Mr. PATERSON (Brant). The Indians also should request the sale, and be parties to the sales that are made. They have to be, but what influences may be brought to bear upon the Indians at times, I do not exactly know. I think it would be well for the Government to have a conference with the Indians, with those who have a beneficiary interest in them, and if they are pressing for a sale at a time that the Government feel convinced is not the best time, and if they are not able to obtain the amount which an expert sent by the Government to determine the timber to be worth, it would not be in the interests of the Indians to push a sale at that time. Of course, we do not want to go into matters that have transpired, but the House is sensible, and the Ministry are sensible, that sales have been made which, unfortunately, have turned out not to have been what the timber was worth, and the interests of the Indians consequently has not been best served. It behooves the Government, it seems to me, to do away with any charge that might be made that the best available means has not been taken to secure the highest possible price. The member for Assiniboia has pointed out where property was sacrificed in the North-west much below its value. I do not know why that should have occurred. If it was patent to the Government that a great sacrifice was being made, it seems to me the sales should not have gone on. The First Minister says they have that power within their own hands, but, having that power it seems to me it must have been available in the case mentioned by the hon. member for Assiniboia, and so with all cases. I think it would be well for the Government to follow the rule that is followed in the province of Ontario, and I believe in the province of Quebec now, for wherever that rule has been followed, it has met with the approbation of the people. I desire to give the Ministry every credit for desiring to secure the best terms they could, and for honestly believing they could secure better terms by tender, but, I say, as has been said before, that if there is any danger of combination on the part of the buyers at a public auction, you are liable to the same danger precisely in asking for public tenders. Let there be a reserve power in the hands of the Government, who will honestly ascertain the value of the timber, and have a conference with the Indians, who, I think, in all these matters, in the older provinces, at any rate, ought to be fully consulted, and only after that should sale be made, a sale made that would approximately be a fair price, as ascertained by one competent to judge, acting on behalf of the Government and on behalf of the Indians.

Mr. MASSON. I am sure there is no member of the House who is not anxious that the very best price should be obtained from the sale of any Indian property, and the question of whether better prices could be obtained by sale by auction or by tenders, is one that can only be settled by persons who have had experience of both ways. Now, it has been stated that this is the universal method in Ontario, both by the Government and by the courts of Ontario in the first instance. Now, Sir, my experience teaches me that the reverse is the case, that it is not the universal way, either by the courts or by the Government. It must be in the memory of hon. gentlemen opposite that many sales have been made by the Government of Ontario of timber lands by tender. The Government of Ontario have, within themselves, the power of selling by public auction, or by tender. It is true that they have generally resorted to sale by public auction; it is true that they have, in many cases, received very large prices, especially of late years. But hon. gentlemen must remember that it is not many years ago that very serious charges were made against the Ontario Government for allowing sales to be made by public auction at much below a fair value, and instances were given where, within a few months after a sale by public auction, the property changed hands at five or ten times the price first paid for it, and in some cases even more.

Mr. CHARLTON. Can the hon. gentleman give any instances?

Mr. MASSON. I have not got instances at hand, but the hon. member must remember that these charges have been made not many years ago. We know that even in sales under the supervision of the court, the purchaser at public auction frequently sells the property a few days afterwards at a much higher price than he paid for it. Now, it is not at all the universal practice that sales are made by the courts at public auction. The formal decree of the court generally direct the master or other officer of the court to carry out the sale under his direction, and the formal order gives him power to sell by public auction or by tender. It may be that in the majority of cases the sale by public auction is first resorted to, and, failing that, as the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Lister) said, they resort to tender. But those who have had any experience in the sale of lands by the courts know that the very best prices have frequently been obtained by sale by tender. I had the honour myself of being Master of the Court of Chancery for some twelve years, and, during that time I found that my best sales were by tender, so much so that in the latter years during which I held that office, wherever the parties were agreeable, I offered by tender. It may be possible for combinations to be formed to keep down prices where tenders are asked for, but not to the same extent as in the case of sale by public auction. At a public auction, a person wishing to form a combination, knows whom he has to compete with, he is brought face to face with those with whom he has to compete, and he may then and there form his combination. Where tenders are advertised, persons quite unknown to each other have put in offers, and offer what they consider to be a fair price, and the Government are just as likely to obtain high bids as if the lands were put up to competition at auction. Reference has been made to the sale of timber lands in Ontario, and to the prices being in an increasing ratio. Certainly timber lands are increasing in value, and they may realize higher prices than those which have been sold by the Indian Department. But it is to be borne in mind that the sales of timber in Indian reserves are small sales as compared with the extensive limits placed on the market by the Ontario Government. Those provincial limits are so large and valuable as to attract the attention of the lumber kings and speculators of the United States. They come here, and as some hon. gentleman said, the competition at times is very sharp. Not only are the Ontario Government limits more extensive, but the timber is much better than that on the Indian reserves. These reserves do not contain choice timber, in no case were they reserved for timber purposes; on the contrary, the timber on Indian reserves is generally patchy and broken and not nearly so valuable as that on the large limits sold by the Provincial Government. My experience would lead me to believe that it is only right and proper for the Indian Department to have the same power in their hands as is exercised by the Government of Ontario in the sale of their land and the licensing of limits, in which they reserve to themselves the right to sell on such competition as they deem advisable, by public auction or by public tender. No comparison can be instituted between sale by tender and private sale. The hon. member for Quebec (Mr. Langelier), referred to private sales made in the province of Quebec. Every one knows that jobs would be likely to be common where sales were made by private sales, but when tenders were asked for quite a different state of affairs existed. At a private sale an individual will attend at the Government office, make his proposal without competition and the sales may be made, as the hon. gentleman said, as low as 50 cents per acre, but where tenders are advertised for publicity is given and other parties have notice, and the prices received at tender are as likely to be high as they are at public auction. Timber limits on Indian reserves are also liable to be scattered. In my own neighbourhood there are timber limits on islands. They are small in extent and poor in value. But if any one wants to buy them he is told, they cannot be obtained except at public auction or at tender. Tenders will be advertised for; there may be very few competitors, but the offers are bona fide, and there is no opportunity given for fraud, the limits being sold to the highest bidder. The desire expressed that Indian timber lands should realize the highest price is one in which every member will agree, but experience has shown that there is more chance of jobbery and fraud in sale at public auction than by tender, and so I see no valid reason for contending that these lands should all be sold at public auction. My own experience is otherwise, and the experience of the courts is also otherwise. At public auction parties are bought off more frequently than at public tender, and it will be tying the hands of the department to the detriment of the Indians if the department are prevented selling by tender. It is not, however, asserted that sale is generally made by tender; I do not know of any cases, the common way of selling being by public auction. The department are disposing of the timber lands of the Indians in a similar manner to that adopted by the Ontario Government and by the courts. The department do not resort to public auction in every case, this depending on the nature of the limits, their situation and value, and it would be unnecessarily tying the hands of the department to deprive it of the privilege they now enjoy.

Mr. CHARLTON. How and when did the Ontario Government resort to the system of selling by tender?

Mr. MASSON. Within the last two years the sales have been advertised.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I desire to offer a few remarks on this subject as it is one in which I feel some interest, because in my own constituency there are valuable timber limits belonging to Indians. I think I know the timber limits to which the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) has referred. I am sure the House is anxious that the Government should be placed in the best possible position to deal with this subject. This is not a party question, but is as to how the interest of the Indians can be best preserved. While I think it will be exceedingly foolish for the Government, even in their own interest to avoid selling at public auction whenever that system can be adopted, I do not feel inclined to go as far as the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) and confine the action of the department to that particular method of sale. I believe in the case of such a limit as that referred to by the hon. member, it would be the height of folly to adopt any other course than that of sale by public auction, because that is known to be an exceedingly valuable limit. It is within my knowledge that influences of every description have been brought to bear on the Government and the Indians to get possession of that particular limit, but so far apparently without effect, because the old chief will not sell, a very foolish decision in his own interest because the limit is liable to be destroyed by fire and full value can now be secured. But I can understand that cases may arise with which the department have to deal where the circumstances are not at all similar to those existing in Ontario, and I do not think the hands of the Government should be so tied as to compel them, under all circumstances, to sell by a particular method, and so long as we have the assurance and guarantee that there will be competition, I am inclined to accept the amendment of the First Minister and not tie the hands of the Government so that they cannot sell by tender, if in the interests of the Indians it should prove desirable to do so. At the same time the power is one that should be exercised only when it is quite evident, from all the circumstances, that the other method would be less desirable.

Mr. DALY. In answer to the remarks offered by the hon. gentleman opposite I may say that probably considerable discussion would have been avoided if the hon. member had listened to the reading of the clause in amendment to the Order in Council of last November. It reads as follows:—

Section 3. The berths or limits when surveyed and set off, and all new berths or limits in surveyed territory, shall be explored and valued and then offered for sale by public auction at the upset price fixed by such valuation or by tender,—

That meets two of the difficulties raised by the hon. gentleman opposite: First, the timber must be valued, and second, it must be sold either at public auction or by tender, at an upset price. The clause continues:

—at such time and on such conditions as the Superintendent General of Indian Affairs shall direct by public notice for that purpose; but in the event of berths or limits being offered for sale by tender, the Superintendent General of Indian Affairs shall not be bound to accept the highest or any tender should he deem it in the interest of the Indians owning the timber to do otherwise.

The reason of our amending the Order in Council was simply to meet a condition of affairs that existed in connection with some of the timber limits in the northern portion of Ontario, namely, that certain limits which a few years ago were considered of trifling value have now become valuable on account of pulp wood. The department did not desire to go to the expense of putting up such limits at auction as the proceeds would not be sufficient. In answer to the hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson), I may say it is a condition precedent to all sales of timber on Indian lands, that we must first have the consent of the majority of members of the band, and after we have that consent the timber has got to be valued and then it can only be sold at the upset price of that valuation. Therefore so far as the interest of the Indians is concerned it is safeguarded in every particular. It was only to meet the condition of things that I have spoken of that the change was made. On certain reservations, timber of no value a few years ago is now acquiring value; in order to avoid the trouble of a sale by public auction and to get a better price for the timber I have described, it was thought better we should ask for tenders. In answer to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mills) as to the reservation he refers to, he is perfectly correct in saying that efforts have been made on the part of people to get the old Chief Dokis—I suppose it is to him he refers—to surrender his timber for sale. So far as the department is concerned they are interested only in getting that man to surrender his timber in his own interest and that of his people, because it is liable to be destroyed by fire at any time, and the full value that there is in the timber for himself and his band may be lost at any moment. But until such time as he sees fit (without any coercion on the part of the department) to surrender, no timber will be sold. The surrender can only be made to the department, and until such a time as he decides to do it the department are powerless to sell. If it is sold, it will be sold at the highest valuation after it has been inspected and valued.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). That is the law as it stands.

Mr. DALY. That is as the law stands now.

Mr. CHARLTON. The usage of the Department of the Interior and of the Government at the present time, with regard to the sale of timber limits, is certainly an immeasurable improvement on the usage of the Government in vogue prior to 1888. We had, previous to that time, about 25,000 square miles of timber lands, not placed upon the market, but disposed of by private sale to friends of the Government without any bonus being received whatever. That was one of the greatest abuses that ever existed under any Government. When the extent of that abuse was laid bare the outcry against it led to a better arrangement, and I quite agree with the statement made by some hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House that the question now is a question of business method as to what is the best course to take with regard to the disposal of Indian lands. I am very clearly and strongly of opinion, judging from my own experience in these matters, that the plan of disposing of these lands by public auction is much the better. I have to criticise the course taken by the Government with regard to what they deem due notice of sale. One month, I think, was the time mentioned by the hon. Minister of the Interior, and one month's notice is totally insufficient.

Mr. DALY. I may say that that is not the rule—it depends on the case.

Mr. CHARLTON. In any case whatever one month's notice would be insufficient. If land of this kind is to be sold, no person would think of purchasing it without examination. It requires more than a month's time to make preliminary preparations for the examination of a timber berth. Men have to be sent into the woods, and if it is a limit of any extent it will take two or three months to make a satisfactory examination. The men have to be allowed time to go in and to come out, and to communicate with the parties who sent them. If the Government have been proceeding upon the assumption that this short notice of one or two months is sufficient, then that is enough to account for the unsatisfactory results of sale by auction. They have got to give adequate notice, they have to give sufficient length of time for intending purchasers to examine the property, and if they wish to make their attempt at a sale by auction effectual they have got to communicate with as many persons interested as possible. It is not necessary to hold the auction sale in the region where the timber limit is situated. It should be held in some commercial centre. If the limit is situated in the province of Ontario no more suitable place could be found for the auction sale than in the city of Toronto, and if the limit is situated in the province of Quebec no more proper place than either the city of Ottawa or the city of Quebec could be selected. It does not cost very much to send a notice by mail to every individual engaged in the lumber trade who is likely to have any interest in the sale of a limit of that kind. It is not an expensive mode of advertising, as circulars can be printed and sent by mail to lumbermen; their names can easily be ascertained by consulting catalogues or registers of the trade. When the trade is apprised of the fact that this sale is coming, and a sufficient length of time given—not one or two months—but a length of time sufficient to get the notice to these men, to allow them to make their arrangements for examination, to allow them to send men to make their examination, and then time enough for the men to come out of the woods and make their reports to their principals—if this course is taken I can assure the Government that they are not likely in these days, with an active demand existing for timber, to have an unsatisfactory sale by auction. But if they will adopt the plan of having the notice insufficient, and the time for making the examination too short, then they adopt a plan that is exactly calculated to defeat the purpose of having a bona fide sale by auction. It is possible—I would not charge it would be done—that certain individuals, favourites of the Government, might be apprised of the fact that the Government intended at some future day to give a month's notice that they were going to sell a certain limit by auction, and these favourites of the Government who were in the inner ring could have their examination completed, and the data all in their hands, before the public were let into the confidence of the Government as to their intention to make the sale. Then there would be what would be ostensibly a public competition for the purchase, but these men who had the information at first hand would have an immense advantage over those who in a legitimate way had striven to obtain this information. As my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior has the option of selling by tender or public auction, I would advise him to try his sales by public auction after having given due notice—a notice of not less than four months, sent to every man in the lumber trade—to see what prices he can get at auction. It will only cost three cents each to inform these men that a certain territory is to be sold on a certain day, and that day far enough ahead to enable these men to make an examination of that territory. If the Minister will do this, I will guarantee that his sale by auction will be satisfactory, and that no combination can be made or attempted. If I were bidding by tender, or if any other lumberman was bidding by tender, he would not be likely to bid for the property to the utmost limit he would bid at a sale by public auction. I think my hon. friend from Pontiac (Mr. Bryson) will bear me out in that. Neither he nor I would ever bid to the fullest extent in a written tender for a property we wanted to buy, at all events we would not bid to the figure which we probably would go to if we were competing against each other at open sale. I know from my own personal experience that in the sales of timber by the Ontario Government, combinations have been impossible. The last sale of timber was for the extent of 630 square miles, and it brought bonuses to the amount of $2,300,000 to the province. If it were possible to effect a combination there was an object in having one there. I may say that I have never known of a sale of timber berths by public auction in Ontario where combinations were effected and evils such as the Government profess to fear were met, and there is no danger of anything of the kind happening, always supposing that the Government takes pains to apprise the trade and all persons likely to be interested that the sale is to take place, and that they shall have abundance of time to examine the property, and to put themselves in a position to know if they want to buy it, what is the utmost figure that they will give for it. With regard to the statement of the hon. member for North Grey (Mr. Masson), that the Government of Ontario was in the habit of selling either by public auction or tender at their pleasure, I am very sorry that the hon. gentleman was not in the position to tell us of any instance where the plan of inviting written tenders at sales of berths had been resorted to. The uniform policy of the Ontario Government has been to sell at public auction, and the uniform result of that policy has been in the highest degree satisfactory. There may possibly have been cases where it was necessary to make an immediate disposition of a small tract of a few hundred acres on which the timber was burned, but these exceptions rather prove the rule.

Mr. MASSON. The hon. gentleman will admit that the Ontario Government are not so tied down that they must sell by auction.

Mr. CHARLTON. They have made a uniform practice of selling by auction, except in those isolated cases that I have mentioned. The hon. gentleman said that purchasers at auction had afterwards sold their limits for five or ten times the price they had paid. I would like to know one of these instances; it would be better for him to give the proof rather than to simply make the statement. I know one case in which a limit was sold for $325,000 which I positively believe was not worth more than $100,000. At these auction sales men get together and stimulate each other to bid, and the prices realized are almost invariably satisfactory. It was alleged by the right hon. leader of the Government that in many of these cases, when an upset price had been put on the timber, combinations were formed and the Government could not sell. Very well, if you cannot sell, withdraw the property. It is property which it is safe to hold. The Ontario Government withdrew a number of townships in 1872, some of the bidders not having consummated the sale, and others not having offered the price which the Government thought the property was worth; and to my personal knowledge many of those limits so withdrawn were sold in 1884 and subsequently at, speaking roughly, ten times as much as they brought in 1872. There is no risk run by the Government in holding these limits if they do not receive a bid equal to what they consider a fair value. The only risk they run is the risk of fire; otherwise the property is sure to rise in value. No better investment can be made than the purchase of timber limits at the current price, and the Government is at no time obliged to sell. I believe that the policy of selling at public auction, with proper safeguards, with the proper degree of publicity given to the sale, and with an adequate length of time afforded for an examination of the property by intending purchasers, is the best policy the Government can adopt. Even if the Indians insist that the limits should be sold, or bring pressure on the Government to sell them, the Government are not necessarily obliged to do so. The Indians are wards of the Government, and the Government are charged with the duty of deciding when the sales can best be made in their interests. This is a business question entirely. I do not attribute any improper motives to the Government in the course they are pursuing. I hope they are perfectly honest in adopting their last regulations, which they, no doubt, believe to be the best; yet I question the soundness of their judgment in adopting them. I do not say that they should be compelled under all circumstances to sell by auction, because cases may arise where they must sell burnt districts in order to utilize the property. But, in ordinary circumstances, I believe firmly that the proper policy for the Government to pursue is that of selling by public auction with proper safeguards, and after giving purchasers ample time to examine the property.

Mr. DEVLIN. If I were not unable to vote to-day, in consequence of having been paired with an hon. gentleman on the opposite side of the House, I would vote in support of the motion of the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills); but as it is, I can only express my opinion. I have heard with a good deal of interest the opinion expressed by the hon. member for Pontiac (Mr. Bryson) in regard to the two sales recently made. I am sure that he has had, as he says, a very large experience of sales of timber limits. There was recently a sale in the city of Ottawa at which he was present, and at which, if I mistake not, he bought some limits at extraordinary prices. That sale was not by tender, but by public auction. If I mistake not, it was the sale of the Perley limits; and, instead of any combination being formed to defeat the object of the sale, there was very severe and sharp competition. It is known to-day that whenever a timber limit is put up for sale, there is competition, the lumbermen being very anxious to purchase these limits. The hon. gentleman also referred to the fact that the Ontario Government had on certain occasions offered to sell limits by tender. The hon. gentleman approves of that to-day; but I think that at that time he denounced it, although it was merely a sale of some burnt territory. I do not believe that the Ontario Government ever put up well-wooded limits for sale by tender. The territory sold by tender was territory which, if not entirely damaged, was at least very severely scorched by fire, and in that case the highest tender was accepted. What guarantee have we that the Government here will accept the highest tender? They do not bind themselves to accept the highest or any tender. In view of the experience which both provinces have had in regard to the disposal of timber limits by public auction, I believe that such a policy is the best in the interests both of the Indians and the Government.

Mr. BRYSON. I wish to say that I never condemned the Ontario Government for selling timber limits by public tender. What I did condemn, and am prepared still to condemn, was that in the advertisement of the sale it was stated that the terms of payment should be one and two years, and that the time was afterwards extended by the Government in the interests of their own friends.

Mr. DEVLIN. Was not that in connection with the disposal of this particular limit that had been burnt?

Mr. BRYSON. Certainly.

Mr. DEVLIN. Does not the hon. gentleman admit that during recent years all the timber limits belonging to the Ontario Government, apart from the burnt territory, have been disposed of by public auction, and that very high prices, which in fact caused astonishment throughout the country, were obtained? I know that he, as a lumberman, would desire to buy the limits at the lowest possible figure. That is one reason why I would vote for the motion of the hon. member for Bothwell. Perhaps the hon. gentleman himself would like to tender, and thereby obtain limits at lower figures than he could by public auction. I do not wish to attribute any motives to the hon. gentleman; far from it; but he knows very well that the prices obtained by tender, whether for timber limits or for any other properties, do not come up to the prices obtained by sale at public auction.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I certainly did expect that the hon. Minister of the Interior, if he was going to oppose my motion, would have assigned some reason for doing so—would have given the House some information in reference to the business of the department, to show that the change in the Order in Council, which was made in November, 1893, was a change necessitated by some public inconvenience which experience had revealed in the practice under the Order in Council previously in force. The House will remember what very serious sacrifices were made in the department in charge of the Indian population before that Order in Council was adopted. That order, I suppose, arose out of the matters which came before the House, which were here made the subject of discussion, in which it was pointed out that in the sale of a single reservation the Indians had lost at least $60,000 to which they were entitled, and which they would have obtained, and perhaps more, if the sale had taken place at public auction. Under the law of Ontario, as I recollect it, there is no power to sell otherwise than at public auction, except in the case of burnt districts, and that exception arises from the necessity of getting something out of the timber, which would otherwise go to decay. When the territory beyond the province of Ontario was first acquired by the Government of Canada, the law of the province of Ontario was copied. The same rule was adopted here, but experience pointed out that when you were hundreds of miles remote from settlement, where there were no means of access to the territory, you could get lumbermen to bid or make an offer for reservations at all. And so it became necessary to confer upon the Department of the Interior the power of selling otherwise than at public auction. They made in the interest of the early settlers of Manitoba, the best bargain they could, under the circumstances, to induce parties to cut lumber for the supply of the settlers who were going into that remote district. That condition of things did not last many years; and that a change had taken place was shown by what happened with reference to the sale of certain timber limits to a member of this House and by him to a certain American lumberman, by which timber was acquired for, if I remember rightly, $5 per square mile and was sold at the rate of $2,000 per square mile. So that, in the case of the Indian reservation I have mentioned and the sale in the North-west Territories, it became evident that a condition of things had arisen which made it highly expedient for the Government here to adopt a policy similar to that which exists in Ontario—a policy which imposes restraint upon the Government and relieves it both from the suspicion and the pressure, which the anxiety of some to become suddenly wealthy would subject the Government to. Now, the hon. gentleman says that a change was made in this resolution in November. The change was not in the direction in which it was necessary the Government should move, and in which public opinion required them to move, but was in the opposite direction. There was a condition of things, as I have already pointed out, when the Government could not put up timber limits to competition—when they were obliged, in the interest of remote settlers, to offer those limits on terms which would induce lumbermen to cut lumber for the supply of the local market. That rule, that condition, although it has passed away, was not a rule which ever applied to timber on the Indian reserves at all. Those reserves belong to the Indians. The beneficial interest is theirs. They are to be administered in the interest of the Indians, and there is no pressing necessity for sale. And it is because there is, and never can be, a pressing necessity for sale, that I would not be disposed to adopt the rule suggested by the hon. member for Lambton, that in case of failure to make a sale at public auction, you should adopt the rule which prevailed in the Court of Chancery. When the Court of Chancery makes a sale, it sells under execution or under some regulation for partition, or some power. It is selling as a matter of necessity. The persons are obliged to have the property sold and distribution or payment made. And wherever there is a pressing necessity for the sale, neither at public auction or by any private arrangement are you likely to get anything approaching the actual market value of the property. That rule does not apply to the Indian lands. The Government are the trustees acting in the interest of the Indians. It is their business to watch their opportunity and make a sale, when it can be made, with the consent of the Indians, upon terms most favourable to them. And if there should be an error of judgment and the timber upon an Indian reservation be placed upon the public market at a time not favourable to make a sale, that will be disclosed upon the failure to get an adequate price offered, and the property should be withdrawn until more favourable circumstances arrive. There is no necessity, there never can be, under the condition of things that exists in the various Indian reservations, for an immediate sale being made. And so I say that experience has shown that there is but one permanent and satisfactory way of making sales of the timber upon these reservations, and that is at public auction, after due notice has been given, both as to time and the notoriety of the notice. The hon. gentleman made a change last November, he says, in these regulations. He has not mentioned a single circumstance that has transpired out of which that Order in Council has grown. Did the hon. gentleman undertake to make a sale at public auction of Indian timber limits without success? How came it that the hon. gentleman undertook to supplement the previous powers possessed by his department of making a sale at public auction, by the further powers to make a sale by tender? If there had been a series of instances in which the attempted sale at public auction had resulted in failure, the hon. gentleman might have had some justification—some apparent show of reason for the change in the Order in Council. I would like him to say whether there has been any other reason than this—that there has been a strong pressure upon Chief Dokis to make the sale of his reservation or permit it to be made, and that the Government pressed the chief into making the sale.

Mr. DALY. These regulations have nothing whatever to do with the Dokis reserve, good, bad, or indifferent.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Interior says, with regard to the amendment to the Order in Council made in November last, which confers upon the department power of making sale of timber limits upon Indian reserves otherwise than by public auction, that it had not the remotest reference to Chief Dokis, and I do not know what reservation the Government had in view, or whether they had any particular reservation in view when the change was made. But I think that this may be said with certainty—that changes of that sort are not made without some reason. That reason has not been disclosed by the Minister. The original Order in Council, as I pointed out, was adopted immediately after a matter was brought to light in connection with the proper sale of another Indian reserve. That was in 1888. Now, five years have gone by without any change, and we have not had, either by the Prime Minister or by the Minister of the Interior, who is Superintendent General of Indian Affairs, any case cited to show that the practice of selling by auction has inconvenienced the Government in any way whatever. It has not been shown that reservations have been advertised, people convened at a suitable or convenient point, the timber offered to the highest bidder if the price fixed by the Government was exceeded, and yet that no sale took place. We have not a single instance to show that such a condition of things has arisen; and, that being the case, we have had no reason brought before the House for the change in the Order in Council which has been made. I have pointed out, Mr. Speaker, that, in order to avoid any ground of suspicion on the part of the public or on the part of the wards of the Government, the Indians, sale ought to be by public auction after the sale has been widely made known by advertisements. That system or practice, from which no inconvenience has been shown, is now departed from, and departed from, to my mind, not in the interests of the public and not in the interests of the Indians who are to be affected by it. Mr. Speaker, you have this remarkable fact, as the hon. member for Quebec (Mr. Langelier) has pointed out—that in the province of Quebec, since the system of selling timber limits at public auction has been followed, no one has proposed any departure from that system, nor has any exception been proposed as a rule of convenience. Moreover, in the province of Ontario, the practice of selling by public auction has been followed for at least fifteen years, and no member of the Opposition in the Legislature who may have criticised the practice of the Government in this particular has ever suggested that any other method should be adopted than that of selling by public auction. Every one knows that all over the Dominion, east of the Rocky Mountains, timber is becoming, year by year, a more scarce commodity. There is an increasing demand with a diminution of supply; and so, the more the time elapses the fewer will be the instances in which the timber on Indian reservations offered for sale will fail to find purchasers at a very fair valuation. The later the period we chose, the weaker will be the reason for any departure from this rule. Why, Sir, if the hon. gentlemen found no inconvenience from the rule providing for the sale exclusively by public auction, which existed from 1888 until November, 1893, they will find still less reason for so doing in time to come, because the quantity of timber is diminishing and those who require it are increasing in number. So I say, Mr. Speaker, that if this House is to give due consideration to the interests of the Indian population, then we should safeguard their rights by insisting that, whenever a sale of timber upon these Indian reserves does take place, it shall be carried on by public auction. As I said before, so I say again: The Indian population are not in the position of debtors against whom executions have been issued; there is no pressing necessity on the part of the department for the sale of the timber upon the Indian reserves. Year by year this timber is increasing in value and is thus securing to the Indians an additional amount of capital just as certainly as if the timber were sold and the proceeds invested at interest. That being the case, if the Government upon offering for sale the timber upon an Indian reservation fail to find a purchaser at an adequate price, no serious injury to the Indians could result, for the sale could be postponed to a more favourable opportunity. No necessity whatever has been shown for the rule which the hon. Minister of the Interior has adopted in the Order in Council, and no reason whatever for the comment of the right hon. the Prime Minister. It seems to me, Sir, that it would be in the interests of the Government itself to avoid the suspicions of undue favouritism to those who are powerful and not over-scrupulous, who press for the sale of these lands without any regard to the well-being of the Indians. I would like the Minister of Interior to say what protection, under such a rule as he has adopted, the Indians would have against such an occurrence as that which took place in 1887, and which was complained of under the administration of his predecessor. Surely, Sir, if the timber on an Indian reservation was sold in 1887, in defiance of the rule providing for sale by public auction, and sold for a mere percentage of its value, I want to know what protection there is against a similar occurrence taking place again. In this matter the House has a responsibility resting upon it, and it cannot relieve itself of that responsibility by declaring that it will leave the whole matter in the hands of the Administration. I have brought this matter to the attention of the House for the express purpose of giving the House an opportunity of asserting a sound principle which is to guard the Government in the discharge of its administrative duties. Why, Sir, the Government are hedged in at all points in its work of administration in order to prevent abuses. Experience has shown that abuses have, in the absence of the general rule that existed under the Order in Council of 1888, grown up before; and that being the case there is no assurance that similar mistakes or similar wrongs will not occur again. I again call attention to the fact that it is this House, by what it may do with reference to the resolution and the amendment that are before us, that must assume to itself the responsibility of deciding whether the Indian population are to be properly protected. Sir, we had brought under our attention last year the fact that in some cases the principal of Indians' funds had been used, and the House was called upon to make appropriations for the purpose of providing the necessary moneys to supplement those funds and to restore them to their original condition. Why was this done? Because the House admitted its responsibility for the diminution of the funds that had taken place, and it called upon the public to contribute, and by the exercise of its authority it has compelled the people of this country to contribute to make good the funds the principals of which were misdirected. Now, in this case you have this fact before you, that it is people who are the wards of the Government, whose estates you are called upon to administer, and you are bound to see that the property under your control is not wasted and not improperly employed. The Indian people of this country are not a self-sustaining population; you find it necessary to make some provision for them in some way or another. You cannot permit them to die of want or starvation, and where there is an extreme necessity, you compel the public to contribute something towards their maintenance and support. I say, therefore, that it is in the interest of the public as well as in the interest of the Indian population to see that both the timber and the lands belonging to the Indians, when put upon the market, are so dealt with as to secure to the Indian population who are the beneficiaries in the matter, the largest amount of money that can be obtained from these sources. That being so, I am convinced, as I think every one in this House who takes the trouble seriously to consider the subject, will also be convinced, that it is not in the interest of the Indian population and not in the interest of the people of this country that the timber upon these Indian reservations should be disposed of otherwise than at public auction, after the fact that a sale is proposed, has been made widely known.

Mr. HASLAM. While the rule of selling timber on the Indian reserves by public auction is a very good one under certain circumstances, I am satisfied it is not a good one under all circumstances. Where there are large tracts of land likely to attract a good many purchasers, sale by public auction would be the best method; but where the reserves are small I think that great injustice may be done by selling them by auction, for the simple reason that the comparatively few men who would be likely to attend the sale, would know each other well, and before the sale commenced they could enter into a combination in five minutes that would burk all the efforts of the Government to obtain a reasonable price for that timber.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). There need not be any sale, then.

Mr. HASLAM. You would obviate the difficulty by calling for tenders, and when you call for tenders no man knows what another is sending in. The idea has been advanced that the antagonism and antipathy existing among purchasers at auction, have caused them to bid a higher figure than the property is worth. I do not think that is a proper view to take of the case. The money that these lumbermen have paid over and above the actual value of the property, has got to come out of somebody, somebody has to lose it, and I think when the proper value of the land is paid for, that is quite sufficient. When a man goes and examines the property, he knows exactly what that property is worth, and he will accordingly give a tender for what he thinks it is worth to him. In case of small areas the Government will get a better price, and a price more in accordance with the value of the property, if they called for tenders, than they will by selling at public auction. I have seen many instances where, when there were but few bidders at the sale, they came to an understanding and gave exactly what they thought they could get it for, and then divided it up amongst themselves. It was they who pocketed the profit, and not the owner of the property. The fact that higher prices have been realized in later years than formerly, is no argument in favour of the auction system. The reason why prices of late years have been so much higher, is owing to the diminution of timber lands in the state of Michigan and other places, where there were formerly large tracts of land. I think so far as I can understand this question, it would be unbusinesslike and unwise to lay down a hard and fast rule governing the sale of timber lands for the benefit of the country, or of the Indians. There are circumstances that would justify selling by auction, and there are others again in which it would be better to sell by tender; and the property can be just as well advertised, and just as much facility can be given to people for examining the property, when sold by tender as when sold by public auction. I would be very slow to vote for a resolution binding the Government to any particular method of selling such property.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. We have had some examples of the mode in which the Government deal with timber lands owned by them as trustees to the Indians. I need hardly recall to the recollection of the members of this House that a tract of 79 square miles, I believe, was sold to a member of this House for $316, and was resold within three months for $50,000, and I believe was worth a great deal more. With the knowledge of that fact, the Government take upon themselves the responsibility of refusing, apparently, to dispose of these lands in such a way that the Indians may be protected, and that full publicity may be given to the whole transaction. Now, if my hon. friend was merely moving this as an abstract question, there might be something in the remarks of the hon. gentleman who has just spoken; but he comes here with the knowledge, and the whole House has knowledge, that very greivous frauds—I use the word in the most emphatic sense—have occurred in the disposition of the lands of which the Government is trustee, the Indians have been wronged and defrauded, and possibly one of these days the country at large will be called upon, as I believe the country at large ought to be called upon, to make good a sum of money which went out of the coffers of the Indians practically into the pockets of a private member of this House. Under these circumstances I think my hon. friend should at least insist on having the sense of the House taken on this motion.

INSPECTION OF IMMIGRANTS AT QUEBEC.

Mr. LAURIER moved for:

Copies of all correspondence between the Canadian Government, the Imperial Government and the American Government, concerning the privilege asked by the American Government of having an inspection at Quebec of immigrants landing there on their way to the United States.

He said: My object in making this motion is to ask some explanations concerning the matter referred to, and to ascertain the facts regarding the position in which this country stands. It appears that certain statements were made in the American press. It was alleged that although the American Government had made application to be allowed the privilege of having inspectors at Quebec to inspect immigrants who landed there, but intended to proceed to the United States and settle there, it had been denied by the Canadian Government for a long time, though as I understand after some correspondence it was granted, and there have been inspectors since exercising the authority which was at first claimed. My object in making the motion is simply to have the papers brought down, if there are any.

Mr. DALY. There has been no such correspondence either between this Government or the Imperial Government, or between this Government and that of the United States in regard to the matter referred to in the motion. The Government learned through the press that certain officers of the United States Government had been sent to inspect immigrants arriving at Quebec who were destined for American points. The officers desired to examine those immigrants, to ascertain whether they came within the provisions of the Alien Labour Law of the United States. Representations were made to the Government on behalf of the Canadian Pacific Railway, but the Government declined to have anything to do with those American officials, and subsequently I understand an arrangement was arrived at between the steamship companies and the Canadian Pacific Railway whereby the examination sought to be made by the United States officers was made on board the steamships. That seemed to satisfy both the steamship companies and the Canadian Pacific Railway. That is all the information I can furnish.

Mr. LAURIER. Then there is no correspondence?

Mr. DALY. None whatever.

Motion withdrawn.

COMMERCIAL RELATIONS WITH FRANCE.

Mr. LAURIER moved for:

Copies of all correspondence between the Government or any member thereof, and Sir Charles Tupper, asking for and giving explanations with regard to the following statement made by Lord Dufferin, Her Majesty's ambassador to the French Republic, and Sir Charles Tupper to Mr. Develle,

Mr. LAURIER.

French Minister for Foreign Affairs, on the 6th of February, 1893, viz.:

We take this opportunity of confirming what we have already made known to your Excellency during the progress of the conferences, viz., that the Canadian Parliament, desirous of favouring the development of commercial relations between the two countries, has voted a subvention of £100,000 for the purpose of establishing a line of steamers to run between a Canadian port on one side and a French terminus on the other.

He said: In the blue-book which has been brought down with respect to negotiations which have taken place concerning the French treaty the extraordinary sentence quoted is to be found at page 46. It is extracted from a letter dated 6th February, 1893, which is on the very same day the treaty was signed, addressed by Lord Dufferin and Sir Charles Tupper to Mr. Develle, who at that time was Minister of Foreign Affairs for the French Republic. The statement is in extraordinary form as follows:—

We take this opportunity of confirming what we have already made known to your Excellency. During the progress of the conferences namely that the Canadian Parliament desirous of favouring the development of commercial relations between the two countries has voted a subvention of £100,000 for the purpose of establishing a line of steamers to run between a Canadian port on one side and a French port on the other.

I cannot conceive that such an extraordinary statement should have been made by agents of the Canadian Government, that is to say by the English Ambassador at Paris, and by the High Commissioner at London, who was authorized by this Government to negotiate with the French Government. I cannot conceive but that the Government must have at once remonstrated with Sir Charles Tupper and asked for an explanation, if he had any explanation to give, why such an extraordinary statement was made, not as to any intention on the part of the Government, but that actually as a fact the Canadian Parliament had voted the sum of £100,000 to subsidize a line of steamers between a Canadian port and a French terminus. The more we examine into the matter the more clearly it appears that there must have been explanations as to that statement. After the Government had stated that it was their intention to ask Parliament to ratify the French treaty I put the following question to the Government on 9th April:—

Mr. LAURIER asked, Is it the intention of the Government to ask Parliament for a subsidy of £100,000 for the purpose of establishing a line of steamers to run between a Canadian port on one side and a French terminus port on the other, as it was understood in the negotiations which led to the commercial treaty with France?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The Finance Minister is not present, but in his absence I beg to say that I think the hon. gentleman is mistaken in supposing that it was understood in the negotiations which led to the commercial treaty with France that a subsidy of £100,000 should be asked for a line of communication between Canada and France. My reading of the negotiations is that, while that was suggested, it was declined. At any rate, it is not the intention to ask for a subsidy of £100,000 for a line between France and Canada.

The hon. gentleman, according to his answer, did not understand the negotiations as I understood them. I understood from the negotiations that while there was not an actual agreement arrived at, still there was an understanding between the two contracting parties, the French Republic on the one side and the Canadian Government on the other, that there would be a subsidy granted for a line of steamers to run between a Canadian port and a French port, and all the negotiations which took place make this contention which I now affirm imperative in its conclusion. It is easy to understand why the French Government should have insisted on such a subsidy being granted, because without a line running between Canada and France—there is not much in the treaty, I admit, and the Prime Minister himself characterized it the other day as the little treaty—would be altogether without any advantage unless there was a line of steamers to carry the trade, because according to the terms of the French treaty, there is what is called surtaxe d'entrepot, a tax upon every kind of merchandise which enters France. That is to say: that for every 100 kilos of goods which come into France they have to pay, apart from the duty under the tariff, an additional duty; surtaxe d'entrepot they call it, when their goods are brought in not directly from the country of growth. If they are brought in directly from the country of growth they are subject only to the tariff, but if they are not brought in directly from the country of growth then they would be subject to the additional duty. At the present time there are two tariffs in France: what is called the general, and the conventional tariff. Under the treaty we have the advantage of the conventional tariff, which is the minimum tariff, but if goods are sent from Canada to France passing through Great Britain and re-shipped in Great Britain for France, they would be subject to the surtaxe d'entrepot of 3 francs and 60 centimes per 100 kilos, which would practically take away altogether any advantage there may be in this little treaty. The hon. gentleman now says that it was not understood that there should be a subsidy granted to a line of steamers to apply between Canada and France. I submit to the hon. gentleman that if he makes that contention he has evidently not read the negotiations with such care as some other members of the House have. Let me first call the attention of the House to a letter of Sir Charles Tupper, to be found on page 10, of the Blue-book. The letter is dated the 28th October, 1892, and it is addressed by Sir Charles Tupper to the then Prime Minister, Sir John Abbott. This is what he writes:

With regard to the surtaxes d'entrepot on Canadian exports to France through the United Kingdom, I suggested the propriety of asking for the removal of this impost in the case of such exports forwarded on a through bill of lading to France which were transhipped in England, instancing that this course was permitted at the present moment in the case of Canadian exports to France despatched through an American port. His Excellency (that is to say the Minister of Foreign Affairs, Mr. Develle) agreed with me that it was a point upon which strong representations ought to be made, but I am by no means sanguine of accomplishing much in this particular matter as the object of the surtaxe d'entrepot is to promote direct trade with France.

So at the very outset of the negotiations, Sir Charles Tupper pointed out that it was absolutely indispensable, if a treaty were to be negotiated at all, so as to make it valuable to the Canadian people that the surtaxe d'entrepot should be removed. But, as he said, he was not sanguine that he would be successful with the French Government, and the subsequent negotiations show that he had reason not to be sanguine, because upon that point the French Government would not yield. Therefore, if the surtaxe d'entrepot continued to remain, the difficulty—for it was a very serious difficulty—had to be overcome in some other way. On the 7th of November following, Sir Charles Tupper, in another letter addressed to Sir John Abbott, relates an interview which he had with some of the officers of the French Government, and he writes as follows:—

I stated that I did not propose to raise the question of the surtaxes d'entrepot, as the Government of Canada were at present engaged in providing for an excellent fast service between France, Great Britain and Canada, that would thus enable us to avoid transshipment of goods passing through Great Britain. I added that I could give no greater evidence of the great desire of Canada to obtain more intimate trade relations with France, and to promote intercourse between the two countries, than by calling their attention to the advertisement inviting tenders for this service, which I did, and to the condition that there should be direct communication between France and Canada, and vice versa, a French port being stipulated for as the point from which the steamers should start and to which they should return.

You see here the method which was suggested by Sir Charles Tupper in order to overcome the difficulty of the surtaxes d'entrepot. He pointed out, as we all know, that in 1889 the Canadian Parliament was induced to vote a subsidy of $500,000 to a line of steamers which were to ply between Canada and Great Britain, calling at a French port, and by so doing the surtaxes d'entrepot would have been avoided, because goods could have been shipped by that line of steamers from Canada to France, thus avoiding transshipment in England. But evidently the French Government were not satisfied even with that, and they claimed something more, as is to be found later on in the correspondence. On the 10th of November Sir Charles Tupper writes again to Sir John Abbott, and he relates an interview which he had with MM. Hanotaux and Roume, officers of the French Government, who had been appointed to act as commissioners on the part of the French Republic. This is what Sir Charles Tupper writes :

I submitted that although the tariffs of France and Canada had both been raised, the minimum tariff was relatively very much higher than any increase in the Canadian tariff, that Canada had, moreover, given the same remissions of duty which had been made by the United States and in respect of which France had given the latter the minimum tariff on a number of articles, that the fact that Canada received nearly ten times as much from France as she sent to it, and that the large subvention the Dominion was prepared to give for the purpose of establishing direct trade between the two countries and which could not fail to be of very great advantage to France appeared to me to warrant the extension of the minimum tariff as a whole to Canada.

This is, therefore, the inducement which was held out to the Commissioners of the French Republic to yield upon this question, and to make them agree to the treaty, viz. : that the Dominion Government was prepared to establish direct steam communication by means of a subsidized line between France and Canada. Later on Sir Charles Tupper, on the 21st of November, writes directly to MM. Hanotaux, Pallain and Roume, as follows :—

It also appears that you are not disposed to recognize the value of direct communication between France and Canada by a fast line of steamers for which the Government of Canada stand pledged to grant an annual subvention of £150,000 sterling, although it must be perfectly evident that such a line of direct communication between the two countries will be of very great value to France.

Well, Sir, this was therefore the basis, the very basis, upon which the negotiations took place : that the Canadian Government stood pledged to give a subsidy. Sometimes it was said the subsidy was to be £100,000 sterling, and other times a £150,000 sterling, but whatever was the amount it is evident that the negotiations took place upon the statement made on behalf of the Canadian Government, that there would be a subsidy given for a direct line of service between France and Canada, and upon these assurances the French Commissioners at last, on the 22nd of November, laid down their proposals, and amongst them was the following :—

Mr. LAURIER.

The Canadian Government undertake to give a subsidy of £100,000 to a line of steamers having for terminus a French port.

