mr. SPEAKER. Order.

Mr. CASEY. If I am not as much in order as the hon. Minister, I beg to move the adjournment of the House. The part of the question which I did not read consists merely of the resolution of the Montreal Board of Trade with reference to the appointment of Mr. Vanasse as shipping master at the port of Montreal. I dispensed with the reading of that at the request of the members of the House. I asked whether the Government had not received this resolution? I said, if not, had they received any communication directly or indirectly from any parties on behalf of the Montreal Board of Trade, and what was the nature of such communication?

Mr. CASEY.

My reason for putting that question was that the Board of Trade at the same time passed another resolution calling upon the senior member for the city to bring the matter before Parliament and to ask whether such important interests as those of the Board of Trade should not be consulted in making an appointment of this kind. It was for that reason that I asked whether the Government had received communications from other parties. But the hon. Minister takes advantage of the words "if not" at the beginning of the second question, to say that when he answers yes to the first question, the second one disappears. Technically, I suppose it does; but I do not think the Minister is serving his own interests or keeping in touch with the House in taking advantage of that technicality. I beg leave to withdraw my motion for the adjournment of the House.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Carried.

Mr. CHARLTON. I may be permitted to say that I hope the withdrawal of the motion will be permitted. It would be a pity to lose the day for private members for so small a reason.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I want to say a word on the subject. I think the hon. member has been too sensitive altogether as to the nature of the answer which has been given to him. His question distinctly was as to a certain resolution which his question details—a resolution passed by the Montreal Board of Trade. His question was whether that had been received by the Government, and the Minister answered: "Yes, we have received it." The second part of the question is, if you have not received it, have you received anything else from other people? It was surely not expected that we should answer that which is only to be put in case the first question is answered negatively.

Mr. CASEY. That is the technicality.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. There is no technicality about it. We have received a communication from the Board of Trade: that is the answer to the first question. And the answer to the second is, yes, we have received that very communication.

Mr. CASEY. I would suggest leaving the second part as a separate question.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I think that motions to adjourn interposed between business, when the motion is not in connection with a matter of very great importance, are to be deprecated. Unless the object is to discuss some matters of very great urgency, the business of the House should not be interrupted in this way. On private members' day, if any private members wish to move the adjournment, I think the Government will not object to the motion being carried.

Motion, to adjourn, withdrawn.

GEOLOGICAL SURVEY REPORTS.

Mr. COATSWORTH asked, 1. For how many years has the Geological Department been publishing reports? 2. What number have been printed each year? 3. What number have been gratuitously distributed each year? 4. What number have been sold each year, and what amount has been realized each year on sales? 5. What amount of these reports for each year now remain in the department for sale, and at what price are they held? 6. Are there not numerous complaints made because those reports are not distributed free of charge? 7. Is it the intention of the Government to make provision for their free distribution?

Mr. DALY. I beg to say, in answer to the hon. gentleman: 1. Since 1842. 2. From 1876 to 1880—400 copies of the French edition were printed annually; from 1881 to 1884—500 copies were printed in French. Since 1885 to 1894—750 copies in French. From 1876 to 1877—2,400 copies were printed in English; in 1878—3,000 copies in English; in 1879 to 1893—3,500 copies were printed in English. It will require several days to give the returns asked for in questions 3, 4 and 5. 6. A very few complaints have been received respecting the free distribution of these reports.

CAPE BRETON RAILWAY.

Mr. LANDERKIN (for Mr. Davies, P.E.I.) asked, Has the Department of Railways paid or determined to pay all or any, and, if any, which of the claims of sub-contractors for the construction of the Cape Breton Railway? If so, what claims and amounts have been so paid or determined; and if any have been rejected, which, and for what amounts?

Mr. HAGGART. The Government have not paid any claims of sub-contractors for the construction of the Cape Breton Railway.

Mr. LANDERKIN (for Mr. Davies, P.E.I.) asked, Has the claim of Luke Day, a sub-contractor under Sims & Slater in the Cape Breton Branch of the Intercolonial Railway, been allowed by the Department of Railways, or is it the intention of the Government to pay or to recommend for payment all or any part of such claim?

Mr. HAGGART. No claim of such a man has been presented at all to the Government.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS—MANITOBA AND NORTH-WEST TERRITORIES

Mr. McMULLEN. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to inquire when the return, ordered on 30th March last, of the cost of the construction of public buildings in Manitoba and the North-west, will be brought down?

Mr. OUMET. It is in course of preparation, as far as my department is concerned.

GOVERNMENT IMPORTS FROM THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I would like to know when the return of the amount of goods imported from the United States, for the use of the Government in the public service, will be down?

Mr. WALLACE. If such has been ordered, it is in the course of preparation.

Mr. LANDERKIN. When will it be brought down? Of course, the Government would not import very largely from the United States, and the return cannot be very large.

TARIFF COMMISSION.

Mr. MARTIN. When will the return as to the expenses of the Tariff Commission be brought down?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I do not know. The expenses are not returned. Probably not this session.

THE LORD'S DAY OBSERVANCE.

Mr. CHARLTON moved second reading of Bill (No. 2) to secure the better observance of the Lord's Day, commonly called Sunday. He said: I feel quite well aware than in approaching the discussion of this question, I am not entering upon a subject likely to be of very great interest to the House. I regret that this should be the case, but I think I may assume that it is. I have, however, to ask that my fellow-members will consider this question without any party bias whatever, because it is in no sense a party question. It has nothing whatever to do with party politics, and should be considered entirely uninfluenced by such considerations at all. I hope, also, that the consideration of the question will be approached by hon. members without their being influenced by personal considerations—by what the mover of the Bill may have said in the House upon various public questions, which possibly may have created some little feeling against himself in the contests that have taken place here. I should deprecate any such feeling existing towards me of a character calculated to prejudice any chance this Bill otherwise might have. I remember, some years ago, when I was promoting a Bill in this House, I approached the gentleman who was then the first Canadian of his day, and the leader of this House, and I asked him to be so kind as to allow no consideration connected with my having been in opposition to him to influence his opinions or decision with regard to that Bill, and that hon. gentleman said to me that he would be sorry to have me or any other gentleman entertain so poor an opinion of his disinterestedness and his character, as a man, to suppose that he would allow the fact that the mover or promoter of a Bill had been opposed to him politically, to have any influence whatever with him. I may say that the Bill succeeded. The hon. gentleman who led the Government never interposed an objection, prompted by the consideration that I was a political opponent, and through his kindness the Bill received in this House consideration on its merits. I ask the same treatment from my hon. friend opposite. I present this Bill upon its merits. I ask that it may be considered on its merits, and that my own position in the House or in the public may not, in any sense or degree, prejudice its chances of success.

Many attacks have been made, I am sorry to say, in connection with the Bill, upon the character of its promoter as a crank, a fanatic, a saintly man, a Puritan, a self-righteous man, and so on. I am sorry to say that we all deserve to confess our sins, and look to a higher source for forgiveness. Our highest aspirations often savour somewhat of earthly things :

We hope, we resolve, we aspire, we pray,
And we think we mount the air on wings,
Beyond the recall of sensual things,
While our feet still cling to the heavy clay.

I wish to claim, in connection with this matter, no merit further than that of seeking to serve my fellow-countrymen and of being governed by what I believe to be good intentions. I do not present the Bill because I think it reflects the opinions of one section more than another, but because its provisions will benefit the whole country. I believe it to be a public measure, conceived in the highest interests of the people. I believe that, if passed, it will reflect credit on the House and be a blessing to the people. This is not a popularity yielding measure certainly ; but it will be a beneficent measure, in my humble opinion, if it passes.

This Bill, Mr. Speaker, is based, of course, upon religious considerations. The sabbath was set apart in the first place to commemorate the creation of the world ; it was set apart by the Creator and hallowed by him. The only institutions that were transmitted to posterity from the possessions of man's first estate of innocence were the sabbath and marriage, and when the time came to inaugurate a greater event than the creation of the world, when the time came to redeem man, the hallowed day was changed from the seventh day of the week to the first and re-established as a memorial of redemption. And thus it stands to-day recognized by nearly all Christian churches—recognized by the Catholic church, recognized by almost every Protestant church—as the day set apart by Divinity to celebrate that great event, the greatest of all events in human history.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I propose to present this Bill not from the religious standpoint except incidentally. I propose to present this Bill and urge its claim upon the members of this House from a civil standpoint. I propose to present it as a civil measure ; as a measure designed to secure for the people of this country their civil rights, and their religious rights as well, under the law. The aim of the Bill is not to prescribe religious observances ; it will not interfere with the belief or religious observance of the Mahomedan or the Jew, the Pagan or the infidel. It will prescribe to no man what his religious belief or his religious conduct or his religious observances shall be. It is designed to secure to all men certain civil rights ; it is designed to secure to the labourer the right of rest on the first day of the week ; it is designed to secure the right to the Christian labourer to enjoy religious observances or ordinances upon the first day of the week—and, unfortunately in many cases, unless the law steps in and protects him in that right, it is impossible for him to exercise it. The foundation for action in this Bill is, first, that the Bill is in the interest of human liberty, and second, that it is in harmony with divine law.

Now, while we may not be called upon to legislate with regard to religion and morality, while we may not make a man's religion or a man's standard in morals something that will determine whether he shall be a member of this House or a member of any other body or not ; religion and morality, nevertheless, Mr. Speaker, have very much to do with the interests of the state. George Washington, in his farewell address to the American people, used this remarkable language :

Of all the dispositions and habits that lead to political prosperity, religion and morality are indispensable supports. In vain would that man claim the tribute of patriotism who would labour to subvert these great pillars of human happiness.

Now, the state, while it is not called upon to dictate what a man's religion shall be or what a man's religious observances shall be, ought not to sanction that which promotes irreligion and vice. No Christian state would be justified in doing that. The state is not justified in sanctioning and promoting obscene plays, the introduction of obscene literature, gambling or vice of any kind. It is the proper function of the state to prohibit all those usages and practices ; it is the proper function of the state to refrain from that which promotes irreligion and vice ; and no civilized state, whether there be there a connection between church and state or not, would be performing its duty if it permitted any usage which promoted irreligion or which created or increased vice.

All human law rests upon the Decalogue :
Thou shalt not kill ; thou shalt not steal ;
thou shalt not bear false witness against thy neighbour ; thou shall not commit adultery—these are the foundations of civil law. And the Decalogue, Mr. Speaker, is not of parital obligation—it is a symmetrical whole ; and the state cannot observe part of the Decalogue and disregard part of the Decalogue. If it gives heed to the sixth or the seventh or the eighth commandment, it must give heed also to the fourth, which is part of the symmetrical whole. Now, although there is no union of church and state in this country, there is, nevertheless, some intimate connection between the civil institutions of the country and religious obligations. No state can be entirely divorced in its laws and usages and constitutions from this obligation. St. Paul said with regard to the empire of Rome, "There is no power but of God ; the powers that be are ordained of God." "By me kings reign and princes decree justice," said Solomon, in referring to Jehovah. Men cannot sever the connection that exists between religious obligation and civil institutions, whether there is a union of church and state or not. Christianity has stamped its distinctive features upon the civilization of this century, upon its political institutions, upon its social institutions, upon its religious institutions—the teaching of the great prophet of Nazareth leavens all phases and all functions of society ; and the contrast that exists between the civilization of the nineteenth century and the civilization of Rome under Nero and Caligula is entirely due to the operation and influence and the formative power of Christianity brought to bear upon the society of our age. So, Sir, we are bound, in the consideration of this question, to give the requirements of the higher the divine law due consideration. We are bound to permit these requirements to have their due weight and to determine what bearing they have upon our civilization and to what extent we are meeting these requirements. As I have said, the state cannot dictate the creed, the mode of worship or the religious observances of the people. But just as truly the state should not promote infidelity, the state should not dishonour God's law. It is just as absolutely debarred if governed by correct principles from doing the one thing as it is from doing the other, if it properly discharges its duty. The state should protect the rights of conscience. The state should protect every citizen within its bounds in the exercise of religious liberty ; and I hold that the state may properly provide such laws as public necessity and the public good require.

I lay this foundation, because every principle in this Bill is involved in it. I proceed next to the consideration of the question, Have we any precedents for the legislation that is proposed in this Bill ? Is this some new scheme hitherto untried ? Is it a new theory that is propounded here for the first time ? Is there any precedent for the action proposed in this Bill ? I answer, Yes, not only one precedent, but multitudes of precedents. A law of this kind was first put upon the Statute-book in England in the reign of Edgar, in the year 958. Between that year and 1854, there were thirty laws placed upon the Statute-book of Great Britain with regard to sabbath observance, more or less stringent in their character, but all conceding the principle that the state could properly legislate with regard to Lord's Day observance. Shortly before Queen Victoria's inauguration, a Royal Commission was appointed to examine into the question of Sunday observance in England, to traverse the whole field of investigation, and report as to the character of such laws, to report as to the character of Sunday observance, to report as to whether additional legislation was necessary, to report whether legislation of this kind was justifiable. This commission was struck in the year 1832 ; it was a special commission, consisting of twenty-nine members, among whom were Sir Andrew Agnew, Sir Robert Peel, Sir Robert Inglis, Lord Viscount Morpeth, Lord Viscount Sandon and Sir Thomas Baring. Many celebrated men were members of this commission. The evidence taken before this commission fills some 200 pages. They proceeded to summon witnesses, medical men, employers of labour, manufacturers, merchants, all classes of business men in England. They made an exhaustive examination of all the questions bearing on this matter, and I shall make two or three extracts as indicating the character of their report. In their report, paragraph 23, the following language occurs :—

In recommending a general revision and amendment of the laws for the observance of the sabbath it should be observed that Sunday labour is generally looked upon as a degradation, and it appears in evidence that in each trade, in proportion to its disregard for the Lord's Day, is the immorality of those engaged in it.

Now, that statement, if you will pause a moment to consider it, is pregnant with suggestive truths—that labour done on that day is looked upon as a degradation, and that Sunday labour promotes immorality ; paragraph 24 declares :

The workmen are aware, and the masters in many trades admit the fact, that were Sunday labour to cease, it would occasion no diminution of the weekly wages.

I shall read one more extract from the report of the commission, and one extract from the evidence given before that commission. At paragraph 29 of the report, I read :

The express commandment of the Almighty affords the plain and undoubted rule for man's obedience in this as in all other things ; and the only question therefore, is, in what particular cases should the sanctions and penalties of human laws be added to further and enforce this obedience to the divine commandment; a question which should be approached with much seriousness of mind, when the obligations of legislators to promote, by all suitable means, the glory of God, and the happiness of those committed to their charge, is duly weighed.

These extracts correctly indicate the character of the report made upon this question by this commission in the year 1832; and I would just produce one item of evidence given before the commission by John Richard Farre, M.D. :

The researches in physiology by the analogy of the working of Providence in nature, will establish the truth of revelation, and consequently show that the divine commandment is not to be considered as an arbitrary enactment, but as an appointment necessary to man. This is the position in which I would place it, as contradistinguished from precept and legislation; I would point out the sabbatical rest as necessary to man, and that the great enemies of the sabbath, and consequently the enemies of man, are all laborious exercises of the body or mind and dissipation, which force the circulation on that day in which it should repose; whilst relaxation from the ordinary cares of life, the enjoyment of this repose in the bosom of one's family, with the religious studies and duties which the day enjoins, not one of which, if rightly exercised, tends to abridge life, constitute the beneficial and appropriate service of the day. The student of nature, in becoming the student of Christ, will find in the principles of this doctrine and law, and in the practical application of them, the only and perfect science which prolongs the present, and perfects the future life.

So much for the report of this commission, and the character of the evidence given before them, which led to their recommendation that the Sunday observance laws of England should be made more stringent.

If we turn from Great Britain to the various colonies, we will find that scarcely one English colony is without some kind of an enactment with regard to the Lord's Day observance. I believe there are only two of the forty-four American states that have not upon their Statute-books laws of a similar character. Precedents are abundant, and I think, Mr. Speaker, we may fairly come to the conclusion that the laws were warranted by divine authority and by human need. If human need had not required the placing of such laws upon the Statute-book, surely we would not find thirty statutes in Great Britain, we would not have over forty American states with laws of that kind, we would not have every English colony, with perhaps one or two exceptions, with laws of that kind; and the universality of those laws, and the length of time during which they have been in force, and the result of those laws in all these cases, render the conclusion inevitable that the laws were warranted and that they were justified by experience.

If we look at the character and progress of states and nations that have enacted and lived under these laws, one of the most powerful arguments bearing upon their propriety and necessity, is furnished. Take the Anglo-Saxon race itself, a sabbath observing race from the commencement, with 6,000,000 people in 1700, with twenty and a half millions in 1800; the English language the fifth among the languages of Europe in the year 1800, spoken in that year by twenty and a half millions of people, spoken to-day by one hundred and fifteen millions; risen from the rank of the fifth language in Europe in 1800 to the first language in Europe in 1890; spoken by sixty millions more people than the French language; spoken by thirty-six millions more people than the German language. Surely there is some cause for the wonderful progress of this race. Its institutions must have been of a good character, its laws must have been well adapted to secure national growth and prosperity. In my belief nothing marks the contrast between Anglo-Saxon states and continental states more pointedly than the laws of the Anglo-Saxon states with relation to sabbath observance, to obedience to divine law, and to rendering obedience and homage to the will of Him who rules nations, by whose edict nations prosper or nations are brought low.

The Scotch people are prominent above all other people for their observance of the Lord's Day. I do not suppose that there is a race on the face of the earth whose progress has been more remarkable, whose influence is more widely extended, that has made a better figure in science and literature and material advancement than the Scotch people, who inhabit a little country, with a limited population, but the leaven of whose influence has reached the ends of the earth; it is felt in this Dominion, in the United States, in every British colony, and in proportion to their number their influence is vastly greater than the influence of any other race on the face of this globe. It is not because of the superiority of the race or of any natural advantage, but it is in consequence of the stability of character, firmness and persistency in adhering to their rules in regard to religious matters and sabbath observance, a characteristic which they have displayed during the last two hundred or three hundred years. We may safely follow those precedents and examples because the whole course of experience with respect to them points in one direction and in one direction only, and proves that this experiment has been pre-eminently a success.

I shall proceed in a few moments to the citation of authorities on this question, which I trust will have some weight and influence with almost all members of this House, and especially with those hon. members who come from the province of Quebec. Before doing so, however, I may be permitted to say, or rather it may be necessary to say a few words with respect to the change of the Sabbath from the seventh day of the week to the first day of the week. I judge this is necessary from the fact that last year one of the leading newspapers of this city contained an editorial, in which it combatted the position that the law with respect to sabbath rest had any application now, or if it had any application it referred to Saturday and not to the first day of the week, and an hon. friend, who sits behind me, took the same ground, that we were arguing for the enactment of a law requiring the observance of a day for the observance of which there was no sanction or requirement in the divine law. I do not think it is necessary to enter into an extended disquisition on this point. Suffice it to say that the Catholic Church has accepted the first day of the week as the Lord's Day, and the Protestants have accepted it, with one or two trifling exceptions, and the change of the day is held to rest upon the example of the early Apostolic Church. Recently a manual of worship of the early Christian Church was found in one of the Greek convents of Constantinople. That manual gave the order of worship among the early Christians and dealt with all the religious observances, and it required explicit observance of what is termed the Lord's Day of the Lord as a day of rest and religious observance, when the people should be gathered together for the purpose of breaking bread. If we establish the fact that the early Christian Church adopted that day, and if we refer to the further fact that the institutions of the Christian Church were fixed, not by chance, but by the direction of the Third Person in the Godhead, the Holy Spirit (the apostles were commanded to tarry at Jerusalem for that spirit till it came, and it was poured out upon them at Pentecost), if we consider that influence directed the apostles in laying the foundation of Christian institutions, we have the fact that the selection of the first day of the week was by virtue of the influence and direction of the Holy Spirit, and that the Catholic Church and all other churches that recognize that day are following the example of the Apostolic Church, and that the Apostolic Church was governed in its decision by the influence of that power that our Saviour promised to send to direct them and instruct them and bring to mind and remembrance all things he had said unto them. Let these remarks suffice for this branch of the question.

With respect to the propriety of the choice of this day from a civil standpoint, of course for obvious reasons it is necessary to have a uniform day. One body might observe Saturday, another Friday and another the first day of the week, and the result would be great confusion in civil employment. The lawyer at the bar might observe one day and the judge on the bench another; the clerk in the store might observe one day and the customer another; the locomotive engineer might wish to lay off on Saturday and the fireman on Sunday, and this would produce great confusion. So the necessity of enacting one day as the legal day of rest and thus following the example of the Christian Church, is apparent, and that should be the day of the week as laid down by the Christian Church.

I wish, having shown that there are many precedents for a law of this kind—precedents in British legislation, precedents in colonial legislation, precedents in American legislation, and I will show later that there have been precedents in recent days in European legislation—to refer to some of the authorities for the observance of this day, and I take into account the fact that I have many friends in the province of Quebec who are somewhat sceptical as to the propriety of legislating for the observance of this day, not that they do not recognize the day, not that their church does not recognize the day, but they have some doubt as to the propriety of this House of Commons interfering in this matter. I desire to refer to certain Catholic authorities for the purpose not only of strengthening my position, but of influencing the convictions of my fellow members who are Catholics. I take the liberty of reading what the Holy Father Pope Leo XIII. said about this matter of Sunday observance in one of his deliverances to the church of which he is the head. His Holiness said:

The observance of the sacred day which was willed expressly by God from the first origin of man, is imperatively demanded by the absolute and essential dependence of the creature upon the Creator. And this law, mark it well, my beloved, which at one and the same time so admirably provides for the honour of God, the spiritual needs and dignity of the man, and the temporal well-being of human life. This law, we say, touches not only individuals, but also people and nations, which owe to Divine Providence the enjoyment of every benefit and advantage which is derived from civil society. And it is precisely to this fatal tendency, which to-day prevails to desire to lead mankind far away from God, and to order the affairs of kingdoms and nations as if God did not exist, that to-day is to be attributed this contempt and neglect of the day of the Lord. They say, it is true that they intend in this way to promote industry more actively, and to procure for the people an increase of prosperity and riches. Foolish and lying words! They mean, on the contrary, to take away from the people the comforts, the consolations and the benefits of religion; they wish to weaken in them the sentiment of faith and love for heavenly blessings; and they invoke upon the nations the most tremendous scourges of God, the just avenger of His outraged honour.

These are the words of the head of the Catholic Church. These are weighty words, these are words of wisdom, these are words that every man, whether Catholic or Protestant, in this Dominion may well heed, these are words directly warranting the action proposed on this occasion, to ask by legislative enactment to some extent the honouring of this day for which His Holiness speaks. I have here expressions on the same line from His Eminence Cardinal Taschereau, from His Grace Archbishop Fabre, from His Eminence Cardinal McCloskey, from Cardinal Gibbons, from Archbishop Ireland, from Archbishop Riordan, from Archbishop Goss, from Bishop Keene, of Richmond, Va., from the Bishop of Buffalo. All these Catholic prelates take exactly the same position (some of them in a more pronounced way) that is taken by the head of their church. As to the Protestant clergy, it is unnecessary to quote from them; it is only necessary to say that all are in favour of legislation that will secure a better observance of this day for the public benefit and for the civil government of man. As for jurists, I might quote the language of Lord Mansfield, the language of Sir Matthew Hale, the language of Blackstone, the language of Justice Field, the language of Judge Thurman, and I will quote an extract from Judge Kelly of Minneapolis, which is so pertinent to the case and is so recent that I will place it upon record now. Judge Kelly says :

The Puritan taught and enforced a strict, very strict observance of the sabbath-day. And he made that day the corner-stone of his political fabric. I am not a Puritan, nor a descendant of the Puritan. I am a Southern born and Southern reared. By blood, I am Irish, and by faith, Catholic. All the traditions of my life have been adverse to the Puritan and his teaching. But for all that, I thank God that the Pilgrim Fathers left Leyden and landed at Plymouth, and that the impress of their presence and labours here have been left in the character of every American state. If, perhaps, they were in their ideas about the sabbath too severe, that very fact has made the impress more lasting.

This is the language of a judge in one of the western states, and an Irish Catholic. Then with regard to statesmen, I might quote the words of Disraeli, the words of Gladstone, the words of Argyle, the words of Bright, the words of Shaftesbury, the words of Washington, the words of Lincoln, of Garfield, of Harrison, of our own statesmen of Ontario, Mowat—I am afraid I could not quote the words of some gentlemen who are interrupting me on the other side of the House. As to labour organizations, I might quote the words of Henry George, of T. V. Powderly, of P. M. Arthur, of the American Federation of Labour. There is not a labour organization, I believe, upon this continent that has not placed upon record its desire for Sunday rest through resolutions passed by the order, and through the language of its recognized head. As to religious organizations I will quote from one only; I will quote the following from the circular of the Third Catholic Plenary Council, assembled at Baltimore :

Mr. CHARLTON.

And the consequences of this desecration are as manifest as the desecration itself. The Lord's Day is the poor man's day of rest; it has been taken from him,—and the labouring classes are a seething volcano of social discontent. The Lord's Day is the home day, drawing closer the sweet domestic ties, by giving the toiler a day with wife and children; but it has been turned into a day of labour,—and homes are fast losing their sweetness and their hold. The Lord's Day is the church day, strengthening and consecrating the bond of brotherhood among all men, by their kneeling together around the altars of the one Father in heaven; but men are drawn away from this blessed communion of saints,—and as a natural consequence they are lured into the counterfeit communion of socialism, and other wild and destructive systems. The Lord's Day is God's day, rendering ever nearer and more intimate the union between the creature and his Creator, and thus ennobling human life in all its relations; and where this bond is weakened, an effort is made to cut man loose from God entirely, and to leave him, according to the expression of St. Paul, "without God in this world." (Eph. ii. 12.) The profanation of the Lord's Day, whatever be its pretext, is a defrauding both of God and his creatures, and retribution is not slow.

The case could not have been put in better form than in this circular of the third Catholic Plenary Council of Baltimore. Now, Mr. Speaker, there has been manifested a growing discontent among the labourers of Europe and the labourers of America because of the exactions of capital, and because of the gradual loss of their privileges as regards the day of rest. These labourers have felt instinctively that the demands of corporations and employers that compel them to labour seven days out of seven, was trampling upon their just rights. Whether they had religious scruples or not, whether they believed in God or not, whether they believed that the Lord's Day was of divine origin or not; these men have instinctively felt that as a civil right they were entitled to one day's rest out of the seven; and this agitation has begun to produce fruit. There was formed in Geneva in 1861, the Sabbath Observance Federation. The operations of this federation at first attracted little attention and produced little results, but at the time of the holding of the World's Fair at Paris in 1889, attention seems to have been called to this question by the example of the United States and of Great Britain with regard to their exhibits. These exhibits at the Paris exhibition, as well as the exhibits of all the British colonies, were closed on Sunday, and this was an object lesson which seems to have produced a powerful effect on public sentiment in Paris, to the extent, at least, of drawing attention to this question. In connection with this fair, an International Congress of Weekly Rest was held at Paris under the authorization of the French Government from 24th September to 27th September, 1889. This national congress made recommendations with regard to Sunday rest by passing resolutions advising legislation with reference to this matter, and recommending the securing of Sunday rest to the labourer, by legislative enactment. This international congress was followed by the International Labour Congress which was convened by Emperor William II., of Germany, at Berlin, in March, 1890, less than a year after the congress at Paris. The International Labour Congress which sat from 15th March to 30th March, also passed resolutions in favour of Sunday rest. Here then we have the resolutions of the International Congress of Weekly Rest at Paris in 1889, the resolution of the International Labour Congress, convened by the Emperor of Germany, at Berlin, 1890; and following these recommendations came fruits.

Germany passed a law in 1891, and again in July, 1892, and in that law, the prosecuting of certain employments was prohibited on the Lord's Day, and clerks in all callings were only employed five hours on the Lord's Day, while work in mines, manufactories, workshops, tile shops, dockyards, and building yards was prohibited. Austria passed laws of a similar character in 1884 and in 1885. Hungary passed a law of a similar character in 1891, and the association of newspaper editors and printers has maintained a severe struggle to bring to an end the printing of newspapers on Sunday, with good prospect of success. Belgium passed a law in 1885, and the law was further amended in 1889. By this law letter delivery was curtailed more than one-half; fifteen hundred freight trains were discontinued on Sunday, the freight depots were closed, postmen are free every Sunday, and the service performed by special persons, and various other provisions were made for securing Sunday rest for employees, and so the principle of recognizing man's right to Sunday rest was recognized in Belgium. Denmark passed a law in 1891 which released 100,000 Sunday slaves from their labour on that day. Spain, the last country we would almost dream of in connection with Sunday rest-reform passed a law in February, 1892, and under the provisions of that law, Sunday rest was made obligatory in every government establishment in Spain, and Sunday labour in all factories was prohibited for persons under eighteen years of age. France passed a law on the 16th of February, 1892, and again on the 2nd of November, 1892, and by these laws contractors were prohibited from compelling labour upon Sunday, women and children were secured their Sunday's rest, and this provision of the law, curiously enough,—I wish to call the attention of my hon. friends to this fact—guaranteed women and children one day's rest a week—not the sabbath nor the Lord's Day, but simply one day's rest a week. The legislators did not dare to use the expression Sunday rest, as they were afraid to seem to make concessions to the Catholic party, who were demanding this legislation, but they gave a law guaranteeing one day's rest a week; and this indicates pretty clearly what the Catholic sentiment of France is with regard to the matter. The fact being that the Catholics have become ardent friends of the labour Sunday rest movement. Through the influence of this movement the government has closed its freight depots on the railways after 10 a.m. Sunday, postal deliverers have been reduced one-half. Sunday fairs in many instances have been deferred till Monday, and in the French army Sunday is kept strictly as a day of rest. Holland passed a law in 1889 dealing with the Sunday rest question. Sunday work for women and children in factories is forbidden. A large proportion of Sunday freight trains have been discontinued. Postmen and telegraph employees are free on Sunday. Railway employees have more or less Sunday rest. Elections have been discontinued on Sunday. The civic guard does not drill that day, and no Sunday papers are issued. Italy is moving in the direction of a Sunday law, under the advice of the Pope, and the influence of the Congress of Workingmen's Societies, and other leagues and organizations. A law is in course of preparation in Russia itself for securing a cessation of labour on the Lord's Day. Norway has a law in the same direction. Sweden has a similar law. In Switzerland almost every canton has a Lord's Day law and prohibition of Sunday newspapers. Now, here are the fruits of this agitation in these continental countries where a few years ago there was scarcely a whisper of legislation with regard to Sunday observance. We have now such laws in Germany, Austria, Hungary, Belgium, Denmark, Spain, France, Holland, Russia, Norway, Sweden and Switzerland; and surely Canada can never claim to be the moral leaders of this continent or a moral leader in any sense, if we lag behind in this matter, and refuse to place a law of the same character upon our Statute-book. This movement for sabbath reform is a movement, I repeat, specially in the interest of labour, and it is an interest in regard to which labour is beginning to awake. The labourers of all countries are realizing that they are being made slaves to the exactions of corporations and capitalists, and that unless the legislatures step in and secure to them the rights they desire to maintain, they will continue to be slaves to Sunday labour.

Last fall there was held at Chicago the most remarkable of all the Sunday rest conventions or congress as yet held in the world—the International Congress on Sunday Rest, which met on the 27th of September, and remained in session three days. This congress was attended by leading statesmen, public men, journalists, jurists—

An hon. MEMBER. And priests.

Mr. CHARLTON. Yes; priest and preachers; and Archbishop Ireland was one of the most active among them. Leading men were there from all sections of the civilized globe, and the expression of opinion with regard to this matter was of the most unmistakable character. The arguments placed before the public through the medium of that International Sunday Rest Congress are unanswerable, and to my mind among the best papers presented to that congress were those of Cardinal Gibbons and Archbishop Ireland. That international congress has given to this movement in the United States an impetus that will be sure to tell in the near future.

It is conceded on all hands that the rights of labour cannot be secured without the intervention of law; it is conceded that the law must step in, or the labourer is powerless; it has been shown that the advocacy of Sunday labour comes not from the men who perform the labour, but from the men who pocket the dividends, and who profit by trampling on the rights of the individual. It has been shown furthermore that the labourer is not a free agent in this matter. He reaches home Saturday night too tired to continue to work, and too poor to quit; and he is compelled to work. With him it is not a free choice, but a choice between breaking his conscientious scruples and starvation for himself and his family; and unless the law protects him in the right he desires to enjoy, he is powerless and at the mercy of those corporations who wish to coin money out of his life-blood, his sufferings and his loss, and by the deprivation of himself and his family of every religious privilege and every natural right.

Now, Sir, we have in all parts of the world at the present time labour troubles and unrest; we have to-day 200,000 miners on strike in the United States; we have an army of disaffected men marching on to Washington; we have bomb-throwing in almost every capital of Europe; we have society trembling on the verge of great social upheavals; and we are all standing in dread of the changes that may speedily come. What is the matter? Has all this trouble and unrest come because we have been dealing with the disaffected classes on the basis of Christian privileges and Christian usage? Is it because we have paid heed to the injunctions of the Teacher of Nazareth, and have found that these injunctions have proved insufficient? No, Sir; it is because we have disregarded those injunctions; it is because modern society disregards the principles of Christianity and the commands of its Founder; and the remedy for all these difficulties lies in the application of Christian principles, which will make better masters and better men. Unless these principles are applied, these social upheavals will continue; and the first step to take in applying them is to recognize God's law, that the sabbath-day is to be remembered and kept holy, and the labourer is to be secured in the possession of his right to enjoy that day as a day of rest.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I come to the point where I propose to inquire, do these Sunday laws that are proposed violate any of the true principles of human liberty? It is claimed that they do. It is claimed that it is an unjust interference with a man's natural right to say that he shall not be permitted to labour, that he shall not be permitted to employ labour, that he shall not be permitted to do just as he pleases with regard to such things. If a Sunday observance law is an infringement of any just and true principle of human liberty, then, of course, we cannot pass that law; and the question is, is it? With regard to this matter I wish to refer to just three authorities; though I might refer to hundreds. I wish first to refer to Blackstone, who we all know is a very eminent English jurist, whose opinion on a legal or any other question should command respect. With regard to the Sunday rest he says:

It is of admirable service to a state, considered merely as a civil institution.

Mr. Justice Field, of the United States Supreme Court, one of the foremost jurists of this continent, in giving a decision in California some years ago, when he was chief justice of that state, said:

The legislature had the right to make laws for the preservation of health and the promotion of good morals, and so to require periodical cessation from labour, if of opinion that it would tend to both. Archbishop Ireland said in my hearing last September, at Chicago, with reference to this matter:

I know well we cannot ask the interference of the civil law for mere religion's sake. This consideration is often urged against enactments of Sunday laws. But Sunday is more than a religious day. Sunday is the safety of society, the safety of the nation. Sunday is the inheritance of those who are disinherited from the wealth of the world. Sunday is the day needed by the masses of our people. On this ground I appeal to our lawmakers to aid us in preserving us it from desecration.

Noble words these, carrying conviction to every man who is open to conviction—words pronounced by one of the highest ecclesiastical authorities on this continent, and one of the foremost and purest men in the world. We have, in these declarations by jurists and ecclesiastics, the foundation laid for the vindication and proof of the assertion that Sunday laws do not violate the principles of human liberty. In conclusion, in urging this branch of the subject, I may say that it is proper for this Legislature, or for any Legislature, to impose any degree of restraint necessary for the general welfare. All laws impose restraints. Laws against theft impose restraint; laws against murder impose restraint; laws against any crime impose restraint. Any restraint it is necessary to impose for the purpose of securing the public weal is a restraint which the lawmaker has a right to impose, and if it can be shown that this restraint with regard to Sabbath observance is a salutary one, calculated to benefit society, this Legislature has the right to impose it.

I propose to inquire briefly into the question: In what respect does a Sunday rest law promote the public interest? And in what respect is it necessary in the public interest? I answer that it is necessary in many respects. It is necessary, first, as a sanitary regulation. We have the power to make quarantine regulations. We appoint health officers who impose restraints, who interfere with individual liberties, and they have the right to do so in the public interest. We have the right, as a sanitary regulation, to abate a nuisance of any kind, detrimental and prejudicial to health. We have the right to regulate the hours of labour. We can pass a 10 or an 8 or a 12-hour law; we can regulate the hours of labour upon the grounds of a sanitary regulation. We can inspect food; we can prohibit the use of certain articles of food. We can exercise the most arbitrary powers in connection with food inspection, as a sanitary regulation. We can order the destruction of infected clothing and diseased cattle. We can do anything that the public good and safety require. And I say that the Sabbath observance law, as a sanitary regulation, is in the public interest. With regard to its bearing on the question, as a sanitary regulation, let us see what the outcome of the deliberations of the Royal Commission, appointed in 1832, was:

This commission took the testimony of medical men as to the utility of Sunday rest in repairing the waste of physical energy. The impression produced by this testimony was profound. All concurred in the opinion, fortified by experiment and experience, that the respite from toil one day in every seven was essential to man and beast as a condition of the highest development. Other inquiries as to economics and the interests of manufacturers, operatives and of the people in general, led to the same conclusions. And for sixty years the laws unchanged, have continued to bless a great people.

So I come to the conclusion that this law, as a sanitary regulation, is justified upon the ground of public necessity.

In the next place, I come to the conclusion that this Sunday observance law does not violate the principles of human liberty, but, on the contrary, is necessary in the public interest, because it has a tendency to promote good morals and social purity. Now, what rests upon the morals of the individual? If there be no private virtue, how can you expect public virtue? If there be no public virtue how can you expect stability in our institutions? Is the state not interested in securing a condition of things that will promote private virtue? Will the state permit the unrestrained introduction of obscene literature? Will it permit the placing before the public of obscene plays? Do we establish reformatories and houses of correction? What is our justification for our expenditure on these? It is our wish to promote public virtue. We wish to reclaim those who have fallen; we wish to promote the interests of the state, because there can be no public virtue without private virtue, no stability of human institutions without private virtue, and consequently a law which above all others will promote good morals and social purity is a law which should pass. Permit me in this connection to make two quotations from papers contained in the compilation of proceedings of the International Sunday Rest Congress at Chicago. "The Sunday Problem; its Present Day Aspects." Prevention is always better than cure. A policy that will promote social virtue and purity is a policy of prevention, the prevention of evils that result from vicious courses. And in connection with this matter, one of the most eminent doctors of law, Dr. Butler, in his address at Chicago, said:

The practical solution of these questions has been reached by dealing with the Day of Rest as an accepted and essential part of the established order of Christian civilization, demanded by the physical, moral, and social needs of men, and requiring the exercise of the power of the state to protect its citizens in its enjoyment, and to compel its observance so far as may be necessary to that end, wholly aside from any attempt to enforce its religious observance.

Cardinal Gibbons, in the same connection, said:

How many social blessings are obtained by the due observance of the Lord's Day? The institution of the Christian sabbath has contributed more to the peace and good order of nations than could be accomplished by standing armies and the best organized police force. The officers of the law are a terror, indeed, to evil-doers, whom they arrest for overt acts; while the ministers of religion, by the lessons they inculcate, prevent crime by appealing to the conscience, and promote peace in the kingdom of the soul.

A third reason for the enactment of such a law is that it gives higher education, and in that sense supplements the efforts made in our public schools. The public take an interest in educational matters. It is felt to be a part of the duty of the Legislature of a state to see that the children under its care do not grow up in ignorance, and provisions are made for their education. These provisions are, in the main, for secular education. Now, a man may be a very highly educated man, and his education may only increase his powers for evil. The Sunday observance law steps in and offers to supply the deficiency of secular education by giving to the child the opportunity for that higher education which is given in the church and in the Sunday-school, and by the religious instruction, which will not be given if the Lord's Day is not observed, and will not be given thoroughly unless the state throws its influence on the side of right and upon the side of the observance of the Lord's Day. Now, intelligence is a good thing, and the fear of God is just as good a thing, and if the public school gives education in the line of intelligence and the higher education of which I speak is given in the church and Sunday-school the state is doing its full duty, and only its full duty, if it permits this higher education to supplement the education given in the common schools.

In the fourth place, an additional reason for enacting such a law as this is the fact that the law is calculated to secure the rights of conscience and religious liberty. Now, we profess in this country to have religious liberty; we profess to regard the rights of conscience. It would be considered an outrageous thing if any law was placed upon the Statute-book which interfered with the free exercise by any citizen of his rights of conscience and religious liberty. There is no member of this House but would raise his voice against such an outrageous enactment. But, Sir, there are scores of thousands of men in this Dominion, there are more than a million of men on this continent who cannot exercise their rights of conscience, whose religious liberty is denied them, who are obliged to work on the Lord's Day, and have no remedy, and can have no remedy until the law steps in and protects them. And the object of this law is to give these men the rights of conscience and religious liberty—not to say to them that they must go to church, not to say to them that their religious observances must be according to this rule or according to that; but to say to them: You may go to church, and the state will protect you in your right to go to church, the state will see to it that you shall go to church if you want to, and no human power shall prevent it. That is the object of this law—not to force religious observances upon the people, but to permit religious observances; not to interfere with religious liberty and the rights of conscience, but to secure a religious liberty and the rights of conscience; and, without this law, these rights cannot be secured; without this law there must be thousands of men in this Dominion who cannot and will not exercise these rights which we here hold they have a right to exercise, and in the exercise of which the law should protect them. At the Sunday Rest Congress there was a gentleman of the name of Beach who was sent to the congress by the Pennsylvania Railway to read a paper. He went on, Sir, in a very plausible way to state that the roads were quite in favour of diminishing Sunday labour as far as it was possible, but there were seasons of the year when there was great pressure on the roads, and there was such a thing as emergency freight. Here would be a steamer at New York going to sail on Tuesday, and some shipper away back in the western states had some freight he wanted to send by her, and, in order to get it there in time, they would have to send it over the road on Sunday, and, consequently, it was necessary to do a very large amount of Sunday work. When I followed I showed that there was certain emergency work upon a farm: Here was a farmer with grain standing in the field, when it looked as if it might rain on Monday, and he felt the pressure of an emergency to put it in the barn the day before. But it was not held that he had the right to do so, and no Christian society would bear him out in the assertion that he had the right to do so. I was followed by Mr. L. S. Coffin, a member of the Iowa Railway Commissioners Board, who was at Chicago as the representative of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, the Brotherhood of Railway Trainmen, the Order of Railway Conductors and the Order of Railway Telegraphers, numbering in the aggregate 110,000 men. Mr. Coffin differed from Mr. Beach, and showed most conclusively that the statements made by that gentleman with regard to the railway companies would not hold water. He said there was no such thing as emergency freight, no such thing as perishable freight since the introduction of the refrigerator car system; delay only involved the use of a little more ice. He showed that stock in the cars was all the better for the rest on Sunday. If the railway was pressed with work in the fall it was a confession that there was a dearth of motive power, and, instead of violating God's command and compelling their men to work on the Lord's Day, they had only to add one-sixth to their working force and one-sixth to their rolling stock to overcome the difficulty. He said that it was the cupidity of the railway stockholders and of the management that disregarded the rights of labour and failed to provide sufficient working force and rolling stock which deprived labour of its right to Sunday rest.

The next reason, Mr. Speaker, why a Sunday observance law is in the public interest, and a law that we ought to pass, and a law that every civilized state ought to pass, is that it secures good homes. Daniel Webster once truly said that the good home was the bulwark of the state. Now, a good home that graduates an honest, industrious, virtuous, God-fearing son as a voter, lies at the foundation of the state's prosperity and permanence. The bad home that graduates the vicious man who has no regard for God and no regard for morality, and no regard for principle, is doing its utmost to sap the foundation of the state. And, if a Sunday observance law is calculated to secure good homes, and it is generally proved that its practical operation is to promote that end, we need no other reason than that fact as a justification for the passing of such a law. Now, the state ought not to be indifferent to evil influences. I wish to read a short extract, which shows about how this compelling of men to work on the Sabbath is looked upon by the labourer himself. This Mr. Coffin, to whom I have alluded, in speaking of this matter of men being compelled to work in the railway yards and on the train without being secured their Sunday rest, spoke of a man in the city of Keokuk, in the state of Iowa, and he gave the language of that man when he was conversing with him and asking how often he had been in church during the last five years. The man said :

For five years I have lived at Keokuk ; for five years I have been every Sunday in the yards, making up trains and getting in cars, and for these five years I have not been inside of a church on Sunday. My wife, thinking that if I had to work it was her duty to stay at home and get me a good dinner, for those five years has not been inside of a church on Sunday. My children do not go to Sunday school. And when I have been in the yard with those cars I have thought it over, and have come to this conclusion : It is the almighty dollar that everybody is after and they don't care a — for us.

Now, that was this man's process of reasoning. The lack of a law securing to that man his Sunday's rest had kept him out of church, had kept his children out of church and Sunday-school, had kept his wife out of church for five years, and in consequence of this failure to protect them, they were existing and the children were growing up in a condition of semi-heathenism. What kind of a Christian nation is it that turns a deaf ear to the cry of scores of thousands of people who ask simply that there shall be a law passed that will secure to them a right which God has given, which the state can give, and the exercise of which the state is bound to secure them if it discharges its duty to its citizens ?

In the sixth place, Mr. Speaker, this law is quite consistent with the principles of human liberty and demanded by human necessity and the necessities of society, because it promotes temperance and obedience to the law, because its direct tendency is to diminish crime. Now, we all deplore the evil of intemperance, we discuss the possibility of putting an end to it. We discuss prohibition, we discuss high license, we discuss one remedy and another, but the best remedy, and you and I both know it, Mr. Speaker, is to reach the individual man, to reach his convictions, to reach his conscience ; and to do that we must adopt the approved channel and methods, and a Sunday observance law is right in the direction of reaching that man and bringing him under the influences that will produce the desired effect. Now, we provide jails for criminals. Would it not be a great deal better to keep the man out of jail ? Certainly it would. We have institutions for the administration of justice, we pay an enormous sum for the administration of justice. Would it not be a great deal better to have less justice to administer ? Certainly it would. We punish crime—not from any feeling of revenge, but we punish crime as an example to deter others from committing it. Would it not be well to adopt some more effectual method to keep men from committing crime ? We are a terror to evil-doers, and we should be a praise to those that do well, and we should attempt to do well ourselves ; but we cannot attempt it in a better way than to obey the commands that a higher power has placed upon us, and to move in the direction of the institutions that He has laid down for our guidance and government. Now, no cause that would check these evils should be disregarded, and why should we overlook that cause which promises to be more effectual than other influences ? The enactment of a law which will bring people under religious influences, which will give them Sunday observance and Sunday rest, will, so far as the state is able to produce that result, make these men and women, and boys and girls, better individuals, and better members of society. I hold that this law is of a character calculated to promote temperance, to promote obedience to law, to diminish crime, and no other reason than that is necessary to justify the passage of such a law.

In the last place, this law is justified upon the grounds of public necessity and public welfare, because it is a law that promotes the welfare and prosperity of the state. We meet here and we discuss the tariff—discuss it at great length, greater length than necessary, sometimes ; we discuss law, we charter companies, we discuss policies. What do we do all this for ? Why, the professed reason is that we wish to promote the public good, to increase the prosperity of the state. That is the excuse of holding these sessions. If we did not do that, or attempt to do it, we would not be discharging our public duty. Now, if this law will promote the welfare and prosperity of the state, it is a wise, just and beneficent law, a law justified upon the ground of public necessity, a law that needs no other reason to justify its passage. Now, who says this law will not promote prosperity ? Who says this law will not make better individuals of the people of the country ? Who says it will not promote material prosperity, and place it upon a higher moral plane, and in every way act to strengthen the nation and make it more powerful and prosperous ? Nobody can say so. We waste time here on a thousand schemes, and the whole of them combined are not as well calculated to secure the result we are talking about as this single law. Now, Sir, if all these things are so, if these seven reasons, any one of which would warrant the passage of this law, are reasons that can be defended, are reasons that can be proved to be well founded, then, why not be guilty of recognizing God ? Why not promote, by legislation, morality, promote thrift, promote cleanliness, promote public health, promote self-respect, promote individual and national prosperity, and promote respect to human right ? We can pro-note all these things by this law, we can promote all these things more effectually by this law than by any other law. We can promote all these things more effectually by this law than by all other laws.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. CHARLTON. Those hon. gentlemen say, "Hear, hear," perhaps in a tone of irony. I tell you, Mr. Speaker, that if any man believes there is a God—and I am not talking to those who do not—if any man believes there is an overruling Providence, if any man believes that it is a divine command to remember the sabbath day and keep it holy, if any man believes in respect for, and obedience to, God's law, and in laying the foundation of our public institutions and public education in that law—if any man believes this, he cannot but believe that this law is the best calculated of all laws to secure the prosperity and welfare of the state. If he does not believe this, all these arguments are thrown away on him, as a matter of course.

Now I come to the provisions of this Bill. It is not a drastic Bill, it is not a puritanical Bill; it is a Bill that fails to meet the expectations of the greater portion of the Christian people of this country. The word "religion" is not in the preamble of this Bill, the word "religion" is not in the body of it. It makes no provision whatever for religious observance; it does not profess to interfere with the right of any citizen of Canada with regard to religious observance. One of the aims of this Bill is to secure religious rights. Another aim, and the chief aim, is to secure civil rights, to check the influences that are at work now, and that threaten our national welfare. For that purpose, this Bill proposes three or four simple things. It proposes, in the first place—and perhaps some of my hon. friends will be shocked at a proposal so puritanical and absurd—it proposes to put an end to the publication of Sunday newspapers in this Dominion. The provision is this:

Whoever shall, on the Lord's Day, either as proprietor, publisher, or manager, engage in the printing, publication or delivery of a newspaper, journal or periodical, and whoever shall, on the Lord's Day, engage in the sale, distribution or circulation of any newspaper, journal or periodical, shall be deemed to be guilty of an indictable offence.

Now, I pointed out a short time ago that Sunday newspapers are not published in Great Britain, they are not published in Switzerland, they are not published in Holland. An effort has been made, and the effort will probably prove successful, to secure a law in Hungary by which their publication will be prohibited there. One of the American journalists, Mr. Bennett, of the New York 'Herald' I believe, spent a great sum in finding out that the British people would not tolerate a

Mr. CHARLTON.

Sunday newspaper. The Sunday newspaper is an institution of modern date. I can well remember when the first Sunday newspaper was published in the United States. There are nearly 700 daily newspapers published on Sunday in the United States at present. One of the greatest American editors, Horace Greeley, denounced the Sunday newspaper as a social demon; and so it is. Its influence upon the religious and moral life of the United States is most disastrous. It tends to sap every good influence that exists in the country; it banishes the Bible, it banishes religious reading matter; it banishes all solid literature from the family. It begets a lower tone of sentiment. Triviality, superficiality, and immorality are the characteristics of the Sunday newspaper. A man who reads the Sunday newspaper is a superficial and trivial being, to the limit of the Sunday paper's influence upon him. The Sunday newspaper is the sworn enemy of the sabbath, the avowed enemy of the sabbath. It makes no concealment of its desire to break down the Bible. It defies and opposes the sabbath at every step of its career. A newspaper in a city may not have the voluntary choice whether it will issue a Sunday edition or not. If a newspaper is issued on Sunday, another newspaper is compelled to follow suit or fall behind in the race of competition, and upon hundreds of publishers the necessity of publishing a Sunday edition is forced by the fact that other newspapers publish Sunday editions. Under the old American sabbath which prevailed at the time of the Centennial Exhibition, that Exposition was not open on the Lord's Day; at the time of the Paris Exhibition the exhibits of the United States were not open, nor were they at the Vienna Exhibition; but we notice the influence of the Sunday newspaper in the intervening years by the fierce indignation displayed against the principle of Sunday closing at the Chicago Exhibition. We notice that every Sunday newspaper in the United States derided and belittled that sentiment of the thirty or forty millions of people who petitioned against the opening of the Exhibition on the Lord's Day, and we know the influence of the Sunday newspaper in the United States has been most disastrous, most debasing, most demoralizing, and its existence in that country is a great evil. The Sunday newspaper is the anti-christ of America; itself a violation of divine law, it is the enemy of all divine law; and unless it is put down the Christian religion will be put down; within its theatre of operations it is a question between Christian institutions and this engine of the devil. We propose to prohibit the publication of Sunday newspapers. We propose to follow the example of the mother land, an example of many hundred years, which has carried her over all her difficulties. I wish now to refer to one or two authorities, contained in the International Sunday

Rest Congress papers, with respect to the publication of Sunday newspapers in the United States. My first authority is J. W. A. Stewart, D.D., and my second is His Eminence Cardinal Gibbons. Dr. Stewart says :

In the name of all that is sacred, let six days suffice to ding it continually in my ears that I belong to sense and to time ; let there be one day on which the "still small voice" may be heard, which whispers that I belong to eternity and to God. The spiritual man does not stop to ask whether the Sunday newspaper is a sin ; he instinctively says it is an impertinence. After he has given six days of thought and time to temporal things, it comes and does its best to drown that voice which tells him of his higher destiny ; it comes to pre-empt his thoughts and his hours, and to drive away prayer and the Bible and holy meditation. I say to the spiritual man it is an impertinence.

Cardinal Gibbons says :

A close observer cannot fail to note the dangerous inroads that have been made on the Lord's Day in our country within the last quarter of a century. If those encroachments are not checked in time, the day may come when the religious quiet, now happily reigning in our well-ordered cities, will be changed into noise and turbulence ; when the sound of the church bell will be drowned by the echo of the hammer and the dray ; when the Bible and the prayer-book will be supplanted by the newspaper and the magazine ; when the votaries of the theatre and the drinking saloons will outnumber worshippers, and salutary thoughts of God, of eternity, and of the soul will be checked by the cares of business and by the pleasure and dissipation of the world.

I repeat that we do not want this American institution in Canada. We do not want that condition of things which has dragged the United States down from the position of a nation which was once known for its regard for the sabbath to a nation which permitted its great Columbian Exposition to be opened on the Lord's Day, and is rapidly declining from the proud position it once occupied as a Christian, sabbath-keeping nation. I repeat that we will act wisely if we follow the example of the mother land and prohibit the publication of the Sunday newspaper, and by prohibition of its publication save the country from the attendant horde of evils that have attended its introduction in the United States.

It is said by some that we have not the power to deal with this question, that we have not the power to deal with this question of overwhelming importance which threatens the religious and moral life of the nation. I do not believe it. I believe, as the Parliament of this Dominion, we have power to make a criminal offence of any act calculated to injure this country. We have the right to make a criminal offence of theft, arson, murder and assault, and we have the right to make criminal a thing which is infinitely worse than all those acts in individual instances. I affirm that it is worse than any single case of murder—the consequences of publishing Sunday newspapers are worse than those following a single case of murder, arson or theft. I tell this House that the consequences of the introduction of the system, looking at the experience of the United States and judging, not by theorizing, but by the actual results following this great outrage on God's law, are of a character so grave and serious that the Government are warranted in dealing with this question. We have power over the introduction of obscene literature, we have power in the matter of copyright, we control the transmission of printed matter through the mails ; and is it to be said that the central power of this country, possessing power over copyright, over the mails, over the importation of impure literature, is incapable of stretching forth its hand and dealing with the greatest danger which threatens the people of this country? Why should we go for national rather than local control? Because we want to make Canada the moral leader of this continent. We want to set an example to the neighbouring nation and we desire to place ourselves right where that country is wrong. Let Canada take this course, let Canada grapple with this evil and take heed of the results which have followed it in the neighbouring nation, and, forewarned, let Canada place herself in a position where she will be forearmed.

The second provision of the Bill is with respect to the closing of canals from six o'clock in the morning until nine o'clock on Sunday. A great many people think this is a surrender of principle, and that the canals should close during the twenty-four hours. However, the provision will be one that will prevent the quiet and sanctity of the sabbath being interfered with so far as worship is concerned, and is one that should be adopted, as this country does not want to place itself in the position of committing breaches of a divine law.

Section 3 of the Bill is with respect to railway traffic. This Bill has been submitted to all the railway men of this country. In 1890 letters were received from Mr. Van Horne and Sir Joseph, then Mr. Hickson, with respect to this Bill, and the manager of the Grand Trunk made certain suggestions which are embodied in it. I assume, and I have a perfect right to assume, that the Bill is satisfactory to the railway managers, because no protest has been received from any of them since 1890, and the Bill has been submitted every year since that time. The provisions with respect to railway traffic, I am sorry to say, are perhaps not of a very important nature. The question was surrounded by difficulties. It was found practically impossible to deal with the question of through trains without inflicting serious consequences upon the railways. Their business connections with the American roads render it necessary for them to conform in this matter to American usage to some extent; at least, it is held that that is the case, and I presume it is correct.

An hon. MEMBER. You are making a compromise.

Mr. CHARLTON. My hon. friend says: it is a compromise of the principle. This is an attempt to secure all that is practicable in the line of the principle. We might easily fail in asking more than we can get. All great reforms are secured step by step and item by item, and if the choice is placed before us either of securing something that is tangible and something that will lead to the securing of something more, I hold that it is prudent and proper that we should take a practical course and not stand on a theory that will wreck our attempts to do anything in the matter. Now, Mr. Speaker, this provision with regard to railway traffic goes as far as it is possible to go at the moment, by positive legislation, and it places before the United States and upon the United States, the responsibility of continuing the evil of through freight traffic, by offering to them reciprocity in legislation upon this matter and declaring our readiness to abate this part of the evil if the United States will render it practical to do so by concurrent action. This is the provision:

At such time as the laws of the United States shall make corresponding provision, no through freight in transit from one point on the frontier of the United States to some other point on the said frontier, shall be allowed to pass over Canadian roads on the Lord's Day, except live stock and perishable goods.

As soon as the United States will make corresponding regulations we place before them this proposition. We greatly strengthen the hands of that element in the United States that are agitating for railway reform. We go as far as we can go, without inflicting ruinous consequences upon our own roads, and we take a step which, in my opinion, will speedily secure for us the realization of what we desire by the adoption, on the part of the United States Government of that proffer which we make, to act in co-operation with them for the purpose of putting an end to freight traffic on the Lord's Day as far as it is possible to do so. The Bill, so far as it stands now, deals with local traffic. It prohibits local freight traffic, it prohibits local passenger trains, it leaves other trains with their necessary connection as it was thought necessary to do so. I may say with reference to the provision of this section, that this Bill was submitted to a special committee three years ago. Upon that special committee were representatives of all the railway interests in this country, and these points were thoroughly discussed. The difficulties that stood in the way of this arrangement were all raised and met, and the provisions of the Bill were necessarily made to meet the objections of those men, or the report of the measure could not have been secured. I repeat that the Bill, so far as it refers to railway traffic, makes the best provision that under the circumstances it was possible to secure.

The last provision of the Bill is with regard to excursion trains, and it prohibits excursions by train, partly by train and partly by steamboat, on the Lord's Day. This provision was introduced into the House several years ago, but the Bill failed to pass. A member of this House at that time, the Hon. Mr. Bowell, sent the Bill to a friend of his, Mr. Wood, in the Ontario Legislature, and Mr. Wood introduced in that Legislature that same Bill, and it was passed and is now the law of Ontario. This section provides:

Excursions upon the Lord's Day by steamboats plying for hire, or by railway, or in part by steamboat and in part by railway, and having for their only or principal object the carriage of passengers for amusement or pleasure and to go and return the same day by the same steamboat or railway or any others owned by the same person or company, shall not be deemed a lawful conveying of passengers within the meaning of this Act; and the owner, superintendent or person by virtue of whose authority and direction such excursion is permitted or ordered on the Lord's Day shall be deemed to be guilty of an indictable offence; provided that nothing in this section shall be deemed to prohibit the ordinary carriage of passengers authorized by provincial statute.

That is the provision with regard to Sunday excursion trains, and that is, as I have said, now the law of Ontario. There is, I believe, some pressure on the part of the public to induce railway managers to relax the policy they have hitherto pursued in regard to Sunday excursion trains. The great railway managers of this continent are opposed to Sunday excursions, and they are desirous, I believe, so far as it is practicable in that respect, to give their employees Sunday rest, and the primary objection to the Sunday excursion train is found in the fact that one class of employees are robbed of their Sunday's rest in order that another class of employees may have a day of frolic. This is very happily set forth by Archbishop Ireland in his address at the International Sunday Rest Congress at Chicago, where he says:

The opponents of the Sunday strive to have us believe that the violation of Sunday rest is more or less in the interests of labour. When the question was agitated whether or not the Exposition should be kept open on Sunday, the chief reason put forward was the interest of labour. It turned out afterwards that sixteen thousand men were to be employed seven days in the week, so that other labourers could visit it on Sunday. Labour is most concerned in the sacred observance of Sunday.

And labour is concerned in the prohibition of Sunday excursion trains. Labour is concerned in the prohibition of anything that may act as an entering wedge to deprive the labourer of his Sabbath rest. No labourer actuated by proper motives would desire to rob his fellow-labourer, the engineer, the fireman, the brakeman, the conductor of the excursion train, of his Sabbath rest, in order that he might have a frolic upon that day. And if Sunday rest is to be preserved, the principle must be respected by all labourers, and will be respected by all labourers. No labourer with a true sense of what is at stake, will require any other labourer to lose his Sunday rest, feeling that he himself may be the next to suffer. The opening of the British Museum on the Sabbath has been systematically opposed from the commencement by the labourers of London. They realize that the opening of that museum and the consequent requiring of those in charge to lose their Sunday's rest would be apt to react upon themselves, and with instinctive realization of what is at issue they have uniformly opposed the opening of that museum on Sunday. In the interest of labour, I repeat, Sunday excursions should be prohibited. Anything that involves Sunday labour should be prohibited, and the argument: that it is in the interest of labour that these violations of Sunday observance are made, is a fallacious argument in all cases.

With regard to Sunday excursions, Mr. Speaker, let us see if they are desirable in themselves apart entirely from the consideration of labour being required and men being robbed of their Sunday rest in order that an excursion may be obtained. I hold they are not. In the first place, Christian people necessarily avoid the Sunday excursion; in the second place, the worst class patronize them, so far as my observation goes, and they are too often a saturnalia of drunkenness and vice. In the city of San Francisco, where there is no Sunday law, the police were obliged to suppress the Sunday excursion as a public nuisance. Sunday excursions would go to the suburbs of San Francisco, and a crowd of male and female hoodlums would terrorize the suburbs all day. Then the trains would get back at night filled with a drunken rabble, the lights were turned out, and the scenes became so scandalous that the police of the city suppressed a Sunday excursion train as they suppressed a brothel. The planters of Louisiana were obliged to petition the Legislature of that state to prohibit Sunday excursion trains, because they led to a sulphurous Monday and a blue Tuesday, and their employees worked only four days in the week. It is the uniform testimony of employers of labour, that the efficient labourer, the happy, clean, self-respecting labourer, is the man who stays at home on Sunday, goes to church and Sunday school, and comes up to his work on Monday morning fresh and alert and ready to grapple with his duties; while the man who goes on a Sunday excursion is demoralized and bedraggled, if not worse, on Monday morning, and is unfit to go to his work. Such a man has not had what the Lord intended to give him, he has not had his Sunday rest, with Christian worship, and enjoyment in the bosom of his family; but he has been spending the day in dissipation. He might better have been at work for two days than to spend one day in that kind of dissipation. Therefore, aside from the fact that the Sunday excursions inevitably deprive the labouring man of the rights that should be guaranteed to him by law, they are vice breeders and undesirable in many respects.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I repeat that the provisions of this Bill are moderate, that it is not in any sense a drastic measure, that it is not a puritanical measure, that it is not open to the objection that it forces upon any class of people in this country any religious observance or usage whatever. I repeat that the object of the Bill is to secure to the labourers of this country certain civil rights—the civil right to the rest day, the civil right to religious observance if they wish to participate in them, the civil right of conscience that will permit them to go to church if they want to, and if they do not, they may settle the matter with their spiritual advisers. The object of the law is to provide that no employer of labour shall make a slave of a man and prevent him going to church on Sunday if he wants to. It is not a religious enactment; it stands purely and squarely on the principle of civil rights, and the religious portion of the law is merely incidental. Of course, religious conviction is an important matter. It is important that we would realize that the provisions of this Bill will be blessed by the great Lawgiver who gave the day of rest for man's benefit. But the Bill deals with a civil question, and aims to secure for men a civil right. Now, the state should be on the side of justice, good order and truth.

Petitions have been presented to this House deprecating the passage of legislation of a religious nature, assuming that a measure of this kind is a measure to secure some kind of religious usage, or some kind of law that will affect a man's religious standing. Those petitions do not meet the case: the Bill is not one of the character that they assume. It does not propose that the state shall legislate with regard to any religious observance. It does not propose that the state shall say that Armenians are right or that Calvinists are right, or that the doctrine of the Trinity is right, or that Unitarianism is right; it does not propose to say one word about religious observances or tenets or ordinances. The Bill plants itself squarely and unequivocally on the principle that the state does not dictate to men what their religion shall be, but guarantees to them the enjoyment of the privileges of the religion that they believe in, and that is all there is in the measure.

Now, I wish to call attention to the significant character of the opposition to this Bill, and to all Bills of a kindred character. Not that some good men do not oppose the Bill; not that some conscientious men, a great many of them, do not oppose it. But I affirm that you can find no bad, vicious element of society in favour of this Bill. The hoodlum, the Anarchist, the thief, the brothel-keeper, the brothel inmate, the saloon keeper, the drunkard—every vile, satanic element in society is opposed to this Bill; and I call upon the men who oppose this measure to take notice of the society and associations in which they are placed. The bearing of this question, not upon religious life primarily, but upon national life, is a matter of very great importance to us. The highest requirements of statesmanship are involved in the consideration of this Bill. The question is, will this Bill have a tendency to lay broader and more securely the foundations of the state that we are building on the northern part of this continent. The question is, will this Bill promote religious liberty? Will it promote public virtue? Will it have a tendency to promote good morals, and from a blessed combination of good influences clustering around the christian Sabbath to graduate good men and good citizens? Will this Bill promote temperance? Will it promote obedience to law? Will it promote respect for God's commandments? Will it have a tendency to secure to the inhabitants of this country that higher education which must go with secular education if we are to turn out men properly equipped for their duties as citizens? These are the questions involved in the consideration of this Bill—questions of statesmanship higher than the consideration of a tariff or the question of the establishment of an experimental farm, or the usual questions surrounding any proposal as to a public measure. These are questions of the highest possible importance in their bearing upon the future of this nation, not only in this decade and the next decade, but in all succeeding decades as long as this nation shall have life. There are upon this continent to-day, seventy millions of English-speaking people. There will be upon this continent a hundred years from to-day, in all human probability, three hundred and seventy-five millions of English-speaking people. How are all these people to be educated? In what way are the foundation of the future to be laid? What is to be the character of the influence to be exerted by these English-speaking races upon the world? What kind of a nation are we to build here, with our vast natural resources and capability of supporting a hundred million people? Shall we stop to consider these questions? Shall we realize that upon us devolves the responsibility of building for the future? And shall we take into consideration this measure in the spirit in which we ought to consider it? Shall we consider that God has not laid upon us an unreasonable demand, and never did?

Mr. CHARLTON.

He never made upon any human being an unreasonable demand. He never required of man anything that was not in man's interest. He never required of man anything that man would suffer by performing, and he requires of us, as a Legislature, attention to this matter in the light of our responsibility to him, in the light of our responsibility to the people of this country. He requires our attention to this with a due sense of the importance of this question and the responsibility that rests upon us. The wisdom of the infinite is a safe guide, and we can not despise the means which He has appointed to secure national wealth and prosperity, without invoking upon our own heads the disasters that will be sure to follow the disregard of His commands. For that reason I press this Bill, believing it is in the highest interest of Canada, believing I am justified in urging its passage in the warmest manner. I present it to the kindly and judicious consideration of every member of this House—the leader of this House, and every one of his followers and the gentlemen who sit in Opposition—and I ask that it may receive that consideration which the importance of the questions demands.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

SECOND READING.

Bill (No. 96) to incorporate the Trust Corporation of Canada—(from the Senate).—Mr. Davis (Alberta.)

THE LORD'S DAY OBSERVANCE.

Mr. CHRISTIE. I only intend to occupy the time of the House for a few moments. It gave me great pleasure to hear the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) again introduce the Bill to secure the better observance of the Lord's Day. The question is one of vital importance to the prosperity and well-being of the Dominion. The hon. gentleman has been very indefatigable in his efforts to secure better sabbath observance in the face of strong opposition. I trust that on this occasion his efforts may be crowned with success, but, be that as it may, I think he is justly entitled to the thanks of the Dominion for the ability, zeal, and perseverance with which he has advocated this great moral reform. So far as I can understand this Bill, and I have examined it very carefully, it encroaches on no man's rights or privileges in any way. Neither does it interfere with his religious opinions, be they what they may. Its chief aim appears to be to secure to the employees of the Government on our railways and canals and other public works and the employees of other corporations, the inestimable boon of Sunday rest. We all know that there are thousands of employees who are robbed of their Sunday rest, who are denied all opportunity of attending Divine worship or of receiving religious instruction in that way, whose lives are one continual round of toil, without the necessary break of Sunday's rest to restore their wearied energy and fit them for a more efficient discharge of their duties during the remaining six days of the week. Without that rest their physical and mental vigour decays and becomes demoralized. It is generally admitted that if the Lord's Day were universally observed as a day of devotion and rest from secular labour, men would be stronger and healthier, able to do more work and make more money, and be better in every sense of the word. This Bill, if enacted, will be a great blessing to this great mass of employees. It is intended to lighten their burdens, to break their bonds, to make their lives better and brighter and happier. That is not all. It will contribute in many ways to the welfare and prosperity of the people. The first clause of the Bill is for the prevention of printing and publishing of Sunday newspapers. We know that that evil has already obtained a foothold in Canada, and is spreading, and will continue to spread, unless prevented by timely legislation. We know that prevention is better than cure, and that if we would deal with this evil now, it would be much easier prevented than at a future day. In the United States, we all know that Sunday newspapers are scattered broadcast. And the practice there has had a most baneful, demoralizing influence upon the people. We know that the best men in the United States have long been struggling and striving to rid the country of that great and terrible evil; but, so far without success. Now, I am convinced that if even this section of the Bill was adopted it would be a great benefit, and would promote morality in this community. The second section of the Bill provides for closing the canals from six in the morning until nine or ten at night on the Lord's Day. That, no doubt, is a step in the right direction, and no doubt it will be a great boon to the employees on the canal, the boatmen and others interested. But I would have been glad if the Bill had gone a little further. I would like to have seen the sanctity of the whole twenty-four hours preserved. No doubt these employees require a whole Sunday's rest like other people, and I should be glad to see the Bill amended so as to ensure that to them. The third section of the Bill seeks to minimize the Sunday labour done on our railways. We all know the vast amount of labour—of what appears to be unnecessary labour—done on our railways on the Lord's Day. We are told even by railway experts, men who are intimately acquainted with the working of railways, that much of the labour that is now expected and exacted of employees cannot in any fair sense be considered absolutely necessary. Some go even further and tell us that if they had the power they would not allow a fire to be lit or a wheel to be moved on the Lord's Day, that such a rule could be carried into effect without in any way impairing the efficiency of the service, and that it would not involve a loss to the roads or in any way affect the trade or commerce of the country, but would be a great boon, a great benefit to the men mentally, morally and physically, and a great boon to the public as well. This Bill makes ample provision for all works that are really necessary—indeed, I think it goes too far in that direction; but, be that as it may, it certainly makes ample provision for all works of necessity and mercy. The Bill would undoubtedly be a great boon to the employees on our railways whose lives must now be embittered by being obliged to work seven days in the week. These men cannot help themselves; they look to this House for relief, and I do trust and hope that the House will extend to them all the relief it possibly can. We are told again and again that these Sunday laws are unnecessary, that they infringe on the rights and privileges of the people and interfere with their religious convictions, that the sabbath is really a matter of convenience and expediency, and that there is no necessity for its strict observance. I hold these views to be fallacious and erroneous. I firmly believe that the sabbath was made in man's interest. I believe that the sabbath was made for man, but it was made for man's benefit, made to be kept and not profaned and desecrated. Its observance invariably brings a train of blessings such as can never follow its desecration. I think we ought to beware of ignoring or trampling on the divine commandment so far as the observance of the sabbath is concerned.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). This Bill has been so frequently discussed in Parliament that I do not think it is necessary that I should say very much with regard to it. We have before us two questions—we have the question as to where the right to legislate upon this subject rests, and, having found that, we have the question how far that power ought to be exercised for the general good of the community. I do not understand that my hon. friend who has brought in this Bill undertakes to legislate upon this subject on religious grounds, but that he submits this measure to us solely as a police regulation intended to secure the good order of society and to enable those parties who belong to the various religious communities of the country to engage in worship upon this day as they may think best. Of course, Sir, the views of the Christian world upon this subject differ very considerably. The various religious bodies that exist in Christendom do not all hold the same views upon the subject; they do not all regard the Lord's Day as identical with the sabbath-day spoken of in the Old Testament. It is a historical fact well-known to most people that at the time of the Reformation the great majority of the reformers held to the view that the Lord's Day was a voluntary institution which persons might or might not observe as they saw proper; and in Calvin's Institutes, this view is set forth with a very great deal of learning and very elaborately. But I do not think we are called upon to discuss the question as to whether the sabbath is an institution divinely appointed and binding upon mankind for all time. This is a question which concerns the individual himself and with which the state, as such has nothing in particular to do. Now, Professor Wayland, in his work on moral science discusses this subject. After expressing very much the same view as that set out by my hon. friend from North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), in the very able speech he addressed to the House this afternoon, Professor Wayland, near the conclusion of his article upon the question whether the state ought to undertake to enforce the views generally entertained by Christian communities upon this subject, expresses the opinion that the state, having no power to secure the observance of the day in the manner in which God himself intended that it should be observed, could accomplish nothing by legislation in that particular; but that legislation with a view to securing the good order of society and to securing to every man the right of conscientiously worshipping on that day as he thinks right is a proper regulation. The state has no authority to enforce the observance of the sabbath in the sense in which we expect every Christian to observe it, but it ought to secure to him the exercise of his right in this particular as his conscience tells him. Now, my hon. friend is asking for this legislation with a view to securing to the various members of the community, and especially those engaged in the public service, the right or the enjoyment of Sunday as a day of rest, and as a day of worship to such members of the community as may see proper to use it for that purpose. Of course, Sir, we are told in the New Testament that it is the duty of Christians not to forsake the assembling of themselves together; and, while that is a duty devolving upon us, no one proposes to enforce that by penal legislation at the present day. There are two provisions in this Bill that I do not think stand exactly on the same footing. The one is that relating to public officers throughout the community, embraced in sections 2 and 3, which are within our jurisdiction, and upon which I think we ought to legislate, legislate with a view of securing to the parties in our employment the rights which, as members of the Christian community, belong to them. But when you propose to legislate in the way spoken of in section 1, and in sections 4 and 5, I think a different principle applies. You are undertaking to deal in these sections with questions relating to personal and civil rights, and these, it seems to me, fall within the jurisdiction of the Local Legislature. I would call the attention of my hon. friend who spoke immediately before me (Mr. Christie), to chapter 205 of the Revised Statutes of Ontario, which is entitled "An Act to Prevent the Profanation of the Lord's Day." The Legislature of Ontario has legislated upon that subject. I have not looked at the statutes in the other provinces, but I think in every province of the Dominion there has been legislation to secure the observance of the Lord's Day. That is within the jurisdiction of the Local Legislature, and the same public opinion which stands behind my hon. friend from North Norfolk, if these subjects were within our jurisdiction, stands behind the members of the Local Legislatures in the various provinces to enable them to discharge their duty to the public in this respect, and to secure to the various members of the community the rights which belong to them. I need not read the sections of the Ontario statute, but they go quite as far as my hon. friend proposes to go in this Bill; and they go further in this particular, that they make no restriction, they make no exemptions from any particular hours of the day. My hon. friend, in the first section of this Bill, provides:

Whoever shall, on the Lord's Day, either as proprietor, publisher or manager, engage in the printing, publication or delivery of a newspaper, journal or periodical, and whoever shall, on the Lord's Day, engage in the sale, distribution or circulation of any newspaper, journal or periodical, shall be deemed to be guilty of an indictable offence.

Now, I am not saying that that goes further than is justifiable in the public interest. Certainly the distribution of many newspapers on Sunday gives employment to a great number of persons, and seriously interferes with the observance of the Sunday as a day of rest. You do not care, on your way to church, to have newsboys thrusting newspapers under your face, and offering to sell them to you on Sunday. But with regard to that provision, I do not know on what ground we have a right to legislate. Of course, every newspaper is local in its character, the publication is local, it is not something which extends in its operation over the entire Dominion. The work of printing and publishing a newspaper is as much under the control of the Local Legislature as would be cutting out clothes and making them on Sunday in a tailor's shop. Both would be violations of Sunday rest, both would in that respect fall within the jurisdiction of the Local Legislature. If then, we were to legislate upon the subject, unless the provision making it criminal would bring it within our jurisdiction, it would be ultra vires of the authority of the House. Then there are other sections of the Act which, it seems to me, are ultra vires in the same way; for instance, excursions upon the Lord's Day by steamboats plying for hire, and so on. Now, these, unless they were lines of steamboats starting from a city with a view to sailing to a foreign country, or with a view of sailing from one province into another province, would be within provincial jurisdiction. Take, for instance, section 92 of the British North America Act, subsection 10, and clauses (a) and (b) of that section:

(a.) Lines of steam or other ships, railways, canals, telegraphs, and other works and undertakings, connecting the province with any other or others of the provinces, or extending beyond the limits of the province.

(b.) Lines of steamships between the province and any British or foreign country; are under the jurisdiction of this Parliament. If they were going upon voyages of this sort, it would be within our power to say that they shall not sail on Sunday; but if they are going to sail into a lake on an excursion, and return again, that would be as much under the jurisdiction of a local legislature as would be a cab starting out from the city and driving ten miles and back again. The vessel goes out into a lake, the cab goes in the opposite direction, but so far as jurisdiction is concerned, they would be exactly on the same footing. Now, the question with regard to sections 1 and 4, as to whether we can acquire jurisdiction, depends on the provision which my hon. friend has introduced in section 5. Section 5 says:

Any person guilty of any offence declared in section 1 of this Act to be an indictable offence, shall, on summary conviction, be liable to a fine not exceeding $50 for the first offence.

My hon. friend spoke about the offence being one worse than murder, arson, or another serious offence which he has mentioned. But whatever he may think in that respect, the punishment which he has attached to the offence is a police regulation. What was before a police offence, and made so for the purpose of securing the peace, order and quiet of society, and to enable parties to worship freely, is not, it seems to me, taken out of the jurisdiction of the province by this provision. If the hon. members will look at the legislation with regard to the Sunday observance in the various provinces, they will see that it treats such violation as a police offence. This section providing for a punishment, treats it as a police offence. There is no provision that a party shall, upon conviction, be sent to the penitentiary for five or ten years at hard labour, or that he shall be capitally executed. There are none of the punishments that are incident to a serious crime, attached to this offence, but remain under subsections 15 and 16 of section 92. It has always been regarded, where there are laws relating to the observance of Sunday, as a disorderly act, and as one that requires legislation in the direction of police, and the legislation proposed by my hon. friend is legislation of that sort. There is nothing provided here except the pecuniary punishments, and those light punishments that are incident to police offences. I think it would be a very serious abuse of our authority to undertake to obtain jurisdiction over a subject which, for centuries, has fallen in a different class, and undertake to declare it a crime; and the mere declaration, without the incident punishment, would not transfer it from one category to the other. I think that this Bill ought to be read a second time, and that the provisions of this Bill ought to be confined within those limits over which we have jurisdiction. We can control persons who are engaged in the railway traffic in certain cases; and with regard to all public officers, with regard to our own property, the closing of the canals, the closing of public offices, the closing of post offices and everything of that sort—all these are under the jurisdiction of this House, because they are part of the machinery of Government. I take it that it is as part of the machinery of the Government we have jurisdiction; it is not because the subject matter falls generally under our control, the subject matter falls under the control of the Local Legislatures. Whether that was best or not, I am not called upon here to say. It is the fact with which I am dealing. I say, as a matter of law, the jurisdiction on the subject of sabbath observance generally is in the Local Legislatures and not in the Parliament of Canada, and that our jurisdiction over the subject at all is due to the fact that those officers and those public works of which I have spoken are public works of Canada, and as such we can close them on any day we may see proper, not because the day is Sunday, but because they are ours, precisely as any individual carrying on his farming operations may say to his men, You shall have a holiday to-day. It is upon that ground we have jurisdiction over the subject with respect to these particular matters, and it is on that ground we should deal with the subject so far as these public works are concerned; but so far as regards the regulation of persons outside, private individuals, the securing of peaceful worship in churches, the securing of the proper observance of the sabbath by the community generally, that is a work which belongs to provincial jurisdiction as a matter of civil right and not to the Parliament of Canada.

Mr. McMULLEN. I shall not attempt to add to the very forcible argument presented by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) in his very excellent and well-delivered address this afternoon on behalf of this Bill. He deserves much credit for the persistence with which he has pressed the consideration of this measure on the House for several years. While I will not for a moment attempt to combat the arguments presented by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) or to challenge the accuracy of his views regarding the question of provincial rights and the question of the power which may be exercised by this Parliament, I think this House should give effect to any provisions of the Bill over which we have jurisdiction. If certain provisions are not considered to be within the jurisdiction of this House after the Bill has received its second reading and has gone to committee, such provisions could subsequently be eliminated and in that way we could give effect to such provisions as are entirely under our control. I agree that the regulation of traffic on railways and canals on the Lord's Day would unquestionably be within the jurisdiction of Parliament, because they are directly under the control of the Dominion and cannot possibly be interfered with by the Local Legislatures. With respect to railways, I may say that if there is one thing more than another that has led to the demoralization which exists in the United States, it is the running of railway excursion trains on the Lord's Day. That is a most objectionable feature, and it introduces a demoralizing element among the people. During several seasons I visited Old Orchard Beach for a short time, and I was struck with the enormous traffic in all directions on that day. No less than four excursions were run from Boston to Old Orchard every Sunday forenoon, returning in the evening. I can honestly say that I have seen at that watering place, where there is supposed to be not a drop of spirits sold, it being in the old state of Maine where the Maine Liquor Law is supposed to be in existence, more people drunk on Sunday afternoon than I ever saw on any other day of the week, these people reaching there by excursion trains.

Mr. MACLEAN (East York). Were those people drunk by reason of the excursion on the railway, or by reason of the liquor they drank?

Mr. McMULLEN. Those people had supplied themselves with that kind of nourishment when they left Boston. They took bottles of liquor in their pockets and used it to excess and got drunk, and if they had not had the opportunity of taking that excursion on the Lord's Day they would undoubtedly not have got drunk. On no other day of the week were there such cheap excursions as on Sunday, and this afforded an inducement to the poorer classes to come out and carry refreshments with them, with the result of using them to excess. It is not too much to say that a man might have gone round and gathered a cart load of empty bottles on Monday morning. This was the outcome of the Sunday excursions, and these demoralize any country, as they have demoralized the United States. The hon. member from North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) deserves the thanks of this Dominion for introducing this Bill, if it does not accomplish more than prevent the inception of such excursions here on the Lord's Day. I hope they will not be permitted. With respect to the canals, I remember the speech delivered by the Minister of Railways last year, in which he clearly pointed out the difficulties connected with the closing of the canals on the Lord's Day, and particularly at a late period of the season, when ship-owners were anxious to reach the port where they might unload their cargoes, and if they were detained twenty-four hours in the canal this delay would prove a great drawback to the shipping interest. There is no doubt a good deal of force in that argument, but I contend we should as far as possible avoid encouraging boats passing through the canals on the Lord's Day. Boats very often make it their business to strike a canal on the Lord's Day, because the men have an opportunity of a little joviality and they spend the day passing through the locks. This should not be encouraged, and in fact obstacles should be placed in the way of vessels passing through the canals on that day. I heartily congratulate the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) for the very able manner in which he introduced this Bill, and for the extensive and able address which he delivered to this House. I am sure it will be read with great interest by the Christian people of this Dominion, and he will receive hearty thanks for his able efforts in the direction of securing the legislation called for by this Bill. As I have already intimated, I will not attempt to answer the remarks of the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), but in speaking of the sabbath, he said it was a question for each man to answer for himself. I can hardly accept that statement. The question of drinking liquor you may say is one for each man to decide for himself. But if we are to leave every man to judge for himself and do as he pleases, we would eventually have no sabbath observance, and if we left every man open to drink what liquor he pleased, we would have a great deal of demoralization.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman has misapprehended my statement. The moral duty of observing Sunday was a matter which the civil magistrates could not enforce—it must be a voluntary observance, but the civil magistrates could secure to every individual the undisturbed right of worshipping God as he pleased.

Mr. McMULLEN. Unquestionably, the seventh day is a divine institution, and it depends on what day you begin to count from whether we shall have it on Saturday or what is understood as Sunday. We do not propose, however, to settle that question in this House. Our sabbath has been recognized as such by the Christian world for nearly 1800 years, and I think we are all willing to continue the first day of the week as we have it. I do not know that we are disputing as regards that.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Certainly not.

Mr. McMULLEN. I do not know that I understood the question of the member for East York (Mr. Maclean), but if I did not, I will be very glad now to answer any question he wishes to put.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

BRIBERY AND DISFRANCHISEMENT.

Mr. WELDON (Albert) moved second reading of Bill (No. 6) to disfranchise voters who have taken bribes. He said: Mr. Speaker, the Bill which I now move the second reading of, is, in form, not altered very much from that which I introduced last year; and the reasons which I then gave in support of it I need not repeat at any length. The object of the Bill is clearly indicated by its title. It proposes to disfranchise voters who have been found to have taken bribes. The principle of the Bill, it seems to me, is as simple and clear as can be. It is, I believe, a thoroughly British principle, that those who have the ballot should use that power worthily. When electors are found to care so little for their right to vote that they are willing to give it away and put it in the hands of another, it is wise to take that power away from them until they have had an opportunity of thinking the thing over, and of prizing the franchise more. I shall not make any lengthened argument in favour of this Bill to-night. Some objections were taken last session when the Bill reached the committee stage, and one was, that we made no provision for punishing the briber. Mr. Speaker, we make no provision for punishing any one. There is nothing punitive in the nature of the Bill, there is nothing to degrade, or wound, or hurt; no fine, no imprisonment, no degradation of any sort other than this, that we say, a man who is found out to have taken a bribe shall not have the controlling power of the ballot for a term of years. The law at the present time heavily punishes one who gives a bribe. I think, Sir, the serious objection that will be taken by the House to this measure is that it is not likely to work, that it is not likely to have sufficient backing to secure its operation. In answer to that, I point to the vigour with which, in the city of Montreal, within the last twelve months, a body of young men, with nothing but public spirit to impel them, have constituted themselves into what is called the Volunteer Electoral League, have themselves put up money amounting now to some four or five thousand dollars, in order to make thoroughly operative the section of one of our Acts already on our Statute-book against the personating of voters. If there be in that city sufficient public spirit to lead to the expenditure of so much money, and what is very much more, the expenditure of a great deal of effort with a view of purifying the elections in that regard, I think it is a hopeful sign that we may find in some of our counties, enough public spirit to make this Bill operative.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). This Bill, in its provision is very much the same as the Bill we had on the Statute-books, introduced by Mr. Blake, and which was in force for some years, but afterwards repealed under what circumstances I do not know. I think the hon. gentleman's Bill refers to the same subject and proposes to deal with it in much the same way.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

Mr. WELDON moved:

That Bill (No. 6) to disfranchise voters who have taken bribes, be referred to a select committee to be composed of Messrs. Dickey, Lister, Amyot, Choquette, Masson, McLeod, Frémont and Weldon, with power to report from time to time.

Motion agreed to.

THE BALLOT IN THE NORTH-WEST TERRITORIES.

Mr. MARTIN moved second reading of Bill (No. 7) to extend the ballot to the North-west Territories.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Mr. Speaker, I would like the hon. gentleman to consider the particulars of this Bill. In the first place, there is no objection at all to the principle of the Bill, as can be understood from the fact that a Government Bill on this subject was promised in the Speech from the Throne at the opening of last session; that it was introduced, read a second time, I think, and, in consequence of want of time and the pressure of other business, was laid over, as it well might be in view of the fact that no election was imminent in the Territories. The Bill has been reintroduced this year. The hon. gentleman, I think, on examination of the Bill which he has introduced, will find that it merely repeals certain clauses and requires some substantive enactment in order to be effective. I would suggest to him that we should simply read the Bill a second time to-night, and that before we go into committee upon it, he should consider that point.

Mr. MARTIN. If the hon. First Minister looks further he will see that the effect of my Bill is to repeal those exemptions in the ordinary law affecting elections which formerly excluded the North-west Territories, and to make the Territories a part of Canada so far as that law is concerned. No subsequent legislation would be needed, because the Franchise Act and the Dominion Elections Act would then apply to the North-west Territories. However, I am quite agreeable to the course suggested by the hon. First Minister, that the Bill be read the second time now, because I am not very sure whether after all that is the better course for the Territories at present. Under one of the statutes which my Bill repeals the Territories have a way of their own of making a voters' list not subject to the Dominion Franchise Act, and while, as a matter of principle, I see no reason why the Territories should not have the same law as the rest of the Dominion, I have no objection to having the Bill conform to the measure introduced by the Government last session and also this session, which would leave the law regarding voters' lists the same as it is now, although even that requires some modification to make it applicable to a general election.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

CUSTOMS ACT AMENDMENT.

On the Order, second reading of Bill (No. 9) further to amend the Acts respecting the Duties of Customs.—(Mr. Charlton.)

Mr. CHARLTON. Before moving the second reading of this Bill, I may say that the subject with which it deals is now under the consideration of the House in connection with the new tariff. I would suggest to the hon. First Minister that the Bill should be read the second time, so that it may go to the Committee of the Whole at any time that the House is prepared to deal with it, in the event of its being thought proper to deal with the subject.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I agree with the hon. gentleman that it would not be well to proceed with the Bill to-night; but I can hardly acquiesce in the second reading of the Bill. I understand that the provision of the statute which the hon. gentleman desires to repeal is no longer in force, and it is proposed in Committee on Ways and Means to substitute for that a new provision altogether. So that the whole subject will come up in that way.

Mr. CHARLTON. I move, then, that the order be discharged.

Motion agreed to, and order discharged.

GRAND JURORS IN ONTARIO.

Mr. EDGAR moved second reading of Bill (No. 24) to reduce from twelve to seven the number of grand jurors necessary to find a true bill in the province of Ontario. He said: This Bill is not to abolish grand juries, but to reduce their number only in the province of Ontario. It is not proposed to reduce the number by the Bill, but it is proposed that this Act shall come into force on a day to be named by the Governor in a proclamation. Practically, the object is to conform to the law of the province of Ontario on the subject. In the year 1892 an Act was passed in the Legislature of Ontario to be brought into force by the Lieutenant-Governor in Council, authorizing the reduction of the number of jurors necessary to be called from 24 to 13. That part of the subject came properly within the jurisdiction of the province of Ontario, but the true Bill to be found by grand jurors I have no doubt comes within the jurisdiction of this Parliament. Therefore this Bill proposes that, notwithstanding any law, usage or custom to the contrary, 7 grand jurors instead of 12, as heretofore, may in the province of Ontario find a true bill. I suppose it is pretty well known that in the province of Ontario there is a very strong feeling in favour of the abolition of grand juries altogether. In response to a circular letter issued by the right hon. First Minister a few years ago, the replies of 25 of the judges of Ontario favoured the abolition of grand juries, 18 were against it, while 6 were doubtful. There is a great deal of complaint in the country about the expense of grand juries, which runs from $1,000 to $1,500 a year, I think, in most of the counties, and if the number of grand jurors is reduced by half, as this Bill proposes, the expense will be reduced by half. And surely 7 of a grand jury should be as competent as 12 to bring in a true bill. I may say that the important body of the Patrons of Industry are very anxious to have the number reduced. In this Bill it is practically proposed to reduce the number from 12 to 7, and I hope that the House will consider this a good thing on the whole and a saving of expense.

Mr. LISTER. The Bill of my hon. friend is likely to provoke a good deal of discussion. Two questions have to be considered: first, has this Parliament the right to reduce the number of grand jurors? and second, is the reduction advisable? There is a very wide difference in Ontario as to the wisdom of reducing the number of grand jurors. There is much to be said in favour of the present system and against its abolition or reduction. We ought first to decide, however, whether this Legislature has any power to interfere in the matter. As a matter of fact, the Legislature of Ontario has always dealt with this question of grand jurors up to the present, and we should therefore, to be certain beyond peradventure, that this is a subject over which this Legislature has control before we undertake to deal with it. I think that, as the Bill will give rise to very considerable discussion, it ought not to be proceeded with to-night, especially in view of the small number of members present, and in view of the fact that many members have not given the matter very much consideration, or not sufficient to justify us in dealing with it at present.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). If the Ontario Legislature has jurisdiction to legislate on the subject, then the number should be no doubt reduced to seven, which is the figure they have fixed it at in that province. But if they have not the power, we have before us the question whether we ought to adopt a uniform system or follow the inclinations or wishes of each particular province. I agree in what the hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Lister) has said, that we should have a further discussion of the subject. That, however, can be had in committee as well as on the second reading.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

CIVIL SERVICE SUPERANNUATION.

Mr. McMULLEN. I see that item number fifteen, second reading of Bill to amend the Civil Service Superannuation Act, has been passed over. I was quite ready to proceed with the Bill.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The Finance Minister is not able to be here, and he would like to be present when it is discussed.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to ; and the House adjourned at 9.15 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, 4th May, 1894.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

MESSAGE FROM HIS EXCELLENCY.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON presented a Message from His Excellency the Governor General.

Mr. SPEAKER read the Message, as follows :—

ABERDEEN.

Gentlemen of the House of Commons :

I acknowledge with thanks the Address you have loyally adopted in reply to the Speech with which I opened the Session, and I rely with confidence on the assurance that the important measures submitted to you will receive your careful consideration.

GOVERNMENT HOUSE,
OTTAWA, 1st May, 1894.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 105) for the relief of Caroline Jane Downey—(from the Senate).—(Mr. Denison.)

INQUIRY FOR RETURNS.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). In the documents brought down relating to the Thousand Islands, there seemed to have been a letter addressed to the Government on the 24th March by the Lieutenant-Governor of Ontario, which is not amongst the papers ; and the papers, I learn this morning, have gone to the printers. It would be well that everything up to the present time should be included, and that all the correspondence should be printed together.

Mr. DALY. It must have been a clerical omission. I will send over to the department and have it rectified.

Mr. McMULLEN. A return of the House was ordered on the 30th March last for a statement of the sums paid to Mr. A. F. Wood, Government valuator, for services, maintenance and transport during the years 1891, 1892 and 1893. It must be a very short return, and I cannot understand why it takes five weeks to bring it down.

Mr. HAGGART. I will bring it down in a day or two.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE TARIFF.

Mr. FOSTER moved that the House again resolve itself into Committee on Ways and Means.

(In the Committee.)

Wrought scrap iron and scrap steel being waste or refuse wrought iron or steel, fit only to be re-manufactured, the same having been in actual use, not to include cuttings or clippings which can be used as iron or steel without re-manufacture, and steel bloom ends and crop ends of steel rails, three dollars per ton ; and on and after the first day of January, eighteen hundred and ninety-five, four dollars per ton.

Mr. LAURIER. We expect from the Minister of Finance some explanation of this increase of 100 per cent on the heavy duty which was put on five or six years ago. I would remind the Minister of Finance that when he made his Budget exposé, he merely stated what his intention was, but never gave any reason for the change of policy he intended.

Mr. FOSTER. I regret very much that I am not physically very able to make explanations to-day. I forget almost what I did say in regard to the matter in the Budget speech.

Mr. LAURIER. Nothing.

Mr. FOSTER. I have no doubt it was, as usual, something very wise and pithy. What the hon. gentleman asks me now is as to the reason for the increase on scrap. That probably necessitates a few words on the general subject. What the Government had to face, in considering the iron and metal schedules, was, in brief, a very general demand for a lessening of the cost of merchantable iron, such as is used in the different subsidiary but very widely distributed industries founded upon pig iron, puddled bar, and bar iron, but especially upon the latter. The price of iron entering into these industries was thought to be high—too high to make it possible to reduce to any extent the protection which these industries had; and the problem to solve was to make this commodity cheaper, and at the same time not to destroy the development of the iron resources of the country, which in 1887 had a large protection granted for their development. The only way the Government could see of bringing these two things about was to adopt in part an extension of the system of bounty which should compensate the iron industry for the lessening of the protection upon bar iron and steel and puddled bar. So it was decided to keep the bounty system as applied to pig iron, and also to leave the protection given to pig iron, and then, in working up to the bar iron, to grant a reduction upon puddled bar and afterwards a reduction upon bar iron. Ever since 1887, although there has been a fairly strong protection in customs duty added to the bounty on pig iron, unfortunately the door was left open in the allowing of scrap to come in at a duty of $2 per ton, whilst puddled bar had a customs duty of $9 per ton. Chiefly, I think, for that reason, this fact seems to be clear, that, although from 1887 up, for a number of years, the iron industry, in regard to the making of pig out of the iron ores of the country, developed fairly well, and during the last three years has developed largely, I may say rapidly; yet the process stopped at that point, instead of being carried from the pig iron to the puddled bar, and from that to the bar iron, and bar iron came to be made almost entirely, and in the last two years I may say entirely, from scrap instead of from puddled bar. This had a bad effect in two respects. It discouraged the working up of iron from the pig into the puddled bar; it placed scrap where puddled bar should have been; and it also had a bad effect upon the iron of the country, because it is impossible to make a good quality of iron, of certain sizes and kinds, out of scrap, and for that reason a great deal of bar iron had to be imported. It was felt necessary, therefore, that this should be stopped; and the only way to do that was to raise the duty on scrap, so that there might be inducements to make puddled bar from pig iron, and thereby obtain a better quality of iron. After all, while there is a certain amount of scrap which is a good and in some cases an unused iron, it is in most cases, as everybody knows, a used iron, having been used twice over, often a dozen times; and all authorities go to show that after iron has been worked and reworked a number of times, it loses its vitality, its strength and its fibre; it is too dead for a good many processes, and a proper quality can only be successfully obtained by the use of puddled bar or an admixture of puddled bar. So that the Government had these three things in view: first, to keep the protection and encouragement which was necessary for the iron industry as a whole; in the second place, to reduce to the makers of iron materials the cost of their bar iron and steel which were their raw materials; thirdly, the working of pig iron from ore, and from that into puddled bar and bar iron. This latter process it is proposed to encourage by increasing the duty on scrap, making the transaction as easy as possible, by raising it by $1 a ton to the end of the present year, and thereafter having a uniform duty upon it of $4 per ton. This, it is hoped, will induce the manufacture of puddled bar from the pig, and the better kinds of iron from the puddled bar. It will not, however, make it necessary that the refuse iron, a great deal of which we have in this country, which every country has, and which ought not to be allowed to go to waste, shall be allowed to go to waste. A large proportion, probably one-third of the scrap which is worked up into iron in this country, is domestic scrap. That is increasing from year to year, and though there may not be an importation of scrap—it is not probable that there will be a large importation of it—there will yet be a large quantity of scrap iron in the country, which will be made up by the rolling mills, and which will supplement the puddled bar in the making of a higher and better class of iron. I do not know that I have anything more to say upon this special point at the present time. I shall be happy to give any information I can as the debate progresses.

Mr. LAURIER. I am sorry that the hon. gentleman is not in his usual state of health, because apart from the general sympathy that we all feel with him, there is no part of this tariff that his ingenuity would be more required to defend than the iron duties. There is nothing, in my estimation, which shows more clearly the fallacy and danger of a protective tariff than the increase which the hon. gentleman is now making in the duty on scrap iron. Every one remembers that, five or six years ago, the duties on iron were remodelled by the then Finance Minister (Sir Charles Tupper) with a great flourish of trumpets. His object, he declared, was to develop the iron industry to an extent of which the country had no conception. We were to have charcoal furnaces and iron furnaces, and two hundred thousand men at least earning a living out of the smelting of iron in this country. That was why such an onerous duty was put upon scrap iron at that time. To-day, after six years' experience, far from having realized these expectations, the Government admit their failure by coming down for more duty. The protection then given was not sufficient.

Mr. FOSTER. We are coming down for less duty.

Mr. LAURIER. Not on scrap iron.

Mr. FOSTER. It is not used by anybody for making articles.

Mr. LAURIER. Then why not leave it as it is? If the hon. gentleman will give us the details of the numerous interviews he had with different persons during the recess, he will be forced to tell us that there were remonstrances from day to day against the increase of duty on scrap iron. If he will be candid and tell us about the interviews he had with those who use iron in their manufactures—and their name is legion—he will have to admit that he had remonstrances from all these against the duty on scrap iron. I am sure he must have had the most active and vehement remonstrances from the manufacturers of agricultural implements. He has decreased the duty on agricultural implements from 35 to 20 per cent, and of this I do not complain. But the manufacturers have remonstrated with the Government, on the ground that while reducing the duty on the finished article they increased it on the raw material.

Mr. FOSTER. Quite the other way.

Mr. LAURIER. If the hon. gentleman has been informed the other way, his information is altogether at variance with that I have received. I have heard vigorous complaints on the part of the manufacturers of agricultural implements. They complain that they are hit both ways—in the first place, by the reduction of the duty on the finished article, and then by the increase on their raw material. The hon. gentleman says that raw scrap iron is not used. What then is the object of raising the duty? He must see that such a reason cannot be accepted by the country.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend must certainly be mistaken. If there is any point in his argument it is this: that while we have lowered the duty on agricultural implements from 35 to 20 per cent, we have raised the duty on the raw material. We have done nothing of the kind. The manufacturers of agricultural implements do not use scrap iron. They use pig iron, and on that there is no increase of duty. They use steel, and upon that there is a reduction of $2. They use bar iron, and on that there is a reduction of $3 a ton. There is no iron product, outside of pig iron, which goes into the manufacture of agricultural implements that has not been lowered, so far as the duty is concerned. The only men who have a quarrel with the increase of duty on scrap iron are those who roll the scrap into bar iron, but that is their quarrel, and not the quarrel of the agricultural implement men, because the latter benefit by the reduction of $3 per ton on the bar iron which is made out of the scrap. So that the raising of the duty on scrap iron, though it may be argued by certain persons as a hardship, cannot be a hardship to the men my hon. friend is speaking for, because it does not make any difference to them whatever.

Mr. MULOCK. Was not a request made that all iron should be put on the free list?

Mr. FOSTER. They would like to have bar iron and steel free, of course, but that has nothing to do with this argument.

Mr. McMULLEN. The whole question of the duty on iron is an exceedingly important one. I can well remember the manner in which the question of increased duty was brought before the House by Sir Charles Tupper, when that hon. gentleman was Minister of Finance. We were then promised a very large and desirable development of our iron industries. We have not experienced any thing of the kind. The fact of the matter is that the duties then imposed for the purpose of developing our iron resources have fallen very heavily upon the consumers of iron, of which the farming class is the largest. If we are anxious to develop our iron resources we should do it entirely by a bounty and not by the imposition of duty. In the United States they did it almost entirely by bounty, and the result was that the tax did not fall entirely upon the consumers of iron, but on the whole population. The man wearing a broadcloth coat and a tall hat paid his percentage of the duty just as well as the farmer who used the iron. If it is considered a national necessity that we should develop our iron resources, let us do it at the expense of the whole community and not at the expense of any particular section of it. All classes, of course, use iron to some extent, but the great consumer is the farmer. If the hon. gentleman would remit the duty or fix it at the lowest possible rate, consistent with the necessities of the country, and then grant such a bounty as would secure that industry the necessary encouragement, there could be no objection to his course. But to levy the duty on those who consume the iron and then allow the others to go scot free, is an unfair method of proceeding.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I would like to mention that the farmer has not complained so very much about the effect of these duties. When the last iron furnaces were built—the Ferrona Iron furnaces in Pictou—pig iron was selling at $32 a ton in Toronto. Since those furnaces have been at work, whether on that account or not, that article is now selling at $15 a ton, so that there could not be a very great complaint with regard to the burden of these duties. There has been an extraordinary drop in iron.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Mr. Chairman, hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches some years ago put up the duty on pig iron to a very high figure in order to encourage the production of pig iron in this country. They left the scrap iron duty at a lower figure than that upon pig iron, which is a coarser article. I suppose the idea was not to interfere with the rolling mills. Well, the rolling mills now import a good deal of scrap iron, and the producers of pig iron complain ; and so the Government find themselves between the deep sea and a certain party whom I need not name, and they are obliged to legislate now against the rolling mills so as to allay the complaint of those who are engaged in producing pig iron. The hon. gentleman said that the scrap iron produced is not of very good quality. I daresay that is the case. When you have English iron and Swedes iron, and American iron, soft iron and hard iron, tough iron and brittle iron, all mixed together and rolled out into a new bar, you have iron of a very unequal hardness, and very unequal tenacity, and, thus, not a very good article for use for many purposes. The hon. gentleman still adheres to the idea of helping by undue taxation those who are engaged in the production of pig iron. Now, the hon. gentleman can stimulate the manufacturing interests of this country a great deal more by giving them an opportunity to get iron at a reasonable figure than by keeping up taxation that enormously increases the cost of the iron, and then—the hon. gentleman says it does not increase the price. Then what is it for? what is the object of this taxation? Let any one compare the prices of pig iron in Scotland with the price in Canada, and he will see whether this duty increases the price or not. The hon. gentleman, if he looks at the figures, will see that the price here is enormously greater than in Scotland, and the reason is the existence of this duty. If the hon. gentleman had decreased the duty on pig iron, he could have done a good deal to help the iron manufacturers and could have enabled them to enter into competition with their neighbours over the way, and he could have granted reciprocity in these articles with perfect safety and in the interests of the manufacturing classes. The hon. gentleman is vainly striving to establish an industry in this country which is altogether in advance of the accumulation of capital here, and the general circumstances of the population.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Does the hon. gentleman happen to remember—I ask for information and because my own recollection is not clear—what is the price of the Scotch iron? I think there is not very much difference in the prices here and the prices in Scotland.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). There is some six or seven dollars a ton difference.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I am quite sure it is not so much as that.

Mr. MACDONELL (Algoma). The difference in reality to-day, taking the price at the city of Hamilton, or the city of Toronto, is $2 a ton.

Mr. MULOCK. Between what two points? I did not understand the hon. gentleman.

Mr. MACDONELL (Algoma). Scotch or American iron—the difference is about the same. The question that appears to be at issue between the two sides of the House is this: Whether there shall be no protective duty on pig iron, or whether the Government shall give that protection to the iron industry that all parts of the country feel at this time is absolutely necessary for our success and welfare. Now, Sir, if we look at the history of the iron industries of the various countries of the world that have become prosperous and influential and important through their production of iron, I think our hon. friends opposite cannot but agree with us on this side of the House that the iron industries of the Dominion of Canada should have that protection that is absolutely essential to make them what they should be, the producers of, as nearly as possible, the quantity of iron that our people consume. What is $2 per ton bounty or $4 per ton duty on pig iron, or what is a bounty on pig iron if we can succeed in establishing these industries that will employ labour, give a market for the produce of the farm, add materially to our national wealth and prosperity, and advance the interests of the whole country? When we think of the results to be achieved, the question of a duty or a bounty such as has been given, is seen to be a comparatively trifling one. Let us look at the history of the countries that I speak of. In Great Britain, during the days of protection, when the iron industries of that country attained that magnificence that they have held ever since, the import duty was from 130 to 140 shillings a ton. If our hon. friends who are always pleased to look to the other side of the line for an example of what we shall do, will examine the history of the United States, they will find that the duty on iron has been from 30 per cent ad valorem up to $9 per ton, varying according to the desire of the people to afford protection to these industries. I do not wish to take up the time of the committee with a long explanation of these things. No doubt we shall have an opportunity of discussing the subject at greater length, and discussing it more intelligently. I can only say that I am glad to see the Government lay down the principle that the iron industries of the Dominion of Canada, in which every province of the Dominion is interested, the development of which will enable every province to add to its wealth, shall be encouraged. The Dominion of Canada consumes yearly about 600,000 tons of iron, of which we are obliged to import more than four-fifths in value, notwithstanding that we have the ore and the different kinds of ore that are necessary to mix together in order to make the very best quality of iron that can be made—stated by experts to be equal to the best Swedes iron—we have the coal in the east, and, in the west, illimitable forests of timber, suitable for the production of charcoal. When we take these things into consideration, the opportunity that awaits us is manifest. If we made but one-half the quantity of iron consumed in the country, we should add at least $20,000,000 to our national wealth. We should spend $5,000,000 in wages that would go into circulation, helping not only the artisan actually engaged in the production of the material, but helping, also, the farmer and those engaged in cutting and hauling the wood, and giving such an impetus to business as would benefit all classes. But already the development of the iron industry is surprising. During last year we produced something over 55,900 tons of pig iron. But there is one thing that retards the development of this industry, and that must retard it so long as this unfavourable condition exists. Considering the uncertainty that has existed with regard to the encouragement to be given to the iron industry, considering the changes that might take place on account of commercial union or continental free trade, or unrestricted reciprocity, how can we expect that any capitalist will invest his money in this country to establish such an industry? Until the question of the iron duties and bounty is put upon such a basis, so that there can be no doubt whatever in the minds of capitalists, we cannot look for them to invest their money in this country. There is an immense field for capitalists if they would only come in, but with the uncertainty I have spoken of, there is no chance in the world, to my mind, that we are going to get capitalists to come in and engage in this industry, from the old country, or even from the United States, where they have a mint of money now invested in iron industries. I am sure that if our friends on the opposite side of the House went to their constituents and consulted them on this matter, they would receive but one answer. The reason is that for every ton of pig iron produced in the country, the quantity of labour involved in that production is so great that a greater amount of money paid is for labour, and goes into general circulation, than perhaps in connection with any other article manufactured in Canada. So I feel that instead of lowering the duties, or the bounty, on this material, the Government should increase it. Now, one word with regard to scrap iron, the article now under discussion. Scrap iron has undoubtedly been brought in by the rolling mills people. Why? Because up to this time we have not produced, for the reasons I have mentioned, the iron that is necessary to be used in the rolling mills; consequently, their rolls, as I understand, were made for that purpose. But every ton of scrap iron that came into this country and did not pay one dollar to the national wealth of the country, dispossessed just that much pig iron that should have been manufactured in this country and have gone into general consumption.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell).

Mr. CASEY. The hon. Minister must be aware that in increasing the price of the raw material out of which other classes of iron are made, he must increase the cost of the production of these articles. If he has taken off protection from the finished articles made out of scrap or pig, such as rolled bars, he must, of course, do so at the expense of the manufacturer of these articles. It happens that upon this tariff becoming known, the rolling mills in the city of Hamilton were compelled to call upon their workmen to take reduced wages, and a strike of several hundred men occurred in consequence, the owners giving the change in the tariff as the reason for having to reduce the wages. The strike, I believe, has been settled since, the men having accepted the reduced wages—so far as I have seen in the papers. It certainly appears strange that a Government which professes so strong a desire to help the labouring man, should in this case have reduced his profit to that extent. But the hon. Minister was mistaken in saying that the amount of scrap iron imported was inconsiderable.

Mr. FOSTER. I said it probably would be, after this duty was imposed.

Mr. CASEY. I think the Minister is probably right in that assumption, it will probably prove to be a prohibitory duty. But the quantity of wrought scrap imported last year was 15,000 tons, about half the amount of pig iron produced in the country. Although my hon. friend from Algoma (Mr. Macdonell) stated our production last year was over 50,000 tons, I find that bounty was paid on only 30,500 tons of pig iron produced in Canada during the fiscal year ending last June, and I prefer to take that estimate of the quantity. Now I find that the ad valorem effects of the old duty on wrought and cast iron, lumping them together, amounted, in round numbers, to a taxation of 16 per cent; that was at the rate of $2 per ton. The $3 per ton rate will amount to 25 per cent, and the $4 per ton rate will amount to 33 per cent. Now, Mr. Chairman, fancy a Minister who says that he wishes to allow raw material to come in free of duty, or at low rates, for the purpose of manufacture, taxing the raw material to the extent of 33 per cent. He tells us, of course, that his object is to encourage the pig iron industry. All I wish to say about that now is that in the year in which Sir Charles Tupper made the changes in the iron duties which were intended to encourage that trade, and when he made the prophecies which he then made, the production of pig iron was 39,800 tons, on which bounty was paid, whereas, during the last fiscal year it was only 30,500 tons. So that Sir Charles Tupper's attempt to increase the amount of pig iron made in the country resulted in a diminution of over 8,000 tons in the amount produced, with the additional cost to the country of a great many thousand dollars by the increased duty and the increased bounty which he then imposed. My hon. friend the Minister of Marine thinks this duty on pig iron won't increase the price. We must quote to him his master in this connection; undoubtedly the Finance Minister is his master in dealing with a question of this kind. He says:

Another objection which has been made to the National Policy and to the protective principle in it, is, that the cost of many manufactured goods has been enhanced to the consumer on account of the rates imposed. Now, Sir, I grant that argument at once to a certain extent.

Then he goes on to say that in the initial years of a protective policy this would be the case:

I say that in the initial years of a National Policy with a protective principle in it, will have the effect of enhancing the cost of goods, and that at the first the cost of goods will be very closely up to this measure of the protection which was given. If it does not have that effect, why should it ever be adopted at all, and what is the good of it?

The very answer made to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills). What is the use of a protective tax on these articles if it does not raise the price? That is what is wanted. There is no use pretending that prices will be reduced by increasing the tax on the imported article. The Minister of Marine says that before the last manufactory, the Ferrona, was started in Pictou County the price of pig iron in Toronto was $22 per ton, and now it is down to $15.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. A little over.

Mr. CASEY. During what length of time?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Recently.

Mr. CASEY. How long a time between the two prices?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I think a couple of years.

Mr. CASEY. In a number of years we reduced the product of pig iron, and the prices also fell in spite of the protective duties. If that be the case, it must be that the price of iron has fallen tremendously all over the world, and that the price in Canada has been compelled to fall in sympathy, notwithstanding the protection afforded both by duty and bounty. The hon. gentleman cannot claim that any advantage arises either from the new companies or from the duties, because these have not increased the product of pig iron, which is the only way that prices can be reduced.

Mr. MACDONELL (Algoma). Where did the hon. gentleman get his figures in regard to the product of pig iron?

Mr. CASEY. Out of the Auditor General's Report, from the statement showing the amount paid out for bonus.

Mr. MACDONELL (Algoma). The hon. gentleman's figures are inaccurate. The figures I quoted were from a statement as to the mineral productions of Canada.

Mr. CASEY. That statement does not cover the same period.

Mr. MACDONELL (Algoma). The statement from which I quoted shows an output of 75,000 odd tons for the year.

Mr. CASEY. That is not for the fiscal year.

Mr. MACDONELL (Algoma). It is for the full year; it is stated that was the product of the year 1893.

Mr. CASEY. That return was not for the fiscal year, in the first place. In the second place, it is admitted that those returns are not invariably accurate, whereas the returns for the amount paid for bounty are accurate, as a man is not likely to produce a ton of pig iron and not claim bounty.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. It will be of importance to the committee in considering the whole question that they should be furnished with an accurate statement of what the furnaces are doing. The returns of the officers of the different companies for the current year, 1893, show the following:—

| Company. | Situation of Furnace. | Quantity of Pig Iron manufactured. | Value at Furnace. | Total Ore charged. | Quantity of Fluxing Material. | Quantity of Fuel charged. | Number of Persons employed. |
|---|------------------------|------------------------------------|-------------------|--------------------|-------------------------------|---------------------------|-----------------------------|
| | | Tons. | $ | Tons. | Tons. | Tons. | |
| Londonderry Iron Co. (Ltd.).... | Londonderry, N.S.... | 23,474 | 275,366 | 56,390 | 13,500 | 34,484 | 400 |
| New Glasgow Iron, Coal and Railway Co. (Ltd.) | Ferrona, N.S. | 22,500 | 270,000 | 44,856 | 12,890 | 30,846 | 480 |
| Canada Iron Furnace Co. (Ltd.).. | Radnor Forges, Que. | 7,422 | 185,575 | 16,700 | 1,680 | 750,000 | 600 |
| Pictou Charcoal Iron Co. (Ltd.)... | Bridgeville, N.S. | *498 | not given | 853 | 124 | 68,220 | 100 |

*It should be stated that this company only resumed operations towards the end of the year, and the furnace was only in blast for a few months.

Mr. CASEY.

I desire to add, as my remarks in reply to the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), touching the extraordinary results as regards prices go, may have been misunderstood, that I did not mean at the time to state that the effect of the duty was to reduce the price, or would reduce the price, but I remarked that the result had been, no matter what the cause, an enormous reduction in a very short time since the erection of the last iron furnace in Ferrona. I mentioned that, according to my information, there had been within a short time a drop from $22 to about $15 in Toronto for the same class of pig iron.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I have looked at the 'Economist,' and I find the price of Scotch pig iron was 42 shillings 10 pence, or $10.50 a ton, which is $4.50 less than here.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I am glad the hon. gentleman has mentioned that price, for it is about the price at which it is selling in Nova Scotia. I have found the authority on which I based my statement. In the 'Mining Review,' a journal given to investigation of prices and mining matters, it is stated no later than March this year, as follows:—

It is satisfactory to know that pig iron can now be produced and sold in Nova Scotia—

Not in Toronto, where I gave the price at $15.

—at prices quite as low as the same grades of Scotch iron are sold in the centre of the Scotch iron trade, Glasgow.

That is a very extraordinary and gratifying statement.

Mr. MULOCK. I should like to ask the hon. Minister of Marine, and also the hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Macdonell), whether I understood them correctly. I understood the hon. member for Algoma to give certain prices, and to state that the price of pig iron in Toronto is not more than $2 per ton greater than Scotch manufactured iron at the same point?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I said nothing of that kind.

Mr. MULOCK. I am sorry the hon. member is not in his seat, for I think he is in error on that point. The hon. Minister has mentioned that in Nova Scotia pig iron is now produced at about the same price as Scotch pig iron in Glasgow. A short time ago, since the duty was under consideration, a delegation of iron men came to Ottawa, and I was informed by one of the largest iron users in Canada that it is possible to lay down pig iron from Alabama in Toronto at $5.50 per ton cheaper than Nova Scotia pig iron could be sold there. I asked if the cause of that difference was cheapness of production?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. It was due to demoralization, I think.

Mr. MULOCK. He told me that pig iron was produced in Alabama at over $2 per ton less than in Nova Scotia, and that the rest of the difference was made up in freights which were against Toronto. He was a practical man who gave me the information. No doubt the hon. Minister has heard the same statement.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Hear, hear.

Mr. MULOCK. It was not an individual statement, but it was the statement of the trade, and I suppose the Minister of Finance had that communication made to him in connection with the deputation that came to Ottawa to press that pig iron be placed on the free list. If that information is correct, the hon. Minister is quite incorrect in his figures that pig iron is now produced in Nova Scotia as cheap as elsewhere.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I was careful to specify only the price in Scotland. I did not refer to a market that is demoralized; I did not refer to the United States where many of the iron furnaces are stopped altogether, and where there exists a very serious and extraordinary condition of affairs. The 'Globe' the other day summed up the situation very well in the reference it made to the condition of the United States market. It said:

The prices for all descriptions of iron and steel are away below any prices ever dreamed of. There is apparently no room for further reduction in prices without going below the cost of manufacture.

No doubt if we wished to destroy our iron industry here, we could get cheaper iron, probably from the United States. It would, however, in my opinion be cheap only for a very short period, and the only point of my reference was that the reduction here, without creating any extraordinary disturbance in Canada, had been such that we could compare favourably with an old established industry which is not demoralized, and that is the iron industry of Glasgow.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) If the hon. gentleman is correct in his figures, he desires to leave the impression on the House that pig iron is now produced and sold in the province of Nova Scotia for the same price as pig iron is bought in England and Scotland.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. In Glasgow.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) So that if any one imported from Glasgow he would have to pay in addition to the cost price, the freight and duty.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Yes.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Then how is it that we imported from Great Britain last year 31,308 tons of pig iron, which were valued at $346,000, and on which we paid a duty of $135,250?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentleman will see that a great deal of the answer would be based on the fact that the furnaces were not running at that time. The furnace to which I referred had just been started, and they had not got well on their feet. I wish to be thoroughly frank with the hon. gentleman. It may be said: if Scotch pig iron is so low, and you can make the article in Nova Scotia at the present moment at something like the same cost as they do in Scotland, what do you want with protection? The answer is, that this comes out in ballast, and it can be put on the Canadian market at the present time for a mere song as regards the freight. The difficulty with the iron trade in Canada was the transport to the markets, but its price of course fluctuates greatly. Nevertheless, the point was fairly made, that we had reached in March that condition of affairs where the protection was absolutely essential to the Canadian manufacturer in connection with the extraordinary small charge for the transport of the Scotch pig to the market here.

Mr. LAURIER. The only point made by the hon. gentleman is simply this: That in the opinion of some man, at a certain time, pig iron in Nova Scotia would sell at about the same price as it sold in Glasgow. The hon. gentleman will not go to the length of saying that that is the normal rule.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. No; I am not able to.

Mr. LAURIER. Then if it be the exception what is the value of the point?

Mr. McMILLAN. The Minister told us that the farmers of the country did not complain of the high duties placed on iron and of the high duties they were paying on their implements. He does not know the feeling of the farmers or he would not make such a statement in this House. I know the feelings of the farmer, and I know that their grumblings are long and loud, and justly so. I heard the same statement from one of the gentlemen in connection with the iron exhibit in the corridor of the House at the commencement of the session, that they manufacture pig iron in Canada as cheaply as they can in my native country, Scotland. If that is the case, why impose a duty of $4 a ton and give a bounty? It is time, in view of that condition of things, to relieve the people of the heavy burthens placed upon them in this matter. I hold that the Government cannot defend their position with regard in this matter. Iron in Scotland is about $10 a ton, or something under, and if it can be produced for $10 a ton in Canada, why is the duty $4 a ton and the bounty of $2-$3 a ton upon an article that is only worth $10? I hold that the Government should reduce the duty on pig iron, even if they retain the bounty. I do not believe in either the bounty or the duty, but let them retain the bounty for a time if they will, in order that the pig iron manufacturers might have the advantage for a certain length of time.

Mr. CASEY. I did not understand the Minister of Marine distinctly as to whether the figures which he gave were the prices at which iron was sold by the manufacturers, or whether they represented the cost of production.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. If the hon. gentleman will come over to my seat, I will tell him all about it. It is not interesting to the public at the present moment.

Mr. CASEY. Oh, no. I want the information publicly, as it is a matter in which the public are interested.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. It would be a waste of time to repeat statements over and over again. I will very gladly discuss it with the hon. gentleman, if he wants the information, and the committee can proceed with its business.

Mr. CASEY. I want the information openly. The Minister did not make it clear whether he gave the cost of production or the selling price. The hon. gentleman says that it does not interest anybody to know which he meant. I do not suppose it would, as far as his own personal opinion on the matter goes, but as he professes to speak from authoritative figures, it is interesting to know all about it.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I think the hon. gentleman will have to ask some one to move the adjournment of the House.

Mr. CASEY. I do not think so. The hon. Minister says he will give the information privately in his seat.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Or outside.

Mr. CASEY. That will not do. I want the statement made publicly in the House. I want the Minister to make his statement clear with regard to this.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I have stated it twice.

Mr. CASEY. The Minister has not. The figures he gave were, 23,474 tons, valued at $275,000. He has not stated whether that is the cost of production, or whether they are ready to sell it for that.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. That is what they charge at the furnace.

Mr. CASEY. We have that part of the information at last, but we do not know what the cost of production is, and what profit they make. The manufacturer has $2 a ton bounty, and if he sells at $12 a ton he is getting $14 for it, but we do not know how much it costs him. Perhaps one of the members from the city of Halifax (Mr. Stairs) could tell us exactly what the cost of production is at the Ferrona works. I am told that pig iron can be produced in certain parts of the western states at $4 or $5 a ton, and, from the account Sir Charles Tupper gave us of the special conveniences for producing iron in the county of Picton, I think it could be produced there as cheaply as anywhere. He told us that the flux, and the ore, and the coal, were together in one valley, and that the pig iron could be loaded right into the ships from the smelting works. Now, Sir, if they cannot produce it as cheaply there as elsewhere, I would like to know where the other place is. There is certainly one gentleman in the House who could tell us approximately what it costs to produce it. Above this bounty there is the duty of $4 per ton; but in spite of all that the price of iron abroad is so low that we have been importing the quantities quoted by my hon. friend from Queen's. The Minister did not quote the quantity imported from the United States, which was 25,000 tons, valued at $331,000. It is absurd and ridiculous to talk of these people furnishing iron cheaper than, or as cheap as it can be purchased abroad. They do not do it; they would get no benefit from the duty if they did, and the duty is for their special benefit. The hon. Minister of Marine said that he did not refer to the American market for Alabama iron, because that market was thoroughly demoralized, a great many of the furnaces were closed, the prices were all gone to pieces, and a most extraordinary state of things prevailed. We have the hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Macdonell) telling us how much higher the protective taxes are in the United States than in Canada. If it is the case that still more highly protected manufacturers go to pieces occasionally, it would not seem that a protective system was of much use even for the manufacturer. Whatever the cause of the disorganization of the market there may be, I do not know; the main point is that in spite of the one or two instances that the Minister quoted, however correctly he may be informed in regard to these, he himself admits that as a rule iron is not sold as cheaply here as in other countries, and, as we make a very small quantity compared with what we import, the maker obtains the whole benefit of the $4 duty, as well as the $2 bounty, all of which the consumer has to pay.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I wish to call the attention of the hon. Minister of Finance to the important statement made by his own colleague, the hon. Minister of Marine. However much he may be disposed to dispute statements made on this side of the House, he will certainly accept those made by his fellow Minister. The hon. gentleman will see, therefore, that we have now reached that stage in this business where the Government has done all that he thinks they ought to do. They have developed the industry sufficiently. The process of the development is complete, so complete that iron is produced in this country at as low a price, if not a shade lower, than the price in England. The obtaining of revenue is a subordinate and indifferent point; the main point is the development of the industry, and that, it is alleged, has been reached and completed, and therefore there is no further reason for the continuance of these iron duties. Last year we paid $226,816 on pig iron, and some $23,000 on charcoal iron. In addition to that the hon. gentleman has paid $93,800 in bounties. Now that the policy has yielded its fruits, that the system has been developed, I want to know how you can justify taking $350,000 out of the people's pockets for further gratuities to this already developed industry. Why continue the duties? I would like to get an answer?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentleman is always ingenious. While he has tried to knock my head and the head of the Minister of Finance together, I can return the compliment by knocking his head with that of the hon. member for North York.

Mr. MULOCK. Our heads are very hard; we can stand it.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I have no doubt of it, and they have stood the operation well. I refer to the hon. member for North York, because he explained quite clearly what the hon. member for Queen's did not catch from me; that is, while I referred to the one market of Glasgow, the hon. member for North York pointed out that our industries still had to meet the lower prices of the iron of Alabama. The hon. gentleman will see, therefore, that if we undertake to throw down the bars it is not the Scotch pig that would meet us.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). But the Alabama factories are closed.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) And demoralized. Those which are open are hardly sufficient to supply the home market, so there is very little danger of an overflow into this country.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I do not speak as an expert; but I would like to refer to the condition of the Pittsburg market, as reported in the Toronto 'Globe.' The hon. gentleman must know why I turn to his friends for information in this respect. No doubt he knows the prominence which the 'Globe' is giving to the policy that Sir Oliver Mowat has entered upon for the development of the mineral resources of Ontario. He is going, as far as is possible in a Local Legislature, to take that industry under his wing, and the 'Globe' shows that he has reason for assisting it in some form. In this connection it says:

Prices quoted at Pittsburg show a falling off in proportion to the decline in the output. This was shown by the following figures from the 'Engineering and Mining Journal' of 3rd February, 1892, 1893 and 1894:—

| | 1892 | | 1893. | | 1894. | | | | |
|-------------------------------|---------|-------------|---------|---------|-------------|---------|----|-------------|----|
| | $ cts. | $ cts. | $ cts. | $ cts. | $ cts. | $ cts. | | | |
| Bessemer pig, per ton | 15 | 25 to 15 | 60 | 13 | 20 to 13 | 40 | 10 | 60 to 10 | 75 |
| Gray forge pig | 13 | 30 to 13 | 50 | 12 | 25 to | | 9 | 85 to | |
| Steel billets and slabs | 24 | 50 to 25 | 40 | 21 | 50 to 21 | 75 | 15 | 85 to 16 | 00 |
| Steel rails | 30 | 00 to | | 28 | 00 to 28 | 50 | 24 | 00 to ... | |

It would be impossible to prevent the causes which led to such results from affecting the mining industry of Canada, but the relief from royalties and the lessening of prices will tend to minimize the depression.

The Ontario Government jump into the gap as far as they can; but we were here in advance with another remedy, and I only hope that the hon. gentleman will see, from the extraordinary competition now to be met in the country to the south of us, that we should not remove the protection that has already done so much good, and has been attended with a reduction in prices.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman has very cleverly avoided answering the question I put. He has stated that we can purchase iron in Nova Scotia as cheaply, if not more cheaply, than in Glasgow. Why, then, does he wish to continue a policy which gives a direct bonus to the Londonderry Iron Company of $49,906, and to the New Glasgow Iron and Coal Company of $25,871? Is not that a pure gratuity? If, as he says, pig iron can be purchased as cheaply in Nova Scotia as in Glasgow—and the House is bound to accept his statement, for the nonce, at any rate—how can he justify giving a bounty of $2 per ton on every ton that these companies produce? That is the point for the committee.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I speak of the price of Scotch pig in Glasgow, and not as sold in Canada.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Then there is less reason for it, because if you import from Glasgow, they would have the protection of the extra freight and insurance crossing the Atlantic. The Scotch pig, when landed in Nova Scotia, must, perforce, if the hon. gentleman's statement be correct, cost more than the pig iron produced by the Londonderry Iron Company and the New Glasgow Iron Company.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. In the same market, for market consumption, Scotch has the advantage in freight—an extraordinary advantage.

Mr. CHESLEY. I have been waiting with some patience to make a few observations on the resolution now before the House, and now that the friendly spar between the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) and the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) is over, I shall ask the indulgence of the House while I briefly discuss the subject. The question is whether a duty of $2 per ton shall be added to that already in existence on scrap iron, and the discussion, instead of being on the propriety of doing that, has turned on the question of the development of pig iron in this country. A certain policy was adopted by the Government some years ago, with the view of developing iron mines and the production of pig iron from our own ores. That policy was established in two ways—by duty and by a bounty. I find, on examining the returns, that, during the past two or three years, the increase in the production of pig iron in this country has been over 100 per cent, and in that way it will be seen that some development of our iron mines and the making of pig iron has taken place. I perhaps might say that no industry, no avocation, followed by the people of this country, is deserving of more attention and consideration at the hands of Parliament than the iron industry. If it be true that we have all the ores experts say we have, and all the different qualities of iron, all that is required, for the thorough development of these ores and the making of pig iron, from which all other irons are produced, is technical knowledge and the investment of capital and time. This industry is entirely different from a great many others. You invest your capital in a cotton mill, and buy your raw cotton, and once the mill is started you can make your product. But in the production of iron from the ores the process is much slower. It requires much longer time and a very considerable amount of capital to change the ores into the merchantable commodity. However, the Government adopted a policy of a duty and a bounty, and the result has been that within the last two or three years the output of pig iron in this country has increased a little over 100 per cent, which shows that this policy has induced capitalists to invest their money in the iron mines of the Dominion. But when you have succeeded in producing your pig iron, you are only on the threshold of supplying iron for general consumption. The next move is to turn this pig iron into what is known as puddled bar. From these bars is made what is known as merchant bar iron and iron for other purposes, which goes into general use throughout the country. It has been said that the reason this has not followed the production of pig iron is that the raw material can be had cheaply from outside—notably scrap—and that the rolling mills have been fitted up, for the purpose of utilizing this scrap, with a special class of machinery, from which they make bar iron, and that, therefore, the industry of producing puddled bars has not been entered into. I think that that statement is entirely inaccurate, because any man who knows anything about the manufacture of iron must certainly know that in all countries, wherever the manufacture of iron has attained a large degree of development, it has only been attained by a judicious mixture of the various grades of pig iron produced from the different ores, to bring about a certain result or to produce a certain quality of iron suitable for general consumption. And I say that in Canada, with all the pig iron that has been made, no such result has yet been obtained. There has not been made, and, I venture to say, there will not be made, for some time, puddled bar from the pig iron produced in Canada. I do not mean to say that the ores are not good enough in quality for that purpose, but there is no single ore from any particular mine from which you can make puddled bar suitable for iron that enters into general use. You must mix the different grades of ores, containing different qualities, together, and in this way you will produce a certain quality of iron, suitable for merchant bar. That has not been done as yet. I think I can see, in the adjustment of the tariff, so far as the scrap iron business is concerned, an effort perhaps on the part of parties who may be very largely interested in iron mines and the making of pig iron, to compel the rolling mill people to erect puddling furnaces and make from this pig iron puddled bars for their raw material. If the different grades of pig iron suitable for that purpose were made in this country, there could not be so much fault found with the idea. But they are not made yet, and will not be made for some time. Therefore, scrap iron has entered largely, if not wholly, into the manufacture of merchant bar iron, and will continue to do so for some time to come. Last year there was imported in this country wrought scrap to the amount of 45,226 tons, and wrought steel scrap, or steel cuttings, to the amount of 4,450 tons. This was used as raw material in the rolling mills, and from that a very fair and suitable merchant bar iron has been made, and the country has been fairly well supplied with it. These mills have worked up a prosperous and successful business, so far as I know, wherever they are located. If the duty on scrap iron is increased and the duty on puddled bar from abroad remains as it is, the only thing I can see that will follow will be, until such time as you produce puddled bar in this country from your own ores, to increase the cost of bar iron made from this scrap. That will surely follow, at all events for a time. We all know that Great Britain and the United States, greatly as their iron industries have been developed, not only import, but export ores. They import and export pig iron simply because each country possesses different qualities and grades of ores, and to produce certain results you must have a mixture of the various grades. Great Britain imports very large quantities of iron ore from Spain, notwithstanding the great variety she has at home. And in the Wilson Bill, it was determined that ores should come into the United States free, because they are required to produce a proper mixture for the making of certain classes and grades of iron. That will apply to all countries, and Canada is no exception. Then the question arises, who is to erect these puddling furnaces to make these puddled bars; shall it be the men producing the pig iron, or shall this be imposed upon the rolling mill men? In that connection, I will read a short extract from a pamphlet by Mr. George E. Drummond on that point:

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER.

Unfortunately the Dominion Government made one mistake, viz., the admission of wrought scrap iron, as the raw material for the manufacture of bar iron, at a less rate of duty than puddled bars, blooms and billets, with which it came into competition.

The admission of scrap iron at a low rate of duty has resulted in two evils. First, it has retarded the progress of the manufacture of pig iron from Canadian ores, inasmuch as the ironmasters cannot afford to produce puddled bars or steel billets at competitive prices with cheap wrought scrap. Secondly, it has caused the Canadian Rolling Mill proprietors to make investments in special plant for the manipulation of scrap, and brought about a condition of affairs in the rolling mill business that will be greatly disturbed by any sudden change in the tariff with regard to the admission of wrought scrap.

Then he goes on to show how this may be remedied. He says:

This may be done in several ways, for instance, by naming a definite date, say within from three to five years, when wrought scrap, the present raw material for Canadian bar iron, shall be placed at the same rate of duty as puddled bars or steel bars with which it comes into competition, and that in the meantime a sufficient bounty be granted, either to the rolling mill companies on such iron and steel as they may produce from the products of Canadian blast furnaces or to the blast furnace companies direct, as an inducement to them to produce steel billets and puddled bars, so that they may shortly be in a position to supply the mills (at a reasonable living profit to themselves) with all the raw material necessary for the manufacture of bars and other finished iron.

So you see, this gentleman, who has said some very good things on this subject and has given us a great deal of information on the iron industry, sees the very difficulty I am trying to point out—that is, that before this pig iron can reach the consumer in the form of merchant bar, a certain other process must take place which is not only expensive, but takes time, and requires a large investment of capital. Mr. Chairman, I might say that last year the production of pig iron in this country was about 47,000 tons, at least that is the amount on which the bounty was paid. Mr. Drummond shows in his report that the total production was about 60,000 tons. I presume he makes up his statement to the end of the calendar year, while the other figures are made up to the end of the fiscal year, the 30th June. The total consumption of the products of iron in Canada was 600,000 tons. We are thus very far from supplying ourselves with all the iron and products of iron that are consumed in this country. The rolling mills last year turned out, in the products of iron, about 80,000 tons. That quantity was almost, if not quite all, produced from scrap iron. The iron foundries turned out about 80,000 tons of castings—these would be for stoves, agricultural implements, and other heavy castings. The quantity of pig iron manufactured in the country was, as I stated, about 47,000 tons. The imports of charcoal pig iron amounted to 5,944 tons, and of pig iron other than charcoal iron, 56,703 tons. In addition, 729 tons of cast scrap iron were imported, making a total of 110,324 tons of pig iron consumed in the country during the past year. On this point, I will read another short paragraph from Mr. Drummond's pamphlet which bears and goes to strengthen what I have said :

Within the past two years Nova Scotia has made great progress in the erection of modern plants and improved appliances. She must continue on this course, for the time is past when iron can be successfully produced without improved appliances both in construction and modern methods of operation. The blast furnace must meet the consumer's wants, in quality of iron and technical knowledge, and administrative ability must be joined together in Nova Scotia just as in the United States to secure the increased output and high quality of iron which the times demand.

I think that Mr. Drummond is entirely right on that point. But, apart from all this, Mr. Chairman, I may say that, in my humble judgment, the increase of the duty on scrap iron at the present time is a mistake. I think that if the duty had been left as it was, $2 per ton, with a lowering of the duty on the bar iron produced from the scrap, from $13 to $10 per ton, as provided for by the revised tariff, perhaps it would have been more satisfactory. But if it is expected by the Government that by the increase of $2 per ton on scrap iron, an influence will be brought to bear that will induce capitalists or the rolling mills to go into the puddling of iron, I think they are entirely mistaken—that is an industry that it will take years to establish satisfactorily. It has been stated that these rolling mills have been fitted up with a peculiar class of machinery for the manipulation of scrap iron. That is not correct; the same rolls, the same machinery will roll the puddled bars into merchant iron as are used in the rolling of scrap bar into merchant iron. This scrap iron is first put into bars of the same shape and size as the puddled bars made from pig, and in that shape both scrap bar and puddled bar would enter the heating furnace. So there is nothing in that statement whatever. Then there is another item in the tariff concerning which I wish to say a few words. I refer to the second item in this schedule :

Iron or steel being pieces, punchings, or clippings of boiler plate or other plates, sheets or bars of iron or steel, whether the same have had the ragged or cropped end or edges sheared off or not, and crops from iron and steel rails having both ends sawn or sheared off, the same not having been in actual use and being fit for re-rolling or re-manufacture only, four dollars per ton.

That duty is increased. Now, I wish to explain to the House what all that means; I think it is well that hon. members should have the information. In Great Britain, where iron ship-building is, of course, a great industry, there is much waste in the sheets used in the construction of these vessels. From these sheets, pieces are frequently cut, known as clippings. These are in different sizes and shapes, and they are utilized by putting them into the shears and trimming them up into squares of whatever size the several clippings will make. They are very good material, being of new steel. These clippings have been sold in our provinces in very large quantities to the rolling mills as scrap, and they are a cheap and good raw material. They are simply thrown into the heating furnace, and, with one heat, passed through the rolls and made into sheets of beautiful steel nail plate.

Mr. CHARLTON. At what price per ton are these clippings bought?

Mr. CHESLEY. They are bought at the price of scrap, or, perhaps, at a slight advance.

Mr. CHARLTON. What is the price of scrap?

Mr. CHESLEY. From $10 to $14 per ton. Large quantities of these clippings thus trimmed have been brought in by our rolling mill men, and, as I say, made into plate from which nails are made. It is proposed to put a duty of $4 per ton on these clippings, which, I think, is another mistake.

As I said before, you will have to continue the use of this class of raw material for a long time to come. We cannot hope to reach the point of development where puddled bars would enter as a raw material into manufacture for all these purposes, this scrap iron and scrap steel will continue to be used by the rolling mills, and the only effect will be to increase the cost to the consumer of the articles produced. While I am in sympathy with the policy of the Government in developing the iron mines, I think when they come to connect the two things, when they try to get from the pig iron puddled bars, and when they try to put those puddled bars into general use, there is a gap that they cannot bridge over as easily as they think by legislation. It requires some time and a large capital, and a better understanding of the whole subject ought to be had before the attempt is made. It is well known—at all events I know it, and all others engaged in the iron business, know it—that notwithstanding the large increase in the production of pig iron, there has been no attempt yet to make puddled bars from it. The producers of pig iron do not want to make puddled bars from it. Their policy would be to sell their pig iron to the rolling mill men, and for the rolling mill men to erect puddling furnaces and produce puddled bars as their raw material. I may further state that none of the ores of the Londonderry mines, or those in Pictou County, N.S., will produce merchant bar iron alone; they must be mixed with some other grades of pig iron. There is too much phosphorus in the Londonderry iron. This renders it very valuable for stove castings or any other like castings where you wish a metal to run freely, but not for other purposes. When you come to the Ferrona ore of Pictou County, you have a different grade of iron entirely. To make the matter clear, the Londonderry iron is thin, more like water; the other is more like molasses when it melts and runs. That is the difference between the two irons. Neither of them alone, as any man of experience knows, will make puddled bars suitable for the making of merchant iron. So that whoever may make an attempt to produce puddled bars from pig iron must not only use the pig iron produced at either one or other of those mines, or perhaps both, but he must also import other pig iron to mix with the Canadian product before a satisfactory result can be obtained. I think that is about the way the matter stands in Canada to-day. I do not think any increased duty should be placed on the raw material that the rolling mills use in this country. These rolling mills have grown up as successful industries, and I am proud of the fact that to-day we are able to supply nearly all the wants of this country in what is known as merchant bar iron; I am proud of that fact as a result of the tariff policy inaugurated some years ago. But I regret that any steps should be taken to-day to cripple that industry for the purpose of helping some other interest. That is where I think a mistake has been made. Where the Government got the information on which they were acting, is more than I can understand, because if they had got correct information with reference to this matter, the story would have been about as I have told it. I well remember that about 25 years ago, in the city of St. John, it was attempted to import pig iron and to make puddled bars, and from them to make merchant iron. The attempt was a complete failure. The men who put their capital into the business lost everything. The works were idle for many years, and finally were sold to pay the ground rent under the buildings. A new company, at the head of which was the late James Harris, bought the property for a mere trifle, and at once commenced the manufacture of iron from scrap, and from that date to the present they have gone on successfully, and increased the output over 100 per cent. Last year these works were running right and day, making all the bar iron and nail plate they could turn out and finding a ready market for everything they made. The same thing applies to the Hamilton mills, to the Montreal mills, and others. Now, if these people are to be met with a duty of this character—of course one man will be in the same position as another—the inevitable result must follow, that they must all pay more for their raw material in consequence of this additional duty, and the price of iron must be increased to the consumer. Now, I feel there is no necessity for that. I would very much sooner offer a bounty to people who are producing this pig iron, as an inducement to produce puddled bars, than to do as the Government propose. It is true the Government have taken the duty off puddled bars, or, in other words, have reduced it from $9 to $5 a ton. With puddled bars at $5 a ton and scrap iron at $4, it is easy to see which material will be used by the rolling mill men. Where there is a difference in price on the other side of about $4 to $6 a ton between the cost of scrap iron and the cost of puddled bars; therefore, scrap iron will continue to be used here, and puddled bars will not be made. I thought it well to make these few explanations in reference to this matter, because I have some knowledge of the practical side of this question, having had a good deal to do with it in my lifetime. I think if the Government had left the duty as it was on scrap, it would have been entirely satisfactory to the people, as I think the duty and bounty on pig iron are satisfactory to the country at large. I believe the great bulk of the people are satisfied with the present development of the iron industry, and the way our own rolling mills are supplying their wants. I may further add that bar iron has been produced almost as cheaply for the last year or two in Canada as you could buy it anywhere else; therefore, under these circumstances, I think it is impolitic, not to say unwise, on the part of the Government to do anything that will interfere with the success and prosperity of these rolling mills. They employ a very large number of men, they consume all the scrap the country produces, besides making large importations. They are successful, let them remain successful, and try some other way of producing puddled bars from pig iron, adopt some other means of bringing about the end you have in view. I feel that under all the circumstances I ought to say at least this much. The people in my constituency are much interested in this question, we have two large rolling mills there, which employ a large number of men, and circulate a great deal of money. There has been some feeling and a good deal of talk in reference to this matter, and that is my justification for making these observations.

