SPEECH FROM THE THRONE.

Mr. SPEAKER laid on the Table a copy of the speech delivered by His Excellency the Governor General to both Houses of Parliament in the Senate Chamber this day, which is as follows :—

Honourable Gentlemen of the Senate :

Gentlemen of the House of Commons :

In the Queen's name I greet you, for the first time since assuming the high functions intrusted to me by Her Majesty ; and it is with feelings of the liveliest satisfaction that I thus meet you assembled for the labours of another session of Parliament.

This feeling of satisfaction is enhanced by the opportunities which I have already enjoyed of visiting, and in my official capacity renewing acquaintance with, several of the chief centres of the enterprise and activity of this Dominion; nor need I refrain from assuring you that I have been deeply impressed by the heartiness of the reception accorded to me as Her Majesty's Viceroy and Representative, a reception which has once more manifested the loyalty, the cordiality and the public spirit of the Canadian people.

My predecessor was able to express gratification to you last year on an increase in trade and on the continued progress of the Dominion. It is gratifying to me to observe that the expectation which was then formed—that the volume of trade during the then current year would exceed that of any year in the history of the Dominion—has been fully realized, and that Canada's progress continues with every mark of stability and permanence.

It may be observed with satisfaction that a large proportion of this increase is shown to have been due to an extension of our commerce with Great Britain.

It is a cause of thankfulness that our people have been spared in a very great degree from the sufferings which have visited the populations of some other countries during many months past, and that while the commercial depression prevailing abroad could not but affect the activity of business in the Dominion, we have been free from any extensive financial disaster or widespread distress.

The revenues of the year have been ample for the services which you provided for, and have met the expectations on which the appropriations of last year were based.

The peaceful conclusion, by the award of the arbitrators at Paris, of the controversy which had prevailed so long, with respect to the Seal Fisheries in the Pacific Ocean and the rights of British subjects in Behring Sea, has removed the only source of contention which existed between Great Britain and the United States with regard to Canada. There is every reason to believe that Her Majesty's Government will obtain redress for those Canadian subjects of Her Majesty who were deprived of their property and liberty without just cause while the controversy was in progress.

At an early date a measure will be laid before you having for its object a revision of the Duties of Customs with a view to meet the changes which time has effected in business operations of all kinds throughout the Dominion. While my Ministers do not propose to change the principles on which the existing enactments on this subject are based, the amendments which will be offered for your consideration are designed to simplify the operation of the tariff and to lessen, as far as can be done, consistently with those principles and with the requirements of the Treasury, the imposts which are now in force.

There will also be laid before you a measure on the subject of Bankruptcy and Insolvency which will, it is hoped, make more adequate provision than now exists on that subject for the increasing trade and commerce of the country and for the greatly expanded trade between the several provinces of Canada.

Measures will also be submitted to you making more effective provisions for our lines of steam communication on the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, for improving the law with regard to Dominion Lands and with regard to the management of Indian Affairs; also a Bill respecting Joint Stock Companies, another with respect to the Fisheries, and several less important measures which experience has suggested with regard to various matters under your control.

Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

The Public Accounts will be submitted to you at an early date and also the Estimates of the expenditure which has been considered necessary for the ensuing year.

Honourable Gentlemen of the Senate:

Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

While it is hoped that the public measures which will demand your attention will not be very numerous some of them will be of great weight and importance, and it is my earnest hope and prayer that the care and zeal which you will apply to the deliberations of the session may be aided by the abundant blessing of the Almighty.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved:

That the Address with which His Excellency has been pleased to open the Session be taken into consideration to-morrow.

Motion agreed to.

SELECT STANDING COMMITTEES.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved:

That Select Standing Committees of this House for the present session be appointed for the following purposes.—1. On Privileges and Elections.—2. On Expiring Laws.—3. On Railways, Canals and Telegraph Lines.—4. On Miscellaneous Private Bills.—5. On Standing Orders.—6. On Printing.—7. On Public Accounts.—8. On Banking and Commerce.—9. On Agriculture and Colonization;—which said Committees shall severally be empowered to examine and inquire into all such matters and things as may be referred to them by the House; and to report from time to time their observations and opinions thereon; with power to send for persons, papers and records.

Motion agreed to.

OFFICIAL DEBATES COMMITTEE.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved :

That a Select Committee be appointed to supervise the Official Report of the Debates in this House during the present session with power to report from time to time, to be composed of: Messrs. Beausoleil, Béchard, Cameron, Charlton, Davin, Hazen, Innes, LaRivière, Lépine, Prior, Scriver, Somerville, Taylor, Weldon, and White (Cardwell).

Mr. LAURIER. Is it the same committee as last year?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The same committee.

Motion agreed to.

REPORT OF LIBRARIANS.

ADJOURNMENT — THE NEW BRUNSWICK JUDICIARY.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Mr. Speaker, before the House adjourns I would invite the right hon. gentleman, the Minister of Justice, to make a statement respecting certain changes that have taken place in the judiciary of the Province of New Brunswick. Under ordinary circumstances I would not, so early in the session, bring this matter to the attention of Parliament, but the right hon. gentleman is aware, and the House and the country are aware, that the changes which have just taken place—or one change at least which has taken place—has been attended and surrounded by circumstances of an extremely grave and serious character. In this country, Sir, we have been accustomed heretofore to boast that, whatever charges may have been made or bandied about by politicians from one political party to another as to political malversation in office, yet, so far as the bench of the country is concerned, it was, at any rate, pure and above suspicion. The hon. Minister of Justice will recollect that some months ago—I think it is six months ago—one of the leading newspapers of St. John in a doubled lead editorial preferred charges of a very grave and serious character against one of the hon. judges of the Supreme Court of that province, charges so grave and so serious that if they were true, of course all further confidence must cease in the administration of justice by that gentleman. The public awaited in breathless silence and suspense the action that would be taken with respect to these charges. The charges were not made in an indirect way; they were direct, positive charges of malversation, and the bar of the different provinces—I speak more especially of the Maritime Provinces—listened from day to day to hear the action that would be taken to remove the cloud which hung over, for the first time, one of the justices of the Supreme Court of the province. No action was taken. It is well known that the judges of the Supreme Court of New Brunswick at least had not been averse in the past to maintain what they imagined was their dignity, by taking proceedings in the nature of attachments for alleged contempt. It was believed that possibly that course might be resorted to in the instance I have referred to. No course of that kind was taken. After some period of time had elapsed the press generally challenged the action of those implicated who maintained this extraordinary silence, and it was asked whether, if proceedings were not to be instituted for contempt, at least proceedings would not be taken in the nature of a libel suit, in which the truth or falsity of those very grave and serious charges might be proven. It was felt and known, Mr. Speaker, that silence was impossible to be maintained very long. It was known that it was impossible that this House, this Inquest of the Nation, could meet and prorogue without this matter, or this charge, or this alleged blot on the fair escutcheon of our judges being removed or explained away. It has been lately announced in the press that the judge so charged has tendered to the Government of the day his resignation of his judicial position. It is stated, Sir, that the Government have accepted that resignation. I rise to ask for information on these points. I am told, on what I conceive to be fair authority—the right hon. gentleman will correct me if my information is wrong—that the Minister of Justice had this matter specially brought to his attention, not only brought to his attention, I may say, in a public form by reading the press, or having his attention called to the article, but that the incriminated judge also communicated to him with respect to it. I am informed that the whole matter was brought to the right hon. gentleman's attention. I know the jealousy with which the Minister of Justice views the integrity of the bench. I have confidence in him in that respect, however little confidence I may have in him politically—

Mr. FOSTER. Just saved himself.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I did not save myself "just." I saved myself wholly. I desire to say that this matter is not a mere political squib. I am not speaking for political effect; I am speaking of a matter which every hon. member in this House, on both sides, will recognize as exceedingly grave. I am speaking of a matter which would be rendered still more grave if an improper silence were maintained by the representatives of the people in this House. I feel quite sure, Mr. Speaker, that if the hon. Minister of Justice were charged with receiving a bribe in the administration of his duties, the matter would properly and promptly be brought to the attention of the House and discussed. I feel quite sure, that if he were similarly charged, a day would not go by without the accusation being properly challenged and investigated, and I see no reason why the same prompt and energetic action should not be taken with respect to a charge which surrounds and attacks the integrity of one of the judges of the Maritime Provinces. When I passed through St. John the other day, I understood the hon. judge was still discharging his official duties on the ground that his resignation had not been accepted. I rise to know, Sir, whether this judge has resigned, whether his resignation was accepted, whether the charges preferred against him some months ago in the columns of the St. John 'Globe' were brought to the notice of the Minister of Justice, and whether the Government have voluntarily accepted a resignation which entitles him to superannuation, without their taking any steps to make an investigation into these charges?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman has brought to the notice of the House, on the motion to adjourn, a question of undoubted importance, and one which perhaps it would be more satisfactory to the House to consider when the papers on the subject are on the Table of the House, in order that members might be more fully aware of the considerations involved in the case; and in order, that even speaking for myself and my own department, I should have greater accuracy in the explanation which I should give to the House, than if I relied upon memory. But, answering the hon. member's questions in the way in which they are put, and relying upon my memory entirely for the material with which to answer the hon. gentleman, I would say that the comments of the St. John 'Globe'—I think that was the paper the hon. gentleman mentioned—were brought to my notice by a copy of the paper being sent to me, where I then was, outside of this country. I am unable to recollect any instance in which they were called to my notice or attention in any other way than by the perusal of the paper. But communication was made to me, not directly, but indirectly, by the judge who was so charged in the press; and the statement which was made to me, indirectly and orally, on his behalf, as I was given to understand, was one which absolutely denied the truth of the statements involved, and made explanations with regard to the details of the transactions which justified me in believing that the judge impugned intended to vindicate his judicial and personal character if any attempts should be made to follow up those charges in the regular way. I say in the regular way, because it has always been the practice of the Department of Justice, and I think is in every other country, to take no official cognizance of charges made in the press merely. The practice always has been, in my experience—and I am informed, in the experience of my predecessors—that when a communication is made impugning the administration of justice, or the personal character of any judge, I require the person making the complaint, before it shall be noticed, to send that complaint to me in a way in which it can be communicated to the judge himself, and on the personal responsibility, at least, of the person who makes the charges. So far as I can recollect, there was no personal responsibility assumed by the writer of the article attacking Judge Palmer. If my memory serves me right, the charges were made in an editorial, or a communication, I forget which.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) An editorial.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Of course, the publisher of the paper was amenable to justice, if he were slandering the judge, by proceedings for libel, or attachment, or other proceedings for contempt; but as to personal responsibility for the allegations therein made, personal responsibility, I mean, as to the knowledge of the writer of the truth of the charges so preferred, there was none. I say, Sir, that my own practice has been that when such charges have been preferred in regard to any judge, whether a county judge or a judge of a superior court, I communicate the charge which has been thus made to the judge against whom it has been preferred. If the judge whose conduct is so impugned makes a denial, or what appears upon its face to be a satisfactory explanation of the charges which are thus preferred, the course has invariably been to inform the author of the complaint that any further proceedings on that subject must be taken before Parliament, because, by our constitution, as members are well aware, steps for the removal of a judge can only be taken by way of an Address from both Houses of Parliament to His Excellency to cause the judge to be removed. I am speaking, of course, now in this particular case, of an imputation against the conduct of a judge of a superior court. In the case of judges of county courts, there is a statutory provision under which it is my duty to inform the person who makes the charge against a county judge, assuming, of course, that the charges are such as to justify an inquiry, that if he thinks proper to pursue the inquiry further, a commission will be issued appointing a judge of a superior court to investigate the cause under the statute with a view to the exercise by the executive of the power of removal of the county judge, if the circumstances should justify his removal. I wish the House, therefore, to understand from this explanation that there was no communication addressed to me of that kind, no communication other than that which appeared in the newspaper which the hon. gentleman has referred to, and that the explanations, therefore, which were placed before me on the part of the learned judge himself, were placed before me on his own motion and instance, and not as the result of any communication from myself. The next question which is asked is whether the learned judge has tendered his resignation. The judge in question has tendered his resignation, and that resignation has been accepted. The circumstances under which it was accepted are these: The judge has reached the age of 74 years; he has been within a very few months of 15 years on the bench as judge in Equity of the Province of New Brunswick. The medical certificates which were laid before us are as strong as any that in my experience have ever been presented by a judge retired from the bench on the ground of incapacity for duty. Those certificates state that the judge, by advanced age and infirmity, had been deprived entirely of the sight of one eye, and therefore relied solely, in reading or writing, upon the other eye, which had been blind for a number of years before, but the sight of which had been eventually restored by medical treatment. Under these circumstances, and especially in consideration of his advanced age, I think we were justified in accepting his resignation.

Mr. LAURIER. The hon. gentleman has not stated, but perhaps he can say now, when the resignation was accepted, and when communicated to the judge.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It was recently, I think, about two weeks ago, or ten days. I will ascertain the date.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Has it been communicated to the judge by letter?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I think so, though I cannot say positively, because my department is not the department that makes such communication. I will ascertain, and inform the House to-morrow.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I understand from the right hon. gentleman's statement that he did not call the judge's attention to the article, and ask him with regard to the matters therein set out.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. No.

THE COMMISSION ON THE LIQUOR TRAFFIC.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Before you leave the Chair, I would like to inquire of the Government when the report of the Royal Commission on the question of prohibition, will be submitted to the House.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It is not customary to lay reports on the Table until the Speech is considered. I hope the report will be ready for submission very soon afterwards.

COPYRIGHT.

Mr. EDGAR. Before you leave the Chair, let me say that I think the First Minister will agree with me that the time has arrived for the consideration by Parliament of the copyright dispute between Canada and England. I do not want to discuss it until the papers are brought down showing the latest phase that it has assumed; and I would ask the Minister if he will lay before the House at the very earliest day, all the papers that are in the possession of the Government and that he can produce, since the last occasion on which returns were laid before the House, which was in 1891. I think on this question there should be no difference of opinion in this House, because I am sure that those who have sent us here will expect us all to maintain firmly what we consider to be the rights of self-government of Canada; and unless I am very much astray, an important right of self-government is involved in this decision.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I agree with what the hon. gentleman has said, and if he will move for the production of the papers I will endeavour to have them ready by the time the motion is carried.

Motion agreed to; and the House adjourned at 4.05 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, 16th March, 1894.

The Speaker took the Chair at Three o'clock.

THE GOVERNOR GENERAL'S INSTRUCTIONS.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to call the attention of the Prime Minister to a paragraph in the Speech from the Throne in which His Excellency is designated the Viceroy and Queen's representative. I should like to ask the hon. gentleman whether any change has been made in the terms of the Governor's Commission, and if so, whether he is prepared to lay the document on the Table of the House? The hon. gentleman knows that the Governor is not a Viceroy, unless Her Majesty has extended to him all the prerogatives and powers which belong to Her Majesty under which she acts.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Her Majesty has not changed the provisions of the Commission under which Governors General have been appointed in recent years.

THE NEW BRUNSWICK JUDICIARY.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I desire to ask the Prime Minister whether I understood the hon. gentleman correctly, that in the conversation across the floor yesterday he expressed the intention to bring down the papers to which I referred, without a formal motion being made? I have not placed on the paper a motion, because I gathered from the hon. gentleman's remarks that he would bring down the papers at an early period, without the necessity of a formal motion being passed.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I did not say I would bring them down without a motion being passed, and we came to the conclusion that it is more convenient to have a motion submitted in every case, but I will waive the motion in this instance.

ADDRESS IN ANSWER TO HIS EXCELLENCY'S SPEECH.

The House proceeded to the consideration of His Excellency's Speech delivered at the opening of the session.

Sir JAMES GRANT. Mr. Speaker, within the year that has just passed two very important events have transpired. We have parted with one representative of Her Majesty, and we have received the nobleman who recently arrived amongst us and is the present representative of Her Majesty in this Dominion. During the sojourn of Lord Derby and Lady Derby in this country they endeared themselves to the people, and he, by his wise judgment and discretion, by his long practical experience as a legislator and his occupancy of important positions in the Government of Great Britain, so discharged the serious responsibility of presiding over the destinies of this great Dominion as to reflect great credit on himself and to carry back to England the warmest possible regards of the people of this country. As for Lady Derby, she endeared herself to everyone with whom she came in contact. She took an active interest in our people, in our institutions, in everything that tended to the welfare of our people, and in leaving Canada she left behind her tangible proof of the work she was desirous of accomplishing, the establishment of an institution in the capital of the Dominion known as the "Stanley Institute," which is a credit to her name and her reputation. The wish of the people of this country is that in leaving Canada they may be long spared to enjoy the ease and affluence which have recently descended to them, and in doing so I feel satisfied that throughout the length and breadth of Canada there is but one wish that they may be long spared to undertake works of practical usefulness which await them in the great centres of England. We have also received here within a very short time a nobleman and lady, Lord and Lady Aberdeen, whose names went before them, inasmuch as they lived in Canada for a short time, and although that period itself was extremely short, still they endeared themselves to the people with whom they came specially in contact in that Garden of Eden, as I might call it, Hamilton, one of the cities of Ontario, so that when they left Canada there was a unanimous wish felt among the people throughout the country that we might be so extremely fortunate as to have them here as representing Her Majesty. "The Grand Old Man," whom I am sorry to say is now languishing from sickness, and has been obliged to leave the leadership of that great party over which he presided, in his judgment and discretion selected to come to Canada a nobleman who was Viceroy of Ireland, and who so distinguished himself in that position as to endear himself to every Irishman in that grand old emerald isle, where to-day the shamrock grows so sweetly and luxuriantly. We rely upon it that not only will the representatives of that Ireland, which we all delight to honour, but all the people of Canada will receive at his hands that degree of justice which is bound to flow from any representatives sent to Canada by Her Majesty, as on every occasion she selects the best man possible to preside over the destinies of this important and conspicuous portion of her domain. As for Lady Aberdeen, we know her well. She takes, also, a deep interest in our people, in our institutions, and in everything that appertains to the welfare of the country. I am sure that when, in the ordinary course of events, the time arrives for Their Excellencies to leave Canada, our people will heartily say, God-speed to the Governor General and his lady, who have so largely contributed towards the happiness, the comfort, and the prosperity of the Dominion. Mr. Speaker, I rise with no ordinary degree of pleasure to move the address in response to the Speech from the Throne. Although twenty years have elapsed since I before had the honour of occupying a seat in this Chamber, I still undertake this duty with a considerable degree of hesitancy, inasmuch as I am fully aware that within that time there have been extraordinary advances made in every line of thought, and particularly in the great department of political economy. As one of the representatives of the capital of the Dominion of Canada, I feel satisfied that the compliment that has been paid me is more to the people whom I have the honour to represent, than to myself, personally. Permit me to say, Sir, that, in making this response to the address, I wish to crave the indulgence of the hon. members of this House. Time is an important factor in estimating the development and progress of a country, and certainly the people of Canada have reason to feel proud of what has been accomplished within the past twenty years. If we look around us, in almost every direction we see tangible proof of that advancement. I would ask any sane man who looks into the various lines of thought and development, if he does not observe in this the full and thorough determination of the people of Canada (notwithstanding the difficulties they have had to contend against) to maintain the spirit of independence and reliance on themselves. It all convinces me that our people are rapidly attaining the point of the maintenance of the true spirit of national development. I know of nothing that has tended more to bring our people together than the grand principles of confederation. It has cemented the various provinces, it has developed interprovincial trade and commerce, and it has caused us to know their legislators, who have been brought up here from time to time, and who have taken so active and so energetic a part in the affairs of this House that—as the Hon. Sir Hibbert Tupper pointed out in Hamilton a few days ago in his admirable address on “Canadian Footprints”—we look to the Maritime Provinces as a nursery of great men. These provinces have contributed to our public life a class of men who have always taken an active and energetic part in the advancement of this country. Before the principles of confederation were thoroughly carried out, the Maritime Provinces traded with Boston and New York, and the contiguous portions of the United States; but since confederation what do we find? That we in this part of Canada are taking their coal, that they are taking our flour, that in every way trade and commerce has sprung up between us, and that by our interchange of ideas we are daily becoming more closely allied to each other. The hon. members of this House need not be told what the Canadian Pacific Railway has accomplished in the progress of our great country. I might say, Sir, that I hold in my hand to-day the bill presented to me by the late Sir John Abbott when he was taking an active part on the floor of this House, who then expressed his wish to me that I should introduce the Canadian Pacific Railway Bill. He formulated the principles of it, and I had the pleasure of introducing it on the 20th day of April, 1872, and of addressing the House on the importance of that great highway. We are to-day realizing the importance of the construction of that railway in every sense of the term. We find that trade and commerce have developed to an extraordinary degree. In the present state of depression that railway has no doubt difficulties to contend against, as almost any railway on this side of the Atlantic has, but notwithstanding that, I am satisfied that it will be able to stem the current, to float on as for years past, and to assist very materially in the further development of the resources of Canada. I may say that I know perfectly well the sentiments expressed by individuals who have considered the subject, and they are, that the shortest route across from the Atlantic to the Pacific would ultimately command the commercial supremacy of this North American continent. We find also that the Government are now inaugurating a system of rapid steam communication between Great Britain and Canada, a policy which will also assist very materially in advancing our position as a country. Twenty years ago, we had only one line of steamers—the Allans—and to them is due a great deal of credit for what they have done in the earlier stages of Canada. We know that if it had not been for the Allans the trade of Canada would be in a backward condition compared to what it is to-day. There are now five lines of steamers sailing from Montreal to European ports, and we will yet have another line in order to enable us to compete with the great Republic to the south of us. We have also those magnificent steamers, sailing from Vancouver to Japan, China, India and Australia, and they will undoubtedly bring about in time increasing trade with these countries. I read the speech of the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce regarding his mission to Australia the other day, and what a regret came to my mind when I thought that had the Grand Old Chieftain been living he would have clapped him on the shoulder and said: Well done, thou good and faithful servant. Mr. Speaker, I look forward to the time when we shall have a large and important trade with Australia. At the present time the trade of that great country is just what the trade of Great Britain was when Her Majesty ascended the Throne. Is not that an evidence in itself of what Australia has done by the public spirit and self-reliance of its people? And, when we look at our products that are now being exported there, and the manner in which our Canadian mowers and reapers and other agricultural implements are attracting the attention of the farmers in Australia, we see another evidence that the products of Canada, by their superior construction, will command a market no matter where they go. I believe that it is the intention shortly to establish a Canadian depot in Australia. That is a practical idea, and the people of that continent will then know,—as they are shortly going to know in England by the establishment of a depot of a similar character—what are Canadian products and what are not. We know how often spurious articles are put in the market and said to be Canadian when they are truly something else. It is right and proper that our public men should so direct the current of trade with reference to these depots that the products of Canada, no matter where they go, shall be amply and carefully protected from spurious imitations. I am glad to know that a conference is shortly to take place in Ottawa—I believe on the 21st of June—when we shall receive emissaries from Australia who are coming to exchange ideas with the leading men of this country, and to see what means can be adopted for establishing a more extended trade with these provinces. I look forward to the day, not far distant, when the various Australian provinces will be confederated as are the Canadian provinces; and when that takes place, it will not only stimulate the people there to perfect their internal government, but also assist them in promoting their foreign trade. When an individual wants to accomplish anything, he has first to know himself, and then he knows how to deal with others. So it is with the people of a colony. They require to know themselves, to adopt the principles which have been found useful in other colonies, and then they can prosper; and when the various provinces of Australia shall be joined together like the various provinces of Canada, it will stimulate them very materially in carrying out those principles of trade which we have in contemplation. I hope also that the day is not far distant when we shall have an electric cable laid between this country and Australia. We know that an electric cable is the trade pulse of the world. When the price of a product rises or falls, the fact is at once telegraphed to the various centres of the world. We in Canada need to be up and doing in this matter if we are to hold our own; and I have been very much pleased indeed to find that Mr. Sandford Fleming, a gentleman very well known in this country for his energy and enterprise, especially in connection with the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, should have gone to Australia on his own personal account, and so stimulated the interest of the Australians in the matter that, with reasonable assistance from Canada and Great Britain, I feel satisfied that an Australian cable will before very long be an accomplished fact. A great increase has also taken place in the volume of our trade with the West Indies. This trade was greatly stimulated by the Jamaica exhibition; and chiefly owing to the visit of the Finance Minister and the Canadian Commissioner to that exhibition, Mr. Adam Brown, of Hamilton, we have thus a large source of revenue from those islands. Our products have been successful there for the same reason that they have been successful in the great Chicago exhibition. We know how many prizes have been awarded to us; and they have not come to us from mere chance or accident, but as a result of the energy of our farmers and mechanics; and I am satisfied that the products of this country when placed in competition with the products of any other country in the world, will always be able to stand the test and maintain an equally high standard. We have also had the enormous steamers of the Canadian Pacific Railway ploughing our western lakes, and developing a line of trade there of very great importance. I merely advert to these subjects as indicating the great progress of the country, because they were scarcely known twenty years ago when I formerly occupied a seat on the floor of this House. There are pessimists who say that Canada is going to the dogs, that we hardly amount to anything, that our position is so infinitesimal that we are hardly noticed. But when we look at the resources of this country, at the energy of our people, at the wonderful development of the country in the last twenty years, it is perfectly marvellous how much Canada has to be thankful for, and we can see that a great future is in store for our people. We know perfectly well, Sir, that within the last twelve months an extraordinary financial depression has existed almost throughout the entire world; scarcely any country has escaped from it; the great centres of trade and commerce have been very materially disturbed. But thanks to the energy and perseverance of the various peoples in the world, times are now gradually improving, and I hope the day is not far distant when the general trade of the world will march forward again with the same progress and advancement that we have seen in the years that are past. Of the various sections of the world, I do not know any where this trade depression has been felt more severely than in Australia. Nearly every bank in Australia—I believe all with the exception of three—went to the wall; and even those three were tested to the utmost capacity. The influence of such a depression was widespread, and was felt in the great financial centres of the world, particularly in England, and why? Because the monetary men of England were induced to invest their capital in the form of deposits in the various Australian banks, and the collapse came when they least expected it. They were induced to put their money there like many other capitalists, by the prospect of high interest; and high interest is never a safe investment. The consequence was that the far-reaching effects of that collapse were experienced in England. Succeeding that almost immediately, an extraordinary cyclone passed over the financial institutions of the United States. They were shaken to their very foundations; and notwithstanding the collapses that we have witnessed in every direction we have never for one moment felt that the people of that great country, whom we admire and respect, whose institutions we have seen grow up almost at our doors, would long fail to revive. We have seen how they paid off the great debt of the American War, when everybody said that it could not be done; we believe they are able to pay everything they owe, and will soon be as prosperous again as ever; yet we saw no less than 158 of their national banks go to the wall, because those banks were not established on the same sound basis as our Canadian banks. They did not possess the same elasticity, and there was not the same opportunity of getting money in a hurry. Thanks to the wisdom and foresight of the public men of this country, our banking arrangements are entirely different; and, as a consequence, the financial institutions of our country have been saved from disaster and have shown the solid and substantial basis on which they rest. We find that to-day the bonds of Canada stand as high in the English market and in other money markets as any other securities; and this we owe largely to the manner in which the monetary institutions of this country have been managed. Again, it is a remarkable fact that in a period of stagnation the associated banks of New York should have accumulated $236,000,000, while, owing to a want of confidence in the country and a feeling of nervousness on the part of the men who held the purse-strings in the monetary centres, only $11,000,000 were placed in general circulation from the 19th of August to the 13th of September. This is proof positive of the want of confidence they had in themselves. When large sums of silver were being thrown on the market, those who held gold locked it up in their vaults, so that this gold, which would have been, under ordinary circumstances, in circulation, was doing no good whatever to the country. Again, it is a remarkable fact that no less than seventy-six railways in the United States passed into the hands of receivers during the past year. Why? Because the railway companies, although they had the securities to cover their indebtedness, were unable to raise money, owing to this lack of confidence and of elasticity in the American banking system, and had to pass into the hands of receivers. And this despite the likelihood of their being able to pay in the near future. If we turn to England, what do we find? England is looked upon, and with reason, as the great centre of the financial world. It is the Mecca to which everyone goes who seeks to float a scheme and raise money. Well, in England we find that the capital created and issued in 1893, was less than one-fourth of what it was in 1889. Does not that show stringency in the money market? Most assuredly it does. But I am glad to know that in the month of February past the trade and commerce between England and Canada has very materially improved, and is to-day more than it has been for some time, which is proof positive that we are gradually and surely working again into a more successful trade than we have experienced for some time past. I may seem, Mr. Speaker, to be drawing a rather dark picture, but I feel assured it is but right that we should consider all these matters, because they afford us tangible proof, if such be required, of the remarkable way in which Canada has stood the crisis. And how proud we ought to be that this country of ours is now hopefully looked forward to by every individual who wishes to build up a home for himself in the New World where he will have some prospect of obtaining an adequate return for his labour and investment. In view of certain reports which have been put in circulation concerning the great North-west, and which may tend to retard the current of emigration there, it may be well that I should allude to certain facts respecting that country. Much of the depression in the province of Manitoba, and particularly in the North-west, is due to the low price of wheat. We know perfectly well that wheat throughout the world is now in a depressed condition. A large quantity is grown in India, Russia, the United States, and various other portions of the world. In some places it is grown so very cheaply that competition by us has become extremely difficult. I am sure, however, that the time is not very far distant when our farmers will be able to so diversify their farming operations as to overcome this difficulty. The following table will show the fluctuations in the value of wheat growing since 1890, in various states:—In the state of Illinois, the average value per acre in 1890, was $11.22. In 1891 it was $15.00; in 1892 it was $11.91; and in 1893, $5.61. In Missouri, in 1890, the value of wheat per acre was $18.71. In 1891 it was $14.05; in 1892 it was $8.04; and in 1893 it was $4.07. In Minnesota, wheat was worth, in 1890, $10.29 per acre. In 1891 it was worth $15.52 per acre; in 1892, $7.44; and in 1893, $4.50. In Northern Dakota, the value of an acre of wheat in 1890 was $4.83. In 1891 it was $15.25. In 1892 it was $7.45; and in 1893 it was $4.30. In our North-west Territories, it was raised from $6.75 to $11 per acre. As regards the cultivation of land, the average increase in area of cultivable land in the United States has been as follows:—

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell).

| 1871 to 1875 | 32 per cent. |
| 1875 to 1880 | 34 do |
| 1880 to 1885 | 19 do |
| 1885 to 1890 | 7 do |

or only 1¼ per cent per year between 1885 and 1890, showing that the limit has been reached, and that the pioneers of farming industry must turn their attention to Canada. A great deal has been said about our farmers leaving their lands and going elsewhere, but it is well to remember that in many parts of Minnesota, homesteads were granted to farmers no less than five times, yet to-day that state is one of the most prosperous in the Union. We find to-day that hundreds of American farmers are settling in this country. All along the North-west, up about Edmonton, they are coming in quietly and steadily, and taking an active part in the development of the country. Hundreds are turning their attention to mixed farming, because they find that growing wheat alone will not pay; and I find, from statistics that I have recently obtained from the North-west Government, that the production of the farms is as follows:—

| No. of Farmers. | Produced bushels of Wheat. | Cattle. | Pigs. |
| 34..... | 29,675 | 246 | 152 |
| 26..... | 21,163 | 255 | 111 |
| 34..... | 18,681 | 413 | 198 |
| 8..... | 3,863 | 106 | 61 |
| 13..... | 6,543 | 444 | 77 |
| 4..... | 690 | 9 | 9 |

These statistics, which were gathered at various points in the North-west, prove beyond doubt the great agricultural development which is taking place in that country, and show that the time is not very far distant when farming will be carried on there as it is now in our eastern country, and the people will not give their attention entirely to the cultivation of wheat. The report of Mr. Crawford of Indian Head, which has been sent down recently, shows the following as regards Assiniboia. Thirty-three farmers had the following acres under crop : 5,512 acres.

| Wheat produced..... | 134,406 bush. |
| Oats do..... | 28,258 do |
| Horses do..... | 378 |
| Cattle do..... | 386 |
| Sheep..... | 448 |
| Pigs..... | 4,615 |

The same men have 6,485 acres ready for 1894. It is all very fine for people to disparage our country, but let them look at these facts and consider the matter quietly, and I am sure that they will unite in saying there is a great future before the North-west, and I hope the day is not far distant when we will have even a greater tide of immigration flowing into that country than we are now experiencing. We know perfectly well that there are great territories that have scarcely been opened up at all. There is the great Athabasca country. Thanks to the Minister of Interior, we have had recently a splendid report by Dr. McConnell upon that country, which report shows that there is there an area of over 200 miles in length, which has lying under it an enormous basin of petroleum. Consider how, when this is developed, it will add to the material resources of this country, it seems, at first thought, remarkable that it should have remained so long untouched. But it could hardly have been otherwise, because there was no railway construction to Edmonton until recently. We know what Pennsylvania has done in a financial way for the benefit of the United States, and we may rest assured that, as the Athabasca country is developed, it will do as much for Canada. Mr. Bowell, in his address at Toronto, said that Australia took no less than a million and a quarter dollars worth of coal oil last year. How gratifying if we, the people of Canada, could command the trade in this respect, not only of Australia, but also of China, Japan and India, where, up to the present time, nothing like petroleum has been discovered. We have an additional stimulus to the development of our country in the resources of the North-west. We want to develop every productive industry in our country. We require money to keep us going, and, rely upon it, with the resources behind us, we have no reason to fear that the finances of this country will be in any other than a prosperous condition in the future, as they are at the present time. As regards the United States, permit me to say before leaving that point that in reading The Forum, only a short time ago, I was very much impressed with an observation made by one of the leading men, who is also known as a statistician of the highest repute, with reference to Canada. Mr. David A. Wells refers to Canada in these terms :

In the Dominion of Canada separated territorially from us on the north by an imaginary line, there has been no panic, no unusual demand for money, no stoppage of industries, no restriction of trade, no increased rate of interest ; in short, nothing beyond the ordinary course of events, except so far as these events may have been influenced by contiguity to what may be termed a financial cyclone whose pathway of destruction was contiguous but not within its own territory.

Mr. Speaker, that expression of opinion with reference to Canada and the people of Canada, and the future prospects of this country, from so able a statistician as Mr. Wells must be extremely encouraging. It is in this way that the best men of the neighbouring republic regard us to-day. They are taking lessons from our institutions, they are imbibing at our fountains of learning, and they estimate the value of our institutions by the prosperity of our people. I trust the day is not far distant when they will arrange their tariff so as not only to meet their own requirements, and develop their own resources, but also to co-operate with us in advancing the great principle of trade on the North American continent. With reference to the great arbitration which has just been held, before concluding, permit me to say that it should be a source of entire gratification and satisfaction to the people of this country to observe its results. There is no doubt the matter has been arranged most satisfactorily to the people of Canada. We had great pride in the plenipotentiaries who went from this country, and we know that the manner in which they discussed all the questions that came before them, the skill and ability they displayed won for them distinction, not only from the people, but from Her Majesty as well. The great question above all others in this conference was that of peace, and that has been accomplished : peace has been secured, and a striking evidence given of the progress of civilization. We have now pelagic sealing ; we have no mare clausum. We know that in 1885-86 there were some half-dozen vessels fishing in these waters which caught seals only to the value of about $100,000, whereas during the conference some fifty vessels were engaged, and that trade had advanced to about $500,000. The Asiatic and American shores, and to within sixty miles of the Pribyloff Islands are free to us, so that the energy and ability of the gentlemen who had this subject in charge have afforded our hardy fishermen an opportunity of not only materially advancing their own interests, but also helping on the resources of our entire Dominion. I feel that this question has been decided in a manner which the people of Canada may regard with a high degree of pride and satisfaction. As regards the tariff, we know that it is a very vexed question, and how it is to be determined this House will soon know. I have not shared the secrets of any member of the Government, but I think the people of Canada, living on the border of a highly protected and industrially developed country, such as the United States, must consider the whole question of the tariff fully, calmly, and dispassionately. It is not a question that can be settled in a day. We must have a revenue to meet our expenditure. If the principles of free trade were introduced, where should we be? We should be in the same position as they are now in England, and should be obliged to levy taxes upon our people. In that country they have an income tax; no man can shoot a bird, or even take a feather from its tail, without being subject to a tax; no man can catch a fish in any small stream without being taxed. But to-day, in Canada, we are free in these particulars. And why are we free? Because thirteen years ago the principles of protection, moderate protection to meet the requirements of our people, and to carry on the affairs of our country, protection so arranged as not to press unduly upon a community, not to thwart the efforts of manufacturers, but to broadly subserve the best interests of this country, and advance its material prosperity, were recognized. And I feel sure that when the tariff is brought down, the men of common sense in the Dominion of Canada will acquiesce in the sentiments which emanate from those who have authority, and that the tariff for this country will be of such a discriminating character, will have so much power in its principles, will so tend to advance the material interests of our people, as to give entire satisfaction to all classes. In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, let me say that the Dominion of Canada is a noble heritage which has descended to us from the achievements of the various nationalities which make up our people. We have a prosperous country, we have an energetic, pushing, and self-reliant population, and, judging from the traditions which our ancestors have left us, I think our own people are fully able to work out their own destiny. Density of population or extent of country are not everything. If we look back over the pages of history, what do we find? India, with a population of two hundred millions, controlled by a few Anglo-Saxons, China with as many millions of people as there are days in the year—what influence do they exert on the progress of civilization, on the advancement of society, or in the councils of the nations? Brazil and Mexico, with even a greater population than Canada—where are they to-day so far as regards their influence in the world? When we consider little Canada, as we are called, with our five millions of people, what do we find? We find that a few days ago our plenipotentiaries distinguished themselves at the seat of learning in Paris, where they met those other great counsellors, and they came back here having established for themselves a name and a reputation which lead us to believe, and which lead the people of the world generally to acknowledge, that in Canada we have a class of men who are well able to guard our interests and to protect us in the widest and most comprehensive sense of the term. It is a grand thing to live in the spring time of a nation; it is a great thing to be at the fountain head of the great stream of national existence, flowing on with every season and gaining momentum with the lapse of time. Little events sometimes disturb nations; we know perfectly well that expression of opinions sometimes interfere with the prosperity of a country; and for that reason, no matter what side of the House we occupy, be we Reformer or be we Conservative, we owe it to our country to protect its interests and its people; we owe it to our country to utter nothing that will be detrimental to its interests, we owe it to our country to guard it in every particular, both at home and abroad. With these ideas before us we may rely upon it that the young oak of Canadian nationality, planted but as yesterday, will spread out until it extends from one end of the Dominion to the other. Let us hope that the dew-drop on the very leaf of the acorn will never generate the sap of religious antagonism, bigotry or sectionalism, will never develop racial differences, will never develop anything but what will tend to advance the best interests of Canada; and in that way, and in no other way, we will become bound together as one people. When I look around this Chamber to-day and observe the seats that were once occupied by great men whose voices are now hushed, it seems to me that a phonetic power emanates from these walls to-day that binds us together as one. When I think of a Macdonald, a Cartier, a Mackenzie, and a Dorion, the quadruple powers of intellect, activity, intelligence, and perseverance; when I think what these men did for this country in years past, how they formed by their energy and ability the very warp and woof of that structure upon which to-day rests the civil and religious liberties of this country, I feel constrained to ask, have we not reason to feel proud of what has been accomplished? Let us look forward now to a unity of effort and a unity of design, and irrespective of political considerations, with no other object in view but the advancement of the material interests of our country, let us perpetuate the fair name of Canada, let us endeavour to continue it as a colony of which the Government of Great Britain has reason to feel proud; because I feel assured that among the territorial dominions of Her Majesty there is not one that occupies a higher position than Canada. Sir, I wish its people the greatest possible degree of prosperity, and God-speed.

Mr. LACHAPELLE. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, previous to seconding the Address in answer to the Speech from the Throne delivered yesterday by His Excellency the Governor General. I deem it my duty to pay to His Excellency the respects of this House and to convey to him the feeling of gratification with which the Dominion at large received his appointment as its Viceroy. When, last summer, Lady Aberdeen was selected as the head of the Women's Association in Chicago, when she organized that congenial work, that affectionate work in the shape of an Irish village, Lord Aberdeen was given us as our new Governor. I fancy, Mr. Speaker, that it must have been somewhat of a pain for His Excellency to break the bonds that tied him to the old land, for I am aware that His Excellency was a favourite with the English, Scotch, and especially Irish people. Well, let His Excellency be pleased to bear in mind that he will find in the Dominion the same affectionate feelings, and, moreover, the affection of the French people, which, in their behalf, I have the honour to tender him. Mr. Speaker, the first section of the Speech from the Throne seems to be permeated with one single concern. It looks like a wish of the heart, the reading of this section seems to give voice to a joyous exclamation. His Excellency states therein a feeling of gratification resulting from the financial and commercial condition of the Dominion. His predecessor had ventured to hope that our trade would go on increasing and that the financial working of the last year would realize the happy anticipations which he chose to make. His Excellency appreciates this fact, and we share his delight in this respect. The fact is, the prosperity of Canada shines out more forcibly from day to day. We have but to consider the various elements on which we must rely to prove this proposition, and we find that we are right in feeling proud of this general prosperity. I will not venture, Mr. Speaker, to read aloud the trade returns nor the banks' financial statements, nor the other returns of the same kind on which one must exclusively rely when stating that the present condition of our country realizes what the founders of confederation had prophesied. I only beg to be allowed to call your attention to a fact which happened during last year, a most momentous fact, which, to my mind, affords the proof of the statement which I ventured to make when speaking of our prosperity: I refer to the great Chicago Fair. Well, what is the lesson that comes out of this fact as regards our country? All the visitors to the exposition came back satisfied that, although the United States apparently held a higher position than ours in the political world, the Dominion held along with the United States an enviable position, a position which is indeed considered by us all as much advantageous, if not superior, to that of our neighbours. At this exposition, where we had an earnest organization, for which the Government really deserves the thanks of the country, our Canadian exhibitors, in the most important departments of industry, carried the largest number of the prizes granted. They came back, so to say, the breast covered with medals, their hearts overflowed with a new patriotism. Why should we feel so proud? Why is it that we are feeling this pleasant sensation, this deliverance of contentment which we are pleased to make repeatedly outside of this House and even here to-day? It is because this prosperity is the natural result of the National Policy brought about in 1878. We are happy, Mr. Speaker, to find that it is the natural result of the great policy that the Conservative party introduced in our country. It is a natural consequence of the policy in which we, the Conservatives, believed, and which has led to the prosperity and the greatness of our country. Mr. Speaker, the most important point of the speech delivered by His Excellency, the Address to which I have the honour to second, the material part of that speech is that which regards the tariff, the revision of the tariff. We must feel that this is a momentous question, requiring the whole attention of this honourable House, and one which must truly be granted every consideration in the preliminary researches which it involves. But it is well to bear in mind in the meantime that the protection principle was the safeguard of our trade, that this principle is the one that made the Dominion what it is now. So that, should the Government deem proper to amend the tariff, it must be understood that the underlying principle of this tariff must remain unchanged. We must remember, also, Mr. Speaker, that the regulating of a tariff, the fixing of the duties to be raised, form, so to say, a contract in which are, to a large extent, certainly, interested the foreign manufacturers, the importers and our own manufacturers. Well, if, according to my contention, there is a contract in that, the Government, when establishing and making a new tariff, are bound to preserve the protection principle which has prevailed for a number of years in our country. Mr. Speaker, must we not understand, as any one does, as for that, that when it comes to changing a contract, it does not go without thorough, earnest studies, without preparatory labours, without preliminary researches, which must necessarily lead to fruitful results. I repeat that we must be governed by the protective principle in the preliminary studies which we are called to make with respect to the changing of the tariff. It is the principle by which the Government also must be governed in their fiscal policy. I know, Mr. Speaker, that these statements will not agree to all of us, but it must be understood—and I beg to be allowed to emphasize my sentiment by repeating the same idea—that we, Ministerial members, or rather, members who sit on the Government side, feeling, as we do, that the protective policy is necessary, it must be understood that the policy of the country must be essentially protective, that is to say, a policy aiming to make in the future the fortune of the country as it has done in the past. I am aware, Mr. Speaker, that this policy was, and is still, charged with making the fortune of a few and being an injury to the many. This was said in various circumstances, and it was stated again at the time of the great Liberal convention held in this town, last summer. As I understand it, this policy, defined in this way, is hardly defensible. But we know that by contending for the protection principle, we rely on the experience of the past, on the financial prosperity of our institutions, and we are in a position to state, by the returns which they furnish us, that this policy must be continued. We in the meantime assert that the protective principle does not make the fortune of only a few, but the good of all. Mr. Speaker, one section of the Speech from the Throne is devoted to the settlement of the troubles arising out of the fishing in the Behring Sea. On that point we are bound to congratulate the Government and to acknowledge that that was a happy event for us, for the country at large, for all the British subjects. That question, which was pending for many years, was a menace for our tranquillity and our interests. That difficulty was settled in a friendly way. When considering the settlement of that question, we ought to congratulate ourselves in so far as the principle was acknowledged that the British subjects have a right to fish in the Behring Sea, a right which the Government of the United States was disputing to them. We must acknowledge, Mr. Speaker, that the grievance, which was kept standing for so many years, being thus settled in a friendly way, we have a good ground to hope that in the future all these difficulties will be settled in the same way, and that, consequently, we will always be in a position to guard against the innumerable calamities of a war. Reference is made, in another section of the Speech from the Throne, to a new improvement: I mean the establishment of a line of fast steamers between England and the Dominion. It is a most important question, and one which will certainly deserve the attention of the Government and of this honourable House. But, Mr. Speaker, I may be allowed to make the following suggestion, namely, that it is a matter in which the whole Dominion is concerned, and that private interests could not be taken into consideration in settling the conditions of such a considerable enterprise, which ought to be excessively advantageous, but which will also require enormous sacrifices from our country. That question will have to be considered in the best way possible and with regard to its importance. Various other matters are brought to the attention of this House, but as to which we have no sufficient data to be well informed. I beg, however, to observe that, during the labours of the present session, we ought to bear in mind that protection should be granted, in the fullest way, to our farming community. No doubt, comfort is not as general as we would wish it to be, although there are no further hardships. Nevertheless, it is our duty to extend a helping hand to our farmers as far as possible; they surely are worthy of the attention of the Government, and I feel satisfied that the latter intend to protect the farming community. How far can that assistance go? I am not called upon to come down to details just now, but I hope the Government will give the matter their very earnest consideration and that the farmers, seeing how much the Government cares for them, will acknowledge, as much as the people in the cities, that the protective policy is decidedly the proper policy for the whole of our people. The Speech from the Throne concludes, Mr. Speaker, by a prayer offered by His Excellency to the Almighty. I beg to recall, before concluding, a remembrance of mine. In 1854, Lord Elgin, after many years of endeavours, had it granted by the Imperial Government that the Montmorency Laval school should be converted into a university. Her Majesty likewise granted to the Laval University all the privileges conferred to the highest universities in the United Kingdom. We then saw, in 1854, the highest personification of the English Church granting to the province of Quebec a Catholic university and conferring to it the same teaching rights as held by universities in the United Kingdom. Well, Mr. Speaker, we then saw the Pope, the highest personification of the Catholic Church, thanking Her Majesty the Queen Victoria for the immense favour granted. Is not the recalling of this remembrance proper, Mr. Speaker, and should we not say over again that, when Her Majesty the Queen Victoria and the Pope Pius the Ninth are seen exchanging relations of intimacy and congratulation on the occasion of such an important event, we ought to remember that both these examples should be followed and that we ought to work for the good understanding, the increase of the public wealth and the prevalence of peace amongst all our people. Let it be remembered, especially, that the love of labour must predominate and silence all dissensions, all jealousies. Let it be remembered that should we continue the carrying on of this policy of general interest, and should order and peace continue amongst us, the Dominion will continue to see days of prosperity and greatness.

Mr. LAURIER. Mr. Speaker. I am sure I am voicing the sentiment of this side of the House, and, perhaps, also, for once, the sentiment of the other side, when I express to the hon. member for the City of Ottawa (Sir James Grant) and to the hon. member for Hochelaga (Mr. Lachapelle) the high sense of appreciation which we all entertain for the creditable efforts with which they have gratified the House. The duty which had been assumed by the mover and second of the Address is under all circumstances, as I know, a difficult one; and on this occasion having to create something out of nothing, having to evolve ideas out of few words, their task was particularly trying, and I am bound to say, in all conscience, that with the exception of a few flights of fancy to which I could not concur, they have come very well out of the ordeal. My hon. friend from the City of Ottawa particularly charmed me in one passage of his speech, where he referred to the Maritime Provinces as a nest of great men, and when he said that the Maritime Provinces always appreciated their great men, I could not but think of the event which only took place yesterday as evidence that in uttering this sentiment he spoke truly, and that Nova Scotia, at least, appreciates the great man who now conducts her provincial affairs. My hon. friend from the City of Ottawa, in the latter part of his speech, also referred in touching terms to names and memories which must forever be dear to all Canadian hearts; he lifted a cloud from the horizon which we once saw full of the splendour of their glory, although their forms are now for ever enshrouded in the silent shadow of death. My hon. friend had once the privilege of sitting in this House at a time when perhaps there was congregated on the floor a galaxy of men which has never been equalled since. Casting a glance around him, he was impressed, painfully impressed, with facts with which he was already familiar, but perhaps which had never impressed him so heavily before. He was impressed with the fact that the ranks of those who were guiding the destinies of this country some twenty years ago had been suddenly thinned by the hand of death. Well, time flies, and we are carried in its flight. This is nothing new, it is a very old and admitted truth; yet old as it may be, it is always new, and its painfulness always carries a new bitterness with it. To one who, like my hon. friend, comes into this House after a lapse of several years, perhaps to him the painfulness of that truth is more conscious than to us, who have been sitting continuously for these many years in this House, and who have seen the gradual disappearance one by one of all those whose absence from the floor he deploras, and whose memory he reveres. Yet after all we know this is the old and supreme law, and since it is, it should be, and inevitably must be, the part of wisdom, as my hon. friend said, to apply ourselves to fulfil to the best of our ability the task left to us by those whom we no longer see amongst us, but whose example I believe will ever remain. The hon. mover of the address was most felicitous in the remarks he made in regard to the cordial welcome which has been extended by all classes of the Canadian people to the distinguished nobleman who represents Her Majesty the Queen in this Dominion of Canada. All classes of people have been particularly satisfied with the selection which had been made by the Imperial authorities of the person of the Earl of Aberdeen to fill the position which has become perhaps one of the most important in the British Empire. In this democratic country we would deem it beneath our dignity to offer to anyone, however high in station, anything which would resemble fulsome flattery; yet it is no flattery whatever, but the sober truth, to say that Canada has been eminently fortunate in the character and gifts of all those who up to the present time have occupied the distinguished position of Governor General of Canada—I will not say Viceroy, as stated in this address—but simply use the regular term, Governor General of Canada. It is certainly no flattery to say that of all those eminent men who have occupied the position, no one came to the discharge of these important duties with a prouder name and prouder record than the present incumbent of that office. In one sense the name of Aberdeen came most fittingly after the name of Derby. The name of Aberdeen, like the name of Derby, is a name which, while it has been made famous by a long line of ancestors, has never shone more conspicuously than during the present reign. I re-echo every word that was spoken by the hon. member for Ottawa (Sir James Grant) with respect to the late illustrious incumbent of the office of Governor General. When Lord Derby left our shores he carried with him, as well as his distinguished consort, the entire sympathy and respect of the whole Canadian people, who had learned to appreciate their unobtrusive and genuine qualities. The reputation of the successor of Lord Derby had preceded him here, a reputation won by eminent services to the State, a reputation characterized by the most marvellous success which marked the administration of the Earl of Aberdeen as Viceroy of Ireland, a success which I say was nothing short of marvellous, when we remember that Lord Aberdeen came as Viceroy of Ireland to Dublin Castle in the midst of great agitation, in the midst of solid distrust, and left the castle six months after amidst the sobs and tears of a people quick to respond to kindness and generosity of a people whose tender heart and quick intelligence had discerned and discovered in that scion of a proud aristocracy one who understood all the phases of modern democracy more than anyone of his class, unless in that respect the palm be given to the noble lady who also bears the name of Aberdeen. The hon. member for Hochelaga (Mr. Lachapelle) referred at some length to the success of Canada at the World's Fair. Well, in that respect, I re-echo every word that was said by my hon. friend. The success of Canada at the World's Fair was such as to cheer all Canadian hearts, especially of those who believe that agriculture is the art of arts and the science of all sciences, for, had it not been for the agricultural exhibits, I am not aware that Canada would have had any special cause for enthusiasm in regard to successes won there. The farmers took the lion's share of all the awards carried away by Canada, and the World's Fair has shown that, though the farmers of Canada are not a pampered class and have received nothing from the Government, but, on the contrary, are burdened and hampered by the Government, still it is to the farmers of Canada we must look for the development of this Dominion. My hon. friend from Hochelaga (Mr. Lachapelle) said he was sure that this time the Government would do something for the protection of our farmers. Why, Mr. Speaker, I was under the impression that the Government have always pretended that they have done a good deal for the farmers of Canada. My hon. friend is not satisfied: he hopes and believes, however, that the Government will do something now. Well, he has more hope and faith in the Government than I have. But, Sir, having gone that far with my hon. friend from Ottawa, (Sir James Grant) and with my hon. friend from Hochelaga (Mr. Lachapelle) I am sorry to say to them that I can go no further. Already, in this discussion, we have come to the parting of the waves, and it is with regret I see them following in the errors of their ways. I regret it all the more, I am sure, because I cannot take my share of the flowers, though they were flowers of rhetoric, with which the hon. member for Ottawa strewed the ground on which he was treading. My hon. friend is endowed with a good deal of enthusiasm, for without it he would not have been able to produce such a profusion of blossoms as he obtained from the sandy, rocky and barren ground to be found within the four corners of the Speech from the Throne. He is endowed with a good deal of enthusiasm, I say. In all the range of Canadian politics, he has not seen anything which did not afford matter for admiration and commendation. If there was anything in the policy of the Government which did not altogether meet with his approval, he kept it concealed in his breast. For instance, the hon. gentleman has not said a word, nor did the hon. member for Hochelaga, as to the late and inconvenient season at which Parliament has been called. I am sure that this is a matter which the hon. gentleman cannot approve. It has been the unwritten law of Canada for a great many years past, that Parliament should be summoned at an early period in the year, at the latest, towards the end of January. The reason is obvious. In this country we have no privileged class. All the members of this House, with scarcely an exception, are engaged in the ordinary avocations of life, and it is an object of paramount necessity that after having discharged their duties to the country, they should be able to go back to their ordinary business pursuits, about the opening of the busy season. In years past, I say, it was the unwritten law of Canada: still, this year the Government have departed from that law. They waited, and waited, and waited, until the opening of the busy season was in sight, before summoning Parliament, and as to this, not a word of explanation has been offered. Why, we might have expected, at all events, that the gods who rule over our destinies would have come down from the sphere which they occupy in majesty, and given us a word of explanation. At least, I would have expected that if they would not take us into their confidence, they would have taken into their confidence the hon. member for Ottawa, who might I submit to my hon. friend from Ottawa (Sir James Grant), as well as to his hon. friends around him, that under existing circumstances the Government have been sadly remiss in their duty in not summoning Parliament unless they can bring forth some cogent and strong reason to excuse their negligence. Unless the Government are able to bring up some reason of much convenience to themselves, to excuse the inconvenience to Parliament, I say they are remiss in their duty. Some reason there must have been, and what was it? I am told that the Government expect to rush the session. Well, Sir, no one expects to remain here for a very long time, but at all events the session must last the time necessary to carry on and discuss the business of the nation. That is the work for which we are here. There is another reason which has been hinted. It has been stated in the press that the Government were waiting to see what development would be made in the revision of the tariff on the other side. It has been stated that they were looking to Washington. But, Sir, is that possible? Why looking to Washington? How are the mighty fallen; how are the pure fallen from grace, I ask? How are the superloyal fallen down from their own high declarations of superior allegiance which they used to make in former times? I believe after all that there is some truth in that statement. I believe that was the true reason indeed that Parliament was not summoned, because they wanted to so shape events by looking to Washington to see what progress would be made in the way of tariff revision there. I believe it, Sir, because it was my good fortune in the month of January, 1893, more than a year ago, to be present at the dinner of the Board of Trade in Toronto and there I heard those words from my right hon. friend the Prime Minister. Speaking of the changes in public opinion which had taken place in the United States he continued in this way :

It may be that changes have taken place in the public mind since, and that far greater progress in the direction of tariff reform will be made, but let us wait and see the measure which is to be the result of the great change of opinion and the great change of parties. We are not driven to seek our example and our guidance in the statesmen of that country, but I should be foolish if I did not admit that every country is bound to take lessons by the experience of its neighbours and to be controlled to some extent in the formation of its tariff and regulation of its trade by the condition of the tariff and of trade in other countries.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. LAURIER. Gentlemen opposite cheer the statement, and from that I understand that that was the reason. Then why has not the statement been openly made? Last year some reason had to be given by gentlemen opposite why the revision of the tariff was not proceeded with. The Prime Minister had occasion to speak, yet he never repeated that language before the House. He took a back seat on that occasion, and then my hon. friend the Minister of Finance came forward and stated: That indeed the tariff could not be proceeded with with regard to the revision of the same; not because it was wise to take the example from our neighbours, as had been stated by the Prime Minister in Toronto, but because he was not sure that there was a necessity for a revision of the tariff, because he did not know that there had been such an expression of opinion in the country, and he wanted to know from the people themselves what was their opinion upon that subject. He decided that he and his colleagues, during recess would go from place to place, meet the people and the various business interests, and see what was their opinion and their wish with regard to the tariff; whether it should be kept entire; whether it should be reformed, or whether it should be simply modified. That was the reason given last year, and when Parliament rose it was well understood that the Ministers were to go from place to place to interview the people and to ascertain their views with regard to the modification of the tariff. As it was natural to expect (and it is nothing extraordinary) there has been a great curiosity amongst the people to read, and to hear from the representatives of the various business interests themselves what was their opinion in regard to modifications in the tariff. Great, therefore, was the astonishment of the people, when on the 24th of April, at the first of these meetings in the city of Montreal, it was found that the conferences, instead of taking place in the light of day, were to take place in camera obscura. There was to be no publicity. Great was the astonishment, greater was the disappointment, and greater yet the indignation, because, Sir, in this democratic country of ours, the people have a natural aversion to, and suspicion of everything, whatever it may be, which does not come out in the light of day. The people were suspicious, and protests were loud and general; indeed the protests were so loud and so general, that my hon. friend, the Minister of Finance, could not ignore them, and had to refer to them. He had to take some notice of them and he had to do the best he could to explain his own position with regard to the same. This he did at a banquet tendered him in the city of St. John. Then, Sir, the reason he gave why these meetings were held in secret, was this: That if the meetings had been public he would have had to listen to set speeches upon free trade and protection, and by having the meetings in secret, he would get more information. Well, I am bound to say to my hon. friend that this excuse deceives no one but himself. He knows, as well as I do, that when he was having these interviews with the different business interests of the Dominion, he was not doing his own business, but he was carrying on the business of the country at large. He had to pass judgment upon his own judgment; and to tell us simply, that these meetings did not take place in the light of day because he was averse to be lectured on protection or free trade, is to tell us that which he may believe, but that perhaps others may take with a grain of salt. I do not question, however, the sincerity of my hon. friend when he made the statement that the sole reason which he had, not to meet the people in open day, was his aversion to set speeches on free trade and protection; but, Sir, if my hon. friend convinced himself on that, I may tell him that he did not know his own mind. He did not know his own mind as fully as his followers; he did not know his own mind as fully as the reporter of the Montreal 'Gazette' who gave some account, as far as he could give, of what took place at these meetings. The reporter of the Montreal 'Gazette' was at the first of these meetings at Montreal. He could not go in, but he was at the door and he saw the various persons who went in, and he informed the public through the paper that the Ministers had been interviewed by delegates from the following business interests: "Boots and shoes, leather shoe findings, tanners, wall paper manufacturers, dry goods importers, wines and liquors, spruce lumber, and pulp." The reporter could not report what was going on but still he guessed pretty accurately what was going on, as we may judge by the heading which he put on his article. And what was the heading? It was a very suggestive one: "Feeling their Pulse." That was what was going on in the camera obscura, feeling the pulse of those delegates to ascertain whether they would submit to a reduction of their protection or whether they would kick and insist on their pound of flesh. I believe that the reporter stated exactly what was going on in the camera obscura: my hon. friend was feeling the pulse of those gentlemen on that question. Well, if such be the case, we know exactly what took place, because after all human nature is everywhere the same. At the time of the American civil war, Artemus Ward said that he also wanted to make some sacrifice to preserve the Union—he was willing to sacrifice all his wife's relations. So, when the country is suffering, and has been long suffering under a protective system, when the complaints of the people are loud and universal, then every monopolist in the land will say to you: There may be some truth in that; my own industry needs to be protected; my own trade needs to be carried on by the country, but the trade of my neighbour should be carried on by himself. Shakespeare has told us of a similar comedy which took place in secret in a tavern at Eastcheap, in the reign of Henry IV. Those engaged in it were Prince Henry, Sir John Falstaff, Bardolph Peto and Poins. Meeting one night at the tavern they determined to have a little play, the subject of which was the rebuke that the prince would be sure to have in the morning from his royal father, the king, for the bad company he was keeping. Falstaff took the part of the king, and rebuked the prince, and afterwards they exchanged their parts, the prince becoming the king, and Falstaff taking the part of the prince. Falstaff, as the prince says:

I would your grace would take me with you: whom means your grace?

PRINCE HENRY. That villainous abominable misleader of youth, Falstaff, that old white bearded Satan.

FALSTAFF. My lord, the man I know.

PRINCE HENRY. I know thou do'st.

FALSTAFF. But to say I know more harm in him than in myself, were to say more than I know. No, my good lord; banish Peto, banish Bardolph, banish Poins; but for sweet Jack Falstaff, kind Jack Falstaff, true Jack Falstaff, valiant Jack Falstaff—and therefore more valiant, being as he is, old Jack Falstaff—banish not him thy Harry's company, banish not him thy Harry's company; banish plump Jack, and banish all the world.

Well, Sir, suppose we had gone into this camera obscura at the time the representatives of some of those interests were there to interview my hon. friend. Let us suppose that the reporter had entered just at the moment when the liquor and wine men were present. There would be the king, in the person of my hon. friend the Minister of Finance, stern, with a hard look in his face, telling the wine and liquor men that the complaints of the people are so loud that he is obliged to make a reduction of the tariff, and that he has to repeat the observations that he made in 1891, when taking the duty off sugar and increasing the duties on wine and spirits and tobacco. Then you would have heard the wine and liquor men reply: Good lord, banish boots and shoes, banish leather, banish woollen goods, banish wall paper; but good wine, valiant wine, banish not from thy Harry's presence. This might have taken place; but this is only guess on my part, because the people were not admitted; the thing was done in secret. But I think I have guessed pretty truly. Why was not the truth known? Why were not the public admitted to those meetings? I have told you the reason: my hon. friend did not want to have public meetings, because he did not want to be lectured on free trade and protection. Let me quote his language in order not to do him an injustice. These are the words my hon. friend made use of at the banquet at St. John:

Instead of revising the tariff without a knowledge of the needs of the people they had taken the business method of examining on the spot all conditions of the tariff. After becoming familiar with the conditions they will make their conclusions, he said, on the fullest possible basis. Their meetings were not open to the press, because if they were they would be subject to a series of set speeches on free trade and protection made for political effect. By holding secret meetings they were able to get fuller information.

So you see my hon. friend did not want to be lectured on free trade because he did not want to be convinced, and he did not want to be lectured on protection, because he was convinced; so he went from city to city, and held his interviews in secret. But he came to meet the farmers at last, and then the policy was entirely reversed. Up to that moment secrecy was the order of the day; but then it was changed to publicity. When the hon. gentleman met the manufacturers secrecy was the rule and reporters were given a wide range, and even if a very inquisitive member approached the Minister to get an inkling of what was going on, he found him as unwilling to give the secret as the sphinx on the sands of Egypt. But when he came to the farmers, the case was different. The meetings were open, if possible in the open air, under the roof of heaven, the press not only admitted, but invited; and what is the fact? Would you believe it? The hon. gentleman who had such horror of set speeches on free trade and protection, lectured the farmers vigorously on their duties. The farmers went there to expose their grievances; but instead of being allowed to do so, they met the Minister of Finance, the Minister of Trade and Commerce, the Minister of Agriculture, the Controller of Customs and the Controller of Inland Revenue, all armed with blue books, who proved to their own satisfaction—not the farmers' but the Ministers'— that the farmers had no grievances whatever. Then they divided the job. The two Controllers, the Controller of Customs and the Controller of Inland Revenue, took the province of Ontario; the Minister of Agriculture took the North-west Territories; and I am bound to say for the Minister of Finance, who displayed great activity, that he took the whole Dominion for his operations. Well, the Controller of Inland Revenue and the Controller of Customs proved to the farmers of Ontario that they were blessed with prosperity. It was true, they did not see it, or feel it, or enjoy it; but it was there all the same, and they would feel it if they would have full faith in this paternal Government. As to the hon. Minister of Agriculture, when he came to the North-west, he was bound to admit that the farmers were not in a very prosperous condition, but after all he told them it was all their own fault. What if they were taxed on their lumber? What if they were taxed on their binding twine or their agricultural implements? What if they were taxed on everything they consumed? If they were taxed, it was their own fault. The panacea was not in the tariff. It was on every hand: mixed farming was the thing that would save them and lift them out of the slough in which they were struggling. I am proud of my profession when I see what a good Minister of Agriculture a lawyer can make, and how much of agriculture a lawyer knows—much more than a farmer would imagine. For instance, how was it possible that the farmers of the North-west could, of themselves, conceive that the remedy for their evils lay to such an extent in their own hands. They never could have thought of it. But as soon as a lawyer, who happens to be, at this moment, Minister of Agriculture, points out mixed farming as the remedy, they exclaim: How stupid we were not to have thought of that. But I am bound to say that the Minister of Agriculture did not act fairly towards his predecessor, the hon. gentleman who to-day represents the city of London (Mr. Carling), for that hon. gentleman said not only that mixed farming was the panacea, but also that two-rowed barley was the thing that was going to save us. Our present Minister of Agriculture forgot the two-rowed barley. Now, as regards the Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster), he went from the east to the south, and the west, and everywhere he went he proved to the farmers that they have no grievances whatever. He lectured them on the beauties and advantages of protection, and then he preached to them a great sermon on the necessity of people paying their taxes. He said it was the duty of all good Christians, and especially good Christian farmers, to submit to the evil of taxation. Why, my hon. friend was not as generous as that other Minister of Finance of whom I read a moment ago. A French Minister of Finance, after the Restoration,

Mr. LAURIER.

M. de Villèle, imposed frequent and heavy taxation on the people, and the people sometimes remonstrated. One of the comic papers represented the Minister armed with a long knife, and wearing the traditional white apron and cap of a chef, surrounded by a brood of chickens. He spoke to the brood in this way: Chickens, with what sauce would you prefer to be eaten? But, they said: We do not want to be eaten at all. Oh, said he, you are begging the question; I am consulting you as to the sauce you would like to be eaten with. Our Minister of Finance did not consult the chickens even on this important point, but told them that the sauce was to be protection, and allowed them no choice. Well, Mr. Speaker, after all those interviews, the Government were just as much at sea as to what they should do with regard to the tariff as they were before. When they came back to Ottawa, they apparently did not know any more than when they went forth, because as soon as they got back they were followed by long processions from the very places they had just visited, composed of the same men they had just been interviewing. The Minister had gone to feel their pulse, and now they came in their turn to feel the pulse of the Minister. They came to feel his pulse and to steady his nerves, and, above all, to exact the pound of flesh; and, judging from the words the Minister has put in the mouth of His Excellency, they have indeed obtained their pound of flesh. There is to be no reform whatever. The system is to be continued, which has prevailed for some years, of levying taxes, not to go into the public exchequer, but into private purses—of imposing duties, not with the view of raising a revenue, but with the view of taxing one portion of the community for the benefit of another. My hon. friend from Ottawa (Sir James Grant) said a moment ago that he expected that the Government would, in their wisdom, provide protection for all classes. I am sure they will. I have read the speech which my hon. friend the Prime Minister made a few days ago in this city. In that speech he proclaimed himself much more of a protectionist than I had even supposed he was. Why, he is going to protect all kinds of labour, even professional labour; he is going to protect even the lawyers and doctors. Let me read to you his words:

Now, our position is that what promotes the welfare of the industrial classes is good for all; that the prime object is to promote the labour of the country, and to see that the work which has to be done is done by Canadians. This is the goal we should endeavor to reach. Whether it is the labour of the farmer, the mechanic, the professional man, or the manufacturer, the grand aim we should keep in view is that labour is the basis of the welfare of the country.

So, if we are to have protected labour among the provisions, I denounce the First Minister to the mover and seconder of the Address, who are both physicians. Physicians are not protected yet, but the lawyers are well taken care of. Judging by the reports of the Auditor General there are some lawyers in this country who are protected to an almost fabulous extent. But where is the need of reform in the tariff? The Speech from the Throne tells us, the hon. member for Ottawa (Sir James Grant) tells us, the hon. member for Hochelaga (Mr. Lachapelle) tells us, and every gentleman opposite, no doubt, will tell us that this is indeed a most prosperous country. I agree that Canada is blessed as few countries are. We are blessed with a cold and bracing climate; we are blessed with fertile broad acres; we are blessed with hills and valleys, with forests and prairies and lakes and rivers, the like of which the sun in its course never sees elsewhere; we are blessed with wealth along our briny shores and in our hills and rocks. Nature has done much for us, but what have we done for ourselves? We are told, and hon. gentlemen opposite profess to believe, that Canada is a prosperous country. But one million of Canadians have fled from their prosperity, and to judge of our condition we have to take some standard of comparison. No doubt, if we compare our fate with that of some nations, we may be deemed prosperous. The fellah in the valley of the Nile who brings up his scanty crop under the protection of a just Government, deems himself prosperous when he remembers that fifteen years ago everything he produced was seized upon by a swarm of petty officials, who kept him in beggary. If we come to more civilized nations, there was a time in the history of France when that most humane king, Henri IV, stated that his object was to bring about such a state of things that every peasant would be able to put a fowl in his pot every Sunday. No doubt, the French peasant who was able to put meat on his table once a week was deemed prosperous; and if we measured our prosperity by that standard, we are very well off. To-day the French peasant brings up his family on ten acres of land, and if by dint of persevering labour and continual denial he is able to add one or two acres to his original lot, he is considered prosperous; and if that measure be applied to us, we are prospering. But if we measure our prosperity by the standard which ought to rule in Canada, if we measure it by the standard which has been laid down by the hon. gentlemen themselves, to tell us we are prosperous is a mockery of common sense and an insult to the intelligence of the people. Prosperity! Why, we are told that our trade has increased with Great Britain. As I understand the Trade and Navigation returns, it has increased more with the United States. But we are told by the press of the hon. gentlemen: No, the trade with the United States has not increased, because most of the increase of that trade has been in the export and import of coin and bullion. Therefore there has been no increase in trade whatever. So, whichever way you regard it, the Speech from the Throne is not satisfactory in this respect. But, suppose that our exports have increased, what is it we sell most of? The great bulk of our exports—we all realize the fact—is in agricultural products. This is the basis of our prosperity, and I admit that of late years our exports of agricultural products have increased. Under such circumstances there should be more prosperity amongst the farmers. There is not the prosperity among the farmers one would be led to expect from the increase of their exports. Why? Because the farmers sow and reap and sell, but they do not toil for themselves; they toil for monopolists. It is the old story—"Sic vos non vobis mellificatis apes." Like the busy bees they toil, but some robber comes and takes away their profits. This is not prosperity, but, Sir, this is the condition of the country at the present time, and if hon. gentlemen talk of prosperity under such conditions I take issue directly with them. My hon. friend from Ottawa (Sir James Grant) compared our status as a nation with the status of the American nation. It is true that the Americans are not as prosperous a people to-day as they have been in the past. They have been going through a crisis. But what is the cause of this crisis? Protection. Protection is the primary factor in the present crisis in the United States. What has been the determining cause in that crisis? Is it not a fact that the determining cause in the crisis in the United States has been the silver legislation? And what was that but an application of the principle of protection in a law which compelled the American people to buy silver for circulation at a higher price than the ruling market price? That was the origin of the crisis which now prevails in the United States. Therein is a lesson for us. Our legislation is better than theirs in matters of finance, but in our fiscal policy we follow closely upon the lines of American legislation. We must take warning from what has taken place in the United States, and, if we wish to avoid the crisis which they are now passing through our duty is, at the earliest possible moment, to reverse our system and go back to more sane fiscal legislation. Now, Mr. Speaker, there is in the Speech from the Throne, apart from the legislation we are promised, a paragraph which has been commented upon at some length by my hon. friend from Ottawa (Sir James Grant) and by my hon. friend from Hochelaga (Mr. Lachapelle), the award by the Behring Sea Court of Arbitration. Both these hon. gentlemen have spoken in very glowing terms of that award. In this they have reflected. I am sure, the ideas which were set forth by the Prime Minister when he came back from Europe after the Court of Arbitration had finished its labours. The Prime Minister, when he returned from Europe, spoke in terms, I will not say of extravagance, but I will say of exuberant, praise; in fact he was so exuberant in his language that—I say it without meaning any offence to the hon. gentleman—I cannot but think he said more than he really meant. I do not think that in his heart of hearts he quite considered our success so complete as he would have us believe. With regard to the hon. gentleman I am somewhat in the position of my hon. friend to my left (Mr. Davies, P.E.I.)—I am not overburdened with confidence in the Prime Minister in political matters, still I respect his opinion. But when he tells us that we have reason to be proud and to be satisfied with our success before the Court of Arbitration, I oppose to his opinion the opinion of a gentleman, who in matters judicial always commands respect—I oppose to the opinion of the Prime Minister the opinion of the Minister of Justice of Canada, who was a member of the court, and who dissented from that award in its most important particular, and, for my part in this matter, I prefer to follow the opinion of the Minister of Justice rather than the opinion of the First Minister. What was the origin of the trouble between Canada and the United States with regard to these Behring Sea fisheries? It was the danger of the extinction of seal life in the northern seas. Up to the year 1886 the Canadian sealers and the American sealers had prosecuted their labours without injuring one another. But, in 1886 the American authorities took violent, arbitrary and unwarranted proceedings against the Canadian sealers to oust them from the northern seas. The ground for this, as alleged by the American authorities, was that they had jurisdiction over Behring Sea because, as they said, in the language of international law, it was a mare clausum, that it was a sort of American lake over which the Americans had just as much authority as they have over the waters of Salt Lake in Utah. This contention was so preposterous that the negotiations between the Foreign Office and the Department at Washington were not carried far before it was practically disavowed. Then they fell back upon the contention that they owned the seals, whether found in the open sea or near the shore, because the seals were born in American territory. Then, failing in this, they fell back upon the claim that they had a right to protect the seal life and to take measures to prevent the indiscriminate slaughter of the seals. This latter proposition was really the whole bone of contention. It was known and admitted that the seals had become scarce in comparison with what they had been in former times, both those that teemed in the seas and those that rooked on the islands. The Americans carry on their operations on land, while the Canadians carry on theirs upon the waters of the open sea. The first object of the Americans was to prevent pelagic sealing, the taking of seals in the open sea. All nations have established domestic laws to protect certain kinds of game and fish. It is well known that when they came before the court all their legal pretensions were brushed aside by the court, in fact, so far as I have been able to read the proceedings, the whole of the contention between the American Commissioners and the British Commissioners was as to the making of these regulations for the protection of the seals, and in this I affirm that the pretensions set up by the Canadian Commissioners were altogether set aside by the award of the court. In the first place, it is a well-known fact—and this will not be denied—that the first contention of the British Commissioners was that the regulations should apply not only to pelagic sealing but also to the slaughter of the seals on land. There was much reason in this and the point was put forth with great ability and great force in the British case. This is what was said in the British case, which, I believe, was largely prepared by my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries:

No such regulations

Says the case—

can be just or effective unless accompanied by corresponding and correlative control over the islands and over the time, method and extent of slaughter upon them by the nationals of the United States of America.

To enforce regulations which would shut out British subjects at certain seasons and from prescribed areas from the pursuit of pelagic sealing and at the same time would leave the slaughter of seals on the islands to be pursued according to the mere will of the lessees of those islands or of their Government, would be to establish regulations one-sided in their character and unjust and therefore ineffective for the object in view, namely, the preservation of seal life.

Sir, notwithstanding the cogency of this argument, the court of arbitration came to a different conclusion, establishing regulations, not for the slaughtering of seals on land, but simply for the slaughtering of seals in open water. Our pretensions, I am bound to say, were rejected against the dissent of the Canadian arbitrator, and therefore I cannot conceive why the Prime Minister should want the Canadian people to rejoice at such a reward as this. Now, there was another contention, a second contention, advanced by the Canadian commissioner, to the effect that the regulation with regard to pelagic sealing should apply simply to Behring Sea, and should not apply to any part of the Pacific Ocean south of Behring Sea, and the award, instead of accepting that contention, established that the regulations should be binding not only in the Behring Sea but in the Pacific Ocean south of the Behring Sea, as far back as the 35th degree of latitude, that is to say, as far back, I understand, as San Francisco. This award was also made,

I am bound to say, against the protest of the Canadian arbitrator, and upon this point also I prefer, for my part, the opinion of the Canadian arbitrator to the opinion of the Prime Minister. Then it was agreed on both sides that there should be a zone around the Islands, which served as rookeries to the seals. The Canadian commissioner suggested that the zone should be twenty miles around the Islands, but the court of arbitration made it three times twenty, or sixty miles around the Island. Then it was agreed also on both sides that there should be a close season within which sealing should be prohibited. The Canadian commissioner suggested that the close season should be from September 15th to May 1st, but the Court of Arbitration decided that the close season should be from May 1st to July 31st, the very reverse of what was proposed by our own commissioner. Upon this regulation also the Canadian commissioner dissented, and I am disposed to back his judgment against the opinion set forth by the Prime Minister. But, we may be told, the American commissioners also dissented from this regulation. It is true the American commissioners dissented from this regulation, and when they came back they did not brag, the American commissioners never pretended they had made a great success, on the contrary they protested against the regulation, and there was a very obvious reason why they should protest. From the very first their pretension was that they had a monopoly of those seals, that they had the right of ownership, the right of protection, and consistently with their pretension, they would not be participants in the regulation which knocked the bottom out of their pretension. But if you want to know why we should rejoice, as the member for Ottawa (Sir James Grant) said a moment ago, over that award, let us look at what took place on the other side of the continent, let us look at what took place on the British Columbia coast. Sir, I call the attention of my hon. friend from the city of Ottawa to this fact, that the effect of that award has been to kill the Canadian sealing industry completely. Canadian sealing is a thing of the past. I see that my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries takes some exception to that; has he not seen, as we have all seen, a report that all these schooners and tackle which were employed in the seal fisheries in British Columbia have been offered for sale at auction? I do not know whether the sale took place, but I know that they were offered for sale, and the hon. gentleman will not contradict me on that point, although I do not know that they were sold. I know that the British Columbia sealers have offered all their schooners and tackle for sale at auction, saying that their industry was forever a thing of the past, and unless I am greatly mistaken—we shall see by and by—I understand that there is in the hands of the Government a petition from the owners of schooners and tackle employed in the fisheries, asking the Government to compensate them for the great loss they have sustained by the award. Sir, I agree that on one ground we have reason to be satisfied—we have reason to be satisfied with the reference of the question to a court of arbitration, we have reason to rejoice that a dispute between Great Britain and the United States was referred to a court, instead of those two nations appealing to the supreme arbitrament of war. This is the second time within thirty years that the two great Anglo-Saxon nations have given this example to the world of settling their disputes, not as in the past, by the barbarous plan of war, but by a judicial arbitration. So, however unsatisfactory the award may be, still there is reason to be satisfied that the dispute was peacefully settled in the same manner as previous disputes had been settled. Now, there is another paragraph in the Speech from the Throne of which we have heard a good deal, a fast Atlantic service. Sir, how long ago is it since the Prime Minister told us, with a great flourish of trumpets, that Canada was to provide a fast Atlantic service on the northern route between Europe and Canada, equal to the fastest and best then plying the ocean? It must be six years ago at least, and in the following session, in consequence of that grandiloquent promise, the Parliament of Canada was induced to vote $500,000 to whoever would establish such a service equal to the fastest and best then plying the ocean. Now, half a million is a large pile of money, but although that offer has been on the statute-book for four years, nobody has yet come forward to take possession of that sum of money. Our great Canadian lines, the Allan line, the Dominion line, and the Torrance line, who, as the hon. member for Ottawa City said a moment ago, have been the pioneers of steam navigation in the St. Lawrence, have not come forward, enterprising men as they are, to take the money, and why? Because it is well known that the conditions set forth by the Government are impossible of fulfilment; it is impossible to have on the northern route a service equal to the fastest and the best, it is impossible to have a service as fast as the services now plying between New York and Europe. Why, Sir, it is a well-known fact that the difficulties of navigation are so great in the Gulf of St. Lawrence that it would be madness to expect any company to maintain a rate of speed such as is maintained between New York and the European ports. I remember that this question was discussed a few years ago, and two gentlemen of authority in this House gave their opinion to that effect. Mr. Jones, then one of the members for Halifax, and who is an authority upon this subject, said it was madness to expect that we should maintain a rate of speed of seventeen or twenty knots an hour, such as is maintained on the southern route. The hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Welsh) gave the same opinion. I hold in my hands now a book entitled, "The St. Lawrence Pilot, comprising Sailing Directions for the Gulf and River; originally compiled by Rear-Admiral H. W. Bayfield." On the very first page of the book I read this :

In the charts resulting from extended Admiralty surveys will be found accurate soundings, taken with Massey's patent sounding machine, which gives the depth independent of the effect of currents or drift of the vessel. The use of this instrument cannot be too strongly recommended, for correct soundings may be obtained with it in 30 fathoms of water without heaving to, if the vessel be not sailing at a rate exceeding 6 knots; and no vessel ought to be permitted to run so fast, in a thick fog or dark night, when in the vicinity of land or other danger.

Now, this is conclusive, and if these proposals—which I do not discuss at length to-day, and which will have to be discussed at a future date—are at all to be realized with any degree of success, the conditions will have to be greatly modified before they can be accepted. There is another paragraph in the Speech with respect with Australia. Well, this is also a chapter which is an old story. We have sent delegation after delegation, I do not know how many times. We have sent a delegation to the West Indies, once, twice, and perhaps three times. We have sent a delegation to Brazil and to almost every part of the world, and now even to the Antipodes. To obtain, what? That which we have at our very doors—to obtain trade which we can secure without any difficulty whatever, not by subsidizing lines of steamers, but simply by removing obstacles to trade and commerce. Sir, the Speech shines with many subjects, but many matters have been omitted that should have appeared. An hon. member yesterday called attention to the Prohibition Commission. How many years have elapsed since the hon. Finance Minister told us in a very solemn moment—

An hon. MEMBER. In a moment of weakness.

Mr. LAURIER. It was at a solemn moment when the hon. gentleman made a confession that in a moment of weakness he had formed a hasty opinion of prohibition, that he wanted more information. That incident occurred, if I remember rightly, in July or August of 1891. One year, two years, have elapsed, and still the hon. gentleman is in the same state of ignorance. By this time his trouble must have become chronic, and if continued much longer it will prove incurable. Why has he not that report at this hour? Is it not a mockery? The resolution was adopted by the House in the summer of 1891; it was not until January, 1892, that the Commission was appointed, and the

Mr. LAURIER.

Commission has been sitting, and I do not know whether it is sitting yet, but two years have elapsed and still there is no report. It seems to me that the hon. Finance Minister is not desirous to get rid of his ignorance on that subject. Then there is another subject to which reference should have been made in the Speech from the Throne: I mean the treaty with France. It is now more than fifteen years ago that Sir Alexander Galt was instructed by the Canadian Government to open negotiations in order to obtain, if possible, a treaty between Canada and France. Those negotiations were opened and then abandoned, they were resumed, then interrupted, then renewed again, and finally they culminated in the completion of a treaty which was signed last winter, in February, I think, and placed at once on the Table of the House. Strange to say, the Government, which had been negotiating that treaty for about fifteen years, so soon as the treaty was completed, seemed to have repented that they had entered into such a treaty. They were bound to take some action and inform Parliament at once whether they proposed to have the treaty ratified or not ratified. They did nothing. During last session it might have been unfair to press for an answer. The Prime Minister was away on other important duties; but on this occasion, a year after the treaty had been signed, we had reason to expect that reference would have been made to that important subject in the Speech from the Throne, and the Government would have announced their decision to ask Parliament to ratify the treaty. But there is no reference to the subject in the Speech. Evidently the hon. gentlemen opposite have not formed an opinion. Why? Because there are conflicting interests in that regard, and firmness and courage are required to arrive at a conclusion in respect to it. But they are bound to come to a conclusion, they are bound to come to a decision and a decision at once. There are important interests waiting to know what is going to take place in reference to the treaty. The lumbermen of New Brunswick want to know under what tariff they will send their lumber to France. That is one interest affected. The wine producers of the west want to know whether they will have to meet the competition of French wines or not. The temperance people want to know whether French wines are to be admitted on more favourable terms; and there is a class of my fellow-countrymen who are in favour of more extended relations with France, if possible, and they are entitled to obtain the opinion of the Government on the subject. These are conflicting interests; and shall we be told that in the face of so many conflicting interests the Government are discharging their duty in not expressing to the House their opinions respecting them? We must have a decision. The prime duty of a Government is to form opinions and carry out resolutions arrived at on any question that arises in the country. This Dominion has already suffered too much from long delays in forming opinions and in dealing with important matters.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Oh.

Mr. LAURIER. The hon. gentleman is very guilty in that respect. He has dilly-dallied with many important subjects, and dilly-dallied with them so long that to-day strong passions have been aroused which would have been settled if the hon. gentleman had at once taken a firm stand. This is why I denounce the Government to-day. The opinion prevails that the Government is not composed of business men, because the first requisite of business men is to be able to form a decision and form it promptly. I arraign the Government before this country. I arraign them on that charge; I arraign them on their fiscal policy, on their many derelictions of duty, and on this new charge, that they dare not do their duty because it may involve them in many difficulties. I charge them on their own confession with being sadly deficient in the requisites of all Governments—courage, decision, and some capacity to discharge public business.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Mr. Speaker, I am gratified at the way in which the hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat has referred to the manner in which their duty was discharged by the hon. gentlemen who moved and seconded the address. I am sure it is a matter of great gratification to us all to see among us to-day as a new member, introduced only about twenty-four hours ago, a gentleman who participated in the deliberations of this Chamber twenty years gone by, and who has come among us again to share in the labours of this Parliament, and that he greets us with the patriotic and fervid expressions which we heard from him this afternoon. I am sure my hon. friend from Hochelaga (Mr. Lachapelle), who has been with us two sessions, I believe, surprised us by the manner in which he discharged his duty, by the grace with which he spoke, by the clearance and eloquence of the language which he used. All that the hon. leader of the Opposition said with regard to those hon. gentlemen expressed appropriately the view which is held on this side of the House, as it generously and gracefully expressed the views of his friends on the other side of the House. I need not say much more as to the manner in which those hon. gentlemen discharged their duties, because the hon. leader of the Opposition paid to them what he thought was a supreme compliment when he said their task was a difficult one and a somewhat delicate one because they had to make a good deal out of nothing, and the hon. gentleman continued his address long enough to convince every hon. member of the House that he was a master in that art himself. I agree, Sir, with all the hon. gentleman said with respect to the coming amongst us of the Earl of Aberdeen and his gracious Countess, and with all that he said with respect to those who left us when His Excellency came. It has been the good fortune in all times past in the history of Canada that when the Governors General have left us they have left us, the warmest friends of this country eager to do her service in every sphere of life and activity in which they move in the country to which they returned. And in this case, while we have the gratification of knowing that Lord Derby is among those friends of Canada who are eager, earnest and outspoken in her interests in the mother country, we have had come to us as his successor, and the successor of his consort, a nobleman and a noble woman, who come eager to do service to Canada, eager to enlist in every public enterprise and in every public charity by which the weal of this country can be promoted. We cannot, therefore, in justice to ourselves and in justice to our people, hesitate to accord them in this assembly allusions to the warm feeling which is inspired in Canadians who find coming to them a ruler full of affection and full of desire to promote their interests. Now, Mr. Speaker, there was another step which I am able to go, and most cordially, too, with the hon. the leader of the Opposition. I say so with pleasure, because the steps that we are able to take together in commenting upon this address are, I regret to say, very few indeed. But I did hear with pleasure the allusions which he made to the success of the representation of Canada at the World's Fair at Chicago, and I heard with gratification his remark that the triumphs achieved in Chicago were principally the triumphs of the Canadian farmers. No statement could be more true, and no statement could be more gratifying than that that class of our people showed their skill, showed their progress, and achieved a triumph for this country, to the disadvantage of the people of every other country with whom they were in competition. I am sure it must have been a matter of profound gratification to the hon. the leader of the Opposition himself—although that gratification was not expressed—that the class of Canadians who achieved that noble triumph for Canada was the class which he and his friends have been depicting as down-trodden and miserable tax-burdened people, who have no prosperity among them, and who are flying from the prosperity which is said to exist in this country. The hon. gentleman was willing—in view of the triumph which these men had achieved for their country and of the exhibition which they had made of the prosperity and progress of Canada—to admit graciously that this country was blessed in many respects, blessed in climate, blessed in resources, blessed in natural means of communication and facility of transportation, but cursed in many other respects. The hon. gentleman was, however, not willing to admit that the country was prosperous; we have heard that before; but we take bold issue with him on that question, as we have done in times past, and in order that the issue may be distinct, I assert on behalf of those who agree with me, and there are many of them in this House, that the prosperity with which Canada has been blessed, in comparison with other nations, affords reason for pride to every Canadian, who does not take a purely partisan view of the matter. I assert that the prosperity of Canada is not surpassed by any country with which she can be drawn into comparison. I do not need to follow the hon. gentleman's comparison of the condition of our people, with the same classes in the older countries. I do not need to allude to the condition of the Fellaheen, but I am willing to take the standard of comparison which the hon. gentleman himself set up, and to say, that as regards the standard which should prevail on this free American continent, the condition of Canada to-day is unequalled for firmness and stability. It is not, I am sure, the hon. gentleman's desire or will to misrepresent the condition of his country, which induces him to express that denial of the real condition of the country, which is apparent to almost everybody else. The hon. gentleman is without hope for his country. The only hope with which he can look towards the future of the Dominion, the only pride with which he can survey it, is in seeing all the resources this country possesses, which he believes could be made more prolific of prosperity, and the improvement of the condition of the labouring and farming classes, if there were a change in the country—for one change is all that he asks—a change of administrators. The hon. gentleman has no hope with regard to the condition of the country—and therefore he is unwilling to admit that there is any prosperity in it—except on the single ground that by some complication of affairs, a change of administrators may take place; and the hope, which he is willing to hold out to the farmer and the artisan, that while they are now poor, down-trodden and tax-ridden, each of them shall have a chicken in the pot on Sunday, if the hon. gentlemen opposite can but get into power. Now, Sir, the condition in which the hon. gentleman really supposes this country to be, could not be expressed by greater exaggeration than that which he expressed when he spoke of the farmers toiling and sweating in exhibiting the trophies of their industry, and the trophies of their progress at the exposition of the world's industries, while sitting in miserable dens at home, with robbers depriving them of everything they earned—the wages of their toil and sweat. The hon. gentleman and I have to part company here, although it is my duty to comment upon some other of his observations. He commenced by a rebuke to the Government as to the disagreeable season of the year at which Parliament has been convened. I agree with the hon. gentleman that the season is somewhat inconvenient and that it would meet the wishes of members on this side of the House, and especially members of the Administration, if the session could commence in the month of January every year. There were circumstances which retarded the opening of Parliament, and I must take exception to the language which the hon. gentleman used in discussing that subject. The hon. gentleman stated that it was part of the unwritten law of Parliament that we should begin our session not later than the month of January. I have a list here of what has occurred during the last twelve sessions of Parliament, including this one, as to the date of commencement, and I find that in six of them the commencement was later than this year. It is generally considered that the period of the session at which the business interests of the people begin to be most affected by our legislation, is the period at which the Budget is brought down to this House, and, generally speaking, when complaint has been made with regard to the lateness of a session, the complaint is based upon the uneasiness of the public as to possible tariff changes which have to be made, but, Sir, if circumstances remain as they are, the Minister of Finance will be in a position to lay before the House on Wednesday of next week the Budget for the coming year; and if he shall be able to do so, he will have commenced that portion of the public business earlier than it has been commenced for seven out of the twelve sessions to which I have referred.

After Recess.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Mr. Speaker, I will ask the House to bear with me for a moment or two more while I allude to the circumstances which appear to me to have justified the Government in delaying until this period of the year the opening of the present session. Let me remind the House that the statement was fully made in the course of the discussion of the Budget of last session, that before the opening of the present session there should be a careful revision of the entire tariff, and that that revision should not be made, or indeed should not be undertaken, until the Ministers who had the immediate charge of the subject had had an opportunity of conferring with the representatives of the various industries throughout the country—agricultural and industrial—industries, in fact, of every description. In accordance with that promise, the conferences took place to which the hon. leader of the Opposition has referred this afternoon. Those conferences occupied the principal portion of last year, and, indeed, a portion of the present year; and it was not until well after the opening of the present year that the Ministers were able to sit down to the examination, the discussion, and the revision of a tariff, consisting of from nine hundred to a thousand items, and preparing the revision for submission to this House. I am glad the hon. leader of the Opposition was good enough to read to the House the statement which I made on this subject in another place—I think at the Board of Trade banquet in Toronto in the year 1892. On that occasion I made the statement that it would be proper to delay the revision of the tariff until some indication had been given of the policy which would be pursued in another country; and while hon. gentlemen opposite may make merry with the phrase about looking to Washington, and all that, we adhere still to the business principle, as we regard it, that no sensible Government would undertake to revise its own tariff, seeing that a neighbouring country was engaged in the same operation, until it had some opportunity of observing the progress of events there, knowing that the revision of the tariff there in progress will affect all the business transactions and operations of this country for the next few years at least. It may be that before we enter upon the discussion of that subject in this House, the measure will not be completed in the other country; but, Sir, we shall have done the best we could; we shall have delayed as far as possible—not to look for an example to the other country, not to look there for guidance as to the tariff we ought to make for Canada, but for information on a matter of pure and solid business which this House will shortly have to undertake. Let me remind the House further of the statement we have made in previous sessions, and have also made in discussing this matter sometimes throughout this country, that it was our desire to meet the Government of the United States and the legislature of that country, as far as we consistently could—consistently with regard to our revenue, and consistently with regard to the principles on which our tariff is based, and the preservation of those principles. We were anxious to meet with good-will any propositions which the Government of the United States would be willing to make, or which Congress might be willing to make, in favour of the enhancement of the trade between the two countries. Would it not have been a violation of that idea—a violation of that principle, a violation of that offer of good-will, which was no more cordially stated by us than pressed upon us by the Opposition—if we had undertaken to convene the House and bring down a tariff regardless altogether of what the neighbouring country might do? Surely, Sir, if we were sincere, as I can assure the House we were, in offering, by any means within our power, and consistently with the interests which I have mentioned, to take measures to increase the trade between these two countries, the least we could do was to wait to see what progress was being made on the other side of the line, in the way of the lessening of duties, or otherwise, which might tend to increase that trade on their part, in order that we might reciprocate by similar legislation on our part. I think that no reproach could have been more fair and more unanswerable than that which would have come from the other side if we had asked the House to deal with this whole subject in ignorance of the views of Congress, and had prorogued the House to wait another year before a single step could have been made towards an enlargement of the trade between the two countries, if any such step is to be taken. I hope the hon. leader of the Opposition will not suspect me of disrespect for him, for the speech which he has delivered to the House to-day, if, in addition to taking strong issue with him as to the condition of the country at the present time, I shall venture to suggest to the House that that speech exhibited a marked tone of dissatisfaction, a note of profound discontent with the existing state of affairs, and an unwillingness to be pleased with any phase of public affairs. And more, Sir, it exhibited an unwillingness to be pleased with any phase of public affairs in this country. Why, the hon. gentleman made merry over the deliberations of the Ministers who went to a meeting in Montreal to receive a number of deputations there, and who went afterwards to the Maritime Provinces and there received deputations likewise. He made it a matter of complaint that these gentlemen should have excluded the press when these deputations were received, and afterwards, in attempting to define what was taking place in those secret councils, the hon. gentleman treated us to an extract from Shakespeare to show how absurd the whole transaction was. I do not so regard these conferences. It has been customary, ever since I knew anything of public affairs—and I am sure it was customary when hon. gentlemen opposite ruled—to receive deputations who desired to present their views, whether with regard to trade or anything else, without the proceedings being reported in the press. Such is generally the wish of gentlemen connected with business who come upon deputations relating to their affairs. It is not always, or by any means common, that the desire for reserve and to avoid publicity comes from any nefarious design upon their part, or any desire to screen themselves from public investigation and criticism because of anything they have to conceal. But it frequently does happen that gentlemen have matters to discuss in connection with their own business transactions, in connection with the profits of those business transactions, which may have been misrepresented, or with regard to the expenditure of capital involved in their enterprise, which it is not always convenient to have reported in the newspaper press. I think that even that deputation which went to the Finance Minister of the Mackenzie Government (Sir Richard Cartwright) to claim that something should be done to relieve the depression of trade, and in which they received the response that they might go to the father of all evil, was not reported in the press; but it strikes me that we are indebted to the hon. Minister himself (Sir Richard Cartwright) for the very interesting report of it which was made to this House and the country. The hon. gentleman seemed to me to evince an unreasonable desire to find fault when he charged the Ministers of Finance and Trade and Commerce with a great outrage in hearing business men in the absence of the press, and when he still more seriously complained that afterwards they went out and addressed a public meeting. He was profoundly dissatisfied with the secrecy of the interview, but still more dissatisfied that an open meeting should have been held under the broad canopy of Heaven. I am not surprised that my colleagues considered that it was impossible to satisfy the hon. gentleman, and consequently not worth their while to try. But I think he might have excused the reluctance of my colleague, the Minister of Finance, to do anything which might bring down upon him another inundation of set speeches on free trade and protection. My colleague had just come out from within the walls of this Parliament, where he had listened, I am sure, to everything that could be said on both sides by hon. gentlemen opposite. I am sure there was not an argument in connection with free trade that he had not heard fifty times over, expressed in every mood and tense and phase the English language will admit of, and after having escaped by the prerogative of prorogation, I am sure my hon. friend will be excused if he desired to escape for a further brief space speeches upon those subjects to which he had already listened so long and so often. But another point of view in which it seems to me my hon. friend, the leader of the Opposition, exhibited an unreasonable desire to criticize and an unwillingness to be satisfied was in the observations he made with regard to the Minister of Agriculture. He declared that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Angers) went to Manitoba and the North-west Territories, after leaving those conferences in the older provinces, and was guilty of making the statement to the farmers of the west that he believed that their burdens and grievances were principally due to circumstances over which the Government had no control, and with which the tariff had no connection, namely, the unusually low prices of their products, and the system of farming which had been carried on hitherto in Manitoba and the North-west Territories. If the hon. leader of the Opposition, instead of sneering at the Minister of Agriculture as being a lawyer, had stated that he told the farmers something which they had already found out by bitter experience, his criticism would have been better timed and better placed. What the Minister of Agriculture stated to the people of the west was simply a bold and courageous statement of what he believed to be the truth as regards the condition of the country and the people whom he was addressing. He would have been a quack if he had told them that those low prices and the evils connected with farming one kind of product alone had been the result of any disease in the body politic which the Government or Parliament could cure. But when he gave to them the advice that they must seek to protect themselves in the future against the depression by resorting to mixed farming, he was proclaiming a doctrine which no sensible agriculturist, east or west, will deny. But I thought that my hon. friend was unreasonably dissatisfied in this respect, that after all this comment upon the Minister of Agriculture and his advice to the farmers of the west, the hon. gentleman still seemed profoundly moved with dissatisfaction at the idea of a lawyer being Minister of Agriculture. Why, I thought that he and I, if we could have anything in common, would be one in profound respect for the training of the profession, which those who admire and love it say fits a man for everything. I should have thought he would at least have recalled the period in which he was a worthy and eminent member of a Cabinet in this country, and when he made a not discreditable Minister of Inland Revenue, although he was and still is a lawyer. I thought that the hon. gentleman should at least have remembered another circumstance, that the Cabinet in which he sat had two Ministers of Agriculture. That Cabinet had two fine opportunities. We have had, in our short career, but one, and I think we have made an admirable choice. But that Government had two opportunities, and it chose a lawyer on each occasion. Their first Minister of Agriculture was the Hon. Luc Letellier, and their second the Hon. Senator Pelletier, the one an avocat and the other a notary. My hon. friend went a step further, and exhibited again an unreasonable desire to be dissatisfied when he made comment on that portion of the Speech which refers to the expanding and increasing trade of Canada. He took up that portion which refers with satisfaction to the circumstance that a large proportion of the expansion is due to the increase in our trade with the mother country. The hon. gentleman found fault with that, for the very extraordinary reason that a larger proportion still was due to the increase of trade with the United States. I thought if the hon. gentleman would be satisfied with anything, he would be satisfied with that circumstance; but he seemed to find more fault with us than ever, because, while our trade with Great Britain had greatly increased, there had been a still greater increase in our trade with the United States. Why, Sir, the hon. gentleman, exhibiting the same spirit of dissatisfaction, the same degree of unwillingness to be satisfied, commented, a few minutes afterwards, upon the improbability of a large trade with Australia and indicated that we could increase our trade with the United States by simply throwing down the wall, while he had just expressed dissatisfaction at finding that so large a proportion of our increased trade was with the United States. The hon. gentleman made a statement with regard to the condition of business in the United States, with which I think very few hon. members will agree. The hon. gentleman accounted, amidst the cheers of his friends, for the extraordinary depression in the United States by declaring that it was due altogether to protection. I should like to know by what public man in the United States, on either side of politics, that statement is endorsed. On the one side we see, banded together in a determination to change the tariff laws of the country, a set of men who say that relief is due to the masses of the people from undue protection, and, scorning the idea of free trade, struggling hand in hand and shoulder to shoulder, month after month, for the enactment of a tariff two or three stories higher than any tariff Canada ever had. We see the halls of Congress filled to overflowing with deputations from every part of the great Union protesting against the reduction of the tariff, even to that extent, and we hear of delegates from the various industries and from the workmen of that country swarming in the lobbies and halls of the Capitol at Washington, outnumbering the members of Congress two to one, and we learn that the walls and pavements ring with the sounds of the wheels bringing in petitions against a measure of that kind. We know that the industries of that country are paralyzed, not because there had been protection there, but because there is an effort to reduce that protection. I must pass on to make a few observations—and they will be but few, because the subject-matter may come up again and I hope will be discussed by some of my colleagues, perhaps this evening—with regard to what the hon. gentleman said as to the award at Paris and its effect upon this country. The hon. member, unwittingly, I am sure, represented me as having come home in a state of jubilation and triumph and brag after the sittings of the tribunal at Paris. If the hon. gentleman understood that, Sir, from anything I said in public, I should like him to read it to this House. If he understood it from any interview I gave to any representative of the press, he profoundly misunderstood my meaning and my expression. When I came back to this country, I found the subject but little understood, with a feeling of alarm prevalent as to the severity of the regulations which had been adopted. I made the statement, in the only press interviews which I remember to have given, that I thought Canadians had reason to be satisfied with the result, but I made the statement at the same time that I had dissented from the regulations which had been adopted, because I thought them, in some respects, too severe, and, in some respects, inadequate for the purpose for which they were framed. Therefore, Sir, there was no deception on my part, there could be no reasonable misconception, no supposition on the part of the public that I was rejoicing or bragging over the result. But the view which I took of the affair, Sir, was this: That we had been brought before an international tribunal, not for the purpose of seeing what additional concession could be made to Canada, there was nothing for Canada to gain in the matter, but there was an opportunity for her to be completely shorn, at the instance of the United States, of rights which we believed she possessed, and which she had exercised for a number of years. It was satisfactory to me, above all things, that Canada had been proved to be right in the contentions which had been put forward on her behalf,—it was a matter of profound satisfaction to me, and I thought it would be to my fellow-countrymen, to learn that, while Canada had taken a position which induced the United States to seize her vessels, to imprison her seamen and send them in custody to remote shores, in escaping from which some of them met their death, these wrongs had been put a stop to, and that our rights denied in that way had been upheld by the tribunal to which an appeal for justice had been made. It was a matter of profound satisfaction to me, and I believed it would be to my countrymen, that, after we had brought this great Empire to the very verge of war, it had been proved that we were far within our rights, and that the blame of the quarrel was not upon us, but upon the other side. Now, my attitude and position with regard to the regulations was this: I believed that the regulations which I favoured in the conference of the arbitrators would have been more effectual for the preservation of seal life, and would have been somewhat less severe upon our own seal fishermen. I entertain that opinion still, but it was not for me to expect that my individual opinions upon this subject were to prevail over all others. And, Sir, I think first of all we should look to the fact that the questions referred to the tribunal, the principal questions to be decided there, were by no means the suitability of the regulations, but the questions of right. The hon. member has stated that if we look into the history of the subject we shall find that the real bone of contention was as to the right to restrict pelagic sealing. Mr. Speaker, that is precisely the contention of the United States, but it was precisely that contention which was overthrown in the proceedings of that tribunal; and why the hon. gentleman should present here the United States side of this question and not the Canadian side, I should be at a loss to understand if I had not seen parallels to it in previous debates in this House. Does not every member of the House who has considered the subject know that, without one word of assertion of any right to protect the seals, or any right of property in them, and without an hour's notice or warning, our vessels were seized, our fishermen sent to prisons and their vessels left stranded upon the coasts of Alaska, under a statute of the United States which forbade them to enter Behring Sea. That was the condition of affairs, Sir, and when Great Britain remonstrated upon our part, it was not set up that there should be a regulation about this subject, but the bald assertion was made that the United States had acquired these waters by treaty of cession from the Emperor of Russia, that Great Britain had recognized the right of Russia to exclude from these pursuits in the Behring Sea, and that the United States had an equal right to that which Russia had assumed and which Russia had exercised. And, Sir, developed from that was the contention that the United States had an absolute property in every one of these seals because they were born on the shores of her territory, and further that she had the right to protect them by force from capture, because they were connected with an industry which was carried on upon her territory. The hon. gentleman says that the doctrine of mare clausum was given up very early in the controversy. As called by that name it was; but down to the last hour of the arbitration, not only was the assertion made, but most vigorously was it contended for by the ablest counsel the United States could send to the bar of that tribunal, that while the doctrine of mare clausum might not apply to Behring Sea, the equivalent doctrine did prevail, namely, that the Czar of Russia had for many years, more than a century ago, asserted and exercised absolute dominion over that sea to prevent the killing of seals and other fur-bearing animals; that he had exercised that authority with the consent and acquiescence of Great Britain, and that when Russia transferred her rights to the United States, she transferred all the sovereignty which she had thus acquired. So that while, under the name of mare clausum, our fishermen were not excluded from that Sea, yet they dare not fire a gun or harpoon a seal or take any fur-bearing animal because these had been protected, as the property of the Emperor of the Russias, from time immemorial, and his authority had been transferred to the United States. These were the questions of right which were involved. Brushed aside, said the hon. member (Mr. Laurier), at once by the court. Why, Sir, they have not been brushed aside, but put down by the solemn and authoritative decision only of the majority of the tribunal; and that only after listening for upwards of three months to arguments presented by the ablest men that the bar of the two countries could produce, in support and in denial of the doctrine which the hon.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON.

gentleman says was at once brushed away. And when we came to the deliberations of the arbitrators on that subject, one of them stands on record to-day as having affirmed, down to the last moment, all these rights his country claims to have received from Russia and to have exercised since Russia ceded them to the United States. And with regard to the right of property and the right to protect the industry by preventing the killing of seals, even when swimming in the open waters of the Pacific Ocean—even as regards those contentions, the two arbitrators of the United States stand together in dissenting from the terms of the award, and have published most elaborate opinions to the contrary. And these are the contentions which the hon. gentleman supposes to have been at once brushed away by the tribunal and hardly left in the domain of argument. The hon. gentleman was—unintentionally, I believe—unfair in criticising the regulations themselves, although he was right in saying that I was dissatisfied with them. When the hon. gentleman states that the contentions of Canada—what he believes to have been and what he supposes I believed to have been the rights of Canada—were distinctly controverted and overruled by that tribunal, he is somewhat mistaken again. The hon. gentleman was right in stating, as was put in the British case, that no effective provisions could be made to preserve the seal race until there was a restriction as to the killing on land or on the islands owned by the United States. But had he looked carefully into the terms of the reference, he would have found that the power of the tribunal to make regulations was limited by the terms of the treaty, and that the regulations could only apply outside of the territorial jurisdiction of either country. I was under the impression that regulations might have been so made as to apply only in case proper regulations were made by the United States with regard to the islands themselves, but we were met with the view of the other arbitrators that that would have been a practical evasion of the principle which confined our jurisdiction only to waters outside of the territorial jurisdiction of either country, and likewise by the strong evidence that down to the present time no special abuse had been shown with regard to the regulations which had been made by the United States as applicable to those islands. If the hon. gentleman had been under the impression—as I am sure he was when he said it—that the present regulations were an absolute denial of all the pleadings made in the interests of Canada, how can he explain the fact that they were so profoundly unsatisfactory to the United States that neither of the American arbitrators would agree to them or sign the award, for their names are put to it merely as testifying that this is the award which the tribunal made. The hon. gentleman said, as to this, that they did not go home and brag, at any rate. Why did they not? If anything had been decided in their favour, they might well have done so. But I beg to assure the hon. gentleman again that he is mistaken in supposing that in anything I have said, there was any spirit of brag or boasting whatever. I professed satisfaction, for the reasons I have stated, and I have professed elsewhere great satisfaction at the upholding, in the most solemn way and before all the nations, of the doctrine for which we in this House have contended, for which we have contended in our correspondence with the Imperial Government, and for which no people in this country have so zealously contended as my hon. friend and those who sit beside him, namely, for the right of Canada to have a ruling voice in negotiations which affect her interests. I expressed a feeling of satisfaction that Her Majesty's Government had so fully recognized that right of Canada, of a great colony—and I suppose the same right would be conceded to any colony—that she had not only appointed one of the tribunal a Canadian Minister, but that she had given the conduct of the case to my colleague, the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, and had furnished him, out of her zeal and good-will for the cause of Canada, with the ablest counsel that the bar of the mother country could furnish, to stand side by side in the struggle for our rights with one of the ablest Canadian counsel who could be brought there to present our case. I expressed satisfaction at this circumstance; but so far from indulging in any spirit of boasting on the subject, I say now once for all that nothing was further from my own view, and it would have been exceedingly ill-placed that I should have had any boasting or bragging as far as my part in the transaction was concerned. The part which I had to perform was not to fulfil the duties of a counsel or an advocate there, but to do my duty as well as I could to both the contending parties, to see that the rights of my country in so far as they could be put before a tribunal of that kind by one of its members were upheld by myself. But the great protection which Canada had was not in the circumstance that I was a member of the tribunal. It was, in the first place, in the conduct of the case by those who had the conduct of it at our bar, first amongst whom was the Minister of Marine and Fisheries; and it was in the high sense of justice which pervaded that tribunal and every member of it, whether he came from the United States or any of the other countries which were represented at that tribunal; and I merely enumerated in the interview, which seems to have given the leader of the Opposition the impression of a boasting spirit, the causes of the satisfaction which I felt, and which I undertook to express at the earliest possible opportunity after my arrival in Canada. I still think the award, taken on the whole, both on the questions of right and on the question of regulations, ought, under the circumstances, to be satisfactory to the people of Canada—not satisfactory in the sense that they cannot be improved, not in the sense that they are all one would desire, but that, under the circumstances prevailing at the time, under the great desire which was evinced by the United States for the preservation of the race, under the circumstances that the question had a great deal of novelty about it, and a great deal of obscurity, under all these circumstances of difficulty we have reason to be satisfied that this country has come so little harmed out of the contest. But when my hon. friend stated to the House what he believed to be the harm that was done, I venture to say to him that he has been entirely misinformed on that subject or I have been grossly misinformed. The hon. gentleman is under the impression that the sealing industry of Canada is a thing of the past, that the fishing schooners have been dismantled and offered for sale at auction. I am under the impression that to-night a larger fleet of Canadian sealers from British Columbia, as large a fleet at all events, as was ever engaged in the seal fishery, are out on the ocean in pursuit of the seal, and I think he will find that he has been misled by the bald statement which appeared in the press, that under a feeling of irritation at the regulations which had been enacted, owners of the fleet sought to obtain compensation from the Imperial Government to the extent of the value of all their vessels and equipments, in consequence of their claim which they then made that the sealing industry would not be as profitable as it had been in the past. An allusion was made, Sir, to the mission to Australia in terms which seemed to me to show once more a desire to be dissatisfied on the part of my hon. friend. I do not think there is anything extravagant or unreasonable in our sending the Minister of Trade and Commerce to visit our fellow-colonists in Australia for the purpose of seeing what increase of trade could be secured between the two countries. The hon. gentleman says we could have a greater trade than that by throwing down the tariff wall. He goes on the old fallacy, which we have had put forward in this country for ten years, that all we have to do is to pass a statute and we will have reciprocity with the United States. By all means, if the regulation of the trade with a foreign country is in the hands of this Parliament, let us pass a statute and have reciprocity right away; let us have the bill introduced on Monday. But if it be that there are two tariff walls, and while we let down our own we are simply letting in the products of another country to compete with our own, letting in the labourers of another country to do the work our labourers are doing here, and the products of another country to destroy the market for the products of our own country, and the other tariff wall is higher than ours ever was, and is still to be maintained. I doubt the prudence just now of taking down that tariff wall, entirely, at all events. But my hon. friend after a moment of reflection will see. I am sure, that the proposition as to an increase of trade with Australia is not so unwise as it occurred to him at the moment when he spoke, because we find that four or five Governments interested away out on the Pacific have not treated Mr. Bowell's mission as a mere delusion and farce, but have not only received him with the cordial hand of fellowship, as warm and generous as one fellow-colonist could extend to another, but have declared in response to his invitation not only their desire to listen to our proposals, but their intention of coming to Canada to discuss them in the month of June. I venture to say that a proposition which is thus warmly received and is being acted on by four or five Governments in Australia and New Zealand is not one to be derided as unworthy of the ambition of a Government representing this country, for we can see not only that commercial interests may be developed and extended by the promotion of trade between those countries and Canada, but that we shall be doing honest yeoman service to the interests of the Empire if we draw together in closer bonds our fellow-colonists and ourselves. One word more. In conclusion the hon. gentleman gave what I thought was the 'crowning reason for confessing that he was unwilling to be satisfied on any conditions. We have been arraigned, we have been accustomed to being arraigned, by him for every offence of which public men can be guilty. May I say to him, with the greatest sincerity, that we are always glad to be arraigned by him. It is always so pleasing to listen to his accusations, and I might almost say it is so easy to answer them, that we are rather delighted than otherwise when we have new indictments prepared against us and the hon. gentleman rises to assail us. But, Sir, the offence with which he charges us to-night is a new one, and I almost hesitate to plead to it on the instant. The new charge is that because we have not announced our policy on the subject of a treaty with France within the first twenty-four hours of Parliament, we are unworthy of confidence as business men carrying on business transactions. Well, Sir, I will promise the hon. gentleman that we will submit a policy on that subject. I will promise that we will announce it, but we will not gratify him by announcing it to-night. We will bring down our policy on that subject when the measure in regard to it ought to be brought in or to be announced as not to be brought in, and the hon. gentleman may possibly be despoiled of the great delight which he sees in store from the struggle which he thinks we shall have with the various clashing interests which interfere with each other on that question. The hon.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON.

gentleman had a real source of satisfaction in enumerating the different interests which he thought were clashing heads together over this little French treaty. There were the prohibitionists, the wine-producing interests, the interests of the persons whom the hon. gentleman designated as desiring closer relations with France, and two or three interests besides. He will find that the clashing of interests on these subjects is not so material as he may think them. I see the hon. gentleman has not trusted to his note of dissatisfaction on this point to elicit a response as to what our policy is, but has put a question on the paper which will come up on Monday. He will find that the Government have had no unreasonable delay in arriving at a policy on this subject, and no hesitation to announce it at a proper time; but I do think that his doctrine is wrong and that he has gone very far to seek a grievance when he denounces us for any Bill that we may introduce or not introduce, not being put in the Speech from the Throne at the opening of the session of Parliament. If I thought I could convince the hon. gentleman how unreasonable he is to be dissatisfied with us, and to be dissatisfied with us so early in the session, I declare I could go on for half an hour or more, quoting proofs, which the hon. gentleman would admit to be exceedingly cogent and strong upon some of the points upon which I have addressed the House. With regard to the condition of the country, for example, I would quote to him the Speeches which Lieutenant-Governors have read from the Throne in the different provinces, and in which they have declared in plain terms what the condition of the country is, terms almost as strong as I have used to-night. In the Legislature of New Brunswick, in the Legislature of Nova Scotia even—and the hon. member referred in words of admiration to the gentleman who penned that address, on a ground which elicited warm cheers and approbation from his friends, on the ground that the premier of that province had just emerged from an electoral contest in which his majority has been cut in two.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Reduced by two is what you mean.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Not at all. That is another of the hon. gentleman's arithmetical mistakes. I do not detract at all from the accuracy of Mr. Fielding or from his credit. The hon. gentleman has stated that the Maritime Provinces was a nest of able men. It is not customary in our little nest for us to deny each other's ability, and therefore, so far from detracting from the capability of Mr. Fielding to express an opinion on the subject, I commend the hon. gentlemen opposite to the speech which Mr. Fielding put in the mouth of his Lieutenant-Governor at the opening of the last session of the Legislature of Nova Scotia. I regret, Sir, to have detained the House so long, but on this, the first opportunity that I have had of addressing the House since I left before the close of last session. I feel it both a duty and a pleasure to express my acknowledgments and gratitude to the members of the House on both sides for their kindness in facilitating the transaction of public business at last session in such a manner as to enable me to proceed to the high duties upon which I was subsequently engaged. I recognize the fact that it might have been made almost impossible for me to have gone to the discharge of those duties, if the hon. leader of the Opposition and his friends behind him and around me, including friends on this side of the House, who were deeply interested in some public questions, had not given me those facilities. I venture to say that they showed a high sense of patriotism and public duty in affording me that opportunity, and they have conferred an obligation upon me as a public man that I feel bound to recognize this evening.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I must frankly admit that it is not often we are called upon to complain of the levity with which the hon. gentleman treats important subjects. I would rather be disposed, in a general way, to describe the hon. gentleman's style as ponderous, than the reverse, but still, when I hear the hon. gentleman speaking of the great work of the High Commissioner, Sir Charles Tupper, as the little French Treaty, the petite French Treaty, Sir, I am in the judgment of the House if I say that the hon. gentleman has not on this occasion manifested a levity much at variance, I suspect he will find, with the great gravity that underlies that subject. The right hon. gentleman, with respect to the rather important question of the time at which Parliament was summoned together, has given us, no doubt, several precedents. The hon. gentleman is great on precedents. He has established several very curious precedents in the administration of justice in this country, to which I shall allude before I sit down, but I may tell the hon. gentleman now that he has read these particular precedents decidedly amiss. He will find cases enough, I dare say, within the last dozen years, where similar errors have been committed by his predecessors and himself; but, Sir, he will find no occasion in the seven-and-twenty years which have elapsed since Confederation, in which eleven months and a half have been allowed to lapse between the termination of one session and the calling of another. The hon. gentleman has sailed very closely indeed to the law in not summoning Parliament together until the 15th of March, when Parliament was prorogued, as we all know, on the first day of April, 1893. This is the law on the subject, with which the hon. gentleman is well acquainted:

There shall be a session of the Parliament of Canada once at least in every year, so that twelve months shall not intervene between the last sitting of the Parliament in one session and the first sitting in the next session.

He has barely kept to windward of the law.

Mr. FOSTER. We got to port all right.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. You just barely kept to windward of the law. The right hon. gentleman was good enough to announce on the part of his colleague, the Finance Minister, that he hoped to deliver the Budget speech by Wednesday next, a hope I am afraid which he will find to be entirely fallacious. If the hon. gentleman did wish to facilitate the progress of public business, I could understand very well his having summoned Parliament together at a convenient time. I could understand very well his having taken the House into his confidence, having stated to them what is an undoubted truth, that the interests of Canada and the United States are so very closely intertwined together that it was important for us to know their policy. There is some reason in this proposition, which is, however, wholly and utterly inconsistent with his previous professions. There is some reason in his declaration, that it is a matter of great importance for us to know what our friends on the other side of the border intend to do. That much I admit. That, Sir, might have been a good reason perhaps for delaying the presentation of the Budget, but it was no reason at all for not calling Parliament together at a proper time and pushing the public work ahead. Will the hon. Minister of Finance allow me to make him one suggestion? I fear, with all the desire in the world on my part, and on the part of my friends beside me, to help him forward—and we do not desire to spend a day here more than the public duties imposed upon us require—I fear that it will be utterly and entirely impossible for him to introduce his Budget on Wednesday next. I would suggest that instead of Wednesday next, he should name this day fortnight, and thereby he will select, perhaps, the most appropriate day in the whole calendar for the introduction into this House of a series of tariff resolutions which, while adhering to the principles of protection, will yet restore prosperity to the farmers of Canada, seeing that if the hon. gentleman defers it until the day I have indicated, the 1st of April, will witness the introduction of the new Budget to Canada. The hon. gentleman was good enough to reprove my hon. friend beside me (Mr. Laurier) for, as he said, sneering at his Minister of Agriculture, and he went on to declare that the Minister of Agriculture would have been a quack, if he had done what? If he had declared that it was within the power of the Government to raise the prices of grain or to give prosperity to the farmer. Sir, I remember a score—nay, a score of scores—of similar quacks who made their way from one end of this Dominion to the other in 1878, who obtained power by pretensions, which the hon. gentleman has rightly designated as pretensions, which none but quacks and charlatans would ever dare to make. Sir, on the 1st of April or thereabouts we shall probably have to hear from the mouth of the present Minister of Finance what arrant charlatans and imposters all his predecessors were in making the promises they did to the people of Canada, how utterly and gross a failure in every imaginable point and part has been this same National Policy, and how totally they have failed to redeem every pledge and promise they made. Sir, the hon. gentleman is not particularly fortunate in his allusion to the remarks made by my hon. friend on the increase of English commerce with Canada. Does the House want to know what all this flourish of trumpets is about? Well, Sir, according to the Trade and Navigation returns, which I hold in my hand, our total trade with England amounted in the year 1892 to $106,254,000, and in the year just closed to $107,238,000. The increase, therefore, on the total trade was rather less than one per cent. Turning to our exports, I find that we exported to England in 1892 $64,906,000, and in the year just past $64,080,000; in other words, our exports to England were nearly one million less last year than they were the year before. I do not think, Sir, that that is a very great increase, and I cannot think that it is worth a paragraph in the Queen's speech. However, Sir, the hon. gentleman is now convinced that my hon. friend was not quite in such error as he supposed, when he intimated that while our trade with England had increased hardly a million during the past year, our trade with the United States had increased ten millions. My hon. friend had good reason for calling the hon. gentleman's attention to the vast and enormous importance of endeavouring to develop a trade such as that with the United States, which forms very nearly the equivalent to our total trade with the whole of the rest of the world, and which is capable of being increased by a matter of ten millions in the course of one single year. Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman has alluded to one matter of very great importance to the people of this country—a matter which I propose to discuss at some length, because I have the misfortune of differing from him very widely indeed as to the position in which, under his guidance or under the guidance of his ministry, the people of Canada have been placed with respect to this same Behring Sea award. On one point I can and do congratulate the hon. gentleman, and that is that he has most wisely abstained from any glorification as to the position in which we find ourselves placed by the decision that was come to by the arbitrators who sat at Paris. Now, Sir, I have read that award from end to end many times. I have done more: I have read, I will not say all the speeches, but I have read a very considerable number of the speeches that were delivered by the eminent counsel to whom he alluded on that occasion, and, although I speak of course as a layman, and without regard to the particular legal points involved, I do pretend to understand as well as the hon. gentleman does where that award has left Canada, and what that award has done for our trade and commerce. Sir, I am bound to say that the effect produced on my mind by the perusal of that award—and that effect has been increased and deepened every time I have read it over—has been a feeling of the most profound dissatisfaction. I, for my part, Sir, take upon myself the responsibility of saying that not one of the three principal parties to that award have come out of the business with credit or with honour. In the first place, I say that every line of the award shows clearly, distinctly and conclusively, that the conduct of the United States Government in seizing our ships and imprisoning our sailors when found on the high seas at distances of sixty, seventy or a hundred miles from the nearest point of land, was to the last degree arbitrary and high-handed, was utterly unwarranted by any principle of international or maritime law, was without one shadow of justification, and was utterly and entirely at variance with all the pretensions previously advanced by the United States, whether as regards Behring Sea itself or whether as regards their claims on our fisheries on the Atlantic. But, Mr. Speaker, while I, for my part, will uphold the contention of my hon. friend, partially enforced by the hon. Minister of Justice, as to the conduct of the United States on that matter, I deeply regret to say, speaking here as a British subject, that I feel that the conduct of the British Government in the matter is open to almost equal censure. Mr. Speaker, what were the circumstances of the case? I am willing to admit that in the first instance, in the year 1886, there was a considerable excuse or reason—on grounds to which I shall more fully allude later on—for the apathy and indifference manifested by the British Government. The place was distant; the facts required to be verified; moreover, Sir, it is well known—and this has to be carefully considered and borne in mind by the House in studying this whole question—at that particular time the foolish conduct of the Canadian Government in the Atlantic seas had placed the British Government in a position of extreme difficulty, and Canada at large in a position of extreme danger in its relations with the United States. But, Sir, while I admit that for the first year, and perhaps for the second year even, there were excuses to be made for the conduct of the British Government, I am not disposed to admit, looking the whole matter through, that the British Government did their duty to their Canadian subjects in this matter of the Behring Sea difficulties. Sir, this is the year of grace 1894. Eight mortal years have elapsed since British ships—or Canadian ships sailing under the British flag, for there is a material difference—and Canadian subjects sailing under the British flag were arbitrarily and violently seized while pursuing their legal calling on the high seas, and, Sir, to this day, not one particle of compensation has, through any remonstrance from the British Government, been granted to our people to indemnify them for the wrongs they have sustained. This is not the first time this kind of apathy has been displayed by the British Government. I am old enough to recollect when Canadians were shot down in their own land by marauders from the United States, when Canada was put to considerable expense, and when Canadian interests were seriously injured, and I am old enough to remember how those interests were put entirely aside as too insignificant for mention when Great Britain and the United States came together to adjust their differences over the Alabama claims. Sir, the present is a parallel case, and while it is well to practice patience and forbearance and to avoid as far as we honourably can aught which may prove a cause of war between two great and kindred nations, yet there are worse things than war, and there is a point where forbearance becomes cowardice. But while I neither acquit, for my part, the American Government of overbearing action towards us, nor the British Government of undue apathy and indifference in protecting the rights of Canada and of Canadian subjects, I am bound to say that if there be one thing which could excuse or justify the indifference of Great Britain, it was the perversity and wrong-headedness which marked the conduct of the present Government and their predecessors in all their dealings with the United States for the past eight years. That, Sir, is the sole and only justification which can be urged in defence of the British Government, and I deeply regret to say that they can make out far too strong a case against us in that matter to be pleasant. Now, what are the facts, even on the showing of the hon. gentleman? He and the members of his Government go before the Behring Sea Tribunal with a case which was absolutely unanswerable. What has been the result of their conduct of that case? To my mind, looking to that award, remembering their own contentions, bearing in mind the evidence that has been laid before us on this subject at various times, it appears to me beyond doubt that my hon. friend was strictly and literally correct when he stated that with an absolutely unanswerable case we had succeeded in losing everything for which we had contended. We have gained the verdict, yes, but we have lost the property and pay our own costs. Now, I have to tell the hon. gentleman that this may be a moral victory, but it is an exceedingly barren one. I have to tell the hon. gentleman more, that while I am not here in the slightest degree to defend the policy or the conduct of the United States Government towards the British Columbia sealers, in a great number of respects, what occurred at Paris was but the fitting and natural climax of the policy of the hon. gentleman and his predecessors towards the United States during the last seven or eight years. Sir, the policy of those hon. gentlemen may be defined in these words: it was first to bluster and snarl, and then to cringe. We have, with respect to this award, three witnesses of very unequal value—we have the Minister of Justice, we have the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, and we have the award itself. As the Minister of Justice is in an arithmetical mood to-night, I may say that if I were to designate the value of these witnesses by algebraical symbols, I would be disposed to describe the value of the evidence of the Minister of Justice by the sign of zero, of my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries by minus zero, but the award remains as a plus and positive quantity. Now, Sir, I desire to call the attention of this House for a few moments to what this award which I hold in my hand, declares. First of all, let me say to the Minister of Justice that when he gave the House to understand that the United States arbitrators declined to agree to this same award, I think he went too far. I find that five separate points were passed upon; I find that as to four of these points Mr. Justice Harlan, the United States Commissioner, concurred with the other commissioners; I find that on the fifth point alone Mr. Justice Harlan dissented. It is true that Mr. Senator Morgan, who has special political exigencies as well as the hon. gentleman, did not affix his signature to the award, but the Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, if this copy of the award which I hold be a correct one, did assent to four out of these five propositions. Now, what does that award declare? That award—and if I am in error, the hon. gentleman and his friends will correct me—that award, as I read it, and I think I can understand English quite as well as the hon. gentleman, declares, first of all, that Canadians were within their legal rights from start to finish, a position the hon. gentleman will not dare to controvert. It declares that the United States had no ground to stand upon, moral or legal, a position also he will not dare to controvert. It shows clearly and distinctly, in the facts detailed in the appendix to this award, that Canadian ships, as he said himself, were illegally seized, that Canadian subjects were illegally imprisoned, and that the trade of Canada, so far as regards one important portion thereof, was arbitrarily interfered with and stopped for no less a period than eight years. Now, what result should follow from these facts laid down by these arbitrators? Sir, I say that in all reason and conscience two results should follow most assuredly: first of all, that the United States should be ordered to make compensation for the wrong done, and next, that Canadians should be free thenceforward to follow their legal occupation. What was the result?

Why, Sir, the result was this most lame and impotent conclusion, that whereas Canada had been within her legal rights all through, that whereas the United States had been wholly without warrant for anything they did, nevertheless that from the date of that award Canadians are forbidden to hunt in Behring Sea except for a few short weeks, during the rest of the time the sea being shut up by ice; that a tract of sixty miles on either side of the Pribyloff Islands is reserved as a special reserve for the United States; and as I am informed that the Pribyloff Islands cover an area of some sixty miles by twenty or thirty, it follows that a tract of 30,000 square miles is set apart out of the Behring Sea as an exclusive reserve for the United States, within which no Canadian sealer dare to enter at any time. More than that, not merely is this reserve established in Behring Sea, but we are forbidden to hunt in the Pacific, except under restrictions which, I am informed, as well as my hon. friend will so enormously reduce the value of the sealing privileges that to all intents and purposes, as he truly said, sealing in Behring Sea by British Columbia fishermen is practically a thing of the past. It may be true, as the hon. gentleman said, that sealers are fitting out from Vancouver or from some port in British Columbia, but I apprehend, if the truth were known, it will be found that they go, not to fish in Behring Sea waters, but to fish in Japanese waters, or in some other region where the United States cannot invent a pretext for interfering with them? Now, what is the result of all this? It may be summed up in two words: Canada gets the shells and the United States gets the oyster. I do not pretend to say that correspondents of newspapers are always accurate in their report of what happens, especially at the conference in Paris, but I do recollect seeing certain statements which led me to the suspicion that during a great part of the time the conference was in progress the Minister of Justice slept, while the United States Commissioners were very wide awake. Now, as I have said, I have examined this award with care. The award is of some length. I am aware that people at large do not care to wade through several pages of legal phraseology, and therefore, for the benefit of the public, I have boiled down the award into a few lines of plain English, so that he who runs may read. Sir, condensed and translated into plain English, the award as I read it, ought rather to have been delivered as follows:—"Gentlemen of the United States: You are utterly in the wrong and you know it; you have not a shadow of a claim, morally or legally, to interfere with these Canadians. But you represent a very great power, which must be humoured. So, while we must for very shame's sake, decide against you on the legal merits of the question, we will annex such regulations as will give you everything you desire and we will not hurt your feelings by even hinting at compensation for your very high handed proceedings." Then turning to the unhappy representatives of Canada the officer delivering the award should have proceeded as follows:—"Now, as to you Canadians; you have all the right on your side no doubt, but you are only a dependency whose good-will or ill-will is of no sort of importance to us, and, what is more, your suzerain state has very solid reasons of her own for wishing to keep on good terms with the United States, so you will please understand that you are to have a moral victory and the United States a material one. Go home and meditate on the great truth underlying Mr. Lowell's celebrated dictum as to the position of the United States in a similar case:

We air a bigger nation, and so our rights air bigger.

"You know you have been told if a man goes to law with you for your cloak let him have your coat also—so, as the United States have claimed the Behring Sea, let them have the Pacific Ocean, too—and pay your own costs." Well, Sir, I defy any man, any plain, straightforward, honest man, to say whether my version of the award is not the true and literal one and the one that ought to have replaced the somewhat lengthy document now in my hand. Mr. Speaker, there are very important issues indeed underlying this whole question. I admit, Sir, that there is one thing gained and one thing only, by the course hon. gentlemen have taken. I admit it, Sir, and I am not disposed to undervalue it, that it is a very important gain to Canada to have subjects of dispute and difficulty between her and the United States removed from the arena of contention. But, Sir, I can tell the hon. gentleman, because I too have had some experience in the conduct of negotiations with the United States, that he and his Government committed, in my opinion, a very gross error of judgment indeed in consenting to become parties to the arbitration without securing these two conditions—first of all, Sir, that our rights on the Atlantic coast should have been considered by these arbitrators simultaneously with our rights on the Pacific Coast, and, next, that the broad outlines of the principles upon which compensation should be awarded to our people for the wrongs they had suffered should be passed upon by the arbitrators, and I tell him that had he fully appreciated the importance of the position, it would have been infinitely better for Canada not to have been represented at all on that occasion or to have conceded what the United States originally asked. Mr. Speaker, I do not arraign the hon. gentleman of purposely or dishonestly betraying the interests of this country, but I do arraign the hon. gentleman and his friends of utter lack of statesmanship in the whole conduct of this matter. There were three courses, Sir, open to the Government of Canada, any one of which might have been adopted with great profit and advantage to this people. They might, in the first instance, have used their position, which was one of indisputable and undoubted strength, so as to have conciliated the people of the United States. They might, had they understood their business, have so used their position as to have placed the Government and people of Great Britain under a very important obligation to them, or they might, in the third place have contrived to obtain substantial compensation. Any one of these three things could have been secured by hon. gentlemen, and they might, if they had been particularly dexterous, have secured them all. What have they obtained? Sir, they have failed in all. We cannot expect, after what has passed, that the United States will entertain any gratitude, or give us thanks for concessions which we have not made, but which have been wrung from us. So far as Great Britain is concerned, we know only too well what we shall be told if we presume to found a claim upon what has passed—we shall be told: You consented to become parties to this arbitration, you were allowed to name your arbitrator and to appoint your own counsel, and, if things did not go to suit you, you have only yourselves to blame. As for substantial compensation, it is only too clear that substantial compensation for the nation at large is entirely beyond our reach. It may be, as hon. gentlemen have told us, that at some distant day—I suppose eight years from this date or about sixteen years from the commission of these outrages—at some very remote date—a few individual Canadians may possibly obtain some compensation from the United States. But, so far as the nation at large goes, we have given away our birthright and we have got absolutely nothing in return. Sir, the case is clear. The United States wished to appropriate a large slice of Behring Sea, they wished to obtain various other easements. Good. Let them give a fair equivalent, let the Government secure a fair equivalent either on the Atlantic or on the Pacific, I do not care which, and I, for one, would be far indeed from holding them to too severe account. But, otherwise, the bargain ought to be void for want of consideration. Now, Sir, the truth of the matter is this—our rights in Behring Sea have been, to all intents and purposes given away by reason of the mismanagement and folly which was displayed by hon. gentlemen opposite in their dealings, on the other side of the continent, with the people of the United States. Now Sir, I do not make that assertion, which is a grave one, without warrant. When did these difficulties commence, Sir? For years and years our sealers had prosecuted that industry without disturbance. Not until August, in the year 1886, had the United States attempted to interfere with the just rights of our sealers. It is within the recollection of this House that in August, 1886, these gentlemen opposite, in opposition to our warnings, were carrying on a vexatious kind of persecution against the fishermen of the United States, and that they had brought things to such a pass with the United States that, early in the year 1887, Mr. Joseph Chamberlain was commissioned to come to this continent with full power to do as he pleased in the matter, to reconstruct the Canadian Cabinet, and that he used his power to bring their pretensions to a very summary close. The true history of these transactions, Sir, should read as follows:—1886—Canadian sealers are illegally seized, contrary to all precedent, by the United States cruisers. British Government decline to interfere by reason of the persecutions and vexations by which the Canadian Government were at the self-same time subjecting the American fishermen on the Atlantic coast and by reason of the extreme irritation which their proceedings had produced in the minds of the people of the United States. 1887 witnessed the same state of things with this material difference, that Mr. Joseph Chamberlain had come over to tell the people of the United States that the interests of Great Britain and the United States were far too closely intertwined, and far too important to be imperilled for a few codfish. In 1888 there was a Presidential election, and, I suppose, international courtesy required that the British Government should not recklessly interfere with the time-honoured national pastime of twisting the British Lion's tail at such periods. In 1889 there was a new Government, as you will remember, installed in the United States, and it was necessary for them, before considering the question, to acquaint themselves with the details of these outrages in Behring Sea. But in 1890—and now I come to a time which the hon. gentleman and the Minister of Finance and the former Minister of Customs could tell something about—in 1890, although the outrages continued, it was not very convenient for the Canadian Government to press the matter home, because at that particular moment they were telling the electors of Canada that they were on the most friendly possible terms with the United States, and on the very verge of negotiating a most advantageous reciprocity treaty with them. I need not remark that 1891 was chiefly taken up on the part of the Canadian Government in apologizing for the fibs which political exigency had compelled them to tell upon that occasion. But in 1892, apparently, the high contracting parties had put their heads together and made preparations for practically selling these troublesome Canadians. In 1893 the bargain and sale was completed, Canada was sold but not paid for. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman, as well as my hon. friend beside me, had something to say as to the extreme importance of allowing these matters to be referred to arbitration. I am with both of them there, that it was a great gain to humanity that disputes between two such nations as England and the United States should not be allowed, under any circumstances, if it could possibly be avoided with honour, to come to a bloody arbitrament; but I may be excused as a Canadian in thinking that if this was so very much for the general good of humanity, it is a little hard that the expense should be borne by us solely. Nevertheless, I am not going to deny that the conduct of the British Government on this last occasion was in some important respects a material improvement on their conduct in 1887; I am not going to deny that it is more gratifying to our national self-love, that it is, on the whole, a more decorous way of doing business that we should be allowed to appoint an arbitrator and counsel than that Mr. Joseph Chamberlain or any other British potentate should be sent over here to knock the heads of Canadian Ministers together and tell them that Canada should not be allowed to embroil England and the United States for the sake of a few cod-fish. My hon. friend, before recess, alluded wittily to a certain famous scene from a certain famous French comedy, where a certain courteous cook invited his poultry to come together to consider with what sauce they would prefer to be eaten. Sir, I am going to push the parallel a little further. We were treated, I admit on this occasion a little more courteously than this most courteous cook treated his poultry, because we were allowed to send over two of the poultry themselves to assist in the composition of the sauce wherewith they were to be cooked. Now, Sir, if we have lost everything else it is a source of unfeigned pleasure to see that these two animals have been returned to us at any rate safe and sound. The elder bird, I am bound to say, looks even sleeker and snugger and more sanctimonious than of yore; while as for his pretty companion, he has come back to us with a ribbon tied around his neck to inform us of what we know pretty well without any special information from him, how thoroughly and completely the anser canadensis was first plucked and then cooked by the arbitrators, and what an excellent vehicle arbitration sauce was for assisting in its consumption. Now, Sir, let me tell the hon. gentleman that there is a right and a wrong in this matter, there is a true policy and a foolish policy for Canada to pursue. Sir, the hon. gentlemen have got to learn, and Canada has got to learn, that to bluster and to brag is not the way to ensure a triumph over a nation like the United States. Now, I have been a member of an Administration which in its time had occasion to conduct an arbitration with the United States, and the hon. gentleman would have done well to take example by the manner in which the Mackenzie Administration conducted their arbitration with the people of the United States. Has the hon. gentleman forgotten that there was such a thing as a Halifax Award? Has he forgotten the genuine success which attended the efforts of the Canadian negotiators on that occasion? I am not disposed to deny that we had great advantages. As I understand it, our case on that occasion was not so strong and not so unanswerable as the case which these hon. gentlemen had in the matter of the Behring Sea award. But, sir, we had great advantages, and perhaps it was not the least of these advantages that upon that occasion Canada had engaged the services of my hon. friend beside me (Mr. Davies, P.E.I.); and I remember, unless I am gravely mistaken, that the United States, on that occasion, had engaged the services of the hon. the Minister of Justice. Now, the fact of the matter was that on the occasion of the Halifax award, Canada was represented by two trained and capable statesmen, by Sir Alexander Galt and Sir Albert Smith; Canada on the last occasion was represented by—well, comparisons are odious, Mr. Speaker, and besides that, I do really not wish to say anything harsh. Moreover, I am convinced that the hon. gentlemen probably did their best, and, after all, the fault did not lay with them, but with the persons who placed them in a position for which they were not especially fitted by training and capacity. However, in deference to the prejudices of the Minister of Justice, I will apply the test to which he will not object, the arithmetical test, and the result is that in the case of the Halifax award the people of Canada came out five million dollars to the good; while in the case of this award at Paris the people of Canada will pay their own costs. Now, there is a lesson to be learned from this, and I commend it to the serious consideration, not merely of the hon. gentlemen, but of every Canadian from one end of this Dominion to the other. The lesson I deduce is this, the utter uselessness—and I say it with emphasis, I say it with knowledge—the utter uselessness on the part of the people of Canada of relying on English intervention in any shape or form. When Canada, as in the case of the Halifax award, was allowed to settle her dispute with the United States in her own way without the interference of Englishmen, Canada for the only time in the history of English negotiations with the United States, came out a substantial gainer. Sir, what we require to-day is to have the right to settle our disputes with the United States after our own fashion. We require to have our own accredited agent at Washington responsible to us alone, and reporting to us; and had we had that advantage, I tell the hon. gentleman we could not possibly have fared worse than we did in this case, and with any kind of discretion we would have come out vastly the gainer. Now, I think the hon. gentleman would do well to consider the propriety of improving this occasion in order to carry out the suggestion I was making. It is time to have a little plain speaking with Great Britain on our part. Sir, if, in any given case, the Government of Great Britain will come to us frankly and honestly and say to us: Imperial interests require a surrender on your part, we know that we cannot adequately protect you, and therefore in your interests and in ours we require a certain surrender—I am not going to be unreasonable, if the British Government choose to make such a statement, let us accept the situation, but let us demand that the corollary be accepted also, and the corollary that I deduce from this same transaction is that while maintaining our connection with Great Britain we should have the right to demand and ought to demand a free hand to settle our difficulties with the United States, and with any other people on this continent, at least, in our own fashion and according to our own way. Sir, I know, and no man knows better, the very great value of the friendship of the United States to England. For five and twenty years I have privately and publicly from my place in Parliament and in the Cabinets of English ministers urged this view, and have never ceased to point out through good report and evil report, that no consideration under Heaven is so valuable to the people of England as to retain the friendship and good-will of the people of the United States, and as a private man and as a minister I have done my best, and I will continue to do my best to the day of my death, to bring about that most desirable end. But while I will go as far as any man to obtain the friendship of the United States for Canada and the mother country, I desire it to be done by fair and honourable means, and I tell hon. gentlemen opposite that this is not the way to win it. I repeat again that to conciliate does not mean to crouch, and that the worst possible way of seeking the friendship of the United States is to bluster and then to cringe. I know, because I have had dealings with the American people, and my hon. friends around me have also had in their time dealings with the people of the United States. I know that the Government of the United States respects fair and courteous opponents, and as a matter of fact the Administration of Mr. Mackenzie, which had made it a part of their policy by all fair and honourable means to conciliate the United States, but which at the same time never gave up one jot of the rights of Canada without receiving adequate compensation, never stood higher in the estimation of the United States Government than after showing at Halifax that while they were willing to maintain the most friendly relations with the United States, they were also determined to maintain to the uttermost the rights of Canada. I am sorry to have to say it, but the policy of the Canadian Government with respect to the United States, for the last seven years at least—I hope a better time is coming, and I take some courage after the remarks made by the hon. gentleman in hoping a better time is coming—but for the past seven years at least their policy was one long mistake. I say they were rash and intemperate in their language, and in the language permitted by them to be used by their subsidized press, and in the expressions used to and of the Government of the United States. They were obstinate when they should have been yielding; they were weak and ill-advised in action, and what is more, and what I regret much is, that they have thrown away many golden opportunities which, had they known how to use them, might have established us in a satisfactory position in regard to the United States. More than that. They knew perfectly, and the Minister of Justice must have known, that in former times they incurred a frightful risk by their folly in dealing with the United States, and if they escaped a collision it was most assuredly rather by accident than by their own foresight. In proof of what I have said I will read an authority, which the Minister of Marine at all events will not dispute. I called attention some little time ago to the extraordinary danger in which the folly of the present Government had placed Canada from having complicated matters in connection with the Behring Sea difficulty, by reason of pursuing a mischievous policy on the other side of the continent. Here is what in this House in my presence six years ago, the present High Commissioner, Sir Charles Tupper, told the House with respect to the position the policy of the hon. gentleman opposite had placed us in the year of grace 1887. Sir Charles said:

I would like to draw the attention of the House to what has been accomplished by this treaty. I have told you what position Canada stood in with regard to the United States of America before the initiation of these proceedings. I have told you that we stood face to face with an enactment which had been put on the Statute book by a unanimous vote of Congress, ratified by the President, providing for non-intercourse between the United States and Canada. I need not tell you that that bill meant commercial war, that it meant not only the ordinary suspension of friendly feeling and intercourse between two countries, but that it involved more than that. If that bill had been brought into operation by the proclamation of the United States, I have no hesitation in saying that we stood in the relation to that great country of commercial war, and the line is very narrow which separates a commercial war between two countries from an actual war. Yesterday we stood face to face with a non-intercourse bill sustained by the united action of the Senate and House of Representatives, sustained by almost the whole press, Republican and Democratic, of the United States, sustained with few exceptions by a prejudiced, irritated, exasperated people of 60,000,000 lying on our borders.

Having said what I have said as to the British Government, I felt it right to put on record what Sir Charles Tupper had to say of the results of the policy of his colleagues towards the United States almost at the same time that these outrages of which I have spoken were being perpetrated on our sealers and ships in Behring Sea. Sir, I repeat we have had one gain, and one gain only. It is true we have removed the cause of friction, and doubtless the process was very easy. We removed the cause of friction, and doubtless the process was very easy. We removed the cause of friction as we might remove all causes of friction, by giving up everything demanded of us, and there so far and no further, no doubt the hon. gentleman has scored a success. Now, Mr. Speaker, having spoken like my hon. friend of what the Speech does contain, I have a word to say in regard to what the Speech does not contain. The Speech does contain an allusion, not in very glowing terms, but still in terms sufficiently glowing, to the great diplomatic victory obtained abroad, but by a singular omission, for which it is difficult to account, the Speech contains no allusion to a much greater diplomatic victory which the Government obtained at home. Sir, there can be no doubt whatever that a few weeks ago the Government of Canada were in a very awkward position, to use a vulgar phrase, they were in a remarkably tight place. There can be no doubt whatever that the Government of Canada by the exercise of diplomatic skill successfully avoided a very great danger. There can be no doubt whatever that it required no trifling exercise of finesse to enable the Minister of Justice to get those injured innocents, Messrs. McGreevy and Connolly out of jail in good time before Parliament met. Had they been in durance vile when the House assembled, I shudder to think what might have been the consequences to the hon. gentlemen opposite. They might have spoken inadvisedly with their lips, they might have furnished much most curious information regarding the inner machinery to which the hon. gentleman and his colleagues owe their seats in this House. I really think the success of the hon. gentleman deserves special mention in the Speech from the Throne: I might also say that it deserved a Te Deum Laudamus with which generals are wont to celebrate their great victories. There is another consideration. The hon. gentleman is great in precedents; in his time he has established some remarkable precedents. He established a very remarkable precedent in showing how to deal with charges presented against members of the Cabinet. Now, the hon. gentleman has established another precedent, which will be of great use no doubt in the future, namely, how to deal with ex-M.P.'s who happen to know too much. I desire to know is the Minister of Justice prepared to apply this rule? Is the Minister of Justice prepared to declare in future that if a prisoner finds his health suffers from confinement he is prepared to discharge him after he has gone through about one quarter of the punishment the courts believed adequate to the offence? I know that the Minister of Justice is not very strong in political economy. I have not myself discovered that he is a very great adept in matters of arithmetic; but the hon. gentleman is a lawyer, the hon. gentleman is an ex-

judge, the hon. gentleman is the author of a criminal code of more or less value—rather less than more, according to Mr. Justice Taschereau, but that is not a point I intend to dwell upon. Anyhow, the hon. gentleman is the chief executive officer of the Department of Justice, and I want to know whether he is prepared to apply this rule? I want to know whether he is going to give equal British rights to all classes of men, equally and indiscriminately? Sir, it is known to me, and probably the Minister of Justice, that there are many persons now confined in the several prisons and penitentiaries of this Dominion whose health is suffering from confinement. I am informed that the collective sums, for the theft for which those worthies are in prison, would not amount, all put together, to more than ten per cent of the sum for the embezzlement for which McGreevy and Connolly were confined, and I desire to know whether the hon. gentleman is prepared to recommend the release of these prisoners, and if not, why not? I am told on good medical authority that one hundred prisoners, or thereabouts, in Kingston penitentiary alone, were taken down with typhoid fever during the last year. Will the Minister of Justice permit the release of these patients, who undoubtedly have suffered in health by reason of this confinement. I am prepared to say—though I do not speak with authority, not having had any communication with them—that these prisoners would not be unreasonable, and if distinguished personages should be afraid that the Minister of Justice was too tender-hearted and too easily imposed upon, I am sure these prisoners would be quite ready to submit their cases to Dr. Wright, or to any other medical authority that might be suggested. Very far be it from me to criticize anything that may be suggested by a distinguished personage such as I have alluded to, but I must say that I think that it was not altogether necessary to employ the medical expert I have referred to, and for this reason: it would have been quite possible for that distinguished personage to have obtained, without going outside his own council walls, ample corroboration of the views of the Minister of Justice. Mr. McGreevy and Mr. Connolly may have much to complain about, and I dare say they have, but Messrs. McGreevy and Connolly certainly cannot say to the Cabinet at large: We were sick and in prison and ye visited us not. If I am correctly informed, there was not a week—I am not sure there was not a day—during which to their credit be it said, some member of the Cabinet, some one of His Excellency's advisers did not cause the door of the jail at Ottawa to open, in order that he may hold sweet counsel with Mr. McGreevy or Mr. Connolly. Whether that arose from pure philanthropy or from a pardonable curiosity to see what accommodation might be provided in Ottawa jail for persons who are convicted for embezzling public money, I cannot say; but of one thing I am certain, that the members of the Cabinet aforesaid might, to quote Lord Dufferin, "On their honour as gentlemen, on their fealty as sworn advisers of the Crown" have assured His Excellency that from their own knowledge they were aware that Mr. McGreevy and Mr. Connolly were very sick from being in prison, and very angry too. I did not hear my hon. friend from Ottawa (Sir James Grant), make special allusion to it, but I have noticed in the press many congratulations, and I have no doubt very proper congratulations, on the recognition which has been extended by Her Most Gracious Majesty to the Minister of Justice. The hon. gentleman will permit me to offer my congratulations on the still better merited recognition which was extended to him recently by His Excellency in this matter of McGreevy and Connolly. He will also permit me to make a slight retraction. It is true, when starting out with my remarks, I declared that the meeting of the House had been delayed in order that the hon. gentleman might look to Washington to see what the United States authorities were doing. There is no doubt, Sir, that that was a reason and a powerful one, but, Sir, I believe that after all that that reason was a secondary one. The true reason is the last one. This Cabinet so strong in the people's love, this Cabinet so feared abroad and honoured at home, this Cabinet with so ample a majority, this combination of all the virtues and all the talents, these illustrious statesmen so confident in the consciousness of their own inner purity,—dared not meet Parliament, dared not meet their own supporters, but preferred to paralyze the business of this country, preferred to subject themselves and the whole House to the greatest possible inconvenience until such time as they had been able to make their peace with Messrs. McGreevy and Connolly.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 10.40 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, 19th March, 1894.

The Speaker took the Chair at Three o'clock.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved :

That Notices of Motion be postponed until after the consideration of the Order of the Day for resuming the adjourned debate on the motion for an Address to His Excellency the Governor General in answer to his Speech at the opening of the session.

Motion agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT—EASTER.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Hon. members are continually inquiring at what time the adjournment for the Easter recess would be proposed, and it might therefore be convenient that we should come to an understanding about it to-day. My proposition is that when the House adjourns on Wednesday next it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, the 27th March, at 3 o'clock in the afternoon, and if there is no objection I will now make a motion to that effect.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Then I presume that the hon. Minister of Finance hardly contemplates delivering his Budget statement on Wednesday, as announced?

Mr. FOSTER. That scarcely follows.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I want to know before consenting to this motion.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It is impossible to say how long the debate on the Address will continue.

Mr. LAURIER. At all events, it will never do to have the Budget speech on a day that is a private members' day.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I do not quite see that. Of course, members' business will have precedence.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. If private members' business have precedence, as usual, there is not much question as to the Budget being reached. I would ask the hon. Minister of Finance, or the Controller of Customs—I do not know which has the matter in charge—whether it would be convenient to have distributed to the members of the House a certain official document showing the rates on goods imported from England, and the rates on goods imported from the United States, which I understand has been prepared, and which would be of great interest and value in the approaching discussion.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not know to what document my hon. friend alludes. I suppose he has not by him a copy of it which he could give one.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I had one, but I haven't it here.

Mr. FOSTER. If there are any documents which are necessary for the understanding of the tariff question when the Budget comes before the House, we shall be very pleased to bring them down.

Mr. LAURIER. I would be loth to believe that the Government had such a document prepared, if it were not necessary. If it is necessary for the Government, I think it is necessary for the members generally.

Mr. FOSTER. That does not always follow.

Mr. LAURIER. I think it does.

Mr. LANDERKIN. The Government need it more than the members generally.

Motion agreed to.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 2) to secure the better observance of the Lord's Day, commonly called Sunday.—(Mr. Charlton.)

Bill (No. 3) to repeal the Electoral Franchise Act, and to make certain provisions in place thereof.—(Mr. Charlton.)

Bill (No. 6) to disfranchise voters who have taken bribes.—(Mr. Weldon.)

Bill (No. 7) to extend the ballot to the North-west Territories.—(Mr. Martin.)

PREVENTION OF CRUELTY TO ANIMALS.

Mr. COATSWORTH moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 4) to make further provision as to the prevention of cruelty to animals and to amend the Criminal Code of 1892. He said: This Bill is the one I introduced last session. The law has been found inadequate to meet the number of cases coming before the different magistrates, and the object of this Bill is to make further provision as regard the prevention of cruelty to animals, in order to meet cases of abandonment of diseased animals, and over-driving, and the use of animals as targets, the carriage of animals by rail and water, and other cases. The present provisions of the law are to be modified so that all cases of cruelty may be brought within its scope.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

N.W.T. REPRESENTATION ACT.

Mr. DALY moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 5) to amend the N.W.T. Representation Act. He said: The Bill is exactly the same as that introduced last session, but which was withdrawn by me in order to expedite the business of the House. Its object is to extend the ballot to the North-west Territories.

Mr. MARTIN. No notice has been given of the Bill. The notice reads "An Act to amend the N.W.T. Act."

Mr. DALY. I will strike the word "representation" out of the title of the Bill.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

FISHERY INSTRUCTIONS.

Mr. LEDUC (for Mr. Beausoleil) asked, Whether the Department of Marine and Fisheries has issued fresh instructions to the fishery overseers of the counties of Berthier, Maskinongé, St. Maurice, Nicolet, Richelieu and Yamaska, with reference to the fisheries, for the year 1894? If so, are the said instructions identical with those of last year, and do they permit the taking of soft fish during the close season for game fish? When were the said instructions forwarded to the fishery overseers of the said counties?

Mr. LAURIER.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Yes. The instructions are identical with the exception that pickerel cannot be caught after 1st April. They permit the taking of soft fish during the close season for game fish. They were forwarded to the fishery overseers of the said counties on the 24th February, 1894.

FRENCH COMMERCIAL TREATY.

Mr. LAURIER asked, What is the policy of the Government with regard to the Commercial Treaty with France? Is the Government to ask or not to ask the ratification of the treaty?

Mr. FOSTER. I beg to say in reply to the hon. gentleman that two important delegations have asked to be heard with reference to this treaty, and the Government have therefore decided to defer giving their answer until after the Easter holidays, after these delegations have been heard.

TUBERCULOSIS.

Mr. SMITH (Ontario) asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to introduce any legislation this session dealing with tuberculosis?

Mr. FOSTER. The department is now making studies with reference to this matter, and no definite answer can yet be given.

ADDRESS IN ANSWER TO HIS EXCELLENCY'S SPEECH.

The House resumed the consideration of His Excellency's Speech at the opening of the session.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). In rising to make a few observations on some of the topics touched upon in the Speech from the Throne, I beg leave, in the first place, to extend my congratulations to my professional confrère, the hon. member for Ottawa (Sir James Grant), on the very able and eloquent speech he made in moving the address in answer to the Speech from the Throne. His graceful and well-timed remarks concerning the Earl and Countess of Derby, who left our shores a few months ago, after having so ably filled the Viceregal position in this country, are well deserving of compliment. His reference to the worthy and the noble Lord and Lady who have been called to preside over the destinies of this country was also exceedingly appropriate. I am sure that every member of Parliament, and every citizen of the country, will agree with these sentiments, so kindly and so eloquently expressed by the hon. member for Ottawa (Sir James Grant). Mr. Speaker, we in this country are a loyal people. It is sometimes alleged by the Conservatives that disloyalty pervades the ranks of the Liberal party of this country, but I am happy to say that there is very little disloyalty in the country, and that we are always proud to give that allegiance to the mother country to which she is entitled. But, while we are willing to do that, we must remember that we have a country of our own deserving of our allegiance, and our patriotic efforts for her advancement, and while we love and revere the land of our fathers, we love and revere the land of our children still more. It is the sentiment of the Liberals of this country, and I have no doubt it is the sentiment of a large proportion of the Conservatives as well, that in our consideration Canada should be first, Canada should be last, Canada should be all the way between, and it is from that standpoint I have always endeavoured to discuss Canadian questions, irrespective of the interests of any other country. I desire to make some reference to our external trade. The Speech from the Throne tells us that this trade is increasing year after year. Now, Mr. Speaker, that should not surprise anybody who knows Canada, for it could not reasonably be expected that five millions of people, possessing the intelligence, the skill, the energy, the push of the Canadian people will halt in their upward progress. The cause of surprise should not be that we are as prosperous as we are, but rather that our prosperity is not still greater. In looking over the external trade of this country, one cannot but observe that the Government has failed to gain for us a number of markets which it promised to gain years ago. You will remember, Mr. Speaker, that when you were on the floor of this House and taking part in its discussions, the Government you supported promised to open larger markets to our people in which our industries would realize higher profits than before. This was particularly the case about three years ago, when the McKinley Bill had been passed, and Canadian products were prohibited from entering what I believe to be the natural market for many of those products. South America was pointed out as a market for important lines of Canadian products. Sir John Macdonald, years ago, said that the Liberal party when in power neglected to extend the trade of Canada among these countries that required so much of our produce, and grew so much that we required for consumption in this country. But, Sir, if we look at the results of the efforts made by the Government we find that they have signally failed in extending our trade with the countries of South America; indeed, the trade of Canada in these countries was greater a few years ago than it is now. The members of the Government and their supporters generally put importations and exportations together when they speak of the external trade of this country. Now, it is well known that the measure of our success is found in our exports rather than in our imports, for what we sell is the true indication of our prosperity. This is seen in all departments of life. The labourer counts his prosperity by what he receives, not by what he pays for his living; the business man judges his progress in business by what he is able to earn, not by what he pays for the support of his family. So it is with the trade of the country, the true measure of our success and advancement is found in our exportations to foreign countries. Now, I desire to draw the attention of the Government and the country to the extent of our exportations to countries which the Government, when they established the National Policy, promised us should afford large markets for our products. Take South America, for instance. In 1889 we sent to the countries of South America products of Canada to the value of $1,889,000, and in 1890 we sent $1,511,000, a much less quantity than in the year before. In 1891 we sent $1,063,000, and in 1892 $1,027,000. Last year there was a slight increase to $1,327,000. These figures prove that these countries, which the leaders of the Government said would afford a large and lucrative market for our exportations, have actually reduced their purchases from us within the last five years under the paternal care of that trade by the party now in power. If we look to Germany, a country with which we should carry on a large export trade, we find the same condition of affairs. In 1892 we exported to Germany goods to the value of $943,000, but last year this export trade had fallen off to $751,000, a reduction of about $200,000 in one year. Now take another country. You will remember, Mr. Speaker, that efforts have been made by the Government now in power to establish trade with France; several plenipotentiaries have been sent to France within the last few years for the purpose of negotiating a treaty with that country. And you will acknowledge, and the country will acknowledge, that there is no other country on the continent of Europe with which we should have a larger trade than with France, for, as I have said before, a large proportion of our population is of French origin, their habits, customs and feelings are largely the same as those of the people of France, and it would therefore naturally be expected that between two such peoples trade would grow rapidly. But, instead of that, our export trade with France is falling off year by year, and we are losing our grip upon the trade of that country. Let me give a few figures to corroborate the statement I have made. As far back as 1873 we sent to France products of this country to the value of $632,000. In 1883, ten years afterwards, this trade was only $617,000, and, notwithstanding all the efforts of the Government, and notwithstanding their claims for the success of their policy, that trade last year fell off to $264,000, or only a little more than one-third of what it was twenty years ago. Now, Sir, this proves to my mind that, so far as the trade of these countries is concerned, the efforts of the Government have been futile. There is a group of islands lying to the south of us, and a few years ago I heard the eloquent Finance Minister of this country say that there was a likelihood of a great trade being established between Canada and these West India islands. Indeed, the hon. gentleman was sent there about two years ago at the expense of the Government to confer with the people of those islands in order to establish better trade relations between them and the people of Canada. He went there, and, as a result of his visit, or the result of something else, our trade has been falling off instead of increasing, with the West India Islands. One of the reasons of that decline is that he would not give them the same favours in the Canadian market as the United States did in their market. They said they could not continue to buy from us when we would not allow their products into our markets on as favourable terms as the United States allowed their products into their markets. Now, let us see what our trade has been with the West Indies. In 1873, long before the National Policy had any existence, our exports to those islands were $3,989,000. In 1883, ten years afterwards, and five years after the National Policy was introduced, trade had fallen off to $3,125,000. In 1893, still under the National Policy, and notwithstanding all the efforts that have been made to promote that trade, including the establishment of two lines of steamers running between Halifax and the West Indies, our exports had declined to $3,146,000; this great reduction taking place notwithstanding the facilities, and notwithstanding the expenditure which the Government of this country had undertaken to establish those facilities. Now, I do not think there is any cause for satisfaction in these facts. Satisfaction has been expressed in the Address from the Throne in regard to the extension of our trade. Sir, do you see any reason for satisfaction in these facts? Do better markets and better prices prevail for those to whom better markets and better prices have been promised? Sir, I wish now to refer to another country, a country at the antipodes to our own, the Australian Colonies. It has been maintained by the Minister of Finance for the last few years that a very large trade could be established with that country in many articles that we produced; and last year the Minister of Trade and Commerce was sent by this Government on a visit to Australia, and they paid all his expenses, to ascertain if there was room for the products of Canada, and if a trade could not be profitably established. After making a full investigation, he came back, and a few weeks ago he addressed a meeting of the Manufacturers' Association in Toronto; and if he is properly reported in the newspapers, he used these words:

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron).

Look at what the Massey-Harris Company has accomplished in the last five years. I have under my hand now figures of their operations during the last year. Five years ago, when they first sent their agent into Australia to sell reapers and mowers, they were laughed at and told to take them back to Canada. "Where is Canada?" We know nothing of Canada. We are dealing with the United States; their goods are good enough for us in that line, and we don't see why we should buy from you.

Well, certainly that shows a great deal of ignorance on the part of the people of Australia. I suppose the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce took a geography with him in order to point out on the map of the world where Canada was. Do you suppose that the people of Australia were as ignorant of Canadian industries and Canadian products as he represents them in that portion of his speech? Is it not wonderful that five years ago, when the Massey-Harris Company went there and founded this trade, the people of Australia were so ignorant of Canada that they took from this country more than double the value of the products that they take to-day, or, to be accurate, 56 per cent more? Does he mean to tell me that the people of Australia were so ignorant of the products of Canada and of our industries that twenty years ago they took more of our products than we sent them last year, notwithstanding the increased facilities for trade which have since been established? Now, figures, it is said, do not lie, and in order to establish my position, I will give you the figures of our trade with Australia. In 1889, the very year that the Minister of Trade and Commerce said that the people of Australia were so ignorant of Canada that they asked where she was, we sent $661,000 worth of Canadian products into the Australian Colonies. Surely, they were not ignorant of Canada when they took so much from us. One year after that they were getting more ignorant, for they only took $471,000. In 1891, still forgetting where Canada was, they only took $589,000; and still forgetting the position she occupied on the map of the world, in 1892, they took $437,000. Last year, when the Minister of Trade and Commerce was there, they had almost forgotten Canada and only took $289,000 worth of our products. Is that a satisfactory showing for the exports of the products of this country to Australia? I cannot agree with those hon. gentlemen who think so. Now, I have a few more words to say in regard to the statements made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce before the Manufacturers' Association in Toronto. He asked those manufacturers why they did not send a larger amount of their product into Australia, and he is reported as saying:

In 1892 the United States sent to Australia over $11,000,000 worth of goods and imported over $8,500,000 worth. What were the principal goods they sent in which we can compete? I find that they were in agricultural implements, breadstuffs, brooms and brushes, carriages and horses, patent medicines, chemical dies and medicines, cotton goods, fish, canned salmon, cordage, canned fruits, explosives, india-rubber boots and shoes; india-rubber, manufactures of; iron castings; machinery, nails, saws and tools, scales and balances, sewing machines, engines, stationary; boilers and parts, stoves, ranges, &c., wire, all other manufactures of iron, leather, boots and shoes, harness and saddles; other manufactures of leather; oil and cement, malt liquors, slate roofing, stone, manufactures of; musical instruments, organs, pianos; oil, whale and fish, kerosene, lubricating; paints and painters' colours; paper, printing and wrapping; plated wire, soap, toilet and common; tobacco, cigars, vegetables, canned; timber, manufactures of. These are the articles which the United States have been sending to Australia. Why should not the manufacturers of this country compete with them?

Now, Sir, the Minister of Trade and Commerce has given away the whole principle of protection. I ask you, Sir, and I ask the people of the country, if Canada can compete in the open and neutral markets of the world with England and the United States, in those articles here mentioned, why should the consumers of this country be burdened by a high tariff to protect them in their own country? If the manufacturers of this country can make those articles and send them six thousand miles across the sea, paying the freight, paying the agencies, paying insurance, and paying everything that is involved in sending those articles into a foreign country, and then go into the open market in competition with English cottons and English machinery, with United States cottons and United States machinery, with Canadian cottons and cottons from other countries—I ask you why it is that nine out of every ten of the people of this country should be burdened with these high duties in order to prevent these parties from having competition in the country of which they are citizens? I challenge any hon. gentleman on the other side of the House to answer that question satisfactorily to himself or satisfactorily to any reasonable man in this country. But according to the Speech from the Throne we are to have the principle of protection continued; we are to have the policy of the last fifteen years continued as a burden upon the people yet. Let me read to the House the paragraph of the Address which refers to this subject and to the continuance of the policy of protection. It is as follows:—

At an early date a measure will be laid before you having for its object a revision of the Duties of Customs with a view to meet the changes which time has effected in business operations of all kinds throughout the Dominion. While my Ministers do not propose to change the principles on which the existing enactments on this subject are based the amendments which will be offered for your consideration are designed to simplify the operation of the tariff and to lessen, as far as can be done, consistently with those principles and with the requirements of the Treasury, the imposts which are now in force.