That was the basis of the negotiations on the part of the French Government ; that was the condition which they laid down as the basis upon which they insisted. That was on the 22nd of November, 1892, and the negotiations here stopped for a while. From the 22nd of November, 1892, up to the 18th of January, 1893, there is a blank in the negotiations. December elapsed, and the better part of January had also elapsed, and nothing took place, and what was the reason ? The reason was that Sir Charles Tupper had transmitted to the Canadian Government the proposals of the French Government, whereby the latter insisted that the Canadian Government would pledge itself to such a subsidy as I have here mentioned. On the 18th of January Sir Charles Tupper, writing to the Hon. Mackenzie Bowell, who was, I believe, acting at that time as Prime Minister, refers to a telegram he had sent on the 11th of January to which on the same date Mr. Bowell had replied as follows :—

Re French negotiations, Government cannot accept conditions involved in clauses regarding steamship subvention and reduction duty French books.

Here you see the position is taken by the Canadian Government that they will not make this a condition of the treaty. In the same letter Sir Charles Tupper refers to an interview which he had had with M. Hanotaux and the French Commissioners, to whom he had given the following answer :—

I stated after full consideration the Government of Canada had accepted the proposals of the French Government as embodied in the memoranda which he (M. Hanotaux) had handed to me at our last meeting on November 22nd, with the exception of the proposition to reduce the duty on French books and the clause relating to the direct steamship service between France and Canada ; that I was not aware of any change in the policy of the Government in regard to the steamship service, but that it was not considered proper to make a question of this kind the subject of an engagement to another country ; and that I would write a letter to him (see enclosure) explaining that fact, and furnish him with a copy of an extract of the speech I had recently addressed in London to a large deputation of gentlemen interested in the port of Milford Haven, from which he would see the importance that Canada attached to obtaining direct communication with France.

Then, there is a letter which Sir Charles Tupper sent to M. Hanotaux on the very same date, the 18th of January, 1893, in which he says :—

DEAR M. HANOTAUX.—As I informed you to-day the Government of Canada have agreed to the proposals in your memoranda which you handed to me at our meeting on 22nd November last, with the exception of the proposed reduction of duty on French books, and the clause relating to the steamship service between France and Canada. This does not arise from any change in the policy of the Government in the latter question, as I have placed it before you, but there does not seem to be any ground for embodying the intentions of the Government in a treaty to which there are obvious objections.

So the question was reduced to this. Sir Charles Tupper declared again and again to the French Commissioners that the Canadian Government were pledged to give a subsidy to a line of steamers to ply between Canada and France, but that for obvious reasons, as he says—whatever the obvious reasons may be I do not know—the Government would not consent to make this a part of the treaty; but Sir Charles Tupper insisted that the policy of the Canadian Government remained the same; and it is evident that it was on the strength of that assurance, given by the Canadian Commissioner, that the treaty was negotiated. In the same letter Sir Charles Tupper goes on to say:—

Since our meeting on the date mentioned, I had occasion to refer to this subject in replying to a very influential deputation which waited upon me to advance the interests of Milford Haven as a point of communication between Canada and England. I inclose a copy of my speech in reply to the deputation in which you will see that I explained to them that Canada attached a great deal of importance to that feature of the project which provided for direct communication with France.

You will also readily perceive that the concession of the minimum tariff on a number of articles which it is proposed to give Canada will be practically of no value unless direct communication between the two countries be provided, as the surtaxe d'entrepôt would make it impossible for Canada to derive any advantage therefrom.

So Sir Charles Tupper states, as a basis for the treaty, that there must be such a subsidy voted by the Canadian Parliament,—that it is the policy of the Administration,—and that unless there is such a subsidy voted and a line of steamers plying between Canada and France, the whole benefit of the treaty will be lost. Then to prove that this is the policy of the Canadian Government, Sir Charles Tupper sends to M. Hanotaux a report of the speech he delivered a few days ago before to the parties who waited upon him on behalf of Milford Haven; and this is the report:—

There was, however, one feature connected with the matter which had not been prominently adverted to. It was a feature to which Canada attached a deal of importance. That was they proposed to have not only a direct and rapid communication by going to an English port, but they proposed also to have a direct line of communication between Canada and the continent of Europe by requiring vessels to proceed on to a French port. Owing to the system adopted, and held with such tenacity by France the trade between Canada and France was greatly obstructed by the want of direct steam communication between the two countries.

So the policy of the Government, as expounded by Sir Charles Tupper, not only to the French Commissioners, but also to the parties in England who were interested in the port of Milford Haven, was clear in this respect. Then Sir Charles Tupper, writing on the 21st of January to Mr. Powell, gives resumé of the negotiations which he has had with M. Hanotaux on this question. He says that he stated to M. Hanotaux that the Canadian Government would not agree to put in the letter of the treaty the engagement that they would subsidize a line between France and Canada, but that at the same time the policy of the Government remained the same. He says it was well understood between him and the French Commissioners that the treaty would be absolutely without any value unless it was supplemented by such a subsidy, and that the French Commissioners expressed themselves as perfectly satisfied. Sir Charles Tupper says:—

Monsieur Hanotaux informs me that my letter in reference to the steamship service was considered quite satisfactory.

And again, Mr. Develle, writing a few days later, in February, to Lord Dufferin, and Sir Charles Tupper, says:

You have also confirmed what you had made known to be during the conference, namely, that the government of the Dominion wishing to encourage the development of the commercial relations between the two countries has caused to be voted by the Parliament of Canada a subsidy of one hundred thousand pounds sterling to a line of steamers sailing from a Canadian to a French port.

So that the French Government were negotiating upon the assurance of Sir Charles Tupper that not only this Government had pledged themselves to grant such a subsidy to a line between France and Canada, but that actually the Canadian Parliament had voted such a subsidy. Obviously, when Sir Charles Tupper made this reference to the subsidy, which had already been voted by Parliament, he must have referred, and Lord Dufferin must have referred also, to the fact that the Canadian Parliament, in 1889, had voted a subsidy to a line to ply between Canada and Great Britain, but to call at a French port. Now came the letter which I have just quoted, at the beginning of my remarks, on the 6th February, addressed by Lord Dufferin to Sir Charles Tupper, by which, for the last time, they confirmed everything that had been said before as to such a subsidy having been granted by Parliament. And then, to crown all, there is the letter from Sir Charles Tupper addressed to Sir John Thompson, on the 6th February, in which is to be found the following sentence:—

Under the proposed steamship line with France, which will enable us to have a much more rapid communication and relieve our trade from the surtaxe d'entrepôt, I see no reason to doubt that the exports from Canada to France will be very rapidly and greatly increased.

In the face of all this, it is impossible to contend, as was stated the other day by the Prime Minister that there was an understanding that such subsidy was to be granted by the Canadian Parliament to a line of steamers between France and Canada. I admit it was not part of the treaty. It was not put into the four corners of the treaty. But all the negotiations were made on the part of the French Government upon the assurance given by the Canadian Commissioner that not only would the subsidy be voted, but that, as a matter of fact, it had been voted. As I said a moment ago, there was a subsidy voted in 1889. One condition of that subsidy was that the steamers to be subsidized would call at a French port while the terminal ports were to be in Great Britain and Canada. But the Finance Minister a few days ago, said that this condition was cancelled and was not to be carried out. So that, taking the case as it is, the Government to-day have refused to carry out the conditions laid down by their commissioners; and the least that can be said is that it is a most extraordinary situation. I am not going to qualify it to-day by any strong terms, as I am only asking for information, but it is evident to me that there is something very mysterious in this treaty. Once the treaty is ratified, the Government stands pledged in honour towards the French nation to carry out the promises which were made, while the negotiations took place, and which finally led to the signing of the treaty.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. There can be no objection to the motion being carried. If there are any papers giving additional information on the subject, they will be produced cheerfully. I have no objection to the statement of the case which the hon. gentleman has made, although my conclusions are directly opposite to those at which he has arrived. The hon. gentleman called the attention of the House to this subject by a question on the 9th April, in which he presented the subject in this light: He wished to know "whether the Government intended to ask a vote of one hundred thousand pounds for the purpose of establishing a line of steamers to run between a Canadian port and a French terminal point, as was understood in the negotiation which led to the commercial treaty with France." My statement, in reply, was, in the absence of the Minister of Finance, that I did not so view the negotiations, and that it was not the intention of the Government to ask for a vote for that purpose. It will be seen that the leader of the Opposition, in that question, put the matter to the House as if one of the conditions contained in the negotiations which led to the treaty was that a vote of this Parliament should be asked for a new subsidy. The view which I endeavoured in my answer to put forward in contradiction to that, was that no such condition was contained in the negotiations, and that is just the view that I put before the House this evening. The hon. gentleman has stated with perfect accuracy, as I have already intimated, the various passages of the correspondence connected with the treaty, in which this subject was discussed; but I submit to the House—and I shall quote those passages again, or some of them, for the purpose of supporting the view I now present—that what the correspondence shows is this: There was no promise from beginning to end, that the Parliament of Canada should be asked to vote one dollar or one pound for steamship connection between Canada and France. But there was simply a representation by Lord Dufferin and Sir Charles Tupper to the French Government, of the facts which then existed, namely, that in the session of 1889 a subvention of one hundred thousand pounds sterling had been voted to procure a fast service between this country and Europe, and that the scheme which the Government had in view was to have direct communication with France by the same steamship which should cross from Canada to Great Britain. That was not only the state of the facts existing at the time, but our advertisements calling for tenders were in the press and distributed through various parts of Europe, so that what the negotiators were stating then was not based on any promise as to a future vote or action of this Parliament, but was simply a representation of what the existing facts were with regard to this subject. Later, it transpired that the effort to establish direct communication with France—that is to say, to have steamers to go direct from Canada to France, was not capable of realization, and that the subsidy which Parliament had voted for that purpose was entirely inadequate. But, at the time these representations were made, that result had not been demonstrated, and we were still in hope of securing that direct communication with France. The state of facts, as I have said, was represented by Sir Charles Tupper and Lord Dufferin to the negotiators, on the part of the French Government, and the negotiations went forward until the French negotiators, not satisfied with a simple statement of the facts which then existed, proposed to put in this treaty, as a condition, that a connection with France by a line of steamers to cross between this country and Europe, should be made. When the proposal was made that that should form a condition of the treaty, it was promptly declined on the part of the Government of Canada, showing that the difficulties in the way were so great that, in all probability, the expectation which, at one time, had been formed, could not be realized. And, therefore, the view which the hon. gentleman presented, to the House in the question he put—which question, he thinks, I answered inaccurately—that that was one of the terms on which the treaty was negotiated, is expressly negated by the terms of the negotiation. And the view which the hon. gentleman has presented this evening that we are in the position of refusing to carry out a condition agreed to by our negotiators, receives the most emphatic contradiction by the narrative of the negotiations themselves. No matter what discussion may have taken place, no matter what assurances may have been given as to the policy of this Government—and those assurances were undoubtedly true as to the desire and policy of this Government—when the negotiators, on behalf of France proposed to insert that as one of the terms of the treaty, their proposition was declined. A treaty on those terms was declined by this Government, so that it is impossible to say that this was one of the conditions laid down in the negotiations for the treaty, or that it was in any sense a condition, or that we are in any sense bound by it now. And in the consideration of that question I beg to call the attention of the House once more to the fact that, while the policy of the Government in desiring and seeking to have this direct line established was repeatedly insisted upon by the negotiators, and explained even in the speech by Sir Charles Tupper in London with regard to Milford Haven, which the hon. leader of the Opposition has read; while the policy was fully stated, this Government, and the negotiators on behalf of the Government, declined to be bound by that as a condition; declined to pledge that policy as a condition of the treaty, and, from the beginning to the end of the negotiations there is not a line or a word on record to show that any promise was made that this Parliament should be asked to vote another pound for the service or a pound conditional upon the terminal port of the trans-Atlantic line being in France. Now, notwithstanding that I do not dispute the accuracy of the hon. gentleman's quotation, let me, after stating that view of what took place—and it is our view—call attention to what these quotations were. Reference to this subject practically began on the 28th of October, 1892, when Sir Charles Tupper, writing to the Hon. Sir John Abbott, referred thus to the matter of the steamship line. Hon. members will find the quotation on page 10 :

With regard to the surtaxes d'entrepôt on Canadian exports to France through the United Kingdom, I suggested the propriety of asking for the removal of this impost in the case of such exports forwarded on a through bill of lading to France which were transhipped in England, instancing that this course was permitted at the present moment in the case of Canadian exports to France despatched through an American port. His Excellency agreed with me that it was a point upon which strong representations ought to be made, but I am by no means sanguine of accomplishing much in this particular matter as the object of the surtaxe d'entrepôt is to promote direct trade with France.

Hon. members will see that the reference to the establishment of the French line, the policy of establishing a direct line from France to Canada, if it were possible to do so, was being put forward at that time by Sir Charles Tupper as a reason, not why the treaty should be entered into in its present form, but why additional concessions should be made, and why the surtaxe d'entrepôt should be waived in favour of the exports of Canada. On the 7th of November, 1892, Sir Charles Tupper wrote to Sir John Abbott. At that time the policy was still expected to be direct communication with France by the steam line :

I also referred to the fact that Canada received at present nearly ten times as much of the products of France as she sent her. I stated that I did not propose to raise the question of the surtaxes d'entrepôt, as the Government of Canada were at present engaged in providing for an excellent fast service between France, Great Britain and Canada that would thus enable us to avoid transshipment of goods passing through Great Britain. I added that I could give no greater evidence of the great desire of Canada to obtain more intimate trade relations with France, and to promote intercourse between the two countries, than by calling their attention to the advertisement inviting tenders for this service which I did, and to the condition that there should be direct communication between France and Canada, and vice versa, a French port being stipulated for as the point from which the steamers should start and to which they should return.

Again, when the matter is most fully explained by Sir Charles Tupper, more fully than at any other stage, he is simply calling attention to the existing state of facts, reading the advertisements issued by the Dominion Government calling for a direct line of steamers between Canada and France as the best assurance he could give of the desire on the part of the Canadian Government for such communication—not a single promise as to anything in the future, but simply calling attention—

Mr. EDGAR. Will the hon. gentleman read the next line ?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Certainly.

I mentioned that the Government of Canada stood pledged—

Mr. EDGAR. Pledged ?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Exactly.

I mentioned that the Government of Canada stood pledged to the appropriation of £150,000 per annum for the proposed service, and that when it was organized and in operation, as I believed it would be at no distant date, the speed required would enable mail matters and passengers to reach not only Canada but all the western states of America more than twenty-four hours sooner than they could be conveyed to the same points by the direct route now in existence by New York.

The hon. gentleman who desired me to read that passage, now that I have read it, will not say that Sir Charles Tupper meant that we were pledged to France or that we proposed to pledge ourselves to France. He was not talking of any pledge to France whatever, but was speaking of the public pledge we had given in this Parliament and to the country as to the kind of service we desired to establish.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). He also said that the treaty would be worthless without it.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. That was Sir Charles Tupper's opinion at that time of the effect of the treaty. What the effect as to the want of communication with France would be in view of the surtaxe d'entrepot, I do not propose to refer to, because this is a motion for papers, and the Government will state what we can state with regard to the negotiations, and the French Treaty will be discussed at another time. Let me call attention to an extract from a letter from Sir Charles Tupper to MM. Hanotaux, Pallain and Roume, dated 21st November, 1892. The extract appears at the top of page 24 :

It also appears that you are not disposed to recognize the value of direct communication between France and Canada by a fast line of steamers for which the Government of Canada stand pledged to grant an annual subvention of £150,000 sterling, although it must be perfectly evident that such a line of direct communication between the two countries will be of very great value to France.

If there could be any doubt as to the meaning of the preceding passage, in which it was said that the Canadian Government stood pledged, that doubt would be completely removed when it becomes apparent that Sir Charles Tupper did not refer to a pledge under the negotiations which took place between France and the British Government or negotiators, but he referred to the pledge given by the policy of this Government, as stated in Parliament and before the public. Now, these negotiations had proceeded thus far, and it was completely understood on both sides that the negotiators on behalf of Great Britain had been telling simply the policy of the Canadian Government, as expressed by the Government, and as conveyed in the public call for tenders. But at this period, the 22nd of November, 1892, when it became a question what the terms and conditions of the treaty should be, the French Commissioners proposed that the condition, as regards the steamship subsidies, should be embodied as one of the terms of the treaty, and if that had been adopted the hon. gentleman would have been in a position to say that it was one of the conditions laid down in the negotiations, and one that it was the duty of the Government to observe. They proposed that it should be stipulated that :

Sir JOHN THOMPSON.

The Canadian Government undertakes to give a subsidy of £100,000 to a line of steamers having for terminus a French Port.

This was on the 22nd of November, 1892. The paper begins at page 25 and the extract is found on page 26. Now, on page 24 we find the next reference, being a telegram from Mr. Bowell. We find a quotation of a telegram from Mr. Bowell, dated January 11th, 1893 :

Re French Negotiations, Government cannot accept conditions involved in clauses regarding steamship subvention and reduction of duty on French books, but agree.

And so on as to the other conditions. On page 35, in the continuation of the same letter from Sir Charles Tupper to the Hon. Mr. Bowell, in which that telegram of Mr. Bowell is quoted, Sir Charles uses this expression :

M. Hanotaux said that he quite understood this, and was very glad to welcome me back to Paris. I stated that after full consideration the Government of Canada had accepted the proposals of the French Government as embodied in the memoranda which he (M. Hanotaux) had handed to me at our last meeting on November 22nd, with the exception of the proposition to reduce the duty on French books and the clause relating to the direct steamship service between France and Canada ; that I was not aware of any change in the policy of the Government in regard to the steamship service, but that it was not considered proper to make a question of this kind the subject of an engagement to another country ;

Now, if it is not to be considered proper on the part of this Government to make any arrangement on that subject with a foreign country, I should like to know how it could be said with any degree of accuracy that we are refusing to carry out the conditions laid down in the negotiations with that foreign country in declining to vote a further subsidy of £100,000.

Mr. AMYOT. Was there any complaint from France about that ?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. None whatever. But the hon. gentleman will see that without any further negotiations on that subject whatever, either in the way of complaint or in the way of request, a request for any pledge, promise or assurance, the treaty was made without that clause in it :

And that I would write a letter to him (see enclosure) explaining that fact, and furnish him with a copy of an extract of the speech I had recently addressed in London to a large deputation of gentlemen interested in the port of Milford Haven, from which he would see the importance that Canada attached to obtaining direct communication with France. I added that the fact that the minimum treatment which it was proposed that France should give to Canada on a number of articles would be practically of little value without direct communication between the two countries, affording a sufficient guarantee of the interest which Canada had in obtaining that direct steamship service.

I have only to say that the interest we have in that subject, the subject of obtaining direct communication with France, both in view of the provisions of this treaty and for the purpose of the enlargement of the trade between the two countries, is not less now than it was then. It is simply a question of practicability so far as we are concerned, but so far as the view presented by the leader of the Opposition is concerned, it is a question of obligation, although we distinctly declined to be pledged. Now, here is another letter which Sir Charles Tupper seems to have addressed to M. Hanotaux in pursuance of that promise, on the 18th January, 1893 :

As I informed you to-day the Government of Canada have agreed to the proposals in your memoranda which you handed to me at our meeting on 22nd November last, with the exception of the proposed reduction of duty on French books, and the clause relating to the steamship service between France and Canada. This does not arise from any change in the policy of the Government in the latter question, as I have placed it before you, but there does not seem to be any ground for embodying the intentions of the Government in a treaty to which there are obvious objections.

Since our meeting on the date mentioned, I had occasion to refer to this subject in replying to a very influential deputation which waited upon me to advance the interests of Milford Haven as a point of communication between Canada and England. I inclose a copy of my speech in reply to the deputation in which you will see that I explained to them that Canada attached a great deal of importance to that feature of the project which provided for direct communication with France.

You will also readily perceive that the concession of the minimum tariff on a number of articles which it is proposed to give Canada will be practically of no value unless direct communication between the two countries be provided, as the surtaxe d'entrepôt would make it impossible for Canada to derive any advantage therefrom.

I hope the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), when he suggested a reference to that passage of the correspondence a little while ago, was not misconstruing it in his own mind as indicating that Sir Charles Tupper was of the opinion that the treaty would have no value to Canada unless a direct line of steamships referred to in the negotiations about a £100,000 subsidy, were established. Sir Charles Tupper was calling attention to the fact that the surtaxe d'entrepôt would apply to the goods forwarded through other countries to France, and that direct communication was absolutely necessary as regards many of the articles which were referred to in the treaty. That is no doubt the case.

Mr. LAURIER. And without direct communication, the treaty would be valueless ?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Certainly, as to many of the articles contained in it, but not necessarily direct communication by means of this line of steamships.

Mr. LAURIER. Why not ?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Direct communication, for instance, in forwarding our lumber to France, which is not sent by steamer. There is a reference with regard to Milford Haven, which I do not think very important, but in which he refers to the fact that owing to the system adopted :

They proposed to have not only a direct and rapid communication by going to an English port, but they proposed also to have a direct line of communication between Canada and the continent of Europe by requiring vessels to proceed on to a French port. Owing to the system adopted, and held with such tenacity by France the trade between Canada and France was greatly obstructed by the want of direct steam communication between the two countries. Now, a vessel coming to an English port in the first instance would not at all affect the regulations in France, provided the vessel went on under through bills of lading and delivered her cargo, if intended for France, or any port of the continent of Europe, without having landed it in England first.

Now, my hon. friend from Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot), asked me whether there was any remonstrance on the part of the French commissioners. On page 38 we find a statement made in a letter of Sir Charles Tupper to Mr. Bowell, Minister of Trade and Commerce, that M. Hanotaux informed him that his letter with reference to steamship service was considered quite satisfactory, and that is a letter assuring him of the desire and the policy of the Canadian Government to secure direct communication with France, and to secure it also in relation to a steamship line which would be worth £100,000, as evidenced, not by anything that he pledged this Parliament to do, or that the Government intended to do other than they had done already, namely, offering that sum of money to secure such a steamship line. Then on page 44 is another communication from Lord Dufferin and Ava and Sir Charles Tupper to the Minister of Foreign Affairs of France, in which they say :

We take this opportunity of confirming what we already made known to Your Excellency during the progress of the conferences, viz. : that the Canadian Parliament, desirous of favouring the developments of commercial relations between the two countries.

The hon. gentleman, to establish his conclusion, and to justify his argument, would need that the paragraph should go on to say "Will vote a subvention of £100,000," but what they actually say is :

Has voted a subvention of £100,000 for the purpose of establishing a line of steamers to run between a Canadian port on the one side and a French terminus on the other.

Just what they had done, and just what they had then made a public offer of. The last passage I will read is an extract from a letter to myself from Sir Charles Tupper in which he said :

Under the proposed steamship line with France, which will enable us to have much more rapid communication and relieve our trade from the surtaxe d'entrepôt, I see no reason to doubt that the exports from Canada to France will be very rapidly and greatly increased.

My contention then is that while we are perfectly willing to give my hon. friend any further correspondence—and I am afraid there is no more to give him—while we are willing to give him anything we have that will throw any light on the subject—and the hon. gentleman seems to think there must be some more on account of the long interval which elapsed between two communications—while we are perfectly willing to produce anything we cannot admit that at any time from first to last of the negotiations, there was a pledge on behalf of this Government that a subsidy should be voted for the establishment of a line of steamships between Canada and France ; but we contend that the references to that subject were legitimate references to what had already been done, and that when it came to the question of whether any pledge should be given or any condition made on the part of the Government of Canada, we distinctly declined to be bound by any such condition whatever.

Mr. EDGAR. I desire to ask the Finance Minister if the Government have communicated their change of policy to the French Government ?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. We have not made any change of policy.

Mr. LAURIER. As I said a moment ago, I do not desire on the present occasion to discuss the question involved in the motion before the House ; still some remarks have been made by the First Minister which require comment on my part. When the other day I put the question to the hon. gentleman with respect to the line of steamers that was to be subsidized between France and Canada, I did not state that this stipulation was part of the contract entered into as regards the treaty between France and Canada, but I stated that it has been an understanding in the negotiations that had taken place, and which led to the treaty. The hon. gentleman cannot deny, and no candid man can deny, that it was well understood in the negotiations which took place between the French and the English Commissioners, Sir Charles Tupper, especially, that the policy of the Canadian Government was that there should be such a line of steamers subsidized between France and Canada, and it was not only the policy of the Canadian Government but it was an actual fact and the money had been voted by Parliament. It was not a promise, but the basis on which the negotiations were conducted. The French Government desired that this provision should be embodied in the treaty, but the English Commissioners said that for obvious reasons—whatever they were I do not see—they could not enter into such engagements towards another nation. But at the same time it must be remembered that although this condition was not embodied in the treaty, it is part of the policy of the Government, and actually the money has been voted. Not only the honour of the English Commissioners, but the honour of the English Ambassador to France, Lord Dufferin, is pledged to the statement made, and which was made on the very day the treaty was signed, that the Canadian Parliament had actually voted £100,000 towards the subsidizing of a steamship line between France and Canada. That was not an untruth stated by Lord Dufferin on that occasion, it was a fact, because in 1889 the Canadian Parliament voted the sum of money there mentioned, $500,000, towards the subsidizing of a steamship line between Canada and Great Britain, the vessels calling at a French port, and thereby being able to avoid the surtaxe d'entrepôt, which otherwise would make the treaty valueless. What is the position now ? The Canadian Parliament has determined to ratify the French treaty, a treaty which was signed on the part of the Republic on the understanding that a line of steamers was to be subsidized, and the Minister of Finance told us a few days ago that the conditions on which the subsidy was granted in 1889 had been cancelled, and that the vote would not be found in the present Estimates. A departure has therefore been made by the Canadian Government from the basis upon which the treaty was negotiated. The hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot) asked : But has the French Government protested ? How can the French Government protest ? It has never been made aware of the departure of the policy now agreed to by the Canadian Government.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. That was not the question put by the hon. gentleman.

Mr. LAURIER. What was it ?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The question was whether the French Commissioners objected.

Mr. LAURIER. That was not the question, if you will remember.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It was.

Mr. LAURIER. The question was whether the French Government had remonstrated or protested.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. No.

Mr. LAURIER. The French Government have made no remonstrance, because they do not know of the departure from their policy by this Government.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. There has been no departure.

Mr. FOSTER. Of what departure is the hon. gentleman speaking?

Mr. LAURIER. Here is a statement made by Lord Dufferin and Sir Charles Tupper:

We take this opportunity of confirming what we have already made known to your Excellency during the progress of the conferences, viz., that the Canadian Parliament, desirous of favouring the development of commercial relations between the two countries, has voted a subvention of £100,000 for the purpose of establishing a line of steamers to run between a Canadian port on one side and a French terminus on the other.

Was that an untruth, or was it a fact?

Mr. FOSTER. It was a fact.

Mr. LAURIER. Was it not a fact that the Canadian Parliament at the instance of the Canadian Government in 1889 voted a subsidy for a line of steamers to ply between Great Britain and Canada, and at the same time call at a French port? Did not the Finance Minister only a few days ago make a statement when the question was asked him—

Mr. FOSTER. What was the question?

Mr. LAURIER. It was:

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT asked. 1. Will the terminal point of the proposed fast Atlantic service be in England or in France? 2. If the terminal point be in England will the line call at any French port?

Mr. FOSTER. The terminal point will be in England. 2. It is intended that there shall be a service to a French port.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. By the same line?

Mr. FOSTER. The same line or a cross line.

Mr. FOSTER. Where do you find any departure in policy?

Mr. LAURIER. It was not to be a cross line, but the same line. The hon. gentleman knows very well that if a subsidy is granted for a line from Canada to Great Britain and there is a cross line, there must be transshipment, and the goods are then subject to surtaxe d'entrepot. The very object failed of attainment. I do not know that the French Government have protested, but I am very much afraid that the French Government will protest. I do not desire to make any further comments than such as cannot be avoided, but it seems to me that the honour of Canada is pledged in this matter, and before we take a final step and the Government asks for a ratification of the treaty they should state exactly what is their policy, whether they intend to ask a subsidy to carry out the promise given—I will not say a promise—but the understanding on which the treaty was negotiated.

Mr. TARTE. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, the explanations which have just been given us are not calculated to give us credit in Europe as a people having any regard for good faith. It is not the first time that in negotiations of this kind, we have been wanting in good faith. But now, we have before us such a clear case that—I regret having to state it—bad faith is unhappily too plain. In 1889, we passed an Act under which five hundred thousand dollars were granted for the establishment of a line of steamers between Canada and France. The third clause of this Act reads as follows:—

The Governor in Council may enter into a contract for a term not exceeding ten years with any individual or company, for the performance of a fast weekly steamship service between Canada and the United Kingdom, making connection with a French port, on such terms and conditions as to the carriage of mails and otherwise as the Governor in Council deems expedient, for a subsidy not exceeding the sum of five hundred thousand dollars a year.

I think there could be nothing clearer than such a clause. A French port was to be taken as the terminal port. Besides, both our negotiators in France wrote to the French Government, as already stated, that the Canadian Parliament, as soon as 1889, had voted a subsidy of half a million dollars for the establishment of fast steamers between a Canadian port and a French terminus. Now, they come and tell us that the Government do not feel bound to fill that condition. Here is bad faith in its simplest expression. The French Government were imposed upon on the 6th February, 1893, and now they are a good deal more. The hon. the First Minister has just stated, in the face of Europe which hears him, that while there exists a statute sanctioned by the Queen in which it is stated that a subsidy of five hundred thousand dollars is granted for the establishment of a line of fast steamers between Canada and France, the hon. the First Minister, I say, stands up here and states that if nothing should be voted for the establishment of such a line, the Government in whose behalf he speaks and who are bound by his word, will break no contracted obligation. As I stated, we have already deceived foreign nations, but it is a more dangerous game to try and dupe the courts of Europe than the American people. I have no doubt but that, when the explanation of the hon. the First Minister will reach Europe, the French Government will see that Canada, through those who officially represent her, is trying to quibble and avoid her engagements. On the 6th February, 1893, we voted a subsidy of $500,000, and in the course of the treaty negotiations, both our negotiators used this vote by the representatives of France and the Minister of Foreign Affairs as an evidence of our desire to have more extended commercial relations with France and of our good faith in the negotiations then pending. Yet, the hon. the Minister of Finance told us the other day in terms sufficiently clear : We are going to ask you to wipe out the very condition, without which the French Government would never have made any treaty with us. After all, Mr. Speaker, what do we give to France by this diplomatic instrument ? Should we faithfully observe all the conditions of the treaty, France would give us much more than we would grant her. The hon. the First Minister went to France since this treaty was signed. I think he must have taken information. I understand that the treaty and the line of steamers which were to start from Canada and end at France were referred to. I think that, when the correspondence will be brought up, we will find that during this last trip, the hon. the First Minister, who has just stated that he took no engagement towards the French Government, then bound himself, to a very large extent, to contribute to the establishment of a line of steamers between Canada and France. I am not making of this question a party question. A treaty question must never be a party question, but the Government are making of this a party question. Most people know that the Government fear the ill-will of some of its friends as for whom the sole name of France is a cause for irritation. I regret that it should be so.

Mr. AMYOT (Translation). Name ! name !

Mr. TARTE (Translation). There would be too many to name. Moreover, why should I give names which were held before me by the hon. member for Bellechasse to the indignation of the province of Quebec ?

Mr. GEOFFRION (Translation). And which he now flatters.

Mr. TARTE (Translation). I repeat, Mr. Speaker, that this is not a party question, for this side of the House at all events. Speaking in my own name, although I am sure to express the views of many of my friends, I say that it is the duty of this House to see that the Government should faithfully keep the word they have given. I have somewhat, I might even say that I have much, travelled in France. During these travels I concerned myself with the question of trade relations between Canada and France, and I have no hesitation in saying that if the line of steamers in question should not be established as understood, the treaty will be absolutely useless. We have heard many things in connection with the ratification of this treaty, amongst others that the Government would have it adopted here, but would take their measures to have it killed in the Senate. We will not be parties to an act of duplicity. If the Government are not willing to keep faith with their engagements, for my part I am not prepared to say that I will vote for the ratification of this treaty.

Mr. OUMET (Translation). Hear, hear.

Mr. TARTE.

Mr. TARTE (Translation). I hope that in this case the Government will keep the engagements they have taken towards France.

Mr. OUMET (Translation). And you are willing to vote against the treaty.

Mr. TARTE (Translation). Let the hon. Minister of Public Works understand me well ; I say it is the duty of the Government—and he, the hon. Minister who occupies a very important position in this Government, ought to see closely to it—I say it is the duty of the Government to act in good faith. The hon. Minister of Public Works took, I know, a prominent part in the movement which took place in favour of the subsidy inserted in the statute of 1889. I have some knowledge of that, for I was then with the hon. Minister in better terms than now. He displayed much activity and devotedness in all the proceedings which had for their object the voting of this subsidy. I now ask him, in the face of the province of Quebec and of the whole country, if he is now going to consent to the wiping of that clause out of the statute ? If he is, he knows he will do something which he will not be able to account for, and I beg to be allowed to say that he knows he will do an act of weakness. Well, I say I am not prepared—and I am not afraid to state it here—I am not prepared to vote for the ratification of this treaty if it is sought to make it an instrument of bad faith. For, if we should now vote for a treaty which has no meaning, or rather, which would have no other meaning than that of deceiving a friendly country, how could one ever go and negotiate in France ? Suppose it is not ratified in France, suppose France says to us : You have deceived us, when truly we would have deceived her, is not the hon. Minister willing to agree with me that we never could make any treaty with that country ? Well, under those circumstances, since the hon. Minister interrupted me, I call his attention, not from the standpoint of a political party, but as one of the representatives of the province of Quebec, of which he, after all, has the special charge with his French colleagues, to the necessity which is incumbent upon him to urge that this important and essential condition should not be taken out of the statute.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I just wish to say one word, not in regard to the discussion upon the merits of the treaty, or upon the peculiar influence of the surtax d'entrepot in its effect upon the trade between ourselves and France ; but simply to make a statement which, I think, is necessary after what has been said by the hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition ; a somewhat surprising statement, in that he attempted, and did, in fact, make a charge of bad faith on the part of the Government with reference to what he termed a change of policy about the trans-Atlantic service. I do not think that charge should be made without there was very good ground for it, and I do not think there is any ground upon which to base such a charge. Leaving out the merits of the treaty entirely, leaving out the effects of that peculiar provision of the surtaxe d'entrepot which we are not discussing to-night at all, and leaving aside all this voluble excitement about breaking faith and the like of that which we have heard: let us see whether it is true that there has been a change of policy with reference to this matter. The references to the service between Canada and France were references that took place between the negotiators of the treaty upon either side. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Laurier) will see, if he reads over the correspondence, that the plain effort of Sir Charles Tupper as one of the negotiators was to get from France the benefit of their minimum list as a whole, and in order to do that he brought forward what was a fact, the policy which was the avowed policy of the Canadian Government; that a subsidy had been voted by Parliament for the establishment of a fast line of communication between Canada, Great Britain and France. And, using that as an argument, and mentioning the large sum of money which Parliament had voted to carry out that avowed policy, he pointed out that Canada, having done so much, the benefit of the minimum list should be given to Canadian trade. That was the argument used for that purpose, and it was a fair argument to make. It passed between negotiator and negotiator, and it is altogether apart from what was in the articles of the treaty which was agreed upon between the negotiators, and which was agreed to by the Government as well. It would be idle to say that you must hold the Government responsible for all the pourparlers, and statements made in pourparlers by the commissioners upon either side. The Government of either country have done all that they have agreed to as put in the articles of the treaty. Now, what was the policy of this Government, and how did Sir Charles Tupper come to mention the fact? The policy was laid down in 1889, and, in order to refresh the memory of the House, it is well to read what was contained in the Act of Parliament passed in that year, and upon which the policy of the Government in reference to the matter was founded. The 3rd section of the Act of 1889 reads this way:

The Governor in Council may enter into a contract for a term not exceeding ten years with any individual or company for the performance of a fast weekly steamship service between Canada and the United Kingdom, making connection with a French port, on such terms and conditions as to the carriage of mails and otherwise as the Governor in Council deems expedient, for a subsidy not exceeding the sum of five hundred thousand dollars a year.

That laid down a policy; that was what this Government was pledged to do; that was what this Parliament passed; a fast line between Canada and the United Kingdom, making connection with a French port. Sir Charles Tupper used that in the negotiations; stated the fact and stated the policy and used it as a lever by means of which to influence the French negotiators to give to Canada the benefit of her minimum list. Now, has there been any change in that policy? Directly consequent upon that came the call for tenders for a service upon the terms of the statute, as indeed they must have been on the terms of the statute. It was always an open question as to whether that service as between Canada and France should be by the same line of steamers, from an English terminal port to a French port, or whether it should be a communication by a cross line of steamers. It was infinitely preferable that it should be by the same line of steamers, and the effort and policy of the Government was to bring that about, and the provisional contract which was made upon one occasion for the service, and which afterwards fell through, provided that the service should be done by the same steamers, the idea being that the steamer should leave Canada and go to an English port, then cross from the English port to the French port, then come back to London and freight up with what was necessary to fill the vessel, after having taken on any cargo in France that might offer, and then to call at Southampton on the outward voyage for mails and passengers, and so come to Canada. That was in pursuance of the policy laid down in the enactment which I have just read. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Laurier) says: There has been a change of policy, and he bases that argument on something stated by myself in answer to a question. The hon. gentleman asked me a question with reference to that. He asked whether or not the Government proposed to ask for additional legislation this year with reference to the fast service, and, in answer to that I stated the Government did so propose. I suppose the hon. gentleman put this question on the strength of what had been stated in the newspapers and what had been talked about widely in Canada, that we were going to propose to ask Parliament for a vote of $750,000 for a fast line of steamers. He asked me that question, and if I recollect rightly, my answer was—at least this was the sense of it—that we did propose to ask for additional legislation with regard to the matter. That showed that the Government had not changed its policy. Then there was another question put to me by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) in relation to the matter we are now discussing; and the question and answer were as follows:—

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT asked, 1. Will the terminal point of the proposed fast Atlantic service be in England or in France? 2. If the terminal point be in England will the line call at any French port?

Mr. FOSTER. 1. The terminal point will be in England. 2. It is intended that there shall be a service to a French port.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. By the same line?

Mr. FOSTER. The same line or a cross line.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Can you not tell which?

Mr. FOSTER. No.

We have not abandoned the policy in the view of the hon. gentleman who asked the question, because in the very question itself, he implies that we are going on with the policy. There was no change in the policy as announced in that answer, because it was always proposed that the vessel should go from here to a port in the United Kingdom, and neither has the policy changed, as it was always intended—in fact, the statute upon which the whole was based made a provision—that there should be a connection with a French port. My answer that the communication should be by the same line or a cross line is exactly the policy that has been announced from the first. As to whether it shall be by the same line or by a cross line depends entirely as it did from the very first, on the conditions which it may be possible to obtain. The Government first proposed that a subsidy of $500,000 should be given. The Government is going to propose that an enlarged subsidy shall be given. It is going to propose it on the same principle upon which it proposed the first vote, that is, for a fast line with the United Kingdom, and connection with a French port. It is advisable on all sides, if it can be done, that that communication shall be by the same line of steamers. Anyway, there must be a connected service with a French port if the policy of the Government is to be carried out as proposed. Now, that is the simple story of the whole matter. What ground is there in that recital for saying that we have changed our policy in reference to the fast line? Not any in the least, I submit. What ground is there, then, for framing an indictment against the Government that we are breaking faith with the French Government? No ground in this recital that I have made, and no ground in the negotiations which appear in the blue-book from which we have been reading. To-night I wish to put that version of the matter straightly and fairly before Parliament, and I contend that under it there is no ground for saying that we are bound to the French Government, under the articles of the treaty, to do thus and so. What was stated was stated as a fact of policy to which the Government were pledged, and which we proposed to carry out. No change has been made in that policy. The Government do propose to carry it out: they propose to carry it out in the same way in which they have proposed to carry it out from the first.

Mr. FOSTER.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It is perfectly clear, from the hon. gentleman's own statement, that the Government are not prepared to implement the statement, made by Lord Dufferin and Sir Charles Tupper, as a positive matter of fact, that there was going to be a direct service between Canada and France. That is their statement made in half a dozen places; that is the statement which has been read by the Minister; and Sir Charles Tupper went further, and stated distinctly, over and over again, that, in his judgment, unless that line was established, the treaty would be of very little value, if any.

Mr. FOSTER. If the hon. gentleman will allow me, what Sir Charles Tupper and Lord Dufferin did state was this:

That the Canadian parliament, desirous of favouring the development of commercial relations between the two countries, has voted a subvention of £100,000 for the purpose of establishing a line of steamers to run between a Canadian port on one side, and a French terminus port on the other.

A statement of fact.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Precisely what I said—a statement by Lord Dufferin, and confirmed by Sir Charles Tupper, to the effect that there was going to be a line of direct communication between Canada and France. It is perfectly clear that that is not going to be the case. It is perfectly clear that, if the Government are going to have any kind of communication with France it will be by a cross line. We know that they cannot make a French port a terminal point. I am not going to recall the discussion which my hon. friend initiated until the papers, if there are any, come down; but I do say, having regard to the statement made by our High Commissioner, and endorsed by the English Minister at Paris, that it was the duty of the Government, when they found that there was no likelihood of such a line being established, or that there was doubt on the point, to have communicated with the French Government; and, if they have not done so, it is their duty, without an hour's delay, to acquaint the French Government that, owing to difficulties that have occurred, and the great doubt that exists as to the possibility of establishing direct communication between Canada and a French port, they wish the French Government to understand distinctly that while the statements were correct as to what their intentions were at the time the subsidy was voted by the Parliament of Canada, they find now that they cannot carry out those intentions; and before they bring down this treaty to Parliament, they ought to be able to acquaint us with the fact, first, that they have communicated with the French Government, and that the French Government, if they choose to continue the negotiations, regard that as no impediment. It is true, when Sir Charles Tupper and Lord Dufferin made the statement, although it was not embodied in the treaty, they represented it as an accomplished fact. It is equally true that the French Government believed it an accomplished fact, and that Sir Charles Tupper believed that the treaty would be good for nothing unless it was done.

Mr. OUIMET. After the very clear explanations that have been given by the hon. Finance Minister, it is useless for me to try to show, what has been done already, that this Government have not been guilty of breach of faith with the French Government in regard to the alleged undertaking to establish a direct line between a Canadian port and a French port. The vote for that purpose, as everything else in this House, was contingent on the possibility of finding the people to carry out the idea of a fast line to touch at an English port, and then go to a French port. As to the apparent necessity or usefulness of having direct communication with a French port, if this French treaty is going to be ratified, there will be no difficulty in realizing that; why, unless our goods are taken to a French port direct, we cannot have the benefit of the exemption from the surtaxe d'entrepot, and it will practically shut out the French market to our exporters. As the first scheme could not be carried out, the Government have resolved to ask Parliament, as has been announced, to ratify a proposed contract for a fast service between a Canadian port and an English port. After the treaty is ratified, if it is ratified, it will be for the Government to arrange matters so that the Canadian people will have the full benefit of this treaty; and I am sure the Government will not be deficient in their duty on that score.

Mr. LAURIER. In what manner will that be done?

Mr. OUIMET. It will be announced in due time. It has been shown clearly to the hon. leader of the Opposition and to the House that the representations made by Sir Charles Tupper was founded on facts. This never was done in order to induce the French Government to agree to a treaty with us; but it was stated as evidence of a desire on the part of this country to enter into closer commercial relations with France. I must say that I was sorry to hear the hon. leader of the Opposition indicate to this House and the country, after all he has said himself and all he has allowed his friends to say in the province of Quebec and elsewhere to people who are anxious to see that treaty ratified, that he has found a side path by which he thinks he will be able to oppose this treaty, and yet appear before his fellow-countrymen as having favoured closer commercial relations with France. The hon. gentleman did not say very much, but he has an echo behind him, who not only repeats what the leader of the Opposition says, but on the hustings and everywhere else, says what his leader thinks, but will not dare say himself, as the chief of the Grit party in this Dominion. The hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte) has said that this alleged breach of faith with France is the reason for which he for one—adding that he thought he was speaking also on behalf of those around him from the province of Quebec—would vote against the treaty. We understand that very well, and the good people of Quebec will not be deceived by such tactics. They are only a reproduction of what has occurred in the case of other burning questions. The hon. gentleman says openly what his leader will not say.

Mr. TARTE. What did I say? Just as well to know it now.