Mr. McMULLEN. The House is unquestionably indebted to the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Chesley) for the valuable information he has given us, and I earnestly hope the Finance Minister will see his way clear to meet, in some way, the suggestions of the hon. gentleman, who is evidently possessed of a good deal of personal experience in regard to the production of iron. Now, I find the production of pig iron, from the inception of the bounty system down to the present time, has been as follows:—

| | No. of tons claimed upon. | Amount of duty paid. |
|--------------|------------------------------|-------------------------|
| 1883-84..... | 29,388·16 | $44,089 91 |
| 1884-85..... | 25,769·13 | 38,654 91 |
| 1885-86..... | 26,179·19 | 39,259 56 |
| 1886-87..... | 39,717·00 | 59,576 00 |
| 1887-88..... | 22,209·00 | 33,314 00 |
| 1888-89..... | 24,822·00 | 37,333 00 |
| 1889-90..... | 24,373·00 | 25,697 00 |
| 1890-91..... | 20,153·00 | 20,153 00 |
| 1891-92..... | 30,289·00 | 30,294 00 |
| 1892-93..... | 35,268·00 | 67,590 00 |

In addition, during the period from 30th June, 1892, to 4th March, 1893, 47,155 tons were produced, on which a bounty was paid of $94,201. So that from the inception of the bounty system down to the present time there has been produced 325,322 tons, on which has been paid $490,045, or we have paid about $500,000 in bounty for the purpose of placing this industry on its feet. We have now over 11 years' experience. I quite agree with the remarks offered by the hon. gentleman who preceded me, to the effect that if we are going to develop the iron industry we should do it by bounty and not by duty. Some hon. gentlemen opposite, notably the Minister of Marine, have pointed to the action of the Ontario Government in granting a bounty of $1 per ton on iron production. If this industry is to be encouraged, let it be fostered by a bounty; I do not believe in placing the onus on men who are obliged to use the iron, if its production is one of national necessity. I admit that it is desirable we should produce iron in this country, and viewed from that standpoint I commend the course taken by the Ontario Government. If it be a necessity, let its development be at the expense of every one, and not merely at the expense of those who use iron. If hon. gentlemen opposite are disposed to continue the system which has been in force in the past, I prefer they should reverse the order of proceedings. It would be in line with their policy to make the bounty $4 and the duty $2, and at the same time we would be giving iron to consumers at less price. I think the statement of the Minister of Marine with respect to prices of iron in Glasgow is erroneous.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The low price at Glasgow is largely due, if not wholly, to the very bounty which the hon. gentleman commends.

Mr. McMULLEN. It is quite clear that the hon. Minister of Marine rather gave himself away in the statement he made, and is now showing his facility to extricate himself from a corner.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The mistake I made was in the use of the word "produce." If I had said at the price at which pig iron was sold at New Glasgow or Ferrona, I would have been correct. I used the word "produce," and it was erroneous to say that it was "produced" at the same cost. I am much obliged to the hon. gentleman for allowing me to make this explanation.

Mr. McMULLEN. I merely considered it to be my duty to point out that this industry has cost the country $500,000, and it does not appear now to be in a better condition than before. We produced more pig iron in Canada some years ago than we do now; production reached its highest point in 1886-1887, when the output was 39,717 tons.

Mr. CHARLTON. I am quite convinced that the position taken by the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Chesley) with regard to this subject is the correct one, and that the Minister of Finance has sacrificed one interest to benefit another. I observe by the Wilson Bill that scrap iron and steel are dutiable at the rate of 10 per cent, which, according to the figures given by the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Chesley), namely, $10 per ton, would be about $1 per ton, as compared with the present duty of $3 per ton on scrap iron in Canada, to be increased to $4 per ton under the tariff now proposed by the hon. Finance Minister after the first of June next. Consequently, our duty will be about three or four times as high as the duty proposed by the Wilson Bill of the United States.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. What is the duty on pig iron?

Mr. CHARLTON. It varies from 25 to 35 per cent. So that the duty proposed on scrap is relatively twice as high as that imposed on other grades of iron. No doubt in the United States, with the vast development of that industry there, they have placed a duty on scrap iron and steel at a point more in consonance with the interests of the trade than the Finance Minister has done, and I am convinced a mistake has been made here, and that this duty is relatively too high. It would be absurd to sacrifice the rolling mill interest here for the blast furnace interest, and the latter has received consideration at the hands of the Government that the rolling mill interest has not obtained, because it has received, besides the protection of the customs duty, an addition in the shape of bounty. While adverting to this matter I desire to say that from the best information I was able to obtain when chairman of the Mining Commission of Ontario, there is no point in America where iron can be produced cheaper than in Nova Scotia. I visited Birmingham, Ala., in company with the secretary of that commission. We found that at Birmingham they were producing iron from a low grade of ore, an ore running 30 to 40 per cent of iron, at a cost of from $6.50 to $7.25 per ton at that time—1889. Being brought into contact with iron men and men experienced in the business, I ascertained that it was the opinion of iron producers familiar with the locality that iron could be produced more cheaply in Nova Scotia, at New Glasgow, than at Birmingham.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. You did not visit New Glasgow ?

Mr. CHARLTON. No ; but I obtained the opinions of men competent to judge, and I found that the opinion prevailed that while iron could be produced at Birmingham, Ala., at from $6.50 to $7.25 per ton, yet with the same appliances and with a similar investment of capital it could be produced at New Glasgow at a lower cost.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. They did not propose to invest.

Mr. CHARLTON. No, they did not propose to invest. It is an unfortunate thing that the condition of affairs in this country does not seem to invite investment.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. But others did.

Mr. CHARLTON. As chairman of that commission I ascertained that charcoal iron could be produced in this country at a lower price than it could be imported for. We had before us Mr. Massey of Toronto, who informed us that charcoal iron at $4 a ton more than pig iron, would be used by himself and by a majority of founders for strong castings ; that he would use 2,000 tons per annum in his own business at $4 per ton higher than imported Scotch pig. We had estimates furnished and data given as to the cost of the manufacture of charcoal iron in Ontario. The Madoc furnace had been producing charcoal iron at $12 per ton, and the details of the cost were as follows : Cost of ore $3 per ton, cost of fuel $3 per ton, flux 30 cents per ton, labour $3.10 per ton, wear and tear $1 per ton, and general expenses $1.60. We had the report of Mr. John Birkenbine of Philadelphia, who is considered the best authority on iron matters in the United States, as to the cost of producing charcoal iron in the townships of Darling and Levant, and its estimated cost was $12.85. Mr. Birkenbine's estimate went into details as to cost of plant, cost of mineral lands, cost of developing mines, and all the expenses connected with the investment and creation of the plant. We had an estimate of cost of producing charcoal iron made by Mr. J. C. Pusey, a practical iron worker in the township of Snowdon, and his estimate was $13.80. We had an estimate that at the Haliburton Imperial Mines it cost $9.08 per ton ; another giving an estimated cost in another locality of $11.46, and another giving the estimated cost of producing charcoal iron at $11.92. These are undoubtedly figures that would approximate very closely to the actual cost of the production of charcoal iron. The best authorities believe that iron can be produced at New Glasgow cheaper than at any other point in America. Under these circumstances, having pursued the policy of bonusing iron establishments for many years, it strikes me that the policy is not an efficient one. We want a change in our trade relations ; we want the introduction of more energy and more capital, we want to adopt a policy that will give the country general growth and that will bring into it the infusion of new ideas and the infusion of new energies. This bonusing policy pursued by the Government is to a great degree inoperative. At all events, in connection with the item under consideration, the policy adopted by the Government, judging by the course taken by the United States, is one which is likely to prove injurious to the rolling mills, and the duty imposed is too high. Either the Government here is wrong or the framers of the Wilson Bill are wrong, because the conditions of the trade in the two countries are relatively much the same, and the United States would not be likely to adopt a policy injurious to the iron-producing interest.

Mr. MACLEAN (York). I would like to point out, for the information of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Charlton), and for the information of the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies), that while iron may be produced in Nova Scotia at a very low rate, we in Ontario desire to see iron produced in our own province. I would specially point out to the hon. gentleman for Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), that the very commission that he was appointed a member of is now bearing fruit, and that the Government of Ontario, which sent him to make this inquiry, have now adopted an iron policy and have become protectionists.

Mr. McMULLEN. No, no.

Mr. MACLEAN (York). Yes. They have come to believe in the doctrine that it is essential to national greatness to have an N.P.; a policy that will give us iron production in this country. No country has ever become great, no country has ever become a leader among the nations of the earth, that had not an iron industry of its own, and that did not try to build up an iron industry of its own. We are now trying to do that in Canada, and the Reformers of this country who have always opposed protection have come at last to the view that they in Ontario will try to create an iron industry in this province, and for that purpose they employed the gentleman who has just addressed the House (Mr. Charlton), and they are now about to act upon his suggestion. Another thing I wish to point out is this: that the greatest mistake ever made in this country was, when we were building the great Canadian Pacific Railway, that we neglected to provide that every rail which entered into the construction of that road should have been rolled in this country and made from Canadian iron.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Has the hon. gentleman calculated how many millions of dollars more that would cost, above what it did cost?

Mr. MACLEAN (York). Even if it did cost more, this country would be just that many millions of dollars better off.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) There would be a charge on the North-west and on the transportation trade for all time to come.

Mr. MACLEAN (York). I deny that. I say that before the Canadian Pacific Railway was built, we should have provided that that road should be built entirely of Canadian iron. I hope in future that in the case of all roads bonused out of the Federal Treasury it will be made a condition of the bonus that they will employ Canadian iron and Canadian rolled rails in their construction. There is another thing I wish to point out in connection with the iron policy of Ontario—and I wish to point it out especially to the member for Huron (Mr. McMillan), who says that the farmers do not wish an iron policy in this country. It is the best thing that could happen the farmers of this country to have an iron policy, and the farmers of Ontario believe in an iron policy, and they believe in it because it will give them the best home market that they possibly could have, for there is no home market equal to that that is made by a mining population. We in Ontario hope to see an iron policy there, and we are prepared to support this Government in maintaining an iron policy. I wish to repeat the hope that I expressed before: that it will be a condition of all bonuses granted to railways in future that they shall be built of Canadian iron rolled in Canadian mills.

Mr. MACLEAN (York).

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). You are defending the Ontario Government now. They have converted you

Mr. MACLEAN (York). We have converted the Ontario Government, and at a time when they are in the throes of a great struggle the Ontario Government has reached out its hand for this policy of protection, and it is the only hope they have of saving their lives in the electoral struggle that is about to take place.

Mr. MULOCK. I have been waiting for some time to come back to the point at which this discussion diverged. There is a controversy between some members here as to whether the Government's policy had sufficiently developed the industry; but here we have this fact staring us in the face; we have a tariff now which is in some respects more onerous than ever upon the consumers of iron. I do not myself give my own opinion or knowledge as to what price iron can be produced for in Canada or elsewhere. What I stated was: that large users of iron, men engaged in the manufacture of machinery and implements of various kinds, whose raw material is iron, had waited upon the Administration after their proposed tariff had been given to the public, and, as I understand, asked the Government to reduce the duty upon iron, and in some cases to have it made free. But, instead of reducing the duty on this article, the Government has raised it. I now come back to where the discussion was left off, and I ask the Minister of Finance, why he does not apply his policy to iron, which is the raw material of these manufacturers? I understand his policy to be, to admit the raw material free. Is not iron in various forms the raw material of manufacturers of implements of different kinds? If that is his policy, how comes it that he does not apply it to the case of iron? It is idle to say that the imposition of this duty is not going to enhance the cost to the consumers of iron goods. Now, I ask the Minister of Finance what the effect is going to be upon the manufacture of agricultural implements, which subject has been so ably dealt with by the hon. member for St. John. The agricultural implement manufacturers have called upon the Government to make certain changes in the duties upon their raw material, in the shape of iron of various kinds. I ask the Minister, if he is free to give me an answer, if that is not the case? Have not the manufacturers of agricultural implements, and the users of iron for the manufacture of various necessities of life, asked the Government for a reduction of the duties on iron?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. MULOCK. I thought so; and the reason assigned was that it was necessary for them to get their raw material cheaper. But the Government turned a deaf ear to them.

In some cases, I admit, the duties have been lowered ; but the hon. member for St. John cited a case in which the Government turned a deaf ear to the application that was made. The result is that one of the most widely used manufactures of iron is made dearer to the consumer.

Mr. FOSTER. How is it made dearer ?

Mr. MULOCK. By increasing the duty on scrap and leaving the duty on pig iron at $4 a ton.

Mr. FOSTER. It is made no greater.

Mr. MULOCK. Is not $4 a ton something ? The change is going to cause a larger importation of pig iron or make scrap more expensive.

Mr. FOSTER. Not at all.

Mr. MULOCK. The hon. gentleman must see it. The hon. member for St. John has stated that it is necessary to import pig iron to produce certain grades of iron.

Mr. FOSTER. Not necessarily.

Mr. MULOCK. The hon. member for St. John said that we do not produce certain grades of iron without using imported pig.

Mr. FOSTER. He did not say we could not.

Mr. MULOCK. He said we do not, though ; and he said that at the present time scrap forms a valuable mixture in the production of certain grades of iron.

Mr. FOSTER. Mixture ? What for ?

Mr. MULOCK. Puddled bar. That is what he stated—and that, as you are now making this scrap more expensive, it will be necessary, in his judgment, to import more pig.

Mr. FOSTER. It is only steel scrap that is used to make billets, and that is cheaper than it was before.

Mr. MULOCK. I am repeating what the hon. member for St. John has said. He says that scrap is melted up in St. John for the manufacture of cut nails, and that the increased duty will make them dearer.

Mr. FOSTER. Cut nails are made cheaper. The duty on them is reduced nearly one-half.

Mr. MULOCK. I am not speaking of the nails. I am speaking of the scrap that enters into their manufacture. The maintenance of these duties and their increase in certain places increases the cost of the manufactured article to the consumer.

Mr. FOSTER. How ?

Mr. MULOCK. I would like to ask the Minister why he does not apply his policy generally ? If he is in favour of cheap raw materials, why does he maintain these high rates on raw materials ?

Mr. FOSTER. We have reduced them.

Mr. MULOCK. You have not reduced them all ; you have increased some and reduced others to a trifling extent. To say nothing of the freight, there is a duty of $10 a ton on bar iron—that much additional charge to the consumer on all classes of goods into which bar iron enters.

Mr. FOSTER. It was $13 before.

Mr. MULOCK. Why should it be $10 ? To-day you are posing as the farmer's friend ; but your tariff shows you to be the farmer's enemy. What is going to be the effect of your iron policy upon agricultural implements ? Your whole policy is a mass of inconsistencies.

Mr. FOSTER. What would be your policy with regard to implements ?

Mr. MULOCK. I am not making a policy ; I am trying to point out the absurdities and inconsistencies of the Government's policy, and the disasters that must flow from it. They have announced the making of raw materials cheap to the manufacturer as the foundation of their policy ; but they have not carried out that policy with reference to the iron duties. Since they undertook to tinker with these iron duties, they have paralyzed the iron industries of the country. What have become of the prophecies of Sir Charles Tupper, made in this House in 1887, when he told us of the great natural advantages that Canada had for the building up of a great iron industry if she would only adopt the excessive scale of duties which he proposed ? Ever since that policy was introduced, the consumers of iron goods have been great sufferers ; and because the Minister is able to point to trifling reductions in one or two points, he thinks he has done all that the condition of the country warrants. Now, that the hon. member for Algoma is in the House, I would ask him if I correctly understood him to say that Canadian pig iron was as cheap within $2 a ton in Toronto, as Scotch or American iron ? Was that what he wished the House to understand ?

Mr. MACDONELL (Algoma). Go on.

Mr. MULOCK. I understood the hon. gentleman to make that statement, and if so, I would reply both to him and to the hon. Minister of Finance by saying that I do not profess to give any evidence myself on the point, nor do I think that the evidence I did give had reference to a demoralized state of the trade. I understand that pig iron of the very best kind is produced in Alabama at $2 a ton less than in Canada—not at demoralized prices, but at normal prices. Then, owing to railway freight, we are handicapped to the extent of $3.50 per ton, say at Toronto a leading centre, where iron is required, so that pig iron would cost in Toronto, under your tariff, $5.50 per ton more than it can be laid down for, even brought up from the east. Now, the effect of it is this : The American farmers, owing to cheaper raw materials, will get their agricultural implements cheaper, and you are handicapping our Canadian farmers in their competition with the Americans, because if you make the raw material which enters into the manufacture of their iron goods dearer, you will make it more expensive for them to carry on their industry, and in this way this Government, which pretends to have introduced a farmer's tariff, are imposing a tariff directly antagonistic to the interests of the farmers.

Item agreed to.

Iron or steel, being pieces, punching, or clippings of boiler plate or other plates, sheets or bars of iron or steel, whether the same have had the ragged or cropped ends or edges sheared off or not, and crops from iron or steel rails having both ends sawn or sheared off, the same not having been in actual use and being fit for re-rolling or re-manufacture only (39 per cent) four dollars per ton.

Mr. FOSTER. This is the other form of steel scrap. I think the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Chesley) was in error in the matter of the steel scrap. In the old tariff, the duty was 30 per cent. The average price of that which came in was $15.90 per ton, so that the duty of 30 per cent amounted to $4.80. The duty now is $4. It may be that steel scrap sometimes came in under the preceding section at $2 a ton, but if so it slipped in where it had no place.

Mr. CHESLEY. What is called steel scrap in the item before the House was simply imported as scrap iron always. It is nothing but scrap anyway.

Mr. FOSTER. It should not have been.

Mr. CHESLEY. It is the leavings from the sheets where boilers are made and vessels are built. These are the cuttings and ends of sheets brought into the country as scrap and rolled into nail sheets. It was brought in at first without any trimming, but finally the people on the other side, interested in the trade, commenced clipping—what they called clipping or trimming these pieces; and these came in as scrap steel. It was used for the manufacture of nail sheets. From these sheets cut nails were made. The same remark applies to your steel rails which you have in this item. There have been thousands of tons of old steel rails rolled this very past season in St. John into steel sheets or nail plate. I know of a contract which the Harris people had for three thousand tons of steel sheets made from old steel rails, and these steel rails are their raw material. There is any number of these rails in the country at present on railway lines, but after a time, when the rails have to be renewed, there will be a great quantity of this cheap raw material in the country. The rolling mill owners went to considerable expense and trouble to get the necessary machinery for converting these old rails into sheet and nail plate at one heat. After going to all this expenditure and trouble, you are going to prevent them bringing in this material unless they pay a duty of $4 per ton.

Mr. MULOCK.

Mr. FOSTER. Wrought iron or steel sheet or plate cuttings or clippings as got at the rolling mills or shipyards, fit only for rolling, and to be used for such purposes, had to pay 30 per cent. That was steel scrap and was the item under which it came in. If any steel clippings came in at $2 the importer got the advantage to that amount.

Mr. CHESLEY. All I have to say is that these people were importing the article as scrap, and it is nothing but scrap.

Item agreed to.

Iron in pigs, iron kentledge and scrap iron, ($4 per ton); ferro-silicon and spiegeleisen ($2 per ton), four dollars per ton; ferro-manganese ($2 per ton), 10 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. FOSTER. Allow me to make it 5 per cent instead of 10 per cent on ferro-manganese.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The hon. Minister of Finance has had representations made to him with regard to the steel or iron used in the manufacture of windmills. Is it the intention of the Government to make any change in the direction asked for? What they ask for particularly is that the material not manufactured in Canada be allowed in free for the manufacture of windmills. They also complain that the duty on the raw material is too high, higher than the duty on the manufactured articles allowed into the country. So that the Americans or other producers of these windmills can export into this country at a lower rate of duty than the duty on the material which is used by our own manufacturers. They ask in order that they may be enabled to compete with outside manufacturers to have the raw material brought into Canada admitted free. Is it the intention of the Government to grant any relief?

Mr. FOSTER. I can hardly tell what it will be until we come to the free list.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If the item of steel and iron is passed, and no attention paid to their representations, we can hardly expect a change.

Mr. FOSTER. An item in the free list would quickly take it out of that.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I do not understand the reply. I ask the hon. gentleman frankly, in the interest of those parties, who have given him full information with regard to their business, whether he intends to do anything to encourage their industry? The duty on the raw material used in the manufacture of the article is higher than that on the finished product.

Mr. WALLACE. It is not higher.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon, it is higher.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman will understand that I could not say to him, on representations made by friends of his, whether I am going to put it on the free list or not. We will have to wait till we come to the free list, and if there are any other items to be put on at that time, they will be put on together, on the revision.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I simply asked whether it was the intention to give any relief in regard to that industry? I did not mean to ask for any information I should not receive.

Mr. FOSTER. I could not say at present.

Mr. CASEY. It has been the contention that nobody is unduly favoured by this tax on pig iron. Now, the amount of iron imported last year in the shape of scrap, common pig and charcoal pig, was 78,847 tons, which, at $4 a ton duty, would yield $315,388. Our blast furnaces, according to the Minister of Marine, made 55,000 tons. In addition to that, we gave $110,000 bounty, of which, seeing that we imported such a very large surplus of iron, they must have had the full advantage; they must have had the full advantage of the $4 per ton duty, and so they got $220,000 increased price on that point; in other words, we paid in duties $313,000, and gave a bonus and protection to the blast furnaces, of $330,000, in all, $643,000 in round numbers, to encourage the production of pig iron in Canada. Now, the Minister says that 55,000 tons were produced by this encouragement. I think it was less, but take it at his figure. The country paid out $643,000 to secure the production of 55,000 tons of pig iron, or about $11.50 for every ton produced by the blast furnaces. Can any one say that that is a reasonable state of things? The hon. Minister has taken the line all along of saying as little as possible. He cannot deny these figures, he cannot assert that the encouragement of the production of pig iron, at the rate of $11.50 per ton, at the expense of the consumer, is reasonable, defensible, or proper. We were not led to anticipate any such result as this when these duties were first proposed by Sir Charles Tupper. He told us that the imposition of these duties would lead to vastly increased production in the country, and to a reduction in price. I should notice, however, that in producing these 55,000 tons of pig iron, about a thousand men were employed, as near as I caught the figures given by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper). Now, Sir Charles Tupper estimated that in the production of pig iron, as encouraged by his duties, 20,000 men would be employed in a very short time, making with their families, an addition of 80,000 or 100,000 to the population of the country. We see that the estimates then made of the great progress of this trade, were falsified, as I believe the anticipations entertained by the Ministers now with regard to this trade in the future, will be falsified. But, apart from the question of the amount of the product, I must call the attention of the House to the promises made concerning the production of charcoal iron, not only in Nova Scotia, which seems to be the only place where iron is produced now, but throughout Quebec and Ontario. Sir Charles Tupper pointed out the advantages of charcoal iron in these words:

The experiments recently made by some of the great lines of railway in the United States have shown, as the result of scientific analysis, that the mode of making the life of a rail infinitely greater than it is, is to have incorporated in the rail a large portion of charcoal iron, and under this recent discovery, there is a field for the development of charcoal iron, that will go far to make it one of the leading industries of Canada. There is at present, as you know, in Ontario, running through a large number of counties and townships, a most valuable deposit of iron ore. A railway has been built to Central Ontario, over 100 miles long, to carry this ore to Weller's Bay, to be shipped across the lake to Charlotte, Oswego, and other points on the American side. Well, from Oswego and Charlotte on the American side to the anthracite coal field is only 150 miles, and I say that, under a policy which will give iron the protection we give to everything else in Canada, under the National Policy, you will have the ships that convey the ore to Oswego or to Charlotte, or to any of those places from Kingston, Cobourg and Weller's Bay, bringing back the anthracite coal, and you will have the establishment of blast furnaces at Cobourg, Kingston and Weller's Bay, that will give the iron industry of Ontario the same position it occupied years ago.

Admitting by that last sentence that the iron industry had fallen off. Now, this is a beautiful example of the humbug of all the promises made on behalf of the National Policy, and of this latest excrescence upon it, Sir Charles Tupper promised wonderful things, and not one of them has come to pass. No blast furnaces have been started in Ontario, whether by anthracite coal or charcoal. No vessel brings coal from Oswego or Weller's Bay to the consumers of Canadian ore; even the export of ore itself has been stopped. The people of Cobourg, Kingston, Weller's Bay, Belleville, and other points in Ontario must realize how they were humbugged before the elections of 1887, by the promises made by Sir Charles Tupper. Then he went on to point out that he was going to take the duty off anthracite coal, and he referred again to Weller's Bay, Kingston, and Cobourg, and to these cargoes of coal they were to bring across:

There is nothing to prevent it but one thing, and that is the duty upon the anthracite coal; and what I propose to ask this House to do, in adopting the policy of vitalizing this great industry of Canada, is to take the duty off anthracite coal and make it free. The moment that is done we shall have blast furnaces at Cobourg, Weller's Bay and Kingston, at all events, served by anthracite coal, making that description of anthracite iron which is so highly valued by gentlemen connected with foundries.

Now, there is no such thing as anthracite iron made in Canada to this day, although it was promised to us at that time to induce us to impose these heavy burdens upon ourselves to secure it. In regard to charcoal iron, he urged the same thing in very strong terms. He proposed to encourage the production of this iron by a heavy duty and pointed out that, as a result, we would all be engaged in this manufacture in a short time. As a matter of fact what is the state of things to-day? Not a single ton of charcoal iron is made in Canada to-day. Plenty of charcoal is made in Canada in the western peninsula of Ontario; but it is exported to the United States and used to smelt iron taken from American mines.

Mr. CHESLEY. I beg to correct the hon. gentleman's statement. They are making charcoal iron in Quebec now very successfully. They made over 7,000 tons last year.

Mr. CASEY. I accept the hon. gentleman's statement, as he seems to be well informed upon these subjects. But we have had no official statement to show that this manufacture is going on, and I was not aware of the fact. But I know well that in Ontario, of which I am more particularly speaking, there is none made, and that our charcoal is being exported to Detroit to smelt iron on the other side of the line, instead of bringing the ore over to be smelted here with our charcoal.

Committee rose, and it being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

House resolved itself into Committee on Bill (No. 21) to incorporate the St. Clair and Erie Ship Canal Company.

(In the Committee.)

On section 10, subsection (a),

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Mr. Chairman, I object to the clause on the ground of jurisdiction. The first part of the clause I do not object to, because it is simply a limitation of the franchise the House is giving to the company, and we have power to grant franchises on whatever conditions we think expedient in the public interest. But we go beyond that and beyond the proper function of the House in the second part of the clause. We should simply provide that the parties whose property is drained shall not be in a worse position, shall not incur larger expense than would have been the case if the canal had not been constructed, and that any additional cost necessary in order to secure the drainage of the land shall fall upon the canal company and not upon the proprietors of the land. You may provide, if you see proper, that in case of any dispute arising it shall be settled by the ordinary tribunals. I do not think we have power to provide that, because one party to a dispute is a company incorporated by this House, the other parties to the dispute shall be dragged before a tribunal specially constituted. We may limit the franchises granted to a company, we may state what their responsibilities shall be to other parties; but when you come to the remedy which they shall be entitled to under the provisions of the Act, that remedy is fixed by our constitution. The judicial determination of that question will rest with the ordinary tribunals, or, if there was to be a special tribunal created for such cases at all, the special tribunal would be one created by the province for the trial of such question. The jurisdiction would be with the province and not with us. Therefore, I do not think we ought to go so far as this clause—I do not think we have the power to do so. The moment we create this company it becomes an artificial person. Then its relations to the other members of the company would be, to the extent of its franchises and limitations, exactly the same as those of any other person natural or artificial. That rule was laid down in the Parsons case; it has been laid down by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, and it has been repeated in other cases. By the course here proposed you will simply create litigation both for the parties and for the company, and I would suggest to the hon. gentleman that—as he does not want to put the parties in a worse position than if the canal had not been constructed—instead of that second part of the amendment, the Bill should simply declare that the parties whose lands may require to be drained shall not be in a more unfavourable position than if the canal had not been constructed and that any expense beyond what they would have incurred had the canal not been built shall fall upon the canal company. Give them the assurance that they are to be in no worse position, so far as the drainage of their own land is concerned. You may declare, also, if you like, that any disputes shall be tried by such tribunals as are competent to try such cases in the province of Ontario. I supposed, from what the Minister of Justice said when he asked the Bill to stand in the absence of the hon. gentleman who had charge of it, that the hon. Minister intended looking into the matter. I am sure the House wishes he were here to give his opinion upon the subject.

Mr. TISDALE. I am obliged to the hon. gentleman for the moderate and kindly way in which he has discussed this matter. Undoubtedly the hon. gentleman only desires to make this Bill accord with what he believes to be fair and legal. We always agree on that point. But, even if I were inclined to agree with the hon. gentleman's opinion—and I am bound to say I differ from it—there is this difficulty in the way: When this Bill first came up at the meeting of the Railway Committee, there was a delegation representing the townships affected. The reason why they were here was that the drainage was especially mentioned. I believe that the drainage about which they were concerned and with regard to which they desired the committee to take great care is not the drainage of individual farms; it is the system of drainage provided by the municipalities which have spent a quarter of a million dollars or more on such works. The representatives of these townships are very properly anxious that the interests of the townships in respect of this drainage system should be in no way injured. The Railway Committee took the view that it was well to have a special clause inserted in the Bill instead of leaving these questions to be decided under the general provisions of the Railway Act, which had been suggested and drafted as part of the Bill in the first place. At the suggestion of the committee, the consideration of the Bill was postponed for one meeting and I met the representatives of the townships in company with the hon. members from the ridings affected, Messrs. McGregor, Allan and Campbell, and we agreed on these clauses that have been mentioned. I am therefore pledged in good faith—always subject, of course, to the decision of the House and the committee—that this clause shall be carried out. The reason why these gentlemen were willing, and not only willing, but anxious to have the clause put in this way, was that they wanted to be sure of a tribunal that would dispose of the matter so that they would not be carried from court to court, by the lawyers as they said, and never know when they were through. So far as the representatives of those important interests which the Bill aims to protect are concerned, this is their express desire. As one of the projectors of the canal company I may say that the company prefers the same provision, in order that we may know, when we have these disputes, the tribunal to which we must appeal. If it is not in the power of Parliament to do this, whatever our desire may be will be comparatively a minor consideration. I mention that fact because I think it leads up to this proposition: that unless it is very clear that Parliament has no jurisdiction, the committee should agree with me that the clause should be passed in the form proposed, which is satisfactory to the parties representing the interests involved on both sides. I have very excellent authority for the position I occupy in the decisions of the Privy Council on questions arising under the British North America Act, and I think I will be able to call the hon. gentleman's attention to one or two decisions, particularly a very recent one, in which the opinions of the Privy Council have been very unmistakably expressed. Before referring to these cases I shall express my own opinion, given from some knowledge of the working of the legislation to which I have referred, and it is that it would be most undesirable to curtail the power which this Parliament has heretofore exercised, and which in my opinion it undoubtedly possesses. I believe where we can lawfully create a corporation or an entity, by whatever name you may be pleased to call it, the Dominion Parliament, under the British North America Act is entitled to vest it and those who have to deal and come in contact with all such powers, authorities and attributes as will enable a settlement to be arrived at of disputes between them, which are incident to its working, construction and existence. I say this is directly incident to construction and existence, and I will show why. The hon. gentleman cannot gainsay, because he admits the first clause of the amendment to be a proper one, that we should declare in what way and by what tribunal the present drainage shall be dealt with.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). So far as the tribunal is concerned, I object to it. My point with respect to it is, that it is a limitation on the franchise of the company as to the extent of their responsibility.

Mr. TISDALE. Does the hon. gentleman also question that if we cannot agree between ourselves, or if anybody is not satisfied with the way we take care of the drainage, it is not proper, even as to that, that the Railway Committee of the Privy Council should decide it?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). With respect to the question of drainage, it being under the control of the local jurisdiction, anything we do is subject to the sovereign authority of the Local Legislatures, as this question is within their sole jurisdiction.

Mr. TISDALE. The hon. gentleman has weakened his contention by what he has just stated. If there is any doubt as to the future there is certainly no doubt as to the present, and it is that we shall see how the present drainage shall be dealt with and disputes in regard to it settled. That is the form and enlargement of the drainage.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Suppose the hon. gentleman's contention were correct, we could go so far as to say that the canal company should have no responsibility, and release it from responsibility by such a declaration. That would follow from the hon. gentleman's contention.

Mr. TISDALE. I think we can burden the creature we create with any responsibility. To resume my contention, and on that branch it applies to both, I call the hon. gentleman's attention to this fact, that the amendment to which he objects is precisely, in every way, in principle, form and effect, the spirit and principle on which our general Railway Act is founded, and, therefore, if the hon. gentleman's contention is correct, our general Railway Act is unconstitutional, on this as well as on other points. The Railway Act provides that this shall be done by the general Railway Act 'in praesenti' and 'in futuro.' What we are asking this House to enact is chiefly drawn and considered on that line, that if this proposition is not constitutional the general Railway Act under which so many millions of dollars have been expended for railway construction is unconstitutional. This is a very strong point I submit for the consideration of this committee. The first authority from the Privy Council I quote is the case of Cushing and Dupuy. The principle involved was this: As regards bankruptcy and insolvency, certain legislation was passed by the Dominion and certain legislation by the province of Ontario. If the Dominion legislation could not interfere with civil rights and the rights of property in Ontario, the Dominion legislation was bad. That question came up expressly, and it was held by the Privy Council that Dominion legislation must override the legislation of the provinces, although the court expressly stated that although a Provincial Legislature might pass a law incident to the carrying out of a bankrupt or insolvency Act, nevertheless if it interfered or was in any way contrary to the Act of the Dominion, the Dominion Act must prevail. It seems to me that that is the same principle involved. I will quote shortly what their Lordships said on that question:

It was contended for the appellant that the provisions of the Insolvency Act interfered with property and civil rights, and was therefore ultra vires. This objection was very faintly urged but it was strongly contended that the Parliament of Canada could not take away the right of appeal to the Queen from final judgments from the Court of Queen's Bench, which, it was said, was part of the procedure in civil matters exclusively assigned to the legislature of the province. The answer to these objections is obvious. It would be impossible to advance a step in the construction of a scheme for the administration of insolvent estates without interfering with and modifying some of the ordinary rights of property and other civil rights, nor without providing some mode of special procedure for the vesting, realization and distribution of the estate and the settlement of the liabilities of the insolvent. Procedure must necessarily form an essential part of any law dealing with insolvency. It is therefore to be presumed, indeed it is a necessary implication, that the Imperial statute in assigning to the Dominion Parliament subjects of bankruptcy and insolvency, intended to confer on it legislative power to interfere with property, civil rights and procedure within the provinces, so far as a general law relating to these subjects might affect them. Their Lordships, therefore, think that the Parliament would not infringe the exclusive powers given to the Provincial Legislatures by enacting that the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench in matters of insolvency should be final, and not subject to the appeal as of right to Her Majesty in Council allowed by Article 1178 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

Precisely the same principle was involved in that case as is involved now. Then there is the case of the Merchants Bank vs. Smith, reported in our Supreme Court Reports, Vol. VIII., which case, however, was not carried to the Privy Council. There was a contention as to the ownership of property, which if the provincial law was to prevail, would not have allowed the property to be held by the bank, but if the Dominion law in regard to warehouse receipts and similar matters under the Banking Act was to prevail, then the bank could hold the property. Our Supreme Court enunciated the same principle, and gave judgment accordingly. Later than these cases and much more satisfactory, because the language is unmistakable and very general in its terms, is the case of Tennant vs. the Union Bank of Canada, a report of which appears in the advance issue of the Law Times Reports, No. 7, Vol. X., of 13th December, 1893. The Privy Council had not only a full board, but because of the importance of the case in relation to the constitutionality of this law, the court called in additional assistance at a subsequent stage, and gave a decision on the question, namely, whether the banking laws of the Dominion or the banking laws of the province of Ontario in relation to the passing of title to chattels was to prevail. The report says:

The case, which was one of great importance to the banking and commercial community in Canada, was argued before a board consisting of Lord Watson, Lord Hobhouse, Lord Morris, Lord Shand, and Sir Richard Couch, and afterwards before the same learned lords, together with the Lord Chancellor and Lord Macnaghten.

And what makes this still more important, notwithstanding the case of Cushing and Dupuy, and the Merchants' Bank and Smith, they expressly ordered and directed that the principle involved in those cases should be reargued, so that before so full a court they should give a decision which they hoped would be final. I shall read a portion of this, because I think it is important to settle this question which the House of Commons of Canada has long since settled, but which continually is being raised as an objection whenever one of these points seem to go a little further than some hon. gentlemen think they should:

Their Lordships, before dealing with those questions, thought it expedient to determine for themselves whether the provisions of the Bank Act, to which the appellant took exception, were competently enacted. The appellant's plea against the legislative power of the Dominion Parliament was accordingly made the subject of further argument, and the point being one of general importance, their Lordships had the advantage of being assisted in the hearing and consideration of it by the Lord Chancellor and Lord Macnaghten. The question turned upon the construction of two clauses in the British North America Act, 1867. Section 91 gave the Parliament of Canada power to make laws in relation to all matters not coming within the classes of subjects by the Act exclusively assigned to the legislatures of the provinces, and also exclusive legislative authority in relation to certain enumerated subjects, the 15th of which was "banking, incorporation of banks, and the issue of paper money." Section 92 assigned to each Provincial Legislature the exclusive right to make laws in relation to the classes of subjects therein enumerated; and the 14th of the enumerated classes was "property and civil rights in the province." Statutory regulations, with respect to the form and legal effect in Ontario of warehouse receipts and other negotiable documents, which passed the property of goods without delivery, unquestionably related to property and civil rights in that province; and the objection taken by the appellant to the provisions of the Bank Act would be unanswerable, if it could be shown, that by the Act of 1867, the Parliament of Canada was absolutely debarred from the trenching to any extent upon the matters assigned to the Provincial Legislature by section 92. But section 91 expressly declared that "notwithstanding anything in this Act" the exclusive legislative authority of the Parliament of Canada should extend to all matters coming within the enumerated classes, which plainly indicated that the legislation of that Parliament, so long as it strictly related to those matters, was to be paramount authority. To refuse effect to the declaration would render nugatory some of the legislative powers specially assigned to the Canadian Parliament. For example, among the enumerated classes of subjects, in section 91, were "patents of invention and discovery and copyright." It would be practically impossible for the Dominion Parliament to legislate upon either of these subjects without affecting the property and civil rights of individuals in the provinces. That was not the first occasion on which the legislative limits laid down by sections 91 and 92 had been considered by that board. In Cushing v. Dupuy [5 Ap. Ca. 409] their Lordships had before them the very same question of statutory construction which had been raised in this appeal.

I read that part of the case because I think it very satisfactory to find that in cases where we have this implied authority, this Parliament is paramount in authority as to the provinces. I repeat, therefore, it is very satisfactory to have it so expressly stated in this case which the Privy Council ordered to be reargued, that where we have this authority it shall be paramount to the authority of the provinces.

And it appeared to their lordships that the plenary authority given to the Parliament of Canada by section 91 (15) to legislate in relation to banking transactions, was sufficient to sustain the provisions of the Bank Act which the appellant impugned. On those grounds their lordships had come to the conclusion that the judgments appealed from ought to be affirmed and they would humbly advise Her Majesty to that effect. The appellant must bear the costs of this appeal.

I submit that after those cases we ought to consider it hereafter as pretty well settled. That is the latest case, a case which expressly cited with approval both of the other cases, argued not only before a full Board of the Privy Council, but they called in the Lord Chancellor, and the other learned lord mentioned, so as to give their decision the most distinctive weight possible, and also expressing, as they did, that it was a case of such vast importance to our commerce and banking interests that it was well to have such a decision. If there has been any doubt heretofore about our exceeding our authority, there should be no question hereafter, in my opinion, that we should bother our heads any more about it.

Mr. WELDON. The question raised on this section of the Bill by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) is one of very great importance; that is, primarily, the status of a corporation created by this Parliament that goes into one of the provinces of Canada to carry on its business. The view taken by the hon. member for Bothwell in this respect, I very largely share. It seems to me that when a body is incorporated by this Parliament, it is a fair statement of the case to say: When that creature goes down to a province, it must there take the laws of that province as it finds them; just as you or I Mr. Chairman, going to do business in a particular province, must take the laws of that province as we find them. Take the strongest possible case, the case of an incorporated bank. We have a clause among the Federal powers which says that this Parliament may incorporate banks. I take it that if a bank goes to a city in one of our provinces to do business, it must there conform to the Statute of Frauds if it wishes to make contracts of a certain sort. If in a city there is a fire district, and a by-law providing that buildings within that range must be built of brick, I take it that banking corporations, erecting buildings in that city, within the fire district, must build them of brick. Generally, a corporation is as the member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) says, an artificial creature, with the same rights and duties as natural persons have who live and do business in any province. That would lead me to say: That if the question is as to what tribunal a corporation shall be brought into in case it is alleged to have invaded the rights of persons in a province; it would, of course, go before the ordinary tribunals of the province. If we create a corporation, and if, in the exercise of the franchises which we have undertaken to give it, it invades the rights of private persons or municipalities, it seems to me that these private persons or municipalities alleged to be injured, have a right to say: We will have that question tried out by the ordinary tribunals of the province. I listened carefully to the case of Cushing and Dupuy which my hon. friend (Mr. Tisdale) cited from the Privy Council judgments; also the case of Smith and the Merchants' Bank, decided in our Supreme Court of Canada, and the case in the Law Times Reports decided last December. These three cases all decided one thing. The thing that is very clearly laid down in the case of Cushing and Dupuy, is: That where the British North America Act gives our Parliament certain legislative powers, the grant of power is effective, and they must have as incidental to that grant of power the right to interfere with civil procedure, or civil rights it may be, to the degree that the exercise of their substantive power is thereby made effective, and no further. The burden is thrown on those who defend any Federal interference with civil rights, or with property to show any such necessity. In the case of Cushing and Dupuy, the Lord Chancellor said: You cannot enact a substantive bankruptcy law, destroying preferences, and taking the honest debtor from under the harrow, and leave that law to an effective operation by calling in any existing civil procedure in any province. You have in this Parliament to make your own peculiar bankruptcy procedure. That is a statement we all assent to. In another case they say, auxiliary to a banking law is a section declaring that the assignment of warehouse receipts shall effect a valid transfer of property. That is all that is decided in the case of Smith and the Merchants' Bank: That that clause of the Banking Act which validates the assignment of a warehouse receipt, and makes it operate as a transfer of property, is a necessary part of a valid banking Act; although on the face of it implies an abridgement of the provincial power to legislate as to civil rights. The case which my hon. friend cites from the Privy Council lays down precisely the same rule in precisely the same way. It touches the same section of our Banking Act. They all go to affirm what I said when I began, namely, that the Federal power given in section 91 does not carry with it the right to interfere with civil procedure or property legislation beyond what is necessary to the valid enjoyment of this Federal power. The hon. gentleman has endeavoured to show that the effect of the franchise of the canal company carries with it the right to drag parties before the tribunal of the Privy Council. I think it is necessary to show that the Federal corporation cannot operate effectually unless there is the right to have its differences with any litigant redressed by the committee of the Privy Council. I do not think the hon. gentlemen have made out their case.^c To my mind it is not enough to say that the Railway Act in more parts than one assumes powers cognate with the one in dispute. I think there is more than one section of the Railway Act that is beyond the powers of this Parliament. My contention may be challenged by calling attention to section 101 of the British North America Act, which says:

The Parliament of Canada may, notwithstanding anything in this Act, from time to time, provide for the establishment of any additional courts for the better administration of the laws of Canada.

If this Bill were a substantive law to make the Railway Committee of the Privy Council a Federal court for dealing with all disputes between railways and canals on the one hand and aggrieved parties on the other, I would like to argue that question; but that is not the question before us. After all the section which I am quoting contemplates that the law to be administered is a valid law of Canada. We incorporate the company, and I think we can clothe it with the powers that section 91 and the cognate sections involve; but I think it is an overstatement of Federal powers to say that we can go into the provinces and make Federal corporations there, independent of valid provincial laws.

Mr. TISDALE. I wish to say that I spoke of this principle to the Prime Minister before I brought the Bill up to-night, and he said that he had no doubt about the constitutional authority of the House to pass it. Hearing that there was some discussion on the matter, I took the Bill to him and asked him whether there was anything objectionable in it from a constitutional point of view, and he said there was not. He was quite satisfied that it was within our constitutional power.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I would be better satisfied if the hon. Minister of Justice were here to state his reasons for such an opinion. I entirely agree with the views expressed by the hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon). I think he has conclusively answered the hon. gentleman who has charge of this Bill. In the case he has referred to, Cushing vs. the Queen, it will be seen that while the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council maintained that the legislation did not go beyond the power of the Parliament they did so for the reason that it was a necessary incident to the bankruptcy law, and that without such legislation the law could not exist. If it had been an ordinary corporation, and we had undertaken to create a special rule of procedure when the law already afforded adequate procedure, then the case of Cushing vs. the Queen would not apply, because we would have been going out of our way in so doing. The rule is that you are to look to the grant of the power to legislate on the subject of banking, and see what that implies. How are you to determine to what it applies? You are to look to the previous practice through a long series of years, to ascertain what it was intended to grant, and you will find that the issue of warehouse receipts and things of that kind fell within the class of powers which banks habitually possess. Therefore, the power to legislate on the subject of banks was embraced in these powers. Does that apply in this case? If the hon. member were to undertake by his Bill to provide for all cases of dispute between the canal company and forwarders, with regard to the ownership of freight and the liability of the company, or the amount the company would be entitled to charge, there being nothing of that sort specially set forth in the Act, and that we should create a tribunal to try these cases, or make the Railway Committee of the Privy Council the tribunal, the hon. gentleman would see at once that his position was altogether indefensible. Under the British North America Act, while Parliament has power to create courts, it has not the power to give to an administrative body a judicial power. If you are to have a judicial proceeding for the purpose of settling the rights of parties, it must be before a judicial body, and the determination must be a judicial determination. But apart from that altogether, even under section 101 of the British North America Act, this Parliament may appoint a tribunal to try cases arising under this Act, but it cannot deprive the courts of the provinces of the powers they possess. There is nothing in the Act to enable this Parliament to make its jurisdiction exclusive. I cannot take away any power a provincial court possesses, and when the hon. gentleman proposes not simply to create a tribunal, but to refer to an administrative body the judicial determination of disputes that may arise, not between the company and some forwarder or other person who is doing business through the company, but between the company and an outside party who has no connection with the company, he might just as well say that all cases between a banking corporation and any person who may bring a suit against the bank or against whom the bank may bring a suit, shall be tried by the Railway Committee of the Privy Council. He might as well do the one thing as the other; we have just as much power to do the one as the other. I am not going to press the matter further. I have no desire to prevent the hon. gentleman getting his Bill through. I merely wish that the interests of the parties who are to be affected by the construction of this canal shall be adequately protected, and protected according to law, and I suggest that protection is not being afforded by this provision of the Bill, because it proposes to create a tribunal that will not have jurisdiction after it has been created. There is no more connection between those parties who are the proprietors of land or who may in future be proprietors and the canal company than there is between the canal company and a person in the remotest portion of Canada. There would be just as much propriety in saying that the canal company, in carrying freight for some person residing in Halifax, shall have the dispute decided by the Railway Committee of the Privy Council, as that this matter shall be so decided.

Mr. TISDALE. The hon. gentleman's argument would make it entirely beyond our power to create the arbitration clauses in the Railway Act. In this Bill there is no tribunal created. The hon. gentleman might as well say that the Railway Committee of the Privy Council could not have been made a tribunal to arrange the tolls and freights on the railway.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Not at all.

Mr. TISDALE. The same principle. If it was not for clause 101 there might have been some question. This is simply dealing with a very limited subject that is entirely incident to the exercise and the constitution of a court we create, just as much as giving the power, without appeal, mind you, to a court in regard to the arbitration clause for settling expropriation disputes.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Expropriation is a necessary incident to the very existence.

Mr. HAGGART. As to the first objection of the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), that the Bill should contain a clause proving that, in all future drainages, existent rights shall not be prejudicially affected to a greater extent than if the canal had not been built, there is a good deal to be said in its favour. Parties owning rights, such as drainage rights and the right to a natural course to the river, should not be put in a worse position by the building of the canal than if it had not been built. Such a clause might be embodied in the Bill. but as to the legal objection with reference to the powers of the Dominion and the province traversing one another, surely we have a right to build a canal. The provincial Government have the right to build a ditch, but suppose we give the right to build a canal, which has the paramount authority. There can be no doubt that, under all the decisions, the paramount authority rests with the Dominion Parliament. We have the right to build the canal no matter how it may interfere with the ditch. It is an incident to our power that the canal may cut into the ditch, and it surely is an incident of it that we should provide for the making of the connections necessary for that ditch to enter into the canal. If we have the power, it is the power of eminent domain, and if we have the power of granting it to different companies surely we can provide as to the manner in which they shall exercise it. We have the authority to describe what tribunal shall exercise that power. That is what we have done always under the Railway Act. These cases have occurred again and again. It is embodied in the Railway Act. Surely in chartering a canal company, if the draining of the ditch with the canal is incident to the charter, we have the power of describing in what manner the right of eminent domain shall be exercised.

Mr. OUIMET. The Railway Committee of the Privy Council is a tribunal already in existence, and which has been created by a statute of this Parliament. If section 101 has any application it has in this case.

The Parliament of Canada may, notwithstanding anything in this Act, from time to time, provide for constitution, maintenance and organization of general courts of appeal for Canada and for the establishment of any additional court for the better administration of the laws.

The Railway Committee of the Privy Council is a tribunal created by the Railway Act of Canada, and has been given jurisdiction to hear and settle disputes arising under the operation of various provisions of the Act.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Does the hon. gentleman contend that the Railway Committee of the Privy Council is a court constituted under that section of the Act?

Mr. OUIMET. It is a court created by statute. Its jurisdiction has never been questioned. This Bill proposes to create a corporation with a general power of constructing, maintaining and operating a canal. The authority of this Parliament to enact legislation to that effect under section 94 of the British North America Act cannot be questioned. In the exercise of its powers certain difficulties and disputes must arise, the settlement of which must be devolved to some tribunal. The present Act provides that these disputes may be referred to the Railway Committee of the Privy Council. That is a mere extension of the jurisdiction of the latter; and, I should say, a very wise one.

Bill reported, and read the third time and passed.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE TARIFF.

House again in Committee on Ways and Means.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. CASEY. Mr. Chairman, when you left the Chair at six o'clock I had been quoting from the prophecies indulged in by Sir Charles Tupper as to the prosperity of the iron industry, especially the pig iron industry under the tariff which he then proposed, and I will have to trouble the House with another quotation or two. After dealing with charcoal iron, Sir Charles Tupper said:

Well, Mr. Speaker, twenty years ago iron rails were made in Toronto and Hamilton and within the next twenty years we will make all our own rails.

He went on to say that the Government proposed to exempt steel rails from the tax and continued:

We propose that they shall come in free as they have done in the past, because we consider that should be made an exception. I do not hesitate to say that the adoption of this policy, in my judgment, will place Canada in a position where she will be able to provide her own rails, and that at no distant period, at as reasonable a rate as any country in the world. Why should we not do so? Show me any country possessing as many miles of railway as Canada does that does not manufacture its own rails? It cannot be done. There is no country in the world with 12,000 miles of railway in operation that does not manufacture the rails used there.

Now, Sir, in spite of that hopeful assurance, we do not make our own steel rails yet; I do not know that we are making any rails at all. If we are making any, they must be very few indeed. It is only where we have an almost prohibitive customs barrier against the importation of iron that we are making anything in the way of iron as raw material for manufacturers. We are not making rails, for there we have to enter into competition with the world. Sir Charles Tupper went on to refer to certain steel industries that looked promising, using words which I quoted at another time and which I need not now repeat. Then, Sir, after promising grand prosperity to Nova Scotia, Quebec and Ontario from the growth of the iron industry he asks:

And what more? Across the Rocky Mountains, need I tell you that in British Columbia you have one of the most magnificent deposits of iron ore on Texada Island—(30 miles long and 5 miles wide)—that is to be found in any place in the world, rich in the highest degree in iron, and that you have the Nanaimo coal field to furnish fuel to put blast furnaces in operation at an early day, lying within 30 miles of Texada Island. I say, that with the prospect of opening up trade with Australia, with China and Japan, although I am not a prophet nor the son of a prophet—

I notice that he did not deny the possibility of his being the father of a prophet—

I believe that at no distant day you will have in the province of British Columbia an iron industry built up which will compare favourably with that of any other industry in this country.

Now, Sir, we still have the iron ore at Texada Island; we still have the coal at Nanaimo—and that coal is being mined, but not being taken to Texada Island to smelt the iron ore—we have our attempt to open trade with Australia and China and Japan; but we have no smelting industry in British Columbia yet. I must skip a great deal, that is interesting in Sir Charles Tupper's speech and refer finally to his estimate of the addition that would be made to the population. I quoted a little while ago remarks which show that he expected twenty thousand men to be employed in making pig iron—which would mean an increase of 100,000 to the population. Now, seven years afterwards we have about a thousand men employed in this industry:

Now this estimate of an increased population of 100,000 souls does not take into account the manufacturer of castings and forgings, cutlery and edged tools, hardware, machinery and engines, or steel rails. Were we to manufacture these articles now imported, and there is no reason why we should not steadily progress to that point—the population I have mentioned of 100,000 souls would be no less than trebled.

Let us see how the production has increased ; let us see how the employment for men has extended. Sir Charles Tupper states that our consumption of pig iron, leaving steel rails out of the question, was 250,000 tons in 1887. Last year, according to the statistics given in this House, we only used 133,000 tons of pig iron. Instead of the business increasing, instead of the consumption of pig iron increasing, it has decreased to the extent of 117,000 tons, if the figures given by Sir Charles Tupper in 1887 and by the Finance Minister now are correct. Now, Mr. Chairman, this is the last quotation with which I need trouble the House. I have gone into it at some length for the purpose of showing how fallacious were the promises by which we were induced to place these burdens upon our shoulders. The production of pig iron has averaged less since that time than before. We were promised a very large increase in population in connection with the making of this iron. It has not come to us ; we have not had that benefit. We have only employed one-twentieth of the men we were promised would be employed in that industry. We were promised that this would not be a heavy burden on the consumer. We find that it has been so heavy a burden that it has retarded very seriously the development of industries using pig iron. And, beyond all this, the ordinary consumers of iron, amongst whom the farmers, I think, hold the first place, who were promised a market for their productions in return for the burdens laid upon their shoulders, have been obliged to bear those burdens, but they had not had the additional market. The whole scheme is proven to be a failure, for we are not securing a home market for Canadian produce. For all these reasons, Sir, I cannot see that we are in any way justified in maintaining these heavy burdens upon the people. It is purely a tax for the benefit of four concerns mentioned by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries—Londonderry, Ferrona, Radnor Forges, and one other. For the benefit of those four institutions employing about a thousand men we are taxing the country in one shape or another to the extent of over $600,000. It is, as I have said with regard to the tax on coal oil, one of those instances in which the most private negotiations and consultations between the Government and the parties interested should be laid before the House and the country, and it should be made clear to us for whose benefit these taxes have been imposed. It has been clearly shown that they are not imposed for the benefit of the country at large.

Item agreed to.

Type for printing, 20 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. INNES. Some time ago representations were made to the Minister of Finance with respect to lowering the duty on type, which is the raw material, as he well knows, of publishers not only of newspapers but also of books. I hold in my hand a letter received from the officers of the Printers, Publishers and Bookbinders' Association of the Dominion, which I think was brought to the attention of the Finance Minister some time ago, in which they represent that this industry employs 30,000 hands. It is a matter of very great importance to them to get their raw material at a lower figure than they are charged at the present time. At the last meeting of the Press Association a resolution also was passed to appoint a committee to wait on the Finance Minister to ask for a revision of the tariff on printers' supplies and a reduction of the duty on stereotype plates. I believe that that deputation waited on the Minister of Finance ; I do not know, of course, what answer he gave them, or whether he made any promises to them, but judging from the duties in the present tariff, he does not seem inclined to make any concession to this very important industry in the country.

Mr. FOSTER. Oh, yes ; several concessions have been made.

Mr. INNES. With respect to the stereotype plates, the press generally is united in regard to the very high rate put upon this class of material that is now largely used in the composition of newspapers. The other day I cut out of the Ottawa 'Citizen,' a paper that is friendly to and supports the present Administration, the following paragraph :

The Finance Minister has adopted the principle of replacing specific by ad valorem duties, and in this respect we think he has taken a wise departure. But the metamorphosis is not complete and there are still certain exceptions to the rule which call for reformation. One of these is the article of stereotyped plates, upon which exorbitant duties are levied to foster a Canadian monopoly. Publishers here who desire to avail themselves of the superior service furnished from Buffalo are compelled to pay $1.95 duty upon goods whose price ranges from $1.20 to $2. Any industry which cannot stand without being protected to this extent ought to be allowed to go. In considering the tariff resolutions in detail in committee it is to be hoped that Mr. Foster will see that the principle which he has acknowledged and adopted as the basis of the changes he is making shall be consistently adhered to in dealing with this particular article.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I think that upon this one particular item there is a universal demand for a lower duty, and I believe that the Minister of Finance should make some concessions to the wishes of the publishers throughout the whole Dominion.

Item agreed to.

Barbed wire fencing of iron or steel, three-fourths of a cent per pound.

Mr. CHARLTON. I would ask the Minister of Finance if he cannot possibly make that item free? He has not made many concessions to the agricultural interests of this country, and although he has made a reduction on the duty in this case, he would do a very gracious and proper thing if he put it on the free list. The prices of produce are very low, farmers are having hard times, the prospects ahead for them are not very favourable by any means, and no producing interest in this Dominion is more deserving the consideration of the Government than they. Farming forms the basis of all business and all prosperity, but it has not received at the hands of the Government the consideration it is entitled to. Very little concession has been made in the matter of coal oil, and if barbed wire were placed on the free list the farmers of the country will feel inclined, I am certain to thank the Government for having done them justice in this respect. I ask the Minister of Finance to transfer this item to the free list.

Mr. FOSTER. I would be very glad to transfer it to the free list if it could be done, but a reduction of one-half has been made, and putting it on the free list would be a little further advantage to the farmer, but at the same time, it would destroy the work of some eight or nine mills that are making barbed wire in Canada, and I think that when a reduction of one-half is made it is a very large reduction.

Mr. CHARLTON. We have the Minister of Finance and his fellow Ministers from time to time making concessions and passing Orders in Council for the purpose of relieving from various burthens the manufacturing industries of this country. We have had Orders in Council putting raw materials for manufacturers, time after time upon the free list; a list that would cover columns of articles that they have taken from the dutiable list and put upon the free list without consulting this House. When there is such a disposition shown by the Government to benefit the manufacturing industries of this country—which I do not say is improper at all—I think the Government are making an invidious distinction when they fail to remove burdens from the shoulders of the farmers as well. The farmers of this country are in straightened circumstances; the prices of all kinds of produce are very low, it is a difficult thing for them to make expenses and pay mortgage interest; they are not enjoying prosperity as the manufacturers are, and in view of the concessions that have been made by the Government to manufacturers; the farmers have a right to demand that something more shall be done for them than has been done in the arrangement of the duties under this tariff.

Mr. FOSTER. We have done a good deal for them.

Mr. CHARLTON. The farmers have no show here.

Item agreed to.

Mr. CHARLTON.

Sewing machines or parts thereof 30 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. INNES. I wish to bring to the attention of the Minister of Finance a disadvantage that the manufacturers of sewing machines in Canada are subjected to by the alteration of the duty on these articles. There are now only two sewing machine factories in the country, one of which is situated in the city of Guelph, where I reside, and the manufacturer there, Mr. Charles Raymond, makes the following statement:—

Mr. Chas. Raymond had estimated roughly that on each machine the new duty would deprive him of $1.40 to $1.50 of the former protection, while he would save only 5 cents a machine on his raw material. The old duty was $3 a machine and 20 per cent; the new 30 per cent. Machines were now invoiced from the States at $16; the old duty was $6.20, the new $4.80. Several of his attachments were not made in this country, he imported his needles, with a 30 per cent duty, and the Canadian iron was too hard for his work, so he had to bring in Scotch iron. For iron alone his machine cost him to make $1 more than the Americans could do it for. He was not exporting; this drawback on iron alone put him out of competition with the Americans and Germans. Where the Standard Co. would turn out 500 or 1000 machines, he would turn out 100 or 200, and all his expenses of manufacture and sale had to be charged to his limited output, such as the Canadian market would justify. Under the Mackenzie tariff they had no iron duties, but some machines were brought in invoiced as low as $4. This class of machine had gone out of use now. Mr. Raymond spoke very strongly against the exactious of the screw combines or Canadian Screw Co. At one time they had been content with a fair price, but another concern started, the two pooled their output, prices were jumped one third higher, but still a shade lower than the high duty and freight added to the American price. The Government should put the product of such combines on the free list to bring them to their senses.

Therefore in this respect alone, the sewing machine manufacturers in Canada are now placed at a much greater disadvantage under the amended tariff than they were under the old tariff.

Item agreed to.

Buckthorn and strip fencing of iron or steel, one-half of one cent per pound.

Mr. ROWAND. I would like to know from the Finance Minister why he has made a distinction between these three kinds of wire. This is a more ornamental wire than the other, but it is coming into use more generally every day, and I think the Minister might have made a reduction in the duty. The use of barbed wire is considered very cruel, and a good many people do not like to use it in lanes or around barnyards. There are other wires that are very nice and perhaps just as useful as the barbed wire, and I do not see why the Minister of Finance should not make a reduction on all fence wires.

Mr. FOSTER. This is more of an ornamental arrangement.

Mr. ROWAND. It is both ornamental and useful.

Mr. FOSTER. It is useful for gardens and around farm houses.

Mr. ROWAND. Yes, and in narrow lanes and barnyards, and some use it on their front fences, too.

Item agreed to.

Lead bars, block and sheets, 50 cents per 100 lbs.

Mr. BARNARD. I regret that the Government have not seen their way to increase the duty upon lead. I think the representatives of British Columbia during the last four or five years have several times brought the matter to the attention of the Government, because it is an industry that is thriving in British Columbia, and is one that deserves some encouragement. The production of the lead mines is very large there, and that industry, although in its infancy, produces as much lead in British Columbia as has been used throughout the Dominion. The quantity of lead that was imported into Canada last year and manufactured into different articles, amounted to 6,000 tons, and the province of British Columbia produced an amount equivalent to that. Very large lead works have been erected in the province of British Columbia, and a sum of about $250,000 was invested on Kootenay Lake last year, by some American capitalists, in large smelting works which have been erected for treating lead ores, and turning out lead, with the expectation of finding a market in Canada. The American Government has imposed a duty of 1½ cents a pound upon the lead in the ore, which is equivalent to $30 a ton; whereas the duty we are imposing on lead imported into Canada, amounts, on lead bars, blocks and sheets, to 60 cents per hundred pounds, which is about $12 per ton; and on lead scrap, and old lead scrap and bar, 40 cents a hundred pounds, which is equivalent to $8 a ton. I think the lead industry is entitled to as much encouragement as the iron industry. The iron industry is encouraged by duties ranging from 35 to nearly 60 per cent; whereas, if we take the average value of lead at 4 cents a pound, we are only protecting it to the extent of 12½ or 15 per cent. I regret that the Government have not seen fit to encourage this industry in British Columbia, and if they will look into the matter I think they will see that they would be warranted in doing so.

Mr. BOWERS. A great deal of this rough lead in bars is required by fishermen in the Maritime Provinces; and, as this tariff as amended, has raised the duty on a great many other things used by the fishermen and lumbermen in the Maritime Provinces, more especially in the shape of cordage and meat, I think the duty on lead is quite high enough.

Item agreed to.

Telephone and telegraph instruments; telegraph, telephone and electric light cables; electric and galvanic batteries, electric motors and apparatus, n.e.s., 25 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. FOSTER. After "motors," I want to add "generators, dynamos, sockets, and electric apparatus."

Item agreed to.

Corset clasps, spoon clasps or busks, blanks, busks, side steels and other corset steels, whether plain, japanned, lacquered, tinned or covered with paper or cloth; also back, bone or corset wires, covered with paper or cloth, cut to lengths and tipped with brass or tin, or untipped or in coils, 5 cents per pound and 20 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. McMULLEN. Why is there an ad valorem as well as a specific duty?

Mr. FOSTER. There is a special manufactory, and if my hon. friend will look at the old tariff, he will find there was a much higher duty. We have reduced the duty, but found it inadvisable to take off the whole of the specific with the ad valorem, and keep the industry.

Mr. LANGELIER. It appears to me that clasps and eyelets used in the manufacture of corsets, have to pay a duty, but when those articles are used in the manufacture of boots and shoes, they are put on the free list. They are raw materials for the manufacture of corsets as well as for the manufacture of boots and shoes. I have been asked to mention this matter to the Government by the member for St. Hyacinthe (Mr. Bernier) who told me the other day that there is a manufactory of corsets in his constituency, and they would like very much to have these articles put on the free list, because they are an important raw material in their industry.

Mr. WALLACE. Those used for corsets are made in this country, but those used in the manufacture of boots and shoes, are not.

Mr. LANGELIER. I think that eyelets and clasps for the manufacture of corsets should also be put on the free list. Where is there a manufacture of corset clasps for the protection of which this duty is imposed?

Mr. FOSTER. In Gananoque.

Mr. TAYLOR. While we are discussing the question of the free list, I want to make a suggestion to the Government. I see on the free list, shoe buttons, metal glove fasteners, eyelet hooks for boots and shoes, and lacings for boots. We have had in Gananoque for the last twelve years, an industry making these hooks and lacings, and they are on the free list. I hope the Minister of Finance will make note of that, and put them on the dutiable where they were last year.

Mr. LAURIER. That is an infant industry.

Mr. TAYLOR. It has been in existence for ten or twelve years, and supplying the trade.

Mr. LANGEIJER. If the duty is not completely abolished, I think it should be reduced. Heretofore, the duty has been 5 cents per pound, and 30 per cent ad valorem, and now it is proposed to keep the 5 cents per pound duty, and make it 20 per cent ad valorem. If protection is to be given to the infant industry at Gananoque, I think the same attention should be also paid to the much larger industry for which this is a raw material.

Item agreed to.

Coffins and caskets, 25 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. CHARLTON. Could not my hon. friend the Finance Minister allow the dead to escape?

Mr. FOSTER. We are letting them off easy; we are reducing the duty.

Mr. McMULLEN. In case of a body coming into Canada in a coffin made in the United States, do you charge duty upon the coffin?

Mr. FOSTER. No it has not been done.

Mr. McMULLEN. Have there not been some cases in which duties have been demanded?

Mr. FOSTER. Some little delay did take place in one case, but the question was adjusted.

Mr. CHARLTON. Did they pay the duty?

Mr. FOSTER. No.

Item agreed to.

Farm and freight wagons, carts, drays and similar vehicles, twenty-five per cent ad valorem.

Mr. CHARLTON. Could not my hon. friend reduce the duties on these wagons?

Mr. FOSTER. We have reduced them very largely.

Mr. CHARLTON. How much were they before?

Mr. FOSTER. They were charged a mixed duty, amounting to 56 or 70 per cent; it is now reduced to 25 per cent.

Mr. LANGEIJER. I would like to call the attention of the Government to some statements made to me last summer by a dealer in these carts and wagons. He told me there is a regular system at some of the custom-houses of putting a discretionary valuation on these articles. He mentioned, for instance, a certain firm in Ohio which advertised that they would send to anybody, on receipt of $100, either three covered wagons or four uncovered wagons delivered at the address of the sender. I was surprised to notice the cheapness of these goods, and my friend told me they were good wagons. He told me he was not interested, that it made no difference to him whether he sold Canadian or American wagons. But when I asked him why he sold the Canadian buggies, which were so much dearer than these others, he told me that he could not import these from Ohio, that he had tried it, but the customs placed the duty upon such a high valuation as to make the duty at 35 per cent prohibitive, and so he had to confine himself to selling the Canadian article. I think the attention of the Government should be called to that, so that they may see to it that no fancy valuations are put upon these articles.

Mr. WALLACE. The duty was not 35 per cent; it was $10 specific and 20 per cent ad valorem. There could not be an arbitrary valuation.

Mr. CHARLTON. Was there no chance for an arbitrary valuation under that 20 per cent ad valorem?

Mr. WALLACE. But the larger portion of the duty was specific. Of course, if there was a higher valuation than the article was worth or than the market price in the United States, the importer had the right to appeal and produce his evidence. This he did not do.

Mr. CHARLTON. It is very well to tell men with small invoices and in dread of customs officials—

Mr. WALLACE. It costs nothing to appeal; and there need be no dread.

Mr. CHARLTON. It would seem that in many cases, where the invoice prices have not been high enough to satisfy the custom-house officers, those prices have been made higher.

Mr. WALLACE. There is no evidence of that.

Mr. CHARLTON. I believe this power of valuation has been abused by custom-house officers in the case of buggies, carriages, reapers, threshing machines, ploughs, and so on. I have heard of cases where I believe this was done. It is a very high-handed act, but the general impression among importers seems to be that there is very little use to appeal, because it is all part of a system to make the protective tariff more efficient. There should be some safeguard for importers. Of course, there may be cases where the attempt is made to defraud the customs by means of undervaluation, and I would not think of facilitating operations of that kind. But if there is a disposition to the arbitrary use of the power which now rests in the hands of the customs officer to raise the valuation of an article, then it becomes at once a dangerous power, and the liability to abuse soon causes that abuse to be an accomplished fact.

Mr. FOSTER. The importer can appeal and get justice.

Mr. LAURIER. Surely the Minister of Finance and the Controller must have seen the letter of Mr. Mills, of the firm of Lyman & Co., published only a few days ago, stating that in such a case it is impossible to get justice?

Mr. WALLACE. Mr. Mills has made a number of misstatements in his letter. Moreover, all the complaints that he himself has preferred to the department have been carefully considered, and, I think, satisfactorily adjusted.

Mr. LAURIER. Not satisfactorily to him.

Mr. WALLACE. His demand is that there shall be established a board of customs, and such a board already exists.

Mr. LAURIER. But he says it is a dead letter.

Mr. WALLACE. It is not a dead letter. We consult daily the members of our Board of Customs, and get the opinions of our most competent appraisers on every difficult case that comes up. And, as soon as this tariff is through, the members of the Board of Customs and the most experienced of the appraisers will be called to meet here and give their opinions on matters in dispute.

Mr. LAURIER. The hon. gentlemen take issue with the statement of the member for Quebec Centre (Mr. Langelier), that injustice arises, and declare that there is a remedy. I quote the opinion of a man who has to deal with the Customs Department, and who says that he never receives satisfaction. Now, the Controller of Customs says that this gentleman did receive justice. That is a question between the Controller and Mr. Mills. Perhaps, when the matter is discussed more in detail later on, we may be able to consider this point more fully. I only wished to show that there are occasions, in the opinion of those who deal with the Customs Department, when justice cannot be had.

Mr. WALLACE. Mr. Mills has not cited one case of injustice or wrong-doing, and the statements that he makes are entirely incorrect; they are the statements of a man knowing nothing of the law or how it is administered. If he had any specific grievances and would mention them, that would be a ground to work upon.

Mr. LANGELIER. I have a case that came under my personal knowledge. This did not happen during the incumbency of the present Controller of Customs, but two years ago. In Quebec there is a very important firm of leather manufacturers, whose establishments are in the constituency of my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition. I do not give their name, but they are a firm of the highest standing. One day, two years ago, there entered their office a gentleman who called himself a special officer of the Customs Department. He gave his name as Mr. Belton, from Toronto. There was nothing to show that he was an officer of the customs, he was completely unknown in Quebec, and he might as well have come from China as from Toronto. He said to these gentlemen: You are using a machine in your factory which has been undervalued in the custom-house. They gave him all the facts. They said: We have received it from a firm of manufacturers in the United States, and here is a catalogue giving all the prices at which they could deliver the machines at our factory at Quebec. We sent them the money, and they sent us the machine and a man to run it for a month. The machine had been in use for two years, and these men were pounced upon by that gentleman, who asked them to pay $500, or else have the machine confiscated. They then sent for me to find out whether such a thing could be done, and that is the way I happened to become acquainted with the circumstances. When Mr. Belton saw that they were reluctant to pay the fine, he said: You have got another machine which has been in use for five years, and which was brought in exactly the same way, and the price you paid is not the price for which it is sold at the place of manufacture. They replied: We do not know at how much it is sold for, all we know is from the catalogue which we received, and upon which we sent our order, and upon which we got two machines. Well, eventually, in order to get rid of that man—because he could have seriously interfered with their business—they paid one-half the fine; and the head of the establishment said to me: See what a country we are living in. The Government talk about encouraging manufactures, and this is the way manufactures are being encouraged. We are fined because we cannot be sorcerers, because a man would require to be a sorcerer to know at how much that machine was sold, unless by the catalogue. Up to the present time that firm does not know the price upon which the customs duties should be charged, they have to take the arbitrary price fixed by that customs officer. He has made a special or fanciful valuation. The law says that the valuation is the market value at the place where the article is manufactured. But how can a man in this country know the market value of an article manufactured in a foreign country except by the catalogue? In this case, because those men did not know the market value in the country of manufacture otherwise than by the catalogue, they were fined a large amount. It is easy to say that they might have applied to the Board of Customs, but in the meantime their works would have been stopped.

Item agreed to.

Railway cars, sleighs, cutters, wheel-barrows and hand carts, 30 per cent.

Mr. CHARLTON. Is not that rather high on all those articles, except railway cars?

Mr. TAYLOR. Every town in the country is making them.

Mr. CHARLTON. Perhaps we could build them a little cheaper. We have the material and the labour.

Mr. FOSTER. Competition keeps that down.

Item agreed to.

Pianofortes, 35 per cent.

Parts of pianofortes, 25 per cent.

Mr. CHARLTON. Why are the parts made 25 per cent and the whole instrument complete 35 per cent?

Mr. FOSTER. The parts are less than the whole. The parts are imported to be put up by the manufacturer.

Mr. CHARLTON. What parts are imported?

Mr. FOSTER. Tongues, the speaking parts.

Mr. CHARLTON. I suppose my hon. friend has made himself acquainted with the details of this business. We require information as to what parts are imported, for what parts we are dependent upon foreign manufacturers?

Mr. WALLACE. The framework and the outside parts are always made here.

Item agreed to.

Musical instruments of all kinds, n.e.s., 25 per cent.

Mr. LANGEЛИER. I do not know of any manufactory of musical instruments used by brass bands.

Mr. WALLACE. Whaley, Royce & Co., of Toronto, manufacture all kinds of brass instruments used by bands.

Item agreed to.

All sugar above No. 16 Dutch Standard in colour, and all refined sugar and molasses, n.o.p., 1 $\frac{1}{2}$ ¢. per pound.

Mr. CHARLTON. We profess to have free sugar. This duty of 64-100ths of a cent, as a protection to refined sugar, is too high. It places a vast sum of money in the pockets of the refiners unnecessarily. In the United States, after a long quarrel about this matter between the sugar refiners and the Finance Committee, they finally settled upon 4-10ths of a cent per pound, and have reduced it since to 1 $\frac{1}{2}$ th of a cent, which was considered sufficient protection to the refiners.

Mr. FOSTER. The latest is 40 per cent.

Mr. CHARLTON. As I understand it, the difference between raw and refined sugar is 1 $\frac{1}{2}$ th of a cent per pound. When the discussion took place in this House two years ago the utmost claimed was 3 $\frac{1}{2}$ ths cents of a pound in favour of the American refiner on the cost of refining sugar, and it was necessary to have a protection of about 3 $\frac{1}{2}$ ths of a cent per pound. That statement was clearly set forth, and from the best information we could obtain the refiners of Canada, owing to certain natural disadvantages in regard to freight and so forth, were placed at a disadvantage equivalent to 2-10ths of a cent per pound as compared with their American competitors, and a protection of 3-10ths of a cent per pound was ample to protect them against any competition. With that protection they would be unable to put in their pockets a very large sum after selling in the market at prices at which they will be obliged to sell in order to control the market, but the protection was then made 8-10ths of a cent per pound for their benefit; with this duty of 64-100ths of a cent, the refiners will be able to make, in addition to a fair profit, such a profit as their American competitors would have to be satisfied with, 3-10ths of a cent on every pound refined. The law will place the refiner in a position to make a profit of at least 3-10ths of a cent per pound, besides the legitimate profit on which he should conduct his business. We have played into the hands of the refiners long enough. Under the old arrangement of 8-10ths of a cent, the refiners were obtaining from the country from \$1,500,000 to \$2,000,000 more than the profits to which they were entitled. They were making enormous fortunes, and under this arrangement they will make \$1,200,000 to \$1,500,000 at least, besides a fair profit. It is an outrageous proposition to take from the pockets of the consumers of sugar such an enormous sum of money and place it in the pockets of those who are of course friendly to the Government, and no doubt do handsomely by the Government, but in the interests of the people we have no business to so adjust the tariff as to enable the refiners to charge 3-10ths or 4-10ths of a cent more for sugar than the price at which they are able to sell sugar and make a living profit. If the Government should place the duty at 4-10ths of a cent, this would afford the refiner ample protection, and even then he would be receiving at least 1-10th of a cent more for his sugar than he should obtain. I must protest against this arrangement, knowing as I do from the discussions in the United States and from the data we obtained from the old Depression Committee of 1876 that this duty is that much too high, and I trust the Government will arrange the matter on a different basis, and content themselves with giving the refiner such a measure of protection as that to which they are entitled, and nothing more. I do not think they are entitled to any protection, and that the farmers and consumers should obtain sugar at cost price, but if the Government intend to secure the refining of sugar in Canada it is surely not necessary to hand over to the refiners \$1,500,000 more than is necessary for that business.

Mr. McMULLEN. I think it is well that I should emphasize the remarks of my hon. friend, who in a clear manner has pointed out the injury which must follow the operation of the tariff as framed. The consumption of sugar for the year before last was about 350,000,000 pounds; last year it was 250,000,000 pounds. Taking the rate of 64-100 of a cent per pound the tariff will give the refiners a clear profit over and above imported sugar of $1,500,000. Take that rate on all refined sugar in this country, and it is apparent that $1,600,000 is paid to the refiners for refining the sugar used here. A small quantity will no doubt be brought in under No. 16 Dutch standard, which may be used in place of refined sugar, but I have no doubt that $1,500,000 will be received by the refiners from sugar under the operation of this tariff. I do not think it necessary that they should be granted this protection and continued this advantage. Sugar refiners have been making enormous fortunes; they have been able to retire and live in England or Scotland, purchase mansions and live like lords, after spending a few years in this country in the business of refining sugar. When we find men like Senator Drummond, receiving a larger salary than the Governor General, this amount being paid on account of his salary as managing director of the Redpath Sugar Refinery of Montreal, it is apparent that sugar refining is not an infant industry. The very fact that a sugar refinery in Montreal is able to pay its managing director $60,000 a year is clear and positive proof that the industry is not starving and is not lacking in protection. If that has been the experience of sugar refiners in the past, it is not right that this system should be continued to their advantage. We should cut down their profits to a fine point, just sufficient to enable them to retain our market, but when it is proposed to hand out of the pockets of the consumers of sugar $1,500,000 dollars a year, simply and solely for the purpose of inducing the refiners to continue their business and enable them to amass enormous fortunes it is time we called a halt.

Mr. WELDON. If the hon. gentleman had been well acquainted with the real nature of the operations of the great change that has been made in the sugar duties, he would not have spoken so injudiciously as he has done to-night. The people of the Lower Provinces, who are well acquainted with West India sugars, and who in old days imported a great many of them, approve highly of the change made, by which sugars up to and including No. 16 Dutch standard are admitted duty free. I remember in old days buying sugar for my own household, a beautiful sugar which came in and which will come in on the free list, a sugar which grades No. 16, and is one of the strongest and best sugars that can be put on the market. Our Lower Province people, who are familiar with the West India trade, are without exception congratulating the Government on the very great change they have made, so that the poor man has no possible grievance on this matter of sugar. There are no advantages given to the sugar refiners that will impress him in the slightest degree. Most of us would think life very tolerable if he could have the clear, bright, strong, sweet sugar which comes in up to and including No. 16. For my own part I heartily congratulate the Government on what they are giving us.

Mr. McMULLEN. I do not grumble at placing sugars up to No. 16 on the free list. It is a proper step, but I complain of the duty of 64-100ths on refined sugar.

Mr. WELDON. That is paid for by the rich.

Mr. McMULLEN. The hon. gentleman does not mean to say that the people will use nothing but brown sugar up to No. 16 Dutch standard. Those accustomed to use refined sugar in their tea and coffee will not easily discard it, even although brown sugar is placed on the free list. No doubt brown sugar will be used more than in the past, and the action of the Government is a step in the right direction. If the hon. gentleman thought I was finding fault with it, he was mistaken. My complaint is that under the tariff we will give the sugar refiners at least $1,500,000 profit more than they would obtain if their products were brought into competition with the sugars of the United States on a fair basis.

Mr. BARNARD. The hon. gentleman who has just addressed the committee will no doubt be astonished to learn the fact that the reduction in duties on sugars has compelled the Vancouver refinery to close its doors. It is thus evident that the profits derived are not so great as is generally supposed. The company were doing a very fair business during two or three years, but the present reduction has caused them to close their doors.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The Government, no doubt, have taken a step in the right direction in including No. 15 and No. 16 Dutch standard in the free list; but when the hon. gentleman (Mr. Barnard) says that a sugar refinery closed because it was unable to make a profit on its undertaking, all I can say is that it was closed because of an existing and stronger refinery within the country which was able to crowd it out.

Mr. BARNARD. No, no.

Mr. FOSTER. Quite the reverse; it was the Hong Kong sugar that closed it up.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The process of refining is simply a process of washing. There is no manufacturing industry in this country that requires so small an expenditure of labour and of money to produce the refined article as in the case of sugar refining. It is simply very little more than a washer-woman's business.

Mr. FOSTER. You were never through one, I am afraid.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Some years ago I studied the process of refining from the production of sugar in its crude state until it is converted into the refined article, and I am satisfied there is no industry in the world that needs less protection. In the city of Vancouver the raw sugar must have come from the same country as the refined sugar—the East Indies—and if the refinery closed there, it was simply because the people preferred sugar No. 16 in the raw state to refined sugar.

Mr. FOSTER. It is refined sugar.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The process of refining is very cheap, and an industry of that sort requires no very great protection. What I rose specially to make inquiries about is: What are we to understand by "refined sugars?" Does it imply that refined sugar below 16 Dutch standard would be taxed?

Mr. FOSTER. Certainly, all refined sugar.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Does the hon. gentleman count West India sugar that is dried on the centrifugal wheel as refined sugar? If so, this whole thing is an illusion. If that is the meaning of this, then the whole contention of the hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon) is upon a mistaken view or construction of these words. If sugars dried on the centrifugal wheel are to be counted refined sugars, then this paragraph will exclude all sugars over 14 Dutch standard.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Sixteen Dutch standard.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I say that centrifugal sugars, which are almost the only sugars above 14 Dutch standard, will be excluded under this provision, if counted as refined sugars. They go through no refining process except the process exercised upon them by centrifugal force. They are sometimes clarified by water being dropped into the wire basket in which the sugar is contained until they are nearly as white as loaf sugar, and sometimes an aniline dye is dropped on them, which reduces the colour, with the object of bringing them down to the particular colour of Dutch standard. If these sugars are to be counted refined sugars, then this provision will not alter the tariff to any appreciable degree.

Mr. FOSTER. It gives the advantage of two degrees.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Not if you include centrifugal sugars as refined. Does the hon. gentleman say that they are to be counted as refined? If he does, then this paragraph will mislead the public as it is misleading the hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon).

Mr. STAIRS. I do not see how the Minister of Finance, of whom the question was asked by the hon. member for Bothwell, could count centrifugal sugars as refined sugars, for the simple reason that they are not refined sugars. They never were treated as refined under the old tariff, and there is no change in the wording now. The only change is that the limit is raised from 14 to 16 Dutch standard, so as to allow sugar of a brighter colour to come in.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell).

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I would rather have that answer from the Minister of Finance.

Mr. LAURIER. Is that the answer of the Government?

Mr. FOSTER. It is a very good answer.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Does the Minister of Finance accept it?

Mr. FOSTER. Do not press me.

Mr. CHARLTON. Does the Government expect to realize any revenue from this duty?

Mr. FOSTER. Not very much.

Mr. CHARLTON. How much revenue did we get last year?

Mr. FOSTER. About $80,000 last year.

Mr. CHARLTON. That shows that this is a very effective protection. I repeat that the duty is one-half higher than is necessary to secure the manufacture of this sugar in the country, and that the Minister of Finance is giving the refining industry an undue advantage. The truth of that assertion is borne out by the action of the United States Government, which placed the duty on refined sugar at about one-half the amount this Government has placed on the same article.

Mr. McMULLEN. Will the grades of West Indies sugar come in under this list, as proposed by the gentlemen who came from the West Indies last year?

Mr. FOSTER. Of course.

Item agreed to.

Syrup of all kinds, the product of the sugar cane or beet-root, n.e.s., and all imitations thereof or substitutes therefor, 1½c. per pound.

Mr. FOSTER. After "syrups" add "and molasses," and after "kinds" add "n.o.p."

Mr. CHARLTON. How much does this amount to per gallon? What is the weight of an imperial gallon?

Mr. DALY. Thirteen and three-quarter pounds.

Mr. CHARLTON. That is about 7 cents a gallon. I see that in the American tariff molasses under 56 degrees polariscope test is charged 2 cents a gallon.

Mr. KENNY. What about the duty on sugar?

Mr. CHARLTON. The duty on refined sugar is about half what it is here.

Mr. FOSTER. Ours is only 1½ cents per pound up to 60. We are more liberal than they are.

Mr. KENNY. The hon. member for North Norfolk has told the committee that the duty on sugar in the United States under the proposed tariff is less than we impose under this tariff.

Mr. CHARLTON. No. I said that the difference between 16 Dutch standard and refined sugar is less. Under the Wilson Bill there is a duty on brown sugar and a duty on refined sugar, but the difference between the two is less than it is here. The protection given to our refiners is greater—is in fact enough to enable them to put three-tenths of a cent a pound in their pocket above what is necessary to protect them.

Mr. KENNY. The Canadian duty is 64-100ths of a cent per pound, and the hon. gentleman knows that it costs about 60-100ths of a cent to manufacture raw sugar into refined.

Mr. CHARLTON. No.

Mr. KENNY. If the hon. gentleman has faithfully read the discussion that has taken place in the United States Congress, he will have discovered that. If he has noticed the report of the Finance Committee of the Senate he will find that the duty on sugar is to be 40 per cent on raw sugar and one-eighth of a cent additional on refined, which would make the duty, estimating crystals at about 3 cents a pound, over 15 $\frac{1}{8}$ ths of a cent on refined sugar.

Mr. CHARLTON. I am very happy that the hon. member for Halifax has so clearly borne out the statement I made. I stated that the difference between refined sugar and raw sugar is $\frac{1}{8}$ th of a cent a pound in the United States, whereas the difference here is 64-100ths of a cent a pound. The difference in the United States is sufficient to afford the refiner protection, and if it is sufficient there it ought to be sufficient in Canada. The refiner in Canada is enabled by the Government to put into his pocket from 30-100ths of a cent to 35-100ths of a cent per pound above what is necessary to hold this market; and this explains how it is that Mr. Drummond receives \$60,000 a year.

Mr. FOSTER. Does he?

Mr. CHARLTON. It is reported that he does. It explains why a sugar refiner can live in his Chiselhurst palace in Europe like a prince. The wealth of these refiners is made at the expense of the people of this country and by the connivance of this Government who are affording them vastly more protection than they require; and that is what we protest against.

Mr. McMULLEN. Is there an increase in the duty on molasses or syrup?

Mr. FOSTER. There is an increase in molasses of a kind that is not included in "a" and "b" below; that is a molasses that would not be and ought not to be edible.

Mr. HASLAM. In regard to the contention of the hon. member for North Norfolk that this protection all goes into the pockets of the refiners, I may say that in the quarter ending the 31st of March, there was 894,000 pounds of refined sugar imported from China into Vancouver; that was under the old tariff.

Mr. CHARLTON. You had the Canadian Pacific Railway rates to contend with against getting sugar from anywhere else.

Mr. BOWERS. Has not the duty on syrups been raised?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes. Syrups before was 8-10ths of a cent per pound; now they are 5-10ths of a cent.

Mr. BOWERS. I think there is a mistake here; that 8-10ths of a cent must be wrong. I think it was about 1 $\frac{1}{2}$ cents a gallon before. I am informed by importers in St. John that the duty is now equal to 7 cents or 8 cents a gallon, which excludes syrups from New York of a better quality than are made in Canada, and which they were selling for 30 cents a gallon, but which they cannot now sell for less than 36 cents or 37 cents.

Mr. FOSTER. Then they have been importing syrups that had no saccharine matter.

Mr. BOWERS. I have been selling the same syrups myself and they brought 5 cents a gallon more than any syrups that we could buy from any Canadian manufacturer.

Item agreed to.

Committee rose and reported progress.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and the House adjourned at 10.55 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, 7th May, 1894.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

LABOUR DAY.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 106) to amend the law relating to holidays. He said: The object of the Bill is to establish as a holiday Labour Day, the first Monday in September of each year.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. FRECHETTE. (Translation.) Before the Orders of the Day are called, Mr. Speaker, I would like to call the attention of this House to an editorial published in 'L'Electeur,' of Quebec, in connection with the speech of the hon. the First Minister on the school question. Here is what is stated in that editorial, addressed from Ottawa, under date April 29th last :

The political world here is much more disturbed than people are led to believe. Indeed your correspondents describe in your columns what is going on on the stage, but they do not tell you what is said in the green-room behind the curtain.

And yet it is not devoid of interest. You were told of the recent debate on the school question. You were told of the speech delivered by Sir John at Thursday's sitting.

Here are some recent particulars which will enable your public to form a more correct opinion.

Lieut.-Governor Chapleau was in the Speaker's gallery.

When Sir John, in the course of his speech, stated that neither he nor the government had ever promised anything to Monseigneur Taché, Mr. Chapleau was unable to conceal his indignation.

Coming down from the gallery, he loudly said to two members, friends of his, whom he met, that Thompson's speech was a disgrace, and that never had he heard any one lie with such impudence.

This talk was soon whispered in every Conservative circle and made a great impression.

I myself, subsequently heard Dupont, from Bagot, say to Fréchette, from Megantic, that that speech would kill Sir John in the province of Quebec.

Fréchette answered that such was not his opinion. This speech, he said, is calculated to enormously promote Sir John's interest among the English speaking people. As for the French people, they will swallow any humiliation.

Sir John also made another important statement. To humiliate Messrs. Ouimet and Angers, he stated that he wished distinctly to assert that his colleagues had been unanimous in refusing to disallow the school Ordinances of the North-west.

That speech will be translated and profusely distributed in the province of Quebec.

In my opinion it is wasting money.

Dupont is wrong and Fréchette is right. The French people will swallow anything.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to emphatically deny the charge contained in the lines I have just read. The words gratuitously ascribed to me have but one object, that of injuring me among my electors in the county of Megantic. That supposed conversation never took place, neither with the member for Bagot nor any one else, and, consequently, there is not a shadow of truth in that editorial, as far as I am concerned.

IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READINGS.

Bill (No. 40) to incorporate the Elgin and Havelock Railway Company.—(Mr. Hazen.)

Bill (No. 41) to amend the Acts respecting the Clifton Suspension Bridge Company.—(Mr. Coatsworth.)

Mr. FRECHETTE.

Bill (No. 22) respecting the Winnipeg and Hudson Bay Railway Company, and to change the name thereof to The Winnipeg Great Northern Railway Company.—(Mr. Ross, Lisgar.)

Bill (No. 48) respecting the Montreal and Ottawa Railway Company.—(Mr. Baker.)

Bill (No. 47) to revive and amend the Act to incorporate the Brandon and South-western Railway Company.—(Mr. Davin.)

Bill (No. 50) to authorize the purchase of the Yarmouth and Annapolis Railway by the Windsor and Annapolis Railway Company (Limited), and to change the name of the latter company to The Dominion Atlantic Railway Company.—(Mr. Kenny.)

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (No. 99) respecting the St. Lawrence Insurance Company.—(Mr. White, Cardwell.)

Bill (No. 100) to incorporate the French River Boom Company (Limited).—(Mr. Maclean, York.)

COAL IMPORTS BY G. T. R.

Mr. McDUGALD asked, How many tons of bituminous coal have been imported into Canada by the Grand Trunk Railway during the years ending 30th June, 1891, 1892 and 1893, and what amount of duty has been paid thereon during each of such years?

Mr. WALLACE. It is impossible to say. The official records do not show separately the imports by any private firm or corporation.

LIGHTHOUSE AT EASTERN HARBOUR.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) asked, Is it the intention of the Government to have a lighthouse constructed at Eastern Harbour, Inverness county, C.B., during the present year? Had Dr. Cameron, M.P. for Inverness, the authority of the Government, prior to the late provincial elections in Nova Scotia, to promise that such lighthouse would be constructed? If so, when was he so authorized?

Sir CHARLES HERBERT TUPPER. The subject of the construction of a lighthouse at this point is being considered by the officers of my department. Touching the last part of the question of the hon. gentleman, I have to say, Mr. Speaker, that, after the late provincial general election, a letter dated 23rd March, was received, through the hon. member for Inverness (Mr. Cameron), from Mr. Patrick Cormier, of Grand Etang, inclosing a petition for the construction of a lighthouse on the eastern end of Cheticamp Island. The hon. member for Inverness had no authority to promise that the lighthouse would be constructed, and, it is almost unnecessary to add, that he informed me that he made no such promise.

REPAIRS AT BROAD COVE, C. B.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) asked, When and why was John McLeod, Esq., removed or dismissed from the position of inspector over the repairs of the Broad Cove Marsh pier, Cape Breton? Who was appointed in his stead?

Mr. OULMET. Mr. John McLeod was not dismissed from the position of foreman of the repairs of the Broad Cove Marsh pier, Cape Breton, but his employment ceased on the 31st October, 1892, when the amount authorized for expenditure in 1892-93 was exhausted. Mr. H. McDonald, who in the meantime had been appointed wharfinger, was, at the suggestion of the chief engineer, placed in charge of the repairs for which an appropriation of $300 was made by Parliament for expenditure during 1893-94.

LOADING VESSELS AT MONTREAL.

Mr. LEPINE asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to appoint, this year, competent persons to act as inspectors of appliances used in the loading and unloading of vessels in the port of Montreal?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. It is the intention of the Government to appoint competent persons this year to act as inspectors.

SHIPPING MASTER AT MONTREAL.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (for Mr. Casey) asked, Have the Government received any communication, directly or indirectly, from the Montreal Board of Trade, or from any person or persons on their behalf, except the copy of a resolution, the receipt of which was acknowledged by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries on 2nd May, regarding the appointment of Mr. Vanasse as shipping master at Montreal? If so, what was the nature of such communications?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. A telegram was received on the 18th ultimo from the Board of Trade and others, stating that they could not believe that the recommendation of the Board of Trade, shipping interests and local representatives, was passed over.

BRIDGE OVER THE OTTAWA.

Mr. DEVLIN asked, Have the Government received any application for aid towards the construction of a railway and general traffic bridge over the Ottawa River, connecting Hull with Nepean Point, Ottawa? If so, is it the intention of the Government to assist the project?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It appears no such application has been received.

MAIL SERVICE IN THE COUNTY OF OTTAWA.

Mr. DEVLIN asked, Have the Government, during the last year, taken any steps, and if so, what steps towards improving the mail service between Ripon, St. André Avelin and Papineauville, in the county of Ottawa? Have the Government received petitions for the establishment of a post office at or near Maloney's, in the township of Low, Ottawa County; and, if so, is it the intention of the Government to take any action in the matter?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. No steps have been taken during the last year to improve the mail service between Ripon and St. André Avelin. The question of giving Papineauville post office a separate service to the railway station is under consideration.

WEIGHTS OF CHEESE.

Mr. TAYLOR asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to have some person appointed at Montreal to act as referee in case of disputes arising between buyers and sellers as to the weight of cheese having been sold either at the factory or elsewhere subject to weight at Montreal?

Mr. DALY. It is the intention to appoint the Inspector of Weights and Measures at Montreal to act as referee in matters of dispute respecting the weights of cheese.

THE SCHOOL QUESTION IN THE N.W.T. AND MANITOBA.

Mr. DEVLIN moved for:

Copy of the last petition of the Roman Catholic Archbishops and Bishops of Canada, having reference to the Ordinances passed in 1882, by the Legislature of the North-west Territories, and also of the School Acts of 1890, of the province of Manitoba.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. There has been no petition received, and, therefore, the hon. gentleman had better allow the motion to stand.

Motion allowed to stand.

IMMIGRATION WORK.

Mr. MARTIN moved for:

Return showing the names of all persons appointed to act as what are known as return-men, in connection with immigration work, the period during which each worked, the amount of money paid to each, the names of the settlers brought to Canada, by each return-man, and the places in which such settlers were located.

He said: Some time ago the Department of the Interior, or, I fancy, at that time it was the Department of Agriculture, or at all events, it was the Department of Immigration, adopted the system of sending immigration agents to the old country in the shape of men who had come to Canada as immigrants, and who either had, or were supposed to have succeeded in the Dominion. In a general way, perhaps, the principle may have been to some extent a sound one, but, as a matter of fact, I believe it has been made use of for the purpose of furnishing certain persons with holidays at the public expense. At all events, in those cases of which I have personal knowledge, I have never known an instance of an immigrant being brought out to Canada by any of those return-men, and it seems to me it would be advisable in the interest of the country, to know what, if any, benefit resulted to Canada from this policy. At the same time, it would be desirable to know how much it cost to send over those agents, and further particulars as to what they have done. For that reason I make the motion.

Mr. DALY. I have no objection to the motion passing, Mr. Speaker. I may say in answer to the hon. gentleman's remarks as to men going home to the old country for the purpose of having a holiday, that there is no possibility of that occurring under the arrangement that at present exists between the Government and the Canadian Pacific Railway and the steamship companies in reference to the class of men that are sent home. I have no doubt that in times past possibly some of the men who were so sent home may not have done the work that was expected of them; but when the return is brought down, the hon. gentleman will see that the men are now properly selected in every instance, and are selected by the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Government agents only from among men who, they were satisfied would be of benefit to the country and would bring out the proper kind of immigrants for the North-west.

Mr. MARTIN. In view of what the hon. gentleman has said, would he allow me to add to the motion: "Also a statement as to what arrangements are now made with regard to these returned men?"

Mr. DALY. Yes, I have no objection.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

NORTH-WEST SETTLERS FROM THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. MARTIN moved for:

Return showing the number of settlers brought into the Yorkton and Saltcoats district from Dakota, and into the Calgary district from Chicago, and showing in each case the nationality of such settlers, the cost of obtaining them, and the number that still remain and the occupations those remaining are engaged in.

He said: Some time ago a great deal was said with regard to immigration from North and South Dakota and special effort was made to obtain a very considerable number of settlers from those states. The immigrants were men who had gone to Dakota, and who failed there. They were brought to Manitoba, notably during one spring, in special trains. The trains were covered with streamers announcing that these people had abandoned the United States and had determined to reside in Canada, and the newspapers, especially the Government organs, took up the matter and made a great deal of it indeed. I am not exactly aware just how far the Government went in this matter; but, at any rate these immigrants were practically without any means whatever. It was necessary not only to bring them, and their families, and their effects from Dakota, but I believe in most instances arrangements were made, practically through the Government, by which money was advanced to enable them to leave Dakota and come to Manitoba. They were settled on the Manitoba and Northwestern Railway in the northern part of Eastern Assiniboia, in the country adjoining Saltcoats and Yorkton. I believe considerably more than one-half of these immigrants brought to this portion of the North-west at such great expense to the Government have already left, and I may say that I believe the only reason the balance of them do not leave is because they are unable to raise enough money to get out of the country. They are probably waiting for the Government of some other country to make the same arrangements with them as this Government did to bring them from Dakota. I may say also that the loan company through which the advances were made to these settlers to enable them to come to the North-west from Dakota finds itself in very serious financial difficulties with regard to the transaction they have entered into at the instance of the Government. This loan company has, I believe, invested something like $70,000 in this. Under a provision in the Dominion Lands Act, mortgages were given to the loan company upon their homesteads. The settlers have never become entitled to the homesteads as they did not complete the homestead duties, and of course the mortgages that the company has upon these homesteads are of no value to them. In addition to that, even if the title were issued—as I suppose the Government might feel inclined to go that far, considering that these advances were made, I understand at the instance of the Government largely—I fancy that the company will still be a heavy loser, because the portion of the country which was selected to place these immigrants in was not a suitable part for the purpose of following the business of agriculture. Not but that the country is good enough, but these settlers have been unable to get water for the use of their cattle, and the district has been too dry for the successful growing of grain. I am in receipt of a letter from one of these settlers inclosing me a copy of a demand made upon either himself or some other settler by the loan company threatening to sell him out unless he pays up the arrears of principal and interest upon the loan. This settler writes to me that it is quite impossible for him to pay the interest, not to speak of the principal at all, and he thinks that something should be done in the way of relieving them from this mortgage which they have been induced to give. So far as I can learn the whole transaction has been a gigantic failure. It is most unfortunate that it should have been a failure for several reasons; more especially for the reason that such great publicity was given to the transaction, and that now we find that most of these people have left the country and that those who are remaining are practically of no use as settlers. It seems a very great mistake on the part of the Government to have gone into the matter so blindly. Surely if any one in Canada should understand and know the condition of the North-west generally, it is the Department of the Interior. The large sums of money that are annually spent by the department in connection with the North-west should enable them to know what portions of it are the best for bringing immigrants into it. Of course it would be a very great mistake to suppose that the failure of this particular settlement is any reproach to the North-west generally. There is no doubt that there are large tracts in the Territories which are very suitable for settlement; but that being so, it is all the worse for the credit of the immigration policy of the Government that they should have selected a district that has turned out to be quite unfit for settlement. Therefore, we have the great publicity that was given to this effort to provide homes in Canada for people who had gone to the United States and failed to make a living for themselves there; we have the very large expense to which the Government were put in bringing in those settlers from Dakota; and we have the unfortunate position of the loan company, which is an old country institution, and of course any losses that company may suffer will in the end affect the credit of the country in which their investment has been made. All these things reflect very seriously upon the department for dealing with such an important matter in so careless a way. I also refer in the motion to immigration operations at Calgary. It is reported that the Immigration Department, at a large expense, transported a considerable number of Jews from Chicago to Calgary, presumably for the purpose of their engaging in agriculture. But these Jews were not farmers, and never could be made farmers, and the expense of taking them there has been completely lost. They were not adapted to make settlers, and as a matter of fact they did not make settlers. They belonged to the class of Jews whose business is peddling or something of that kind; and it does seem to me rather a reflection upon the department that they should not have been able, with the aid of all the officers they have selected, presumably because they have some knowledge or ability to fit them for the work, to make a better selection of settlers. I am informed by the hon. Minister of the Interior that the work of his department, to which the work of immigration is now attached, speaks for itself. Well, I am inclined to agree with him in that. In these two instances to which I have alluded the work of the department does speak for itself, but I am very sorry that the sounds of that speaking are not such as to bring credit, either to the Dominion of Canada at large or to the particular department in question.

Mr. DALY. Mr. Speaker, there will be no difficulty in furnishing the information asked for by the hon. gentleman if he means by the word settlers those who have taken up homesteads. The department do not undertake to locate people unless they have taken up homesteads. I am at a loss to understand what object the hon. gentleman could have in making this motion unless it was to have a fling at the Government or the Department of the Interior. If the hon. gentleman had been specific in his statements, if he had specified from what part of Dakota these settlers had come, or into what particular portion of the North-west they had gone and when they had gone, I would possibly be able to answer such specific statements. From his remarks I can only gather generally that he meant a number of people who went into what is called the Sheho Lake district, near Yorkton, some three years ago. If the hon. gentleman refers to that settlement, which is the only one I can reconcile with his statements, I may say that if he had looked at page 7 of the report of the Department of the Interior, he would have found full information in reference to that settlement. My recollection of the coming of those people into Manitoba is that it cost the Government but very little money. I believe they were induced to come as a result of their having sent delegations of their neighbours into the North-west to spy out the land. Those delegations went to the North-west through the instrumentality of the then Government agent, Mr. Webster, since deceased. He conducted them through Manitoba and the North-west, and they themselves selected the particular portion of the country in which the people subsequently settled; so that the Government were not responsible in any way for the settlement of those people in that particular portion of the country. The delegation went back and reported to their people very favourably about the country. They said that they had selected lands in the Sheho Lake district, which they regarded as a good farming district, and the best part of the country for their people to settle in. Then, it appears that the question of means was raised. Those people were heavily mortgaged in Dakota, and were unable to secure the necessary means for their transportation. The Manitoba North-western Railway Company was directly interested in the district where they were to settle, because their railway when extended would run directly through it; and some of the officers of that company were associated in a loan company known as the Canada Settlers' Loan Company, and any advances made to the settlers were made by that company and not by the Government. The Government were not instrumental in having the advances made, did not ask the company to make those advances, and are not responsible in any way for their having been made. They were made by the Canada Settlers' Loan Company after it had sent agents into Dakota to investigate the affairs of those people. The company paid off certain obligations of the people in Dakota, and brought them into this country, taking the usual lien, which the Dominion Lands Act provides for people advancing money, on the homesteads of the settlers; and I have no doubt that they will realize every dollar that they advanced to them. The officers of the Canada Settlers' Loan Company were men who were thoroughly conversant with the tract of country in which those people settled and the circumstances of the people. They made the advances with their eyes open; and if the company loses the money, they will have to blame their Canadian agents and no one else. The Government are not to blame in the slightest degree. Now, I will read from the report of the Dominion Lands agent with reference to those settlers. He says:

A number of farmers from Dakota, also, have settled around Lake Sheho, in townships 29, ranges 7, 8 and 9; townships 30, ranges 9, 10 and 11; townships 31, ranges 9 and 10; and township 32, range 10, all west of the 2nd meridian. Inspections recently made by officials of the department show the condition of the settlement to be most satisfactory. The people are described as being in comfortable circumstances, the well-built houses, stables, granaries, fences, &c., having the appearance of a settlement of ten rather than barely two years' standing. The crops this year have been excellent in quality, and excepting certain losses sustained during the winter of 1892-93, the result of inexperience, when many cattle die from lack of sufficient fodder, their enterprise has been most satisfactory. This want of hay in some instances was due to the settlers putting up too small a quantity for their actual requirements, and in others to the destruction of some of their stacks by a prairie fire.

The Sheho Lake settlement is composed chiefly of Canadians who emigrated to the States and found it impossible to make a living there, poor crops and heavy taxation proving ruinous. They were assisted to return to this country by the Canada Settlers' Homestead Company, and the following figures will show their present standing:

In the settlement there are 67 families containing 275 souls. They own 914 head of stock and have 813 acres under cultivation. The crops this year have been remarkably good, and the people are well satisfied and contented, and it is only a question of a little time before their prosperity is assured. The only cause for complaint that they have now is the absence of railway communication, and if the line were extended from its present terminus at Yorkton it would be of great service to the community and to the future settlement of the country. Here, as elsewhere, wheat cannot be raised to advantage when the market is so far distant; and until this is remedied the area cultivated will remain limited. They are a highly respectable class of men and likely to succeed in their new homes.

Now, these are the people to whom the hon. gentleman refers as being in such a condition that they were likely soon to leave the country, and he says some of them have left already. I think the report I have read is a sufficient answer to his statement. Then the Commissioner adds:

There is another settlement of farmers from Dakota in the Stony Creek district, townships 43, 44 and 45, ranges 18, 19, 20 and 21, west of the 2nd meridian, east of Prince Albert, where there are some 300,000 acres of exceptionally fine land, with mellow loamy soil, well watered and within easy reach of excellent timber, which, to supply the settlers' needs, is converted into lumber at a saw-mill, established on the creek. At the present moment there are 17 families, representing 68 souls, having 54 horses, 81 head of horned stock, with effects valued at over $13,000. They are all comfortably settled, but feel keenly the lack of railroad extension. The continuation of the Manitoba and North-western Railway will complete the settlement of this district which, at present, is at a standstill. The opportunities for wheat-raising are exceptionally good, but are neglected for want of a market. Besides the Dakota, there are some fifty other settlers from Ontario and Manitoba who have located here, attracted by the richness of the soil and vegetation.

These are extracts from the report of the Commissioner of Dominion Lands, dealing with the only people to which the hon. gentleman refers, if I have rightly seized his remarks. And I regret exceedingly that the hon. gentleman should have seen fit to give out to the world, through his utterances in this House, that any class in that country are in the condition he describes. It would be well for the hon. gentleman to secure better information on subjects of this kind before undertaking to deal with them. Now, as to the Jews, of whom he speaks as having come from Chicago to Calgary, he has also indulged in exaggeration. It appears that the attention of the Canadian Pacific Railway's agent in Chicago was called to the fact by the Rev. T. D. Phillips, late of Ottawa, and for some time residing in Chicago, that there were a number of people, consisting of Germans, Hungarians and Poles, who were in his parish in Chicago, and who were desirous of emigrating to the North-west or to portions of the Western States where they could go upon farms. The information given to the Canadian Pacific Railway was that these people were farmers, that they had been accustomed to farming in the old country, and that some of them had done farming in the States since they came out, and also that they were possessed of money, ranging from $300 to $600 each. Upon these representations of the Rev. Mr. Phillips, the Canadian Pacific Railway agent notified the Government agent, Captain Holmes, of these people's desire, and I will read from Mr. Holmes's report what he says concerning them. It is on page 150 of the report of the Department of the Interior :

Letters having been received from Rev. Mr. Phillips, in Chicago, representing some 70 families in Chicago, and from parties in Idaho, Washington and Oregon, I was instructed by the department to visit these places and make arrangements for representatives of these people to visit the North-west.

In Chicago I saw the Rev. Mr. Phillips, and met several of the people about whom he had corresponded. They made arrangements for a mass meeting on the following Sunday evening at Rochester Hall, where I met some 700 people and explained the requirements for homesteading. I found them a mixed lot, consisting of Germans, Poles and Hungarians principally, with about 25 per cent Jews among them, the remainder being Lutherans, Roman Catholics and other persuasions. They selected four of their number to go to the Calgary district and select land, and asked to have an agent familiar with the country sent with them. The Canadian Pacific Railway Company kindly furnished transportation for the party over their lines, the delegates paying for their own transportation to the boundary and return.

As a result of this expedition some twenty heads of families left Chicago in the month of June and took up homesteads on the line of the Calgary and Edmonton Railroad. They took with them sums of money averaging about $500 per family. Some of them have since sent for their families, and all have been self-supporting.

Now, it appears, as stated here, that 25 per cent of the people whom Captain Holmes met were Jews, and that amongst the delegates was one Jew. It appears that this man did most of the talking, and because he was a Jew and did most of the talking, the press opposed to the Government of that country, naturally concluded that all the rest of the people were Jews. But Captain Holmes' report speaks for itself. He says that these twenty families went there, that they are as good subjects as it is necessary for us to get into that country.

Mr. MARTIN. I have taken pains to see that my information in this matter is strictly accurate, and I challenge the report the hon. gentleman has read as being entirely inaccurate with regard to the settlers in Yorkton and Saltcoats who came from Dakota.

In support of my statement I beg to read a letter from one of these settlers themselves, showing their condition ; and I fancy the country will take more stock in what the settlers themselves say than in the reports of officials, who, of course, have to depend for their position on making out a case as to the success of their efforts. This is the letter :

LAKE VIEW,
SALTCOATS, ASSA., April 10th, 1894.

The Hon. JOS. MARTIN,
House of Commons, Ottawa.

DEAR SIR,—As secretary of settlers who have taken up land under land companies in this district, I beg your earnest and earliest attention to the following requests, and to inclosures, the latter I will ask you to return to me when you have done with them in the House. Petition is sent to Earl Aberdeen. The prayer of petitioners was that they be granted their patents where duties were fulfilled ; that legislation be given preventing land companies taking mortgages on the homestead ; that inasmuch as that not one settler could pay either interest or principal, that the Government should pay off said liens, and so retain the 50 per cent of said settlers that are left—50 per cent are gone and the rest have no alternative but to go if nothing is done by the Government, as an inclosed letter received by me (and every other settler has received a similar one or a worse one) will prove the truth of above statement.

The letter is signed by Frederic Kirkham, secretary for the petitioners. I had all this information, quite independent from the letter of this man. I know myself the condition of these settlers after they went up there. They were obliged to come down to the neighbourhood of Portage la Prairie, where I then lived, in order to get sufficient money by working for farmers, to keep them going a short time. And I know that fully 50 per cent have long since left the country. I have been informed, and I believe that the only reason the other 50 per cent did not leave was because they had not enough money to get out of the country. Yet, in the face of all that, the officials of the hon. gentleman's department represent them as happy and contented settlers. I leave the country to judge between these two accounts the real state of affairs.

Mr. DALY. What is proved by the letter the hon. gentleman has read? Simply that these people have failed to meet their obligations, and that they now want the Government to pay for the lands they got through the Canada Settlers' Company advancing the money to take them from the misery they were in in Dakota and place them on the land. I think the report of the officers of my department can be taken as against the letter the hon. gentleman has read. He started out by—

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman has exhausted his right to speak.

Mr. DALY. But the hon. member for Winnipeg has raised a new question and I think I have the right to answer it. I am confining myself to the statement the hon. gentleman has just read. He endeavours to fasten upon the Government the blame for these people not having been successful, for their having selected lands on which they could not make a living. The Government had nothing to do with them going to that country except taking their delegates there. These people selected the land, and advised their friends to come on; they were brought there by the Canada Settlers' Company, with whom arrangements were made, and the Government had nothing to do with it, good, bad or indifferent. The letter read by the hon. gentleman goes to show that the people are not successful. As against that we have the report which I have read, made not by any ordinary officer of the Government, but by the Commissioner of Dominion Lands, and published in the official records of the country. I ask that that report be taken as against this letter from a man who wants to be relieved of his obligation.

Mr. MARTIN. Of course this report was not made from Mr. Smith's own inspection.

Mr. MARA. I would move to add after the word "Chicago," "The states of Oregon, Washington and Idaho." I had an opportunity last year and the year before of conversing with the settlers from the states mentioned, and I was gratified to learn that they were well pleased with their new home and were advising their friends in those states to take up land near Calgary. The statements made to me by these people were in striking contrast with the tenor of the remarks made by the hon. member for Winnipeg.

Mr. DALY. There is no objection to the amendment.

Mr. MARTIN. I have no objection to the amendment being made, and I would draw the attention of the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Mara) to the fact that I said nothing whatever with regard to the condition of the settlers at Calgary, except the cases I mentioned in which I charged the Government with having brought certain persons from Chicago who are not fit to become settlers and did not become settlers, being Jew peddlers. So far as concerns the settlements the hon. gentleman refers to, my information agrees with his that there has been a very satisfactory immigration into the country between Calgary and Edmonton from the states mentioned by the hon. gentleman.

Mr. DALY. Why did not you say that before?

Mr. MARTIN. It was not at all pertinent to the question I placed before the House.

Mr. DALY.

Mr. MARA. Mr. Speaker, I referred to what would be understood from the tenor of the hon. gentleman's remarks.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

RETURNS ORDERED.

Return showing: 1. How much timber has been disposed of in townships 1, 2, 3 and 4, in ranges 14, 15, 16 and 17 east of 1st meridian, and also on the Whitemouth River. 2. To whom said timber has been disposed of. 3. In what way said timber has been disposed of. 4. Prices realized for same. 5. Copies of all advertisements in connection with same, with names of newspapers in which same appeared and dates of insertion. 6. How much timber still remains undisposed of in said townships.—(Mr. Martin.)

Copies of all letters, proposals, cablegrams, and correspondence since the 1st January, 1890, between the Government and any member thereof and any person, firm or company in relation to establishing a fast Atlantic steamship line between Canada and Great Britain, and also a line between Canada and France, and in relation to the subsidies for such services asked for or proposed to be given by the Government, and any draft or completed contracts for such steamship service.—(Mr. Mulock.)

Return showing the amounts paid for legal services and costs in each department of the public service during the fiscal year from 1873-74 to 1878-79, inclusive; also to whom the several amounts were paid, and for what services.—(Mr. Taylor.)

Copies of all calls for tenders, tenders received, contracts made, correspondence, telegrams, letters and papers relative to the public work (wharf or breakwater) at Grand Etang, Cape Breton; together with a statement of all moneys advanced or paid on such contract, with dates of payment.—(Mr. Davies, P. E. I.)

Correspondence with the Railway Department relative to the steam ferry established across the Strait of Canso, between Port Mulgrave and Hawkesbury, also between Port Mulgrave and Hastings, from the time the Eastern Extension Railway was operated by said Railway Department up to the present time.—(Mr. Cameron.)

Correspondence with the Railway Department relative to charges made against G. C. Lawrence, ticket agent at Port Hastings, Inverness County, N.S., and also of the evidence furnished to substantiate these charges since he was employed as ticket agent up to the present time.—(Mr. Cameron.)

Receipts and expenditures chargeable to Consolidated Fund from 1st July, 1893, to 1st May, 1894, and also for same period from 1st July, 1892, to 1st May, 1893.—(Sir Richard Cartwright.)

Statement of all sums of money in the hands of the Government held as security for the performance of contracts completed, the name of each contractor who deposited the money, date of each such deposit, and amount of interest accrued on each deposit.—(Mr. Lister.)

Correspondence between J. B. Wright, M.D., V.S., and the Government, or any member, department or officer of the Government, and of all correspondence between the Grand Trunk Railway and the Government, or any member, department or officer of the Government, and of all correspondence between Mr. A. Brush and the Government, or any member, department or officer of the Government, and of all correspondence between the Imperial authorities, or any one on their behalf, and the Government of Canada, or any member, department or officer thereof, from, and including, the year 1882 until, and including, the year 1891, regarding the inspection of cattle passing through Canada from the United States.—(Mr. Mulock.)

Order in Council authorizing the sale of lot 16, concession 12, township of Luther, in the county of Wellington, for $800 to John McNab and John Gallagher.—(Mr. McMullen.)

Return showing the kind of manufactured goods or articles exported being the product of Canadian factories, upon which a rebate of duty was granted, the value and kind of material in each, the name or names of owners, the name and location of each factory, the net amount of rebate allowed on each article exported, and the several countries to which the exported manufactured goods or articles were shipped; the gross amount or value of goods or articles exported upon which a rebate was allowed, and the rebate of duty made, for the fiscal year ending 30th June, 1893.—(Mr. McMullen.)

ADULTERATION OF TEAS.

Mr. STAIRS moved :

That in view of the increased importations of adulterated teas into Canada, owing to their importation into England and the United States being prohibited, the provisions of the Act respecting the adulteration of food, drugs, &c., are insufficient and it is consequently necessary to provide for the immediate inspection of all teas proposed to be entered for consumption in Canada, and the destruction or exportation of all found to be adulterated.

He said: I would like to give a few words of explanation. The question of the importation of adulterated tea into Canada is one which has been attracting considerable attention within the last few years. As is well known to all, the great English-speaking peoples are the great tea-consuming people—that is, the people of the United Kingdom, the United States and Canada consume a great deal more tea, proportionately, than any other people, with the exception, of course, of the people of China, and more, I presume, than those of all other countries in the world combined. This being the fact, and particularly as it is well known that such a large quantity of tea is used in Canada, it becomes important, in the interests of the people of Canada, and especially in the interests of the women of Canada—who, I think it may be assumed, are the large consumers of tea—that the teas used in this country should be pure. It is well known, Mr. Speaker, that of late years the adulteration of teas has been extensively practised, particularly in China, adulteration of such a character that it need only be referred to in order to show how injurious it must be to those who consume these adulterated teas. As I have already said, most of this adulteration is practised in China, not, as is sometimes supposed, in London and New York. One of the methods of adulteration followed—and I will be very brief upon this whole subject—affects such teas as are largely imported into the lower provinces, mostly black teas. Exhausted leaves, that is, tea that has been used and from which the useful properties have been drawn, are spread upon a floor and mixed with iron filings. They are then sprinkled freely with water, the effect of which is to cause the leaves to resume their original dark colour, so that they look as if they had never been drawn. After this process, the leaves are dried in the usual way and packed for exportation. There are other methods of adulteration practised, as, for instance, the admixture of the stems and leaves of other plants than the tea plant. Green teas are adulterated in a somewhat different manner. In this case the exhausted leaves are “faced,” as it is called, with a mixture of pounded rice, gypsum and Prussian blue, this being done to restore the leaves to their original colour. These facts are so well known to large importers of and dealers in teas and others acquainted with the business that it is not necessary for me to emphasize them. Nor does it need to be emphasized that it must be injurious to the public health for people to be in the habit of using such teas, and that it is desirable that the importation of such teas should be prohibited. Several references have been made to the adulteration of tea in New York papers of a somewhat late date, showing that these teas are being sent into Canada. Now, it being admitted that the adulteration is prejudicial to health, it being admitted that adulteration is largely practised, and that not only does the tea so adulterated contain substances which are prejudicial to the health of those who use it, but also that the active principle of tea, the principle for which tea is used, is entirely taken out of it in the case of these exhausted leaves, it becomes our duty to look into the means which should be taken to prevent such adulteration. The Parliament of Canada have admitted, when it passed the Adulteration of Foods Act, that the public health should be protected by legislation, that efforts should be made to keep out of consumption all articles which are injurious to health. I think the object aimed at has hardly been attained in the case of tea. It must be admitted that it is better to keep an article from going into consumption, to keep it from being scattered throughout the country and from getting into the retail shops, than to attempt to stop the sale of it by the officers of the Inland Revenue Department, after it is scattered throughout the country.

Now, there is another important reason why it behooves the people of Canada to look closely into this question, and to take some steps to prohibit the importation of these adulterated teas, namely, that for some years past, both in England and in the United States, very stringent legislation has been adopted prohibiting the entry for home consumption of all adulterated teas. The effect, of course, of these acts has been to cause a larger proportion of prohibited or adulterated tea to be brought into Canada than would have been the case had England and the United States not passed such Acts, because the market for these cheaper teas being closed in both those countries they naturally find their way into Canada. Now, to make clear to the House how I think this subject ought to be treated, I will briefly refer to the English and the American Acts. The English Act is chapter 63 of 38 and 39 Victoria, 1875, the Act respecting the sale of food and drugs, and as showing that the adulteration of tea needs to be dealt with in a somewhat different way from the adulteration of other articles, a special provision was made in the Act concerning the adulteration of tea. I think the general tenor of the Act is very much the same as that of the Canadian Act respecting the adulteration and sale of food and drugs. But section 30 of this Act is a special one, providing for the adulteration of teas. In order not to take up too much of the time of the House, I will read only one or two extracts from the special provision :

From and after the first day of January, 1876, all tea imported as merchandise into and landed at any port in Great Britain or Ireland, shall be subject to examination by persons to be appointed by the Commissioners of Customs.

Then a provision is made as to some details, and how these are to be administered. It goes on :

And if upon such analysis the same shall be found to be mixed with other substances or exhausted tea, the same shall not be delivered unless with the sanction of said commissioners, and on such terms and conditions as they shall see fit to direct, either for home consumption, or for use as ship's stores, or for exportation.

Then there is a further and more stringent provision :

But if on such inspection and analysis it shall appear that such tea is, in the opinion of the analyst, unfit for human food, the same shall be forfeited and destroyed, or otherwise disposed of in such manner as the commissioners may direct.

Section 31 of this Act explains what the term "exhausted tea" shall mean. In accordance with this Act a large number of regulations were made providing for the administration of the Act. They are very full, one of which, as it is of some interest, I will read. It is section 61 of the General Order 127, of 1892, which, I may explain, is a consolidation of previous general orders. It provides :

Should the surveyors have any reason to suspect that a particular tea is not genuine, or that it is exhausted, or mixed with exhausted tea, or that it is mixed, stained, coloured or powdered with any ingredient or material, or otherwise damaged in any way so as to injure its proper quality, they are to forward samples from each suspected bed to the analyst at the laboratory,—

Where it may be analyzed. Then other sections go on to say what shall be done with it. Now, I understand that this Act is very strictly administered in England, so strictly that no tea that is injurious to public health can go into consumption. Now, I will turn for a moment to the legislation which has been adopted in the United States. The first Act of which I have any knowledge, referring to the adulteration of teas in the United States, was passed on 31st March, 1883. It was amended, but not to any great extent, I think, on 2nd March, 1893. Its provisions are very strict, indeed I may almost say more strict than those of the English Act. I will read one or two extracts from it :

That from and after the passage of this Act it shall be unlawful for any person or persons or corporations to import or bring into the United States any merchandise for sale as tea adulterated with spurious leaf or with exhausted leaves, or which contains so great an admixture of chemicals or other deleterious substances as to make it unfit for use.

The rest of the Act refers to details regarding its administration ; but there is one section which would require to be incorporated in any legislation which this Parliament might see fit to enact. In section 2 it is provided that :

On making entry at the custom-house of all tea, or merchandise described as tea, imported into the United States, the importer or consignee shall give a bond to the collector of the port that such merchandise shall not be removed from warehouse until released by the custom-house authorities, who shall examine it with reference to its purity and fitness for consumption.

There is no provision of that kind in the English Act, owing, probably, to the fact that there being a duty on tea in England, it is put in bond, while tea being free in the United States, unless there had been some provision, it would be entirely under the control of the importer. There has been a very large number of regulations made from time to time by the Treasury Department at Washington in order to carry that Act into effect. I think, although my remarks have been brief, I have said enough to show to this House and the Government that it is desirable some steps should be taken to prevent the importation of adulterated tea into Canada. I submit that Parliament has already, by the passage of the Act respecting the adulteration of food and drugs adopted the principles that substances injurious to the public health should not be allowed to go into consumption. I submit further that it must be more desirable to prevent adulterated tea entering into consumption by the prohibiting it at the port of entry, rather than to attempt to deal with it afterwards when it has become distributed throughout the country, because it would be impossible, in the case of an article entering into such general consumption as tea for the officers of the Inland Revenue to follow it up—at all events, so far as the Act stands at present it has been found impossible for the Inland Revenue officers to deal with it. I submit, therefore, that it is desirable to prohibit the importation of adulterated tea absolutely, and provide proper officers for its inspection and analysis. I believe that the expense will not be large, and, as an outcome of this legislation, it might be desirable in the future to deal with other adulterated substances in the same way.

Mr. WALLACE. In answer to the remarks offered by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stairs), I may say that the Government, and particularly the Department of Customs, have been giving a good deal of attention to the subject-matter now under consideration of the House. We have had this subject called to our attention during the past year, and instructions have been given to the appraisers at the various ports, especially to the grocery experts who are well acquainted with teas and are excellent judges of it, not to permit any tea to be brought into this country of the class to which the hon. gentleman has referred. All teas that are adulterated with mineral or other deleterious substances have been prohibited. It was stated that large quantities of such teas had come to the United States, but by their laws, were prohibited from being entered for consumption in that country. So soon as we ascertained that fact, instructions were issued to our own officers that if teas which had been prohibited in the United States came to Canada they must be closely watched, and the fact reported to the department. I may say further, that under the new tariff now before the House, ample provision is made in the direction suggested in the hon. gentleman's motion. It is provided that teas which are not permitted to be entered for consumption in the country to which they are sent, shall not be permitted entry in Canada. For instance, if a cargo of tea comes to Great Britain it is examined there under customs supervision. One portion of the cargo may be pronounced fit for use, and another portion pronounced unfit. Under our new tariff, only such teas will be allowed entry into Canada as have passed inspection in Great Britain, having passed the customs experts there had been admitted as proper quality for home consumption. In that case, they are permitted to be entered here free of duty. In the United States, they have a still more rigid inspection than in Great Britain. Under those circumstances, we have a guarantee under our own law that none of those adulterated teas could be imported from Great Britain or the United States free of duty, unless they have passed the critical examination of British customs officers, who are experts in examining teas, and the same remark applies to the system prevailing in the United States. So, if any teas are brought in that have not passed that examination, they can only be entered after they have paid 10 per cent duty, and our officers at the ports of Toronto, Montreal, Halifax, St. John, and Quebec, are expert examiners of tea, which is, in fact, one of their particular qualifications, and so there need be no general apprehension that any adulterated tea or any teas manufactured from exhausted leaves will find entry into Canada. So far as the most careful and rigid inquiry has gone, we are pretty safe in saying that no adulterated or injurious teas have as yet found a foothold in Canada. I move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. STAIRS. I think the Controller of Customs is mistaken in holding that the Government have power under the present law to prevent the importation of adulterated teas. They have, no doubt, the power to stop their sale after the teas have gone into consumption, but they have no power, on an entry of adulterated tea being offered at any Canadian port, to refuse the entry. Even the provision of the new tariff, to which the hon. Controller refers, does not prohibit the admission of adulterated teas. If the tea is not of such a character as will be allowed in the United Kingdom, and it should, nevertheless, be landed here, the department could only deal with it by levying a duty of 10 per cent. What I desire specially to point out is that under the provisions of the Act respecting the adulteration of food, as administered by the Inland Revenue Department, the machinery is complicated, and it cannot be put in force instantly, so as to deal with a special importation. Besides, the provision of the new tariff is defective, even if it should operate as the Controller has indicated, in regard to all importations of tea from China or the country of production for it has no effect on tea brought from China and entered for consumption in Canada. As adulteration of teas is practically carried out altogether in China, some provision is required whereby teas can be inspected and their importation prohibited.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville.) One word with respect to the subject-matter now before the House. The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stairs) has said that the Adulteration of Food Act did not work successfully in the case of adulterated teas imported into this country. But it must be borne in mind that the Act was never intended to apply to such a case. There is only one way in which the case can be met, if it is thought desirable or necessary by Parliament, to meet it, and that is to appoint tea tasters, men who are experts in the work. The Inland Revenue Department of which I am Controller, will furnish analyses, if it is provided with samples of food; but no officer has any right whatever to go aboard ship or enter a customs-house and select samples. All we can do is to make analyses of samples presented to us.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I do not think that the observations addressed to the House by the hon. Controller of Customs at all meet the statement made by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stairs), who declared that there are adulterated teas coming into Canada and that this adulteration takes place in China.

Mr. WALLACE. I did not understand the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stairs) to say that they were coming into Canada.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). But the hon. member for Halifax pointed out that there is no machinery to prevent them from coming into Canada, and the Controller of Customs did not undertake to show that he was mistaken in that particular. The Controller did not show that there is at present any effective machinery to prevent adulterated teas being landed in Canada.

Mr. WALLACE. We could hand them over to the Department of Inland Revenue.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). But there is no prohibition on them, and the hon. gentleman knows that that would be a very ineffective way to prevent such teas entering into consumption here. The statement of the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stairs) is entitled to very much more consideration than the Government seem to have given it, and it is hardly treating the very serious statement of the hon. gentleman with the importance it deserves, that the Controller of Customs should move the adjournment of the debate. The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stairs) has pointed out that there is likely to be adulterated tea imported here from China free of duty, and it must largely enter into home consumption before the attention of the Controller of Inland Revenue could be called to it. That statement being made it is the duty of the Government to provide a more efficient remedy than exists at the present moment. The Controller of Inland Revenue has informed the House that he has no power to act unless a sample of the adulterated article is sent to him for inspection. Then, he reports upon it, but he has no power to send a competent officer on board a ship to see whether the tea that is about to be landed is adulterated or not. It seems to me that so far from the debate being adjourned the subject requires further consideration, and that the Government ought to show, if they can, that under the law as it now stands the public health can be adequately protected.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

PROHIBITION OF THE LIQUOR TRAFFIC.

Mr. FLINT moved :

That it is expedient that as speedily as possible this Parliament should enact a law to prohibit the importation, manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors in Canada, except for medicinal, manufacturing and sacramental purposes.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I will not disguise from you that I approach the discussion of this resolution with a great deal of diffidence and with considerable anxiety. I desire, in presenting the case which is suggested by the terms of this resolution, that I should do so in such a manner as to attract support to it, and not to antagonize any possible source of opposition. The subject is one so broad, it touches so many points of interest to many classes of the people of this Dominion that it arouses, probably, more public interest than any other individual question which has come before this Parliament for consideration. At the outset of my observations I desire to state that the form of the resolution has been dictated by the fact that it represents the mature judgment and carefully arranged views of the prohibition party, so-called, of the Dominion of Canada; a party which comprises gentlemen upon both sides of politics, a party which includes men, and women also. I may add, representing every class and every creed in this broad Dominion. I desire that I may have the privilege to suggest such a line of discussion that political feeling may be avoided, and that the question may be discussed upon the broad platform, in which the interests of the community as a whole may be considered, rather than any narrow interests of any class or any particular party. Attention has already been called, and very naturally so, in the public press, to the peculiar wording of the resolution which I ask the House to adopt. It has been pointed out that there is a vagueness in the term: "That it is expedient that as speedily as possible this Parliament should enact a prohibitory law." Other resolutions that have been laid upon the Table of the House in other days, and that have been discussed and passed upon here, have stated in more explicit terms the desire of their supporters that Parliament should act upon the subject immediately, or at a definite time; and it may have appeared to many who are earnest and devoted in their desire to see a prohibitory liquor law enacted at once, that there has been a stepping away from that standpoint in the form of this resolution. But it will be recollected that at the beginning of the session, a large and influential delegation of the prohibition leaders from, I believe, all the provinces of the Dominion were assembled at the Capital for the purpose of interviewing the right hon. Prime Minister and his colleagues upon this great and important question. It will be remembered that in the able presentation of that case to the Prime Minister and to those of his colleagues who met these gentlemen upon that occasion, all the main and essential points of the prohibitory agitation were sketched, and a desire expressed by them that the Government of the country, as such, should take hold of the great problem connected with the prohibition of intoxicating liquors in Canada and act upon it as a Government question. It will be remembered also that the right hon. gentleman at the head of the Ministry, in very moderate terms indeed, pointed out some practical difficulties, why, even if the Government were so disposed, even if the Government were convinced that the position taken by the delegation was absolutely the correct position in the interests of the Dominion, there were practical difficulties in the way of the immediate acting upon those convictions. Practical difficulties were pointed out which convinced large numbers of hon. gentlemen favouring prohibition, who at the same time support the right hon. Premier in his political policy. They were convinced that upon that point at any rate, the Premier had taken a very strong stand. Many of these gentlemen, agreeing with him that it would be impracticable even if it were desirable, that the Government should forthwith frame a prohibitory liquor law, declined, in the conference which ensued, to commit themselves in opposition to the Premier's position. Many others, while thinking that the Premier's position was not sound, yet deemed it advisable, in the face of the fact that so prominent and able a leader of the dominant political party had taken that stand, that the phraseology of the resolution should be somewhat changed in order to meet the views of the Premier's supporters. Therefore I desire it to be understood, and I believe the supporters of the resolution generally desire it to be understood, that the expression "as speedily as possible" has reference to practical difficulties only—not to any doubt as to the ripeness of public opinion or as to the expediency and ability of the Dominion Government, if so disposed, to enforce and carry out, with proper support, any prohibitory law which Parliament may deem it advisable to enact; but only to such practical difficulties as would necessarily arise in the framing of a Bill at the present session of Parliament. I think the strongest advocate of prohibition present would be willing to give the framers of a prohibitory liquor law ample time in which to carefully consider all the outlines and details of such a measure; but we are strongly of opinion that the time is near when such a measure should be enacted, that public opinion is prepared to support it, and that it may be practically carried out with the support of public opinion behind it. Having said this much as to the phraseology of the resolution, I would advert to the peculiar character of the legislation which it asks for. There are, outside of the House, considerations of a very deep and important character which it is unnecessary and which it would be perhaps inadvisable to allude to here. There are moral and religious feelings aroused which it would be improper and inappropriate to discuss in Parliament. In my opinion the subject should be discussed in this House purely from a utilitarian and economic standpoint, and those other considerations which are of great weight and importance in sustaining such legislation, and which have sustained the agitation so far, should be left to operate in their own way to support the Government in the administration of the law after it is enacted. Public opinion has travelled far and fast since the inception of the history of prohibitory legislation in this country. In fact, from the very beginning of our history the liquor traffic has been treated in an exceptional manner. Let us go back as far as we may in the history of the country, and we find that from the very outset the peculiar effects of the use of intoxicating liquors have demanded at the hands of legislators peculiar treatment. Not as bearing peculiarly upon the question of prohibition, but as a historical incident showing the exceptional character of the evil with which prohibitionists at the present time are trying to deal, and with which the champions and friends of law and order generally have always, since we have had legislative institutions, attempted to deal, I would call your attention to the fact that at the very first meeting of one of the very first legislatures of the provinces, that of Nova Scotia, in 1758, the first Act passed by that Legislature was one referring to the importation of rum and distilled liquors, and, although I am not acquainted with the terms of the legislation, there can be no doubt, from the subsequent history of the dealings of legislatures with license Acts, and other liquor laws, that the object was of a restrictive character. In 1758 the fourth chapter of the Acts of the first Parliament of the province of Nova Scotia was an Act to prohibit the creation of distillery houses or the setting up of stills within the town of Halifax or within a quarter of a mile of the pickets of the said town. Later in the same sitting of the Legislature, drunkenness was among the evils or offences classed as crimes, and it was punished very severely as a crime against the community. From that time to the present the most rigid license laws have followed one after another in the Legislature of the province of Nova Scotia, as well as in the Legislatures of the other provinces now forming this great Dominion. As another historical fact of no little interest, throwing as it does a light on the early history of legislative attempts to restrict the evils of the liquor traffic, I may refer to an Act passed in 1792, in the first session of the Parliament of Upper Canada, held at Niagara, in which, dealing with the subject of licenses for the sale of intoxicating liquors, it was enacted that no licenses should be granted for retailing spirituous liquors in any jail. The inference, of course, would be that previous to the enactment of that law criminals or other prisoners confined in jail were allowed to purchase and use intoxicating liquors. The evils were so apparent that at the very first session of the first Parliament of Upper Canada, an absolute prohibition in this particular was decreed under the most severe penalties. And later, in 1793, legislation for restricting the sale of intoxicating liquors generally in the old province of Upper Canada was undertaken. I am aware that none of this legislation was of a prohibitory character; but it was of an exceptional character, passed many years before public opinion had induced or forced the Legislature to deal in the same manner with other articles which are now placed under the ban of the law. The very discussion which has just closed, referring to adulterated teas, and to the desirability, agreed upon on both sides of the House, of this Parliament enacting, if necessary, very stringent legislation prohibiting the importation into this country of adulterated teas, as well as the Acts on the Statute-book prohibiting the importation of adulterated articles of consumption of other kinds, show that the principle of prohibiting that which is deemed to be injurious to the public health or to the public interest is a well settled principle of our constitutional law. The history of the prohibitory agitation, so-called, in which the friends of good order and of temperance, in which the opponents of the use of intoxicating or spirituous liquors in any degree whatever, are engaged, is of great interest, and shows to what an extent the public mind as well as the feelings and actions of the leading public men of the Dominion have been operated upon since Confederation. Almost at the outset of confederation, there arose, in every province of the Dominion, an agitation to induce this Parliament to enact a prohibitory liquor law. Up to 1873, however, this agitation had not culminated in any very remarkable public exhibition. But in that year, I find that a strong effort was made in the House of Commons and the Senate to enact a complete prohibitory law. In 1873 a special committee of the Senate was appointed, owing to the flood of petitions which were pouring in upon the Senate and the House of Commons, to consider the whole subject. That committee reported, among other things, as follows:—

The committee consider the time has arrived when the earnest attention of the Government and of the Legislature should be given to this important subject, with a view of discovering and applying the best remedy for the gigantic evil that affects so seriously the peace and prosperity of the Dominion.

Mr. FLINT.

In that year 993 petitions, signed by 40,000 petitioners, were presented in the Senate. Nothing in particular came by way of legislation in reply to this earnest movement, so in the following year, the friends of the prohibitory cause again aroused themselves and made another effort to induce Parliament to accede to their views. I will, however, go back to the year 1873, before continuing my remarks regarding the year 1874, to show how strongly the committees appointed by this House viewed the necessity for some such enactment as I have described. The first report of the special committee appointed by this House concluded as follows:—

Further examination reveals the fact that a considerable portion of the respectability, the influence, the intellect and the wealth of the Dominion, has united in this protest against the evils of intemperance. Bishops, the clergy generally, judges, legislators, magistrates, public writers and very many of our merchants and manufacturers have given their names and their support to the furtherance of this good cause.

In that year 460,000 petitioners were represented in their demand upon Parliament to enact a prohibitory liquor law. The committee, at a later period of the session, added to their report a lengthy series of calculations and statements, and the conclusions to which they had arrived, from further examination of the evidence brought before them, are stated in their second report. The result of their most careful deliberations, based upon the facts to which they have had access, may be briefly summarized as follows:—

- First. That the traffic was an unmitigated evil.
- Secondly. That the petitions showed conclusively that the people of the Dominion are very strongly impressed with the enormity of the evils alluded to, and that in view of this strong and energetic demand, some action is necessary.
- Third. From the answers given by sheriffs, 114 of whom have voluntarily given evidence, your committee find that four-fifths of the crime in the province of Ontario is directly or indirectly connected with the manufacture, sale or consumption of intoxicating liquors.
- Fourth. In Ontario and Quebec out of 28,289 commitments to the jails for the three previous years, 21,336 were for drunkenness or for crime perpetrated under the influence of drink.
- Fifth. That the testimony of medical men is almost unanimous, that intoxicating liquor is not necessary as a beverage, and your committee find, from a careful investigation of the testimony, that a prohibitory liquor law may be enforced, that it is completely workable, and that the results would go to diminish crime, to diminish the expense of administering local affairs, to increase industry and promote general happiness and content.

The year 1874 was a year of considerable agitation in this House and throughout the country on this subject. Strong resolutions were introduced, lengthy debates were carried on, considerable feeling was evoked—so much so that it appeared to be almost the unanimous conviction of the House that the evils of the traffic in intoxicating liquor had not been exaggerated. In the minds of many, however, there was this difficulty, that possibly public opinion was not strong enough to support the carrying out of reasonable prohibitory legislation. I was pleased to see that you yourself, Mr. Speaker, in 1874, moved in the direction of prohibition. Your resolution was as follows :—

That the traffic in intoxicating liquors is an evil for which the laws of this country provide no adequate remedy, and that it is desirable to prohibit the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquor except for medicinal and manufacturing purposes.

Although this resolution received considerable support, yet, in the prevailing temper of the House of Commons as a whole, it was not assumed that it could be adopted, and it was consequently, after some discussion, withdrawn. But the result of the whole discussion, and of the strong agitation prevailing out of doors, induced the Government to consent to the adoption of a resolution looking in that direction, by the House of Commons, and the appointment of a commission to inquire into and report on this whole subject. The commission was appointed, and the matter of course stood over, pending the production of its report. In 1875, the report was brought before Parliament. The commissioners proved conclusively,—as conclusively as it was possible for intelligent men, having regard to the facts which came under their observation, to prove anything with regard to the economic results of any evil—that the liquor traffic and crime were inseparable, that restriction of the evil was followed by decrease of crime, that prohibitory legislation was practical and workable, that the principle had already been recognized by successive Parliaments in dealing with this as well as other subjects. That the principle had already been recognized by successive Parliaments, and that it was advisable, having these results in view, that Parliament should take some action looking in that direction. After a long discussion in this House, participated in by many gentlemen who were then and have since been distinguished as practical statesmen, the House, in Committee of the Whole, accepted this resolution :

That the most effectual remedy for the evils of intemperance would be to prohibit the manufacture, importation and sale of intoxicating liquors.