You will notice, Mr. Speaker, there are two conditions on which this tariff revision is to be made: the first is, that care must be exercised not to touch the manufacturers and to preserve the principle of protection, and the next is, to be very careful to have sufficient revenue for the next election, not to affect the treasury of the country. Not one word is said about the interests of the consumers who have been burdened by this tariff during the last fifteen years, not one word is said about the labouring classes; tariff revision is not to be consistent with their well-being but with the principle of protection on the one hand and with having enough money in the public treasury on the other. The Government will disappoint the expectations of the people when it is seen that the object of this reduction, amendment or readjustment, if you may call it so, is to be carried out solely and entirely in the interests of the treasury, so as to have money to spend lavishly, and to furnish the same protection to the manufacturers as they have been receiving for the last fifteen years. One of the most eminent statesmen in the world, a man who has attained the extraordinary age of eighty-four years, has stated that protection is a system of legal robbery, and not one whit the more respectable because the state is the culprit. This system which has been in force for the last fifteen years has burdened nine-tenths of the people and acted as legalized robbery as regards their interests in order to place a proportion of their earnings in the hands of the favoured few who constitute one-tenth of the population of the country. You know very well, Mr. Speaker, the origin of the word "tariff." It came from Tariffa, the name of a great sea robber residing on the northern part of Africa on the shores of the Mediterranean, who built a city and a castle for himself, and who when the merchant ships came from the east towards the west raided and robbed them of a portion of their goods. But the merchants having been despoiled of a portion of their goods placed an additional price on the balance and made the consumers pay it. Is not that the principle of the tariff to-day? Does not the tariff levy one-third or one-fourth of the whole value, and is not an additional price placed on the balance sold to the consumers, the manufacturers and merchants thus recouping themselves from the pockets of the consumers? Very truly can it be said that the tariff is a robbery of the many for the benefit of the few. But, again, protection is a promise to shelter the manufacturers. What does the Government say to the manufacturer? It says, you go on and manufacture your goods. It is true you cannot manufacture them as cheaply as manufacturers in England, Germany and other countries. True, your skill may not be so great and your machinery not so perfect, and there may be a waste of capital; but we will see that the waste which takes place is counter-balanced by keeping you from the competition of producers in other countries. Is not that the very sentiment expressed by those who support protection, and is it not thus the manufacturer receives an advantage? Again, protection protects the product of labour from competition, while it puts labour itself on the free list. I ask every hon. member who will look upon this subject in a reasonable and sensible light, if it can be supposed for a moment that protection is being afforded to the labouring class, or that protection ever raised the wages of the people one cent? When the labour market is fully supplied the value of labour is low, and when the labour market is stringent then the price of labour rises. When we have spent over $3,000,000 during the last fifteen years in trying to bring labourers here from foreign countries, and have sent agents to London, Liverpool and Manchester, and to France and other countries of the world, setting forth the advantages to be obtained here in the labour market, and urging workmen to come here to compete with our labourers, is it not hard on our labourers to have to meet this competition, owing to the action and influence of the Government, while at the same time the products of foreign countries cannot come in here because our manufacturers want to make large profits out of their products. The whole system is wrong from the foundation to the last shingle on the roof, wrong east, west, north and south, the whole system has no basis on which it can be justified. Therefore, the country will regret very much that this principle is to be continued. Protection compels 90 per cent of our people to pay a bonus, a subsidy, to go into the pockets of the other one-tenth of the population, and at the same time forces the 90 per cent to sell their labour in the free markets of the world. Take the farmers of this country. It has been acknowledged by Conservatives last year, and probably it will be acknowledged by them this year, that it is impossible to protect the farmers, that so soon as there is a surplus in the country which is to be sold in the foreign market, and which comes into competition with the products of other countries in the open market, the bushel, pound or ton, which goes into that foreign market gives a price to the bushel, pound or ton of the products of a similar character that remain at home. That is an economic question on which there is no divergence of opinion. It is not possible to protect the farmer except in some small localities, special points, geographically close to the United States; but taking the broad principle, it is impossible to protect the farming interest, because it exports a surplus of products. The farmers constitute two millions and a half of our people, and when you add the labourers on the farm, and the labourers employed on works such as canals and railways, they constitute 90 per cent of the population, and therefore only about 10 per cent of the population receive direct benefit from the National Policy, even if they receive very much advantage. Is it right and just to take money out of the pockets of this 90 per cent of the people, whom you cannot protect, and to place it directly in the pockets of those who receive the advantage of protection? I say that it is a blunder, and it is a policy which will never develop the interests of this country as those interests should be developed. But there is another argument against protection which I think should be considered. Protection is the parent of combines, trusts and monopolies, which fleece the consumer. I am sure I need no argument to convince the hon. members of this House on that point. The Controller of Customs, a few years ago, saw that to such an extent that he asked Parliament to give him a committee to investigate into the combines of the country, and the result was that a report was presented to this House which showed that the combines and trusts and associations of that kind, had fleeced the consumers of Canada to an extraordinary degree; so much so that it was deemed advisable to bring in a Bill to prevent them carrying on their nefarious traffic. I had a little experience this summer in combines. I wanted some plate glass, and I asked for tenders from the plate glass companies of Ontario, but noticing the heading of the tenders, I found that they were all headed "Dominion Stained Glass Co.," and that there was only four or five dollars difference in the amounts which they asked me. I went to work and I found in another province a company that was not in the combine, and I purchased from them, and by so doing I saved 20 per cent on the prices asked me by the glass combine of Ontario. Does not that go to show that if I had bought from the Ontario combines, and if I had not gone out and beyond my own province, that on the little purchase of $325 of plate glass which I made, I would have been fleeced $75. There can hardly be a business in this country to-day that is not in the hands of a combine, where they meet and decide how much product they will put on the market, what price they will ask for it, and in which they control the independence of smaller concerns and in every instance fleece the public. What is the cause of that? Nothing else but the protective system, for if there were free trade or anything approaching it, there would be free and open competition, which would prevent the manufacturers taking this unfair advantage of the Canadian consumers who are made to pay and protect them. But, Mr. Speaker, protection enables the manufacturer to unload a glutted market at a loss, or at a lesser profit, and to recoup himself then at the expense of the consumers of Canada. Hon. gentlemen know that, whether they be Conservatives or not. You all know that the large industries of this country export and sell to outsiders, very frequently at a lower price than they ordinarily charge; and that when they come back to this country they raise the price to the consumers of Canada, who are thus forced to recoup them for their loss or their small profit. Let me give you an instance of this. The cotton companies of this country found last year, or the year before, that the markets were glutted. They could not sell their products with a high profit because there was too much in the market, and so they concluded that something else must be done. They sent $245,000 worth of cotton to China, and sold it in the Chinese markets in competition with the German, the Indian, the English and other cottons. Now, if they realized a sufficient living profit they do not want protection, and if they did not receive a living profit they could not afford to export it in this way. What did they do? Immediately after unloading on the Chinese market they came back to Canada and raised the price of cotton 15 per cent to the Canadian consumers. In this way the Canadian consumers not only paid the legitimate profits upon the cottons they were using, but they were made to pay as well to the cotton manufacturers the loss they sustained, or the lesser profit they obtained, by sending the goods across the sea and competing with the producers in other lands. There was a base iniquity perpetrated on the consumers of this country, and the country to-day will be very sorry to hear from the Address from the Throne that that system of iniquity is to be continued. But, Mr. Speaker, protection has another fault. Protection renders non-productive millions of the capital of Canada which might be used in other ways. Let me explain this. In the work of distributing the products of this country there are millions of capital invested. It is estimated that there are about three hundred millions worth of manufactured articles distributed to consumers through the various markets of this country. Supposing that one man undertook the business of distribution, he would require a capital of $300,000,000, in addition to what he would require to work his business. Under free trade, he would only require $210,000,000, or 30 per cent less to do the same work, employ the same hands to distribute the same articles, and here we would save ninety millions of money that might be invested in other industries of the country, which would give employment to about ninety thousand men. Let me give you another illustration of the loss of capital in distribution under this high tariff. We will take the article of iron. We import, in round numbers, about ten million dollars worth of iron each year, and on that we pay $3,000,000 duty. If there were no duty, a man could undertake to distribute the whole iron used by the various consumers of this country for $10,000,000. That would be the amount of capital he would have to put in his business, but, under the present condition he pays $13,000,000. There are three millions more which are lost and unproductive. He does not employ more hands by the expenditure of the thirteen millions, because he has to send it out to the same consumers, but if he invested in other manufactures that three millions which he could spare out of his distribution business, it would give employment to thirty thousand men. As another instance, take the importation of coal oil. We imported last year 5,600,000 gallons for the various consumers of Canada, and the distribution of that will employ a certain number of hands. Under the tariff, we have got to pay $437,000 for the oil and $430,000 duty, which comes to nearly $900,000 altogether, which a man engaged in that business would require to distribute that amount of oil under the present conditions. But suppose we had free trade. $437,000 would buy the oil; he would require the same number of hands to distribute the 5,600,000 gallons, he would give employment to just as many people, and have $430,000 of his capital to invest in and develop the country in various ways. So you see, that the protective tariff is a waste of millions and millions of capital (as I have said already, nearly $90,000,000) in the entire distribution of the country. But, Mr. Speaker, protection has another fault. Protection protects the rich and discriminates against the poor. I am prepared to prove from our own official documents that it discriminates against the poor man and favours the rich man, and I challenge any hon. gentleman upon the opposite side of the House to prove anything else, for the figures here are incontrovertible. The arguments are of such a character that they cannot be gainsaid; for, Sir, when I place before you these facts, and ask you to consider them in that light, no other conclusion can be arrived at. On the imports last year the average tariff was 30 per cent. Here are some of the tariffs paid by the farmers of Canada: mowers, reapers, ploughs, drills, 35 per cent, 5 per cent above the average. Forks (two and three-pronged), 50 per cent, 20 per cent above the average tariff. Forks (four and five and six-pronged), 46 per cent, 16 per cent above the average. Hoes, 48 per cent, 18 per cent above the average. Garden rakes, 49 per cent, 19 per cent above the average. Barbed fence wire, 54 per cent, 24 per cent above the average. Now, look at another schedule of duties which will show how the poor man is discriminated against. On checked shirting, the cheapest in the market, the duty is 48 per cent, on the dearest 22½ per cent; on gray cottons, the cheapest, 36 per cent, the dearest, 21¼ per cent; on flannels, all-wool, the cheapest, 40 per cent, the dearest, 25¼ per cent; on tweeds, the cheapest, 42 per cent, the dearest, 26 per cent; on beaver overcoatings, the cheapest, 80 per cent, the dearest, 30 per cent; on nap overcoatings, the cheapest, 75 per cent, the dearest, 33 per cent; on serge cloakings, the cheapest, 58 per cent, the dearest, 33 per cent; on blankets, the cheapest, 130 per cent, the dearest, 33 per cent. On only three of these articles used by the rich is the duty above the average, while on those used by the poor it ranges all the way up to 100 per cent above the average. In the face of these facts and figures, taken from documents furnished by the Government itself, I ask you, Mr. Speaker, I ask the members of this House, and I ask the country, is there not discrimination against the poor and in favour of the rich? But that is not all. Let us look at the rich man's tariff: Silk fabrics, 30 per cent; silk laces, 30 per cent; precious stones, 10 per cent; oil and water colour paintings, by eminent artists to adorn the walls of the rich, free; but if the poor man wants a few steel plates or anything of that kind he has to pay 30 per cent. A member of this House bought a painting in New York for $46,000, brought it home to Montreal to adorn his palace, and brought it in free of duty; but if I want to buy a picture in accordance with my limited capacity for buying, I have to pay 30 per cent of its value before I can bring it in. Is that not discrimination in favour of the rich? The best carpets which can be purchased in this country are charged 30 per cent; silk velvets, 30 per cent; jewellery, 20 per cent; manufactures of gold, 20 per cent; china and porcelain ware, 30 per cent; fur coats and cloaks to keep the rich warm, which the poor cannot buy, 25 per cent. In this list there is not one single article on which the duty is above the average. In the face of these figures I ask this House, and through the press, I ask the country, are they willing to retain in power a Government which thus places a burden on the poor and favours the rich? The situation is correctly described by a little triplet which I found the other day in the New York 'Daily America.' Listen to it:

"Yes, the tariff is a tax,
And the poor people get it
Where the chicken got the axe."

But, Mr. Speaker, that is not all that can be said against protection. It is such an abomination of iniquities that a person could hardly get through telling of them in a week. Protection distributes unequally the wealth of a nation, and the labouring classes, in whose favour it is said to be, have not at command at any time enough to carry them over a few months' stringency in the labour market. Twenty-five thousand people of the United States have more money and property within their grasp than the balance of the sixty-five millions. Is that a proper distribution of the wealth of the nation? I will show you that protection brings about that inequality. Three-fifths of the wealth of the United States is congested in the nine North-eastern States, the great manufacturing States of the Union. But, Mr. Speaker, I want to place before you and the House figures which go to prove my contention that protection distributes unequally the wealth of a country. In 1860 the farm values of the United States were $7,989,000,000. In 1880, after twenty years' protection these values had risen to $12,140,000,000, or an increase of 52 per cent. Now, other values amounted in 1860 to $8,180,000,000, and in 1880, twenty years afterwards, they had risen to $31,538,000,000, or an increase of 280 per cent. But, Sir, there are other figures which I wish to give you, taken from the compendium of the United States census of 1880, at page 926, so that any hon. member can verify them for himself. The amount invested in farm property in 1880 in the United States was $12,104,000,000; the value of the products was $2,790,000,000; the persons employed were 7,670,400; the product per hand was $288. The value of farm labour at that time was $270, so that the farmer had $18 profit on each hand he employed. That was the farmer's side of the matter. Now take the manufacturer's side. In 1880 the amount invested in manufacturing industries in the United States was $2,791,000,000; the value of the product was $5,370,000,000; the cost of material was $3,370,000,000; the value of the product, less material, was $1,973,000,000; the persons employed numbered 2,732,000; and the product per head was $721. Now, the average wages paid in the factories of the United States was $325, leaving a profit to the manufacturer of nearly $400 on every hand employed, while the farmer had a profit of only $18 on each hand employed by him. That shows beyond any doubt that the farmer is not getting fair play under protection; and if it were possible to give similar figures in regard to this Canada of ours, they would show exactly the same results in principle. But there is another evil in protection. Protection is at least one of the causes of the depreciation of the value of farm lands. We are told every day that the farmers are getting better off. Now, it is no use talking arrant nonsense; it is no use trying to deceive the people; because they know that they are not getting better off. I will give you a few figures which will show you to a demonstration that they are not as well off as they were a few years ago. The average value of farm lands in Ontario for the ten years from 1882 to 1892, was $632,500,000. In 1891, the value was $621,250,000, or 11¼ millions less. Do you really suppose, Sir, that the farmers of this country in selling out their lands in 1891, and getting 11¼ millions less for their property, were equally wealthy as if they had sold at the higher rate? Worse than that, in 1892, the value of the land was $616,000,000, or $16,500,000 less than the average from 1882 to 1892. It is estimated that we have 250,000 farms in Ontario, so that, dividing the land equally, the value of each farm would show a reduction of $660 in 1892, as compared with the average value during the decade. But that is not all. Let me quote this statement from the Bureau of Industry Report for the year 1892. According to that report, the value of the following field crops, wheat, oats, rye, peas, corn, buckwheat, beans, barley, potatoes, mangel-wurtzel, carrots, turnips, hay, in 1891, was $130,866,000, and in 1892, $110,563,000, showing a decrease of $20,303,000, in 1892, as compared with 1891. On 250,000 farms, that would represent an average loss to each farmer of $812. Yet we have men in this House who will probably, before this debate is through, get up and say that the farmers are as well off now as they were years ago. Although the products of each farm yielded $812 less in 1892 than in 1891, yet we have men in this House, sufficiently intelligent to be selected as representatives of constituencies, who will, in the face of these figures, taken from official sources, tell us that the farmers of this country are as well off this year as they ever were. My comprehension may be limited, but that certainly is one thing I cannot understand. Now, the Government may ask, how could we help all this? Supposing the farmers do not sell as much as they did, supposing their lands are cheaper in value, can we increase the prices? What can we do for the farmers? I will tell you, Sir, what the Government can do. They can leave the farmers alone; they can let them hew out their own destiny, which they would do much more effectively and satisfactorily than they are doing at present. You do not find the farmers coming to Parliament as lobbyists. You do not find them so crowding our passages here that you can hardly get through from one place to the other. You do not find them coming to ask favours and special legislation to increase their profits. All they ask, and they ask it emphatically, is to be let alone to do the best they can with their products. They ask to be allowed to sell where they can realize the most, and to buy where they will pay the least, so that if they lose in one way they will save in the other. This Parliament, however, has not acted justly by the farmers, but has placed burdens upon them, and that in the very face of the depreciation of their property and reduced prices for their products. In the Speech from the Throne, the Government have announced that these burdens shall be continued. Their raw material is taxed. On their farm implements, there are duties levied to the extent of 18 to 20 per cent, and in some cases even 60 per cent over the average duty of 30 per cent imposed on other articles. Our agriculturists say to Parliament: Gentlemen, we want you to take off the burdens you have put on; reduce the taxation on agricultural implements and on iron; reduce the duty on coal oil, barbed wire, and manufactured goods generally—woollens, the cheaper kinds of clothing, cottons, boots, and shoes. Give us a fair field, they cry, and we want no favour. We can stand on our own energy and industry.

and hew out, unaided, happy and prosperous homes for ourselves. There is another thing which the Government can do. Our farmers are, to a very large extent, shut out of their natural market, and the Government have been promising for the last few years to take steps to pull down the fence now raised so high between the two nations who ought, in trade matters, to mingle and intermingle freely with each other. The Americans produce many articles which we require, cheaper than we can produce them, and there are many things which we can produce cheaper than the Americans can, so that there is every opportunity for reciprocal trade if no barriers were raised to prevent it. We all know what honourable distinction Canada gained at the World's Fair. I was never so proud of being a Canadian as last October when I visited the Chicago exhibition and saw the high position our country took. In grain, our Canadian farmers won no less than 197 awards for their exhibits. In flour, oatmeal, &c., they took 24 awards. In honey, they carried off 17 awards. In swine, they gained 50 awards. Their cattle bore off 184 awards. Out of 352 sheep which they exhibited, 250 took awards, whereas, out of 478 sheep exhibited by the United States, only 193 took awards, so that while 71 per cent of our sheep gained prizes, only 40 per cent of the American sheep earned this distinction. Does not that prove that if we had an open market for our butter, cattle, sheep, honey, swine, &c., we could profitably dispose of them in the large centres of the United States? Our best cattle would go to the cities of Detroit and Chicago, and other western cities, where they would come into competition with the inferior beef from Texas and Mexico and the Indian Territory; and the rich customers in those western cities, who do not look so much to the price as to the quality, would certainly purchase our cattle in preference to inferior stock. The same remark applies to our sheep. Let me give you, briefly, the results which Canada achieved at that exhibition. Our cattle, horses, sheep, swine and poultry obtained 963 awards, out of an exhibit of 1,847 animals, or 51 of our animals out of every hundred took prizes. Compare this with the United States exhibit. The United States exhibited 4,005 of these animals, and obtained only 1,494 awards, so that only 37 of their animals out of every hundred came to the front. This proves that if we had an open market for these products in that country we should have a large and lucrative trade. Sir, I take up now the subject of cheese. You all know that in her cheese exhibits Canada swept the board, that neither the United States nor any other country had any place. Canada took no less than 392 awards for cheese, and in some cases the excellence of this cheese was recorded at 99½ points, 100 being perfection. Suppose we had the American market for our cheese; suppose we had Chicago and Detroit and Buffalo and New York and Boston and other large cities to send our magnificent quality of cheese into, should we not be assured of a splendid market? Are not all the best products of every kind assured of a ready market in these cities, where there are rich people anxious to procure them, and willing to pay the price? One more department of industry: Canada stood 30 per cent higher in fruit than any other state or country. And what a magnificent market would be opened for our apples, our plums, our pears, and our peaches if freedom of trade were established, and we were able to ship our high class goods to purchasers in the United States. I must bring my remarks to a conclusion. I have given you, Mr. Speaker, twelve or thirteen reasons against the protective system; I have demonstrated that the present policy is a detriment to 90 per cent of our people, and that burdens are placed upon these in order to secure the prosperity and advancement of the few. Take the case of the Massey-Harris Company. Mr. Massey has accumulated great fortunes, which he is now giving away. I would like to ask in what business is it possible for a man in 20 years, without extraordinary profits, to amass wealth so great that he can give away fortunes right and left? It is the farmers' money that is being spent, and this money has been taken unfairly from the pockets of the farmers of the country. I am sorry the Government has not seen fit to promise us a great reduction of the tariff. I am sorry they have not promised us the wiping out of the protective principle to the extent of establishing the tariff upon a revenue basis with protection as an incident, rather than, as they are doing to-day, putting protection first with the object of revenue as merely incidental.

Mr. McMILLAN. Mr. Speaker, before this debate closes I would like to say a few words. I can cordially endorse the sentiments of the hon. gentleman who moved the resolution with reference to the Governor General. I am glad also to congratulate him upon the manner in which he presented his case to the House, for there is no doubt he had a very hard task. In some respects he seems to have been misinformed. For instance, he stated that our trade with the West Indies had been extended through the efforts of the Government in sending delegates to that country. I cannot believe the hon. gentleman has examined into the subject, otherwise he would surely never have made such a statement. Years ago when the late Hon. John Macdonald, the great merchant of Toronto, went down to the West Indies, we received from him a glowing account of the trade that could be established with that country. So when Mr. Adam Brown, of Hamilton, was sent down to those islands, we were told there was a large field there for the extension of Canadian trade. Again, when the Finance Minister came back from that country after having visited it at the expense of the people, we were assured that there were splendid opportunities there for the extension of our trade. How does that matter stand to-day? Why, Sir, in 1875 we had trade with the West Indies to the amount of $3,948,000, while in 1893 it amounted to only $3,145,000, a reduction of $800,000, and this notwithstanding that a large amount of money had been spent in the effort to increase the trade. We have had the Minister of Trade and Commerce lately visiting the Australian colonies. When he returned he spoke before the Board of Trade of Toronto, and gave a glowing account of what could be done in extending the trade of Canada with Australia. Let me ask what benefit it is going to be to those whose condition most needs to be improved at the present time, the farmers and workingmen of Canada, to extend our trade with the Australian colonies? Why, Sir, the Minister of Trade and Commerce himself stated that of $8,000,000 of stuff exported from the United States to Australia agricultural products made up only $63,000 of the amount, and the rest were the products of manufactories. Let me ask what benefit it will be to the farmers of this country to subsidize a line of steamers with a large sum of money in order to take agricultural implements from Canada to the Australian colonies? The only effect will be that, while the farmers will still have to pay the 35 per cent duty on their implements, their burdens will be increased in order that the manufacturers may be better able to place their goods upon the market in the Australian colonies. Why, Sir, I can remember when, some two or three years ago, the Finance Minister rose in his place in this House and stated that a large trade was being established in agricultural implements in the Australian colonies. He stated at that time that Mr. Massey alone had declared that he had established a trade of something like $300,000 a year with those colonies, and when the statement was challenged he still declared it to be accurate. Is that statement shown to be accurate in the light of events? Why, Sir, the whole value of our exports to the Australian colonies is only $208,000, and the agricultural implements sent from Canada to these colonies amounts to only something like $86,000. Now, Sir, let me, just for a moment, examine into the wealth of Canada, or more particularly, into the wealth of the province of Ontario, as we have not the means of ascertaining the agricultural wealth of the other provinces in the same manner as we have that of Ontario through the Bureau of Industries. I find, according to the census that was taken in 1891, that there were then 175,000 farmers in Ontario, who farmed 22,646,000 acres of land. The total value of their property, farm land, agricultural implements and farm stock, was $980,000,000. The average farm in Ontario, therefore, is 130 acres, and the total value of that average farm, including farm stock and implements, is $5,600. According to this census, what is the value of the property devoted to manufacturers in the province of Ontario? Sir, it is only $176,603,000, not one-fifth of the property owned by the agriculturists of this country. The Government tell us that they are going to revise the tariff, and the First Minister told us that he would make changes that would be beneficial to all classes; but, judging from other statements we have heard, those changes are all going to be in the direction of favouring those who are already, as the Government term it, in a prosperous condition, that is, the manufacturers. No favourable changes are to be made with respect to the agriculturists or the workingmen of this country, the tariff is not going to be reduced so far as they are concerned. Now, Sir, I was amused, as a farmer, when I heard the statement made that the Minister of Agriculture had gone up to the North-west, and after examining into the condition of things and into the depression that exists in that country, he then turned round and told the farmers that their salvation laid in changing their system and going into mixed farming. Nay, I was more amused when the First Minister told us that he would give them sound advice. It reminded me of a story I heard of a clergyman in my native land. In visiting amongst his parishioners, he went to a fisherman's hut, and proceeded to put him through his catechism. The clergyman found him not so well posted as he ought to be, and reprimanded him severely for not being better acquainted with theology. The fisherman said to him: "Will you allow me to put a single question to you?" "Oh, certainly," said the minister. "Will you tell me, then, how many hooks it will take to make a twelve-fathom line?" "Oh," says the minister, "that is entirely out of my line of business." "It is also entirely out of my line of business to study theology," returned the fisherman. Now, Sir, any man who is acquainted with the condition of the farmers in the North-west, must see that when these two gentlemen undertake to advise the farmer to go into mixed farming, they are talking of something that is entirely out of their line of business. The conditions of the North-west are not similar to those of the province of Ontario or to those of the lower provinces. We know that even if they were to go into mixed farming, they could not succeed, on account of the action of this Government in causing the United States Government to impose the McKinley tariff, for I hold that it was the action of the Canadian Government, to a considerable extent, that led to the McKinley tariff being enacted against Canada; because Mr. McKinley himself, when he made his speech in the House of Representatives, stated that they could not forget the action of the Canadian Government in returning to the tariff list of 1890 those goods they had removed under pressure in 1888. Even if the farmer of the North-west were to go into mixed farming and to raise barley, he could not get a paying price for it, because the United States market is closed to him—he can only take into the United States after paying a duty of 30 cents per bushel. We know that all the products of the North-west farmers are highly taxed before they can go into the United States. Hon. gentlemen may say that the farmers of the North-west can go into the raising of cattle. Why, Sir, let me tell you that the highest price the farmers of the North-west could get for their cattle last summer, the very best animals they could produce, was 2 cents to 2½ cents per pound, live weight. Let me tell the Minister of Agriculture, and the leader of the Government also, that the farmers of the North-west cannot go into mixed farming, as they are doing in Ontario. Although they can raise roots in abundance, they have not the facilities for handling these roots in the same manner we have; they cannot save them from frost and feed them in winter. Let me say that any individual who declared that the salvation of the North-west at present lies in a system of mixed farming, is speaking of something of which he is ignorant. I went over Manitoba and a good part of the North-west as far as Calgary, visiting Regina and Wolseley, and mingled a good deal amongst the farmers there, and although, before I left Ontario, I was of the opinion that they ought to go more into mixed farming, after going through that country, I soon found that I had been mistaken, and I became convinced that the farmers had been pursuing the best system they could possibly pursue in their own interests. Sir, the farmers in every country are, as a rule, the best judges of what system of farming they can profitably pursue. If the Minister of Agriculture, when he visited the farmers of the North-west, had told them that he was aware they were paying very large sums of money for their agricultural implements, and that he would endeavour to bring pressure to bear upon his colleagues in the Government in order to relieve them from that burden, he would have made a promise which, if fulfilled, would have been greatly to their interest. The settlers in Manitoba alone paid last year something over $600,000 in duties on goods going into that country, while, at the same time they only got a little over $400,000 as a subsidy from the Government. They had to pay close upon $2,000,000 altogether in duties and in tribute to the manufacturers; that is to say, $2 went into the pockets of the manufacturers for every dollar that went into the treasury of the country. I hold that grievous burdens are imposed upon the farmers in that country from one end of the land to the other. I was astonished at what I ascertained with respect to the trade of that country. When I went up there, I expected to find them deriving great benefits from the Canadian Pacific Railway, as, no doubt, they have in certain localities. When I went from Calgary to Edmonton, I said to several gentlemen that they must have been greatly benefited by the continuation of the Canadian Pacific Railway to Edmonton, and a merchant answered me, with a sneer: "Benefit! benefit! Before the Canadian Pacific Railway was built, we could get our goods freighted up from Calgary for 75 cents per hundred, paying half the freight in trade, and even the whole of it. Now I have got to pay 82 cents per hundred and the whole of the money goes out of the country." Such is the condition of things that the farmers in that country are labouring under. Now, there was another statement that the Minister of Agriculture made last session in the Senate Chamber. No doubt, he gave great cheer to the manufacturers of Canada when he showed them that between 1879 and 1883 there was a total of $8,240,000 of free goods brought into Canada. The Minister went on to say that they were continually increasing the free list to the benefit of the manufacturers; and between 1884 and 1888, $9,560,000 worth of goods came into Canada free of duty, which were in the interest of manufacturers; from 1888 to 1892 the amount of goods on the free list had increased to $13,167,000, all in the interest of the manufacturers of this country. He said that he had told them again and again: We have promised you that we will enlarge the free list in your favour just as rapidly as you will lay your plans before us. Now, what effect has this upon the farmers of the country? Sir, every article that is placed upon the free list, although it is entirely in the benefit of the manufacturers of this country, imposes an additional burden upon the workingmen and farmers, because the tariff must be increased and the revenue has got to be raised. The Minister of Agriculture told us that we paid $1.50 duties more last year per head than we had done for some years past; so that, ever since the introduction of the National Policy down to the present time, every revision of the tariff has steadily increased the burdens on the workingmen and the agricultural community of Canada. The Minister of Trade and Commerce, in a speech that he delivered last fall, stated that they intended to revise the tariff, and that in reality they had been continually revising the tariff since 1879 down to the present time. We know that in 1879 25 per cent was placed upon agricultural implements, and that rate of protection has gone up until it is now 35 per cent. For instance, we know that at first cotton prints were 28 per cent, and they are now 32½ per cent; that is an illustration of the way the tariff has been revised. There is a large number of articles upon the tariff list which ought to be removed in the interest of the farmers of this country. Sir, have the Minister of Finance and the committee who are revising the tariff, carefully examined the list that was prepared by the North-west Council, when they memorialized the Government to put a number of articles upon the free list? Let me enumerate some of the articles: Woollen hose, 10 cents per pound, and 30 per cent. On goods costing $4.87 per dozen, the duty is equal to 31 per cent, but on goods costing $1.22, the duty is 50½ per cent. On gray or unbleached cotton, costing 6 cents, the duty is 31½ per cent; on that costing 3 cents, the duty is 48½ per cent. On blankets, the duty is 10 cents per pound and 30 per cent. On those costing 49 cents per pound, the duty is 40 2-5 per cent, while on those costing 16 cents per pound, it is equal to 82 per cent. That is an example of the favour and sympathy which this Government extends to the workingman and to the farmer, especially to the farmers in the North-west, where these goods are required in large quantities; and that is the manner in which the tariff imposes burden after burden on the shoulders of the working classes. Let me state with regard to the duties on iron that it would have been a blessing to the farmers if there had not been a single pound of iron ore found in Canada. Why do I make this statement? I do so because the Government have placed a duty of $4 per ton on pig iron, and have given a bounty of $2 per ton on all pig iron manufactured in this country. Has this action encouraged the industry? By no means. The Government have also placed $2 per ton on scrap iron which comes here and is manufactured, thereby preventing our native iron being used to the extent which would otherwise be the case. It is clear that this system is a curse to the country, and that the farmers would have obtained their implements cheaper, and every other iron article cheaper if there had not been a superabundance of iron ore in this country; but the Government have framed a tariff, and imposed duties with the object of encouraging the iron industry, but which did not encourage it. No bonus should have been given for iron manufactured out of scrap, but only for that manufactured out of our native ores. That, however, is an example of the manner in which the Government have maintained monopolies, that is a fair sample of the way in which they are subsidizing the manufacturers. The shares of the cotton manufacturing companies are going up steadily in value, as are the shares in all other monopolies, while, at the same time, the value of farm property is steadily declining. Let me state once for all that unless the Government take active steps to relieve the people of the burdens imposed on them, their term of office will certainly not be a long one. Last session I warned hon. gentlemen opposite that a cloud was on the horizon, perhaps not bigger than a man's hand, which would overspread the heavens. That cloud has spread over the length and breadth of Ontario. The farmers and the Patrons of Industry—and I hold I am the representative of the Patrons on the floor of this House, although I do not belong to the organization—will not support the Government unless they make tariff reductions. Further east, it will also be found, that the Government cannot obtain the support of the Patrons unless the tariff is largely reduced. Let me state what occurred in New Brunswick. At a meeting of the St. John Board of Trade, held on February 7th, a committee on the tariff, presided over by the chairman of the Conservative party in that province, reported that the tariff must be reduced. From Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, and every other province, there is a similar report. I understand that the recent election in Nova Scotia was run almost entirely on the question of tariff reform. Are the people going to obtain from this Government that justice to the farming class which they demand? The hon. gentlemen opposite have no intention of granting it. When the committee representing the Government were travelling through the country, they would have allowed the farmers to have appeared before them and made plain statements, without an attempt being made to gainsay their utterances, if they had desired to extend justice to the agricultural class. Why did the members of that committee sit in secret conclave when they were hearing the manufacturers, while they heard the farmers in open meeting? It was done simply that those hon. gentlemen might be able to show how smart they were when they had a simple-hearted farmer to question regarding the working of the National Policy. I notice that certain resolutions were passed by the Manufacturers Association when they met the Minister of Trade and Commerce at Toronto. Let me quote a statement to show what they consider should be the fate of any one advocating a tariff reform measure, such as I am advocating to-day. I observe here an hon. gentleman who was at that meeting, and no doubt he concurred in the sentiment given utterance to with respect to anybody who would ask a reduction in the tariff. Mr. E. Gurney said that any man who went on the stump to advocate a change from the present policy to one which had no bottom in it, was nothing more than an anarchist, and the people would have to rise against anarchists and hang the lot. So the farmers of Ontario as a body will have to be hanged, and that will be found a difficult job, because they are all advocating tariff reduction, and not merely tariff reduction, but that this protective system shall be abolished. I heard the First Minister from his place no later than yesterday say that he had yet to hear the first statement made by any public man in the United States that the financial stringency had been at all brought about by the National Policy or the protective system. I will quote a statement by Congressman Bryant with regard to the effect of protection in the United States. It is as follows:—

Protection violates international law, human and divine, by prohibiting trade among the families of the men, thus denying the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man. It has driven industry to want, beggary and starvation; it has forced virtue, dressed in rags, to insanity; it has driven mothers with their infants at their breasts, from the cottage hearth, starving, into the winter's blast, and denied to the husband and father work necessary to support his family; it has made thousands of millionaires and millions of tramps, both a curse to society; it has filled the prisons with criminals and the churches with hypocrites; it has driven millions of honest labourers to the soup-houses, to be fed in the name of charity with the products of their own labour, out of which they were robbed; it makes merchandise of men, slaves of women, beggars of children and outcasts of all, and then retains power by bribery and fraud; it is the author of all the sweating system in the world, where women and children sweat blood to be coined into money to satisfy the greed of mammon, and it forges the promise of God into a lie, and we do see, the seed of the righteous "begging bread," the divine promise to the contrary notwithstanding.

There is no one but must admit that protection has had that effect to a great extent in this country. Will any man stand up and tell me that any Government could legislate in a manner to make rich the whole inhabitants of any country? I do not ask that any privileges should be granted to the farmers of this country, but I do ask that they shall be relieved of the burdens that have been unduly placed upon their shoulders. All that I ask is: That all classes of the community shall be placed in a position so as to reap the full rewards of their honest labour. I hold, Sir, that no farmer and no workman gets the full reward of his labour in a highly protected country such as Canada is. I hold that, to-day, the farmer for every purchase that he makes only gets $100 of goods when he spends $130 for them, and especially is that the case in the class of goods which is manufactured and sold to the people in this country. The Minister of Agriculture when he went to the North-west did not show to the people the true condition of affairs; but many of the people there know what that condition is, and the Government got a taste of what the North-west will do during the last election of Winnipeg, when my friend who sits behind (Mr. Martin) was returned as an opponent of theirs. That is only a sample of what the North-west will do when she gets the opportunity. She has lived on promise long enough, but she will not be fooled any longer. The farmers of the province of Ontario were fooled last election when the Government told them that they dissolved the House before the natural life of Parliament expired so that they might go before the people of this country, and have the authorization of a fresh Parliament, not a moribund Parliament, to proceed to Washington to discuss reciprocity, as the United States Government had solicited such a conference. We all know the humility that the people of Canada felt when one individual high in office had afterwards to go to Washington, and upon his marrow-bones take back the statements spread in Canada that the United States Government had asked for reciprocity. I was astonished last summer, when at Clinton, I heard the First Minister state on the stump that when the Ministers went to Washington they offered reciprocity not only in natural products, but that they offered a list of manufactured goods as well. I had in my pocket the address of the President of the United States, sent in reply to a resolution from the Senate, to give a statement of what took place at the conference, and I took the opportunity of showing it to some of the Conservatives at that meeting, not five minutes afterwards the First Minister had made his statement. I was astonished that he would try to humbug the people and to impose on their ignorance and credulity in such a manner. That is what is being done by the Government all over the land, and the time is fast approaching when the Government will have to answer for it all. The Minister of Agriculture has told the people that the country is in a prosperous condition. The Controller of Customs and the Controller of Inland Revenue both tell us that the country is prosperous. From their standpoint, from the late augmentation of their finances annually, there is no doubt that they may feel that the country is in a prosperous condition. Five thousand dollars a year, besides their indemnity, going into his pockets, would make any man feel that a country was prosperous that could go on increasing its officials and officers and still further burdening the people with taxation. The people thought that this Government was going to be economic, and they asked me what this meant. They also asked me what was the meaning of a Bill which was brought into the House last year appointing a Civil Service Commission. They asked me if that commission was to be permanent and if there were to be any salaries? Why, Sir, they were astonished when I told them that there were two officials at $300 a year, and one at $1,250 a year, and his salary was to be increased until it reached $1,500. When I was asked what the duties were I was stuck. I could not tell. I never heard it explained, and the only explanation that I could give was, that it was providing a good fat berth for some of the supporters of the Government, and that they were going to follow that up, because they were in a position that they required all the support that they could possibly get. I do not know that I am going to say a great deal more at the present time, but I do say that the farmers of this country begin to understand this tariff. When the National Policy was introduced in 1879, many of them believed that the tariff would be a benefit, and they believed the utterances of the then First Minister: that the agricultural industry would be improved, that the country would consume all its own surplus products, and that all those tall chimneys which we heard so graphically described, would be towering throughout the whole land. But, Sir, we find that such has not been the case. We find that the manufacturing industries have not spread to any great extent. When the people of Seaforth saw in the last census returns the number of manufacturing industries in that town, they asked me to point them out, but no one, even though he had lived in the town since the first building was erected in it, was capable of doing that until such time as the report went back with the names of the individuals and the industries. And then, what a farce to see such industries pictured as if they were really industries that had been brought into existence by the National Policy. Let me say that the farmers of this country are a class of individuals that require no favours. We have been told that the farmers want to shirk the just incidents of taxation that ought to be imposed upon their shoulders. That is not the case. As I have said, the farmers ask no favours. All they want is that the Government shall remove the burdens that they have placed unduly upon their shoulders, and that they will give such legislation as will enable the farmer and the pioneer in this new country to reap the full rewards of his own labour without providing that a large part of the profits of their toil shall go into the pockets of the manufacturers of this country, and that the earners shall derive no profit from it whatever; but that, on the contrary, they—as I heard a farmer say—are to be made the subjects of insult and injury wherever the opportunity is presented.

Mr. CHARLTON. Mr. Speaker, I do not rise to participate at any length in the debate that is now in progress. In that respect I shall imitate the example set by the Government. I am surprised, however—I cannot help expressing surprise—that the members of the Government, and the supporters of the Government, should allow the speeches that have been made on this side of the House, the arraignment that has been made of their policy, the attacks that have been made upon them, to go by default. I cannot help expressing surprise that the Government should sit meekly, and permit these assaults to be made without the slightest rejoinder. Silence is said to give consent, and certainly we may infer from the attitude of the Government that their case is a bad one, and that they have very little to say in answer to the charges made against them. I rise for the purpose of making reference to one point only; one point that has been alluded to in this debate, a point that was brought up in the question put by the leader of the Opposition in the House this afternoon, and that point is the matter referring to the French treaty. That treaty has now been awaiting ratification from this Government for a period of more than a year, and we would like very much to know what the policy of the Government is. When we ask that question from the Government, however, we are probably asking more than they know themselves. It would seem, from their attitude, and from their conduct throughout, that this is a problem that they are incapable of grappling with. It is not a very important treaty. The Minister of Justice very happily characterized it the other night as being a "little French treaty." It is a little French treaty, involving interests of no very great importance, and yet I repeat, Sir, that the Government seem unable to give to the country the policy which they intend to pursue upon this question, and, in fact, they seem to be uncertain in their own minds as to what they shall do. I think, that for the sake of consistency and for the sake of self-respect, the Government should place themselves in a position whereby the people would know what their policy is to be on this question, and they should at once announce what they intend to do. No doubt they are surrounded by many difficulties. They have on the one hand, the opposition that evidently is an overwhelming one from the public with regard to the ratification of this treaty. On the other hand, it is intimated—I do not know with how good a foundation—that pressure has been brought to bear upon them in certain high quarters. It is asserted that the High Commissioner for Canada has taken them by the throat and demanded that this treaty be ratified; that he pins his reputation to this treaty; and that if the treaty is not ratified he will become an enemy of the Government. It is represented that a relative of the High Commissioner, an hon. gentleman who is a member of this House and a member of the Government, and who is a loyal son of the High Commissioner, has also threatened resignation, and threatened to make all the trouble that he possibly can for the Government, if the demands of his father are not acceded to, and his reputation maintained, so far as it can be, by the ratification of this treaty. Now, Sir, the country and the press are talking about these things, and in this matter the Government occupy a humiliating position. They are accused of vacillation; they are accused of indecision, of lacking the courage to come to a decision. It is said that they feel loath to ratify the treaty. Why do they not express their views and set the public mind at rest with regard to this question? Now, Mr. Speaker, the Opposition has always been generous and forbearing enough to come to the rescue of the Government when it has been necessary to do so to save the honour of Canada—and the honour of Canada is somewhat bound up and imperilled in this matter by the action of the Government. I would therefore suggest to the Government that they take the course which they have pursued on other occasions when difficult questions have demanded solution and they have felt unable to grapple with them. They have a remedy, a remedy which they have themselves invented, and which might be applied to this case as well as to the case of prohibition and the case of the Caron charges. Let them refer the French treaty to a royal commission, and they can easily arrange the matter in such a way that the decision of that commission shall not be made this century if necessary. In that way they could bring their difficulties to an end; the French treaty question would be disposed of, and they would avoid the decision of the question which some day they will have to make unless they refer it to a royal commission. If my hon. friend, the leader of the Government, will take into consideration this proposition and appoint a royal commission to settle this difficulty, it is not likely that the question will again trouble him so long as he is in office. I think I may most unhesitatingly commend this solution of the difficulty to the hon. gentleman. He will then dispose of the threats of the High Commissioner; he will dispose of the insubordination of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries; and he will dispose of all the conflicting elements of his party, asking for and contending against the ratification of this treaty. He will then get the question set at rest, so that it will not rise like Banquo's ghost to disturb him in his slumbers as it now does.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). It is not my intention, Sir, to trouble the House but for a few moments on the subject of this Speech. I think it would have been satisfactory to the House, and would have greatly facilitated the work of the session, if the hon. gentlemen on the other side had undertaken to defend the various propositions which they have put forward in the Speech. They have in some degree challenged the Opposition to consider several propositions, which, after that challenge has been accepted, they have themselves resiled from defending. Now, Sir, the Government have told us in this Speech that the country is in a prosperous condition. It has been pointed out that that is not an accurate statement—that the country is far from being prosperous; that many classes of the population, particularly the mercantile and agricultural classes, are suffering at the present time from serious financial embarrassment; that the income of the agricultural population has largely diminished; that greatly as it had diminished during previous years, it has during the past year, since the House was in session before, diminished at least 40 per cent. Now, Sir, the Opposition were ready to consider and controvert the propositions put in the mouth of His Excellency. But hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches do not appear disposed to defend what they have here stated. The hon. gentlemen have told us, in a series of speeches extending over the past fifteen years, that they had altered the tariff in such a way as to contribute to the prosperity of the country; in fact, they proposed to prevent a condition of depression and distress; and now, after they have from time to time legislated with the view of correcting the mistakes which they said were in the tariff, and which it was impossible that men could avoid, however perfect their information might be, the hon. First Minister informs us that no one possessed of common sense would undertake to declare that a Government could by its legislation make the country prosperous. Why, Sir, we had a very different story told us. We had a declaration that the voices of a distressed population had come from every part of the country to a former Prime Minister, crying, "Come over and help us out of the difficulty and distress in which we are." The hon. gentleman has also put into this Speech the declaration that the land laws of the North-west require amendment; yet neither the mover nor the seconder of the Address, nor the hon. First Minister himself, has told us in what respect these laws are defective or in what respect they require amendment. The hon. gentleman has also put in His Excellency's mouth the declaration that the Indian Act is defective and requires amendment, but in what respect it requires amendment we are up to this moment left in the dark. And we are asked to vote an Address in reply to the Speech, which will echo everything contained in the Speech, though hon. gentlemen opposite have not up to the present moment given us the slightest information on these subjects. The hon. leader of the Government requires a great deal of his followers on this occasion. He requires them to affirm what he has put in this Address, while he withholds from them the information to enable them to say whether what he has put there is correct or proper in any particular. Now, Sir, it appears to me that, when the Governor General is meeting Parliament for the first time, nothing should be put in the Speech which is not in point of law accurate; and yet—and I suppose the hon. First Minister, as the Minister of Justice, is responsible for this—I find it stated here that His Excellency the Governor General is the Viceroy of Her Majesty. Now, Sir, we know right well that that is a mistake. We know that in the British empire there may be but two persons holding that position. The one is the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, the other the Governor General of India. Prior to 1876, when India became an empire, and the Queen's proclamation was issued, the Governor General of India was not a Viceroy, and Lord Canning was declared by the Queen's proclamation, in November, 1858, to be the first Viceroy of England who ruled in British India. We know the origin. Every one acquainted with the history of Ireland knows that before the time of Henry VIII. Ireland was a Lordship, and that the representative of the Sovereign there was called the Lord Deputy or Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, and it was not until after that period that the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland became a Viceroy. This subject has frequently been before the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. Let me call the attention of the House to some of the cases. In the case of Hill vs. Bigge, Lord Brougham, who gave the decision, said:

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell).

If it is said that the Governor of a colony is quasi sovereign, the answer is that he does not even represent the sovereign generally, having only the functions delegated to him by the terms of his commission, and being only the officer to execute the specific powers with which that commission clothes him.

And so we find, in the case of Cameron against Kyte, where the decision of the Judicial Committee was delivered by Baron Parke, that Baron Parke said:

If a governor had, by virtue of that appointment the whole sovereignty of the colony delegated to him as a viceroy and represented the king in the government of that colony, there would be good reason to contend that an act of sovereignty done by him would be valid and obligatory upon the subject living within his government.

And so on, and then he goes on to say that that is not the position of a Governor, because a Governor derives his authority from his commission. He is not intrusted with all the powers belonging to the Sovereign, and therefore is an executive officer, whose executive duties are defined and limited by the commission which he has received, and the instructions which are from time to time given to him. I see, in the case of Musgrove vs. Pulido, there is exactly the same doctrine laid down by Sir Montague Smith, in which it is said:

It is apparent from these authorities that the Governor of a colony (in ordinary cases) cannot be regarded as a viceroy; nor can it be assumed that he possesses general sovereign power. His authority is derived from his commission, and limited to the powers thereby expressly or impliedly entrusted to him.

I am not going into a discussion of this question, because every one who has considered the subject knows that His Excellency is not a Viceroy. His Excellency is a Governor General. He is intrusted with the executive powers, to the extent mentioned in the Commission, which are necessarily conferred upon him in consequence of the provisions of the British North America Act. He is no more a Viceroy than a Lieutenant-Governor, and a Lieutenant-Governor represents Her Majesty. He is clothed with certain powers, as an executive officer representing Her Majesty, but he is not clothed with all the powers that belong to a Sovereign. He is possessed of limited powers, and, that being the case, is not a Viceroy. Two things are necessary to make him such. The one is that a regular Government shall exist under his authority, and the other is that all the powers belonging to the sovereign who is at the head of that Government shall, for the time being, be intrusted to him. I merely mention this because the expression is introduced into the speech of His Excellency to Parliament for the first time, and it is just as well that no mistake should be made upon the subject. But leaving that aside altogether, what is important is to consider what are the measures of practical consequence which the Government propose to bring down. Now, the first and most important is the revision of the tariff, and yet the Government, up to this hour, have not given to the House the slightest information on the subject. Why, we have had for a long series of years the declaration, on the part of Ministers of the Crown, that the tariff was put upon a sound and proper economic basis in 1879—that all the revision the tariff required was that which experience would suggest of a minor character, and which necessarily sprung from the imperfections existing in subordinate matters with which the Ministry could not be supposed to be acquainted—but that these were from time to time corrected and the tariff more and more improved, until we find that since we were here last the Government have sent members of the ministry all over the country to inquire what was wrong with the tariff. This measure, which has been under the consideration of the Government for fifteen years, which has been revised by them, about which they have received almost every month in every year deputations pointing out defects and asking for changes—after discussing this measure in some thirteen sessions, they sent a commission all over the country, and now we are informed by His Excellency—that if this paragraph means anything—notwithstanding all these provisions and all this care, the tariff is so imperfect that now it must undergo radical changes—that the machine has been improved until it is no longer practical and workable, that the country will not have it, and says it is necessary to make it something very different. I think we are entitled to have some statement of the Minister of what the changes, in general outline, were which he intended to make. We do not call for a discussion of the changes in detail; we shall have that when the Budget comes down, but when the hon. gentleman thought proper to put a paragraph like that into the Governor's speech, we require some general exposition of what the Government meant by this paragraph, either from a Minister of the Crown or from one of the hon. gentlemen who were asked to move and second the Address. Then the Government has put in a paragraph congratulating the country on its good fortune in the matter of the Behring Sea dispute, as disposed of by the arbitration at Paris. It seems to me that, so far as the questions of public law are concerned, there could not be very much room for very wide difference of opinion. A more untenable position than that taken by our neighbours across the border upon a public question could not well have been taken, and so if we had had a decision upon that question we would have had the declaration that our American neighbours were in the wrong, and from such decision there would naturally have flowed the rights of redress which the existence of that wrong would have suggested. But, what has happened at this Paris arbitration? Why, simply this: Our friends on the other side of the House have said to the American Government, in effect: Your contention was all wrong; you have committed trespass upon the high sea; you have violated our rights of person and property; but it is very important that this fact should be made clear and that what you have done should be hereafter made a proper and legal proceeding. Now what has been done, in effect? Formerly, when the Canadian sealer went out upon the Pacific ocean to engage in the business of seal-catching, he was within his rights, notwithstanding the violent conduct on the part of the United States. To-day, if he goes out for such a purpose, regulations having been made, and being now in force, he is a wrong-doer; and the rules which the United States undertook to enforce illegally against him, may be legally enforced against him from this time forward. We have got nothing except the barren declaration that our seal-catchers were acting within their rights. The American Government has gained this—that hereafter, if our seal catchers undertake to do what they have done before, they will be trespassers against the regulation of public law, so far as the citizens of the two countries are concerned, and will be liable to punishment for their wrong-doing. You make the conduct of the Canadians, as it has been in the past, illegal for the future; and you make the arbitrary proceedings of the United States legal and proper proceedings against those who were legitimately pursuing a legitimate calling. There is another matter. I think this House was entitled to a declaration of what the Government intended to do on the subject of the French treaty. This treaty, it is true, is a little affair. No great public interest is involved in it; but it is extremely vexatious. If it were put into operation, it would give a great deal of trouble without conferring any special advantage upon any portion of the community. Now, what do the Government propose to do with it? They have had something like twelve months to consider this question. When the House prorogued at the end of last session, the Government were not sure what they ought to do ; in fact, they were in as great a difficulty as Lord Dundreary ever was in. But we have met again, and we thought that by this time, after the lapse of twelve months, the Government would have known what course it ought to take. But we meet them here, and we find that they are as undecided as they were when Parliament prorogued nearly a year ago. Now, Sir, I think we are entitled to know what the Government intend to do, because, after all, the Administration are but the servants of Parliament as well as the servants of the Crown. I say we are entitled to know what they intend to do with regard to a question, such as this, affecting the material well-being of the country, yet up to this moment the Government are not prepared to tell us. Why, Mr. Speaker, we had a declaration from, I think it was the Finance Minister, yesterday, that a deputation, or two deputations, were expected to come to Ottawa to present their views to the Government on this subject, and that the Government must hear these deputations before they would know what they were going to do with regard to the French treaty. Well, Sir, we thought the period for deputations on this question was over, that the time for deliberation had gone by, and the time for action had come. But, we were mistaken, and so on this very great question of the French treaty, the Government have not yet made up their mind, they have not yet solved the difficulty, and so they are unable to tell Parliament what is to happen with regard to it. Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not propose further to claim the attention of the House on these matters. But it seemed to me a subject affording good ground of complaint that we should have put before us a statement of this sort without the necessary information to make that statement intelligible, that the majority of this House should be expected to support a Speech from the Throne without having sufficient information to know whether they ought or ought not to approve of many of the matters therein referred to.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I ask the indulgence of the House, having spoken already, for the purpose of making an explanation upon one point which the hon. gentleman has touched upon, the phrase in the Speech from the Throne concerning His Excellency being "Her Majesty's Viceroy and Representative." I have simply to say, Sir, that it has been exceedingly common in this country, for the last twenty years, at least, to refer to the Governor General of Canada as Her Majesty's Viceroy, in consequence of the close analogy which exists—which, I submit, does exist, notwithstanding the hon. gentleman's contention to the contrary—between the functions discharged for Canada by the Governor General for the time being, and the functions discharged by a Viceroy. I need not labour the analogy at all, though I think there is a very strong analogy, because the use of that term in the past has by no means determined the accuracy of the expression. It is not necessary, in order to demonstrate this, to show that there is no substantial difference between the functions of the two officers ; I think there is no substantial difference. It is sufficient, in order to refute the exact legal accuracy of the expression, to show that the one is named by Her Majesty to be a Viceroy, and the other named to be a Governor General. But, Sir, as I said before, nothing has been more common in this country than for us to apply that mode of expression to His Excellency ; and, if the House will allow me, I will show that even from so high an authority as the Governor General, for the time being, himself, even from so high an authority as Lord Dufferin, for instance, the expression was used with reference to the Governor General on more than one occasion. For instance, on page 432 of the history of Lord Dufferin's administration in Canada, we find that Lord Dufferin made a speech to the mayor of Quebec, and others, in which he used this expression in speaking of his predecessors. He said :

Viceroy after Viceroy has appealed to your patience, your fortitude, your charity, your patriotism, and never once, whether in good fortune or ill-fortune, as your history tells us, has the appeal been made in vain.

So His Excellency went on to make an appeal for forbearance on his own behalf. Then again on page 730 of the same volume, in the course of another speech, His Excellency used this expression :

When I resign the temporary Vice-Royalty with which I have been invested, into the hands of my Sovereign, I shall be able to assure her that not a leaf has fallen from her maple chaplet, that the lustre of no jewel in her trans-Atlantic diadem has been dimmed.

On page 776 of the same, he refers to the previous administrations of Governors General, and speaks of The semi-feudal splendours of your early Viceroy.

On page 800 of the same, His Excellency makes another appeal for forbearance, and in giving a parting advice to the people of this great country, he says :

Yet perhaps a Viceroy in extremis might claim exceptional indulgence.

I would suppose that all that might be well answered by the hon. gentleman's remark that while the language was metaphorical it was not legally exact as designating the particular office which His Excellency held, notwithstanding that it has been the custom of our people to refer to His Excellency as the Viceroy, and the custom of our press also. But I appeal to the hon.

gentleman that he is not in a position to tell me that the language of Lord Dufferin, which I have just quoted, was inaccurate, at least so inexact that it should not be found in a Speech from the Throne; because I turn to the speech in which His Excellency took leave of the Parliament of Canada and read language put into his mouth by the hon. member for Bothwell himself, in which these words occur:

My interest in Canada shall not cease when my mission as Her Majesty's Viceroy shall have terminated.

It being Six o'clock the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. MARTIN. Just before the House rose at Six o'clock, the First Minister conceived that he had found an answer to a point raised by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), and asked the special indulgence of the House that he might speak the second time upon the question, and that he might give this House an answer to that point. Are we to infer from that circumstance that hon. gentlemen on the opposite side have no answer whatever to make to the very serious arraignment made against their policy by hon. gentlemen on this side of the House? Indeed, when we come to examine the answer which seems so conclusive to the First Minister upon the point in question, it amounts to this: He admits that the point raised by the hon. member for Bothwell is perfectly correct, but his answer is, and from his own standpoint he deems it a conclusive answer, that once upon a time the Liberals made a similar mistake. Now, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that when the Liberals come into power in this country and their policy is attacked, if by any chance it should happen to be wrong, it will be an exceedingly easy matter for them to defend themselves by similar logic, because I can fancy no error in legislation, no mistake in public policy which it would be possible for the Liberals in power to fall into, as to which they cannot find ample justification in the misdeeds of hon. gentlemen opposite. Now, Sir, previous speakers have referred to the question of the French Treaty, which the hon. the First Minister considers a very small matter. I am not sure, Mr. Speaker, that my presence in the House this evening is not in some degree, at all events, connected with this exceedingly small matter. The hon. gentleman who preceded me, as representative of the city of Winnipeg, gave his explanations to his constituents of the reasons which induced him to take the rather unusual course of resigning his seat in the House, which he did, and I fancy I am casting no reflection upon that gentleman in suggesting, that possibly, inheriting as he does some of the cunning for which his distinguished father was celebrated, he possibly has found it necessary not to give to the public all the reasons which induced him to take that course. As has been pointed out by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), the distinguished gentleman who brought into being this exceedingly small treaty, has a representative in this House and a representative in this Government, and representatives who are exceedingly closely connected with the gentleman who preceded me as the representative of Winnipeg, and it has been more than hinted that the failure of the hon. gentlemen opposite to ratify the treaty negotiated by the High Commissioner was not agreeable to the business associates of my predecessor, and that was one of the very strong reasons which induced him to vacate his seat. I have listened with much interest to the remarks of the hon. First Minister in connection with the policy of the Government as announced in the Speech from the Throne. The hon. leader of the Opposition made the statement that it was an unwritten law of this House that Parliament should be called together in the month of January. The hon. First Minister was able to meet that statement in a conclusive manner, not by showing that the Liberals when in power had called the House in the month of March, but by showing that his Administration and that of his immediate predecessors had been guilty of great delay in convening Parliament, and that during the last twelve years six at least of the sessions had been called later than the present one, and the hon. gentleman appeared to think that was a conclusive answer and wiped away the law which the leader of the Opposition stated had become an unwritten one. It seems to me that if logic of that kind is a sufficient answer to charges of that nature and is sufficient to wipe out of existence a law which had sprung up from years of usage, the hon. gentleman can meet almost any argument in that way. We in Canada are in danger of losing many of the great principles which are supposed to underlie the legislation of this country, if those principles are to disappear merely from the bad practices of hon. gentlemen opposite. It is a principle of the constitution that members of this House shall be elected by the people of the Dominion. The hon. gentlemen opposite have endeavoured most successfully to violate that principle, to enact a law in which the members in this House will not represent the constituencies which are carved out for them in the Representation Act—I refer to the Franchise Act, which gives to the large railway corporations, that have the ability to carry large numbers of the electors from point to point, the power of electing members to this House, instead of such power being in the electors of each constituency. Again, in such respect the hon. First Minister can show by the same relentless logic that the fundamental principle which presupposes that the House is a fair representative of the feeling of Canada, also has been to a large extent done away with by those Acts of Parliament ordinarily called Gerrymander Acts, under the operation of which the members in this House do not by any fair arithmetical calculation represent the feelings of the people of Canada. Another principle of which we are all proud, and which we all suppose was firmly implanted in our Government and in our constitution, was the pure, unsullied administration of justice in this Dominion. We have been wont to pride ourselves, when comparing Canada with the country at the south of us, upon our difference in that respect, at least from many parts of the United States. While it is possible, I am sorry to say, to cast the most serious reflections upon the administration of justice in many portions of the United States, particularly in the large cities, it has in the past been the pride of Canadians to point out that here at least justice was pure and unsullied, that no matter how much we might disagree and how bitter our conflicts might be on political questions, we were all united in upholding the purity of the Bench, and in upholding the Minister of Justice of the day in dealing out even-handed justice to the criminals of Canada. Again, the hon. gentleman can show that by the practices, not of his predecessors, but of himself and his own Government, this principle bids fair to disappear, or if not to disappear, to become materially weakened. The hon. gentleman has been able to make for himself a name as being stern as adamant when a criminal came before him and asked for pardon, and as giving to each case the most careful attention, and taking every pains to see that justice was administered sternly and that pity had very little place in dealing with those matters. In that respect the administration by the hon. gentleman of the important Department of Justice has met with the approval of the people, and I regret very much indeed that within the past few weeks the hon. gentleman's record has been so seriously broken in that respect. The hon. gentleman has shown that while he was prepared to deal with the ordinary criminal in that manner, a kind of criminal has come before him who requires different treatment and special consideration. And why? Because those criminals were of such a nature and were possessed of such information that they were dangerous to the hon. gentleman and to his Government. While the hon. gentleman was prepared to defend the people of Canada from any trouble in connection with murderers, robbers and thieves of the ordinary kind, yet when it came to a question which might endanger him in his possession of power and endanger the seats more especially of certain colleagues, he was able with that ingenuity for which he has become celebrated, to find reasons and arguments why justice in that case should be perverted and pursue a different line. And what, Mr. Speaker, is the argument? I have alluded to two kinds of arguments which the hon. gentleman has produced here for our consideration. One is: that if his Government is arraigned for a mistaken policy it is a sufficient answer to show that the Liberals have made a similar mistake; another is: that if his Government is arraigned for a certain policy, it is still more clearly sufficient for him to show that his Government and his predecessors in office have made the same mistake. There is a third kind of argument, a new principle of criminal law which he adduces. The hon. gentleman introduced his criminal code too soon; he should have waited until this new principle could have been incorporated therein: the principle that if imprisonment turns out to be bad for the health of an unfortunate criminal he is entitled to his release. I would remind the hon. gentleman that within the past few days another criminal, similar in nature to Mr. Connolly and Mr. McGreevy, has fallen into the toils of the law, and has been convicted of a serious crime, the crime of perjury, and I would point out that in this manner I expect for my province the same kind of justice as is administered in the province of Ontario. There is one thing that we are strong upon in Manitoba, and that is provincial rights, and if it is proper and right in the province of Ontario to release a criminal because there are other criminals behind him who should be there also, then I say that Mr. Chamberlain, who has been convicted of perjury in connection with the election in Winnipeg, would be able, if that is a correct principle, to produce superiors to him and men back of him who are really responsible for the serious crimes he has committed. Now, Mr. Speaker, after excusing the long delay in calling the session with the kind of argument to which I have alluded, the hon. First Minister tells us that he has waited thus long in order that he might know what to do with the Canadian tariff, through the action of the American people in connection with their tariff. The hon. gentleman gave us very meagre explanations of the policy of the Government in connection with this great question. Speakers on this side of the House have been urging the Government to give some more definite explanations of the reasons which have induced them to announce their adherence to the policy of protection. Having waited as they have done for so many months in order to learn what the American people were going to do with this question, the Government should be ready to tell us now what they will do. I am not sure, that it was not a natural position for them to take, because having departed in trade matters from the policy of the great nation of which we are a part, and having adopted the trade policy of the Yankees, for whom they profess so little esteem, it was natural indeed that they should look to their masters in the art of protection to know what was to be done under the circumstances. But, Sir, while they have in years past sat at the feet of the Congress of the United States in connection with the trade question, I would ask them what advantage there has been to them, and what advantage there has been to Canada in their waiting these two or three months? Have they followed in the footsteps of their friends to the south? Have they learned any reasons from them in that respect? If they had so learned, instead of coming here to-day and announcing that they stood by the policy of protection, they would have followed the example of that great nation, and say: We have disregarded the principle of protection; we are now prepared to adopt a revenue tariff. Hon. gentlemen opposite laugh at that statement. The Democratic party went to the country upon a clear and definite issue. They said that a protective policy was a legalized robbery, a system which made the rich richer, and the poor poorer, and with the definite policy in their hand, appealing to the electorate of that great country, they were returned to power with an enormous majority. Hon. gentlemen opposite seek to screen themselves from following the American people in this connection, because Congress has failed to carry out the full mandate of the people; but if the Congress has failed to carry out the full mandate of the people, is that any reason why, if they are prepared to follow the American people in their dealing with this great question, they should not rather have followed the wishes and desires of the rank and file of the American people, the great producing classes, the farmer, the mechanic, the labourer; or is it rather better that they should follow the weakness of the Congress of the United States, and seek to still fasten upon Canada the policy of protection? The hon. the First Minister, in answer to the leader of the Opposition, stated that no public man in the United States had attempted to say that the hard times, the serious depression now afflicting that country, was attributable to the protective policy. I might delay this House at very considerable length in quoting from public men in the United States to show what was their position with regard to this question. I shall content myself with referring to two. The Hon. James B. McCreary, speaking in the House of Representatives, puts the matter in this way:

The marvellous prosperity which, according to Republican prophecy, was certain to follow the McKinley Act in 1890, proved to be a mirage full of disaster and distress. Like the apples of Sodom which turned to ashes on the lips, the fruits of the great Protection Act have been unsatisfactory, disappointing and disastrous to the people. Stagnated trade, reduced values, closed factories, failing banks, mortgaged farms, unemployed labour, suffering people and a depleted treasury, are some of the fruits of the law which we were told would be a blessing and a boon to all classes and all sections of our common country.

Again, the Hon. Claude E. Swanson, another member of Congress, refers to it in this way:

For over thirty years, under the pernicious system of a protective tariff, inaugurated and perpetuated by the Republican party, has the Government been unjustly and unfairly controlling the distribution of wealth. For the last thirty years this country has made marvellous strides in the increase of wealth. It has increased its wealth from $16,000,000,000 in 1860 to about $63,000,000,000 now. Never before in its history of the people have the people been more frugal, more energetic, more persevering, and more toiling. Never before has their labour produced more bountiful and abundant crops. But all this increase of wealth and production has been, not for the benefit of the great toiling masses, but for the favoured few to whom, under the operation of this pernicious tariff system, the Government has made the distributions. So flagrantly unfair and unjust has been this distribution under it that it is estimated that half of the wealth of this vast country is now owned by less than 40,000 people. Under the operation of this system stupendous fortunes have been created with a surprising rapidity. This system has created millionaires whose wealths exceed that of great and sovereign states. While it has brought abundant wealth to the few, it has brought poverty, distress, and want to the many. It has brought the farmer, labourer and mechanic to the verge of bankruptcy and despair. It has taken the earnings of the farmer and labourer and with them enriched the capitalist and manufacturer. It has reduced what the farmer has to sell far below the cost of production, and enhanced what he has to buy 50 per cent above its natural price. It has created the millionaire and the tramp. Under its disastrous effects the agricultural interest of the country over is practically paralyzed and destroyed. Imagination cannot conceive, reason cannot calculate the vast sums of money which this system has taken from the pockets of the farmer and labourer and placed into those of the manufacturer and capitalist. * *

* * * * * These dry figures tell us a story of wrong, deprivation, and robbery surpassing anything furnished by the annals of history. The great Napoleon in his wild career of victory and conquest never extorted from the vanquished nations which lay prostrate at his feet one-fifth as much as this Government through republican legislation has extorted from its own toiling citizens for the enrichment of its favourites. In these dry figures can be read the cause of the want, wretchedness, and despair of the great masses of the citizens to-day. They stand powerless and helpless under the immense and appalling burden which their own government has imposed upon them.

Mr. Speaker, if you apply these same words to Canada, they are true—not to the same extent in Canada, but why? Because Canada has not gone the full length in the line of protection that the United States has done and that has been its great safety in this matter. The hon. gentleman seemed to think that it was a conclusive proof that the Americans had not decided to do away with the pernicious principle of protection, that Congress was overwhelmed with deputations of distressed manufacturers opposing the lowering of the tariff on the respective articles in which they were interested. I must admit, Mr. Speaker, if that is to be taken as a conclusive reason why protection, either in the United States or in Canada, should be abolished, that never at any time can we hope to abolish it, because, as has been pointed out, the manufacturers of Canada not only availed themselves of the opportunities that were given to them by the travelling inspectors of the Government, to show why the tariff should not be reduced, but came down here in hordes to prevent the Government giving, as they had given, some reason to suppose that they intended to do something to relieve the country of its burdens. In this respect, I was somewhat amused by the hon. First Minister's reference to an interview which is said to have taken place between some of those rapacious manufacturers and the hon. member for South Oxford, in which that hon. gentleman told them that they should go to the father of all evil. Well, I must say, Mr. Speaker, that those manufacturers seemed to have had a great deal of confidence in the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright); for, if we are to believe the statements of the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), in the speeches that he is making throughout the country, they seem to have at once taken the advice of the hon. member and gone to the father of all evil, as represented by the great statesman across the way, then in search of a job, and they seem to have received that consolation from the father of all evil, as represented by the hon. gentleman, which the hon. member for South Oxford refused to give them. Now, allusion has been made in this debate to the journeys which took place during the recess by the members of this Government, who in this matter seem to take this position: We have not any particular views ourselves; at one time we were free traders, we adopted—as the hon. member for North Simcoe, then in their ranks, and perhaps as well acquainted with the motives under which they acted as any of them, has told us—we adopted protection, because we were led to believe that it might result in our return to power, not because we had any particular faith in the doctrines of protection; and to-day we are quite liberal in this matter: we would be prepared, if it were necessary to our salvation, to again profess the doctrines of free trade, and give to the people of the country the relief they are asking for; provided always that we were quite sure that the result in which we are most deeply interested, of our remaining in our places, would thereby be arrived at. And for that purpose, in order to investigate thoroughly the position of affairs, hon. gentlemen sent deputations of their number throughout the country; and even the small province from which I come was not neglected, and in course of time we had a visit, a very friendly visit, from the hon.

Mr. MARTIN.

Minister of Finance and the hon. Minister of Agriculture. Reference has already been made to the fact that the distinguished Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Angers), and I may add his colleague, the Minister of Finance, are able, from their superior knowledge of the principles underlying the great science of agriculture, to give to the farmers of the Northwest, who are, comparatively speaking, new to the thing—who are not as yet masters of the principles of that science—very valuable information and instructions as to how they can overcome the difficulties and evils in their way. The hon. the First Minister seems to take issue somewhat with the delegation, because he tells us that there are no evils in the way but that the people of Canada are quite prosperous and contented. However, his colleagues seem to have found some evidence in contradiction of that statement when they came as far as our province; and the Minister of Agriculture told our people that if they would only engage in mixed farming all their difficulties would disappear. He seems to have been so pleased indeed with this panacea, which he discovered in his pursuit of the science of agriculture in the library adjoining this House, that when he found himself in the neighbouring province of British Columbia, addressing a meeting there in a mining camp, he said: No doubt, you are somewhat hard up; no doubt the times are depressed; but I would advise you, if you wish to improve your condition, not to ask the Government to reduce the tariff, but to go into mixed farming. And I may say that his advice to the miners of British Columbia was quite as acceptable and quite as complete a cure for them as it was to our people. I may say that we do not require in Manitoba the advice of the hon. Minister of Agriculture or any one else as to the proper way to develop that country. The speaker who preceded me said that what the people of Canada want—and I can emphatically say that what the people of Manitoba want—is to be allowed to follow their occupations without any interference from this Parliament. And the people of Manitoba will undertake that that province shall be developed in the proper way. They will undertake that, as it is found from time to time, as necessarily it must be found, that one particular system of agriculture fails, they will be prepared, as fast as circumstances will allow, to take up new ideas, to go into new lines. But they ask emphatically that the policy of the Government shall not be such as to materially hinder them from taking up these new lines—from going into mixed farming, as the Minister of Agriculture suggests. It is very easy to say, go into mixed farming. I do not know that the hon. gentleman himself exactly understands what that means. What did he intend that we should do? Are we to raise cattle? We have been engaged—I suppose he knows—largely in the raising of wheat in that country Through causes over which we have had no control, and over which the Government repudiate any control, wheat raising has not in recent years been extremely profitable. I would like the hon. gentleman to give to this House the figures upon which he bases his idea that a departure from the growing of wheat and going into the raising of cattle would be, in the face of the prices that cattle bring in the province of Manitoba, any advantage in a monetary sense, over the growing of wheat. If then he did not intend that we should raise cattle, what did he intend? Did he intend that we should raise more of the coarse grains? Barley for instance. Barley can be grown in Manitoba with great success; but the trouble is that hon. gentlemen opposite have so mismanaged, or so managed, that the natural and only market for the barley we could grow in Manitoba and the North-west is closed to us by the high tariff wall of the Americans. If the hon. gentleman, before he again comes to Manitoba, will devise a means by which the millions of bushels of barley, which could be grown in that great country, can find their natural market down in the city of Milwaukee and the other great malt consuming centres of the United States, then his advice will be appreciated, and not only appreciated, but promptly acted upon. The hon. gentleman gave us a remedy for our difficulties on the one hand, and with the other made such arrangements that we are quite unable to take advantage of his very valuable advice. Now, the First Minister met the statement of the leader of the Opposition that the Canadian farmer and Canadians generally are labouring under distress by saying that the Canadian farmer was able to carry off a great many prizes at the World's Fair against all competitors. I have great difficulty in following the logic of the Premier in this contention. Possibly if I possessed the subtle mind which the hon. gentleman has, I could understand that the fact that the farmers of Ontario and the farmers of Manitoba were able to produce the best cheese and the finest wheat in the world was conclusive proof that these farmers were prosperous. The leader of the Opposition has said that there is no country in the world where the farmer has more natural resources at his command than the Dominion of Canada. And I will be excused perhaps if I say that in my opinion there is no part of the great Dominion more blessed in that respect than the small province from which I hail. We have there the greatest natural resources; and it seems to me that the fact that Canada was able to make so fine a show at the exhibition in Chicago was a corroboration, rather than an impugment of the statement of the leader of the Opposition that the farmer, in spite of these natural advantages, in spite of a fertile soil and fine climate, is to-day in a state, not exactly of destitution, but of failure to reap the prosperity and the comfort which his labours and skill, and all these natural advantages should procure for him. All these advantages have been set aside. And set aside by whom? By the hon. gentlemen opposite. And, it seems to me, it will be the duty of the people of Canada, at the election which is so soon to take place, to remove from power the gentlemen who persist in upholding an exploded system, who persist in imposing upon this Dominion a policy which has set aside all these natural advantages, and which has reduced the farmer, especially in the province from which I come, to the condition in which he finds himself to-day. Why, the hon. gentlemen themselves last session, when they appeared before this House, drew attention to the large increase in immigration, especially in Manitoba and the North-west. But, in spite of the progress of which they speak, in spite of the contented condition of the country to which they refer, in spite, also, I may say, of their having a Minister of the Interior with a vigorous immigration policy—in spite of all these advantages, they have not the hardihood to allude in the Speech from the Throne to which we have just listened, to any increased immigration at this time in Manitoba or in the North-west Territories. The hon. gentleman says that all we care for, and all the leader of the Opposition is interested in is, not the welfare of the people of Canada, not a change of policy for the people of Canada, but simply a change of Administration. Well, Mr. Speaker, I consider that, apart from all other questions, apart from all considerations of policy, it would be of immeasurable advantage to the people of Canada to have a change of Administration; to substitute the hon. leader of the Opposition for the hon. the Prime Minister at this particular juncture in our history. But, in addition to that fact, it seems to me that, with the people of the country at the present time, the question is one of principle. It is not a question whether the hon. the leader of the Opposition shall control the destinies of this people, but whether the manufacturers shall continue to extract from the producing classes the tolls which have produced among those manufacturers the millionaire to whom the hon. members who spoke this afternoon alluded—men who have greater riches than they know what to do with, and who are troubled as to the disposition of those riches. It is on this question that the Opposition are appealing to the country; and, if the signs of the times count for anything, if the presence of myself at this particular time on the floor of the House is any indication of the feeling of the people, then it is plain that the people are only waiting for the chance to sweep from power the hon. gentlemen opposite, and to place in power those who are prepared, as I understand it, to abolish the principle of protection from the tariff of Canada, and to give us a tariff which will extract the smallest possible amount of money from the pockets of the people, compatible with the efficient administration of public affairs—and, when that money is thus extracted, to use it for the benefit of the public at large and not for any small portion of the people. I have alluded, Mr. Speaker, to the election in Winnipeg; and it seems proper that, at this time, on the first occasion when I have the honour to address this House, I should make a few remarks in connection with that election, more especially in view of the fact that remarks have been made outside of this House referring to that election by the hon. the Prime Minister of this Dominion. Mr. Speaker, it is well known to those who are in touch with public feeling in that province that my return here is a protest by the trade centre of that country (the trade centre not only of Manitoba, but of the North-west also) against this policy of which I have been speaking. One argument which I offered for the consideration of the electors at that time was this: I know, I said to them, what your feeling is with regard to the effect of the tariff upon this portion of Canada. You are at one with me in being desirous of the abolition of the protective principle. You, as Conservatives, still have possibly (although it is difficult for me to understand it) some faith in the promises and professions of those who now sway the destinies of your party. You desire to wait that they may fulfil the promises that have been made to you, believing that they intend to give you relief from these great burdens. I would suggest to you this consideration—if my opponent, Mr. Campbell (advocating, it is true, upon the question of tariff the same principles that I advocate) is elected to represent you at Ottawa, then, in spite of anything that you may say, these gentlemen will at once contend that the great city of Winnipeg has endorsed their policy. On the other hand, if you vote for me, you will only take away one vote from a Government which has a majority of about sixty in the House. The destinies of Canada do not hang upon this election; my vote in the House will count for nothing. But, if you send me to represent you, these gentlemen will understand that you mean what you say when you ask for tariff reform; they will understand that you really desire it, and are willing to go to the length of voting against the Government now in order that the Government may be saved from their false allies, and form the strong influences that are brought to bear upon them by the manufacturers. The people of Winnipeg, the Conservatives of Winnipeg—many of them—accepted the consideration which I offered to them, and they voted for me as a protest, while still retaining their Conservative principles, and still anxious that the destinies of this Dominion should be controlled by gentlemen representing the great Conservative party. But I can say that these same persons, strong Conservatives though they be, brought up in that profession, if the Government pursue the policy they have announced in the Speech from the Throne, and refuse to give them that relief from their burdens which they ask for, are prepared, when the great conflict comes, to range themselves on the side of the free traders of this country, of the revenue tariff party. They are prepared once and for all to abandon their political friends and stand up for their province, for their purses, and for their pockets. The hon. First Minister, however, seems not to have had that explicit information with regard to the affairs of Manitoba and the Territories which, as Premier of this Dominion, he should have, because, as I have said, he has taken occasion to refer to that election, and while, in a very generous manner saying that with his big majority, he could well afford to give the Liberals a few seats here and there, including Winnipeg, still he seems to have been under the misapprehension that the election in Winnipeg, instead of being as it was a protest, and a very vigorous protest, against the National Policy, was rather an endorsement of myself personally as the representative of the Manitoba School Act. Now, I can say that during that contest the Manitoba School Act was never mentioned; I can say that my opponent, Mr. Colin H. Campbell, was, if possible, an even more enthusiastic opponent of the old separate school system in that province than I myself was. He took special pains to have the electors of Winnipeg understand that in voting for him they would be voting for a staunch advocate of the abolition of separate schools. I say, therefore, that if the hon. gentleman really had an idea that the election meant an endorsement of the services that I had performed in that direction, he was entirely and absolutely mistaken. I can say, and I say it with great pride, that a very large number of those who gave me, in the past, and would give me in the future, a strenuous opposition on the school question, voted for me on the tariff question. Now, the hon. gentleman, in taking this view of the election, indulged in some remarks which I have scarcely been able to understand. He seemed to think that it was very strange that I, a Protestant, should come down to this House and should be able, along with the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte) to vote want of confidence in him and in his Government. The hon. gentleman was good enough to christen me with a new name, the hon. gentleman was good enough to refer to different colours on both sides of the coat. Now, as I say, I have had some difficulty in following the hon. gentleman, and in understanding what he was driving at. I have not had the same experience in turning my coat as the hon. gentleman has had.

While I am not ashamed of my position as a Protestant—I adhere to my position in that respect—I come here not to discuss the question of religion; I come here prepared to fight the battles of Liberalism along with every man who is prepared to take the same stand, and I shall not inquire what his religion is. The hon. gentleman seems to think that he and his party should have a monopoly in the business of blending the Green and the Orange. Well, I notice in the newspapers this evening that the hon. the Controller of Customs and the hon. the Minister of Trade and Commerce—I do not know whether they are yellow or what their colour is, I do not stop to inquire what their colour is—but I see by the newspapers that they are to speak at an Orange meeting tomorrow; and yet the First Minister, who thinks he can throw an epithet of contempt upon me, by calling me the Yellow Martin, still retains these orange birds in his Cabinet, and sends them out through the country to pick up Protestant votes, to get Protestant Orange support for him, while he himself undertakes the duty of hunting up the Catholic vote. Even in that respect, if we are to judge by the present attitude of His Grace the Archbishop of St. Boniface, the hon. the First Minister seems to have somewhat fallen from grace as the great Catholic leader of this country. I notice that the Conservative French papers of the province of Quebec consider it a mortal sin for the hon. leader of the Opposition to have done me the honour of introducing me to this House. Well, Mr. Speaker, I have been for a good many years in politics; although not in the larger arena in which I now find myself, but I can say that never, at any time in my life, have I devoted myself to politics with more heart, with more pride, and I may say with more certainty of success, than I do to-day, ranged under the banner of the hon. leader of the Opposition. The fact that that hon. gentleman differs from me in religion is to me, under the circumstances, rather a pride and a pleasure, because it gives me an opportunity of showing that when I advocated the abolition of separate schools in the province of Manitoba I did so not as a religious matter, but because I am firmly convinced that it is not part of the duty of the state to interfere in any way, shape or form with the question of religion, that it is the duty of the state to leave to the individual the right to follow his own conscience in those matters. Sir, let me say that when we have to deal with great questions of policy in this country, there is no reason why, because certain Roman Catholics in this House support him like-member, that I should not support him likewise, and on the other hand, I hope they will consider that the fact that my record upon the school question has been such as is known to you, disagreeing as they do with me upon this question, and because I happen to be a Liberal—I say I hope they will consider that no reason why we should not stand shoulder to shoulder together with the hon. leader of the Opposition; I hope they will consider that no reason why they should not loyally stand by him in the great fight that we have on hand in the interests of our native country.

ADJOURNMENT—THE NEW BRUNSWICK JUDICIARY.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. First Minister intimated the other day in conversation across the floor that he would inform the House at its next sitting whether the acceptance of Judge Palmer's resignation had been communicated to that gentleman. I should like to ask the hon. gentleman to make the statement now, and also if he will be kind enough to say when we may reasonably hope to have the papers in connection with that matter.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Yes. I looked at the dates. The resignation was dated the 5th; my report was on the 7th; that report was approved on the 9th, and the acceptance of the resignation was communicated, I think, on the 10th. As to the papers, the hon. gentleman, I think, will remember that I suggested he should move for them informally. So far as I am concerned, I will waive any notice; but we agreed that a motion should be made in every case in order that the papers may be placed in charge of the Clerk and form part of the sessional papers. If the hon. gentleman will make a motion at any time, the papers will be brought down.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) There appears to have been a misunderstanding. I understood the hon. gentleman was willing to accept the conversation as equivalent to a formal motion.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I would willingly do so, but it was thought desirable that a motion should be made. I have the papers all ready, and they can be brought down as soon as the motion is carried.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) By consent I will make the motion to-morrow.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Certainly.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 9.35 p.m.

Motion agreed to.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I have the honour to lay on the Table of the House the papers called for in this motion.

OCEAN FREIGHT RATES ON CATTLE.

Mr. MULOCK moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 8) respecting ocean freight rates on cattle. He said: The cattle industry is one of sufficient importance to invite the serious attention of the House, if it should happen to be in the slightest degree in danger of being prejudiced by any influences removable by the action of this House; and from representations which have been made to me, and which I believe to be well founded, there is such a danger at the present time. Looking at the growth of this industry, we find that it began about 1875, and reached its highest point, in respect of volume and return of money, in the year 1891. There have been constant mutterings with regard to some of the difficulties under which this trade labours. From its circumstances, it has practically but one point of export from Canada to Great Britain. Live cattle for the English market cannot be shipped by the United States except on compliance with the quarantine regulations of that country. This practically rules out an American port, because it would be impracticable to comply with such regulations, involving, as I believe they do at the present time, the quarantining of Canadian cattle in American territory for ninety days before they are allowed to be shipped abroad. So that, being limited to the St. Lawrence route, economy of shipment necessitates the cattle being put on board at the head of ocean navigation. That for the present is the city of Montreal, so that Montreal is the only point from which cattle leave Canada for the United Kingdom. Several lines of vessels come to that port equipped with appliances for the trade, but in consequence of there being but one port it is extremely easy for the agents of these lines to create a monopoly in freights. I have been told by shippers that so arbitrary have the ship-owners become that now they refuse even to quote freights up to the time the cattle are put on board, so that the cattle men have to go into the country to purchase their supplies, uncertain as to what freights may be imposed upon them. I find from figures furnished me that the freight charged per head on cattle leaving Montreal fluctuates from a few shillings up to as much as 75 shillings per head, and it is no unusual thing for quotations of freights to change 10 shillings between the sailings of one vessel and another. That element of uncertainty renders it impossible for the cattle dealers to promote their trade with any degree of satisfaction to themselves or justice to the farmers. The result has been in some cases to ruin the shippers. There is scarcely a shipper to-day who has been able to survive the dangers connected with the cattle trade. I am not going to attribute all their misfortunes to the vessel-owners or those interested in the carrying trade, but we can certainly attribute part of the misfortunes to the practices to which I refer. The result has been not only disastrous to the middlemen, but to the producers of cattle. To-day if a cattle buyer desires to purchase for export to the United Kingdom, he has to bear in mind that he knows not what the freight is to be. It may be 25 shillings or 75 shillings. And, of course, being a prudent man he reckons on being charged as much as can be extorted from him. This depreciates the value of the cattle which he is buying, so that the farmer is really the sufferer under the existing system. I invite the attention of the House to the removal of this evil. It is an evil most intimately connected with the welfare of the country. I am assured by cattle men that when there is a large quantity of cattle waiting shipment at Montreal or about to arrive, the vessel-owners take advantage of the situation and put up freights to the very highest point. They also keep themselves posted on the state of the market in England, and if any improvement is shown in prices, they take advantage of the occasion and hence the profit which ought to go to the producer and the purchaser of the cattle goes into the hands of the vessel-owners. Everything is taken advantage of by them. They have practically a combine in Canada to-day for the purpose of obtaining excessive rates. I am aware that the vessel-owners say they cannot make money at present rates. I was present at an interview between cattle dealers and the Government a year ago, and I there heard a controversy between the cattle men and the vessel-owners. The latter said they could not declare dividends out of existing rates, but the reply was made that whether they made money or not the rates were so excessive that at times the cattle men were obliged to charter vessels from the United States and bring them all round from Boston to Montreal, and in this way got rates from Montreal to Liverpool cheaper than asked by the Canadian vessels, which were in receipt of large sums from the Canadian Government. If vessels can be brought from Boston to Montreal which will take cattle to Liverpool cheaper than our own Canadian vessels, it is time for Parliament to interfere and put a stop to the evil. I am told that now freights from American ports to Liverpool are much cheaper than from Canadian ports, so that our cattle trade is hampered in the markets of Great Britain by reason of high rates here as compared with those in the United States. That state of affairs calls for our attention, and I hope will be remedied in time for the spring trade. I do not know if my Bill meets the case. I am not going to say whether it does or not. At all events it represents my idea, and I would ask that the Government either adopt the measure or press through one of their own to remedy the evil. I am told, indeed, that no cattle men will go through the country to purchase, the trade is so greatly depressed because of the embargo in Great Britain, and adding this monopoly makes trade almost impossible. I therefore earnestly beg the Government to take charge of this matter, which is of such great importance to the farming industry, and provide a solution in time for the spring business. If you will look at the Trade and Navigation Returns you will find that this industry reached its highest point some three years ago, and now appears on the decline. The number of cattle shipped in 1891 was 107,000. This has fallen off to 99,000 for the fiscal year ending 30th June, 1893, and I am told that the returns for the year, which began the 30th June last, will show a further decline.

Mr. FOSTER. Did you compare the value each year ?

Mr. MULOCK. Of course, you cannot compare values from the Trade and Navigation Returns satisfactorily, because we have only the number of the cattle, and the value depends upon the weight ; but if you wish for the amounts, I may say that in 1891 the value of the export was $8,425,369. The value of the cattle exported in the fiscal year ending 30th June, 1893, was $7,402,208, a falling off of about a million dollars. The number was reduced by about 8,000 head, but the weights not being given, of course we are not able to tell the value per pound. I propose by this Bill to authorize the Governor General in Council to fix a tariff of rates beyond which it shall not be lawful for these vessel-owners, or persons engaged in contracting for space, to go. The Bill contains certain provisions for giving effect to this regulation and provides penalties for its infraction.

Mr. McMILLAN. I desire, Mr. Speaker, to say a word concerning this Bill. If ever there was a period in the history of our cattle-shipping industry when some such enactment as this was required, the present is that period. During the last month a large number of cattle have been got ready by the feeders, but, contrary to all former experience, not a single buyer has been out purchasing cattle for the old country market. The first reason for this, I take it, is the schedule arrangement in the old country, and the second on account of the knowledge on the part of the cattle-buyers of the unsatisfactory condition of the freight rates. Let me say, Sir, that in some years, while we were paying as high as 70 to 75 shillings on cattle from Montreal to Glasgow, they were paying only from 30 to 35 shillings from Boston. If the schedule is not to be removed from the Canadian cattle in the old country, and if the Government cannot see their way to giving us some such relief as has been indicated by the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock), I hope they will attempt to make an arrangement with the American Government under which the Canadian cattle may be shipped in bond. I do not see why such an arrangement should not be made. Down on the Grand Trunk, American cattle are being shipped from the western to the eastern states in bond. I was down this winter, and there is a station at Lynn from which the cattle are crossing from the Canadian to the American side. The same is being done on most of the roads, but this is one of the leading roads. Seeing that the Americans are having these privileges in Canadian territory, I hope the Government will do their utmost to give us relief. It would be a great advantage if we could get our cattle sent through in bond for shipment from American ports. Before the present scheduling arrangement was imposed against Canadian cattle landing in Great Britain, some of our cattle-buyers found it profitable to send their cattle through from Montreal to Boston and ship them from Boston to British ports, even though the cattle had to be slaughtered on landing. The buyers found that, although they were obliged to accept a lower price on account of not being allowed to send their cattle inland on the hoof, they were more than remunerated by the lower freight rates they got from Boston to Liverpool and London. Last season, the trade was very unsatisfactory; many of our cattlemen went under on account of the low prices. This is something over which the Government have no control, but if they can give us relief in any of the ways suggested, I hope they will do so; for, at the present time, one of the most important industries of the agriculturists of Canada is threatened almost with destruction. I am perfectly certain that if we do not get better prices than those realized for the first shipments during 1893, the trade of shipping cattle from the province of Ontario to the old country must be very greatly injured.

Mr. McMULLEN. I would very much like to have heard a member of the Government reply to the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock), that we might know what they intended to do with reference to this matter. This is unquestionably a most important subject, and the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) deserves credit for bringing it before the House at this early period of the session. The shipment of cattle from Canada, especially from Ontario, is a growing industry and one to which the people have turned their attention with hope, and with reasonable prospects of success, up to 1891. Since that time, owing to the scheduling arrangement in Great Britain, those engaged in this industry have suffered, but they have suffered even more from the increased rates imposed by the shipping companies from our ports to England than from the scheduling arrangement. Last year, while the price of cattle in Montreal was 5 cents a pound for shipping purposes, the same class of steers, running from thirteen to fourteen hundredweight, were selling in Buffalo market at 6 cents a pound, or virtually $14 a head more than the Canadian price, and the animals in Buffalo, like those in Montreal, were bought for export. The difference in price was the difference in the freight rate from New York or Boston to Liverpool, as compared with the freight rates from Montreal to Liverpool. Now, with regard to quarantine arrangements between Canada and the United States, it is a matter for regret that we are deprived of the opportunity of shipping by the American route, because, with that route open, we should have competition. I am not going to find fault with the Government for the course taken that brought about the strained relations between us and the United States with regard to the interchange of horses and cattle. I believe the Government took the course it did in the first place in order to satisfy the English Government and people that we were doing everything we could to keep our cattle free from contagious diseases, and in the hope that our cattle would be relieved from the schedule in England.

Mr. MULOCK.

That arrangement has been kept in force between Canada and the United States for a considerable time. If there is no hope of the removal of the embargo placed upon our cattle in the English market, I would suggest that steps be taken at once to secure the removal of the restriction upon our cattle going into the United States. We were the first to impose these quarantine restrictions, and then the Americans meted out to us the same treatment we had measured to them. No doubt, if the Government would remove that quarantine regulation and allow American herds free access to our country, the Americans would remove their stringent regulations and would allow our cattle to go through their territory and to be shipped from their ports. I was very glad to notice that the Minister of Trade and Commerce made some reference to this matter of cattle-shipment in a recent address. I believe he stated that the Government would be justified in remonstrating with the steamboat companies that were subsidized by this Dominion for the carriage of the mails, if they did not carry our cattle from our ports to England on as reasonably fair terms as were quoted from Boston and New York. I hope that, in saying this, he was expressing the opinion of the Government. I hope they will bring their influence to bear upon these companies that are now receiving subventions for mail service, so that they may fix the rates for cattle at a point that will enable our shippers from Canada to compete reasonably with the shippers from the United States. Since the opening up of the North-west and the enormous reduction that has taken place in the value of wheat, the farmers of Ontario have been driven to the necessity of going largely into stock-raising, and one of the principal substitutes for wheat is the growing of fat cattle for shipment. Now, this industry can be encouraged. I have not the slightest doubt the Government will do everything they can to encourage it. It is one of the most important industries in the province of Ontario, and if you can secure, by the enactment of this Bill, the relief that the farmers of Ontario unquestionably stand in need of, so that they will not be hampered and subjected to extortion in the way of rates as they have been for the last two years, I believe that industry will grow to be one of the most lucrative that has yet been adopted by the farmers of that province. I can fully endorse the remarks made by my hon. friend from South Huron (Mr. McMillan). He has had an extended experience in that particular line, and is able to talk by the book when a question of that kind comes before this House, and I have not the slightest doubt that every word he has said with regard to the experience of stock exporters during the last few years, is quite true. I hope that before the Bill proceeds further, the House and the country may have some assurance from the Government that they will take this matter up with all reasonable despatch in order that, as the mover of the Bill has truly said, it may be crystallized into law at as early a date as possible, so that favourable rates may be secured for the stock that is now being fattened in our province. I hope the Government will take this matter up before even the first reading is agreed to by this House, and that they will be prepared to announce to the House that they will take such steps as will compel the shipping companies to receive and carry the cattle of this province in order that the people may get the relief they stand so much in need of.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I can say in response to what the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) has suggested with regard to the examination of the Bill, that all attention will be given to the subject as soon as possible with a view to meet his suggestions in so far as we are able to do it. The subject to which he refers has been under consideration for some time by the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and likewise the cognate subject referred to by the two hon. gentlemen who last spoke, with regard to the export of our cattle from ports in the United States. Hon. members are well aware, and those hon. gentlemen have admitted the fact, that we must give up all hopes of the scheduling of our cattle in Great Britain being removed if we take a step of that kind, because we cannot expect the United States to confer upon our traders a privilege of that character without reciprocally allowing their cattle into our ports for the purposes of export. We should not take so grave a step as that until all hopes are extinguished of the embargo upon our cattle exported to England being removed in that country, although I am aware that there are many strong advocates in this House and out of it, of the step that has been proposed. However, the whole subject will be considered as soon as possible.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Will the hon. gentleman be kind enough to say whether the Government have received any communications at all from the English authorities on the subject within the last few weeks?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Yes, there have been communications with regard to the condition of our cattle and the rumours of cattle disease, and these have been answered by a very full report on the part of the Minister of Agriculture. These communications have been moved for, I think, by some notice on the paper at present, and they will be brought down very soon.

Mr. EDGAR. It strikes me that the uncertainty of the freight rates that are imposed by the owners of steamships in Montreal, is one of the great grievances. If there were some fixed rates which the farmers and buyers could rely upon, they would know where they stand. Now, this is very nearly on all-fours with the dealing by the Government by Order in Council, under the authority of Parliament, with the freight rates on the railways of the country; the same principle is largely involved. Of course, the ocean is not a monopoly, but under the circumstances of this trade the St. Lawrence route seems to be practically a monopoly; therefore, I think there is a great deal to be said in favour of an interference by Parliament in that particular. Then again we are talking here of granting $750,000 a year for a fast steamship service across the Atlantic. There may be importance in that, but surely a matter like this which involves seven or eight millions of trade a year, in which the farmers of the country are directly interested, is quite as deserving of the attention of Parliament as that fast line service. Now, we assume jurisdiction in this Parliament to legislate against combines; possibly this may be a sort of combine; however, I do not think it could be reached by any existing law on the subject. At any rate, Parliament has dealt with combines in transportation already, and should do it again. For all these reasons I think the Government should not allow this session to pass without taking up the subject which has been introduced to-day.

Mr. IVES. I think one of the causes of the difference in rates from Boston and from Montreal last season, especially the latter part of the season, was due to the cattle men themselves. If I am not misinformed, a very large part of the space on cattle ships for the whole year was contracted for by buyers early in the season with a view to speculating on that space. Some one or more of the cattle men took practically the whole space from Montreal for the whole season, and then sold it out. It seems to me that if the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) had directed his attention to making it illegal to deal in advance with cattle space in that way, he might, perhaps, have arrived at some grievance in regard to which Parliament might interfere with less difficulty than the way he has indicated. I think that the chief difficulty last year was that the more enterprising buyers thought they would corner the rest of the buyers and get the inside track and gobble up the space.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) A Bill fixing the maximum rate would surely meet that difficulty.

Mr. FEATHERSTON. I wish to take exception to what the hon. Minister has just said. Last year the cattle men took what space they required, and they did not take any more. The year before last, and the previous year, they were in the habit of gobbling up the space, as he has said, but last year the space was regulated according to the market. In the spring the markets opened rather poorly for the steamship men, but as soon as the trade improved a little and a good number of cattle began to come forward, they increased the rates. I am in favour of the proposed Bill of the hon. member for North York. We want some legislation that will open up American ports to Canadian cattle. I do not see that we will endanger our trade with Great Britain in any way if our cattle are allowed to go through American territory to the seaboard, since American cattle are now coming through Canadian territory on their way to American ports. The great danger lies in bringing cattle through Canada from the Western States. They are passing through every day over our railways, coming from the west by the Michigan Central, the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Grand Trunk Railway, and especially the Southern branch of the Grand Trunk Railway, by way of Buffalo; and there is great danger of our cattle contracting disease from the western cattle, and, of course, there is great danger of our cattle being made to appear before the British public as being subject to disease, even more so than would occur from our cattle being sent through American territory and shipped from American ports. We have received some information from England respecting the raising of the embargo on our cattle, and the statement has been made that such embargo is likely to be raised. I have been a very long time interested in our cattle trade, having been one of the first shippers from Canada, sixteen years ago, and I am glad to find that such feeling now exists in the Agricultural Department of the British Government. Whether we will be able to realize this hope, I cannot say, but I trust the embargo will be raised in the very near future. I feel that we should make every effort to secure the shipment of our cattle by American ports. I do so for this reason: we have very many good cattle this year, and we would have more if we could ship them during spring, in the cool weather. Our greatest trouble is due to the fact that our cattle are too fat and heavy to be able to bear the hot weather at the port of Montreal during the shipping months. Last year a large number of our best cattle were lost between Montreal and Father Point, and that is where we sustain our heaviest losses. If we had access to American ports during the latter part of March, April, and the beginning of May, we could ship a large number of our cattle and realize good prices, and the returns to Canadian shippers would be very much greater than they are at present. I hope, when the Bill comes down to the House, it will be taken hold of by the Government, as dealing with a business that is for the benefit of the people, and I shall be glad to give all possible assistance in order to further the interests of the cattle trade of the country, for, when our cattle men are suffering, our farmers must be suffering likewise. Last year our cattle men suffered losses, and they are afraid to buy a bullock this year, and although I am largely interested in the trade, I will not buy this spring.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

DUTIES OF CUSTOMS—EXPORT DUTY ON LOGS.

Mr. CHARLTON moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 9) further to amend the Acts respecting the duties of Customs. He said: The object of the Bill is to repeal certain clauses of the Customs Act relating to the imposition of export duties. The law imposing those duties was first enacted in chapter 33, section 6, of the Revised Statutes of Canada, and in schedule E of the same. Schedule E was subsequently amended by section 3 of chapter 39 of the Statutes of 1887, and in 1888, section 1 of chapter 15 gave the Governor in Council power to increase those duties to $3, to reduce them, to repeal them, to reimpose them, and to keep the trade in a great state of uncertainty and fear as to the course that the Governor in Council might be pleased to take with respect to this very disturbing proceeding. From my own connection with the lumber trade, I am well aware that this power in the hands of the Governor in Council has had a depressing and unfavourable influence on the trade, and whatever may be the question as to the propriety of imposing export duties, the last section of this Bill, which says that no further action shall be taken by the Governor in Council, with respect to export duties, without the consent of Parliament having first been obtained, is a section which must commend itself to the good judgment of every business man. If the export duties which have been removed under the statutory provision of the McKinley Act are to be reimposed, the matter should be fully discussed, and the House should be made aware of the reasons for the imposition of those duties. There was an occasion when the Government increased the duties from $2 to $3 per thousand. They speedily found they had taken a step that was an imprudent one, and they receded from the position they had taken, which was an illustration of the point I desire to make, that the consideration of this important question is one which should be had in open day, should be discussed here on the floor of this House, and the reasons for the imposition of those duties should be fully canvassed and considered before action was taken. For these reasons, the Bill proposes that the clause of the Customs Act authorizing the imposition of export duties should be repealed, and that no action on this matter should in future be taken without the consent of Parliament having first been obtained.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

N. W. T.—DUAL LANGUAGE.

Mr. McCARTHY moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 10) further to amend the Act respecting the North-west Territories. He said: I may explain that this is the Bill which I introduced last year. It deals with two subjects. It proposes to repeal the clause in the North-west Territories Act by which separate schools are imposed upon the Territories, and by which no discretion is given to the Council of the North-west Territories respecting education, and in place of that clause to give the power to deal with the subject of education untrammelled and uncontrolled, and as the North-west Council may see fit. It also proposes to do away with the remnant of what is known as the dual language clause. It will be in the remembrance of members of this House who sat in the last Parliament of 1890 that a discussion took place with respect to the repeal of the clause as it then stood, and the result of the discussion was a compromise, by which a portion of the clause was repealed, or rather power was given to the Council of the North-west Territories to repeal a portion of the clause, but the remaining portion stands as it was in the original Act. The original section imposed duality in language in four matters: first, with respect to publication of the laws; second, with respect to proceedings in the courts; third, with respect to proceedings in the Council; and fourth, with respect to the printing and publishing of those proceedings. As to the proceedings in the Council, this power was given by the Act of 1891, in pursuance of the arrangement made across the floor in the preceding session; provided, however, that after the next general election for the Legislative Assembly such Assembly may, by ordinance or otherwise, regulate its proceedings in the matter of recording and publishing the same, and the said regulation shall be embodied in the proceedings which shall be forthwith published by the Lieutenant Governor, in conformity with the law, and shall afterward have full force and effect. The House will observe that the power given to the Legislative Assembly was merely with respect to its own proceedings, and the other portion of the law still remained in force: first, that proceedings in the courts might be conducted in either language, and, second, that the ordinances, passed under this provision, shall be published in both languages. As I have often said before in making this motion, or in bringing in a bill to repeal this clause, I do not do it with any feeling of hostility to my French-Canadian fellow-subjects. I believe, Sir, that the interests of this country will be best served, when the distinction between these nationalities is done away with: at all events, that so far as the North-west is concerned, we certainly should not introduce a measure which is calculated and apparently designed, to perpetuate that race distinction which unhappily exists in one of the older provinces.

Mr. DEVLIN. Which one ?

Mr. McCARTHY. In the province of Quebec. If the hon. gentleman wants to know, we have no difficulty in answering that question.

Mr. DEVLIN. We will tell you about the other one by and by.

Mr. McCARTHY. With regard to the subject of education, I think that the House and the country must be satisfied just now, that an attempt to interfere with a province in the North-west, or the territories in the North-west on the subject of education, is calculated to cause a great deal of trouble. We have had the Manitoba School question up, by reason of an attempt that was made in the constitution of Manitoba, to fetter or control that province on the subject of education, and recently, I think the Government have found some little difficulty in dealing with a cognate question which came from the North-west Territories. The sooner we realize that the people of Manitoba, as well as the people of the North-west, are perfectly competent to manage their educational affairs themselves, without any control from this Parliament, the better it will be for the peace and welfare of this country. I, therefore, have pleasure in introducing to the House a Bill which will take away that limitation which the Act intends to impose, which the Act does impose, with regard to education, and which will remove the last vestige of the dual language clause so far as the North-west is concerned.

Mr. DEVLIN. Mr. Speaker, I certainly did not expect to speak upon this question at the present time, but I wish to answer one statement which was made by the hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat (Mr. McCarthy). He says that the province of Quebec is responsible for the hard feeling that to-day exists in the Dominion of Canada; and I answer that by saying: He is the one. He is the one who is responsible for the hard feeling that exists in the Dominion of Canada. We have had that hon. gentleman here year after year since 1887; with what? With a project of law, the intention of which is to close the North-west Territories and the province of Manitoba against the Catholics of the province of Quebec; a project of law which tells them that if they wish to go to that province or to those territories, they must remember that there—if his views can be carried out—their language will be prescribed, and their rights will be trampled upon. Why, Mr. Speaker, it was only last night that there was in this city another effusion on this same subject. I do not see the Controller of Customs in his seat at this moment, and I regret that he is not. But we are beginning to be accustomed to these insults coming from those gentlemen whose only political stock is this one theme: their hatred of their Roman Catholic fellow-citizens. What does the hon. gentleman expect to gain by all this agitation? Does he imagine for a moment that we from the province of Quebec fear him? Does he imagine for one moment that the province of Quebec is going to submit to all his dictates? His object, no doubt, is to attain to a position which, by reason of his alliance with the party with which he is so long connected, he could not attain. He wanted, no doubt, to enter the Cabinet. I believe that was his object. Now, finding that he could not enter the Cabinet, finding that he would not be taken into the Cabinet, he is trying by this other means, to attain to the position of leader of the Government in this country. He would like to form a solely Protestant population in this country. He would like to form solely, and to constitute solely, Protestant schools in this country. He would stand up in this House and tell a province which sends sixty-five representatives here, that they shall not speak the language which they learned from their parents. From the very beginning of the time in which this animosity took root in his heart, from that moment to this, every political question of any importance to the country at large has been left aside by him, simply that he might speak his hatred against the Catholics of Canada, and in particular against the French-Canadians of the province of Quebec. He has met with very little success so far. He speaks of the province of Quebec as one in which there is hatred. Let me tell him—

Mr. McCARTHY. The hon. gentleman will allow me to interrupt him. I did not at all use the expression he thinks. I never referred to the province of Quebec as having hatred.

Mr. DEVLIN. Would the hon. gentleman tell us exactly what he did say?

Mr. McCARTHY. What I said was: That I trusted we were not going to perpetuate in the North-west the racial divisions which unhappily existed in the province of Quebec. I never said "hatred" at all.

Mr. DEVLIN. Very well, then. I will immediately give the hon. gentleman an instance of some of the divisions which exist in the province of Quebec. In the counties of that province which are largely Catholic in some of such counties the representative is Protestant. I will take the county which I represent in this House. The overwhelming majority of that county is Roman Catholic, yet I am the first Catholic member that ever sat for Ottawa county in this House. A Protestant gentleman represented that county for thirty years. To give the hon. member (Mr. McCarthy) a further instance of the same generosity, I may state that the county of Ottawa was represented in the Local House by a Protestant member for years. The warden of that county was a Protestant; for years the Mayor of the most Catholic city in the whole province of Quebec—the city of Hull—was a Protestant, and so I could name a good many other counties with a similar record. I could name the county of Lotbinière, which is almost exclusively French-Canadian and Catholic, and that county sent a Protestant representative to this House. More than that, it sent to the Quebec Parliament—a Catholic Parliament—a Protestant gentleman to represent it. I tell the hon. member that there is no spirit of intolerance in the province of Quebec; there is no bigotry in the province of Quebec. There is certainly a spirit of disgust, but that disgust is entirely due to the miserable attempt of the hon. gentleman to fasten against them this charge of bigotry. Does he claim that the French-Canadian people have no rights in this Dominion of Canada? He tells us here plainly that the object is to do away with their language. Have they not as much right to speak the French language as he has to speak the English language? What is the object of all his hostility against the French language? What is the object of all his hostility against institutions which have been established in this country, and which have been found to work successfully here? Does he mean to say that a population of nearly two millions shall have no right in the Dominion of Canada? Sir, I tell the hon. member that every time he stands up in this House to attack us as he has done to-day, there are nearly two millions of Roman Catholics in this country who mock at him, who laugh at him, who treat him with contempt; and here in this House what is his following? One lone gentleman; that is the following he has here, after all these years of agitation against the Catholics. I tell the hon. gentleman that the Catholic element in Canada has been truer, and a better friend of the Dominion than ever the hon. gentleman was. What has he done for the country? Let us examine his career from the beginning to this moment. Let us examine what he was outside the House; let us examine what he has been inside the House. What has he done after all these years to promote the prosperity of his country, or good feeling amongst our people? Nothing, nothing, but a few mean, despicable attempts at imposing a peculiar kind of legislation on this country. He spoke of the Manitoba School Act; he no doubt means to say it is a success. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman, does he mean to say that public schools or Protestant schools exist to-day in the province of Manitoba? The hon. gentleman who introduced the School Act is in this House to-day, and he is able to speak for himself on the subject. The Protestants in the province of Manitoba, who are in a majority, abolished the Catholic schools under the pretence of establishing public schools. Are public schools in existence in the province of Manitoba to-day? No, there are no public schools in the province of Manitoba. I said so last session; I said so the session before. The schools which exist to-day in the province of Manitoba, to which we Catholics are obliged to subscribe, are purely Protestant schools.

An hon. MEMBER. No.

Mr. DEVLIN. I beg pardon, yes. The best authority on that subject is the gentleman who introduced those schools, and I will quote his own words. The hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin), speaking a short time ago, said:

He was himself not satisfied with the School Act and had never been so. He had made a strong effort to have the public schools controlled by the Government really made national schools, with religion obliterated. And he was now more convinced than ever that that was the only school which could be justified as constitutional. They said that the state had no right to interfere in the matter of religion, but he contended that they could not do the one without the other. It had been urged by satisfied supporters of the Act that none could complain of the devotional element introduced, as it was of the broadest nature, but they found that the Roman Catholics had the very greatest objection to this provision of the Act, and he was dissatisfied himself and was glad many Protestants shared his objections. It had been said that in the event of his opinions being adopted our public schools would be Godless schools, but by many staunch supporters of the School Act it had been privately admitted to him that the religious exercises practiced in the schools at that time were without value * *. The Roman Catholics had honestly stated that in their belief the two forms of education should go together. The Protestants admitted, on the other hand, that it was impossible to have religious training in schools, and only asked that it be recognized, insisting, however, on imposing their views on others in that respect. Rather than that small amount of religious training should be done away with in the schools, the Protestants said they would prefer the old state of affairs. He would leave it to his audience to determine which was the more honest stand of the two.

And, Sir, documents have recently been put into the possession of every reader in this country by the Venerable Archbishop of St. Boniface—documents which we will quote further on in the debate on this Bill—showing conclusively that the schools which exist to-day in Manitoba are not public schools, but simply and purely Protestant schools. I have quoted from the hon. gentleman who introduced this villainous School Act in the province of Manitoba to the effect that the schools there are Protestant schools. And this is your great generosity towards the Catholics of Manitoba. You wanted public schools, you said, on the broad grounds of the young nationality growing up in that province. See the result: you have turned the strong Protestant element of that province against the poor, struggling Catholic minority. You have not succeeded even in establishing the public schools that you pretended by this Bill you were going to establish. You have established Protestant schools; you maintain them; and you wish to do the same in the North-west. Mr. Speaker, last night the hon. Controller of Customs—and I just quote this as evidence of the spirit of the Bill and the spirit of the hon. member who has introduced it—referred to our Church as the “Romish Church”; he spoke next of its efforts to obtain state recognition in the North-west; he next said that the Archbishop had been foiled in his attempt to secure ascendancy in the province of Manitoba; and, finally, he went on to speak of the loyalty of the Orangemen, leaving the inference to be drawn that the Catholics were not loyal. The hon. gentleman uttered three insults in that speech: first, against the Church, by speaking of it in an offensive way as the “Romish Church.” In the second place, against the Archbishop of Manitoba in saying what was untrue, that the Archbishop tried to secure ascendancy. The Archbishop did nothing of the kind. He simply asked for the restoration of those rights which, up to 1890, the Catholics of Manitoba enjoyed. Finally, against the loyalty of the Orangemen, and of the lack of loyalty on the part of others, I will say that he speaks the truth if he refers to their loyalty to persecution from the beginning to the end of the history of the Order. These are some of the results due to the mean spirit of hostility manifested towards the Catholics of this country by the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), by the Controller of Customs, a gentleman paid by the Catholics—

Mr. SPEAKER. Order. I think the hon. gentleman should not indulge in remarks of that kind.

Mr. DEVLIN. Perhaps I should not indulge in the truth, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think the hon. member had better take the advice of the Chair, and not indulge in the language he is using—

Mr. DEVLIN. Against the Controller?

Mr. SPEAKER—with regard to hon. members of the House.

Mr. DEVLIN. I was merely quoting the Controller's language from an organ of the Government.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman, in saying that these hon. gentlemen were actuated by a mean spirit, is indulging in language which he, as an old member of this House, will, I think, admit is not in accordance with parliamentary usage.

Mr. DEVLIN.

Mr. DEVLIN. Very well, Mr. Speaker, when the question is up again, I will refer to the lovely spirit, the generous, broad spirit, actuating these gentlemen—the magnificent spirit which has for its object the destruction of a language and the deprivation of a people of its rights.

Mr. TARTE. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, although we are not used, at the first reading of a Bill, to consider its worth and bearing. I cannot let this opportunity pass without registering my protest against this measure.

Hon. MEMBERS. Oh! oh!

Mr. TARTE. By the noise made, it will appear as if there were on the other side of the House, hon. members who wish to abolish the French language immediately.

Mr. TARTE. (Translation.) I have only two words to say, Mr. Speaker, and I am determined to say them in French. I was just stating, when I was interrupted, that, although it is not according to the practice followed in this House to consider at this stage the worth and bearing of a Bill, I nevertheless deem it my duty to avail myself of this opportunity to record my protest against this proposed legislation. The hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), whom I consider one of the most intelligent and enlightened members of this House, might have used, and might use in the future, his abilities and the power of his mind in a much more useful way for the general interests of the country. We will consider, later on, the merit of the arguments with which he brought before this House the child which seems so dear to him. At present, I am inclined to let his measure be introduced by simply stating: “on division,” for I think the country is enormously interested in that the stand taken by him should be well and clearly defined. If we are to continue to sit together, French and English members, in this House, it is well that we should know once for all on what ground we will stand in relation of one to another. If we are called upon to form a nation in this country, it is better for us to just now lay the grounds on which that nation will stand later on. Consequently, Mr. Speaker, I will resume my seat after recording my most solemn and energetic protest against the measure brought in by the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy).

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time (on a division).

MESSAGE FROM HIS EXCELLENCY— THE ESTIMATES.

Mr. FOSTER presented a Message from His Excellency the Governor General.

Mr. SPEAKER read the Message, as follows:—

ABERDEEN.

The Governor General transmits to the House of Commons, Estimates of sums required for the service of the Dominion for the year ending 30th June, 1895, and in accordance with the provisions of "The British North America Act, 1867," the Governor General recommends these Estimates to the House of Commons.

GOVERNMENT HOUSE.

OTTAWA, 19th March, 1894.

Mr. FOSTER moved :

That His Excellency's Message, with the Estimates, be referred to the Committee of the Whole House in Supply.

Motion agreed to.

TAY CANAL—RECEIPTS FROM TOLLS, &c.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT asked, 1. What were the total receipts from tolls on the Tay Canal during the year from 1st January, 1893, to 1st January, 1894? 2. What was the cost of maintaining said canal during same period? 3. What was the total cost of construction of said canal to 1st January, 1894? 4. Is any further expenditure necessary?

Mr. HAGGART. In answer to the first question, $135.76. In answer to the second question, $2,486. In answer to the third question, $476,128.73. No further expenditure is required for the works of construction.

I. C. R.—FREIGHT RATES.

Mr. DAVIES moved for :

Return of all rates, general or special, charged on the Intercolonial Railway on through freight from Lévis to Halifax; with the dates when such existing general or special rates came into force, and in cases where such rates have been altered, specifying the alteration.

He said: I desire to know the change that took place in these general and special rates. I want to know what the rates were and what they are now.

Motion agreed to.

RELEASE OF MCGREEVY AND CONNOLLY.

Mr. MULOCK moved for :

Copies of all petitions or communications to the Government or to any member thereof, or to His Excellency, asking for any interference with the sentence passed by his Lordship the Hon. Mr. Justice Rose on Messrs. McGreevy and Connolly; of all replies thereto and all correspondence between any member of the Government and any other person on the subject of commutation of such sentence; of all medical reports made in regard to either said McGreevy or Connolly, whilst undergoing such sentence; of all reports and recommendations on the said subject, by any member of the Government, to His Excellency, and of all replies thereto and of all Orders in Council in any wise bearing upon the subject of the commutation of said sentences.

He said: I do not propose to make any remarks on the matters mentioned in the motion, but rather to call the attention of the Government to the fact that the commutation of the sentence in question has given rise to a good deal of feeling in the country. It may be that the return, when brought down, will allay that feeling and justify the action of the Government. I desire, however, to express the hope that the Government, should this motion pass, will have the return laid upon the Table without delay.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. There shall be no unnecessary delay.

Mr. MULOCK. I think the First Minister might go a little further than that. To say that there will not be any unnecessary delay will not meet the situation, I believe. I think the matter is one of importance, of such importance as to entitle the country to extra despatch in the production of this return. I venture to say the country demands that action on the part of the Government, therefore I do not think the matter ought to be dealt with as the Minister says. Perhaps he did not mean all that his words would convey. His answer is the usual one with relation to returns which are allowed to drift and to await the pleasure of the copyists or clerks of the departments. I venture to say that this is a case which demands extra speed.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I mean exactly what I said, Mr. Speaker—that there would be no unnecessary delay in preparing this return and bringing it down. If I intended, as the hon. gentleman infers from the language I used, that the matter would be allowed to drift or to await the pleasure of copyists and clerks in the departments, I would not have been telling the truth in saying that I would allow no unnecessary delay.

Mr. MULOCK. Then I understand.

Motion agreed to.

THE DUTY ON BINDER TWINE.

Mr. MULOCK. Mr. Speaker, I beg to move the following resolution:—

That binder twine be placed upon the free list.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman has taken time by the forelock, and has got his motion in as early as it could possibly be brought in, almost before I had the opportunity—indeed, by a few hours, actually before I had the opportunity—to bring down the Budget, which would give the sentiments of the Government with reference to this and other matters before the House. I think, however, in view of the statement which was made that I would be prepared to bring down the Budget and tariff recommendations at a very early day—to-morrow, by the Grace of Her Majesty's Opposition, though their consent is not very cordially afforded me, judging by a conversation which took place across the floor of the House—the hon. gentleman had better postpone his motion for the meantime, and allow the matured opinion and recommendations of the Government to be presented to the House. If the hon. gentleman does that, I think he will be doing right under the circumstances. If not, I will have to move, I suppose, the adjournment of this short but very interesting debate.

Mr. MULOCK. I have endeavoured on many occasions to bring this motion in at the right time, and I have never yet succeeded in hitting upon the time that would exactly please the Finance Minister.

Mr. FOSTER. Blundering, as usual.

Mr. MULOCK. I have always brought it in at the time he favoured in the previous year; but his policy, or his interests, or his views, or his convenience always lagged about a year behind his previous expression. Since he acknowledges now that he is, if I may so say, on the string, I am willing to grant his request. I assume, from what he has stated, that at last the Government, like Davy Crockett's coon, is going to come down, and therefore I gave him the opportunity without being brought down.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

BLUE-BOOKS AND DEPARTMENTAL REPORTS.

Mr. CHARLTON moved for :

Return showing the dates in each year since May 5th, 1887, when the Public Accounts, the Appropriation Accounts, and the Trade and Navigation Returns of Canada, for the next preceding fiscal year, have been published and ready for distribution; and when the said accounts and returns have been issued to the senators and members of the House of Commons of Canada in each of the years aforesaid.

He said: I desire, in connection with this motion, to ask the attention of the Government to an order of the House that was passed on the 5th May, 1887, with regard to this matter. The blue-books and different departmental reports had often been issued at a late day, and many members of the House, myself among the number, felt that it would be desirable to have such returns as the Trade and Navigation Returns, the Public Accounts, and the Auditor General's Report placed in the hands of members at the earliest possible date. We used to have these reports placed in our hands after the assembling of Parliament, and thus members were not permitted the privilege and advantage of careful study of these returns before coming here to discharge their sessional duties. The motion I referred to was moved by myself, and was as follows:—

That the rule now in force requiring the withholding of blue-books and departmental reports till the assembling of Parliament—results in the suppression, often for periods of many months, of information relating to public affairs which the public interests require should be promptly made public.

That the blue-books and departmental reports for each fiscal or calendar year should in future be made public as soon as practicable after the same are prepared, and that no unnecessary delay should be permitted to interfere with the issuing of the same.

That the Finance Department cause to be inserted in the "Canada Gazette" at the close of each month a statement of revenue and expenditure for the month, and also for the unexpired portion of the fiscal year, distinguishing between expenditure upon capital account and expenditure on account of Consolidated Fund, and giving statement of gross debt and net debt.

That the Customs Department cause to be inserted in the "Canada Gazette" at the close of each month a statement of exports, of imports, of immigration and of navigation for the month, and also for the unexpired portion of the fiscal year.

That the Department of Railways cause to be inserted in the "Canada Gazette" each week a statement showing the gross and the net earnings of each of the Government railways for the preceding week, and also for the unexpired portion of the fiscal year.

I fear, Mr. Speaker, that this mandate of the House has to some extent escaped the notice of the Government. The order contained in this resolution is a very explicit one, and the object as affirmed at the time, and as assumed by the Government to be a very good one, was to place in the hands, especially of members of the House of Commons, the information contained in these reports at the earliest possible moment. Now, Sir, this year the Trade and Navigation Returns, which perhaps are the most important of the returns issued by any of the departments of the Government, were issued more than seven months after the close of the fiscal year. Rather more promptitude was observed at first. The reports of 1889 were issued on the 18th of December of that year, those of 1890 on the 29th of December, those of 1891 on the 26th of December, and those of 1892 on the 27th of December. This year that report was not issued until the 6th February. I make this motion partly for the purpose of complaining at the unnecessary delay that characterizes the conduct of the Government in issuing these reports, partly for the purpose of calling their attention to the publication of the immigration returns and railway returns that they have not complied with, and partly for the purpose of bringing to their attention the fact that the House has required of them the discharge of a duty which they have not discharged in the spirit of the resolution passed by the House. I hope that in the future the Government will give attention to this matter, and will issue these reports more promptly, and will place them in the hands of the members of the House, and in the hands of the members of the Senate, and before the public, at an earlier date than they have hitherto done.

Motion agreed to.

RETURNS ORDERED.

Correspondence and other papers relating to the copyright question which have not already been brought down.—(Mr. Edgar.)

Return, in the form used in the statement usually published in the "Gazette," of the exports and imports from the first day of July, 1893, to the first day of March, 1894; distinguishing the products of Canada and those of other countries; and comparative statements from the first day of July, 1892, to the first day of March, 1893.—(Sir Richard Cartwright.)

REPORTS.

Report of the Secretary of State for the year ending the 31st December, 1893.—(Mr. Costigan.)

List of the Civil Service of Canada, for the year ending 30th June, 1893.—(Mr. Costigan.)

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 4.45 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, 21st March, 1894.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

OFFICIAL REPORT OF DEBATES.

Mr. LaRIVIERE presented the first report of the committee appointed to supervise the Official Report of the Debates, as follows:—

1st. That Mr. Alexander Colin Campbell be appointed to fill the vacancy on the staff of the Official Reporters caused by the death of Mr. Thomas J. Richardson.

2nd. That a gratuity of $1,000 be granted to the widow of the late Thomas J. Richardson, one of the Official Reporters of the House of Commons.

3rd. That in view of the fact of an extra allowance of fifteen days' salary having been granted last session to each of the sessional clerks, messengers and pages of the House, the same favour be extended to each of the amanuenses to the Official Reporters who were employed during the said session.

4th. That the quorum of the Committee be reduced from eight to five members.

THE MODUS VIVENDI.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to lay on the Table of the House copies of an Order in Council dated 17th of January, 1894, under the provisions of the Act respecting fishing vessels of the United States. The Order in Council brings in force the modus vivendi this year.

REPORT.

Report of the Department of Interior for the year 1893.—(Mr. Daly.)

BEHRING SEA REGULATIONS.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Mr. Speaker. I desire to move the adjournment of the House. This is a course I do not often take. But, as there may be some discussion in consequence of the remarks I am about to make, and as it is more convenient that such a discussion should be in order, and as you, Mr. Speaker, have frequently expressed your desire that we should observe the rules in this respect, I shall conclude my remarks with the usual motion to adjourn. The point to which I wish to call the attention of the First Minister is this: As I understand it, no steps whatever have been taken, up to the present date, either by the British Government or by our own Government, to give anything like legal effect or validity to the regulations which were made at Paris affecting the Behring Sea fishery—I believe I am correct in that statement. Now, Sir, I have seen very recently certain rather remarkable statements in the American press to this effect—that it is the intention of the American Government to order a number of their cruisers to attend the annual migration of the seals on their way northward from any point above 35 degrees of north latitude to Behring Sea; and that it is further their intention, and that instructions to that effect are understood to have been issued to the commanders of these cruisers to deal with any parties trespassing against these regulations as if the regulations were absolutely valid and of legal effect. Now, I am not going at all to impugn the desirability of enforcing these regulations as they have been agreed to, but I want to call attention—as the First Minister said the other day that a large number of sealers were being fitted out from Vancouver in British Columbia—to the extreme desirability, if these regulations are to be made effective, of the British authorities, or our own, so declaring, either by proclamation or by act of Parliament—I do not know which is the proper mode—and causing all parties concerned to be notified that such regulations are to be enforced. For, it appears to me, it would be very undesirable either that the British Government should have, as they did, I believe last year, to pay a large sum of money to its own subjects by way of compensation for not exercising their legal privileges, or that our flag should be subject to insult and humiliation, as has been the case in the past. I am not aware of the precise legal mode in which these regulations should be given effect to. That, no doubt, has been considered by the Minister of Justice and his colleagues. But, I think it would be a very great misfortune if a fresh crop of demands should spring up in consequence of such action as the American press intimates is intended to be taken by their cruisers. And I am sure the American Government would object to making compensation whether these regulations had legal effect or not, and, on the other hand, it would be very discreditable and humiliating for Canada or Great Britain to compensate their people under the circumstances. While I am on the subject, I may say that, if it be correct, as stated publicly by the United States press, that from this time out the United States are going to shepherd the annual migration of these seals along our coast and to take upon themselves the enforcement of these regulations, it appears to me, Sir, that there should be an intimation given to the British Government, which maintains a squadron on the Pacific, that the Yankee cruisers may be accompanied by a British force to see fair play. Also, I will take the opportunity to inquire whether any arrangement has been made, formally or informally, with the American Government whereby disputes arising through these regulations may be submitted to a joint court, which I think it would be an expedient thing to do. I think some of our friends from British Columbia might be able to tell us what the position of matters is there, or whether there is any considerable risk of British Columbia sealers being caught on the present occasion. We would like to hear from them; we have not heard anything of their views on this subject. At any rate, I would like to know from the Government what the precise position of the case is, whether these regulations have been enforced, or what steps require to be taken to enforce them, and whether it is their intention, or so far as they know, the intention of the British Government, to take action.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. In reply to the hon. gentleman's question I have to say that the regulations have no force or validity against British subjects until a statute has been passed by the Imperial Parliament. No doubt the obligation of Great Britain under the last treaty on the subject, pledges her to adopt the legislation which will be necessary to give the regulations force and effect; but the view is certainly held by Her Majesty's Government, and is held by this Government, undoubtedly, that a statutory provision is necessary by the Imperial Parliament to give the regulations any force or effect whatever over British subjects.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Statutory regulations by the British Government alone, or concurrently by ours?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. By the British Parliament alone. The contrary view was held, to some extent, on the part of the United States; how far by their Government I cannot say, but by one of the arbitrators, I see, the view has been put forward in a dissenting opinion, that the regulations have force and validity from the time of their announcement by the arbitrators. But the view is not only held by Her Majesty's Government that a statute of the Imperial Parliament would be necessary under the circumstances, but that view has been communicated to the Government at Washington; so that they are well informed that the opinion of the British Government is that the regulations are not in force and cannot be enforced without the assent of the Imperial Parliament. As regards the procedure which may be adopted, the question was discussed before the tribunal, and it was decided that that should be left to be provided by the statute which should be passed with regard to the whole subject. It would have been difficult, of course, for the international tribunal to arrive at an exact knowledge of the procedure which might be proper in order to give full effect to the regulations of the tribunal. But we have no doubt, and we have made representations to that effect, that the principles which have hitherto prevailed with regard to that subject, should prevail still.

Mr. EDGAR. The modus vivendi?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Yes, in this respect, that when the regulations are made statutory, the procedure against British subjects or vessels shall be in British courts, and the procedure against United States vessels or persons, shall be in the courts of the United States. A draft Bill has been prepared for introduction to the Parliament of Great Britain with the view of giving effect to the regulations. The Canadian Government have been consulted on the terms of that Bill, and have expressed their views with regard to it; it may be that this time it has already been introduced, because the last we heard of it was that it would be introduced very soon. I do not credit for a moment, the statement that the United States Government will attempt by a fleet of vessels or otherwise, to enforce the regulations of the Paris tribunal. I am sure that if any project is contemplated of sending out vessels, it will be for the purpose of seeing that the rights which the United States possess, irrespective of the findings of the tribunal, will be observed, and that the regulations will be enforced only when they have validity; and that if anything is contemplated on the part of the United States Government, it is the enforcement against citizens of the United States of the laws which Congress has passed or may pass, with regard to seals. We have had no intimation to that effect, but undoubtedly if, as is foreshadowed by the observations which the hon. gentleman has read in the press, it were intended, either before or after the passage of the regulations, that gunboats of the United States, or cruisers of the United States, should accompany our fleet of sailing vessels on the Pacific Ocean, we would request that some vessel commissioned by Her Majesty should be there to see that the duty was not too zealously discharged, or oppressively discharged, with regard to any of our people or their vessels.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. May I inquire of the hon. gentleman, while he is on his feet, whether the United States on their part assented to the proposition which I understood was made by the British plenipotentiaries, that offences committed by British subjects should be tried in British courts?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Yes, we understand they have, and that the draft of an Act which they have prepared, contains that provision. There was no objection made to that during the conference which took place in Paris; and in fact under the modus vivendi which has been in force, that procedure was insisted upon, was provided for, and was carried out. One of our vessels was sent to be tried at Victoria, B.C., when an adjudication took place upon it.

Mr. EDGAR. Is the modus vivendi supposed to be in force still?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. No, it has expired. But I may add, we have already communicated to Her Majesty's Government the impropriety of making any provision with regard to the coming season which would be applicable at all to vessels which have already sailed.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The only reason I called the attention of the hon. gentleman to the matter is this: He will notice that a very short time indeed can elapse, under article 2 of the regulations, before these provisions are supposed to come into force, and they are very positive:

The two Governments shall forbid their citizens and subjects respectively, to kill, catch or pursue, in any manner whatever, during the season extending each year from the 1st May to 31st July, both inclusive, the fur seals on the high sea in that part of the Pacific Ocean inclusive of the Behring Sea which is situated to the north of the 35th degree of north latitude.

So if the close season is to be enforced this year, there are barely five weeks now to bring it into effect.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. That prohibition can only be done by statute, and we have called attention to the position, in fact some weeks ago, before the sealers had sailed.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I suppose that the First Minister will have no objection to bringing down any correspondence that has taken place with the British Government, as soon as the measure is before the English Parliament. It seems to me that we should have, at an early day, that correspondence in our possession, so as to be better able to form an opinion on the subject. Of course, there is a difference between the treaties so far as the American Government and people are concerned, and the people of the United Kingdom. Under the constitution of the United States, a treaty is a part of the supreme law, and comes into operation without any Act of Congress ratifying it. I suppose that so far as people of the United States are concerned, the treaty is already in force, but so far as the people of the British Empire are concerned this treaty cannot come into operation until after Parliament has legislated.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. There can be no objection on our part to any paper being brought down on that subject—of course, we have to obtain the approval of Her Majesty's Government. The view with regard to the effect of the treaty in the United States undoubtedly affects the question, but there is still the question whether these regulations made under the provision of the Paris treaty, ought to be regarded as a treaty without receiving the assent of the Senate. That is the view of one of the American arbitrators; I cannot express an opinion upon it.

Motion to adjourn withdrawn.

CANADA TEMPERANCE ACT.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 11) to amend the Canada Temperance Act. He said: The amendment suggested is a very small one. Under the Canada Temperance Act prosecutions, so far as Prince Edward Island is concerned, are in the city and town brought before stipendiary magistrates, but outside the city and town they have to be brought before two justices of the peace, there being no stipendiary magistrates for the outlying portions of the province. The result has been that a very large number of cases, the Attorney General writes at least three-fourths of them, are appealed from the justices to the Supreme Court, and a period of from one month to six months sometimes elapses before these appeals can be heard. The appeals are really re-hearings, the witnesses having to be brought forward again. The result has been that the witnesses are not forthcoming, and a large number of the prosecutions fail from the absence of witnesses, and justice is not administered. The attorney of the Island intends to appoint stipendiary magistrates, professional men of good standing, for counties outside of the city and town, and the only amendment which I suggest is, that when these magistrates are appointed cases may be heard before them, just as before the stipendiary magistrates in the city and town.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

CORNWALL CANAL—DAM AT SHEIK'S ISLAND.

Mr. CHARLTON asked, Whether a contract has been awarded to Messrs. Davis Bros., or to Messrs. W. H. Davis & Sons, for constructing a dam at Sheik's Island in connection with the Cornwall Canal? If so, what is the amount of the contract,—when was it awarded; and was it awarded to the lowest bidder under public tender?

Mr. HAGGART. A contract for constructing the Sheik's Island dams has been made with William Davis & Sons. Before taking this action, the superintending engineer submitted an estimate of the cost of the work, which amounted to $374,000 odd, and he explained that the most suitable material to be had within reasonable distance from the work could be procured from contract No. 4, and that the adoption of the Sheik's Island scheme would necessitate certain additions at No. 20 lock and weir on that contract, and in that manner the two works were somewhat interwoven. Messrs. Davis & Sons were asked if they were willing to undertake the work at the contract schedule prices for contract No. 4, the work at those prices amounting, according to the quantities computed by the superintending engineer, to $374,000. The matter was referred to the chief engineer, who reported in favour of the acceptance of this offer, it being in his opinion in the public interests to do so, in which I concurred. The matter was reported to Council, and an Order in Council was passed authorizing a contract to be entered into with Messrs. William Davis & Sons, based on the prices in their contract No. 4. The contract is dated 19th June, 1893. It is a schedule price contract, but based on the quantities of work furnished by the superintending engineer: it amounts to $374,485. The contract was awarded in May, 1893.

THE BOARD OF CUSTOMS.

Mr. CHARLTON asked, How many times has the Board of Customs been called together for the transaction of business since the late Minister of Customs became Minister of Trade and Commerce?

Mr. WALLACE. There has been no formal meeting of the board since then, the present Acting Commissioner having only been appointed chairman of the board on 20th of January, 1894; but the opinions of the members of the board have been continuously obtained.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.)

CUSTOMS SEIZURES.

Mr. CHARLTON asked, Have the amounts paid to officers of the Customs, or officials connected in any capacity with the Customs Department, for seizures made during the past three years, been returned by such officers or officials to the Government in cases when the Government has subsequently refunded the fines imposed, to the parties from whom such fines were collected, in consequence of reversal of rulings or decisions, by virtue of which such fines were collected?

Mr. WALLACE. No distribution has been made, prior to refund, from the proceeds of seizures made or fines imposed.

LIGHTHOUSES IN THE PARISH OF STE. EMILIE.

Mr. GUAY (for Mr. Rinfret) asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to provide and maintain lights for the lighthouses erected some years ago by the Government, in the parish of Ste. Emilie, in the county of Lotbinière?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. In answering this question, I desire to do so more fully than to make a direct reply, as the circumstances relating to the lighthouses are rather peculiar. The circumstances are as follows: These are two buildings which were erected some years ago in connection with the scheme for lighting the 27-foot channel. They were not put in operation when completed, because the Montreal Harbour Commissioners found more trouble in completing the channel at Cap à la Roche than they had anticipated, and the branch pilots preferred using the Cap Charles range lights to which they were accustomed. In the meantime the two towers have been used as day beacons, and, I think, replace day beacons formerly maintained by the Harbour Commissioners. The Cap à la Roche channel has now been completed by the Public Works Department, and the lights are to be put in operation on the opening of navigation. The keepers of the two lighthouses were appointed in 1880, but the Order in Council provided that their salaries should not begin until the lighthouses were put in operation.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Then these lighthouse-keepers have been fourteen years in office and have done nothing?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. For those special reasons and under those circumstances.

I. C. R.—EMPLOYEES DISCHARGED.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) asked, How many employees of the Intercolonial Railway were discharged during the fiscal year ended July, 1893; and from which department of the railway, and in what numbers in each department? How many have been reappointed since that date, and in what numbers in each department, and at what salaries or wages? How many new men have been appointed since the above date?

Mr. HAGGART. Since 1st July, 1893, forty-nine men have died or left the service of their own free will, thirty-eight men have been dismissed, making a total of eighty-seven men. Of those, twenty-five were of the mechanical department, twelve of the track department, one of the stores department, three of the sleeping and parlour car service, and forty-six of the traffic department. The reappointments have been: mechanical department, fourteen men; one at 10 cents per hour, four at 11 cents per hour, two at 13 cents per hour, two at 13½ cents per hour, one at 14 cents per hour, one at 14½ cents per hour, and three at 15 cents per hour. Parlour car service: one man at $30 per month. Traffic department: one man at $25 per month, one at $1.20 per day, one at $1.50 per day, and one at $2.50 per day, two at $1. The number of new men appointed has been: mechanical department, thirty; track department, seventeen; stores, one; parlour car service, four; traffic department, thirty-two. Two boys in office. Total, eighty-six.

FISHERY BOUNTIES—BREAKWATERS IN GUYSBORO'.

Mr. FRASER asked, 1. Have the Government made definite arrangements as to the yearly date of payment of the bounties to fishermen? If so, what is the date and when was it fixed? What was the date of last payment in Nova Scotia? Have the Government or any member thereof authorized Mr. J. G. Forbes, the Conservative candidate in the county of Guysboro', to state that he is promised by the Government or any member of the Government in case he is returned, to obtain large sums for breakwaters and other public works in the said county of Guysboro'? Have any promises for such expenditures been given by the Government or any member thereof? 3. What is the amount expended in the province of Nova Scotia since 1878, by counties, on railways, harbours, breakwaters, wharfs and all other public works in said province?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The first paragraph of the question concerns my department, and in reply I desire to say arrangements have been made by which bounties to fishermen are paid every year at the end of February. These arrangements were first carried out in 1889. The distribution for 1893 in Nova Scotia was made last month.

Mr. FRASER. I have only received an answer to one question.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I know nothing about the second question. I did not know the hon. gentleman referred to me.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will allow the second and third questions to stand.

Mr. FRASER. Very well.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Each member of the Government has to be consulted to see if he gave his permission.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. That is what the hon. member for Guysboro' (Mr. Fraser) wants to consult us about.

MADUNNAKEAG FISH-WAY.

Mr. COLTER asked, Is it the intention of the Government to place a fish-way at the mouth of the Madunnakeag stream, in the county of Carleton, N.B.? If not, why not?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. In 1885, Inspector Venning reported that for many years, a fish-way had been maintained on this dam, without perceptible benefits. In 1892, another officer was instructed to inspect this river and report his views on the building of a fish-way. He reported that the dam could easily be made passable for salmon at a cost of about $100. He stated that the local sportsmen were willing to bear the cost of this work. On the 11th February, 1893, Mr. John Stewart, Superintendent of the Canadian Pacific Railway at Woodstock, wrote to Mr. Wilmot, saying he had "made all arrangements to place a fish-way in the Madunnakeag River, and hopes to have it placed in a few weeks, the sportsmen at Halton and Woodstock to bear the expenses." This seems to be a matter in which local sportsmen are primarily concerned.

I. C. R.—HARRIS PROPERTY.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) asked, What is the total amount paid for the property acquired in the city of St. John for the Intercolonial Railway, known as the Harris property? How and at what times, and to what persons, and in what amounts respectively was the purchase money paid? What amount has since been expended on this property, and for what purposes has the property been utilized? Has the fee simple yet been obtained and vested in the Queen in that part of the property which at the time of the purchase was leasehold? Has any, and if any, what moneys been paid to the possessors of the leasehold interest in this property? If so, how were the sums to be paid to the respective parties arrived at? Does the total sum paid exceed the amount Parliament was asked to vote and did vote for the purpose?

Mr. HAGGART. The total amount paid for the Harris property in St. John is $200,000, which was paid to the joint order of Messrs. Fred. Barker, agent of the Minister of Justice, and George Schofield, agent of the Harris estate: $75,000 on the 29th of January, 1892; $4,473.57 on the 8th of July, 1892, and $120,526.49 on the 2nd of August, 1892. No moneys have been paid by the Government to the possessors of the leasehold interest in this property. The fee simple has been obtained and vested in the Queen of the whole property purchased, which includes the leasehold. $5,944 was expended in building cribwork approach, laying tracks, floors, &c. The total sum does not exceed the parliamentary appropriations.

THE SCHOOLS OF MANITOBA AND THE N. W. T.

Mr. LaRIVIERE moved for :

Copies of all petitions, memorials and correspondence in reference to the appeal made in the name of the Roman Catholic minority of the province of Manitoba, in reference to the school laws of that province; also, copies of reports to and Orders in Council in reference to the same; also, copies of the case submitted to the Supreme Court of Canada respecting aforesaid appeal, and including factums and all materials in connection therewith, and copies of all judgments rendered and answers given by said court on or to the questions referred to them.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in making this motion, I do not intend at the present time to discuss the merits of the question that is involved. I shall wait until all the papers are put before the House and until the members are fully cognizant of the details of the question. I have my own opinion as to the merits of the case, and as to the action that has been taken thereon, and I intend, later on, as I have no doubt, an opportunity will be given, to express that opinion in an unbiassed and in a fair and impartial manner.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. LaRIVIERE moved for :

Copies of all school ordinances, school regulations or by-laws and amendments thereto, adopted by the Legislative Assembly, the Executive, and by any Board or Council of Education, in reference to the establishment, maintenance and administration of schools in the North-west Territories since 1885; also, for copies of all petitions, memorials and correspondence in reference thereto; also, for copies of all reports to and Orders in Council respecting the same.

He said: My remarks on the previous motion also apply to this.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. TARTE moved for :

1. Copies of all correspondence between His Grace Archbishop Taché, of St. Boniface, and any member of the Government since last session, and in particular of the memorial recently sent to the Governor General, or to the Prime Minister, respecting the Manitoba schools, and of the ordinances adopted by the Legislature of the North-west Territories in 1892, and now in force; 2. Copies of all memorials, petitions and letters addressed to the

Mr. HAGGART.

Governor General in Council, or to any Minister asking for the disallowance of the said ordinances; 3. Of correspondence between the Lieutenant Governor of the North-west Territories or the Executive Council of the said Territories, and the Dominion Government; 4. Copies of the instructions to the Lieutenant Governor of the North-west Territories, and of communications sent to the Executive of the Territories in order to induce them to amend the ordinances of 1892.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I feel it to be my duty to put this motion in your hands and to offer a few remarks upon it; and, imperfect as my English may be, I venture to ask the attention of the House while I attempt to address it in that language. Since the beginning of the session hon. members of this House, on both sides, have carefully discussed the commercial and financial position of this country. Nobody has yet alluded to its political situation, or rather to the grave national crisis with which we are face to face to-day—thanks, I am sorry to say, to the unwise, imprudent and irritating policy of the Government on the school question. Permit me, Sir, to use, as a description of that crisis, a speech which has recently been delivered in the city of Montreal by one of the leading Conservatives of the province of Quebec—the Hon. T. C. Casgrain, the Attorney General in the Taillon Cabinet. That hon. gentleman, speaking at a meeting of the Cartier-Macdonald Club, a few days ago—I quote from the Montreal 'Gazette' of the 28th of February—expressed himself as follows:—

A terrible wind is now blowing even at the very doors of the province of Quebec; and the storm is so strong that it is shaking Confederation to its very foundations. It is a difficult and delicate question which I am now taking up, and I wish to say that I am now speaking only as a citizen of Canada. I am now speaking of the question of separate schools in the North-west.

Confederation was the result of a compromise. In order to protect our fellow-countrymen, who had carried the seed of civilization to the North-west, we stipulated that they should always have the right to separate schools. Now, I contend that no one has the right to do indirectly what the law forbids to do directly. No one had the right to deprive the Catholics of the North-west of their separate schools. The Hon. Mr. Haultain, the Premier of the North-west Territories, understood that perfectly well. That is why he went in a roundabout way. He overhauled all the ordinances relating to the schools; and while the new ordinance reaffirms the rights of Catholics to separate schools, it makes these dependent on such conditions that they are virtually suppressed. So that Mr. Haultain has done indirectly what he could not do directly. The question put to the Federal Government was, whether the law should be disallowed. We have the right to insist that the protection given our countrymen shall be respected. If the understanding arrived at when Confederation was formed can be violated by one party, then that contract is only a paper which can be torn at will. The Federal Government has the right, and I will say has the duty, to disallow all laws contrary to the general interests of the Dominion, and such is the new ordinance. Speaking for myself, I say that fanaticism has long enough had its way. We have had enough of the McCarthys, O'Briens and of the P. P.A., which wanted to ostracise everything that is Catholic. We are citizens and useful citizens of this country. I can claim to be moderate on these questions. I fought the Riel agitation. But when it comes to decide the question whether Catholics have rights in this country, I say that it is time to be up and doing. I appeal to all moderate men, irrespective of creed. Fanatics are not the majority in this country: and if, to prove it, it is necessary to make a daring move—in French, a coup d'état—let it be made. The man who will make it shall have the united support of the province of Quebec. If to succeed it becomes necessary to call around our flag all moderate men, we will do it and we will again go over the work of Confederation. If we allow the sacred rights of our countrymen to be violated, we will vainly work for the progress of this province.

These were very strong sentiments, and they had the more importance because they were uttered in the presence of the Prime Minister of the province of Quebec and four or five of his colleagues. Naturally enough, that speech created a great sensation, in the province of Quebec at least. It was widely discussed. The whole ministerial press, with the sole exception of 'La Minerve,' the personal organ of my hon. friend the Postmaster General endorsed it. 'L'Événement,' which is one of the leading organs of the Conservative party in Quebec, and which is to-day under the able supervision of my hon. friend the member for Gaspé (Mr. Joncas), spoke as follows:—

The speech delivered by the Hon. T. C. Casgrain at the Conservative Club in Montreal has created quite a sensation, and will have a telling effect.

The Attorney General has echoed the feelings of all those in this province who understand that the system of active persecution is organized against them and that the time has come for us to take the necessary means of imposing respect for the rights which have been granted to us by the constitution. Mr. Casgrain deserves the congratulations of his countrymen on account of the patriotism, the firmness and the energy he has shown.

Another paper of great importance, and which is the organ and the property of one of the Quebec Ministers—I mean 'Le Courrier du Canada'—said:

We are the more happy to applaud those vigorous and manly declarations because they respond to the feeling that our readers have found in the columns of 'Le Courrier du Canada' during the last few days. Mr. Casgrain has exclaimed at a certain moment that if the central power is unable to protect the minorities, the guarantee contained in the right of disallowance is nothing less but worthless paper.

This is exactly our opinion. We said the other day that in the question of the schools of the North-west, the Federal Government had the power to disallow, that the circumstances justified disallowance, and that if the right of disallowance cannot be used to protect minorities it is not worth much. We congratulate the Attorney General on the energy and the frankness with which he has developed this idea that the central power is bound to protect the oppressed minorities, if the future of this confederation is going to be assured."

The newspaper, the 'Empire,' having taken upon itself to lecture the Attorney General of Quebec in the same way as it had lectured in former days my hon. friend from North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy). 'Le Courrier du Canada' replied in very plain language:

The 'Empire' says that nobody has been found to approve the conduct of Mr. Casgrain. We have the honour to inform our contemporary that he labours under a strange error. On the very evening of his speech, Mr. Casgrain was warmly cheered by the Conservative meeting to which he was addressing himself, and since then the most cordial congratulations and the highest approbations have come in great numbers to him. The 'Empire' is no more veracious when it insinuates that Mr. Casgrain's colleagues blame the Attorney General. We are better informed than the Toronto newspaper, and we beg him to believe that Mr. Casgrain did not express an isolated opinion when he spoke as he did in Montreal.

A few days afterwards, the Cartier-Macdonald Club met in the city of Quebec. That club is composed of the best class of young men in the Conservative party at Quebec. They thought proper to adopt the following resolution:—

That, in the opinion of this club, the last ordinances of the Legislative Assembly of the North-west relating to education contain dispositions which affect the established principle of separate schools and constitutes a new violation of the rights and privileges possessed by the minorities in this confederation.

That, while we take into account the spirit of justice of well-thinking citizens in this country and their enlightened patriotism, nevertheless in presence of the regrettable events, of the increasing appeals of intolerance and fanaticism, that we have witnessed for some time past, in some portions of the Dominion, this club thinks it is its duty to protest more firmly than ever, and beg to state that it approves on this point the energetic attitude taken by the Hon. T. C. Casgrain, one of the Ministers of Quebec, and the declarations which he has publicly made in Montreal, on the 28th of February.

Well, it is easy to understand that there was some reason for such a series of speeches and articles. What was the reason? Of course, we were not allowed to enter the sanctum sanctorum in which so many angelical spirits preside over our destiny. Nevertheless, the quarrels of the gods were made public to us through the indiscretions of some of their organs. There was a big row in the ministerial press of Quebec. 'La Minerve' supported very warmly and very ably, my hon. friend the Postmaster General, and contended that he was the only patriotic man in this country. On the other side, 'Le Moniteur de Lévis' lectured him in a severe way indeed. Through those indiscretions, it was made known that a sub-committee of the Privy Council had been formed, composed of my hon. friends the Minister of Finance, the Minister of the Interior, and the Minister of Agriculture. Those hon. gentlemen set to work with all the ability and energy we know they possess. They held long and mature deliberations. Still we have not yet been able to see the colour of their work, but there was a rumour to the effect that the three hon. gentlemen could not agree. Patriotic as they were, resolved as they were to work for the prosperity of their country, they were not able to agree, and the question was referred to the whole body of the Privy Council. But during the passage from the sub-committee to the Privy Council, there were very wicked rumours indeed circulated, and circulated by the organs of the Ministers themselves. We were told very plainly that four of the hon. Ministers—three of them I see on the Treasury benches now—had made up their minds that if the Privy Council did not see its way to disallow the North-west Ordinances, they would not be in a position to be of any more use to the Administration. We were even told that three French Ministers solemnly took the pledge that they would resign together if these Ordinances were not disallowed.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Not a bit of danger of that so long as the salary runs.

Mr. FOSTER. That is where it strikes an appreciative chord in you.

Mr. TARTE. We heard another rumour. I hope it is false, but I think I am justified in putting it before the House—simply as a rumour. It went so far as to say that the hon. the Postmaster General (Sir Adolphe Caron) went back on his colleagues without warning them. I trust the rumour is false; I put the question. The rumour may be false, but still this is the rumour that the good friends of the Administration have widely circulated. At any rate, one thing is perfectly clear, and that is this—that none of the hon. Ministers have seen fit to resign. I just remark that the hon. Minister is laughing heartily. I may submit to him presently, for greater enjoyment, the opinion of a journal which is under the direct control of the most intimate friends of the Minister of Agriculture—I mean 'Le Moniteur de Lévis':

Some Montreal newspapers having stated that alone amongst all our Ministers Mr. Ouimet had differed from the majority of the Cabinet on the question of the schools of the North-west, we have argued that it could not be so in presence of the most significant fact that the sub-committee of the Privy Council composed of Messrs. Foster, Angers and Daly had not been able to arrive at a conclusion.

Mr. TARTE.

Mr. Angers had consequently differed, and that difference of opinion had naturally been expressed in the Privy Council, especially as Mr. Angers has found an ally in Mr. Ouimet. As to Sir Adolphe Caron, we have, to inform us on the position he has taken in the Council, no other indication to that effect that he went two or three days afterwards to defend the conduct of the Government before a political club.

Is it natural to suppose, is it logical to conclude, that Sir Adolphe Caron would have defended an opinion which would not have been his own?

By publicly taking before all his countrymen the position that has been indicated in the newspapers, has he not sufficiently pointed out to those who are candid and also those to who are not candid the role that he has played in the Council?

Our deductions are, then, perfectly logical. 'La Minerve' itself, who pretends to laugh, shares our opinions when it says: "Have there been differences between the French Ministers? We don't know anything about it, but the thing is possible and even probable."

"Probable," says 'La Minerve.' And why "probable?" Would there be Ministers who have betrayed their oath of office to inform 'La Minerve,' or has 'La Minerve' arrived at that conclusion by simple deduction.

What 'La Minerve' says on the oath of office is grave and we invite it not to insist. The lesson that it wants to teach has been very badly learned. It is addressed to the wrong party.

Let 'La Minerve' ask of the party who inspires it—

I think my hon. friend the Postmaster General will understand the hint—

—for the narration of a little trip to Montreal during the last days of January by a person in a very high position. If its investigation is well conducted, it will learn to its great scandal that indiscretions have been committed which are of a nature to exempt 'La Minerve,' the confidante of the gods, from proceeding by way of deduction and which allows us to invite it to submit its extracts from Todd to other parties than to us.

If 'La Minerve' wants to know more, we are at its disposal at its first request.

Of course, 'La Minerve' did not want to know anything more—it had had enough of it;—but Sir, we were told that this crisis was going to be averted by Mr. Haultain, the Prime Minister of the North-west Territories, insisting that the Legislature should amend the ordinances of 1892. Mr. Mackintosh, the Lieutenant Governor of the territory, by a happy accident, was at the time on his way to the Capital. A few days afterwards, Mr. Haultain, while passing through Winnipeg, made a speech, in which he stated that he would not submit to any outside interference, that he thought the ordinances fair and just, and that he would not be a party to any amendment to them. Well, in the presence of these statements, I want to know how it is that the French Ministers, who had put their resignations into the hands of the Premier, have been able to retain their seats as they do to-day? Mr. Speaker, a question arises—were the Ministers from the province of Quebec serious or were they not when they instructed their press throughout the province of Quebec to state that they were asking for justice, and that they were insisting upon the disallowance of these ordinances? If they were serious, how is it that they are still on the Treasury benches? If they were not serious, they were simply pursuing the same imprudent course that has characterized the policy of this Government on the school question from the beginning; that is to say, they were contributing to increase the dangerous agitation that we have to face to-day. But, Sir, to save themselves from the humiliation in which they have been placed by their organs, they began to appeal to the most dangerous prejudices. Would you allow me to quote the last sample of that bigot sentiment that the organs of the hon. Ministers of the province of Quebec are trying to excite to-day? As every one knows, my hon. friend from Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) was introduced in this House by the hon. the leader of the Opposition and by my hon. friend from Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies). It is a courtesy that we owe to one another to introduce one another in the House. My hon. friend (Mr. Martin) was elected, not on the school question, but as a tariff reformer; he was elected by the votes of Liberals and Conservatives alike. If I went further, I would not say, perhaps, that he had been elected by the Catholic vote, but certainly, as he said the other day, he has received a great many Catholic votes. And why? Because the Archbishop of St. Boniface thought proper to be interviewed during that election. Of course, His Grace is not as good a Catholic, or as orthodox, as my hon. friend the Postmaster General, still he is something of a Catholic. His Grace was interviewed on the 11th November, 1893, and this is what he is reported to have said:

The interviewer ventured to ask His Grace how he expected Catholics to vote in the Winnipeg by-election. The archbishop replied that he thought the vote would be divided. If either candidate were an advocate of separate schools it might be different, but as the case now stands, those Catholics who desire tariff reform will many of them vote for Mr. Martin, though some will withhold their vote from resentment. Catholics, he said, were perfectly free to vote whichever way they saw fit.

Well, according to His Grace, the Catholic voters of Winnipeg were perfectly free to vote as they pleased; but when my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition introduces to the House a gentleman duly and legally elected, he commits a crime against heaven and society. Now, let us see the extent of that crime according to one of the most important ministerial organs in the province of Quebec, 'Le Courrier du Canada,' the organ of one of the Provincial Ministers in Quebec, Mr. Chapais. The heading is very suggestive:

LAURIER, MARTIN, DAVIES!

A SUGGESTIVE TRIO.

It is done! We wrote a little while ago that if Mr. Laurier dared to do it, he would introduce Mr. Joseph Martin, leaning on his arm, into the House of Commons, the persecutor of the Catholic minority in Manitoba.

Well, Mr. Laurier has dared to do it.

Yesterday afternoon the chief of the Opposition, escorted by Mr. Davies, introduced into the House the illustrious Martin. Laurier, Martin, Davies!

This spectacle is extremely suggestive. Mr. Davies is the author of the persecuting law of Prince Edward Island, of 1877. Mr. Martin is the author of the persecuting law of Manitoba of 1890. Both are fanatical adversaries of separate schools and of the rights of minorities.

And Mr. Laurier, the man that the 'L'Electeur' asks us to aid, opens the session by an official parade in company with these two men. Under the existing circumstances this introduction, usually a very ordinary affair, assumes a very grave character and signification. One would suppose that Mr. Laurier wished to break the ice, and to show upon the first day what the attitude of the Opposition would be on the school question.

Frankly, politics causes the observer to witness strange scenes.

My hon. friend from Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies), is perfectly able to take care of himself; still, if he allows me, I will briefly describe the law that the hon. member for Queen's passed in 1877. If I am rightly informed, the first school law in Prince Edward Island was passed in 1852. It is natural to suppose that a school law which had existed for 25 years in a progressive province, needed to be amended after so long a period of time. The election of 1876, was carried on the question of the necessity of improving the law. It was fought, not by one political party alone, but by a combination of public men belonging to both political parties. My hon. friend succeeded at the polls, and he then formed a coalition Government, of which he was the leader, but the majority of his colleagues were Conservatives. The law which was passed in 1877 did not change the principle of the old law; it only amended it by giving more power to the school trustees and making some other changes. At any rate, the law was adopted. There was some little friction, no doubt. Archbishop McIntyre thought that the improvements he had made on his school property were to be imperilled, and he applied, as I understand, for the disallowance of the law. His request was not granted; and a short time afterwards His Grace and my hon. friend came to a perfect agreement, and since that time His Grace has declared himself entirely satisfied. My hon. friend was defeated in 1879, and his position was taken by Mr. Sullivan—now, I think, Chief Justice Sullivan—who was a strong Conservative and a Roman Catholic. He remained in power for the long period of twelve years, and no amendment was made to the law. Sir, this is the law for which my hon. friend for Queen's has been hurled into eternal flames by 'Le Courrier du Canada.' Now, I want to know what we are going to do, and what is going to happen in the presence of such appeals to prejudices. I suppose my hon. friends opposite will not tell us that all these appeals come from this side of the House. I have quoted speeches, articles and statements made and written by their most important friends in the province of Quebec, and I will challenge hon. gentlemen opposite to find a single statement like this coming from any hon. gentleman on this side of the House. We have claimed justice, we are still claiming justice; we do not claim anything more than justice. I know that some of us, especially myself, have been shamefully misrepresented by some of the Ontario papers. I think I am the oldest newspaper man in this Chamber, one of them at least. I may have read more newspapers for the last twenty years than any other member of this House, for the simple reason that being able to read both English and French, I have read all the papers I could from England, from France, from the United States and in Canada. Sir, I am sorry to speak as I am going to do, but I must say that in my long experience I have never read a paper more wickedly mendacious than the Toronto 'Mail.' I know I am using a very strong expression, but I am confident that the fact justifies it. The province of Quebec is day by day systematically traduced. Its public men are calumniated and denounced to their fellow-countrymen. Yesterday one of my friends whom I now see, told me, "Tarte you are doing in Quebec just the work that is being done by McCarthy in Ontario." I asked him this question—because he is a very sensible gentleman—"Sir, can you read French?" He replied, "Unfortunately, I cannot." "Did you ever read any articles signed by me?"—for I generally sign my articles so that every one may know where I am. He said: "No, I cannot read French." Then, I asked, "Where did you find the evidence that I am playing on the feelings of my countrymen as Mr. McCarthy is doing in your own province?" Of course he was obliged to say: "In the translations that appear in some Ontario papers." My own personality is insignificant and of very little value, but my dear province of Quebec is something after all, and I throw back that slur cast upon it. We have a right to be respected by our fellow-countrymen of English origin; we have a right to be treated like men who love their country and do not want to ruin it. Well, every day the Toronto 'Mail' which is not refuted, I am sorry to say, by many Toronto newspapers, denounces the province of Quebec, its men and institutions, in such a manner that Ministers of the Crown should take cognizance of it. As a governing body they should ask their own organs to be more just to us. A few moments ago I was asking: What is going to happen? The Government is amenable to the charge of being the cause of all the agitation that is going on to-day. I do not speak in a party spirit, and I do not want to be so understood. The prime duty of a Government is to have a distinct and clear policy on all the important questions of the day. The hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches have endeavoured since the school question has entered the political arena to escape the responsibilities of their office. What have they done in the Manitoba school case? They proceeded by way of making promises, privately and publicly. They proceeded, moreover, by way of references to the courts, their only object being to gain time and placate public opinion if they could. As a matter of fact they have taken money from the public treasury to save their heads as politicians. What is the result to-day? The judgment of the Privy Council was given in due course. The hon. Prime Minister, who was then Minister of Justice, had proclaimed that if the Privy Council decided against the demands of the Catholic minority, there would be a remedy still. And whatever may be the efforts and ability of those who may undertake to defend the Government and the First Minister, if language means anything, I want to know what these sentences of his which have already been read to the House, but which I will take the liberty of reading again, can possibly mean. They are as follows:—

If the legal controversy should result in the decision of the Court of Queen's Bench being sustained, the time will come for Your Excellency to consider the petitions which have been presented by and on behalf of the Roman Catholics of Manitoba for redress under subsections 2 and 3 of the Manitoba Act, quoted in the early part of this report, and which are analogous to the provisions made by the British North America Act in relation to other provinces. Those subsections contain in effect the provisions which have been made as to all the provinces, and are obviously the provisions under which the constitution intended the Government of the Dominion should proceed if it should at any time become necessary that the Federal power should be resorted to for the protection of a Protestant or Roman Catholic minority against any act of the legislatures of the provinces or of any provincial authority affecting any right or privilege of such minority in relation to education.

Well, Sir, that pledge will be remembered by all men of good faith as having been made by the First Minister. I do not accuse the hon. gentleman of bad faith, but I do accuse him of weakness. He has, unwillingly perhaps, deceived the Roman Catholic minority. No sensible man who read the statement at the time—and observes that it was published broadcast—could fail to understand that the right hon. gentleman pledged himself to provide this remedy, that if the courts of justice decided that according to the strict letter of the law, the Catholic minority has no statutory rights, the hon. gentleman pledged himself to recognize and consider the claim that the Catholic minority in the province of Manitoba was promised and given, in 1870, the same rights as the English minority of the province of Quebec enjoy, and have long enjoyed, with our cheerful consent. I therefore say the hon. gentleman is amenable to that grave charge. I know the Catholics in Manitoba are weak. It is a fact which there is no use in denying; but I will never agree to the idea that in a British colony, where the people were brought up under British liberty, the majority would undertake to trample upon the rights of the minority. The policy and pledges of the Government are to-day pretty well understood. After the judgment of the Privy Council it became the duty of the Government to keep their pledge and to consider, to use the words of the First Minister, the petitions of the Roman Catholic minority. It did not do so. It had recourse to a new referendum, to the courts of justice, and the judgment has recently been given. Peculiar to say, the hon. Solicitor General who is an able lawyer, went before the Supreme Court and said nothing. The Government had one of the most important cases that could be presented before a court of justice, and still, Sir, the Government had nothing to say. They said nothing, and the Catholic minority got nothing. I would like to repeat a question which I put last year to the House, and to which the Prime Minister at the time refused to answer. I want to know: What is the policy of the Government now? The Supreme Court has decided, but as the hon. gentleman knows, this decision is not binding. The Government is still at perfect liberty to take any course they like. They have the responsibility of the Government, of the peace and of the good harmony of this country on their shoulders. They are a strong Government, backed by a large majority. Can it be possible that on such an important question, involving such great results, the Government have no policy? Are they going to appeal from the decision of the Supreme Court or are they going to abide by it? I believe that we have a full right to receive a distinct answer to this question. Now, Sir, what has the Government done with reference to the North-west Territories school question? The Ordinances were enacted in 1892.

Mr. DAVIN. What have they enacted? You have not told us the grievance. Explain to the House the issue.

Mr. TARTE. If the hon. gentleman will allow me, I will try to explain to his own satisfaction, if I can, what, I am sure, are grievances, but just now I am asking what is the policy of the Government, as it is my right to inquire. What has been the policy of the Government, I ask, with regard to the school question of the North-west Territories? The Ordinances were enacted in 1892, and they were going to be enforced in the course of the month of February last, if not disallowed by the Governor General in Council. As I explained, there were differences of opinion between the members of the Government; there is no possible doubt about that. We have been told by the organs of the Ministers, that if the Ordinances were not disallowed, at least the Catholic and the French minority of the North-west would still get justice, because the Government had recommended to Mr. Haultain, as was its right to do, to amend these Ordinances. We have seen that Mr. Haultain has already stated that he would not consent to amend the ordinances. The Government has not disallowed the law, but it has given inducements, it has given what I may fairly call false hopes, to the Catholic and French minority, and so the agitation still continues. Well, Sir, why has not this strong Government a decided and a strong policy? Do you think that it would not be better for all parties concerned if the Government told us plainly that these two questions are settled? If they told us that, we would know where we are and what means to take. The Government, by leaving everything undecided and by giving false hopes, have encouraged the dangerous agitation which we must face to-day. It may be said to me: You evidently want to invade provincial rights, I claim that this Government has denied the very principle of Confederation, in placing provincial rights over the rights of the people of this Dominion as a whole. We all know how the Confederation Act was enacted. Confederation did not take place out of the love that the different provinces professed for one another. No; Confederation took place because Upper and Lower Canada, United Canada, could not get along together any longer on account of their racial, religious and national differences. The Government was at a deadlock half the time, and then the Confederation scheme was adopted. Now, the very basis of the Confederation Act was the right of disallowance, that statement cannot be disputed. Disallowance and the right of appeal to the Governor General in Council were insisted upon especially by the English majority in this Dominion. And to-day, when we claim that the right of disallowance, and the right of appeal should be exercised towards the French and Catholic minority, I am sorry to say, that we are treated like fanatics. I want to know, and I ask the Government: If, in allowing all these prejudices to take root, they are acting wisely and as a Government worthy of the confidence of the people of this country. In the speech which my hon. friend the Attorney General of the province of Quebec made in Montreal, he stated that if it was necessary to make a daring move, it would be made in the province of Quebec. I beg, Sir, to dissent from that opinion. I beg to state, in the name of my electors, in the name of my countrymen—whom I believe I know as well as any other man—that we do not contemplate any daring movement or any ‘coup d’état.’ We mean to abide by a constitutional agitation, we mean to abide by the law of the land, we do not want anything more, but I do not believe that we should be given anything else. The Government profess to be very hostile to my hon. friend from North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) in his policy. My opinion is that they are following the very same policy, and, if I may be permitted to say so, they are driven by him. The hon. gentleman from Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) has obtained everything that he wanted to have. He wanted to have separate schools abolished, and they have been abolished with the concurrence of the hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House. He desired that the school laws of Manitoba should not be vetoed, and they have not been vetoed. As a matter of fact, the most important plank of his platform is gone, and, of course, I would not be sorry for it, if we had not been sacrificed by the agitation led by him. My hon. friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) has asked me a question which I am delighted to answer; he has asked me, what are your grievances in the North-west? In 1875 an Act was passed by the unanimous consent of this Chamber, and by a majority of the Senate, establishing separate schools and the French language in that country. In this Chamber, there was not a dissenting vote, and I see here to-day a great many hon. gentlemen who then sat in Parliament. Well, Sir, my hon. friend will admit that the separate schools have been abolished by the North-west ordinance.