Mr. OUIMET. I will tell you, Sir, if I am in order. In the school question, the leader of the Opposition never said what would be his course, except that he would do justice. He never would say what was the justice he would do. But his echo behind him, on every hustings, proclaimed that the justice which would be done to the Catholic minority of the North-west would be to disallow the legislation passed by his bosom friend, the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin). The hon. gentleman has been exciting prejudices in the province of Quebec on these questions. Availing himself of the title his leader gave him one day, in a fit of generosity and liberality, of being his first lieutenant in the province of Quebec, he tells the people of Quebec what he would do, and what the leader of the Opposition would do on that question—that they would wipe out the Manitoba Public Schools Act, and also the Ordinance of the North-west Legislature. His leader would not dare say that, because he respects too much his reputation as a constitutional authority. To-night the hon. gentleman says what the leader of the Opposition would not dare to say, that he would vote against the French treaty because our Government have broken faith. He has said what he had no reason to say is true—

Mr. SPEAKER. Order.

Mr. OUIMET. What is devoid of foundation, that this Government would pass the treaty in this House but have it killed in the Senate. I suppose the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte) had in his mind the recollection of a certain procedure which he denounced so fiercely when he was with us. No doubt he recollects the famous bill concerning the Nanaimo and Esquimaux railway.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Killed by your own people in the Senate.

Mr. OUIMET. What I want to say is this, that the hon. member for L'Islet was the man who, in his paper, denounced most bitterly and fiercely that the procedure which he had no doubt then was inspired by the Government of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). It is needless for me to say that this Government intends to carry out truly and loyally its undertaking, as concluded by our representatives in France, and we intend to ask our friends to loyally support us. The hon. member for L'Islet has said on several occasions that if the Government came down with a Bill ratifying the French treaty there would not be found a Frenchman to vote against it. But to-day, thinking that some of our friends object to that treaty, he takes care to announce that now he has found a good reason for not voting for its ratification, and he expects that when we take a vote the Government may be defeated, through defection on our own side, supported by hon. gentlemen opposite. These are the facts to which I wish to draw the attention of the people of Quebec. But even if I did not draw their attention to it, I think that everybody in that province would see through the policy of the hon. gentleman. I am sorry that the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte) and his leader should have made a party question of this matter, and have taken the opportunity of resorting to tactics, in order to defeat the Government, that will not redound to their credit.

Mr. TARTE. In reply to the hon. gentleman—

Mr. SPEAKER. Order.

Mr. FLINT. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. TARTE. If the hon. Minister had not introduced into this debate a matter which is entirely foreign to it, I would not avail myself of the motion, Sir, which is now put into your hands. My hon. friend has stated that I was the echo of the hon. leader of the Opposition. Let it be understood that I am here the echo of nobody except my electors. I think I am old enough, when I speak here to say just what I think and to speak for myself. The hon. Minister has thought fit to say that on the hustings in the province of Quebec I have said things that are of such a nature that they are not a credit to me. Well, Sir, I think if I were to refer to certain speeches made by the hon. Minister I could find in them what many would not expect to hear from a man having a responsible position as that he occupies. But let us lay aside all these personal questions. The hon. gentleman has referred especially to the school question. Well, I have said outside of this chamber what I am prepared to say in this chamber. I have not only spoken, but I have written. And, as I have said already in this House, I have the bad habit of signing my articles. Therefore, what I have written may be quoted in this Parliament. I challenged my hon. friend on another occasion to quote one of my articles in which I have written things I would not say here.

Mr. OUIMET.

Mr. OUIMET. There would be too many of them.

Mr. TARTE. In other times I quite remember that my hon. friend was very fond of my articles. I remember well they were also enjoyed by a great many of hon. gentlemen on the other side. But, of course, times are changed.

Mr. DALY. Since Hannah died.

Mr. TARTE. I did not catch what my hon. friend said.

Mr. DALY. I only remarked that things have changed since Hannah died.

Mr. TARTE. If the hon. gentleman would say it in French, I think it would be better. The hon. Minister of Public Works says that I made speeches on the school question that were calculated to arouse religious and race prejudices. Well, Sir, his friends in the province of Quebec have said things with regard to this very question that none of us here would dare to say. I might quote again to-night the speech I have quoted already, made by the hon. Attorney General of the province of Quebec, in which he says that the time has come to make a coup d'Etat, because on that school question the Rt. Hon. Prime Minister and his colleagues had not thought fit to disallow the law. I never said anything of that kind. All the French ministerial organs in the province of Quebec have stated the same thing, with the sole exception of 'La Minerve.' Now, Sir, I will say more than that. On an occasion that my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition will recollect perfectly well, I met a Minister of the Crown in the Vaudreuil election. That hon. gentleman, the Minister of Agriculture, pledged himself to a very strange course of action indeed. He pledged himself that justice should be done, and done quickly, to my French fellow countrymen, or he would be ready to forfeit his right arm. We have not threatened the country with any such calamity as that. The hon. Minister of Public Works has pledged himself to follow the advice of the bishops of the province of Quebec. He did so in a speech that has been published broadcast, and which he cannot deny. I say that a public man ought to have the courage of his convictions, and I declare here on the floor of this Parliament that I think that in the North-west school question it was the duty of the Government to disallow the Act. I may be wrong, but I think I have the right to my opinion. If that opinion is wrong, let it be shown and proved. Let it not be shown and proved by sneers—which will not annoy me very much—but let it be shown and proved in a clear and unmistakable manner. The hon. Minister to-night has taken a stand that is not going to be to his credit, because I am quite sure that the stand he has taken publicly is not the stand he has taken elsewhere. The hon. Minister himself has asked that these laws should be disallowed. I am not in the Ministerial secrets; but the Ministers have spoken. If the hon. Postmaster General was free to speak, I am sure he would bear out every word I am now saying. The hon. Minister of Agriculture and the hon. Minister of Public Works have asked that the law be disallowed. The Rt. Hon. Prime Minister knows that, and he will not deny it, I think.

Mr. OULMET. What the hon. gentleman now states against me involves the very grave charge that I repeated or divulged what passed in Council. I resent that charge, and I tell him that it is utterly without foundation. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), who says nothing now, but smiles and laughs at what I am saying, ought to respect a colleague of his as a Minister of the Privy Council, and ought to believe that colleague, when he says that he has been loyal enough not to divulge what he has sworn to keep secret.

Mr. TARTE. I accept the hon. gentleman's statement. I am bound to do it; I am glad to do it. But how is it, I want to know, that this recommendation at the end of the report of the Council goes so far as to say in other words that this North-west Territories law should be repealed? Is it not clear to any one's mind that a promise was made? Does not the hon. gentleman remember that there was a sub-committee of the Privy Council appointed to report on this question? He does remember that. Did that sub-committee ever make a report? It did not. The personal organs of the hon. Minister of Public Works and the personal organ of the hon. Minister of Agriculture stated publicly and openly—and they were not contradicted—that the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of Public Works had insisted, and were still insisting, that the North-west Territories' law should be repealed. Well, Sir, I never was stronger, but I was clearer than that. I spoke in time. I said that if the Government of this country had been willing or strong enough to make the law of the land respected they would have acted otherwise than they had done. The Rt. Hon. Prime Minister laughs very heartily. I think he will find in the end that, on this question, the people will not laugh with him. If I am not mistaken in public feeling, there is a widespread opinion that on this school question he has not been fair to us; that he has not been fair to Archbishop Taché; that he has not been fair to those with whom he has acted politically. Well, Sir, I am sorry that this has taken place; but at least I have not been the cause of it. I think the Minister of Public Works has gone beyond the limits of this debate in which we are engaged, and it may be just as well when such an instance arises, that it be cleared up immediately. But let it be well understood, and once for all, that I am not answerable to the charge of saying outside this Chamber things that I would not dare to say here. Of course I am not as white a man as some hon. gentlemen opposite, I may be a very "black man," but I am not a coward.

Mr. AMYOT. I am rather surprised to see that the discussion on the papers relating to the French Treaty, has drifted into matters having no relation to that treaty. The hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte) has thought fit to accuse the Government of bad faith. He has warned France against the bad faith of the Government; he has told France that we were receiving much more than we were giving, that the members of this House were being shamefully kept in ignorance of what is prepared for us in the Senate, that the Government is preparing a defeat of the treaty in the Senate. He has represented the Government of this country as a lot of men who are engaged in a conspiracy to deceive France and to deceive their own friends. Where is the proof of that? My hon. friend from L'Islet is in the habit of hurling accusations.

Mr. TARTE. And proving them, too.

Mr. AMYOT. We will see that in a moment. Although some of the bishops have reproached him with deception, he still goes on, and he says he signs his articles. We will see what those articles have brought upon his head. The bishop of all others most interested in the school question is Monseigneur Taché. Surely he is the bishop most intimately acquainted with, and most deeply concerned in, the school question. What has been the conduct of the hon. gentleman towards him, that old man who has spent his whole life in working for the half-breeds, for the good of their souls and of their bodies? In his old age he has been accused, suspicions have been directed against him by that tender and good-hearted fellow, the member for L'Islet. For months and months that hon. gentleman has published articles signed by himself, containing all sorts of accusations against that venerable prelate. And what was the answer of Bishop Taché? On the 13th June last, in an open letter signed by himself—between the two names you will have to choose—he writes the following to the address of the hon. member for L'Islet. I translate it:

I hope you will not be too much surprised at the liberty I take in addressing you the present letter through the press. I am only answering your challenge oft repeated in different forms and in many circumstances. I had thought until recently that it was better to keep silent, but I have changed my mind. I now proceed to answer your interrogations, and to declare to you that after having deceived yourself you have deceived others concerning negotiations which you affirm took place between the Government at Ottawa and the Archbishop of St. Boniface respecting the Catholic school of Manitoba.

You deceived yourself and you deceived others.

I now declare to you and to those who have heard you, that your assertions are completely false. Encouraged by the silence which I thought proper to keep in presence of your accusations, you have repeated them before the Liberal Convention held last week at Ottawa. If I correctly understand your charges, you said—

And he enumerates four accusations made by the hon. gentleman.

I regret to have to contradict you. Now, why have you repeated assertions so false and so ill-founded?

This is the language of one of the bishops of this country, one of those bishops whom the hon. gentleman pretends to follow when he is speaking before French people, but whom he reproaches a Minister of the Crown for following when he addresses this House. He is speaking to Protestants here; he would not dare to speak before a meeting of Catholics as he does to-night. To-night he thinks he has put the Minister of Public Works in a tight place when he says to him: You have declared that you would follow the bishops. Well, the hon. the Minister of Public Works, if he follows the bishops, will follow a set of men much better than those who surround the hon. gentleman. The hon. gentleman is surrounded by whom? By the member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin), who is the father of that law which has brought so much trouble on the Dominion. And how did he become the father of that law? By false representation, by false promises, by solemnly promising the people that if he were returned no such law would be enacted, and after having attained to power by means of those false representations, he abused the confidence of the people and passed that law. And who to-day is the best friend of the member for Winnipeg? Who in the quarrels outside of this House flies to his rescue? The hon. gentleman wants to make us believe that he is in favour of the French Treaty. Sir, we were advocating that treaty long before he ever thought of it. This is the first Government that has ever presented such a treaty for the ratification of this House. The hon. gentleman knows that in the Conservative ranks there are many wine manufacturers, as there are in both parties. If light wines from France are introduced in this country at a cheap rate, these men fear they will injure their own trade. The Government have to face not only opposition from that quarter, but they have to face the hostility of the prohibitionists, of whom there are some in both parties. The Government have had to face the opposition of their friends among the wine makers and their friends among the prohibitionists. Our High Commissioner having negotiated a treaty with France, the Government comes and asks the House to ratify it, in spite of the objections of the prohibitionists and of the wine makers. But how is he received by those who pretend to be the friends of France and of the French treaty? With insinuations, with a solemn declaration of bad faith. I ask the hon. gentleman to give us proof of bad faith. We do not like bad faith any better than he does. Is this accusation like those that he directed against Archbishop Taché? Every time he opens his mouth to make an accusation, the accused party tells him that he is wrong, but he spends his life repeating it. I will answer the hon. gentleman to-night in the name of the majority of the people of the province of Quebec and say that we are in favour of a treaty with France; we have some gratitude for the Government which does its best to initiate a treaty and develop our commercial relations with France, and the majority of the people believe the Government are honest and sincere. I tell the people of France that the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte) has no evidence of bad faith on the part of the Government, and if the hon. member wanted his words to have credit, he would have the evidence to substantiate them ready. I challenge him to produce the evidence of bad faith.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. AMYOT. In a circus there are always some people whose business it is to make other people laugh or who laugh themselves, and that may be repeated in a deliberate assembly. But let the hon. gentleman produce his evidence that there has been bad faith. It is asserted that France has been deceived because direct communication was promised. I deny that statement. A communication was promised and a French terminus was promised—not promised, but mentioned—a policy was defined. It was said that we were ready to vote a sum of money in the hope of building up a large trade with France. We never said that we would engage ourselves to have direct communication with France, and no such statement is contained in the treaty, which is as clear as daylight. There has been nothing changed. But what difference does it make in regard to French trade whether there is a line of steamships from Canada direct or not. The fact of a ship leaving Montreal, Quebec, Halifax, or St. John and steaming rapidly over to France and return does not load the vessel or unload her. If there is enough trade to be done, vessels will be found to do it, and the condition of rapid or subsidized steamships has nothing to do with the treaty. If there is sufficient lumber to be sold in France, there will be members found even in this House who will be glad to do the trade. But this does not change the treaty. But the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte) says that if it is evident that the Senate will reject the Bill, he will vote against the treaty. That is pretty much like the man who declares that on Friday night next we will parade, and if Friday is going to be bad weather, we will make it to-morrow. If the hon. gentleman is satisfied that the Senate will reject the treaty later on, he will vote against it now. I think hon. members should avoid the practice of casting suspicion on the motives of each other; they should respect each other, and should not without cause or justification, especially in dealing with a question which concerns other countries, throw accusations across the floor. The only reason I rose was to protest against the language used by the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte), and to state that his statements did not represent the sentiments of his colleagues here, that the French Canadians were serious in this matter, and desired a treaty, and were only sorry they could not obtain a more extensive treaty. Sir Alexander Galt visited France, but failed to obtain a treaty. Sir Charles Tupper, with the help of Lord Dufferin, has secured a treaty: we will accept it, and endeavour to increase our commerce with France, and when we have increased it we hope a new treaty will be framed so that France will become one of our most advantageous markets. It is not, however, simply with France that we desire a treaty. I am in favour of entering into treaties with all the nations, including Germany, Spain and Cuba, and the United States, when they get ready for it, and it was because they were not ready for it we went elsewhere. In regard to the other question referred to by the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte) I will not say anything more at the present moment. I might quote other instances where that hon. gentleman had introduced letters which had brought severe replies, and had cast upon him reproach. If I quoted one of the letters of Archbishop Taché it would be only to prove that the hon. member for L'Islet has not a monopoly of the bishops.

Mr. OUIMET. This is the second time on which the member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte) has charged me with having stated at St. Jérôme, and I remember very well the occasion, that I would blindly follow the advice of the bishops on the school question. If I did that, I do not consider I would be following foolish advice, as the hon. member has said. However, that was not the statement I made. What I said was merely this: Our opponents pretend to voice the wishes of the bishops, and they ask the people to oppose our Government on these questions, explaining that a Catholic could not in this matter vote against the bishops' advice without voting against the church. I contended that it was not for those hon. gentlemen to say what the doctrine of the church was; if any one had to do it, it rested with the bishops themselves to state what the doctrine of the church on that question was, and when the bishops kept silent it was not for hon. gentlemen opposite to voice their sentiments and opinions. That is what I said, and I do not think I said anything of what I ought to be ashamed.

Mr. LAURIER. I do not rise with any intention of discussing the school question, which has been imported into the debate for reasons I cannot perceive. If hon. gentlemen are anxious to discuss that question there will be many occasions during this session when it can be done by itself. The hon. gentleman stated in so many words, in order to prove that bad faith had not prevailed, that the Government intended to keep faith as regards the pledge given in the course of the negotiations, and that a contract had been entered into with this Government by a gentleman, who was understood to be Mr. Hibbard, for a subsidized line of steamers between Canada and England. Now, I would not have asked now for the communication of this document, because I suppose it would come down in due time; but since it has been brought in debate I suppose that the Government will not have any hesitation to lay it before the House at the earliest possible moment.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Question.

Mr. SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of Mr. Flint that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. FLINT. I withdraw the motion.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. SPEAKER. The motion cannot be withdrawn without the consent of the House. Is it the wish of the House that the hon. gentleman shall have leave to withdraw the motion?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. No.

Motion (Mr. Flint) to adjourn, agreed to; and the House adjourned at 11.15 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, 17th April, 1894.

PRAYERS.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS COMMITTEE.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I understood there was a report from the Committee on Public Accounts of very considerable importance which was to have been presented this afternoon, or which ought to have been presented. The gentleman who is in charge of it ought to be here.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I suppose the hon. gentleman means the motion to adopt.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The report was not presented; it was laid over.

Mr. FOSTER. I think the report was presented several days ago.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It ought to have been moved to-day.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I do not think there is anything in the report that requires a motion of the House. It is an announcement on the part of the committee that they propose to make an application to the House under certain conditions in future. But as I understand it there is nothing in the report itself that requires any action on the part of the House.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. A distinct understanding was arrived at that that report should be moved to-day, and I do not think it is treating the House with due respect that the chairman should be absent.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I did not know there was any understanding. It occurred to me from the reading of the report at the Table that it was presented under a misapprehension, and that there should have been no report, inasmuch as the resolution reported to the House was a mere statement that at a future day, if necessary, the committee would apply to the House.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That was not the understanding arrived at in the committee or with the chairman of the committee. On the contrary, the chairman of the committee by a formal understanding made with gentlemen on this side of the House, expressly waived the obtaining of concurrence in the report in order that there might be a discussion on it here.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I will ask the chairman of the committee on it. I have not seen him since.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I think the form of the report was not the form the committee intended. The committee intended to report to the House asking power in certain cases to take the evidence of witnesses under oath, limiting the power to a greater extent than it had been the practice to limit it before. That was the view expressed by a majority of the committee, and it seemed to some members of the committee that, without initiation in the House, and without some declaration on the part of the House to depart from the rules as laid down before, that the committee ought not to have taken any action. If the report has been brought down in the form which the Minister says—I have not looked at it—of course, it would require a motion to take any action in the House upon what is stated in the report.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I would like the hon. member to look at the report, because as I read it, it does not in its present shape justify any action on the part of the House and it may not be what the hon. gentleman desires.

Mr. LAURIER. With regard to this report, I think the hon. gentleman will agree, that it had better be taken up for discussion to-morrow, if to-morrow will suit him.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Any day will suit me, as far as I am concerned, but I cannot see anything to adopt in the report, and I would suggest that the hon. gentleman should look at the report and see whether any action of the House adopting it or otherwise, would make the slightest difference in the matter of principle. What I understand is, that there was a decision on the part of the committee to do nothing in the direction proposed at that particular time, but that they should apply to the House when certain circumstances transpire. The report does not present any case on which the House can decide as between the two dividing parties in the committee, and, as well as I understand it, what is wished by the minority of the committee is, that the principle involved in the discussion upon that occasion, should come up for ratification or otherwise by the House; but the report does not present it in any way. If I remember the report correctly, it will settle nothing whatever to adopt it by the House. It is simply an announcement that the committee intended at some future day to apply for certain power.

Mr. LAURIER. But the report could be amended, or adopted, or rejected.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Of course it could, but there is no object in asking its adoption.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) There has been a strong contest in the Committee of Public Accounts on this matter, and the committee divided in opinion. A large portion of that committee voted to affirm the precedents which had been followed here from year to year for some time past as to the swearing of witnesses before the committee; another section of the committee desired to limit the powers of the committee in that respect, and presented a report with that limitation in it. I do not suppose that the House is prepared to have its ruling, which is in the archives, overridden by a committee. We submit, that the committee have, to a large extent, overruled the precedent and action of the House, and we desire to challenge the opinion of the House on that point. It was clearly understood that the chairman of the committee should present a report, not only of the resolution, but of the proceedings which led up to the passing of that resolution, and, when it was proposed that the action of that committee should be affirmed, it was understood that we should have the privilege of submitting a substantive resolution embodying our views, which heretofore have been the views of the whole House. The First Minister will see that it is nothing but fair that that should be brought up. If it is thought desirable to leave it until to-morrow, somebody on this side of the House will move to affirm the desirability of having the witnesses examined before the Public Accounts Committee, sworn on oath or affirmation. It is for the purpose of challenging the opinion of the House that we desire to have this opportunity. It is intolerable that the decision of the House should be overruled by the action of the committee, and that the House should not, by resolution or otherwise, assert its rights.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Of course, there are a dozen ways in which the ruling of the House can be had on the subject, and I merely invite attention to the report to see whether it contains the case for the House which the hon. gentleman expects. If the hon. gentleman finds that the report is such as to bring up the question which he refers to, we can take it either to-morrow or any other day agreed upon, and, if he finds it is not adequate to the purpose of bringing up the principle, let the committee amend it and make another one. There is no objection to discuss it on any day named.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman will see that in the committee, in order that the matter should be properly brought before the House, it was resolved, not only that the report should be presented in the form in which it was, but that the proceedings of the committee which led up to that report, should be presented to the House also, so that the House would be in possession of the main motion moved by my hon. friend from North York (Mr. Mulock), and the amendment moved by the hon. Minister of Marine, which was subsequently carried. Then it would remain for the House to decide what course to pursue—the general one that has been pursued hitherto, or the limited one now proposed.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. There was no resolution of the committee that the report should be presented on this particular day.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Oh, yes, there was a resolution moved by myself and carried by the committee.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I was referring to the report already presented. When the report comes down, we will agree upon a day.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) To-morrow?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Let us see the report first. We will have it printed in the Votes and Proceedings.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE TARIFF.

House again resolved itself into Committee of Ways and Means.

(In the Committee.)

Champagne and all other sparkling wines, &c., &c.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The Government requested the other day that certain questions of mine, respecting the probable loss of duty under the French treaty, should stand over. This would be a convenient time for giving the information, if they have it. The question I asked was, what was the estimated loss of revenue under the French treaty upon wine?

Mr. FOSTER. There can be no estimate given other than from the importations of past years. In 1891 the importations of wines, not sparkling and not over 26 per cent proof spirits, were in value $93,942; the duty collected was $52,407. The 30 per cent reduction would make a loss of $28,183. Then, there are imported for home consumption, champagne and other sparkling wines, to the value of $153,761. The duty collected amounts to $72,929. A reduction of 30 per cent ad valorem will leave $46,129. Those are the two classes of wines referred to in the treaty.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. In this statement, does the Finance Minister include wines simply imported from France?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What about the question as to whether wines of a similar character, imported from other countries, would not likewise be affected?

Mr. FOSTER. In the case of other countries, which have no favoured-nation treaties with Great Britain and us, if the wines imported from those countries fulfil those conditions as to strength and proof and quality, they would come in under the reduction of 30 per cent.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What loss would there be in that case?

Mr. FOSTER. I have not here the calculation as to that. The Customs Department is making it up.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That would have to be added to the estimated loss, as the matter stands?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes; I will have that to-morrow.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I do not want, at this stage, at any rate, to raise the other question to which I directed attention the other evening, but it is one of very considerable importance. That is, whether the favoured-nation clause has any bearing at all in the case of a reciprocal treaty. My recollection is that, after very full discussion here, the opinion was pretty freely expressed—and by the First Minister—that a reciprocity treaty did not bring the favoured-nation clause into operation, and there seems to me ground for that opinion.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The American rule has long been well settled that the most-favoured-nation clause is outside of a reci-procuity treaty altogether, and that where a treaty grants special terms, the most-favoured-nation clause cannot be applied for the purpose of getting in the products of another country upon the same terms as secured by the reciprocity treaty. There are some papers in which the English Foreign Secretary has expressed a different opinion, but when the treaty of 1854 was negotiated, the English Government at that time acquiesced in the American view, and I do not know that since then they have dissented from it.

Mr. FOSTER. The discussion on this point will be more opportune on the ratification of the treaty.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I merely mention the matter because we want a distinct opinion on it, and I do not want the question, which is of great practical importance, passed over on the ground that it has not been brought up, particularly as my recollection is strong that the First Minister expressed an opinion in conformity with that of the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills).

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I remember well the occasion the hon. gentleman refers to. The question was raised as to the effect of the treaty between Spain and the United States. The doctrine held by the United States Government is that the benefits derived under a reciprocity treaty are not extended to other countries having the most-favoured-nation clause, and that doctrine was established by a decision of their Supreme Court. On the other hand, the contrary doctrine has been held by the continental countries, and insisted upon, I think, by Great Britain, namely, that the most favoured nations do get the benefit of a reciprocity treaty.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I understood the Minister of Justice himself agreed on the American view.

Mr. EDGAR. I think we will have to abide by the British interpretation.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I presume so. We must always bear in mind, in dealing with the subject, what country we are making a treaty with of that character, because they will insist on their interpretation.

Mr. LAURIER. We are bound by the British interpretation, but suffer from the American interpretation. I understand that our merchants down below are suffering from that very ruling in American international law. In consequence of the treaty between Spain and Norway and Sweden advantages are extended to Spanish subjects in Cuba which are denied to British subjects. However, I will call the attention of the Government to another matter in this connection. Last year, on a question from the hon. member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar), the Government declared that if the treaty with France were ratified, it was not their intention to discriminate against other countries. The Government have decided to ratify the treaty, yet they maintain the existing tariff. In the treaty with France specific duties are maintained, but the ad valorem duties are removed, while both are retained in the tariff. Therefore, in the tariff there is to be a discrimination against other nations.

Mr. FOSTER. That would be the effect if it were only given to the most favoured nations.

Mr. LAURIER. Then you are going to discriminate in favour of France as against other nations by the ratification of the treaty.

An hon. MEMBER. It is discrimination against England.

Mr. FOSTER. England makes so many of these wines.

Mr. LAURIER. We should understand where we are. Since the treaty is to be ratified, it is to hold in favour of France exclusively. I do not make these remarks in any critical spirit, but want to know exactly where we are. I understand the treaty gives to France advantages denied to other nations, England included.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. All the matters relating to and affected by the treaty will be dealt with by the Bill for its ratification, whether as to wines coming from France or from most favoured nations or any other countries. But we propose to adopt the tariff as if the treaty were not in existence, because the Bill to ratify the treaty will have to go into force at a future date. It can only come into force after proclamation, and after it has been ratified by the other country.

Item agreed to.

Opium (crude), one dollar per pound, the weight to include the weight of the ball or covering.

Mr. FOSTER. I want to make one change there—to strike out all after the word "pound."

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is that for?

Mr. FOSTER. It makes the duty on crude opium $1 per pound on the opium itself.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That reduces the duty considerably?

Mr. FOSTER. It reduces it a little; I think it will reduce the duty about 15 per cent.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the object of that? What reason is there for altering?

Mr. FOSTER. The duty upon crude opium seems to be too high, taken in connection with the decreased duty in the United States. The proposed Bill in the United States reduces opium almost one-half.

Mr. LAURIER. Surely you do not consider the proposed Bill in the United States.

Mr. FOSTER. We have to in some cases.

Mr. LAURIER. The hon. gentleman did not know anything about it, and would not consider it with regard to agricultural implements. Now, when it comes to opium, he knows all about it. The hon. gentleman has had new light since the other day.

Mr. FOSTER. I have received a copy of the Bill since then.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). What is the loss of revenue?

Mr. FOSTER. About 15 per cent.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). What will be the amount of the loss?

Mr. FOSTER. I think there will be no actual loss of revenue.

Mr. CHARLTON. I hope my hon. friend is not taking a step which will increase the use of opium.

Mr. FOSTER. If it were putting a temptation in the way of my hon. friend, I would put the duty away up.

Mr. CHARLTON. I doubt the propriety of reducing a duty of that kind. I do not know but that my hon. friend is in as much danger as I am.

Item agreed to.

Opium prepared for smoking, five dollars per pound.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Why ought this to be imported at all? It ought to be prohibited. It is a most improper thing for the hon. gentleman to propose to encourage the smoking of opium. There has been a regular fight in every portion of the Christian world against a proposition of this sort, and it does seem to me a monstrous thing for the Government to encourage the use of opium, whether by the heathen Chinese or the Christian citizen. I think the hon. gentleman ought to propose the prohibition of this article. This item ought to be in the criminal law instead of being in the tariff.

Mr. CHARLTON. You ought not to sanction vice, or injustice, or anything wrong by law. You have no business to sanction opium smoking by law—my hon. friend is all wrong there.

Mr. FOSTER. I may say that last year the immense amount of half a pound was all that came in under this duty.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Does the hon. gentleman propose to allow this to stand?

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman probably did not catch what I said. I said that under this duty only half a pound was imported last year. So, it is practically as well as though the item were prohibited in the criminal law.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman does not retain it for the purpose of raising a revenue. It must be, then, a part of the other branch of the tariff and intended for the development of the industries of the country.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. No; it is to keep as far as possible from the free trade system.

Mr. McMULLEN. This is an exceedingly important matter. It seems to me quite clear that this item ought not to appear on the tariff list. The Finance Minister states that only half a pound was imported last year. Still the item as it stands leaves it open to those who wish to import it to do so. Some men may be so committed to the habit that they will have this drug, though they pauperize their families and themselves, to say nothing of having to pay $5 a pound duty. If it is the intention to prevent the importation I think it would be better to erase this item, and to declare that opium for smoking must not be imported under any circumstances.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Put it on the prohibited list along with obscene books.

Mr. McMULLEN. We ought not to leave this temptation in the way of the unfortunate victims of the opium habit. I move that opium for smoking be prohibited, that it be transferred to schedule "C."

Mr. CHARLTON. I beg to second that motion. And in doing so, I wish to say that if the duty of $5 per pound is intended to be a prohibitory duty, as undoubtedly it would be—any of the drug brought would be smuggled—still, the attitude of the Government would be much more respectable, and the Government would stand better in the estimation of the country if this article were placed upon the prohibited list. We do not want opium imported for smoking purposes, or the Government committed to the policy of permitting its admission to the country on any terms whatever.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. It would be better to move that it be struck off this list, and then move that it be added to the prohibited list when we get to that part. Mr. McMullen moves, seconded by Mr. Charlton, that the item "Opium prepared for smoking, $5 per pound," be struck off the list.

Mr. FOSTER. What I am to understand is that the hon. gentleman wishes to have free opium?

Mr. LAURIER. That is not the motion, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. FOSTER. That is the effect of the motion.

Mr. LAURIER. The motion was put at the suggestion of the Chairman and the Clerk to strike this off the list, the intention being to add it to schedule "C."

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman does not know that we shall ever reach schedule "C," but he takes good care that this is put on the free list.

Mr. LAURIER. The hon. gentleman's wrath is altogether out of place. The Chairman has not put the motion as it was presented—to strike this item out of this list, and add it to schedule "C." Therefore, I beg to call your attention, Mr. Chairman, to the fact that you have not put the motion as it is.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). I point out to the hon. gentleman that if he wishes to be consistent he must include crude opium also, because that can be brought in and chewed, if the bringing in of the other for smoking is prohibited. There is no difference in the result.

Mr. EDGAR. Will the hon. gentleman support it if it is moved?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). No, I will not; for the result will be that they will smuggle the drug in from the United States.

Mr. EDGAR. We will deal with opium for smoking now, and take up opium for chewing later on. I think, Mr. Chairman, we ought to have the motion put as it was handed in by the hon. member for Wellington (Mr. McMullen), because we have a clause in the resolutions we have passed referring to schedule "C," and it will be found on page 3 of the Corrected Copy, subsection 3, of section 13. In subsection 3, of section 2, it is provided:

That the importation into Canada of any goods enumerated, described or referred to in schedule 3 hereto appended, is prohibited, and that any such goods if imported shall thereby become forfeited to the Crown and shall be destroyed, and that any person importing any such prohibited goods, or causing or permitting the same to be imported, shall in each case incur a penalty of $200.

Now, I understand that is the provision under which my hon. friend desires to have this article come.

Mr. CHARLTON. After the unworthy motive attributed by the Minister of Finance to the Opposition in regard to this matter, I think we may insist that the motion be put as it was handed into the Chair, that is, that the article shall be taken from the schedule in which it stands now, and be put in schedule "C," on the prohibited list, and then the insinuation made by the Minister of Finance cannot be made. As a matter of order and convenience, we should adopt the suggestion made by the Chair, and by the Clerk of the House, that the article should be dealt with in the schedule where it stands now, and be stricken from that schedule, and then when we reach schedule "C," in the ordinary course of parliamentary practice, we would then put the article into that schedule. But if my hon. friend seeks to make capital, as he evidently desires to do, let us have the motion put as it is handed in, and say that this article shall be stricken from the place where it now stands and be placed upon the prohibitive list.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The wording of the motion, as put, is not according to rule.

Mr. EDGAR. What rule? Can we not make the wording so as to bring it under schedule "C," as found on page 3 of the resolutions we passed the other night? As the Minister of Finance has pointed out, if it is simply struck out and not put in schedule "C," it is made free.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. We have got a motion now that can be read, moved by Mr. McMullen:

That opium prepared for smoking be struck from the dutiable list, and transferred to the prohibited list.

Mr. FOSTER. Now that we have got a motion that will stand fire, we can proceed to discuss the question. Hon. gentlemen opposite object to the duty of $5 on opium, because they fear that under that duty, opium would be imported into this country, and used by the Canadian people, and they ask that it be prohibited. Shortly afterwards, a proposal was made to strike it from this list entirely, but if it were struck from the dutiable list entirely, it would become practically free.

Mr. CHARLTON. Such a proposal was not made.

Mr. FOSTER. If the motion was to strike it from the dutiable list, it would strike it from this list and make it 20 per cent, which is almost as good as free, certainly there would be no barrier against its importation. The fact is that $5 per pound is a prohibitive duty, as, according to the returns of last year, only half a pound was imported under that duty. Consequently, it is only a play upon words. You can put a duty upon a thing so great as to make it prohibitive, or you can transfer it to the prohibited list. Five dollars per pound is a prohibitive duty, and none can be imported under it, as shown by last year's record. If hon. gentlemen would rather have it prohibited entirely, or by name, instead of putting a duty upon it, it makes no difference, and I have no objection, for my part, which plan is adopted.

Mr. McMULLEN. When we pass a clause in an Act admitting opium under a duty of $5 per pound, we sanction the use of it by any person who desires to introduce it under that duty. It means that we are prepared to say that any man who likes to import it and pay the duty, has full liberty to do so, and with the sanction of this country.

Mr. AMYOT. Why not? Where is the authority to prevent me smoking opium if I like?

Mr. McMULLEN. We make it legitimate for any man to bring it into the country as long as he is willing to pay the duty, and the country sanctions by law the smoking of opium by any one who is willing to pay that duty. That is a principle I want to prevent being carried out under the revised tariff; and I say that we have a right to place it where it ought to be, and that is, on the prohibited list at once.

Mr. EDGAR. I suppose the hon. member for Bellechase (Mr. Amyot) must think that his personal liberty is threatened by the prohibition which appears in schedule "C," a little further on, which would prevent him from importing oleomargarine, or butterine, or other similar substitutes for butter, under a severe penalty.

Mr. AMYOT. Is the hon. gentleman not able to distinguish between smoking opium and eating false butter?

Amendment negatived on division, and item agreed to.

Live hogs, 25 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. FOSTER. The committee will remember that the other night I gave notice of certain amendments to the clauses which had been previously brought down. Instead of making that 25 per cent ad valorem, as I gave notice of doing, I want to change that to 1½ cents per pound. In the next item I want to strike out "beef, salted, in barrels," and insert in place thereof, "meats, n.e.s." I will give all the changes so that the committee can see them.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Perhaps the Finance Minister will now explain the reasons that led him to make the change from the original proposal.

Mr. FOSTER. The original proposition was to charge on live hogs 25 per cent ad valorem, and on salted meats 25 per cent. It will be remembered we had two schedules for salted meats. Barrelled pork, with not more than a certain number of pieces in the barrel, the intention being to include the heavy pork, was charged 1½ cents per pound, and on other salted meats 2 cents per pound. The 1½ cents per pound, instead of 25 per cent, would give at the prices which prevailed last year a shade higher duty, and the 2 cents per pound on other salted meats would give a duty a shade lower. But these meats vary in value. Barrelled pork sometimes runs down as low as $8 per barrel, and sometimes as high as $18. When it is high, 25 per cent ad valorem would give too high a duty, and when meats advanced to $18, 25 per cent would be a very high duty, and when the price ran down low it would take away from the protection which our farmers hope to enjoy. It is believed that 2 cents per pound all round, besides getting rid of the difficulty of distinguishing whether barrelled pork contained 16 pieces or not, will afford a more even and effective protection than the 25 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. MARTIN. The hon. gentleman has pointed out that the duty of 25 per cent ad valorem is too high when pork is at the price of $16 per barrel. The duty, however, would be just $4, which would be equal to 2 cents per pound.

Mr. FOSTER. I meant $18 per barrel.

Mr. MARTIN. Pork is very seldom $18 per barrel; but even then the duty would only be a trifle higher than what is now proposed.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I understand the hon. gentleman's proposal is that when pork sells at $8 the duty should be 50 per cent, which is a very excessive duty on an article of food.

Mr. FOSTER. The intention is that when salt meats are abnormally low, after having gone through all the manipulations of the Chicago market, the farmer shall still have a fair protection.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The farmer shall have a protection practically worth nothing, and at the same time be fleeced to any extent on a thousand other articles.

Mr. EDGAR. What is the average price per pound for live hogs?

Mr. FOSTER. The average value of live hogs imported last year, according to the Trade and Navigation Returns, was 9¾ cents per pound, but it was an abnormal price, because the duty on live hogs was 2 cents, and some very exceptional kinds of hogs were brought in.

Mr. McMULLEN. Does the Minister of Finance intend to convey to the House that hogs were of the value of 9¾ cents per pound live weight?

Mr. FOSTER. I intend to convey to the House that the hogs brought in last year were of the value of 9¾ cents per pound. That may astonish the hon. gentleman, but the cold fact is in the Trade and Navigation Returns.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The value shows that they were only breeding hogs.

Mr. TISDALE. Does the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) object to the increase in the tariff?

Mr. McMULLEN. I am not talking on that question at all. I am asking the Finance Minister if he really intends to convey to the House the idea that the value of live hogs is 9¾ cents per pound. Wherever he obtained his information, he is entirely incorrect.

Mr. FOSTER. I am not; I am entirely right.

Mr. McMULLEN. An average of 9¼ cents is beyond any price obtained.

Mr. GILLMOR. I object to the duty on hogs, either alive or dead. I think it is a most unjust and unfair tax against the poor people who consume pork in this country that they should be taxed 2 cents a pound on that article. If you go down to the corner of Elgin street, where I have been today and yesterday and see thirty or forty men there looking for work and the supplies of the winter gone, you will recognize that this duty is unjust. It is outrageous that these poor people should be taxed 2 or 3 cents a pound on the bit of pork they have to eat, whether it is to help the farmers or any other class of the people.

Mr. MACLEAN (York). As a protectionist, I desire to congratulate the Government on their return to specific duties, and especially do I congratulate them that they have taken this course in connection with the farmers' products, viz.: pork, meat, and lard. As a protectionist, I hold that specific duties are an essential part of a protective policy; in the first place, because they secure a proper collection of the duty; in the second place, because they afford a protection to the honest importer, against those who may try to evade the law by undervaluation; and in the third place, because they supply the best form of protection to our home manufactures and products. On that line, I repeat again, that I desire to congratulate the Government for returning to these specific duties, and I congratulate them all the more because they are returning to them in the interest of the farmers, and also, I trust, in the interest of the manufacturers. As a proof of my assertion that specific duties are in the interests of all the industries of the country, I wish to read a telegram from Toronto published in the Montreal 'Gazette' of this morning, which goes to show that the moment specific duties are withdrawn, Canada is, and will be made a slaughter market for United States products. This despatch says:

In view of the more general application of ad valorem duties under the present tariff, and the tendency at present in the United States to offer goods for consumption in Canada at prices much below their fair ordinary market value, the Collector of Customs here has been instructed to cause all invoices of United States vendors to be carefully scrutinized to the end that the collection of duty upon proper values be ensured. In any case where goods are invoiced as being job lots or in which the value is doubtful, the collector has been instructed to forward the invoice to the Customs Department, where the same will be examined and the necessary instructions will be forwarded to the collector.

Mr. McMULLEN.

Mr. CHARLTON. What has that got to do with hogs?

Mr. MACLEAN (York). That has to do with the general question of specific duties, and the farmers' product of hogs will be all the better for it. It is a very important question, and I am glad to see at the outset, that the Government propose to restore, at least, some of the specific duties and to retain their former policy in that regard, so as to benefit the farmers of Canada. I have also here an extract from a paper published in Winnipeg, called the 'Nor-wester,' which has undertaken to criticise what I said the other day in defence of specific duties. That paper says: "The farmers will not take kindly to the Government when they hear these views upholding specific duties." I contend that if the farmer is to have specific duties in connection with his products, that he cannot, and should not, object if the manufacturer has specific duties in connection with what he produces. I trust that when the Government come to these industries in which the specific duties have been removed, especially the woollen and the knitting industry, the wall paper industry, the small agricultural implement industry, and others of that kind; that they will endeavour in every case possible to return to specific duties. Another well-known newspaper, the Montreal 'Star,' has undertaken to criticise me because I uphold specific duties. They say:

That the main reasons for defending specific duties are, first, that it raises the tax as the taxpayer becomes poorer; second, that it discriminates in favour of the rich; third, that it fights against the effort of invention and genius to cheapen the food, clothing and necessities of the people, for, just in proportion as they succeed, it raises the percentage of taxation; fourth, that the effect of specific duty can be understood only by those who have a thorough knowledge of the business affected, and hence that it lends itself to deception and masked extortion.

I say that the facts are quite the contrary; that the farmers and every ordinary minded man can understand specific duties. As a matter of fact you can argue out specific duties on the platform, and every one can understand the question, but when you begin to talk about ad valorem duties the people become befogged and they do not see through it. The argument of this newspaper which has undertaken to dispute my contention in regard to specific duties is altogether beside the fact, and for its information, I would refer it to what is done in free trade England. It is a fact that in England every duty is a specific duty. There is not an ad valorem duty on the list in England. The tea which the poor man uses, costing 6 cents a pound, pays the same duty as that paid by the tea which cost 5 shillings a pound. In some cases the poor man's tea is dutiable at 75 per cent. Free traders in Canada are all the time crying out that the specific duties are unjust to the poor man. It is true in a way, but there are other items which enables the revenue to deal fairly with him, and I say, that the great bulk of the duties paid in this country and under this protective tariff, are paid on articles in the shape of luxuries, and that the poor man is justly treated in connection with our protective policy; especially do I wish to say: That he is fairly treated under the system of specific duty. I hope and trust that as the Government go along in the discussion of this tariff they will come back in every case possible to specific duties, because specific duties are in the line of protection, and this is a protectionist Government I hope, and a protectionist Legislature as well.

Mr. FRASER. I wish to have some information with regard to what the Minister proposes with reference to meats. Did I understand him to say that "meats, n.e.s., 25 per cent," would be struck out altogether. Then, we have remaining "meats, n.e.s., 2 cents a pound, and meats, fresh, 3 cents a pound."

Mr. FOSTER. On the fifth line, when we come to the words, "meats, n.e.s., including," I will ask to strike out these words and put a capital "C" to the word "canned," which follows the word "included."

Mr. FRASER. I would ask the Minister what would be the difference in duty between meats, n.e.s., at 25 per cent ad valorem and the same meats at 2 cents per pound?

Mr. FOSTER. That would depend on the price. If barrelled pork is $10 a barrel, 25 per cent on that would of course be a quarter of $10, but if it is 2 cents a pound, it would be $4.

Mr. FRASER. Has the Minister of Finance made any calculation covering a year or more to see how these two duties would work?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes; in reference to hog products salt, if you take the imports of last year under the two systems, on 1½ cents for part of it, and 3 cents for the other and put the whole at 2 cents, it gives just about the same revenue as last year's rates.