It is only fair to add that the report of the committee of the whole House was not accepted by the House itself. But the Senate committee, appointed to consider the same subject, reported as follows :—

That, in view of these facts and considerations, it appears just and expedient that the prayer of the petitioners should be granted. And that the time has now arrived when the attention of the Government should be given to this important question with a view to the introduction of a Bill to prohibit the manufacture, importation and sale of intoxicating liquors, except for mechanical and medicinal purposes, throughout the Dominion at the earliest date compatible with the public interests.

Here we have the House and the Senate conceding the magnitude of the evil shown by the petitioners, and conceding that the probable results of favourable action in the line of the prayer of the petition would be highly advantageous to the interests of the country as a whole. Even some who had strongly opposed the adoption of any stringent resolution at that time frankly admitted that prohibition in itself, if it could be enforced, would be a great advantage to every interest in the state. I find that Mr. Thompson, of Cariboo, who distinguished himself by his persistent opposition to granting the prayer of the petition and to the principal resolution then before the House, admitted that he would be quite prepared to support a prohibitory liquor law if he thought it could be carried into effect. The present Minister of Trade and Commerce, in the same session, was so strongly convinced that no other remedy existed for the great evils that had been sketched by the report of this commission, and had been adverted to during the course of debate, that he was moved to introduce an amendment to the main resolution then before the House in which he stated that it was the emphatic duty of the Government of the day to take up this question as an Administration, and to risk its power and influence upon the carrying into effect of so necessary a law. He stated that ever since he had had the honour of occupying a seat in Parliament the Table had every year been groaning with petitions in favour of prohibition, and he saw no other means out of the difficulties in which the liquor traffic had involved the people of this country but vigorous action upon the subject by the Administration. Later, in the year 1877, during another lengthy and able debate, in which this great subject was viewed in all its bearings, both as to the evils of the traffic and the difficulties of providing a remedy and as to the necessity that some remedies should be devised, a resolution was introduced by the present hon. Governor of the province of Manitoba (Mr. Schultz), and supported by him in a very vigorous manner. He made the following remarks :—

While it was true that he did not belong to any temperance organization, yet he would always remember with pleasure that the North-west Council, of which he had the honour to be a member, had passed early in its existence, the first prohibitory liquor law in Canada, and that the result had been that in over one-half of the Dominion, the manufacture and sale of liquors had been prohibited, and, with effects so good, that he would like to see the experiment tried in the other half.

Here we have the views of a practical man, one whose sincerity none could doubt, and who spoke of the question as the result of experience and who moved that the Government should take the matter up and bring it strongly and persistently before Parliament, and embody the principle, if possible, in a law. After that we were involved in the discussions and debates relative to the Scott Act, to the Liquor License Law, known as the McCarthy Act, and to the legislation in connection therewith. I will not occupy the time of the House with the discussion of these matters, but I can say that a reperusal of those discussions will be found replete with interest and information. The time when that legislation could be effectual, however, has in a large degree passed away, and those who support it have now gone further, and are pressing upon Parliament and the Government to prohibit entirely the importation, sale and manufacture of intoxicating liquors except for purposes which are mentioned in the resolution now before the House. In 1884 the present Finance Minister, after a speech of great ability, in which he seems to have brought to a focus the opinions of the wisest and greatest men of the English-speaking race, a speech in which almost every phase of this question was touched upon with earnestness and force, again appealed to Parliament to do something to remedy the evils of the liquor traffic. He proposed a resolution substantially similar to that which is now before you. But Parliament 10 years ago seemed to be of opinion that possibly such legislation would not be supported by the people of the country. We had not, at that time, had the advantage of the popular votes which have since informed Parliament of the wishes and views of the people generally, and his resolution was adopted with a rider providing that popular support should first be guaranteed to so drastic a measure. The resolution to which Parliament committed itself, after a debate of almost unexampled earnestness and remarkable ability, was in the following terms, the main motion having been moved by Mr. Foster and the rider by the late Hon. Thos. White :—

That the most effectual remedy for the evils complained of is to be found in the enactment and enforcement of a law prohibiting the importation, manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes. And this House is prepared, so soon as public opinion will sufficiently sustain stringent measures, to promote such legislation as far as the same is within the competency of Parliament.

I do not advert any further to what was said during that discussion than to quote one or two of the observations of the eloquent mover of the resolution. The hon. gentleman referred, as I have referred, to what every hon. gentleman must have observed, the very strong feeling in the country generally that Parliament should do something to stop the disorder and the loss caused by the traffic in intoxicating liquors. He also said that he felt he was within the mark when he stated that the evils resulting from the liquor traffic in the Dominion had done more to retard the prosperity of the country and sow germs of disorder and discontent than any other evils with which this country has been afflicted. Now, that was a strong statement, coming from one who, since that date, has risen high in the councils of the state, and who stands high in the confidence of hon. gentlemen opposite as a practical administrator; those are the words of one who has had long experience in the study and the discussion of all questions connected with the liquor traffic, as well as with those other questions which are connected with the economics of that trade. In the same debate, that hon. gentleman, in defending the grounds upon which such a resolution could fairly be adopted, used this language—and I will call the attention of the House to it, because this seems to afford a basis upon which we can all agree in dealing with this subject. He said :

We legislate to keep up the distillery, to keep up the brewery, to keep up the liquor shops of our country, which employ altogether some 11,000 or 12,000 persons. Now, there is another class in this country, and that is the 4,500,000, or over, who do not make and sell liquor. The legislation we have at present is in favour of the 11,000, but it is against the best interests of the 4,500,000. By the legislation now proposed, the good of the greater number is sought, and if it is admitted that the good of the greatest number ought to prevail, then the interest of the smaller number ought to go down.

It is, Sir, upon this line, and I was almost going to say upon this line only, that we can base legislation of the character now before us for reconsideration. I have always felt the force of the objection made to me by one who partakes of intoxicating liquors in moderation, that it is a strong step for the majority to take to deprive him of the pleasure or benefit which he may derive, or think he derives, from the use of this liquor in the manner which he deems best. But it seems to me that if we are to admit that plea to be sound in principle, then there goes by the board at one stroke almost all the legislation which this or any other country has enacted for the benefit of the vast majority of the people. It is none the less true in politics than in the everyday affairs of life, that that which is for the benefit of the greatest number must be considered rather than that which gratifies the smaller number. I admit that the evils that are to be overcome must be great in order to justify the legislator in resorting to that policy.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. FLINT. Mr. Speaker, when you left the Chair, I was adverting to the right and duty of Parliament to legislate in the interests of the mass of the community, even at the sacrifice of the personal feelings and interests of the few. And on this ground, that the safety of the people as a whole is the supreme law, a principle as old as society, coeval with the origin of jurisprudence, and practised without interruption in every free country since the institution of government. There is the implied assent of every individual that his personal welfare should, in case of need, give way to that of the community, and that his liberty even shall be limited by the requirements of the safety of the state. As a great writer puts it:

From the very nature of the social compact in which all municipal law is founded result those laws which, in certain cases, authorize the infliction of penalties, the privation of liberty, and even the destruction of life, with a view to the future prevention of crime and insuring the safety, and well-being of the public.

This principle derives its origin from absolute necessity, and that being so, the only question that naturally arises would be as to the proper time for its exercise by way of legislation. I contend that since this question of the prohibition of the liquor traffic was first brought before the public and Parliament, the whole burden of proof as to the weight and character of the evil caused by intemperance and by the traffic in spirituous liquors, has been shifted from the shoulders of those who ask for this legislation, to the other side; and that, taking into consideration the enormous literature on the subject, taking into consideration the vast mass of official reports that accumulate in our archives and libraries, and adding to that the express statements of statesmen, and men of letters, and men of observation, and the resolutions of Parliament itself, we are no longer called upon to expend our time in dwelling upon that phase of the question. It is to be taken for granted that the evils are of a serious and overwhelming character, and that some remedy must be provided if the state is properly to protect itself. I contend it is now fairly left to those who object to the form of remedy we propose, to point out where these evils have been exaggerated, or to point out in what direction a better remedy may be proposed. Before you left the Chair, I had touched upon the parliamentary history of the efforts made in the direction at which this resolution aims, and I had sketched roughly and hastily an outline of what had been done in Parliament up to 1884. After that period there were more resolutions presented, which, owing to various circumstances with which we are familiar, were either disposed of by some side wind or did not reach a conclusive vote; but in 1889 a resolution was adopted by this House strongly endorsing the position taken by us at the present time, with a proviso added that Parliament should wait until public opinion was ripe for this action. In other words, Parliament objected to immediate action and demanded that evidence should be given when public opinion was ripe for legislation in the matter. By way, however, of emphasizing the point to which I have alluded, namely, the character and mass of evils to which I am referring, and as a mere specimen of the evidence which can be produced in abundance, and which indeed has already been presented to Parliament in large quantities, I will quote briefly from a report presented to the British Parliament as long ago as 1834. That report was founded on an elaborate examination by a committee of able men, who summoned witnesses from every portion of the three kingdoms, and inquired into the whole of this great subject. It concludes:

The consequences of the vice of intoxication are so many and so fearful that it is difficult to enumerate them all in their melancholy details—and to pursue them would require a volume. Consequences to national welfare: 1. Destruction of grain—converted to poison. 2. Medical authorities uniform in their testimony that ardent spirits are poisonous to the human constitution. 3. Loss of productive labour—at least 1 day in 6 throughout the Kingdom. 4. Extensive loss of property at sea and on land. 5. Spread of crime. 6. Retardation of improvement. 7. The mere pecuniary loss to the nation from the several causes already mentioned may be fully estimated at little less than £50,000,000 sterling per annum.

That was sixty years ago, and that loss to the mother country has gone on accumulating and increasing from that time to the present. The human imagination is fairly staggered at an attempt to contemplate the ruin and devastation these figures necessarily represent. At the close of the report of the commission appointed under the auspices of this Parliament in 1874, we find the subject of right, duty, and power of Parliament to deal with the matter alluded to, and as a few of the quotations in this report are similar in their tenor and terms to an enormous mass that has already been stated in previous debates in this House, and as these quotations fairly reflect the opinions of the greatest jurists at the present time, I will quote some of them. Judge McLean, of the Supreme Court of the United States, in a judicial decision bearing on the right of the state to prohibit, for its own safety, made this statement:

If the foreign article (spirits for instance) be injurious to the health or morals of the people of the state community a state may in the exercise of that great and conservative police power which lies at the foundation of its prosperity prohibit the sale of it.

Although that refers to a state of the American union, the principle of law laid down applies to any sovereign state to which the question may be applicable. Justice Grier, in the same case, laid down as sound a principle of jurisprudence, the following :—

If the loss of revenue should accrue to the United States from a diminished consumption of ardent spirits, she will be a gainer a thousand fold in the health, wealth and happiness of her people.

I think I need not strengthen these points by further quotations, because, as I said before, the principle lies at the foundation of all our criminal and preventive legislation. It has been admitted on every occasion by this Parliament when legislation has been attempted, and although it has been objected, and strongly objected, that we cannot make men sober by Act of Parliament, yet Parliament has always acted upon the proposition and upon the principle that it was its duty to prevent any evil which interfered with the general prosperity of the mass of individuals of which the state is composed. While it may be true that we cannot make men sober by any Act of Parliament, yet it is equally true that by Act of Parliament we can remove from the way of those who are tempted and liable to be otherwise than sober the means of temptation and the means of self misery and self ruin which they bring on themselves. We cannot make men rich by Act of Parliament, and yet Parliament has acted for many years on the proposition that it was its duty to so legislate as to place the means of getting rich within the reach of a large class of the community. The whole substratum of the so-called National Policy has been based on this idea, and a large measure of the attacks which have been made upon the details, and even the principle of that policy, has been because the effect of the legislation proposed by the Administration has been to make certain classes of the community rich at the expense of the vast majority, a few rich at the expense of the many. So it is too late in the day to raise the objection to the principle, while perhaps, on matters of details, as to whether the time has arrived to apply it rigidly or not, may be possibly open to discussion. As bearing on this point, it will be only fair to lay before this House, as well as I can from the statistics within my reach, some idea of the greatness of the difficulty in the way of establishing prohibition in this country. It has been objected to the movement which we are endeavouring to carry out that the effect of this legislation will be a reduction in the revenue, the confiscation of property, the banishing of thousands of people from their homes, the lessening of trade, the spoliation of vested interests. Appeals have been made against this action on the ground that great danger and great injury will be caused to certain classes of the community. If we have no compensating advantages to point to in favour of the whole community, then much of this claim must be accepted.

Mr. FLINT.

We are called upon to point out the existence of the evil, and as bearing upon that the extent of the benefit that would be derived from abolishing it. I find from the Trade and Navigation Returns that of the imported manufactures, the total first cost of liquors imported into this country is as follows :—

IMPORTS, 1893.

| Total first cost..... | | 20,424,498 | |

I have estimated the value of these spirits to the best of my ability, and from inquiries I have made, at $1 per gallon, which gives the total wholesale cost at $20,424,498. While I submit this statement with diffidence, I may say that I submit it as agreeing with the statements of such eminent financiers as Sir Leonard Tilley and the present Finance Minister, as well as one or two other distinguished gentlemen who have discussed this question. I think it would be only fair to increase that first cost by 100 per cent, which would represent the actual cost to the consumers of intoxicants in the Dominion at $40,000,000. In order to show that these figures are not unreasonable I undertook to estimate in another way as to how much the people of the Dominion were paying directly for spirituous and intoxicating liquors, and I found that of spirits, wines and liquors, there were imported and manufactured in Canada according to the following table :—

| | Gallons. | Per gallon | Value. |
| | | $ | $ |
| Imported spirits.... | 909,402 | 6 00 | 5,456,412 |
| do wines..... | 485,746 | 5 00 | 2,428,730 |
| do malt liquor | 329,653 | 3 00 | 988,959 |
| Total..... | 1,724,801 | | 8,874,102 |
| Entered for consumption..... | 2,731,896 | 5 00 | 13,659,480 |
| Malt liquor..... | 16,964,211 | 60 | 10,178,266 |
| Total..... | | | 32,711,848 |

I have taken still another method to ascertain the amount that the people of Canada are annually paying for intoxicating liquor, and that is shown by the following table :—

| | Gallons. | Value. | Duty. |
|---|------------|------------------------|-----------|
| | | $ | $ |
| Imported..... | 1,724,811 | 1,604,135 | 2,359,828 |
| Manufactured spirits..... | 2,731,896 | 2,731,896 | 4,139,306 |
| Malt liquor..... | 17,175,356 | 5,152,606 | 1,001,655 |
| Total duty..... | 21,631,063 | 9,488,537 7,500,789 | 7,500,789 |
| First cost, total..... | | 16,989,426 | |
| Ultimate cost to consumer, adding 100 per cent..... | | 16,989,426 | |
| Grand total cost to consumer..... | | 32,978,852 | |

So I think taking all those estimates together it would be only reasonable to conclude that the consumers of the Dominion are paying as a first cost at the time of consumption, about from $35,000,000 to $40,000,000 per annum for the cause of the evils to which I have referred. This is much larger than the annual customs revenue; it is larger I believe than the whole revenue paid to the Dominion. And now the question arises: What advantages are claimed to any class or to the community from the machinery, and from the persons employed in manipulating the machinery, which causes this expense to the country, and which produces these evils to the individuals who consume it. I find from the returns that we have 162 breweries, 8 distilleries and 5 maltsters' establishments in the Dominion, which employ machinery to the value of $1,469,000; that the number of employees is 2,243; that the capital invested in breweries is $8,309,644; that the capital invested in distilleries is $7,054,000 or a total amount of capital, in breweries and distilleries in the Dominion of $15,363,664. The total amount of wages paid in breweries and distilleries is as follows:— In breweries, $891,381 per annum; in distilleries, $178,950, or a total of $1,070,331 per annum. I found it very difficult to make the figures of the output agree with those in the Inland Revenue returns, but I presume there were difficulties in my way of making this estimate. However, the output as given by the statistical authorities is as follows:— Breweries, $5,717,873; distilleries, $2,199,600; total, $7,916,473. The total number of employees in breweries are 1,840, and in distilleries, 403, making 2,243. Adding to this the estimate made by the Hon. Mr. Foster in his speech in 1884, the 12,000 persons engaged in this trade other than the manufacture, we would have in the neighbourhood of 14,000 or 15,000 persons altogether concerned in the production and sale of spirits and liquors manufactured and imported in the Dominion of Canada. The question is: Whether the interests and benefits of these 14,000 or 15,000 persons are to be paramount to the interests of the rest of our population who go to make up the five millions odd in Canada? The question is: Whether the $15,000,000 of capital now employed in breweries or distilleries are to prevail over the $353,836,817 of capital employed in the other industries of the country which are adversely affected by the prevalence and increase of the evils caused by the liquor traffic. The question is whether the interests of ten or twelve thousand employees, including the bar-tenders and all others concerned in handling this product, are to be preferred to the interests of the 367,865 employees in the other factories of the country. The question is as to the ratio of loss to gain which would be occasioned to the one hundred millions of wages paid out in the other manufacturing interests of the country; the effect it would have on the production of the $256,000,000 worth per annum of manufactured materials; the effect it would have upon increasing the product represented by other manufactured goods to the value of over $475,000,000; the ratio which the complete wiping out of this capital, if it were to be wiped out, and the change of occupation of these ten or twelve thousand employees, would bear to our export of natural products, amounting in 1893 to about $119,000,000. I contend, Sir, that large as the figures of the liquor manufacturing and sale business seem when treated by themselves, they sink into utter insignificance as compared with the general interests of the country as represented by its productions and its exportations of raw material and by its products of manufactured goods, against which no such charge can be laid as is laid against the manufactured products of the industries we are discussing. At the same time, I am not prepared to admit that prohibition would necessarily destroy all the capital which is invested in breweries and distilleries. No doubt to a certain degree it would be impaired. The buildings could be used for other purposes, some of the machinery could be disposed of for other purposes, and all the employees' would in a short time find remunerative employment in occupations that would benefit and not in any degree injure the state. But, say our objectors, you are striking down a great source of revenue; you are impairing the credit of the country; how are you going to replace the $7,500,000 of revenue now paid into the Dominion by those who produce this manufactured product? I am willing to admit, as I think all candid men must admit, supposing the prohibition of the liquor traffic to come into effect, that at first the loss of revenue would be appreciated and would be of some importance—that there would be a temporary sacrifice. This could easily be made up in many ways. But I differ entirely from those who claim that the advocates of a prohibitory liquor law who are willing to admit that this revenue would be struck out, are obliged by any rule of honour or discussion, to point out in detail the methods by which that revenue could be made up. I think no parliamentary leader of experience has ever laid down the rule that it is the duty of those who criticise the means of raising the revenues for carrying on the Government of the country, to lay down in detail the methods they would adopt for making up the revenues in case the policy of the Government should change. It is sufficient for our purpose to show, as I believe we can abundantly show, that there are many ways in which the revenues could be made up—that the general prosperity of the state would be so enhanced, that industry would be so relieved from unfair and unjust taxation, that other products on which a reasonable amount of taxation could justly be levied would be consumed by the people to such an extent, as to make up and counterbalance in time the loss of revenue. I think I am justified in stating, from what has come under my own observation, and from the tone and temper of the great prohibitory party of the Dominion—now represented, as we claim, by the majority of the electors—that they are willing to bear any reasonable sacrifice that may be necessary in order to make up the deficiency in the revenue until the natural course of events would bring about those circumstances which would necessarily come in a few years after the adoption of the policy, and until the revenue could be supplemented fully from other sources. This is not a new question. It has been discussed by some of the most eminent men of the day, men whose names are familiar to this Parliament, men whose names are household words the world over. If, as Mr. Gladstone has said, the curse of the liquor traffic has caused more loss than war, pestilence or famine, then it would not be too much to ask of the patriotic people of any country to put up with any sort of taxation whatever that could protect them from such dangers and calamities. In 1884, in this House, Sir S. L. Tilley—I think he was Finance Minister at the time—in the course of the debate on prohibition, made this observation :

Of course the Finance Minister would naturally look to the matter of revenue, but that in my opinion is but a feather in the scale when compared with the beneficial effects that would follow the practical working of prohibition. I would vote for it most cheerfully, and, as Finance Minister, prepare ways and means to make up any deficiency that would arise if we were in a position to say that if such a law were enacted it would be sustained.

I think it would be superfluous for me to add a word to what has been so strongly stated by a practical statesman who had the confidence of this Parliament. At an earlier period, speaking in the mother country, the same distinguished financier made the following remarks bearing on this point :—

It has been my misfortune or fortune, having been a great many years in the Government of my native province of New Brunswick and in the Government of the Dominion to hold the post of Finance Minister in all these Governments, and I have never heard but one opinion about the revenue question, namely, that it is of quite secondary importance, though it is, I admit, a more difficult matter with you.

The revenue we obtain the Dominion of Canada is probably 5 or 6 million of dollars a year and it cost the people $20,000,000 in providing it for us. No Finance Minister would remain long in office who would, in this day, propose a scheme for raising a revenue of $5,000,000 that would cost $2,000,000 to collect.

Upon the same subject we have the opinion of an English financier and statesman whom no one would ever accuse of impracticability or of fanatical sensationalism, the late Lord Idlesleigh, then Sir Stafford Northcote, who, speaking as Chancellor of the Exchequer upon the Budget, observed :

If the reduction the revenue derived from spirits be due to a material and considerable change in the habits of the people, and increasing habit of temperance and abstinence from the use of ardent spirits, I intend to say that the amount of wealth such a change would bring to the nation, would utterly throw into the shade the amount of revenue that is now derived from the spirit duty; and we should not only see with satisfaction a diminution of the revenue from such a cause, but we should find in various ways that the exchequer would not suffer from the losses which it might sustain in that direction.

Now, although Sir Stafford Northcote alluded to the diminution of the revenue caused by the change in the habits of the people, yet precisely the same result must accrue if the change in the habits of the people were caused by legislation. Mr. Gladstone, in reply to the prayer of a deputation, said :

Gentlemen, you need not give yourselves any trouble on the score of revenue. That question need never stand in the way of reform. Besides, with a sober population, not wasting their earnings, I shall know where to obtain a revenue.

These are not statements of unreasoning fanatics, or of gentlemen unversed in practical politics. They are the calm and deliberate statements of experienced statesmen, men in whom the world has grown accustomed to place confidence, and whose words should always have weight in this Parliament when subjects of that character are discussed. There was an extraordinary opportunity for observing the effect on the national welfare of the diminution in the use of intoxicating spirits, in the case of Ireland, during the great campaign waged in that country by Father Matthew, from 1839 to 1845. We are all aware that at the beginning of that temperance agitation, Ireland was in a very distressed condition, owing to the evils of the use of strong drink. Though, naturally rich, and quite prosperous in some other respects, yet so great was the disorder, wretchedness, and misery caused by the abuse of spirituous and malt liquors in Ireland, that many of her best friends almost gave up, in despair as to the future. So moved was Father Matthew that he started out on the crusade, famous in the history of moral and social reform, and made a world-wide reputation through his persuasive powers over the Irish people. I quote from the History of Ireland, by Sullivan, the well-known author, the following remarks:—

Five millions of people took Father Matthew's pledge. The annual consumption of spirits fell from 11,595,536 gallons in 1837, to 6,485,443 gallons in 1841.

Adverting to the state of the country, at the close of that period, Mr. Sullivan says:

The fame of his labours and his success filled the city. Every street, every lane and alley, every large workshop had its story of the marvellous change from misery and want to comfort and happiness wrought in some particular case by "joining Father Matthew." * * * * It may be estimated that in 1845 the temperance movement had attained to its topmost height in Ireland. What had it to show for itself? What were its visible fruits by this time? It is no exaggeration to say it had effected an astonishing transformation. It could not bring to Ireland that prosperity and wealth which flows from increased production or multiplied resources. The condition of the bulk of the population was at best, as the world soon afterwards came to know, terribly precarious. But, subject to this reservation, it may be said that never had a people made within the same space of time such strides from hardship to comparative comfort, from improvidence to thrift, from the crimes of inebriate passion to the ordered habits of sobriety and industry. I speak of what I saw. The temperance movement had not, I repeat, removed the deep-lying political causes of lust, poverty and crime, but it brought to the humblest some amelioration of his lot; it banished from thousands of homes afflictions that politics could neither create nor cure; it visibly diffused the feeling of self-respect and the virtue of self-reliance among the people. * * * * To this purpose came testimony from every side. The magistracy and police told of crime greatly diminished. The clergy told of churches better filled with sincere and earnest worshippers. Traders rejoiced to find how vast was the increase in popular expenditure in articles of food and clothing or of home and personal comfort. There is official evidence in abundance on this point. As early as 1840, the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, in a public letter said: "To the benefit which the temperance pledge has conferred upon Ireland, in the improved habits of the people and in the diminution of outrage, His Excellency bears grateful testimony."

Like declarations might be cited from executive officials throughout the later years up to 1845.

The police returns for the period are equally striking; but so many circumstances have to be weighed and calculated in considering the fluctuations in "criminal statistics" in Ireland, that, as a general rule, I lay but little stress upon what they show.

Still it is rather convincing to find that the annual committals to prison in the seven years 1839 to 1845, with a rapidly increasing population, show a steady decrease from 12,000 to 7,000; that the capital sentences in each year declined gradually from 66 to 14; and that the penal convictions sank from 900 in 1839 to 500 in 1845.

The whisky trade was for the time annihilated.

This shows what an almost immediate effect prohibition would bring about. While upon that subject, I will quote another author, Porter's "Progress of the Nation," showing the effects in Ireland of this voluntary prohibition, in a very short time. The amount of distilled liquors in 1838 was 12,296,342 gallons, and the revenue £1,434,573. In 1841, the amount fell to 6,485,000 gallons, and the revenue had decreased to £864,726. And yet the deposits in the savings banks had increased from £2,048,469 in 1838 to £2,302,302 in 1841, and £2,921,581 in 1845. In other words, the increase in seven years of the deposits in the savings banks in Ireland, during which the whisky revenue fell off so enormously, was over $4,365,000 of our Canadian money. Crime decreased from 26,392 cases in 1839, to 16,696 in 1845. The revenue, which our friends who object to prohibition are so timid about, increased from £1,691,515 on customs in 1839, to £2,030,159 in 1841, showing that during these years, the customs revenue increased nearly £340,000, and the excise revenue remained about the same. At the end of 1845 the customs revenue had increased to £2,126,149, and excise had fallen to £1,147,900. In other words, while crime decreased and while the revenue from whisky decreased, the general prosperity of the country was so markedly increased, that it affected the deposits in the savings banks by nearly a million pounds, and it affected crime to such a degree that the percentage of falling off was over 50 per cent. I have no doubt that, were the figures accessible, many more in the same line could be adduced; but I found an embarrassment in the fact that the statements of Irish revenue were so confused with those of English revenue that it was difficult to arrive at an exact result. Having dealt with the revenue question, it would only be proper to advert to the results which would follow the practical adoption of a prohibitory liquor law. We have been told that there would be a great loss to the country owing to the loss of capital now invested in the manufacture of intoxicating liquors, and to the throwing out of employment of the people engaged in the various branches of this traffic. But, unfortunately for those who make this claim, the facts of history are against them; did time permit, we could occupy the attention of this House from now until a reasonable date for prorogation with quotations showing the direct contrary. That prohibition does not decrease the prosperity of a country I think is evident from the statistics which can be gathered from the records of the State of Maine. That State is well known to have carried out, as effectually, perhaps, as it could be carried out, a prohibitory liquor law; and we might possibly expect that there, if anywhere would be seen any evils arising from the operation of such drastic restriction. In the first place, no public man in the State of Maine, in the present temper of the public mind, would propose such a thing as going back upon prohibition as it now exists there. That small state, with a population of 661,000 people, and having by no means the resources I will not say of the Dominion, but even of the Maritime Provinces, has to-day deposited in the savings banks, $50,277,000, being $10,000,000 more than the deposit in the savings banks of the whole Dominion, with its population of over five millions of souls. The savings banks' deposits in other States which have prohibitory laws also largely exceed proportionally those in the Dominion of Canada. There are several States of the Union that have adopted prohibition, among them Kansas, which, from 1880 to 1890, increased in population by 43 per cent; Iowa, 18 per cent; South Dakota, 234 per cent; North Dakota, 395 per cent; Maine did not increase appreciably in population, but increased greatly in wealth; New Hampshire increased about 8 per cent; and in Vermont there was scarcely any increase. And yet, in all these cases, the increase of wealth was most marked. The following table shows the increase in wealth in the prohibition States between 1880 and 1890, according to the census of the United States:—

|------------------|-------------|-------------|-----------|
| | $ | $ | |
| Kansas..... | 160,570,761 | 348,459,942 | 117 |
| Iowa..... | 398,671,251 | 530,695,141 | 33 |
| Maine..... | 235,978,716 | 309,129,101 | 31 |
| Vermont..... | 86,806,775 | 171,263,543 | 98 |
| New Hampshire.. | 164,755,181 | 252,722,016 | 53 |
| North Dakota.... | 8,786,572 | 78,885,142 | 875 |
| South Dakota.... | 11,534,058 | 131,592,587 | 1090 |

Mr. FLINT.

I am not quoting these valuations to show that its vast increase in wealth was caused by the enactment of a prohibitory liquor law, but to show that prohibition did not operate in any way to decrease the prosperity and growth in wealth of those states that were endeavouring to carry it out. The State of Iowa, with a population of a little less than two millions, has over $26,000,000 on deposit in its savings banks. Vermont, with a population of 332,286, has over $24,000,000 in its savings banks; and in New Hampshire, with 376,530 of a population, the deposits in the savings banks amount to $74,377,279. I will not occupy your time further with quotations upon this line. Those I have given, and many others that I might give, show conclusively that, whatever effect prohibition may have, it has not the effect in any way of diminishing the prosperity of a country. On the contrary, there can be no doubt that, as it diminishes crime, and the cost of caring for criminals, as it diminishes vice and wretchedness, it must add to the productive power of a country's industry. So, if prohibition caused the State to do without the revenue from the sale of intoxicating liquors, it adds to the wealth of the State the money that would otherwise be expended in a ten-fold ratio in connection with the evils which the liquor traffic produces. We have the testimony of the most distinguished observers in these several States which we have the right to accept as proving the result of the prohibitory enactment. In Vermont, Attorney-General Plumley says:

Every year shows improvement in the enforcement of the law, and the decrease of intemperance and crime.

Such statements show not only that the law is not a dead letter, but that it is in force, and that men who are responsible for the enforcement of the law, and who represent the State in high positions regard the enforcement as satisfactory and believe that the good results are equally perceptible. The President of the State Agricultural Society of Vermont, says:

Prohibition is the best law for Vermont, as shown by the almost entire absence of intemperance and crime.

Let us turn now to the State of Iowa, where also prohibition is in force with some beneficial results. We find that no less an authority than United States Senator Wilson, a gentleman whose reputation extends beyond the boundaries of his own State and who is looked upon as an authority, says:

In every desirable aspect of the case prohibition has been beneficial to Iowa. As respects business, value of property, moral and educational conditions, diminution of crime and criminal expenses and domestic phases of society—Iowa stands at the head of the list.

Chaplain Williams, of the Iowa State penitentiary, says:

The business of making criminals fell off remarkably upon the passage of the prohibitory law.

Governor Larabee says :

I think more than half of the jails are empty. Expenses of criminal courts have decreased. Tramps are very scarce in Iowa. Probably 3,000 of their recruiting stations have been closed. The families of labouring men now receive the savings that used to go to the saloons.

Kansas is another State in the neighbouring Republic which has tried prohibition. After much agitation, public opinion was crystallized into law, and to-day Kansas may fairly be said to be a strong prohibitory State. The fact that the law is violated here and there, the fact that men can procure, by devious ways, an illegal means of satisfying their depraved appetites, is no proof that prohibition cannot be, and is not, reasonably well enforced. It is admitted on all sides that many laws which are recognized as wise and judicious, and which no statesman would dare to suggest should be repealed, are not well enforced in all parts of the country ; they are occasionally violated, and because they are occasionally violated, we insist all the more strongly that those whose duty it is to attend to the administration of justice should see that these laws are as rigidly enforced as the circumstances of the case will admit. We have found that Governor Humphrey, of Kansas, uses this language :

The records of courts and of prisons, from the city calaboose to the penitentiaries, show a diminution of crime, bearing the most incontestible evidence of the efficiency of the law.

The late Senator J. J. Ingalls says :

Kansas has abolished the saloon. A drunkard is a phenomenon. The bar-keeper has joined the troubador, the crusader and the mound-builder. The brewery, the distillery and the bonded warehouse are known only to the archæologist.

The late respected Senator Plumb, of Kansas, says :

There has been a great diminution in the consumption of liquors, and in the consequent drunkenness and crime, in the State of Kansas, as the result of the exclusion of the saloon.

Congressman Kelly, Kansas, says :

No law ever passed has added so much to the comfort and happiness of the people as the prohibitory law in Kansas.

Chief Justice Horton, Kansas, says :

Under the law of Kansas the open saloon has been banished utterly from its limits.

Governor Martin, of Kansas, says:

There is no longer any controversy in Kansas concerning the results and beneficence of the temperance laws. Fully nine-tenths of the drinking and drunkenness has been abolished.

Rev. D. Kelly, United States Pension Agent, at Topeka, Kansas in 1880, compiled a statement of the paupers and criminals of the 106 counties of Kansas. This list showed forty-four counties without a pauper, and thirty-seven without a criminal in jail. I can quote an enormous mass of testimony of an official character, given by the Governors of Maine in their official addresses to the State Legislature, extending from 1871 down to the present year, but it would be unfair to occupy your time with reading these addresses. I can only direct the attention of those who are interested in the inquiry, to the original sources of this information, the official reports of the State of Maine. Almost without exception, every chief Executive of that State has given his testimony in the strongest and most unmistakable manner, as to the beneficial results of prohibition in the State, as to its complete practicability, and as to the fact that after an experience in prohibition extending over forty years, public opinion is stronger to-day than it ever was in maintaining the law. No public man, expecting to continue to represent the intelligent people of that wealthy and prosperous community, would retain his public position for an hour if he undertook to oppose the continuance of that law. I think it only fair to quote a few words from that distinguished prohibitionist venerated throughout the world for his services in behalf of the cause of temperance, Neal Dow, still living at the age of ninety years, who, looking back upon a triumphal record in connection with this great reform, says :

There were no people in the Union who consumed more strong liquors in proportion to numbers than those of Maine had done. There were many distilleries in the State ; grog shops were everywhere, there was no hamlet so small and retired that the drink fiend did not find it and establish a drunkard factory there. The result of this wonderful resolution (1851) was immediate and plainly seen throughout the State. All decent men everywhere employed in the liquor traffic abandoned it at once. The diminution of the liquor trade was so sudden and so great that within six months the jails in the counties of Penobscot, Kennebec, Franklin, Oxford and York were empty. The jail in the most populous county, Cumberland, had for years been badly overcrowded but within six months it had only 5 inmates, three of them were rumsellers. The House of correction for Cumberland County was entirely empty. The immediate decrease of the number of paupers in our workhouse was like that of the occupants of our jails. The law was well enforced generally throughout the State. In Portland, before the law, there were many poor, ragged and barefooted children begging cold victuals from door to door. Within six months after the enactment of the law all that disappeared from our streets and not a fragment of it remains at this day. It is within the fact to say that less than 1-20th of the quantity of liquors formerly sold in the State is now smuggled in and sold in violation of the law.

The quantity of liquor now sold in Portland is not 1-100th part so great as it was formerly, the city being twice larger now than it was when the law was enacted. Formerly liquor equal to the entire valuation of the State were sold in every period of 20 years as they are now sold in the nation to the value of all its property in every period of 35 years. Maine was formerly the poorest State in the Union; now it is one of the most prosperous. We save and have been saving more than 20 million dollars annually, which but for prohibition would be wasted in drink.

This testimony, which could be amply corroborated, if time permitted, by other quotations, amply vindicates the position we take that not only would the law be beneficial, but that it could be practically worked, with one condition, and that is that the people generally favoured it. So strong has this conviction been that public men have been induced, in many provinces of the Dominion, to ask the question formally of the people by means of a plebiscite, whether they are of opinion that it is desirable to prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquor. The figures have been given in the public press from time to time, but I think no argument on this subject would be complete unless they were repeated here. The province of Manitoba was the first to lead off in ascertaining the wishes of the people in regard to prohibition. A vote was taken, I believe, in 1892, resulting in favour of prohibition. The vote stood, 18,637 for; and 7,115 against; a majority of 11,522 in favour of a prohibitory liquor law in the province of Manitoba. In this connection we have an appeal to this Parliament from the Legislature of Manitoba, based upon the results of this plebiscite, which I feel it my duty to read to the House:

Whereas by an Act of the Legislature of the province of Manitoba, assented to on the 20th April, 1892, entitled "An Act to enable the electors of Manitoba to register their votes upon the advisability of the introduction of a law totally prohibiting the importation, manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors as a beverage into or in the province of Manitoba," it was provided that at the then next ensuing general election of members of the Legislative Assembly, an opportunity should be given the electors of the province of Manitoba to record their opinions upon the advisability of the introduction of a law prohibiting the importation, manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors in the province of Manitoba by marking ballot papers either "For Prohibition" or "Against Prohibition" and depositing such ballot papers in the ballot boxes at the time of such general election.

And whereas, afterwards, in accordance with the provisions of the said last mentioned Act, on the 23rd day of July, 1892, the day on which such general election was held, a majority of the electors of Manitoba went under the provisions of the said Act and recorded their opinions upon the question in said Act set forth, and the result of said vote according to the ballot papers marked and deposited was as follows:—

For prohibition, 18,137.

Against prohibition, 7,115.

Thereby demonstrating that an overwhelming majority of the electors of this province who then voted are in favour of the total prohibition of the importation, manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors as a beverage into or in the province of Manitoba;

Mr. FLINT.

And whereas the liquor traffic and its results, is an evil that entails upon the people of this province an incalculable amount of loss and suffering, and is productive of vice, disease and crime to a greater extent than any other cause;

And whereas it is deemed to be the duty of this house to place upon record its strong condemnation of a traffic demoralizing in its tendency and calculated to retard and hamper the moral and material welfare of the province;

And whereas it appears that full legislative power in respect of the premises rests in the Parliament of Canada; and whereas this legislature agrees to supplement, if necessary, any effective prohibitory liquor law passed by the Dominion Parliament by appropriate legislation.

Petitioners therefore pray, that your honourable body shall, with all convenient speed, enact a law prohibiting the importation, manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquor as a beverage into or in the province of Manitoba.

So we have here in the most formal manner possible the appeal of the electors and Legislature of Manitoba to enact a prohibitory liquor law, and pledging the faith and honour of the people to support such supplementary legislation as may be necessary in the premises. Prince Edward Island was also appealed to, and I hold in my hand the result of the vote in that fine province. The vote was as follows:—For, 10,616; against, 3,390; total majority, 7,226; or, in Prince County an average of $3\frac{1}{4}$ to 1; in Queen's, $2\frac{3}{4}$ to 1; in Kings', $3\frac{2}{3}$ to 1. The great, wealthy, fine province of Ontario has also spoken on this question, and the figures are significant of the wish and desire of a majority of the people. The statistics are so familiar to members of the House that I will not read them in detail; but suffice it to say that the total vote for was as follows:—In the counties, 154,009 for, and 21,923 against; in the cities, 30,136 voted for, and 21,923 against; in the districts, 8,342 voted for and 4,968 against; total for 192,497, against 110,757, leaving a majority of 81,730, deducting 10,203 as being the votes of women, still leaves a majority of 71,527. But it is only fair to assume that although I have deducted the votes of women, they represent a very strong power and a highly cultivated public opinion, an influence which will be of the greatest value in sustaining the law if we ever succeed in having it placed on the Statute-Book. While I admit that a law can only be sustained by strong public sentiment, it is greatly fostered by that class of the community. I come next to my own fair province, Nova Scotia, and I am glad to say that at the plebiscite taken at the last provincial elections, it gave a majority of 31,400 in favour of prohibition, the figures being 43,750 in favour and 12,350 against. We thus find that the people have spoken as plainly as possible on this question. They have complied as far as possible with the request of this Parliament to show that they would support any legislation looking to the prohibition of the liquor traffic. They have answered the question as to whether public opinion is ripe for the necessary legislation, and whether the people are willing to give effect to these views. Looking over this whole subject, I think, taking into consideration the nature of the resolution, I hold that Parliament should stamp with its approval the appeal that is made, that as speedily as possible we should enact a prohibitory law, with exceptions in favour of the use of alcoholic liquors for medicinal, manufacturing and sacramental purposes. Sir, I have made no attempt to press upon your attention all the considerations that might be urged in favour of prohibitory legislation. Any attempt to exhaust the argument would exhaust the patience of my hearers as well. In the time I had placed at my disposal I have touched upon a few only of the more obvious objections and answers daily arising in the discussions upon this great subject, the vast literature of which covers not only the ground I have just traversed, but takes into its consideration almost the whole field of political, social, and moral economy. I have shown, I trust, that Parliament has the power as well as the duty thrown upon it of dealing with the liquor traffic on the lines laid down in the resolution I have presented. It has been shown that a prohibitory law can be efficiently carried into operation, and that its effects when fairly worked are favourable to every proper interest of the state. It has been abundantly shown, not only in what I have just urged but in the whole tenor of the former debates in this House that the traffic in alcoholic liquors is the cause of the greatest evils which afflict society. From the opinions of statesmen and jurists, from the expressions of the views of the most sagacious and competent observers in all countries; from the official reports of associations especially devoted to inquiry in this branch of social reform, and from the results of investigations made at the expense of, and under the sanction of the state itself, and even from the formal resolutions of this Parliament of Canada, the conclusion has been irresistibly forced upon a large majority of the best people of Canada, that the wisdom and practical statesmanship of the present day have no profounder problem with which to grapple than the one to which your attention is now invited. The liquor habit, it has been demonstrated, is an enemy to personal health and mental vigour, to the peace and happiness of the home and to the industrial interests of every community in proportion as it has gained a foothold. The traffic, as it is now carried on, under the sanction and with the protection of the state is the fruitful source of drunkenness and crime and, because of its demoralizing tendencies in every direction in which its influence is exerted it has become the enemy and oppressor of the state itself. It is hostile to industry, to purity in political and social life, and to that good citizenship which is the salvation and ought to be the pride of sound government. It wastes the resources of the vast majority of those whose means are used to sustain it, it throws extra burdens of taxation and the responsibility for good government upon the shoulders of the sober, industrious, and thrifty, and flings upon the care and charity of society the innocent victims of the ravages of intemperance. But, say objectors, there is a public compensation. Look at the revenue derived from the traffic; look at the thousands employed in the manufacture and sale of liquors; look at the capital engaged in the liquor business, and the wages paid in carrying it on, and say if you would deprive society and the state of the advantages of these resources and expenditure! These are the compensations for disorder, for poverty, vice, crime, public loss, and embarrassment, for personal and domestic suffering indescribable and for a burden of taxation, a wasteful and reckless extravagance and expenditure far exceeding in amount and capability of injury all the fancied and imaginary benefits claimed for the liquor traffic. Sir, there is no comparison between the assumed gain and the certain loss. The state gathers a few millions, while individuals who might otherwise support the state's great enterprises squander five times the amount. While we put into our treasury some seven millions of gold annually we witness without dismay an annual waste of thirty-five of forty millions expended in alcoholic liquors and with it the ruin of thousands of homes, the wreck of almost measureless resources, which would otherwise go to strengthen a genuine prosperity. Sweep away the traffic by an adequate law of prohibition. Refuse it the sanction of the Government and Legislature and the revenue from it will scarcely be missed in the general buoyancy of the national income derived from other sources. We have the assurances of statesmen of the highest eminence, some of whom are yet in the practical administration of affairs, that the immediate and certain benefits which must accrue will far outweigh in value and importance, the loss to the revenues of the country. The revenue depreciation will be slight and temporary; the public gain will be permanent and vast. The growth in the general revenues will more than counterbalance the depreciation from special sources, while the great individual and domestic, not to mention the moral, benefits will forever remain to upbuild and strengthen every true national interest. Industry will be promoted, because relieved of unjust and unfair burdens of taxation, political life will be purified and ennobled, because relieved of the degrading and unhealthful influence of the saloon and grog-shop, and social happiness will be promoted by the rapid disappearance of those vices which always accompany drunkenness. In the improved habits of the classes yet degraded by the curse of alcoholism, in the reduction of pauperism and crime, in the better enforcement of our laws, in the enhanced rewards of thrift and industry, in the advantage of capital and labour transferred to better fields of competition, in the increased values of property, in the prosperity of thousands, whose lives are now productive of only wastefulness and loss, and the wider diffusion of comfort and happiness throughout every portion of our Dominion we will have our reward for the enacting of a prohibitory liquor law. No prohibitionist claims that such an enactment would furnish a panacea for all the evils that afflict society. Others would remain to tax the wisdom and industry of successive Parliaments. The abuses of century old habits and laws are not removed in a day or a year. There must be periods of anxiety and of struggle, as in the history of every reform which has blest humanity. New light, new laws and better conditions must ever make their way by warfare against ignorance, selfishness, and corruption. But the result, if the majority is constant and patient, need not be doubted. Supported by constitutional majorities whose will in this free country makes and unmakes Administrations, and whose determination decides policies and the character of laws, the prohibition of the liquor traffic, that fountain of wrong and damage, will ultimately take its place among the most revered and most loyally sustained of our public statutes. I trust, Sir, that this Parliament will not neglect the cry which comes from every province of the Dominion to give them this legislation as soon as practicable. I trust that the Government may be able to give us the assurance of their loyal support. The circumstances are propitious for dealing with the question at an early day, and the desire is : that the Government will as speedily as possible, having regard only and solely to the difficulties of arranging the details, bring this matter before the consideration of Parliament. I hope, Sir, that the Government of this country, or that the framers of this resolution, can rely upon sympathy from every hon. gentleman upon both sides of this House without regard to party. I should deplore this ever being made a party question. I believe it should rise above and beyond party politics, and I earnestly trust that all good men representing the wishes of the people will combine to place upon our Statute-book a law which will be necessarily productive of the good results which I have endeavoured to sketch.

Mr. ROOME. Mr. Speaker, in rising to second this resolution, which has been moved by the hon. member for Yarmouth (Mr. Flint), I now do so with a good deal of diffidence. If it was not that the hon. gentleman had gone into the subject so fully, I would feel my inability to place it before you clothed in such language as to make the subject impressive. But, Sir, he has placed it before you in all its phases. He has traced temperance legislation back to the time we got constitutional government in Canada. He has pointed out the different laws which have been placed upon the Statute-book, and the effect such legislation has had upon the country. He has not only traced the temperance legislation in Canada, but he has traced kindred legislation in other countries as well. He has made many references to legislation that has been enacted in the United States, as they have now total prohibition in several of the states across the border, and he has shown to the House the good effects that prohibition has had in these states. I, therefore, feel that the hon. gentleman has given valuable information to the House on this subject, valid reasons why we should have prohibition in Canada, and that he has placed them before the House with such ability and eloquence which a subject like this demands. I would say but very little on this subject, were it not that I do believe that the time has come when this House should be making preparation to pass an Act at an early date by which total prohibition may be placed upon our statutes ; an enactment which will satisfy the great majority of self-thinking people of Canada to-day. We, as temperance people do not expect that such legislation shall be brought forward during this session, as the Bill to raise the ways and means for carrying on the affairs of the country during the coming year has already been submitted to the House after careful consideration. We believe, however, that we may justly call upon the Government at no distant time to bring forward such legislation, and to place before the House for its approval that which will meet the wishes, not only of the electors of Canada, but of the great majority of the people. There has been hardly a session since Confederation that this subject has not been brought before this House. As the hon. member for Yarmouth (Mr. Flint) has pointed out, in the year 1873, owing to the large number of petitions which had been sent from the people throughout the length and breadth of Canada, to the House of Commons and the Senate, both Houses were moved at the time to appoint a joint committee to investigate what would be the best means of lessening the evils of intemperance. It was shown then that no remedy could be effectual save the total prohibition of the traffic. Again, in 1874, prohibition was advocated in Parliament, and in 1875, a resolution was moved in this House by my predecessor, an hon. gentleman who represented the county which I have now the honour to represent, and who to-day is Minister of Education in the province of Ontario. He then moved :

That this House is prepared to bring about prohibition as soon as public opinion will sufficiently sustain stringent measures to promote such legislation as far as the same is within the competency of the Parliament of Canada.

That motion was carried by a large majority. Then again, in the year 1884, a resolution was proposed proclaiming for total prohibition, by the Hon. Mr. Foster, now our talented Finance Minister. He went into the subject even more fully than the hon. member for Yarmouth (Mr. Flint) has done to-night. He dwelt on it from every phase and with an eloquence and ability which few men in this country are capable of. He pointed out that prohibition was the only means whereby the traffic could be stopped, but even with his eloquence and great ability he was not able at that time to convince this House that the time had arrived when prohibition should be made the law of the land. At that time the late Hon. Thomas White, moved an amendment to that resolution, adding to it the words of the resolution of Mr. Ross, in 1875, and that amended resolution was carried by a large majority. The only question then with the members of the House appeared to be: whether the time had arrived for prohibition or not. When the Hon. Mr. Ross moved the resolution now nineteen years ago, there seemed to be a doubt as to whether this Parliament or the Local Legislatures had the power to bring about total prohibition. It was promised by the Government of the day then that the question would be submitted to the courts and the decision arrived at an early date, so that we may justly exclaim that in this matter, "the mills of the gods grind slowly." That promise was given nineteen years ago, but the question is still before the courts, and we have not yet had a decision as to whether it is within the competency of this Parliament or the Local Legislatures to bring about total prohibition. Last week the question was discussed in the Supreme Court by our able Solicitor General, and by able Councillors from the different provinces, so that in a very short time I trust we will be able to know whether the Federal or the Provincial Parliaments are competent to deal with this question. If this Parliament decides to-night that the time has not come when total prohibition should be enacted, no doubt the temperance people will turn their attention again to this Parliament with renewed efforts if it is decided that the power is vested in their hands. If the decision is otherwise, they will no doubt turn to the Local Legislatures and strive to impress upon them that the time has come when the wishes of the people should be carried out. In 1887, the first year that I had the honour of a seat in this House, Mr. Jamieson, now Judge Jamieson, brought forward a resolution similar to the present one, except that it asked for immediate prohibition. It was a resolution framed by the Dominion Alliance, the great temperance organization of Canada, which is doing untold good for our people; but, as in the cases of the former resolutions, an amendment was moved by the hon. member for Brockville (Mr. Wood) almost in similar terms to that of the previous year, that the time had not yet arrived when the people were prepared to carry out and enforce such a law, and that amendment was carried by a large majority. The question came before this House in 1891 by a similar motion; and that time it was shelved by the appointment of a Royal commission to inquire into the working of prohibition in other countries, and whether it would work well in the Dominion of Canada: but I am sorry to say that the report of that commission has not yet been laid upon the Table. We expected that it would be presented early in the session, and we could then form our opinions upon the subject. But as that report has not yet been laid before the House, we see no other way of proceeding than to bring forward the present motion on the present occasion and have it discussed and voted upon; and, believing as I do that the time has come for taking steps towards the enactment of total prohibition. In 1873, when this question first came before the House hon. members were pretty evenly divided in opinion as to whether, then, the time had come for prohibition; but since 1873 the attentive student of Canadian history must have noticed the rapid progress that the temperance sentiment has made in Canada. The opponents of prohibition some twenty years ago looked upon that measure as an idle fad, a mere sentiment, advocated and kept glowing by what they termed temperance cranks. But the men and women who then advocated the measure have continued their work, kept up the agitation, until to-day, on looking around them on every side, they must feel proud to see that the temperance sentiment which they have so long advocated has come to stay,—a sentiment which the statesmen and public men of the country cannot well ignore when they find the people of both political parties uniting together to insist on prohibitory legislation, not only in this House, but in the Local Legislatures and the municipalities as well. They ask for such laws as will drive the monster intemperance from this country—that evil which has caused more misery and suffering, sorrow as well as crime, than has ever been caused by war, famine or pestilence; and the sooner that monster is driven from among us the better it will be for our country. The question of controlling the liquor traffic having been discussed so many times in this House since Confederation, and on every occasion it was decided that total prohibition was the only sure remedy for the control of intemperance. Now, Sir, the difficulties in the way of the realization of total prohibition may be classed under four heads. First, the desire for intoxicants. The desire for stimulants exists to a large extent among the people of Canada as well as among the people of other countries. In fact, it exists among all nations, whether civilized or uncivilized; for we find amongst those nations to whom distillation is unknown a system of intoxication produced from the steeping and drinking of the juice of hashish and other herbs. So that we have that desire for stimulants or intoxicants to contend against, whether that is a natural or an acquired or an artificial taste. I am not going to discuss, more than to say, that that appetite has been lessened among our people very much in the past twenty years, and the only remedy for curing the disease is to remove the cause, to remove the temptation, to place alcoholic liquors beyond their reach; and that can only be done effectively by bringing about total prohibition. The second difficulty is the force of social custom or habits of drinking, when it is looked upon as a show of hospitality and genial friendship, when we gather around the festive board and partake of liquor to produce cheer and merriment, but which in many cases leads to habitual drunkenness. Now, I have stated that the desire can only be cured by total prohibition, so the power of habit has to be controlled in the same way, although the church and the schools, as well as the press and force of example, have done much to lessen them both. The third difficulty to overcome is the moneyed interests, and this is one of the greatest difficulties we have to meet. The manufacturer, the wholesale man and the retail man, each employs labour, each expects a profit; and, as we often hear it expressed, the love of money is at the root of all evil, so it is in this case, and that interest has to be fought before total prohibition can be an accomplished fact. But, Sir, would it not be better if it cannot be done otherwise, to do as the British Government did with slavery—partially recompense those engaged in the traffic for their losses. Let not the money consideration for a moment deprive thousands from enjoying the pleasure of home and happiness. Let not the few be as tortures to the many. Now, the fourth difficulty in the way of total prohibition is the adjustment of the revenue. As you are aware, we raise by excise and customs five or six millions a year, that goes into the Federal treasury, to assist in carrying on the affairs of state. It is one-fourth as much as we raise from customs duties. It cannot be denied but it would cause the Finance Minister some trouble to rearrange the fiscal policy to meet the loss; but, Sir, I believe the majority of the people of Canada would be willing to raise their share. As Sir Leonard Tilley said when speaking to the amendment to the motion of Mr. Foster in 1884, when he was Finance Minister:—

I am prepared to vote for the principle, and to say that when the time comes when it will be desirable to have put in operation, I will be prepared to support a prohibitory measure, not deterred by any question of its effects upon the revenue.

He said the matter of revenue, in his judgment, was but a feather in the scale, when compared to the beneficial effects that would follow the practical working of prohibition. "I would vote cheerfully for it" he said.

Mr. ROOME.

"and as Finance Minister prepare ways and means to make up any such deficiency that would arise if we were in a position to say that if such a law were enacted it would be sustained"; and our present Finance Minister used somewhat similar language in 1891. So that, as far as this House is concerned, that need not be a serious difficulty to overcome; and, as I have pointed out, the Local Administration need not suffer, as a penny saved is a penny gained. Now, I look upon the five or six millions which is derived from the liquor traffic as the dearest tax we can collect from the people of Canada, because the collection of that tax costs the people of Canada thirty or thirty-five millions; and, therefore, as representatives of the people, we cannot approve of that tax. We believe in taxing the rich as much as we can, and letting the poor escape; but this is not only a tax on the poor, but it is a tax collected at the expense of sorrowing wives and mothers and of children hungering for bread. Therefore, I hold that this money should be raised in some other way as soon as possible. While the Royal commission was at Windsor, Mr. Walker, the head of the firm of Walker & Son, Walkerville, the great liquor manufacturers of western Ontario, appeared before them and said that they were in partnership with the Government, and that in the division of profits the Government got the largest share. In the same manner I presume the sellers of liquor can claim partnership with the Local Administration, as they divide with them their profits for the privilege of selling; and the municipalities come in in the same way. So that the municipal bodies, Local Legislatures and the House of Commons must all be partners, receiving a share of the gains from the nefarious traffic. Now, I for one am ready to dissolve partnership with the traffic, and I am sure that there are thousands upon thousands who feel the same as I do. They would feel it a grievance that they should, for a moment, be considered as partners in the liquor traffic. As regards the Dominion, it may be said that the deficit could be easily made up by a rearrangement of the fiscal policy, without our people feeling the burden very much. But as regards the provinces, the Local Legislatures have not the same means as the Dominion Parliament of supplying the deficiency. They cannot make any changes in the tariff. Still they could effect a saving, which would make up for the loss caused by the abolition of license fees. They could reduce the expenditure on their prisons or jails. The amount received from licenses in Ontario by the Local Government reaches $300,000, and by the municipalities $275,000, making in all from $550,000 to $600,000, out of which they pay $75,000 for license inspectors and commissioners. But still they could make up for this loss by reduced expenditure on the different institutions they are now obliged to keep up. For instance, the total commitments in the province of Ontario, during last year, to the county jail amounted to 9,001, to the Central Prison, 935; to Kingston Penitentiary, 702; and to other prisons and reformatories, 234, making nearly 11,000; and Sir Oliver Mowat, Premier of Ontario, has stated on several occasions his firm belief that three-fourths of all the crime and misery in our country might be laid to the door of drink. So that three-fourths of the 11,000, or 8,000, can be attributed to intemperance. Then the cost of keeping up our common jails and reformatories and prisons, being upwards of $1,000,000 a year, could be reduced by three-fourths, and there would be a saving to the people of Ontario, according to the opinion of Sir Oliver Mowat, of some $750,000 to $800,000. Therefore, while we realize from that fund some $600,000, we can make a saving to the revenue of upwards of $150,000 to $200,000, and I presume the same remarks would apply to all the other provinces. On many occasions, it has been decided, and that has been stated often in this House, that the only way to prevent intemperance is by total prohibition. I have pointed out what I consider to be the whole difficulty, and I ask can it be overcome in any way? My opinion is that there is but one way, and that is by a strong preponderance of public sentiment in favour of prohibition. Have we got that public sentiment in its favour? The only criterion we can apply is the plebiscite taken in the various provinces. Manitoba, by a vote of two to one, expressed herself ripe for total prohibition. In Ontario total prohibition was carried by over two to one. In Prince Edward Island, the little island down by the sea, the vote in its favour was three to one. In Nova Scotia, it was carried by over four to one; and in New Brunswick, by the unanimous vote of the Legislature. Therefore in four provinces prohibition has been carried by an overwhelming majority, and in the fifth it has been carried by a decided vote of the people's representatives. In those five provinces, the people have declared that they are ready for total prohibition. In the county of West Middlesex, which I have the honour to represent, the majority in favour of prohibition was three to one; and I would be derelict to my duty, as a representative of the people, if I did not attempt to carry out their wishes. I feel bound therefore to lend my aid to this cause in order to have such a measure placed on our Statute-books. The time has come when we should impress on the Government the necessity of taking steps in that direction. It may be denied, by some very strongly, that public sentiment is not yet sufficiently ripe. Well, Mr. Speaker, we have no way of proving or testing public sentiment except in the way we took by a plebiscite. A second plebiscite would be out of the question. If the temperance people are true to themselves and their country, they will, in the coming contest, send back men here pledged to support prohibition on every occasion on the floor of Parliament, both in the Dominion and Local Legislatures, and who will continue to support this resolution until the Government will be forced to carry out their wishes. And it would be a grand thing for Canadians if we could point out that Canada was the first nation to have total prohibition. It would be a grand thing if Canada were to assume the proud position of leading the cause of temperance in the civilized world. As there are many others who wish to speak on this subject, I will not detain the House any longer. I trust every one who is present will vote for the resolution.

Mr. CRAIG. I am sure I need to make no apology for taking the time of this House in discussing such an important question as the question of prohibition. I think we must all admit that it is one of the live questions of the day. It touches all parts of the community, rich and poor, old and young, men and women. All are interested. I am sure we must all be pleased with the great advance in the temperance sentiment that has taken place in recent years. I can remember myself, not many years ago, when the drinking custom was very common in this country, and when drink would be found in places where it is never thought of to-day. We must all give the advocates of the temperance cause credit for this great improvement in the habits of society. There are many earnest men who have laboured in the cause of temperance, and who have been even called cranks on account of the part they have taken, and yet I am sure they can look back with great pleasure on what they have done in this work. And I am sure I would not be doing justice to the women who have worked so hard in this cause—the members of the Women's Christian Temperance Union—if I did not pay them a tribute too. Whatever we may think on this question, we must all admit that these women deserve great credit for the part they have taken. We must admit, too, that women are particularly interested in this work. They are the great sufferers from drink, through their husbands and sons. Many women are looking forward to the time when a prohibitory law will be in force, and the temptation which now assails their husbands will be removed, and when, instead of living in misery and penury and having to go out and work themselves to make a living for themselves and children, their husbands will bring home the money they now spend in strong drink. This is not only a live question, but a most difficult one. Politicians especially find that to be the case. But apart from politics altogether, the question is most difficult. I need not allude to the question of revenue as that matter has been fully discussed. It is the question of revenue which is most difficult of solution, and which politicians are afraid to face. When we think of the enormous amount received as part of the revenue through the Excise Department, and think of that portion of our national income being wiped out at one stroke we are almost afraid, on that account alone, to pass this measure. But I think if that was the only difficulty it might be overcome. However, when we commence to consider this question there are other difficulties which stare us in the face, and which are brought forward by those who are opposed, and I take it for granted, conscientiously opposed, to a prohibitory law. While I am in favour of a prohibitory law, and would like to see such a law enforced in this country, I have sympathy for those who are not in favour of it. I am not one of those who on this question condemn every man who does not think as they do. I know there are many men who are just as conscientious as I am, perhaps more so, and who are opposed to prohibition because of the difficulties which stand in the way of enforcement of the law, and I must admit that it is a very great difficulty indeed. One of the reasons why this law would be very difficult to enforce, we are told, is the great extent of the boundary between this country and the United States. There is no doubt that if such a law was passed great inducements would be held out to smugglers, and that smuggling would be carried on to a great extent. Another difficulty is that a great many people think there is nothing wrong in drinking in itself. There is a law against stealing, and we all know that it is wrong to steal. If there was law against drinking and against selling liquor, a great many people could not be made to think that there was anything wrong in the traffic, in the selling of the liquor or in drinking it, they would only see that the law declared it wrong, and so these people would be unwilling to go into the witness box or to endeavour to have the law enforced. That would make great difficulty in carrying the law into practical effect. We are told that the Scott Act was not enforced in many of the counties in which it was passed. In some places it was not a benefit to the community. I have heard temperance men declare themselves of that opinion. But they tell us that it will be far easier to enforce a prohibitory liquor law affecting the whole country than the Scott Act, which was confined to a small section, and I believe there is something in that argument. Another argument against a prohibitory law is that it is not enforced in the states in which it is the law. I do not pretend to be able to judge of that myself, not knowing the facts. While some declare that it is not enforced in certain states, like Iowa or Maine, there are those who declare that it is well enforced. Therefore I am bound to consider that an open question. Still, even if it is not strictly enforced, as we think it should be, the prohibitory liquor law diminishes drinking and removes from the path of those who are in the habit of drinking a great many temptations. With regard to enforcement, while there may be difficulties, I do not think enforcement would be impossible here, especially if the people of the country were at the back of the law, and I hold that it is no use to put the law on the Statute-book unless we have the great majority of the people in favour of it. One effect certainly would be to make drinking not at all the respectable thing that it is to-day. If men wished to drink they would have to do it in out-of-the-way places, and young men would not be so likely to be carried away by the temptations of drink as now in the fine saloons attractively furnished on every hand. Under a prohibitory law liquor would be had only in places where respectable young men would not like to be found. No doubt liquor would still be sold. I have often heard it said that if a man wanted a drink in Portland or many other places in the state of Maine, he could get it. No doubt he could; but he would have to go to some secret out-of-the-way place; he could not walk into the saloon as people do in the cities of Canada to-day, no prohibitory law being in force. I go further, and say this: even if the law were not enforced in the United States I believe it would be enforced in this country. This country is filled with law-abiding people, and I believe a prohibitory law would be enforced here. We are told that prohibition would not prohibit. No law absolutely prohibits. There is no law that is not broken sometimes. We find our penitentiaries and our jails full of people. Those people are there for breaking the law, and the fact that they are there proves that the laws do not prohibit. But the laws restrain, and, moreover, they punish the evil-doers and the law-breakers. No doubt the same would be true of a prohibitory liquor law. There is a very important question connected with this proposal of a prohibitory law—the question of compensation. There are some very strong temperance men—and I mean by that those who are connected with temperance societies and who take an active part in the work of temperance reform, and are seeking to bring about a prohibitory law—who do not believe in compensation. I merely wish to say that, if the time does come when this Parliament shall be asked to pass a prohibitory law, the question of compensation will have to be considered. I do not know what view Parliament will take of it; but if businesses are to be wiped out—especially businesses which are yielding a very large revenue to the Government and the people of this country—and wiped out by a law passed by this Parliament, it seems to me it would be only fair that some compensation should be given to the men engaged in this business. I am only expressing my individual opinions on this question, but I believe that many who are in favour of a prohibitory law will agree with me. I have received many letters, as no doubt other members of the House have, from those who favour prohibition, asking me to oppose the ratification of the French treaty, because it would stand in the way of the passing of a prohibitory liquor law. I have replied that we have been told by the Premier that this treaty can be terminated at any time on giving 12 months notice, and, further, that if there are clauses which would prevent a prohibitory law being passed within a reasonable time, the necessary provision will be made so that the friends of prohibition need not be afraid on that account. Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to detain you further. Until I came to the House to-night I did not intend to speak upon this question. I speak principally to show my sentiments on this question. I wish to say that I will vote for this resolution, in the first place, to show what side I am on. For myself, I am a total abstainer, always and in every place. I have no sympathy with men who take the last cent from a man for drink. I admit that there are many respectable tavern-keepers all over the country, men who sell liquor, but at the same time I know there are men who will take the last cent a man has got, money that ought to go to support his family, and who will sell to a man when he is drunk already. I must say that when I see cases of that kind they have made me feel more like voting for prohibition than any argument that could be addressed to me. So I say that I rise here principally to show what side I stand on. I stand on the side of temperance, I am not on the side of liquor, I want to have that distinctly understood, not only here, but by my constituents. In the next place, I vote for this resolution because I believe that if a prohibitory law could be enforced it would be a great boon to this country. We all of us know what prohibition has done in individual cases. We have seen men who have been brought down as low as a man can be brought through drink, and these men have been reformed by abstaining from drink. I know cases of that kind myself. Men have become respectable citizens and have resumed their former places in society. Why? Just because they have practiced prohibition in their own cases, just because they have adopted a law of prohibition for themselves. It has changed their whole nature, and made them different men altogether. I want temptation taken away from these men. When they go out I do not wish to see them exposed to places inviting them to resume their old habits again, and once more to fall. Besides, I want these temptations taken away from our young men. We must admit that a great many of our young men are tempted by these drinking places, and I think we must all admit, that if there were not so many of these attractive drinking places, fewer of our young men would be led into these habits. There is another reason why I will vote for this resolution, and that is because my constituency voted in favour of prohibition at the recent plebiscite. My constituency gave a large vote in favour of a prohibitory law, and I would not be representing them properly on this question in this House unless I voted for this resolution. Now, it is a disputed question whether the time has come for the passing of a prohibitory law. I am not prepared to say whether it has or not. For myself, I have sometimes had a little doubt whether the time has arrived, but I am able to vote for this resolution because it says "as speedily as possible," that is, when this House thinks the time has come, they are requested to pass a prohibitory law. I am prepared to vote for that. But I want to say that whether the time has come or not, to pass a prohibitory law for the whole country, there is one thing this Parliament can do, and it is a matter on which I have sometimes thought I ought to speak, but as I was a comparatively young member of this House, I did not care to do so. But while I am speaking on this resolution I will take this opportunity to say that there is one thing I think this House can do, and which we should do as an example to the country, and that is, we might abolish intoxicating liquor from the restaurant of this House. I think that would be a step in the right direction. I think both sides of the House could get on very well without intoxicating liquor in the restaurant. Whether we think the time has already come or not to enact prohibition for the whole country, I think we would all be prepared to vote that the time has come when we might abolish intoxicating liquor from the precincts of this House. In conclusion, I repeat, that I stand on the side of prohibition because I think it the right side, and in response to the earnest wishes of thousands of men, some of them drunkards, many of them our best citizens, and also, thousands of women, who know the evils of this great curse, I am prepared to record my vote for prohibition, whenever the question comes before this House. I have not come to this decision without considerable thought. I have given the question a great deal of consideration. I know there are difficulties standing in the way, grave difficulties, many more than I have time to mention here, difficulties which, no doubt, other members of this House have thought of. I respect those who consciously differ from me on this question, but for myself, I am prepared always to vote on the side of prohibition.

Mr. CHRISTIE. As this is a question in which I have always taken a lively interest, I do not wish to give a silent vote upon it. I am pleased to see that the hon. member for Yarmouth (Mr. Flint) has introduced a resolution affirming the principles of immediate prohibition. I wish it had been a little more definite. I do not know how others may feel in reference to this matter, but I feel that the time has come now to pass a prohibitory law. I am fully convinced that if this principle was crystallized into the law of the land, it would contribute very largely to the prosperity and well-being of the whole Dominion; indeed, I think it hardly possible to over-estimate the amount of good which would result from the adoption and enforcement of prohibition. It would be unquestionably the great reform of this age. It will be remembered that a similar resolution was introduced to this House in 1891. Unfortunately, that resolution was side-tracked; all further action in this House was suspended, the way was completely blocked by the appointment of the Royal Commission. Now, I do not wish to say a single word disrespectful of that commission, I will simply say that to my mind it was wholly unnecessary, and, therefore, it was a useless waste of time, labour and money. But I rejoice now to see that temperance men on both sides of this House have resolved to wait no longer, but to press forward and force this question upon the attention of the Government, and force it to an issue. I think that no good reason can be alleged for further delay. We all know the traffic in strong drink is fraught with sad and terrible evils. That requires no proof, it is admitted by all. We know, too, that the system of licensing which has been followed for ages, has signally failed to correct or remedy these evils. We have tried high license and low license, we have endeavoured to restrict the traffic in every possible way, and still the result has been unsatisfactory. Temperance men have long since been forced to the conclusion that the only real remedy is prohibition. For some time the only question has been whether the country was ripe for its adoption and enforcement. Now, upon this point, I think the country has spoken out clearly and distinctly. There can be no good reason for delaying action on that ground. Wherever we look we see a strong sentiment in favour of temperance reform. Hon. members of this House will recall how in 1891 this Table was flooded with petitions in favour of prohibition from every part of the Dominion, and from every religious denomination in the country. Since then the provinces have spoken more emphatically still by their votes at the polls. No less than five provinces out of the seven have affirmed this principle by overwhelming majorities: in Ontario, if I recollect rightly, by a majority of about 82,000, in Nova Scotia by a majority of about 30,000 or 40,000, in Prince Edward Island by a majority of 7,000, in Manitoba by a majority of 11,000 or 12,000, and in New Brunswick by the unanimous vote of the Legislature. These five provinces gave a majority of between 140,000 and 150,000 in favour of the principle of prohibition. What more could they do? I may be told that my own province has not yet spoken. That is true, but I think I can fairly say a strong temperance sentiment prevails there. Temperance reformers have been at work there as elsewhere, and I hope and trust, although I do not venture to predict, that when the day of trial comes the grand old province of Quebec will be found in line with the other provinces of the Dominion and in favour of this great moral reform. In view of these facts, in view of the fact that the country has desired and demanded prohibition, I trust the action of this House will be such as to inspire the people with confidence and hope that at least in the near future their request will be granted. Not only so, but I trust the action of the House will be such as to induce this Government to take up this question, to reconsider the whole question more fully and more favourably than they have yet done. When the prohibition delegates waited on the Government lately they were told very courteously and very frankly, but very clearly, that nothing could be done at present, and that no promise could be held out as to the future. That was very discouraging to say the least; and not only so, but the proposition to reduce the duty on beer and to admit wines from foreign countries free of duty, seemed to point emphatically in a direction opposed to the wishes of the temperance people. We know that the whole army of temperance reformers, both men and women, throughout the Dominion are strongly opposed to seeing the Dominion flooded with either wine or beer. I venture to express the hope that we will all consider this question as one outside of party interests and that we will rise above our own personal interest, and be inspired by a sincere desire to promote the best interests of the whole Dominion, and that this great reform will soon be carried to a practical result, for I contend it will contribute very largely to make our Dominion brighter, happier and better than it is to-day.

Mr. COATSWORTH. I do not think we shall have very much difficulty in supporting the resolution moved. It strikes me there is a good deal of milk and water in it—mostly water, says an hon. friend—and it does not go very far in favouring the principle of prohibition, for it says “as speedily as possible Parliament shall pass a prohibitory law.” However, I suppose it is moved by the hon. gentleman with the idea that it is a step in the right direction, and on the principle that half a loaf is better than no bread; and I presume on that principle the House will pass it, for no harm can be done by passing a resolution of this kind. It is also rather a significant fact that in view of the large interests involved, there is so little interest taken in the debate. One would naturally suppose that when interests of such consequence to the country were being discussed, interests involving not only the capital investment of a large number of our citizens, but also involving a large amount of revenue, and involving also what is regarded to be one of the greatest moral questions before the people at the present time, that the seats in this Parliament would be filled with anxious members who are desirous of legislating on this question, instead of hon. members seeking light elsewhere, where probably they may get light of a different kind. But it is an indication, I think, that the movement has not passed through the stage when the leaders of the great parties on both sides can take hold of it and make it a question of practical politics. For my part, I shall be glad to see the time arrive when that can be done, or, if it be not made a party question, when we can all unite and decide what is best to be done in regard to this great subject. I must say I hold rather an anomalous position in this matter myself, because I think I represent the largest liquor interests in any constituency in Canada. I have in my constituency the largest distillery, four of the largest brewers, and nearly all the wholesale liquor dealers in Toronto, besides many others interested in the traffic, and I take it as a tribute of confidence that they should send me to this House, knowing that I have been all my life—no credit to myself, because I was brought up to it—a prohibitionist. They sent me here knowing my views and what action I was likely to take, and that I would act as I propose to act, support the question by all legitimate means. At the same time, I feel that the support given me by those parties has thrown upon me a responsibility in regard to their interests, to be satisfied that no sacrifice is made of any interests involved in this matter, and that what is right must be done to all who are concerned in it. We have heard a great deal in the House, not only to-day, but on previous occasions, as to the difficulties that stand in our way in dealing with this question. We have the very strong sentiment that prevails with respect to the evils arising from over-indulgence in strong drink. They have been graphically depicted on numerous occasions, and so it is almost superfluous to carry on the debate on that line, because it is undoubtedly felt by all who have studied the question, and even by those who have given the question little or no study, that strong drink has ravaged our country to a certain extent, and repressive measures have been adopted already, and there is a feeling that still further measures of repression should be adopted. At the same time, we have reason to congratulate ourselves, especially when we hear the expressions of older members, who can look back twenty or thirty years, and tell us of the advance of temperance sentiment here, and we would be lacking in duty if we did not recognize that and congratulate ourselves on the general advance made, I cannot say in spite of the want of legislation, because that would not be expressing it correctly, but in consequence of the advancement in the sentiment of the community irrespective of the legislation which has taken place from time to time. The country has reason to be congratulated that the time has come when a man may drink or not, just as he pleases, and whether he drinks or not no stigma or discredit is placed on him so long as he does not indulge to excess. In looking at what might be termed the affirmative side of the resolution, in addition to the advance of public opinion in favour of the repression of strong drink, we have also to recognize the very strong sentiment expressed by the people of the provinces in favour of prohibition. We would be failing in our duty as legislators if we did not recognize the large vote which has been given in the various plebiscites, and the advances which have been made in the direction of prohibition. We find that even among our temperance societies, in years past some of them were limited in their pledge to certain classes or certain quantities of liquor, but now they have advanced in their sentiments so that they are all moving in the direction of total prohibition. We cannot overlook that sentiment. No man who is in public life and who looks to the suffrages of the people to keep him in public life can afford to overlook what is the sentiment of the majority of people in his constituency. I quite appreciate the position of my hon. friend from East Durham (Mr. Craig), who says that he advocates this question because he believes that he is representing the views and feelings and desires of the larger portion of his constituency. I think we are bound to recognize that. We are sent here as servants of the people; we are sent here to carry out the will of the people, and although I do not think we would be always justified in surrendering our private judgment of what is best for the people simply because the people might demand a certain thing, yet there are cases in which the majority should rule. We all know that sometimes a wave of popular opinion will sweep in a certain direction which ought not to be gratified, and that at times public men have to stem the current of public opinion for a time in order to set the people aright, where they are inclined to go wrong. But, when we find a prevailing and permanent sentiment in the country in favour of prohibition, a sentiment which has been growing for a number of years, it is not for us to close our eyes or shut our ears to the demands of the people. We must listen to these demands, and when we believe that the time has come that we are bound in duty to pass a prohibitory law, then it is for us to take such measures in the interests of the people and in the interests of the country as to bring about that legislation which is so persistently and universally desired. Now, Sir, we have to consider the other side of the question, and in doing so we find there are many interests involved which it is impossible to overlook. While we may be inclined to legislate at the command of the majority, at the same time I do not think we are bound, without the strongest reasons, to legislate in any direction which will infringe upon the rights and vested interests of a large proportion of the population. When we consider the amount of capital invested, and the number of persons who are engaged in the manufacture and sale of liquor, we are bound I think to consider their interests. I do not know that I could go so far as my hon. friend from East Durham (Mr. Craig) as to compensation, but if the question should arise as to whether the manufacturers should be compensated for the amount of capital they have invested, it is possible that I would be prepared to go as far as he does. I will say this at the present time: that whatever legislation we may embark in on this subject we ought to be careful that such legislation will not so interfere with the capital invested by our citizens as to practically work a great injustice to a large proportion of them. Then we have to consider the question of revenue which has so often been touched upon, and there is no doubt that this is a very important question, especially for us on this side of the House. I do not know that my hon. friends opposite have such a great interest at stake in that at the present time, although they look forward to it in the future and possibly at some very distant date from now, they may have to deal with the revenue of this country. There is no doubt, so far as the revenue is concerned, that if we make up our minds, irrespective of the revenue, that this law should be passed, I think that we are in duty bound to the country and to our constituents to make such provision in the way of revenue as will enable us to carry out this law. Those who have considered the question and who possibly may be a little too sanguine in their expectations as to what will be the fiscal result from the passage of a prohibitory law, claim that this capital which is now invested in the manufacture and sale of liquor will be invested in other directions, and that the commerce flowing from that capital will result in as much revenue to the country as is derived from the manufacture and sale of liquor at the present time. That argument to a certain extent is undoubtedly correct. It is impossible for us to say exactly how far it may be correct, but yet I feel that, if the only question remaining for us to decide were the question of revenue, it would be our duty to pass a prohibitory law and to look for the necessary revenue from other sources. Then again, Sir, there is a very large class of the people who are not believers in prohibition; a large proportion who consider that it is an interference with the liberty of the subject, and we are bound to respect the opinions of these, because as my hon. friend from East Durham (Mr. Craig) said, there are very many people who are just as conscientious, and possibly some of them more so than we are ourselves on this subject, who are inclined to think that the passage of the prohibitory law would be such an infringement of the rights and privileges of the people as to make it unconstitutional, at any rate in the practical sense. Many of them believe that we have no right so to interfere with the liberties of the people as to prevent them from taking their wine or beer as the case may be. There are, also, a great many, Sir, who are moderately addicted to the use of liquor and who would look forward with a certain amount of anxiety to the time when they would be deprived of a glass of wine or a glass of beer at their meals. Many of these gentlemen, and possibly ladies too, would consider this a very great infringement upon their rights should we pass a measure the practical effect of which would be to deny them this luxury, if luxury it be. There are some persons who consider alcoholic drink a necessity, although I presume that in cases where it was really a medicinal necessity the law would not affect its use. We have to consider all these things, but the great basis on which we are able to place prohibition, as stated by my hon. friend from East Durham (Mr. Craig), is to point to the terrible evils which are brought about by the drink traffic. We have to stop these evils in some way. We have been restricting and restricting until we have found that restrictions have not enough practical effect. Therefore, looking at the subject from what might be termed the logical point of view, in order to properly repress the evils, in order to remove the temptations from the way of our young men, in order to make it discreditable and disgraceful to drink, in order that in future we may be spared the army of drunkards we have at the present time, I feel for my own part that it is our duty to pass such a measure of prohibition as would result in the removal of the evil. I do not consider we are interfering with people's rights when we are taking away from a great number of our population this temptation which will drag them down to ruin and degradation. I consider that we are simply fulfilling the duties for which we are sent here when we take such measures in the interests of the community as we believe will best serve the people of the country at large. Up to the present time, ever since we have begun to legislate—I should not say we, because many of us were not born when legislation began on this matter—but from the time our Legislatures and Parliaments have been dealing with this subject, the policy has been restriction rather than prohibition, and the restriction has been carried on with two objects. In the first place, there has been the desire to check the evils of intemperance, and as far as possible to hem in the traffic, so that there would not be so much temptation in the way of our young men and in the way of those who unfortunately have fallen victims to the habit; and the other object, as I understand, has been to derive a revenue from the traffic. Now, if the traffic is as discreditable as it has been painted, if its abuses are as great as is claimed, then it is not proper that we should continue it simply for the purpose of revenue. If we think that the traffic ought to be prohibited apart from the question of revenue, then we ought to be prepared to pass a prohibitory law. We have passed, not only in the Dominion, but in several of the provinces, what may be called partial prohibitory laws—laws that went beyond the mere province of restriction, because the restriction has been usually confined to what might be termed the license law; we have had the Dunkin Act and the Scott Act, and now we have what is called a local option law, all of which are prohibitory in their nature. Now, these laws have undoubtedly had a good effect—and I think we ought to recognize the beneficial effect the license laws have had upon the country; we ought to recognize the beneficial influence of all the legislation on this subject, because each law that has been passed, whether or not it has achieved the objects its promoters intended, has been a step in the right direction. But those laws have been found insufficient to cope with the evils with which we are face to face. We had in Toronto during the past year a convention of prohibitionists, which I had the honour of attending as a delegate, and that convention sent a deputation to the Local Government to ask them what they were willing to do on this very important subject. I was not a member of the deputation. Some hon. gentlemen to-night have spoken of what this Parliament might have done or might do or might promise in regard to the subject under discussion. I would just like to say this—and I do it without any wish to introduce any political feeling into the debate, because nothing is further from my desire. But I did feel, at the time that deputation waited on the Local Government, that the opportunity of the Local Government at that time was a very great one, and if they had been prepared to rise to the responsibility that was imposed upon them by the sentiment and the vote of the people of the province, the delegation would not have been sent away with an answer containing so many “ifs,” so much vagueness and uncertainty as the one they received. There is no doubt one of the greatest evils we have to contend with on this question is the saloon. I doubt if there are many men in this country to-day who will stand up and support the interests of the saloons. I think the time has come when, whatever other action we may take on this subject, we ought to abolish the saloon. The time has come when open drinking in the saloons ought to be done away with. Now, I believe, and it was generally believed, that the Government of Ontario had it within their power at that time to say to the delegation of prohibitionists who waited upon them: “We do not consider that we have the power to pass a prohibitory measure; we are not satisfied as to that, and we are not prepared to take the responsibility until the Privy Council will say that we have the power to pass such a law; but we can close the saloons; we can refuse to grant licenses, and we are prepared to go that length with you, to show our good feeling in the matter.” In that way a great deal would have been accomplished, for we all have to recognize the fact that the saloon to a great extent lies at the root of the evil, and that if we abolished the saloons we would take one of the greatest steps possible in the direction of prohibition. Now, in my view we cannot reasonably expect this Government to deal with the question until the Prohibition Commission has reported. It would be simply folly on the part of the Government to issue a commission and send commissioners throughout the length and breadth of our land and through the adjoining country to take evidence on every phase of this question, and then, before that commission had reported, to pass a prohibitory law. It would require the very strongest expression of feeling and opinion on the part of the people of this country to justify the Government in taking such action, and I do not think that the warmest supporters of prohibition expected that, until after the commission had reported, the Government ought to take hold of the question and legislate upon it.

An hon. MEMBER. Oh, yes.

Mr. COATSWORTH. The Opposition may do it. I do not think they have shown much sign of it yet. Therefore, whatever may be our views on the question, if we regard the legislation which has taken place up to the present time as being in the right direction, we shall not have to strain our consciences very much to support such a mild resolution as we have before us to-night. As to the question whether prohibition can prohibit, that has become, I was going to say a world-wide question; certainly it has become a Dominion-wide question, and there are many things to be said on both sides. But I feel that we must bring ourselves to this point upon that question, that unless there is a moral sentiment in the country which will support the Government in carrying out the law, it will never be carried out. So that what the Government have to consider—and in that respect a very grave responsibility rests upon them—when asked the question: will prohibition prohibit, is whether the people of this country will support them in carrying out such a law. I do not quite go with the hon. member for East Durham (Mr. Craig) in saying that such a law could be enforced just as other laws are, because most other laws deal more directly with the rights of subjects as between each other. A man can hardly commit a crime except against a fellow-subject; no man can do a wrong but it reflects on a fellow-subject, and the law is in favour of punishing and prohibiting all crimes and wrongs, as far as practicable, and in favour of the enforcement of one man's rights as against another, as far as practicable. But I think the question of prohibition is a larger question. It is not so much a question of enforcing the rights of one citizen as against another. It is because we all recognize that the evils of the liquor traffic are so vast that we should legislate against it, and one of the first questions we have to settle is, will the sentiment of the people back us up in the enforcement of such a law? And if we are bound to answer that question in the negative, if we are compelled to rely upon Provincial Governments, in many cases antagonistic to the Government of the Dominion, whichever way the Government of the Dominion may be, we shall find very grave difficulties in our way. I should very much regret to find that the time had come when this subject was made a political one, so that either one party or the other staked its existence on the prohibition question. But I do think that prohibition is backed up by the moral sense of the community. Speaking for my own province, we are fairly entitled to say that, in view of the very large majority (about 80,000) in favour of prohibition at the recent election, the sentiment in Ontario has declared itself. We are justified in saying that the sentiment of the people of Ontario has reached that point where, if this Government will take the responsibility of passing a prohibitory law, the people of Ontario will rise in support of the Government, and go as far as the Government are determined to go in the enforcement of a prohibitory law. We may fairly pass the resolution before us to-night. It does not mean a great deal. Some of our hon. friends think it is a declaration of our views on prohibition, but it does not seem to me to go as far as that. Still, however far it may go, it is, to a certain extent at least, the expression of our feelings; it is an expression of what we think is in the interest of our country, and I trust the resolution will pass.

Mr. DUPONT. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, as pointed out by the hon. member who has just taken his seat, the resolution now before us is but an expression of a simple opinion. I think, however, that the feelings of some of the hon. members who spoke in favour of this resolution are wrong, and that they do not represent the opinion of the majority of the people of Canada. The resolution now before us states that it is expedient that the importation and manufacture of intoxicating liquors should be prohibited. I know of no country where the Government could prohibit the importation and manufacture of intoxicating liquors. If nowhere they succeeded in preventing such importation and manufacture, I think it would be unwise on the part of the Government to try and establish by legislation such an order of things. Moreover, take the more civilized nations of the world—take France, for instance, which is a densely populated country, where most people have a liking for grape-wine and where its cultivation is ever considered one of the most important industries of the country—take France, I say, and you will find that there people daily and freely use wine or such other liquors as beneficent as wine. There, indeed, wine is considered as a nutritive element, as a beverage absolutely necessary to the health of the people. The same can be said of several other countries where wine is in great use. In France, you meet no more drunkards than elsewhere, that is to say, drunkenness is not larger there than in other countries, and those who went to France, those who visited the leading cities of that country, and Europe generally, where wine is in great use, state they did not notice a larger number of drunkards there than elsewhere where they never use wine. To prohibit the manufacture and importation of intoxicating liquors is to accustom the people to those unwholesome drinks which ruin the health and to defeat the object of the very people who would like to see the whole population subjected to a system of compulsory temperance. I can see no necessity for having this resolution passed now, the more so as a commission was appointed with the sanction of this House to hold an investigation with respect to this very question of prohibition and we have not yet its report. That commission entered upon its labours several years ago and has steadily proceeded on them ever since; it has already visited almost all the provinces of the Dominion, and even various states of the neighbouring country, to ascertain the kind of results prohibition has given in the states where such a measure was taken. I think that before expressing an opinion here, before the House should express its sentiments, it had better wait for the report of the commission, since it deemed it proper to appoint it and gave it authority to collect information on that question. I think we should wait for the report of the commissioners entrusted with the holding of that investigation before we should decide ourselves. Besides, I think that that report will support the opinion of those who believe that prohibition established by legislation would be an unjust, or, to say the least, an unwise measure, which would not have the result expected by the very persons who propose it. By the way, I can also refer, Mr. Speaker, to my own experience. I went on a visit to the state of Maine, where there is a prohibitory law, and there I found that there was more drunkenness, even a great deal more, than in the province of Quebec, where the sale, importation and manufacture of liquors were never prohibited. I found that in the state of Maine, the alcoholic liquors people were supplied with were real poison, which ruined the health of those who used them. To show you that prohibition can hardly be practically carried out, here is a fact for your information in this respect. I happened to be one day at a watering-place on the Atlantic when there came a regiment of soldiers of the Secession war. These old soldiers were on a pleasure trip. Although there was not to be found a single large hotel in the locality, all these gallant soldiers were intoxicated in the evening, so much so that a good many of them could not take the boat to go back home. Here is the result of a prohibitory law. You accustom the people to drink alcoholic liquors which poison their blood to such an extent that once they drink it, they cannot dispense with it after using it for a certain time, and that that unfortunate habit drives them to the ruining of their health and ending of their life in a mad-house. I am at a loss to understand the fierceness of the prohibitionists against the product of the vine, since scientists contend, I think, that wine is necessary to health, not only to help sick people to recover a perfect health and to invigorate those who are affected with certain diseases, but even that wine is quite necessary as a tonic for the preservation of health. To adopt this resolution now would seem to me too soon, to say the least. The hon. members who supported it in their speeches would like this House to pass a law prohibiting the importation and manufacture of wines. By such a legislation we would succeed in depriving the people of a beverage necessary to their health, necessary even from a medical and religious standpoint, necessary at least to preserve among our people that pleasant mirth and natural gaiety of which we are so fond, and in inculcating into them a taste for strong adulterated liquors. For you must not lose sight of the fact that wine drinkers are not alcohol drinkers. And in France, the country I referred to a moment ago, there are almost no alcoholized individuals. There people drink wine, use it freely, and yet you see there fewer drunkards than anywhere else. They say the same thing can be said of Italy and Spain, where there are by far fewer alcoholized individuals than in cold countries, where people do not use wine, but drink unwholesome alcoholic liquors, I think, Mr. Speaker, that the best means to bring about temperance is to have associations which will preach moderation and teach the people to use reasonably, but not misuse, the product of the vine. Instead of prohibiting the importation or manufacture of wines in a country, encourage, on the contrary, the manufacture and importation of good wines, induce the people to use these wines instead of drinking alcoholic liquors, and you will far better succeed in reaching the end you have in view. It is through temperance associations and the use of good wines that you will deter the people from the habit of using alcoholic liquors and thereby succeed in establishing temperance and improving public health. The prohibition of alcoholic liquors will never succeed in moralizing a people; it is through education, through the use of beneficial liquors, that that end will be reached. Besides, Mr. Speaker, when considering this question, we must not only consider the revenue; if we had only to deal with that portion of revenue, we could take no notice of it. But I feel satisfied that the establishment of prohibition as understood by my hon. friends who spoke before me, would be a very unfortunate measure for the people, and would drive them, almost as a matter of course, to make use of alcoholic liquors clandestinely manufactured and which always are, as we all know, very unwholesome products. If I had not that conviction I would be willing, with my hon. friends who propose this resolution, to give it the support of my vote. But I feel perfectly satisfied that by prohibiting the importation of wine, as well as by prohibiting the manufacture of beer or any other liquor, not only would not the desired end be reached, but we would favour, as in the state of Maine, the establishment of unlawful distilleries and the manufacture of impure alcohols which are real poisons ruinous to public health. Those who have a passion for alcoholic liquors would be tempted to use these unwholesome liquors, and it would follow that, because we undertook to prohibit to our people the use of all beverages containing alcohol, we would have a class of drunkards, that is to say, of individuals poisoned by those adulterated alcoholic liquors. Those people would be more obnoxious to the community than are now those who use other liquors. If you were to prohibit everything which men misuse, we would have likewise to prohibit bread, and almost any food, for, as stated by a learned economist, a learned physician, more men are killed by good living than by sword. That remark did not apply to an excess of alcoholic liquors, but to the misuse, by some individuals, of the food intended for the preservation of man's life. Because some persons are making a bad use of alcoholic liquors, it does not follow that alcohol need not be used in the manufacture of medicines and sometimes ordered as a tonic by the physician. So that those who would prohibit not only alcoholic liquors, but any other liquor, only mean to say, in my opinion, that they do not wish for temperance. It is a sure way to prevent it from being established on a solid basis. Temperance can only be brought about by our trying and inculcating it with dignity, that is to say, by persuading the people that it is dishonouring and humiliating for a human being to misuse not only alcohol, but any other thing, to an extent injurious to health. I think that when that will be done we will have established a temperance system worth a good deal more than the one now urged. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I hope that the House will not be willing to accept the resolution now before us, however harmless and immaterial it may be. As apparently suggested by the preceding speaker, if that resolution expresses an opinion, I consider that opinion as a wrong one. I consider that even for the prohibitionists, we must wait for the report of the Commission, which cannot be long delayed now, in order that we might know the conclusions to which the commissioners came. In the province of Quebec, where there is no Scott Act, and, therefore, no compulsory temperance, I think that in the rural districts, as well as in the cities, there is less drunkenness than in the cities of the United States which I visited, and which are under prohibition. If this is a fact, if, as found by me, the Commission should find that total prohibition, instead of causing temperance to prevail in the countries where it was to establish it compulsorily and permanently, had quite a different result, I hope that, in the face of a report in that direction, the hon. members of this House who are prohibitionists will side with the Commission, and say with us that total prohibition is not a means to cause temperance to prevail among the people, but that, to have it established, it is preferable to persuade them through the work of temperance associations, and by inculcating into them principles of abstinence, by showing them what degradation there is in the excessive use of alcoholic liquors. In my opinion, when we will have thus educated the people, we will have done more for the cause of temperance than can ever be done by all the prohibitions in the world. In every county where prohibition was tried, it resulted in a real failure. Not only have they not inculcated temperance, but they succeeded in increasing the number of the places where alcoholic and other unwholesome liquors were manufactured, which poison the people. That was the net result of prohibition. But, on the other hand, in the counties where less fanaticism and a more practical turn of mind were shown—and I cannot conceive that our Anglo-Saxon compatriots, who usually are reputed practical men, should be relentless in their efforts to force here such a system, when it is shown by experience that it was a failure everywhere—I cannot conceive, I say, that in view of those facts, which western members ought to know since they take an interest in the cause of temperance with such devotedness and zeal, they should not find, as we do, that prohibition never was a means to make a people sober. If prohibition cannot be brought about by any legislative action, we ought to try to bring it about by way of education. In my opinion, it is through education that we will make the people sober. It is through it that we will succeed in inducing men to reform, to have good morals and to misuse nothing. Never will men be made virtuous by way of any legislative action. It is by preaching morality that we will succeed in establishing temperance permanently and making of our people a respected and moral people. It is by suasion that we will come to that. I hope that my hon. colleagues in this House will ponder before adopting such a resolution as this, and that they will say with me that we must first wait for the report of the commission, which will enable us to discuss that question of prohibition, which we cannot do before that.

Mr. MACLEAN. If we were to pass the resolution now before the House, we should abolish, as has been suggested by one of the hon. gentlemen who spoke before me, immediately, the bar of this House, or else be self-convicted of hypocrisy. But there are other questions which could well attract our attention, and in which reform could be effected to much better purpose. There is too much attention paid in this country to-day to moral reform by way of legislation. Moral reform is not to be effected so much by legislation as by suasion, influence and example. If prohibitionists wish to confer a real benefit on their fellow-citizens, there are questions, such as public health, which they could take up, and in which they could hope to have some practical success. The hon. gentleman who seconded this resolution is a doctor by profession, and if he would examine the records of his profession, he would find that the public health rather than public morals is the thing which requires public attention. More people suffer by consumption, there is more misery brought about by typhoid fever and insanity, and these are things which could be greatly relieved, and which this Legislature ought to attempt to remove. There is plenty of scope for any one desirous to do something substantial for the people in the matter of adulteration of drink and food. Public health would be considerably improved if hon. gentlemen would devote their attention to securing for the people good spirits, beer and claret, rather than trying to accomplish an impossibility. Men are born to drink; those who speak the English tongue have been drinking for generations. They are a spirit-drinking people, and will continue to be such, and will never be reformed by mere attempts at legislation. We may introduce a prohibitory liquor law, but what will be the result? The consumption of drugs, opium and all such deleterious things will come into use and find more victims than whisky and spirits find to-day. Another thing I would like to say is that hon. gentlemen who support prohibition have not faced the question of compensation. They stand up here and revile the liquor traffic, and I join with them in so reviling it, but they have not told the House how the money raised from that traffic can be otherwise made up. A very large portion of the revenue is paid by the men who drink, and yet these men who furnish this great portion of the revenue are constantly abused and reviled, although nobody comes forward to show how that loss is to be made up. We are making great progress in this country in the reform of our drinking habits, I venture to say that a great improvement has been effected. People are drinking less, not because of the law, but because of the force of example. It has come to be recognized more and more that the country has no use for the whisky-head. It has gone forth that the whisky-head and the saloon must go. But the saloons must go in the way of regulation of the traffic; and if any honest reform is to be made in the drinking custom of the country, it will have to be effected by much stricter license laws than are now in force. There is where the field for reform lies, and where our friends the prohibitionists ought to place all the pressure they can. Another thing which ought to be done, if we wish to remove intemperance, is to devote a portion of the revenue raised from the liquor traffic to the maintenance of inebriate asylums. Many men are the victims of intemperance, who, if they could have been placed in a proper inebriate asylum for two or three days, would have been cured from the drink habit altogether. In this way a substantial reform could be effected. Moral reform in the way of temperance must come rather from example and moral suasion and not from legislation, and in this direction a great improvement could be effected by more stringent license laws which would minimize the traffic. There is the key-note for the prohibitionists: Minimize the traffic down to the lowest point. Another means is to abolish the saloons. I am ready to support any measure to that end any day, but to prevent the entire traffic is impossible. You must have a public sentiment behind a law before you can enforce it, and there is no public sentiment which will support a prohibitory law. I need only point to the failure of the Scott Act throughout Canada; to the Maine laws in the United States, and to the prohibitory laws in the western states, to show that public opinion is not in favour of enforcing a law to prohibit the liquor traffic. Another thing, as I have pointed out before, is to devote greater portions of the revenue now raised by provincial taxation to the reformation of inebriates. If we should pass this resolution, it would be incumbent upon us to-morrow to pass a resolution abolishing the saloon down stairs, unless we wish to appear before the country as hypocrites, and I have a great contempt for hypocrites. We will stultify ourselves and stand before the country as men who could vote in this House in favour of prohibition, but who do not practice it themselves.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The lengthy debate on this question indicates the importance which hon. gentlemen attach to it. The House is a very empty House, and I would move the adjournment of this debate. I believe that certain other members are anxious to take part in the discussion of this important question.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and the House adjourned at 11.30 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, 8th May, 1894.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS COMMITTEE.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) In the Public Accounts Committee this morning, there was a desire expressed by myself to examine the Auditor General with respect to certain correspondence contained in his report relating to public expenditure, which correspondence had taken place between the Auditor General and the different departments of the public service; and it was suggested by some members of the committee that, as this correspondence had not been referred to the committee, they could not adjudicate upon it, and therefore the committee could not take cognizance of it. In order that the Auditor might be examined with respect to this correspondence and the several matters in which objections were overruled by the Treasury Board, I would move that the correspondence, together with the accounts, be referred to the Public Accounts Committee. The accounts themselves are the only matters which are brought before the committee on which they could examine; and it is obvious to every one that one of the most important duties of the committee should be to examine carefully the differences of opinion, which arise from time to time, between the Auditor and the Treasury Board. In order if possible to lay down certain rules for the guidance of that officer. I would move:

That all correspondence between the Auditor General and the several departments of the public service, relating to public expenditure, as contained in the Auditor General's Report of Public Accounts for the past financial year, be referred to the Public Accounts Committee.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I understand the purport of this to be that all the particulars mentioned in the Auditor General's Report, and not only those connected with the accounts for the past year, should be opened up and sent to the committee in order that the Auditor may be examined upon them. Much of the correspondence in the Auditor General's report relates to the accounts for the present year, and there is no precedent for referring these to the Public Accounts Committee.

Mr. SPEAKER This motion will require notice.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) If the hon. gentleman thinks that notice should be given, I shall have to let the motion stand over, but the hon. gentleman will see the necessity for referring these matters to the Public Accounts Committee. This correspondence, which takes place from time to time, and some of which relates to expenditure not directly within the year, is published in the report for the year. Next year, when we have the accounts for the year, we will not have the correspondence immediately before us, as it is in the preceding year's report. It is expedient, when there are differences of opinion between the Auditor General and the heads of departments, that, at the earliest moment, these differences should be considered by the Public Accounts Committee, and their judgment passed upon them. It seems to me now is the proper time to do that. I should be surprised at any objection on the part of the Government. It is customary to refer to the Public Accounts Committee matters other than those contained in the public accounts of the year, but special reference must be made. And in the matter I am bringing up, we are without jurisdiction unless we obtain such reference.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I see the reason of the hon. gentleman's motion, but the objection which he finds in his way is not the fault of the Government, but the fault, I distinctly think, of the Auditor General in confusing the accounts of the two years. We find, all through this report, a number of accounts stated which belong to the accounts of this year, and which ought to be only in the accounts for this year to be laid upon the Table with the Auditor General's report next session. If the Auditor General thinks proper to publish his correspondence a year in advance, he puts this House to great inconvenience in investigating the accounts. But that is the point where the matter ought to be corrected.

Mr. LAURIER. I would call attention to this consideration, that the objection the First Minister raises as to the manner in which the Auditor General's report is made up would be a proper subject for investigation by the Committee on Public Accounts, so that we would have a decision of the committee to guide the Auditor General in the future.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. Premier does not require me to give a notice which will not be reached for a fortnight?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It is entirely a new departure which the Auditor General is seeking to introduce, and which the House, by this resolution, will be asked to affirm.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) It is quite customary to refer special matters to the committee, and the inconvenience of allowing them to remain over for nearly two years, after these expenditures had been made, before they can be inquired into, is so obvious that the necessity for examination is evident. I differ entirely from the right hon. Premier with respect to the propriety of the Auditor General publishing this correspondence. I venture to assert he is strictly within his rights and is doing public service by calling public attention to it at the earliest possible moment. At the same time it is a matter which, the hon. gentleman will see, should be referred to the committee and investigated.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The notice will have to go upon the paper for the present, and we will consider the matter further. It is a very important departure from the usual practice, and I understand the committee have abundant work already laid out for them.

Mr. SPEAKER. The motion is out of order.

PRINTING COMMITTEE.

Mr. BERGIN moved that the second report of the Committee of both Houses on the Printing of Parliament be concurred in.

Mr. FOSTER. I notice that this report is a somewhat important one from a financial point of view. It calls for the printing of a very large edition of the Experimental Farm and Dairy report, involving, as I am informed, some $80,000 or $90,000 of expense, and I think it requires very careful consideration. Our finances are not in such a condition as to warrant us in undertaking any but absolutely necessary expenditure, and this seems to be a pretty large expense in the printing of the reports of one department. I would suggest that the report be allowed to stand over until we have time to find out accurately about what this will cost.

Mr. CHARLTON. While the matter is standing over, Mr. Speaker, I would remind my hon. friend that these reports have been of very great service to the farming community. As they have been issued for a couple of years, I should deprecate their discontinuance on account of the expense incurred.

Mr. SPROULE. One reason why the motion was made so early was because the matter is in type at the present time, and copies can be struck off at once if ordered by the House, and thus members might distribute these reports before the close of the session. It is much more convenient for members to distribute these books here than when at home. This motion is for the same number of reports as were struck off last year, or perhaps not quite so many, and the number issued last year was not found to be more than sufficient for the wants of the various representatives of the rural constituencies.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Has the chairman ascertained what the cost will be?

Mr. SPROULE. I do not recollect the figures. The amount was given last year before the House closed, when a similar resolution passed the House referring to the same report.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I thought that was only the Dairy report.

Mr. SPROULE. No—both reports.

Motion withdrawn.

CHEESE INSPECTION.

Mr. McMILLAN (Huron). Before the Orders of the Day are called, Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a few remarks with respect to an answer given to a question by the hon. member for South Leeds (Mr. Taylor) regarding the appointment of an inspector at Montreal to settle any difficulties with regard to the quality or weight of cheese for shipment. Let me say that when the Bill was passed some years ago, I was opposed to any system of inspection that would take the goods out of the hands of the farmers or the factories. Not long ago there was a meeting at Lansdowne, where a number of cheese-makers met, and this question came up to be discussed. I was invited to be present, and the question of the appointment of an inspector at Montreal was fully discussed. The meeting dispersed without coming to any conclusion other than this: that they would enter into an arrangement to sell cheese subject to inspection at the factory or at the railway station before leaving for Montreal.

Mr. SPEAKER. May I ask if the hon. gentleman intends to move a motion?

Mr. McMILLAN (Huron). I have a letter I want to lay before the Government with respect to this matter, and it requires a little explanation.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. If the hon. gentleman would be good enough to send us the letter we should be glad to consider it.

Mr. SPEAKER. I have on previous occasions pointed out the inconvenience that would arise if subjects were brought up on the Orders of the Day being called which would give rise to discussion. Of course, by courtesy of the House, questions may be asked and the Ministers may answer, but if a matter is brought in which is likely to cause discussion, the practice will be inconvenient.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. In order that the hon. gentleman may have an opportunity to bring forward the question he is desirous of discussing, I may suggest that, by forbearing to move now, he may mention the matter on going into Committee of Ways and Means in a few moments. He will then have his opportunity for discussion and the rules of the House will be complied with.

NORTH-WEST TERRITORIES ACT.

House resolved itself into committee on Bill (No. 5) further to amend the North-west Territories Act.—(Mr. Daly.)

(In the Committee.)

On section 4,

Mr. LAURIER. Will the hon. gentleman kindly explain what parts of the Act these refer to, and what are the duties here prescribed?

Mr. DALY. The section provides that:

Section 67 of the said Act is hereby repealed and the following substituted therefor:—

67. Paragraphs (a), (b) and (h) of section 2, subsection 1 of section 20—and others hereby incorporated with this Act, and shall be read to form a part thereof. It also incorporates sections—

Mr. LAURIER. I have not the Act under my eye; I would ask the hon. gentleman what duties this prescribes?

Mr. DALY. Paragraph (a) of subsection 2 reads:

The expression "election" means an election of a member to serve in the House of Commons.

Paragraph (b) provides:

The expression "electoral district" means any place in Canada entitled to return a member to the House of Commons.

Paragraph (h) provides:

The expression "personal expenses," as used in this Act with respect to the expenditure of any candidate in relation to the election at which he is a candidate, include the reasonable travelling expenses of such candidate and the reasonable expenses of his living at hotels or elsewhere, for the purpose of and in relation to such an election.

Subsection 1 of section 20 reads:

No qualification in real estate shall be required of any candidate for a seat in the House of Commons of Canada, but such candidate shall be either a natural born subject of the Queen—

And so on. Paragraphs (b) (c) and (d) of section 30 relate to the furnishing of each deputy returning officer with a copy of the list of voters for the polling district for which he is appointed; (c) refers to the delivery to the deputy returning officer of the ballot box; (d) to furnishing each deputy returning officer with a sufficient number of ballot papers. Section 31 :

Whenever the returning officer fails to furnish to the deputy returning officer for any polling district, the ballot box within the time prescribed by this Act, such deputy returning officer shall cause one to be made.

Section 33, the poll clerk is to act as deputy returning officer in certain cases and appoint a poll clerk under him. Section 34 provides where the poll shall be held. Sections 35 to 40 have relation to the hours of polling, who may be present in the polling station, agents to be authorized in writing, who may act as agents for candidates, oath of secrecy, opening the poll, showing and locking ballot box, and calling voters. Subsections 1 and 2 of section 45 provides regulations for voting and conduct of electors and deputy returning officer, and the oath to be taken by voter if required. Subsection 3 provides that the deputy returning officer is to instruct an elector how to mark and poll his ballot. Sections 46 to 49 provide the mode of voting and marking ballots, despatch to be used in marking the ballot, and quitting the polling station, the penalty for carrying away ballot paper, and voters unable to mark their voting papers, and the oath of voter in such case. Subsection 2 of section 49 provides for an interpreter to be sworn in certain cases ; subsection 3, deputy to enter reasons for marking ballot by him. Section 51 :

The poll clerk shall enter in the poll book to be kept by him aforesaid, opposite the name of each elector voting, the word "voted" as soon as his ballot paper has been deposited in the ballot box.

Section 52 :

No voter who has refused to take the oath of qualification as aforesaid, when requested so to do, shall receive a ballot paper or be admitted to vote.

Section 53, voting more than once in same electoral district forbidden. Section 54 :

If a person representing himself to be the particular elector named on the list of voters, applies for a ballot paper after another person has voted as such elector, the applicant upon taking the oath in the form Y, in the first schedule of this Act, and otherwise establishing his identity, shall be entitled to receive a ballot paper.

Subsection 1 of section 56 provides :

Immediately after the close of the poll, the deputy returning officer shall, in the presence of the poll clerk and the candidates or their agents—and if the candidates and their agents or any of them are absent, then in the presence of such, if any, of them as are present, and of at least three electors—open the ballot box and proceed to count the number of votes given for each candidate ; and in doing so he shall reject all ballot papers which have not been supplied by the deputy returning officer, all those by which votes have been given for more candidates than are to be elected, and all those upon which there is any writing or mark by which the voter could be identified, other than the numbering by the deputy returning officer in the cases hereinbefore provided for.

Subsection 2 provides as to the duty of the deputy returning officer after counting the votes. Section 57 :

The deputy returning officer shall take a note of every objection made by any candidate or his agent, or any elector present, to any ballot paper found in the ballot box—

And so on. Section 58, statement, &c., to be inclosed in ballot box by returning officer. We incorporate the whole up to section 120, inclusive. Then we go on to section 125.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) What are the sections you omit ?

Mr. DALY. The sections omitted are 121 to 124. One hundred and twenty-one relates to fees for services and disbursements to officers mentioned ; and the Governor in Council may make a new tariff, and revise and amend it.

The fees and expenses in the second schedule of this Act mentioned, and no others, shall be allowed to the several officers therein mentioned, respectively, for their services and disbursements at any election : provided always, that if it appears to the Governor in Council that the provisions made in this section are inadequate or insufficient for the purposes for which they are intended—

And so on. The Governor in Council may make a tariff of fees. The reason this is not included is because it is provided for by the present Representation Act.

Mr. LAURIER. I understand there is a special provision in the North-west Territories Act with regard to that, which the hon. gentleman retains. What is it ?

Mr. DALY. Section 66 :

Inasmuch as in view of the extension of the electoral franchise to the North-west Territories, as by this Act provided, and the specific provisions in that behalf herein enacted, and of the remoteness of certain portions of the said Territories, it may appear that allowances for fees and disbursements similar to those provided by section 121 of "The Dominion Elections Act," will be inadequate or insufficient for a fair and just but economical remuneration for the services performed, the Governor in Council may make a tariff of fees, costs and expenses based, as nearly as may be on the tariff of fees, costs and expenses in the said section set forth, to be paid and allowed to returning officers and other persons employed at or in respect to elections under this Act, and may, from time to time, revise and amend such tariff :

2. A copy of every such tariff, and of every amendment thereof, shall be laid before the House of Commons at the then next session thereof.

Mr. LAURIER. At first blush I do not see much difference between the section as applied to the North-west Territories, and the general Act. Why not incorporate the section which applies to the general Act as well, and make it uniform in that respect ?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The general Act is in the alternative—either the fees, or such other fees as the Governor in Council may fix.

Mr. DALY. There seems to be very little difference between the provisions. Section 121 of the general Act provides that a copy of the tariff and amendments shall be laid before the House, but I presume in drafting the Bill it was thought better to leave the present North-west Territories Representation Act as it is. No good purpose can be attained by amending the Bill by either striking out or adding to section 121.

Mr. LAURIER. On the contrary, a good purpose is served by making the law uniform in all parts of the country. Really, the difference is so minute, it would be better to have the Act incorporated in toto.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I think the provision requiring the expenses to be laid before Parliament is a very wholesome regulation. I notice in one election in the North-west Territories the expenses are in the neighbourhood of $1,000, and the personal fees of the returning officer, something like $300. Has the hon. gentleman a statement of expenses for a Dominion election in the North-west ?

Mr. DALY. No, I have not. You will find them in the Auditor General's Report for 1892-93. I think. I know the Auditor General had a considerable amount of trouble in reference to that. Section 126 provides for the mode of giving notices. Section 127, a candidate may act as his own agent. Section 128, mistakes of form only not to avoid elections. Section 129, provisions requiring the presence of agents ; 130, administration of oaths ; 131, contracts or promises :

Every executory, contract, or promise, or undertaking, in any way referring to, arising out of, or depending upon, any election under this Act, even for the payment of lawful expenses, or the doing of some lawful act, shall be void in law.

Those are all the sections that are mentioned.

Mr. MARTIN. The effect of this clause is to incorporate the ballot provisions of the Dominion Elections Act with regard to the North-west representation. That is all right. But with regard to the voters' lists the Bill proposes to leave that as it is. I would draw the attention of the House to the fact that it is a most peculiar system and that it will require some amendment before it can be worked. The clauses referring to the voters' lists are sections 28 and following sections of the North-west Territories Representation Act. Section 28 says :

The Governor General may appoint enumerators to make lists of the electors in the electoral district ; and if such appointments have not been made, the returning officer, conjointly with any two justices of the peace, or with one justice of the peace and a notary public, or with any one of them resident in or near the electoral district and two electors of such district, neither of the number being a candidate, shall appoint under their hand a competent and reliable person to be enumerator for any one or more polling divisions of such district ; and the returning officer shall see that no polling division is omitted to be included in some one of such appointments.

That seems a most extraordinary provision. Under it the Governor General might appoint a dozen enumerators for the one district, and in case the Governor General does not appoint enumerators, the returning officer, along with a couple of justices of the peace, appoints the enumerator for each polling division. Then section 29 provides :

Each such enumerator, immediately after the nomination day, if a poll is granted, shall carefully compile a list of the persons qualified as electors to vote at the election then pending, for the polling division, or each of the polling divisions for which he has been appointed ; and he shall make three plainly written copies of the same, with the names of the voters alphabetically arranged, giving the occupation and residence of each voter, in the form K in the schedule to this Act.

Section 30 reads :

Each enumerator shall complete, date at his place of residence and sign the copies of the voters' list or lists as aforesaid, eight days before the polling day ; two of the said copies for each polling division he shall forthwith post up in two of the most public places within such polling division, and the other he shall retain for revision.

I draw the attention of the hon. Minister to that provision. I fancy the reason it has got into that shape is that in the older days when this Act was first passed, they did not have their nomination only a week before. The hon. gentleman will see that the enumerator does not go to work until after the nomination day, and then he must have his list ready eight days before the election, a thing which is impossible.

Mr. DALY. Is it ?

Mr. MARTIN. It is.

Mr. DALY. I do not see anything impossible about it. If the hon. gentleman will look at section 26 he will see that it reads as follows :—

Whenever a poll has been granted it shall be held on the same day of the week as the nomination, in the fourth week thereafter, and shall be opened at the hour of nine of the clock in the forenoon and kept open until five of the clock in the afternoon of the said day ; and the votes at the several polling stations shall be given between the said hours of that day, and by open voting.

There is nothing impossible about that.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Over a district, how large ?

Mr. DALY. They have always been able to do it before, even when the railway facilities were not such as they are now.

Mr. MARTIN. I do not know if it is smart of the hon. gentleman to be so particularly smart with me in this matter. Allow me in the same tone to refer him to section 6 of the Act, which provides :

Provided always, that in case of a general election the day so fixed shall be the same as that fixed for the nomination of candidates and the other electoral districts of Canada.

Mr. DALY. Well, what about that ?

Mr. MARTIN. Well.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. That refers to the nomination.

Mr. DALY. The polling day is four weeks after the nomination.

Mr. MARTIN. I see. I understood that the law had been made the same in all respects in general elections, and if it has not, it should be. There is no reason why an election in the Territories should be three weeks after the other parts of Canada. Of course, if the election is to be four weeks after nomination, the comments I have made do not apply, although, as I say, it is a most extraordinary provision for making a voters' list. There is nobody charged really with making out this list. There is no time within which the enumerators are to commence, for all they have to do is to have the list ready eight days before the election. There is no notice and no opportunity for anybody to get his name upon the list. The Government can make a list with only five names upon it, and there is no possibility of any one objecting. It seems to me the most autocratic and ridiculous provision that was ever in a statute.

Mr. SPROULE. It is very much on a par with the Manitoba Registration Act.

Mr. MARTIN. The Manitoba Registration Act gives the fullest and freest right of appeal to both sides. The lists are published a long time before, and everything is very complete in that Act. Here is a provision in this Act which is altogether absurd. The returning officer who may be a partisan, we will suppose, appoints a different person in each polling division. That person need not show his list to any one, but can make it out as he sees fit. A man may be entitled to vote, but he has no opportunity in any way, shape or manner of getting his name upon the list. It does seem to me that there should be some opportunity of scrutinizing the enumerator's work, and of giving the voters an opportunity of getting on the list if they are entitled to it.

Mr. LAURIER. I would remind my hon. friend from Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) that there are a good many other places besides the North-west Territories where the preparation of the voters' lists does not work satisfactorily. I do not believe that there is any part of Canada where it works satisfactorily, and indeed we have been told by the Prime Minister only lately that the Government intend to introduce a measure with regard to that Act during the present session, and so the discussion may, perhaps, come up more properly at that time. There is no doubt a great deal of force in everything that has been said by my hon. friend from Winnipeg (Mr. Martin), and when the time comes we will discuss that subject. I would like to call the attention of the Minister of the Interior to this : I may be astray, but I do not notice that he has introduced into this Bill any provision for a recount. The hon. gentleman knows that the system of having a recount is an indispensable accessory to the system of the ballot, and I suppose it is through an oversight that it has been omitted from the Bill.

Mr. DALY. In reference to what the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) has said about the voters' lists, I may say that the provision of the Act in that regard has been found to work very satisfactorily in the elections that have taken place in the North-west Territories.

Mr. LAURIER. Satisfactory to one side.

Mr. DALY. There has been no objection to it by either side. I was there in the general elections of 1887, and I never heard any objection taken to it upon the platform either by a Reformer or a Conservative. More than that, I have taken occasion to consult the representatives of the North-west Territories in the matter, and they prefer that the provisions of the present Act should remain in force, particularly in view of the fact, as the hon. the leader of the Opposition stated, that the right hon. the Prime Minister some time ago announced that there was a possibility of an amendment to the Franchise Act. It does not seem well at the present moment to extend the provisions of the Franchise Act to the North-west Territories, when we have the provisions of the North-west Territories Representation Act, which has proved to be satisfactory. More particularly will that be satisfactory now in view of the fact that the country possesses railway communication, which was not the case at the time when the Act was introduced nine years ago, and hon. members from the North-west will be able to speak more particularly with respect to the working of the system by which the lists have been prepared than I am able to do from personal experience, and they will be able to state to the House whether it is satisfactory or not.

Mr. DAVIN. It is the opinion of hon. members from the North-west—for we had a conference on the matter—that Parliament cannot very well in the present condition of the country improve on the method of arranging for a list of voters. It worked well in 1887 and in 1891. The hon. leader of the Opposition has asked : Worked well for whom ? I think if the hon. gentleman will consult any of his Reform friends in the North-west they will tell him that it worked with equal justice to both sides. I do not think it would be advisable in the present state of the history of the North-west to adopt the system which prevails throughout the rest of Canada.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I agree with my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition that if we are to have a Bill from the Government dealing with the preparation of the voters' lists this will not be an opportune time for the discussion of the subject; but as the Minister of the Interior has said it is the deliberate intention of the Government to continue the existing system, then I think we cannot altogether pass over unnoticed the observations made by the Minister himself and the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin). The hon. member says it has worked satisfactorily. But for whom has it worked satisfactorily? What guarantee have the people that their names will be placed on the lists as a matter of right?

Mr. DAVIN. Permit me to offer a word, for I should have made this explanation in the course of my remarks. If a man's name is not on the voters' list, all he has to do is to walk up to the polling booth, make oath that he is a householder and has been a resident for a certain time, and he votes, whether his name is on the list or not.

Committee rose and reported progress.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE TARIFF— WEIGHING OF CHEESE.

Mr. FOSTER moved that the House again resolve itself into Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. McMILLAN. Before you leave the Chair, Mr. Speaker, I would like to call attention to the announcement made yesterday that the Government intended to appoint an inspector at Montreal to decide disputes about the weight of cheese. Now, the cheese industry is a very important one in this country, especially in the province of Ontario, and in that province the inspection of cheese has been conducted in different localities by voluntary cheese boards; and the rules and regulations of one of these cheese boards I hold in my hand, and will read:

The payment of the sum of $1 to the secretary constitutes an individual membership for the current year, and 25 cents a hundred cows or fractional part thereof for factories manufacturing cheese or butter.

The price for single admission to the board with all its rights and privileges, except voting, for one day, shall be 50 cents.

Members only are entitled to all the privileges of the salesroom.

There shall be a board of arbitration constituted for the purpose of hearing, adjusting and settling all differences which may arise from time to time between the buyers and sellers, and as it is an expressed understanding and agreement by and between such and all members thereof that such settlement by such arbitration committee shall be final and adhered to. The board of arbitration shall be chosen and constituted as follows:—In case of difference between two parties or interests, the said parties or interests shall each choose one member of the board and the members thus chosen shall select a third, and these three shall constitute the board of arbitration and have appropriate jurisdiction.

All bargains between members, made at the salesroom or elsewhere, verbally or otherwise, shall be considered binding and to be lived up to and carried out by each of the parties thereto, and a failure of either party to perform his or their part shall be considered sufficient cause for the expulsion from the said Board of Trade and salesroom of the party so failing to perform.

It is hereby understood and agreed that all goods, so far as weights and quality are concerned, shall be tested on delivery and shall be final unless a written agreement as to the weights and quality be made between the buyer and seller.

This is a very simple method of settling all disputes, a method that has worked very well in the province of Ontario for the last twenty years, and one under which our cheese industry has attained its present position, second to that of no other industry in the province. Last January, while holding meetings of farmers' institutes I attended one at Lansdowne, at which this question of the appointment of a cheese inspector was discussed; and the farmers there came to the conclusion that they would enter into an arrangement to sell all their cheese subject to inspection at the factory or the station before it went out of the hands of the maker or seller. At a meeting which I held at Kingston, the same question was brought up. It was not introduced by me; but after that meeting, a letter was forwarded to me by a gentleman of Kingston on the subject, which I have now in my possession. I was under the impression at the time the Inspection Act was amended in 1892 that it would not be in the interests of the cheese-makers or creameries or farmers to have to sell their butter or cheese subject to inspection at Montreal, and in several cases my fears have been realized. I was told, when in the neighbourhood of Brockville last year, that one gentleman purchased a large quantity of cheese, $60,000 or $70,000 worth, to be inspected at Montreal, and that three weeks afterwards he failed, and returned with an offer of 25 cents on the dollar. In another case, a gentleman who was a patron of a factory from which a quantity of cheese was sold, told me that, knowing that it was to be weighed at Montreal, he went to the shed where the cheese was lying, and he was astonished to find a man and two or three boys actively at work weighing the cheese. Once or twice he saw a cheese that weighed seventy-four pounds put into a box marked seventy-five pounds; and a cheese weighing seventy-three pounds put into a box marked seventy-four pounds. The latter cheeses were put aside, and when the inspector came round they were careful to select for his inspection those below the weight, so that every cheese in the lot was reduced one pound below the weight marked on the box. Another man stated that he had sold cheese to an agent, and a few days after it left he was notified that it was off flavour, and was not in good condition, and he had to suffer a reduction in price in consequence. He went to Montreal and called at the chief office of the buyer for whom the agent was acting, and asked him what was wrong with the cheese. The principal of the firm said there was nothing wrong with the cheese, that it was in a vessel crossing the ocean. The salesman said nothing more, but went on to the street at once and met the agent. The agent asked what had brought him there. "Why," he said, "it was your letter." "What, have you been to the office?" asked the agent; "I hope to God you have not given me away;" and the agent offered him a hundred dollars not to read the letter to the head of the firm. That is a sample of the dishonesty to which our farmers are subjected, when their butter and cheese are sold subject to inspection at Montreal. Such proceedings as this will destroy the confidence of the farmers in the conduct of salesmen, when the cheese is sold subject to inspection at any place except where the factory is situated, and will injure this industry, which should be fostered by the Government in every possible way. If the Government are going to do anything, they should change the Inspection Act, so that all cheese would be sold subject to inspection at the factory or the railway station. The following letter has been received by me in connection with this matter:—

KINGSTON, Jan. 30, 1894.

Mr. JOHN McMILLAN, M.P., Seaforth, Ont.

DEAR SIR,—In reference to the appointment of a Government inspector of cheese and butter, I am requested by a number of cheese manufacturers in this section to request you to use your influence against said appointment. The cheese industry of this section has greatly improved the last few years both in quality and quantity under our present system of doing business. We sell for cash; weights and qualities inspected at the local station here. Then if you do not like the way the buyer inspects or weighs your cheese, you may either leave the case to arbitration or sell to another. There is never any trouble. I have been secretary of the Kingston and Frontenac Cheese Board since it was first established here and know nearly everything that happens between buyer and seller, and I know that there never was a case that was referred to arbitration, or there never was a case in court or one cent of law cost has never been incurred: the cheese buyer and seller have always settled any difference between themselves. There has never been an unkind word between buyer and seller at our cheese board since it was first established to this day. But two of our cheese men this season thought they could do a little better by sending their cheese to Montreal: they lost between \$4,000 and \$5,000. There was another case when a man sent his cheese to Montreal for inspection, he sent the weights of his cheese to Montreal, but through a mistake the cheese was not shipped, yet he got a return from Montreal that his cheese was soft and was cut $\frac{1}{2}$ cent, though his cheese was at the station here and they had never seen them. There was one factory in this country that sold their cheese subject to inspection at Montreal; he said he was selling for $\frac{1}{4}$ and $\frac{1}{2}$ of a cent more than we were every time, but when I settled with my patrons in the fall, I was able to pay \$1.80 more than he paid. There is a large amount of money and capital invested in the cheese industry here, which we think would be nearly all lost if a Government inspector is appointed at Montreal, for of course, if they once get our cheese there, they can pay us what they like, and none but a wealthy company that can ship their cheese to Liverpool could engage in the business, and the cheese industry would be taken out of the hands of the farmers. In conclusion, I may say that I never heard a cheese manufacturer in this section say they wanted the Government to appoint an inspector.

After the Bill was passed two years ago, the Western Dairymen's Association passed a resolution declaring that no cheese should be sold subject to inspection at Montreal or elsewhere than at the factory or railway station. Let me say, as one who has had a good deal of experience in cheese factories for the last twenty years, that the system laid down in the rules and regulations of the cheese boards is one that has worked well, and with which the farmers are perfectly satisfied. Neither the cheese boards nor the dairymen's associations have asked that an inspector be appointed, and I am convinced his appointment will lead a great many cheese factories to believe that the inspection is to take place at Montreal, and create a feeling of non-confidence which will be very apt to spread. While I believe that the Government are anxious to place the matter on as sound a footing as possible, it is their duty to pay strict attention to what the board of Kingston and Frontenac, through their secretary, has said, and with this explanation I will place the letter and the rules and regulations of the board in the hands of the First Minister.

Mr. TAYLOR. Before I say anything I would like to know who is the writer of the letter the hon. gentleman has just read.

Mr. McMILLAN. The letter is signed by Thomas Keenan, secretary of the Kingston and Frontenac Cheese Board.

Mr. TAYLOR. And a buyer of cheese. I may say that I attended the meeting of the Farmers' Institute at Lansdowne, to which my hon. friend has just referred; and I do not agree in the statement he makes that the cheese men there came to the conclusion that they would adopt the same system which was adopted in the west, and to which the hon. gentleman referred, namely, that the purchasers of cheese should sell subject to inspection and weight at the factory. They said, if that could be brought about here in eastern Ontario, it would be no doubt the best thing for the cheese producers, but as yet they had been unable to bring about such a state of affairs. At the Cheese Board at Brockville, where about 150 to 200 different factories are represented, the number of cheeses at each factory offered for sale is registered on a board and is bought subject to weight at Montreal. At the meeting at Lansdowne, after the matter was discussed, a committee was appointed to hold further inquiry and representative men were to be invited to meet them. The result was that a deputation of farmers came here to Ottawa and waited upon the Minister of Agriculture, and urged him to name a referee at Montreal. The report which had been received from Professor Robertson stated that this grievance did exist in the eastern part of Ontario and throughout Quebec generally, that the cheese was sold and shipped to Montreal, and then, after being weighed at the factory by the cheese-maker, the boxes were found one or two pounds short when they arrived at Montreal. What the deputation asked of the Minister of Agriculture was, not to appoint an inspector, but a referee or umpire—some man, who was perhaps an official in some department at Montreal, such as the inspector of weights and measures, for instance, or some other competent person. So that in case cheese shipped to Montreal from any factory, with a bill of weights accompanying it, did not correspond, on arrival, with the bill of weights, then the referee would be called in to test whether the factory weights, as marked on the boxes, were correct or not. The Minister of Agriculture, in reply to the deputation which came from the Brockville Board during this session, agreed to do this, and I think negotiations are going on now towards having such a person named. Some Government officer at Montreal might be appointed, in whom the public will have confidence, to decide disputes as to weights that may arise between seller and buyer. Then I know that the people of the eastern part of Ontario, where they have been in the habit of selling, and will continue to sell, in that way (by the board subject to weight at Montreal) will approve the action of the Government if such an officer is appointed at Montreal. Such an appointment cannot in any way discourage the production of cheese. There is nothing said in reference to inspection as to quality—that is a matter to be dealt with later on should the necessities of the case demand it. There is a grievance all through eastern Ontario and in Quebec because the producers or sellers, if the market happens to drop, are nipped a pound or two on each box of cheese: and it is for the purpose of getting over that difficulty that the farmers, the chief producers, are asking that a referee be appointed who will be independent of both seller and buyer, and who will come forward and say whether a shipment of cheese contains the weights marked on the boxes. If the Government appoint, as I hope they will, such a referee, their action will be acceptable to the producers of cheese, whether it is acceptable to the buyers or not. And it is the producers that we are most largely interested in.

Mr. SPROULE. In consultation with some of the cheese men in my section of the country, I found that the cheese producers universally regarded this step as one in the right direction. But when you talk to the buyers, they appear to be against it: and it is not to be wondered at that they are against it, because they will occasionally resort to these means to get themselves out of a difficulty and improve the situation for themselves where they buy at outside figures in a falling market. I know that, although cheese in our country are not, as a rule, sold on the board, as in eastern and western Ontario, they are sometimes sold subject to weight and inspection at Montreal. As a rule they are sold subject to weight and inspection at the cheese factory where they are shipped. In some instances that came under my notice the reports made from Montreal were not satisfactory to the manufacturers of cheese. There was a good deal of dissatisfaction on account of cutting down weights, when the patrons or the factory men thought they were entitled to larger weights than they got. If an appointment of this kind is made—and I understand it is practically made, or about to be made—the producers of cheese would look upon it with favour, but the buyers would not. The verdict of the buyers is not always a good criterion to judge by, because they are apt to be in favour of what injures to their own benefit. Some years ago, at the Dominion Dairy Association, the proposal was brought forward by myself to have a system adopted whereby cheese would be stamped or labelled, and every buyer at the association objected to it and said it would be detrimental to the trade. I find now they have come round to regard it as one of the requirements of the situation. I believe the same will be the case in reference to this arbitrator appointed, or to be appointed, by the Government. If the appointee was an expert in cheese, it would be better. I notice the person appointed is to be the inspector of weights and measures at Montreal. If the quality was to be inspected, he would be useless, but if the question to be decided is that of weight alone, he would be all right.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I would like to ask the Government whether, in considering this appointment, any communications have been had with the various dairymen's associations throughout the country, especially those where the cheese industry is largest? I understand that in the Dairymen's Association of western Ontario—and I may say that the members and officers of that association are among the oldest and most experienced cheese producers and shippers in the Dominion—this matter was considered, and it was decided that such an appointment was not necessary, that it would create dissatisfaction and trouble to adopt an inspection at any point—Montreal as proposed at that time. As these men have the greatest experience in the trade and are the most deeply interested, one would suppose that some communication must have been had with them with regard to this matter. I cannot understand how this appointment would be to the benefit of the producers rather than of the buyers—from my business experience, I should think the contrary would be the case. I have not heard of any dissatisfaction existing among the chief producers or factory men. In our part of the country the cheese are purchased subject to weight and inspection at the factory, and, under that system, I cannot understand how the producer or manufacturer could have any difficulty. If they are not satisfied with the treatment accorded them by the buyer or the representative the buyer sends, they can refuse to carry out the bargain.

Mr. SPROULE. In many cases they are not bought that way, but are bought subject to weight elsewhere—say Guelph.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I can understand how difficulties might arise in adopting a system of selling subject to inspection either as to quality or weight at any other point than the factory. The hon. gentleman can see that the system proposed might give rise to difficulty and trouble, and while I have not had the opportunity of communicating with the officers of the association or with the large producers in my section of the country, yet, speaking from memory, I am inclined to think that they discussed the question and decided that the appointment proposed would lead to dissatisfaction. I would like, therefore, to know from the Government, if, before they proceeded in this matter, the different associations were communicated with, and, if so, whether they favoured the proposal?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. There seems to be some misapprehension on the subject. The associations have not been communicated with, nor is it the intention of the Government to communicate with them, and for this reason: It is not the intention of the Government to do anything about this matter. I understand the complaint of the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. McMillan) is based on the belief that the Government intend to appoint an inspector, involving a change in the system by which the dairymen have been accustomed to sell according to weights agreed upon at the factory or the railway station, or wherever they pleased. There is no intention to take any such action. The seller and buyer will make their bargain according to weight or anything else at any place they like. All that has been decided upon, all that has been done, according to the answer that was given in the House yesterday, is this: that if buyer and seller should make a bargain dependent upon weighing at Montreal, we consent that our officer shall act as referee. But it is entirely at the option of the seller.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The hon. gentleman will see that no one would understand from the answer given that this was the action intended. His explanation puts an entirely different face upon the matter.

Mr. DALY. The answer was:

It is the intention to appoint the inspector of weights and measures at Montreal to act as referee in matters of dispute respecting the weights of cheese.

Mr. SCRIVER. I was pleased to hear what has fallen from the hon. the Premier with regard to this matter. I may say that during the past year, especially, a great many disputes have taken place in regard to the weighing of cheese in Montreal. In the part of the country I represent we have no boards, as they have in eastern Ontario. The buyers go into the country and make their purchases from the different factories; the cheese are shipped to Montreal, and the buyers there, under some arbitrary system which they have adopted, have the cheese weighed. I understand the system pursued is something like this: that four or five cheese are selected from a lot of 100 or more boxes; they are weighed, and in case there is what they call an even beam, a pound is deducted for the weight of the box. The result of this is a loss to the producer of a larger percentage than should be exacted, and consequently there have been a good many disputes, and a good deal of heart-burning. I think it would meet the desire and reasonable wishes of the makers of cheese in our part of the country if some official connected with the Government, some one who would have no personal interest in the matter, were appointed to see that perfect justice was meted out to both parties, and thus prevent disputes.

Motion agreed to, and House again resolved itself into Committee on Ways and Means.

(In the Committee.)

Provided that on all iron or steel bars, rods, strips, or steel sheets of whatever shape, and on all iron or steel bars of irregular shape or section, cold rolled, cold hammered or polished in any way in addition to the ordinary process of hot rolling or hammering, there shall be paid one-sixth of one cent per pound in addition to the rates imposed on the said materials.

Mr. LAURIER. This is going back to the old duty?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes. Owing to the extra work upon these articles, 5 per cent is scarcely an adequate protection.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) What is the difference between the proposed and the new duty?

Mr. FOSTER. The 5 per cent would not give more than $\frac{1}{8}$ th of a cent per pound. One-sixth of a cent per pound was not at all a prohibitory duty under the old tariff, because it came in even with that.

Mr. McMILLAN. What particular classes of finished iron come in under this item?

Mr. FOSTER. All iron or steel bars, or the like of that, which are finished.

Mr. McMILLAN. Will it apply to polished mouldboards?

Mr. FOSTER. No.

Item agreed to.

Forgings of iron and steel of whatever shape or size, or in whatever stage of manufacture, n.e.s., 35 per cent ad valorem, but not less than $15 per ton.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) You eliminate from this resolution rolled or hammered bars or iron or steel not less than 4 inches in diameter—why?

Mr. FOSTER. Because in bringing in a bar of iron or a bar of steel you can go up to 4 inches with it, and the duty will be $10 a ton; but if it goes above 4 inches, 35 per cent might be more than $10 a ton. Under this provision the effect will be that all bars of iron or steel of 4 inches or more come in at the rate of $10.

Mr. CASEY. The Minister has not explained why there should be different classes of duty on these articles.

Mr. FOSTER. By striking that out I am assimilating the duty on bars of iron or steel, making them uniformly $10 a ton, instead of the larger amount.

Mr. CASEY. But you say this is to be not less than $15 per ton.

Mr. FOSTER. This is for the forgings, iron and steel.

Item agreed to.

Rolled iron or steel angles, channels, structural shapes and special sections, weighing less than thirty-five pounds per lineal yard, n.e.s., 35 per cent ad valorem, but not less than $10 per ton.

Mr. CASEY. It is quite a puzzle to any person not up in the technicalities of the trade to understand why there should be so many different classes and different duties on each.

Mr. FOSTER. There are different classes of iron.

Mr. CASEY. Is this a lower duty, because the process of making is simpler or easier?

Mr. FOSTER. It is a lower duty; it is not to be less than $10 a ton.

Mr. CASEY. The item we just passed is not to be less than $15 per ton. This is a lower duty than that—what is the reason of the lower duty?

Mr. FOSTER. These articles run into almost an infinite variety of shapes, sizes, and the like of that. There is a difference between a forging and these small channels.

Mr. CASEY. The forgings are evidently made to apply to things of all sorts and shapes, irregular shapes, and sections, and so on. Is it because forgings of iron and steel included in the present item are more simple and more easily manufactured?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, the other are the more costly kind.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Is it not a fact that the forgings of iron and steel cost only about $20 or $25 a ton, and that the tax will amount to 60 per cent instead of 35 per cent, taking average values? Perhaps the hon. Minister will state the average values during the last six months.

Mr. FOSTER. Forgings of iron range from 3 cents to 7 cents per pound, and some of them, I think, even higher; the unit of value of the importations last year was about $4\frac{1}{4}$ cents per pound. The average of rolled iron, channel, structural shapes is about $1\frac{1}{2}$ cents per pound. The duty is not to be less than \$10 per ton, or 35 per cent.

Mr. CASEY. The committee might have expected to have had a schedule submitted showing the usual price of these articles, in order that hon. members might be able to form an idea of the amount ad valorem really represented by the specific duties. Once the hon. gentleman departs from the honest and straightforward path of ad valorem duties he loses himself. I do not suppose the Finance Minister is in the least degree capable of telling the committee the amount the specific duties would reach on the various classes in this schedule. It is quite certain that when a number of items are grouped together the specific duty on the whole must impose a varying percentage, and must be very high in some instances and very low in others. That, in fact, is the object of the specific duty—it is to cover the enormous taxation imposed on the cheaper articles under the form of so much per pound or per ton. The argument used in favour of specific duties is that they are to prevent undervaluation; but the real reason is to place prohibitive duties on certain lines of goods without letting the public know it. This specific duty is the pet of the combine. In conversing with a member of one of the combines the other day, he complained of the change made in the duty on the article he produced, in that while formerly it was specific now it was 35 per cent ad valorem. I replied that 35 per cent was enough protection for any established industry. The reply I received was : We do not care about the percentages, what we want is the specifics ; what we want to do is to exclude the cheaper class of articles such as we produce ; we want it to be a prohibitive duty, and that can only be done by means of a specific duty ; if the Government impose a tax of $1 a dozen on certain articles, worth only the same amount, it may exclude foreign competition, but if the duty is only 35 per cent, it will not prevent competition from outsiders, and what we want to do is to avoid competition entirely. That was an honest statement as to why the manufacturer wanted specific duties. The rest of the schedule now under consideration of the committee is so crowded in technicalities that, to use a popular phrase, no fellow can understand it. I do not believe the "fellow" who submitted the proposition is any better off than other members.

Mr. FOSTER. Not much, but still he knew that charcoal iron was made in this country.

Mr. CASEY. I give the hon. Minister credit for having found that out during the progress of this discussion, but it was not he who in the first instance gave the information to the House. These items have been evidently arranged by the parties interested. They have waited on the Minister and have shown him how the item should be arranged. Another delegation has followed and submitted clashing requests and demands, and the Minister had to get the parties together and reconcile their demands as far as possible. While home a few days ago I overheard a discussion about the weather among a group of farmers. One of them said it would be queer weather if each farmer had the making of his own weather. I think the making of a tariff is something like making the weather. It may be truly said that if the weather were submitted to those interested we would have very queer weather, for all those interested would differ. In making out the tariff, it has been intrusted to those interested, and the result is that we have a queer tariff.

Item agreed to.

Iron bridges and structural iron work, 30 per cent ad valorem, but not less than 1 cent per pound.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Why does the Finance Minister insert that limitation, "not less than 1 cent per pound" ?

Mr. FOSTER. Because of the excessively low prices prevailing for bridge work at the present time, especially in Belgium and the United States. On some parts of bridge works, just 30 per cent would be so low a tariff that they could not compete, although under normal prices 30 per cent is quite sufficient protection.

Mr. CASEY.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). You were afraid the people would have an opportunity of getting cheap bridges.

Mr. FOSTER. They might get a temporary advantage because of abnormally low prices, but in the end they would get no advantage.

Mr. CASEY. I suppose the hon. gentleman is afraid that if the bridges are too low the first flood would carry them away.

Mr. FOSTER. I am afraid you might get drowned.

Item agreed to.

Railway fish plates and tie plates, $10 per ton.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Why is the specific duty returned here again?

Mr. FOSTER. This is exactly the same duty as on the bar iron, and you cannot complain if you put on the fish plate, which is made from the bar iron, the same duty.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) And the resolution the hon. gentleman came to, of applying an ad valorem duty, has vanished, and he has gone back to specific duties.

Item agreed to.

Wire nails, 1 cent per pound.

Mr. CASEY. This duty is raised one-quarter of a cent over the first duty proposed ; why is that ?

Mr. FOSTER. The difficulties in the way of adjusting the tariff as regards iron nails and wire were very great. The former duty of 1½ cents a pound on wire nails was a very respectable duty, and the object was to reduce it just as far as it possibly could be done without destroying the industry of making wire nails in this country. I thought we could possibly accomplish that by reducing the duty upon the sizes of wire used in manufacturing nails to 15 per cent, and then reducing the nails to three-quarters per cent. We find, that in the present condition of things in the United States wire nails are abnormally low, costing in fact less than the iron rods from which the wire is drawn and out of which the nail is made, the industry could not live here. In looking over the matter this fact came out: that if we excepted from the wire drawing the numbers that were used for the making of these nails and barbed wire, it would be taking some 60 or 70 per cent of the entire production of the wire drawing establishments from them ; and the duty upon wire is only 25 per cent, which is not at all an extravagant duty. I found that would not work, and the only fair way is to give a reduction of half a cent a pound on the wire nails and leave the wire itself at 25 per cent. That makes a very considerable reduction in the cost of the nails.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). A very considerable increase, you mean.

Mr. FOSTER. I am looking at it from the other point of view. It does not destroy the industry of wire drawing, which is an important one.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I could well see how one or two changes might be made in the tariff which the hon. gentleman submitted, but here we have over a hundred changes. He has been collecting duty on these nails. I suppose, according to the proposed tariff.