Mr. DAVIN. No.

Mr. TARTE. My hon. friend says no. I will try to make myself clearer to him. Does not the Act of 1875 mention Roman Catholic separate schools? I want to know if, since the passage of the ordinance, there are any longer Roman Catholic separate schools in the North-west. We are speaking here as men of good faith, and let us use words in their ordinary signification.

Mr. DAVIN. There are Roman Catholic separate schools in the North-west.

Mr. TARTE. I will illustrate my idea in a way which I hope my hon. friend will understand. Suppose that at the next session of the Legislature of the province of Quebec—it will never be done, I am only supposing it—an hon. French member should copy, word for word, the Ordinance of the North-west Assembly and should propose to place under the control of the Government, constituted the Council of Public Instruction, all the schools of the province, all the books—in a word, everything connected with the schools—I want to know from any reasonable man, would not the Protestant separate schools of the province of Quebec be thereby abolished? We are here, not to play with words, but to speak facts. And now, let me say, with the utmost frankness, that in claiming our rights we are not acting under the dictation of any Roman Catholic or ecclesiastical influence. We are accused, especially by the ‘Mail,’ of being driven and led as a lot of cattle by the Roman Catholic clergy. With regard to the majority of the members of this side of the House, they have been fought by the clergy. I claim, and I am proud to claim it, that the most enlightened part of the Roman Catholic clergy are beginning to realize where they are now. There is not an hon. member on either side of the House who will not bear out this statement, that my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition is leading, in the province of Quebec, a party which has not received so far the full sympathy of the Roman Catholic clergy. And yet we are accused by the Ontario organs of hon. gentlemen opposite of being directed by the hierarchy. On the question of schools let it be well understood, that we are prepared to discuss calmly and like business men the whole situation. We quite understand that things may change; we quite realize that we cannot always remain stationary; but our position, in regard to which we should have the sympathy of every Protestant member of this Chamber, is this: We have made a bargain, an agreement, and, as one of the parties to that agreement we do not want our rights to be taken from us, at least without being consulted. If the English minority in the province of Quebec, which bears the same proportion to the French majority there, as the French minority bears to the English majority in Manitoba, were treated as the French minority is treated, the English majority of the Dominion would, if necessary, take up arms in their defence. My statement will not be challenged, because Englishmen are fond of liberty, and are not disposed to submit to being trampled upon. Is it surprising that we have the very same feeling? But we don’t go any further. So far as I am concerned, I always sign my articles. I speak here before the representatives of the whole Dominion, and I challenge any one to quote one single sentence of mine in which I have either threatened or attacked the rights of the English minority of Quebec. With regard to the other part of the question put by my hon. friend, I want to know if the minority of the province of Manitoba and in the North-west do not suffer from the deprivation of the very same rights that the English minority enjoy in the province of Quebec. We had a right to our language; we had a right to our separate schools, those rights have been abolished. Hon. gentlemen will say that they have been legally abolished. Every one of us has known in his experience many good cases which have been lost in the courts of justice; but, in my experience of history I have never yet known the case of a people being deprived of their political rights through the courts of justice. That is the reason why we insist so much that this Government should have a policy on this matter. I do not know whether any of the Ministers will condescend to answer me. I am not speaking in my own name alone. I am speaking on a question which is to-day exciting the attention of the whole Dominion. Would it not be better to have a full discussion and the settlement of these grievances in this House during this session, than to let the agitation in the country be continued? Sir, we often boast that we have a magnificent country. It is true. We often boast of our desire to build up a nation on this soil of British North America. That is a legitimate desire. But how can we build up a nation if we are going to quarrel with one another? Is there a man of brains who would think for a single moment that the English majority of the Dominion, strong as it is, could conduct public affairs profitably by dictating to the French and the Catholic minority? Nobody imagines that. If we want to become a nation and live as civilized men and Christians should live, let us come to some understanding. When we converse with one another in this House we are all of opinion that we should put a stop to all appeals to prejudices and bigotry. When it becomes a matter of party politics we are driven into the abyss. I have perhaps spoken too long, but the question is one of very great importance. I hope I have dealt with it in a spirit which is not offensive to any one. My great aim was to put before the House the question as I honestly understand it, and nothing more.

Mr. TARTE.

Mr. DAVIN. I do not rise, I need hardly say, to oppose this motion, but to relieve the overwrought feelings of this House, after the speech of my hon. friend (Mr. Tarte). I am sure that the members of this House, particularly the French-Canadian members, who take a deep interest in the French minority in the North-west, must have been deeply grieved to hear the striking description of the differences existing among us in that country. To know something of the grievances of the kind described by the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte), and of grievances of a similar character described from another point of view, a North-west member has to come to this House. It must have struck any rational man, on hearing the speech of my hon. friend, that my hon. friend has left us still in the dark as to what really our grievances are. The speech of my hon. friend, if he will excuse me, I will say was a vocal scrap-book. He gave us what Mr. Casgrain, the Attorney General of Quebec, said. He gave us what 'Le Courrier du Canada' and the 'Moniteur de Lévis' and sundry other papers and people said; but I waited in vain to hear my hon. friend, who, I believe, is a university man, and must have a more or less trained mind, state the case on which he asks this House to come to an opinion. He failed to state the issue or the grievances which require remedy. I appeal to his own friends whether he has up to this minute stated these grievances. I would ask him to do so now, and I am sure the House will permit me to take my seat if my hon. friend describe the grievances which he says are existing in the North-west. He has given us the opinion that no Roman Catholic separate schools exist there. I say they do, and I say that not a single Roman Catholic separate school has been suppressed by any legislation in the North-west.

Mr. TARTE. They are under the control of a Protestant Board.

Mr. DAVIN. My hon. friend says they exist under the control of a Protestant Board. I will describe to the House what has been done. It is a mere accident that the members of that board are Protestant. I will read to the House what the arrangement is in regard to that. Hon. gentlemen on one side and the other rise up and give the public outside the notion that some portion of our people in the North-west is suffering under great grievance, and hence these strident appeals, calculated to do harm to that country. Is it not extraordinary that my hon. friend could quote gentlemen in Quebec by the dozen as to the existence of grievances in the North-west, and not be able to quote a single Roman Catholic opinion in the North-west.

Mr. LAURIER. That is what he is moving for—for the petitions.

Mr. DAVIN. That is all right, and you will have the petitions. But I ask is it not extraordinary, that, if there is such a sense of grievance in the North-west among the Catholic minority, no speaker has said one word about these grievances? What I want to point out is this, that I have never myself heard any complaints against the Ordinances as they exist. What I have heard is complaint against certain regulations. Now, I will show to the House what actually exists. The Council of Public Instruction is composed as follows. I am reading the Ordinance of 1892:—

The members of the Executive Committee and four persons, two of whom shall be Protestants and two Roman Catholics, appointed by the Lieutenant-Governor in Council shall constitute a Council of Public Instruction, and one of the said Executive Committee, to be nominated by the Lieutenant-Governor in Council, shall be chairman of the said Council of Public Instruction. The appointed members shall have no vote and shall receive such remuneration as the Lieutenant-Governor in Council shall provide.

As to separate schools, section 22 provides:

The minority of the ratepayers in any organized Public School district, whether Protestant or Roman Catholic, may establish a Separate School therein, and in such case, the ratepayers establishing such Protestant or Roman Catholic Separate Schools shall be liable only to assessments of such rates as they impose upon themselves in respect thereof.

Well, certain regulations were made by that Council of Public Instruction, and they were objected to. I am not going to say whether they were rightly or wrongly objected to. I suppose every one who knows me is aware that there is probably not a man on the continent of America so free from dogmatic prejudices, though they exist among so many of my fellow-countrymen of opposing opinions, as I am. Yet I speak with some earnestness on this subject, and for this reason: I say that it is more than one's patience can very well endure, to sit here, as I have for years past, even before my hon. friend (Mr. Tarte) was a member of this House, and hear hon. members, who know absolutely nothing of the North-west, speaking as though this or that section were being trampled under foot. My hon. friend refers to the newspapers. I never read long articles from newspapers to this House myself—I know their value. But I have read articles in one of the best written papers in the Dominion of Canada—the Toronto 'Mail'—from which one would suppose that Mr. Royal, while Lieutenant-Governor, was like a czar driving his political car over the Protestant sentiment of the North-west. It is not necessary to assure this House that there was nothing of that kind. It would be simply impossible. What actually happened was this: Mr. Royal, when he first came among us, went beyond the powers given him by the Dominion Act in handing over everything to the Assembly. The late Sir John Macdonald saw what he was doing, and reminded him that he must act within the Dominion statute. When Mr. Royal tried to hark back, and get within the Dominion Act, he seemed to be taking back something he had given, but he was only declaring that he had no power to give that which he had assumed to give. Subsequently, legislation took place that practically gave the Legislative Assembly all the powers of a Provincial Assembly, with two or three points excepted, and the North-west at the present minute is practically in the position of a province, save these two or three exceptions, and the fact that instead of getting a subsidy as the other provinces do, we get a grant in bulk but for specific purposes.

Mr. CHARLTON. What are the exceptions?

Mr. DAVIN. We cannot charter insurance companies and we cannot borrow money.

Mr. DALY. Cannot charter railway companies.

Mr. DAVIN. Railway companies also. Now, Sir, I have read these ordinances. Let me repeat that I have no brief here for the existing state of things, or any possible state of things. The issue I have with my hon. friend from L'Islet (Mr. Tarte), and the issue I have had with my hon. friends on the Ministerial side, when they have described a state of things which does not exist in the North-west, is plain. Certain regulations relating to the separate schools were passed, and these regulations were objected to. Now, what did this Executive Council which my hon. friend (Mr. Tarte) described as a Protestant council, do? My friend Mr. Haultain—who is described as premier, but who as he is a sensible man, laughs at that description of himself—has taken steps to meet the criticisms of his acts with reference to these questions, upon which he will have to appear before the people at no distant day. Here, I may say, are the modifications of the regulations, signed by Mr. James Brown, who is Secretary of the Council of Public Instruction:

In reply to inquiries respecting 'Readers' and examinations for promotion in Roman Catholic schools—

You see the schools are there.

Mr. TARTE. Hear, hear.

Mr. DAVIN. My hon. friend says, "Hear, hear." He knows this to be the fact. But will any man who has listened to him, not agree with me, that the impression conveyed by his speech was that the Catholic schools were done away with?

Mr. TARTE. The words are there, but the thing is gone.

Mr. DAVIN. Here is the modification that was made:

In reply to inquiries respecting 'Readers' and examinations for promotion in Roman Catholic schools, I am directed to forward the following minutes passed by the Council of Public Instruction the 13th of January, 1893:—

The regulations of the Council of Public Instruction mailed to all schools on or about 16th August last govern all examinations held under the direction of the Council.

The following Readers are authorized for use in Roman Catholic Schools in Standards I. and II., and become compulsory after 1st January, 1894, viz.:—

Protestant Readers? No.

The Dominion Series (Sadlier's Catholic Readers) Parts I. and II. and the Second Reader; or "The Ontario Readers" Parts I. and II. and the Second Reader.

In school districts where French is the vernacular the school trustees may, upon obtaining the consent of an Inspector, in writing, use the Ontario Series of bilingual readers, Parts I. and II. and the Second Reader, instead of the Dominion Series or the Ontario Reader. In all standards above the Second the Ontario Readers are prescribed after 1st January, 1894.

Now, there were some details of such a character that upon these, probably, there was ground of complaint, though I understand this ground has been removed. As a fact, at this moment the Roman Catholic schools there are taught, in some cases by Roman Catholic ladies with vows, and the schools are in existence precisely as they were before this ordinance was passed. We get a grant of something less than $200,000 all told. What was the use, Mr. Speaker, of having a dual inspection? As now arranged they have a Protestant inspector and a Catholic inspector. At one time the Catholic inspector goes over the district previously travelled by the Protestant inspector, and, at another, the Protestant takes the ground previously travelled by his Catholic colleague. Is it to be supposed, when they fix on the readers and the character of the instruction to be given in the schools that either inspector cannot be trusted to see that the system is carried out effectively? I have heard, as I say, from one or two friends in conversation, complaints against some of the regulations. I cannot say that I have heard complaints against the enactment. My hon. friend stands here to support the Roman Catholic schools for the North-west. He may be surprised when I tell him that no greater enemy—though he does not mean it—no greater enemy of Roman Catholic schools in the Territories exists in the Dominion of Canada than my hon. friend. The speech my hon. friend has made here to-day and every such speech, let me tell him, is a blow struck at Roman Catholic schools as they exist in the North-west. I am dealing simply with the question of schools in the North-west and not with any question outside of that. Sir, let me tell you that the people of the North-west, Catholic and Protestant, have, if possible a stronger sentiment of provincial autonomy—because it is nascent—than the people of any province in the Dominion of Canada where the sentiment is matured. The sentiment that they ought to be accorded all the rights and all the privileges of a province, is strong all over the North-west; and men who have no more prejudice against Roman Catholic separate schools than my hon. friend, if the Government had disallowed that Ordinance, would have been agitating all over the country. I said to one gentleman, who is, I believe, a friend of my hon. friend on my right, who is a French-Canadian, and takes a deep interest in this question: What do you want? Could you succeed in having the Federal Government disallow that Ordinance, you know well the result would be that agitation would never cease until we had in the North-west a Martin Bill. Those are the exact words I used.

Mr. MULOCK. Yellow?

Mr. DAVIN. Yes. Yellow Martin. Another incident showing the utter ignorance that prevails as to the state of opinion in the North-west was the speech of Mr. Casgrain. Mr. Casgrain, like my hon. friend, never stated the grievance. It would be very hard, I think, for my hon. friend, after reading over that Ordinance, to say that separate schools do not exist there still; I will be very glad if he will show me from that Ordinance where his grievance is. If there is a grievance, or any of his friends feel that there is a grievance, in regard to that Ordinance, it is his duty to point it out. Now, I have seen the statement in the papers. Mr. Casgrain mentioned it, and my hon. friend quoted it, that perhaps the Lieutenant-Governor of the North-west and Mr. Haultain, were going to fix this thing up, and they would tell the Legislative Assembly what to do. Sir, we have not yet got party Government in the North-west Territories, and there is no one in the Local Assembly with what is called a following in the sense that Mr. Mowat, for instance, has a following in Ontario, or the right hon. gentleman who leads the Government, or the hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition, has a following in this House. There is no man in local politics that has such a following, and if Mr. Haultain were foolish enough to make any such suggestion, the Assembly would simply go on their way without minding the suggestion. There is, I repeat, a strong sentiment in favour of provincial autonomy in the North-west, and I am perfectly certain that it would be a pretty dangerous thing for Mr. Haultain to go to the country if he attempted to take any such course as Mr. Casgrain thinks he ought to take. What would be the use of it?

Mr. MULOCK. Perhaps you had better explain some of the changes.

Mr. DAVIN. The alleged grievances have not been very clearly explained. One of the grievances—and it is one that I certainly condemned myself, but I am under the impression that it has been remedied—was that Mr. Goggin, the Educational Superintendent, laid down that the ladies who taught in Roman Catholic schools, or the ladies about to take vows for the purpose of teaching, should go and be examined either at Calgary or at Regina, unless they were already qualified. Well, I considered that that was not necessary, and that it would be well to adopt the plan followed in Manitoba some years ago, namely, that the examiner should go and examine those ladies and see that they came up to the standard required by the Council of Public Instruction. It is, however, not a practical question at present, as all the ladies teaching or desiring to teach in Catholic schools are qualified. Now, Sir, I hope that my hon. friend will not think that it is rude on my part to say that I do not think he understood this question, although I am sure he must understand it now, if he did not before. I think I have shown the House how the legislation stands; I have shown the House how the Council of Public Instruction is formed, and I think I have shown the House where the shoe pinches, if there is any pinch. It was understood that a kind of informal arrangement had been come to so that the Ordinance would work, and I am very sorry if any hitch has occurred. Sir, I repeat that there never was a more mistaken course taken by any one who is a friend of separate schools, than the course of objecting to the state of things that exists at present. If you agitate it the result will be that a sentiment, partly provincial—and I won't say that there is not another sentiment of a warmer character than provincial—might be raised, and the results would be inimical to the very cause my hon. friend has at heart. Now, Sir, my hon. friend speaks of the "dear province of Quebec." Dear that province is, not only to him, but to us all. But does he not suppose that the people of the North-west can say: "Dear Territories of the North-west"?

Mr. TARTE. We do not abolish separate schools in the province of Quebec.

Mr. DAVIN No, you do not; but what you are contending is that something has taken place in the Territories that causes a great grievance to you. That is the point. Why, Mr. Speaker, my hon. friends talk about the French minority in the North-west Territories. I cannot speak the French language as my hon. friend does; I cannot appreciate all the fine and delicate 'nuances' of expression that belong to that magnificent tongue, as my hon. friend does; but I can, to a great extent, appreciate that language, and I need hardly say that I have no prejudice against the French language or against French people. But if you are going to talk about the French minority in the territories, what are you going to do with the German minority? Why, the German minority is of consequence to-day, and at the rate they are growing, they will soon compete with the English inhabitants in the North-west Territories. What are you going to do in regard to them? I am not aware of any French-Canadian in the North-west Territories who complains of any grievance. I am aware that gentlemen in high authority have objected to the regulations in regard to separate schools; and I am aware that on the part of my hon. friend, on the part of the hon. member for Simcoe, and on the part of several other hon. gentlemen, there is a hallucination prevailing as to the dual language question in the North-west Territories; a perfect hallucination. The bee buzzes as loudly and as nonsensically in the head of my hon. friend as he buzzes in the heads of others. Sir, there are some other things that I would like to say on this question, but as the House is about to adjourn I will defer saying them now, as I will have another opportunity of speaking before my hon. friend's motion finally passes.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I would like to make a suggestion as to the course of public business. This order cannot be resumed this evening as public Bills and Orders will come up after Government Orders, and I think it would be convenient, therefore, that this debate should stand adjourned. To-night, according to the Order of the House given the day before yesterday, when the House adjourns it will stand adjourned until Tuesday next, and inasmuch as a large number of members desire to take the night trains for the east and west, I think it would not be well for us to begin anything like the Budget business to-night, more especially as the Finance Minister, if he took four or five hours to deliver his Budget Speech, would have no time to reply to any comments on his speech. I may say that my colleague is perfectly ready, if it is the wish of the House, to go on with the business of this evening. What I would propose, however, is that we should adjourn this debate and then adjourn the House.

Mr. DAVIN moved the adjournment of the debate.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The hon. gentleman has the floor. Before moving the adjournment, I ask to have it agreed that the debate on the Budget, which I suppose will begin on Tuesday, shall be continued 'de die in diem' when it reaches the Committee stage.

Mr. LAURIER. I have no objection to that.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Does the Finance Minister definitely decide to make his financial statement on Tuesday?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and the House adjourned at 6.10 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, 27th March, 1894.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 12) to amend the Electoral Franchise Act by providing for a residential qualification for all voters.—(Mr. Edgar.)

REPORTS.

Annual Report of the Department of Railways and Canals, for the fiscal year ending 30th June, 1893.—(Mr. Haggart.)

Tables of the Trade and Navigation of the Dominion of Canada, for the fiscal year ending 30th June, 1893.—(Mr. Wallace.)

EX-JUDGE PALMER.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish, pursuant to private notice I gave the leader of the Government, to ask whether the Letters Patent have yet passed under the Great Seal, granting to ex-Judge Palmer, of New Brunswick, superannuation allowance provided in certain cases.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. On receiving the hon. gentleman's letter, I made inquiry yesterday, and I was told they had passed.

SEALING IN BEHRING SEA.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I desire to ask the Prime Minister if he has any further information to communicate to the House with respect to the subject to which I called attention at the last sitting, namely, what action has been taken or is likely to be taken in regard to the capture of sealers in Behring Sea? The hon. gentleman, I dare say, has noticed that the statements I made with reference of the possible intention of the United States Government seem to have been more or less accurate, if the American press is to be at all relied upon.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. There have been one or two despatches from the Colonial office on the subject within the last few days. I would not like to state from memory what bearing they have on the hon. gentleman's question. I will look at them, and tell the hon. gentleman to-morrow.

INSTRUCTIONS TO LIEUTENANT GOVERNORS.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I would like to call the attention of the Prime Minister to a statement made in the press, and to ask him to inform the House what are the facts in the matter. I notice a statement that the instructions issued to the Lieutenant Governor of the North-west have been recalled, and other instructions have been issued in their place, and there is also the allegation made that new instructions have been issued to the Lieutenant Governors of the various provinces. If so, I think the House should be informed in regard to what instructions have been issued, what were the reasons for recalling the instructions previously given, and in what respect they vary.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The same instructions have been given for some years past to the Lieutenant Governors of the several provinces. I am under the impression that a copy of them has already been placed on the Table of the House; if not, a copy of the instructions will be brought down. The instructions given to the Lieutenant Governor of the North-west Territories were the same as those issued to the Lieutenant Governors of the provinces. The Lieutenant Governor of the Territories called our attention to the fact that in some particulars, not very material, the ordinary instructions were inapplicable to the Lieutenant Governor of the Territories, from the fact of there being no Executive Council and matters of that kind, and therefore the instructions were recalled, and made applicable to the Territories by change of phrase merely, not by change in any material particular.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE BUDGET.

Mr. FOSTER moved :

That the House resolve itself into Committee to consider the Ways and Means for raising the Supply to be granted to Her Majesty.

He said : Mr. Speaker, I shall have to crave the indulgence of the House to-day for a more lengthy hearing than usual, and to bespeak the kindly attention, even a more considerate attention, which I could scarcely ask, than hon. members have generally given me, owing to the magnitude and length of the task which is set before me. In the first place, I will as briefly, as plainly and as definitely as possible, lay before the House the statement of the finances of the preceding year, with the usual remarks and observations with respect to the current and succeeding years, and after that, will proceed to explain the tariff recommendations with which I have been intrusted, and which I am to present to the House. I do not intend to make any pretense of a speech in the statements that I am to place before the House, but I desire to do my work in the shortest and most business-like way possible. Last year, it will be remembered, I gave no detailed statement of the probable revenue to accrue during the current year, but gave a gross estimate amounting to the sum of $38,000,000. The actual revenue has exceeded the estimate by $168,608, the Customs overrunning the Customs receipts of the preceding year by $452,944, the Excise overrunning the Excise receipts of the preceding year by $422,267, and the miscellaneous revenue or earnings overrunning those of the preceding year by $371,526. So that the excess of revenue from these three sources, besides being $168,608 more than was estimated, shows $1,246,737 in advance of the revenue of the preceding year. The principal items in which the revenue increased, briefly stated, are as follows :—

| Breadstuffs | $ 20,495 |

| | Qty., 1892. | Qty., 1893. | Duty, 1892. | Duty, 1893. | Increase in 1893. |

| | | | 7,846,107 | 8,266,706 | 420,599 |

The duties accruing in 1892-93 as compared with 1891-92 show an increase in spirits, in malt, in cigars, in cigarettes, in tobacco, and snuff: that is, along the whole line, and amounting in all to $420,599. The per capita consumption of these articles as revealed by the report of the Controller of Inland Revenue is :

| | Spirits. | Beer. | Wine. | Tobacco. |
|------------------------|----------|--------|--------|----------|
| | galls. | galls. | galls. | lbs. |
| Average from 1867..... | 1.120 | 2.768 | .137 | 2.152 |
| do do 1891-92..... | .701 | 3.516 | .101 | 2.291 |
| do do 1892-93..... | .740 | 3.485 | .094 | 2.314 |

There is a slight increase in tobacco over the average, and over the consumption per head, of the year 1891-92. The House will see, then, from what I have stated that the remarkable fact about the year 1892-93—and I think it is a fact well worth noting just here—has been the extraordinary recuperative power which has been exhibited; a recuperative power which in Canada has been in marked contrast with the history of greater countries, and I may say, in fact, with all the great nations of the world. For, whereas these other countries have during the year 1892-93 experienced exceedingly great disturbances of trade, with a falling off in exports and imports, and a falling off in revenue as well; the fact remains that as far as trade is concerned, as shown by the Custom House revenue, as far as excise is concerned, and as far as the earnings, the miscellaneous revenue of the country are concerned, there was an increase in each item; a considerable and a steady increase over the year preceding, which, as the House may remember, marked the highest period which had been attained from Confederation up. These facts, I think, are worthy of consideration and of note at this time, showing as they do the healthy condition of trade in Canada as compared with other countries, showing the increased consumptive power of the people, showing also, if we will look into the returns, an augmented and expanding energy in the industrial work of the country as marked by the increase in raw materials, which in 1892-93 have been imported for working up in these different industries. Another gratifying fact about the year 1892-93 is that the miscellaneous receipts of Canada increased by the sum of $371,526, showing that the earning power of these investments of the Government has kept steady and gradual pace with the trade of the country and the improvement of the country in other respects.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I do not want to interrupt my hon. friend unnecessarily, but will he give details of that? Has he got the details there?

Mr. FOSTER. The details are given in the Public Accounts in full under the head of "Miscellaneous," so that I have not troubled the House with them just here. I wish to state that these receipts have shown a gratifying increase for a number of years back. They amounted in 1867-68 to $1,987,247, and by 1873-74 they had grown to $4,075,907, or an increase of 105 per cent. In 1878-79 they had decreased slightly, remaining almost at the figure they were in 1873-74. In 1892-93 they had bounded up from four millions of dollars to $8,847,241, or an increase over 1878-79 of 118 per cent. The increase in the earnings, or miscellaneous receipts of 1892-93 over those of 1891-92 was $371,526, as I have stated, or 4½ per cent. The rate of taxation on home consumption entries of dutiable goods last year was 30·28 per cent; on the total of goods imported for home consumption dutiable and free, it was 17·38 per cent, thus showing a decrease in the percentage raised on goods entered for consumption, both dutiable and free, from 21·21 per cent in 1889-90 to 17·38 per cent in the year which has just passed. Whilst, therefore, the other colonies of Great Britain have felt very acutely the commercial depression, the loss of revenue and the loss of trade in the year 1892-93; and while that has been felt also by the great countries of the world, Canada, perhaps, without exception amongst the countries of the world, shows an increased trade both in imports and exports, and an increased revenue of one and a quarter million dollars over the preceding year 1891-92. Coming now to the expenditure for the past year. I stated about a year ago, or a little more, that my estimate of expenditure for the year 1892-93 was $36,700,000, whereas the actual expenditure was $36,814,052. The income was $38,168,608, so that the total expenditures on consolidated fund account taken from the total revenue on Consolidated Fund account, leaves, what has been a pleasant and recurring experience in the administration of the present Government, a tidy surplus of $1,354,556, to be carried to capital account. The increase in expenditure in 1892-93 as compared with the preceding year was $48,158. That, however, is a very small increase when you take into account the increased interest on the debt, the increased sinking fund charges, the large quarantine expenditure to which the country was put, the mail and steamship subventions which have been added to, and the increasing demands for the various public services of the country. In fact it is well for the House to remember just at this moment, that from 1887 to 1892-3 there has been almost a stationary expenditure upon Consolidated Fund account. In the year 1887-88, $36,718,494 was expended, and in 1892-93, $36,814,052, or an increase of only $95,558, and the average of the expenditure for the six years from 1887-88 to 1892-93 was $36,599,312, the expenditure during those six years being, as I have said, about stationary. So that it would not be anything more than pardonable for me and for the Government, and for the party which supports the Government, to take note of the fact, and to emphasize it—that, in six years of Canada's growth, with services over a widely extended range of country constantly growing, and new ones constantly coming to the front, and in a time of progress and competition, when those services have to be generously met, we have been able to meet them, and have been able to keep the country's expenditure on Consolidated Fund at an almost stationary figure, and to have a good surplus each year to carry to capital account. Coming to capital account, the expenditure for this year has been in excess of the expenditure of last year, mainly owing to the extraordinary expenditure for the finishing of the Sault Ste. Marie Canal. The expenditure upon railroads and canals, chiefly, of course, on canals, was $2,782,490; on public works, $181,877; on Dominion lands, $115,038; making altogether $3,079,406, as against $2,165,700 for these items the year previous. If you add to this amount railway subsidies, which total $811,394, as compared with $1,248,215 the year preceding, you have a total capital expenditure, adding some few miscellaneous items, of $4,039,673 during the year just past. Taking from that sum the surplus of $1,354,556, taking also from it $2,095,513 applied to sinking fund, which, of course, is laid up against the debt, taking also $40,000 received from the city of St. John, we have as an addition to the debt the sum of $549,605, as against an addition to the debt last year of $3,332,403; another evidence of careful financial supervision and careful and prudent expenditure. The expenditure on capital account, has been met by temporary loans and by the issue of stock, the temporary loans made for this purpose amounting to $1,460,000, and the stock issue amounting to $1,186,403. So much with reference to the capital expenditure.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Will my hon. friend state from whom he borrowed the $1,460,000?

Mr. FOSTER. The Bank of Montreal, our financial agents, which, I think, took most of the Treasury Bills, although they have been assisted somewhat by other London houses. Coming now to revenue and expenditure for 1893. I must frankly say to the House that I cannot present so favourable a statement; but the statement, such as it is, and exactly as it is, I intend to give. The revenue and expenditure up to the 10th of March of the present year, and of last year respectively, were as follows:—

|--------------------------------------|--------------|
| Revenue to 10th March, 1894. . . | $25,096,000 |
| do do 1893. . . | 25,771,000 |
| Expenditure to 10th March, 1894. . . | 22,633,000 |
| do do 1893. . . | 22,235,000 |

Last year from the 10th of March to the 30th of June, revenue accrued to the amount of $12,397,000, and expenditure was incurred to the amount of $14,579,000. If I were to calculate on the basis of receiving as much money from revenue from the 10th of March this year up to the end of it, as was received during the same period last year, and making an equal expenditure, the figures would stand in this way, that we should have a revenue of $37,493,000, and an expenditure of $37,212,000. But I cannot expect so large a revenue from the 10th of March this year to the end of the year as we received last year. The year 1892-93, as I have stated, was a remarkably steady, and, in fact, a progressive year. The progress, so far as the revenues were concerned, remained remarkably steady up to about the middle of December, 1893. From that time to the present the revenues have shown a gradual decline, due to two causes: First, to a general apprehension throughout the country that there was to be a change in tariff conditions, and what followed from that, naturally and logically, a general prudent restriction of expenditure, and waiting to see what the tariff would be before making large purchases or undertaking large expenditures. This, I have no doubt, has been the principal cause of the temporary recession of the revenues. There has been, however, I think, another cause, which is this: Though this country stood remarkably well the stress of the hard times and the commercial disturbances which the world experienced in 1892 and 1893, and seemed to have passed through them without visible effect upon our trade or revenue, we are now feeling the reflex or dying influences of that world-wide depression and period of low prices, and it has had and is having the effect in Canada—for a period short as yet, and which I believe will not be of long duration—of making people prudent in expenditure and careful and conservative in their purchases. These reasons lead me to think that the revenues will be considerably less during the year 1893-94 than the revenue which accrued in 1892-93, and from present appearances I do not anticipate more than thirty-six and a half or thirty-six and three-quarter million of dollars. If the expenditure from the 10th of March to the end of the year should be normal, that would leave us with a deficit; but this Government has come to the conclusion—a wise conclusion, which I think will be echoed by this House, and in which the Government will have the co-operation and cordial help of the House—to endeavour to live during this year within our income, and, if our income is less, to resolutely keep down the expenditure, so that in the end we shall not have that unwelcome visitation which so often made its appearance to my hon. friend who sits opposite me—an ugly and ill-visaged deficit. A prudent business man, any prudent business concern, any private gentleman, any householder, would take that course of action; and in the national housekeeping it is equally incumbent, it seems to me, to follow the same course. It is fortunate that we have come pretty closely up to the limit of our capital expenditure upon great works. Three months from to-day, if our calculations are not wrong, will see Canadian vessels passing through the Sault Ste. Marie Canal, and an uninterrupted channel of communication for Canadian and other vessels, totally within Canadian waters and Canadian territory, from the centre of this continent out to the seaboard. We have spent a large amount of money upon our general canal system and upon the Sault Ste. Marie Canal. This last expenditure will be finished by the end of the year.

Mr. FOSTER.

and what remains will be the deepening and widening and other improvements necessary to the St. Lawrence canals and river, which will not cost a very large sum and will not extend over a very long period of time. Therefore it is fortunate that at this particular time, we are nearing the end of extraordinary expenditure for heavy public works and coming to a period when our revenue must more nearly equal our expenditures on Consolidated Fund account, so that we shall have to borrow less for the necessary capital expenditure which, from time to time, will have to be made.

Mr. CHARLTON. What expenditure is deemed necessary on the St. Lawrence canals, and what depth of water is it proposed to provide?

Mr. FOSTER. That is a question which more particularly pertains to my hon. friend who sits beside me. I am not prepared to give an estimate, but I think somewhere in the neighbourhood of $8,000,000 or $10,000,000 is supposed to completely finish the work and give the depth to the canals proposed for and known to the House for several years back.

Mr. CHARLTON. What is the depth?

Mr. FOSTER. Fourteen feet. Leaving the question of expenditure, I wish to say a word or two with reference to two or three facts worthy of being noted when considering the year just passed. The savings of the country, as indicated by the deposits of the people in the Government and other savings banks, show an increase as usual—an increase which might not have been expected, but which nevertheless took place. On the 30th June, 1889, we had a balance of deposits in the Government savings banks, including the Post Office, of $42,956,357. About that time, as hon. gentlemen will remember, the rate of interest was lowered from 4 per cent to 3½ per cent. For that and other reasons the deposits ran down until, on the 30th June, 1891, they touched $39,400,026. On the 30th June 1892, they had increased only to $39,529,546, but the deposits had an upward tendency. On the 28th February, 1894, those deposits had grown to $42,165,896, or an increase of $2,636,350. Another evidence of the thrift and prosperity of our country during the year 1892-93 is shown by the fact that whilst this increase took place in the Government savings banks, there was also an increase of about $7,908,418 in the savings deposits in the other chartered banks; and if we add to these the savings of the people as placed in the loan and building societies—not a very large amount, about $19,000,000, and which remains fairly stationary—we find that the total deposits of the people, the total savings of the people—their deposits in the various banks, Government and others—amounted, on the 28th February, 1894, to the sum of $242,645,358, or a sum of nearly $50 per head for the population of the country. When we take into account the fact that in 1878 this total was only about $87,000,000, the fact remains that an increase between that period and the present has taken place of $155,096,312. The commerce of the country during 1892-93, I have briefly noted. As finances showed exceedingly well in that year, as the savings showed an increase of about ten million dollars, so the trade and commerce of the country showed not only well, comparatively to itself in preceding years, but exceedingly well relatively to the experience of other countries. The Australian colonies, in their trade, ran down by hundreds of thousands; British commerce decreased in 1892-93, as compared with the preceding year, to the extent of $133,291,535, her exports decreasing to the extent of $41,678,026. French commerce declined $97,811,239, her exports declining $49,883,914 of that amount. The United States trade fell off $133,182,229, her exports showing a decrease of $68,499,544. With this record of decrease and decadence in trade, it is pleasing to contrast Canada's experience, which shows an increase in trade of $6,269,177, and an increase in exports of home products of $6,459,344. If that is an indication of progress relative to our foreign commerce, when we come to the country itself we find that more miles of railway have been operated, namely, 15,020, as compared with 14,585 in the preceding year. We find that there has been an increase in the passengers carried; we find that about an equal amount of freight has been moved—some twenty-two million tons—and we find that the earnings are larger than in the preceding year, amounting to about $52,000,000. The tonnage by lake and sea has been well sustained. The increase of imports and exports has taken place as I have stated, and a notable and gratifying effect in relation to this increase is that in farmers' products—agricultural products, animals and their products—there has been a large development, the year 1892-93 showing a total export of these products of $49,235,106, against $46,145,590 the preceding year. As to the distribution of the exports to the United States, Canada sent $6,020,992 worth in 1893, as against $6,643,019 in 1892; to Great Britain, $40,420,681, as against $36,869,595 the preceding year. Now, Mr. Speaker, having thus briefly and rapidly gone over the financial exposition, as it is called (which I think cannot but be, on the whole, gratifying to the House) it becomes my duty to take up the second branch of my labour of the day; that is, to say something with reference to the tariff changes which it is proposed to introduce. I am sure the House will pardon me if I preface the recital of these changes by some general remarks upon the question. You will agree with me, Mr. Speaker, that there could not well be a more important question for a Parliament to discuss and for a country to decide than the principle upon which and the details with which it arranges its fiscal and tariff legislation. The arrangement of a tariff and the principle which is to be adopted has two aspects—it looks to the revenue which is required in a country, and it looks as well to the general trade and development of a country. I wish, at this early stage of my remarks upon this subject, to say that, so far as the revenue aspect is concerned, it is of infinitely less importance than the effect of the principle and the details of the tariff upon the trade and development of a country. I know—and hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House will recognize it as a fact when I state it—that the revenue which is raised under a tariff is used often (and used, in my opinion, very often wrongly) either as an argument in favour of a tariff principle or as an argument against it. It has not been outside of the experience of myself and other hon. gentlemen on this side of the House that the fact that thirty-eight millions were raised and spent in the country in a single year has been debited to and made the ground of attack upon the policy, and the principle of the policy under which that revenue accrued. That is a position which, to my mind, is scarcely defensible. The principle of the tariff has nothing to do in this year 1893-94 with the amount of money which is required for the country's expenditure; and the fact that thirty-eight millions of dollars are raised under it is neither an argument for its support nor an argument for its condemnation. In the first place, thirty-eight millions of dollars are not raised by the tariff at present in force, and would not be raised by any tariff put in force in this country. Of the thirty-eight millions of dollars of revenue, twenty-one millions of dollars has to do with tariff principle or tariff detail. But the other seventeen millions of dollars are raised in totally different ways, as hon. gentlemen well know. So that the fact that a large amount of revenue is raised and spent in the country is not to be used by opponents of the present policy either in its details or in its principle as an argument against it and for its condemnation. The first thing to be settled by a country in this relation is how much money it ought to raise for its current expenses. When once that is settled, then the question of tariff simply has to do with revenue in this light—whether that revenue can be raised under that tariff or not, and then the tariff is relegated to the place where it properly belongs, and the view with which it should properly be canvassed—the principle and details of the tariff under the working out of which the necessary revenue shall be raised. So that the principal aspect in which the tariff is to be viewed is as to its effect upon the trade and development of the country. The principle of the tariff was well discussed in 1878 and several years preceding. It was discussed by the rival parties on the platforms of the country, and in the House of Parliament itself.

Then the question was relegated to the people, and the decision of the people given upon it. That decision has been reaffirmed in 1882, in 1887, and in 1891. Now it happens that, in the course of events, a period arrives when a retrospect is to be taken of the tariff in its operation, and when the question comes again before Parliament as to the principles of the tariff and as to the details which shall be built upon those principles. It seems to me that there are only three possible principles upon which, or methods by which, a tariff can be modelled. One is to have simple free trade, under which you have no customs imposts at all, the revenue necessary for the country being raised by direct taxation, however it may be distributed. Another is to have a revenue tariff which selects a list of articles and places rates of impost upon those articles, chiefly with a view to the quickest, easiest and best method of raising the amount which is necessary, but also with the necessary sequence of incidental protection whenever this selected list includes those things which are produced or can be produced in the country itself, a protection which is incidental, but which, in a purely revenue tariff, is never designed. The other and third method is the protective tariff, by which you select a certain list of articles and place upon them certain rates of impost with a view to raising a certain amount of money for the services of the country, but more especially with this view, that whilst you raise the amount of money that is necessary for the country, you shall stimulate the development of the resources of the country, you shall help to make its industrial life broad and diversified, and progressive, to manufacture in the country, by the labour of its people, as much as possible of what the people have to consume, and over and above that, as much as possible of what outside countries can be got to take of the products of the labours of the people. So the difference between a revenue tariff and a protective tariff is not that there may not be in both an incidental protection, but that in a purely revenue tariff that protection is simply incidental and not designed; whilst in a protective tariff it is both incidental and is designed to be a protection, and is put upon the statute-book for that purpose. Now, Sir, it seems to me that outside of these three methods no others have ever been proposed, or have ever been acted upon. Take the first, the simply free trade method. There is no country in the world to-day which practices it, or which has adopted it; there has been no country in the world, among those classed as great and progressive countries, which has ever adopted it. It is something which is very well to talk about, something which in airy and fine-sounding phrases, does to tickle the ear, at the hustings, of the audience that is listening, but which when brought down to the cold plane of discussion in Parliament and in legislative halls, has no place, and up to this date has found no place. The only great country in the world which has adopted the second method is Great Britain. She has selected a list of articles and placed imposts upon them, and so far as any of those articles are produced in the country, and are not subject to an equivalent excise tax, she has given them protection. The protection is brought to a minimum when the list of articles is so chosen that the whole of them, or the most of them, are of a class which is produced abroad and which is not produced at home. The third method is that which all great countries at the present time, with the exception of Great Britain, has adopted and has in practice, and that is the protective system, in which a list of articles is selected, and upon which impost rates are placed with the design, not only of raising a revenue, but of protecting the country in its various industries, in its labour and in its general development. Great Britain, which to-day is the only example, as I have said, of a country which has a revenue tariff as nearly as possible approaching to the non-protective, is a country which commenced her career by a protection which in some cases amounted to absolute prohibition, and which, for many years, progressed under a very high rate; and it was only when at last, by the unique development of her own forces, her own industrial powers as compared with surrounding countries, and the unique combination of conditions outside of herself which put her in a position to dominate completely the industries of the world, that she threw her ports open and allowed all products to come into her markets without imposts, in order that she might, for her own interest and benefit, carry the products of her labour, of her inventive faculties and mechanical genius, into every quarter of the world. She did that, but year by year her customers have been learning her arts, though they have not practised her example; and whilst they, in inventive genius, in mechanical dexterity, in industrial development, in many cases are equalling Great Britain, or coming close up to her, at the same time they are protecting their own ports and their own country; and to-day wares and goods which formerly were made in Great Britain alone, are now made in every quarter of the globe, and they are coming from protective countries into the markets of Great Britain to compete with what she manufactures, and throwing out of employment, in many instances, the very artisans who are descended from generations of industrial operatives in Great Britain.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Would the hon. gentleman leave the academy and come back to Parliament?

Mr. FOSTER. I have a first duty to perform to my hon. friend to make up for something in which, possibly, he has been previously lacking, and to give him a touch of the academy before I come down to his comprehension. If Canada were to-night commencing

'de novo' and discussing the principle upon which she should arrange her tariff with a view to the development of her resources and of her industries. She would have this surrounding set of circumstances of which to take cognizance: that being young, without the advantages of wealth, with all the initial disadvantages of a new country and a comparatively undeveloped country, so far as industries are concerned, surrounded by older and wealthier countries, having generations of skill, with large industries competing for the marts of the world, and on a world-wide scale, and all earnestly and fiercely competing for trade in those industrial products which Canada herself might have to take for the consumption of her people. If she were in that position to-day it seems to me that the very same thing would have to be done which was done in 1878 when she first canvassed this question, when she first came to the decision that it was impossible for her to have the industrial development which she needed, and which was necessary to her progress and her permanence, unless she gave to her people the vantage ground of a measure of protection which would mitigate the fierce competition and the advantages which older and more skilled countries possessed against her; and when she chose, as her policy, the well-known principle underlying the present tariff. In 1878 the Liberal-Conservative party espoused that principle, that party has existed on that principle up to the present time, it exists to-day upon that principle. More than that, it proposes to base its existence for many days to come upon that principle. One thing is certain, that so far as this Government is concerned, their policy is historic, it is definite, it is undoubted. I wish I could say the same of the party of hon. gentlemen opposite.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Ha, ha.

Mr. FOSTER. Will some one tell me what is the principle which they believe to be correct now—I mean the principle which, at this present time, is in favour with hon. gentlemen opposite? I invite them now, and especially the hon. gentleman who sits opposite to me, early in the discussion, a discussion which is one of the most important this Parliament has ever entered upon, and upon the decision of which the people will poll their votes not many months hence—

Mr. CHARLTON. How many?

Mr. FOSTER. I cannot tell my hon. friend. If I did so, he would know just as much as I do, and I never want an opponent to know as much as I know myself.

Mr. CHARLTON. Does the hon. gentleman know?

Mr. FOSTER. I invite the hon. gentleman, who will speak in the course of this debate, to be frank in this matter, as he has never been frank with the country or with this Parliament in the matter of tariff, and to tell the people and to tell this Parliament just what he proposes as the principle. I do not ask him for the details, on which he will base his fiscal policy. The question is so serious and the consequences which hang upon it are so great, that the people will demand—and the hon. gentleman might just as well give it now as give it later—that he go to the country with a definition of his principles which will not have any doubt about it, but which will be plain, definite and clear. The policy of protection, which was adopted in 1878, has been objected to for several reasons, and just for a moment I wish to glance at two or three of the objections which have been made. In the first place, it has been objected to because of the alleged high rate of duty which it imposes upon products imported into the country; and the attempt is made with many persons, who do not have the advantage of reading, discussing and understanding these matters as do gentlemen who are continually engaged on them, to show that the tariff under the protective system that has been in force in Canada since 1878, and which is in force now, is one that is abnormally and outrageously high. Let me discuss that question for a single moment. Is it high? If there is to be a protective system at all, everybody knows that it must be higher in its inception than as the years gradually pass, when industries have become established and when the industrial development of the country grows apace. If a high degree of protection is necessary at any time, it is necessary in the initial years of a policy which adopts the principle of protection as its basis. Compare the rate of impost upon products coming into this country with that in other protected countries, and how do we stand? Is the assertion correct, that the rate of impost in Canada under the protective policy is absurdly and outrageously high? Suppose we compare it with other countries, not with France, which is a most highly protected country, but with the United States, and consider the actual figures as to what the imposts are in our own country. Well, Sir, if you take the average of the ad valorem duty paid on all dutiable goods imported into this country for home consumption from 1879 to 1893, you will find that in no year has the rate exceeded 31.85 per cent, and that the average of those years has been 28½ per cent. That is a refreshing and moderating fact when taken in connection with the assertion constantly made by the opponents of the policy that under it the imposts reach 40, 50, 60, 70 and 100 per cent.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. FOSTER. True in regard to trivial and individual items here and there, but entirely misleading, as tending to induce the public to believe that it is an outrageously high rate. That is a mode of argument which is open to hon. gentlemen opposite, but at least, we must confess that it has not the merits of open, candid and complete truth. The rate per cent of imports dutiable coming into the United States between 1879 and 1893 has never been below 43 per cent, and has gone up to 50 per cent, and the average of those years is 45½ per cent, on the imported dutiable goods for home consumption in the United States; that is, Canada has this protective tariff that hon. gentlemen opposite have always denounced as being so absurdly and outrageously high. 17½ per cent lower than the tariff in force in the protective country by the side of us, the United States. But there is another point of view which for plain, honest and complete truth must be brought out. What the people pay as the amount of the impost can only be fairly taken and fairly put if you take the total amount of goods that are brought in for home consumption and used by the people. The very essence and concomitant of a national policy on the protective system is that while you build up industries in the country, you leave raw material which is not made in the country or grown in the country, free, as a basis of cheap manufacturing, and the dutiable list and the free list go side by side and have gone side by side under this policy; and the true measure of the impost and cost, so far as revenue is concerned, and so far as the people of Canada are concerned, is to find out what has been the duty rate on the total quantity of goods they have imported and consumed in this country. Taking that as a basis, what do we find? That in no year from 1869 up to now, has there been more than 21·57 per cent duty upon dutiable and non-dutiable goods on an average as an ad valorem impost in this country, and that the average has been 19 per cent. In the United States there has never, until the last two years, been a less duty than 25 per cent; it has become lower during the last two years, since raw sugar was taken off the dutiable list and put on the free list, but, notwithstanding that fact, from 1879 to 1893 the average impost on dutiable and free goods in the United States was 27½ per cent, while in Canada it was 19 per cent.

Mr. CHARLTON. What has it been in the United States during the last two years?

Mr. FOSTER. In the last two years in the United States it has been 21·26 per cent, and 23·49 per cent. So that I think the contention is fairly made and is well founded, that if you take the tariff as a whole and compare it with the tariff of protected countries, even as to the dutiable list, it is a moderate tariff on the average; and if you take in connection with that the large free list which goes side by side with the list of imposts, the tariff is remarkably moderate, not exceeding at the present time 17½ per cent, or a shade below it. But there is another point of view to be taken, and that is that in Canada the National Policy, so far as the protective features are concerned, has laid no heavy hand upon the vast consuming population so far as staple products of consumption are concerned, and I desire to draw the attention of the House for a moment to this point. What are they? The staples of living produced in this country have been benefited, in that the protective policy has kept the market from periodical and sectional demoralization, and that has been its value, and that is the value of the principle of protection so far as it applies to the staple products of the country, which are produced in surplus. But, with reference to these things, what is the truth of the matter? In lumber, in brick, and in stone, which are the staples of building, this country has a surplus, and they are not enhanced in price. In the matter of fuel, of wood and of coal: the one abounds everywhere, the second abounds in different portions of the country in large degree; and since the year 1887 the only remaining article of the fuel of the people, in the shape of anthracite coal, has been free. So that to-day the fuel that the people of this country need for warmth and for comfort, is free and untouched by the National Policy or its imposts. If you come, again, to the staple food of the country, its vegetables, its fruits, its grains, its meats, its dairy products, all of these grow in this country to a surplus, and the National Policy lays no heavy hand of impost upon them. They are raised here, they are raised in surplus, and, so far as the energy and power of the people is concerned, they are hampered to no degree by the National Policy. The tea, the coffee and the sugar of the people have also been made free under the National Policy—although that was a boon which could not be given by hon. gentlemen opposite under their revenue policy—and millions of taxation have been remitted from all classes of the people, especially the poorer people, on those products alone. The National Policy has laid no heavy hand on the people so far as the consumption of these articles goes. Let us come to the staple articles of wear: the boots and shoes, upon which there is a tariff of 25 per cent, but every man knows that in Canada boots and shoes are made as good and bought as cheaply as they are in any country in the world. On the cottons that are used by the people, the average tariff has been about 28 per cent, and cottons to-day can be bought in Canada, taking quality and price into account, as cheaply as anywhere else in the world.

Mr. FOSTER.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. FOSTER. Taking quality and cost into account, I say yes. I have had two pieces of cotton placed before me, bleached cotton.

Mr. CASEY. No.

Mr. FOSTER. Actually yes. My hon. friend may never have seen the like, but I have. One of these pieces was a Canadian cotton and the other a foreign cotton, and, to look at them, they appeared equally good; but if you tore the foreign cotton, the sleeves of your coat would be covered with the clay filling with which it abounded; while, if you tore the Canadian cotton, you had the strong, steady fibre. Take the woollens of the country. There has been an average impost upon them of but 30 per cent, and the woollen consumers of Canada have been well supplied with good material and cheap. Even take the iron that has been used in the country, upon which my hon. friend opposite has declared undying and unrelenting warfare, and with reference to which he has declared, that the moment he comes into power every item of duty goes off from iron. The hon. gentleman nods his assent to that one part of the principle of his tariff, which is the only one I have been able to get from him. But, Sir, it may surprise my hon. friend, who has probably not looked into it, to know, that if he will take the imports of iron into this country last year, and calculate the ad valorem duty on the whole of them, it only amounts to 22 per cent. So that, even with the outrageous iron duty that is spoken of so much, when you take the high-priced, the low-dutied and the free together, the average ad valorem duty last year amounted to about 22 per cent. These are the four great staples of manufactured products, and in that regard I hold that the National Policy has laid no heavy hand upon the people of this country, so far as the consumption of these articles is concerned.

Mr. LAURIER. Surely, you are not going to amend this very perfect tariff?

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend wants me to tell him two hours in advance what I am going to do.

Mr. LANDERKIN. The chances are even yet.

Mr. FOSTER. They are even yet. Now with regard to the luxuries. The tax in this country under the National Policy has not been excessive and the rate which has been placed upon luxuries is a rate which they are quite able to bear, and which in any form of the tariff they should bear in their contribution to the public service. Another objection that has been made to the National Policy and to the protective principle in it, is: that the cost of many manufactured goods has been enhanced to the consumer on account of the rates imposed. Now, Sir, I grant that argument at once to a certain extent. I say that in the initial years of a National Policy with a protective principle in it, it will have the effect of enhancing the cost of goods, and that at the first the cost of goods will be very closely up to the measure of the protection which was given. If it does not have that effect why should it ever be adopted at all and what is the good of it? The fact that you have a country which is not in its then present condition able to compete with the great industries and competitive powers of the world, shows that it is necessary that they shall have a vantage ground upon which they may collect their forces, upon which they may deploy the industrial activities, upon which they may gain experience, and in which they may get skill; and the object of a protective tariff is to give that vantage ground, and in giving it I frankly admit that in the initial stages the price will be raised to a certain degree. But I want to meet my hon. friends opposite on this argument of theirs, which again is not altogether truthful and perfectly honest. That is: that in their speeches before the country and in their speeches in this House, they tax the National Policy with raising the cost to the full amount of the duty which each article bears at present. Now I say that that is unfair. I affirm that the only measure of rise, the ultimate measure of rise in cost under the National Policy is, the difference between the impost that it puts upon a certain line of goods and what would have been put upon that line under a revenue tariff, and a tariff for revenue purposes only. And I say this: that if hon. gentlemen opposite reproach the National Policy with a 30 per cent tariff upon hardware, while they put a 17½ per cent impost upon it; in perfect fairness all the cost they can debit to the National Policy is the rise between 17½ per cent and 30 per cent, or 12½ per cent. If they thought it was necessary to put a tariff of 17½ per cent upon boots and shoes for revenue merely, with the incidental protection that it gave, and if the duty on boots and shoes to-day is 25 per cent, do not debit the National Policy with the full 25 per cent of rise, but debit it with what properly belongs to it, namely, the 7½ per cent. Let us go further than this. Go back to 1878 and calculate the ad valorem equivalent upon all goods dutiable and free brought in to this country, and it is 14 per cent. Calculate it to-day and it is 17½ per cent, and debit the National Policy with what belongs to it, namely, a rise on the total consumption of the country of 3½ per cent. Now, Sir, I have been frank to admit that, in the initial stages of a protective policy, the prices of goods manufactured under it will be enhanced; but I am here to state another fact, and that is, that as capital invests itself, as industrial establishments multiply, as they become diversified and distributed throughout the country, the power of internal competition comes in to take the place of external competition—a competition in many cases more keen and destructive than the foreign competition, owing to equal conditions of production and equal conditions of carriage and distribution in the country. It is one of the most patent facts in the history of the National Policy here, as in the history of protection in the United States, in Germany, and in other countries—and a fact that cannot be contradicted—that, although there is at first a heightening of prices, they tend to come down, by the multiplication of industries and the competition which results therefrom, until the producers sell simply at the cost of manufacturing, plus a merely living profit. But, Sir, a crowning objection that hon. gentlemen take to the National Policy is that it is an offspring of greed and selfish cupidity on the part of the few—of a desire amongst some to rob, and an acquiescence by the great majority in being robbed, until the process is legalized; and then it becomes, as my hon. friend says, legalized robbery. The very force and vehemence of an assertion like that disproves it. This is a free country; the free men of Canada are an intelligent people, and they make their representatives understand what they want; and their representatives right quickly put on the Statute-book what the people make them understand they think ought to go on the Statute-book. There is the straightest and freest communication between the legislative power and the constituencies which are the basis of the legislative power; and no long years of dilly-dallying, no long years of delay, take place between the expression of the people's sentiments at the polls and the crystallization of that sentiment on the Statute-books of the country. And to say that a system like this, canvassed from one end of this country to the other in 1878, before an intelligent Canadian electorate—canvassed ever since, and decided four times at the polls, and always by the same intelligent electorate—can be set down as the cupidity and selfishness of a few to rob the people under the guise of law, is to make one of those assertions, so extravagant, and consequently so harmless, that I wonder hon. gentlemen opposite have not reformed their methods in this respect, and come down to milder and more moderate language. I say, Sir, that there was a nobler sentiment and a stronger reason for the adoption of the National Policy in 1878 than the one just given. I look upon it that the National Policy in 1878—whosoever brain conceived it, wherever the plan came from—came at the right moment, and in answer to a sentiment that was growing and developing in the country—the sentiment springing from a growing knowledge of Canada's resources and Canada's greatness; a sentiment of hope and aspiration. Every awakening feeling of a people coming up into stronger and lustier manhood at that time, took hold of the idea that was embodied in the National Policy. They said this: Here we are, on this continent, a small people, widely separated with geographical difficulties, but with immense and almost boundless natural resources; we cannot make up our minds to live always as a people simply giving our attention to one kind of work, and one kind only; these resources must be developed; those varied industries which have made the life of all great countries, which are indispensable to the life of every great country, must be planted, and permanently planted, in this country as well; and with our present position, and in the competing circumstances and disadvantages around us, there is no way by which we can do that other than by making the necessary sacrifice—by obtaining for ourselves the vantage ground, even though we have to pay for it at first, in order that those industries may be developed, and in order that we may grow up to be a progressive and self-dependent people. That was the principle taken hold of and embodied in the National Policy in 1878, and to that principle the people of Canada have been true and steady at every polling, and in every election ever since. Now, Sir, another statement which has been made widely by hon. gentlemen opposite—another of those mild and moderate statements—is that this policy and this system has been a blight and a curse to Canada—

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Hear, hear.

Mr. FOSTER. And my hon. friend is kind enough to emphasize the assertion which I have made, in his usual emphatic way, and in doing so, to help me in the answer which I am going to give to that statement. If the National Policy and the protective system has been a blight and a curse to Canada, it has had a very odd way of showing it. Take the period covered by the National Policy, and contrast it with any other period in the history of Canada's growth; has there ever been a brighter, a stronger, a more prosperous, a more progressive period? And this result has been achieved—it is the dark spot in the prospect—notwithstanding the fact that the National Policy has been depreciated by nearly one-half of the people of this country, who belong to one political party, and despite the groans and sighs and lamentations and oburgations of hon. gentlemen opposite that have been launched against it. I would not find fault if they had been launched simply against the policy; but the trouble is they have been launched against the country as well. In the creation of despondency in blighting hope and aspiration, these hon. gentlemen, by the very vehemence and absurdity of their language, have been themselves what they declared the National Policy was—a blight and a curse to this country. Thousands of people are to-day, far distant from Canadian homes, in countries to which they wish they had never gone, and which they would be glad to leave; and they are there for what reason? Because, Sir, of the sad and doleful pictures and prophecies of hon. gentlemen opposite.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. FOSTER. Hon. gentlemen may treat this matter lightly and assume a careless countenance, but it shows rather a selfish and callous heart after all when they must know that their lack of faith in and their depreciation, of Canada have caused the expatriation of thousands of their too confiding countrymen, the vision of whose privations and distress should haunt them nightly in their dreams and daily in their thoughts. But, Sir, if this National Policy was a blight and a curse to the country, it has had an odd way of showing it; for, from 1878 to the present time, the revenues of this country have been buoyant and abundant, and the deficits which were numerous under hon. gentlemen opposite, have disappeared, and surpluses have taken their places. The $6,000,000 minus sign has become $20,000,000 with a plus sign. Capital expenditure, for the last fourteen years, has been aided on an average of one and a half millions yearly or more, by the overplus from Consolidated Fund revenues. The credit of the country has steadily advanced and the interest rate on our debt steadily decreased. The financial conditions of this country have been sound, though our people have taken, during these late years, as it was right they should, every counsel of prudence. In the periods of stress and storm, which have recurred from time to time, in the cycle of fourteen years, Canada has stood the strain better than ever she did during similar periods before, and comparatively with other countries has passed them well and come out of them prosperously. In those fifteen years, our record has been one of progress. The locomotives of Canada to-day travel ten thousand miles more of rails than they did in 1878. They transport 8,000,000 more passengers and 17,000,000 more tons of freight, and they earn $33,000,000 more. They pierce every portion of the older provinces, they extend like a network through the North-west, and reach the sea shore of British Columbia, and with our canal system, which has been enlarged and extended, with our steamships plying from ports on the Pacific and the Atlantic to all points of the compass, they form great lines of transport, developing Canada, binding together the different parts of the country, furnishing means of outgo and carriage for our surplus products, and bringing closer together the colonies and the mother country. That is the record written in broad lines, and it does not bear out the assertion that the National Policy has been a blight and a curse to this country. The condition of the people has improved. The $87,000,000 of earnings, which they had saved in 1878, has become $243,000,000, an increase of 180 per cent. The aggregate wealth, comfort and happiness of the people have increased enormously as regards themselves, and comparatively as regards other peoples; so that to-day it is a truism—no argument is required but the bare statement is sufficient—that the people of Canada, taken as a whole, are as prosperous and comfortable as the people in any other part of the world. This makes out, I think, a strong prima facie case against the assertion that the National Policy has been a blight and a curse to this country. It has changed the whole face of business in this country. Old industries have been broadened and enlarged; new ones have been introduced; there has been a great diversification of industries. Read the census of to-day.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friends read it as some people read the Bible, to find just what they want and nothing else, but if they read it carefully and read it all through, they will find evidences of diversification which bear out my assertion that almost everything required in this country is to-day made by the mechanics, artisans and work people of Canada. Our industries have not yet overtaken the home consumption of the people, but are gradually growing up to the point of meeting the consumptive demand in the country. Look at the lists of raw material which have been brought in and which show the progress of our manufacturing industries. Let us take some of the principal ones:

|-----------------------------|------------|-------------|
| | lbs. | lbs. |
| Wool | 6,230,084 | 10,503,645 |

| Broom corn | 89,954 | 146,987 |

Pig and scrap iron, which in 1878 was introduced to the amount only of 34,000 tons, was imported in 1893 to the amount of 107,000 tons, while 48,000 tons were made in this country itself. These things show the wonderful increase and expansion in industrial developments which has taken place. Under the regime of hon. gentlemen opposite, most of our manufactured goods we would have imported from abroad, paying the artisan and the workman in the foreign country. Under our policy we import the raw materials duty free, we make them up, and Canadian capital, Canadian brawn and Canadian brain has a chance to do this work. My hon. friends opposite are so much in love with the census that I must give them some more figures from it in order to inform them upon some points which they have not found within its columns.

The wood industries in 1881 had an output of $59,022,196, and in 1891 this output had become $80,536,737. Leather industries, boots and shoes, show an increase of $1,124,478; saddlery and harness, $648,028. Textiles show an increase from $13,258,197 to $17,472,226 as between 1881 and 1891. The wages paid in Canada in the wood industries as between 1881 and 1891, shown an increase of $6,994,223; leather industries an increase of $794,331; textiles an increase of $1,767,659; food industries show an increase of wages of $1,864,921; musical instrument manufactories an increase of $555,400; paper and pulp mills, $693,101.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I ask the hon. gentleman's pardon for a moment. In speaking of "textiles" I understand him to mean all kinds of woollens as well as cottons, and so on.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes. Furriers and hatters show an increase in wages of $161,669. Taking these and a few other industries which I have given, the total increase in wages in 1891 over 1881 is $19,580,044.

Mr. CHARLTON. Would the hon. gentleman be kind enough to give the total amounts for 1881 and 1891, so that we may judge of the percentage of increase as well as the total?

Mr. FOSTER. I am anxious to give my hon. friend all the information I can, but it happens that I have not the totals by me, and I must ask him to exert his investigating faculties for the information required.

Mr. CHARLTON. I judge the hon. gentleman might do that himself.

Mr. FOSTER. The following is a summary of Canadian industries by the census returns:—

So that my assertion that a notable change has taken place in the industrial life of the country in this period of the National Policy is substantiated by the best statistics at our command, statistics which, taking them as the basis of comparison between 1881 and 1891, are reliable, the statistics of 1891 being as reliable and even more carefully collected than those of 1881. But, Sir, there have been great changes in fourteen years in the imposts put upon the people, and I invite the attention of hon.

gentlemen opposite for a moment to this point. The history of the National Policy has not been wholly a history of raising the import duties, although hon. gentlemen opposite are fond of so representing it. The National Policy has had two attendant features which should be noted. The first is that, while changes were made in the imposts upon dutiable goods, the free list has been constantly expanding, and to-day it is very large. Another is that burdens and imposts have been repeatedly taken from the backs of the people from 1880 up to the present time, and that by the very persons who supported and believed in the National Policy. Now, Sir, if you wish to debit us with all the imposts we put on under the National Policy, be equally frank and honest in giving us credit for those we have taken off—and they are neither few nor trival. Sir, in the matter of bill stamps and newspapers, taxes were taken off. So far as the second is concerned I am not prepared to say that the change lightened the burdens of the people, but it lightened somebody's burdens certainly, and if the benefit did not go to the people generally, it went to that very enterprising class of people in our country who disseminate information for us, and very often give us information that we could get in no other way. But when we come down to other things, there can be no doubt about where the benefit went. Hon. gentlemen opposite, when in power, taxed tea 5 and 6 cents per pound; under the National Policy that tax was taken off. They taxed coffee 2 and 3 cents a pound; under the National Policy that tax was done away with. The tax on anthracite coal, which at the beginning of the National Policy was 50 cents per ton, was taken off in 1887, and anthracite coal has been free ever since, representing a lessening of duties to the tune of about three-quarters of a million dollars a year. The duties on glass have been reduced; the duties on salt have been reduced; the duties on molasses have been reduced one-half; and, more than all, three years ago the duty on raw sugar was completely taken off, remitting taxation to the amount that had formerly been collected.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend says "Hear, hear," no doubt with a flickering idea in his mind that when we admit that, the duty on raw sugar being taken off the taxes of the people were so much lightened, therefore we have admitted that a duty under the National Policy is always a tax. But there is every difference between a duty on an article which is made in this country, the like of which on entering the country has to meet this impost, and an article not made in this country, every cent of an import duty upon which must come directly from the pockets of the people. So the remission of three and a half million dollars of duties on sugar was an actual, positive and immediate benefit to the tax-payers of this country, a benefit well diffused over every part of this country. So that, taking these things altogether—and I ask my hon. friend's attention to this—the aggregate amount of taxation remitted since 1882 on the articles I have enumerated amounted to $29,500,000, or an average of about $2,500,000 a year. For 1892-93, I have had the pleasure of announcing in Parliament that we had a surplus of $1,354,000, had we kept the taxation on these articles, taxation which was imposed upon them, when the National Policy had its inception or in its first years, I should have had to add to that surplus the sum of $5,600,000, which would have represented so much more taken from the pockets of the people. I have thought it not unnecessary, Mr. Speaker, to enter upon these observations before coming more particularly to the work of explaining the revision of the tariff, and I have done it because of the oft repeated objections which have been made to the principle of the tariff, and because I think it well that they should be brought up in Parliament, and that the arguments in reply to them should be stated to the people of this country. Now, Sir, there have been many changes since 1878. Since the inception of the National Policy, fourteen years have gone by. Changes have taken place in the business conditions of this country itself, changes in the value of raw material and of manufactured products, changes which, so far as the ad valorem equivalents of duties are concerned, have made a very great difference as to the nature and rates of imposts between those times and the present day. The industries of this country have, many of them, well established themselves. The amount of protection which they needed before, they do not need to so great a degree to-day; and for some years an opinion has been gaining ground among the people that the time for a revision has come, an opinion which was recognized by the Government when they said to Parliament last year that the time had come for a complete re-examination of the whole matter of our tariff arrangements in order that the anomalies existing might be done away with, and that the tariff might be brought level with the existing circumstances and changed conditions of business, not only in Canada, but in foreign countries, at the present day. Those changes have taken place, and those changes have been recognized. I wish again to state as forcibly as possibly that the argument—not strong at all, but used largely, and tending to deceive in some regards, if not carefully considered—that the argument is completely baseless, that the policy of protection depends upon the per cent of impost that shall be put upon a certain article. Because the Government recognizes, as all people recognize, that the conditions of business have changed within the last fourteen years, and that it is well to rearrange the tariff to suit those changed conditions, does not justify the conclusion that therefore the Government have gone back upon the principle of protection, or denied the cardinal principle of the National Policy. Such reasoning is inconsequential, and an argument which has neither logic or force. I wish to state here that the Government of to-day, and the party which supports the Government of to-day, take their stand squarely and firmly upon the embodiment and upon the preservation of the principle of protection in the tariff, the degree of that protection to be according to the circumstances of the industry and the conditions of business and of trade at the present time. But, when they do that, they are not to be taunted with going back upon their policy. The argument is not sound, and cannot fairly be used, that they have therefore repudiated the cardinal principle and plank of their policy for the last 14 years. So that these changes, as I have said, having been recognized it becomes necessary for the Government to carry out its pledge given last year in Parliament, a pledge which was lightly treated by some hon. gentlemen opposite, who thought we were simply turning the corner, who thought we only wanted to shelve the question for another year and, perhaps, to go before the electorate, to get ahead of the hon. gentlemen opposite and steal their clothes—if indeed they have any political clothes worth stealing. Their clothes have become so variegated within the last six or seven years that they outrival Joseph's coat of many colours. Whilst we to-day take our stand upon the principle of protection in the tariff, will hon. gentlemen opposite be equally frank and say upon what principle they will take their stand? Will my hon. friend tell the House to-day, what he told the people of Ontario last year, that he would make a tariff out of which every vestige of protection shall be exorcised?

Mr. GILLMOR. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. There is one honest free trader in this House, and he comes from Charlotte county, N.B., who has no hesitation in saying what his principles are, who does not seek to befool or befog the people by stating in a roundabout way what he proposes to do. He is frank enough to say that, if he were in power, he would apply the principle of free trade and take every vestige of protection out of the tariff of this country. Let me tell that hon. gentleman that if he is following the leader of the Opposition with the idea that when he gets into power at some future time—I do not know how far distant—he will exorcise every vestige of protection from the tariff, he has pinned his faith to a broken reed. In the first place, he will not be able to do it; in the second place, it is perfectly impracticable and impossible in this country.

Mr. FOSTER.

Mr. GILLMOR. It is not impossible. You cannot find a bit of protection in the British tariff.

Mr. FOSTER. I think I could.

Mr. GILLMOR. Then you have got to hunt for it.

Mr. FOSTER. I have to acknowledge that in coming to a revision of the tariff and a rearrangement of it at the present time, there are two difficulties that have to be met. The first difficulty is the depression prices which exist over a large part of the manufacturing world to-day, and which are now based on abnormal conditions; and the other difficulty is the fact that we are face to face with a revenue which is not increasing, but, on the contrary, is rather falling. These two causes make it difficult to-day to revise and arrange the tariff, and they must both be taken into account in the consideration of the recommendations which the Government are to place before this House. The brief review that I made of the financial situation as regards the months that have passed of the present financial year, will be sufficient to show the House that we do not expect this year, and we do not expect next year, any considerable surplus; on the contrary, we expect that it will require the closest economy in order to keep the expenditures within the revenues that come into the consolidated fund. But, taking these two things into account, both the depression prices that exist and the necessity for not paring off the revenue too largely, the Government has come to its conclusions with reference to the tariff, and is prepared to submit them to the good judgment of the House, and of the country. Now, there are some things that I have not attempted to do, that the Government have not found it possible to do, in the rearrangement of this tariff. It has not been possible to proceed upon any fixed rule of uniformity, any fixed plan of horizontal reduction. The tariff which was made in 1878 was a practical tariff, and the tariff which is to be arranged during this session must also have that feature, if possible, of being a practical tariff, and must take cognizance of the varying conditions of different industries, and must mete out to them, on the principle which we have stated, the protection which is reasonably due to them, and necessary in order to maintain possible industries in their position in this country. Neither has the Government found it practicable to adopt any hard and fast rule with reference to the vexed question of specific and ad valorem duties. Some condemn specific duties entirely; others favour specific duties, especially on certain lines. I think the truth lies between the two extremes. Specific duties, in some respects, are absolutely necessary to guard against frauds of valuation; in other respects they are useful in inducing the consumption of a higher and healthier, and better grade of article. Every customs-house officer, of course, delights in specific duties; they are not complex, and the importers of the country find it easy to make their calculations under them. The chief argument to be used against specific duties is where they are applied to a wide range of useful articles varying in price.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Woollen goods.

Mr. FOSTER. If the hon. gentleman thinks that is one article, we will say woollen goods. And where the specific duties act so as to raise the rate upon the cheaper though good articles, thus discriminating against a class of consumers in the country. In a case of that kind, the argument for ad valorem duties is strong; the argument for specific duties is equally strong in other respects.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. If the hon. gentleman will permit me to make a suggestion, it is that as he appears to be somewhat tired, six o'clock might now be called, and the hon. gentleman might resume after recess.

Mr. FOSTER. I prefer to proceed, as I desire to close a certain part of my statement before six o'clock. One main object has been to simplify the tariff and make it clear. Its 655 items of dutiable goods have been, as the House will see, very considerably condensed. Three schedules have been made; one for dutiable goods, one for free goods and one for prohibited goods. They have been arranged in the first schedule under classes alphabetically, and in the other schedule simply alphabetically, and the aim has been where items conflicted, to have them harmonize, and where there were grades of goods of different kinds, but yet which blended with each other, so as to make it difficult for the appraisers and customs-house officers to tell the difference between them, to place them under equivalent duties and thus avoid the inconvenience, the vexation and the confusion that arose from conflicting claims as to the quality of the article and the item under which it came. As far as it could possibly be done, special exemptions have been struck from the list, although as they have existed from the first and industries have grown upon them, it has been found impossible in all cases to strike them out, and in some cases the necessities of the situation seem to demand their continuance. The prime object in view has been to cheapen the cost of manufactures in this country, to cheapen the cost at which the goods issue from the factory itself; for there is another fact of which people think too little and which is not clearly treated even by those who do know it, and that is, that the cost to the consumer and the cost of the goods as they issue from the manufacturer are two very different things. I have in view to-day an article in very wide consumption which the manufacturer places on the shelf of the seller for $1\frac{3}{4}$ cents per package, and it never realizes less than 5 cents per package. Coal oil was sold at Petrolia for 9 cents per gallon, and the cost of carrying it to a certain town was 2 cents per gallon, and yet it was sold in that town at 25 cents and 27 cents. Innumerable instances can be found of large increase of cost on goods from the time they leave the factory until they get into the hands of the consumer, and that has militated and has been made to militate unjustly against the policy and the factory itself. All I ask is, that in looking at the ultimate cost of the goods to the consumer, the manufacture should be looked at apart from the distributing agency; the cost at the factory should be considered by itself and the cost of distribution should be considered as well, for very often it has been found, and it will be found in the course of any investigation, that although the factory made the goods cheaply and sold them at a very small advance, the cost of distribution was large, and the ultimate cost to the consumer was therefore large. Two ways have been adopted for cheapening the cost of goods, one by lowering the duty upon raw material, and by transferring raw materials from the dutiable to the free list. It has been found in the course of the work that we had pretty well exploited that division of the subject already, and that in this country almost all the great staples for manufacturing were already on the free list, in contra-distinction to our neighbours to the south, where they are to-day fighting over the vexed question as to whether or not wool, a great staple for a large industry in that country, and an article of enormous consumption, shall bear a tax of 11 or 12 cents per pound or be placed on the free list. In 1893, \$121,000,000 worth of goods were entered for home consumption; of this amount \$52,000,000 represented free goods, the large proportion being raw materials for manufactures. The duties which have been placed on different articles have been regulated according to the vigour and the development of the industry itself, according to the conditions of competition outside, according to the advantages that home production has for various reasons in our own market, and according to methods of business in some cases as well. When any person undertakes to look at the effect of the duty which is placed in the revised tariff upon a particular article in which he is interested, he should not simply look upon the impost placed upon that article, but he should look as well at the list to which free goods have been transferred from the dutiable list, and to the dutiable list where articles which are raw material have been reduced so far as import duty was concerned. Whilst endeavouring to sacrifice no industry which can reasonably hope to maintain itself in this country, so far as it can be done by the imposition of a reasonable duty which will give it sufficient vantage ground to maintain itself here, employing labour and paying wages into the hands of labour, to be used again in buying the products of the farmers, we have endeavoured to take these matters into account, and by a reasonable protection to retain all those industries which are in the country which employ labour, and which work up the raw material of the country or use imported raw material and which industries are consequently benefiting the country. But I wish to say this as well; although we have been accused often of seeing none but the selfish interests, as they are called, of those who are engaged in these industries and who want protection, the Government has had many opportunities of making themselves well acquainted with the views and requirements of the consumers as well, and whilst trying to make every reasonable provision for industries that exist, so far as I am concerned I have felt it to be my duty to represent the interests of the consuming population of this country, as well as the interests of its industries, in order that not only the consumer shall get the benefit which accrues, but that the industry shall be kept as well; for it would be of little avail in this country that an operative should be able to buy his goods at a cent a pound, or a cent a yard less than at present, if he did that under a condition of things which would keep him from earning the wage with which it was necessary to get the wherewithal to pay for that which he bought. It is very well to have in this country consumers who can get what they want as cheaply as possible, but it is well also to have consumers who, by virtue of invested capital, and by industries in the country, have a place where they can find their daily work, from which they can draw their daily wage and have the money to pay for that which they consume. Now, Mr. Speaker, I have travelled over the most of the ground that, I think, intervened between the commencement of my remarks, to which the House has most kindly listened, and the explanation of the different tariff items.

After Recess.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, when the House rose at six o'clock I was saying that in the tariff revision it has been the aim of the Government, while seeing that industries are reasonably protected in this country, to also see that the rights of the consumers are carefully looked after, and that all classes and all conditions of the people shall have fair consideration in the arrangement of the tariff. If there has been any exception at all with reference to any class, it has been in the view that has been taken with reference to the incidence of taxation upon that large and worthy class of people in Canada, the foundation of its progress and the hope of its future, namely: the agricultural classes. With reference to those, I think I may say truthfully that the Government in preparing its tariff has acted sympathetically. This class of the people, distributed as they are over every part of the Dominion, working their fields and farms, producing that which is the basis of all supplies, becoming ultimately the consumers of a large proportion of what is made in this country, and what is imported into this country, having to struggle with various difficulties—difficulties often of low prices, difficulties of competition in the great markets of the world—I say that this class demands at the hands of the Government, as I propose it shall receive, a sympathetic and favourable consideration. That is not saying that, in my opinion, the agricultural interests of the country have not been the object of solicitude by the Government. I think they have been, and I think the Liberal-Conservative Government since 1878 has pursued a course of constant and unvarying care for the interests of the farmers of this country.

Mr. FOSTER.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. FOSTER. Our friends in Opposition have had much sympathy and many fair words for the farmers. Of course, they have not for the last fourteen years had a chance to accomplish very much so far as deeds are concerned. But the record of the five years during which they occupied office, from 1873 to 1878, indicates no special consideration and no special care for that class. I may say, with reference to the agricultural classes of Canada, that the Government and the Liberal-Conservative party have shown their sympathy with the farmers in what they have done—first, in the protection that they have given to the products of the farmer, the protection which, as I said in a former part of my address, was not so much with the object of raising abnormally the prices of their products, as of steadying the market for them and preventing sectional and periodical inroads upon them, with the result of lowering the fair market value of what they produce. I wish to adduce some figures to show what has been done for the agricultural interests of this country. In 1877, the people of this country consumed, of imported agricultural products, animals and their products: from Great Britain, $56,588 worth; from the United States, $16,066,963 worth; from other countries, $7,798 worth, making a total of $16,131,349. In 1878 these imports for home consumption amounted to $15,050,930, and in 1879 to $10,420,344. The National Policy did its work, and the result was that the importation of these products fell to $4,240,849 in 1891, to $3,092,452 in 1892, and to $2,741,733 in 1893. In other words, in the three years, 1877, 1878 and 1879, there was an average annual import of these products for consumption of $13,867,541, whereas in the last three years there was an average annual report of the same materials for home consumption of only $3,358,344. If we turn again to the imports of flour and grain of all kinds, including pease, which come entirely from the United States, we find that the imports for home consumption were: in 1877, $13,855,879; in 1878, $13,452,460; but in 1892 these importations had fallen to $1,345,294, and in 1893 to $1,339,429. But, as an instance of the special protection accorded to certain products of the farmer in 1889-90, I will read the results as I have collected them. It is well known that at that time the imports of bacon, hams, shoulders, beef, mutton, pork and lard were very large, displacing by that much the same products of the Canadian farmer, and affecting him in two ways: in the first place, depriving him of part of the market which legitimately belonged to him; and in the next place, taking away from him his desire and encouragement to produce those products for a market which should be reasonably well assured to him. Well, Sir, the protection on these products to the farmer was increased in 1889-90, the result of which has been as follows:—In 1888-89 the imports of these articles amounted to 31,131,746 pounds, and in 1889-90 to 33,112,701 pounds. Then came the legislation, and in the succeeding year, 1890-91, the imports fell to 17,400,504 pounds in 1891-92 to 13,486,880 pounds, and in 1892-93 to 6,999,051 pounds. That is, in 1889-90 this country afforded a market for these products from the United States to the value of $1,734,225; but in 1892, under the increased protection, that had been reduced to a market for only $452,812 worth. That shows indisputably that the farmers have been given control of the market of Canada, and that they have risen to the height of the demands for consumption in this country, and have been able to avail themselves of this their legitimate market by means of the protection given to these products. They have had just that much more market for them. But another consequence is to be noted: the production of those articles has been stimulated. The fact that the farmer finds a home market ready for what he produces, gives him the basis of a stock-in-trade on which to work; he works on that and enlarges it, and then he looks to the foreign market for the disposal of his surplus product. What has been the effect of that? In 1877 the farmers of this country sent, of agricultural products and animals and their products, to Great Britain $13,437,762 worth, and to the United States $10,198,297 worth, or a total of $25,123,396. In 1878 that total was increased to $27,644,636 worth, distributed—$17,308,793 to Great Britain and $8,984,025 to the United States; and in 1879 increased to $29,813,771, distributed—$17,690,006 to Great Britain and $10,869,275 to the United States. The average exports of those three years amounted to $16,145,520 to Great Britain and $10,017,199 to the United States, a total export of $27,-

527,267 yearly. Coming to 1892 and 1893, the exports to Great Britain in 1892 reached the sum of $36,869,595 and the exports to the United States the sum of $6,643,099, a total of $46,145,590. In 1892-93 they were to $40,420,681 to Great Britain and $6,020,992 to the United States, a total of $49,235,106. Taking the average of these two years, the average exports of these products to Great Britain was $38,500,000; the average export to the United States amounted to $6,333,000; and the total averaged $47,690,000. That shows that the farmer has benefited in two ways. He has gained the control of the market, which is properly his own, in this country. He has displaced, through the aid that protection has given him, the products that formerly came in from the United States, and in consequence of the better position thus acquired, he has gone into the cultivation of these products more largely and sent the surplus to Great Britain and the United States—notably Great Britain—until last year the export reached the very large sum of $49,235,000. In this respect the National Policy has benefited the farmer. It has done more. It has provided experimental farms, at a very generous cost, from the Treasury. Experiments have been made, bulletins issued, competent teachers have gone throughout the country giving the results of their operations and experiments, teaching the people the elementary principles and the latest results of science and the best business methods in the raising of their various products. Further, at a great cost, this policy has, for the last fourteen years, provided transport for the farmers' products going out and for the articles they consumed coming in—a transport system which goes into every corner of the country, and which, for excellence and cheapness, is not surpassed by that of any other country in the world. Is not that a great advantage to the agriculturists, scattered throughout the country and depending on these means for the easy access of their goods to market, and benefiting by the better result from the sale of their goods, through the cheapness of transport thus afforded? These are two or three considerations which, I think, make my contention good, that the farmers' interests have not been neglected by the Government heretofore, and support my assertion that, in the revision of the tariff, his interests will again be found not to have been neglected. Now, after having made these observations generally and specially with reference to the tariff, I come to the items themselves. The first item in the schedule of dutiable goods is that of liquors and tobacco. In tobaccos we have made no change whatever. In spirituous liquors we have made no change whatever. With reference to malt liquors, we have made one change. It will be remembered that two or three years ago, when I undertook, in the face of a fairly buoyant revenue, to reduce that revenue by $3,500,000 or more, I had to have recourse, for a limited period at least, to some speedy method of recouping the great drop in the revenue caused by the reduction of the sugar taxation. I did so by putting a larger duty—although small in degree—upon tobaccos; by heightening the duty to a small extent on spirituous liquors, both excise and customs; by heightening also the excise on malts, making the excise, which had always been in this country, with the exception of a very short space of time, 1 cent a pound, 2 cents per pound. That was felt to be a very large increase. It operated in this way: The malt, and consequently the beer duty, in this country became 7 cents, as compared with 4 cents in Great Britain and 3 8-10 cents in the United States. The revenue has since come up largely to the expectations formed. The chasm that was made has been filled, and, under these circumstances, the Government has determined to take off from the malt duties one-half cent per pound, leaving it at one cent and a half instead of one cent, which has been the figure since Confederation, with the exception of one or two years. The loss which will accrue to the revenue from that will be in the neighbourhood of $200,000. We will get some accretion of revenue probably from the larger amount of malt made, because, under the 2 cent duty on malt, the production decreased to a certain extent, and sugar and other substances were used which, it is said, make an inferior article. I leave that to my hon. friends opposite to judge.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is your own opinion?

Mr. FOSTER. I am not a practical man myself in that respect.

Mr. LANDERKIN. You take moments of weakness occasionally, though.

Mr. FOSTER. I do, but am always frank enough to acknowledge my moments of weakness. Others are not. I have seen some hon. gentlemen get very irritable when these moments of weakness were brought to their attention.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Will you tell us what the Prohibition Commission has to say about it?

Mr. FOSTER. I have not had the pleasure of meeting the prohibition delegation, and the commission has not yet reported. I come next to the item of agricultural products, the second class of the schedule. From the remarks which I have made, it will be seen that it is not the policy of the Government to decrease in any material degree the protection at present afforded to the agricultural interests of the country. The effect upon their interests has been what I have pointed out, and with those effects fully in view, the Government did not feel itself justified—as indeed it did not feel disposed—in diminishing the protection which has worked so well and been so valuable an adjunct to that class. Some changes, however, have been made. Animals living, which were formerly—

Mr. LANDERKIN. Dead.

Mr. FOSTER—which were formerly 25 per cent, with the exception of live hogs—have been reduced to 20 per cent, which is the percentage placed upon live animals in the Wilson Bill and the Bill as emanating from the Senate Committee so far as it has gone. Live hogs, which were formerly 2 cents per pound, have been made 25 per cent. When we come to beef, fresh or salted, which was 2 cents per pound, that rate has been retained. Fresh mutton, which was 3 cents per pound, has been changed to 35 per cent. Meats, n.e.s., including canned meats, poultry and game, 25 per cent ad valorem. One explanation is due upon that item. It is this: The House will remember that, with reference to pork, we had two schedules. One was intended to include what was called the heavy or mess pork, and upon that a duty of a cent and a half per pound was placed. The other was intended to include the lighter pork, and upon that a duty of 3 cents was placed. The only way we had of distinguishing between the heavy and the light pork was by the number of pieces that should be in the barrel, but a very little experience was sufficient to show that that test was entirely inadequate.* It was impossible to open and inspect every barrel and find the number of pieces, and even if that were possible, it was practicable for dealers to cut up the hog in such a way that there should be the requisite number of pieces, even though it were a light pork, and then, after it was introduced into the country, to re-pack the pork, thus having the light pork come in at 1½ instead of 3 cents. That difficulty, therefore, had to be overcome, and the simplest and easiest way has been found to put a uniform duty of 25 per cent on both kinds. This will have the effect of raising the duty somewhat on the heavy pork, and of reducing it a shade on the light pork. On the whole, it will make an equitable arrangement, give an adequate protection, and take away a very serious evil and vexation, not only in the carrying out of the tariff, but one of which the farmers themselves rightly complain, inasmuch as where they supposed they were getting a protection of 3 cents per pound, the pork was actually coming in at 1½ cents per pound. Meats, fresh, n.e.s., which had been placed at 3 cents per pound, are left as before. Poultry and game are kept at 20 per cent, the same as before. Extracts of meat, fluid beef, not medicated, and soups, 25 per cent, the same as before. Lard and cottolene are changed from 3 cents per pound, and 20 per cent ad valorem respectively to an ad valorem duty of 25 per cent. Tallow, stearic acid and stearine, which formerly were 1 cent and 3 cents per pound, having been reduced to an ad valorem of duty of 20 per cent. Beeswax, which bore a duty of 20 per cent, has been reduced to 10 per cent. Paraffine wax and candles, which formerly paid respectively 3 cents and 5 cents, have been reduced respectively to 2 cents and 4 cents. All candles which formerly bore various duties have been reduced to a common duty of 25 per cent ad valorem. Soap, which bore a specific duty in two cases and a mixed specific and ad valorem duty in another case—the mixed duty being 10 cents per pound and 20 per cent and the specific being 1½ cents per pound, have been arranged under two schedules. The common or laundry soap, not perfumed, will bear a duty of 1 cent instead of a duty of 1½ cents per pound, and those soaps which bore a mixed specific and ad valorem duty, will pay a uniform rate of 35 per cent. Castile soap, mottled or white, remains at the duty at which it was before—2 cents per pound.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Can you give the equivalent ad valorem duty?

Mr. FOSTER. I think it would be about 25 or 30 per cent. Glue and mucilage—glue was formerly dutiable in two ways—liquid at 30 per cent, and other at 3 cents per pound, and mucilage was 30 per cent. These have been put into one schedule, and reduced to 25 per cent. British gum, or dextrine, sizing cream, &c., are all put under one schedule, and charged 10 per cent ad valorem, instead of 1 cent per pound. This is because these materials are used in processes of manufacture. Feathers, which were in three categories, are now placed in two, undressed feathers, which were formerly dutiable at 15 and 25 per cent, being put at 20 per cent, and others, formerly 35 per cent, being now 30 per cent. Butter remains as before, at 4 cents per pound, and cheese, as before, at 3 cents per pound. Condensed milk, which was divided into two schedules, one sweetened, dutiable at 1¼ cents per pound and 35 per cent, and the other, unsweetened, at 35 per cent, have been joined in one class containing condensed milk, condensed coffee, condensed coffee with milk, milk foods, and all similar preparations, including preserved ginger, are dutiable at 30 per cent ad valorem. When we come to the grains—oats have been kept at 10 cents per bushel, and cornmeal at 40 cents per barrel, but two schedules have been formed with other grains, and two or three other agricultural products. The first schedule contains corn and barley. The duties on these are kept as they were before, but there is added this clause, "Provided that barley and Indian corn shall be free of duty when imported into Canada from the country of production, if such country, whence either or both are imported, admits both these products free of duty, when imported thence from Canada. That is an offer of reciprocity to any country that chooses to take it up.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). What is the object of leaving oats out?

Mr. FOSTER. The object of leaving oats out of that proposal was to retain protection to that product of the farmer in Canada, a very large product, and one which, in some portions of Canada, might be adversely affected at certain times and under certain conditions, if the duty were removed. Then again buckwheat, buckwheat meal, rye, rye flour, beans, peas, hay, potatoes, green and ripe apples, and vegetables, are left with the same duties, or nearly the same, as they had under the old tariff, and it is enacted that each of the above products shall be admitted free of duty from any country which imposes no duty on the like product when imported from Canada. The duty on oatmeal is placed at 50 cents per barrel. I come now to the question of rice, which has been discussed on several occasions in the House. Formerly the uncleaned rice, or paddy, was dutiable at 17½ per cent, and the cleaned rice at 1¼ cents per pound. Two methods of dealing with these items were canvassed. One was to reduce the duty on the uncleaned rice, and to correspondingly reduce the duty on the cleaned rice; but, on the other hand, it is necessary to look to the contingencies of revenue. Rice is an article which, although it is used largely, is used in small quantities by any one family, and the price of it is not high. A considerable duty can easily be got from it, the tax being diffused over the whole country, and not being felt as any considerable burden. It has, therefore, been decided to raise some $30,000—basing calculation upon the importation of last year—in addition to the revenue already yielded from rice.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What will be your total revenue on this item?

Mr. FOSTER. The total revenue, I think, would be $55,000 or $60,000. That, however, is not at the expense of the consumer. The duty upon cleaned rice at present is 1¼ cents per pound. The arrangement of duties that has been made is this: to place four-tenths of one cent duty upon the uncleaned rice, and 1 cent per pound upon the cleaned rice, and it will recoup the revenue to the extent of about $30,000. Rice flour and sago flour, which bore a duty of 2 cents per pound, have been placed at 25 per cent. Wheat and wheat flour are kept at the same rates as before—15 cents per bushel on the former and 75 cents per barrel on the latter. Biscuits formerly bore duties of 25 per cent for unsweetened, and 35 per cent for sweetened. A uniform duty of 25 per cent is now placed upon them. Macaroni and vermicelli, formerly 2 cents per pound, are now placed at 25 per cent ad valorem. Starch, including farina and corn starch, formerly bore a duty of 4 cents per pound for sweetened, and 2 cents a pound for unsweetened, no change having been made since the reduction of the duty on sugar. The sweetened and unsweetened have been united in one uniform duty of 1½ cents a pound.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Is that expected to make any difference in the revenue?

Mr. FOSTER. Very little. I do not think that there will be any great importation into the country.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Perhaps I did not quite understand. I thought the hon. gentleman stated that one was four cents a pound and the other two cents, and that he now proposed to make them one and a half cents all round.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Well, if he reduces them to one and a half cents from two and four respectively, there must be more or less loss.

Mr. FOSTER. I think, if my hon. friend will look up the returns he will find that not much sweetened starch product came in at four cents duty. Sweet potatoes and yams, ten cents a bushel, with a reduction in behalf of the consumer in part, and a reduction also with reference to the Island of Bermuda, which imposes a very slight duty upon Canadian products going in there, and which, by letter or otherwise, has brought to the attention of the Government the high duty upon products from that island. Pickles were widely distended and under different categories as to duties; and there were duties upon fractions of a gallon as well as upon the gallon. The three schedules of pickles, sauces and catsups have been thrown into one, and a uniform duty of 35 per cent instead of the specific and specific and ad valorem duties combined, has been placed upon them. Garden seeds remain the same as before, 10 per cent when in bulk, and 25 per cent when in package. Ground mustard, 25 per cent, as before. Mustard cake reduced five per cent, and made fifteen instead of twenty. Malt, fifteen cents per bushel as before. Extract of malt, no change. No change has been made in the duty on hops, six cents per pound. Compressed yeast, and yeast cakes have been reduced from four and eight cents to three and six cents per pound, and the three schedules have been thrown into two. Trees, such as apple, cherry, peach, pear, plum, quince, of all kinds, have been made a uniform duty of three cents each. The specific duty has been retained, as it is almost impossible to follow these in point of valuation; that is not much change from the present duty. Grape vines, gooseberry bushes, raspberry bushes, currant bushes, and rose bushes, and all fruit plants not elsewhere specified, shade, lawn, and ornamental trees, shrubs, and plants, the half dozen categories under which these were found, some ad valorem and some specific, have been grouped under an ad valorem duty of 20 per cent.

Mr. CASEY. What change does that amount to?

Mr. FOSTER. On some, that is a lowering of the duty. It is most difficult to tell, because of the difficulty of getting their valuation. Take gooseberry bushes, their valuation, even of the same class, may be widely different in two or three days and is uncertain always. Blackberries, gooseberries, raspberries, strawberries, cherries, and currants, which had a duty of three cents a pound, and one cent a quart, respectively, have been put into one schedule of two cents a pound.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. When you say two cents per pound, what about the packages?

Mr. FOSTER. The package is included in the weight for duty. Cranberries, plums and quinces, which were thirty cents a bushel, have been put under an ad valorem duty of 25 per cent. Apples, forty cents per barrel, as before. Those I have spoken of. Apples, dried, desiccated, or evaporated, raisins, currants, dates, figs, prunes, and other dried or evaporated fruits, have been all made an even 25 per cent instead of an ad valorem duty of 10 per cent and one cent per pound.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. How about the French treaty in respect to those dried fruits?

Mr. FOSTER. The French treaty, when it comes into operation, will affect these by the very fact of its coming into operation, to the extent of the proportionate reduction which is provided for in the treaty. Grapes, two cents per pound, as at present. Oranges, lemons, and limes have been kept at about the same duty, a reduction from $1.60 a thousand to $1.50 a thousand upon the bulk. Peaches, one cent per pound, as before. Fruits, in air tight cans are reduced from three cents a pound to two cents.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I take it that in all these cases the packages are included?

Mr. FOSTER. Packages are included where I do not mention otherwise. Fruits preserved in brandy are kept at the brandy duty, $1.90 per Imperial gallon; that is for fear that more brandy will be brought in than fruits. Jellies, jams, and preserves, which are now five cents per pound, are reduced to three cents per pound. Honey in the comb is kept at the old rate of duty, three cents. Coffee, green, when not imported direct, 10 per cent; when it is roasted or ground, and not imported direct, two cents a pound and 10 per cent. Coffee, roasted or ground, which was three cents a pound in the old tariff, becomes two cents per pound. Extract of coffee, or substitutes therefor, formerly five cents per pound, are reduced to three. Chicory, which was three and four cents a pound, whether green or dry, becomes three cents per pound. Tea, a duty of 10 per cent when not imported direct. Cocoa paste and chocolate, which bore a duty of five cents per pound when sweetened, have been placed in the same list, and made four cents per pound.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Do I understand that there is now a duty on coffee of all sorts ?

Mr. FOSTER. There is a duty of ten cents on coffee when it is green, when it is not imported direct. When it is imported direct, there is no duty upon it. The same with reference to tea. Cocoa nuts remain at the same duty as before.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell.) If I understand the hon. gentleman, coffee that will be imported from Florida will come in free if it was grown in Florida ; but if the coffee was imported from Cuba to the United States it will pay ten per cent ?

Mr. FOSTER. It must be imported direct from growth and production. Desiccated cocoa nut, which, when sweetened, bore eight cents per pound, has been reduced to four cents per pound. A little change has been made in ginger and spices of all kinds, formerly they were 12½ per cent, and now they have been made fifteen per cent ; but when ground, the same duty of 25 per cent has been retained. Nutmegs and mace remain at the same duty. That disposes of the agricultural class of products, treated under the tariff. I now come to the third class, which consists of books and papers. On this question of books, leaving aside for a moment that of papers, there has been a good deal of writing, a good deal of speaking, and a great many demands have been formulated from different interests, from the reading public, from that portion of the reading public which may be called the studying public, who want scientific, philosophic and educational works which are not printed in this country, and which, for evident reasons, cannot at the present time be economically produced in the country. Colleges and libraries have also made a strong plea during several years for the admission of books for their libraries free of duty, and also for the admission of books for courses of study in the different classes. Then, again, there is the aspect of the printers of the country towards the book publishing interest to be considered. The book publishing interest in Canada does not occupy the position that it did many years ago. The large book houses which were then scattered in almost every considerable city, doing business in their special way, have largely gone out of the business, and it has taken other channels of distribution, most widely among which is that of the subscription sale and the distribution of books by means of agents through the towns, villages, and rural portions of the country. The book duty heretofore has been an ad valorem duty, and that has been complained of on the ground of principle. After considering the matter carefully, the decision has been arrived to change the duty, and to make it a pound duty rather than an ad valorem. At first sight that might seem to defeat the object of those who seek relief for the reading public who take scientific, philosophical, and educational works, because those books are not printed in this country and cannot be printed here, and it might be thought that the system would bear more heavily on that class and more lightly on the class of books of a more ephemeral character, including current literature, put up in paper covers or more lightly put together than books of the other class. But the test shows that is not so. If you take a subscription book, bound, which sells at $3, its weight will probably be four pounds. Under an ad valorem duty of 15 per cent, as at present, the duty would be 45 cents. It is proposed to make the duty a pound duty, 6 cents per pound. The duty on such a book would be 24 cents, instead of 45 cents. If you come down to current and light literature, large quantities of which are sent into this country, and which have not expensive bindings, and whose price is almost nominal, such a book coming here would weigh half a pound or three-quarters of a pound, and the invoice price would be but a few cents per pound. The ad valorem duty is almost nothing ; the pound duty will be considerable. Another point arises, and that is this, that in the distribution of books in the country the post office is largely availed of, and great difficulty arises from ad valorem duties in the post office customs distribution. It involves the appraisement of each book at the place where it is delivered. The pound duty is much easier ; the officer has simply to put the book in the scale and weigh it.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Will it be made fractional—3 cents for the half pound ?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes. Broadly stated, the question of principle I think is this, that the pound duty does not tax the genius, the spirit, the thought in the book ; it taxes the paper, binding, and the articles entering into its production. It is a better protective duty to those articles and to the printer as regards that class of book which it is possible to produce here. The duty will be 6 cents per pound for books, instead of an ad valorem duty of 15 per cent. British copyright, reprints of, will have in addition to 6 cents per pound, a duty of 12½ per cent, which is the amount we collect in payment of the copyright and transmit.

Mr. EDGAR. Is this ad valorem ?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes. But there is a clause attached, which is as follows: This duty shall continue until 27th March, 1895, and thereafter the rate shall be 6 cents per pound, it being the intention of the Government not to continue to collect this amount, but to try and have the matter adjusted by that time in a better and more satisfactory way. Advertising pamphlets and all that class of matter, which had an ad valorem duty of 20 per cent and 6 cents per pound, are retained at the same rate of duty. This item is a large revenue producer, and has been left unchanged.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Does the change from ad valorem to specific make any difference in the receipts?

Mr. FOSTER. It is very difficult to calculate that. If you take the returns on an ad valorem basis you have not the weight but simply the value; but testing different prices of books as we have done, it may be fairly assumed that what is lost on one side is gained on the other, and that the reduction on the whole will not amount to a very large sum. Bank notes, bonds, bills of exchange, and the like have been kept dutiable at 35 per cent; labels 15 cents per pound and 25 per cent, this item being also a large revenue producer. Maps and charts are 20 per cent. Painting, prints, and engravings remain as before, 20 per cent. Playing-cards will be 6 cents per pack; printed music 10 cents per pound. The question of wall paper has been settled by dropping the specific duties and imposing an ad valorem duty of 35 per cent all round. Paper sacks and bags, which were 35 per cent, have been made 25 per cent. Mill-board remains the same as before, 10 per cent. Tar red paper will be 20 per cent.

Mr. EDGAR. What will be the duty on ordinary paper?

Mr. FOSTER. It remains at the same duty as at present, namely, 25 per cent. It is desirable I think to state in this connection with respect to books on the free list—and I am stating it briefly and from memory—that these include Bibles, psalm-books, prayer-books, and hymn-books, instead of being charged 5 per cent; books for university, college, and libraries of that kind, books for public and incorporated mechanics' libraries are also made free to the extent of two copies to each institution. Books found in the regular curriculum of colleges, universities, and academies, being of a kind not printed or reprinted in Canada, are allowed free for those purposes. Books printed in any language foreign to this country, that is in any language except French and English, are admitted free, and some other concessions are made, which, though important, have escaped my memory.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. How about monthly magazines?

Mr. FOSTER.

Mr. FOSTER. They are kept as at present.

Mr. FOSTER. Books for the deaf, dumb, and blind are admitted free. A friend suggests that this is a concession to the Opposition.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It is a concession, Mr. Speaker, got by the Opposition from the predecessor of the hon. gentleman, and I should say, wrung out of the Ministry by the Opposition.

Mr. FOSTER. I hope the Opposition have used them. Coming next to chemicals, oils and paints. The vinegar duty has been kept the same as before. There is an excise upon the manufacture of vinegar in the country, all of which is carried on under the Inland Revenue, and it is proposed to make the excise duty larger and to get an additional revenue of some thousands of dollars therefrom. The protection upon vinegar is a large protection, but it is almost impossible to make it other than it is and keep vinegar from being made wholesale from acetic acid and other ingredients of a deleterious and unhealthy kind. So that that problem has been solved by keeping the vinegar at the old duty, and by raising an additional amount of revenue from the manufacture of it in the shape of excise.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. How much?

Mr. FOSTER. The additional income will be probably about $30,000. Acid, acetic and pyroligneous of any strength for the purpose of manufactures which bore a duty of 25 cents per gallon and 20 per cent, has been reduced to 25 per cent. Acid, muriatic and nitric has been reduced from 25 per cent to 20 per cent. Sulphuric acid which bore a duty of five-tenths of a cent per pound has been reduced to four-tenths; sulphuric ether is the same duty, viz., 5 cents per pound. Acid phosphate has been reduced from 3 cents to 2 cents per pound. Liquorice paste and liquorice root, which has a duty of 2 and 3 cents a pound, have been made ad valorem 20 per cent, a considerable reduction; all medicinal preparations and patent medicines have been kept at the same rate: 50 per cent for liquids and 25 per cent for others. Cod liver oil, medicated, is kept at the old rate, 20 per cent. Essential oils, largely used in manufacturing soaps of the better kind, in fact all perfumed soaps, reduced from 20 per cent to 10 per cent. Pomades are kept at the same rate. Perfumery, including toilet preparations, have been kept at the same rate, namely, 30 per cent. Various representations have been made in Parliament and out of Parliament, looking to the reduction of duty upon illuminating oil. After having carefully thought over the subject with a view to do whatever was reasonable for the general consuming public, and with a very strong unwillingness to destroy an industry which has existed from Confederation up, and existed always under the protection of the Government: an industry which is local I admit, but which is peculiar in its nature in that, in the locality in which it exists it is widely distributed and becomes a living, each well, to the family, the small holder that owns the land upon which the well is worked. A year or more ago, very large prices were paid for oil, whether they were Canadian oils or American oils. That was not the fault of the producer at Petrolia. At the very time the Canadian oils were selling from 25 cents to 45 cents per gallon in Canada, they were being sold in bulk at Petrolia for 9 and 11 cents per gallon. It was pointed out to the producers last year that it was necessary for them to take measures by which oil should be reduced in price to the consuming public, and with an expenditure of commendable energy, and an expenditure, I am sure, of a large amount of money, they have perfected arrangements by which to-day, instead of the prices which I have quoted, oil is being distributed now from Calgary to Cape Breton, and sold at no place at a cost greater than 25 cents per gallon, and coming down to a cost of 10 and 12½ cents per gallon. The duty of 7 1-5 cents per gallon is a large duty, but it is a duty which is not availed of by the producers and sellers of the oil. On the other hand, from those who use American oil a very large revenue, some $400,000, is received which it is difficult for the Government to sacrifice without replacing it in some other way. The amount of oil which is used by each family is not surprisingly large in quantity, and is not surprisingly great in its value.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What do you compute the total consumption at both home and imported?

Mr. FOSTER. The division is about two-thirds to one-third; one-third of the market is supplied by the United States illuminating oil, and two-thirds of the market is supplied by the home product. I will give you the figures later on. Under these circumstances, the Government has come to the conclusion not to lower the duty upon illuminating oils this year. Some changes have been made, however, with reference to the distribution, and arrangements will be made by the Inland Revenue by which this oil can be delivered and stored in tanks in any city or in any village, and by which it can be distributed without many of the vexations and additions to the expenses which exist.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Are the means of carriage to be interfered with?

Mr. FOSTER. Do you mean in transport by rail?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Or by water.

Mr. FOSTER. The law in that respect will remain the same as it is to-day. However, the duty on barrels in which oil is brought in is at present 40 cents, and that has been reduced to 20 cents, giving in that method of bringing in the oil by barrels, a reduction of 20 cents on each barrel. In crude oils and gas oil and fuel oil, for fuel and manufacturing purposes, a reduction has been made of one-half of the present duty, and in lubricating oil the limit upon which that duty is placed has been reduced from 30 cents per gallon to 25 cents per gallon; and all above 25 cents per gallon in value goes into the class for lubricating oils, which bears a common duty of 25 per cent. Linseed oil or flaxseed oil, which bears a duty of 1¼ cents per pound and which is the raw material for a great variety of industries, has been lowered, and instead of that duty which I have mentioned, an ad valorem duty of 20 per cent has been placed upon it, which is a very considerable reduction. Lard oil, neat's-foot oils, and sesame seed oils remain at the same rate of 20 per cent. Olive oil prepared for salad purposes, has been increased from 20 to 30 per cent. Olive oil in bulk for manufacturing purposes has been placed on the free list, used, as it is coming to be now, very largely in the manufacture of the better kinds of soap and in various other articles, and in the preparation of sardines and the putting up of fish. Vaseline is to have a duty of 35 per cent instead of the old duty of 6 cents and 4 cents per pound. Blacking, shoe and shoemakers' ink is reduced from 30 per cent to 25 per cent. Ink for writing has been reduced from 25 to 20 per cent. Blueing has been reduced from 30 to 25 per cent. Dry white and red lead, orange, mineral and zinc white, 5 per cent; ochres, raw siennas and the various foundations for paints have been reduced from 30 per cent to 20 per cent. Oxides, ochres and ochrey earth, raw siennas and colours, have been reduced from 30 per cent to 20 per cent. Paints and colours which bore a 30 per cent duty, and in another class, 5 cents a pound and 25 per cent duty, have been reduced all round to an even 25 per cent. Paints and colours, ground in spirits, are kept at the same duty which is the spirit duty of $1 a gallon, but scarcely anything is done in that line, no importation now taking place. Turpentine which is a basis for different manufacturing processes has been reduced from 10 per cent to 5 per cent. Varnishes, lacquers, japans and the like which bore a duty of 20 cents and 25 per cent, have been reduced to 20 cents a gallon and 20 per cent. Paris green is kept at the same duty, namely, 10 per cent. Putty has been reduced from 25 to 15 per cent. Coming to the class of earthenware, glassware and stoneware: brick for building remains at 20 per cent. There were two schedules, one of China and porcelain ware, and one of earthenware. The duty on china and porcelain was less than the duty on earthenware, and there were occasions for disputes arising at custom-houses. The two are thrown into one, and the common duty of 30 per cent is put upon them. Earthenware and stoneware, demijohns or jugs, churns or crocks are reduced from 3 cents to 2 cents a gallon of holding capacity. Drain pipes and tiles are kept at the old rate. On glass the duties have not been interfered with in the main, except that small wares of glass, small bottles and the like, which bore 5 cents a dozen and 30 per cent, have all been placed in the general class bearing 30 per cent ad valorem. Insulators of all kinds and lamps, including arc and incandescence lamps, lamp chimneys, side-lights and head-lights, shades, globes, and all that kind of articles, which bore 5 cents a dozen and 30 per cent, and some few 25 per cent, have been placed under the common duty of 30 per cent, a reduction on the whole.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What does that cover?

Mr. FOSTER. That covers all kinds of electric fixtures and all kinds of lamps, side-lights, shades and globes, whether for oil, electric light or gas. Outside of what I have mentioned, the only change in the general glass duty has been to reduce the duty somewhat on plate glass, which comes in panes of not less than 12 feet square, the duty being reduced from 6 to 4 cents per square foot. The duty on the other glasses remains at the same figure, that schedule having been very carefully gone over two or three years ago and arranged very satisfactorily, I think, both to the importer and to the revenue. On spectacles and eye-glasses the duty is 30 per cent, as before, and upon the frames or parts thereof, 20 per cent. Show-cases, which bore a mixed duty of $2 each and 35 per cent, have been placed at 35 per cent. Magic lanterns and slides therefor, philosophical, photographic, mathematical and optical instruments, 25 per cent. Cement, which ran through five schedules, has been placed in one, and the uniform duty of 40 cents per barrel put upon it. Plaster of Paris, in the rough and when calcined or manufactured, bears 15 per cent and 20 per cent respectively. Flagstones, granite and the rough stones generally, have an ad valorem duty of 20 per cent, and the finished article 30 per cent. Marble in the rough, that is, sawn in slabs, but not otherwise manufactured, has a duty of 20 per cent, and the finished article bears a duty of 30 per cent. Slate and manufactures of slate—roofing slates, slate-pencils, school or writing slates, the latter of which bore a complex and absurdly high duty, have been placed at the uniform duty of 20 per cent.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Surely, nothing was absurd in the National Policy.

Mr. FOSTER. The story is told that at one time slate was charged at so much per square foot, and the way adopted to get at the duty on slate-pencils was to find out the number of slate-pencils that would lie in a square foot and to calculate the amount of the duty from that. I state that by way of information to the hon.

Mr. FOSTER.

gentlemen when they come to frame their tariff. Leather, manufactures of, and rubber form the next class. On fur skins, 15 per cent, as at present. On fur caps, hats and the like, 25 per cent, as at present. Leather-board and leatheroid and boot and shoe-counters, 20 per cent. Leather and skins not otherwise provided for, when tanned, belting leather, sole leather, upper leather, including dongola, cordovan, lamb, sheep and calf, bear a uniform duty of 15 per cent. This is a slight reduction. Sole leather, rough or undressed, is the same as before, 10 per cent. On japanned, patent or enamelled leather, a uniform duty of 22½ per cent. Skins for morocco leather, tanned, but not further manufactured, 15 per cent. Glove leathers are, as before, at 10 per cent. All manufactures of leather, not elsewhere specified, are left at 25 per cent. Belting of leather or other material, is reduced from 25 to 20 per cent. Harness and saddlery of every description is placed at 30 per cent. Whips, which were 50 cents per dozen and 30 per cent ad valorem, have been put at 35 per cent ad valorem. Boots and shoes are kept at 25 per cent. India-rubber boots and shoes, with tops or uppers of cloth or of material other than rubber, which bore 35 per cent, are put at 30 per cent. India-rubber boots and shoes and manufactures of India-rubber keep the same duty of 25 per cent. India-rubber clothing, surfaced and otherwise, which bore a compound duty, is put at 35 per cent. Rubber belting, hose, packing and mats, which bore a compound duty of 5 cents per pound and 15 per cent, is put at 32½ per cent ad valorem. I now come to the class of metals and manufactures of, including, as the article of prime importance, iron. Upon this a great deal of attention and careful consideration has been bestowed. On the one hand, the duties upon iron have been and are relatively high. On the other hand, there is the patent fact that unless there be a sufficient inducement in the way of protection or bounty given for the manufacture of iron, it will be impossible in this country, as it has been found impossible in all other countries, ever to rise from the production of raw ores, which abound in this country, to the independent and self-contained manufacture of the larger portion of the iron needed for the consumption of the country. That problem has been solved in part before by the fixing of a duty of $4 per ton upon pig iron, and grading the duties on puddled and bar iron in proportion, the present duty being $13 per ton, upon which to build up the manufacture of iron in the country. Scrap, which is a raw material, out of which bar iron is made, was, however, when these duties were arranged in 1887, left at the import duty of $2. The consequence of that has been simply this: Instead of the bar iron of the country being made from puddled bars, the product from pig iron, and the latter from the iron ores of the country, no bar iron is at present made in the country from puddled bars. All that is made is made from scrap, either the native scrap or imported scrap. That has its effect upon the quality of the iron, but its most serious effect is to retard in that way the development, so much desired, of the iron industry. Some method, therefore, had to be adopted in order to remove that disadvantage. It is not the intention of the Government to take the line which has been assented to by my hon. friends opposite to-night. It is not our intention to destroy every vestige of protection, so far as the iron schedule is concerned. We must bear in mind that in 1887 the first real attempt was made to give iron any real protection in this country. We must bear in mind that although the National Policy dates from 1878, there was nothing but a revenue tariff upon iron from 1878 up to 1887. It was at that period, and only six years ago, that Parliament assented to a scheme which had for its object the development of the iron industry by a system of protection and bounty. The problem which confronted the Government was this: In the first place, not to destroy the development of our iron industry; in the second place, to give as much relief as possible to those who make up all kinds of articles from the iron of commerce—that is, the puddled bar, or the bar iron. In steering between these two conflicting interests, the Government have concluded to adopt this as their policy. Briefly stated, it is as follows: to keep upon pig iron the same customs duty and the same bounty as at present—the duty being $4 per ton, and the bounty $2 per ton.

Mr. EDGAR. That is on the net ton.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes; the net ton is always understood in our duties. That gives to pig iron a protection of $6 per ton. It is not proposed to disturb that duty. The difficulty, however, which has occurred from the introduction of scrap, and the practical making of all the bar iron of the country from scrap, had to be met, and the proposal of the Government is to make the scrap duties, from to-day until the end of the year, $3 instead of $2, and after the 1st of January, 1895, $4 per ton.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. How much revenue do you expect from that?

Mr. FOSTER. It is impossible to make any estimate. Under that duty it is supposed that not a very great deal of foreign scrap will be imported. Our object is to induce the manufacture of bar iron from the iron of the country—from the puddled bars.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. You expect that duty to be prohibitive?

Mr. FOSTER. It will largely act as a deterrent to the importation of foreign scrap. It is proposed to keep the duty and bounty upon pig iron. In order to reduce the cost of merchantable iron to the country, a reduction will be made in bar iron of $3 per ton, reducing it from $13 to $10. A reduction will be made also in puddled bar from $9 to $5, being a reduction of $4 per ton, and iron and steel will be treated all through on an equality as respects the imposts, and upon these lowered duties on steel and iron the reductions have been made in the articles which are manufactured from these forms of iron. But in order to stimulate the production of puddled bar from the pig iron, so that the process of development may not stop at the point of pig iron, it is proposed to give a bounty of $2 per ton upon puddled bar, and what corresponds to that in steel. Both bounties in pig iron and puddled bar to run five years from the day of this enactment, and also with this proviso, that if in two years from this, for instance a blast furnace starts and goes into the operation of making iron, it shall have the benefit of the bounties, on the strength of which it made the investment, for five years from the time it commenced to make the pig iron or puddled bars.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Will the old concerns go on for five years?

Mr. FOSTER. They go on five years from this date.

Mr. CHARLTON. How will it be in the case of one starting four years from this date?

Mr. FOSTER. It will have the five years bounty in the same way.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). That one concern, but not the others?

Mr. FOSTER. Not the others. The object of a bounty, in every case, is to induce the investment of capital into the making of iron from the ore into the pig or puddled iron. It is in the general interests that these industries shall be distributed in different parts of the country, so as to overcome, to a large extent, the heavy cost of distribution, consequent on our geographical extent.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman proposes to tie the hands of Parliament for five years.

Mr. FOSTER. As any law ties the hands of Parliament. Any law which is enacted ties the hands of Parliament to that extent. The present Bounty Act ties the hands of Parliament just as much and no more than the one now proposed will do.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the loss of revenue you expect for these proceedings, bounty included?

Mr. FOSTER. I may mention that although in the first years of the bounty no very great progress was made, there has been in the last three years great progress in the manufacture of iron, and last year the manufacture of pig iron in this country, upon which the bounty was paid, amounted to 48,000 tons. This year, up to March, the amount made was 42,000 tons. So that there is every possibility that the current year will see pig iron made in this country to the extent of 50,000 tons. The bounty upon puddled bar, it is calculated, will increase that amount by about one-half, so that for the next three or four years—the bounty being $2 per ton—the amount paid will run from $90,000 up probably to $120,000, or $130,000. Of course, all depends upon the rapidity and extent of the development in the production of this kind of iron.

Mr. EDGAR. That is, on the two.

Mr. FOSTER. On the two. The duty on wrought scrap iron and scrap steel then is, as I have stated it, and the duty upon pig iron is $4 per ton, as at present.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I did not observe that the hon. gentleman gave any intimation of the loss of revenue, pursuant on the reductions he proposes to make—in the one case of $3 per ton and in the other $4 per ton. He ought to have those figures before him.

Mr. FOSTER. As far as can be calculated, the loss on metals and manufactures, owing to the reduction proposed in duties, will amount to about $350,000, basing the calculation upon the importations of last year, which is the only way, I suppose, in which you can make an estimate. But the hon. gentleman will see that to estimate with any degree of accuracy will be impossible, because we do not know what will be the effects of these duties from year to year. Bar iron and steel, as I have stated, are reduced to $10 a ton, from $13 a ton. Iron or steel plates or sheets, sheared or un-sheared, hoops, bands, strips, and skelp iron or steel, sheared or rolled in grooves, and iron or steel of all widths not thinner than number seventeen gauge, n.e.s., will be $10 per ton. Plates or sheets of iron or steel over thirty inches wide, and not less than one-quarter of an inch in thickness, commonly denominated boiler plate, and universal mill or rolled edge steel plates, not exceeding thirty inches in width, will be 12½ per cent. A large reduction is made in iron or steel sheets, hoops, bands, and strips, or other iron or steel of all widths, sheet iron, common or black, smooth, polished, coated or galvanized and Canada plates, number seventeen gauge, and thinner, the change being from 12½ per cent, and, in some cases, as high as 30 per cent, to 5 per cent. These are materials which at present are not made in Canada, and which are largely used, and the duty is put at a nominal rate so as to encourage those industries which use these materials.

Mr. CHARLTON. What was the duty on boiler plate?

Mr. FOSTER. It was either $13 per ton or 12½ per cent. Plough plates, mould boards, land sides, and other plates for agricultural implements, when cut to shape from rolled sheets of steel, but not moulded, punched, polished, or otherwise manufactured, and being of a greater value than four cents per pound, were formerly charged at the rate of 12½ per cent. This is a quality of steel not made in this country, and the duty has been reduced to the nominal rate of 5 per cent, which, of course, will be a distinct gain to the manufacturers of implements and other articles made from these materials. Forgings of iron and steel, which were 1½ cents per pound, but not less than 35 per cent, have been fixed at 35 per cent. Rolled iron or steel angles, channels, structural shapes and special sections, weighing less than twenty-five pounds per lineal yard, which were formerly charged at one-half cent per pound and 10 per cent ad valorem, have been placed at 35 per cent. Rolled iron or steel angles, channels, beams, and the like, which were largely used by bridge builders, and which, when imported by bridge builders for the purpose of bridge building, came in at 12½ per cent, have been placed at 12½ per cent, the condition being taken off, so that they may be imported for use by any one at this rate. Iron bridges and structural iron work, formerly charged 1¼ cents per pound, but not less than thirty-five per cent, had been placed at 30 per cent. Iron and steel railway bars, or rails for railways and tramways, of any form, punched or not punched, formerly dutiable at $6 per ton, will be fixed hereafter at 30 per cent.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Does this apply to electric railways?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, this would apply to electric railways. Railway fish plates and tie plates, formerly charged $12 per ton, will be 30 per cent. There is a quality of iron which comes into the country and is largely used, known as Swedish iron. It has borne a duty of 20 per cent, being of high value, and necessary for certain processes of manufacture, and filling a place which could not be filled by our own rolled iron. The duty upon this material has been made 15 per cent. Axles, car springs, and springs of iron or steel, or parts thereof, formerly $30 per ton, and not less than 35 per cent, have been placed at 35 per cent. Malleable iron castings and steel castings, n.e.s., were formerly $25 per ton, and not less than 30 per cent. This duty has been fixed at 25 per cent. Cast iron vessels, plates, stove plates and irons, sad irons, hatters' irons, tailors' irons, and castings of iron not elsewhere specified, are reduced from $16 per ton and not less than 30 per cent to 27½ per cent. Cast iron pipe of every description, formerly $12 per ton, and not less than 35 per cent, has been reduced to $10 per ton, and not less than 35 per cent. Boiler tubes of a kind not made in this country, have been reduced from 15 per cent to 7½ per cent, and to these have been added corrugated tubes, or flues for marine boilers.

This is a distinct advantage to an industry which is largely prosecuted in this country. Lap-welded iron tubing for artesian wells and petroleum wells, etc., remain, as before, at 20 per cent. Tubes not welded or more than 1½ inches in diameter, rolled steel, are also unchanged at 15 per cent, and wrought iron tubing, threaded and coupled or not, over two inches in diameter, bear the same duty as before—15 per cent. All other wrought iron tubes, five-tenths of a cent per pound and 30 per cent. Chains (iron or steel) remain at 5 per cent, except that the limit has been reduced from nine-sixteenths to five-sixteenths of an inch in diameter. Nails and spikes, wrought and pressed, galvanized or not, horse-shoe nails, and all other wrought iron, steel, and other nails, n.e.s., and horse, mule and ox shoes have been changed from 1½ cents per pound, and not less than 35 per cent, to 30 per cent ad valorem. Composition nails and spikes, and sheathing nails have been reduced from 20 per cent to 15 per cent. Wire nails, cut nails and spikes of iron or steel now bearing a duty of 1½ cents per pound, but not less than 35 per cent, have been reduced to three-quarters of a cent per pound. Cut tacks, brads, or sprigs, not exceeding 16 ounces to the thousand, were formerly 2 cents per thousand, but this duty has been reduced to 1 cent per thousand. The same class of goods, exceeding sixteen ounces to the thousand, formerly charged 2 cents per pound, are reduced to 1½ cents per pound. Screws, commonly called wood screws, which formerly had a protection of 6 cents, 8 cents, and 11 cents per pound, respectively, have been reduced to 3 cents, 6 cents, and 8 cents per pound, but not to be less than 35 per cent. This is a reduction of about one-half on the present duty. Other screws of iron, steel or brass, or other metal, not otherwise provided for, are reduced from 35 per cent to 30 per cent. Wrought iron or steel nuts and washers, iron or steel rivets, bolts, with or without threads, nut and bolt blanks, T and strap hinges, which formerly bore duties of about 1 cent per pound and 25 per cent, have been reduced to 1 cent per pound and 20 per cent. Skates, formerly 20 cents per pair and 30 per cent ad valorem, are reduced to 10 cents per pair and 30 per cent ad valorem. Clothes wringers, formerly $1 each and 30 per cent, are reduced to 25 cents each and 20 per cent. Cutlery, not otherwise provided for, remains, as before, at 25 per cent. Celluloid is not changed, the duty being 10 per cent. Knife blades and blanks are 10 per cent ad valorem, this duty involving no change. House furnishing hardware, builders' and cabinet-makers' hardware, etc., which formerly occupied two different schedules, have been thrown into one schedule. The former duties were 30 and 35 per cent. A common duty has been fixed at 32½ per cent. Adzes, hatchets, picks, mattocks, track tools, wedges, and crow-bars of iron and steel, and hammers or sledges are now 30 per cent. This is on the whole, a reduction, the duties coming down from about 35 per cent. On this there was 35 per cent before. Axes of all kinds, scythes, hay knives, lawn mowers, pronged forks, rakes, and hoes, not elsewhere specified, and other agricultural tools or implements not elsewhere specified, 35 per cent ad valorem. These were, some of them, $2 per dozen and 40 per cent; some of them $2.40 a dozen and ad valorem duties combined. Shovels and spades, which had $1 per dozen and 25 per cent, have been made 35 per cent. Files and rasps, 35 per cent. Steel needles, 30 per cent. Surgical and dental instruments are reduced from 20 to 15 per cent. Safes and the like are reduced from 35 to 30 per cent. Fire engines, 35 per cent. Locomotives for railways were formerly 30 per cent ad valorem when not less than $2,000 each. The limiting clause has been stricken out, and locomotives for railways have been placed at 35 per cent. Steam engines, boilers, machinery, and the like, have been reduced from 30 per cent to 27½ per cent.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Am I correct in understanding you that the total loss will only be $350,000 on all the reductions made?

Mr. FOSTER. According to the best calculation that can be made, but it is a calculation which has no pretention to accuracy.

Mr. EDGAR. These things the hon. gentleman has lately given us are included in that estimate?

Mr. FOSTER. The different kinds of furniture are not included. Coming to the question of agricultural implements, the Government has found that a vexed one. The duty which has been heretofore 35 per cent upon mowing machines, binders, harvesters, and the like of that, has been greatly reduced. A very strong demand has been made by the farming interest all over the country for a reduction in that duty. A great many have been, I think, a little unreasonable, and have asked that the duty should be taken off altogether; others, representing large sections of the farming community, have petitioned that the duties should be materially reduced. These machines are made at the present time almost exclusively of iron, the percentage of wood which goes into their construction being remarkably small; and the reduction of duties upon iron will, to the extent that it is used, be felt in the reduction of cost in the manufacture of these different implements. After considering the matter in all its phases the Government has come to the conclusion to reduce these from 35 per cent to 20 per cent, a reduction of 15 per cent on the whole, and a reduction which it will tax the manufacturers of these implements to meet and keep the field in which their competition is at present even quite heavy, especially in the North-west; but a reduction with which the Government believes that they can prosecute their industry, while, at the same time, it will have the effect of greatly cheapening one of the largest items of expenditure to which the farmer has been subjected, especially in grain growing districts.

Mr. CHARLTON. Has the Government considered the question of granting reciprocity to the United States in agricultural implements under the terms of their tariff, giving free admission to our agricultural implements into the United States on the condition that theirs are admitted here on the same terms?

Mr. FOSTER. The Government is aware that in the Committee's Draft Bill in the United States Senate, agricultural implements have been made free to the people of that country. So far as the manufacturers and buyers of implements in the United States are concerned, there is no duty upon agricultural implements, whether Canada reduces her duty in whole or in part.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I would like to know from the hon. gentleman what he calls agricultural implements. It is extremely important that that should be clearly understood.

Mr. McMILLAN. I would ask the hon. gentleman if the United States has not adopted a provision with respect to agricultural implements that they will allow them to come into their country free from any other country that allows American agricultural implements to come in free?

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman would be perfectly correct if he had asked whether a committee had not recommended that, but nothing has yet been adopted. What my hon. friend has said is true with that limitation. This clause takes in mowing machines, harrows, cultivators, seed drills, horse rakes, self-binding harvesters, harvesters without binders, binding attachments, reapers, sulky and walking ploughs, all of which are placed at 20 per cent.

Mr. CHARLTON. This is a matter of considerable importance. The Senate Finance Committee's draft on the Tariff Bill provides that agricultural implements shall be admitted into the United States free of duty if imported from countries not imposing duties upon agricultural implements of American manufacture exported to that country. That, undoubtedly, will be a question that the Government will be called upon to meet. No doubt that provision in the tariff will be retained if the Wilson Bill passes; and if that provision is made I presume the people of Canada would like to know, now that the tariff is under consideration, what course the Government of Canada would be likely to take in the premises.

Mr. FOSTER.

Mr. FOSTER. All I can say to my hon. friend is that we have to legislate under present conditions. This is the legislation which we propose under present condition.

Mr. LAURIER. How was it a moment ago about reciprocity?

Mr. FOSTER. How has it been for the last five years about reciprocity? Hon. gentlemen have been preaching reciprocity for five years. No one more than my hon. friend, who has just spoken, hailed with delight and with exuberant joy the result of the late election in the United States, and the coming into power of the Democratic party, because he believed there would be a free and open road to free trade in the United States. But what has happened? That although that party has an overwhelming majority in the House of Representatives and a clear majority in the Senate, after a year and a half of arduous struggle, they have succeeded in getting as far as the report stage of a Bill which is protective from one end of it to the other, and which expressly abolishes every reciprocity treaty that has been entered into with the United States.

Mr. LAURIER. The hon. gentleman was asked, what he would do about reciprocity in agricultural implements; and his answer was that he had to legislate according to present conditions. That is to say, that the hon. gentleman cannot do so when we do not know what will be done by the United States. But a moment ago the hon. gentleman submitted a reciprocity clause with respect to other articles, without knowing any more what the United States legislation would be than in the present case.

Mr. FOSTER. I see no inconsistency in that, not the least. We are legislating for ourselves in both respects. We are stating now in this legislation what under certain conditions and with respect to certain articles we are prepared to do with the United States. We are legislating in respect of the clauses under discussion, exactly in the same way.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. There will be some loss of revenue. Can the hon. Minister state how much?

Mr. FOSTER. I do not know that there will be loss of revenue. Portable machines, portable steam engines, threshers and separators, now bearing 35 per cent, will be charged 30 per cent.

Mr. McMULLEN. Before the hon. gentleman leaves the question of agricultural implements I desire to ask, whether the Government will claim the right to re-value those instruments at the port where they are entered, or will they be bound to accept the invoice of the cost where they are manufactured?

Mr. FOSTER. We will adopt the same course with respect to those machines as we follow with regard to other importations. Sewing machines, which were \$3 each and 20 per cent, have been made 30 per cent. Pumps of all kinds and wind-mills will have a duty of 30 per cent. Type for printing will remain as before, 20 per cent; type metal will be 10 per cent. Bookbinders' tools, printing and lithographing presses and printing machines will remain at 10 per cent. Plates engraved on wood and on steel will be 20 per cent. Stereotypes, electrotypes and celluloids, for almanacs and such like, will remain at 2 cents per square inch; those of books will be free, because it has been found that the duty upon them has in no sense affected for the better those branches of the printing trade in this country. The duty upon the stereotypes and electros has, however, a different effect on book publishing, and the fact that these will be made free, while it will not in any respect injure the printing business, will assist the publishing and paper interests. Bird cages will be 35 per cent; barb wire fencing will be reduced to $\frac{3}{4}$ of a cent per pound, buckthorn and strip fencing of iron will be $\frac{1}{2}$ cent per pound. Machine card clothing will be 25 per cent, and wire cloth of brass, copper and tin will be kept at the same rate. 20 per cent. Wire of brass and copper is reduced from 15 to 10 per cent. As a concession to the manufacturers of wire fencing and wire nails, on whom the competition will fall with very great force, and who under the reduced duties will find it a hard struggle to keep up their end of the competition, we have given them a little relief by reducing the wire used for those purposes, from No. 11 to No. 14 gauge, from 25 per cent to 15 per cent.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is your estimate of the loss of revenue?

Mr. FOSTER. I think there will not be any loss of revenue. Wire rope of iron or steel will be 25 per cent; manufactures, articles or wares not specially enumerated are reduced from 30 per cent to 27 $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. Firearms will pay 20 per cent. Corset clasps, spoon clasps or busks and other articles of that class will be 5 cents per pound and 20 per cent. Gas, coal oil and electric light fixtures will pay 27 $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. Gas meters will pay 35 per cent. Bells of any description, 25 per cent. Brass and copper nails will also pay 25 per cent; zinc, manufactures of, 25 per cent; babbitt metal, 10 per cent; phosphor bronze, 10 per cent; lead, 60 cents per 100 pounds, when in bars or blocks; old lead, 40 cents per 100 pounds; manufactures of lead, 30 per cent; cans and packages made of tin or other material, 11 $\frac{1}{2}$ cents per quart; stamped tinware, japanned ware, 25 per cent; enamelled iron or steel ware, 30 per cent. Telephones or telegraphic instruments will be 25 per cent. Composition metal for the manufacture of filled gold watch cases, remains the same, 10 per cent ad valorem; Britannia metal and German and nickel silver, manufactures of, remain the same, 25 per cent. Manufactures of gold and silver jewellery have been raised from 20 per cent to 25 per cent, and I would have had no hesitation in raising the duty still more if I thought it would have had the effect of bringing in additional revenue, but when you go beyond a certain limit of duty no additional revenue is obtained. Sterling silver table ware and plated ware, 30 per cent, plated cutlery, 35 per cent, precious stones, 10 per cent; clocks, 25 per cent instead of 30; watches remain as before, 25 per cent. Jewellery and watch cases have been brought in under a common duty of 35 per cent. Coming to minerals, few changes have been made. Plumbago has been reduced from 15 per cent to 10 per cent; manufactures of plumbago from 30 per cent to 25 per cent. Cane or rattan, split, will be 12 $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent to 10 per cent; manufactures of plumbago from 30 per cent to 25 per cent. Manufactures of cane or rattan will be 15 per cent. Lumber and timber manufactures, further than rough sawn or hewn, 20 per cent; hubs, spokes, felloes and parts of wheels have been reduced from 15 per cent to 10 per cent; pails, tubs, churns, etc., reduced from 25 per cent to 20 per cent.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Is there any change on the duty on a wagon?

Mr. FOSTER. I will come to that presently. Manufactures of wood and brushes, 25 per cent; umbrella and parasol sticks, 20 per cent; veneers of wood reduced from 10 per cent to 5 per cent. Picture and photograph frames have been reduced from 35 per cent to 30 per cent; mouldings of wood from 25 per cent to 20 per cent; fishing rods are maintained at the same rate of duty, 30 per cent; furniture of wood, iron or other material reduced from 35 per cent to 30 per cent; coffins and caskets have been reduced from 35 per cent to 25 per cent.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Bless the dead.

Mr. FOSTER. That will be some relief to the hon. gentleman opposite. Billiard tables, which had a series of duties, specific and ad valorem according to their grades and value, have all been put in one list at 35 per cent. In respect to carriages, two divisions have been made. Carriages had a complex duty and were graded according to their value. It has been decided to make all farm and freight wagons, carts, drays and similar vehicles 25 per cent; and to make all other carriages and buggies, including children's carriages, at a uniform rate of 25 per cent.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Where do bicycles come in?

Mr. FOSTER. Bicycles and tricycles come in next at 30 per cent.

Mr. MULOCK. What reduction would that be on carriages?

Mr. FOSTER. You can figure it out in this way: If a farm wagon cost less than $50—say it cost $30—the duty as at present would be $10 and 20 per cent, which is $6; the two duties would be $16 on $30, which would be over 50 per cent. If a wagon cost $20 the rate per cent, ad valorem equivalent, would be still greater. The present arrangement of duties, besides lowering the ad valorem upon the farmers' wagons and all that class of wagons, does away with the discrimination against the lower valued wagons. Railway cars and the like are 30 per cent. Fibreware is reduced from 30 per cent to 25 per cent. Lead pencils are reduced from 30 per cent to 25 per cent. Musical instruments, which had a set of double duties, are reduced to a uniform duty: organs 30 per cent, pipe organs and sets or parts 25 per cent. Pianofortes had also a series of mixed duties, according to the value of the instruments, and a round duty of 35 per cent has been placed upon them. Parts of pianos coming in as before at 25 per cent, and musical instruments at 20 per cent. We come next to the items of sugars and syrups. The present duties upon sugars, as hon. gentlemen will recollect, is 8-10 of a cent upon refined sugars, and upon all sugars above No. 14 Dutch standard. Molasses has its duty of 1½ cents per gallon, grading up or grading down, as the molasses becomes better or as it becomes poorer. The decision of the Government with reference to sugar is this: to raise the colour standard from 14 to 16, so that hereafter all sugars not over, that is, including No. 16 Dutch standard, will come in free; all raw sugars. That will give ingress to a very valuable class of sugars fit for the table and culinary uses, which will be brought in largely from the West Indies. At the same time the protective duty for refined sugars, which is now 8-10 of a cent per pound, is to be reduced 20 per cent, and the duty will be 64-100 of a cent.

Mr. CHARLTON. Looking to Washington.

Mr. FOSTER. No; they will put a duty on raw sugar. That is, the committee arranged it; but what will be done, no one knows.

Mr. CHARLTON. They have only 3-10 of a cent protection.

Mr. FOSTER. No; the present schedule, if it goes into effect in the United States, will give a clear 4-10 protection. Glucose, or grape sugar, 1½ cents per pound. Sugar candy, in which all have an interest, which was 1¼ cents, and 25 per cent before, is reduced to 35 per cent. The molasses clause has been made more strict in order, if possible, to include in it what is really good molasses, and to exclude from that category of a low rate of duty, what is not good molasses and syrups of different kinds and of all qualities, some good and more of them bad, which are thrown into the market. So that the arrangement of the wording has been made as strict as it possibly could be upon molasses, and a third class is made of syrups of all kinds, the products of the sugar cane or beet root.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Do I understand the hon. gentleman correctly that from this time out the sugar duties will be 6-10 of a cent per pound, all over No. 16 Dutch standard?

Mr. FOSTER. Sixty-four one hundredths.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That is close to 6-10, practically the same. And on molasses—did he say it would be 5-10 of a cent per pound?

Mr. FOSTER. No; on molasses 1½ cents per gallon of a certain test, and when it goes far below that test, my hope is that it will not be able to come in at all. Below that test it degenerates rapidly, and becomes ultimately what is known in the Maritime Provinces as "blackstrap," but it is not used, I think, there except for the purpose of making blacking. I come next to textiles, and the first is cotton. Hon. gentlemen will remember that the cotton schedule or items run over a considerable space, and combine a very large number of different specifications. An attempt has been made, and I think successfully, to very greatly lessen the confusion that arises therefrom by making the schedules definite and fewer in number. It is proposed to have the following duties upon cottons: cotton batts, batting and sheet wadding, dyed or not, which formerly had a compound duty, have an ad valorem duty of 22½ per cent. Cotton warps and cotton yarns, dyed or undyed, which had a double or mixed duty, have been placed at 25 per cent. Cotton unbleached, which was formerly 1 cent a square yard, and 15 per cent ad valorem, has been made 22½ per cent. White or bleached cotton fabrics, which were 2 cents per square yard, and 15 per cent, have been reduced to 25 per cent, and cotton fabrics, printed, dyed or coloured, which came in largely at 32½ per cent duty, have been reduced to 30 per cent. That takes in the cotton schedule, being some five items, simple and plain, and avoiding all confusion in importation and appraisement.

Mr. FLINT. Does that include cotton duck?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, that includes cotton duck. Everything that is made of cotton finds its place in one or other of these schedules.

Mr. MULOCK. Has any estimate been attempted as to the reduction or revenue in this?

Mr. FOSTER. No; if I made any estimate it would simply be a guess, and would not be worth discussing. I cannot tell. We have one item after this: that of cotton and linen. xylonite, collars and cuffs, and shirts of all kinds, which is a rather difficult one to deal with. It is an industry which is very widely disseminated, which has grown to very large proportions, and which has one most excellent feature about it, especially in the province of Quebec, in that, the work is very largely distributed amongst the farmers' homes in the vicinity of these factories, where the wages are paid and where the effect of this distribution of the money is felt and seen in the general improvement and betterment of the community. In these collars and cuffs and shirts there is also a very strong competition, not only from the United States of America but more especially from the old country and from Germany. The low prices of labour on the continent enables them to put together these articles at an exceedingly cheap rate, and makes it almost impossible, makes it entirely impossible, in my opinion, without a strong vantage ground, for the manufacturers of these articles in this country to hold their own. The duties upon collars, cuffs and shirts have been arranged with reference to that condition of outside competition and to the feature of the general distribution of the work in our own country. Upon collars of cotton, linen, xylonite or celluloid, the duty, which was before 24 cents a dozen and 30 per cent, has been reduced to 24 cents a dozen and 25 per cent. Cuffs of cotton, linen, etc., have been reduced from 4 cents a pair and 30 per cent to 4 cents a pair and 25 per cent. Shirts of all kinds, costing $3 or less per dozen, have been placed at a uniform duty of 25 per cent ad valorem, a low duty, which will, I suppose, have the effect of sacrificing that part of the industry to the foreign producer; but shirts costing more than $3 per dozen, worn by the better class, have a specific duty of $1 per dozen and 25 per cent, instead of $1 a dozen and 30 per cent. That, I believe, will keep the larger part of the industry; and certainly there is no complaint in the country that these goods are not as well made and as cheaply sold in Canada as they are in other countries. Cotton clothing and all other manufactures of cotton, which were 35 per cent before, will be 32½. Crapes, black, 20 per cent. Velvets, velveteens and plush fabrics are increased from 20 per cent to 30 per cent for revenue. Webbing is put at 20 per cent, instead of 25. Jeans and coutils have been imported by corset-makers under a special schedule at 25 per cent, and some would come under the new 30 per cent rate. It has been thought best to keep a special schedule for these at 25 per cent. Laces, braids fringes, embroideries and the like are reduced from 35 to 30 per cent, not because it was thought well to particularly cheapen these goods, as they are in the nature of luxuries, but because it was thought that 30 per cent would bring a greater revenue than 35. Cotton sewing thread, in hanks or on tubes, black, bleached or unbleached, which was 12½ per cent has been increased to 15 per cent, while cotton sewing thread and crochet cottons, on spools or in balls, has been kept at 25 per cent. It was considered that 10 per cent was sufficient for the operation of spooling; a little more revenue will accrue, while the price will not be raised to the consumer. Twine and cotton cordage of all kinds, 25 per cent. Cordage not elsewhere specified, 30 per cent. Twine for harvest binders, which was reduced last year to 12½ per cent, has been kept at that rate. It is really a low rate, and has not in it now a very large element of protection, now that the different governments have undertaken to manufacture binder twine in the prisons. Boot and shoe laces are 30 per cent. Hammocks and lawn tennis nets are 30 per cent; damask, towels, and sails for boats and ships are 25 per cent. Bags or sacks of hemp, linen, cotton or jute, which had half a dozen different kinds of duty, some of them compound, have been lumped together under a uniform rate of 20 per cent. Bags or sacks of hemp, linen, cotton or jute, and all manufactures of flax and hemp are 20 per cent. Jute cloth, dyed or bleached or calendered, 10 per cent. The silk duties have been kept as they were. Silk velvets and all manufactures of silk and ribbons are at the same rate of 30 per cent. When we come to woollens, the difficulty of arranging the tariff was apparent from the outset. The woollen industry is exceedingly diversified in the grades and qualities of its productions. The present duties are specific and ad valorem together. On the lowest class of goods, or shoddies, they range to a very high ad valorem equivalent, and it has been found impossible, even with the best intentions, to do all that was desired for that part of the woollen trade. It has been found impossible to afford adequate protection to that class of goods, which at the same time would be reasonable for straight woollen goods. The Government has therefore come to the decision to make two single items of the whole woollen business. Yarns, woollen and worsted, which bore 10 cents a pound and 20 per cent ad valorem, have been made to bear an ad valorem duty of 27½ per cent, and all fabrics and manufactures of wool have been put at the rate of 30 per cent. Women's and children's dress goods, which are imported in the rough, to be dyed and finished in this country, come in at 22½ per cent, under regulations as to their dyeing and finishing. Felt, pressed, of all kinds, 17½ per cent. Hosiery and knitted goods, which have borne a double duty of 10 cents a pound and 20 per cent, are put into one schedule and will pay 35 per cent. The carpet schedule, which ran over five or six items, has been reduced to one, and carpets, mats and rugs are put at 30 per cent. This will be a slight increase on Brussels carpet, which before paid 25 per cent; but those who buy Brussels carpet can afford to pay a little more for the purpose of uniformity in the schedule. Carpeting, mats and matting of cocoa, hemp or jute, the same as before. 25 per cent. Floor oilcloth, which before had a mixed duty, has been put in one item, at 30 per cent. Window shades, 35 per cent. Gloves and mitts, 35 per cent. Ready made clothing, 32½ per cent. Hats, caps and bonnets, umbrellas and parasols, 30 per cent. Braces and suspenders, 35 per cent. Surgical belts and appliances, 25 per cent. In the class of sundries, artificial flowers are the same as before, 25 per cent. Buttons of hoof, rubber, vulcanite or composition, which were before 5 cents per gross and 20 per cent, have been put at 4 cents per gross and 20 per cent. Buttons of pearl, vegetable ivory or horn, which were 10 cents per gross and 20 per cent, have been made 8 cents per gross and 20 per cent. Buttons of papier maché and all other, n.e.s., which were 25 per cent, are reduced to 20 per cent. Combs, 35 per cent. Fireworks, 25 per cent. Fertilizers, compounded, which bore 20 per cent, have been reduced to 10 per cent, and all un-compounded fertilizing matter comes in free, and can be imported by any person and mixed and compounded by the farmer himself for his own wants. Gun, rifle and pistol cartridges, cartridge-cases and the like are reduced from 35 per cent to 30 per cent. Nitro-glycerine, dynamite, blasting, mining and gunpowder and other explosives, which bore specific or specific and ad valorem duties, have been placed in one schedule at 25 per cent. Photographic dry-plates are 30 per cent. Tobacco pipes, cigar and cigarette-holders, 35 per cent, the same as before. Trunks and valises, 30 per cent, the same as before. I do not propose to trouble the House by reading the whole of the free list through. I will place that, of course, upon the Table, and it will be printed in due course. There are just one or two things that I wish specially to notice. With reference to books, I have explained that pretty fully. Generally, I may say, that all acids, drugs, dye stuffs—everything which is necessary for tanning in the manufacturing process and the like—have been taken from the dutiable list and placed on the free list. In that respect, pretty nearly all, if not all, the elements that go into dyeing, tanning and the like, have been made free. In addition to the books made free are those printed by any government or association for the promotion of science and letters, and issued in the course of the proceedings of such association, to its members, and not for the purpose of sale or trade. Also books, not being printed or reprinted in Canada, which are included in the curriculum of any university or incorporated college in Canada; books specially imported for the bona fide use of incorporated mechanics' institutes, etc. Brass scrap and brass in sheets or plates. Brass in bars and bolts, drawn, plain and fancy tubing, and other brasses, as will be seen by reference to the list, are made free. In the article of minerals, coke, which was dutiable heretofore, has been placed on the free list. This will be a large concession to the whole of the western part of this country, in so far as manufacturing is concerned.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Did you say anything about bituminous coal?

Mr. FOSTER. In passing over that, I said they were kept as before. But there is one item made free, which deserves special mention, and the object of which is to afford a healthy amusement, at a cheap rate, to a large and deserving class of our population. Curling stones of granite have been made free. Dogs have been added to other fowls that come in free for breeding purposes. Globes, geographical, topographical and astronomical, have been put on the free list. Mining machinery, it will be recollected, was put upon the free list for three years.

Mr. EDGAR. That was only what could not be made in this country.

Mr. FOSTER. That has been re-enacted with an addition which will make it read as follows:—

Mining and smelting machinery, imported prior to the 16th May, 1896, which is at the time of its importation of a class or kind not manufactured in Canada.

The object is to assist, as far as possible, in holding out inducements for the establishment of new smelting furnaces.

Mr. FRASER. Will that include such machinery as is required for the washing of ores as well as the mining of ores?

Mr. FOSTER. It will include just what is understood under smelting machinery. I am not sufficiently versed in mining and smelting machinery to know just how far it will go, but the Controller of Customs and the Minister of Justice will take care that it does not go too far. Shoe buttons, papier maché; metal glove-fasteners, eyelets, hooks and eyelets for boots and shoes, and lacing hooks, are free. Sugar, not above No. 16 Dutch standard in colour, sugar drainings or pumpings, drained in transit, melado or concentrated melado, tank bottoms and sugar concrete, are also free. With reference to woods, logs and round unmanufactured timber, not specially enumerated or provided for in this act; firewood, handle bolts, railroad ties, ship timber and ship-planking not specially provided for in this act, and other woods as mentioned in the schedule, are free. This is a special concession, and I hope will prove a useful one in Manitoba and the North-west. There was no one feature of our examination into the condition of things in that part of the country, which impressed itself so forcibly on my mind, as the combine which existed for the distribution and sale of lumber. Every town was parcelled out. One or two men were selected, to whom was given the monopoly of selling in each place. The prices were fixed, and if they sold a fraction of a cent under the fixed prices, their privilege was taken away and given to somebody else. That monopoly bore heavily on the people in that country, where lumber is so essentially necessary in the making of barns and houses, and I came to the conclusion that if possible help should be given by putting lumber upon the free list, and that has been done. But there is a codicil, which will, I know, please my hon. friends opposite. These articles are free, but it is provided that:—

If any country shall impose a duty upon the articles in this schedule enumerated, or any of them, when imported into such country from Canada, it shall be lawful for the Governor in Council, from time to time, by proclamation published in the Canada Gazette, to declare that the following export duties, or any of them, shall be chargeable upon logs exported into such country from Canada.

The articles enumerated are as follows:—

Pine, Douglas fir, fir balsam, cedar and hemlock logs not exceeding $3 per thousand feet board measure. In case of the export of any of the above enumerated logs in shorter lengths than 9 feet, then a rate per cord may be levied in the same way, equivalent to the above enumerated rate per thousand feet, board measure. And export duty shall be chargeable accordingly, after the publication of such proclamation: Provided that the Governor General in Council may by proclamation published in like manner, from time to time, remove and reimpose such export duty.

Wood pulp, mechanically ground, and chemical wood pulp, bleached or unbleached, are added to the free list. I think I have exhausted the patience of the House, and your patience, Mr. Speaker.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the total effect of this on the revenue?

Mr. FOSTER. I therefore will conclude this long series of remarks by giving the hon. gentleman the information which I have at hand. The total reduction of revenue resulting from the changes, taking as a basis the imports of last year, will be about $1,500,000 or $1,600,000. This takes into account the additions to the revenue which we may fairly calculate upon, as in the case of rice.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That is the net loss.

Mr. FOSTER. That is the net loss. That is a rather bold reduction to make, the situation being as at present, but I have every hope that the depression in the revenue will be short lived, and that in a few months the revenues of the country will recover their buoyancy with recovering business on the other side of the line, in Great Britain, and, I hope, the world over. However that may turn out, I think that what we have to face, as a prudent people, and to face cheerfully, is the fact that we may be short in revenue for a year or two as compared with former terms. It is our duty, in making this reduction and incurring that shortage, to keep the expenses of the country well within our revenue, whether it slightly exceeds our expectations or whether it does not fully come up to them. I wish to state this one thing in addition: After all that has been done in the United States, after their election, run upon the basis of tariff revision, and after the question has been thoroughly fought out in the House of Representatives, there is a net result, if the Wilson Bill is carried as at present, of an average protection on dutiable imports of 30·66 per cent. That is a little over the average upon the dutiable imports in Canada under the present tariff. The American representatives came face to face with the facts: their theories had to be put to the test of a practical solution, and the leaders, in the preparation of the Bill, and in the House itself were obliged frankly to acknowledge that they could not make a free trade measure and that they had to embody in the Bill the principle of protection. That principle has been embodied in it from the first. But, after all the agitation that has taken place, their average ad valorem duty, calculated on the basis of their imports, will be a little higher than our average ad valorem duty under the present tariff. Under the reduced rates which I have just given, our ad valorem duty will be, on the average, about 28 per cent, which is a large reduction, and much below that of the United States as it will be if the Bill is carried as proposed. I want to say, in conclusion, just one more word with reference to the principle of reciprocity. We have been charged with not dealing with the United States in a fair and reciprocal spirit. We must consider the whole line of the Customs tariff. We know this fact, that the McKinley Bill in 1893 (the last year of its operation if the new Bill is carried) charged an ad valorem duty equivalent to an average, on the table of imports, of 49½ per cent, while our tariff, as regards dutiable imports for home consumption, went down to an average of 30·28 per cent. Ever since they have had a protective system their duties have been, on the average, from 15 to 20 per cent higher than ours, and, in some cases, their duties have been double what ours have been. Take cotton warps and yarns—their average duty in 1890 was 46 per cent; in 1891 they were 49 per cent; in 1892 they were 49 per cent; and in 1893 they were 50·23 per cent. On carpets, they have had an even 50 per cent; on cotton cloth from 46 to 48 per cent; knitted goods, in 1892, an average of 68 per cent. The total cotton manufactures have borne a duty of 55 per cent, and so on through the whole list. It cannot be argued that, in the matter of arrangement of duty we have not treated them fairly. They have been able to get over our wall, but it has been almost impossible for us, in nearly every line of manufactured goods, to get over the wall they have built around their country. I thank you, Mr. Speaker, and the members of the House for the attention with which you have listened to me.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Will the hon. gentleman allow me a question? He has mentioned that garden seeds remain as before. Is grass seed in the same category?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes; it remains as before.

Mr. CHARLTON. If the hon. gentleman will permit me I desire to ask a question. As I understand the hon. gentleman, boards, deals, etc., are placed upon the free list, with a provision that nations that do not reciprocate shall have an export duty placed upon logs and some other articles. A contingency may arise with regard to which I wish to inquire. The American Congress has now a tariff bill under consideration, which bill places these articles upon the free list. Consideration of that bill may not be completed and final action taken as early as final revision upon this bill. Under the provisions of the tariff just explained by the hon. gentleman, as I understand it, we are liable to have export duties imposed in the interim between the time this bill is passed and the time the American bill is acted upon. If that were the case, it would have an irritating effect and might very seriously compromise our chances of getting free admission for our lumber into the United States. Would such a contingency arise?

Mr. FOSTER. No; it is not the intention that any contingency of that kind shall arise.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I suppose the intention of the hon. Minister in the resolutions he has placed before us is to repeal the present provisions of tariff enactments and to consolidate the law?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). As the hon. Minister proceeded I did not observe that he referred to some articles which had occurred to my mind, and he has forgotten to tell us what rate he intends to impose on unenumerated articles.

Mr. FOSTER. The same as before, 20 per cent.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. I would like to ask the Finance Minister if it is the intention to allow stereotype plates for newspapers to come in free?

Mr. FOSTER. There is no change in that respect; stereotypes for books come in free. I have already, Mr. Speaker, thanked yourself and the members of the House for the attention with which you have listened to me. The following are the resolutions:—

1. Resolved, That it is expedient to revise and consolidate the Acts and parts of Acts now in force respecting the duties of Customs, and that for this purpose it is expedient to repeal the following Acts or parts thereof not heretofore repealed, viz. :—

5. That any goods or packages being the growth, produce or manufacture of Canada, and having been exported therefrom and intended to be returned, may be admitted free of duty on being reimported into Canada, provided such goods or packages were entered for exportation, and branded or marked by a collector or proper officer of Customs, and are fully identified by the collector or proper officer at the port or place where they are so reimported; and provided further, that the property in such goods or packages has continued in the same person or persons by whom they were exported, and that such reimportation takes place within one year of the exportation thereof.

6. That all medicinal or toilet preparations imported for completing the manufacture thereof, or for the manufacture of any other article by the addition of any ingredient or ingredients, or by mixing such preparations, or by putting up or labelling the same, alone or with other articles or compounds, under any proprietary or trade name, shall be, irrespective of cost, valued for duty and duty paid thereon at the ordinary market value in the country whence imported of the completed preparation when put up and labelled under such proprietary or trade name, less the actual cost of labour and material used or expended in Canada in completing the manufacture thereof or of putting up or labelling the same.

11. That regulations respecting the manner in which molasses and syrups shall be sampled and tested for the purpose of determining the classes to which they shall belong with reference to the duty chargeable thereon shall be made by the Controller of Customs; and the instruments and appliances necessary for such determination shall be designated by him and supplied by such officers as are by him charged with the duty of sampling and testing such molasses and syrups; and the decision of any officer (to whom is so assigned the testing of such articles) as to the duties to which they are subject under the tariff shall be final and conclusive, unless upon appeal to the Commissioner of Customs within thirty days from the rendering of such decision, such decision is, with the approval of the Controller, changed; and the decision of the Commissioner with such approval shall be final.

That subject to the foregoing provisions and to the requirements of the "Customs Act" (Chapter 32 of the Revised Statutes, as amended) there shall be levied, collected and paid upon all goods enumerated, or referred to as not enumerated in Schedule A hereto appended,—the several rates of duties of Customs set forth and described in the said Schedule and set opposite to each item respectively or charged thereon as not enumerated, when such goods are imported into Canada or when taken out of warehouse for consumption therein:

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I wish to relieve your mind and that of my hon. friends by saying at once that I have not the slightest intention of inflicting a speech upon them to-night. We have had an extremely interesting discussion upon the most important matters that can come before us and I will not pay the Finance Minister so poor a compliment as to proceed to discuss changes in 665 tariff items without having the document before me. I therefore move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved :

That the adjourned debate be made the first Order of the Day on Wednesday and subsequent days until concluded, after questions put by members.

Motion agreed to.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 11.10 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, 28th March, 1894.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

OFFICIAL REPORT OF THE DEBATES.

Mr. LARIVIERE moved :

That the House do now concur in the First Report of the Select Committee appointed to supervise the Official Reports of the Debates of this House during the present session.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I would ask that the motion should not be pressed for this afternoon. There is, perhaps, some mistake in the recommendation of the committee on the subject of the gratuity to the widow of one of the official reporters now deceased. It was the intention of the Government to propose a gratuity in the Estimates, and, I think, in the main Estimates before the House a gratuity is now proposed, and, I think, a little larger than the one recommended by the committee. A postponement will give us an opportunity of ascertaining whether that concurs with the views of the committee, or whether the proposition is to give a second gratuity, which, I think, the House would not be disposed to do.

Motion withdrawn.

AMENDMENTS TO THE SEAMEN'S ACT.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 13) to amend the Seamen's Act. He said: There are just two paragraphs in the Bill. One is the same as was in the Bill introduced last session, and it is to extend the right of lien for disbursements that the seamen now enjoy, to the master the same as in the English law. The second clause is to extend the language in a section of the Seamen's Act so as to remove all doubts, and practically to legalize a practice which has obtained in the Board of Trade in England since 1869. In 1869 the Government of this country entered into an arrangement with the Board of Trade respecting expenses incurred by Her Majesty's Consuls in relieving sick and distressed mariners; and in examining certain accounts it was ascertained that the language of the Act did not go so far as the agreement upon which action has been taken ever since 1869. At the moment I would not be quite positive as to which words were required, but I am of the opinion that the question of the domicile was the point in reference to which legislation is required to carry that agreement out. As it stands, this proposal is that a seaman who is domiciled for twelve months in Canada shall be entitled to the advantages of those provisions in the Seamen's Act.

Motion agreed to, and read the first time.

CHINESE LABOUR AT ESQUIMALT.

Mr. PRIOR asked. Whether the Government is aware that the Imperial authorities having charge of the impending fortifications at Esquimalt, British Columbia, are employing Chinese labourers on those works; and if so, will they remonstrate with the Imperial Government on this matter and strongly urge the necessity of giving employment to the large surplus of white labour now on the Pacific Coast instead of to the Chinese?

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). I was not aware of the circumstances referred to in question until they were brought to my notice by the hon. member. I may say that there is nothing before me upon which to base a remonstrance.

THE ROYAL MILITARY COLLEGE.

Mr. MULOCK asked, 1. How many students have graduated from the Royal Military College since its establishment? 2. How many of these graduates are now in the public service of Canada, and how many in the service of the Imperial Government? 3. How much has been expended on capital account and how much on income since the college was established? 4. How many students graduated in 1893? 5. How many students are now in attendance? 6. What is the total amount of salaries paid each year of all persons employed in connection with such college? 7. Who is the commandant of the college? What is his salary; what perquisites, if any in the way of free residence, maintenance thereof, supplies, servants or otherwise, does he enjoy? 8. Was a residence for the use of the commandant purchased? If so, what was the purchase money, and what amount has been expended thereon by the Government since the purchase?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I think the hon. member ought to move in a matter which requires so much labour.

Mr. MULOCK. Will the hon. gentleman allow this to pass as a motion?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Yes.

Mr. MULOCK. I will make the motion, then, presently.

Mr. SPEAKER. You cannot to-day.

Mr. MULOCK. By consent. It has been done before.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I would suggest that the hon. gentleman should move the motion when motions are called to-morrow. We will waive any notice.

PUBLIC WORKS IN GUYSBORO'.

Mr. FRASER asked. 1. Have the Government or any member thereof authorized Mr. J. G. Forbes, the Conservative candidate in the county of Guysboro', to state that he is promised by the Government or any member of the Government, in case he is returned, to obtain large sums for breakwaters and other public works in the said county of Guysboro'? Have any promises for such expenditures been given by the Government or any member thereof? 2. What is the amount expended in the province of Nova Scotia since 1878, by counties, on railways, harbours, breakwaters, wharfs and all other public works in said province?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The Government have not, nor has any member thereof, authorized Mr. J. G. Forbes to state that he was promised by the Government or any member of the Government, in case he was returned, to obtain large sums for breakwaters and other public works in the county of Guysboro'; nor has any promise for such expenditures been given by the Government or any member thereof. Applications were made to some of the Ministers and to myself with respect to some works in the county, on the part of Mr. Forbes and friends who came with him, but no promise was given other than an assurance that the representations they made would be fully considered, and the claims of the different localities they mentioned would be investigated. It is proper I should state for the hon. gentleman's information that Mr. Forbes has written me a letter denying that he made any such assurances as are stated in the question, and that the only assurance he gave was that the friends whose election he was advocating and himself would be glad to forward any request, and exercise any influence which they possess in favour of obtaining any proper expenditures which the necessities of the county might require. The information called for in the second branch of the question should be moved for by the hon. gentleman. It will require considerable work by each department in order to obtain the amount expended in Nova Scotia, since 1878, by counties, on railways, harbours, breakwaters and other public works.

Mr. FRASER. Will the hon. gentleman allow a motion to that effect to take the same position as the motion to be moved by my hon. friend from North York (Mr. Mulock) ?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Yes.

SUGAR REFINERIES.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT asked, Whether the number of persons employed in sugar refineries is correctly stated in the last census returns at 171 ?

Mr. FOSTER. The number of persons who are sugar makers and refiners, as given in the census of 1891, is 171, and the number of persons employed in sugar refineries is 1,927.

FLAG STATION AT MILL RIVER, P.E.I.

Mr. PERRY asked, At whose recommendation was the flag station at Mill River, P.E.I., moved to Howlan Road ?

Mr. HAGGART. The flag station at Mill River was moved to Howlan Road on application of Rev. A. E. Burke and others.

CLAIMS BY ENGINEER PALMER.

Mr. PERRY asked, Did the Government finally settle with Engineer Palmer on account of claims for services in boring across the Straits of Northumberland during the summer of 1892 ? If yes, what is the amount paid Palmer ?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, the Government have settled with Mr. Palmer. The total amount paid in connection with the work of these borings during the season in which Mr. Palmer had charge under his agreement, is $7,280.

MIMINEGASH BREAKWATER, P.E.I.

Mr. PERRY asked, Is there a balance of $1,000 or any amount not expended out of the appropriation towards the repairs and extension of the Miminegash Breakwater, Prince Edward Island ?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON.

Mr. OUMET. The balance unexpended is $455.50.

DREDGING AT MIMINEGASH BREAKWATER, P.E.I.

Mr. PERRY asked, Did the Department of Public Works, by contract or otherwise, authorize dredging along the Miminegash Breakwater, Prince Edward Island ? If by contract, who is the contractor ? What is the amount of the contract ? Is the Government satisfied that such dredging will not damage the breakwater by causing it to tumble over ?

Mr. OUMET. I am informed that the Department of Public Works did not authorize dredging along the Miminegash Breakwater, Prince Edward Island, and the Department is not aware that such dredging has been done.

PROPOSED TUNNEL ACROSS STRAITS OF NORTHUMBERLAND.

Mr. PERRY asked, Have any borings been made last year across the Straits of Northumberland, from Cape Traverse, P.E.I., to Cape Tormentine, N.B., with the view of further obtaining information as to the practicability of building a tunnel across the Straits, and to enable engineers to make an estimate as to the cost of building said tunnel ? If yes, who was the contractor ? If by day work, who was the engineer in charge ? How many borings were made ? How much did the work cost ? Is it the intention of the Government to cause further borings during the present year ?

Mr. FOSTER. No borings were made last summer across the Straits of Northumberland from Cape Traverse to Cape Tormentine. It is the intention of the Government to cause further borings to be made during the coming summer.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) To be continued until the elections.

TIGNISH BREAKWATER, P.E.I.

Mr. PERRY asked, What is the amount collected and paid in during the year 1893, at Tignish Breakwater, Prince Edward Island ?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. No returns have been made of the amount collected for the year 1893 at Tignish Breakwater.

IMPORTATION OF COAL OIL IN TANKS.

Mr. LANDERKIN asked, At what date did the regulations which permitted the importation of coal oil in tanks come into force? In how many places in Ontario is oil so admitted at present, and what is the name of each place? Have any places applied for authority for such privileges and been refused? If so, what places and why refused?

Mr. WOOD. The regulations which permitted the importation of coal oil in tank cars came into force on 1st July, 1893. Oil is so admitted in 38 places in Ontario. The names of those places are: Belleville, Berlin, Brantford, Brockville, Cornwall, Chipewa, Collingwood, Fort Erie, Galt, Gananoque, Guelph, Hamilton, Kingston, London, Lindsay, Napanee, Oshawa, Ottawa, Owen Sound, Pembroke, Perth, Prescott, Peterborough, Port Arthur, Port Hope, Port Stanley, Petrolia, Sarnia, Sault Ste. Marie, Smith's Falls, Stratford, St. Catharines, St. Thomas, Toronto, Whitby, Windsor, Woodstock and Welland. No place has applied for authority for such purposes and privileges and been refused. With regard to one place, Harrison, for which application was made for this privilege, a favourable recommendation has been made, but owing to the fact of its not being a customs port some delay has arisen, there being no officer at such place to collect the Customs revenue.

WILLIAMSBURG CANAL SUPERINTENDENT.