Mr. FRASER. I am glad the hon. member for York (Mr. Maclean) has put himself right with the newspapers who seem to be doubting the wisdom of his speech on this question. With that, however, I have nothing to do. I would rather congratulate the Government upon any changes they have made in the direction of ad valorem duties, and I trust that the Government will not go back from that which is in the best interests of the people. I want to call the attention of the Government to the duty on meats, and to say that as a prime necessity of life this duty is too high altogether. In all the lower provinces our fishermen have to purchase these meats, and this is a very high duty. I hold, in regard to the necessaries of life, the things men eat and the things men wear, that to put so high a duty upon them is neither in the interest of the revenue nor of the consumer. Are the men who produce meats as numerous as the men who use them? By no means. Salt pork and salt beef are supplies of the greatest possible importance to all the lumbermen and fishermen of the Dominion. I know that there is not a man in this House interested in the lumbering and fishing industries who does not agree with me that this duty is too high, and that it is an imposition upon men who do not get the largest possible returns from their labour. There are plenty of men wanting to work in the woods, who have to take such prices for their labour as they can get; and upon an article which is a prime necessity for them the Government imposes a duty of 3 cents a pound. The fishermen have to take their chances of bad harvests and good harvests in the sea, just as the farmers do on the land; and I am sure there is not a man here from the Maritime Provinces who, if he spoke the truth as he feels it in his heart, would not speak as I do. I suppose, however, that nothing can be done. It is an equitable system; it is in the interest of people whose votes are wanted; and it will be shown that in a certain way they get compensation. But you can never make a country great by taxing those things which men must eat and drink and wear.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Here are nine items with reference to meats, and the Minister of Finance has undertaken to explain some of them. But some it is very difficult to understand, without something being disclosed which we have not at the present time. For instance, meats, n.e.s., are put at 3 cents a pound; that would include beef; but mutton and lamb are put at 35 per cent ad valorem. Then canned poultry is put at 25 per cent, but poultry and game are put at 20 per cent.

Mr. FOSTER. Those are alive or not in cans.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Then what is the necessity of the distinction between beef and mutton? Why should there be a specific duty in one case and an ad valorem duty in the other?

Mr. FAIRBAIRN. They must be a very happy family on the Opposition benches. Some of them have been weeping and wailing for the farmer, and the moment something is done to assist him the others in the party do not want to see him assisted. I would like to ask the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies), to answer the hon. member for Guysboro' (Mr. Fraser). For my own part, as a farmer, I think I ought to raise my voice. The hog of this country has become a very important factor to the farmer; it is a valuable adjunct to the dairying cow; these are two of his great staple articles; and anything that will interfere with the great industry of raising these animals will be very detrimental to the farmer. The time has gone by when it was considered impossible to raise hogs in this country to supply the demand of the country. Now that the question is settled, I hope for all time to come, that the farmers of this country are capable of raising all the pork required, and are exporters rather than importers. This industry should be given fair protection. If it were not for what I know of the lower provinces, I would ask for greater protection; but I wish to be liberal, and, therefore, I say that the protection now on pork is quite enough, it is fair, and I hope there will be no change.

Item agreed to.

Mutton and lamb, fresh, 35 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Now, I suppose the hon. Minister can tell us why he preserves a specific duty in one case and an ad valorem duty in the other, and why the rate is so high?

Mr. FOSTER. The effect of the duty of 35 per cent will be to lower the rate on fresh mutton a little—very little; but it will be seen that sheep came in before at 30 per cent, and they came in under this, with animals living, at 20 per cent, so that the protection on each of them is somewhat reduced, and fresh mutton and lamb are made 35 per cent. more in accordance with live animals at 20 per cent.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Has the hon. gentleman been studying the American tariff? Can he tell us what their duty is on these articles imported?

Mr. FOSTER. Animals living have been put in the United States tariff at 20 per cent, and we have put ours at the same rate. Mutton and lamb and all fresh meats have been going through a variety of processes. They went up 25 per cent from the Wilson Bill; they were changed by the Finance Committee of the Senate; and I notice that after the Senate had sent in its first report, they again sent in an amendment making it at the present rate, if I remember rightly, of 20 per cent. All you can say about it is that it has gone through three or four changes by way of proposal without any change being actually made. But if it goes through at the Finance Committee's proposal, it will be 25 per cent.

Mr. MARTIN. The Minister of Finance has not yet explained why mutton and lamb are made ad valorem 35 per cent, and other fresh meats, including beef, remain at the specific duty of 3 cents per pound. Why should a specific duty be put on all kinds of fresh meat except these two particular kinds?

Mr. FOSTER. Both the sheep and lamb and the meat as well in this case are ad valorem.

Mr. MARTIN. Then why are all other fresh meats, including beef, put at a specific duty of 3 cents per pound? What is the reason for the distinction?

Mr. MARA. I should imagine the reason is to encourage the trade with Australia. Australian mutton can be imported into British Columbia very much lower than from the United States. British Columbia is the largest purchaser in the Dominion of sheep, and by the new line of steamers, established recently, mutton can be brought over from Australia and sold at a very much lower rate than if imported from the United States.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. How does that affect the question raised by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills)?

Mr. MARTIN. The question is why mutton and lamb are charged 35 per cent ad valorem duty, and all other fresh meats a specific duty of 3 cents per pound. The hon. gentleman says that possibly it is intended to make mutton and lamb cheaper, in order to encourage the Australian trade. I would point out to him that any attempt of that kind to encourage Australian trade in British Columbia is done at the expense of the farmer in Manitoba, who is a competitor with the Australians in the British Columbia market for mutton and lamb. I wish to find out whether that is the reason which induced the Government to make the change. But apparently neither the Minister of Finance nor the Controller of Customs, nor the two combined, are able to answer the question.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Shall this item be adopted?

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I put my question and have not yet got an answer.

Mr. FOSTER. I have answered the hon. gentleman quite satisfactorily. I find the hon. gentleman hard to please.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). If I heard the answer, I might consider whether it was adequate or not. But I have not heard any. In the first place, the hon. gentleman has put fresh meats, beef and pork, on the list at 3 cents per pound specific duty. Then he has put mutton and lamb at 35 per cent duty ad valorem. I do not know whether that is a higher or a lower rate, and I do not see any reason why the one should be a specific duty and the other an ad valorem duty. The hon. gentleman has not told us.

Mr. FOSTER. I thought I gave the hon. gentleman full information, and I think he must have been busily talking and did not hear. I dare say he will find, as we go through these items, where specific and ad valorem duties follow each other, that it may be sometimes quite difficult to see any general principle upon which the one is placed at a specific rate and the other at an ad valorem rate. But certainly it is not against his argument to charge the ad valorem duty. Sheep or lamb is placed at an ad valorem duty, and so is the flesh of the sheep or the lamb. In the case of mutton, worth 7 cents a pound, that gives a protection of about $2\frac{1}{4}$ cents per pound; and if worth 6 cents per pound, the protection is about 2 cents. The competition in fresh pork and beef is very much more keen in Canada with the United States than in mutton and lamb. If the hon. gentleman will look up the returns, he will find that the imports of sheep and lamb from the United States, in all the provinces, with the exception of one, is very small indeed. The chief importation is in the Pacific Province, where they have to bring in a large proportion of the lamb and sheep food that they use. The hon. gentleman knows that, for some time back, we have been cultivating trade with Australia. He knows that subsidized vessels are now running between the two countries, and a duty of 35 per cent gives a little better range for that trade between Australia and British Columbia. It is one of the friendly inducements which we held out to that trade, even in advance of the conference which is to take place in June, and from which we expect good results. At the same time, 35 per cent is a good protection for sheep-raisers in this country. Taking all these things into consideration, I do not think the House will be disposed to find fault with us for not having, on the one hand, given adequate protection, and on the other held out a friendly hand to our Australian brothers

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Mutton in Australia is worth about $1\frac{1}{2}$ cents a pound.

Mr. FOSTER. But it has a long way to come.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Does the hon. gentleman really pretend to say that we are going to encourage a big trade in Australian mutton by the imposition of the duty he proposes?

Mr. FOSTER. A little friendly competition in a certain kind of mutton.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It will be a little friendly competition. I see we imported $9 worth of mutton all told in the year of grace 1893. That is a valuable trade. It is likely to result as profitably as the hon. gentleman's other attempts to open trade with the ends of the world, and his other attempts to destroy really valuable trade which might be helped by assimilating the tariffs. He has been assimilating the tariff to that of the United States in a good many particulars. Here is an opportunity for him to show some good-will that will really mean something and will result in some good, by assimilating the tariff with that of the United States.

Mr. CHARLTON. I think this is not a question of great practical importance. We exported $1,088,000 worth of sheep last year, and, under these circumstances, we are not likely to import a great deal of mutton. I notice that the Finance Committee's version of the Wilson Bill puts sheep and cattle at 20 per cent, and fresh beef, mutton, &c., at 25 per cent. One is supposed to be the equivalent of the other. If that is a fair basis of calculation, my hon. friend the Minister of Finance seems to have arrived at some strange results.

Mr. FOSTER. I think that is a very low basis, if you try to equalize them.

Mr. CHARLTON. I imagine it would be. However, as I said, it is a question of no great practical importance, as we are large exporters of sheep, and have all the mutton we want. I do not think my hon. friend from British Columbia (Mr. Mara) will find a large importation of that from Australia. I do not think my friends from the North-west will find themselves very much interfered with by the importations.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I have been unable hitherto to understand how it was that we had specific duties in some cases, and ad valorem duties in other cases. But now we have obtained an explanation from the Finance Minister. It seems the hon. gentleman and his colleagues adopted the method of tossing up. If it turned "heads," it was a specific duty, and if "tails," an ad valorem duty. The hon. gentleman had no reason in the world, and simply decided it by the question of "heads" or "tails."

Some hon. MEMBERS. Carried.

Mr. MARTIN. It will be carried all the sooner, no doubt, if the hon. gentlemen will allow me to complete my remarks. The hon. Minister was very reluctant indeed to explain this matter. He got up and said he had explained this item, when he had made no explanation whatever.

Mr. FOSTER. I think I made some explanation.

Mr. MARTIN. No; the hon. gentleman failed to make the explanation he has just made. The hon. member for Yale (Mr. Mara) first made that explanation, and afterwards the hon. Finance Minister gave it to us. I think we now understand what it is, and I am quite unable to agree with my hon. friends on this side when they say that it will not have a considerable effect upon the British Columbia importations. It is intended to have an effect, and, whatever that effect may be regarding British Columbia, I would like to call the attention of the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), and the hon. member for Alberta (Mr. Davis), to the very direct effect it will have upon the ranchers and farmers in their districts. Mr. Chairman, the country in the North-west Territories is more particularly adapted to the raising of sheep and lambs and cattle, and the sheep and lambs that are grown there find their market almost exclusively in British Columbia. Now, the change in this duty, it appears to me, is a very radical one. I understand that it is to be levied upon the price of the sheep and lambs in Australia, which is about 2 cents a pound. Thus, the duty, instead of being 3 cents per pound, will be 6-10 cents per pound, or about one-fifth of what it is at present—a very radical change in the duty, I am sure, and practically an encouragement to the Australians as against the farmers and ranchers of the North-west. I may say, Mr. Chairman, that shortly before the House assembled I held some meetings in the North-west, and at one of these meetings hon. gentlemen opposite were represented by Senator Perley. At that meeting, this matter was very fully discussed, and one of the very great inducements held out by the hon. Senator to the farmers to give their support to the Government was the protection that the Government gave them as against the Australian farmers in the matter of lambs and sheep. Now, I beg to call the attention of the people of that part of the country, and of the hon. Senator, to the fact that hon. gentlemen opposite have abandoned that policy completely, have reduced the duty of 3 cents a pound upon sheep and lambs going into British Columbia to 6-10 cents per pound, or less. I cannot at all agree with the statements of hon. members on this side that this will not bring sheep and mutton into British Columbia from Australia. I am quite sure that the hon. member for Yale fully expects that it will bring sheep and mutton into British Columbia from Australia. This is another instance, Mr. Chairman, of the extreme difficulty of working a protective tariff in a country like Canada, which extends like a line from ocean to ocean. I do not blame the hon. member for Yale, and other British Columbia members, who seem to be acting in the interests of their constituents, for inducing the Government to make this very radical change. But I do blame the hon. member for West Assiniboia and the hon. member for Alberta, and other members representing the North-west Territories for having nothing to say on this very important question affecting their constituents. I am quite certain, Mr. Chairman, that when the matter comes to be discussed in those localities, as it will be after this House rises, the farmers there will regard it as a matter of very considerable importance to them, and they will believe that whatever British Columbia may gain will be their loss.

Mr. MARA. There is no radical change, Mr. Chairman. British Columbia has been in the past, a good customer of Manitoba and the North-west for sheep; and no doubt she will continue to be as large a purchaser as ever. But, besides her purchases in Manitoba and the North-west, British Columbia has been obliged at certain seasons to buy in the United States, when Manitoba and the North-west could not ship sheep that were fit for mutton. Out of $27,000 paid last year, British Columbia paid over $21,000; and nearly all that went into the United States. Surely the hon. member for Winnipeg will not—

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What did you pay $21,000 for—not on mutton, surely?

Mr. MARA. No; on sheep. The total amount paid for the year was $27,421, and of this British Columbia paid $21,498, in addition to purchasing some thousands of head from Manitoba and the North-west. But surely the hon. member for Winnipeg will not say that if it is in our interest to divert a portion of that trade from the United States to Australia, we should not do it; and this, I would presume, is what the hon. Minister of Finance and the Government intend trying to do. We will still continue to be purchasers from Manitoba and the North-west, but we have to purchase elsewhere when Manitoba and the North-west cannot supply us.

Mr. MARTIN. I do not care how much hon. gentlemen opposite divert trade from the United States to Australia, but I do care if, by means of their tariff, they divert trade now done by Manitoba and the North-west to Australia. I think the people of Canada are more interested in the farmers who are struggling to make a home in the North-west than they are in cultivating trade with Australia.

Mr. SPROULE. I was about to say that the hon. gentleman must have surprised the House, and his remarks will surprise the country, because, if he was correctly reported at the very meeting of which he spoke, when Senator Perley advocated the duty, the hon. gentleman took opposite ground and declared that this protection was of no benefit to the farmer, and that it was a mistake to say that it was a benefit. Now, he is blaming the Government because they happened to change that to a form of duty that may perhaps be a little lower. If I understand the hon. gentleman in his argument all along the line, it was that the Government were to blame because they had not lowered the tariff enough; to-day he wants it raised. He ought to take one ground or the other—either that protection is a benefit to the farmers and ought to be kept up, and he ought not to abuse the Government for keeping it up, or else he should say that protection is no benefit at all.

Mr. MARTIN. I did not say that the tariff on mutton and lamb was not a benefit to the North-west farmer; I said the benefit was a trifling one compared with the grievous hardships brought upon him by the general tariff.

Mr. MARTIN.

Mr. SPROULE. I say the hon. gentleman is reported in that speech as saying that protection was no benefit to the farmers whatever. Now he admits it is a benefit.

Item agreed to.

Lard and cottolene, 25 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. FOSTER. I want to change that to read, "Lard, lard compound and similar substances, and cottolene, 2 cents per pound," instead of 25 per cent ad valorem. The effect of this change is to give a little higher protection to lard, and it is to put lard compound, which is a cheaper substance than lard, under a higher duty, lard compound not being what you may call a pure lard, and yet come into competition with lard. It is not what you may call a natural substance. Cottolene is made with stearine, cotton seed oil, and lard. Cottolene bears pretty nearly the same price as lard. It is proposed to put the whole of them at 2 cents per pound.

Mr. TAYLOR. I see by the Trade and Navigation Returns that we imported last year for home consumption 745 pounds of lard, while we exported 709,624 pounds. Now, I think if this item read simply "lard" it would be quite sufficient. I have a notice on the paper to prohibit the importation of adulterated lard. If lard compound and cottolene are mentioned, we do not know what they may include. If we are to have these goods for table use, my opinion is that they should be manufactured in the country and under the supervision of the Inland Revenue Department. I do not think it right that they should be imported. We should prohibit the importation of adulterated lard as well as that of adulterated butter or oleomargarine. I think the Government would be acting in the interest of the farmers if they just left the item alone, mentioning lard only, and making no provision for adulterated lard. I fancy that lard compounds and cottolene do include adulterated lard, and they should be prohibited altogether.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman has that opinion, I know, but would it not be better to let this go as it is now? He can bring up his proposition later, and the House can discuss it; but in the meantime we must have some duty upon these articles or else they would come in at a less duty, and this is a duty which will have the effect of restraining importation from abroad.

Mr. MASSON. While not agreeing altogether with the member for Leeds (Mr. Taylor) that lard compounds should be prohibited, I think we should have a higher duty upon that article than upon ordinary lard. Lard compound and cottolene are cheaper in production, and they are brought into competition with the lard of the country; they are also brought into competition with lard compounds manufactured in Canada under certain supervision. I would suggest that the duty on lard compound, instead of being the same as upon lard, should be higher; it should be made to bear a specific duty.

Mr. FOSTER. If my hon. friend will take the prices into account, he will see that a specific duty of 2 cents on lard and on lard compound, while it gives protection of a certain amount to lard, will put a duty of 10 or 12 per cent higher on the other, because it bears a much cheaper price.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It is desirable that we should understand on what grounds the hon. member for Grey (Mr. Masson) is basing his objection. Is he basing it simply on the ground of its being a cheaper article, or is he basing it on the ground that it is an adulterated article, that it is so adulterated as to be injurious to health? These two questions should be dealt with on different principles. The fact that it is a cheaper article is no ground whatever for discriminating against it, but the contrary. The cheaper the article the better for the consumer. But, on the other hand, if the hon. gentleman were prepared to prove to the House that this article was adulterated in such a way as to be injurious, then there might be a fair case for applying some of the provisions we have made against dangerous adulterations in articles that may be used for food, or possibly prohibiting this article altogether.

Mr. MASSON. In respect to adulterations that are injurious to health, I would certainly agree with the hon. member for Leeds that they should be prohibited. But I was addressing my remarks more particularly to the class of compounds that are cheaper than lard, and advocating an increased duty or a specific duty on them as a matter of protection to the lard producers of this country.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I would like to ask the hon. gentleman how it is that when he made his Budget speech he proposed that a specific duty should be adopted in this case instead of an ad valorem duty; and then he deliberately made up his mind that a specific duty should be abandoned and an ad valorem duty substituted. Now the hon. gentleman proposes to abandon the ad valorem duty and to return to a specific duty. What gave the hon. gentleman the light that produced the first change, and what gave him the new light which leads him now to propose to go back again to the other form of duty?

Mr. FOSTER. It is pretty hard for me to explain to the hon. gentleman all the interior workings of the mind on these different articles. The reason for the specific duty was this, and I think it is very good: In the first place, with reference to lard compounds, the price is low, and the article is one which ought not to be on the same footing as pure lard, and therefore ought to have more restriction put upon it than pure lard has. Cottolene is a substance made up of stearine, cotton seed oil and a slight admixture of lard, which is used as a substitute for pure lard. Being of a lower price, the specific duty makes the incidence of the duty a little heavier. Two cents a pound is not too much for lard; it was formerly 3 cents, as my hon. friend will remember. There is difficulty in placing articles like compound lard and cottolene on ad valorem duties, and a specific duty on that class of articles is a good one in the way of protection, and it is necessary in the way of preserving the revenue.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. All those are matters which must have been before the mind of the Finance Minister just as much six months ago as they are to-day. The Finance Minister, after having a whole year to incubate his tariff, came down and made a formal proposition. I have no doubt the hon. gentleman has some good reasons for proposing the change.

Mr. FOSTER. I have given the reasons.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. gentleman has given his reasons for his original opinion this session, but he has not stated the reason why he abandoned the opinion at which he had arrived. The probable hypothesis is that the hon. gentleman has been bullied into this change by some supporter or other, or some deputation or other, and he abandoned his own deliberate judgment, calmly formed without pressure, in favour of some bully or other who has made it inconvenient for him to adhere to his own deliberate judgment.

Mr. FOSTER. That is very hard.

Mr. COCKBURN. It is very hard to assert that this change is to be ascribed to the Minister of Finance having been bullied by a deputation. At Chicago I took considerable trouble to obtain the facts in regard to compound lard, and in my opinion the tariff is a very fair one.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Did the hon. gentleman make these investigations since the Budget speech?

Mr. COCKBURN. No; but while in Chicago I took the trouble to inquire into the matter, and I think the tariff is a very fair one, and as has been remarked by the Minister of Finance, the taxation on compound lard and cottolene is higher than on lard itself.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman forgets how he cheered the propositions submitted originally by the Finance Minister. The Finance Minister announced several changes in favour of ad valorem duties, and the hon. gentleman joined in the paean of praise which was sung by hon. gentlemen opposite in regard to those changes. Now, the hon. Minister is going back to specific duties, and the hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Cockburn) says that this is just the right policy. So that while it was right to make changes in favour of ad valorem and abandon specific duties, the hon. gentleman now says it is right to abandon ad valorem and go back to specific taxation.

Mr. COCKBURN. I never for a moment took the ground that all duties must be either specific or ad valorem. I say that considering the circumstances of the country it would be impossible to change the tariff entirely to ad valorem duties, but at the same time I stated most distinctly that in regard to certain clauses it was impossible to levy ad valorem duties, and the only duties that could be levied on such classes were specific, and I think that the hon. gentleman will find the lard compound a very fair substitute for the lard itself, and at the same time considerably cheaper.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman is his own physician, but he might very well know that there are certain personal idiosyncrasies which would make the hon. gentleman's case very different from that of other parties. The hon. gentleman has told us that this change back to specific duties was a very proper change to make, but he has not told the committee how it was a very proper act to do now, and at the same time proper to propose an ad valorem duty three or four weeks ago.

Mr. MARTIN. The hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean) is the only hon. gentleman on the opposite side of the House who can congratulate himself on the stand he has taken on the tariff with respect to this particular matter under discussion. He is the only member who had independence enough to criticise the comments of the Finance Minister in making these changes. He came out boldly and said: I condemn the Government for abandoning the principle of protection by abandoning the principle of specific duties. The hon. gentleman in making that statement represented very powerful interests in this country, which feel very strongly that the abandonment of the specific duty principle is to a large extent the abandonment of the protective principle. I desire to draw the attention of the House to the fact that while only one hon. member, the hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean) was bold enough to stand up and condemn the Government for their abandonment of the principle advocated by them in favour of the principle advocated so long from this side of the House, the interests represented by that hon. gentleman were sufficiently strong and independent to bring the Government to time on the question, and so we have the Finance Minister going back to that policy which met with such approval at the hands of the member for East York (Mr. Maclean).

Item, as amended, agreed to.

Tallow, stearic acid and stearine of all kinds, n.e.s., 20 per cent.

Mr. McMULLEN. Why does the Finance Minister impose a duty of 20 per cent on stearine? It is not manufactured in this country, and at the same time is necessary for the manufacture of leather. Hides are free, and there is a large amount of leather manufactured here, and so stearine is absolutely necessary.

Mr. FOSTER. Under my present light I would rather that stearine should have a higher duty imposed on it than that proposed, and I may submit a proposition to the committee later. Stearine is manufactured here—the hon. gentleman is under the impression that it is not. A branch establishment of a New York firm has been established in Montreal, and has been making this article for the last year; the firm is now making it quite largely; and it is of an excellent article as well. Oleo-stearine, for use in filling leather, is included among the items on the free list.

Mr. GILLMOR. From what is stearine made?

Mr. FOSTER. From animal fat, which is softened by steam. When the oil is pressed out of it two substances are left, one, the refuse, which goes to the making of manure, and the other a hard, consistent fat, stearine. Stearine is used largely in making leather, also in manufacturing cottolene and lard compound.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Then the hon. gentleman is disposed to injure one manufacturer for the benefit of the other?

Mr. FOSTER. No.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Because this will be the raw material of some manufacture now in existence, and the hon. gentleman proposes to add to the tax for the benefit of some nondescript Yankee who has come in to start a new factory in Montreal.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman is too hard on his old-time friends and acquaintances. Besides, it would not have that effect. The amount of stearine used as lard compound or cottolene is by percentage a very small proportion of the whole. They have their protection. However, I will look into the matter, but I do not think they will be injured very much. It has proved a great advantage to put to a useful end fat, which otherwise would probably go to waste in this country, and the industry is performing a very good office in that respect.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I am anxious that the Minister of Finance should give us the probable effect on the revenue of these different changes. As we are at the end of what may be termed one class of articles, I would ask him to give us the effect on the revenue, by the way of gain or loss, with regard to these items.

Mr. FOSTER. I have not that paper with me now, but I will bring it down.

Mr. BOWMAN. Is stearic acid and stearine used by tanners, to come in free of duty as heretofore?

Mr. FOSTER. Stearine is to be the same as during the past few years.

Item agreed to.

Beeswax, 10 per cent ad valorem.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I have no objection that the Minister should reduce the duty on beeswax, but why does he do it?

Mr. FOSTER. I did it at the request of the bee men themselves. Their chief product is honey, and they use beeswax for making comb formation, and they asked that this should be done.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Why do you not put it on the free list, and not make two bites of a cherry?

Mr. FOSTER. It is well to have whatever little revenue there is in it. It was not kept separate before, and I cannot tell what the revenue was.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I apprehend that it is utterly insignificant, and, if you are going to make a compliment to the bee men, who are a very deserving class, and who are becoming a rather important element in some counties, you might as well go the whole hog and let them have their beeswax free.

Mr. FOSTER. I should not object to that, if they wished it; but it is dangerous sometimes to give a man more than he asks. They only asked to have it reduced by one-half, and they might resent it if we gave them more.

Item agreed to.

Soap, n.e.s., pearline and other soap powders, pumice, silver and mineral soaps, sapolio and like articles, 35 per cent ad valorem.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the effect of this?

Mr. FOSTER. That works out, so far as the duties are concerned, about in this way. We had before four items for soaps. The common brown-yellow soap, not perfumed, was 1½ cents per pound. We have made that 1 cent per pound. The next item was the perfumed or toilet soap, 10 cents per pound and 10 per cent ad valorem. That was a pretty high duty, and it has been thought better to make that an even ad valorem duty and add to it the class of soap powders and all these compounds, which result is a reduction of the duties upon these soaps and soap powders from about 41 per cent to 35 per cent.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). What is the sum total of the revenue?

Mr. FOSTER. About $64,000 last year, and on the same importation it will probably be about $54,000.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. As I understand it, this is one of the articles which is likely to be affected more or less by the French Treaty.

Mr. FOSTER. Only castile soap.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the amount of loss on that?

Mr. FOSTER. The duty last year on the importation of castile soap from France was $5,132, and that would be, under the treaty, reduced by half. The loss would be $2,566. I think there is very little castile soap comes from any other country than France.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman has three rates of taxation on soap—two specific duties and one ad valorem. Why not class them all under an ad valorem and have a proportionate rate?

Mr. FOSTER. The specific duty was kept on castile soap for other reasons, it may be, but there was one sufficient reason: that we had a duty when the treaty negotiations were going on, and the condition of the treaty was that that should be reduced one-half. Therefore, we keep the duty exactly as it was, so that, when the reduction was made, it would be half the duty. The common, or laundry soaps have a specific duty because they are all low grade, and the brands or varieties of them are not well defined, and, when there was an ad valorem duty on these common soaps before, it was almost impossible to arrive at their value. A brand would be made particularly for this country, and you could find no market value for it in another country. Being low grade soaps of very low prices comparatively, the specific duty is kept on them as being the most easily worked and less provocative of fraud on the revenue. The other soaps at 35 per cent are well defined. They are of a higher value, and the possibilities of undervaluation will not at all be anything like what they would be on the common soaps.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). What would be the average value of these higher-priced soaps?

Mr. FOSTER. They run from 6 cents up to 30 or 35 cents; 32½ cents was the average value of the perfumed soaps. It will be remembered that the duty was high, and only the very best class of these came in.

Mr. MARTIN. It may be very well for the Minister to give that reason, but the real reason, or a very strong reason, for continuing the specific duty on common soap, is, that so far as Manitoba and the North-west are concerned, the specific duty on common soap is a very heavy burthen. The result is, that the soap manufacturers in eastern Canada have a monopoly of the market in Manitoba and the North-west, except so far as we have some local soap factories there. We ought naturally to import our soap from the United States, where soap is made cheaply and is very much nearer to us. And the heavy freight rate would not bear so much against the country, if we could import from the United States. The hon. gentleman's explanation will not at all go down with our people. It may sound very nicely here, but the real reason is, that the Government want to keep the market of the North-west for the soap manufacturers of eastern Canada.

Mr. FOSTER.

Mr. FOSTER. I am much obliged to the hon. gentleman for interpreting my reasons. I gave a reason that was the reason. He gave a supposition; that is all right.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. gentleman gave proof, because he knows, having been an attentive observer of the working of the tariff as regards Manitoba. It is known that one of the greatest difficulties in the way of settling Manitoba has been the injurious operation of our enormously high tariff on the necessaries of life for the people there. This article of soap is a necessary of life for decent people, as all the settlers in the North-west no doubt are, and the tax upon it is a peculiarly improper one to inflict upon the unfortunate housewives of that region. There is not the slightest doubt that my hon. friend is right, that this tariff, all through, though not perhaps designedly, has been in its working one of the main causes, and it will continue to be one of the main causes, of the disastrous failure of our efforts to settle the North-west. Over a hundred millions of public money, or if you include the interest, one hundred and fifty millions, have been spent there, with the miserable result that I believe we have not added ten thousand families to the population of Manitoba in the past ten years; and one of the main reasons is just such taxes as this. You cannot improve the position of the people of Manitoba or add a cent to the prices they obtain for their wheat or other products; but you can grind them down by taxation.

Mr. WALLACE. If the hon. gentleman were as careful an observer of the prices of soaps as he is of the North-west, he would have ascertained that while the duty on the finer soaps is 35 per cent ad valorem, this duty of 1 cent per pound on the commoner kinds amounts to exactly 17½ per cent, or just one-half of the rate on the higher and better classes. On the importation of last year the average price was 5½ cents per pound, on which 1 cent per pound is equal to about 17½ per cent.

Mr. McMULLEN. The hon. gentleman is either under a wrong impression, or he is attempting to mislead the House. He knows perfectly well that the soap used in Manitoba and the North-west is manufactured in Ontario, and he knows, or he ought to know, that the average price is nothing like 5½ cents a pound, but more like 3 or 3½ cents a pound at any factory.

Mr. FOSTER. That is all rosin.

Mr. McMULLEN. I know better. The hon. Minister is not posted either.

Mr. WALLACE. The English soaps that came in under that class averaged 5½ cents per pound, and the lowest price I have heard of was 5 cents.

Mr. MARTIN. It is not the price in England, but the price in the United States, that I am speaking of. If the statement of the hon. Controller of Customs is correct, I would like to ask him if he would change this duty from 1 cent a pound to 17½ per cent?

Mr. MARA. I would like to ask the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) what necessity there is for Manitoba importing soap, when there are hundreds of thousands of head of cattle running over the prairies of Manitoba and the North-west. The hon. member may not be aware of the fact, but Manitoba, instead of importing soap, exports soap, and ships soap to British Columbia.

Mr. MARTIN. The hon. gentleman may think he knows more about Manitoba than I do.

Mr. DALY. He could not know less.

Mr. MARTIN. That is the hon. gentleman's view, I know, but it is not apparently the view of the people in Manitoba itself.

Mr. DALY. It is the view of the people of the largest constituency there.

Mr. MARTIN. Will the hon. gentleman stake his reputation on the statement that Manitoba does not import any soap?

Mr. DALY. I will not; but Manitoba does export soap.

Mr. MARTIN. I did not say that it did not export soap; but it imports a large quantity of soap from eastern Canada.

Mr. AMYOT. It pays no duty on that.

Mr. MARTIN. The reason we pay no duty is that the duty is so high that we cannot get any from the United States. We do not pay duty to the Government, but we pay it to the manufacturer. In any grocery store in Manitoba you will find Manitoba soap, no doubt, but you will also find the common laundry soap manufactured in the eastern provinces. While I hope we shall manufacture more soap in Manitoba, in the meantime this is a heavy tax upon the people there; and, if the hon. gentleman's figures are correct, he would not injure the manufacturers by making the duty 17½ per cent. What is the use of the hon. Controller of Customs quoting the price of soap imported from England? We do not import laundry soap from England; but we could import it from Minneapolis, St. Paul and Chicago at a price, I venture to say, of about 2 cents a pound. This duty is equivalent to 50 per cent, so far as Manitoba is concerned.

Item agreed to.

Castile soap, mottled or white, and white soap, n.e.s., 2 cents per pound.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Will not the wording of this item lead to complications? Does this apply to castile soaps alone, or does it refer to other soaps as well?

Mr. FOSTER. No, to castile soap.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). The item does not read so.

Mr. FOSTER. I think we might drop out the words, "and white."

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). What is the estimated change in the revenue in the way of gain or loss on soaps?

Mr. FOSTER. Sixty-four thousand dollars under the old, as against $53,000 under the new tariff, on the same importation.

Item agreed to.

Glue and mucilage, 25 per cent ad valorem.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What amount of loss of revenue do you anticipate, if any, under this item?

Mr. FOSTER. That is a reduction of duty of some $8,000 or $10,000 on the whole.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. In making that estimate, is any allowance made for the increased import which may follow the reduction of duty?

Mr. FOSTER. No; could not make any estimates.

Condensed milk, condensed coffee, condensed coffee with milk, (not sweetened, 35 per cent; sweetened, 1½ cents per pound and 35 per cent), milk foods, and all similar preparations (30 per cent), including preserved ginger (35 per cent), 30 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. FOSTER. I gave notice of a change in condensed milk. The rest of the item remains, but condensed milk I wish to make at 3 cents per pound.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Why is the hon. gentleman going back on his better and earlier thoughts?

Mr. FOSTER. The duty on condensed milk before was 1¼ cents per pound and 35 per cent. In the revision it was cut to 30 per cent, which was a very large reduction. In looking over the matter, whilst 30 per cent was a sufficient protection to condensed milk of a standard quality, it was not sufficient against condensed milk coming in from the United States of low qualities, with reference to which the consumer could have no guarantee at all, and the exporting houses being distant from this country and having no particular reputation to lose, care not what became of their next exports so long as they got rid of what they were then trying to get out of the country. This may not be adulterated, but simply milk lacking in the qualities of sustenance. And whilst the standard milk sells at $5 to $7 per case, this is offered for sale as low as $4 and $3.40 per case. So that while 30 per cent is sufficient protection for the higher, and consequently good grades of condensed milk—and no one in this country wants anything else—3 cents per pound specific duty is a bar against the lower grades, and amounts to no more than 30 per cent on the good standard grade. It is a protection to the consumer of milk in this country and does not raise the duty on good milk.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) There is only one factory in the Dominion.

Mr. FOSTER. There are three. My hon. friend is not well up in the industries of the country.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I am well up in that particular one. The hon. gentleman will find that the main one is at Truro. I do not follow the hon. gentleman's argument, because I see by the Trade and Navigation Returns that the total quantity imported was only $3,071 last year, showing that the protection was sufficient to prevent large importation.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, if we keep the same protection.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) You propose to increase it.

Mr. FOSTER. The protection was 1¼ cents per pound and 35 per cent.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Only in the case of sweetened.

Mr. FOSTER. There is no difference in value between the two.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. There are two totally distinct duties: condensed milk, not sweetened, 35 per cent; sweetened, 1¼ cents per pound and 35 per cent. There may be no difference in the duty now proposed and that on the old sweetened condensed milk, but there is an enormous difference in the case of the non-sweetened. Three cents per pound on non-sweetened is a very heavy duty.

Mr. FOSTER. Not any heavier than on the sweetened. Before we made the reduction on the sugar duties, these differences were made between the sweetened and non-sweetened articles because of the increased value given to them by the high prices of sugar. After the scaling down of the sugar duties, there was no change made in the condensed milk sweetened, and consequently it was charged the duty that obtained before when there were high duties on sugar. If you will inquire, you will find there is practically no difference in the cost between the condensed milk sweetened and the condensed milk not sweetened, so that 3 cents per pound is no higher protection on the one than on the other.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I do not quite see that, but will waive that for the moment. The hon. gentleman said that the good qualities of condensed milk range from $5 to $7 per case. What is the weight of a case?

Mr. FOSTER. Forty-eight pounds, that makes the duty $1.44 exactly.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. In this case there is the objection to specific duties that if it becomes possible, as it may, to produce condensed milk at a lower rate, the specific duty may become equal next year to an ad valorem duty of 50 or 60 per cent.

Mr. FOSTER. It is not within the range of possibility that there will be so much difference as that. Milk is a staple article and so is sugar, and the cost of making the condensed milk will remain about the same. At the same time this will prevent fraud. If a person who goes to a store to buy condensed milk, buys it just according to cheapness, he may get a very inferior article. But the specific duty operates against the inferior article, while on a good, fair quality it gives no greater protection than 30 per cent, and on an excellent grade not quite that.

Item agreed to.

Apples (40 cents), forty cents per barrel, including the duty on the barrel.

Mr. MARTIN. I have to protest against this duty on apples. It bears extremely hard upon Manitoba and the North-west. I may say that apples cost there from $3 to $5 a barrel. We are quite unable to grow any apples in that country and never expect to grow them. It seems to me very unfair discrimination against us to have such a duty upon fruit which we have to import. Of course it is, to a certain extent, a protection to the Ontario farmer, but I fancy that, even in the matter of apples alone, the Ontario farmer will find it to his interest to let that country get people into it for then the people will be able to buy more apples, even if they cannot pay a high price for them. In fact, Manitoba and the North-west, if put in such a position as to be able to get in some people, might become a very large and profitable market for the apples of Ontario. But in the meantime, a specific duty of 40 cents a barrel upon that fruit is nothing but a great extortion from the people of that country.

Item agreed to.

Potatoes, 15 cents per bushel.

Mr. CHARLTON. How much revenue is expected to result from a tariff on potatoes?

Mr. FOSTER. I can give that information later on; let the item go in the meantime. This is intended for the benefit of Prince Edward Island.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Thank you for nothing.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Carried.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Wait a moment; we are not going to take all these statements on trust.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I understood the hon. gentleman was to have the information later on.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. We want the answer now.

Mr. CHARLTON. I want the farmer to have all the advantages he can get out of this tariff; but I do not want him to be deceived by supposing that he is getting something that he is not getting.

Mr. FOSTER. Last year the Customs receipts on potatoes were $7,900.

Mr. CHARLTON. Into what portion of the country were these potatoes imported?

Mr. MARA. Chiefly into British Columbia—early potatoes from the United States.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I suppose the hon. member is satisfied to pay that.

Mr. MARA. It encourages home production, and those who can afford to buy early potatoes, can well afford to pay the duty.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) It is a great shame to tax seed potatoes anyway.

Item agreed to.

Provided, That green or ripe apples, beans, buckwheat, pease, potatoes, rye, rye-flour, hay and vegetables, n.e.s., or any of them shall be free of duty when imported into Canada from the country of production, if such country whence any of the above products are imported imposes no duty on like products imported thence from Canada.

Mr. CHARLTON. I would like to ask the Government whether they have taken any steps to bring before the American Government during the discussion of the Tariff Bill in Congress, their readiness to make reciprocal arrangements of this kind; or have they left the American people to find it out as best they might after our Tariff Bill was submitted to Parliament? This is a kind of an offer of reciprocity; but I think the country would be interested in knowing whether the Government has had any agent in Washington, or has made any efforts whatever to induce the American Government or people, in view of their being willing to make reciprocal arrangements, to lower their tariff rates, and whether they have taken any steps to approach the American Legislature in that matter?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I may say, Mr. Chairman, that communications were indirectly made with the United States Government to the effect that Canada would be glad to know of any desire or willingness on the part of the United States Government to take measures toward the extension of trade between the two countries, and that Canada would be willing to reciprocate, with due regard to the interests and industries of Canada, and with due regard to the revenue which would be necessary to Canada. At a subsequent stage, an officer of this Government went to Washington for the purpose of seeing whether it was the desire of the United States Government, or of the committee then having charge of the subject in the House of Representatives, to enter into communication with the Government of Canada on the subject of tariff concessions on either side of the line; also, for the purpose of ascertaining whether information was desired with regard to the trade of Canada, or whether they desired the agent to be a medium of communication for the purpose of receiving information to be given on the part of the American Government, or the committee having the matter in charge. And the impression derived from his visit there was that it was not considered desirable that communications should take place between the two Governments with regard to the consideration of any tariff in the United States, or with regard to their tariff arrangements; that if communications were to take place with regard to reciprocity, they should take place between the two Governments, that of Great Britain, and that of the United States through the medium of the ambassadors of the two countries; and that, as regards the tariff arrangement, tariff discussions then in progress, the tariff was being made for the United States, and for the United States only.

Mr. CHARLTON. The right hon. leader of the Government tells us that steps were taken "indirectly." They must have been quite indirect I think. He says also that afterwards the Government had sent an agent to Washington, or had communicated with the Washington Government, and had received the impression that the American Congress were not ready to consider negotiations with reference to reciprocity. Now, I think, Mr. Chairman, that the country had a right to expect something more. There was a change of Government at Washington, a party came into power there avowedly determined largely to reduce the tariff burdens resting upon the people, a Government whose policy, as outlined by their platform, was to approach free trade, and a Government avowedly favourable to more extended trade relations with surrounding countries. The people of this country had a right to expect, not that the Government would make indirect advances—and they must have been very indirect—not that the Government would send some unauthorized agent to go in a private capacity and sound the state of public opinion, and then return with the report that, in his opinion, it was not a proper time to open negotiations, but direct action. This Government ought to have taken steps at the very outset, when the Democratic party came into power, a party from whom they had a right to expect that we could secure favourable trade relations. The duty rested upon them to initiate the proceedings for attempting to negotiate a treaty. And the initiatory steps of those negotiations ought not to have been indirect; they ought not to have been of a character that would leave the Government to surmise that it was improbable that the United States Government would listen to its proposal, but they should have been overtures made in the broad light of day, overtures made by accredited agents of the Government of Canada, acting in the name and by the authority of the British Minister at Washington. And the Government should have ascertained definitely whether proposals for reciprocal trade would be entertained by the American Government, and whether they would be able to secure any of these concessions. It is my belief that a golden opportunity slipped through their hands. It is my belief that this Government could have secured favourable trade relations with the United States, if they had been desirous of so doing, and had openly and candidly and honestly made the overture and had attempted in good faith to secure these advantages. Sir, no man conversant with the question believes that the Government acted in good faith in attempting to secure such overtures, and these proposals contained in this tariff are a mere blind to lead the people of Canada to believe that the Government are favourable to obtaining that which they do not want to obtain, which they have never attempted to obtain, but which they might have obtained, if they had made an honest effort to do so.

It being Six o'clock, the committee rose and the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

House again in Committee of Ways and Means.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. McMULLEN. Before proceeding with the item under consideration, I want to draw attention to a statement made to the committee before recess. The Controller of Customs stated to the House that the price of soap, the ordinary kind of soap used by the agriculturists, was $5\frac{1}{4}$ cents per pound. The Finance Minister corroborated that statement. I took the opportunity, since the committee rose, of interviewing a merchant, who produced to me an invoice, and I say now that the wholesale price of soap by the dozen boxes is, for the lowest grade, $2\frac{1}{2}$ cents a pound, and for the best laundry soap, 4 cents a pound. That shows how well the Controller of Customs and the Finance Minister are posted with regard to the price of these items.

Mr. CHARLTON. When the committee rose, we were discussing what we may term the reciprocity clauses in this Bill, and the right hon. the leader of the Government has made to the House a statement with regard to the lack of overtures, I think I may fairly term it, on the part of the Government of Canada for the purpose of obtaining reciprocal trade relations with the United States. The Government, no doubt, will claim that the propositions made in this tariff Bill are of the character of an overture for reciprocal trade relations, and will, no doubt, claim that all that can be expected of them as a Government are contained in these propositions. Now, I wish to point out to the committee that these do not even go so far as the old proposals of the Government to obtain reciprocal trade on the lines of the treaty of 1854. These propositions are not even propositions in reciprocity in natural products. Let us examine them for a few moments and see what is the character of the proposals contained in this Bill. We have it stated, that the duties will be upon apples so much, and so much upon beans, buckwheat, pease, potatoes, rye, rye flour, hay, vegetables, barley and corn, with a proviso that any of these articles shall be free of duty when imported into Canada from the country of production, if such country whence any of the above products are imported imposes no duty on like products imported into such country from Canada. Now, this is the extent of the Government proposition for reciprocity in natural products—reciprocity in apples, in beans, in buckwheat, in pease, in potatoes, in rye, in rye flour, in hay, in vegetables, in barley and in corn. Now, I wish to draw the attention of the committee to the fact that in this entire list there is but one article that is an inducement to the Americans to grant reciprocity, there is but one article on the list that we import from that country in any considerable quantities, and all the other articles mentioned on this list are articles that we sell to the United States, sell to them in large quantities, and for some of these articles we find almost our exclusive market in the United States. Now, this is an offer of reciprocity that the hon. gentleman well knows never will be accepted, it is not a reciprocal offer at all. It is a proposition to the United States that, if they will give us ten points, we will give them one; that is what it amounts to.