Mr. FOSTER. Subject to amendment always.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). How does the hon. gentleman propose to deal with all those who have been paying the lesser duties and making sales on that basis?

Mr. FOSTER. In the way it always has been done since we have been making tariffs in this country. When the resolutions are brought down they go into force, although they are not law. All entries from that time until the resolutions become law are made subject to amendment, and a man who imports has got to make his own calculations and exercise his own discretion and judgment.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) How is he to ascertain the changeable moods of the Minister of Finance?

Mr. FOSTER. He just takes the general principle that all mankind are subject to changes.

Mr. LAURIER. But the hon. gentleman may amend his own amendments.

Mr. FOSTER. I will promise not to change this.

Mr. CASEY. What is the ad valorem equivalent of 1 cent per pound on wire nails?

Mr. FOSTER. The price of wire nails is from $1.50 upwards.

Mr. CASEY. Then it is 66 per cent, and why does the Minister put 66 per cent on wire nails, and only 30 per cent on some other articles?

Mr. FOSTER. Just for the reason that I have given.

Mr. CASEY. That they were too cheap before?

Mr. FOSTER. That under the present conditions it would not be possible otherwise for our wire nail manufacturers to conduct their business.

Mr. LAURIER. And therefore the people have to be taxed accordingly.

Mr. FOSTER. A light tax is put upon the people, but they have all the benefits of the industry in this country.

Mr. CASEY. Sixty-six per cent is not a light tax. Of course it is not a very large item of consumption, but the tax on it is a good type of the taxes on other articles that enter into larger consumption. The Minister says that this industry could not live with three-quarters of a cent per pound protection, which would be 50 per cent on the price of wire nails as stated by him, and he has to give it 66 per cent to keep it alive. Does he imagine that the maintenance of an industry that cannot live with 50 per cent protection is of such benefit to the country as to justify him in taxing every buyer of wire nails 66 per cent on the cost? Can he tell us what size this industry has attained in Canada, how much capital is invested in it, and how many men it employs?

Mr. FOSTER. There are eight or ten factories, employing a large number of men.

Mr. CASEY. A hundred apiece?

Mr. FOSTER. I do not know exactly the number they do employ.

Mr. CASEY. It is almost impossible to discuss this matter seriously when we come down to the statement that the existence of eight or ten factories, employing a number of men that the Minister has no idea of, justifies him in imposing a tax of 66 per cent upon an article in favour of an industry which could not live with 50 per cent protection. It is amusing in a way, but it is a sign of the complete rottenness of the whole system.

Mr. McMULLEN. Can the hon. gentleman say about what was the output of the factories last year?

Mr. FOSTER. The capital invested is about $339,600 and the annual wages paid about $123,650—that is, for wire drawing, and the manufacture of wire nails. I have not at my hand a statement of the quantity turned out.

Mr. McMULLEN. It would be well if the committee were placed in possession of that information, because wire nails are used very largely and are generally taking the place of cut nails; and the statement of the Minister that this duty will increase the price 66 per cent is a very serious matter to people engaged in building who want to get these nails as cheaply as possible.

Mr. CASEY. It seems very strange that in all these cases it is the interest of the producers that is considered and not the interests of the consumers, though the consumers are to the producers as many thousands to one. It is understood to be one of the objects of good government to secure the greatest good for the greatest number; but the hon. Minister's object seems to be to take special care of the minority, to secure the greatest good for the smallest number, in fact, to put the duty where it will do most good in the technical sense of the phrase, not to the greatest number, but where the most political capital can be made out of it. The trades come and ask him for assistance on the very ground of their insignificance—on the very ground that they are small and trifling trades, and cannot produce goods as cheap or as good as those of foreign producers, and they therefore claim that he should compel the Canadian consumer to use their wares. I saw a very amusing instance of this in a Petrolea paper which has been mailed to all of us, which says that the oil producers there have been working to exclude American oil, not so much to increase the price as to force Canadians to use Canadian oil, in order that they might overcome the prejudice that they have in their minds and their noses against Canadian oil. This method used to be followed by our mothers in the days when we had a strong prejudice against castor oil, both in our minds and in our noses. It is certainly a truly drastic method of overcoming prejudice and compelling customers to buy what they do not want. Wire nails of Canadian manufacture cannot be made as cheaply as the imported nails, but the hon. Minister thinks it is better that Canadians should pay twice as much for Canadian nails as they would for the imported. He knows what is good for them, and forces them to buy the Canadian article at no matter what increased cost.

Item agreed to.

Shoe tacks, one-half ounce to four ounces, 1 cent per thousand.

Cut tacks, brads or sprigs, not exceeding sixteen ounces to the thousand, $1\frac{1}{2}$ cents per thousand; exceeding sixteen ounces to the thousand, $1\frac{1}{2}$ cents per pound.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) This is an increase of $\frac{1}{2}$ a cent a thousand on cut tacks?

Mr. FOSTER No, it is a reduction.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman's original proposition was 1 cent per thousand on cut tacks, not exceeding 16 ounces to the thousand. Now he is making it $1\frac{1}{2}$ cents.

Mr. FOSTER. The old duty was 2 cents per pound and the present proposition is to make shoe tacks 1 cent per thousand, and the second grade $1\frac{1}{2}$ cents per thousand, and the other $1\frac{1}{2}$ cents per pound, instead of 2 cents per thousand and per pound respectively. My hon. friend will see that it is a decided reduction in the duties as they were.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The corrected revise of the first revise, which was about the third proposition the hon. gentleman made, contained a resolution taxing cut tacks, brads and sprigs, not exceeding 16 ounces to the thousand, 1 cent a thousand. By the revise of the revise, he makes it $1\frac{1}{2}$ cents, or an increase of 50 per cent. What is the reason for the change?

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman does not give me credit for taking shoe tacks out and making them less than before.

Mr. CASEY.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). It is the other tacks that are taken out and increased $\frac{1}{2}$ a cent.

Mr. FOSTER. What I proposed to do was to put the shoe tacks at the 1 cent per thousand, but I find that shoe tacks are defined by the weights I have given—one-half ounce to four ounces. We took out all the shoe tacks that are used, and it was not the intention at first to put other than shoe tacks at the low rate.

Mr. CASEY. Then when the first proposal was made, the hon. gentleman did not understand the classification.

Mr. FOSTER. I did not understand all about tacks.

Mr. CASEY. We should like to have the price of tacks as in the case of wire nails.

Mr. FOSTER. The average price of all the tacks—shoe tacks and others—last year's importations, was about 5 cents per pound.

Mr. CASEY. What is the selling price of Canadian tacks?

Mr. FOSTER. They retail about 5 cents per package.

Mr. CASEY. That will be about 25 per cent and the others higher in proportion. At $1\frac{1}{2}$ cents a pound it would be $37\frac{1}{2}$ per cent.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Do we make cut tacks in this country?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, in Hamilton.

Item agreed to.

Brass and copper nails, rivets and burrs, and manufactures of brass or copper, n.e.s., 30 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Here you have 5 per cent of increase.

Mr. FOSTER. Five per cent decrease from the old duty.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) An increase from your first proposition.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, the decrease was too much.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman made a good resolution and then went back on it.

Mr. FOSTER. This is probably the best.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman took credit for reductions in the tariff, and now he is bringing in amendments which restore the tariff to what it was.

Mr. FOSTER. I shall take credit for the tariff as finally passed.

Item agreed to.

Lead pipe and lead shot, four-tenths of a cent per pound and 25 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I would like the hon. gentleman to explain this item. I have had some telegrams from people interested, and

I cannot understand the change as it is proposed. It is altogether different from the resolutions in the corrected copy, which read :

Lead, bars, blocks and sheets, 60 cents per hundred pounds.

Lead, old, scrap and pig, 40 cents per one hundred pounds.

Lead, manufactures of, n.e.s., 40 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. FOSTER. The old tariff had four items, if I remember rightly.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) But, as proposed in the corrected copy, it has three.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, it is not proposed to make any change in lead, bars, blocks, and sheets; in lead, old, scrap, and pig, or in lead, manufactures of, n.e.s. Lead pipe and lead shot were reduced to 30 per cent. But the raw material which goes into the making of them was charged four-tenths of a cent a pound.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) What will be the duty now ?

Mr. FOSTER. The actual protection will be 25 per cent.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) And four-tenths of a cent per pound.

Mr. FOSTER. No. Suppose you import a pound of scrap lead to be made up into lead pipe or shot. On that scrap lead there is a duty of four-tenths of a cent. When made up into pipe or shot, there is a gross protection of four-tenths of a cent, and 25 per cent ad valorem. But your raw material has already cost you four-tenths of a cent duty, so the net protection is 25 per cent.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Then the tariff will contain four resolutions ?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Item agreed to.

Enamelled iron or steel ware, including granite or agate ware, 35 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. FOSTER. That is an increase of 5 per cent. The tariff on these goods was 30 per cent. This was an industry for the commencement of which preparations had been made. A very large establishment has been built in Toronto, and there is another establishment in Montreal and they have been, for the last year or two, experimenting on the enamelled ware. They have just finished their experiments, and are ready to go into the manufacture of the goods. In fact, they have already manufactured a considerable quantity, which they have in stock, but have not yet put upon the market. We have, therefore, decided to keep the same protection as in the old tariff.

Mr. LAURIER. And, notwithstanding that the facts were as the hon. gentleman has stated, he proposed to decrease their protection 5 per cent. And now he goes back on that.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes; simply because I do not think they could keep the industry in operation, notwithstanding all the capital they have invested, without it.

Mr. CASEY. And, therefore, every farmer's wife who puts up preserves has to help to pay for these experiments. These people tell us that they did not know how to make granite ware, and they wanted a year or two to experiment. Now they are allowed to charge 35 per cent more for their inferior products than the foreign product can be bought for. They are thus bonused to enable them to learn their trade, and, when they think they have learned it, they are allowed to go on taxing us to the extent of one-third the value of the article.

Mr. McMULLEN. What quantity of this ware was imported last year ?

Mr. FOSTER. The whole importation under this item last year was about $197,000. That included, also, stamped tinware, japanned ware, and galvanized iron ware, very little of which is imported, nearly all being manufactured in the country.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) As to this lead duty, do I understand that the duties remain the same as before, with the exception of this one change of lead pipe and lead shot, four-tenths of a cent per pound, and 25 per cent ad valorem ?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Item agreed to.

Chrome steel, 15 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. FOSTER. Chrome steel came in before under the general steel duty at a high rate. It is a steel not made in this country, and is used almost exclusively for the making of safes. We have reduced it to 15 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Copper wire, 15 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. CASEY. Why is this change made ?

Mr. FOSTER. The 15 per cent protection remains unchanged, as I think it should. We have made no change in the raw material; they had the copper rods and ingots scrap copper, and so on, free. Wire is drawn from copper rods, and there is no change made in copper rods, which are still admitted free.

Mr. CASEY. Why did you put it down to 10 per cent in the first place, and now raise it to 15 ?

Mr. FOSTER. We raised it to 15 to keep it right.

Item agreed to.

Wire cloth, n.e.s., 30 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). This is a change from what the hon. gentleman proposed.

Mr. FOSTER. It was not enumerated, and it was thought best to enumerate it so that it would be clear. This is wire cloth of steel wire.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). It is a new article, then?

Mr. FOSTER. It is defined here.

Item agreed to.

Cases for jewels, watches, silverware, plated ware, cutlery and other like articles, 5 cents each and 30 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. CASEY. Is there a factory for these things in Canada?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes; a large one in Toronto.

Mr. CASEY. What does the 5 cents apiece amount to?

Mr. FOSTER. On some of the little things it would be very high, and on others it would be a very small addition to the duty.

Mr. CASEY. Is the specific duty intended to exclude all the cheaper cases of this kind?

Mr. FOSTER. Specific duties will have the effect of excluding the cheapest cases coming from the continent, and especially from Germany. As these are used exclusively by jewelers, and as the jewelry establishments consider it convenient for them to have the manufacture in this country rather than abroad, they do not object.

Mr. CASEY. It is rather to please the jewelers than the makers of these boxes?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, that is chiefly the reason.

Item agreed to.

Wood pulp, 25 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. FOSTER. That was the old duty. It was placed on the free list, and I propose to put it back at the duty it was before, and to add a reciprocity clause with it. If we left it on the free list it would leave us in this position, that whilst our pulp cannot, commercially, go to the United States on account of the high duty, whilst they have the full benefit of our pulp wood resources to draw upon, they do not give us reciprocity in the finished article. We propose to keep the duty upon wood pulp, and add a reciprocity clause afterwards, so that when it is made free by the United States, we will make it free.

Mr. LAURIER. Then you propose to leave this on the standard offer of reciprocity?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. LAURIER. I may mention in this connection that I noticed some days ago Sir Henry Tyler stated that the Prime Minister had renewed the promise that if coal was put upon the free list by the Americans, it would be put upon the Canadian free list. Did the First Minister notice that statement?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I did observe the statement, and I have since ascertained that

Mr. FOSTER.

Sir Henry Tyler was misreported. There was no such promise.

Item agreed to.

Emery wheels, 25 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. FOSTER. Emery wheels were put upon the free list by mistake, owing to defective information. During our investigations, the information came to us that no emery wheels were made in this country, and so they were put upon the free list. But we found out since that there are two factories of emery wheels which are making an excellent article; and the people who use emery wheels much prefer to have them made here, where they can deal with responsible parties, than to go abroad for them. They are not always sure of their quality when purchased abroad. I may also add that emery wheels are peculiarly dangerous to the workmen if they split and fly off.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). It is worthy of note that everybody wants to buy emery wheels that are made in Canada, and in order to give them the privilege, they are precluded from buying any brought in from outside. The hon. gentleman has shown how much reality there is in the statement, by what he proposes to do with reference to it.

Mr. FOSTER. There is no doubt that the purchasers of emery wheels prefer to have them made here.

Item agreed to.

Axles, springs and parts thereof, axle bars and axle blanks of iron and steel, n.e.s., 1 per cent and 20 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. FOSTER. That is instead of the 35 per cent. The old duty was 1 cent per pound and 30 per cent. These are chiefly the smaller axle springs, and the like of that, for carriages.

Mr. CASEY. What is about the average price of these things?

Mr. FOSTER. Eight and one-half cents a pound was the average value of last year's importation. We import about 50,000 pounds.

Item agreed to.

Wrought iron or steel tubing, threaded and couples or not, not over two inches in diameter, 15 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. Minister of Finance is aware that in the Maritime Provinces there has recently been a new method of drying fish discovered which promises to cause a revolution in that important industry, and if it turns out as successfully as it promises to do it will work a remarkable change in that branch of commerce. A gentleman by the name of Mr. Whitman, of Annapolis, has patented an invention for the artificial drying of fish, which seems to meet with pretty general approval. I notice in the report of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries for last year that a lengthy description of Mr. Whitman's process is insented, and that invention involves the use of the very large quantity of wrought iron tubing. I will read a short extract from the description of Mr. Whitman's invention as contained in the Minister's report :

The wet salted fish are taken from the ketch, and washed, after which surface water and pickle is pressed out of the fish by steam press or otherwise. After having been in press for a few hours, the fish are ready to be spread on the wire "flakes" or trays that are placed in rows that are nine inches apart; the rows of flakes or trays being contained in compartments that are traversed by pipes in which steam or hot water is permitted to circulate. The maximum temperature which the steam, or hot water on the pipes can impart to the compartments is about 95 Fahrenheit.

The hon. gentleman knows that the old way of drying fish was to take advantage of the warm weather and sun to put the fish on flakes by hand, and when they have been exposed for a certain time to the sun to withdraw them, and when wet weather occurred the people have to wait for the sunshine, and sometimes a long period is occupied in drying the fish properly. Mr. Whitman has patented this invention, under which fish can be artificially dried in a very few hours. I had the pleasure of going through Mr. Whitman's establishment last summer, and certainly the fish dried under his process made a very remarkable showing. I heard from several parties who had visited establishments that the results of this drying process were excellent. If Mr. Whitman can successfully dry fish which hitherto have had to be dried by hand in the sun, and the drying of which was dependent on the state of the weather, it will work a revolution in that branch of industry; but he finds the duties upon wrought iron pipe used by him in his invention are so onerous he will not be able to use it in this country. He contends, moreover, that the manufacturers of wrought iron pipe in Montreal have taken advantage of the duty to raise the price on it to such an extent as to preclude him from manufacturing his invention in Canada. I will read the letter he sent me, which will explain the matter more lucidly than I can do. It is dated April 4th, and is as follows :—

I beg to call your attention to the extensive duty on wrought iron pipe equivalent to 2 cents per lineal foot of inch pipe. Before the protection tariff (under the present glorious ? National Policy), the Montreal Rolling Mills were manufacturing 1-inch wrought iron pipe and selling at 3½ cents per foot, and now under tariff nursing they have worked prices up to 5½ cents. As a great favour, I got 30,000 feet of this pipe from the Montreal Rolling Mills last year for my fish-drying establishment at Halifax at 5½ cents per foot. The 1-inch wrought iron pipe referred to in the clipping from the 'Morning Chronicle' inclosed, cost me f. o. b. steamer at Boston 5½ cents per foot, and will pay a duty at St. Johns, Nfld., of 25 per cent, costing 4 cents per foot at St. Johns against 5½ cents per foot at Halifax, or about 30 per cent in favour of St. Johns. I can put up my fish dryers on the coast of Maine at 50 per cent, or 55 per cent less cost than in any part of the Dominion; and my operations will in consequence be largely confined to Newfoundland, the coast of Maine on the Atlantic, and Alaska, U. S., on the Pacific coast, being actually driven from my native country to operate abroad an industry that would largely develop one of the most important natural resources of our country.

The clipping from the Halifax 'Chronicle' annexed to the letter reads as follows :—

The steamer 'Portia' takes the apparatus (pipes and fittings, water heater and exhaust fan, &c.) for a fish dryer of Whitman's patent process, the first of a number of these dryers to be erected and operated at St. Johns and the outports of Newfoundland. Owing to the difference in duty on the wrought iron pipe fittings, water heater, exhauster and wire netting, these fish dryers can be put up in Newfoundland at 30 per cent less cost than in the Dominion. The duty on wrought iron pipe, the largest item in these fish-drying machines, is almost prohibitory and gives the Montreal manufacturer a big pull on the Maritime Provinces.

When I received that letter I wrote Mr. Whitman in reply, and I subsequently received from him the following communication :—

I notice you will endeavour to get a reduction made in the duty on wrought iron pipe when the House goes into committee on tariff resolution. I inclose a bill of wrought iron pipe purchased in Boston last month, 24th March, at 3½ cents per pound, f.o.b., shipped at Boston, from the well-known and expensive manufacturers of wrought iron pipe, the Walworth Manufacturing Company. This is the same size, 1 inch, and as good, or actually better pipe, quality, as the Montreal Rolling Mills demand and get 5½ cents per foot for in large lots. What prevents the Montreal Rolling Mills from manufacturing profitably wrought iron pipe at prices for which it can be manufactured in the New England States? Is labour higher, money dearer, or does the iron from which this pipe is manufactured cost more in Montreal than in the manufacturing towns of New England? These are pertinent queries, and I should like to know what answer Minister Foster or this industry has to make. Why should an industry, such for example as my fish-drying place, for which I ask no Government protection, be taxed 40 per cent or 60 per cent to pay into the pockets of the Montreal Rolling Mills or any other concern. I also inclose the E. F. Sturvenant Company's bill of $86.26 for exhaust fans. On this I pay at St. Johns, Nfld., a duty of 10 per cent, which on three fans I imported from Boston for my Halifax and Annapolis fish dryers I had to pay a duty of 30 per cent. These fans are not manufactured in the Dominion to my knowledge.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. All that was under the old tariff.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) A precious small change has been made by the present tariff.

Now, the bill which he annexed from the Walworth Manufacturing Company read: "4,035 feet of pipe, 1-inch, at 3 2-10th cents per pound; $129.14." The gentleman whose correspondence I am reading calculated that the duty on the wrought iron pipe was equivalent to 2 cents per lineal foot on 1-inch pipe. If the statements which he has made are correct, and I think they will hardly be questioned, I would submit to the Finance Minister that he should make in this tariff a provision similar to the provision he has made where welded iron or steel tubing is imported exclusively for artesian wells and petroleum pipe lines. In such cases he allows them to come in, under regulations to be made by the Governor in Council, at a small rate of duty. It does seem to me that in an industry such as Mr. Whitman is trying to establish, taking into account the enormous quantity of 1-inch pipe he is obliged to use, that the hon. Finance Minister should make provision that the duty should not be charged as it is now charged in the tariff proposition he submits to the House; in other words, that when Mr. Whitman uses the iron pipe in this drying process of his, it ought to come in under special regulations and at a largely reduced rate. It does seem outrageous that this gentleman should be compelled to pay 5½ cents when he says it can be imported for 3½ cents. I submit these facts to the hon. Finance Minister. The hon. gentleman himself states that there is no justice in allowing one manufacturing establishment to be mulcted in order to benefit another; and the Montreal Rolling Mills should not be allowed to take advantage of the tariff in order to compel this gentleman to pay such an enormously high price compared with what he otherwise could import his material for. He says: "Before the protective tariff they sold wrought iron pipe at 3 2-10th cents per foot pound, but now they are charging 5½ cents."

Mr. McINERNEY. What is the total of the invoice of Mr. Whitman for the 4,035 feet of pipe?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) $129.14 was the total of the Walworth invoice, but that is a small matter, and the total quantity which this gentleman consumes is very large. One lot which he brought from the Montreal Rolling Mills of 30,000 feet he got as a special favour at 5½ cents per foot; and as he says himself: with the high price which these Canadian manufacturers are enabled to charge him he is actually prohibited from constructing this improved method of drying fish in this country at all, and he is driven to manufacture them in the Island of Newfoundland, in the neighbouring state of Maine, and in Alaska. I do not think that any one would justify a continuance of that state of affairs, and I think Mr. Whitman has made out a very good case for the attention of the hon. Finance Minister.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.)

Mr. McINERNEY. According to the Walworth invoice there would be a pound of pipe to the foot.

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis). I may say that I have before called the attention of the Finance Minister to this matter. Mr. Whitman is a native of my town, and although he is neither a personal nor political friend of mine, yet I recognize and have recognized the importance of his industry, he has consulted me with reference to it, and has also written me with reference to this very matter which the hon. member from Prince Edward Island (Mr. Davies) has laid before the House this afternoon. If the Minister of Finance could see his way clear to make some concession in the manner that has been suggested by the hon. member from Prince Edward Island (Mr. Davies), it would be encouraging a live industry in the Maritime Provinces. But I do not think that allowing the duty to remain as it is—I believe in giving the correct facts in reference to these matters—will drive that industry away from the Maritime Provinces or from any portion of them, because it is a well-established industry. It is going to do a good work and it is doing a good work. Mr. Whitman has erected a manufactory at Annapolis, and one at Halifax, and another in Newfoundland, and his industry no doubt will make a great revolution in the process of fish drying. I cannot see why he should be compelled to pay any more extravagant price for his tubing than what would be justifiable. I agree entirely in the main with what the hon. member from Prince Edward Island (Mr. Davies) has stated.

Committee rose, and it being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

House again in Committee on Ways and Means.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I hope the hon. Finance Minister does not propose to pass this item without giving some answer to the statements I have made. I do not suppose he wants to favour one manufacturer at the expense of another, or to sacrifice the interests of all those who use steam tubing for the benefit of a few manufacturers in Montreal. I trust at all events that he will give to those on whose behalf I have spoken, and to the arguments I have presented, the courtesy of an answer.

Mr. FOSTER. I am not objecting to giving an answer; but the hon. member for North Brant (Mr. Paterson) was on his feet.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I do not wish to divert attention from the subject brought up by the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies). I rise to speak with reference to the way in which this duty on tubing affects other manufacturers. I have a letter from a manufacturer to whom this tubing is a raw material, in which he states that the specific duty of six-tenths of a cent per pound and the ad valorem duty of 30 per cent in the old tariff together are equivalent to an ad valorem duty of 60 per cent, while the finished article is admitted into the country at a duty of 30 per cent. So that he is not only left without protection, but he is legislated against to the extent of 30 per cent. As an instance, he states that he is tendering on a small job in Windsor, and that he could save $40 by having the work done in Detroit instead of Windsor, and bringing into this country the manufactured article and paying the duty on it.

Mr. FOSTER. What is he making?

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Coils for heating purposes. I cannot exactly tell what the duty on that article is under the proposed tariff.

Mr. FOSTER. I suppose it would come in as a manufacture not specially enumerated or provided for, composed wholly or in part of iron or steel, at 27½ per cent?

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). According to this man's statement, the duty on his raw material is 60 per cent, while this tariff gives him only 27½ per cent on the finished article. As I understand, we are discussing this tariff on the principle that the Minister has laid down and the House adopted, that it is designed to help the manufacturer. Criticising it from that standpoint, while not committing myself to the principle, it seems to me that it should not discriminate against one manufacturer and in favour of another. This information having been given to me, I simply mention it, having promised to do so.

Mr. FOSTER. Have you an idea of the cost of that man's finished product, and the cost of the raw material that goes into it in the shape of these pipes?

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). In this letter he says:

The tariff has been framed for the benefit of two small concerns in Montreal that make a little pipe two inches in diameter and under. I do not think these establishments make 10 per cent of the small pipe used in Canada. Again, while the Government are trying to foster a pipe-making industry in Montreal, they are driving out of the country the coil-making industry. These coils are brought into Canada cheaper than they can be made here by the difference of 30 per cent ad valorem on pipe. I understand that there are some changes to be made in the tariff soon, and if you can so present this matter to the Government as to see that the American manufacturers of coil pipes will have no advantage over the Canadian manufacturers, you will do good service to the coil makers.

This letter was written to me before the tariff changes were made at all, pointing out the difficulties, and expressing the hope that they would be remedied. The writer says further:

For instance, I am now tendering for a heater and fan for a factory in Windsor, and have to pay $40 more duty for the pipe that is in it by having it shipped to Windsor as pipe than I should have to pay if I made the heater in Detroit and shipped to Windsor.

From this the Minister can have some idea of what the cost of the article would be.

Mr. FOSTER. Will the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) kindly give me the date of the letter and the transaction mentioned in the letter?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The first letter I got was dated April 14th.

Mr. FOSTER. What is the date of the transaction of which you quoted the invoice?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I would like to inquire of the Finance Minister whether, under this heading, will come in such pipes as are commonly used for distributing gas?

Mr. FOSTER. They must come in under the item we are now considering.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Gas pipes would not be wrought iron, but cast iron.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am rather inclined to think that the small pipes, which ramify throughout houses, would come under this item.

Mr. FOSTER. I think so too.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I would also like to know what the supposed value of these pipes is per pound?

Mr. FOSTER. About 2½ to 2¾ cents a pound.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. So that, practically speaking, the duty you propose amounts to 55 per cent—one-half cent per pound on a value of 2½ cents a pound, and 30 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. FOSTER. The average price was pretty nearly 3 cents per pound.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. If you have a duty of one-half cent specific and 30 per cent ad valorem, it would range about 50 per cent, which is an enormous duty to put on articles such as gas pipes in particular, not to speak of the other articles to which my hon. friend has alluded. What is the number of hands employed in these factories which the hon. gentleman particularly wants to protect? Can the Controller of Inland Revenue tell?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). Some hundreds.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That is very vague.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). Montreal, Toronto and Hamilton—I am quite within the mark when I say some hundreds.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the amount of revenue derived from this?

Mr. FOSTER. There was an importation of nearly 6,000,000 pounds.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Yielding about how much revenue?

Mr. FOSTER. About $80,000 under the old tariff.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The date of the invoice is 24th March, 1894, and 3 2-10ths cents per foot was the price.

Mr. FOSTER. What was the date of the alleged price in Montreal?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Five and three-quarter cents all along. But, he says, that last year, as a special favour, he got, on a purchase of 30,000 feet of pipe which he purchased for his Halifax factory, a special allowance of 5½ cents per foot.

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis). I understand that piping is sold now for 4¼ cents. I have got that information since six o'clock.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) This gentleman seems to be thoroughly well up in the matter, and he pledges himself that the Montreal Rolling Mills demand, and now get, 5¾ cents per foot, in large lots, and they gave him, as a special favour, on a purchase of 30,000 feet of this piping last year, 5½ cents per foot.

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis). I have learned since six o'clock, on good authority, that it is selling for 4¼ cents.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I give the hon. gentleman my authority, and I do not see what possible motive my informant could have for misrepresenting.

Mr. FOSTER. There is some misapprehension somewhere. I find that the price quoted in Boston in March, 1894, was 3 3-10ths cents, and I do not see how it could be possible to quote 5¾ cents, when you take even the old duty and add it to the price in Boston. Take 3 2-10ths cents and add to that six-tenths of a cent, or at present five-tenths of a cent of duty, and the ad valorem as well, it certainly would not bring it to 5¾ cents.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Including the freight, it would bring it beyond that.

Mr. FOSTER. The freight has to be paid in every case. It would bring it to 4¾ cents.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The duty is equivalent to 2 cents per lineal foot.

Mr. FOSTER. What we propose is five-tenths of a cent and 30 per cent. That would make the duty $1.50. Add 3 2-10ths to that, and you have 4¾ cents.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) You added six-tenths before.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, you would have to add one-tenth to that.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) This latter is calculated on the old tariff. The date of the letter is 14th April, and the invoice is dated in March.

Mr. FOSTER. What they sell that kind of pipe for now in Montreal is 4 1-5th cents per foot. There is a discrepancy somewhere, due to the fact of his having an incorrect idea of what the pipe cost there.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Does not the hon. gentleman think it would be fair that, as between two manufacturing establishments, if you must charge a duty on pipe at about the rate you suggest, you should make an allowance for pipe imported for the purpose of entering into the production of this fish-drying establishment? The development of our fisheries is just as important, and I venture to say much more important, than the development of this iron industry in Montreal, as it affects everybody in the Maritime Provinces and elsewhere, too. And, if the hopes of the inventor of this new fish drying process are at all realized, the benefits to be conferred upon the country by its means are enormous, and it does seem to me the hon. gentleman might fairly consider that. Let the question stand over if the hon. gentleman is not satisfied about the prices and the facts; let it stand so that he may see if he cannot allow pipe imported and used for this special purpose to come in at special rates.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not see that Mr. Whittman should claim that the pipe which he uses in his fish-drying establishment should be imported at special rates any more than the man who is engaged in making coils or radiators should ask it.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Do you not do it for others?

Mr. FOSTER. Not in many instances.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I read here that lap-welded iron and steel tubing not more than one and a quarter to two inches inclusive in diameter for use exclusively in artesian wells, petroleum pipe lines and petroleum refineries is to be admitted at a special rate.

Mr. FOSTER. That is a pipe not made here.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) But I am pointing out a case in which the hon. gentleman has made special regulation with respect to importations of pipe for special industries. Why not make a similar regulation for this industry? I am sure not a man who comes from the Maritime Provinces but will endorse what I say. The hon. gentleman himself knows that this is an industry which deserves at his hands every encouragement.

If this new method of drying fish is successful, as Mr. Whitman claims, and if it can be generally used it would be of incalculable benefit to the whole people.

Mr. FOSTER. And of large benefit to Mr. Whitman.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) On what possible ground or reason can these Montreal people—who seem to be preferred to all the rest of the community—ask to be given an advantage at the expense of an incubus put upon Mr. Whitman, and refuse to allow him some equivalent for the advantage given to them? Why should he be compelled to buy from them at a higher price than he can purchase elsewhere, when he is engaged in the manufacturing business just as they are, or be driven to Alaska, or Maine, or Newfoundland.

Mr. FOSTER. He imported a very large quantity of pipe and went into this operation when the duty was higher than it is now.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon. The 30,000 feet which he purchased were got from the Montreal men and he got it at a special rate of 5½. He can't go on doing that forever.

Mr. FOSTER. He can get it now for less—4 2-10ths.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) You say he can; he says he cannot. But he can get it in Boston, according to this invoice, at 3 2-10ths.

Mr. CURRAN. What is the date of that invoice?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) It is dated 24th March.

Mr. CURRAN. Of course prices have gone down since then.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) But this is less than two months ago; there can't be much change since then.

Mr. CURRAN. Everything is at slaughter prices in the United States just now.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) He gives the prices he gave a year ago. Here is a point the hon. gentleman cannot get over. Mr. Whitman, in his letter, says that before this Montreal industry was protected to the extent it is, they were glad to sell him a pipe and did sell it at 3½ cents; but they have forced it up to 5½.

Mr. FOSTER. Their prices have been going down.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) So you say; but here is the fact given by Mr. Whitman. They have forced up the price; and if it is true, as he says, that the result must be to drive him out of the country, it is a very serious business.

Mr. McINERNEY. Does this gentleman sell these fish dryers to the fishermen, or does he put them up and work them as a monopoly?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) He put one up at Halifax as an experiment and he has one at Annapolis. I went through the one at Annapolis. I am not an expert in the fish business, but I have some general knowledge of it from having lived in a fishing country. It seemed to me that everything in that establishment was working most admirably, and the large quantity of fish which he had dried seemed to be as good as the sun-dried article. I was in hopes that the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Fauvel) would have been present when this matter came up for discussion. He is thoroughly acquainted with the business and knows the practical working of this new process, and I had hoped to have the benefit of his endorsement. I can tell my hon. friend from Kent, N.B. (Mr. McInerney) that Mr. Whitman put up one fish-drying plant in Halifax very largely as an experiment, to show the Halifax fish dealers what he could do, and I understand that he has erected some in Newfoundland and Maine, and in Alaska.

Mr. McINERNEY. I have been credibly informed that he does not sell these machines, but puts them up and works them himself and that he has a monopoly of this method of fish drying. It is no great measure of protection to the fishermen for this gentleman to get his material free while the fishermen are taxed in other respects. This gentleman is protected by this country through his patent right, and, if this machine of his is as great benefit as he thinks he will reap sufficient profit from it outside of any benefit he might have by having these articles come in free. The fishermen, as a rule, do not use this dry-fishing machine. They dry the fish in the old way, and I believe that is the best way. I have heard it stated that this experiment is not a success, that this artificial mode of drying fish by means of heat run through pipes by the medium of steam or hot water, is not a good method, and that fish dried in that way do not keep. If the machine is a monopoly this gentleman should not be considered specially at all.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Hear, hear.

Mr. McINERNEY. I am glad the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) agrees with me in that.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I observe that the hon. gentleman desires to obtain the monopoly for the manufacturers of Montreal. On what other possible ground can he justify the Government's action in this case? He says he hears this process is not a success. I can only say that I was through the establishment myself and saw a great many thousand quintals turned out which seemed to me to be most excellent product. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries has embodied in his report for last year a very elaborate description of the process, to that extent giving his official endorsement.

Mr. FOSTER. Why was not complaint made about the duty on the raw material then? Mr. Whitman then said that the only difficulty was the scarcity of fish.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) What was the use of his complaining then? Now he has got an opportunity of making his complaint effective and he puts it before the hon. gentleman. If the hon. gentleman does not choose to yield, I cannot compel him to do so, but those who have listened to this debate before dinner and since must have come to the conclusion that, even accepting the principle upon which the tariff is based, as stated by the hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson), this application should be favourably considered.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). One thing is pretty clear—this business does not come within the class referred to by the hon. Finance Minister when he speaks of his policy as one of development, for if it did, he would be disposed to give it favourable consideration. As it is, he is not disposed to treat it with any consideration whatever, and I was amused at the observation made by the hon. gentleman from Kent, N.B., when he said that this was a business that would not help the fisherman, and why? Because the benefits were confined to the inventor. I wonder what industry the hon. gentleman has supported and favoured and fostered during the whole of this session that is not of the same character. There are thousands of people in this country buying cotton every year. In what way does the protection of the cotton industry help these individuals in their business any more than this invention helps the fisherman? Will the hon. gentleman tell us what advantage the great body of consumers receive from these industries that have been fostered and favoured during the present session? It seems pretty clear from what the member for Queen's, P.E.I., has said that this process of drying fish secures the curing of the fish in proper time, no matter what may be the condition of the weather, and therefore the fish are not likely to be spoiled, a condition of things that often happens, in the case of those who are dependent solely upon wind and sun for the purpose of properly curing their fish. The hon. member forgets that if this is a superior method—and if it is not superior to the ordinary way of drying fish, it would derive no advantage—if this is a superior method and you drive it from the country, the Canadian fish will be less favourably received in the markets of the world; and will command a price less than that which is cured by the best modern methods. Consequently the hon. gentleman is striking a blow at the whole fishing industry of the Maritime Provinces by the course he is adopting in this matter. The hon. gentleman professes to favour the fishermen. He favours the continuance of a bounty to fishermen, but when it is proposed to enable them to cure their fish properly, with absolute certainty against loss and destruction, and to put it upon the markets of the world in a first-class condition, that opportunity is to be denied them, and the industry of drying fish is to be driven to a neighbouring province, and to a neighbouring state. It is pretty clear that the hon. gentleman is a ward of an institution stronger than the fishermen of the Maritime Provinces.

Mr. McINERNEY. The hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I., (Mr. Davies) will not drive me into a corner by trying to make out that I am in favour of a Montreal manufactory as against the fishermen of the Maritime Provinces. It is of little or no consequence to me where this tubing is made, and it should be of little or no consequence to any fair-minded man in this House, or the country. I think it is about time the sectional cry was abandoned in Canada, when a man from the Maritime Provinces stands up and denounces any particular duty because it injures or affects a particular industry in one section or another of this country. So far as the hon. gentleman from Bothwell (Mr. Mills) is concerned, I am pleased that for once I have been a source of amusement for him, because on several occasions he has been a source of great amusement to me. Now, I fail to understand the position these gentlemen take on this question. They would seek to put themselves before the country as friends of the fishermen, after having for some time put themselves before the country as the friends of the farmer. They are friends of the fishermen to this extent, that because a gentleman—whether a Canadian or not, I do not know—has had a machine patented in this country for drying fish, they seek to give him a particular line of protection, and argue that this is not a monopoly, although none of the fishermen of the coast use the particular machine that they wish to protect. I call that an unfair protection, a protection quite different from the protection that I advocate and support, because it is a protection to one individual for a machine that he has patented in this country, but that is not in general use by the fishermen of the country; on the contrary, they are prevented from using it by this man under his patent right, and he will only set it up on a particular line of coast where he can get a monopoly of drying all the fish that are brought ashore there. I say that is an improper protection, but it is a protection that hon. gentlemen opposite seek to advance and support.

Mr. BOWERS. The hon. member for Kent (Mr. McInerney) says that this Whitman process of drying fish is not a success. I say it is a perfect success. To my own personal knowledge loads of fish have been taken from our place to the Whitman factory in Annapolis to be dried, and fish have come by the thousands of quintals from New York to be dried, and are sent to Brazil and the West Indies, where they bring a larger price than fish dried in the sun. All the water is extracted from them in the short space of twenty-four hours, and that is a great point, because we have a great deal of wet weather on our coast when fish cannot be dried by the sun, and immense numbers are spoiled. On the other hand, when the weather is very hot, they burn. Now, I cannot see why this factory should not have a little fair play as well as some of the other manufacturers in the Dominion. There is another thing. If the Minister will lower the duty to about half what it is now, the revenue will be greatly increased; whereas the present duty will keep out most of the piping coming in from the American market.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). This tubing is a raw material for a great many different lines of manufacture in the country, and consequently affects a great deal more than the article hon. gentlemen are speaking of. I think the Minister of Interior stated that it was made in Hamilton and some other places. I am not aware that it is made any where but in Montreal, although I may be wrong. However, no one takes objection because the factories are in Montreal, but the question is this: If you have 60 per cent duty upon this article—which I am told it amounts to—in order to keep that industry alive, and if it be a fact, as is reported, that they do not make over 10 per cent of the pipe that is used, you will see that they will then take advantage of the full duty. This is not a case of over-production, where competition will bring down the prices, because they are not making enough to supply the market. Now, I speak subject to correction, but I think there can be no doubt that several times the number of men are engaged in industries of which this tubing is a raw material. Now, if this amounts to a 60 per cent duty, is it wisdom to maintain such a rate of duty upon that which is a raw material for industries employing vastly more hands than are engaged in this manufacture, especially in view of the further fact that it is represented that they do not make over one-tenth of what is wanted in the country, showing that the duty will be taken advantage of? I would like to ask the Minister if he knows what the ad valorem duty is equal to by his tariff of 5-10ths of a cent per pound and 30 per cent ad valorem, on pipe under two inches in size. Is it a fact that the duty amounts to something like 60 per cent?

Mr. WALLACE. I think hon. gentlemen opposite are hardly discussing this matter fairly, because they generally go on the assumption that the price in Canada is 5½ cents per pound, while the Finance Minister has quoted it at 4·2 cents, and the hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies) has quoted New York pipe at 3·2. If you add to that 30 per cent duty the ½ cent per pound, and that 3·2, you get exactly 15½ per cent; and 30 and 15½ make exactly 45½ per cent, and not 60 per cent, as was stated by the hon. member for Brant.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Has the hon. gentleman got the English prices as well, because I am informed they are a great deal less?

Mr. WALLACE. No; I am proceeding on the statement made by the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) as to the lowest price at which inch-tubing can be purchased. Any larger size than inch would bear a duty of less than 45 per cent, and so in proportion according to size. The usual size sold is less than 1 inch, and on that the duty will be 45 per cent. Then there is the fact that the price to-day being 4½ cents, any one engaged in the manufacture is not called upon to pay more than 1 cent in excess of the price in the United States, and I assume that the price is as low in the United States as it is in Great Britain, because we know that to-day in many branches of the iron trade American prices are lower than those in Great Britain, Germany or Belgium. For 1-inch pipe the price is 1½ cents per foot, and the manufactured article made from it is two or three times that price. So that the fear entertained by the hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson) that the manufactured article would not be produced here but in another country is unlikely to happen, because our manufacturers will be able to import the raw material and afterwards turn out the manufactured article complete, employing Canadian workmen.

Item agreed to.

Other wrought iron pipes or tubes $\frac{1}{8}$ cents per pound and 30 per cent.

Mr. McMULLEN. Does the hon. Minister of Finance consider that this duty will be equal to 45 per cent?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That, of course, will depend on the size of the pipe. Pipe of a small diameter will be very much less than 45 per cent. In the case of the small pipe, and which the hon. gentleman says is included, the duty is much more likely to be 60 per cent than 45 per cent. The estimate of 45 per cent may be perfectly correct as regards the larger pipe, and I believe the figures given by the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Paterson) will be found to be perfectly correct.

Mr. WALLACE. All the pipe used for radiators is much larger than 1 inch.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. But there are a great many other purposes for which piping is used, and the worst of the whole system is that on the small piping of comparatively little value the ad valorem duty runs the price up to a very high figure. Forty-five per cent is an exorbitant duty, but when it reaches 50 per cent or 60 per cent it becomes simply outrageous.

Mr. McMULLEN. Does the hon. gentleman expect to obtain a larger revenue from this article during the coming year?

Mr. FOSTER. No.

Item agreed to.

Wrought iron or steel nuts and washers, iron or steel rivets, bolts with or without threads, nuts and bolts and hinge blanks, "T" and strap hinges; 1 cent per pound and 20 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. McMULLEN. This is a very high duty on strap hinges, and there are a great many of them used in the country.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What does it amount to translated into ad valorem?

Mr. FOSTER. The average price was 5 cents per pound on last year's importation.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). That would be 45 per cent.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That would not represent by any manner of means the extreme duty levied upon it. That is an article in which there is a very great variety in the prices.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). At a very low price it would be 70 per cent on strap hinges.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not think it would go that far.

Mr. WALLACE. This would represent the very lowest price. There was another item in the old tariff at 12¼ cents. The average price on this is 5 cents, so this is the lowest price per pound.

Mr. McMULLEN. Are these hinges manufactured in this country?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes; at Brockville and several other places.

Mr. TAYLOR. The largest factory in Canada is run by Messrs. Cowan & Britton, of Gananoque. They manufacture exclusively "T" and strap hinges.

Item agreed to.

Cotton batts, batting and sheet wadding, dyed or not, 22½ per cent ad valorem.

Mr. EDGAR. Perhaps the Minister of Finance will tell us whether he is going to make any important changes in the cotton tariff, now that he has come to this section?

Mr. FOSTER. We will see as we go along.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That is not a proper way to treat the House.

Mr. EDGAR. The statement should be made now. We will not go along so fast if he thinks that is the best way to treat the Opposition.

Mr. FOSTER. Then we will go slower.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

Mr. EDGAR. What change does the Minister propose to make in this item?

Mr. FOSTER. I do not propose to make any change.

Mr. EDGAR. Will the hon. gentleman be good enough to tell the House a little more about that item? For instance, I see that in the former tariff those that were not bleached, dyed or coloured had a duty of 2 cents per pound and 15 per cent ad valorem. Will the hon. gentleman give us an idea of how much that duty amounted to ad valorem?

Mr. WALLACE. Twenty-five and a half per cent.

Mr. EDGAR. Then I see that the rest of that item is made up of bleached, dyed or coloured, 3 cents per pound and 15 per cent. It was a different duty, and that is all included in one now. What would the previous duty amount to?

Mr. WALLACE. Twenty-four and one-half per cent, including, of course, the warps, which were in the same item.

Mr. FOSTER. That is a reduction on the whole.

Item agreed to.

Cotton warps and cotton yarns, dyed or undyed, n.e.s., 25 per cent.

Mr. FOSTER. That also is a reduction.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think the hon. gentleman, when introducing an item involving a number of changes, ought in all conscience to give the House a statement of why he proposes to make these changes, and what the effect of them is.

Mr. EDGAR. Perhaps I will have to cross-examine the hon. gentleman and help him out a little.

Mr. FOSTER. That will be the easiest way.

Mr. EDGAR. I see that this includes "under No. 40, not bleached, dyed or coloured, 2 cents per pound, and 15 per cent, and "bleached, dyed or coloured, 3 cents per pound, and 15 per cent." What did these amount to, ad valorem?

Mr. FOSTER. Twenty-five and one-half per cent in the case of the first, and 24½ per cent in the case of the other.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What was the value of the importations under No. 40?

Mr. FOSTER. Nineteen thousand pounds, a very small importation.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What was that valued at per pound?

Mr. FOSTER. Twenty-four and one-quarter cents. On the bleached, dyed or coloured, the ad valorem equivalent on what was imported was 30 per cent, 51,000 pounds being imported. Of No. 60, and finer, almost nothing was imported. The duty was 15 per cent.

Mr. EDGAR. It is 25 per cent now. How much was imported on beams?

Mr. FOSTER. Only 163 yards. It was an old-fashioned way.

Mr. EDGAR. I suppose that was practically prohibitive.

Mr. WALLACE. It was not prohibitive at all, because the duty amounted to only 17 per cent.

Mr. EDGAR. On the whole, there is a considerable increase in the duty.

Mr. FOSTER. Taking the importations, you may say there is, but the importations were so small that it is difficult to form any opinion from them.

Mr. EDGAR. The duties were high enough before to keep the goods out.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What were the total importations?

Mr. FOSTER. About 114,000 pounds, valued at $26,000.

Item agreed to.

Gray, unbleached cotton fabrics 22½ per cent.

Mr. McMULLEN. How much of these were imported last year?

Mr. FOSTER. In the old tariff, bleached and unbleached went together, and of the two, 1,500,000 yards were imported, and the average rate of duty was 25 per cent.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. At what do you put the value of the unbleached gray cotton?

Mr. WALLACE. The two are not separated. The average value of the importations was 10¼ cents per pound, showing that only the more expensive kinds came in.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. If I am not mistaken, so far from requiring protection on these goods, I understood that the trade was supplying these goods to the Chinese; and a great deal of very proper exultation was displayed by some members of the House over the fact that our cotton manufacturers were able to compete in the Chinese market with the products of the English and the United States mills. If that be the case, what do you want with this protection at all? If they are able to undersell English and American goods in the Chinese markets, our own people ought to get the benefit.

Mr. FOSTER. It is a fact that the mills have sent certain grades to the Chinese markets. That has been done successfully by running entirely upon that line of goods, by the mill at Quebec, the Montmorency mill.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Then, what do you want protection on this article for?

Mr. FOSTER. But in manufacturing for a country like this it is impossible to run a mill on one article.

Mr. McMULLEN. This is an important item, affecting a large class of people, and there ought to be a larger reduction. When our mills are able to send goods to China to compete against English and American goods, I do not think it is necessary to subject our people to this duty in order to give the cotton manufacturers protection. They have their raw material free, wages are just as low in Canada as in the United States, rents as low, and living as cheap, and I do not see why they cannot produce as cheaply as the manufacturers on the other side. I would like to know why it is necessary to keep up this protection.

Mr. WALLACE. It is only a short time ago that hon. gentlemen opposite were complaining that on goods of this character the poor men were paying 40 or 50 per cent, and when we reduced the duty to 22½ per cent, they are not yet satisfied.

Mr. EDGAR. I think the hon. gentleman will find it rather difficult to find where it was claimed that on this item the duty was 40 or 50 per cent. There are some items of the tariff on which the duty was 60 per cent, or higher, but this was not one of the items the hon. gentleman was talking about.

Mr. WALLACE. That is one of the items.

Mr. EDGAR. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will say when that claim was made and by whom?

Mr. WALLACE. The hon. gentleman is not the only one who made the statements on this subject.

Mr. EDGAR. With his usual politeness and delicacy of expression, the hon. gentleman can scarcely avoid insinuating that whoever is addressing the House in a matter in which he is concerned, is mistaken. The other day he was good enough to say that I was deliberately misleading the House in the discussion of this very item of cottons. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman's attention to this point. On a certain occasion, I mentioned the fact that there were three kinds of sewing cotton imported into this country. That one kind came in—

Mr. FOSTER. That is old history.

Mr. EDGAR. Not what I am going to say, but it may be unpleasant possibly for the Controller. One kind came in at the unchanged duty; another kind came in at a slightly increased duty, and another, which had been imported at 20 per cent, was now raised to 25 per cent, and the Controller positively denied that that was the case.

He denied that sewing cotton thread had ever been imported as low as 20 per cent, and he was good enough to refer to page 43 of the Public Accounts in support of his statement. He was right as regards page 43, but he was not ingenuous enough to suggest to the House to turn over to page 44, where I find that there are two items of importation of sewing cotton thread on which the duty was only 20 per cent. Cotton manufactures, sewing cotton thread, n.e.s., were imported to the extent of \$9,308, and the duty paid was \$1,861, which is exactly 20 per cent. So that if there was no authority for the subordinate customs-house officers of the hon. gentleman taking 20 per cent on sewing cotton thread, he should have looked to it before. Then, the next item is "all other cotton threads, n.e.s., \$6,602, duty paid, \$1,320," which is also exactly 20 per cent. This shows that the hon. gentleman allows his subordinates to introduce cotton threads at 20 per cent, although he denied it the other day and charged me with deliberately deceiving the House. The hon. gentleman, by his changes in the tariff to-day, is proposing to raise the duty on that thread $32\frac{1}{2}$ per cent, because under the tariff now, as he will see a little further down, he puts other manufactured cottons, n.e.s., at $32\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. I hope when we come to that, he will take it out of that item and put it back to 20 per cent.

Mr. FOSTER. I think the hon. gentleman ought to allow me to cross-examine him for a moment, because I think the impression he tried to make is that, putting gray cottons here at $22\frac{1}{2}$ per cent is going a very small way in the matter of reduction. What does the hon. gentleman consider a fair range of prices for gray cottons? Would he consider 4 to 6 cents a yard the proper thing?

Mr. McMULLEN. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. Suppose you take gray cotton at 4 cents. The old duty on that was 1 cent a yard and 15 per cent ad valorem. On cotton at 4 cents a yard the duty would be 40 per cent ad valorem, that is six-tenths of a cent, and 1 cent per yard, making 16-10ths cents, and if you divide that by the four, you get the equivalent ad valorem, which is 40 per cent. Now it is $22\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. If you take the 3-cent cotton, its equivalent ad valorem was 48 per cent, and now it is $22\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. Take the 6-cent cotton, and the equivalent ad valorem would be about 30 per cent, whereas now the duty is $22\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. Take the whole range, and comparing the old duty with the present, you will see that $22\frac{1}{2}$ per cent is a very large reduction.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Will the hon. gentleman inform the House of the quantity of cotton imported at that range? It is not contained in the Trade and Navigation Returns.

Mr. EDGAR.

Mr. FOSTER. Under an ad valorem ranging from 65 to 30 per cent very little was imported. When you put it down to $22\frac{1}{2}$, it is a very great reduction.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Even so, in the case of those coarser articles, the duty may still, at $22\frac{1}{2}$ per cent, be very nearly practically prohibitive, and I expect it is. If it is possible at all, by any honest means, for these manufacturers to export a large quantity of these gray unbleached cottons to China and compete with the American and English mills and undersell them, as they must do—if that is done in any honest fashion, there is no doubt it matters very little, in the case of cotton, whether you put the duty at 40 per cent or 50 or 30 per cent or $22\frac{1}{2}$, it is equally prohibitive all through. The point I call the Minister's attention to is this, and he has not answered it, that if it is possible for our people to manufacture these gray unbleached cottons and sell them in other countries, in competition with American and English mills, there is no occasion to protect them at all, and our people ought to be allowed to buy these cottons at reasonable prices—such prices as the manufacturers can make them at, because if they can undersell English and American manufacturers in China, they can undersell them here, and there is no need to protect them at all.

Mr. EDGAR. Might I ask the Minister of Finance to give me the items of importation of last year of these goods, on which he calculates the former duty at 40 per cent, which is now reduced to $22\frac{1}{2}$ per cent?

Mr. FOSTER. The bleached and unbleached are altogether in the return. They are not separate. You cannot get them in the Trade and Navigation Returns.

Mr. EDGAR. As far as I could get them and make out the duty, I thought it was about 24 per cent.

Mr. FOSTER. Without coming down to any guess-work or supposition at all, but to the real range of prices, supposing the invoice prices of gray cottons runs from 4 to 6 or 8 cents, you just calculate the two rates of duty, and you see the reduction is very large compared with the former rate. Now, with reference to some of our mills running wholly on goods for the eastern market, there is one mill in Quebec that runs entirely on those goods—does not make a yard of cloth for the Canadian market. It has access to the whole market of the east, and it runs upon this special line and uses the whole force of the mill upon those lines. But, in a small market of four or five millions of people, that is impossible. If a mill were to run a specialty, they would soon overstock the market. Moreover, the class of cottons sent to the east is the cheapest to make.

Mr. CHARLTON. What grade is it?

Mr. FOSTER. Gray cotton.

Mr. EDGAR. The hon. Minister talks as if some particular mill in Quebec were the only one exporting. I find that in the record of the exports of last year, there was a small amount, $14,000 or $15,000 from Ontario, $185,000 from Quebec, $134,000 from Nova Scotia, and so on. This shows that there was not one mill in particular manufacturing for export. But suppose there was. They manufactured here for the foreign market, $383,000 worth of cotton goods. They competed with the whole world, with Great Britain and the United States, without any protection whatever. Of the amount of export, $244,000 went to China, and these goods were supplied in competition with the world. But they require on this common line of goods, 22½ per cent protection here. The hon. Minister thinks they are able to meet foreign competition in China, because they have one mill running on a single line. Will the hon. gentleman give us an estimate of the output of the mills in Canada, for the Canadian market.

Mr. KENNY. If it would not be out of order, while the hon. Minister of Finance is looking for the figures, I would like to say a few words. The hon. gentleman has spoken of the exports of manufactured cotton from Canada to China. I know from my own personal experience in connection with a cotton mill some years ago, that we did export cotton goods to China, but we only did so in order to keep the mill going, and I am of the opinion that the goods which were exported from Canada to China during the past twelve months were exported under similar conditions, and I am very much afraid, with the result of a loss to the shippers. The object in manufacturing these goods for China was, as has been explained in part by the Finance Minister, because there was over-production in Canada for our own domestic market, and these goods were manufactured for the Chinese market in order to keep the hands together and to keep them employed; for hon. gentlemen who have been connected with any manufacturing enterprise will recognize the extreme difficulty which would have been involved in gathering the hands together if the mills had been closed down. Rather than resort to that course, the goods of these mills were shipped to China, and, in many cases, I am afraid, at a loss. It must be borne in mind also that these goods do not come into competition with English goods in the Chinese market. There is a marked difference between the unbleached cotton goods manufactured in the United States and Canada, and those manufactured in England. The goods which are manufactured in the United States and Canada are made of a purer cotton, they are not filled with clay as the English goods are. There are millions of yards of unbleached cotton goods shipped from England to China, but they stand in a different position from American and Canadian goods. In dealing with this duty of 22½ per cent on unbleached cottons, hon. gentlemen opposite must not forget that it is only 5 per cent more than the rate of duty which prevailed when they were administering the affairs of the country; and they, I am sure, know from their own practical experience that the 17½ per cent would have yielded more revenue than the 22½ per cent does to-day, because cottons are relatively so much cheaper.

Mr. EDGAR. The hon. gentleman who has just spoken must not try to impress us with the idea that the tariff is only 22½ per cent on cotton goods. That is the rate of duty on this particular item. We have already passed an item of 25 per cent, and there are other items, which the hon. Minister does not show any signs of reducing, of 30 per cent, and 32½ per cent. Perhaps the hon. Finance Minister is able now to give us his estimate of the output of the Canadian mills for consumption in Canada?

Mr. FOSTER. Eight or nine millions.

Mr. EDGAR. I think the hon. gentleman's estimate must be exceedingly moderate, or the profits of the cotton mills are much less than we imagine.

Mr. FOSTER. Probably the latter.

Mr. EDGAR. Last year the hon. member for Cornwall (Mr. Bergin) made an elaborate speech on this question. He stated that he was provided with material for the speech by the proprietors of the cotton mills. He quoted figures to show that the actual cost to the mills of producing the cotton was just about the figure stated by the hon. Finance Minister, as the whole output for Canadian consumption. Surely nobody will contend that the companies could go on paying profits of ten and twenty per cent, as they have been doing, unless they are able to sell their cotton for more than it cost them. The output must have been considerably over ten millions of dollars. The cotton mills, we are told, are able to make $383,000 for the foreign market, chiefly because they run their mills on these lines particularly; but when they are making eight or nine million dollars worth of cotton goods for the people of the Dominion, they cannot afford to make them cheaply and cannot afford to run their mills on special lines.

Mr. FOSTER. They did make them cheaply.

Mr. EDGAR. Then what did they want this protection for? That is what I cannot understand. If the goods are made cheaply, why do they require this protection of 20 and 30 and 32½ per cent? We cannot accept that explanation. And it must be perfectly clear that the cotton mill owners are not the kind of men that will run their mills at a loss just to give employment to the people. They shut them up. They have shut up over and over again in this country when they thought they were manufacturing at a loss. I am sure the hon. member for Halifax will have to find some other theory than that it was out of philanthropy that these mill-owners manufactured goods to send to China so very much cheaper than they can manufacture goods to supply Canadians.

Mr. McMULLEN. As the Finance Minister and the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Kenny) are a little out of line on this question, perhaps they had better get together and adjust their differences.

Mr. FOSTER. We will pass this item and then get together.

Mr. McMULLEN. The Finance Minister says there is one mill especially that applies itself entirely to the production of cotton for the Chinese market, and that it does not manufacture a pound for the home market; but the senior member for Halifax says that where cotton is manufactured for the Chinese market it is done at a loss, and only for the purpose of keeping the hands employed.

Mr. KENNY. I expressed my individual opinion.

Mr. McMULLEN. The hon. gentleman must admit that he was mistaken in the face of the statement made by the Finance Minister. They will have to get together and settle their difference.

Mr. FOSTER. Nobody sees a difference but you.

Mr. McMULLEN. The Finance Minister sees it.

Mr. FOSTER. No, I do not.

Mr. McMULLEN. Yes, he has stated to the House that there is one mill in Canada that manufactured exclusively gray cotton for the Chinese market, and that it does nothing else.

Mr. FOSTER. I did not say whether they were getting rich. They may do it out of philanthropy for the Chinese.

Mr. McMULLEN. The hon. member for Halifax says that they are doing it at a great loss, and to keep their hands at work. Now, either that is the case, or there is a combination amongst the cotton mills, and they assign to that particular mill a special article to produce for the Chinese market, saying: We will make up your loss to you because we cannot all manufacture for the Canadian market. Suppose you manufacture for the Chinese market, and we will divide the profits among us.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. How does the hon. gentleman arrive at the estimate of eight or nine millions as the production of the cotton mills of Canada?

Mr. FOSTER. That is the statement of their output made by the census.

Mr. EDGAR.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I do not find that statement in the two volumes. The original bulletins vary so much from these volumes that it is a matter of great difficulty to trace the amount which ought to be debited to those cotton mills. What does the hon. gentleman suppose to be the relative value of the finished article and the raw product on the average—or perhaps the hon. member for Halifax can tell me that?

Mr. KENNY. I read a telegram the other day which I had received from Mr. A. F. Gault in reference to a statement which was made by my hon. friend from West Ontario (Mr. Edgar); and speaking from memory, I think that telegram, which is to be found in the 'Hansard,' put the output of the cotton mills of Canada last year at nine millions.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Can the hon. gentleman tell me about what proportion the raw material bears to the finished product? Does the cotton that goes into the manufacture represent 25 per cent or 30 per cent, or what proportion?

Mr. WALLACE. About 40 per cent. Raw cotton is worth about 8 cents a pound, and the gray cotton is worth about 20 cents. There would not be as large a proportion in the finer qualities of cotton, but in the gray cotton we are speaking of, it is about 40 per cent.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What I want to get at is about the average value.

Mr. WALLACE. According to the returns of last year there were 4,900,000 pounds of cotton waste, and 36,500,000 pounds of cotton wool, that is to say, about 41,000,000 pounds, which, at 8 cents per pound, would be about $3,250,000. The value of the manufactured product being about $8,500,000, that would be about 37½ per cent of the manufactured article.

Mr. McNEILL. My hon. friend, the member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), put the figures at $8,400,000 as the output of the mills, and I think you will find by the Trade and Navigation Returns that the total value of cotton imported is about $3,200,000, which would be, roughly, about what my hon. friend has said.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The Minister of Finance has made a statement of considerable importance. He has told us that a cotton mill in the city of Quebec has manufactured for the Chinese market so successfully because it was engaged in producing one line of goods, whereas the other mills are producing several kinds of goods for the limited market of Canada. Now, if the hon. gentleman is right with regard to his first statement, there is no reason why the cotton goods manufactured in Canada should be confined to the market of Canada. If the mill in Quebec is capable of manufacturing for christendom and for the countries outside, simply because it is confining itself to one line of goods, that is just a reason why the hon. gentleman should not undertake to keep up the mills engaged in the manufacture of a variety of goods by a very high protective tariff. If they were thrown upon their own resources, according to the hon. gentleman's statement, they would be compelled to confine themselves to the production of one kind of goods, and if they did that, they would produce them much more cheaply, and the Canadian people would get the benefit of the cheaper production.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend might not like to clothe himself and his family with the same kind of products that are sent to China.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman will see that it is not because they are producing gray cotton, but because they are producing only one kind of cotton.

Mr. FOSTER. That is what they are doing.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Is the hon. gentleman so unacquainted with the manufacture of cotton, with the progress of efficiency in this particular branch of industry, as not to know that the same argument applies to bleached cotton, and to the finer varieties of bleached cotton as well as to gray cotton?

Mr. EDGAR. There can be no doubt that this tariff averages 25 per cent on cotton goods. If there are only nine millions of an output in this country and if the manufacturers come up as closely as they can to the price that the duty will warrant, then we pay 25 per cent on the output from the mills, and we are paying to the cotton mills every year $2,250,000.

Mr. FOSTER. That is a very easy calculation.

Mr. EDGAR. Supposing you take off 5 per cent and bring it down to 20 per cent, there would be $1,300,000, and I do not think the Finance Minister can persuade himself or anybody else, that the manufacturers, if you have a duty of 20 per cent on cotton coming into the country, will charge their customers one cent less than 20 per cent.

Mr. FOSTER. Why not call it 21 per cent? You are following imaginative data.

Mr. EDGAR. My hon. friend's figures are here. Nobody can doubt that the tax collected from the people of Canada by the cotton mills to-day, is $2,000,000 a year. And they at the same time are selling to China and Japan and other countries goods on which no taxes are collected whatever.

Mr. FOSTER. And in how much variety?

Mr. EDGAR. I want the Finance Minister to tell me if the manufacturers are selling $1 worth of the same goods to the Canadian people at the same prices as they are selling in China? If the hon. gentleman will tell us how much cotton goods are being sold to the Canadian people at the same prices as they are being sold in China, then there may be some force in the theory of the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Kenny) that this is being done in order to keep the mills going. If we go further and look at the enormous capital stock of both companies we will see the Finance Minister is bolstering them up and enabling them to pay enormous dividends on watered stock by this tariff. The hon. Minister will not, I think, persuade the people that he is making any very serious reduction, while the stocks of the companies are higher to-day than when he introduced his tariff. It will be no use telling us that they have issued new price lists and are making some reductions. We know that they issued a new price list on the 6th April, and that they have issued another price list on certain lines, making some reductions in prices; but we know they can recall their price list, because the system of the tariff and of the combination of the mills enables them to do as they like in this country. They can recall the new price list to-morrow if they choose, or when Parliament is prorogued and everything is snug and comfortable—they can withdraw it then if it is not giving sufficient returns in the shape of profit. So long, therefore, as the tariff is kept at its present figure and there is a combination in the cotton trade in Canada, which is known to the Government, those hon. gentlemen will be blamed for bolstering up the combination. Hon. gentlemen will remember the statement made by the First Minister a couple of years ago when his attention was called to the existence of a cotton combine, that if such were proved to exist the Government would so arrange the duties as to suppress it. It is not too late yet; but the country will never believe that with an average duty of 25 per cent on cotton goods anything will be done to prevent the cotton combine securing large profits.

Mr. ROSAMOND. The hon. gentleman appears to understand a good deal about the cotton trade, but he does not understand it altogether. In the first place, referring to the Quebec mill, I may say that that mill was built specially for manufacturing cotton goods for the Chinese market. I take it for granted that there is not another mill in Canada, or perhaps in the world, that was established originally for that purpose. That mill, therefore, can afford to make gray cottons cheaper for the Chinese market than any mill in Canada; it can afford to make gray goods cheaper in Canada for the Chinese market than any other mill, and if any other mill undertakes to manufacture goods for the Chinese market, it must produce them at a loss, or certainly at no profit whatever. There is no doubt whatever that some of our mills have at times been obliged to manufacture for the Chinese market, simply because at the moment they could not find anything else to do, and as the hon.

member for Halifax (Mr. Kenny) said, they did so in order to keep the hands together and the machinery employed. Every manufacturer is aware that it is much better to keep a mill running, even at a small loss, than to cease operations, and unless he is suffering a heavy loss he will always endeavour to keep the mill running if at all possible. One word with respect to the duty. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Edgar) says the cotton combine has made large or excessive profits. Perhaps they have made large profits, but the action of the Government in reducing the duties by one-half must offset that argument altogether.

Mr. EDGAR. Will the hon. gentleman tell me, as he appears to be conversant with the Quebec mill, how much cotton is sold by that mill in Canada at the same prices as it is sold to China?

Mr. ROSAMOND. I do not think they sell one yard, because the goods are made for the Chinese market, and not for the Canadian market. They are not suitable for the Canadian market, and there is no demand for them in this country.

Mr. EDGAR. Of what kind are they?

Mr. ROSAMOND. Gray cottons.

Mr. EDGAR. Do not Canadians use gray cottons?

Mr. ROSAMOND. Not of the same kind.

Mr. EDGAR. Will the hon. gentleman explain?

Mr. ROSAMOND. If the hon. gentleman will get samples of both kinds he will soon see they are not the same kind.

Mr. FOSTER. No doubt I could procure at the mills a sufficient quantity to clothe the hon. gentleman.

Mr. EDGAR. Then I would be the first Canadian furnished with these goods at Chinese prices?

Mr. McNEILL. As the cotton industry, which has been attacked so vigorously, is one of very great intrinsic value to the people of this country, and as it would appear to be, in the opinion of hon. gentlemen opposite, specially vulnerable to attack as a protected manufacture, the committee may be able to obtain much valuable or interesting information by discussing the question somewhat further. With the permission of the committee I should like in all humbleness to say a word or two as to why this industry should not be attacked so violently as it is often attacked by hon. gentlemen opposite. We have heard a great deal about cotton combines and cotton lords and immense duties and colossal profits, profits arising out of the fact that the whole of the high duties we hear about is passed into the pockets of the cotton lords. The result has been that a very strong feeling has been aroused in the minds of the people in opposition to those engaged in the cotton industry. It has been thought that they have been employing the protection which has been extended to them for the purpose of selfishly and unduly enriching themselves at the cost of the people. I am not here for a moment to say that manufacturers have not used protection in many cases in such a way as I have referred to, that they have not used protection unduly to enhance the price of goods in this country, and I confess that so far as this particular industry is concerned, I have myself shared, in some degree at all events, the prejudice which the public shared in connection with it, but since I have heard the discussion on the floor of this House, where the accuser and accused are face to face, where the discussion is regulated by the rules of fair debate, I confess I have felt inclined very materially to modify my views on the subject. Now, one reason which had induced me to modify my views on the subject was the statement made by my hon. friend from North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy). That is a statement which I think will have very great weight in the country, because it is very well known that the hon. gentleman is now a very strong opponent of the National Policy. The statement of the hon. member from North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) to which I refer was this: That it is not true that the amount of duty placed upon the cotton goods is put into the pockets of the manufacturers, but that, on the contrary, the whole of that duty is paid out in wages to our own people. I think, Mr. Chairman, that that is a statement, coming from the source from which it did come, which will be of very great benefit in the way of removing misconceptions which have been inculcated by the newspaper organs, and by the statements of hon. gentlemen opposite in regard to this matter. It was not only that my hon. friend (Mr. McCarthy) made that statement; it was not only that he made that statement in express terms, but there is also the fact that he entered into a deliberate and careful calculation to prove the truth of what he said, and he stated that he took the average duty imposed upon cotton goods at 35 per cent. The hon. gentleman further said: That 35 per cent upon the whole output of cotton, which he took at about eight and a half million dollars, amounted in round numbers to $2,190,000 and some odd dollars. He took the wages at $2,100,000 and some odd dollars, so that you see they are very nearly, though not quite, balanced. But the claim is that the figure that he took of $2,100,000 as wages is incorrect, and that the amount of wages paid is really $2,400,000. I do not want to press that any further than simply to bring it to this point: that the wages paid is exactly equal to—it is really more than, but I will put it as exactly equal—to the amount of the duty which is imposed upon these goods. That is upon the basis of his calculation, which is: that the goods in Canada are enhanced exactly to the amount of the duty, for he says that we paid the full amount of $2,200,000 more than we would pay if we got these goods from England. Now, Mr. Chairman, I just wish to say before passing on, that I hope after that statement made by my hon. friend (Mr. McCarthy) we will hear no more of the allegation that the whole of the duty goes into the pockets of the cotton lords. Now, I want to call the attention of the House to this fact: that my hon. friend the member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) is utterly mistaken in saying that our cotton goods are enhanced in price to the extent of 35 per cent over and above what we could purchase these goods for in the English market. I have brought some samples of English and cotton goods with me.

Mr. LAURIER. And Chinese also?

Mr. McNEILL. No, I have no Chinese. Before dealing with this matter I might just say that the hon. gentleman (Mr. McCarthy) mentioned six lines of cotton goods which he himself selected. If we may judge from the manner in which he dealt with the iron industry of the United States, I think we may conclude that these lines of cotton were as good as he could find to prove his contention. Let us see how he dealt with the iron industry of the United States, and then we can come to a conclusion as to whether it was not likely he selected the lines that would best prove his own case. He wished to convey to this House the idea that the iron industry of the United States under protection had not in any degree thriven in proportion to that industry in the mother country which enjoys the great privilege of free imports and shackled exports. How did he proceed to prove his contention? Did he take the growth of these two industries in the two countries and compare that growth with the last ten years? Did he even tell the tale of the exports of iron and steel goods in England and in the United States? Did he tell this House that ten years ago, the export of iron and steel from the mother country was £32,600,000 sterling, and that ten years afterwards it had fallen to £22,500,000 sterling, a decrease of over 30 per cent. Did he tell the House that during the same period the exports of iron and steel from the United States show, during the first year of that ten-year period, $17,330,000, and in the last year of the period, $28,800,000; that is to say, that in place of there being a reduction and a falling away to the extent of 30 per cent, as was the case in England, there was an increase of far more than 50 per cent in the United States. The hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) did not tell us that. Did he tell this House that in the edge tool line of the iron and steel industry, the United States was successfully competing with the mother country herself in her own market? Did he tell this House that, which is a patent and a notorious fact? Did he tell the House that handsaws could be purchased in the United States cheaper and better to-day than they can be purchased in England, and yet mirabili dictu there is 40 per cent duty on these handsaws in the United States and still they incontinentally and perversely sell themselves—notwithstanding that 40 per cent duty, which, according to the contention of hon. gentlemen opposite, should make these saws 40 per cent dearer—they sell themselves cheaper than the English handsaw does. Did my hon. friend (Mr. McCarthy) tell this House that out of the one hundred and twelve lines of iron and steel manufactures enumerated in our Trade and Navigation Returns, the United States successfully competes in eighty-one, and the mother country, England, in only thirty-one of these? No, Mr. Chairman, my hon. friend did not tell the House that. That was not the line of argument that he adopted to prove to this House that the iron industry of the United States was not as prosperous under protection as the iron industry of the mother country is under free trade. He pursued a very different method indeed. Out of these 112 lines of iron goods enumerated in our Trade and Navigation Returns he selected one line, steel rails, which he said were dearer in the United States than in England. None of these facts that I have referred to mattered at all; but because steel rails happened to be dearer in the United States than in England, therefore the iron industry of the United States, my hon. friend contended, could not for a moment compete with the iron industry of the mother country. Now, judging from the skilful manner in which my hon. friend selected his witness, and put that witness into the box, I think I am justified in saying that the witnesses he has now called with regard to cotton goods are the best he can produce in support of his contention. I have endeavoured as well as I could to get hold of these witnesses of my hon. friend, because I have felt pretty sure that if I could get hold of some of them we might succeed in getting some further information from them. I have succeeded in obtaining two out of the six. I was not able to obtain as many as I wished, because the particular lines of English goods which the hon. gentleman selected are not much sold in this country. But I have two of those lines here, and I will deal with them. The first witness my hon. friend called was the line of Oxford shirting. He stated that as good Oxford shirting as the Canadian article, which is sold at 7¼ cents a yard, is sold in England for 5 cents, from which he argued that we paid 45 per cent more for our Oxford shirting than we would have done had we got it from England. I have here a sample of English Oxford shirting at 5½ cents, and a sample of Canadian Oxford shirting at 7 cents, the difference between the two being not 45 per cent, but 21½ per cent. If this Canadian shirting at 7 cents is as good as the English at 5½ cents what becomes of my hon. friend's contention that there is a difference of 45 per cent in value between them? The difference in price is only 21½ per cent. But I say that this Canadian shirting at 7 cents is not only as good as the English shirting at 5½ cents, I say it is far better, and I have no doubt that there is on the other side of the House some hon. member who knows something of this class of goods, and I am perfectly willing to leave it to him to say whether this Canadian shirting at 7 cents is not far better than the English at 5½ cents. How much better is it? I may say that I have had a piece of each washed, so that hon. gentlemen may see the difference. This English shirting is largely composed of China clay; it is a composition of cotton and clay, and when it is washed a great part of it disappears. The Canadian shirting, on being washed, shows no perceptible difference as to substance; it is just as good in substance after washing as before. Now, how much better is it than the English shirting at 5½ cents? It is vastly better. It is not only not made up of clay and cotton, it is not only pure cotton, but it is dyed in a different way. It is indigo-dyed cotton, while the English is aniline-dyed, and I am told that the difference in the cost in that respect alone is 4 cents per pound of cotton goods. But leaving that aside for a moment, without considering the colour at all, I ask what is the difference in the value of these two classes of goods? I have taken some trouble to find that out. I wished to be quite sure that I was going to say nothing in this House that I could not substantiate. In the first place, I saw the invoice of the English goods. I took the trouble to go round to houses in this city that are supplied with Canadian goods, and I saw the invoices of them, so that there is no mistake as to the figures I am giving being correct. I went to two gentlemen in this city who have been engaged in this business for very many years. One of them was connected with one of the largest establishments in London, in St. Paul's Churchyard, in 1856, before he came to Canada to take up the industry here, so that he has had a pretty large experience. I asked him whether these goods were of equal value, or if there was any difference in value between them, which was the better of the two. He said the Canadian goods were much the better of the two. I asked him what difference in price he would put between them. He said at least ¼ of a cent a yard. I was not satisfied with that. I went to another gentleman who is engaged in the wholesale trade in this city; I have no objection to mention his name—Mr. Garland. I showed these goods to him, and he, without knowing at all what the other person had said, told me that there was a great difference in value between them, in his opinion at least ¼ of a cent a yard. So that these two authorities entirely agreed that there was at least ¼ of a cent a yard difference in value in favour of the Canadian goods. Now, if you add that ¼ of a cent to the price of the English goods, in order to get value for value, you have the English goods raised from 5½ to 6¼ cents. Now, you have to add to that something more, because, supposing we take away all protection and supposing the hon. member for North Simcoe had the opportunity of bringing in goods from England without paying any duty, he would still have to add, at the very least, 5 per cent, for freight and insurance and exchange, &c., which I understand is a very low estimate. The result is that in place of their being a difference of 45 per cent, there is not quite 8 per cent difference in cost between the English and Canadian goods. I ask, then, what becomes of the contention of my hon. friend from North Simcoe, that on this line of goods there is a difference of 45 per cent in favour of the English article?

Mr. EDGAR. What is the protection required for?

Mr. McNEILL. I desire to be perfectly courteous to my hon. friend, but if he will kindly ask the question when I have done speaking, I will be only too glad to tell him, or, if he is very anxious, I will tell him now. The reason we put a duty of 30 per cent on these goods is the very same reason that induces the people of the United States to put a duty of 40 per cent on their saws. It is the very same reason that induces every country that is governed by practical statesmen, and has adopted the policy of protection, to put a heavy duty on certain imports. And that reason is to secure at least their own market for themselves, and prevent the slaughtering in it of imported goods. It is in order that we may not suffer again from what we experienced before, and which, though it may be a source of merriment to hon. gentlemen opposite now, was not a source of merriment to the country at the time. I refer to the slaughtering of foreign goods in our market. That is the reason why a duty is put upon these goods to the extent I have mentioned. I may say further that at present there is a very serious risk that we may be very injuriously affected in this very matter of cottons by the condition of trade, in the United States, because there is a very great likelihood of a slaughter taking place, and it is essential that our industries should be protected to the extent, at all events, of securing our own market for them. But I would ask my hon. friend, if it be incontestably true, as it must be, unless it is supposed that everything I say is utterly unreliable—and I have taken special precautions to obtain correct information—if it be true that these goods only cost us 8 per cent more than similar goods laid down from England, without any duty at all, who is hurt by the duty? The manufacturer is protected—who is hurt? So much for the Oxford shirting.

Mr. LAURIER. Are they all clay or cotton?

Mr. McNEILL. I will hand them over to the hon. gentleman, and he can judge for himself. I could find no difference in the Canadian goods in substance, after washing, as compared with the goods before washing.

Mr. LAURIER. They are all equally good.

Mr. McNEILL. There does not seem to be any adulteration whatever, whereas the other goods are adulterated very largely.

Mr. LAURIER. They treat us as we do the Chinese.

Mr. McNEILL. I think we have had the Chinese market pretty thoroughly discussed. I think we have been told by a gentleman who seems to be very well informed on the subject, that the goods manufactured for the Chinese market are not such goods as are sold here.

Mr. LAURIER. Apparently, from the hon. gentleman's argument, the English people treat us as we treat the Chinese.

Mr. McNEILL. I really do not know whether our manufacturers load their goods for China with clay or not. I should think that it would be very much wiser for them not to do so, because their goods having come into competition with the English goods, loaded with clay, they would be very much more likely to succeed if they sent in the unadulterated material. I will proceed to deal with another line of goods to which my hon. friend referred—flannellettes. My hon. friend said that English flannellettes at 6 cents are as good as Canadian flannellettes at 8 cents.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman is comparing English with Canadian and not American goods?

Mr. McNEILL. I am comparing the goods the hon. gentleman dwelt upon, and I am dealing with his argument.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) You have not got American samples there?

Mr. McNEILL. I am dealing exclusively with the class of goods to which the hon. member for North Simcoe referred.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman said that the Americans were cutting out the English in their own market, but evidently the Canadians have not come to that point yet.

Mr. McNEILL. I have not made any statement of the kind with regard to American cottons, for, so far, but it is true that to some extent, American goods are. I know I shall never get my hon. friend to take a practical view of anything. I was saying, when my hon. friend interrupted me, that the hon. member for Simcoe stated that English flannellettes at 6 cents were as good as Canadian flannellettes at 8 cents. Now, I have got an English flannellette here at $5\frac{1}{8}$ cents, which is the best I could do, and I have got a Canadian flannellette at $5\frac{3}{4}$ cents. And to shorten the discussion, I will just say that the same assertion which I made with regard to the Oxford shirting holds good in this case. I say that this Canadian flannellette at $5\frac{3}{4}$ cents is far better than the English at $5\frac{1}{8}$ cents. The difference in price, as hon. gentlemen will see, is nothing like what my hon. friend said it was. But I took this also to the gentleman to whom I referred last, Mr. Garland, and I asked him which of these was the better class of goods. He examined them, and said at once that the Canadian unquestionably was much the better.

Mr. LAURIER. We should export them to England, and send the English people good goods.

Mr. McNEILL. This is $5\frac{3}{4}$ cents per yard.

Mr. LAURIER. But it is better.

Mr. McNEILL. It is better. I asked how much better, and he said he would give half a cent per yard more.

Mr. LAURIER. Let us export them to England.

Mr. McNEILL. I am glad my hon. friend recognizes that our industry is progressing so fast. This, then, is the difference in value between these goods—a difference of simply one-eighth of a cent in value. According to this expert who examined both, the Canadian goods at $5\frac{3}{4}$ cents was worth $\frac{1}{2}$ cent more than the English goods at $5\frac{1}{8}$ cents; that is to say, you must add $\frac{4}{8}$ ths of a cent to the English goods, which brings up the English goods to $5\frac{5}{8}$ ths as against $5\frac{6}{8}$ ths, which is the actual price of the Canadian goods. And that does not take into account the cost of transportation. If you take into account the cost of transportation, then, so far as this line of goods is concerned, the Canadian goods are actually cheaper than the English. Now, I want to ask again what becomes of my hon. friend's contention, which was that we paid 33 per cent more for our flannellettes in Canada than we could get them for in England or than we could import them for from England. It has melted into thin air. Now Mr. Chairman, this Canadian line of goods is, as I have said, cheaper than—or, at all events, as cheap, let us put it no further than that—as the English goods. Take the average, for my hon. friend struck an average between the goods he mentioned—take the average between the flannellettes and the Oxford shirting. One is no dearer than the English, and the other is 8 per cent dearer. So you find the average is 4 per cent dearer, this is 4 per cent only as against the Canadian goods, instead of 35 per cent, as my hon. friend declared the difference in price to be. Now, I have taken my hon. friend's own lines of goods; I have taken his own witnesses, and I have the right to assume that no better witnesses for his contention could be found than those he himself selected, and, so far from proving his contention, these witnesses of his own make utterly ridiculous the statement he made on the floor of this House. Now, that brings us face to face—well, very close, indeed—to my hon. friend's main contention and fundamental argument against the whole National Policy, and that argument was this—that we are paying for it more than it is worth. Now, he made the statement that we paid the whole amount of the duty, 35 per cent, and that it amounted, in round numbers, to \$2,200,000. Taking the figures I have given you, it amounts, not to \$2,200,000, but to \$340,000. Now, in order to save that \$340,000 to the consumer of cottons in Canada, my hon. friend condemns his constituents and mine to the use of this cotton clay compost. And not only so, for he did not intend to relieve the consumers of cotton of all taxation; he intended that they should pay 17½ per cent. But, under this policy, in place of paying 17½ per cent, they are only paying 4 per cent. But, Mr. Chairman, even if my hon. friend desired to save the \$340,000 for the revenue, I want to know what he intended to do with the rest of the money. While he argued that the consumer should pay 17½ per cent to the revenue rather than pay 4 per cent to the workingmen of this country, I want to know what his position was with regard to the eight million dollars and more that are left. If you subtract \$340,000 from \$8,500,000 you have more than \$8,000,000 left. Now, what was my hon. friend's proposal with regard to this \$8,000,000, as compared with which the \$340,000 was a very small matter? His proposal was that we should send that \$8,000,000 bodily out of this country to buy English or foreign goods. Now, a certain amount of it does go out of this country—about one-third the value of the goods—which is spent for the raw material. But the difference between the price of the raw material and the price of the manufactured goods, the bulk of it at least, is simply wealth produced in this country by the labour, energy and skill and enterprise of the people of Canada. But my hon. friend did not consider that at all. He said we got nothing in return for the extra price we paid. We have about five millions of dollars as an increase to the wealth of this country, besides giving employment to our people. Why, Sir, the sum that goes to our people as wages—\$2,000,000, not a small sum in itself, but small in comparison with the eight or nine millions of dollars—is still here, it is still circulating in this country, buying flour and beef and other products of the farm.

Mr. McNEILL.

buying shoes and clothes and other goods. And I want to call the attention of the House for a moment to the fact that my hon. friend excluded the bakers and butchers and shoemakers and tailors from the benefits of the National Policy. But these also are getting their profit from the National Policy and increased in number by it. That brings me now—and I am sure I am very much obliged to the committee for the great patience with which they have heard me—to what is a still greater error of my hon. friend, to what I conceive to be the essential error of his position, the idea that only the men employed within the walls of protected industries are benefited by the National Policy. That is a very large question. I say that the effects of such an industry as this are far-reaching; it is almost impossible to say how far they extend in benefit to the industries of this country. I need not elaborate that idea; I will confine myself to quoting one sentence from a little work which I have in my hand. I have quoted this expression in this House before, but it is quite evident, Mr. Chairman, that it requires to be quoted again. This work is by Professor William Smart, Professor of Political Economy of Dundee and Glasgow, and a strong free trader. In reference to this particular matter, as to the effect of an industry upon the surrounding population, I would call attention to what he says. He is writing of the sugar industry. I do not say that this may not be an extreme case, but, at all events, it illustrates the point I wish to make. He says:

Along with the sugar industry go, a good many subsidiary trades, such as coopers, engineers and the large amount of shipping formerly necessary. Greenock, for instance, a town of 70,000 inhabitants, and with a municipal debt of £2,000,000, has only about 2,000 men directly employed within the walls of the sugar houses, yet almost the entire population is dependent upon the prosperity of sugar.

Now, I think if any statement can be imagined which ought to enlighten hon. gentlemen opposite with regard to the narrowness of the views they take on this subject, it is the statement which I have read. This is a statement made by a professor of political economy, who is a strong free trader, and if it was necessary, I could read a passage from the book to show what a strong free trader he is.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Read the passage. I dare say it would be better instruction than the one you read.

Mr. McNEILL. I will read the passage if my hon. friend wishes:

It is perhaps not out of place to ask: What is our national policy? The battle of free trade was fought out in the days of our fathers. The younger generation have accepted the name of it, without much attempting to grasp the great arguments that Cobden and Bright and Villiers made familiar from every platform. Of late there has been a slight reaction against it. But the reactionists have proved so weak in debate, and so evidently partisan in interest, that they have served only to settle us more firmly in our conviction, that nothing can be said for protection that was not said forty years ago and confuted then.

Does that satisfy my hon. friend? Is that sufficient proof that this is a free trade author? I would just say that I hope when any hon. gentlemen discuss this question in the future, they will remember the dictum of the gentleman whose utterances they have so rapturously applauded at this moment, and that they will not consider that the only men benefited by a protective policy are the men employed within the factories. The farmer as well as every one else is benefited. Now, I think this cotton industry is one of which we in Canada ought to be proud. It is an industry in which some thirteen million dollars are invested, an industry that turned out last year nearly nine million dollars worth of goods. It is an industry that employs 9,000 of our working people, and these have to be supplied by our farmers. The wages that are paid, as I have stated, are claimed to be $2,400,000, and the amount of energy that has been displayed in prosecuting this industry, is extraordinary. The great coloured cotton spinning mill at Magog, which, I understand, unfortunately, has paid no dividend so far, and whose capital stock is in the market at some 30 or 35 per cent of a discount—which does not look very much like enormous profits—I understand this mill turns out 3,650 different patterns of printed goods. I am informed there is no other single mill in the world that turns out anything like the same number of patterns. It was stated here the other day, I think by the hon. member for Wellington (Mr. McMullen) that this mill was dead, or he fancied so. Well, it is very much alive, I am glad to say. Four years ago it turned out 190,000 pieces of goods. The year subsequent to that it turned out 275,000 pieces of goods, and this year it is expected to turn out 400,000 pieces of goods. So that does not look very much like inanition. I must say that I think the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), and the hon. gentlemen opposite with whom he is acting in this matter, are utterly mistaken in the proposal they make. It seems to me it would be a fatuous policy, and that it would be a very shabby policy to desert this industry and to turn the people who are employed in it again adrift. It seems to me that the true and statesmanlike policy is to support and maintain an industry which does so much for this country, which employs so many of our people, which produces directly and indirectly so much capital, and which directly and indirectly encourages industry in this country to so great an extent.

Mr. McMULLEN. I must say that for a number of years I have not listened to an

hon. gentleman on that side who has made a stronger free trade speech than my hon. friend who has just sat down. He has proved most clearly to this committee, from the quotations he has made and the samples he has produced to the House, that Canada can produce in the cotton line goods as valuable as England or any other country. Now, if that is the case, why should there be protection at all? I regret that the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) was not present to realize how completely he has been snowed under to-night. How he would have felt the power of the argument presented by the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) in criticising the speech he made to this House a few days ago. I must express my surprise that the hon. member for North Bruce, who has ever been ready and willing to stand up for the honour and dignity of England, should to-night have turned his back upon her. He produced samples made in England to this House, and said: This is China clay, it is not cotton. He decried his own country. The man who has ever been ready to stand up for the honesty, the uprightness, and the integrity of England, has told us to-night that she manufactures cotton out of clay and sends it to Canada to be sold as cotton. I suppose the hon. gentleman thinks that he has settled the whole question to-night. Protection, he says, has accomplished a great deal for Canada, and his argument would go to show that we do not want any more protection. Our cotton mills can compete with creation, and when they can compete with England with a very little duty, why should they have any more protection? That is just what we have been contending for on this side of the House, the people of this country for many years have been paying an enormous amount of money presumedly to keep the cotton mills agoing so that they could make money, but we find out by the hon. gentleman's argument to-night that they have been protected too long, and the best thing we can do now is to strike off the shackles and allow the people to buy where they can please themselves best, and if they chose to buy English clay imported as cotton, let them have the opportunity of doing so.

Item agreed to.

White or bleached cotton fabrics, n.e.s., 25 per cent.

Mr. FOSTER. This is a reduction. Cotton denims, drillings, bed-ticking and so on, average 31½ per cent.

Mr. EDGAR. That may be so, but the hon. gentleman cannot point out in the Trade and Navigation Returns anything to substantiate that. I would like to know where he gets these figures, because he cannot get them from the imports.

Mr. FOSTER. I thought it was the next item that had been called. It has already been explained that the two are in one item in the returns.

Mr. EDGAR. How much does the hon. gentleman say the duty was on bleached sheetings, ducks, &c. ?

Mr. FOSTER. They are altogether in the item. It is impossible to give anything but an average on bleached and unbleached.

Mr. EDGAR. I see from the Trade and Navigation Returns that the average is 24½ per cent, so the duty proposed is not a decrease.

Mr. FOSTER. That took in unbleached as well as bleached, it embraced ducks, drill sheetings, &c. It is very clear that this is a very great deduction.

Mr. FLINT. Has the Government concluded to accede to the prayer of the petition of a certain cotton manufacturer in Nova Scotia, who asks that the cotton duck used for belting and hose be removed from the free list and be given some duty, in order to give the manufacturer the same measure of protection as is enjoyed by other manufacturers in the cotton industry ?

Mr. FOSTER. I can hardly tell the hon. gentleman until we come to the free list, and then I shall be happy to give the information.

Item agreed to.

Cotton fabrics, printed, dyed or coloured, 30 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. FOSTER. The cotton duck, checked and striped shirtings, cottonades and Kentucky jeans and goods of like description were 31½ per cent on an average. The gingham, plaids, cotton or cotton flannels were 34½ per cent. By placing the duty at 30 per cent, we have made a decided reduction.

Mr. EDGAR. On page 45 of the Trade and Navigation Returns I find that on coloured cotton fabrics, woyen in whole or in part, ducks, &c., the duty on the importation was at the rate of 24½ per cent. Now it appears to have been increased to 30 per cent.

Mr. FOSTER. No; it is 2 cents per yard, or 15 per cent. The hon. gentleman can easily calculate it.

Mr. EDGAR. I have calculated the duty on importations, and I make the rate 24½ per cent.

Mr. FOSTER. That is for cotton bleached and unbleached.

Mr. WALLACE. The hon. gentleman is quoting an item that does not belong to cottons, but includes cotton and a number of other fabrics, such as "jute yarn, or part jute and part cotton." It is not fair to compare this as being cotton goods, which it is not.

Mr. FOSTER.

Mr. EDGAR. The item includes coloured cotton.

Mr. WALLACE. Only cotton mixed with other fabrics.

Mr. EDGAR. This includes coloured cottons and cotton fabrics. It is true that the whole of the item is not cotton fabrics, but it includes coloured cotton fabrics.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman is looking at the wrong place. If he will turn to page 40 he will find the cotton goods. These goods to which the hon. gentleman has been referring are really woollen or a mixture of cotton with other fabrics.

Mr. EDGAR. There are cotton goods on page 40 as well as on page 45.

Mr. FOSTER. They come under a different item entirely.

Mr. EDGAR. I know it. I am only referring to the coloured cotton fabrics.

Mr. McMULLEN. What change will the duty make in the revenue ?

Mr. FOSTER. If any change occurs, we will obtain a larger revenue, because the amount of protection has been greatly lowered.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I understand it has been lowered from 31½ per cent to 30 per cent.

Mr. FOSTER. I have regard to the hon. gentleman's own argument with respect to this point, that if you take a range of prices you will find that on very many the old duties will be much higher.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Then I will ask the hon. Minister what quantities were imported of the lower grades, and what of the higher ? In bringing down these items containing twenty or thirty different descriptions of cotton fabrics, it is quite impossible, unless the hon. gentleman has made a careful calculation, which if he has he can give to the House, to tell from these vague general statements anything about the matter. There may be $10,000 worth or $100,000 worth of the inferior goods imported. What are the amounts according to the hon. gentleman's calculations ?

Mr. FOSTER. Unfortunately our returns do not separate them.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It is groping pretty much in the dark. All we can tell is the average amount is so much, 31½ per cent, and it is now proposed to reduce it to 30 per cent.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes; but we know also that there is a large margin of prices, and that they run from 6 and 7 cents up.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Surely the hon. gentleman in making his calculation as to what the tariff would yield or the loss that would be sustained must have had before him some competition more or less accurate—we do not expect minute accuracy—as to the total amount of coloured cotton goods imported, or that were imported, and how they would be affected by the duty. There should be some means in his department to ascertain the gross amount. But what does the hon. gentleman suppose to be the gross amount of coloured fabrics imported?

Mr. FOSTER. About 3,000,000 yards, or a little over.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That is an enormous proportion when the total amount was only $4,000,000 last year.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes; but this is the largest proportion.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Am I to understand that by cotton fabrics at 30 per cent, 75 per cent of the imports are covered?

Mr. FOSTER. I am giving the hon. gentleman the quantity, not the value. I mean 3,000,000 yards, the value of which was $380,000.

Mr. McMULLEN. Can the Minister of Finance give us any idea of what the output of the Magog mills was for the last year?

Mr. FOSTER. A little over $1,000,000 worth.

Mr. McMULLEN. Then we imported apparently $1,749,000 worth, which gives $2,749,000 used in Canada. The Magog people had some $300,000 of protection for manufacturing that million dollars worth of goods. They had 30 per cent on what they manufacture, and they sell their cottons up to the prices at which you can import them.

Mr. FOSTER. Make your calculation correct, and put it down at 32½ per cent.

Mr. McMULLEN. That is a bonus of $325,000 to the Magog mills. How many hands do they employ?

Mr. FOSTER. They have about 1,200 hands.

Mr. WALLACE. They make the cloth in other factories in the Dominion, and you can put 1,200 more hands for that.

Mr. McMULLEN. If there is anything at all upon which a very decided reduction should be made it is on printed cottons, because everybody knows that the poorer classes of this country buy very largely of cheap prints. In my humble opinion the action cannot be justified of trying to establish a cotton printing institution in this country, because it is well known that with a limited market of less than 5,000,000 of people, you cannot change the pattern sufficiently often to keep up with the fashions issued in England and France, where the most stylish prints in the world are produced. The fact is that in order to change their rollers so as to make new and stylish patterns they have to go to great expense, while in England and France they run off an enormous amount of cotton on the same die. It is a piece of gross folly and an indefensible imposition on the poorer classes of our people to impose a duty of 30 per cent on printed cottons for the purpose of keeping the Magog mills running. For any legitimate industry there might be some reasonable excuse for protection, but in this case there is no excuse whatever. It is on a par with our trying to manufacture all kinds of earthenware and chinaware here when we have to bring the clay and sand from the United States in American bottoms, and land it on the banks of the Richelieu to try and produce crockery to compete with the Staffordshire ware. That is running protection into the ground.

Item agreed to.

Collars of cotton, xylonite, xyolite or celluloid, twenty-four cents per dozen and twenty-five per cent.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I would like to know what the hon. gentleman computes that to be ad valorem on the inferior qualities?

Mr. FOSTER. The average on last year's importations was 52 per cent on the collars, and 56 per cent on the cuffs. Of course the duties were higher.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That was the average, but that is not exactly what I asked. I asked what information the hon. gentleman had as to the duty on the separate grades. I know that in the trade this duty is regarded as an enormous and improper duty, amounting to 80 or 100 per cent on a good many of the grades imported.

Mr. EDGAR. I have ascertained from members of the trade that they have bought in England a great many of the cheaper class of collars for a shilling sterling a dozen, that is 24 cents a dozen. That is 100 per cent of duty on the specific part, and in addition to that the hon. gentleman is levying 25 per cent, so that on that class of collar the duty would be 125 per cent. That is a reason why I think the Government should put an ad valorem and not a specific duty on this article. I should think an ad valorem duty away down would suit the case better.

Mr. FOSTER. An ad valorem duty away down would destroy the industry in this country.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What does that industry amount to? Where is it situated, and how many men does it employ? I should like to know what industry is worth taxing the people of Canada 125 per cent for, and I should like to know what return these manufacturers are going to make to us for subjecting our people to such a tax?

Mr. FOSTER. It may be possible to buy collars for a shilling a dozen, but I am inclined to think that collars sold at that price do not return much to those who make them, after the material is paid for. It seems to me that that is not the kind of industry in a foreign country for which we ought to sacrifice a fair and legitimate industry in this country. The hon. gentleman asks how many people this industry employs. I suppose he knew before he asked that it is a widely extended industry. I find that it employs directly about 5,000 hands.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. In making collars ?

Mr. FOSTER. In making collars and cuffs and shirts.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Where is that statement to be verified ?

Mr. FOSTER. You can find it in the census returns under the industries.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Name the industries, if you please.

Mr. FOSTER. They pay out about $1,000,000 in wages.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am not inquiring about the shirts ; we will come to them in due time. I am inquiring about these collars.

Mr. FOSTER. Collars and shirts are made together ; they are not separate branches of industry. They employ a very large number of people and in a very excellent way, that is, outside the factory. For instance, in Quebec, where that industry is largely carried on, most of it is done in the farmers' homes, the work being given out to the wives and daughters of farmers and brought in when finished. If my hon. friend will inquire in the vicinity of Montreal he will find that a very large employment is given there, with very excellent effects, that otherwise would not have been given, and at a fairly remunerative wage. I think it is not to be suggested here that because the grade of collar my hon. friend refers to he says he can get at a shilling a dozen, therefore, our people are paying a duty of 100 or 125 per cent. That is not true at all ; because, in the first place, the materials are widely different, and, in the second place, there is no combine, no approach to a combine, no possibility of a combine, among the shirt and collar manufacturers of this country. They are all competing with each other, and their goods are sold at a very low price. Collars of very good quality are sold at from 60 cents a dozen upwards ; and, when you take into account the price of the material and a fair wage for making them, that is very cheap indeed. On the continent of Europe there is no branch of the work which is done at a rate of pay nearer to starvation wages than the making of shirts and collars, and it is to protect a legitimate industry in our own country against that kind of labour that this duty is put on. Not that our people take advantage of the whole duty, and do not produce an article of fair value from good material.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The advantage does not go to the labourer at all.

Mr. FOSTER. The advantage does go to the labourer. The manufacturer gets a fair return for his work, but not a large return, because the competition keeps down the prices and the profits ; but it is just, in a comparison with that kind of labour on the continent, in Germany and in England, that we may come to the conclusion that labour here does get the advantage, and that it should be protected from competition with that class of labour. It is simply a question whether, to suit a mere whim, a mere idea with reference to free trade, we should destroy an industry of this kind and throw 5,000 of our people out of work, in order to have collars of a very cheap and very poor kind—they must be as poor as they are cheap—at the rate of 24 cents a dozen. Hon. gentlemen will find, if they inquire in the stores in our cities and country places, that collars and shirts and cuffs are sold very low indeed, and I do not think that the protection, under those circumstances, is an undue one, considering the interest which is being subserved. No doubt English collars are imported, no doubt something is paid for style, but I do not think the poorer classes are discriminated against in these duties while a very large employment is given in our own country. The amount of cotton consumed in the making of these collars and cuffs is very large, and this also helps to keep up our cotton milling industry and thus furnishes additional employment.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The statement which the hon. gentleman behind me made as to the price at which collars may be purchased in England is correct. I have correspondence in my hand from a large importer in the Maritime Provinces. He says that ladies collars can be bought in England at a shilling a dozen, and that the duty imposed on these, computing the specific and ad valorem, is exactly 120 per cent. That surely is protection beyond reason. To prove the correctness of his statement, the importer sent me samples of collars which he imported at these prices. And the hon. gentleman can see that they are not of the class he imagines at all. Here is one that cost 11 pence sterling per dozen. Value for duty 22 cents, 30 per cent ad valorem, 6·60, specific duty 24 cents per dozen—the whole duty 36·60, or 140 per cent.

Mr. FOSTER. Did he tell you how much he sells those for ?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) What does that matter ? We are asking how much duty the hon. gentleman is putting upon them, and whether collars of this character can be purchased at the price my hon. friend behind me said they could.

Mr. FOSTER. No doubt they can.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) This proves beyond doubt that they can be purchased at the price you said and a shade less. They cost 11 pence per dozen, and the duty is 140 per cent, and the character and style of the collars may be seen from the samples produced here. No sane man can justify such an enormous and absurd duty as that upon an article of this kind.

Mr. TAYLOR. He can buy them at 30 cents a dozen.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) If you can make them cheaper than they can be imported at, we do not want a duty on them.

Mr. TAYLOR. Most certainly you do, to keep them out.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) We are arguing against the imposition of an absurd and unreasonable duty which nothing can justify. Now, he sends another sample, which seems to be a very good collar. It costs 14 pence per dozen sterling, and the whole duty amounts to 115 per cent. What possible justification can the hon. gentleman advance for placing these exorbitant duties on a collar costing 14 pence per dozen?

Mr. CURRAN. Does he give the wages paid to the seamstresses?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Will the hon. gentleman tell me what prices are paid to the seamstresses in some of the cities of Canada? He does not know, but I have been told by some who do know, that you pay them sweating prices.

Mr. CURRAN. The hon. gentleman asserts that, but cannot prove it.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) When the hon. gentleman asks me the prices paid seamstresses at home, has he any evidence?

Mr. CURRAN. The evidence of the price per dozen.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) You have no evidence, but they produce them cheaper than you do.

Mr. HASLAM. I believe I have evidence on that point, from an importer of English goods. He compared the prices paid here with those paid in the sweating shops of London to the exiled Jews from Russia and Germany and other continental countries, who were bound to exist in London the best way they could, and he told me that the prices paid in Canada—

Mr. LAURIER. No sweating shops in Canada.

Mr. HASLAM. No, and I hope the Opposition will never get low enough to wish for them. The wages paid in Great Britain for the very class of goods exhibited here are positively a disgrace to any country claiming to be a nation.

Mr. LANDERKIN. And the old flag.

Mr. HASLAM. Yes, or any other flag; but the flag, I am proud to say, is not responsible for the actions of a great many people who claim protection.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I am glad to hear that.

Mr. FOSTER. That lets you out.

Mr. LANDERKIN. But not you.

Mr. HASLAM. I hope that Canadian politicians will never degrade themselves to the extent of asking the poorer classes of people in Canada to work for the wages paid by some of the manufacturers in Great Britain. There is certainly over 400 per cent difference between the wages paid to the poorer classes for the same line of goods in Great Britain and Canada.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) How will the hon. gentleman reconcile that statement with the statement made by the hon. member for Leeds (Mr Taylor), who said that we make them as cheaply in this country as in England?

Mr. HASLAM. The hon. gentleman spoke only of the goods the articles were manufactured from. I am talking of the work done on the articles. I am talking of the made-up articles. He did not mention collars or cuffs at all.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Yes, that was the subject I was talking about.

Mr. HASLAM. I did not hear the hon. gentleman mention it. I know whereof I speak in this instance.

Mr. INGRAM. I have been trying to ascertain whether the manufacture of celluloid goods covers other articles than collars and cuffs. I know that a large class of other goods are made in celluloid, but whether this factory makes them or not I am not prepared to say. If they do, the people of this country would make a great saving on goods handled by different dealers. Ivory is growing scarce and celluloid goods are taking the place of those formerly made of ivory. Saddlers handle a number of these goods. Take, for instance, martingale rings. A large number are manufactured, and they are extensively used in this country. The ivory rings are very dear, and, by the use of celluloid, a great saving can be effected. I believe also that druggists handle a certain class of celluloid goods that take the place of ivory.

Mr. EDGAR. The hon. member for Vancouver Island (Mr. Haslam) expresses his fear of the competition of exiled Jews in London making these collars. In the city of Toronto, when the employees of the sweaters tried to get an increase of wages, their employers sent to New York and imported exiled Jews by the dozen to Toronto to keep down wages there.

Mr. WALLACE. What firm was that?

Mr. EDGAR. I can learn the name of the firm and give it to the hon. gentleman, for I saw it stated in the papers when I was in Toronto before the session opened.

An hon. MEMBER. What paper was it?

Mr. EDGAR. I think it was the 'World.' The Finance Minister asked my hon. friend from Prince Edward Island (Mr. Davies) what the importer sold these collars at. I can tell him this: that when the Government puts on a duty of 120 per cent and upwards, the importer sells the goods at more than 100 per cent additional to the people of the country. He has to add his profits and his interest and charges not only on the cost of the imported goods, but also on the duty he pays to the Government. So, the higher the duty, the higher the price, but always in proportion to the duty.

Mr. HASLAM. I am obliged to the hon. member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar) for bearing out my statements. He has proven that we have to go to another country in order to bring in labour to reduce wages.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) But there is no protection for labour in this country.

Mr. COCHRANE. You objected to it when it was proposed.

Mr. COATSWORTH. It is not proper for the hon. gentleman (Mr. Edgar) to make the statements he has made. I saw the same accounts that he saw. The hon. gentleman did not give the names because he could not give them. He has simply made a statement based upon a newspaper report which may or may not be true. I do not say anything about the newspaper—

Mr. LANDERKIN. Thin ice.

Mr. COATSWORTH. The hon. gentleman has gone on thinner ice, and has gone through it too. The hon. gentleman has made a statement based upon a report in an evening newspaper. I am surprised to hear the hon. gentleman making such statements about the city of Toronto without having satisfied himself whether they are true.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. One thing is perfectly clear—the hon. gentleman is perfectly willing to inflict a duty of 125 per cent and over upon the people of this country, for the possible benefit of a small number of persons who are carrying on this industry of collar making. Whether his information as to those engaged in shirt making, which is a larger branch of industry, be true or not, I cannot say. The census figures, I am sorry to say, are so very badly arranged that it is a matter of extreme difficulty to test the accuracy of the information supplied to the hon. gentleman by interested parties; and I doubt very much indeed whether, in a great many of these statements he has made, he has any better authority than the very vague allegations made by persons whose interest it is to maintain these enormous duties. The hon. gentleman and his friends are willing to pile up duties of 125 per cent and over in order to develop some petty little industry at the expense of the great bulk of the people of this country, to whom they can give no protection, who have to sell in the markets of the world and accept the prices given them as the result of competition in those markets. These taxes, although they do not amount to much per head, when put together go very far to justify the statement made by the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), who I am sorry to see is not here to vindicate his own cause, but who, I have no doubt, will vindicate it on proper occasion. The practical result of these taxes is that the people of Canada are being taxed to the tune of sixty or seventy millions, by far the larger part of which is exacted in taxes scattered over a number of small articles, and a comparatively small proportion of which goes into the treasury. These things all go to show that the Government take no notice of facts no matter how clearly put before them. They have been saying that our tariff is only one of 30 or 35 per cent, or, as one of them put it, a tariff of 20 per cent. But when you come to analyse it, you find just such cases as my hon. friend has given. There is not the smallest shadow of an excuse for a tax ranging to 100 or 135 per cent. It is well that the people of Canada should understand that so far as the great mass of the producers of this country are concerned, the Government are utterly indifferent what burthens they lay upon their shoulders.

Mr. WALLACE. I think the hon. gentleman is needlessly indignant. The real fact with regard to these collars is that the importations average 4s. 6d. per dozen, not 11d. or 12d., because these women's collars that are shown here are practically not imported at all. We do not need to import them, because they are made and sold here by people who are paid good wages for making them at 3 cents apiece.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Then why tax them 125 per cent?

Mr. WALLACE. We do not want to tax them for the protection of those engaged in making cheap collars, but we do put a duty on the class of collars that are worn by hon. gentlemen of this House, and by the farmers and workingmen of this country as well. The average cost price is 4s. 6d. per dozen, or $1.08, that is the average price at which these collars have been imported. Those that the hon. gentleman showed here do not require to be imported.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) They are imported, those are a sample of collars actually imported.

Mr. WALLACE. They cannot be imported, because the duty on them would be 30 cents a dozen, and they can be bought here for 36 cents a dozen, and nobody would be fool enough to import them. But the tariff does protect the women of Canada who make cheap collars, from the cheapest paid labour in the world, and I think the working women in Canada who are making these shirts, collars and cuffs, are entitled to a large measure of protection. Ninety per cent of those who are making these collars are women, and the Government are prepared to give them the necessary protection they require, so that they may be employed in this country at fair wages. This duty will shut out the products of the pauper labour of Europe.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It would be more to the purpose to protect these people by reducing the duties on the necessities which they consume, and that can be done by going back to those half-dozen items we have passed, all of which pay a high duty.

Mr. EDGAR. The hon. member for East Toronto (Mr. Coatsworth) got very indignant about my reference to some exiled Jews being brought to Toronto and put at sweating work. That was not in one paper alone, but in all the Toronto papers at the time. There is a discussion now going on in the city council as to what they are going to do with the colonies of Jews in that city who are coming into competition with the labour of Toronto. The Controller of Customs was very anxious for me to tell him the name of a firm whose work was done by exiled Jews. I may tell him that it was sub-contractors for this clothing and work of that kind, who got into a squabble with their employees and refused to pay them living wages, and imported these Jews. The sub-contractors were at work for a wholesale clothing firm, Lailey, Watson & Co. This firm did not employ these Jews themselves, but it was the sub-contractors, the regular sweaters all over town, who did that. The working people of Toronto are discovering that this 50 and 100 per cent protection goes into the pockets of the manufacturers, and that it does not keep out this imported Jewish labour.

Mr. COATSWORTH. The objection that I made to the statement of the hon. gentleman, he has not removed. I read those articles as well as he did, and I am surprised that he, a lawyer, should stand up before this committee and make the statements he has made to-night, from the article that appeared in that paper. I have this to say, that the alleged investigations—because I can hardly call them more than alleged investigations—were made by one newspaper, and so far as they appeared in other newspapers they were simply copies of, or extracts from, the articles in the first paper. I read the paper myself almost every night while these things were being published, and I must say that I am surprised that any gentleman, without some investigation on his own part, should take these newspaper reports, which may or may not have been got up for the purpose of selling the paper, and without satisfying himself as to the truth of the reports, should have inflicted them upon this House with all the assurance of one who is telling what he knows to be a true statement. Now, my hon. friend has mentioned the name of one firm, but he takes particular care not to say that he cannot mention the names of the persons who were referred to in these reports. It is very well to say that some firm standing high up, through a series of sub-contractors, has this work done in the way he mentions; but there is no evidence. My hon. friend has mentioned the name of to show that that kind of thing exists in Toronto; and I can assure this House that if it does exist to any extent we will soon find means to stamp it out.

Item agreed to.

Committee rose and reported progress.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and the House adjourned at 11.55 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, 9th May, 1894.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

CARAQUET RAILWAY.

Mr. MULOCK asked, What were the gross receipts and expenditures of the Caraque Railway for the fiscal years 1891, 1892 and 1893?

Mr. HAGGART. For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1891, the gross earnings were $17,819.16; and the gross operating expenses, $19,514.49. For 1892, the gross earnings were $18,899.77, and the gross operating expenses, $21,080.29. For 1893, the gross earnings were $20,069.66, and the gross operating expenses, $22,095.18.

MOUNTED POLICEMAN GILPIN BROWN.

Mr. McMULLEN asked, When was Gilpin Brown appointed a member of the North-west Mounted Police? What is his position in the corps? What service has he seen to fit him for the position he fills? If any officer of the kind was wanted, why was it not filled by promotion in place of a new appointment? Is Mr. Brown a Canadian by birth? If not, how long has he been in Canada?

Mr. IVES. He was appointed on the 8th February, 1894. His position is that of inspector. He was an officer in the 92nd Gordon Highlanders from 1874 to 1884, and had served with distinction through the Afghan war of 1878-80, the Boer war of 1891, and the Egyptian war of 1892. He had also served with the Canadian forces during the North-west rebellion in 1885. He is not a Canadian by birth. He has resided in Canada since 1885. He was appointed because of his eminent fitness and qualifications for the position.

THE NATIONAL PARK.

Mr. MARTIN asked, 1. Have any lots been sold in the National Park town site? If so, how many, and at what price? 2. What were the receipts from the National Park in 1893? 3. How much money was expended on the National Park in 1893?

Mr. DALY. 1. No lots have been sold. 2. The receipts in 1893 were $3,025.50. 3. The amount expended on the park in 1893, exclusive of salary of superintendent, was $4,456.80.

INDUSTRIAL SCHOOLS IN THE NORTH-WEST TERRITORIES.

Mr. McMULLEN asked, What is the number and location of the several industrial schools in Manitoba and the North-west Territories, and the average number of pupils attending each during the fiscal year ending 30th June, 1893?

Mr. DALY. There were seven industrial schools in operation in Manitoba and the North-west Territories during the fiscal year ended 30th June, 1893:—St. Boniface, at St. Boniface, Man., with an average attendance of 77. Rupert's Land, at St. Paul's, Middlechurch, Man., with an average attendance of 53. Washakada Home, at Elkhorn, Man., with an average attendance of 56. Battleford, at Battleford, Treaty 6, N.W.T., with an average attendance of 95. Qu'Appelle, at Fort Qu'Appelle, Treaty 4, N.W.T., with an average attendance of 158. Regina, at Regina, N.W.T., with an average attendance of 85. St. Joseph's, at High River, near Calgary, N.W.T., with an average attendance of 68. In addition to which the following boarding schools, at most of which one or more industries are taught, were also in operation during that year:—Portage la Prairie, at Portage la Prairie, Man., Treaty 2, with an average attendance of 15. Water Hen River, at Water Hen River, Treaty 2, Man., with an average attendance of 7. Birtle, at Birtle Agency, Treaty 4, N.W.T., with an average attendance of 13. Blackfoot, on Blackfoot Reserve, Treaty 7, N.W.T.; average attendance of 22. Blood, on Blood Reserve, Treaty 7, N.W.T.; average attendance of 14. Crowstand, near Pelly (south end of Coté's Reserve), Fort Pelly Agency, Treaty 4, N.W.T.; average attendance, 19. Emmanuel College, at Prince Albert, Treaty 6, N.W.T.; average attendance, 19. File Hills, at Little Black Bear's, File Hills Agency, Treaty 4, N.W.T.; average attendance, 12. Gordon, at Geo. Gordon's, Touchwood Hills Agency, Treaty 4; average attendance, 13. Lac la Biche, at Lac la Biche, Saddle Lake Agency, Treaty 6; average attendance, 18. Lakesend, near Muscowpetung Reserve, Treaty 4; average attendance, 4. Muscowequan's, at Muscowequan's, Touchwood Hills Agency, Treaty 4; average attendance, 14. Muskeg Lake, at Petaquaquey's, Carlton Agency, Treaty 6; average attendance, 3. McDougall Orphanage, on Stoney Reserve, Sarcee Agency, Treaty 7; average attendance, 36. Piegan, on Piegan Reserve, Piegan Agency, Treaty 7; average attendance, 6. Round Lake, at Round Lake, Crooked Lakes Agency, Treaty 4; average attendance, 13. Sarcee, on Sarcee Reserve, Sarcee Agency, Treaty 7; average attendance, 7. Standing Buffalo, Standing Buffalo, Muscowpetung's Agency, Treaty 4; average attendance, 6. Stoney Plains, at Enoch la Potac, Edmonton Agency, Treaty 6; average attendance, 7. St. Albert Orphanage, at St. Albert, Edmonton Agency, Treaty 6; average attendance, 50. Vermillion (Irene Training), in Athabasca District, outside treaty limits; average attendance, 14.

BRIBERY AND DISFRANCHISEMENT.

Mr. WELDON moved that the House resolve itself into committee on Bill (No. 6) to disfranchise voters who have taken bribes.

Motion agreed to, and House resolved itself into committee.

(In the Committee.)

On section 2,

Mr. JEANNOTTE. (Translation.) Mr. Chairman, before this section is passed, I would like to state my views as regards the provisions embodied in this Bill. As is now well known, penal proceedings can only be instituted in a direct way, that is to say, the facts must be explained, the charges stated clearly which the incriminated party will have to meet—in short, everything must be stated directly and plainly. Well, what is this Bill enacting? It states that, whenever twenty-five voters shall lay a complaint on their mere suspecting that bribery has been practised, that they have reason to believe that bribery prevailed at an election, these twenty-five voters shall apply to the judge of the Superior Court of the district in which the electoral district is included, and the judge shall make a fishing inquiry into cases of bribery. Make an inquiry!—but into what? against whom? It is not known, Mr. Chairman, at least it is not stated in the Bill. However strange it may seem, such inquiry will have to be made upon mere suppositions. If this Bill is passed, it will not be necessary that definite facts should be stated in the petition for the opening of the inquiry. What will the parties arraigned have to do? How will they dispute the evidence given against them? What power will they have to protect themselves? For, let it be observed, the judge despatches the case as quickly as he can. Now, the inquiry once begun, those incriminated parties who would wish to contest the case will be told it is too late for them to object to the inquiry; that they should have done that before the opening of the proceedings. But how will they know that such proceedings are to take place? It is stated nowhere in the Bill. That attempt at legislation, Mr. Chairman, is the result of the endeavours made last year by the hon. promoter of this Bill. It will be remembered that, at the last session, he introduced a Bill to make these inquiries in a wholesale way. But the Bill was drawn up in such a way that it could not reach its third reading, and was killed after its second reading. True, they substituted for it a little baby, but the child was born not likely to live, and now we know not where he is. This year, the hon. member comes again with a new Bill, which does not seem to me to be more acceptable, with another child, whom I consider no more capable of living. I am in favour of any measure that tends to prevent or do away with bribery at election times. Last year, it was stated in some newspapers and elsewhere that I was opposed to that principle. I deny that emphatically. I am in favour of any measure, and any legislation which will have for its object to make elections as pure as possible; to see that not a single dollar should be spent. I am the more for the putting down of bribery as I have no money to spend for such purposes. At the next election I may possibly not be returned by acclamation, as I was at the last, and should I have an opponent, I would, of course, be the most happy man living, should there be a law to prevent any bribery, or any attempt at bribery. Therefore, I am in principle in favour of any measure tending to prevent electoral bribery, and if I am not in favour of the Bill now before us, it is because I think it will not fill the object for which it was drawn up. It is wanting in two things: first, it does not punish the more guilty parties. Should it be passed, you could not punish the bribe-givers, or, rather, those who do the real wrong, those who practise bribery on a large scale. But you will punish, you will reach, innocent men, or a poor man who will have received fifty cents to provide bread for his wife and children, while you leave alone the man who did all the wrong. That poor man, who does not know the law, who would have simply accepted, as a gift rather than as a bribe, that trifling sum of fifty cents, would be uselessly dragged before that court of inquiry. I cannot see the opportunity of this Bill, as such electoral laws as we now have to provide for all the cases mentioned in this Bill. But, Mr. Chairman, who will pay the costs of the inquiry that is to be made whenever twenty-five voters petition for it? I will make myself right at once with respect to various sections of this Bill, for I do not intend to take the floor at every moment, and this is why I will pass on from section 2, now under consideration, to the other sections. Who, I repeat, will pay the costs? When an election is over, does any one fancy that there is a man to be found, scrupulous and desirous of the public good to such an extent as to look for and have such a petition for inquiry signed by twenty-five voters? Does any one believe that many people will be found who will be impelled by such a desire to purify the political atmosphere and be willing to make a deposit of five hundred dollars, which they will lose without any profit or benefit accruing to any one? You will not often find people so well disposed as to spend such a sum solely in the interest of the public good. I think, Mr. Chairman, it is going a little too far. I think that never will a man be found who would be willing to spend five cents under such conditions, and, consequently, such legislation would have no practical results. Let no one be mistaken with respect to that deposit of five hundred dollars; the man who will ever make it will never see a single dollar of it come back to him. But what will be the effect of this Bill? I suppose the judge will grant the inquiry, and he could not do otherwise, once a petition for it has been filed before him. The judge will go to the place and there begin the inquiry. He will bring along with him a clerk, bailiffs, short-hand writers—for the Bill authorizes the use of short-hand writers—in short, the judge will go there with all his kitchen utensils. Under such conditions, I can assure you that the five hundred dollars will not last long. When they will be expended, will the inquiry be stopped? And if it is not stopped, if it is not suspended, who will pay the additional costs incurred? I presume that there being no money, the judge will stop the inquiry. Then what result will you have obtained? It may often happen that the evidence received should incriminate nobody and that no one could be disqualified. What, then, will all your efforts have come to? But I go further. Under this Bill, there is no direct disqualification, for the voter who will have taken a bribe will be simply put on a list. By what proceedings will that result be reached? But I think I had better wait till the committee reaches the section relating to this point, as I will then move an amendment. The two Bills which were brought before this House last year never came to completion, and I think the present one has no more chance than its predecessors. The means suggested are the same, and they are not of the kind to necessarily do away with bribery at elections. Even though you could succeed in disqualifying three or four voters, it would not prevent bribery to be practised. This Bill, in my opinion, is apparently designed to favour rather than suppress bribery at elections. With such a law, the candidate or his friends could freely practise bribery to their satisfaction, carry the election, and once they had carried it, rest after their success and say laughingly to the victims of their bribery: Deposit five hundred dollars, which you will never see again, and try to make an inquiry. I say, therefore, that this Bill is useless, that it will not reach the object for which it is proposed, and, moreover, that it will be the cause of useless persecutions against good and honest citizens. It is not acceptable, and, as stated by me at the last session, it is a real court of inquisition which they wish to establish in Canada, inquisition which caused such an evil in other countries and was so much denounced. Why should they wish to establish such a court in our country? I say again that the first Bill came to an end because it was not born likely to live, and I think the present one is in no way stronger than the two others, the birth and death of which we witnessed in so short a time last year.

Mr. DUPONT. (Translation.) Mr. Chairman, I think this Bill is not such a law as is desired by this Parliament, and, in my opinion, such a law incorporated in our statutes would be a real disgrace to this Parliament. Its net result would be to provide for lawyers a very good source of income; but, as regards electoral purity, it will be quite ineffectual. The fact is no fees are determined for those who will be called upon to carry out this law. We do not know what fees will be allowed the lawyers, judges and clerks who will be called upon to make the inquiries mentioned in this Bill. So that a wealthy candidate or voter, by depositing $500, will compel his political opponent to spend as much, and so on till the returned candidate, to prevent his election being voided by proceedings and bills of costs—and we know that lawyers are clever people when it comes to making a bill of costs—be compelled by his own friends to resign his seat in order to avoid ruinous proceedings and expenses. Indeed, with a deposit of $500, very likely one could compel his political opponents to spend a thousand, and that, as stated by the hon. member for L'Assomption (Mr. Jeannotte), without being able to ascertain a single case of bribery. But under this Bill a voter could be summoned who, although quite innocent, would be unable to defend himself, would be dragged before the court and obliged to retain a counsel, which would cost him some hundred dollars; because a great many witnesses would be summoned to give evidence against him; that voter would have to make a counter-inquiry. And when the $500 deposit would be exhausted, or nearly so, nothing in this Bill gives the court any right, or even any authority, to compel the plaintiff to deposit another $500 or cover the costs of the victim brought before the court. With such a law, you could go round a large electoral district, disturbing everybody during the valuable time of field labour, disquiet the whole country and embarrass the administration of justice. You would discredit the judges by mixing them with politics. They are already often enough charged with partiality in the trial of controverted elections. Drag the magistrates all over the rural districts, put them in direct contact with voters, and you will unquestionably bring down upon them a charge of partiality; you will remove the confidence the people ought to have in them. Assuming this Bill to have some opportunity, and supposing the people should be willing to use it, you will deter the magistracy from its true duty, which is the administration of justice. Cases are already too long pending before the courts; they will be still more, especially in the city of Montreal. Lawyers will reap an abundant harvest; but the electorate will suffer proportionally. And besides, you will not improve public morality by means of this Bill, for you will summon before the courts a great many individuals who, in order to save a relative or a friend, will perjure themselves. You will invite, in a manner, those who would be exposed, to perjure themselves by calling upon them, ever and anon, to take an oath about matters of such importance. If you cannot now reach the bribe-taker and bribe-giver through our controverted elections law, you had better, in my opinion, amend it. There are enough jurists in this House that they might find out a means whereby the law respecting controverted elections could be made efficient, and whenever a voter will be convicted of bribery, let the Controverted Elections Act enact that he will be disqualified. Why embody in our statutes a new way of making inquiries? Why drag the magistrates through rural counties, far distant, and leave judicial affairs in suspense by compelling them to make futile inquiries which can only end in discrediting them and can have no other result but lowering them in the minds of the people? I would have several other observations to make in respect to the first section, but I hope the common sense of the House will reject this Bill. In my opinion, the Government ought not to countenance such a Bill. On the contrary, they ought to dissuade the electorate from making inquiries of that kind. It is a new abuse of the oath, and one which will invite the voters, in such inquiries, to declare against their political opponents, at the very moment when electoral passions exercise such influence among people who are not quite enlightened. It ought to be admitted that the statements under oath of those who acknowledge having received money at elections are to be dreaded. We ought, therefore, to give them no opportunity for perjuring themselves. We should not either give, I will not say the opportunity, but the advantage, as concerns the moneyed men, to grind down the people, or, as concerns the legal profession, to raise exorbitant fees.

Mr. JEANNOTTE. (Translation.) Before the committee divides on this section, I would like to ask a question from the Government. I would like to know whether the Government are willing to pay the expenses which will be incurred after the deposit will be exhausted? If they are willing to incur these costs, let them say so; otherwise it would be perfectly useless to pass this Bill. If they have money for that, so much the better.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. This is a very bad year to have such a question put to us, and in the absence of the Finance Minister, it will be only safe for me to say, No.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). It seems to me that in order that this Act may be made workable and efficient, it should be provided that this duty should be undertaken as if it was a special request from Parliament. The former statute that was in force was a statute in which Parliament took the initiative. The hon. gentleman who has introduced this Bill has endeavoured to get rid of the delay incident thereto, and it seems to me that in order that the Bill may be made efficient and workable its enforcement should be undertaken at the public expense, and not at the expense of the people of particular constituencies. I think that will be clear if we look at some of the provisions of the Bill. Take, for instance, section 16. It is exceedingly doubtful, no matter how corrupt a constituency may be, unless there should be some very wealthy people in it, that this Bill, important as it is, would be anything more than a dead letter. In order that the hon. gentleman's object may be attained and the Bill made efficient, the expense of all proceedings should be charged against the public revenue, and not against the people in any particular locality. We are all interested in having elections conducted properly, in having pure elections and in discountenancing bribery; it is not a matter that concerns the people of one constituency alone, but the well-being of the whole country, and that being so, the work should be undertaken at the public expense.

Mr. WELDON. Some of the criticisms made by the hon. member for Bagot (Mr. Dupont) I think merit an answer, because they were very clearly and strongly pressed. Exception was taken by him to the inadequacy of the provision in the Bill for carrying on the proceedings. I think that discussion will be more germane to section 16, and therefore I will not deal with it until we reach that section, if we may. The hon. gentleman complains of the expense which may be incurred by the voter whose vote is challenged. That is an incident of the Bill, and cannot be prevented. The guarantee that $500 will be put up by the parties who proceed to attack corrupted votes is a pretty good guarantee that this Bill will not be used as an instrument of revenge, and will only be used by men of public spirit who feel that they have been scandalized by a particularly outrageous election in a particular county, and who will try and disfranchise for a term of years the electors who have taken bribes. I do not think in practice any very great danger will befall innocent men. The hon. gentleman also complains that the Bill would discredit the judges by drawing them further into political controversy. If I rightly apprehend the operation of the Bill it will not have any such effect. We may not shut our eyes to the fact that bribery is common in many constituencies, and is practised largely by the friends of both parties. That this bill will have any considerable political effect as regards the fortunes of either party seems to be unlikely. To be sure, in a county where the people feel strongly enough on the subject to put up $500, where the people feel that the last election was outrageously corrupt, that the mind of the country was not expressed in the election, we will put up the money and place on the black list as many of the bribe-takers as we can find the names of. If bribers were prosecuted by both sides, and I have already intimated that bribery is very largely practised by the friends of both parties, one party will attack and the other party will make a counter attack, and both will put out their full strength, so that not one party alone will suffer, but the bribe-takers on both sides will be struck at. The inquiry will not take on a political complexion in any case, and therefore the idea that the judges will be dragged into a political controversy is not well founded. The hon. gentleman put a very fair question when he asked: Why put this measure on the statute-book when we already have laws on the subject? That question was fairly asked, and it should be fairly answered. We have made two attempts since confederation to deal with this question. One was in the Act for the Trial of Controverted Elections, and I leave it to the judgment of the House whether with our 20 years' experience of that Act it has had the effect of at all diminishing or cutting down bribery. Every one knows that the Act has not struck at the guilty party; it has struck at the elected member, and punished him, and yet it is within our remembrance that in many cases the member has acted in perfect good faith, and has endeavoured to prevent bribery in his own county, but nevertheless bribery has gone on behind his back and without his knowledge. What fairness is there in attacking his seat under that Act, of putting him to the fatigue and expense of an election, when he is not the guilty party? I have the concurrence of the House when I say that after 20 years' experience of the operation of that law it has not had the effect of diminishing bribery; it has not done that part of its work. We have had another law to which the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) has referred, introduced into Parliament by the Hon. Mr. Blake, which proposed to make up a black list of those who had taken bribes, but which contemplated entirely different treatment of the bribe-takers from that set forth in the present Bill. He proposed to treat the parties as criminals, and hand them over to the Attorney General of the different provinces for punishment. The public mind does not look with that degree of abhorrence on bribery that would justify the Blake Act. The Act never worked well; it was only tried once or twice, and it was never enforced successfully, because bribery in the public mind is not an offence of such a character as would justify a criminal indictment. I propose to deal in a much milder way with this offence, not to treat the parties as criminals, but as children, who, as they did not sufficiently value the franchise, would be deprived of it, not for ever, but for a term of seven years. So my answer to the hon. member who put this question is that we have made two attempts to deal with this question, one by means of the election petition, which in my judgment has proved a perfect failure for that purpose, although it may have other good effects, but so far as preventing bribery goes it has been an outright failure; and the second was the Act introduced by the Hon. Mr. Blake, which altogether exaggerated the degree of public antipathy felt towards the offence of bribery. That hon. gentleman viewed the offence as a crime, and treated it as such. But we at the present day do not think it is a crime, and the present Bill does not treat it as a crime. There is no degradation, fine or imprisonment provided, and the Bill simply takes from the voters the sacred trust which they have failed properly to exercise. The suggestion by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) that the Administration should take hold of this Bill and make it a Government measure, and have the cost under it paid out of the public treasury, I heartily endorse. I appreciate the difficulty to which the hon. gentleman referred. I know that unless there was a strong feeling of indignation it will be found difficult to induce men to put up the $500 necessary to set the machine in motion. I believe that in some countries persons will be found with public spirit enough to enforce this Act, and diminish bribery at elections. I refer again to a most reassuring piece of history, enacted in the city of Montreal, where ten times as much money as is named in the 16th clause of this Bill was subscribed by some persons in that city who had nothing but public spirit to impel them. These genlemen said: Fraud and personation are going on in these municipal elections, and in future we propose to put an end to that; and we will spend money to stop that fraud. They did subscribe the money, and what was a great deal more than money, they put their own public spirit and enthusiasm into the thing, with the result, as I am informed, that in the last municipal elections in Montreal, personation was almost unknown in some of the wards in which, in previous elections, it had been a scandal and a disgrace to the city. I believe that there is public spirit in the country. I believe that if the public find they have an instrument in their hands which they can work to put down bribery and corruption, they will avail themselves of it. If I did not believe there was that public spirit in the country, I would agree with some hon. gentlemen in this House that it was a waste of time to discuss this Bill. I am perfectly confident that, in some counties, people will put up $500 in an election, not in every election, perhaps, but in an election where the consensus of opinion is that the corruption was scandalous and outrageous. That being so, I think I have answered the objections of my hon. friend.

Mr. JEANNOTTE. (Translation.) The hon. member referred to what happened in Montreal. As he is coming from a remote province, he does not quite know the real facts. I feel compelled to contradict him, for his statement is not correct, although he might have made it in good faith. When he states that in Montreal there is much bribery at elections, he is mistaken. True, a few persons formed an organization for the purpose of purifying the electoral atmosphere, but at the last municipal elections there were neither more nor less bribery than before, and the hon. member was therefore quite mistaken. The election went on as last year; there was no difference whatever. True, there were some telegraphs, as we call them, but that happens as well in the rural districts as in the cities.

Mr. LAURIER. (Translation.) In St. Mary's Ward, for instance.

Mr. JEANNOTTE. (Translation.) In St. Mary's Ward, yes; but there were some, too, in St. James's Ward. The electoral business in Montreal is managed as honestly as in any other part of the country; there is no more bribery there than elsewhere. It might happen that faults were made, but when it is remembered that the majorities of the members of the City Council ranged from two hundred to fourteen hundred votes, it is plain that the result was not due to bribery. The Citizens' Committee made no more wonders than usual, and almost every old alderman running was returned again.

Mr. DAVIN. If the hopes of my hon. friend (Mr. Weldon), who has charge of this Bill, are realized, it cannot fail to do good. If the opinion respecting it of my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills), and others, should be realized, then all that would happen would be that the Bill would be a dead letter. However, it would always remain available in case there were a certain number of public-spirited citizens in a constituency who were willing to make an example of those who sell one of the most sacred trusts that can be committed to any one.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). My hon. friend is not representing accurately what I stated. I did not say that the Bill would be of no value. On the contrary, I think it will be of value; but I say it would be much more efficient if the Government were to provide for the payment of the expenses out of the public treasury.

Mr. DAVIN. I beg my hon. friend's pardon. I understood him to say that clause 16 did not make sufficient provision for implementing the fund. However, I think the measure is good, and I will support it. This is the way I look at it: It will either be a dead letter or it will do good, and if it remains a dead letter it can do no harm.

Mr. AMYOT. (Translation.) Mr. Chairman, I think that seldom has the attention of Parliament been called to such an extraordinary measure and one which in practical operation would be as much arbitrary as the one now before us. It is intended that a whole country be exposed to the vengeance of an individual wounded by his having lost an election in which he was interested. It is proposed to make an inquiry whenever a certain number of individuals will choose to state that they have reason to believe that bribery prevailed at an election. A great many voters will be dragged before that court of inquiry and will be put face to face with what? A mere affidavit in which it is vaguely stated that extensive bribing prevailed. The whole proceedings required to obtain such an inquiry are to be confined to the filing of such an affidavit and the making of a deposit of five hundred dollars put at the disposal of the judges appointed to conduct the inquiry. Assuming there are no guilty parties in fact, fifty accused, perhaps more will yet be compelled to be there, to have their counsel, their witnesses, to leave their residence, the voters being at the extreme ends of the county having to go to the centre of the same, or those living at the centre having to go to the extreme ends of the county. These witnesses, these accused persons might have to remain there for ten or fifteen days or more, to neglect consequently their business, to suffer losses and damages of every kind, in order to follow the proceedings of such inquiry and to protect themselves against what might possibly be alleged against him. Or, again, it might happen that after all these delays, all these damages suffered, all these losses sustained, the court should be obliged to pronounce that the charges made against them are false. But, Mr. Chairman, where is the person or persons who will be responsible for the damages incurred and the expenses made? I very particularly call the attention of the hon. promoter of this Bill (Mr. Weldon) to what I am now saying, for he is an earnest lawyer, and I feel satisfied that he would not put his name to a law which, no doubt, would be the cause of much tyranny and arbitrariness. If, after the inquiry, the judge should decide that such and such incriminated persons are not guilty, all these expenses would have been incurred, you would have caused all these damages amounting possibly to a thousand and even two thousand dollars, or perhaps more, expenses and damages which will be paid by whom? By the Government? By the county? No, for it does not bind itself to that. The petitioners themselves will have no responsibility. Then nobody will be responsible? And this is the law you wish to incorporate in our statutes and under which five voters will have a right to cause an inquiry to be made.

An hon. MEMBER. (Translation.) It is not five, it is twenty-five.

Mr. AMYOT. (Translation.) The Bill says five. I am referring to the Bill as amended by the Select Committee which had charge of this Bill.

Mr. WELDON. Mr. Chairman has said twenty-five electors.

Mr. AMYOT. (Translation.) Well, let us say twenty-five, even though it be thirty or fifty voters, it does not matter. Nobody is responsible, and in whatever light you view the question, there is no more guarantee one way or the other. The voters accused will be left nothing whatever, and they will be sure losers by the system established by such a legislation. The deposit will be applied to the payment of travelling expenses, to the payment of the bailiffs, of the shorthand writing, in short of all the expenses of the court and of those acting under its authority. There will be nothing left to indemnify those who will have suffered an unjust prosecution. How could they protect themselves against such individuals? It is not stated in the Bill. I very much doubt, Mr. Chairman, that an action for damages could be taken against the petitioners, for it would require a formal evidence of their want of good faith. It would have to be shown that they acted through positive malice and in an evident bad faith, which would be very difficult. We are all in favour of measures having for their object to repress and even to prevent any attempt to bribe the electorate of this country. We are all anxious that the voters should decide openly, honestly, sincerely and freely with respect to public affairs, that the popular will should make itself known without any impediment, without any obstacle. That is what we all of us want, but, as so well stated, a moment ago, by the hon. member for Bagot (Mr. Dupont), does this Bill provide the means to reach a desirable result? I think, for my part, that it would have a result quite contrary to that desired by its father. If you should put this Bill into our Statutes, if you should incorporate in our Statute-book a legislation which will appear unworkable in every respect and which will become obsolete, you will have caused this result: that in future bribery, instead of being decreased, will be practised on a much larger scale than in the past. What ought to be done, therefore—for we admit that there is still bribery in Canada at election times, less than twenty-five or thirty years ago, less than in other countries—what ought to be done—and I call the attention of the promoter of this Bill to this point—should be to amend our Dominion Elections Act. Thus section 84 of that Act reads as follows:—

(a.) Every person who, directly or indirectly, by himself or by any other person on his behalf, gives, lends or agrees to give or lends, or offers or promises any money or valuable consideration, or promises to procure, or to endeavour to procure, any money or valuable consideration, to or for any voter, or to or for any person on behalf of any voter, or to or for any person, in order to induce any voter to vote, or refrain from voting, or corruptly does any such act on account of such voter having voted or refrained from voting at any election.

(b.) Every person who, directly or indirectly, by himself, or by any person on his behalf, gives or procures, or agrees to give or procure, or offers or promises any office, place or employment, or promises to procure or to endeavour to procure any office, place or employment, to or for any voter, or to or for any other person in order to induce such voter to vote, or refrain from voting, or corruptly does any such act as aforesaid, on account of any voter having voted or refrained from voting at any election.

Why not add: "and every voter who will receive money or allow himself to be bribed will also be guilty of bribery." We will see further on what guarantee this would give to the public as well as to every individual. I always wondered why, in this electoral law, we declare guilty the one who gives and not the one who receives. What is the reason of such a distinction? My hon. friend from Albert (Mr. Weldon) evidently shares my opinion, since he would have a special law passed to punish the bribe-taker. And he adds: We want a black list to be made out and the names inserted thereon of all the black sheep who allowed themselves to be bribed. This is all very well; but, in my opinion, the machinery which he wishes to be adopted would not be workable. The electoral law, such as it is, will be the proper machinery if he adds therein the offence of taking bribes. He can now refer to subsection (b) of section 84, which I have just read and which provides for the case where a candidate or his agent promises some office or employment to a voter. Why not enact that any person who will ask for any employment by pledging his vote to obtain it will be guilty of bribery and be liable to be punished accordingly? Subsection (c) refers to the giving of money to have some one returned. Usually one gives money to another party; one does not give money to one's self. To give money there must be two parties, the one who gives and the one who receives. Why should the one who receives not be held guilty the same as the one who gives? What is the reason of this distinction? Now, subsection (d) states:

(d.) Every person who, upon or in consequence of any such gift, loan, offer, promise, procurement or agreement, procures or engages, or promises or endeavours to procure the return of any person to serve in the House of Commons, or the vote of any voter at any election.

Why not, here again, add that any person who will connive at such actions will be jointly and severally responsible before the civil and criminal courts for the consequences of his action. Subsection (e) further states:

(e.) Every person who advances or pays, or causes to be paid, any money to or to the use of any other person, with the intent that such money or any part thereof shall be expended in bribery or corrupt practices at any election, or who knowingly pays or causes to be paid, any money to any person in discharge or repayment of any money wholly or in part expended in bribery or corrupt practices at any election.

Why not state that the bribee will be as guilty as the briber? I can see no reason why, and it must be due to a defective original wording. I see no reason why the general election law did not provide for the punishment of the offences of persons allowing themselves to be bribed. Should there be an earnest law to prevent people from allowing themselves to be bribed, the candidates and their agents would be less liable to tempt them, the danger would be less and the snares less numerous. When the voter comes and receives five, ten or twenty dollars; or when he goes out and secretly takes a glass of whisky; or when some one goes to fetch him and drive him to the poll; if he could say within himself: I may be put on the black list, the dishonouring list, fined two hundred or five hundred dollars, or condemned to pay all the expenses of the candidate, he would not so easily expose himself to be bribed. Were the law formal and positive, were the proceedings to reach the punishment simple, it would be the best protection against the candidate and his agents; it would be the surest restraint against the demoralization which they still complain of in certain localities. Section 85 states:

The following persons are also guilty of bribery, and shall be punishable accordingly:—

(a.) Every voter who, before or during any election, directly or indirectly, himself or by any other person on his behalf, receives, agrees or contracts for any money, gift, loan or valuable consideration, office, place or employment, for himself or any other person, for voting or agreeing to vote, or for refraining or agreeing to refrain for voting at any election.