Mr. LANDERKIN asked, Has the following article from the Morrisburg 'Herald' been brought to the notice of the Government:—

The Superintendent of the Williamsburg Canals is unmolested in his dual role of superintendent and medical practitioner. His professional card, a plea for patronage, is displayed prominently in a local paper, and every effort made to remove as far as possible from the intention of the regulations governing his as well as other official positions. During the late session of the Ontario Assembly, the member for Dundas with extreme earnestness insisted that an official who was allowed to partake of the proceeds of business other than his official one, was nothing less than a thief, that the practice was bad and should be ended. It is not allowed in this province. Most of your readers will well remember when the late superintendent, Mr. A. G. McDonell, was compelled to relinquish a lucrative law practice in order to retain his position as superintendent. This, of course, was during the Mackenzie regime, but the same regulations are still in force and should be put into operation as they were at that time.

What is the name of the officer, his salary, and when appointed?

Mr. HAGGART. The article referred to by the hon. gentleman had not been brought to the attention of the Government. The name of the superintendent of the Williamsburg canal is Charles E. Hickey; salary, $1,800 per annum, and he was appointed in 1891.

THE LOBSTER FISHERY.

Mr. BOWERS asked, Whether the Minister of Marine and Fisheries has received, since the last session of Parliament, any correspondence recommending or asking that the limitation of size, as regards the taking of lobsters, is placed at ten and one-half inches?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I have.

Mr. BOWERS asked, Whether the notice of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries has been called to the systematic evading of the fishery law in the harbours and along the shores to the eastward of Halifax, N.S., and the fact that parties there not only catch lobsters, but can them during the close season? Shall we see, this session of Parliament, an Act placed upon the Statute-book of Canada, looking towards the better preservation of this very valuable and remunerative fishery?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. In reference to this and the following question, I regret that I have to take objection to the manner in which they are framed. I have no objection to give the hon. gentleman the definite information which he desires, but I think the two questions involve, to some extent, debatable subjects, and they are based on hypothesis that I cannot admit. Therefore, I am not really in a position to satisfactorily answer them as they stand.

HON. SENATOR SANFORD.

Mr. LANDERKIN asked, Whether the Government are aware that Mr. Senator Sanford spent a considerable time at Washington, in discussions on the subject of the United States tariff, with certain members of the United States Congress?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Shortly before the session, Senator Sanford informed me that, for certain reasons of his own, it was very important that he should visit Washington in connection with his own affairs, and, as regards expressing approval, I could not do otherwise than express approval of his intention under the circumstances, although, in connection with business coming before the Senate his presence here would have been desirable. I am not aware how much time the hon. Senator spent in discussing the United States tariff question.

Mr. LANDERKIN asked, also, Whether Senator Sanford communicated his intention of proceeding to Washington to the Government of Canada, or to any member thereof, and whether the Government, or any member thereof approved of his intention?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I think I have answered that question pretty fully before.

Mr. LANDERKIN further asked, Whether Senator Sanford had any communication with the Government, or any member thereof, during his stay at Washington, and whether he has made any report of his proceedings, while at Washington, to the Government, or any member thereof, verbal or otherwise ?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Yes ; I had one or two letters from Senator Sanford while he was in Washington, and conversation with him since his return. I would not like to say they were on the subject of his proceedings—that is a rather formal expression—but they were in relation to his visit to Washington.

THE REPORT OF THE MAJOR GENERAL.

Mr. MULOCK asked, 1. Whether the report made by the Major-General commanding Her Majesty's forces in Canada will be published in ordinary course, and if not, why ? 2. Whether the said report, as originally presented to the Minister contained a statement that the militia of Canada, in their present state of organization, could not resist fifteen hundred regular soldiers, or words to that effect ?

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). I may say that the report of the Major-General will come down in due course. In answer to the second paragraph of my hon. friend's question, the reply is, No.

ROYAL COMMISSION ON THE LIQUOR TRAFFIC.

Mr. FLINT asked, Has the Royal Prohibition Commission (so-called) concluded the taking of evidence and hearing of arguments on the subject under their consideration ? If so, has the said Commission yet made any report, preliminary or otherwise, of its findings, or evidence taken by it, to the Government ? When will the report be presented to Parliament ? Is it the intention of the Government to publish in detail the evidence taken by the said Royal Commission, and is such evidence to be presented to Parliament with the report of the Commission ? If the Commission has not yet reported, when does the Government expect to receive such report ?

Mr. FOSTER. I desire to say in answer to that question that the Prohibition Commission has concluded the taking of evidence and the hearing of the arguments on the subject under their consideration. The Commission has not yet made any report, but the evidence taken by it or nearly all of it is in. The report will be presented to Parliament as soon as it comes from the Commission into the hands of the Government.

Mr. LAURIER. Is there not a preliminary report ?

Mr. FOSTER. Not yet. The intention of the Government is to publish the evidence taken by the Royal Commission, in fact the major part of the evidence is already in print, and such evidence will be presented to Parliament with the report of the Commission. The Government expects to receive the report of the Commission before a very long time.

SAMUEL CAMPBELL, P. E. I.

Mr. DAVIES asked, What was the date of the dismissal of Mr. Samuel Campbell from the position of superintendent of St. Paul's Island, and keeper of Ingonish Island ? When was he appointed to fill these positions, respectively, and what was his salary at the time of his dismissal, and how long had he served ? What was the alleged cause of his dismissal ? Was he granted any superannuation allowance ? If not, why ?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Mr. Samuel Campbell was appointed keeper of the Ingonish light on the 17th of April, 1871. He was appointed keeper of the two lights and superintendent of the Humane establishment on St. Paul's Island on the 6th November, 1874. His salary was $600 at the time of his dismissal. He was 67 years of age at the time of his dismissal, which occurred in the autumn of 1893. He was dismissed for holding out improper inducements to secure a vote at an election, and for these reasons, of course, he was not superannuated.

CATTLE EMBARGO IN GREAT BRITAIN.

Mr. FEATHERSTON asked, Has the Government received any official intimation from the Imperial Government of their intention of removing the embargo now existing against Canadian cattle entering the ports of Great Britain ? If so, on what condition do they propose the removal of said restrictions ?

Mr. FOSTER. No official information of such intention has been received.

VACANCIES IN THE SENATE.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT asked, How many vacancies are now existing in the Senate ? 2. For what length of time have the said vacancies existed ; giving date in each case ? 3. Is it the intention of the Government to fill the said vacancies without further delay ; and if not, why not ?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. There are seven vacancies existing in the Senate. I cannot, for the present, give the dates at which they occurred.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Will you get these dates, as it is a matter of certain consequence ?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Yes ; let that stand for the present. It is the intention of the Government to fill the vacancies at an early date.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT asked, also, Have the Government, or any member thereof, promised any member of this House that he will be appointed to one of the vacancies in the Senate, and if so, at what date?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The answer is, No.

CUSTOMS COLLECTORSHIP OF MONTREAL.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT asked, When did the office of collector for the port of Montreal become vacant? Is it the intention of the Government to fill this office without further delay, and if not, why not?

Mr. WALLACE. The office became vacant on the death of the late collector, M. P. Ryan, on the 15th of January, 1893. It is the intention of the Government to fill the position at an early day.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT asked, Have the Government or any member thereof promised any member or members of this House that he or they will be appointed to the collectorship of Montreal, and if so, at what date is the said appointment to be made?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The answer is, No.

THE STATISTICAL YEAR-BOOK.

Mr. COCKBURN asked, Why is the Statistical Year-book for each year not ready for distribution among the members of this House when it meets, and how is it that in Great Britain and the United States the Trade Returns are published monthly, in full, by countries, quantities and values, so that every business man may see at the earliest date the trend of the exports and imports of the country for the preceding month?

Mr. FOSTER. The Statistical Year-book is in part an abstract of the blue-books published by the several departments for presentation to Parliament. Until these blue-books are prepared it is impossible to obtain the material for the preparation of the Year-book. It is the intention to accelerate as much as possible in the future the obtaining of this information. With regard to the second question, the departmental figures of the Trade Returns have not hitherto been made up in such form as to admit of monthly publication, but the question of such publication is under consideration.

REPORT OF DEPARTMENT OF MARINE.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I would like to ask the hon. Minister of Marine the cause of the delay in the presentation of the report of his department this year, and when we may hope to have it?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The report of the Department of Marine and Fisheries has nearly every year been later than the other annual reports, for this reason: all the other reports cover the fiscal year, whereas the report of the Marine Department covers the calendar year; so that we are obliged to wait until we get reports from the outside officers of their work up to the end of December instead of to the end of July. Last year and the year before the report was brought out earlier than usual—which no doubt has caused the hon. gentleman to ask this question—because we divided the report, as it were, bringing the preliminary portion down much earlier than the later portion. It was, however, considered somewhat inconvenient, and the whole report is now in the hands of the printer, and I was told a week ago that it would be ready in a few days for distribution.

RELEASE OF MCGREEVY AND CONNOLLY.

Mr. MULLOCK. I would like to ask the hon. Minister of Justice the reason for the delay in bringing down the return ordered on the 20th of March last, in reference to the McGreevy and Connolly pardon?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. There was no delay. The file of papers was put in hand immediately, and the copying of them is complete. They were laid on my desk this afternoon, but I did not bring them, because I had not time to read them.

Mr. MULLOCK. We may expect them tomorrow, then?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Probably.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE BUDGET.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Foster:

That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair, for the House to go into Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. FOSTER. Before my hon. friend proceeds with his speech, I desire to say that in making up the schedules last night the class of fish and fish products was left out. It was prepared, but in the copy which was laid on the Table of the House, as well as in a second copy which I had, it seems to have been omitted, and I desire to submit it to-day as a part of what should have been included last night. At the same time, I desire to correct two clerical errors, so that in the discussion of the subject we may be on all-fours.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Are there any material changes in the duties on fish and fish products?

Mr. FOSTER. No. Democrat wagons are to be included with carriages and buggies at 35 per cent. It was a clerical error that they were put in the class to which I alluded last night. Starch and preparations of starch, instead of being 1¼ cents, should be 1½ cents. Both of these were clerical errors, which I wish to have corrected, so that the discussion may proceed on a proper basis.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, like my predecessor, I shall feel compelled to crave the indulgence of the House on this occasion if I trespass on their patience for somewhat more than the time I usually require. I fear that it will not be in my power to make my speech as interesting as was the latter half of his speech, but I will do my best, notwithstanding, to relieve the monotony which attends on discussions of a financial character. The hon. gentleman, I observed, divided—and perhaps very properly divided—his speech, which was of very unusual length—although amply warranted by the magnitude of the subject—into two parts. The first portion, consuming about two hours and a half in delivery, was occupied in a eulogy of the late—I suppose I may call it the late—tariff. The hon. gentleman pointed out with great force and great unction, the high, noble and patriotic motives which actuated the framers of that tariff. He dwelt with almost equal unction on the enormous benefits which had accrued to the vast mass of the people of Canada under the beneficent influences of the National Policy. Nor did he forget to reprimand those evil-minded men who had dared to speak of that great policy as a blight and a curse. But, Sir, whilst I can understand that so far the hon. gentleman may have carried a large number of his supporters with him, I do think that when in the succeeding two hours and a half he proceeded to maul and main, and mutilate and mangle, in every conceivable shape and form, this so glorious work of art, the National Policy and the tariff which represented the National Policy, I do conceive that, in the minds of some of his supporters perhaps—I fear in the minds of a great many of his attentive listeners—there did appear to be some inconsistency between the first half and the latter half of the hon. gentleman's speech. By the time the hon. gentleman had got through with what I have described as the late tariff, I am bound to say I think that tariff, or rather the tariff which succeeded it, could only be properly described by the language which Lord Byron applied to the man who fooled around a powder magazine: "The very mother who him bore she had not known her son." One thing only the hon. gentleman did not do, which he ought to have done: he did not succeed in exorcising the demon of protection from the tariff which he otherwise treated so badly. The shell was altered; the outward and fleshy tabernacle was altered; but the spirit of protection remained as before. Now, Sir, I would ask, in all sincerity and kindness, the hon. gentleman and his friends here, and his supporters throughout the country, to consider what manner of thing was that tariff with which the hon. gentleman dealt so roughly on that occasion. Sir, at least in the hon. gentleman's eyes, I think that tariff should have been entitled to gentler treatment. Was not that tariff the last-born, best-loved child of Sir John Macdonald? Was it not tenderly nursed by Lady Tilley—I mean Sir Leonard Tilley? Was it not the tariff to which the great Sir Charles Tupper had been sponser and midwife? Was it not, therefore, entitled to better treatment at the hands of the Minister of Finance than it received? I can only liken the treatment it received at his hands, to the story so well related by Victor Hugo, in which he describes how a noble boy of princely parentage, strayed from his home, fell into the hands of an itinerant tinker, and how that tinker did so mutilate and deform that princely child that he made of it a hair-lipped, split-nosed, squint-eyed monstrosity, henceforth of no use to any one but the tinker and his friends. In the recent assembly of a body to which I desire to refer in all respect—no less important and august a body than the Protective Association of Manufacturers—meeting, I think, in Toronto, I observe that one fervent admirer of the late tariff, intimated, I think semi-officially, that the only way to deal with those who raised sacrilegious hands against the holy tariff, was, simply, to fasten a hempen rope around their necks. I confess I thought for a moment, when Mr. Gurney made that recommendation, it was me he had in his mind; but it appears it was not exactly open foes, but secret traitors, to whom he had reference. I have one question to put to the Minister of Finance. He knows, and we all know, that a thing of beauty is a joy for ever. Has he not told us, time and time again, almost without number, what a thing of beauty was the late tariff? And yet it is his sacrilegious hands that have maimed and mutilated that beautiful object. Sir, I can hardly refrain from expressing the sentiment which all men ought to feel, when they see a noble creature mutilated by unworthy hands:

Mr. FOSTER.

"An eagle towering in his pride of place Was by a mousing owl hawked at and killed."

Mr. FOSTER. Nothing personal intended.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Certainly not. Incidentally and in the course of his general remarks, the hon. gentleman did four things. First of all, he was good enough to explain to us the genesis of the tariff. Do you think, Mr. Speaker, that was preparatory to its exodus? In the next place, the hon. gentleman enlarged, and I also will presently enlarge, on the innumerable tokens of general prosperity throughout this country due to that tariff. He was then good enough—for my special benefit, I suppose—to deal in a small chapter of deficits. And lastly, he gave us a lecture on tariffs, and explained how all tariffs were more or less protective, the British tariff in particular included. Well, with respect to the noble, the lofty, the patriotic motives which actuated the noble men who founded and introduced the National Policy and the tariff based thereon, it is possible for us to obtain a little better evidence than the Minister of Finance. That hon. gentleman was not present on that auspicious occasion. He did not enter Parliament until many years after the tariff was an accomplished fact. Now, we are highly privileged in having in this House—and I am delighted to see him here to-day—a gentleman who was present on that occasion. He was very high in the councils of his party. He was, and deservedly, a bosom friend of the late Sir John Macdonald, and I propose to read what that most unimpeachable witness had to say as to the lofty, the patriotic motives which impelled the men who originated and founded the tariff. Sir, I find that the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), who spoke on the subject, was good enough to inform the country :

No doubt in the world the Conservative party were put out of power, and by going in for the National Policy and taking the wind out of Mr. Mackenzie's sails we got into power. We became identified with the protective policy, and if Mr. Mackenzie had adopted a protective policy we would have been free traders. I am willing to make this confession, that if Mr. Mackenzie had been a protectionist, there would have been nothing left for us but to be free traders. But Mr. Mackenzie was either too honest or too earnest in his opinions to bend to the wave of public opinion, and the result was he was swept out of power and had only a corporal's guard to support him when the House met.

The House and the country can judge whether the Minister of Finance or the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) is a better authority or is likely to be better informed as to the real motives which actuated the founders of the National Policy. But I can add a little, of my own personal knowledge, to the facts bearing on the case. I remember right well in 1876, after having finished my speech on the Budget, that my esteemed friend, Mr. Mackenzie, stepped over immediately to Sir Charles Tupper, then sitting in the place I now occupy, and asked him whether he had not been prepared at that moment with a speech denouncing Mr. Mackenzie and myself, had we come down and proposed any addition to the burdens of the people. And I have Mr. Mackenzie's word for it, that Sir Charles Tupper candidly admitted, that had we proposed an increase, he was prepared, then and there, with all the eloquence which fits him so well, to denounce us for placing the iron heel of an Ontario Finance Minister on the neck of the Maritime Provinces.

An hon. MEMBER. Give us the corroboration.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It requires no corroboration. It was my fortune in early life to be exceedingly well acquainted with the late Sir John Macdonald. Few men among his colleagues knew him better or had better opportunities of knowing him than I had; and I know this at least, that while Sir John Macdonald was in the prime of his life and of his intellectual vigour, on all occasions he spoke of protection as a hollow sham, and intimated to me and many others his belief that a revenue tariff was the only one properly suited to Canada. And, unless I am greatly misinformed, the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), so far at any rate, corroborates this in many of his speeches, as to express his opinion, which I believe was true enough at the time, that the protective tariff of 1879 was only adopted, according to his understanding, by Sir John Macdonald as a mere temporary expedient. Now, Sir, the hon. Minister of Finance had the—well, I must call it audacity, looking at all the facts—to rise in his place—he, the man who presumably ought, by virtue of his position, to be best acquainted with the true condition of the people of this country—and to tell us that Canada at this time was enjoying a great measure of general prosperity. This, Sir, was what he said—he hailing from the Maritime Provinces, those provinces which in the last ten years have not added one per cent to their total population, I believe; he, coming from the province of New Brunswick which, in the last ten years, has not added 61 souls to its entire population; he, representing the county of King's which, within the last ten years, putting together the absolute loss of population and the natural increase which it has failed to retain, has lost well nigh 9,000 souls on a present population of 23,000—this hon. gentleman, though knowing these facts and having them forced upon his notice in every possible shape and way, dares to tell us that this country is in a state of general prosperity. Sir, it is an old and a true saying "Where wealth accumulates, men decay." I will not dispute the fact that in the province of New Brunswick, if we are to judge from the specimens we have on the Treasury benches, there has been a great decadence since the days of Sir Albert Smith and Mr. Isaac Burpee—

Mr. FOSTER. In size.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am afraid, however, that if the men have decayed, the wealth has not accumulated, unless, peradventure, so much as may have flowed into the pockets of fortunate individuals having seats in the judiciary of the province, or of those owning land in the immediate vicinity of some Intercolonial railway station. Then, Sir, the hon. gentleman was good enough to give us a little chapter on deficits. He was good enough to express a very strong opinion, indeed, as to the utter lack of statesmanship—I think that is what he said—which distinguished any government that happened to have a deficit at any time. The hon. gentleman is not a very old member of Parliament and does not seem to be very well acquainted with the history of the Canadian statesmen with whom he has been associated. Was the hon. gentleman aware that, when he made that slightly unguarded statement, he virtually spat upon the grave of his own late chief? Was he aware that of all the statesmen that have ever lived in Canada there never was one who had so many deficits or such enormous deficits in proportion to the income at his disposal as the late Sir John Macdonald? You do not think so? Well, Sir, I will give the hon. gentleman—it is worth while doing it—some proofs on that subject. The hon. gentleman has chosen, as his predecessors have chosen, rather inadvisedly, to refer to deficits incurred under the Mackenzie Administration. Why those deficits were incurred, what caused them, I will have a word or two to say about presently. I find that when Sir John Macdonald was Prime Minister of Old Canada, he had in 1858 a deficit of more than 60 per cent on the total receipts. I find that in 1859 he had a deficit amounting to 22 per cent, in 1860 and in 1861 he had deficits of 28 per cent, and so on. Now, Sir, what were the total deficits during the Mackenzie regime? The greatest we had was a deficit of 9 per cent and the last was a deficit of 4 per cent. Why were Sir John Macdonald's deficits incurred? In consequence of his own acts? Why were Mr. Mackenzie's deficits incurred? Sir, they were incurred because of the enormous obligations left upon this country through the desperate attempt of Sir John Macdonald and his colleagues, by wholesale bribery, to escape the condemnation which was justly meted out to them in 1873. That was the cause of our deficits—that our predecessors went out of office leaving four millions of dollars of annual charge upon the country for which they had not provided one single copper. Let the hon. gentleman, if he chooses, lay down the proposition—I do not object to it, but he may find reason to recall it before he is much longer in office—that all deficits are evidence of gross want of statesmanship. The hon. gentleman had better be cautious. The statements he has laid before us show that he himself is in very serious peril of having a deficit, and a very considerable deficit to deal with before this country is 18 months older. I have here his statements of the 10th of March. What do they show? They show that the revenues up to that date are half a million less, and the expenditures up to that date half a million more, than they were last year. They show, in other words, that by the 10th of March last past all his boasted surplus of 1893 had vanished into thinnest air. He told us last night that he expected to lose one and a half millions of revenue from the results of the tariff he brought before us. Now, Sir, if that be the case, the hon. gentleman is convicted out of his own mouth; his practice does not keep pace with his principles. The hon. gentleman is making a deficit inevitable; he has apparently taken no steps to prevent it. The hon. gentleman trusts to nothing except the bare chapter of accidents, to a lucky chance, to relieve him from the very thing which he brought as a reproach against me, an event which has occurred in a very great number of cases in Canadian history, as he well knows, an event which has occurred in the history, even of the very government in which he was a Minister, for I recollect very well, in a former year, gentlemen opposite had a bigger deficit than the whole of mine for three years put together. How was that deficit caused? Was it caused by the overruling act of Providence, by financial depression which we could not control, or by any great shrinkage in values? Not at all, Sir; but by the most scandalous and wicked misgovernment of those unfortunate half-breeds in the North-west, and which ended in goading that people into insurrection. But, Sir, perhaps the crowning effort of the hon. gentleman was the lecture he delivered to us on the three kinds of tariff which, he alleged, were alone possible. Let me say to the hon. Minister that a little knowledge is a very dangerous thing. The hon. gentleman was wholly in error. He has laid down propositions which no political economist who knows his business would defend for one instant. The hon. gentleman dares to tell us that you cannot have a revenue tariff without incidental protection. I take issue with the hon. gentleman from the start. You can have a revenue tariff without incidental protection; and, more than that, I tell the hon. gentleman that the English tariff to-day is a tariff which gives no protection at all. Sir, the hon. gentleman is fond of looking to English precedents—

An hon. MEMBER. Fond of saying so.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I accept the correction; the hon. gentleman is fond of saying he looks to English precedents, but very fond of following American ones. The hon. gentleman left it to be inferred that there was incidental protection in the English tariff. I have here the English tariff. I will give the hon. gentleman my place and my time and he may show then, if he can, that it affords incidental protection. Or I will read the items in succession and I challenge him to show one single solitary item in the English customs tariff which gives incidental protection in any shape or form. The customs tariff of Britain yields a total of about £20,000,000. The first item is £4,290,000 from the duty on foreign spirits. Does the hon. gentleman say that there is any incidental protection there? The next is £1,268,000 on wine. Does he say there is any protection there? The third duty is a duty on tobacco yielding £10,124,000; and he ought to know, if he does not know, that the English excise laws are so arranged that there is absolutely no protection to the English grower there. Then there is the duty on tea, cocoa, coffee, chicory, amounting to £3,745,000. It may be known to the hon. gentleman, but it will be news to the House, that there are sections of the British Islands in which tea, cocoa, coffee and chicory can be grown to advantage, and if not, there is no incidental protection there. The remaining duties, and they are very small indeed, are £345,000 from dried fruits, not an article affording much incidental protection, and £33,000 on miscellaneous minor customs duties, which I have not investigated. There is the English customs tariff; and now, and here I defy the hon. Minister of Finance or any of his followers to show one vestige of incidental protection in the English customs tariff as it stands to-day.

Mr. McNEILL. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman if there is not incidental protection upon whisky?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. member had better refer that question to the Prohibition Commission. My impression is that it is the other way; my impression is that home-made whisky is considerably more taxed than it ought to be in proportion to the taxes which are levied on the wines consumed by the richer classes in England. I will answer the hon. gentleman to the best of my knowledge—the protection is, in my judgment, to the foreign grower of wine, and not to the manufacturer of Scotch, or Irish, or English whisky.

Mr. McNEILL. There is a duty upon imported whisky, and consequently a protection to the home-made whisky.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. And a very heavy excise duty upon home-made whisky. However, my challenge was to the Minister of Finance, but I know he is not as good an authority upon whisky as my hon. friend. Sir, I would be glad to have the hon. Minister of Finance, or his friend the Controller of Inland Revenue, point out if they can one solitary instance where there is a particle of incidental protection, or protection of any kind, at present, contained in the British tariff. Now, I will not say to the hon. gentleman, "Tarry at Jericho till your beard be grown,"—that appears to be unnecessary—but I will say to him that he had better not undertake to instruct this side of the House in matters of political economy until he has mastered at least the A B C of the same. Sir, it is, as the hon. gentleman was good enough to remind us, exactly 15 years, or within a few days, since the initiation of that scheme of fraud misnamed the National Policy. It becomes our duty now to recall some of the promises which were made to the people of Canada when that delusion was palmed off on them; it becomes our duty also to examine the position in which we find ourselves to-day. Sir, what is that position as compared with 1879? We find that our national debt is very nearly double. I left it at one hundred and forty millions net; the hon. gentleman knows it is more than two hundred and forty millions now. The real taxation of this country, as compared with the taxation going into the Treasury in Mr. Mackenzie's time, has been absolutely trebled, if you put together not merely the sum which goes into the Treasury, but the sum which is taken out of the pockets of the people for the benefit of a few hundred persons. The great mass of farm property and the great mass of town and village property, every one knows, has at least in the older provinces been frightfully depreciated in those fifteen years. Far worse than that, a thing I regret infinitely more than I do the loss of a few hundred millions of dollars, is the fact now well known, proved by the United States returns, proved by our own returns, that most unhappily to-day, in all human probability, of every male born in Canada, between the ages of 20 and 50 years, one in three is found in the United States; and I make that statement, with special reference to the enormous percentage of the youth of our country found in the annual migration to the United States. Sir, in ten years, if there be one particle of truth in the official statistics laid on the Table of the House by the hon. gentleman's colleagues, during that period, 886,000 persons came to Canada intending to settle, and our census returns show that scarcely 150,000 of them remained with us. In those ten years, if the United States statistics are to be relied upon, and if, as I said, our statistics are worth the paper they are written on, we have lost from Canada a million and a quarter of people, putting together the loss of the emigrants who came here intending to settle, and the still more important factor of the loss of our own people who have gone to the United States. All these things have occurred in a country having a population of five millions, but having lands and resources quite sufficient to enable it to sustain 50, and it may be, 150 millions of people. Now, I ask the Minister of Finance whether in the teeth of facts like those, he is not ashamed to repeat the statement he has made, without one particle of foundation in fact, that this country is in a state of general prosperity. There is one test of prosperity, the truest test and the best test. Do people desire to leave a country which is as prosperous as he describes; do people come to a country so prosperous as he describes, and then leave it by hundreds of thousands? Sir, what has the hon. gentleman to say of the unrest and discontent which, as he well knows, pervades all Canada to-day? Do men clamour to have general prosperity removed from them? Do they fly by millions from a state of general prosperity? If that general prosperity exists, is it needful that the Government of the country should be sustained by such means as we know they are sustained? Is it needful that general prosperity should be defended by fraud, by falsehood and by corruption? Is it needful that general prosperity should be maintained by subsidizing a part of the press to distort the truth? Is it necessary that general prosperity should be maintained by raising a corruption fund at the point of the bayonet from protected manufacturers, or by gerrymandering the constituencies by wholesale in such a fashion that in my own province to-day I can point you to twelve constituencies where the Reform party had a collective majority of over 2,000 strong, and yet, of the representatives in this House returned by those 12 gerrymandered constituencies, having a Liberal majority of 2,000 strong, we have only four Liberal members to eight Conservatives. I can point you to the other end of the same province, where the Minister of Public Works resides, and I can show you there 12 constituencies having a Conservative majority 2,000 strong, from which 12 constituencies there are 10 Conservatives and two Liberals returned. So that out of 24 constituencies in which the actual vote was equally divided between the two parties, by grace of the gerrymander, the Conservative party have eighteen representatives and the Liberal party six. Sir, is it necessary to maintain and defend general prosperity by means of knavish Franchise Acts? Is it necessary to do it by bribing the electorate by wholesale, as we have seen so often done? Let us for our part face the situation frankly. Let us understand where we are, and let us understand what we have to do, before we decide how far the proposals of the Government are worthy of the acceptance of the people of this country. Sir, what is our situation? Why, in the first place, looking at the question of the public debt, allowing for the difference in the rate of interest on our debt, and on the English debt, which, as the House knows, is considerably heavier for us than for them, our debt at this moment, gauging it as it ought to be gauged, by the amount of interest we pay, is quite equal per head as regards the burdens of the people to the great public debt of England, incurred during hundreds of years, and in the prosecution of hundreds of wars. It is equal, I believe, to the debt with which the United States emerged from their great and desperate civil war. Then as I have often pointed out, if you will take the real taxation inflicted by the tariff on the people of Canada, and not merely the nominal taxation as recorded in our Public Accounts, you will find that per head the sum paid by the people of Canada to-day quite equals the sum paid by the people of England, with this extremely serious difference, that whereas the English tariff is wisely and justly so distributed that the chief burden after all falls on the shoulders of the upper and wealthy class, our tariff is arranged so that the chief burden falls on the shoulders of the needy, and the most heavily taxed man in Canada to-day is the poor man with a large family to support. We know perfectly well, as I have said, that the flower of our youth to-day is not to be found in Canada but in the United States, in a great measure. We know, I know, if the hon. gentleman does not, that in hundreds of towns and villages in the province of Ontario, and the same rule applies, I am informed, to places in the Maritime Provinces and to the province of Quebec, that there is scarcely one in ten of those formerly prosperous towns and villages in which, during the last ten years, the growth of population has equalled the natural increment, without taking into account in the slightest degree the immigration we have brought at great cost into this country. The hon. gentleman knows, or he ought to know, for the census returns have made it plain to any one of the meanest capacity, that over all the rural districts, with very few exceptions, throughout the elder provinces of Canada, the rural population has been decimated four times over. We have lost more by far than our total natural increase, when you come to take into account in these elder provinces the number of people imported into them as well. The hon. gentleman knows, we all know, and we all regret it, and no man regrets it more than myself, that the stupendous efforts that have been made and the enormous sums that have been spent in prosecuting the colonization of the North-west have resulted in what I can characterize as no better than total failure, taking into account on the one hand the extent of our exertions, and on the other hand the great natural resources of that country. The hon. gentleman must know, and if not, any of his friends from the rural districts can inform him, that within these ten or fourteen years the prices of our leading farm products have fallen, fallen, fallen, till they have touched to-day the lowest point known for forty years. The hon. gentlemen disclaim all power to add to the prices of farm products; they now tell us these are governed by causes beyond their control. What said the hon. gentleman's friends and predecessors when they were preaching the National Policy in 1878? Why, our ears were dinned with declarations, that with the National Policy the people would have a home market for everything they could raise, and obtain high prices for everything they could produce; every village would become a town, every town would become a city, and all that the farmers could produce would be wanted for the enormously increased population which the National Policy would bring in. Sir, I think we have not seen the worst. I fear that, low as prices have fallen, there is danger in some important respects that they may fall lower yet; but of that I shall have a word or two to say later on. Well, Sir, what is our consolation? The hon. gentleman tells us: Take heart; never mind the loss of one-third of our male population, the depreciation in the value of our farms, and the reduction in the prices of farm products ; be consoled, the savings' banks are increasing their deposits, and the depositors in the banks are becoming more numerous. That is good so far as it goes. I am not disposed to question that these are evidences of thrift ; they go to show that the hon. gentleman has not quite succeeded, as yet, in utterly destroying the fruits of our industry and our great natural resources. But if the hon. gentleman knows his business as he should know it, he must be aware that when he talks of one hundred and twenty or one hundred and fifty millions of additional savings, that is quite insignificant when compared with the loss to the farmers of Canada alone by reason of the huge depreciation which has taken place in the value of the farms from one end of the country to the other. Sir, I say, and I know whereof I affirm, that in the province of Ontario alone there has been a decline equal to ten dollars an acre on every acre of cultivated land from one end of the province to the other, and I am informed by those who have larger power of obtaining information than myself, that what is true of Ontario is true of Prince Edward Island, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Quebec, and if the hon. gentleman understands what that means, he will know that for every dollar that has gone into the savings bank three or four dollars have gone out of the pockets of the farmers of Canada. The hon. gentleman in the course of his remarks advanced one very absurd fallacy. The hon. gentleman took credit to the National Policy for the whole growth of manufactures. Why, does the hon. gentleman not know that there were plenty of manufactures in Canada before we ever heard of the National Policy ? Does he not know that the growth of Canadian manufactures during the period from 1860 to 1878 was very considerable indeed, and if he is going to claim credit for that growth he must in all consistency and honesty deduct first a percentage of increase equal to that which occurred during the period when we were living under a revenue tariff. My hon. friend near me says if that were done there would be nothing left. That is to say, that although there would be a few specially favoured industries which had grown up in consequence of this policy there would be in other quarters of the country a marked absence of natural, wholesome, indigenous industries which had perished under that blight and curse. The hon. gentleman made one correct statement in his speech, and I give him credit for it. The hon. gentleman said, and said truly, that Canada had been very successful in weathering the financial storm which very nearly wrecked so many industries in the United States. Sir, for that result very considerable credit, in my judgment, is due to the Canadian banking system, which I have always defended against the attempts made by some hon. gentlemen opposite, and unless my memory fails to serve me, made by the Finance Minister himself, to interfere with it unnecessarily. But I have a caution to give the hon. gentleman. I know, and I have seen it more than once, I have seen it as a private man and have seen it and felt it as a Minister, and it is perfectly well known to men of experience in Canadian affairs, that as a rule a great and general disaster in the United States, for instance, will not make itself fully felt in Canada for a year, or it may be two years after it has occurred in the United States, and if the hon. gentleman understands the real situation, he and his colleagues, however contrary it may be to their inclinations otherwise, should pray night and morning that the cloud resting over the United States be speedily lifted, because I tell them, knowing of what I speak, that if unfortunately the United States were again to go through a period of depression similar to that which prevailed from 1873 to 1878, the hon. gentleman would find his revenue and his receipts reduced day by day in an infinitely more alarming ratio than he may expect. I desire, for their sake and for our sake, that the United States should prosper ; I believe and hope with the hon. gentleman that the financial tornado which has swept over them will be of short duration, and that they may be speedily restored to something like their pristine prosperity. But I tell the hon. gentleman, that if, unfortunately, it should be otherwise, if, unfortunately, the United States shall be subject to a prolonged period of great depression ; if he is wise, he will take in all sail with all possible expedition, for he may rest assured that every merchant and every manufacturer and every business man in Canada will have a bitter experience to go through, if our great neighbour and best customer were to suffer again as she did some twenty years ago. I hold it in some respects as a sign of returing sanity, that the hon. gentleman, and the Minister of Justice too, appear at long last, a very long last, to have wakened up to the conviction that our interests and those of the United States are very closely intertwined. They did not always think so ; at any rate, they did not always say so, and they have not always instructed their press to express those friendly sentiments for the United States. But, whatever they thought before and whatever instructions they gave, the fact is so, and I am glad to see from their remarks some sign that they are wakening up to the fact, that for good or for evil, the prosperity of the people of Canada is exceedingly closely intertwined with the prosperity of the people of the United States. I do not know what I can say as to the propositions the Finance Minister made in the direction of reciprocity. Is it impossible for this Government to do anything by wholesale ? Must they tinker at every proposition they make ? Do they not know that all these petty little offers of concessions to the United States are practically worthless ? Let them come down with a bold and decisive measure of reciprocity, and although I must say that their conduct has not been altogether such as to recommend them, I think in that case they will get a very fair consideration from the Government and from the people of the United States. But, Sir, that is just what they won't do; they won't meet the United States; they won't even tell the Parliament of Canada what they intend to do with respect to the offers of reciprocity already contained in the tariff of the United States. Where it suits their purpose, on one or two individual articles, as my hon. friend (Mr. Laurier) pointed out last night, they are ready enough to declare that they will, under certain conditions, go for reciprocity, but when they are asked as to what they shall do as to a particular article known to be recommended by the committee of Congress, an article of great importance and involving very important manufactures indeed, why, Sir, it is quite impossible to obtain anything but the most frivolous and contradictory answers from them on a point on which they ought to know their own minds and be prepared to take the House into their confidence. There is one other point, with respect to the statement of the Finance Minister, which deserves some consideration. The hon. gentleman's proceedings have done this, at any rate: they import an element of great uncertainty into the trade and business of this country. He has got, in a very remarkable fashion, new light on the tariff. Who can tell us that after the next election the hon. gentleman may not get new light the other way, and that all these changes that are made on the eve of a general election—not many months, as he says, before a general election—may not, after the general election, be reconsidered and reconstructed as heretofore. Let my farming friends look to it, and let them take good, strong and solid material guarantees that these gentlemen will be kept in the same frame of mind that they are in at this present moment. We asked the hon. gentleman last night for information, which I think we had a right to have. We asked him to let us know what his calculations were as to the extent to which these varied changes would affect the revenue of the country. What was the answer we got? We wanted to know the loss of revenue that was likely to accrue in consequence of the reductions of duty, but the hon. gentleman did not know. We asked to know the loss which was likely to accrue from the bounties he proposed to give, but the hon. gentleman did not know. The hon. gentleman told us that it was all guess-work, and that the result of his lucubrations was in brief this: That he was about to make a leap in the dark and he did not know where he would land. There is no doubt, Mr. Speaker, that an honest confession is good for the soul, but whether one which is not so honest will be of any spiritual benefit, I am not quite sure. Now, if the Minister of Finance were like Mr. David Wells, who began life a great protectionist, but who was converted by watching the practical operation of the United States tariff, into a very decided and demonstrative free-trader; if the hon. gentleman is really—and I am not quite sure that he has not been converted at the bottom of his heart into a free-trader, or at least a revenue tariff man; after all said and done, the hon. gentleman ought in all conscience to let us know it. But I fear that even if the hon. gentleman is converted, he will keep that conversion as he has done his conversion on other subjects on which he originally entered public life with very pronounced opinions—pretty well at the back of his head until the election is over. The speech of the Finance Minister, in one aspect, might be described as one long apology to the manufacturers. He wanted the manufacturers to understand that he was their dear and trusty friend, but he also wanted them to understand that the wolves were after him and that self-preservation was the first law of nature. The hon. gentleman's conduct on this occasion is not altogether unlike the story published and illustrated by 'Punch,' of the Russian mother, who, being pursued by wolves, first affectionately kissed her babes and then threw them over; or, perhaps, the hon. gentleman's conduct might be more fitly described by a reference to the ancient Egyptian tradition, that, when the deluge overspread the country, the antediluvians of that date put their children under their feet in order that they might thereby prolong their base and miserable existence a few seconds more. Sir, there are three things which especially strike me in the hon. gentleman's remarks. One of them was this: In this new tariff of his, which is to supersede the old one, there is, apparently, an utter absence of any governing principle. You might define this tariff as a tariff in which the very maximum of disturbance is introduced, in which the very maximum of loss of revenue has occurred, and in which the minimum of general substantial relief to the consuming classes is given. I do not say that no relief is going to be given, but I say that for a thoroughly revised tariff I never saw more disturbance, with more pitiful results. If I were going to coin a word for it, I would be very apt to describe it, not exactly as a tariff of shams perhaps, but certainly as a tariff of makeshifts. There is no sort of finality about such a tariff as that. The hon. gentleman will find—and I warn him, and I warn his supporters, and I warn the manufacturers—the hon. gentleman will find that you cannot stop here. He will have to go further. He will have to make more concessions. He will find himself compelled, whether he likes it or not, by reason of the very concessions he has given and of the very steps he has taken, to surrender or to quit. The second thing that must strike every one in this tariff is the fact, that of all tariffs that have ever been submitted in Canada, this is the tariff which looks straightest and most directly to Washington. We can easily see why this House was not allowed to meet until the very latest moment that the law permitted. The original tariff was, it is true, a mere plagiarism of the tariff of the United States, but it was hardly so servile a copy as the hon. gentleman is disposed to make the one he has now introduced. Sir, what have these hon. gentlemen done? Did Mr. McKinley impose or threaten to impose new taxes? The House will remember that straightway the hon. Minister of Finance imposed new taxes. Did Mr. McKinley remit any taxes? Did he lower the sugar duties? Straightway the hon. Minister of Finance lowered his sugar duties. Do the United States makes alterations all along the line of their tariff, as they propose to do by the Wilson Bill? The hon. gentleman straightway makes alterations all along the line of his tariff, until, as he told us last night, there is scarcely any more than a imaginary line between the amount of taxes levied under the Wilson tariff and the amount levied under his own—I think he put it at 28 per cent under his and 30 per cent and a decimal under the Wilson tariff. There is another point on which I have a word or two to say. This House will remember well the denunciations with which this Chamber, and the country, too, rang when I dared to say that if Canadian interests required it, I would not hesitate to have discriminatory duties against Great Britain. What have these men been doing in their tariff? From start to finish this whole tariff of their has been one huge discrimination against Great Britain. Sir, that was from the necessity of the case. Great Britain is a great manufacturing country—the greatest manufacturing country in the world. Therefore, if you introduce a tariff for the purpose of protecting manufacturers, it follows necessarily that you must discriminate, and discriminate heavily, against Great Britain. Now, Sir, it is not possible for anybody but an experienced expert to tell how far, in these changes which the hon. gentleman has made, that particular effect of his tariff is increased or removed; but I know, and the hon. gentleman knows, that a critical analysis of his former tariff, at any rate, shows all through a very great discrimination indeed against Great Britain. Why, Sir, in a certain document, purporting to be official—I have no reason to believe that the thing was forged—said to have been prepared for the use of the hon. gentleman, I come upon such items as these: Iron axles, imported from Great Britain, 61 per cent; from the United States, 44 per cent; bar iron, imported from Great Britain, 38 per cent; from the United States, 27 per cent; boiler iron, from Great Britain, 41 per cent; from the United States, 23 per cent; cast iron, from Great Britain, 52 per cent; from the United States, 43 per cent; and so on, through a long list of articles which I will not now inflict on the House. Now,

I should like to know what, under these circumstances, is the hope of the Government. Well, Sir, apparently the hope of the Government is simply in the chapter of accidents. It is possible—and I think in their inmost hearts they would be heartily glad of it—that tariff reform in the United States may fail. It is possible that the well-expressed will of the people of the United States may be frustrated. It is possible that obstacles may be placed in the way which may delay for a time, though I think not for a long time, the giving effect to the wave of reform now sweeping over the United States; and how our excellent Government would rejoice if they were only able to point to a higher tariff existing in the United States than in our own country. There are other accidents which might occur to help them out. It is possible that we might have a European war, which would cause an increase in the price of some of our staples; we may have good harvests, or some such piece of good luck may befall them; but, looking at the facts submitted to this House and to the people of Canada, the stern and plain fact remains, if the calculations of the hon. gentleman are correct, and if there is no improvement in our condition or alteration in our system of affairs, that we are driving headlong into that condition of deficit which the hon. gentleman denounced so energetically about twenty-four hours ago. I observe that the hon. gentleman did in one or two places deprecate allusions to the past. We deal with the present, he said, not with the past. Well, Sir, I can understand perfectly why the hon. gentleman, and some of his friends, too, should deprecate allusions to the past. People with a certain class of antecedents do not like allusions to the past. If I wished to endear myself to an assemblage of a particular kind, no doubt I would abstain from certain allusions to the past. Were I addressing, for instance, an assemblage of ex-convicts, I do not know that I would allude to the effects of the transportation system; nor, if I were addressing an assemblage of fraudulent bankrupts, would I consider it necessary to allude to the importance of a strict insolvency law inflicting severe punishment on those who defrauded their creditors. Similarly, it might not be expedient to talk of a rope to men whose ancestors were hanged, or even whose ancestors deserved to be hanged. I do not doubt that it is equally unpleasant to some of these hon. gentlemen to recall the promises which heralded in the National Policy. What were we promised then? Why, Sir, above all and before all, we were promised economical government. An expenditure of twenty three and a half millions—that was a frightful thing! According to Sir David Macpherson, it was an appalling thing; I have his statement here to that effect. Sir Leonard Tilley was shocked at it; and Sir John Macdonald thought it a horrible thing. Sir, what are the facts? I left office with an expenditure of twenty-three and a half millions; my successor comes down and tells us that he requires to provide for an expenditure of thirty-seven and a half millions. These hon. gentlemen promised, from one end of Canada to the other, that they would stop the exodus from the country, although they well knew that during Mr. Mackenzie's time the rural population increased twenty-fold faster than during their time, and that the emigration from Canada, under Mr. Mackenzie's regime, was not one-third or one-fourth of what it has been under theirs. But they declared they would stop that exodus. Well, Sir, we find, as the result of their efforts in that direction, that, not in fifteen years, but in ten years, between the foreigners who have come to this country and left it again, and our own citizens who have become residents of a foreign country, one million and a quarter of people who ought to be in Canada are in the United States. Sir, these hon. gentlemen pledged themselves a hundred times over to settle the North-west, and to repay to the people of Canada every penny which the Canadian Pacific Railway would cost them. These pledges are on record; I can give the hon. gentleman chapter and verse for them. I can show him the place where Sir Charles Tupper promised us 640,000,000 bushels of wheat per annum from the North-west at a time which has long since expired. I can give chapter and verse for the promise made by Sir Charles Tupper, and backed up by Sir John Macdonald, that by the 31st of December, 1891, we should be in receipt of $58,300,000 of cash, or securities which would be better than cash, from the sale of our lands in the North-west, to indemnify us for our outlay on the Canadian Pacific Railway. I have likewise the Public Accounts in my hands to show that from the day we occupied the North-west down to this present hour, though we have voted away an empire, we have not obtained from it enough to pay the costs of our surveys. Sir, they promised to provide home markets for all our farmers could produce, and last night the hon. Minister of Finance made it the special point of his speech in that regard that we were able to supply outsiders with more products than we did before. They talked of redressing the balance of trade, too. Well, I have not looked up the last fifteen years, but I think the balance of trade is against us to the tune of at least $200,000,000 during that period, and probably nearer $300,000,000. Aye, and they talked of increasing the price of farm lands and products. How say these hon. gentlemen now? Now they tell us that none but quacks and charlatans would dare to tell the people of Canada that it was in the power of any government to increase the price of farm products. Agreed. None but quacks or charlatans ever did or would use such language; and it was such language which was used by the men who founded the National Policy. Sir, they tell us that there are causes which no government can control. Again I say I agree with them, but it has taken them fifteen years to discover that simple fact. What are the causes which we can and what are those which we cannot control? It is true that a certain section of the people were deluded by these false promises and fell into grievous error in 1878. They condemned the Mackenzie Government then for causes which, according to these gentlemen's own statements to-day, no government that ever lived could by any possibility control. They condemned us for the results of the acts of our predecessors, against which we had protested from first to last. What are the causes which led to those deficits the hon. gentleman alluded to? What were the causes which brought about the downfall of Mr. Mackenzie? It is worth while to spend a few short moments in recalling them. They were, first, the world-wide depression which extended over almost the entire civilized world from 1873 to 1878, and more particularly over our two best customers, Great Britain and the United States. As I have said, it will be well for the hon. gentleman if he is not called upon, as I hope he will not be called on, to grapple with such a period of distress in the future. What was the second cause? It was this. It is well-known to every one who knows anything of the commercial history of that time—during 1876, 1877 and 1878—that there was an enormous, and, up to that date, perfectly unprecedented fall in prices, which necessarily disorganized all calculations of income based on the ad valorem principle. And lastly, there were the immense outlays which had been undertaken, against our will and protest, by the predecessors of Mr. Mackenzie, for purposes by no manner of means urgently required in the interests of the country. Those were causes which the Government of that day could not control, and which led to the deficits of which the hon. gentleman complains. But while there are causes no government can control, there are others perfectly well within the power of governments to control. Sir, every government can control the amount of taxation it finds necessary to impose upon the people. Every government, if it likes, can confine that taxation to the amount absolutely required to meet the necessary services of the country. Governments likewise can very largely affect the distribution of wealth. In those two ways, and only in those two ways, there is not the slightest doubt government can largely affect the general prosperity of the country. Now we are confronted with the results of the course we adopted in 1879. What has been the cost to us? I notice that the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) put it at about the same amount as I did although he arrived at his figures by a somewhat different process. I believe there have been exacted from the people of Canada during the last fifteen years, in real taxes, paid not into the treasury but into the pockets of manufacturers as well, not less than $1,000,000,000, and for that belief I shall at the proper place and time give adequate and substantial reasons. I have given them several times before, and they have never yet been successfully controverted on that side of the House. When they are replied to, I or some of my friends on this side of the House will be ready to refute the answer. We have lost one and a quarter million people in ten years and very nearly two millions in the last fifteen years. In 1867 I was one of those who agreed to Confederation. There was no man who would not, at that time, have scouted the idea that after twenty-seven years of Confederation, Canada would not have at least a population of seven millions strong. That is the population we ought to have, resulting from the bare natural increase. That would have been barely equal to our previous natural increase and barely equal to the natural increase which has taken place in many other countries less favourably circumstanced than ours, and that increase would have taken place had we been able to keep our young men and women at home. The proof is this. In the United States returns there is a special column for the children of Canadians, which shows that there are now in the United States—either Canadian-born or of Canadian parentage on both sides—two and a half millions in all—one million born in Canada and one and a half million the children of Canadians. The Government have done worse. They have introduced a debasing and degrading element into the body politic. If there was no other reason, if all they say as to our material progress was true, as I know it to be false, it would be enough for ever to condemn the protective principle in the eyes of honest men, that wherever you have protection you have corruption, and corruption in the highest degree. Protection and corruption are political Siamese twins. They never have been separated in this world, and I do not think they will be in the next. Now, I have another thing to say to the hon. gentleman. There are certain documents which we ought to have had before being called upon to discuss this tariff. Do not we know, has not the hon. gentleman made a merit of it, that two distinguished members,—I was going to say of the Ministry, but if they are not in the Ministry very near it—were despatched, regardless of expense, all through the Dominion, for the purpose of obtaining information as to these changes. Now those gentlemen did not pay their own expenses, but their expenses were paid by the country, and we ought to have their reports. The reports of the Controllers of Customs and Inland Revenue we ought to have in our hands. Are all those volumes of wisdom which were delivered by these gentlemen to the farmers to be denied us? Who knows that if we had a full report of the speeches delivered by them, we might not be converted to a somewhat better appreciation than we now possess of the beauties of protection. Then we ought to have that table of rates in the hands of the hon. gentleman, showing the practical discrimination against British goods under the tariff. The hon. gentleman cannot deny that such a thing exists. He wanted to keep it for his own private use, but some of us were favoured with a copy—not with his consent, I confess.

Mr. FOSTER. Tell us how you got it.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am not bound to tell you. The thing exists and you cannot deny it.

Mr. LAURIER. We got it by mail.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It came by Her Majesty's Postmaster General—ask him. Now there is another point on which I have a word to say. The hon. gentleman made a considerable deal of the increase of trade. That is a good and a wholesome sign. I join with him in congratulations on the increase of trade. It is one of the most cheering symptoms that has occurred for some time. Let us understand what it means. He would give us to understand that this increase of $6,000,000 in the total volume of trade—this increase from $241,000,000 to $247,000,000, is an extraordinary and unprecedented thing. Why, Sir, I look back to the year 1893, and what do I find? I find that we had then a total volume of trade of $217,000,000. Does the hon. gentleman know what that means? Let me tell him, Sir. It means that, in 1873, twenty years ago, with a population of three and three-quarter millions, all told, we had a total trade of something like $57 or $58 per head, and to-day, with a population of five millions, we have a total trade of not quite $50 per head. This means that we are fifty millions of dollars short, relatively, of the standard we had attained in 1873. Well, Sir, I am glad to see that we are going up the hill; but, on my word, I do not see that an increase in twenty years of about thirty-three millions of dollars, giving an average total trade of $50 per family less than the figure we had attained in 1873, should quite reconcile us to all the other facts that I have alluded to. I notice, Sir, by the by, that in this volume of trade returns there are one or two curious items. We have, it is true, a total volume of trade of six millions more in 1893 than we had in 1892. But part of that is made up in this way: In 1892 we exported $1,800,000 of bullion, and in 1893 we exported $4,000,000 worth of bullion. Now, Sir, is that a very desirable or a very valuable addition to our exports? The Finance Minister can say, or some of his fellows may have the goodness to tell us. Further, I think that before the hon. gentleman asks this House to come to a decision upon his proposals, he ought to have stated fairly and candidly to this House, and fairly and candidly to his own colleague, the Minister of Marine, what, at long last, he is going to do about the French treaty. This treaty affects our revenue, and we ought to know what the hon. gentleman proposes to do with regard to it. The hon. gentleman has admitted that the public honour is in no respect pledged for the ratification of this French treaty. The hon. gentleman made that clear, perfectly clear, the other day, when he stated that the Government had not made up their minds as to what they would do with regard to this treaty, because they had to wait to hear what one or two deputations of temperance men and vine-growers would have to say about it. That cuts from under the feet of the hon. gentleman, and from under the feet of the Government of which he is a member, the opportunity to pretend that the honour of Canada is in any way concerned or affected in implementing this treaty. That being so, it was his bounden duty, on coming down to this House with his Budget, to tell us what they proposed to do with this same French treaty. The hon. gentleman ought to take the earliest opportunity to do it now. The Government has been interviewed by the temperance representatives and has heard what these gentlemen have to say. Surely there has been time enough for the Government to make up their mind with regard to this matter. The House knows, Sir, that this Government is a 20-knot Government; the Finance Minister told us that some time ago. And, being a 20-knot Government, of course it is bound to have a 20-knot Atlantic service. The fast service is going to cost us at least $750,000 a year, which, capitalized, is equal to twenty millions of dollars. Not one word of notice do I find in the Estimates, not one syllable did I hear in the Budget speech yesterday as to whether that alarming item of $750,000 was or was not to figure as an increase of our expenditure. Surely it cannot have slipped the mind of the hon. gentleman along with the fish products. Will not the hon. gentleman tell us whether we are to have that $750,000 added to the expected deficit of $1,500,000 which he told us would result from loss of revenue caused by his tariff changes? Will not the hon. gentleman relieve my anxiety on this point now?

Mr. FOSTER. Not just now—sorry.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think this is very hard and very unreasonable.

Mr. FOSTER. You have all you can do now.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. gentleman ought to know, and he ought to be able to tell us. He ought not to make a Budget statement involving large reductions of duty without informing us not only of the general expenditure in the main estimates, but also if there are to be any important supplementary charges. The hon. gentleman ought to have given us this information, and, if his supporters know their duty, they will insist upon having it brought down before this debate is over. Well, Sir, there was another subject we ought to have known something about, but upon which the same policy of ostrich-like concealment has been followed. We ought to know what hon. gentlemen opposite intend to do about their Prohibition Commission. We ought to know if our excise revenue is in danger through a measure of a prohibitory character; we ought to know if they intend to take steps to obtain a plebiscitum, and, if so, whether they will implement the decision of that plebiscitum after it has been taken. Sir, this is a very interesting question, and a very important question, a question which may affect, or which ought to affect, very materially, the decision of the House with regard to the several propositions submitted to us. Sir, looking over the financial statements that the hon. gentleman has submitted to us, it does appear to me that there is need for very considerable caution. There can be no doubt whatever, let the hon. gentleman say or think what he pleases, that the real taxation to which the people of this country are subjected to is enormous. Then there is a point to which, for twenty years, I have never failed to call to the attention of the House—that the fixed charges upon our revenue are a very large proportion of that revenue. This is a very serious consideration when we are talking about the probable results of the tariff changes. It is very easy for members of the House to talk of an income and expenditure of thirty-seven or thirty-eight millions, but to overlook the fact that a large proportion of that expenditure is beyond control. The part of our expenditure that we can control is very small; the amount of saving that can be made is relatively very limited. Therefore, the loss of a million and a half of revenue is much more serious than it might appear at first sight. Then there is another consideration to which many members of this House, on both sides, have called attention, and that is, that the debt of Canada—and by that I mean not merely the public debt of the Dominion, but also the provincial debt, the municipal debt, the railway debt and the private debt—is exceedingly large. We owe a huge amount of money, and we do not owe it to our own people. The amount of money owed by the people of Canada abroad has been estimated at as high as eight or nine hundred millions, including the amount due for railway construction. I am not prepared to say at this moment whether this is nearly correct or not, but there is not the faintest doubt of this, that the total amount is immense, and that Canada has become in the strictest sense of the word a tribute-paying country—chiefly, it is true, to the mother country—and that an enormous amount of gold, or the equivalent of gold, must be sent out day by day or year by year to pay the interest on our debt. Now, Sir, when the hon. gentleman talked of a very great increase in our exports, he will do well to bear in mind, that, so long as we are not borrowing, and, so long as corporations doing business in Canada are not borrowing, a very considerable amount of these exports goes really for no other purpose than to pay the interest on Canadian debt. That is a serious consideration in looking to our future. Sir, all these features are in themselves bad features. The plain truth of the matter is this, that (pardonably perhaps) a few years ago, when we were not aware at the rate at which our population would increase, our clothes were cut considerably too large for us. We have a suit which is more fitted for a population of fifteen or twenty millions than for a population of five million. What on earth do we want with fifteen or sixteen Cabinet Ministers? Sir, it would be high treason to say it, or I would ask what do we want with a couple of Speakers? There is no doubt whatever that the general cost of our departments is far too extravagant. Now, I want to say to the Finance Minister—because it has been my disagreeable duty, as I dare say it has been his duty, to cut down the estimates of my colleagues ruthlessly—I would just call attention to this fact, that we had substantially the same work to do that he has, the real difference is very small. Civil government, which is more particularly under the control of the Government of the day, in Mr. Mackenzie's time, cost altogether about $823,000. The hon. gentleman to-day asks for $1,475,000 for doing the same work, and not doing it as well. Sir, the conclusion that I draw from these statements of the hon. gentleman is this: the hon. gentleman and his followers, by his acts and their acts, by his extravagance and their extravagance—or, perhaps, I might say more correctly, by failing to curb their extravagance—has enormously and unjustifiably increased the annual expenditure of this country. I give him no credit for saying that he has succeeded in stopping the expenditure at thirty-six or thirty-seven millions a year. Sir, Canada has no business, and never had, to spend thirty-six or thirty-seven millions a year. It is a monstrous thing, properly understood, and wholly apart from the amount of real taxation paid by us that an expenditure of thirty-six or thirty-seven millions should be saddled on five millions of people in the position of the people of Canada. The hon. gentleman would do well to look at the annals of the United States, and he will find that when they were a people of twenty millions, a people obliged to maintain an army and a navy, a people obliged to maintain a foreign consular service, a people, in one word, obliged to maintain all the things which are requisite to the existence of an important nation, they were able to get along with twenty-two millions annually, as against the thirty-seven millions required by the people of Canada, though but five millions strong, and if the hon. gentleman pleads, as I have heard him plead, that a good deal of that money goes in subsidies to the provinces, I can remind him that there is a great deal of the United States expenditure for which we have no equivalent, or anything corresponding thereto. Sir, I think that calm reflection on the part of our people will endorse the statement that Canada to-day, above all things and before all things, must be made, if it is going to prosper, a cheap country to live in and a cheap country to produce in. More than that, Canada, above all and before all things, must have access to larger markets, and notably to the most important of all markets, the market which lies to the south of us. Sir, if the hon. gentleman's follies have hitherto temporarily blocked that opportunity, if they have deprived us of the chance which existed half a dozen years ago of obtaining access on reasonable and honourable terms to the United States market, all the more need to-day for low taxation, and all the more need to-day for saving every penny we can, because, with that market excluded, Canada must compete for her living with the whole world. She will get no favour in the English markets. She will not be able to induce the English buyer to take a pound of Canadian beef, or a pound of Canadian cheese, or a pound of Canadian butter, or a pound of Canadian products of any sort or description, unless Canada can undersell all producers in the English market, which is open to the whole world on equal terms. Sir, for myself, and I speak for myself more particularly, I here reaffirm—let the hon. gentleman understand it—all that I have said in my place in this House, and out of it, as to the enormous importance to Canada of obtaining access to the market to the south of us. I tell this House, and I will tell the people of Canada anywhere and everywhere, that while I think Canada can maintain herself, perhaps, with good government and a wise fiscal system, in reasonable comfort, independent of the United States, yet that great prosperity and anything like a full development of our resources can only come to us, and will only come to us, when we obtain, on fair and honourable terms, free access to the markets of North America. There are other considerations on which I will not dwell now, considerations of the very highest value not merely to Canada, but to the British Empire at large, which have always made me, and will always make me, a determined advocate of close and friendly relations with the United States. Hon. gentlemen may say what they please, they may do what they please, yet with all that we can do with our tariff, the full development of Canada must and will depend on our success in obtaining access, as I said before, above all things and before all things, to the markets of the great country, our great neighbour to the south of us. Now, Sir, looking at the conduct of hon. gentlemen in the past, looking to what we know of their position, of their relation to various interests throughout the country, if there was ground for supposing that the hon. gentlemen were really, in the proper sense of the term, free agents, that they were really the authors of this policy, I do not know but that it would be well worth while, on the present occasion, I do not know but it is worth while on the present occasion, for some of my hon. friends—for my time will not permit me to do it—to review the former utterances of those hon. gentlemen and their predecessors. Certainly the contrast would be very remarkable between, not so much the words, as the acts of the hon. gentleman last night, and the acts of the hon. gentleman a few years ago. Sir, knowing the relations that these hon. gentlemen occupy to certain interests in the country, I do not know, after all said and done, that it would be very desirable for me to occupy much of the time of the House in contrasting the contradictions and inconsistencies which mark the career of that hon. gentleman and his friends. Sir, "cui bono"? The real question is, not how do the hon. gentleman's speeches agree with one another, but really and truly, does the hon. gentleman offer on the present occasion, or perhaps I should say more correctly, do the protected manufacturers, through their parliamentary mouthpiece, offer us anything that is worth considering? We will waive discussion on the abstract right of protection, and we will see what their offer amounts to, for after all, that is the most important question the House has to consider. I listened attentively to the hon. gentleman last night, and although I do not pretend to say that I could analyse at this short notice the results of all the alterations proposed to be made in the tariff, there is no doubt that the hon. gentleman has disturbed and revised the tariff to a very great extent, but it does not follow—and it is well the House should bear that in mind—that while he has disturbed the tariff in a vast number of articles he has therefore any material reduction in his tariff. I doubt very much whether the concessions, so-called, that the hon. gentleman makes in cottons, or in woollens, or in iron, are going to be of great benefit to the consumers at large. We will be able to judge of that very much better when we hear what he has to say under the cross-examination to which all these items will be subjected in committee. But, taking it on the whole, it appears to me that the hon. gentleman has gone on this principle, and to a certain extent he is perfectly consistent in going on this principle—he has selected certain large and important industries, owned and engineered by wealthy firms, and wealthy individuals, and the kind of persons, in short, whom it is convenient to approach about election time. Those have substantially escaped, but the minor thieves are to be slaughtered, to some extent—manufacturers of binder twine, for instance. The hon. gentlemen, as I have remarked, are thoroughly consistent. All through they have been quite willing to sacrifice half a dozen little clerks, who might have been convicted of nefarious practices, but the hon. gentlemen have always been careful to draw the line at officials who knew too much. Sir, there is a certain height of virtue which has been attained by the Minister of Justice, as well as by the Minister of Finance. The Minister of Justice was perfectly willing to sacrifice John Charles Rykert on the eve of a general election; the Minister was perfectly willing to sacrifice an unpopular colleague, whose presence might have stood in his way; but the hon. gentleman is very cautious about giving up any protected industry which can be milked to some purpose for the corruption fund. I recollect a suggestion I once made to the hon. gentlemen with respect to their subsidized press. I suggested to the Minister of Justice, I think, that it was expedient and desirable in the case of the subsidized press, that just as you put the words "limited liability" after a firm which has ceased to be individually responsible, you should put after the title of every one of those newspapers who received subsidies from the Government, the amount which they received during the last year, in sufficiently large characters, and this should be printed in the organ immediately under the head line. I suggest that if we are to have an intelligent discussion of these revisions in the tariff, if we are to understand exactly where we are and the principle on which the Government have proceeded with respect to all those important industries, in regard to which, as I have said, I can see very little reduction is to be made, there should be brought down to us first an estimate of the sum for which the people are taxed over and above that which goes into the Treasury, and next, a short statement of the amount which these individuals have subscribed to election funds during the last few years. Were the Government really sincere in their wish to reform the tariff, the speech would have been a rather curious commentary on the inherent difficulties which arise when once a Finance Minister goes thoroughly wrong and adopts a thoroughly bad system. One of the worst effects, indeed the worst effect of the protection system, is that it creates difficulties in the way of its own reform. Vested interests spring up. I do not mean to say (although I am not going to sanction the principle, that a vested wrong by long continuance becomes a vested right), that some reasonable discretion and latitude might not be allowed in dealing with a vested interest of long standing; but, as the hon. gentleman is beginning to understand, and if I know anything of Canadian manufactures, as he will understand very much better between now and two weeks later, the longer it lasts the more difficulty such a tariff creates and the more mischievously it operates. There is a very good illustration of this in the case of the country to which the hon. gentleman is constantly looking. We see in the United States, where the public mind has been expressed, in a way in which never in the memory of living man it was so strongly expressed before, where it is manifest that the people desire a revenue tariff, that they desire to do away with protection, that they want, if not free trade, as near free trade as possible, how thirty such years of protection have produced ramifications and such entrenchment of different interests, and how by availing themselves deftly of those peculiar forms of the United States constitution, which however valuable they may be for certain purposes, are in my opinion far less efficacious than our own in matters of this sort, there is great danger that the expressed will of the people may be frustrated by a few score of plutocrats and millionaires. Something of the same kind may occur here, possibly something of the same kind has occurred here; but there is no doubt whatever that this goes to show how thoroughly rotten, how thoroughly mischievous, how thoroughly corrupt such systems tend to become, not, perhaps, so much by reason of the inherent depravity of the men who follow them as by reason of the inherent and natural results of a system which makes it the interest of a number of wealthy men to combine together for the purpose, rightly or wrongly, of maintaining in power a Government pledged to share with them the plunder obtained from the people. The whole conduct of the hon. gentlemen shows this fact at all events: they did not crave publicity. The First Minister and Minister of Finance have both taken this ground with respect to the investigation recently conducted by the Finance Minister: that they were not justified in calling upon the men they examined to give details of their business, or if they had the right, that these details must be given in camera and not in public. I take issue fairly and squarely with the hon. gentlemen on that point. Who were those men who were interviewing the hon. gentlemen? They were men who came to him claiming that they could not by their own legitimate exertions and industry, by the use of their brains and capital, make an honest living. They required to be protected; they required that special privileges should be given to them that were not given to their fellow-subjects. They demanded that the rest of the people should be taxed for their benefit. In all such cases the onus lies on every man who asks protection to make good his case, to explain not to the Finance Minister, not to the hon. gentleman in a closed chamber, but to explain fully and plainly and in good time, so that their statements may be tested and examined, and full inquiry made as to their allegations in order to obtain the real truth as to the facts, why and wherefore they claim the right to tax the people of Canada. It is possible that under some very extraorinary circumstances (such as I have never known, and cannot imagine) a good case might be made out—I am willing to suppose the possibility—but be that possible or not the Finance Minister had no right, and the Government had no right to conduct those investigations in the close and secret manner they did. They should have been conducted as publicly as they were when the Controller of Inland Revenue and the Controller of Customs were conducting their investigations. When the case of the farmers was up we had the fullest publicity, aye, we had the hon. gentlemen acting as—what shall I call them?—devil's advocates in order to convince the unfortunate farmers that they were not being pillaged by the trusts and combines; but when the Finance Minister was conducting his investigation with men who have an enormous interest, as every one knows, in maintaining the duties, then everything was done in secrecy, then everything was done privately, the press and the public being excluded. We were left utterly in the dark as to facts that we should know as well as the Finance Minister himself, as to the profits derived by these men, the number of hands they employ, and the whole details of their business, which I maintain, and I always will maintain, must be made public in the case of protected manufacturers if they are to make out, even in the remotest degree, a case of right to tax the public at large. We have had, almost as a necessity, the result of which I have spoken. We have a tariff embodying no principle; we have a tariff, which I have declared, and I think rightly, to be merely a makeshift tariff. There, and there alone, perhaps, hon. gentlemen have been consistent. There is protection in every line of the tariff. We have at last here got the classes and the masses face to face. The question of freedom and slavery is brought up for our decision. The question which the hon. gentleman submits to us is this: Shall this Government, shall the fiscal system of Canada be so administered as to enrich a few hundred wealthy men and millionaires, or shall it be administered for the benefit of the millions of wage-earners and toilers from one end of the country to the other? Sir, the Government—although possibly the partnership may be in danger of dissolution—at all events up to the present time, have been nothing more nor less than sleeping partners with the Red Parlour. To it they have looked for the means of conducting election campaigns. We do not forget that the founder and originator of the policy told the gentlemen of the Red Parlour that the hogs for whom he shook down the acorns must make a fair division. After all, it is really a return to first principles. Everybody knows that in the last resort the government of a country depends on the good-will of those who furnish the supplies, and it is pretty clear that whatever we may do here in this chamber, the real supplies, which go to grease the inner machinery of the government—that extraordinary and intricate machinery of which we got a little glimpse in the case of my hon. friend the Postmaster General—we know perfectly where the oil and the grease to make that machinery work harmoniously comes from, and whence it must be supplied. I did notice, in one respect, an improvement in the hon. gentleman's tone and in the tone of the First Minister. They, having, perhaps, learned their lesson, rather to the cost of the people of this country, are not quite so prone on the present occasion as they have been in the past, to endeavour to stir up ill-blood between ourselves and the people of the United States. Maybe they feel that, under the circumstances, that would be a very impolitic thing to do. Therefore, they have not on the present occasion, as they have very often done before, indulged in much rhetoric about the disadvantage and about the impropriety of looking to see what our American neighbours were doing before we decided on any matters of importance affecting our finances. But, notwithstanding, the hon. gentleman could not possibly abstain from one old fallacy, which I noted at the time he spoke. I observe that the hon. gentleman took occasion to quote the case of the United States, by way of proving to us, as he alleged, that our tariff was enormously lower than the tariff in the United States. Now, had the hon. gentleman examined that question with any care, he would have known this—no intelligent protectionist would ever deny it—that the larger the area over which a protective system spreads, the less consequence it is how high the duties you may impose. It is a very serious thing in a small country to impose a protective tariff, even apparently of moderate dimensions. It exposes you to many evils which do not exist in a larger country. There are circumstances in Canada which must be well known to the hon. gentleman—which ought to be well known to him, at any rate—which make Canada, of all countries I have read or known of, perhaps the very worst suited to the application of the protective principle; as there are likewise circumstances in the condition and position of the United States which minimize to an enormous extent the mischief which even there arises from the application of protection. The knowledge of that fact ought to have convinced and ought to have shown the hon. gentleman, the utter fallacy of his contention, that because, peradventure, the United States tariff was higher on some few articles than it was with ourselves, that, therefore, we were infinitely better off in that regard than the United States. I tell the hon. gentleman that it is possible for the United States to have an almost absolutely prohibitive tariff, and it would not do them anything like the amount of mischief that a very moderate protective tariff would do in Canada. The reason is obvious. The United States are a great country; they are rather a group of thirty nations than a single nation; they extend from the tropics to the Arctic zone; they extend from one ocean to the other, and so do we, but under circumstances of very much more disadvantage. Our country consists of three or four isolated groups of provinces, separated from each other by tracts of wilderness which can only be traversed at very great cost and very great expense. The portions of our country are separated from each other, and, what is more, they have not any very great facility for mutual interchange. We are rather competitors, as I have often said, than customers of each other, and there is no portion of the Canadian group which has not a better market to the south of it—I am sorry to have to say it—than it has with the country which lies east or west. Under these circumstances, to impose protection on a country so-circumstanced, is, and has always appeared to me to be, the very height of folly; and it is a still greater folly to argue from the example of the United States or from the rate of their tariff, that because they have, for reasons of their own, reasons of a very peculiar character, reasons which were dependent on the result of the civil war—because they were persuaded or misled into adopting a protective tariff, that therefore we could do it without suffering more in proportion than they. Sir, there is another consideration. We on this side of the House have time and again called attention to a thing which every statesman ought to consider, and that is: The extreme burthens which are imposed by our tariff on the poorer classes of the population. The hon. gentleman may tell me that that is almost inevitable in any tariff or any system of taxation which depends solely on indirect sources of supply. There may be an element of truth in all that; but, Sir, our tariff is, and has been so arranged that it inflicted very special injury on our farmers, and our fishermen, and our miners, and on our lumbering interest; in one word, on all our great producing classes. I am glad to see that, in obedience to suggestions from this side of the House, in obedience to remonstrances which have been constantly made by us, that evil has been remedied in this tariff to some moderate extent. But a very great deal still remains to be done. A great many of these burthens have been only touched, not substantially lightened, and it will be the interest, and it will be the duty of the Government, if they do their duty, to see that that relief is made effectual and not as it is at present, a mere skin-deep relief, a mere 2½ per cent or a mere 5 per cent, when double or treble that is required to render any real and substantial relief to the people who are suffering from it. The indirect effects of this, as everybody knows, have been very serious to us. The indirect efforts of laying these heavy burdens on the poorer classes of our population have contributed to a very large degree indeed to the great loss of people which we deplore, and also they impose a very severe check on the successful colonization of the North-west. Now, Canada, in its collective capacity, has sunk something like $100,000,000 or more—a great deal more, if you include the interest we have had to pay—in endeavouring to develop the North-west. It is a mere truism to say that the results which we have as yet obtained have been wholly and miserably uncommensurate with the expenditure that has taken place. I had hoped to find, and I have no doubt that my hon. friends from that section of the country had hoped to find, some more substantial recognition of the needs and interests of the people of Manitoba and the North-west than the hon. the Finance Minister is disposed to give them. The hon. gentleman spent a considerable time there, so he tells us. The hon. gentleman was at pains, he says, to make himself acquainted with the needs of these people. The hon. gentleman did, if I am not mistaken, hold out rather large though indefinite promises of relief, yet I fail to see, except in one or two comparatively insignificant particulars, where that relief will come in under his present tariff. Sir, that is a question on which I should like also to hear more from the hon. gentleman or his colleagues before this debate closes. In my judgment, and I shall give reasons for it before I sit down, the position of the North-west to-day is very serious. I do not know that the hon. gentleman has fully appreciated the enormous extent to which the successful raising of many products of that country is threatened by recent discoveries and by recent developments which have taken place in various parts of the world. But, if it has not attracted the attention of the hon. gentleman, I can tell him that I am informed, on very high financial authority from the English Stock Exchange, that it is now expected—and I think he will see for himself, without further comment, the enormous importance of the statement—that it is now expected that the Argentine Republic alone will be able to supply to the English market, in the course of next year, from eighty to one hundred million bushels of wheat of a very superior quality, which can be laid down in London at a rate little if at all in excess of 60 cents per bushel. That is a matter which the hon. gentleman ought to be made acquainted with, which he ought to take into account in framing his tariff; because it is perfectly obvious that, if that statement is even approximately correct, I regret to say, the further development of wheat raising in the North-west, for some considerable time to come, must be regarded as very problematical, and that, perforce, the advice given by his distinguished agricultural colleague to quit wheat raising and go into mixed farming, will become an absolute necessity on the part of the people of that country.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

After Recess.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I much regret that it was not in my power to bring my remarks to a close before six o'clock, and I shall endeavour not to trespass on the patience of the House any longer than is absolutely necessary. At the same time, there were one or two points alluded to by the hon. Finance Minister which cannot be passed over entirely in silence. The hon. gentleman, among other things, endeavoured, consciously or unconsciously, to give the stamp of his authority to a very absurd fallacy as to the number of persons who are really interested in these same protective duties. Now, Sir, this is a triple fallacy. In the first place, there is not one shadow of justification for alleging that the 367,000 persons, be the same more or less, who are down as engaged in manufacturing industries, are, in any shape, form or way, benefited by the imposition of high taxes; in the next place, the hon. gentleman, as I pointed out before, entirely ignored the fact—a fact which ought to be perfectly well known to him and others—that an immense number of those industries which were supposed to owe their existence to the protective policy, had been in existence and were flourishing industries under the revenue tariff which prevailed up to 1878; and in the third place, the hon. gentleman ignores the equally well-known fact—known to every man who has examined carefully the industries which now exist in our various towns and villages, more particularly in Ontario—that a great number of the industries which were doing well and flourishing under a revenue tariff, have wholly and entirely disappeared under the protective tariff. Taking these three things together, I allege that it is a most gross mistake to assert or insinuate that these 367,000 persons who are stated to be engaged in manufactures, are as a whole at all dependent upon the existence of a high tariff. In the volume of the census, which has been lately published—and as to which, by the way, I may observe that it appears to me to be very inartistically arranged—I do not know what particular Minister is specially responsible for it—I find a list of the persons engaged in the manufacturing industries. Now, if the House remembers, I put a question, before I commenced my speech, which will illustrate that statement. I called attention to the fact that, superficially and apparently, the sugar makers, the sugar refiners in Canada were barely 171. Of course, I was aware there was some mistake there. The Minister of Finance alleged, though he did not give details, that something like 1,900 persons were so employed. What he meant by that I do not know. He may have included all the persons concerned in mining coal for supplying the sugar industry. He may have included all the coopers and the vast variety of other men indirectly employed. These returns give very little opportunity of ascertaining what the actual facts are, and in that respect are exceedingly defective, not to say misleading. However, such as they are, we must take them, making the allowances I have mentioned. Now, I have gone pretty carefully over the various occupations which come under the head of manufactures. I find, on a tolerably careful examination, that the total number of persons who can, even superficially, be supposed to be benefited by this protective tariff, is really very small. The numbers are as follows:—

|---|-------|
| Cotton operatives | 6,053 |
| Glass operators | 5,081 |
| Hosiery operatives | 946 |
| Mill and factory operatives, put under the head of textile not otherwise stated | 3,876 |
| Linen mill operatives | 522 |
| Manufacturers and officials | 6,169 |

A rather peculiar heading.—

|---------------------------|-----|
| Oil well operatives | 177 |
| Oil works do | 167 |

There, also, I suspect, the number is considerably understated.—

|---------------------------------------|--------|
| Rope and cordage operatives | 412 |
| Silk mill operatives | 121 |
| Sugar refiners' operatives | 171 |
| Parasol and umbrella operatives | 31 |
| Woollen mill operatives | 4,241 |
| Total | 23,667 |

But the result is this, that superficially stated, and with the light afforded of these census returns, apparently out of these 367,000 about 23,667 would represent the number which could fairly be said in any way to owe their existence or continuance in operation to the protective tariff. A vast number of these, I may add, are women and children—not men at all—and are hardly entitled to be reckoned as full hands, it being perfectly well known that, in the case of children particularly, the amount of wages received, the number of hours employed, and all the rest of it render them a comparatively insignificant fraction as regards their power of adding materially to the number of the population supported by these industries. But when we turn to the other side, when we examine who compose the great bulk of these 367,000 people, we find that they are composed, for the most part, of trades which I verily believe are not only in no degree assisted or benefited by a protective tariff, but are materially injured, inasmuch as the great proportion of them depend for their prosperity and maintenance on the prosperity of the farmers and other producers who are most decidedly injured by the protective tariff—and that injury extends itself to all those who depend on the agricultural class. I find items like this:

|---------------------------|--------|
| Bakers | 5,116 |
| Blacksmiths | 19,957 |
| Boot and shoemakers | 15,816 |
| Brick makers | 3,138 |

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

| | |
|--|---------|
| Butchers | 7,288 |
| Carpenters and joiners | 45,229 |
| Butter and cheese makers | 1,801 |
| Carriage-makers | 6,822 |
| Compositors and pressmen | 6,095 |
| Coopers | 3,420 |
| Dress-makers | 22,217 |
| Harness-makers | 3,647 |
| Tanners | 3,593 |
| Marble and stone cutters | 3,585 |
| Masons | 10,205 |
| Millers | 4,384 |
| Milliners | 3,456 |
| Painters and glaziers | 10,017 |
| Plasterers | 2,458 |
| Plumbers | 3,249 |
| Saw-mill operators | 13,338 |
| Lumbermen | 12,319 |
| Ship and boat builders | 4,435 |
| Tailors and tailoresses | 14,517 |
| Tinsmiths | 4,740 |
| Woodworkers and innumerable others | 2,178 |
| Seamstresses | 10,239 |
| | 241,219 |

And innumerable others, whom I have not taken into account. But the ones I have taken into account muster 241,000 out of the 367,000, most of them being heads of families. Now, the vast majority of those people are not benefited, but injured, because the customers with whom they deal are injured, because the men on whom they depend are injured, because the great trades of which they are offshoots are injured by this excessive protection and enormous taxation, so that the pretension which, if true, would undoubtedly entitle the plea of hon. gentlemen opposite to a more respectful consideration—the plea that 367,000 of our people are in any way aided by the protective tariff—fails utterly, and it would be infinitely nearer the truth to say that scarcely one-twentieth part of that number do or have derived any benefit from your national protective policy, and that even of that one-twentieth, a very large percentage would—judging by the results which occurred between 1870 and 1878, and the results which occurred previously—have been carrying on a much sounder and more prosperous business, would earn higher wages and get more value for their wages today if you had no protective tariff. Now, the truth is this. Our policy and that of the United States have, to an enormous degree, isolated Canada entirely. Under those circumstances, and more particularly until you get access to the United States market, your only safeguard is to enable your people to produce cheaply, because the prices of the products on which your people mainly depend are not regulated by your home market at all, but by the competition of the whole world. Those who have to face the competition of the whole world must have the right, if they are to prosper, to purchase as cheaply as they can. In order that they may purchase as cheaply as they can, and enjoy the prosperity they ought to enjoy, you must have low taxation. You must have at any rate as low taxation as the public honour and credit will permit You must put no taxes on them that are not imperatively required to enable you to discharge your obligations. Not one cent should go on except for that purpose. More than that, these men must have the liberty, not merely to sell where they can at the best advantage, but to buy where they can at the most advantage. Otherwise we will fail of necessity in the competition forced upon us against the whole world in the open market, where no favour is shown to us. Now, what is the actual fact? It is that whether it be under the late or the present tariff, each petty manufacturer forsooth is able to dictate to his countrymen where and from whom they shall buy, and if the people do not choose to deal with him he is able to subject them to a very heavy fine. Take cotton manufacturers. Even under the tariff now introduced they can say: Deal with us or pay a fine of $30 or $35 into the Treasury for every hundred dollars worth of goods you buy. That is a literal and simple statement of the case, and they will exact every penny out of you, save only that miserable remnant which enables him to undersell the foreign competitor. In other cases it is even worse. We talk of usury; we talk of the iniquity of exacting a higher percentage than a fixed rate. A good many worthy people demand that the rate of interest be fixed by law at a very low rate. They talk even of requiring that the Government should lend money at 3 or 4 per cent. But where is the usury now existing that can compare with the fine of $35 on every hundred dollars' worth of goods you require to buy? Meantime, Sir, we have the census returns in our hands. Those returns ought to convince, I believe really they have convinced, all the more intelligent among the supporters of the Government, that something must be done to stop this fatal atrophy which is spreading over large sections of what ought to be the most prosperous portions of our Dominion. Sir, is it to be tolerated that to-day we should be taxed to death and that a fertile island such as that which my hon. friend here (Mr. Davies, P.E.I.) represents should barely add 190 souls to its population in ten years? Is it to be tolerated that, as I have said, all over the Maritime Provinces the total increase of population should be barely 1 per cent in ten years? That the province of New Brunswick should add barely 61 souls of its population in ten years? Is it to be tolerated, nay, is it not to the proper shame and scandal of the people and Government of Canada, that, in this country, with room for a hundred millions more than are here to-day, the increase in Canada should fall far below the increase in some of the longest settled and most densely populated countries in the known world? Sir, some time ago, I think it was in reply to the First Minister, I called attention to a most significant fact. I have not my notes by me and must trust to my memory. But that fact is this. Sir, every one here knows to what a frightful extent the Southern States of the American Union were ravaged and desolated by the terrible civil war which prevailed from the year 1861 to the year 1865. Some time ago I made a careful examination of the state of things in seven or eight of those States which had suffered most. I found, Sir, that they had a population of something like eleven millions at the commencement of the period of the Civil War in 1860. In the ten years between 1860 and 1870, although these unfortunate States had been ravaged with fire and sword, although after the Civil War had ended they had been subjected to one of the most brutal and oppressive black governments ever inflicted upon an unfortunate people—the period known as the carpet-bagger regime, and detested to this day by every true Southerner—although they were subjected to almost every affliction that could befall a conquered people, yet (and this is worthy of the most especial notice of the people of Canada) in these ten years, these seven or eight States had gained 14 per cent in population. Yet, Sir, in the ten years from 1881 to 1891 the whole of Old Canada—Quebec, Ontario and the Maritime Provinces—scarcely gained 8 per cent. Sir, I might go on for hours, and yet I could give no better proof of the intolerable evil and the intolerable mischief this same protective system has worked upon our people. Now, what are the remedies offered by the Government? We have the right to demand of these people who initiated this policy, and who have had for fifteen years almost supreme and unchecked power in Canada, what are the remedies they propose for this state of things. The remedies they propose are about as effective as a penny squirt for a house on fire. Sir, Canada has only two markets of any value. Other markets may be developed in the future. I do not know what can be done with our brethren at the Antipodes; perhaps the Minister of Trade and Commerce will make an announcement with regard to that in due time. But at the present time, Canada has only two markets that are of any value; the rest are mere side shows at best. The Government, largely by their foolish conduct, has barred us out of one; at any rate it has done nothing, and is doing nothing to secure us access to the American market. I think a change is coming over the spirit of their dream, a change I am very glad to see. Till very recently, one of the main objects of themselves and their subsidized press was, at all times and at all seasons, to depreciate and minimize the value of the American market. Sir, I do not say that the Ministers themselves have exulted in the misfortunes which overtook a portion of the United States of late, but I do say, and I am in the judgment of both sides of this House, if I do not speak the truth, when I say it, that it was notorious in all parts of Canada that a great many of the organs of the Government, a great many of their subsidized organs were constantly on the look-out to bring forward everything detrimental and injurious to our best customer, the people of the United States, and to exult over it. Now, Sir, I say that was most superlative folly. I say, and I have pointed out before, that Canada is, above all things and before all things, a part of North America, and that what injures the United States will most assuredly injure us. There is at best but a short delay before the reflex action of misfortunes in the United States is felt here. More; I can tell the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster), whom I do not see in his place, and I can tell the hon. gentleman's colleagues, that if they think that Canada escapes scot free from the results of the commercial cyclone or tornado which swept over the United States, they are most enormously mistaken. It is within my knowledge, and if the hon. gentleman doubts, let him go to Montreal, or let him go to Toronto, and consult any broker in large business or any banker in large business, and he will be told that among the fruits of the disasters that overtook the Americans was this—that a great number of millions of Canadian capital have perished altogether. Sir, I repeat, and it is a thing to be repeated, it is a thing to be dwelt upon, it is a thing to be thoroughly understood by those who desire to see a stable prosperity in Canada, that, while I admit, and while I myself have always contended, that it is quite possible for us, by wise and good government, by reducing our taxation, by introducing a sound fiscal system and by developing our resources, to attain a moderate prosperity; yet no great prosperity can be attained by the people of Canada, notably, I believe, none can be attained by the people of the Maritime Provinces, or by the people of the great provinces of the North-west, unless and until we establish friendly, amicable relations with the United States and obtain access to their markets—a thing which, moreover, I have always contended and believed, is of the greatest possible importance to the ultimate welfare and prosperity, not merely of ourselves, but of the British Empire as well. These gentlemen frequently say: This may be very well, but we cannot get access to the markets of the United States. When did they ever honestly try to get access to that market? Sir, if that market is barred to us, it is by reason of their own deliberate misconduct during the last eight or ten years. I say that up to this present moment they have never made one honest effort to gain access to that market, and their record testifies against them at all points and testifies to the truth of my assertion. But, Sir, I will take the Government on their own ground. Let us admit what they say—that they cannot get access to the American market. They allege to us the superior value of the British market.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

Now, I freely admit that, for certain articles, the British market is an excellent market, that, for certain articles, it is perhaps our best market, that it is a market to be cultivated and exploited and made the most of—all the more so because it is perfectly free to us. But it is a delusion to say that for an enormous number of articles of great value to us, the British market is the best market. For a great many things that Canada produces and for producing which she has special facilities, the British market, at the best, is a second-rate and second-best market; and the only true and really valuable market is the market which extends for 3,000 miles along our southern border. You must remember that when you talk of the British market you talk of a market in which no special privilege is or can be given to us. I do not want, in the presence of the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) to speak too slightly of the aspirations which at one time I partly shared myself, relative to the somewhat glittering generality of Imperial Federation. But after all said and done, you are not going to get the English people to give you any special privileges or to pay more for Canadian wheat, or Canadian beef, than they can buy it for in open market. Disabuse your minds at once and forever of that idea. The British people cannot do it, and the British Government, whether they be Conservative or Radical, have not the faintest intention of doing it either. Nevertheless, if it be true that the English market is the one market to which we must look, is the one market which is open to us, all the more reason for enabling Canada to produce more cheaply and thereby to sell more cheaply, all the more reason for having lighter taxation. Remember that if our people are going to produce cheaply, they must have the power to buy all that they require, as cheaply as they possibly can. Unless that is granted, I think it is in the nature of things impossible for them to compete on fair terms in the markets of the world. Recollect that the people of Canada, though they have in other directions important advantages, are handicapped in many ways. There is a long and costly transport intervening between us and the English market; our climate in some important respects makes farming to-day, and makes living here, more expensive than it is in England. In my judgment, human labour will always be pretty dear here, and I do not know that I regret it. I do not want to see my countrymen brought down to the level of a man, woman and half a dozen children, living on eight or nine shillings sterling per week. I am glad, therefore, that labour is dear here, and likely to be dear. That is an important element in estimating the cost of production here; and it is, I repeat again, a most important additional reason for reducing the cost of protection to the lowest possible figure. Now, Sir, as to the allegation that our farmers ought to be content with their situation because, forsooth, farmers in other countries suffer as well as they do, because, forsooth, in England and elsewhere farming has been at a heavy discount for some years back. What does that prove? It proves that there are exceptional causes operating which make farming unusually unprofitable. Now, the necessary corollary and the necessary deduction from that fact is this, that if farmers are specially handicapped by causes over which the Government have no control, the Government is bound, above all things and before all things, to see that by no act of theirs are those disadvantages increased or added to if they can prevent it. Now, it is well-known that Canada, whatever power it may possess for manufacturing, is above all things a great food-producing country. That is our staple manufacture, and the manufacture which, of all others, should be most forwarded and most attended to by the Government. The rest, after all said and done, is subsidiary to that. Now, Sir, we are able to produce food for fifty times our present number, and in a great number of articles, as we all know well, Canadian produce is vastly superior to the produce of most other countries, and is notably superior for many purposes to the similar articles produced in the country to the south of us. As I have said, for a great deal of our produce, that is our best market, but if the Government will not or cannot get that for us, at any rate let them give us a fair chance to supply the others. It is frequently stated, or perhaps rather insinuated, by the Minister of Finance and his colleagues, that this side of the House is inimical to manufactures. No statement can be more untrue, no statement can be more without foundation in fact. I most fully recognize, we all recognize, the enormous importance of manufactures in every country; we all desire every possible good to all honest manufacturers who are willing to pit their brains, and their capital, and their energy, against the brains, and the capital, and the energy of other people, either here or elsewhere. Sir, what do our manufacturers need? They need, above all things, larger markets. They manufacture under great difficulties in this country. Their market is smaller even than it appears to be by reason of the extraordinary extent and shape of this country. It would be nearer the truth to say that our manufacturers, in many cases, have a market of but three millions instead of a market of five. But they need another thing, they need more prosperous customers; they need that the farmers with whom they deal and to whom they must sell the great bulk of their goods, should be more prosperous, for in their prosperity all the manufacturers who deserve to prosper, would, I believe, find theirs. And so also with the cities and towns, notably the cities and towns of Ontario. With a prosperous farming community, the cities and towns will prosper as well; without a prosperous farming country, although they may have a temporary and ephemeral prosperity, there is no stable foundation for it; and even those which, for a time, appear to be prosperous, having surpassed their natural increment, have discovered after a few short years that when the country is drying up but a very short time will elapse before the cities will dry up too. Now, I desire to speak briefly, having already inflicted upon the House a longer speech than I intended, of the details of the measure submitted to it. I will speak but briefly for several reasons. First of all, and I think I have good right to complain of it, I have not up to this present moment, nor have my friends beside me, received any official copy of the tariff as proposed by the Government. We do not know how many clerical errors may be discovered; we do not know how many members of Parliament may put the screws on to get more clerical errors discovered before this Bill is carried. Are there more democratic wagons, or wagon manufacturers—I do not see the hon. member for South Leeds (Mr. Taylor) present, but I should like to put that question to him—requiring clerical errors to be corrected? Are there more gentlemen interested in starch factories who require other clerical errors to be corrected? The matter is one of some interest. I must say that I do not approve of this fashion of coming down and intimating that in important sections of the tariff clerical errors have been discovered twenty-four hours after information as to the changes intended to be made, has been placed before the House. It is not right, it is not just, it is not creditable to the Government that these things should occur; and they would not have been so likely to occur had the practice which prevailed in my time, and in the time of most of my successors been followed, that of having the changes printed confidentially and placed in the hands of the House when the Minister of Finance made his statement, and then being adhered to. I am not going to say that this tariff has not some good points. This tariff has some good points, because the Minister of Finance has taken the several motions which have been moved time and again, year after year, from this side of the House, and has under compulsion embodied them in his tariff. Therefore, and therefore only, the tariff has some good points. Those hon. gentlemen opposite have been long in learning, but for incorporating those points I give them credit, and I will enumerate them too. The House will remember, I have no doubt, that year after year we denounced specific duties, that in speech and in motion we pointed out the extreme injustice done to the poorer class of the community by their operation. The Government has removed, to a large extent, specific duties in obedience to our demand, and in consequence of the feeling we created in the country, and so far the tariff is an improvement. Hon. members will remember perfectly well that when the McKinley tariff was imposed, and when hon. gentlemen opposite, who spurned American dictation, were compelled to alter the sugar duties, we pointed out the injustice that was being committed to the consumer. My hon. friend from Brant (Mr. Paterson) moved that all sugar up to No. 16 be made free; he also moved that other sugar should be admitted at a rate of 51·100 of 1 cent per lb. What does the Finance Minister do? He follows as nearly as he possibly can the exact and literal wording of the motion made by my hon. friend from Brant, and embodies it in his tariff. Here is my hon. friend (Mr. Mulock) champion of the farmers and of binding twine. Does the House forget how year after year he brought up the needs of the farmers and the necessity of a reduction in the duty of binding twine. Hon. gentlemen opposite have seen the error of their ways, and although they have not made it free, as they very well might and ought, they have largely reduced the duty. On this side of the House we repeatedly denounced the duties on barbed wire, on iron, and on other articles, and on looking over this tariff, while it is in some respects modified and improved, we find that all the modifications and all the improvements and everything good in it consists in the adoption of motions and suggestions that were made in the public interest from this side of the House, and this side only. Sir, as I have said, it is not possible at this hour, and with the information we at present possess, to enter into anything like a minute examination of this readjustment. So far as I can judge from the statement made last night, an immense number of the modifications are of the most superficial and trivial description. We find reductions of $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent and 5 per cent in cases in which four times that reduction should have been made. I am sure the Ministers do not know, and I think the trade cannot yet judge how far the abrogation of the compound duties and the substitution of very considerable ad valorem duties will for the time being produce any substantial relief. It may in the long run, by reason of the improvement constantly going on in mechanical processes, but I doubt exceedingly if much of the readjustment is at all fair. Take a case with which I am somewhat familiar, the article of agricultural implements. It is right there should be a reduction; it is very proper that a reduction has been made. Those are farmers' tools and are of the first necessity to them. Without them, as the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) will tell you, farming in the North-west would be almost impossible. It is perfectly right to reduce the duties on them: but it is only just that when you reduce the duties on those that the iron and steel, of which they are composed, should be put on the same footing as the raw material of the cotton or woollen manufacturer. Reduce those duties as much as you like, but at the same time reduce the iron duties, give those manufacturers fair play, and remember that in giving them fair play you give the farmers fair play, because the cheaper the manufacturers are able to produce those articles the cheaper the farmer will get them and the less difficulty there will be in the way of cheap production. And what is true of them is true of other workers in iron, and there are a great many of them. This industry, although I have no statistics, because these returns are so imperfect I cannot use them, employ quite as many men as the cotton industry or the woollen industry. Why, I should like to know, and I repeat the question, should the cotton spinner obtain his raw material, his cotton, perfectly free, and the woollen spinner obtain his wool perfectly free, and the agricultural implement maker be mulcted in very heavy duties on the iron and steel he employs? True, some trifling reduction has been made, but nothing at all in my judgment equal or adequate to the loss which they sustain by reason of the very heavy iron duties maintained. I repeat, speaking generally and looking at this tariff as a whole, that I believe you have about the maximum of disturbance and the minimum of real relief, and it is not an insignificant consideration that you have imported a great element of uncertainty into trade and commercial transactions. So far as the people have been relieved, good; but at the same time it does appear to me that when you are overturning the whole tariff some reasonable or substantial relief, vastly greater than that proposed, might have been afforded. More than that, I have my doubts, and I have reason for my doubts, as to how far the Government mean honestly to carry out this tariff. Under our present customs law I have observed that the Government, or perhaps I should say the Customs Department, have most improperly arrogated to itself a power which is often practically equivalent to adding 30, 40, or 50 per cent to the lawful tax. It is done in this way. I believe the right to make these revaluations was first given at a time when American currency was in a very disturbed condition, and, therefore, it was very difficult to judge accurately the cost on the other side. At all events the Customs authorities have chosen to take to themselves this power, that when a Canadian merchant purchases goods for a fixed sum, cash paid on the other side or elsewhere, the Customs Department may disregard the invoice altogether, and this arbitrary action is often done at the bidding of the manufacturer who is engaged in producing similar articles, and by increasing the price, the duties are thereby raised to an enormous extent. That is a fraud, a gross fraud, it is a very tyrannical proceeding, and it is a power which has been grossly abused, and it is one which the House would act wisely in speedily taking away from those gentlemen. But so long as that power remains, I have great doubts whether after all this revision may not issue in a great many cases in a taxation practically far in excess of that which the House intended or approved. Putting the whole case together, I say that for a protective tariff, scientifically constructed, if such a thing be possible—some people say it is, but I have my doubts—but for a protective tariff, something is to be said; for a revenue tariff a very great deal is to be said, but for this amorphous botch nothing is to be said. It is neither fish, flesh nor red herring. It really does nothing at all but disturb everybody, make a certain number of corners, which will appear as we go through it in minute detail, and conciliate for a time until the elections come round a certain number of gulls whom the hon. gentlemen have successfully deluded in times past. One thing I must congratulate the Government upon, and that is their capacity for swallowing not only their own previous professions upon the subject, but their predecessors too. In this tariff the Government have justified to the full all the criticisms that have ever been levelled at the past tariff from the Opposition benches, and they show now to the people by their own confession how outrageously they have been plundered by the imposition of specific duties and similar inventions in times gone by. But the Government have, I think, unwittingly done one good thing. The Government have pointed out the road to the future. Every concession that these men have made, if we be true to ourselves, and if the people be true to themselves, means other concessions, and that in the near future. These gentlemen opposite are like engineers who have broken down their sea wall in order to avoid a temporary rush of water, and they will soon discover that there is a good deal of truth in the statement made by one of their supporters from Cape Breton: That be the tariff good or bad, when you begin to pull the bricks out the whole arch will soon crumble about your ears. Sir, I may be pardoned, perhaps, for indulging in a brief, and it shall be a very brief, historical retrospect. I have been a member of this House for a longer period than I quite care to recollect. I was a member of the Canadian Legislature which preceded it, and in my judgment there have been within the last seven and twenty years no less than four distinct occasions on which the people of Canada might have obtained great advantage by a wise policy. One occasion took place when Confederation was initiated in 1867. At that time Canada occupied a position of marvellous advantage towards the United States. Our taxes were one-third per head of theirs, our debt was one-third per head of theirs, our expenditure was very low, scarcely one-third of our present expenditure, and had that position been wisely taken advantage of, it would have been possible then to have introduced in Canada a system of free trade which would even have satisfied my hon. friend from Charlotte (Mr. Gillmor). It would have been possible at that time to have introduced a system which would have practically compelled the people of the United States to pay the greater part of the customs-house duties of Canada. That opportunity was lost, partly, I believe, by the unfortunate fact that at that time that bold and daring statesman, Sir Alexander Galt, ceased to be the Finance Minister of the Macdonald Government, and was succeeded by a gentleman who, although of undoubted ability, had not much experience up to that date in that particular walk. However, whether for good or evil, that opportunity, and it was a great one, was lost, and I have the authority of no less experienced a man than Sir Francis Hincks for saying that if he had been in Canada at that time he would have availed himself of it to the utmost. In the year 1873 another opportunity was given to us. We had prospered greatly, thanks chiefly to the great prosperity of the United States, during these half dozen years. We had prospered far more than we expected. We had a great surplus of revenue, and we were in a position to have very largely reduced our taxation then. Instead of that, we chose, for reasons that I will not now repeat, to throw them all away, and to add four millions of dollars unnecessarily and needlessly to our annual expenditure. We chose to pave the way for the deficits the Minister of Finance alluded to, and we chose to embarrass our whole future without the smallest justification to my mind. Another opportunity presented itself in 1879. Say what they please, we had then surmounted the grave difficulties that our predecessors in office had left behind them. It was perfectly clear that prosperity was coming fast, because it was perfectly clear that the United States were emerging from the cloud of oppression that overspread that country, and we knew it, and I knew it, and you will see that I stated in detail in the very last speech I made as Finance Minister: That within a few brief months at the uttermost, trade would return to its normal proportions, and the very moderate revenue tariff we then had would have afforded us all, and more than all, we required for proper government. That opportunity, too, was thrown away. There was, whether ministers knew it or not, another magnificent opportunity given us in 1888, when Mr. Cleveland and Mr. Bayard, on the other hand, and some of the leaders of the Republican party on the other, had expressed their earnest desire to enter into a fair and equitable arrangement with Canada. And, Sir, it is a noteworthy fact that when in 1888 I made the speech which I then delivered on reciprocity with the United States, it is within the recollection of hon. members of this House that the then Finance Minister, Sir Charles Tupper, took excellent good care—and I knew the reason why—not to oppose me or to say one word on the subject in opposition to my speech. The hon. gentleman, I won't say was conveniently ill, but he was conveniently absent for four or five weeks during that time, and it did not in the least interfere with his carrying on his ordinary avocations. Now, Sir, these four opportunities have passed and gone. But I believe, Sir, that another opportunity is offering the people of Canada, if not at once, at any rate in not many months, and on the use that they may choose to make of it depends, in my judgment, whether Canada shall enjoy the prosperity that her resources warrant her in expecting, or whether Canada shall go floundering on in the slough in which we now are and be content with adding to our population at the rate of one per cent a year, and with losing a million and a quarter of her people in 10 years or thereabouts. I have been accused by hon. gentlemen opposite, and I have been accused by their press of being most pessimistic in my utterances. Why? Because I have seen what was coming, and I have warned them in time. But I am not so pessimistic as they suppose. I believe, for my part, that out of this evil good may come. Although it may astonish hon. gentlemen to hear it, I look upon all these things to a certain extent, in a young nation, like the diseases incidental to infancy. Protection, Sir, is like measles; in itself it is not so very formidable, but it has very dangerous secondary symptoms, and the most dangerous of these is, as I have often pointed out, the inevitable and terrible corruption which under the system of protection to manufacturers is the certain consequence of protection. Fortunately, the people are beginning to understand what protection costs them, and they are beginning to understand also—thanks particularly to certain revelations that have been made in this House—the corruption which is incident to protection. Sir, they are understanding much else. Hon. gentlemen may not know it; hon. gentlemen may choose to shut their eyes to it; but, Sir, the fact is: that not merely in Canada but in the United States, aye, and to some extent in England—although their system, as I have shown, is infinitely better than ours—the whole theory of taxation as at present understood is passing through the fire, and may be said to be in the crucible. Now, in this respect I speak for myself alone. I want to pledge no one, and in particular I beg to be understood that I do not at all intend to pledge my friends beside me. I say that this good has come out of the evil done by hon. gentlemen opposite: men's minds in Canada and elsewhere have been turned as they never yet were turned to the inequality inherent in the best system of taxation hitherto prevailing. These gentlemen, whether they know it or not, whether they desire it or not, have really made radical reforms possible, and I believe, if my friends of the Liberal party rise to the occasion, if they show a true and bold and wise daring in this crisis, that they may pave the way for a completely new system in good time. I do not want revolution; I want reform:

but I desire to see genuine free trade brought about. I desire to see genuine equality of taxation brought about, so that every man shall bear a burden, not altogether in proportion to his expenditure, but in proportion to his means. Thereby, Sir, would the power of the State be established on a true and broad basis; thereby would, for the first time, perhaps, in our history at any rate, real justice be done, (so far as the system of taxation extended) between man and man. It is possible for us, it is possible for the people of Canada, after all is said and done, to set an example to other nations, and not to be as they have been up to the present time, dragged tamely in the wake of other peoples. Sir, I believe that we may yet succeed in developing our resources as they ought to be developed; and yet more, that we may develop our people as they ought to be developed, and show ourselves worthy of the inheritance of half a continent. And now, Sir, these hon. gentlemen challenge us—these consistent mortals, who are shocked at our inconsistency—demand our policy, and in especial they demand mine. Sir, they shall have it. I announced it years ago: my policy from first to last, ever since this infamous system was put on the statute-book, has been to do away with protection—how, I did not care. If free trade would do it, I was for that; if continental free trade or reciprocity with the United States would do it, I was for that; if a revenue tariff would do it, I was for that. Always and at all times, from the time I was Finance Minister until the present hour, I have set my face like a flint against recognizing in any shape or way the tyranny of protection. Sir, they demand our policy. Well, Sir, they shall have our policy and here I believe I do speak for my hon. friends beside me: our policy is death to protection and war to the knife to corruption. Sir, we strike, and we will strike, for liberty and freedom from this system of protective taxation; and I tell the hon. gentlemen that we will not rest until the slavery that they have imposed upon us has become a thing of the past, and until Canadians are free, as Canadians ought to be—free to buy and sell, free to make the most they can of the opportunities God has given them. And, Sir, that the hon. gentlemen may have their question answered, I move:

That while recognizing in the reductions proposed an admission to that extent of the evils inflicted upon the people by the system of high protective duties, this House is nevertheless of the opinion that the amendments suggested, being based upon the principle of protection and not solely upon the requirements of public service, are inadequate to afford satisfactory relief from the burdens of excessive and unfair taxation;

That the highest interests of Canada demand the adoption of a sound fiscal policy which, while not doing injustice to any class, will promote domestic and foreign trade and hasten the return of prosperity to our people;

That, to that end, the tariff should be reduced to the needs of honest, economical and efficient government, should have eliminated from it the principle of protection to particular industries at the expense of the community at large and should be imposed for revenue only :

That it should be so adjusted as to make free, or bear as lightly as possible upon, the necessities of life and to promote freer trade with the whole world, particularly with Great Britain and the United States.

Mr. HAGGART. Mr. Speaker, before replying to the hon. gentleman, allow me to congratulate the House and the people of Canada upon the prosperous state of the country, as depicted by the Finance Minister. One would have thought, after the statement of the hon. Finance Minister, in which he proved pretty conclusively the prosperity that exists from one end of the country to the other, that we would have heard little from the hon. gentleman opposite about the deplorable state of the country, such as he has given us from year to year, unless he was able to give facts and to state what country was more prosperous than Canada. The wail has not been so loud as formerly ; but still he dwelt a little upon it. After the statement of the Finance Minister, in which he showed the prosperity of the people, as evidenced by their savings in the savings banks and the other banks, by the increased railway traffic in all parts of the country, and by the great increase in the trade of the country, one might fairly have looked for some reason being given for the pictures which have been displayed from one end of the country to the other by hon. gentlemen opposite, especially by the hon. gentleman who has just sat down, and some statement being made as to the respect in which the country is not prosperous. I think every man in this country, from one end to the other, may feel a just pride in being able to point to the fact that, notwithstanding the depression that has occurred in almost every other part of the world, that the country to which he owes his birth and to which he belongs, is in a proud condition of prosperity. There was not a single evidence produced by the hon. gentleman in contradiction to the statement made by the Finance Minister, showing the prosperity of the country, except the old one which we have heard again and again about the exodus of some people to the republic to the south of us. I am proud to say that the people who left this country are returning to it. I am glad to say that the customs returns from the province of Quebec will show that a large number of those who left that province are being repatriated. But I would ask the hon. gentleman to remember some of his speeches from 1874 to 1878, in which he drew a picture of those who spoke of the great and real distress of the country then existing. I would ask him to recall the statement he made at Fergus on 7th July, 1877, and which he will find in the picnic speeches of that period. He then said :

It is also a trite and well-known maxim of political science that when a country is in distress then is the opportunity of your true demagogue, for can we find a surer mark or a better mode of distinguishing between the demagogue and statesman than in this, that the demagogue, of whatever rank or station, will always be found imputing that distress to the Government of the day, while the true statesman will search carefully into the cause of that distress, and will deem it, as it very rightly is, a political crime of the first magnitude, to stir up the violence and passions of the people by holding out hopes of succour which he knows no Government no power can grant.

Sir, who is the demagogue now by the hon. gentleman's own definition ? But how different a tune he sings now. I may congratulate him, perhaps, upon his changed feelings, but I cannot help taking this opportunity of drawing the attention of the House to the statement he then made. In his remarks this evening, the hon. gentleman indulged in comparisons with reference to my hon. friend the Finance Minister. He applied to him, in a paraphrase which I do not remember, the heraldic device of the falcon being struck down by a mousing owl.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. You are wrong ; it is an eagle. I will give you the quotation, if you like.

Mr. HAGGART. I remember the quotation perfectly well, but I never heard the paraphrase before. I remember perfectly well the old heraldic maxim about a noble person being struck down by some ignoble hand, and the same illustration is made use of by Sir Walter Scott in his history of Napoleon. In describing the sympathy excited throughout the whole community, when Danton and his compatriots were sent to the guillotine at the command of Robespierre—although perhaps they deserved their fate—he said it was caused by the sight of a noble eagle being struck down by so ignoble a bird. My hon. friend the Finance Minister need not mind the comparison which the hon. gentleman sought to make. We are all proud, the whole country is proud, of the hon. gentleman. The people look upon him with pride as a worthy successor of the many eminent men who have filled the position he now occupies. He has carried out the policy of the Government to the satisfaction of the country and of the Conservative party. He is a Finance Minister of whom the people are proud, on account of his splendid ability, his untiring industry and application ; and in this last great effort of his, the introduction of the new tariff, he has gained fresh laurels. As the hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) has indulged in comparisons, let me suggest a motto peculiarly suitable to the hon. gentleman himself and his party. On the one side, the lugubrious countenance of the rueful knight of South Oxford, and opposite, having reference to the wonderful tenacity which these gentlemen have displayed in never changing their policy, the motto which the hon. gentleman himself suggested, "A thing of beauty is a joy for ever." Let me also remind the hon. gentleman that, in giving to the House information as to what other people may have said, he should be very particular that the parties are alive from whom he received the information, or that, at least, there be a record somewhere in some speech or in some other manner, in support of his statement, so that we may have some means of confirming the report. It seems to be fashionable now to make statements of alleged facts and quote dead men as authority for the statements. With regard to the statement which the hon. gentleman says Sir Charles Tupper made to Mr. Mackenzie, I was in the House at the time, and several other members of the Conservative party present to-day were here then, and neither I nor they have ever heard anything of what the hon. gentleman attributed to Sir Charles Tupper.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Mr. Mackenzie did.

Mr. HAGGART. And I have no doubt that, when Sir Charles Tupper hears of it, he will give it a flat contradiction.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I dare say.

Mr. HAGGART. I would remind the hon. gentleman to be careful in making statements of that kind, for the simple reason that we hear of a good many statements alleged to have been made, the witnesses to which are no longer living. It is very convenient sometimes to make statements of that kind. I am not imputing to the hon. gentleman that he does not believe in the correctness of the information he gave, but such statements are of their very nature peculiarly liable to contradiction, and should not be made unless the authority for them is in some way forthcoming. The hon. gentleman also referred, when treating of the deficits from 1874 to 1878, to those which occurred under Sir John Macdonald in 1858. He has made the comparison often and often throughout the country, in order to apologize for the deficits from 1874 to 1878. But, if I remember rightly, the gallant knight from South Oxford was at that time a supporter of Sir John Macdonald. He was a close follower and admirer of his, and supported thoroughly in every respect his financial administration.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That is exactly what I did not do.

Mr. HAGGART. He was a supporter of the hon. gentleman in 1858.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I was not in the House then.

Mr. HAGGART. When the hon. and gallant knight left the Right Hon. Sir John Macdonald, the era of deficits for the latter ceased. There were no deficits under Sir John Macdonald after that. But the hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) learned nothing from the experience of 1858, and, when he came into power, the deficits still continued. The House waited with a good deal of curiosity and patience to hear the criticism which the hon. and gallant knight would make upon the tariff. What we are considering at present is the ways and means for the producing of a customs revenue, as the Finance Minister said, of some $1,600,000 less than $21,000,000. That is the question before the House. Has the hon. gentleman made any attack upon the policy of the Government, as proposed by the present tariff resolutions? Has he shown, in a single respect, where they are wrong or suggested a remedy for them? Has he suggested any lessening of the burdens of the people or showed in any particular where a reduction could be made? In one breath he complains of the Minister of Finance. He says to him: You are doing a very foolish and dangerous thing, a thing of which you may repent, in relieving the country of $1,600,000 of customs taxation because you may want revenue. And in the next breath he says: Why is it you are levying such a large amount of $36,000,000 on the people. I defy the hon. gentlemen opposite to show in what particular they intend to reduce the amount of expenditure which is expended in this country. I defied them last session to do this, and I defy them again. Before the people of the country will consent to put these hon. gentlemen in power they must be prepared to show in what respect the amount levied upon the people is in excess of the country's requirements. I, for one, never heard one of the hon. gentlemen attempt to deal with that point. Sometimes the hon. member (Sir Richard Cartwright) is frank in speaking. At one of these times he stated that the amount required to cover the necessary expenditure of this country was about $35,400,000, and he was correct then. There is the interest on the public debt, the subsidies to the provinces, the expense of administering justice, the expense of collecting revenue and other items of necessary expenditure. What item is the hon. gentleman going to reduce; in what manner is he going to lighten the imposts upon the country? Why, the hon. gentleman's leader is pledged to an increase of that expenditure. His leader, if he comes into power, must increase that expenditure under the agreement made with Mr. Mercier in the conference at Quebec by two million dollars each year as additions to the provincial subsidies. What a farce it is for these hon. gentlemen to state that if they get into power they will lessen the burdens of the people. They talked at one time glibly about Commercial Union. But one of the hon. members for Prince Edward Island says:—"I never was in favour of Commercial Union; the party never were in favour of it." What does the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) say with reference to that? What is the meaning of the 'Globe's' articles for a period of three or four months if they are not in support of Commercial Union? Afterwards the hon. gentleman said: "that unrestricted reciprocity was perhaps an unfortunate term," that they are going to resort to the greatest measure of free trade consistent with the raising of the necessary revenues of the country. The hon. leader of the Opposition says that they will follow in the wake of the British Government in having a purely revenue tariff. They go throughout the country and tell the workmen, they tell the agriculturists that they are being over-taxed, that the incidence of taxation falls more heavily upon them than upon any other portion of the community. But will these hon. gentlemen really adopt the British system of taxation? The customs taxes in Britain are levied upon nine articles—tobacco, tea, rum, brandy, spirits, wine, currants, coffee and raisins. Does the hon. gentleman know that if he should resort to such a system of taxation it would be in effect a per capita tax upon the people of this country? The poor man in this country drinks about as much rum as the rich man, he uses about as much tobacco, as much tea and as much of these other articles. If hon. gentlemen stick to the policy which they have last announced and adopt the system in use in England, the burden of taxation will fall upon those practically free from taxes today. Such a system would be in effect a per capita tax as I have said and that more so than in Great Britain, for there it is corrected by a dozen other taxes—by a stamp tax, by an income tax and others which relieve the poor and throw the burden of taxation upon the shoulders of those who ought to bear it. Does the hon. gentleman propose to do that? Let them suggest a way by which they will reduce the expenditure of the country. It is true that the hon. gentleman suggested that they could reduce the amount paid for civil government here in Ottawa. But reduction there would be possible only to a small amount. They might effect a reduction of expenses by refusing to expend upon public works. In this way they could reduce the expenditure by two millions, but do the hon. gentlemen propose to stop these public works and to refuse assistance to railways in this country? A charge they make from one end of the country to the other is that we are responsible for the debt of the country, and therefore responsible for the increased annual expenditure to pay the interest upon that debt. I have again and again answered that charge in this House. The present Government is no more responsible for any portion of the debt of the country than are gentlemen on the other side. What does the debt of the country consist of? The public debt amounts to $240,000,000, made up of the amount of provincial debts, assumed by the Dominion at the time of Confederation, afterwards increased by arrangement of the debt of the different provinces, the amount expended on the Intercolonial Railway, the amount expended on building the canals and the amount expended on the Canadian Pacific Railway. Is there a single item in that list that they opposed? Is there a single item, except the expenditure upon the Canadian Pacific Railway? And do they not now justify the expenditure upon that work in every portion of the country? The hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) in his statement said that a good deal of the deficit under his regime was caused by unnecessary works and public improvements left by his predecessors to be done. It is all very well to tell that to people who forget the events of the period from 1874 to 1878. I remember that when they came into power the principal expenditure they had to make was for the purpose of increasing the capacity of the Welland Canal. Some of the contracts had been let before the hon. gentleman had come in. He cancelled all the contracts and was then in a position not to expend a single cent for these improvements. He relet the work and went on with it, and then blamed his predecessors for his expenditures. But, Sir, not one of those expenditures but was perfectly justified by the necessities of the country. We take pride in the enlargement of the canal. There is another work which was at one time spoken of as if it was one of the biggest jobs ever known in the history of the country—the Galops Canal. It has been stated that the Government was responsible for placing a portion of it on the American side. I have known it to be stated from one end of this country to the other that this was one of the works foisted upon the hon. gentleman and his friends by his predecessor, the late Sir John Macdonald. It was stated from one end of the country to the other that this work was bequeathed to the hon. gentleman and his friends by the Government and Sir John Macdonald. Sir, would you believe it? The work was recommended by Mr. Page to Mr. Mackenzie, the location was adopted by him, and the work was let under contract and carried on by him. This was done in 1876 and continued in 1878. The works on the St. Lawrence Canal are works of great importance, which were forced upon the hon. gentleman's Government by his predecessors. Again, the hon. gentleman complained of the system of taxation which is adopted in this country, a protective system which, as he alleges, enables the Government to bleed the manufacturers of Ontario. If anything should bring a blush of shame to the manufacturers of this country it is to hear that statement continually made by hon. gentlemen opposite. Sir, there are hundreds of manufacturers in this country who know, as I know, that all the assistance the Conservative party ever got from the manufacturers in Ontario would not pay for the printing of the campaign literature throughout the country. There are hundreds of manufacturers in the country who know that this statement is true. We have been accused again and again, especially in agricultural districts, of putting a burdensome protective tariff upon the farming community in order that the leaders of the Conservative party might obtain money from the manufacturers for the purpose of corrupting and debauching the constituencies. Talk about corrupting and debauching constituencies! Have hon. gentlemen no memory? Do they not remember about the Ontario Bank proceedings? Have not the hon. gentlemen themselves again and again admitted the necessity of corrupting and debauching the constituencies, and made public announcement of it? Let me refer to a speech the hon. member for South Oxford now in his own opinion, the emblem of purity, made in Napance on November 21st, 1873, as published in the Napanee 'Express.'

Then, again, he knew there were a large number of men in the county who wanted to be bought. He knew that, because he has bought them twice himself while he was still an unrepentant sinner. But he would not buy them again. He would not be hypocrite enough to deny that in the buying of these men in the two late elections he had spent large sums of money.

Do we not remember the Grit manifesto in Nova Scotia in 1878? This is what it said:

The Liberal candidates should be elected because they support a Government [the Liberal Government] which spent large sums of money on useful public works, because they support a Government which, during five weeks, have spent $1,877,794 upon public works in N. S., as against only $650,288 spent by the late Government in seven years. A Reform yearly expenditure of $375,559, against a Tory yearly expenditure of $92,890.

Do they appeal to the electorate on the ground of a comparison between their methods and the methods of a corrupt and extravagant Tory Government? No, they boldly boast of their corruption as one reason why they should receive the support of the country. They made a yearly expenditure of $375,599 against a Tory yearly expenditure of $92,890. Let me draw the attention of the leader of the Opposition to a speech which he made in the Club National in 1877:

I would have you rely mainly on the justice of your cause, yet I have learned by experience that we must not forget those human devices that are so essential to victory.

And when we see the hon. leader of the Opposition and the hon. member for South Oxford getting up here and talking about corruption, they are merely trying to draw a herring across the trail to turn away attention from their own misdeeds. I am suspicious of those hon. gentlemen when I hear them protest against the corrupt Tory party debauching the electorate, they remind me of a character in Shakespeare, "Methinks she protests too much." Sir, we are all glad to hear the Finance Minister state in his speech that the expenditure of the country, which is now in the neighbourhood of $36,000,000, had remained so for the last five years; that the debt of the country was not to be increased, that it would remain stationary, and the probabilities were that in a few years to come it would be less than at present. He stated that the expenditure in this country had arrived at its maximum. It has arrived at its maximum, because in about three years from this date the large amount which has been expended on capital account for the purpose of constructing the canals throughout the country, will have ceased, and we will save in the neighbourhood of $1,500,000 a year in that work alone. Our expenditure on public works will be less in the future than it is at present, and the prospect is that the national debt, in three or four years from now, will begin to decrease. As I said before, I am at a loss to find in what particular point the hon. gentleman complains of the tariff proposals. The Finance Minister has challenged them again and again to state in what form they intend to raise a revenue in this country if they get into power. Their amendment states, and it is mere verbiage, that they intend to remove all vestiges of protection throughout the country. Well, that is a late idea with them. If I remember rightly, Mr. Blake, in a pamphlet which he circulated among the manufacturers throughout the country, stated that on account of the large debt of the country and the financial necessities existing, at that time, it would be impossible for a number of years to come to have anything but a protective policy in this country. He not only spoke for himself, but he said he had authority to speak for his party, including especially the hon. member for South Oxford. Have they changed their policy altogether? If they get into power is it their intention to do away with every vestige of protection in the country and adopt the English system of levying taxation? Everyone knows that even if they did get into power, it would not be possible to adopt the English system of taxation. Then what fault have they to find with the tariff? The fault they find, if any, is this, that as we have to levy by customs a revenue of $19,500,000 from the people of this country, we levy it in a form that gives incidental protection to the manufacturers. Is not that the best possible form of levying the taxation that is required in this country? As the Finance Minister said, the idea is not to prohibit the importation of goods altogether so that everything must necessarily be manufactured in this country; but it is to place the duty at such a rate that articles can be imported and thereby prevent anything like a combination among the manufacturers. Articles may be imported and come into competition with those manufactured in the country, but we give the latter a slight advantage. Our Canadian manufacturers will have to compete with those of foreign countries, and make their products at least equally good to retain the home market. They will have to improve their machinery and bring their manufactures up to the standard of those which can be imported. That is the policy of the present tariff as stated by the Finance Minister. We have taken particular pains to find out what is the feeling throughout the country on the question. As was promised by the Minister of Finance in his Budget Speech last year, we have consulted every manufacturer throughout the country, we have heard deputations from one end of the country to the other, representing the agricultural interests. We have consulted every agricultural section and every industry in the country, and the tariff is framed in such a manner that the gallant knight who represents South Oxford has not been able to point out a single fault in it. He has not at all criticised the details of the tariff, but has only spoken against the generalities of protection, finding fault with the principle on which it has been framed, calling it legalized robbery and everything of that kind. It is easy to see that the tariff is an astonishment to hon. gentlemen opposite. They admit that in certain particulars it is a pretty good one, they admit it is a great improvement; but they say that if they get into power they will wipe away every vestige of protection from it. Will they wipe out every vestige of protection on agricultural products grown in this country? Will they as the hon. gentleman suggested allow agricultural implements, binder twine, coal oil, and articles of that kind, to come into this country free? Hon. gentlemen opposite if they obtain power would reduce the protection on cotton goods and woollen goods produced in this country. But what has been the result of the protection afforded the manufacturers of those goods in Canada? It has been this, that cotton goods are produced as cheaply for their quality as are cottons in any other part of the world, notwithstanding the protection given, and in the city represented by the leader of the Opposition cottons are being manufactured solely for exportation, and every yard manufactured is sent to China. Woollen goods of better value than those manufactured in the country to the south of us are produced here, and they are as fair value as are woollens produced in any country on the face of the globe. We are manufacturing nearly every article in this country, and I might enumerate a dozen articles in a like position to cottons and woollens, but it is perhaps sufficient to enumerate those two leading industries. These manufacturers, notwithstanding the protective tariff, are producing their goods with the most improved machinery, a considerable portion of which is being made here; the artisans are all being trained in this country, and are being employed, and the people are obtaining the products at as low price here as elsewhere. Yet the hon. gentlemen opposite would strike down these industries, remove the protection afforded and close up the mills. Hon. gentlemen opposite speak about the exodus from this country to the United States. If the policy proposed by hon. gentlemen opposite were carried into effect our people would flock to the United States by thousands, leaving this country, which would become a purely agricultural country, without mixed industries, and as the history of every nation in the world shows, a purely agricultural country is necessarily a poor country. If the hon. gentleman will make a comparison between States in the United States he will find that the value of the land increases in proportion to the industries in the State. Every acre of land is increased in value in proportion to the development of manufacturing industries. I can show the hon. gentlemen—but I will not trouble the House by quoting the figures—that the returns of the United States census prove conclusively that land values are largely in favour of centres of industry, and in the vicinity of cities where large manufacturing industries are established. But hon. gentlemen opposite propose to wipe out every industry. If hon. gentlemen opposite obtained power to-morrow they could not exist two months as a Government if they endeavoured to carry out their policy of wiping out all the industries of the country. Every writer on political economy, every one who advocates free trade, and honestly believes in it, admits that ruin would result if such a policy as is proposed by hon. gentlemen opposite, of wiping out the industries of the country, were carried out, after the industries had been established under the authority of a protective tariff, enacted by the majority of the people, although their views might be erroneous, and that, even under such conditions, it would be impossible to wipe out the industries altogether and sacrifice every man engaged in manufacturing in this country. Hon. gentlemen opposite have embodied that policy in the motion submitted to the people. They say to the people: taxation shall be levied, not as at present, according to a fair distribution, under which I must admit the burdens press a little heavily on the richer and easier class of the community, and fall comparatively lightly on the agricultural labourer and the agriculturist, but it shall be distributed, if hon. gentlemen opposite carry out their programme, and the promises they make in opposition, on the lines of a policy similar to that prevailing in Great Britain, and instead of distributing the burden of taxation somewhat according to the wealth of the people and upon those who are able to bear it, they will make it a per capita tax. Taking the importations of the country at the present day, and the revenues received, and calculating that hon. gentlemen opposite retain the duties on tea, coffee and sugar as they prevailed in 1878, the amount levied on the people would be $9,250,000, of which we levy but a trifle at the present time. Hon. gentlemen opposite have a habit of sneering at agricultural protection. I remember that on one occasion the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) said in his speech that it was true that $16,000,000 worth of agricultural products came into Canada, and he held that this was for the benefit of the country, because it inured to the carrying trade and increased the transport business on our inland waters. The policy of the Conservative party is, and has been, to keep the Canadian market for Canadian products, and in that policy they have entirely succeeded. They intend in the future to keep Canadian markets for Canadian farmers, and they will try to ensure that Canadian mechanics shall supply, at fair and reasonable prices, the articles which Canadian farmers use in their industry. The policy of the Government has been to develop our industries, and so successful has that policy been, that the time is coming soon when not only can our manufactures supply our own markets, but when they will be able to export to the markets of the world and to compete on fair and even terms with the manufacturers of any nation on the face of the globe. In Canada, nature has given us great facilities for manufactures. It is true in some places they have no coal, but nature provides another blessing in immense water power, which can be obtained at comparatively small cost. There is no reason why, by application of the sciences to our natural resources, we should not be able to produce as good and as cheap articles as there are in the world, and to compete successfully in foreign markets as well. For the last fourteen years, protection in Canada has so developed our manufactures that the Government now think that a fair reduction in the tariff can be ventured on. They believe that our people can compete with less protection than formerly, and to prove that, it can be pointed out that we are now sending agricultural implements to many portions of the world, and that we are sending our cotton fabrics to compete with the cottons of European countries in the Asiatic markets. The policy pursued by this Government has placed the necessities of life free on the tables of our people. Sugar is selling as cheaply to-day in the city of Montreal as it does in the city of New York. What a contrast is that with former times when hon. gentlemen opposite were in power. From 1874 to 1878, every sugar refinery in Canada was closed, and the people of this country had to pay the price which that article brought in the city of New York, plus the transport, plus the duty, and plus the commission. To-day we are getting sugar of a finer quality for half the money we had to pay for it in the years from 1874 to 1878. I will give hon. gentlemen opposite the exact figures on this matter, so that they may remember them if they will. In 1891 we abolished the sugar duties, and the public got the full advantage of that change. The price of granulated sugar in 1889, 1890 and 1891 averaged $6.69 per one hundred pounds, and after the change of tariff, the average price in the years 1892 and 1893 was $4.53. Let us contrast that with the years of the Liberal Administration in this country. In 1876, 1877 and 1878, during most of that time, no sugar refining was done in the country, and most of the trade in that article went to New York and Boston. The consumer in Montreal then paid the actual selling price in Boston and New York, plus the cost of transport, interest, insurance, commission, and duty. The average price of granulated sugar in Montreal in these three years of Liberal government was $9.83 per one hundred pounds, while the average price for the same sugar in the years 1892 and 1893 was only $4.36 per one hundred pounds. But, say hon. gentlemen opposite: These duties were put on for the purpose of putting money in the pockets of the bloated millionaires in the city of Montreal. Let us see what truth there is in that statement? Let us contrast the price of sugar in Montreal with the prices in New York. Here is the comparison between sugar of the same quality, namely, New York, extra granulated and Montreal extra granulated, the New York sugar having one-quarter of a cent per pound added for freight, as in the former case. The average price for the year 1892, delivered in Montreal in bond, New York sugar, $4.92 per one hundred pounds; Montreal sugar, $4.34 per one hundred pounds. The average price for the year 1893 was: New York sugar, $5.17 per one hundred pounds; and Montreal sugar, $4.93 per one hundred pounds. These facts prove that the people of this country have not paid one cent a barrel on account of the trifling protection left on sugar last year. The people are supplied with cottons in this country as cheaply as are the people of any country in the world, and the fact that we are able to export and compete in foreign markets and to make a profit shows that. I have it on the very best authority that the same thing obtains with regard to woollen goods, notwithstanding the duty on them. I have heard it from Englishmen who have been brought up in the woollen business in Yorkshire, the great manufacturing centre for woollen goods, and they tell me that the Canadian people receive as good quality and value for their money as do the people of England or anywhere else. Has not the promise that the Conservative party gave to the people of this country been literally fulfilled, namely, that the competition between manufacturers here would reduce prices, that the people can buy as cheaply, and cheaper, than if the goods were imported. The statement made by hon. gentlemen opposite that because there is a thirty per cent protective duty on articles coming into this country our people have to pay thirty per cent extra for them, is a most fallacious one. We have heard another extraordinary statement from gentlemen opposite; that, on account of the system of protection, one thousand million dollars have been wrung from the people of this country. Is it not a proud thing, as the hon. member for Toronto (Mr. Cockburn) remarked to me, to belong to a little country of between four and five millions population, that is still in a prosperous condition, and whose agricultural classes can compare favourably with the people to the south of us, notwithstanding that, during the years of protection from 1878 to 1893, one thousand million dollars have been wrung out of their pockets. It is enough to state the proposition to see the absurdity of it. Where have the thousand million dollars gone? Have these bloated millionaires taken it out of Canada and invested it in a foreign country, or what has become of it? The absurdity of the statement is so ridiculous that it must be laughed at by every person, from one end of the country to the other, who has the least mathematical idea in his head. He has gone into the figures, and he cites by way of confirmation the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy). Is that the kind of stuff that these hon. gentlemen have been feeding the electorate of the country with during the recess? My fellow-countrymen, the people of Ontario at any rate, are an educated people, and nearly every boy who receives a mathematical education would be able, when he looked at the figures, to see at once the absurdity of the ridiculous statement made by the gallant knight who represents the riding of South Oxford. Perhaps I am detaining the House too long, and if I went over the whole ground covered by my notes I am afraid that it would take a much longer time than I care to occupy. I have listened for five hours to the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), to hear if possible some practical reason advanced why the tariff should be changed; but from beginning to end I have not heard a single suggestion. Not one word has he uttered indicating what he intended to do if he should get into power. We are left entirely to guess. The only thing we could gather from the statement the hon. gentleman made, and the amendment he moved, was that he and his supporters want to do away with every vestige of protection in the country. But let me tell them that the agricultural portion of our people will insist on having the markets of this country for themselves. We have had a petition presented to this House, signed by over a hundred thousand farmers, asking that the markets of this country be retained for their agricultural products, and I venture to say that the two Controllers, while consulting the agricultural portion of our people from one end of the country to the other, rarely met a farmer in any part of the country, no matter what his political proclivities were, who was not in favour of agricultural protection. Yet these hon. gentlemen, displaying the other side of the shield, and dwelling upon the deplorable condition of Canada, express themselves as determined to remove every remnant and vestige of protection from the agricultural products and the manufacturers of the country. Do they intend to remove it gradually? No. Their statement is that they intend to remove it as soon as possible, even though it should ruin every man, who, on the faith of statements made again and again in Parliament, has invested his money in the industries of this country, by subjecting those industries to the competition of the whole world. Such a course, without cheapening a single article of production to the consumers of the country, would have the certain result of ruining those industries, and leaving our people to be simply producers of agricultural products, and even in supplying these to the artisans of our own country, our farmers would be subject to the competition of other countries. If the people of the country believe that these hon. gentlemen really intend to carry out this policy, I can assure them that they are much farther from power to-day than they have ever been before during the last fourteen years. I warned them that when the people of this country, especially the backbone of the party who supported them, knew what commercial union with the United States meant, what unrestricted reciprocity meant—when they discovered that it meant the parting with their independence and placing themselves under the control of the country to the south of us, and was inimical to the interests of the old land, which we have been brought up to love and revere, although they might be Reformers and Radicals, they would be found to adhere to the country to which their hopes and aspirations belong. I told them that when the people learned what the effect of their policy was, there would be a falling away from their ranks. Sir Oliver Mowat showed the extent of that falling off, and they were obliged to drop commercial union for unrestricted reciprocity, and now they are going to try to tickle the people with the idea of British free trade. I told them before that when the people understood the meaning of their policy they would never give them their support, and I tell them now, that if the people of the country come to understand their policy of to-day, as expressed in the speech and the amendment of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), there will be such a falling away from the ranks, that often as they have contradicted and changed their policy in the last five years, they will execute a right-about wheel more quickly than they have ever done before. I thank the House for the attention it has given me during the time I have occupied in addressing it on this question.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Mr. Speaker, I shall not at this late hour of the night detain the House at any great length; but will endeavour to reply as briefly as I can to the statements and arguments which have been advanced by the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat. That hon. gentleman seems to have taken it for granted that he was defending the tariff that was in existence prior to yesterday evening. He seems to have overlooked the fact that some changes have been proposed. I think that was very evident from some of the remarks he favoured us with. I noticed that he opened his speech by congratulating the Finance Minister on the prosperity of the country. Well, I congratulate the Finance Minister on such prosperity as we have in the country; but I do not confine my congratulations to the Finance Minister; I congratulate the country as a whole. The hon. gentleman finds fault because he says that sentiment was not echoed from this side of the House. He complains that we portray the country as in a most deplorable condition, that we proclaim blue ruin, and are unable to see anything bright in the prospect. Well, this is a favourite statement of hon. gentlemen opposite. So oft-repeated, perhaps they themselves may believe it. Speaking for myself, I have always recognized that we are enjoying a certain degree of prosperity in Canada, and as a citizen of this country I rejoice in such measure of prosperity as we have. When I am forced to allude at times to the fact that we are not enjoying as great a degree of prosperity as we might, I do not consider that I am decrying the country, but only endeavouring to point out that we have entered upon a line of policy which is retarding its progress, and that a change of policy would bring about the increased prosperity desired by us all. That is the position we take, and it is a proper one. Now then, how will I substantiate the view I hold that the country has not made the progress which a country, situated as Canada is and possessed of the resources Canada possesses, should make. I will not give a standard of my own, because that would not be accepted by hon. gentlemen opposite, but I will give them a standard by which a rule may be laid down that they will accept to show what prosperity might reasonably be expected to prevail. Then I will ask them to judge by that rule if we have attained that degree of prosperity. I give them the authority of Sir John Macdonald and of Sir Charles Tupper. Sir John Macdonald, whom hon. gentlemen opposite will say was a lover of his country, said in this House, in the year 1880, that within ten years from that date we would have over 600,000 souls in the North-west provinces and in Manitoba. That, he said, was a very moderate estimate. He did not wish to speak in an exaggerated manner, but to confine himself within a narrow limit. In 1891, one year after the time in which, according to Sir John Macdonald, speaking in a moderate way, we should have 600,000 people in that country, the people were counted, and instead of 600,000 there was only a little over 200,000, or about one-third of his moderate estimate. I ask hon. gentlemen opposite to apply that rule laid down by Sir John Macdonald. I heard the same hon. gentleman say, supported by Sir Charles Tupper, in his place in this House, that out of that magnificent domain which we, as Canadians, feel proud of, from the sale of land to settlers, reasonably expected to enter that country and take up homesteads, we should have, by the year 1890, in the Public Treasury, after paying all the expenses of survey and management, the sum of $69,000,000 net. What is the result? The hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) has pointed it out. When you take the debit and credit of the sales of land in the North-west, instead of having $69,000,000 in the Treasury to ease the burdens of the people, the balance is, if anything, on the wrong side of the ledger. Now then, I have given hon. gentlemen opposite authorities which they will not deny—authorities speaking in a guarded manner of the possibilities of this country—and when we see how very far short we have come of attaining the degree of prosperity they anticipated, must hon. gentlemen opposite not be convinced that there must be something retarding our progress. Where is that cause? It is not in our soil. Our soil is equal to anything in the world. It is not owing to our climate. Our climate varies from the Atlantic to the Pacific, no doubt; but taken as a whole, where will you find a climate better adapted for the development of a race of hardy men—men of brains, brawn, and muscle, such as are to be found within the Dominion. We have a country possessed of great resources. Its soil will produce agricultural products of all kinds found in the temperate zone. Our fisheries are inexhaustible on the Atlantic and Pacific, and in our great lakes. We have mines and minerals in abundance, and have homes to offer to millions of people. How is it then that, with all these advantages, we have not attained to greater prosperity? There must be some operating cause, outside of natural causes, which has produced this result. We, on this side of the House, believe that one of the retarding influences has been the unwise administration of the Government and their unsound policy. While we have had prosperity to a certain extent, we have not had that prosperity we desire and have a right to expect, and it is owing to the injurious policy of the Government that we have not got it. That is the position we take. We desire to take steps to achieve better results in the future. In years gone by Divine Providence favoured us with abundant crops, and our exports were large, and brought wealth into the country. But that wealth, which should have resulted in enriching the people, has been taken by the Government out of the pockets of the people, and has been squandered in such a way that no good results to the people came from the expenditure. The hon. gentleman spoke next of the deficits that occurred when Sir Richard Cartwright was Finance Minister. Well, there is no denying we had deficits from 1874 to 1878, and I see no necessity for being sensitive on that point at all. What does it mean? Simply, that, as the country was passing through a period of depression—a depression that was world-wide—the Government held that that was not a time to increase the burdens of the people, and, therefore, instead of increasing the tariff and thus laying greater burdens on the people, we maintained a low rate of taxation, economized expenditure as far as they could and carried over the slight deficits that remained—deficits that would have been balanced, had they remained in power, when trade had resumed its normal condition, by surpluses that would have accrued under the same rate of taxation that was in force during the hard times. Then the hon. gentleman found fault with us by saying that the question before us was one of ways and means, and that the hon. member for South Oxford had given no information on the subject. I thought that a very strange charge, because we on this side of the House had just been thinking that the Finance Minister, whose duty it was to give us information upon this subject, had failed to give us that information. The hon. Finance Minister was questioned again and again as to what the effect of the changed tax upon this or that article would be. His only answer was: Well, I cannot just say; I do not think it will make much difference either way. That is about all the information we could get from the Finance Minister with reference to the changes that were made. Therefore, if the hon. gentleman's charges, as against my hon. friend from South Oxford, had any weight, it must have a great deal more weight as against the hon. Finance Minister. The hon. gentleman said further, that we had certain fixed charges against the revenue, and that he would like to know how we were going to reduce the burdens resting upon the people. He said that we did not tell him this. I thought the hon. member for South Oxford did tell him. We propose to arrange the taxation in such a way that the burdens of the people will be reduced and yet more revenue raised. That is what I tell the hon. gentleman; that is what the hon. member for South Oxford will tell him. The tariff of gentlemen opposite is levied, not with a view of bringing revenue, but with a view of excluding revenue and yet leaving the burden upon the people all the same. The hon. gentleman said that we were responsible with them for the increase in the public debt—the expenditure upon the Canadian Pacific Railway and all. I do not know how he could make that out. If he had looked through the journals of the House and taken the recorded divisions of the House upon that subject, he would scarcely have dared to make that statement. The hon. gentleman went on to speak about a remark made by the member for South Oxford with reference to the manufacturers that were spoken of under the name of the Red Parlour, and he said that, if anything should bring a blush of shame to the cheeks of these manufacturers, it was to be charged with subscribing to the Tory fund. He denied what the hon. member for South Oxford had said. I have no personal knowledge in reference to the matter at all, but if the statement was false, as the hon. gentleman declared it to be, and if these manufacturers had never subscribed to this fund, the making of such a statement would hardly bring the blush of shame to their faces. It might arouse a feeling of indignation, but it could hardly bring up a blush of shame, because shame is only connected with guilt. Did the hon. gentleman use that word "shame" inadvisedly, or did he use it advisedly? That is the question I asked myself. I understood the position of the hon. member for South Oxford with reference to this matter to be this: If it be true that men come to the Government and ask for certain favours by way of legislation in the arrangement of the tariff by the operation of which they expect to be financially benefited, and the Finance Minister or any other member of the Government, or the Government as a whole, from corrupt motives, make themselves a party to benefiting that individual at the expense of the people, it would be an unblushing piece of corruption, even worse than anything that has been revealed by the investigations by committees of this House. I think hon. members of this House will agree with me in that. This matter is one which it behooves every member of the House to carefully consider—this question of the bearing of protection in such cases. If a man comes, hat in hand, and asks the Government for a special Act of Parliament in his favour—that is what it amounts to, for every one of these little items in the tariff favouring this or that manufacturer, is, in effect, if not in form, a separate Act of Parliament—can that man be considered as an independent member of this community and as free to exercise his right in a proper manner as a man who has not placed himself in that position? Then, the hon. gentleman told us that the tariff, as amended by the Government, was such as to give incidental protection, but the Finance Minister did not so describe it. Under a revenue tariff by which I understand a tariff that is levied for the purpose of raising a revenue—there may be incidental protection to the person manufacturing an article upon which a duty is levied. But in such a case the Government is not looking to the amount of protection that will be given to the individual; that protection is merely an incident of the tariff. But the hon. Finance Minister does not so describe the tariff which he has placed before us. He describes it as a protective tariff, which it is, a tariff levied, not with a view to raising a certain amount of revenue, but to providing rates upon manufactured articles sufficient to give the Canadian manufacturer the Canadian market for these goods. There is a radical difference between the two principles. And, that I may not be charged with misrepresenting the Finance Minister, let me read just what he did say in reference to that matter :

Mr. PATERSON (Brant).

I want to state here that the Government of to-day and the party which supports the Government to-day take their stand squarely and fairly upon the embodiment and upon the preservation of the principle of protection in the tariff, the degree of that protection to be according to the circumstances of industry, and the conditions of business and of trade at the present time.

The interest of the manufacturer is to be considered first and above all, and if any revenue accrue, that is a mere incident of the tariff. In another place the hon. Finance Minister said that they Must take cognizance of the varying conditions of different industries and must mete out to them, on the principle which we have stated, the protection which is reasonably due to them and necessary in order to maintain them in their position in this country.

I quote these words to show the hon. gentleman that the Finance Minister did not say that he was adopting a revenue tariff which would give incidental protection. The Finance Minister stated over and over again, that they were adhering to the principle of the National Policy, and he took care to define that in different parts of his speech, so as to show that protection to the manufacturers of this country was his chief aim, and that, if any revenue accrued, it was simply an incident. Then he informed us that they had seen all the manufacturers, and that the tariff was right now, and had been right, for cottons and woollens, he said, were better and as cheap as in any other country. That was his broad statement in reference to that matter. Well, now, it struck me at the time, as it must have struck other gentlemen in the House, to ask, if cottons and woollens were as good and as cheap under the late tariff, before the changes were made, as those articles could be had in any other country, why have the changes been proposed? That is a question I would like to have answered by any hon. gentleman who may speak from the other side. That position was taken by the Minister of Finance and taken by the Minister of Railways. I ask him, then, what is the object of making these changes in the tariff? He next stated that if the Liberal party came into power they would wipe out every manufacturing industry in the country. Well, that is a very broad statement. Where does he find it? He does not find it in the resolution that embodies the policy of the Liberal party as submitted by the hon. member for South Oxford. Who is there warring upon the manufacturers of this country? Who are those gentlemen that assume to speak in the name of the manufacturers of this country? Who has given them authority to do so? We have had revenue tariffs in operation in this country before. Was every manufacturer wiped out under that tariff? I think I see manufacturers to the right and left of me who can testify that they were in business and doing well. I think some hon. gentlemen on this side of the House gave testimony before a committee of this House, and said that they were doing well. A great many agricultural implement manufacturers in the country were summoned before a committee of this House, and you can read the evidence they gave; they were all satisfied, and were doing well, and wanted no changes in the tariff. I could point you to the Centennial Exhibition at Philadelphia when the Hon. Mr. Mackenzie's Government was in power, and I can say that there was as much pride in the Canadian breast at the exhibition of our manufactures at Philadelphia as there was in gazing at the exhibition of Canadian manufactures in Chicago within the past year. Take your census returns, and what will you find? Manufacturing industries of all kinds were in existence all over the country, and scarcely a new manufacturing industry has been started since the inception of the National Policy. Some of the same kind have been started, I grant you, but that has been one of the courses that have followed in the wake of the National Policy. It creates a hot-bed, and brings capital into enterprises which glut the market. After a few years of prosperity the market became glutted, and millions of capital were sunk and lost, and property was sacrificed. Gentlemen who may have bought that property at a sacrifice are now able, perhaps, to make something out of what was lost by those who at first placed their money in the business. The hon. gentleman said that the taxes we had in 1878 were heavier than they are now. That is a very strange statement for any one to make. I want to give hon. gentlemen opposite what I consider is a true way of measuring this, because the mere assertion made on one side of the House or the other will carry no weight. I would ask those hon. gentlemen to turn to page 11 of the Trade and Navigation Returns, prepared, not by Mr. Laurier or by the member for South Oxford, but prepared by the Government themselves, and what is that statement? One of the columns shows the amount of Customs duties paid per head of the population. That is the way to measure your taxation. Take the taxes of 1878 and see how much was paid by the population then. You will find it was $3.13 per head. Take the sum this last year, and it was $4.26 per head. That only gives an idea of the taxation levied that went into the revenue. As to the other amount taken from the people which did not find its way into the revenue, the Minister of Railways laughed at the estimate of it made by the member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright); but that a large amount did not go into the revenue we are not forced to prove now by hon. gentlemen whose testimony will not be taken by the other side of the House, because we are in the position since last night of being able to prove it by the statement of the Finance Minister himself, who said that during the early years of the adoption of the protective principle the manufacturers would take advantage of the rate of duty that was levied on the article, and charge that much more for it. The hon. member for South Oxford placed the sum at one thousand millions of dollars, and the Minister of Railways ridiculed the amount as absurd. I do not know that I place the amount at that figure, for I have no means of making a correct estimate. The Minister of Railways asked where was the thousand millions of dollars; if somebody lost the amount it must have gone somewhere and somebody must have got it. That does not necessarily follow. It might have cost the manufacturers more to produce the goods; they might not have had the thousand of millions, if we take that figure for illustration, in their pockets, but that amount might nevertheless have come out of the pockets of the consumers. The country can obtain some idea of the burden of taxation that has been placed on the people if a series of years is taken as a basis for obtaining a per capita calculation, such as that which the Minister of Trade and Commerce has furnished to Parliament. If hon. gentlemen will look ten years back they will find that over $57,000,000 extra taxation has been wrung out of the people over and above what the Mackenzie Government would have taken out in the same length of time. So the House can get a measure and weigh the subject accurately in this light. There is no way in which these figures may be weakened. Hon. gentlemen may say: That will not do, because there were deficits under the Mackenzie regime and surpluses under their regime. Granted; but surpluses and deficits take their place in the public debt and manifest themselves one way or another, and when $57,000,000 of extra taxation have been taken out of the people by this Administration in ten years more than would have been taken under the Mackenzie regime, there were also two million dollars a year added to the public debt more under hon. gentlemen opposite than during the Mackenzie Administration. Stated in that way, you have some idea of the excessive taxation that is wrung from the people of the country, and I am speaking now of the direct taxation, the receipts from which went into the Treasury. As to the indirect taxation, that which has gone to pay the manufacturers of the home products, whether they were not able to manufacture as cheaply or whether being able to manufacture as cheaply they took advantage to enrich themselves, a vast amount, whatever you may estimate it to be, was taken from the people in addition to the amount of $57,000,000. It is a serious matter when you speak of $57,000,000; and you are lost in the magnitude of the figures, and it is only when you make some comparisons that you gain some idea of the sum. When I tell the House that during the last ten years the value of all our wheat raised in Canada and exported, together with the value of our flour ground in the Dominion, and also all oats and hay exported are put together, did not equal the amount of excessive taxation taken from the people under this tariff during the ten years, they can understand how the country has been impoverished and see pretty clearly the reason why the Dominion has not made the progress it should have done. Then the Minister of Railways passed on to sugar, and said we had our sugar as cheap as any people. The question occurs again. Then why alter the sugar duties? Will the hon. member from Halifax (Mr. Stairs) tell me why, when we were having sugar under the tariff in existence the day before yesterday as cheap, or even cheaper, as he said, than the people in New York were obtaining it, it was deemed necessary to alter the sugar duties; why does the Government now claim credit for altering them, and say that they are reducing the burdens of taxation? The very fact that they have altered the duties shows that they were cognizant of the fact that the duties were a burden on the country. What is the result of it, and how has it been brought about? Three years ago I offered a resolution in the House asking that sugars up to No. 16 Dutch standard in colour shall be admitted free of duty, and the duty on refined sugar reduced to half a cent a pound. The Finance Minister has adopted the resolution so far as admitting the sugar up to No. 16 was concerned, but has kept the duty on all refined sugars over that number, placing it at 64 cents per 100 lbs. instead of 80 cents, as previously. If the Finance Minister had been in his place, I would have asked him for some information on this point, but as the Controller of Customs is here, I will ask him this question. Is it the intention under the resolution that all sugars up to No. 16 Dutch standard in colour shall be admitted duty free? There are two clauses in the tariff, and one conflicts with the other.

Mr. WALLACE. I think the clauses are pretty clear, and refers only to sugars that are not refined sugars.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Then refined sugar however low in colour will not come in duty free.

Mr. WALLACE. I think so.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). One of the resolutions so enacts, but if the hon. gentleman will look at the free list schedule he will see it is not expressed, but it is simply stated that all sugars under No. 16 Dutch standard in colour shall come in free. I desire to ask the Controller of Customs further, if he knows what the American rule is in regard to this matter? They admit No. 16 free; do they admit all sugars?

Mr. WALLACE. I think not.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). My impression was that they did. I will read to the House the motion I submitted. The proposition was :

That all sugars above No. 14 Dutch standard in colour and refined sugars of all kinds, grades or standards, and all sugar syrups derived from refined sugars shall pay a specific duty of $\frac{1}{16}$ of a cent per pound.

I moved in amendment :

That all sugars No. 16 and under Dutch standard in colour shall be admitted free of duty and that the duty on all sugars over No. 16 Dutch standard in colour be reduced to one-half cent per pound.

The Finance Minister has moved in that direction, but has not gone the whole length of my proposition. The Government are granting, and I give them credit for it, some relief to the trade and conferring benefit on the consumers by admitting raw sugars up to No. 16 Dutch standard in colour, while before they excluded all under No. 14. That will let in some grocery sugars and give some relief. They have also reduced the duty from 80 cents on refined grade to 64 cents. But the question occurs, if sugars was so cheap before, what necessity exists for making the change? To ask the question is to answer it. Then the Minister of Railways declared he never heard of any principle being adopted by the member from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). The amendment proposed had just been read to the House, and the hon. Minister could ascertain what its terms were. The hon. Minister also spoke of the Opposition seeking to wipe out all manufacturing at one fell blow. If the hon. gentleman had read the amendment he would have found that such was not our intention, and that we did not desire to do anything unjust, although the hon. gentleman could perhaps scarcely conceive of a Liberal Administration so acting in any case or under any circumstances. The amendment enunciating the policy of the hon. members on this side of the House is one that is endorsed by the country. What had been the policy of the hon. gentlemen opposite? The Minister of Finance in his opening remarks spoke of the National Policy and its enactment, stating that it had a history. Yes, it had a history; and what is that history? Its history was the coming into power through promises and pledges, not fulfilled, the party of the hon. gentleman opposite, who levied an increased rate of taxation year after year and granted benefits and favours to manufacturers. So the hon. gentlemen opposite proceeded, until at length in the history of their policy a time arrived when they began to find that the people were not at their back as they had calculated they were in days gone by; a feeling of panic took possession of the hon. gentlemen opposite, and last session they promised they would have a committee in-interview manufacturers to see if any reductions could be made, and this year we have the history of the inquiry in the resolutions introduced to the House, forced from the hon. gentlemen opposite, by which some amendments and changes were made granting relief in certain directions, on account of a feeling prevailing in the country that the people would no longer submit to the unjust system of taxation that the National Policy had imposed on them. To-night the Opposition stand in the position of knowing that every concession made in the tariff for which hon. gentlemen opposite claim credit is a concession demanded by the Opposition in a formal manner and refused by hon. gentlemen year after year. The Minister of Finance has told us that he is relieving the burdens of the people to the extent of a million and a half dollars per year by the reductions that he has made, slight as they are, in the tariff. I ask hon. gentlemen opposite, and I ask the country to weigh the amount that has been taken out of them during these last fifteen years, if the slight reductions that have been made on a few articles give them a relief of one and a half million dollars in one year. They can measure the amount of taxation that has been imposed upon them in that way. We find that the speeches of the Ministers this year vary a little—though that of the Minister of Railways did not—from their speeches of previous years. We find the Minister of Finance saying that he was proposing certain changes, but that the principle of the National Policy would be maintained. He told us that the National Policy was very perfect, which led the leader of the Opposition to ask him: Why, if it was so perfect, he intended to change it. As the Finance Minister came near the point in his speech where he was to announce that this perfect piece of machinery was to be taken in pieces somewhat, and its parts changed, he deemed it necessary to assume an apologetic tone and he said: He did it, and made these changes with some difficulty, because of two reasons. One reason was: That a state of depression existed in the country at the present time, and the other: That we were in the face of a falling revenue; and yet he said: We cling to the principle of the National Policy in its entirety, that policy which has a history. Well, what was the history of the inception of the National Policy? Then, a period of depression was existing; then there was a revenue that was short of the requirements, and the remedy then proposed by the National Policy to obviate these difficulties was to double up the taxation. But now, under the same condition of things prevailing, the Finance Minister says: Our policy is to reduce the taxation on certain things. Hon. gentlemen will see that their programme varies somewhat. I am not desirous of reading extracts, nor will I do so further than just to read one made by a member of the Government, which will give us what has been the reiterated statement which was reiterated by the Minister of Railways to-night. This member of the Government speaking away back in the year 1888 said :

I have repeated and I repeat it again, that the National Policy has reduced the price of everything manufactured in this country. Yes, I could go over the list of one hundred articles in common use in this country : cotton goods, woollen goods, iron goods, agricultural implements, everything that is consumed by the farmers, by the artisans, by all classes of the people, and I could demonstrate one after the other that all these articles are reduced in price on account of the National Policy.

And now we find these gentlemen reducing the protection that is upon certain articles, and saying, that they are going to relieve the country ; while if their previous statements were correct, they benefited the people of this country by their National Policy, making it thereby a means of cheapening the goods that they were using. We heard the Minister of Finance boasting because our trade with Great Britain had increased. We rejoice with him in the increase of trade with Great Britain. We rejoice in the increase of trade with any country ; but for my part I feel that there is a little drawback to the joy which we experience in the extension of our trade with Great Britain, because as I conceive, it has in measure resulted from the fact that another and a better market nearer by has been closed to us, for much we have to sell. Therefore it is that our products, that under more favourable conditions would find a market to the south of us, being shut out from that market, had to find the market that is open for the products of all the world in England ; but they had to take the price that was there offered. The desire of the Liberal party has been, as expressed by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), as embodied in the resolution which contains the policy of the Liberal party ; that we desire an extension of the trade of this country with all nations, but especially with the United States and Great Britain. I believe, Sir, that freer trade relations with the people to the south of us would result in greater prosperity to this country, and we believe it our bounden duty, and the duty of the members of this Government and of any other Government, to do all that they can in a legitimate and honourable way to promote freedom of trade between these two countries. There is a point in the tariff that I would like to ask a little information upon, and that is, with reference to the bounty on iron. If I understood the Finance Minister aright, he said that bounty was to be continued for five years, and if, during the term of five years, any new industry was started in that line, that there should be a continuation to that establishment of the increase of that bounty for five years from the date of its inception. I would ask the Controller of Customs, in the absence of the Finance Minister : Do I understand that it is the policy of the Government, when the present established iron works that are entitled to claim this bounty, will have it for five years from now ; and, say, at the end of four years from now another new establishment starts, that they shall have it five years from that time, but that the present established manufacturers shall not have the benefit of it, say, to the end of the five years ?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Answer.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Perhaps the Minister of Railways, who wanted the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) to give some information on the tariff, would oblige by answering the question.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I do not think it is usual to ask questions of that kind in the course of a debate such as this. When we are in committee, the freedom of committee makes it more convenient, and is the proper time for such questions.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I beg the First Minister's pardon, but the rule he has laid down is something entirely different from anything I ever witnessed for twenty-one years in Parliament. I never knew anything like it. The idea of the Government introducing tariff measures upon which there is no one present who can answer such a simple question, seems to me marvellous. It is especially so in the light of the Minister of Railways complaining that the member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) had not gone into the whole matter in detail and given some information in connection with it. It would seem that the members of the Government certainly require information on the subject.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. That is not the question. It is not a fact that there is nobody present to give information or to answer the question. The hon. gentleman commenced to ask two or three questions about sugar, and they were answered. If the hon. gentleman yields the floor, I presume another gentleman will take it.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Answer.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The hon. gentleman, perhaps, did not understand me. My point was, that it is not consistent with the practice of the House, as regards debate, for an hon. member, in the course of his speech, to put a question to another member of the House. If he does so, it would seem that he should surrender the floor, and the hon. gentleman who takes the floor will continue the debate.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I must remark that this is the first time that I have ever heard such an objection taken, when we have been debating a measure of this kind in Ways and Means, and the first time that I have ever known the Government who introduced such a measure to refuse to give information to an hon. member without his surrendering the floor.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The hon. gentleman knows that he has frequently agreed that the House should go into committee in order that the members might have the freedom that the hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson) claims that he should have without the House going into committee.

Mr. CASEY. Notwithstanding the opinion of the hon. First Minister, it has been the custom, for twenty-two years past, to answer a question casually asked in the course of a speech.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. One or two questions have been answered already, and no objection has been taken; but if there is to be a regular cross-examination, that is another matter.

Mr. CASEY. The hon. gentleman does not like to be cross-examined on his own measure. That seems to be the objection.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. At the proper stage, when the proper time comes for cross-examination, we will not object.

Mr. SPEAKER. It seems to me that it is not improper for the hon. gentleman to ask the question. The Government may or may not answer it.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman shall be answered, and answered fully, at the proper time.

Mr. PATERSON. I have to rejoice that, owing to Mr. Speaker's parliamentary knowledge, I am permitted to take the floor again, which I would not have been permitted to do under the ruling of the hon. First Minister.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Not at all. The hon. gentleman quite misunderstood me.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I will not detain the House much longer. The desirable thing seems to be that we should go into the committee, where we shall get the information that we want. I will simply say to the hon. First Minister that if he thinks I wished to embarrass the Government, he is entirely wrong. I was not sure as to the meaning of the tariff with reference to the sugar duties; and it was no desire to entrap anybody, but with a pure desire to get information that I asked the question. I looked over the 'Citizen,' which was the only means I had of ascertaining what the tariff was, and I found that the wording in regard to the free articles of sugar conflicted with the wording in regard to the dutiable articles, and I asked the question in the hope of having the matter explained. I had a right to expect that the Controller of Customs, who is supposed to know something of these matters in the absence of the Finance Minister, would have been able to answer me; and I had a right to expect that the Finance Minister, if he is well—I hope he is not absent through illness—would be present in the House to answer a question like that. But, Sir, the impression on the minds of the people of this country—an impression which is growing stronger day by day—is that this country is governed by a number of men who are not possessed of business ability to manage the affairs of the country. If there is one feeling that has taken possession of the country more firmly and strongly than another, it is that the men sitting on the Treasury benches are unable to grasp the real condition of the country and to manage its affairs as they ought to be managed. Their action shows their want of ability. They were not able to make up their minds on the tariff last year; that was the first awakening of the country to the fact. With a hundred odd supporters behind them, they could not confer with them in order to find out what changes should be made; but they had to appoint a commission to go through the country, hither and thither; and Parliament has to be delayed to the last moment before they can make up their minds to introduce a tariff measure. And when it is introduced, what do we find? Clerical errors made; members of the Government sitting in their seats, from the First Minister down, unable to state the particulars of the tariff or the items contained in it. Not having furnished the members of the House with a printed list from which they could see for themselves, when information is asked of them, they are not able to give it, but instead, when a member asks for information, they try to deprive him of the floor on false pretenses. Sir, that is their line. But before this tariff discussion is over, we will endeavour in committee to get the information that we have not been able to get at the present time. After refusing the advice and instruction given by the Opposition year after year, by formal resolutions moved in this House, the Government now, years after, come down prepared to eat their own votes and their own speeches, because they know that the people have found out that what the Opposition years ago declared for is in the interest of the country, and they are doing from dread what they did not dare to do before. They present the spectacle in one session of having a royal commissioner sent to negotiate a treaty with a foreign power—a treaty negotiated in the name of the Government and to be ratified by this Parliament—and the hon. gentleman leading the Government declaring that he could not see any good that there was in the treaty, and that he did not know whether they would ratify it or not. Twelve months have gone by, and still they do not know whether they should ratify this treaty or not, until they see a committee of wine growers, and another committee from some other part of Canada, to tell them what they should do about it. With the view of extending foreign trade, they send missions here and missions there, and expend public money for the purpose, without having any return from it all; the volume of trade during the last few years being not much greater than it was during the revenue period fifteen years ago. Cramped and confined as the trade of Canada is, they have been spending millions of money; and they have been going hither and thither throughout the country, trying to tickle the people's ears with tales of this and tales of that, while to-day business is depressed, commerce hampered, and men out of employment to as great an extent, I venture to say, as ever before in this country. While a wave of distress is sweeping over the country, these hon. gentlemen sit there and claim credit for what little prosperity we enjoy. I feel that we are more indebted to Providence in giving us the products of our natural resources than to their management of the finances of the country. Sir, I will not take up any more time. There will be an opportunity to speak on this question when we get into committee. I will therefore take my seat, just simply remarking that I think that in the conduct of the business of this House, we should have opportunities for discussing intelligently these Ways and Means, when, as the hon. Minister of Railways said, there will be some person present to give us information as to what the propositions of the Government are and as to what they expect to achieve by the amendments they have brought down.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

Mr. WALLACE. I move the adjournment of the debate, and before doing so I beg to inform the hon. gentleman who has taken his seat, and who waxed so eloquent in the latter part of his speech over an imaginary grievance, that if he had gone to his box he would have got the printed information which was in every member's box at four or five o'clock in the afternoon.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Not so.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and the House adjourned at 11.45.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, 29th March, 1894.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

OFFICIAL REPORT OF THE DEBATES.

Mr. LaRIVIERE moved:

That the First Report of the Committee appointed to supervise the Official Report of the Debates of this House during the present session be concurred in, with the exception of paragraphs 2 and 3 thereof.

He said: This report comprises four items: 1st, that Mr. A. C. Campbell be appointed to fill the vacancy occasioned by the death of the late Thomas J. Richardson; 2nd, that a certain gratuity be given to the widow of the late Mr. Richardson; 3rd, that an extra allowance be granted the amanuenses for their work last session; 4th, that the quorum of the committee be reduced from 8 to 5 members. The motion I now make is in respect to the first and last items, namely, the recommendation in favour of the appointment of Mr. Campbell, and a reduction of the quorum of the committee.

Motion agreed to, and report concurred in.

RETURNS ORDERED.

Return, showing: 1. How many students have graduated from the Royal Military College since its establishment? 2. How many of these graduates are now in the public service of Canada, and how many in the service of the Imperial Government? 3. How much has been expended on capital account and how much on income since the college was established? 4. How many students graduated in 1893? 5. How many students are now in attendance? 6. What is the total amount of salaries paid each year, of all persons employed in connection with such college? 7. Who is the commandant of the college? What is his salary: what perquisites, if any in the way of free residence, maintenance thereof, supplies, servants or otherwise, does he enjoy? 8. Was a residence for the use of the commandant purchased? If so, what was the purchase money, and what amount has been expended thereon by the Government since the purchase.—(Mr. Mulock.)

Statement showing the amount expended in the province of Nova Scotia since 1878, by counties, on railways, harbours, breakwaters, wharfs and all other public works in said province.—(Mr. Fraser.)

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 14) to amend the Railway Act.—(Mr. Mulock.)

Bill (No. 15) to amend the Act respecting the Senate and the House of Commons.—(Mr. Mulock.)

PREVENTION OF LOTTERIES.

Mr. CHARLTON moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 16) to amend the Criminal Code, 1892, for the purpose of more effectually preventing lotteries.

Mr. LAURIER. Explain.

Mr. CHARLTON. The object of the Bill is to prohibit church raffles and lotteries which are permitted under paragraph "b" of subsection 6 of section 201 of the Criminal Code of 1892; also to strike out paragraph "c" of the same subsection and section, which permits the drawing of paintings, art lotteries, under which a lottery has been established, where prizes are issued to the amount of $100,000. The prizes draw paintings, and the drawer of the painting is permitted to cash the nominal value of it at 50 cents on the dollar. The lottery is nothing more or less than a cash lottery; not as honestly managed as the celebrated lottery of Louisiana, because the discount in this case is 50 per cent instead of 30 per cent as in the other. It is used as a lottery pure and simple, and for that reason I think we are called upon to repeal the clause which permits it.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

CIVIL SERVICE—SUPERANNUATION.

Mr. McMULLEN moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 17) to amend the Civil Service Superannuation Act.

Mr. MULLOCK. Explain.

Mr. McMULLEN. The intention of the Bill is to provide that the superannuation system shall not apply to any person taken into the Civil Service after the passing of the Act. It also provides that those who are now in the Civil Service shall not have the right to elect whether they will continue to participate in the rights of superannuation, or whether they will elect to comply with the provisions of this proposed Act. It also provides that the sum now deducted from the salary of civil servants shall continue to be deducted, and shall bear interest at the rate of 4 per cent on each year, and shall remain at the credit of the civil servant, and shall be paid to him when he retires from the service, or to his legal representatives in the case of his dying in the service. It also provides that it shall in no way affect the rights of those who are now upon the superannuated list.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

FISHERY OVERSEER TIMOTHY McQUEEN.