Mr. SPROULE. How many points did they offer us in their tariff?

Mr. CHARLTON. Well, we have never taken pains to find out. The charge against the Government to-night is, that they have never made a proposal, that they have never made an attempt, that they have never made an overture, and they now come down with a proposition in their tariff Bill which is a mere mockery, and offer to give to the United States one point, if the United States will give to us ten points. Everything in connection with this matter points to the fact that the Government have sufficient regard for the interest of their clients, the manufacturers, to deter them from any honest attempt to obtain reciprocity. They never have made such an attempt, they never will make such an attempt, and wherever they have professed to make such an attempt, they have been deceiving the people, and have been acting, not in a 'bona fide' manner, but in a manner which we may fairly characterize as political chicanery. Now, let us look over this list. The first article is apples. Now, how many apples are we likely to import from the United States? Last year our exports of green apples amounted to $2,731,000, and we exported of that amount to the United States, $447,000. The balance of trade is in favour of Canada in the matter of apples. We are not importing apples from the United States; we are exporting apples, we are a large exporting country of apples; so the reciprocity offer in apples to the United States amounts to nothing. Next, with regard to beans. Last year we exported $355,000 worth of beans, and of that quantity we exported to the United States $351,000, almost our entire export; and, although I have not looked up the Trade and Navigation Returns, I venture to say that our import of beans from the United States was 'nil.' So that is an offer which is entirely upon our side. Next, with regard to buckwheat. We import no buckwheat from the United States; we are an exporting country, so far as buckwheat is concerned. With regard to pease, we exported last year, $2,441,000, and of that amount we exported to the United States, $422,000. We do not import pease; we produce pease in excess of our consumption, and consequently an offer of reciprocity in respect of pease is an offer that has no advantage in it for any country to which we make that offer. Next, with regard to the offer of reciprocity in potatoes. Last year we exported of potatoes $421,000 worth; of this amount we sent to the United States $259,000. I am told by an hon. member from British Columbia, that our imports of potatoes was $7,000 worth, early potatoes, imported, probably, from the Sandwich Islands into British Columbia before potatoes were ready for use in that province.

Mr. FOSTER. What he told you was that the duty was $7,900.

Mr. CHARLTON. Very well; let it be the duty. How many bushels will it amount to?

Mr. FOSTER. To more than 70,000.

Mr. CHARLTON. Even if it did, it was an importation of potatoes from a tropical country, the same as an importation to New York from Bermuda before the potatoes in the country that produces them in abundance are ready. The next is with respect to the offer of reciprocity of rye. We do not import rye, we export rye. Next we have an offer of reciprocity in hay, forsooth. How much hay do we import? We exported last year hay to the value of $1,452,000. Of that we sent to the United States in value $854,000, and yet we offered the Americans reciprocity in hay. This is the kind of offer we are making them in reciprocity. And next we offer them reciprocity in vegetables. How many vegetables did we import? Last year we exported to the United States vegetables to the value of $105,000, out of $116,000 worth of total exports. What advantage is it to the United States to have reciprocity in vegetables with Canada? We now come to the question of barley. Last year we exported barley to the value of $944,000. Of that amount we sent to the United States $638,000 worth. Before the McKinley tariff went into operation our barley exports to the United States reached the value of nearly $5,000,000, almost 10,000,000 bushels having been sent. In all these articles the offer of reciprocity is a sham and a delusion; we are sellers, not buyers; we are exporters, not importers, and the only thing we offer to the United States as a quid pro quo, the only advantage whatever in this list is Indian corn. If they will admit apples, beans, buckwheat, pease, potatoes, rye, rye flour, hay, vegetables and barley, all those products of our farm free of duty, then we will admit Indian corn into Canada free. What kind of reciprocity is that, I should like to ask the Finance Minister? Does he suppose that he can deceive the people of Canada with this kind of humbug? He has deceived them before, but not with such a palpable humbug as this. The people were deceived in 1891 by a false statement, a statement made by the Government to the effect that they were negotiating a reciprocity treaty, by a statement that they had obtained reciprocity, and they wanted a Parliament fresh from the people, to pass upon it, and not a moribund House, and they went to the country on that statement, and they secured the credence of the country. The people were led to believe that their statements were true; they took the Government at their word, and placed them back in power. But this is not that kind of offer, this is a transparent sham, it is one that bears on its face its own refutation as a bona fide attempt to get reciprocity, it is an offer of reciprocity that, if the Americans will give us free importations of nearly all the products of our soil, we will give them the advantage on a single article. I think it is about time we had done with this kind of work. I think the farmers of this country have been deceived, and cruelly deceived by this Government with respect to this matter long enough. Our farmer understands that free access to the American markets would be a great boon. He knows that if the articles enumerated in this tariff Bill were admitted into the American market free of duty it would be of enormous advantage. But I think he will have intelligence enough to understand also that the mode in which the Government propose to secure that advantage for him is a mode that must fail of success; it is a mode that if the Government have ordinary intelligence they know full well must fail of success. They have no reason to suppose that such an offer would ever be entertained, and if they have no reason to suppose so, or if they well know it will not be entertained, what is the use of putting it in this Bill, what is their object, what purpose do they propose to gain? Evidently their object is deception; it is to deceive the farmer, to make him believe again that they are moving on the same lines, and attempting to obtain reciprocity, that they are using their best efforts with the perfidious Americans, our bad neighbours, with whom we should have nothing to do. They will say: We have made an offer, and have attempted to obtain reciprocity from those people, but we could do nothing with them, and it is no use talking about trade enlargement, it is out of the question, and cannot be done. I do not think it is worth while pursuing this matter any longer. Here is the offer, and I again pronounce it a humbug and a sham, and I repeat that if the Government do not make this offer purposely to deceive, they betray the grossest ignorance in placing this offer in the present Bill.

Mr. SPROULE. If there is one thing more than another for which the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) is noted, it is for the strength and extravagance of his language. The next characteristic for which he is noted is his invariable rule of advocating and defending the interests of the United States. I do not wonder that it was accidentally announced to this House, and spoken of elsewhere, as the member for the United States instead of for Canada, because he makes a special plea in every instance on behalf of that country. So much is this the case that one almost wonders that the hon. gentleman should condescend to live in Canada, or to remain in a country in which he finds both the Government and the people so entirely wrong. The hon. gentleman has seen fit to give the Government a lecture, because their offer was not sufficiently broad and extensive. What has that great and liberal country, which he invariably upholds, made as an offer to this country, and how much more extensive is that offer than the present one? They attempted to revise their tariff, and they made an offer to us of a somewhat different character, but in regard to which we heard no complaints from the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton). How much better is that offer than that embodied in this tariff to-day? The Americans offered to exchange buckwheat, corn, corn meal, rye, rye flour, wheat and wheat flour, an offer very much on the same lines, and on some of which lines an exchange would be of no value to this country. If they were so illiberal as to present that very limited list, one by which Canada would not have probably benefited in the event of an exchange being made, why should the hon. gentleman have been so severe on this Government because they have gone a little further and done a little better? I think the hon. gentleman would be much more in harmony with the views of his constituents and the people at large if he would endeavour to stand up more for his own country and a little less for the United States. The hon. gentleman every time the reciprocity treaty question has been under consideration had given a new version with respect to the want of sincerity on the part of members of the Government and their efforts to negotiate a treaty with the United States. The hon. gentleman tonight described the efforts as a transparent sham, as a humbug. What did the hon. gentleman and his friends do towards obtaining the same end when they were in power for a period of five years? How many times did he and his friends go to Washington, and on their knees beg for reciprocity? During those five years I believe they only once made an effort in that direction, and they were obliged to return, having failed because those with whom they negotiated refused to negotiate on the terms they desired. Yet we do not hear the hon. gentleman upbraiding the Government of that day because they did not go to Washington every year, cap in hand, begging for the advantage of trading in the American market. But because to-day he can raise objections and because he believes there is a feeling in the country that it will be in the interest of the farmers to obtain a fair reciprocity treaty with the United States he seeks to create the impression that this Government is not honest in its efforts to gain reciprocity, and attacks them on those lines. It is time in the interest of the country and in the interest of the hon. gentleman himself that he should commence his work de novo, declare himself a Canadian representative and not a representative of the United States, work for the interest of Canada and defend Canadian rights and interests, and not always attempt to make it appear that the actions of the Canadian Parliament and the Canadian people are wrong, and those of the United States invariably right.

Mr. CHARLTON. As the hon. gentleman has made personal allusion to me, perhaps I may claim the attention of the House for a few moments more. The members of the Government seem to imagine that they have presented an argument to this House when they reply to the arguments I make by saying that I am a Yankee. Now, as to the advice of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sproule), that I had better pose here in the attitude of a Canadian, I may say to him that I do pose in that attitude, but I am not capable of posing in his attitude, and do not wish to be considered a hide-bound Tory. I do not wish to, and I do not intend to occupy a position in which I will oppose the consummation of any treaty arrangement with a neighbouring and a friendly nation. But so far as my nationality is concerned, perhaps nearly fifty years' residence in Canada ought to naturalize me. In every argument I present to the House with regard to this matter, I am arguing the case from the standpoint of Canadian interests, and I am pointing out the desirability of obtaining for our farmers access to their great natural market, and the extension of trade relations that will bestow on them untold blessings. Yet, I am met by such gentlemen as the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) with his purely childish talk about this man who presents these arguments having been born in the United States some 64 years ago. That is no argument. In the first place, I am not ashamed of my birth; in the second place, I am not responsible for it, for I was not consulted, and if I present arguments here that are in the interests of Canada, that is sufficient, I think, to make me acceptable to the people of this country. Now, then, my hon. friend (Mr. Sproule) asks me: How many times my friends went to Washington to negotiate a treaty when they were in power. They went once. Did they negotiate a treaty? Did they accomplish anything? They went down there in good faith, and they negotiated a treaty. They got the consent of the American Executive Department to that treaty. They negotiated a treaty that put, I will venture to say, one hundred manufactured articles upon the free list. They negotiated that treaty with the consent and with the aid of the British Government. Perhaps I had better read to my hon. friend—who endorses this offer of ten points for one, without an article of manufacture upon the list—a list of manufactures that was contained in that Brown draft treaty:

Schedule (A) consisting of the following natural products:

Animals of all kinds.
Ashes, pot, pearl, and soda.
Bark.
Bark extract, for tanning purposes.
Bath-bricks.
Breadstuffs of all kinds.
Bricks for building and fire-bricks.
Brood: corn.
Burr or grindstones, hewn, wrought or unwrought.
Butter.
Cheese.
Coal and coke.
Cotton-wool.
Cotton-waste.
Dye stuffs.
Earths, clay, ochres and sand, ground or unground.
Eggs.
Fish of all kinds.
Fish, products of, and of all other creatures living in the waters, except fish preserved in oil.
Firewood.
Flax, unmanufactured.
Flour and meals of all kinds.
Fruits, green or dried.
Furs, undressed.

Grain of all kinds.
Gypsum, ground, unground or calcined.
Hay.
Hemp, unmanufactured.
Hides.
Horns.
Lard.
Lime.
Malt.
Manures.
Marble, stone, slate or granite, wrought or unwrought.
Meats, fresh, smoked or salted.
Ores of all kinds of metals.
Pelts.
Pease, whole or split.
Petroleum oil, crude, refined or benzole.
Pitch.
Plants.
Poultry and birds of all kinds.
Rags of all kinds.
Rice.
Salt.
Seeds.
Shrubs.
Skins.
Straw.
Tails.
Tallow.
Tar.
Timber and lumber of all kinds, round, hewed and sawed, unmanufactured, in whole or in part.
Tobacco, unmanufactured.
Tow, manufactured.
Trees.
Turpentine.
Vegetables.
Wool.

Schedule (B) consisting of the following agricultural implements:

Axes.
Bag holders.
Beehives.
Bone-crushers, or parts thereof.
Cultivators, or parts thereof.
Chaff-cutters, or parts thereof.
Corn-huskers, or parts thereof.
Cheese vats.
Cheese factory heaters.
Cheese pressers, or parts thereof.
Churns, or parts thereof.
Cattle-feed boilers and steamers, or parts thereof.
Ditchers, or parts thereof.
Field-rollers, or parts thereof.
Fanning mills, or parts thereof.
Feed-choppers, or parts thereof.
Forks for hay and manure, hand or horse.
Grain-drills, or parts thereof.
Grain-broadcast sowers, or parts thereof.
Grain crushers, or parts thereof.
Harrows.
Hoes, hand or horse.
Horse rakes.
Horse-power machines, or parts thereof.
Hay tedders, or parts thereof.
Liquid manure carts, or parts thereof.
Manure sowers, or parts thereof.
Mowers, or parts thereof.
Oil and oil-cake crushers, or parts thereof.

Ploughs, or parts thereof.
 Root and seed planters, or parts thereof.
 Root cutters, pulpers, and washers or parts thereof.
 Rakes, reapers, or parts thereof.
 Reaper and mower, combined, or parts thereof.
 Spades.
 Shovels.
 Scythes.
 Snaths.
 Threshing machines, or parts thereof.

Schedule (C) consisting of the following manufactures :

Axles, all kinds.
 Boots and shoes of leather.
 Boot and shoe-making machines.
 Buffalo robes, dressed and trimmed.
 Cotton grain bags.
 Cotton denims.
 Cotton jeans, unbleached.
 Cotton drillings, unbleached.
 Cotton tickings.
 Cotton plaids.
 Cottonades, unbleached.
 Cabinetware and furniture, or parts thereof.
 Carriages, carts, wagons and other wheeled vehicles, and sleighs or parts thereof.
 Fire-engines, or parts thereof.
 Felt covering for boilers.
 Gutta-percha belting and tubing.
 Iron, bar, hoop, pig, puddled, rod, sheet or scrap.
 Iron nails, spikes, bolts, tacks, bracks or sprigs.
 Iron castings.
 India-rubber belting and tubing.
 Locomotives for railways, or parts thereof.
 Lead, sheet or pig.
 Leather, sole or upper.
 Leather, harness and saddlery of.
 Mill or factory, or steamboat, fixed engines and machines, or parts thereof.
 Manufactures of marbles, stone, slate or granite.
 Manufactures of wood solely, or of wood nailed, bound, hinged or locked, with metal materials.
 Mangles, washing machines, wringing machines, and drying machines, or parts thereof.
 Printing paper, for newspapers.
 Paper-making machines, or parts thereof.
 Printing type, presses and folders, paper cutters, ruling machines, page numbering machines and stereotyping and electrotyping apparatus, or parts thereof.
 Refrigerators or parts thereof.
 Railroad cars, carriages and trucks, or parts thereof.
 Satinets of wool and cotton.
 Steam engines, or parts thereof.
 Steel, wrought or cast, and steel plates and rails.
 Tin tubes and piping.
 Tweeds of wool solely.
 Water-wheel machines and apparatus, or parts thereof.

Here then are 37 articles of manufactures in schedule "C," 40 articles of agricultural implements in schedule "B," and more than 40 articles of natural products in schedule "A." That was the treaty negotiated by the representatives of the Mackenzie Government.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). What became of it ?

Mr. CHARLTON.

Mr. CHARLTON. Just have patience, and you will hear. It was a treaty that received the assent of the American Department of State. It was a treaty which received the assent of the British Government. It was a treaty that was referred to the American Senate, and in the American Senate it failed to secure ratification. Now, that being the case, the Government of Canada had discharged its duty. The Government of Canada had proceeded as far as it could proceed, and it was useless during its term of office to reopen these negotiations. Has the present Government acted in the same spirit? Can the present Government make the same claim? Did they ever go to Washington and attempt to negotiate a treaty on the broad lines of the treaty of 1874? Did they ever attempt to negotiate a treaty that included a list of manufactures? On the contrary, Sir, they went to Washington, and when they secured the information from the Secretary of State, that he laid it down as a condition of proceeding with negotiations, that any treaty that was negotiated must include a list of manufactured articles; they refused to consider the proposition. They refused to negotiate upon any other basis than barely upon the basis of natural products alone. They know, and I know, and every intelligent man in Canada knows, that if they had gone on upon the basis laid down by the Hon. J. G. Blaine, they could have secured a treaty, though perhaps not as general in its application as the draft treaty of 1874. They declined to entertain a proposition to include a single article of manufactures. They went down to Washington for the purpose of not getting a treaty; and one of their henchmen stands up here to-night and draws a parallel between their conduct and the conduct of the Mackenzie Government. The difference is that one Government acted in good faith and secured a treaty, and the other did not act in good faith and did not want a treaty.

Mr. SPROULE. What is the gist of the hon. gentleman's whole argument? It is that because of the limited offer made by this Government, they could not get a treaty, while if they had made an extensive offer, they could have got a treaty. Then he goes on to read a list of articles ten times as extensive, which were included in the offer made by his friends; and yet he is put in the humiliating position of confessing that they also failed to get a treaty. Their offer covered not only the products of the soil, but also manufactured goods, in which the hon. gentleman claims that it would be an advantage to the United States to have a market in Canada; but they failed ignominiously. And yet the hon. gentleman blames the present Government because they do not make such an offer as was refused before. The hon. gentleman not only abuses this Government once in five years, but five times in one year, because they do not renew that offer. That is his position. He objects to be called a special pleader for the United States; but can any man in this House, or outside of it, who has taken the trouble to read his speeches, come to any other conclusion than that he is a special pleader for the United States from the day he enters this Parliament until the day he leaves it?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I will tell the hon. gentleman what conclusion anybody who has intelligently studied my hon. friend's speeches would come to—that he had an infinitely better understanding of the wants of this country than any hon. gentleman opposite, from the Finance Minister down to the hon. member for East Grey; that he understood, and had the manliness to state, that it is imperative, if this country is to prosper as it ought to prosper, that we should have access to the markets of the United States. I do not pretend to say that the people of this country are not able to maintain themselves in reasonable comfort without access to those markets, provided they had an honest and economical Government; but I do say that no considerable prosperity ever will be obtained under existing circumstances for the people of Canada until they have access to the markets of the United States. That fact is written by the finger of God on every mile of the frontier between that country and Canada. Where can the Maritime Provinces trade profitably except with the United States? Where can Manitoba or British Columbia trade with any advantage unless with the United States? And, although Ontario, with its great resources, may be able, for a part of its goods, to obtain trade with other countries, Ontario cannot and never will be able to develop its resources to one-twentieth part of the extent to which it ought to be able to develop them, until such time as those mischievous and most foolish barriers which the insane policy of hon. gentlemen opposite and the insane policy of the United States have erected between them, are swept away. As to the more important question which does not affect the private position of my hon. friend—although he has laid a very substantial claim to the gratitude of the people of Ontario and the people of Canada by his steady advocacy of the removal of those restrictions; as to the more important question whether this miserable offer which I see in these resolutions ought to appear in any Canadian tariff, I think there is no question at all. Over and over again, a far greater man than any of those who sit now on the Treasury benches—I refer to the late Sir John Macdonald, with whom I differed very thoroughly, but as to whom I will say this, that you might have carved the whole existing cabinet out of Sir John Macdonald and had substance enough to furnish another of equal calibre—Sir John Macdonald, a man of ability and common sense, stated in his place in my hearing, and it is on record, that there was no possibility of our obtaining reciprocity with the United States unless we were in a position to offer them admission to our markets for at least a large part of their manufactures. That is a plain and self-evident fact. Everybody knows it. Nobody who has ever studied the question for one moment can pretend to say that there is anything in this offer of ripe apples, beans, buckwheat, pease, potatoes, rye, rye-flour, hay and vegetables—that there is anything in that miserable offer which is in the slightest degree likely to draw a response from the people of the United States. If the hon. gentlemen had honestly wanted, as I believe they never did honestly want, to obtain reciprocity with the United States, they would have done precisely what my hon. friend has pointed out they should have done; they would have gone to the United States with a broad and liberal offer of reciprocity; they would have proposed something which might possibly have been considered by the United States. But, Sir, we know quite well that when Mr. Bayard and Mr. Cleveland were conducting the affairs of the United States, they expressed in the plainest language—their words have been quoted time and again on the floor of this House—their willingness and readiness to enter into a large and liberal measure of reciprocity. We know that the chief member of the succeeding Administration, Mr. Blaine, professed similar readiness to treat for a broad and liberal measure of reciprocity. We know quite well, not merely that hon. gentlemen opposite deliberately deceived the people of Canada prior to the election of 1891 by professing, what they knew was not the case, what they knew had not a particle of foundation in fact, that the Government of the United States were prepared to negotiate a treaty of reciprocity with them; but that, when they had the opportunity, all these hon. gentlemen could do was to go down to Washington, where the Finance Minister of Canada, forsooth, asked Mr. Blaine to be good enough to tell him, the Finance Minister of Canada, how, if he adopted a treaty of reciprocity, he could raise revenue enough. Why, Sir, out of his own mouth he stands condemned of not having the slightest intention or disposition to negotiate such a treaty. There never was a truer description given of their conduct than that given by my hon. friend just now when he said that these hon. gentlemen went to Washington not to negotiate a treaty of reciprocity, but to make it impossible, as far as in them lay, that such a treaty should be negotiated.

Mr. GILLMOR. We have heard a great deal of this reciprocity question, but I think we ought to address ourselves to the people. The people of this country want the Government to do just what they are doing. What my hon. friend says about the advantage of the Maritime Provinces trading with the United States is correct; but notwithstanding that. New Brunswick sends fourteen men to sustain the Government in their restrictive trade policy; and the Government of the United States are in just the same position. If both these Governments were wiped out of existence, I think the people of these two countries would act on common-sense principles. They would then trade with each other to the full extent of their interests. If both Governments were wiped out of existence, it would be better both for this country and for the United States. I do not think that the United States have shown any particular desire to trade with us. I think they are very foolish. I supposed that the Cleveland Administration were going to do something to pull down the barriers between these two kindred people, so that they would be free to do what they want to do as regards trading with each other. What do you suppose the people would do if it were not for the policy of these two Governments? Would not any man who had buckwheat or beans or potatoes or anything else to sell go there to sell them if he could get more for them than he could get at home? And would not they on the other side come here to sell to us? Who would go there to sell anything that the people did not want? Nobody. But by this policy we prevent people doing what they want to do. Now, with regard to this matter of reciprocity, there are some things about reciprocity that I very much like. But it suits those gentlemen over there because it has a protective principle. I would like free trade, and if I could have my way, I would throw down the barriers on this side, and then we would get what we want—that is one-half of it. But because they will not do what we want, we will do what we condemn them for doing. Because they will not reciprocate, we will do just what they are doing. You might as well say that because the Turks will not adopt Christianity we will adopt Mahomedanism. My hon. friend from East Grey (Mr. Sproule) sings another tune to-day from what he used to sing. He sat alongside of me and we were very good friends; and after the National Policy was introduced, every time there was a cent rise on a bushel of oats, up he jumped and sounded the praise of the National Policy. That was fourteen years ago. But I do not hear him say a word about it to-day. He is very quiet now. I would like to see Canada throw down the walls and set the people over there an example of common sense by allowing their goods to come in. We are not going to buy a dollar's worth from them without their buying a dollar's worth from us to pay for it. If you want to extend your foreign trade, you have to buy, and for all you buy you must pay in something that you produce. You do not pay for it in money. If you buy corn, you pay for it in something you have to sell—cattle, hogs, butter, eggs, or something else; and you will always increase your trade, which is what we want. I want free traders to be free traders. I want them to legislate for their own country. I want them to legislate so that the people here will get the things they want cheaply. Plenty will come in; and the more you get in, the more will go out to pay for it. I think the two countries—both the United States and Canada—are acting like children. They are behind the age, and I hope the time is not far distant when the people will see it. The people want to be enlightened. If they understood the question as they should, and were determined to have a chance to do what is right, they would sweep out of existence the Government that interferes with and obstructs trade.

Mr. CASEY. The hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) lays down rather a remarkable principle in dealing with the member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton). He says that that member is a special pleader for the United States, and that this charge has been so often repeated inside the House and outside of it, that it does not need any proof. The hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) has called him the special pleader for the United States year after year, other hon. members on that side have done the same thing, the Government organs in the press have followed suit, and, says the hon. gentleman, because we have libelled and shovelled abuse on him so long, there is no need to prove our libel or justify the abuse we have hurled at him. This is a principle not often avowed, but, I am sorry to say, too often followed in Parliament by hon. gentlemen on that side. Now, on what grounds is the charge made on this occasion? The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) has not been praising the United States at the expense of Canada. He has not been saying that the people over there have more political sense than the people on this side. He has merely pointed out that this Government have made no honest effort to obtain what they said they meant to obtain at the time of the last election, namely, a treaty for reciprocity with the United States. He has not only asserted but proven that the late Mackenzie Government did make a rational and successful attempt to negotiate a treaty with the State Department at Washington for a reasonable scheme of reciprocity, including natural and some manufactured products. He has shown also that this Government appealed to the people for authority to make a reciprocity treaty with the United States, and set out with the intention to fail in obtaining such a treaty—set out to go through the farce of a few minutes' interview with the American authorities, and come back confessing that they had only been able to propose such a treaty as they knew beforehand would not be accepted. If it be special pleading on behalf of the United States to point out the humbug that characterized the conduct of this Government in their pretense to negotiate a treaty, then the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) is a special pleader for the United States. But otherwise we should rather say that he is a special pleader for the interests of Canada, as far as they are concerned in a treaty with the United States. He has not praised the United States, but has shown how hollow are the pretensions of our own Ministers. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) dealt more particularly with this view of the reciprocity offer, so-called, which is included in this new tariff. He has shown, how hollow it is as an offer of reciprocity. There is another view of that offer should be brought to the attention of the farmer of this country. It is admittedly part of the policy of gentlemen on the other side, that reciprocity in any respect is bad for this country. They have systematically opposed it in manufactured goods. They have spoken on every platform against reciprocity even in natural products; but now, when they must make some pretense of continuing the offer of reciprocity, which existed under the old tariff, on whose interests do they fall? Time and again they have shown to the farmers that competition with the United States in natural products will injure them, yet here is their offer to sacrifice the farmer, and all his wife's relations if necessary, in a reciprocal arrangement with the United States, but to sacrifice no manufacturing interest whatever. This buckwheat reciprocity policy of theirs includes a number of things which would come into competition with Canadian products, although in regard to most, as the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) pointed out, the offer is purely chimerical. Take the question of Indian corn, the great majority of the farmers of Canada prefer to import it and would prefer to have it free. They claim that it is the raw material of their cattle, just as much as sugar is the raw material of the sugar refiners, and as silk is the raw material of various manufactured goods. The demand for free Indian corn for the purpose of feeding cattle has been constantly before this Government, but they have refused to grant it. They refuse to give the farmer his raw material free, but they say that if the people of the United States will allow our Indian corn to go in there free of duty—and we know perfectly well that no Indian corn would go from Canada to the United States—if the United States, in other words, will allow us to do what there is no chance of our doing, then we will allow Indian corn to come in free from the United States to Canada. Now, Sir, there are certain counties of Ontario where the duty upon Indian corn is regarded as favourable to the farmer. But a great majority of counties find it otherwise. The Government have refused to decide between these two interests; but they say: If the United States will accept our Indian corn free, none of which we have to sell them, we agree to take the risk of hurting certain counties by putting corn upon the free list. The same is true with regard to barley. I hope that an opportunity will arise before long to point out that throughout the list of articles used in manufacture, those that are produced by the farmer and the miner are admitted free, whereas partial manufactures or complete manufactures which are the raw materials for other lines of production are uniformly protected. I hope to go into that question more fully when we reach that part of the tariff. Meantime, I wish merely to point out that the general position of the Government seems to be if anybody is to be sacrificed, by all means let it be the farmer.

Mr. McMULLEN. I desire to say a few words upon this question before the discussion is closed. This is an exceedingly important question. The people of this country, especially the farming classes, have expressed themselves most clearly and distinctly, as stated by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), in favour of reciprocity with the United States. In 1891 they expected that the Government would keep faith with them, and would try to secure an outlet for their agricultural products by extending our trade relations with the United States. But, as the hon. gentleman has pointed out, the Government, after securing the confidence of the people, went back on their promises and failed to take the necessary steps to secure for our producers advantages in the American market. I can see in the proposals made in the tariff we are now considering, indications that another attempt will be made to humbug the people with the pretense that the Government are trying to make arrangements along the line of reciprocity. The hon. Minister of Finance knows that when he went to Washington he was met with the question whether he had authority to enter upon negotiations for a treaty of reciprocity, embracing a well-defined list of manufactured goods. He was obliged to reply that he had no such authority. The result was that the opportunity for making a treaty was lost, and the people of this country are left in the same position with regard to this matter as before the election of 1891. If the hon. gentleman fancies that the steps he is taking by this tariff will cause the people to believe that the Government will make another effort to get reciprocity, he will find that he is greatly mistaken; he will find that the people have a vivid recollection of the way in which they were humbugged in the past. Hon. gentlemen have done it once, but they cannot repeat it. They will find that such organizations as the Patrons of Industry and others that have been formed wholly in the interest of a farming community will make their influence felt when this question comes before the people. We can never allow an opportunity to pass without pointing out clearly and distinctly in this House the deception that has been practiced in the past, and warning the electors of the country not to be deceived again. No doubt, when the election comes round hon. gentlemen opposite will do anything at all for the purpose of retaining their places on the Treasury benches; they will make any quantity of promises, and they will try to repeat their plan of 1891, intending, if they are successful, to maintain the old policy and the old principle. I quite endorse the statement made by the hon. gentleman from Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), that the prosperity of this country largely depends upon extended trade relations with the United States, particularly the prosperity of our farming community. We can well recollect the advantages resulting from the old reciprocity treaty. Those who experienced the advantages of that reciprocity long for a new treaty, and they will not be satisfied until an honest effort is made to secure it, and so far no honest effort to that end has been made by hon. gentlemen opposite. Instead of making such an effort, these hon. gentlemen have done everything they could to prevent the negotiation of a treaty. My hon. friend beside me (Mr. Gillmor) said he did not see that the United States were disposed to make any concessions to Canada. I challenge that statement. In the tariff Bill, as first proposed, agricultural implements were made free of duty from those countries that admitted them free of duty. How have hon. gentlemen opposite met that proposal? They have met it with a duty of 20 per cent on agricultural implements coming into Canada. Is that the way to secure reciprocity? Before the Wilson Bill becomes law, it is probable that a duty of 20 per cent will be proposed on agricultural implements. I understand that that proposition has already been made. So the hon. gentlemen's course from beginning to end has never had in the past and has not now a single vestige of an honest desire to secure a reciprocity treaty with the United States. They are laying their plans to mislead and humbug and fool the farmers of this country over again by the pretended offers of reciprocity they make in this tariff. Well, Mr. Chairman, hon. gentlemen may humbug all the people once or part of the people all the time, but they cannot hope to humbug a majority of the electors all the time. Do the people of the United States want to receive our commodities and send us the same in return? Do they want to send us eggs for eggs, horses for horses, barley for barley? We know they do not. They have not got these things to sell, and they intimated to gentlemen opposite plainly and distinctly that if Canada was prepared to receive such articles of manufacture as they were ready to send they would be prepared to accept Canada's raw material.

Mr. McMULLEN.

But hon. gentlemen opposite are not prepared for that. They say: we will take your corn if you will take our barley. The Minister of Finance when in Washington was obliged to reply that the Government could not or would not accept the proposition made on behalf of the United States. What, then, is the use of re-enacting these offers? The people of this country will understand it; the farmers will understand it, and they will see the hollowness of the hopes of reciprocity held out to them by gentlemen opposite.

Mr. MARTIN. I desire to say a word or two upon this matter, for this is a subject of very special importance to our portion of the country. It has been suggested by the hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Gillmor) that the Americans are not prepared to enter into a reciprocity treaty with Canada. However that may be, I can say, Mr. Chairman, that the North-western States, including North and South Dakota, Minnesota, Wisconsin, Montana, and states of that kind, are very much interested in this question, and are prepared to bring powerful influence at Washington to bear in the direction of a reciprocity treaty that shall be fair to both countries. I say that advisedly, because, within the past two or three years, two very large international conventions have been held to consider this subject. The first was in 1891 at the city of Grand Forks, N.D., this convention being attended by delegates from the States I have mentioned and from Manitoba. The second convention was held in the year 1892 in the city of St. Paul, which was attended by delegates from those states, and also largely attended by delegates from the province of Manitoba. I may say that the question in Manitoba is not being considered as it is in this House, apparently, as a party question; it is being considered there in a non-partisan spirit altogether. In support of that proposition, I would say that the delegates who went to St. Paul representing the city of Winnipeg, were appointed at a meeting of the citizens generally. At that meeting the mayor presided, and the mayor of the city is as ardent a Conservative as there is in this House. In opening the meeting he took the ground that this question of reciprocal trade between those states and the Canadian North-west should not be a question of partisan politics, and for that reason he had great pleasure in presiding at the meeting. Speeches were made by prominent men on both sides of politics, and the tone of the speeches was in the same direction, that it was a matter of very great importance to Manitoba and the Territories to obtain reciprocity arrangements, and that it was desirable to cultivate a feeling on both sides of the line to that end. We recognize that failures in the past to obtain a reciprocity arrangement have been caused largely from the want of a proper understanding and the want of a friendly feeling between the two countries in regard to that matter. I may say that among the delegates who attended that convention from the town of Portage la Prairie, were the Grand President and the Grand Secretary of the Patrons of Industry for Manitoba and the North-west. Mr. Graham, who is the Grand Secretary of that body, has been a very strong life-long Conservative. On his return from that convention, he published a letter in the local paper, giving a sort of report of his visit, and I may say that, although he was a farmer and not accustomed to work of that kind, he presented in that letter one of the strongest and ablest arguments in favour of reciprocity that I have had the pleasure of reading. These facts show how those neighbouring portions of the United States and Canada feel with regard to this matter. It is not a question of choice with them. It is a question of natural condition. Certainly, for Manitoba and the North-west it would be one of the greatest boons, if they could get the American market free for such articles as barley, potatoes, horses, and a number of other articles, including vegetables of all kinds. The north-western states feel that in many articles they could trade with us profitably to themselves, and it would be a great advantage to them if they were able, in seasons when failures take place in their crops, to draw upon us for their supplies in those articles. They would be very glad indeed to obtain our hard wheat, and I may say that, in spite of the fact that the price of wheat is settled in Liverpool, it would be a distinct advantage to Manitoba and the Territories to have the large milling markets of Minneapolis for their hard wheat. We know that the price of the better grades of hard wheat is not altogether settled by the export value, but that very frequently a higher price can be obtained locally on account of the demand for a special quality of wheat.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. MARTIN. I suppose hon. gentlemen cheer that sentiment because they think it supports the policy of a duty upon flour. No doubt, there is some argument in that fact. I may say, however, with regard to that—and perhaps the House will excuse me for anticipating a discussion on that question—that, while I admit that the duty on flour is a considerable advantage to Manitoba and the Territories, so far as it encourages mills there, and in that way has a tendency to increase the price of the higher grades, of hard wheat—and I may say that my predecessor as a Liberal representative from that province, supported the increased duty on flour in this House—still, I would like to point this out as a warning to the millers of Manitoba and the North-west, that they are taking to-day, and have been taking since that duty was increased, a very unfair advantage of the increase of the duty on flour, because in Manitoba they are getting more for their flour than they are selling the same flour for in Montreal. What they promised, and what they suggested in asking for that duty, was that they would not advance the price of their flour; all they wished was the market of Canada for themselves, and they suggested that by means of the duty upon flour they would be able to secure the eastern market for flour without really advancing the price. But I say that they have taken an unfair advantage of that increased price; they have put up the price of flour in Manitoba to the highest possible notch consistent with that duty, and the price of flour has been increased by the amount of the duty. We would be able to get our flour very much cheaper indeed, if we could import it from Minneapolis, but we cannot do it on account of the duty.

Mr. SPROULE. Surely, the farmer must benefit by that.

Mr. MARTIN. In what way does he benefit?

Mr. SPROULE. He gets a better price for his wheat.

Mr. MARTIN. I admit that he gets a better price for his wheat from the fact of the mills being there, but he gets no advantage, he gets no better price for his wheat, because the price of flour has been increased to himself and other people in the neighbourhood. As has been pointed out already, the farmer in Manitoba has to buy his flour; the mills refuse to do gristing there, and he has to buy his flour the same as people in the towns. I think it will be admitted by hon. gentlemen opposite that, when the increased duty upon flour was discussed and an advance was made from 50 to 75 cents a barrel, the promise was made on behalf of the millers, that they would not take advantage of the duty to increase the price of flour, that all they wanted was the market of Canada. I say they have violated their pledges in that respect, and they are taking from the people of Manitoba just that amount of additional money for their flour. I contend that they are acting unfairly, and, if they continue to do so, I am not sure but that on the whole it would be to the advantage of Manitoba to have the duty taken off. I am inclined to think that the extra amount paid by the people of Manitoba for their flour, including the farmers, as well as the people in towns, counterbalances any increase in price there may be from time to time in the price of wheat caused by these local mills. I have pointed out the capacity of that country to produce barley, and the inadvisability of producing barley to a considerable extent now for lack of a market. I have mentioned the great capacity of that country to produce potatoes, which are practically worthless to-day, but can be grown at a profit at the prices that can be obtained in Chicago, where the price of potatoes is good at almost all times, because in recent years the potato crop in the Western States has been almost a failure. The people of Chicago have imported their potatoes largely from the island of Cuba, and we are able to sell them the finest varieties at from 30 to 35 cents per bushel and obtain considerable profit. On our soil we are able to produce annually 400 bushels to the acre. But all these opportunities are lost because we are not able to obtain the American market. That, however, does not depend altogether on our own efforts and disposition, but we consider in Manitoba and in the states to which I have referred that it is the utmost importance that friendly feelings shall be engendered so as to bring about reciprocity on both sides of the line. Another matter which was very fully discussed and on which resolutions were passed—I have not got the resolutions at hand or I would read them to the committee—was the necessity of the North-west generally, on both sides of the line, uniting to eventually secure what might be called a ship canal from the North-west to the Atlantic ocean. That is a subject on which our interests are united, and it met with very great favour at these conventions. I may say there would have been a third convention at Duluth last year had it not been for the great financial panic which occurred about the time when it was intended to hold the convention, and it was thought to be an unfavourable time to call together the people to discuss questions of that kind. There is another point to which I desire to refer, and that is the reciprocity offer of the United States in connection with agricultural implements. Hon. gentlemen opposite, if they care anything whatever for the support of Manitoba and the Territories, must consider this question more seriously than they have done hitherto. The United States made a distinct offer to Canada in connection with articles that are of prime importance to settlers in that portion of the Dominion. They proposed that if Canada would take the duty off agricultural implements they would do likewise. Although this matter has been brought very forcibly by hon. members on this side of the House to the attention of the Finance Minister, no discussion has taken place with respect to it on the floor of this House. I should like to hear expressions of opinion from the hon. member from East Assinibola (Mr. McDonald), the hon. member from West Assinibola (Mr. Davin), and the hon. member for Alberta (Mr. Davis), and the hon. member for Saskatchewan (Mr. Macdowell). As regards the members from Manitoba, we do not expect any sympathy from them in this movement, but we would like very much to know what the hon. members from the Territories think of the Government's action in refusing to consider that proposition, which would mean so much to the farmers both in Manitoba and the North-west.

Mr. DAVIN. As the hon. gentleman has appealed to me, perhaps I may delay the committee for a moment or so while remarking on what has fallen from him and also from the hon. member from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), and perhaps also adverting to some remarks that fell from the hon. member from North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton). My hon. friend who has just taken his seat, as well as the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), and the hon. member from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), are here to-night acting that extraordinary part which the 'Globe' acts, and which their orators on platform after platform play, and it is this: They stand up and they blame the Conservative party for not obtaining a reciprocity treaty with the United States. Of course, if all that is not utter blague, if it is not wasted froth, there is behind it a proposition, that some body of men in this country could get a reciprocity treaty with the United States which would be acceptable to Canada.

Mr. CHARLTON. Hear, hear.

Mr. DAVIN. "Hear, hear," says the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton). So it could be done. If that proposition is not behind it, one of two consequences must follow, either it is a manifestation of imbecility, or it is a manifestation, I use the word in the Pickwickian sense, of political knavery.

Mr. CHARLTON. Does the hon. gentleman speak of his own friends?

Mr. DAVIN. No, I had my eye on my hon. friend. My hon. friend read to the House a list of the articles that Hon. George Brown was prepared to put on the reciprocity list; in fact, listening to that list, one is ready to ask what was there left to give?

An hon. MEMBER. Hear, hear.

Mr. DAVIN. Some hon. member says "Hear, hear." But we do not need to answer the argument that is behind that "hear, hear," if there is any argument behind it, because the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) has answered it. The hon. member for Winnipeg can do a great many things, but short as has been his occupancy of a seat in this House, I congratulate him on the fact that he has not only added to the aesthetic aspect of the House, but he has shown how a member of Parliament can blow hot and cold, and he has done this better than any member that ever sat within these walls. Within the short space of a few minutes he talked as an out-and-out free trader and as an out-and-out protectionist; one moment he was standing on the solid, broad footing of a thorough-paced Grit, and the next moment he was speaking from the standpoint—and the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. La-Riviere) knows a good deal depends on the standpoint—of the ordinary Reformer; he was standing on his head and giving us from a politico-economic point of view a thorough acrobatic exhibition. I heard the hon. gentleman in this House a few minutes ago declare that he wanted—and I read somewhere that he made the same statement. I am not sure, but I heard him make that statement outside of this House. I certainly heard him make it inside—that he wanted to eliminate from our tariff the accursed thing, protection.

Mr. MARTIN,

Mr. MARTIN. Hear, hear.

Mr. DAVIN. The hon. gentleman says "hear, hear." The leader of the Opposition did me the honour to suggest that I had retired and hidden myself in the vacuum of my memory, but some time was given me to do that; yet in the short space—and it will be seen that in giving the hon. member for Winnipeg credit for his acrobatic genius, I am not at fault—of five or ten minutes, the hon. gentleman can bury himself in the vacuum of his moral consciousness. The hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) took us into his confidence, and really when the hon. gentlemen on that side of the House become candid we get some glimpses of their character and some insight into their sincerity. The hon. member from South Oxford told the House that Sir John Macdonald was so great a man that the whole Government of Canada at this hour could be carved out of him, and he still remain a man of some consequence. That is the hon. gentleman's opinion of Sir John Macdonald dead. I knew Sir John Macdonald well, and I had his opinion when alive of the hon. gentleman, and all I can say is that it was not quite so complimentary as is the hon. gentleman's opinion of the late great leader of the Conservative party. But if the right hon. gentleman who once led the Conservative party was so great a man, why was it that the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) left his following and failed to agree with him? And if the opinion of the right hon. gentleman now he is dead is of such value to the hon. member for South Oxford, how was it that he never could bring himself to agree with propositions either on the trade policy or on general policy for governing this country that were enunciated by that right hon. gentleman? The hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin), has distinctly again and again stated here to-night, a proposition dear to his opponents, a proposition that I thought had been controverted always by gentlemen on the Reform side of the House. He states that the local market—a point that the Minister of Finance and hon. gentlemen of his party set great store by—is of value, and that the local market raises the price of wheat.

Mr. MARTIN. I did not state that.

Mr. DAVIN. I will give the hon. gentleman his own words and let him correct me if I am wrong. He said: that giving the millers protection increases the local demand for our hard wheat, and the result was that it some times raised the price; and he said further: that one of the advantages of breaking down the customs barriers between Canada and the Western States would be that that local market would be still further extended because we would have the woollen manufactories.

Mr. MARTIN. I did not say woollen manufactories, I said flour mills.

Mr. DAVIN. Very well, flour mills. It will suit the proposition just as well; it is a question of the enlargement of what he calls the local market.

Mr. MARTIN. The hon. gentleman did not understand me. As I understand the argument with regard to the local market, from a protectionist standpoint, it is: that they will create manufactures which will consume these products and increase the price for the farmer. I never intended for one moment to suggest that protection in Manitoba had that effect, or could possibly have that effect. The hon. gentleman has misunderstood what I said. What I said was: that the more mills there were in Manitoba the more likely there was that occasionally the price of our highest grades of hard would be improved, and I said that that would be still further the case in favour of the Manitoba farmer, if the tariff on wheat on both sides of the line were removed, and we had access to the large flour mills of Minneapolis and Duluth, so that we could send our hard wheat there where it was particularly wanted on account of the shortness of their crop.