(b.) Every person who, after any election, directly or indirectly, himself or by any other person on his behalf, receive any money or valuable consideration for having voted or refrained from voting, or for having induced any other person to vote or refrain from voting at any election :

And every person so offending is guilty of a misdemeanour, and shall also forfeit the sum of two hundred dollars to any person who sues for the same, with costs.

Why such a distinction? There should be a more explicit section providing for the punishment of the voters who receive money or promises. Why not enact that the voter bribed, either by money or by any other consideration given him for his vote, will be punished the same as the party who plays the part of the briber? Why should the voter who is unwilling to go and vote without being led to the poll in a carriage paid for contrary to law, not be punished? Why should there be a special law close to the electoral law to state what should be stated in that very electoral law. I hope that the hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon) will explain to the committee why he proposed a new system of repression in this case, and why he does not try to attain his object by moving an amendment to the electoral law itself? Once an election is over, if the candidate who practised bribery happens to have a majority of the votes given, his opponents have at their disposal the Controverted Elections Act, which by its wise provisions protects all the interests at stake. He must not lose sight of the fact that under the system provided for in this Bill, the whole strength of parties will be made to bear. As one party is as powerful as the other, what would be the result? Under the Controverted Elections Act the case is laid before an ordinary court, but previous to that, the petitioner has to deposit a sum of a thousand dollars. You have more: Under that law, the petitioner remains responsible for the costs beyond his deposit of a thousand dollars. Not so with this Bill, for it merely states that it will be sufficient for the twenty-five voters to deposit five hundred dollars—that is to say, a contribution of twenty dollars for each—and to file an affidavit, in order to obtain that an inquiry be made, and this statement goes no further than this: namely, that they have good reason to believe that extensive bribery prevailed at the said election. Can you tell me, you, Mr. Chairman, who have had such a large experience, whether, ever since this country exists, there were an election in which the opponents of the returned candidate did not claim that the victory was due solely to the corrupt practices of the successful candidate and his friends? It is even stated beforehand by the newspapers, and editorials are published in which it is stated that if such and such an election be carried by such a candidate, it will be due to a bribery without any precedent in the annals of the past. Therefore, it is perfectly sure and certain that should this Bill pass, you will find twenty-five voters willing to spend twenty dollars each to have an inquiry against the victorious party. Why? Merely in order that a judge of the Superior Court may go in such and such a county and open the most extraordinary inquiry ever witnessed. And at whose expense will such proceedings be carried on? Who will pay the expenses of the staff accompanying the judge? But suppose that obstacle should not stop the judge and he should go in the electoral district where the affidavit requires him to go, what will he do? Will he be satisfied with saying: I will summon ten or twelve witnesses to ascertain the doings, the exploits and deeds, during the last election, of ten other persons, voters in that division? But that is not all: He will be asked to summon a whole parish, or even all the voters of a county. Or rather, he could summon one-half of the population to give evidence against the other half. A party will always find twenty-five friendly voters ready to spend twenty dollars in that way. In opening the proceedings of the court, the judge, I suppose, will say to the twenty-five petitioners: Give me the list of the persons you suspect of having taken bribes at the last election. They will then take the electoral list checked on the eve of the polling day, and if it is the Liberals who petition for the inquiry, they will give the names of all the Conservatives who voted as those of parties having taken bribes. If, on the contrary, it is the Conservatives who petition, they will give the names of the Liberals who voted as those of parties having allowed themselves to be bribed. Provided with this document, the judge sets to work, the short-hand writers likewise. The lawyers and the whole staff of the court enter resolutely in the discharge of their duties, and then the contest begins. All the voters, of one or the other party, are brought before the court of inquiry. They even summon the women, the servants, in short, everybody. No doubt, under such conditions, your deposit of five hundred dollars will soon be exhausted. If the evidence is somewhat elaborate, the mere short-hand writing will absorb more than that amount, and that, in a very short time. When there will be nothing left of the deposit, who will repay to all those citizens, whom you will have disturbed, the losses and expenses which you caused them to incur in order to gratify the revenge of the defeated candidate or his friends? And to think that we, earnest and wise law-makers, would pass such a law, that we would put into the hands of those who are only anxious to take vengeance of a defeat such a means to practise the most invidious persecution, the most abominable tyranny! By such a legislation, we would disquiet the country, and cause peaceful and honest citizens, who are quite willing to be left to their own business, to incur expenses and sustain losses for which the law provides no means to indemnify them. To provide for the case where a voter thinks his neighbour was bribed, you can pass a clear and positive law in order that such a corrupt voter might be brought before a court and punished. That one deserves to be punished, and you will not find us willing to protect him in any way. But when it is proposed to give to twenty-five voters such powerful means as this, to allow them to trouble the country for the mere sake of gratifying their vengeance, their spite, I take no part in that, and I think the House ought to reject such a proposition. There is in the Revised Statute I now hold before me a provision to which I call the attention of the hon. promoter of this Bill. When an election is controverted, the judge hears the witnesses, all the witnesses, and he is then perfectly informed as to all the electoral doings, and he makes a report to the Legislature. Here is an earnest guarantee. The persons guilty, or supposed to be guilty of corrupt practices are mentioned in that report. Under that report proceedings may be taken, and then the incriminated parties receive notice of such proceedings, and they have the guarantee that nothing will be done against their liberty, hastily or inconsiderately. The machinery provided by Parliament is put in motion. That is what is contained in chapter 10 of the Revised Statutes of Canada. It is a wise and logical provision. Let the hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon) refer to chapter 10 of the Revised Statutes and he will find the law I refer to. He will find that the report of the judge who investigates the petition in a controverted election case is but the initial stage of the proceedings, and that Parliament must interfere in order that measures be taken to further continue the investigation upon the corrupt practices pointed out by the judge :

Whenever the House of Commons, by address, represents to the Governor General that a judge in his report on the trial of an election petition under "The Dominion Controverted Election Act" states that corrupt practices have, or that there is reason to believe that corrupt practices have extensively prevailed at the election, or that he is of opinion that the inquiry into the circumstances of the election has been rendered incomplete by the action of any of the parties to the petition, and that further inquiry as to whether corrupt practices have extensively prevailed is desirable,—or whenever the House of Commons by address represents to the Governor General that a petition has been, within sixty days after the publication in the 'Canada Gazette' of the receipt of the return to a writ of election, by the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery (if Parliament is sitting at the expiration of the period of sixty days, or, if Parliament is not then sitting, within fourteen days after the then next meeting of Parliament) presented to the House of Commons, signed by any twenty-five or more electors of the district, stating that no petition charging the existence of corrupt practices has been presented under 'The Dominion Controverted Election Act' and that corrupt practices have, extensively prevailed at the election, and having annexed thereto a solemn declaration under the statute in that behalf, signed by the petitioners, stating that they are such electors, and that the allegations of the petition are true to the best of their knowledge, and belief,—and when the House of Commons, by such address, prays the Governor General to cause inquiry to be made under this Act by one or more judges of the Supreme Court of Canada, or by one or more judges competent under 'The Dominion Controverted Elections Act,' to try an election petition in the province within which the district in question is situate, or by one or more persons named in such address,—such persons being county court judges, or being barristers-at-law or advocates of not less than seven years standing, and not holding any office or place of profit under the Crown,—the Governor General may appoint one or more of such judges or such person or persons, as the case may be, to be a commissioner or commissioners for the purpose of making inquiry into the existence of such corrupt practices; and if any of the commissioners so appointed die, resign or become incapable to act, the surviving or continuing commissioners or commissioner may act in such inquiry as if they or he had been solely appointed to be commissioners of a commissioner for the purpose of such inquiry; and all the provisions of this Act concerning the commissioners appointed to make any such inquiry, shall be taken to apply to such surviving or continuing commissioners or commissioner, and in case a sole commissioner is originally appointed, then to such sole commissioner.

Thus the Legislature, in its wisdom, has already provided for the case. Now twenty-five voters may, by petition, apply to Parliament, if the election is not controverted or if it is controverted, ask for a report of the judge, stating whether there was extensive bribery. Parliament, in its discretion, may at once require such an inquiry. Would my hon. friend, the member for Albert (Mr. Weldon) tell us why this remedy is no good, in what respect this law is wrong and inadequate? I particularly call his attention to this; no doubt he understands me. We have now the machinery he asks for, and a far better one than the one he proposes. We have a machinery which gives us a guarantee of the free and well-informed expression of the will of the Legislature. Is there a government in this the age where the liberty of the press disseminates with such rapidity the notions of the true and just; is there a government which, in the face of a petition signed by twenty-five voters, or a report of the judge, would withhold the appointment of the commissioner provided for by the Act? I say no. I say that whatever party that happened to be in power would hasten to comply with the demand and grant the inquiry. I think no inquiry was ever asked for, and therefore none was refused. If we were proceeding under chapter 10 of the Statutes of Canada. twenty-five voters would look at it twice before applying to Parliament under the responsibility of their signatures; they would only take action when the facts on which they would rely would be such as to call for a serious consideration and put into motion the machinery provided by law. When the commissioners are appointed under this chapter 10, they are sworn, and they appoint secretaries, copying clerks, messengers and all the officers deemed necessary by the Minister of Justice. Now, Mr. Chairman, the objection raised by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) is answered, that is to say, the officers are appointed by the Minister of Justice and paid by the Parliament of Canada. We have, therefore, in this a machinery perfectly workable. The love of justice is a nice thing, but should one be actuated by it as much as the promoter of this Bill, the difficulty will present itself when the $500 will be exhausted. However much they may love justice, very few people will be willing to take out of their pockets five hundred additional dollars to allow the proceedings of this court to be continued, and should money be wanting, the court will stop its proceedings. We would have lost our time, and caused to be lost the time of those who would have been accused, may be very unjustly. While under the law I have quoted, the machinery is established and is put in motion by money taken out of the Federal revenue. That law also provides for the proceedings of the commissioners, for the adjournment of sittings. The duties of the commissioners are stated therein. Reference to previous elections is allowed. A report is made to the Governor General, which is brought before Parliament. The commissioners are given powers to summon and swear witnesses. It provides also for what will be done in case witnesses should be interested, and for the punishment of uncomplying witnesses. It equally provides for the remuneration of witnesses, the payment of the necessary expenses of the commissioners and their protection. It also provides for the case when the report of the commissioners states that some one was guilty of corrupt practices. Thus this law, long and exhaustively discussed, when it was originally passed, is now part of our Revised Statutes, after having been revised by the law officers and the judges appointed to consolidate the statutes. Well, why should not that law be put into operation? The object of my hon. friend from Albert (Mr. Weldon) is commendable; we are all willing to admit that he is anxious for the country's welfare—for electoral purity. We are anxious for the same, just as he is. But, no doubt, he wishes to gain his purposes. To succeed in this, two things are necessary. First, a law which would state that the bribe-taker is as guilty as the bribe-giver; and, in the second place, when an election is not controverted, then we should apply chapter 10 I have quoted, and request an inquiry. Not an 'ex parte' inquiry, offering no protection and at the mere request of twenty-five voters—who can always be found, even though there may be no proper case—but at the request of Parliament, when twenty-five voters will set forth before it facts which will warrant it making the necessary expenses to put in operation the law enacted in chapter 10 of the Revised Statutes of Canada. My object is certainly not, Mr. Chairman, to oppose the principle of the Bill introduced by the hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon). I congratulate him, on the contrary, upon having introduced his Bill again this year. I congratulate him upon his tenacity. But light comes out of the clashing of opinions, and I think the time has come to amend the present law so as to state that the bribe-taker is as guilty as the bribe-giver, and that both may be put on the black, dishonouring list. We will have to amend that law as soon as possible, and we will then be able to more easily apply chapter 10 of the Revised Statutes, which I have just quoted. I move that section 2 be amended by striking off after the word "stating" in the fifth line, all the words up to the word "prevailed" in the seventh line, and substituting therefor the following words: "in detail the cases of bribery that took place."

Mr. DUPONT. (Translation.) We are not yet at section 2: we are only on section 1.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Denison). Section 1 has been carried. The discussion is now on section 2.

Mr. JEANNOTTE. (Translation.) The section, as worded, states that it will be sufficient for the petitioners to state that they have reason to believe that bribery prevailed. By my amendment, I want the petitioners to give an adequate indication of the cases of bribery they allege to have taken place. That is my object, and I think that, by such an amendment, a great many cases of evident persecution will be removed and a great many citizens prevented from being brought before the court through the jealousy of those who will arraign them before it. Let us compel the petitioners to give particulars, to give the names of those who received money, and by so doing we will save much useless expenses and prevent many people from being troubled without any necessity. For instance, let them be compelled to say: There is such and such an act of bribery done by so and so; we submit them to the court. I will add a few words to the observations made by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot). I do not intend to repeat what he stated; he stated it too well for my taking such a liberty, but I think he did not complete his remarks on one point. I suppose the inquiry is opened. The deposit of $500 is exhausted. I think the court, in such a case, will be utterly unable to continue its proceedings, for want of money. In the case of an interruption of such proceedings, all the parties wrongly accused by false witnesses will have no opportunity to defend themselves. I would like to know whether the judge, in such a case, will be empowered to make a report? If not, those parties, injured in their honour, as they will appear guilty of corrupt practices, will publicly lie under such grave charges without any opportunity being given them to disprove by contradictory evidence these very charges. We heard before now of innocent people accused, and even sentenced, upon false evidence. It is also stated that the evidence will be taken down in short-hand writing. Well, I can assure you, Mr. Chairman, that the court will not have been sitting two days when the $500 deposit will be expended to pay for the mere stenography. Lawyers know what a cost stenography is. Very often the costs of stenography amount to $500. And should this Bill pass into law and be carried out, the inquiry would not only last two days, but even a year, or at least six months. You can see that the $500 would soon be eaten up and that such a law would only be a dead letter. Under it, it would be impossible to prevent, or even discover, any case of bribery. There are counties where there are over five thousand voters. It might very well happen that there five hundred voters should be accused. Those five hundred accused persons will defend themselves, for it seems to me each one of them will have a right to be heard, to cross-examine the witnesses, in order to show that their allegations are false. The hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot) referred to the costs which such a court will entail. And he was right, for those costs will be enormous. What will be left of the deposit after the court will have sat a day or two, even supposing that the judge and clerk be paid by the Government, and the audience chamber supplied and heated by the Government? I say that within two or three days the $500 will be taken for the payment of the sole stenographers. Here is an illustration which shows that I am not exaggerating. Recently, I had a case in the Superior Court in Montreal. We began to take the evidence at 10 a.m., and closed at 4 p.m. Well, the cost of stenography amounted to $253 for my witnesses only. The costs of the witnesses on the other side were no less than $150. With a prospect of such costs, I ask how we could pass such a Bill without providing for the payment of all expenses to be incurred? The lawyers will also have to be paid. When people complain that law costs are high, it is not the lawyers who receive the largest pay; it is the stenographers. Were I counsel or legal adviser in a case raised under this law, I would advise my clients to protract the examination of witnesses, so as to at once exhaust the deposit and thereby prevent any evidence. Those who will have been unjustly accused, an honest man, for instance, who will be charged with having received a dollar or two for his vote, will be at the mercy of any perjurer. False witnesses will be brought who will swear to that effect, but that honest man will not be able to defend himself by showing that he is the victim of a perjurer, for the court seeing that the deposit is exhausted will decline to continue its proceedings. Notwithstanding the statement of some hon. members that people will be found liberal enough to take money out of their pockets for the mere purpose of purifying the political atmosphere, I think that not a single individual will be found to do that. For want of funds, innocent people will lie under charges without having any opportunity to disprove them, to redeem their exposed honour and put themselves before the public in the position of respectable men and men of integrity. Therefore, it is asking for an unreasonable thing, it is asking for a thing which no man capable of reasoning can wish for or desire. I wonder why the promoter of this Bill wishes the evidence to be taken down in stenography when he states further on that there will be no appeal. If there is to be no appeal, there is no necessity for taking down the evidence in stenography. It seems to me this is a means devised to prevent such a court from ever existing, or if it ever exists, it will only exist for a day or two. But I contend that you have no right to suppress the appeal. If this legislation should be passed, the proceedings under it will be of the nature of actions 'qui tam.' Now, this Parliament cannot prevent an appeal. The use of stenography, should the appeal, against all probability, be suppressed, will therefore be for the mere sake of keeping a record which will serve to dishonour a man convicted, through false witnesses, of corrupt practices. His family will be dishonoured and his children may be told later on, thanks to such a record kept by means of the stenography: Your father committed such and such an act of bribery and was visited with such and such a punishment for that. If that is the object, I can only condemn it with all my might. Let it be stated at least that an appeal will lie. I know of no court which will not allow an appeal in such a case. Here is a man deemed honest and upright up to the age of fifty years who might be deprived of his liberty, deprived of his franchise, liberty and franchise which are so dear to a citizen as the right to trade or to exercise any industry. Well, that man will be deprived of his liberty; his name will be stricken off the list of voters, and why? because he will be told: You have done a reprehensible action. That man unjustly condemned will have no right to apply to a court for his protection. But there is more than that: Under this Bill, it is not the judge who conducts the inquiry who will pass sentence, who will decide. He will merely make a report of the inquiry to the Secretary of State and the latter will write to the revising officer: Strike off such and such a name from the list. Well, Mr. Chairman, I am of the opinion that nothing but the judgment of a court can prevent a voter from being placed on the list of voters. Section 13 provides that the judge who conducts the inquiry will pass no sentence, but make his report to the Secretary of State, and the latter, without any authorization, writes to the revising officer: Strike off such and such a man from the list of voters. Under what right can he do that? Such a provision appears to me to be preposterous, if I may be allowed to use the word.

Mr. WELDON. I rise to a point of order. The hon. gentleman is not discussing the clause of the Bill that is before the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Denison). I hope the hon. gentleman will confine his discussion to the clause before the committee.

Mr. JEANNOTTE. I am sorry the hon. gentleman does not like what I am saying. If he will read section 13 in French he will understand that I am at the Bill. (Translation.) Mr. Chairman, I was stating that section 13 contained an extraordinary provision. There are other sections as astonishing as that one; I will refer to them later on. Section 13 is so extraordinary that I am not surprised at the promoter of the Bill requesting my being called to order, because what I state does not suit him. I could say it in English, but he understands French and can follow the observations I have to make. I therefore come back to that section 13, and I say that all the judge will have to do will be to conduct the inquiry and point out the cases of bribery; he will deliver no judgment, but merely make a report to the Secretary of State. Now, I ask again on what authority will the latter remove from the list of voters the names of such persons? He has not such a right. Nothing but a court can do that. It will not be the judge who conducts the inquiry who will be the judge, it will be the Secretary of State, who will not know what happened and will not take the trouble to read a voluminous evidence, who will be called upon to state that such and such a name be stricken off the list, and that without any appeal. The persons whose names will thus be removed will have no right to appeal from the decision of the Secretary of State.

Mr. WELDON. I would like your ruling, Mr. Chairman. The hon. member is discussing the 19th section of the Bill, while the section before the House is the second.

Mr. JEANNOTTE. Section No. 2 explains the others.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Denison). If the hon. member refers to the other sections by way of illustration, that is allowable, but otherwise he should confine himself to the section before the committee.

Mr. JEANNOTTE. My amendment is an amendment to section 2, but in order to explain it I must refer to the other sections to prove that the amendment is good and should be adopted. (Translation.) I see that the promoter of this Bill does not like to have his Bill discussed. When we have before us a new and arbitrary law, I think we have a right to discuss it in full. Should this Bill pass, in foreign countries Canada would be reported as such a corrupt country that we have to go back to the old laws of the Inquisition. It is painful even to have to discuss such a Bill. What my amendment aims at, is that the twenty-five voters, or one of them, should have to give the particulars of the cases of bribery they know of or which they believe to have taken place, in order that if I should be accused, I should know the charge. Let us take the particular case of a parish in my county—because it is above all the county where there is no bribery—the judge goes into the parish of Mascouche, where there are 450 voters. We receive notice that the judge will arrive on the 15th June in the village to make an inquiry with respect to an election held in the month of April. I have no reason to know whether I will be accused, my neighbour likewise. How could we meet the charge? The judge will not come too early in the morning, so that his arrival will only be known in the evening. He will be accompanied by his clerk, his lackey, his crier, all his people; and should there be English-speaking people who do not understand French, it will be necessary to have an English crier, as well as an English stenographer; perhaps might we dispense with the English crier; the petition will have to be read. If the petitioners should not be there, will he proceed? Section 2 of the Bill does not state that the petitioners will have to be there, they are no longer petitioners. The moment the inquiry is ordered, the judge takes upon himself to make it. But suppose there are five petitioners present; the court is opened and no one proceeds; the judge will ask them: Gentlemen, what have you to say? And they will answer, every one of them: I have nothing to say, my neighbour requested me to sign this petition and I have signed it. It will often happen that the most interested party will not be there, because he will be looked at with scorn and as a persecutor of honest people. But I suppose that the interested party should be there; he addresses the judge and says: I declare that I was told by Peter, John and James that Messrs. So-and-So received money for their votes. He gives the names and addresses. But the judge has no time to summon these witnesses; he adjourns the court for a fortnight, and goes back home. Who will pay those expenses? Will they be taken out of the five hundred dollars? He comes back after a fortnight, begins the inquiry, and finds nothing. After two days of inquiry, will the petitioners stop there? Surely no, they are bent on persecuting twenty-five or thirty persons; they will continue. Of the voters of Mascouche, there are at least twenty-five who live in Montreal. These people will be summoned to be examined. The Bill provides that their travelling expenses shall be paid before they leave Montreal. They go to the place and are examined. They may possibly not be ready to answer, or not be ready to make a counter-evidence, for they had no intimation that they would be summoned before a court of inquiry. They had no intimation that they would be brought as criminals are, before an ordinary court. But there is something even more serious than this. Will the charges be made public before the judge opens the court? If they are, people could prepare themselves to meet them. But nothing whatever empowers the judge to make them known to any one. He has no right to do it, for he has no power to that effect. Even though he would be willing to do it, he could not, since he himself is not aware of the names of the incriminated parties. As I have been a candidate, and as I might still be one, it might very well happen that my opponents would merely try to ruin me, and this Bill would be a terrible instrument in the hands of the opponents of any candidate. The twenty-five voters whom I mentioned a moment ago will be summoned to answer to what? They do not know. It might very well happen that there should be no evidence against any of them. They will not even know what is the matter, for there is no reason why they should know it. Why compel them to thus go from Montreal to a neighbouring county? When one is summoned before a court, he is told why; he is told: You are to appear for such and such a cause, on such and such a day, at such and such an hour. The writ of summons must be properly specified, in order that one may know what he is about. A party summoned before a mere police court must be given the reason for such summons. No court, no judge, can pass sentence, if there is no formal and direct indictment filed. Before a criminal court, for instance, the indictment must be specified. The reasons must be stated why any individual is dragged before such criminal court. And even should the accused be the most miserable wretch, he cannot be sentenced unless he is put on trial. If you summon a party before a civil court in a trifling suit for one dollar, you must file a declaration and an account of the amount due. Here it is not a dollar that is at stake, but the liberty of a citizen, the interest at stake is much more momentous than an account of twenty-five cents. It is the liberty of an individual, the honour of families which they try to persecute. Cases in which you can leave on the memory of a citizen a stain which will reflect on his children, on his own family, and every safeguard is neglected.

Mr. WELDON. I must ask for a ruling on the relevancy of this discussion. The hon. gentleman is ranging over sections 7, 8, 9 and 10, discussing the procedure under the Bill at great length. I must ask you to rule, otherwise the hon. gentleman may go ransacking over the whole field of politics.

Mr. AMYOT. Before you rule, Mr. Chairman, I may inform my hon. friend that he is altogether astray as to the fact. The hon. member for L'Assomption (Mr. Jeannotte) has never been so much at the point as he is now.

Mr. JEANNOTTE. I am still at the second section. If I could speak in English, I would convince the promoter of the Bill that I am not past half of the second section.

Mr. WELDON. The hon. member is not dealing frankly with the House. He knows that he was not dealing with the second section and the amendment moved to the second section.

Mr. AMYOT. On the point of order, I beg to remind the hon. gentleman that he has not only questioned the propriety of what my hon. friend has said in French, but what I have said in English. I told him most distinctly that the hon. member for L'Assomption was never so much at the point as when he was interrupted by the question of order. He was defending his amendment. He said that details should be given of the act of corruption. If a man sues another for a debt of 25 cents, he is bound to give all the details, while if the honour of a citizen is at stake, you do not ask for an affidavit giving any detail. That is what the hon. member is explaining, and I am sorry the hon. mover of the Bill does not want him to explain it, and when I took the trouble of standing up and telling him in English that he was speaking to the point he might have done me the compliment of taking my word for it.

Mr. WELDON. I do the hon. member the compliment of taking his word so far as it applies to the statement of the hon. member for L'Assomption at the last stage; but generally he was not dealing with the second section. I think that after we have found it our duty three times to ask for the ruling of the Chair, it is only fair that the hon. member should keep himself to the section before the committee.

Mr. JEANNOTTE. Even if the ruling were three, or four, or five times against me, and I was in order, I would continue to speak. (Translation.) I was stating, Mr. Chairman, when I was interrupted by the question of order, that in a miserable suit for 25 cents, the account claimed must be filed and the demand made in a specific way. In a mere case before a police court, the accused person must be made known and informed of the kind and very words of the indictment. Take a small case in which they have to deal with a man who insults a passer-by, the accused person must be informed of what he is charged, before being brought before the court. The indictment must be specified, and include every particular. It must be served at least twenty-four hours beforehand. Here there is no such formalities. Indeed, I wonder how a man of the position of the hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon) can bring such a Bill before this House. Any individual fined twenty-five cents may appeal from such a sentence to a higher court; he can even go up to the Court of Queen's Bench. Here, there is no appeal whatever. If this Bill is to pass, the defendant ought to have at least before him a detailed indictment and he should also be granted an appeal. If the charge is not particularized, how will you lodge an appeal before a higher court to obtain a redress against a decision unjustly condemning the voter put on trial, a decision which may throw a stain upon his honour and deprive him of his political liberty. This legislation is without any of its kind, it is contrary to natural law; it is without any precedent, and never was such a law seen either in the civil or criminal law. It is contrary to natural law. Any reasonable legislation must be founded on natural law, and natural law wants you to deal with others as you would like to be dealt with by others. If such is the case, I will ask the hon. member for Albert whether he had in mind this immutable principle: Do not do unto others what you would not like others to do unto you. If this Bill is not founded on natural law, I say it is but an instrument of persecution put into the hands of those who seek to injure their fellow-creatures. I now come to my amendment. It is very short and it is more important than the rest of the Bill. It includes in a line about the whole object of our wishes, that is to say, the greatest purity at elections. Purity above all, as it existed in olden times in the Garden of Eden, without no more bad intentions than when Adam chose his wife. I am opposed to bribery in principle and by interest, because I think that a parliament elected without any cabal, without any clandestine practices, is the only one that can make perfect laws. I am also opposed to bribery, because, should I intend to be a candidate, which might happen, I want to be returned without spending a single dollar, and because I wish that others should be dealt with as I would like myself to be dealt with. I am anxious that the Liberals who are now in this House should come back here, and that honest citizens be not exposed to tyrannical prosecutions which are often the result of conflicting political opinions. It is, however, what would happen if we should pass this Bill. As stated a moment ago by the hon. member for Bellechasse, political passions agitate the people. During the fifteen days immediately following an election, how many neighbours are there who smile to each other? They hardly can meet on the way without coming to blows. Relatives themselves are sulky with each other for weeks and months. Well, with a law such as this, in a parish where both parties are about equally divided, the relations and friends are divided, not a word passes between brothers, and I will go further and say—although I can be told that I have no personal experience as to that, but I have it by others—that sometimes husband and wife are divided. I say it is a preposterous law; it will place into the hands of an ill-humoured person a sharp instrument which will do harm to himself and to others. I again come to my amendment. I forgot speaking of the last part of it. I say that a particularized statement of the acts of bribery extensively practised at an election ought to be furnished. I mean to say that a few solitary acts of bribery should not be sufficient to warrant the opening of such an inquiry, in order that any one who signs the petition should know that he must give an affidavit in connection with such obvious facts that he is justifiable, that he has reason to believe that bribery was practised. Otherwise, with a mere intention of injuring or annoying a neighbour, one would give an affidavit and any one doing this would, in such a case, be liable to an action for damages. One has no right to ruin the name and character of a neighbour without a probable cause. That is held by all our courts. In moving this amendment, I, therefore, wish to protect the honest voter; and if the person who did the petitioning does not show that he was right in doing it, he will be liable to an action for damages. I even think that the amendment should have gone further. Section 2 states: twenty-five qualified electors; but the Bill goes further, for all the sections are connected together, and section 11 states that the mere presentation of the petition shall be a 'prima facie' evidence.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. (Translation.) I must remind the hon. member that he has no right to discuss any other section than the one under discussion; if the hon. gentleman intended to discuss the general provisions of the Bill, he ought to have done that before the second reading was allowed.

Mr. JEANNOTTE. (Translation.) I am not discussing section 11; I only refer to it because it is closely connected with section 2 and in order to come to my amendment. It is to show that the amendment is reasonable and founded on common sense. I was saying that twenty-five voters qualified as such draw up a petition which, under this Bill, is evidence by itself. I think I have a right to oppose such a provision. Of the twenty-five voters who signed the petition, I suppose two or three should die in the interval between its presentation to the judge and the opening of the inquiry. I will have no right to cause the proceedings to be stopped, no right to complain of it because it is evidence by itself! Who will replace these two or three dead petitioners? It is stated nowhere. In a civil suit, when the plaintiff dies, all the proceedings are stopped; here it is the contrary. This legislation, I must repeat, is contrary to common sense, contrary to civil law, contrary to natural law, and lastly, contrary to criminal law. What is left to warrant us in inserting such a law in our statutes, law which would have us passed for men not knowing what they did. It is not that I fear that such an inquiry should be made in my county, Mr. Chairman. I oppose this legislation because I think it is unjust and unreasonable and also because, in my opinion, it would be unworkable. My opposition has for its object to prevent the adoption of an impossible and tyrannical law. Should such a law be made known across the Atlantic, what would they think of us? Should it, for instance, go to France, what would they say there? They would surely say: Here is Canada going back to five centuries ago. We, Frenchmen, have suppressed every law against the liberty of the citizen, we have established and proclaimed the great principle of equality and fraternity; and here they are in Canada, a country peopled with our descendants, going back to the trammels of olden times deprived of the lights of civilization. Who knows whether that will not prevent us from having the proposed treaty of commerce between France and Canada, for it might happen that Frenchmen, seeing we are such retrogressive people, would not have it any more. In making such an opposition to this Bill, I have but one object in view, that is the good of my fellow countrymen, the good of my country. I wish to protect the good name of Canada in foreign countries, for there they might think that we are a corrupt people to the core. The carrying out of this Bill would set families at variance and cause too large expenses for those who would defend themselves. Wishing for the good of my country, of my fellow citizens, I say that Parliament ought not to pass such a Bill. Had the promoter of this Bill taken counsel of uninterested parties, had he taken counsel of people free from political dependence of members who were returned by acclamation, for instance, he would have been told that his Bill was ill-starred. It is born not likely to live. After recess, I hope the hon. member will ponder, and that this Bill will no more come before this House. Let my hon. friend take counsel of the very people of this city and they will all tell him that the country wants no such legislation, that it will only be an instrument put into the hands of political opponents to ruin those whom they would strike at in their desire for revenge. To pass this Bill would be to put a dangerous weapon in the hands of people who would use it to gratify their hatred. It seems to me that I only claim a very reasonable thing, that which is included in my amendment. Besides, have we not enough guarantee in the Controverted Elections Act? Are not the provisions of that Act calculated to prevent bribery and punish it? In protested election trials held in Montreal, one voter of Soulanges County and two voters of another county were disqualified for seven years, and we had not such a legislation to persecute Messrs. So and So. At Montreal, one voter was disqualified, and what happened next? The Court of Appeal, composed of five judges, held that the liberty of a citizen was too valuable to be forfeited in this way, the condemned man was given back his franchise, he was cleared of the disgrace they wanted to inflict upon him, and he now enjoys as formerly his rights as a citizen and a voter. I, therefore, say that under the present law, we have almost all the means required to prevent bribery. But there is still something wanting in the present law, and which the hon. promoter of this Bill might have provided for. The hon. member for Bellechasse suggested several changes. We might still be more definite and enact that any candidate who, by himself or his agents, shall canvass the voters from door to door, will be considered as practising bribery and liable to the penalty imposed by the Statutes. By preventing canvassing from door to door, we would do away with any bribery. It is not at public meetings of voters, when we boast of the great services rendered to the country, when we boast of the good we were unable to do, the good measure we proposed, of the bad ones we prevented; it is not then that bribery is practised, and the voters know we are not going before them to slight ourselves. They now read the papers and are well informed as to politics. In parishes where formerly a single paper was received, they now receive ten, and even more. In the county of L'Assomption, a single parish now receives weekly 50 copies of newspapers. So that the voters are now aware of the good we do them or which we intend to do them. In moving this amendment—and the hon. promoter of this Bill knows it well, since he smiles at me—I wish to protect the honour of families and the liberty of the citizen. When I say the honour of families, I might as well say that I protect the honour of a parish, the honour of a county, of a province, of the whole Dominion. I wish to deprive the evil-doers of the means of tarnishing the reputation of an honest man, of a respectable family. Let us try to protect ourselves as much as possible. Let the outside parties ruin themselves if they like; but let us protect ourselves. Bribery, in my opinion, is less than it was 20 years ago. The supporters of this Bill appear to me to be like the people who ask for the prohibition of intoxicating liquors in the interest of temperance. Everyone must admit that nine-tenths of the people drink less now than formerly. Yet there are hon. members of this House who would have it believed in foreign countries that we are a lot of drunkards. I am opposed to any law that tends to lessen the good name of Canada in foreign countries. We must have laws that tend to show them, on the contrary, that we are a country inhabited by sober, honest, intelligent and law-abiding people.

Committee rose, and it being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

BRIBERY AND DISFRANCHISEMENT.

House again resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. JEANNOTTE. (Translation.) When you left the Chair, Mr. Chairman, I was saying that we ought to try and make laws that had for their object to show to the foreign countries that we were a land inhabited by honest, sober, intelligent and law-abiding citizens. I consider Parliament as a great family. Just as in a good family, the wrong that may be done, the divisions that may exist, are held secret so as to conceal the uneasiness of father, mother and children. So it is with the great Canadian family. Should there be bribery, our national interest, in the mind of those who have some patriotism—and I think we all of us have some—would lead us not to enrich our statutes with laws which, in the eyes of strangers, would be calculated to make it believe that we are not a people of goods morals. Proceeding from that principle, I can now come directly to my amendment. But before coming to it I will again refer to the petition. Section 2 of the Bill reads as follows :—

Whenever, within sixty days after the day on which an election is held under The Dominion Elections Act, a petition in the form or to the effect of Schedule A to this Act has been presented to the court, signed by five or more voters of an electoral district (the postal address of each voter signing the same being added to his name) stating that bribery has extensively prevailed at the election, and having annexed thereto an affidavit or affidavits in the form or to the effect set out in Schedule B to this Act, sworn by all the petitioners, stating that they are such voters, and that the allegations of the petition are true, to the best of their knowledge and belief, the court shall within thirty days assign one of its judges for the purpose of making inquiry under this Act.

This section, in the French version of the Bill, only requires the petition to be signed by five voters, but the promoter of the Bill says it is twenty-five. I stated before recess that such a petition should only be warranted by an extensive bribery. It was in order to protect those who would be dragged before the court of inquiry. I also stated that should the complainants not give a sufficient and reasonable cause for such an information, the parties summoned would have an action for damages against them. In the case of all such petitions, the complainant is carefully requested to particularize the cases of bribery upon which the inquiry will have to bear. In municipal affairs, I myself had occasion to ask for inquiries, and each time I was required to mention particular cases of boodling, because an inquiry could not be granted upon general cases. Before the legislatures, such inquiries are never granted unless special cases are furnished. Under this Bill, the twenty-five voters, who will petition for an inquiry will not be bound to this formality sanctioned till now by justice and jurisprudence. I would like to be given a single instance where an inquiry was granted in a manner proposed by this Bill. These twenty-five voters will give an affidavit which means nothing. It would be just as well not to give any. They will give an affidavit stating that they have reason to believe that the election was carried through bribery. After an election, the defeated party always complains of bribery. The most irrefragable election is said to have been carried by bribery. It often happens that we are not satisfied as to such a fact, but we intend to cheer up the defeated party. And they would have the House to authorize the making of an inquiry without any case of bribery being specified. Under the Bill introduced last year the complaint had to be laid before the Governor General in Council. I would rather have that, inasmuch as the Governor General in Council would better see whether there is reason to grant an inquiry. But this new Bill is imperative; the judge will be bound to make the inquiry. Provided that petition be made within sixty days, and the money deposited, he will not be allowed to ascertain whether there are sufficient reasons to decline or grant it. Where will this deposit be made? Will it be into the hands of the judge? Will it be into the hands of the opposite party? Who will have the care of the $500, which the petitioners are bound to deposit? We do not know. Very likely the petitioners will never make any deposit whatever. I have some further observations to make with respect to another question, but one which is connected with section 2. I suppose the case of a protest in which the disqualification of the successful candidate will even be asked for. The successful candidate will have to meet this protest, and to follow the inquiry made under this Bill. Thus he will have two cases on hand. And it is known before hand that the protest of an election is ruinous for any and each party. Now, what will happen? It is shown by experience. How many cases of bribery were found in any protest? Hardly ten, in an average. If ten proven cases of bribery form the average why have it believed that people only carry their elections through bribery? If, in such cases of protested elections, with the co-operation of skilful lawyers, they could only come to an average of ten proven cases in each case, how is it that, after being for such a long time in our statutes a special law punishing such cases, we should not have come to a different result? It is because bribery is not as general as they say. Then, how is it that they should now come with a Bill tending to have it believed that extensive bribery at elections prevails in this country, that a great many voters are corrupt? The mere introduction of this Bill is almost an insult thrown at the electorate. Had protested elections revealed the fact that there was extensive bribery, that it was enormously practiced, so to say, I would be willing to admit with the hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon) that he was perhaps justifiable in coming here with such a Bill. But the contrary is true, and it cannot be denied that elections are now carried on with less bribery than ever. Some few cases may sometimes happen, yet no one ever thought of introducing such a legislation as this on account of these few cases. The Blake law, which has now been in our statute for several years, and which provides, to a certain extent, for the cases aimed at by this Bill, was never put into practice; it has not yet been used. Whoever presented a petition asking for an inquiry under that Blake law, in order to find out cases of bribery? Now, I say that the Bill now proposed will not be more dangerous, will not be more prejudicial to the bribe-givers and bribe-takers. If it should only be to fill our statutes that they wish such a Bill to be passed, it is not worth devoting so much time on it. We are earnest law-makers, and we must see to the prosperity of the country. Now, in order to reach that end we must be very careful about the laws we pass. If we should pass a law to improve the people, and it should have quite a different result, we would be guilty to a large extent. Now, this Bill will have for its result to make people less good in future than they were in the past, for it will deprive parties of the harmony and peace they need to be happy, by perpetrating political enmities. If this law is likely to cause more harm than good, it seems to me we ought not to pass it. When, last year, I opposed a similar Bill, I stated: You will not reach the end desired by every voter, by all people, because it is unworkable. The House sided with me. I think the Bill of last year, compared with this Bill, was the better of the two. This Bill is modelled on the one rejected by this House; it is grafted on a dying one, and it cannot, in my opinion, have more life and vigour for all that. It should not be passed by this House, composed, as it is, of intelligent men. The expenses thrown on those who, indicted before this court of inquiry, will have to defend themselves, must be taken into consideration. In order to show that they were right in asking for such an inquiry, the petitioners will address themselves to people who cannot afford to make such expenses. They will do their utmost to cause to be convicted of an offence, the voter unable, through want of means, to prove his innocence. The first party who will be summoned before the court will be the voter. Appearing before the judge he will be compelled to state his own turpitude in a penal action. The accused party has a right to be heard in his defence, but here he will be compelled to state the offences he committed, to state what he received. How will you get out of it if the indicted party should be unwilling to state that he was bribed? An unknown man will come and say that such a voter was bribed, and this voter will have but his own evidence to prove his innocence. The former individual, perhaps a perjurer, will be known to no one, neither to the judge nor to any other. What will the judge do? They cannot discredit his evidence, for he is unknown. They cannot say he perjured himself; he is unknown. They brought him from foreign parts just because he is unknown to all. We know that that frequently happens in protested elections. What will the judge do, then? But let it not be forgotten that the judge only conducts the inquiry; he has no right to decide. That is the marvel of this Bill. The officer presiding over the court has no right to decide. What will he do?

An hon. MEMBER. (Translation.) The inquiry.

Mr. JEANNOTTE. (Translation.) Yes, he will make the inquiry, and send a list of the incriminated parties to the Secretary of State. Has the Secretary of State any right to decide? None whatever. What could he do? Nothing. We know it is contrary to the constitution; a Minister cannot decide in judicial matters. It is the judge who ought to decide whether the indicted parties are guilty or not. Suppose I am summoned before the commissioner and charged with having sold my vote for two dollars. The Government in power happens to be Liberal, and it is the Secretary of State of that Government who, practically, will decide my case, he who is interested in having me thrown out in order that a Liberal candidate be returned in my stead. And we will be told that there are no party politics, no party spirit. But has the Secretary of State any right to interfere? He is, however, interested in deciding that twenty-five Conservatives should be stricken off the list, as the majority is but twenty-five in that particular county. If I quote this fact, it is to show the absurdity of the Bill. It is really astonishing that a professor of law in a university should be the author of such a Bill. I referred before recess to the question, momentous in my opinion, of the good name of the Canadian people in foreign countries. Has an Englishman in England ever thought of introducing such a Bill? We know, however, what their expenses amount to at election times there. If they do wrong, they do not state it in a statute to be cast all over the world. Are the people better in the United States than here? Have they such laws in their statutes? No; they protect themselves. Hear the Americans speaking of themselves: they set up as the most intelligent and purest people in the whole world. Do they ever speak of bribery? Never. And the French people; go and tell them that they are a corrupt people. They will tell you that they carry on their elections with the greatest possible purity. I am too much devoted to our national honour to be willing to pass such a Bill. We have laws of our own relating to the carrying on and protesting of our elections. They are such as to enable us to say to the outside world that we are business men, but that, should anything wrong happen, we have the means to remedy it, just as we have laws to protect ourselves against thieves. They do not mean that we are thieves, but only that we can protect honest people against dishonest people. I do not intend to detain the House any longer.

Mr. RINFRET. (Translation.) Would the hon. member be kind enough to explain his amendment, before taking his seat?

Mr. JEANNOTTE. (Translation.) It is to that I wish to come. My amendment is very short; it has for its object to protect the families, parishes and counties. I will not be told that the investigation of cases of bribery is not as serious a matter as the protest of an election. In protested election cases there must be a bill of particulars. The particulars of each case must be given as well as the names of the bribers. We are not allowed by the court to get out of that. Well, I would also have a bill of particulars in such inquiries. The question is not whether Messrs. So and So received 25 cents for their vote; it is a question as to the good name of a whole electoral division, which selected a man whom it trusted, since it gave him a majority. The question is whether honest voters are liable to be disqualified. When so much care is taken in controverted election cases to prove the cases of bribery, to show that an election ought to be voided, when so much care is taken to ascertain whether the candidates should be disqualified, how is it that so little care is taken in this case? Why not require particulars? Why empower twenty-five voters to merely say: 'The election, in our opinion, was carried by bribery, and make that sufficient for the making of an inquiry, without the least particular being given, without the judge being put in a position to know what the evidence will be about, without giving him any means whatever to find out the least case of bribery. How is it that a professor of law could frame such a Bill? As I stated before recess, when an election is over, the defeated voters think they only lost it through bribery. No judge, no magistrate, would proceed for five minutes on an information laid up in such general and vague words. The indicted party may say: What am I charged with, why do you bring me before this court? Why an inquiry against me? What reasons have you, why do you summon me here? Tell it to me and I will be ready to meet your charge. In this Bill, every notion of justice acknowledged elsewhere has been set aside. Since Canada makes her own laws, never was such a Bill proposed. Never were honest citizens indicted like criminals before a court with less unceremoniousness. I cannot conceive how a professor of law can teach such principles in the chair of a university. It is a subversion of all the notions of right and justice. Never to my knowledge—it is true I am not very old and others are much older than I am—never have I seen such a proposition. When there is no precedent for such a measure, when no court of justice would enforce such a law, should Parliament persist in passing it. I must ask: What have we come to? Are we such disgraced people that we should be treated with less consideration than thieves, for thieves are told at least why they are arrested and brought before the court. Voters are treated like slaves. A slave is whipped by his master without being told why. As the story goes, a master was once whipping his slave. "Why do you whip me, asked the slave, since I have done no wrong." "True, you have done no wrong, but it is in case you should do some." This Bill reminds me of that story; they wish it to be passed, in case there should be some bribery. And it is to reasonable and intelligent people that they apply for such a law. Poor or rich, we are friends of liberty. I love liberty, I do not want to be interfered with in the exercise of my rights. I hate an excess of liberty to the same extent to which I love liberty. I love liberty, and that is why I dislike the Bill now before this House. Not very many years ago, our ancestors shed their blood in order to conquer that liberty which we now enjoy. To come back to my amendment, and I intend not to be long, I would have drawn it otherwise had I had more time. Some members stated it was not in accordance with section 2. I should think it is not, for it is not in a few minutes that one can draw up such an amendment. My object was to communicate to this House the suggestion I am now defending. Although this amendment does not quite agree with section 2, it, however, explains so well what I aim at that a change of one or two words will be sufficient to make the section read better than now. The amendment means that the twenty-five voters who will sign the petition will know what they are signing. With the Bill as it is, a dissatisfied voter, or one willing to avenge himself, could go to Messrs. So and So and ask them to sign his paper. These good fellows will say: But why should we sign? Oh, sign it, sign it anyhow. Generally they will address themselves to people who cannot read or can hardly sign their name. They will read to each of them a few phrases of the petition here and there, and the trick will be played. These people, acting with good faith, will not be very particular, they will sign, and the individual bent on revenging himself upon some one will never be known, the judge who will go and make the inquiry will never know who set up the whole thing. He will summon Peter, who will be told: You signed this petition. What have you to say? And Peter will answer: I know nothing about it, it is John who made me sign; he assured me it was all right. John, who is a good, unsuspecting Canadian, will appear in his turn before the judge. The judge will ask him: What do you complain of? Nothing, will he answer. But why have you signed the petition, then? Oh! it was some one from the neighbouring parish who came and saw me about that and told me it was all very well. Then the judge, who intended to begin his inquiry, will at once say: There is no complaint. But the English and French stenographers, desirous of making some money, will say: Postpone the inquiry for eight days, and something will turn up then. The judge, who would not have the reputation of a man not knowing how to conduct an inquiry, will adjourn the court. In the meantime, the other signers will be called upon, and at last one will be found who has a case of bribery. He will come and say to the court: I think Peter must have received $1 from Louis for his vote. He will be asked if he witnessed the thing. He will say: No; but he will add that Peter very likely did not vote without receiving $1, as some one went to see him at night time, and if he did not receive it himself, then it must be his wife. Will the judge summon Peter's wife? Under civil law, a wife cannot give evidence against her husband. Under criminal law she can give evidence if she be willing, and her husband be willing. Of course she will be unwilling. Then the judge will again adjourn in order to hear counsel on that point of law, and during all that time the returned candidate will have to be there with his counsel, for the voter summoned before the court will say to the candidate: Protect me, I voted for you. Who will pay the expenses which all this will entail? I think it would be better should the petitioners make no deposit, but give security for costs, as the losing party would then pay the costs. As I stated a moment ago, the $500 will be expended before three witnesses should have given their evidence. And then, will the Commissioner continue the inquiry? If not, this Bill, which tends to purify the political atmosphere, will cause a net loss of $500, besides the expenses incurred by the indicted parties to defend themselves. Therefore, my amendment is perfectly reasonable, and it ought to be incorporated in section 2. When the other sections will come up for discussion, we may be allowed to say what we think of them. My amendment has for its object to give to section 2 some taint of the jurisprudence established in this country. It will not yet appear as it should, but it will be a beginning. It has also for its object to remind these twenty-five voters that they should not lodge any information without some reasonable motives, as they are liable to actions for damages. And of what use will have been all those expenses which will not have reached the desired end? They will not serve to purify the political atmosphere, but merely to allow lawyers to make some money, which is not bad after all. The particular result of this Bill would be to allow an evil-doer to prosecute his neighbours. There are such men in every province of the Dominion. Should this Bill pass, we would legalize the wrong which such wicked people are bent on doing, while the object of laws are to make people better. We would give to these gallows-birds the means of dragging their fellow-citizens through mire, of ruining their reputation and the honour of families. Ask a stranger who going round your place, sets your barn on fire, his reason for so acting, he could not tell it to you, he does not know you. Yet he caused you damages to the extent of thousands of dollars, for the mere sake of doing a wrong. We have no law to protect such a man. Turn this section as you will, view it in whatever light you will, you cannot but admit that it is useless and injurious to the good of the community. This Bill will not prevent bribery; on the contrary, it will afford means to practise it freely. Last year it was stated—you will find it in 'Hansard'—that the bribe-giver is a gentleman, an intelligent man. Why not put on an equal footing the names of the bribe-giver and bribe-taker? No, as you see, one is a gentleman, an intelligent man. If the bribe-giver is the more intelligent of the two, I say he is also the more guilty and ought to be the more punished; it is he who deserves the full reprobation, the full punishment, the full rigour of the law, inasmuch as he is more intelligent than the others and consequently the greatest culprit. I will now come to my amendment and these will be very conclusive words. This amendment is of the utmost importance since it tends to protect the honest man, the honest citizen against the party who would injure him, since it declares to the honest man, desirous of avenging himself and injuring his fellow-citizen in that very good reason, that he cannot do it with impunity. Oh! I do not believe, Mr. Chairman, that such a man will be guided by motives of electoral purity. Very often he will try to avenge himself by persecuting his neighbour because he had with the latter some little trouble about a water-course or a delapidated fence. He will say to him: You are going to repay me the dollars you caused me to spend, and he will get up this plot against this unsuspecting neighbour. I want to protect the peaceful citizen, devoted to, and desirous of the good of his country, against the attacks of the hateful, vindictive man, of the dishonest man who will seek to unjustly persecute him. I hope my amendment will be concurred in, which would much improve section 2. The other sections will also have to be amended, when their turn will come. With these amendments the Bill will not yet be perfect, but it will be more admissible should it ever mature. In this way, its evil effects will be minimized as much as possible; it will not be a weapon in the hands of persecutors; it will no more be a legal reason for a dishonest man to gratify his bad inclinations. I would like to offer some further remarks on my amendment, but I am aware that other members wish to take the floor, and I will make room for them, resuming further observations later on.

Mr. SPROULE. The amendment proposed by the hon. gentleman is not very clear from the reading of it at the Table, and I do not know whether it has been made more so now. At any rate, it has this merit, it is a little more definite in requiring particulars to be given of the cases of men who are alleged to have been bribed. It seems to me that the Bill is a very bad one, if it ever comes into operation, and if this clause could be amended in any direction so as to improve it, it is very important that it should be. Whatever there may be in the amendment proposed by the hon. gentleman, I think it is an improvement upon the clause as it now exists. When political excitement runs high during, and after an election, when the contest is a close one, we find, from past experience, that it generally results in a demand for a recount. After that recount has taken place, the next thing, after a lapse of thirty days, will probably be a protest; and it is quite as easy to get twenty-five electors to swear that they believe there has been corruption, as it is to get the requisite affidavits made for the purpose of a protest. Then the Bill says:

Whenever, within 60 days after the day on which an election is held under the Dominion Elections Act, a petition in the form or to the effect set out in schedule A to this Act, has been presented to the court, signed by twenty-five or more voters of an electoral district—

SEEA

This will be filed with the same court that tries the petition, and there has probably been a protest entered at the same time. After this is filed, or within thirty days after, one of the judges shall be assigned to the duty of commencing this fishing inquiry. He shall do that upon his appointment, or within a reasonable time thereafter, and he shall continue it from time to time until he has gone over the whole riding, and conducted that inquiry to his own satisfaction. Usually, an election petition remains for several months before the trial comes on, and, in the meantime, this fishing inquiry will be kept up. The member who is elected, or it may be the defeated candidate, in the interest of himself and his friends, will necessarily be obliged to look after the interest of his constituents, and when that fishing inquiry commences before the judge, he will be obliged to employ counsel to go around and see that no injustice is done to the electors who have supported him, and, in the case of the defeated candidate to the electors who have supported him. But the main trouble will be that this fishing inquiry will only bring out evidence that will afterwards be used in court for the purpose of sustaining a petition, and that the petition, which is tried afterwards, will be very likely based upon these cases. When a request is made to the court that the party shall file a bill of particulars, the probability is that this fishing inquiry which has been going on in the meantime, will have discovered a number of cases, and these will be filed with the bill of particulars. From first to last it seems this Bill will cause a very heavy expense to the successful candidate, and sometimes to the defeated candidate. We know what it is when we are obliged to go into court and employ counsel to defend a case. The experience of the past has taught us that if you employ a prominent lawyer it will cost you from $25 to $100 a day. The judge will have power to hold the court in any part of the riding he may choose, he may move from place to place where he thinks he can find additional evidence, he may adjourn the court, and, during all this time you are obliged to keep counsel to look after the interest of yourself and your friends. Suppose this court sat ten days, and that you were paying counsel $100 a day, as is frequently the case, that would mean a thousand dollars, not to speak of all the other expenses, and the loss of time that may be involved in following this examination. This would be an expense that no candidate would like to incur if he could possibly avoid it. Then, in addition there is the expense that must be incurred afterwards in the trial of the election petition, when it comes before the court. Now, if this Bill becomes law, you will subject the candidate to the double expense, and sometimes the treble expense, of a recount, afterwards the expense of a protest, and then the expense of this fishing expedition; and altogether it will amount to a sum that very few candidates in the country will be able to bear; it will amount to an expense that will drive a great many men out of public life who are to-day representatives of the people. For these reasons, I think the Bill is very objectionable. The amendment proposed by the hon. member for L'Assomption (Mr. Jeannotte), compelling the party to give more particulars with regard to bribery cases, surrounds the Bill with a few more safeguards that might, perhaps, prevent the fishing investigation from being started. That is all the good it will do. But I think every clause in the Bill is equally objectionable with the one now under consideration, and, for my part, I feel not only like opposing this clause, but every other clause in the Bill. I think we have enough courts in the country now. We have more law than is in the interest of the people, or in the interest of their pockets. This Bill really proposes to establish another court, and it gives another opportunity for draining the exhausted exchequer, in many instances, of the candidate, or his opponent, who have already been put to more expense than they can well bear.

Mr. BELLEY. (Translation.) Mr. Chairman, I do not approve of all the observations made by the hon. member for L'Assomption (Mr. Jeannotte) in connection with this Bill. Some I disapprove and some I approve of. I cannot support what he said as to the principle of the Bill. I think that principle should be sanctioned by this House. In the face of an extensive bribery, it is our duty to look for some means to punish not only those who give bribes, but also those who take them, and the latter, in my opinion, are the most guilty. The hon. member for L'Assomption and several other members, I think, said in support of their remarks, if I am not mistaken: We are opposed to this Bill in itself, because it aims at punishing only the bribe-taker; the bribe-giver should be punished the same as the bribe-taker. I think we have a law which punishes both the bribe-taker and the bribe-giver. The hon. member for L'Assomption (Mr. Jeannotte) mentioned certain cases which happened in Montreal. Among others, I think he referred to the case of Mr. McShane, who was disqualified for bribery practiced at an election held in the county of Laprairie. Mr. McShane had been disqualified for having given a bribe to a voter. That shows that we have a law which strikes at the bribe-giver, for voters were also deprived of their franchise for having accepted a fraudulent consideration. If I well understood the speakers who preceded me, the members who stated they were opposed to this Bill were mistaken on this point. I now state that I am in favour of the amendment moved by the member for L'Assomption (Mr. Jeannotte), as it tends to improve this Bill and to better bring out its principle. According as a legislative provision is properly or improperly carried out, a thing good in itself may be made good or bad, as the case may be. This Bill is just in its object and is founded on a just principle, but through a bad wording it might become a real instrument of persecution. If it should be adopted such as it is, there would be some reason to fear an organized persecution on account of its defective wording, and it is the duty of this House to prevent such a persecution to ever take place. I feel quite satisfied that the hon. promoter of this Bill wants no persecution whatever. Proceeding from that principle, I think we improve this Bill by amending it. If it should be passed without any changes, we would then pass a law contrary to all principles of right, contrary to the practice followed in any court. I take it for granted that any person accused must be so accused by a formal Act, that is to say that any indictment must be well and duly drawn up. We are dealing here with proceedings identical to those followed in police courts, in cases before the Circuit Court, the Superior Court, in a word, before any court as well as before the magistrates themselves. To put that practise aside is, in my opinion, to set up arbitrariness as a system. Consequently the petition asking for the appointment of a court of inquiry ought to be perfectly worded and the same principles applied as are applied in controverted elections. Each and every case and fact must be specified. Why should the same thing not be done in these cases? It is the same principle that is in question. We are anxious to do justice to every one, we want the party who sells his vote to be punished. Not only do we propose that those who committed such acts as are prohibited by law should be reached, and that the member returned through such corrupt means should be equally punished, but we are also anxious that there should be no organized persecution. We want the twenty-five voters who will petition for the inquiry to be earnest in the action they take. To reach that end we must take the required means. Now, the only means is the amendment of the member for L'Assomption. But that very means is not, in my opinion, sufficient, and I think the petitioners ought to be fully examined before the judge who will require them to state upon what ground they base their belief in the fruitfulness of the facts set forth in the indictment. Thus we enact that the petitioners will have to give an affidavit stating that upon their soul they believe the alleged facts to be true. Well, such an affidavit may be given by any voter. It will always be given by insolvent people, and generally by men of nothing, whose evidence would not be received before the courts of justice in ordinary cases. The Controverted Elections Act was amended by an Act passed in 1892. A proviso was added to it which compels the petitioner to give an affidavit stating that he believes upon his soul that the facts alleged in the petition are true. I was one of the first members whose election was protested under this new Act. I have found out that people were allowed to give that affidavit who were at an ease under oath. In the petition presented against me, there were enumerated every conceivable case of bribery provided for by the statute. Thus they alleged that I had bought two hundred voters in different parts of my county, which has the extent of a province. Both the petitioners, two men of nothing, swore that the facts alleged in the petition were true. Was it not really extravagant to allege that I had bought two hundred voters of different parishes in a county of such an extent? These two men perjured themselves most shamefully; they made a statement which they knew to be false. What happened in my case will happen in any controverted election. I would rather see the whole section 2 disappear from the Bill, should my amendment not be concurred in, for it is a useless affidavit and one which will be prejudicial to the very people who come and swear to things they know to be false and perjure themselves. I think that before proceeding any further, the judge should say to the petitioners: You swore that extensive bribery prevailed at the election; well, we will first examine you in order to know upon what facts you base your swearing that you conscientiously believe that such and such an act of bribery were practiced. We will also request the interested parties to come and cross-examine you. I will not go to the length of saying that the petitioners should give a full evidence before the court; but I would like to have at least what is required before a judge, if not a full evidence, at least a secondary one, showing that there is a case. The hon. member for Albert should accept my amendment. It is just. I ask that the petitioners be subjected to a cross-examination and that the judge, after such an examination, and after taking knowledge of the circumstances of the case, should be allowed to decide whether there is any presumption of bribery, or, in other words, whether there is any case at all. And then he could order the inquiry. What I ask for is reasonable and will prevent many injustices towards the voters. It will throw light on all such petitions. The amendment I proposed should be incorporated, not only in this Bill, but also in the Controverted Elections Act. It has already been contended, in a couple of controverted election cases, that the petitioners could be cross-examined before any other witness being examined. The point was raised, I think, in the district of Montreal. The court held the contrary; but the judge stated it would be extremely just that powers to that effect should be granted. It is the proceeding followed in civil cases, in cases of capias and attachment before judgment. The witnesses are heard, and they generally come and say: We know nothing of that personally; we heard it said by such and such a person. In election cases it will be the same thing, and I think the cross-examination of those persons would put a stop to such vexatious prosecutions. A man will come and say that his neighbour sold his vote for $1; another will come and say something to the same effect. Even though ten persons would come and make such a statement, could it be said for all that that extensive bribery prevailed at an election? Under the Controverted Elections Act it must now be shown that the acts of bribery had the effect of changing the result of the election. Under these circumstances, I think the court should have the right to ascertain the reasons which led the petitioners to ask for an inquiry. But, should the judge feel satisfied that there is a case, that is to say, that he has reason to believe that bribery prevailed, he will have to make an inquiry. For this reason, I think the committee ought to accept the proposed amendment. At all events, I reserve my right to move the amendment I have here, should the one now discussed be rejected.

Amendment negatived.

Mr. BELLEY. (Translation.) I move in amendment that after the words "one of its judges," in the twenty-first line, the following words be added:—"for the purpose of examining and cross-examining the said petitioners as to all the facts upon which they base their said knowledge and belief;" and, after the last words of said section, the following words:—"if, after such evidence, the judge should presume that such bribery prevailed; at the hearing of said petitioners, any voter may, either by himself or by counsel, examine or cross-examine the said petitioners as to the facts relating to their affidavit and upon which they base their knowledge and belief."

Mr. JEANNOTTE. (Translation.) What has become of my amendment?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Denison). Your amendment has been declared lost.

Mr. JEANNOTTE. (Translation.) Mr. Chairman, I wish to say a few words in connection with the amendment now before you. I read that amendment in French. It goes to say that the judge to whom the petition was addressed will have to give public notice to the twenty-five signers that on such a day, and at such an hour, they will have to appear before him in order to show upon what they base their belief as to the facts contained in the affidavit they have given. The judge will examine them and see whether their reasons are sufficient to proceed to the inquiry. If he should feel satisfied that their reasons are trifling, he will go no further. It is a means to save large expenses. Possibly, if my amendment had been drawn up in English, it might have rallied more members than it did, for our good friends the English members are often apt to say: We do not understand, therefore, we will not vote on the proposition. I even think that the hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon), had he understood the meaning of my amendment, would have voted for it and against his own Bill. The hon. member may possibly happen to be in the case provided for by my amendment. He will then be forced, in order to protect his voters, to use the means we now offer him. We must protect ourselves against such signers of petitions, who sign for the mere sake of being agreeable to others, without having a clear idea of the import of their action. I, therefore, think this amendment should be agreed to. As the Chairman does not understand French, I might say this more by the way: The question was not put on my amendment and they hastened to declare it lost, but they will lose nothing by waiting. It will come back again at the third reading of the Bill.

Mr. JEANNOTTE. I desire to offer some further remarks.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Denison). I have declared the amendment lost.

Mr. AMYOT. I submit, of course, to the ruling of the Chair, but this is the second clause that has been carried without our full knowledge.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Denison). The clause is not carried.

Mr. AMYOT. The first clause was declared carried without our knowing it, and the amendment has now been declared lost. We are here to decide yea or nay on this question.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Denison). I put the motion quite clearly.

Mr. AMYOT. It was put very abruptly. There was absolutely no time to call for yeas and nays.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Denison). If any member had asked for yeas and nays I would have called for them, but no one asked for them. Now we have another amendment before the Chair.

Mr. AMYOT. You will not facilitate the passage of the Bill in that way, for it is rather too sharp. We shall have some voting on the Bill. We do not want to embarrass the Bill, but we have our convictions on this matter. We have all the same object in view, but have perhaps different ways of attaining it, and I hope the Chair will not interfere.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. AMYOT. If I am out of order, I am ready to withdraw the statement. But we have a right to secure the necessary time to ask for the yeas and nays.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Denison). I think I pointed out clearly before that the motion was put and declared lost, and the hon. member for Chicoutimi (Mr. Belley) moved another amendment. There was plenty of time allowed if hon. members had cared to ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. AMYOT. I had drawn a similar amendment to that moved by the hon. member for Chicoutimi (Mr. Belley), but in somewhat different terms, namely: "provided the court be satisfied by the affidavits produced that extensive bribery had been practiced." I think we must adopt some mode of protecting the public against twenty-five or any number of electors who might come and swear they believed that there had been extensive corruption practiced. During the heat of an election it is easy to find almost any number of electors, even up to 100 or 200, who will come forward and swear that there has been extensive corruption practiced on the other side. We must have some power to check these applications, and some officer should be authorized to look a little more into the facts of the case. When the petitions are presented to the judge, he should be at liberty to say to the petitioners: Give some facts, details and circumstances which lead you to believe there has been extensive corruption. If there has been extensive corruption, surely it is easy to say that it occurred in a certain parish among certain people, and that it was by drinking, or by bribery, or by giving money; also that it was in certain quarters, and for a certain set of electors. The judge in his discretion will exact the amount of information necessary to satisfy him that corruption has existed to a very great extent. This protection is undoubtedly necessary even to ensure the working of the Bill. If we impose upon the judge the obligation of proceeding as soon as he receives the petition and affidavits in general terms without inquiring into the law details, the law will not be executed. I am sure we will not find any judges disposed to go into it, while if we instruct the judge to be satisfied that there was corruption he will go into details, and if he sees that there was a prima facie case he will proceed with the enquête. I believe that the spirit of the amendment, although the terms I do not understand exactly, should be adopted.

Mr. JEANNOTTE. (Translation.) The petition in a controverted election requesting authority to protest the same is not brought up in the way mentioned in section 2 of this Bill. Should it only state: The petitioner has reason to believe that bribery prevailed, it would be dismissed at once. The petitioner is bound to state that the candidate tempted or bought votes. He is bound to specify all the facts and to give the names. Then his affidavit states that he has reason to believe that such facts are true. (In English.) The protest in an election is not the same as the petition mentioned in section 2. The protest must contain special cases, charging that the candidate elected has been guilty of corruption, either by buying votes, or by treating electors, or making promises, whether by himself or his agents. If the petitioner were to present a petition of the same kind as that mentioned in section 2, saying that he believed in his conscience that corrupt practices had been committed by the candidate or his agent, that petition would not stand two minutes in a court of justice, it would be dismissed at once. But he must mention facts, and after that petition has been lodged in court he must furnish particulars, and even mention the places where the corruption has taken place. But in section 2, there is no mention of any such requirements, there is no charge upon which a party can go and be examined. It only says that he must declare in his petition that he believes corrupt practices have been committed. (Translation.) I say that under such conditions, with the petition as brought forth, any conceivable injustice may be committed. Moreover, in the bill of particulars, the petitioner is bound to give each and every fact upon which he intended to base his inquiry for the voiding of the election; while under this Bill, he is not bound to give a single case of bribery; he has only to state that he believes that bribery prevailed. I repeat that that will cause interminable injustice.

Amendment negatived: yeas, 35; nays, 45.

Mr. AMYOT. I move that the following words be added at the end of section 2:—

Provided the court be satisfied by the affidavits produced that such extensive bribery has been practised.

Amendment agreed to: yeas, 40; nays, 36.

Mr. BERGIN. I move that the following words be added at the end of the section as amended:—

The petitioners having given first full particulars of the said extensive briberies in their affidavits attached to the said petition.

I have very great sympathy with the hon. gentleman who promotes this Bill, not only because of his attainments as a lawyer, but also because of his standing in this House. I sympathize with him very strongly in this: that he has once before failed to carry this Bill, and that, if he fails again to-night he will be obliged to drop the measure, and it is evident, from the force with which he presses it, that this will be, I shall not say a source of humiliation, but a source of very great regret to him. Strong, however, as my sympathy is with him, I cannot give my consent to a Bill which I feel must prove unworkable if adopted by this House—unworkable in more ways than one—and which, if it should in any of its parts become workable, would be a source of very great danger to this country, and be very likely to bring about an increase of that fraud and bribery and corruption in connection with elections which the hon. gentleman himself wishes to do away with. The hon. gentleman in this section asks that we should do away with bribery upon the strength of affidavits referred to in the section. Now, I contend that if we adopt this section we shall open the door to a vast amount of perjury, bribery and corruption, such as we have never had before in this country. In the first place, this section suggests perjury. In the heat of an election we know that men's passions are aroused; we know how, in the event of defeat, the desire for vengeance is aroused; we know how almost every man on the defeated side is ready to declare—a great number even upon oath—that the election was carried by bribery and corruption, and there is no difficulty whatever in obtaining any sum of money for the purpose of filing a petition. In the ordinary case, the petition must be supported by $1,000 deposit. How much more easy will it be to acquire $500 for such a purpose after an election? True, the section calls for a number of men to join in making the affidavit, and provides that they shall make it within 60 days. It does not provide that it shall be made on the sixtieth day, but that it shall be made within 60 days. In the first few days there will be no difficulty in getting twenty-five heated, excited men to subscribe to a petition stating that they are satisfied that bribery has been practiced extensively during the election. What is the penalty for making a false affidavit? None whatever. They swear, according to this section, at a time when the whole or, at all events, one-half of the county is bound to be convinced that the election was carried by bribery and corruption, and they swear to the best of their knowledge. It is on an affidavit made at such a time, when people are under the influence of passion, that we are asked to start out a fishing commission, at the head of which, forsooth, we are to place one of the judges of the land, who is to continue fishing, at his own good will and pleasure, until he is satisfied he has probed everything to the bottom, in the endeavour to find out something that will enable him to say that bribery has extensively prevailed. And although the judge may not find, in his search, that bribery has prevailed, he will probably discover that some unfortunate fellow took a glass of whisky in a tavern near the polling booth, or that some one gave a voter, whom perhaps he had driven 30 or 40 miles, a meal somewhere in the neighbourhood of the poll. Some petty thing like this might be discovered, even after a contestation had taken place, and the election declared pure by the judge, upon which the case could be reopened, and the candidate perhaps disqualified for the act of an agent, of whom he knew nothing. What other evils are likely to flow from the enactment of this Bill? Innocent men, men of good character, whom no honest man in the community would believe guilty of an act of bribery or corruption, will be kept, perhaps days and weeks, at the place where the trial is to be held, kept at his own expense, and there will be no redress. He may be obliged to stay there several days, and will not be paid for his attendance, because the petty sum of $500 will not be sufficient to conduct the investigation in a large county, where it is said bribery has extensively prevailed. Again, this clause of the Bill is deficient in this: that it does not provide for the punishment of the briber. Why punish the poor ignorant man who, perhaps, tempted by want at the moment, takes a couple of dollars for his vote, and let the intelligent, educated and wealthy man who tempts him go scot free? I ask this House, in all sincerity, whether they think that a Bill, framed upon such lines, can be productive of any good. As I have said, it opens the door to perjury. Men, heated by passion, will swear without much difficulty, without, in fact, thinking of the effect of their affidavit, that bribery has extensively prevailed. They are not called upon to give any particulars. They swear, in a general way, to the best of their knowledge and belief, that bribery has extensively prevailed; but if they are obliged to add to these affidavits full particulars, showing the men whom they have reason to believe have been bribed, every one of them will refuse to take the oath. We are opening the door to perjury and corruption, and I think that, if we pass this section at all, we must pass it with the addition that all the petitioners shall add to the affidavit the full particulars of the cases where the extensive bribery has prevailed. Although my hon. friend this afternoon, when addressing the committee, addressed himself generally to the provisions of the Act, he afterwards objected to my hon. friend from L'Assomption (Mr. Jeannotte) going outside of section 2 of this Bill. Therefore, I perhaps ought not, without permission of the House, to go out of this section for the present, but shall reserve what I have to say upon the other sections of the Act. For I think every section requires to be recast, and I shall be obliged to make some twenty-one speeches instead of one. I beg to move, therefore, that the following words be added to the section:—

The petitioners having first given full particulars of such extensive bribery in their affidavit.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I would like to say just a word or two upon this amendment. I feel the more called upon to speak in view of the action of the committee on previous amendments. It seems to me that the committee may be led astray from the purpose and objects of this Bill by the consideration of amendments which are plausible in themselves, which seem to guard against perjury and against inquisitorial investigation. But these amendments are aimed at the principle of the Bill. It will be impossible to engraft upon the Bill, without destroying it, those amendments which combine the two purposes of providing for an investigation, and, at the same time surrounding the preliminary steps with precautions which cannot be observed. We cannot, without, in effect, destroying the privilege of petitioning, provide that petitioners who declare that they have reason to believe that corruption has prevailed during an election, shall give particulars at the outset of the investigation. Under our system of controverted elections particulars must be given so as to prevent the investigation from taking too wide a range, but to say that these particulars shall be given in the first instance would be to say that the petitioner shall show his case in advance. It is sufficient that he says by affidavit that he believes the allegations to be correct, and that they can be proved, and if the charge is denied, then, within a reasonable time, particulars are given so that the defendant may have reasonable notice of what he is charged with. But to insist on all this at the outset of the examination, and to insist upon the cross-examination of the parties who allege on their information and belief, to insist that they shall give evidence themselves for the purpose of proving the bribery is to begin at the very outset to prove the petition, so that practically you take away the right of the petitioners who are informed and believe that corruption has existed from the means of going on with the trial at all. It seems to me we should be putting the cart before the horse completely if we insisted on the trial taking place at first.

Mr. BERGIN. I think the hon. Minister of Justice might employ such an argument in an ordinary case. But when the Bill does not provide that at any time after the petition has been presented particulars shall be given, or anything of that kind, I think the argument does not hold good. But perhaps the Minister of Justice may suggest to my hon. friend (Mr. Weldon) behind me, who is promoting the Bill, that he make that provision before the third reading. I am sure that the hon. Minister of Justice must see that such an affidavit, or petitions, founded upon such an affidavit, can and will be made without sufficient thought, in the heat of an election, or immediately after an election, when men's blood is up. I think he will see this further, that if this petition is acted upon immediately or within a very few days after the election, an inquisitorial investigation will go on during which may be developed material upon which a petition will be granted against a successful candidate whose election, under the present circumstances, would not be attacked at all. I think the hon. gentleman will agree also that after a protest has been entered—for a protest can be entered at the end of thirty days and abandoned afterwards for want of evidence by the petitioners—if they find that the disclosures do not take place within thirty days, which would justify them in going on, they may continue it for some time afterwards, and, perhaps after the contestation has been entered upon and the successful candidate has been declared by the court to have been properly elected, and that no corruption prevailed, something might turn out in the course of this inquisitorial investigation which would justify the reopening of the case and perhaps the unseating of the candidate who had already been declared pure. And, if the bribery was of the character described in the first section, as the Minister of Justice will see under the Consolidated Statutes, it would be proper for the judge to report that bribery had extensively prevailed, and this in a case where the trial judge had declared the election was pure, yet, upon the report of this inquisitorial judge, Parliament would be called upon afterwards to disfranchise the whole constituency. These are the principal objections to this section.

Mr. DUPONT. (Translation.) If the hon. the First Minister wishes to induce us to pass this Bill, he ought to offer to us as models other laws than the Controverted Elections Act, such as it is, which is based on no principle whatever. It is the most arbitrary law I know of. In my opinion, the members of the legal profession—and there are many in this House—should hasten to amend it, instead of asking this House to pass a new law. We are now again asked to pass a new law, which is based on no principle of justice. Therefore, I think that if the hon. Minister of Justice wishes to induce the House to pass the Bill of the hon. member for Albert, he ought to propose as a model another law than the Controverted Elections Act now in force.

Mr. AMYOT. The position taken by the Minister of Justice, to my mind, is equivalent to this declaration—that after every general election we should have an inquisition of all the elections held so as to find out any possible case of corruption. But in practice, it would be limited to those cases where there are parties able to deposit the money necessary. I am not ready to admit that principle.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I did not go so far as that; and perhaps the hon. gentleman would be good enough to allow me to say just a word in reply to my hon. friends who have spoken before him. I do not at all object, but on the contrary, would think it quite fair to have particulars given and inquiry restricted to those particulars. But I think we provide for that at the wrong stage, if we insist upon it at the outset of the investigation, on the filing of the petition.

Mr. AMYOT. If we admit that we should have an inquisition in one county, we admit that there may be an inquisition in every county. If it is sufficient, in order to open this investigation, to have the petition of twenty-five people, who, it may be in the heat of a contest, will declare that according to their knowledge and belief there has been general corruption, without anything to satisfy the judge that their statement is true, we admit virtually that there may be a general inquisition in every part of Canada. I am not ready to go so far as that; I think we must protect the public in some way. We must at least give to the judge some prima facie case which will justify him in his wisdom to granting the enquête. We should begin by amending our electoral law and declaring that those who are corrupt are equally guilty with those who corrupt others. I could never understand why we limited the penalty of the law to those who corrupt, whilst we do nothing to protect those who want to be corrupted.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). How do you get any evidence?

Mr. AMYOT. We do not conduct these elections in the woods, nor in the dark, we conduct them in daylight, we generally know the people who vote, and we generally have means of judging what they are doing. Here again the hon. member for Bothwell would admit the principle of the inquisition. I say the principle of the Bill is not correct in itself; you must have a prima facie case before you disturb the community at large. I think the committee was perfectly right in adopting the amendment which provides that the judge must first be satisfied that corruption has taken place. But I say we should amend our electoral law in such a way as to punish a man who has accepted a bribe; and, in the second place, we might amend chapter 10 of the Revised Statutes so as to give more facility for making an investigation, then we would have all needful guarantees that no frivolous investigation would be entered into.

Mr. WELDON. I would be lacking in courtesy to my hon. friend from Cornwall and Stormont (Mr. Bergin) if I were not to acknowledge, before the committee rises, the pleasant words which he has applied to me. But they remind me somewhat of the old pagan priest who, when leading an animal to sacrifice, put a garland of flowers around his neck, and then raised the axe and knocked out his brains. I did not appreciate so much the hon. gentleman's words when he went on with his argument. The hon. member has evidently not read the Bill; at least he has not gone beyond the second section of it. He criticised the 15th section, complaining that we would take a man's vote away who had merely drunk a glass of whisky at an election. He will see, on further study of the Bill, that no such offences are dealt with. He says that $500 would be too small an amount on which to commence an enquête. That is an open question that we can deal with when we reach that section. He complained of a great number of features which I assure the hon. member are already in the Revised Statutes in the plainest words, and have been on the books for eighteen years. Evidently his criticisms do not express the mind of Parliament, for they might as well be directed against the Act we already have. If I correctly understood the amendment first moved by the hon. member for L'Assomption, and voted on, it is identical with the amendment before the House, and if so, I take the point that the present amendment is out of order.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Denison). It is the same as the first amendment, and, therefore, I shall have to rule it out of order.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I move that the committee rise and report progress.

Motion agreed to, and committee rose and reported progress.

Mr. AMYOT.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and the House adjourned at 11 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, 10th May, 1894.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

MINISTERIAL INQUIRIES RE TARIFF.

Mr. LAVERGNE asked, What places did the Minister of Finance, the Minister of Agriculture, the Controller of Inland Revenue and the Controller of Customs visit, since last session of Parliament, for the purpose of inquiring into the expediency of altering the tariff of customs and in view of the proposed legislation in that behalf during this session:—

1. In the province of Nova Scotia;
2. In the province of New Brunswick;
3. In the province of Prince Edward Island;
4. In the province of Manitoba;
5. In the province of British Columbia;
6. In the North-west Territories?

Mr. FOSTER. The Minister of Agriculture has visited the following places:—Halifax and New Glasgow, in Nova Scotia; St. John, N.B.; Charlottetown, P.E.I.; Winnipeg, Boissevain, Melita, Brandon, Neepawa and Portage la Prairie, in Manitoba; Vancouver, Victoria, Nanaimo and New Westminster, B.C.; Indian Head, Regina, Prince Albert and Calgary, N.W.T. All these places I have also visited, and several others which are not mentioned here, but concerning which I gave answers, I think, more than a week ago.

DOCK AT HILTON.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (for Mr. Lister) asked,

1. Did the Government, before the construction of the dock at Hilton, acquire the title to the land upon which it is built? If not, has it since acquired the title?
2. If not, in whom does the title now stand?
3. Has the Government demanded a conveyance of the said dock and appurtenances?
4. If so, what answer has been given to such demand?
5. Has the Government any agreement or writing which will entitle it to compel a conveyance of the property?
6. Has a wharfinger been appointed to take charge of the dock?
7. If so, what is the name of such person?
8. When was he appointed and what is his salary?
9. Has a return been made to the Government of the amount of wharfage fees collected?
10. If so, when and by whom was such return made?
11. Is the Government aware that Mr. Bowker, of Hilton, has been collecting dockage fees? 12. Has Mr. Bowker, or any other person or persons, authority to collect fees for the use of the dock?

Mr. OUMET. The answers to the above questions are all in the negative. The Department of Marine and Fisheries have informed the Department of Public Works that they have charge of no wharf at Hilton. The Hilton wharf was private property, but strong representations were made to the department by a petition of 27th December, 1884, that owing to difficulty of navigation by night in the River Ste. Marie, steamers going to Sault Ste. Marie had to lay over night at Hilton; that the wharf at that place was too limited in extent to afford sufficient shelter to those boats, and that the anchorage was not good, the water in the vicinity being deep and rocks dangerous; and further, that private owners were not in position and did not need to extend the wharf for their business, especially as they did not charge anything for vessels lying at the dock. These are the reasons why the Government constructed the extension applied for, and did not ask for a transfer of the balance of the property.

CATHEDRAL CHURCH IN NICOLET.

Mr. LEDUC asked, Whether petitions have been laid before the Government, or any member of the Government, praying for the disallowance of a certain Act passed by the Legislature of Quebec, at its last session, giving to the town and parish of Nicolet power to vote a grant of eight thousand dollars each, in order to aid in the construction of a cathedral church in the town of Nicolet? Has there been correspondence in relation to this matter with the Government or any of its members?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. No petitions on that subject have been received, and there has been no correspondence.

BREWERY AT NEUSTADT.

Mr. LANDERKIN asked, What revenue was derived from the brewery at Neustadt during each and every year from 1886 to 1893? What was the officer's salary, and what were the total expenses connected therewith in every year of the same period?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville):

| Year. | Revenue. | Salary. |
|---------------|------------|---------|
| 1886-87 | $1,024 00 | $720 |
| 1887-88 | 1,100 00 | 750 |
| 1888-89 | 842 30 | 750 |
| 1889-90 | 946 65 | 750 |
| 1890-91 | 999 62 | 750 |
| 1891-92 | 2,231 00 | 750 |
| 1892-93 | 2,596 00 | 750 |

There were no expenses in any of these years. The officer supervising this brewery likewise supervised the malt house and brewery at Carlsruhe and the malt house at Neustadt.

BREWERY AT CARLSRUHE.

Mr. LANDERKIN asked, What revenue was derived from the Carlsruhe brewery during each and every year from 1886 to 1893? What was the officer's salary, and what were the total expenses connected therewith in every year of the same period?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). The revenue from this brewery in 1891-92 was $2,018, and the expenses $100.50. In 1892-93 the revenue was $1,638.16, and expenses $90.30. This brewery was surveyed by the officer from Neustadt, whose salary is shown in answer to previous question.

STANDARD FOR BARRELS.

Mr. LANDERKIN asked, Is there, under the Act, a standard for barrels, half-barrels, quarter-barrels, or the eighth of a barrel? If so, what number of gallons do each contain? If there is no standard, is it the intention of the Government to enact one?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). There is not, under the Act, a standard for barrels, half-barrels, quarter-barrels, or the eighth of a barrel. The standard measure of weights under the Weights and Measures Act is the gallon, it being a measure capable of containing ten pounds of distilled water at 62 degrees Fahrenheit. It is not the intention of the Government to enact any other standard.

OAKVILLE PIER AND LIGHTHOUSE.

Mr. GIBSON asked, When was the pier at Oakville rebuilt? How much did it cost? How much did the town of Oakville subscribe? Are the Government aware that the pier is partially destroyed and the lighthouse in danger of being washed away? Do the Government intend rebuilding it? If so, when? Has the town of Oakville petitioned the Government for the rebuilding of the pier?

Mr. OUMET. The work was constructed from May to 15th October, 1887. The cost of reconstruction was $14,280. The amount of contribution by municipal authorities was $8,000. The Government is aware that the upper end of the pier has settled, but the lighthouse has been moved further back on the pier and is in no danger of being washed away. A petition from the Harbour Committee of Oakville, praying for repairs to the pier in Oakville harbour, has been transmitted to the Public Works Department through Mr. D. Henderson, M.P., on 11th April last, and is now under consideration.

WATER POWER PRIVILEGES AT CHAUDIERE FALL.

Mr. CASEY asked, Who are the lessees or users of the water power privileges at and around the Chaudière Fall? What are the respective rentals or dues with which they are charged? How much, if any, is each of them in arrears up to the end of last fiscal year? How are their respective rights defined? Have they the right to encroach by permanent building on the Fall itself? Are all the practically workable privileges at the Fall taken up, or controlled by private parties?

Mr. OUIMET. The agreement of lease of 19th of November, 1889, gives as the lessees, Messrs. Perley & Pattee, J. R. Booth, R. Blackburn, J. & T. M. McKay, M. Petrie, A. H. Baldwin, Bank of Montreal, Milton Merrill, Bronsons & Weston Lumber Co. An annual rental of $100 for each lot is paid for 15 lots on Chaudière Island, and 10 lots on Victoria Island. Mr. J. R. Booth, the only lessee who was in arrears at the end of the last fiscal year, made the required payment on 5th October, 1893. All the other lessees had paid up. In the agreement dated 19th November, 1889, can be found the conditions under which the lease was made. The quantity of water to be used in connection with each lot is to be sufficient to produce a force equal to 150 horse-power, but no mention is made of permanent buildings. Certain reservations are made to permit of the extension of the Ottawa City water service; for the timber slide for the use of the surplus power; for the expropriation of the interest of any of the lessees, and for all other public uses and purposes as may be authorized by the Parliament of Canada; but it would appear as if all the workable privileges were at present controlled under the leases above referred to.

THE EXCHANGE BANK.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to inquire from the Finance Minister, or the Minister of Justice, what steps have been taken with respect to the claim of certain parties, arising out of the Exchange Bank indebtedness? The Minister of Finance some time ago stated that the matter had been referred to the Department of Justice, and I suppose it will be by this time in shape.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. An opinion has been referred on the subject, but I think it has not been transmitted to the Finance Department, but will be to-morrow.

INQUIRY FOR RETURNS.

Mr. McMILLAN. When may I expect to obtain the return containing a statement of the quantity of butter manufactured at Elgin and Woodstock creameries? This return was granted on 13th March, but has not been brought down yet.

Mr. FOSTER. I will make inquiry from the Minister of Agriculture, and will see about it.

Mr. CASEY.

EXAMINATION OF WITNESSES UNDER OATH.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved second reading of Bill (No. 90) to provide for the examination of witnesses on oath by the Senate and House of Commons.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time, and House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I observe that in clause 4 the Bill provides that any person examined who wilfully gives false evidence shall be liable to the penalties for perjury. I think the wording should be, guilty of perjury and liable to the penalties therefor.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It is a transcript of the English Act.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Section 6 does not appear to enable the chairman of the committee to administer the oath. The oath may be administered by the Speaker of the Senate or the Speaker of the House of Commons, or by such person or persons as may from time to time be appointed for the purpose, or by any standing order or other orders of the Senate or House of Commons. I suppose the chairman for the time being of the committee should be specially authorized to administer the oath.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. By section 3 the committee can administer the oath, and the chairman of the committee will be the person to administer it for the committee.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) There are two authorities who may administer the oath: first, the Senate and House of Commons, and second, the committees of either House, and by section 6 it is provided that the Speaker of the Senate or the House of Commons, or such persons as may be authorized, may administer the oath. The draughtsman evidently conceived that it was necessary to give some person authority to administer the oath. Section 6 provides that as representing the Senate and the House of Commons the Speaker of either body shall have power to administer the oath, and in regard to the committees, if it is necessary to administer an oath it is proper to designate the person who shall administer it.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I do not know the reason for that provision, except it may be to cover a case in which another person is appointed by the House of Commons or the Senate. The clause is an exact transcript of the English Act.

Bill reported, and read the third time and passed.

WAYS AND MEANS—PUBLIC ACCOUNTS COMMITTEE.

Mr. FOSTER moved that the House again resolve itself into Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. DAVIES (P.F.I.) Mr. Speaker, I brought to the attention of the Prime Minister and the House the other day a question of some importance respecting the functions and powers of the Public Accounts Committee. Desiring in that committee to examine the Auditor General with reference to certain claims on which he had reported in his general report for 1892-93, I was stopped by the committee, it appearing to them that the subject-matters of those claims had not been referred to the Public Accounts Committee in the same way that the Auditor General's Report had been referred, and the committee held, following a precedent, I believe, that I could not examine the Auditor on these matters. I brought the subject up in the House, thinking that as a matter of course the resolution I proposed would be acceded to, and that the correspondence would be referred to the Public Accounts Committee, in order that any question between the Auditor and the departments of the public service might be passed upon by the committee. It seemed to me that that was one of the functions of the committee. It has always seemed to me that if there is an officer in the public service whose duties, powers, and privileges should be guarded by the House with the greatest possible jealousy, that officer is the Auditor General. He is, and ought to be, absolutely independent of party, and, exercising as he does very important and independent functions, he should have the moral support of both sides of the House; and it would require, I should imagine, a very extreme case to justify the parties in the House, divided as they are by political predilections and feeling, dividing as to the right of the Auditor General's functions. We should be as a unit in regard to that; it is one of the safeguards of the House, the country, and both political parties have held that there shall be an effective and proper supervision from an independent source over the public expenditures. Not that I had any special cause to imagine anything very wrong about the particular cases in question, but the Auditor General for the time being having differed from the Treasury Board as to the legality of these expenditures, which amounted to a very large sum of money, I thought it was proper to examine him as to the grounds on which he came to that decision, and that the Committee on Public Accounts should calmly and coolly discuss the question—the ground which the Auditor took, the grounds on which he was overruled by the Treasury Board—and then express its opinion as to who was right and who was wrong. Because this is a matter, not simply of the particular case brought to our attention by the Auditor, but of principle—a most important principle. Here we have a large sum of money, amounting to some hundred thousand dollars, which the Auditor General says has been, in his opinion, illegally expended; the Treasury Board overrules; the money is paid; the Auditor General submits his report upon the matter to Parliament; and the Prime Minister in his remarks to the House the other day rather intimated that he was of opinion that the Auditor had gone somewhat beyond his duties in making this report. It is very important that we should ascertain whether that is the case or not. I ventured at the time to challenge the correctness of the hon. gentleman's opinion, and I think that I was right and the Auditor General was right, and that the hon. gentleman was wrong; because I find in the Act defining the duties and power of the Auditor General that it is expressly provided in the 32nd section that in these cases the Auditor General shall make a special report to Parliament within three days after Parliament meets; it is also provided that no cheque of the Finance Minister, unless certified by the Auditor General, shall be paid. Then follows a list of exceptions; then, a provision for the case of accidents happening during the recess, providing means by which the Government may use moneys; and then, the following provision:—

If the Auditor General has refused to certify that a cheque of the Minister of Finance and Receiver General may issue, on the ground that the money is not justly due, or that it is excess of the authority granted by Council, or for any reason other than that there is no parliamentary authority, then upon a report of the case prepared by the Auditor General and the Deputy Minister of Finance and Receiver General, the Treasury Board shall be the judge of the sufficiency of the Auditor General's objections, and may sustain him or order the issue of the cheque in its discretion.

Then the question is between the Treasury Board and the Auditor. What follows? Sub-section 2 reads:

The Auditor General shall in all such cases prepare a statement of all such legal opinions, reports of Council, special warrants and cheques issued without his certificate, and of all expenditure incurred in consequence thereof, which he shall deliver to the Minister of Finance and Receiver General, to be by him presented to Parliament not later than the third day of the session thereof then next ensuing.

So that it appears that the Treasury Board are a court of appeal, as it were, from the Auditor General, and may overrule his objection, but that, when such a contingency happens and the Auditor General's objection is overruled, the Auditor shall present to the House of Commons, not later than the third day of the session, a full report, with legal opinions, reports of Councils, &c., on which the difference of opinion has arisen. The Prime Minister spoke possibly without reference to this section; I do not know whether he looked at it or not; but it seemed to me then, and it seems more clearly to me now, that the Auditor General was strictly within his rights, and that if he had not presented that report, either binding it up with his annual report or presenting it by itself, he would not have obeyed the express command of the statute. I therefore submit to the hon. Prime Minister, who told me that I had better give notice of my motion, that this is hardly a case in which he is justified in insisting on notice being given before such a formal motion is made. What are the facts? We have before us all the papers; I do not require to move to bring them down; but the Committee of Public Accounts cannot examine them because a formal motion to refer them has not been made. I moved to refer the papers to that committee, which I considered merely a matter of form, and Mr. Speaker ruled that technically notice should be given of all motions, and that it is only by general consent that motions, even of the most formal character, can be made without notice. I want to point out to the Prime Minister that if that rule is insisted upon strictly, public business will be almost entirely stopped. The Order paper contains I do not know how many notices of motion, and if I have to give notice of my motion, it will not be reached for weeks. In the case of every report made to the House by a standing committee, before the chairman can move that it be adopted he must give notice. So that if the rule is strictly followed it will be almost impossible for public business to go on. I do not want to controvert your ruling, Mr. Speaker; but I would submit to the Prime Minister whether this is not an occasion on which general consent might be given. The papers are before the House; we want them discussed by the Public Accounts Committee; and the motion I made was that they should be referred to that committee. The hon. gentleman said he would consider the matter, and if he desires that I should do so, I shall make a formal motion any time it suits the convenience of the House; but if he is not of that opinion, I shall have to challenge his conclusion, because I deem the matter of the highest importance. If the hon. gentleman still clings to his decision, he will not only throw a great obstacle to the discussion of public business, but, in this particular case, will prevent the matter being reached for many weeks to come, if it be reached at all. If that rule is insisted upon, it will go far to prevent the discussion of public business altogether. I submit to the Prime Minister that, having considered the matter since the other day, he will intimate his willingness to withdraw the formal objection he made and let me make a motion without the usual notice.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It is precisely because I thought it was an important matter that I suggested to the hon. gentleman that he had better give notice; and when he expressed his opinion that it was an urgent matter, I said I would consider whether we would debate his proposition soon or insist on his motion going on the Order Paper. I am glad he has brought the matter up to-day, without making any formal motion, because some understanding of what the point at issue between us can be better arrived at in this way. I took exception to the conduct of the Auditor General the other day, and I insist, if possible, with more force to-day, on the opinion that I think the Auditor has gone far beyond his duty, and is putting the House to considerable inconvenience, in the investigation of accounts, by confusing the accounts of two or three years. The Auditor General puts into the hands of the Finance Minister a book purporting to be his report upon the accounts of the financial year, which ended on the 30th June, 1893; but when we come to examine the book, we find that it contains a multitude of items which relate only to the accounts of 1894, which accounts will be laid on the Table of the House next session and referred to the committee for investigation, as a part of the accounts of the current year. I had not reference so much to the correspondence itself as to the way in which the items of these accounts are grouped in the Auditor General's Report of the accounts of last year. The effect of that is, that we shall be investigating, session after session, the accounts of the current year mixed up with the accounts of the past year, and these accounts for a year in advance will be referred again and again to the Public Accounts Committee, as regards every item, confused with the current year's expenditure included in the Auditor General's Report. The items for this year in that report will appear inevitably in his report of next year, and I can conceive no reason why the Auditor General should insist upon doing that, unless it be to make a book of a most inconvenient and expensive size. Now, as regards the particular case of difference of opinion between the Auditor General and the Treasury Board, in respect of which the former has been overruled, I had in view the section to which the hon. gentleman has referred, and which I do not think justifies the Auditor in laying the correspondence before the House in that way. On the contrary, it is provided in the Audit Act, by the section the hon. gentleman has just read, that it is the Finance Minister who has to lay these documents on the Table of the House, and I presume he has done so. But let me call the hon. gentleman's attention to this, and if he will be good enough to reflect upon it, he will find, I think, that the principle I contend for is right, and that is that it is not properly a charge upon the Committee on Public Accounts to investigate those matters in which the Auditor General is overruled by the Treasury Board, in the way he proposes. I grant that it will be the duty of the committee, in regard to those claims as well as any others, to exercise its power of discrimination and of examination, as to any facts that they may desire to bring out. But I do object to its being supposed that the Committee on Public Accounts, by the reference of correspondence of this kind, is to be charged with the duty of trying the Government—and that is what it will have to do if it is to decide between the Auditor General on the one side and the Treasury Board on the other. Let me call the hon. gentleman's attention to this fact that, time and again, in numbers of cases on record, the British Government, in the British House of Commons, has distinctly declined to submit to a trial by a committee of the House as regards its conduct or administration as an Administration. The documents which indicate a difference of opinion between the Auditor General and the Treasury Board are to be laid upon the Table of the House by the Finance Minister. Now, granting that the committee make an investigation as to what the nature of these payments was and all that. I do object to the committee undertaking to decide between the Auditor General and the Government, and the hon. gentleman will see the inconvenience of that course. In the first place, the Government is responsible to the House and is charged with the duty of giving the House the reasons and the justification for its action in each particular case. If the committee undertake simply to hear the evidence of the Auditor General, they will decide on hearing one side only, otherwise it will be incumbent on all the members of the Government to appear before the Committee on Public Accounts, as a tribunal to decide whether the Auditor General or the Government was right, before the committee report their conclusion on that question, as the hon. gentleman intimates they should, to the House. As regards the investigation which the committee may desire to make into the items of the accounts or any matter in respect of which the committee can fairly exercise its functions, without undertaking to assume to themselves altogether the duty of trying the Government on this question—if the hon. gentleman will indicate any set of papers or correspondence which he desires to refer to the committee for the purpose of examination into the details or otherwise, within the limits of the committee's ordinary duties, if the hon. gentleman will make a motion with regard to any particular set of correspondence, we will either agree that the motion shall be adopted at once or I will name an early date at which the House will take the matter into consideration. But the reason why I resist any general resolution on the subject, affirming the practice of sending all these references to the Committee on Public Accounts to pass upon as between the Auditor General and the Government, and adopting the principle that the accounts of this year shall be examined by the committee to which the accounts of last year are referred—the reason why I insist on a motion of that kind taking the usual course and ample notice being given of it, is that we are asked to adopt the practice the Auditor General has been introducing in his book, and which I hope he will depart from, on considering the objections to it, and I think the House should hesitate before adopting a practice that is somewhat inconvenient.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. There are two entirely separate questions raised by the Minister of Justice. One, in which I presume we would all agree, is this, that, with a certain exception which I will presently state, we do not propose to use the Committee on Public Accounts for the purpose of examining items in the current year. But to that there is a very important exception, and I think it is precisely one of the grounds on which the same "hard pan" cases should be investigated by the Committee on Public Accounts. As I understand it, all these expenditures were made under the provisions of the Audit Act, which give the Government power, without the authority of Parliament, under certain conditions, to expend public moneys.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. No.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think so.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. There was a vote for this expenditure. The Auditor's objection is that it was not sufficiently debated in Parliament. That is all.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I understood not.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes; there was an appropriation.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) There is not a specific appropriation for this purpose.

Mr. FOSTER. No money was paid without an appropriation.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I do not think they were voted in detail.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. They were voted in a lump sum.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. As I understand, these cheques were issued under the authority of clause 32 of the Audit Act.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. By Governor General's warrant?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think so.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. No.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) By Order in Council.

Mr. FOSTER. There was an appropriation made, and these were paid from that appropriation, as these others are made by Order in Council.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) And the Auditor General objects to the mode of payment as being illegal for the reasons specified in his letter of 18th September. The Treasury Board overruled the objection on the ground that Parliament had every opportunity to investigate the purpose for which the vote was taken.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The first subsection of this provides for the case of the Auditor General reporting that there is no parliamentary authority for the expenditure, and the Government in the exercise of their discretion overriding his decision. The hon. gentleman, I presume, will not contend that in a case where the Government on their own motion issue cheques for any purpose, these are not properly to be discussed by the Committee on Public Accounts.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. No; and the practice, as I remember, is always to refer them to the committee.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The practice was introduced within the last few years on my own motion. It had not been the practice up to that time; but the reasons for it were so obvious that no objection was made, and, I suppose, it has become the custom. My own recollection of it was that these sums were included in the Governor General's warrants.

Mr. FOSTER. Not a cent.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Of course I accept the hon. gentleman's statement on that point. I myself admit that it would not be convenient—and I was not prepared to advise—that the House should investigate, or rather that the Committee on Public Accounts should be charged to investigate any cases other than those I have described having reference to the expenditure of the current year. If cause should arise, I presume the proper course would be to refer it to a special committee, unless by mutual consent we chose that the Committee on Public Accounts, as being an actual court of audit for this purpose. But the other side of the hon. gentleman's contention is more important. The hon. gentleman seems to think it would be very inexpedient that, when a dispute arises between the Auditor General and the Treasury Board—in other words, the Government of the day—as to a particular payment, the Public Accounts Committee should consider that question. Now, Sir, I must take issue with him. It appears to me that that is a very important part of the duties naturally devolving upon the Committee on Public Accounts. The Auditor General is supposed to be a functionary appointed to see to it that all our expenditures are properly vouched for, and the Committee on Public Accounts has been held to be a committee appointed for inquisitorial and investigating purposes, and with the special duty of seeing that our expenditures are properly made in accordance with parliamentary authority, and in accordance with law. Where there is a difference of opinion between the Government and the Auditor General, so far from hindering public business, it seems to me it should conduce to the proper performance of the public business that this question should be threshed out in the Public Accounts Committee, which is supposed to be conversant with these matters. I can state, though I have not had the pleasure of seeing the Prime Minister there, that two-thirds of the members of the Government are usually present, and are very active members of the committee. There is not the slightest danger of injustice being done to the Government in the Committee on Public Accounts.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.)

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. But I would like to be there.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. We should be delighted to have you there. I will say that I believe we would have got on much better if the hon. gentleman had been there.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I have not the privilege of being a member of the committee.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. We will put you on by unanimous consent. I thought the hon. gentleman was already a member, but, if not, he has ample means of rectifying that unfortunate omission. Apart from that, it does appear to me that on the very ground stated by the hon. gentleman—of facilitating the public business—and on the ground of the special constitution of the committee, where differences of opinion do arise between the Auditor General and the Government of the day as to whether payments should or should not be made, that would be an extremely convenient and extremely appropriate tribunal to investigate such matters. I do not pretend to say that, in many of these cases, the Treasury Board may not be perfectly correct in the decisions they have arrived at; I have never examined the cases in detail. But I submit that it would be better that these questions be discussed in the Public Accounts Committee rather than brought up for discussion on the floor of Parliament, which is the only other place where we could discuss them. But in Parliament they would not be likely to receive the same attention as in the committee; it would not be possible to investigate the causes which led to the decision of the Treasury Board or the objection of the Auditor General with anything like the fullness that it is desirable these matters should be investigated. I am inclined to think that it would be in the interests of the Government that this should be done. I think the Minister of Justice must see that the functions exercised by the Auditor General are valuable to the Government of the day. They enable the Government to keep a much tighter grip upon the public expenditure than they otherwise could. The Auditor General is a very useful buffer on many occasions between the Government and supporters or departments that might be inclined rather to exceed the legitimate limits of their authority for purposes of special expenditure. Further, if we are to maintain the office of the Auditor General in the form in which the statute declares and designs, I do not see how we can do it without having some discussion, either in this committee or before some similar body, where there are disputes between the Auditor General and the Government of the day. The Auditor General is intended to be an independent officer. Now, if he has no kind of appeal from any decision made by the Treasury Board, the usefulness and independence of his office will be in a great measure destroyed. I think it is of the essence of the functions of the Auditor General that when he raises an objection of this kind, the matter should be discussed and a decision arrived at, which might govern him in future, saving the Government and saving us a good deal of trouble in discussing these matters, which are often of a technical and somewhat complicated character. I think the Minister will find that, in the long run, time will be saved, and that it is properly pertinent to the functions of the Public Accounts Committee that these questions should be discussed there. I do not say that a decision should be given, if the hon. gentleman objects to it. It would be quite sufficient if the committee should report to the House the conclusion they have arrived at, and the House could then take such action as it pleased. We do not ask that the committee should censure the Government in any case, but the committee should, at any rate, hear both sides—the reasons for the objections of the Auditor General and the grounds upon which the Government set aside his objection.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Mr. Speaker, I think that the hon. Prime Minister was hardly justified in the complaint he made against the Auditor General, nor did he seem to me successfully to defend that statement in the observations he just now addressed to the House. This House is paramount in matters of public expenditure; it is the guardian and trustee of a public interest in that particular. The Auditor General is not an officer of the Crown or of the Government; he is an officer of this House; he is responsible to this House. He has dissented from the practice the Government seek to establish and the course they propose to adopt in this particular case. The Treasury Board overrule the judgment of the Auditor General, and the Auditor General made a report, as I understand it, to the Minister of Finance. Now the hon. Prime Minister complains that that report which the Auditor General made to the Finance Minister is embraced in the Auditor General's report submitted to this House. The law provides that it shall be laid on the Table of the House within three days of the opening of the session, by the Minister of Finance. In the papers submitted to this House, I did not find this report of the Auditor General to the Minister of Finance anywhere except in the Auditor General's Report. Practically, I suppose, we may regard this report as coming from the Minister of Finance. If the Minister of Finance says that it does not come from him, that he has not laid it upon the Table of the House along with the Auditor General's Report, then the Minister of Finance has been negligent of his duty, he has disregarded the statute, and the only information we have is through the Auditor General, an officer of this House. I do not think it makes any practical difference to the House whether this report of the Auditor General is bound up with the Public Accounts or with the Auditor General's Report: the important fact is that the House should be put in possession of it within the period named in the statute, that is, within the first three days of the session. Now, the Treasury Board has a right to overrule the power of the Auditor General in this particular matter, but the final decision of this question is with the House. If there was nothing to be inquired into in regard to this matter, then the House might, upon a resolution, determine it without a reference to the Committee on Public Accounts. But there is a question of convenience and propriety which the Committee on Public Accounts have always been in the habit of considering; they determine nothing, but after inquiry has been made they report to this House, and the practice has always been for the House to delay its action upon a question of this sort in dispute until that report has been received. Now, the Prime Minister, as I understand, is not willing that this matter should go to the Committee on Public Accounts at all. I do not see any impropriety in that under the circumstances. He says that it does not belong to the year which the committee have to inquire into, but that it belongs to the current year, that it is for the year 1893, and not the current year the accounts of which the Committee on Public Accounts has before it at the present time. But what is the reason of having the Auditor General, when a question of difference arises with regard to public expenditure, stating his reasons for the course which he adopts, and having those reasons communicated to the House, if it is not the intention of Parliament that the matter should be at once inquired into?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. By the House?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Certainly it is by the House, and the Committee of Public Accounts do not seriously intervene with the functions of the House in that particular. The hon. Minister will see that it is a matter of the first consequence to have this question determined. Now, Mr. Speaker, when we look at the letter of the Auditor General, the House will see how very serious and how very important this question of difference is. The Auditor General says:

SIR,—I have the honour to return your application No. 93 for payments against the Oxford and

New Glasgow and Cape Breton Railway appropriations as follows:—

| | |
|----------------------------|--------------|
| Cape Breton Railway : | |
| Isbester & Reid..... | $142,264 69 |
| Daniel McGregor..... | 1,170 00 |
| Samuel C. Graham..... | 970 00 |
| McGregor, Kennedy & Graham | 2,340 00 |
| John McKeen & Co..... | 3,910 00 |
| Oxford and New Glasgow : | |
| Stewart & Jones..... | 38,055 37 |
| McDonald & O'Brien..... | 41,356 69 |

I regret to say that I do not see my way to passing the application, and beg to refer you to the Audit Act, section 38, subsection (a).

When work is performed under a contract the payments for the week are only such as the contract legally requires. Advances are made from time to time as the work progresses, on the prices given by the contract and on the quantities found by the Government engineer in charge of the work, and the final payment, if there is no difference of opinion between the contractor and the Government engineer, is made in the same way when the work has been completed.

If there is a difference between the contractor and the engineer the Exchequer Court settles the difference, the contract still governing.

In my view the Government cannot modify the contract after the work has been completed. The Government is a trustee for Parliament and the people, and is not justified in accepting less for its principals than it may legally obtain, or which is the same thing, is not justified in paying more for work than it is called upon under its contract to pay.

Now, Sir, I believe that is a sound rule, not merely in ordinary jurisprudence, but in parliamentary law. The Government have their authority from this House in matters of administration. It is the duty of the Government to carry out their contract obligations. If they wish to modify them, if they think there are extenuating circumstances which justify them in dealing more favourably with the contractor than the contracts will permit, it is their duty to come to this House and state those facts, and to get the authority of this House to do what they think ought to be done in that direction. Now, that has not been done, no such authority has been given, and no such authority has been sought for from this House; and it seems to me that the Auditor General is wholly in the right in the course which he adopted, and the Treasury Board are altogether wrong. That being so, it seems to me a matter of the first importance that this question should not stand over until the public accounts are inquired into next year, but that we should deal with it now, that the House should determine what rules are to govern, and whether a contract entered into seriously between the Government as trustees for the public, and a contractor, is one to which the Government are bound to give effect, and that they have not the discretionary power as proprietors which would enable them to set aside that contract and to make such an arrangement as they might think proper. Before such power is exercised, they must come to their principals, they must ask the authority of their principals to vary that contract in the way which they think that equity requires it to be varied in the interest of the contractor. I say that has not been done, and it seems to me it was a fair matter for the committee to inquire into and to report to this House upon before finally determining the question. The rules which regulate the matter must be settled by this House, of whom the Auditor General is an officer, is a servant, and whom we are bound to protect in the discharge of his duties, and whose authority we are bound to uphold when we believe he is acting in the public interest and in accordance with the provisions of the law

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I think the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) has really made it tolerably clear that this question does not concern the Committee on Public Accounts at all. The hon. gentleman has mentioned the points that are at issue between the Treasury Board and the Auditor General. It is not contended that there is any other evidence to obtain or that any other information is required; it was not contended by the hon. gentleman who brought this subject before the House that there were further documents, because he knew, and knew only too well, that there is a certain method prescribed by the practice of the House by which to ascertain whether there is any further information, and have it brought down and laid on the Table. But the hon. gentleman showed clearly, and I have no doubt he will admit it, that the reason he thinks this subject should be inquired into is to ascertain whether the Treasury Board was right or the Auditor General was right, what the powers of the Government, for instance, are in connection with the defence or conduct of litigation in court, whether they have the power—I fancy he is ready to challenge it—to waive the statute of limitations, whether when those points are raised and issue made the Public Accounts Committee is to be constituted a court of appeal as between the Auditor General and the Government on these questions. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) agrees with the Auditor General on the matters which have been disclosed. The whole question is this: Is the Public Accounts Committee the body, or is the House of Commons itself the body, which should settle these questions? According to the practice in England, there can be no doubt upon that question. According to our statute, to which reference has been made, I submit there should be no doubt here, because it is made a matter separate and distinct from the Auditor General's report of the expenditure for the fiscal year. It is referred to in a special paragraph, which the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) himself read from the Audit Act to-day, as a matter to be reported upon by the Auditor General to the Finance Minister, and the Finance Minister is charged with the duty of laying these papers and those files on the Table of the House for the action of the House. It has not been suggested to-day that there is any particular reason why this subject should go to the Public Accounts Committee. Hon. gentlemen opposite are candid; they wish to discuss the matter with the Auditor General, they wish the Auditor General to support the opinion he has expressed, they wish to talk it over across the Table. There is no further information to be obtained, because the Auditor General is charged by the statute to place the whole of the information in the hands of the Finance Minister, in order that the Finance Minister may put that information into the hands, not of a committee of this House, but into the hands of Parliament and lay it on the Table of the House. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), therefore, seems to me to have made it very clear that the proper place for the discussion of the policy of the Government or the power of any Government as to how far it can use its discretion in case of litigation, rests with the House, and that here is where principles should be discussed and not before the auditing committee, where the main questions concerning it are whether the money paid out has been paid out to the parties who are charged with receiving it, and whether the amount has been paid out properly, and the vouchers are correct, but not to discuss the principles or powers of the Government, not questions as to whether the money has been carefully or injudiciously spent. These are questions that could be discussed here and are questions which certainly should be raised before Parliament, where, as the First Minister himself has said, the Government as a body appears, and where they are to meet the charge and state their views of the principle whenever it is under discussion and not at a table where a committee sits and where one or two members of the Government may be found. What assistance in this case could the committee give to the House? I have already put the question in another form, but I put it in that way to show how unreasonable is the position taken. I repeat, what assistance can a committee give the House? The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) needs no more information, because he has already told us the conclusion at which he has arrived, he has taken his position on the question and has founded it on the information that the Auditor General was bound to give. But why did the Auditor General, in what appears to be an irregular manner, incorporate it in his report, which he describes himself, in his own language, to be a report concerning, not this expenditure which occurred and this question which arose in September, 1893, but in his report for the fiscal year 1892-93, with an introduction that his report is in relation to the fiscal year 1892-93? He has inserted in a most irregular manner, an opinion on the action of the Treasury Board, based on the report of the Minister of Justice, in a report for the fiscal year 1892-93, whereas this transaction relates to acts which occurred in the fiscal year 1893-94. All these subjects will come up in another form. They will come up now under the law by the reference which the Act contemplates. They will come up in the Auditor General's Report for 1893-94, and in that shape they will come before the Committee on Public Accounts. Why is it that the transaction in these two forms reaches Parliament? It seems to me for this reason: One is a question of principle, with which the House is concerned; the other is a question of audit, which concerns the Public Accounts Committee, for which purpose the committee was constituted.

Mr. LAURIER. No fault can be found with the Auditor General for having been the means of bringing this matter before the House, and if it does not come up in a proper way blame must attach to the Finance Minister for not having brought it before the House. The Auditor General has done nothing but his duty in bringing the matter before Parliament. The law specifically provides that whenever there is such conflict between the Auditor General and the Treasury Board, it shall be the duty of the Finance Minister to bring the matter before the House early after the summoning of Parliament. Let me read the law to this effect:

If the Auditor General has refused to certify that a cheque of the Minister of Finance and Receiver General may issue, on the ground that the money is not justly due, or that it is in excess of the authority granted by Council, or for any reason other than there is no parliamentary authority, then upon a report of the case prepared by the Auditor General and the Deputy of the Minister of Finance and Receiver General, the Treasury Board shall be the judge of the sufficiency of the Auditor General's objection, and may sustain him or order the issue of the cheque in its discretion.

All this has taken place. What follows?

The Auditor General shall in all cases prepare a statement of all such legal opinions, reports of Council, special warrants, and cheques issued without his certificate, and of all expenditure incurred in consequence thereof, which he shall deliver to the Minister of Finance and Receiver General, to be by him presented to Parliament not later than the third day of the session thereof then next ensuing.

All this took place, when? In September last. There can be no doubt that it was the absolute duty of the Auditor General to see that the matter was brought before Parliament, and action in that direction was to be taken by the Finance Minister. It was his duty, not the duty of the Auditor General, to have brought the matter before the House, and if any fault is to be found with any one as to the manner in which it has been brought before Parliament, there is no possible excuse for the Finance Minister not having brought it up, and there can be no doubt whatever in the minds of any hon. member that both the letter and spirit of the law have been maintained. What is the object of the provision setting forth that the subject must be brought before Parliament? It is to enable Parliament to decide between the Auditor General and the Government as to which is right or wrong. I am not in a position at this moment to decide conclusively in regard to this matter and declare that the Auditor General was in the wrong, because there is a strong opinion in my mind at the present time that he was strictly in his right in refusing to certify to the cheques and expenditures in question. But I make no pretense in regard to giving an opinion on that point. I have said nothing, and I will not at this moment attempt to decide between the Treasury Board on the one hand and the Auditor General on the other. Let us assume that both parties acted within their own view of the subject; and if there is a difference of opinion between the Auditor General and the Government, that is a matter which has to be investigated by Parliament.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Yes.

Mr. LAURIER. The right hon. gentleman agrees to that. At this moment when we have not the Order in Council, when we have not the reference to the Exchequer Court, will any one pretend that Parliament, having none of these documents, is in a position to determine this question satisfactorily? I maintain there is not a member of this House who can pronounce upon this point unless he has all those documents before him. I do not deny that Parliament itself has to decide upon this matter; no one will pretend that any committee of this House can decide it. What are the committees of this House for? Simply for convenience, simply for doing in a more expeditious manner and in a manner more conducive to justice what could not be determined so well at the bar of this House. My hon. friend (Mr. Davies) insists that the matter should be referred to the Public Accounts Committee simply to obtain information, and in order to secure all the documents which would throw light upon this subject and without which it is impossible to come to any satisfactory conclusion. The hon. gentleman knows as well as I do, that committee, whether it be the Committee on Public Accounts or a special committee, will not pass finally upon this subject and cannot give an opinion which will be binding upon this House. Their only power is to investigate the matter and to report to the House. They can report the evidence with or without their own opinion if they like, and even if they report their own opinion, it would not be binding on the House, but it could be discussed before the House intelligently and satisfactorily with all the facts before it. At the present moment the House is not in a position to pass judgment between the Government and the Auditor General, because the House has not the documents in its possession. Of course we can move for the papers, but I would ask the right hon. Premier: Will that be more expeditious or satisfactory than to bring them before a committee of this House? I maintain that, as a matter of convenience, there is far more reason to have the question investigated before the committee than to have it in the first place brought before the House. The Prime Minister a moment ago said: He objected to be brought before a committee of the House. Nobody wishes to try him there, but we wish the matter to be investigated there and the information obtained. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries later on in the debate stated, that the object of the hon. gentleman was to bring the Auditor General before the committee so as to give his opinion. What harm can there be in that? The Auditor General is not an officer of this House: he is independent of every one; but he has views of his own and his position has to be maintained with due respect. If the Auditor General comes in conflict with the Treasury Board or with the Government, what objection can there be, in the name of common sense or justice, that that officer should be heard and have an opportunity to give his own views. There are six or seven members of the Government who are members of the Public Accounts Committee and they can give their own views there. They can be heard and the Auditor General can be heard, and will any one maintain that it would not be more conducive to justice that the Treasury Board should be heard and that the Auditor General should be heard, and that the House should then pass an opinion on the saying of the one and the saying of the other? It seems to me that for every consideration, reasons of convenience, reasons of common sense, this matter should be referred to the committee to be investigated in order to collect the evidence, and in order to ascertain the reasons of both parties, before the House is finally called upon to pass judgment upon it.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Perhaps I will be indulged to say a word or two more, as confusion seems to have arisen from some expressions of mine. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), I think, understood me as objecting to these documents being laid before the House because they relate to the accounts of 1894. That was not my contention. My contention was: that the Auditor General was exceeding his duty in putting into the accounts, as he has in many places, items of expenditure for 1894. I thought I was careful to cede the contention that these papers were to be laid before the House within the first three days of the session; by whom is not material, only that I was anxious to show my hon. friend from Queen's (Mr. Davies) that it was not the statutory duty of the Auditor General, as he seemed to suppose.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) He has to do it through the channel of the Finance Minister; he has to do it all the same.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The material distinction I endeavoured to draw was this: while the accounts for the year in this book are sent to the committee for investigation, it is inconsistent with parliamentary practice, in a question where the Administration is upon trial, to send that reference to a committee to try the Government.

Mr. LAURIER. To get the facts.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Why, the hon. gentleman had the facts before him.

Mr. LAURIER. No.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The Auditor General in his report to the Treasury Board, and the Deputy Minister of Finance, have to give a full report of the facts, and that report of the facts and no other is the case upon which the Government acts and is to be tried. When the hon. leader of the Opposition states that the House has not the documents before it, I contend that the most convenient way to get the documents here to try the Government on the question is to move for the papers, and I contend also that the longest way around is to refer the matter to a committee, summon witnesses, and then get the papers. It would be most inconvenient to require the Executive to come before a committee of the House to justify the action which they have taken in this matter, or, in other words, as the hon. leader of the Opposition has stated: to hear both parties before the committee. If the committee were to hear but one party, obviously the investigation would not be a proper one, and if the committee were to hear both parties, it means that the Government is not to stand on trial before the House but to depend on a majority of the committee. That we distinctly refuse to do, and that we distinctly say is contrary to British principle, and that it would be a subversion of the rights of this House, as well as the practice of this House, to send the Government for trial to a committee. I do cocede and admit that in relation to those expenditures which are challenged by the Auditor General and in respect to which we have overruled him, we are from the report of the case placed upon our defence before the House, and ought to be prepared to justify our course. I am prepared, so far as I am concerned, to justify it. I did not know until the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) spoke, what the expenditure was which was challenged to-day, but we are ready to answer, on reasonable notice, which will enable us to get our papers. I am not ready to appear before a committee under such circumstances as this, especially before a committee of which I am not a member.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) My idea was not to refer any matter to the Public Accounts Committee in order to determine whether the Government were right or were wrong, or to try them before that committee and get a verdict one way or the other. Here we find—and I instance the particular case to illustrate the general principle—on a particular point, a payment of a large sum of money with reference to which the Auditor General says to the Treasury Board: I do not think you are within the law. The Treasury Board, without giving reasons, overrule him and say: We are within the law. We asked that information be obtained on this point before a committee, in order that the House may be informed of the facts and come to a conclusion. The facts are not stated in the correspondence. The conclusions of the Auditor, on the one hand, and the conclusions of the Government on the other, are there; the reasoning by which they came to their conclusions, the facts upon which they based them, are not there. Then, what is the method of convenience of arriving at the facts? To call the Auditor before the bar of this House and have him examined, as we went through the farce of doing on one occasion? It cannot be done; the forms of the House will not permit it. It is more convenient to let the committee find the facts. The heads of the different departments come there; they have the papers brought from the offices; the Auditor comes there with his papers; and the committee, having ascertained the facts, reports them to the House. The House is then in a position to challenge the accuracy of the Treasury Board's decision. If we are told that in no case are the Public Accounts Committee to examine into anything except the expenditures of the particular year, it will be eighteen or twenty months before those expenditures can be examined into. The time to conduct such an examination is when the facts are familiar to everybody, when the public are interested in knowing why and for what any public moneys were paid, and not two years later, when public interest in the matter shall have largely passed away. The conclusion which the hon. gentleman is asking the House to come to is a very serious one if it amounts to this, that when a difference of opinion arises between the Auditor General and the Treasury Board, it must not be settled in the Committee on Public Accounts, but in this House, where the facts cannot be got at. I submit to the hon. gentleman that he is not laying down a rule of reasonable convenience, or one that will work well, but one that will be the subject of constant discussions and recriminations. Surely the Public Accounts Committee should exist for the purpose of getting at such facts as these, and reporting them to the House whenever required.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. This much has been acquired by the discussion: the hon. gentleman has indicated the correspondence that he desires to examine. I understand that he disavows any intention that the committee shall deal with the right or wrong of the matter, but is willing that that shall be determined by the House. I understand that the reference he wishes to make to the committee shall be of a limited character; and therefore perhaps he will consider the suggestion I made that he should draft a resolution indicating what he desires the committee to inquire into, so that we may consider the matter.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The resolution I offered the other day was simply to refer all the correspondence. I had formed no opinion on the matter one way or the other, and I wanted to read over the evidence—to look at the contract and the reference to the judge on which the Auditor based his opinion. I had come to no conclusion, and I wanted to have the facts on which to found a conclusion. When I questioned the Auditor in the committee, I was told that I should not do that because the correspondence was not before the committee, and I moved to refer the correspondence, in order that the committee might have jurisdiction over the subject-matter. I think the hon. gentleman knows that I would not be disposed to press the jurisdiction of the committee beyond due bounds, or ask improper questions there.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Will the hon. gentleman indicate what resolution he proposes to move—what instruction he would like to give to the committee? Because it is evidently a limited one.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) It is to refer that correspondence to the committee. Will there be any objection to that?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. There is an objection, because that will be practically an instruction to the committee to report to the House whether the decision of the Treasury Board has been correct or not.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) It is not an instruction. I merely want the committee to ascertain what the facts are.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. You have the facts now.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I have not the facts. There is the contract; I have not that. There is the reference to the Exchequer Court; I have not that. The Auditor says these do not justify the subsequent action of the Government. I do not know whether they do or not until I see them.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.)

Mr. FRASER. If the Government would only permit the motion to be adopted of which I gave notice on April 18, asking for reports, papers and orders relating to the Hard Pan cases, and also the findings of the judge of the Exchequer Court respecting the said claims, the House would be in possession of all the papers.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. There is no objection to the passage of that.

Mr. CASEY. One claim has been made by the hon. Premier in connection with this proposed reference which I do not think we can pass over in silence, although I do not intend to enter into the merits of this particular controversy, as to which I am not very well informed. The hon. Premier claimed that to allow a reference of this matter to the committee was to put the Government on trial before the committee, and that, he said, they were firmly determined to refuse. Now, Mr. Speaker, we cannot forget that in almost every investigation before the Public Accounts Committee, the Government is on trial. It is for the purpose of inquiring into the conduct of the Government in connection with our finances that matters are referred to that committee. Further than that, Sir, we have had in recent years instances of the Government being actually on trial—individual Ministers being personally on trial before that committee in regard to actions for which they were held personally liable. In 1891 and 1892 we had members of the Government examined, and examined on oath, before that committee, as a result of which one member of the Government at least ceased his connection with it.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. No Minister is exempt from investigation, but for an act by the Government as a whole the Government ought to answer to this House.

Mr. CASEY. I am glad to have the hon. gentleman's explanation; but the words he used certainly bore the interpretation I gave to them, that the Government refused to be put on trial before the committee. He says now that he is willing to have any Minister examined as to matters for which he is personally responsible, but that when the Government as a whole is responsible, the committee has nothing to do with it. I have always understood that the Government were responsible, as a whole, for their course, and for every act of every Minister, unless they chose to purge themselves by the removal of that Minister. I wonder how far the hon. gentleman would carry his theory. If the Government has been freed of its responsibility by the exclusion from its ranks of the hon. member for Three Rivers (Sir Hector Langevin), then the First Minister may claim not to be responsible for that hon. gentleman's acts while Minister. If his dismissal or resignation from the Government, or whatever it was, be not taken to purge the Government from any stain that might rest upon it, as the result of the investigations, then the Government is still responsible. But it would almost seem as if the hon. Minister had drawn his line since those inquiries and revelations were made. It would seem as if he had determined to draw the line at the hon. member for Three Rivers, and had decided not to permit inquiry into the actions of the Government before the Public Accounts Committee to go any further. He speaks of the limitation of the inquiry. The hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) wishes merely to refer the correspondence, in a general way to the committee. That is exactly what is ordinarily done—referring correspondence on matters to the committee with no limitation as to the extent of the inquiry. It seems to me the committee ought to be the best judge as to how far they need inquire. The reference to the committee for purposes of inquiry does not give them any right to pronounce final sentence on the matters inquired into. The House has the final right of pronouncing sentence on every matter that comes before it. And I do not know why the First Minister should bring up the purely imaginary idea that it was intended, in this case, to give the committee the power of pronouncing final sentence as between the Government and the Auditor General. I have not heard anything in the discussion which warrants any such idea. It is a bugbear, brought up to frighten us from making the ordinary reference in a matter of this kind. It is quite clear, with regard to obtaining documents or evidence, that they are more easily obtained by the committee. There is no means of obtaining them by notice of motion this session, unless the Government undertake to lay them on the Table themselves. For these reasons, a general reference, permitting the committee to go into the matter as fully as possible is completely justified.

Motion agreed to; and House again resolved itself into Committee on Ways and Means.

(In the Committee.)

Velvets, velveteens and plush fabrics, n.e.s., 30 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. COATSWORTH. I have a communication from the Toronto Board of Trade asking that the item of velveteens should be put in dress goods at 25 per cent.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The members of the Board of Trade are not in favour of the Government, apparently, at present.

Mr. FOSTER. Oh, yes.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. They remonstrate inconveniently. The hon. gentleman cannot expect that Toronto will fare better than Montreal. How does this compare with the old duty?

Mr. FOSTER. On cotton velvets the old duty was 20 per cent.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. While the hon. gentleman is looking into the matter more in detail, I may say that it does appear to me that there is a good deal in the complaint which was made by the Toronto Board of Trade with regard to the article of cotton velveteens, and similar fabrics. The hon. gentleman knows that these fabrics enter largely into general consumption, and he is proposing to increase the original duty by 50 per cent, though that duty was heavy enough before, in all conscience. The former duty was 20 per cent, and he proposes to raise that to 30 per cent. This is a very heavy increase, and it will fall upon a class whose burthens we ought not lightly to increase.

Mr. FOSTER. There may be something in the hon. gentleman's contention, looked at from one side; there is, however, another side to this question. In the rearrangement of duty, revenue has been lost, and something must be done to make up that loss. While the duties on articles of more wide distribution, and of greater necessity, have been lowered, I think I was perfectly justified in increasing this duty on articles which may fairly be classed as luxuries. Poor men have luxuries as well as rich, and I think that velvets and velveteens may fairly be classed under the head of luxuries. They certainly are not actual necessities of life; they are not used for common wear, but are the ornaments, or adornments, in other words, the luxuries of life, whether they be of the finer and dearer, or of the coarser and cheaper sorts. Again, there was this to be said, that there were difficulties of interpretation as between velvets and velveteens, and differences in the rates of duty charged. It tends to fairness and uniformity in the law to put them all under one classification. On these grounds, the duty was made 30 per cent. The hon. gentleman said I had not given much heed to the representations of the Board of Trade. I had an extended conference with the representatives of this board, and that of Montreal. They did me the justice to say that they got most of what they asked; and I do not think men are justified in complaining merely because they do not get all they ask. There are many men, and many public bodies in this country that must get along without having all they desire.

Mr. McMULLEN. The hon. gentleman evidently does not take note of the costumes of those about him, or he would not have made the statement that the cotton velveteens are little worn.

Mr. FOSTER. I did not say they were not much worn; I said they were not articles of common and necessary wear.

Mr. McMULLEN. The hon. Minister is mistaken. There is no retailer of dry goods in this House but will admit that common cotton velveteens are very much worn, and by the poorer class of people. They are used for trimming in many cases, and also for making dresses. That depends, of course, upon what the styles are. If they were now, as they were a year ago, he would find many of the poorer classes wearing cotton velvet dresses. The hon. gentleman is not doing the poorer class justice, because, while he is virtually lowering the duty on silk velvets, he is actually adding 10 per cent to the cotton velvets. Now, if he wants to devise a duty that will fall equitably upon all classes, he should not increase the duty on the goods of the poor and take it off those of the rich. That is what he is doing by changing the duties upon those velvets. The hon. gentleman would surely not insinuate that the richer class use cotton velvets, for they certainly do not. These goods are largely used in making dresses and also in trimming cheap winter dresses for the children, and for women, and mainly by the poorer classes. While the hon. gentleman is readjusting his tariff, professedly in the interests of the consumer, he is putting a heavy duty upon these goods which are used mainly by those who can least afford to pay taxes.

Mr. CASEY. It is certainly news to learn that cotton velvets are a luxury. The hon. Minister says that when he has reduced the duties on so many articles of wide use—referring, no doubt, to his heavy reductions on coal oil and pig iron—he must retain some duties in order to raise the revenue, and he increases the tax on cotton velvets on the ground that they are a luxury. If he had added 10 per cent to the duty on silk velvets, there might be something in what he is contending; but cotton velvets are not a luxury, but are in common use by the class who are not rich. The hon. gentleman says he wants to impose this tax in order to help to make up the million and a half that, he says, will be lost by the reductions that he has made. I fear, Sir, that it is for the purpose of not receiving revenue that this tax has been increased. It is probably hoped by those who suggested this item to the Minister that the duty of 30 per cent on cotton velvets will exclude goods of foreign manufacture, and enable the cotton interest here to produce this article at increased cost to the consumer, but at a loss to the revenue of the country. If we were not accustomed to everything absurd in the way of argument, the statement that cotton velveteens are a luxury would startle us.

Mr. McMULLEN.

Mr. McMULLEN. Are any of these goods manufactured in this country?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. No.

Mr. FOSTER. I understood the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) to say that I had reduced the duty on silk velvet. On what ground did he make that statement?

Mr. McMULLEN. I was referring to the item that followed. The hon. gentleman has kept the duty on silk velvet as it was, and has increased the duty on cotton velvet, and I understand there are no cotton velvets manufactured in this country.

Mr. FOSTER. No; this is simply for revenue purposes.

Mr. CASEY. It may be to achieve the same result as that achieved on agate iron ware—to enable some manufacturer to try experiments for a year or two to find out whether he can make these goods or not.

Item agreed to.

Webbing, elastic and non-elastic, 20 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. COATSWORTH. I have been requested by the same body to ask that webbing, elastic and non-elastic, now at 20 per cent, and braids and fringes, and elastic, round and flat, now at 30 per cent, should be classified together at 25 per cent, in order to avoid confusion.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not think that much confusion can arise with reference to these articles—elastic and non-elastic. Even a non-expert can judge the difference between them.

Mr. McMULLEN. At what percentage do these articles come in when not imported by corset and dress-stay makers for use in their own factories?

Mr. FOSTER. It depends on whether they are coloured or not. Most of them would come in under 30 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Laces, braids, fringes, embroideries, cords, elastic round or flat, tassels and bracelets; braids, chains or cords of hair; lace collars and all similar goods; handkerchiefs, lace, netts and netting of cotton, silk, linen or other material; table cloths and curtains, when made up, trimmed or untrimmed, 30 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. CASEY. I see that table cloths hitherto have been variously taxed according to the material of which they were made. I see also that handkerchiefs will be increased 5 per cent by the change—

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. No doubt the hon. gentleman regards handkerchiefs as a luxury.

Mr. FOSTER. In times of influenza they are.

Mr. CASEY. What was the average tax on table cloths under the old duties? Has the hon. gentleman looked into that.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes; he looked into it.

Mr. CASEY. Is this an increase or a decrease?

Mr. FOSTER. Parts will come under the old duties, a large proportion of which were specific and ad valorem. Probably on those the duty is lower.

Mr. CASEY. Taking table cloths altogether, is this a reduction or an increase?

Mr. FOSTER. I think it is about the same. Item agreed to.

Cotton, sewing thread in hanks or on tubes, black, bleached, or unbleached, three and six-cord, 15 per cent.

Mr. FOSTER. I wish to amend that by leaving out "or on tubes." The object of that is to prevent what is practically spooled cotton thread from coming in at the duty under which unspooled is supposed to come in. It is put on tubes, and it can be used just as successfully as if it were on the spools.

Item agreed to.

Cotton, sewing thread and crochet cotton on spools or in balls, 25 per cent.

Mr. FOSTER. Add "or on tubes."

Mr. EDGAR. Would the Minister of Finance explain what cotton thread came in this year at 20 per cent? A whole lot of cotton sewing thread came in at 20 per cent. That is just where the Controller and I had a little discussion. On page 44 of the Trade and Navigation Returns you will find two items, one of which, sewing cotton thread, n.e.s., came in at 20 per cent, and the other item, all other cotton thread, n.e.s., 20 per cent. I want to know if you propose to leave the same uncertainty in the tariff for the future that there has been in the past, and to allow sewing cotton thread to come in as n.e.s.

Mr. WALLACE. These two items the hon. gentleman refers to on page 44 are not 4 per cent of the total cotton that has been imported. The first item of $9,300 refers to crochet cotton; it is not sewing cotton, but is used for another purpose. The sewing cotton is on page 43 of the Trade and Navigation Returns, and is in two items, the first one, $324,000 on spools, on which the duty is 25 per cent; and the other one, $219,000 in hanks, which were imported into this country, so as to spool them here. That is 12½ per cent, and that is covered by these two items. Under the change as proposed here, crochet cotton is put into the same list as other cottons, so that they may have the same rate of duty imposed on them as all other cottons. If they are in hanks, they come in at 12½ per cent; if in balls, as they usually are, they will pay 25 per cent just the same as sewing cotton.

Mr. EDGAR. That is an explanation as to how this is to be avoided in the future in the case of that one of the items.

Mr. WALLACE. Both.

Mr. EDGAR. They are not both crochet thread. The hon. gentleman explained as to one importation of $9,000. There is another of $6,000.

Mr. WALLACE. The other is a fancy knitting thread, and that will come in under this item, 12½ per cent if it is hanks, or 25 per cent if it is on spools or in balls.

Mr. EDGAR. Why did it not come in under this item last year?

Mr. FOSTER. I do not see why it should not, and I think the simplest way would be to add to that: "and all other cotton thread, n.e.s." We will do that, with the consent of the committee.

Mr. CASEY. It seems to me this amounts to a protection of 12½ per cent on the winding of this thread on spools. It comes in in hanks at 12½ per cent, but if it is on spools or balls, there is a duty of 25 per cent; that is to say, there would be a protection of 12½ per cent to an importer who simply spooled the cotton and resold it. Is not that a correct interpretation?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes; but it is not so simple an operation as you think.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It does appear that my hon. friend's objection is well taken, and that we are protecting men in the industry of putting thread on spools, which cannot be described as a valuable infant industry by any conceivable twist of the hon. gentleman's mind. I should like to understand on what principle he proposes to reward men for simply winding thread, already manufactured, on spools—and I take it that is the practical result of this clause in his tariff.

Mr. WALLACE. There is a good deal more work than merely winding it on spools. In the first place, there is the making of the spools, or if they are imported, they have to pay duty. Besides that, there is the making of the pasteboard box, and the package in which they are placed; and a large amount of printing is done, and other necessary work.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Does the hon. gentleman mean the labels on the spools?

Mr. WALLACE. No; the boxes in which they are placed are printed on four sides.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I should really like to know a little more about this valuable industry. It is not the only case in which articles that are really manufactured abroad are brought in, and some favoured individual obtains protection of 100 per cent over the other duty (because 25 bears to 12 relatively a protection of 100 per cent), without really giving any kind of equivalent by employing an adequate number of hands. A very large quantity of cotton sewing thread is necessarily consumed in this country, and unless the hon. gentleman has fuller information, this is a very queer item to ask the committee to pass. How many men are employed in this industry, first, in making spools, and next, in winding thread upon them, omitting for the present the question of printing?

Mr. WALLACE. The statement was made by a Toronto firm that they employ 30 or 40 hands, and there are six principal manufacturers who import this cotton into Canada. The very fact that out of $540,000 or $550,000, less than one-half, or $219,000, was imported in hanks, and the manufacture completed here shows that importation is not very profitable, or the whole quantity would be imported in hanks and the cotton spooled in this country. At the present time we import 40 per cent of what we use. The other 60 per cent is brought in in spools, showing that winding on spools is not a very profitable industry.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. How many men does the Minister claim to be engaged winding thread on spools?

Mr. WALLACE. The winding of the thread is a very small part of the business. There is the making of the spools, the making of boxes and a great deal of printed paper is used in connection with the industry; but the duty on these branches is high, and therefore the work is being done here and protection given to the industry.

Mr. CASEY. The hon. Controller of Customs has frankly admitted that this is an infant industry. It is no doubt a very small infant, but the Government have a great many such infants to support. They all owe their existence to the Government, and its policy, and must be supported. The Controller has informed the committee that cotton thread of the value of $219,000 was imported unwound. The protection to the parties who spool their thread, at 12½ per cent, would represent $26,000. So the country has paid $26,000 for having last year imported $219,000 worth of thread unwound, which was afterward spooled, put in boxes, gummed, and so on. It cannot be imagined that the difference represented the cost to the manufacturer, and that it would not have been cheaper to have imported the thread already wound. The hon. Controller of Customs has declared that if it had been profitable all the thread would have been imported already wound. The manufacturers, however, claimed the right to wind the thread on their own spools, put their own brand on it and name; that is the reason why there was not a larger quantity imported.

Item agreed to.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

Cordage, n.e.s., 30 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. BOWERS. Does this apply to all hemp and manila cordage?

Mr. FOSTER. To sisal and manila cordage.

Mr. BOWERS. What was the hon. gentleman's intention in advancing the duty to 30 per cent?

Mr. FOSTER. We did not do it.

Mr. BOWERS. Taking the invoices of last year and the present duty of 30 per cent, there is an increase of 30 per cent. It appears that in the tariff submitted this year most of the advances have been made on articles used by the people of the Maritime Provinces, especially cordage. Why should the fishermen be called upon to pay an increase of 20 per cent on cordage, while western farmers have secured a decrease on binding twine used by them? Fishermen have pretty hard times under any circumstances, for they have to brave the storms of the ocean, and find it difficult often to earn a livelihood, and yet an advance on one article used by them is proposed equal to 20 per cent. It almost looks as if this duty had been given as a sop to the Consumers' Cordage Company for the 12½ per cent dropped off the duties last year on binding twine. Let the Finance Minister take into consideration whether it is not possible to reduce the duty somewhat. Take manila at a cost of 10 cents, the old duty would be 10 per cent ad valorem and 1¼ cents per pound, which would be equivalent to 2¼ cents, while that proposed by the new tariff would be 3 cents or 33⅓ per cent.

Mr. FOSTER. Is 10 cents the present price of manila?

Mr. BOWERS. It is a little below 10 cents at present. It is 8½ cents.

Mr. FOSTER. I understand it is about 7 cents.

Mr. BOWERS. That would be only on the larger sizes of cordage; the smaller sizes used for fishing are higher. Cordage, however, is exceptionally cheap just now, and taking an average of 10 years the price of manila would be 12 or 13 cents per pound. It appears as if the Finance Minister were endeavouring to force the fishermen of the Maritime Provinces to use our domestic cordage, and that is within half a cent or three-quarters of a cent of the price of imported American cordage. American cordage is worth very much more, and it is a hardship to seek to compel our fishermen to use cordage manufactured in the Dominion. Take 6 and 9-thread rope, which is used to an enormous extent for lobster nets and in trolling by our fishermen, especially the 6-thread, 100 pounds of it made in the Dominion would make a difference of 10 or 15 per cent in weight, according to size. I think the Finance Minister is pressing the people of the Maritime Provinces a little too severely.

Mr. FOSTER. I can only frame the tariff according to actual prices, and in framing the duty on this item we are endeavouring to accomplish two objects. One is to do away with the double duty, and make the duty a specific one, and the other is to lower the duty, if anything, on the article. At the present prices of sisal and manila on the New York market, if you make calculations on the basis of the old duty a little more than 30 per cent will be the rate. The hon. gentleman will not get very far in endeavouring to produce the impression amongst the fishermen that this Government is harassing them with respect to lines and twine. If the hon. gentleman will refer to the Trade and Navigation Returns he will find that the fishermen obtain the great bulk of the articles they use in the shape of twine entirely duty free. The Board of Marine for the upper lakes specially waited upon me with reference to this, under the impression that the 30 per cent tariff was higher than the old, but when I talked it over with them, and when we took the quotations, they found that at present prices, 30 per cent was a lower rate than the $1\frac{1}{4}$ cents and 10 per cent. However, I think, in order to avoid the double duty, and to keep just a straight ad valorem duty, and to make it beyond doubt that it is a less tax than before, if the committee will allow me, I intend to ask them to put that at $27\frac{1}{2}$ per cent.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Oh, make it 25 per cent.

Mr. FOSTER. I cannot.

Mr. EDGAR. The Minister of Finance must be in error when he says that the duty was about 30 per cent before, because according to the importations of cordage of all kinds, n.e.s., at page 38 of the Trade and Navigation Returns, as I make it out, the duty paid on the total importations was slightly under 24 per cent. There are two items on that page, one is cordage cotton braids, which amounted to 30 per cent, but the item which we are considering now, at the old duty of $1\frac{1}{4}$ cents per pound, and 10 per cent, amounted to, as nearly as possible, 24 per cent. When the Minister has reduced the duty at all, he ought certainly reduce it to that figure. There are other considerations involved in this. The hon. Minister knows as well as the public knows, that cordage is in the hands of a great combine in this country. He knows that there is a Consumers' Cordage Company in Canada which has bought up all the mills. In binder twine, of course, there is some competition now, thanks to the Ontario Government, and the action of the farmers themselves.

Mr. SPROULE. What about Kingston ?

Mr. EDGAR. That combine, the Consumers' Cordage Company, was incorporated in June, 1890, with a capital of \$1,000,000, quite enough, I am sure, to buy up a few industries in Canada. Then, in sixteen months, they increased their capital to \$3,000,000, which has all been issued, as paid up ; how it was issued, we do not exactly know, but there is stock increased by watering, or otherwise, from \$1,000,000 to \$3,000,000 in sixteen months, and they have an absolute monopoly of this article. Instead of reducing the duty below 24 per cent, which it was on the importation of last year, the Minister of Finance now suggests that he is doing a grand liberal thing to the consumers of cordage in this country by making it $27\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. He ought to have brought that duty down so as to prevent this \$3,000,000 combine controlling the trade of this country, a combine which has shut up several mills and thrown the workmen out on the streets, so as to make enormous profits to pay dividends on the \$3,000,000 capital.