Mr. CAMPBELL asked, 1. Whether the Government has dispensed with the services of Timothy McQueen, fishery overseer in the county of Kent, Ontario? What were the reasons that induced the Government to dismiss this officer? 3. Has a successor been appointed in his place? If so, when was he appointed? What is his name, and what is his salary?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. 1. The services of Timothy McQueen, overseer, Kent County, Ont., were dispensed with. 2. For failing to prevent illegal fishing in his district and for assisting in a meeting called to protest against the action of the Department of Marine and Fisheries; seining in the River Thames having been prohibited. 3. Mr. Theodore Peltier, of Dover South, was appointed in Mr. McQueen's place on the 2nd November, 1892, at a salary of $150 per annum, being the same as that of his predecessor.

Mr. CHARLTON.

ACCOUNT OF THE EXCHANGE BANK.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT asked, Has the final dividend on account of the Exchange Bank been paid, and if so, what sum remains due to the Government? Have any proceedings been taken to recover the amount due to the Government from the guarantor of the original deposit?

Mr. FOSTER. The answer to the first question is yes; $81,309.63 remains due to the Government. No proceedings have been taken.

MANUALS FOR THE MILITIA.

Mr. HUGHES asked, Why have copies of the new Infantry Drill, 1893, been issued only to officers commanding corps and to officers commanding companies, to the exclusion of field officers and adjutants? To what corps and to what officers in each corps have the Manual of Firing and Bayonet Exercises been issued? Why have they not been issued to the officers in general?

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). I gave instruction some time ago that every officer and non-commissioned officer in the active force should be furnished with copies of these books free of charge. If the order has not been carried out, it is because the supply ran short; but additional books have been ordered, and as soon as they are received the officers and non-commissioned officers will be supplied.

MARTINI-METFORD RIFLES.

Mr. HUGHES asked, 1. What number, if any, Martini-Metford or other new rifles, have been purchased for the militia by the Government during the years 1892-93 and 1893-94? 2. To what corps and under what conditions are those rifles to be issued? 3. Are any further contracts for new rifles made?

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron) Arrangements have been made for the purchase of 91 stand of arms of the Martini-Metford rifles. As none of the new rifles have been yet received in the country, the other questions are somewhat premature.

SUB-COLLECTOR OF CUSTOMS, CAMPBELLFORD.

Mr. McMULLEN asked, 1. If one William Morton, a sub-collector of customs at Campbellford, was suspended for a misappropriation of funds? If so, what was the amount of the misappropriation? 2. Was the said Morton reappointed, and was he again suspended or dismissed for shortage in funds collected, and to what amount? 3. Were his sureties called on to pay the amount of his misappropriation? If so, was the amount collected from his sureties? If not, why not, and what amount yet remains unpaid? 4.

Who were his sureties? 5. Who has been appointed in his place and at what salary? 6. Does the present appointee perform the duties of the position or are they performed by a substitute?

Mr. WALLACE. When the inspector made his inspection at Campbellford in 1892, on the 1st of August, he found the sub-collector to be addicted to the excessive use of intoxicating liquors and that his accounts showed a shortage of $138.21. The officer was placed under suspension. He reformed his habits, immediately made good the amount which was found to be deficient through carelessness, owing to his irregular habits, and on his promising to give up the use of liquor, was reappointed. On the 31st of October, 1893, the records showed that he was behind in his payments $832.80, and he was dismissed. He was called upon for the amount, but failed to make it good. The matter was, therefore, placed in the hands of the Department of Justice, who have instituted proceedings to recover the sum from the sureties. That is the way the matter stands at present. The sureties are H. Dunham and R. Stillman. S. H. Wilson, of the special staff, who is in receipt of a salary of $600, was appointed temporarily to his place; and, as soon as the inspection was completed, the accounts straightened out and the back work caught up. Mr. Henry Dunham was appointed at a salary of $400 per annum, being the same rate as that paid to the former sub-collector. I understand that Mr. Dunham performs the duties.

RETIREMENT OF LIEUT.-COL. VILLIERS.

Mr. HUGHES asked. Under what authority and for what cause was Lieut.-Col. Villiers, late one of the Deputy Adjutants General of Canada, placed on the retired list?

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). Lieut.-Col. Villiers was placed on the retired list by order of His Excellency the Governor General in Council, upon the recommendation of the General Officer Commanding, on account of his advanced age.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE TARIFF.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Foster:

That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go into Committee of Ways and Means; and the motion of Sir Richard Cartwright in amendment thereto.

Mr. WALLACE. Mr. Speaker, before the House adjourned last evening, the hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson) became highly indignant because some of the questions he propounded were not answered. I do not see that hon. member in his place at the moment, but I desire to say that he was informed the day before on the very questions about which he desired the information last night. I will take up a little time of the House by reading from the report of the proceedings of the day before, in reference to a question asked by the hon. member in connection with the bounties paid for the production of iron:

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Will the old concerns go on for five years?

Mr. FOSTER. They go on five years from this date.

Mr. CHARLTON. How will it be in the case of one starting four years from this date?

Mr. FOSTER. It will have the five years' bounty in the same way.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). That one concern, but not the others?

Mr. FOSTER. Not the others.

So that the whole information which the hon. member was so anxious to obtain last night he had already obtained from the hon. Finance Minister. Sir, I was much struck with the brilliant display of fireworks that the hon. member for South Brant presented before the House when he considered himself refused the information that he had already in his possession. He made a long and laboured speech, in which he did not attack the new tariff now submitted by the Government to the House, because it is one which I believe will commend itself to the people of Canada, and I believe he knows it. But, Sir, what was the hon. gentleman's claim? He claimed that this tariff was due to the Opposition—that every concession contained in it had been forced from the Government by the demands of the Opposition. Sir, I repudiate such an assertion. The demands made by the Opposition, during the last half dozen years, were, as the House well knows, demands for Reciprocity and Commercial Union with the United States.

An hon. MEMBER. Not at all.

Mr. WALLACE. Yes; and that we should give to the United States as a natural consequence of their Unrestricted Reciprocity or Commercial Union, the control of the fiscal affairs of this country, and should discriminate against Great Britain; and the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) has again during the last few days announced this to be their policy. These were the proposals made by the Opposition in this House; and when the hon. member for South Brant says that we are borrowing their ammunition, we are in a position to repudiate the charge. We have no sympathy with their objects as laid down in their speeches and resolutions; and the tariff now submitted to the House and the country for approval does not contain one word on the lines laid down by hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House. On the contrary, we have carried out the policy advocated by us successfully before the country during the last fifteen years. We adopted that policy in 1878. The people endorsed it then and have repeatedly endorsed it since, and it is the same policy we are continuing to-day. What has been the policy of the Opposition? It has been one of change from year to year, according as the varying circumstances of their wretched condition demanded, and it has varied in each province of the Dominion to suit the political exigencies of each particular province. Our policy has, on the contrary, been one for the whole Dominion, on the lines laid down in 1878 and steadfastly adhered to ever since. It may be asked, why then make any changes as you are doing? The answer is, there is no policy that is perfect. We are not perfect ourselves, although the country admits that we are a great deal nearer perfection than hon. gentlemen opposite.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. By gerrymander.

Mr. WALLACE. No, sir; not by gerrymander, but by the majority of the votes of the people. The hon. gentleman himself would need a gerrymandered constituency to elect him. I say that we have not changed our policy, but we have adapted the tariff to the changing circumstances and necessities of the country. The conditions have changed, prices have varied, some manufactures have prospered and adapted themselves to the conditions required in the country. Some have not been so successful; and we have, after the most careful examination of every interest—not the manufacturing interest alone, but the mining, farming, and every other interest—after a careful examination into their wants, conditions and circumstances, we have brought down this policy for the approval of this House; and I am gratified to see in the papers to-day that the bankers of this country—the great barometers of the prosperity of the country—have signified their approval of this policy as one calculated, not to demoralize or injure, but to promote every industry in this country. Now, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson) said that we had adopted resolutions forced upon us. He said that the Opposition had led the way, and he particularly referred to the question of sugar. Two years ago, he said, he had made a motion in this House in the line of the change in the sugar duties which we have adopted to-day. Well, if the hon. member for South Brant refers to his policy, and the policy of those acting with him, in recent years, I have already said that we repudiate it. But if he refers to many years before, when he held different opinions, we can endorse, to some extent, at any rate, the views he then held. It may be interesting, more particularly to the younger members of the House, to be informed what were the views of the hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson) before he was coerced by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir

Mr. WALLACE.

Richard Cartwright). Why, the hon. member for South Brant said then that he was a friend of the farmers and bound to give them more protection. In one speech he said:

If he thought that the Administration—that is the Administration of Mr. Mackenzie, of which the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) was Finance Minister—if he thought that Administration was about to retrograde in regard to incidental protection and sweep away the duties he would withdraw his confidence from it, but they had no intimation that such a step was contemplated, and, in point of fact, the contrary was announced.

He said still further:

No doubt throughout the length and breadth of the country this question—the question of protection to agriculture—agitates all classes of our community, how their interests may be bettered, and especially on the part of the farmers for improvement in their condition. The subject is stirring them to their very depths. At my last election when my opponent told them that they need not expect any protection from the Reform Government, I had to assure them that whenever this subject came up in the House I would raise my voice in their behalf.

When did the hon. gentleman ever raise his voice? Perhaps he raised his voice, as the hon. member for Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) once remarked, almost sufficiently to raise the roof. But did he raise his voice in behalf of protection to the agricultural interests of the country to which he had solemnly pledged himself? The record shows that whenever protection to the agricultural interests was proposed, he was always to be found, when he did vote, voting against it. So I might go on quoting the opinions of the hon. gentleman in days gone by. With reference to our hon. friend from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) when he could not abuse the tariff, he did what lawyers are said to do when they have a bad case. He abused the plaintiff's attorney. The hon. gentleman gave his attention to abusing the Finance Minister. Quite the contrary course he took in a recent speech, when inviting an hon. member for this House to join his party, or, at least, referring to him as having joined that party—he then said to the members of the Opposition: You must not jeer at the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy); you must not say anything against him, though the temptation may be great; but you must welcome him in. I will read a few words of what he did say on that occasion, for the edification of the House. In a speech delivered at the Liberal convention held in Ottawa last June, the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) said:

Now, I would like to say a word or two as to our Conservative friends who of late have become free-traders, or perhaps more correctly speaking, the advocates of a revenue tariff. I have noticed in certain quarters a disposition on the part of some of our friends—a natural disposition perhaps—rather to jeer at those gentlemen, who, after all said and done, have merely come back—or forward, whichever way you choose to take it—to the position the Reform party occupied in 1878. You must remember that there is more joy among the angels over one Conservative sinner that repenteth than over ninety and nine just Liberals that need no repentance. Now, from whatever cause it springs, or whatever may be the reason for it, I am exceedingly glad of the change in these men, and I welcome them with the greatest possible pleasure.

In this language, the hon. gentleman welcomed the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) into his ranks, and I am sure, Mr. Speaker, I will be pardoned for emphasizing his reference to the cause for the changed front of these gentlemen.

Now, the hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson) referred to the expenditure of this country. The hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) also referred to it at great length. The Tories, he said, promised us an economical government. Well, Sir, we did, and we are giving it to the country. I shall prove this statement. I shall ask the House to compare our expenditure with that of the Grit Government in the various local legislatures, and see which has redeemed the pledge of economy. The hon. member for South Brant, a year ago, I believe, made the statement: that two millions more were added each year to the public debt during the Tory regime than during the Mackenzie regime. Now, Mr. Speaker, what are the facts with regard to the increase of the public debt? The increase in the public debt during the five years the Reform party was in power was almost exactly forty millions of dollars, or at the rate of eight millions of dollars per annum. The increase of the public debt in the fifteen years of Conservative rule, since that time, has been ninety-eight millions. But, Sir, of this total amount ten millions of dollars represent debts of the provinces which were simply assumed by the Dominion under the Conservative rule; so that the real addition to the debt was eighty-eight millions of dollars. And, if you hold the Conservatives responsible for all the expenditure—and we are quite willing to bear that responsibility—you find that the actual facts are that less than six millions of dollars a year was added to the public debt under Conservative rule, as compared with eight millions of dollars a year added under Reform rule. In our period we have built the Canadian Pacific Railway, enlarged canals, built and bonused other railroads, and opened up and developed every portion of the Dominion. Sir, we further find that, during the time the Reform party were in power, and even after they were removed from office, they made it their boast that the whole increase of the public debt during their regime was because of liabilities incurred by the Conservative party before the first Conservative Government was put out. What does that mean, Mr. Speaker? It means that, during the five years the Reformers were in power, they never initiated a public work, they never expended a dollar to improve the condition of the affairs of this country. And, Sir, the people realized that, and at the very first opportunity they declared their condemnation of such a policy. They said: We do not want a Government that makes it a proud boast that they have never spent a dollar to improve the condition of the people: we want a Government that will undertake so to direct the affairs of the country that the condition of the country shall be made better. Therefore, they applied to the leader of the Conservative party, who listened to their request and assumed the reins of power; and the Conservative party have successfully governed this country ever since. Now, Mr. Speaker, with regard to the annual expenditure, what do we find? We find that, notwithstanding all the services required for the effective carrying on of the affairs of the country, during the last five years the public expenditures on consolidated revenue account have stood at about the same amount—about thirty-six and three-quarters millions of dollars per annum. In 1889 the expenditure was $36,917,000; in 1893 it was $36,814,000, and in the years intervening it has stood practically at the same figures. And how about the public indebtedness? Notwithstanding that we have assumed great responsibilities, notwithstanding that we have carried almost to completion the Sault Ste. Marie Canal, a most important link in the chain of our navigation; notwithstanding that we are enlarging the canals along the St. Lawrence route; notwithstanding that we are promoting public works and railways in every part of the Dominion these past five years—still the public debt increased by only $4,000,000. In 1889 the total was $237,500,000, and in 1893, five years later, it was $241,500,000. Of this increase more than about half was to be accounted for by the fact that we obtained a loan at a lower rate of interest than before, so that amount of that loan is only an imaginary increase of the public debt, the actual increase being not more than $2,500,000, or at the rate of about $500,000 per annum for the period of five years; and this, notwithstanding that we have been carrying on these great public works and in this and every way promoting the prosperity of the country as well as we possibly could. But what is the record of gentlemen opposite or their friends during the past five years, as shown by the financial returns of the various provinces? I take from the year 1888 to the year 1892, not having the returns for last year. By those returns I find that the aggregate annual expenditure of the provinces, almost every one of which was under the administration of hon. gentlemen opposite or their political friends, increased from $9,600,000 to $12,200,000—an increase of $2,600,000, or about 27 per cent. During the same time, as I have shown, the increase of expenditure by the Dominion Government was exactly nothing at all. In view of these facts, we need have no hesitation in asking the people to decide which political party has most faithfully and economically administered the affairs under its charge. Mr. Speaker, a good deal has been said about the condition of the people of this country. No more important subject could engage the attention of Parliament. I think the annual inquiry into the condition of the affairs of the country, the taking stock of the position and the planning for the future which takes place each year in the form of this Budget debate, does much to advance the interests of the country. It has been said by hon. gentlemen opposite, that this country is going backward; that, in particular, the farming interests of this country are retrograding and are not so prosperous as in years gone by, and that, as a whole, the country is not so prosperous as it would be if under their control. Let us examine the facts, Mr. Speaker. I have here a speech delivered by the hon. member for South Oxford, in 1877, when he occupied the position of Finance Minister. In that speech he laid down a number of rules, by which, he said, we could judge of the prosperity of the country. Sir, we accept the rules and conditions which the hon. gentleman then laid down; we say that we believe these are proper rules by which to estimate the prosperity of the people and the condition of affairs in this country. I will read a short portion from the hon. gentleman's Budget speech of 1877:

I find that the general increase in various matters which are usually considered reliable signs of the advancement of the population in wealth have been very marked. For instance, it is very well known that the amount of circulation of a country, at different periods, affords a very tolerable indication of the volume of business done therein; and I find that whereas on the 1st January, 1868, our total circulation amounted to nearly $14,000,000, at the same period of the year 1877 that circulation had increased to $26,000,000 or by nearly 100 per cent. Similarly within the same period, the bank deposits in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec have increased from $29,689,000 to a no less sum than $70,450,000, the absolute increase in that case being 130 per cent; and the deposit in Government savings banks from $1,686,000 to $7,178,000, an increase of fully 400 per cent, which is specially valuable as showing the growth of habits of thrift and frugality among our population. And although I have not accurate statistics on the subject of life insurance, I believe I am correct in saying that within the past five or six years the gross amount of policies of life insurance outstanding in Canada has increased from $35,000,000 to about $85,000,000.

In this statement he has included the 6½ years of Conservative rule from 1867 till 1873, when there was prosperity, with the years of adversity when he guided the helm. I say, Sir, that we accept the standards which the hon. gentleman sets up for judging the condition of the country—the amount of bank deposits, the note circulation and the amount of life insurance. In January, 1879, the public deposits amounted to 91 millions; in January, 1894, they amounted to 242 millions, or an increase of 151 millions, nearly 165 per cent. Our note circulation in banks in the same period increased from 24 millions to 42 millions, or an increase of 75 per cent. Life insurance increased in the same period from $84,750,000 to $261,000,000, or an increase of over 300 per cent. So that, according to the test which the hon. gentleman himself lays down for ascertaining the prosperity of the country, this country has been not only fairly prosperous, but exceedingly prosperous during those fifteen years. Now, I will give you another evidence of the condition of our affairs. I do not think it does any good to magnify unduly the prosperity of the people, and I am equally sure that it does a great deal of injury to this country when gentlemen can be found—

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). What about 1876?

Mr. WALLACE—when gentlemen can be found in this country who make it their business continually to decry the condition of affairs. The hon. member for Bothwell speaks of 1876. Well, was he not at the time chairman of a committee appointed by the Mackenzie Government to consider into the causes of the depression of business that then existed in this country? Did they not acknowledge it themselves, and did he not, for one, try to find a remedy? But not only were they unsuccessful in finding a remedy, they even failed to make a serious attempt to find a remedy for the condition of affairs that then existed.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Do you object to the truth being told?

Mr. WALLACE. I want the truth to be told, but I object to extravagant untruth being told. I am going to tell the hon. gentleman the truth from impartial witnesses. I will quote, first, the opinion of Mr. Walker, general manager of the Bank of Commerce. Mr. Walker, I believe, is not a political friend of ours, but he is a business man, and desires to see the business interests of this country in a prosperous position. He has, perhaps, more opportunities of ascertaining the business state of the people of this country, of farmers, of mechanics and of business men generally, than any other man outside those lines. The Bank of Commerce has its branches and its ramifications over all portions of the province of Ontario. This is what he says:

The wide range of machines and other articles manufactured to aid the farmer in his operations, constitute such an important share of our manufactures, that we have regarded the extent to which the farmer buys and pays for such goods as fair evidence for or against his prosperity. Quoting from sales and collections running into several millions of dollars, we find that in Ontario farmers paid their paper without renewal to the extent of over 96 per cent.

If we turn to the agricultural interests of Ontario, whether the farmers complain or not, we can find little that is not satisfactory. From every part of Ontario our managers make pretty much the same report. The farmers have more than offset the low price for grain by the high prices for cheese and hogs. Or, we are told that the farmers owing to the low prices of wheat are year after year turning their attention more to dairying, cattle grazing, fattening hogs, or fruit growing. Again, we are told that in many counties the farmers are still holding last year's wheat and in some localities two or three years' crops of wheat. This may be a very foolish thing for a farmer to do, but let us bear in mind that he is financially able to do it. From the same counties we have the information—in fact there are very few exceptions throughout Ontario—that the deposits in banks are increasing, that farmers' notes for implements are promptly paid, that he does not want to borrow from the banks, and is meeting the interest—and to some extent reducing the principal—on his mortgages also, that there is no demand for mortgage loans, and that upon mortgages subject to repayment many good farmers are demanding a reduction in the rate of interest.

That is the opinion of one well qualified to know the facts. He is head of the second largest bank in the Dominion of Canada, and is responsible to hundreds and thousands of people for a correct report of the business of the country. Now, we have other evidence which I intend to submit. Mr. Joseph Jeffery, president of the Ontario Loan and Debenture Company, wrote to the 'Globe' last August as follows:—

Statements are often made in the papers which give the impression that the people of the whole country, particularly the farmers, are groaning under heavy mortgage indebtedness. This is not true. Take, for example, this county (Middlesex). I am positive that in this city (London) and surrounding country not one property in ten is mortgaged and no doubt the same can be said of most of the old-settled portions of the country. The experience of this company is that farmers are paying off their loans and that very few are borrowing. We, in common with all the loan companies in this part of Ontario, find it difficult to obtain farm loans. They have largely decreased, and other investments have in part taken their place.

The president of the Western Canada Loan and Savings Company, at the annual meeting in Toronto, on February 15th last, spoke as follows:—

Improved farms are more in demand and bring better prices, and with the greater attention now being paid to dairying and stock-raising, and a better and more intelligent system of farming which is now being adopted, we may hope that farm property in Ontario will ere long recover to a great extent its former value.

Now, Sir, an hon. gentleman opposite said that we objected to speak the truth. Does he say that these gentlemen are not speaking the truth? Our friends opposite do not dare to quote these remarks to show the real state of affairs. I believe this is the real condition of affairs in this country, and it is a satisfactory one, if we compare it with the condition of the same class of people in any other country to-day. But I have further evidence to submit to this House which hon. gentlemen opposite cannot dispute, and that is the evidence of the Ontario Government. They have a special commissioner whose object it is, at great expense and with much trouble, to ascertain the condition of the farmers of this country. From various sources it is his business to procure returns of the value of farm property, of farm implements, of farm buildings and farm stock; and I intend to submit his report to this House, in answer to the statement made by the hon. member for South Oxford yesterday. He made the statement that every acre of farm land in Ontario had depreciated $10 per acre. The hon. member for Bothwell nods his head in approval. Well, I will quote for his benefit from Sir Oliver Mowat, for whom that hon. gentleman has a high regard.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). But you have not.

Mr. WALLACE. I am not submitting the evidence to myself. I am submitting it to the hon. gentlemen on the other side.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). It is not honest to submit bad evidence.

Mr. WALLACE. If he says it is bad evidence he is condemning his leader in Ontario.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). But you say it is.

Mr. WALLACE. I have not said so. I say that although a man may have many bad qualities, we may still extract some truth from him, and I think we have got some truth here. Now, this report contains a comparison made between the years 1882 and 1892; 1882, I believe, was the year in which the Ontario Government began to make these reports. I will quote the first year covered by the report and the last year, which will surely be sufficient to give a general idea of the condition of affairs during that period of ten years. The report says that the value of farm lands in Ontario, in 1882, was six hundred and thirty-two millions; in 1892 it had decreased to six hundred and fifteen millions, or an actual decrease of $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. That is Mr. Mowat's report. The value of buildings in 1882 was one hundred and thirty-two millions; in 1892 it was one hundred and ninety-five millions, or an increase of 45 per cent in the value of farm buildings. In 1882 implements were valued at \$37,029,815; in 1892 at \$51,000,000, or an increase of 40 per cent during the decade. Live stock was valued in 1882 at \$80,540,720; in 1892 at \$117,501,495, or 45 per cent of an increase. I submit this evidence to hon. gentlemen and they can accept it, or reject it as worthless, but it is the evidence procured by the Mowat Government at very great expense. I think the evidence is pretty nearly an accurate representation of the truth. It shows an increase in the value of farms, buildings, stock and implements of \$97,300,000.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Did the increase take place during that period?

Mr. WALLACE. Yes.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). So the brick houses and the wooden buildings have been increasing in value as they become older.

Mr. WALLACE. That may be a very clever remark on the part of the hon. gentleman, but if he travels through the country he will see that the old log and wooden houses are being replaced by substantial brick ones.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). What do you allow for the improvements?

Mr. WALLACE. Mr. Mowat says the buildings have increased in value by $63,000,000 during that period.

I should like to ask the hon. gentleman opposite to name any other industry in this country that has increased during the same period to the extent of $97,000,000. Have cotton goods increased in value? They have decreased largely. The same remark applies to woollen goods, and in regard to iron there has also been a decrease. Yet we find the net results as regards the farming community in Ontario is an increase of $97,000,000.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Then you are not helping the distress with your tariff?

Mr. WALLACE. We are promoting the prosperity of this country, and these figures show it. I have further evidence at hand. There is a Liberal Government, I believe, in power in the province of New Brunswick.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) No.

Mr. WALLACE. I know that the Premier of the Government attended and took a prominent part in the Reform Convention that was held in Ottawa last summer. Surely he did not go there under false pretenses.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) There is a majority of Conservatives in the Government.

Mr. WALLACE. I am glad to hear that, for it shows there is some hope for New Brunswick. Mr. Mitchell is the Provincial Treasurer, and he delivered his Budget speech on March 21st.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) And he is a good Tory too.

Mr. WALLACE. He said:

He felt on the present occasion he could congratulate the House and the country on the prosperous conditions of affairs generally. The past year has been a fairly prosperous one. The farmers had had good crops and hundreds were returning to the province, from countries where want and destitution prevailed, satisfied that after all there were many worse countries in the world than New Brunswick. The people of this province should be happy in the knowledge that hunger and famine were unknown here, that every man who desired work could secure it, at good wages.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. They were thankful for small mercies.

Mr. WALLACE. That is a pretty good report for New Brunswick. What is the condition of affairs in other countries? The Minister of Agriculture in England, addressing a deputation of agriculturists, spoke as follows—

Mr. LANDERKIN. He is out of office now, and he is a Tory.

Mr. WALLACE. Yes, he is a Tory. The hon. member from South Grey (Mr. Landerkin) is out of office now, and he is not a Tory, and indeed the Tories would not have him. Mr. Chaplin, addressing a deputation of agriculturists lately, said:

He recognized with pleasure that there were among the deputation a large proportion of genuine and unmistakable representatives of the class who earned their livelihood by actual labour on the land. They lived in times when the agricultural interests of Great Britain had been passing through a period of great depression by which landlords and owners of the land, tenant farmers and occupiers and those who gained their livelihood by actual work on the land had been sorely affected in a greater or less degree. There was no one connected with the land but felt the effect of the strain of that depression, the consequences and gravity of which could not be estimated.

That is the condition of affairs in the old country, where they have the blessings of free trade, and where they have the policy which hon. gentlemen opposite would have us adopt here, but which I think we are not yet prepared to adopt.

Mr. LANDERKIN. That is treasonable towards the mother country.

Mr. WALLACE. Hon. gentlemen opposite have been speaking at great length in the country, but not quite so much lately as formerly, about the inestimable blessings of free trade with the United States. We as the Conservative party have been advocating the desirability of extending our trade relations with every country, but not at the sacrifice of our honour and our interests. We are willing, as our tariff from one end to the other shows, to promote trade with the United States on fair and equitable terms, which will meet with the approval of the people of this country, but we are not prepared to sacrifice ourselves in any way.

Mr. MULOCK. To stab her in her vital parts.

Mr. WALLACE. The hon. gentleman is fond of quoting from the editor of the 'Globe'; he appears to be very familiar with that traitorous pamphlet published by Farrer, pointing out to Americans how they could inflict the greatest injury upon Canadians, or as he puts it—"stab her in her most vital parts."

An hon. MEMBER. Hear, hear.

Mr. WALLACE. I say our farmers are desirous of promoting trade with the United States, if we can do it fairly and honourably, and in the propositions we have laid before the House we propose to trade our barley for American corn on fair and reasonable terms. In the other resolutions we are prepared to meet the Americans half-way and equitably, and in the tariff throughout, which provides for a lower rate of duty than the United States tariff, we have indicated our intention of doing everything that is reasonable and proper to promote trade with the United States. But the importance of that trade has been very greatly exaggerated. The fact is that year by year our trade with the United States has been decreasing, while year by year our trade with Great Britain has enormously increased.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). No, no.

Mr. WALLACE. Does the hon. gentleman mean to say it has not increased?

Mr. CHARLTON. Yes.

Mr. WALLACE. I will quote the figures, and the House will be able to judge. Our exports of agricultural products and animals and their products to the United States during the last year of the Mackenzie Government was $13,144,405; in 1890, $13,485,727; in 1891, $11,608,225; in 1892, $8,509,703.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) What figures is the hon. gentleman quoting?

Mr. WALLACE. Our exports of domestic produce to the United States, which was, as I have said, $8,509,703 in 1892, and $8,083,955 in 1893. It was estimated by a very prominent member of the Opposition, Mr. James Young, and a similar estimate was made by Mr. Archibald Blue, a commissioner of the Ontario Government, that the products of the Canadian farms amounted to $400,000,000 per annum. Of this $400,000,000 about $54,000,000 worth last year were exported into foreign countries, and of this latter sum $8,000,000 in round numbers were sent to the United States, and how much to Great Britain? Over $42,000,000 were sent to Great Britain, and not one-fifth of that amount to the United States.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Will the hon. gentleman state our exports to the United States?

Mr. WALLACE. Our exports of farm products to the United States were in 1879, $13,000,000; in 1890, $13,500,000; in 1892, $8,500,000; and in 1893, $8,000,000 worth.

Mr. LISTER. What are the total exports?

Mr. WALLACE. The total exports to the United States in the year 1893 were $33,000,000 worth, and to Great Britain there were $58,000,000 worth, or $25,000,000 more than to the United States. Now, Sir, the United States, as every hon. gentleman knows, are competitors against our agricultural products in all the markets of the world. They grow the same articles that we do; they supply themselves and more than supply themselves, and their surplus products are sent to Great Britain and to other foreign markets in competition with ours. It is admitted that our products, whether of mineral or of cereals, are of better quality than those out of the United States, and therefore they command higher prices. In many instances the animals or the cereals of Canada on account of their superior qualities, are in demand in the United States, although that country's products, whether of minerals or of cereals, are as of good a quality.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I am sorry to interrupt the hon. gentleman, but I want to ask a question. Did I understand him to say that that was our total exports to the United States in 1892?

Mr. WALLACE. Of agricultural products.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I did not know you limited it to that.

Mr. WALLACE. I quoted both the agricultural products and the total exports. The agricultural products, I said, were $8,000,000 in 1893. The total exports from Canada to the United States in 1893, not only of agricultural products, but of lumber and of every other product which we have to export, amounted to $33,800,000, and I also said that our exports to Great Britain were $25,000,000 more than that, or $58,500,000.

Mr. CHARLTON. Would the hon. gentleman repeat the statement with regard to the export of the agricultural products for the different years?

Mr. WALLACE. I quoted the figures for the years 1879, 1890 and 1891. I have my figures here and they are correct, but I cannot help it if I cannot drive them into the heads of hon. gentlemen. These figures surprise hon. gentlemen opposite, and I do not wonder at it; they go up and down the country always expressing intense interest in the farmers, but have never apparently taken the trouble to inquire where his most advantageous markets are located. If they possessed the knowledge and have refrained from using it, what can have been the cause but to seek to induce one of the most important classes in the country that their interests lie in forwarding some commercial reciprocity fad, which, as an actual fact, would be injurious to them. I have already repeated the figures twice, and they will be published in the 'Hansard', and the hon. gentleman will see that they are correct.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) They seem to differ with the Trade and Navigation Returns.

Mr. WALLACE. The figures I have given are correct. The export of agricultural products, both of animals and cereals from Canada to the United States last year amounted to $8,083,000, and to Great Britain they were $42,495,000. That is the relative value of the two markets.

Mr. CHARLTON. What were they in 1879?

Mr. WALLACE. In 1879, the exports to Great Britain were $19,000,000, and to the United States they were $13,000,000. Now the volume of exports has changed, and to-day amount to $42,000,000 to Great Britain and $8,000,000 to the United States. I give those figures in round numbers. Our market with Great Britain is increasing enormously year by year. Look back to the last four years and what do you find as regards the development of our trade in this direction? Four years ago our trade with Great Britain in the products of the farm was $22,000,000, the following year it was $26,000,000; the next year it was $39,000,000, and last year it was $42,500,000.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). They have no McKinley Bill in Great Britain.

Mr. WALLACE. No, nor they are not going to have one either, because the members of the Reform party have not so much influence with the British Government as they have at Washington. Now, we will take a few items of the products of the Canadian farm and see where they go after we have supplied the wants of our own people in this country. The following figures will show this to the hon. gentleman. Here are the relative exports to Great Britain and to the United States:

| | To Great Britain. | To U.S. |
|--------------|-------------------|-------------|
| Cattle..... | $ 7,402,208 | $ 11,032 |
| Meats..... | 3,019,842 | 9,880 |
| Butter..... | 1,118,614 | 7,539 |
| Cheese..... | 13,360,237 | 23,578 |
| Wheat..... | 6,666,382 | 246,568 |
| Oats..... | 2,137,145 | 22,223 |
| Pease..... | 1,795,758 | 427,136 |
| Flour..... | 851,026 | 7,030 |
| Apples..... | 2,247,482 | 447,249 |
| Oatmeal..... | 503,294 | 115,962 |
| Totals..... | $39,101,988 | $1,318,197 |

Or, summing up these articles I have enumerated, $39,100,000 worth went to Great Britain and $1,300,000 went to the United States, or more than thirty times as much were sent to Great Britain as to the United States. An hon. gentleman opposite asked me what about horses. I will tell him. In 1890 were sent to Great Britain $17,900 worth, and in 1893 we had increased that trade to $274,000 worth. In 1890 we sent of eggs to Great Britain $820, and last year we sent $538,000 worth, and the trade is still growing. In 1890 we sent of barley to Great Britain $12,000 worth, and last year we sent $278,000. In 1890 we sent of hay to Great Britain $109,000 worth, and last year we sent $515,000, or nearly five times as much. Adding these four articles, against which the McKinley Bill was most pointedly directed, we find that four years ago our total exports to Great Britain of these articles was $140,000, and that last year they had increased nearly twelve-fold, or $1,607,000. In that fact we have some signs of hope even in these very articles which were most injuriously affected by the operation of the McKinley Bill, for we have the evidence here that we have opened up a profitable market with Great Britain in the same commodities. The hon. gentleman opposite last night quoted figures to apparently sustain his statement that we were discriminating in our policy against Great Britain. Sir, I deny that. It is true that many articles come from the United States into Canada; but why was that? It is because they were the raw materials of our manufactures, such as cotton, manilla, and other raw material which are free of duty. But, Sir, what about the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite when they were in office, discriminating against Great Britain? In 1878, the imports from Great Britain amounted to $37,000,000, and the duty paid was $6,445,000, or exactly 17½ per cent. The imports from the United States during the same year were $48,600,000, and the duty paid was $4,794,000, or 9¾ per cent on imports coming from the United States, as against 17½ per cent imposed on British products. They imposed nearly twice as much duty on products from Great Britain as they did on products coming from the United States, and yet these hon. gentlemen say we are discriminating against Great Britain. I notice, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) did not pay much attention to the census, and to what he calls the exodus from this country this year as he has done on former occasions; though he did repeat his old platitudes, his old stories, and his old calculations, which are utterly devoid of accuracy, as I shall attempt to prove. What are the facts? The hon. gentleman says that the natural increase of population in Canada should be 2½ per cent per annum, while the records show that that is far too high. It is too high, if you take Great Britain, the United States, or other countries as the standard. But, Sir, applying the same rule and the same calculations to the census of the United States that the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) has applied to Canada—and I think hon. gentlemen will say that that is fair—what do we find? The population of the United States in 1880 was 50,200,000; the increase at 2½ per cent would be 13,500,000; the immigration was 5,850,000, which would have made the population of the United States in 1890 69,550,000. But the census returns showed only 62,500,000 people actually in the United States in 1890. What became of the other 7,000,000 people? Applying the same argument to the United States as the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) applied to Canada, there must have been an exodus of 7,000,000 people from the United States. Where have they gone—to Africa, or to Manitoba? This clearly shows the absurdity of the whole calculation of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). A short time ago I read with pleasure an editorial from the 'Daily Telegraph,' of St. John, N.B., a Liberal organ, but one which is evidently patriotic, which has the interest of the country at heart, and which I am sure has no sympathy with the assertions made by hon. gentlemen opposite with regard to the distressed condition of affairs in Canada. I will read a portion of the article, to which, I am sure, the hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Gillmor) will listen with pleasure. It says:

The other day we commented on the fact that a large number of natives of New Brunswick, who had gone to the United States to improve their condition, were returning to their former homes, considerably poorer as well as wiser by reason of their experience. The homeward rush from the States still continues, and we are informed that about 120 persons daily pass through St. John station on their return to the Maritime Provinces. If account were taken of those who are returning to homes on the western side of the river, or the up-river counties, it would probably be found that at least 200 persons a day are coming into the province alone. When the other channels of communication, by which persons reach the Maritime Provinces, are taken into account, such as the International steamships to this port, and the boats running to Yarmouth, Annapolis and Halifax, it will be seen that the returning wave of population is of very large dimensions and must make a very appreciable difference in the industrial condition of the Maritime Provinces, especially when it is considered that the majority of these people are young men in the prime of their vigour. There is no doubt that many of them had substantial reasons for going, in the lack of encouragement to remain at home, while many of them were frightened out of the country by the jeremiads of foolish newspaper writers—

And politicians too, they might have said—

—whose limited brain power enabled them to discern no other way of obtaining a political advantage but by depicting Canada as a lost and ruined country. We expect to see in New Brunswick during the next few years a surprising development in the utilization of our natural resources, and the increase of our trade, and while no doubt young men will continue to go abroad to seek their fortune, it will not be for the lack of work at home, and most of them after a trial of a foreign land, as hewers of wood and drawers of water for strangers, will be glad to return and spend the remainder of their days in their native province.

I commend that article, written by a Liberal in politics, to the kind consideration of hon. gentlemen opposite. Now, I have a return here, made out not long ago in my own department in answer to a request, showing the number of families of immigrants registered at several customs ports in the Eastern Townships during the calendar year 1893, with their nationality and the value of their effects. At the port of Sherbrooke the number of families was 778; at Rimouski, 253, their nationality Canadian; at Coaticook, 97, nine-tenths French-Canadian; at Hemmingford, 26, 11 English and 15 French-speaking Canadian; at Potton, 20, 13 Canadian and 7 American; and at Sutton, 471, nine-tenths Canadian, or a total in that part of Canada of 1,645 families. We have not the return of the number in each family, but if we take five to be the average, it means that 8,225 people, most of them returning Canadians, have come into that portion of the province of Quebec during the last year. But let me give another test of the accuracy of the statements made by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). From the American census returns he gives the number of Canadians in the United States in the years 1870, 1880 and 1890. But what do those figures show? They show that the percentage of Canadians in the United States in the ten years preceding 1870 had increased 34½ per cent; in the ten years preceding 1880, five years of which time hon. gentlemen opposite were in power, they had increased 45½ per cent, and in the ten years preceding 1890 they had increased 36½ per cent. Now, Mr. Speaker, I only wish to say, in conclusion, what I said at the beginning, that this Government has honestly and fairly undertaken to redeem the pledges made by the hon. Premier about fifteen months ago, and repeated in Parliament during last session. It was stated then that the Government would revise the tariff, would change any conditions that were found to be inequitable, and would ascertain, by a thorough examination of every industry and every class of the population, what the people of this country required. Sir, we have done so. The hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson) would sneer at the members of the Government going up and down this country in order to make inquiries. It is true, Mr. Speaker, that is not what hon. gentlemen opposite did when they were in power. When they were in power everybody had to come to see them, and if they were not in extremely good humour, the people could not see them when they got here. The hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) has informed us that when people came to see him in regard to the tariff he told them to pay a visit to his Satanic Majesty. Well, Sir, the people did not take his advice, and they have not done so since. They went back and resolved that they would put in a Government in sympathy with the people of this country, willing to redress any grievances that existed, and ready to devote themselves to the people's welfare. We have done so. In every line of our tariff, the policy and the principle of protection was held steadily in view. We believe that this country can only be built up by adhering to the policy of protection—the policy of giving employment to our own people by encouraging the farming, manufacturing, mining, fishing and other industries. This is what we have attempted to do; and I believe that when the new tariff comes into operation, the affairs of this country will be conducted even more successfully than in the past. We have confidence in the people. What is there in the Grit proposals to attract them? Read over the resolutions. There is not one line of hope or confidence, not one line of what will attract the young men of the country to their side; and the young men are not going over to the side of hon. gentlemen opposite. They are adhering to the policy of the Conservative party, because it is one of hope and confidence in the future of the country. We have continued that policy in our new tariff, and have no hesitation in appealing to the members of this House and the people outside for the approval of the policy now submitted to the House and country.

Mr. CHARLTON. The hon. Controller of Customs made some statements in the course of his remarks, to one or two of which I shall allude in a preliminary way before entering upon the lines of the discussion which I propose to pursue to-day. At the outset of his speech, the hon. gentleman informed us that the chief demand of the Opposition, so far as their policy is concerned, had been, and still was, for commercial union with the United States. Sir, the hon. gentleman was not warranted in making that assertion. It is utterly destitute of foundation. The Liberal party of Canada have never formulated any such policy. No resolution is on record proposed by any member of the Liberal party in this House in favour of commercial union with the United States. And the assertion of the hon. gentleman, if not made in ignorance, was made purposely to prejudice the people of the country with regard to the policy of the party now in Opposition. Individual members of the party may possibly have expressed their individual opinions as being favourable, in the abstract, to such a policy, but it has not been advocated or sanctioned by the party. It has never been advanced by the party. The party does not stand upon, and never did stand upon, that policy. The policy of the Liberal party with regard to reciprocity has been in favour of a wide measure of reciprocal trade with the United States. What the extent of that measure of reciprocal trade might be has never been and cannot be defined, because, before doing so it would be necessary to enter into communication with the United States in order to ascertain to what extent both countries could agree to such reciprocity. And the Liberal party is not disposed to go further in the way of making concessions to the United States than is absolutely necessary in order to get concessions from the United States beneficial to our interests.

The hon. gentleman, while lauding the present tariff and the general policy of the Government, told us that some manufacturers in this country have prospered, and inadvertently mentioned that some have not. I shall later on prove satisfactorily that the manufacturing industries of Canada were, on the whole, more prosperous in 1878 than in 1893. And when the hon. gentleman tells us that some only of the manufacturing industries of this country have prospered under the operation of the National Policy, I tell him that the great mass of them are not in as good and healthy a position to-day as they were when the National Policy was first instituted.

The hon. gentleman says that the changes now proposed in our tariff are not in the direction of demands made by the Liberal party. I affirm the contrary. I say that these changes are in the direction of demands made by the Liberal party. I say that they are in consequence of demands made by the Liberal party—in consequence of the education the country has received at the hands of the Liberal party, which has created a sentiment in the country that demanded these changes. And in consequence of that sentiment and in obedience to those demands made by the people thus educated, the Government were compelled to make these concessions in the line of the Liberal policy. The concessions they have made do not go as far as the Liberal party would go, but every step taken has been taken in the direction of Liberal demands; and not a step would have been taken but for the influence exerted by the Opposition upon public sentiment, which influence has reacted upon the Government.

My hon. friend the Minister of Finance, my hon. friend the Controller of Customs, and other members of the Government, visited, during the past year, various parts of the country. They made their journey ostensibly for the purpose of learning what were the necessities of the public and what it was best to do in the public interest. That was the ostensible purpose. Do you suppose, Mr. Speaker, that that was the real purpose. You and I, Sir, both know better. The people at large may possibly believe such a statement, but we understand political movements too well to be deceived by it. Let me reproduce a scene which probably did transpire more than once between the Minister of Finance and individuals whom he met representing manufacturing interests. We will suppose that he has called some of these gentlemen interested in manufacturing to meet him in the city of Toronto, for instance, and they have gathered together. The reporters are not invited because it is not a public, but a private meeting. The information is not for the public at large, but the Minister of Finance simply meets a few of his manufacturing friends, who perhaps have given contributions in the past to prosecute electioneering work. The inquiry opens. How do you suppose it proceeds? The Minister of Finance proceeds to inform these gentlemen why he has called them together. He says: My friends, you must be aware that a considerable change in public sentiment has taken place. You must know that great pressure is brought to bear on the Government for tariff concessions. The Government feels this pressure; the Government feels it has got to do something; and I have called you together in order to discuss this matter with you and find out how big a cut you can stand. Now, we have got to do something. The people demand something, and if we go to the country without some concessions in this tariff policy, we will be inevitably defeated. And I want you to look the situation in the face, fairly and squarely, and to realize that unless you determine to make some sacrifice, unless you are prepared to remit some of the taxes we have imposed for your benefit, unless you will act liberally and fairly to us, and consent to forego some of the burdens imposed on the people in your behalf, you will fall into worse hands than ours—you will fall into the hands of the Philistines. It is for you to determine whether you will permit us to make such concessions to public sentiment as may, to some extent, meet the public demands, or whether you will insist upon our occupying the position we now occupy with regard to your interests and thus drive us from power. The manufacturers have taken this into consideration. They are astute men, as a rule. They would naturally say: Well, half a loaf is better than no bread; we cannot afford to leave our friends who made this tariff for us, who have always regulated it to suit us, who have invariably met our demands hitherto (and would do it to-day if they could) to be driven from power; we must permit some concessions. And then and there the Minister of Finance and the representatives of the manufacturing interests would decide how far they could go, the understanding being governed, not by considerations of public interest, but, on the part of the Government, by considerations of how much they could be allowed to do, and, on the part of the manufacturers, by considerations of how much it would be absolutely necessary to allow the Government to do. That is the way these concessions have been arrived at and arranged. The manufacturing interests cannot reasonably find fault with the consideration the hon. gentleman has given to them, but there are other business interests of far greater importance to the welfare of the country than the manufacturing interests that have not received that consideration from the hon. gentleman to which they were entitled. The farmers of this country, the lumbermen, the fishermen, the mine owners, the labourers of the country—all these interests, Sir, have received scant consideration at the hands of the Government, whose thought has been directed almost exclusively to the welfare of one interest—the manufacturing interest of this country. Had they looked around they could have seen, with regard to the farmer, shrunken values in land, and in some of his principal articles of production; they might have seen farmers feeding wheat to hogs, because it was cheaper feed than any coarse grain; they might have seen the farmers suffering severely the pinch of hard times. And yet the Government has not been disposed to extend a helping hand to this great industry, but has reserved all its favours, and all its consideration for one interest which is infinitely less important to the country, infinitely smaller than this great agricultural interest of Canada. Sir, my friend, the Controller of Customs mentions it as a matter of congratulation that there is no starvation, there is no want in New Brunswick.

Mr. LISTER. No famine.

Mr. CHARLTON. And no famine. Certainly that is a matter for us to congratulate ourselves upon. There is food enough, but there is not prosperity among these people.

Now the Government has pursued a policy, whenever a manufacturing interest would present a claim for removal of duties upon the raw product it used in its business, to listen to those demands. I have here a list of Orders in Council by which the Government, from time to time, has removed the duty on various articles which enter as raw material into manufacture in this country. For instance, here is an Order in Council of Nov. 6th, 1885, removing the duty from crucible steel. Here is another of the same date removing the duty from lastings and mohair cloth to be used in the manufacture of buttons. Another, dated July 5th, 1886, removing the duty from hatters' bands, bindings, tips, and sides, and linings, both tips and sides imported for the use of hatters; another of July 17th, 1886, removing the duty from steel strip for buckthorns, and plain strip fencing; another of July 17th, removing the duty from wire rope, imported for use in ship building; another of July 20th, 1886, removing the duty from twisted brass and copper wire, used by boot and shoemakers; another of Nov. 18th, 1886, removing the duty from yarn, spun from the hair of the alpaca or angora goat, to be used in the manufacture of braid; another of Nov. 16th, removing the duty from felles of hickory wood, imported for the use of my hon. friend from Leeds (Mr. Taylor) and other gentlemen engaged in carriage-making.

Mr. BERGIN. Do not the farmers use these materials ?

Mr. CHARLTON. Unquestionably they do in some cases, but the duties are removed for the benefit of the manufacturers, and because these articles are required by the manufacturers in their business.

Mr. BERGIN. So that the farmers may buy the manufactured articles at a lower rate.

Mr. CHARLTON. I have here another Order in Council of Dec. 6th, 1888, removing the duty from homo spring steel smaller than No. 9 and not smaller than No. 15, used in the manufacture of mattresses ; another of July 1st, 1887, removing the duty from sweat leathers imported into Canada for the use of harness-making ; another of July 2nd, 1887, removing the duty from square reeds, rawhide centres, textile leather or rubber heads, thumbs and tips, and steel iron or nickel caps for whip ends, imported for use in whip making ; another of Nov. 22nd, 1887, removing the duty from copper rollers used by print makers ; another of July 11th, 1888, removing the duty from steel, No. 12 gauge, and down to No. 30 gauge, imported for manufacturing purposes ; another of July 7th, 1888, removing the duty from yarns, woollens, and worsted, imported into Canada for manufacturing purposes ; another of July 11th, 1888, removing the duty from jute, jute yarn, cotton yarn, finer than No. 40, imported for manufacturing purposes. These Orders in Council have been passed for the purpose of cheapening the raw material of the manufacturers interested, who have come to the Government and represented that their interest was burdened by these taxes. And yet here has been the greatest industry of this country, the most important interest in the country, asking the Government to remove the duties from its raw material—the corn it feeds to its cattle, the harvesters, the mowers, the barbed wire, the coal oil, the binding twine, the thousand and one articles that are the raw material of this great industry—and, year after year, the Government has turned a deaf ear to their entreaties, while, in all the instances that I have mentioned, when manufacturing interests have gone to the Government, their wants have been instantly recognized, and their petitions granted. Now, Sir, I say that the farming interest of this country has not been fairly dealt with by the Government, and the Government does not deserve, at the hands of this great interest, confidence or thanks for the eleventh hour repentance so small in its fruits, which does not remove, but, only in some cases, mitigates the burdens under which the agricultural interest has struggled. The farming interest asked for the removal of the duty on coal oil. The Government has not removed that duty, but has permitted it to remain at from eighty to one hundred per cent. The farmers asked for the removal of the duty on barbed wire, and the Government has lowered it by half. They asked for the removal of the duty on binder twine, and the Government has done nothing with regard to it. The Government, it is true, has placed agricultural implements in the 20 per cent list, but it continues the power with which the customs officer is invested of making a re-entry, and thus practically putting his own valuation on the article, disregarding the invoice which represents its actual cost, a provision under which the customs officer, if he chooses, can make the actual duty 35 per cent, though the nominal duty is only 20 per cent. The Government refuses to make the provision it ought to make for the entering of these articles at the actual cost, without putting such dangerous and arbitrary power into the hands of the customs officers. The Government imposes a duty of 30 per cent on nails, 35 per cent on axes, spades, shovels, forks, keeps corn on the dutiable list, professes to have cheapened the cost of sugar, and it has taken off a miserable 16-100 of a cent on the protection afforded to the refiner of sugar, and the mitigation of the burden with regard to sugar will never be appreciable to the farmers of Canada. In the United States, under the Wilson Bill, the protection accorded to the refiner is about 3-10 of a cent per pound, here it is 6-100 of a cent a pound. It is held in the United States that the retention of that protection of 3-10 of a cent is an outrage, and is contrary to the interests of the consuming population of that country. If that is so, it is a double outrage on the people of Canada to retain the protection of more than 6-10 of a cent a pound as is done by this tariff.

Now, the American Committee having in charge the tariff of that country, has made an offer to this country and to other countries with regard to agricultural implements. It places on the free list agricultural implements, including ploughs, tooth and disc harrows, harvesters, reapers, agricultural drills, planters, mowers, horse rakes, cultivators and threshing machines—all these are placed upon the free list, with this proviso :

Provided that all the articles mentioned in paragraph 591, when imported from any country which lays an import duty on like articles coming from the United States, shall be subject to the duties existing prior to the passage of this Act.

Mr. BERGIN. Does the hon. gentleman wish to give the House the impression that that has become law ?

Mr. CHARLTON. I do not. I wish to give the House the impression that this is a provision of the Wilson Bill, having passed the ordeal of the House of Representatives, having passed the ordeal of the Finance Committee of the Senate, and is now before the Senate of the United States. I wish to say, and I would have said, had the hon. gentleman given me time, that that provision will undoubtedly be incorporated in the Bill when it is crystallized into law. Now, I asked the Finance Minister the other night what he proposed to do, not with regard to this matter, not assuming that it was a fixed fact, but what he proposed to do in the event of this becoming the law of the United States, and in the event of the boon being offered to Canada of having the privilege of buying agricultural implements free of duty, if the Government of Canada would reciprocate and allow the manufactures of the United States to come into the markets of Canada free of duty. I got very little satisfaction from the hon. gentleman, and I assume that he does not propose to give that boon to the farmers of Canada, and that we will in the future, as we have done in the past, continue to pay a duty upon American implements because the Government will not admit American implements into Canada free of duty under an offer to reciprocate on the part of the United States by admitting our implements into that country free of duty.

Mr. BERGIN. The hon. gentleman has stated that this provision will "undoubtedly" be crystallized into law. Now, I want to get from the hon. gentleman what authority he has to make that statement?

Mr. CHARLTON. If I used the word "undoubtedly" I will qualify it by saying I believe it will be, I may say that in all probability it will; and if the hon. gentleman will wait long enough to know whether it will be or not, he will know whether I was mistaken or not.

The Controller of Customs told us in the course of his speech that the Government are anxious to promote wider trade relations with all the world, and that they are perfectly willing, nay more than willing, that they are anxious to secure broader trade relations with the United States upon fair and equitable terms. Now, with all due respect to the hon. gentleman, I beg to say that I believe he is totally mistaken, and I further believe that the Government have made no honest effort to obtain reciprocity, not since 1891, not since 1878 when they came into power. I further believe that they manifested, in all their arrangements with the United States looking towards reciprocity, a degree of enmity and bad feeling towards that country that was exactly calculated to secure for us, not reciprocity, but a failure to secure reciprocity upon any terms that we offered or admitted. It will be remembered that in 1891 when this Parliament was dissolved and a reason was assigned for that dissolution—it was necessary to assign some reason—the Government asserted through their organs that they were engaged in negotiating reciprocity with the United States, that in consequence of the near approach of the time when that treaty would be consummated, they dissolved the House and appealed to the people in order that they might refer that treaty to a Parliament fresh from the people, and not to a moribund House. Well, Sir, we all know now that that assertion was utterly destitute of truth, that no such negotiations were in progress. In fact, five days before the dissolution took place, we had the explicit declaration of the Secretary of State of the United States that no such negotiations were in progress, we had his explicit denial of the rumours floating in the press that such negotiations had been undertaken or were in progress at all; and our Government went to the country upon that pretext, which was utterly destitute of truth, that pretext which was a political falsehood of the blackest dye; and they stole from the Liberal party of Canada its stock in trade, stole its clothes, stole its professed principles, and having stolen those principles, or having induced the people to believe that they stood upon the same ground, they basely betrayed the people by making no attempt to secure reciprocity at all. Will hon. gentlemen tell us that when they went down to Washington the first time and remained there for a few hours, and were told to go home about their business by President Harrison, they were in the line of obtaining reciprocity with the United States. Do they mean to tell us that their approaches to the United States have been of a character to secure the confidence and good-will of that Government? They will hardly have the hardihood to say that. Of course, they wanted to have it appear that they were working in the direction of their pledges and promises, and when they did finally secure an interview with the Secretary of State of the United States on the 10th February following, the Secretary of State asked them to make proposals, and they told him that they wanted to secure a reciprocity treaty on the lines of the old treaty of 1854,—on the lines of the treaty of 1854—when every Government of the United States, every public man of the United States, had declared that such a treaty was impossible, when James G. Blaine, in his letter of 29th January, 1891, had distinctly stated that a reciprocity treaty confined to natural products was inadmissible and would not be entertained. Yet these gentlemen go down there, and with unparalleled effrontery tell Mr. Blaine, in face of his explicit declaration that they never need to come with such a proposal, in face of the fact that the United States Government had rejected all overtures of that kind for fifteen years—they go down and tell Mr. Blaine: We want to get a reciprocity treaty on the lines of the old treaty of 1854. What did Mr. Blaine say? He certainly must have been a very courteous gentleman, for he said to them: Gentlemen, we cannot entertain a proposal for a reciprocity treaty that does not include a list of manufactured articles.

An hon. MEMBER. Commercial Union

Mr. CHARLTON. Not commercial union, but that did not include a list of manufactured articles. Now, we had a treaty negotiated by the British Minister in 1874, that received the assent of the British Government, and which did include a list of manufactured articles, which included a list of many score of manufactured articles, a list. I verily believe, as wide in its scope as it would have been necessary to make a list upon the occasion when the hon. gentlemen were in Washington—not commercial union, but a list of manufactured goods to be admitted into Canada in lieu of the advantage that the United States were willing to grant to Canada of admitting the productions of this Dominion to that country. Hon. gentlemen might, at least, have seen how far it was necessary to go. They might, at least, have inquired from Mr. Blaine: How wide do you wish this to be? Did they do that? Did they make any negotiations in that line whatever? If Mr. Blaine is to be believed, they asked permission to consider the question over night, and came back the next day and said they would not consider such a proposition at all. Then they returned here, and the Minister of Finance published a statement which is in direct contradiction of the statement of the gentleman who succeeded Mr. Blaine as Secretary of State, who was privy to all these negotiations—I refer to Secretary of State Foster. As I pointed out last year, that probably an honest misunderstanding arose, that during informal conversation Mr. Foster, the Canadian Finance Minister, explained to Mr. Blain, Secretary of State, that if they were to admit manufactures to and fro, they would not in all respects stand on an equal footing. For instance, with respect to woollen manufactures, the United States imposed a duty on wool and Canada did not; and Mr. Blaine said, that with respect to such articles, it would be necessary to have a uniform tariff—as it unquestionably would be—and our Finance Minister subsequently asserted that Mr. Blaine made it a condition of entering into reciprocal negotiations that there should be a uniform tariff in all particulars, which was not what Mr. Blaine said or what he meant, but was, no doubt, an unintentional misrepresentation of the actual state of the case on the part of the Canadian Minister of Finance. We did not get reciprocity, and the Canadian Government did not want it. The Government do not want reciprocity to-day; it would not suit their clients, the combines of the country; they do not want our manufacturers to have competition in the few or many manufactured articles it would be necessary to admit here on a preferential basis from the United States.

Mr. CHARLTON.

We now come to the next stage of the matter, with respect to the declaration of the Controller of Customs as to the anxiety of the Government to secure reciprocity of fair and equal terms—the conduct of the Government in the matter of the Wilson Bill. The Minister of Finance said the other night that the United States Government had been wrestling with this question of tariff for a year and a half. It never was submitted to their Congress until last December, for this is the first session since the presidential election, and it has been under consideration by the House of Representatives and the Senate, not a year, but since December last. Here was a new party coming into power that made professions of its desire to enlarge the free list very greatly, which made professions of a desire to reduce the duties all round. Here was a Government favourable to reciprocal trade relations and negotiations. Here was a golden opportunity to secure concessions. Did our Government embrace that opportunity? Have they been represented in Washington since the Tariff Bill came under consideration in Congress, by any agent, confidential or otherwise? You may search Washington with a candle and you will not find that the Canadian Government has had anybody to look after its interests and the interests of our people, or that they have made any attempt to secure concessions to Canadian interests. They have practically said they would not turn over their hands to secure any concessions from the Democratic Administration of the United States—and I defy contradiction from the Finance Minister. They have made no such attempts whatever. Here was a Bill introduced that proposed to give us free ore, free coal, free wool and free lumber, and to reduce largely the duties in the agricultural schedule and remove many of those duties; and surely, if the Canadian Government had been anxious to secure concessions, great or small, with respect to those tariff changes, they would have looked after this matter, and would, at least, have sent a confidential agent or commissioner to Washington to see if anything could be done. They have not done it. There was a disposition on the part of the governing party in the United States to make very great modifications. It would have required, in my opinion, but slight efforts in the direction of concessions on the part of the Government of Canada to have secured the placing on the free list of all the articles in the agricultural schedule; it would have required slight efforts at modification and reciprocity, on the part of Canada, to have made highly probable the securing of the boon of free ore, free coal, free wool and free lumber. We may get part of them. We certainly will not get free ore or free coal, probably we will not get free wool, and the Government have neglected the opportunity presented. They have failed to make any effort to secure the great boon to Canada which would have resulted from concessions on this line. They have made no concessions, they have made no attempt to offer concessions, they have made no overtures, they have done nothing whatever; they let the matter drift, and really did not care. In fact, they did not want reciprocity. Their enmity to anything like reciprocity is clearly shown in their conduct in this matter, and for the Controller of Customs to stand here and say that this Government is in favour of a fair and equitable arrangement with the United States for reciprocal trade relations, is simply a piece of effrontery, in face of the record of the Government. It may be, and I hope it will be, that we will get important concessions in the American Tariff Bill, but I want to point out at this stage that, whatever these concessions may be, that however great they may be, they will be less desirable than the same concessions would be if obtained by treaty, for this reason: If we negotiate a reciprocity treaty with the United States, it is for a term of years, and we have a guarantee under its provisions that, during the term of years it is to continue, there will be no doubt and uncertainty as to whether the articles covered by the treaty will continue to remain on the free list; we have an assurance that they will. But if the United States Congress places a list of articles on the free list by legislative action, we have no guarantee that they will be permitted to remain on that list; the list may continue during the life of the Congress or during the life of this Administration; it may be sanctioned by the succeeding Administration, and it may all be swept to the winds in one or two years from to-day. And so the industries of this country cannot build upon these concessions, because they lack the element of permanency. They cannot make a calculation, and any legislative concession of this kind is of small value in comparison with a concession made upon the basis of a solemn treaty to continue for a fixed term of years. With the changed condition of things in the United States, and with a new party coming into power professedly in favour of freer trade relations and the mitigation of tariff restrictions; the Government, if their professions had been honest and true, could not and would not have failed again to have made the attempt that they professed to have made before, to secure reciprocal trade relations with that country. Now, Sir, why do we need reciprocity? My hon. friend the Controller of Customs stated, evidently with a feeling of satisfaction: that whereas our agricultural exports to the States in 1879 were $13,000,000, in 1893 they had shrunk to $8,000,000. He seemed to be greatly gratified over that fact. He does not want to trade with such a country. I remember some years ago that the then Minister of Customs (Mr. Bowell) congratulated himself that the trade with that pestiferous nest of Democrats was diminishing. That shows the animus of the Government; it sticks out like the cloven foot once in a while, and they cannot conceal it; they do not want to trade with the country to the south of us. It is true, Sir, that our trade is increasing with Great Britain; but it is also true that it is a matter of very great importance to us to secure access to the American markets, and for this reason: that there are a great many articles that we do sell, and must sell, almost exclusively to the people of the United States, and that we cannot find a market for in Great Britain or elsewhere. It is a matter of importance to the Canadian people to have these markets opened to us, for if restrictions were removed the United States market would prove to be infinitely more valuable to us than any other market.

Mr. BERGIN. So you say.

Mr. CHARLTON. I say so, and I will prove it. It is our exclusive market for mine products. We have enormous mineral resources in Canada. We are selling comparatively nothing in the line of iron ore; we are selling nothing in the line of quarry products, although the United States consumes $25,000,000 worth annually, and the whole of the north shore of our great inland seas is lined with the most valuable quarries. The United States is our exclusive market for wood pulp, tan bark, fresh fish, horses, stock cattle, barley, poultry—

Mr. FERGUSON (Grenville). Not for poultry.

Mr. CHARLTON. It would be if we had the duties off. We are selling at a disadvantage because we cannot get into the market where we could sell at an advantage. It is our exclusive market for sheep, hides, hay, malt, potatoes, roots, vegetables, and I might go on at length to quote the different commodities. I went through the Trade and Navigation Returns the other day, and I presume I checked off 150 articles that were exported to the United States, in excess of the quantity exported to all other countries in the world. Now, Sir, large as our trade is with the United States, it is vastly less than it would be but for the restrictions. I am going to prove to my hon. friend from Cornwall (Mr. Bergin), from evidence that ought to be satisfactory to him, and will be satisfactory to any candid mind: that our trade with that country would be greater than with any other country in the world if the restrictions were removed. We fortunately have one brief period of free trade in natural products between Canada and the United States to illustrate our arguments. During the twelve years that the treaty was in force, from 1854 to 1866 our exports to the United States of the natural products of Canada increased four-fold, and we ended in 1866 with an export to the United States, in round numbers, of $40,000,000 worth of these natural products. What were those exports to the United States last year? They amounted to $43,923,000, and of that amount $3,482,000 were inland short returns. You may deduct that sum from the total amount in order to make a comparison with 1866, and that leaves $40,441,000 for the year 1893, or, in twenty-seven years our export trade in natural products with the United States has not increased at all, while in twelve years, under reciprocity, it increased four-fold.

Mr. BERGIN. Was not that during the American war, when they were obliged to import from this Dominion?

Mr. CHARLTON. The American war commenced in 1861, and ended in 1864. The treaty commenced in 1854, and ended in 1866, and I trust that my hon. friend is not so ignorant of history as to suppose that the rebellion lasted for twelve years; it lasted four years, and the year 1866 was two years after its close.

Mr. BERGIN. It was during the war that that trade increased.

Mr. CHARLTON. While to-day our trade is stationary in regard to these products, our exports of bullion to the United States last year amounted to $4,133,000, which figures in the total exports to that country, and if you take out the export of bullion you will find that our exports of natural products to the United States in 1893 were $4,000,000 less than they were in 1866. Now, Sir, suppose that the ratio of increase that held from 1854 to 1866 had been continued under the continuance of the treaty, until 1893, and is there any reason to suppose that that trade would not have continued to increase? Is there any reason to suppose that we would not be exporting to the United States to-day, under such a condition, $100,000,000 a year, instead of the paltry $36,000,000 worth, which we exported last year, besides bullion and coin? Here are these hon. gentlemen opposite professing to be desirous of promoting the interests of the country, falsely professing to be in favour of a fair and equitable trade arrangement with the United States, setting their faces like flint against the consummation of such a treaty, and with the result that the export trade of this country with the United States to-day is $60,000,000 a year less than it would have been if that treaty had continued in force? Sir, if the people of this country understood the magnitude and gravity of this matter—and they are fast beginning to apprehend it—they would turn these hon. gentlemen out of office the first chance they got, and I think they will. Now, Sir, we imported from the United States last year for consumption $58,221,000 worth, and the balance of trade against this country last year in its trade with the United States was $14,289,000 worth. We paid them that $4,133,000 in bullion, and in addition to that there was the balance of trade against us of fourteen million and a quarter, and we paid that out of a portion of the surplus of the balance in trade in our favour with Great Britain. Do you tell me, Mr. Speaker, that this great country, with its opulence of natural resources, stretching from ocean to ocean, with all the wealth undeveloped that it possesses, with its intelligent and vigorous population, with the markets of 60,000,000 of people at its door, with 6,000,000 of people in United States cities almost within telephone call of us,—can I be told that we shall be unable to pay for our imports from the United States, with the products of the mine, and forest, and the fishery, and the field, if we had increased intercourse into that country? No, Sir, it is absurd to make such a statement, and the condition of trade between these two countries illustrates most eloquently, the short-sighted, fatuitous policy that is pursued and has been pursued by the Government of this country. We are doing something in the line of trying for foreign trade, are we? My hon. friend the Minister of Finance went down to the West Indies once. He was going to open up trade with the coloured people of Jamaica, but how much did it amount to? The Minister of Commerce has been in Australia lately. They are looking to the ends of the earth for development of trade, when trade is right at our doors, and is ready to be grasped the moment we are ready to take it. Our trade with Australia now is about $500,000 a year, and how much are you going to increase it. Put on a line of steamships; subsidize it with an annual grant of half a million dollars; and you might bring the trade up to a million dollars a year. All these devices are adopted for the purpose of amusing the people. They are humbugs; they are deceptions; they are resorted to only for that purpose. The members of the Government know, for they are intelligent men, that they ought to secure reciprocity; they know that they can secure reciprocity; they know that if the people of this country had been fully alive to the importance of that trade, they would have secured reciprocity; and they are seeking by these paltry devices to divert the attention of the people from the great boon that is within their grasp. So much, Sir, with reference to the reciprocity question, called forth by the assertion made by the Controller of Customs, that we have been making honest efforts to get it. They have been making dishonest pretenses to get it, and they do not want it at all.

Now, Sir, a few words with regard to the National Policy. You would not acknowledge it, Mr. Speaker, but you know it as well as I do: the National Policy is a humbug—an arrant, first-class humbug. It reminds me of the story of the professor of entomology. The boys thought one day that they would deceive the old man, and they fixed up a bug with brass wire legs and red gauze wings and glass beads for eyes, and put it before him and asked him to classify it. The old professor looked at it for a moment through his spectacles, and then he said: "Young gentlemen, the species of bug that this specimen belongs to is commonly called the humbug." That is the class to which the National Policy belongs. We have long heard the praises of this National Policy sung. We have been told the effect that it has had in developing our national resources—that our manufacturing industries owe their existence to this policy; that it had called them up from the vasty deep, planted them on their feet, developed them, made them prosperous; the whole manufacturing interest has been originated and coddled and fostered and fed and brought to its present proportions by the National Policy. Had we no manufactories in this country before the National Policy was inaugurated? Had we none in 1871, when the census was taken? I asked the Finance Minister the other night some questions about the wages paid by these industries, but he was ignorant about it. According to the census of 1871, we had in that year 187,942 operatives; the wages paid were $40,851,000; the raw materials consumed in manufacturing amounted to $124,907,000; and the products of the manufactories amounted to $221,000,000. That was almost as great a development of the manufacturing industries in proportion to the population of the country as we have to-day; that great development had grown up under a revenue tariff of 15 per cent; and yet these hon. gentlemen tell us that the manufacturing industries of Canada have been created by the National Policy.

Mr. FERGUSON (Grenville). No, they were only revived. You killed them in your time.

Mr. CHARLTON. Did we? That is a good assertion to make. We had a good deal of discussion about this matter in 1878, when our friends on the other side asserted that the country was in such a sad state of depression. Why, Mr. Speaker, there was a boom in agriculture in 1878 compared with the condition of things existing to-day. The assertion was made at that time our manufactories were in a languishing condition, just ready to give up the ghost. I remember that, in connection with the discussions that took place on the subject, I took the pains to get statements from a large number of the leading manufacturing industries of the Dominion. Some of them hedged a little; they were conservative, and they did not like to give me the information I asked for; but some of them did give it. I got letters from twenty of the chief establishments in the various lines of manufacturing in this country. One cotton mill gave me the information that it paid a dividend that year of 10 per cent. Another cotton mill said that they had made no dividend, but I learned afterwards that they had taken a handsome sum from their earnings and applied it to the purchase of plant. One foundry, with a capital of $180,000, reported: "No dividend in consequence of bad debts and heavy losses." A woollen mill reported a dividend of 7 per cent; another 8 per cent. One sewing machine manufactory said they had made a little more than would be interest on their investment. I suppose we may say a dividend of 8 per cent. One carriage manufactory said their business was "fairly remunerative." One clothing establishment said they might have made more by going into the note shaving business, which perhaps meant that they had made 20 per cent. At any rate, it is quite evident that their business was profitable. One large agricultural implement factory said their business in that year was the largest they had ever had. Another said their profits were highly satisfactory. A large foundry in the west stated that the return on their capital had been 20 per cent. Another large implement factory had a return of 23 per cent, another 40 per cent, another 20 per cent; another said their profits were satisfactory; and all said they did not want any more protection. One knitting factory said: "Holding our own, others in the same line about in the same condition." One agricultural implement manufactory reported, "Usual profits 30 per cent; no faith in protection." This is the summary of these twenty establishments; six had paid dividends of 20 per cent and upwards; two returned the profits as satisfactory; two paid 10 per cent dividend; six paid from 6 to 8 per cent; one had the dividend reduced as compared with former years; and two paid no dividend, one of which was the cotton mill that had bought more plant out of its earnings. This was the condition of these twenty establishments in the year 1878, that year of depression, when we were told that every one of our manufacturing industries was ready to fall to pieces. Suppose we compare that condition with the condition of things that existed in the New England States, when protection had been the policy for sixteen years. I have looked up the record for the same year, of forty-eight New England establishments, having a combined capital of $52,320,000. Of these, sixteen reported no dividend; two only in Canada had made the same report. Nine reported a dividend of less than 6 per cent; no establishment in Canada made the same report. Eight reported a dividend of 6 per cent; only two in Canada reported a dividend so low. Seven only reported a dividend of 10 per cent and upwards, against eight out of the twenty in Canada. This comparison shows the condition of these forty-eight manufacturing establishments in highly protected New England to have been infinitely worse than the condition of the manufacturing establishments in the Dominion of Canada under a revenue of 15 per cent, and such a showing, with all the depression which existed in this country at that time, is a safe rejoinder to the assertion that our manufacturing interests were in a depressed and ruinous condition. The question of employment, the question of wages paid, the question of raw material used, the question of output—in all these matters I propose to institute a comparison between the tariffs of 1871, 1881 and 1891.

Practically two of these decades were entirely under a revenue tariff policy. The tariff was changed in 1879. The census returns are given in 1881, but any effect that might have been produced by these tariff changes between the time of enacting the tariff and the taking of the census in 1881 could not have been considerable. So that practically two of these periods were under a revenue tariff policy, and the period from 1881 to 1891 was under a protective policy. Take the number of employees and wages paid. In 1871 the employees numbered 187,942. In 1891 they numbered 254,935, showing an increase of 66,993 under a revenue tariff policy, or an increase of 36 per cent. In 1891 the number of employees amounted to 367,865, or an increase of 112,930, the percentage of increase in the decade ending that year being 44 per cent, against 36 per cent in the decade finishing 1881. In making this comparison, it is proper at this point to observe that the census of 1891 is a misleading one. That census gives as manufacturing establishments almost every place where an industrial occupation was pursued by a single individual. A tinker at a cross-road was put down as an industrial establishment. A cobbler in a cellar, with no stock in trade but his little kit of tools and the sole and upper leather he used in mending boots and shoes, was an industrial establishment. The seamstress in a garret, working alone at needle work, was an industrial establishment. Consequently the lists were stuffed and unreliable; and under these circumstances, I verily believe that the increase indicated by these returns of 44 per cent against 36 per cent should lead us fairly to the inference that the increase between 1871 and 1881 was actually greater than that between 1881 and 1891.

Mr. SPROULE. Were not instructions given in 1891 the same as in 1881?

Mr. CHARLTON. Whatever the instructions were, the mode of taking was different, and the census was a fraud as regards these industrial establishments. The wages paid in 1871, according to the census of 1871, amounted to $40,851,009, and in 1881 they amounted to $59,429,002, showing an increase of $18,577,993, or 45½ per cent. Now, the average wage of each operative in 1871 was $217, and in 1881, still under a revenue tariff policy, it was $233. The wages paid in 1891, according to the census returns, amounted to $99,762,441, an increase of $40,333,439, or 67 per cent. But here again the returns are misleading on account of that stuffing process I have referred to. The average wages paid in 1891 were $244. Thus there was an increase of $16 in 1881 over 1871, and an increase of $11 between 1881 and 1891. Now, with regard to raw material and the output. The value of the raw material was, in 1871, $124,907,846. In 1881 it was $179,918,593, and in 1891 it was $255,983,219. The increase between 1871 and 1881 was 44 per cent, and between 1881 and 1891 42 per cent. Or, there was an increase of 2 per cent less in the decade under protection than in the previous decade under a revenue tariff. That little fact lets the cat out of the bag. It shows the stuffing and manipulations of these census figures—a process which could not be applied to the raw material, because these bogus concerns, such as tinkers, cobblers dressmakers and others, do not use much raw material. So that we have in that statement something on which we can base a correct comparison. And it shows that the increase of raw material in the decade ending 1891 as compared with the previous decade was 42 per cent, as against 44 per cent of an increase in the previous decade over that ending 1871. In the decade ending 1871 the total value of products was $221,617,773. In the decade ending 1881 the total value of products was $309,676,068, still under a revenue tariff policy, showing an increase of $88,058,295, or 40 per cent. In the decade ending 1891, the total value of products was $475,445,705, or an increase of $165,769,637 over the previous decade, or 43 per cent. I am sorry the Finance Minister has gone. Here is the answer to the assertion that the National Policy created our manufacturing interests and increased their prosperity. Here are the hard facts given by the census returns, which show that in 1871 we had an extensive manufacturing system in this country, embracing all the branches pursued to-day. They show also that in 1881, while we had barely ceased to be under the operation of a revenue tariff, there had been a large increase in the number of employees, wages paid, raw material used, and manufactured output. They show further, that the decade ending 1891, the ratio increase in raw material was less than in the previous decade ending 1881. So much for the false assertion that the manufacturing interests of Canada owe anything to the National Policy. Sir, it is an unmitigated humbug, and the Government that rests its fortunes upon that policy is a Government that deserves defeat.

Mr. SPROULE. The National Policy keeps you in opposition.

Mr. CHARLTON. Very true. The National Policy may be doing a great many things that are bad for the country, and one of the worst is keeping those who would give honest government out of office.

This National Policy made a good many promises to the farmers, every one of which was a dire delusion. It promised higher prices. Did it give them? What was the average prices of products when Mr. Mackenzie was in office? The average price of wheat during those five years was $1.11 per bushel. To-day the farmers are feeding their wheat to the hogs, as it is not worth over 50 to 55 cents a bushel. The average price of barley was 85 cents per bushel. To-day is it worth

40 cents? The average price of oats was 42 cents per bushel. The average price of pease was 71 cents per bushel. Dressed hogs averaged \$7. Wool averaged 34 cents a pound. And so on through the list. The farmers, who were receiving these prices, were promised an Utopia under the National Policy. They were to be immeasurably benefited. The farmers have suffered, but the party in power to-day has benefited by this miserable delusion, this humbug palmed off upon the people for the benefit of a few. The people swallowed the bait and have suffered the consequences. With whom must our farmer compete to-day? Can he get protection? He goes into the foreign market and competes with the coolie of India; he competes with the Italian and Spanish-American of the Argentine Republic. He competes with the recently-emancipated serf of Russia; he competes with the labourer of Hungary—he competes with all the low-paid and miserably-fed labour of the world, and he must sell below the price accepted by these labourers or he cannot command a market. When he has to buy, what is his fate? Can he buy where he sells; can he buy cheap because he is obliged to sell cheap? Not at all; he must buy in a restricted market; he must buy in a protected market; he must buy in a market where every article he wants to use is enhanced in price for the benefit of some monopolist or favourite of the Government. He is compelled to sell cheap and to buy dear. He is, as I have often said, like Issachar, a strong ass bowed down between two burdens. He is an ass because he submits to it, and the burdens resting upon him are low prices on the one hand, and high prices on the other, both evils aggravated by the policy of the Government of the day. Now, we have heard a good deal about the depression that existed in 1878, and comparisons are made between that time and the glorious times we have had since. We had a howl at that time about the exodus. We were told that the country was being depopulated by the policy of Mr. Mackenzie and his colleagues in office, and it was declared that we must apply a remedy for this evil, and that remedy must be the National Policy. The Controller of Customs said to-day that my hon. friend on my right (Sir Richard Cartwright) in making his calculation that the natural increase of Canada ought to be $2\frac{1}{4}$ per cent per annum, was far wide of the mark. Sir, he was not wide of the mark. The natural increase of population in the United States from 1790 to 1850 was over 30 per cent in each decade. In one of those decades the increase was 34 per cent. In the decade between 1850 and 1860, it was 28 per cent. To tell us that a young and vigorous country like Canada, with a population such as ours, with resources such as ours with room for the expansion of population that we have, ought not to have a natural increase as great as that of the United States during the first seventy years of its existence, is to tell us something that is manifestly preposterous. The fact that we increased 17 per cent in one decade, and in the next increased only 12 per cent is to prove that there has been an enormous drain upon the population of this country. The exodus must have run up to hundreds of thousands of the native-born population of the country in order to account for our low rate of increase of population. In addition, there is the drain of the immigrant population, which has come to us in hundreds of thousands, but has left us, as our native-born population has been doing. Yes, Sir, my hon. friend was right; he was within the mark; his statement will bear investigation, and it may well challenge investigation.

After Recess.

Mr. CHARLTON. Mr. Speaker, at six, o'clock, when you left the Chair, I was referring to the question of the exodus of native-born Canadians to the United States during the term of the Mackenzie Government, and to the charges made by the then Opposition that the policy of the Liberal Government was one which promoted emigration to that country; and I was referring also to the promises made that if the party now occupying the Treasury benches were brought into power, the policy they would inaugurate would result in checking that exodus, and would have the further result of bringing back to Canada many thousands of her sons who had left the shores of this country. Well, Sir, these promises have not been fulfilled. On the contrary, the policy adopted by the gentlemen who came into power in 1878 seems to have been one calculated to aggravate the evil of which these gentlemen complained, and for which they promised to furnish a remedy if they were intrusted by the people with their confidence. We have several sources of information as to the extent of the exodus of our sons from Canadian shores. One is, the United States census returns, giving the nationalities of foreigners resident in that country. I have reason to believe, Sir, that the returns of native Canadians in the United States are very largely below the mark, as many Canadians there choose to profess to be native Americans and do not declare themselves to the census enumerators to be natives of British America. Nevertheless, the last census returns give the number of Canadians in that country at one million. The United States customs officials, for a term of years, professed to furnish statistics as to the number of Canadian immigrants crossing the border into the United States. These statistics were confessedly lacking in accuracy, but a comparison of these figures for two periods would furnish a fair comparison, because the relative inaccuracy would undoubtedly be about the same for one period as for another. From these custom-house statistics, it seems that the emigration of native Canadians from Canada into the United States as enumerated by these officials, for the five years from 1874 to 1878, inclusive, was 124,863, or an average of 24,972 per annum. These statistics were continued until the year 1886, and, according to the tables, the number of Canadians passing into the United States as permanent residents, between 1879 and 1885, inclusive, was 522,214, or an annual average in the latter period of 74,000, or about three times as many as in the former period. I say, Mr. Speaker, that I do not claim that these statistics are strictly accurate, that they are more than approximately accurate. Still, that they show conclusively that the tide of emigration from Canada to the United States was greater in the latter period than in the former. Now, Sir, in the light of these facts the assertion made by hon. gentlemen that they would check the exodus and would bring back numbers of native Canadians who had gone to the United States was an absurd promise. They failed to perform what they had promised. On the contrary, the evil of which they complained, and for which they professed to be able to furnish a remedy was greatly aggravated by their policy. We had in the United States in 1890, native Canadians, and children born to native Canadians in that country, to the number of not less than 2,400,000. The statistics for 1880 gave 712,000 as the number of Canadians in the United States, and 939,000 as the number of children of Canadian parents in that country. Upon that basis, we must have had in the United States in 1890, native Canadians, and the children of native Canadians to the number of 2,400,000, and our population, of course, is that much the less than it would have been but for the exodus. Then we have the grandchildren of Canadians, and the great grandchildren of Canadians, who emigrated to the United States in earlier years; we have the immigrants who left Canada at various periods, and their descendants. Altogether it is capable of mathematical demonstration, it has been demonstrated, and can be demonstrated again that if there had been no exodus from Canada since Confederation the population of this country would have exceeded nine millions instead of falling short of five millions.

Now, I wish to say a word with regard to the assertion made by the Minister of Finance that the burdens imposed by the American tariff, even under the Wilson Bill, if it passes, substantially in the shape in which it stands at present, are greater than under the Canadian tariff, and that the Wilson Bill will furnish a higher degree of protection than our tariff. The hon gentleman asserted that the burdens borne by the American people through the imposition of customs duties were greater than the burdens borne by the Canadian people. He asserted that the average rate of duties before the passage of the McKinley Bill was 45 per cent, and, even at the lowest rate of duties, it was 23 per cent, on the whole importations of the country. There is one criterion by which to test the accuracy of the hon. gentleman's statement—an infallible criterion—and that is to ascertain what the total taxation of the United States from customs is, and what the per capita tax is; then turn to Canada and ascertain likewise, the total customs taxation and the per capita ratio of that tax here. That comparison must settle the question. How does the matter show by that comparison? The total customs taxation of the United States last year was $203,355,000; the per capita tax was $3.08. The customs taxes of Canada last year amounted to $21,161,000. The per capita tax was $4.26, while it was $3.08 in the United States, or $1.18 more than in the United States per capita, a difference of 35 per cent. That disposes of the hon. gentleman's assertion. That proves that he has made assertions in this House calculated to mislead the country, that he has either made this assertion in ignorance of the true state of the case, or for the purpose of producing an effect upon public sentiment that the facts do not warrant.

Now, the hon. gentleman made some other references. He spoke in a jocular and sneering tone of that unwelcome visitor of Reform Governments, the deficit. That matter has been referred to before, it was referred to by the hon. member for South Oxford, and I wish to say only one more word about it. I wish to point out that the inference which we were supposed to draw from the hon. gentleman's remarks, that a deficit was an unwelcomed Reform visitor, or peculiar to Reform Administrations, was an insinuation without foundation, and not based upon the truth. The Liberal Government had deficits from 1875 to 1878, in the aggregate amounting to $4,489,000 in round numbers. But did the Government of which the hon. Minister is a member, ever face a deficit? They met deficits between the years 1878-79 and 1887-88, of $12,365,000; they met deficits of three dollars to every one dollar of deficit confronting the Reform Government; and yet the Minister of Finance, standing upon his feet here, makes reference to deficits as something peculiar to the administration of affairs by a Liberal Government, and as an unwelcomed visitor that we alone had to entertain. Why is that effrontery? Well, it is dealing with facts and presuming upon popular ignorance in a manner that I think betrays a good deal of hardihood, to say the least. Now, with regard to this question of deficits, I suppose that the Reform Government could have corrected them by imposing additional taxes—no doubt they could. Their tariff was a moderate revenue tariff, their policy was to maintain their tariff at the figure of a moderate revenue tariff. They unfortunately held office during a period of great financial depression, a period of depression commencing in 1874 and lasting till 1879. The revenues continually shrank. That Government practiced the most rigid economy; it increased its expenditure, chargeable to the consolidated fund, $186,000 in five years, by a careful analysis of the accounts and adjusting them so as to apply to the term they came into office and the term they went out. During that time they had to meet increased expenditures of interest charges of nearly a million dollars. Now, the Liberal Government decided that the depression of trade was temporary, they decided that an increase of revenue was certain to come when that depression passed away, that it was better to tide over the difficulty by the strictest economy and by facing small deficits, than to increase the burdens resting on the country to such an extent that when the revival came they would have more revenue than they required. And so they kept on, waiting for the revival, practicing economy, and refraining from putting upon the shoulders of the people unnecessary burdens. If they had remained in office do you suppose that their expectations would have been realized? Do you suppose that when the depression passed away in 1879 and the trade of this country assumed its normal condition, that the revenue under the tariff of 1876 would have increased to a sufficient extent to meet the expenditures of the Government upon the economical basis that it practised? Well, Sir, beyond question it would; and although we cannot point to the results that would have followed, because the tariff in the meantime was changed, yet we can draw a reasonable inference from the experience of the United States. They did not change their tariff, their fiscal conditions were very much the same as ours would have been, our revenue would have been affected by the same general causes. Now, the revenue that country derived from customs in 1878-79 was one hundred and thirty-seven millions and a-quarter. In 1879-80 the revival came, the United States resumed specie payment, and trade improved, and the customs revenue of the United States in 1879-80, rose to one hundred and eighty-six millions and a half. Now, if the same conditions of trade had governed the case in Canada, and if the tariff of 1876 had continued in force until 1879-80, the increase would have been nearly in the same proportion, that is, from $12,900,000 in 1878-79 to $17,540,000 in 1879-80; it would have given the Mackenzie Government, in 1879-80, $2,702,000 revenue more than the deficit of the last year they were in office. The expectations of the Finance Minister would have been fully realized, and there was no necessity, in view of the future revival of trade that was sure to come, for increasing the tariff, and the Finance Minister of that day acted upon the soundest fiscal policy in refusing to do so.

Now, one word about the matter of the debt. My hon. friend the Controller of Customs informs us to-day that the debt of Canada increased $40,000,000 under the Mackenzie regime. Very true. We commenced Confederation with a net debt of $75,728,000; the net debt of this country on the 30th June last, was $241,681,000, an increase of $166,000,000 in round numbers. Now, Mr. Speaker, I make the assertion here in my place in Parliament, that the Conservative Governments of this country, the Conservative Government that held office from Confederation till 1873, and the Conservative Government that resumed office in 1878, and continued until the present time, are responsible for every dollar of that debt; the Liberal Government is not responsible for one farthing of that increase. Why, the Controller of Customs himself tacitly admitted that when he said that Mr. Mackenzie never originated any policy at all that involved expenditure. Certainly he never did. He came into office, and he found that they were pledged to certain expenditures, and he had to go on and carry out the obligations that his predecessors had incurred. His Finance Minister, now Sir Richard Cartwright, in his speech on the Budget, in the session following the downfall of the Liberal Government from office, made these remarks with reference to this matter:

Suffice to say now, that the [very first step which I took when becoming Finance Minister was to ascertain what were the engagements which Canada would require to defray, in order to do all that the hon. gentleman had pledged to do, and without charging more than the $30,000,000 which he, himself, assumed to be the total cost of the Pacific Railway, I found that, instead of $60,000,000 being required to meet our engagements, we would require to provide $91,000,000.

The Liberal Government came into power with obligations amounting to $91,000,000 resting upon their shoulders; they were obliged to go on and carry out those engagements, the enlargement of canals, the completion of the Intercolonial Railway, the completion of contracts here in Ottawa, and the expenditure upon the Pacific Railway, and in doing these things, I repeat, that for every dollar of that forty millions increase of debt that accrued during their administration, the Conservative Government of this country were responsible, as they are now responsible to the people of Canada for the existence of every dollar of that $241,686,000 of debt that rests upon our shoulders, and if our friends on the other side would deal honestly with this question, they would admit the truth of this assertion. The debt amounts to $50 per head for every man, woman and child in this Dominion. Was it necessary, was it prudent, to increase the debt of the country by the amount it was increased? I say no. I affirm, that we incurred a scale of expenditure befitting a nation of fifteen millions, that we are too ambitious, that we place on ourselves burdens that make us stagger under their weight, that this debt, with its interest charge of $9,800,000 last year, is an incubus on the prosperity of Canada of the most serious imaginable character. For what purpose did we spend that money? On a system of canals—perhaps they were necessary—on public works of various kinds that were not necessary; on bonuses to miserable little railways for the purpose of buying ridings, squandering money in a thousand different ways, expending money by bucketsful and by millions in connection with the Canadian Pacific Railway, when we could have adopted a scheme that would have given us that railway for half the cost incurred. All these hare-brained schemes for building works sufficient to equip a nation of fifteen millions, all these rash and unjustifiable schemes imposed on the people of this country this enormous debt that renders it practically impossible to give them such a kind of government, as regards economy, as we should possess.

Then, we have the growth of the expenditure. We commenced the first year after Confederation with an expenditure charged to the Consolidated Fund of $13,486,000. That expenditure last year was $36,884,000. While our population has increased barely 50 per cent, our expenditure has increased 300 per cent; we have increased our expenditure six times faster than our population and our resources have increased, and the Government that will go at that pace is a Government that is rushing the country to ruin. My hon. friend from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) last night made a comparison between our expenditure and that of the United States. I wish to make three comparisons of a more ample character, one between 1800, another between 1830, and another between 1860 and our present condition. The United States in 1800 had a population of 5,308,000, well on to half a million more than our present population. Their total expenditure was $10,777,000, less than one-third of ours, and they had an army, navy, diplomatic service and all the expenses pertaining to a nation to defray, and we have none of those. In 1830 they had a population of 12,820,000, with an expenditure of $24,354,000; with a population two and a half times greater than ours their expenditure was only two-thirds as great as ours. In 1860, with a population of 31,183,000, their total expenditure was $56,054,000, and the previous year it had been but $48,000,000. These figures illustrate the fact that our affairs have been managed in a way, extravagant, reckless and ruinous in its character.

The Minister of Finance told the House that the period from 1879 to 1893 was the brightest and most progressive in our history. Well, I suppose he feels so. He has been on the Treasury benches during a part of that time and he and a good many other gentlemen who have been enjoying the sweets of office may feel so. You know that there is a passage in the Scriptures which says: "Dot the wild ass bray when at grass, or lower the ox over his fodder?" Hon. gentlemen opposite are at grass and are feeding at the public crib, and they feel these are very bright and prosperous days for them. But are these times prosperous to the country with its depleted population, with its depressed industries, with its population increasing during the last decade less than 12 per cent, when the normal increase shall have been 30 per cent? No, they were not prosperous times for the country. The hon. gentlemen opposite remind me of a story regarding a doctor. He was called in to see a man's wife, and the man asked him how his wife was. The doctor replied that his wife was getting along very well. He came next day and the man again asked him how his wife was, and the doctor replied she was progressing favourably. He called the next day and was again asked how she was progressing, and the doctor said, "There is a marked improvement." That night the wife died. Some neighbours asked what was the matter and the man said he could not exactly tell but, as near as he could make out from the doctor's description of the case, she died of too much improvement. That is about what is the matter with this country. It is dying of too much of this improvement, this brightness and progressiveness, with members of the Treasury benches drawing salaries and feeding on boodle, it is a bright and prosperous time in their history.

Mr. CHARLTON.

Mr. BERGIN. Where does the laugh come in?

Mr. CHARLTON. I cannot delay to perform a surgical operation on the hon. gentleman to get a joke into his brain, as I have no time to-night. In the next breath, the Minister of Finance admitted the truth of the charge we have been making, for he said that Canadians had been driven out of Canada by thousands in consequence of Grit misrepresentations. He admitted the exodus, but he did not properly state the cause. He alleged that thousands had been driven away by Grit misrepresentations. Do hon. gentlemen suppose that to be the fact? No, these people were tired of unjust laws, of oppression, of taxes, of boodle, of shamelessness, of Caron squirms, and left it to the Tories, who are misruling it and rushing it to ruin.

I have been asked what is our policy. I will state very briefly what I understand some of the features of our policy to be. We want a Government in power that will give the same consideration to farmers, lumbermen, labourers, fishermen, and the great mass of the producing community as they are disposed to give to manufacturers. We want a policy that will give fair-play and even-handed justice, and no special favours. That is the kind of policy we want. We want a Government that will not talk about economy and let it end in mere talk, but a Government that will practise economy, a Government that will reduce burdens, not to a paltry extent, but will give the country some adequate measure of relief. We want a Government that will make an honest effort to secure reciprocity, a Government that will not abuse and deceive the people by a game of deception and false promises and pretenses with regard to their policy, but a Government that will make an honest effort to secure this greatest of all attainable boons for the people of this country. Do the hon. gentlemen suppose that this Government is capable of doing this? Can the leopard change its spots; can the Ethiopian change his skin? Can this Government become an honest, respectable, prudent, economical Government worthy of the confidence of the people of Canada? Well, I do not know. I suppose miracles might be performed, but the age of miracles is passed, and you take such a Government as this, a Government of timber limit distributors, of Yankee gerrymander imitators, of franchise list stuffers, of expense incurrers, of debt creators, of tax advancers, of money squanderers, of contract sweaters, of bonus tollers, of boodle conspirators, of inquiry dodgers; why, such a Government never can be respectable. It is never to be dreamed of that they can be, and a people that expect to reform such a Government or ever to enjoy the blessing of good government under them, is a people that is doomed to be deceived. Their offences, Sir, are rank and smell to Heaven, and the sooner the people of this country can get rid of them the better.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). Mr. Speaker, I can promise the House one thing at least, which I am sure hon. gentlemen will be very glad to hear, and that is that I shall not take up much of the time of the House as the hon. member who has just preceded me has done. Sir, the present is a very important period in the history of the country, and before this House there is a measure of perhaps vaster importance than any that has ever been brought down by the Government since the year 1879. I, for one believe that the people of this country are fairly well seized of the facts concerning the National Policy and the changes in the tariff which are now proposed; and, Sir, believing that I have some idea of business, hoping at least that I have; I know very well that the business interests of this country demand that the decision of the House, upon this question, should be come to at the earliest possible moment. Therefore, I shall not take up so much time as my hon. friend who preceded me. I believe, Sir, that the Conservative party of this country can at least claim the credit of fulfilling its pledges. I believe that if there is one point of difference between the two parties, the one in power and the other striving to attain power, it is that we of the Conservative party have never made a pledge to the people of Canada which we have not fulfilled. Talk about the National Policy as you like. Talk about it if you will in the terms we have just heard from the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton); I retort and tell him that at least we have been consistent. Ours has been a consistent policy, and not like theirs; a rag on every bush. I tell my hon. friend, too, and I tell hon. gentlemen upon the other side of the House: that before they ever acquire or obtain the confidence of the people of this country, they must change their methods and they must learn the important fact: That they cannot chew meal and whistle at the same time. If I understood the hon. member (Mr. Charlton) aright, when he began his address this afternoon, and endeavoured to refute the remark made by the Controller of Customs: that our opponents, the Liberal party, had tied themselves to commercial union; the hon. gentleman (Mr. Charlton) declared that that was not true, that the Liberal party of this country had never taken that attitude and that no Liberal of any distinction in the party had ever done so. Well, Sir, the hon. gentleman said a moment ago that the Ethiopian cannot change his skin nor the leopard its spots, and the hon. gentleman himself is the best illustration of that adage whom I have ever known. Why, Sir, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Charlton) himself made a speech—and it just so happens that I have it in my hand, not at all supposing that the hon. member would allude to it—he made a speech just about the time that Mr. Wiman—and I mention that gentleman's name without the slightest disrespect at all—was in this country in the year 1888. It was that period when commercial union was having its fling in this country and when the Liberal party was standing up to it almost to a man.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). Yes, and I will prove it before I get through.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) You have a big contract on hand.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). I will accept the hon. member for Prince Edward Island. Here is a quotation from a speech of the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) at that time:

Mr. Charlton first proceeded to explain the meaning of the term commercial union. It was, he said, simply a customs union between two or more independent States, where a common tariff and excise laws were adopted, and the revenue collected after deducting expenses, the balance was divided among the participants upon the basis of population or any other basis that might be agreed upon while all trade restrictions between them were removed.

The hon. gentleman was paving the way for that; he was trying to form public opinion upon it in one of our western counties. He continued :

The application of the principle between Canada and the United States would require that the two countries should have the same excise rates and the same tariff upon imports from all other countries.

That is just exactly what Mr. Wiman argued. I am reading words that came from the lips of the hon. member (Mr. Charlton), who, when contradicting the declaration of my hon. friend, the Controller of Customs, declared : that no man of any distinction in his party had ever allied himself to commercial union. Then, Sir, it follows that you have no place in the ranks of your own party.

Mr. CHARLTON. I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon. I think what I said was : That the party never committed itself by resolution or otherwise, although individual members of the party might have done so.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). I have not 'Hansard' to refer to, but I listened to you with great attention on that point, and I believe my memory is right, because I had a distinct recollection of your utterances on the occasion to which I allude.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Are not you getting too direct now ?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). Then I will direct myself to the hon. gentleman who has just reminded me that perhaps I should have addressed the Chair. I think it was the hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) himself, who in 1888, that period when commercial union was in the air, moved in this House :

That it is highly desirable that the largest possible freedom of commercial intercourse should obtain between the Dominion of Canada and the United States and that it is expedient that all articles manufactured in, or the natural products of either of the said countries, should be admitted free of duty into the ports of the other, (articles subject to duty or excise or of internal revenue alone excepted). That it is further expedient that the Government of the Dominion should take steps at an early date to ascertain on what terms and conditions, arrangements can be effected with the United States for the purpose of securing full and unrestricted reciprocity of trade therewith.

If unrestricted reciprocity does not mean : trade without any restrictions whatever, then I am at a loss to understand the plain meaning of two English words very common and very much used. It may be said by hon. gentlemen—it was said by my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition to the Minister of Finance, when he was making his speech : Why do you alter this policy, why do you change it all ? Well, Sir, I believe it has been the practice of this Government ever since the inception of that policy, to make changes from time to time, as the necessities of the case required it. I believe, Sir, that that fact cannot be contradicted. A tariff, after all, is but the emanation of human minds, and we cannot control or guide the future. Circumstances differ ; prices vary ; new conditions of trade arise ; new industries spring up ; and all these have a varying effect upon an existing tariff. If any man should declare that a tariff ought to be perpetual and ought not to be changed in any respect, I would simply say that it would be an outrage for a people to pay taxes in order to keep up asylums and to allow him to run at large. I never met a man who would take that position. Now, Mr. Speaker, I will not take time to go over the different items, or to show the different respects in which we have made changes in this tariff since it became the law of the land. That has been done by those who have preceded me. I will say, this, however, that from its very inception, the principle that has been always kept in view has been that stated on the floor of this House by our late lamented chief, Sir John Macdonald, in that historic resolution which declared that the Customs duties should be so readjusted that, whilst producing a sufficient revenue to meet the necessities of the country, they would at the same time afford a degree of protection to the manufactures of the country. Sir, a careful examination of the policy of the Liberal-Conservative party during the fourteen or fifteen years of the existence of this tariff, will show, as I have said, that we have been true to the record in that respect. But with regard to our opponents, I have only mentioned one departure in their policy, that is, the demand for commercial union. I do not propose to go over all the various changes that have taken place in their policy. But I do say that the policy contained in the amendment submitted to the House last night by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) is the most indefinite that I have ever yet seen. It simply proposes nothing that you can get at and argue from. During the whole course of this debate, notwithstanding all that they have said about the changes which the Government have made in this tariff, there has not come from hon. gentlemen opposite one single suggestion or one single word as to any change that we should make in it. Until they come down to some practical basis on which they can place their policy before the country, they may expect to continue in Opposition. Now, Mr. Speaker, the work involved in amending this tariff has not by any means been light. I believe that those who were intrusted with the preliminary work in connection with it have at least tried to do the best they could. We have an example in the United States of the great difficulty involved in any such undertaking ; and, in view of what we see in that country, I think that we may say with pardonable pride that we have not allowed the grass to grow under our feet in fulfilling the great task that we have had in hand. I think that all Canadians, whether Grit or Tory, and of whatever nationality, must view with pride the fact that we have met the wishes of the people and have fulfilled our pledges to the extent that we have done. Be the result popular or unpopular, in the interest of the country or not, we have done it at once, in obedience to what we believed to be the feeling in the country. What progress has been made in the country to the south of us, either in point of time or in point of carrying out the solemn pledges that the reigning party there gave to the people? We can all unite in pointing to the immense superiority of the institutions of our country to those of the United States in regard to giving to the people good, sound remedial legislation, and giving it promptly and effectually. Now, in the work of revising the tariff the principle of protection has been kept steadily in view. There were several prominent features of the question to which our attention and the attention of the country had been drawn. The great iron industry of the country was one of the first things that needed consideration. The question that arose was this: was the iron industry of this country to be destroyed or not? Should we, after having made the attempt that we did to develop that great industry—and every nation in the world that has ever amounted to any thing has developed such an industry by a heavy rate of protection—should we continue that protection, or allow that industry to go to the wall? I believe the great consensus of opinion throughout this entire country is that that great industry, for the encouragement of which we possess all the elements of success, ought not to be allowed to perish. It was so decided; and we have come down with the scale of iron duties so distributed that while we give additional protection to the iron makers of the country, we at the same time arrange it so that it involves a cheapening of the iron products to the farmers. This has been the basis of what we have done in respect to the iron interest of Nova Scotia; and I have reason to believe and hope that before very long in many other parts of the country we shall see blast furnaces erected. I am aware that that hope has been held out before; but I believe that now, in the altered condition of affairs, we are in a better position for the erection and carrying on of blast furnaces in the province of Ontario or any other part of Canada than we ever were before. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), who preceded me, surprised me beyond expression this afternoon when he stated that the National Policy had never done anything for the farmers. I very well remember that when that policy was introduced the rate of interest on ordinary mortgages ran from 8 to 10 or 11 per cent. There is not a man on either side of this House that will deny that fact. To-day, if a farmer goes into any town in the province of Ontario at least, and offers a fair investment on his farm, if he goes in the morning, before twelve o'clock at noon, there will be a half-a-dozen lawyers trying to get that mortgage at 5 or 5½ per cent. Now, what has brought that about?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The National Policy of course.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). The National Policy of course. I am not foolish enough to think that any one policy can make up for brains, activity, energy, and application; but I do mean to say that the National Policy has been a very important factor in bringing about that state of things. At all events, we must admit that it is not to blame for bringing interest down from 10½ to 5 or 6 per cent. The hon. gentleman will not say that. I might go on with a comparison, which has often been made in this House, regarding investments in the different banks throughout the country. Speaking for that part of the province of Ontario, known as Eastern Ontario, from which I come, I say that the people there are prosperous, contented, and happy. On making inquiry, as I have done, at the different banks, I learned that the deposits made by the farmers exceed now what they have ever been before. I make that statement, and am prepared, if required, to give the names of the bankers, some of whom are not in touch with me in politics, who will bear it out. I say further, that there are less mortgages on farming property in that portion of the province than ever before. When my hon. friend says that nothing we have ever done has helped the farmers, I wish to draw his attention to the following comparison of duties on the different kinds of farm produce, during the time his friends were in power and since that time.

Now, if that is no benefit to the farmers, I have nothing more to say upon that head. The hon. gentleman can go out to the country and try and convince them it is not. In the changes brought down by the Minister of Finance the other day, I submit that the interests of the farmers have been kept in view. I submit that, with regard to no particular class of the people, was the Government more concerned than the farming community. We realize the vast importance of the farming interest. At the same time we know that although the farming interest is paramount to that of every other class, nevertheless the farmer is a reasonable being, quite willing to live and let live, quite willing to do what he can to assist manufacturing industries in so far as regards giving them a fair measure of protection. This afternoon, my hon. friend, the Controller of Customs, gave $400,000,000 as the total products of the farms. I think perhaps he underestimated the amount. The paper to which he alluded was one prepared by the Dominion statistician at the request of the Hon. John Young, once Provincial Treasurer of Ontario; and it was proved by Mr. Young that about $500,000,000 would represent the entire products of the farms. Out of that $500,000,000 worth, it is interesting to know that only a little more than one-tenth is exported. What does that prove? It proves conclusively the immense advantage of the home market. Too much attention may be paid to the foreign market. Two elections occurred in 1891, won by our opponents—two memorable contests that were surprises to us on this side of the House. One was in Welland and the other in North Essex. Now, if you will just follow me for one moment I think I can draw from these a lesson which will prove to any reasonable person the immense advantage of a home market. Each of these localities juts into a large American city—the county of Welland into Buffalo, and the county of North Essex into Detroit. Now, we are not legislating here for any two constituencies, so that whilst I admit, under some circumstances, there might be some advantage to the home market, the very same reason applies to the county of York in its relation to the city of Toronto, and it applies too in the case of almost every interior town; and the last census discloses this fact that the urban or city population has increased about 600,000. We have added by this policy that amount to the consuming element in these different places, and to that extent we have helped the farmer. I was not surprised on reflection that these two constituencies were lost to us then. But I draw from that fact this argument, that if we were to depart altogether from the policy of protection we would find it utterly impossible to maintain the same population in the towns, our local markets would suffer, and the farmers would suffer in consequence. But why argue the question of free trade or protection? When you ask hon. gentlemen opposite if they are in favour of free trade, you cannot get an answer. They may say they would have it in some distant period—in the millennium period—but that is many years hence. You could not get an hon. gentleman on that side to say that he would do his best to bring about free trade, if his party were in power tomorrow. They dare not crystallize such a policy into a resolution. No doubt in the country, in the ranks of hon. gentlemen there are many who believe they are free traders, and that if they once get into power they would sweep down the tariff wall between this country and the other side. But I am very much mistaken if the people are not rapidly coming to the conclusion that our opponents are not as practical as men should be who are striving to attain power in this country, and to govern the country on a business basis. The hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) referred also to what he called commission hunters, and spoke the other day of the two Controllers as the devil's advocates. With regard to commissions, if we wanted an example, I certainly could point to the Hon. Sir Oliver Mowat, the chief of the Ontario party, at all events; and I do not know that any Government ever held the reins of power in any one province, which has followed the system of appointing commissions to a greater extent than the Government of Sir Oliver. One of his recent acts, I believe, has been to appoint a commission to see whether the fee system is all right. We are well aware that, in 1878, there was in this country a very strong feeling, a feeling that was observed by almost everybody, in favour of tariff reform; not tariff reform on a descending scale, but tariff reform rather on an ascending scale. To this fact gentlemen on the other side resolutely shut their eyes. They turned deaf ears to those who came to them. They knew it all and would give no relief. They went to the wall—they went into opposition and they have been there ever since. Now, we do not adopt that course. Whether our action has been right or wrong in point of policy or as a matter of right; we, realizing, as expressed by the Finance Minister a year ago, that there was a feeling among the people in favour of some change, decided that an investigation should be made. We took exactly the course that has been taken by almost every Government in the world when it wished to ascertain the true state of public opinion—we went among the people, and if the hon. member for South Oxford wants the report of the Controllers, I tell him he can have them.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Let us have them.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). And that at no very great cost.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Let us have them.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). Move for them in the usual way.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It is your duty to present them; you have been paid out of the public fund.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). Mr. Speaker, I submit that the course taken by the Government resulting in the changes which have been announced by the Finance Minister, after the most careful investigation, is perfectly consistent with the course we have pursued year after year since the National Policy came into force. Personally, my opinion is that, as between expansion of trade with the United States on the one hand and expansion of trade with Great Britain on the other hand, our interest lies in the increase of our trade with Great Britain. In saying this I have not the least desire or disposition to belittle our advantages in trading with our neighbour. But if I have read at all correctly the history of the United States and of their actions toward ourselves, I am right in saying that they have been actuated by no other motive than one—and properly so—that one motive being the desire to advance the interests of the United States. The speech of the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) to-day was based, as the speeches of so many other hon. gentlemen on his side are, upon the delusion that if they get into power they can influence the Government of the United States. Well, perhaps they can; but I do not believe that even he could do it. They legislate entirely in their own interest, and not in the interest of Canada. Now, Mr. Speaker, following out the question of the condition of the farmer, I desire to draw the attention of the House again, though it has been referred to by other speakers, to the value of our trade with the United States and with Great Britain relatively. I shall not go into that question exhaustively at all. But, as I see it, one of the widest distinctions between the policies of the two parties—so far as I can make out, the policy of the hon. gentlemen opposite and ourselves—is that they, in all their arguments and all their policy, point southward, while we, in all that we propose so far as expanding trade is concerned, proceed upon the theory that the best business interests of this country require that we should seek rather to direct the current of our trade towards Great Britain. I have here the figures showing the exports of animals and agricultural produce to Great Britain and the United States respectively for the last four years :

| | Great Britain. | United States. |
|-----------|----------------|----------------|
| 1890..... | $ 22,240,548 | $ 13,485,727 |
| 1891..... | 26,245,171 | 11,608,225 |
| 1892..... | 39,187,861 | 8,509,703 |
| 1893..... | 42,495,261 | 8,083,955 |
| | $130,168,841 | $41,687,610 |

Mr. Speaker, we are, as has been stated before competitors with the United States in almost everything that the soil can produce. We have in this country, I believe, the climate and other conditions to produce the best cereals, and the best things the earth can produce as well : and I hold that this country is destined not only to develop its resources for internal trade, but at length to compete successfully with the United States in the markets of the world. People talk about our protection as if the system had existed here for thirty or forty years. But, compare us in this respect with other countries. I do not think that people realize what has been so often referred to, that under enactments in force two hundred years ago in Great Britain, it was almost a criminal offence for an English artisan to leave his country and seek employment in a foreign workshop. England came down to free trade. Certainly. But the prediction of Cobden that within twenty or thirty years every other nation would adopt the same principle has never been fulfilled ; to-day she stands almost alone as an example of a free trade nation. In the United States they have had a period of protection of thirty or forty years. In this country many of the industries affected by the tariff we have brought down have not yet had more than six or eight years' protection, yet you ask us to stand upon an even footing with these older nations that have had protection for so many years. If I understood the remarks of my hon. friend from North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), the great difference between the policy he advocates and the policy we advocate is that, while we retain the semblance of protection, he would adopt a revenue tariff, making free trade his ultimate goal. You nod your head—I am right in that. Then you would dispense with every vestige of protection—am I right there ? You do not nod your head this time.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think we have made it plain enough—read the resolution.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). Let me say a word, Mr. Speaker, about the increase of the exports of agricultural produce, notwithstanding the McKinley Bill. This is a very important feature of our trade since the passage of that Bill. I admit that we were hit by that tariff—it would be nonsense not to say so. But we were not hit so hard that we did not recover very quickly, and we did it simply by diverting our trade from the United States to Great Britain. We did not do that through any desire to injure them, but because they had struck a blow at us. They put the duty on barley ; we did not. The arguments of hon. gentlemen in this House and on the platform all tend to the fallacious and erroneous idea that we are to blame for all this ; but it was the doing of the United States. The following figures show the exports of cereals from Canada to all countries before and since the McKinley tariff came into operation :—

| Barley | $ 4,600,409 | $ 944,355 |
| Oats | 256,156 | 2,553,910 |
| Pease | 1,884,912 | 2,578,632 |
| Beans | 250,044 | 355,682 |
| Wheat | 338,861 | 7,060,033 |
| Buckwheat | 24,028 | 277,681 |
| Totals | $7,404,410 | $13,770,293 |

Now, if the United States ever did anything that was to the benefit of this country, it was in passing the McKinley Bill, enacted, I think, in a spirit of unfriendliness, at all events, not in a neighbourly spirit. But it had this effect, the effect that was once predicted by the hon. member for South Oxford when he was addressing an audience, I think, in Prince Edward Island, it had the effect of showing us what our people could do if driven into a corner. Now, Sir, our opponents met in the city of Ottawa last summer, and they passed certain resolutions. I have looked over those resolutions very carefully. It was a very large gathering, no doubt. The weather was very warm, but nevertheless they worked very hard, and produced what is called a policy. You cannot, of course, expect that they are going to be very definite. Too much cannot be expected of a political leader or party in Opposition, but what that policy lacks is just what their policy always did lack: that degree of definiteness, which, after all, is necessary to satisfy the people before you can expect them to turn a ruling party out of office. I turn to some of the planks, and I find one regarding the Senate. Now, it is popularly supposed that the Liberal party is in favour of wiping out the Senate.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I beg your pardon.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). I am glad to get an expression from one hon. gentleman on the other side to the effect that such is not the case. But you say you want to change the constitution of the Senate in such a way and in such an extent as will make it more representative of the people. Now, I will be glad to hear, during the course of this debate, or during this session, just in what particular you propose to alter its character. I am inclined to think that you have made that a plank in your platform with a very big reservation, namely, that it will be a subject for consideration when you get into power. Now, Sir, much has been said on the subject of coal oil, and that is a point I omitted to mention when I was speaking of the proposed changes in the tariff. I would remind hon. gentlemen opposite that the protection afforded this industry was largely owing to the legislation of hon. gentlemen opposite. I would remind them of something that they perhaps do not know, that when they came into power there was an excise duty of 5 cents per gallon on coal oil, and they wiped it out. I would say furthermore that in the visits of myself and colleagues to the farmers this summer we heard no great complaint among them on the subject of coal oil. We found that they appreciated the legislation that had taken place in that regard, and the efforts that had been made to cheapen that product to the consumer. I believe that the provisions in the proposed Bill, if it passes this House, will greatly improve the regulations concerning that article, and greatly cheapen it to the farmer. I have only a word or two to say about the exodus, and then I have done. We have heard a great deal about that, session after session, and year after year. I need not remind my hon. friends opposite of a fact which they know very well, that undoubtedly much of the apparent loss of population during the last ten years was due to a change in the mode of taking the census. The hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies), himself, had admitted as much. I think that a sufficient degree of importance has never yet been given to that fact by the people. Sir, I submit that it is unfair to compare the census returns of 1881 and 1891 for the reason I have stated; but I will say this, that I have never yet met any man who could convince me that by the adoption of free trade, or anything approaching it, you could retain all our population in this country, and prevent any exodus. We are told that free trade will develop our minerals; we were told so this afternoon. I never yet knew a valuable mine in this country of any kind that has remained undeveloped for the want of capital, if the mineral was there. I grant you that in regard to one product, that of iron ore, we might be benefited; but, speaking generally, let hon. gentlemen point out a single gold mine, or silver mine, or any other mines of importance, or of real and genuine value, and there will be no want of capital to work it.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville).

Mr. CHARLTON. How about copper mines?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). Will you tell me to what extent they are developed in this country? The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) to-night endeavoured to prove by an elaborate calculation, based upon a method of mathematical reasoning, that I did not quite understand, that an immense number of Canadians were living in the United States. Well, if he goes on in the same way for another session or two he will prove that almost every man in the United States is a Canadian. I do not undertake to say that his figures are not right; but I have never yet heard from him or from any other member on that side of the House, a single argument to prove, by inference or by any other kind of logic, that if you had free trade or unrestricted reciprocity you would not have even a greater exodus from this country to the United States. I believe that the adoption of the National Policy in this country was the one means that prevented a much greater exodus than that which has taken place. I have not the slightest doubt that had it not been for the adoption of that policy at that particular junction in our history, the exodus to the United States would have been greater than we have ever seen it yet. I say that the condition of things prior to the adoption of that policy were favourable to an exodus. We know that the workshops were being closed, we know that deputation after deputation were coming here. I know this is an old story, but we must repeat the old stories sometimes when circumstances require. People were coming here from all parts of the country only to be met with discouragement. The country swept the then Government out of power. Why? Were the people all fools, then? Admitting they were fools once, they were not fools again in 1882.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. No. They were gerrymandered that time.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). I am very glad the hon. gentleman has mentioned that matter. That assertion served his purpose very well for some years. But, in 1891, his party gained in the province of Ontario, which, as alleged by him, was gerrymandered. Owing to the unfortunate attitude taken by the press of the country and hon. gentlemen opposite, the people of that province believed that they suffered from certain ills, which were imagined, and that the panacea for all such ills was free trade. What was the result? We suffered loss in Ontario, especially in the west; but down by the sea in the Maritime Provinces, where the knife had never entered, where no gerrymander had taken place, hon. gentlemen opposite were nailed to the cross. Since that time I have heard very little about the gerrymander; but if the hon. gentleman wishes to hear more, I refer him to his provincial political chief, Sir Oliver Mowat. In conclusion, I simply desire to say this, that as a Canadian I have faith in the country, I believe in the destiny of Canada, and I have never wavered in that belief, and I will do hon. gentlemen opposite the justice to say that if they got into power to-morrow they would find that the best course they could adopt for the interests of the people of Canada would be to follow in the footsteps of those that had preceded them. I believe that Canada has a future ahead of her far greater than that which lies behind.

Mr. McMULLEN. I cannot allow this opportunity afforded me, as the representative of an agricultural constituency, to pass without offering a few observations on this very important question, and I must say that I have a very easy task to perform in answering the hon. gentleman who had just taken his seat. He commenced by discussing the question of potatoes, and he went from that to the Senate, then he came back to coal oil, and he wound up by referring to the exodus. Those were the four points to which he confined his remarks. In the first place, he said that the great question was the question of ins and outs, one party was in power and the other was out of power. The hon. gentlemen opposite are in power, they occupy the Treasury Benches, and they are willing to sacrifice any principle if the country will only allow them to stay there. As I have stated on more than one occasion in this House, they very much resemble a wooden weathercock on top of a barn. It always points the way the wind blows, and they are quite willing to turn in any direction they think will be popular and allow them to remain where they are. One session they will advocate a certain line of action, and the next session they will swallow all their previous professions as they have done on the question of sugar duties. Last year they were opposed to admitting sugar up to No. 16 Dutch standard, although the West Indies were very anxious to establish trade with Canada, if the Dominion would only accept from them sugars up to that grade. Hon. gentlemen opposite would not do that; but this year they find in order to meet public sentiment and comply with the expressed and pronounced will of the people for a reduction in tariff, that it is desirable to come down and accept sugars up to No. 16 Dutch standard. The Controller of Inland Revenue has taken credit to himself and his colleagues for the very arduous duties they performed in their peregrinations throughout this Dominion getting information with respect to proposed changes in the tariff. This is rather amusing. Although hon. gentlemen opposite are in this House backed by 80, 90, or 100 followers, they are so entirely ignorant of the views of their constituents as regards the changes that should be made in the tariff that the Finance Minister and two of the Solomons with whom he has surrounded himself, had to start on a mission throughout this Dominion to find out what the people wanted. Their followers were not in a position to tell them, the Government could not trust them for information, and even the hon. and intelligent representative for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) was not able to convince the Government that the people in the North-west wanted a change, and the Finance Minister, with the Minister of Agriculture, took occasion to visit the North-west and gather the information for themselves. What a compliment this was to the hon. and intelligent representative from West Assiniboia and the constituents who sent him to this House. If I were a supporter of a Government that treated me and my constituents in that fashion, I would have as little confidence in it as they had in me. It is nothing short of a positive insult to every constituency represented by a Conservative that the Government should have gone round gathering information and ignoring the representatives sent by the different constituencies to this House. Still the Controller of Inland Revenue took great credit to himself and those associated with him for the meritorious duties they performed in that regard. The hon. gentlemen opposite are fond of following British precedents. I should like them to point out in British history any case in which the Government adopted the course which the hon. gentlemen opposite have pursued in peddling around, seeking to find out what changes the people wanted in order to be able to meet public sentiment. They cannot find any such instance, there is not one on record. The hon. Controller of Inland Revenue spoke with respect to the iron duties. It is quite clear from the changes made in the iron duties that hon. gentlemen opposite are not going to lower the price of iron. They will probably encourage the production of iron in Canada by taxing scrap iron. I have no objection to have blast furnaces established here, for we have mountains of iron, and I should be pleased to see our iron resources developed. But if the hon. gentlemen opposite are anxious under the operation of the policy to develop our iron resources, they should do it by a bounty and not by a duty. Why should the farmer be bound to bear enormous burdens in order to develop our iron mines by means of duty? I contend that if the Government are going to develop the iron industry, the men who do not use iron as well as those who use iron should be called upon to contribute. If they had followed the example set them by the United States, they would have rather tried to develop our resources in iron, entirely or nearly so by a bounty, without placing it in such a shape that a very large responsibility and a largely increased tax falls upon our farmers. The hon. gentleman states that farmers are now able to borrow money at less interest than they could years ago. That is very true, but does the hon. gentleman claim that the National Policy has a right to be credited with that? Why, Sir, centuries after this, after the National Policy has been dead and buried and forgotten, if it ever should rise from its grave and read the epitaphs engraved on its tombstone by the present Government and its supporters, it will be surprised and astounded that it was ever the father of so much good to Canada as they gave it credit for. Hon. gentlemen opposite give the National Policy credit for everything. They gave it credit for the reduced rates of interest on money, for the prosperity they say exists in the country, for keeping the people in the country when they are fleeing from it, and for anything and everything that they can possibly lay their tongues upon. They have told us in this debate, and they have told us frequently before, about the home market, but the fact is, the home market is a delusion. It is a delusion that President Cleveland, one of the greatest statesmen on this continent, has described in the following words. Addressing the Secretary of the Farmers' Alliance of the United States, Mr. Cleveland said:

Struggle as they may, our farmers cannot escape the conditions which fix the prices of what they produce, and according to the rates which prevail on foreign markets flooded with the competition of countries enjoying a freer exchange of trade than we. The plausible pretensions of the blessings of the home market should not deceive our oppressed and impoverished agriculturists. There is no market for them which does not take

In dealing with the question of the home market, President Cleveland, who has been elected to the highest position of that great republic, points out to the farmers of the United States, that the value of their product is not enhanced by the protection that is supposed to be given, but that the intrinsic value of their product is fixed by the price that can be got for it in the foreign market. That is a principle that cannot be successfully controverted. The hon. member for Brockville (Mr. Wood) said something with regard to our country. We have, unquestionably, a grand country; we feel proud of the country in which we live; we believe we live in a country the climate and soil of which is equal to any other on the American continent; we claim that if this country were blessed with an economical and prudent Government, and with a capable Government, that its future would be a bright and glorious one. But we claim also, that during the last fifteen years the policy adopted in Canada has vastly retarded our progress. We have not been able to keep our population within our borders; they have been fleeing from us. We have not made that progress that we would have made had the people not been crippled and shackled by the policy that has been enforced here. Had our people been left severely alone by the Government and allowed to work out their own destiny, had they been left free to buy where they could to the best advantage and to sell where they could sell to the best advantage, restricted only by the necessities of revenue, the condition of this country would be immensely better than it is. The hon. gentleman has told us that Canada is not responsible for the McKinley Bill. He may say so, but, after all, there is a certain percentage of responsibility for it resting upon the occupants of the Treasury benches. For instance, what did they do when the United States allowed fresh fruit to come into their country duty free? For two years they worried along before they agreed to take the duty off fresh fruit, and when at last they did so, in order to satisfy those who were claiming protection on that commodity, they put a duty on the baskets. These gentlemen pursued from time to time a foolishly irritating course towards the United States, winding up with their discrimination in canal tolls, which eventually drove the States into a course with regard to Canada which resulted in the lamentable national relationship these two countries now occupy. Hon. gentlemen opposite brag that we have a British market. It is a grand thing, Sir, that we have got even that, because it is about the only thing that the National Policy has not robbed us of. What is our position to-day? Owing to the pernicious, crotchety, cranky course the Government has adopted against the people to the south of us, we have a tariff wall of, say, 35 per cent between us and the American market ; we have virtually a mountain raised 35 miles high, which our producers cannot get over. What market have we north of us ? We have not a customer until we go to the north pole. Where are our customers now ? We have got to go 3,500 miles east to get to the European customers, or 5,000 west to get to the western customers. I would ask any intelligent farmer, I would ask any intelligent citizen of any city, or any intelligent inhabitant of any town : What hope can there be for progress or prosperity when you separate any town, or city, or farmer, or country from the rest of the world in such a manner as that ? Place a farmer in a position that on one side of his farm he has a mountain and on the other a muskeg ; let him be 35 miles from his customers east, and 50 miles from a customer west, and what would be the value of a farm that was so located ? What would be the value of a city or town that was so circumstanced ? Yet, hon. gentlemen opposite have got Canada in that very position to-day by the course they have adopted, that irritating course which brought about the enactment of the McKinley Bill. I shall now make reference to some of the points touched upon by the Minister of Finance. In the opening of his speech, the hon. gentleman said that in a certain time, up to the month of December, the revenue of the country had kept well up to the ordinary amount, but then it began to fall off, and it fell off in consequence of the anticipated changes that would take place in the tariff. I would like to ask if the Minister of Finance can point to any other country in which a Finance Minister ever pursued such an impolitic and extraordinary course as he did, in publicly announcing a year ago that a decided change would take place in the tariff ? You will not find an English Minister of Finance getting up in the House of Commons in England and announcing that it is the intention of the Government to make very considerable changes in the tariff at the next session of Parliament. He would understand that to do so would be to throw into confusion the whole trade of the country. But our Minister of Finance had no hesitation in declaring that he and his colleagues intended to make changes in the tariff ; and then he comes down and announces that very serious reductions in the revenue have occurred in December, January, and February. It is not much wonder, because the people were waiting to see what changes were going to be made ; and the Minister himself is unquestionably responsible for any reduction that has taken place in the revenue. Then, he refers with pride to the fact that last year we sent $49,000,000 worth of produce to Great Britain, while we sent only $3,000,000 worth to the United States. The hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Wood, Brockville), also referred to that fact with considerable pride, as evidence that we are working up an extensive trade with Great Britain, while our trade with the United States is being restricted, and is growing beautifully less every year. Why is it that that is the case ? Simply because our people are forced to send their produce to Great Britain because they cannot send it anywhere else. They cannot send it to the United States. Place this country in the position in which it was before the McKinley Bill was passed, and you will find that the trade of this country with the United States will rapidly increase ; but since the passage of the McKinley Bill it has very seriously decreased, to the great loss of our people. Before the introduction of that Bill, barley and horses were extensively purchased in this country and shipped to the United States. But to-day the stables of our farmers are full of horses, for which they have no market ; and hon. gentlemen opposite have not done anything, and have not intimated their intention to do anything, in the direction of helping the farmers in the unfortunate position in which they are placed in that respect. We have something like 750,000 farmers in this country ; and I venture to say that 500,000 of those farmers have each at least two horses that they would be glad to dispose of ; that is a million horses in this country for which there is no market. I admit that the introduction of electricity has somewhat reduced the demand and the price of horses. The Controller of Customs says that there has been an increase in the number sent to England. But the number sent there are a mere bagatelle compared with the number that our people would be glad to sell. I myself proposed last year that in order to encourage the export of our surplus stock of horses, the Government should offer a bounty. I thought, when the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce was going to Australia, that he was probably going to hunt up a market for horses ; but I carefully read his speech delivered before the Board of Trade in Toronto on his return, and I found that, instead of having any encouragement for the farmers, he did not say a single word with regard to helping them. The whole object of his trip was to find an outlet in Australia for the manufactured goods of this country. He drew attention to the very large trade that was done there by the Massey-Harris Company. We are very glad of that ; but from the beginning to the end of his statement there was not one word said with regard to any advantage that his trip might have for the farmers of this country. Now, the hon. Minister of Finance tried very hard to confuse the public mind on the question of commercial union. Ever since that has been suggested, hon. gentlemen opposite have tried to frighten the people of this country as to what might be the outcome of establishing a relation of that kind between Canada and the United States. They have endeavoured to show that we would be entirely under the control of the United States ; but while commercial union was a policy suggested by Mr. Wiman, it never has been adopted by any member of the Reform party that I know of. The hon. Controller of Inland Revenue (Mr. Wood), who read to the House some words that were spoken by the hon. member of North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), after all failed to satisfy any intelligent mind that my hon. friend advocated the adoption of that principle. The Minister of Finance said that in the inception of protection the price of articles must necessarily be largely increased. That is very true. If we look back to the period when protection was introduced into this country, we shall see the position in which it placed the consumers. In 1880 our customs taxation was $14,130,000; in 1886, it was $19,448,000, or an increase in six years of $5,318,000, of taxes taken out of the people's pockets. In 1889 our customs taxation was $23,971,351, or an increase over the taxation of 1886, of $4,523,351. In the nine years, from 1880 to 1889, the customs taxation jumped up by over a million a year, the gross increase in those years being $9,841,351. That clearly shows that in the inception of the National Policy the people of this country were subjected to an enormous drain in the shape of increased taxation. I was amused that the very next word uttered by the Finance Minister was that the National Policy had not laid a heavy hand on the consumers of this country, but that it had dealt very gently with them. Well, Sir, if he would for a moment take a retrospective view of the operations of that policy during the years that it has been in existence, ready as he is to make statements wide of the mark in order to bolster up the National Policy, he would not have dared to make that statement. Then, the next thing he did was to compliment the people of this country that they did not pay any duty on their wool. They had free wool, they had free meat, and they had free dairy products. This statement brings me back some years to the time when the Finance Minister delivered one of his first budget speeches in this House. I can well remember the picture he drew to show to the people how thankful they ought to feel that they were not taxed in many ways. He commenced his little ditty on that occasion by describing how the farmer took his own sheep and clipped it himself; how he took the wool down to the little carding mill, run by the rivulet at the foot of his farm; how there it was carded; how he took it to his own industrious wife, and she spun the yarn, then how the little weaver, with his hand-shuttle, wove it; how he brought it thence to the fulling mill, and had it full-ed, and finally, how he took it back to his own house, got the country tailor to take the measure of all the inmates, and had garments made to cover them all. Then the hon. gentleman exclaimed: I would like to know what taxes that man pays. That whole picture is in keeping with his suggestion of to-day, that our farmers should be exceedingly thankful because our Finance Minister has not, in the changes he has made in the tariff, put a tax upon wool, butter and cheese. But if the National Policy remains in force ten years longer, and if the Government are driven to extremes for the purpose of raising revenue, I would not at all be surprised—should the Finance Minister continue to occupy the position he now holds—to see him put a tax upon wool, butter and cheese. He will be driven to the necessity of putting a tax on everything, and no doubt along with everything else, he would tax the air we breathe, if he possibly could. The hon. gentleman said that the people make the Government understand what they want, and the Government are quick to give effect to their wishes. Well, Sir, the people in 1891, by their votes, plainly and clearly indicated that they wanted reciprocity. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) has clearly and distinctly pointed out the treacherous advantage which was taken of the people on that occasion, when the Government dissolved the House and went to the country on the pretence of getting a verdict in favour of reciprocity with the United States. It cannot be too often reiterated, both in and outside the House, that by a gross abuse of power, the Government dissolved Parliament on the pretext that they were going to send a delegation to Washington to make a treaty with the United States. The people unwisely accepted their invitation, and returned a Government majority, anticipating that the Government would carry out its programme. But the people were fooled and deceived. There was no treaty and no honest attempt to obtain one. The farmers realize fully that it would be very much better had they more extended relations with the United States. They can well remember the advantages they enjoyed from 1854 to 1866 under the old reciprocity treaty. Those who are old enough to cast their eyes back upon the experience of those years express themselves in the strongest terms in favour of a renewal of the privileges we then enjoyed. And those who have not had that experience are still aware of the advantages that were enjoyed before the passage of the McKinley Bill, and know that an extended trade with the United States would be a decided advantage to us. Our farmers are not able to compete in the open British market with the cheap labour of the world. As the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) has said, how can you expect the Canadian farmer, who has to pay a dollar a day to an ordinary labouring man, to compete with the coolie of India, who can be hired at sixpence per day. How can you expect that he will be able to compete with the cheap labour of Europe in the production of those commodities which he has to sell in the British market against the open competition of the world? Were the American market open to us to-morrow, it would give us, not the very lowest prices the world can afford to pay for those commodities, but it would give us in many cases fancy prices. The hon. gentleman, speaking of the shipment of eggs to England, said a very large trade was growing in that direction. Why, take the experience of this country before the passage of the McKinley Bill, and what do you find? Did we then ship any eggs to Europe? No. And why? Because the American market was the best market for this commodity. It was the most convenient and lucrative market, and to that market we would go to-morrow, were it open to us, in preference to the English market. Let me briefly refer to the question of sugar, in the duty on which the Finance Minister has made some reduction. He has admitted 16 Dutch standard free, and has also reduced the protection on granulated sugar from 8-10 cent to 64-100 of a cent—64 cents on a 100 pounds. Now, on last year's importations and consumption of sugar the people paid 8-10 of a cent on 252,000,000 pounds, or $2,016,000. This they paid to the refiners of this country for refining the sugar, because it was sold up to the point at which it would be sold if we had to import it and pay the duty. He has taken a little slice off the sugar refined, in order to cultivate popularity with the consumers, and suppose we consume the same quantity next year that we did last, the people will still pay $1,600,000 to the refiners for refining the sugar we use. That is a pretty considerable sum which the people will have to pay for refining the sugar in this country. Another point the Minister of Finance spoke of was the deputations that are rushing to Washington from all parts of the United States for the purpose of urging that protection should still be respected in the United States, although the Democratic party had been elected on the platform that protection was a fraud. We all know from experience—we all know from the twisting and truckling to influences hon. gentlemen opposite have exhibited, that protection will die hard. It always does; it died hard in England. It took a long time, and a terrible struggle before the people of that country were relieved from the tyranny of protection. It will die hard in the United States. There are a great many Democrats, no doubt, interested in manufactures, who would like to see protection, notwithstanding the declaration of their party in favour of free trade. They have a personal interest in the matter. Why, at the introduction of protection into Canada we knew that the Reform party lost a considerable number of supporters who went over to the Tories on that question—not because of their conscientious conviction that protection was the best thing for the country, but from their personal conviction that it was the best thing for themselves. The result was that they left the Reform party and joined the ranks of the Tory party in order that they might have the advantage that protection would give them. In the United States, no doubt, they must experience something of the same kind as we have experienced here. No doubt protection will die hard in the United States as it dies hard in Canada. The hon. Finance Minister said that under the operation of the National Policy the free list was growing very large. There are some things on the free list that, in my humble opinion, might be well subjected to a duty. Take, for instance, diamonds; they come into this country duty free. What a matter of congratulation it must be to every farmer in the country to think that when he wants to present his wife with a diamond ring he can do so without being called upon to pay duty. Again, paintings that come in to decorate the lordly palaces of millionaires in Montreal and Toronto, come in free. But wall paper, up to this time, has paid from 45 to 60 per cent. The Government has reduced that to 35 per cent. I notice also that wire for piano strings comes in free, but wire for fencing is subject to a very considerable duty. Again, twine for fishing purposes and for making fishing tackle comes in free, but twine for farming purposes—binding twine—is subject to a duty of 12½ per cent. I had expected that the Finance Minister would place the consumers of twine upon an equal footing, and that he would say to the fishermen: If we tax the farmer for his twine, as a matter of simple justice, we must tax you. But the hon. gentleman knows that the fishermen are a very intelligent lot of people. I do not say but the farmers are the same. But the fishermen have been shrewd enough to secure this advantage. Were hon. members from the Maritime Provinces obliged to go to the fishermen with the information that there had been a duty of 10 or 12 per cent put on fishing twine and fishing tackle, they would have great difficulty in getting the fishermen's votes. But the farmers also are becoming enlightened on this subject. I am glad to see, for instance, that the Patrons of Industry have declared very distinctly their determination that the duty upon binding twine and the duty upon coal oil shall be reduced. Another thing the Finance Minister has done which, no doubt, he thinks very clever. He has offered the United States the opportunity to send corn free to us if they will give us the opportunity to send barley into their country free. This action is along a line of proposed reciprocity which the Americans have declared they will not accept upon any condition. If there is any one thing the Americans want to-day more than another, it is an outlet for their manufactured goods. The Americans export but a very small percentage of the entire products of the soil; and, in the course of a few years, if their population continues to grow as it has grown within the last few years, a small percentage of corn and a considerable quantity of cotton will be about the only articles of raw material which they will export. They do not consider it a favour of any country to receive from them corn free of duty. They will only laugh at the Finance Minister for placing corn upon our free list upon the condition that they shall admit barley free. They have already answered him upon that point; they have told him that the only ground upon which they are disposed to enter into trade relations with us in respect of the products of the soil, of the fisheries, of the forest, and of the mine, is that Canada shall admit free a list of manufactured goods. Why, consider the state of affairs during the time when we had in force the policy which the Finance Minister would renew—the time of the old Reciprocity Treaty, from 1854 to 1866. We know very well that during that time we sent more than twice as much to the United States as they sent to us. But, Sir, take even the period from 1887 to 1890—that is just before the passage of the McKinley Bill. The products of the farm sent to us by the Americans were $5,842,272. The leading items making up this amount were pork, lard, corn, and flour. During the same time, the exports from Canada to the United States, the products of the farm, were $16,561,447, of which the leading items were horses, sheep, barley, and eggs. The Americans have these facts and figures before their eyes, and can any man expect them, as sensible, intelligent people, to enter into a trade arrangement with us to exchange commodities of the farm of which we send to them three times as much as they send us. I desire to say a word with regard to carriages. The Finance Minister said last night that when he was announcing the change with regard to carriages, he announced that democrat carriages were to be admitted into Canada at a duty of 25 per cent; but—I do not know whether it was because of the towering influence of the whip on the Conservative side, or what was the cause—he had found that he had made a clerical error and that the duty was to be 35 per cent. Under the old tariff, democrat wagons up to the value of $50 were charged a duty of $10 each, and 20 per cent. But they removed them from that category and made them subject to a duty of 35 per cent, and democrats that were worth $100 they have kept up to 35 per cent, notwithstanding the fact that we imported only twenty-nine under the value of $100, and five over the value of $100. It is very singular what clerical errors are made. The fact is, we cannot come to any other conclusion than influences that make him do things, that the Finance Minister is subject to when he is giving his tariff speech that he would, perhaps, prefer not to do. Hon. gentlemen opposite have spoken of free trade in England. If they want to get a lesson of what free trade has done for England, let them compare her operations under free trade with her operations under protection, and they will very soon come to the conclusion that free trade has done a very great deal for England. If we consider the rapid growth of her trade under free trade, we will see that it has been a boon for that nation. In 1885 the aggregate trade of Great Britain was £642,000,000; in 1889 it was 742 millions, or an increase of 100 millions. But the best way to judge of England's position is to take her financial condition when she adopted free trade, and compare it with her position today. In 1837, when Queen Victoria ascended the Throne, the debt of England was £850,000,000 sterling. In 1846 she adopted free trade, and after that date she had the Russian war, she had her Indian mutiny, and she had other wars that cost her millions of money. She paid the cost of all those wars, and from the date that she adopted free trade down to the present time she has reduced her national debt by $900,000,000. That is a pretty good record of the effects of free trade in England. We would like to get our national debt reduced, but we will never get it reduced under protection. The experience of every country under protection has shown that their national debt has increased instead of decreased. Now, if we want to follow the noble example that has been set us by England, let us adopt the principle of permitting our people to trade in any part of the world they like, with the least possible restriction, and to sell their commodities in any part of the world where they can secure the best markets for them, and take off the shackles at home. We have a climate unquestionably equal to any in the world; we have a soil that is rich, and which would sustain a wealthy, thrifty and peaceable people, were we permitted to enjoy the privileges that we would enjoy under a system of free trade. But we are not permitted to do that, and our people have suffered the results. Now, Sir, hon. gentlemen opposite speak of the difficulties of cutting down the tariff. I contend that, if the Finance Minister wishes to be in a position to meet the demands that are made, and will continue to be made, upon him by interests which have got a footing in this country, he had better use the pruning-knife very vigorously upon those expenditures that the people of this country can well do without. Enormous expenditures have been carried on for years that we can well dispense with. There is no difficulty whatever in very considerably reducing the annual expenditure, if hon. gentlemen opposite are only willing. We want to abolish the Franchise Act, that costs the country $200,000 a year. We want to abolish the superannuation system, that costs this country $200,000 a year. We want also to abolish the bounty we are paying to the sugar-refiners of over a million and a half a year, money that is taken out of the pockets of the people and never reaches the Treasury of this country. We want to abolish the Senate. We want to dispense with the services of five Ministers out of the fifteen we have now. We honestly admit, that if the brains of the fifteen were compressed into ten heads, they would still do no more than make ten ordinary men.

I think we could well do with ten, and dispense with five of them. That would save us $200,000 a year. Then, we can save $200,000 a year on immigration. We have squandered an enormous amount of money on immigration—three millions and a half of money spent in ten years to bring people into this country, and, when we come to enumerate our population, we cannot find them in the country. If that has been our experience during the last ten years, we had better abolish the expenditure under the head of immigration. Then, we have a military school at Kingston that costs an enormous amount of money. We spend a million and a quarter each year under the head of militia. We have a commandant in charge of the school at Kingston to whom we pay $4,000 or $5,000 a year, and we find him a house that has cost us $12,000, and we pay all the necessary perquisites and pickings that give him a very comfortable limit. I do not know anything that he has done for us for which he is entitled to credit, but I notice that he has been training some carrier pigeons for his own amusement. These were very valuable vehicles of news 200 years ago before telegraphs were introduced. I see that he has one pigeon that flew all the way from Ottawa to Kingston. That was a wonderful feat for a pigeon to perform, and the people of the country are paying $4,000 a year to a man to train carrier pigeons to perform that kind of work. Well, if that is all he has done—and I do not see anything else he has done—we can well dispense with his services and the services of many more, and save half a million a year to the country. We can also reduce the expenditure on public works; we can reduce the expenditure on legislation; we can reduce the expenditure upon the Mounted Police. Why, we spent, year before last, $701,000 on the Mounted Police in the North-west, and last year a little less. I am glad to notice that it is coming down a little. I think we could well dispense with those Mounted Police, if they are kept there under the impression that the Indians and Half-breeds of the North-west are going to pounce upon and murder all the people that have gone there to settle. If that is the reason the Government are keeping up the Mounted Police, they are labouring under a very serious delusion, because the Indians and Half-breeds have no more idea of going to war with the white settlers of the North-west than the rats and mice of Ottawa have of going to war with the cats and dogs. I admit that the Minister of Trade and Commerce intimated, when he had a seat in this House, that the Mounted Police did very valuable work in the way of acting as preventive officers to prevent smuggling into the North-west. Sir, the best way to cure that kind of thing is to bring our tariff down below the American tariff. Put all the responsibility upon the Americans of preventing goods being smuggled from Canada into the United States, by reducing our tariff, and you will not need the Mounted Police. I tell you, more than that, the five millions of people in Canada are not able to bear the enormous expense that will have to be borne if we are going to keep up a full staff of preventive officers from the Atlantic to the Pacific to prevent goods from being smuggled from the United States into Canada. I say, also, that we will never get extended trade relations with the United States until we bring our tariff down low enough to place the onus upon the Americans of preventing smuggling from Canada into the United States. The moment the United States understand that they have got to keep up an enormous preventive force along the whole frontier to prevent goods from being smuggled from Canada into the United States, that moment they will come down to easy terms with regard to an interchange of trade; and they will never do it until our Government adopt that course. If the Finance Minister will do that, he will secure for us better trade relations with the United States than we have got at the present moment. Now, the Controller of Inland Revenue drew some attention to our trade with the United States as it existed after the passage of the McKinley Bill. Allow me to give the House a little information as to the enormous change that has taken place in the exportation of commodities from this country to the United States in 1890, the last year before the passage of the McKinley Bill, and in 1892, after that Bill had become law. Of horses, horned cattle, poultry, eggs, wool, flax, apples, barley, split peas, hay, malt, potatoes and vegetables, we sent in 1890 $10,570,486 worth. That was the last year before the McKinley Bill. In 1892 we sent these commodities only to the value of $4,079,246, or a drop of six and a half millions of the produce of the different kinds enumerated within those two years. I think that shows clearly the direction in which our trade with the United States has fallen off; that clearly gives the reason why we have only sent $3,000,000 worth last year in place of $10,000,000 worth before the McKinley Bill became law. I desire to refer to a few points adverted to by the Finance Minister in his eulogy with respect to the financial position of this country, and the position of the farmers. Every hon. gentleman declares that the farmers of this country are prosperous. When the hon. gentleman visited my county, and went through the riding, he complimented all the farmers on their comfortable houses and the evidences of comfort that were apparent. He appeared to think that the outward evidence of some comfort was proof of their financial position and prosperity. A doctor driving along a road might as well judge of the health of the inmates of the house by its outward appearance as to judge of the financial condition of the farmers by the outward appearance of their dwellings. A doctor might say that no sickness could prevail in that house, for it was a very fine and comfortable one, while some member of the family might be at the point of death. The Minister rides through the riding and observes some evidences of comfort, and forthwith he comes to the conclusion that every man is well-off. If you will examine the condition of the farmers to-day you will find that over ten million dollars worth of fat cattle are seeking buyers for export. The farmers of the western part of the province of Ontario are at their wit's end to know what they are going to do with respect to exporting fat cattle this spring. What has the Government done to open up that market? They have truly done nothing. While the American Government has sent experienced veterinaries into every port in England where American cattle are unloaded, for the purpose of looking after the cattle trade there, and while they have also guarded their interests with respect to the cattle trade with Germany, not a single veterinary has been appointed by Canada to the ports of debarkation in England to inspect cattle, report upon their condition, and protect the privileges we have enjoyed in that market. But we have a High Commissioner in London. He lives there, and enjoys all the advantages of a lordly life, at a cost of about $20,000 a year. What good is he as regards protecting the interests of our cattle trade? On one occasion he is supposed to have spoken a word in regard to the landing of a cargo of cattle, and whenever the question of the High Commissioner's salary and expenses has come before the House this action has been trotted out as evidence of the desirability of continuing the Commissioner in England. If our Government were anxious to protect the English market for the farmers of this country they would have placed in the ports where our cattle were landed experienced veterinaries to look after our interests. They have not done so. They have been pressed to do so by the cattle trade, they have been written to do so, and I have the proofs that they have not done anything to protect Canada in the English markets, that they never put forth a single effort or appointed one veterinary to watch Canadian interests, but left them to the mercy of English veterinaries. In that respect the Government have not discharged the duties which the farmers might reasonably expect they would perform in order to protect them in the English market. In regard to the price of wheat, I can testify to the truth of the remarks of the hon. member from North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton). The farmers in our section are feeding wheat to cattle, rather than sell it at one cent per pound. Again, peas are selling at 50 and 55 cents, barley at 30 and 35 cents, oats at 30 and 32 cents, and potatoes at 25 and 40 cents, live hogs at 4½ cents per pound, and hay at $6 a ton. I would like to know how it can be possibly expected that our farmers receiving such prices can be considered to be prospering and making money. The farmers of Western Ontario were never driven to their wit's end to make ends meet to such a degree as they are to-day. It is a blessing that money is so cheap, but if the farmers spoke the sentiments of their minds they would declare that their experience had never been so severe as during the last five years as regards the prices obtained for their commodities, and to-day they are at a loss to know how to turn in order to pay their way. Yet the Finance Minister, because he occupies a distinguished position at a salary of $7,000 a year and perquisites, has come to the conclusion that the farmers are contented and are well off. The Liberal party has been fighting a noble and determined fight for the last fifteen years. They fought against the National Policy at its inception and from that time to this they have endeavoured to expose the pernicious results of the adoption of that policy. Let me ask what has the National Policy done? It has carried rottenness and corruption to every department of this Dominion; it has demoralized our people, it has caused investigations from time to time, the results of which have excited surprise and wonder throughout the British Empire; so much so that the British press, both radical and tory, has declared that the blackened record of Canada was a disgrace. What have we got from it. We have got one man who has been picked out as a scapegoat and sent over to this side of the House to occupy a vacant Tory seat—and there he sits, a fossilized corruptionist, a living example of what exists amongst the men with whom he associated; men who have been blackened by their own acts, men so guilty that they are afraid to allow the people's representatives to investigate the crimes that would undoubtedly be fastened upon them as the result of an investigation by a committee of this House. What did the First Minister tell us when we asked that we should be allowed to investigate Section "B" scandal? He said: That the Minister at the head of the department had been back to his constituency who had justified the acts he was guilty of, if guilty of any. On this plea the House was not permitted to examine into that transaction at all. The people of this country are sick and tired of the condition of things existing, and they have now set their teeth with a determination, no matter who shall suffer, that these scandals shall be no longer perpetuated. Whoever occupies the Treasury benches of this country, we should be willing as patriotic men and honest men to shake hands across the chasm that separates us as to party, and we should be able, no matter what Government be in power, to say that the affairs of Canada must be honestly conducted. I hope that we have seen an end of the scandals and an end of the boodling, and when the history of Canada comes to be written, I sincerely trust that the historian will have to confine to the years of protection all the black spots upon our history. I believe that when we get rid of this protective system, we will be on the high road to prosperity, that our country will progress, that our population will increase, that we will become a progressive nation and that our people will reap in the future the advantages of the climate we enjoy, of the soil we inherit, and the advantage of being an important section of the British Empire. I do not desire further to detain the House. There are one or two things that I might draw attention to, but I shall reserve them for the opportunity which will present itself in connection with the resolution I have on the notice paper. I do hope that this discussion with regard to the tariff changes shall have a beneficial effect throughout the country. The Government unquestionably has made a change in the right direction and we are glad they have done so; but, Sir, I contend that they have not shown that generosity with the United States which they should have shown. What have they done in the matter of agricultural implements? Take the position which the Canadian manufacturer of these implements will occupy in relation to the American manufacturer. If the Wilson Bill becomes law, and in all probability it will, the Canadian manufacturer can send his implements unrestricted into the markets of the United States. Massey-Harris can manufacture his binders and his mowers, send them without duty into the United States and after he has enjoyed the advantages of that market, he can bring back the remnant of his stock, re-enter them as the product of Canada, and re-enter them duty free. Then he has the whole Canadian market to himself while at the same time he has free access to the American market. I would like to know if such a proposal as that, is any indication on the part of this Government of a disposition to encourage extended trade relations with the United States. I believe that such a policy clearly proves that the Government has no desire to cultivate extended trade relations with the people south of us. It shows, that while the United States is holding out to us the olive branch by removing the duty from agricultural implements, our Government answer their offer by putting a duty of 20 per cent on American implements coming in here. That policy only tends to irritate and annoy the people of the United States, and if, before the Wilson Bill becomes law they reimpose a similar duty upon Canadian implements entering the United States, they will only mete out to us the same measure we have meted out to them. Why is it, as we are told by hon. gentlemen opposite, that our Canadian manufacturer cannot compete with the manufacturer of the United States? Is not labour as cheap in Canada as it is there, is not living as cheap to the Canadian as to the United States citizen; then in the name of fortune, I ask, why is it that the Canadian manufacturer cannot compete with them? It is not

Sir, that he cannot compete, but that he does not want to. He wants to hold the market that he now enjoys. We have about 750,000 farmers in this country, and suppose that 500,000 farmers each require a binder, and suppose that the Massey-Harris Company turn out 40,000 a year—I believe they turned out that number last year—it would take them about twelve years to supply each farmer with a binder. That shows what an enormous market, and what an enormous advantage they enjoy. I am pleased to see the Massey-Harris Company prosper, I am glad to see them do well; but I do not want to see them hold the market of this country under their thumb to such an extent that they can put a price upon what they produce in excess of its real value. There is no class of the community that requires to be released from burdens as much as the farming class at the present moment, and the least that the Government should have done for them is to give them their agricultural implements free of duty. Had the duty been removed entirely, and had the farmers been permitted to take their implements from the United States if they choose to do so, it would have been a boon to the North-west, it would have been a boon to Ontario and to the farmers of Canada generally. I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, to have detained the House so long, but I felt it my duty to present these remarks on behalf of the constituents I have the honour to represent.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved :

That the Report of the Special Committee appointed to report Lists of Members of this House be concurred in.

Motion agreed to, and Report concurred in.

PUNISHMENT OF SEDUCTION AND ABDUCTION.

Mr. CHARLTON moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 18) to amend chapter 29 of 55 and 56 Victoria, for the purpose of making more effectual provision for the punishment of seduction and abduction. He said : The Bill proposes to raise the age of consent from 16 to 18 years. It proposes to make the minimum age of the male who is liable to punishment for seduction under promise of marriage, 18 years instead of 21 ; and it proposes to place women who are not heiresses upon the same footing as women who are heiresses, in the matter of abduction.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 19) to amend the Weights and Measures Act.—(Mr. Wilson.)

MR. ODILON PELLETIER.

Mr. DELISLE asked, Whether the Government have made any payment to Mr. Odilon Pelletier, of St. Roch des Aulnaies, county of L'Islet, for services in connection with the Department of Marine and Fisheries ? If so, what sums have been paid to him since 1st January, 1893 ? How long has he been so employed by the Government ?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I will give the hon. gentleman a more positive answer hereafter, but I do not think Mr. Odilon Pelletier is in the employ of the Marine Department or has received anything for his services.

MR. EUGENE PELLETIER.

Mr. DELISLE asked, Is Mr. Eugene Pelletier, of Ottawa, and formerly of St. Roch

Sir JOHN THOMPSON.

des Aulnaies, employed by Government, in the Department of Agriculture ? If so, how long has he been so employed, and what is his salary ?

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Eugene Pelletier is not in the employ of the Department of Agriculture.

MR. ESDRAS LABEL.

Mr. DELISLE asked, Is Mr. Esdras Lebel, of St. Roch des Aulnaies, employed by the Government, in the Department of Marine and Fisheries ? If so, how long has he been so employed, what is his salary, and how much has he received from the Government since his appointment ?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Mr. Lebel is in the employ of the Department of Marine and Fisheries ; he has been employed since April last, and has received $1,400 since the date of his appointment.

Mr. MULOCK. What is his salary ?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. $1,400. It can hardly be called a salary. It is paid to him under the terms of a contract, by which he performs certain services for that amount.

THE BRITISH CATTLE EMBARGO.

Mr. FAIRBAIRN asked, Whether the Government have received an official intimation of the intention of the Imperial Government to remove the embargo that is at present imposed upon the importation of Canadian cattle into Great Britain, in time for the commencement of the spring exports ?

Mr. FOSTER. No official information has yet been received.

PRINTING OF THE TARIFF.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to inquire of the Finance Minister if it is the intention to have the tariff printed, with the old tariff and the new tariff side by side ? It would be very convenient for the use of members. It is so printed in the newspapers, and I think it would be well to have it printed in the same way in the Sessional Papers.

Mr. FOSTER. I think that might be done for the convenience of members by the time the House goes into committee. It would be useful in the discussion of the items then ; but until that time it is not necessary.

THE INSOLVENCY LAW.

Mr. FLINT. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to ask the Government if the new Insolvency Act could not be placed in the hands of members before it reaches this House in the due course of legislation. I understand that it is to be introduced in the Senate.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I would not like to answer that question until the Bill is introduced.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). An unsettled problem.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. No; but the hon. gentleman assures that the Bill will be introduced in the Senate. I am not willing to assent to that at this moment.

Mr. LANDERKIN. The delegates have not all been heard from.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Yes, they have all been heard from.

EXPORTS TO THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. CHARLTON moved for :

Return showing the exports to the United States for the last fiscal year, of articles, the export of which to the United States exceeds in value the export of the same to all other countries, which return shall give: 1st. A detailed classification of the description of articles, commodities or wares, under the general subdivisions of the products of the mines, products of the fisheries, animals and their products, agricultural products and manufactures, coming within the scope of the inquiry; 2. The value of each class of articles exported to the United States and exported to all other countries; 3. The totals and value under each general subdivision exported to the United States and exported to all other countries; 4. The grand total of values under all the general subdivisions exported to the United States and exported to all other countries.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Stand.

Mr. CHARLTON. This return, if it is to be got out, should be taken in hand before long.

Mr. FOSTER. I would ask the hon. gentleman whether the information he asks for here is of such a nature that it cannot be taken from the Trade and Navigation Returns that have been brought down?

Mr. CHARLTON. I presume not, but the work of compiling the information is rather more than a private member would care to undertake. The information would be a matter of public interest and public importance, and I think it is perfectly proper to ask the Government to compile the information asked for in this motion, even if it can all be collated from the Trade and Navigation Returns, as I presume it can.

Mr. FOSTER. It seems to me there will scarcely be any end to that sort of thing, if we allow public money to be expended in obtaining particular excerpts or summaries of information contained in full and complete returns.

Mr. CHARLTON. I consider this is a matter of particular importance.

Motion allowed to stand.

MAPLE SUGAR.

Mr. RIDER. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I desire to inquire from the Finance Minister how he proposes to deal with maple sugar, whether he will consider it as refined or raw sugar?

Mr. FOSTER. So far as I can see just now, I think that it would come in under the "raw sugars" or under the "unenumerated." I would not like to say which yet, but I will look into the items.

Mr. RIDER. Will the hon. Minister of Finance be able to inform the House shortly with regard to that as it affects a very considerable product?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE TARIFF.

The House again resumed the adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Foster:

That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go into Committee of Ways and Means; and the motion of Sir Richard Cartwright in amendment thereto.

Mr. HAZEN. Mr. Speaker, I trust, Sir, that neither you nor the members of this honourable House will consider it unfitting, coming as I do from the same province as the hon. Minister of Finance, that I should preface the remarks which I propose to make upon this occasion by congratulating that hon. gentleman on the very satisfactory Budget which he was able to bring down to this House, and upon the bold and scientific tariff that he has placed before the House for its consideration; a tariff, Sir, which so far as I am able to judge from the expressions of public opinion as formulated in the press of this country and as heard from other sources, gives satisfaction, and very general satisfaction to the people of Canada. Not only does it give satisfaction to the people of this country, but I am sure that I am safe in saying that it gives satisfaction to the people of the mother country as well; and judging from the tone and colour of the debate in this House so far, I feel that that tariff is of such a character that the hon. gentlemen who sit on the Opposition benches have very little indeed to say against it in the way of criticism. Mr. Speaker, we, in the Maritime Provinces—we, especially from the province of New Brunswick, though I think that feeling is shared also by the people of the other provinces generally—feel that we have just reason to be proud of the hon. gentleman who at the present time occupies the high and important position of Minister of Finance of the Dominion of Canada. We feel proud of the fact, that from the time of his entrance into public life he has given to the service of his country, integrity, most undoubted industry, and statescraft of a very high order. It is a pleasure to us to look back over the history of the past, to look back to the year 1878 when the gentlemen opposite occupied the Treasury benches, and when the people were so dissatisfied with their policy of inaction, with their "fly on the wheel" policy, that they asked them in the most emphatic terms to step down and out and to give way to a Liberal-Conservative Government. Then, Sir, at that time, in the session of 1879, when a new era dawned upon this country, and when a new state of affairs was inaugurated; the statesman whose duty it was to bring that new policy before the country was one of the predecessors of my hon. friend the present Finance Minister, and a gentleman also from the province of New Brunswick. We from the lower provinces are proud of the fact, that after fourteen years of success under the National Policy, and after that policy has been ratified three times at the polls by a large majority of our people; that now when conditions have changed, now when trade has changed, now when values have changed, now when changes have taken place in the transport and carrying business of the country—we are proud, Sir, that it has fallen to the lot of a New Brunswicker, still maintaining the basic and fundamental principles that underlie the tariff of 1878, to bring down to this House these changes and modifications which the altered conditions and circumstances of the times since then, have made necessary. Also do we feel proud; so warmly has that tariff been received in this country that the changes which he has proposed; the tariff as largely amended under his direction, bids fair to be quite as popular, if not even more popular in this country, than the National Policy in its original shape, as announced to this House of Parliament in 1879 by the then Finance Minister, Sir Leonard Tilley. Mr. Speaker, I think there must have been a feeling of great disappointment in this country at the attitude which was taken by hon. gentlemen opposite in discussing—if I might so use the term—the tariff that has been laid before this House. It might fairly have been expected of hon. gentlemen opposite; if this tariff did not meet their views, if this tariff did not suit their wishes, that they themselves would have taken this House and the country into their confidence and would in fair and honest terms have informed this House and informed this country, what tariff they themselves would propose should they come into power. They should have told us what better tariff they would propose to take the place of the one which is now before us. I say without hesitation that the people of this country demand something of that sort from these hon. gentlemen opposite, and they demand it irrespective of party. Allow me to say, for I think I can say it correctly, that those in the country who are opposed to the present tariff will not be contented with the Opposition in this House simply moving an amendment that is a mere play upon words, but that they will insist that the Opposition shall take the House and the country into their confidence and tell what tariff they would propose, what tariff they would think preferable to the one now before the country. Hon. gentlemen opposite should also give the details of their ideal tariff so that the country may know how they would propose, if they ever come into power, to make up the necessary amount of revenue. That much, Sir, I think hon. gentlemen opposite owe this country, and I trust that they will give that information before the debate is concluded. If hon. gentlemen opposite object to this tariff, what tariff do they propose? As I have said, they have simply offered an amendment which is a mere play upon words, an amendment which might mean nothing or anything, and which gives the country no idea of what tariff policy hon. gentlemen opposite prefer to the present one. It would be only fair, for instance, Mr. Speaker, that they should let this country know—if they are not in favour of raising the revenue of the country by the method proposed and by the taxation and imposts of the present tariff—how they are prepared to do it. Is it their intention to return to the tariff that was in force before 1878? Is it their intention once more to place a duty of 5 or 6 cents a pound upon tea, and of 2 or 3 cents a pound upon coffee? Is it their intention once more to impose duties upon raw material? If it is not, I say, that in all fairness and with all sincerity and candour, they should let the country know what their views on these matters are. Or, are they prepared to go in for a policy of absolute free trade, to take away the incidental protection that exists to the present tariff; are they willing to do that and to say to the ratepayers of the country: We will have absolute free trade and what money we want for the maintenance of the public service of Canada we are prepared to raise by a policy of direct taxation. That would be the manly and bold and statesmanlike course for the hon. gentlemen opposite to take. But, Sir, judging from the tenor of the debate so far, I feel that we cannot with reason expect that any such course will be taken by them. Rather are we led to believe that these hon. gentlemen will continue, still continue to be only critics, and to assume the role of iconoclasts, finding fault with everything and offering nothing in return. I think that this country must have been very much disappointed indeed, especially with the speech which the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), the financial critic of the Opposition, delivered in answer to the hon. Minister of Finance. It might naturally have been expected that the hon. gentleman would deal with the question in a somewhat different way from that in which he did deal with it. We might reasonably have expected that he would point out the effect which the changes made in the tariff would have on the trade and commerce of the country. But, instead of doing that, the hon. gentleman, as has been his custom for many years past, delved into ancient history and delivered to this House the very same old speech that I have heard from him for four successive sessions, and which has been heard a dozen times or more by members of longer standing than myself who are sitting here to-day. I think that must have been a source of disappointment to the country. It was practically the same old speech, only that the hon. gentleman rather outdid himself, rather out-Heroded Herod, in the strength of the adjectives ne used and the abuse he directed against the Finance Minister. Among the "Orient pearls at random strung," which the hon. gentleman scattered broadcast over the House and the country—

Mr. LANDERKIN. Hear, hear.