Mr. DAVIN. I appeal to the House and to the candid gentlemen around me if that is not what I stated. The hon. gentleman laid down the proposition: that if you had flour mills you would enhance sometimes the local market for wheat, and thereby you would sometimes raise the price of wheat. Is that correct?

Mr. MARTIN. Yes.

Mr. DAVIN. The hon. gentleman nods his head in assent. I said once that when a certain gentleman shook his head, there was nothing in it; but when my hon. friend shakes his head there is a little in it, and I have at last stated the case. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Martin) in his mode of controversy in this House reminds me very much of the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte). He reminds me very much of the way the hon. member for L'Islet conducts his controversy in this House. There is not a great deal probably in common between them with the exception of their methods, although I suppose that they are all fours in this: that each is a little tart.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Mr. DAVIN. I see that my hon. friend behind me (Mr. Fraser) is very indignant that I should have made a point. Well, I will admit that it is a very indifferent pun, and I am sorry that I trespassed on his monopoly of doubtful wit. Now, my hon. friend from Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) wants me to say something about agricultural implements, and he says that he has not yet heard any of the gentlemen from the North-west discuss that question—

Mr. MARTIN. I did not say that. What I said was that I had not heard an expression of their opinion as to the policy of the Government in refusing the reciprocity offer of the United States in connection with agricultural implements.

Mr. DAVIN. And in answer I may say that the United States have not yet placed themselves in such a position in regard to that, or any other matter, that this Government can with any safety go further than it has gone. I say further, as I stated when I spoke on this subject before: that I should have been glad to see agricultural implements on the free list. I say also, that in regard to agricultural implements and some other items in the tariff: that whatever the United States did I should be glad to see our own Government take the bull by the horns and go further than they have done in regard to a few things that our people in the west are concerned in. I repeat what I said on this subject before: that looking at the fact that the Minister of Finance had to deal with the iron industries, that, as a statesman, he could not at once wipe away protection to these iron industries. I do not see how he could at the present time have taken away all the protection from the agricultural implement makers. I said on that occasion: that placing on the one side all the things that had been done for the Territories, things that were shown to have been done for the Territories, for the farmers household and for all that would affect the farmer; I say that under that tariff the North-west farmer and the Manitoba farmer, the constituents of my hon. friend as well as my own; do get more under that tariff at this minute than they would get under the tariff had it been made in accordance with the suggestions that I ventured to press on the Government last year and the previous year. I am not surprised at the condition the debate on this subject has come to already in committee. When we were discussing the question of going into committee I ventured to state that the opposition to this tariff had been knocked endways—I think I used language somewhat more elegant, but certainly not more expressive—and I anticipated that when we went into committee and had to deal with it after it my hon. friends of the Opposition would find themselves in the difficulty they find themselves in now, because it is pretty clear that instead of discussing this matter for a month, we shall get through committee much quicker than we thought we should, for the reason the more you come to look at this tariff the more does it bear criticism.

Mr. GILLMOR. Oh, nonsense.

Mr. DAVIN.

Mr. DAVIN. My hon. friend says Oh! Nothing in the world would satisfy my hon. friend except absolute free trade, because he wants free trade and he wants direct taxation.

Mr. GILLMOR. Could you find a more contemptible mode of taxation than this?

Mr. DAVIN. I will not limit the capacity of my hon. friend, and he may yet be called to power. Although I should like, for instance, to see something taken off the duty on coal oil and agricultural implements, I say that the more we look at this tariff the better we find it. I may say, also, that I am very glad that some additional protection was put to-day on pork. Although I do not hope to see, just now, more duty taken off agricultural implements, I have hopes as regards coal oil and one or two other items, and I look to see still more done in the near future, and speaking generally, looking at the tariff as a whole, and after considering it for weeks, I can give the same verdict on this tariff that I gave of it when I spoke on going into committee.

Mr. GILLMOR. But they are changing it all the time.

Mr. DAVIN. They are changing it in the direction that I like. My hon. friend, with whom I have often had the pleasure of a private chat, and who is a metaphysician in his way, and a man of great precision of language, who can think correctly and fruitfully, knows that no human work is so perfect that it may not receive some finishing touch. If you go to Italy and see marble chiselled into a living statue, there it stands before your eyes apparently perfect; but the artist comes along in a few days with his sandpaper and chamois and makes it still more perfect. So, I have no doubt, my hon. friend, who is also something of an artist, aided by the Finance Minister on the other side, will be able to make this tariff still better than it is.

Mr. McDONALD (Assinibola). If my hon. friend from Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) had not called upon me to make a declaration. I do not know that I would have taken up the time of the House to-night. I agree with the hon. member for West Assinibola (Mr. Davin) that there are some things in this tariff which are not perfect; but I for one am going to take it on the instalment plan. The farmers of the North-west, of whom I am one, have received considerable benefit from the changes in this tariff. Like the hon. member for West Assinibola, I am not exactly satisfied with the duties on agricultural implements and on coal oil. I did say, before I came down to Ottawa, that if the Americans would put agricultural implements on the free list, we should do the same, as I believe Canadians are able to compete with any people in the world; but when I come here and look into these questions, it changes the programme considerably.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. McDONALD (Assiniboia). My hon. friends on the opposite side cheer, and I am glad to get a cheer from them. What I understand by that is, that if the patents on our machines infringe on the patents on the machines in the United States, we could not send them there free; and every one of the principal implements that we use on the prairies has the same identical patented devices as are used in the United States machines. There is not a binder made in this country but the patent originated in the United States. The hon. member for Winnipeg told me a little news to-night. He said that the people of the North-west were in favour of reciprocity with the neighbouring states of Dakota and Minnesota. He also said that under free trade, Minneapolis would buy our superior hard wheat. Well, I am a wheat farmer of the North-west, and I think that would be a good deal like taking coals to Newcastle. The United States, in 1892, raised over 600,000,000 bushels of wheat. Let the United States wheat be excluded from the English market by a duty of 10 cents or 15 cents a bushel, and it will increase the price of our wheat 10 cents or 15 cents a bushel. The hon. gentleman said that the United States would furnish a market for our horses. Up to the present day, horses are going into the North-west from the province of Ontario.

Mr. MARTIN. That has practically ceased.

Mr. SPROULE. Only last Saturday a carload left down here at the station.

Mr. McDONALD (Assiniboia). It is true, as the hon. member for Winnipeg says, that it has practically ceased. Nevertheless, the bringing of horses from Montana to our country has not practically ceased.

Mr. CAMPBELL. The hon. member for West Assiniboia started by accusing this side of the House of blaming the Government for not obtaining reciprocity; and he said that we insinuated that if this side were in power, we would be able to get a reciprocity treaty with the United States. Well, Sir, I have no doubt we could if the Liberal party—

Mr. DAVIN. I would like to correct the hon. member. He says that I insinuated that if that party were in power they could get a reciprocity treaty. I insinuated nothing of the kind. What I stated was that unless behind their proposition there was some body of men who could compel the United States Government to give us reciprocity, all their talk was nonsense. I did not insinuate any such extraordinary power as regards the Opposition.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Well, any person who reads the report made by the hon. Finance Minister after he came back from Washington a year or so ago, can come to no other conclusion than that a treaty could have been obtained at that time if the Government wanted it. They went down to Washington nominally for the purpose of arranging a reciprocity treaty with the United States, but their object was not to negotiate any treaty, although the facts showed that if they had had the least desire to obtain such a treaty they could have done so.

Mr. DAVIN. How was it that George Brown did not get it?

Mr. CAMPBELL. George Brown failed fifteen or twenty years ago. Circumstances have changed since then; the party in power in the United States had as one of their principal planks the doing away with protection altogether. Because we failed fifteen or twenty years ago, that is no reason why we should fail now. At any rate, the great importance of this matter to the people of Canada warrants us in using every effort to obtain it. The hon. member for West Assiniboia also spoke of the hon. member for Winnipeg as one who could blow hot and cold better than any one else in the House. Well, Sir, if we look back over the political history of the hon. member for West Assiniboia, we shall find that he has been blowing hot and cold ever since he came to this House. You cannot tell by his speeches how he will vote; he generally speaks one way and votes another. Last session the Order Paper was filled by him with resolutions for free coal oil, free binder twine, and free agricultural implements; but those questions he never brought to the issue. He always supports the Government no matter what they do. If they do not take the duty off coal oil, he will still vote for them; if they do not take the duty off agricultural implements, he will still praise them; if they leave the duty on coal oil and binder twine, he will still support them, although he talks the other way. The hon. member spoke of the reference the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) made to the late Sir John Macdonald. I understood the hon. member for South Oxford to admit the great abilities of the late Sir John Macdonald, as we all do; he did so by way of contrast with the ability of the present Government, very much to their discredit. But the hon. gentleman wants to know why the hon. member for South Oxford left Sir John Macdonald, and did not support him? Because he did not agree with his policy. A person may admit the great ability of an opponent without agreeing with his policy. The hon. member also said of the hon. member when he shook his head, that he could not say of him as he had said of some other hon. members, that when he shook his head there was nothing in it, because he admitted there was a little in it. It is reported that a very prominent gentleman, a late member of this House, said, when asked his opinion of the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), that he would be an able man if he had a little more brains. I think that was a very truthful remark. If the hon. gentleman had ballast, he would be a well-balanced man. He has given us an opinion of the Government, in one of his sober moments in the House, which reads very differently from his opinion to-day. He then referred to them as a Government of antiques, and wanted somebody to peddle brains to them. That opinion and the one he expresses now, are in accord with his entire policy. He blows hot and cold, speaking one way one day, and contradicting himself the next. The proposition of the Government to place a certain number of articles on the free list, provided the Americans allow the same articles free from Canada. I have no hesitation in saying, is a perfect humbug. It is not intended to have any practical result. On the face of it, one might be led to suppose that, when we made such an offer, it was a fair offer to the United States. But, when you look to the exports of this country, you will see at once that there is nothing in the offer at all to induce the American Government to accept it. As the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) has said, it gives the Americans one point, and asks them to give us ten. Take all these articles, apples, beans, buckwheat, peas, potatoes, rye flour, hay, vegetables and barley, that we propose to admit from the United States free of duty, if they will admit those articles into their country free, we find that the Americans, if they had free access to our market, would in all probability not send us one of these articles, because there is no market for them here. We export largely those different articles to the United States, and it is simply absurd to propose to admit from the United States those same articles, when we know there is no market for them here. The benefits would be all on our side. There is no question that if we can obtain reciprocity with the people of the United States, we would confer the greatest possible benefits on our people. I do not believe there is any law we could place on the statute-book that could confer anything like the benefits to the people of Canada which the opening up of the American market to our farmers, artisans, fishermen and lumbermen would. Therefore, I think that the Government have been very derelict in their duty in not attempting to bring about more favourable relations with that country. Their golden time was eighteen months ago, when the Democrats were returned to power and Congress was in session. They should then have sent a commissioner to Washington to endeavour to negotiate a treaty. In not doing so, they have made the greatest mistake they could possibly make. I believe the people of the United States would be willing to meet us in a fair and just measure of reciprocity. They will not renew the old treaty that existed between 1854 and 1866, but, if we had included a certain list of manufactured articles, we have the assurance of the late Secretary of the United States, the Hon. Mr. Blaine, that they would have entertained the proposition favourably. I believe the Government have seriously neglected the interests of Canada in not having taken every possible step to negotiate a treaty. There could be no greater piece of folly committed on both sides than the policy of each country. If you go along our border—if you go along the beautiful Niagara or St. Lawrence River, you will find that capitalists have invested millions of dollars in building magnificent iron and steel bridges to cross these streams and bring the two countries together. They did so in order to remove the natural barriers placed in the way of commerce between the two countries, and yet the Governments of this country and the United States have erected artificial barriers to prevent our making use of these bridges, which it cost millions of dollars to build. It seems to me that, if we wanted barriers, the better way would be to blow up these bridges and sink the vessels that carry cargoes across the river at different places along the border. Then we would have all the barriers we require without erecting artificial ones. But there is no man in either country who would be such an idiot as to propose such a course. We do not trade with the people of the United States because we prefer that country to others, but simply because it pays us to buy there, just as it pays them to buy from us. That is why this large trade takes place between us. We sold to the United States almost as much last year as to the rest of the world, England included. Then, we bought from the United States far more than from any other country, including Great Britain. That shows that the people of Canada find it to their advantage to trade with the United States, and I believe that, if the barriers were removed, the development of trade between Canada and the United States would go on increasing at an enormous rate, to the great advantage of both countries. I charge the Government with having neglected the interests of this country, in losing the golden opportunity they had. They have not done a single thing to bring about this advantageous trade, and the offer they are now making is simply a delusion. They know well that the Americans will not accept it, and it would be foolish for them to accept it, and it is a sham and a delusion to allow it to remain on the statute-books of this country.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). The hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) is very fond of charging the Opposition with inconsistency. If there is an inconsistent man in this House, it is the very gentleman who makes that charge against us. As you are all aware, every year he comes here with a policy of his own, and, in fact, if we read the speeches made by him during the last six or seven years, I defy any one to say what his policy and principles really are. To say for one moment that a reciprocity treaty with the United States would not be a benefit to Manitoba, is to express an opinion to which I do not think any reasonable man would give utterance, if he spoke independent of the party with which he is connected. The hon. gentleman from East Assiniboia (Mr. McDonald) stated that the wheat of Manitoba would not be sent to Dakota, even if free trade existed between the two countries. But the hon. gentleman knows, just as well as I can tell him, that Manitoba No. 1 hard wheat is superior to any wheat they can grow in Minnesota, and that the large mills centred in Minneapolis and other points are anxious to get the very best wheat in order to make the best flour, so that they may be able to meet their competitors in any part of the world. Again, a large proportion of wheat is sent from Manitoba into Dakota for seed purposes. Allow me to read from a Conservative paper, 'The Canadian Journal of Commerce,' what is stated in an editorial paragraph with regard to the export of wheat from the elevators at Brandon:

The farmers' elevators at Brandon shipped several thousand bushels of seed wheat to Dakota last year and are busy shipping more now. The only drawback is the duty on seed wheat entering the United States.

Now, there is a fact which contradicts the contention of those hon. gentlemen who say that a reciprocity treaty between Canada and the United States would not benefit Manitoba. It is almost a universal sentiment among the farmers of that country that it would be a great boon to the country if they had free access to the markets of the United States to sell what they produce and to purchase many articles for the use of their farms which can be purchased more cheaply in the United States. I am astonished, Mr. Chairman, at seeing three or four members from Manitoba sitting here and failing to endeavour to answer the arguments made use of in favour of Manitoba from this side. But two hon. gentlemen from Manitoba who did attempt to answer the hon. member from Winnipeg (Mr. Martin), absolutely failed to meet one of the arguments brought forward in favour of that country. They had not one word to say in favour of the farmers or in favour of those purchasing the various articles the duties upon which were considered this afternoon, but they sat there as if they had no tongues, but looked to the members of the Government to see whether they should speak or not. When we lose our independence to such an extent, when we come to this House and sit as dumb dogs, without a word in vindication of the people who sent us to represent them, we cannot but think we have become political party hacks to such an extent that our usefulness is gone. There are four or five members from British Columbia here, and if they look over the Trade and Navigation Returns, they will find that their province almost lives and moves and has its being by what they receive from and what they sell to the United States. A large portion of their meats are imported from the United States, and they pay a very high duty upon these imports. A large proportion of their potatoes are imported from the United States, and upon these they pay thousands of dollars in duties. Many other articles that go into consumption in British Columbia are imported from the United States. On the other hand, in the case of one of the principal industries, the coal industry, they have to sell almost every ton in the United States. And yet here are the two tariffs, one on one side and one on the other, forming together a tremendous obstacle in the way of commerce between these two countries. And yet these representatives of British Columbia will come here and sit silently through the discussion of these heavy duties imposed upon the trade of their province. Coming to the province of Ontario, I hold that there is not a single reasonable man, who, looking at the trade and commerce between the two countries and speaking his independent opinion, but must say that reciprocity with the United States would be a great boon for the farmers of this country. And when I hear it argued that the United States is not our market, I can only come to the conclusion that the man who uses that argument has not examined the records put before him by the Government. Take up the Trade and Navigation Returns, and you find that in spite of duties running from 40 to 50 and 60 per cent, and even higher, so far as many of our products are concerned, we trade almost entirely with that country. When you see that these are the facts, how is it possible that hon. gentlemen can continue to tell us that, because the United States produce a surplus of the articles that we produce, there can be no market there for us. We all know the effect of the McKinley Bill upon the barley growing of Ontario. If that McKinley Bill and its high duties were done away with the farmers could engage in that trade again. When the McKinley Bill came in, eight hundred thousand acres were under barley in Ontario. To-day not one-half of that area is carried under barley. Being excluded from the United States markets, the farmers had to go out of this business, which was the most profitable department of the farm. This is one result of the Government not seeking to have an understanding with regard to trade matters upon equitable and dignified grounds. Hon. gentlemen very well know that in 1891 the late Sir John A. Macdonald issued a proclamation in which he stated that he was about to negotiate a treaty along the lines of the treaty which was in force from 1854 to 1866, and that he actually dissolved Parliament on the ground that he wished to have a mandate from the people to negotiate that treaty. I was told upon the platform by a Minister of the Crown that a Ministerial party of three were on their way to negotiate a treaty and that in a few weeks a treaty would be arranged which would be greatly to the advantage of the farmers of this country. Among other things, agricultural implements would be placed upon the free list. I do not see in his place the hon. gentleman who made that statement. I refer to the Minister of Militia. He made that declaration upon the public platform at a meeting which I attended. And yet hon. gentlemen say that we have not a large market in the country south of us. It does not follow that because a country produces more than she requires therefore her people will not purchase articles from outside, that they cannot find goods outside their own country which, for various reasons, will suit them better than those they produce. For instance, do hon. gentlemen opposite suppose that we could not sell our cheese in the United States, if the United States markets were open to us? We are able to offer them the best cheese on the continent, or in the world. If our cheese is sent to the great markets in the United States—New York, Philadelphia, Boston, Buffalo, Chicago, and many other large cities—you can sell it beside the American cheese and at a higher price. Why? Because those who go into the market do not inquire from what country this or that article comes. They will take the best that is offered and pay the highest market price for it. Therefore, I blame the Government for not putting forth a conscientious effort, which I believe they never did, to negotiate a treaty, including raw materials and agricultural products, with a large range of manufactured articles, which would be beneficial to the countries on either side. They may do that without sacrificing any of their dignity, without sacrificing the interest of Canada, but to the advantage of the people of this country. And the people will hold the Government and their supporters responsible, and when the hon. gentlemen go to the country, as they must within the next two years, the people will assert their position and place the Government where they ought to be, because they have neglected the interests of the people, particularly the interests of the agricultural classes and have catered to the interests of those with more money to spend to keep them in power. When I see the people of the United States, as it were, holding out their hands ready to receive and pay for our products and the Government keeping up the barrier between us, I cannot but come to the conclusion that there must be something which we ought more fully to understand which induces them to avoid making a treaty that would be beneficial to both countries. An hon. gentleman the other night said that the treaty of 1854 was an unmixed evil. The Government of that day did not regard it as such. The Government of that day regarded that treaty as largely beneficial to this country, as having brought to this country a trade which wiped out the discontent and restlessness which previously existed. In 1866 when the United States gave notice of their intentions to abrogate that treaty, the Government of Sir John A. Macdonald passed a Minute of Council deploring that this country was to be deprived of the benefits of that treaty, and imploring the British Government to interfere to see if they could not get the United States to continue that treaty which had brought such prosperity to this country. Yet, Sir, we have men among us to-day who will persist in saying that that treaty was not beneficial to this country. Now, I believe you can never get a treaty with the United States upon the mere basis of natural products: but if you add to those products several of our manufactured articles, I am satisfied, from the expression of the newspaper press in the United States, from the expression of members of the Senate and House of Representatives, from resolutions passed by the National Board of Trade, that the United States are in a humour to meet us half way, and if our Government will only do all they can, they will be able to bring around freer trade relations between Canada and the United States.

Item agreed to.

Indian corn, 7½ cents a bushel.

Mr. McMILLAN. I think it is the duty of the Government to give the farmers the relief they are entitled to and for which they have been asking. The farmers of western Ontario have sent deputations to interview the Government asking them to place corn upon the free list. When the question was put by the Government, What if the United States will not allow our barley to go in there free? the answer was, Give us free corn, whether the United States will take our barley or not. I believe the time has now arrived when the farmers of Canada, especially in the province of Ontario, should cease to be exporters of coarse grains in any shape, and when they should import corn in order to make farming the success it ought to be. During the last year there were 5,100,000 bushels of corn imported from the United States into Canada. Of that quantity, 2,100,000 bushels were entered for consumption; the distillers took 890,000 bushels, leaving 1,300,000 or 1,400,000 bushels of corn to be consumed by the farmers and stock men in Canada. I think of that amount, 1,240,000 bushels is consumed in Ontario. Now, I hold that it would be a great benefit to the farmers to have free corn. There are other crops that we can raise very profitably. For instance, Ontario is well fitted by the nature of her soil to raise large crops of peas; and we could sell these peas and purchase corn instead, provided there was no duty on corn, and corn would make as good a food and as cheap as pease. If the Wilson Bill passes the Senate with the item of barley in the same position as it was sent to the Senate, leaving barley about 25 per cent, which would mean something like 12½ cents a bushel for duty on barley going into the United States, we would only pay 2½ cents in excess of what it was before the McKinley Bill was passed. It would then pay the farmers of Ontario—and I speak of Ontario particularly because I am better acquainted with that province—it would pay them to go into the raising of barley, the most paying crop they ever raised, and sell that barley and purchase corn. Let me say there is no other grain I know of that will give the farmers the same relief as free corn, and even if the Wilson Bill should not pass, let us have free corn. We want to cheapen the cost of production by every means in the province of Ontario, in the dairy, in feeding stock for beef, in raising pork—in all these respects we could make money if we only had cheaper food. Let me say that the Patrons of Industry, some of them from the corn-growing districts of western Ontario, have interviewed the Government asking that corn should be placed upon the free list. There may be some locality in Canada at certain times that would not get as good a price for their corn if the duty was taken off, but let me say that the best farmers in the corn-growing counties are consuming the corn that they raise themselves, and purchasing foreign corn. We want to change our system of farming entirely. Taking all these things into consideration, I move :

That corn be struck from this schedule and placed upon the free list.

Believing that such a measure would give a great amount of benefit to the farmers of the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I feel myself at a loss to account for the proposition which the hon. gentleman embodied in the tariff, except it is for the purpose of trying to persuade a certain portion of the population who are in favour of a reasonable measure of reciprocity with the United States, that the Government engaged in negotiations for that purpose. The hon. gentleman knows well that for many years the Government of the United States and the press of the United States have declared that a reciprocity treaty confined to natural products, would not be acceptable to the people of that country. A few years ago the hon. gentleman and certain of his colleagues advised the Governor General to dissolve Parliament before the usual period had elapsed, on the ground that the Government of the United States was prepared to enter into negotiations, and they wished a mandate from the people to enable them to negotiate. There was then a standing offer on the statutes of Canada, at least as comprehensive as the offer the hon. gentleman has now embraced, and the hon. gentleman did not regard the standing offer at that time as any indication of what the opinion of the country was, but they wished to obtain a direct expression, so they declared, from the people of this country. Now, the hon. gentleman has, by his own action and that of his colleagues, declared that this was a matter of no consequence. It was no indication of what the opinion or sentiment of Canada was, that it was no justification whatever for the Government to undertake negotiations on the subject of reciprocity. Why then embrace it here at all? For what purpose is it inserted in these resolutions? Why is it to be embraced in a measure including these resolutions? Sir, I think it is not difficult to understand the aim of the Government; it is to endeavour to persuade the agricultural population of this country that the hon. gentlemen who sit upon the Treasury benches, and their supporters, are not opposed to negotiations for a reciprocity treaty. Sir, the action of the hon. gentleman since this session opened, like the action of those associated with him during the ten past sessions, is sufficient to show that the hon. gentleman is committed to a policy which stands in the way of any attempt at negotiating a reasonable reciprocity treaty. Sir, the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) made an attack on the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton). Why, he said, the hon. member for North Norfolk rather represented the people of the United States than a constituency in Canada. What reason did the hon. gentleman assign for that statement? Simply this, that the hon. gentleman pointed out that this offer, which is to become a standing offer and which the Minister of Finance proposes to incorporate in a statute, is one which proceeds on the principle that it is more blessed to receive than to give, and that the receipts demanded are at least ten-fold as great as the Government propose to bestow. That may be a correct statement, or it may be that the hon. gentleman has overestimated the case as against the offer here made. Upon that point I express no opinion. There is no doubt they have demanded very much more, whether it is ten or fifteen times more than what they are prepared to accept I am not prepared at this moment to say. But the hon. gentleman did not undertake to show that this was a rational offer, a proposition that reasonable men would propose and reasonable men might be expected to accept. He never said one word in justification of the offer, but he declared the people of the United States were a hostile people, not disposed to negotiate a reciprocity treaty, and that there was no hope for negotiating a reciprocity treaty with them; and yet the hon. gentleman thinks these propositions should stand in the resolution. If the hon. gentleman is right in his contention, that there is no hope or prospect of negotiating a treaty of reciprocity with the United States or of obtaining reciprocal free trade in any of these matters with them, why include these propositions in the resolutions? For what purpose are they put there? For, according to the hon. gentleman's contention they can be put there, but for one purpose, and that is to mislead the agricultural population of this country, and to persuade them or induce them to believe that the hon. gentlemen who sit on the Treasury benches and those who support them are prepared to sustain a reasonable measure of reciprocity. The conduct of the Government does not point in that direction. There was a time when the Government demanded and when the Conservative party asked for a treaty of retaliation. For what purpose? To secure ultimately reciprocal free trade with our neighbours; but that was long ago abandoned. For years hon. gentlemen have supported a policy of protection as a thing good in itself, and they have believed that the less they had to do with any other country as regards carrying on trade with that country, the better off were the people of Canada. That has been the line of argument adopted and pursued over and over again, and every one who holds any other view whether in Parliament or out of Parliament outside of these propositions must be regarded in the highest degree rational. Yet, hon. gentlemen opposite, knowing that the United States are not prepared to negotiate a treaty confined to natural products, and holding that any other treaty with the United States, if negotiated on any other basis, would be inimical to the interest of the people, nevertheless undertake to sustain these resolutions and to attack the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), because he insists that the propositions made, if made at all, should be such as a community anxious to establish liberal reciprocal trade relations would be likely to accept. The hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule), said more, and he was followed in that line by many hon. gentlemen who have spoken on the subject, and asserted that we, when in office, had failed to secure reciprocity: that we had negotiated a treaty which was comprehensive in its character, embracing many manufactured articles as well as natural products, that the Senate of the United States had rejected our proposition, and that that fact of itself was conclusive evidence that the American people and the United States Congress were wholly opposed to reciprocal trade relations with Canada. If hon. gentlemen thought that offer or those negotiations of twenty years ago, nearly a whole generation ago, were evidence of the opinion of the American people at this moment, why did the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) sustain and justify the dissolution of Parliament and the appeal to the people of this country under the pretense that a treaty of reciprocity was about to be negotiated, and why does he undertake to justify the including of these propositions in the resolutions relating to the tariff? They should go overboard if the hon. gentleman is right, they should not be embraced in the tariff; it is a preposterous offer which everybody knows will not be accepted, it is one made to a people who have steered their faces against any proposition coming from the Parliament or the Government of Canada. That being so, it is impossible that hon. gentlemen can reconcile the including of these propositions in the tariff with sincerity on the part of those who proposed them. Let me say that I dissent from the statement of the hon. gentlemen, that the American people have never been in favour of the consideration of a reasonable measure of reciprocity. I have no more doubt than I have of my existence, that if the Government or its representatives, when they went to Washington a year or two ago for the purpose of negotiating a treaty had made fair propositions, perhaps not more comprehensive than those made by Hon. George Brown in 1874, those hon. gentlemen would have succeeded in negotiating a reciprocity treaty, and it was not the sentiment of any portion of the people of the United States which stood in the way, but the hostile sentiment of those on whom the Administration depended mainly for their support and continuance in office in this country. That is the position then, that is the position to-day, and everybody in this country will thoroughly understand the meaning of these propositions in the mouths of those who are hostile to any negotiations succeeding with the United States. But the hon. gentleman has referred to a failure on the part of Congress to ratify a treaty made twenty years ago. The treaty was negotiated, the Secretary of State approved it, the President also approved it, and a majority of the Senate alone stood in the way. How came that about? Was it because the people of the United States were altogether opposed to trading under all circumstances with the people of Canada? Not at all. It was because a great civil war had occurred in that country. The people of the South were arrayed against us as a portion of the British Empire, because the Government of the United Kingdom had not come to their support and supported them against the legitimate Government of the country. The people of the North were opposed to us on account of the hostile sentiment exhibited by the Conservative party of this country, who thought—not having any special feeling, perhaps, against the United States—but who thought, that it was important that Republicanism, Democratic Government, should fail, and they pointed to the civil war in the United States as an evidence that no people trusting wholly to themselves were capable of self government. Upon that point they exhibited a strong sympathy in favour of the South, and a strong feeling of hostility against the northern section of the Republic. It was under these circumstances, before that feeling had died away with the great masses of the American people, that this negotiation was had, and it failed, not for reasons of political economy, not because the American people did not think that it might be advantageous to trade with us, but because they thought that in refusing to trade with us they were inflicting upon Canada a greater evil than they were inflicting upon themselves. Those were the reasons of failure on that occasion. But, Sir, at the instance of my colleagues I went to Washington not long before the elections of 1878. I met the President, and I met his advisers, and I had an opportunity of fully discussing this question with him and them, and I have no hesitation in saying that if we had carried the elections of 1878, before the year 1880 came to an end there would have been in active operation between the people of Canada and the people of the United States, a treaty substantially the same in its provisions as that negotiated by Mr. Brown. The failure under the circumstances was due to the undertaking of a wholly different fiscal policy, which—whether the Government saw the direction in which it was leading them or not I will not pretend to say—inevitably led them into the position of upholding the manufacturing classes of this country in the exclusive possession of the Canadian market. So they felt in order that these parties might be fully in sympathy with them, and that they might be consistent in maintaining that position, that it was necessary to delude a large section of the farming population into the belief that the maintenance of that policy was in their interests as well. Therefore you find that hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches (whatever declarations they may have made to the electors) have during the past ten years stood resolutely opposed, by every act that they have performed, to the principle of reciprocal free trade with the neighbouring Republic. No one will be deluded by these two paragraphs in the resolutions. Every one will understand these that this Government is offering to the United States what they (United States) have over and over again refused to accept. When the hon. gentleman himself went to Washington and formally proposed this principle to them, they deliberately refused to receive it as a basis of negotiation. I say to the hon. gentlemen who supported the Government when they proposed specific duties, who cheered them when they proposed to repeal those duties and to supersede them by ad valorem duties, and who have encouraged them in the abandonment of ad valorem and the imposition of specific duties again, I say to these supporters of the Government that those paragraphs in those resolutions will deceive nobody. Every farmer in this country will understand what they are put there for. Every man who is obliged to abandon the production of these cereals and these products for which his farm is best suited, and whose income is diminished in some instances by one-half in consequence of this, will understand that the injury which he is sustaining is an injury inflicted on him by the Administration in the interests of another class of the community. I say this, and I am ready to repeat everywhere, because I am as convinced that it is true as I am convinced that hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches are unfaithful to the best interests of the country in what they propose: that any Government anxious to secure a fair treaty of reciprocity with the United States, and who conscientiously endeavour to carry out that object will not fail. They are just as certain to accomplish it as the Government is certain to inflict serious injuries upon the people of this country by the maintenance of that protective system that has been modified now to some extent, but the evils of which have not been diminished by the resolutions which we have now under consideration.

Mr. SPROULE. I do not propose to say anything in reply to the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), because his argument has been answered over and over again, beyond this simple observation: That if the hon. gentleman and his party were able to carry out the policy that they propounded to this House and to the country, of either free trade or a revenue tariff, doing away with every vestige of protection in it, what would they have left upon which to negotiate a treaty? If they gave away everything, as they proposed to do, and were willing to do—and as some of them say they are willing to do yet—how could they ever hope to negotiate a treaty with the United States? I rise to refer to the motion made by the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. McMillan): that the duty be taken off corn. I have no doubt that if the farmers of Canada were all similarly circumstanced to the hon. member for Huron (Mr. McMillan) it would be in their interests that the duty was taken off corn, because that hon. gentleman, as most members of this House are aware, is engaged in a business for which the great requisite is cheap feed. He is not, as we understand the word in our part of the country at all events, an ordinary farmer. He is a feeder, and not a farmer, in so far as he does not profess to raise even the grains that he feeds his own cattle on, and when he puts 100 head of cattle in the stable every fall he endeavours to get the cheapest possible feed for them, until the time comes when he can turn them out as finished beeves. It is important for him that he should get free of duty corn or any other grain that will answer his purpose. He is a feeder, and would be benefited by free corn, but there are perhaps not one out of fifty farmers who are so situated, and who would benefit to the same extent by it as he does. Therefore, in this respect what would do good to that one farmer would do an injury to the forty-nine others. So long as the great majority of our farmers are raising these coarse grains, and depend upon their sales for a profit upon their operations, so long will it be to their benefit to keep out free corn. It is a fact that no one can successfully deny that in the past, when there was free corn, it came in contact with the use of coarse grains in the country and reduced their value so that to that extent it was injurious to the ordinary farmer. What I say in regard to the farmers of my constituency applies, I believe, to many of the farmers in Huron and Bruce, as well as in Grey, and the people of Grey, so far as I know their views—and I think I know them pretty well—believe to-day that it would be an injustice to them, and that it would do them a great injury if we allowed free corn to be brought into Canada. I for one am therefore opposed to the motion of the hon. member for Huron (Mr. McMillan.)

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I personally rejoice very much at the discussions which have taken place from day to day upon this tariff, because they serve to accentuate the cardinal differences which exist between the two political parties upon the trade question in this country. We have in the first place the policy presented by the Finance Minister, a policy based, as he says, upon the principle of protection to native industries, a tariff framed, as he says, not for the purpose of a revenue, but chiefly for the purpose of promoting special interests in the country. We have on the other hand the proposition which has emanated from this side of the House, that a tariff should be based upon the principle of collecting money for revenue only, with every principle of protection eliminated therefrom. There can be no doubt as to the distinction between the two policies. In addition to that, on the question of the trade relations between this country and the United States, we have the policies of the two parties brought into clear distinction—the desire of the Opposition to have the freest and broadest trade relations as contradistinguished with the desire of the Government always to limit those trade relations. Nothing could show that distinction more clearly than the arguments which we have heard to-day. We have heard one hon. gentleman say to-night that he would like to see the duties reduced on some articles which were consumed by the people whom he represented, while on all other articles, consumed by people in other parts of the Dominion, he was perfectly willing that high duties should be paid. You have thus one class played off against another class, with the result that the great consuming masses of the people are fleeced for the benefit of the manufacturers. Then, the free traders are driven to say: 'If you must have a protective tariff, while that exists the particular industry that prevails in that part of the country from which we come must have its share. They are taunted with inconsistency because they say: If you engage in fleecing the consumers all round, you must do some justice to the people of my section. In that way the policy of the Government sets class against class, and defrauds the masses in the interest of the few. But we have the great question before us to-night, whether the Government are advancing or receding in their desire to promote trade relations with the United States. It is clear to those who have attacked their record that they are receding, and receding fast. When the protective tariff was introduced, it was introduced with the explicit statement that one of its objects, if not the main object, was to promote reciprocity with the United States. I think that was part of the resolution formulating their policy; and, after they came into power, they boasted that they had put on the statute-book what was called a statutory offer, announcing the desire on their part to bring about a fair reciprocity of trade with that country. What was that standing offer. I desire to read it to-night for the purpose of showing that hon. gentlemen opposite have receded very largely from the position which they then assumed. At that time they were willing to make a pretty broad reciprocity treaty in natural products: they did not confine their offer to one or two articles, as they do at present, but specified a pretty large number. That offer was as follows:—

Any or all of the following things, that is to say, animals of all kinds, green fruit, hay, straw, bran, seeds of all kinds, vegetables (including potatoes and other roots), plants, trees and shrubs, coal and coke, salt, hops, wheat, pease and beans, barley, rye, oats, Indian corn, buckwheat and all other grain, flour of wheat and flour of rye, Indian meal and oatmeal, and flour or meal of any other grain, butter, cheese, fish (salted or smoked), lard, tallow, meats (fresh, salted or smoked), and lumber may be imported into Canada free of duty, or at a less rate of duty than is provided by this Act, upon proclamation of the Governor in Council, which may be issued whenever it appears to his satisfaction that similar articles from Canada may be imported into the United States free of duty, or at a rate of duty not exceeding that payable on the same under such proclamation when imported into Canada.

There, Sir, we had, as compared with the puny offer they make now in this tariff, a large offer—confined, it is true, to natural products, but still a large offer. Those articles were to be admitted not only free of duty, but at a reduced rate of duty if the duty upon them was reduced by the other country. That offer, contained in the tariff introduced in 1879, was repeated in 1888 with a great flourish of trumpets; and at that time there was not to be found, so far as my recollection bears me out, a gentleman on the other side of the House who did not cheer to the echo the policy of the Government in placing this offer on the statute-book. They went to the country proclaiming that they were sincere and earnest in their desire to obtain reciprocity with the United States; and in proof of their desire they produced this, what they call their standing offer. How do they stand to-day? Are they repeating that standing offer to-day? Why, Sir, the very tariff which we have before us contains provisions enormously limiting the offer which they then made. Outside of lumber, they simply provide that green or ripe apples, beans, buckwheat, pease, potatoes, rye, rye-flour, hay, and vegetables, n.e.s., with barley and corn, shall constitute the statutory offer which they make to the United States. Now, Sir, I ask hon. gentlemen to explain why they have excised from the offer so many important articles which were contained in the previous statutory offer. It is for this reason, Sir. They have been logically driven from the position which they attempted to take every year, that they were in favour of a reciprocity treaty. They are now showing themselves in their true colours. They are not in favour of it. How do we know that? Their late leader, Sir John Macdonald, in 1884, said that any man who had watched the expression of opinion given on the other side of the line—in the press and by leading statesmen and members of the Government—must know that no offer of reciprocity could be carried into effect unless it embraced manufactured goods. That was stated by Sir John Macdonald and accepted as a truism by hon. gentlemen opposite. Therefore, they stand in this position, that they themselves were aware when they went to Washington, in 1891, that they could not hope under any conceivable circumstances to negotiate a treaty with that country, unless they included a list of some manufactured goods. What did they do when they went there? We had the statement made by the Minister last year or the year before, of his recollection of what had taken place, with a certified report corroborating his statement. We are not concerned with the differences of statement or the differences of recollection that may be shown between our Minister and the United States Minister; but we are concerned to know what was really and substantially the opinion that the United States Minister held on that question, and we are not left without positive and absolute proof on that point. We have the message which Mr. Blaine transmitted to the Senate, stating in explicit terms what he and the Government of which he was a leading member were prepared to do; and that is entered on the official records of the United States Government. He recapitulates a controversy that took place between him and the commissioners of Canada on the subject of reciprocity; and what was the first rock on which they struck? Why, Sir, it was on this very point which their leader had told them years before was an absolutely essential thing in the negotiation of any reciprocity treaty, namely, the admission of some portion of the manufactured goods of both countries into that treaty. What does Mr. Blaine say? I read the whole of his report last year, and will not trouble the House with the whole of it now. But the matter is so crucial and important, that I think it well to put once more upon the record a portion of it. He said:

The Commissioners were informed that the Government of the United States would not be prepared to renew the treaty of 1854, nor to agree upon any commercial reciprocity which should be confined to natural products alone; and that in view of the great development of industrial interests in the United States and of the changed conditions of the commercial relations of the two countries since the treaty of 1854 was negotiated, it was regarded of essential importance that a list of manufactured goods should be included in the schedules of articles for free or favoured exchange in any reciprocity arrangement which might be made.

There it is as clear as the noonday sun, that the Congress of the United States was then prepared to enter upon negotiations for a treaty which would embrace a list of manufactured goods. And I would like to ask on what grounds any person in favour of reciprocity at all, could successfully contend that manufactured goods must be absolutely excluded from such a treaty? He did not ask that all the goods should be included, but only that the principle of including some classes of goods should be agreed upon, and then he would invite them to discuss article by article. What did our commissioners do? Did they evince the slightest desire to enter upon any such treaty, knowing that such condition was the cardinal point upon which the negotiation of a treaty must necessarily turn? No; they turned their backs upon that offer, and they told him, to use his own language:

In the conference of the 11th, the Canadian commissioners stated that they had given careful consideration to the suggestion that manufactured goods should be included in the schedule of articles for exchange in a reciprocity convention, and to the desire expressed by the Government of the United States that such American goods, on their introduction into Canada, should be afforded preferential treatment over similar goods from other countries; and they announced, with an expression of regret, that they did not consider it possible to meet the expectations of the Government of the United States in these respects.

Then follows the several reasons which the commissioners gave for coming to that conclusion. They absolutely refused to consider the question at all, and Mr. Blaine winds up his report as follows:—

The announcement of these conclusions of the Canadian Commissioners was accepted as a bar to further negotiations on the subject.

There is the sum and substance of the whole matter. If the Canadian people are not prepared to include any manufactured goods of any kind in the treaty, then they proclaim a bar to the negotiation of any treaty whatever. Hon. gentlemen opposite have taken that course, and stand before the country to-day, with their minimized standing offer, proclaiming clearly a policy which they know, by official declarations, is an absolute bar to the negotiation of any treaty. I do not know how hon. gentlemen from the Maritime Provinces defend this new statutory offer which these hon. gentlemen make. Why are these articles, which formerly we were willing to exchange either free or at a reduced tariff, eliminated from the standing offer to-day? The offer is a pitiable, contemptible one, which we know will not be accepted, and is intended to throw dust in the eyes of that large mass of people who know that in a reciprocity treaty—a fair and honourable trade treaty—with the United States lies the assurance of prosperity. I cannot condemn too strongly the action which the Government has taken; and, while I rejoice at the fact that the differences between the two parties are becoming daily more accentuated, I regret most deeply, that those who have charge of our affairs have seen fit to turn their backs on a policy which I have always believed will result in bringing prosperity to our people.

Mr. FOSTER. I have listened patiently for several hours to this renewed discussion upon the subject of reciprocity. And I would not rise now were it not that I think it is only fair to the gentlemen who have discussed the question on the other side, that some notice of their remarks should be taken by the Government. And I think it is only fair that, after the ingeniously-worded statements, the special pleading and—I am not going to say misrepresentation—but party representation of the question, some notice should be taken of the remarks made by hon. gentlemen opposite in the interest of the Government as well. Let them have their own fling; let them reiterate arguments to satisfy themselves; let them make statements and assertions, if they please, without contradiction—and they will put themselves and their own party in a favourable light before the country, if it can possibly be done. But I think there is something else to be considered. We have to consider whether these statements are true, whether the representations they make are correct, and whether the conclusions they come to are justified by the documents in hand and the course of history in this matter. Several things have been discussed to-night, and I wish to take up a few of them. First, as to whether the United States has or has not for the last period of years, say twenty years, shown any very favourable disposition to enlarge trade relations with Canada. It has been stated that they have, and it has been stated that they have not. But there is an historical aspect to the question, which any person may study, and on which he may come to his own conclusions. But hon. gentlemen opposite—some of them who have made the statement, and made it very emphatically—find just behind them internal contradictions. One of them sits behind the leader of the Opposition. He is a gentleman who is a free trader, a consistent member of the party opposite, but, who, living alongside the border, has kept his eye on these developments between the United States and ourselves. And yet, out of an experience as long and an observation as keen as that of any gentleman on that side, he states to-night, as his deliberate opinion, that the United States have not, in the course of their history, shown any great desire for enlarged trade relations with Canada. I believe that hon. gentleman is right. It makes not a whit of difference whether we belong to one party or another, we ought to read history aright and properly. From 1854, when the United States entered into a treaty with Canada of reciprocity on certain lines, from that very moment a spirit of opposition began to be developed to the treaty—to what they called the disadvantages of the treaty as concerning themselves, and its uncompensated advantages as regards Canada. Time and time again efforts were made towards its abolition, and, when 1866 came, the very first period that it could be abolished, it was abolished, and, as everybody knows—it seems too bad to have to repeat it again—it was abolished, not because Canada did not wish to have it continued, but because the people and the legislature of the United States determined it should no longer continue to exist. Can there be any doubt about that? Take the history of the negotiations from that time. In 1866, in 1868, in 1869, in 1871 and 1872, in 1874—to come no further up—did not Canada make repeated endeavours on her own account, and by the aid of and through the mother country, to have that treaty renewed, and have these advantages continued as between the two countries—advantages which Canada claimed were mutual. Is there any doubt as to that? Is there any doubt that, upon each one of these occasions, Canada was met, not with an equal spirit to her own, but with the idea of the United States that the treaty of 1854 was now ended, that they did not wish to have it renewed, and did not care for reciprocal trade between the two countries on those lines. Much has been said about the Hon. George Brown's negotiations. He went there; he did go through the form of negotiations; he wrote out a large list that was agreed to. But, when we come to the ultimate conclusion of the matter, the people of the United States would have nothing to do with it at all. It is one thing for two or three gentlemen to arrange about an exchange of commodities, but the decision lies with the ultimate power, which is the Senate of the United States, and, when these negotiations came to the Senate, that body did not give them even the courtesy of consideration. Then, Sir, take the history of the case from that time up to the end of the Mackenzie Administration. Mr. Mackenzie himself, a man of good common sense, who led his party with a firm and strong hand, repressed repeatedly the tendency on the part of some followers to attempt to force the Government to beg from the United States what they had refused in 1874, and told his followers repeatedly in answer to questions that the Government had made all the advances they thought it prudent or proper to make, and that, on the next occasion, the first advances should come from the United States.