Mr. FORBES. I am very glad that the Minister of Finance has seen fit, after a short discussion to reduce that duty from 30 per cent to $27\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. He must, however, bear in mind that this is still an increase over the old tariff of 15 per cent on certain grades, and a great deal more on others. Although I am not a dealer in those articles, I know it to be a fact that certain the Canadian factories sell the same to fishermen are sold at a higher rate to them than the Canadian factories sell the same to fishermen in other countries. These factories can export it and sell to foreign fishermen at a less price per pound than they sell to our own fishermen. If such is the case, I cannot see why the Minister of Finance should object to reduce this duty. His failure to do so indicates that he is endeavouring to make the fishermen pay a higher rate of duty upon certain essential articles to their business, because they are given an advantage in having, free of duty, other articles which they use. As the hon. gentleman (Mr. Edgar) has told us, although this cordage company is prosecuting its business by virtue of a statute, nevertheless, they are extorting illegitimate prices from the consumers. It is time for the Government to consider whether they have not sufficient notice given to them of this condition of affairs, to cause them to still further reduce this tax. It has been pointed out by the hon. member for Digby (Mr. Bowers) that this tax bears unjustly and unfairly upon our fishermen. They use a quality of rope and cordage which can be produced only at a higher price, so that this duty bears more heavily on that industry than on other industries using cordage. They use very large quantities of it, lobster men use it, shipbuilders use it, all kinds of fishermen use it, and it would be a wise and just thing for the Finance Minister to detect another error in the tariff so as to reduce this duty further. The time will not arrive between now and the next session of Parliament to make this needed reduction; but probably after the next session, when the new Government takes charge of affairs, we will be able to reduce the duty on this item. It is necessary for the fishermen who are now fitting out for the season's operations, as well as for those who will fit out next spring, that the Minister of Finance should now give them the advantage of a further reduction of the tax on these articles.

Mr. WALLACE. The hon. gentleman has not any very great grievance to complain of on behalf of the fishermen, because the fishermen not only get their nets and seines free, but they get all their fishing lines and twines in connection with the fishing industry, absolutely free of duty. The imports during the past year of these articles alone, for the use of fishermen—I give the foreign price—was $425,000, which, I am quite certain, is ample to equip all the fishermen in Canada with all the nets and seines and cordage they want. They have not to pay one farthing of duty on that.

Mr. BOWERS. Does the hon. gentleman say their cordage is free?

Mr. WALLACE. Twines and cords in connection with their fishing.

Mr. BOWERS. I will remember that. Will he allow us to import it free of duty?

Mr. WALLACE. I say that fishing lines and twines in connection with their fishing is free.

Mr. FORBES. Will the Controller point out where that is stated? Will he show me what item that is?

Mr. WALLACE. I can give the hon. gentleman samples that are distributed to every maritime port, of the various twines and cords that are admitted free, and some of them are of a very large size, indeed, because they are required for various kinds of fishing: in fact, twines of a larger grade.

Mr. CASEY. Does it include ropes for rigging fishing vessels?

Mr. WALLACE. It does not.

Mr. BOWERS. Or ropes for the nets?

Mr. WALLACE. Yes, it does, and I can show the samples which are sent out to the collectors of the maritime ports, as kinds of cordage that are permitted to come in free. As I have already stated, $425,000 worth were brought in free of duty last year, not a particle of duty was paid on it. The higher-priced cordages and twines that come in for the fishermen are free of duty.

Mr. BOWERS. Is there any kind of manila cordage that comes in free?

Mr. WALLACE. Certainly. It does not matter what the material is, if it is for use in the fisheries it comes in free of duty, whether it is cotton, manila or sisal. At the highest price at which these twines are sold to-day, $6\frac{1}{4}$ cents a pound the duty in the old tariff amounts to 30 per cent. at 5 cents a pound it amounts to 35 per cent, and at 4 cents a pound to 41 per cent. We have reduced all these to $27\frac{1}{2}$ per cent.

Mr. McMULLEN. I am very glad to have the statement brought out that was made by the hon. Controller of Customs a moment ago, that $425,000 worth of twine was brought into Canada for the fishermen last year, on which not a brass farthing of duty was paid, while the farmers have had to pay duty on all the twine they use, down to binding twine. I shall be in a position to use that statement with the farmers of this country. It is a very fishy tariff all through. My hon. friend here says that the fishermen have never been able to get the advantages that the Controller says they are entitled to, the tariff being understood in one way at one place and in another way in another place. It is for the fishermen in the east and in the west, while the farmers in the centre are made its victims. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman if it is not as necessary to cultivate the soil of this country as to fish in its waters. If so, why are not the farmers allowed to bring in free rope to make lines for tying their horses and cattle, for which purposes an enormous quantity is used? But the farmers have to bear the brunt of this beautiful tariff. They are not allowed to import $425,000 worth of twine duty free. Yet, I have no doubt that the hon. gentleman will take the stump and tell them that the present tariff has been largely changed in the interests of the agricultural classes—that they have made great reductions in order to encourage them. But we have an admission now to the contrary, and I shall not forget it. I hope to have the opportunity of meeting the hon. gentleman on the stump some time and repeating his admission of to-day.

Mr. BOWERS. I think the hon. Controller must be mistaken in saying that there are certain kinds of manila cordage which are brought in free for use in the fisheries. I have been importing American cordage for the last ten or twelve years, and I have never yet imported any free. Last fall I imported two or three tons of American manila, a large part of which had from six to nine threads, the kind used in the fisheries, and the customs officer of my port would not allow me to enter it free. If there are some places where manila cordage is admitted free, I shall have to make application for $200 or $300 of drawback. The hon. Minister of Finance is putting the prices a little too low. The size I have imported costs 8 cents a pound, on which the new rate of duty will amount to 15 cents per 100 pounds more than old rates.

Mr. FOSTER. On the average it is much lower.

Mr. BOWERS. The hon. gentleman knows that probably in a year or so, as soon as the combination in the United States stop fighting among themselves, cordage will take a jump of 2 or 3 cents per pound, and then the rate in the new tariff will be much higher than the rate of the old tariff.

Mr. FORBES. The hon. Controller of Customs made the statement that we imported $425,000 worth of free cordage for the fishermen last year.

Mr. WALLACE. No; I said nets, seines, fishing lines and twines.

Mr. FORBES. We were discussing the item of cordage, which I imagine the Controller would know includes both large and small sizes.

Mr. WALLACE. I said fishing appliances.

Mr. FORBES. The hon. gentleman sought to justify this tax on the fishermen by stating that they had imported $425,000 worth free last year. That is to say that because the fishermen get a certain amount of their raw material free, they must under this tariff submit to a vexatious tax on cordage in order to compensate the manufacturers for what the fishermen get in free. This is the natural conclusion. Otherwise he is attempting to deceive the committee and the House by saying that fishermen imported cordage free, and that I was entirely wrong in stating this was a tax on them. One of two things must then be the result of his own argument. Either he has backed down and withdrawn his statement or his statement was misleading. Fish-hooks, nets, seines, fishing lines, and twines come in free, but other cordage is taxed. That which comes in free is only a small quantity of the material used by the fishermen. All the other ropes and cordage are taxed. I asked the Finance Minister to justify, if he could, this increase under this tariff, and the only answer he gave is that the fishermen got certain articles in free.

Mr. TAYLOR. It would be well if hon. gentlemen opposite had before them a copy of the American tariff, so that they might see how the American people use their fishermen as compared with the way we use them. These hon. gentlemen are fond of eulogising everything done in the country to the south of us, but I do not hear them making any references to the new American tariff. I notice in the tariff that gill-netting, seines, &c., are increased from 25 to 40 per cent, while in Canada they come in free.

An hon. MEMBER. But they make all their own nets?

Mr. TAYLOR. They are protectionists. Then, according to the argument of hon. gentlemen opposite, their manufacturers must charge that 40 per cent in addition to the cost of the article. We spent about two hours of valuable time the other night discussing collars and cuffs, on which we placed a duty of 24 cents per dozen, and 30 per cent ad valorem; but in the American tariff collars and cuffs, composed wholly or partly of linen, are taxed 50 cents per dozen and 30 per cent. If hon. gentlemen opposite would take a copy of the American tariff, they would find that there is not an item in that tariff on which the duty is less than it is in ours. On the contrary, in every instance it is 25 to 30 per cent more.

Mr. FORBES. We do not look to Washington.

Mr. TAYLOR. You do certainly when you think you can make an unfavourable comparison between our Government and the Government at Washington.

Committee rose, and it being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

House again resolved itself into Committee on Ways and Means.

(In the Committee.)

Cordage, n.e.s., 30 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. KAULBACH. I was rather surprised before six o'clock to hear hon. gentlemen opposite criticising the protection given to our fishermen, and also expressing themselves not very favourably with regard to the farmers. Now, the fishermen, I contend, do not receive benefits to too large an extent, because they have to encounter many risks and receive but a very meagre reward. The benefits they receive, are in lines, twine, nets, &c., which has free entry. With regard to cordage, hon. gentlemen think the Controller of Customs was slightly in error. With regard to the protection given the farmer, it should not be forgotten that they are very well protected. Were a reduction to be made in the tariff on many articles of farm produce, they would find the American products coming in and flooding the market. They would find the American products slaughtered in our market, which would have the result of causing our farmers to have a very insignificant living, or, perhaps, be crippled entirely. With regard to the item of cordage, I would ask that the duty be made 25 per cent instead of 27½. I think it would be no more than fair to make such a reduction. It will not amount to very much, while it will be more satisfactory to the fishermen, who use a very large quantity of that description of cordage. I refer particularly to the small cordage.

Mr. McINERNEY. I would like to support the demand of the hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Kaulbach). I think 25 per cent would be nearer the old duty than 30 per cent, and therefore I would ask that the duty be reduced to 25 per cent. The old duty of 1¼ cents a pound on the 5 cent rope is equivalent to 25 per cent, and adding the 10 per cent ad valorem, makes the total duty 35 per cent. On the 10 cents rope, the duty of $1\frac{1}{4}$ cents a pound would amount to $12\frac{1}{2}$ per cent ad valorem, and adding the 10 per cent ad valorem would make it $22\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. Striking the difference between $22\frac{1}{2}$ and 35 per cent. I think 25 per cent would be the fairer duty. As the Finance Minister seems inclined to make a reduction, I would ask him to make the duty the square figure of 25 per cent.

Mr. FOSTER. If hon. gentlemen do not agree with me, as I do not with them. I think it would be to their advantage to make it $27\frac{1}{2}$ per cent, instead of the old duty. There seems to be a latent fear that the object was to raise the duty on that twine. That was not the idea, but if hon. gentlemen would rather have it so, I am willing to put the duty as it was.

Mr. McINERNEY. I would prefer to have it as it was.

Mr. EDGAR. Does the hon. gentleman intend to consult us about that?

Mr. FOSTER. I spoke generally.

Mr. EDGAR. We have not agreed to that.

Mr. FLINT. I would like to ask the Finance Minister if he has conveniently at hand any statement of the amount of manila and sisal cordage that would come under this description consumed in Canada, of Canadian manufacture? I have been unable to ascertain the fact from any report to which I can gain access. Or can the Minister give any idea anywhere near the amount?

Mr. FOSTER. No.

Mr. FLINT. That is rather gratifying to me in this particular, that it shows that my failure to obtain the information was not due to my own fault, but to the fact that the information is not accessible. Although we have succeeded in obtaining, through the urgency of the hon. member for Digby (Mr. Bowers) a slight reduction, I think the feeling on the part of the Maritime members generally on both sides is that we have just tasted enough blood to give us a taste for a little more. Looking at the Trade and Navigation Returns, I find that the practical effect of the old tariff has been prohibitory, because although every one knows an enormous amount of cordage must be consumed by the various large interests of the Dominion, so effectually has the tariff thrown the trade into the hands of the home manufacturers, or the combine which now controls it, that only about $59,000 worth of cordage of all kinds, n.e.s., were imported. I think we would not be stating the case unfairly if we said that $500,000 would represent the rest of the cordage that this combine is able to force the consumers of the Dominion to use. The increase in the present tariff over the previous one, provided prices remain substantially the same as now, is about 19 per cent. I believe the

Mr. McINERNEY.

Finance Minister is relying almost entirely upon a notion he has that the price of cordage will remain as low as it is at the present time. Now, there are many reasons why this product is lower at the present time than it has been for some years before.

Mr. FOSTER. I propose to restore the old duty.

Mr. FLINT. We ought to go a great deal further than that. The Minister ought to reduce the tariff far below the old duty and take off the specific duty altogether, making it wholly an ad valorem duty. If the Minister would take off the $1\frac{1}{4}$ cents per pound, and make the ad valorem duty 10 per cent, I think that would be something like fair and honest treatment of the consumers of this commodity. This would afford ample incidental protection for the manufacturers of this product, and would probably yield even a larger revenue than the duty he proposes. If the difference between the import price, and the price of the goods here went into the Treasury, there would be less reason to complain, but, as this tariff is arranged, almost the whole of the difference goes into the pockets of a gigantic monopoly, and the people are forced to purchase about \$500,000 worth of home-made cordage, a large portion of which they could import more satisfactorily to themselves and of a great deal better quality than is now manufactured in Canada, while the Treasury would reap the advantage of increased revenue, and such protection would be afforded to the manufacturer as would be satisfactory to reasonable men. I do not base this claim, as some have done, upon the peculiar class interests of the fishermen, though they have a strong claim, a claim which has been recognized by the Government in many cases. The Controller of Customs, however, probably through ignorance of the exact state of the case, said that cordage for fishermen's use had been allowed for many years to enter free. If that is the case, then the orders of the department have not been properly transmitted to the various collectors of customs.

Mr. WALLACE. I quoted you the words of the Act.

Mr. FLINT. All I know is that I have been told seriously by persons handling this product that they have not been allowed to import it free. The item on page 304 of the Trade and Navigation Returns, quoted by the hon. gentleman, does not include this product at all. This item reads:

Nets and seines, and fishing lines and twines, not including threads and twines commonly used for sewing and manufacturing purposes.

This does not include cordage. Now, I hope that, if the collectors of customs have been in error in their interpretation of the statutes or Orders in Council, or if the Controller has been in error in thinking that cordage was included in this item, the Government will see that that interpretation of the law is enforced in the future. As has been pointed out, the fishermen have to a large degree been relieved from the heavy import duties which have been paid by other classes of the community, owing to the fact that their occupation is peculiar, and that they are subject to vicissitudes and hardships, and losses, and risks that large portions of other consuming classes are not subject to. I think if the Minister would do away with the specific duty altogether, and give us a much lower ad valorem duty, and then add the interpretation which the Controller of Customs said was the rule, I think we could feel that something had been really accomplished of value to that portion of the consuming population.

Item agreed to.

Twine and cotton cordage of all kinds, 25 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. COATSWORTH. Before this item is carried, I would like to say a word or two on behalf of the twine industry in Toronto. The duty on that and on several items under the general head of twine has been reduced from an average of 30 per cent to an average of 25 per cent. The industry that I refer to is called the Dovercourt Twine Company, and it carries on its business in the city of Toronto. They mentioned several items to me, and, as the statement they make in regard to the matter is short, I think I cannot do better than read it to the committee. The first is the item of cotton twine. They say :

Owing to the limited market we have been barely able with 30 per cent duty to hold our share of the trade. If reduced as proposed we will be shut out from the manufacture of fish lines, chalk lines, mason's lines, etc.

Then in the same item that you read there is cotton cordage, and on that they say :

Owing to the fact that a cheap grade of cotton rope made from the United States is flooding this market, made from a grade of cotton that cannot be bought here, we have had difficulty in competing, with the duty of 30 per cent. At the present rate we will be entirely shut out, as we have not made a profit of 5 per cent on cotton rope in the past.

Then the next item, following the same line, refers to jute, hemp and flaxed twine, which have been reduced to 25 per cent. They say :

We are engaged in the manufacture of over 100 different lines of twine, mostly of a high grade, and come into direct competition with imported twine. We import all our raw material in yarn, paying 20 per cent duty. We cannot get suitable stock here. We cannot bring it in raw and get it spun at a price equal to what we can import the yarn for. We have exhausted all means to do so and are compelled to import the yarn. We have to compete chiefly with German, Austrian and British manufacturers who have practically an unlimited market, thereby reducing the cost of manufacture materially. With a duty of 30 per cent we have not been able to get a fair share of the business and that branch has not paid us one cent in profits in four years. With 25 per cent on manufactured twine and a duty of 20 per cent on all our raw material, it will be evident to you that we cannot possibly keep the business running. We have been handicapped by this duty on raw material from the beginning. If we were permitted to bring in the yarn free we could compete with any one and increase our trade ten fold. We therefore respectfully request that you will give this matter your earnest and careful consideration and place us in a position to compete with all outsiders. * * * * * We expend as much or more labour in the manufacture of twine (in wet and dry carding, sizing polishing, etc.) as do the manufacturers of the other lines mentioned. We therefore request that you will place on the free list all jute, flax and hemp yarns or mixtures thereof for use in the manufacture of twine.

There is one item more that they refer to, and that is hammocks, tennis and other netted goods, reduced to 30 per cent :

In these goods we have had a large share of the trade of the Dominion, but have found it difficult with 35 per cent duty to compete with American goods. The principal part of the cost of these goods is the labour expended which gives employment to a large number of men, women, girls and boys in the winter when other work is scarce, and as the goods are certainly articles of luxury there can be no great object in reducing the duty. If reduced we will have to discontinue the manufacture of all netted goods thereby discharging all the hands engaged in that branch of the business.

Mr. CHARLTON. How large an establishment is this, and how many hands are employed ?

Mr. COATSWORTH. I have been told they employ 100 men.

Mr. EDGAR. This is no doubt a very touching appeal that has been made to the Government, and I would suggest that if the Controller himself would take a hand in and support the hon. member for East Toronto (Mr. Coatsworth) on behalf of his own constituents it might have a good effect. It is hardly fair that the Controller should not stand up and advocate the cause of his constituents, because this factory is in West York, in the constituency of the Controller himself, but he has handed the matter over to the member for East Toronto.

Item agreed to.

Rope, when imported for the manufacture of twine for harvest binders, 10 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. CASEY. The hon. gentleman has affirmed that he wishes to take the tax off raw material wherever he can. Here is a raw material for a very important manufacture, the manufacture of binder twines. Why has he not seen his way to take this tax off ?

Mr. McMILLAN. As this is said to be a farmers' tariff, and as the Government have been in the habit of steadily allowing raw material to come in free for the benefit of the manufacturers, here is an opportunity for the Government to show their sincerity. The Minister of Agriculture last year admitted that the Government had been reducing the duty on raw material to the extent of $113,000 for the benefit of the manufacturers of Canada. Now, why not take this 10 per cent off and reduce the duty altogether on binder twine? Since this is a farmers' tariff, why should a duty of 10 per cent be kept on the raw material for the manufacture of binder twine, and 12½ per cent on binder twine itself? If this is a farmers' tariff, let the Government prove it in this instance. In every instance where the duty has been reduced at the expense of the manufacturers, they have been heard. As a farmer, I ask the Government now to grant this slight request, and take the 10 per cent off this raw material, and give us binder twine free.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. member for Elgin (Mr. Casey) asked me why we did not take the duty off rove as a raw material and make the binder twine less. Now, the binder twine that is used has a duty of 12½ per cent, while hemp, jute, manila or sisal, used as a raw material, come in free. Rove is properly not a raw material, it is partially manufactured, and therefore is not allowed to come in free as a raw material. A smaller duty is placed upon it as being an article partially manufactured, and therefore is more serviceable for the making of the peculiar kind of binder twine which is made from rove, although not much binder twine is made from that. Binder twine is chiefly made from the fibre which comes in free, and is worked up here entirely.

Mr. CHARLTON. If rove is allowed free the admission would be an advantage to the manufactories of binder twine.

Mr. FOSTER. To a certain extent, it would.

Mr. CHARLTON. I think the Government ought to give a little more consideration to the manufacturers of binder twine than they are doing here. The Government in a dozen or more Orders in Council have placed upon the free list many articles like crucible steel, mohair cloth, tips, sides and a hundred other articles, and they would be moving exactly in the same direction if they were to place rove on the free list for the benefit of the manufacturers of binder twine. It is a large industry, it would benefit the farmers to some extent, and it would benefit the manufacturing industry to a considerable extent. It would be in the line of the Government policy in admitting raw material free.

Mr. CASEY.

Mr. CASEY. The Minister's explanation might be typical of many explanations in regard to these items. He says this is not in itself a raw material, but is partly manufactured. He will find that the finished article of one manufacture becomes in many cases the raw material of other manufactures. If he is going to promote manufacture by cheapening the cost of production he must admit that which is a raw material for the one manufacture at a very much decreased duty, or free, in order to promote the other manufacture. In regard to this particular item I think we may fairly ask on behalf of the consumers of binding twine that the duty should be removed in order that binding twine itself should be made cheaper.

Mr. WALLACE. The effect of having rove free and binding twine 12½ per cent would be that the manufacturers would bring in their rove free of duty, but the manufactured article would be no cheaper to the consumer.

Mr. CASEY. I fail to understand how the admission of rove free would knock out the manufacturers of binding twine.

Mr. WALLACE. The rove would be made in other countries, and Canadians would be deprived of that measure of employment.

Mr. CASEY. I am not discussing the making of rove, but of twine, and I think that the admission of rove would reduce the price of twine, and that is the object I and my agricultural friends are endeavouring to secure.

Twine for harvest binders of hemp, jute, manila or sisal, and of manila and sisal mixed, 12½ per cent.

Mr. CASEY. As the hon. member for Wellington is not present, I feel it my duty in the interest which we both desire to serve to refer to the fact that if it is allowable in the public interest to permit the free importation of lines and twines for fishing to the extent of $425,000, as the Trade and Navigation Returns show, it is desirable in the public interest that twine intended for the use of farmers should also be admitted free. There is no reason why fishermen should be petted at the expense of the farming interest. The fishing industry is very important no doubt, but if it is thought proper to allow materials for fishing to come in free, it is obvious, especially in view of the fact that a precedent has been established, that it would also be good policy to admit free materials for the farming industry. The fishermen not only enjoy the privilege of obtaining their lines and twine duty free, but they also receive a bounty. The producers of pig iron receive a bounty in addition to high protection, and so on with many other industries, and the farmers alone are given no special consideration in regard to materials which they import. The farmers, together with the lumbermen have a right to urge that some consideration should be extended to them as well as to the fishermen. It cannot be supposed that the privilege was extended to the fishermen for a sectional purpose. If that were so, we must all oppose such a regulation, but we are bound to assume that it was granted for the purpose of assisting an industry which is useful to the country at large, which had brought up a hardy race of sailors, and at the same time produced considerable wealth. The farming industry also produces a hardy race, well qualified to be soldiers, if not sailors, and fitted to fill any position in life. Moreover, the farming interests produces the greatest amount of wealth of any in the country. Under these circumstances we claim that a strong prima facie case is made out in behalf of extending a similar privilege to farmers. The Finance Minister and his two Controllers had the opportunity during the recess of ascertaining the farmers' views on the subject. There was a very unanimous demand, according to newspaper reports, for free binding twine and free coal oil. If the newspapers have misled us with respect to the interviews held, this is the fault of the Finance Minister and his colleagues, who omitted to provide a permanent official record of the interviews which they could lay before Parliament. If we can judge from the reports in the press, free binder twine was almost unanimously demanded, and the attempt made by the Controllers to argue against it was not successful. I must refer again with disapprobation to the fact that the Finance Minister has furnished no official report of those conferences, and has even refused to tell the House how much they cost, and yet we know they must have cost a large sum if conducted in a similar way to the Behring Sea arbitration. Nevertheless, the Finance Minister has refused to use the information he has obtained. This is a question of the greatest importance to the farmers, and the Finance Minister should explain why the farmers are treated differently to other classes in this respect.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Carried.

Mr. CASEY. Then the Finance Minister refuses to answer, and cries "Carried." No reason has been given why the farmer should be taxed, and the fishermen not taxed.

Mr. SEMPLE. I think that this item in the tariff should be reduced. It could hardly be expected to be made free when a duty remains on the raw material. The expectation of the people, however, was that binding twine would be put on the free list—that at all events was the expectation of farmers throughout the Dominion. When we see the Finance Minister speaking in favour of maintaining the duty for the benefit of 100 employees in manufactories, how much more necessary is it to do something to benefit 600,000 farmers scattered throughout the Dominion. The Government have not reduced this duty, but I still hope to see the duty, if not entirely removed, reduced.

Mr. CASEY. As the Finance Minister does not seem able to explain the item, perhaps the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stairs), who usually seems exceedingly well posted on binding twine and cordage, will offer an explanation.

Item agreed to.

Damask, 25 per cent.

Mr. FOSTER. I desire to change the item to damask of linen.

Mr. CHARLTON. Will that make any change in the other qualities of damask?

Mr. FOSTER. Damasks of silk and of cotton will go under their proper heads.

Item agreed to.

Sails for boats and ships, 25 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. KAULBACH. Sails for boats and ships would mean cotton duck, which means a very important item in this tariff, as it interests nearly the whole of Canada, but more particularly the Maritime Provinces, where it is mainly used in their fleet of shipping. I observed some few days ago when the Budget was brought down, and the revision of the tariff submitted by the Minister of Finance, that our hon. friend the member for Yarmouth (Mr. Flint) was conspicuous for having singled out this item, and made the inquiry as to whether there was any change in the duty on this article. The thought naturally arose, as he is a free trader, and sent here by the people of Yarmouth, who have pronounced in that direction, that he desired to see that article have free entry, or placed in the free list, and I was congratulating myself that as the Yarmouth cotton duck factory was the only industry of the kind in Canada, and producing a good article of duck, excellent work, of which we have had practical proof, and which I understand is financially a success, that my hon. friend was throwing out a pointer in that direction, that is, to have it placed on the free list. I would like to know if my hon. friend was sincere at the time? I certainly consider that that industry is well protected and the tariff might be reduced on the article, as the patronage that industry is receiving is very great, so much so that at times they are unable to fill their orders. I sincerely wish that if not placed on the free list, which I do not expect to see, neither do I desire to "fix the Flint" of hon. gentlemen opposite, yet I consider that the hon. Minister of Finance will see that he has raised the duty on this article instead of diminishing, the duty having been 1 cent per square yard and 15 per cent ad valorem. Now it is 25 per cent. I do think 20 per cent would be amply sufficient. Of course, when it is compared with the American tariff there is a very great deal of difference. Under the McKinley Bill cotton cloth, not bleached, dyed, coloured, stained, painted or printed, exceeding 100 and not exceeding 150 threads to the square inch, counting the warp and filling, 3 cents per square yard; if bleached, 4 cents per square yard; if dyed, coloured, stained, painted or printed, 5 cents per square yard, and 40 per cent ad valorem. That would amount on the whole to a 60 per cent duty. The difference is very great, but at the same time as this industry apparently is meeting with great financial success, I think this item might be reduced, and I would suggest 20 per cent.

Mr. EDGAR. The hon. gentleman who has just spoken said he did not ask for our sympathy on this side of the House in this matter, but our sympathy flows out to him in spite of himself, and our sympathy is not so much for this particular item as for the extraordinarily queer position he has placed himself in on the cordage question. Why, Sir, he got up this evening, and he was backed by the hon. member for Kent (Mr. McInerney) in urging the Government that 27½ per cent was too high a duty, and he wanted the Finance Minister to reduce it. Well, the hon. Minister had before that told us that the duty that the cordage was paying under the old rate of 1¼ cents per pound and 10 per cent ad valorem was 35 or 40 per cent, and he showed that 27½ per cent was a great reduction, but at the earnest pressure of the hon. members for Lunenburg and Kent, the Finance Minister was persuaded to put it back at the old rate, which, as the Finance Minister told us was 35 or 40 per cent. The hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Kaulbach) has our strong sympathy for the peculiar position he has placed himself in to-night.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman (Mr. Kaulbach), by advocating a reduction of duty on this article, I suppose becomes converted to the view that the duty does increase the prices, and that the imposition of a duty does not make goods cheaper. That being so, the hon. gentleman ought to apply that rule to other articles in the tariff, besides the one which is now under consideration.

Mr. FOSTER. I want to call the attention of my hon. friend to the fact that the item under discussion is the finished articles of sails for ships when made, and the duty is 25 per cent. The duck out of which the sails are made has a duty of 22½ per cent. I know my hon. friend would not think that 2½ per cent even was too large a margin of protection. If we want to lower the duty on this article we must go back to "cotton duck" and have that somewhat reduced, but I would not like to do that in the absence of the hon. member for Yarmouth (Mr. Flint) who takes an interest in it, so that with the permission of the hon. gentleman I will leave that over for a little while.

Item agreed to.

Wool, viz.: Leicester, Cotswold, Lincolnshire, South Down, combing wools, or wools known as lustre wools and other like combing wools, such as are grown in Canada, 3 cents per pound.

Mr. CHARLTON. I would inquire of the Government whether any wools of these kinds are imported into Canada, and whether we do not raise a supply of all these wools in excess of the requirements of the manufactures of the country. If this is the case, is not the placing of these wools on the dutiable list an attempt to convey to the farmers the idea that a benefit is being given to them when in fact no benefit is intended or can be given? If the Government wish to benefit the farmers by a duty on wool, let them impose a duty on the wools brought into the country. This duty is entirely deceptive and inoperative in its character, because it is a duty on articles which we do not import. I think, therefore, as a matter of common honesty we had better wipe this thing out entirely, and not leave the farmer under the impression that he is getting any protection on wool, when he is not. If the Government were to put a duty on Australian wool, or wool from the Argentine Republic, or any other kind imported into the country, they would be giving the farmer a benefit, because that would increase the demand for the wools our farmers produce. This duty, however, is put here evidently and purposely to mislead the farmers by giving them the idea that this paternal Government is giving them something when in reality it is giving them nothing. I would ask the Finance Minister how much wool of all grades we import into Canada, and whether we import a single pound of Leicester, Cotswold or South Down?

Mr. FOSTER. There is an importation of the kinds of wool mentioned here. Of course, the large importation is of the kinds we do not raise in this country.

Mr. CASEY. The kinds of wool mentioned here, were imported last year to the value of $342, on which a duty of $30.54 was collected. All the rest was free.

Mr. IVES. The hon. gentleman says there was only a small quantity of long wool imported; but how much can he say would have been imported if the duty of 3 cents a pound was not there? There is no doubt that combing wools are being used more largely every day in the manufactures of Canada. The worsted manufactures use them to a great extent, and the market is increasing every year for the kinds of wools mentioned in this item.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). There was imported last year 1,018 pounds of these wools on which there is a duty of 3 cents a pound.

Mr. FOSTER. That is quite a load.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). If the hon. gentleman thinks this is considerable, what does he think of 10,503,645 pounds that came in duty free?

Mr. FOSTER. I think that is considerably more.

Mr. PATERSON (Grant). There was $342 worth on which a duty of $30.54 was paid; but $1,651,440 worth came in free of duty. The wool duty has operated as we said it would; for years there was not a cent of duty paid. Yet the Minister proposes to retain it in the new tariff. I would like to ask him whether, when he was consulting with the farmers upon this tariff, the subject of wool was discussed, and if so, what views he elicited from them in reference to it?

Mr. FOSTER. The subject of wool was discussed, and the view I elicited from the farmers was that they would like to have the duty retained, while some of them would not object to have a duty put on wool all the way through. That view, however, was greatly modified when we took up the other part of the discussion and considered that the vast quantity of the wool imported and used here was of a kind that would not be grown in this country, and that a duty on that would be a duty on a raw material which would add to the price of the fabrics the farmers consumed.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman knows that this duty on wool is not of the slightest value to the farmers.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not know that.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Yes, I think I am safe in saying that the hon. gentleman knows that. I give him credit for the possession of common sense, and, therefore, I think the conclusion is irresistible that he knows what I say he does know. Now, it does not pay the Canadian farmer to undertake to produce merino sheep, and those varieties which produce the very fine-wool, and he therefore is obliged to depend largely on the varieties which produce long or combing wool. The hon. gentleman professes to protect those varieties. The only way he can protect the wool produced in Canada is by putting a duty on all wool, so as to compel our manufacturers to produce a larger quantity of cloth, as they did years ago, from these coarser varieties of wool. I do not say that that would be an advantage to the public at large, but it would be to the agricultural population, and this is of no advantage whatever to the agriculturists.

Mr. IVES. The hon. gentleman believes in agricultural protection.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). No, but I believe that if you are obliged to submit to the evil of protection, the incidental advantages that arise should be extended to the farmer, which would happen if you would exclude foreign wool so as to compel the Canadian manufacturers to purchase the kind produced in Canada, and purchase it at the market price, plus the duty. Let me call the hon. gentleman's attention to this. The classes of South Down, Leicester, Cotswold, and Lincolnshire do not belong to that class of fine wools. How is the hon. gentleman to know whether the wool that is being imported is South Down or not? How is he to know whether a certain number of varieties of Cape or South American wool being imported are not South Down? The hon. gentleman cannot tell, and I fancy that if South Down wools are imported at all, they are not imported as paying a duty of 3 cents, but are imported free. The farmer would not be any the worse off whatever if the hon. gentleman were to put all these wools on the free list, because there is no appreciable import of these. That being the case, whether the duty be 3 cents or $3 can make no possible difference to our agricultural population. The greater portion of the wools of the varieties we produce are shipped to the United States, and there converted into worsted yarn and carpet yarns, and they will go there. As long as the hon. gentleman admits the finer varieties of wool, the others will not be manufactured here to any extent, but must find a market in a foreign country where they will be manufactured. I do not say that we ought to impose a duty for the purpose of compelling the people to wear the harder and perhaps more enduring cloth and flannel goods produced from our wools; but as long as the hon. gentleman adopts the principle of protection, he is not dealing fairly with our agricultural population by pretending to protect them when the duty offers no protection whatever. The only way you can protect our farmer is by putting a tax that will exclude the imported productions from the Canadian market. Everybody knows that the wools which compete with ours are not the coarse wools brought from abroad. If the coarse wools could be favourably manufactured here, from the manufacturers' standpoint, they would purchase them. They do not purchase them, and the farmer must send them abroad to find a market. The Canadian wools are driven out of the Canadian market by the foreign wools brought in free of duty. If the hon. gentleman intends to let this remain as it is, it only goes to show that the farmers are not a disciplined, organized body, capable of over-awing the Government, as the Government are controlled by those who are more closely organized, and whose interests are consequently looked after in this tariff under pretense of protection to the farmer.

Mr. WALLACE. I think the hon. gentleman is in error, because this tariff is calculated to benefit the farmer as well as the other working classes in the community.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Put a duty on these wools.

Mr. WALLACE. What would be the effect if a duty were put on the fine wools, of which 10,000,000 pounds are imported? It would be a tax on the people who consume the products of those wools.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). They would not come in, and you would manufacture goods out of your coarse wool.

Mr. WALLACE. We know that we cannot manufacture a fine quality of worsted goods, such as the hon. gentleman's coat is made of, out of our wools. The result would be that you would either compel the people to pay the tax on this fine wool, or wear a class of goods they do not want to wear.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). You are doing it all the time.

Mr. WALLACE. We are doing this. We are protecting the Canadian farmers.

Mr. CHARLTON. No, you are not.

Mr. WALLACE. All the goods made from the long wools, the combing wools, in Canada, are made out of wools produced by the Canadian farmer, and we have a surplus to export, in addition, of from 15,000,000 to 20,000,000 pounds.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). No.

Mr. WALLACE. Yes. The other day I saw a sample of material made in England from some wools obtained in foreign countries, which could be sold in Canada at 18 cents a pound. It is true it was a coarse wool, not quite as good as that made from Canadian wool, but for some purposes it might come into competition with it. Yarn sold at 18 cents means that wool would be purchased at 10 or 12 cents a pound. If we took this duty of 3 cents a pound off those wools, large quantities of those coarser, and I consider inferior wools to ours, would come in.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). They come in.

Mr. WALLACE. Not at all. The duty of 3 cents a pound on the wool, and the large protection on the yarn hitherto has kept those yarns and wools out of Canada. What would be the result if the suggestion of the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) were carried out and we put a duty on all kinds of wool that cannot be produced in Canada. He says it would compel the people to wear the coarser textures made from the Canadian wool. The people will wear the quality of goods that suits their pockets.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). If you let them.

Mr. WALLACE. We are letting them do it because we are permitting that wool to come in free. So that we are letting them do it.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). No.

Mr. WALLACE. How can the hon. gentleman say no? There is no duty on that wool, and a duty on an article we do not produce would have the effect of raising the price of that article. Take the United States. They charge 10 or 12 cents a pound duty on these coarse wools which Canada produces, and which we export to them largely. What is the effect? The effect is to raise the prices of articles manufactured from them, so that those woollen goods are a great deal cheaper in Canada to-day than in the United States, and we have a better article. Now, the effect of the duty, as placed here, is to give to the Canadian farmers 3 cents a pound protection on what they produce, and besides give our people a cheap manufactured article, made from those imported wools, such as fine flannels, tweeds and worsted cloths, and other goods.

Mr. CASEY. I did not expect the hon. gentleman to repeat the statement that this 3 cents per pound duty on kinds of wool which we do not import is any protection to the Canadian farmers. That is such utter nonsense that the hon. gentleman contradicted it in his own speech further on. He said that after supplying the Canadian market with Canadian wool—to what extent he cannot tell us, and I do not know—we have so many million pounds to send abroad. Well, Sir, if we have a surplus to send abroad what nonsense it is to talk of increasing the price of the home grown article by means of protection. It is only the price of articles of which we have not enough at home and of which we import a considerable quantity that can be increased in price by a protective duty. The hon. gentleman's statements have been incorrect from the beginning, as also have those of the President of the Council. They said there was a large consumption of Canadian wool by Canadian manufacturers. I would like to know how much that consumption is. I have never heard of a considerable Canadian market for wool. The price in Boston rules the price in Canada as far as I have learned, and I have had considerable experience in raising and selling wool, though I cannot say I have had much experience in pulling it over the eyes of other people, as the Government is doing. This is a tax put on for use on the stump. I can remember when and why it was put on. There was a strong feeling in this House and out of it that, if there was to be protection, the farmer ought to have his share, and that he ought to get a benefit on his wool where he could be protected. Responding to that agitation the Finance Minister of that day agreed to put a tax on the kinds of wool raised in Canada. It sounded so extremely fair. It was a good thing to go to the country with. The Government said: We do not want to increase the price of manufacturing woollen goods generally, but we will put a tax on the kind of wool you raise, so as to afford you protection. As a matter of fact, the wool raised by Canadian farmers is sent out of the country, except the small quantity used by local mills to make up a limited line for the consumption of the neighbours. If $1 a pound were imposed upon that kind of wool it would not increase the price at all, whereas if the Government imposed even one-tenth of a cent per pound on the wool we import it would raise the price of that wool by the amount of the duty, and would provide a certain and continuous addition to the revenue. The hon. Minister says he cannot reduce the duty on velveteens, because they are a great luxury, but must increase it because he wants a revenue. Here is a case where he could find considerable revenue by a very slight impost. Every cent per pound imposed upon imported wool would bring $100,000 of revenue. And, as the woollen manufacturers are so highly protected, and as the hon. gentleman has refused raw material for so many of the manufacturers, I do not see why he should be such a stickler for free raw material in this case. The woollen manufacturer would not raise his prices; he might make a cent a pound less in his profits. Although the duty would not, I admit, give the farmer a larger price for the kind of wool he now raises, it would encourage him to grow the wools that are used by manufacturers. Like my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills), I do not advocate the system of protection all round. I do not think that we can bring about a general benefit by means of protective taxes; but I point out that this duty shows the attitude of the Government towards the farmer. Where they can protect the manufacturer they do it, but where they can protect the farmer they leave him out in the cold, and insult him by putting on such make-believe protection as this.

An hon. MEMBER. Louder.

Mr. CASEY. Yes—loud enough to be heard all over this country. It is a gross insult to the intelligence of the average farmer to impose such taxes, and the average farmer is much more intelligent than the gentlemen who shout "louder" and "whoop'er up." My hon. friend from Bothwell said the farmers were not sufficiently organized to compel the Government to meet their wishes. But the farmers are organizing, and it is to that fact that we owe the amelioration of the tariff. The Government are afraid of the Patrons of Industry and of the Conservative farmers, who begin to see through the humbug of this farmer's protection, so the Government have been compelled to yield some points and reduce the farmers' burdens a little. To try to make a farmer believe that this tax on wool is any benefit to him is adding insult to the injury he suffers from the taxes he has to pay. The hon. President of the Council said we did not know how much more wool of these combing kinds would be imported if there was no duty upon them. He ought to know enough about woollen manufactures to know that, until fashion changes and there is a demand for goods made from long combing wool in Canada, the duty will not have any effect whatever upon the consumption of wool. I find a grade mentioned here, "South Down combing." South Down is not a combing wool; it is a short staple wool, and this is only another evidence of the little knowledge with which this tariff is made up where farmers are concerned. So long as the manufacturers make fabrics of short wools, not combing wools, so long will they refuse to buy the Canadian wool product, and so long we must send it abroad. This is not a case of asking protection for the farmers. What my hon. friend beside me (Mr. Mills) and myself have said was the same thing—that there is an attempt to mislead the farmer by making him believe that there is a protection for him under this item, when, as a matter of fact, there is none.

Mr. McMILLAN (Huron). As a farmer I consider the statement made by the hon. member for Elgin (Mr. Casey) and the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) is quite correct. I cannot think the Controller of Customs is in earnest in stating that this duty has had the effect of increasing the price of the Canadian wool product 3 cents a pound. The province of Ontario alone exports 1,146,000 pounds of that wool into the foreign markets. I never heard a statement so misleading since I came into this House as that made by the President of the Council and the Controller of Customs tonight to mislead the farmers of this country. There is no benefit to the farmers from this duty, I am convinced of that from my experience of the last five years. If they keep this item in the tariff it will be a proof that they are determined to strive to humbug the farmers, and pull the wool over his eyes as they have done in the past. I am convinced that the farmers of Ontario are beginning to examine this tariff, and there is not an intelligent farmer or sheep-breeder who does not know perfectly well that his wool is not increased in price by any duty the Government could impose, so long as that wool is taken out of the country and manufactured in another country. We have over 10,000,000 pounds of wool brought into this country. I do not ask that a duty should be imposed upon that, but I do ask that the tariff should be placed upon a fair basis, so that the farmers can understand clearly what it is, and that the Government should not impose a duty upon an article that does not benefit them in any degree.

Mr. SPROULE. I have no doubt the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat and the hon. gentleman who spoke before him, know a good deal about wool, but there is a good deal they do not know yet. There are members of this House who remember the arguments that were advanced in 1879 when a duty was placed upon wool. It was contended then that it could do the farmer no good to place a duty upon short wools that were not raised here, and therefore, the duty ought to be taken off so as to allow these short wools to be brought in to be manufactured.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). It was on that side of the House the argument was used.

Mr. SPROULE. It was on the other side of the House the argument was used. It was argued that that concession should be made to enable the manufacturers to turn out goods made from short wool as cheaply as possible, and when it was found that wool of that class could not be produced in Canada to meet the demand, the duty was taken off, but it was left upon long wools. Now, it is held to-day that to do any good to the farmer who raises long wool, you must put the duty on short wool, the very reverse of what was argued before. Now, because the duty is taken off it is claimed it can do the farmer no good to allow the duty to remain on long wool, but it would do him good if it was put on short wool, because it would induce the manufacturers of long wool to supply a class of goods that would take the place of short wool. There may be some reason in that, but to say that it does the farmer no good because you allow the duty to remain on long wool, is to say something that is not consistent with what most people believe. The hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey) said that we export our wools, that we do not use them here, and the hon. member for Huron (Mr. McMillan) said the same. According to the Ontario Bureau of Statistics, there were 1,168,834 pounds of wool exported last year. Will any hon. gentleman tell me that we do not raise four or five times that quantity of wool in Ontario? What became of it if we did not use it here? Then, if that was used here, and if long wool could be brought into the country, as the Controller of Customs says, at about 15 cents a pound, and if that would not take the place of our wool, then I do not understand how it is possible for one thing to supplant another.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Our Down wools are not exported. South Down wools are manufactured here in the country.

Mr. SPROULE. Certainly they are, and our long wools are manufactured here also. Of what do we make our coarse carpets if not from long wool? Is not that the very line this policy is calculated to develop in the country? Let any one look at the development of that line since 1879, and he will see that our long wools are used extensively for that purpose. Notwithstanding the fact that we have a little more than supplied our own demand, it does not necessarily follow that it will not enhance the value of what we have by keeping that duty on. We know that a few years ago there was a duty on meats. We are often told, as we have been to-night by the hon.

Mr. SPROULE.

member for Elgin, that the price of wool is regulated by Boston. So they said the price of wheat and the price of meat were regulated by Liverpool. But when we had a duty on meat a few years ago, every man in our part of the country knows that he could send meat to the west to supply the local demand and sell it at one to two cents per pound more, live weight, than he could sell it in the Toronto market, where it was prepared for the British market. So with wool. We have a territory extending over 4,000 miles from east to west along the border of the United States, and were it not for that duty of 3 cents per pound, no doubt in many localities wool would be brought in here and used in Canada, but now it is kept out. The hon. member for Brant (Mr. Patterson) reminds us that there are certain classes of wool that we have no duty upon, and that over a million pounds of such wool were brought in. That shows that the duty has something to do with keeping out wool upon which a duty is placed.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I would ask the hon. gentleman if he can find in the Trade and Navigation Returns that during the fifteen years in which there was no duty on coarse wools, any coarse wool was imported into Canada?

Mr. SPROULE. I have not looked it up, but I can tell the hon. gentleman that for fourteen or fifteen years after the American war, we were largely supplying the Americans with wool and with sheep. At that time I lived over on the other side, and I paid $85 for a common suit of tweed clothes, and we can understand that there would be no wool imported into Canada then. I paid $25 for a pair of pants made out of wool. These prices were owing to the fact that so many men were taken from agricultural pursuits to fight in the war that the local demand for wool was not supplied, and it had to be imported, and for many years it was supplied by the Canadian farmer. There was no necessity for a duty on wool then, but as soon as they began to develop these lines and greatly multiply the number of sheep, then there arose a necessity for us to put a duty on wool to keep out American wool. Why, they send their sheep from Montana to the North-west to-day. Would they not also send their wool if it were not for this duty that keeps it out? I believe the Canadian farmers are too intelligent to be misled by the arguments the hon. gentlemen are using to endeavour to convince them that no benefit accrues by keeping this duty on wool. It does benefit them, notwithstanding the fact that they raise more wool than we consume here, and notwithstanding the additional fact that there is such a large demand for short wool brought into the country to be manufactured here into classes of goods that cannot be made out of the wools that we raise at home. The hon. member for West Elgin said that South Down is not a combing wool. I do not think he read the item closely. Combing wools are mentioned in the item.

Mr. CASEY. It is not "South Down," and then a comma, and afterwards "combing wools," but it is "South Down combing wools," without a comma between.

Mr. SPROULE. It is clear that the comma is left out by accident, and not by design. We read immediately after "and other like combing wools." Now, we do not raise any short wool here, but the South Down and Shropshire belong to the short wool class, and their wools bring a better price than the long combing wools, because there is a greater demand for them than we can supply; but in the other lines where we supply more than the demand, they would be, in some instances, supplanted in our own market were it not for the duty. The duty is for the purpose of giving the market to the country that puts the duty on. We put a duty of 3 cents a pound upon butter to keep foreign butter out, and it does keep it out; and 3 cents a pound on wool keeps wool out in many instances where it would come in were it not for the duty, and to that extent the Canadian farmer benefits by this duty.

Mr. CHARLTON. The hon. member for South Grey (Mr. Sproule) is at fault in his historical reminiscences with regard to the attitude assumed by the different parties in this House on the wool duty. When my hon. friends opposite assumed the position of protectionists in 1876, from that time down to the end of the period that the Mackenzie Government were in power in this country, they rung the changes upon the necessity of imposing a duty upon all classes of wool, of not allowing a single class of wool to come into this market without paying a duty because the farmers of this country required protection in wool. But because the Mackenzie Government allowed classes of wool to come into this market free of duty that come in free to-day, they were denounced for permitting the importations of that class of wool. Now, the hon. gentleman tells us that we raise four times the quantity of these coarse combing wools in this country that we export. It does not matter whether we raise four times, or ten times, or twenty times, as many pounds as we export. The question is: Do we raise more than we consume? Do we export a surplus of the wools? If we do export a surplus of these wools, we require no protection, because we have more of these wools than we can use. He tells us that the duty prevents the United States from sending into this country the very class upon which the duty is imposed. We sold to the United States of these wools last year 1,167,000 pounds; the United States imported that quantity of wool upon which a duty is imposed in this country. I presume that the United States exported none of that class of wool. If they were raising enough for their own consumption and had a surplus to export they would have bought none from us, and the fact that they bought over 1,000,000 pounds of the coarse wools of Canada is presumptive evidence that they raised an insufficient quantity for their own use, and exported none. So the duty is inoperative and useless so far as it may be intended to prevent the importation of American coarse wools into Canada, when the Americans have no coarse wool to export and are actually importers of that class to a large extent. The hon. gentleman's theory is a pretty broad one, but his argument with respect to the operation of the duty is a fallacious one. We raise of certain kinds of wool more than we consume, we export a large quantity, and the Government placed the duty on that class of wool with the intention of impressing on the farmers the belief that they are acting in their interests and are giving them a protective duty which is of some benefit to them. It is a perfectly fallacious idea. Last year we imported 10,500,000 pounds of wool that paid no duty. We exported 1,168,000 pounds of wool. We imported about nine pounds of wool for every one we exported. If there had been a duty on this great bulk of fine wool it would have fostered the use of the grade of wool we raise in this country. If we had reduced the volume of the imports of wool by 2,000,000 pounds, one-fifth of the importation, that would have placed the farmers in a position where, raising insufficient quantity of wool for home consumption, they would have been under no necessity of exporting 1,168,000 pounds. Then the farmers would have had a home demand for every pound they could raise, and even more wool than they raise. Even if the imported wool had been diminished by one-fifth by a duty, the farmers would have reaped advantage from the duty and would have had conferred on them the advantages of protective duty. If the Government desires to benefit the farmer, let them impose a duty on that class of wool which is imported into this country. By the imposition of that duty they would diminish the importation of those wools, and they would make it an object for the manufacturer to use a larger quantity of the grade that the farmer raises, by the imposition of that duty on the wool actually imported they would bring about a state of things when the farmers would have to increase their clip of wool in order to supply the home demand, and if the Government would adopt that policy they would give the farmer protection, whatever the effect might be on other interests; and if they do not adopt that policy, if they do not put a duty on wools imported and put a duty on grades not imported, but exported, from the country in large quantities, they are deceiving the farmer, they are professing to give protection when there is no protection, and the whole system is a transparent humbug adopted for the purpose of deceiving the farmer class.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. CHARLTON. I repeat that a protective duty on wool must be such a duty as the American Government imposes; it must be on all grades in order to make it an object for the manufacturers to use domestic wool. That has been the operation of the law in the United States; that is the reason why the Americans will import our coarse wool and pay a duty of 10 cents per pound, because there is a duty in the United States on all grades of wool: on Australian, Argentine, wool from the Cape, wools from every quarter of the world, there is no difference, and duties are imposed on all, and so the farmers receive an honest protection in the shape of duties on wool. But if the grades of wool wanted by the manufacturers of the United States had been admitted free of duty and if the Americans had imposed a duty on the grades raised and consumed in the country, the farmers would have received no benefit, and if the Government is to pursue an honest straightforward policy on this subject they will remove the duty now imposed on the kinds of wool which we import and in excess of the domestic demand, or if they wish to give the farmer protection they will impose a duty on that class of which we import 10,500,000 pounds. I repeat that by reducing the importation of wool to the extent of one-fifth only in amount, the manufacturers will absorb all the surplus of wool now raised in Canada, and make it necessary for the farmer to increase his clip of wool in order to meet the domestic demand.

Mr. SPROULE. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) has advanced this argument again and again, that it is an utter fallacy that the imposition of a duty on any article of which we have a surplus to export cannot do good. Does not the hon. gentleman remember the imposition of a duty on pork, and will he say that it has conferred no benefit on the Canadian farmer? Will the hon. gentleman make such a statement, in view of the fact that the development in that line was three-quarters of a million dollars within a year and a half, after the duty was raised in 1890? Undoubtedly the change did good; and the farmers think so to-day. When the Controllers went through the country there was no article on which there was such general agreement as pork and beef, and yet during the last year we exported over and above all we used no less than 29,000,000 pounds of pork and the products of pork. But if the hon. gentleman's argument amounted to anything it would apply equally to pork and beef as to wool.

Mr. CHARLTON. Will the hon. gentleman tell the committee whether pork was higher in our markets than in those of the United States?

Mr. CHARLTON.

Mr. SPROULE. I do not care whether it was higher or lower. Will the hon. gentleman deny that the year before the imposition of the duty there were brought in 29,000,000 pounds of beef and pork to feed Canadians, and that next year we shut out 14,000,000 pounds? Does not this duty give the Canadian farmer the home market? It must do so, and no doubt it did give him an additional market as regards 14,000,000 pounds of meat without any cost for freight. I find that last year 2,640,000 sheep, averaging five pounds each, represented 13,000,000 pounds of wool. That product was in only one province of the Dominion; yet all the provinces exported 1,168,000 pounds of wool. Therefore, we must have consumed all the wool raised in other provinces except Ontario, and at least 12,000,000 pounds of the Ontario output. Has not the duty therefore given our farmers the home market? Certainly, and our wool is consumed here, and then we export 1,000,000 pounds over and above all we use at home. Is not the duty doing the farmer good? It is doing him good, and that is the opinion of the Canadian farmers themselves.

Mr. ROSAMOND. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) still harps on his old idea that we should follow the American system, and have a duty on wool.

Mr. CHARLTON. No; I pointed out that if the Government want to give protection to the farmers they must adopt the American plan of imposing a duty on all classes.

Mr. ROSAMOND. I can make a better suggestion, and that is to increase the duty on woollen goods, and thus increase the consumption in this country of Canadian-grown wool. There is no question but that the consumption of Canadian wools has been largely increasing every year, and no doubt were the duty on woollen goods increased, the consumption would advance still more. It has been asserted that South Down wools were not combing wools. They are combing wools, and they are being combed every day in every worsted mill in the country. I do not desire to prolong the discussion, but as some hon. gentlemen seem to be very anxious to have the duty on wools removed, I make a suggestion to the Government and that is to give those hon. gentlemen their way and take off the duties on wool. All the gentlemen that I have heard speaking on the Opposition side of the House seem to be against the duty on wool. The Minister of Finance might accept their suggestions for once and take the duty off wool so that we might see how it would work.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I suppose the hon. gentleman (Mr. Rosamond), while he is a great advocate of protection so far as his own business is concerned, is equally a pronounced free trader with regard to the business of everybody else. If we had a duty of 5 or 10 cents a pound on all wool coming into the country then the farmers would give up producing coarse wool and produce the kind the hon. gentleman requires. According to the argument he uses in favour of his own business, the farmer would produce him wool cheaper than he could import it. Is he willing to give the farmer 10 cents a pound on all wool of every variety that can be produced in this country? If he gives that protection the farmer will furnish him with fine qualities of wool. The hon. gentleman could then have an opportunity of applying to the business of the farmer that same policy which he insists upon having applied to his own. If the hon. gentleman were to do that, then he would show some confidence in his theory, because he would not be adopting the policy which he now advocates of free trade for everybody else's business but protection for his own.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I would like to ask the Minister; but perhaps the member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule), who has given a good deal of consideration to this matter will inform me; How many pounds of the kinds of wool mentioned in the item under consideration were imported during the time there was no duty?

Mr. SPROULE. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) asked that before, because he knew I had not the book here. Of course the reason why it would not be imported then was because there was such a demand in the United States that we were supplying it from Canada. It was much dearer in the United States than here and of course we would not import it.

Mr. ROSAMOND. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) ought to know that fine wools cannot be grown in this country.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). No.

Mr. ROSAMOND. It has been tried time and again for the last twenty-five or thirty years to my certain knowledge and in every instance without success. There would be no use putting a duty on fine wools for the purpose of encouraging their growth here. It would only come back on the farmers, inasmuch as if there was a high duty on this wool it would increase the cost of manufactured goods so much that no benefit would be derived from it.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). There would be lots of wool.

Mr. ROSAMOND. My suggestion was taken from the arguments of the Opposition. They seemed to think that there was no necessity for a duty on wool, and I want them to test that in the eyes of the farmers by suggesting to the Finance Minister that he should take the duty off wool at their request. I wanted to see if they were honest and sincere in their statements and if they wanted to go to the country as being in favour of no duty on wool.

Mr. FOSTER. Having requested that some items of the tariff resolutions should stand.

Mr. MACLEAN (York). I wish to have some of these items stand.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). We will never get through the tariff at this rate.

Mr. CHARLTON. There is too much of this standing business.

Mr. MACLEAN (York). One reason why I wish these items to stand, is that I wish the House to pronounce on the question of specific duties. The specific duties have been taken off these items and I am going to contend for a return to specific duties.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). You are a specific duty man?

Mr. MACLEAN (York). I am a specific duty man and I will tell you why.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Never mind now until we come to the items.

Item agreed to.

Buttons of hoof, rubber, vulcanite or composition, 4 cents per gross and 20 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. CHARLTON. Here is a specific duty.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, we lowered that.

Mr. CHARLTON. We are always suspicious of these specific duties. What is the equivalent ad valorem duty of this?

Mr. WALLACE. About 30 per cent.

Mr. CHARLTON. Does it not run as high as 100 per cent in some instances?

Mr. WALLACE. Last year it was 34 per cent.

Mr. CHARLTON. Would the hon. Minister state positively that there are no instances where this duty would run as high as 100 per cent?

Mr. FOSTER. No, I would not state that.

Mr. CHARLTON. Would the Minister deny it?

Mr. FOSTER. The burden of proof is on you.

Item agreed to.

Buttons of pearl, vegetable ivory or horn, 8 cents per gross and 20 per cent.

Mr. CHARLTON. There are kinds of pearl buttons on which this duty will amount to 100 per cent.

Mr. FOSTER. The duty will run from 20 per cent up.

Mr. CHARLTON. How high up? Will it go in any case up to 100 per cent?

Mr. FOSTER. I dare say there would be cases in which it would.

Mr. CHARLTON. Is that not scandalous?

Mr. WALLACE. I think the average price is as low as 50 cents a gross.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). And how high ?

Mr. WALLACE. As high as $10. There are some kinds lower than 50 cents.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Yes, as low as 25 cents.

Mr. WALLACE. If so, I do not think they are of any use.

Item agreed to.

Fertilizers, compound or manufactured, 10 per cent.

Mr. CHARLTON. To what extent are fertilizers used in Canada, and to what extent are they imported ?

Mr. FOSTER. The use of them is increasing largely. It is pretty difficult to say how much fertilizer is used, because every barn-yard is a manufactory by itself ; $21,000 of fertilizers were imported last year.

Mr. CHARLTON. Have we any manufacturing establishments ?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes ; in Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Quebec and Ontario ; they are pretty well distributed.

Mr. CHARLTON. Do they really require protection ?

Mr. FOSTER. They had 20 per cent last year, and we are giving them only 10 per cent now.

Mr. CHARLTON. I think it would be as well to let the farmers have free fertilizers.

Mr. FOSTER. We do, in this way, that nearly all the components of fertilizers come in free of duty.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). That does not advantage the farmers.

Mr. FOSTER. Oh, yes ; the farmers, through agricultural societies and otherwise, are largely working up these materials for themselves.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). You are simply giving the manufacturer an advantage of 10 per cent in addition to his ordinary profits and freight.

Item agreed to.

Photographic dry plates, 30 per cent.

Mr. CHARLTON. Are these articles manufactured in this country ?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes. The old duty was 9 cents per square foot. This is a very large reduction.

Mr. CHARLTON. Have there been any representations from the photographic trade with regard to this duty ?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes ; that is why the reduction has been made.

Mr. CHARLTON. Are they satisfied with the present rate ?

Mr. FOSTER. I have not heard a word against it.

Item agreed to.

Mr. WALLACE.

Gun, rifle and pistol cartridges, cartridge cases of all kinds and materials, percussion caps and gun wads of all kinds, 30 per cent.

Mr. INGRAM. I would like to ask the Finance Minister why it is that cartridges for Peabody rifles have to pay duty ? I understand that these rifles are not manufactured in this country, but in the United States ; and, as a number of them are in use in this country, why should the cartridges for them not be admitted free of duty ?

Mr. FOSTER. We must have some revenue.

Item agreed to.

All goods not enumerated, as subject to duty, free of duty or prohibited, 20 per cent.

Mr. CHARLTON. What class of goods would be included in this ?

Mr. FOSTER. It is almost impossible to tell. It is a very long list. There are hundreds of items.

Mr. WALLACE. We have taken out the principal one, that is linen goods, $1,250,000 or thereabouts, and enumerated it.

Mr. CHARLTON. What would be the balance in the aggregate, roughly speaking ?

Mr. WALLACE. There are two or three columns, several million dollars.

Item agreed to.

Mackerel, 1 cent per pound.

Mr. CHARLTON. Is this for fresh mackerel, or any kind of mackerel ?

Mr. FOSTER. Any kind.

Mr. CHARLTON. I imagine that the imposition of these fish duties is very injudicious. It has led to imposition of duties upon fish in the United States. We naturally would import almost nothing in this line, as we are a great fish-producing country, and seek markets for our fish abroad, and it strikes me these duties, which cannot yield much revenue, are mischievous in their consequence. I do not see the use of them. We do not import mackerel and require no protection.

Mr. WALLACE. We imported 20,000 pounds.

Mr. CHARLTON. That would be under exceptional circumstances, I imagine.

Item agreed to.

Herrings, pickled or salted, $\frac{1}{2}$ cent a pound.

Mr. CHARLTON. How much duty did we derive from that ?

Mr. WALLACE. We imported 62,000 pounds.

Mr. CHARLTON. That would give a very inconsiderable sum. Suppose the result would be that the United States imposed a duty of $\frac{1}{2}$ cent duty ?

Mr. FOSTER. They have their duties now.

Mr. CHARLTON. If we took that off and said to the Americans that we are moving in the line of tariff reform, we would be setting them an example.

Mr. FOSTER. It would be generous.

Mr. CHARLTON. It would be politic.

Mr. FOSTER. It would be generous, but not business.

Item agreed to.

Salmon, pickled or salted, 1 cent a pound.

Mr. CHARLTON. How much salmon did we import ?

Mr. WALLACE. About 1,000 pounds.

Mr. CHARLTON. We realized $10 on it. That is a very important item of revenue.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). It is for development.

Mr. CHARLTON. I am thoroughly convinced that the fish duties are useless and mischievous. If we were to take the duties off, our chances for getting modifications of the American duties would be very greatly improved.

Mr. FOSTER. They would not do that for $10.

Item agreed to.

All other fish, pickled or salted, in barrels, 1 cent a pound.

Mr. MACDONALD (King's). There is a fish imported by the fishermen in the Maritime Provinces from the United States, which is not caught anywhere else, the duty on which weighs heavily on the fishermen. It is used altogether as bait and is called porgees. While vessels prosecuting the sea fisheries can get a drawback on the fish imported for bait, the fishermen on the coast have to pay the duty. I hope the Government will see their way clear to remove that duty, which is really a hardship on the fishermen engaged in coast fishing.

Mr. FOSTER. We will consider that matter.

Item agreed to.

Foreign codfish, imported otherwise than in barrels or half-barrels, whether fresh, dried, salted or pickled, not especially enumerated or provided for by this Act, 50 cents per 100 pounds.

Mr. CHARLTON. Is there a large importation of that line ?

Mr. WALLACE. There is a large number of items here. The total would be perhaps $40,000.

Item agreed to.

Oysters, shell, in bulk, 10 cents per gallon.

Mr. CHARLTON. Now, as to oysters, Mr. Chairman, mentioned in this and two or three succeeding items—I suppose we are almost entirely dependent on the United States for our supply—

Mr. FOSTER. No ; we get large quantities from Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick.

Mr. CHARLTON. Of good quality ?

Mr. FOSTER. First-rate.

Mr. CHARLTON. They do not reach us here.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, they do ; I discussed a barrel or two of them this winter.

Mr. CHARLTON. In the western part of the province, at least, we are almost entirely dependent upon the American supply from Chesapeake Bay and Delaware Bay. This is a tax upon a food product. I doubt very much whether these taxes are justifiable.

An hon. MEMBER. We use oysters here for parliamentary dinners.

Mr. CHARLTON. If you would confine the taxation to parliamentary dinners it would not be so bad.

Mr. WALLACE. This is only 8 or 9 per cent ; these oysters are entered at $1.20 per gallon.

Item agreed to.

Oysters in the shell, 25 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Oysters in the shell ought to come in free, and have the canning done here.

Mr. CHARLTON. This is an unjust discrimination. Oysters in bulk come in at about 8 per cent, while the oysters in the shell are taxed 25 per cent, a discrimination against oysters in the shell of about 17 per cent. It seems to me this ought to be reversed. The transportation lines receive more benefit from carrying oysters in the shell, and then there must be some labour employed in shelling the oysters. Then the Government could retain the shells for lime.

Mr. EDGAR. The Government must hope, by this duty, to encourage the manufacture of oyster shells.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Seriously, I think that oysters in the shell should be on the free list. They are a cheap article of food, and might be generally used.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Put the shells on the free list, and tax the oysters.

Item agreed to.

Packages containing oysters or other fish, not otherwise provided for, 25 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. FOSTER. I wish to add another item which seems not to be provided for :

Fresh or dried fish, n.e.s., imported in barrels or half barrels, 1 cent per pound.

Item agreed to.

Articles for the use of the Governor General, free.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I would suggest that this would be a good opportunity for the Minister to give the committee an idea of the articles put upon the free list that were not on before.

Mr. FOSTER. That would be a good deal of labour.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). It would prevent the asking of questions at each item.

Mr. FOSTER. We can go over the list, and I will mention wherever there has been a change.

Articles imported by and for the use of the Dominion Government or any of the departments thereof or for the Senate or House of Commons, including the following articles when imported by the said Government or through any of the departments thereof for the use of the Canadian militia:—military clothing, musical instruments for military bands, military stores and munitions of war.

Mr. INGRAM. I would like to ask again the question I put a short time ago. Take the cadet corps in my own town, for instance. They have bought their own clothing. They have been provided with Peabody rifles by the Department of Militia. When they want to engage in ball practice they must buy ammunition made in the United States. I would like to know whether the ammunition brought in by the corps will come in free of duty?

Mr. FOSTER. I will give that matter consideration.

Mr. SPROULE. I do not think curling stones should be on the free list, as they are articles of luxury and the people could well afford to pay a duty on them.

Mr. CASEY. I think diamonds unset are not necessities of life, any more than are granite curling stones. It is outrageous to allow unset diamonds to come in duty free. The Finance Minister will find a great many people who are taxed on the necessities of life will wish to know why unset diamonds, valued at thousands of dollars, are to be admitted free, while the necessities of life are heavily taxed.

Mr. FOSTER. This subject has been discussed in a great many deliberative bodies when making tariffs, and the consensus of opinion is that the duty on diamonds is inoperative, because they are so easily smuggled, and in fact it operates against the honest jeweller and importer because of the extreme facility with which they can be brought in. Besides, if a duty were imposed, it would produce but a small revenue.

Mr. CASEY. In the United States diamonds are taxed, although attempts are made to smuggle them. They are also taxed in free trade England.

Mr. WALLACE. They are not taxed in England.

Mr. AMYOT. If the hon. member will look at item 557 of the tariff 1890 of the United States he will see that diamonds and other precious stones are on the free list.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant).

Mr. KAULBACH. I think it is not desirable that eggs should be on the free list, as they have been taken from the free list in the United States and subject to a high duty.

Mr. FOSTER. The new tariff has not been passed yet.

Mr. McDONALD (Assiniboia). I consider that eggs should be made subject to a duty of 5 cents a dozen. The placing of eggs on the free list has ruined the industry in Manitoba and the North-west Territories, as our markets are now flooded from Minnesota and Washington State.

Mr. CASEY. This is a very different position of affairs from the time when hens were laying larger eggs under the influence of the National Policy, and the idea of placing eggs on the free list is not consistent with the idea of protecting the farmers' interests.

Mr. FOSTER. Allow the item to stand.

Flax fibre and flax tow.

Mr. CASEY. It is a strange method of protecting home industries to put this on the free list if the principle is to be carried out all around as Ministers have always pretended it would be. The flax industry is one of the most important in Ontario. I fancy there are a great many more men employed in producing flax fibre than in many of the industries that are heavily protected by the Government. I would like to know on what principle the Minister makes this free, while he protects other industries so largely?

Mr. WALLACE. Would the hon. gentleman suggest what duty he would propose to the House to put on?

Mr. CASEY. I would propose to the House that the Controller of Customs should take his seat, and that the Minister should answer my question. It is not my place or the Controller's to propose a duty. That belongs to the Finance Minister.

Mr. WALLACE. Would he suggest that a duty should be put on, or that it should remain free?

Mr. CASEY. I am asking the Minister of Finance for necessary explanations which the Controller of Customs cannot give. It is the duty of the Minister of Finance to explain his policy. This is a matter in which my constituents, as well as those in other counties, are deeply interested. I want to ask the Minister on what principle he puts this on the free list while he taxes other articles of a similar nature. If there is any principle underlying this different treatment of the different articles, I want to get at it.

Mr. SPROULE. There seems to be no necessity for a duty on it because there were only thirty-eight pounds brought in, and it does not require a duty to keep it out.

Mr. CASEY. That is only the future Minister who has given the explanation, and not the present one.

Mr. SPROULE. It answers your purposes, no matter where it comes from.

Bananas, plantains, pineapples, &c.

Mr. BAIN (Wentworth). What is the difference between bananas and oranges?

Mr. FOSTER. Difference in size and shape.

Mr. BAIN (Wentworth). I suppose they all go the same road in the end, but you let bananas in free, and you tax oranges.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). This is a very peculiar proposition. There was a discussion on this matter before.

Mr. FOSTER. And a very able one.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I do not know that.

Mr. FOSTER. Oh, yes; the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mills) took part in it.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). But the Minister of Finance did not, and so it was only partly able. There should be some explanation as to why bananas should be free and oranges and lemons taxed. Is it because the bananas come from the West Indies, and oranges and lemons largely from the United States?

Mr. FOSTER. That is not the reason.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Then what reason is it? There is neither of them produced in this country, and the Minister is simply raising a revenue on what is becoming more and more a necessary of life. It seems to me that all these articles ought to be treated on the same principle, and they should all be subject to a very moderate duty, or what would best serve the people, they should all be on the free list.

Mr. FOSTER. The revenue would lose considerable.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Not so much as is lost by bananas.

Mr. FOSTER. When the taste for them gets well developed, we will get a revenue from them.

Hides and skins, raw, whether dry, salted, or pickled, and raw pelts, free.

Mr. CASEY. This compares very unfavourably with the high duty on tanned leather. The farmer is again put to a disadvantage. He has to compete with the extremely cheap hides of the pampas of South America in the sale of his raw hides, while he is compelled, on the other hand, to pay a very high duty on all articles made of leather which he buys. Of course, there is no hope of getting this matter explained, as the Minister has evidently shut his mouth with the intention of not explaining anything, in the hope that thereby he will facilitate the hurrying through of these items; but, although he will not explain why he treats this farmers' product as something that needs no protection, while imposing high taxes on the leather which they have to buy, it is worth while calling the attention of the House and the country to the matter in this brief way, though I may have to do it another time at greater length.

Indian corn of the varieties known as "Southern white Dent Corn" or horse tooth ensilage corn, and "Western yellow Dent Corn" or horse tooth ensilage corn, when imported to be sown for soiling and ensilage, and for no other purpose, under regulations to be made by the Governor in Council, free.

Mr. CASEY. Of course, there can be no objection to putting these varieties of corn on the free list. But I want to know how you are to distinguish corn imported for the purpose of being sown for ensilage from corn imported for fattening cattle. Although my county produces a very large amount of corn, I would like to see all corn put on the free list. It would be the most important benefit that could be conferred upon the very large class of people who feed cattle for the English market; and, on the principle on which drawbacks are granted to people who import raw materials and export the manufactured product, it is certainly proper and right to ask that the raw material for producing fat cattle for export should be allowed to come in free. Our cattle trade with England is now in a very languishing condition, and the most that can be done by the Government to reinvigorate it is to cheapen the cost of fattening cattle in Canada, and we cannot fatten them profitably without importing corn from the United States. If there is anything more than a pretense of consideration for the farmer in the minds of the Government, they will show it by putting corn on the free list.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The item specifies corn sown for soiling and ensilage, and for no other purpose. Of course the Minister of Finance does not intend to exclude corn for planting, for which the farmers in the south-western portion of Ontario very frequently import southern varieties. When these are planted in this country a few years, they become harder, developing into flint corn, and so they have to import again in order to retain the soft varieties. The word planting ought to be inserted.

Mr. FOSTER. I have no objection to that.

Mr. CASEY. How do the Government distinguish between corn imported for that purpose and corn imported for other purposes?

Mr FOSTER. Certain kinds of corn are only fitted or mostly fitted for ensilage and not for food purposes.

Committee rose and reported progress.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to ; and the House adjourned at 11.20 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, 11th May, 1894.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

THE HARD PAN CASES.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. There has been a desire evinced on the part of the House that hon. members should be placed in possession of the documents in relation to the Hard Pan cases. The hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Fraser) has a motion on the paper respecting them, and, in his absence, if the House will permit me, I will move for :

Reports, papers and orders relating to the Hard Pan cases, and also the findings of the judge of the Exchequer Court respecting the said claims.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Will this order include the commission issued to the judge by Order in Council ?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Yes.

Mr. MARTIN. And also the report of the engineer ?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Yes, and all the papers.

Motion agreed to.

INQUIRIES FOR RETURNS.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). In reference to the Order of the House for a return of the correspondence relative to the Thousand Islands, I call the attention of the Minister of the Interior to the fact that there are papers that ought to have been included in that return that are not before the House, and amongst them a despatch from the Lieutenant-Governor of Ontario, of the 24th of April. I think that motion was carried in the House after the 24th of April, and, as all papers relating to that subject were moved for, I would like very much that they should all be brought down and printed together.

Mr. CASEY.

Mr. DALY. I stated to the hon. gentleman yesterday that I brought down to the House all the papers in the possession of the Department of Indian Affairs at the time the motion passed. The report he refers to was not received by the department until the 27th of April, long after the Order of the House was passed. I am powerless to have printed any papers I am not ordered by the House to bring down.

Mr. McMULLEN. When will the return with regard to the dues collected in the cul-lers' office in Montreal be brought down ?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). I have not been able to get the information asked for as yet. Let it stand for a few days.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE TARIFF.

Mr. FOSTER moved that the House again resolve itself into Committee on Ways and Means.

Motion agreed to, and House again resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Free list—Iron or steel beams, sheets, plates, angles and knees for iron or composite ships or vessels.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. While I am not going to raise any objection to this being on the free list, this is a convenient time for inquiring of the Minister of Finance whether the Government have decided to give any consideration to the proposition of the manufacturers of agricultural implements, in the way of allowing them to obtain free any portion of the iron and steel which they use in the manufacture of these implements ?

Mr. FOSTER. No such decision has been arrived at yet.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Then, are we to understand that there is no redress for these parties, because it appears to me that a very grave injustice has been committed. I have no objection to the reduction of the duty on agricultural implements, and so far I am in accord with the policy of the Government on general principles that we ought to reduce the tariff generally ; but, as the Minister knows very well, a large quantity of the iron which enters into those articles is taxed at the rate of 40, 50, and 60 per cent, and in some cases even a higher rate of duty. It does appear to me that it is a grave injustice to refuse any concession to these persons. Now, if the Government have made up their minds that they will make no concession in that way, that they will tax the raw material of the agricultural implement makers at rates much more than double the tax of the finished article ; not only is it a departure from their own prin-principles, as laid down on frequent occasions here, not only is it an absolute injustice to that class of manufacturers, but, of course, it injures the farmers also, because there is no doubt whatever that they would be greatly benefited by any reductions that would enable the manufacturers to produce those articles more cheaply; it will come in the end directly on the farmers. I want also to know whether the Government—and I think this is an occasion on which they ought to state to us frankly what they propose to do—if they will not make any concession now, do the Government intend, when Parliament has risen, or even now, to make any use of the powers which they hold, or are supposed to hold, for there may be a doubt on the matter, under the law which allows the Treasury Board to relax duty in certain cases? Do they propose to make use of that to abate the duty?

Mr. FOSTER. No decision has been come to with reference to that. The subject has not even been discussed.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. And is not intended to be acted upon?

Mr. FOSTER. At the present time there is no intention; that is as far as I can answer.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. This is a proper time to call the attention of the Minister to the matter I referred to a few days ago with reference to allowing sheets and angles to come in free for the manufacture of steel windmills. The hon. gentleman has in his possession a full statement of what is required. As I pointed out the other day, this class of sheets and angles is not manufactured in Canada at all. The manufacture of windmills is an important industry, giving employment to a large number of men, the windmills are being adopted almost universally in many sections, and, even from the point of view of the Government's own policy of protection, when this class of steel or iron is not manufactured in the country, but has to be imported, it seems to me that this material might be admitted free for that purpose, seeing that the same thing is done with regard to the manufacture of ships and other things. As I pointed out, the duty on the raw material is higher than the duty on the manufactured article. I simply bring the matter to the attention of the Government, hoping it will receive their consideration, for the request seems to me from every standpoint to be a reasonable one, which, if granted, would be for the benefit of the country without injuring the revenue.

Mr. FOSTER. After the hon. gentleman spoke the other night I looked up the papers in my possession, and the only request, so far as I remember, was with reference to pipes for derricks, used in the construction of windmills. What the hon. gentleman has stated to-day is new, and if he will send me the representations he speaks of, I will take them up in connection with the other matter, as to which I have not yet decided.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I shall be very glad to send the hon. gentleman the representations.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I would like to know when the hon. gentleman means to decide, because it would be treating this House very unfairly to pass this tariff and afterwards reopen it for the purpose of taking up such questions.

Mr. FOSTER. The tariff is not yet settled. There are points in the main tariff to which we have yet to go back.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). They were settled, then unsettled, and they want settling again.

Mr. FOSTER. No. Before the tariff is finally disposed of, I think the hon. gentleman has a right to have a straight answer to that question, and I propose to give him one.

Iron or steel manufactures, which at the time of their importation are of a class or kind not manufactured in Canada, when imported for use in the construction of iron, steel, or composite ships or vessels, free.

Mr. CASEY. If this item were made general and not confined to materials used in the construction of ships, it would cover both windmills and agricultural implements. Undoubtedly the protection given to the manufacturers of agricultural implements has been reduced, and it may be said that in that way the farmer will obtain all the benefit he ought to ask for. I do not quite agree with that. Seeing that the protection on the finished machine has been reduced, while the duty on the raw material has been maintained, and in some points increased, it is natural to expect that the manufacturer, unwilling to bear the whole cost of the reduction in the price of his finished article, will try to pass off a somewhat inferior article on the farmers. In other words, he will try to recoup himself for the smaller difference that exists between the cost of the raw material and the cost of the finished article than formerly. I am very glad the duty on the finished article has been reduced, but I think the manufacturers of these implements, who are a large and influential and wealthy class in the country, are also deserving of consideration. Therefore, both on account of the farmers, and on account of the manufacturers of these implements, I would ask that even if all iron for use in the manufacture of agricultural implements be not admitted free, the kind of iron mentioned in this item, that which at the time of its importation is of a class or kind not manufactured in Canada, should be admitted free for the manufacture of agricultural implements. I have had occasion to oppose the claims of the manufacturers in many particulars, when I thought they were unduly favoured by the imposition of protective duties. This seems to me to be a case where an important manufacture should be assisted by the thoroughly wholesome method of admitting part of its raw material free, and if the articles are not manufactured in Canada, I do not see how anybody else could be injured by this exception being made.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not think it is possible. Even if it were, it would not help the manufacturers of implements, because the kinds of iron they use are manufactured in this country.

Mr. CASEY. The Minister is perfectly sure that everything that is used—

Mr. FOSTER. I am not perfectly sure that everything they use is made in Canada, but all the kinds of iron they use is manufactured in Canada—pig iron, bar iron and steel as well.

Mr. CASEY. Are all sorts of rods and bars they use manufactured in Canada?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, rods and bars, and everything used in making binders.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Is it not true that a drawback is granted these manufacturers on implements they export?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, a slight drawback.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Then there must be some articles they use that pay a duty?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Then there must be some used by them that are not made in the country?

Mr. FOSTER. Some articles, but very few. The drawback is very slight, probably $2 a machine.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). As the hon. Minister says, this would not be a great advantage to them, but there is this fact mentioned by the hon. member for South Oxford. They are burdened with a duty on raw material, and they would not receive a relief under this, as the burdens on the raw material still remain. Having made a cut of 15 per cent in the protection afforded them—a larger cut than that made on any other item—it seems hard that they should be left burdened with the excessive duties on the raw materials they use. I am not in a position to speak definitely, but have been told by those engaged in the industry that the duty on a good deal of the raw material they use would be equal to even 40 or 50 per cent, and I think they say on pig iron as much as 60 per cent. The Minister has told us that he does not propose to do injustice to any manufacturing industry for the sake of protecting another, and it seems to me this is a case which deserves some consideration. The manufacture of our agricultural implements is a thing Canadians feel somewhat justly proud of—the position it has attained and the extent of the industry. And to treat it in a very exceptional way by leaving the burdens on their raw material while reducing the protection on the finished article, would seem, according to their representations, to leave them nothing at all in the way of protection. I suppose the hon. gentleman has had representations made to him on this matter, and would like him to say what protection really the manufacturers of agricultural implements enjoy. What is the difference between the duty on the raw material and the finished product?

Mr. FOSTER. I have no doubt the hon. gentleman perfectly knows.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). No, I am not thoroughly posted.

Mr. FOSTER. He seems to be perfectly well posted.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is your view?

Mr. FOSTER. It is that the agricultural implement men have a fair protection under the rates as they are.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What do you call a fair protection?

Mr. FOSTER. The tariff gives them 20 per cent.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Yes, on the finished article, but the duties may be 40, 50 or 60 per cent on the raw material which they are obliged to use. I doubt extremely whether, at this moment, in several of these articles, the agricultural implement maker receives any protection at all. And I feel no doubt whatever on another point, that if the agricultural implement makers had been, most of them, better supporters of the hon. gentleman and his friends than they have, they would have received very different treatment at the hands of the Government.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. In that case they would have been the major and not the minor thieves.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It is pretty clear how this tariff has been constructed. It has been devised to protect the interests of those who have aided the Government, on various occasions, in purse and person, and to injure those who have not contributed to keep the Government in place.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. After that misstatement, which we are so accustomed to, perhaps one of the friends of the implement manufacturers on that side will tell us what the articles are on which they pay any duty on their machines.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I will tell the hon. gentleman. On all the iron and the steel they employ of every description. On the angle iron, the rods they use, on every single article of iron and steel which goes into the production of agricultural implements. And if the Finance Minister does not know that, in his position, he ought to know, the greater part of the raw material used in the manufacture of most agricultural implements is iron and steel.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Yes, but not iron and steel on which duties are paid.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Yes, and on which exorbitant duties are paid.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Most certainly not.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Will the hon. gentleman name any single description of iron or steel which goes into the manufacture of agricultural implements on which no duty is exacted?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I have asked the hon. gentleman to state on what articles duty is paid which form part of the machine, and his answer is: Tell me the articles on which they do not pay a duty.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. All the iron and steel of every description which go into the manufacture of agricultural implements are heavily taxed, beginning with pig iron and going on to angle iron and rods.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The major part of the iron they use is produced in Canada.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Is the hon. gentleman still ignorant of the fact that the price of that is increased by every tax on the imported article?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I am not ignorant of the fact that that statement is made every quarter of an hour by the opposite side of the House, nor am I ignorant how little foundation there is for it.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). If the duty does not enhance the price, what is the object of it?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. We have had that chestnut very often discussed, and it was cracked long ago.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). What is the object of reducing the duty on agricultural implements from 35 to 20 per cent, if the duty were not taken advantage of? The hon. gentleman must be well convinced, in his own mind, that the duty on imported iron enhances the price of that made in this country. There are, in addition, certain articles which the manufacturers do import and which are not made in this country, and, as the Minister of Finance says, they are allowed, on their machines exported, a rebate of something like $2 a machine to counteract the duty. But the hon. Minister will not pretend to deny that the bar iron and pig iron and steel and the malleable irons and all these articles they use are not enhanced in price by the duty on the imports. I suppose the Finance Minister will be the first to tell us that if he were to reduce the duty on these, he would destroy the home industry, and that the home industry can only be maintained by giving it this advantage over the imported article. What we submit to the Minister is that, having reduced the duty on agricultural implements, which it is desirable should be done, he should not, on the other hand, do an injustice to these men by leaving them burdened with the same duties on the raw material as were charged before. He tries to get around that by saying the raw material they use is not imported, but it must be enhanced in price by the imposition of a duty, otherwise there would be no object in imposing it.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend has taken his position, let us see what it amounts to. He will excuse me if I analyze it for a moment. I believe he is a free trader, and if his party came into power they would take off the duty on agricultural implements and on the articles which enter into their manufacture. Therefore, if my hon. friend is consistent as a free trader, he is bound not to give the manufacturer here, who is protected upon the finished article, more protection than offsets the amount of duty he has to pay upon what goes into its production, provided he gets those materials from abroad. There is no escape from that position. If my hon. friend will make the assertion and prove it, that if an agricultural implement maker imports everything from abroad, and pays the duty according to the present schedule, and then make his machine at a price corresponding to that of the machine made in the United States, and gets his protection of 20 per cent—if the hon. gentleman will make the statement and prove it, that, under these conditions the Canadian manufacturer is not in a better position than he would be if no duties were imposed, then I will give up the struggle. And until he does that, my hon. friend is inconsistent with himself, with the policy of his party, and with the free trade principle which he sometimes, on platforms at least declares for, whether in practice he urges it or not. Unless he can show that the manufacturer of agricultural implements to-day has not an offset to the duties he would pay upon everything that goes into the construction of a machine, even if he imports it and pays the duty, he is inconsistent, as I have stated. He cannot prove that. The manufacturer has an advantage, and the hon. gentleman knows it.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). The Minister, according to his own declaration, must be guided by the free trade principle in framing this tariff. I do not so understand it. I understand that the hon. Minister has submitted a proposition based upon what he declares was necessary for the country, the protection of home manufactures. And, in criticising his proposal as I had occasion to say before, I judge it by this principle which he has laid down and which has been adopted by the House, though opposed on this side. We are now in committee perfecting this tariff according to the principle adopted by the House, but not adopted unanimously. The hon. Minister is not in a position to say that we on this side of the House, under these conditions, are bound to judge this tariff by the free trade principle. Applying the principle that he has laid down to the tariff that he has proposed, we ask the hon. gentleman: Why should you single out one particular industry to slaughter it, while other industries not employing one one-hundredth part of the same number of men are receiving protection of 100 per cent? We are criticising the tariff on the principle laid down by the hon. Minister himself, and the hon. Minister will please confine himself to that aspect of the case and state fairly—he himself claiming to know the facts and alleging that I know them, although I am not in that position—what amount of protection he is leaving to the agricultural implement manufacturer under this tariff as it is arranged. That is to say, what protection is there in the difference between the duty on the finished product and the addition to the price of the raw materials of which the implement is composed caused by the duties upon these raw materials? That is the standpoint from which this tariff is to be discussed, and that is the standpoint from which it is being discussed by the Opposition, although they deny the truth of the principle upon which this tariff is based.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman knows as well as I do that an agricultural implement of a certain kind—say a binder—would be valued at $100. At 20 per cent duty, the protection to the home manufacturer of such an implement would be $20—that is plain enough. I defy my hon. friend to say that, if everything that goes into the construction of that agricultural implement is imported from abroad and duty paid upon it, the total duty represented by that implement will be more than from $6 to $8.

Mr. WALLACE. The hon. Finance Minister might have gone still further. What are the articles used in the construction of a binder? I am told that a binder weighs about 1,400 pounds. Of that, about 150 to 200 pounds are wood and canvas. The statement is made by the implement men that the iron used in the construction of a binder weighs 1,200 pounds—600 pounds pig iron, 300 pounds wrought iron and 300 pounds steel. The duty on 600 pounds of pig iron, if they had to import it—but they have not for they get it cheaper here—

Mr. PATERSON (Brant).

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). No, no.
Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. WALLACE. If they could not buy it cheaper here they would import it; the fact that they buy it here is sufficient proof that they get it cheaper. But suppose there were in this country no manufactures of pig iron or bar iron, or steel, and that the manufacturers of agricultural implements had to import all their raw material, what would be the result? The duty on 600 pounds of pig iron, at $4 per ton, is $1.20; the duty on 300 pounds of steel, at ½ cent per pound, is $1.50; the duty on 300 pounds of wrought iron, at ½ cent per pound, is $1.50, making a total on these articles of $4.20. Say there were other items to be imported, and upon which they would have to pay duty—for instance, canvas, which, however, is made in this country—and counting the duty upon coal and other articles used in the manufacture, but which do not appear in the composition of the article itself—take all these duties and you cannot make up a total of more than about $6. As the Finance Minister said, the price of the imported American binder, as fixed for the purpose of estimating the duty, is as follows:—For 100 binders in one shipment under one invoice, $90; from 50 to 100 binders under one invoice, $95, and under 50, $100. These are the prices fixed and accepted as satisfactory by the American manufacturers, because they are based on the law which says that the price for duty shall be the price in the open market, and these are the prices for wholesale quantities charged by McCormick and other manufacturers in selling to dealers in these implements. As a matter of fact there has never been a shipment of 100 binders under one invoice, nor even one of 50 binders under one invoice, so that upon all implements the duty has been calculated upon a price of $100. Now, 20 per cent on $100 makes $20 of protection, and I challenge the hon. gentleman to quote figures of all the materials entering into the manufacture of this implement, even supposing all were imported and duty paid upon them, to show that the total duty upon these materials would be more than one-third of the protection given the manufacturer of the finished article. The manufacturers have over $13 clear protection on a binder, and, that, I think, is a pretty fair protection. The same proportion will apply to all other agricultural implements made in Canada by Canadian manufacturers.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. Controller of Customs, who has just addressed the committee, it seems to me, has taken a more rational view of the subject of protection in discussing this question than he did in discussing a number of others, in which the duty ran much higher, being up to 140 per cent in one case. It would seem that the hon. gentleman's view of the reason—ableness of the amount of protection given depends upon some occult relation between the manufacturer and the hon. gentleman. We had him declaring a few evenings ago that 140 per cent was not an unreasonable protection in one instance, and now he says that 20 per cent in another case, even though many of the raw materials are subject to duty, is adequate protection. So, it is pretty clear the hon. gentleman's opinion of what would be reasonable is a variable quantity.

Mr. FOSTER. Something like your policy over there.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman has pointed out that the articles which are subject to these duties may be produced here and can be bought without paying duty, and that seems to have been the view taken by the hon. Prime Minister. Well, Sir, that seems to me a very extraordinary contention. The hon. gentleman says: Why, the manufacturer of agricultural implements may buy his pig iron, and his steel, and his other iron in Canada, and if he does so, he need not pay any duty at all. I wonder if it makes any difference to the manufacturer whether he is paying a tax to the Government or whether he is paying a tax to the party who produces his raw material. Why, it was shown to the House, I need not say when, that pig iron could be purchased in Scotland for $10.50 a ton, when it was commanding here $15 or $16 a ton. Does not every hon. gentleman see that the manufacturer is as much burdened in consequence of the duty, although he may purchase a product found in this country, as if he purchased the same kind of product from abroad? Now, if I understand the contention of the hon. Minister of Finance, it amounts to this, that if a party were to manufacture here, from Canadian iron and steel, an agricultural implement, and were to send it abroad, he would get no remission of taxation in consequence of the extra price incurred on account of the tariff; but if he were to import the iron and steel and manufacture an implement from those imported articles, although it cost him no more than it would to manufacture it from articles produced in Canada, when he reshipped that implement, having paid a duty upon a portion of the raw material, he would be entitled to a remission.

Mr. FOSTER. No; he would not be entitled to a single cent of remission.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Why not?

Mr. FOSTER. Because, no remission is given in the way of drawbacks upon articles of a kind which are made in this country, and if he makes his implement from pig iron, or from bar iron, which are of a kind made in this country, he gets no drawback on what he imports.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Even for imported articles?

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman knows the law.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). It is important that we should know that fact, because everybody will understand then that the manufacturers of agricultural implements who, 15 years ago, were manufacturing these same implements for the German market, are to-day unable to enter into competition with foreign makers in consequence of the extra burdens that are imposed upon them.

Mr. FOSTER. They are selling more abroad to-day than in any other year in the history of their existence.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I think the hon. gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. FOSTER. I beg to say again that the agricultural implement men are selling more abroad to-day than at any previous time in their existence.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). As against the Americans the Canadian manufacturer may be on fair terms of competition, because the American manufacturer who sends his article to the European market is as heavily burdened as is the manufacturer of Canada, in consequence of the high duties that are imposed upon him. I would like to know whether that is giving the manufacturer of agricultural implements in Canada a fair opportunity. It is perfectly clear from the hon. gentleman's own statement that the Canadian manufacturer is burdened, at least to the extent of $6 on implements directly upon the articles themselves, and with regard to the cost of labour and everything else that enters into the composition of the machine, his burdens are increased, and increased at least, to an amount double the duty paid upon the raw material that he actually uses. So it is clear that the hon. gentleman, far from fostering the industry so far as the foreign market is concerned, is imposing serious impediments in its way. But that is not all. The hon. gentleman is imposing an additional burden upon agriculturists. He promised to help the agriculturists, but if he makes it impossible for the Canadian manufacturer to make that machine at the lowest point at which the manufacture is possible, he is burdening every man in the country who is a purchaser of the article, and so the hon. gentleman is putting a burden upon the whole agricultural population of this country who are customers of those engaged in the manufacture of these agricultural implements. But I rose mainly to call the attention of the House to the extraordinary position taken by the Prime Minister. He declared that because an article is manufactured from native products there is therefore no burden falling upon the manufacturer. Why, he said: He don't pay duty. The fact is he does pay duty, but he does not pay it into the public treasury, he pays it to the producer of the raw material which he employs. The hon. Minister of Finance admitted that. The Minister of Finance, in his Budget speech, admitted that with regard to a great number of those articles, and in the first instance with regard to them all, the increase in price was equal to the amount of duty. Well, that being so, every one of these articles is taxed, the price of every one of these articles is enhanced, and this enhancement of price is made more unjust for the reason that the public derive no advantage from it. The public have received nothing; the public treasury is in no way helped, but the parties who produce the article are seriously hindered by these arrangements. Every one will understand in how much better a position all these parties would be—the farmer who purchases the article, and the manufacturer who produces it—if it were not for the burdens that are imposed, and every hon. gentleman knows that not one dollar goes into the public treasury in consequence of these burdens, but they are tributes imposed upon one section of the population for the benefit of another section of the population.

Mr. DAVIN. I followed as closely as I could the argument of my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills), and I also followed the argument of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), and it is quite clear to me now that the great Reform party, and especially the hon. member for South Oxford, are taking the manufacturing interests under their wing.

An hon. MEMBER. They always did.

Mr. DAVIN. Well, I must say, then, that their tones have greatly changed. It appears to me that the hon. member for South Oxford, in discussing this subject, is like an irascible but affectionate mother in regard to these manufacturers—that is, accepting the view that the Reform party have always taken them under their wings—and while the child is beaten in passion one day, it is fondled the next. I confess, Sir, it was touching to me to hear the tones of sweet endearment in which the hon. member for South Oxford spoke about the burdens that the manufacturers of implements had to bear, because it allowed me to get glimpses into the depths of tenderness of the hon. gentleman's nature, that I never had before. But now, applying myself to the argument of the hon. member for Bothwell, I will point out, if I may venture to hope that I can do that in regard to my hon. friend, the defect in his argument. I grant that there are cases where, if you impose a duty, you enhance the price—there must be such cases. There are other cases where if you impose a duty and develop the manufacture of an article in the country, the price, as we know, as for instance, in regard to this very item of agricultural implements, is lowered, because I have only to go back some few years to show that the price of agricultural implements all over Canada, and especially in the North-west and Manitoba, were higher than they are to-day. There is a double fallacy running through the argument made against the protection of manufactures by many hon. members of this House. At one time I hear the question, when an industry that is protected is mentioned: How many men does it employ? Another item is brought up, and another manufacturing industry is before the House, and again the cry comes: How many does it employ? The reasoning there, and we have had it more elaborated, is this: Here you are protecting this industry for the sake of 100, 300, or 700 men; what are 700, what are 300, what are 100 men? Go over each industry in Canada and ascertain the number of men employed, and then ask what is that number of men compared with the 5,000,000? Here is the fallacy. Take an individual industry, and the number of men employed seems small; but make an aggregate of the number of men employed in all the protected industries of Canada, and there you have the true fraction, and the true relation, and you get at its proper importance. It is the old fallacy that Horace refers to about pulling hairs out of the tail of a donkey. Pull one hair out and it matters very little. Pull out another—what are a few hairs out of the tail of a donkey? But go on and pull out every hair, and I commend this task to the hon. member for Elgin (Mr. Casey) because he is a classical scholar, and I have no doubt he would feel he was engaged in an Horatian task, and it would be a most useful and profitable undertaking. The time will come when, with a little patience, and industry on the part of hon. gentlemen in regard to this matter every hair will be out of the tail of the donkey, and you will then have a bob-tailed donkey. Now, I come back again to the argument of my hon. friend. He said the statement made by the Controller was a very fair one. I must say that the statement made by the Controller was intelligent and enlightening to the House. I did not know some of the points made, and it was enlightening, I have no doubt to the hon. member for Grey (Mr. Landerkin), and I see a beam in that perspicuous orb that I never saw there before—so the Controller has done something towards enlightening my hon. friend.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell).

Mr. LANDERKIN. The Controller enlightened you last session, also.

Mr. DAVIN. I am not sure that the hon. gentleman is quite right, but I am very glad to see that whether the Controller enlightened me or enlightened my hon. friend, his remarks should have made such a permanent impression on the hon. gentleman, that he was able sometimes to use them this year to eke out his efforts at stale pleasantries in this House. The argument of the Controller is this : That if a duty is placed, say $6, on an implement, it is not, under present conditions, paid by the farmer. I will state the argument as strongly as it can be stated against the position I am going to take, and I will include the argument of the member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) and the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), because I want to call the attention of the committee to the fact that those hon. gentlemen, up to the present moment, devote a second or two to the farmer, but the main portion of their time to the injured manufacturer. And that emphasizes, if I may refer to the speech I made to this House before we went into committee, what I ventured to state then and what I reiterate now, that the Government have gone so far in the tariff as to really seriously embarrass hon. gentlemen opposite. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) was so much occupied with the manufacturer that he actually forgot his usual accuracy. That hon. gentleman is one of the most accurate of men ; I am acquainted with no man who knows so much, and I never knew a man so confident that he knew everything. The hon. gentleman was anxious about the manufacturer, and whether he could compete in foreign markets with other manufacturers. He stated that our manufacturers of implements did not now send so many implements abroad. The hon. gentleman was at once contradicted by the Finance Minister, and it is notorious that, at the present moment, in the markets of the world our machinery manufacturers hold a high place. If the manufacturer was actually handicapped by the duty, the result would be that the farmer would pay the $6. But what is contended by the Finance Minister and the Controller, and what I contend, too, is that with the moderate duty we have now—and if the duty had been reduced or entirely swept away I should have been glad of it—we shall be able to meet prices at which implements are sold across the line. But if you swept away protection on that and other industries, under which we have our goods and machinery made here, what you would do would be not merely to sacrifice 100, 200, or 700 men, or 7,000 men, who are, according to hon. gentlemen opposite, sucking the life-blood out of the farmer, but you would surrender the farmer to the manufacturer of the United States. You would throw down the protection, not merely to the manufacturer but to the farmer himself, and the man who, at the present moment, has cheaper implements and cheaper goods is better off, as a purchaser, generally, than he was before, and, as regards implements, he is better off than he was before protection was adopted ; he would once more be exposed to the very same imposition to which he was exposed before he had protection. You would increase the price of the implements and of all articles the farmer used. And then, what would follow ? The country might obtain a little more revenue from one or two articles, but hon. gentlemen opposite would no longer be able to ask as to whether 300 or 500 or 700 men were employed in certain industries, for those industries would have gone across the line. What further would have happened ? My hon. friend from Huron (Mr. McMillan) and my hon. friend from Wellington (Mr. McMullen), who can sometimes talk protection, and the highest form of protection, those hon. gentlemen would find our farmers, in whose interest there is no man here more zealous than I am, would really be handicapped instead of occupying the satisfactory position in which he is to-day ; and what is more, that home market on which those hon. gentlemen set store, and properly so, would be swept across the line in the stream of emigrating artisans.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Oh, oh.

Mr. DAVIN. The hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) says, "Oh, oh." Although I never was with the hon. member for Queen's on a seat in court, I knew him when we were both students in the same inn of court in London, but I have sat in court with other barristers, and I know that falsetto, "Oh, oh," well. I have heard it again and again. When I have been stating, in my unsophisticated manner, the facts of a case to a jury, and laying down irreproachable law, the counsel on the other side would say, "Oh, oh," in precisely the same manner. So there is nothing in the "Oh, oh." I say, that if I thought the manufacturer was placed in an unjust position by that duty ; because having his 25 per cent as he has now—

Mr. WALLACE. Twenty per cent is the duty.

Mr. DAVIN. Yes ; I forgot. You have reduced it to 20 per cent. If the manufacturers have that 20 per cent protection, I do not see how they are handicapped by the duty on iron. Therefore, I have no pity for the poor manufacturer. I have no pity for the Massey-Harris Co. whatever ; the only pity I have for them is that the friends of some hon. gentlemen of the Opposition so handicapped them at the great Chicago exhibition that they did not get justice. Looking at the matter as it is, looking at the prices that have been paid for agricultural implements in the past, and the comparative prices now paid in the United States and in Canada, I say that the farmer is suffering nothing in consequence ; because if we were to destroy the home competition, the result would be that the farmer would have to pay a large price for his implements.

Mr. CASEY. The hon. member (Mr. Davin) has certainly dealt in a most unsophisticated way, as he told us, with the arguments advanced in connection with this item. On the other hand, his humour has been highly sophisticated. When he dragged the donkey by the tail into the discussion and compared it to the great National Policy, as now revised and re-revised, I feel sure that some judgment must fall upon him for his sacrilegious comparison. It is not only the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) whom we generally find buoyant in his disposition, who has been excited by this discussion, but the Premier and the Minister of Finance himself, who ought to be used to it by this time, both lost their coolness and both showed very clearly that there was something sore in their feeling in regard to this matter. The right hon. the Premier severed himself from his colleague, who is supposed to attend to the finances of the country, in his opinion as to the effects of the protective tariff. It is a two-headed Government, evidently, and the two heads do not think alike. The Premier committed himself to the extraordinary statement, that people who use dutiable goods did not pay any taxes in case they did not actually import the goods from abroad. His colleague said in his Budget speech—it has been quoted before, but I must quote it again, because the Premier said the statement only came from this side of the House—his colleague at his right hand used this language in his Budget speech :

Another objection that has been made to the National Policy and to the protective principle in it is : that the cost of many manufactured goods has been enhanced to consumers on account of the rates imposed. I grant that argument at once to a certain extent.

Even so far the Minister of Finance has knocked the wind out of the Premier. He says further :

I say that in initial years of a National Policy with a protective principle in it, that it will have the effect of enhancing the cost of goods, and that at the first the cost of goods will be very closely up to the measure of the protection which was given.

That is to say, the price of home-made material will be put up as high as it can be, without enabling people to import cheaper. Again :

If it does not have that effect why should it ever be adopted at all, and what is the good of it.

I should not have repeated that quotation had not it been for the injudicious statement of the Premier that the protective policy had not such an effect. From the words of his own colleague, I convict the Premier not only of not keeping in touch with the ordinary political economy of the day, but of not keeping in touch with his own Finance Minister, especially charged with attending to these matters. The right hon. gentleman, in fact, lost his head a little, and under a fit of irritation, he said what he did not think, and what he knew could be immediately squelched by a quotation from the remarks of his own colleague. The Minister of Finance, instead of answering the questions of my hon. friend from Brant (Mr. Paterson), rose to his feet, saying : May I ask my friend another question ? I defy my hon. friend from Brant to prove so and so. It is not the place of the Minister to question the hon. member for Brant ; it is his place to answer the questions put by the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Paterson), because it is not the hon. member for Brant who is proposing a tariff to this House. The tariff is proposed by the Minister, and it is his duty to answer all pertinent questions in regard to his proposals. The Minister of Finance pretended that the issue was, whether the manufacturer of agricultural implements is better off with a 20 per cent tariff, and paying duty on what he uses at various rates, than he would be without any duty on either his raw material or his finished article. That is not the issue before the House. We have a tariff here, giving a certain protection to the manufacturer of agricultural implements. We have a tariff putting a very high duty on his raw material, and we urge that this manufacturer who very properly has had to submit to a reduction in the price of what he makes, should be relieved to a considerable extent by reducing the duty on his raw material. It has too long been the idea of gentlemen opposite that the only way to help the manufacturer is to put a duty on what he makes. It is time that the sound and honest way of helping a manufacturer should be pointed out to the House, and that is, to reduce the cost to the manufacturer. What we ask now is, that the maker of agricultural implements should be helped in that way, and not in any protectionist way whatever. The Controller of Customs, in figuring up the amount of duty to be paid on the various kinds of iron and steel used in the manufacture of, say a binder, adopted a plan that was not quite as straightforward as it should have been. He assumed that 600 pounds of pig iron were used, that 300 pounds of wrought iron were used, and he puts them all at half a cent a pound ; whereas, we know that a half cent a pound is the lowest rate and that wrought iron is taxed in various shapes at a good deal more than that. We have wrought iron in the form of forgings, and in the form of axles and axle bars, taxed at 35 per cent. Then, we have malleable castings taxed 25 per cent, nails 30 per cent, screws 35 per cent, and so on, with a great deal of the iron that enters into the making of a binder, all taxed at varying rates, amounting to a good deal more than half a cent a pound. So that the hon. gentleman's figures are utterly unreliable. We know quite well that the manufacturers of these machines do not make everything they want to put into them. They do not make all their own castings, nails, screws, bolts and sheet iron. They buy largely these articles ready-made from others. Then, we have not had any figures with regard to the canvas ; but that, as well as the paint and varnish, and everything else put into the machine, are heavily taxed. We therefore ask, not that any further protection should be given to the manufacturer, but that he should be relieved of some of these burdens. According to the Controller's figures, which I think amount to about $5 per machine, or about 5 per cent, the makers of these machines have a protection of about 15 per cent out of the 20. The Minister of Finance says that is a fair protection. Now, Sir, let us compare that with his idea of a fair protection for coal oil. He gives the producer of coal oil from 100 to 200 per cent protection on an industry which is smaller and less important than the manufacture of agricultural implements, and which hardly imports anything, and he refuses to relieve the agricultural implement maker of some of the cost of his raw material as a set-off for the reduction in his protection. There was a call from the other side of the House a few moments ago in regard to inconsistency on this side. Now, Sir, for inconsistency commend me to these two items, as samples of the utter want of principle displayed in this revision of the tariff.

Mr. BENNETT. Let me call the attention of the Minister of Finance and the Controller of Customs to the fact that wooden vessels are excluded from the benefit of this item. Last year I had occasion to make an application, on behalf of the owners of a wooden vessel, which cost a very large amount of money, for a rebate in respect of a steam-steering apparatus which was not manufactured in the country and which could not possibly be purchased here. But wooden vessels were excluded from this privilege, and the owners could not get the benefit for which I applied. As a matter of fact, on the upper lakes it is desirable to have wooden vessels in preference to iron, owing to the fact that in those waters there are large numbers of sunken rocks, and when a wooden vessel strikes it can often be saved, while an iron vessel that strikes generally becomes a total wreck. Therefore, I would suggest the addition of the word "wooden" as well as the word "composite" to this item.

Mr. MASSON. When this question was first broached, I rose to propose the amendment which the hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) has suggested. We have had a good deal of discussion in regard to the amount of protection necessary for agricultural implement manufacturers. It is now conceded that they have a net protection of about 14 per cent in addition to a very considerable protection by the patent laws, so that I think that class of manufacturers now receive ample protection. I will not occupy the time of the committee any further on that point. But I would press upon the attention of the Finance Minister the requirements of a class of people who are not protected at all, but who, I think, should be allowed to import free of duty all materials that enter into the construction of their product. The ship-builders of this country have to compete, in the same waters and in the same trade, with American-built ships. They have also to compete with the world, so far as shipping is concerned. English vessels of the very highest type—steel, iron and wooden vessels—can come into our waters, fully equipped, and compete with our Canadian-built ships. Not only the hulls and rigging come in free, but all the furnishings that enter into the complete equipment of these vessels. Some years ago I called the attention of the Government to the duty that then existed on iron and steel entering into the construction of iron, steel and composite vessels, and an amendment was made, which is now re-enacted, in the application of which I found the difficulty my hon. friend from East Simcoe has pointed out. On the upper lakes, where the very strongest class of vessels is required, where the freights are heavy and the seas are great, the shipping is passing from wooden vessels to iron or steel vessels, or to wooden vessels strengthened by iron and steel. The expression "composite" may have been intended to cover that class of vessel; but it has been interpreted to mean a vessel so called by Lloyd's. Consequently, vessels built on our upper lakes, strengthened with arches or sides or frames of iron and steel, do not get the benefit of this free item. I would therefore ask that the item be extended to all vessels without distinction. I would further ask that steering-gear and other articles not manufactured in Canada, and intended for use on these vessels, be allowed to come in duty free. The steam and electric steering-gear which is now in use on all our passenger vessels, and also on a good many freight vessels, is not manufactured in Canada, but has to be imported either from England or the United States. There is also, in our more finely finished vessels a large quantity of copper and brass used, which also has to pay duty. I may say that in one vessel built in the town of Owen Sound over $6,000 in duty were paid on material that went into its construction. You can easily see then that an industry striving to compete against the world, without protection, as this industry of ship-building in Canada is now striving, requires that every facility should be given it in the construction of vessels in the best and most improved and cheapest manner.

Mr. FOSTER. Before replying directly to my hon. friend who has just sat down, I want to, if I can, give a little more information to my hon. friend opposite, who ventured the assertion, I think, that the present tariff made it very difficult for agricultural implement makers to compete in foreign countries, and I think led to the impression that they were rather falling off in their exports to foreign countries. The returns give some interesting facts. From 1887, which was the year when we put on the higher iron and steel duties—what my hon. friends would call inordinately heavy protection—to the present time, what has been the history of the extension of the agricultural implement industry, in so far as its export trade is concerned? This, Sir, that in 1886 we exported only $17,000 worth of agricultural implements, and in 1893 we exported $444,696 worth, nearly $500,000. Now, there must be something wrong in the premises or the deduction of my hon. friend, who has tried to leave the impression that the present tariff made it very difficult for our agricultural implement men to compete abroad. There are the facts. In 1878, before the National Policy had its inception, $86,000 worth were exported altogether. In 1886, just before we put on the higher iron duties, the export was $17,000 worth, and in 1893 the export had gone up to $444,696, $50,000 more than in 1892, and of course a great deal more than in the preceding years. Consequently it has not been proved by my hon. friend that the duties upon iron have had the effect of destroying the manufacture of agricultural implements, so far as the export business is concerned.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). How does the hon. gentleman account for the reduction from 1878 to 1887?

Mr. FOSTER. It needed more stimulus than it got in 1887.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). In 1887 the export was only $17,000, and in 1878 it was $86,000.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman will remember that the course of every industry, under a protective policy, is first to make itself strong in the home market, and then, after it has gained possession of that, to reach out for the foreign market.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Are we to understand from the hon. gentleman that the cause of the increased expansion of the export of agricultural implements is the iron duty? That is the cause, according to him. You have added enormously to the cost of their raw material, and therefore you have been able to increase production.

Mr. FOSTER. I was answering the argument of hon. gentlemen opposite, that the duties on iron so hampered the industry that these agricultural implement men could not carry on their business successfully.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. No; that was not the argument.

Mr. FOSTER. I have shown that the facts tend exactly the other way.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What we were pointing out was the extraordinary injustice done by the hon. gentleman to a particular class. He chooses to give one class of men 100 per cent protection, and to cut another class down to 20 per cent. He chooses to give one class of men their raw material absolutely free, and to inflict a tax of 30, 40 and 50 per cent on the raw material of another. Why should the cotton manufacturer be allowed to have his raw material perfectly free and the agricultural implement manufacturer be compelled to pay an enormous duty on his raw material? What earthly ground or reason is there for that? Is it on the ground of the benefit done the country? Now, the agricultural implement industry is one that is naturally indigenous to this country, which cannot be said of the cotton industry.

Mr. FOSTER.

Mr. SPROULE. It needs less protection.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. If you are going to protect anything at all, you ought to protect the industries which are natural and indigenous to the country, and likely to develop a considerable export trade, and not foster hothouse industries, which can only develop an export trade at an extraordinary expense to the country. There are ten reasons for protecting agricultural implements to one for protecting cotton. The hon. gentleman knows well that these agricultural implement industries employ a very large number of hands—more, I believe, if you have regard for the number of men employed, than the cotton industry. In the latter there may be a few men, but the rest are women and children. In the agricultural implement industry, although the census returns are so made up that this is not shown, 4,000 or 5,000 men are employed, and these have families. Of the two industries, the one is much more valuable than the other. But the hon. gentleman cannot give the slightest advantage to that industry, which is natural to the country and which employs almost all able-bodied men, with families depending on them, but he can give treble and quadruple protection to the manufacturer of cotton, who employs, of necessity, as a rule, a much greater number of women and children than men. When the hon. gentleman has to deal with such an industry as the development of our coal oil wells, he has no scruple in giving it a protection of 120 to 150 per cent.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Neither had you.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I gave no such protection. I reduced the protection very largely. I reduced the duty from 15 cents to 6 cents.

Mr. FOSTER. But what about the excise duties?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. And I reduced the excise duties, and gave a great boon to the whole population of Canada—a boon worth $1,500,000 to $2,000,000 per year, looking at the quantity of coal oil consumed in the country. That is what the Government of Mr. Mackenzie and myself did. But I want to call attention, for the sake of illustration, to the case of the valuable industry of hulling rice. To that industry the hon. gentleman had not the slightest scruple in giving a protection of at least 75 per cent on his own showing.

Mr. FOSTER. No.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Every penny of 75 per cent. The duty on unhulled rice is 3-10ths cent per pound, and on the cleaned rice it is 1¼ cents per pound. Now, the difference between those, making a very liberal allowance, indeed, for the total loss that may be incurred in converting the dirty rice into clean rice, would give at least a protection of 75 per cent. But when it comes to the agricultural implements there the hon. gentleman's idea of fair protection is 13 to 14 per cent, as laid down by the Controller of Customs. Now, we have a right to ask: Why this extraordinary discrimination? Why let the cotton manufacturers' material in free and tax the agricultural implement manufacturers' raw material to the tune of 40 or 50 per cent? Or still more, why do you allow such a comparatively insignificant matter as the hulling of rice to be protected to the tune of 75 per cent? or wall paper to the tune of 100 per cent? or some of these manufactured cotton goods to be protected to the tune of 32 per cent, when for the agricultural implement maker 13 per cent is enough?

Mr. SPROULE. If the hon. gentleman's argument means anything, it means that the agricultural implement maker is dealt with unfairly, that he has a grievance. And the only possible reason for that is that the protection to his manufacture has been reduced. Now, the hon. gentleman had better make up his mind whether he is to stand by the manufacturer or to stand by the farmer. He has turned around and is now advocating the interests of the manufacturer, contrary to all experiences we have had of that hon. gentleman, his invariable complaint hitherto having been that the farmer was being harshly dealt with for the benefit of the millionaire manufacturer. I do not see how the manufacturer can be so unfairly dealt with if he has only to pay in duties—provided he imports all his iron—$4.20 for the material for an implement on which he gets a protection of $20. The argument of the hon. gentleman is not a fair one. Even if it were true that the duty on cottons or other lines of manufacture was too high, it would be better to have them lowered than to institute a comparison with a view to increasing the duty on agricultural implements beyond what is desirable. The hon. gentleman's argument is only to convince the agricultural implement manufacturer that he is not being fairly dealt with. I do not think they will regard him as their friend because of his present attitude. His new born zeal for the manufacturer will not win him very much favour from those who remember so well the denunciations of manufacturers we have so often listened to from the same hon. gentleman.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). The hon. gentleman (Mr. Sproule) says this is a question between the farmer and the manufacturer. It is not so. There is no demand made for an increased duty on agricultural implements, and only if that were done would injustice be done to the farmer. It is to the interest of the farmers as well as to the interest of the manufacturer that the remarks that have been made should be made.

Mr. SPROULE. The contention is the manufacturer is unfairly dealt with by the reduction of this duty.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). There is no contention whatever that the duty on agricultural implements should be more than 20 per cent. The reduction of the duty is approved of on this side, but what is asked is that the duty on the iron entering into the manufacture of these implements shall be reduced, and that in the interest of the farmer as well as of the manufacturer. It should not be much trouble to the hon. gentleman to see that; and others can see, if he cannot, that what is asked for is not in the interest of the manufacturer as opposed to that of the farmer. This tariff is based upon the principle of protection to home manufactures, and the question is asked why there should be such a difference in the treatment meted out to different kinds of manufactures. Instances have just been given of protection to certain industries running as high as 75 per cent, and the question is why should there be such a difference in the rate of protection given to different classes? Take, for instance, the refining of the sugar. Sugar is a necessary article of every day consumption, and the process of refining is a comparatively simple one, employing relatively few hands. The protection on refined sugar runs from 16 to 21 per cent. Now, according to the figures of the Controller of Customs, there is a net protection to the manufacturers of agricultural implements of about 13 per cent.

Mr. SPROULE. It is 15.80 per cent over the duties paid on their iron, even if all were imported.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). These are not the figures given by the Controller of Customs. I think he said that, allowing for the duties on all raw materials, the net protection would be about 13 or 14 per cent.

Mr. WALLACE. The net protection on a binder would be $13.40. I have the complete figures here now, and the total amount paid by the manufacturer on the materials entering into the manufacture of a binder, if all those materials were imported, would be $6.60. I might mention that there was an error in my previous statement. I substituted pig iron for wrought iron or steel. That would cause some variation in the figures, but the total, as I have it here, is $6.60.

Mr. EDGAR. That does not include the duty on the paint ?

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I suppose the hon. gentleman left that out of consideration, as also the 30 or 35 per cent on the machinery used in the manufacture. However, that need not come into the discussion now, because this is a discussion of comparative rates of protection. Take the industry of sugar washing, of which I was speaking. Why should this industry be given a protection of from 16 to 21 per cent according to the value of the sugar—averaging say about 18 per cent—while there is only about 14 per cent on agricultural implements. I am now comparing one large item with another : but many others could be cited, as the hon. gentleman knows, the raw material for which is admitted free, while the protection runs from 25 to 30 or 35 per cent. That is the question submitted to the Finance Minister, and it is in the interests of the farmer as well as of the manufacturer, not that the duty on agricultural implements should be increased, but that the duty on the raw material should be reduced. I merely rose to point out to the hon. gentleman that he was mistaken if he thought the position taken on this side of the House was adverse to the interests of the farmer. We speak in the interests of the farmer and we ask why it is, if you are adopting the protective system, that one class of manufacture is treated so differently from another class ?

Mr. SPROULE. That was not the contention of the hon. gentleman. He spoke of this as an important industry employing thousands of hands, and he contended that they were unfairly dealt with. If they are unfairly dealt with, how is it being done ? By lowering their protective duty ? If the whole gist of the argument was not that the manufacturer was being unfairly dealt with, then I do not know what the nature of argument is.

Mr. BENNETT. I would like to ask the hon. Finance Minister whether he intends to make this clause cover the case of wooden as well as of iron vessels ?

Mr. FOSTER. That is a matter of importance, and if the gentlemen who have presented it will rest their case with the presentation of it, the Government will take into consideration how far it can go in the direction they desire. The question involves important points demanding consideration.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Does the item stand ?

Mr. FOSTER. No ; we will consider the matter.

Mr. LAURIER. I would suggest to the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) that he should adopt the idea given out by the Prime Minister. He should tell the ship-builder that he has the choice of purchasing Canadian or foreign iron. If he purchases foreign iron, he must pay the duty, but he has it on the authority of the Prime Minister that if he buys Canadian iron, he pays no duty.

Mr. WALLACE.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. That is the first time I ever heard the hon. gentleman give such sound Canadian advice.

Mr. BENNETT. But I spoke of articles not manufactured in the country—for instance a steam-gearing apparatus—which, if used in iron or composite vessels would be free of duty, but, unless the clause covers wooden ships, would be dutiable if used in ships of that class.

Mr. McMULLEN. I would like to ask the Controller of Customs when the price of imported binders was fixed at $100. When was that order made, or how long has it been in existence ?

Mr. WALLACE. I made that ruling a year ago this month. I think, before the implements were brought in, at the request of the McCormicks, of Chicago, who were proposing to send in some implements.

Mr. MARTIN. Was that done when they were proposing to bring in more than a hundred at once ?

Mr. WALLACE. We fixed the schedule of prices for binders, mowers, and ploughs—the whole arrangement.

Mr. MARTIN. Does the hon. gentleman mean to say that it was done at the request of the McCormick Company ?

Mr. WALLACE. They asked to be informed at what rate of duty their implements could be brought into this country, and I informed them the valuation at which the implement could be brought in.

Mr. MARTIN. The hon. gentleman, in his remarks before, stated a somewhat new principle. We have been accustomed in the committee to hear a great deal about the Canadian manufacture. The Finance Minister disposes of a great many items by telling us that the duty is satisfactory to the particular manufacturer in question.

Mr. FOSTER. How many items ?

Mr. MARTIN. A great many.

Mr. FOSTER. How many ?

Mr. MARTIN. I could not say, probably a hundred.

Mr. FOSTER. I will give my hon. friend $10 for every one he can find above five.

Mr. MARTIN. I think I will get a great many $10.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Put up your money.

Mr. MARTIN. I was about to point out that the Controller of Customs has introduced a new principle. It is not the Canadian manufacturer alone who is to be satisfied, but he tells us that the American manufacturer is satisfied in this matter. Now, I venture to doubt, even if that is a correct statement. The American manufacturers object very much to the arbitrary action of the Customs Department in assuming to say what the price of their article is. I may say that I do not care at all what the American manufacturer thinks, whether it is in his interest or against it, but it happens that in this particular matter the interest of the American manufacturer is precisely the interest of the farmer in Manitoba, and in that I am interested. On what principle has the hon. gentleman a right to say that a particular binder is worth $100, when, as a matter of fact that binder can be bought possibly, for $80? If there is a duty of 20 per cent upon that binder which is worth $80, it would amount to $16; but the hon. gentleman arbitrarily says that it is worth $100, therefore the amount of duty on that binder is $20 instead of $16, as it ought to be. He makes the provision that if a hundred binders are brought in at once, the price is to be reduced to $90. The hon. gentleman must know that that provision is practically of no effect, because that number of binders are not brought in at any one time. But I claim that in this matter the action of the department is most arbitrary, that it is most unnecessary. There is no reason why the value of binders cannot be determined in the same way as any other article. Now, I would point out further that the value of binders varies very much indeed. For instance, we know that at the present time the manufactures in the United States are depressed, and we know that binders can be bought there considerably cheaper now than they could be bought when the hon. gentleman made that order a year ago. Now, why should the farming classes not be able to take advantage of those low prices? Why should the department make a regulation which practically makes a duty purporting to be 20 per cent, run up to 30 and 35 per cent? The farmers of Manitoba feel that this is an arbitrary regulation, that it is one which practically increases the duty, and I am much mistaken if the American manufacturers, whom it affects indirectly by decreasing importation, are not also much opposed to it. I know as a matter of fact that the agents of those manufactories in Manitoba who sell these goods, find these regulations very hard upon them. I draw attention to this matter because agricultural implements are one of the items for which the Finance Minister, in his speech, claimed a good deal of credit for the Government by reducing the duty from 35 to 20 per cent in the interest of the farmer. If the hon. gentleman had gone further and stated that he would only collect 20 per cent, then the farmer would have received the benefit that the Government profess to give him, the farmer would have known exactly what it was; but under the present conditions he cannot and does not know what he must pay for his agricultural implements.

Mr. WALLACE. The hon. gentleman is unnecessarily concerned about the interests of the American manufacturer. We have looked after the interest of the Canadian people, and we have not done any injustice to the American manufacturers. What are the facts? The McCormicks of Chicago wanted to send some of their implements into Canada, and they wrote to the department, asking on what prices we would impose a duty. I asked them to send along their price list, the prices at which they sold them singly and in large quantities, and they did so. In addition to that, I sent a special agent of the Customs Department, Mr. McMichael, of Toronto, to the States, to inquire into the prices at which they are sold in that country, that being the price according to the law, upon which the customs duties are regulated. He reported that the statement made by McCormick Brothers, as to their price, was correct, that these were the prices at which they were selling them in the United States, and upon those prices the duties were collected. No injustice was done to the McCormick Brothers, because the prices were those that they gave me, and which I ascertained by inquiry to be the prices at which they were rateable for duty. From beginning to end, it was simply carrying out the customs law of Canada.

Mr. FRASER. I would like to ask the Controller if he accepted the prices?

Mr. WALLACE. I have just told the committee that the prices were accepted after our agent went over to the States and made an investigation, both from their books and from other sources, and ascertained that these were the prices at which these implements were sold in the United States.

Mr. FRASER. Therefore when a machine comes in here, it is just entered at their prices?

Mr. WALLACE. Certainly.

Mr. FRASER. There is a question back of all this that shows the character of the tariff. Are there more men employed in making the machine than of those who are purchasers of the machine? That is the great question. If there are more people to buy, surely their interest should be taken into consideration. If we are going to look after the man who makes the article and not look after the man who purchases it, where there are ten men purchasing the article to one making it—

Mr. SPROULE. Your friends have been arguing all the time that an injustice has been done.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. No, they have been arguing that these men should have the raw material, as all others have had, duty free.

Mr. FRASER. So far as this particular duty is concerned, I am not concerned for the interest of the American manufacturer. I do not care whether an American machine comes in here or not, provided the farmer here can get the machine as cheap in Canada as the American farmer gets it over there. Whoever heard of sending an agent into the United States to find out the price at which the machines are sold there? If the Americans send them in here at half price and the farmers get the advantage of it, as they are made here, is that not a good thing? Why send a man into the States to find out about the price for fear they may send them in here too cheap? The tariff appears to be framed on the principle that certain manufacturers must be consulted, and that no inquiry need be made as regards the views held by purchasers. I am not going to mention in how many cases the Finance Minister stated that the manufacturers were suited. It would be the same in one case as in five thousand, because the principle would be involved. Are we going to make this country rich by satisfying the men who produce articles and not those who purchase them? It is a curious way of enhancing the value of the land, and of increasing the wealth of the people, in view of the fact that there are 100 purchasers to one manufacturer. If there be any force in that argument it must be only when it has been shown that the manufacturers add more to the wealth of the Dominion than do the purchasers. If that proof is furnished, there may be some foundation for the present tariff, but surely the purchasers, who constitute the large majority of the people, must be consulted in regard to agricultural implements or any other articles. The principle is universal. It is not a question of adopting one principle for one industry and another for another, and if the Americans choose to produce cheap articles of equally good quality to those produced in this country, is not that to the interests of our people? The Americans must take something in return. They must purchase from us some article which they need and which is made to advantage by us in Canada, and, of course, that adds to the wealth of the country.

Mr. MARTIN. I object to the Controller putting into my mouth a complaint I never made. I did not complain about any manufacturing company. What I did was to complain of that a year ago the Customs Department fixed the price on binders at $100, in the face of the fact that there was a falling market in the United States, and the price has fallen very considerably, and it was not fair at that time to decide that all binders should be charged at the rate of $100 in the United States. That regulation has been in force more than one year, since which time every binder entering Winnipeg has been assessed at the rate of $100. There has never been a time at which many binders have been bought at much less, generally about $80, than at the value put on them by the Customs Department. What I desire the Controller of Customs to explain is why binders were selected for that very exceptional treatment. Does the Customs Department, on every article of commerce, fix an absolute price, utterly irrespective of the state of the market? It does not. Is there any special likelihood of importers committing irregularities upon the Customs Department in connection with binders? In my opinion, that is a matter very easily kept in hand, and there is no article on which the Customs could detect fraud so easily as in connection with the importation of binders. A binder is a large article, is a well-known machine, and an article, the price of which can be very easily ascertained from time to time, and the Controller has made no explanation as to why the Government found it necessary to oppress the farmers of the North-west and Manitoba by assessing every binder at a fixed price of $100, utterly irrespective of the price of binders from time to time. As a representative of a city where the people gain their living entirely from farmers, I quite agree with what has been said with regard to the unfair policy pursued by the Government in connection with the iron duties. So far as regards agricultural implements, the manufacturers and the farmers are precisely in the same boat. The agricultural implement maker should be placed in the position to supply implements at a cheap rate to the farmers, and if the high duties on iron, in the case of bar iron of 50 per cent, and in the case of iron of 40 per cent, were removed or very largely reduced, the farmer would get that advantage; but there are many other articles besides agricultural implements, manufactures of iron, which the farmers are obliged to buy, and on all those lines a reduction in iron duties would be a very great advantage to the farmer. So the efforts of hon. gentlemen opposite to make it appear that hon. members on this side of the House are one day opposing the manufacturer and the other day supporting him are wrong, for this action can be taken, to a certain extent, without any inconsistency. We on this side of the House oppose high duties on all articles. We are opposed to high duties on agricultural implements; we concur in the reduction from 35 per cent to 20 per cent. So far as that is concerned, we have no sympathy with the agricultural implement maker, and in the interest of the farmers we consider that the protection afforded them should be reduced. But when the duty on agricultural implements has been reduced to 20 per cent, and a duty of 40 or 50 per cent is allowed to remain on the raw material which enters into the manufacture of implements, then, without any inconsistency, without any abandonment of the principles of a revenue tariff, we can join with the implement makers and ask the Government to reduce the duties on iron, and in that respect the farmer will receive advantage as well as the manufacturer.

Mr. HASLAM. I desire to call the attention of the committee to the thorough inconsistency of the argument made by hon. gentlemen opposite. As a matter of fact, the amount of $20 on a machine is a specific duty; it is $20 protection on a $100 machine. To-day, $100 invested in butter at 20 cents per pound, represents 500 pounds, and there is exactly $20 protection on that, or exactly the same rate as on agricultural implements, so the protection is similar in both cases. Let me pursue the argument further. When butter is low, at 16 cents per pound, and 500 pounds is purchased, there is still $20 protection. So the farmer and the machine maker, so far as these classes of goods are concerned, stand exactly in the same position, and the policy which should be good for one should be good for the other. But it appears that this will not suit hon. gentlemen opposite; there must be a different policy adopted for each, whereas, as matters stand, the rate of protection is exactly the same on butter and agricultural implements, and it is a specific duty in both cases. I think that taking the agriculturist and the machine manufacturer, you will find if you take the trouble to go into it, that the protection is just about equal through. I do not think that the farmer has very much to complain of in that respect.

Mr. McMULLEN. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Haslam) has advanced a theory of protection which is something new to this House; and I shall not take time to say anything in reply. The Controller says that the prices of binders for importation has been fixed at $100. That is $25 beyond the value of these binders when bought for export. The hon. gentleman says he sent a man to the United States to ascertain the price at which they were sold there, but he knows very well that binders are sold in the United States under a combine, and the result is that the price for export is fixed 25 per cent below the price for home consumption. He did not fix his duty upon the export price of a binder, but upon the price at which it is sold for home consumption in the United States.

Mr. WALLACE. The law says that the price for duty is the price that it is sold for in the open market of the country from which it is imported. Therefore the price for duty is not the price for which the American binder is sold in Canada. That is the Act of Parliament; we have to be guided by that law, and it is a very proper and just law too. Suppose it were otherwise, how would the price be fixed for any article? It might be sent in here, and defraud the revenue and defraud the honest trader as well.

Mr. McMULLEN. If goods are imported from England is the duty fixed upon the price they were sold for, or on the price they sell for in the open market in England for home consumption?

Mr. WALLACE. Certainly.

Mr. McMULLEN. I think the Controller of Customs is mistaken in that.

Mr. WALLACE. Not at all.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Mr. Chairman, permit me to suggest that we are off the item altogether.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Oh, we have been away from it for two hours.

Mr. McMULLEN. The Finance Minister has been trying to persuade the farmers that the duty upon agricultural implements has been reduced from 35 to 20 per cent, but in order to please the manufacturers of binders he has placed the value at $100, whilst the intrinsic value is $75. In that way he is giving the manufacturer of binders more than they are entitled to.

Newspapers, and quarterly and monthly and semi-monthly magazines, and weekly literary paper unbound.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Is there not a tax levied upon such articles as Harper's, and all the rest of these?

Mr. FOSTER. No.

Mr. FRASER. Does that free list include such publications as the Law Magazines, and Law Reports of England and the United States?

Mr. FOSTER. They come in free unbound.

Mr. FRASER. I have always had to pay duty.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I get mine free, but I know they are charged duty in some places and not in others.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It is intended that they should be free.

Mr. FRASER. I will show that to the collector the next time he tries to charge me duty.

Seeds of flax. Free.

Mr. SPROULE. I think this article should have a duty on it. Large quantities of it are now produced, not only in Ontario, but in Manitoba and the North-west Territories; and at the same time there is quite a large importation from the United States. By keeping the market for our own people, we would enable them to get a little better price at present, and develop the production further. I think it is not fair that it should be left on the free list.

Mr. FOSTER. It is the raw material for linseed oil, on which we have reduced the duty.

Mr. SPROULE. But we have quite enough in the country for the manufacture of linseed oil. The flaxseed is not imported for that purpose, but for sowing in Manitoba and the North-west Territories.

Mr. MARTIN. You do not want to put the duty on seed, do you?

Mr. SPROULE. I believe they are to-day raising it in large quantities.

Mr. FRASER. Then why do they import it, if they are raising enough?

Mr. SPROULE. I understand they have enough to supply themselves now.

Shoe buttons, papier maché; metal glove fasteners, eyelet hooks and eyelets for boots and shoes and lacing hooks. Free.

Mr. FOSTER. I want to make an amendment; strike out the words: "and lacing hooks."

Mr. LANGELIER. Does this include eyelets for corsets?

Mr. FOSTER. No; this is a boot and shoe business.

Mr. LANGELIER. Eyelets for corsets are not manufactured in this country. I have a telegram from a large corset manufacturing concern in St. Hyacinthe, the E. T. Corset Company. The telegram reads:

Corset eyelets not manufactured in this country to our knowledge. If the contrary is stated please ask where they are made. At Gananogue they only make corset clasps.

This is the raw material of a very important industry.

Mr. FOSTER. They have 35 per cent protection.

Mr. LANGELIER. But why do you charge a duty on raw material of one manufacture and not on that of another? This is as much a raw material for the manufacture of corsets as for the manufacture of boots and shoes. As a matter of fact, in St. Hyacinthe, there are large manufactories of boots and shoes which import these eyelets without paying duty, while the corset manufactory near at hand has to pay duty.

Mr. FOSTER. There is a great difference between corsets and boots and shoes.

Mr. LANGELIER. The other day I called attention to the article of clasps, when it was stated that there was a manufactory of clasps at Gananogue. But there is no manufactory of eyelets. If this duty is not intended to protect anybody, these goods being a raw material of manufacture, surely they should be on the free list, just as for boots and shoes.

Mr. FOSTER. Where does the eyelet go?

Mr. LANGELIER. I am not in the business; I speak only by the book.

Mr. SPROULE.

Soda, sulphate of crude, known as salt cake, barilla or soda ash, caustic soda; silicate of soda in crystals or in solution, bichromate of soda, nitrate of soda, cubic nitre, sal soda, sulphide of sodium, nitrite of soda, arseniate, binarseniate, chloride and stannate of soda. Free.

Mr. FOSTER. In the last line, after the word "chloride" add "chlorate."

Trees, forest, when imported into the province of Manitoba, or the North-west Territories for planting. Free.

Mr. FOSTER. Make that read: Trees, n.e.s., dropping out the rest of the item.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the effect of that?

Mr. FOSTER. To let forest trees in free anywhere, and all trees except fruit trees or ornamental trees mentioned in the dutiable schedule.

Committee rose and reported progress.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Bill (No. 53) respecting the Calgary Irrigation Company.—(Mr. Davis.)

Bill (No. 63) respecting the Guelph Junction Railway Company.—(Mr. Henderson.)

WELLAND POWER AND SUPPLY COMPANY.

House resolved itself into Committee on Bill (No. 49) to incorporate the Welland Power and Supply Company (Limited).—Mr. McKay.)

(In the Committee.)

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I call the attention of the Minister of Justice to this Bill. I was on the Private Bills Committee, and this Bill was referred to a sub-committee of which I was a member. I would call the hon. gentleman's attention to the question whether we have any jurisdiction in the matter at all. Jurisdiction is attempted to be given us by suggesting that they are going to take from the waters of a navigable river certain waters for the purpose of filling their artificial ditch and providing electric power. Apart from that one fact, all the other powers sought are those which ought to be given by the Ontario Legislature. The Bill is purely provincial in every other respect, and my own judgment was strongly that it is not one this Parliament ought to pass at all. Having expressed myself pretty strongly in the committee on this point, I now call the attention of the Minister of Justice to it. If he chooses to advise that the Bill should pass, I shall say no more about it. It is not a railway Bill in any sense, although the Railway Act applies to it. It is Bill 'sui generis'; I do not know of any like it having been passed. It is not like the Bill of the hon. member for South Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale), which provided for the construction of a canal which shipping would use. It is to provide for certain water powers to be used for electric purposes, and the company proposes to tap the waters of what they call a navigable stream to obtain these water powers. That is the only possibility by which this Parliament could seize jurisdiction at all, and in my opinion it is not sufficient to give it jurisdiction.

Mr. McKAY. After the objections raised by the hon. member for Queen's, it might be as well to defer the Bill until Monday next to enable the hon. Minister of Justice to look into the matter.

Committee rose and reported progress.

ATLANTIC AND NORTH-WEST RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. BAKER moved concurrence in amendment made by the Senate to Bill (No. 30) respecting the Atlantic and North-west Railway Company.

Mr. EDGAR. I would like the hon. member to explain what the nature of the amendment is.

Mr. BAKER. The amendment is made to the second subsection of the second section, and relates merely to the public notices of the meeting of shareholders to approve of the agreement authorized by provisions of the Bill. The Bill is drafted upon the lines of the model Bill in the Railway Act, which provides that such notices shall be published in one newspaper in each of the counties through which the railway runs. This railway as incorporated runs from the boundary line of New Brunswick to Montreal, and thence to Lake Superior; but the agreement contemplated by this Bill refers to the portion of road between Renfrew and Eganville, a distance of about twenty miles; and the amendment provides that the notice shall be published in each of the counties through which the portion of railway covered by the agreement runs. It would manifestly be useless to publish notices relating to this agreement in New Brunswick.

Motion agreed to, and amendment concurred in.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 110) to amend and consolidate the Acts relating to the Harbour Commissioners of Montreal—(from the Senate).—Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper.)

SEAMEN'S ACT AMENDMENT.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER moved second reading of Bill (No. 13) to amend the Seamen's Act.

Mr. FLINT. Will the hon. Minister explain the Bill?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The first section repeals a clause in the Seamen's Act, which gives the master of a vessel a lien on the ship for his wages. It is proposed to give him a lien also for liabilities properly incurred by him on account of the ship, and to assimilate that section in our Act to the provision that obtains in the Imperial Act. The other clause in the Bill is practically to sanction the practice that has obtained in Canada ever since 1869 in regard to claims for the relief of seamen found abroad in distress. We have been paying these claims on vouchers from the consuls abroad in all the cases of seamen who had been domiciled in Canada for twelve months; but the Act did not seem to go so far as that, though the Order in Council adopted in 1869, upon which the British Board of Trade has been acting, was on that line; and the object of the Bill is now to put that practice in the form of an Act and sanction what has been done.

Motion agreed to; Bill read the second time, and House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

On section 1,

Mr. FLINT. Was this provision in the Bill of last year?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Yes, but the Bill was not proceeded with.

Mr. FLINT. And the same provision exists in the British Merchants' Shipping Act?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Precisely the same.

On section 2,

Mr. FLINT. In what respect does this differ from the old section?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. These words have been introduced: "who have been domiciled in Canada for twelve months." That is the language of the Order in Council of the 19th of November, 1869. Any Canadian seaman who is relieved from distress in a foreign country is relieved by a British consul. The Board of Trade pays the expenses and charges them to us, and we pay the Board of Trade.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Should not that same provision be extended to our seamen in inland waters: for instance, in the case of a man in Chicago?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. We deal with claims of that kind as special cases. They do not come under this provision.

Mr. FLINT. I congratulate the Government on this measure, and it will no doubt supply a want which has been felt for some time. I remember years ago, to speak more distinctly within the recollection of the Minister, there was application made for assistance for seamen who were in destitute circumstances abroad, and the Government were enabled to meet their needs. If this Bill fully meets a case as that which occurred then, no doubt it will be a good law and will be approved by merchant seamen.

Bill reported, and read the third time and passed.

HARBOUR MASTERS' ACT.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER moved second reading of Bill (No. 45) to amend the Harbour Masters' Act.

Motion agreed to; Bill read the second time and House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the object of the Bill?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. At present the Governor in Council can only appoint a harbour master, and that has given rise to some inconvenience in case a harbour master has to absent himself for any time; and it is to enable the appointment of a legal representative or deputy to be made that the Bill is proposed.

Mr. McMULLEN. Then it is not intended to increase the expenditure?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Not at all.

Bill reported.

LIGHTHOUSES AT SABLE ISLAND.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER moved second reading of Bill (No. 46) to amend the Act respecting lighthouses, buoys and beacons at Sable Island.

Motion agreed to; Bill read the second time, and House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). What change is proposed by the present Bill?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. At present it is necessary for the Minister of Marine to obtain the approval of the Governor in Council to the appointment of every light-keeper, and in cases where the salaries range, as a great many of them do, from $50 to $200, there is a loss really to the exchequer through this practice, which is now obligatory, because it is absolutely necessary to put the light in operation, and some one has to be appointed temporarily. That sometimes involves a greater cost than the proportion of the salary, and it is considered in the public interest that as regards the smaller appointments the Minister should have power to make them.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). What I desire to know is, whether the Minister has considered if this will affect the independence of Parliament?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Both the Canals and Railways are now administered in the same way, and the Minister of Railways makes appointments of a much more important character. I have not considered the matter to which the hon. gentleman refers.

Bill reported.

PICTOU HARBOUR.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved second reading of Bill (No. 88) further to amend the Act respecting the harbour at Pictou.

Motion agreed to; Bill read the second time, and House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). What is the object of this Bill?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The object of the Bill is simply to remove doubts. The wharf referred to is within the limits of the harbour, and was built by the Harbour Commission out of the public funds. But in the Act respecting the harbour at Pictou, N.S., certain wharfs are mentioned. The Act was passed prior to the building of this wharf, and the commission desire the passage of this Bill to remove any doubt that might arise as to their jurisdiction.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Does it involve any expenditure?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The wharf has been built, and the commission are in charge of it.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). There is no private property involved?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. No question whatever has been raised in regard to the wharf.

Bill reported.