Mr. HAZEN. I am glad the hon. gentleman appreciates the fact also—we learned that the Finance Minister was full of audacity, that there was scandalous mismanagement, that the tariff was a scheme of fraud, that there was brought into the question fraud and falsehood, theft and corruption. These and many kindred expressions much too numerous to mention, fell from the hon. gentleman as thick as those autumnal leaves which, we are told, strew the brooks of Vallambrosa. When I first heard that speech from the hon. gentleman, four years ago, as a young member of this House, I felt shocked and pained and surprised that an hon. gentleman occupying the high position he does in this country, a gentleman of his reputation and standing, should use such extraordinary and extravagant language, and utter such gross inaccuracies as the hon. gentleman then did. But, Mr. Speaker, since then I have got used to that speech; in fact, I am coming to regard it somewhat as an old familiar friend; and I think that some of us on this side of the House would feel almost as lost in Parliament, if we failed to hear that speech delivered here every year, as we would feel at witnessing in a theatre the play of Hamlet with the character of the Prince of Denmark left out. If he failed to hear that speech delivered, I think we would begin to fear that evil days were about to overtake the Conservative party of this country. Our wish, therefore, is that the hon. gentleman may long live to continue to address that speech to the members of the House of Commons. But, Mr. Speaker, hon. gentlemen opposite, some of them at least, have taken the ground, to adopt the expression used many years ago in England, that the Government have "caught the Whigs in bathing and have stolen away their clothes." Mr. Speaker, I do not think we can be justly accused of being to-day arrayed in the clothes of hon. gentlemen opposite. If we were, we would certainly present a most motley and extraordinary appearance. As has been said, we would have a coat of many colours. If we had stolen the clothes of hon. gentlemen opposite, and arrayed ourselves in them, we would have a coat of unrestricted reciprocity, a waistcoat of continental free trade, and, inside and nearest our heart, the garment of commercial union; and we do not want to be arrayed in any such garments as those. If we had stolen the clothes of hon. gentlemen opposite, and arrayed ourselves in them, we would be to-day before this country asking for a tariff uniform with that of the United States; we would be throwing down all the barriers between Canada and the United States, and allowing the combines of the United States to make this country a slaughter market for their surplus products, as they did before 1879, and enabling them to interfere with the employment and wages of the artisans and labourers, and with the home market of the agriculturists in this country. Mr. Speaker, we put no such platform before the public as that. That was the platform of the party opposite in the last election. Shortly before that election, down in the city of Halifax, the hon. leader of the Opposition, said that their party had nailed the flag of unrestricted reciprocity to the mast, and by that policy they proposed to stand or fall. Fortunately for this country, that policy was not accepted. But if they had been in a position to carry out their pledges—and I do not know that they ever took back that announcement by their leader—during the past year, when a terrible depression prevailed in the United States, we would have had this country in a worse position than it was before 1878, we would have had a policy prevailing that would have made our people what they were once before, hewers of wood and drawers of water for the great republic. The Conservative party comes before the country to-day with no such unpatriotic policy as that; but they say that fourteen years have now passed since the introduction of the National Policy; the conditions have changed in many respects; and it is, therefore, desirable that many changes should be made in the tariff in order to adapt it to the changed conditions of the time. Under the protective policy which has been in force, many industries which were weakly infants fourteen years ago, have become strong and vigorous and do not need as much protection as they had at first; other industries which it was hoped to create—and I say it frankly and freely—have been found to be unsuitable to the conditions of this country; and therefore, though that policy was adopted, and the people repeatedly endorsed it as an unqualified success, yet I think it the duty of wise statesmen, under these circumstances, to bring the tariff more into line with the conditions and feelings of the age. In doing that, we have not stolen the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite, we have not stolen their clothes. Now, Mr. Speaker, in addressing this House in the vehement and unpatriotic language which he used with reference to the Government, the hon. member for South Oxford referred to the present Minister of Finance as a tariff tinker. Well, Sir, if there is one subject more than another on which the hon. member for South Oxford is able to speak with authority, I think it is the subject of tariff tinkering; for, from the day he entered office in 1873 until the day that the people of this country asked him to relinquish the seals of office in 1878, the hon. gentleman's management of the finances of this country was one long-continued operation of tariff tinkering; and so greatly did his policy of that day interfere with the consuming power of the people—one year putting a tax on tea, and another year on coffee—that, from the time he went into power until he left it, he was constantly engaged in raising increased revenue by taxing the necessaries of life. But so poor a tinker was he that he was unable to stop the leaks in the governmental kettle, and everything he put into it ran out as fast as he put it in. I think, therefore, that if any one is an authority on the subject of tariff tinkering, it would be the hon. member for South Oxford. But the hon. gentleman adopted a new role on this occasion, and for him it is a very extraordinary role: he even had a kind and sympathetic word to say for the manufacturers of this country. Hitherto the hon. gentleman has spoken of the manufacturers of this country as if they were a set of thieves and highway robbers. He has, I think, spoken of them in plain Anglo-Saxon as thieves. He has spoken of them as monopolists and has usually used the adjective vile in connection with it. But on this occasion a change has come over the spirit of the hon. gentleman's dream, and he has a kind and sympathetic word to say for the manufacturers of the country. I do not know whether he is going to become their champion or not; but he appeals for fair-play to the manufacturers. Formerly we were told that these men went to the Red Parlour and subscribed liberally to the election funds of the Government party. Now we find that what money they have subscribed to election funds has been extorted from them—not only extorted from them, but extorted by the most forcible, the most vile, means possible. It has been extorted from them, Sir, at the very point of the bayonet. What a splendid subject this would be for a grand historical painting. The poor manufacturer with his knees shaking, trembling with fear, and the Government, with their bayonets drawn charging at him, and demanding that he should give up what money he has. This, Sir, might be a very beautiful picture except for the fact that it would be lacking in the essential element of truth. Time and time again has the assertion of hon. gentlemen opposite been met by the contrary statement, which the Minister of Railways made in this House the other night, that the manufacturing interests in this country have never expended on elections more money than would pay the cost of campaign literature. Still, over and over again without one tittle of evidence to support his assertion, the hon. gentleman goes on repeating it; and judging from the success with which his statements have been received throughout the country, I think it will be a very short time indeed if he repeats it often again before the people generally will make up their minds that there never was such an institution in the country as the Red Parlour at all. The hon. gentleman persists in alleging that the Government owes its success to what he calls "wholesale gerrymander," despite the fact, which cannot be gainsaid, that after the last election the majority returned to support the Government came from those provinces in the east and west where the county lines had been maintained and no gerrymander had in the slightest degree occurred. Yet, despite that fact, on every occasion, the hon. gentleman persists in alluding to the results of the elections of 1891 as due to wholesale gerrymander. Passing on, Sir, from that subject, the hon. gentleman displays himself in a new role in the House—the hon. gentleman is particularly solicitous, particularly anxious—I cannot understand his new-born solicitude—for the well-being of what to-day he is polite enough to call the great provinces of the west. He is to-day also particularly solicitous for the welfare of those provinces by the sea from which I have the honour to come. What a change has come over the spirit of the hon. gentleman's dream. About three years ago, the hon. gentleman, after the general elections of 1891, could not find language insulting enough in which to allude to the Maritime Provinces, and what he is now pleased to call the great provinces of the west. Then they were in his eyes nothing but the minor provinces of the confederacy. They were, in his beautiful and graphic language, nothing but the shreds and patches and the ragged remnants of the confederacy. Can it be the fact that the occasion when he used that language was just after the general elections, and that it was the defeat under which he was then smarting that prompted it? And can it be that the fact that elections are not many months distant now has caused a change in the hon. gentleman's feelings? Why, from the time the hon. gentleman has had a seat in this House, he has never missed an opportunity of running down the Maritime Provinces. There has scarcely ever been a vote for the expenditure of public money in those provinces which the hon. gentleman has not condemned. Time and time again has he insulted the people of those provinces in the most extravagant terms. They were a people who had no regard for principle. They were a people who regarded more the payment of money in hand or the promise of immediate and extensive railway subsidies than any political principle. Perhaps the hon. gentleman, if that were true, found a similar state of affairs existing in the district in which is situated the town of Napanee, on the occasion when he made that historic speech some years ago, in which he admitted to the people that he had bought them twice, but did not propose to buy them the third time. Time and again he has taken that role with regard to the Maritime Provinces. I well remember after the death of Sir John Macdonald and after the formation of the new Government under the premiership of Sir John Abbott, the hon. gentleman rising in his place to discuss that Ministry, and endeavouring to excite sectional feeling and jealousy by declaring that the Maritime Provinces in the Cabinet representation, were an easy first, that Quebec was a fair second, and the western provinces nowhere. On every occasion the hon. gentleman eagerly seized the opportunity to strike the Maritime Provinces below the belt. To what then must we attribute the change of feeling, the change of base, in the hon. gentleman now? It certainly seems to me that this is one of those occasions when we have to suspect the hon. gentleman, even when he comes to us bearing gifts. We have to beware of the Greeks even when they come with gifts in their hands. The hon. gentleman comes too late in the day to gain the respect of the Maritime Provinces by any professions of sympathy. These provinces have had enough experience of his conduct in the past towards them to beware of his present professions of sympathy, and the people of these provinces may well exclaim, on hearing them: If we have to depend upon the sympathy of the hon. member then may God help the Maritime Provinces. But the sympathy of the hon. gentleman is based entirely on a mistaken idea of the facts. He says there is stagnation in the lower provinces. He cries out that there is blue ruin in those provinces, that the people are fleeing from them in large numbers to the United States. Is the hon. gentleman's statement correct? I propose to adduce evidence to the contrary which the hon. gentleman himself will not question. For my authority and evidence I will not go to Tory sources, but to Liberal sources. And I think I will be able to prove out of the mouths of his own supporters that the statement he has made that stagnation exists in the Maritime Provinces is a most extravagant assertion utterly unfounded on fact. In discussing the condition of affairs in the lower provinces, I do not propose to paint them as being couleur de rose. There cannot possibly be, it is not reasonable to expect that there could be a general world-wide depression in business circles and that at the same time small portion of the globe, the Maritime Provinces, should entirely escape. But what I am satisfied I can prove out of the mouths of the hon. gentleman's own friends is the fact that in those provinces during the past year when depression was so rampant and widespread in other parts of the world, we have enjoyed a fair average degree of comfort and prosperity, and have been, in comparison with other countries, prosperous to a considerable degree. The first authority to which I will call the attention of the hon. gentleman is the Liberal Premier of the province of New Brunswick. In the speech delivered on the 15th March at the opening of the Legislature of New Brunswick by the Lieutenant-Governor—the speech placed in His Honour's hand by the Premier of that province—himself a Liberal and a gentleman who occupied a very prominent place at the recent Liberal convention, in the city of Ottawa, contained these words:

It is fitting that we should acknowledge, in a spirit of gratitude and thankfulness, to the Giver of all good things, that while other countries have experienced and are still suffering the most distressing consequences of a disordered business condition, we in New Brunswick have enjoyed almost complete immunity from the worst phases of these exceptional troubles.

An hon. MEMBER. Hear, hear.

Mr. HAZEN. I am glad my hon. friend recognizes the authority. It is true that the shipping and lumber business of the country have not recovered from the depression to which, for some time past they have been subject, but evidence is not wanting that improvement in both these departments of our industrial life may be hoped for at an early period.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Hear, hear.

Mr. HAZEN. The hon. gentleman expresses some comfort at the statement with regard to the shipping and lumber interest, with which the policy of this Government has no more to do than the policy of the Government of Madagascar. The hon. gentleman, however, did not express much comfort at the statement that the people of New Brunswick enjoyed complete immunity from the worst phase of those troubles in other countries. Yesterday, in this House, my hon. friend the Controller of Customs quoted the speech of the hon. Provincial Secretary for New Brunswick, somewhat in the same direction. I will not bore the House by again quoting the speech here, but I will read to the House an extract from a speech made by Mr. Wells, the member for the Liberal county of Westmoreland, who moved the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. Mr. Wells said:

While it is a general complaint that times are dull, it must be acknowledged that we have no such depression as exists in the bordering republic and in England. In this respect we have cause to be thankful that we have not been burdened with tens of thousands of unemployed, nor heard the wail of woe and want, but have pursued the even tenor of our way during the past year, with the assurance that we have better prospects ahead.

Very likely, my hon. friends opposite will say that this is not a proper authority. Yesterday, when my hon. friend the Controller of Customs quoted from the utterances of a member of the New Brunswick Government, the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies, P.E.I.) said: That is not a Grit Government; that is a Government in which there are Conservatives, and a majority of the members of the House of Assembly supporting the Attorney General and the present Government, are members of the Conservative party.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I merely corrected a misapprehension he was under—that was all.

Mr. HAZEN. He may have imbued the idea of the members of one section of the Liberal party in New Brunswick, who are of opinion that the hon. gentleman's administration has not been in the interests of the Liberal party in the province of New Brunswick, that he has at times appointed Conservatives to office, and that he has a number of Conservatives in his Ministry. But, whether he regards it as a Liberal Government or not, the Attorney General of that Government was a good enough Liberal to be lionized in the Liberal convention and to be made one of the vice-chairmen; and I think he is second in command in the Maritime Provinces—by resolution of that convention—to my hon. friend from Queen's (Mr. Davies, P.E.I.) Now, Sir, I would quote an authority against which I feel perfectly confident the hon. gentlemen opposite will not say one word. The authority I propose to quote now, Mr. Speaker, is a gentleman who we have the authority of the hon. leader of the Opposition, given during this session, for saying, is a great man. I propose to quote the Premier of the province of Nova Scotia—perhaps not quite so great a man as he was a little while ago, as his prestige has been somewhat shattered by the result of the recent elections and by the fact that he himself escaped defeat in Halifax barely by the skin of his teeth, and would have been overwhelmingly defeated had he not passed an Act taking the franchise from the members of a very large and respectable element in the community. But, in the eyes of hon. gentlemen opposite, no doubt, he is still a great man. He was certainly a great man at the Liberal convention. I desire to read to yourself, Mr. Speaker, and to this House what that great man said in the Speech he placed in the hands of the Lieutenant-Governor of the province of Nova Scotia at the opening of the last session of the Provincial Legislature. He says:

While the condition of business throughout Nova Scotia leaves much to be desired in the way of improvement, we can rejoice that during the year the people engaged in the various branches of industry have had a moderate measure of success from their labours, and our province has escaped—

And this I commend to the attention of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), who was talking about the stagnation in the Maritime Provinces:

—the severe depression created in some parts of the continent by financial disturbances.

Let me cite one more Nova Scotian authority to the hon. gentlemen before I sit down. I am sure they will pardon me if I delay a moment in doing so. The Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne in the Legislature of the province of Nova Scotia was moved by a most staunch and strong supporter of the Liberal party in this country. I propose to read to you from that hon. gentleman's speech to show what he thought of the condition of business in the province of Nova Scotia. I ask hon. gentlemen opposite to read, mark, learn and inwardly digest. This is what he said as to the condition of business:

He thought we had reason to congratulate ourselves at the present time upon the prosperity enjoyed by our fair province. He doubted whether there was a place in North America containing the same number of square miles of territory and the same population that enjoyed the same measure of prosperity as the province of Nova Scotia. There was less poverty and want here than in any other place that could be named, and, in this particular, there was great cause for encouragement.

This, Sir, was Mr. Hunt, a Liberal member of the Legislative Assembly of the province of Nova Scotia. I would advise my hon. friend, before he undertakes again to talk stagnation existing in the Maritime Provinces, to go down to the Maritime Provinces and talk with his own friends there. If anything will convert the hon. gentleman that conversation will convert him, and he will come back in a very different frame of mind from that in which he goes down, and will cease from eternally singing his song of blue ruin and stagnation.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Does the hon. gentleman contend that there is any important measure of prosperity there?

Mr. HAZEN. I contend, as I said at the outset—and if the hon. gentleman had listened to me (and I cannot but think he did listen to me)—he would have known what I said. I said that I did not propose to paint the condition of affairs in the Maritime Provinces in extravagant language of praise or in the colours of the rose. But I said I did propose to show the House, by comparison with any other country—and how better can you judge of a country's condition than by comparison with other countries—and out of the mouths of witnesses who are friends of hon. gentlemen opposite themselves, that the lower provinces had enjoyed a very fair measure of prosperity during the past year. Mr. Speaker, I feel that this House will agree with me, that I have made good my promise by the proof I have given. The Legislature of the province of Prince Edward Island, represented by my hon. friend from Queen's (Mr. Davies, P.E.I.), met two days ago. I have not yet seen the Speech from the Throne which was delivered there, but I doubt very much if the Liberal leader of the Government of the province of Prince Edward Island has put into that Speech anything that will weaken the effect of the evidence of the other authorities I quote. But, Mr. Speaker, I find—pursuing this subject a little further—that it is not only in the Maritime Provinces that we find the Local Governments declaring that they have cause for thankfulness for the condition of affairs during the past year. I pursued the question a little further and took up the Speech from the Throne made by the Lieutenant-Governor of Manitoba at the opening of the Legislative Assembly on the 11th January, this year. There are no Tories in the Government of that province. The leader is a staunch and strong Liberal, an active member of the Liberal party of the Dominion of Canada. What do I find is the Speech which the Premier of Manitoba puts into the mouth of the Lieutenant-Governor of that province at the opening of the Legislature on 11th January, 1894? I find that His Honour says:

It is a matter of satisfaction to know that in the general depression which has existed throughout the world and especially throughout this continent during the past year, Manitoba compares more than favourably with other countries.

Mr. Speaker, where are we to find this stagnation, this blue ruin? We certainly cannot find it in the evidence which the Premiers of these provinces put before the people of this country. I go further and reach the province of Ontario, and I find that Ontario, at the opening of the present session of the Legislative Assembly, the Lieutenant-Governor was made to say:

The signal success of the province at the World's Columbian Exposition has been a matter of just pride and satisfaction to our people. By our exhibits of live stock, grain, fruit, honey, cheese, minerals, timber, natural history and education, we have shown that Ontario possesses great natural resources, and in their development has kept pace with wealthier and more populous countries.

That is the province of Ontario, which we are led to believe by Liberal newspapers in the lower provinces has been going completely to the dogs. But we find that, according to the testimony of Sir Oliver Mowat, the leader in Ontario provincial politics of my hon. friends opposite, Ontario has been keeping pace with more populous countries. We must look further yet to find this stagnation, and, in looking further, I look to see what the Lieutenant-Governor of British Columbia said at the opening of the Legislative Assembly of that province. I do not quote this as an authority that will be accepted as unimpeachable by my hon. friend opposite, because the Government of that province is now a Conservative Government; still, I find that the Government of the province of British Columbia used these words in opening the session of the Legislature of British Columbia this year:

Notwithstanding the reduction in the market price of silver, the mines of the West Kootenay district in consequence of the high grade of these ores, have shown a healthy development. The agricultural and horticultural reports from the various districts show a satisfactory improvement both as to the area under cultivation and the modes of culture. Our fishing industry has produced results larger than in any previous year. Although the past year has been one of great commercial depression throughout the world, the revenue of the province has closely approximated the estimate notwithstanding the diversion of considerable sums of money to newly formed municipalities.

If we look at the reports of the Provincial Governments, Liberal and Conservative alike, from one end of this country to the other, we fail to find that stagnation which the hon. member for South Oxford says exists in this country. Now, I have another authority which I feel sure will appeal to the hon. gentlemen opposite, especially to the hon. member for South Oxford, even more strongly than any authority that I have yet quoted on the subject. It is only a few years ago that the hon. gentleman went down to Boston, and he told the men of Boston, in public banquet assembled, that if they only had free trade with Canada, Boston would become the entrepot of a great commerce which no man could take away from them. Sir, the hon. gentleman has been wounded in the house of his friends. I hold in my hand an extract from the Buffalo 'Express' of two days ago, and what do I find that paper say with regard to the state of affairs in Canada? It says:

While the United States has been suffering the evil of hard times Canada has been practically unaffected.

That is testimony from the 'Express' which the hon. member for South Oxford will appreciate.

The 'Express' has noted this fact before, as shown by the reports of failures made by the commercial agencies. It proves beyond question that our troubles have been internal and not external. Canada has had a settled protective policy and a settled financial policy. The United States has been and is agitated by the double threat of a free trade tariff and a free silver currency inflation. That is the only difference. The causes of American hard times can be found in the causes of Canada's escape from them.

A still stronger authority yet I will cite before I leave this branch of the subject. I will site from a newspaper published yesterday morning in that very city of Boston which the policy of my hon. friend opposite was to make the entrepot of Canadian trade, I quote from an article in the Boston 'Advertiser':

The protective policy has done so much for Canada in the past that the Government has no hesitation in declaring an intention to stick to that policy. While the United States under a threat of a revenue tariff has passed through one of the worst years of financial depression recorded in American history, Canada while declining to make any trial of a revenue tariff has been comparatively prosperous. Both countries export and import products of a similar nature. Canada as well as the United States sends heavy cargoes of agricultural products abroad and imports sugar, tea and manufactured European goods; but while the United States has suffered severely in the past six months Canada has increased the deposits in savings banks, has had a generally prosperous year and has kept up her foreign trade with but a small loss as compared with the startling decrease in the trade of the United States. These facts speak more loudly than volumes of mere theory.

Well might hon. gentlemen opposite exclaim in the language of the Psalmist, after hearing this last quotation: "Yea, mine own familiar friend, in whom I trusted, which did eat of my bread, hath lifted up his heel against me." There was another authority on the subject which I intended to cite to this House, but the hon. Controller of Customs has saved me the trouble of doing so, and that was the authority of the leading Liberal organ in the province of New Brunswick, the authority of an organ owned and controlled by a gentleman who, until a few years ago, occupied an honoured place on the Liberal benches opposite, a gentleman whose position was so conspicuous in the ranks of his party that when the party leadership was put into commission, he was selected to be one of the commissioners. The publisher of the leading Liberal organ in that province took the ground that there was no exodus from New Brunswick, and that the people, after having been lured from their comfortable homes in that province, probably by the idle vapourings of Liberal platform speakers, and by the newspapers of hon. gentlemen opposite, were returning in great numbers, and were passing through the station at St. John by hundreds every day. The management of that paper, being wiser in its day and generation than hon. members occupying seats to the left of you, Mr. Speaker, saw that the way to gain the confidence of the electorate of the province of New Brunswick for the Liberal party was not by pursuing the old threadbare and worn-out course of running down the country by crying blue ruin and shouting out about the exodus, but the method was to tell the plain unvarnished truth, and to put the facts fairly before the people. I feel that when the Liberal party throughout the Dominion adopts the policy that has been adopted by their leading organ in the province of New Brunswick, the Conservative party will have much greater reason to fear the results than they have had during the past fourteen years. There are several more authorities that I want to bring before this House. First of all, I want to read you a statement made at the meeting of the Canadian Bank of Commerce last year, by the president of that bank. Hon. gentlemen opposite will not regard that as an expression of opinion from a Tory source. Mr. Cox, the president of the bank, is not a supporter of this Government; his political sympathies, I understand, are with the hon. gentlemen opposite. Do his words show that there is stagnation and great depression in this country? At the last annual meeting of the bank, he used these words:

In the bank we see the balance sheets of very many different kinds of business, and of many different men in the same kinds of business; a very trifling minority may have fallen behind in capital during the past year, but we have remarked more than once at the board table that at no time in recent years has the improvement in capital as shown by the surplus in the customers' balance sheets, been so general. Looking around us, while every caution is necessary, we do not see anything in the outlook which is not hopeful for Canada.

Mr. B. E. Walker, the general manager of the bank, in his address, used language which, although it was quoted yesterday by the Controller of Customs, I am going to ask the House to hear again. Mr. Walker, not a Tory partisan, in his address, spoke as follows:—

Quoting from sales and collections running into several millions of dollars, we find that in Ontario farmers paid their paper without renewal to the extent of over ninety-six per cent. In the Northwest, where the year is admitted to be unfavourable, and where renewals are always required more or less, the payments were under sixty per cent. From every part of Ontario our managers make pretty much the same report. The farmers have more than offset the low price for grain by the high prices for cheese and hogs. For, we are told that the farmers, owing to the low prices of wheat are, year after year, turning their attention more to dairying, cattle grazing, fattening hogs, and fruit growing. Again, we are told that in many counties the farmers are still holding last year's wheat, and in some localities two or three years' crops of wheat. This may be a very foolish thing for a farmer to do, but let us bear in mind that he is financially able to do it. From the same counties we have the information—in fact there are very few exceptions throughout Ontario—that the deposits in banks are increasing, that farmers' notes for implements are promptly paid, that he does not want to borrow from the banks, and is meeting the interest and to some extent reducing the principal on his mortgages. Also that there is no demand for mortgage loans, and that upon mortgages subject to repayment many good farmers are demanding a reduction in the rate of interest. Looking around us, while every caution is necessary, we do not see anything in the outlook which is not hopeful for Canada.

I leave this condition of affairs in the upper provinces, and come back once more to my own province of New Brunswick, the province where, according to the hon. member from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), starvation is stalking abroad, and poverty is knocking at the door of the palaces of the rich and the cottages of the poor; I return to my own province of New Brunswick, which that hon. gentleman went out of his way to insult gratuitously by attacking one of the courts of the country, composed of as high-minded and able men as ever sat on the bench in any country in the world—a matter which we will have an opportunity later to deal with—I come back to my province and desire to look for a few moments at the situation of the people there. I propose to pass in review before you, Mr. Speaker, and this House the deposits in the savings banks in New Brunswick. Hon. gentlemen opposite may say that the savings in the banks are not infallible evidence of prosperity and comfort and thrift among the people.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). Hear, hear.

Mr. HAZEN. The hon. member for East Huron (Mr. Macdonald) says, "Hear, hear." I have great respect for the opinions and views of the hon. member for East Huron, but I regret that on this occasion I have to disagree with the hon. gentleman, and to say to him that in so far as the deposits in the savings banks are concerned, which cover small deposits made to a very large extent out of the earnings of the labouring people, agriculturists and mechanics of the country, they are evidences of thrift and prosperity, and prove that the people are going ahead. They are not like deposits made in the large chartered banks. It is, perhaps, a fair statement to make in regard to those deposits that they are not always evidence of prosperity, but rather that the public have no confidence in the general investments of the country, and in its manufacturing concerns, and prefer to place their money in the chartered banks, especially when they are paying 3 or 4 per cent interest. While I admit that an argument of that kind may apply to the chartered banks, I deny 'in toto' that it can be applied to savings banks. Let me quote the figures for the benefit of hon. gentlemen opposite, especially for the benefit of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), for, if we are to believe his statement, the people in the lower provinces are in a state of penury and abject want. What do we find to have been the increase in the deposits in the savings banks since the hon. gentleman ceased to mix and muddle the finances of this country? I find that in the savings banks in St. John, when the hon. gentleman went out of power and left the Finance Department in 1878, there were deposited there, of small earnings, the amount of $1,093,377. I find on 30th June, 1893, the amount deposited in that bank was $3, 717,494, or three times as much as was lying there when the hon. gentleman went out of power in 1878. I find that at Bathurst, the shire town of Gloucester, the deposits increased from $36,373 in 1878 to $131,592 in 1893. In the town of Chatham, the deposits were $129,749 in 1878, and increased to $254,258 in 1893. In the little town of Dalhousie, in the county represented by my hon. friend from Restigouche, the amount was $107,677 on 30th June, 1878, and it increased more than three-fold, to $354,205 in 1893. I may say that this amount represents the savings of the fishermen, farmers and lumbermen who live in that vicinity. In Dorchester, on 30th June, 1878, the deposits were $6,512, and they increased to $93,991 in 1893, and that notwithstanding the fact that the commercial centre of the county of Westmoreland has been practically removed from the town of Dorchester to Moncton. In Fredericton an enormous increase occurred, it being over six-fold within that period of time. There on 30th June, 1878, the deposits amounted to $94,135, and on 30th June, 1893, they reached $577,430. In Newcastle they were $85,291 on 30th June, 1878, and increased to $224,789 in 1893. At St. Andrews the deposits in the savings bank, which were $96,919 in 1878, increased to $321,435 in 1893. For Sussex we have no returns for 1878; the deposits were $143,722 in 1891, $151,026 in 1893. At Woodstock, where the deposits were $61,795 in 1878, they increased nearly eight times, and in 1893 were $474,980. Those deposits in Woodstock, I have no hesitation in stating here, though I have no accurate information on the subject, are largely the savings of the farmers and agriculturists who live in Carleton and Victoria. Thus we find that whereas there was the sum of $1,711,831 standing at the credit of depositors in the Government savings banks in 1878, in 1893 that sum had increased to $6,300,304. I think I have said enough to satisfy this House that so far as the province of New Brunswick is concerned—and the same remark applies to the other Maritime Provinces—it is not in a state of starvation, penury and want, as has been represented to this House by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). I tell the hon. gentleman that the people of that province resent the insult cast upon its people by the hon. gentleman in this House, and I warn the hon. gentleman that the speech he delivered a few evenings ago has done more to destroy the chances of his party in New Brunswick at the approaching election than any other means he could possibly have devised. Passing on—there were other matters on which I desired to speak, but I must not trespass too long on the time of the House—from that branch of the subject with the inquiry first, Would we have had this state of affairs in New Brunswick or in any part of Canada had we adopted the suicidal policy advocated by hon. gentlemen opposite, and allowed the products of a foreign country, without let or hindrance, to flow into and compete with the products of our own people, those products coming from a country which had erected a high tariff wall against us, involving the highest protection the world ever knew—passing on with that inquiry, I will deal for a moment with the statement made by the hon. member from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), that protection, extravagance and corruption always go hand in hand. The hon. gentleman said: Put us in power; we do not want a protective tariff, and we can raise a revenue without it, for we will be most economical, and will put an end to this era of extravagance, which has prevailed in this country from 1878. Let us for a few moments carefully analyze that statement made by the hon. gentleman opposite. The only one of the hon. gentlemen opposite who has paid the slightest attention to that branch of the question was my hon. friend who preceded me, and who showed, to his own satisfaction, that there need be no expenditure if all the public services were abolished. That would be certainly a very radical means of doing away with the expenditure of the country. It was only a wonder to me when the hon. gentleman enumerated the many public institutions and services to be abolished that he did not also wish to abolish the House of Commons itself. I feel that it would have been included possibly in the hon. gentleman's list had it not involved too great a personal sacrifice to himself. But take every item of expenditure that the hon. gentleman proposed to do away with last night, abolish the militia, abolish the Military College, if you will, abolish the Senate, abolish all those different services of the country, which the hon. gentleman proposes to abolish, and the hon. gentleman will not save the amount which his leader has pledged in increased subsidies to the provinces if he comes into power. In the campaign of 1891, be it remembered that the hon. leader of the Opposition pledged himself to his friend and supporter, the hon. Mr. Mercier, the then Premier of the province of Quebec: that he accepted the terms of the Quebec conference and that he would carry them into effect if he came into power at Ottawa. The terms of that conference meant additional imposition every year on the Federal exchequer of this country, of a sum, in round numbers, of $2,000,000. I can therefore assure my hon. friend who spoke before me (Mr. McMullen), that even if he effects the savings which he thinks—but I may remark that no such policy has yet been advocated by any of the gentlemen on the front benches opposite—he cannot save an amount which would make up the deficiency of revenue that will be caused by the promise of his leader to carry out the platform of the Quebec conference; a promise which he has never yet denied. Is that the way to have economy in this country? Let us look at the condition of affairs in these provinces of the

Mr. HAZEN.

Confederation where we have Liberal Governments in power. In the province of New Brunswick, which has a Liberal for its leader, and that hon. gentleman a few years ago rode into power on the promise of retrenchment and reform—shortly before his advent to power, in a speech which he delivered in the House of Assembly, he said that by prudent and careful management of the finances direct taxation in the province of New Brunswick could be averted for a period of thirty years. Why, Sir, since he has come into power, we find that under his control and management of the finances the debt of the province has increased by many hundreds of thousands of dollars; and already forms of direct taxation have been imposed. But it may be said to me by hon. gentlemen opposite, who wish to escape from the position: There are as many Conservatives as Liberals in the Government of New Brunswick. Then let me refer them once more to a purely Liberal Government, the Liberal Government of the province of Nova Scotia, a Government which also came into power on promises of retrenchment and reform, and which since the few years they have been in power—if I have my figures correct, and I think I have—added in the vicinity of $3,000,000 to the public debt of the province. What kind of economy is that under Liberal administration? There is very little encouragement in all that for those who hope that the accession of a Liberal Government to power will bring increased economy; a Government which would probably include within its ranks the hon. gentleman who is now Prime Minister of the province of Nova Scotia, for we found after the Ottawa convention, the Liberal papers heralding from one part of the country to the other, that that hon. gentleman was too confined in the narrow sphere of Nova Scotia politics, and that his proper place was the position of a Cabinet Minister in Ottawa. Very little satisfaction is to be got from that state of affairs from those who hope for an economic Liberal Government. I do not say that these figures I have given are absolutely correct, but I say that they are very near the mark. Now, Mr. Speaker, we turn from that, to another Liberal Government, the Government of Prince Edward Island. We find there that since the accession of the Liberal Government to power the provincial debt has been greatly increased, and already direct taxation has to be resorted to for the purpose of raising a revenue. In the other provinces of the Dominion, ruled by Liberal Governments; the province of Manitoba for instance, their public debt has also been largely increased. So I think, Sir, that if we expect that an economic management of public affairs is to set in by reason of the advent of the Liberal party to power, we will be very seriously mistaken. The hon. member who addressed the House last evening suggested amongst other economic reforms. that the Cabinet should be reduced from fifteen members to ten. There is very little prospect I must say of such a reduction being made if the Liberal party succeed at the polls. All the time they were in power before, from 1873 to 1878, though year after year their Minister of Finance had to admit to Parliament that the expenditure of the country had not been enough to meet the revenue; yet there was no move during all these years to make any saving in the public expenses of the country by reducing the members of their Cabinet from the number of thirteen. If they should come into power to-day, can we expect any reduction in this line, considering the large number of aspirants for Cabinet positions which it is natural to suppose will be in their ranks. In view of the probable fact that their Finance Minister's deficits have been turned into surpluses by ours can we reasonably expect that the number of their Cabinet Ministers will be reduced? Rather, reasoning by analogy, we might expect that there would be an increase of the number of Ministers in a Liberal Administration. I wish to place one more instance before this House of the administration of affairs by a Liberal Government. For a few years, not a very long period of time, we had a Liberal Government controlling the destinies of the province of Quebec, and during the few short years they were in power we saw the debt of the province increased from $7,000,000 to $20,000,000, or an increase of twelve or thirteen million dollars. If a Liberal Government were formed here in Ottawa, formed of similar material to the men who compose the Liberal Government of the provinces of the Dominion, how could we expect any retrenchment, or saving, or any economy in the public expenditure? What do we find in this Dominion at the present time? I say unhesitatingly that the finances of this country are being wisely, prudently, and economically administered, and the danger of the present Government is, that there may be greater dissatisfaction in the country, because of their great economy than if they were more lavish of expenditure. Under the administration of the present Minister of Finance there never was a time in the history of Canada—I say it advisedly—when the finances of this country were more prudently, economically and wisely administered than is the case at the present time. We have now arrived at a stage when the increase of public debt has practically ceased; we have all our great public works constructed and yet the burden of the debt to-day is very little greater upon our shoulders than it was when hon. gentlemen opposite left power in 1878. Returning now, Mr. Speaker, to the other branch of the subject with which I was dealing. The hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) told us the other night that protection and corruption were twin evils, and that if his party came into power they would put down any corruption there was in the country. Let us again examine the record of the party of which the hon. gentleman is a prominent leader. Was this country free from scandals and corruption during the five years that the Liberal party held power? No, Sir, there was at that time the most luxuriant crop of scandals in Canada that this country has ever known. Was the province of Quebec free from corruption during the period that a Liberal Government controlled the reins of power there? Is the province of Nova Scotia free from corruption or scandal during the regime of the present Liberal Government?

Mr. FORBES. Yes.

Mr. HAZEN. My hon. friend says yes. Let us see by the record whether he or I am right. What has the Government of Nova Scotia done? They have borrowed sums of money which they have spent upon the roads of the country to be washed into the ditches by the rains falling in the spring. This, for the purpose of gaining political support; and before the recent elections in Nova Scotia—let me call the attention of hon. gentlemen opposite to this when they talk about corruption in public affairs—before the recent elections in Nova Scotia we had Orders in Council passed by the Government of Nova Scotia devoting very large sums in railway subsidies, just on the eve of that election, to a narrow gauge railway and a broad gauge railway running into the county of Shelburne for the express purpose of securing the defeat of Mr. Cahan, the leader of the Opposition party. Have we had no scandals in the province of Nova Scotia in connection with the expenditure of the by-road money? Turning again to the province of New Brunswick, we find that at the present time, it has appeared before the House of Assembly, that two of the Liberal supporters of the Attorney General, one of whom was his colleague in the last election in the country, for the purpose of raising the wind for campaign purposes, deliberately sold an office for the sum of $200.

An hon. MEMBER. Have you got any record of that?

Mr. HAZEN. Does the hon. gentleman want the record? Perhaps if he does I can give it to him. Let me read the correspondence which is also before the Local Assembly. The first of it bears the letter-heading of the office to which the Attorney General belongs. It reads:

A. C. BLAIR, Attorney General; J. H. BARRY,
BLAIR and BARRY, Attorneys and Solicitors, Fredericton, New Brunswick.

FREDERICTON, N.B.,
16th January, 1890.

DEAR QUINN,—It is of the utmost importance that you should hand me to-day the cheque we were speaking of yesterday. Our calculations were based on your doing this, and I do not know what the consequences will be if we are disappointed.

Yours very truly,

(Sgd.) J. H. BARRY.

Mr. Barry was the partner of the Attorney General. The next document is the receipt for the $200, which is as follows:—

FREDERICTON, N.B.

13th February, 1890.

$200.

Received from William H. Quinn the sum of $200 towards the election fund; not to be used until appointment is arranged, and if no appointment made, then to be returned.

(Sgd.) WILLIAM WILSON.

A leading member of the Liberal party in the province of New Brunswick, one of the orators put forward at the Liberal convention at Ottawa, and a colleague of the Attorney General of the province. I think my hon. friend the member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) will have to come down and give them a Napanee speech. Unfortunately, it appears that the goods were not delivered; the man did not get the office, in which case the money was to be paid back. Now, I will read the sequence:

WILLIAM WILSON, Esq., M.P.P.:

DEAR SIR.—After waiting and begging for over one year for the position in Mr. Allen's office, which Mr. Blair promised me in my store, it now seems I will not get it. I gave the money with that object, and it was the only office vacant at that time. Please send me a cheque for the money and interest, as I don't feel inclined to give the money for engraving clerk.

(Sgd.) WILLIAM QUINN.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Mr. Blair is in bad company.

Mr. HAZEN. I am afraid he is. These three men are all Liberals together. It is evident that Mr. Blair was in very bad company at the time; but in justice to him I wish to say that it does not appear, except inferentially, that he had any connection with the operation. I wonder, too, if we are to look for a lack of corruption in a party one of whose provincial leaders at the last general election was generous enough to send to the city of St. John a cheque for $5,000 for the purpose of electing the Liberal candidate. I think, as we look at the record of that party in Nova Scotia, in Quebec, in New Brunswick, and in the Dominion when they were in power here, that we cannot help coming to the conclusion that the cause of purity is not to be promoted by placing hon. gentlemen opposite in power again. But, Mr. Speaker, I am willing to take the ground, and to argue it in this House or on any public platform, that the present Government has not been an extravagant Government. What do we find the present rate of taxation to be as compared with what it was when hon. gentlemen opposite were in power? I find that when they went out of power in 1878 the per capita taxation in Canada amounted to $4.37. In 1892, after the Liberal-Conservative Government had been in power for fourteen years, the per capita taxation, according to the last returns that I can obtain, was $5.81 per head, an increase of only $1.44 per head in those fifteen years. Now, I think it would be well to inquire how the rate compares with the rate per capita in Great Britain and in the other colonies of Great Britain. In the United Kingdom the taxation is $9.62 per head; in Mauritius is $5.77 per head, in the Cape of Good Hope $4.86, in Newfoundland $6.79, in Bermuda $7.37, in Trinidad $7.87, in Victoria $15.35, in New South Wales $12.14, in South Australia $12, in Queensland $17.64, in Western Australia $22.05, in Tasmania $15.39, in New Zealand $16.91, in Australasia $14.74. In comparison with the other British possessions, I think we have little reason to find fault with the per capita rate of taxation in Canada; and that rate, although at present so low, will, I think, be further reduced to a considerable degree under the operation of the present Tariff Bill. If we look at the net debt of Canada, what do we find? We find that in 1878, when hon. gentlemen opposite went out of power, the net debt of Canada per head amounted to $34.41, in 1892 it amounted to $49.22, an increase of $14.81. I do not think that is a serious increase in our public debt, considering that we have practically completed the canal system of the older provinces, built the Canadian Pacific Railway, completed the Intercolonial Railway, and erected splendid public buildings in almost every town in this country. Let me ask, would this country, for the sake of avoiding an increase of $14.81 per capita in the public debt of the Dominion, be willing to return to the state of affairs that existed before, and blot out the Canadian Pacific Railway, blot out the canal system of Ontario and Quebec, blot out the Intercolonial Railway, and take away the splendid buildings dotting this country from one end to the other? I feel that these expenditures were justifiable expenditures, prudently and honestly made. Again, let us institute a comparison between the per capita debt of Canada and the per capita debt of the United Kingdom and those of the other British colonies. While our net debt in 1892 amounted to $49.22 per head, that of the United Kingdom amounted to $86.54, that of New South Wales to $225.65, that of Victoria to $185.56, that of South Australia to $330.73, that of Western Australia to $157.75, that of Queensland to $365.61, that of Tasmania to $235.93, and that of New Zealand to $292.61. It is said that comparisons are odious; but I think that comparison is not odious to us. It shows beyond peradventure the prudence and care exercised in the management of the finances of the Dominion of Canada, that to-day we have a very complete system of public works, a very complete system of railways and canals, that our public services have been all properly maintained, and that our credit has also been maintained; because there is no colony of the British Empire whose bonds command the same high value in the money markets of the world as those of Canada. We have done all that, and have yet kept our public debt within reasonable bounds, it being less than one-fifth per head of that of any of the Australian colonies. Then, the customs taxes in 1878, the last year of hon. gentlemen opposite, we find, amounted to $3.13 per head; in 1892, after fifteen years operation of the National Policy, they amounted to $4.18 per head, a tax rate that will be further reduced as a result of the changes at present proposed in the tariff. When we come to analyze the professions of economy made by hon. gentlemen opposite, and their boast that when they get into power the era of extravagance will be at an end, and the reign of economy will commence, we find that under their regime, it cost $5.58 to collect every hundred dollars of revenue, whereas, in 1892, under the management of the hon. gentlemen now occupying the Treasury benches, it cost $4.39 to collect every hundred dollars of revenue, a difference in favour of the economy of this Government of $1.19, a sum amounting in the whole to nearly a quarter of a million dollars a year. Now, Mr. Speaker, I would like to say just a few words with respect to the tariff itself. I may be excused for not having referred to it earlier in my speech, because hon. gentlemen opposite, with the exception of my hon. friend who last spoke, made no reference to it at all. My hon. friend from North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) engaged in a discussion on the advantages of reciprocity with the United States. I do not, and never have, belittled the advantages that would result to this country if we had a fair reciprocity with the United States—a treaty based on terms fair and honourable to us in Canada as well as to the Americans; a treaty which did not amount to a practical renunciation of our political independence, and to the handing over of the control of our tariff to the United States Congress. I have never undertaken to belittle the advantages of a treaty of that character, and do not propose to do so at present. But I do not think the hon. gentleman was altogether disingenuous and fair in the method he adopted of dealing with the condition of Canada during the period from 1854 to 1866, when we had a reciprocity treaty with the United States. The hon. gentleman must bear in mind that there were many exceptional circumstances then, which, of themselves, would have caused an increase of trade in Canada without any reciprocity. In the first place, the Crimean war occurred during that period. The armies of Europe had taken the field, many people were torn from their ordinary occupations, an impetus was given to our lumbering interest, and in many other ways our trade was stimulated. During that period also the Grand Trunk Railway was built in Canada, and millions of dollars were spent throughout the provinces of Ontario and Quebec in its construction. During that period also occurred the civil war in the United States, during which hundreds of thousands of men were called from the fields and the workshops to take up arms in behalf of their country. Those people, taken from the fields and workshops, had to be replaced; their labour had to be replaced; and naturally that occasioned an increased demand for the products of the Canadian workshops and farms. And yet, with all those exceptional advantages, we know that the year 1857 was one of the hardest years which ever existed in the upper provinces of the Dominion. The American people have since returned to their fields and their workshops; and instead of there being a large population in the United States anxious to buy the products of our fields and workshops, of all sorts and descriptions, we find the artisans and farmers of that country are to-day such large producers that they not only produce enough for home consumption, but export millions of dollars worth of manufactured goods and agricultural produce to the outside world, and only require certain lines of our products. Our present tariff, it seems to me, will meet with favour in this country. I think that the hon. Minister of Finance completely took the wind out of the sails of the Opposition by his speech. So far hon. gentlemen opposite have not attempted any serious criticism of the tariff, and until they do that and take the people into their confidence—until they tell the people what they propose themselves, what improvements they would suggest in the tariff, the country will not be prepared to accept any doctrine they may advance. The tariff itself will be an advantage to this country. I think that the way the dry goods tariff is arranged—imposing ad valorem instead of specific duties—is a distinct advantage, and one which, perhaps, might have been made at an earlier date with advantage to the country. This change to ad valorem duties, abolishing the specific duties, practically reduces the duties to a very considerable extent, while at the same time giving sufficient protection to insure the continuance of cotton manufacturing and the manufacture of fabrics and textiles. The great advantage that I see, however, in the change in the tariff is this, that it can no more be said, with the faintest semblance of justification, that it operates in favour of the rich as against the poor. No doubt the lower grades of goods, being heavier than the more expensive grades, the specific duties were, to a limited extent, open to the charge frequently made by hon. gentlemen opposite, that they operated in favour of the rich as against the poor, and the change to ad valorem duties, pure and simple, does away with that charge as an issue between the Government and the Opposition. It will certainly take from the Opposition the opportunity of dilating by the hour, as a famed leader of theirs did when addressing a meeting in New Brunswick, on the question of how many inches a poor man was justified in devoting to the tail of his shirt. That question has passed out of the range of politics. The change in the duties on sugar is also in the interests of the country, and the same remark applies to the tariff with regard to hardware and many other items. I shall not take up the time of the House further in discussing the items seriatim. No one claims perfection for the measure, because perfection is not to be found in human affairs. But when the matter comes to be considered in committee, no doubt certain changes will be made, and no doubt suggestions offered from both sides will be considered; and I have no doubt that it will finally be adopted in such a shape as to be more acceptable to the public than a free trade tariff or any tariff for revenue could possibly be. I must not take up the time of the House further in discussing this matter. The amendment of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), as I have said, is simply a play upon words. It gives us nothing substantial; it lays down no policy; it advances no new political theory or doctrine. And I am confident the people will regard it as simply a piece of political tactics, so framed as to enable the Opposition to declare to the people, in any particular locality in which the spokesman of the party may have occasion to lay down their views, that, if unproven, they would frame a tariff so as to suit that particular locality. I thank you, Mr. Speaker, and hon. gentlemen, for the attentive hearing you have given me. I trust that under the new tariff our country may go on prospering more and more. I trust that any sectional or sectarian feeling in the country may be allayed by our wise, statesmanlike, and progressive legislation. I trust that we, in this Dominion, having in view the interests of our young nationality, will remember, wherever we may be, that first and last and all the time, in heart and soul and feeling, we are Canadians; and that the one aim and object of all will be, as loyal Canadians, to have all elements in the country so blended, that the thistle and the shamrock and the rose and the lily of France may be entwined in one beautiful and harmonious whole with the maple leaf of Canada.

Mr. LANDERKIN. This being the first time I have addressed the House this session, I hope, Mr. Speaker, you will excuse me if I make any clerical errors. Even if I should make a clerical error—I do not know whether I would have the sanction of your approval, Sir—but I have a precedent. The Minister of Finance made two clerical errors, and those were of such a size that a wagon with a load of starch passed through in one of them unperceived. I think I may call, therefore, for the sympathy of the hon. Minister in the observations that I shall make. I might say that I have listened with a great deal of pleasure to the speech of the hon. gentleman. I admire the city of St. John. I admire that beautiful province of New Brunswick. I admire the provinces of Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island, and all the Maritime Provinces. We have some good men from those provinces here. I do not admire all the men we have here from those provinces now. But still I am quite willing to listen to them, and am pleased to listen to them. The hon. member for St. John (Mr. Hazen) alluded to the speech of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) as being an old speech. The hon. gentleman is not a very old member. He has spoken here two or three times; and now I would like to ask him to tell me how many times I have heard his speech. Do you know, Mr. Speaker, I think I like that speech better every time I hear it. It is a most happy speech, and I think the hon. gentleman is improving in his delivery; I think his delivery is getting freer every session. I do not know whether that is the result of parliamentary life, for I have been here a great many sessions and have listened to a great many able speeches; and you, Mr. Speaker, have been here a great many sessions and have listened to a great many able speeches, and I do not know whether we improve as much as we ought to do. Just look at the giants that preceded you, Mr. Speaker. Probably, if you had listened as attentively as some other members have listened, some other gentleman might be called upon to preside at our session who would not bring that grace and dignity to the position that our present Speaker has brought to it, and for which we all admire him. But then new men must form the Government. It is true, as the Premier has said, they stand by the old principles, but they are new men. No doubt, that is the reason they have such hope in the country; for youth is always hopeful. They imagine that they are possessed of more experience than those who have been here for years and years. I remember when the member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) came into this House twenty years ago. All the Tory newspapers in the land said they welcomed him to his seat because he was to be the brains of the party. The brains of the party! And, as a supporter of the principles of reform, I welcomed him because I thought brains was what they were most in need of at that time. I remember when the First Minister came here. The member for North Simcoe came here twenty years ago, but age and experience do not count with this Government. Somebody who was trained in a boarding-school and has just got out is the man to handle the finances of the country in order to give the business people confidence in our financial institutions. I remember when the First Minister came here about eight years ago. I was reading a speech of the hon. gentleman only the other day. There was never any doubt at first, and for many years about the loyalty of the member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), to the Conservative party. Why, if I had been called upon to select one Conservative in this country—more, if I had been called upon to select a sound Tory—the hon. member for North Simcoe is the man I would have selected. And when I heard him read out of the party at Belleville by the First Minister, who had only been in this House eight years—and who passed sentence upon him apparently because he (the Premier) had once been a judge—when I heard it declared that the hon. member for North Simcoe must carry on his nefarious work outside of the Conservative party—well, it did strike me as something peculiar. I believe the Tories believe in vested rights. Why was it then that the First Minister took away the vested rights of the member for North Simcoe and declined to have him any longer in the party? Now, the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Hazen), spoke for an hour and a half—was I going to say on the tariff? If I had said so, it would have been a clerical error. He spoke for an hour and a half and never mentioned any article of the tariff until the last—unless there be one exception. For the first ten minutes of his speech he undoubtedly exercised a good deal of discrimination in dealing with taffy—taffy for the Government, taffy for the Finance Minister: so much taffy for the latter that I was going to ask the hon. Finance Minister what was the duty on taffy, and whether he was going to increase that duty or to make taffy free.

Mr. FOSTER. I think we will make it free.

Mr. LANDERKIN. If it was to be free, I could indulge in it a little myself. The hon. member for St. John told us about the happy, contented and prosperous condition of the people of St. John and of New Brunswick, and of the great progress they had made during the last ten years. I fancy the hon. member has been so much engaged in his briefs that he has not attended to the political records. He made a great deal of the advancement of property in St. John. Perhaps that arose from his knowledge of what was made in the sale of the Harris estate to the Government. It may be that he built this whole part of his speech on that one sale. Two hundred thousand dollars was paid for a few feet of land in the city of St. John which was sold to the Government. There is another thing I wish to call the hon. gentleman's attention to. When he read his letter about Blair, I observed he was very kind and very considerate. The Minister of Railways was out; the Postmaster General was out; the hon. member for Three Rivers (Sir Hector Langevin) was out. It was very kind. I do not know whether the First Minister was out and whether he also was spared the reading of those letters. But the hon. gentleman from St. John has cast a terrible slur upon the province of New Brunswick. He gives us to understand that Mr. Blair bought up the whole province for $200. I have not heard anything so bad as that in all the blue ruin that has been spoken in this country. Think of it; the whole province of New Brunswick bought by Mr. Blair for $200! When I heard the hon. gentleman I thought of suggesting to the Government the idea of sending the member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Cockburn) to see if he could not find out about it. That hon. gentleman went down two or three years ago to investigate some matters in Quebec. I believe it was a joint matter between the Postmaster General and Mercier; but the hon. member for Toronto did not take much cognizance of the Postmaster General; his business was particularly with Honoré Mercier. I remember that when he came back he declared himself astonished at the extravagance and corruption in the province of Quebec, because he found that actually Mr. Mercier had a house to live in. The hon. gentleman was satisfied in his own mind that Mr. Mercier must have been a corrupt man because he lived in a house. I hope the members of our Government are all safely housed; I hope they have even their city and country houses.

After Recess.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Mr. Speaker, when you left the Chair I was referring to the speech delivered by the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Hazen). The hon. gentleman pointed out the great prosperity that was to be found in the beautiful province of New Brunswick. He also spoke of the corruption existing in the Local Government of that province, and in the Local Governments of other provinces. In so far as Local Governments are concerned, the hon. gentleman evinced considerable aptitude in discovering where there was anything wrong in the administration of public affairs. But, singular to relate, the hon. gentleman has not discovered anything wrong since he came to Ottawa. The only thing that he brought before this House was a matter of $200 that was supposed to have been used at the last general election for the province of New Brunswick, and he read about that amidst great applause from the gentlemen on the other side. But, ever since he came here he has seen no reason to doubt that we have an honest Government, that we have a Government that would not take public money and apply it to any purpose other than that for which it was intended by Parliament. The hon. gentleman also spoke of the prosperity of the province. Let me draw the attention of the hon. gentleman to the fact that we have had a census taken in the province of New Brunswick. That census was not taken by gentlemen on this side of the House, but by gentlemen now occupying the Treasury benches. And what did it show? Why, it showed that in the city and county of St. John, so ably represented by my hon. friend and two colleagues, two is to be taken, and one is to be left, and this is provided for under the gerrymander of the Minister of Justice. The question for them to decide is who are to be taken and who is to be left. If the people of the city and county of St. John will do their duty, they will leave them all at home, and will send gentlemen here who will support a policy that will have a tendency to develop not only the city of St. John, but also the county of St. John, the province of New Brunswick and the Dominion at large. There is one thing I admire the hon. gentleman for, besides his taffy—and he had a wonderful stock of that on hand which he administered to the member for Kings, the Finance Minister. You would have thought the hon. gentleman was going to draw more money than Mr. Blair did in the province of New Brunswick before the next general election, judging by the taffy he indulged in in the first portion of his speech. Ten years before we had the National Policy we had a census taken, and taken, not by hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, but by hon. gentlemen on the other side. And that census showed that the province of New Brunswick had increased in its population in ten years by nearly 50,000 souls. But, since we had the National Policy—the great National Policy, that has built up our industries, that has given prosperity to our people, that has made the country bloom and blossom like the rose—what has been the increase in that province? The population of the province in 1881 was 321,233. In 1891 the population was 321,263, an increase, under the beneficent National Policy of 30 souls. And the hon. gentleman is delighted with that prosperity, which he attributed to this policy. But he did not tell us whether greater prosperity would come under the old policy or under the present hybrid policy. Now, I think perhaps it might be well for the House to go into Committee of the Whole in order to see which of these Conservative members we are to reject by the gerrymander, made necessary by the fact that the population has fallen off so that they cannot afford to pay three members, and must reduce the number to two. There was an election there some time ago; one gentleman, a member of this House, having been elevated to a judgeship of some kind or other. The Government brought out a candidate, but he did not succeed, and, consequently, we have here a gentleman representing that constituency, elected in opposition to the machine. We would like to see that hon. gentleman exercise a little independence in this House and show the Government that if they do not administer the affairs of the country as they ought, he will no longer be with them. Now, Sir, it is very remarkable that in the formation of this Government, the Prime Minister thought it incumbent upon him, even when the population was not increasing, to add three more members to his Government—not to the Cabinet, but to the Ministry. The Prime Minister has two Controllers and one Solicitor General. The hon. gentleman is unable to manage the Department of Justice alone, so he has called in a very able lawyer in the person of my hon. friend, the Solicitor General. I understand the Solicitor General has had a good deal of experience in certain kinds of cases in Montreal, cases particularly interesting to the Government. I believe he is a splendid solicitor for bridges. I understand that he has had a great deal of experience in that line, and, though it may have been expensive to the country at times, still his ability has shone forth. It was necessary for the Minister of Justice to have a capable Solicitor General with him. The other day I was going by the Privy Council Chamber. I saw the two Controllers and the Solicitor General sitting outside. They were apparently tugging the door. I overheard their conversation—and I was not eaves-dropping, either. They were complaining bitterly because they could not get in. The question of the tariff was before the Government, and they thought they ought to have a voice in the discussion. The Controller of Customs says: I have a large following behind me in this country. The Solicitor General says: So have I. But they did not get in. They had their hats in their hands, and I understood afterwards that they were waiting for the free lunch that is served there during tariff discussions. The Solicitor-General said to the Controller of Customs:

Men sometimes are masters of their fates;
The fault is not in our stars,
But in ourselves, that we are underlings.

I recollect when hon. gentlemen were about forming a Government. I do not know whether the member for St. John (Mr. Hazen) was here or not, I wish the Prime Minister were here now, and anything I may say regarding hon. gentlemen I do not desire to say offensively. I will relate a little history, and do so in as easy and friendly a manner as I possibly can, but I will be true to history. I hope hon. gentlemen opposite will not think there is any blue ruin in this; if so, I did not make the blue ruin, they are responsible for that. I remember a speech delivered by the Prime Minister, and I will refer to that speech now in order that the House may understand to what I may desire to call attention. This was a speech delivered by the First Minister after his return from Paris. I suppose all hon. members have heard that he was at Paris, and I am sure all have heard the member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Cockburn) was in Chicago. The speech to which I refer was delivered by the Prime Minister in Belleville. He went there on the occasion of the demonstration given for the member for West Hastings (Mr. Corby). I am sure it was on behalf of a very worthy member, and the Prime Minister went there, and took all his combination with him. The Prime Minister spoke of the death of the honoured chieftain Sir John Macdonald, and then he spoke of the death of Sir John Abbott, and he said that right on the accession of Sir John Abbott to the leadership came a tremendous attack on the Conservative party by the Opposition, the longest sustained and most bitter in Canada; in that dark hour no man stood firmer in the ranks and responded more promptly when the bugle sounded than the man they honoured that night, Harry Corby. In that dark hour, when we made a bitter attack! The Premier's memory is not so good as are the memories of the hon. gentlemen who spoke on the tariff. I heard the same arguments presented by hon. gentlemen on the tariff as they used twenty years ago. They have remarkably good memories, but the Premier had not a remarkably good memory. Does not the Premier know the attack was made on the Government and on the old principle by one of themselves, by the secretary of their association, if I understand rightly? Do they not remember that when Sir John Macdonald was in his declining days, and it was considered by the people of the country, and by his friends, that the termination of his life was only a question of a few days, that a conspiracy was made to defeat the man who had stood by Sir John Macdonald for thirty years, Sir Hector Langevin? Who were prominent in the fight, who lead it? The present Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec, aided and abetted in a very diplomatic way by the present First Minister. Were they better than Sir Hector? Those hon. gentlemen who attended the committee and watched the conduct and action of the present First Minister will remember how gently, during the time of Sir John Macdonald's illness, the Minister of Justice was inserting his knife into the political body of his colleague. Is there any hon. member who did not see that? And when at last death removed the old Chieftain, he plunged it to the very hilt. Why? Sir Hector Langevin stood between the Minister of Justice and his ambition. Now, there were difficulties in the Cabinet at that time. One of those difficulties which occurred reminds me of an historic scene in the past. They held a meeting of the Cabinet. The member for Three Rivers was away at an interview with His Excellency the Governor General; the Postmaster General was in Quebec—I believe he had to see Angers. They held a meeting of the Cabinet, I say, and this thing was smelling all over the country. It was not a question of a few hundred dollars—an! I draw the attention of the hon. member from St. John (Mr. Hazen) to this point—it was a question of about two million dollars that had been stolen from the people. The question to be decided then was, who was to be the scapegoat? They were all in the same boat, one as bad as the other. I tell the Postmaster General this because he was not there, and it was during his absence and the absence of the member from Three Rivers, that the members of the Cabinet had a conference. The record is not taken down in the minutes, but I imagine it was something like this: A gentleman who was true to his leader—I refer to the then Minister of Inland Revenue, now Secretary of State (Mr. Costigan) spoke up in Council and said:

Shall no man else be touched but only Sir Hector?

The Minister of Trade and Commerce, who is now in the other House, Mr. Mackenzie Bowell—I suppose I can so speak of him without making any clerical error, said:

Costigan, well urged; I think it is not meet Sir Adolphe, so well beloved of Sir Hector, Should outlive Sir Hector: we shall find of him A shrewd contriver; and you know his means. If he improve them, may well stretch so far As to annoy us all; which to prevent Let Sir Adolphe and Sir Hector fall together.

Skill and diplomacy in destroying showed forth in Sir John Thompson, who said:

Our course will seem too bloody, Mackenzie Bowell,

To cut the head off and then hack the limbs,
Like wrath in death, and envy afterwards;
For Sir Adolphe is but a limb of Sir Hector,
Let us be sacrificers, but not butchers, Mackenzie.

We all stand up against the spirit of Sir Hector,
And in the spirit of men there is no blood;
O, that we then could come by Sir Hector's purse
And not dismember Sir Hector! But, alas,
Sir Hector must bleed for it! And, gentle friends,

Let's kill him boldly, but not wrathfully;
Let's carve him as a dish fit for the gods,
Not hew him as a carcass fit for hounds;
And let our hearts, as subtle masters do,
Stir up their servants to an act of rage,
And after seem to chide 'em. This shall mark
Our purpose necessary, and not envious;
Which so appearing to the common eyes,
We shall be called purgers, not murderers,
And for Sir Adolphe, think not of him;
For he can do no more than Sir Hector's arm
When Sir Hector's head is off.

Then Bowell rose again in Council and said:

Yet I do fear him;
For in th' ingrafted love he bears to Sir Hector.

Then Thompson said:

Do not think of him:
If he love Sir Hector, all he can do,
Is to himself—take thought and die for Sir Hector:

And that were much he should ; for he is given
To sports, to wildness, and much company.

Then Haggart comes in. He said :

There is no fear of him ; he need not die
Until we get our vouchers that he holds.

The reappearance of the Postmaster General and of the Minister of Public Works cut short the controversy, and, I understand they then took up the question of the subsidy of the Lake St. John railway. Now, Mr. Speaker, hon. gentlemen on that side of the House claim that they have a policy, and they say that we have no policy, and although they tell us that we have had this policy and that policy and the other policy for years ; they say they do not understand our policy. Why, Sir, they do not wish to understand our policy. Our policy is for freedom and for liberty ; our policy is calculated to give every man in this Dominion every cent he earns, and by our policy we do not provide, as they do, that one man shall get the money that another man earns by reason of any legislation. We are bound to fight them on this ground, we are bound to fight it whether we win or whether we lose ; whether in defeat or whether in victory we are going to stand up for the people and to stand up for their rights, and not delegate from the people any right which they possess under our constitution. The Government have a peculiar way of doing things. One of them will say : That if they were to take down the tariff barriers any lower we would have Canada made a slaughter market, that this country would be ruined and destroyed by goods coming in from the American market, and in the next breath they will tell you about all the victories that were won by Canadian farmers in competition with all the world at Chicago. I would like to ask any hon. gentleman in this House—if it be the case, and it is—that our farmers at the Chicago exhibition carried off the palm from the world ; what do our farmers want but the markets of the world in order to succeed. Is that not clear to the apprehension of every member of this House ? What have our farmers to fear ? They have only to fear restriction, and they have only to fear being shut out from the markets of the world. They met the peoples of all countries, and in open competition at the world's exhibition they came out triumphant. And now the Ministers—those men who have been in public life two, three or four years, with the exception of a few of them—think that they know better what would suit the farmers of this country and the people of this country than men who have devoted a lifetime to the study of these questions and to the study of matters that tend to develop a country. Why, if the Ministers would only examine their own reports, if they would examine the census for a moment, they would be convinced that Canada requires a change of policy. We want a thorough and radical change of policy and we must have it if we wish our country to improve and to progress. With everything that hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House have said in favour of Canada, in favour of the industries of Canada, in favour of the resources of Canada, in favour of the intelligence of our people, I heartily agree, and I am glad to endorse it. I am just as strong in acknowledgment and in defence of our rights and in admiration of our institutions and of our resources as any man in this House ; but I am convinced that the time has arrived when a radical change of policy must come. In the province of New Brunswick, during the last ten years, the policy of this Government has taken away, not only the natural increase of population, but every immigrant that came into the province ; and the idea of any member from New Brunswick getting up and defending, in this House, such a policy as that is something that I cannot understand. I tell you that the fact is this : That under those circumstances, members have a heavy responsibility resting upon them, in that they neglect to draw the attention of the Government to the existence of such a state of things in their province. Now, to show the supporters of the Government the esteem and respect that the Government have for their opinions, let me draw your attention to another matter. You remember that last session there was some talk about a revision of the tariff. The Government talked about revising the tariff, but they could not trust the opinion or advice of any of their followers in this House. They doubted the judgment of these hon. gentlemen. They had no faith in them ; they were too old, some of them, they had been in public life too long, they understood the country apparently too well, and the Government did not want to consult them. To use a rather vulgar phrase, the Government sat upon them and told them that their opinions and their advice would be disregarded. So what did the Government do ? They sent out the Minister of Finance ; about three years ago, he taught a school in Fredericton, taught a young ladies' school, did that gentleman who is in charge of our finances. They sent the Minister of Agriculture with him, and then they sent out the two Controllers. They went down to Montreal to get information that they could not get from the members for Montreal ; the members for Montreal did not count. They had the Solicitor General here, but what did he know about the tariff ? His attention was to be directed to law ; law questions and bridge contracts and all that kind of thing had to come under his supervision so that he could not devote any attention so as to give the Government advice on what his constituents needed. They went to Montreal and two or three other cities, and they held secret conferences with their supporters to find out how much they could stand of a reduction, and how much they would advance if they did not reduce. After they went among their friends, then they grew a little bolder, and they tell us that they went out in two sections. The Minister of Finance and the Minister of Agriculture being well qualified to look into these things, went to the east and to the west; and the Controller of Customs and the Controller of Inland Revenue, I believe, confined their attentions to the province of Ontario. The two controllers went there to sit down and to listen to what the people had to say, and to what the people wanted. Did they do that? Did they seek to enquire from the people what changes they wanted in the tariff? What did the papers say about it? As soon as these two Controllers went together and met the people, they would call a witness, and if the witness gave any evidence they did not like, then they would heckle the witness, and it became so common an occurrence that the Conservative papers, meeting after meeting, used to say: Another triumph and victory for the Controllers. They had badgered the farmers and they had badgered others that came before them, and they had a triumph and a victory at this place and that place. Well, the combination of Minister held meetings through the provinces, and they came to my riding, but they were not satisfied with one meeting, and so they held two meetings. They were so much attached to me that they thought they could give me two meetings. That did not exactly satisfy the Government. It appears that what the Ministers had said did not go down; there was something peculiar there. Then the Controller of Customs and the Controller of Inland Revenue were sent back on the back-track of the Ministers, and had a meeting at the same place where the Ministers had been; and there they tackled and badgered the people. If I might offer a suggestion to the Controller of Inland Revenue, I think, he is infinitely better at law than he is on tariffs. As long as he sticks to law, he will do well; he ought to take the Solicitor General's place; but when he takes hold of the tariff, I tell you he gets very much mixed. They went around to see the people. Of course, there was the member for Leeds (Mr. Ferguson) and the member for Cornwall (Mr. Bergin)—what did they know about the tariff? What advice could they give to the Ministry? There was the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy)—what suggestion could he make? Or the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien)—what could he say about it? Or the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Fairbairn)? Or the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Ross)? What could any of these men propose? They knew nothing of the tariff; the Ministers would not believe them. They had to go and see the people for themselves in order to find out what they wanted—what was necessary in the interest of the country. There is one matter that I want to draw the attention of the Government to, and it is this. I have examined the Trade and Navigation returns, and I find that the duty on coal oil is very excessive. I find that a gentleman, who imported several carloads of coal oil, imported one carload on January 5, 1892, the value of which was $224.77 and the duty $233.50. On February 6, 1892, he imported another carload valued at $202.38, on which the duty was $240.50. On September 13, 1892, he imported another carload, the invoice price of which was $183.75 and the duty $225.15. On November 29, 1892, he imported another carload, the invoice price of which was $184.86 and the duty $229.03. On January 26, 1893, he imported a carload, the invoice price of which was $181.41, and the duty $231. Now, according to the theory which the Conservatives used to put forward that the foreigners paid the duty, I find by the Trade and Navigation Returns that in two years the United States sold us $970,000 worth of coal oil, and they paid $990,000 of duty, as well as the freight, in order to get the privilege of selling it to us. That is, taking the Conservative argument, the Americans were so anxious to sell their goods in Canada that they paid $990,000 in order to sell us $970,000 worth. I wonder why it is that the Government have not had their attention called to this. They are making a great change in the tariff. The Minister of Finance the other night spoke for two hours in praise of the tariff; told us of its beauties and excellencies; told us what it had done—how it had developed the various industries of this country; told us of the terrible depression that had existed before it came into force. But still, after telling us all this—how perfect, how good, and how useful this tariff was in developing the resources of the country—he comes along and changes it in a few particulars. He hacks it a little here and a little there. He is not going to make much alteration in it or give much relief to the country. They talk about the depression that existed under the old system. Let them take the census returns and examine them for themselves, and they will find that the day when the blight came on Canada was the day when our taxes were increased by the National Policy. National Policy! It has never been a National Policy. It is scarcely a ward policy. It does not deserve the name of National Policy. It is a sectional policy, a provincial policy, a narrow policy, it is a fraud on the people of this country, and ever has been. When they got into power, they got in on what they called the N.P. resolution. What was that? It was one line after another of blue ruin; one line after another of decrying this country. No men have decried this country but the men who introduced the system that has brought ruin and disaster upon many people in this country, that has driven people out of every province in this Dominion. We have not kept our natural increase; we have not kept the immigrants that we have brought here. I tell these hon. gentlemen—whether they can fortify themselves against the wishes of the people by their gerrymanders, their franchise Act, or their tariff system—that the people of this country are determined, and if they are true to themselves they will never rest until they rise in their might and sweep this policy of protection away. Now, I will read to you the policy of the leader of the Government when he is on the public platform, and then I will read to you the policy of my leader when he is on the public platform, and then leave this House and the country to judge which of these gentlemen takes the right view as to what the future of this country should be. The leader of the Government made a speech at Antigonish, in his native county, which he represents in this House; and in that speech, as reported in the 'Empire'—and I presume it did not do him any injustice—the hon. gentleman said:

Now, the Grits are very anxious that we should say something about Winnipeg, and I am going to oblige them this afternoon. We lost Winnipeg, and they gained it. We are not hoggish. We don't want the whole House of Commons. A parliamentary majority of 63 is good enough for us every time. It was proper to let the Grits enjoy a thanksgiving rooster, after patiently waiting for it for so many years. Of the 64 bye-elections during the present Parliament, the Government has carried four out of every five, and our majority has gone up from 23 to 63. Under these gratifying circumstances, we should not begrudge them the little rooster. A victorious general, after a battle, said: 'Another such victory, and we are lost.' Another such victory as that at Winnipeg, and the Grits are ruined. When we started off in the bye-election fights, the Grits captured Richelieu. They did so by the aid of Thomas McGreevy and Nicholas Connolly, whom the Government were prosecuting, but they paid dearly for Richelieu during the subsequent contests, and Winnipeg will be a very costly thing for the Grits before they settle their bill. After extracting all the plunder he could from Mercier, Tarte became Laurier's standard-bearer in Richelieu, and was victorious by the aid of McGreevy and Connolly. Tarte proclaimed himself as the great patriot who was going to rectify the wrongs of his fellow-countrymen in the North-west, and now Joseph Martin, the originator of all the trouble, the man who has set race against race and creed against creed, and against whom the party's bitterest shafts have been levelled, is cordially congratulated on his election by Mr. Tarte's chieftain, Mr. Laurier. (Laughter.) "Stealing their clothes, indeed," exclaimed the Premier. "I like to see the colour on both sides of the clothes I wear. I don't wear yellow on one side and black on the other. Mr. Laurier is perfectly welcome to his black Tarte and yellow Martin." (Laughter and applause.) He (Sir John Thompson) would be the last man to thrust religion into politics, though some people were busily engaged doing that elsewhere.

Mr. LANDERKIN.

The Premier proceeded to relate the facts regarding Martin's determined effort to strike down the Catholic schools of Manitoba and the subsequent reference of the appeal of the minority to the courts, as the law provided. Yet, because he had carried out the law proposed by Mr. Blake, and unanimously adopted by both houses of Parliament, insidious efforts were made to condemn him as trying to subvert Manitoba legislation; while in Nova Scotia paltry attempts were made to make it appear that he was selling his conscience and betraying those who worship at the same shrine as himself; but the generosity, intelligence and sense of fair play of his fellow-countrymen would never allow these miserable attempts to succeed.

Now, I would ask who was Minister of Justice when that Bill was introduced? Does that Bill take away any right from any class or creed of this country? I would ask the Minister of Justice that question. I would ask every member in this House, if that Bill took away any rights, where was the Minister of Justice if he allowed that Bill to go without veto, then he must share alike with Mr. Martin any responsibility or blame that may be attached to it. That is the exact position. Why did he go down before his constituents of that class or creed in order to inflame them and throw the blame of his own act upon Mr. Martin? The right hon. gentleman was Minister of Justice then. If there was a wrong done or intended, what right had he to go into the county of Antigonish and lay the blame at the door of another man, when he had not the moral courage to disallow it. I am not discussing the merits of this measure, but am taking the First Minister on his own words; and I say if hon. gentlemen opposite have an idea that one policy in one province and another in another is ever going to build up this Dominion, they never made a greater mistake. I am a Protestant, and thank God I am too strong in my Protestantism not to protest in this House against sectarianism. As long as I have been in this House, on every occasion, I have stood firm to my principles. I believe that every man should worship according to his own conscience, and I believe that the man who goes to his constituency and tries to trade on the religious sensibilities of his constituents in order to inflame them is doing a worse act than the Minister of Finance is doing in his tariff, and that is unlimited in its capacity for evil. Now, I will read you what the leader of the Opposition said, and show you the difference between the two men. The leader of the Opposition spoke in Quebec, and here is what he said:

Before going further, let me say, and I am happy to be able to make the statement in this old French city of Quebec, to be able to proclaim that the basis and aim of our ideas and hopes as Liberals are that we are before and above all Canadians; Canadians in the fullest acceptance of the terms: Canadians at Quebec, Canadians at Toronto, and Canadians from the shores of the Gulf of St. Lawrence to the famous mountains whose feet are kissed by the waves of the Pacific and whose crests are refreshed by the balmy breezes from the Orient. (Prolonged applause.) Our great object is the development of the work of confederation; it is to draw closer, bind and cement together the different elements scattered over the face of the whole of British North America, and to weld them into one nation. (Hear, hear.) This is, as I understand it, the role of the Liberal party in the confederation, and as long as I shall have the honour to take a part in the shaping of our destinies this is the ideal towards which it shall gravitate. (Applause.)

In another portion he says :

You know, gentlemen, as well as I do, that the citizens of Quebec have seen the day when their splendid harbour was their joy and their pride. That was the time when, at all seasons of the year, the banks of the River St. Charles resounded with the blows of the carpenter's axe, when from June to September the waters of the north brought them the square timber from St. Maurice, the Gatineau, the Ottawa and even the Georgian Bay, when from the opening of navigation in the spring to its close in the fall a forest of masts greeted the eye from Lévis to Sillery, and when seamen and raftsmen crowded each other in the streets of the Lower Town, the one conveying to us the products of European civilization, and the other the spoils of our virgin forests. (Applause.) That time was, but it exists no longer, except as a memory of a prosperous period, and as I speak at this moment, under the reign of Sir John Thompson, Mr. Angers and Sir Adolphe Caron, the port of Quebec, even in its most active season, is as deserted, empty and lonely as in the time of Donnacona. (Applause.)

Now, I will just read what the First Minister said in reference to the condition of the country, when the late respected and lamented Mr. Mackenzie, held the reins of power; and I shall leave it to the House and the country to judge the fairness of the men who made these different utterances. Speaking at Belleville, the right hon. the First Minister said :

I remember as well as every one of you can, the hopeless state in which this country was fifteen years ago. Every industry paralyzed, every wheel of activity stopped, the revenue frustrated, the trade falling off millions every year. The facts are undisputed to this day. They are incapable of dispute because the ex-Finance Minister, Sir Richard Cartwright, declared in the House of Commons that the state was like a ship lying to in a storm. The people of every part of this country at that time asked the Government for something better than something lying to in the storm, but they were refused redress and refused hope until almost from the place in which I stand the notes of a new policy were sounded which gave hope and political life to the people of this Dominion from one end of it to the other.

Note the tone of that and compare it with the tone of the other. Consider the national aspirations of the gentlemen at the head of the respective parties in this country, and I appeal to the people of this country to say which they like the better of the two. I will read you what my leader says at the close of his speech :

" True to the double blood that was poured into my veins by my father, an old soldier, and my mother, a Vendean." Let us also be true to our double origin, true to the memory and the reverence of the great nation from whom we have sprung, and true also to the great nation who have given us freedom. (Applause). And, in all the difficulties, all the pains, and all the vicissitudes of our situation, let us always remember that love is better than hatred, and faith better than doubt, and let hope in our future destinies be the pillar of fire to guide us in our career. (Enthusiastic and prolonged applause).

I think I could safely leave my speech here, merely pointing to the declarations of my leader and saying that I subscribe to every line and every word in that address. I ask hon. gentlemen on the other side if they can subscribe to the speech made by the First Minister in the riding of Antigonish, which he represents. Now, our friends on the other side have peculiar ways of doing things. The Premier spoke of the assistance the Opposition gave to his Government when he was absent. There is no wonder that he did so, because during the—I hope the Controller of Customs will not run off; I have a little to say to him. I want to refer to his sedition in the absence of the Premier.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Come back! Come back!

Mr. LANDERKIN. There was a question that came up in the House during the absence of the Premier. It was the question of the speech delivered by the Controller of Customs. Why, the Controller of Customs last session was going to march upon Ulster. Now he has marched out. I was going to suggest a campaign for him. I do not know whether the Premier, when he was in the old country, went to Ulster to select the battle ground for the Controller of Customs. The Controller was going there to overthrow the Queen, Lords and Commons, if they passed a Bill he did not like. He said he would, and everybody knew he would if he said it. He was going over there to do that. I was going to select another mission for him. You know we had a Behring Sea arbitration, and that, as a result, our seal fishermen were not allowed to fish for seals in Behring Sea. This was the way of it: You remember that when the present Minister of Finance first came out of the boarding-school he was made Minister of Marine here, and he went on so with the American fishermen down on the Atlantic Coast and so irritated the Yankees that they would not allow our people to fish in Behring Sea. The hon. gentleman is responsible for that. But I do not blame him, for he was young and had not had any experience. He got out of the position, but he did not get out in time. And then they put a worse man in the place. I was going to suggest to the gallant Controller of Customs that he should fit out an armament and go up to Behring Sea and guard our poor fishermen. That would be better than going to Ulster. That would suit the country better; it would be truer to our policy on this side—the policy of standing by Canada. Now, we have had that award, and you know the result of it. The hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) told you about that award; told you how your interests had been slaughtered by it; told you how the seal fishers of this country had had their rights taken away. Well, it is singular that this Government and this House intrusted such a case to the young stripling Minister of Marine. Is there any nation under Heaven that would do a thing like that except Canada? Is there in Canada any Government except this one that would do such a thing as that—sending to take charge of such a case a young, inexperienced head of a department, and one who had been put in charge of the department, not on account of his own virtues, but on account of the virtues his father is regarded as having possessed? The sealers are there and out of employment; they are not allowed to catch seals. But then, of course, there are some compensating advantages to the poor sealers who are out of employment, who are selling their kits and their outfits, and whose families are starving—why, Charley Tupper has been knighted. What a consolation to these people to know that Charley Tupper has ceased to exist and that Sir Hibbert Tupper begins his career from the ruins of their business and from the loss of the seal fishing trade to this country. There is another little matter I should like to refer to, and then I think I shall conclude. I see the Minister of War (Mr. Patterson) is getting warlike. He was at Windsor not long ago. They gave a banquet there to Attorney General Casgrain of Quebec, who at one time belonged to Windsor; I believe he was born there, and is the son of the Senator from that district. Now, I want to show you how broad the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite is. I will read from an article in reference to this matter from the 'Toronto Mail.' No one will doubt that article, because the 'Mail' used to be a great organ of the party of hon. gentlemen opposite—and I do not know exactly what it is now. The article is headed: "A Significant Speech," and it refers to the banquet given to Attorney General Casgrain:

¶ Shortly after he entered the Ministry he was banqueted at an hotel here and in unmeasured terms he denounced the P.P.A., which at that time was not heard of in Canada far beyond Windsor, and could therefore, he supposed, be safely attacked.

I would like to get the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) to listen to this, as the question is one in which he takes a deep interest. I would just like hon. gentlemen opposite to consider these things and see if they cannot soften down a little and arrive at some conclusion satisfactory to the whole Conservative party.—

Last night he took quite the opposite view. He referred to the fact that Ontario and its people are denounced almost every Sunday at the church doors throughout the province of Quebec, and spoke at length of the aggression of the Church in that province. He concluded a patriotic and fiery speech by stating that Ontario people would be cravens indeed did they fail to resent the conduct of French Canada.

Well, here is the Attorney General of Quebec in reply to that. I will give you his speech in Montreal, in the presence of a good many members of this House, just to show you how united they all are. The Solicitor General is not here, and the Minister of Trade and Commerce cannot get in here now; he is of no use on these questions. Here is what the Attorney General of Quebec says:

A terrible wind is now blowing even at the very doors of the province of Quebec; and the storm is so strong that it is shaking confederation to its very foundation. It is a difficult and delicate question, which I am now taking up, and I wish to say that I am now speaking only as a citizen of Canada. I am now speaking of the question of separate schools in the North-west. Confederation was the result of a compromise. In order to protect our fellow countrymen, who had carried the seed of civilization to the North-west, we stipulated that they should always have the right to separate schools. Now, I contend that no one has the right to do indirectly what the law forbids to do directly. No one had the right to deprive the Catholics of the North-west of their separate schools. The hon. Mr. Haultain, the Premier of the North-west Territories, understood that perfectly well. That is why he went in a roundabout way. He overhauled all the ordinances relating to the schools, and while the new ordinance reaffirms the right of Catholics to separate schools it makes these dependent on such conditions that they are virtually suppressed. So that Mr. Haultain has done indirectly what he could not do directly. The question put to the Federal Government was whether the law should be disallowed. We have the right to insist that the protection given our countrymen shall be respected. If the understanding arrived at when confederation was formed can be violated by one party, then that contract is only a paper which can be torn at will. The Federal Government has the right, and I will say has the duty, to disallow all laws contrary to the general interest of the Dominion, and such is the new ordinance. Speaking for myself, I say that fanaticism has long enough had its way. We have had enough of the McCarthys, O'Briens and of the P. P. A., which wanted to ostracise everything that is Catholic. We are citizens and useful citizens of this country. I can claim to be a moderater on these questions. I fought the Riel agitation. But when it comes to decide the question whether Catholics have rights in this country, I say that it is time to be up and doing. I appeal to all moderate men irrespective of creed. Fanatics are not the majority of this country, and if to prove it, it is necessary to make a daring move (coup d'état) let it be made. The man who will make it shall have the united support of the province of Quebec. We do not want a Mercier to lead us. We shall find in the bosom of the Conservative party men to lead us, and enough soldiers to win victory. If to succeed it becomes necessary to call around our flag all moderate men, we will do it and we will again go over the work of confederation. If we allow the sacred rights of our countrymen to be violated, we will vainly work for the progress of this province.

That speech was delivered on the 28th of February, 1894. Now, if he is going to war I would like to make a suggestion to the Government. I scarcely ever make a suggestion to the Government, but I would suggest that they let the Minister of War and the Attorney General of Quebec fight it out, and could we not by some means get the Controller of Customs to act as referee for them? I think probably that would be the best way we could take to produce a fusion in that party. Is it not a nice thing to see men trading on religious prejudices in this fashion? I tell you there are a great many men who trade in religious prejudices for revenue only; and until this country recognizes the fact that all questions should be settled according to their merits, this country will never be well governed. It is truly a sad spectacle to see the leading men of the Conservative party trying to stir up religious strifes in the two portions of this Dominion, instead of preaching, as the leader of the Opposition has done all through his career, that love is better than hate, that he who endeavours to secure to every man the right to exercise his convictions is the only true patriot, and the only sound politician.

Mr. HASLAM. I would crave the indulgence of the House for a few minutes while I make a few remarks, which I can promise will be brief. I believe that every speaker who has preceded me has endeavoured to reply, to some extent, to the speaker that preceded him. I hope that the House will pardon me if I decline to do that. I do not think it is necessary to tell the House that there is not so very much to reply to. There have been a great many assertions made and a great many speculations indulged in by hon. gentlemen opposite. For instance, one hon. gentleman opposite, in calculating the loss to Canada through emigration, went on to estimate the number of young men who had left Canada in fifteen years, and for the purposes of his argument, he converted those young men into fathers, grandfathers, and great grandfathers in the short space of fifteen years. I will promise not to enter into any speculation so wild and so far-reaching as that. There is one point, however, which I wish to discuss, that is of special interest to the people of Canada, and that is the price of wheat. It is a burning question to-day, and a question that has been discussed on the floor of this House from every point of view. Now, I think I will indulge in a little speculation upon that subject. We will assume, for instance, that the hon. gentlemen who now occupy the Opposition benches had remained in power, that they had been able to carry out their grand scheme of a national highway composed of magnificent water stretches, innumerable portages, and endless pieces of wagon roads. If the people of the North-west were to-day dependent upon a highway such as that, in case of an emergency, and for practical use on the railways of the United States, what would the price of wheat be in the North-west? In the North-west to-day I believe no one will assert that wheat is sold for less than 50 cents per bushel. On the other hand, at Spokane Falls, in eastern Washington, at the junction of a great number of American railroads, three weeks ago wheat was sold for 25 cents per bushel, No. 1 wheat. I do not think the price from that time to the present has increased one cent. If Canadians had no other way of reaching the market, except what the American railroad system would give them, could they expect any more than 25 cents a bushel for wheat in the North-west? I think that any man who examines the position, unbiassed by political prejudices, must come to the conclusion that wheat in the North-west, under those circumstances, would not be over 25 cents per bushel. There is another view that we might take of this question. From the period of the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway to the present time, how much capital, and how much money derived from the prices of products raised in the North-west, would have gone to the coffers of the American railway system, if we had not the Canadian Pacific Railway? If the American railway system was a financial success to-day it would have been Canadian capital and enterprise that made it so, and that money would have come out of the income of the farmers of the North-west. The farmer can safely say to-day that he is getting 25 cents per bushel more for his wheat than he would have obtained had the circumstances remained as they were and the policy of the Government been carried out. Again, it has been asserted from the Opposition benches, from almost every member who has taken part in the debate, that if free trade had been adopted by the country it would have given us free access to the markets of the world, and as a matter of course our people would have had the benefit of reciprocal trade. I think that is a statement that no sane man would make if he took the trouble to examine the conditions as they are to-day, and as they have been for the last fifty years. Here is Great Britain, with a population of 32,000,000 or over, a people that has the greatest amount of money at command among the nations of the world, a people that has the largest commerce, a people that is the greatest purchaser, and has the greatest amount of cash with which to purchase. These people have been avowed and declared free traders for the last fifty years, or within two years of that period, and up to the present time they have not been able to induce one nation to follow their example and throw open their markets to Great Britain on a fair and equitable basis. One or two hon. gentlemen opposite indulge in some mathematical problems. Some undertake to solve these problems by the ordinary rules of arithmetic, some soared higher, and tried to solve them by algebra; but here is a problem that not only every member of this House, but every man in the Dominion, and every one who has the welfare of Canada at heart, would be glad to have solved, namely, if Great Britain, with all her wealth, population and ability, and everything else in her favour, has not succeeded during fifty years in getting one nation to throw open its ports for free imports, how long would it take Canada, with 5,000,000 of people, who, according to hon. gentlemen opposite, are tax-ridden and down-trodden, to induce one, two, or ten nations, as opposite gentlemen promised, to open their ports to us. We are told, again, that the protective policy of the Dominion is responsible for the decrease in land values. If that be the case, we must come to the conclusion that a free trade policy would enhance land values, or if not, keep them at a standstill. I take that as the position of hon. gentlemen opposite, and that is certainly the assertion they have boldly and fearlessly made, it is well for us to examine the land values in the only free trade country in the world, Great Britain. It is well in these matters to cite the authority for statements made, the authorities from which I quote are the "Statistical Abstracts of the United Kingdom," page 32, and "Mulhall's Dictionary of Statistics," page 341. According to these authorities, from 1880 to 1891, land values decreased in England and Scotland £11,853,976. If free trade maintains land values, how did that decrease occur? Then, again, it is asserted that free trade increases the quantity of manufactured articles. Before we accept that statement, it will be well for us to examine the products of Great Britain and the United States from 1885 to 1891. The figures are large, and probably may prove wearisome to hon. members, but I will take the year 1885 as showing the products of pig iron in Great Britain. That is the basis of manufactures in the iron industry, and in Great Britain you might say of all industries, for that is accepted as an indication of the extent of trade. In Great Britain in 1885 the production of pig iron was 7,415,469 tons. In the United States the production was 4-

Mr. HASLAM.

529,869 tons. Hon. members will mark that the reduction in Great Britain was very nearly double what it was in the United States. In 1889 there was the largest production that Great Britain had from 1885, to 1891, the production in Great Britain being 8,322,824 tons. In the United States in 1890 the production was 10,307,028 tons, or a production over 2,000,000 greater than Great Britain, or in other words the increase or difference between the smallest and largest year from 1885 to 1891 was 5,777,159 tons in the United States, the protective country, while in Great Britain, a free trade country, the increase was only 907,305 tons, or the increase in the United States was almost 5,000,000 tons more than in Great Britain. If free trade gives the impetus to all industries, why does this condition exist in these two countries, one the highest protected country, the other a free trade country? I know that hon. gentlemen opposite will furnish an answer that will be satisfactory to themselves, at least, and that is that the expansion of trade in the United States was due to the large home market, but I shall be able to answer that argument in a few minutes. Of Bessemer steel, which is another article of importance, the production in 1885 was 1,701,762 tons, and in 1890 the production was 4,131,535 tons, while in Great Britain in 1885 the production was 1,304,127 tons, and in 1890, 2,014,843 tons. You will mark the stride that the production of Bessemer steel made in the United States in comparison with the production of Great Britain. From the year 1890 up to the present, the growth of that trade in the United States has been much larger in proportion than it was previously. The increased growth is due to the improved methods in the manufacture of that article. The difference between the largest and smallest year of production in the protected country was $2,129,773, while the increase in the free trade country was only $836,664. I mentioned a few moments ago that hon. gentlemen opposite would, no doubt say that this extension of trade was due to the large home market; but there is another phase of the question which is a complete refutation of that contention. Take the articles exported, the manufactures of iron and steel, as an article that should be the fairest test of the exporting capabilities of both countries, and an article which represents a large amount of money, we will single out locomotives. In 1886 the export of locomotives from the United States was to the value of $333,393, and in 1891, which was the largest year of exports for both countries, the export of locomotives from the United States was valued at $2,424,363, while Great Britain exported in that year $1,848,462, or, in other words, the increase in the exports of locomotives in the United States was $2,090,970, whilst in Great Britain the gain was only $189,166, or, the increase of that trade in the United States was eleven and a half times greater than that of Great Britain. I do not think that it is necessary for me to elaborate on these facts at all, because they are incontrovertible, and if free trade is the benefit to this country or to any other country that the gentlemen on the opposite benches assert that it is, this comparative condition of things that I have indicated between the United States and Great Britain could not exist. If Great Britain, with the advantage and the start that it had in the manufacturing industries with her wealth and with all her industries long established in this direction, cannot hold her own in the commercial world, how can it be supposed that the Dominion of Canada, just starting in life, with hardly an industry in real good working order—for they are all to a certain extent in their infancy—how are we to believe or to suppose for one instant, that Canada could maintain even the position she has to-day in the face of such a condition of things as exist between Great Britain and the United States? There is another argument made by hon. gentlemen opposite which I think will not bear the light of day, and that is: That protection increases to the consumer the price of the article manufactured in the protected country. That is not so. There is not much use in my saying that it is not the case without giving proof, and so I will give these hon. gentlemen opposite an opportunity of testing my assertion for themselves. Let them get any competent engineer—I care not who he is, so he is master of his business—let him draw up the specifications and plans for a good, substantial stationary engine and boiler, and furnish the manufacturers of Canada—say, for instance, Peterborough—with a copy of these specifications; and furnish them to the manufacturers in Pennsylvania—let us take Erie, for instance—and also furnish these specifications to the manufacturers in Great Britain. I have tried this myself; I speak from what I know, so that it is not hearsay. The difference between the prices at the factories of an engine and boiler, say 35 horse-power, made to the specification, between Canada and the United States is something like $300 less, in favour of the Canadian manufacturer; throw the duty out of the question altogether—you cannot lay the English article down in Canada for the same price as you have it made here. There is another view of this question which probably does not present itself to the minds of a great many people, and it is this: The country that has no protection has sometimes a very great difficulty in maintaining even its own markets. Let us take a case in point to prove this. Some years ago there was a strike amongst the glassworkers of Great Britain which extended over all the trade. Previous to that time there were a great many glass factories in England, for England lead the world in that industry; but to-day I venture to say that in England or in Great Britain there is not 10 per cent of the glass used there which is of home manufacture. Over 90 per cent of the glass used at the present time in Great Britain is manufactured in Belgium, and not only that, but the glass that is used in the Dominion of Canada, and the glass that is used all over the world, is manufactured in the same country. Now, why are not the English glass-makers able even to get into their own market? The reason is: These men, before they can secure the home market, have to cut prices lower, have to get their men to work for lower wages and have to produce the article at a lower rate than even the Belgian manufacturer does. They have only the advantage of the bare freight, which, for such a short distance, amounts to nothing. Now, the difficulties that they have to contend with in that one operation are these: The glass factories, to be profitable, have to run on a very large scale; and before any English manufacturer is able to compete, and get his money back, he has first to contract with his employees at a lower rate of wages than he ever did before; he has to make that contract for a long period of time—longer than any English workman would care for; and he has to put in a plant more extensive than any sane man would invest the necessary capital for; on the bare chance of getting back a business that he might not be able to hold after he got it. Another instance, we all look upon Great Britain as the centre, and the best and cheapest place in the world, for the manufacture of iron and steel and their products. A person would naturally think that a country like Great Britain, with its wealth and all its other advantages, would be able to supply even its own market with those goods. I know that it is not able; I know that it does not do so. I import a good deal; and when I can do it I am loyal enough to Great Britain and her institutions to import from there. Last summer I wanted a small quantity of steel rails, only a little over a hundred tons, and I sent to London for them. They were bought there and shipped to me, and what were they when I got them? They were German rails, manufactured by Krupp in Germany, with Krupp's stamp and name on them. If free trade had all the advantages that hon. gentlemen opposite claim that it has, could that condition of things exist? I do not believe it possibly could. They may have some means of arriving at their conclusions that is altogether foreign to me, though, from a business point of view, I must confess, I cannot understand it. These are only a few articles, but they fairly represent the divergence of trade from the free trade country to the protected countries that is going on every day. There is another industry in regard to which I have not time to go into statistics, that is the boot and shoe trade. If you examine the boots and shoes that are sold and worn in Great Britain to-day, you will find that a very large percentage of them—some of the British manufacturers themselves say over 30 per cent—are manufactured in Massachusetts. It cannot be said that the protected country has so many advantages over the free trade country, in the way of location, cost of materials, and so on, as to produce that result. There must be another cause, and I think it is not far to look for; I believe it lies in this fact, that the protected country always has a market within itself—a market which enables it to keep its industries up to a certain point of efficiency, and a market that is sure; while in the free trade country there is nothing sure, it depends always entirely on the fluctuations of trade in the outside world. There is nothing that will give it any chance of competing, in case of an emergency, such as labour difficulties, strikes, or any internal trouble of that kind that may occur in the country. It has no chance of getting that trade back unless by cutting deeper, and doing work at a lower price than any other country that it competes with; for it is competing with the world. Great Britain has to compete with the world, and the world is getting the better of it every day. Now, I do not think it would be wise for me to go any further. I did not expect to have anything to say to-night, nor for a number of nights; but, under the circumstances, I thought it might be better for me to get through with what I had to say. I am not a political speaker; I speak purely and simply from a business standpoint. Now, I will take my seat and allow hon. gentlemen opposite to draw their own conclusions. If I have made any statement that any reliable authority will not bear out, I would be very pleased that they would let me know it.

Mr. PERRY moved the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. FOSTER. I think it is too early to adjourn the House. We are in the midst of a very important discussion, and the country is waiting for the ending of it. I think we had better go on.

Mr. PERRY. It is not my intention, Mr. Speaker, to speak at any length this evening. We have heard a great deal of discussion here on this important question—I may say the all-important question to the taxpayers of this country. The Finance Minister has delivered himself of a speech of something over five hours, I suppose to his own satisfaction and to the satisfaction of some of his supporters. I presume that they are not all of his opinion. They were not all of his opinion last year, and I am sure that they are not all of his opinion this year; because the reduction of the tariff now proposed to the House is not what a good many hon. members on the other side of the House, as well as on this side, would wish them to be, and far from satisfactory to the taxpayers of this country. Sir, the Government have hardly been consistent with their own record in this matter. They are political thieves; they have stolen part of the policy of the Liberal party, and why? Because they have been driven to it by the arguments advanced from this side of the House last session and the session before, and by the meetings of indignation that were held through the country during the last recess. They got alarmed, though they endeavoured to keep up the policy of procrastination. Last session many of their friends—the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Calvin) for instance—said it was absolutely necessary there should be no procrastination in revising the tariff on the lines of a tariff revenue. We found several other gentlemen on that side making motions asking that certain articles be placed on the free list. How was it possible then that hon. gentlemen opposite can be unanimous on this occasion? We found the hon. member for Inverness (Mr. Cameron) frequently, on the floor of this House, warning the Government not to dare to take one brick out of the structure of the National Policy. I would ask him how he can to-day stand alongside and support the Minister of Finance, who has pulled out not one but several bricks, without expecting to see the whole structure come tumbling about his head.

Mr. PERRY. The Government got afraid after the demands of the House last session. They endeavoured to obtain secret information from the people. They began first to hold their meetings with closed doors, but the Liberal press and a good many of the Conservative papers as well, became indignant and said: If you keep up this system of seeking for information with closed doors we must oppose it; the country is alarmed and indignant at such conduct. And the Government had to open their doors. I remember quite well in July or August that two of the most prominent members of the Government travelled all the way to the little province of Prince Edward Island. The Minister of Finance was one, and the other was no less a personage than the Minister of Agriculture (Senator Angers). It was quite necessary that the Minister of Agriculture should make his appearance there, because there is a considerable French population in Prince Edward Island. And he found it very convenient to be present on the occasion of a tea party at the beautiful settlement of Mascouche, composed principally of French settlers. I was not aware that those two gentlemen were coming there, or even that the Government had adopted the system of sending out these flying angels over the country to seek information; and when I saw these two gentlemen on the platform, I at first could hardly believe my eyes. The Minister of Finance made a speech in which he was careful not to say a word about agriculture or fishing or any other industry, but confined himself to congratulating Mascouche on the fine turnout it made, on the fine looking, healthy people it possessed, and he expressed the hope that the result of the tea party would enable them to wipe off the debt of the church they had just finished. But the Minister of Agriculture took another stand. He began to lecture the people on the best mode of farming. He spoke of the advantages of mixed farming, and went on to tell them something about cows. If the farmers of Prince Edward Island, he said, fed their cows better and housed them better, every cow—he made no reserve—every cow, whether good or bad, would give during the year a net profit of $45. The intelligent people of Mascouche, more especially the young people, were so disgusted with this statement that they left the meeting. Well, I suppose the Minister of Agriculture is very prosperous himself. The Finance Minister has told us that the country is in a flourishing condition, and he admits that he has been robbing the taxpayers at the rate of $1,500,000 for the last fourteen years. Now, if this policy had been inaugurated by the Liberal party, why we would only say: it is the policy of the Liberal party; it is the child of its father. But when we find these gentlemen coming forward and boasting of their policy, and in the same breath acknowledging that they have done wrong for fourteen or fifteen years, I cannot understand it. They say the country has been prosperous under the National Policy. If it has, why do they not continue the same treatment? If the country has been prospering under this system of national imposition, which the Government have imposed on the people, why not continue the same treatment? Surely it is too bad to abandon it. The country is no doubt prosperous, as far as the fourteen Ministers of the Crown are concerned, with their $8,000 a year, but not so prosperous with the poor people who are taxed to pay the salaries of these officials, and extra fees besides to them for going through the country, and endeavouring to delude the country. The Controllers of Customs and Inland Revenue had a little trip up west and I would like to know how much that trip cost the taxpayers. No doubt it has cost a good deal. In fact it is costing a good deal to pay them $5,000 a year, and I am not aware what return they give. It cost the taxpayers $5,000 a year for the services of the Solicitor General, whose office was never known heretofore to exist since confederation. And what has that hon. gentleman done? How many thousand dollars has he saved to the taxpayers by taking hold of legal cases in which the Dominion Government is interested? I am not aware that even in the celebrated McGreevy-Connolly case he pleaded on behalf of the Government. I believe that, on the contrary, he skedaddled. I believe he was not seen in court half as often as he was seen in jail after these two unfortunate men were detained there, striving, no doubt, to extract from them papers—but it is as well not to dwell further on this point. I do not know whether the Controller of Customs is a lawyer or not, but if he is not he must have had his instructions from the Government before he left this part of the country to go up west and catechise the farmers and merchants and traders in that country. I can tell him, from the very questions he put that he could never on the spur of the moment—for his brains are not much brighter than those of ordinary men—have put those questions unless he was primed in advance, unless he had the firearm in his pocket with a bullet in it, he could never at that particular time have asked the questions he put to these people. I find that he came in contact with a gentleman named Mr. Marr in a place called Markham. This is taken from a Conservative paper. Henry C. Marr, of Markham, said that in Cleveland he had seen good horses selling at from $20 to $80 apiece. But it turns out that this gentleman is importing horses from the United States for breeding purposes only, on which there is no duty, and consequently he does not care whether the duty is taken off or put on. But when they got down still further they found a rustic customer, no doubt he was a Liberal. His name is E. C. Pearson, of Etobicoke. The first question asked this gentleman by the Controller of Customs was this: "How about the duty on corn?" Now, this shows that the Government were under the impression that the great body of the people do not want the duty on corn to be removed. These gentlemen had corn on the brain; perhaps they had something else in some other part of the body, possibly whisky. The very first question the Controller of Customs asked this man was about the duty on corn. Well, this man is a farmer, he grows a lot of coarse grain, and the Controller of Customs, very cunningly, like a fox, thought that as this man grew a lot of coarse grain he would want the duty left on corn in order that he might have a market for his own. But this man answered:

I would like to see it removed. I raise coarse grain for feeding, but if the duty were removed I would buy corn. I am a free trader.

Now, this man, though a farmer, and very likely a good farmer, was quite willing to have the duty taken off corn, and to buy corn. He was not afraid of competition in the market from his neighbours in the United States, or anywhere else. Now, that is just the policy of the Liberal party. Give every man a chance to sell his produce in the best market, and allow him to buy his goods in the cheapest market he can find. Well, they asked him another question, and recollect that the questions are put very artfully, very lawyer-like. If the Controller of Customs is not a lawyer, he got his cue from a lawyer, perhaps from the Minister of Railways. He asks this question:

If there was free trade there would be direct taxation.

There is the bugaboo. That is what the Controller of Customs was holding over the head of these people, to frighten them, he threatens direct taxation. Well, this witness answered :

We could have an excise duty.

In the next question the Controller of Customs tries to suggest an answer. He asks :

Q. You could not pay an excise duty on whisky without an equal customs duty. Now if you buy a farm for $6,000 and pay half down and borrow the rest from some millionaire, you would pay all the taxation while he would pay nothing. Would that be fair ?

Now, I will ask any man of common sense on the opposite side of the House, is that a fair question to ask ? Here you see the threat, the lash of the whip held over the head of that man, in the prospect of direct taxation, if he would not submit to allow the duty to be left upon those articles. He answers this way :

No, but I do not think it would go that way. It goes too much that way now. I favour the English system.

Q. Then you would have the duties again put on coffee, tea, and things which are not produced in the country ?

Now, recollect that is a very tender point—threatening this farmer to put a duty on tea, coffee and other things of the same nature. The answer is this :

We do not get the benefit of the removal of the duty on coffee.

Q. Yes, you do. There is no duty on green coffee, and there is no roasted coffee imported, it all comes in free, and what more can we do ?

A. But it is all roasted when it is sold, and we have to pay for it.

By this time the Controller of Inland Revenue thought that his friend the Controller of Customs was getting the worst of it, and he came to his rescue with this question :

The roasting is not an expensive process, and we let it all in free?—A. Well, the tariff gives the roasters of coffee a chance to roast their customers as well.

That ended this part of the inquiry. Now, they turn up again in a day or two somewhere else, I forget the name of the place, where the evidence of Mr. Robert Crawford is taken down. I do not know whether it is correct or not, I would not have much confidence in it if it is like the last census returns, where we were told that in Prince Edward Island there were 173 boot and shoe factories, and when the Government were asked for details as to where those factories were, and the number of hands employed, they were dumb, they could not give the information, because the factories were not there. Evidence of a similar nature was given by Mr. Robert Crawford, Secretary of the Richview Patrons of Industry, who advised the removal of the duty from corn. Mr. Wood asked him this question :

Q. Are you in favour of direct taxation ?

Now, just fancy, Mr. Speaker, the Government asking a man whether he was in favour of direct taxation ! Why, you might as well ask a man to cut his own throat as to ask him if he is in favour of direct taxation. It is ridiculous, and I am surprised that a man of the character of the Controller of Inland Revenue should ask such a frivolous question. Well, this is the answer :

A. No.

Q. Do you think the duty should be removed from pork?—A. I would meet the Americans half way and remove the duty, if they did.

Q. Is that your view regarding agricultural implements?—A. Yes.

Have the Government done so ? What is the use of taking this information, what is the use of saddling an enormous expense upon this country in sending these two gentlemen up and down the Dominion to get information, if the Government does not act upon that information ? Why, Sir, it is the height of hypocrisy. The question is asked :

You would not take off the duty unless they did ? The price, you know, is higher than here.

Which is false. I have documents here taken from the Trade and Navigation Returns for both Canada and the United States to show that farm implements are sold from 15 to 20 per cent cheaper in the United States than they are in Canada. This is the answer :

Well, that would be all the better. I would take it off what they admitted free.

Q. Would that work fairly ? Now, in the case of—A. I object to this cross-examination. A man who is a politician can raise quibbles and make objections that will puzzle a farmer every time.

This was all the satisfaction this man got. He was right in castigating the Controller of Inland Revenue for his impertinent question. This man was, like myself, a farmer, and a hard-working man, and he was not able to compete with the cunning and shrewdness, and knowledge of the law, which the Controller of Inland Revenue possessed. I stated a moment ago that the prices of farm implements were less in the United States than they are in Canada. I have figures taken from the blue-books, showing that in Lacolle, in the province of Quebec, peas were worth 60 cents per bushel, when in Champlain, New York, they were worth 75 cents a bushel. I want to show that the same products are worth more in the United States than they are here, on account of this barrier to civilization in the shape of a protective tariff, without which our products would bring us more than they do now. Here are a few figures concerning farm products :

| | Lacolle, Que. | Champlain, N. Y. |
|---------------------|-----------------|------------------|
| Beans, per bush... | $ 1 40 | $ 1 75 |
| Oats do .. | 0 36 | 0 40 |
| Barley do .. | 0 43 | 0 50 |
| Hay, per ton . | 8 00 to $10 00 | 10 00 to $12 00 |
| Butter, per lb..... | 0 22 to 0 22 | 0 26 to 0 28 |
| Eggs, per dozen... | 0 14 | 0 17 |
| Potatoes, per bag.. | 0 40 | 0 60 |
| Turkeys, per lb.... | 0 08 to 0 09 | 0 10 to 0 11 |

Now, I want to show this House how much cheaper farm implements can be bought in the United States than in Canada. Mowers sell in Canada from $50 to $60; in the United States from $40 to $45. Self-dumping hay rakes, $30 in Quebec, and from $20 to $23 in New York. Reapers, $75 in Quebec; $50 to $60 in New York. Ploughs, $7.50 to $15 in Quebec; $6.50 to $14 in New York. Disc-harrows, $30 in Quebec; $20 in New York. That shows the advantage it would be to the people of this country if they had free trade with the United States in natural products and in agricultural implements. Take the case of a farmer in Prince Edward Island, for instance, who comes up to Ontario to buy his binder, or reaper, or mower. He pays the price of the articles, $60 or $75, whatever it may be, and when the time of payment comes he has to carry his produce across the line and sell it under an almost prohibitory tariff to the people of the United States, and out of every hundred dollars worth he loses $55 or $60, which goes into the revenue of the United States, and when he comes back to Canada to buy his machinery, he is handicapped by a tariff of 20 per cent. Let any man consider these things, and he will see how hard it is for the poor farmers of this country to live. I do not pretend to speak for the minority in this country who are so well protected by the tariff; I do not pretend to speak for Senator Drummond, who is at the head of the great sugar factory in this country, nor do I pretend to speak for 10 per cent of the population who are protected against the other 90 per cent. Now, Sir, we heard this afternoon a speech from the hon. member for St. John city and county, New Brunswick (Mr. Hazen). He could not leave the little province of Prince Edward Island alone. He had to travel over there. How he got there I do not know, for we have had no mail communication from the Island these last four or five days. I may say that he did not go by the tunnel, for that is not built, and I am afraid it never will be. But this hon. gentleman went there in a dream; he got the nightmare, and when he came back he told us that in Prince Edward Island they had a Liberal Government which had run the country into debt, and now they had to have recourse to direct taxation to pay the debt. Now, let me tell him that the Liberal Government have not yet been three years in power in Prince Edward Island. That province has been under a Tory Government from 1879 to 1891, and during that time they gobbled up the whole resources of the province, and ran it into debt to the extent of $300,000 or $400,000. They took $200,000 out of the capital of Prince Edward Island, and when they walked out of power they left the province in debt for over $200,000, and now these poor Liberals, the hard-working people of that Island, have got to be taxed to pay that debt. Let the hon. member for St. John put that in his pipe and smoke it. The Tories so mismanaged our provincial affairs that they were not satisfied with gobbling up everything they could find, but they began to steal the land office in Prince Edward Island; they stole several thousand dollars from that source, and the people of the Island, when the election came on, drove them from power. The leader of that Government, in 1891, tried once more to beat my hon. friend from Queen's county, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies), but he was defeated, and was consoled by being pitchforked into the Senate of this Dominion, where a great many more of his class are put. Such is the history of Tory mismanagement, and Tory robbery in Prince Edward Island. They have run the province into debt, and have left that dirty, nasty legacy to the Liberals, who must now have recourse to direct taxation in order to pay the debt. The Liberals in Prince Edward Island are honest men, who like to pay their debts. We are not coming on our marrow bones to this Government to ask them to help us to pay our debts, we are going to stand on our own dignity. The member for St. John (Mr. Hazen) was out of his latitude at the time he made the statement. The leader of the Liberal Government in Prince Edward Island (Mr. Peters) attended the Reform convention at Ottawa with myself. It was the happiest time I ever had in my life to come here and see Liberal delegates gathered from north, east, south and west, every one willing to forego his own private view, nationality, or creed, for the time being, and pull the oar to carry the political ship into its proper harbour. They were unanimous on one point, and that was to be true Canadians and live and work for the welfare of the Dominion. Mr. Peters was here on that occasion and spoke at the convention, endorsing the policy of the leader of the Opposition in the House. Mr. Peters then returned home and held meetings, and told the people of the Island what he had done, and his endorsement of the policy of the Liberal leader. What was the result of the elections held on 13th December last? When Mr. Peters took the reins of Government in 1891, he had a majority of only one, and his opponents thought they would be able to out-vote him during the session, but they failed. At the recent elections, Mr. Peters was returned with twenty-four members against six. If this result gives comfort to Cabinet Ministers, they are free to accept it. These facts go to show that the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Hazen) must be more careful in making attacks upon the people of Prince Edward Island, who are always willing and able to pay their debts by earnings derived from hard toil, and not by efforts to take money out of the pockets of their neighbours. Our people earn their money by the sweat of their brow. We pay our way and are able to rely on our own resources. Let the Government leave us alone, and place no barriers in the way of free trade, and trade with other markets. We were told when the McKinley Bill became law that five cents per dozen on eggs as a duty was of no consequence, because we would be able to send our eggs to England. I know several gentlemen in Ontario shipped eggs to England, and lost everything. We were told on one occasion that a gentleman sent a lot to the English market, sold a few of them, and the balance he presented to the High Commissioner in London, and they were used in the kitchen.

An hon. MEMBER. Name the man.

Mr. PERRY. If the Government are honest and sincere they will furnish information as to how many thousand dozen of eggs were sent to England in October, November and December last. Perhaps none were shipped to that market. We have still to sell our eggs across the line, notwithstanding the five cents duty. I shall be told that it is not the fault of the Government but of the United States Government. In our tariff I find a tax of five cents per dozen levied on eggs from the United States, and twenty-five cents per bushel on potatoes; but who ever heard of potatoes or eggs coming here from the United States? All we in the Island wish is to be left alone. We are loyal subjects, and we contribute nearly one million dollars into the treasury, and receive very little over six hundred thousand dollars a year in return. These are undeniable facts which can be proved, and still the Canadian Government were not satisfied with extracting from the people of the Island four hundred thousand dollars more than they expend there, but to seek to impose more burdens on them. When I hear the member for St. John (Mr. Hazen) declare that the Liberals of Prince Edward Island have run the country in debt, I wonder why he did not refer to the province of Quebec, which, since Confederation has been under the administration of Tories, with the exception of two short periods. They have run the province into debt thirty millions. Why did not the hon. gentleman state how prosperous Ontario had been under the administration of that man of unblemished character, Sir Oliver Mowat, under whose administration there was a surplus of between five and six millions. Why did not the hon. gentleman state that the national debt of Canada under the administration since 1879 had increased about 150 per cent? What have we obtained in return? No further proof of the unsatisfactory position of affairs need be quoted than the case of the two unfortunate men who were incarcerated not long ago. I am not going into the question as to why they were released from jail, but I do not think it is to the credit of the Government to prosecute men for high crimes, obtain a jury and judge to sentence the men for twelve months, and afterwards release them on the pretence that they were sick. Any men in jail would be sick—they need not be so high in station as McGreevy and Connolly to feel sick and sore regarding their incarceration. We find that Judge Rose, in passing sentence, said: "I am sorry for you, gentlemen. Why? Because others who were more guilty than you are should be in the same box." These facts must be well known to the Minister of Justice and members of the Cabinet, nevertheless, they have taken the responsibility on themselves to recommend their release, and I am sure His Excellency must have chuckled when he signed the papers. From my standpoint, I do not give the Government any thanks for the small reduction they have made in the tariff. In fact, if hon. members felt as I do, they would say that the Minister was giving even that relief with a grudge. We could see that every time he read an article upon which he had lowered the duty, he did not like it. Therefore, in my opinion, he is entitled to no credit, because the Government have been forced to do what they have done, and, if I am not much mistaken, they will be forced into another remodelling of the tariff before twelve months are over. The country is indignant because it has not got what it is asking for. The Government have muddled up the affairs of this country in every way. They muddled the tariff, they muddled and endangered the friendship between this people and the United States, and I am sorry to say that their policy has had the effect of bringing about a disturbance in this country which may, perhaps, tear Confederation into pieces. The Government have acted in a double-dealing way, they have not been straightforward. Let us take the article of sugar, because of the reduction of the duty on which, hon. gentlemen opposite tell us that the consumers have derived a great deal of profit. It is true that the tariff which is now brought before the House, lowers the duty on sugar, but that tariff is not passed yet, and I am not sure whether it will not, because there are a great many bolters on the other side of the House, and maybe they will kick. Sugar is admitted duty free up to 16 Dutch standard, but, when refined sugar is imported, it is to be taxed 64 cents per hundred pounds, or 16 cents less than under the old tariff. Now, if the 80 cents duty in the old tariff was prohibitory, and we know that it was, because the 64 cents duty will have just the same effect. That is where the monopoly is staring us still, and that is where the poison still comes in. The amount of sugar consumed by the population of this country is about 344,000,000 pounds a year, and on this, at the rate of 64 cents per hundred pounds, the consumer will have to pay

$2,201,600 more than if there was no duty at all. Recollect, Mr. Speaker, that we, the consumers, are paying that much more for our sugar than we should pay. Senator Drummond, who is at the head of the sugar manufacturing in this country, says that over 1,900 men are employed in that industry. Now, let us say that there are 2,000 men engaged, and their wages will come to $700,000 a year, or thereabout. Take that from the $2,201,600, and it will leave a balance of $1,501,600. Would it not be better at once for the people of Canada who use sugar to pay these labourers the $700,000 and to save the $1,501,600? Be it remembered that this immense sum does not go into the Treasury of this country, but that it goes into the pockets of Senator Drummond and his brother manufacturers. That is the result of the policy of the Government. Why did they not allow our manufacturers to export sugar to the United States, if they thought proper? I am doubtful to-day if we cannot go to the United States and import our sugar and pay the 64 cents per hundred pounds duty for it, but we know that the manufacturers of this country so far have not attempted to send their sugar across the borders. The Government have told us that they have reduced the duty on agricultural implements to 20 per cent. What a great godsend to the farmers. Why did they not take the duty off altogether and provide that the moment that the Americans allowed our implements in duty free, we would do the same thing towards them? The Government have not done that; they must be death on the farmers; I believe they do not expect the vote of the farmers at the next election. The tariff which is now before this House, is not what the people expected, and it will not succeed as the bait by which the present Government want to catch the fish they are after, namely, the votes of the people. The people know that the Government would not have gone even so far if they could have helped it, and they know now that they have been robbed of $1,500,000 a year for the last fourteen years. They know, too, that the money they have just contributed has not gone to a good purpose, but that it has been squandered in the Red Parlour, and that the million dollars which those two men were sent to jail for, was stolen from the people. The people know, too, that a great deal of their money has been sunk in the River St. Lawrence at Quebec and all over the country. What guarantee have the people that, if these gentlemen opposite are returned to power at the next election—which I do not expect they will—they will not go back to the old principle of protecting the manufacturers? There is no doubt in my mind that there is a secret understanding between the combines and the Government that the Government is not willing to do justice to the country. What did my friend the Minister of Finance answer me, when I asked him were there any borings done last summer across the Straits of Northumberland? I asked him, was it the intention of the Government to have borings done this year, and he said it was. Now, what is this for? Perhaps it is that we are on the eve of a general election, and I suppose the tunnel horse is going to be ridden down there again. I am afraid, if that is the case, the Government will be just as unfortunate as ex-Senator Howlan was when he tried his hand. I may have some more to say upon these different items of the tariff, when they are taken up seriatim, but I cannot finish without saying that my friend the member for St. John (Mr. Hazen) has been guilty of a gross attack, an unwarrantable attack, and an attack that cannot be borne out by true statements against the people of Prince Edward Island.

Mr. DAVIN moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

VACANT SENATORSHIPS.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Has the right hon. First Minister got the information as to the length of time several of the senatorships, now vacant, have remained vacant, which the hon. gentleman promised us the other day ?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I have asked for the information and will have it in a day or two.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Is it so difficult to obtain ?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I do not think so.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. So many of them, of course.

ODILON PELLETIER.

Mr. FAUVEL (for Mr. Delisle) asked, Whether the Government have made any payment to Mr. Odilon Pelletier, of St. Roch des Aulnaies, county of L'Islet, for services in connection with the Department of Marine and Fisheries ? If so, what sums have been paid to him since 1st January, 1893 ? How long has he been so employed by the Government ?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. He received $137.32 for forty-two cords of wood supplied to the lightships. That was the only payment made to him during 1893.

JOSEPH TREMBLAY, C.E.

Mr. FAUVEL (for Mr. Delisle) asked, Is Mr. Joseph Tremblay, C.E., of St. Roch des Aulnaies, in the employment of the Government, and if so, how long has he been so employed ? What is his employment ? What is his salary, and what sum is he allowed for travelling expenses ?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. He is not in the employ of the Government. He was employed last summer for a period of six months and eighteen days, as engineer in charge of the works in the counties of Temiscouata and L'Islet, in the province of Quebec. His salary was at the rate of $4 per diem. No allowance for travelling expenses, only his actual expenses being paid by the department.

JULES PELLETIER.

Mr. FAUVEL (for Mr. Delisle) asked, Whether Mr. Jules Pelletier, formerly of St. Roch des Aulnaies, and now of Quebec, is employed by the Government, in the Post Office Department, and if so, how long has he been employed, and what is his salary ?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Mr. Pierre Alphonse Jules Pelletier has been employed as a temporary letter carrier in the Quebec post office, since 19th August, 1893. He has passed the required Civil Service examination. His salary is at the rate of $300 per annum.

ADMISSION OF COAL OIL IN TANKS.

Mr. LANDERKIN asked, At how many places in Ontario, where coal oil is admitted in tanks, is it now barrelled ?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). Coal oil which is admitted in tanks in Ontario is barrelled at the undermentioned places :—London, St. Thomas, Petrolia, Stratford, Hamilton, Toronto, Toronto Junction, Chippewa, Whitby, Peterborough, Port Hope, Belleville, Kingston, Brockville, Smith's Falls and Ottawa.

GOVERNMENT BUILDING, VICTORIA, B.C.

Mr. MARTIN asked, 1. What is the intention of the Government respecting the erection of a new Government building in Victoria, British Columbia ? 2. Has a site been purchased, and if so, where, from whom, and at what price ? 3. Were the two representatives in this House for Victoria, or either of them interested in the site purchased, and to what extent ? 4. What departments are to use the new building, and when will work be commenced upon it ?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. It is intended to construct the building to accommodate the services of the Post Office, Customs and Inland Revenue Departments. The site has been purchased, and is composed of that block of land situated between Government, Courtney and Water streets. Price paid, $75,000. The owners are the Canada Western Hotel Co., and the deed has been passed in the name of the company. The department has not been made aware of the name of the persons composing the company. Work will be commenced probably during the next fiscal year.

FRANKED MAIL MATTER FROM THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. GILLMOR asked, Whether any legislative papers or documents, franked by a member or members of Congress of the United States, have come into Canada by the ordinary mail routes, and have been ordered by the Postmaster General to be sent to Ottawa and thereby prevented reaching their original destination? If so, what is the reason for such action?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Certain packets of printed papers franked by a member of Congress were received in this country from the United States and were sent to the Dead Letter Office as not being prepaid by stamps and not being legislative papers or documents.

ADMISSION OF COAL OIL IN TANKS.

Mr. LANDERKIN asked, At how many places in Ontario, where coal oil is admitted in tanks, is it now barrelled? What is the name of each place?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). I would ask the hon. gentleman to allow that to stand.

Mr. LANDERKIN. This question is similar to the other only the name of each place is asked for here instead of in the other. But I understand that the hon. Minister in his answer before stated that in all the other places he mentioned coal oil was barrelled now.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). No; that is not the case. All the places to which coal oil is taken in tank cars do not take advantage of the provision respecting barrelling.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Then I will allow this to stand.

JUDICIAL DISTRICT OF PONTIAC.

Mr. DEVLIN asked, Have the Government received notification from the Government of the province of Quebec, of the erection and official opening of the judicial district of Pontiac? Is it the intention of the Government to appoint a judge for the district of Pontiac? If so, when?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. We have received no such notification. It is not the present intention of the Government to ask for a vote for the salary of a judge.

MONTREAL DIVISION POST OFFICE INSPECTORSHIP.

Mr. GUAY (for Mr. Brodeur). (Translation.) Has the post office inspector for the Montreal Division been superannuated, or is he merely on temporary leave of absence? If superannuated, when did his superannuation take effect, and why has not his successor been appointed? If he is simply on leave, when is he to resume the discharge of his duties?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. In reply to the hon. member, I will say that Mr. E. F. King, ex-post office inspector for the Montreal Division, has been superannuated by an order in council passed on the 7th of December, 1893. His superannuation took effect on the 1st of September, 1893. The appointment of his successor is under the consideration of the Government.

MR. B. LOISELLE.

Mr. GUAY (for Mr. Brodeur). (Translation.) 1. Is the Government aware that the complaint which caused (according to the statement made by the Government to this House on the 14th September, 1891) the dismissal of Mr. B. Loisel as postmaster of Ste. Angèle de Monnoir, has been declared by the courts to be false and malicious? 2. If so, is it the intention of the Government to reinstate Mr. Loisel in his position, or to order an inquiry into the matter? 3. Is it the intention of the Government to lay before the House, this session, the papers in relation to the said dismissal, the same having been ordered on the 7th March, 1892?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. 1. The department is informed that Mr. Loisel has taken an action against the person who had accused him of embezzlement as postmaster. Also, the department has been informed that judgment has been pronounced in favour of Mr. Loisel. 2. Another postmaster having been appointed in the place of Mr. Loisel, it is impossible to reinstate Mr. Loisel in his position. It is not the intention of the Government to order another inquiry into the matter. 3. The papers in relation to the dismissal, being confidential, cannot be laid before the House, according to an order in council prohibiting the production of those papers. That order in council has been passed in 1886.

MANITOBA SCHOOL CASE.

Mr. GUAY (for Mr. Brodeur) asked, Is it the intention of the Government to submit for the decision of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in England, the questions already submitted to the Supreme Court, in relation to the subject of the Manitoba schools?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The questions involve considerations as to what party or parties have the right to appeal to the decision of the Privy Council, and what party or parties may or may not desire to appeal. As to these points we have not full information at the present time.

SALARIES OF THE JUDGES.

Mr. GUAY (for Mr. Brodeur) asked, Is it the intention of the Government during this session to increase the salaries of the judges?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It is not the intention of the Government to bring down any general measures on that subject.

MAILS IN NOVA SCOTIA.

Mr. FRASER asked. Do the Government propose to provide for better communication between Canso, Arichat, Guysboro', and Mulgrave, during the present session, by giving a daily service to Canso and Arichat, and tri-weekly to Guysboro' and Port Hood? 2. Who was the contractor for carrying the mails from Hawkesbury to Sydney, C.B., since 1890? What was the yearly payment? 3. When did the contract terminate? How were the mails carried after the contract ceased, and by whom? Who was the responsible party, and what was the remuneration? 4. Has any contract been entered into since 1890 for carrying said mails? If so, who is the contractor? How many tenders were put in? What were the names of the tenderers? What is the remuneration, and is payment made to the contractor? How many days were given the contractor for entering on the work, after the date of opening the tenders? How many horses were necessary for carrying the mails and passengers under the first and second contracts, respectively?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. In answer to the hon. gentleman, I desire to state that the mail service to Canso, Arichat, Guysboro' and Mulgrave post offices is already daily. Inquiry will be made as to the desirability of increasing the service to Port Hood. In reply to the hon. gentleman's second question the contractor is James Morrison, and the price paid for the service $9,000. The contract terminated on the 31st December, 1893. The mails were carried in the same manner as before by James Morrison, whose contract was renewed until 1st March, when it was transferred to Metzler Morrison. The parties mentioned had the responsibility of the service. There was no change made in the rate of payment. Since 1890 the contract has been in the hands of James Morrison at $9,000 a year, and the payment has been made to him up to 1st March, 1894. On the 15th December last tenders were invited, receivable until 26th January last. Two tenders were received, one of which was withdrawn. The service is still being carried on under a temporary agreement with the late contractor, now Metzler Morrison. The department has no information as to the number of horses employed by Mr. Morrison.

POSTMASTER OF OWEN SOUND.

Mr. GRIEVE asked. Whether the position of postmaster in the Owen Sound post office is now vacant? If so, who is in charge at present? If no appointment has been made, what is the cause of delay?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. 1. The postmastership of Owen Sound is now vacant. 2.

GUAY.

The widow of the late postmaster is temporarily in charge, with the help of the assistant to the late postmaster. 3. No appointment to the office has yet been made. 4. The matter is under consideration.

LETTER POSTAGE.

Mr. GRIEVE asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to reduce letter postage from three to two cents?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. It is not the intention of the Government to reduce letter postage from three to two cents.

REGISTERED LETTERS.

Mr. GRIEVE asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to reduce the fee now charged for registered letters? If not, is it intended to guarantee the safe delivery of all registered letters and their contents?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. It is not intended to reduce the fee now charged for registered letters. It is not intended to guarantee the safe delivery of all registered letters and their contents.

POST OFFICE, WESTON, N.B.

Mr. COLTER asked, Whether the Postmaster General has authorized the establishing of a post office in Weston, in the county of Carleton, New Brunswick? If so, when was it authorized, and when will it be open?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The establishment of a post office in Weston, county of Carleton, New Brunswick, has not been authorized.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS COMMITTEE.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to inquire of the Minister of Finance whether he will be good enough to direct the Public Accounts Committee to be summoned at the earliest moment. We have been nearly three weeks in session, and that committee has not been organized yet—nor, I suppose, have the other committees. Last year there was a great deal of inconvenience caused by delay in summoning the committee, and the very short time it was allowed to sit. On the present occasion it is desirable that we should have it summoned as early as possible.

Mr. FOSTER. I will communicate with the chairman of that committee.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I was not aware that you had even got a chairman.

Mr. LAURIER. The committee has not been organized yet.

Mr. FOSTER. I will have it called as soon as possible.

TEA AND COFFEE DUTIES.

Mr. KENNY. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I desire to ask the Government a question in reference to the item of tea in the new tariff. Is it to be understood that under the proposed tariff, importations of tea, in order to be free, must come direct without transshipment from the country of growth and production?

Mr. FOSTER. In answer to the hon. gentleman, I would say that it was not the intention of the Government to preclude the shipments of tea from the country of growth and production, from coming in free of duty, even though they were transhipped at another port—merely on the ground of transshipment.

Mr. LAURIER. That is another clerical error, then.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, if the hon. gentleman interprets it that way.

Mr. LAURIER. I interpret it that way because there is a wide difference between the language of the resolution and the language of the statute.

Mr. FOSTER. There is no statute as yet.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. That is precisely what the statute was decided to mean.

Mr. LAURIER. The language has not been quoted here yet.

Mr. McKAY. May I ask the Minister of Finance if it is to be understood that the present tariff on tea and coffee is to be exactly the same as the old tariff?

Mr. FOSTER. The announcement I made to the hon. gentleman for Halifax (Mr. Kenny) may not have been clear. Coffee will be treated in exactly the same way as tea. It is not the intention that the fact of transshipment shall be a bar to the entry of either tea or coffee, free of duty.

CATTLE DISEASE IN GREY COUNTY.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to make an announcement to the Government of a matter that has been brought to my notice by Mr. George Binnie, reeve of the township of Glenelg. He informs me that a serious disease has broken out among the cattle in that township, and a great many have died. He further informs me that in the township of Artemesia and in the township of Osprey the disease has been very fatal among the cattle. In the letter received from Mr. McKechnie, M.P.P., is inclosed another letter from Mr. Telford, to the same effect. There is no doubt that the loss has been very heavy, and the people are anxious that the Government should take some steps, if it is in their power to do so, to prevent the spread of the disease and to prevent the loss of their cattle. Mr. Binnie, in his letter as reeve of the township, and on behalf of the people of the township, is most anxious that a commissioner should be sent there in order to investigate, and to let the people know the best steps they can take in order to prevent the spread of this disease. I spoke to the Controller of Customs about the matter, and I also referred the letters to the Minister of Finance, who, I understand, is acting for the Department of Agriculture. I would be pleased to know, if it is within the province of that department, whether any steps will be taken to let the people know what is best to be done to prevent the spread of the disease, and to save the valuable property of the people in those three townships.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I understand the Minister of Finance received the letter which the hon. gentleman refers to, and communicated it to the Department of Agriculture. I have not had an opportunity of being acquainted with the facts, but I will make inquiry at once. The hon. gentleman did not state what disease it was.

Mr. LANDERKIN. The people do not understand the disease, and consequently do not understand what treatment they should pursue, and how the cattle should be fed.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I will have the matter inquired into at once.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE TARIFF.

House again resumed the adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Foster :

That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go into Committee of Ways and Means; and the motion of Sir Richard Cartwright in amendment thereto.

Mr. DAVIN. Mr. Speaker, seeing that I took some small part in the advocacy of tariff reform, it would probably be not quite proper that I should give a silent vote on the amendment proposed by the hon. member for South Oxford. When I look at the amendment of that hon. gentleman, I cannot but see that it is in entire keeping with the speech with which he introduced it, because that speech, as I shall show in a passing way, was inconsistent with itself; and if the House will permit me, before further dealing with the tariff, I will show wherein the motion of the hon. member for South Oxford is inconsistent. The first paragraph, when analyzed, affirms that it is impossible to get rid of excessive and unfair taxation if that should be attempted on the principle of protection. That is the first proposition. The second proposition is a proposition that could only properly come from a protectionist. Let me read it to the House :

That the highest interests of Canada demand the adoption of a sound fiscal policy which, while not doing injustice to any class, will promote domestic and foreign trade, and hasten the return of prosperity to the people.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Hear, hear.

Mr. DAVIN. I did not know that either free traders, or revenue tariff men, believed that you could propound a tariff that would promote foreign and domestic trade. But their theory, I thought, was this, that you should propound a tariff that would let the trade of the country take care of itself. Well, then comes a revenue tariff proposition, the third paragraph :

That to that end the tariff should be reduced to the needs of honest economical and efficient government, should have eliminated from it the principle of protection to particular industries at the expense of the community at large, and should be imposed for revenue only.

The fourth paragraph propounds the proposition :

That it should be so adjusted as to make free or bear as lightly as possible upon the necessaries of life and to promote freer trade.

Why, Sir, what are generally termed the necessaries of life in tariff discussion, are free in this tariff.

Mr. MULOCK. Is coal oil a necessary of life ?

Mr. DAVIN. While proceeding in the direction of freeing the necessaries of life, what the proposition means is this, if it means anything, that if the member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), should assume charge of the finances, he would do what any revenue man would consistently do, namely, draw a great part of his revenue from tea, sugar and coffee. Every economic writer, both on the side of free trade and on the side of revenue tariff, as well as on the side of protection, declares that, allowing what are called the necessaries of life to come in untaxed, giving a free breakfast table, to use Mr. Bright's phrase, is essentially a protective measure, whereas taxing tea and sugar, and, in fact, the breakfast table, that belongs, to tariff for revenue, and as we see in England, to free trade.

Mr. MULOCK. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to ask him a question ?

Mr. DAVIN. Certainly ; a hundred.

Mr. MULOCK. Does the hon. gentleman say that, under the present tariff, the necessaries of life are free ?

Mr. DAVIN. I say that, under the present tariff, what are commonly called the necessaries of life are free, and I shall be glad, when the hon. gentleman speaks, if he will show how, as the hon. gentleman who proposed this motion, has not done, he could get the revenue needed for carrying on the business of Canada without taxing articles which according to his interpretation of the phrase, "necessaries of life," would come within that category. I will go further than that. I will promise to vote with the hon. gentleman, when it comes to a division, if the ablest amongst them will rise and show how the wit of man could raise the revenue necessary for carrying on the affairs of Canada at this moment by customs and excise, without having in the customs tariff, as my hon. friend the Finance Minister suggested, some of the elements of protection. At the first glance of this tariff, those of us who advocated certain reductions in the interest of the farmer were disappointed. We had hoped that, for instance, agricultural implements would be free, that one or two other articles would be free ; but, when I came to examine the tariff as a whole, I came to this conclusion, and I will endeavour to show that is the case before I sit down, that those for whom we agitated last session and the session before, have received a great deal more than if we had been successful last year and had induced the Finance Minister to give us that comparatively contracted measure of reform which we urged upon him at that time. The Finance Minister and the Government generally, instead of doing what we asked then, took a course of which, at the time, I did not approve. They said : We will not do that ; on the contrary, we will postpone this matter for a year ; some of our members will go and see the manufacturers and the farmers, and we will make ourselves acquainted with the exact condition of affairs. There were excuses, I confess, for their taking that course, because those who spoke, as representatives of the people, uttered a divided voice in this House. Some said they wanted a tariff reform in the direction embodied in the motion which I had the honour to place on the motion paper. Others said they did not think such a reform was needed, that the farmers were perfectly content. Under those circumstances, it was perfectly natural that the Government should say that they must come into direct contact with the people of the country. Another idea, evidently, came into the minds of the Government. It occurred to them that, if they made any move, and it was so stated by the Prime Minister, I think, there must be a general revision, that the time had come to revise the tariff, and a general revision should be made and the only way that it could be done was by doing, but more thoroughly, what Sir Leonard Tilley did in 1879, go about the country, come into contact with the various industries and ascertain exactly how they were progressing, and how much reduction could be made with loyalty to the principle on which hon. gentlemen stood, as a Government, and with justice to the industries that had been called into being by that policy. The hon. Minister of Finance and Senator Angers came west ; and, from the moment they touched the west, there was one universal voice in favour of certain reductions or certain abolitions in regard to duties on articles used by the farmers. The result of their coming west was, that one of the papers opposed to me attacked me, as if the coming west of those gentlemen showed that the Government had no confidence in what I represented in this House. But I pointed out to those who attacked me as I point out now that it was most natural, seeing that the voice coming from the west was divided, the Ministers should take the course they took. We had a meeting at Regina, and Mr. Bole, a prominent farmer, spoke at it. The hon. Finance Minister was so struck with the ability and exhaustiveness of the speech made by Mr. Bole, that he turned round to me and asked who he was, and expressed the opinion, which he held in common with all who heard that gentleman, that the speech was a thoughtful one, and that, evidently, he was well posted. Mr. Bole asked for a reduction in certain directions, he asked for certain duties to be swept away; and this is what he said in the hearing of the Finance Minister:

As to implements, there was a great difference of opinion, but he believed the time had come when the duty should be reduced. 35 per cent was a protection duty. It should be reduced to 15 or 17½ per cent. It was all right to protect them when they were infant industries, but the day had arrived to reduce the duties.

I think I remember that the hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition in this House, stated, when he discussed this question, that any reduction which had to be made should be made gradually; and, in fact, I stated to hon. gentlemen on the Reform side of the House, in discussing this very tariff, that if the parties had crossed the House, if the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) stood in front of the chair occupied at this moment by the Finance Minister, he would not, he dared not, have brought down duties lower than those embodied in this tariff. Here is a book written by F. W. Taussig, Assistant Professor of Political Economy in Harvard University. It is written against the tariff in the United States; it is written from a free trade point of view; yet here is what he said:

Certainly it is to be wished that changes from a system which has been in force for 25 years and to which the industrial organization has more or less completely adapted itself, ought to be made slowly and with caution. It would be a great mistake, fortunately not one likely to be committed, if a headlong reduction like that of 1833 were again to be attempted, and were again to overshoot the mark. A great change in the character of our industrial system, in order to be safe must be gradual and tentative, and is not likely to be fully carried out in less time than has elapsed since the present system was begun.

Mr. Fawcett in his book on "Protection and Free Trade" makes the same general statement. Now, Sir, that being so, in the interests of the country at large and looking at it rationally from the local standpoint that I looked at it last year, I cannot but say: that this measure of tariff reform which has been given us by the Government is indeed a very large step in the right direction; far larger than we anticipated as I will show, and far larger I think than my hon. friend, the leader of the Opposition, anticipated. I remember well when Sir Leonard Tilley propounded the policy of the Government in 1879. At that time there used to be a seat on each side of the Speaker, and Sir John Macdonald had brought me in to sit on the right, and I was able to see the face of Mr. Mackenzie who used, I think, occupy the chair which my hon. and learned friend, the leader of the Opposition, occupies at the present moment. And, as Sir Leonard Tilley unfolded the scheme of adequate protection as it struck him, as he showed that the Government were determined to carry out fully its pledges made on the hustings in 1878, there was disappointment written on the face of the then leader of the Liberal party. I was one of the humblest of the little propaganda that went about the country in 1878, and the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) was ungracious enough to say: That we went about like a lot of quacks telling the people that we were about to do things that had never come to pass. The Liberal party thought in 1879 that the Government would not dare to carry out these pledges, and my hon. friend from South Oxford has been giving us revelations, or "soi-disant" revelations of what occurred. How Mr. Mackenzie went over to Sir Charles Tupper and said: Were you not going to do so and so if our policy had been different? Why, Sir, I have been assured on the very best authority that Mr. Mackenzie had a speech in his desk, and that the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) had a speech in his desk full of denunciations against Sir John Macdonald's Government for want of faith in not carrying out the policy that they had promised on platform after platform. And I do think, that in those musings, and those rhetorical dreams that bear such excellent fruit, when the leader of the Opposition discourses in golden accents to this House—I cannot but think, that many a happy sentence and many a caustic epigram were evolved that are now wasted and gone; epigrams attacking the Government suggestions that they would give us tariff reform. My hon. friend from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) dealt with the tariff question, my hon. friend from Wellington (Mr. McMullen) also dealt with it; and although my hon. friend from Huron (Mr. McMillan) has not yet spoken on this matter he spoke in anticipation of what was going to be done, and he rather let the cat out of the bag as to what the expectations of his party were, for that he actually complained that certain things were not done in regard to iron which we now find are done in this tariff. I remember reading in Charles Lamb about his school days in the Blue-coat Hospital School, that Coleridge, an exceedingly handsome youth, when walking out with him, played a prank on a fishwife, and you know that fishwives in London or elsewhere are not the most polite. Coleridge played a prank on the fishwife, and she turned around to maledict him—I cannot exactly say what she said in such polite ears as this Assembly over which you preside, Mr. Speaker, or what she wanted to say—but instead of blasting, she blest the beautiful face of Coleridge when she saw it. And so my hon. friend from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), who certainly is not given to blessing, who deals out his maledictions in all directions and gives vent to his wild and severe opinions upon all and sundry on every possible occasion, has not cursed this tariff; on the contrary, he has given it a grudging benediction. In fact, the only class of persons that the hon. gentleman has never exercised his dreadfully black judgment upon are those who sit behind him; and when he is, so to speak, cursing the Conservative party and all its members, I long sometimes that in a moment, in one short moment of frenzy, he would turn around and, forgetting the bonds that bind him to the party behind him, give us his candid opinion of his friends. Sir, if the hon. gentleman would only do that, I am persuaded that strong as the opinions have been that we have heard as against ourselves, they would prove to be mild compared with those that have been harboured so long in that thunderous bosom against his own party. The hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), however, has told us that there are good points about this tariff. He says that he freely acknowledges that, and my hon. friend from Wellington (Mr. McMullen) says: It is a move in the right direction; and my hon. friend from Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) puts on it the highest eulogy possible, for he says: It is a child of his own. As I, Sir, greatly approve of this tariff as a whole, I am constrained to say that we are about to dispute the claim of fatherhood made by the hon. member for Norfolk (Mr. Charlton). I am not going to waste the time of the House by discussing the question as to whether these gentlemen have any such claim as they make out. They say, and the 'Globe' also speaking of the tariff says: That the good points in it, the reductions, were all suggested by the Liberals. Why, did not some of the Conservatives advocate some of these things? and before ever my hon. friend took up binder twine, and before ever we heard particular changes advocated from the Liberal side of the House—and we have only heard of one or two—the Conservatives in other parts of the country advocated these changes. I shall not discuss that question for it is a small one; it is lighter than dust in the balance compared with the practical question for us to discuss here: Is this or is it not a good tariff? If it is a good tariff, or if it is an approach to a good tariff—just to take the standpoint of my hon. friend for a moment—surely the proper thing for us to do is to go into committee and like business men discuss it point after point, and see wherein we can improve it. I stated that the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) was not only inconsistent in his motion but inconsistent in his speech. What did he say? In one part he said, You have the maximum of disturbance with the minimum of relief; in another part he said: You have only made trifling changes. If you have the maximum of disturbance in the tariff, you must have made great inroads on the protected manufacturers; and if so, my friends, the farmers, must have fared pretty well. Now, Sir, I complain a little of what the hon. member for South Oxford said, though, mark you, it was really a eulogy on this tariff; but I complain still more of the fact that his remarks were echoed by a more conscientious man—my hon. friend from North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton). I am not constrained to weigh nicely what the hon. member for South Oxford says; because, as Mr. Disraeli said of Lord Salisbury, he is a great master of gibes and flouts and jeers; but my hon. friend from North Norfolk is a man who weighs his words, not merely in the nice balance of the apothecary, but in the balance of the sanctuary; and yet my hon. friend, echoing what was said by the hon. member for South Oxford, says that he does not think that the Government will carry out this tariff. I doubt very much, says the hon. member for South Oxford, if the Government will carry out this tariff; it is so good, it goes so far, it does so much for the farmer. He tries to infect the farmers with that notion. That suggestion is unworthy of this House, and unworthy of the hon. member for South Oxford, and the hon. member for North Norfolk. It is a suggestion that the men who occupy the foremost positions in this country are ready to commit one of the basest, most dastardly, and most treacherous acts possible. And, Sir, it suggests more than that; it suggests that some thirteen or fourteen men would go spontaneously crazy, almost—that, having got themselves once more entrenched in power by appealing to the people, they would turn round and betray and abandon the men who placed them in power, and show themselves damned in the eyes of the historian for all time. Why, Sir, the thing is preposterous. I believe it is not unfair, under these circumstances, that I should ask, how persons with a cross-fishing motion like this intend to legislate? Examine the motion; you cannot get at the kernel of it. One paragraph says one thing to one set of men, and another paragraph another thing to another set. In fact, the hon. member for South Oxford, in one part of his speech, seemed to say to the manufacturers: The Government have gone too far; your friends have betrayed you; you have been wounded in the house of your friends; I have been abusing you for years like pickpockets. but if you turn to me I will do something for you. But the hon. gentleman could hardly maintain himself in that mood very long, because in a short time he said the Government did not mind throwing over the minor thieves if they could keep the greater ones on their side. I remember that George Lord Littleton says, "love will hope where wisdom would despair." Well, Sir, ambition will hope where reason would despond, and it is quite clear that all this fighting is not at all in the interest of the farmer, or in the interest of the country, but is carried on solely in the hope that the hon. member for South Oxford should once more have his finger in the pie of our finances, and the Reform party should once again be in power. That is the whole object. But we may well ask, and I will ask the country: Suppose they did come into power, what guarantee have we that they would carry out the principles enunciated in this motion? A well known jingle of a popular poet tells us that when the Whigs are out of power they are very noisy, but that

As bees on flowers alighting cease to hum,
So settling into office Whigs grow dumb.

Now, Sir, the present leader of the Reform party used to edit a paper called 'Le Defricheur'; and I need hardly say that he did so with such skill as we would expect from a man of his literary feeling and scholarship. He will remember that in 1864 the Rouges of Lower Canada laid down a platform, that in 1872 that platform was adopted in the very county which, at that time, he represented in the local House, and that he was advocating the various planks of it in his paper. What were those planks? I will not read them all; I will read only the most interesting—only those that remain still new, shining untarnished by wear or tear. One was election of Senators; the third was the reduction of the number of Ministers of the Crown; the fourth, diminution of the Governor General's salary; the fifth, diminution of the number of Government employees; the sixth, reorganization of the militia; the seventh, amelioration of our means of communication in the St. Lawrence; the eighth, opposition to the construction of the Pacific Railway, so long as the North-west is not sufficiently colonized; and the eleventh was—what do you think?—protection to home industries. My hon. and learned friend shakes his head. To borrow a joke that was made by Daniel O'Connell, you will remember, Mr. Speaker.—well versed as you are in all sorts of parliamentary and forensic lore—that when arguing before a jury, and the presiding judge shook his head in dissent from the law that he was expounding, O'Connell said, "Gentlemen, his Lordship shakes his head; but when his Lordship shakes his head, there's nothing in it." My hon. friend entered the House of Commons in 1876 and in 1877, and became Minister of Inland Revenue in Mr. Mackenzie's

Government; but did we ever hear a word of these reforms from the Mackenzie Government while my hon. friend was a member of it? I need hardly tell you that they did not touch the question of the election of Senators; they did not reduce the number of Cabinet Ministers, nor the Governor General's salary, nor the number of public employees, but added $300,000 a year to the public burdens under that head; they did not reorganize the militia; they had no policy with regard to the St. Lawrence or any other route; and they began to build the Pacific Railway before there were three farmers in the North-west. During all that time my hon. friend never spoke one word in regard to those things that his eloquent pen was dilating upon in 1872.

Mr. LAURIER. If the hon. gentleman will pardon me: my paper was dead in 1872.

Mr. DAVIN. I may be incorrect in saying that he advocated them in 1872 in his paper; but he did advocate them in his paper, and in 1872 in his speeches. I may say this, that it shows a failure of medical and surgical skill on my part, from a literary standpoint, not to know that it was dead, and it is a wonder that it lived even as long as it did. What happened, actually? Going aside a little, and yielding, so to speak, to the spirit of this debate up to the present moment, I ask: What was done for the country during those four years? and what could we expect to be done if they had remained longer in power? I was reading the other day the speech made by the hon. member for South Oxford in 1878, when he was Minister of Finance. It is not necessary for me to inflict a long quotation from it on the House; I do not, as a rule, you know, quote much. But I will say this, that all you have to do is to take up the speech made by the hon. member, when he was Finance Minister in 1878. That speech was one note of despair in regard to doing anything for the North-west or for the Dominion. When Mr. Tilley, afterwards Sir Leonard Tilley, brought in his Budget speech, what did the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) say then? What he did say then shows the value of his criticism on the present budget. He told the manufacturers that they would have competition a hundred times worse, under the tariff of Sir Leonard Tilley, than they had under the former tariff it was to supersede. Not only that, he said they would have the most vehement domestic competition, and he described the ruinous financial evil consequent on the protective tariff of Sir Leonard Tilley. If you go westward, he said, you have a very long stretch of country which for many years, cannot be bridged over by railway, and we are dependent for the means of keeping up communication with the North-west, at best for several years, on the privilege of passing through a foreign country. He had no anticipation then of seeing the completion of the Canadian Pacific Railway, which, three years later, was completed by the Government of Sir John Macdonald. Such a thing as the feasibility of that enterprise never entered his head; and if the hon. gentleman had continued in office we should have no Pacific Railway to-day, and the North-west would still be an unknown region, an unknown quantity, so far as the Dominion is concerned. Therefore, when he denounces this tariff, when he says it gives the maximum of disturbance and the minimum of relief—when he prophesies all sorts of evil results from the tariff—all we have to do is to remember his doubts at the period to which I refer. The hon. gentleman is a doubter who has never had ground for his doubts. He is worse than Thomas, for Thomas, when he got grounds for belief, believed. He is worse than Cassandra, for she prophesied the truth and was doomed not to be believed. But my hon. friend is not only not believed, but time mocks at his prophesies. Therefore when he tells us this tariff may not be carried out, that fact alone—even if we did not know the men on the Treasury benches; even if we did not know that no rational men could propose the policy which the Minister of Finance has proposed, and then after an election go back on it—the bare fact that it is the hon. member for South Oxford who doubts is sufficient to warrant us in coming to the conclusion, safe and sound, that carried out it will be in every detail. I appeal to my hon. friend from North York (Mr. Mulock), who took an interest—it is true he came late in the day into the field of labour, but late as he came, we acknowledge his exertions and he will have his reward as though he came in at an earlier hour—I appeal to him whether we have not got a good deal. I asked myself, when I began to analyze this tariff, what does the farmer get? First, he gets a reduction of 15 per cent on his implements. You have therefore at present a duty of but 20 per cent on these and with the prospect of cheap iron in the States, I believe it will be found that the competition from there will probably be just as free and just as strong as if the duty had been entirely removed. I will come to the reasons by and by why no rational man could have expected the entire removal of that duty. Then we have lumber free, which is a tremendous boon to the North-west and Manitoba. We had a combine there. We had 20 per cent on lumber, which was paid by every man who built a house. Now, that lumber is free, and that is an immense boon. Not only that, but the laths and tar paper and everything that goes into the building of houses—which, from the standpoint of the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock), is of course a necessary of life, though not what is usually called a necessary of life among political economists—have had the duty entirely taken off. What has been done in the matter of sugar is, I believe, also a great boon to the farmers of the North-west. I will not trust myself to discuss that question, but will do what I believe I have never done before in this House. I will read from a newspaper article to strengthen my position. In making this exception in this case, I shall tell the House the reason why. The newspaper is the 'Mail.' It so happens that Mr. Bunting, who used formerly to have a seat in this House, and who manages this paper, is, we all know, an authority on sugar. What he does not know about sugar is not worth knowing. That he is thoroughly posted, I have personal knowledge, because I was once on the editorial staff of that newspaper, before and after Mr. Bunting was connected with it. In this article, Mr. Bunting says that the greatest advantages to the consumer will result from these sugar duties, that yellow refined sugar cannot fail to be cheaper, that the trader will have a great advantage under it; and he goes on to show that a great boon has been conferred on consumers, and that the changes should have an expanding effect on the consumption of sugar during the coming fruit season. I have given these as some of the larger items. There are twenty-seven items in the tariff relating specially to the farmers—tar paper, axle grease, whips, axes, scythes, hay knives, threshers, separators, buckthorn fencing, hubs, and spikes, felloes, etc., and for the cowboys, jiggers, stirrups, saddle trees, cheap Morgan trees, etc., etc., free instead of 10 per cent. So that, Sir, when you add to that what has been done, you already have a set-off to the 20 per cent that remains on the implements and for the half of the old duty that remains on barbed wire. But I go further than that: The farmer, as a rule has a wife, or he ought to have—every man ought to have. Now, Mr. Speaker, I have here a list of fifty odd articles, all touching the domestic life of the farmer. I shall not read this list, but I will say that the duty upon every one has been either lowered or abolished, and that these changes will materially lower the cost of living to the farmer of the North-west. For instance, the hon. member for South Oxford may in future have the consolation of knowing that he is washing his hands in cheaper delf and that when he comes to be buried, he can be buried in a casket that comes in under a lower duty. Then, Sir, when you come to the industrial portion of the community, I have here a list of sixty-six articles, the reduction of duties upon which will cheapen production and will therefore result in a reduction of the cost of living to the farmer of the North-west. And when you put these into the scales, the 20 per cent on implements and $\frac{3}{4}$ -cent per pound that remains on barbed wire, kick the beam. Now, Sir, I come to a point on which I congratulate the Minister of Finance specially. I am not aware whether I can make the claim with certainty, but I think I was the first man in the House to move in the matter of bringing before the Minister the necessity of allowing books for universities, previously taxed, to come in free. I think the placing of these books on the free list is a great concession to higher education. I shall not now discuss the general question of the duty on books, but in regard to this particular matter, on behalf of those who take an interest in higher education, and those who take an interest in university life, I thank the hon. Minister for the concession. Now, Sir, I may be permitted to ask a question of the Opposition who have been discussing this matter of tariff reform. The whole tone of what they say is this: That a tariff somehow is responsible for any want of prosperity that may exist in a country at the time when that tariff prevails. They cannot deny that such is the tone of their speeches. Yet, in the same breath with which he conveyed this idea, the hon. member for South Oxford will tell you that it is an absurd proposition. And, Sir, it is absurd, it is demonstrably absurd. It is demonstrable that tariffs have nothing whatever to do with what are called commercial crises.

Mr. LAURIER. Hear, hear.

Mr. DAVIN. I do not know whether that is a cheer of assent or a cheer of derision.

Mr. LAURIER. That is a recantation.

Mr. DAVIN. On your part?

Mr. LAURIER. On your part.

Mr. DAVIN. No, I will not say I never recant, but I will say I never have any need of recanting. But, as I pointed out in the earlier part of my remarks, my hon. friend must have recanted.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. DAVIN. If hon. members on the Opposition side agree with it, why then is the argument stated in such a way as to suggest that if there is a low price for wheat, the tariff must be responsible. Take the remark of my hon. friend from Wellington (Mr. McMullen). He would have us believe that when there is a low price for any given commodity such as wheat, the tariff is responsible for that. But if you had absolutely free trade, such as they have in England—or, for I will not discuss the technical point, such as they aim at in England; we should have the same price for wheat. Why then should the hon. gentlemen take the tone they do? Is it for want of something to say, or is it to throw dust in the eyes of simple people? I do not know; but, as I say, it is demonstrable that a tariff has nothing to do with financial crises. Take, for instance, the years between 1874 and 1878. You had depressions during those four years over the whole world. There was depression, stringent and strong, in England, a free trade country. You had depression in Canada. You had depression very severe and drastic in the United States. Well, in the United States you had the highest tariff ever imposed up to that time in any country; in England you had free trade. My hon. friend from South Oxford talks as if the present depression that has swept over the United States, is due in some way to their bad banking system. But, even bad banking systems, Sir, do not necessarily produce crises. What produces crises, depressions and financial disasters, is over-speculation,—wild speculation. Sir, we have an instance to demonstrate that a good banking system will not save a people from this result of bad speculation, in the crises of 1637 in Holland. The people of Holland at that time went as wild over tulip speculation as ever Englishmen did over the South Sea bubble. No less than thirteen thousand florins was paid for a single bulb. Men went shares in single bulbs; men sold bulbs that did not exist. Men who had not as much as a flower-pot in their possession sold bulbs at fabulous prices, and these the bulbs of tulips, which, while beautiful, are not the most attractive of flowers. After this period of wild speculation the crash came. In Holland at that time they had no paper currency whatever and its banking system had been always noted for its soundness. If our friends contend that any financial depression existing here is due to the tariff, they ought to point out how the tariff has produced these evils of which they complain. Now, Sir, let me say one word about why I think it reasonable that we should be content with the 20 per cent duty upon implements. That reason is this, that, owing to the tariff of 1887 the Finance Minister's hands were tied in regard to iron. I hold, as you know, Sir, that iron ought to be free, as being the raw material of so many things. But, suppose we had as a free trader a Finance Minister, he would have to deal with a very grave question. You had protected these industries and fostered them—how then could he do other than move slowly? Of course, you know my views still further. If I were to protect raw material at all, I would protect it by a bonus pure and simple. The 'Globe' newspaper, which is very able and well written—never so well written as it is at present—discussed this question of a bonus, and it seems to think there is no difference between a bonus protecting a raw material industry and a customs. Let me point out what the difference is. We will suppose that a bonus is sufficient to encourage the manufacture of a given commodity, that it is sufficient to enable the manufacturer to compete with the outside world, that bonus will not affect the international price of the commodity to the consumer.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The Government pays the duty instead of receiving it, that is the difference.

Mr. DAVIN. Is that what the hon. gentleman always contends? The hon. gentleman contends in regard to protection that the Government does not receive the duty at all, but that the manufacturer receives it.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Not on the imported articles.

Mr. DAVIN. What would happen would be this: The community would give a certain premium; it would come to the conclusion that it was worth while to give a certain premium to encourage a given industry. Those who deal in that raw material would buy at the international price. I am only contending now, and I am sure the hon. member for Bothwell will agree with me, that there is a radical difference between encouraging an industry by protection in the shape of customs and by protection in the shape of a bonus. There is a complete difference, and I just mention it because, in my view of a tariff, under no circumstances would I ever put such a customs duty on raw material as was placed on iron in 1887; but once it was placed there, the hand of any Finance Minister is more or less tied, he cannot give you the heroic remedy that he might otherwise do, and partly because of such a criticism as the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) makes. That is the kind of criticism that would be made all over the country. The hon. gentleman must know as well as I do that if there is anything to be paid for encouraging an industry under the circumstances the community at large would pay less under a bonus than under a customs protection. However, I merely mention that in passing, to point out that as long as a duty was to be placed on iron it was impossible for the Finance Minister to go further than he has gone in regard to reducing the duty on implements. Now, Sir, I have no fear whatever that the farmers of the North-west, bearing in mind what has been done by this extended reform in our tariff, will not be well content with the reduction on implements, and on those other things that we fought for, from year to year. I remember that in 1888 or 1889 a dinner happened to be given at Regina, when I was going away, and a gentleman spoke at that banquet, whom my hon. friend the Finance Minister heard speak on a Regina platform last year when he was up there. This important question of protection had come up, and this gentleman who stated at the Regina meeting what I may say I had laid down when I was editing the Regina 'Leader' in 1883, that the North-west did not receive directly any benefit from protection, and I took up especially this very question of lumber. At that time the Government was doing a great deal to open up the North-west; they were spending large sums for that work, and Mr. George Brown, whom my hon. friend the Finance Minister heard speak last year, stated at that banquet, that the people of the North-west did not take so contracted a view of the tariff that they could not consider what was for the benefit of the whole Dominion of Canada. Sir, I will say this, that any view that stops short of regarding this country as an organic whole, that stops short of regarding it as an organism, just like a human organism, that looks to the benefit of any single member of that organism as against the rest, takes a narrower view than is consistent with even local wisdom, above all, consistent with patriotism to the country in which he happens to live. We must rise above that. As one of our most fascinating writers says, it is not Cape Breton, it is not Nova Scotia, it is not New Brunswick, it is not Quebec, it is not Ontario, it is not Manitoba, it is not British Columbia, it is not the North-west but all these together, the Dominion of Canada, that we must think of when we are considering what is best in a matter of this kind; because you cannot have a tariff for the North-west, you cannot have a tariff for Quebec, you cannot have a tariff for the lower provinces, but you must have a tariff for the whole Dominion. Sir, I believe that under the circumstances this tariff approaches as nearly as possible at the present time to that organic harmony in which, if one member suffers, in the language of the great Apostle, all suffer, and if one member rejoices all rejoice. From that point of view, I feel that this tariff we are discussing here to-day, this tariff that we have been asked to condemn by a motion introduced in a speech which declares that it has some good points, a motion supported by speeches which yet say the tariff has gone a long way in the right direction, a motion supported, also, by a leading paper that has emphatically declared that a good deal has been well done in that tariff—I say, Sir, that tariff is one that it is impossible for me to condemn, as I am asked to do by the motion of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). Speaking as a North-west man, looking at what has been done in the direction of easing the burden upon the farmer, and making living cheaper to him, easing the burden upon the mechanic, and making the domestic life of both classes easier—looking at all that, I say that the tariff placed before us goes beyond what I had anticipated, it goes beyond what I believe the member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) would have dared to attempt if he had been in power, and taking into account not only the interest of any one locality, but the interests of that locality combined with the interests of the Dominion at large, you have here a tariff that is one of the boldest and sagest that has been proposed in my memory, in Canada; it is one of the boldest things that have been done in the history of tariffs—and I recall what has been done by Mr. Gladstone—it is a bold, a sage and a liberal measure, and it will have my undivided support.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). In following the eloquent gentleman from the North-west (Mr. Davin), I beg leave to draw the attention of the House to some remarks that he has been pleased to make. He is of a different opinion to what he held a few years ago. He appears to have a new policy every time he comes to this House. When he came here at first he did not believe in altering one single article in the tariff; he believed that every article must stand as a part of the whole, and that if one was removed the whole fabric would fall. In 1890 he spoke so strongly in regard to the well-being and prosperity of the farmers up there, that he stated there were no complaints among them. He said they were purchasing everything at as low rates as on the other side of the line. The hon. gentleman does not deny it, and no doubt he remembers it well. He stated in his speech that at a meeting where a large number of farmers were present from Dakota, consulting with some of the farmers in Regina, on comparing prices, it was declared that the farmers of his country received those articles at a cheaper rate than did the farmers south of the line. The following year the hon. gentleman came back again with a different impression, not from conviction, but from force of circumstances. The farmers were oppressed, they were heavily taxed, they were paying actually more for the articles they were purchasing than were the farmers south of the line, and the farmers called a meeting, and demanded that their respected representative should attend, and give an account of himself. In regard to these very articles upon which they got much cheaper prices than did farmers south of the line, the hon. gentleman had to acknowledge, before a large meeting of his constituents, that there were many articles for which the farmers of Manitoba were paying higher than did the farmers south. One article specially mentioned was binding twine, and the hon. gentleman had to promise that he would not do as he did the year before, vote against free binding twine, and last year the hon. gentleman came to this House and made an eloquent speech, and submitted a motion that binding twine be placed on the free list. He also moved that agricultural implements be placed on the free list; also that coal oil be placed on the free list. The hon. gentleman then made an excellent speech in regard to coal oil, but during the long speech he has delivered this afternoon he never made a single reference to that question, which he made the subject of a separate speech last year. The hon. gentleman may think that perhaps he has not so spoken, but I have the very words which the hon. gentleman used in those debates under my hand, and in order to prove them to the hon. gentleman, and to hon. members in the House, and to show that the hon. gentleman is not consistent in the policy he advocates, I intend to present the different views he has entertained on these questions. The hon. gentleman said last year that it was impossible to protect the farmers; that if anybody believed the farmers could be protected he would like to hear them prove it. Let me give his own words, because they are more flowery than mine, and perhaps more to the point, when I am dealing with the hon. gentleman's remarks. The hon. gentleman, speaking on the resolution moved by the hon. member for Compton (Mr. Pope) said, on February 8th, 1893, as recorded on page 465 of 'Hansard':

I have to say on behalf of the great farming country from whence I come that it is difficult indeed to show that we gain by the National policy.

Yet the hon. gentleman comes back this year and holds up the National Policy as a panacea for all the ills of the people of this country, although last year he stated that he could not see that the National Policy ever did any good to the people of the North-west from which he came.

An hon. MEMBER. How did he vote last year?

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). He spoke all right last year, but voted all wrong. The hon. gentleman made his speech from the Liberal standpoint, but he would not for a moment vote against his party, and when the question came up he voted with it. The hon. gentleman further went on to say:

In fact the proposition that you can protect the farmer is a proposition that would seem to me to be a very difficult one to prove.

Now, it appears that during the year that has passed, the hon. gentleman has proved to himself, and has come to this House to give his new experience, that the effect of the National Policy is in a contrary direction. The hon. gentleman further proceeded to say:

Above all other things it is difficult to protect the farmer who is a producer of wheat, and for the reason that he produces a surplus; and the moment he produces a large surplus and has to export it, how are you going to protect him?

Does not the farmer of the North-west produce a large surplus of wheat? Has not that country produced about twelve million bushels last year; and yet the hon. gentleman is willing to stand up as a representative of the North-west and declare that the farmers cannot be protected, and yet he supports a tariff that proposes to levy heavy duties on them, and does not protect them in producing the wheat. Is that the position which a representative of the North-west should take in discussing a question having special reference to the country from which he comes? But the hon. gentleman told us how he could protect the farmers, and gave expression to sound Liberal principles in the following remarks:—

I maintain the only way you can protect the farmer is, not by levying duties on wheat or other things of which he produces a surplus, but the way to protect him is to give him those articles he has to use on the farm at the lowest prices.

Is not that what the Liberals of this country have been urging, that the tariff on agricultural implements should be taken off, or be made very much lower than it is, that the duty on coal oil should be reduced almost one-half, that the duties on other goods for farmers that go into the North-west to feed the poor people who have gone there to build homes for themselves, should be reduced? But to-day he does not consider any article as coming within the terms "necessaries of life," with the exception of wheat and other food products. How could the hon. gentleman go out on the prairie in the middle of winter without coat or clothes? Such, indeed, are as necessary as the food of the table; nevertheless, under the term "necessaries of life" the hon. gentleman does not include clothing, boots and shoes, and other articles that are as necessary for the existence of a man and his family as the articles consumed as food. But the hon. gentleman stated, two years ago, how cheaply they got articles out there, and I want to read the expressions of his opinion at that time. Speaking on the binding twine question in this House on July 6th, 1891, as recorded at page 1892 of the 'Hansard,' he said:

We have the sons and brothers of these farmers (the hon. gentleman is speaking of the farmers of Canada generally) in the North-west. Is it to be supposed for one moment that if they have given more, as compared with prices in Dakota, for binding twine, I would not have heard a complaint. I have never heard in my constituency one word of complaint as to the prices paid for twine. We have had within a few weeks in Regina, a large number of farmers from Dakota, who were comparing the prices in Dakota and Regina and they declared that in regard to all things the farmers use on the farm and in their business down to the clothes they wear and the food they eat, the farmers in the North-west compare advantageously with those in Dakota. If that be so, why did the cry come from Manitoba and the North-west for two or three years against the excessive duties levied by the Dominion Government on those articles? Why did the farmers send a memorial signed by them to the Government showing the excessive prices paid for agricultural implements and many other articles of necessity, and asking the Government to reduce the duty, so that they might be able to live in the North-west? Why was it that during the election in Winnipeg a large proportion of the Liberal-Conservatives, who always supported the Government heretofore, supported a candidate opposed to the Government, to send him here as a protest? Because the heavy taxes levied upon the goods that they consume, made them so expensive to them. I would ask the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) to listen to what one of the Regina deputation said last summer to the Minister of Finance, when he visited that city. It is the very gentleman whose name the hon. member mentioned. Mr. George Brown, a man, whom he said had stated in a patriotic manner the following:—We know we are a part of the great Dominion, we know we must be subject to taxation in order to meet the expenditure necessary to carry on the affairs of the country, and, although we have to pay high for those things, we are so patriotic that we will continue to assume the burdens, in the interests of the manufacturers of the eastern country. That is what the hon. member (Mr. Davin) said that George Brown had said; but this is what the papers say that he said:

We sell the two great staples, cattle and wheat, in Liverpool. If wheat is low in price, then the only way the farmer can be helped is to enable him to produce cheaply. When the farmer takes a bushel and a peck of wheat to town and this buys only a gallon of oil the conditions are not very good.

Not one single sentence was said to-day by the representative of the North-west country in regard to the burdens in that respect at all. The hon. gentleman was present at the meeting, he heard the expression made use of by Mr. Brown before the Minister of Finance, and yet not one solitary protest came from him to-day in favour of the very people that he represents here. Mr. George Brown went on:

When the farmer has to take a load of wheat to bring back a ton of coal, the conditions are not very good. In a country where coal was $7.50 a ton, in Winnipeg, and $9 or $10 here, the conditions are not good.

Here was a strong Conservative, willing to support and to say every possible word in favour of the Government, but he was so constrained by the circumstances by which he was surrounded, by the conditions of the country, of which he was a citizen, that he was forced to give public expression of his disapprobation of that system which bore so heavily upon the farmers. I could go on still further to show that the gentlemen who support the Government from the North-west do not give us an honest, upright, intelligent view of the condition of the farmers of that country. I know from observation, and from practical experience and information that I get from persons with whom I am acquainted there, that at the present time they deem themselves heavily burdened by this system of protection which has continued for so many years. The hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) evidently has not much faith in the Government. He asked them last year to reduce the duty on agricultural implements, on binder twine, on coal oil and several other things, and now he tells us boldly, that he has got more than he anticipated. It shows that he had no confidence in the men who govern this country, when he asked them for certain reductions, and now says that the limited reductions he has received are far beyond his anticipations. I am sometimes greatly astonished, will I say at the impudence of people—I think that is the only word that comes to me now to express exactly what I mean. Here is this hon. gentleman to-day congratulating the Government for raising the standard of raw sugar from No. 14 to No. 16 Dutch standard, to come in free, which he says will effect a large saving to the consumers. Two years ago, when the duties were reduced on sugar, the Liberal party expressed the opinion then that the standard should be raised to 16, as was the case in the United States, and that hon. gentleman was the very man who spoke against it and voted against it, and now he comes back, with an audacity that I have no words to express, and congratulates the Conservative party for giving what the Liberal party then asked them to do. Mr. Speaker, I have another hon. gentleman to deal with, and I am very glad he is in his seat. I want to deal for a short time with the Controller of Customs, and I hope he will give his attention, because he is a limb of the Government, though he does not belong to the trunk.

Mr. MULOCK. A sort of a mouldering branch.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). He is one of the limbs of the Government. He made statements here the other night that I want to contradict boldly. I wish not only to contradict them, but I wish to disprove them as well. He started out in his speech with a statement which he knew to be false.

Mr. DAVIN. Order.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). I am in perfect order. I know he knew it to be false.

Mr. DAVIN. Mr. Speaker, is it in order to say that an hon. member knew a thing to be false?

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). He knew it to be false, because he could not help knowing it to be false.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). I do not say he lied, but certainly he had a knowledge of it.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman knows very well that he cannot impute any motives to a member of the House in that manner. I think the hon. gentleman is not in order when he made the statement, "knowing it to be false."

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). I made no statement that you can construe into my saying that he lied.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman has not got the right to say that a member of the House made a false statement knowing it to be false.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). He made a statement that he ought to know was false, and I will tell you what it was. He made the statement, that the policy of the Liberal party was commercial union. If he did not know that to be false, he ought to have known it, because it is false. I will challenge him to-day, or I will challenge any member on that side of the House, or in any part of the country, to point out a single individual, or to quote a line or a paragraph wherein the Liberal party have expressed themselves in favour of commercial union. We have expressed ourselves in favour of freer trade with the United States. That is a different thing altogether, but the Controller of Customs went on to say, that the Liberal party wished to place our whole trade question in the hands of the Government at Washington, and that we would lose control of our own affairs. I challenge him again, or I challenge any other man to show one line or one sentence or one expression, made by any Liberal member of this House speaking for the party.