Mr. CHARLTON. Who said this ?

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Mackenzie, your former leader. Take the history of the case from that time up. Hon. gentlemen opposite take for granted, what they desire to believe, whether they honestly believe it or not, and they make the assertion over and over again, that they understand the motive of hon. gentlemen on this side, understand the inward desires of the Government. No matter whether the indications point in a totally opposite direction, they know all about it, and declare that the motive and wish and desire of the Government is to prevent any enlarged trade relations with the United States.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Most assuredly.

Mr. FOSTER. How do they know ?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Because of your acts.

Mr. FOSTER. The tendency of our acts is entirely in the other direction, and every unprejudiced observer and reader will recognize it, and will see that only the pro-versity of hon. gentlemen opposite appears in the assertions to the contrary—that is all. They declare that we have no desire for extended trade relations, that we never had, that every effort of ours has been rather to frustrate extended trade between the two countries. That is all declamation, but it does not win any credit and does not effect the truth of the matter, or the reading of history, one iota. I tell these hon. gentlemen who make these assertions on grounds that are not tenable, that they are entirely mistaken. The Government—and I think I know what has taken place—has been anxiously desirous of enlarged trade relations between this country and the United States; but they have been anxiously desirous, in attaining these, that no interest of Canada should be sacrificed without a corresponding advantage. Hon. gentlemen opposite have the lack of courtesy to declare that commissioners had started from this side on the part of the Government in 1891, and had gone to Washington with the full determination that no treaty should result from their labour, and that they took the best means that they possibly could, to make sure that the negotiations should be fruitless. There is no ground for the statement. The opposite is entirely true. I know that the opposite is true. Now, listen to the special pleading of the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Davies, P.E.I.) We noticed on this side, whether his friends did or did not, how deftly and, I must say, how, with a lack of true candour, he avoided the principal point in dispute which arose in the last negotiation. He stated to this House, and to the country, as plainly as he could, that when we went to our negotiations, and when an offer was made of a treaty on the old lines of natural products. Mr. Blain informed us that that could not be entertained by the United States Government or the United States negotiators, and that Mr. Blain said, in effect: If you will consent to take in some manufactured articles, then we will talk to you about arranging a treaty. And the hon. gentleman deliberately stated, and every word he spoke went to fasten the conviction upon the House and the country, so far as his influence could do it, that we and the United States negotiators parted on the question whether we would put in any manufactured articles or not. I tell the hon. gentleman that he is incorrect, and he ought to know he is incorrect. The hon. gentleman can read English, and he ought to have a mind sufficiently trained to take in the plain meaning of English words. There is another point the hon. gentleman was not anxious to have brought before the House and the country, because it accentuates the difference between them and us. It is true the first proposition was made for a renewal of the treaty on the basis of the old reciprocity treaty, the free exchange of natural products of the two countries, modified to meet the changed condition that had meantime arisen. That is the first step. It is true the United States negotiators declined to proceed upon that basis, and said that in order to the negotiation of a treaty between the two countries, manufactured goods must be included. I will not debate the point for the instant whether it should be a complete or a partial line of manufactures. It is sufficient that the condition was made that manufactured goods should be included. What was then the dispute that arose? It was not whether this Government would enter upon negotiations upon that basis, but the foundation of the whole question had to be considered as to whether the United States desired that the manufactured goods that were included in the list should have preferential treatment over importations from other countries. And, Sir, although the hon. gentleman did not mean that it should come out, he had to read the latter part of Mr. Blain's assertion as well as the first, in which Mr. Blain affirms exactly what I stated, that we split upon the question of preferential treatment for their manufactured goods in this country. Now, the hon. gentleman slipped over that very adroitly. Does he think he can pull the wool over the eyes of the hon. gentlemen in this House, and over the eyes of the people of this country? Why should he not be candid with the House, and give the whole of the facts? It is plain that this was where the negotiators parted—when the United States declared to us that, if manufactured goods were admitted on the list, they must be admitted as against their chief competitor, Great Britain, in the markets of Canada, a British colony. That is where we differed; there is no doubt about that. If hon. gentlemen opposite would have done otherwise—and they have not a single ground to stand upon unless they would—let them so declare, and go to the country upon that question. This Government would not yield that point. We were willing to negotiate upon the basis of leading lines of manufactured articles being included in the treaty, but, before we canvassed the list of manufactured goods, as sensible men would do, we wanted to know the conditions upon which they would enter into these negotiations. The condition was that it should be upon a basis preferential to the United States, and discriminatory against Great Britain, a point which we did not care to cede; and, consequently, there was a bar to further negotiations. That is the truth of the matter. It has been stated in this House, over and over again, and yet, every year, the same dreary, monotonous reiteration of these things take place before the House, with a view to getting it before the country. Hon. gentlemen opposite are very much disturbed. I have not seen them in such a state of perturbation for some time. The reason for it is plain. Now that we are upon the agricultural schedule, their agitation takes an acute form and shows its symptoms very decidedly. What is the matter? They fear that the Government will have some credit for making legislation which will be favourable to the farming interests of this country, and they want to try and raise a hue and cry that we are insincere. The country has judged us before. The country has seen our actions for fifteen or sixteen years. The country has had our policy and has lived and thriven by it, and we can appeal with confidence to the country, against these gentlemen, in a year hence, as in other years, we have appealed and not in vain. They talk about this offer being an absurd offer. You would think the United States had offered us the half of their kingdom, and that we had refused to accept it. My hon. friend grew virtuously indignant over this "hollow sham," "this mockery" contained in such an offer as that. He read out the items and tried to make it appear that there could be no trade beneficial to the United States in those things. We have receded in our reciprocity arrangements, he says, receded in our reciprocity tendency towards the United States. How consistent the hon. gentlemen are about it! Talking free trade, and every principle and every vestige of protection to be taken out of the tariff as soon as they get power to make it, and talking in the same breath about including a list of manufactured articles in which to give a preference to the United States! With free trade how can they give a preference to any body? If they give free trade they give to every country all that country can require, and they have nothing to offer in return. They come here to-night and at this very hour they inveigh against us because we have not put in our Bill the reciprocity clause of 1868, which included natural products, and yet there is not a day passes that one hon. gentleman after another does not get up and declare that he is a fool, and a madman, if he is not a knave, who thinks that you can possibly have reciprocity with the United States on the line of agricultural or natural products. They find fault with us because we do not go back to 1868 and put in the clause which they themselves for the last ten years, at least, have not ceased to declare is simply impossible as a method of negotiation and a basis of trade between the two countries. We have changed, they say, and in this reciprocity offer of ours to-night we have offered nothing to the United States, whilst the United States have been regal, royal and princely in the offer they have made to us. Why could not a friend of Canada stand up in this House, with Canadian interests behind him and about him, and put the matter fairly? Why could not a friend of Canada upon that side of the House be candid for once and make a whole statement of the facts? What would it be? It would be that from 1868 until to-day the United States had shown no very strong desire to enter into trade relations with us on a fair and a reasonable basis. More, that candid friend would show that as year after year has passed, this feeling has strengthened towards us, and that to-day, while the Democratic party is in power in two branches of the Legislature, whilst they are putting their policy upon the statute-book as fast as their methods will allow them, when we come to read their last word to us, we find in it no offer of reciprocity that is even as broad or as generous as the one which we make them. Why could not a friend of Canada have pointed that out? But instead of that, hours of declamation must be brought to play against the Government and the Conservative party of the country, as to the humbug, the hollow mockery conveyed in this clause which we propose as a reciprocity offer to the United States after their generous offer of reciprocity to us. Look at their offer of reciprocity to us, and from the first to the last word what do you find? The party in power to-day, as far as its voice has gone, waiting only for the crowning act of legislation, has declared that every reciprocity treaty that has been formed by the United States within the last six years shall be swept clean off from the statute-book and be null and void so far as they are concerned. For twenty-five years it has been a tenet of the Democratic party that whatever is done in the way of trade arrangements between the United States and other countries should not be done by the Senate as a close body, should not be the will and dictum of one part of the legislative machinery of the United States, but that it should be a matter of fiscal legislation, a laying on of taxes or duties, and that it is the function of the House of Representatives and not of the Senate. According to this, their historic policy, whatever country is given reciprocal relations in trade those relations must be established by legislation in the House of Representatives and not by treaty to be confirmed only by one branch of the Legislature. That is the whole tendency of their legislation, and the last word they have given us upon that point is in the line of the historic policy of the Democratic party, a policy which has much to recommend it, and with which to-night I am not finding fault. But having declared themselves against reciprocity treaties, having swept off reciprocity from their statute-book, then they say what they will do in legislation with reference to Canada. And here is their offer, as I find it in their Bill now before the Senate :

Buckwheat, corn or maize, corn meal, oats (oat meal), rye, rye flour, wheat and wheat flour, 20 per cent ad valorem, but each of the above products shall be admitted free of duty from any country which imposes no import duty on the like products when exported from the United States.

That is their offer of reciprocity. I put that alongside our offer of reciprocity in the legislation we propose, and I leave it to any candid man which is the fairer of the two ; I leave it to the farmers of this country, to the farmers of Ontario, who in these two points are chiefly interested, and nine out of every ten of them will say that ours is a fair offer. If they will let our barley go into their country free of duty, we will let their corn come into this country free of duty. Last year we imported two million bushels of corn, of the value of about one million dollars, from the United States of America. If we give them a free market for that corn from this country is it not fair that we should ask them to give us a free market for our barley ? That is the proposition we make. We include some of the articles that they mention and others which they do not mention, but which give a fairer compensatory trade so far as they are concerned. We put that proposition upon the statute-book, and it is as fair and as reasonable an offer as one people can make to another. As I have said, the policy of the Democratic party which is to-day the party in power, is against a reciprocity treaty, and in favour of making their trade arrangements by legislation ; therefore, we must look at the different items as they will ultimately come out in their tariff legislation in order to know what advantages they have given to trade with Canada. With the people of the United States we have lived in peace and amity, we always expect to live in peace and amity with them, and we wish to have with them a trade founded on a fair and equal basis, as broad as it can be, but with reference to that trade we do not go to the extreme position that we in Canada are never sure of future prosperity and success unless we get that indispensable condition of a free entrance into their market. When they look over the items in our tariff as it shall have passed this House, they will find that line after line, article after article, grade after grade, we have given them a better chance to get into our market than they have given us to get into their market ; consequently legislative reciprocity so far as trade is concerned, shines out from the propositions that the Government put before the House to-day, in a far greater degree than it does out of the legislation which they have proposed, and which is in progress through their Congress. Now, Mr. Chairman, I am sorry to have taken up so much time, but I wanted to put a statement of the facts against these reiterated assertions, and I must say incorrect representations, made by hon. gentlemen opposite. One thing I wish to say again, and that is that it is not a good kind of party warfare, it is not altogether an honourable party warfare, for gentlemen, in the face of historic facts, in the face of what cannot be disputed, continually to go on and declare that the motives of the Government are other than their actions show, are other than their professions go to show, as well. They do that : they attempt to show that we went to Washington, and that we never could have gone to Washington other than with the direct idea and secret purpose of frustrating negotiations in which we had no part. The hon. gentlemen are welcome to that form of attack, if they think it would promote the advantage of their party ; but to my mind it is not the best one for themselves, and I am quite certain it will not prove to be the best before a fair and reasoning electorate as that of Canada.

Mr. LAURIER. The hon. gentleman has prefaced his observations with respect to the policy of the Government on reciprocity, or rather their want of policy, with the statement that for the last twenty years there has been no inclination on the part of the United States to enter into reciprocal relations with Canada. Let hon. gentlemen mark his words. I repeat that the basis of all the hon. gentleman's observations was that for the last twenty years there had never at any time been a disposition on the part of the Government of the United States to enter into negotiations with Canada for a reciprocity treaty. Why, has the hon. gentleman forgotten his own remarks and action? There was never such a slap given by a Minister of the Crown to a Governor General as that given by the hon. gentleman. He has forgotten that Parliament was dissolved in 1891 on the statement made by the Government to the Canadian people, that they had an offer of reciprocity. Here is the Minute of Council on which Parliament was dissolved in 1891. Here are the words placed in the mouth of His Excellency :

The Committee of the Privy Council having learned that the Secretary of State of the United States had expressed to Her Majesty's Minister at Washington his readiness to negotiate a reciprocity on a wide basis.

Was there, or was there not, a lack of disposition on the part of the American Government to enter into reciprocal trade negotiations with Canada? What is the proof, I want to know, in regard to the events at that time? What is the proof at the present time? Is the hon. gentleman truthful, when he says that there never was a disposition on the part of the United States Government to make a reciprocity treaty; or has he, as had often been done previously, deceiving the House and the people, when the Government made the announcement that they had received an invitation to negotiate a reciprocity treaty? The fact is, as hon. gentlemen well know, that such an invitation to enter into a reciprocity treaty came from the American Government to Canada; but it was well known at that time that Secretary of State Blaine had stated, not to the Canadian Government, but broadly throughout the country, that the Government were prepared to enter into negotiations for a reciprocity treaty, but a treaty on a wider basis than the treaty of 1854. It was as well known as anything can be, for it has been declared publicly, not once, but ten times, that both the Democrats and the Republicans were prepared to negotiate a treaty of reciprocity, not on the basis of the treaty of 1854, but on a basis which would include manufactures as well as agricultural products. The reason, however, why this offer never was accepted was because hon. gentlemen opposite have been receding year after year from the position they occupied in 1878, when they appealed to the country, and when they stated they desired to obtain protection with a view ultimately to obtain a reciprocity treaty. That was the appeal made to the Canadian people in 1878, that was the policy on which the Government went to the constituencies at that time; but hon. gentlemen opposite have during subsequent years, in fact from 1878 until the present time, receded from the position, and when they are brought face to face with the possibility of obtaining a reciprocity treaty, they take refuge in some excuse for not carrying out what was at one time their own policy. How can hon. gentlemen opposite, I want to know, lead the House to believe that they are in favour of a reciprocity treaty? Listen to the debates that have taken place, not this year, but every session during the last five or six years. There has always been a plea by hon. gentlemen opposite for no reciprocity; it has been pretended that Canada was better off without a reciprocity treaty, not only as regards manufactured goods, but even as regards agricultural products. Did we not hear, two or three years ago, a member of the Government, Mr. Colby, then President of the Council, declare, and his words were never contradicted on the floor of Parliament, that Canada was better off without reciprocity, even as regards agricultural products? Did we not hear in this very debate a supporter of the Government, the hon. member for Kent, N.B., (Mr. McInerney) declare that the reciprocity treaty of 1854 had been a calamity, an unmixed evil to Canada? If it had been an unmixed evil to this Dominion, no wonder that hon. gentlemen opposite do not want reciprocity, which, according to some of those hon. gentlemen, was an unmixed evil; and no wonder, when hon. gentlemen opposite visit Washington, they say "good day" and "good bye" at the same time—they enter the city and leave it almost immediately afterwards. No wonder, under such circumstances, they make a pretense of desiring reciprocity, but never put forth any efficient efforts to secure it. It was in the power of the Finance Minister to have obtained a reciprocity treaty when he made his visit of three minutes to Washington. But the hon. gentleman was afraid of the possibility of discriminating against Great Britain. He did not wish to discriminate, although yesterday he practically told the House that the treaty with France would involve discrimination against Great Britain. But at that time the hon. gentleman was determined that there should be no discrimination against Great Britain, and, therefore, he would not contemplate the possibility of concluding a reciprocity treaty in manufactured articles. Will the hon. gentleman tell me that a reciprocity treaty, even as regards manufactured goods, involves discrimination against Great Britain? I could mention article after article of manufactured goods on which, in the event of reciprocity with the United States, there would be no discrimination against Great Britain. Does the hon. Finance Minister pretend that, if a reciprocity treaty with the United States included pianos and musical instruments, that would involve discrimination against Great Britain? So in regard to ploughs and agricultural implements of every kind there would not be the slightest danger of any discrimination against Great Britain. Why does not the hon. gentleman enter into a consideration of a list of those articles? Simply because he does not want reciprocity. Hon. gentlemen opposite might then have had reciprocity without discrimination against Great Britain. If we want to judge of the sincerity of the Finance Minister, we can do so by remembering that he has told the House that he was in favour of reciprocity, but he did not desire to obtain it in that form. The hon. gentleman has proposed a few articles as to which he makes a standard offer to the United States, and they are in the line of the American tariff. Strange to say, a few days ago the hon. Minister was asked to place a certain article on the list embodying the standing offer, but he would not do so. The hon. gentleman then said: How do we know about the American tariff, we do not know how it is to-day, we do not know how it will be in a few days. Although he did not know anything as to the American tariff then, yet he tells us now that he proceeds on the line of the American tariff when he places these articles on the standing offer. If he takes the American tariff which he knows to-day and which he did not know fifteen days ago, why does he know it only in part? He knows the American tariff in so far as it applies to agricultural products but when it comes to articles of manufactured products he does not know it at all. He has no objection to meet the Americans upon their standing offer with regard to agricultural products, but when it comes to the article of salt he ignores it altogether, or when it comes to the article of farming implements, which I understand is also in the American standing offer, he ignores it completely, and he will have none of it. Could anything show more conclusively the insincerity of hon. gentlemen opposite? I tell them, and I repeat it, that their efforts at reciprocity have never been genuine and sincere, that they are only a sham to obtain the votes of the people, to mislead them, to make them believe that they are in favour of reciprocity when they are not, and cannot. Why? The reason is obvious. Their masters, the monopolists, will not allow them. The hon. gentleman says that he would not discriminate against Great Britain. Does he forget that in fact he has been discriminating against Great Britain for the last fifteen years? Does he forget that the tariff which his friends and followers have been defending for the last fifteen days has been and is a constant and daily discrimination against Great Britain? The Minister of Finance a moment ago appealed to an intelligent electorate. Sir, I accept that appeal. I do appeal also to an intelligent electorate, and I am sure that whenever the occasion is given (though hon. gentlemen opposite boast of their past victories) the intelligent electorate will see through and beyond all these pretenses of the Government, and discover what the reality is.

Amendment (Mr. McMillan, Huron) negatived on division, and item agreed to.

— Dutiable breadstuffs, grain and flour and meal of all kinds, when damaged by water in transitu, twenty per cent ad valorem upon the appraised value, such appraised value to be ascertained as provided by Sections 58, 70, 71, 72, 73, 74, 75 and 76 of the Customs Act.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). In reference to this article, it will be well if it could be defined more clearly, so that the ruling in the Customs Department might be uniform in all cases. I would like the Minister to state what is meant by "grain, damaged by water, in transitu?"

Mr. WALLACE. "In transitu" means coming from some foreign country to Canada. It has been decided by the Department of Justice that in transitu is not going from one American port to another.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). It is well to have items of this kind so defined that you will have something like a uniform ruling in reference to these matters. I think the Controller knows that there have been different rulings given at different ports.

Mr. WALLACE. I do not think so.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Supposing grain left Chicago consigned to a person in Buffalo was damaged by water in transitu, and was sold, say at Detroit, to a Canadian as damaged grain, what would be the ruling of the department in a case of that kind as to the duty for bringing it into Canada?

Mr. WALLACE. The ruling of the department, I believe, is that in such a case the article is not in transitu. Under the circumstances mentioned by the hon. gentleman it would not come under the provisions of this clause.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Why should that be the ruling? That is a point we ought to make clear.

Mr. WALLACE. Because the words "in transitu" there must be adhered to, and it is decided that they mean what I have stated.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). The intention evidently is that the grain having become less valuable shall be appraised ad valorem. I cannot see why an article so damaged, and thereby losing its marketable value to some extent, should be charged to its full amount. The principle is recognized that because the grain has lost part of its value that it shall not be charged the same duty as if it retained its full value. Why should the words "in transitu" be there at all?

Mr. WALLACE. That is a question for Parliament to decide, and Parliament has already decided that the words should be there, and the department must carry out the law.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I know that you are just re-enacting the old clause, but I am bringing it before the attention of the Committee now so that it shall be clearly understood.

Mr. WALLACE. I understood that the hon. gentleman was objecting because there were different rulings on the matter.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I say that it is liable to that. If it be the intention of Parliament that there is to be an ad valorem duty upon goods that have lost part of their market value, and are therefore entitled to be entered at a lower rate, and if the words "in transitu" prevent that being done, then you are placing an impediment in the way of your carrying out your desire. In the case of this grain which has lost part of its market value, but which is yet an article that is able to find a place in the market, is it the desire of the Government to allow that to be entered at a lower rate of duty on that account?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I understand the principle of the special provision to be this, that we do not desire damaged breadstuffs to be imported into Canada and sold here, and, if they are imported and sold under the ordinary conditions, they shall pay the high rate of duty; but a special provision is made for those breadstuffs which are damaged in the course of transit to Canada. That is the object of the distinction.

Item agreed to.

Oats, 10 cents per bushel.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Does the hon. gentleman get much revenue from that?

Mr. FOSTER. It depends upon the season. A short crop in Ontario causes an importation.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Is that a good time to tax oats?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. McMULLEN. I would like to know upon what principle the Finance Minister imposes a duty of 10 cents a bushel on oats. It takes 12 bushels to make a barrel of oatmeal.

Mr. FOSTER. No; only ten.

Mr. McMULLEN. If ten, that amounts to $1 on a barrel of oats coming into Canada, while he charges only 50 cents on a barrel of oatmeal.

Mr. FOSTER. We arranged to go no further than the item of oats to-night, and if the Committee will now rise and report progress, we will take up the question of oatmeal afterwards.

Item agreed to.

Committee rose and reported progress.

ADJOURNMENT—PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND MAIL SERVICE.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant).

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I desire to ask the hon. Postmaster General whether he can tell us what arrangements have been made for the carriage of mails to and from Prince Edward Island. The hon. gentleman knows the unfortunate accident by which the steamer has been detained in the ice for eight or ten days, and during that time the people of the Island have been without a mail at all. I understood from some of the officials that some people were endeavouring to make arrangements to put a tug on. I would like to know if that has been done, because the serious character of the detention is something I can hardly describe.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Instructions have been sent to put on a tug, and, from the information I have received from the department to-day, I believe those instructions have been carried out.

Motion agreed to; and the House adjourned at 11.45 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, 18th April, 1894.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

VOTING BY EMPLOYEES.

Mr. RIDER moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 87) to facilitate the voting by employees at elections of members for the House of Commons. He said: The object of the Bill is to facilitate voting by employees and labouring men at elections of members for the House of Commons, by permitting them to leave their employment for at least two working hours, for the purpose of voting on the days on which such elections occur.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

CAPT. EDWARD DUNN.

Mr. LANDERKIN asked, Was Captain Edward Dunn, of the Dominion fishery steamer "Cruiser," suspended or dismissed from the service? If so, when and why? What was his salary and position? Is Captain Edward Dunn now in the service of the Government? If so, in what capacity? When re-appointed, and at what salary?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Capt. Dunn was suspended on the 18th October, 1892, for not properly carrying out certain instructions concerning the charter of a vessel for the fisheries protection service. He is now in the service of the Government, in the capacity of fishery officer in command of the Government steamer "Petrel." He was appointed on the 5th September, 1893, at $90 a month when actively employed, and on half-pay when the vessel is out of commission. $90 a month was his previous salary.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Was he dismissed?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. No, he was suspended.

Mr. LANDERKIN. He was suspended for a year?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. He was practically suspended for a year. That is, he was not under pay during that time.

MR. DIMOCK.

Mr. FLINT asked, What amount has been paid Mr. Dimock for services rendered at the Chicago Exhibition? When did his services cease? Is he still employed by the Government in any capacity? If so, what are the terms of the engagement?

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Dimock has been paid for services rendered in connection with the World's Columbian Exposition, $2,541.07. His services ceased on 17th February, 1894. He is not now employed by the Government in any capacity.

THE MEMBER FOR WINNIPEG.

A question respecting the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin), standing in the name of Mr. Amyot, being called,

Mr. FOSTER. Will the hon. gentleman allow his question to stand?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I object to this question being put. There are statements of disputable matter in it, which makes it out of order.

Mr. FOSTER. Will the hon. gentleman allow his question to stand, as the First Minister is out?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). No; it is out of order. The point of order has been raised.

Mr. MARTIN. I would ask the hon. gentleman to waive his point of order, and allow the hon. member to ask his question.

Mr. SPEAKER. My attention was not drawn to the question until just a moment or two ago, but it seems to me a very objectionable one at least. Whether it is outside the rules of order or not, I am not prepared at the moment to say, although I think it is for two reasons. First, the rule laid down states:

That a question should be simply and severely accurate in its allegation. If it is hypothetical, it is objectionable, and as a rule should not be answered.

But apart from all that, this question, as far as I can gather, has relation to matters which have arisen outside this Parliament altogether. And looking at it from those two points of view, it seems to me very objectionable.

Mr. AMYOT. I would like to know the ruling of Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think the question is out of order for the two reasons I have stated.

MAIL CONTRACT, HURON COUNTY.

Mr. McMILLAN asked, Has the contract for carrying the mail from the railway station to the post office at Clinton, in the county of Huron, Ontario, been renewed lately? If so, were tenders invited?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. This contract was renewed last February, and tenders were not invited as it was renewed.

PROMOTION EXAMINATIONS, P.O. DEPARTMENT.

Mr. CASEY (for Mr. Edgar) asked, How many third class clerks were there in the Post Office Department who had passed their promotion examinations at the date of the special examination of Mr. John Graham, held on 16th December, 1893?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Fifty-six.

GOVERNMENT COMMISSIONERS ON THE TARIFF.

Mr. CASEY asked, Were the members of the Government who held meetings at various points throughout the country since last session, formally appointed commissioners for that purpose? Did they receive any instructions from the Government as to the conduct or objects of the inquiry they were prosecuting? If so, what were those instructions? Did they take or have taken notes of the evidence laid before them? Have they made any report to the Government as to the result of their inquiry, with or without notes of the evidence? If not, why not? Is it expected that they will make any such report with notes of evidence? If so, will it be promptly laid before the House for its assistance in discussing the proposed changes in the tariff? What sums were paid to or for each of the gentlemen engaged in this inquiry, for travelling and living expenses, or otherwise; and what has been the total cost of such inquiry to date?

Mr. FOSTER. The members of the Government who held meetings at various points throughout the country since last session, were not formally appointed commissioners for that purpose. They did not receive any instructions from the Government as to the conduct or objects of the inquiry they were prosecuting. They did take notes, mentally and otherwise, of the evidence laid before them. They have not made any report to the Government, and the reason why is because it was not expected that they would. It cannot, therefore, be promptly laid before the House for assistance in discussing the proposed changes in the tariff. The travelling expenses of the members of the Government, as is usual, were paid out of contingencies. I cannot just say now the amount.

Mr. CASEY. What about the total expenses?

Mr. FOSTER. I cannot give that at present.

Mr. CASEY. Will the hon. Minister let the part as to the cost stand and answer it later?

Mr. FOSTER. Well, I do not know.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). How far are those mental notes still legible?

Mr. FOSTER. They are legible in the tariff propositions which have come before the House if the hon. gentleman will read them.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Which, the first or second set?

Mr. FOSTER. Both.

PIERRE FURLOW, STAVE CULLER.

Mr. McMULLEN. I notice in the printed question that a clerical error is made. "Stone culler" is printed instead of "stave culler." I would ask, When was Pierre Furlow appointed stave culler at Quebec? What is his salary, and what is the amount of fees collected for his services as culler since he was appointed?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). Pierre Furlow has not been appointed stone culler at Quebec. No such person of that name has been appointed.

Mr. McMULLEN. Has he been appointed stave culler?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). If the hon. gentleman will allow his question to stand, I will look into it to-morrow.

Mr. LANDERKIN. These clerical errors are becoming epidemic.

CULLERS' OFFICE, QUEBEC.

Mr. McMULLEN asked, What is the number of cullers in the cullers' office in the city of Quebec? The amount of fees collected during the last fiscal year, and the salaries paid to the entire staff of cullers at Quebec?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). The present number: Eleven cullers, $7,700; supervisor and office staff (nine), $6,580.38; total, $14,280.38. The salaries paid to the entire staff at Quebec during last fiscal year, amounted to $10,661.38.

Mr. FOSTER.

ANALYTICAL INDEX OF TARIFF.

Mr. WALLACE read the following letter:—

OTTAWA, 16th April, 1894.

Hon. N. C. WALLACE,
Controller of Customs.

SIR,—Referring to application of Mr. Somerville, M.P., for a copy of the accounts rendered by the Queen's Printer for the "Analytical Index" to the tariff and to your answer in the House of Commons on the 5th instant, as to the cost of such work;

I have to state that owing partly to the manner in which the answer to this question was prepared and partly through a mistake of my own the cost of the first order of 2,500 copies, $1,414.77, was given instead of the cost of the total number printed, 3,550 copies at a cost of $1,881.44.

The total number of books published is covered by three orders, as follows:—

|---------------------------|---------------|
| June 6th, 1893..... | 2,500 copies. |
| September 12th, 1893..... | 1,000 do |
| July 17th, 1893..... | 50 do |

It was only on the day the question was to be answered that I was directed to give the figures as to the cost, and being exceedingly busy, in my haste I mistook the one account for the first order as covering the entire quantity published.

Yours respectfully,

R. R. FARROW,
Clerk in charge of Expenditure.

EXPORT OF CATTLE.

Mr. MULLOCK. Before the Orders of the Day are called. Mr. Speaker, I would like to call the attention of the Controller of Customs to page 10 of the report for 1893 of the Minister of Agriculture, and to the figures therein given, showing the number of cattle exported for the calendar years 1890, 1891, 1892 and 1893. The hon. gentleman will remember that the other day he gave some figures on this subject in reply to a question. These figures do not quite agree with the figures in the report. I am not finding fault, but, perhaps, as there seems to be some inaccuracy—

Mr. WALLACE. I think I can explain. Our statements are for the fiscal year ending 30th of June, while I think that the Department of Agriculture make their statements for the calendar year.

Mr. MULLOCK. But the question I put to the hon. gentleman referred to the calendar year, and I suppose that the figures were given accordingly. And those figures do not correspond with the figures given in this report.

Mr. WALLACE. I will compare the figures and give the hon. gentleman an answer to-morrow.

TARIFF COMMISSION.

Mr. MARTIN. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to ask the Government when we may expect the return moved for some time ago giving the details of expense of Ministers going through the country to make inquiry concerning the tariff ?

Mr. FOSTER. I will inquire about the matter and let the hon. gentleman know.

BOUNDARIES OF THE PROVINCE OF QUEBEC.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved for :

Copies of all correspondence, instructions, Orders in Council and reports relative to the northern and north-eastern boundary of the province of Quebec, not already laid before this House.

He said : Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to renew my remarks of last session, which were fully met by the hon. Minister of Interior at that time. I only wish to have brought down any papers that have been received since on this subject, correspondence, Orders in Council, and so on. Perhaps, also, the hon. Minister of Interior would say a few words about the progress that the surveyors have made during the recess in the examinations they were instructed to make, and would state whether these have been completed or whether they are to be continued during the current year.

Mr. DALY. Mr. Speaker, in answer to the hon. gentleman, I may say that considerable progress has been made in the exploration of the territory referred to since the question was before the House last year. According to the reports received up to last session, the distance of 450 miles had been surveyed along the East Main River. Since that time, during this past season, Mr. Low and Mr. Eaton, the gentlemen on the survey, have surveyed 750 miles. They have discovered a number of branches of the East Main River, which are detailed in Mr. Low's preliminary report which has been received by the department. This report I hold in my hand and I will be glad to hand it to the hon. gentleman. I will not detain the House by giving an account of the facts covered by the preliminary report, except to say that, owing to the scarcity of provisions at Port Chimo, on Ungava Bay, where he arrived in August, he thought it best to take advantage of the Hudson's Bay steamer and he wintered at Hamilton Inlet. He says :

For those reasons I have resolved to go with the party on the ship to Rigolet, and from there to the post at Northwest River at the head of Hamilton Inlet, and during the winter send provisions up the Hamilton River, and ascend the river a hundred and fifty or two hundred miles before the ice breaks up next spring. By this means the summer months can be devoted to the exploration of the interior, making a survey of the Hamilton River to its head, and the return trip in the fall can be either by one of the rivers flowing into the Gulf of St. Lawrence or down the South River to Fort Chimo.

So we hope that when the explorer returns next fall he will have complete information with reference to the sources and the direction of the East Main River, and will give all the information possibly to be obtained by exploration of the territory covered by that river and its tributaries. There is no objection to the motion.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The information is quite satisfactory. May I ask the hon. gentleman whether this report will be printed ?

Mr. DALY. It is not printed, but I will hand the hon. gentleman a type-written copy which I have here.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The report ought to be printed and in the hands of members, accompanied with a map showing the direction of the East Main River. The hon. gentleman knows that that river is a very long way north, and the propriety of taking that river as the boundary between the province of Quebec and territory to the north would depend a good deal on the direction of the river. The House ought to be put in possession from time to time of whatever information may reach the department.

Mr. DALY. This is only a preliminary report sent in by Mr. Low, and we have received it by courtesy of the Hudson's Bay Company. I do not think it would be well to publish it, but rather to wait until a full report is in which can be printed, accompanied by a map. The explorer may find it necessary to make some changes as to the branches of the East Main River, because it has been shown that it divides into branches flowing south-west and north-west. I think it would be better not to publish until we have a full report, and it is expected that that full report will be in the hands of the department in time to be laid on the Table next session.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Has the Rupert River been surveyed as a possible boundary and its direction ascertained ?

Mr. DALY. That is one of the objects sought, and we will have a survey of the Rupert River.

Motion agreed to.

SEIZURE OF THE 'WILLIE MCGOWAN.'

Mr. McDOUGALL (Cape Breton) moved for :

Copies of all correspondence between the Dominion Government and Her Majesty's Government, on the subject of the seizure by the Russian cruiser 'Zabiaka,' of the Canadian schooner 'Willie McGowan,' in the North Pacific Ocean, in June, 1892.

He said : This vessel, the 'Willie McGowan,' owned by several people in North Sydney, Cape Breton, sailed from the port of North Sydney on the 18th November, 1891, for British Columbia. After arriving at Victoria, she cleared from that port for the sealing grounds in the North Pacific on 14th May, 1892; and, after two months' fishing, she was seized at a distance of over forty miles from land by the Russian cruiser 'Zabiaka,' on the 18th July, 1892. A prize crew was put in charge and she was brought into a port called Peterispolleski on the Russian coast. She was taken with all the skins and property belonging to the owners of the vessel. The crew was transferred to the cruiser and deprived of part of their clothing, and put on scanty rations for a number of days. They protested against it, and were threatened with imprisonment in Siberia. After some time they were allowed to take passage on board a United States vessel for British Columbia, and thence they found their way home. The vessel, fitted out as she was by the owners, was estimated to be worth about $15,000, and the loss to the owners by being deprived of that season's fishing is estimated at about $10,000. The owners are yet without any redress or compensation. On behalf of the owners, I would like to impress on the Government the necessity of pressing for a settlement of this matter in the interest of the men who suffered this great loss, a loss which they can ill afford to bear. The Russian authorities having admitted the illegality of the seizure, on behalf of the owners of the vessel I beg to urge upon the Government that no further delay should take place in securing redress for the owners of this vessel.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. There is no objection to the papers being brought down, subject, of course, to the understanding that the question covers those papers which we are at liberty to bring down. Correspondence is now, and has been for some time, going on with Her Majesty's Government about this case; and, as the House knows, before we could bring that down we must communicate with Her Majesty's Government on the subject. But, subject to that provision, there is no objection to the motion passing. The hon. gentleman has alluded to the extreme hardships in connection with this seizure, and the papers, when brought down, will show that he, as well as the owners, have been most active in bringing to the attention of the Canadian Government the circumstances connected with that seizure.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Will the hon. gentleman state to the House what the facts are? because we do not know them.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. As we understand them, the seizure occurred in 1892, and was made by the Russian vessel 'Zabiaka,' and the Russian Government put forth as a justification that this vessel was poaching within the Russian territorial limits. There was no assertion in this case, so far as the papers disclose, of extraordinary jurisdiction either over the waters or over the seals; and at Paris, we used the correspondence that had gone on from that date between the Government of Great Britain and the Russian Government, in order to show that the United States' contention in the main case was not supported by the Russian authorities. The owners of the 'Willie McGowan,' and the owners of several other vessels seized during the same season, deny absolutely, and with great circumstance, that they were within or near the waters over which Russia had any jurisdiction; on the contrary, they were, as even the Russian Government admit, seized a considerable distance away, and, in this case, some twenty-one miles from the coast, according to the Russian statement. The British Government made the usual prompt protest against this and other seizures. The Russian Government represent that the seizures having taken place at a great distance from the seat of Government, they proposed to carry on a very thorough inquiry by a commission into the facts connected with the different seizures.

Mr. LAURIER. I understand the Minister to say that it is admitted even by the Russian authorities that the seizure was made twenty-one miles from shore. On what ground did they pretend they had a right to make a seizure at that distance?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Hot pursuit was their contention. They claim that this vessel went to poach upon the Commander Islands, went to raid the Commander Islands, and took seals, either on the land or close to the shore. According to the Russian story, the vessel was sighted fifteen miles from land, and when the 'Zabiaka' went to board her she sailed away, and the 'Zabiaka' gave chase and overtook her at a distance of twenty-one miles from the coast. That is the Russian statement, and the report of the Russian commander of that coast. Their whole case was put upon the ground of hot pursuit. And they submitted the question to a commission. The British Government have awaited the result of that commission, and the last papers that have been communicated to the public in England, and which are produced in the Fisheries Report laid upon the Table of this House this session, is the report of that commission. In connection with the 'Willie McGowan' they find that while they still suspect she was a poacher, and that the seals found on board were seals taken close to the shore, they did not feel justified in declaring that the seizure of this schooner was altogether regular; in other words, they were unable to find evidence to support their suspicion that she was within the territorial limits. And so, in her case, and in the case of several other vessels that were seized that year, they came to that conclusion. On the other hand, in some cases, they say that the evidence is very strong, and they are prepared to stand upon it, that they were poaching within the three-mile limit. This case, so far as the published papers go, stand there. The claimants in nearly every one of the cases insist that the facts have not been fairly put before the Russian Government, that it was an ex-parte inquiry and was not satisfactory to them. The masters of those vessels are amongst the most respectable of our shipping class, are seamen of good standing and citizens of such a character that their statements are exceedingly strong; and the Canadian Government have steadily forwarded, as alone it could do, their remonstrances, their petitions and their requests, and have urged upon Her Majesty's Government that everything should be done that can be done to obtain for them at least a fair hearing, at least some arrangement by which the witnesses can be brought face to face, if there are no other means of ascertaining the real facts. I think I am at liberty to say, at all events under the circumstances, considering the long delay, considering that these people or some of them are in destitution from the damage done to them, and they are, so far as we know and believe, thoroughly innocent and have obeyed all laws in following a legitimate pursuit on the high seas, we have pressed for this commission, and Her Majesty's Government has brought before the Russian Government these facts and that position of the case, since which time we have had no definite information whatever as to the result. I, of course, need not mention to the House the unfortunate and almost necessary delays that occur in all these cases, these diplomatic discussions which take place between the Governments of the great nations of the world. There is a disposition everywhere to avoid an open breach, to avoid war, and this case, as I have mentioned, stands in this position: The Russian Government is not raising any difficult points of international law, but is relying on the reports of its officers and of the commission, and is simply insisting on the legality of the seizures, with the exception of one or two to which I have referred, the "Willie McGowan" being one. The unsatisfactory statement I have to make at this late date is, that, while they do not believe in that case there is anything more than suspicion hanging on the vessel, no means have yet been reached whereby assessment of the damage could take place. I venture to suspect that, in connection with this matter, the whole of the cases will be dealt with at once. I think if some means are reached by which the facts can be ascertained, some arrangement will be arrived at for ascertaining and arranging the amount of the damages in all the cases; but I take it for granted that, as soon as these diplomatic discussions have been brought to an end, there is nothing remaining in the case of the 'Willie McGowan' but the assessment and payment of the damages.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I desire to inquire from the Minister of Marine, whether any steps have been taken by our Government, or any suggestion made by the British Government, looking to the appointment of a joint commission which might dispose of those cases? It is quite obvious that, if our sealers are not to be excluded altogether from Behring Sea, it is very likely that disputes of that kind will be cropping up either with the United States Government or the Russian Government, which owns, I think, one-half or thereabouts. So far as my recollection serves me, and I am speaking from memory, in somewhat similar cases the British Government has more than once made arrangements with a Government like the Russian Government for the appointment of one or more commissioners chosen by each country, who would deal summarily with those cases. One thing is very obvious, that in cases like that of the 'Willie McGowan' such delay as is sure to arise between our Government and the Imperial Government and the Russian Government, will result in a great many cases in an utter denial of justice. As the Minister knows well, in the case of the Behring Sea outrages, for I must call them so, committed eight years ago, for which no redress whatever has yet been given to the Canadian subjects aggrieved. I should not like to think, I do not think, that, in the case of the Russian Government, similar delay would occur; but I may say that my own experience of the enormous length of time consumed as between the Canadian Government and Her Majesty's Imperial advisers and the advisers of European powers, or even of the United States, leads me to believe that, if justice is to be rendered within a reasonable time, it must be done by referring the matters in dispute to a joint commission.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. That subject has not been lost sight of, and there has been considerable correspondence on the question of a joint commission for this inquiry particularly. As to the present season or as to future seasons, this subject is, perhaps, placed on a more satisfactory footing by the arrangements that have obtained in the various 'modus vivendi' we have had. For instance, it is arranged now, and it was arranged last season, that where a vessel was arrested by a Russian cruiser for coming within the thirty-mile limit of the Commander Islands, instead of taking the vessel to a Russian port, the vessel should be taken to a British port.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. gentleman speaks of a thirty-mile limit in the case of the Commander Islands. When was that agreed to?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Last year there was a modus vivendi between Great Britain and Russia, under which it was agreed that no fishing whatever should take place within a radius of thirty miles of the Commander Islands, and the Russian Government agreed not to take more than 30,000 seals on those Islands, they having taken in previous years 38,000 and even 40,000, we having, as we had, the report of our commissioners that the system on those Islands was much more satisfactorily and effectually carried out in connection with the system of killing the seals than that which obtained on the Pribyloff Islands. Under an exchange of notes, that arrangement was made, and it was further arranged that any vessel found within the thirty-mile zone, instead of being taken by the vessel making the seizure into a Russian port, should be taken to a British port, so that an immediate trial should take place into the facts before a British court, or her papers should be taken from her and she should be directed to the nearest British port. One or two seizures occurred under that convention, and I am very glad to say that the trial that followed—one trial took place at Yokohama—resulted in the vessel being acquitted of committing any offence. The reason I referred to that case was to show the House that for the future, both with Russia and with the United States, there is a more satisfactory method, and there will be a more satisfactory method of settling the facts, and that method in both cases will be before a British court, in the case of our vessels, no doubt, a vice-admiralty court in British Columbia. But in reference to the other question of a joint commission, the Canadian Government long ago sent fully the facts and reasons for the establishment of that, and in the meanwhile, both in this case of the 'Willie McGowan,' and others similarly situated, we have been endeavouring from every source to obtain all the evidence that can be used on that occasion. The House will see, that supposing that tribunal were constituted tomorrow, there is much that the owners will have to do; the collection of the men is a great difficulty in their way; they must collect the testimony that they had available at the time, and that is why we have been urgent to press upon Her Majesty's Government the necessity of haste, because every day's delay, every month's delay, places more difficulty in the way of the owners to bring their cases before any proper tribunal.