PUBLIC HARBOURS.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER moved second reading of Bill (No. 95) respecting public harbours. He said: This Bill is rendered necessary in connection with questions that have arisen concerning the harbour of St. John, notably. There are certain ports excepted from the general provisions of the Harbour Masters' Act, and the harbour of St. John is one of them, it having a special charter. Vessels had been depositing ballast outside of the limits described in that charter, and endangering the navigation of the roadstead, but the harbour authorities were powerless, and, as the harbour and port were excepted from the provisions of the Harbour Masters' Act, there seemed no way in which the nuisance could be prevented. This Bill has been drafted to give the Governor in Council power generally to proclaim a certain area of water to be a harbour under the jurisdiction of Parliament, and to apply the provisions of the Harbour Masters' Act to that. For instance, at St. John, the waters not extending out sufficiently to cover this roadstead approaching the harbour, would be declared to be a public harbour, and the provisions of the Harbour Masters' Act would be brought into play, and authority would be obtained to prevent any nuisance of that kind, and to regulate the depositing of ballast.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Are you claiming as harbours, natural bays and inlets where no public money has been expended?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. No, that is already covered in general by the Harbour Masters' Act, and these provisions were ample, except in the case where we came to a port having special privileges by Royal Charter.

Motion agreed to; Bill read the second time, and House resolved into committee.

(In the Committee.)

On section 3,

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I move to strike out section 3, as printed in the Bill, and substitute the following:—

"The Governor in Council may make rules and regulations for the Government of any public harbour or port in Canada, but in the case of the ports of Quebec, Montreal, Three Rivers, Toronto, Halifax, Pictou, and the port of St. John, in the province of New Brunswick, such rules and regulations as are inconsistent with any rule or regulation of any of these ports shall not be made until after application therefor from the local authority in charge of the port has been received by the Governor in Council.

These ports that are exempted from the operation of the general provision of the Harbour Masters' Act, of course, are naturally sensitive that anything should be done to impair their privileges, and the clause, as printed, I find does that, to some extent. For instance, it gives power to the Governor in Council, in making the rules which would be necessary, power to make regulations which would affect the harbour having these special privileges. Therefore, I beg to substitute the clause, above, in place of section 3 of this Bill.

Mr. HAZEN. I would like to ask the hon. Minister of Justice if he thinks that this clause as amended covers the case of the harbour of St. John. That harbour is not what is generally known as a public harbour, that is, one under the control of this Parliament. The charter of the city of St. John, a royal charter, granted in 1874, conveyed to the mayor, aldermen and commonalty of the city of St. John all the land of the city and all the land covered by water, the harbour and the rights of navigation and fishing in the harbour. That royal charter was confirmed by an Act of the first legislature of the province of New Brunswick passed in 1785. Under the terms of the British North America Act the control of all harbours which belonged to the provinces at the time of Confederation was passed to the Federal powers. But so far as I know, the Federal Parliament has never exercised any jurisdiction over the harbour of St. John at all, that harbour being controlled by the Common Council of the city of St. John; and for that reason the harbour of St. John is expressly exempted from the provisions of the Harbour Masters' Act. This Parliament should, therefore, pass no legislation that would in any way affect any of the rights that the Common Council of St. John has in the harbour. I would ask the hon. Minister of Justice what he thinks of this section.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The royal charter only takes the harbour of St. John out of the category of harbours that belonged to the provinces before Confederation. It is the property of the corporation of St. John, who hold it as trustees for the public; but my impression is that the rights of legislation with reference to it exist only in this Parliament.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I do not question the statement of the hon. member for St. John, but the question is what inference may be drawn from his statement. I think there are many English cases in which the rule laid down that property which is vested in the king personally may be granted by him, but property which he holds in trust for the nation he cannot make a grant of.

Mr. HAZEN. That would be true with regard to a part of it. He could not grant, for instance, the public fisheries; but in this case the rights of this Parliament over the harbour is limited by the fact that the legislature of New Brunswick, in 1785, ratified the royal charter.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I do not think that would make any difference, because I apprehend that the charter was a charter granted by the Crown and not by the Parliament; and the legislature by legislating could not make its functions broader than the Crown had power to grant. All the property in the harbour, so far as it was not navigable, would be in the power of the Crown to grant to commissioners; but I do not see that the Crown could grant away the property in the harbour itself.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It could not grant any more than the Crown held.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). And it seems to me that the British North America Act gives this Parliament power to legislate in this case.

Mr. HAZEN. Of course the British North America Act gives this Parliament power to deal with navigation and shipping. I may say that this whole question is before the Exchequer Court, in a case brought by the Queen against the St. John Gas Company, to restrain them from allowing refuse water to run into the harbour, which, it is claimed, interferes with fishing and navigation—a case which was argued there the other day, and in which I was counsel; and judgment will probably be given in a short time.

Mr. FLINT. Have the authorities controlling the harbour asked for this legislation?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. It is in their interest and at their instance that the Bill is proposed; but it is made general, to suit any case that may arise.

Mr. HAZEN. That is true, but I do not think the Act, as amended, has ever been submitted to the corporation of St. John. If there is no great hurry, I would suggest to my hon. friend that he should allow it to stand until their advice can be obtained in regard to it.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The amendment before the committee meets any possible objection that the corporation of St. John or any other might have. The harbour of St. John, while it is interested, is not the only harbour interested; and in no case can any action be taken to put in force any of these rules and regulations until their adoption is requested by the harbour authorities. We might take the committee stage, and let the third reading stand, and in the meantime the hon. gentleman will have every opportunity to communicate with the city.

Mr. HAZEN. Under the amendment perhaps no harm could result, as any action taken would have to be taken at the instance of the city. At the same time, I would like to have the views of the corporation before the Bill becomes law. If the hon. Minister prefers to have it pass the committee now and let it stand to the third reading, that will be perfectly acceptable.

Bill reported.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and the House adjourned at 9.10 p.m.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, 14th May, 1894.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

VINTON POSTMASTER.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (for Mr. Fraser) asked, Who is the present postmaster of Vinton, county of Pontiac? When was he appointed? When was his predecessor dismissed? Were any charges made against the late incumbent? If so, what was the nature of such charges and by whom were they made? Did any person or persons ask for the change? If so, the name or names of such party or parties? If charges were made against the late postmaster, by whom were they laid? Was an investigation held? If so, at whose instance and with what result?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Mr. Grace is the present postmaster of Vinton, in the county of Pontiac. He was appointed on the 15th of February, 1894. His predecessor was not dismissed. It was ascertained that the post office was not in a convenient position. The inspector inquired into the matter and reported that the site was not a convenient one. The old post office was, therefore, closed and a new office was opened at the residence of Martin Grace, which was stated would be more convenient to the persons using the office.

WEST SHEFFORD POST OFFICE.

Mr. SANBORN asked, Has the post office at the Canadian Pacific Railway station, West Shefford, in the county of Shefford, been closed? If so, when, and for what reason?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. This post office was closed on the 1st of May, the postmaster having resigned, the office appearing to be of little utility. The department has now under consideration an application made for the reopening of the office in question.

VOTERS' LISTS FOR 1894.

Mr. GUAY asked, Have instructions been issued to the revising officers under the "Dominion Franchise Act" to prepare for the revision of the voters' lists this year? If not, why not?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. No instructions have been issued to revising officers this year, except to the revising officers who have been newly appointed. The statute requires them to begin their duties of revision on the 1st of June. No instructions to that effect are necessary from the department.

PIER AT WEST POINT.

Mr. PERRY asked, Is it the intention of the Government, during the present session, to place a sum in the Supplementary Estimates to rebuild the Dominion Government pier at West Point, Prince Edward Island ?

Mr. OUMET. I cannot give an answer to that question until the Supplementary Estimates are before the House.

CASCUMPEQUE HARBOUR.

Mr. PERRY asked, Is it the intention of the Government to continue, during the present year, blasting rock and dredging Cascumpeque Harbour, Prince Edward Island ?

Mr. OUMET. The hon. gentleman will know exactly what is the intention of the Government when the Supplementary Estimates are brought down.

REVISING OFFICER FOR RICHMOND.

Mr. RINFRET asked, When was George H. Aylmer Brooke, Esq., advocate, appointed revising officer for the county of Richmond, P.Q. ? Has the said G. H. Brooke been paid any moneys whatsoever for services as reviser, for printing, expenditure, &c. ? Are the Government aware whether there was a revision of the electoral lists of the county of Richmond in 1891, when the revision of the electoral lists was made in all the other counties of the Dominion of Canada ? Do the Government intend to retain Mr. Brooke in his position as revising officer for the county of Richmond ?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The Secretary of State is not here, but I will answer for him. Mr. Brooke was appointed revising officer for the county of Richmond, in the province of Quebec, prior to the commencement of the last revision. He has been paid moneys for his services as revising officer, for printing, expenditure, &c., payments on account. There was no revision of the lists for the county of Richmond in 1891. The Government do not intend to retain Mr. Brooke in his position ; they intend to appoint another revising officer.

MAJOR GENERAL HERBERT.

Mr. HUGHES asked, What words were used by Major General Herbert on the occasion of his recent visit to Montreal, in reference to the Pontifical Zouaves ? Had Major General Herbert permission from, or the authority of, the Honourable the Minister of Militia, to use the words he did on that occasion ?

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). I disclaim all responsibility for any utterances of any officials in connection with the department over which I have the honour to preside. There is no necessity for my authority being given for any of their utterances. At the same time, out of courtesy to my hon. friend (Mr. Hughes), and with a desire to gratify his laudable thirst for knowledge, I will give him the exact words used by Major General Herbert on the occasion to which he refers, when the Major General was addressing a French-Canadian battalion in Montreal. I apologize in advance to the House for any defects of accent :

Vous avez parmi vous, de ceux qui, se joignant à cette bande, justement nommée : " les croisés du dix-neuvième siècle," ont rempli un devoir à la fois militaire et religieux sur les champs de bataille de Mentana et de Monte Rotundo, et aux portes mêmes de la ville éternelle. C'est à vous donc de vous jeter en avant, et de montrer les qualités militaires de votre race et son dévouement héréditaire à la patrie.

PIER AT HIGGINS' SHORE.

Mr. YEO asked, Is the Department of Public Works aware that by reason of a sand bank which has formed close to the pier at Higgins' shore, Prince County, P.E.I., the said pier is almost useless for shipping purposes ? Have any petitions been received asking that a dredge may be sent to remove this obstruction ? If so, is it the intention to send a dredge there during the present season ?

Mr. OUMET. A petition was received in February last stating that dredging was required at Higgins' shore, Prince County, P.E.I. This petition has been sent to the resident engineer with instructions to examine into and report on the matter complained of, but his report has not yet been received. There will not be any dredge available for work at this place during the present season.

DISMISSAL OF MR. B. LOISELLE.

Mr. BRODEUR moved for :

Copies of all correspondence, reports or judgments, in relation to the dismissal of Mr. B. Loisel, postmaster of Ste. Angèle de Monnoir.

He said : Mr. Speaker, in making this motion, I desire to say a few words in regard to the dismissal of the postmaster to whom it refers. In previous years I have brought up in this House the question of the dismissal of this postmaster, and I regret to say that the Government have refused to produce the papers in regard to it, which were ordered by the House in 1892. In the first place, in 1891 I put the following question to the Government :

Whether the Government have dismissed Mr. B. Loisel, postmaster of Ste. Angèle, in the county of Rouville ? Were complaints made against him ? Who is the person who made such complaints ? Why was he dismissed as postmaster ?

The answer given to that question was as follows :—

Mr. HAGGART. The dismissal of Mr. B. Loisselle from the postmastership of Ste. Angèle de Monnoir has been decided upon by the Government. Complaints were made that a registered letter addressed to Mr. A. Guillet, and repeatedly applied for by the addressee, was improperly detained in the Ste. Angèle de Monnoir post office for three days, and the post-mark altered to conceal the time date of receipt. The principal complainant was Mr. A. Guillet. These complaints were found on inquiry to be well founded, and the facts have been considered sufficient to justify the postmaster's removal from office.

The charges made by the Government against that postmaster were very serious. He was charged, first, with having committed a forgery, and, secondly, with having kept a letter in his post office for several days, during which the said letter had been repeatedly applied for. Well, I may say at once that since that time those charges have been proven to be entirely untrue from beginning to end. The postmaster has never been guilty of any forgery or of having detained the letter in question in his post office. But more than that. In 1892 I moved for the correspondence and all the other papers concerning the dismissal of this postmaster; and, although two years have elapsed since the order of the House was given for them, no papers have been brought down; the Government have not seen fit to give us the documents on which they relied to justify the dismissal of the postmaster. But I am not surprised at all that the Government has done such a great injustice to a man who was not guilty at all of the charges which were made against him; I think there was good reason for it. I afterwards wrote to the Government placing in their hands affidavits which proved conclusively that the charges made were untrue; but the then Postmaster General, now the Minister of Railways and Canals, did not even answer my letter. An action for damages was then taken by Mr. Loisselle against Mr. Guillet, who was mentioned by the Government as the author of the charges; and judgment was rendered some time ago. At the trial it was admitted by the sub-inspector who made the inquiry, and by the Deputy Postmaster General, that the charges were entirely untrue, that no forgery had been committed by Mr. Loisselle, that there had been no delay in the delivery of the letter, and that consequently Mr. Loisselle was not at all guilty. Judgment was rendered to that effect by Hon. Justice Lynch, and the Government will no doubt accept the word of such an eminent judge. In the judgment it is said :

That the said charges have been made by Guillet without cause and with malice, and that it has been proved that no alteration has been made, and that the said letter has not been detained in the post office by Mr. Loisselle's fault.

Mr. BRODEUR.

But now let us come to another fact. When the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals stated in 1891 that the postmaster had been dismissed because he was guilty of forgery, he declared that Mr. Guillet had made the complaint. Well, we examined Mr. Guillet under oath, and these are the answers he gave in the witness box :

Question. Have you made any complaint in 1891 against Loisselle, concerning some irregularities which you pretended having been made by him in the administration of the post office of Ste. Angèle?

Answer. I have not made any complaint.

At page 6 of his evidence we asked him this question :

Question. On the oath you have taken, Mr. Guillet, you undertake to swear positively that you have not mentioned to anybody, or you have not put anybody else under the impression, that Mr. Loisselle had detained improperly that letter in question in the post office, and besides that, you swear positively that you have never mentioned, and you have never put anybody else under the impression, that Mr. Loisselle had changed the postmark of the said letter?

Answer. No.

Question. Did you not declare to the deputy inspector, Mr. Gervais, that Mr. Loisselle had altered the date of the receipt of the letter, and had altered the post-mark?

Answer. I have never said that to Mr. Gervais.

Well, Mr. Speaker, I do not know who is telling the truth; but I suppose it was the then Postmaster General, when he said that Mr. Guillet had made such a complaint. At all events, here is one of the friends of the Government, whose rascality is now defended by the Government, who declares under oath that the Government did not tell the truth when they stated that he had made some charges against Mr. Loisselle. But the judgment rendered declared that the charges had been made by Mr. Guillet. In fact, according to that judgment, Mr. Guillet perjured himself. At all events, we sent a petition to the Government asking them to reinstate Mr. Loisselle in his position. Here is a man who had been charged by Mr. Guillet and the Government of having detained a letter in his post office. This was a very serious charge, and I do not blame the Government for his dismissal at the time. But when the person on whose word the Government relied came on the stand and swore that he had never made any charge and that everything which had been said by the Minister in the House was untrue, and when a judgment of the court was afterwards given, declaring the charge to have been entirely untrue and erroneous, what was the duty of the Government? I sent in a petition asking for this man's reinstatement. I urged that, as he had been dismissed on a charge which the court had declared to be untrue, it was the duty of the Government to reinstate him or to order an inquiry. But the Government refused to do either, and are now upholding the man who declared under oath that the utterances of the Minister of Railways and Canals in this House were utterly unfounded. I think that now, since it has been undoubtedly proven that this man was not guilty of the crime with which he was charged, and that he had administered his office perfectly well, it is the duty of the Government to at once reinstate him.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. This matter has come more than once before the House, and the attention of the Postmaster General has been called to it by the hon. gentleman. The facts of the cause appear to be as follows: Mr. Loisselle was dismissed in July, 1891. He had been charged with wilfully detaining a registered letter addressed to one Guillet. The assistant inspector was sent, as is done in every case where a postmaster is charged with any irregularity, to investigate the matter, and a full report was sent in by the inspector to the department. In that report, the inspector said that the charge was well founded, and the Postmaster General, following the invariable rule, dismissed this postmaster. It would appear, however, that Mr. Loisselle subsequently took out an action for damages against one Mr. Guillet, who had made the charges, and judgment was given granting damages to Loisselle. Now, the hon. gentleman asks me, under the circumstances, to reinstate Mr. Loisselle. The question would not have been so difficult of solution had not the department, acting upon the report of its inspector, appointed a successor. A new postmaster was appointed, who has always given satisfaction, against whom no possible charge has been brought, and to reappoint Mr. Loisselle would have necessitated the dismissal of the postmaster named in his place. However, according to the report, although I am prepared to admit that the judgment rendered by the court disproves the charge brought against Mr. Loisselle, there were irregularities, which certainly did not amount to any criminal act, and which would have been overlooked, had not a new postmaster been appointed.

Mr. BRODEUR. Will the hon. gentleman tell us the irregularities complained of?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I cannot tell the hon. gentleman. They form part of the inspector's report. I am perfectly free to admit that the irregularities were not such as would have led to the dismissal of the postmaster, but taking the full report of the inspector, besides that report being positive as to the postmaster having detained the registered letter, it mentioned other irregularities, which, as I have said, would under other circumstances, have been overlooked. I merely mention this for the purpose of showing that the course of the then Postmaster General (Mr. Haggart) was perfectly clear, and that he could not act otherwise than as he did, that is, dismiss the postmaster on the report of the officer entrusted with the investigation. As to producing the papers, the hon. gentleman knows that every report of an inspector to the Postmaster General is strictly of a confidential nature. The hon. gentleman may consider that very funny, but in the very nature of the duties which inspectors are called on to perform, it is necessary that their reports should be considered confidential. Otherwise it would be impossible to expect these men to investigate with perfect freedom charges such as are brought from time to time to the notice of the department, knowing that they would incur the animosity and the ill-will of those whose conduct they had been investigating, if their reports were given to the public and discussed freely. These reports are required for the purpose of maintaining the strictest possible efficiency in the service, which is of such enormous importance to the public at large. The privacy of letters, the importance of communications of a commercial nature sent from one person to another, require the exercise of the strictest possible discipline, and this discipline can only be ensured by means of such officers as the inspectors, who are instructed to investigate charges and report to the Postmaster General.

Mr. BRODEUR. Will the hon. gentleman permit me. I think there is more than that in the record. There is an envelope which, if produced, would, of itself, be sufficient to prove that the man was not guilty of the charge made against him. If the hon. gentleman will not produce this report, at least he should produce the vouchers.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I am giving the report placed in my hand by the officers of my department. I assume that that report is correct. If there is an envelope the hon. gentleman would like to see, there can be no objection to producing that. When the hon. gentleman gave his notice of motion, as I was anxious that every paper and every piece of evidence that could be produced before the House should be laid on the Table promptly, I caused a letter to be written to Mr. Palmer in Montreal to ascertain if he had any of these documents. Here is his answer:

I am inclosing a copy of the judgment in the case of Benoni Loisselle vs. Amédée Guillet. The late postmaster of Ste. Angèle has been awarded sixty dollars damages, with costs against the defendant. The full report of the trial may not be printed for some weeks yet. I shall certainly send you a copy at the earliest possible moment as requested in your communication dated the 5th inst.

These are the circumstances in this Loisselle case. It was upon the report of the inspector that he was dismissed. I do not see how it was possible, under the circumstances of the case, to dismiss the man who had been appointed to replace Mr. Loisel, and to reinstate Mr. Loisel in office. If there are papers that can be laid before the House, they will be brought down.

Mr. BRODEUR. Will the envelope be produced ?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Yes, if it is here.

Mr. BRODEUR. Why has it not been produced within the past two years ?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I do not know ; but it will be produced now, if it exists.

Mr. BRODEUR. When the matter was up in court in Montreal, I saw the envelope there.

Mr. DEVLIN. I seconded the motion now before the House because I had become acquainted, to some extent, with the facts connected with the case. This is certainly a case of hardship. A charge is deliberately made against a postmaster to the effect that he had retained a registered letter. An officer of the Government, as I understand the case, is at once despatched to the scene. He returns with a report, and the result of this report is the dismissal of the postmaster who has been on trial. The inspector, if I am correctly informed, while engaged on this mission, never saw the postmaster against whom the charge was made, nor did he have him examined. The inspector simply went down and got what information he could pick up, and came back without having thoroughly informed himself of the case. The department, acting, no doubt, upon the inspector's report, dismissed Mr. Loisel. Afterwards, action is taken in civil suit, and the judgment in that suit shows that the postmaster was entirely innocent. The hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Brodeur) by petition addressed to the department, and afterwards by motion in the House, asks that justice be done to this postmaster. The gratifying reply of the Postmaster General is that this is impossible. Of course, says the Postmaster General, the charge made against the postmaster was unfounded ; the postmaster's conduct was perfectly correct ; it is true there were a few little irregularities, but they were not covered by the charges, and they were not even considered by the department. The charge upon which the postmaster was dismissed was that of having detained a registered letter, and afterwards a judgment rendered in the courts proved conclusively that the charge was not well founded. But the reason why this postmaster cannot be reinstated, the reason why his reputation cannot be given back to him as an honourable man, the reason why he is to be denied reinstatement in the position, the duties of which he discharged faithfully and honourably, is that another has been appointed in his place, and it would be too bad to turn him out. Mr. Speaker, there is very little logic in that position. If this gentleman, who has had the office for a very short time, would be injured by being relegated to the position which he occupied before his appointment to this office, does it not seem clear that the gentleman who occupied it so long must suffer much more from being discharged with the cloud over him of a charge specifically made and now proven to be not founded in fact. There is no logic, there is no fairness in such a position. I take this case up because it is one of interest to the members of this House. The hon. member for Rouville has sent petitions to the department, asking that justice be done to this man, asking that he should be treated fairly, asking the Postmaster General simply to discharge his duty with regard to this man, and the Postmaster General replies that he cannot do justice to this man because another has been appointed in his place. This seems to be of a piece with the general policy of the department over which the hon. gentleman presides. Of course, this petition was sent by a member on the Opposition side, and, perhaps, for that reason, the department and the Postmaster General think it should not court. Why, what was the answer given me by the Postmaster General ? When I asked the hon. gentleman certain questions, I was informed by him that every change in the service in the county which I have the honour to represent was made at the demand of a gentleman who is not a member of this House. The Postmaster General no doubt, remembers very well the discussion we had last session with regard to matters of this kind in this House. On that occasion he promised me publicly in this House that he would look into these matters, that he would study them, that he would carefully consider them, and, if possible, remedy the grievances I pointed out. And this year I am informed that I had no need to bring these matters to the attention of the hon. gentleman, that all representations on these subjects came from outside sources. On the Order paper I see a question put by the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Fraser), relating to a case which, I believe, is absolutely similar to the one brought forward by the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Brodeur). A charge was made against the postmaster at Vinton, if I am not mistaken, and upon that charge the postmaster's services were dispensed with. But to-day the answer given by the Postmaster General is that the postmaster was not dismissed, but that the post office was changed for convenience sake. Now, the Postmaster General knows that it was not for convenience sake that the post office was changed. If the hon. gentleman had ever been at Vinton he would know that the change is a very slight one, that the post office has only been removed from one place to another, and that the change in distance cannot add to the convenience of the public. There was something behind this action which was not revealed by the Postmaster General in his reply. I have much pleasure in seconding the motion made by my hon. friend. It is hard for Mr. Loïselle that justice cannot be done him in this matter, but it must be a great satisfaction to him to know that the report made by the officer of the department, although his report may have been satisfactory to the department, has since been shown to have been contrary to the facts. Not only by a judgment of the court rendered in Montreal, but by the declaration of the Postmaster General made on the floor of the House to-day. Mr. Loïselle was declared perfectly innocent of the charges made against him. The Postmaster General admits that he did his duty thoroughly, but simply because another gentleman, whom the Minister favoured, had secured the place, after an ill-founded report had been sent in, Mr. Loïselle must be denied justice and fair-play.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON.

Mr. SCRIVER. I must say I listened with a good deal of surprise to what fell from the hon. the Postmaster General in regard to this case. There is one thing about it that I do not understand. It appears that the officer who was sent to investigate the charges against Mr. Loïselle, reported that they were well founded. that Mr. Loïselle had been guilty of forgery, and had also been guilty of the lesser fault or crime of detaining a registered letter. But if I understand what has fallen from the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Brodeur), that same official, in giving his testimony afterwards before a court, denied that he had made such a statement in regard to this postmaster. If that is the case, I need hardly say to the Postmaster General that his plain duty is to inquire into all the facts, and into the conduct of this particular official. At all events, it appears, and the Postmaster General admits it, that Mr. Loïselle was entirely innocent of these grave charges which had been brought against him, charges which, I admit, had they been true, would have justified his dismissal; but the Minister contends there were some trifling irregularities which, however, would not have been sufficient to warrant his dismissal. In fact the Postmaster General has admitted that but for the false charges brought against Mr. Loïselle, and the false report made by an official of his department, this gentleman would still be in the position of postmaster at that place. I need hardly say that the fact of his dismissal has left upon his character an imputation, and I think it is the plain duty of the Minister, under the circumstances, to remove it. I cannot admit that the mere fact that another man has been appointed to the position from which Mr. Loïselle had been improperly dismissed, would justify the department in keeping that man in office and refusing to reinstate Mr. Loïselle. It seems to me that after I appeal to the sense of justice of the Postmaster General, he cannot do otherwise than consent to the reinstatement of this man because, if he does not do so, a great injury will have been inflicted upon an innocent man.

Mr. HAGGART. A few words in reply to the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Brodeur). It seems that this case occurred when I was Postmaster General, but I forget the circumstances entirely. The hon. gentleman says that I made a statement in the House to the effect that this postmaster had been accused by the inspector of certain charges, and that in subsequent examination before a judge, the inspector stated upon oath that he never made those statements to the Postmaster General.

Mr. BRODEUR. No; the inspector did not say that.

Mr. HAGGART. The hon. member for Huntingdon (Mr. Scriver) so understood him, and has just reiterated that statement.

Mr. BRODEUR. The then Postmaster General declared that a man named Guillet had made charges against the Postmaster of forgery, and of having detained a letter during a certain number of days. Well, that Guillet was examined under oath—I have read a part of his testimony—and he then declared that he had never made any charge against the postmaster to the Government; and now the Government are taking the part of this man Guillet, who admitted that he had not spoken the truth against Mr. Loïselle; consequently Mr. Loïselle must be considered to be entirely innocent of the charges made against him.

Mr. HAGGART. If I understand the hon. gentleman rightly now, he says that a man named Guillet lodged a charge with the department upon which, after investigation, the postmaster was dismissed, and that subsequently Mr. Guillet upon oath retracted his charge. All I can say is that at the time I made this answer, I knew of no such man as Guillet, and could not have known him, and could not have known any of the circumstances of the case. I gave the answer on the authority of the inspector of the department. The hon. gentleman says that although all the circumstances were laid before me, I did not even have the courtesy of returning an answer to the hon. gentleman. I must also deny that statement. It was a departmental affair, and I gave a departmental answer to the hon. gentleman. All I can say is that this postmaster was dismissed on the recommendation of the inspector, and that the answer I gave to the House in 1891, notwithstanding any assertion of any gentleman who made an affidavit or was examined in reference to the case, was prepared for me by my officers as an answer to the hon. gentleman's question.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The statement of the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals

I am sure is made in perfect good faith ; but he will see that the answer he gave at the time leaves scarcely any doubt as to the accuracy of the statement made by my hon. friend.

Mr. HAGGART. I did not hear him read my answer.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman read it, and I fancy there is no mistake with regard to that. Now, the statement made by the then Postmaster General, the present Minister of Railways and Canals, according to what the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Brodeur) has said, was that the date upon which the letter was received at the post office, was altered, and that it was kept back from the party who was rightfully entitled to claim it ; and that was the report made to the hon. gentleman by the inspector of the Post Office Department, and upon that ground the postmaster was dismissed. The statement made by the court was that the party who made the complaint never made any such allegation, and that the letter was not kept back from the party entitled to receive it. So that if the Postmaster General did not fall into a mistake at the time he made the statement to the House, he was evidently misled by the inspector on that occasion, and the statement of the present Postmaster General is not satisfactory because it is of very great consequence that the party who is discharging the duties of inspector of post offices should carefully discharge those duties so as not to cast any reflection on any party not deserving of censure. The testimony which my hon. friend read, taken in court, was that the inspector never called on the party, never made any inquiry with respect to the matter, and the date stamped on the envelope shows that the statement made by the inspector of post offices in his report, was an inaccurate statement. How came he to make that report ? How came he to declare that there was an alteration in the date stamped on the receipt of the letter, if no such alteration was made ? How did he come to make such a declaration without having seen the envelope, as appears to have been the case ? How came he to make the declaration that the letter was detained in the post office for several days after it had been received, when the party entitled to receive it himself declared upon oath that he never made any such statement, either to the Postmaster General or to the inspector ? The information given to the House at this moment shows that the inspector has been guilty of a very great dereliction of duty. He had been guilty of more than that. He has made a false and erroneous statement to the Postmaster General, or to the Post Office Department, which shows that he is entirely unworthy to retain that position, if the facts disclosed by my hon. friend should turn out to be correct. The House will be wanting in its duty, and so, too, will be the Postmaster General, if it permits this party to remain in office without having the matter fully inquired into and the result laid before Parliament, in order that Parliament may see on what grounds this party was accused, and on what grounds he was dismissed, and how the inspector came to make such a statement to the Postmaster General, and by him communicated to the House, in justification of the dismissal of this postmaster. This postmaster is entitled to be reinstated in his office. We have not before us any question of any trifling or subordinate irregularity. They are not matters before the House, and they would form no justification for continuing to exclude this man from office ; and the Postmaster General is called upon to satisfy the House that the charges were of such a character as to show that this man was unfit to retain his position. The hon. gentleman admits they are not such charges. He admits there was no justification for the dismissal of the party from the position of postmaster, and although postmasters in the country hold office during pleasure, we know very well the conventional rule is that the Government permit them to retain office so long as they properly discharge the duties appertaining to it. I think this matter is one that the House cannot pass over with indifference, because it is perfectly clear that an officer, high in the department has made statements to the Postmaster General which were wholly unwarranted, and that he has been guilty, not only of very great dereliction of duty, but also of gross misconduct in office.

Mr. EDGAR. I have here an extract from 'Hansard,' which will no doubt satisfy the Minister of Railways as to what he said in reply to an inquiry made on September 14th, 1891 :

Mr. TROW (for Mr. BRODEUR) asked, Whether the Government have dismissed Mr. B. Loisel, postmaster of Ste. Angèle, in the county of Rouville ? Were complaints made against him, and who is the person who made such complaints ? Why was he dismissed as postmaster ?

Mr. HAGGART. The dismissal of Mr. B. Loisel from the postmastership of Ste. Angèle de Monnoir has been decided upon by the Government. Complaints were made that a registered letter addressed to Mr. A. Guillet, and repeatedly applied for by the addressee, was improperly detained in the Ste. Angèle de Monnoir post office for three days, and the post-mark altered to conceal the time date of receipt. The principal complainant was Mr. A. Guillet. These complaints were found on inquiry to be well founded, and the facts have been considered sufficient to justify the postmaster's removal from office.

It is evident that my hon. friend the Postmaster General was a little mistaken in thinking he had heard nothing of the complaint made.

Mr. HAGGART. I did not say anything of the kind. I said the circumstances had all passed from my mind, and that no doubt the answer would be correct, and whatever the answer was, it was one prepared by the department.

Mr. EDGAR. I wish to point out that there is something material in the reply made. In the first place, the ground of dismissal is stated there positively—that of holding back a registered letter and altering the post-mark. No other ground of complaint for the dismissal was stated at the time, and it is too late now for the Postmaster General to come forward and say there were other charges, he did not remember, and he did not know what they were—he did not justify his action on that ground, but he made it a sort of excuse for keeping the other man in office. I never heard of this case before, and I am only speaking now in regard to what has been admitted on both sides of the House. Here are two innocent men; one innocent man is in office and another innocent man is out of office, and not only is the latter an innocent man, but he is a deeply-injured man; and as between those two innocent men, one of whom has had the advantage of holding the office for some time, and he has had benefits showered on him, while the other has been dismissed, injured, and wrongly injured—which of the two innocent men should suffer? Surely not the one who holds office to-day by reason of the unfortunate error made on an insufficient examination of the inspector, and which is now admitted was wrong. Is the Crown to be the only employer to treat an honest man as a criminal, and to continue to treat him as such, although his innocence has been proved? What a nice lesson this is for civil servants throughout the country! Imagine a man in the Government's employ accused of a crime and dismissed without very much examination, and another officer put in his place! That man is then forced into the courts of law, and when his innocence is established, the Government says: We can do nothing for you, you and your wife and children must starve, because, although you are absolutely innocent, we put another favourite in your place. I do not believe that the people in the country will justify that sort of treatment. This is not a question of departmental administration, but one of principle as regards the Government of the country. This is not a mere trifle. Cannot the Minister of Justice tell his colleagues that if a criminal is found guilty and sentenced to imprisonment, and facts are subsequently established to prove his innocence, immediately messengers of mercy are sent to release the man and place him at liberty, and do all that can be done to restore him to his place and position. Why, we have often heard of cases where men have been let out of prison without having established their innocence on account of the condition of their health. But here is a case where absolute innocence has been established, and it would be a wretched precedent if this House, without severe comment, allows the Government to get up and justify such a course as the present Postmaster General has justified this afternoon.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I hope, for the sake of the Civil Service generally, that the Postmaster General and the members of the Government will reconsider the position which I understand they have arrived at. I am no more disposed than they are to advocate as a general rule the production of confidential reports or correspondence, but where a very grave injustice is admitted by the Postmaster General himself to have been committed on an innocent party, and when it appears clear from his statement that the man who committed that injustice was an officer of the department, the inspector sent down to report upon the case; then I say that that inspector's report, whether confidential or not, ought to be submitted with the rest of the papers and be examined. If the statement of my hon. friend from Rouville (Mr. Brodeur) is correct, apparently this inspector—I do not pass judgment upon him, I am merely repeating the statement of my hon. friend—this inspector, is said by a gentleman in this House to have conducted an examination without taking the trouble to examine the party accused, or of giving him an opportunity to justify himself.

Mr. BRODEUR. And no notice was given.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That, I understand from my hon. friend to be the case. If that be the case, if it can be proved and shown that the officer on whose report the former Postmaster General, and I suppose the present Postmaster General, relied, did so act, and when it is admitted by the Postmaster General that a most grave injustice has been committed on an employee of the Government, then, Sir, I do respectfully submit to the House that the ground of retaining confidential communications ceases, and that in common justice and equity all the papers in such a case, which, as put by my hon. friend from Rouville (Mr. Brodeur), conveys a very grave charge against this officer, should be laid before the House, and thereafter, that my hon. friend ought to be in a position to take, on full examination, such steps as seem to him just to ensure either one of two things: That redress should be given to this man, as I think redress should be given, or that the officer whose misconduct or whose error of judgment, as the case may be, has brought about the present state of things, should receive some adequate censure and some adequate punishment. It is outrageous that any civil officer under Government should be dismissed on a charge of which he proves to have been absolutely innocent, and that nobody should be held guilty of any wrongdoing in the matter. If the Minister in his capacity as head of the department has been misled—as I am quite willing to suppose—by the error of his officer, then it rests with that officer to make such excuse or justification as he can for the grave injustice which has been committed. In order that this matter may be thoroughly searched, I think that my hon. friend (Mr. Brodeur) is right and that, confidential or not confidential, all these reports made by the inspector which have led to such a state of things as we have seen disclosed this afternoon, should be placed before this House, which is the proper tribunal to investigate wrongs of that kind; and that after that is done, my hon. friend, if he deems it necessary, should bring the conduct of this official before the House in case the Government do not themselves, on examining into the matter, see that there is reasonable cause for punishing him. Apparently, so far as I have been able to gather from the facts stated here, the party who is guilty in this matter—I say apparently only because I do not wish to condemn him—is the official who made this report on insufficient evidence, and thereby induced the Government to do this very grievous wrong.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It would seem that two public officers are concerned: One of them has been tried and found not guilty; the other of them has not been tried, but has been found guilty by some hon. gentleman to-day in advance of the trial. He has been denounced for the last twenty minutes at least, and has only had the benefit of the saving clause which the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) has put into his speech, and in which he supposes there may be a possibility of his being innocent. I quite admit that there may be cases in which even confidential reports should be submitted to Parliament, especially if such confidential reports had misled the action of a public department. Let me call the attention of the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Brodeur) to this fact: that in deciding whether these reports should be treated as confidential, or whether they should be laid on the Table of the House, it is important that the head of the department should be informed what the testimony was at the trial which took place in the province of Quebec. It may be that that evidence and that trial fully exonerated the postmaster; it may be that it did not, and in order to enable us to come to a correct conclusion as to how far we should keep the reports as confidential, it would be well that we should see the evidence. If the hon. gentleman has it in his possession, as I understood from him a few moments ago, I would ask him to let the head of the department have it.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

Mr BRODEUR. We might amend the motion then by adding: That all the papers in the suit of Loïselle against Guillet should be brought down.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It is not necessary to do that.

Mr. BRODEUR. I have got only the deposition of Guillet; I have not all the depositions, and I think it would be perhaps better to have all the evidence given at the trial.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I may remind the Minister of Justice that the Postmaster General expressly admitted the innocence of this man, and in admitting his innocence he therefore admitted that at the least a grave error of judgment had been committed.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I beg to make an explanation. I made no admission of any kind. I merely stated that a judgment had been given declaring that this man was innocent; and, moreover, I supplemented what I said by reading an answer to a letter which I had addressed to Mr. Palmer for the purpose of obtaining the papers which would allow me to judge as to how far the judgment had gone. I stated to the House the answer of Mr. Palmer, who said: That the report of the trial has not yet been completed. In the very report from 'Hansard' which the hon. gentleman from West Ontario (Mr. Edgar) has read, it will be seen that my statement agrees absolutely with what the then Postmaster General stated. The Postmaster General stated, according to that report: That there were charges made against Loïselle, and one of these charges was made or laid by Mr. Guillet, and I said that there were other charges, which were perfectly true.

Mr. LISTER. The Postmaster General has not ventured to inform the House whether, if he became satisfied on an examination of all the papers that this man dismissed from office is really innocent, that he will restore him to his office. He has not said that, and that we have a right to expect from the hon. Minister. His department, either under him or under some person else, has done the most grievous wrong it is possible for one man to do to another. He has branded him, as far as the department can do it, as a forger, and as having violated the law in other respects, and upon the evidence which was submitted to the then Postmaster General this man was summarily dismissed. Now, Sir, it is an astonishing thing indeed if the good reputation of a man and his family are to be destroyed by any official of the Government, without a proper examination and consideration of the evidence, and the conviction that the evidence leads to one only conclusion, and that is that the man is guilty. Is it possible, in this year or in this age, that a Postmaster General of this country will, without proper testimony on the recommendation or report of some official of his department, dismiss a man from office and brand him as a criminal, and that that innocent man shall have no redress in the courts of this country because it is the act of the Government? And when it is discovered that the man is innocent and that the whole action of the Government has been wrong, is it possible to find anybody who will refuse that man all the redress which it is in his power to give to him? It is incredible that the Postmaster General should stand up here to-day, and, after admitting, as he has admitted, and as the proofs completely establish, that the charges made against this person were absolutely untrue, should say that because he has appointed somebody else in this man's place, he refuses to right the terrible wrong he has done to him and his family. Anybody else who did as he has done might have to answer to the courts of the country; but he is free from that responsibility. Now, Sir, the Postmaster General says one thing in which I concur. He says that it is necessary in the public interest that the discipline of the post office officials throughout the country should be strict. I agree with him in that; I believe it is the duty of the Government to enforce the strictest discipline on the part of their officials. But, Sir, does the hon. gentleman always apply this rule? I trow not. There was brought to the attention of the hon. gentleman who sits beside him (Mr. Haggart), and who was at one time the Postmaster General of this country, the fact that a postmaster, a son of a supporter of the Government in this House, with the officials in his office, had deliberately opened, not one letter merely, but two or three or more letters. The evidence was clear beyond any question. If the hon. gentleman will bring down the confidential report on that case, which he has in his department, I believe it will show that the charge made against the gentleman in question was true. The Postmaster General had an opportunity of seeing the person who made the complaint; an investigation was made by an official of the department; evidence was taken, and, if the statement made to me is correct, not by one person alone, but by others who were familiar with the matter, it was proved that the postmaster had opened more than one letter, I believe three or four. The Postmaster General was told of this in his office, and he has in the archives of the department a report of the inspector who examined into the matter. That postmaster is still the postmaster nominally; but, as he is studying for a profession, he passes only the vacation time in his office. This matter was brought before the Government several years ago, and has been brought before it year after year since, and yet the hon. gentleman at the head of the department, who says that discipline is absolutely necessary in the public interest, has not thus far dismissed this official, but he is allowed still to draw the emoluments payable for the services he is supposed to render. I repeat, Sir, that the same measure of justice that is measured out to one should be measured out to all. It should not be allowed to go abroad that because one man happens to have power and influence with the Government he may do with impunity what would cost the official life of somebody else. All should be placed upon a footing of the most perfect equality. That is the only way in which discipline and fidelity to the interests of the country in the public service can be enforced. Let the officials of the country know that one is to be punished and another is to escape, and you establish a precedent that is dangerous to the public welfare. If the Postmaster General desires more information upon the case I have hinted at, I am prepared to give it to him; I am prepared to furnish him with the evidence and proofs of the statement I make, either publicly or privately. The matter was investigated by the inspector in a certain district in this country, and I believe that the evidence brought before that inspector proved beyond any question the truth of the charge that had been made against the postmaster. Now, it is somewhat astonishing that a different mode of procedure should exist in the province of Quebec from what exists in the province of Ontario. I know something about these investigations. I know, to the credit of the department, at all events in the western part of the country, that a man who is charged with an offence is given every opportunity to answer to the charge by giving evidence and calling evidence on his behalf, and the person making the charge has an opportunity of bringing evidence to substantiate it. The court is in every sense an open court, and at the end of the inquiry all the evidence, together with the report of the inspector, is forwarded to the Government. That is the proper course of procedure. But in this case what do we find? This poor man was the postmaster in a small village. If the statements of the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Brodeur) are correct, the inspector comes along and holds a sort of star chamber somewhere, nobody knows where; the unfortunate man accused is not even notified that a charge is made against him, or called to answer to the charge; but somebody comes before the inspector and makes a statement, it may or it may not be under oath—in all probability this was not under oath. The man who the Minister says made the complaint denies that he ever made any such complaint to the Minister or the inspector. Then, who else could have made it? The man who has lost his situation is not in a position to know. Was there any reason for his dismissal apart from the statement made to the Government? Was not the envelope itself, if it had been produced to the inspector, abundant evidence that the charge of altering the date was false? What evidence was there? Surely the hon. Minister should not have discharged this man and ruined his prospects, good name, and reputation, on the simple report of an inspector, unsupported by the evidence given. And if that were not testimony in the proper sense of the word, he should have gone back to the orders of the department and taken the evidence on oath. Because an inspector reported that certain charges are well founded, surely the department without any further investigation, should not have dismissed this man and perhaps have ruined him, or at all events, cast a stain upon his character. For no matter what the court may have done, this dismissal can be cast against him and his family. And the only restitution the Government can make him, the only way they can rectify the great wrong done, is to restore to him the office which they so wrongfully took from him.

Mr. BRODEUR. In answer to the hon. gentleman on the other side, let me say that the conduct of the inspector, from beginning to end, was entirely misleading. The Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Haggart), who was then Postmaster General, says that he never received the letter I sent him some time ago. Well, I have a copy of the letter here, which I sent to him in 1891, and that letter was sent to him personally. It is true I wrote the letter in French, but I thought at the time the hon. gentleman understood French, and I am informed he does. It was written on the 17th September, 1891, and was addressed to the Hon. Mr. Haggart, Postmaster General, Ottawa. I am very much surprised to hear that the hon. gentleman did not receive such a letter.

Mr. HAGGART. I did not say that I did not receive it. I do not remember any of the circumstances. Probably it went to the department as a departmental letter. But if it is a private letter to myself, I will hunt it up and see if I can find it. What is the date?

Mr. BRODEUR. 17th September, 1891.

Mr. HAGGART. I am not aware that I ever refused to answer any letter, and it seems extraordinary to me that I did not acknowledge the receipt. At all events the Postmaster General (Sir Adolphe Caron) says to-day that the only paper we have is the inspector's report.

Mr. BRODEUR. Where is the letter of the 17th September, 1891, and where are the affidavits which accompanied it? I sent with that letter some affidavits to the then Postmaster General (Mr. Haggart), proving that the charges made against Mr. Loïselle in this House by him were entirely unfounded. I have not even received an answer to that letter. The hon. gentleman said a minute ago that if the letter were a private note, perhaps he had knowledge of it. The letter should be in the hands of the department, and I do not know why these papers should not be brought down.

Mr. HAGGART. The hon. gentleman says he sent the letter to me and that it was a private letter. But if he inclosed affidavits, it was evidently a public letter, and the moment I received it I handed it to the officers of the department. It was their duty to answer it, and these affidavits will be on file in the department.

Mr. BRODEUR. I understood from the Postmaster General (Sir Adolphe Caron) that the only paper in the department is the report of the inspector.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Every paper, except the confidential reports of the inspector, will be brought down and laid on the Table.

Mr. BRODEUR. I think that, under the circumstances, not only the other papers, but the report itself should be brought down, and I will tell the hon. gentleman why. I asked for those papers at the beginning of the session of 1892. On the 7th March, 1892, this House gave an order for copies of all petitions, correspondence, vouchers, depositions, inspector's reports and all documents whatsoever respecting the dismissal of Mr. Loïselle. The Government did not oppose the motion, and it was adopted. Now the Government say they will not produce the report because it is a confidential one. But there is the order of the House instructing the Government to produce those papers, which so far the Government have refused to produce. More than that, in 1892, I asked for the papers, and was told that they were lost. I was told that they had been given to the then Postmaster General (Mr. Haggart), the Minister of Railways and Canals, and that they could not be found. Some time after I was told that they were in the hands of Mr. Chapleau. At any rate I could not get those papers brought down in 1892. In 1893, I again asked for their production, but nothing was done. I was informed that the papers were all lost. I had to take an action against Guillet, and I questioned him concerning the declaration in the House that he had made a certain charge against Mr. Loïselle. I asked him what he had to say to that? He replied that all that was said by the Postmaster General was untrue from beginning to end; and he made that statement under oath. I do not want to blame the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Haggart) who, I believe, was perfectly sincere when he made the declaration. I know that he was reading the report of Mr. Gervais. But I ask, what kind of an investigation did this Mr. Gervais make? Was it such an investigation that could be accepted by the Government? What did he do? One day, immediately during the Quebec provincial elections, my adversary, Mr. Gigault, said to Loïselle: Well, Loïselle, you are against me, but you will see in a few days you will be dismissed by the Government. On the charge that a pretended crime had been committed, Inspector Gervais went, one year afterwards, to Ste. Angèle de Monnoir, and there saw Guillet, the Conservative leader of the locality, and held an investigation with Mr. Guillet. He did not examine any witnesses, he did not notify Loiselle—not at all. But he made a report to the Government that Loiselle had been guilty of the charge of forgery and had kept a letter many days in his office. He made the serious charge which was repeated in this House by the Minister of Railways and Canals. As a member of this House, and as knowing every fact of the case, for having conducted the enquête in court myself at Montreal, I declare what I have stated to be true. There was no investigation made. More than that, some time after I asked the Postmaster General (Mr. Haggart) to have an investigation made. Unfortunately he did not receive my letter and consequently could not answer it. At all events I did not receive any reply. I then entered an action, and that action was sustained, the judge declaring that the charges were malicious. And what scandal did we see when the case came up in the courts in Montreal? The judge before whom the case was tried had been on the bench but a short time. Before his appointment he had been known as a Conservative in politics, and a member of the Provincial Cabinet. The advocate for the defendant Guillet kept constantly asking, during the case, what was the use of granting damages for in a political action, and spoke of the case as a political trick. But, in spite of this, the judge was honest enough to grant damages, and to declare that the charges were entirely untrue. More than that, Guillet did not bring a single witness to prove his case. The Deputy Postmaster General, Mr. White, came there as a witness, and then, for the first time, I was allowed to see this famous envelope. I asked for the production of the vouchers concerning this dismissal in 1891, and again in 1892. Among these vouchers was that envelope; there is no question about it. I discovered that this envelope was in the hands of the Government. How did I discover it? I had been told that there was not a single paper in the department, that they had not the record of the case, that everything had been lost. I went on one occasion to the office of the advocate for the defence in this case, and he showed me a letter from an official of the department, telling him that they would bring every paper that would suit him. That is the way in which this man Loiselle has been treated, and that is the way Gervais, the inspector, made his investigation. I say that under the circumstances the duty of the Government was to reinstate this postmaster. I sent a letter with a copy of the judgment to the Postmaster General, and he answered me that the matter should have consideration. Some time ago he answered me in the House that he would not reinstate Mr. Loiselle. Mr. Speaker, considering that this inspector has not seen fit to make a serious investigation of the case, I think we have a right to have the documents produced before this House, and that is the reason why I move that the following words be added to the motion before the House, according to the suggestion of the hon. Prime Minister:—

And a copy of the record, depositions, declarations and pleadings in suit brought in Montreal of Loiselle vs. Guillet, and the inspector's report.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The hon. gentleman cannot move an amendment to his own motion. I understood him to say that he had in his possession the papers relating to the trial.

Mr. LANGELIER. Is there any objection to my moving the motion which has been read by my hon. friend? If not, I move that these words be added.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. If these papers are in the department they will be brought down; if not, an order of the House cannot cause them to be produced.

Mr. BRODEUR. This is an address.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I see the original motion is for an address; I thought it was for an order of the House.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

PICKET'S PIER.

Mr. BORDEN moved for:

Copies of all letters, reports of engineers or other papers in the hands of the Government relating to the condition of the Picket's Pier and the non-expenditure thereon of the sum voted last year for the purpose of repairing said pier.

He said: In making this motion, Mr. Speaker, I must ask the indulgence of the House for a few moments while I recount in some detail the history of this public work during the past few years. I may say, by way of preface, that the Picket's Pier, so-called, is a breakwater on the Basin of Minas, in the county of King's, N.S., and is similar to other breakwaters from time to time receiving Dominion Government aid. It was a public work, constructed many years ago, before Confederation, by the aid of the Provincial Legislature, and, after Confederation, grants from time to time were made by this Parliament to keep up this work. I think it was in 1886 that it was transferred by the Provincial Government, together with a number of other breakwaters, to the Department of Marine and Fisheries.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. No.

Mr. BORDEN. I think so. Well, then, to the Department of Public Works. At any rate it was transferred to the charge of the Dominion Government, and the Dominion Government has taken control of it and appointed a public official known as a wharfinger, who has charge of this breakwater, and who collects fees from vessels coming there, and upon goods received and shipped there. In 1878, I think, public money was expended on this breakwater, and again, I believe, in 1883. In 1887, when I came into this House for the second time, a petition was sent to me in which it was stated that the breakwater was going down, and that public money should be expended upon it. I presented that petition. I saw the Minister of Public Works at that time and asked that a sum of money be expended upon this work to keep it from falling into decay. Nothing was done, and this went on until 1891. After the election of 1891, I again repeated the request made to me by citizens of the locality in which this pier is situated for the expenditure of public money on the work. However, the Government was deaf to all entreaties. But it so happened, Mr. Speaker, that on the 1st day of February, 1892, or a little before that, the Government developed a new and lively desire for the maintenance of this interesting public work. I may mention, by way of parenthesis, that just at this time there was a by-election in the county of King's. I had been unseated, and a writ had been issued for polling in the by-election on the 13th of February. Although it was in winter, although the wharf was covered with two or three feet of snow, and it was a very bad time of year for making the expenditure, nevertheless an engineer was sent there in the middle of January, and on the 1st day of February following, he issued a commission to a resident of the community near that wharf, in the following terms:—

The Dept. of Public Works, Canada,
Resident Engineer's Office,
HALIFAX, N.S., 1st Feb., 1892.

LEVI EATON, Esq.,
Lower Canard.

DEAR SIR,—Inclosed herewith I hand you a commission and authority to expend the sum of $200 in making some urgent repairs—

Mark the words, Mr. Speaker, "urgent repairs" —to Picket's Wharf. We examined this wharf together on the 16th January, and you are well aware of what is required.

At the same time this letter was also forwarded to Mr. Eaton, the commissioner:

On the recommendation of C. R. Bill, Esq., the Honourable the Minister of Public Works has been pleased to approve of your appointment as foreman in charge of repairs to Picket's Wharf, Lower Canard.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Who is Mr. Bill?

Mr. BORDEN. Mr. Bill is the gentleman who was contesting King's County with me at that interesting moment. Now, we observe that an important step had been taken towards the repair of the breakwater at Picket's Pier, and on 4th February I find a letter written by this same resident engineer to this same Mr. Eaton, who enjoyed office for a very few days, as the sequel will show:

DEAR SIR,—I have yours of 2nd inst. I think if you look at your commission you will find it stated that your pay will be at the rate of $2.50 per day for every day that you are actually working. This, of course, does not mean time that you have to wait before you are able to make a start on the repairs, and while you are making arrangements for material. With regard to beginning work, you will use your own judgment as to when it is practicable to do so. As long as the wharf is not sustaining actual damage, there is, of course, no necessity to begin work immediately.

Now, that was on the 4th day of February, and on the 6th day of February, which was nomination day, this interesting letter was written by this same resident engineer to this same Mr. Eaton, for the time being, the commissioner for the expenditure of this money. The election took place on the 13th February subsequently:

February 6th, 1892.

LEVI EATON, Esq.

Please do no work and make no contracts or arrangements for materials, or for beginning work on Picket's Pier until further instructions. That is to say, please consider your appointment suspended for the present.

Yours truly,
C. E. DODWELL.

Now, it so happens that this man, Levi Eaton, for so short a time in the enjoyment of these official honours, has been a life-long Liberal. He is some 60 years of age, and has been a Liberal ever since he was able to vote, and a very intelligent Liberal. Mr. Bill, my opponent, had gone to him and asked him if he would expend this money on the Picket's Pier. Mr. Eaton said: Why don't you get some of your own friends to do it? Mr. Bill said: You are the most prominent man in this locality, I want you to do it, and unless you will consent to do it, the expenditure won't take place. Well, Mr. Eaton did not wish to see the community deprived of the great boon of having this wharf repaired, and so he consented to take charge. But, Sir, the fact that this appointment of Mr. Eaton had been made, accidentally got out before nomination day, and on nomination day there was serious trouble in the Conservative camp. The Conservatives living in that neighbourhood insisted it was an insult to them that a Liberal should be appointed, and they insisted that the appointment should be cancelled, and that the expenditure should not be made. These are facts, and I state them in my place in Parliament with full knowledge of the responsibility I am taking in making this statement. Well, so much for the expenditure which the engineer found absolutely necessary and urgent to be made in February, 1892. Now, as it happens, I came back here in 1892, and knowing the report the engineer had made, and knowing that it was correct—because I say at once that the report made by the engineer was perfectly truthful, that the work was going into decay, and that repairs should not only have been made in February, 1892, but long before that—I saw the Minister of Public Works, and asked him if he was going to put a vote in the Estimates; and he put me off, although he gave me to understand that he would put a vote in the Estimates in 1892. Towards the end of the session, finding that I was not likely to get much satisfaction, I took the liberty of calling the attention of the then Minister of Justice, now Prime Minister, to the condition of affairs, and to what had taken place. On 4th July, 1892, I received from him the following letter:—

DEAR SIR,—I note what you state in your letter of 28th ulto. and shall be very glad if the Minister of Public Works is yet able to meet your wishes in the matter.

Yours sincerely,
J. S. D. THOMPSON.

Finding no vote had been put in the Estimates, I asked the Government to take the sum out of the vote for general repairs and carry out that which they had found so urgently necessary in February, but which in July they seemed to think might go over for an indefinite period. I wrote to the Minister of Public Works about the same time, and received from him this very polite note, dated 19th July, 1892:

I beg to acknowledge the receipt of your letter re Picket's Harbour. The chief engineer of my department will visit Nova Scotia at the end of the month, and will examine the state of Picket's Pier, and see that what is necessary be done.

Yours truly,
J. A. OUIMET.

That was on the 16th July, 1892, and so far as I know, the chief engineer has never got there yet. Well, I kept pegging away, and in December of the same year, I received another letter from the Minister of Public Works:

I have received your three letters of 27th inst., and have asked my officers to give me reports on the matters mentioned therein.

With best wishes for the new year,
I remain, yours truly.

That letter was dated about Christmas time, 1892, and the good wishes were for the year 1893. In 1893 we had a session of Parliament, and I succeeded in persuading the Minister to put a vote in the Estimates for the repairs of this important Government work. That vote was passed through this House, and it amounted to $800. I went home happy, imagining that the matter was settled, and that this long-needed repair would be at once carried out. But after I reached home I found nothing was being done. So, on August 8th. I wrote a letter to the Minister to refresh his memory once more, in regard to Picket's Pier. On August 16th, he very promptly answered—as he always does—as follows:—

In answer to your letter of the 8th instant, I may say that orders were given over a month ago to do necessary repairs at Picket's Pier. I will inquire into the matter.

That was on August 16th, and orders had been given a month before. I waited until September 5th, and on that day I wrote another letter, and I am afraid, as time elapses, my importunities became rather strong.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The pier had been getting better all the time.

Mr. BORDEN. There is a little of it left. On November 2nd, I received the following reply:—

In compliance with your request contained in your letter of 5th September, I have the honour to inform you that orders have been given for the necessary repairs at Picket's Pier.

I telegraphed the Minister, and finally I wrote him in the following terms on December 9th:—

Notwithstanding the fact that you have twice assured me within four months that "orders" had been issued for the repairs to be made to the Picket's Pier, not a particle of work has been done, nor is there the slightest indication, at the pier, of anything being about to be done. I have just been on it, and I can assure you once more and finally, so far as letters and telegrams are concerned, that the work is in a most disgraceful condition, and will, in all probability, become a complete wreck if not repaired at once. If you have given "orders" for the work to be done, your subordinates seem to be taking their time in executing these "orders." It seems a little too bad that a small expenditure (duly voted by Parliament) which would save from destruction a costly and useful public work, cannot be made. What is the reason?

That letter, I believe, brings the correspondence up to date. When Parliament was called I came here, and I certainly expected to find in the Estimates, which were promptly laid on the Table of the House, a revote of the grant which had been made last year for a work for which orders had been given. I was, however, truly astonished when I found that the Estimates contained no mention whatever of a vote or revote for Picket's Pier. Although the amount involved is not very large, the principle at issue is one of some importance to this country. We should know why, if the engineer in February, 1892, found that repairs to this breakwater were so urgently necessary that they should be done at once, during that inclement season of the year, this work is allowed to continue without anything further being done with regard to it. If the action taken by the Government at that time was justifiable, then surely the course pursued by the Government since that time was utterly unjustifiable; if it is, on the contrary, a work that does not deserve the expenditure of public money, or if it is a work not out of repair, surely the course pursued by the Government in February, 1892, was utterly unjustifiable. Hon. gentlemen opposite may take which ever horn of the dilemma they please. The people who live in the vicinity of this breakwater are almost exclusively farmers, and the feeling prevails that the reason they have been neglected is that they are farmers. They say: If this breakwater happened to be near the terminus of an important railway, or in some town where industries were being bolstered up by this Government, and by the National Policy, the matter would have been attended to at once, but they being nothing but agriculturists they may be neglected with impunity by the Government. I must confess that when that statement is made, I find it very difficult to satisfy these people that it is not true. I have already stated enough to show that some explanation is demanded with respect to the course which the Minister has pursued in this matter. I felt it was of sufficient consequence to have a statement made on the floor of this House in explanation of the course taken by this Government. I have endeavoured to do my duty by my constituents. I have written letters and have interviewed Ministers, and I have promised these people that they were on the eve of having the repairs made, and every time I have done so it appears I was misinformed. In justice to myself I wish to be in a position to satisfy these people that, at all events, so far as I am concerned, every word I said to them was true; that when I said I had received assurances from the Minister that the order had been given for the expenditure, I had received that assurance, and I have taken this public way of proving to these people that the statements that I made to them were in every respect correct. I desire to obtain copies of the orders alleged to have been given. I should like to see a copy of the interesting telegrams or letters which must have passed between the Public Works Department at Ottawa, and the resident engineer, Mr. Dodwell, on that interesting day, February 6th, 1892. I should like to know how a gentleman who had been appointed on February 1st as commissioner, who was assured on February 4th that his payment would be $2.50 per day, and that he might choose his own time to begin the repairs, should be dropped out as commissioner on February 6th, which day happened to be the day of the nomination for the by-election in King's County. This will prove interesting information, and I am sure the Minister will be glad to supply these details when the papers are brought down to the House.

Mr. BORDEN.

Mr. OUIMET. I cannot thank the hon. gentleman (Mr. Borden), but at the same time I cannot find fault with him for having read so much of my prose. I suppose the hon. gentlemen of this House have, from these letters, noticed the willingness and earnestness on my part and on the part of the department to do what was fair towards the hon. gentleman and his constituents as regards that pier.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). You promised.

Mr. OUIMET. I repeat that I was willing and in earnest about it, and before I sit down, I think I will be able to prove that in this matter the department has done nothing but its duty towards the public and towards the county of King's, N.S. The hon. gentleman stated that it was too sad that the instructions given in February, 1892, should have been prosecuted, because they might have influenced the electors of his county against him and in favour of his opponent. I am not aware that this could have been the fact, and if such were the case it is a poor compliment to his electors, for I could not suppose that the expenditure of $200 on a pier of the importance of Picket's wharf would have been of so much value in a by-election. As regards matters passing during the month of February, 1892, I must say my memory is a little unreliable. I was in the same position as the hon. gentleman himself, I was going through the electoral mill for myself and for many of my friends. I was new in the department at the time, and probably a good many details escaped my attention. In complaining that the appropriation voted by Parliament last year has not been spent, the hon. gentleman should have, in the first place, shown to the House that this appropriation was sufficient to carry out the work that was to be done, and in the second place, he should have shown that circumstances had not so changed as to justify the department in not expending the money that had been voted. When the reports of the resident engineer and of the chief engineer of the department are laid on the Table, they will, I believe, prove to the full satisfaction of the House and of the country, that the department had acted wisely in not expending during last summer, the money which had been voted. The facts stated in my letters to the hon. gentleman are strictly true. At the beginning of the fiscal year the programme of the department was fixed by myself and the chief engineer, and instructions had been issued all over the country to proceed with the works that had been provided for by Parliament, Picket's pier being one of them. I was very much surprised to hear from the hon. gentleman that the instructions in this particular case had not been carried out, and I gave an order to proceed with the work. Some time later on, it was reported to me that the pier in question was in such a state that the amount of $800 would not be sufficient, and nearly $3,000 would be hardly enough to put that pier in such repair as to make it perfectly safe and useful. It became then a question as to whether the department was justified in undertaking a work that could not be completed for the amount voted and so incurring an expenditure and responsibility far beyond the appropriation. Seeing that, I took it upon myself to have the chief engineer order that a careful report should be made by the resident engineer, placing the facts before the department so as to see exactly what was required and what would be justified by the importance of the wharf itself, in order that I might be in a position to state to Council that the expenditure necessary would be much larger than that authorized, and that the department would require a further amount to complete the work. The result was contained in a report made to the department by the chief engineer in February last, transmitting a report, with plan, from Mr. Dodwell, resident engineer, relating to the condition of Picket's wharf, N.S. The cost of thorough repairs is estimated in that report at $2,649. The report also calls attention to a previous report made by him to the effect that the wharf was not, in his opinion, a work of Federal importance.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) What is the date of the previous report from Mr. Dodwell?

Mr. QUIMET. That was in January, at the beginning of the year. There is another aspect of the question to which the attention of the House ought to be drawn. It is a fact that since the wharf has been built, circumstances have greatly changed. It was at one time the only wharf in that part of King's County which served for the export of a large quantity of agricultural products, but since then, the Cornwallis Valley Railway has been built. The best point for a landing place in that particular part of King's County was thought to be Kingsport; and the importance of and facilities for a wharf there were considered by the authorities of the company to be such that they chose Kingsport as their shipping port, and have built their track to the wharf to accommodate not only themselves but also the public. I understand that the wharf is only two or two and a half miles from Picket's wharf, and it is very doubtful if it would be wise to go on with any further expenditure on Picket's wharf. As I have said, nothing on my part has been done to take an undue advantage of my hon. friend. Everything has been done by me in the most straightforward manner, with an earnest intention of doing him and his electors justice as if they were the best friends of the Government. These facts will be placed before the House; and when the Estimates come down—or before, if the hon. gentleman chooses to make a motion upon the subject—it will be time enough to consider the whole matter, and I hope that my department as well as myself will be absolved from any intention of doing any injustice to the hon. gentleman or to his electors.

Mr. BORDEN. The hon. Minister has read from the report of Mr. Dodwell, the resident engineer, to the effect that he doubts whether this work is any longer a work of general or Dominion importance. That, I understand, was the first report Mr. Dodwell made. His first visit to the harbour was made on the 15th or 16th of January, 1892; and, as the result of his visit, he advised the Government to spend $200 immediately to save from destruction a breakwater which he gravely doubted to be of Dominion importance at all. Let me call attention to the fact that there had been no vote for any expenditure at Picket's pier; and yet in mid-winter, a most extraordinary time for such a thing, this engineer went there—it must have taken strong pressure to induce him to make a report of that kind—and, though it was not of Dominion importance, he advised an immediate expenditure of $200 upon it. These are facts which the hon. gentleman has not cleared up to my satisfaction, and I doubt if he has done so to the satisfaction of this House. The hon. gentleman says that before I find fault with his department I should prove that the grant of last year was insufficient. I am not the chief engineer of the Department of Public Works; I have no responsibility whatever with reference to the amount of the grant. My responsibility is ended when I place the case before the Government and induce them if I can to place a vote in the Estimates for the repairs. It lies with the Government and the engineers of the department to make correct estimates.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Did you not suggest the amount?

Mr. BORDEN. No; I did not suggest the $800; I said that I thought from $500 to $1,000 would be enough. While the grant may be inadequate now, the general opinion is that $1,000 ought to be sufficient, and certainly would have been had the repairs been attended to in time. Now, the hon. Minister has stated that the circumstances are altered—that a railway has been constructed which renders the maintenance of this pier unnecessary. The hon. gentleman is, however, entirely at fault in his geography. While it is true that Picket's pier is not even two miles distant from the Kingsport pier, the terminus of the railway he refers to, it is equally true that Picket's pier is on the opposite side of the river, and the distance from there by the road to Kingsport pier is six or seven miles. The railway he refers to is not any nearer than the Windsor and Annapolis railway, which has existed there for fifteen or twenty years; and, as a matter of fact, that railway will not be used. If this breakwater is allowed to fall into decay, a very serious loss will be entailed on the community; and I do hope that before the Minister adopts the recommendation of the engineer, he will look into the matter and see whether a small sum cannot be expended to keep the pier at least in such a condition of efficiency as to be useful for the shipment of produce. I would like to ask the Minister if the report, which he says suggests the necessity of an expenditure of $3,000, recommended an extension of the breakwater, or simply repairing it.

Mr. OUMET. The cost of efficient repairs will be approximately as follows:—31,000 cubic feet of close-faced stone cribwork, $2,170; 210 cubic yards brush and stone protection, $210; 940 cubic yards stone and gravel filling, $564; four mooring-posts, $20; total, $2,964. The report concludes:

I propose examining this work again in the spring as soon as it is free from ice, and if I see any reason to change the above report and estimate, I will forward another.

I have not received any other report.

Mr. BORDEN. It does not appear that there is any extension of the work contemplated. I must think that the estimate is a very high one. The argument which the Minister presented as a reason why this pier is unnecessary is not well founded. The fact that a railway is constructed which has its terminus at Kingsport will not in any way relieve the necessity for this breakwater.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Does that take part of the produce that used to go by the old route?

Mr. BORDEN. Very trifling indeed.

Motion agreed to.

IMPORTS UNDER ORDER IN COUNCIL.

Mr. CHARLTON moved for:

Return showing the amount and value of crucible steel imported into Canada, free of duty, in each year since 1885, under the provisions of Order in Council of 6th November, 1885. Also, amount and value of lastings and mohair cloth imported into Canada, free of duty, in each year since 1885, under the provisions of Order in Council of 6th November, 1885.

He said: The motion that I have put into your hands, Mr. Speaker, refers to a matter of very considerable importance, and to a line of conduct adopted by the Government which, in my opinion, is a usurpation of power. The Government, of course, must have a majority to sustain them as a Government, but that majority should keep the Government in its proper place. If it merely fills the functions of a majority and is guilty of slavish submission to the Government, and permits the Government to usurp the powers that a Ministry of a free country ought not to possess, then the majority becomes subservient to the Government and recreant to its duty to the people who sent it here. The independence of this House has been seriously impaired in the last few years from various causes, and I think we are gradually drifting into a course of procedure and into a policy in respect of which it is high time we should call a halt, and adopt a policy more in consonance with the principles of free and representative Government. In the English colonies on this continent, from almost the time that they were established, there was a constant struggle on the part of the people while these were Crown colonies against the power exercised by the Governor in Council, and a constant demand made by the people for representative government, the benefits of which, though so highly appreciated by the early colonists, we seem in this Dominion at present to place a lower estimate upon, than was placed upon by them 150 to 200 years ago.

The objections to the system of legislation by Order in Council are numerous. Of course, we have a body of Ministers who are perfectly capable of shaping the legislation of the country, and who are worthy of the confidence of the people, and who might possibly safely dispense with the co-ordinate functions of the House at their back. We might have that. We always do have in the Government some men of ability, and certainly have at present, in the leader of the Government, a gentleman who is accounted a jurist and a statesman, a man of high reputation and fit, no doubt, for the position he occupies, but we also have in our Cabinets a good many men who are not of that description, but who are little, if at all, above the average of the ordinary members of the House. We have in our Governments, as a rule, a good many members who are not capable of forming an opinion, shaping a policy, and guiding the destinies of the state in matters of delicacy and importance. Some Minister may have some croquet, and if the Government is in the habit of legislating by Order in Council that Minister may impress his ideas on his colleagues, or his colleagues may pay very little, if any, attention to the representation of his ideas, and he may get the consent of his colleagues to some enactment by Order in Council highly detrimental to the interests of the country. That, we can readily understand, may be the case. And in any event, when the question to be decided by Order in Council is under consideration, there cannot be that consideration given to it which is given in the open House of Commons. There cannot be that sifting of the various interests, that presentation of the opposite side of the case, and it is not natural to suppose that such should be the case. The Government in Council sit with closed doors. There are 13 members in the Administration. A proposition is laid before this body. Those interested on the opposite side, who might wish to be heard in opposition to the majority, are not there. Some Minister may, as a favour, desire his colleagues to give their consent to the measure he proposes; and in nine cases out of ten it will fail to receive the consideration it deserves. The Government in Council, with the best intentions, will be liable at all times to make serious mistakes. They are assuming a responsibility which should rest upon the House of Commons. There are instances in history of mistakes that were made, and there will be instances again, and this being the case, there should be the utmost regard paid to the wishes of the entire House, and the utmost modesty exercised by the Ministry in shaping legislation and running the affairs of the country. Now, we have had Ministers here, Mr. Speaker, to whom neither you nor I would be willing to entrust the decision of important and delicate questions. For instance, one Minister, who may have graduated as the teacher of a ladies' seminary, may assume the important functions of one department of the Government, although his previous training has not been such as to fit him for the discharge of these functions. Another, who may have graduated from a country store, may assume control of a department of the Government, and his training has not been such as to entitle him to the utmost confidence of the people. Therefore, I say that the Ministers themselves ought to be chary about exercising legislative powers, and ought not to adopt fiscal legislation or measures of other kinds, as they have been doing in the past, without consulting the House of Commons.

Now, I wish to refer this evening to some of the acts of the Government in the line that I am complaining of. I wish to point out that in the last eight or nine years the Government have, by Order in Council, adopted important fiscal legislation which should not have been adopted without reference to this House. They have assumed to place fiscal legislation upon the Statute-book by Order in Council without consulting the House, and they did not ask the consent of the House even after it had met in session the second, third and fourth times after these Orders in Council were placed on the Statute-book. We have in these motions I am now moving, thirty-eight general classes of merchandise, placed at various times on the free list, and these thirty-eight general classes of merchandise may be further divided, perhaps, into one hundred different subdivisions. We have in these Orders in Council all these concessions made by placing the articles I refer to on the free list for the benefit, not of the general public, but of special interests. In not one instance can it be shown that the change was for the public benefit, but every one was made for the benefit of some class. Seventeen different classes of manufacturers have been benefited by these special Orders in Council placing these thirty-eight different classes of goods on the free list. In 1885, we had two orders of this kind passed. That was nine years ago, and for nine years the Government has not asked Parliament to sanction the action taken with regard to these two orders. We have an Order in Council passed on the 6th of November, 1885, putting crucible steel upon the free list for the benefit of some line of manufactures, and we have an Order in Council of the 6th November, 1885, putting mohair cloth and lastings upon the free list for the benefit of some other class. Nearly nine years ago these two orders were passed, and for all that length of time they have been on the Statute-book! And yet Parliament has never been asked to give its concurrence and assent to these enactments. Now, Mr. Speaker, this is outrageous. The only justification for the passing of an Order in Council is the necessity of meeting some emergency arising before Parliament assembles. And, when Parliament assembles, it is the duty of the Government to lay their action before Parliament at once and to ask its concurrence in what they have done.

In 1886, five Orders in Council were passed putting various articles on the free list for use in certain manufactures. For eight years these orders have been in force without Parliament having been asked to ratify the action of the Government. On the 5th of July, 1886, hatter's bands, bindings, tips and sides and linings, both tips and sides were put upon the free list; on the 17th of July, steel strip for buckthorns and plain strip fencing; on the 17th of July, wire rope; on the 20th of July, twisted brass and copper wire, and on the 18th of November, yarn spun from the hair of the alpaca or angora goat. All these changes were made at the instance of men representing special interests, who came before the Governor in Council in their Council Chamber, or appeared there by deputation or representation and asked for these favours. These Orders in Council were made without other interests being heard: all these concessions were made without discussion by the people or the representatives of the people, and they have remained the law of the land without Parliament being consulted till this session.

In 1887, we had three Orders in Council passed relating to the same class of subjects. On the 1st of July, sweat leather was put on the free list; on the 2nd of July, square reeds, rawhide centres, textile leather or rubber heads, thumbs and tips, and steel, iron or nickel caps for whip ends; on the 22nd November, copper rollers for calico printing.

In 1888, we had five Orders in Council of the same character. On the 16th of November, felloes of hickory wood were put on the free list for the benefit of carriage makers; on the 6th of December, homo spring steel wire, smaller than number nine and not smaller than number 15 ; on the 11th of July, steel, No. 12 gauge and down to No. 30 gauge ; on the same day, under another Order in Council, yarns of wool and the worsted ; and on the same day, under another Order in Council, jute yarn, cotton yarn, finer than No. 40 ; and wire of iron or steel, galvanized or tinned or coppered or not, of No. 16 gauge or smaller.

Now, here are fifteen Orders in Council. Mr. Speaker, two of them passed nine years ago, five passed eight years ago, three passed seven years ago, and five passed six years ago, all dealing with fiscal legislation, all affecting changes in our fiscal system which should have been submitted to the Committee on Ways and Means of this House ; but all of them, in order to serve class interests, adopted without discussion in the country or among the people's representatives. All these stood upon the Statute-book year after year and no protest was raised in this House, a subservient majority not venturing to question the right of the Ministers to take from them their proper functions of legislating in matters of this kind.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Nor a subservient Opposition either.

Mr. CHARLTON. The Opposition is not subservient, Mr. Speaker. The truth is we have had so many outrages to look after, and our numbers are so small, that some matters, such as this, have escaped attention. But now we are beginning to gather them together. Better late than never is a good rule, and, though these Orders in Council have been left unconsidered for nine or eight or seven or six years, until my hon. friend may have supposed they had escaped attention, at last they will be brought to public attention. The mills of the gods grind slow, but they grind exceeding small, and in the end we will have the misdeeds of this Government dragged to the light.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The mills of the gods seem to grind you smaller every time.

Mr. CHARLTON. We may be ground fine, Mr. Speaker, but I sometimes think, when I hear of the good times our friends on the opposite side are having, of the old scripture expression : " They were eating and drinking until the flood came and swept them away."

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Still looking for calamities.

Motion agreed to.

It being Six o'clock the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

THE LOBSTER FISHERY.

Mr. BOWERS moved for :

Correspondence since 1st January, 1892, to the present time from fishery officers, and others from Mr. CHARLTON.

the western counties of Nova Scotia and the county of Charlotte in New Brunswick, as regards the taking of lobsters and of the limitation of size, and of all recommendations in regard to the same. Also a copy of all correspondence between the Minister of Marine and Fisheries and his officials and all other persons as regards the close season for the herring fishing at Two Island Harbour, Grand Manan, and of the weirs at that place.

He said : Mr. Speaker, in dealing with the question under consideration, I would call the attention of the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, and of the House, to the great importance of this subject, and more particularly as it appertains to the welfare of the inhabitants and fishermen of western Nova Scotia, and of the waters of the Bay of Fundy, including the southern shores of New Brunswick. I will speak first of that part pertaining to the lobster fishery. Only a few years ago, the exportation of lobsters in a live state was in its infancy, and it has only been within the last eight or ten years that this ever-increasing and enormous industry has become one of vital import to that part of the Dominion. The Yarmouth Steamship Company have given it a great impetus by establishing a fast line of boats to Boston, thus placing, in a short space of time, this very edible shell-fish in a satisfactory condition in that market, whereby all connected with it, reap, at certain seasons of the year, very large prices, and making it, on the whole, a fairly remunerative business. Some idea will be given if I state that for the fiscal year 1893, there were exported, of live lobsters, from Shelburne County, 2,670 tons ; Yarmouth County, 1,637 tons ; Digby County, 681 tons ; Annapolis County, 76 tons ; and Charlotte County, New Brunswick, 944½ tons ; making a total amount of live lobsters exported from these five counties, of 6,008½ tons, valued at $467,113, giving employment to a large number of men, who own 380,000 traps, valued at $266,000. During the last year or two, however, there has been a largely decreased catch, per capita, more particularly in the counties of Digby, Annapolis, and Charlotte, with which counties I am more personally cognizant. Many petitions and letters, if I am rightly informed, have been forwarded to the Minister upon this subject, praying that some steps may be taken to increase the output, by an extension of the fishing season, and save, at the same time, this very valuable fishery from extinction. As the statute now stands, all lobsters not under nine inches may be taken, with the exception of berried or seed lobsters. What the fishermen want, almost to a unit, in Digby, Annapolis, and Charlotte counties, is that no person shall be allowed to catch and sell any lobster under ten and one-half inches, the size allowed to be sold in the Boston market. As for the counties of Yarmouth and Shelburne, I am not prepared to speak, but I am aware that many tons of undersized lobsters are taken in those counties, and sold to the canneries, and I have no doubt but what most of the fishermen in those counties would be pleased to have the Act apply also to them. However, of this, probably the representatives of those counties may be the best judges. In talking with fishermen this spring at Beaver Harbour, Charlotte County, I was informed that all the fishermen of that county would be willing to see such an Act enforced, as three out of four lobsters caught at present were under ten and one-half inches, and although the catch in Digby and Annapolis counties compare better as to size than this, I feel sure that fully 40 per cent are under this length. When we consider that the price of a full-sized lobster will average from 8 to 10 cents each, while the undersized ones will only bring from 1 to 1½ cents each, we can readily understand the large financial loss that takes place yearly when it is estimated that those undersized shell-fish will, in the course of twelve months, be worth from 600 to 700 per cent more than if sold as they are at present to the canneries, or exported to the New York market. Therefore, I desire to impress on the Minister and Government the necessity of enacting an Order in Council forbidding the taking of all lobsters under ten and one-half inches in the waters of the Bay of Fundy, as pertains to the counties spoken of. Overseer Campbell, of St. Andrews, page 177, report, 1893, says :

The lobster catch was less than last season, owing to a less vigorous prosecution of the industry. They are annually becoming more scarce and unless a close time for a year or two is made, will soon have to be abandoned.

Special Guardian Cross, of Beaver Harbour, reports :

The lobster fishing is gaining in importance to us, the catch having been larger, and more men engaged in it each year.

Overseer Brown, of Campobello, reports decrease in the lobster catch. Commodore Pratt, page 175 of report, 1893, says :

A large increase is noticed in the catch of lobsters, due not only to the fishing being slightly better than previous seasons, but also to the fact of a larger number of men being engaged in fishing for them. Prices were considerably in advance of previous seasons.

Many persons have begun this fishing without due regard to the close seasons, therefore, during the week just closed the crew of this ship and the several fishery officers were busy in seeking and destroying several hundred traps and releasing their contents. Great care had been taken in the manner of setting those traps, with a view to their being unnoticed by a casual observer.

Inspector Kianey, at page 122, says :

The increased take may be attributable to two causes: first, the increased number of those employed in the industry; and secondly, the fishermen have learned the once popular idea that these fish were to be taken only in inshore waters, has been exploded, hence this branch of fishing is now largely conducted miles at sea.

The present fishery regulations are satisfactory, with, of course, the exceptional cases—one of which is that in some localities where winter fishing cannot with any degree of success be carried on—the fishermen do not feel satisfied that others more favourably located shall reap the good results of the good prices obtained in the early part of the year.

It is regrettable that many of the packers buy and pack the "berried" fish. In this connection I would again urge that the packer be licensed, such license to be cancelled upon proof of wilful violation of the regulations.

It will be noticed that the increased catch which some note is nearly always owing to the large number of men engaged, and not on account of the fish being more plentiful. On the contrary, it is generally conceded that each year a greater number of traps is required, and they must be placed at longer distances from the shore to obtain the same financial results as the preceding year. Again, Mr. Speaker, there seems to be a general feeling that the season should be extended from four to six weeks in the waters of the Bay of Fundy, as the violent storms that take place during the months of March and April prove very destructive to traps and oftentimes cause much financial loss to those who have embarked in this industry. In fact, many parties along the southern shores of the Bay of Fundy dare not place their traps in position before the 10th of May, which gives them scarcely two months to pursue their calling. This, it is needless to say, does not give parties enough time to earn wages suitable to the risks incurred. They recognize that, with an extension of time of from four to six weeks, and the stoppage of the catch of small lobsters, that in a short time they can look forward to an increased catch of saleable fish. This will give them the American market, when prices are especially buoyant. It is estimated that from seventy-five to one hundred thousand dollars would be thus added to the wage of the fishermen in that part of the Dominion. The fishermen of these counties strictly observe the close season, which is not the case in many parts of the Dominion. I, myself, during the month of September saw fishermen hauling their traps in some of the harbours of Halifax County, where I was told they can them and then ship them to Halifax where they are sold in open market. The hon. Minister will remember that in 1891 I called his attention to the annually increasing scarcity of bait-fish in the waters of the Bay of Fundy, and instanced the enormous waste that was annually taking place along the shores of Charlotte County, N.B., and elsewhere by means of weirs, &c., that trapped the greater part of those small herrings that the Government in other places tried, or pretended to protect. The hon.

member from Charlotte (Mr. Gillmor) at that time undertook to say, that no man was sure whether these herrings were sardines or not, and that if they were, in a few years they would be as plentiful as ever. Well, time has borne out the statements I then made. It is only needful to state that the winter herring fisheries of New Brunswick, which had proved a great source of revenue to that part of the country, and which had then commenced to decline, has never been since prosecuted, and herrings in those waters in the winter time have long since ceased to be a source of revenue. Inspector Pratt informed me that last year he computed that 80,000 hogsheads were used in the sardine business alone, and when we take into account the enormous numbers used as lobster bait, and for fertilizers, sizes too small for sardines, besides the boat-loads that are dumped into the channels when there is no market; we may at the smallest computation place these so wasted at 80,000 hogsheads additional. Now, each hogshead contains about five barrels, or an equivalent of 800,000 barrels—allowing that it only takes twenty-five of these small herrings to make the bulk of a full-grown one—although some allow forty—we have almost the incalculable number of twenty millions of barrels, which, if not thus caught and destroyed, would arrive to maturity, taking out of account the natural enemies of the ocean world. Some may think these figures large, but those acquainted with this industry are aware that I am not exaggerating. I am told that from Musquash to Deer Island, a distance of fifty miles, immense numbers are taken, and when there are no purchasers they take those immense boats containing from 50 to 100 barrels and just dump them far enough out to sea so that they will not injure the weir by polluting the water. I am told that even at Barton and Griffin Cove, in Digby County, they are used as fertilizers, and that under the eyes of the overseer. In fact the overseer owns a share of the weir, if I am rightly informed, where this is done. I have the persons' names to corroborate this if necessary. The catch of herrings for bait and for export as a consequence of this ruthless waste and destruction will in the course of a few years be a thing of the past, and with the scarcity of bait-fishes the failure of the line fisheries follows as a natural sequence. Reports from all parts of the two provinces, calling the attention of the Minister can be found in his report for 1893. Most of these report the herring fishing yearly declining. At page 102 of the departmental report for 1893, Mr. Bertram reports :

Herring are the first fish to visit our shores in the spring and upon this run, the cod and lobster fishermen largely depend for bait. These fish are much inferior to the mid-summer run, which command $2.50 and $3 per barrel more than either spring or fall herring and are used largely for home consumption by all classes. It is in these fish that the greatest decrease has taken place, being 4,105 barrels, each county contributing to the decrease. The cause for the absence of summer herring during the past two years cannot be accounted for. Herring are known to be sensitive to stormy weather and during storms make for deep water. Both this season and last just as they were making their appearance on the coast heavy east and north-east storms occurred lasting for several days. It may be that these storms caused the fish to return to deep water, thus resulting the failure the statistics for the past two seasons indicate.

The loss of this branch of the fishery is seriously felt by our people.

At page 222 of the report, Mr. Wakeham says :

The catch of herring has again been small, though these fish were more than usually constant for bait purposes, all through the season, on the south coast, yet the spring catch at the Magdalen Islands was below the average, and the fall fishing on the Labrador was a complete failure. Small fat herring were very abundant along the coast of Gaspé in December; they were only taken for local use. These small fat fish are not found at any other season, save when the ice is making along shore in the months of November and December; they are undoubtedly, as far as quality and flavour is concerned, far and away ahead of any other run of herring, but they never reach the market.

The following reports appear with reference to the fishery in the province of Quebec :—

Overseer L. E. Grondin reports an increase in the yield of salmon and sardines, but a considerable shortage in herring. The latter he attributes to the prevalence of porpoise around the coast at that time. The total yield is valued at $15,000, being a difference of $9,000 less than the season of 1892.

Mr. Grondin also collected the statistics of fisheries for the neighbouring division in the vicinity of Rimouski. There also, all kinds of fish make a favourable showing with the exception of herring, which entirely failed. The total yield of ex-Overseer Martin's division is valued at about $7,000.

Overseer Napoléon Levesque reports a great diminution in the yield of the fisheries of the district as compared with the season of 1892. This is especially noticeable in herring and coarse fish. In fact, the total value only amounts to $8,400, a decrease of over 80 per cent.

Overseer Xavier Pelletier also returns a large decrease in the yield of the fisheries of his division. Where he reported nearly 500 barrels of herrings in 1892, this year he only returns 11 barrels. The shad fishery was also a failure; but a fair catch of salmon was effected at St. Denis, 96 white whales, (marsouins) were captured at River Onelle. The whole catch of fish is completed at a value of $12,000.

NORTH SHORE, RIVER ST. LAWRENCE, FROM QUEBEC TO BERSIMIS.

Overseer L. P. Huot reports the past fishing season as generally satisfactory. The slight decrease noticed in salmon, shad and whitefish is ascribed to the smaller number of men engaged in those fisheries. Eels, the staple fish of this division, were plentiful, their yield exceeding 200,000 pounds, a surplus of 63,000 pounds over the catch of the previous year. Pickerel also shows a large increase. The fishery laws were well observed. The total yield of the fisheries of this district, valued at $18,000 (an increase of 50 per cent over that of last season) is all disposed of on the local markets of Quebec City and vicinity.

Overseer Ulysse Bhéreur reports the salmon fishery of his district as steadily declining, in fact only 500 pounds were taken this season. The yield of the herring and sardine fisheries was the smallest on record in this district. No sufficient reasons are given for this discrepancy.

In regard to the second part of my motion, I intend calling the attention of the Minister to the somewhat invidious manner in which the interests of the weir-owners and of the vessel fishermen conflict, and I will say that some Act should be enacted, or some allowance made, whereby fishermen would be permitted to set their nets at Two Island Harbour during the close season for the purpose of obtaining bait. This might be done under the superintendence of the fishery overseer. Some vessels, with their crews, were seized and fines imposed during last season for catching herrings for bait only. This seemed very hard to them, more especially as the weirs were allowed to take all the herrings they wished, and that these weirs should be licensed while they were forbidden, does seem to be somewhat strange. I trust that the Minister will take these matters into his very serious consideration, and grant the small boons asked for by the fishermen of that part of the province which I have the honour to represent, as also to take immediate steps for the better preservation of the herring fisheries of the Bay of Fundy.

Motion agreed to.

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND RAILWAY.

Mr. PERRY moved for :

Copies of all correspondence between the Minister of Railways and the Rev. A. E. Burke and others, having reference to the moving of the flag station from Mill River, on the Prince Edward Island Railway, to Howlan Road, and all telegrams and documents having reference to the same, as well as all petitions, &c., against the removal of said flag station.

He said : Mr. Speaker, in making this motion I ask the indulgence of the House, while I make a few remarks. The Mill River flag station is situated on the Prince Edward Island Railway, about half way between Duvar Road and Howlan Road. These two roads run in parallel lines from east to west ; there are about 40 settlers on Duvar Road and about 50 on Howlan Road. The Mill River flag station was established about 20 years ago, about the time the Island railway was completed, for the accommodation of two lumber mills, owned by the Messrs. Haywood Brothers. They bought 1,500 or 2,000 acres of wood land at Mill River, and built these two mills, and they have been carrying on the manufacture of lumber ever since, so that this flag station was a great accommodation to them. We have no way of ascertaining exactly the amount of freight which the railway has obtained by carrying the lumber of these mills to places where it has been required, because Mill River station was not a booking station. I suppose the freight would have to be paid at the place of destination, wherever the lumber went, and I believe it was sent to different places all the way from Tignish to Summerside. About 100 carloads, I think, are shipped annually from Mill River station, of which about 80 carloads go from the mills of Messrs. Haywood Bros. Now, this is an item of great importance. Each of these carloads would average about $10, which would be $800 contributed to earnings of the Prince Edward Island Railway by the mills alone. From Howlan Road, so far as I can ascertain, about 12 carloads have gone, and from Duvar Road about 8 carloads, which would make about the quantity I have mentioned. Now, I am not prepared to say that the people of Howlan Road should not have station accommodation. I dare say they have a right to it ; but why should the Department of Railways rob Peter to pay Paul ? If it was necessary to have a station at Howlan Road, why not build one there and leave the one at Mill River where it was ? But it happens that Messrs. Haywood, unfortunately for them, I suppose, are not Tories, but Liberals, and they have made no secret of the fact that at the last election they voted for myself and my colleague against Messrs. Howlan and Hunt, the Government candidates, and I suppose this is the reason why this station has been removed. If this is the way the Government expect to gain votes in Prince Edward Island at the next general election they are making a sad mistake. When these papers are brought down, as I hope they will be shortly, it will be amusing to see the names of the parties who have signed the requisition for the removal of the station. We shall find that many of the gentlemen who signed the requisition are living at great distances from the station, and have no personal or business relations at either Howlan Road, Mill River or Duvar Road. I understand that the people at Duvar Road have made application to the Department of Railways for a station there. Hitherto they have been accommodated by the Mill River station. I am not certain that that petition has ever reached the department ; I think, perhaps, it has not. I know it has been drawn and signed, and I know that a request has been made to send it ; but perhaps they were told : " You had better not send it just now ; if you do, you will be looking for two stations, where there is only one. I am sure that the removal of this station is against the interests of the Island Railway. I have been told that the superintendent of Government Railways, Mr. Pottinger, was sent to make a report to the Department of Railways on the subject; but I am sure that he did not recommend the removal of the station from Mill River, because it would be against the interest of the railway. But as a punishment the Messrs. Haywood Bros. are compelled to haul their lumber a mile or a mile and a half from their mill to the place of shipping, and what will be the result? The result will be that the consumers of this lumber throughout the country will have to pay an extra sum in order to indemnify the mill-owners for the extra expense to which they have been put by the imprudence of the Government. Now, the people of Duvar Road will no doubt look for station accommodation at their road, and they have just as good a right to it as the people of Howlan Road. Why did not the Department of Railways apply to myself and Mr. Yeo, who are the representatives of the county? I know it is not satisfactory to the Government that we should be here, but the people's wish is supreme, however unsatisfactory to the Government, and it is a small piece of business on the part of the Government to show their displeasure and disappointment in this way. From 300 to 400 men are employed, getting out the lumber, hauling it and manufacturing it, in the mills, into boards, shingles and laths. The industry of these men should be fostered instead of impeded by being cut off from the accommodation they had previously enjoyed and which their industry requires. But because some busybodies, forsooth, whispered into the ear of the Minister of Railways that these men did not vote for the Government candidates, but voted against Messrs. Howlan and Hunt, they are to be deprived of this accommodation. What a great crime it was to vote against Messrs. Howlan and Hunt? How did they come to get the monopoly of the votes of the people of Prince County? But let me tell the Government that neither Mr. Howlan nor anybody else can force the electors of that county to vote subserviently to the dictates of the Government. The people of that county are independent and have minds of their own. Perhaps they have not made the best selection. They might have made a better selection than myself and my colleague, but at all events that is their business and not the business of the Government, and the Government have no right to dictate to them how they are going to vote, and bring coercion to bear on them because they choose to exercise freely their political proclivities. A good portion of the passenger traffic has been contributed by the employes of those mills, many of whom live from 5 to 20 miles distant, and go home every Saturday evening, returning to their work Monday morning. Besides, there is a large lumber traffic hauled over the road from these two mills yearly. I believe the traffic of the Mill River has been about a thousand dollars a year, and perhaps more, which went into the exchequer of the Prince Edward Island Railway. Now, however, these people are cut off, and will have to employ teams and double teams to haul this lumber to a shipping point, and the consequence will be that the consumer, the poor farmer and fisherman, will have to pay extra in order to indemnify the mill-owners for the additional cost they have been put to through the action of the Minister of Railways. I trust that these papers will be brought down without delay. They are already written in the department, and I shall not take "no" for an answer, but shall insist on having the papers at once. I wish to be in a position to let the electors of Prince County know who they are who are so much interested in opposing the interests of the people and the welfare of the county. I wish to know how many miles some of them live from the Howlan Road and the Mill River Duvar road, and would like to know what interest they have in causing all this mystery and mischief. The time ought to be passed when men should be ostracised because they happen to be in opposition to the present Government. I am not finding fault with the Government for appointing their friends to office. Neither I nor any of my supporters expect any office from them, but we expect justice, though it is difficult to expect justice from an Administration which has given so many instances of wrong-doing. A more glaring case has not come before the House for years than that brought up by the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Brodeur) to-day, in which a man was condemned and hanged, his character destroyed, and all this without a trial, on the mere word of a Government inspector, and to all appearances because he did not vote for the Government candidate. It is the same in the matter of the Mill River case. Because the people did not choose to support the Government, they are to be deprived of the accommodations which they are entitled to, and which they have hitherto enjoyed.

Mr. YEO. I do not know what the reasons were which induced the department to remove the flag station from Mill River, but in my judgment a great mistake was made and a great injustice inflicted on the people in that locality. The people who live in the immediate neighbourhood of Mill River station have erected mills and carry on quite an industry there. As my hon. friend has explained, there are two roads running parallel with each other, Howlan Road and Duvar Road, and these are connected by the Mill River Road. The flag station formerly was about midway between the two—I think some five chains nearer Howlan than Duvar Road, but in a place convenient for both. When the railway was built it was thought that Mill River was the most suitable place for the flag station, and there it was placed and there it remained until some time during last December. I think the removal of the flag station was commenced about the 13th of December, just about the time of the Prince Edward Island election. I do not know whether this was done to influence the voters, but it would seem rather suggestive. I think about four-fifths of the traffic was supplied by the Mill River people, and about three-quarters of the passenger travel was from Mill River and consisted principally of the parties who owned the mills and their employees. If it were thought necessary to give the people residing on Howlan Road a flag station, I would like to see them get it, but I do not want to see them get it at the expense of the people who have enjoyed it heretofore. I do not think that the people who reside on Howlan Road would ask that they should be furnished with a flag station if, in order to grant their request, it was necessary to deprive the people of Mill River of the station they had. The Minister of Railways, in replying to a question asked by my colleague a few days ago, stated that the flag station was removed in consequence of a petition, and named a gentleman who resides fifteen miles away and who cannot possibly know the wants of the people as well as those living in the neighbourhood. The people at Mill River have built up a property there; they have, I think, two steam mills and a water mill or two. They have built up that property expecting that the station which they have always had would be left there. I do not suppose its removal ever entered their thoughts, and I think it would have been only fair to these parties, before the removal took place, to have given them some intimation that such a step was being considered. Of course we shall know better when the papers come down, but I cannot for a moment suppose that any one residing in Prince Edward Island in connection with the railway would recommend this change, and the people engaged in carrying on the work of that railway ought to be better able to judge in a matter of this kind than those who know little or nothing about railways. My own opinion is if they were consulted they would say that Mill River is the proper place for the flag station, or if it is necessary to construct another station for Howlan Road, by all means do so. I asked the hon. Minister of Railways a few evenings ago whether any application had been made for a flag station at Duvar Road, and his reply was there had not. If such is the case, if the department do not intend to place a flag station on Duvar Road, they will inflict a great injustice on those people, as well as on those at Mill River; it will make them travel half a mile further than they have been accustomed to do to reach the station. I know that some of the parties living on the Howlan Road, if the question were put to them, would say they would much prefer, if only one flag station is to be established, to have it at Mill River. One gentleman, who receives as much freight, if not more than any one who is living on the Howlan road, told me since the change was made that he had ordered his freight to be left at a railway station two miles distant. I do not know whether the political opinion of the men who live near Mill River has anything to do with this change. I hope it has not. I hope the Department of Railways, as well as every other department of the public service, looks more to the interest of the public than to benefiting supporters of the Government. I cannot think that the Minister of Railways would allow himself to be influenced by such considerations. I am afraid there is too much of that kind of thing in our public service, and, if such is the case in this instance, I think, in the general interest, the sooner a new departure is made the better. I beg leave to second the motion, and, in doing so, to express the hope that the Minister of Railways—whom I am sorry not to see in his place to-night—when he has had the opportunity of looking into the papers, will reconsider the matter and order the flag station to be opened again at Mill River. I do not ask that the station should be removed from Howlan Road. If these people want that accommodation and the Railway Department see fit to give it to them, I shall be only too delighted to see them accommodated. I do not want to see any part of the country benefit at the very serious expense of another, and, as these parties have done so much in supplying freight and passenger traffic to the railway, I hope and trust the Minister of Railways will take the question into his very serious consideration and order the flag station at Mill River to be reopened.

Motion agreed to.

DISTRIBUTION OF THE INDIAN DEPARTMENTAL REPORTS.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant) moved:

That it is desirable that three hundred extra copies of the Report of the Department of the Indian Affairs be printed yearly, and sent from the distribution office as soon as issued to the various Tribes or Bands of Indians having Trust Funds in the hands of the Government, such distribution to be in proportion to population, and sent to the different Councils and Local Superintendents for the use of the Indians, and that all future reports of the Department shall contain the items of expenditure from the funds of each such Tribe or Band during the year.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the reports of all the departments are of public interest, and this fact is recognized by the printing of a sufficient number to supply members of the House for their own use and also to furnish some extra copies for distribution.

While the same number of the Department of Indian Affairs is printed, it will be obvious to the House that the Indian tribes or bands have a special interest in this report, and I think are entitled to consideration at the hands of the House. As is well known, many of those tribes or bands have large trust funds in the hands of the Government, and the report of the Department of Indian Affairs gives a report of those funds, and, in a limited measure, the manner in which they are dealt with, and the expenditure connected therewith. I know for my own part that many of those Indian bands are anxious to have the reports, so as to know how their affairs are conducted, and what is done with their funds. As far as my own county is concerned, where there is a large and intelligent band of Indians, I have endeavoured to give them all the reports of which I was able to avail myself. The Superintendent General of Indian Affairs usually kindly seconding my efforts in that direction by giving me extra copies. But still there is not enough of them to satisfy what I think is a fairly reasonable demand on their part; and I think it would only be the proper thing for the department to second the efforts of the member that may have the honour of representing a county in which any of these bands are situated, by seeing that the report should go to them as a matter of right. In thinking the matter over I have placed the extra copies which I think it is desirable should be printed, at some 300. Whether that would be enough, I cannot say; at any rate it would be an improvement on what we have at the present time. The extra cost would be a very small matter; I suppose that when the report is in print the extra expense entailed by the printing of these 300 extra copies, would probably not be more than $40 or $50 at the outside. The suggestion that these shall be sent from the distribution office, according to population, and sent to the different councils and local superintendents for the use of the Indians, is, I think, the best and fairest way of making the distribution. As the Minister knows, the population of these various tribes or bands varies a good deal, and the number of the members of the council differs very much; there may be from five to perhaps 40 or 50, or even more, in the council of the Six Nations, which are in the county of Brant. My idea was that each of the councillors, at any rate, should be possessed of a copy, and that there should be several extra copies in the council house which could be distributed amongst them, or made use of by other members of the band taking interest in the affairs of the band, and that a certain number also might be sent to the office of the local superintendent, who should be instructed to allow their perusal by any of those under his charge who might desire to make use of them, or that he might distribute them in his wisdom among those who might ask for them and to whom they would be of value. So much for the first part of my proposition. The second part is that all future reports of the department shall contain the items of expenditure from the funds of each tribe or band during the year. For some years past the department seems to have departed somewhat from following this course. It was done more fully in previous years, but lately, for some reason or another, the information has been curtailed, and this year I was forced myself to ask for two special returns to elicit the information which it was right and proper that the Indians in my own riding should have, in reference to the expenditure of their funds. I am one of those who believes that it is very desirable that no special returns should be asked for in this House that can possibly be avoided, and I think this will be a means of saving expense and time and trouble; and for that reason I suggest in my resolution that in the future the items of expenditure out of the trust funds of these various tribes shall be printed in the Minister's report, so that when these reports are sent to the various tribes or bands they may have before them an account of the stewardship of the Superintendent General in the management of their affairs, giving them, not only the amount of the balance of their funds on hand, but the amount of those funds that has been expended during the year, giving the items of expenditure, and what it was incurred for, &c. When we remember that we are but the trustees of the Indian funds, it will strike every one, and I am sure no one more strongly than the Minister himself, that it is but right and proper that those whose funds are being dealt with by the department should be given the fullest information with reference to the disposition of these funds. Feeling that the resolution is a very reasonable one, with these few words of explanation, I beg to place it in your hands.

Mr. DALY. I may say for the information of the hon. gentleman and the House that upon reference to the reports of the Department of Indian Affairs it will be found that we publish there the accounts of some 177 bands for whom the Government hold trust funds. It is true that the details are not given, it is simply the balances on hand at the last fiscal year, and the receipts, expenditures and balances on hand at the end of the present fiscal year. The reason the details of receipts and expenditures are not given, is that they appear in the Auditor General's Report, and to place them in the report of the department would expand the volume very considerably. It was not thought necessary that we should publish more than is being published at the present time. The hon. gentleman will see that it would extend our report considerably if we were to include in it the accounts of 177 bands. Of course the items in some would be much more numerous than in others, and it was simply for reasons of economy that the items were not added, and it was thought that for all purposes the appearance of those items in the Auditor General's Report would be quite sufficient. From information I have received from the department since the hon. gentleman's notice was placed on the Paper, I learn that the department have somewhat anticipated the hon. gentleman's idea by suggesting the distribution of 200 extra copies over and above what have been distributed in the past. This number will be sufficient to meet the desire of the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Paterson) and, at the same time, the view of the department, because, in times past, a detailed statement of each account was sent to the Indian Superintendent, to be kept by him in his office for inspection by such Indians as might apply. But since the publication of the statement respecting the tribal funds, this has been abandoned, and a number of copies have been sent for distribution among the chiefs and head men among the different tribes. The department is of the opinion that it would be better to obtain an extra number of copies, over and above the 500, to which we are entitled under the Order in Council passed in January, 1893, and that 200 is sufficient to supply all extra copies required for the Indians, although, of course, there is no objection to 300 copies being distributed if it is thought necessary. I would ask the mover to strike out the words, "From the distribution office," and the motion will be taken as an instruction to the department. In regard to the closing portion of the hon. gentleman's motion, I have already pointed out why I do not think it would be well to carry out the idea suggested, on account of the extra expense that would be involved in printing when the details already appear in the Auditor General's Report. In order to overcome the difficulty, I would undertake that a certain number of copies of the Auditor General's Report should be sent to Indians who desire to see the details. The First Minister suggests that as the Auditor General's Report is so bulky, that portion of the hon. gentleman's motion should be allowed to remain.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I am glad the Minister has received the motion in such a friendly spirit. The expenditure for the additional 300 copies will not be much, and that number of copies will be required. The hon. Minister is not aware how anxious the Indians are to see copies of the reports connected with their funds. It will be much preferable to have these statements embodied in the report of the Indian Department rather than have copies of the Auditor General's Report supplied.

Mr. DALY. Let the motion pass, striking out only the words, "From the Distribution Office."

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

RETURNS ORDERED.

Copies of all correspondence, contracts, leases, &c., in relation to the purchase or to the leasing of a property for the purposes of the post office of St. Roche de Quebec.—(Mr. Choquette.)

Also, quantity and value of yarns, of wool and worsted, imported into Canada, free of duty, for use of manufacturers in each year since 1887, under provisions of Order in Council of 11th July, 1888. Also, quantity and value of jute yarn, cotton yarn finer than No. 40; and wire of iron or steel galvanized or tinned, or coppered, or not, of No. 16 gauge or smaller, into Canada, free of duty in each year since 1887, under provisions of Order in Council of 11th July, 1888.—(Mr. Charlton.)

Copies of all communications or petitions addressed to the Minister of Railways, or to any other Minister, by the parishes of St. Jacques, St. Alexis, St. Esprit and St. Marie Solomé, in the county of Montcalm, respecting the locating of the railway called "The Great Northern Railway": also copies of all answers made to said petitions or to any other letters or communications received.—(Mr. Tarte.)

1. Copies of all correspondence between the Department of Railways, the Minister of Public Works and any other persons in relation to sections 12 and 13 of the Soulanges Canal. 2. Copies of the call for tenders and of all tenders received. 3. Copies of contracts awarded.—(Mr. Tarte.)

Correspondence during the past three years, between the Government, or any of its members, and any Company or other person, in relation to the establishment of a steamship line between France and Canada.—(Mr. Tarte.)

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. EDGAR. I really must ask the hon. First Minister if it is not a rather early hour to adjourn at so late a period of the session. There is a motion ready to come which will not be a contentious one, and on which the discussion will not be very long, and it is only half past nine o'clock. We have only one day in the week left for motions, and there are a great many on the Paper. I think the First Minister should take this matter into consideration.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I think it would be very unfair to ask the House to discuss the question of universal peace at half-past nine o'clock, and the probability is that if the motion was taken up the debate would be adjourned, and the motion would be placed in a much less favourable position than it occupies now, at the head of the list.

Motion agreed to; and the House adjourned at 9.30 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, 15th May, 1894.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 111) to amend the Insurance Act—(from the Senate).—(Sir John Thompson.)

Bill (No. 112) respecting the arrest, trial and imprisonment of youthful offenders—(from the Senate).—(Sir John Thompson.)

Bill (No. 107) again to revive and further to amend the Act incorporating the Red Deer Valley Railway and Coal Company—(from the Senate).—(Mr. Davis, Alberta.)

Bill (No. 108) respecting the Manitoba and North-western Railway Company of Canada—(from the Senate).—(Mr. Ross, Lisgar.)

PRIVILEGE—MR. TURCOTTE, M.P.

Mr. BRUNEAU. Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I beg to state that I am credibly informed and believe that I can establish:

First, That Arthur Joseph Turcotte, Esquire, a member of this House for the electoral district of Montmorency, and while he was a member of the House, to wit, from the eleventh day of March, eighteen hundred and ninety-two, until the first day of February, eighteen hundred and ninety-three, was a partner in the firm of Turcotte & Provost, which said firm, during said period, held, enjoyed and executed a contract with or for the Government of Canada, on behalf of the Crown, in the name of Jean Baptiste Provost, one of the members of the said firm, for which public money of Canada has been paid to the said firm and to the said Arthur Joseph Turcotte, a member of said firm, which said contract was for the supply of groceries and similar goods for the use of the Militia Department at Quebec;

Second, That the said Arthur Joseph Turcotte, while a member of this House, to wit, from or about the first day of February, eighteen hundred and ninety-three, until the first day of February, eighteen hundred and ninety-four, was carrying on business for his own benefit in the city of Quebec under the firm name of "Turcotte & Provost," and during said period he held, enjoyed and carried out a contract with or for the Government of Canada, on behalf of the Crown, which said contract stood in the name of Jean Baptiste Provost, but was in reality held for the sole use and benefit of the said Arthur Joseph Turcotte, and large sums of the public money of Canada were paid under said contract to the said Arthur Joseph Turcotte, and, although the cheques were issued therefor to the said Jean Baptiste Provost, the proceeds thereof were received by the said Arthur Joseph Turcotte, which said contract was also for the supply of groceries and similar goods for the use of the Militia Department at Quebec;

Third, That the said Arthur Joseph Turcotte, while a member of this House, to wit, from on or about the first day of February, eighteen hundred and ninety-four, to on or about the first day of April, eighteen hundred and ninety-four, was carrying on business for his own benefit at Quebec under the firm name of "A. J. Turcotte & Co." and during said period he held, enjoyed and carried out a contract with or for the Government of Canada, on behalf of the Crown, which said contract stood in the name of Jean Baptiste Provost, but was in reality held for the sole use and benefit of the said Arthur Joseph Turcotte, and large sums of the public money of Canada were paid under said contract to said Arthur Joseph Turcotte, and the benefit thereof was received by the said Arthur Joseph Turcotte, which said contract was also for the supply of groceries and similar goods for the use of the Militia Department at Quebec;

Fourth, That the said Arthur Joseph Turcotte, while a member of this House some time in the year eighteen hundred and ninety-three, was interested in contracts and agreements with the Department of Marine and Fisheries for the Government of Canada, on behalf of the Crown, and large sums of the public money of Canada were paid under said contracts and were received by the said Arthur Joseph Turcotte, which said contracts were for the supply of groceries and similar goods for the use of the Department of Marine and Fisheries.

I therefore move :

That the matters stated be referred to the Select Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections to inquire fully into the said allegations, with power to send for persons, papers and records, and to examine witnesses upon oath or affirmation, and that the said committee do report the result of their inquiries, and whether the said Arthur Joseph Turcotte has vacated his seat.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The motion which the hon. gentleman has made is undoubtedly one relating to privileges, and is therefore entitled to urgency ; but the usual practice of the House in such matters is to have the matter stand over for a day or two until the paper can be printed and appear in the Votes and Proceedings. From the reading of it at the Table, not three members of the House know what it is.

Mr. LAURIER. I have no objection to the matter standing over. My hon. friend purposely did not give notice, because last year, when my hon. friend behind me (Mr. Edgar) gave notice it was held to be no longer a question of privilege, and had to take its place on the Order paper. Will this be taken up to-morrow or the day after ?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The day after. The case the hon. gentleman referred to was the case of putting a motion on the paper, and then it could not be taken up as a question of urgency.

Mr. LAURIER. It will stand as a notice of motion for the day after to-morrow.

THE CATTLE TRADE.

Mr. MULOCK. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would ask the Government to be good enough to expedite the carrying out of the order of the House of Monday last for copies of correspondence between the Government and certain parties named in the order respecting the cattle trade—the embargo imposed on the cattle trade in Great Britain, and so on. The particulars of the order appear in the Votes and Proceedings, page 210. I am desirous of that order being complied with at the earliest possible moment, in order that I may deal with the matter involved, and I would be grateful to the Government if they would expedite it.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It will be expedited. What is the page ?

Mr. MULOCK. 210, the lowest order, commencing with :

Copies of correspondence between J. B. Wright and the Government.

PRIVILEGE—NEWSPAPER CRITICISM.

Mr. McMULLEN. I find in the Halifax 'Herald' this notice :

McMullen denounced the Government for allowing fishermen's supplies to the amount of nearly half a million of dollars to be admitted free of duty. He wanted to know why the fishermen should be thus favoured at the expense of the farmers.

I must say that the gentleman in the gallery who penned those words and sent them to the Halifax 'Herald' must have known he was penning what is a barefaced falsehood. I made no such statement in the House. These are the words I used :

I would like to ask the hon. gentleman if it is not as necessary to cultivate the soil of this country as to fish in its waters? If so, why are not the farmers allowed to bring in free rope to make lines for tying their horses and cattle, for which purposes an enormous quantity is used? But the farmers have to bear the brunt of this beautiful tariff.

I contended then, as I do now, and as I have done every time this question of the tariff has been before the House, that the necessities of life should be made as free as possible for the farmers and fishermen, and duties put upon goods that are luxuries.

INQUIRIES FOR RETURNS.

Mr. McDONALD (Huron): Before the Orders of the Day are called, Mr. Speaker, I would ask the Government if they can tell me when I may expect the return giving the names of the members of the Ontario Legislature who received money for services performed under the Dominion Government since 1879, and also the members and ex-members of the Legislature who have received appointments from the Dominion Government since 1879 ?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It will take some months yet. We have to ascertain the names of all these members of the Legislature, and to look through all the Public Accounts for fifteen years past.

Mr. McMULLEN. I would like to ask if it will take some months to prepare the return I asked for six weeks ago—of the amounts of money paid to Mr. Wood, M.P.P. for Hastings, by the Dominion Government within the last three years ?

Mr. HAGGART. That return will be down this week.

REVISION OF VOTERS' LISTS.

Mr. LAURIER. I would call the attention of the Prime Minister to the fact that we are within fifteen days of the period fixed by law for the commencement of the revision of the voters' lists. I understand that no instructions have been given to the revising officers on the subject up to the present moment. I gather from a casual observation made by the Prime Minister that it was the intention of the Government to bring in a Bill this session to amend the Franchise Act. I would like to ask whether it is the intention of the Government that revisions shall take place under the present system, or whether the law is to be amended in that respect?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The revision is to take place under the present system. The reason no instructions have been given to the revising officers is that there has been no intention to give any; the revising officers are expected to carry out the law which obliges them to begin the revision on the 1st of June. I explained yesterday, in the absence of the Secretary of State, that instructions had been given to those revising officers recently appointed, but in no other case have instructions been given. In previous years instructions have been given only when it was the intention of the Government to have the revision postponed. It is intended that the revision shall take place under the present system, and the Bill to be introduced will not make any changes in the system, but will make provision for the case of those districts the boundaries of which have been changed in the Redistribution Act which goes into force at the next general election. That is the only material change.

Mr. LAURIER. That is all?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I would like to add a word. I do not wish to consider myself bound by the statement that that is all. That is all that I am aware of at present.

Mr. LAURIER. Of course I am quite aware that the intentions of the Government may change from time to time—I need hardly be reminded of that.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I would ask the hon. gentleman to let that stand for a few days.

NORTH-WEST TERRITORIES ACT AMENDMENT.

House again resolved itself into Committee on Bill (No. 5) further to amend the North-west Territories Act.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. DALY. Mr. Chairman, I have one or two amendments I propose making in the Bill. In order to meet the difficulties pointed out by the hon. leader of the Opposition with reference to section 64 of the Dominion Elections Act, I propose to insert a clause in the Bill to the following effect:—

The application provided for by section 64 of the Dominion Elections Act and by subsections added thereto by section 11, chap. 18 of the Statutes of 1891, shall, in the North-west Territories, be made to any judge in the said Territories.

The reason for that is, that the Act as at present, provides for a recount being had on an application to the judge of any judicial district, and as, in the North-west the judicial districts are not coterminous with the electoral districts, it seems to me best to provide that application may be made to any judge of the Supreme Court of the Territories.

Mr. MARTIN. I would suggest that it should read:

To any judge within whose district the whole or any part of the electoral district is situated.

The other, it seems to me, would be a very inconvenient provision, because, for instance, in an election in Eastern Assiniboia an application might be made to Judge Rouleau at Calgary.

Mr. DALY. It is not likely.

Mr. MARTIN. I do not know about that. It seems to me there should be some limitation, and that could be made by providing that applications should be made to the judge within whose district part or whole of the electoral district is situated. An applicant should not have the right of selection among all the judges in the North-west Territories.

Mr. DALY. If the hon. gentleman will look at section 64, he will see that application must be made within four days after the day on which the returning officer has made final addition of votes. There would not be time to apply to a judge at Calgary in a case arising at Eastern Assiniboia as the hon. gentleman has suggested.

Mr. MARTIN. I am not sure about that. This gives one party the right to select a judge. Both parties should be obliged to go to the same judge. If the hon. gentleman will put in that a limitation that there must be some part of the constituency within the territorial limits of the judge, then perhaps it would be confined to one of the two judges.

Mr. DAVIN. The inconvenience suggested by the Minister of the Interior might occur, if the suggestion of the hon. member for Winnipeg were adopted, but I think the object both have in view might be attained by a slight modification. For instance, the hon. member for Winnipeg is afraid that an applicant for a recount in Eastern or Western Assiniboia might apply to the judge at Calgary. Suppose we take a voter in Eastern Assiniboia, in the Qu'Appelle district, who is a supporter of my hon. friend (Mr. Macdonald), and he wants a recount. It would be much cheaper and more convenient, as the hon. member for Winnipeg knows, for him to apply to Mr. Justice Richardson in Regina, which is in my constituency; and I think the object might be attained if words were added to say that an applicant for a recount shall apply to any judge of the Supreme Court, but that he shall always apply to a judge whose residence is nearest to his own habitat—or some words to that effect. I think that would meet the view that my hon. friend from Winnipeg wants to have carried out, and it would also meet the objection of the Minister of the Interior.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I think the prime difficulty is that this is a provision conferring jurisdiction. If the suggestion of the hon. member for Winnipeg be carried out, no judge will have jurisdiction excepting one whose judicial district includes the electoral district or part of it. If that judge should happen to be away, there would be no judge in the Territories having jurisdiction. Take, for example, an election contest in the riding of West Assiniboia. Here are all the judges sitting in Regina, except Judge Richardson, who happens to be away from the country on leave, and of all the judges there, not one of them would have jurisdiction.

Mr. MULOCK. You can confer jurisdiction on all of them; but then you could go on and say that the application should first of all be made to the nearest judge, the judge who resides in the electoral district, or nearest to the one in respect of which the election is in question. Moreover, if several judges have concurrent jurisdiction, you may have this difficulty arising, that an application made to one judge for a recount may be granted, and another application made to another judge may be refused; or you may have several judges at the same time issuing an order for a recount.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. You never can get through any judicial proceeding, if the judges interfere with each other's judicial work, as they would be doing in that case. If the Act be passed as it is drafted now, no judge in the Territories will undertake to exercise jurisdiction within the jurisdiction of another judge, unless some reason be assigned for it. There is the case of absence on leave; there is the case of absence under ordinary circumstances for a few days, as on an excursion to the country, illness, or any of those cases. You are dealing with the matter of jurisdiction, and I think, if you want to make it perfectly safe that there shall be a recount, the better way is to give jurisdiction to all the judges and trust to the ordinary courtesy of the Bench that the judges shall not interfere with each other.

Mr. MARTIN. That objection as to absence on leave applies to jurisdiction in other parts of Canada, where application must be made to the county judge in which the electoral district or any part thereof is situated. I see no reason why a different law should prevail in the Territories to that prevailing in other parts of Canada, except that arising from the fact that the distances are greater.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The hon. gentleman will see that, as regards county judges, we have other provisions which give jurisdiction to judges in the neighbourhood, or a special judge, in every case where a judge is absent, or ill. These judges in the North-west Territories are not confined in their ordinary jurisdiction to the judicial district in which they live. They have full jurisdiction in every part of the Territories, and therefore we will be but following the ordinary course in giving them the same kind of jurisdiction.

On section 4,

Mr. DALY. I propose to amend this section so that in the sections and parts of sections, or forms in which the words "revising officer" occur, shall be read as if the word "enumerator" were substituted for the said words.

Mr. MARTIN. Is there any reason why section 42, chapter 8, should not apply to the Territories? It prohibits judges voting, also revising officers and election clerks.

Mr. DALY. It is met by section 46, under which no person can vote unless his name is on the list.

Mr. MARTIN. There is nothing to prevent a judge having his name placed on the list?

Mr. DALY. No.

Mr. MULOCK. But the Franchise Act was to secure uniformity.

Mr. MARTIN. The hon. gentleman is practically making the whole of chapter 8 apply to the Territories, except as regards section 42. The judges, I suppose, would not vote in any case. The best way would be to make the whole applicable.

Mr. DALY. I do not think the whole of section 42 is applicable. It specially refers to revising officers. I am ready to prepare a clause in special reference to judges voting.

Mr. MARTIN. The clause itself would apply all right, because the hon. gentleman has already a clause where the revising officers are referred to as meaning enumerators.

Mr. DALY. The revising officer would be only one man whose vote would be lost in an electoral district, while there would be dozens of enumerators in such districts.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I think the hon. gentleman will find that as regards these persons the section has been repealed or suspended. There was a declaratory Act passed, I think, in 1887, stating that those persons should have the right to vote.

Mr. MARTIN. Surely it is not intended that the enumerators should vote?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Certainly.

Mr. MARTIN. Or that the revising officer should vote?

Mr. DALY. No.

Mr. MARTIN. It seems to me that this legislation is not based on the right principle. If it is wrong for a revising officer to vote in a constituency in Ontario, why should an enumerator vote in a constituency in the North-west Territories? Both these officials are supposed to be judges in a sense. The enumerators are entrusted with the independent task of making a voters' list, and if the revising officers are forbidden to vote, I do not see why the enumerators should vote?

Mr. DAVIN. There is a complete difference between the position of the revising officer and the position of the enumerator. The enumerator is sent out to take the names of persons in a certain district, who ought to vote under the Act, and if we were to disfranchise them, we would, I think, do a very great wrong. The enumerators are not in the position of revising officers. If they put a man on the list or leave a man off, it is not final; because a man can go to the poll and make a declaration that he has fulfilled all the qualifications, and he has a right to vote whether the enumerator puts him on the list or not. The enumerator is not in the position of a judge, whereas a revising officer in Ontario to a certain extent is.

Mr. MARTIN. If it makes no difference whether the enumerator puts a man on or off the list, why in the name of common sense do you have enumerators at all? If it makes no difference whether their duties are performed or not, why do you have them?

Mr. DAVIN. I am surprised at the futility of my hon. friend's objection to my argument, because he is a North-west man himself in a sense, and he knows something about the country. If every man who came up to vote had to be sworn we never could take the vote in one day, or even in two or three days. You must have an enumerator to give you the list of those entitled to vote. If the enumerator has left a man off the list, he really has not adjudicated him off, nor does he adjudicate in the case of a man who goes on the list, because every man who goes on the list can be sworn as to whether he fulfils the conditions to qualify him to vote or not.

Mr. MARTIN. Before this Bill is reported, I would like to say a word or two with regard to the previous discussion which we had upon it. I had then occasion to refer to what I might call the bumptious manner in which the hon. Minister of the Interior met the suggestions I made with regard to this Bill. I made those suggestions in a good spirit with a view to getting the legislation into as perfect a state as possible, and in the course of them I referred to the fact that the elections in the Territories were now held on the same day as the elections in the other parts of Canada. The hon. Minister of the Interior, in a very bumptious and nasty way, referred me to the section of the Act which provided that those elections should be held three weeks later than the elections in the other parts of Canada, the hon. gentleman not being aware that that section had been repealed. I would be very far from commenting on what might be called the ignorance of the hon. member in a matter of that kind—something that he ought to have known when legislating upon it—had it not been for the nasty way in which he attempted to reflect on me for making a mistake, when, as a matter of fact, I had made no mistake. But at the moment, when the hon. gentleman referred me to the section, I was not in a position to turn up the amending Act which had been passed in 1888, and which made me right and the hon. Minister wrong. I think it right to say that much on the matter, and at the same time to compliment the hon. Minister of the Interior on the very much improved manner in which he has conducted this Bill to-day as compared with the manner in which he conducted it on a previous occasion. I am always prepared to discuss these little matters of detail in a friendly way with a view to getting information myself, and, if at any time I happen to be in a position to give information to the hon. member, I am most happy to do so. I am also prepared to receive as hard blows as it is possible for the Minister of the Interior to give me, as I am prepared to deliver similar blows to him, if I find myself in a position to do so. But I do not think the hon. member improves his position at all by approaching the discussion of the details of a matter like this in the very nasty and bumptious way in which he did so on the previous occasion. I wish to enter my protest against that kind of conduct, because if it is persisted in, I shall certainly resent it, and I am sure that the hon. member brings no strength or dignity to himself or to the Government or to the position he fills, by indulging in such conduct. The hon. gentleman has been reprimanded in a very public manner for the way in which he has filled his position outside of this House—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. MARTIN—and I very much regret that it becomes necessary for me to call attention in the House to the manner in which he attempts to conduct himself in the position in which he finds himself.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I object altogether to the hon. gentleman's proposition that on this question we should come to blows. He says that he is prepared to deliver hard blows and to take hard blows; but I hope we can amend this Act without any necessity for that. In fact, it would be inconsistent with the principle of the Bill, which is to keep the peace at elections, that members of the House should break the peace in discussing it. I do not think the observations of the hon. gentleman are called for at all. We always treat with the greatest respect suggestions from members of the House for the purpose of improving Bills that come before us. No one in this House possesses the combined intelligence of the whole House, and any one who has a Bill to promote will be grateful—we on this side always are—to receive suggestions from those who possess a portion of that wisdom which is not concentrated on this side of the House. Perhaps it would gratify the feelings of the hon. gentleman to put in a clause to say that no one shall be "bumptious" and "nasty," only that I think that that would be regarded by the general public as a direct reflection on himself.

Mr. MARTIN. The hon. Minister of Justice must have entirely misunderstood what I said. I spoke of blows merely in an intellectual sense. I am prepared to inflict criticisms on the Government, and I am prepared to receive from the Government the strongest kind of criticism for myself and the party with which I am connected. But I quite repudiate the suggestion that the hon. Minister has made as to bumptiousness. I think I have made my suggestions in a proper spirit, and I ask the hon. Minister of Justice if he thinks the conduct of the Minister of the Interior on the previous occasion was not bumptious?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I decidedly think it was not. There were some expressions used in a hasty way, but I am sure they were not offensive, and were not intended to be offensive to the hon. gentleman.

Bill reported.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE TARIFF.

Mr. FOSTER moved that the House again resolve itself into Committee on Ways and Means.

Motion agreed to; and House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Adzes, hatchets, picks, mattocks, track tools, wedges and crowbars of iron or steel, and hammers and sledges, 30 per cent ad valorem.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am sorry to see that the hon. gentleman is going to add largely to the duty on these articles.

Mr. FOSTER. Not very largely.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. There is already an enormous duty for such articles. I say enormous, because I regard 30 per cent as wholly indefensible, and now the hon. gentleman proposes to make the duty 35 per cent.

Mr. FOSTER. On some of them.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Picks, mattocks, track tools, wedges, and crowbars, of iron or steel—every one of these articles being largely used either by farmers or artisans—on these he proposes to add 5 per cent to the enormous duty of 30 per cent. It would be very much more to the purpose to reduce the whole to 25 per cent. On what possible ground does the hon. gentleman propose to depart from the policy of reduction to 30 per cent, and now make it 35 per cent? Hardly a more objectionable duty than that on tools can be found in the whole tariff. They are among the last things that ought to be increased.

Mr. CHARLTON. This is another illustration of the fact that some other industry has the ear of the Government, which the farmers and labourers have not. There is a list of articles in use by the farmers, miners, lumbermen, a decrease in the duty on which would be a general benefit, extending to almost all classes of society, yet the hon. gentleman proposes to raise the tariff from 30 to 35 per cent for the benefit of the special interests and to the detriment of numerous classes. The action of the hon. gentleman is clearly indefensible. Why not leave the duty where it was?

Mr. FOSTER. You have to look at these duties and the proposals now before the House in two lights—as regards the material out of which they are made, and with reference to the duties in the old tariff. These articles are made from steel and iron, which are protected, and the duty it is proposed to put upon them at present, taken in connection with the materials of which they are made, is not a relatively high duty. Taken in connection, comparatively, with the duties as they were before, there is, in almost every instance, a decrease or, at least, no increase. Adzes and hatchets 35 per cent before, it is proposed to keep at that rate. Picks, mattocks, track tools, wedges and crowbars, of iron or steel, old duty, 1 cent per pound and 25 per cent; hammers, weighing three pounds and over, 1 cent per pound and 25 per cent; all others, 35 per cent; and sledges, 1 cent per pound and 25 per cent. These are the old rates, and all these compound duties were much higher than the present duty placed upon them. We make the duty lower, and make it a single duty rather than a compound duty. As regards the axes, they were $2 per dozen and 10 per cent. That has been reduced to 35 per cent, which, according to the price, is a very large reduction on the lower grades. The hon. gentleman will easily find out the equivalent of the duty in each case by taking the grades of axes and calculating the duty, and he will find that the duty is very largely reduced on the lower and medium grades by putting it at 35 per cent.

Mr. CHARLTON. That information would not be available in time to consider the item now.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman can make the calculation in a very little time. Take axes worth $5 per dozen—$2 per dozen and 10 per cent would amount to $2.50, or about 50 per cent.

Mr. CHARLTON. Is that the ordinary grade of axe?

Mr. FOSTER. Four dollars, $5, and $6 are the ordinary grades; $6 is a good grade.

Mr. SCRIVER. Very few axes sell as low as $5. The axes commonly sold in this country cost 66½ cents.

Mr. FOSTER. That is the retail price.

Mr. SCRIVER. That is the price by the dozen boxes.

Mr. FOSTER. We are speaking of the invoice price. Then, if you take scythes, they were $2.40 per dozen. Hay knives were $2 per dozen, and 20 per cent; forks of all kinds had the double duty, the ad valorem and specific; making, in all these cases, a much larger duty than the 35 per cent now proposed.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. All these considerations must have been present to the hon. gentleman's mind when he made the duty 30 per cent. He had a year to incubate upon the question, and when he announced the 30 per cent he gave it as his matured consideration.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Then, "why this thusness;" why do you raise the duty now? The hon. gentleman, in one respect, is, beyond all question, carrying on a private and Star Chamber sort of examination into these matters where no human being except himself and the parties interested in having these duties raised have any opportunity of being heard. He came to us two months ago, declaring that 30 per cent on these goods was enough. Why has he altered his mind? The cause, as we know perfectly well, is that pressure has been brought to bear upon him by some of these parties who are interested in manufacturing these goods, and this is done at meetings where others have no opportunities of cross-examining these people. I cannot conceive of a worse system, one more likely to produce corruption on one side, and all imaginable evils to the public on the other, than this system of the Minister, after having come to a deliberate decision that, under all the circumstances a certain duty is best, having interviews with the manufacturers, and coming to terms with them. We ought to know what ground these men propose to him for the departure from the rate of 30 per cent which he announced. That is a huge protection, as he knows. I may point out also that what the hon. gentleman has just said about the heavy duties imposed upon the raw material used in these manufactures, goes to show how just is our claim for the reduction of the duties on raw material used by agricultural implement makers. If the manufacturers in the line we are now considering are entitled to have their protection increased by reason of the fact that their raw material is heavily taxed, then, 'a fortiori,' the makers of agricultural implements ought to have their raw materials cheaper, if we cannot see our way to raise their duties. I would like to know, for general information, whether the iron and steel of which the goods we are now considering are manufactured are produced in this country?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, a large portion of it is.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Then, according to the statement officially made by the Prime Minister, these people pay no taxes upon that.

Mr. FOSTER. That is true.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Then, what possible justification can there be for these high duties?

Mr. FOSTER. Will the hon. gentleman give me an instance, recorded or not recorded, where a man who does not import an article pays a duty into the Customs?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I did not say I could show a case of a duty paid into the Customs on an article not imported, but I can show a thousand cases where duties on such articles are paid to the protected manufacturer. I would like to know why this 30 per cent is changed into 35 per cent? Mr. Chairman, we have so much respect for the original decision of the Minister that we deem it highly inexpedient that he should go back on it without explaining to us why he does so. What arguments have been given him to justify this increase of 5 per cent?

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman is very hard on himself and very hard on the gentlemen who sit beside him when he lays down the proposition that, having once come to a decision about a matter, you ought never to change.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I do not say that; but why do you change?

Mr. FOSTER. When a reasonable man charges his mind it is because of an access of light and knowledge. The hon. gentleman tries to make it appear that we have succumbed to superior force in a private Star Chamber meeting, where the manufacturer has faced the Ministers and obliged them, perforce, to come to his terms. Perhaps the hon. gentleman would question some of the manufacturers of these articles and find out whether the Ministers have come to their terms or not. A man makes up his mind according to his light and knowledge, but he is not a progressive man who, having made up his mind resolutely shuts his eyes and ears and refuses to learn more. The wise man is he who knows more to-day than he knew yesterday.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Then, give us the additional light that was poured in on your own mind.

Mr. FOSTER. How can I? The hon. gentleman knows that he carries on this discussion in a spirit of persiflage.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Not at all; I want to know why we are to pay 5 per cent more on these goods?

Mr. FOSTER. The idea of the Government from the first was to make a reasonable revision of the tariff, and to give to each industry which could make out a case for its being retained in this country, a reasonable vantage for maintaining itself here. If, after looking over a particular case you come to the conclusion that 30 per cent is sufficient, but afterwards it is shown that this is entirely insufficient, it is only right, as it is in accordance with the principle we have laid down, to make a change and allow what is reasonably sufficient to maintain the industry. Some of these may appear to be very simple articles, but if the hon. gentleman will go into the investigation of the subject—the cost of material, the prices at which the goods are sold, the competition to which the manufacturers are subject from the United States, and from other countries—he will find that the question is not so simple a one to decide. In this case, the majority of the articles remain at 30 per cent; it is only a few that we have raised to 35 per cent. The change from the old duties to those which we now propose is a very large reduction in every case, a reduction greater, I am bound to say, than the reduction made in the raw material—and the duties in iron and steel, as my friend knows, were both reduced. The desire has been, while not wishing to destroy any industry, to keep it down to the barest modicum of protection which would give it a vantage ground in the very strong competition—stronger now than ever before—which every industry has to meet.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). The other day, in discussing the protection on agricultural implements, the Controller of Customs gave the figures showing the quantity of raw material entering into a reaper, and the proportion of duties upon that raw material as compared with the duties on the finished article. No doubt the Minister has the figures in this case also, and if he will give those figures, I think he will convey the information asked by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). For instance, he might give the duty on the raw material for a dozen axes.

Mr. FOSTER. The duty is half a cent per pound.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). But the Minister might reduce that, so that we might compare the duty with that under the ad valorem rate.

Mr. FOSTER. Take an axe which weighs four or five pounds, and it is easy to calculate the duty upon it. If he will just state the duty on an ad valorem basis on the raw material entering into a dozen axes of average value. A dozen axes will weigh about 50 pounds. A dozen axes require 54 pounds of iron and six pounds of steel, and say 10 cents' worth of borax, with coal for fuel, grindstones to sharpen, emery wheels to polish and boxes to put them in.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). It is the cost of the raw material we want.

Mr. FOSTER. Then the grinding of the axe, the polishing off, painting, boxing and papering; and there is a certain amount of waste which has to be accounted for, and so on.

Mr. CHARLTON. We want to know what the duty would be upon 54 pounds of iron and six pounds of steel.

Mr. FOSTER. The steel and iron both make 36 cents on a value of about $1.36. When you have the axes ready, they are worth in round numbers $5 a dozen—36 cents on the raw material.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Then, with 6 per cent duty on the raw material of a dozen axes, that leaves 29 per cent protection?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) This is a development tax, not a revenue tax.

Mr. FOSTER. This is simply a protective tax to keep the industry.

Mr. CHARLTON. It is a highly protective tax—29 per cent besides the duty on raw material.

Mr. MULLOCK. Will these axes be of any use to lop off moulding branches?

Mr. FOSTER. They can be used for that purpose.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Apparently the reverse process is going on. This is grafting on an addition of 5 per cent, not lopping off 5 per cent.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Does the hon. gentleman think this increase will bring him in a larger revenue?

Mr. FOSTER. I do not anticipate much revenue. The duty being lowered, the importation is apt to be more. In that case, of course, we gain some.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Do you calculate on an increase of revenue?

Mr. FOSTER. There will be very little difference.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Then I take it this is for the purpose of developing the industry?

Mr. FOSTER. To keep the industry, yes.

Mr. McMILLAN. I cannot understand why this industry requires 29 per cent when the duty on the raw material is only 6. The other day we were told that the duty upon the raw material of our binders was $6.60, and that there was $13.40 duty in favour of the manufacturer, and the Government contended that was a sufficient amount of duty. Now, if that was a sufficient amount of duty to the manufacturer of agricultural implements, how does it come in the case of axes that they require 29 per cent when there is only a duty of 6 per cent upon the raw material? I am afraid there is some favour shown in some shape. There are manufacturers of other agricultural implements, such as hay tedders and implements of that description, that are required upon almost every farm in the country, and these are to be taxed 35 per cent. I would like the Government to explain how it is that one class of implements require so much more protection than another class?

Mr. McMULLEN. It appears to me this enormous duty of 35 per cent is given to a class of tools that have been made in this country for thirty or forty years. Axes were made in Canada long before we had a National Policy, and men were able to manufacture them and get along and make money. I cannot understand how the Government continue to increase the burdens of the consumers of those particular articles by imposing increased duties, when it is not for the purpose of raising a revenue, as they admit. If you consult the Trade and Navigation Returns you will find that very few of those articles have been imported. The fact is the whole trade of this country is kept within the hands of our own manufacturers in Canada, and by means of the tariff they are able to victimize the users of those tools, and charge for them considerably more than their actual value. Now, the country is getting no benefit from the operation of this policy except that it keeps a few men at work, and it would be much better for the consumers of these articles if the Government would superannuate the men engaged in the manufacture, and give them a living allowance, and let the people buy everything they want wherever they please, and at the lowest price. This was shown the other day in the matter of cotton mills. The Minister stated the other day that on the output of a mill manufacturing cotton prints, we are paying $300,000 a year, or, according to his admission, over $270 for each man, woman and child engaged in it. We are virtually paying the whole wages of that particular institution in order that it may continue to make prints in Canada. In other ways also, the people are being robbed and plundered, they are being ruined financially for the purpose of keeping in existence a policy that prevents the people from buying in any other country, and compels them to pay whatever price the manufacturers choose to ask. If that is in the interest of this country, I am much deceived if public opinion will longer bear the injustice to which we are subjected by the operations of this tariff. Possibly hon. gentlemen may fancy that they will be able to extend its operations in the future, and continue to mystify the public mind as they have been doing in the past, but I do not think the people will much longer submit to it. My impression is that the people are getting educated on these points.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. Minister made a statement just now, no doubt in good faith, which is wholly and entirely at variance with his statements in the Trade and Navigation Returns, which I hold in my hand. The hon. gentleman stated, and the matter is of moment, that his present tariff is a large reduction in fact on the tariff that formerly existed. I want to call the attention of the committee to the real value of the reduction the hon. gentleman is making. I find that on tools, implements, axes of all kinds, adzes, hammers, &c., we imported last year the value of $6,240, on which there was a duty paid of $2,184. I should like to ask the hon. gentleman where the reduction is? That duty did not amount to more than 33 per cent or 34 per cent, and consequently instead of making a reduction as he says, if anything, there is a slight increase, according to the evidence of the Trade and Navigation Returns. And similarly in the case of axes, on which, if I understood the hon. gentleman aright, he also claimed a large reduction, I find of chopping axes there were imported 558 dozen, of the value of $4,925, on which a duty was paid of $1,609. The committee will see that this is equivalent to a little less than 30 per cent. If there is any error in the hon. gentleman's figures as contained in the Trade and Navigation Returns, he will of course be at liberty to explain it, but that is the statement made in those returns.

Mr. WALLACE. It is 32½ per cent.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I see that the Finance Minister proposes to make the duty 35 per cent on axes of all kinds.

Mr. WALLACE. The hon. gentleman said that it was under 30 per cent, and I find it is exactly 32½ per cent.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It is well under 35 per cent. The contention of the Finance Minister was that he had reduced the duties, that even under 35 per cent there would be a large reduction. As a matter of fact it is perfectly clear that 35 per cent, instead of being a reduction, is a considerable augmentation. Hon. gentlemen opposite may have altered the duty from a compound specific to the ad valorem, but as a matter of fact, in the face of the Trade and Navigation Returns, the hon. Minister is imposing an additional duty. It may not be so heavy as I have stated, it may be only 2½ per cent instead of 5 per cent increase; but whether it be 32 per cent or a little under 30 per cent, it is quite clear that by placing the duty on axes at 35 per cent the Government are not reducing the duty, but are adding considerably to those duties which were levied last year. Errors excepted, I make it out that while last year we imported 558 dozen of axes of the value of $4,925, on which a duty was paid of $1,609, the duty required to be paid on those goods as now proposed would be $1,723. The actual effect of the hon. gentleman's proposition is not to decrease the duties, as he stated, but to increase, by nearly 10 per cent, or at all events, 7 per cent or 8 per cent, the already high duty levied on an article like axes, which it is important to every agriculturist and every other people to obtain as good and cheap as possible.

Mr. FOSTER. This is a matter of some moment, and I am glad the hon. gentleman has brought it up, because it allows me, not to take back what I stated, but to affirm what I said, and prove it. The hon. gentleman took an item in the Trade and Navigation Returns and based his whole statement upon it. He is correct so far as that item in the Trade and Navigation Returns is concerned. But if the hon. gentleman were looking, not for pointing an argument for the time being, but at obtaining the truth, he would at once judge that as there were only 558 dozen axes imported they must form a very small proportion of the whole number of axes used in the country. As a matter of fact, 25,000 dozen of axes are made and used here annually, and so the importation of 558 dozen is an infinitesimal proportion of the number used.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Do you mean used or imported?