Mr. McNEILL. Do you say, in favour of commercial union?

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). In favour of commercial union.

Mr. McNEILL. I will show you.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). The hon. member for Bruce (Mr. McNeill) might show where some individuals might have expressed themselves.

Mr. McNEILL. Ah. You said any member of the House.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). Any member of the House, as speaking for the party.

Mr. McNEILL. Ah.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). Well now, do you suppose that the party is responsible for the expressions made use of by any one individual in the country? Suppose I charge the Conservative party with being in favour of annexation, and went on to show that one of their number, Mr. Sol White, of Windsor, was in favour of annexation, would that prove that the Conservative party were in favour of it. I hope that, when the Conservatives charge the Liberal party with being responsible for any policy, they will find out first whether the Liberal party has accepted that policy or not. Therefore, the Controller of Customs should know, before he made the charge, that it was false.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Will the hon. member for Bruce (Mr. McNeill) accept that principle?

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). Certainly he will; he cannot help it.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Will the hon. member for Bruce accept the principle that the expressions of any one member of a party should commit the whole party to a line of policy ?

Mr. McNEILL. What does the hon. gentleman ask ? I did not hear him.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). The hon. member for Prince Edward Island (Mr. Davies) asked : Are you willing to accept as your policy anything that one of the Conservative party may say on the public platform outside : are you an annexationist because Sol White, one of your colleagues, was an annexationist ?

Mr. McNEILL. I may just answer the hon. gentleman in this way: that the Conservative Association of North Bruce passed a resolution to the effect, that no person who was an annexationist could be a member of that association.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Are you willing to accept for your own party the line of argument you try to apply to your opponents ? That is the question.

Mr. McNEILL. My hon. friend is not at all fair. The hon. gentleman who has the floor challenged any member on this side of the House to point to any statement made by any member of the House on his side in favour of commercial union, and I said I could point out such statements. He may not have intended it, but that is what he said. If my hon. friend from Prince Edward Island (Mr. Davies) desires to repudiate the statements made by the hon. gentleman sitting next to him, and if he desires to say that they do not at all represent the views of the party, then the two hon. gentlemen can settle the matter between themselves.

Mr. CHARLTON. May I inquire what statements the hon. gentleman refers to, if he alludes to me ?

Mr. McNEILL. The hon. gentleman who has just spoken is the hon. gentleman I refer to, and I say that I can point out, in speeches made by him, statements in favour of commercial union.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). The hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) knows very well that I was speaking here in my place, not of individuals at all, but of the policy of the Liberal party ; and I challenged the hon. gentleman to read any line or expression or speech wherein the Liberal party endorsed commercial union. If he can do that, I am willing to hear what he has to say.

Mr. McNEILL. That is not the statement I refer to.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. McNEILL. I am in order. If Mr. Speaker says I am not, I will sit down ; but I have a right to put myself right. I am replying to a certain statement, and that statement only.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron.) Now, Sir.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron).

the hon. Controller of Customs the other day said that we had decried the country, and that the prosperity existing in the country was known and seen of all men. He went on to prove that the country was prosperous, from figures which he said Sir Oliver Mowat had placed before him ; and, holding a report of the Bureau of Industries in his hand, he said : " I am going to prove by figures which are not mine, but which have been placed there by Sir Oliver Mowat and his Government, that hon. gentlemen opposite have been decrying the country." Then he went on to quote figures, and I wish to show the House just how much the hon. gentleman knows of the figures he undertook to quote. He stated that in 1882 the value of the farm property of the province of Ontario, exclusive of buildings, was $632,000,000, and that in 1892 the value was $615,000,000, a reduction of only 2½ per cent. " Now," says the hon. gentleman, " there are the figures of Sir Oliver Mowat, and yet these men have been telling you time and time again that the reduction in the value of farm lands in this country has been from 16 to 20 and even 25 per cent, and I leave the matter to be settled among themselves." That statement appeared very nice to those who did not know the facts. When I tell him that in 1882 there were 201,000 farmers in Ontario, and that in 1892 there were 241,000, does he suppose that the 40,000 additional farmers added nothing to the value of the farm lands of the province ? And when I tell him again that, according to the various assessors of the province, there were, in 1882, 19,000,000 acres occupied, and, in 1892, 21,000,000 acres, does he mean to say that the 2,000,000 acres additional brought under settlement added nothing to the value of the land in 1892 ? Need I tell him, either, that there were 1,750,000 acres more cleared land in 1882 than in 1892 ? When we consider that it costs about $20 an acre to clear land, we have $35,000,000 added to the value on that account ; and, as the land settled upon between the years 1882 and 1892 is worth at least $10 an acre, we have an additional value of $20,000,000 on that account ; and without counting the improvements made on farm lands in the way of drainage, reclaiming wet lands, and in many other ways, we have, in 1892, $55,000,000 more value than in 1882. Therefore, without taking this increase into account, the value of farm lands in Ontario to-day is $72,600,000 less than it ought to be, if the lands had maintained the value they had in 1882. To those facts I challenge contradiction. Those gentlemen who should have known the facts, and should, above all others, have represented them to the House in a reasonable and proper way, sought to mislead the House by quoting the two sets of figures, the one in 1882 and one in 1892. But, Sir, the Controller of Customs also went on to show that the farmers were very prosperous. I am not here to decry the farmers or my country. I am a Canadian; all the interests I have are in Canada; and, as I have often said, Canada to me is first and last. I put the interests of Canada above those of every other country. Speaking of my country, I say there are no five million people in any other country in the world who possess the same energy, industry and intelligence as do Canadians. And there is no country which possesses such great storehouses of wealth of every description. I praise my country, but I condemn the policy by which it is governed. I assert that the policy we have had for the last sixteen years has not been in the interests of the farming community, but has burdened the people by very heavy taxation, when it could not assist them, according to the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), in any one particular. We are told that, being representative of the farmers, we have no right to find fault with or deplore their condition. Supposing I said to the Controller of Customs that his property was depreciating, and that he was not doing as well in business as he used to do, and suppose he were to corroborate all that I said, would you believe him? You certainly would, and you would believe him before you would me, if I contradicted him. And when I stand in this House and tell you the condition in which the farmers are, and when the farmers substantiate and corroborate and reiterate my words—when, from their own position, knowing their own interests and their own surroundings, they say that their condition is not what it should be, should not that be sufficient to establish the accuracy of my statements? We can give figures to prove that the farmers are not fairly treated under the National Policy. I regretted the other day, when speaking, that I had not the figures which would apply to Canada at the time. I submitted figures to show the condition of the United States under their protective system. I showed how the large capitalists of the country were centralizing themselves exclusively in those states and sections where manufacturing industries were carried on to the detriment of other sections of the country. We are asked sometimes why farm lands are decreasing in value. They are decreasing in value for the same reason that other stocks decrease, because the return from the capital invested is becoming so small that no person will purchase at the high prices they would give when the profits was greater. That is quite natural. Just consider the following statement. According to the census of 1891:—

|---------------------------------------|---------------|
| The capital invested amounted to..... | $353,837,000 |
| Value of product | 475,446,000 |
| Cost of raw material..... | 255,983,000 |
| Cost of labour..... | 99,763,000 |
| Number of hands..... | 367,865 |

|--|---------------|
| Amount of profit after deducting raw material..... | $219,463,000 |
| Amount of profit, per hand employed... | 596 |
| Average wages paid each hand..... | 272 |
| Net amount of profit, deducting material and wages, per each hand..... | 324 |
| On capital—34 per cent. | |

Just take the other side and contrast the farmer's investment for the year 1892, taken from the report of the Bureau of Industry, with the manufacturer's given above:—

|--|---------------|
| Capital invested..... | $979,979,000 |
| Value of products, all the crops of every kind..... | 110,563,000 |
| Live stock sold or killed for sale, either on the farm or to others..... | 32,454,000 |
| | <hr/> |
| | 143,017,000 |
| | LESS |
| Cost of seed..... | $12,050,000 |
| Cost of feeding animals sold, and killed and sold..... | 16,000,000 |
| | <hr/> |
| Net proceeds | 114,967,000 |

Now, there are 241,000 farmholders in the country. It would require the labour of another man on an average on each farm, which makes 483,400 hands. Divide the net proceeds by this number of hands, gives the sum of $238, which is the amount made per hand on the farm, while the average wage for farm labourers was $253 a year. The owner of the land making out of his investment and labour $15 less than the labourer that he employed to assist him, while the manufacturer makes $324 profit on every hand employed by him. In the face of such a statement as that, how can it be argued that this National Policy, inaugurated so many years ago, is in the interests of the farmer. But I am going to put the farmers themselves into the witness-box, for it is sometimes said that politicians misrepresent matters. There is a society in the west called the Grangers, which embrace a very large proportion of the farmers. Of late years the farmers have fallen into the Patrons and other associations of a similar character. Some few weeks ago a Grangers' convention was held at Toronto, consisting of delegates from the various Grange organizations in different parts of the country, and an executive committee was ordered to submit this petition which I held in my hand to the Government. I will read the first paragraph in which they describe their own condition:

That fifteen years experience of a protective trade policy had shown no improvement in the condition of the farmer. Prices on nearly all kinds of farm products have shrunk. Farms have declined in value until many are unsaleable and an enormous mortgage debt has been rolled up upon them, in many cases beyond redemption.

Those are the words of the farmers themselves, who ought to know their own condition, whose delegates made a study of the subject and met at Toronto to talk this matter over, and who gave instructions to a special committee to put the facts together and petition the Government, impressing upon it the condition of the agricultural community and asking for relief. Will anyone, after that, say that I am decrying the condition of the farmers, when we hear their own voices calling for relief, informing the world that their property has almost become unsaleable, that they are burdened with taxation and cannot meet their obligations, that they have to borrow money on their chattels in order to try and make both ends meet. There is another point. The hon. gentleman took very strange methods to prove the prosperity of the farming community. One was the statement that the rate of interest was reduced. Did you ever, Sir, hear of low interest during good times? I pause for a reply. Look over for the last twenty-five or thirty years in the history of Canada and point out the most prosperous times, when all classes were prosperous. Was money low then? It was high? Why? Because the avenues of trade and commerce, now depressed, were opened up. Every man who had a few dollars to invest or loan could obtain a high interest, because the borrowers could make reasonable profits. When the times became hard, however, the moneys invested were drawn in, and deposited in the banks, and the rate of interest fell. To prove the soundness of the principle I have enunciated, I will quote the Finance Minister who said that when the Government reduced the rate of interest in the Government savings banks, a large number of people took out their money, a few years ago, because they could make more on it than the rate allowed by the Government, and more than they can make now. Those funds, which they thus invested, are now being withdrawn and deposited again in the Government savings banks at $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent interest, because sources of investment are closing in other avenues of trade. You know, Sir, the history of protection. It never was adopted when the people were reasonably prosperous, but always in a period of financial depression. Look at the United States. In 1862, during the great war which disturbed the conditions of the country, protection came in at the back door to offer its assistance to provide money to meet the exigencies of war. But everybody was willing to accept protection, then. To-day, it may be asked: Why do they continue protection? It is easier by far to introduce protection than to get rid of it. When the manufacturers in that country found they could make money out of the protective system, they grasped the United States by the throat and prevented the people repealing these high duties. Do you suppose to-day that the people are to have their way through the Wilson Bill? Had the people's demands been listened to there would have been great reductions. Two years ago the people pronounced in favour of such a policy. But now we find that the Wilson Bill is to be almost wholly a fizzle, because the manufacturers have taken the representatives by the throat, and, by means of the powerful influence they wield through the capital they have accumulated under the protective system, they have induced a number of the representatives and Senators to prevent the passing of such a Bill as the people demanded. Protection confers upon the manufacturers great privileges. It concentrates capital in the hands of a few, and these few will spend their capital like water in order to place in the legislature members who will carry out their behests. It was said yesterday, Mr. Speaker, that not one single word of fault was found with this revision of the tariff. Why should we find fault with the revision of the tariff so far as it has gone? We have been fighting for it for years, and at last we have driven the Government to bay. It was a case of "Hands up or your life," in the language of the Texan highway robber. The Government knew they must obey or lose their political life. But they hold their life only until they meet the electors, and then their existence will come to an end. It was a case of the burning prairie around them, the flame rushing towards them. To save themselves, they have tried to get out of the track of the fire by burning the prairie around them. But the fire of public opinion is sweeping on, made broader and fiercer by the knowledge of injury done and injustice wrought by many years of high taxation. The result will be that this Government will be swept away and more honest and capable men placed in their position. Sir, you remember a few years ago, gentlemen on the other side, including the Finance Minister, denounced the idea that protection increased the price of manufactured products. We were told we were getting these articles as cheap as if there was no protection at all. But, some two or three years ago, possibly in a moment of weakness, the hon. gentleman placed before this House a proposal which destroyed the platform on which his party had formerly stood. When he reduced the duty on sugar, he declared that he had lightened the burdens of the people: he said that he had, with one stroke of the pen, made such a change as involved the reduction of taxes to the people of this country by three and a half millions of dollars. How could he remove that burden unless that burden had previously existed? For twelve long years we had stood here demanding that taxation should be removed and the consumer relieved of this burden which he had borne in the interests of the refiner. What advantage has the refiner to-day that the refiner did not ten years ago enjoy? Has he not the same machinery in the factory? Does he not get his raw material on equally good terms? Does he not have the benefit of the same class of labour? Hon. gentlemen, at that time, declared that they had taken three and a half millions from the burdens of the people, and now they can no longer argue on hustings and on platforms that the duty upon these articles is not a burden upon the people. The hon. Finance Minister gave himself completely away the other day by admitting that, in the initial stage of protection, manufacturers do take advantage of the duty. That is the first acknowledgment, as far as I know, that the hon. gentleman has made along that line, but he was forced to make it.

An hon. MEMBER. He was getting new life.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). Certainly; how could he help it with so much light being thrown upon the subject by this side. Can a man stand in the blaze of the sun's rays without being heated by them? Can gentlemen opposite stand in the blaze of arguments and philosophical discussion directed at them from this side without being, to some extent, enlightened? Surely they are not in the position of having their minds completely closed against everything of a philosophical character on these economic questions. Therefore, even if we did not get to the other side of the House, we have at least influenced those who are there, and thus have secured benefits which the people could not otherwise have gained. We have cultivated public opinion and brought its force and influence to bear upon gentlemen opposite until they were compelled to yield. Do you remember how, last year, the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Calvin) stood in his place and condemned the National Policy? Do you remember how the hon. member for Compton (Mr. Pope) stood up in his place and condemned the National Policy? Do you remember how the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), who has accepted the National Policy to-day, denounced it in strong terms last year, and said that it did not protect the farmers? Do you remember when the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Cleveland) condemned the National Policy last year? Do you remember how the hon. member for East Durham (Mr. Craig) rose in his place last year and declared that the time had come when there must be a change? And do you remember when another gentleman, at one time one of the leading men of the Conservative party, a man who, when he entered this House, was looked upon as the brains of the party, was looked upon as the coming premier of the country, the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), unable to endure any longer in silence the injury that was being done to the country, was constrained, from conscientious conviction to go back on his party? And do you know that this gentleman is the representative of a large party among the electors? The Government will be defeated through a combination of the circumstances, through the disaffection among their own friends, through the powerful influence of Mr. McCarthy and his friends, and also by the powerful association of farmers who have been compelled to organize to protect themselves against a policy onerous and unjust, and through the strong and philosophical discussion of these questions through the country by the Liberal party. Then the Government will lose its grasp upon power in this country, and men will be put there who are better able to discharge the duties required of them than those who have held the position for the last fifteen years. I know we are told that we have not found fault with the changes. For my part, I congratulate the country upon the changes that have been made; I congratulate the consumers upon the changes that have been made. The only thing I am sorry for is that the Government did not go further and make even greater changes, that I might congratulate the country still more upon the success achieved by the Liberal party, and while I congratulate the people at large, I congratulate the Liberal party as well upon the noble victory they have won by their continued and steadfast advocacy of the truth. While I am pleased that these reductions have been made, it must not be forgotten that, although the farmers and consumers generally will be benefited by these reductions, the manufacturers have a corresponding benefit also. Therefore, the consumers have every right to demand that the Government shall go further and give them still greater relief. Let me point out, Mr. Speaker, a few things I am dissatisfied about. I am dissatisfied that the Government has not seen fit to reduce the duties upon cotton more than they have done. Those duties range from 22½ to 32½ per cent. Raw cotton comes to the manufacturer free of duty. The duty as reduced gives the manufacturers a profit equal to one-fifth to one-third of the entire product.

After Recess.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). Mr. Speaker, when you left the Chair at six o'clock, I was about to point out that the cotton manufacturers of this country had received at the hands of the Government great care and protection during the last number of years at the expense of the consumers of cotton goods in this country. I was going on to show that the Finance Minister, although he was constrained by public opinion to reduce the protective duties on cotton manufactures in this country, will find that in the opinion of the people of this country the reduction has not been sufficient, and they will demand at the hands of the Government in power a larger reduction in their interest than they have made. I believe that the cotton manufacturers of this country are still over-protected. It will be remembered that a few years ago two or three of the present large cotton industries bought up the smaller ones, and two very important and strong institutions have been established—I mean the Dominion Cotton Company and the Montreal Cotton Company. The Dominion Cotton Company a few years ago had such large dividends to give to the stockholders that they were almost ashamed to let the public see from any published document what their dividends were, and they contrived a method by which the public, to a large extent, was to be kept in the dark. They gave to each stockholder a full share of $100 for the small sum of $10, and by so doing increased the capital stock of the company just double what it was previous to that. Now, when I tell you that on that watered stock, a stock watered from 110 to 200, the quotations of the value of the stock, as published in the 'Empire' of Saturday last, were 122 asked by the stockholders and 119 offered by those who wished to purchase, you will be enabled to see at once that the profits must be very large in connection with the cotton industries when their stock sells at such an extraordinary figure. But the quotations in connection with the Montreal Cotton Company stand still higher; the quotation last Saturday was 135 asked, and 125 offered. Now, to my mind large profits must be derived from institutions whose stock is worth so much in the Canadian market; there must be larger dividends than there should be, and those dividends come from the extraordinary profits which these establishments are enabled to withdraw from the people. You know just as well as I do that the cotton manufacturers of this country have entered into a combine, and they regulate the entire market of Canada by either dismissing their men for a certain number of days, or weeks, or months, as the case may be, so that the market is relieved by lessening the product; or, on the other hand, they send a large proportion of their cottons away to be sold in foreign countries in competition with the cotton of other countries. In these ways, as soon as the market is eased in this country, they will do in future as they have done in the past, put up the price of cotton to the Canadian consumer. Therefore, there is an injustice done to the Canadian consumers, who, in the first place, have to pay these large profits on what they purchase here, and then they have to pay enough to make up for the deficiency of the profits which the manufacturers realize in sending their cotton to foreign countries to be sold in competition with foreign cottons. Therefore, I am in a position to say to-night that I am not pleased, and I do not think that a large proportion of the people of this country are pleased with the reductions on cottons. Although they may be gratified that so much has been taken off their shoulders, they are not satisfied with the present reduction, and will look forward to a greater reduction as soon as they have an opportunity of expressing themselves at the polls. Now, Sir, according to the very best authorities, basing my calculation upon the output of the Dominion Cotton Company, so much per spindle, I find that the total output of the cotton factories in this country is about $14,000,000. Now, the duties up to the present time have given them power to charge on certain lines 30 and 35 per cent higher on their product than they would otherwise charge. Now, 30 per cent upon $14,000,000 make about $3,600,000, which the consumers of this country pay more than they would pay if the duty was removed, or one-third more than they would pay if the duty were brought down to 20 per cent, or one-half more than they would pay if the duty was brought down to 15 per cent, by reason of the increased prices placed upon this cotton and sold to the consumers of Canada. In addition to that they have to pay about $1,200,000 duty on imported cottons. Not only that, but when we add the duty to the original price of the cotton, it becomes part and parcel of the original cost to the importer, and he places his percentage, 35 or 40 per cent, as the case may be, upon it, and thus again increases the cost. So when you add that to the increased prices paid to the manufacturers of cotton in this country, the consumers of Canada pay about $4,000,000 in order to protect and sustain these men. Therefore I contend that the Government should deal more liberally with the consumers and a little less liberally with the manufacturers. But, of course, it was evident that they expected more influence and power, and money, from the manufacturing industries than they could expect from the poor farmers, who have no money to give and not much influence, comparatively, to wield during election times. I am not satisfied with the reduction in woollens. A large number of our people in a country like this with an inclement climate, have to purchase woollens to a very great extent, and therefore the bulk of their expenditure for clothing is for woollen goods. Notwithstanding that fact, we find the Government are not willing to reduce the duties below 25 per cent and 35 per cent on those articles. I speak in the name of the consumers, and find fault that the reduction has not been greater and the interests of the consumers have not been more closely looked after. Then, again, I am not satisfied with the reduction in the duty on agricultural implements, and hon. gentlemen opposite will find that the farmers will not be satisfied. When you consider that the manufacturers obtain a corresponding advantage in the shape of a reduction in a large portion of the material brought in and used as raw material, it is obvious that the reduction to the farmers, although large, is not so large as it should be. Under the present system the duties on agricultural machinery of all kinds should be brought down to 15 per cent. I am glad of one change that has occurred, and it means a great victory gained by the Liberal party. We have been for years contending that the system of specific duties was unjust and indefensible, that it imposed heavier duties on the poorer people on account of the fact that the materials used by the rich people are those on which the specific duties are not so high. From year to year we impressed that fact on the Government and the country until we created a feeling in this House and outside of it that brought sufficient influence to bear on the Government to cause them to largely abandon specific duties. I remember year after year it was said: Why do you oppose specific duties? There are specific duties imposed in France, Germany, Belgium, and the United States, and therefore we are perfectly justified in placing specific duties on articles here, and it is much better than the ad valorem system. But now the Government have come to see that the country demands at their hands a change, and I am very glad that the change has come about. It will prove a relief to consumers, especially to those who consume the cheaper goods. We were told by the Finance Minister the other day, and he will remember it well, that this is a free country. I doubted it a little, but he said it was so. He said: Has not this policy been endorsed by the people consecutively at four elections; and if the policy was opposed to the public interests, why did not the people then defeat the party who framed it, and placed it on the statute-book? The answer is plain, and I am sure it will occur to hon. gentlemen opposite. In 1882, the first time the Conservative party went to the country after the National Policy was inaugurated, they did not appeal to the people on the basis of that policy. They know that as well as it is possible for me to tell them. In 1882 they passed the iniquitous Gerrymander Act, in respect of which one of their own men who supported it, has recanted, and announced publicly that it was passed for the purpose of legislating into office men by Act of Parliament rather than by the voice of the people. This country, hon. gentlemen are aware, was divided in such a manner that the Grits were hived and had no power of expressing themselves at the polls, and in 1882 I know that my own county was carved out for the purpose of meeting the requirements of the Conservative party. Sir John Macdonald, who introduced the Bill, did not divide Huron; the Conservatives in that county divided it, and sent a deputation from the county to press that division on the Premier, and the very division they suggested was the division that was carried out, and that was for political purposes. Therefore, the Government did not go before the same jury in 1882 as in 1878, and consequently the verdict of the people was thwarted by the legislation of the Tory party. A few years subsequently a new general election took place. Did the Tory party go before the people on a square issue? They passed the iniquitous Franchise Act for the purpose of keeping Liberal voters off the list and placing their own friends on the list, and by appointing friendly revising officers, securing every possible advantage, and thus in 1887 the people at the general elections were again handicapped, notwithstanding the statement made the other day by the Finance Minister that we are a free people. But passing on we come to the general elections in 1891. Did the Conservatives go before the people on the merits of the National Policy? Not at all. Sir John Macdonald issued a proclamation that he was about to dissolve Parliament. For what purpose? That the Government was about negotiating a reciprocity treaty with the United States, and he wanted a Parliament fresh from the people in order to ratify the treaty that he was about to make between the two countries. Hon. gentlemen opposite who belong to the Maritime Provinces are very well aware that the Government did not go before the people of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick on the question of the National Policy. They will remember that at the cross-roads and on the fences there were placards calling on the people to vote for reciprocity and the Conservative party, leading the people to suppose the Government were about to negotiate the treaty with the United States, and desired the support of the people to carry out that treaty. So the hands of the people have been wholly and entirely tied by the legislative Acts of the Government in power. There is one fact that will prove the contention I put forward. In this House to-day from Ontario there are fifty-nine Conservatives and only thirty-three Liberal members. In that connection I might state that the returns for the last general election corrected by the returns of the by-elections show that 182,000 Liberal votes were polled and 186,000 Conservative votes. If our hands were not tied, and if we had the same power to manifest our influence at the polls as the Conservatives possessed, we would have about 45 members and the Liberal-Conservatives 46 or 47. That would be the position of parties as regards Ontario; but instead of those numbers we have thirty-three and hon. gentlemen opposite fifty-nine. Can any one explain on what principle this condition was brought about, except that we were unfairly treated in the constituencies. Another fact is, that for 3,159 Conservative votes polled they have a member in the House. Why should we have not a member for a like number of votes? The Liberals have a member for every 5,550 Liberal votes polled. These facts prove to a demonstration that the Liberal party has been so gerrymandered and so affected by the legislation of the Government that we have not had the power to exercise our proper influence at the polls, and that is the explanation of the fact that the hon. gentlemen opposite are in office to-day. The Finance Minister the other day endeavoured to justify high tariffs of this country by quoting the high tariffs of other countries. That is the same as a boy justifying his error by saying that other boys commit the same offence. It is no justification for having a high tariff in Canada that the United States have a high tariff. We know the effects of the high tariff in the United States on the farmers. We have been told by hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House that the farmers across the border are ten times worse off than our farmers. They have had a high protective tariff in the United States for about thirty years, and consequently their farmers and labourers are in a worse condition than Canadians of the same class. We have only a half that period of protection in this country, but let the high tariff go on for another fifteen years in Canada and we will be in a far worse condition than we are at the present time. In all the speeches that have been made on the National Policy by hon. gentlemen opposite I have never heard the statement made that protection has increased the wages of the labouring classes of this country. As I understand that a large number of gentlemen on the other side have yet to speak on this question, I hope they will be prepared with figures to show that the labouring classes have been benefited at all by the operation of the National Policy. I find on looking over the average wages of farm labourers in Ontario that the average from 1882 to 1892 was $161 a year, with board, and last year it was down to $156, or $5 lower. I will give you a sample of the increase of wages under free trade in England, and no protective country in the world can show anything like it. Under free trade in England the wages of farm and other labourers went up as follows: The wages of miners under free trade went up 50 per cent; factory hands, 20 to 30 per cent; carpenters, 63 per cent; masons, 47 per cent; bricklayers, 65 per cent; seamen, in Bristol, 66 per cent, in Glasgow, 55 per cent, in Liverpool, 25 to 70 per cent; unskilled labourers, 70 to 90 per cent, and the wages of farm labourers, 60 per cent. Can you show any protective country in the world where the wages of the different classes of the community have increased so rapidly as under the free trade policy of England? I see from the 'Globe' of to-day that there is a strike among the weavers down in the Maritime Provinces. It says:

The weavers of the Halifax cotton factory went on strike yesterday on account of a notice of a 10 per cent reduction in wages to take effect from April. The manager's version is: That about 110 weavers in the factory went out in consequence of a reduction of wages in some lines of goods. They were notified last week that a reduction would take place.

Here we are protecting industries in this country, up to 20 and 30 per cent, and sometimes to the tune of 40 and 50 per cent, and yet we find that the labourers are thrown out of employment or wages reduced in one of the hardest seasons of the year, when we know that the stocks of these companies are quoted in the different newspapers at from 120 to 135 per cent. If we are satisfied to cater to the interest of the manufacturers and against the consumers, it is time that the consumers should understand what position the Government takes. I want to say a few words on the iron tariff. I am not satisfied about that. The pruning-knife was applied to the iron duties, but, in my opinion, it was not inserted deep enough. The Minister of Finance stated the other day that we were on the eve of a great production of iron. His speech was almost as rosy and as hopeful as the speech of Sir Charles Tupper in 1887, when he stated that within the coming four years not less than 25,000 people would be engaged in the iron industries in Canada; but these four or five years have passed and gone, and there has been very little increase in the production of pig iron up to this last year. We were only producing 20,000 or 25,000 tons up to last year, when I am glad to say that the production increased to 48,000 tons. But how much do the Canadian people pay for this production? For this 48,000 tons we pay $96,000 of a bounty. For the duty on the imported iron we pay $253,000, and the increase of price, owing to the consumer of the home product by reason of the duty, was $132,000, making a total of $540,000, which it cost the Canadian people for the production of 48,000 tons of pig iron. Now, the cost of production in Canada of pig iron this last year was $11.85 per ton, and it has cost the people of this country $11.25 per ton to protect it. In view of that incontrovertible fact, I ask any intelligent man if we do not pay too high a price for the production of pig iron in this country. I am sure that the people of this country will not be satisfied to have pig iron protected as it is with $4 a ton duty and $2 a ton bounty to be paid out of their hard earnings. Again, there is an arrangement made to reduce the duty somewhat on puddled bar, which, I understand, is one degree higher in fineness than pig iron. But you will remember, Mr. Speaker, that while the Government proposes to reduce the duty from $9 a ton to $5 a ton, they propose also to give this $2 a ton bounty for five years. There is hardly an article of the farmers' implements that is not composed largely of iron; it is the raw material of their industry, and they demand of Parliament that some greater reduction of duty shall be made in the tariff on this article. Mr. Speaker, I now come to another question and I hope that the hon. member from Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) will be here to assist me. I ask why did not the Government make some reduction in the extraordinary duty on coal oil, which is now about 100 per cent, and in some cases over 100 per cent, if you include the duty on the barrel. I cannot conceive why any industry that is suitable to our country, should need a protective duty of 100 or 120 per cent. If the industry requires that high protection, it is certainly not adapted to this country, and we are only keeping it up at the expense of the consumers. Coal oil is an absolute necessity to every householder in this country, especially to the farmers, labourers of all classes, because in cities and towns, gas or electric light is the means of illuminating, and the richer people are not extensive users of coal oil. Therefore the poorer people of the country are compelled to bear this heavy burden of the coal oil tax. I will prove to you that it falls on their shoulders. Last year we imported of coal oil 5,980,000 gallons. The original cost of that was $437,692; the duty we paid was $430,565. The average price of the best American coal oil was 7½ cents per gallon, including the duty on the barrel, or without the barrel, duty was 6 4-9 cents net. Now, that duty of $430,000 which we paid went into the exchequer, and that is all right enough; But we paid $172,226 as profit to those who handle that oil. Thus, we paid in duty and profit $602,791. Now, the Finance Minister says that he can get Canadian oil at from 9 to 11 cents per gallon in Petrolea, and that the oil men do not take advantage of the duty. A coal oil refiner told me last year that, on the best Canadian oil, they took advantage of the duty, and that they manufactured 2,000,000 gallons of the best No. 1 Canadian Water White, on which the rate of duty would enable the manufacturer to charge $144,000 extra by reason of that duty, and that they manufactured 8,000,000 gallons of No. 2 inferior oil, on which they take the advantage of at least 3 cents a gallon, on account of the duty, which would come to $240,000. The duty and extra profits on coal oil costs the Canadian consumers $986,791, of which $430,565 goes to the Government, and $556,236 goes into the pockets of those who deal in oil—the manufacturer and the middleman. In view of these facts, I hold that it is the duty of the Government to relieve the consumers of this burden. The hon. Finance Minister said that they wanted some revenue. Well, I can point out a way in which revenue can be obtained, and with greater facility, and with greater advantage to the consumers. We often hear members on the other side speaking of free tea and free coffee, and a free breakfast table. I am sometimes nauseated when I hear such stuff. Is not tea a legitimate article of taxation? Why should we make tea free any more than any other article? Will any hon. gentleman on the other side tell me that? We import tea from foreign countries, and every person in this country, both the poor and the rich, uses tea; but every person does not use coal oil. Therefore, with a reasonable duty, say 7 per cent, put on tea, which would be equal to 3 cents on coal oil, the consumer would be relieved to a great extent, and the Finance Minister would have more revenue in the exchequer. Now, I am coming to another article in which I am interested; that is, an article produced in the county from which I come, and I want the Finance Minister specially to note what I have to say. The salt interests of this country chiefly belong to the county of Huron. I understand that salt is placed on the free list, and that our salt-makers have now to compete with the American salt-makers of Michigan and Syracuse. I am glad to say that our salt-makers are perfectly willing to compete, provided they are placed upon a basis of equality with the American salt-makers. But, while the Finance Minister has not interfered with the oil industry in the southern portion of the western peninsula, he has placed on the free list the salt manufactured in the county of Huron, without making any corresponding reduction in any raw material used in the manufacture of salt. The salt-makers use for fuel bituminous coal, on which they are obliged to pay a duty of 60 cents per ton; and now what they ask the Government is this: If you place salt on the free list, be kind enough to place the coal that we use in the manufacture of the salt, also on the free list. The duty of 60 cents a ton is equal to 5 cents a barrel on all the salt produced; and, thus handicapped, our salt manufacturers are not able to compete with the salt-makers of Michigan, who use the refuse of saw-mills as fuel, nor with the salt-makers of Syracuse, who have coal free of duty. I would like the Finance Minister, in all earnestness to consider this matter. I am sorry the Minister of Militia is not in his place. He represents the West Riding of the county of Huron, and he will be held responsible for this, as sure as his name is what it is. I have a letter from one of the principal towns in his riding, written by an officer of the Salt Association, who is one of the strongest Conservatives in that town, in which letter he condemns in strong terms the action of the Government in placing salt on the free list without granting any corresponding reduction in the duty on the fuel the makers have to use. It is the duty of the representative of that riding to stand by its interests. He has stood by the interests of the county of Lambton, but he has forgotten the interests of his own county; and the salt men have to write to outsiders, representing other sections of the county, to get this matter brought to the attention of the Government. I will read a portion of this letter, which is headed, "The Canadian Salt Association," and is dated, "Clinton, March 28th, 1894":

Salt on the free list. Bituminous coal left at 60 cents per ton. This is a piece of the most damnable robbery—I use the language advisedly—ever performed politically. If it be urged that coal dust is free, we don't want it; we have no use for it. We used all last year lump coal. The dust is dust, and valueless. We don't want their protection. Give us free coal, and we will compete with the Americans.

That is a good Canadian sentiment. These men say, give us a fair field; we want no favour. Is it not the duty of the Government to attend to the demand of that large interest, in which tens of thousands of dollars are invested? For years past it was crippled by the introduction of free salt from England and other countries. And now it is crippled because the same advantage is not given to it that is given to other industries whose product is placed on the free list. For instance, barbed wire is reduced three-quarters of a cent a pound, but the raw material from which barbed wire is made is reduced five-ninths of a cent per pound. Agricultural implements are reduced on one side, but the manufacturer gets a corresponding reduction on his raw material on the other side. But salt is placed on the free list without any corresponding reduction being granted on the raw material used in that industry. Now, I ask the Government, in the name of this large industry, in the name of right and justice, to place these men on a proper footing by removing the duty on coal. Does that duty help any person? Does it force Nova Scotia bituminous coal into the county of Huron? Not at all. If the Government do not wish to put all bituminous coal on the free list, let them at least put on the free list such coal as is imported for use in the salt wells. It is only fair to these men, who are striving to meet competition in the open market to enable them to do so on just and equitable terms. I ask the Government to do just and right with that struggling industry. I will draw my remarks to a close. I am sure that the country will be, to a certain extent, glad that such reductions have taken place. They are a part of the burden removed, but the people are not satisfied with the little that has been removed. They believe that the manufacturers have still too great protection, and that the country is not receiving what it should. But this is the first instalment, and if the Government do not, before the next general election, pay the balance due, the country will put men in power who will do what is right and just to develop the interests of the country.

Mr. McINERNEY. In entering the debate at this late stage, I do so without the faintest presumption that anything I may say will tend, in any material degree, to elucidate the question now under discussion, but rather impressed with the idea that as many members of this House as possible, and above all as many members of this House as have never yet put themselves on record, should at as early a date as possible declare their views on the great principles underlying the resolutions introduced by the Minister of

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron).

Finance, and the principles underlying the amendment thereto proposed by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). Now, I believe that the question for discussions at this stage—what is commonly known as the Budget—allows, and happily allows, as far as some gentlemen of the Opposition are concerned, a person to go very far afield. It gives one a sort of roving commission by which he can trace the records of the different parties, from the time of their inception, in this country, and follow them down through the history of their politics, fiscal and otherwise. It gives us—happily for members of the Opposition—great scope for discussion in that particular. Well, until the gentleman who has just taken his seat, addressed the House, I had not heard very much from hon. gentlemen of the Opposition touching the principles and the question really at issue between us. I have heard very little on those principles; I have heard very little with regard to the details which spring incidentally from those principles. But I have heard much and the House has heard much, ably and eloquently expressed by able men—some of the ablest men of this country—on questions really extraneous to the issue now before us. We have heard much on such questions as the question of reciprocity, the question of free trade, the question of blue ruin and its consideration, the question of extravagance of this Government, the question of combines and lastly we have heard them dilate, as they know how, having had much practice in that particular and that being particularly and almost exclusively their cry throughout the country—we have heard them dilate particularly on the extravagance and scandals of this Government. Why, Mr. Speaker, the party of my hon. friends live on scandals and like the worm, it takes its colour from what it feeds on. But not content with speaking on reciprocity, and on these questions I have alluded to, some of the hon. gentlemen—particularly the hon. member for South Grey (Mr. Landerkin), and the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright)—even went so far as to roam into the fields of poetry, and the way in which they quoted, parodied and misapplied Shakespeare was sufficient, in my mind, to make the bones of the great bard of Avon turn in their grave. Why they were altogether unaware, they seemed to pass by the appeal written on the stone slab above the dust of that great man—and they were not afraid to “move his bones.” Now, the hon. member for South Grey treated us to a very extensive quotation—a misapplication of a parody of a certain scene in Julius Caesar, by which he wished to illustrate a certain conspiracy, which he thought took place, not very long ago, in this country. Well, I think, if we on our part wished to talk about conspiracy and the fall of leaders, while he may say we lost our Caesar, we might retort that they lost their Alexander.

And I have heard it said that there was some conspiracy, in which perhaps the hon. member for South Grey may have taken some part, as he was in the Liberal party and in the House at that time. But the hon. member for South Grey does not impress me as very much of a conspirator. He has not the bearing or the air of a Cassius, but there is another character in Shakespeare—the one to which the leader of the Opposition likes from time to time to refer—that appears to me to suit most admirably the hon. gentleman who represents South Grey in this House. If he were among the Merry Wives of Windsor, he would fill a very big basket, and with the hon. member for Wellington (Mr. McMullen), as the sleek and slim Prince Hal, would make merry nights in the streets of the Capital. Now, the different speakers have spoken at various times of reciprocity. That is a subject which interests me to a considerable extent, and a subject on which I will admit I have had something to say in the past.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Hear, hear.

Mr. McINERNEY. My hon. friend says "hear, hear," but he and his friends are hardly willing to admit that they had something to say on it in the past. They seek to conceal that part of their political history. In speaking of reciprocity, I have not read aright the declarations in Parliament of the hon. leaders of the party to which I belong, if I have not come to the conclusion that the Conservative party is also in favour of whatever measure of reciprocity with the United States can be obtained, consistent with our honour, with protection to our industries, and the saving of the interests and rights of the people of this country. But this question of reciprocity has a history. To hear hon. gentlemen opposite speak on it, one who was not at all acquainted with its history, might take it for granted that if they only were in power, if they only possessed the seals of office, they could at a moment's warning at once satisfy the powers at Washington and induce them to pull down the tariff walls, "the Chinese walls" as they are pleased to call them, and bring about at once a treaty of unrestricted reciprocity. This is what these gentlemen have told the country, and they have told it either with a knowledge of the history of the question or in duplicity. I am prone to believe, from the high idea I have of the character of the leaders of the Opposition in this House, that they did it rather in ignorance of the history of this question than from any other motives. They really believed, I know, for several years that, if they were returned to power, they could so impress the governing power at Washington as to bring about a treaty of reciprocity in the best interests of this country. Sir, what is the history of this question and its treatment. We had a reciprocity treaty from 1854 to 1866. The merits of that treaty and the results that flowed from it I will discuss by and by. But, Sir, after 1866 that treaty was brought to an end. It was brought to an end at that time, not on the part of the people of Canada, but on the part of the people of the neighbouring republic. Our neighbours came to the conclusion that it was in their interest to have that treaty in force no longer. But, above all things, I claim this—I claim it fairly before the people of this country, I claim it fearlessly in this House—that the sentiment that, above all others, actuated the people of the United States in the abrogation of that treaty, was a sentiment of unfriendliness to the people of this country was an attempt, continued from that day to this, to force the hands of the people of this country in such a way as to drive them into political union with the republic which lies to the south of us. That, Sir, I believe was the idea in the minds of the American people in 1866, when the Reciprocity Treaty of 1864 was abrogated. But, Sir, it must be remembered that in 1866, I think, immediately after the abrogation of the treaty, Hon. Alexander Galt, afterwards Sir Alexander Galt, and Mr. Howland, accompanied by delegates, both from New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, went to Washington for the purpose of endeavouring to bring about a reciprocity treaty. But in their negotiation they failed. Then, Sir, in 1869, three years afterwards, Sir John Rose went to Washington in a like manner to enter into negotiations for a reciprocity treaty; and he failed. In 1874, while hon. gentlemen who are now in Opposition were in power, they sent one of the ablest men that ever belonged to their party, Hon. George Brown, to Washington to endeavour to negotiate a treaty of reciprocity. The offer he made was very broad and very generous, and drew from the people of Canada many complaints. But Mr. Brown failed in his endeavour. Now, Sir, I think it would be wise to recall at the present time the previous utterances of hon. gentlemen now in Opposition. While hon. gentlemen may say in this House that reciprocity does not mean unrestricted reciprocity, this was their main battle-cry, and was written on their banners in 1891. Though they may say they have forsaken that policy and gone back on it, I say that in every school-house in the country, when an electoral campaign is on hand, these gentlemen still proclaim the glorious results which they say will flow from unrestricted reciprocity. Now what was the proposal of Hon. George Brown in 1874? He was sent to Washington by the Liberal party on a mission of reciprocity. The proposal he made was a very wide and generous one; it was of such a liberal character that it called forth some unfavourable comment from the press in Canada. The following is a summary of the propositions, and, in order that I may not be accused of quoting from documents too unfavourable to gentlemen on the other side, I will say that this is taken from the St. John 'Daily Telegraph,' one of their principal organs in the Maritime Provinces :

The proposition was that for 21 years there should be a free exchange in animals and their products, in the products of the farm, the forest, the mine, and the sea. In addition the following articles were to be struck from the dutiable list of both countries: agricultural implements, axles, boots and shoes, cottons, furniture, all kinds of vehicles, iron and ironware, lead, leather, machines, paper, type, presses, railroad cars, steel, tin, and tweeds. Further, the Atlantic fisheries were to be open to the United States without money compensation; reciprocal coasting was to be granted; the Canadian canals were to be enlarged so as to admit vessels 260 feet in length; the Canadian and American canals were to be free to the vessels of both nations; vessels of all kinds built in either country were to be entitled to registry in both countries; and both countries were to unite in deepening the Lake St. Clair channel, in lighting the waterways, and in propagating the fish.

Well, Sir, these propositions were not adopted; they were not favourably regarded by the people of the United States. In 1877, while the party now in Opposition were ruling this country, in the Dominion Board of Trade, a motion was presented, I think, by the late lamented Thomas White, asking the Government of that day to go down to Washington and endeavour to negotiate a reciprocity treaty in the interests of the people of this country. Well, Sir, nothing ever came of it. As soon as the party of hon. gentlemen opposite went out of power, and from that day down to the present, at different times, at various stages in the history of the question, the party now in power has made efforts in favour of a reasonable, a large and generous measure of reciprocity. And they have failed.

An hon. MEMBER. No, no.

Mr. McINERNEY. I hear somebody say "no." Sir, I have fresh in my mind the reading of a celebrated debate that took place in this House. Hon. gentlemen in Opposition in this House endeavoured to draw from the remark of Sir Charles Tupper the declaration that he had at Washington offered to make a treaty of unrestricted reciprocity. And I remember reading that Sir Charles Tupper declared that his offer was not an offer of unrestricted reciprocity, but an unrestricted offer of reciprocity; and he could not understand the intelligence of the man who could not see the difference between these two.

An hon. MEMBER. Nobody could see it.

Mr. McINERNEY. Nobody could see it? None are so blind as those who will not see. Now, not very long ago, and since the offer made by Sir Charles Tupper, the present

Mr. McINERNEY.

Minister of Finance, with a deputation went to Washington and made an offer of reciprocity to the Government at Washington.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. McINERNEY. My hon. friends on the Opposition side say "hear, hear." The facts are fresh in everybody's mind. And, having heard the hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies), in various places and at various times declare that the hon. Minister of Finance had not made any such offer as he stated in Parliament he had made, it was an extreme delight to me to hear the Finance Minister last session, in making his closing speech on the Budget, I think it was, prove to any unbiassed mind the truth of the assertions he had previously made. I felt, Sir, from his declarations then, I know from his declarations from time to time, declarations made in public and in private by the Minister of Finance, that he was the spokesman for his party in that particular case, and that on that question he was prepared, and is prepared to enter into negotiations for a reciprocity treaty that will not be repugnant to the honour and not fatal to the interests of the people of this country. Now the question of the merits of this treaty is one to which I will ask the attention of the House for just a few minutes. It has seemed a strange thing to me that those people in the Maritime Provinces, who opposed the confederation of the British North American provinces, and who did it on a principle, and impressed with the idea that it would be against their interests to enter a union and thereby fall into competition with the upper provinces, the then Canadian provinces, because then they would have against them the skill and capital and established manufactories of the upper provinces, and who will make use of this argument against this union even to the present day, cannot see the conclusion that must be forced upon them, if they would accept unrestricted reciprocity with the United States. In such a case they would be thrown practically into competition with sixty millions of people with unlimited capital, with the greatest skill of any people in the world and with manufactories that have been established and kept up by over forty years of protection. But in connection with this question of reciprocity, what strikes me again as peculiar is that while the party in power is charged with not obtaining reciprocity with the United States, the hon. gentlemen opposite, when their party was in power, from 1873 to 1878, were also unable to obtain reciprocity for this country. How can they blame the party in power for not obtaining it when they themselves were unable to obtain it during the five years they were in power, when they sent the ablest diplomats in their ranks—and I say this without wishing to disparage the other able men they had—when they sent the ablest men that ever belonged to the Liberal party in this country, to negotiate for such a treaty? Why did they fail at that time? And why having failed when they were in power, do they now attempt to make capital against this Government and this party because they have failed in doing so? What were the reasons given in 1866 and 1874 by the Americans against entering into a treaty of reciprocity with Canada? They claimed that their national debt was so high, that they had to raise such a tremendous revenue for the purpose of paying the interest on that debt, that they could not afford even to allow the products of Canada to go into that country without paying a duty. Well, Sir, let us face this question manfully and honestly, and if it is necessary to bury it, let us bury it out of sight now and for ever. Sir, I cannot understand why a reason that was good in 1874 should not be just as good in 1894; for we know that the American Government since that time have, by the extensive additions to their pension list, added largely to the current expenses of the Government of that country; and their revenue, everybody knows it who reads, is not nearly so buoyant, is not nearly so great, as it was in 1874. Therefore, that less buoyant revenue, that larger expenditure, much larger by the additions to their pension list, have placed them in a position of saying now, much more strongly than they did in 1874: We want so much money to run this Government, we must have it off Canadian products the same as we have it off other countries in the world. Now, Sir, I have heard considerable discussion over the Wilson Bill that is now before the United States Congress. Some of the farmers in this country seem to think that they are going to receive great benefits from the Wilson Bill if its various provisions are crystallized into law. I have my doubts about that. I admit that it might be a good thing for this country to have the 5 cents duty taken off eggs which the farmers send into the United States; it might be a good thing for this country, perhaps, if the duty on potatoes were brought down from 25 to 15 cents a bushel; I admit that it might be a good thing for our farmers if the duty should be lowered on various other articles that they are able to export into the United States. But the events of the last few years have proved one thing conclusively to my mind and that is that it is not for the ultimate good of the Canadian farmer that the raw products of his farm should go freely into the United States market. The farmer is a peculiar being. With him, sufficient unto the day are the evils thereof. Far be it from me to say anything derogatory to their intelligence, but I say that the farmer of this country, if he can raise enough from day to day to keep him, is generally satisfied.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. McINERNEY. Hon. gentlemen say "hear, hear"—in derision, I suppose. It is one of the finest traits, it is one of the finest incidents of agricultural life, that a man is satisfied with little; it is one of the finest features of agricultural life that the man who lives on a farm and digs his living out of the soil, is satisfied with what the soil will give him. He is not avaricious, he does not want the world and all its belongings—like some hon. gentlemen whom I see on the Opposition side of this House.

Mr. MULOCK. That is a kind of policy you want for the farmer—just let him live and have enough to eat.

Mr. McINERNEY. That is the kind of policy that the hon. gentleman who has just spoken wants for the farmers, as I will prove before I get through. The fact of our farmers being shut out from the markets of the United States has forced upon them a spirit of invention, has compelled them to seek new and better methods for turning the raw products of their farm into manufactured articles, and sending them to other markets. That is what this happy necessity has done for him for some years past; it has forced him to make a factory of his farm, it has forced him to turn the raw material on that farm into a manufactured article. A factory is set up on almost every farm all through this country. Everybody knows the proud position our farmers have taken in foreign markets in regard to cheese and butter. Why, Sir, I say it with some degree of pride, though not a sectionalist in any sense of the word, that the county from which I come had the honour, although a factory had only been established there for the short space of eighteen months, of carrying off the gold medal as the highest award for butter at the Chicago Exhibition. Now, that was a grand thing for a county in which the dairying business had only been established for a short time. Sir, I say without fear of contradiction—it has been impressed on my own mind by reasoning out the matter, by observing the course of events, and the results of our tariff position during the last few years—that the farmer of Canada, by the simple fact that he could not get his raw products into the markets of the United States, has risen to a higher plane, has become a better man and more self-reliant than he was at the time when he could sell his raw products in the markets of the United States. I make that proposition, and I say that it may not be altogether an unfortunate thing for the farmer of this country if he is not able to get his raw products across the border free of duty, for that will enable him to turn his attention to other more essential matters which he has neglected in the past. Now, hon. gentlemen opposite, from time to time, maintain that reciprocity can be easily obtained, and they claim it would be a good thing for Canada. Now, it is necessary that they should show how it would be a good thing for Canada. Putting out of the question altogether, if you will, that grand and dominating idea, the Imperial idea, putting out of the question, if you wish, the honour of the people of this country, putting out of the question, if you will, the barren idea, as some people call the sentiment of nationality, that is growing strong and sturdy in the breasts of our people—putting that altogether aside for one moment, I wish to ask hon. gentlemen if they can prove to this House and to this country that this matter of reciprocity is one that would be to the material advantage of the people of this country, that would be to the economical advantage of the people of Canada. I fail to see it, and until it is proved to me, I must confess that I am not willing to accept that conclusion. Why? We have heard much in the past from hon. gentlemen opposite of the argument, that when it is shown that the imports of the country exceeded the exports, the country cannot be prosperous. The balance of trade argument has been used against this Administration from time to time by the hon. gentlemen of the Opposition.

Mr. GILLMOR. No.

Mr. McINERNEY. If that argument has not been used by the hon. gentleman from Charlotte (Mr. Gillmor), he is an honourable exception to the Opposition in this respect, and in many other respects.

Mr. LAURIER. No.

Mr. McINERNEY. He is an honest free trader, and you are not. The hon. member for Quebec East, so far as I can understand, has no central idea by which this country should be governed. Then, if we consider the question from the point of view of the balance of trade, what do we find? The hon. gentleman need not think I am quoting from a document prepared by a gentleman opposed to him, but I am quoting figures from a speech delivered by Hon. Benjamin Butterworth, of Ohio, in the House of Representatives, in May, 1890. At that time Mr. Butterworth, who was a colleague of Mr. McKinley, then representing Ohio, had moved a reciprocity resolution in amendment to the McKinley Bill, and it was to back up his proposition, to endorse and support it, that he gave the figures I am quoting. We find from these figures that from 1854 to 1866, inclusive, the balance of trade against Canada, or rather against the British North America provinces, because at that time we had no Canada such as we have to-day, was in favour of the United States to the extent of $74,830,221.

Mr. CHARLTON. That is wrong.

Mr. McINERNEY. If it would not weary the House, I would read the figures. I will, at all events, read part of the speech delivered by Mr. Butterworth. In that speech

there is one small error, because for 1864 Mr. Butterworth makes the imports from British North America provinces $27,000,000 odd, and it is printed $7,952,401. That is evidently a mistake, because they never fell in value below $20,000,000 in any year from 1854 to 1866, and they could not have possibly been only $7,000,000 odd. What did Mr. Butterworth say? In the course of his speech he said:

Now my friend and colleague was not accurate in his information touching the history of the legislation, the purpose of which was to establish reciprocal trade between United States and Canada, and his figures therefore are misleading and convey to this committee and the country an utterly erroneous impression touching the result of the commerce between United States and the provinces of Canada under the Reciprocity Treaty, 1854-1865. The impression conveyed to the Committee and the country was that the balance of trade was against us.

Mr. CHARLTON. He was mistaken nevertheless. At that period the balance of trade was in favour of Canada.

Mr. McINERNEY. I shall have to quote the figures to convince the doubting Thomases on the other side as to the facts I wish to establish. Mr. Butterworth further said:

At the time spoken of, while the Reciprocity Treaty was in force in the Dominion of Canada, that is the Confederation, had not been formed, but the provinces were none the less there and our trade was carried on with all these provinces, and instead of the balance of trade being against us as he asserts, it was more than $50,000,000 in our favour: and more important still during the forty years ending with 1889 the balance of trade with Canada has been in our favour to the amount of more than $250,000,000.

If hon. gentlemen of the Opposition do not believe these figures are accurate, I would like the figures to be printed in full in my remarks, and I will not trouble the House with them.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). You cannot have that done.

Mr. McINERNEY. I see that this was done by Mr. Butterworth himself, who said that in order to save the time of the House he would not read the figures, but would incorporate them in the report of his speech.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). They can do that in Congress.

Mr. MULOCK. We are under the British flag.

Mr. McINERNEY. Then I will take the time of the House to quote the figures:—

| Year. | Imported into United States from British North America possessions. | Imported into British North America possessions from United States. |
|-------|---|---|
| 1854 | $ 8,784,412 | $26,115,132 |
| 1855 | 15,118,289 | 34,362,188 |
| 1856 | 21,276,614 | 35,764,980 |
| 1857 | 22,108,916 | 27,788,238 |
| 1858 | 15,784,836 | 22,210,837 |
| 18 9 | 19,287,565 | 26,761,618 |
| 1860 | 23,572,797 | 25,871,399 |
| 1861 | 22,724,489 | 28,520,735 |
| 1862 | 18,515,685 | 30,373,212 |
| 1863 | 17,191,217 | 29,680,955 |
| 1864 | 29,608,736 | 27,952,401 |
| 1865 | 33,264,403 | 27,269,158 |
| 1866 | 48,528,628 | 27,905,984 |

The figures for 1864-65-66, conclusively prove and substantiate the argument made on the Government side of the House in connection with reciprocity during the various years. We admit there was during some years of the Reciprocity Treaty a fair degree of prosperity in this country, and that we did during certain years, from 1854 to 1866, ship largely to the United States. Taking these figures as a basis, hon. gentlemen will find that the only years in which we did ship to the United States more than we received from them were 1864-65-66. That is accounted for by the fact that at that time the American war had begun, that it was being carried on, and having lost from their workshops and from their fields, the brawn and the skill of their country, the people of the United States were compelled by the force of circumstances and the magnitude of that war, to send abroad at high rates and great prices for all the products they could possibly obtain for the purpose of feeding their immense army. I say that the figures given by Mr. Butterworth and now cited by me for the years 1864, 1865, and 1866 point that argument conclusively. The point that I wish to make in connection with these figures, is this, and the way I corrected the figures for 1865 shows: That from 1854 to 1866 the balance of trade was against Canada to the tune of $74,830,251. I have spent considerably more time, Mr. Speaker, on that branch of the subject than I intended—

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Do you think that the period of the Reciprocity Treaty was an unmixed evil for Canada?

Mr. McINERNEY. I think it was an unmixed evil for Canada; I think that for many years the reciprocity treaty was one that did not do Canada any good, that it conferred little or no benefit on this country; and I ask the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davies): That if it was such a great thing for Canada as he claims, will he please tell me why, from 1873 to 1878, when the Liberal or Reform party were in power, they could not get a reciprocity treaty.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Will the hon. gentleman permit me to ask him just one question? Why, if reciprocity—

Mr. McINERNEY. That is an Irishman's way of answering a question..

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Why, if it was an unmixed evil, did the hon. gentleman the other day commend the Government for trying to obtain it?

Mr. McINERNEY. The hon. gentleman does not seem to apprehend the sense of my words. The treaty in force from 1854 to 1866 was a treaty based on different lines altogether from the proposal that my hon. friend the Finance Minister made in Washington. The Minister of Finance made a different proposition. He made his proposition, if I understand it, in this way: That the treaty that would be brought about under his proposition must be a treaty having an eye to the interests of the Empire in the first place, inasmuch as we should not put on duties against the interests of the United Kingdom; that it should be a treaty based on lines that would allow a living at least to the manufacturers of this country, and that it should be mainly on agricultural products, the raw products of this country, with such a list of manufactured articles as would be consistent with the best interests and prosperity of Canada. That was his proposition, and the treaty that was in force from 1854 to 1866 was very different.

Mr. LAURIER. I thought it was a renewal of the treaty of 1854 that they wanted.

Mr. McINERNEY. I do not think so, and I do not believe so.

Mr. LAURIER. But the Government say so.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. No.

Mr. McINERNEY. I do not think the Government said so. I was present in this House during the last session of Parliament and I heard what was then said on both sides. I have endeavoured to make myself cognizant, by reading, of what has taken place and I must with all deference, contradict the leader of the Opposition by saying, that what he says now is not what the Minister of Finance said last session. Now, in 1878, after the party then governing the country had failed for five years to bring about reciprocity, at a time when this country was almost in despair, when the people were leaving it in all directions between 1873 and 1878, and rushing off to the manufacturing towns of New England; there was a policy proposed by the late Right Hon. Sir John Macdonald, which was accepted by the people and which has remained from that time to the present the settled fiscal policy of this Dominion. I wish to say a few words with reference to that policy.

Mr. McMULLEN. Did you keep the people at home?

Mr. McINERNEY. Yes, kept them at home in a much greater degree than your party kept them in the years between 1873 and 1878. kept those at home who would have gone out of the country in swarms if that policy had not been inaugurated. I ask any honest man, I ask any honest Reformer or Liberal: What would have been the condition of the workmen of Canada from 1878 to the present time unless factories, and means of wage-earning, and work had been given them under the blessings of the National Policy. Hon. gentlemen of the Opposition talk about the exodus. What did they ever do to stop the exodus, or what could they do to-morrow to stop the exodus? I assert boldly before the people of this country and in the presence of members of the Liberal party here, that the National Policy has done much—no matter how you deal with it in other respects—to keep in the country the brawn, and bone, and muscle, and brain of our people. I do not wish to be understood as denying that we have had an exodus. The point that I wish to make is: That the exodus has been less from 1878 to the present time than it would have been if the National Policy was not in force. That is incontrovertible. It is an axiom, it does not require proof. It is as true as this: That the square erected on the hypotenuse of a right angle triangle is equal to the square erected on the other two sides.

Mr. FORBES. The Liberal party is the square on the hypotenuse.

Mr. McINERNEY. The Liberal party is the square on the base; there is nothing upright at all about it.

Mr. FORBES. The hon. gentleman supported the Liberal party.

Mr. McINERNEY. The hon. gentleman did not.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Might I ask the hon. gentleman what year he began to lean over?

Mr. McINERNEY. I would ask the hon. member to ask the hon. gentleman who sits at his left (Sir Richard Cartwright) what year was it that he began to lean over? The hon. gentleman from Prince Edward Island may be of opinion that consistency is all on his side, but I state this in the presence of the House and in the presence of the country: That I never was a Liberal, that I never belonged to the Liberal party, so-called, that the elections I ran in this country, I ran as an independent, that even during my last election I ran as an independent; but that by the foolish policy adopted by hon. gentlemen on the Liberal side I have been diverted from their side of the House altogether upon these questions. I wish to tell hon. gentlemen here that I have endeavoured with a fair mind, impartially as I could, to study these questions out for myself. I have looked at the record of both parties, I have looked at the policies of both parties, I have endeavoured to study them and to study the men who compose both parties, and I am driven to the conclusion—much as I admire some gentlemen on the Opposition benches—I am driven to the conclusion that in men, in ideas, and in policy, the Government party far surpasses the other. Now, Mr. Speaker, having gone more extensively than perhaps I should have into the question of reciprocity, and the questions that arise from it incidentally, I would like to say a few words on the policy inaugurated in 1879. That policy was promulgated for the purpose of giving new hope to this country. That policy had for its aim, the purpose of giving at least an equal opportunity or a coign of vantage to the producers in Canada over any other country. It may have been, if you like, founded on a certain degree of selfishness; but it had first and above all as its central idea, the interests of this country at heart and in view. I do not think that at this late date there is much necessity to discuss the abstract question of protection and free trade. That has been pretty well threshed out both in the country and in the House, and where hon. gentlemen on the Opposition make a mistake, where the hon. gentleman from Charlotte (Mr. Gillmor) I think makes a mistake, is in treating this question of free trade and protection as an abstract question. This question can only be treated in the light of the conditions and circumstances of this country. It is not an academic question. This is a Legislature, not an academy, in which we are debating a subject of this nature, and we should have constantly and at all times in view the fact that it must be treated from the standpoint of the conditions surrounding us. Now, this policy arose out of the necessities of the situation in 1879. Our people were leaving us in crowds; they were going to the manufacturing centres of the United States. That policy was based upon the necessities of the time, because we had against us at that time what I can at least call American unfriendliness; we had to contend with the newness of the country, the want of capital, and the absence of skilled labour. To make up for the disadvantages of these conditions, it was necessary for us to look around and endeavour to find some plan for meeting them, and this policy was adopted. Now, has it done all that it was intended to do? That it has not performed all that was expected of it is no reason why it should be condemned; but if it has succeeded in any appreciable degree in fulfilling its purpose, then I claim it stands justified and self-approved before the people of Canada. What has it done? It has given our manufacturers a market; it has given us a buoyant revenue; it has built our great public works, or enabled us to build them; it has sustained, and even advanced the credit of the country. Was this country in 1879 to sit down by the wayside hopeless and despairing, or go forward to the fulfilment of its destiny? If this country was ever to become a great nation it was absolutely neccessary that the great wheat fields we possessed in the west should be opened up. In order that the shortest and quickest route to the sea should be obtained for the products of that great territory, it became necessary that a great railway should be built at enormous cost, and, in undertaking that gigantic work, the only thing that enabled us to go into the markets of the world and borrow the necessary money was the fact that the National Policy had given us a largely increased revenue and kept up our national credit. This policy has been national, not only in a fiscal sense: it has been national in the broader sense. It has tended to unite the people of this country by many bonds. And its mission is not yet accomplished, for, having, by railway and canal—constructed at great expense, I admit, but still not greater than the needs of the country demanded—having carried to the seaboard the products of the west, there still remains to be accomplished a measure, which is in the air, which I have heard mooted, of granting a subsidy of three quarters of a million dollars to enable Canada to have a line of steamships across the Atlantic that will enter into fair and open competition with any other line on the face of the globe. This policy has done what? It has, if I may use the term, bridged the Pacific ocean; it has established a line of railway communication from Vancouver to Halifax; it will give us a fast line of steamers from Halifax, or some other Canadian port to England, and it will in time, I am convinced, put a belt around the world, if not, as 'Puck' said, in 60 minutes, at least in 60 days. We are so situated that that policy must be carried out, for this is a national policy, not only in its fiscal aspect, but because it has enabled this country to go forward in the construction of great public works, and to bind the provinces together as one. Now, I think it would be a very strong arraignment of the fiscal part of the National Policy if the contention of hon. gentlemen in Opposition could be proved that the policy is opposed to the interests of the poor man and in favour of the interests of the rich. It is not hard to prove that that is not the case. The figures to prove it have been read to this House already, and it is not necessary for me to read them again. But I will quote the tables for 1878, and compare them with the tables for 1892, to show the amount of taxation imposed on the necessaries of life for the poor. Taking those articles together—and they are very numerous—I find that in 1878 the necessaries of life, largely used by the poor, paid a duty of $5,305,938, while in 1892 they paid a duty of only $3,067,419. On tea the duty paid in 1878 was $611,313, while in 1892 it was only $8,261. Some person on the Opposition side of the House said to-day that tea was not a necessary of life, or as great a necessary as coal oil. That is the blind way in which these hon. gentlemen would seek to guide the legislation of this country. While it may not be said that tea is an absolute necessary of life to the poor man, practically it has come to be so, much more than oil, because in the poorer districts of the larger towns and cities oil is not generally used for lighting purposes. Molasses, which is commonly used by the poor, paid a duty in 1878 to the amount of $235,173, and in 1892 to the amount of only $70,277. Sugar, which has now come to be looked upon by the poor man as one of the necessaries of life, paid duty in 1878 to the amount of $2,515,656, while in 1892 it paid only $77,828. And here it would not be out of place for me to say that I think one of the wisest features in the revision of the tariff which has been brought down to the House is this particular detail. By the removal of the duty on sugar up to 16 Dutch standard, the sugar that will be admitted free is a sugar that is generally used on the table of the poor man—ay, and on that of the middle classes too—as a prime necessary of life. Therefore, this change will be hailed as a boon to the poor people of the country. Now, cotton goods paid a higher duty in 1878 than in 1892, for in 1878 they paid a duty of $1,243,340, and in 1892, $1,115,257. If you turn, Sir, to fancy goods, you will find that while in 1878 they paid a duty of $293,304, in 1892 they paid $493,373. Fruits—not at all a necessary of life for the poor man—paid in 1878 a duty of $182,062, and in 1892, $516,073. Furs, largely used by the richer classes, paid, in 1878, duty to the amount of $40,806, and in 1892, $516,003. Gloves, chiefly kid, paid, in 1892, $238,078. Gold, and silver goods paid, in 1878, $40,496, and in 1892, $72,156. Hats, chiefly silk, paid, in 1878, $184,515, and in 1892, $365,912. Jewellery paid, in 1878, $46,404, and in 1892, $57,718. Musical instruments paid, in 1878, $87,868, and in 1892, $169,368. Perfumery, in 1878, $5,853; in 1892, $10,585. Silks and satins, in 1878, $246,669, and, in 1892, $751,452. And so I might go on through the whole list. I shall finish by taking up tobacco and cigars. In 1878 they paid duties, $1,770,032, and in 1893, $3,326,590. Taking all the articles enumerated in the list, the luxuries of life, used principally by the wealthier classes, paid, in 1878, only $7,379,488, and in 1892, $13,974,877. From this one thing is abundantly clear, and that is that the point made against the tariff that it bore most heavily on the poor man is not true. That brings me, having spoken of the policy in operation from 1878 down to the present, to the revision with which we have to deal just now. I may say here that there are in the Opposition, gentlemen with varying opinions with regard to fiscal policy. The hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Gillmor) differs as widely as the poles asunder from the hon. gentleman from Queen's (Mr. Davies).

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) No.

Mr. McINERNEY. Well, one is an out-and-out free trader, and the other does not tell us exactly what he is. He prides himself on the fact that he never pronounced himself an unrestricted reciprocity man, or a commercial unionist. Well, these gentlemen opposite have varying doctrines, as, I admit, parties in Opposition will have, naturally. I also admit that we on this side have varying degrees of doctrine on the question of protection. We have high protection men, as there are high protection men in the country behind us, and we have men who still cling to the doctrine of protection, but want the tariff brought as low as possible, as long as it will allow the manufacturers to have a fair living and supply the home markets. When the revision of the tariff came up, it must have been expected that numbers of gentlemen supporting the Government would make known their views. And they did so. Hon. gentlemen have taunted us with saying that the Government did not consult their supporters in this House. Sir, they did consult them. They promised their supporters in this House and in the country that they would take them into their confidence, that they would at the earliest possible moment, go round the country, see what the manufacturing industries would stand, and what could be taken off in the interest of the poor man and the agriculturist. The Government did that, and they have brought down a tariff, which, I think, must meet with the approval of all who give it fair consideration. Has not the tariff, in its present condition, a tendency to favour the poor man? I think it has. In taking off the specific duties, and imposing ad valorem duties alone, it goes a long way in that direction. If a poor man buys a hundred yards of cloth, he will, under a specific duty, pay a higher rate than does the rich man who buys the same quantity of cloth, but of more valuable material. But when the ad valorem system alone is imposed, each one is taxed according to the value of the thing he buys.

Mr. EDWARDS. They have been fifteen years finding that out.

Mr. McINERNEY. You do not give them credit for finding it out now; and if they had found it out fifteen years ago, you would still be finding fault. As the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) said, but one thing will satisfy hon. gentlemen opposite and that is that they should occupy the Treasury benches. Now, the fact that the duties have been reduced on the low grades of woollens and cottons, which are largely used by the poor man, will operate to his advantage. The fact that the duty on coal oil has been taken down by the Government in fifteen months to the tune of one-half what it was—

Mr. MULOCK. Oh, oh.

Mr. McINERNEY. Yes; last year the Government did take off to the tune of one-half. They have taken the duty off binder twine to the same extent. And as these things are called the necessaries of life by hon. gentlemen opposite, they should be content with what the Government has done in this respect. The Government have also favoured the farmer in this tariff. There is a cut in the duty on agricultural implements from 35 to 20 per cent, which must be a great boon to the farmers of the Northwest. And I am informed by the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) that the taking off the duty on lumber has knocked on the head the combine that existed in the west, and will be a great boon also to the people going into building operations in that part of the country. Now, I have no doubt that if the Government would go down to the Maritime Provinces to-morrow with the duty on flour removed the people down there would be much better pleased than to have the duty retained. I admit that if we could come down and say the duty on coal oil has been removed altogether, they would be pleased much more than now to see it on. I suppose if you went to the farmers of Ontario and told them that the duty was removed on flour, they would not be as well pleased as if it were kept on. And if we went to the coal miners of Nova Scotia and told them the duty was removed from soft coal, they would not be at all satisfied, so that the different sections must come to this final conclusion, that every part of the country must be taken into consideration in the framing of the tariff, and every section cannot have just what it wants. The widest interests of the country, the national interests of the country must be taken into consideration. I think it may safely be said that that is the view in which the National Policy has been received and approved by the people of the Maritime Provinces. They said: It is true that it does weigh upon us somewhat; still, for the advancement of this country, and in order to carry out the national idea, the ambitious idea we have that this country shall become great, we are willing to make our share of the sacrifice. It has often been stated, and it was stated early in this debate by hon. gentlemen in Opposition, that the combines and manufacturers alone were consulted in private with regard to this tariff, and that they alone were benefited. How can hon. gentlemen, as honest men, make such statements, in the face of the fact, that in the revision that has taken place there has been a large cut in cottons and woollens, and a large cut against manufacturers of agricultural implements? Why, Sir, these changes are made against their interests, against their selfish interests, and we Government supporters, who are for the lowest tariff consistent with a fair living for the manufacturer in this country, hold this as a tariff for the farmer, the agriculturist and the labourer of this country. We have heard all through the country cries about sugar barons and cotton lords. But, Sir, how is that consistent with the fact that a change has been made affecting the interests of the manufacturer of sugar, under which sugar up to 16 Dutch Standard is allowed to come in free? Is that in the interests of the sugar barons? The same thing is to be found with regard to the nail manufacturer; the same thing with regard to the so-called cotton lords. While we view protection as the basic principle of the fiscal policy of this country, we must see that the revenue of the country is not too much impaired. This is a point to which I desire to give just a few minutes' consideration. I cannot understand any tariff based upon the free trade principle advocated by members of the Opposition that would enable hon. gentlemen, if they came into power to-morrow, to raise sufficient revenues to cover the expenditures of this country. The revenue of this country must be at least $35,000,000. Gentlemen of the Opposition wail that it should have remained at about $23,000,000. But they must face the situation as it is, and, should they come into power to-morrow, they would be obliged to recognize that the condition they had to face would not be that of fifteen or sixteen years ago. What is the situation at the present time? We have to face a fixed expenditure of $25,000,000. The interest on the public debt amounts to $10,000,000; then, $2,000,000 must be put into the sinking fund yearly; the sum of $4,000,000 goes for provincial subsidies and $9,000,000 for the collection of our revenue—for our customs and excise officers, for operating our railways and canals, for our post office system and for other services of that kind. Beyond that $25,000,000 we must raise at least $10,000,000, or allow the public service of the country to become impaired. We must raise for the support of our Indians, who are given to us as wards, about $1,000,000 a year. We must raise for the lighthouses that stretch along our coast and up our principal rivers, from $500,000 to $1,000,000 a year. About $1,400,000 is necessary to keep up our militia. Then, for civil government and the administration of the various departments we need an additional sum, which will make up $10,000,000. What would hon. gentlemen in opposition do if they got into power to-morrow? Take away the amount that is expended from year to year on the lighthouses of the country? Take away the amount expended on the Indians of the country? Take away the amount expended in protecting the fisheries? Take away the amount expended on Civil Government? Even if they did appreciably lower the expenditures in this last particular, they would have to raise at least thirty-five million dollars in order to meet the cost of governing and running the country. Now, Mr. Speaker, I cannot conceive of any fiscal policy they could adopt that would take the place of the policy that is now before the country. They might follow the example of some of their friends who are Premiers of some of the provinces; they might do as the Hon. Mr. Peters did in Prince Edward Island; they who are such great friends of the farmers, might put the entire tax upon land, make every acre of land in the country pay a tax; they might emulate the example set them by Mr. Peters, the Liberal Premier of Prince Edward Island, and introduce such a system as that. They might impose direct taxation all along the line, but in that I do not think they would succeed. Now, they have gone back on every policy they ever had. They have gone back and buried free trade, they have gone back on commercial union, they have gone back on unrestricted reciprocity, they have gone back on freer trade, which they proposed last year; and they now stand simply and solely for a revenue tariff. There was a very good story told last year by the Minister of Railways and Canals, in some part of the west, when he said that hon. gentlemen in opposition, with regard to their policies, were like the colony of Sierra Leone with regard to their governors; they always had two, one that they were bringing out alive, and the other that they were sending home dead. Now, it appears to me that is a good illustration of the method of hon. gentlemen opposite. There is another thing that strikes me. They are like the Egyptians who only judge their kings after they are dead. The hon. gentlemen pursue the same method with their policies. After a policy is dead they then hold a post-mortem upon it, and pronounce that it was never any good, and more than that, they seek to disown it. There is no doubt at all in my mind that hon. gentlemen opposite will be driven to pronounce the same judgment upon their new policy. When they go to the country the issue will be clearly drawn. The fight between the two parties will be on that question. If hon. gentlemen opposite are at all consistent they will go to the country on a tariff-for-revenue-policy only, while the Government of the day will go to the country on a tariff having for its central idea protection to the industries and the products of the land. Nobody can be in doubt as to what the result will be. The Opposition will go to the country on a revenue tariff policy that will be the sun in the centre of their solar system, and they will have for nebulous comets floating round through their cloudy sky, creed cries and sectional cries, they will seek to raise prejudices on the question of the North-west schools, they will seek to raise the prejudices of the people of Ontario against the people of Quebec on those questions, and in this way they will endeavour, without having, perhaps, any well defined policy to put before the country, to snatch a verdict from the people. But they will not succeed, they will not come within measurable distance of success, unless their opponents should emulate them in the latter part of their policy. They will not succeed, because the Conservative party, strong in its rank and file, great in its leaders, honest in its ideas, fixed in its principles, will not be buried in the Aceldama of fanaticism;

but on the contrary, their appeal will be to moderate men in all sections of the land, their appeal will be to moderate men of every creed and nationality, on an honest policy, a policy that has always been successful, a policy that has proved itself invincible. Standing upon an honest policy appealing to moderate men of every section of the country, this party will put its foot upon sectionalism and prejudice of every kind, national or religious; and standing under the banner of protection, will fight the great battle before the electors, and in the hour of trial I am certain they will vindicate their policy, and consecrate the triumph of the national idea in the triumph of the National Policy.

Mr. CARROLL. I sincerely congratulate the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat on his eloquent speech. This is not the first time I have had occasion to admire the eloquence of the hon. gentleman. In 1891, when I was fresh out of Laval University, in Quebec, I had occasion to listen to the very eloquent remarks of the hon. gentleman, but then his remarks were in favour of the policy of the hon. leader of the Opposition.

Mr. McINERNEY. What was the policy of the leader of the Opposition?

Mr. CARROLL. I will tell you in a moment. Then, Mr. Speaker, I had occasion to admire the eloquence of the hon. gentleman; to-day, not only have I to admire his eloquence, but the fixity of his principles and the independence of his character, which no party whip can control. The hon. gentleman has gone so far as to attempt to prove the good effects of the Conservative policy. I will not go so far as that, and I will be shorter in my remarks. Hon. gentlemen on the Ministerial side of the House have expressed their views on the commercial policy of the Government. The Finance Minister has outlined the policy of his Government, and has stated what that policy should be for the future. The Finance Minister has spoken on the subject with his usual clearness. Of course, it is the duty of a good Prime Minister to look at the bright side of things, and, above all, to present this bright side to the country. Nobody will blame him for this, for in so doing he plays his role admirably. He has told us that his policy for the last years have been realized, and that his forecasts for the future should also be borne out. He has also indulged in a pompous eulogy of the policy pursued by his party during the last fifteen years. But he has lost a little of his former self-confidence. In 1891 those who raised their voices in favour of freer trade were almost enemies of their country; this year the case is quite altered, and the story altogether different. The Government has told us it intended to reform the tariff. This reform, satisfactory to some, the most of whom are Ministerialists, will not be so to some other friends of the Government, who must, to-day, feel how much truth there is in the old saying that "there is many a slip betwixt the cup and the lip." The member for Assiniboia especially. I thought, wanted to drink a long draught from the cup which contained this reform, but he has been able only to wet his lips with it and he declares himself satisfied. Harassed on all sides, the Ministry does not know where to turn. Within the past eight months, several of the Ministers have spoken in all the provinces, one declaring himself in favour of a radical reform of the tariff, and another pompously proclaiming that the Ministerial party would sink or swim with what has been, and is still, termed the National Policy. The reason for this divergency of opinion at different times is not difficult to understand. As the political barometer rose or fell the Ministers varied. As the deputations presented opposite views, the Government wavered and leaned now to the one side and now to the other. As the Controllers controlled the farmers or failed to control them, the Government controlled or did not control itself. And we can boldly assert that, for the past twelve months and upwards, the Ministry has hesitated in its trade policy, advancing and backing to try and adapt it to every popular wind; now wanting reform, and now repudiating it. It was and is evidently looking for a compass which will help it to steer safely between the requirements of its friends and the legitimate demands of the consumers. During the past year, especially, the Ministers have had no policy. Whether on the head of reform of the tariff or of social or administrative questions, their policy has possessed no fixed character; everything has been left to chance and to uncertainty. They are like the Ministers of Louis Philippe, of whom Cormenin said: "Unskilful and timid steersmen, they hide themselves in bay, and dare not venture into the open sea." The Government wants to make a compromise with the different classes of our people, but in all compromises there is something or somebody sacrificed. And unfortunately the victims in the present instance will again be those who have been the victims for the last fifteen years. The hon. member for Kent referred to the progress of our country, of that great country which stretches from the shores of the Atlantic to those of the Pacific, and to the splendid results obtained at the Columbian Exposition, seeming to claim as a title of glory for the Government the successes won there by the Canadian exhibitors. Canada, undoubtedly, figured admirably at the Chicago Exhibiton and all Canadians rejoice at the fact. For my own part I confess that it is not without a sentiment of pride that I have noticed the triumphs won by them over competitors of the entire world. And I fully and heartily approve the outlay incurred by the Government for the purposes of that exhibition, at which the arts, sciences, and human genius manifested themselves in so many forms. But the merit of our successes does not belong to the Ministry, but rather to the workers with hand and brain, by whom our country is so justly honoured. The Chicago Exhibition was a great object lesson for the benefit of all mankind. The salient feature of that exhibition was the bringing together of all the products of the globe, and the opportunity which this afforded to us to compare these different products, and to study the special aptitudes of the different peoples through their finest and most varied handiwork. It demonstrated the fact that the mechanical processes are the same all over, and that everywhere, also the tendency is to substitute the power of machinery for the skill of the artisan. It also emphasized with irresistible force the advantage of cheap raw materials, and the consequent inconveniences of the systems of customs, which burdens them with taxes, while proving at the same time the profits to be derived from the nations by free trade. It pointed, too, a great lesson against the prejudices fostered by the politicians of the protectionist school in order to maintain an insurmountable and perpetual line of demarkation between the peoples. We had the spectacle of the latter, represented by their foremost manufacturers, distributing with the strictest impartiality the rewards adjudged to merits, loyally recognizing superiority wherever found, with one hand raising the veil from the future by no longer considering labour from the narrow standpoint of nationalities, but from the lofty pedestal of the triumphant principles of freedom of trade. This lesson was given to all the peoples, but more particularly to those who, at all cost, wish to maintain the barriers of prohibition and restriction. What has been the result of the Government's policy during the last fifteen years? What advantages has the country in general derived from the present tariff? I will not go into details, which have been well threshed out, but my impression is protection is the root of the evil. The protectionists of the Tory school take, whenever they think they can find them, the arguments which they use in favour of the economic system which they call the National Policy, and one of their favourite sayings is, that free trade, or freer trade, by abolishing or reducing the customs duties, would deprive the Treasury of its chief source of revenue. Granted that, as a matter of fact, the revenues from the customs count for a very large sum in the public receipts. This argument, which appears forcible at first sight, nevertheless does not logically flow from their economic theories. The aim of the Tory economists is well defined. They want the country to produce all that is needed for home consumption, and to obtain their object they impose upon foreign products such high duties that they cannot compete with the domestic products. The acknowledged object of their policy is, therefore, to exclude foreign products, for if these products do not come into the country, if the object is attained, our customs will yield us no more revenue, the imports alone paying customs duties. The experience of latter years is appealed to in vain. If the customs have yielded and still yield millions to the Treasury, it is because the prohibitive system has not yet fulfilled its mission, and because, in spite of the high duties, the consumers are forced to import what they require; so that the retention of the protective system necessarily and forcibly involves a waiting for the attainment of the end looked forward to by the protectionists, and doing without foreign merchandise. But when the supporters of this system shall have put the crown upon their works, what will become of the customs, a system of expensive administration yielding nothing to the public chest? Will we be less taxed then? No. If the State derives nothing from them, the taxes will not be the less heavy, but the proceeds will go into other hands. The millions which the State will lose will go into the pocket of a few private individuals, which means that protection openly violates the right of property. Its effect is to create taxes which do not benefit the public treasury, but on the contrary only benefit private parties, and from this point of view such taxes are unjust. If it is permissible for a State to force its citizens to sacrifice a portion of their incomes for the general good, it is certainly not permissible for a State to deprive one citizen of the smallest portion of his property and appropriate it to the benefit of another. This is not mere theory. Practical examples are numerous. But we are told that an essential element of our population, the workingmen, benefit by this state of things. Let us, for a moment, look at this aspect of the question. Let us take for example the article of sugar. If we produce all the sugar needed for home consumption, refineries will be required and the workingmen will get employment, that is to say, they will get all the employment that the refiners can give them. But how much will this amount to? It is admitted that if we continue to shut our doors against foreign countries, the latter will sooner or later return us the compliment by retaliating. We shall therefore remain with our limited market of 5,000,000 of souls, which can be more than supplied by five or six refineries, employing at the most 1,500 or 2,000 hands, while 6,000 perhaps would be demanding employment. And what would be the result of this? The refiners, besieged by so many thousands of workingmen out of employment, would only pay whatever wages they pleased, the workingmen preferring to be content with low wages rather than earn nothing at all. Thus, not only would the workingman lose a large portion of the wages out of which he has to pay a tax to his employer, but, as the supply of labour would be far in excess of the demand, he would also have to submit to a reduction of his salary. Here again it is not theory, but facts which prove my contention. We are annually losing by emigration thousands of our citizens, who are expatriating themselves through their inability to find work at home, and yet, notwithstanding this wholesale exodus, wages have not increased and are not increasing. In proof of this it is only necessary to recall the labour programme which triumphed with Mr. Lépine in Montreal East in 1891. The leading plank in this platform demanded the passing of a law for the protection of the wages of the workingman. Consequently, since he asks for legislation that will guarantee him sufficient wages to live upon, protection has not improved his lot. And this deplorable condition of the poorer classes will not improve under that regime. What we need to improve the situation is a vigorous trade that will stimulate our industries. Protection lays an embargo on this trade by proclaiming that we must trade within ourselves, and the foreigner must be shut out of the country. Under this system the producer gains in two ways: on the sale of his products, and on the cost of production, while the consumer and the workingman lose on the price of purchase and in wages. Not only does this apply to the consumer, properly so called, but the protective system produces disastrous effects, even upon many of those who praise its advantages. But the Ministerial orators and papers have told us that if the American Government closes against us the doors of their market, we can export to England. No tariff law can affect the price of the articles which we send to England, where they are admitted free of duty. That the hon. gentleman does not want reciprocity is shown by the fact that since 1891 the Government has made, or seemed to make, efforts to secure a reciprocity treaty with the United States. More than that. In 1891 the ex-Premier, the late Sir John Macdonald, dissolved Parliament on the pretext of consulting the people in regard to the advisability of concluding a treaty of reciprocity in natural products with the United States. The result of the negotiations by our Ministers on the other side of the boundary line is well known. That it is the fault of the Canadian Government that no agreement is possible was shown conclusively last session. Every one admits and regrets the disastrous effects of the bad understanding which prevails between the two countries. We have a surplus of products, and the natural outlet for it is not the markets of Australia or the West Indies, but the market of the United States. Then, protection has proved of no benefit to the farmers. It has enhanced the price of everything which they have to buy. Cotton and woollen goods, as well as agricultural implements, are very high priced. On the other hand, its effect has been not only to diminish, but to virtually destroy the price of what they sell. The Government seemed to understand the unfortunate position to which the most important class of our population has been reduced, but it should not be astonished at it. It is simply reaping what it has sown. For the sake of a mere ephemeral election success, it did not hesitate to appeal to popular prejudices which are so easily aroused. And, during many years, instead of pursuing a policy calculated to bring the two countries closer together in the bonds of peace, one of abuse has been followed. While our party were loyally seeking to come to the rescue of the tiller of the soil, our Ministers and their friends were going through the country appealing to the spirit of nationality and to the loyalty of our farmers. The spirit of nationality and the loyalty of our people are certainly sentiments that even in exaggerated form are honourable, when they have good faith for their basis, but for some years past the politicians have made use of the noblest passions of men for the sake of power. For a certain number of years also, the Government's policy has encouraged the ever-increasing tendency to look to it for favours. Assuredly our population are not lacking in personal dignity and national pride, and it is always more or less painful for an individual to apply to another individual for favour and protection. But, the moment the Government is in question, the case alters and it really seems as if it is regarded as the universal dispenser of all good things to every one. It is truly deplorable to have to note that a great many never think for a moment that the favours so granted must be taken from some quarter, and that there is no Sacramento from which gold can be drawn full handed. We have entered upon a disastrous path under the influence of a far too prevalent thirst for public employment. The diminution of unshackled activity tends more and more to wean the people from the habit of personal effort and the sense of personal responsibility. It leads them to shirk as much as possible all individual initiative, and to look to the Government for everything. Manufacturers, officials, contractors, furnishers, all are supplicants, and all look to the Budget. One wants places, and another premiums; one public grants and another restrictions. A portion of the social body is always demanding, in one shape or another, its pound of flesh from the Budget, forgetting that the Budget can only return what they themselves give to it, and overlooking the fact that the generosity of power can never equal their avidity. The manufacturers take first rank in this class, and are the most eager in the chase after the spoils. Every one has seen by the newspaper reports the complaints which these gentlemen have been making to the Ministry, and the Finance Minister's speech shows that he was unable to resist their appeals. They admit, therefore, that they are unable to withstand competition, that their raw material is inferior, and that their manufactured products are equally so. For there is only this reason which can lead them to fear competition. I cannot understand this inferiority in a country so young and so fruitful in the varied wealth of land and sea as ours is. Our mines and forests, our rivers and our fertile soil do not yield inferior products, and the disturbing persistency of the manufacturers can consequently have but one object—to enrich themselves at the expense of the many. Another effect of the protective system has been to encourage smuggling, which in many quarters has become a regular industry, employing the activity of a large number of persons, undertaking operations of all kinds, and possessing its go-betweens, its brokers, and its intermediaries, among whom customs officers have often been found. Smuggling habituates the people to violate the laws, and to throw upon the good laws a part of the discredit forcibly provoked by bad ones. It constitutes an inequality in the cost of production, and gives an advantage to those who break the law over those who respect it. It necessitates the maintenance, at great expense, by the Government of an excess of customs officers, who are thus doubly unproductive. It has the painful drawback that the courts inflict punishment that shock public sentiment for infringement of laws that are condemned by a large number. The reports show that, far from decreasing, the smuggling trade is on the increase, and it is impossible to calculate the enormous amount annually lost by the treasury. One collector has already expressed an opinion to the effect that half a million yearly is diverted from the revenue and goes into the pockets of the smuggler. And in a country like ours it is almost impossible to keep up a sufficiently large number of preventive officers to put an end to this illegal traffic. Protection has also resulted in withdrawing from the cultivation of the land the capital formerly invested therein, and diverting it into channels of manufacturing industry. The capitalists are perfectly right, from their own standpoint, in doing this. It is admitted to-day that the returns from the cultivation of the land do not yield five per cent on the capital invested, and this is the reason why such an enormous displacement of the national wealth, as has been noted for some years past, has taken place. This explains the constant and regular dispeopling of our rural districts, and the exodus towards the manufacturing centres, which is, perhaps, the greatest ill under which our country labours. Canada is essentially an agricultural country, and the words of the Minister fully applied to it, as fully as they did to the Kingdom of France. "Agriculture is the foundation of our wealth." Our agriculture is not yet very developed. Improved machinery has penetrated to the most distant settlements, but has not yet become general. The labourer does not extract from the soil all that it is capable of yielding, and it is the duty of the Government to take under its fostering wing the mother industry, without which all the others are as nothing, to stimulate and encourage it, and to take such measures as will keep the strong, laborious and virile youth of our rural districts at home. I do not pretend that protection is the sole cause of the exodus from the rural districts, but, instead of commencing by protecting the foundation of our wealth, manufacturing industries have monopolized all our protection. It is said that the exodus from the rural districts to the cities is not confined to this country, but that all countries are suffering from it, and that there is an incomprehensible force which attracts the people of the rural districts to the cities. There is some truth in this, but like causes produce like effects. It is unfortunately the tendency of the people of our age. But, on the other hand, who is to blame for it, if not those who, by their legislation, have favoured this tendency? In his glowing eulogy of our great riches, the Finance Minister did not forget our railways. True, they have been an instrument of progress. They have bound together the different provinces, but they have also been used as a powerful instrument to strengthen the weak and confirm the strong. Of the railway subsidies for fifteen years past, the Government has always utilized a part to create electoral funds, those indispensable sinews of the Ministerial war. We have seen parties entirely impecunious float companies, apply to Parliament, obtain charters to construct railways—parties who did not subscribe one cent to capital getting appointed to the presidency of companies, some fine day selling out their charter and retiring from business, after having secured incomes out of the public funds and having given nothing to the public in return. This policy has caused a loss to the country of millions, which have been absorbed by such companies as I have described, and which have also served to strengthen the faltering faith of a number of federal electors. We have only been able to learn something of these operations when the friends have quarrelled among themselves, and yet, though in that way only a corner of the veil has been lifted, we have been allowed to get a glimpse at the gigantic corruption which ravaged this country for a number of years. I did not intend to follow my hon. friend from Kent, N.B. (Mr. McInerney), in his argument, but he has gone a little too far. He said that we appealed to prejudices. No, Sir, the Liberal party has no prejudices, but they accuse the Government of not having taken a firm stand on questions which indirectly affect the economic conditions of this Dominion. Be it rightly or wrongly, a portion of the population of this Dominion is diverted from going from the east to the west because of the laws regarding education. I am not prejudiced in any way, but my opinions on this question are these: They are the opinions of an ex-Finance Minister who played an important role in this country. Sir Alexander T. Galt once said:

There could not be a greater injustice than that which would force a population to educate its children in a manner opposed to its religious beliefs.

And the ex-Finance Minister was right, for teaching is society in labour; it is the morals, the sentiments, the tendencies, and the works of the generations which hasten towards the threshold of the future. It is impossible to encroach on these tendencies without striking a blow at freedom. What then is the reason which caused the Manitoba Government to act as it has? The interest of the province, will say its defenders—the interest of the province, the interest of the country. Such arguments have ever been used, and by unrestrained rulers abused. Under ancient systems the interest of the country served to justify all the abuses of force committed by a powerful republic, to the detriment of weaker nations. It is in the name of the country's interest that treaties entered into by Roman Republics on the morrow of unexpected reverses were annulled and considered not binding by the Roman people. It is in the name of this same interest that allied powers, on the most futile pretexts, assimilated conquered nations, and treated them as such. When the Greek and Roman tribunes were scattered and the Agora and Forum deserted, the unrestrained masters justified all by the means of the same argument. Why, it is the same argument which prompted the St. Bartholomew and the revocation of the edict of Nantes. In presence of this pretended interest of the state all reasons must disappear. It is the supreme law of the Romans of old, and unfortunately it is the same law that obtains in parts of this country. Sir, I blame the Government, but the Government is not only to blame. A portion of the press of this country has rendered the task of this Government all the more difficult. The influence of the press is well known. The press is the weapon and the sinew of modern society. A French writer said in 1830 that it was in France more a social necessity than a political institution. Since these words were spoken the child of that time has become a veritable giant, who, with its two agents, steam and electricity, is henceforth to sway the world. The press is the indispensable support of our political institutions. It exercises a supreme influence over the minds and movements of men, and if it had in this instance generally given its support to the right, it would have greatly promoted the solution of the question. I want to read to this House an extract from an article written in Scribner's Magazine, by

Mr. CARROLL.

Mr. Putnam, the American editor, relating to the question of language and school:

When a native of New York, in the course of a half hour's confinement on an elevated railway train can detect in the speech of his fellow-prisoners a half dozen languages besides his own, he may be fairly confident of the cosmopolitan character of the people of his town. It is not an uncommon thing in such enforced intimacy to overhear French, German, Italian, Scandinavian, Spanish, Chinese, and perhaps one of the obscure tongues that Asia Minor contributes. It happened to me only recently on a Sunday afternoon, when possibly the holiday habit had brought out the foreign elements in disproportionate force. One fact in the polyglot entertainment struck me—the frequency with which, in the babbling stream of every foreign tongue—even the Chinese—an occasional English word would be perceptible; most often it was the "yes" or "no," or some minor phrase of the syllable or two. Clearly these were the signs of a half-conscious adjustment of the speakers to their environment, an adjustment barely begun, but which I like to think must go on with important results.

But how fast and how far? That is an interesting question. Many of these people who come to us have shown pretty bitter hatred towards each other at home. The German and the Frenchman, the Frenchman and the Italian, the Irish and the English, the English and French Canadians, have for a long time now cherished that 'bad blood' and spilled some now and again in war or in riot. Will they learn to live in peace with each other and with us, and come to be a fairly steady-going and contented and well-to-do people? I am inclined to think that in the long run they will. My confidence is not altogether in the beneficent effect of 'free institutions,' though these count for much, but also in that 'wholesome neglect' which is the permanent character of our political organization. It is fortunate for us that we have not put the management of the infinitely varied interest of our people in any one set of hands, but have been able to let them gather in groups. * * * We do not, perhaps, have as much national feeling as is desirable, and our life, as a people, is not so picturesque, but on the whole it is not a bad arrangement for the old-fashioned purpose of the greatest good of the greatest number.

Sir, these sentiments, I hope—not only I hope, but I am sure—are the sentiments of the Liberal party in Canada. They were the sentiments of Lafontaine and Baldwin, of Blake and Dorion, those pioneers of these principles in Canada. I am sure that they are the sentiments of those who sit beside me under the leadership of one who, if he were not in his place in this House to-night, I would proclaim as the greatest among those who have preached the gospel of peace and goodwill in this Dominion of Canada. Our commercial policy has been attacked; our social policy has been attacked; but, Sir, the Liberal party, though success has not always crowned its efforts, will continue in the path that seems to us to be the straight and the right one, never forgetting that in the long run the immutable truth will prevail.

Mr. SEMPLE. Mr. Speaker, I have listened with a great deal of pleasure to the speech that was so well delivered by the hon. member for Kent (Mr. McInerney). I also admired very much the speech of the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Hazen). I think it was remarkable that two hon. gentlemen bearing every evidence of the greatest prosperity should speak on behalf of a province in which there appears to be to a certain extent a lack of prosperity. No doubt it was to show the contrast, and if a person wanted counsellors to speak on his behalf, those hon. gentlemen, who spoke so well, would no doubt be the very best exponents of a bad case that could be got. I do not intend to follow in the line of those hon. gentlemen; but I propose to speak from the farmer's standpoint, on that branch of the subject with which I am best acquainted. The hon. Finance Minister, in his Budget speech, gave expression to an old and exploded theory, which was given up by the farmers years ago. He stated that in 1877, 1878 and 1879 about $10,500,000 more, on the average, was exported from the United States to Canada than in the last three years. Well, Sir, I took the trouble to investigate the subject, and I found that there was no basis for that statement. I remember hearing that same statement made about the time the National Policy was originally propounded. It was said a great deal of grain—Indian corn, oats and wheat—comes into Canada from the United States, and if we can only shut this out, we shall be conferring a benefit on the farmers of this country. They had the opportunity to do so, but it had not the effect intended, for since then prices have got lower nearly every year. I shall just show the effect that the import of about $10,000,000 a year from the United States had on the country, and I think that should be enough to explode the theory of hon. gentlemen opposite if any one believed in it. The Minister of Finance told us that in the last three years about $10,500,000 less of the products of the United States were imported to this country than during the last three years under a revenue tariff, and dilated on the benefit that was to the farmer. Now, we imported into Canada in 1878, 5,635,403 bushels of wheat, value $6,510,131, costing at the rate of $1.15 a bushel. The same year we exported to Great Britain, not the produce of Canada, 4,112,894 bushels, value $6,253,703, which was sold at $1.52 per bushel. In this direction there was a gain of 37 cents per bushel to those handling that grain, or $1,521,770. Then there was Indian corn, the importation of which they said was a disadvantage to the farmer. In the same year there was imported of Indian corn from the United States 7,387,590 bushels, value $3,535,579, purchased at a cost of 47 cents per bushel. Then we exported corn, not the produce of Canada, to the amount of 3,986,905 bushels, value $2,677,752, bringing 67 cents per bushel, or a gain of .20 cents per bushel, making in all $797,380. We also exported peas, the product of Canada, to Great Britain, 1,684,991 bushels, value $1,429,425, at 85 cents per bushel. Therefore, instead of these importations being a disadvantage to the farmer it was an advantage. It brought in money to the shippers and forwarders, and a large number of people were engaged in the handling of that grain. It is also well known that until the National Policy was propounded, we never heard that this importation of grain was injurious to Canada, and it was only when the National Policy was first advanced that this pretension was put forward. The only effect of the duties has been to stop our produce merchants from buying where they could buy cheaply. In the United States they have not as good barns on the farms on their prairies as we have in this country. Consequently it is an advantage for them to sell early to the Canadians, who buy cheaply and hold the grain for a profit. But now our merchants have to sell in bond nearly the same amount of goods come in as before, only they have to sell in bond, and if they wish to sell a hundred barrels of oatmeal they have to pay 10 cents duty on each bushel of oats imported. This causes the farmer to pay $1 a barrel more for his oatmeal to the miller in each case. In fact, he has to pay a larger price than could be realized by the miller in the markets of Great Britain. When I heard the speech of the Finance Minister in dealing with the reductions in the tariff I was very glad to hear that a reduction was made in agricultural implements from 35 to 20 per cent. The Montreal 'Gazette,' which supports the Government, says this is virtually a revenue tariff. Well, as such, we must commend that tariff. What the Liberal party has always contended for is a revenue tariff as much as possible. The Government are doing what the Liberal party has contended for ever since 1878 in that respect. The Minister of Railways and Canals said that no fault has been found with the tariff except in a general way—that the Opposition specified no articles on which they wished the duty reduced. I will remind him of two articles—binder twine and barbed wire. The article of binder twine was discussed in this House last session to a large extent, and it is unfair to the farming community that while the Government have boasted that raw material of all kinds should be free to the manufacturers, and that the fishermen should have their salt and fishing tackle free, the binder twine is not free, although it is the raw material of the farmers; his grain cannot be put into the barn until it is used. I note that the United States Congress has put binder twine on the free list, so that even in the United States more regard is had for the farmer than in this country. While the duty on agricultural implements is being reduced, the duty on binder twine and barbed wire shows conclusively that the protective principle is maintained in those respects, and this tariff is therefore nothing but a mongrel tariff. Barbed wire is a very important article ; in the older provinces, when the first fence begins to fall down, people need to have the barbed wire as cheap as possible. The hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), in an eloquent speech last session, showed conclusively that in Manitoba and the North-west, 6 cents and 7 cents had to be paid, and of that 1½ cents was due to the duty. Now, Sir, only a small portion of the binding twine used in this country is imported, the duties paid amounting to only about $33,000 in round numbers. The amount for barbed wire and buckthorn wire collected does not amount to $6,000. So that there is less than $40,000 of revenue from barbed wire and binding twine. This makes it plain that it is not for the purpose of revenue that the Government maintains this duty, but to afford protection to the manufacturers at the expense of the consumers, who are obliged to buy large quantities of these goods. I am very glad, Sir, that some of the Conservatives have agreed with us in the statements that we have made. The hon. member for Assiniboia has pointed out that you cannot protect wheat ; that the price of wheat depends upon the price at Liverpool. So it is, Sir, with all the produce that goes to Liverpool. The hon. Controller of Customs gave some figures of these exports, specifying the articles and showing that the total was about $39,000,000. When that produce reaches Liverpool it must compete with what is sent there from every portion of the world. And if the farmer is thus called upon to face the competitions of the market abroad, why should he be called upon to give to manufacturers the protection which cannot be given to himself. A celebrated writer in the United States said truly that the only protection any person required in the United States was protection against the violence of others—this applies to all countries. All the people in a country cannot be benefited equally by protection. When protection is granted to a manufacturer it necessarily means that an undue advantage is given to him, and the profits or advantages he gets must be the result of excessive charges he has been able to collect from the consumers of the country. I was very glad to read the remarks of the Finance Minister when he spoke about the boon he was about to confer on Manitoba. I shall read his words and then ask an opportunity to make a few comments :—

With reference to woods, logs and round, un-manufactured timber, not specially enumerated or provided for in this act ; firewood, handle bolts, railroad ties, ship timber and ship-planking not specially provided for in this act, and other woods as mentioned in the schedule, are free. This a special concession and I hope will prove a useful one in Manitoba and the North-west. There was no one feature of our examination into the condition of things in that part of the country, which impressed itself so forcibly on my mind as the combine which existed for the distribution and sale of lumber. Every town was parcelled out. One or two men were selected, to whom was given the monopoly of selling in each place. The prices were fixed, and if they sold a fraction of a cent under the fixed prices, their privilege was taken away and given to somebody else. That monopoly bore heavily on the people in that country, where lumber is so essentially necessary in the making of barns and houses, and I came to the conclusion that if possible help would be given by putting lumber upon the free list, and that has been done.

That is what every Liberal has always declared, that the effectual way to meet and abolish the combines was to abolish their monopoly by taking off the duty, just as the Finance Minister has done in this case. It will be remembered that a few years ago a committee was appointed by this House to investigate the subject of the combines. A great deal of evidence was taken before that committee, which proved that combines existed, and, as Parliament felt that this should not be, a law was passed, the best that the skill of Parliament could devise, in order to kill these combines. That law has now been in force for a number of years, but we do not hear of its having much effect. Had the Government simply taken off the duty, the law would have been unnecessary, for the combines could not have existed without the protection afforded them by the duty. When this policy is followed combines will cease and consumers will be able to buy their goods at the true market value. Now, Sir, it has been said that Great Britain is almost our only market and that our trade with that market is increasing every year. To a certain extent that is true. I would like to read a table I have prepared on this subject. While it is true that Great Britain is the natural market for a large number of staple articles that the farmer has to sell, it is likewise true that it is not the most profitable market for many other articles produced by the farmers. For our wheat, peas, oats, cheese, butter, bacon, horned cattle and apples England is the proper market, as the following report will show :

| | Exports. | Value. |
|------------------------------|-------------|------------|
| | Bushels. | £ |
| Wheat—Great Britain | 8,617,967 | 6,666,382 |

In the item of apples, we exported last year to Great Britain 946,063 barrels, of the value of $2,247,482; to the United States we exported 28,302 barrels, of the value of $447,249. These are the staple articles the natural market for which is Great Britain. We expect this state of things will continue; but, while that is the case, every farmer who has studied the question knows very well that there is a large number of articles the proper market for which is the United States. I will read from the Trade and Navigation Returns a list of a number of articles the proper market for which is the United States, showing our exports to both Great Britain and the United States:

Mr. McNEILL. Does the hon. gentleman happen to know how much barley was exported from the United States to England last year?

Mr. SEMPLE. I do not know. That is another question that concerns the United States more than this country.

Mr. McNEILL. I did not desire to interrupt the hon. gentleman, but I wished to remind him of the fact that the United States is exporting an enormous quantity of barley to England at the present time.

Mr. SEMPLE. Well, we are only concerned as to the trade between Canada and the United States. But I tell the hon. gentleman, that the McKinley tariff has ruined the barley market in this country. Although the Government has taken credit for putting a duty on the pork, and flour, and beef that has come into Canada, it was a blue day for the Dominion of Canada when that Act was passed in 1890. The United States and Canada generally copy each other. The action of the McKinley tariff has destroyed our barley market. The barley that was sold to all countries last year amounted to less than one million dollars, while Ontario alone in 1889, before the McKinley tariff, exported to the United States barley to the value of $6,300,000, in round numbers. We have lost on our barley, in one year, over $5,000,000; we have lost on horses over $1,000,000 yearly; we have lost on eggs $1,000,000 yearly. Now, I could hardly understand why it was that the Controller of Inland Revenue made this statement in his address:

Now, if the United States ever did anything that was for the benefit of this country, it was the passing of the McKinley Bill, enacted, I think, in a spirit of unfriendliness, at all events, not in a neighbourly spirit.

The hon. gentleman, if reports are correct, has been all over the country asking the farmers what they need. It seemed to me that the farmers that came before him had been loaded up for the occasion, because I have not met a single farmer opposed to tariff reform who does not say that it is to our advantage to have trade as free as possible with our neighbours across the line. The United States is our natural market for many articles. It is a convenient market—we can raise what they need, and what they buy from us is the best article obtainable at the cheapest price; and this trade is carried on notwithstanding the erection of almost a prohibitory wall between the two countries, the imposition of duties amounting to $4 per ton on hay, $30 on a horse worth $100, $45 on one worth $150 and $60 on one worth $200. Nevertheless our farmers find their best market in the United States, with its almost prohibitory limit, although there is a free market in England. On every sheep a duty is levied of 75 cents, and yet over $1,000,000 worth is sold yearly in the American market. On potatoes 25 cents per bushel duty. There was a time when the National Policy had some advocates in the country, but they are less in numbers daily. That is the reason why the Government have endeavoured to make it appear to the people that they are going to reduce the tariff. The people certainly want tariff reduction. Hon. gentlemen opposite have acknowledged in unmistakable language that the reduction of the tariff gives goods at cheaper rates to consumers. Hon. members heard the Finance Minister make the statement last session that $3,500,000 were taken from the people in burdens of taxation. We have been further informed this session that a further reduction has been made of $1,500,000, or a total of $5,000,000. If $5,000,000 have been taken off in two years, it would indicate that over $70,000,000 have been extracted from the pockets of the consumers since the inception of the National Policy. If $70,000,000 were so taken from the people in that time and only reductions made in duties on sugar and a few other articles, how much greater would the reduction have been if the tariff had been brought down to the basis of revenue requirements. However, we must be thankful for small mercies. The Government is advancing in a correct direction, and so long as it continues in that direction, it will be a matter of consolation to members of the Opposition. Hon. gentlemen opposite are certainly carrying out the views which the Opposition have long advocated, and we only hope that they will go further as opportunity may occur. We shall be glad to see the principles we advocate to-day carried into effect, whether we are in opposition or not, so long as the country is benefited and the prosperity of the people increased.

Mr. SPROULE moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

VACANCIES IN THE SENATE.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I was asked to-day to give the dates of the vacancies that occurred in the Senate. I find that one of the existing vacancies took place in 1890, two in 1891, one in 1892, two in 1893 and one in 1894.

Mr. LAURIER. Will the hon. gentleman please give the dates of the appointments of their successors?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Yes, as soon as the appointments are made.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and the House adjourned at 11.20 p.m.

Mr. SEMPLE.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, 3rd April, 1894.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 20) respecting the Wood Mountain and Qu'Appelle Railway Company.—(Mr. McDonald, Assiniboia.)

Bill (No. 21) to incorporate the St. Clair and Erie Ship Canal Company.—(Mr. Tisdale.)

Bill (No. 22) respecting the Winnipeg and Hudson Bay Railway Company, and to change the name thereof to the Winnipeg Great Northern Railway Company.—(Mr. Ross, Lisgar.)

Bill (No. 24) to reduce, from twelve to seven, the number of Grand Jurors necessary to find a true bill in the province of Ontario.—(Mr. Edgar.)

EDMONTON TRAMWAY.

Mr. DAVIS (Alberta) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 23) respecting ordinance No. 32 of 1893, of the North-west Territories, empowering the municipality of the town of Edmonton to construct and operate a tramway.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I would like to inquire of the First Minister, as a matter of legal opinion, whether tramways are not within the authority of the North-west Council. Railways, of course, are not; but I should have imagined that tramways might be within their authority.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. There are no words in the Act by which the distinction could be made, I fancy; and the application is made here, probably, on account of a doubt as to the power of the North-west Assembly.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

ADMISSION OF COAL OIL IN TANKS.

Mr. LANDERKIN asked, At how many places in Ontario where coal oil is admitted in tanks, is it now barrelled? What is the name of each place?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). Coal oil which is admitted in tanks in Ontario is barrelled at the undermentioned places: London, St. Thomas, Detroit, Stratford, Hamilton, Toronto, Toronto Junction, Chippewa, Whitby, Peterboro', Port Hope, Belleville, Kingston, Brockville, Smith's Falls and Ottawa—in all, 16.

INVERNESS, N.S., MAILS.

Mr. FRASER asked, What were the amounts paid per month to H. A. Archibald, mail contractor, for carrying mails in the county of Inverness, during the last twelve months ending the 28th day of February last? Was the work done by contract?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Payment was not made to Mr. Archibald by the month but by the quarter. The last payment was for the quarter ended 31st December, 1893. The aggregate amount paid was $2,447.45. The work was done partly by contract, partly by temporary agreement pending contract.

BALANCE DUE THE MISSISSAUGAS.

Mr. PATERSON (Prant) asked, What is the amount of the Indian Trust Fund at the credit of the Mississaugas of the Credit, as per Auditor General's Report and Report of Department of Indian Affairs, respectively? Is there a difference in the balances of these two reports? What is the amount of such difference, which balance is the correct one, and how is the difference to be explained?

Mr. DALY. The balance at the credit of the Mississaugas, per Report of Department of Indian Affairs, June 30th, 1893, was: Capital, $113,636.14; interest, $706.97; total, $114,343.11. The balance per Auditor General's Report, June 30th, 1893, was $86,344.24. There is a difference of $27,998.87. The balance as per Auditor General's Report is correct. An Order in Council of the 30th June, 1884, authorized the Department of Indian Affairs to credit the Mississaugas of the Credit with $68,672.01, an amount due the tribe by the old province of Canada for land sold. That amount was accordingly credited to these Indians in the books of the department, and they were allowed interest thereon. But the Auditor General took no action on the Order in Council, and hence the difference in the showing of his report and that of the Department of Indian Affairs as to the balance at the credit of the Mississaugas. On a report from the Auditor General, the Treasury Board directed, on the 31st March last, that, as the amount had not been collected by the Dominion Government, but formed one of the unsettled accounts between the late province of Canada and the Dominion, the original entry made by the Department of Indian Affairs should be reversed and the over-expenditure of interest made good if possible. The question of the liability of the old province of Canada for the amount is now before the arbitrators appointed to settle the disputed accounts.

POST OFFICE OF ST. ROCH, QUEBEC.

Mr. CHOQUETTE (Translation) asked, 1. Who is the owner of the property leased by the Government for the post office of St. Roch, Quebec? 2. What is the rental? 3. To whom is the said rent paid? 4. Since what date has the lease existed?

Sir A. P. CARON (Translation.) 1. The lease of the property for the post office of St. Roch, Quebec, was signed by the Postmaster General and Felix Eugène Turcotte. 2. The rental is $700 a year. 3. The rent is paid to Mr. F. E. Turcotte. 4. The lease exists since the 1st of May, 1893.

CATTLE DISEASE IN GREY.

Mr. FAIRBAIRN. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like from the Government some information respecting a statement made yesterday by the hon. member for South Grey (Mr. Landerkin), that the cattle disease was prevalent in the county of Grey. That is a very damaging statement, and is calculated to do a great deal of harm to the farmers throughout this country who are engaged in cattle raising. I feel individually concerned in this matter as well as publicly, and I want to know if the Government are prepared to make any statement of facts contradicting the allegation that this disease exists among our cattle.

Mr. FOSTER. In answer to the hon. gentleman's question, I wish to say that the hon. member for Grey simply revived an old matter which had already been attended to. About a month ago the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) sent in a report containing a diagnosis of the symptoms of a disease amongst cattle in that county, undoubtedly the same as referred to by the hon. member for South Grey (Mr. Landerkin). The letter was immediately referred to Prof. Andrew Smith, of Toronto, the Chief Veterinary Inspector of the Department of Agriculture for the province of Ontario, who was instructed to make an immediate investigation and report. Prof. Smith did so, replying that he had previous notice of the disease referred to, stating that he had been in communication, both personally and by letter, with veterinary surgeons practising in the district, in relation to such disease. He reported that the disease was confined to the limbs and feet, that it was due to local causes. He said he had been examining the provender, and had in that discovered the probable cause, namely, gangrenous ergotism. He added that there was no cause for alarm, and that he would make a further investigation and report. This morning the following telegram was received from Prof. Smith:—

Toronto, April 3, 1894.

To the Minister of Agriculture:

I notice that the subject of cattle disease in the county of Grey was brought up in the House yesterday. The disease is non-contagious, and due to local causes, and there is no cause for alarm.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS COMMITTEE.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Before the Government Orders are called, I want to inquire if any steps have been taken by the Minister of Finance to cause the Committee of Public Accounts to be organized?

Mr. FOSTER. The committee will be organized on Thursday morning.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE TARIFF.

House resumed the adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Foster:

That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go into Committee of Ways and Means; and the motion of Sir Richard Cartwright in amendment thereto.

Mr. SPOULE. Mr. Speaker, in addressing myself to the subject before this House. I wish, first, to congratulate the hon. Minister of Finance upon the clear, lucid and satisfactory statements that he has given to this House, and through this House to the country, of the financial condition of Canada. I also wish to congratulate the Minister of Finance and his colleagues upon the assiduity with which they have addressed themselves to the subject since the last session of Parliament, in fulfilment of the promises then made to go through the country and ascertain what changes could be made in the tariff in the interests of the people of the country. I congratulate them on the success which has attended that effort. I also congratulate them on the fact that their most able critics in this House, in the onslaught they have made on the Budget speech, have been up to the present time unable to find any great flaw in it; and that the consensus of opinion on the Opposition side of the House has been that the tariff proposals were in the right direction, and that, although they did not go so far as they anticipated, still they admit candidly, some of them, others very reluctantly, that the changes which are made in the tariff are in the right direction. But there was another subject which sprang up in the course of this debate, and which I will take the earliest opportunity to refer to, and that is the disposition of hon. members upon that side of the House to deny the record which they placed before the country a few years ago, and the emphatic statement that was made by several hon. gentlemen in Opposition, notably by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen), the hon. member for East Huron (Mr. Macdonald), and, I think, by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), and also by the hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies), all denying that the Liberal party ever advocated commercial union, or accepted it as their platform and presented it as such to the people. It will be necessary for me for a short time to make a comparison between the platforms of the hon. gentlemen at various times in the history of the politics of the country. I take the present platform of 1894, and it is amusing, in view of the different resolutions that are on record to-day in the 'Hansard,' setting forth to the electorate of Canada the views of those gentlemen upon the condition of the country, the needs of the country, and the different policies which the country has required from time to time. The last one which they presented to the House only a few days ago reads as follows:—

That, while recognizing in the reductions proposed an admission to that extent of the evils inflicted upon the people by the system of high protective duties, this House is nevertheless of the opinion that the amendments suggested, being based upon the principle of protection and not solely upon the requirements of public service, are inadequate to afford satisfactory relief from the burdens of excessive and unfair taxation:

That the highest interests of Canada demand the adoption of a sound fiscal policy which, while not doing injustice to any class, will promote domestic and foreign trade and hasten the return of prosperity to our people:

That, to that end, the tariff should be reduced to the needs of honest, economical and efficient government, should have eliminated from it the principle of protection to particular industries at the expense of the community at large and should be imposed for revenue only.

Now, that may all be simmered down to two features, the elimination of protection in every form, and a tariff for revenue purposes. That is the platform that hon. gentlemen are pleased to present to the country to-day as containing their views regarding the needs of Canada. Now, let us look at their platform of last year. I find that their platform of last year is entirely different from the one they have at the present time. It is as follows:—

That the present customs tariff bears heavily and unjustly upon the great consuming classes of the Dominion and should be at once thoroughly reformed in the direction of freer trade.

It was not a revenue tariff, it was not free trade then, but it was to be in the direction of freer trade.

And that the amount of taxes collected be limited to the sum required to meet the necessities of the Government efficiently and economically administered.

That was different from the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite to-day. To-day it is absence of protection and revenue tariff; last year it was reform of the tariff on the lines of the policy laid down by the Democratic party in the United States, from which hon. gentlemen opposite hoped so much. A portion of that resolution is exactly in the words of the platform laid down by the Democratic party. But we go back to the previous occasion when they formulated their platform. How far does that platform accord with the views expressed by them to-day. It was as follows:—

That it is highly desirable that the largest possible freedom of commercial intercourse should obtain between the Dominion of Canada and the United States, and that it is expedient that all articles manufactured in or the natural product of either of the said countries should be admitted free of duty into the ports of the other (articles subject to duties of excise or of internal revenue alone excepted).

That was not a revenue tariff: it was practically a free trade tariff, not a freer trade tariff, but entirely a free trade tariff.

That it is further expedient that the Government of the Dominion should take steps at an early date to ascertain on what terms and conditions arrangements can be effected with the United States for the purpose of securing full and unrestricted reciprocity of trade therewith.

We say that is commercial union. Hon. gentlemen opposite deny it, and it will be necessary for me to quote the opinions expressed by hon. gentlemen opposite in confirmation of the statement I have made. But for a moment I should like to draw attention to the distinction between these three policies. We have to-day the elimination of protection while not doing away with the customs tariff, and we have a plea for a revenue tariff only. We had last year a declaration in favour of freer trade with the raising of the revenue that was consistent with the economical administration of affairs of this country. And the year before that we had unrestricted reciprocity, or a proposal to admit the goods of the United States into this country without any restriction whatever or any customs duty whatever, so far as it could be mutually agreed upon, a tariff framed upon the distinct line that not only the natural products but the manufactured goods of the United States should be admitted into this country free, while they expected the same treatment would be accorded in the United States to our goods. In considering this matter a short time, I will first draw the attention of the House to a pamphlet which was distributed very largely during the last elections. The copy I hold in my hand was addressed to a constituent of the hon. member for Kent, with the compliments of Mr. Campbell. It is entitled "Facts and Figures for Farmers," and it was evidently prepared with a view to educate the public mind of Canada, especially the farmers, up to the platform laid down by the Liberal party. It was issued to the people in 1891. I take up the paragraphs relating to the Liberal platform; and how does the pamphlet read? I find the following:—

The Conservative party now in power in Canada, by an amended tariff (just now made more than ever offensive), by a harsh interpretation of the Fisheries Treaty; by denying trading and bonding facilities freely granted by the United States: by canal discrimination, and by a general policy of restriction, has made the commercial attitude of Canada one of direct antagonism to that of the United States. Meantime our neighbours just now propose to double the duties heretofore exacted on agricultural products, and thus practically shut out of the United States markets our Canadian commerce who derived more than half their income from this source. In view of this most serious condition of affairs, the Liberal party present as the only alternative, in the shape of an immediate and prominent remedy, the policy of unrestricted reciprocity with the United States, which it is believed can be secured. The issue between the Conservative party and the Liberal party before the people of Canada is therefore plain and decisive. As a contribution to the information preparatory to this trouble, and in order that the advantages and possibilities of this Liberal policy may be plainly apprehended, the compilation of extracts in the following pages is submitted.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. From what is the hon. gentleman reading?

Mr. SPROULE. I am reading from "Facts and Figures," a pamphlet addressed by the Liberal party to the electors of Ontario during the electoral campaign in 1891. The pamphlet further says:

It will be borne in mind that the speeches from which these extracts are made were delivered long in anticipation of the present threatened action of Congress; but the force of the arguments adduced is rendered doubly strong by the certain result that will follow. As the securing of unrestricted reciprocity in the face of the threat of Congress to double the duties against Canadian products, this may be said, that those who, in the United States, keep the closest watch of the trend of public opinion, and are best informed as to the real situation of affairs, firmly believe that this great boon will be secured, if only the people of Canada express a strong desire for it. This they can do by the election of a Parliament who will respond to the terms of the Bill which was introduced into Congress by Mr. Butterworth (printed in the appendix), or by accepting the resolutions recently unanimously adopted by the Committee of Foreign Affairs, of which the Honourable R. R. Hitt is chairman, and which report, it is believed, would be adopted by both branches of Congress.

They told the people of Canada that if they elected members of the Reform party to Parliament this is the tariff they would obtain. This policy was formulated upon the line of Mr. Butterworth's Bill or the Hitt resolutions, and those resolutions embodied the views of the Reform party, and hon. gentlemen opposite were satisfied that if the electors would return them to power they would secure unrestricted reciprocity. The pamphlet further says:

Recent events indicate the desire by a large section of the American people for a change in their policy, regarding the unshackling of commerce on the continent of America, both North and South, and many indications point to a possibility of the most intimate commercial relations between the United States and her near-by neighbours. In this Canada will participate, if only her people express a desire for the same. The resolution adopted by the Committee of Foreign Affairs is in the following simple words, and if made effective, in the spirit with which it has been presented, will have consequences to Canada of the highest moment :

“ Resolved, that whenever it shall be duly certified to the President of the United States that the Government of the Dominion of Canada has declared a desire to enter into such commercial arrangements with the United States as will result in the complete removal of all duties upon trade between Canada and the United States, he shall appoint three commissioners, to meet those who may be designated to represent the Government of Canada, to consider the best method of extending the trade relations between Canada and the United States, and to ascertain on what terms greater freedom of intercourse between the two countries can best be secured, and said commissioners shall report to the President, who shall lay the report before Congress.”

That is what they say in their address.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. In whose address ?

Mr. SPROULE. In the address of the Liberal party called “ Facts and Figures,” which was distributed to the farmers of Canada with a view to lead them to vote for the Reform party, because that party were prepared if returned to power to adopt this tariff policy. They go on to tell what the farmers’ mission was in shaping its policy :

If, while maintaining here in Canada a complete and separate political existence, and working out her own destiny as best she may, Canada can make such a commercial bargain with the United States as will permit her to remove the customs line that has hitherto retarded her, if she can gain all the material advantages of a union that shall be commercial and not political, why should she not do so ? If the consequence of that union should be to perpetuate British connection, if its consummation should remove the only argument that exists on behalf of annexation, what greater purpose can be achieved than by carrying it out ? The stupendous consequences that have followed in the United States from a freedom of trade between those great commonwealths would follow in Canada, if between the United States and Canada a perfect freedom existed. A development of resources so varied as Canada possesses, a growth in population equal to that which elsewhere on the continent has taken place, an increase in wealth in enterprise, in all that goes to make up a nation, is to-day within the grasp of Canada.

By whom shall this advantage be achieved ? By what class shall the effort be made to bring about this great revolution ? Certainly by the class it would most benefit ; and who, more than all others, but the farmers of Canada.

And all the farmers were advised to vote for it. Now, that is the way they speak of it in their instructions to the farmers of Canada.

Mr. SPROULE.

In another part of the pamphlet, in explaining it, they say :

It is well to consider that so far as Great Britain, as a nation, is concerned, nothing could happen so advantageously to her as a complete customs union between the English-speaking people of the continent of North America.

Remember that they use the words, “ complete customs union.” They quote again the Hitt resolution which I have already read, and they refer to the Butterworth Bill, and they say it is on the lines of these two that they are appealing to the electorate of Canada. But hon. gentlemen opposite say that they did not endorse commercial union, and that it is not their policy. I have quoted the resolution of 1888, and, in turning to the pages of ‘ Hansard ’ for 1891, what do I find ? We have been told by the Liberal members in this House that no prominent member of the Reform party either endorsed that policy of commercial union, or gave it to the country as theirs. It is, therefore, worth while to look, for a short time, at what these hon. gentlemen have said upon that subject.

Mr. CHARLTON. If I may be permitted to interrupt the hon. gentleman, may I ask that if he is through with the document from which he is reading, he would allow us to look at it

Mr. SPROULE. I am not through yet. It is too good to let go so early. I think the hon. gentlemen have plenty in their own desks if they will only use them. I take as the most important of those who have given an expression of opinion on this matter, the leader of the Opposition, because I suppose he ought to be the exponent or mouth-piece of his party, and I find in the ‘ Hansard ’ of June, 1891, that a quotation is made from the speech of the Hon. Mr. Laurier at a meeting held in Abbotsford the previous October, and he describes what he understands unrestricted reciprocity to be. He says :

This policy involves full and absolute reciprocity, not only in natural products, but also in manufactured articles, without any restrictions whatever. When the Liberal party comes into power, it will send commissioners to Washington—

It will be a long time before these commissioners go to Washington.

When the Liberal party comes into power, it will send commissioners to Washington, according to the principles affirmed by the Cartwright resolutions of 1888, to propose a mutual agreement by which there will be free trade along the whole line.

To-day their policy is not free trade, but it is a revenue tariff. Last year their policy was freer trade, and before that, it was unrestricted free trade. Mr. Laurier continued:

Doing away with restrictions, vexatious and detrimental to both countries alike, and removing the customs houses that go so far to cause friction between two countries, designed by nature to exist side by side in friendly relations.

That was what the leader of the Liberal party said. The Hon. Mr. Laurier was in favour of striking down the customs houses along the whole line, and yet we are told that no prominent member of that party advocated commercial union. He goes on to say :

With commercial union between the two countries, we could dispense with the standing army, for, under the new relations that would be established between ourselves and our neighbours, there would be no necessity for one. We could do away with our custom-house officers, and they would have to seek other fields of usefulness.

Is that not explicit enough? Is that not an answer to the denials of the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), the hon. member for Wellington (Mr. McMullen), the hon. member for East Huron (Mr. Macdonald), and the other hon. gentlemen who made the denial the other night? If they want anything more specific than that statement from the leader of the Opposition, I would like to know where you could find it. Now, let us see what was the interpretation of the Liberal policy by outsiders, who are not members of this House. Goldwin Smith says :

The proposed assimilation of tariff, on the seaboard, is simply an arrangement to prevent reciprocal smuggling.

Let me show once more that commercial union and unrestricted reciprocity mean the same thing, and that Liberals understood it to mean the same thing, and that they endeavoured to educate the farmers of this country in the belief that it was the same thing, namely, the removal of the customs line between Canada and the United States. Again, Goldwin Smith says :

Commercial union would, of course, involve assimilation of tariffs, which, however, would present no insurmountable obstacle to negotiation. It would also involve an assimilation of the liquor (excise) duties.

Mr. LAURIER. Will the hon. gentleman pardon me for a moment. He referred to me a moment ago as having expressed myself in favour of commercial union. I once before corrected that in the House, and I stated that I never used any such expression at any time. The report that was made of these words was made at a meeting held in Abbotsford. I spoke in French, and there was not a single French reporter there. I never made use of any such expression. My hon. friend from Iberville (Mr. Béchard) was there, and knows what I state now to be a fact. It is seldom that I correct anything that is attributed to me in the press, but I stated in the House once before that I never made use of any such language as the hon. gentleman quoted, and I repeat my denial here.

Mr. BECHARD. Mr. Speaker, if I may be permitted, I wish to add a word to support the statement now made by the hon. leader of the Opposition. I was present at that meeting in Abbotsford. The leader of the Opposition spoke in French, and I spoke also, and there was not even a mention made of the words "commercial union."

Mr. SPROULE. As I never before heard the hon. gentleman contradict this as an unfair report of his speech, therefore, I cannot be blamed for quoting it again, especially as it appears in the 'Hansard.' I am, therefore, glad that he has made the contradiction, because I do not wish either to mislead the public or to misrepresent him, and therefore I allow the matter to pass with his explanation. But, Mr. Speaker, I want to prove and I think I can clearly prove it, that there is practically no distinction between unrestricted reciprocity and commercial union, and that it means one and the same thing. They are convertible terms, they are synonymous terms, and to prove that, I will give the authority of quite as able men in public life, both as parliamentarians and statesmen, as the hon. member who has just now contradicted me. I may be allowed to say just here that in this pamphlet to the farmers of Canada, it is stated that the Liberal policy is upon the lines of the Hitt resolution or the Butterworth Bill, and we might naturally ask what did Mr. Butterworth understand by commercial union, and what did Mr. Hitt understand by it? Mr. Hitt's resolution, the very resolution that they told the farmers they would get what they wanted by carrying it out, explains it thus :

The adoption by both countries of precisely the same tariff of duties or taxes to be levied on goods coming from abroad, abolishing altogether our line of customs houses on the north, by which we collect tariff duties on goods coming from Canada, and they abolishing their customs houses along the same line by which they collect duties on goods we send into Canada, and having intercourse as unrestricted between this country and Canada as it is between the States. The line of customs houses would follow the sea, and include both countries.

That is exactly what the Liberals have said with regard to unrestricted reciprocity. They have told us that commercial intercourse between Canada and the States should be as free and unrestricted as it is to-day between the different states of the union, that the line of customs-houses should follow the sea and include both countries. The Butterworth Bill and the Hitt resolution were the principles upon which they based their policy and upon which they were educating the people. Now, Mr. Butterworth says :

The adoption of the system proposed would involve the assimilation of tariffs, rates and internal revenue taxes, and possibly an arrangement for pooling receipts from customs, and a division on some equitable basis.

Now I come to another member of the Reform party, who, I think, may fairly be considered an authority in this House. I refer to the hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I.; and I see, by the way, that he is highly eulogised by Mr. Peters down there as one of the great powers of the House. I find that the hon. member made this statement before the Charlottetown Board of Trade—

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) That was contradicted twice.

Mr. SPROULE. This is what the hon. gentleman said:

Unrestricted reciprocity would differ from commercial union in this respect, that while it would be perfectly free trade between the two countries, each country would have the right to frame its own tariff as regards the rest of the world. Canada, for instance, might have a 25 per cent tariff while that of the United States might be one of 35 per cent. The immediate consequence would be that imports to the United States, instead of being carried to the great ports of the United States, would be taken to the States by the way of Montreal. To this the States, whose people are not arrant fools, would never consent, and unrestricted reciprocity, although it would suit as well as commercial union, was, therefore, impracticable.

And, therefore, commercial union was the only thing to be aimed at. Now, I have a pamphlet here, in which I find some plain talk on commercial union by Mr. Thomas Shaw, the permanent secretary of the Central Farmers' Institute of Ontario; and, by the way, the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), in a speech delivered in 1888 in this House, claimed that forty-eight of the farmers' institutes of Canada had practically pronounced in favour of this principle of unrestricted reciprocity or commercial union. But, before referring to Mr. Shaw's statement, I may be allowed to quote a statement made by the hon. member for North Norfolk himself. Whether he is considered an authority or not on the other side of the House I will not question. At Jarvis, Ont., in 1887, the hon. gentleman made the following statement regarding commercial union:—

It was simply a customs union between two or more independent states where a common tariff and excise laws were adopted, and the revenue collected, after deducting expenses of collection, was divided among the participants upon the basis of population or any other basis that might be agreed upon, while all trade restrictions between them were removed. The application of the principle between Canada and United States would require that the two countries should have the same excise rates and the same tariff upon imports from all other countries should be divided upon conditions hereafter to be arranged, that the customs line between the two countries from ocean to ocean should be removed, and that trade between Canada and the United States should be in every respect as free and untrammelled as trade between the different states of the American Union was at the present moment.

Mr. SPROULE.

Mr. CHARLTON. Will the hon. gentleman allow me one word of explanation? At Jarvis, I was proceeding to define to the audience that I was addressing what constituted commercial union and what constituted reciprocity; and the statement I made, which is repeated by the hon. gentleman, was not an advocacy of commercial union, but a definition to the audience of what commercial union was.

Mr. SPROULE. Well, I will give the hon. gentleman one of his own definitions in this House. The hon. gentleman is one of those kaleidoscopic political economists who, every time they open their mouth, show a change of scene; but in the main, he always keeps in view the same principle of unrestricted reciprocity or commercial union. Here is what he said:

Mr. CHARLTON. I might as well define what I understand commercial union to mean. The definition read by the Minister of the Interior, quoted from the speech made by me in Haldimand, is exactly what I do understand commercial union to mean. I understand commercial union to mean an arrangement between two or more powers or as many more as chose to join—for instance, the commercial union of Germany embraced all the German states—

That union in Germany was a commercial union, established for the perfect freedom of commerce among the German states, just as he says unrestricted reciprocity means as perfect freedom of commerce between Canada and the United States, as exists to-day among the different states of the Union:

—an arrangement made between two or more countries whereby they adopt a common tariff and common excise laws, abolish all commercial restrictions between themselves, abolish all customs lines between themselves, collect a revenue at any point where the goods may be entered from any country not a member of the union; throw that whole revenue into one common fund and divide that fund.

That was the same line on which he advocated the principle before the people of the country; and surely I am not misquoting him when I quote this as what he understands by commercial union. I have also a statement of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) as follows:—

There is no doubt whatever in my mind, also, that we cannot overlook the risk that does undoubtedly arise, that increased commercial intercourse with the United States may strengthen the hands of those who desire to see our political system absorbed in theirs.

And further he goes on to say:

I have no hesitation in saying, frankly, that if the United States are willing to deal with us on equitable terms the advantages to both countries, and especially to us, are so great that scarcely any sacrifice is too severe to secure them. I am as averse as any man can be to annexation, or to resign our political independence, but I cannot shut my eyes to the facts. We have greatly misused our advantages, we have been foolish in our expenditures, we have no means of satisfying the just demands of large portions of the Dominion, except through such an arrangement as commercial union.

There is the position of the hon. member for South Oxford; and in the face of it, will any hon. gentleman say that no member of the Reform party ever advocated commercial union?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. May I ask what the hon. gentleman is quoting from?

Mr. SPROULE. I have quoted from the 'Hansard.'

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Where? What year, and what occasion?

Mr. SPROULE. It is a quotation from a speech of the hon. gentleman, made in 1888 at Ingersol, and quoted in this House by the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill); the hon. gentleman can find it for himself. Now, I take up the pamphlet of Mr. Shaw, the secretary of the Central Farmers' Institute, who endeavoured to enlighten the electorate on behalf of the Reform party on the subject of unrestricted reciprocity. He refers to a resolution passed by the Farmers' Institute, and what does that resolution say:

In the opinion of this Institute, a removal of all the restrictions on trade between the Dominion of Canada and the United States is desirable, either by reciprocity or otherwise.

Commercial union, unrestricted reciprocity, or otherwise. Then, the resolution expresses the opinion that if we cannot get that, the Dominion Government should suggest to the Government of Great Britain:

The expediency of entering into a commercial union with her colonies with regard to food supplies and imposing a protective tariff against all foreign countries.

Then Mr. Shaw goes on to say:

Commercial union between Canada and the United States implies a free interchange of all the products of both countries of whatsoever nature, whether of the waters, the soil, the sea and the mines. It would involve (1) an assimilation of tariff against all other countries; (2) of internal revenue taxes; and (3) very probably an arrangement for pooling receipts and customs, and distributing the same.

In this way he held that it would involve the abolition of all custom-houses between the two countries. Further, he says:

There is really no difference between what is implied by the use of the terms Commercial Union and Unrestricted Reciprocity in this case, for the latter involves an assimilation of tariffs and internal revenue, as well as the former. The terms are synonymous and interchangeable.

He recognized no difference between the two terms. Do hon. gentlemen opposite want anything stronger than that? Then, I take up the letter of Mr. Blake, written at the time he abandoned the party, because it had adopted unrestricted reciprocity, or, what he understood to be the same thing, commercial union, and what does he say about it:

The absence of agreement would give to each country power to disturb at will the industrial system of the other; and unrestricted reciprocity without an agreed assimilation of duties is an unsubstantial dream.

No politician ever believed it could be worked out. Again, he goes on to say:

Since any practical arrangement does substantially involve, not only differential duties but a common tariff, unrestricted reciprocity in these its redeeming features is difficult to distinguish from Commercial Union. And Commercial Union establishing a common tariff, abolishing international customs-houses and dividing the total duties between the two countries, in agreed proportions—is the more available perhaps, the only available plan

Then, further on, he says:

What is the position of the people of Canada, —our hopes and our fears alike would draw one way. We would then indeed be "looking to Washington." Nor is there any fair comparison in this respect between the new and the old reciprocal arrangements.

We would then, he says, speaking of the policy of unrestricted reciprocity, indeed be looking to Washington. Then I go on further, and find that he speaks of unrestricted reciprocity as follows:—

Without needless lengthy recapitulation, you will see, by contrasting my views with those of the present advocates of free trade with the States, several serious questions of a difficulty and difference—for example, uniformity of tariff and its control; deficiency of revenue and its supply—on which I am unable to adopt their opinions.

Then he goes on to say:

Assuming that absolute free trade with the United States; best described as commercial union, because every one knows then what it means—may and ought to come, I believe that it can and should come, only as an incident or at any rate as a well understood precursor of political union; for which indeed we should be able to make better terms, before than after the surrender of our commercial independence. Then, so believing—believing that the decision of the trade question involves a constitutional issue for which you are unprepared, and with which you do not conceive yourselves to be dealing—how can I properly recommend you now to decide on Commercial Union.

Do not decide, he says, on commercial union, the policy laid down by the Reform party, and because of which he was abandoning the party. He winds up his letter as follows:—

Since I cannot help, to hurt as little as I may : and therefore, to go down with my own little ship in silence, bearing for the moment all consequent misconstructions, and leaving, till the ides of March be past, the explanation of my action.

If there is anything plainer than that needed to show what we are to understand by unrestricted reciprocity, I should like to know it. I have given quotations from Mr. Blake, who was the leader of the party then, and who abandoned the party because of its policy. I have given quotations from speeches of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), the hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies), the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) and some others ; and I have gone outside that and taken up the Butterworth Bill and the resolutions recommended to Canada as the solution of our commercial difficulties at that time, and upon which the Opposition asked the electors of Canada to return them to power. And I find it understood in every instance that commercial union and unrestricted reciprocity are one and the same thing. There is a little sheet which I intended to present to the House to-day, but on which I find I cannot lay my hands just now. It is the fly-sheet which was distributed in Bruce, at the time of Mr. Cargill's last election. It was headed, "Vote for Truax and commercial union." Then it goes on to say what commercial union means—It means $50 more for every horse you sell ; 30 cents per bushel more for every bushel of barley you sell ; and it sums up the whole by calling on the people to vote for commercial union and Mr. Truax and the Reform party. I was told that some innocent farmer was simple enough to believe this fly-sheet and to vote for Mr. Truax. Mr. Truax got in, and the next day this honest farmer came into the town of Walkerton with a horse, for which he would have accepted the week before $100, and wanted $150 for it. He returned, convinced that no reliance was to be placed in the statements of that fly-sheet, intended to dupe the electors of that riding. I shall now leave this subject, and, with the permission of the House, will address myself for a short time to the amendment. They ask that the protective tariff be done away with and a revenue tariff substituted. Let us see what the tariff changes in Canada have been for a long time. I find that the tariff to-day is simply and strictly a revenue tariff, with incidental protection—what the people of Canada want. It is a tariff calculated to raise revenue without unnecessarily bearing heavily on any class of the community, and at the same time protecting Canadian industries against foreign competition. It is a national tariff. It is a National Policy and a Canadian policy, and it is also a revenue tariff. I have here a little work, very nicely compiled, giving the changes in the tariff for a great many years past. What does this work say :

Mr. SPROULE.

The first tariff enforced, in 1849, was a revenue tariff, it was 12½ per cent on certain classes of goods and 2½ on heavier goods such as iron. In 1856 the duty on general merchandise was raised to 15 per cent because they wanted more revenue, and on leather it was raised to 20 per cent.

If I understood the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) correctly last year, he said that in 1879, for the first time, a protective tariff was introduced as the policy of this country. But I find that as far back as 1858 the Hon. Mr. Cayley, Inspector General, then submitted what he was pleased to call an incidentally protective tariff, calculated to protect the interests of Canada. The inauguration of a protective policy was announced for the purpose of developing home manufactures and for that purpose a 20 per cent list of articles was enumerated. And the manufactures of leather as boots, shoes, harness and saddlery, and clothing or wearing apparel made by hand or machinery was made. The tariff of 1859 was an increase of duty on the same lines. It was a further carrying out of the aim and purpose of protection, begun in 1858, and it was done for the double purpose of raising revenue—because if you look at the Trade and Navigation Returns you will find that the revenue was falling very fast—for the purpose of raising additional revenue and also for the purpose of protecting the interest of Canada. The principal difference was in the advance on goods unenumerated in 1859 to 20 per cent instead of 15 per cent. During the seven years between 1859 and 1866, when the tariff was again changed, the advance in manufactures was very great in Canada. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) the other night said that manufactures in Canada had grown during that period. And he forgot to tell the members of this House and the people of the country that there was a protective tariff then, and that, in consequence of that protective tariff, the development of the manufactures of the country had gone on. The change in 1866 was a reduction to 15 per cent on those lines that had paid 20 per cent and 25 per cent before. The changes of 1867 and the Act of April, 1868, were a further carrying out of the purposes of the Act of 1866. If I had time I would show that because the revenue would allow it they reduced the burden upon the people of the country, and they thought the manufacturers had got a fair footing and were able to stand alone, comparatively speaking, without the rate of protection given them under the previous Acts. Under the Act of 1870 the principal changes made were a reduction of the duties on live animals to 10 per cent ad valorem. Before that they were : Horses, $15 per head ; horned cattle, $10 per head ; swine, $2 per head. In 1870 to meet the exigencies of revenue, all customs duties were increased 5 per cent, or 1-20 of their amount. The revenue was falling off, and they were obliged to raise the tariff rates. The change that attracted most attention was the imposition of a duty on natural products, such as coal and coke. Salt, except imported from the United Kingdom or British possessions, or for the use of the Sea Gulf fisheries, per bushel of 56 pounds, 5 cents, equal to 25 cents a barrel of 280 pounds. Hops, 5 cents per pound; rice, 1 cent per pound; wheat, 4 cents per bushel; peas, beans, barley, rye, oats, Indian corn, buckwheat, 3 cents per bushel; flour of wheat and flour of rye, 25 cents per barrel; Indian meal and oatmeal, 15 cents per barrel. In 1871 these duties were struck off, as also was the 1-20 added to all duties in 1870 to raise revenue. In 1874 the Reform party was in power, and they found it necessary to put on a tariff in order to raise a revenue. What did Sir Richard Cartwright, who was then the Finance Minister, do in order to raise that revenue? We heard it said the other night that this present tariff was based upon no principle of political economy. The hon. gentleman seems to consider himself an authority upon economic science, and retorted across the floor of the House that hon. gentlemen on this side had better learn the A B C of political economy before they undertook to teach hon. gentlemen opposite. The hon. gentleman said this tariff was based upon no principle; that it was not a revenue tariff; that it was not distinctly a protective tariff; that it was not a tariff of specific duties nor a tariff of ad valorem duties. He condemned the old tariff on the ground that it was made up largely of specific duties, declaring that specific duties bore heavily upon the poor man and therefore were wrong. One would suppose that a gentleman who knew a wrong, and had the opportunity to correct it, would not commit that wrong himself. The hon. gentleman had the privilege of amending that wrong when he made the tariff of 1874, and you would have expected him, Mr. Speaker, if he understood political economy, to raise the taxes upon an ad valorem basis, seeing that that is the one which he says is correct. But what did he do when he was called upon to raise the duty? Did he follow what he says is the true principle of political economy? He raised the duties 2½ per cent on all unenumerated articles, and, upon those lines which constitute, as we believe, the necessaries of life, such as tea and coffee, he laid a specific duty. He first raised the duty on tea to 4 cents a pound, and afterwards increased it to 6 cents a pound. So the hon. gentleman, when he had an opportunity to show his knowledge of political economy, and his ability to make a tariff suitable to the country, and based upon sound principle, instead of doing as he says now the Finance Minister ought to do, based his tariff on the very lines which he condemns in this House. He placed these duties on a specific basis. And what did that mean? The ordinary tea in use by the masses of the people at that time cost 25 cents a pound, while the better grades of tea, including fine Young Hyson, ran up to $1 a pound. The poor man, when he invested a dollar in tea, bought 4 pounds. On this he paid a duty of 6 cents a pound, or 24 cents for the 4 pounds, being a tax of 24 per cent on the tea, while the rich man, buying one pound of tea for $1, paid only 6 cents in taxation, or 6 per cent, as against 24 per cent paid by the poor man. The hon. gentleman is not in his seat to hear what I say. The hon. gentleman usually goes out when his own inconsistencies are being pointed out from this side of the House. He feels so high above the common member of this House and the common citizen of the country that he becomes indignant at criticism and will not listen to it. The hon. gentleman condemns this tariff because it is not intended for revenue purposes alone, and declares that the policy of his party is to have a tariff for revenue purposes only. What kind of tariff would these hon. gentlemen impose for revenue purposes? Would it not follow the lines of this tariff of 1877, and place a specific duty upon those articles that are regarded as the necessaries of life? What would be more likely to be effective in raising revenue than duties on such articles as tea and coffee, which are used by the poor as well as by the rich. Moreover, we find that the hon. gentleman made such a tariff when he had the power to make tariffs. When he was in power he imposed these specific duties, but now he argues for ad valorem duties and condemns the specific duties because they have been embodied in a tariff made by this Government. Then the hon. gentleman goes on to say that this is a tariff that gives a maximum of disturbance with a minimum of relief. He declares that it was a mutilated and mangled, a hare-lipped, split-nosed, squint-eyed monstrosity. He described the tariff of 1879 in somewhat similar terms. These tariffs never suited his ideas of what was right, and they never will, so long as they come from this side of the House. He admits in one breath the changes are in the right direction, but in the same breath he declares that the tariff is wrong because it is not based upon any principle of political economy. Then he leaves the tariff and does not see it after that, but goes back to his old and popular theme of the exodus of the people, the shrinkage of values, reduced population, hard times, the tariff still favouring a few millionaires at the expense of the poor people of the country, and so on. Then we have the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), and he also says that the tariff has resulted in an exodus of the people, and declares that it means dear living, shrunken values, the reduction of the population of the country. Then we come to the hon. member for North Brant (Mr.

Paterson), and he gives credit to the Government for putting sugar up to 16 Dutch standard on the free list. That hon. gentleman, like a number of his friends, when the tariff touches some line affecting himself, is very anxious to see the free list extended, and thinks the revenue can be more easily raised by a tax on some other article. He wants his raw material of manufacture free. He is engaged in confectionery manufacture, and is connected with the combine of biscuit manufacturers in this country. The hon. member for East Huron (Mr. Macdonald) was not satisfied to wait until the changes were made, but, fearing that he would not have another opportunity at the old National Policy, he devoted an hour and a half in telling us what it had accomplished before the Budget Speech was made. The hon. gentleman said: We would have beaten you in the last election had the contest been a fair one. We would have had 53 members from Ontario instead of the number we have if our hands had not been tied by the Gerrymander and the Franchise Act. Well, I can tell the hon. gentleman that it would have been well for him and his party if we had been able to go further, and besides tying their hands, to have tied their tongues also, because it was their tongues that did them the harm, it was their tongues that kept them where they were, that converted the electorate to the Conservative side, and the electorate will keep the Reformers in Opposition for a long time. He says that the output of cotton has only been three or four millions last year, that the tariff has not done much good to the people of Canada, and therefore the tariff is all wrong. I find by the statistical record that the output of cotton last year was $8,451,000, instead of being only three or four millions. Then he says: "I challenge the supporters of the Government, or any one of them, to show that wages have increased during the time of the National Policy." Well, the same statistical record says there was an increase in the amount of wages paid in 1891 over 1881 of $40,333,439; in 1891 the wages averaged $272 per head, as compared with $233 per head in 1881. Is that not a specific answer to the contention of the hon. gentleman that wages have not increased? The record says:

All variations of condition being considered, it would appear that there was an advance in the rate of wages during the decade of about 16 per cent.

Now, I think that is a sufficient answer to that point. Then I take the speech of the Liberal member for Centre Wellington (Mr. Semple). He says that they were always in favour of a tariff for revenue. Now, I have shown by their own resolutions that they were not in favour of a revenue tariff. When they espoused the policy of unrestricted re-reciprocity, that could not mean a revenue tariff, because it did away with the whole of the tariff. When they made their platform freer trade, that was not a revenue tariff; but no doubt they have at last got down to a revenue tariff. Now, I will take the tariff as it is. Is that tariff what the country wants? I am surprised that these hon. gentlemen to-day wish to hide in oblivion the different platforms they have presented to the people of the country. One after another, their platforms have done duty for the time being, but these successive policies have only relegated them again to the cold shade of Opposition. But now, because they did not answer their purpose, they would like to bury them away where they can never more be found. It seems to me they would like to do with them as was done with the body of Moses. He was never allowed to take his people into the promised land, and because their platform of unrestricted reciprocity did not bring them into the promised land, the Treasury benches in this House, they would now like to bury it away in some unknown mountain where no Grit could go to worship at its shrine, and where there would be no tombstone erected over its grave to tell the tale. They do not want it buried on this side of Jordan's stream, because it did not answer their purpose in bringing them into the promised land, but instead it left them in the cold shades of Opposition. Whether it was because it had failed to lead them into the promised land, or whether they were afraid that it might be resurrected again to do duty, we are not prepared to say; but at any rate, they are attempting to bury it in oblivion. But like Banquo's ghost it will not down, it will up again, and it is before the electorate of the country to-day. The memory of the people is not so short as that they will forget it, and they will resurrect it from time to time, and give these hon. gentlemen the benefit of a reminder. Now, we might reasonably ask to-day: Is the tariff what the country needs? The country asked, through the Patrons of Industry, for a reduction in the tariff of certain lines. Well, the Government has given it. The country asked for a reduction in the burdens of living, and the Government has given it. This tariff reduces the burdens of living on many lines. The country asked for a reduction of protection, believing that the manufacturers who had enjoyed a moderate protection for fifteen years, were now able to stand without that protection, or with a less protection than was given them in 1879; and the Government has reduced it. Last year the Government was asked to reduce that tariff at once, and after carefully examining the situation, and sending out the Controllers through the country to ascertain what the condition of the people is and what they want, to see where the shoe pinches, where the tariff bears heavily upon them, the Government has now decided to reduce the tariff. The hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) said: If the Government had not sufficient confidence in me as a representative of the people to tell the Government what my constituents want, I would have as little confidence in them. One or two other members have pronounced the same opinion. But what do their friends do in Ontario? Have they not submitted a plebiscite to the people to ascertain what the people want? They do not think that the representatives of the people in the Local Legislature are able to tell the Mowat Government what the people want, and so the Liberal Government submitted a plebiscite to the people for the purpose of gaining an opinion, much in the same way as the Controller of Customs and the Controller of Inland Revenue have gone through this country in order to ascertain what the people wanted. Now, we find that the tariff was raised in 1879 for two purposes—for the purpose of raising a larger revenue, and for the purpose of protecting the industries of the people. It did protect the industries of the people, and it raised a higher revenue, and by the assistance of the higher revenue, we were able to build the Canadian Pacific Railway, we were able to build the highways of commerce that have cheapened the cost of transport of the products of this country to the markets of the world, we were able to improve our harbours, our canals and our breakwaters. Therefore, the tariff enabled the farmers of Canada to benefit by the increased advantages that accrued to them by public improvements in these various lines, and when the tariff had done that, then the Government said: As there is no longer an urgent necessity for that high tariff to protect the manufacturers, because they have been able to build up their various industries, and as the people demand a reduction, we will give them a reduction. Now, what is that tariff to-day? I say it is intended to be a revenue tariff. It may or may not meet the expectations of the Minister of Finance, but he expects it will be a revenue tariff, and in order that they may lessen the burdens of the people as much as possible, the Government have reduced the proposed expenditure for the coming year as compared with last year, to the extent of nearly four million dollars in the main estimates, so as to keep the expenditure within the revenue. Then I say this is a national tariff, it is a tariff for the benefit of Canada as a nation against all the world. What is more, it is a Canadian tariff in contradistinction to the various tariffs proposed by the hon. members opposite; it is a tariff calculated to protect the Canadian farmer, to protect the Canadian manufacturer, to protect the Canadian artisan and the Canadian labourer against those of every other country of the world. Then I say it is a protective tariff. Now, Sir, I cannot understand why the hon. member who leads the Opposition and his friends, pronounce so unmistakably their undying antipathy to protection. Would it not be natural in a young country, or in a young family, or in anything that is young and helpless, to throw around it the needed protection which we are able to give it? Would it not be the right thing to do? If by any means the Government could raise the necessary revenue and at the same time give incidental protection to the interests of Canada, would it not be natural for them to do it? The hon. member for South Oxford, in these resolutions, proclaims his undying hatred to protection, and, therefore, we know very well what these hon. gentlemen would do if they got into power tomorrow, they would undoubtedly do away with protection, and would leave the Canadian people at the mercy of every country in the world. Then I say this is a poor man's tariff. Why? Because it reduces the cost of the necessaries of life by taking the duty off tea, and sugar, and coffee, and various other lines, by reducing the duty on clothing, and various other necessities that are consumed by the people. Above all, this is a farmer's tariff, it is a reduction on everything he uses. Now, the farmers above all others were asking that this tariff be reduced, and the Government, in obedience to their request, have endeavoured to make this tariff specially a farmer's tariff. While the labourer benefits by it, and while the artisan benefits by it, still the manufacturer benefits by it also. While the commercial people of Canada benefit by it, above all the farmers of Canada benefit by it. Why do I say so? Because that tariff maintains a high protection upon everything that the farmer has to sell. It maintains the duty upon horses, sheep, swine, wheat, oats, peas and barley, Indian corn, rye, seeds, beef, pork, hay, butter, cheese, lard, oleomargarine and every other line of products. The duty on every product in which the farmer is interested is kept nearly as high as it was before. I shall have a word or two to say with respect to the duty on pork, which to my mind needs a little change, but I have no doubt it will receive that attention which its importance deserves before we have done with this resolution. But the tariff does more than that. It reduces the duties on those lines of articles that farmers most largely use. I have said already that this is a farmers' tariff. The Patrons of Industry asked reductions in various lines. Those reductions have been given them. This is an agricultural tariff. Why? Because taking the reductions in duties last year and this year they embrace agricultural implements, harness, wagons, reapers, mowers and binders, rakes, seed-drills, cultivators, threshing machines, harrows, ploughs, spades, shovels, rakes, forks, hoes, hardware, nails, barbed wire, hinges, binding twine, coal oil, clothing, cottons, woollens, tea, sugar and coffee. If the farmers use much more than the goods belong to outside lines. The tariff keeps the duties on silks, satins, feathers, flowers and all those lines that are consumed by the rich people of the country ; also on wines, champagne, whisky, brandy, tobacco and such articles which do not represent the necessities of life. It maintains the duty on those, and gives to the farmers reductions on the lines most needed and most used by them, and at the same time it substantially protects them in regard to the industry in which they are engaged. Some will say, and some have said, that the duty does the farmer no good. Parliament raised the duty on pork a few years ago, and I have some little complaint to make that the Government have now changed the duty, but I hope the matter will be adjusted before the debate is closed.

Mr. FORBES. Does the hon. gentleman want to raise it higher ?

Mr. SPROULE. I will tell the hon. gentleman after a little while ; we want the duty to be no worse for the farmer than it was before. In 1889 we found that large quantities of pork came into Canada, no less than 27,155,430 pounds having been brought in for consumption. We raised the duty. What was the result ? In the year 1893, instead of 27,155,430 being brought into Canada only 4,630,000 pounds were brought in. The duty kept out 23,000,000 pounds, and that gave the Canadian farmer the home market for his product to that extent at least. Then it will naturally be asked, how does the farmer profit by the duty ? Canada very largely developed her output in that line of production. While we kept out 23,000,000 pounds of pork by raising the duty, on some varieties to 1½ cents per pound, and on others to 3 cents per pound, we exported in 1889 7,492,082 pounds of bacon, ham, pork and lard. But in 1893, in addition to supplying the 23,000,000 pounds that were formerly sent in, we exported 23,116,993 pounds, showing a development during that time of enormous proportions. When we gave the farmer the home market and the protection he demanded, pork raising became one of the most profitable lines in which a farmer could engage, at all events that and the dairying interests. To-day the farmers are not interfered with by the tariff, and I am glad to have been able to arrive at the conclusion that this is above all others a farmers' tariff, a tariff from which the farmers and the people will obtain benefit. I will not say anything in regard to the duty on pork at present, because when we reach committee and the item comes up for consideration, I will state what change, in my opinion, should be made in it in the farmers' interests. I ask on behalf of the farmers to have the duty as good as the old duty, I do not ask anything better. They were satisfied with the duty and did well under it, they did not ask any change, and they do not ask any change to-day. I have received a telegram from the President of the Central Farmers' Institute in East Grey, which I think expresses the views of the farmers and the gratitude of the farmers in respect to the revision of the tariff. The telegram reads :

MARKDALE, 31st March, 1894.

We thank the Government most sincerely for the consideration given the farmers in the revision of the tariff and believe it will be generally satisfactory.

THOS. KELLS.

This is a tariff satisfactory to the farmers, and it is one framed principally with a view to their interests. What they asked has been given them. At the same time the protection afforded them has not been taken away, a protection which they desired to be continued, as it has proved advantageous to their interests. The tariff also reduces the cost of the necessities of life, it reduces the duties on agricultural implements 15 per cent and other reductions have been made which will prove specially beneficial to the farmers of Manitoba and the North-west, because I believe the manufacturers to-day are turning out implements as low as they can be produced, whether the tariff is high or low, and I do not anticipate that the farmers of Ontario will receive much benefit, from the reduction in this particular line but the change will prove very beneficial to the farmers of the North-west. We are, therefore, justified in defending the tariff and maintaining that it is a proper tariff for Canada. In view of the fact that the tariff is in harmony with the people's requirements, that is what the Patrons of Industry, the Farmers' Institutes and the whole body of farmers want, that it is in harmony with their views, we are bound to support it, and I am prepared to vote against the motion submitted by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), believing as I do, that if the principle it propounds were introduced into any policy and carried out, it would prove detrimental to the interests of the people, not only as regards manufacturers, but as artisans and the labouring classes, as well as the farmers. Believing it would prove detrimental to the agriculturists I am prepared to vote against that resolution, and to support the Government in carrying out the wise and able legislation which they have propounded in their policy, which I believe, and which the farmers believe, is conducive to the interests of all the people, but more especially the interests of the farmers of Canada.

Mr. McMILLAN. I have been very much pleased with the speech of the hon. member for South Grey (Mr. Sproule), in whose opinions a great change has occurred as compared with those previously expressed on the floor of this House. This is the first time he has admitted that a reduction in the tariff will cheapen goods to the farmers. Not only has the hon. gentleman made that statement, but the Finance Minister the other day for the first time admitted that goods were increased in price almost by the total amount of the duties. That was a great change as compared with the statement made in 1891. I desire at the outset to refer briefly to a few of the statements made by the hon. member for South Grey. The hon. gentleman quoted opinions expressed by Mr. Thomas Shaw. But the Liberals are no more responsible for the views of Mr. Shaw on the tariff than hon. gentlemen opposite are responsible for views expressed by Mr. Sol. White in favour of annexation. Mr. White, however, was a leader in the ranks of the Conservatives, he was the lieutenant of the leader of the Opposition in the Ontario Legislature, and he gave utterance to sentiments in favour of annexation, sentiments to which no member on this side of the House ever gave utterance. Why did they not tell us what the Hon. Edward Blake said about the National Policy? He said: It left us with a depleted treasury, and an enormous debt, a decreased population, lower standards of political morality, and he admitted that reciprocity with the United States would give us a meed of prosperity beyond anything else he knew of. Why do not hon. gentlemen opposite tell us fairly and honestly what prominent and responsible men have said about that policy of theirs. The hon. member for Grey (Mr. Sproule) has stated often in years gone by, that agricultural implements are just as cheap in Canada as they were in any other country, and that the National Policy did not raise the price. I am, therefore, greatly astonished that he should turn around today and eat up his utterances for the last fifteen years, and state now that the new tariff was a farmers' tariff, and a blessing to the workingmen of this country. I admit, Mr. Speaker, that we have a measure of redress in the changes proposed under the new tariff, but let me ask, what has brought these changes? They have been brought about by the teaching of the members of the Opposition upon every platform in the country, and on the floor of this House for the last fifteen years. It is the members of the Liberal party who educated the people to ask for a change in the tariff which at last they have obtained, although in a very small degree. We have been told time and again by members of the Government that the tariff would be retained in its integrity. Nay, Sir, an hon. gentleman occupying a prominent position in the Government stated that they would stick by the National Policy in its integrity, that they would not give way one iota, although the whole sixty of the majority they had in the House were swept away. These are idle vaporings, and when it comes to the test, and when they find that the people of this country are in earnest, and that the Patrons of Industry all over this country are determined to have changes, the Conservative Ministers turn their back upon the National Policy and make these changes. The hon. member for South Grey (Mr. Sproule) referred to the Patrons of Industry. What have the Patrons asked? They asked a tariff for revenue only, and so adjusted as to fall as far as possible upon the luxuries, and not upon the necessities of life. Have the Government put a tariff upon the luxuries, or have they still retained it on the necessities of life? I say that, in that respect the demand of the Patrons has not been granted. Will the Government give the Patrons what they ask? Will they do away with the bonusing of railways by Government grants, as contrary to the public interests? Will they give the preparation of the Dominion voters' lists to the municipal officers? Since the Government have taken the position that this is a farmers' tariff, and that the farmers have obtained all that they require, why do they not pay some attention to the platform of the Patrons of Industry? Let them do away with the Gerrymander Act. They tell us that four times have they appealed to the country successfully, but let me tell them that they have never honestly appealed to the country on the National Policy except in 1878. That is the only fair appeal they ever made to the country, and there is no doubt they carried the country then. In 1882 did they appeal to the country fairly and squarely? No; they appealed to it on a Gerrymander Act that was intended for the purpose of keeping the Conservatives in power. My own county was gerrymandered in order that they might hold two of the ridings, but they have been grievously disappointed in that, because they only held one, and that for but a short time. There are other things which the Patrons of Industry want. They want one thing which we are all agreed upon, and that is, British connection. But, Sir, they want also the reservation of the land for the actual settlers in the North-west. Have the Government in times past reserved the land for the actual settler? No; I was astonished the other day when I heard in the House that in that great north-western county which we would all like to see flourish, over forty millions of acres of the best land were in the hands of corporations and railway companies. The Patrons want purity of administration, and independence of Parliament. That is something that is very badly required in this country. We were told last night that the Liberal party delighted in scandals, and loved to dwell upon them, and we were also told by the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Hazen) that in his province they had attempted to sell a Government position for $200 in order to raise an election fund in the interests of the Reform party there. Let me say that the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Hazen) who brought that up was guilty of a grave misdemeanour in this House, when we consider what the purity of Parliament is. Let me refer to the selling of the position of lock-keeper and lighthouse-keeper in East Northumberland, one position for $200, another for $150, and another for $125, and when the guilty individuals in that transaction were sought to be punished before this House, the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Hazen) voted that they were guilty of no crime. We know what he has done in the past, and we know what he would do if he were in power, so that it ill becomes any individual who has justified such acts of the Government to come before this House and say anything about scandals. I was much amused last night at the member for Kent (Mr. McInerney) stating that we delighted in scandals and loved to dwell upon them. Does the hon. gentleman not know that the Government to-day hold their place in a great measure by reason of the proceeds of these scandals which were brought to light in this House, and for the participation in which two men have lately been relieved by the intercession of the Minister of Justice, from a punishment which the judge said it was too bad that it should be inflicted when more grievous offenders went unpunished? The hon. gentleman referred to our statements that if the Reform party should get into power, we would be able to get a reciprocity treaty with the United States. I may tell him that I have every reason to believe, that if the Reform party did get into power the blessing of reciprocity would be obtained for Canada. In treating of the history of reciprocity, he forgot to go back to 1888 when the Canadian Government refused to obey the reciprocity clauses in their own tariff schedule, at a time when the United States removed a certain number of articles included in that statute from the tariff list. And when pressure was brought to bear from Washington, when the leader of the Opposition put the question to the then First Minister: If they would not obey their own tariff statute and remove these goods from the tariff list of Canada, the answer was a most direct "No"; and he was cheered to the echo by every member on the Government side of the House. But a grave change came over them in a short time. In less than five days afterwards, Sir Charles Tupper stated in this House that a change had come over the views and feelings of the Government of Canada with respect to this tariff Bill. He told us that they had passed an Order in Council the night before that the duties were to be removed, and that an announcement would be published in the official Gazette the next day, to the following effect:—That these duties had been removed and that the Government of Canada awaited the further action of the Government of the United States in the same direction. Let me say, Mr. Speaker, and I say it advisedly, that every improvement the Government have ever made in the National Policy, and every time they have ever made an advance in the direction of reciprocity, they have done so for the purpose of keeping themselves in possession of the Treasury benches. That shows for what purpose the National

Mr. McMILLAN.

Policy was introduced. An hon. gentleman who was high in the counsels of the Government at that time has told us plainly on the floor of this House, that it was adopted in order that the Conservative party might get into power. I heard statements made here the other day with regard to hon. gentlemen on this side of the House having had speeches prepared contrary to those which they delivered; but I believe it is true that the leaders of the Conservative party came to this House in the session of 1878 with speeches prepared against an increase of duties which they believed the Government of the Hon. Alexander Mackenzie was going to impose at that time.

Mr. CHARLTON. That was in 1876.

Mr. McMILLAN. Be that as it may, there is not the least doubt in my mind that it is a fact. I remember when hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches had to swallow their own utterances with respect to the removal of the duties on certain goods that were admitted free in the United States. When Sir Charles Tupper announced that those articles were to be put on the free list, there was not a single cheer on the other side of the House, but a great many wry faces. I hold that the McKinley tariff was to a great extent, due to the action of the Canadian Government in reimposing those duties which they had removed in 1888. We were also told by the hon. member for Kent, N.B., that the Finance Minister's declaration showed that the Government were willing to enter into a treaty for the exchange of natural products and a short list of manufactured articles. Why, Sir, the hon. gentleman does not seem to understand the position of the matter. No such declaration was made by the Finance Minister. On the contrary, when he came back from Washington, he told us that he was unable to negotiate such a treaty. During the last summer, at a picnic at Clinton, in the county of Huron, standing close to the platform, I was astonished to hear the First Minister attempt to make the people believe that the Government favoured reciprocity, not only in natural products, but in a small list of manufactured goods. The hon. member for Kent further stated last night, that the Opposition believed that we could get a reciprocity treaty, if we got into power. I believe, Sir, that the Opposition, if in power, could in a very short time obtain a reciprocity treaty with the United States on fair terms. Why do I say that? Because the United States Government, at the time our representatives went to Washington in 1892, offered to take into consideration the question of a reciprocity treaty, if our Ministers would admit a list of manufactured goods along with natural products. I have here a statement of what took place at the first conference, contained in a message from the President of the United States, informing the Senate relative to the negotiations for reciprocal trade with Canada. The report of Secretary Blaine says :

At the first conference on February 10, the Commissioners stated that they were authorized by the Canadian Government to propose the renewal of the reciprocity treaty of 1854 (which was terminated in 1866 by the action of the Congress of the United States), with such modifications and extensions as the altered circumstances of both countries and their respective interests might seem to require.

In answer to an inquiry, the Commissioners stated that the modifications or extensions contemplated in the schedules of articles should be confined to natural products, and should not embrace manufactured articles.

There was a plain statement made to the Government of the United States by the commissioners who went down from Canada, although they knew well before they went there that the Government of the United States would not be prepared to discuss reciprocity in natural products alone. We can all remember the letter that Secretary Blaine wrote to Congressman Baker in regard to that question, in which he said that the Government of the United States could not enter into any treaty unless manufactured goods were included. This report of Secretary Blaine further says :

The Commissioners were informed that the Government of the United States would not be prepared to renew the treaty of 1854 nor to agree to any commercial reciprocity which should be confined to natural products alone ; and that, in view of the great development of industrial interests of the United States and of the changed conditions of the commercial relations of the two countries since the treaty of 1854 was negotiated, it was regarded of essential importance that a list of manufactured goods should be included in the schedules of articles for free or favoured exchange in any reciprocity arrangements which might be made.

There is the evidence, Mr. Speaker, that if the Opposition were in power to-day, they could obtain a reciprocity treaty with the Government of the United States on fair and honourable terms, provided that we were willing to include a list of manufactured goods. But there is the evidence that no such list was offered by the commissioners from Canada. I believe, Sir, that reciprocity would be one of the greatest benefits that could be conferred on the agriculturists of this country. Let me state, notwithstanding what the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) has said, that it is an impossibility for any tariff to protect the farmer on his products, so long as he has to seek a foreign market for his surplus. I see the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) looking in my face. I was astonished at his utterance, when he challenged any one to say that the necessaries of life are taxed by this tariff. Does he not know that the farmers of his constituency are taxed 75 cents on every barrel of flour they get for their wheat ? Or that they are taxed 50 cents on every barrel of oatmeal they get ? He knows that the farmers of that country complain loudly that they are being wronged in not being allowed to get in grain and flour free of duty ? They feel it keenly. I have been among them, and I know their feelings as well as the hon. gentleman. The hon. gentleman ought to know that the tariff imposes a high duty on flour, which to them is a raw material.

Mr. DAVIN. May I ask the hon. gentleman a question ? Does he mean to say, that when a farmer north of Regina brings wheat to the mill to be ground, he pays a customs duty on the flour he takes away ?

Mr. McMILLAN. I mean to say, that he pays no customs duty, but there is a customs duty on the flour coming into the country.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Mr. McMILLAN. Hold on a minute. Does the hon. gentleman not know that the day has gone by when farmers take their wheat to the mill, get it ground, and take away the grist ? To-day the miller takes the farmer's wheat at its market price, and gives him in return flour at the market price of flour. If the duty on flour was of no benefit to the millers, why have they come to the Government to get it increased or continued ? The hon. member for Kent last night told us that it would not be for the benefit of the Canadian farmer to have the duty taken off flour. He says that the farmers in Ontario do not want the duty taken off flour. Let me tell him that he knows very little of the conditions and the feelings and the aspirations of the Ontario farmer. Such a slander as he cast at the farmers of this country I have never yet heard. He said that the farmer was satisfied with his condition, and in the next breath made the statement that the farmer was satisfied with the bare necessities of life. Why, Sir, he sank the farmers to the level almost of beasts of burden. The farmer, according to the hon. gentleman, has no aspirations, no desires beyond the gratifying of his primitive wants. In fact, the hon. gentleman seems to imagine himself back in the period of two hundred years ago, like Rip Van Winkle, when he came out of Sleepy Hollow. He seems to imagine us back in the old days of serfdom, when the tiller of the soil was considered as part and parcel of the land and the chattel of the landowner. If the hon. gentleman represented a constituency in Ontario, east or west, after giving utterance to such a sentiment, his constituents would, at the first opportunity, send him back to that obscurity from which he should never have emerged. The farmers of this Dominion, Sir, are as intelligent as any other class. They have the aspirations of the intellect, aspirations towards improvement, and desires for greater comfort in their surroundings, just as much as have any other class in the community. But there is a certain class of persons—confined, I am glad to say, to the Conservative party—who look upon the farmers as not belonging to the same race as themselves, but as made to be used and moulded by them just as potters mould their clay. The Finance Minister gave utterance to a similar sentiment when he told us in 1891 that the farmer paid no duty on anything he had—that his furniture in his house was made from the timber grown in his woods, that his farm implements were made of the same timber. But he has got a lesson since then. He now finds that farm implements are not made of timber but of metal, and has made a very small reduction in the duties. It has taken a long time to convince hon. gentlemen opposite, and the Minister of Finance in particular, that the farmer pays the duty. They have now given up that position, and admit, as far as the farmers are concerned, the prices of the goods they consume are increased by a sum equal to the amount of duty. As a farmer, I am glad that the Government have taken the first step in the direction of taking the duty off some of the necessaries of life. I am glad they have reduced the duty on agricultural implements, but let me say this, there is no class of the community on which the tariff bears so heavily as it does on the farmer and the workingman. We pay taxes on all the other necessaries on which the rest of the community pay taxes. We have no other recourse but to pay them. The wholesale man, when he buys goods in England, pays the duty, but adds the duty to the price of the goods and charges a profit on it. The retailer also adds his profit, but the farmer and the workingman have no remedy. There is no protection for them under the tariff. They have to pay very high duties on all the necessaries of life besides a high duty on agricultural implements. The Minister of Finance said that the Government had dealt very leniently with the farmer, and told us that we did not enjoy those benefits under the Mackenzie Government which we enjoy to-day. Let me say, for the information of the Minister of Finance, that we had advantages under the Mackenzie Government of which we were quickly deprived when that Government went out of office. There was a clause then in the tariff allowing agricultural implements to be brought in free when imported by agricultural societies. That was a boon which was very soon taken away from us. As a representative of a farming community, I ask for no special legislation. All we ask is to be dealt with as we were by the Mackenzie Government, and not be called on to pay taxes under the false guise of protection. In 1878 the Mackenzie Government was defeated at the polls. But since then there has not been a general election fought out on its merits in a manly, honourable manner. In 1882 we had the Gerrymander Bill; in 1887 we had the Franchise Act; and at the last election the great plank in the Government platform was their statement that they intended going to Washington to get reciprocity. Let me say here that the Minister of Militia (Mr. Patterson) in West Huron, within a mile of a place called St. Augustine, told the farmers at the by-election in 1892, when he was elected to his seat in West Huron, that the Government would take the duty off from binder twine and agricultural implements. When I made the representations I did in this House, concerning the way in which the election was carried in West Huron, the hon. gentleman came to me the following day and spoke to me about the matter. When I accused him of telling the farmers that the duty would be taken off agricultural implements and binder twine, he replied not to whistle until we were out of the wood, that the session was not over. He tried to make me believe, by that statement, that the Government were likely to take action in that direction. That is the way the Government carried the election in 1891. So far as the condition of Canadian farmers is concerned to-day, there is not another class in the community which has felt the depression to such an extent. The Finance Minister admits that this is a very bad time to revise the tariff, for the simple reason that there is depression in manufacturing circles at present. What is the cause of that depression? It was brought about by the reduced prices and small crops which the farmers had been getting for a long time. Let me state what the value of produce has been, during the year 1892, per acre of land:

|---------------------|---------|-----------|
| Fall wheat. | $14 92 | per acre. |
| Spring wheat..... | 8 00 | do |
| Oats... | 10 70 | do |
| Barley..... | 10 15 | do |
| Peas | 11 00 | do |

These are the principal crops the farmers raise for export; and if we accept the statement given by the farmers themselves as to the cost of production in Ontario—and the farmers of Ontario give a higher cost of production than those of the United States, because we cultivate our land better and get more out of it—the farmers suffered on every acre of fall wheat a loss of $4; spring wheat, $6; oats, $4; barley, $4.50; and peas, $4.53. Until the McKinley Bill came into force, barley was one of the best paying crops we had, but, of course, that Bill killed the export. Now we are told to go into mixed farming. I agree that mixed farming is a great benefit to the country, but let me say, as a farmer, that there is no mixed farming into which we can go at once. We must change our system gradually and not rapidly. The conditions of the farmer will not allow of a rapid change. When we go into mixed farming, the only difference is that we feed the crops we raise into our animals, and sell the animals instead of the crops. I want any hon. member on the other side of the House—and there are practical farmers on that side as well as on this—to rise in his place and tell the House how the farmer with these prices is to advance himself to a flourishing, thriving condition such as we have heard described. It is very well for hon. gentlemen who know nothing about these matters to rise and talk to this House, but let any practical farmer show me why the farmer should be satisfied with these prices and these markets. The conditions being as they are, I contend that it is the duty of the Government to give the farmers just as much relief as it is possible for them to give. It must not be forgotten that agriculture is the principal industry in this country. Out of a total export of something like $110,000,000, the agricultural products and animals and their products amounted to $53,000,000. In the same time the export of manufactured goods was only $7,693,000. Why, Sir, we farmers exported nearly eight times as much as did the manufacturers. And, even so far as the manufacturers are concerned, to what country are we to look for an extension of our export trade, provided that conditions are such as to enable them to send out their goods? Must we look to China, Japan or Australia? Not at all, Mr. Speaker. Out of the total export of $7,693,000 of manufactures, Great Britain took $2,454,000, and the United States took $3,563,000. This shows, if it shows anything, that the United States is the best field even for our manufactured goods. We had been told a great deal of the benefits we were to receive and of the benefits we have received from the increase of our population. The Controller of Customs spoke of Toronto, and showed what a benefit it was to the farmers to have an increase of population there, to consume the surplus products of the farm. Could not the hon. gentleman go a little further, could not the hon. gentleman look to the other side of the boundary line and see what a benefit we should derive in the same way if we had reciprocity with the United States? We have Buffalo at our very doors, with a population of 265,554 inhabitants; we have Detroit on our border, with 205,876; we have Rochester, very little inland, with a population of 153,896; we have Cleveland right on the lakes, with 261,000 souls; we have Milwaukee, with regard to which we are advantageously situated, with 204,461 of a population. Then we have New York, which is nearly as close to us in the province of Ontario as is Quebec, and which contains a population of 1,710,715, and Brooklyn, with 853,945. Here is a total city population of over 2,500,000, lying very close to the people of Ontario, and attention to which on our part would leave the markets of Montreal and Quebec to the farmers of Quebec. How much better it would be for the farmers of Ontario to be given free access to this great market upon their very border than to pay $750,000 for a fast line of steamships to carry their goods across the ocean. Let me say, Mr. Speaker, that at the present time the farmer is in a critical condition in more ways than one. The class accustomed to fattening cattle have 70,000 or 80,000 cattle, which they are preparing for the old country market during the summer, and, contrary to all our experience, there is not a single buyer making an offer for any of these animals. Is it not the duty of the Government to give us all the relief they possibly can? I was saying, Mr. Speaker, that the Controller of Customs had got up and had attempted to show the increase that had taken place in farm values within the last ten years. Sir, I shall not go over the whole of these figures; they were ably gone over by my colleague for East Huron (Mr. Macdonald). This increase in the acreage of cleared land in the last ten years is $1,859,390, which, at $20 per acre, would amount to about $37,000,000. Then we must allow something for the general improvements that have taken place, not only in the farm buildings, but in ditching, draining and so on, which computed at any fair rate, will amount to $20,000,000. These figures show a decrease in value of farm lands of $5,416,000. Altogether there must be a reduction of over $65,000,000 in the value of farm property proper. A good deal has been said of the improvements that have been taking place in the farm buildings, and there is a great deal of truth in it. But the time has come when no farmer in Ontario can carry on his farming operations unless he has commodious and well equipped buildings. The time has gone past when farming can be carried on in the slipshod manner of former years. And let me say this: that many of our farmers who now have fine buildings have been obliged to burden their farms in order to get the necessary accommodation to enable them to construct these buildings so necessary for the carrying on of their operations. We have been told that at the inception of a protective policy a higher protection is required than is required afterwards when manufacturing industries have been established on a firm foundation. Such, Sir, was not the case in Canada under this policy. If the Finance Minister had gone back to the earlier figures he would have seen that the National Policy was not imposed at its highest in 1879. In 1880 cotton clothing was only 30 per cent, but when it came to 1889 the rate was raised to 35 per cent. Printed cottons were only 28 per cent, in 1889, 32 per cent. Implements were only 25 per cent in 1880, and in 1889 they were 35 per cent. And in 1889 woollen goods were raised from 7½ cents a pound and 20 per cent ad valorem to 10 cents a pound and 20 per cent ad valorem. Now, Sir, respecting the statement we have heard time and again upon the floor of this House, that when this Government came in deficits disappeared—it has been ably shown that deficits have been greater since they came in. But they have had surpluses also, and let me ask if these surpluses have been a benefit to Canada, if the result has been to raise Canada in the estimation of people of other countries? We know, Sir, that if a lavish amount of money was taken into the treasury there was also a lavish expenditure. We know that large sums were taken out of the treasury and given as extras to the contractors, and we know that large sums went back into the hands of Ministers in order to enable them to secure their position in the country. And what was the effect of this upon the people of Canada, and upon the reputation of our people abroad? Has it added to Canada's good name? Has it raised Canada in the esteem of the people of the British Empire, where we all wish to stand well? Let me read what a Tory paper said on the subject. I quote from the St. James' Gazette:

The existence of an organized system of corruption among public officials in Canada has been conclusively proved, and like everything else on the American continent the bribery has been colossal.

There is one statement made in the British press; here is an even more graphic statement of the case from the 'Graphic Despatch':

The secret of Sir John Macdonald's electoral victories is out. On this side of the water surprise has often been expressed at the patience with which our Canadian cousins submitted to the Tory protectionist rule of that prince of political intriguers. There is now, alas, no difficulty in explaining that curious situation. Sir John's Government rested on a stupendous and all-pervading system of bribery and corruption. Even Tammany Hall smells sweet and clean in comparison with the huge stinkpot of Sir John's Government.

If that is the result of the large amount of surpluses which went to a certain extent into the Treasury of this country, I for one do not envy this Government. Now, the Finance Minister told us that our crops had been protected, that twelve million dollars worth of agricultural products had been kept out of Canada by the National Policy. Now, for the third or fourth time I will have to repeat that the National Policy has not protected the farmer, it has not increased the price of his farm products. We remember that in 1882 this Government appointed a Commission, called Dr. Orton's Commission. I have gone through the report of that Commission and examined it carefully, and I find that in 1878 spring wheat in New York was $1.15 and in Montreal it was $1.29, 14 cents higher in Montreal than in New York. When we come to 1881, it was $1.26 in New York and $1.32 in Montreal, only 6 cents higher in Montreal, whereas it was 14 cents higher before the National Policy was imposed. Now, in 1878, oats were 32.66 cents per bushel in New York and 29.50 cents in Montreal. In 1881 they were 45.83 cents in New York and 39 cents in Montreal. In 1878 there was a difference of 3.16 cents; whereas in 1881 there was a difference of 6.83, or nearly 7 cents a bushel, showing conclusively that the farmer had not been benefited by the adoption of the National Policy, according to a committee of their own choosing. Barley in 1878, in New York, was 75½ cents; in Montreal it was 85½ cents per bushel. When we come to 1881, it was $1.16 in New York, and only 83 cents in Montreal, or 33 cents of a difference, as against 11 cents before the National Policy was imposed. Now, we will take prices at Toronto and Buffalo, and what do we find? And let me state here that these figures are taken from the Year-book, an abstract and record of 1886, showing the fall that has taken place in the price of wheat in Canada and the United States from 1881 to 1886. In 1881, wheat in Montreal was $1.33; in the United States it was $1.11, 22 cents per bushel higher in Canada than in the United States. In 1882 it was $1.30 in Montreal, and $1.18 in the United States, only 12 cents higher in Canada. When we come to 1883, we find it was $1.14 in Montreal and $1.12 in the United States, only 2 cents higher in Canada. In 1886 it was 85 cents in Montreal and 87 cents in the United States; so that while wheat, under this blessed National Policy that protects the farmer, had fallen in the United States 24 cents a bushel, it had fallen in Canada 48 cents a bushel. Will any member of the Government, or any of their supporters, attempt to show us how that change has taken place under the National Policy? On the 19th January, 1892, I find that spring wheat in Toronto was 87½ cents a bushel; in Buffalo it was 91½ cents, 4 cents more in Buffalo than it was in Toronto. Oats were 34½ cents in Toronto, and 40 cents in Buffalo, a difference of 5½ cents. That is the way the farmers of Canada are protected. If the farmers of this country were allowed free intercourse with the United States, if they were allowed to take their products over the line freely, prices would very soon be assimilated, and to our advantage in almost every case. In 1889, I find that wheat in Toronto was 61 cents, on the 23rd March, and on the same date it was only 61 cents in Buffalo. I find that oats in Toronto was 40 cents a bushel, and 38 cents a bushel in Buffalo; so that down to the present time the prices were almost exactly similar. Let me say that the reason why oats were 2 cents higher in Canada is that they weigh two pounds to the bushel more here than in the United States. Now, it is said that the United States are not the best market for our produce. I have a statement here made up from the Trade and Navigation Returns for 1889, at a time that the National Policy was swimming quietly and peaceably along, at a time when there was no excitement with respect to McKinley Bills or any other Bills; and I want to show by that statement that without reciprocity with the United States, that country still takes the most of the agricultural produce of the Canadian farmer apart from our animals and their products. We all want to get the markets of the United States, and we still want to retain the British market, believing that for some kinds of produce the British market is best, especially for our cattle, for our wheat, for our cheese and for some others of our products.

STATEMENT of Agricultural Products Exported to Great Britain and the United States, July 1st, 1889.

| | To Great Britain. | To United States. |
|----------------------------|-------------------------|-------------------------|
| | £ | £ |
| Dominion | 3,674,055 | 9,125,707 |
| Ontario | 880,879 | 7,720,457 |
| Quebec | 2,438,519 | 934,367 |
| Nova Scotia | 351,043 | 141,899 |
| New Brunswick | 2,093 | 142,026 |
| Manitoba | 759 | 85,684 |
| British Columbia | 750 | 13,505 |
| Prince Edward Island | 12 | 87,769 |

From this table it will be seen that our exports to the United States were nearly three times the amount that we exported to Great Britain. These figures show conclusively that the United States are our best market for many articles of agricultural produce, and for some kinds of animals and their products. In barley, we sent to the British market 934,501 bushels, or $654,603 worth. Let me say that in barley, we have lost the market of the United States since the McKinley Bill to the extent of over five million dollars. We have lost on barley and eggs a market taking yearly $6,801,000.31, a market that was the most profitable to the farmers of Ontario. I hold that the McKinley Bill was certainly to a great extent the offspring of the action of the Government in regard to American vessels and their action on other public questions. I have no doubt whatever that the United States Government remembered all those matters in framing the McKinley tariff. Have the farmers of this country been well protected? American hides come into this country free, and they were brought in to the value of $1,731,000. There was a time when the farmers could get full value for their hides; but they are almost unsaleable at the present time. Undoubtedly the United States is the best market for our farmers. It is at our door. We do not need to establish a fast line of steamers or to give bounties to a steamship company to secure that market. It is a market which is available the whole year, and the farmers of Ontario have felt keenly the loss of that market, especially for their eggs. On account of being shut out of the American market, farmers in the western portion of the province have been compelled to sell their eggs during the entire winter at 10 cents per dozen. We have been told that we enjoyed protection as regards our horses. Since the McKinley tariff shut out our horses from the American market, Ontario farmers have almost given up breeding horses for sale or export. Although the English market has taken large numbers of them, it is not so favourable a market as the United States. Any person who knows anything about shipping animals is aware that our horses can be sent across the line without any great danger, but many of our finest animals, especially those which are nervous and highly strung, are lost on the ocean voyage to England, and great risk is involved in making these shipments. Our best market has been lost to us through the McKinley Bill, especially for the sale of our barley, horses, eggs, lambs, hay, poultry and other lines of produce. The farmers have been told a great deal about the cheapness of goods they require, and it has been stated that they have not been so cheap for fourteen years, and that yet they will be cheaper still. We have further been told that the transport provided for the farmers is the very best enjoyed by the people of any country in the world. But the rates of transport have pressed very heavily on the farmers in many respects. I have often shipped cattle east, and have found that cattle were being shipped from Chicago to Montreal, a distance of 1,000 miles, for $50 per car, while I was called upon to pay $54 per car for a distance of 400 miles. Is that giving the farmers cheap transport? Do the people of the North-west imagine they are getting the cheapest transport that can be given? While I was there a year ago last fall I travelled from Regina to Prince Albert, and saw strings of teams freighting goods between those points, because the rate was cheaper, and the railway was only being used for carrying quick despatch freight. At Edmonton I was told the people were accustomed to pay 75 cents per 100 pounds for freight from Calgary, a distance of 270 miles, before the railway was built, and either the whole of that sum or at least one-half would be taken out in trade. Now the railway company charge 82 cents per 100 pounds, the whole amount of which must be paid in cash, and goes out of the country. That is the great benefit that the farmers are enjoying with respect to cheap transport. We have always been told that we are obtaining goods cheaper under the National Policy than at any period of our history, and the attempt has been made to cause it to appear as if reduced prices had been brought about by the National Policy. Let me quote a few figures to show that there has been a corresponding reduction throughout the world. From 1870 to 1874, in Britain, a ton of pig iron was worth £4 10s. 9d., from 1885 it was worth £2 5s. 7d., or a fraction over one-half. Railway iron was worth from 1870 to 1874 £10 7s., from 1885 to 1889 £4 17s. 1d., less than half it cost during the previous period. Steel that cost £12 1s. 1d. in 1874 cost in 1887 only £4 12s. When we come to flannels (and these figures are taken from the statistical tables of British manufactures), we find that in 1889 the cost was 11 66-100d., in 1892 8d., a very large reduction indeed. Cottons in 1878 were 4d., while in 1892 they were 2 90-100d. These reductions have taken place in almost every country where manufactures are established, but the people of Canada have not been benefited to the extent of the improvement that has been made in manufacturing in other countries.

After Recess.

Mr. McMILLAN. Mr. Speaker, before recess I was saying that the National Policy did not protect the farmers and that it could not protect them, and I repeat that that policy has borne very heavily upon the agriculturists and upon the workingmen of this country. It has taken very large sums of money out of their pockets, and, although the Finance Minister told us that, after the policy had been established for a length of time, the natural tendency would be that keen competition would cut down prices, yet such has not been the case. I know of no competition in almost any line of manufactured goods in Canada by which prices have been kept down. Let me quote the statement of one who has been well acquainted with the National Policy from its inception, a gentleman who, perhaps, had one of the largest shares in bringing it about when it was first imposed—I mean the member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy). He says:

Of that $265,000,000 of goods manufactured in Canada, are the people of Canada paying more for, than they would pay if it were not for the protective policy? If it be true that $265,000,000 manufactured in Canada in addition to the large importations we make—if it be true that these prices are dearer than they would be but for the protective policy—it is for us here to see, and for the people of this country to determine, how much more we are paying than we would pay but for the system I refer to. I will not attempt to put that into figures but perhaps one would not be far out if it were said that taking quality and price into consideration—because I do not think the comparison would be true unless you take into consideration quality as well as price—about 30 per cent of that $265,000,000 is paid by the people of this country in addition to what they would have to pay but for this protective policy.

Be it remembered that that is upon goods manufactured in this country, and that it does not include imported goods, upon which a very heavy duty also is paid, and which the people have to bear their share of. When we inquire into these things and see that we are paying these large sums of money, we must ask in vain: Where is that keen competion that should have been brought about by the National Policy, and why has it not cheapened goods to the consumer? We find, Sir, the authority I have quoted states further:

He ventures to say that there is hardly an industry, certainly not one of the great industries, so to speak, which have been fostered by the protective policy, that is not now in one way or another in a combination and in which in other words there is not a practical monopoly.

We have it brought to our attention every day that all our great industries are now a practical monopoly. Only the other day I chanced to take up a paper, and I saw in it a statement which caused astonishment to me that it should have been allowed to see the light of day; but, in conversation with a gentleman of the press, he told me that the statement I referred to was never intended for the public, that it found its way into a printer's office, that it was intended for the owner of the office, and not for publication, but through some mishap it fell into the hands of one of the printers and had been accidentally published. That statement was to the effect that one of the cotton companies had declared a dividend of 15 per cent upon their capital of $1,200,000, and that $750,000 was laid by for the benefit of the shareholders, in addition to the dividend. That is one of the strongest evidences that competition has not brought down the price of goods, and it shows the immense amount of money that protection has taken out of the pockets of the people. How much is each individual in Canada taxed on account of this larger amount that we have to pay for that $265,000,000 of goods manufactured in Canada? Why, Sir, it amounts to the sum of $16 per capita of the whole population, or $80 a head for a family of five. I will show how this affects the country. I will take my own county, where we have 64,190 of a population, and this policy takes annually out of their pockets $1,027,040. It takes out of the three ridings of Huron—because the county of Huron is composed of two townships and an incorporated town more than is included in the ridings—it takes out of the three ridings $930,752. In the west riding of Huron, with a population of 20,020 people, it takes out of their pockets $320,320; in the east riding of Huron, with a population of 18,968 people, it takes out of their pockets $303,488; in the south riding of Huron, which I have the honour to represent, with a population of 19,184, the large sum of $306,944 is taken out of the pockets of the people on these goods manufactured in Canada, and that immense sum of money goes directly into the pockets of the manufacturers of this country. Now, with regard to the townships which I have the honour to represent. The township of Hay, with a population of 4,244, pays the sum of $68,904 annually; the town of Hullett, where I live myself, with a population of 3,281, pays $52,496 annually to go into the pockets of the combinesters, manufacturers and monopolists of this country. The township of McKillop, with a population of 3,086, pays $49,376 annually into the pockets of the combinesters, for which the people receive no benefit in return. The township of Tuckersmith, with a population of 2,867, pays $45,872 annually; the township of Stanley, with a population of 2,470, pays $39,540; the township of Seaforth, with a population of 2,641, pays $42,256, and the village of Bayfield, with a population of 595, pays the sum of $10,520. These are enormous sums taken out of the pockets of the people of this country, for which we derive no corresponding benefit. Now, Sir, what is the total amount of taxation that the people of this country have to pay? We find that the taxation on customs and inland revenue that was paid in 1892 was $5.81 per capita, so that in a family of five it amounted to $27.05 taxation, which goes into the Treasury, in addition to the tax, as you may call it, of $80 per family which goes into the pockets of the manufacturers and combinesters, or in all a total sum of $107 per family taken out of the people in taxation; while they really only get the benefit of the $27.05. These are very large sums of money taken out of the pockets of the people, for which they receive no corresponding benefit. Now, we have been told time and again that the Government of the Hon. Alexander Mackenzie was a Government of deficits. It is true that in the last four years of that Government there were deficits to the tune of $3,426,958; but during two years of the Government of the late Sir John Macdonald there were deficits to the tune of $8,074,630; which were entailed by the carelessness—nay, the criminal neglect—of those occupying the Treasury benches in failing to satisfy the just claims of the inhabitants of the North-west. Hon. members claim that the Government have a surplus at the present time. It is true, they have had surpluses amounting in five years to $9,495,000. You would expect that an economical Government would have reduced the debt of the country by a corresponding amount; but have they done so? No, Sir, the debt of the country is steadily increasing. When the Government of the Hon. Alexander Mackenzie took up the reins of power in 1874, the amount of customs duties per capita paid by the people of Canada was $3.74; the year they went out of power it was reduced to $3.13 per head, a reduction of 61 cents per head. Now, we find that the customs taxes imposed by the present Government, instead of being $3.13 per head, amounted to $5 per head in 1890, $4.83 in 1891, and $4.18 in 1892, or an average of $4.67, which is $1.45 per capita in excess of what was imposed in the last year of the Mackenzie Government. This is equal to $6,546,000, taken from the pockets of the people of this country in a single year or, if we take the average population for the 14 years under the present Government, we find that $50-

$1,706 of customs duties has been taken out of the pockets of the people of Canada more than would have been taken if the Mackenzie Government had remained in power. Now, it has been said that the farmers are not willing that the manufacturers of this country should have a chance. Let me say as a farmer, and giving expression here to the views of the farmers, that we want to see every industry in this country fairly prosperous; but we do not want to see any industry taking large sums of money out of the pockets of the people for which no corresponding return is given. We have a very important industry in the western portion of Ontario, which I fear is going to be ruined by the changes which have been made by the Government in their present revision of the tariff; I mean the salt manufacturing industry. Since the duty on salt was reduced two or three years ago, the salt manufacturers of Western Ontario have just barely been making the business pay. The American salt manufacturers have been taking a large portion of the trade. In the United States there was a duty of 8 cents per hundred pounds on all salt shipped in bulk; but when shipped in packages—barrels or bags—the duty was 12 cents per hundred pounds; while in Canada we had a duty of only 5 cents per hundred pounds on salt in bulk and 7½ cents in bags, barrels or other packages. During the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1893, the large quantity of 20,163,000 pounds of salt was imported into Canada, of which 9,608,392 pounds came from the United States, while the total quantity of salt exported from Canada in the same year amounted to only 4,010 pounds, showing conclusively that the salt manufacturers of the Dominion of Canada, and of Ontario especially, were not in a sufficiently prosperous condition under the late tariff even to keep their own market. But now, since salt has been placed on the free list while the salt manufacturers have to pay 60 cents per ton of duties on the coal they use, there is not the slightest doubt in my mind that, unless some relief is given, that industry will go down. If I speak thus on behalf of the salt manufacturers it is not because they have been supporters of mine; for those of them in the riding which I represent are all politically opposed to me. But I care not whether they are political opponents or friends; I want to see every legitimate industry in this country prosper, and I want the Government to give the salt manufacturers this much relief at least: That if they will not take the duty from coal entirely, they will at least remove it from such coal as is required in the manufacture of salt. But I am of opinion that the salt manufacturers require a great deal more relief than that from the hands of the Government. I think that the industry to be successful should have the duty taken off the plates in which they dry the salt, as well as from the nuts, bolts, rods, and tubing that they use. In asking this measure of justice for the salt manufacturers, I only ask that the same privilege be extended to them that is extended to other manufacturers in the country, of getting their raw material free of duty. It is a very important industry, and one which largely benefits the whole community, especially the farmers. I remember the time when we had to pay $3 a barrel for salt in the county of Huron, and although at times the manufacturers in that industry entered into a combine and attempted to charge extravagant prices that was but for a short time, and I am convinced, from personal knowledge of the industry from its earliest infancy in the county of Huron, that more money has been lost in that county than has ever been gained in profits by all the salt manufacturers in the Dominion. I therefore think the Government ought to give that relief to the salt manufacturers to which they are justly entitled. There is no industry of greater benefit to the farmers. It has furnished us with a valuable manure cheaply at our own doors. We are often told by Government supporters that we are continually decrying our own country. Sir, I deny that charge. I have been going among the farmers for the last six years, and in my opinion there is not a spot on the continent of America which can compare with this Canada of ours. I hold that the province of Ontario is the garden of the continent of North America. I hold that we have advantages there which perhaps no other locality enjoys. We can raise better crops, but no doubt a great deal is due to the superior intelligence of our agriculturists and the advanced system they pursue. I want a tariff that will give to every individual the just reward of his labours. I do not want a tariff imposed which will take one third of my earnings and put them into the pockets of a company, or a combine, or an individual who never earned a cent. I want a tariff so framed that the taxation imposed under it will go solely into the treasury of the country. If, after sixteen years of protection, our industries are not capable of standing alone, if we have some hot-bed industries to which the conditions of the country are not naturally suited, the sooner these industries disappear the better both for the people and the manufacturers themselves. We want a policy that will be just to all parties and to all industries. I, as a farmer, ask no favour of the Government for the agricultural community at the expense of any other class, but I ask the Government to remove all legislation which bears unjustly upon the farmers and takes large sums of money from them without giving them any corresponding benefit. Twelve months ago I said that there was a little cloud in the west. That cloud has spread, and that is one of the reasons why the Government has seen fit to reduce the duties in the way they have done. They know that the farmers have entered into an association among themselves, and are determined that no government shall rule which does not give attention to their interest. Those farmers have sent a deputation here, and they are watching with an eagle eye the course of the Government. I approve of the reduction made, but I say that we had a right to expect they would have been greater. Cotton goods are still charged 30 per cent. Let me tell you, Sir, what a duty of 30 per cent means to the consumer. When the wholesale man imports these goods he adds his profit to the duty as well as to the first cost. Then when those goods go into the hands of the retailer he also adds his profits to the wholesale prices, so that by the time they reach the consumer, that duty of 30 per cent is swelled to 46 per cent, at the very lowest calculation. And that increased cost has the fact of raising the prices of goods manufactured in this country to a similar extent. I shall not say much more at present, but I repeat we had a right to expect that the duty would have been taken off articles which we consume and of which we raised the raw material. The system adopted by the Government in years gone by, of allowing millers to bring in wheat in bond, make it into flour and ship it out in bond, had the effect of driving all the small millers from the province of Ontario, so that to-day you cannot find one of these small mills which we had twenty or thirty years ago. They have all gone into the hands of large corporations, and while there are many honourable men in those corporations who would not extort the whole amount they can under this system, still the system has had an injurious effect and should be reformed. Let me say that, so far as the reduction in duty upon agricultural implements is concerned, when the question was put to the Finance Minister whether the Government were going to allow those implements to come in at their invoice value, or whether they were going to allow the customs officers to put a revaluation on them, I was sorry to hear him reply that they would pursue the policy in the future which they had followed in the past. The customs officers thus have full power to put their own valuation on the implements imported, and thus nullify the effect of the reduction in the tariff. Thanking you, Sir, and the House for the kind attention which has been given to my remarks, I shall now resume my seat.

Mr. SMITH (Ontario). After the statement of the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. McMillan) that the farmers on this side of the House are ignorant and do not understand what they are talking about, I feel that I will have to throw myself especially upon the indulgence of the hon. gentlemen opposite, whilst I briefly address the House on questions with which I have been somewhat intimately connected during my whole life. I refer to those concerning farming operations. I do not propose tonight to follow the hon. gentleman in his favourite role, not only in this House but upon the platform of the scandalmonger, because this is something which we can throw back. And when we consider the momentous issues involved in such a discussion as we are now engaged in, it would be unwise of any member of the House to waste his time in taking such a course. The hon. gentleman charged the Government with having been guilty of great extravagance; but I might remark that the hon. gentleman has spent a number of years in the receipt from the Ontario Government of public moneys, while going up and down the country talking in the interests of the farmers; and if his speech to-day is any example of what he talks to the farmers in Ontario I am not surprised that it should have taken the Opposition fifteen years to convince even the Tories of Canada that the tariff should be lowered. The hon. gentleman's whole speech to-night, with the exception of one noteworthy portion, was devoted to the abuse of the system of protection. He looked to the other side of the line and lauded the protection of that country. He wants us to throw down the barrier between Canada and the United States, and adopt a protective tariff, which is infinitely worse than anything we ever dreamed of here. But I wish to point to the last portion of the hon. gentleman's speech. It is not often in this House that we have witnessed the humiliating spectacle of a member spending nearly two hours in decrying protection—telling us that protection is a curse not only to the farmers but the people generally—and then, when his dog happens to be kicked, appealing to the Government to put a duty on salt. I say to the hon. gentleman that, in his place, had I the courage of my convictions, after taking the course that he took in the first part of his speech, I would have fought the battle out on that line, and said to the people of Huron that I was opposed to protection in every sense and intended to oppose protection to salt. But the moment some of his people are hurt, the hon. gentleman comes down here and whines and begs the Government to continue a protection to an industry, which, at one time in the history of Canada, was subject to one of the greatest combines ever formed here. That hon. gentleman will tell you, Sir, that combines are wrong, and yet to-night he has taken the unusual and unexampled course of defending that particular combine. A number of years ago, in the early days of the discussion of this question, as a young man taking some interest in public affairs, I thought it well that, at all events, I should form an opinion upon the propositions which had been submitted to Parliament by the late leader of the Conservative party. The proposition as put was that a readjustment of the tariff would benefit and foster the agricultural, mining, shipping, and manufacturing interests of the Dominion. Taken in that connection was the opinion—hesitatingly expressed, it is true—by that great authority, Mr. John Stewart Mill, that a young and rising country might adopt a system of protection such as would assist them in naturalizing foreign industries. On looking into the matter I came to the conclusion, satisfactory to myself at all events, that this would be the best course for the Dominion of Canada. This was a young and rising country, thinly settled and lying alongside a great and highly protected country to the south of it. We had an industrious, intelligent and active people, and we had within our bounds almost inexhaustible resources and a climate almost unsurpassed in the world. Now, the point has been referred to that a desire has been expressed throughout Canada for a revision of the tariff. This has been led up to to a certain extent by the farmers institutes, pushed on by such gentlemen as the hon. gentleman for South Huron (Mr. McMillan), and, during the last two or three years, by the Patrons of Industry. We have heard a good deal about the Patrons of Industry and their platform here to-night, and, so far as a great deal of that platform is concerned, we have no quarrel with it. It will be within the recollection of members of this House that last year the hon. the Finance Minister gave a promise that a revision would take place if, after examination, it was found to be in the interests of the country. That pledge has been faithfully carried out; and, while opinions throughout the country may have differed as to what will be best, still I believe, take it altogether, that there was a strongly expressed opinion that the tariff should be lowered. The prices of all kinds of grain have been exceptionally low, and it was thought that, under these circumstances, the farmers should be favoured, if possible, in the reduction of the tariff. Of late years the farmers of this country have been competing not only against cheap labour, but against the labour saving results of railway extension in such countries as India, Egypt, the Argentine Republic, and Russia. The work done under the National Policy from time to time has been remarkable. Whilst both free trade countries and highly protected countries have suffered terribly during the past year, Canada, with a moderate protection, has been able to hold her own. We have greatly increased our production of cheese, butter, lard, and bacon. In this connection I desire to refer to the statement made by Professor Robertson in speaking a little to the south of us. When asked what a farmer on the other side of the line ought to do when he had to pay $19 per ton for bran, and sell his butter at 14 cents, Professor Robertson advised him to come here and buy his bran at $17 per ton and sell his butter for 24 cents. I desire to refer for a moment to the statement made by the hon. member, who has just taken his seat, with regard to the horse trade of Canada. I may say that considerable imports have been made into Canada from the United States.

These imports have been ranging from 1,700 horses during the past year to over 2,000 horses the year before, and you will find that the prices have run down from $58 to $46 per horse. It has been pointed out in this House on more than one occasion that the horse trade on the other side of the line has been lost to us. The hon. gentleman has exclaimed here, in tones as loud as it was possible for him to use, that this trade was of immense value to the people of Canada. On more than one occasion on the platform I have asked how it is that those animals that can be sent into the United States free—animals for breeding purposes—were as unsaleable there to-day as the cheaper horses, if not more so. The simple cause is that the United States is full and overflowing with horses and they are looking for markets everywhere. It is only the other day that a carload or two of horses came into Toronto from the United States to be sold. This proves that that trade is lost especially to the province of Ontario, and that there is nothing in it. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), speaking in this House, compared the prices of grain during the years in which Mr. Mackenzie had control of the Government of this country and the present time. I need not refer particularly to the figures, because I admit the fact that prices are lower to-day than they were then. But I would like to ask the hon. gentleman, I would like to ask any hon. gentleman who may follow me, how it is that the farmers were able to export $53,786,000 in 1893, whilst in 1878, with the prices quoted by the hon. member for North Norfolk, they only exported $32,028,000, an increase in 1893 over 1878 of $21,758,000. The hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) stated the other day that the rural population of the Dominion had not increased. I am prepared to accept that statement for the present. The population has increased during the past number of years by about 800,000.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) What number of years?

Mr. SMITH (Ont.) Between 1878 and 1893. These people must be living in our cities, towns, and villages, and, if the rural population has not increased, there must be 800,000 people more in 1893 than in 1878 fed by precisely the same number of farmers. Now, I find that the annual average export of farm products in each year from 1874 to 1878 was $31,984,203, while the annual average between 1889 and 1893 was $43,690,512, so that in these five years the farmers of Canada had exported $60,000,000 more than they had in the same number of years of the former period. In connection with this I want to refer to a statement which may, perhaps, be misunderstood, at all events in my own riding. We have been changing our mode of farming, and I am sorry to admit that South

Mr. SMITH (Ontario).

Ontario, perhaps one of the finest agricultural constituencies to be found in this Dominion, has not changed its mode of farming as completely as some other counties have done, and to-day is suffering more than some others on account of continuing in the old methods. But notwithstanding that fact, the farmers of Canada to-day are in a better position than they were during the period when the Government of this country was controlled by the hon. gentlemen opposite. I would like to say that the National Policy has meant a great deal more than a simple tariff. It has meant the developments of our railways, it has meant that our cheese and butter, on account of the improved methods adopted in their manufacture, and the greater interest our people are taking in that industry by the establishment of our experimental stations, are to-day amongst the largest articles of export from this country. I might mention in this connection the wonderful results which we achieved in Chicago in some of those articles; and whilst it is true that we were not afraid of the world there, that we more than held our own, our exhibit reflects, it appears to me, a great deal of credit upon our farmers, upon their intelligence and upon their industry. Hon. gentlemen opposite claim that protection has been but of little value in connection with many of the articles that we produce, such as butter, cheese, pork, beef and coarse grains. Well, if protection has not done any good on these articles, it has done the farmer no good in anything. Sir, if you take the statements made at different meetings held throughout the province of Ontario last fall, you will scarcely find a single farmer asking that the duty should be taken off one of these articles. And why? Simply because, whether he may have been Grit or Tory, he knew down in his heart that he had made money out of the protective duties imposed upon these articles. Now, let me for a moment refer to the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite. They tell us that they have a policy. The hon. member for South Grey (Mr. Landerkin), in speaking the other day, screeched out that they had a policy, that it was one of liberty and freedom. When he was speaking in that way I could not help but think that their policy resembled a great deal the principles of the bandits in the Western States, where a man chooses and takes what he pleases. That would be the course pursued by hon. gentlemen opposite if they got into power; they would simply take our policy and mutilate it in such a way that it would be of no service to any one. It was strongly pointed out this afternoon by the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule), that it would mean taking the duties off the necessaries of life, the products of the farm, such as cheese, butter, pork, beef and coarse grains. But it would do a great deal more; it would still leave a duty on what the farmer would have to buy. Now, reference has been made to implements, and some speakers have contended that the duties should have been lowered still more upon implements. I do not think we can complain much of the prices we pay for agricultural implements to-day. The best implements are as low in Canada as they are on the other side. It is true that in many of the tests which have taken place Canada has been able to hold her own, but there might be one difficulty that I may mention. I do not know whether our Canadian people are to blame for it, but they have, perhaps, come to the conclusion, owing to the whisperings of the people to the south of us, that our machines are not as good as the American machines; and the Americans will tell you, on the other hand, that our machines are simply imitations of theirs. Then we would have to fight the Americans in our own markets, and we would be at a still greater disadvantage in going into theirs. Now, if the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite were pursued, if they were to adopt a tariff for revenue only, they would have to take a very different course from what they have taken in the past. Judging them from their achievements when in office, one would not accuse them of being great economists. They not only increased the public debt at a very rapid rate, but they met with deficits year after year. Now, the hon. member for Wellington (Mr. McMullen), told us the other night that he would economize. He would economize by doing away with the Franchise Act, that cost us, he said, about $200,000; that is to say, he would place us in the hands of his friends of the Ontario Government, he would place us at their mercy, and every man who held office under the Dominion would be disfranchised. Are the Parliament and people of Canada prepared to give up their rights and liberties in that respect, and place themselves in the hands of their opponents in the province of Ontario, even if they could save $200,000 a year? Then he says he would do away with the Mounted Police. Well, I do not know very much about the Mounted Police, but this I do know, that the management of our Northwest affairs has been more successful than that of our neighbours to the south of us. We have none of the terrible tales to tell of Indian troubles that the people of the United States have to tell in connection with the management of their Indians. Our Mounted Police from first to last have been able to keep peace in our North-west, and I do not believe that the people of Canada to-day are prepared to do away with that service. I do not say that in the near or distant future, the time may not come when we may be able to do away with the Mounted Police, but to-day this country is not prepared to do away with it. Now, hon. gentlemen opposite have not stated their policy, they dare not state their policy. If they were honest men, if they had the interest of their country at heart, they would be prepared to come down with a policy in black and white upon the tariff, so that it could be compared with what we are offering the country. But they are not willing to do that, they prefer to deal in generalities and to tell us that they want a tariff for revenue only, when at the same time they know from their past record that it would be impossible to carry on the Government under such a tariff. I must say to the hon. gentlemen that if they were able to bring forth such a tariff, it would be like nothing in the Heavens above, or in the earth beneath, or in the waters under the earth. I want to make one statement more, and I refer to the speech of the member for South Huron (Mr. McMillan), who said that the farmers upon this side of the House are not honest, that we have not the interests of the farmers at heart. I may say to that hon. gentleman that as a farmer I yield to no man occupying a similar position on either side of the House, in my loyalty and devotion to the agricultural interests of Canada. They are as dear to me as they are to the hon. gentleman; and when they say that we do not know what we are talking about, I cannot but remember that the people of Canada have endorsed our policy upon different occasions for the past fifteen years. Although I do not think the new tariff is perfect, because it is human, and I reserve to myself the right when in Committee of the Whole to state my views regarding two or three matters, if I find it necessary, yet, taken altogether, from end to end, it is a policy that I believe is wholly and strongly in favour of the farmers of Canada. I believe that it will meet their wishes as much as any tariff it is possible to frame, that it will please the Patrons of Industry, who demand that we shall have a tariff for revenue only; and I may say this to the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. McMillan), that although he stated that this tariff and the old tariff imposed burdens very grievous to bear, there is one matter in connection with the old tariff specially deserving notice, and it is, that the free goods have increased in value from thirty-one millions to forty-five millions, and dutiable goods have remained at about the same figure, seventy millions. I venture to assert that the duty has been paid in a large measure upon articles of luxury, and while the farmers have the right, as much as any other men, to wear and use articles of luxury, I make this statement, and it is very well known, that the farmers are not paying a very large proportion of the public revenue on the luxuries which are enumerated in the tariff, and it is very well they do not. I close with this statement, which I desire to repeat, that the tariff as now submitted to the House is, taken all in all, very strongly in favour of the farmers of Canada.

Mr. RINFRET. (Translation.) I have listened with much interest to the Budget speech delivered, a few days ago, by the hon. the Minister of Finance, and I think I may say that the people of Canada at large will read with the same interest this financial statement which was for so long a time anxiously and impatiently waited for. It is a well known fact that for a long while there has been much discontent, not only in the Liberal party, but even among the friends of the hon. the Minister of Finance, against the protective policy and the high tariff which we have had for many years. This dissatisfaction was already at such a pitch at the last session that the hon. gentleman himself understood that public opinion was clamouring for a remodelling of the tariff and important changes in our fiscal legislation. For a reason or another, he deemed it his duty to postpone this readjustment to the present session. It must be owned that the dissatisfaction has only been spreading since last year, and it has even lately taken the proportions of a real agitation. Well, Mr. Speaker, I think I am in a position to state that those who were complaining of the tariff we have had up to now will not be more satisfied with the new tariff brought up to this House for their approval. Indeed, the changes proposed by the hon. gentleman amount to what? The duties have been raised upon certain things and lowered on many others. But this lowering is hardly perceptible, and there is no change which is calculated to impress the public sentiment. And I think I can, in all earnestness, apply here the word of Alphonse Karr: "The more it changes, the more it is the same thing." One need not review the details of the new tariff to show the unimportance of the changes proposed. To prove it, it is sufficient to quote two parts of the speech of the hon. the Minister of Finance. In the first part of his speech, he stated that whatever changes might be proposed, the protective principle will be maintained in its entirety. In the second part, when referring to the public expenditure, to the revenue required to meet it, he stated that of all necessity there ought to be a sufficient revenue to meet an expenditure of $37,000,000. Mr. Speaker, if the protective principle is to be maintained in all its entirety, and if, on the other hand, the new tariff is to yield as much revenue as the late one, the changes proposed cannot amount to much. Whatever might be the differences of opinion which existed in the past, and still exist between the hon. the Minister of Finance and myself, there is a point as to which I am happy to meet with the hon. gentleman, that is the definition of the policies of both parties in this House. The hon. gentleman stated that the only difference of opinion that existed between us was this: Both parties acknowledge that there must be imposts so as to meet the public expenditure; there is no difference on that point. The difference between us and the Conservative party is that we are of opinion that just enough taxes should be imposed to meet the public expenditure, while the Conservative party profess, on the contrary, that they must moreover impose taxes in order to protect the manufacturing industries of Canada. Well, Mr. Speaker, I am willing to meet the hon. gentleman on this ground. The taxation in Canada amounted, in 1878, in round figures, to something like $18,000,000. In these late years, it has reached the enormous figure of $30,000,000. That is to say there was an increase of 65 per cent in the last fifteen years. We have had some opportunities in this House, my hon. friends on this side and myself, to oppose the large increase in the public expenditure. Many a time we have established that the public expenditure in Canada was increasing at too rapid a rate and that it undoubtedly exceeded the natural resources of the country. Yet it must be owned that since this expenditure exists, taxes must be imposed to meet it. But it must also be owned that the revenue required to meet this expenditure is already so large that we ought not to impose additional taxes in order to protect the manufactures of the country. I think I am able to show that the additional taxes imposed to protect the manufactures of the country represent nearly 50 per cent of the taxes required for the administration of the public affairs. For several years past the protective policy had the effect of giving rise in the country to a good many monopolies which, as a result, brought the people to pay large sums. Take, for instance, the cotton goods monopoly. The taxes paid upon that article imported from foreign countries amounted, on an average, during these last years, to $1,150,000 out of an import of about four millions. The annual consumption of cotton goods is about $16,000,000, by adding the article manufactured in the country. I had an opportunity to get some information upon that matter from the wholesale merchants of the city of Quebec, and here is what I was told—moreover, it could not be otherwise—I was told that the cotton goods manufactured in Canada sell at the same price as the cotton goods imported from foreign countries. Well, if that is well founded, it is plain that we pay taxes on the cotton goods manufactured in the country the same as on those imported from foreign countries. Mr. Speaker, if three times more cotton goods are manufactured in the country than are imported, it is easy to estimate that the taxation on that article alone was from three to four million dollars a year. Therefore, as to that sole monopoly, the taxation was over three million dollars a year. Here is another one: the woollen goods. Of course, the amount paid on that article was not so large, because its consumption is not as large. I do not wish to tire the House with figures, but I have made the computation, and I came to the conclusion that the amount paid by the people to uphold this monopoly, amounts to two or three million dollars a year. The same conclusion may be drawn as regards the manufactured iron goods. The taxes paid on those articles amounted to two or three million dollars, simply to pay the monopoly of the iron manufacturers. The hon. the Minister of Finance proposes a slight decrease on the agricultural implements. The duty upon these was 35 per cent and he decreases it to 20 per cent. We must thank him for this decrease; but, when he made it, he was well aware that that duty of 20 per cent, so far as the province of Quebec and the province of Ontario are concerned, and, even the whole Dominion of Canada, with the exception of the North-west, where conditions are different, he was aware, I repeat, that that duty of 20 per cent was a prohibitive duty, and that it in no way affected the condition of the Canadian manufacturers. Mr. Speaker, I have just examined three of the principal monopolies maintained by the protective policy. I might add several others to them; there are monopolies on cordage, on sugar, on coal oil. They are very many. I will only say a word with respect to the sugar monopoly. The duties upon sugar were lessened last year, they were eight-tenths of a cent per pound; they are lessened this year to six-tenths; that duty of eight-tenths of a cent did not seem large, yet here is the effect it had last year. The consumption of the country has reached—I do not guarantee the figure as I am speaking from memory—something like 345,000,000 pounds. The duty collected being eight-tenths, it represents two million five hundred thousand dollars collected from the consumers. Out of this enormous amount, less than $100,000 went to the Public Treasury, the balance, that is to say, about $2,400,000 falling into the manufacturers pockets. Let us now take the question of the consumption of coal oil. It is a sure thing, according to the best estimates, that some sixteen to twenty millions of gallons of coal oil are consumed annually in Canada, upon which the Government imposes a duty of 7½ cents per gallon. This represents, perhaps, one million dollars and a half for the duty only. Well, only a third of that amount goes into the Public Treasury, the balance being pocketed by the manufacturers who work that product. Mr. Speaker, I was anxious to examine some of the articles upon which the people are called upon to pay taxes much higher than would be supposed by the amount deposited in the Public Treasury, because the manufacturers raise an enormous amount, thanks to these so-called protective duties. The conclusion to which I came is that the people of Canada has paid taxes to the amount of at least fifteen million dollars for the only sake of maintaining and enriching the manufacturers. That amount of fifteen million dollars of taxes represents one-third of the whole taxation imposed upon the country by the present Government. According to the best estimates, I think we can state without any exaggeration, that since fifteen years the charges upon the people were doubled without any necessity with regard to the public requirements, for the only object of protecting the manufacturers and to the prejudice of the consumers. It must be owned that this is a most serious and momentous question. Now, Mr. Speaker, allow me to say a word about the exodus of our compatriots to the United States. I heard the hon. the Minister of Finance and some other members on the other side of the House say that that exodus had nothing to do with the National Policy introduced in 1879. If protection had nothing to do with that exodus, how is it that it is even now larger than before? Yet, according to their account, the protective system was to do away with it. I think I am in a position to establish the counterpart of the contention repeatedly put forward during this debate, namely, that the protective system did not increase that exodus. Prior to the adoption of the National Policy, it is true that a number of our compatriots were crossing the line each year to go and work in the United States, but there is not a man, knowing what is going on and making inquiries, who does not know that the exodus of the Canadians to the United States doubled and even trebled these last years. True, the taxation is not the only reason that led them to emigrate, but I think it is one of the reasons. Here is how I explain the matter. We all know that it is chiefly heads of numerous families who take to the United States and we know that in our rural districts, it is no uncommon thing to find heads of families of eight or ten children. Well, the increase alone of the taxes representing at least from thirty to forty dollars a head, which these heads of families have to pay in addition, gives in eight or ten years a total amount of from four to five hundred dollars. It must be confessed that this is a very appreciable amount. It is a well known fact that a farmer who owes five hundred dollars on his farm, owing to the accumulating of deficits caused by an increase in his expenses, is bound to go to the United States, there to work with his family so as to be able to pay his debts. There is no other means for him of getting rid of his debts but going out of the country. Well, that debt of five hundred dollars, by what is it formed if not by an equal amount of five hundred dollars raised out of the revenues of the consumers in order that the manufacturers might benefit by it? I observed that the hon. the Minister of Finance, in spite of the speeches we heard on this question for many years, had not, the other day, when he made his Budget speech, as much enthusiasm in referring to protection as his predecessors when they extolled the protective system. I remember, Mr. Speaker, the fervid speeches of Sir Leonard Tilley, of Sir Charles Tupper on the National Policy. Notwithstanding all the ability that distinguishes him, the hon. the Minister of Finance did not seem full of that enthusiasm which actuated Messrs. Tupper and Tilley when they came and extolled before us the prosperity of the country, the benefits of the protective system. They spoke with such warmth that we were almost tempted to think that they themselves believed in the truth of the words they uttered. But when the facts are far away, when the impression of the moment is dispelled, we can better appreciate, and with more steadiness of judgment and truth. If we go back to the first years which followed the establishment of the protective system, would you know, Mr. Speaker, the conclusion to which any business man must come? Well, it is this: There was in 1880 and in 1882 a revival of business, but we must not forget that we were just coming out of a great period of depression. That depression extended to all Europe and to the United States. Canada suffered by it as every other country did. We may say now that it is that depression that chiefly contributed to induce the people to overthrow the Government of Mr. Mackenzie. That depression having disappeared from Europe and elsewhere, it is plain that it could not but disappear from Canada. The disappearance of that depression was the first and chief cause of this revival of business. But it must neither be forgotten, Mr. Speaker—I am speaking of the years referred to a moment ago—it must not be forgotten that the Government were engaged in the building of the Pacific Railway. For three or four years, they had to make loans to the amount of fifty or sixty millions to cover this extraordinary expenditure. To that must be added the amounts contracted for by the company themselves, amounts which they expended in the building of their road. Besides, there was also the building of other railways in different provinces which required a considerable capital move. In short, if we take into consideration the amounts borrowed by the Dominion Government, and by various railway companies, it is easy to understand that not less than two hundred and fifty million dollars must have been expended in the space of two or three years. There is nothing astonishing that that should have had the result of reviving a great activity in the affairs and giving a new life to the trade of Canada. Now the condition is much changed. For several years past the situation was far from being as brilliant and flourishing, now that all the loans are completed and that, instead of causing capital to come into the country, we find our money crossing the ocean to pay the interests on the loans made during those years. Another cause which is not much felt in the cities, but which has a great influence in the rural districts, is the following one: when speaking, a moment ago, of the exodus of our compatriots to the United States, I stated that a great number of them flew to the other side of the border for the purpose of earning money in order to pay their debts. Several have succeeded and sent money here. For several years past, I have travelled several times through my county, and I thought it my duty to avail myself of these visits to talk with the merchants about these matters; and here is what they said to me: Every fall, people who went to the United States send us money to pay their debts. Besides, the amounts thus paid to the merchants, large sums are sent to relatives living in our rural districts. The money thus sent from the United States was another cause of the revival that made itself felt in business, by making money more plentiful. Those who contend that the protective policy had anything to do with this prosperity are, I am not afraid to say it, but visionaries, for they have nothing on which they could earnestly base such a contention. The simple imposition of taxes upon a people cannot in any way enrich the same people, and there is no cause, other than those I have referred to, that goes to explain the prosperity which existed during a time. It is plain the policy of the Government never had the result its friends claim for it. The hon. the Minister of Finance contended, in his Budget speech, that the condition of the people had much improved during the last ten years. He relied for that statement on the census. It is a big volume that was quoted several times since a year ago. I saw my hon. friends on this side of the House quoting it to show that the National Policy was a calamity for the country. The hon. gentleman grounded his statement on a singular fact. He alleges the fact that the manufactures of the country have increased from 44,000 to 75,000. He ought to have remembered that during last session, a number of young and inquisitive members, among whom was my hon. friend the member for Richelieu (Mr. Bruneau), asked him some very interesting questions, indeed. They asked him to name the manufactures referred to in the census for each of their counties, and the very enumeration of such manufactures caused the House to burst out laughing. It is perfectly clear that this increase in number simply took place in the manufactures called home manufactures. And I might name among them the brick-yards, foundries, cheese factories, butter-dairies, saw-mills, furniture and leather factories. In the county of Lotbinière, there was an increase in the number of manufactures, since a great number of cheese factories were established there during the last ten years. Besides, some brick-yards were built. I might add some other manufactures, although I do not remember them all at present.

An hon. MEMBER. The dressmakers have also increased in number.

Mr. RINFRET. (Translation.) But I will ask the hon. gentleman how he can reasonably fancy that the protective system had anything to do with that? He is perfectly aware that the protective policy is wholly foreign to such manufactures and industries. In every country in the world, in Great Britain, in the United States, and everywhere such manufactures are seen, whatever might be the fiscal policy in force. As to the manufactures which were protected by the tariff in our country, I think we could not figure their increase by some dozens. And can it be said that they have earnestly prospered when we hear the hon. gentleman, after fifteen years of that system, coming and asking some more protection for those manufactures? A good story, which we had a right to believe dead and buried, is that of the agricultural policy of the hon. gentleman. He spoke about protecting oats. He referred to the establishment of a national market for our breadstuffs. Mr. Speaker, if I had any advice to give him, it would be never to refer to that story again. For, what was the effect of protection on our grains and breadstuffs? He intimated, if I well understood the tenor of his speech, that we were on the eve of having a national market for our grains and breadstuffs. This national market never comes to light and the prices of our grains and breadstuffs go on decreasing. Indeed, those who sit in this House ever since 1879 are aware that unceasingly, in all the speeches that were delivered, quotations of the prices of grains were given to us. Now, the hon. gentlemen opposite are no more heard quoting the prices of grains for the reason that these prices have fallen 20 per cent. I never had the habit of proffering false charges against my opponents. I am free to confess that it is no fault of the men in power if the prices of grains and breadstuffs have fallen; but there is one thing sure, and that is that they have utterly failed in the promises they made to the people on that point, and that they were beguiled with respect to their hopes. I might say that, should not the farmers have, to indemnify themselves, the butter and cheese dairies, perhaps half of them would be compelled to desert their farms and take to the United States. There is but one way to protect the farmers, we have repeatedly proclaimed it in this House, it is to give to them a market for the sale of their produce. We have pointed to the hon. gentlemen opposite that the only way to protect the farmers was to procure for them a market for the sale of hay, horses, potatoes and a great many other products of theirs, and that that market only existed in the United States. As to the price of grains and breadstuffs, it is determined now by the Liverpool market and any legislation we might pass as to that could not affect it in the least, save, perhaps, as regards barley and corn. The hon. the Minister of Finance, after his recent journeying through the Dominion to collect information, seems a little more reconciled than he was formerly with the idea of a reciprocity with the United States, and I observe that he spoke less forcibly than usual against it. He no more contends now that those who are in favour of reciprocity are disloyal to Great Britain; he proceeds with more caution. But I can tell him that as long as the governing party will be the present one, we will not have reciprocity with the United States for two reasons: In the first place, because the Washington Government do not trust them enough to negotiate with them. Two years ago, we might have concluded a treaty should not the Dominion Government have deemed proper to deceive the Washington Government and to dishonestly conduct the negotiations. There is this further reason: that even though the Washington Government should wish to negotiate a reciprocity treaty with the Dominion, the manufacturers of the country, who are masters, would not allow them. So that those people who are in favour of reciprocity, the farmers and the consumers at large, have but one thing to do: and that is to vote against the present Government and let my hon. friend the member for Quebec East (Mr. Laurier) come into power. Another objection I wish to make against the National Policy, one of the evil effects of protection to manufacturers is that it considerably increases the revenue and incites, consequently, the Government to much extravagances. I had many an opportunity to condemn certain wild expenditures made by the Government, especially those with respect to the settlement of the North-west. According to Sir Charles Tupper, the National Policy had two distinct parts, two particular objects in view: the first was to help in the establishment of manufactures in the country, the second to assist in the building of the Pacific railway and the development of the North-west Territories. As stated by me in this House, in my county and elsewhere, these extravagances had no justification. I repeatedly denounced the excessive expenditures indulged in by the Government in the North-west. I considered them as a folly, to a certain extent, and I think the events have shown that I was not wrong. What was going on there during the years I refer to? Then, they did not mind the expense the moment it was for the North-west. There went the surpluses of the Public Treasury. It is impossible to give the precise figures, for all these expenses are not entered separately in the Public Accounts, a number of them are mixed with other expenses; at all events, I think I am right in saying that they amounted to not less than three millions or three millions and a half, only for the additional interest we have to pay on the public debt increased by loans with respect to the building of railways and the development of the North-west. The expenses for Crown lands, police, increase of the expenses in the Interior Department here—all those amounts put together form a total in the neighbourhood of six, seven, we might even say eight million dollars a year, by including the interest on the money spent in the building of the Pacific Railway. With this estimate of the expenses applied to the development of the North-west, there is no exaggeration in saying that if we deduct from them the revenue yielded to us by the North-west, the surplus of expenses over revenue is still as large as the sum total of the public expenditure of the province of Quebec. We find ourselves in this singular position, that we, of the province of Quebec, pay a direct tax because our ordinary revenues are not sufficient to meet the expenses, and, while we are compelled to cut down the amount appropriated to the development of our provincial resources, we have, moreover, to bear the burden of the extraordinary expenses made in the North-west. It is distressing to find that these wild expenses in the remote provinces of the west are paid by the high taxes imposed upon the voters of a province which has not the revenues necessary to the development of its own resources. Here, Mr. Speaker, I have something to say, and it is that in view of the course which is pursued persistently in these Territories and in Manitoba, where the separate schools and the use of the French language are abolished, should the Government come and ask us to make for the North-west the expenses made in the past, how many would there be amongst us who would be willing to make these sacrifices anew? I stated a moment ago, that I denounced these expenses as extravagant. I now think that not only was I right when I stated that they were extravagant, but, moreover, that we must feel humiliated for having made them, after the treatment we have received. That which occurs now-a-days there will have a great influence on the future of this country. How could it be possible for French-Canadians to go there as long as their rights are not acknowledged. I know that now is not the time to discuss these delicate questions. Yet, it is a matter in which the people of the province of Quebec are interested to the highest extent, and I cannot refrain from availing myself of this opportunity to make these remarks. I will further add that when we denounced these expenses we were a thousand times right, and the subsequent facts have unhappily but too much justified these denunciations. Some hon. members opposite asked what was our platform. They boast of having a platform and say we have none. The platform of the Liberal party was more than once given out, and again at the great Liberal convention, held in this very city last summer. I do not wish to examine in detail the articles of this platform, but I will sum it up in two words. We want all the classes of the community to have their share in the public revenues, and the imposts to be distributed with equity and justice. We intend to impose only just such taxes as are necessary to provide for the public expenses.

Mr. RINFRET.

It is a very short platform as concerns our fiscal policy; it is summed up in a few words; but it is so much grounded on justice that I hope it will be finally agreed to by the voters of the Dominion.

Mr. FRECHETTE. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, I have but a few remarks to offer in answer to the hon. member you have just heard. I feel happy to take part in a discussion followed with so much interest, for several days past, by this House and the country at large, for I feel I would be wanting in my duty to my constituents should I not state my views with respect to the present condition of the country. The hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Rinfret) represents a county adjoining my own, and as a neighbour, I think I should not be hard on him. He stated that there had been no progress in the province of Quebec since the introduction of the protection policy. I will ask that hon. gentleman if it is not a fact that the people are better off now than under the administration of Mr. Mackenzie? They talk about the exodus of our compatriots to the United States, but this exodus is nothing new. It began in 1840, and it was larger between 1840 and 1857 than at any other time. It is therefore not a new thing. The hon. gentleman spoke against the duties upon grains, but he carefully avoided speaking of the duties upon cheese. Should we take away that duty of three cents a pound upon cheese, we would be touching upon a very serious question for the province of Quebec, for it would greatly affect the dairy industry which has taken such a development in our province since ten or twelve years. The hon. member also contended that the protective tariff only protected but the manufacturers. It is all the contrary that is true. True the manufacturers are protected, but it must not be forgotten they employ operatives to work their manufactures. Should these manufacturers not be protected by the Government's policy, how could they employ these operatives who earn in the manufactures the bread of their families? By protecting to a reasonable extent the industries of the country, we protect the farmers as well. The tariff as proposed is much more favourable to the farmers and workmen than to the manufacturers. I avail myself of this opportunity, Mr. Speaker, to congratulate the Government and the hon. the Minister of Finance in particular upon having brought forward so satisfactory a Budget, showing for the year 1892-93 a surplus of over $1,350,000.

Well, Mr. Speaker, my hon. friends opposite are not satisfied with this result; it does not make them cheerful, they who, under the Liberal administration, from 1874 to 1878.

had but one surplus, and even that was left to them by the Conservatives. It was the same thing with the Liberal party in Quebec. I will show, Mr. Speaker, the deficits accumulated by the Government of Mr. Mackenzie while they were in power. I have to quote as to that point some figures which are summed up in the following table:—

As can be seen, during the fourteen years of the Conservative administration there were surpluses of revenues amounting to over $18,000,000, after deducting the deficits. I say it would be unfair to condemn an administration which thus carry on the affairs of the country. It is certain that there is no government who commit no faults, but when we come out with such figures, I don't see how the opposing party can manage to cause the people to believe that we have a deficit. The year 1878 was a hard one. Money was at an exorbitant price and very hard to get at that; the rate was 10 per cent. The manufactures were closed down. Under the Mackenzie rule, the farm products did not sell. Following are some data with respect to the present value of our farm products. The hon. members opposite take delight in denying that our farmers get a good price for their products; it looks as if they were paid by their counties to come here and disparage the country. I do not know whether it is profitable to these to send here people to vilify it. I say that the agricultural produce sell to-day better than they sold before protection was introduced. Let us take pork, for instance; it is sold at $7.50 to $8.50 per 100 pounds; butter, 18 to 22 cents a pound; cheese, 9 to 10 cents; oats, 45 to 50 cents a bushel; beef, $5 to $6 per 100 pounds; muttons, $2 to $3 each. It is shown by these figures that the market for farmers is preferable to-day to that of 1878. Let us now see what the farmer has to pay for what he buys now. Flour is at $4 a barrel; tea, first quality, 30c. to 40c. per pound; sugar, 5c. to 6c.; weaving cotton, 25c. to 30c. a pound; gray cotton, 5c. to 10c. a yard; bleached cotton, 5c. to 10c.; tweeds, 30c. to 75c.; bar iron, $2.10 per 100 lbs.; nails, $2.50 to $3 per 100 lbs.; horse rake, $20; mowers, $50; shoes, glasses and paint, 25 per cent less than under the Mackenzie rule. Let us now examine the prices of these same articles during the years that lapsed between 1873 and 1878: Pork, $5 to $6 per 100 pounds; butter, 12c. to 15c. per pound; oats, 35c. to 40c. a bushel; muttons, $2.50 a head; beef, $4 to $5 per 100 pounds. As can be seen, agricultural products sold at lower prices before the working of the protective tariff than now. And never was the dairy industry, the industry of butter and cheese, spoken of at that time. My hon. friend from Lotbinière (Mr. Rinfret) spoke much about cheese. He ought to be in favour of protection, for I say that the increase in the production of cheese was due to it, and if we had free trade with the United States, the Americans would flood our market with their produce and kill that industry.

Mr. RINFRET. (Translation.) Does the hon. member ask me a question? Does he ask what my views are with respect to protection?

Mr. FRECHETTE. (Translation.) No. I did not ask you that. From 1873 to 1878, flour was sold at $7 to $8 a barrel; tea, 50c. to 60c. a pound; sugar, 8c. to 12c. a pound; coffee, 50c.; coal oil, 30c. to 40c.; nails, 5c. to 6c.; tweeds, 60c. to $1.25 a yard; gray cotton, 10c. to 15c.; bleached cotton, 10c. to 15c.; cotton prints, 12c. to 14c.; weaving cotton, 40c. to 50c. a pound; horse rake, $30; mowers, $75; bar iron, $4 per 100 pounds; scythes, forks, axes and paint were 25 per cent higher than before the establishment of our manufactures. Thus, the competition between manufactures had the effect of cutting down the price of these articles notwithstanding the duties that were imposed. The workingmen of our country have nothing to complain of. They earn fair wages. The wages of the workingmen to-day, compared with those paid prior to 1878, are 25 per cent higher, and they have steady work, and everywhere, the labourers of the province of Quebec—I know nothing of their condition in the province of Ontario—live very comfortably with the wages they earn; they are not rich, but they can buy the necessaries, and at cheap prices, owing to the changes made to the tariff. They have nothing to complain of, and they do not complain either. That is seen at election times. Well, Mr. Speaker, I well know we will never succeed in contenting the hon. members opposite. They still clamour that the country is drifting to bankruptcy and ruin. I think they were made indeed to cry out thus: that it is with them a mania to proclaim the ruin of the country, to depreciate it and to sacrifice their fellow-citizens to party interests. That is the great disease they are suffering from. Allow me, Mr. Speaker, to say a word about the dairy industry. We cannot too much admire the growth taken by this industry during these last years, as shown by the success it has attained at the great Chicago Fair. The fact is that out of one hundred and thirty-two prizes granted, the dairy industry of the Dominion took one hundred and twenty-six. I say that we ought to be pleased with such a success, and congratulate ourselves upon it. It was a thorough success. Certainly these one hundred and twenty-six prizes do not go to show that the province of Quebec or the whole Dominion are drifting to ruin, to bankruptcy, as stated by the hon. gentlemen opposite. Our fisheries, our lumber and minerals also took prizes at the great Chicago Fair. In my county there are twenty-four cheese factories which, last autumn, produced a million pounds of cheese. This cheese was sold at 9 cents a pound, totalling $90,000. There are also in my county three butter dairies. They produced fifty thousand pounds of butter, sold at 20 cents a pound, making $10,000. There is $100,000 for that single industry. It is, therefore, Mr. Speaker, an industry worth consideration, is it not? And to what is it due? Is it not to the policy of the Dominion Government—a policy which caused them to establish these magnificent experimental farms, spreading among our agricultural class the knowledge required to attain so satisfactory results? It seems to me a government ought not to be condemned when they so well do their duty. All that, Mr. Speaker, does not go to show either that the country is drifting to ruin and to bankruptcy, as contended by the Liberals. On the contrary, I think it is a magnificent result. Last year, again, our exports of cheese amounted to $13,000,000. I have no doubt that this figure will still be increased, owing to our experimental farms. I say that the Government are in duty bound to do all that they can possibly do to prevent the Americans from using our cheese marks to pass theirs on the European markets as Canadian cheese. The Government are bound to take the necessary measures to prevent our neighbours from securing our cheese marks in order to sell their products in Great Britain by giving them out as Canadian cheese. I know this was promised, at the last session, by the hon. the Minister of Finance. I hope he has not forgotten that promise, and that he will see to it as early as possible, for it is an important matter. I will now quote some figures, Mr. Speaker, to show the progress realized by the country since we have the protective system. The figures I am going to quote are very encouraging, as you can judge by yourself. We have now over ten thousand miles of railway more than in 1878. Does that show that we are going backwards? Is it not, on the contrary, an evidence that we are moving in the right direction, for, were we not prosperous, how could we increase the number of miles of our railways? A country building so much railways is certainly not on the eve of going into bankruptcy. The number of passengers carried by our railways, last year, was eight millions, and the latter had over seventeen million tons of freight. Their earnings exceeded thirty-three million dollars. It is a result which does not show that our condition is not prosperous. The hon. members opposite contended that the number of our manufactures had decreased. Let us compare the figures contained in the census and see if there is any truth in that contention. Let us take the figures of 1881 and compare them with those of 1891. In 1881, we had 49,933 manufactures; in 1891, we had 75,768. It is an increase of 25,845 in ten years, or 51 per cent. Does that furnish to my hon. friends opposite any ground for stating that the country is drifting to ruin? I think the very contrary is true. The capital engaged in manufactures in 1881 was $165,000,000. In 1891, it amounted to $333,000,000. That gives an increase in ten years of $188,000,000, or 114 per cent. If my hon. friends opposite would take the trouble to inquire, to look at the figures, they could see as we do the facts I put before you, Mr. Speaker. Let us now see that which has reference to the number of people employed in these manufactures. In 1881, there were 254,000 persons employed in the various industries, while in 1891, there were 367,000, or an increase of 113,000. That gives 44 per cent more in favour of 1891. We must bear in mind, by the way, that these people employed in the manufactures are consumers of the produce grown by the farmers. The United States have their agricultural produce which they sell to their working classes.

It ought to be the same thing in Canada. Do not these people employed in the manufactures form a market for the farmers of all the provinces? Let us now see what has been the value of the production of manufactures. In 1881, it amounted to $309,000,000; in 1891, to $475,000,000, an increase of $165,000,000, or 53 per cent in ten years. When a country manufactures more products than it requires for its consumption, one cannot say that that country becomes impoverished. When a farmer reaps more than what is required for his consumption, is it not a fact that he enriches himself by the sale of the surplus of his harvest? It is the same thing for the manufacturer. Another evidence. Mr. Speaker, of the prosperity of our people is to be found in the savings they make. Well, on the 28th of February last, there was in our Government savings banks, or other banks of the same kind, an amount of $242,645,358, or nearly fifty dollars per head. In 1878, these deposits only amounted to $87,000,000. We are passing through a period of depression. But, speaking of depression, I observe that my hon. friends did not refer this year to the United States. Yet, they used not to spare us that comparison. I remember that, last year, half of the debate on the Budget was taken up by references to the prosperity of the United States. This year they dared not refer to it. Go to the United States, go to Portland, Biddeford, Maine, Fall River, etc., and you will see half of the people in the poor-houses. It is true, unhappily, and I am not stating it to take any glory out of it. In the United States more than three hundred and thirty banks closed their doors. Is it an evidence of prosperity when banks thus close down? Moreover, thirty thousand miles of railways were given to be sold by the Receiver, inasmuch as they were unable to pay their working expenses. That is a prosperous condition, is it not? That is the country to which they wish to annex us at any price. Half of the manufacturers closed down or lowered the wages they were paying. The operatives there work two or three days a week. That is the condition of affairs in the United States. Well, notwithstanding the depression we have had, our banks kept standing up and our manufactures are working; there is the difference. Would we be better off with annexation? I say no. Our Canadian families are coming back by full car loads to our country. I passed the other day at Richmond; I saw there seven families who were coming back from the United States and they told me: it is better to remain in this country at 25 cents a day than go to the United States. Since 1883, the Conservative Government have lessened the duties on Canadian tobacco. We all remember that in 1878, the Mackenzie Government had put a duty of five cents per pound on that tobacco. Who took that duty away? The Conservative party. Who took away the duties on tea, coffee, sugar, newspapers, coal? The Conservative party. My hon. friend spoke about coal oil; well, it was sold from 40 cents to 50 cents in 1878. It is now sold at 15 cents an Imperial gallon. Is there any cause for complaint? Suppose for a moment that the oil mills at Petrolia should be closed down and that we should be at the mercy of the Americans, what would happen? Within three months we would pay for it from 25 to 30 cents, and they would sell us common oil and keep the good one for themselves. I am glad to congratulate the Government upon having in a bill readjusting the tariff, inserted a clause under which they will be authorized to put corn on the free list whenever the United States let our barley come in free. The present Government cut down the duties on lumber, iron, nails and agricultural implements. But there is more than that; who built the great railways, the canals, especially the Sault St. Marie Canal, who built the Intercolonial and the public buildings? Who purchased the North-west Territories? It is the Conservative party. I remember very well that the Opposition stated the Government were giving $1,400,000 for lands that were worth nothing, for an iceberg. Mr. Speaker, the Liberals were opposed to all the great works that do honour to a young country like ours. It is true our public debt ran to $242,000,000, but we have assets to show. When a merchant has a stock worth $10,000, if he owes only $7,000 or $8,000, I say he is not poor. Besides, we must bear in mind that the Government subsidized the railways. I was pleased to hear the hon. the Minister of Railways state, in the course of his speech the other night, that railways would receive new subsidies this year. Well, I suppose, and I have reason to believe that the Hereford railway, that is the railway from Lime Ridge to Lévis, through the counties of Wolfe, Megantic and Lotbinière, the three finest agricultural counties of the province, in which are to be found a great quantity of timber of all kinds, mines and magnificent water powers, will have its share of the subsidies. I am greatly interested in the future of this railway. It must not be forgotten that subsidies were promised to me by the lamented Sir John A. Macdonald in 1878. These promises were repeated by the present Ministers. Moreover, I reiterated my application on the very first day of the session. I am satisfied that the National Policy was a genuine success and that it is the agricultural class to whom it has been the most benefit. I am willing to show that they it were who were the most protected. It is neither myself, nor the lawyer, nor the notary, nor the professional man, who benefit by it, it is the farmer. For the farmer is not supposed to buy what he requires for his living. Are we not living more comfortably now than fourteen years ago? I appeal on this point to the hon. members opposite. I remember those times. I lived in the county where I am still residing, and I say that the farmers are living fifty per cent better than in 1878, although we pay now one hundred per cent more than then for educational purposes. Where is the money found to meet those expenses? It must come from somewhere. Well, that means, in my opinion, that we are not as poor as during those times. I had an opportunity to visit several counties since a few years. I went travelling through England, Ireland, France, Italy, New England, Manitoba, the North-west Territories and British Columbia. I am not referring to these travels to praise myself; what I wish to say is that I had an opportunity to examine these countries, and I must say, advantageously to Canada, that there is nowhere a more prosperous country, and one where I better like living than in Canada. All what these countries produce we can produce, but farming is not as flourishing there as here. Our railway system is perfect; our laws are good—we are protected; our educational system is perfect; our government system is good, especially as managed by the hon. Ministers who are in power, and after mature consideration, I come to the conclusion that our country is the best in the whole world. I will conclude, Mr. Speaker, by saying that the National Policy will be preserved long enough to allow my little four years old child to grow and be strong enough to bear some distress whenever the Liberals come into power, which I well hope they will never do.

Mr. FORBES In rising to speak on this important subject of the tariff, I shall ask the indulgence of the House for but a short time, and further, I may say, I shall endeavour to confine myself to the subject under discussion and not follow the practice of hon. gentlemen opposite who have never yet expressed any sentiment with regard to or given their approval of the tariff actually presented to the House. Before proceeding to discuss the question immediately before the House, I may be pardoned for referring to some of the remarks made by the junior member for St. John (Mr. Hazen), as well as to observations made by other hon. gentlemen opposite, who went beyond the question before the House, and referred to matters with which they had very little acquaintance, and upon which they spoke more in rashness than with malice aforethought. The member for St. John (Mr. Hazen) referred to the fact that the Liberals were administering public affairs in the lower provinces, and the hon. gentleman asked what the Liberals would do if they got into power in Federal politics, and declared they could do nothing better than had been done by their predecessors if Federal affairs were administered by politicians like those who are now governing the maritime provinces, and he referred to Mr. Fielding, of Nova Scotia. The hon. gentleman had the assumption to charge that hon. gentleman with having used the public funds and increased the public debt of the province in a manner that was not justified by honest and fair government. The hon. gentleman declared that the leader of the Government in Nova Scotia had improperly increased the provincial debt by borrowing money for public roads, and that he had afterwards expended it for political purposes, and that the roads themselves had consequently suffered. Such was not the case, and the hon. gentleman should have known the facts before he made such a statement in this House. The Premier of Nova Scotia borrowed $600,000 for public road purposes in Nova Scotia. This sum was wisely and honestly expended. The roads of the province were never in a better position than at the present time—and in much the same good state of repair they have been ever since this money has been spent. Further, as the hon. gentleman should be aware, the money was not raised on the votes solely of the Liberal members of the Assembly, because every member of the Tory Opposition in the House voted for the increase of the provincial debt for the purpose for which it had been expended, except one member, Mr. Andrews, of Annapolis, and when he went back to his constituents for re-election he was ordered to remain at home. The hon. gentleman referred to the debt of Nova Scotia as having been largely increased by the Liberals, and mentioned that it was a matter for regret, and he affirmed that if we got into power we would so conduct the business of the country as to follow the example of Mr. Fielding of Nova Scotia. The debt of Nova Scotia, I may say for the information of the hon. gentleman, is very much less than the debt of any other province of the Dominion, except Ontario. The net debt of Quebec is equal to $10.43 per head, New Brunswick $5.89, British Columbia $6.58, Manitoba $4.43, Nova Scotia $3, and this result was brought about after twelve years of administration of affairs by the Liberal party. If the hon. gentleman can show such a record in connection with the administration of the affairs of Canada by the Conservative party, he may be justified in drawing a comparison. But what is the Federal net debt? It is equal to $43.81 per head of the population. Yet the hon. gentleman would call the attention of the House to the fact that Nova Scotia, governed by the Liberals, was unwisely governed, and that a similar condition would follow the administration of federal affairs by the Liberal party. I desire to refer also to a statement made by the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin). That hon. gentleman made an eloquent appeal on behalf of the farmers. He would be the farmers' friend to-day and the Government's friend to-morrow, provided the Government did not attack the farmers' interest although he had denounced the Government in his newspaper, and this was done after he had denounced the Government in this House by moving a resolution, or giving notice of a resolution, to abolish the duties on the necessaries of life for his constituents in Assiniboia. Yet the hon. gentleman continued to vote straight, because he has a Government paper, which I have no doubt represents the interests of the party, and he draws from the funds of the Dominion Government large sums on advertising contracts.

Mr. DAVIN. Mr. Speaker I rise to a point of order. The hon. gentleman, I think, has no right to make a statement on assumption, and I may say that it is a pure piece of assumption altogether, because there is no truth in it.

Mr. FORBES. If the hon. gentleman has not yet been paid his bill for advertising it is time he was, and I have no doubt he will receive his cheque in due time. The hon. gentleman at one time was not at all in favour of the Government or its policy, and he wrote a letter and it was published in his paper called the 'Regina Leader.' This letter was written about the close of last session, and is as follows:—

The session is over. A very peculiar session, unique in its brevity. The Opposition are jubilant; very confident of success, and speak of sweeping the country. At this moment they might do it, so discredited is the Government by reason of inherent and universal weakness. It must be remembered that for nearly half the session one strong man has been away, and that man the premier. But some Tory members of Parliament will say it would have been worse were he here. There can be no doubt that some private members abstained from bringing up questions in consequence of his absence. Still the Government was discounted by the want of a certain weight, not an ascendancy, which belongs to him. Then Tupper was away. Well, Tupper has lots of fight and can make a big blazon, but he cannot debate. I conclude these two men's absence was a loss, but that the loss was counter-balanced by the embargo Thompson's sabsence placed on certain members, among them a western member, who had an important motion to move he would not move in Thompson's absence. The session leaves the Government weak. The Government does not realize the way the country regards it. The country is ready to spew it out of its mouth, and unless Sir John Thompson reorganizes, not according to the dictates of faction, but according to the wishes of the people, this Government will be swept out of existence.

Mr. DAVIN. Did the hon. gentleman say I wrote that?

Mr. FORBES. I may say that I have not the original manuscript to show that the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) wrote it, but it was published in his paper in the west and circulated throughout the east.

Mr. DAVIN. I rise to order, Mr. Speaker. The hon. gentleman stated at first that I wrote the letter to a paper, and it now seems that he quotes a letter written to a paper, and he has no authority whatever for attributing it to me.

Mr. FORBES. Will the hon. gentleman deny that he wrote it?

Mr. DAVIN. I deny emphatically that I wrote the letter.

Mr. FORBES. The hon. gentleman controls the paper and controls the publication of it, and he surely must be responsible for the utterances of his own organ and this letter in its choice, terse language represents the feelings of the hon. gentleman at that time and strongly indicates the writer. It was written in April of last year, just at the close of the session and it is high time that he should repudiate it. Coming to the subject under discussion, I wish to refer to some remarks made by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries when he was in the province of Nova Scotia after his return from Paris. He deemed it advisable in the interests of the Government to endeavour to show that the country was experiencing a tremendous period of prosperity, that everything was glorious; that the rivers were running with logs, lumber and fish; that the exports and imports were increasing, and he went to his own county of Pictou and made a speech which I will venture to say was not graced by an original thought. It is made up of twenty-five or thirty excerpts from speeches made by Liberal members of Parliament, and outside of that it contains simply nothing. He made quotations from what he presumed to be correct figures, according to the blue-books, although I doubt if they are, and I shall claim the indulgence of the House for a moment while I analyze them. As an evidence of prosperity in Nova Scotia he drew a comparison between the tons of shipping outwards and inwards in the years of 1878 and 1893. It is ridiculous that such a thing should be done by a Minister of the Crown. A junior member of this House or a person inexperienced in political warfare might be excused, but it is hardly creditable that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries should attempt to befool the people of the province of Nova Scotia. He said that the difference between the two years I have mentioned in tonnage, inwards and outwards in the province of Nova Scotia, represented nearly 5,000,000 tons. Did he presume that the province of Nova Scotia was going to stand still for fifteen years, or was he entitled to gloat over the fact that we had not receded in our trade during that time? Does the Minister not know that these figures for the year 1892, as well as those for 1878, but especially those for the year 1892 refer to tonnage inwards or outwards from the several ports? A vessel might call at Sydney for a load of coal and she might touch at Halifax, Lunenburg, Bridgewater, Liverpool, Shelburne, Yarmouth and Digby before she completes the discharge of her cargo, and at every one of these ports she will be entered as of so much tonnage. A cargo of potatoes may be taken from Wolfville, in the county of King's, carried to Boston, and that vessel may get coal at Sydney and go up the Bay of Fundy to discharge the coal at several ports, and that vessel would be entered five times at a certain tonnage. Therefore there is no logic at all in his argument in this respect, nor is there any force in it. The hon. Minister of Marine also spoke of the deposits in the banks as evidence of prosperity; but he failed to tell the people whether these were small deposits in the savings banks or large deposits in our financial institutions. If they are large deposits it would rather show a stagnation of trade and the want of means for the investment of the money of the people. It shows that they have locked up their money in banking institutions at 3 or 4 per cent, afraid to invest it, and afraid to trust the policy of the Government for the development of trade. I fail to see why the Minister should quote that as an evidence of prosperity. The hon. gentleman also cited the increased production of coal as an indication of prosperity. Let me ask him why should we not export more coal than we did fifteen years ago? The machinery for developing the mines is improving year after year: coal which was produced two years ago for about $1.22 a ton, is produced to-day for from 80 cents and 85 cents free on board the vessel to 95, and why should there not be an increase in its production? That fact is more attributable to the policy of the Liberal Government in the province of Nova Scotia, than in any degree to the policy of this Government. Although the exports of home manufacturers have only grown $300,000 in fifteen years in the province of Nova Scotia, yet he, the Minister, cited this again as an evidence of prosperity. He says that the imports of raw cotton into the province of Nova Scotia were only 5,667 pounds in 1878, and that they were 3,618,000 pounds in 1892, and according to him that indicates a large measure of prosperity in that province. We all know that a large quantity of that cotton was simply taken into port, landed on the cars and sent west to the cotton manufacturers in Montreal, or it may be, that it was manufactured in the mills in Nova Scotia, for export to China, but yet the Minister says that that indicates prosperity in the province of Nova Scotia. I fail to see that the statements made by the Minister indicate any degree of prosperity in our province. Let us come to what really does indicate a want of prosperity. No Maritime Province member has yet undertaken to show how the old National Policy, or how the new deformed Policy, with the old ragged and tattered garment of protection hanging to its limbs, has benefited, or is going to benefit those provinces. How are their great industries going to be prospered or benefited in the least degree by the policy of restriction? If we take the shipping industry, I will show the House, if it will bear with me, how the various protective taxes have affected it. From 1868 to 1874, inclusive, the average annual tonnage built in the Dominion of Canada, under the then low tariff, was 115,063 tons; from 1875 to 1879, inclusive, the days when the Liberal party were in power, the average was 138,193 tons. From 1880 to 1892, inclusive, the years during which the National Policy got in its work, the average annual tonnage built in Canada had fallen to 49,917 tons, a shrinkage of nearly 100,000 tons a year. And yet hon. gentlemen undertake to tell us that under the policy which they are supporting and advocating for this country, the great industry of shipping in the Maritime Provinces is increasing. In 1878, Canada built 101,506 tons of shipping, and there was a steady decline until in 1892 we built and registered only 28,773 tons. The province of Nova Scotia, in which I am more particularly interested, lost, as a province, in 1881, 741 tons; that is, the total amount of tonnage to the credit of Nova Scotia at the end of the year 1891 was 741 tons less than it was at the end of the previous year. But what about the province of New Brunswick, of which the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Hazen) and the hon. member for Kent (Mr. McInerney) have spoken so well, which they have spent hours in telling us is in a prosperous condition? They have told us that its native industries of shipping, farming, and fishing, are prospering, yielding large returns, and developing year by year. They want no change; they are satisfied to leave things as they are. But the fact is that in 1891 the province of New Brunswick lost 15,059 tons of shipping, and Prince Edward Island, 2,730 tons. In 1892, Nova Scotia lost 33,598 tons, New Brunswick, 11,187 tons, and Prince Edward Island, 610 tons. In 1893, Nova Scotia lost 31,575 tons, New Brunswick, 34,366, and Prince Edward Island, 2,730 tons. In 1892, Nova Scotia, the year 1893, which is just about closed, represents, at a valuation of $30 per ton, a total loss to those provinces, and consequently to the Dominion, of no less than $2,077,140. If such a state of affairs continues to exist for any length of time in the Maritime Provinces, where will this great industry find itself? What does this loss represent to the people of those provinces? Loss of labour to the artisans, the ship-builders, blacksmiths, carpenters, painters, sail-makers, riggers, boat-builders, sailors, officers, pilots and stevedores, in building, rigging, loading and discharging these vessels. Let it be borne in mind, further, that while Canada has suffered so great a decrease in shipping, directly attributable to the policy of restriction, that she has adopted, she is in good company; for her shipping has decreased with that of Holland, an effete and worn-out monarchy, that of Italy, and that of the United States in respect to her shipping, engaged in foreign tonnage; while, since 1890, the tonnage of shipping has increased in the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, Denmark, Germany, Norway, Belgium, and France. Now, if it can be said that these things indicate a reasonable prosperity in the Maritime Provinces, I should like to know wherein we might expect to find stagnation. The hon. Controller of Customs, the other day, asked the House to be thankful that there was no stagnation or starvation in the provinces of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, but that the people were able to get enough to eat and drink and wherewithal to be clothed; and the hon. member for Kent told us that we should be thankful that the farmers have enough to eat and drink. A condition of mere subsistence among the farmers was satisfactory to him as long as the Tory Government remained in power. But what about our other great industries, such as the fishing industry? None of these hon. gentlemen referred to that. Turn up the Government statistical year-book, and you will find that in 1873 Nova Scotia yielded $6,577,000 worth of fish; in 1874, $7,652,000 worth; while in 1884 the product had grown to $8,763,000 worth. But in the year 1891, the product of the fisheries of Nova Scotia had fallen to $7,000,000 worth; in 1892, $6,340,000 worth; and in 1893, to $6,100,000 worth. We find that there has been not only a stagnation in that great industry, but a positive retrogression; yet we are asked by the Government supporters to be thankful that we are allowed to live. Although our provincial industries may dry up and fade away, bless your stars, haven't we a Tory Government in power? We get no other comfort. We are told that some of the manufacturers of the Dominion have been benefited by the tariff; but we do not hear a word about our great fishing industry, though where can you find a more valuable industry, not merely to the Maritime Provinces, but to the whole Dominion? And I claim that I have a right to refer particularly to the natural industries of the Maritime Provinces. Other hon. members of this House have particularized the industries of their own provinces, and I claim that I have a perfect right to do the same. When necessary, I speak for the whole Dominion; I wish it were wisely governed and every one of its industries prosperous; but why should hon. gentlemen supporting the Government, and the Government themselves, single out two or three of the industries of the Maritime Provinces to be imposed upon and slaughtered, in order that two or three other industries of the Dominion may prosper and grow rich at their expense? I need not refer to the lumber industry, which is a national as well as a provincial industry. But I can say this as regards that industry, that the policy of the Government to-day is a policy of restriction. It does nothing to assist or develop it; but every article which enters into the consumption of the lumberman is taxed heavily for the benefit of some other industry in the Dominion. There is no middle course taken; nor is the lumberman asked to abide by a fair or moderate tariff. You never hear a word said by the Government on his behalf. The farmer is right in looking after his own interests; but where is the man who reminds the Government of the fact that while they benefit the farmer by imposing a tax on pork, they are injuring the lumberman? You have increased the tax on pork, one of the prime necessities of the lumberman's business. Is it fair to harass and restrict his industry in that way? You give peculiar advantages to the fishing industry as regards pork, flour, and many other articles the fishermen use, which pay no duty, if used for deep-sea fishing. It is the only free trade industry in the country to-day, the only industry which is not hampered and restricted by the Tory tariff. The Government dare not tax the fisherman, because he would turn upon them and hurl them out of power as the lumberman and other workers in the national industries which make up the great body of the consumers, will do yet. The fishing industry enjoys only part of the advantages which the Liberal party always contend it should have, and to which it is fairly entitled.

Mr. McDUGALL. You always voted against it.

Mr. FORBES. Never. The hon. member for Cape Breton (Mr. McDougall) need not talk so fast. His corns are not pinched. The fishing industry, as I have said, enjoys great advantages in the line of free trade and non-restriction. That industry is a glaring attack on the policy of the Government and an open argument in favour of the policy of the Liberal party. I appeal to the same Government for fair play and equal rights to our other national and provincial industries. Why tax articles entering into the general use of the lumberman and the miner, and farmer and artisan, and single out the fishermen for the great benefits of the Liberal policy of freedom from taxation when prosecuting certain lines of their great industry? If we require further indication of the want of proper development and prosperity in the Maritime Provinces, we have only to go to the census. There we find in the whole Dominion a shortage of over 1,250,000 in population in ten years. In the Maritime Provinces, the very best counties in Nova Scotia have lost their people. The counties of Pictou and Antigonish, represented by two Cabinet Ministers, not only have lost their natural increase, but are actually short of the number of souls that were in them ten years before. And yet the Minister of Marine took occasion, when out west, to find fault with Canadians who had gone abroad to seek a living. He sneered at the young men who had been driven out of Canada and he sneered at their relations who were left at home. He said: "We have not missed those people who have gone to the United States. We do not want faint hearts in this country." What right had he to make that remark. It is an insult to the brothers remaining behind, of those who were driven out of the country for want of employment, resulting from the restrictive policy of the Government. Yet they are called by the Minister of Marine "faint hearts," because they did not remain here and submit to a system of unfair and unjust taxation. If you take an article in any province and send it abroad, you must naturally bring back something in return, for unless you get a return cargo, your shipments must pay double freight. If the policy of this Government tends to restrict the importation of foreign goods, as it undoubtedly does, a shrinkage in our foreign trade is bound to follow. Such being the case, what else can happen but that the shipping industry must naturally dry up and become nil in a very short time. If you take a cargo, which would be the average surplus catch of one or several fishermen, either on the banks or on shore, and bring it to the best and only market we have, the American market, and it will fetch prices as follows:—

|--------------------------------|--------------|
| 50 bbls. mackerel at $10..... | $ 500 |
| 50 bbls. herring at $5..... | 250 |
| 50 qtls. codfish at $5..... | 250 |
| Total..... | 1,000 |

Then you have to deduct the American duty :

|---|--------------|
| Duty on mackerel $2 per bbl..... | $100 |
| do herring $\frac{3}{4}$ of a cent..... | 42 |
| do codfish $\frac{3}{4}$ of a cent..... | 42 |
| | $184 |

Balance..... 816

That is the exporter of one of the greatest productions any one of the provinces of this Dominion has for export, loses $184 in consequence of your policy, on his export cargo; because the purchasing market of the United States regulates the price. Now, the ship which carries this freight has her crew on board and her provisions for the voyage, and she must return either in ballast or with a cargo. We load her on return with the following goods suitable for our market :

|---|---------------|
| 500 gallons paraffine, costing 8 cents, duty 7 $\frac{1}{2}$ cents..... | \$ 37 50 |
| 100 bbls. flour, costing $3.50, duty 75 cents .. | 75 00 |
| 225 cwt. cordage, costing 8 cents, duty 25 per cent..... | 50 00 |
| 10 bbls. pork, costing $14, duty $3..... | 30 00 |
| 10 bbls. beef, costing $10, duty $2..... | 20 00 |
| Total..... | 212 50 |

This shows you that the fisherman first has to pay $184 to the American Government and then $212 to the Canadian Government, or a total of $396.50 is taken out of his $1,000 on the very best article for export that any country ever produced. That amount taken right straight in cold cash for taxes out of the $1,000, which the fisherman's goods brought in the American market, leaving him a poor $604 as his return out of the selling price. How long can that industry stand that tremendous tax and wherein has the new policy tended to improve its condition? It has not improved it in the slightest degree. The tax on cordage used by the fishermen is increased 6 per cent by the new scheme. I trust this is not a sop to the hon. gentleman from Halifax (Mr. Stairs), who suffered a small reduction on binding twine last year. This tax will fall directly and heavily on the Maritime Provinces. This same illustration will apply to any other export, whether lumber or products of the farm or mine. Before proceeding further on this point, let me give an illustration of the operation of the tax on some articles necessarily imported, because not made in the country. The cost of dry goods, value $100, under Liberal tariff :

|--------------------------------|-----------------|
| Cost in England..... | $100 00 |
| Duty..... | 17 50 |
| Cost of importing..... | 8 00 |
| Cost to wholesaler..... | $125 50 |
| Add 15 p.c. profit..... | 18 82 |
| Cost to retailer..... | $144 32 |
| Add 25 p. c. profit..... | 36 08 |
| Cost to consumer..... | $180 40 |

Now, let me apply the same calculation to a similar parcel of dry goods imported under the National Policy at an average duty of 33 per cent—the cost of same goods under National Policy being identical in England or country of purchase :

|--------------------------------|-----------------|
| Cost in England..... | $100 00 |
| Duty..... | 33 00 |
| Cost of importing..... | 8 00 |
| Cost to wholesaler..... | $141 00 |
| Add 15 p. c. profit..... | 21 15 |
| Cost to retailer..... | $162 15 |
| Add 25 p. c. profit..... | 40 54 |
| Cost to consumer..... | $202 69 |

That is, the consumer under the excessively high tariff of the present Government takes out of the consumer the sum of $22.29 more than under the old tariff in force before the National Policy was brought into operation. There is also an increase in the duty on pork which will fall directly and heavily on the lumbering and fishing interest. With such a condition of affairs, it is safe to assume that the trade of the whole country, particularly of the Maritime Provinces, will still be more seriously handicapped. In 1879, the gross trade of the Dominion amounted to $153,000,000, in 1892 it had grown to $241,000,000, or an increase of $88,000,000, in thirteen years under the National Policy. In 1868, the first year after confederation, the gross trade of the Dominion was $131,000,000, in 1874 it had grown to $217,505,000 under a revenue tariff, showing a total increase of $86,588,000 in five years. The average annual increase under the revenue tariff of the Liberal party, and that of the old Conservative party, before it took hold of this theory of protection, was $14,000,000 per year, while the average annual increase under protection was only $6,700,000. That shows plainly that the National Policy has tended to restrict business. Take it on the basis per head. In 1873 the trade per head of the Dominion was $59.70. In 1891 it had fallen off to $45.09 per head. In 1892 it was $48.27. This shows a shrinkage of $11 per head in the trade of this country in twenty years—an actual shrinkage. And yet the hon. Minister of Marine will come down to the province of Nova Scotia and hon. gentlemen will stand up in this House and tell us that we have no signs of stagnation, that everything is couleur de rose, that all our industries are extending, that our imports and our exports as well are increasing, that every industry is developing and everybody is happy. And all this in the face of figures compiled by themselves and by their own statisticians, which prove the contrary. Take the total increased trade last year. Our increase in trade with eight countries was $13,138,552, while we decreased $3,746,388 in our trade with seven other countries, the net result being an increase of $9,392,164 in the whole trade of the Dominion. With what countries was that trade gained? We increased our trade with Great Britain $973,922, with France $325,991, with Italy $170,664, with Belgium $695,307, with Newfoundland $743,940. This last was on account of the great fire, causing a demand for our lumber for rebuilding. Our increase in trade with South America was $194,010, and with Switzerland $65,431. Our trade with the United States increased $10,019,387. The decreases in trade were with Germany, Spain, Portugal, Holland and the West Indies (the decrease with the last named being $248,649, a direct maritime loss), China, Japan and other countries not enumerated, the total decrease being $3,746,388, which, deducted from the total increase, leaves a net increase of $9,392,164. This makes it clear that, had it not been for the ten millions of increased trade with the United States, our foreign trade would have shown an actual falling off of about one million dollars. Yet we are told that our natural market is not in the United States, and that we ought to do nothing to encourage trade with our neighbours to the south, as they have nothing that we want. Gentlemen within hearing of my voice will remember that upon the statute-book of this country stands what is known as the "Standing Offer." It has been there ever since 1879. Under that offer the Government bound itself to give free exchange of trade based on the natural products of the country, when the United States agrees to do the same. Yet we have hon. members of this House representing the Government, knowing that on this question of reciprocity they are driven to the wall and are not sincere, knowing that their pretense of a desire for reciprocity is a hollow sham, now actually declaring that our trade with the United States is not worthy of consideration, in fact, that reciprocity would do us harm and not good. I have heard the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague), and the hon. member for Kent (Mr. McInerney), and the Finance Minister, elaborating the idea that the farmers did not want reciprocity with the United States, that our farmers were content with the products they raise themselves, that they were satisfied with the condition of affairs they have to-day, and all this in the face of the fact that, in spite of the tariff walls between the countries, the whole of our increased foreign trade is represented by our increased trade with the United States. Facts speak louder than words, and even the hon. gentlemen arrange their fanciful arguments and present them to this House in defence of positions which are wrong in themselves—they cannot be consistent in any policy for more than a year—they are driven now to attempt to defend their manifestly untenable position that reciprocity cannot do any good for this country. What was the expense to this country of increasing the trade with countries other than the United States? We grant subsidies amounting to over $120,000 a year to steamboat lines running to the West Indies in order to increase our trade with those islands. And yet, in spite of this, our trade in that direction fell off $248,000 last year, notwithstanding that we taxed ourselves, as I have said, $120,000 a year to pay these subsidies. Now, this condition of affairs must be the direct result of the Government's trade policy. If hon. gentlemen would only permit trade to take its natural channels, the merchants, who know more about these things than the Government can possibly know, would push their trade in the direction in which it could be most easily increased and made most profitable, and I venture to say that in five years from now we should have such an increase in the regular exports of this country as to represent a very large development in our foreign trade. The steamboat trade feels the restrictions of the present Government's policy. The manager of the Beaver Line says:

I lay the blame of the present high cattle rates on the heavy tariff levied under the National Policy. Vessels are coming over only half full; in fact the National Policy is strangling the import trade and hence ships' earnings are entirely dependent on the export.

Mr. Torrance, of the Dominion Line, did not express dissent from Mr. Murray's views, but seemed to consider the Government too much bound to the manufacturers to give much prospect of present relief. These are only the opinions of gentlemen interested in the trade. Whether they know more than the Finance Minister and the Controller of Customs about the trade of this country, about exports and imports and shipping, I leave hon. members of this House and the people at large to judge. There are the opinions of these experts, and it is only a matter of fairness that the moment you retard importation you must expect a charge of a double rate of freight upon the exports in order to compensate the shipper for the loss. We in the Maritime Provinces have four great industries—fishing, lumbering, mining and agricultural. In every one of these we produce a large surplus. Now, what has the Government done with its new tariff to affect these industries, or any of them? Take the item of coal oil, called kerosene. This article is really one of the raw products of these various industries and enters into the production of these articles which we export, and it forms besides a staple article of consumption amongst the masses of this country. They have raised that duty in various ways in times past, and they have not listened to the cry of gentlemen representing the views of the consumers in this House to any appreciable extent. They have at this time only reduced the tax on the barrel 20 cents. How does the duty stand to-day under the new tariff presented by the Government? Take a barrel of coal oil containing 48 gallons, or 40 gallons Imperial measure. The following table shows the cost to the consumer :

|---------------------------------------|--------|
| 48 gal. cask at 5 cts. per gal..... | $2.40 |
| Duty 7½ on Imp. gal. 40..... | 2.85 |
| Duty on bbl | .20 |
| Inspection..... | .10 |
| Bbl. cost | 1.50 |
| | $7.05 |
| Less returned bbl. selling price..... | .60 |
| Total cost to purchaser..... | $6.45 |

Thus the duty represents a tax of about 165 per cent. Now, that is a direct tax upon the industries of the Maritime Provinces, as are many other taxes, such as those upon rope and cordage, corn, cornmeal, pork, rubber goods, ready-made clothing, woollens, cottons, dress goods, flour and sugar. These are direct taxes upon all the industries of the Maritime Provinces, as well as of the great industries of the Dominion. If the Government can tell me any reason why they should not have taken the duty off corn or cornmeal, I will undertake to be satisfied with it, if it is a reasonable and fair excuse or justification for the imposition of that duty. I have never yet heard any man attempt to justify it or explain the position of the Government in continuing the duty on corn and cornmeal. Nobody with an ounce of sense has ever pretended to put forth an argument in support of it. It is a thoroughly unjustifiable policy to put a tax upon the corn which comes in and to prevent the farmer from using it for fattening purposes. Why they put a tax upon cornmeal, goodness only knows; I do not. You do not raise corn in this country, therefore you do not produce meal, but they tax the corn itself and then they tax the meal. They may say there is a drawback allowed on corn imported and ground for human food, but what has that got to do with the corn used in the great industries in the Maritime Provinces, in the lumbering industries, for instance? Why, Sir, eight-tenths of the meal used in the Maritime Provinces by the lumber industry is fed to cattle, and that meal, under the tariff of the present Government is taxed at 40 cents a barrel, and amounted last year to about $24,000, that is the tax it will have to bear. The same argument will apply to pork, cordage, flour, clothing and everything else. The flour duty is a direct tax upon us in the lower provinces, although probably not to the full extent of the amount of duty imposed, but it is a direct tax upon that article to every consumer in the Dominion of Canada. And so with pork and with rubber goods. We import all those articles, we must import them for use in our great lumber and fishing industries. The rubber goods made in Canada are not suited for our purposes, and we have to get them from the United States. If the Canadian manufacturers will make them suitable for our purposes, we will be glad to use them; but the high tariff which is imposed on that class of goods has enabled the Canadian manufacturer to make, to a certain extent, an inferior article, one that is unfitted for many uses in the Maritime Provinces, and we are compelled to buy the foreign article, and can get no relief under this tariff. Now, the tariff has had its natural effect upon the several manufacturing industries of this country. As manufactures were started by reason of this high tariff, fictitious prices were created and large profits made. Then came competition, and prices fell. Some of the manufacturers were forced to the wall, while the richer and the more wealthy united with each other and formed combines. They then regulated the prices to suit themselves; the consumer had nothing to say in the matter at all; he was compelled to buy, if he wanted the article, at the price which the manufacturer asked for it; otherwise he must buy the foreign article and pay the duty. In every case we know what the result was, the price to the consumer was raised in consequence of the duty imposed on the foreign article, because there was no competition by reason of this duty, and the manufacturer got the benefit of it. Here is the difference between the two tariffs, a revenue tariff and a protective tariff. Under a revenue tariff the duty imposed on the article all goes into the Treasury; under the protective principle the duty imposed goes into the pockets of the manufacturer. These two systems stand side by side, and it is self-evident to any person who has followed the history of manufactures in this country, that the Government have allowed a small class of people to rule and to regulate the price charged to the great masses of the consumers; although I myself do not pretend to blame the manufacturers for taking the advantage which the tariff has given to them. I say, that under the protective system it is a natural result that the price of the manufactured article is enhanced by the duty levied upon the foreign article. Now, we know that the manufacturers have formed combines; there is no doubt about it. The hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) and several other members of this House have put motions on the Order paper in times past, declaring that it is best, in the interest of the country, to reduce the duties upon certain lines of goods, the manufacture of which has fallen into the hands of monopolies, and rings, and combines in this country. I hold in my hand a form of declaration, or bond, which may not have been brought to the notice of every gentleman in this House, or to many people in the country; I shall, therefore, be pardoned if I refer to it for a few moments. This bond bears out my contention: it shows distinctly that the manufacturers, having once got the power from the Government, formed rings and established prices to suit themselves. Then they arranged matters so that this ring should not be broken up, so that no manufacturer should be compelled to slaughter his goods upon the home market, but, on the contrary, that the consumer should be compelled to pay enhanced prices. Whether he bought them in Cape Breton or Vancouver, if they were the home-made article, the purchaser must pay the price fixed by the manufacturer. This bond or declaration I speak of is to be signed or sworn to by the purchaser from one of the manufacturers; it also is to be signed by the dealers who trade with the manufacturer and who trade with one another, such as the wholesale houses. This bond or declaration reads as follows:—

That I am _____ for _____ one of the parties to the above named agreements.

That during the month of _____, 189____, neither I, nor, to the best of my knowledge and belief, any other person, for, or on behalf, of the said party, did, in any way whatsoever, consign any goods to any person whomsoever on any pretext, nor allow or pay any commission except to "bonâ fide" agents, whose names have been previously declared to the secretary-treasurer of the said association, nor sell or invoice goods except in the name of the said _____.

That I have not, nor to the best of my knowledge and belief, has any other person, as aforesaid, either directly or indirectly, resorted or had recourse to any subterfuge of any kind whatever as an inducement in making sales of goods.

That no goods have been sold by me, nor, to the best of my knowledge and belief, by any other person as aforesaid (except to members of the said association), at any less price than that fixed by the said association, and that no rebates, discounts (except as provided for in the said agreements), drawbacks, allowances or inducements whatever have been made or allowed by me, or to the best of my knowledge and belief, by any other person as aforesaid, as an inducement to any person to purchase goods.

That no goods have been sold by me, nor, to the best of my knowledge and belief, by any other person, aforesaid, subject to a decline in price, or for delivery after the first day of _____.

And I make this solemn declaration, conscientiously believing the same to be true, by virtue of "an Act for the suppression of voluntary and extrajudicial oaths."

Signed and declared before me _____, at _____, this _____ day of _____, 189____.

Under this bond combines are operating in paints, wire nails, tacks, cut nails, horse-shoes, pressed wrought spikes and bar iron, and the many other lines of necessaries used by the great masses of consumers. That clearly shows the extent to which the tariff has allowed the manufacturers to go. There are hon. gentlemen here on the Conservative side of the House who represent various industries in this country, the farmers, the fishermen, the labourers, the artisans, the shipbuilding industry, and why is it that they do not stand up and speak out in defence of the interests of their constituents? I fail to understand why a condition of things such as that bond represents should be allowed to continue any longer in this country. That reminds me of an anecdote which I may give to the House. There was a celebrated Southern colonel called Smith, who passed out of this world, and proceeded up to the pearly gates. He knocked at the door, and asked permission to enter. The question came, "Colonel, is that you?" The reply was, "Yes." He was then asked, "Are you mounted, or on foot?" The Colonel said, "I am on foot." "Then you cannot come in here; it is utterly impossible," was the reply. So the Colonel trudged down hill again, and met brother Jasper, a coloured man of moderate pretension, who was trudging uphill. Said the Colonel, "Brother, where are you going?" He replied, "I am going up to the pearly gates." "How do you expect to get in?" "I think I have served my people very well on earth, and will be admitted." The Colonel then said to the coloured brother, "You will not be admitted, unless you are mounted." And the Colonel suggested a way in which to get over the difficulty. "You and I can both get in by adopting a little scheme of mine. Suppose you get down on all fours; I will mount you and we will then go up to the pearly gates, and will both get inside." "A very good scheme," said Jasper, and they commenced their journey. The Colonel knocked at the door. The answer came, "Are you mounted?" To which he answered, "Yes; I am mounted." He was then told, "Very well; come in if you are mounted; but hitch your horse outside." That is the way with the manufacturers and consumers. The manufacturers can enter the mansions and attain all positions of affluence and wealth, but the masses are hitched outside. That illustrates in a simple way the position in which the people have been placed by the fiscal policy of the present Government. What has the Government done either by the old tariff or by the proposed modification of the tariff to alleviate the condition of the masses? Nothing. They have reduced the duties on a few articles, immaterial reductions, which are nothing else but a sham. They have raised the duties on other articles, including some prime necessities. Yet the Government will go round and declare that they have introduced the tariff in the interest of the consumers. They, however, still adhere to the principle of protection, and in other parts of the country and before other audiences they will declare that they have reduced the tariff, that it is nothing but a revenue tariff, and that it is a revenue tariff with the protection principle in it. Was there ever such an absurd condition of affairs, such a tariff? The fiscal policy has brought the Government to this position, they have endeavoured to run with the hare and hunt with the hound; endeavoured to satisfy the manufacturers, and at the same time make their peace with the great masses of consumers, and it has landed them where they are, in a vortex of despair, and when they next appeal to the people they will receive the verdict of popular indignation, which they are to-day bringing down on themselves. When the resolutions are considered in Committee, I shall ask the Government to point out wherein the proposed changes of duty on a great many articles will be for the benefit of the consumers. I, with others on this side of the House, represent the fishing, lumbering, mining and agricultural industries; and they will wish to know wherein the proposed tariff on flour, meal, pork, iron goods of certain kinds, cordage and ready-made clothing and other articles which enter into the consumption of the masses of the people in the Maritime Provinces, will prove beneficial. We were told that the tariff would be changed in the interests of the consumers, and I shall ask these explanations in Committee. The Government have been driven from their extremely high pedestal by the speeches of hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, by the arguments presented to the country by the Liberal press, and by the firm stand taken by the Liberal leaders in favour of a reduction in the tariff, and the total abolition of the principle of protection. We believe that the tariff is not in the interests of the people as a whole, but that prosperity can only come to the great mass of the people by reducing taxation all round, and imposing duties that are necessary for revenue purposes on certain classes of goods which are imported, so that we shall obtain an honest revenue for the necessary expenditure of this country. The Liberal party have been asked more than once to state their policy. The memories of hon. gentlemen opposite must be very short, or they are asking that which they have never sought to obtain. The policy of the Liberal party has been a straightforward and undisguised one for years back. It is laid down in more than one resolution on the records of this House, and it is incorporated in the resolutions passed at the grand convention held in Ottawa last June. In order to remove any doubt let me read the principle planks of the platform, adopted at that gathering. They were as follows:—

We, the Liberal party of Canada, in convention assembled, declare:

That the customs tariff of the Dominion should be based, not as it now is upon the protective principle, but upon the requirements of the public service.

That the existing tariff founded upon an unsound principle, and used as it has been by the Government as a corruption agency to keep themselves in office, has developed monopolies, trusts and combinations.

It has oppressed the masses to the enrichment of a few.

It has checked immigration.

It has caused great loss of population.

It has impeded commerce.

It has discriminated against Great Britain.

That the highest interests of Canada demands removal of this obstacle to our country's progress by the adoption of a second fiscal policy, which, while not doing injustice to any class, will promote domestic and foreign trade and hasten the return of prosperity to our people.

That it should be so adjusted as to make free or to bear as lightly as possible upon, the necessities of life, and should be so arranged as to promote freer trade with the whole world, more particularly Great Britain and the United States.

We believe that the results of the protective system have grievously disappointed thousands of persons who honestly supported it, and that the country in the light of experience is now prepared to declare for a sound fiscal policy.

The issue between the two political parties on this question is now clearly defined.

We denounce the principle of protection as radically unsound and unjust to the masses of the people, and we declare our conviction that any tariff changes based on that principle must fail to afford any substantial relief from the burdens under which the country labours.

This issue we unhesitatingly accept, and upon it we await with the fullest confidence the verdict of the electors of Canada.

This we declare to be our policy, the policy we propose to stand by, and it is the same policy we have enunciated in years that have gone by. It is only because hon. gentlemen opposite cannot get the sinews of war under such a policy in the same manner and the same extent as they can from their petted and favoured friends that they have held to protection. I trust the members from the Maritime Provinces will take part in this debate, and show whereby the great industries of those provinces will be benefited by the proposed changes in the tariff, or have been benefited by the old tariff. Our farming industry in keeping with the farming industry in Ontario and Quebec has suffered and will continue to suffer. Let us have a fair and free discussion on this subject. Let hon. gentlemen opposite come down to business, and discuss the tariff itself, and not take up the time of the House in finding fault with the policy of the Liberal party. Let them discuss the merits of the resolution I have read to them, and let them find fault with it if they can or if they dare.

Mr. BELLEY moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

ADJOURNMENT—BEHRING SEA REGULATIONS.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. McDOUGALL (Cape Breton). Before the House adjourns I would like to ask the First Minister if he has any information to communicate on the subject of the Bill introduced in Washington yesterday in relation to the Behring Sea fisheries, and whether it will effect the seal fisheries for the present season. I may say that a number of people in my county are largely interested in this matter, having their vessels in the Behring Sea, and I would like to get some information from the Government as early as possible.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. We have no information on the subject of the Bill introduced, or said to be introduced, in Washington, and as regards that, no statute of the United States can apply of course to British subjects upon the high seas. The matter of regulations will be completed by the Bill which has been introduced into the British Parliament, and upon that, the views of this Government have been fully communicated to Her Majesty's Government.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Has the substance of the new Bill which Sir Charles Russell is said to have introduced into the Imperial Parliament been communicated to the Canadian Government?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Yes.

Mr. LAURIER. And have the Canadian Government approved of it?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The draft Bill was communicated to the Canadian Government, and the Canadian Government expressed objections to certain features of it. I am not yet in a position to say how far our views have prevailed, but we have information that they have prevailed to some extent at least.

Motion agreed to; and the House adjourned at 11.15 p.m.

FAILURE OF THE EXCHANGE BANK.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT asked, Does the Government intend to order any proceedings to be taken to recover the sum lost by the failure of the Exchange Bank from the party who guaranteed the original deposits?

Mr. FOSTER. The department is preparing a case for submission to the Department of Justice for an opinion.

PORT ALBERT HARBOUR.

Mr. McMILLAN asked, Whether the contract for repairing Port Albert Harbour with Patrick Nevin has been cancelled? If cancelled, why? Was any amount of money advanced or paid to Patrick Nevin? If any, how much? Did Patrick Nevin or the previous contractor forfeit any deposit on contract? How much money was paid to A. C. Hawkins for inspecting this work? How much was paid to A. C. Hawkins for filling a hole in the pier?

Mr. OUMET. 1. The contract has not been cancelled. 2. The amount paid to the contractor, Patrick Nevin, up to 31st July, 1893, was $810. 3. No security deposit was forfeited. 4. The amount to A. C. Hawkins, inspector, up to date, was $201.20. 5. Nothing was paid to A. C. Hawkins for the work referred to.

SAULT STE. MARIE CANAL.

Mr. CHARLTON asked, What was the date fixed in the original contract with the contractors for the construction of the Sault Ste. Marie Canal, for the completion of that work? Was any subsequent arrangement made with said contractors for the earlier completion of said canal? If so, what was the date fixed for the completion of the canal under such agreement? What were the terms upon which the said contractors agreed to complete their work on the Sault Ste. Marie Canal at an earlier date than stipulated in the original contract? And what additional amount of money, compensation, or consideration was promised them?

Mr. HAGGART. For a canal with lock 600 feet long and 85 feet wide, with 16 feet and 3 inches of water on the mitre sill, the time named in contract, dated the 20th November, 1888, for completion, was the 10th May, 1892. In the early part of 1891, upon representation being made of the importance of increasing the depth of water in the canal and locks, and increasing the length and breadth of the lock to 650 feet in length and 100 feet in width, with 19 feet and 3 inches of water on the mitre sill, negotiations were had with the contractors for this change, resulting in an agreement dated the 13th June, 1891, the whole to be completed by 10th May, 1893. In the early part of 1892, it having been urged that the dimensions of the lock be changed and made 900 feet long by 600 feet wide, with 20 feet and 3 inches of water on the mitre sill, after negotiations, under date of the 5th August, 1892, the contractors agreed to undertake the change, completion to be on the 31st December, 1894. In the autumn of 1892 it was considered important to have the canal completed in the summer of 1894, and an agreement was entered into on November 8th, 1892, to complete the lock masonry by the 31st December, 1893, for $90,000, and to complete by the 1st July, 1894, the remainder of the woodwork, and the iron bolts, and fastenings, &c., of the filling and emptying culverts in the lock bottom at the prices per item for which the lower ends of the culverts are already under contract to them.

A FAST ATLANTIC SERVICE.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT asked, Whether, in view of the fact that the Minister of Finance has declared that he expects a deficit in the revenue of the current and succeeding fiscal year, the Government intend to ask Parliament during this session for a vote of $750,000 for a fast Atlantic service?

Mr. FOSTER. I wish to call the hon. gentleman's attention to the fact that when he speaks of a deficit in the accounts for either the current or succeeding fiscal years, if he means a deficit after taking the revenue and expenditure into account, he is a little misinformed. I do not think he can find any such declaration made by the Minister of Finance. It is the intention of the Government, however, to ask legislation from Parliament with reference to a fast Atlantic service this year.

SUGAR REFINING INDUSTRY.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT asked, Under what heads in the census returns are to be found the 1,900 persons stated by the Minister of Finance to be supported by the industry of sugar refining?

Mr. FOSTER. As respects the employees in sugar refineries, they are to be found under two general heads: (a) under the head of Industrial Establishments; (b) under the head of Occupations. And, first, under the head of Industrial Establishments, they are to be found under the sub-head of Sugar Refineries ("Hands Employed"). Second, under the head of Occupations they are separated according to the special work in which they are engaged, such as chemists, sugar-makers and refiners, foremen.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Have you not got the numbers?

Mr. FOSTER. I have not got the numbers.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Your census returns give us no information on these points.

Mr. FOSTER. Janitors, watchmen, engineers, packers, carpenters, machinists, coopers, officials of the manufacturing companies, labourers, &c., &c., the design of "occupations" being to divide the employees into their several classes, while the return of Industrial Establishments shows the number of employees connected with each industrial establishment irrespective of their positions in the establishment.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I would like to say to the hon. gentleman that I think we ought to have a more detailed account than that, because the various items he has alluded to are lumped, apparently, 50 or 100 industries together, and there is no possibility of seeing how many of these 1,900 belong to each.

Mr. FOSTER. The total number of employees in the sugar refineries is given, but not under the heading of each special employment.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. One hundred and seventy-one, but you state 1,900, and the object was to ascertain under what heads these 1,900 came. There is no subdivision in the return in my hand.

AGRICULTURAL IMPLEMENT INDUSTRY.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT asked, How many persons are in like manner supported by the industry of agricultural implement making, and under what heads are they placed ?

Mr. FOSTER. As respects employees in agricultural implements making : 1st. These in 1891 numbered 4,543, according to the returns from the Agricultural Implement Establishments. 2nd. With respect to occupations, they are distributed among classes such as agricultural implement makers, foremen, clerks and other officials, stationary engineers and firemen, teamsters, packers, designers, blacksmiths, labourers, &c., as they designated themselves to the enumerators.

EXCISE DUTY ON CANADIAN TOBACCO.

Mr. DUGAS asked, 1. How many pounds of Canadian tobacco have paid excise duty? 2. What is the amount of the said duties? 3. How many pounds of foreign tobacco have paid excise duty? 4. What is the amount of said duties? 5. How many pounds of cigars made with foreign tobacco have paid duty? 6. What is the amount of the said duties? 7. How many thousand cigars, made with Canadian tobacco, have paid duty? 8. What is the amount of the said duties? 9. What is the amount paid to the employees of the Canadian tobacco department? 10. What is the amount paid to the employees of the foreign tobacco department? 11. If no such classification exists, what is the total amount paid to the employees of the Excise for the tobacco department? 12. What is the number of officials in the tobacco branch of the Department of Excise?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). The information required by the hon. gentleman is so wide in its extent that I must ask him to take the usual course of placing the notice of motion on the Order Paper, at the same time limiting the extent to which the inquiry goes.

BREAKWATER AT CANOE COVE.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT (for Mr. Davies, P.E.I.) asked, Has the Minister of Public Works received a petition for the construction of a breakwater at or near Canoe Cove, P.E.I. ? If so, is it the intention of the Minister to have a survey of the locality made with a view of ascertaining the probable cost of constructing such breakwater ?

Mr. OUIMET. A petition from the inhabitants of townships Nos. 30 and 29 in the county of Queen's, P.E.I., praying for the construction of a breakwater at Canoe Cove, P.E.I., was transferred to the Department by Mr. Neil McNeil on the 27th March last. The matter is now being inquired into by the department.

NEWSPAPER ADVERTISING.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT asked, 1. Names of the several newspapers forming

Class "A" as per Order in Council of July 14th, 1891, described as follows :—

"A." A paper of first-class standing entitled to receive, at the discretion of Heads of Departments, all kind of advertising whether of a general character, such for instance as Tenders for extensive Public Works or for supplies in large quantities, or of a local nature concerning only the localities in which such papers are published.

2. Of those in Class "B" :

"B." An influential and widely circulated paper, although not published in a very important centre, entitled at the discretion of Heads of Departments to the largest portion of advertising of provincial or local character and to a limited share of the more general advertising.

3. Of those in Class "C" :

"C." Purely local newspapers, daily or weekly, monthly or weekly periodicals and journals devoted to special branches of learning or industry, entitled only to purely local or special advertising, and that merely in a very limited proportion.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The classification referred to in this question has been abolished.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. How long ?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Very recently. The matter has been under consideration in Council. It would not be produced in any case, because it is confidential. It would involve the reading of a printed pamphlet of 30 pages.

CANADIAN SEAL CATCH IN BEHRING SEA.

Mr. LANDERKIN asked, What is the estimated number of seals taken yearly in Behring Sea by Canadian sealers during the past ten years, and what is the estimated value of the same ?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. There are no particulars of the catch of seal for 1884. In reply to the question put by the hon. gentleman I may read the following figures showing the number of skins and the value in each year since 1884, of seals taken in Behring Sea by Canadian sealers : 1885, 800 at $10, $8,000 ; 1886, 12,423 skins at $10, $124,230 ; 1887, 21,716 skins at $7, $152,012 ; 1888, 16,940 skins at $10, $169,400 ; 1889, 16,585 skins at $10, $165,850 ; 1890, 18,165 skins at $11, $199,815. For the three following years the modus vivendi was in force, under which Canadian and United States sealers were forbidden to seal in the waters of Behring Sea, the question being then in dispute. But the notice of the promulgation of the modus vivendi not having been issued in time there were taken by Canadian sealers in 1891, 29,146 skins at $15, being of the value of $437,190. During the next two years the Canadian sealers catch was outside of the waters of Behring Sea, so no figures appear in answer to the question. For the years 1885 to 1891 the total number of skins was 115,775, being of the value of $1,256,497.

Mr. LANDERKIN. How is the table made up?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. From the returns of the Collector of Customs at Victoria.

THE FRENCH TREATY.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT asked, Whether, now that the several deputations referred to by the Minister of Finance have had the opportunity of stating their views in reference thereto, the Government of Canada are prepared to state whether they will ask Parliament to ratify the French Treaty, and if not, why not?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The Government will ask Parliament to ratify the treaty.

TRENT VALLEY CANAL.

Mr. MULOCK asked, How much has been expended on the Trent Valley Canal system? What was the total cost of maintenance of the system of the last fiscal year? What was the total revenue from the system for the last fiscal year?

Mr. HAGGART. The expenditure on construction prior to Confederation, 1867, was $309,371.31; ditto from 30th June, 1879, to 30th June, 1893, $1,079,112.56; from 30th June, 1893, to 1st March, 1894, $3,338.32; total, $1,391,822.19. Cost of maintenance, 1892-93, $12,926.07. Cost of staff, 1892-93, $3,739.86. Total revenue, 1892-93, $888.95.

STEAMER "ADMIRAL."

Mr. FAUVEL asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to ask for tenders for the service of the mails between Dalhousie, New Brunswick and Gaspé Basin, or to continue the same subsidy of $12,500 to the steamer "Admiral" for the said service?

Mr. FOSTER. The subsidy of $12,500 has been continued to the steamer "Admiral" for this service.

POST OFFICE AT MONTMAGNY.

Mr. DELISLE asked, Is John Langlois, of Montmagny, in the employment of the Government, in the post office at Montmagny? If so, since what date has he been so employed? What is his salary, and how much has he received from the Government since his appointment?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Mr. J. C. B. Langlois, generally known as Mr. John Langlois, is postmaster at Montmagny. The Montmagny post office was transferred to the charge of Mr. Langlois in November, 1892. Mr. Langlois receives per annum: for salary, $520; for forward allowance, $40; for rent, $80, and he has received since his appointment: for salary, $707.77; for forward allowance, $54.44, and for rent, $101.88. Total, $871.09.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE TARIFF.

House again resumed the adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Foster:

That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go into Committee of Ways and Means; and the motion of Sir Richard Cartwright in amendment thereto.

Mr. BELLEY. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, one of the leading features of the tariff debate raised a few days ago in this House, is that, on one side, the great prosperity and great resources of the country are being expatiated upon, while from hon. gentlemen opposite we hear nothing but doleful and disheartening utterances. Are we, then, on this side of the House, to be taxed with exaggeration when proclaiming aloud the prosperity of the country, or are hon. gentlemen opposite open to criticism for discrediting and running down the country? I do not think we, on this side, are open to censure on that score. At all events, should we err in standing by our country, it is a very excusable weakness of the heart, while the hon. gentlemen opposite are guilty of a much more heinous sin, a sin of the intellect. Under these circumstances, the words of Christ to Magdalen, the repentant sinner, apply to our case: "Her sins, which are many, are forgiven, for she loved much." Another prominent characteristic of the present debate is this: that the Government intends to maintain the protection of home industries, the National Policy established in 1878, preserving in its entirety the principle of protection. This policy is not only the policy of the Conservative party, but that of the whole people of Canada. It was the people that insisted on having that policy in 1878, and endorsed it again at the general elections of 1882, 1887 and 1891. Shall it be said that the people made a mistake? Supposing the people were wrong in 1878, how could they have been misled into endorsing this policy on three different circumstances? The electors are not likely to have fallen repeatedly into the same snares at four different elections. It stands to reason, on the contrary, that when bringing the present Government into power by an overwhelmingly strong majority, the electors were not labouring under any delusion as to the character of the policy they wished to commit the Government to. That the same electors should have fallen into the same error in 1882, in 1887 and in 1891, after the protective policy had been in operation for years, is a preposterous idea and altogether beyond the realm of probability. Moreover, in the actual state of things prevailing in the country is found the vindication of the cause of action pursued by the electorate, when placing the present government in power, whether we consider the aim the framers of the National Policy had in view or the fruits of that policy. That the various classes of the community are in a state of prosperity, is an undisputed fact. The farming community, the working classes, the manufacturers are actually enjoying a high degree of prosperity, a fact which goes to prove that the policy pursued by its framers, from its very inception, was truly national and patriotic. When protection was established in 1878, the working classes could not find employment, the home industries not having taken the development they have since attained. But, thanks to the National Policy, our Canadian industries sprang into existence. The framers of the Confederation in 1867 wished to build up a nation; they instilled life into it, in order to enable it to reach its full development, and wing its flight towards prosperity; industries had to be started into existence, to enable our nation to compete with and follow in the wake of other nations, and in order to make rapid strides towards prosperity. Through protection, the great agricultural industry has received its full development; a labour market has been created: thousands of workmen have found employment, who, in their turn, as consumers have bought the farm products. The agricultural labourer shares in the prosperity of the workmen, the advancement of the agricultural interests being closely connected with the progress of the industrial community. Such are the plain facts, Mr. Speaker, and those who have closely followed the progress of events during the last fifteen years will bear me out when I say that this is an exact portrayal of the economical condition of the country. When agriculture is prosperous, and the working classes find remunerative employment, you have a happy and contented people, and contentment and prosperity make a people loyal, and breed in them a national spirit, an ardent love for the native land. In the National Policy of 1878, a policy of protection to our manufacturing and industrial establishments, was contained in its embryonic state the germ of Canada's future prosperity; on the groundwork of that policy was raised the edifice of our national grandeur. What has been the outcome of that policy? Sir, in 1881, as it appears from the census returns of that year, the number of industrial establishments was 49,923, while the total number of manufacturers in 1891, was 75,768, showing that during the decade there was an increase of nearly 51 per cent. Now, as to the amount of capital invested in those manufactures. In 1881, there was a capital of $165,836,817; invested in those industrial establishments, against $353,836,817 invested in 1891, being an increase of $188,534,194. or

114 per cent. In 1881, the number of employees in our industrial establishments was 254,935 against 367,865 in 1891, being an increase of 112,930. Now, as to the wages paid. In 1881 the wages reached a total of $59,429,002, against $99,762,441 in 1891, showing an increase of $40,333,439 over 1881, the amount being at the rate of $272 on an average per year, as compared with $233 per head in 1881, an increase of 52 per cent over 1881. Undoubtedly, this is a decided advance in the average rate of wages, and a considerable general progress. The different classes of our population are quite satisfied with the present state of things. It may be safely inferred, from the above figures, that the country has been growing fast since 1881. Our home industries are progressing; our working classes have plenty work and remunerative wages; hence it follows that our farming community is also in a state of prosperity; as to our working classes, they are certainly better off in Canada than in any other country of the world, as they are enjoying a larger share of freedom and independence than either in the United States or in Europe. The labour question is not a living issue here. The workman may aspire to the highest social and political positions, as evinced by the presence in this Chamber of my hon. friend the member for Montreal East (Mr. Lépine). Now, Mr. Speaker, I come to our agricultural situation. No one who is conversant with the agricultural situation of 1878, when one heard of little or nothing except the complaints and sufferings of agriculturists in all parts of our country, will dispute the fact that the farmers' lot is not better to-day than it was at that time when agricultural distress prevailed and our farmers were on the verge of destitution and beggary. To confine myself to my own constituency, the farmers were loaded with mortgages, while at present, they manage to pay their debts and meet their bills. In 1878 our farmers had got into a state of bankruptcy, while at the present moment, they are in relative prosperity, and some of them are making up an estate. Many parishes, utterly destitute ten years ago, are now enjoying prosperity and can compare favourably with the thriving parishes of the district of Montreal. That this happy state of the farming community was brought about solely by protection or by the National Policy alone, I would not go the length of asserting on the floor of this House, still I think I am borne out by the facts when I assert that protection has been a very important factor in the progress accomplished, that it was instrumental in replenishing the treasury of our country, thereby enabling the Government to secure railway connection between the rural centres and the manufacturing cities. Several other factors have been instrumental in bringing about this state of prosperity, and among others, the concerted action of all men of good will in the province of Quebec in the furtherance of the agricultural interests. Liberals and Conservatives, during these last years, have acted in co-operation with each other with a view to impressing on the minds of the farming community that the latter could live on the land in comfort and find thereon all the resources needed to bring up their families. In 1889, in the county of Chicoutimi, cheese has been sold to the value of $50,000, in five or six parishes alone. In 1891, the value of cheese made was $72,000. This year, it reaches up to $90,000. In the Lake St. John district, which is included in my constituency, the sales have reached about the same figure, giving a total for both sections, of something in the neighbourhood of $200,000 of butter and cheese sold, this year. These figures go far to destroy the alleged pauperism of our farming community. Still the county of Chicoutimi does not rank among the most prosperous counties of the province. The dairying industry is also making headway in the county of Chicoutimi, so ably represented in this House by my hon. friend (Mr. Carroll), who, by the way, forgot to tell us about the growth of the dairying industry in his constituency. The farmers of this country who were paupers, ten, fifteen or twenty years ago have been made wealthy through this industry. So with the counties of Montmagny and L'Islet. I remember hearing, last year, the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte), telling the House that the farmers had no markets for their products. Now, our only products are butter and cheese. The agricultural community in the province of Quebec cannot compete with the American West in the line of breadstuffs and grain raising. The secret of its future prosperity lies in the dairying industry. Farmers should give up growing oats and breadstuffs for exportation. The hon. member for L'Islet told us there was no outlet for our agricultural products. I say we have a first class market in England for the produce of our dairying industry; and this applies to all the districts of the province of Quebec. We have sold cheese and butter this year to the tune of $6,000,000. I put the question to the hon. members opposite: does this go to show that we have no market, or that we need the United States market? This policy of encouragement should receive the endorsement and warm support of members of both federal and provincial legislatures. Strenuous efforts are everywhere being made in this direction. Everybody is working in favour of the agricultural interest, for, to quote a well-known aphorism: "Labourage et paturage sont les deux mamelles qui nourrissent l'Etat." It is only by promoting among the farming community these agricultural industries that our farmers will be satisfied that they can live with comfort on the land. But we are met here with a serious objection: How is the exodus of the farmers towards the United States to be accounted for, if the farming community enjoy such prosperity. It is protection, they say, that drives them away from the country. Give us a treaty of reciprocity with the United States and, behold, there will be a stop to the exodus. Such contention is unfair and at variance with actual facts, and facts are stubborn. The exodus dates back from 1840, while protection was only established fifteen years ago. How then can they stand as cause to effect? And the outgoing of our population continued from 1854 to 1866, notwithstanding the existence of a reciprocity treaty with the United States during this period styled by the Liberals the golden age of Canada. In those years, every farmer was able to have his chicken in the pot for the Sunday's dinner. Reverend Father Hamon is authority for the statement that, under reciprocity, and when the country enjoyed such great prosperity, Canadians went over in increasing numbers to the neighbouring republic. It is, then, most unfair to say that the exodus is due to the impolicy of the course pursued by the present Government. I am of opinion, on the contrary, that the National Policy cured, to a certain extent, the exodus from this country. It did not stop it altogether, but the stream was dammed up, and within the last few years it has resulted in keeping the exodus from acceleration. The 'Courrier de St. Hyacinthe,' in one of its latest issues, contained interesting figures relating to a movement homewards among our Canadian compatriots. These figures are derived from reliable sources, and I would recommend them to the attentive perusal of the hon. members. It is stated in that article that as many as 172,000 Canadians have come back from the States within the past two years. If it has not proved a panacea against emigration, the National Policy has at least dammed up the stream. I do not presume to go into the causes of this deplorable outgoing of people from the country, which can hardly be adequately accounted for. But such a depopulation cannot be explained away, in my opinion, by assigning as its cause general dissatisfaction among our farming community. In 1840, a considerable displacement took place in the older settlements; the stream of population flowing out of their old parishes, set in a twofold direction, partly towards the neighbouring republic, partly towards the Lake St. John region. The current running towards this latter region carried with it settlers from the settlements on the southern shore of the River St. Lawrence. Other farmers went over to work into the United States. I need not tell this House which of these two sets of emigrants succeeded best in making homes for themselves. Of those pioneers who took up the axe and plunged into the primeval forest or those who went over the line, I need not tell the House which of the two best succeeded in making homes for themselves. We have fertile and wide farm lands, and should our Canadian fellow-citizens only retrace their steps homewards and resume their agricultural pursuits, and work with, I will not say as hard, but half as hard as they do in the United States, they would soon be rich men. I speak from personal experience, coming as I do from a newly settled country, where no industrious man willing to work, has failed in making a good home. To caprice, for the most part, and not to lack of energy, must be attributed the exodus of our fellow-citizens, as also to a lack of courage to follow in the wake of those pioneers who had opened up the wild lands and cleared the forest. The hon. members sitting opposite dispute also the correctness of our conclusions as to the National Policy when they say that the taxation bears heavily and unjustly on the farming community. As a matter of fact, far from bearing the great burden of taxation, there is no class of the community that pays so little tax to the Federal Government. The farm products raised by the agriculturist are not taxed by the Government. The farmer has to pay, like all the other consuming classes, the duties levied by the Federal Government on spirits, tea, sugar, coffee, rice. Now, from the figures of the last census, or rather from the Statistical Year Book for 1892, it is quite easy to gather data as to the amount of taxation paid by the agriculturists on these different heads. In 1892, the duties levied on spirits amounted to $1,804,877, and on wines to $367,867. Let us see how unfair is the statement that the farming community pay one-half of these imposts, when their share of taxation on these articles amount to about one-fourth only of the amount collected. Granting, for the sake of argument, that they pay one-half of the duty collected on spirits, their share of taxation on that head would amount to $902,428. As to imported wines, the consumption of the farming community is about one-third, and here again, for the sake of argument, let us credit them with one-half of the total amount, $122,626. Now, both these sums added up give a total of $1,025,054, which sum, divided between 413,113 farmers, or heads of families, give an average yearly taxation of $2.48 per head. I come now to the Customs duties paid on tea, sugar, rice and coffee. In 1892, the duty collected on tea was $8,265. This tax has since been removed. On sugar the duty was $190,300; on coffee, $42,870; on rice, $38,730; the proportion per head for the whole population of Canada, which is 4,823,299, is six cents. Six cents per head! behold the burden of taxation which people have made such a bugbear of: it amounts to a taxation of six cents per head per annum for all duties levied on coffee, tea, rice, and for all sugar duties. Taking a family of eight individuals, which is, I submit, not a fair average for our Canadian families and quite below the reality, this tax represents a yearly impost of 48 cents for each family of the farming community; to which if you add the duty on spirits, you will have a tax of $2.96 per annum. From these two dollars and ninety-six cents, two dollars and forty-eight cents have to be deducted, as they represent taxes levied on luxuries; for spirits and wines are not by any means classed among the necessaries of life for the farmer any more than for the other classes of the community; while tea, sugar and other articles have to be bought. At all events, the highest amount the farmer has to pay for the tariff on these articles is $2.96 a year; a burden not oppressive enough to depopulate Canada, and drive Canadians away from their farms into the United States. Now, Mr. Speaker, one of the chief aims of the National Policy was the raising of a revenue which would enable us to meet the expenditures incurred for our great public works. With this additional revenue, we were enabled to purchase the North-west Territories and to incur considerable expenditure to develop their resources; an expenditure which my hon. friend for Lotbinière (Mr. Rinfret) regrets, though he does not pass condemnation on it. We have said he almost came to the point of repenting of having incurred expenditures for the purchase and development of those territories, and the two or three millions of dollars of yearly expenditures. In that hon. gentleman's opinion, the House should repent of the course followed in the past; and whether the people of the province of Quebec would now venture to pursue the policy carried out in the territories is a question open to serious doubt, as viewed in the light of events of quite recent occurrence within these territories. Such is not the point at issue, but whether the policy pursued by the Government was a wise one, and whether the Government were right in adopting such a course. In my opinion, the Government's North-west policy was the right one, and one we should not repent of; for, to my mind, Mr. Speaker, the expenditure of capital for the purchase and the opening up of the Territories, as also for the various improvements required, was a splendid investment, and a policy which commends itself to the general approbation of this House, on economic grounds. For it is owing to this policy that certain commodities sell now much cheaper than formerly. The poor man's flour would not sell so cheap, were it not for the opening up of the Territories and their wheat raising capacity, nor would the price of these commodities have decreased by one-half. Calculating the difference of prices paid for flour prior to the opening up of the Territories and the actual prices, we cannot help coming to the conclusion that this difference in prices amply compensates us for the sacrifices incurred and the capital expended in the purchase and development of this region. We are so circumstanced in the province of Quebec, in the opinion of the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Rinfret) that we have to resort to direct taxation in order to meet the public expenditure. I agree with him that more millions have been swallowed up in the province of Quebec than in the North-west. Let the hon. member express his regret at the doings of his friends, while they were in power in that province, and not try to saddle other people with the responsibility of the evil done by the former. Owing to this additional revenue, created by the National Policy, we have been enabled to aid the provinces in building their railways, and securing railway connection, and improving our transportation facilities; we have undertaken to improve our inland navigation. I believe in the practicability of providing security to the shipping on the St. Lawrence, notwithstanding the opinion of the hon. the leader of the Opposition, who thinks that none but sails can navigate its waters with security; in my opinion, even vessels of great speed can navigate the river. In our system of railway connection throughout our provinces, in our canals, and in the great transcontinental Pacific Railway, a most stupendous work, we should hail with pride the results of the National Policy. The Canadian Pacific Railway was built in spite of the Liberal party, which fought with might and main this great national work, this gigantic undertaking which provokes universal admiration. Truly admirable was the genius that planned and found the means of carrying out the great work, the most marvellous feat of engineering skill recorded in the annals of the world; truly admirable again was the genius that planned the policy best calculated to secure the necessary means for carrying out the enterprise; truly marvellous also was the development assumed by our home industries which contributed towards lightening the burden of taxation involved in the carrying out of this great work. To-day, the Government contemplates establishing a fast Atlantic service, to run between Europe and Canada, and behold the hon. members sitting opposite stand up and object to the Government policy as impracticable. And the hon. the leader of the Opposition, who is the representative of the city and district of Quebec is the first to stand up and protest against this fast Atlantic service, thus antagonizing a policy endorsed by the whole district of Quebec. While listening, the other day, to the hon. gentleman's remarks upon His Excellency's Speech, and to the words which the whole district of Quebec repudiates, I recalled to mind the eloquent words, full of fervour and devotion to the interests of the city, fallen from the hon. gentleman at the banquet tendered him in January last. He then proclaimed aloud that Quebec had a magnificent harbour, the finest harbour in the whole world, and that the brightest future was in store for it. But he now says that steamboats can scarcely enter into the harbour, except the Montmagny steamboat, which runs six miles an hour, down stream; that larger vessels of greater speed, running 20 miles an hour, cannot go into the harbour.

Mr. BELLEY.

Quebec is no longer the finest harbour in the world, and none but vessels of an inferior rate of speed, snail-like, can enter into it. I protest against such language, Mr. Speaker. I know that a steamboat of the Richelieu company was plying last year between Quebec and Chicoutimi, running at a rate of 20 miles an hour it was the "Carolina." I protest, as a member of the district of Quebec, and I beg of the hon. members of that district to enter also their protest against the words fallen from the hon. the leader of the Opposition. The hon. gentleman was also of opinion that the prosperity of Quebec was connected with the iron ship-building industry, and at his command, as it were, newly built iron steamers were to spring up from the ship-building yards near the River St. Charles. I enter again my protest against the words fallen from the hon. gentleman, and I invite the Liberal members of the district of Quebec to join in my protest.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. BELLEY. (Translation.) From the interruptions that greet my speech, I augur that the hon. gentlemen do not wish to join in my protest. They are so blinded by party prejudices that, should they once come into power, they will be unable to tell the truth, for the contention is that men in power cannot tell the truth. I beg of them to stand up and plainly tell us what they think about the utterances of the leader of the Opposition concerning the interests of the district of Quebec. Let them protest to-day, on the strength of their mandate; for, should they fail to do it now, the electors of the district of Quebec, at the next election, will speak out their mind on the matter. I know that newspapers, among others 'L'Electeur,' obeying a watch-word, try to attenuate the import of the utterances of the hon. the leader of the Opposition, with a view to putting public opinion on the wrong scent, and smothering the protests which rise from all sides of the district of Quebec against the words alluded to. Now, Mr. Speaker, I think I have clearly established that the National Policy is closely connected with the prosperity of all classes of the community, that the present state of things, as compared with 1878, is quite satisfactory. True, we have gone through the regime of desolation extending from 1874 to 1878. When the Liberals came into power, in the province of Quebec, we had also to go through a similar ordeal; it was the abomination of abominations.

Mr. LANGELIER. (Translation.) You mean the abomination of desolation.

Mr. BELLEY. (Translation.) Exactly so. They brought down ruin on the province of Quebec, just as they had brought ruin on the whole Dominion, when in power in Ottawa. The electors understood it in the past, and will show in the future that they fully realize the situation, in spite of all the prejudices appealed to by our opponents, on all the platforms of the country. Tariff revision, a rational and just tariff revision, meets with general approbation, without the attendant financial disasters and ruin experienced by our neighbours. Within a few months, the policy pursued up to now by the Conservative party will secure the approbation of the Canadian people. We will not reverse a policy endorsed by the people. The tariff reform now under discussion in this House may be likened to the repairs done to a building, which, far from detracting from its value, only strengthen and beautify it and improve its appearance. A tariff revision, on the basis of protection, will only consolidate our institutions, and secure for the Conservative party an after growth of strength and renewed vitality.

Mr. BRUNEAU. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, I must at the outset heartily congratulate the hon. member for Chicoutimi upon the effort he made—without, however, persuading us—by trying to show to this House the benefits of the protective system. But I was impressed with the singularity of the comparison he made with the Magdalen of the Gospel, and it hardly proves in favour of the Government. It must be confessed that comparing them with Magdalen the sinner is not flattering for the Ministers. Neither was it an appropriate comparison, for the Government are not, that I know of, a repentant Magdalen, since they continue to uphold their protective policy; instead of repenting, they, therefore, persevere in their impenitence. Why, exclaimed the hon. member for Chicoutimi (Mr. Belley) has not the protective policy caused the prosperity of the country and was it not upheld in four different occasions since 1878? Indeed, the cause is known of the result of the general election of 1878. Is it not a known fact that it is by deceiving the electorate, by offering them a national panacea, that the Conservative party then succeeded in coming into power. In 1882, they owed their maintaining into power to the infamous gerrymandering. In 1887, they owed their success to the scandalous law on electoral franchise, and the hon. member for Chicoutimi ought not to have forgotten that it is owing to the existence of such a law if there was no ballot box in the poll at Pointe-aux-Esquimaux. In 1891, the Government again succeeded by deceiving the people with respect to reciprocity with our neighbours. The hon. member for Chicoutimi stated that there was no mortgages on the farms of his county. I used to place much confidence in the word and honourableness of my colleagues in this House, yet, he will allow me to tell him that I would like to go to the registration office of his county in order there to collect the information which would enable me to control the accuracy of his statement. He next extolled the benefits of the protective system, and at the same time he referred to the sale of cheese and butter in his county. I cannot see what the sale of these two products might have to do with the protective system. Speaking of reciprocity with the United States, the hon. gentleman hinted that the commercial treaty which existed from 1854 to 1866 between Canada and our neighbours, was not the golden age for our exports. I have here the report of the Minister of Finance, published in 1862, respecting the treaty of reciprocity, and here is what I find therein: In 1851 we exported to the United States products to the value of $4,071,544; in 1852, $6,248,520; in 1853, $8,936,380; in 1854, the first year of the treaty, our exports amounted to $8,649,000, that is a little less than the preceding year, but soon after, as soon as 1855, our exports reached $16,737,276. In 1856 they still showed an increase of $1,100,000, since they amounted to $17,979,752. That was the golden age for the Canadian trade with the United States. It began with the treaty of reciprocity of 1854, and continued till 1866. That is why, Mr. Speaker, the Opposition would wish us to come back to that policy. The hon. member for Chicoutimi voted about the coming back of our compatriots to our country, the 'Courrier de St. Hyacinthe' as an authority. He stated, after the 'Courrier,' that 162,000 Canadians had come back since two years. I do certainly not believe in the sayings and authority of the 'Courrier de St. Hyacinthe,' and I will show by the very report of the Department of Public Instruction in the province of Quebec for last year that this alleged coming back does not take place. I find in the report the most direct and formal contradiction of the statements of the 'Courrier de St. Hyacinthe.' Indeed, I read the following in that report: Mr. Beaulieu, of Isle Vert, one of the school inspectors of the province of Quebec, writes as follows in his report for 1892-93:—

It is the constant leaving of our young girls for the manufacturing centres of New England which was the cause that the school trustees had more difficulty this year than ever to recruit the teaching staff. It is the leaving of young men for the neighbouring republic which is the cause that the heads of families having women hands for farming are compelled to take their children away from school at an early age and put them to their works. It is the leaving of families for the United States which is the cause that the districts are depopulating and that the school is closed, in many instances, on account of the small number of remaining children.

For his own party, Mr. Biland, another school inspector, writes as follows:—

The average of salaries for the primary schools is $79 and for the high schools, $135. It is a little better than in the years gone by, but there is every reason to believe that better will yet considerably develop, for the female teachers have left, in large numbers, for the United States. Those who remain will very likely require higher salaries.

Mr. Demers, of St. John, says, for his own part:—

This great difference in point of attendance is chiefly due to the leaving for the United States of a very large number of families from this part of the province.

Mr. Stenson, of Wotton, adds :

There is consequently a scarcity of teachers (there are only two lay teachers in my district of inspection); many female teachers have given up their calling to go into more profitable careers: a certain number are going to the United States to work in factories. It is a fact I much regret having to own, but I think it is better to tell the whole truth, in the hope that that humiliation will hasten the applying of a remedy to this great evil.

And it is after these testimonies that the hon. member for Chicoutimi, taking his stand on the statements of the 'Courrier de St. Hyacinthe,' comes to this House and states that our compatriots are coming back from the United States to this country. The hon. gentleman also referred to the prosperity of the agricultural class, but who is he that does not know that our lands have suffered a great depreciation since ten years, depreciation which is the result of the deplorable exodus of our compatriots to the neighbouring country? I live in a rural county, and have opportunities to see the people; I just come from home, and a few days ago I inquired from citizens of Sorel, St. Ann and St. Joseph whether many Canadian families had come back from the United States. The answer given to me was not the same as that of the hon. member for Chicoutimi. For a very few families who come back, a much larger number have left. The hon. member for Chicoutimi (Mr. Belley) exclaimed: Do the agricultural class pay duties? He gave us the result of his estimates, and he came to the conclusion that a farmer's family only pays duties to the amount of $2.80. He went further, and he said that if we are paying the direct tax in the province of Quebec the fault lies with Mercier. I will have an opportunity, in the course of my remarks, to throw a retrospective glance on the past, and to refer to Mr. Mercier. For the present, allow me, Mr. Speaker, to tell you that the Conservatives are now into power in Quebec, and that the first action they took was to tax, ransack and rob the people under the pretext of paying the debts of Mr. Mercier, and it is yet to be asked what debts they paid with their loans, bearing interest at 7 per cent? The resolutions of the hon. the Minister of Finance are calculated, in the mind of the Government, to effect the Customs reform claimed for years and years by this side of the House, and supported by the press and the public sentiment of the country. Seeing from day to day the ever-rising tide of reproaches and discontents, hearing from all parts of the eastern and western provinces numerous complaints against their fiscal policy, foreseeing a new general election, feeling the ground slipping away from under their feet, the Government at last decided to take action, after hesitating and procrastinating. And the new piece of work which they now bring before this House is still, as was the late tariff, according to the hon. the Minister of Finance and his friends, the ne plus ultra of perfection. But I much fear that the Government who intended to play the part of a "wise opportunist," according to the language used at Montreal, in December last, by the hon. the Minister of Public Works, should have completely missed their mark, and fired their last shot before the coming electoral fight. The claims for a revision of our tariff, not a slight one, but a thorough one, were so urging and positive, that in January, 1893, on the eve of the last Federal session, in the course of a dinner at Toronto, the hon. the First Minister was compelled to declare that he acknowledged the necessity of lopping the moulding branches of the protective tree. When the session came he had it ostentatiously announced by the hon. the Minister of Finance, on the 14th February, 1893, that the revision of our tariff was definitely postponed to the present session, so as to have time, during the interval, to take the necessary information, and especially to know the stand and decisions of the American Congress on the same question. So, during the recess, we attended, behind the curtain, the more or less comical play, while the perambulating commission of the Government were going to the country. From the secret meetings they had with the manufacturers came out the resolutions we now know, "as Minerva came out fully equipped from Jupiter's brain." After awaiting one year we had the right to hope for a true reform, a change in principles. Alas! like the labouring mountain, the perambulating commission brought forth a mouse. For if the revision of the tariff should be made in earnest, we could still charge the Government with the basest ingratitude with respect to the industries they so long nursed. The Government take good care to state that in that respect the manufacturers would be satisfied. Should the revision of the tariff be made in earnest, could we not charge the Government, the fathers of protection, the beloved favourites of monopolies and combines, with imitating the French Revolution, which, after the example of Saturn, according to the word of one of the speakers of the time, would devour his own children. Before entering upon the discussion in its actual merit, allow me, Mr. Speaker, to briefly recall some interesting events which we witnessed since last session. The exploits and deeds of the hon. Ministers, the speeches they delivered at the various meetings they held, even the addresses presented to them present a more or less striking contrast with the new revision of the tariff. In the first days of October last the hon. the First Minister, at Lucan, in Ontario, had presented to him an address which the 'Mail,' so liberally subsidized by the Government to misrepresent and disparage my compatriots, qualified of "address of a new kind." In it we could read :

While readily acknowledging the rapid growth of our various industries and the large measure of prosperity obtained by the country under a protective tariff, yet we cannot disguise the fact that the National Policy was and is still much cried down by the very men it was calculated to favour. We cherish the hope to see the Government hastening to cause the laws to be adopted and the measures to be taken which they will deem necessary to prohibit and prevent combines of every form and shape, either by amalgamation or otherwise, which have for their object to oppress any popular class.

This demand from the voters of Lucan was only identical in its bearing to all those the Government had received till then ; it was but the echo of the "Workingmen's Association," and the agricultural classes who have addressed to this House, for several years, petitions after petitions requiring the free importation of a large number of articles which are necessities for them, and which the new revision of the tariff scornfully left out. What member in this House, with the exception of the hon. member for Chicoutimi (Mr. Belley), having any regard for his honour and his word, is ready to rise and assert without being victoriously refuted on the spot, that the new revision of the tariff is calculated to prohibit and prevent monopolies and combines ? No ; the monopolies which the Opposition denounced under the late tariff still exist under the new one. The robbery and fraud which were sanctioned by the late tariff are still sanctioned by the new one. It is these monopolies, this robbery, this fraud that the Opposition, in their fiscal policy, contend against and denounce, to replace them by the fairness of imports through a simple revenue tariff. In 1878 a moderate protective system was established in order to protect our manufactures against the competition of our neighbours, who declined at that time to negotiate with us ; agriculture, mines and forests were to furnish the raw material, and we foresaw, with plausibility, the possibility of new outlets. But since 1878, in every statute quoted in the preamble of the hon. the Minister of Finance's resolutions, all the important readjustments of the tariff were effected in favour of the manufacturers. The agricultural and labouring classes, the most numerous in our country, were relegated to the background, neglected, forgotten, disregarded, lost sight of, to the benefit of a few cotton manufacturers and sugar refiners—of sugar refiners whose insidious monopoly is sanctioned anew by the revision of the tariff so as to allow the Canada Sugar Refining Company to pay to its manager the small salary of $60,000—$10,000 more than what we pay to our Governor. But is it true, Mr. Speaker, that protection did not realize the hopes of its authors, as implied in the address of the voters of Lucan ? I endeavoured to show it last year by asserting—which can not be controverted—that the aimed, the obvious object, plainly written in the 'Hansard,' of the protective system advocated in 1877, was : 1st. To check the flow of emigration to the United States ; 2nd. To give rise everywhere to high chimneys of manufactures in the smallest town and village—even in the village of Caughnawaga ; 3rd. To give us the American market for the sale of our products, through reciprocity, when our manufactures should have been established on firm grounds. They know well on the other side of the House that these alluring and fallacious promises were solemnly contradicted by facts. But they, notwithstanding, persevere in the protective system—that of monopolies and combines—in order, in our humble opinion, that they might buy new contributions, on those who benefit by it by means of large contributions to the electoral fund. In the opinion of members on this side of the House the new tariff as truly sanctions the same monopolies as flourished under the late one ; but the protective system is, the hands of the Government, an agent of electoral bribery. It would be childish to think that the fabulous sums spent during election times by the Tory party all come out of luxuriant contracts or liberal subsidies to the railway companies, as so eloquently shown by the investigations held against the ex-Minister of Public Works and the present Postmaster General. No ; the protective system helps, moreover, the pouring into the hands of Tory electoral organizers of large sums of money for "legal expenses" which, on election day, are supposed in the minds of common people to come down from Heaven, as formerly the manna to feed the Israelites in the wilderness. And it is useless for the hon. members opposite, as did the hon. member for the city of St. John (Mr. Hazen), to compassionate the condition of the Local Liberal Governments ; it is useless for them to inveigh against the corruption of the Liberal party, to put on a countenance ; they well know for all that that they are talking of hemp in a family which had some of its members hanged. It is useless for them to cry out thieves, to inveigh against the corruption of the Mercier Government ; history will say, nevertheless, in spite of their boasting and bragging, that the Liberal Mercier, judged by his equals, was declared guiltless of the crimes he was accused of, while the Conservative McGreevy, having to pass through the same ordeal, had to take the road to the Carleton jail. History will say, nevertheless, Mr. Speaker, that the late First Minister of the province of Quebec saw his office pilfered away from him by a shameless and unscrupulous Lieutenant-Governor, who boasted, some months later, having jumped over the constitution—without having his wrist cut off—in order that his friends might come into power in the province of Quebec, while the ex-Minister of Public Works of the Tory party saw his taken away from him, after a minute investigation, in the course of which all the rules of parliamentary art and science were put to his service in order that he might keep it, nay more, after the Conservative majority of the House, always concerned about the honour and dignity of its members, had decried the purity of his good intentions and the spotless whiteness of his innocence! Will you allow me, Mr. Speaker, to say in a few words what the protection system, in my humble opinion, has done for the country? Not only did it not check the flow of emigration to the United States; not only did it not give us the American market, through reciprocity, for the good reason that the Tory party did not want it; not only did it not erect as many high chimneys of manufactures as was prophesied, contrary to the false assertions of the census of 1891; not only did it sanction as virtues, in our statutes, robbery and fraud, through the monopolies it promoted and the electoral corruption it developed, but if our country stands now thoroughly isolated on this continent, the fault lies with protection. If we have no liberty of trade, even in our country; if insidious monopolies in their talons of vultures, overtax the Canadian people; if we are at the mercy of the American Government with respect to fiscal matters, as proclaimed and acknowledged by the Canadian Government; if the land value has decreased; if the exodus has not abated; if the immigrants perfer the American West to the Canadian West; if our agriculture is paralyzed; if, in a word, our growth has been slow, the fault lies with the protective system. If no competition was raised between the various industries of our country, the fault lies with the so-called National Policy, for it was calculated to form between the agricultural and manufacturing interests a link, a correlation favourable to both, which it certainly did not effect under the late tariff and which it will no more effect under the new one, since it is based on the same defective principle. We ought to be after the United States the most advanced people of the two Americas. The extent of our territory, the fertility of our Far West, our unrivalled inland navigation, the richness of our mines, the variety of our climate, the immensity of our forests, our numerous lakes, our incomparable fisheries, all these natural advantages ought to have assisted in the sure and rapid growth of our country. But for the 15 years past, the protective system unhappily retarded the progress of our national destinies. This is why the Government was asked earnest, thorough reform, and no trifling ones, without any practical and effective results, as is the case with most of the new changes bearing upon the principal articles of the tariff. This is why the ninth annual Congress of the Workingmen's Association, of which I hold the report and which was held in Montreal, in June last, asked for "an effective legislation, calculated to protect the labouring classes against combinesters and monopolies which unjustly raised the price of articles." This is why the Toronto Board of Trade addressed, hardly a few months ago, to the hon. the Minister of Finance and Agriculture, a memorandum which clearly showed that they had not been imposed upon by the protectionist theories in favour of which the perambulating commission tried to speak within their walls. Here is the tile the Government received from that Board of Trade, a body foreign to our political struggles, and which was, then as now, the same as the very platform of the fiscal policy of the Opposition, endorsed by the financial and commercial men:

The Council respectfully submits:

That the duties upon the articles coming into the Dominion should be reduced to the lowest possible rate consistent with a revenue tariff.

That all the specific rates should be abolished and the duties collected ad valorem. That the Government should be empowered, upon evidence of the existence of a combine, to maintain or increase the prices, to decrease or to abolish by order in council the import duty upon the articles affected by such a combine.

The Council maintains that the increase of imports at rates inferior to those now existing would tend to increase rather than decrease the revenue of the Dominion. Many duties now collected are in reality prohibitive, and the Government receive consequently no benefit out of them. The Council submits that the manufacturers of several textile products have formed combines and that they lose their prices, not upon the price of labour with a fair profit, but upon the price of similar products once entered into Canada, duty paid. Under these conditions, the consumer pays an excessive price for the goods and the Government gathers no revenue, the manufacturer being the only one who benefits by it.

It was impossible for the Government to agree to these wise suggestions, because these are truly the fiscal policy of their opponents and because protection, under the late tariff which, nevertheless, they deemed necessary to repeal, had made the country grand and prosperous. And then, on the 21st September last, at a meeting held in Belleville, did not the hon. the First Minister state, according to the report of his speech published in the 'Presse,' of Montreal: "That himself and his colleagues were new men with old principles?" Well, according to the old principles, as advocated by the late old chief, the tariff reform was a treason. Hear these words, uttered by Sir John A. Macdonald at Toronto, in the first days of the last electoral campaign:

The Government decided to stand by the National Policy and they are willing to appeal to the people on that question. Commercial union, reciprocity and tariff reform only mean annexation, that is to say, treason.

If we are going to have an earnest reform of the tariff in the resolution of the hon. the Minister of Finance, then the new chief did not stand by the old principles of the old chief. If the tariff reform, as effected, is truly worthy of such a qualification, what shall we not think, Mr. Speaker, of the hon. the First Minister, of all his colleagues, of all his friends, they the most loyal subjects of Her Majesty, they who, to help their party interests, patch up their banner so often jeopardized and damaged, display on every possible occasion the most extreme loyalty to our Sovereign Lady the Queen, the Crown and Her Dignity, by stirring up all through our country acrimonious styles of races and religions. If the tariff reform is made in earnest, Mr. Speaker, in behalf of the old Conservative principles which I have just evoked, I mercilessly leave the First Minister to the vengeance of the hon. Controller of Customs, Grand Master and controller likewise of the Orange lodges of this country, always ready, as we all know, to take up arms to defend the threatened autonomy of Ireland and the Romish Church of this country; I leave the hon. the First Minister to the tender mercies of the hon. member for Muskoka, one of the gallant colonels of our militia, whose sword is ever ready to save the interests of the Empire, even when it comes to defending the seditious propaganda of the Protestant Protective Association! In that same speech at Belleville, the hon. the First Minister followed again the "old principles" of the Tory party: Speak ill of and depreciate the American market to the benefit of that of Great Britain, as also did the hon. member for Chicoutimi and Saguenay. He exhibited to the electorate the bugbear of the American crisis, the closing down of banks and manufactures in the United States. But do we not know, Mr. Speaker, the true causes of that overwhelming disaster? And do we not know that the protective system, so due to the Government, was one of these decisive causes? Let us hear, Mr. Speaker, 'Le Moniteur du Commerce,' a newspaper with Conservative leanings, which stated, on the 12th January last, in an editorial entitled:

A NEGLECTED CAUSE.