Mr. FOSTER. Used in the country. The next fact is, that with a duty of $2 a dozen and 10 per cent, only the highest grades could be imported. The consequence is, that if you compound the duty collected on an ad valorem basis on high price axes, at $9 per dozen, the percentage is very much smaller of course. But the hon. gentleman knows this, that the axes used in this country, or at all events, the very large proportion of them, are not axes which realize $9, $10, or $8, but are axes which run from $4.50 up to $6.50. Those will include the axes which are used in common. If the hon. gentleman will deal with the facts and not make an abstract and one-sided statement, let him follow my calculation. Take an axe worth $4 a dozen: the old duty was $2.40, the proposed duty is $1.20, or a reduction of one-half. Take an axe worth $5 a dozen: old duty, $2.50, proposed duty, $1.85. Take an axe worth $6 per dozen: old duty, $2.60, proposed duty, $2.20. Take an axe worth $7 per dozen: old duty, $2.70, proposed duty, $2.45. When you come to an axe worth $8 per dozen the two duties are exactly even. Now, according to the hon. gentleman's theory, according to the creed he believes in and preaches persistently, not only does the man pay the duty on the importation, but every man who buys an axe manufactured in the country pays the amount of duty, not to the customs officer, but to the man, the greater or smaller robber, making the axes. So by his theory, on 25,000 dozen of axes an amount of from $1 to 50 cents per dozen under the old duty was paid into the hands of the manufacturers here, which would be manumitted under the new duties. The hon. gentleman need not spin theories, for he is a man of business, he knows the prices, he knows the duties, and he can take a pencil and prepare a statement such as I have made. The hon. gentleman need not do so just now, because I have made this matter so plain.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The result is this, that if the hon. gentleman would only give us free trade the people of Canada would get a first-rate axe for no more than they now pay for an inferior one, and the revenue would not lose 1 cent. The hon. gentleman admits that we make 25,000 dozen and that 558 dozen are imported, and that the total revenue is about $1,600; but if we were not an enslaved people we would be able to buy in the cheapest markets where we would be able to obtain an article of the best quality for the price which we now pay for an inferior one. That is the necessary and inevitable deduction from the argument of the Finance Minister. I grant that the mixed duty is a little worse as regards the inferior article, but our people do not want inferior articles, and it is adding insult to injury to tell them, as the Finance Minister does, that the effect of his tariff is in practice to condemn them to the use—as indeed appears tolerably established, and that is all he did establish—to condemn them to the use of a very inferior article, and to pay the extra price upon it; much more than 35 per cent on the inferior article, although not much more than 35 per cent on the superior article. He could not give a better illustration of the prodigious mischief which, perhaps without intending it, the introduction of this protective tariff does. Here is an article in general use in every household, and under your tariff you do not get any revenue from it. The tax on 25,000 dozen of axes, according to the Minister's calculation, would have amounted to $60,000 or $70,000, but the sum which comes into the public treasury amounts to but about $1,600, proving as I have often contended, that among the other beauties of the protective system is this: That it constantly occurs that for one dollar that goes into the public treasury, $10 or $20, or perhaps $100 are taken out of the pockets of the people. We do not want any better illustration of that than the statement made by the hon. gentleman, that whereas the total consumption of axes amounts to 25,000 dozens a year, under his tariff we are only able to import 500 dozens of the superior article.

Mr. FOSTER. And two other things are perfectly clear: First, that the hon. gentleman has abandoned the position he took a moment ago, that I made a mis-statement, and that we are not reducing the duty.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Not a bit of it.

Mr. FOSTER. Does the hon. gentleman still make that statement?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. On the decent article, yes.

Mr. FOSTER. He cannot maintain, nor can he prove that the duty is not lower than it was before on all the articles. When that was made plain to him, he went off on another tack. Under his beautiful system I can tell him exactly what would happen. It is this: The employment, large and varied, given by the making of axes in this country and all the attendant industries, would be a thing unknown in Canada. The employment would be elsewhere. These articles would be made in other countries, and the whole trade would go out to other countries, and the labour would be paid and would reside in other countries. The hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) has not looked into the question, and I can tell him something more that would happen. I can show him a letter from a manufacturer living in New Hampshire to a hardware merchant in this city, in which the United States manufacturer proposes to make him a sale of axes, and he is ready to invoice these axes at a certain price, but informs him in the same letter that these axes are sold to the people of New Hampshire for $8 or $9 a dozen, and he proposes to sell them to this merchant in Ottawa for $5.75 a dozen; he to pay the duty here in Ottawa. Take off that duty and what would happen would be exactly this: In the first place, no axes would be made in this country, and the employment would go to a foreign country; in the second place, without the stimulus to reduce the price of their axes that the New Hampshire manufacturer has to-day by reason of this duty, showing conclusively that he is willing to pay the duty, and that it is not the consumer here that pays it; instead of that, the man in Ottawa would pay the same for his axes that the man in New Hampshire does to-day.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

Mr. CHARLTON. The hon. gentleman has perhaps unconsciously illustrated one of the beautiful features of protection. He tells of a New Hampshire manufacturer, who proposes to sell to a customer in Ottawa an axe for $5.75 for which he charges $8 to a customer at home. What enables the New Hampshire manufacturer to do that? He is, under the protective arrangement in the United States, enabled to enter into a combination with other manufacturers to charge $8 a dozen for an axe that he could afford to sell at a profit for $5.75. That is what it amounts to. The hon. gentleman has mentioned a character of the trade between the two countries which is well known to all importers. For instance, the Canadian importer can buy sewing machines from the manufacturer of the United States for $20 or $30 less than is charged for the same article to the local trade of that country. They sell for export at a cheaper price than they sell for home consumption, and they can afford to do it because they have command of the market at home, and because the Government is a partner with the manufacturers in enabling them to fleece the people by charging far higher prices than they could profitably sell for. In this way colossal fortunes have been rolled up, millionaires have been created in the States through the operation of a tariff that enables them, provided they can manage a trade combination among themselves, to sell the articles they manufacture at 15 per cent, 20 per cent, or 30 per cent higher than they can afford to sell them for. That is the system by which the Government enables the manufacturers to rob the people of that country, and the hon. Minister, I repeat, has unconsciously placed before the House a striking evidence of that when he relates that a New Hampshire manufacturer offered to sell an article in Canada at a price that would afford him a profit, while he sold the same article in New Hampshire for 50 per cent more.

Mr. TAYLOR. I sold axes during the time of the Administration of hon. gentlemen opposite, as I have no doubt some of their friends on that side of the House are doing to-day. During the Liberal regime we sold axes at $1.25 each, and to-day any farmer can buy the same axe for from 60 to 70 cents each. Now, if the National Policy has done anything, it has done that for the users of axes in this country. It has brought down the price fully 100 per cent. and any hon. gentleman engaged in the mercantile trade on the opposite side of the House will corroborate this statement which I make.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. They will corroborate the statement that the hon. gentleman knew a good deal about the pressure which induced this duty to be altered from 30 to 35 per cent.

Mr. TAYLOR. The original proposition was 35 per cent on axes, if the hon. gentleman will read his tariff.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am speaking of the proposition that is before us, and which is to raise the duty on a number of articles from 30 to 35 per cent.

Mr. TAYLOR. There is no raising of the duty from the original proposition of the Finance Minister; the original proposition was 35 per cent.

Mr. MULOCK. Why does he want to change it, then?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). It is pretty clear that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Taylor) has had his axe ground, and that the Finance Minister did it for him. The hon. member has addressed to the House one argument, and the hon. Finance Minister another. I wonder if the manufacturers have pressed the Finance Minister to alter the tariff because of the reason stated by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Taylor). Is it because that they could not get as good a price under a low as under a high tariff, or that they got a better price, that they pressed the Finance Minister to alter the tariff? The hon. gentleman (Mr. Taylor) says, that when the tariff was 17½ per cent he got $1.25 each for his axes. Then why does the hon. gentleman favour the raising of the tariff, for surely he was better off then than he is now? The American competitor did not do for him what the Finance Minister pretends to say the American competitor is likely to do for the manufacturers to-day. He did not come in, and make Canada a slaughter market. On the contrary, the Canadian manufacturer was very much better off than he is at the present time. Notwithstanding that the manufacturer is so much better off, the hon. gentleman is not satisfied with that happy lot. He wants to make him miserable; he wants to put him in a worse position than he is in. In fact he never could be comfortable unless he were placed in a worse position than he was before, and so the hon. gentleman presses this change of tariff upon the Finance Minister, not because the manufacturer is going to profit by it, but because it is going to give to everybody in the country cheaper goods. Well, Sir, is that the reason? If the hon. gentleman is right, the higher the duty, the lower the price of the article in the market. But that was not the contention of the Finance Minister; that was not his argument. The Finance Minister himself admitted that when a duty was imposed it increased the price of the article very nearly to the extent of the duty; it was only after numerous establishments came into existence and there was competition between them, that there was an actual reduction of the price. This House knows that an argument of that sort is the merest nonsense; it does not impose upon any one any more. The hon. gentleman may have imposed on the people with an argument of that sort when the National Policy was first introduced; but it will impose on no consumer in this country any longer. It is not to ensure goods being furnished to the consumers of this country at lower prices that the hon. gentleman is proposing this change in the tariff; it is to put more money into the pockets of the manufacturers than would go into them under a lower tariff. The hon. gentleman talks about foreign competition injuring the Canadian manufacturer and driving him out of his own market. In what instance has that ever happened? Who is going to offer goods at less than their cost in this or any other market? Is not everybody manufacturing with the view of making all the profits he can, and does he not take advantage of every opportunity to do that to the fullest extent? Manufacturers in the United States do not differ in this respect from those of any other country in the world. The hon. gentleman says that a manufacturer of axes in New Hampshire has offered to sell in Canada at $5 a dozen the same axes that he sells in the American market at $8 or $9 a dozen. Well, that only shows that he can sell them at $5 at a profit; he would not offer them if he could not; and it is in consequence of the high duties imposed in the United States that he is able to fleece the people of that country by making the market a close market. Ought not that to be a warning to us, instead of an example to be improved upon? A few years ago the Singer sewing machine was imported into this country at $16 each, and retailed here at about $45. Some of these machines were seized for undervaluation; what was the effect? It was shown that they cost the manufacturer about $10 each, so that instead of being entered at an undervaluation, they were entered above their cost and sold at a very much higher figure. The Singer sewing machine has never been sold in this country at $10 or at any such figure. A few years ago the Wanzer sewing machine was sold at retail for $33. It cost the manufacturer $7.50; it was sold to the wholesale man at $11; it was sold by the wholesale man to retailers throughout the country at $22; and it was sold by these retailers to individual purchasers at $33. In that case who was fleeced? Was it the manufacturer? Did the American machine destroy the Canadian market for him? Was he injured, or was there any prospect of his being injured? No; the only people in this country who have been fleeced for the past fifteen years under this tariff have been the consumers of these articles. I dare say the Controller of Customs knows that there is not a sewing machine put on the market in Canada to-day that is not sold at three times its cost, and more in many instances, or that there is not an American machine put on the market which, apart from the duty, is not sold at double its cost; and yet the hon. gentleman, in the face of these facts, which must be known to him, comes to this House and declares that if the duties were reduced on articles necessary for use or consumption, the manufactories in Canada would be closed. Nothing of the kind would happen. The manufacturers reap large profits; so large in many instances as to induce them to manage their business without any regard for economy or for proper management. Under all circumstances, whether the management is strict or loose, the effect is the same: they reap large profits, they are enabled to do that in consequence of the duties imposed by the Government; and men who are not earning more than 5 per cent on the value of the capital invested in their agricultural undertakings, throwing in their labour and counting it as nothing, are compelled to pay a large additional sum for everything they purchase in order that some one who gets 14 or 15 per cent on his capital may add 15 or 20 per cent more. I say the whole thing is monstrous; it is not creditable to the Government of this country. It is wholly incompatible with every honest consideration. Instead of protecting every man in the possession of what belongs to him and enabling him to retain what his own industry produces, the Government compels him to pay tribute to some favoured manufacturer. A more monstrous system than exists in Canada cannot be devised, and every change which the hon. Finance Minister has made since he has introduced his tariff has been a change in the direction of oppression and injustice to the great consuming population of Canada.

Mr. McMULLEN. The hon. Finance Minister stated that a man in the United States offered to sell in Ottawa for $5.50 a dozen the same axes that he sold in the United States for $8 a dozen. I would like to know from the Finance Minister if Canada is not trying her hand at the same thing? Our manufacturers are sending cottons to India and selling them there at prices which must be below what they are charging our people. Why is that? Because they are sold in India in competition with goods which are manufactured in free trade countries. That is done in order to keep the cotton factories in this country running, as the Minister admitted the other night. He said that some factories were kept running by producing stock adapted for the Australian trade and the Indian trade, and another hon. gentleman said that the experience of the manufacturers had been that they had lost money on all the cottons they had exported. Perhaps the man in the United States who wants to sell axes here for $5 a dozen, wants to do it in order to keep his factory running. I have it on the best authority that organs exported from Canada are sold at less than they are sold here after the carriage is paid. So that we are just following the same line the Finance Minister pointed out the United States is following. We are reaping the results of this tariff, which is ruining the people who have to submit to its operation.

Mr. MARTIN. I would like to ask the Controller of Customs for information on this point. In the case of an importer bringing goods into Canada, and who has disposed of these goods, on which he has paid the duty according to the tariff resolutions first brought down, I understand the regulations of the Customs Department require him to make an amended entry, should the duty here be increased in going through committee. In some cases large quantities of goods have been imported and sold on the basis of the tariff resolutions as originally announced. Of course, so far as any decreases are concerned, the importers are not going to object. But an increase may mean a very serious loss. Are customs-house officers instructed to compel importers to put in an amended entry and pay the additional duty, where the duty has been increased in committee?

Mr. GILLMOR. The Finance Minister has given me information about the price of axes that I had not before. I have always been in the habit of buying and selling and using axes and have never seen any of those the Finance Minister talks of as being sold at $5 per dozen. Before Confederation we had several axe factories in New Brunswick, when our tariff was but 12 per cent. We then had as good axes as now, though they were a little higher in price, but I know of none that can be sold to-day at less than $6 or $7 a dozen. The parties making axes in New Brunswick, under this high protective tariff are not as well off as were those who were making axes forty years ago.

Mr. FOSTER. The conditions of trade have changed very much.

Mr. GILLMOR. There may be hand hatchets that sell at 30 cents or 40 cents, but there is nothing that can be called an axe in the market which is not worth at retail 80 or 90 cents, if fit to be used at all. The Finance Minister is a New Brunswicker, and he knows that the axe industry there to-day is not in a better condition than it was before we had his protective tariff. My hon. friend from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) and the Minister of Finance may understand these changes, but I must confess that I could not make out anything from the description the Minister of Finance gave of these increases in the tariff, and I do not believe there are ten men in the House who understand it. The country does not understand this system, but is getting its eyes opened to its abuses. My hon. friend has been about 60 days trying to readjust the tariff, and as a result we have a mass of confusion which no one can make anything of, instead of a system so plain that every one called upon to contribute ought to understand. Other systems of taxation are easily enough understood. If you tax a man for school purposes, he knows what he pays and what he is paying it for. If you tax him to support the poor in the county, he knows for what object he is taxed and what he pays. But here you are taxing the people to the tune of $90,000,000 a year, and I defy any one to understand anything about it. All that the people do know is that the country is worse off under this protective system than it was under a lower tariff.

Mr. FOSTER. I am lowering the taxes.

Mr. GILLMOR. If you are lowering taxation, I accept the decrease. Anything that will lower taxation is an improvement, but you have to understand vulgar fractions, and the scuffle in Goff's arithmetic is not a circumstance to this cumbersome, confused and intricate system of taxation. The theory of protection is to develop infant industries, but when these infant industries have got full control of the home market why put anything more on?

Mr. FOSTER. I want my hon. friend not to be misled by the arguments on that side. I am reducing the taxes very largely.

Mr. GILLMOR. From all said on both sides, I cannot understand that you are reducing it. Are you not adding to it, compared with what you contemplated when you brought down your tariff resolutions?

Mr. FOSTER. No, sir.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Yes; it was 30 per cent, and you are making it 35.

Mr. FOSTER. Thirty-five per cent both times.

Mr. GILLMOR. Thirty-five per cent is a very heavy tax. I hope the time is not very far distant when the reduction will be considerable. If you have Canada for a market why not reduce the tax?

Mr. FRASER. Are the axes made in Canada good axes?

Mr. FOSTER. Splendid.

Mr. FRASER. Take the axes that the Americans can send in at $5 or $6, what do we sell them at?

Mr. FOSTER. Just about the same.

Mr. FRASER. Then there is no fear of outside competition?

Mr. FOSTER. You might sell a thing at the same rate and still lose, as you with your stock in the glass factory.

Mr. FRASER. They lost nothing.

Mr. FOSTER. You lost.

Mr. FRASER. The original factory did. If we can produce as cheaply in Canada as in the United States, what need of 35 per cent duty?

Mr. WALLACE. In reply to the hon. member for Winnipeg, I beg to inform him that all the entries are now made subject to amendment, and if Parliament increases the duty the importer will be called upon to amend the entries.

Mr. MULOCK. After they have sold their goods?

Mr. WALLACE. It is immaterial. As in this case the duty is not proposed to be increased, they will not have to amend their entries. The duty before was much higher than it is now. As submitted to Parliament it was 35 per cent, and we do not propose to change that. There are one or two matters which have developed themselves in this discussion. The hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Gillmor) has told us that the manufacturers of axes are not as well off to-day as they were forty years ago when they were getting about $1.50 or $2 apiece for their axes.

Mr. GILLMOR. That is my impression. I am not thoroughly acquainted with the different industries.

Mr. WALLACE. If so, those men cannot be robbing the people or else they would be very rich. The hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Gillmor) says they have got poorer.

Mr. GILLMOR. I have not said that exactly.

Mr. WALLACE. The hon. gentleman said they were not as well off now as they were forty years ago. That is a pretty good answer to the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), who says they have been robbing the consumer. If his statement is correct, they would be rich by this time. Another point that it developed is that in the country having the highest protection on steel they are producing the cheapest quality of axes that can be made. These axes do not come from England; they are imported from the United States. These 558 dozen that were imported at $8.82 per dozen, under the old duty would have cost to lay down in Canada, $11.70.

Mr. CHARLTON. Ordinary chopping axes?

Mr. WALLACE. I do not say they are ordinary chopping axes; they are much more expensive. You can buy, not the ordinary, but a good chopping axe—for men who are earning their living by chopping will not use an inferior axe—at $6.50 to $7 per dozen. Axes that would cost $11.70 must be of a superior kind. According to the hon. member for South Oxford, the old duty on these high-priced goods would be 32½ per cent, or a little less than the duty which is proposed by the resolution now submitted to the House. I contend that the present duties are much lower than the old ones. For instance, an axe worth $4 a dozen in the United States, under the old duty would cost to bring in, $6.40. That is pretty near the average price of axes, as stated by the hon. member for Huntingdon (Mr. Scriver), which, I believe, is correct. The duty on these axes under the old tariff would be 60 per cent; on axes at $5 a dozen, the duty would be about 50 per cent, and on axes at $6 per dozen, it would be 43½ per cent. We are proposing to make all these 35 per cent, so that we are making a very substantial reduction in the protection granted the Canadian manufacturer, but still, I hope, giving sufficient to enable these men to go on and give employment to our own people in the manufacture of axes, scythes, and forks, which industries, I am told, employ from 1,200 to 1,500 men in this country. Another point is that these articles are sold as cheaply here, and even more cheaply, than they would be if we adopted a free trade tariff. According to the statement of the Finance Minister, who gave the facts of an actual business proposition made to an Ottawa merchant of which there can be no doubt, the offer is made to sell, for $5.75 a dozen, a class of goods for which they charge $9 per dozen in the United States. If this protective duty of ours should be taken away, why should Canadians get the article 1 cent cheaper than the people in Vermont get it? They would pay $9 a dozen as the people on the other side do. These goods are sold to-day, duty paid, at $8.50 per dozen. We should be paying 50 cents a dozen more than we are paying to-day, and about 1,500 people, who are now at work in Canada, would find themselves without employment.

Mr. MULLOCK. Why do the people of the United States pay $9 for these goods? How is it the manufacturers can get that price there?

Mr. WALLACE. I will give the hon. gentleman the reason. Nine dollars per dozen is the lowest price at which they will sell them over there, but they will sell their surplus to Canadians at a lower price. They have a combination there in these particular articles.

Mr. McMULLEN. Now you have struck it.

Mr. WALLACE.

Mr. WALLACE. Well then, I hope the hon. gentleman is satisfied.

Mr. MULLOCK. How can they have a combination?

Mr. WALLACE. Because they have combined—that is the reason.

Mr. CHARLTON. What enables them to combine?

Mr. FOSTER. Headwork.

Mr. WALLACE. The hon. gentleman wants us to say that protection enables them to combine. But if he will inquire into the matter, as I inquired when the Combines Committee was at work some years ago, he will find that the worst forms of combinations in this country are in those articles in which there was no protection whatever. It was shown before that committee that the worst combine was in coal.

Mr. MULLOCK. Nature protects that.

Mr. WALLACE. So the hon. gentleman's innuendo that these combines were caused by protection is not correct. Moreover, as the Prime Minister says, we cannot affect the operation of the United States tariff. Whether their tariff is high or low, whether there are combinations or not, we cannot affect that. But we can control affairs in Canada, and we have much more power over combinations here to-day than we could have under a free trade system under which these articles would be imported from the United States.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Why have not these hon. gentlemen the courage of their convictions? The hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Taylor) proved to a demonstration—at least to his own satisfaction—that when you had a 17½ per cent duty, axes cost $1.25; now that the tariff is 35 per cent, axes cost 60 cents or 70 cents. Then, by all means, raise the tariff to 70 per cent, and let us get axes at 30 cents or 40 cents, and we will be content. If the hon. gentlemen are willing to follow out these conditions, I am not sure but that I would agree to make an exception and advocate the change.

Mr. TAYLOR. Under the 17½ per cent duty, our axes were partly made in the United States. To-day, they are all made in Canada, and the farmers of this country are feeding labour engaged in making them and they are getting cheaper and better articles.

Mr. McMULLEN. There is one thing the people of this country will be convinced before this discussion on the tariff is through, and that is, that the Finance Minister and the Controller of Customs are the godfathers of more infants in this country than any other two men in it.

Mr. MARTIN. I should like to say a word or two further with regard to the question I put to the Controller of Customs. It does seem to me that this involves a very great hardship. We have been discussing the tariff for nearly two months. It is not possible for merchants and manufacturers to suspend their business for two months. It is necessary, in many cases, to produce certain articles and put them on the market in the spring, otherwise they cannot be sold at all. Let me illustrate by taking the case of wire. I fancy that item is not passed, but, at any rate, what I say is for the purpose of illustration. A certain tariff is proposed upon wire, but afterwards this is largely increased. In the meantime, the manufacturer who uses this as his raw material, has had to import it, and manufacture and sell his goods, and he has given the people the benefit of the reduction proposed and—so far as the law is concerned—actually made by the Government in this particular. The Government have received deputations from manufacturers who are interested in this particular item and, as a result of their representations, have increased the duty on wire. In this particular item they are increasing it 5 per cent, in other items it is much more than 5 per cent. Then they call upon these manufacturers who have used this as a raw material to make a large payment and amend the entry. I understand the Minister has the question of wire under consideration, iron and steel wire, 11 to 14 gauge, which is now at 15 per cent. Now, if that is increased, as I understand it is proposed, those manufacturers who have used large quantities of that wire have reckoned as part of the cost the duty upon that wire at 15 per cent. Now, is it not a gross outrage upon a particular individual who is in business in Canada, whose interests the Government are bound to protect, to compel him amend his entry and make an additional payment to the Government for goods that he has already disposed of? I would submit to the Finance Minister whether it would not be fair, considering the great length of time that the revision of the tariff has necessarily taken, that if a merchant or manufacturer can show that he has actually disposed of those goods, and that he will be put to an actual loss, he should only be compelled to amend his entry with regard to those goods that he has not disposed of. If something of that kind is not done, a great loss will be sustained by those manufacturers who were obliged, by the peculiar conditions of the trade they are in, to go on and manufacture their goods in the months of March and April, and who find it impossible to wait until the Government have made up their mind as to what duties they are going to put on that article.

Mr. MULOCK. This duty of 35 per cent, in fact all duties of 35 per cent on articles that pass through the hands of a wholesaler and retailer, amount to a duty of 50 per cent to the consumer. When, therefore, the Government argue that 35 per cent is a moderate duty, they are defending what amounts to an additional cost to the consumer of about 50 per cent. If I understand the trade rightly, when a wholesaler purchases an article, whatever the cost is, he reckons his percentage of profits on the total costs, which, of course, includes the duty. If, therefore, a wholesale merchant has been obliged to purchase an article on which 35 per cent duty has been paid, if he estimates his profits at 20 per cent, which I am told is not an unreasonable profit in trade, that, added to the 35 per cent duty—

Mr. FOSTER. He would not add it to the 35 per cent. It is only 20 per cent of 35 per cent, not 20 per cent and 35 per cent together.

Mr. MULOCK. Twenty per cent of 35 per cent will be another 5 per cent. When that passes into the hands of the retailer he will add on 20 per cent of the total cost to him. So this 35 per cent to the original wholesale merchant has grown to be 50 per cent added to the retail price to the consumer.

Mr. WALLACE. Ten per cent is the wholesaler's profit.

Mr. MULOCK. It will vary on different articles. I do not know what is the rate on axes. Taking 20 per cent as an average—and that is a great deal under the percentage of profit taken by middle men in some cases—but I believe that 20 per cent will be found to be a very reasonable scale; so that 35 per cent of a duty at the custom-house means 50 per cent of a cost to the consumer. Ministers may shake their heads, but I am aware of articles in which the middle cost is far in excess of 20 per cent. I think the Minister of Finance is bound to give the committee some reasons for maintaining these high rates on these tools which is going to amount to 50 per cent. Or if I were to take the suggestion of the Controller of Customs, even if the middle profit on the protection were only 10 per cent, it would amount to a duty of $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent, which added to the 35 per cent, gives you $42\frac{1}{2}$ per cent, if you only allow the wholesaler and the retailer 10 per cent profit on the cost. If the percentage of protection is less, the cost would be less, and there would be a corresponding reduction in the cost to the consumer. Every person understands that to be the custom of trade. So we may well discuss the tariff in view of its being worked out, and to see its ultimate effects on the consumer. Even taking the statement of the Controller of Customs, when he says the middle man charges but 10 per cent profit upon the cost—even in that case a 35 per cent tariff means $42\frac{1}{4}$ per cent additional cost to the consumer, if you admit that the tax at the custom-house is added to the cost of the consumer. I presume these items under discussion are regarded in some sense as necessaries of life, and you are taxing these various industries at this excessive rate. Therefore, I say that it is due to the country that the Finance Minister should now give the reasons which have led him to ask Parliament to give its sanction to this high rate.

Mr. FOSTER. Carried.

Mr. MULOCK. No ; I ask the Minister to tell us, because we have information, it has been suggested by the member for South Oxford, and it was generally rumoured before these items came up, that there were going to be changes made in the interest of certain persons, that pressure was being brought to bear upon the Government. Now, if the Government have thought only of these industries, and have not considered the rights of the consumers, we ought to know it.

Mr. FOSTER. No ; we have considered the rights of the consumers.

Mr. MULOCK. But have they been consulted ?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. MULOCK. The consumers have been consulted ? That is information the country will be glad to know. Will the Minister say in what form he has consulted the consumers ? I believe that deputations of manufacturers have come down. Now, the Minister has made a statement that he has consulted the consumers ; will he say how. The consumers, I am afraid, were not invited to be heard. It would seem then that this schedule has been fixed up in the interest of a few favoured ones who had kicked, or threatened, or intimidated the Minister. In fact there are industries represented by members in this House, and I feel it is a scandal to our system of government that members of Parliament should be personally interested in framing a tariff that will put money into their own pockets. I do not know how far it is correct, but I see it stated in public papers that a member of this House placed his resignation in the hands of a semi-official person, the whip, because the Government were not giving him all the protection he wanted upon an article, starch, I believe ; and that then the Government came down and listened to the demands and threats of a supporter, and promised a surrender. We have other instances of clerical errors being made, owing to pressure of a hidden character, all outside the public gaze. Now we have the Minister telling us that he has consulted the consumers in regard to this matter. If he has, it is his duty to tell the House and the country how he consulted them ; when he consulted them. When did he invite the great masses of the people of the community to make their opinions known before he ventured to propose this scheme here ? When the Government were dealing with the farmers, when it was proposed to affect them, they were invited to be present, and the Controller of Customs and a couple of lawyers went about and tried to badger these farmers in public, to prove to them that they did not know anything about the grievances they thought they were suffering under. They were obliged to argue their case as best they could, in the presence of a number of gentlemen who were badgering them and endeavouring to make them appear inconsistent, and in some instances, ridiculous. But in regard to manufacturers, the interviews took place in secret ; and after the tariff changes were proposed, we are told a great many deputations waited upon the Minister, and again he listened to them in secret. We do not know what occurred. Now, I say that this is a scandal to the country, it is an abuse of the position the Government occupies, to be levying taxes upon people through the medium of this tariff at the solicitation of interested parties, without giving a hearing to those who are to pay the bills. That state of affairs is now being sought to be reversed by this legislation, and the Minister of Finance declines to tell the House in what respect he has considered the interests of the consumers and given them an opportunity to be heard. If the hon. gentleman will not respond to the voice of the people so far as it may be said to emanate from the Opposition, he may have to listen to that voice direct from the people later on.

Mr. MULOCK.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am not going to renew the axe discussion just now, but I wish to call the attention of the Finance Minister to the remark made by the hon. member of Winnipeg (Mr. Martin). I am quite aware that under ordinary circumstances the mercantile community have to take their chance. But these are not ordinary circumstances. Never in our experience has a tariff been kept under consideration for anything like the length of time that has now elapsed in regard to the present tariff.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes ; in 1878.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Not for the same length of time.

Mr. FOSTER. For six weeks.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I had something to do with it, and I think neither the Finance Minister nor the Controller of Customs was a member of the House at that time. For all practical purposes very little alteration was made in that tariff as submitted, and certainly no changes were made to be compared with the large alterations which the Finance Minister has made in this tariff ; some may have been made, but they were not of any great consequence. But whether or not, on the mere ground of equity towards the commercial public it is desirable, and it could be accomplished under an order of the Treasury Board, or by the adoption of a short resolution by the House to be inserted in the tariff Bill, to provide that in all cases where actual transactions have taken place, the original duty which had been paid should be considered sufficient. No one, I think, could object to that proposition on the ground of equity, and I do not think there is any reason to anticipate either in the present or the future any great inconvenience or loss to the Government, although great loss might accrue to individuals if no such rule should be adopted. It appears to be perfectly equitable, when the Government has come down and declared they intend to fix a certain rate of duty, and when the ordinary merchant, having no means of information other than the discussions in Parliament, imports his goods in good faith according to that tariff, and proceeds to sell them at prices he would not have accepted if he had known the duty was going to be raised, that the transaction shall be allowed to stand without requiring the merchant to pay the additional duty.

Mr. BOWERS. I should not like that to be done. I have an entry of manila cordage, and I should like to obtain a reduction on it. After the remarks of the Controller of Customs the other day I think I will get my cordage free. I do not, therefore, agree with the last speaker.

Item agreed to.

Shovels and spades, shovel and spade blanks and iron or steel cut to shape for same, 50 cents per dozen and 25 per cent ad valorem.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the reduction ?

Mr. FOSTER. It is a reduction from $1.25 to 50 cents per dozen.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What does the 50 cents per dozen represent ? This is really a proposition to raise the duty from 35 per cent to 50 per cent. It may be according to the tariff that was in existence last year a reduction, but compared with the proposition which the Finance Minister submitted to the House a few weeks ago it is a very large increase.

Mr. FOSTER. Take shovels at $5, and the old duty would represent $2.25 ; the duty at 35 per cent would be $1.75, the duty at 50 cents per dozen and 25 per cent would be $1.75. So there is a large reduction on the old rate, and the present proposition is about the same as 35 per cent.

Committee rose, and it being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

House again resolved itself into Committee on Ways and Means.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. McMULLEN. Would the Minister say what is the average value per dozen of these ?

Mr. FOSTER. I think probably the average would be $4.50 or $5 per dozen.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). What change is proposed in this ?

Mr. FOSTER. The duty proposed is 50 cents per dozen and 25 per cent ; the old duty was $1 per dozen and 25 per cent.

Mr. GRIEVE. Does the Minister mean to say that the wholesale price of these spades and shovels is $4 or $5 a dozen ?

Mr. FOSTER. Oh, no ; I was asked for the average price. They run from $3.25 up to perhaps $7 a dozen.

Mr. GREIVE. They are retailed at from 80 cents to $1, so that there must be a tremendous profit on them.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I remember seeing an invoice in which the duty figured to 74 per cent, so that the price of the shovel blades is not much more than $2 per dozen, and the duty on that class would be 50 per cent.

Mr. McMULLEN. How many factories are there making these ?

Mr. FOSTER. There is a factory at Gananoque, a factory near Halifax, a factory at Montreal, and one at Quebec.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Perhaps the adviser of the hon. gentleman could tell us how many men are employed in this industry ?

Mr. TAYLOR. I know that there are from 80 to 100 employed in the Gananoque factory. There are some seven or eight in the country, and I cannot speak of the others.

Mr. McMULLEN. The Minister ought to place us in the possession of all the information with regard to this industry, and the number of hands employed in these factories.

Mr. FOSTER. The Gananoque factory is the largest and they employ from 80 to 100 hands. There is a large-sized factory in Halifax, but I am not able to say how many hands are engaged there.

Mr. McMULLEN. What is the total quantity of this article manufactured in Canada ?

Mr. FOSTER. The total output of the Gananoque factory is 8,500 dozens.

Mr. GRIEVE. Is the total output of the Gananoque factory composed of spades and shovels ? I understand that it also makes lawn mowers, forks and other kinds of garden tools.

Mr. FOSTER. No, I think shovels and spades only.

Mr. McMULLEN. Can the Minister not state the amount of the total output in Canada ?

Mr. FOSTER. I cannot at the moment. If I can get the information for the hon. gentleman, I will send it to him. Only 2,200 dozens were imported last year.

Item agreed to.

Wire of iron or steel, 11 to 14 gauge inclusive, 15 per cent.

Mr. FOSTER. I want to amend this by adding: "Galvanized iron wire, No. 12 gauge, when imported by makers of barbed wire for use in their factories, 15 per cent."

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I wish to call the hon. gentleman's attention to a communication which I have received from a company engaged in the manufacture of wire fences. These gentlemen represent, and apparently with considerable truth, that the wire which is their raw material is charged a very high rate of duty. The wire they more particularly use is Nos. 6 and 9. They make what is called the locked wire fence. This is an industry which, whether infant or adult, does not appear to have been brought to the hon. gentleman's notice, and they pray for a reduction on their raw material, which, being entirely in accord with our policy on this side, I am very happy to forward as far as I can. The hon. gentleman seems to have given to the companies engaged in similar occupations their wire either free or at a reduction. This wire, I suppose, would at present come in under the general clause at 25 per cent ad valorem. If the hon. gentleman would include in his amendment Nos. 6, 9 and 12, that would meet the case.

Mr. FOSTER. I shall have to think that over. The barbed wire fence makers require No. 12, and but for this change would have to pay 25 per cent on it, while the small protection given to them on barbed wire would not permit them to carry on their industry. So I propose to put No. 12 gauge on the 15 per cent list, and keep the duty on barbed wire as it is.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. If the hon. gentleman would add Nos. 6 and 9, I think that would meet the views of the manufacturers of locked wire fencing. This, I think, is very much the same as the barbed wire fencing, with this difference, that certain joinings in it make it easier to make and to erect, and necessitates fewer posts. Of course, the Minister is aware that all over the North-west and Ontario, every day, more and more, the use of wire fencing, either barbed or plain wire, or wire fencing of some kind or other, is coming into constant use, and it is a very important item in the economy of a farm, in certain agricultural processes, that farmers should possess fences not only cheap and durable, but capable of being easily moved. I understand that the lock wire fence is one that has special merits in that direction. It is easier erected, requires fewer posts, and is capable of being moved from place to place more easily than any other fences. It is, therefore, for many reasons a thing which does deserve, if any industry of that kind deserves, a reasonable consideration at the hands of the Government. I am not asking in the least to increase the tax, but simply to give these men who use six and nine the same protection that it is proposed to give the men who use gauge No. 12.

Mr. CHARLTON. The principle is exactly the same in the two cases.

Mr. FOSTER. I would have to look into that. I have not examined that question. It must be a very heavy grade of wire that runs as thick as six.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That would be used for what, I suppose, they call the supporters. Of course, the heavier the wire they use, the better able they are to dispense with numerous posts. Every one of us who has had anything at all to do with leasing lands, knows that in a very large part of the country the removal of fences is becoming an extremely serious question. More and more, every day, the wood is disappearing, and the necessity of having metal fences is becoming apparent. No doubt whatever I am speaking against our party interests when I urge that a reduction of the tax on the wire which goes to make wire fences would be a great boon to all farmers everywhere throughout the Dominion.

Mr. FOSTER. The Government have recognized all that and have reduced the duty on the barbed wire fence just one-half. It is to enable the barbed wire fence manufacturers to live under the present duty that we reduced No. 12 wire, which is not all the wire they use—they use twelve and thirteen. If the hon. gentleman will send me the note he has, I will look into the matter, and if we can do anything, will come back to the matter again.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. gentleman, I suppose, will advise me before the matter is absolutely out of our hands what he will do?

Item agreed to.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes. There are two items that were passed of which I wish to change the verbiage a little, and reduce the duty on some portions. They are on page 13 of the small book. Take the item of rolled iron or steel angles. The committee will recollect that we divided the rolled iron or steel angles and special sections into two classes; and on those weighing less than 35 pounds per yard the duty was 35 per cent. Then, on others, weighing not less than 25 pounds per lineal yard, it was 12½ per cent. I propose to widen that, and to change the verbiage a little, so that the first one will read:

Rolled iron or steel angles, channels and other sections, weighing less than 35 pounds per lineal yard, 35 per cent.

That goes with the old duty.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. You said you were going to reduce the duty.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, I am taking out of that something which I am putting into the item below it at 12½ per cent :

Rolled iron or steel angles, channels and other sections, weighing less than 35 pounds per lineal yard, n.e.s.—strike out structural shapes and special sections, 35 per cent.

Then the next one will read :

Rolled iron or steel angles, channels and special sections, weighing not less than 35 pounds per lineal yard, and rolled iron or steel beams, joists, girders, columns, sections,—trough sections and other building or bridge structural sections, weighing not less than 25 pounds to the lineal yard, and rolled iron or steel bridge plates not less than three-eighths of an inch thick nor less than fifteen inches wide, and flat eye bar blanks, not punched or drilled, 12½ per cent.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. You had not bar blanks before.

Mr. FOSTER. I amended that by putting "flat eye bar blanks not punched or drilled." That lets into the 12½ per cent duty certain structural shapes which were before included in the 35 per cent, and is an advantage to builders.

Item agreed to.

Celluloid, moulded into sizes for handles of knives and forks, not bored nor otherwise manufactured ; also molded celluloid balls and cylinders, coated with tin-foil or not, but not finished or further manufactured, 10 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. FOSTER. I wish to make an addition—celluloid lamp-shade blanks. It reads just as it does now, but I add at the end, before the 10 per cent : "And celluloid lamp-shade blanks." That reduces them from 20 per cent to 10.

Item agreed to.

Stereotypes, electrotypes and celluloids of newspaper columns, and bases for the same, composed wholly or partly of metal or celluloid, ¼ of a cent per square inch.

Mr. FOSTER. I propose to reduce that one-half and make it three-eighths of a cent instead of three-quarters.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Will not that be an excessive duty, even at the reduction of one-half ? The stereotype plates manufactured are sold to the newspapers at so much per square inch, and the duty amounts to from 160 to 180 per cent.

Mr. FOSTER. I think not so much as that. I have had a statement put in my hands showing that it may run as high as 118 per cent.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. I understand that the newspaper men have been making representations to the Government to have this duty reduced. I would like to ask the Finance Minister how many men are employed in Toronto in this industry, for Toronto is the only place where this plate is manufactured ?

Mr. FOSTER. I am informed that the wages paid in these industries amount each week to $800. There are two houses making these stereotype plates.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). How many thousands are employed in the printing establishments which find these plates necessary for their business ?

Mr. FOSTER. The papers seem to be very glad to get these plates.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Yes ; but they would be very much better pleased if they could get them at a reasonable rate.

Mr. GRIEVE. Are stereotype plates in the German language manufactured in this country ?

Mr. FOSTER. I do not know ; but I imagine not.

Mr. GRIEVE. Would there be any possibility of their being manufactured in the near future ?

Mr. WALLACE. German books are allowed in free.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Carried.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. No ; before this resolution is adopted, I think we ought to know what this reduced duty means. If my hon. friend from North Brant (Mr. Somerville) is correct, the old duty amounted to the perfectly outrageous figure of 180 per cent. The reduction, therefore, leaves it at about 90 per cent.

Mr. FOSTER. Oh, no.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That would be still an outrageous duty.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. We have the authority of the Ottawa 'Citizen' that it was from 160 to 180 per cent.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. There is an authority I do not believe equal to my hon. friend, but hon. gentlemen opposite may. I am not aware what the duty is myself, but if the 'Citizen's' statement is even approximately correct the duty of ¾ths of a cent a square inch would still leave the duty far too high. There is no sort of defence for a duty in a matter of this kind of 80 or 90 per cent, no matter whether 50 or 60 or 800 people are employed in producing the article. I should like to know what the hon. gentleman considers what the duty of ¾ths of a cent per square inch represents on an ad valorem basis.

Mr. FOSTER. It would be very variable, according to the value of the plate brought in. In some cases it would be as high as 50 or 55 per cent.

Mr. CHARLTON. Not higher ?

Mr. FOSTER. Not on any plate worth anything.

Mr. WALLACE. Further, the statement is made, and I believe correctly, that the price of these plates in Canada is a little lower than that in the United States. The duty is not added to the price here at all.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). That is not the point. It is impossible in the market of Canada to produce more than a very limited number of plates, and the difficulty every newspaper man experiences is to get plates distinct from those being used by his neighbour. Take the case of two newspapers published in the same town or in adjoining towns. They do not want to get the same plates, but to get plates covering different matter, and in the limited market of Canada this cannot be done. The necessary variety cannot be furnished. Any newspaper man can tell the hon. gentleman that.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. The hon. Minister says that the duty depends on the value of the plates imported, but the duty is so much to the square inch, regardless of the value.

Mr. FOSTER. Some plates are worth more than others.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. But the duty is so much per square inch.

Mr. FOSTER. But there are more characters in one square inch than in another.

Mr. GRIEVE. I am informed that the duty of $\frac{3}{4}$ of a cent per square inch amounts to something like 32 cents per column, and the price of the plate to the printer is 20 cents per column, so that those who are forced to import this plate from the United States have to pay something like 52 cents per column, or \$3.12 per page. This is an injustice to a certain class of printers in this country. We have a large number of German printers who use this plate. German electro plate is not manufactured in this country, and must be imported. This is a great injustice, not only to the German printers, but to the German readers as well. German readers in this country are the same as English readers, they like to read the old country news. German papers printed in the large centres in the United States are composed largely of German miscellaneous matter. The ordinary German reader in this country prefers that class of reading, and they will subscribe to American papers in many cases in preference to Canadian papers, because of this German miscellany. If there is no probability in the near future of this German plate being manufactured in this country, I would recommend the Minister of Finance to take into his consideration the desirability of reducing the duty on this article.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. I would like the hon. Minister to explain with regard to the duty and the value of the plate of which he spoke. The tariff is so much to the square inch. It does not depend upon the value, but upon the size of the plate.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Of course the hon. gentleman must have the information in his possession. What does he suppose to be the value per square foot—which is perhaps the easier way to get at it—or per square inch, if he prefers it, of this stereotype plate? Of course, we understand that where this is variable it will affect the ad valorem rate of duty. No doubt he has the average figures, and also the minimum and maximum.

Mr. WALLACE. The average as given in the Trade and Navigation Returns is $\frac{5}{8}$ of a cent per square inch.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Then that would correspond closely with what I said, because if the value is $\frac{5}{8}$ and your tax is $\frac{3}{8}$, that would be close upon 60 per cent.

Mr. FOSTER. You are right.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Which is a very heavy duty on articles of this kind. Of course that is better than 160 or 180 per cent. Moreover, I apprehend that if $\frac{5}{8}$ is an average, on certain qualities it would be very much higher.

Mr. WALLACE. There is another point that hon. gentlemen opposite forget. They have a chance of having their speeches printed on Canadian stereotypes, owing to this duty.

Mr. CHARLTON. In the matter of stereotype plates, the Government ought to put them on the list of articles the duty on which is arranged on an ad valorem basis. There is a great variation in the value of these plates. The duty as it is arranged now may be as much again, on an ad valorem basis, in some cases as in others. The newspapers of the country certainly deserve fair treatment at the hands of the Government, and if the Government were to put a duty of 20 per cent ad valorem on stereotyped plates, it would be a high enough rate. We would then have the duty assessed on plates according to their value, and the matter would be placed upon an equitable basis. The duty, instead of being a specific duty of $\frac{3}{4}$ of a cent per square inch, should be an ad valorem duty, and the committee should decide what rate that ad valorem duty should be. The hon. gentleman proposes to charge stereotyped plates 30 cents per column. I have just measured one, and the plate costs 20 cents per column; so under this proposed duty the rate is 150 per cent. The committee have been misled as to the actual rate of duty on the ad valorem basis, and we are now agreeing to a duty of 150 per cent on this arrangement of $\frac{3}{4}$ of a cent per square inch.

Mr. WALLACE. The hon. gentleman is in error. He is estimating it at $\frac{3}{4}$ of a cent per square inch. We have reduced it one-half, to $\frac{3}{8}$.

Mr. CHARLTON. Even at $\frac{3}{8}$, it is 75 per cent, and that is as high again as it ought to be. You can prove it by measuring a column and getting the number of square inches, assuming a basis of 20 cents a column for the stereotyped plate.

Mr. FOSTER. What paper are you measuring?

Mr. CHARLTON. I am measuring the 'Globe.'

Mr. FOSTER. You can't depend upon the 'Globe.'

Mr. CHARLTON. Papers differ in their moral character, but they do not differ much in the size of their columns.

Mr. GRIEVE. I have a letter from the editor of a German newspaper, who tells me that he pays 20 cents per column for the plate, and 32 cents per column for duty.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. I think the Minister might well consider the case of German plates, because there is no probability of German plates being made in this country in the near future. The German newspapers printed in Canada have to compete with the German newspapers printed in Detroit and Buffalo, which are largely circulated in Canada. The German people prefer to have, as the hon. member for Perth said, a larger amount of reading matter in their papers than they get now in Canadian papers, because the Canadian-German newspaper publishers cannot afford to give the same amount of reading matter as the German papers in the United States, where they get this cheap plate. It is utterly impossible for the Canadian-German newspaper publisher to compete with the American-German newspaper publisher under these circumstances, because he cannot get German stereotyped plate in this country at all, it is not manufactured here, and there is no probability it ever will be manufactured here, and he is placed at a great disadvantage in his business when he has to compete with the papers on the other side. I think it would be well for the Government to consider this matter, even if they do charge an exorbitant duty on English stereotyped plates used by English newspaper publishers, they ought to allow the Germans to be placed on the same basis as the American-German publishers. So long as they have to pay such an exorbitant duty for these plates that they have to bring in from the United States, our Canadian-German papers cannot be as large as the German papers in the United States, and they cannot get as high a circulation; and if the principles of the Conservative Government are to be propagated in this country through German newspapers, the Government must give them the same facilities for furnishing news as the American-German newspapers have.

Mr. McMULLEN. The suggestion of the hon. member for Perth (Mr. Grieve) is a very important one, and I hope the Minister will give it his consideration. There are a great many Germans who would like to get their reading matter as cheap as possible, and I think the Minister should consent to the suggestion that has been made.

Item agreed to.

Cane, reed or rattan, split or otherwise manufactured, $17\frac{1}{2}$ per cent.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. To what are you raising it?

Mr. FOSTER. I am lowering it; it was formerly 25 per cent.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It was $12\frac{1}{2}$ per cent.

Mr. FOSTER. This is a second thought. The duty on that article was 25 per cent. This is a rearrangement of the duty by which it is brought down to $12\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. We think, however, that is too small a protection for the industry, which is a large one in or near Toronto. I should like to make the duty $17\frac{1}{2}$ per cent, which will then be a reduction of $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is manufactured principally from the cane or rattan? Is the industry one of splitting the cane?

Mr. FOSTER. They import the bamboo, strip it, split it, and prepare it.

Mr. McMULLEN. Is there any duty on the cane when imported?

Mr. FOSTER. No, the rough cane comes in free. Referring to the sugar duties, I propose to place the duty on glucose at 1 cent per pound.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). That would be equivalent to a duty of about 115 per cent.

Mr. FOSTER. About 100 per cent.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I am informed it would be more.

Mr. FOSTER. I saw to-day invoices at $15\frac{3}{8}$ cents, and that would be less than 100 per cent.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The candy makers and persons engaged in the confectionery business will find this to be a tremendous tax. The Finance Minister is dealing with them somewhat as he dealt with the agricultural implement makers.

Mr. FOSTER. No.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). He has given a certain amount of protection, but he has also given them a certain amount of burden to bear.

Mr. FOSTER. I have been good to confectioners, chiefly from my regard for the hon. member for North Brant (Mr. Paterson). They have 35 per cent straight protection. I have kept the duty on the coverings for the confections at a low rate.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). One hundred per cent on glucose.

Mr. FOSTER. I have reduced the duties on sugar, which is, of course, largely used, and I have given them peanuts at a much less rate of duty than formerly, and I am now reducing glucose from $1\frac{1}{2}$ cents to 1 cent.

Mr. McMULLEN. How many manufacturers of glucose are there in the country?

Mr. FOSTER. There are two, at least, that I know of.

Mr. McMULLEN. The Minister having decided to reduce the duty on glucose, he should also reduce the duty on corn starch.

Mr. FOSTER. I did reduce it from 4 cents to $1\frac{1}{2}$ cents.

Mr. McMULLEN. From 2 cents to $1\frac{1}{2}$ cents.

Item agreed to.

Mr. FOSTER. Under the head of textiles, I propose that shirts costing more than $3 per dozen, shall bear a duty of $1 per dozen, and 25 per cent.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). If the hon. gentleman left them at 25 per cent, omitting the $1 per dozen, he would be placing the duty sufficiently high.

Mr. FOSTER. The duty on the raw material is 25 per cent. I propose to ask the committee to consider the case of shirts costing less than $3 per dozen, the day after to-morrow.

Mr. EDGAR. Suppose shirts cost $4 per dozen, this tax would be 50 per cent, and on shirts costing $3.25 it would be 55 per cent.

Mr. MULOCK. They are a luxury.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). For that reason, perhaps, the duty is placed at 55 per cent.

Mr. FOSTER. The committee has already discussed shirts, collars and cuffs, and gone over the whole ground. Reasons were given why high protection was necessary in order to protect the industry in this country. Information was given as to the distribution of the industry, as to the large amount of labour employed, and the reasons stated why it was necessary to afford protection in order to protect our people against cheap labour in other countries.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman has asserted that shirt makers pay a duty on the cotton that is manufactured in Canada, namely, 25 per cent on the raw material. If the contention of some of his friends, including the Prime Minister, is correct, shirt makers do not pay any tax unless they manufacture shirts from foreign material. The Finance Minister has made a little progress, but he has not carried all his friends with him. The hon. gentleman is charging an enormous duty when he imposes a rate of over 50 per cent.

Cotton clothing and other manufactures of cotton, n.e.s., $32\frac{1}{2}$ per cent ad valorem.

Mr. BOWERS. Does that mean nets and seines?

Mr. FOSTER. Nets and seines are on the free list.

Mr. BOWERS. Is it intended to put nets and seines on the free list?

Mr. FOSTER. I told the hon. gentleman that two months ago.

Mr. BOWERS. In the old tariff it said: "nets and seines free." In the free list of this tariff it says: "twines to be used in making nets and seines, free."

Mr. WALLACE. That was changed in committee a good while ago.

Mr. EDGAR. Is the Minister going to allow this item to pass in that shape?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. EDGAR. Surely the Minister of Finance cannot be in earnest, because while that is a reduction of $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent on clothing, it is an increase from 20 per cent to $32\frac{1}{2}$ per cent on manufactures of cotton, n.e.s.

Mr. WALLACE. The intention of that is, and the wording of it will bear it out, that cotton clothing is $32\frac{1}{2}$ per cent, and articles manufactured from textile cotton fabrics are $32\frac{1}{2}$ per cent; not any manufactures from the cotton wool, but an article made such as a garment or bag, n.e.s., made from the cotton textile fabric.

Mr. EDGAR. If the Minister means that, would he be kind enough to say it in his tariff, because at present it does not say so.

Mr. FOSTER. It was the same reading in the old tariff.

Mr. EDGAR. I do not think so. The old tariff as to clothing was item 17, of 50 and 51 Vic., chapter 39, and the language used was this:

Clothing made of cotton or other material, n.o.p., including corsets or similar articles, made up by the seamstress or tailor, also tarpaulin, plain or coated with oil, paint, tar, or other composition, and cotton bags made up by the use of the needle, n.o.p., 35 per cent.

The Minister of Finance has shortened up that article now and made it to read: "cotton clothing," which perhaps includes it all, and I do not say it does not. However, by the Revised Statutes of Canada, chap. 33, item 139, we have the item reading in this way:

All manufactures of cotton, n.e.s., 20 per cent.

Will the Minister show me in his new tariff where this item of "manufactures of cotton, n.e.s." is, if it is not in this?

Mr. FOSTER. You mean by that, manufactures of cotton wool?

Mr. EDGAR. Manufactures of cotton, as is said here. That was the language which was used in the tariff before, whatever it meant, and under that the hon. gentleman knows that in the importations there were large quantities, even of sewing thread, imported under that n.e.s. at 20 per cent. Now, while this item on clothing apparently is a reduction of 2½ per cent, it is on all other manufactures of cotton, an increase of 12½ per cent. If it is not meant to be so, I hope the hon. gentleman will change the language of the item.

Mr. WALLACE. The hon. gentleman asked where those items are provided for in the new tariff. Under items 3, 4 and 5 of "textiles," gray "unbleached cotton fabrics, 22½ per cent;" "white or bleached cotton fabrics, 25 per cent," and "cotton fabrics, printed, dyed or coloured, 30 per cent." Can the hon. gentleman find any item that is not included under these three? Every article of cotton manufacture is either bleached or unbleached, or printed, or coloured, and these three items will take in every manufacture of cotton, of whatever kind it may be, except those especially enumerated hereafter. There is no "n.e.s." required.

Mr. EDGAR. Under the old tariff there were forty different items, and now you have reduced them to twenty.

Mr. WALLACE. It shows how we simplified this one.

Mr. FOSTER. It is intended that this should include everything.

Mr. EDGAR. It may be intended, but is there any clause whatever for manufactured goods except this?

Mr. WALLACE. This item includes garments or articles made from the textile fabrics, and not made from the cotton wool. Just the same as cotton clothing and any other articles that might be made from the cotton clothing.

Mr. FLINT. Has the Government concluded to accede to the request of the Yarmouth Cotton and Duck Company to transfer from the free list cotton duck for belting and hose, and place upon it some duty in order to protect, to a certain extent, their manufacture? If I understand the situation correctly as laid before the Government, it is this: We have on cotton manufactures a pretty high tariff of 32½ per cent. A certain manufacturing institution manufactures goods of this kind, which are used by belting and hose companies in the manufacture of their belting and hose. This cotton manufacture is admitted under this present tariff free. Now this company says: We look to the Trade and Navigation Returns, and we find that about $50,000 of that particular class of that cotton goods is imported free as a raw material for the manufacture of belting and hose. These manufacturers ask the Government to apply the principle of their own policy to them as well as to other manufacturers, by giving them the benefit of some protection on their manufactured product. It seems to me, treating the matter entirely from a protective standpoint, from which I think this tariff should be discussed as far as the details are concerned, that they have made out a pretty good claim; and I would like to ask the Minister or the Controller, if they have made up their mind either way, to state the reasons they have for any proposed action, because, so far as I have been able to study the question from the papers placed in my hands, it appeared to me, viewing the matter from the standpoint of the Government, and the standpoint of the principle on which the tariff is based, that they had made out a good case.

Mr. FOSTER. That properly comes in, I suppose, under the free list, which I hope we shall soon reach, and then we will take it up. I wish to make a little change in this, to make it clear. I wish to make it read: "Cotton clothing and other articles made from cotton fabrics, n.e.s., 32½ per cent." That is what was meant, and this will make it clear.

Logs and round unmanufactured timber, not specially enumerated or provided for in this Act, free.

Mr. SPROULE. Before this item is passed, I would like to say something upon it. In the northern part of Ontario a condition of things has been going on for some time which is very detrimental to the best interests of that portion of the country at least; and I believe the same thing is going on to some extent in the Maritime Provinces and in the province of Quebec. I refer to the exportation of pine logs, spruce logs and other logs in large quantities to the United States.

Mr. CHARLTON. If the hon. gentleman will allow me, I would suggest that this discussion would come properly when we reach the export duties at the close of this list.

Mr. SPROULE. We are at the free list of logs, and I do not know that we could have the discussion at a better time. I say that the exportation of our logs has been increasing every year since 1885. No restraint is put upon that exportation by our Government, and it is doing the country a very serious injury. We had a discussion on this subject last session, but owing to the shortness of the session not as many spoke upon it as wished to do so; therefore, the Government were not as fully informed on the subject as they otherwise would have been had this discussion continued, and as no change has been made since, the discussion which then took place appears not to have influenced the Government in the direction we had hoped it would, and therefore it becomes our duty again to draw the attention of the Government to this condition of things. In 1885, I believe, we had an export duty on logs of $2 a thousand. In 1888, the duty was increased to $3 a thousand, and it had the desired effect: it stopped the exportation of Canadian logs to a very large extent. The result was that the mills in the northern part of Ontario commenced to cut the lumber that had previously been cut in the United States. But, through influences that were brought to bear on the Government, they were persuaded that if they would take off the export duty on logs the Americans would give us a free market for our lumber. It is true, they did reduce the duty to the extent of $1 a thousand on pine lumber, but on no other. That change was in the right direction, but it did not meet the expectations or the wishes of the Canadian lumbermen, for it did not prevent large numbers of our logs going out of the country. Then, the work commenced to extend, and from that time to the present there have been taken out of our country increasing numbers of logs every year. I have here from the Trade and Navigation Returns a statement of the value in dollars and cents of the timber taken out of the country during the last few years. In 1889, when the export duty existed, there was taken out $444,805 worth, in 1890 $615,194 worth, in 1891 $615,320 worth, in 1892, after a large number of timber limits in the Georgian Bay district had been bought by Americans, $1,044,134 worth, and in 1893 $1,517,137 worth.

Mr. DEVLIN. Are these amounts for logs only?

Mr. SPROULE. For logs, and principally in the Georgian Bay district. I am giving them just as they appear in the Trade and Navigation Returns. What does this mean to the people in our section of the country? It means, first, the destruction and waste of our timber, because the timber of that country is being taken out in such large quantities that in a few years those vast and magnificent forests in the province of Ontario provided by nature for man's use, will be entirely destroyed. No one can deny that fact; any one who has given any attention to the subject must admit that year by year the timber is decreasing very rapidly. At the present time, I am credibly informed and believe, over fifty townships in the Georgian Bay district are denuded of pine timber every year. The Ontario Government, which has been looking into the matter, has come to the conclusion that although there is a great deal of timber back there, still the best of the timber has gone, and in a few years that section of the country, which was formerly covered by magnificent pine forests, will be almost entirely bare. Then this policy is taking out of the country its raw material and giving to Americans, instead of to Canadians, the labour and the profit of cutting, towing and manufacturing that raw material. What does that amount to? I gave last year statistics formulated by an American lumberman of the amount likely to be cut during the year, and I have been since told that even a larger amount than the estimate was taken—I have been told that some 500,000,000 feet were taken out. The following figures I gave last year as an approximate estimate of the cut for the then current season:—

The Saginaw Lumber Company is putting in over 20,000,000 feet in the Spanish River; Barringer, 15,000,000; Spanish River Lumber Company, for Folsom & Arnold, at Bay City, 17,000,000; Nelson, for his Cheboygan mill, 8,000,000; Park, Woods & Company, for Au Sauble, Mich., 15,000,000, and E. Hall, of Detroit, for his Bay City mill, 16,000,000. On the Mississauga River, Gilchrist, of Alpena, has let contracts for 80,000,000 to stock his mill, and Howry & Sons will take out 25,000,000. On the French River and Wahapite, there are heavy operators. The Emery Lumber Company are taking out over 50,000,000 for Tawas and Bay City; Hart & Fisher are going to get out all the logs they can this winter, and next summer they will take out over 50,000,000 feet; Captain Bliss will take from French River for his Saginaw mill 16,000,000, and the Moore Lumber Company, about 10,000,000. Further east, Wm. Peters will take out 17,000,000, and Merrill & Ring about 12,000,000.

Summing these up, and adding what is taken out by Canadian jobbers and sold to Americans, they amount to about 450,000,000 feet.

Mr. DEVLIN. From what district?

Mr. SPROULE. The Georgian Bay district. I notice that in the discussion on the Wilson Tariff Bill in the United States lately, a friend of the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) who evidently was posted on what he was talking about, said, speaking of the Americans: We are in a position to-day to supply our mills from the Canadian shore.

Mr. CHARLTON. Who was that?

Mr. SPROULE. Senator Weadock, who was quoted last year as an authority by the hon. member for North Norfolk. He said: We are able to supply our mills from the Canadian shore. There are four ports of the United States, Saginaw, Alpena, Cheboygan, and Tawas, whose mills are nearly entirely supported by logs taken out of Canada. To-day, we are bringing over annually about 500,000,000 of Canadian pine to be sawn up in the mills of our country. Therefore, the request was made in the United States Senate to allow lumber to come in free, lest the Canadians should put on an export duty and stop the export of those logs. The American senator then asked: What does it mean if these logs are stopped? It means virtually the shutting down of these great mills and the stoppage of the operations carried on in the salt works. It means the throwing out of employment of thousands of men employed to-day in the manufacture into lumber of these logs, taken out of Canada. But, Mr. Speaker, on the other hand, I ask, what does it mean as regards Canada? Last year I gave figures, which I believed to be approximately correct, because they were furnished by one of the biggest lumbermen in the Ottawa Valley. According to these figures, the lumbermen in the Ottawa Valley expected to take out, last year, 428,000,000 feet of lumber. The trees are cut down in the winter, put into the streams and lakes, floated down, and in the summer are cut up in our mills. To take out enough logs to make that quantity of lumber, required the employment of about 7,000 men in the woods during the winter months, and then for the balance of the year in the mills and lumber yards, cutting up, piling and shipping the lumber to a foreign market. It means, in fact, the employment of seven thousand men all the year round, six months cutting down the trees, carrying the logs to the lakes and streams, floating them down, and then six months cutting up the logs in the mills and piling and shipping them. Every one knows what commercial activity is caused by the lumber mills in the city of Hull and along the Ottawa Valley by the number of men employed in the lumbering industry, and one can readily understand what a depression has resulted in the Georgian Bay district from the fact that all the logs taken out from that district are now cut on the American side. In the Ottawa Valley, only 428,000,000 feet were taken out, but, according to an American authority, 500,000,000 were taken out in the Georgian Bay district in the course of the year. That means the employment of 8,000 men for the winter six months. But these men, who otherwise would be actively employed in this country in the summer for the remaining six months, are, by the policy of the Government, thrown idle during that time. They cannot engage in the mills on the other side, because they are met at the line by the alien labour law, which shuts out every Canadian from employment there. Therefore, the Canadians are thrown out of employment for six months in the year. It is easy to conceive what a loss that causes to the towns in the Georgian Bay district. What were lively commercial centres a few years ago are, comparatively speaking, dead to-day. The mills that gave employment to hundreds of men are now standing idle. In Mildand, a few years ago, there were four large mills working, one of which cut a hundred thousand feet per day. At present there is not a single one in operation.

One of these mills used to employ about three hundred men, directly and indirectly, but to-day it is shut down. Go to the Muskoka district, around Parry Sound, and you will find the same condition of things. Go along the Spanish river and the north shore, and of the mills which formerly cut large quantities of lumber every year, almost all are idle, and the busy hum of industry which rejoiced the ear a few years ago, is silent, only to be heard on the American side. One can readily understand what that means to Canadians. It means that the raw material is taken out of our country in order to give employment to Americans. It means the keeping of our saw mills idle. An average saw mill would cut, probably ten million feet in a year. According to the estimate of Senator Weadock, 500,000,000 feet were taken across Georgian Bay last year. At the rate of ten million feet per mill, that would keep fifty mills going the whole season round. You can understand then, Mr. Speaker, what a loss the transfer of this business to the American shore has caused our section of the country, where we experience the evil results more than, perhaps, any other portion of the country. Not only are the men thrown out of employment, and the mills forced to shut down, but the money expended in plant is utterly unproductive. And all this is owing to the policy carried out for some years past by this House. This policy has also resulted in raising the price of finishing materials to our farmers and others. A few years ago, before the logs were taken out of Canada, we had the advantage of getting cheaply the cull lumber to convert into doors, sashes, shutters and other lines of finishing work. We could obtain that lumber at $4.50 per thousand feet, laid down in carloads and freight paid. To-day, we have to pay for the poorest kind, at least $9.75 per thousand feet. One can understand from that why it is that the price of the goods in these various lines has gone up. Doors, sashes, frames, blinds, and the finishing for buildings—all these lines have gone up in price, greatly increasing the expense of those who desire to build and who ought to be supplied from the refuse timber of their own country instead of being obliged to pay for higher priced goods. Now lath went up in about the same proportion. A few years ago we could buy a good pine lath at $1.25 to $1.35 per thousand. It is now worth $2.75, and hard to be got at that. Another result has been to deprive our railways and vessels of an important item in their trade. When these logs are taken across Georgian Bay, they are not towed by Canadian tugs; the Americans will not allow that to be done. I see they are endeavouring now to induce the Government to allow not only their towing plant, but their chains and other parts of the outfit used in this work to be entered free. In the towing they use their own tug, while Canadian shipping is left comparatively idle. Another result is that it has destroyed a valuable market for the products of the farm. A few years ago in the Georgian Bay country, one of the best markets we had in the fall was among the lumbermen of the Georgian Bay. We could always afford to pay 5 cents a bushel more for oats and a cent a pound more for pork and a higher price for other products of the farm which were sent to lumber camps to be used as supplies. How is it now? We do not send a single pound of pork to this market. These men coming in from the United States bring their supplies with them, and I am told by those engaged in business—I mean the labouring men—and I have letters in my possession to the same effect that a large amount of the stuff is smuggled in, no duty being paid. They bring in their sleighs, chains, and harness, as well as their supplies of oats, corn, pork and beans, a large proportion being brought in without the payment of duty. Moreover, they bring their own men in in hundreds. It is estimated that last season over a thousand men from the state of Michigan were employed in the Georgian Bay district taking out logs, this labour coming in competition with Canadian labour. And with what effect. Men who a few years ago were receiving from $25 to $30 a month, last year were cut down to $18. This was because of the competition they were obliged to endure through the importation of these men. Times were hard in the United States and many men were out of employment and these men were brought over here and put to work, reducing the value of Canadian labour. Again, this system is seriously injuring our towns and villages in the northern portion of the country. I spoke of that before, and need not dwell upon it at length. Another evil result is that it is destroying the fisheries of the Georgian Bay. Some may ask the question how it is that this can possibly interfere with the fisheries. These logs are taken over the Georgian Bay in great fields, enclosed within a boom. I am told that sometimes they extend from one to two miles between the booms. The rubbing of the logs together scrapes off the bark and this sinking to the bottom of the lake where the fish have been in the habit of getting their feed, settles down to such an extent that it covers up and destroys the feeding grounds of the fish, which are thus forced to migrate. In many localities in the Georgian Bay where fishermen formerly found it profitable to carry on their business, they are now unable to catch any fish at all. Moreover, the effect is to destroy the nets of the fishermen. I have here a sample given me by some fishermen. This is a portion of a net that was spread for fish, but the bark from the pine logs settled down and got so entangled with the mesh that the net has become useless. This bark cannot be taken out, the net cannot be made over, and so it must be thrown away as completely destroyed. The fishermen have remonstrated against this serious injury to their occupation, but are unable to do anything to prevent it. I have the authority of a fisherman for saying that there are between one and two thousand men engaged in the fishing business in the Georgian Bay and Lake Huron. That means between one and two thousand families and a very large number of these are deprived of the returns they would get for their labour were it not for this injury to their occupation. This towing of logs not only injures fisheries and destroys the nets of the fishermen, but it is a serious danger to navigation. These logs are taken across, as I have stated, in great fields, sometimes nearly a mile long. While the tug that is towing them can be seen at night, those directing a vessel cannot see the great tow of logs behind and cannot be aware of their danger until they run into the tow, injuring their vessel and endangering the lives of the people aboard. Now, what does this business mean to the labouring men in our district? Senator Weadock estimated that logs representing 500,000,000 feet of lumber were towed across Georgian Bay. The towing would represent $500,000. The cost for manufacture, piling and shipping would be $2.50 per thousand, or $1,250,000. All this is labour that is lost to Canadian workmen. For freight it would cost about $2 per thousand, or a further $1,000,000, lost to Canadian railways and vessel-owners. The lath and culls would represent 50 cents per thousand, or $250,000. So that in the aggregate, the Canadian lose, nearly all for labour, about $3,000,000 per year, and that all in our section, by virtue of the system of the present day of allowing logs to be taken out free. This quantity of timber is enough to keep fifty mills in operation for the whole season, running at an average of about 10,000,000 feet each. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), speaking on this subject last session asked: Why should we complain if the Americans take a few logs over to their country; we take as many from them as they take from us. I stated then and I repeat it now, that I have studied carefully the Trade and Navigation Returns, and every other authority I know of, and I have failed to find anything to verify or justify the statements made by the hon. gentleman. His estimate was based, I think, upon information that was not correct. The hon. gentleman said that we brought into the country as many logs as we took out of the country. And to make up that, what did he give? I find from the Trade and Navigation Returns that in 1889, while there were $444,805 worth went out, only $358,805 worth came in. In 1890 there went out $615,194 worth, and there were brought in $256,100 worth. In 1891 there went out $615,320, but there were brought in $859,898 worth. That was the only year where the importation was greater than the exportation. $412,224 worth of that was lumber taken in Manitoba.

Mr. CHARLTON. I would call the hon. gentleman's attention to one fact that he has overlooked. In making returns of the imports of logs from the United States, our Trade and Navigation Returns make no account of logs received at St. John and sawed there, from the state of Maine.

Mr. SPROULE. I want to show the hon. gentleman that he is entirely mistaken in the conclusion he draws, and the information he gives regarding that one item of lumber. In the year 1892 we brought in $237,723 worth, and we sent out $1,044,134 worth, or rather the Americans took that value away of our Canadian logs. In 1893 we brought in $266,990 worth, and we sent out $1,517,157 worth. Now, the hon. gentleman said that the Trade and Navigation Returns take no account of the lumber that is brought in from the state of Maine, to be sawn in New Brunswick. The hon. gentleman is in error in making that statement, because he knows, I think, as well as I do—at least, if he does not, he ought to know, being a lumberman—that the logs which are brought in there are brought in under special conditions; they are not cut by Canadians, and we get no benefit whatever from them. I say they are brought in under special circumstances. Those who are acquainted with that section of the country know that the streams run from the state of Maine down into Canadian territory, and in the Webster-Ashburton Treaty of 1846, a provision was made that timber in the state of Maine along the tributaries of the St. John, should be allowed to be brought into Canada, because it must be floated down the river to reach the markets of the world. It is brought down by Americans and manufactured at the mouth of the river, and thence shipped to other countries. That is a privilege they enjoy. The third article of the treaty providing for it, reads as follows:—

That all the produce of the forest in logs, lumber, timber, boards, staves or shingles, or of agriculture, not being manufactured, grown on any of these parts of the state of Maine watered by the River St. John, or its tributaries, shall have free access into and through the said river and its said tributaries, having their source within the State of Maine, to and from the seaport at the mouth of the said River St. John, and to and around the falls of the said river, either by boats, rafts or other conveyance; that when within the province of New Brunswick the said produce shall be dealt with as if it were the product of the province.

Then there was to be a special customs regulation made to meet the requirements of the case, and the clause in the United States Customs regulations relating to this matter reads as follows:—

The products of the forests of the State of Maine, upon the St. John River and its tributaries, owned by American citizens.

Owned by American citizens, not by Canadian citizens.

And sawed or hewn in the province of New Brunswick by American citizens, the same being unmanufactured, in whole or in part, which is now admitted into the ports of the United States free of duty, shall continue to be so admitted under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury shall from time to time prescribe.

And upon these conditions only this large quantity of logs are admitted. Now, the hon. member for North Norfolk said last year that over $700,000 worth of logs were brought in through that channel that did not appear in our Trade and Navigation Returns, and therefore he said that we brought in more logs from the United States to Canada than they took out from Canada. But we ought to leave out this large quantity, seeing that they must be owned by Americans, must be cut, manufactured and handled by Americans, for, although they are manufactured on Canadian soil, Canadians reap substantially no benefit whatever from that manufacture, and therefore we have no right to include that quantity. If you take that out, you reduce the entire imports down to the figures I have given. Those are not shown in the Trade and Navigation Returns. The hon. gentleman made an estimate of the quantity, and I give his own estimate, therefore it must be correct. But if you leave out that estimate, as it ought to be left out, it leaves us in this position: that last year we only brought in $266,000 worth of American logs, while they took from us $1,517,000 worth. Now, I do not wonder that some people are advocating the taking of our logs out of Canada free of duty. Why? Because their interest lies in the United States, they want to get them over there to saw. I do not wish to be offensive, nor to say anything that I should not say in reference to conduct of any man; but when I tell this House that the hon. member for North Norfolk has been engaged in the lumber business for a great many years, that his mills are located at Tonawanda, in the state of New York, that he requires the raw material to keep those mills running, that he has to take the logs from the Georgian Bay, and when he gets them there free it is to his advantage—when the House knows this, they will estimate what importance should be attached to his arguments when he speaks on a question of this kind. And that has been going on for many years. He cannot, under a contract, take one of his own Canadian fellow-citizens over there to manufacture his lumber, but must employ Americans in his mills altogether. Although we could bring Americans into the Georgian Bay district to cut down the pines, when Canadians float these logs to the line they are there met by the Alien Labour law and are sent back, and Americans do the rest of the work. Now, I do not wonder that he should advocate taking the logs out of the country free of duty. It answers his purpose, it adds to his profits, therefore it is quite natural, from a selfish motive, if from no other, that he should support that policy. He stands to-day in the same position as the United States lumbermen over in Bay City, in Alpena, or in Cheboygan; he has to get his raw material out of Canada to keep his men and mills employed over there, therefore he wants to get that raw material at the cheapest price, and without paying anything to Canadians who furnish that raw material. I say it is unfair, and I am sorry to find that the Government have not provided for an export duty on logs. I believe that if we had an export duty of $3 or $4 a thousand put upon these logs we would have a large quantity of lumber sawed in our country, that is now sawed in the United States, it would compel the employment of those 8,000 men in our own country, it would make an additional market for the products of the farmers in western Ontario, and for the stores of the merchants, it would increase work and promote industries in our own country, where to-day there is stagnation. Now, this has been going on for years, and if it is not stopped, in a few years more the timber will be gone, and will be no longer worth protecting. Some will tell you that the Americans do not want our lumber. That is not so; they say themselves they do want it. They say their mills would be idle, those salt works would be lying idle were it not for the fact that men come over to the Canadian side and supply themselves with the raw material to keep those mills going. It is in the interest of the people of our country, especially of my section of the country, that we should have an export duty on logs. This question has been before the House year after year. Last year, as I said at the commencement of my remarks, there was not time enough for the members to discuss it properly; we only had part of one afternoon to consider it, and there was not consequently a full expression of opinion in the House, and the Government could not estimate the feeling that existed in the country as it would have been voiced by the people's representatives. Let me say that the town councils and the county councils in our part of the country have passed very strong resolutions favouring an export duty. The county council of Grey, representing 80,000 inhabitants, the county council of Simcoe, the town councils of Collingwood, Owen Sound and Meaford, along with several others, have passed resolutions strongly favouring it. One or two deputations have been down here to interview the Government to induce them to reimpose this export duty on logs, but up to the present time we have not succeeded in doing so. We still hope it may be done. We think it is short-sighted policy to allow this raw material to be taken from the country without let or hindrance and without the imposition of an export duty, and I hope the

Mr. SPROULE.

Government will see fit at an early date to reimpose the export duty on timber. If we do not do so, our forests will gradually disappear, and we shall lose a very valuable asset left to us by Providence, and be unable to use it and obtain that advantage from it in the future that we have done in the past. There are two ways in which this may be accomplished. The Provincial Government, which sells the limits, might impose restrictions so as to make it compulsory that the timber must be cut and manufactured in the province. They have not done so for the simple reason that they obtain a better price by imposing no restrictions in regard to taking timber from the country. So there is no other way of securing this necessary restriction than by placing an export duty on logs through the Dominion Parliament, and when we cannot move the Provincial Government we should be able to retain this restriction from the Dominion Government and be able to induce them to impose an export duty, and thus prevent the denuding of the forests, which constitute a great source of wealth, and retain in the country the labour and trade connected with the manufacturing of that lumber. Allow that section of the country to benefit by it; it is not benefiting by it to-day, and it ought to be able to do so. Year by year the Americans are buying up the timber limits in much larger proportions, they are buying them from Canadians to an increasing extent, and are paying large prices for them. Some hon. members will say that the lumbermen will suffer. Let hon. members, however, consider the high prices that are being paid and the large profit that is made to-day. When it is remembered that McArthur Bros. bought up timber limits for $73,000, and held them for four or five years and sold them for $450,000, hon. members can understand the extent of the profits coming into the pockets of the lumbermen. The men who own timber limits, of course, do not want an export duty imposed because they would not receive quite so much for their limits, but if this duty were imposed, the labour would be kept in Canada, and the money would be spent here instead of on the other side of the line, and it would be largely spent in the Georgian Bay district on account of the pine timber there. I hope the Government will reconsider this question, and put an export duty on logs before the session closes.

Mr. CHARLTON. I can quite sympathize with the hon. member for Grey (Mr. Sproule) in his desire to see the pine timber in the Georgian Bay district, manufactured in Canadian mills. It would be very desirable in the interest of the country, if this result could be secured without involving a great disaster in endeavouring to obtain it. Trade, however, finds its level naturally, without the interposition of the Government, and if the sawing of the timber now cut from the Georgian Bay forests in Canadian mills could be secured without diminishing its value $2 or $3 per thousand, well and good; but I am not in favour of ruining one class of the community in order to afford incidental benefit to another. An export duty is essentially a robbery; it cannot be justified on any condition. It is a policy usually resorted to by barbarous states. The United States prohibit an export duty by a clause in their constitution, and the best political economist recognized an export duty as a measure for the purpose of forcing trade into unnatural channels, and imposing on the industries of the country burdens which cannot be justly borne. The hon. gentleman, in the course of his remarks to-night, admitted that the result of the export duty in 1890, which was adopted on the promise made by the American Government that the duties on lumber would be reduced $1 per thousand, produced beneficial effects to the extent of largely increasing the lumbering business of the country, and of conferring benefits on those engaged in the trade. The hon. gentleman told the House that the trade was very largely increased, and in that connection he made use of figures which were the guesses of an American lumber journal, and he paraded those figures before the House as a correct statement of the volume of trade, amounting to 500,000,000 feet last year. I wish to give the hon. gentleman some authentic returns.

Mr. SPROULE. I wish to correct the hon. gentleman. These statements were not the guesses of an American lumber journal, but were estimates of both American and Canadian lumbermen in the business, and they should be tolerably correct.

Mr. CHARLTON. The hon. gentleman quoted them from an American lumber journal as to the amount of business to be done, as the number of chickens to be hatched, when the result of the business were summed up, and the amount of business was placed at 500,000,000 feet. The Ontario Government collected Crown dues on all logs shipped to Michigan, except about 10,000,000 feet, taken from Indian reserves. They exercise a close supervision in order to collect $1 for every thousand feet. The cut is supervised by rangers during the winter, and if there is any suspicion of any imposition or fraud, the logs are seized and scaled over, and the Ontario Government may be relied on to secure from those lumbermen payment for all the timber they have cut. The return I hold in my hand shows that the export of logs last year from the province of Ontario was not 500,000,000 feet, but 236,432,802 feet. If it is necessary, I will give, in detail, the names of the parties who made returns to the Ontario Government, who paid their dues, who got their permits to export their logs, and who exported them. The return is as follows:—

Department of Crown Lands,) Toronto, 9th May, 1894.)

Mr. SPROULE. The hon. gentleman has not given the Canadian jobbers' portion, which is very large.

Mr. CHARLTON. I have given the return of the export of logs, showing the total quantity cut by men holding licenses under the Ontario Government, who made returns, who paid Crown dues, who obtained permits and exported their logs, and of that quantity, 20,000,000 were old logs from the previous year. This return contains a full statement of the quantity, excepting something like 10,000,000 feet exported from Indian reserves.

Mr. SPROULE. The hon. gentleman must know this, that he has taken the amounts collected for stumpage dues, and on that statement the return is made up. But the amount exported by Canadian jobbers does not appear.

Mr. CHARLTON. To talk with a gentleman who understands the trade is an easy matter, and it is very easy to get along with such an individual, but it is entirely different when you are talking with some one who is entirely ignorant of it.

Mr. SPROULE. I have heard that before.

Mr. CHARLTON. The hon. gentleman speaks, no doubt, with the very best intention, but he knows nothing about the subject. He has been grossly deceived with regard to the exports, and he is now unwilling to accept an official return, a return that is strictly accurate, made by men under oath, and who have paid their dues on this quantity of lumber, a return which shows as accurately as a return can show, the quantity exported.

So much for that branch of the subject. The statement made by the hon. gentleman with regard to the exports, is more than double the amount actually exported. Now, with reference to his statement that the mills are standing idle. It is true that owing to the improper location of certain mills in that region they are not running, but the mills in the vicinity of the pine regions where pine is convenient to the mills, are running. It has been found impossible on the part of some men to get their logs sawn there, and that has been the case on one occasion with myself. But the mills at Midland, and the mills at Victoria Harbour, and the mills at Collingwood, and the mills at other points are nearly as far from the source of supply as the Saginaw mills, and the reason these mills are standing idle is: that the logs have to be towed to them, and the towing is more dangerous, as you are on a lee shore all the way down, than to Tawas, Alpena or Bay City.

Mr. SPROULE. Does that apply to the Parry Sound mills?

Mr. CHARLTON. It does to a limited extent, although the mills about which the greatest difficulty and trouble is made are the mills at the points I have referred to.

The hon. gentleman has produced a piece of net here got up for the occasion, and I do not know how much ingenuity was expended in setting pieces of pine bark into the meshes of that net; but if any trouble results from the towage of logs by the dropping off of the bark, and the depositing of that bark on the shore, that trouble would be as great, if not greater, in the towage of the logs to Midland, Victoria Harbour and Collingwood, as in their towage to Michigan, and the objection amounts to nothing either one way or the other.

The hon. gentleman told us as a grievance that lumber has gone up in price. He states that it costs him and the people in his section of the country far more for lumber and far more for lath than it did before the removal of the export duties. Of course it does. It is one of the reasons that the lumbermen of this country are satisfied with this policy, because the products of the forest are higher in price now than before, and they are realizing more money from the lumber than previously. On lumber sawn in Canada, the duty has been reduced $1 per thousand feet, and on lumber exported from Canada in logs, the duty of $2 per thousand has been removed. The result is an advantage to the holders of stumpage, and to all parties interested in general. It may not be good for my hon. friend (Mr. Sproule), it may not have had the effect of cheapening the price as the policy of the Government is intended in some respects to do. It may not be in favour of cheapening lumber, laths, shingles and labour, but the interests of the lumbermen and the interests of the labourers are better served in consequence of having prosperity by reason of the high prices and better returns.

The hon. gentleman tells us that Canadian tugs are not allowed to tow logs to Canada. That is another illustration of the correct knowledge possessed by the hon. gentleman. All the Canadian tugs on the upper lakes suitable for the work are engaged in this business.

An hon. MEMBER. Oh, no.

Mr. CHARLTON. Yes; all the Canadian tugs fit for the business are engaged in it during the towing season, and there are no restrictions on Canadian tugs. Those rafts are cleared from a Canadian port for an American port, and Canadian vessels can engage in the business of going from a Canadian port to an American port just as well as American tugs are cleared from an American port and can go to a Canadian port. There are no restrictions whatever in this respect, unless in the case of wreckage, and in such cases an American tug cannot work on the Canadian shore, and the Canadian boat cannot work on the American shore. In consequence of that fact, all the towing companies have vessels registered in both countries for the purpose of being placed in such a position that they can attend to the rescue of their rafts on the Canadian shore with Canadian tugs, and that they can attend to the rescue of their rafts on the American shore with American registered tugs. So much for the accuracy of the hon. gentleman's assertion with regard to that matter.

Mr. SPROULE. Then why are they applying to-day to get their towing plant free?

Mr. CHARLTON. That refers to boom sticks and chains, and boom sticks and chains are not a tug. Although it may be held to be part of the outfit of a tug, just as much as a tow line is, yet it is not a tug. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Sproule) said that Canadian tugs were not permitted to participate in this trade, and I inform him now that he is utterly mistaken in that. He tells us that wages have been reduced in consequence of this change. That statement is not according to the facts. When the export duty was taken off logs in 1890, wages that winter went up 30 per cent or more, and in 1891, wages in the Georgian Bay district were nearly double what they had been previous to the removal of the export duty. It is true that last winter there was a decline in wages as compared with the previous year, but that was in consequence of the great commercial stringency and depression in the lumber market. However, the result of the removal of the export duty has been a large increase in the number of men employed, and greater prosperity in all the towns in the vicinity of lumber operations in the Georgian Bay district.

The hon. gentleman also referred to the dangers of navigation by these rafts, and he stated that the rafts were one or two miles long. Well, Baron Munchausen could not have made a wilder statement than that. I suppose they may possibly be three-eighths of a mile long, some of them.

Mr. GILLMOR. How wide ?

Mr. CHARLTON. Seven or eight hundred feet, or six hundred feet wide of the bag boom, but they do not all endanger navigation in the open lake. They have a code of signals which prevent that. On a clear night the tug displays a certain kind of light to show that it has a raft in tow, and every navigator on the lakes knows what it is. On a foggy night they have what is technically known as a mocking-bird whistle, which gives a peculiar kind of shriek, and every navigator on the lakes knows what that is, and knows that there is a tow of logs behind that tug. Whether they hear the whistle or see the peculiar light of the tug, they know what her business is on the lake.

The hon. gentleman (Mr. Sproule) has also given us some information in a comparison of log exports and log imports, but he studiously avoids making an account of the great quantity of logs that we have been importing from the States practically, and which have been sawn at St. John, ever since lumbering commenced on the upper waters of the St. John River. As I have stated, these logs do not figure in the Trade and Navigation Returns, but the practical result, the money result of taking these logs to Canadian mills at the mouth of the St. John River, and sawing them in these mills, is precisely the same as the practical money result of taking the logs from Canada and sawing them in Michigan.

Mr. SPROULE. Will they let Canadians do the work ?

Mr. CHARLTON. Certainly they do. That is another assertion of the hon. gentleman, which is more absurd even than the one about the length of the rafts. The labour in these mills on the St. John River is Canadian labour, and Canadians earn the money in these mills. Let the hon. gentleman ask any man familiar with the business as to that, and he will learn that there is no restriction in regard to that matter at all, and that in addition Canadian labour takes the logs out in the woods and mans the drives on the river.

Mr. SPROULE. Allow me for one moment—

Mr. CHARLTON. I wish to make my statements without any interruptions.

Mr. SPROULE. I read the clause in the American Customs Act which prohibited Canadian labour. I read it there and that is the authority I gave, and it ought to be good authority.

Mr. CHARLTON. The hon. gentleman made this assertion last year, and I took the pains to acquire the information that would enable me to speak with authority on this matter, and I can inform him that he is utterly wrong.

Mr. SPROULE. You can go into the Library and acquire the information there.

Mr. CHARLTON. The mills situated at the mouth of the St. John River employ Canadian labour. The mills in the conversion of these American logs into lumber distribute money in the Canadian centres of employment to the same extent that money is distributed in Saginaw in sawing Canadian logs there.

Mr. INGRAM. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman—

Mr. CHARLTON. I would like about one-quarter of the interruption, and a little more chance to make my remarks.

Mr. INGRAM. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman this question. With regard to the mills that he has at Tonawanda, will the American people allow Canadian labourers to work in these mills ?

Mr. CHARLTON. I wish to inform the hon. gentleman that I have no saw-mill at Tonawanda, that I never owned a saw-mill in my life anywhere, either at Tonawanda or anywhere else.

Mr. INGRAM. The mill that you and your brother own there.

Mr. CHARLTON. My brother and I do not own a saw-mill at Tonawanda, and we never owned a saw-mill since the commencement of our business. So much for the accuracy of the information of some hon. gentlemen opposite. I never owned a saw-mill, or had an interest in a saw-mill, and I always had my logs sawn under contract.

Mr. INGRAM. What about your planing mill ?

Mr. CHARLTON. A planing mill is not a saw-mill any more than a horse is a mule. Now, Sir, with regard to the statement made by the hon. gentleman—

Mr. WALLACE. Answer the question about the planing mill.

Mr. CHARLTON. Is that pertinent to this matter ? If it is necessary to say what we have in the United States, we have a small planing and house trim mill at Tonawanda, which manufactures principally lumber brought from the southern states into forms fitted for the New York market—southern gum poplar, hardwood and cypress, and a little white pine, which, however, is a very insignificant portion of our business. Now, the export of logs from the state of Maine into the province of New Brunswick and the conversion of these into lumber at the city of St. John is practically the same as the exportation of logs from the Georgian Bay district and the conversion of them into lumber in the state of Michigan. The benefits accruing are in the one case the same as in the other. Now, we have no record in our Trade and Navigation Returns of the amount of this business, and, in order to get track of it, it was necessary to apply to other sources for information; and I did apply to the secretary of the Boom Company at Fredericton, N.B., for a statement of the quantity of logs brought into New Brunswick from the state of Maine that passed through their booms for several years. On the information I received, I made a computation of the exports and imports for a period of years extending from 1884 to 1890. During that period our exports of logs to the United States amounted to $3,289,000 worth, as shown by our Trade and Navigation Returns, and our imports of logs into Canada from the United States, including the amount as shown by the returns given by the secretary of the Fredericton Boom Company, amounted to $8,468,000 worth; so that we imported $5,179,000 worth of logs in excess of the amount we exported to the United States. In the face of these figures, gentlemen stand up here and make a great ado about the outrage of exporting logs to the United States, although up to the year 1890 we received $3 of advantage by our imports for every dollar of disadvantage, if any, we incurred by our exports. It is true that last year the export of logs increased. I suppose last year, possibly the year before, was the first year in the history of Canada when our exports of logs to the United States exceeded our imports of logs from that country. Last year our exports as shown by the Trade and Navigation Returns were: Pine, $1,057,000 worth; spruce, $123,000 worth; and elm, $216,000 worth. I suppose we may leave elm out of the calculation, as it has not been proposed to impose export duties upon this class of logs. In this case, our imports of logs from the United States last year, were $266,990 worth, as shown by our Trade and Navigation Returns, and the imports from the state of Maine to be sawed in the mills of St. John were about $900,000 worth, a total of $1,166,990 worth; and, leaving out of account elm logs, our exports to the United States amounted to $1,180,259. In other words, we exported in excess of the amount we imported $13,269 worth. And yet we have this great fuss made about the existence of a trade that the hon. member for East Grey makes out is ruining our country. As a House of Commons we have to look at the whole field. If our attention were confined to the matter as it affected the Georgian Bay district, we would have to consider it on a different basis from what we do when we regard the interests of the whole country, which is the view of the case we have to take. As I said before, I am sorry that these logs cannot be manufactured into lumber in the Georgian Bay district; but it cannot be done, although if we get lumber admitted to the United States free, and the provision for free lumber is on a permanent basis—this business of towing logs to Michigan will almost, if not entirely, cease. Give the Michigan lumbermen a reasonable assurance of the admission of lumber free into the American market as a permanent condition of the business, and they would prefer sawing the logs into lumber in the Georgian Bay district to towing them to Michigan. The risk of towing the logs is a considerable one, estimated at from 75 cents to $1 a thousand; the tow-bill is on an average $1.50 per thousand, and the cost of delivery to mills in the Saginaw Valley, from 30 to 70 cents per thousand, and these and other expenses they would avoid by sawing the logs on this side of the line. Give them the assurance that the provision for free lumber will last long enough to enable them to build mills and take something out of them at the end of three or four years' operations, and they are not going to tow their logs to Michigan. It is only because of the uncertainty of the trade, or the fear that the lumber duties might be increased, or that the Canadian Government might put an export duty on logs and the American Government might add that to the amount of the import duty—it is only because of the unsettled character of the trade that the American lumbermen continue to tow their logs across the lake, when, other things being equal, they would prefer to saw them here.

Now, the hon. gentleman tells us that the Ontario Government ought to impose restrictions. Why, I have heard the hon. gentleman and his friends make such a wild proposition as that the Provincial Government should charge $4 per thousand of Crown dues and remit $3 of that for all logs sawed in the country. Would it not be an interference with the vested rights of men who had bought timber limits from the Government to make them pay four times the amount of Crown dues that they were asked to pay when they bought these limits—to tell them that if they do, what the Government dictate, they will remit three-fourths of these Crown dues? Sir, it could not be done? The Ontario Government have these timber resources as a source of revenue; they pay a large portion of the expenses of the Government from those resources; and when that Government want to put a timber limit on the market they want to do it on conditions that will bring the largest returns. At the last sale they realized $2,300,000 from a little over 600 square miles of timber limits. If any restriction had been imposed such as the hon. gentleman proposes, if they had been sold on the condition that the timber should be sawed in Ontario, the Government would not have received a million dollars where it received $2,300,000. As a business proposition, the Government of Ontario sell their timber limits to make money, not for the purpose of building up a little sawmill here or there.

The hon. gentleman tells us that the men who own the limits are opposed to the export duty. Of course they are, because the imposition of the duty would reduce the value of their property more than one-half, perhaps two-thirds. A man who has a limit worth $100,000 would naturally object to the imposition of a duty that would make that limit worth only $30,000; and would it not be an outrage on that man to adopt a policy which at one fell stroke would wipe out two-thirds of the value of his property? But the hon. gentleman appears willing to do that for the purpose of benefiting some petty sawmills in the Georgian Bay district, which we would be glad to see benefited if it would not be done by robbing others.

Mr. SPROULE. Is $3 a thousand two-thirds of the value of the pine?

Mr. CHARLTON. Yes, $3 a thousand wipes out the value of the pine, standing on the stump, in most localities.

Mr. SPROULE. One-fourth of the value.

Mr. CHARLTON. On the average, these limits on the north shore of the Georgian Bay, after the Crown dues are paid, are not worth $3 a thousand, and if the Government impose a duty of $2 a thousand it would wipe out over two-thirds of their value. And if the Government imposes a crown charge of $3 a thousand feet, it wipes totally out the value the stumpage. The hon. gentleman proposes to confiscate to the extent of two-thirds the value of this immense property in order to benefit a local class interest. No more outrageous proposition was ever made in any legislative body in any free country.

I want to point out to the hon. gentleman a few of the consequences that would follow the imposition of this duty. We did have an export duty imposed in the year 1866 of $1 a thousand. That export duty was continued up to the year 1866, when it was increased to $2 per thousand, and in 1888 it was increased to $3 a thousand, by the operation of an Order in Council, made without due consideration, upon the representations of one side only. The Order in Council was passed in November, and a few months afterwards the Government found out its mistake, and again reduced the duty to $2 a thousand. The American Government did not seem to have had their attention drawn to this question until about 1889. They had then a consul in this city by the name of Hotchkiss, who happened to be a practical lumberman, and who, on investigating this matter, discovered that the import of logs into Canada from the United States was greater than the export of logs from Canada to the United States. This fact was laid before the Treasury Department at Washington. The American Government then became aware of the fact that, while by their constitution, they were precluded from imposing an export duty on logs or anything else, the Canadian Government had been charging an export duty of $1 a thousand for a number of years, and then had raised it to $2 a thousand, when, in point of fact, it would have been more reasonable for the United States to impose an export duty, since the export from that country to Canada was greater than the export from Canada to it. The American Government, therefore, cast about for some method of rectifying this wrong, as they deemed it. They could not do it directly by the counter imposition of export duties, because their constitutional limitations would not allow them to take that course. It was, therefore, proposed to add the Canadian export rate to the import duty in the United States as retaliation. When the McKinley Bill was under consideration, it was arranged, by informal negotiation, that if Canada would wipe out her export duties, the United States would reduce its import duties on lumber to $1 a thousand feet. Various propositions had been made while that Bill was under consideration. One was to add the export duty to the import duty, and thus make the duty on lumber in the United States $4 a thousand feet, but finally the United States made informally the proposition that if the Canadian Government would officially promise to remove the export duty on logs the United States would, in return, reduce its lumber duty to $1 a thousand feet. The question was put to the Government by the hon. member for Pontiac, and Sir John Macdonald replied in the affirmative. He said that his Government would consent to that, and would take occasion to inform the proper officials at Washington of its intention. Then the American Government reduced the duty on pine lumber, but not on spruce lumber as it should have done. Our export duty was, however, removed, in consideration of the reduction of the duty on pine to $1 a thousand feet. A great impetus was thus given to trade in the Georgian Bay district. Limits changed hands at advanced prices; and since the reduction of the American duty and the repeal of the export duty, the limits in the Georgian Bay region increased in value some twenty million dollars. That increase would be wiped out if the export duty were restored. The trade has gone on prospering since. The lumber interests of Canada have never been in so prosperous a condition as during these late years. And I may say that, but for the existence of our export duty of $1 per thousand feet, when the McKinley Bill was under consideration in 1890, we would probably have got free lumber. The irritation produced in the United States by the existence of that absurd, unjustifiable duty was so great as to prevent our securing free lumber when the McKinley tariff was arranged in 1890. The proposition to have free lumber was naturally opposed by the lumbermen of Minnesota, Wisconsin, Oregon, Washington Territory, California and Maine. These men adroitly seized upon the existence of this obnoxious tax, and made it do effective duty in their opposition to the granting of free lumber, and that one fact, I repeat probably, prevented us having free lumber under the McKinley Bill.

Now, we have at Washington a tariff under consideration, and by that tariff lumber has been placed on the free list. The Democratic party promised that many articles should be placed on the free list—coal, iron ore, sugar, wool, lumber. One after the other these articles have been put on the dutiable list, and now the only things remaining are wool and lumber.

Mr. SPROULE. You do not know but that they will be made dutiable.

Mr. CHARLTON. If my hon. friend has his way, I know that would be taken off the free list quicker than the sun rises. It would not be a day before they would be taken off if the insane policy of the hon. gentleman were adopted by our Government. Here is the Wilson Bill, and I want to call my hon. friend's attention to the following paragraphs in the free lists:—

672. Logs, and round unmanufactured timber, not specially enumerated or provided for in this act.

673. Fire wood, handle bolts, heading bolts, stave bolts, and shingle bolts, hop poles, fence posts, railroad ties, ship timber, and ship planking, not specially provided for in this act.

Under the tariff now in force ties are charged 20 per cent, ship planking $2 a thousand feet, and some of the other articles enumerated bear a duty.

674. Timber hewn and sawed, and timber used for spars, and in building wharfs.

675. Timber, squared or sided.

This now bears a duty of $1\frac{1}{2}$ cents per cubic foot.

676. Sawed boards, planks, deals and other timber.

Now, spruce is included in that, and at present it bears a duty of $2 a thousand. Basswood and hemlock pay a duty of $1 per thousand red pine, $2 a thousand and so forth.

677. Pine clapboard.

These now bear a duty of $1 a thousand.

678. Spruce clapboard.

These are now charged $1.50 per thousand.

679. Hubs, for wheels, posts, &c.

680. Laths.

Mr. CHARLTON.

Laths now bear a duty of 15 cents per thousand and pieces.

Pickets and palings—These now bear a duty of 10 per cent.

Shingles—Now 20 cents a thousand.

683. Staves of wood of all kinds, wood unmanufactured.

This wood includes pulp wood and all classes of wood. These are the articles put on the free list under this Bill, subject to the following proviso:—

Provided that all of the articles mentioned in paragraphs 672 to 683 inclusive, when imported from any country which lays an export duty on any of them shall be subject to the duties existing prior to the passage of this act.

That is, if you were to levy an export duty upon hop poles, or railroad ties, or the most insignificant of the articles enumerated in that schedule, the duties in force prior to the passage of the Wilson Bill would all come into force again. This is the disaster the hon. gentleman invites. He is prepared to sacrifice the lumbering interests of this entire Dominion, from Nova Scotia to British Columbia, for the sake of saving a few local interests up in the region of Georgian Bay. He puts me in mind of the little boy who wanted to stop a steamer running Ohio falls in order that he might pick up his apple which had fallen into the river. We cannot stop to pick up the hon. gentleman's apple; we cannot sacrifice so many interests and invite so great a disaster for the purpose of conferring the slight advantage he desires to have conferred upon himself and his constituents in the Georgian Bay region.

So much for this branch of the question. Now, it is asserted—the hon. gentleman will make the assertion, I suppose—that the Yankees must have our lumber. The American market is of great importance to us, there is no doubt about that. We sold over $13,000,000 worth of lumber in the United States last year. Year by year, as our limits grow poorer, the percentage of coarse lumber made by our mills grows greater. The only market that we have for this is in the United States. The mills of the Ottawa Valley make about 25 per cent of their cut into deals which are shipped to England. The balance of the cut must be sold to the United States. Therefore it becomes apparent that the American market is a necessity to us, and that necessity is growing greater. It is asserted that they must have our lumber. Impose what restrictions we may, they will come over for our lumber, and that, whatever restrictions we impose, they will have to bear the consequences. That is a mistake. I am familiar with the lumber trade, and I know that for the last 15 years southern pine and poplar have been constantly encroaching upon the area which we have considered as our own market. The fact has recently come to my knowledge that a box and shook factory in the city of Oswego, just on the other side of Lake Ontario, which formerly used 60,000,000 of feet, mainly of coarse Canadian lumber, is bringing up 40,000,000 feet of southern pine, so that its order for Canadian lumber will be cut down from about 60,000,000 feet to about 20,000,000 feet, and this in a city immediately overlooking our southern border. Our red pine has been crowded out of the American seaboard cities, and our white pine has to meet the competition of southern pine, poplar, gumwood and other varieties and mills engaged in what is known as the trim business—that is, supplying doors and windows, flooring and wainscoting and all the interior finish of a house, use three times the quantity of southern woods that they formerly did, even those mills in the lake basin and along the frontier. So it becomes of importance to us to take care of this market, to see that we are not placed at a disadvantage in competition with the southern source of supply. If we invite the imposition of heavy lumber duties, we invite a condition of things that would be disastrous to the Canadian lumber trade, and if we adopt the policy that would prevent our getting free lumber we inflict an incalculable disaster on this country. For that reason I deprecate, as do all lumbermen who have trade relations with the United States, the imposition of this export duty upon logs. I deprecate even the raising of the question at the present time. The fact that this matter is discussed, that a prominent Government supporter justifies the imposition of an export duty, may exercise the most unwelcome influence upon the deliberations now in progress in Congress as to whether lumber shall remain on the free list or not. So we want to treat this question with a little common sense and forbearance. We want to realize that having had a settlement of this matter in our favour we should adopt the policy that will allow the whole lumber interests to derive advantage from the changes that are proposed. We want to realize, moreover, that we cannot impose an export duty without being made to suffer for it. The Americans are alive to this question, and they have made up their minds that an export duty is not to be permitted, and that if any attempt is made in that direction on our part it will be at our own peril and at our own very serious cost. This question is one of prime importance. Bearing as it does upon so many interests in this country we should deal with it very carefully; we should deal with it with a great deal of prudence. We cannot impose this duty again. I objected very strongly to the power held by the Government to arrange these matters and to impose duties by Order in Council. I regard that power with the greatest nervousness and the greatest distrust, because I know the power exercised by deputations coming to the Government with representations on this subject. Such a deputation waited on them the other day, including, I believe, my hon. friend who has just spoken (Mr. Sproule), one of the members for Simcoe, and a number of prominent citizens from the Georgian Bay district, who went to the Government without realizing that there is any other side to this question. What I fear is that the Government may come to a decision—and embody it in an Order in Council—which men understanding both sides of the case would never dream of. I hope that when we come to the consideration of the proposal that the Government shall have power to impose export duties, the Government will withdraw that request, and that, if not, the House will deny the power.

Mr. BENNETT. The hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat is indeed to be congratulated on the piece of special pleading he has done for the American limit-holders, and especially for the firm of John & T. Charlton. The hon. gentleman is talking for dollars, and I quite understand why he has made this pathetic plea, and why he has seen fit to adopt this style rather than the swaggering style he usually adopts in debate. The hon. gentleman very valiantly came to the rescue of the Ontario Government, who have been the friends of the American limit-holders throughout, in their refusal to place such restrictions on the sales of timber as to ensure the lumber being manufactured in the province of Ontario. I have made the statement, believing it to be right and correct, that the Ontario Government have the power, and always have had the power, to advance the dues, and, if they choose, to impose dues of $6 or $7 per thousand on the timber, and then give a rebate for any of this timber which is manufactured in the country. I have here the authority of a gentleman who poses as being thoroughly conversant with timber matters, and I propose to read his opinion. But before doing so let me say that the hon. gentleman must admit that the Ontario Government has from time to time changed the dues in respect to timber. Men owning limits, and having paid for them under a duty of $1 per thousand, woke up next day to find these duties increased to $1.25 or $1.50.

Mr. CHARLTON. The hon. gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. BENNETT. I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon. I am informed by the limit-holders—

Mr. CHARLTON. If the hon. gentleman will permit me I will correct his statement now and if not, I will correct it at the close of his speech. Some years ago the dues were increased from 75 cents to $1 per thousand. They have not been increased since. The last sale held by the Ontario Government was of about 600 miles of limits, which were sold for about $2,300,-

000. They were sold subject to dues of $1.25 per thousand. There was no interference with the sales previously made, and all the timber limits, except those in this 600 miles of territory, pay $1 per thousand in dues to-day.

Mr. BENNETT. I have on the one hand the statement of a gentleman whose word I know is to be taken; but I have on the other hand the word of the hon. gentleman opposite, and from one of his statements I judge of the balance. Now, I have got here the statement of a gentleman who assumes to know whereof he speaks, and this is what he says publicly in reference to the increase of dues:

In the first place the Ontario Government have refused to make the tenure as regards Crown dues permanent: they have refused to give the limit holder a statutory rate of $1 per thousand and the assurance that this will continue for a fixed period, and the American is left ignorant as to how soon that regulation may be changed, and uncertain as to the moment at which the Ontario Government may increase the dues.

Does the hon. gentleman agree with that?

Mr. CHARLTON. I agree that something might happen in the future, and I assume that until this is done, the dues are only $1 a thousand.

Mr. BENNETT. The hon. gentleman has made the statement that it cannot be done.

Mr. CHARLTON. I have not.

Mr. BENNETT. That is the statement the hon. gentleman made in the House a year ago.

Mr. CHARLTON. I said a discrimination could not be made in charging $4 to one man and $1 to another.

Mr. BENNETT. I do not blame the hon. gentleman for standing by the Ontario Government, for they stood by him. Now, the hon. gentleman has made some other statements which resolve themselves into matters of fact. He equivocated on the point as to whether he was interested in mills in the United States, and he covered up his retreat by saying it was only a planing mill. Now, from a Tonawanda paper I read this advertisement:

J. & T. Charlton, wholesale dealers in masts and spars, Canada round pine, etc., Tonawanda.

Is that the firm of which the hon. gentleman is a member?

Mr. CHARLTON. It is, and they did not saw any of it there.

Mr. BENNETT. Then they go a little beyond planing lumber. As a matter of fact the hon. gentleman knows very well that he has been engaged in the lumber business, and his advertisements in the American papers prove it.

Mr. CHARLTON.

Mr. CHARLTON. I merely stated that I had no saw mill, and never owned one.

Mr. BENNETT. The hon. gentleman says that the statement made by Senator Waddock that 500 million feet of Canadian logs went into the United States last year, is untrue, and in support of that he produces a statement of the Ontario Government to the effect that there were in all only some 236 million feet. Now, in answer to that let me tell the hon. gentleman and the House that the Ontario Government do not keep an account of how much lumber is exported from Canada into the United States, but they do make up a return showing what the Americans are cutting and exporting, and such a return shows that the Americans took 236 million feet; but the hon. gentleman is not honest enough to tell us the millions and millions of feet that were cut by Canadians and sold to Americans, and if he aggregates the two together he will find that something in excess of 500 millions was last year exported to the United States. Now, I will give him the benefit of this fact, that the customs returns skew only the export from Canada to the United States of about 245 million feet. But how is that statement made up? An American tug owner, anxious not to disclose the truth as to the amount of exports, has his captain make a clearance showing that much less timber is in rafts. Now, there was a time when the trade had not grown to such large proportions, and in those times even the firm of John & T. Charlton were honest enough to get up and admit that the vessel was taking out five million feet in a tow; but since there has been so much noise made and so much opposition to this large export, what do we see? We see that in most rafts there is only an export of one million feet, an even million; and the fact is that in the returns of that tug you might as well have a printed affidavit showing that each clearance was one million feet. As a matter of fact, instead of there being one million feet in each raft, there is usually three, four, and up to seven million feet. Let me tell the hon. gentleman further, to show how erroneous and misleading the customs returns are, that one raft belonging to Ring, Merrill & Co., which cleared with seven million feet, is not shown in the returns at all. Now, let me tell the hon. gentleman further, that his tug, the Onaping, I think, this year probably, according to the return usually made on one occasion, took out five million feet, but since they are getting cautious and canny, since the word has gone forth, apparently, that these shipments were not to disclose the truth, the tug only towed one million feet. Well, there is a little tug called the Chamberlain, the power of which I know as a matter of fact, is not equal to one-fourth of that of the Onaping, tows 4,500,000 feet. The fact is that realizing the importance of the matter to them as American limit holders in Canada, they have absolutely and fraudulently made returns which are misleading and which are untrue. When only 250 million feet are returned as having cleared at the customs-house last year, the fact is, as I believe, that they have cleared nearly 500 million feet, or even more. Now, from an Orillia paper containing correspondence from the port of French River this fact appears, that this year the Emery Lumber Company will export 40 million feet, and the Saginaw Towing Company will take out 60 million. Now, there are two firms alone who will ship over one million feet, and the hon. gentleman knows as well as I know that the record which shows 236 million feet, is untrue and is false in every respect.

Mr. CHARLTON. I rise to a point of order. The statement I made was true, and the hon. gentleman accuses me of falsehood, and I wish him to retract.

Mr. BENNETT. I did not. I say the hon. gentleman knows that the return is false.

Mr. CHARLTON. I assert that the return is true. I rise to a point of order, Mr. Chairman, and I want your decision.

Mr. BENNETT. I did not say the hon. gentleman's statement is untrue. I say that the return is false, and I believe he knows it to be untrue.

Mr. CHARLTON. No; you said I knew it to be untrue, without qualification.

Mr. BENNETT. Well, I believe the hon. gentleman knows it to be untrue.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Chair, Chair.

Mr. BENNETT. Well, I withdraw the statement and qualify it in this way. I believe the hon. gentleman knows, or rather he thinks, that this is not wholly within the mark.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman cannot make any imputations.

Mr. BENNETT. Then all I can say is that the hon. gentleman is not very conversant with the matter when he asserts that Senator Weadock's statement is untrue, that 500 million feet went last year into the United States. Now, I do not want to misinterpret anything the hon. gentleman said, but he said that he was patriotic at heart, that he was anxious, nay, more, that he was particularly anxious, to saw his logs in Canada, but that he could not get accommodation. Did I understand the hon. gentleman correctly in that

Mr. CHARLTON. I said that there was one occasion when I was unable to get all my timber sawed in Canada, and was in consequence compelled to tow the timber away from the point where it was put in, and I towed it to Tawas, Michigan. Had I got it sawed in Canada, I would have towed it to Midland or Collingwood, but I preferred to tow it to Michigan, for various reasons, and did so.

Mr. BENNETT. Within what time?

Mr. CHARLTON. Within the last two or three years.

Mr. BENNETT. I have in my hand a letter written by Mr. D. H. Turner, from Little Current, Ont., and it will show the hon. gentleman the fact concerning his exportation of logs:

DEAR SIR,—It may be a pleasure for you to know that your efforts regarding the reimposition of a duty on saw-logs has been greatly appreciated by the people of this section of Algoma. I believe in the National Policy, but the only "smoking chimneys" that we see here is the smoke from the stacks of the American tugs with hundreds of acres of logs passing on their way to Cheboygan, Saginaw, Bay City and other United States towns while the "chimneys" of our mills are smokeless. Things were humming here at one time and we have a mill here that will cut 125,000 a day that is now idle, it is known that a firm was negotiating for it when the duty was taken off and that firm has been towing upwards of 30 million per year to Saginaw. Mr. Charlton has 7,000,000 at Whitefish river near here which he has contracted to cut at Cheboygan. No wonder he has been exercised over this matter, we look forward to this matter being arranged to help us out and I thank you for your help.

Yours truly,

R. H. TURNER.

Yet within a few miles of where the hon. gentleman's logs are, there is a mill standing idle. So much for his patriotism and the encouragement and help he is willing to grant Canadian workingmen. The riding I have the honour to represent is interested in this business. It is a matter of men leaving this country or staying in this country. The Government to-day have spent money and are spending money in the United States to bring immigrants back. I tell the Government that by one stroke of the pen, by placing an export duty of $5 on logs they can bring from 16,000 to 15,000 Canadians from Michigan, Canadians who have been expatriated by this policy. This statement is borne out by the hon. member for Russell (Mr. Edwards), who said that in every mill in Michigan he found Canadians employed. I hold in my hand petitions from a number of towns. I have one here from the town of Orillia, which is thirty miles from the shore of Georgian Bay, and is a town which felt the beneficial effect of the lumber trade when it was in full blast, on the shores of the Bay. The people of the town ask the House of Commons and the Government of Canada to place a practically prohibitive duty on logs. May I say this, too, that the Mayor of the town of Orillia has a large saw mill there, and he strongly denounced the imposition of an export duty, because it would produce a return to $2 duty against Canadian lumber. Despite his opposition, the resolution was carried by a practically unanimous vote of the town. Then the town of Penetanguishewa shene has also petitioned, and I hold in my hand a resolution passed by that town, asking that a prohibitory duty be imposed on logs. The town of Midland has also passed a resolution to that effect, and I have received a letter from the Mayor of Collingwood, stating that to-morrow I will receive a petition from his Town Council. Are the Government going to pass by and disregard the wishes and claims of thousands of people simply that dollars may be thrust into the pockets of the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) and a few American speculators? These men came into this country and bought limits, on what terms? On the terms that the hon. member for North Norfolk has stated: First, that they did not know the minute the duty would be increased by the Ontario Government, which it has the power to do; and, secondly, they knew that the Dominion Government had in the past imposed a prohibitory duty on logs, because $3 duty was practically a prohibitory duty. Knowing these facts, they came in here and purchased limits. What are their rights as vested owners? Their rights are simply rights subject to anticipated changes, and to-day American lumbermen know very well that the Government, either provincial or Dominion, has this power, and they expect it at any moment to be put into force. I charge the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) that he is the man more than any person else who has prevented Canada from getting lumber free into the United States. The hon. gentleman went over to Tonawanda, in 1890, and I have a copy of a paper containing a report of a meeting there. When it was stated that there was a probability that the duty might be taken off lumber altogether, what did the hon. gentleman do? The report says:

After discussing the matter it was voted that a telegram be sent to Senator Hiscock at Washington, a difference of opinion exists as to whether duty on lumber should be reduced to $1.00 or $1.50 per thousand. A majority favours $1.00, but we are unanimous on the conditions of adding the entire Canadian export duty on logs to our import duty on sawn lumber. The Canadian Government have power to remove the export duty by Order in Council and can act without consulting Parliament.

Does the hon. gentleman deny he was at that meeting? Does the hon. gentleman deny that he offered them all that information? He was the man himself, and instead of doing what he should have done, endeavoured to impress on the meeting the necessity of permitting Canadian lumber to come in free of duty, he urged that—and the sting was in the tail—there should be added the export duty placed on Canadian lumber. Despite the hon. gentleman's pilgrimages to Washington, time and again, and I presume they have been mostly in this behalf, what has been the result? When the McKinley Bill was passed, they were unable to have their views incorporated in the McKinley Bill, namely that the duty should be $1, plus the export duty. Why? Because the Government of the United States very wisely and properly said: The people of the United States, as a matter of necessity, require Canadian lumber, and not to please the hon. member for North Norfolk, not to please the American limit holders who had purchased limits in Canada, will we make an arrangement to pay that large amount of duty. I will not discuss the question who pays the duty, as that question is threshed out almost every day. It must be admitted, however, that when you must have an article as a matter of necessity, that moment the consumer pays the duty. What would be the result if the Dominion Government imposed an export duty on logs? The result would be this, that these men who hold limits to-day in Canada, and who are Americans to a great extent, have been successful in getting introduced into the present Wilson Bill that clause which produces, in the event of an export duty going into effect, the imposition of $2 duty on lumber. If that action has produced that result in one case, as soon as this Government intervenes and places a prohibitive duty on logs, that moment the eyes of these hon. gentlemen will be turned to Washington to secure admission from this country into the United States, of free lumber. Why, the hon. gentleman says, in defence of Canadian lumbermen, that this Government should not interfere. I make this statement, that one of the largest manufacturers of Canadian lumber in Ontario assured me in this city that he did not care the snap of his finger if $2 duty were imposed, because it would have to come out of the pockets of the American consumers. And I had, moreover, an interview with Mr. Eddy, of Hull, who will be accepted as an authority in the lumber business, in which he stated that the Americans must have our white pine, and we are the only people from whom they can obtain it; further, that if they put on a duty even of $50 per thousand they would have to have it—they must have it, and that settles it. The hon. member for North Norfolk knows that to-day, before a saw has been placed in a log in the Ottawa Valley, 75 per cent of the cut is sold, despite the fact that the duty may be increased to $2. Has the American dealer who purchased the lumber agreed that in the event of the Wilson Bill going into effect, he will pay the Canadian dealer $1 more. No. It is an accepted theory to-day that the American purchaser is the man who has to pay the duty, no matter what it may be. I am not going into questions as to the effect on the trade in that section of the country of the removal of the export duty. Those petitions speak for themselves. The Minister of Finance knows that last year a large deputation, over thirty in number, came here representing the County Council of Simcoe, also that deputations have come here repeatedly; and the question simply resolves itself into this, whether this Government are prepared to drive the people out of this country by the operation of the present policy? Yet we have driven them out in the past, and they are continuing to drive them out. If the Ministry do not propose to interfere, but to continue the present policy of free logs, let it be known once for all, and let the balance of the lumbermen on Georgian Bay banish themselves to Michigan and become America's citizens. It is the duty of the Government to intervene, and when there is a conflict between labour and capital, labour should prevail. No class legislation of this kind should be passed by this Parliament. Let the hon. member for North Norfolk be patriotic. Instead of taking his seven million feet of logs at White Fish across the lake, let him have them cut at the mill alongside, which is at present idle—let him leave some money in Canada. It is quite true the hon. gentleman made the statement that the masses in Canada are not particularly to be admired for their intelligence.

Mr. CHARLTON. When did I say that?

Mr. BENNETT. Why, Sir, you said it in that ever memorable letter you one time wrote to an American newspaper, in which you described the volunteers of Canada who had went to the defence of their country during the Fenian raid. You will see it all in 'Hansard.' The hon. gentleman remembers that memorable correspondence. Now, the hon. member for Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) must mistake the intelligence of the Ministry when he thinks that forever and forever they are going on in this policy of driving the people out of the country in order that he may be permitted to use his tugs in towing over logs to the United States.

Mr. HUGHES. On Sundays.

Mr. BENNETT. Certainly, on Sundays. I made a statement last year that the hon. gentleman's tug was employed in towing logs on Sunday, and I make the statement here again.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, no!

Mr. BENNETT. Yes. If the hon. gentleman is the owner of the tug 'Onaping,' and I do not think he will deny that he is, she certainly was employed last year in towing logs on Sunday.

Mr. CHARLTON. On what occasion, and on what date?

Mr. BENNETT. About the month of July, and into Victoria Harbour. When she was under charter to Mr. Waklie.

Mr. CHARLTON. I had not the control of her then.

Mr. SPROULE. Did you get the profits out of it?

Mr. BENNETT. Did the hon. gentleman provide that he would not charge for Sundays? Will he be good enough to answer the question whether the charter excepted the Sundays? The hon. gentleman does not answer. Silence gives consent, and so I presume that the hon. gentleman charged for the Sunday work.

Mr. MACLEAN (York). The Sunday Bill will stop that.

Mr. BENNETT. It is to be hoped that it will. I say that a plain duty is imposed upon the Government and upon the people of Canada in this matter. Here is a trade going out of the country that will employ 10,000 or 15,000 men. Here is a trade that will distribute in the country hundreds of thousands of dollars, and are the Government going to permit a continuance of this system which has been in vogue, to the country's great discredit and to the country's great evil, for so many years past. If they propose to do so, all I can say is this: Let the Government announce at once and forever, and then the men living on the shores of Georgian Bay who have been hoping on that some change shall be made, will pick themselves up and betake themselves to the United States. The policy of the Government in this matter is not right. It is not fair to Canadians, because it sets up class legislation. It sets up a class of legislation that benefits the few at the cost of the many. Let the Government intervene; let them pursue a policy in this matter that will be progressive, a policy that will be paternal, a policy that will be patriotic, and will receive the thanks not only of the honest men who are engaged in the lumbering business, but of the thousands of people who are interested in it in that portion of the country.

Mr. CHARLTON. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Bennett) seems to have deemed it necessary in discussing this question, which is properly a question of public policy, to resort to a personal attack upon myself.

Mr. BENNETT. Not at all.

Mr. CHARLTON. The spirit he has evinced in that respect is, I think, one to be more honoured in the breach than in the observance in a decorous body like the Canadian House of Commons. I have nothing to say to the hon. gentleman's imputation that I have stated a falsehood and knew it was a falsehood and sought to deceive the House by false statements. I do not know that my character in this House, or perhaps in the country, will warrant so young a member as the hon. gentleman from East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) in making an attack of that kind upon myself. However, let that matter pass.

Mr. BENNETT. If the hon. gentleman will allow me, I did not say that he made the statement, knowing it to be false.

An hon. MEMBER. That is what you said.

Mr. BENNETT. If any hon. gentleman had that impression conveyed to him, I ask him to take my disclaimer that I mentioned anything of the sort. But I did say this: that the statement was untrue and with a full knowledge of the facts, as the hon. gentleman has, I think he will hardly take the statement to be correct in its entirety.

Mr. CHARLTON. I take the hon. gentleman's disclaimer as a matter of course, but I take the disclaimer with the statement: that I have every reason to believe that the statement was true, because I had the proof, and the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bennett) had no reason whatever to believe the statement untrue, because he had nothing but hearsay evidence with regard to the matter. However, I shall allude to that matter again. He takes up the statement of Mr. Weadock, of the House of Representatives, not Senator Weadock, in a speech in which he says so much timber is brought over. The hon. gentleman took up a newspaper statement, but I took up a sworn Government return and showed what the facts were. I wish to approach this matter in the most temperate spirit and to avoid that spirit which my hon. friend (Mr. Bennett) has evinced to-night, because we should observe decorum here. I wish to refer to the statement made by the hon. gentleman with regard to the timber regulations of Ontario, and his assertion that the Ontario Government had increased the Crown dues and had given no assurance to the limit-holder that they would not increase them rapidly and indefinitely. The hon. gentleman stated that the Ontario Government had increased the dues to $1.25 per thousand. That statement is incorrect, although there was a foundation of truth that might have misled the hon. gentleman, and I wish to state explicitly to the House what the policy of the Ontario Government is, and what are their dues at the present moment. The Crown dues in Ontario for many years were 75 cents a thousand feet, board measure. Some ten years ago, I think, I speak under correction, the dues were increased to $1 per thousand. The lumbermen of Ontario have asked at various times that the Government should give some statutory assurance that these dues would remain a permanent fixture. While the Ontario Government has never seen fit to grant that request, yet, they have always given it to be understood that their policy in that respect would be a conservative one, and that there was no reason to believe that the dues would be increased. They gave proof that this was the case when at the last sale held a year ago last fall they placed some 600 square miles of timber limits upon the market, and they stated as a condition of the sale that the ground rent would be $3 per square mile, which is the ground rent of all limits in the province, and that the Crown dues would be $1.25 per thousand, which is 25 cents higher than the Crown rent upon all limits then under license. No change was made in the limits under license, no change was contemplated, and no foundation existed for the statement that the Ontario Government had increased the dues 25 cents per thousand feet on licenses which previously existed. The Government did not do it, and there is no reason to suppose they will do anything of the kind. This statement made by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bennett) was made for the purpose of conveying the impression to this House that the Ontario Government had a right to increase the dues to $3 or $4 per thousand feet, and make a drawback in the case of manufacturers who manufacture timber in Ontario. Such a course would be a mere confiscation of property. These berths have been sold in good faith at public auction and the highest bidder got them, whether he was an American or a Canadian. The highest bidder took them under the regulations of the department, and to vary these regulations after these sales were made would be an act of bad faith. The Ontario Government does not look upon the matter in the light that my hon. friend and some of his friends evidently do, who seem to suppose that an American limit holder is a fair object for plunder, that an American limit holder has no rights, and that he should be deprived of his property by adverse legislation and discriminatory Crown dues. If such a policy were entered upon by the province of Ontario or by this Dominion it would be a policy that would lead to very grave consequences. It would be a policy dishonest in itself, indefensible in itself, and a policy which the country would suffer by very seriously.

Now, Sir, with regard to the quantity of logs exported, my hon. friend from East Gray (Mr. Sproule) attempts to show that there were 500,000,000 feet, and in order to belittle the evidence I have placed before the House in regard to this matter my hon. friend from East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) corroborates the statement made by the hon. member for East Grey that the statement made by me to-night from the returns of the Government of Ontario is incorrect. Now, this statement is a statement in detail. It gives the quantity of logs taken out by every firm in Canada for export. The Government of Ontario understand what logs are exported. It is necessary, before 1,000 feet of logs can be cleared from any outport in Ontario, to get the permit of the Ontario Government. Unless that permit is had, and is in the hands of the collector, no clearance will be given, and the Ontario Government have the means of knowing exactly what logs have been exported. The Commissioner of Crown Lands in Ontario has made this statement on his responsibility and it gives all the logs exported from the province of Ontario except those taken from Indian reserves, amounting to 10,000,000 feet in round numbers. With regard to Americans who have exported logs, purchased of Canadian limit-holders and not returned for export, I would like the hon. gentleman to give the name of one of them. This list contains the names of some Canadians who have sold logs for export; for instance, Hale & Booth, whose headquarters are in this city.

Mr. BENNETT. Does it contain the amount sold by the Georgian Bay Lumber Company to Ring, Merrill & Company, and exported by them?

Mr. CHARLTON. I repeat that this statement covers all the logs exported by these various parties to Michigan, and it is not worth the hon. gentleman's while to try to cast discredit upon it. The total amount exported from Ontario last year falls short of 250,000,000 feet. The hon. gentleman's attempt to throw discredit on this statement by saying that our navigation returns show more than the amount shown by the Ontario Government statement. Our navigation returns do nothing of the kind. They show an export last year of 127,000,000 feet of pine logs in all, while the Ontario returns show an export of 236,000,000 feet, almost double the amount shown by the navigation returns.

Mr. BENNETT. The returns of the custom-house clearances made by American capitalists aggregate 184,703,000 feet.

Mr. CHARLTON. I have given the figures of the Trade and Navigation Returns for the fiscal year ending the 30th of June last.

Mr. WALLACE. That is not the calendar year.

Mr. CHARLTON. I am aware of that. The Ontario statement is for the calendar year 1893. The two statements do not agree; but the statement by the hon. gentleman that the Trade and Navigation Returns show a larger export of logs than the Ontario returns is an incorrect one.

Mr. BENNETT. I did not say the Trade and Navigation Returns; I said the statement compiled from the custom-houses.

Mr. CHARLTON. This statement in the Trade and Navigation Returns is compiled from the custom-house statement, and the statement which the hon. gentleman may have made himself or some other person may have made for him, does not supersede these authentic official returns made by the Minister and his officials. The hon. gentleman says that if I were conversant with this matter I would not have fallen into so many errors. I venture to say that I am as conversant with the lumber business as the hon. member for East Simcoe. With regard to the charge that I had taken logs from Canada when a mill was standing idle in this country, it is true; I was shipping logs to be sawn at Cheboygan in Michigan, and I was asked to have them cut at a mill at Little Current at $4 a thousand, including delivery, when I could get them cut at Cheboygan at a trifle over $2 a thousand, and will any man say that I was not justified in getting them cut there at about half of what I would have been charged at Little Current? It is true the gentleman he refers to, Mr. Turner, did communicate with me, but it was after I had closed my arrangements for the season, and whether his arrangement would have been advantageous or not, it was too late for me to consider it. The hon. gentleman talks of the Government adopting a policy that will put money into the pocket of the member for North Norfolk. Are we discussing this question merely in regard to its bearings on the interests of one or two individuals, or the members of this House or a few limit-holders? Did I not point out that the entire lumber interest of this Dominion was interested in this matter? Did I not point out that the proviso in paragraph 68³ of the Wilson Bill provided that if the most insignificant article in the free list were subjected to an export duty, every article on that list would be put upon the dutiable list? This question is one that does not affect me or the members of this House alone, or the lumbermen of the Ottawa Valley alone, but one that affects every lumberman in Canada from Prince Edward Island to British Columbia. The hon. gentleman tells us that he saw an Ottawa lumberman who expressed entire indifference as to whether the duty was increased to $2 a thousand or not. I would like to know who that Ottawa lumberman was. I think I know the Ottawa lumbermen pretty well, and I know that they all stand in the utmost dread of this question being tampered with, and the chances of their getting free lumber into the United States under the Wilson Bill destroyed.

An hon. MEMBER. Mr. Eddy.

Mr. CHARLTON. As for Mr. Eddy, he is not manufacturing lumber for export. He is engaged in the business of manufacturing wood pulp paper and wooden ware, and since he went into that business it is in his interest to have the export duty put on to cheapen his raw material. If he could get his pulp wood and all the raw material he uses reduced in cost 30 or 40 or 50 per cent he would hail the export duty as a God-send to him; but every man who has lumber to export would bewail the folly of the Government if they took the advice which the hon. member for East Simcoe gives to-night.

Mr. BENNETT. I was not referring to pulp wood.

Mr. CHARLTON. But the hon. gentleman referred to Mr. Eddy, and I am showing what was the milk in the cocoanut in regard to this matter.

With regard to the meeting of the Lumbermen's Association at Tonawanda, I was there some two or three years ago, and I went to the meeting as a spectator. I knew a good many of the lumbermen there, and being in the town I was invited to attend the meeting. The majority of the meeting were in favour of putting lumber on the free list. Some were opposed to it. The question of export duties was also discussed, and the lumbermen at that meeting, as all the lumbermen in the United States, took the ground that if the United States admitted lumber free of duty it was a matter of plain and common fairness that Canada should remit the export duty. If the United States made any concession with regard to lumber duties, a condition should be that Canada should be required to remove this obnoxious tax. That was the opinion of the majority of gentlemen there. It is the opinion of the majority of lumbermen from Maine to California, and it is the opinion the United States will act upon, my hon. friend may rest assured.

My hon. friend says that I have made frequent pilgrimages to Washington. I have been there once or twice, and I have found it a very fine city. I shall make it a practice to go there in future whenever I have leisure. I find it a very fascinating city, where I have made some very pleasant acquaintances indeed. I have found my ideas enlarged by going there, and I believe that if my hon. friend went, he would come back with a little more knowledge of the world, and a little more breadth of idea than he has at present, and in all probability he would see things in a somewhat more liberal spirit. I was not at Washington during the discussion of the McKinley Bill for the purpose of securing high rates of duty on lumber, because I am interested in having lumber admitted into the United States free. I have always expressed my opinion, in the United States and everywhere, in favour of free lumber and the removal of all restrictions on a trade of every kind, since I have had a seat in this House. In Washington, my little influence, so far as it went, was exerted in favour of free lumber, and I may possibly have been somewhat instrumental in preventing the adoption of that proposal to add the export duty in Canada to the import duty in the United States. I may have been somewhat instrumental in getting the proposal made that if this Government would remove the export duty, the Americans would reduce their import duty to $1 a thousand feet. As I have stated before, if our foolish export duty had not been in the way, if it had not been for the irritation caused by this duty, if it had not been for the adroit use made of it by opposing American lumbering interests, we would probably have had free lumber in the McKinley Bill. It was the existence of that irritating export duty which prevented our obtaining free lumber, but the best terms that could be got under the circumstances were obtained when that provision was made that if Canada removed the export duty, the Americans would reduce the duty on pine lumber one-half.

My hon. friend spoke of a letter. I had almost forgotten. It is ancient history. In that letter he says I spoke disparagingly of the Canadian people. I ask the hon. gentleman, when he referred to the letter, whether—

Mr. BENNETT. Not the Hickey affidavit?

Mr. CHARLTON. No; my hon. friend's kindly animus is always shown in his remarks. The letter referred to was a piece of paper written upon in pencil, I understand without date or signature, and since 1872 up to the present I have been waiting to have it shown that that was my letter. I have always been called into court to prove the charge against myself. I have never acted as a witness, but have always defied my accusers to prove that such a letter of mine ever existed, and I defy the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) to-night to do the same thing.

With regard to the working on Sunday of the 'Onaping' steamboats have to work on Sunday, even if they belong to Puritans. Steamers have to cross the ocean, and do not lay to from Saturday night until Monday morning, but pursue their voyage on Sundays as well as other days. I never advocated any measure in this House to prevent steamboats working on Sunday. My Bill provides that Sunday newspapers shall not be printed, that the Government canals shall be closed on Sunday, and that railway lines should not run on Sunday, beyond the limits of actual necessities, and that excursions by rail or steamer shall not be permitted. I would not permit my tug to work on Sunday if I could help it. She was chartered last year to a firm that required her services, and if she was out with a tow of logs on Sunday she had to pursue her voyage. No vessel out on the lakes or on the high seas stops her course on a Sunday. No religious society has asked for such a measure, and this attempt of my hon. friend to throw discredit on an opponent is only an instance of the malignant and malicious animus which has animated him in everything he has said.

This is, perhaps, all that it is necessary for me to say on the matter. I shall summarize what I have to say very briefly. It is this. I am quite willing that all logs should be manufactured in Canada; I am quite anxious that this should be done, if it can be done without too great cost. But I am not prepared to sacrifice great interests in this country for the purpose of promoting, by an unjust tax, smaller interests. I am not prepared to incur the penalties which the United States Congress is prepared to impose on the entire lumbering interest in Canada, for the sake of securing the manufacture of a few logs in the Georgian Bay region; and for one reason, among others, that if we did attempt that, the market we desire for the sale of our lumber would be cut off by retaliatory legislation. We have had enough of this kind of work. We want broader trade relations between the United States and Canada ; we want the development of a better feeling between the two countries, and the abandonment of this absurd system of retaliation and counter retaliation. We do not want, in a condition of trade where we import more logs than we export, to charge an export duty on the smaller quantity we export when we receive the larger quantity we import free, and especially when the consequence of our act would be the infliction upon us of retaliatory legislation, affecting the entire lumber interests of the country. We should look at the question from the broadest standpoint. We should get above the narrow range of view of the little country village or town, and adopt a policy best calculated to serve the interests of the whole Dominion, even if it may not exactly satisfy the wishes of the hon. member for Simcoe and his constituents.

Committee rose and reported progress.

Sir JOHN CARLING moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to ; and the House adjourned at 11.40 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, 16th May, 1894.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FOG-ALARMS.

Mr. BOWERS asked, Will tenders for the supply of coal be advertised for the fog-alarms of Apple River, Cape d'Or, Point Prim, Briar Island, Cape Fourchu, Seal Island, Cape Sable and Cape Roseway this season ; if so, will they be issued separately, or in such a way that a tender can be placed for one or more stations ? Will the one tendering the lowest receive the contract, all else being equal ?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. No tenders for the supply of coal for these fog-alarms will be asked for the season of 1894. I may add for the information of the hon. gentleman, that in 1891, Townshend & Co. applied for and obtained the contract of supplying these fog-alarm stations for a term of three years at $5.40 per ton, 2,240 pounds per ton, which included the supply of coal and the freight of coal to the different stations, in such quantities and at such stations as might be required from year to year.

NORTH WAKEFIELD MAIL CONTRACTS.

Mr. DEVLIN asked, What contract or contracts exist between Robert Joynt, of Masham, Ottawa County, and the Government ? What is the amount specified in such contracts ? When do they expire ?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Mr. Joynt has the contract for the mail service between Joynt and North Wakefield via Rupert and Lascelles. The amount payable under the contract is $426.66. The contract is temporary, during the pleasure of the Postmaster General.

LITTLE RAPIDS DAM.

Mr. DEVLIN asked, Have any petitions calling attention to damage done to property through the dam at Little Rapids, Rivière du Lièvre, Ottawa County, been presented to the Government during the last two years ? Have any claims for such damages been made ? What action, if any, have the Government taken in the matter ?

Mr. OUIMET. Several claims have been presented to the department for damage done to property through the construction of the dam at Little Rapids, on the Rivière du Lièvre, in the county of Ottawa, Quebec. In some cases amounts have been claimed, in others no specific sum has been mentioned. A survey of the river was made during the past summer to ascertain what damages, if any, had been done to the various properties, and the report is now under consideration in the department.

BRANDON EXPERIMENTAL FARM.

Mr. MARTIN asked, What outbuildings have been erected at the Experimental Farm at Brandon during the last twelve months, and at what cost ? Who was the contractor, and who was the architect ? Were tenders asked for ? If so, in what way, and what were the names of tenderers and amounts of tenders ? Why were not advertisements asking for tenders published in the Brandon newspapers ?

Mr. OUIMET. An implement and carriage shed costing $2,125 was built during last summer. John Hanbury was the contractor. The plans and specifications were prepared by the Department of Public Works. The cost of the building was estimated by the architect of the department at $2,250. Mr. John Hanbury offered to do the work for $2,100, and, as he was reputed to be a reliable contractor, the contract was awarded to him.

THE DEATH OF VICTOR LEMAY.

Mr. RINFRET asked, Has the Government been informed that Victor Lemay, of St. Louis de Lotbinière, was killed accidentally, on the 10th April last, while working at the Sault Ste. Marie Canal? Has the Government been informed as to the manner in which the death of the said Lemay occurred, and whether the accident was caused by negligence on the part of those in charge of the works? Who are the contractors engaged in the construction of the Sault Ste. Marie Canal? Is it the intention of the Government to indemnify the family of the deceased?

Mr. HAGGART. The Government have not been informed that Victor Lemay, of St. Louis de Lotbinière, was killed accidentally on the 10th of April last on the Sault Ste. Marie Canal. The Government have not been informed as to the manner in which the death of the said Lemay occurred, nor as to whether the accident was caused by negligence on the part of those in charge of the work. Messrs. Hugh Ryan & Co. are the contractors engaged in the construction of the Sault Ste. Marie Canal. If an accident did occur by which Victor Lemay lost his life, the Government are in no way responsible, and, therefore, do not propose to indemnify the family of the deceased.

EMPLOYMENT OF A MEMBER'S SON.

Mr. MARTIN asked, Whether any son of the hon. member for Eastern Assiniboia is in the employ of the Government? If so, what is his employment and salary? When was he appointed, and on whose recommendation?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). A son of the hon. member for East Assiniboia is in the employ of the Government. He is temporarily employed as assistant inspector of weights and measures, and his salary is $500 per annum. He was so temporarily employed in October, 1893, on the recommendation of the Hon. Senator Perley.

ADJOURNMENT—QUEEN'S BIRTHDAY.

Mr. TAYLOR. I would like to inquire of the hon. Premier if it is the intention of the Government that, when the House adjourns on Wednesday, the 23rd instant, it shall stand adjourned until the following Monday? I understand that there is a pretty general consensus of opinion on both sides of the House that this shall be the case. I have made a good many inquiries among the members, particularly those from a long distance, and I find that a great many wish to visit Toronto on the 24th, and they would prefer that the House should not sit on Friday, but should stand adjourned until Monday.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. In a matter of that kind the desire of the Government would be to comply with the general wish of the House itself, but with safeguards as to the despatch of the business which the Government have to carry forward. I think it would be necessary to make it a condition of the adjournment, even though the general assent of the House should be given, that Wednesday should be a Government day.

Mr. CHARLTON. Mr. Speaker, we have upon the Order paper at present, I think, twenty-eight public orders, and we have practically done nothing with this branch of the business at all. When we assembled the House gave the Government all the days during the Budget debate. This consumed between three and four weeks. Under the rules, a suspended debate on a notice of motion went to the head of the list of public Bills and orders. In this way days have been taken up with the discussion of notices of motion, and we have actually devoted only two days to public Bills and orders. Last year private members gave practically all their time in order to enable my hon. friend the Premier to go to Paris, and we had no consideration of public Bills and orders for that session. The proposal to take the same course this session, allowing private members no time for the consideration of their Bills, is one against which I protest. I think we can stay here long enough to discharge the business of the country in a proper way, and it would not be a proper way to deprive private members of an opportunity for the consideration of the business they have in charge.

Mr. LAURIER. I can appreciate the desire of the Premier to conform to the wish of the members in this matter. But if such an adjournment carries with it the condition mentioned by the Premier, I would join in the protest of my hon. friend (Mr. Charlton) against giving away all the days that are left to private members to press forward the Bills they have in charge. The hon. the Premier should not forget that the Order paper is now crowded as it has not been for several years past, nor should he forget that three weeks at the beginning of the session were taken for the business of the Government. Under such circumstances, the adjournment, if it is agreed upon, should take place under the ordinary rules, and when we resume on Monday following the Queen's Birthday we should follow the Order paper as it is now.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I have only to say that the three weeks at the beginning of the session were taken, not for Government business, but for an attack on the Government. However, that is an end to the adjournment.

BRIBERY AND DISFRANCHISEMENT.

House again resolved itself into Committee on Bill (No. 6) to disfranchise voters who have taken bribes.—(Mr. Weldon.)

(In the Committee.)

On section 2,

Mr. JONCAS. Before entering into a discussion of the details of the different clauses of this Bill, I ask permission to offer a suggestion. This Bill is meeting with rather strong opposition from many members on both sides of the House, and I think that, if the suggestion I am about to offer is accepted, this opposition will be considerably lessened. I can understand and appreciate the desire of my hon. friend the member for Albert (Mr. Weldon) to crush corruption and put a stop to bribery at elections. Although the political level in Canada is still high, and I may say higher than in any other country in the world, I have no hesitation, however, in saying, and I think that many members of this House will agree with me that our political level has lowered somewhat during the past twenty years; and it has not lowered only in the province from which I come, but in every other province of the Dominion. I am proud, however, to be able to say that there is a strong political feeling existing in both parties in the country, and that the immense majority of the electors who go to the polls are guided by a sense of their duty as citizens. But is it not equally true that in too many counties and ridings in this Dominion, on the eve of every election, there are hundreds and hundreds of hangers-on who are waiting to be purchased before they will make a single move? It is well known that these hangers-on are so numerous now that they have the balance of power in many counties in the Dominion. So I say that the hon. member for Albert is to be congratulated in his efforts to put a stop to bribery and corruption, and the principle laid down in his Bill is one which has been accepted, and which is acceptable to every member of this House. Let me tell him, however, that, in my opinion, it does not go quite far enough. I have not the least doubt of his sincerity, but if he wishes to prevent corruption and stop bribery, I think he must provide in his Bill for the punishment of the man who offers a bribe, as well as for the punishment of the man who takes it. In my opinion, a man who offers a bribe is much more guilty than the poor man who receives it, because the man who offers the bribe is generally educated and intelligent, while the man who accepts of it is very often an ignorant man, who cannot realize the enormity of the fault he is committing. It may be said that there are laws already existing to punish the man who offers a bribe. I agree that we have laws punishing the man who offers a bribe, but we have laws also punishing the man who takes a bribe. Why, then, it may be asked, should we now frame a special law to punish only the man who takes a bribe and not include in this punishment the man who offers it? I will take this occasion to say a word about certain articles which appeared in the English press a few days ago in relation to this subject. From the tone of those articles it would appear that many have come to the conclusion that the opposition to the Bill comes only from the province of Quebec, and that the members from the province of Quebec are willing to allow corruption to be practised. Well, Mr. Chairman, I do not think that is the case. We from the province of Quebec readily admit that the principle laid down in the Bill of my hon. friend from Albert is a good one. But we want it to go a step further, and we say to him: If you want to stop corruption, punish severely the man who offers the bribe, and even more severely, if you can, than the man who takes it. Therefore, I think that if the hon. gentleman will consent to insert in his Bill the word "offered" wherever the word "taken" occurs, the opposition to this Bill will be considerably lessened. I merely offer this suggestion in the meantime, before the discussion on the details of the Bill is taken up.