Motion agreed to.

RIVER YAMASKA DAM.

Mr. LAURIER moved for :

Statement of all sums paid by the Government for the construction of the River Yamaska dam under the first contract and subsequently thereto up to this date.

He said: The object which I have in making this motion is chiefly to ascertain from the Government what is their intention with regard to that dam. The present Minister of Public Works remembers that his predecessor in office commenced the construction of that dam about ten or twelve years ago: the dam was completed at some date—a year, I think, after that, as much as perhaps $200,000 having been spent upon it. A portion of the dam was washed away by a freshet in the spring. The object of the dam was to raise the level of the water so as to make the river navigable for a distance of some thirty miles. In consequence of a portion of the dam being washed out, the whole of that work has become perfectly useless and the water level is just the same as it was before its construction. This state of things has been in existence, certainly for two years, and perhaps for three years; and yet the Government have done nothing at all with regard to repairing the damage that has been done. The fact is that at the present time, the whole of the money expended there gives no more benefit than if it had been thrown into Lake St. Peter or into the Yamaska River itself.

Mr. OUMET. This work was commenced and completed by my predecessor long before I was in office. I am supplied by the department with the following information, which may be useful to the hon. gentleman and also to the House. The works required for the improvement of this river were first reported upon in 1835 by Mr. Alexander Stephenson, C.E., who preferred the idea of raising the water by means of a dam to that of deepening it by dredging. In 1856, Mr. Page, Chief Engineer, also reported on this work and recommended the construction of a lock and dam at Yamaska to raise the water and render it navigable a distance of twenty-five miles from Lake St. Peter. Again in 1880 the matter was brought to the attention of the department by petition, which represented that the volume of trade to be served by the improvement asked for represented an annual sum of from $200,000 to $400,000, and that if navigation was rendered more easy by dredging or otherwise this amount would be easily doubled. Acting upon these representations the department ordered the chief engineer to make an examination, and this officer recommended in January, 1881, the construction of a lock and dam at Ile à Cardin, with four feet of water on the lock sill at lowest known stage of water, the lock to be 133 feet long and 33 feet wide. The tenders were asked, and a contract was awarded to Messrs. Brecken, Gaherty & Davis, in October, 1881. I am informed by the department that the dam and lock are in a pretty fair state of repair, and that they fully answer the present requirements of the trade on the river. I am sorry to have to admit that the expectations as to the future development of that trade have not been fulfilled. The trade has not increased, and I think, on the contrary, it has diminished. It is the opinion of the department that the dam and lock, as they are there now, are amply sufficient to meet the requirements, and it is not at present the intention of the department to spend any more money to improve it unless trade would require it. The papers will be placed before the House and all information that can be imparted to the hon. gentleman will be gladly given.

Mr. LAURIER. I am really surprised to hear the hon. gentleman state that he is informed by the officers of his department that the work is in a fair state of repair. Unless the dam has been repaired since the month of July last it is in the worst possible condition, because, as I said in presenting this motion, a portion of the dam has been washed away, and therefore there is not an inch more of water than there was before. It certainly cannot be in a good state of repair as long as this condition remains. I cannot conceive how it is possible that the officers of the department should have made such a report. If the hon. Minister would send a special officer there I am sure he must report that the work is in a bad state of repair, and that at the present time it is not only not an advantage, but it is a positive nuisance.

Mr. OUMET. I have no doubt that it could be very greatly improved, but as a useful work the state that it is in now is amply adequate to the requirements of the trade.

Mr. LAURIER. That is a sad comment upon the Department of Public Works.

Motion agreed to.

CLAIMS BY BRITISH COLUMBIA SEALERS.

Mr. LAURIER moved for :

Copies of all memorials and petitions of seal fishermen in British Columbia, for compensation by the Imperial Government or the Canadian Government for losses arising through them out of the award of the Behring Sea Court of Arbitration.

He said : It has been stated in the public newspapers of British Columbia that petitions were to be sent, either to this Government or to the Imperial Government to ask for compensation for damages resulting out of the award of the Paris Court of Arbitration ; because, as I understand it, it was stated that as soon as the award was put in force by the legislation of the United States and of Great Britain, that the trade of the British sealers in the Behring Sea would be completely destroyed and sacrificed. I move this motion in order to ascertain whether such petitions have been received by this Government or sent to the Imperial Government through the instrumentality of the Canadian Government.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Mr. Speaker, I also saw in the papers, very soon after the award was published in August last—I think it was a month or two after that—that certain sealers in British Columbia were very much exercised in reference to the stringency of these regulations, and that they proposed to call a meeting on the subject ; but I do not think the meeting ever took place. Certainly, no memorials or petitions ever have been received by the Government of the character mentioned in the motion—indeed, none on that subject. In order to make sure, I made a special inquiry, when I saw the notice of the hon. gentleman's motion, and was confirmed in my impression by receiving this answer from my department :

No memorials or petitions from seal fishermen in British Columbia, for compensation by the Imperial Government or the Canadian Government for losses arising to them out of the award of the Behring Sea Court of Arbitration, have been received. With regard to the position of the sealers, while there is much speculation and a great deal of room for argument as to the future, they have had the courage to proceed this year with practically the same fleet as last year, when they sent out the largest in the history of the business. When these difficulties occurred in 1886, there were some eighteen vessels all told registered in Canada engaged in sealing, either on the coast of British Columbia or north in the waters of Behring Sea, and the catch was comparatively small. The profits, of course, were very good indeed. But there are now some sixty vessels engaged in that business, of which fifty-seven have cleared either for the Japan coast or for the more southern waters on the coast of this continent. I think that thirteen or fourteen of them have gone for seals on our own side, going south as far as California, as usual. But it would be really impossible for them, I think, to make out any satisfactory case for presentation either to the Canadian Government or to the British Government until they had really put to the test their experience in sealing. The business has greatly changed. They know far more about sealing now than they did in 1886. They have made a great deal more money since 1886 and since this trouble occurred than they ever dreamed of making before. Since these complaints have arisen, they have made enormous sums of money comparatively, and one great difficulty, I fancy, that must meet them now is their own very great competition with each other. The fact that where there were only eighteen vessels in 1886 there are now sixty engaged in that business, in itself says a good deal. But one curious feature of all these disputes is that for the last three or four years the Canadian sealers have practically had the sealing business to themselves. The business on the islands, so lucrative hitherto to the lessees of the United States and to the United States exchequer, has been at a standstill ; the operations of those lessees have practically amounted to nothing. They have been allowed to take 7,500 seals for the natives, chiefly for food, instead of the millions they took formerly, and instead of 60,000, they reduced the number under the terms of their last lease. All the profit in the sealing business, so far as the United States and Canada are concerned, has been in the hands of Canadian sealers. Nevertheless, I would not for a moment minimize in any way what may be their loss; but I take it, and I merely throw out the suggestion, that one reason why no formal memorial or petition was forthcoming, was that had they begun early in the day to complain, they might have been answered by Her Majesty's Government that they might at least have made a fair trial of the regulations before they made any claim. Nothing has been done by the Canadian Government that will interfere with their claims whenever they are forthcoming. After what I have said, I take it that the hon. gentleman will withdraw his motion.

Motion withdrawn.

PROVINCE OF ONTARIO FISHERIES.

Mr. MCGREGOR moved for:

Copies of all Orders in Council and departmental orders now in force in the province of Ontario, concerning fisheries therein, and of all petitions received by the department with regard to the same.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in making this motion I may say that the county which I have the honour to represent is very materially affected by the fishing laws of this country. It is one hundred miles long, and only fourteen miles across, and is almost surrounded by water. It is in the neighbourhood of a very large body of water which abounds with fish; but the county being adjacent to the United States, our fishermen have great difficulty in getting their rights from the department at Ottawa. In that county we have an agreeable climate, second to none in Canada, and a soil equal to any in the country. We grow large quantities of grapes, peaches, tobacco, corn, and other grains. But we are not only hampered by the restrictions of the Department of Fisheries, but we feel the iron hand of the tariff very heavily. The county is only from three to five hundred yards from the United States boundary; and while our American neighbours are subject to no restriction in regard to their fishing laws, our fishermen are trammelled in every way. On Lake St. Clair, which is from thirty miles to forty miles in length, our fishermen on the Canadian side have only four pound-nets, while they have seen American fishermen use seventy pound-nets without restriction. That being the case, and the two countries being so close together at that point, we feel that the Government should allow our fishermen, especially in that portion of the Dominion, to have the same privilege as their American neighbours. In 1889, the last year for which the American census gives an account, we find that the Americans took from the waters of Lake St. Clair, the River Detroit, and Lake Erie

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER.

$1,899,988 worth of fish, while the Canadian fishermen, with the restrictions upon them, took only $299,000 worth. This shows the position in which our fishermen stood at that time. Notwithstanding the restrictions, the fish caught in Ontario during the last few years have been increasing, as the following figures will show:—

| | |
|-----------|-----------------|
| 1880..... | 11,473,040 lbs. |
| 1885..... | 27,778,100 “ |
| 1889..... | 32,169,032 “ |
| 1892..... | 33,328,433 “ |

Now, the Americans' catch on the great lakes, in their waters, was as follows:—

| | |
|-----------|-----------------|
| 1880..... | 68,742,000 lbs. |
| 1885..... | 99,842,076 “ |
| 1889..... | 117,085,568 “ |

The report for the year 1889 is the last American report, but it is supposed that in 1892 130,000,000 pounds were taken, or about twice as many as in 1888. The Minister will say, no doubt, that Canadian fish breed in Canadian waters. We can prove beyond doubt that if the wind blows from the east the people on the other side take the fish, and if it blows from the west the people on the east side take the fish, so that the direction the fish take is governed by the wind at the time they cross. The following figures will show the amount of fish taken in those years by the Americans. The catch along the shores in the State of Michigan was:

| | |
|-----------|-----------------|
| 1885..... | 27,294,000 lbs. |
| 1892..... | 33,714,000 “ |

The State of Wisconsin, which borders on a portion of the great waters in which we are interested, took:

| | |
|-----------|----------------|
| 1887..... | 5,541,741 lbs. |
| 1892..... | 19,271,000 “ |

Nearly four times as much in 1892 as in 1887. The catch of fish in Lake Erie, both by Americans and Canadians, has been increased on both sides of that lake:

| | |
|-----------|----------------|
| 1880..... | 31,095,000 lbs |
| 1885..... | 59,220,000 “ |
| 1889..... | 73,189,085 “ |

The American catch in Lake Erie in 1889 was 31,781 tons out of 5,000 square miles of water. The area in Ontario, of the Canadian portion of the great lakes, is over 80,000 square miles. If that area were fished by as many nets and men as are engaged in the American waters, our catch would amount to two hundred and fifty million pounds. This, at 5 cents per pound, or $100 per ton, would be worth $12,500,000, whereas we took but 16,668 tons in 1892, which were valued by the hon. Minister at only $2,000,000. We feel that that is a great loss to this country. If our fishermen disobey the law now on the statute-books their nets are seized and burned, their boats are broken up, and the men are imprisoned, if necessary. There is no place where the fishermen are so hardly used as in Ontario, especially on the borders where we live. We appeal to this House for relief. Our people have purchased their boats and nets, and many of them have purchased the lands in front of which they fish. They have gone to great expense in the way of taking out stone, building up piers and capstans, putting the nets in good order, yet, under the restrictions imposed, they cannot fish anywhere on the Detroit River, they can use but four nets on Lake St. Clair, and five or six on Lake Erie—that is, in our portion of the lake. We feel that these men should be protected just the same as if they had a patent on the waters on which they fish. Our friends opposite say we are looking to Washington for a tariff. Well, we would like very much if they would look to Washington in respect of fishing laws, because we are peculiarly situated. We are bordering on the waters in which our fishermen are specially interested, the States of Michigan and Ohio, a portion of Pennsylvania and a portion of New York. Those States have their individual laws, as each State has the right to make its own fishery legislation, and it is impossible for our Government to negotiate satisfactory relations with those four States. We feel that while we are preserving the fish we are not preserving them for the Canadians, but for the Americans. We feel that we are peculiarly situated, and we ask the hon. Minister what Essex has done that she should be so treated. Why not give us some advantages? While the Americans have taken $1,500,000 worth of fish out of the waters opposite to us, we have to content ourselves with taking only $240,000 worth. While they have 1,500 men at work we have to content ourselves with 220. That being the case, we feel the hardship greatly, because the very time that the fish come up our rivers along the banks of our lakes is the time we are restricted. We called a meeting in the city of Windsor for the purpose of asking the people along the shores their opinion with reference to fishing matters, and at that meeting the following resolution was carried:—

Moved by Mr. Dufour, seconded by Jacques Pajot, that whereas fish found in international waters between Canada and the United States, are owned in common by the people of these countries; and whereas it is known that the fish migrate from one side of our lake to the other; and whereas the States of Ohio, Michigan and Wisconsin, bordering international waters, charge no license fee, they do not restrict either as to number of men or nets, and have practically no close season; and whereas in Canada a heavy license fee is charged, the number of men and nets are restricted, the number of nets being recently reduced by 50 per cent, a weekly close season is provided from six o'clock on Saturday night till seven o'clock on Monday morning, also a general close season for the month of November, which practically means the prohibition of white-fish fishing along the shores of this county, except a short distance along the shores of the townships of Colchester and Mersea; and whereas the practical result of this condition is that along the shores of that part of the States of Ohio and Michigan opposite the county of Essex, the Americans had 1,500 men engaged in fishing in the year 1889, and the value of the fish caught was $1,900,000, while in this county only 245 men were employed, who caught fish to the value of $227,000: therefore be it resolved, that this meeting most emphatically condemn the restrictions placed upon the fishermen of Canada, and are of opinion that until some mutually satisfactory arrangement for the protection of our fish can be arrived at with the United States, Canadians be allowed to fish under the same regulations as are the Americans.

That motion was carried unanimously. That being the case, it speaks strongly for the feeling in our district. Then, again, we feel the want of fish. I would say that there is no county in Canada growing as rapidly as the county of Essex. We have a population of nearly sixty thousand. There is no county that has shown as well on the census, and all we ask is fair-play. We ask that the Minister of Marine, who has not seen fit to even pay us a visit, should come and discuss the matter with us. We have been in the county a long time, and we know that these restrictions mean an annual loss of at least half a million dollars to our people. We have put the case as fairly and honestly before the Minister as possible, and invited him to make a personal inspection, but, so far, he has not acceded to our request. The Deputy Minister has been amongst us several times, but his mind was made up so positively that we cannot get him to act. Now, Sir, we say that the Minister and the department are a little more than harsh in their action with reference to our river and lake fisheries. We have an island in the Detroit River, called Fighting Island. This island was purchased by Major Paxton in the year 1854. He paid this Government somewhere in the region of $6,000 for that island. It is a small island, and the land is of comparatively little use, but he bought it for fishing purposes. The deed reads that he takes in the land to the channel bank. From 1854 until within the last two years he occupied that island for fishing purposes, and for that almost alone. He cleared out the rocks from the river, and has gone to a good deal of expense in building piers and making other improvements. Last year, the Government came down and they appropriated his piers and his capstan and reels and everything belonging to him, and that without paying him a single dollar. Now, I appealed to the department in every way I could, and I am appealing to the House now to ask if there is not some mode in which to proceed. We claim that this is a great injustice to the man who really owns to the channel bank. Then, again, Mr. Speaker, people complain that the fishing season is too short. The restrictions in reference to close seasons prevent us from fishing during the only season when the fish come into our waters. The Government, in fishing for themselves did not even set us a good example, for their agent fished during the close season. The power of the law had to be invoked, and the agent of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries was brought up and fined by the magistrate of the district. The fish could not be sold at that time on the Canadian side, because of the close season. So they took them across the water and sold them to our American friends. We were thus deprived even of the opportunity to buy the fish for our own use. Now, Sir, the close season commences in November. We ask the Government to take into consideration the changing of the close season so as to make it commence at the 25th of November and extend to the 15th of April. This country, Mr. Speaker, is expending somewhere in the neighbourhood of $4,000 a year for the maintenance of a fish-hatching house in the town of Sandwich, a mile or two from where I live, and on the borders of the Detroit River. But our laws are such that our fishermen get no benefit from this fish hatchery, because they are prevented from fishing by the close season. We say that if the laws are to be maintained as they are at present, it would be better to do away with the fish hatchery and save the money. Our men, no doubt, will continue to go to the other side of the line; for I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that we have lost a large number of our young men, and some of our middle-aged men as well, who were brought up to fishing. Sir, I have several reports here from men who have examined the waters, and these I should like to quote to the House. For instance, we have the report of Mr. Charles Wilmot, in the Report of the Department of Fisheries. I quote from page 93 :

As an illustration of the correctness of this view I would call your attention to the American shore of Lake Erie, where, even with a small-meshed pound-net (say 1½ and 2 inches, which I am strongly opposed to), fishing has been carried on for the past twenty years in a most extensive manner without any apparent signs of decrease in the better classes of fish.

Then on page 48 of the report for 1892 there is a quotation from Mr. C. W. Keyes, the manager of the Sandusky Salt Fish Company, who handles large quantities of fish at Sandusky, and who said at the Detroit conference on Dec. 20th, 1892 :

There were more whitefish taken this fall in Lake Erie than have been taken for a number of years.

I read these reports to show that, though our American neighbours are fishing alongside of us Ontario people, they are taking more fish from the lakes and rivers now than they did some years ago. I could go on and quote for an hour, evidence of the same kind on this subject, but I do not wish to weary the House. Mr. C. W. Keyes, an experienced fisherman of Sandusky, Ohio, whom I have already quoted, in his speech at the Detroit conference, said :

The month of November is the only time that it is possible to catch the fish, that is to fish for commerce, and you take the month of November out of the fishing season and you may as well hang up your nets entirely, that is at the western end of the lake.

I could go on and show that the Americans have increased their catch. In 1885, the catch in the State of Michigan was 27,294,975 pounds, and in 1892 it was 33,714,868. In Wisconsin there was even a greater proportionate increase. Mr. Speaker, we have a large number of petitions from the municipal councils along the borders of the lake, as well as petitions from individuals. Here is a petition from the County Council of Essex, which council is composed of men differing widely in their political opinions :

To the Honourable the House of Commons of the Dominion of Canada in Parliament assembled.

The petition of the County Council of Essex, in the province of Ontario, humbly sheweth :—

That the county of Essex being almost entirely surrounded by water, offers to its inhabitants unusual facilities to engage in the fishing business.

Some years ago, a large number of the people of this county were engaged in fishing in the Detroit River, Lakes Erie and St. Clair, and a considerable sum of money was realized annually which was of great benefit to the county.

The laws at present in force relating to the fishing licenses and regulations are so restrictive and unreasonable as to almost prevent any one engaging in the business of fishing with any advantage or profit to themselves. The waters surrounding our said county being international waters, afford equal advantages to our American neighbours to engage in the fishing business and a large number are so engaged.

The Americans on our border have practically free fishing, having no license fee to pay, no license being required and no limitations as to description or number of nets fished by any person or company. In Ontario we have restrictions made to preserve the fish for our American neighbours, who can take them at all seasons.

We ask to be placed in the same position as our neighbours; to do this the license system and close seasons should be abolished. The following comparison of catch of fish during the year 1889 on those portions of the States of Ohio and Michigan bordering on our county with the catch of Essex County fishermen during the same year shows the advantage of free fishing and the great loss sustained by our people:

Essex County fishing—245 men employed, catch 4,711,321 lbs. On the American side directly opposite Essex County—1,415 men employed, catch 37,470,744 lbs.

The value of these fish at three cents per pound shows of nearly one million dollars thus lost to the people of this county. For these and many other reasons your petitioners would respectfully urge that the fishery laws at present in force as applicable to Ontario should be amended so as to encourage the fishing industry and place our people on an equal footing with American competitors.

And your petitioners will ever pray.

ALFRED HAIRSINE

Warden.

Dated this 25th day of January, 1874.

THOS. McKEE,

Clerk.

This petition shows the feeling of the people in that portion of the country. I have a score of other petitions on the same subject, from one of which I would like to read a portion. It is from the inhabitants of the town of Sandwich, who are similarly interested :

The petition of the Council of the town of Sandwich, in the county of Essex, and province of Ontario, humbly sheweth as follows :—

That the town of Sandwich is situated on the banks of the Detroit River a short distance from Lake St. Clair, and is within the limits of the County of Essex, the boundaries of which are for many miles washed by the waters of the said river and of Lakes Erie and St. Clair. That some years since one of the most important and lucrative industries of this locality was that of fishing and a large number of men was employed therein whose earnings and expenditures were of general benefit. That more recently this business has largely decreased and a much less number of fishermen is employed in plying their vocation along the shores of the river and lakes aforesaid. That the strong and well-nigh universal belief in this town and in the county aforesaid is that the decline in said industry is attributable directly to the existing policy of restriction in the matter of licenses ; the weekly close seasons ; the close seasons for different kinds of fish, one running into the dates of other kinds of fish, making it impossible to fish without violating some of the regulations ; the enforcement of a close season in the month of November, the only month in the year in which whitefish can be caught in the Detroit River and Lake St. Clair ; and the curtailment of the number of gill-nets, seines and pound-nets fished. That on the American side of said river and lakes the American fishermen have free fishing, have no license fee to pay, and are subject to no restrictions as to description or number of nets fished by one person or company ; and the State Legislature of Michigan, in the month of April, 1893, refused to pass a bill making the month of November a close season or otherwise restricting fishing in international waters. In Ontario we have restrictions made to preserve the fish for our American neighbours, who can take them at all seasons. That our fishermen are thus placed in the position of seeing almost at their own doors the American fishermen doing a profitable business which they could and ought to participate in but for being hampered and trammelled as aforesaid. That, notwithstanding the lack of restriction on the American side of said river and lakes, the catch is constantly and enormously increasing as the official returns amply demonstrate. That by reason of the said restrictions, as your petitioners are convinced, the catch on the Canadian side in the county of Essex is as steadily and greatly decreasing as appears from the Reports of the Canadian Fishery Department. These reports show that said catch in said county has decreased in value from 1889 to 1892 from the sum of $229,032.39 to $150,517.10 and in the Detroit River the value of the catch has diminished in value from the year 1886 to 1889 from $198,992.50 to $19,191.25 and from that amount in the latter year to $2,725.25 in the year 1892. The catch of whitefish in Detroit River in 1880 was 103,500 fish, equal to 258,750 lbs., and in 1892 only 24,000 lbs. The diminished catch was caused by the enforcement of the close season of November, which was considered so unreasonable as regards the Detroit River that it was suspended for many years until November 1, 1889. Since then the Department permitted American fishermen to fish, in 1890 and 1891, on the Canadian side of Detroit River, in the close season of November, for whitefish and refused to Canadian fishermen the same privilege. That in the year 1889 the number of men employed in fishing on the Canadian side of the Detroit River was 127, and in 1892 this number had been reduced to 62. That but for said restrictions in all probability as many men would be employed on the Canadian side as on the American side, fishing as many nets and in waters where the fishing is admittedly as good or better. The fish migrate from one side of a lake or river at pleasure, controlled by storms of wind, seasons of the year, search of food and other reasons. The Superintendent of Fish Culture, on page 14 of his report in Report of Fishery Department for 1886, says : " A good deal of reasoning, however, may be given in support of the theory put forth, ' that the fishermen on the American side of Lake Erie reap the lion's share of the whitefish grown from the fry bred at the Sandwich Hatchery.' In the first place it has been demonstrated that of all the young whitefish which have been planted in the Detroit River and Lake Erie by the Fish Commissions of the United States and Ohio and Michigan and the Fisheries Department of Canada up to the season of 1882, by far the larger percentage has been turned out of the Sandwich Hatchery into Lake Erie." * * * We respectfully request that you will consider the fact that millions of dollars is annually lost to the fishermen of Ontario, caused by the license system and restrictions in force at the present time, and that in many localities American fishermen reap the harvest of fishes that Canadians are prevented from taking.

Your petitioners will ever pray.

ERNEST GIRARDOT,

JAMES A. STUART,

Mayor

Town Clerk.

Now, Mr. Speaker, these petitions go to show that the people in that portion of the province are being very unjustly treated. It is true that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries will say that this Act was passed during the time of Mr. Mackenzie, in 1875 or 1876. I believe that is the case ; but when the facts were properly explained to the Mackenzie Government, and it was pointed out to the Hon. Albert Smith, who was then Minister of Marine and Fisheries, what great disadvantage the people would suffer in reference to this matter, it was decided that the law should not be put in force, and from 1878 to 1889 that law remained a dead letter on the statute-book of the country. But since the hon. gentleman has taken possession of the department we have not been able to induce him to remove that restriction. We hope and trust he will be able to see his way clear to allow our people the same advantage that is allowed our American neighbours across the water, because in many places the Americans have to cast nets, and the Canadian fishermen have to do similar work at about the same time. By arrangement the American fishermen throw their nets at one time, and the Canadian fishermen at another time; but when a certain season of the year arrives, the Americans continue to throw their nets and take fish, whereas our men fold their arms and are compelled to suspend operations. We consider this to be a great injustice to the people of the county of Essex.

Mr. LISTER. The hon. gentleman who has just closed his remarks has confined himself entirely to the grievances of the fishermen in the vicinity of the county in which he lives. I am bound to say, in justice to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, that the regulations which have been made by the department, or at least some of them, and which are complained of by the fishermen, apply not only to Lake Erie but also to Lake Ontario, River St. Clair, Lake St. Clair and a portion of Lake Huron. No doubt the fishermen of the province of Ontario feel that the management of the department presided over by the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries, no matter how honest his intentions have been, has been such that they have been harassed and vexed in the prosecution of their business by the different regulations which have been adopted. It is well, in the first place, to consider briefly what the real grievances are. My hon. friend who has just addressed the House has declared that the fishermen are dissatisfied because we have not free fishing such as they have in the States of the Union. I do not know in making that statement he voices entirely the wishes of the fishermen of Ontario. We know the great difficulties which are to be overcome, so far as the United States are concerned in this, that the different States along the chain of lakes and rivers control the right to fish in those lakes and rivers, and it has been found impossible in the past to get the various States to come to an understanding with the Dominion of Canada to regulate the close season and the manner of fishing, namely, with what nets the fish shall be caught, the size of the nets, and so on. I believe that many of the fishermen of Ontario at all events will be satisfied with the close season now provided for by the departmental regulations, provided they be allowed to prosecute their business as they have done in the past, namely, with seines instead of pound-nets. The business of fishing has been carried on ever since the western district has been settled. Men have grown old in the business. Men are engaged in it who depend entirely for their livelihood upon it, who know no other work, and if they are prevented from prosecuting that business now, it means that they will be compelled to seek employment in work with which they are not acquainted and in which in all probability they will not be able to make a living for themselves and their families. The Department of Fisheries has provided by its recent regulations that no licenses should be granted to fishermen to fish with a seine, and the ground on which that position is supported by the department is that seine fishing has the effect of destroying the spawn, fry and young fish. It has been contended by the fishermen, and I believe it has been proved, that the contention of the department is unfounded so far as they are concerned. They say positively that the fry are not killed by the hauling in of the nets, and moreover that the spawn is not deposited upon the ground which the fishermen use for fishing. Be that as it may, those are the statements of the fishermen. The regulations this year provide that in River St. Clair and in the Bay of Quinté, and on the branches of the Detroit River, no seine shall be used for fishing. The Government has adopted a new policy, and has favoured fishing by pound-nets and by other means, and they have declared that under no circumstances will they grant seine licenses to any Ontario fishermen. What is the effect of this regulation so far as regards fishermen fishing in our rivers is concerned? These rivers are rapid, the deep water comes close to the shores, and the navigation is close to the shores on account of the swift current, and so it is impossible for fishermen to put the pound-nets in the river, because it would interfere with navigation, and unless seines are used they are deprived of pursuing their calling and continuing that employment to which they had been accustomed. Upon River St. Clair there are twenty or thirty fishermen who have pursued their calling there for twenty or thirty years, and the department now say that no fishermen on that river shall receive licenses to fish with seines. The result of that is, that those fishermen are deprived of their living and of the means of supporting themselves and their families. The fishing plant, which is their sole wealth, their boats, seines and shanties and other appliances connected with seine fishing, these results of years of work are now swept away by this order or regulation of the department, and these men and their families are thrown on the world to seek some other employment to which they are not accustomed, and in which I have no hesitation in saying they will be unable to earn a livelihood. The hon. Minister, no doubt, will say that these men must be sacrificed for the general benefit of Canada. The Minister's Deputy, Mr. Prince, no doubt a highly honourable man, a man well qualified to fill his position if he had experience, a gentleman from England who has been in this country for the last two years, forgets that the lakes of this country are great inland seas, while those in England are little lakes, and has been accustomed to deal in England with waters that are mere ponds compared with our vast inland seas.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. What about the Atlantic Ocean, because that was largely the seat of his operations?

Mr. LISTER. I have no hesitation, in view of the enormous reproductive powers of the fish, in saying: that it is utterly impossible to fish these streams out. My hon. friend will say that in the River St. Clair the fisheries are being depleted, that the catch is much less than it was years ago, and that the reason for that is overfishing in that river. I say, Sir, that I do not believe that the reduction in the catch of fish in the River St. Clair is on account of overfishing. They make a comparison with fifteen or twenty years ago when the traffic on these lakes and on that river was comparatively small, and when it was traversed by smaller vessels and few of them. But to-day, vessels passing up and down that river are so enormous in size and numbers, that I believe I am safe in saying that the traffic passing through that river exceeds the traffic through the Suez Canal.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. So as to understand the hon. gentleman's position better, I would like to ask him: Does he think that Lake St. Clair has not been overfished?

Mr. LISTER. I am not prepared to say whether Lake St. Clair has been overfished or not.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The reason I asked is: that in 1891, the hon. gentleman will remember that he inveighed against the use of pound-nets in Lake St. Clair, claiming that the fisheries were being injured by these.

Mr. LISTER. I have no doubt of that, and I can support the contention I then made by the report in the hon. gentleman's own department.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. That is, it has been overfished.

Mr. LISTER. It may have been on account of the pound-nets which were put into the lake, but I say that so far as the river fishery is concerned, which is a herring fishery, that it cannot be established at all that any reduction in the quantity of the fish catch in that river is owing to the seine fishermen, or is owing to fishing at all. As I was about to say: twenty years ago traffic up and down that river was comparatively small, but within the last few years it has become enormous in extent. The vessels which are now carrying the freight up and down are of immense size, and I contend that that is one of the reasons why perhaps the fisheries have not been successful in the last two years as they were during previous years. Now, Mr. Pollock, the overseer of the department, at page 24 of the departmental blue-book last year "reports fish plentiful, especially in the St. Clair River where the catch was not only better than usual, but of a superior quality." That was in the year 1893. This year he reports: "There was less traffic on the river owing to low freights, and fishing should have been prosecuted more advantageously. He thinks a larger number will apply for licenses next season. The value of the lake portion of his division he puts down at $11,482, and for the St. Clair River, $8,942." It will be seen from this that the overseer of the Department of Fisheries attributes the larger catch during the past year to the fact that there were less vessels and steamers plying up and down the river than there had been during previous years, and on that account the catch had been greater than formerly. He does not say that it was overfished, nor that the seines had destroyed the fishing ground, but he does say that the fish had been disturbed by large vessels going up and down the river close to the shore, forcing them out into the centre of the river, and across the river. That has been the cause, if there was any cause for the diminution in the quantity of fish caught. It is most irritating to our fishermen to have their nets on our side of the river reeled up, to have their men discharged, and to have their boats lying idle, when within 500 yards across on the other side of the river, the American fishermen are catching enormous quantities of fish. What can our people say and think of such a condition of things as that? It may be wise, and perhaps it is wise, to protect the fisheries and increase the quantities of fish by natural and artificial means if possible; but I say that until we can succeed in making arrangements with the United States, or with the different states fronting upon these lakes and rivers, that we have no business, either by artificial propagation or by any other means, to increase the quantity of fish for the benefit of the fishermen of the United States. If these lakes and rivers are to be depleted, then let us help to deplete them and let us have our fair share of what there may be in these rivers. I know that it is contended on the part of the department that the fish follow a well-defined course, that is to say: that the Canadian fish will never be found in American waters.

Mr. LANDERKIN. They take the oath of allegiance.

Mr. LISTER. It is contended that they remain on the Canadian side.

Mr. SPROULE. They are more loyal than some others.

Mr. LISTER. It is contended by the department that Canadian fish do not cross the water, except a fugitive fish now and then may find its way over.

Mr. LANDERKIN. A rebel.

Mr. LISTER. I take issue with the Minister of Marine and Fisheries on that point. I say that it is proved beyond any reasonable doubt at all that the fish find their way from one side to the other just as the wind happens to blow.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Will the hon. gentleman allow me. This is a very interesting subject and I am afraid his opinion on it is not much better than my own, and my own is poor indeed. But I have a great many authorities on my side, and I would ask the hon. gentleman before he concludes, to give some authorities for his contention.

Mr. LISTER. I know that neither of us know much about the question so far as catching the fish is concerned; but I say this: that the fishermen along the river have told me, and I believe it to be a fact beyond all doubt, that when the wind is from the west blowing to the Canadian shore, the fishermen on the American side catch but small quantities of fish and our fishermen are more successful in their fishing, showing as conclusively as anything can be shown, that the fish are influenced by the direction of the wind, and that as the wind blows they go from one side of the river to the other. It has been proved too, and the evidence is in the hands of the department: that fish caught and marked on the Canadian side and thrown back into the river have been taken in the seine on the American side. That has happened on more than one occasion, so that in a lake the size of Lake Ontario, or Lake Erie, and along the river, a fair inference is: that the fish find their way from one water to the other; that they do not confine themselves particularly to the Canadian side, nor do they confine themselves to the American waters. Now, Sir, this industry is a very important one. It is a growing industry, and I think that our fishermen should not be unduly hampered in the prosecution of their business. We find that in the province of Ontario alone, the value of the product for 1893, was $1,694,930. We had seventy-six tugs engaged in the business, of the value of $197,650; we had 1,012 boats of the value of $92,146; we had nets of the value of $374,246; or a total value of $664,042. The number of men employed in these fisheries in that year was

Mr. LISTER.

2,629, or, if we estimate four to a family, a total population of 9,516 depending on the fishing industry of Ontario. The receipts from these fisheries are also an important item. The Government received for rents, licenses, fees and fines in 1893, $30,623; they disbursed $20,116; leaving a balance to profit of $10,507. With the exception of British Columbia, the province of Ontario is the only province in the Dominion in which the receipts equal or exceed the expenditures. It is laid down by all fishing authorities, I believe, that the pound-net and gill-net are destructive modes of fishing. That was recognized by the department up to four years ago.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. It is now.

Mr. LISTER. I admit that the department granted pound-net licenses as far back as 1860; but we had reason to believe, from statements made by the Minister, that the policy of the department was to abolish that system of fishing entirely and to allow the system of seine fishing to go on. In reply to a question that I put to the Minister last year, or the year before, in regard to Lake St. Clair, he said, I think, that there were two or three nets there, but that no further nets would be allowed on Lake St. Clair, and I believe also on Lake Huron. There was no complaint in regard to seine fishing. The seine fishermen had petitioned against pound-net fishing being allowed, on the ground that that mode of fishing was destructive of the industry; and one can understand it. Along the shores for miles, at short distances apart, are to be found pound-nets, extending for three or four miles into the lake. They are there all the time, and it is impossible for any fish of a certain size to escape them. They work day and night, on Sunday and every other day; they never stop, while the seine fisherman puts his net in for half an hour only, and he is not permitted to fish between Saturday night and Monday morning. Therefore, it will be at once conceded that the pound-net system is a very much more destructive system. I venture to say that not much of the fry or spawn may be destroyed by the hauling in of the nets. In 1860 these pound-nets were first allowed, and they have been gradually increasing in number up to the present time, owing to the adoption of the rule by the Government that pound-nets and gill-nets must be the means employed of catching fish in addition to hoop-nets. Hoop-net fishing, however, cannot be carried on in the St. Clair River, because it is a swift stream, and that kind of fishing has to be carried on in perfectly still water. The policy of the Government is to abolish the seine-net fishing and to throw its protecting arms around the pound and gill-net fishermen, to the injury of other classes of fishermen. In certain sections of the country, as I said before, it is impossible for pound or gill or hoop-nets to be used, and the only means of fishing is by the seine. So that to-day the fishermen of the River St. Clair, of the Bay of Quinté and of other sections of the country, who have followed that lawful avocation for twenty, thirty or forty years, find themselves refused licenses by the department, and the earnings of a lifetime swept away by an order issued by the department. Some of them may be able to stand, notwithstanding this regulation; but nine-tenths of the fishermen on the River St. Clair, the Detroit River and other waters have been utterly ruined by it. I am not intending to reflect upon the Minister's administration of his department. I am frank to say, so far as the hon. gentleman is concerned, that I believe he wants to do what he thinks is best. My object in speaking is not to censure him, but to persuade him, if possible, in the interest of these people, to rescind the regulation which the department has made, and to grant these men licenses to carry on their ordinary business. The seine fishermen have no other way of making a living, and the regulation of the department destroys that industry, and ruins those engaged in it. The consequences of the regulation are so grave in their character that the department, no matter what they do on the great lakes of the country, should not prevent the fishermen of the River St. Clair, who are only catching herring after all, from following their occupation. The apprehension of the hon. gentleman that the seine-nets may destroy some of the spawn or fry, is, in my judgment, not sustained by testimony. Mr. Prince who, I believe, visited the city of Detroit, did not think it worth his while to come up to Sarnia or along the river for the purpose of taking evidence from the fishermen there. Those fishermen have presented petitions to the department setting forth their grievances, in which they contradict the conclusions that Mr. Prince arrived at as to the destructive character of this mode of fishing. At all events, the hon. gentleman should grant licenses for this year, and during the year he should make further inquiry and hear what these men have to say. He is trying and convicting them without their being present or having an opportunity of saying a word in their defence. The theories of Mr. Prince—who no doubt knows about as much about practical fishing as the hon. gentleman or myself—should not be set up against the practical experience of men engaged in the business. I urge the hon. gentleman, in the interest of this unfortunate but deserving class of men, at all events for this year, to withdraw this regulation with respect to seine-net fishing on the River Detroit and Lake St. Clair, and to have a further investigation made, giving the fishermen an opportunity to be heard on the subject; and then, if it is thought that that style of fishing is so injurious as to imperil the fishing of the country, it will be time enough for the Government to consider what should be done under the circumstances. I cannot speak too strongly for these men—poor, hard-working, industrious men. They are cast out with scarcely any warning. It may be said by my hon. friend, that last year they were notified that no further licenses would be granted. Some of them had that notice on their licenses and some had not. Many expected that this year they would receive licenses, as in the past, and be permitted to go on with their work. This is a hard case. It means ruin to the families of many of these people. And the whole result will be that a loyal, honest, hard-working portion of our population will be compelled to leave the flag under which they have lived for so many years, and transfer their allegiance to a foreign country, in order to prosecute the work in which they have been trained, rather than undertake something they know nothing about. I trust the hon. gentleman will not take the stand he has taken in the past, but give these men an opportunity of being heard, and consider the reasons they have to urge against the policy his department appears to have adopted.

Mr. CAMPBELL. After the very able manner in which the matter has been brought to the attention of the House, by the hon. member for North Essex (Mr. McGregor) and West Lambton (Mr. Lister), I do not propose to take up the time of the House at any length. In fact there is little else that can be said. In the county of Kent, which I have the honour to represent, a great number of fishermen are engaged in Lake St. Clair and the River Thames, whose whole means of livelihood is derived from that one source. They have been engaged in that business for years, and they feel these restrictions a very great hardship. In Lake St. Clair there is quite a large number of fishermen who have been for years engaged in seine fishing. This year the department has prohibited seine fishing altogether, although our fishermen can look across the lake a short distance from where they are, and see the Americans, all the time from January to December, engaged in fishing with as many seines, pound-nets, and gill-nets, and any other kind they like. This seems to me an exceedingly foolish policy for the Department of Marine and Fisheries to adopt. We are only preserving these fish, not for ourselves, but for the Americans. If the Americans will not institute any close season or agree upon regulations for preserving the fish, what is the use of our trying to preserve them? I have a letter here from a fisherman in that part of the country, more particularly interested in pound-nets, and he writes as follows:—

The American fishermen use as many pound-nets as they can attend to, and as many seines as they find profitable,——

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Where?

Mr. CAMPBELL. In Lake Superior.

—and as many fathoms of gill-nets as they choose. They observe no close season, and consequently are as prosperous as fishermen generally are. In Lakes Huron, St. Clair and Erie they enjoy the like privileges. Canadian fishermen in the same waters must pay high licenses for the like privileges, besides strictly observing close seasons, and the expenses of finding a market for their fish. Canadians are restricted to a very limited number of pound-nets. Last year Canadians were not allowed to use gill-nets, while Americans were at liberty to use as many fathoms of gill-nets as they found profitable. Last year one company were fishing twenty-four miles of gill-nets in their own waters, in the Detroit River fisheries, for whitefish is nearly all played out on account of the very large amount of sewage and garbage from the cities of Detroit and Windsor, also from the wonderfully increased traffic carried on by vessels of all sizes, especially very large ones.

That is the reason he gives, and I think it is a very plausible one, for the disappearance of the whitefish.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to ask him, so as I may understand his position, whether he advocates unrestricted fishing on our side as the Americans enjoy, in the case he puts?

Mr. CAMPBELL. I do. If the Americans will not agree to any regulations for preserving the fish, I think it is a very foolish policy for us to restrict our fishermen. We are only preserving the fish for the Americans. Take the River St. Clair—

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. And Lake Superior and Lake Erie as well?

Mr. CAMPBELL. It might be different in large bodies of water like Lakes Erie and Huron, but I speak now of the Rivers St. Clair and Thames. The River Thames you can jump across.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I quite understand that. The object of my question was merely to test the value of the letter the hon. gentleman read. That letter covered Lake Superior and these very large waters. I quite understand we are discussing the regulations with respect to waters between United States and Canada, which are narrow.

Mr. CAMPBELL. In these large waters perhaps some regulations might be adopted irrespective of what the Americans did. But certainly in waters like the narrow streams, such as River St. Clair and Lake St. Clair, where the Americans fish in every way, it seems to me most stupid for our Government to obstruct our fishermen. We are only preserving the fish for the Americans, as regards Lake St. Clair, and I know that a great many men have been fishing there with seines for a number of years. But by the recent regulations, they are prohibited from doing so. But what appears curious is that, while seines are prohibited, the Government allow pound-nets and gill-nets and hoop-nets to be used, which are far more dangerous than seines. A seine can only be drawn every half hour, but a pound-net is at its work all the time—day and night, Sundays as well as Mondays, and is far more destructive of the fish. In view of the great importance of this question, the large number of men employed, the large amount of capital invested, the department, instead of preventing these men from obtaining a livelihood out of the business they have been brought up to and have followed for years, ought to encourage them, and give them more latitude to prosecute it in the most profitable way. If the Americans will not agree to any restrictions or close season, no such restrictions should be imposed on our fishermen. I think, therefore, that as has been well said by the gentleman who preceded me, the Government ought, this year at least, to abolish the regulations, so far as seine fishing is concerned, and allow the fishermen to fish with seines again this year.

Mr. MACDONELL (Algoma). Mr. Speaker,—

Mr. O'BRIEN. If the hon. gentleman will allow me—there are several matters in connection with this subject that cannot possibly be discussed to-day; and so that this Order may not go to the foot of the list, but may be retained in its place, I would move that the debate be adjourned.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. If carried over in consequence of it being Six o'clock, the Order will keep its place on the paper.

Mr. MACDONELL (Algoma). Mr. Speaker, I can heartily agree with one part of the remarks made by my hon. friend from North Essex (Mr. McGregor)—that in which he spoke of the invitation of the Minister to visit these western constituencies and see for himself how the fishing is carried on. I think it would be a benefit to him, and a very great benefit to the persons who are engaged in fishing. I have given this subject a good deal of consideration, and, having had a number of years' experience and representing a constituency in which we take $500,000 worth of fish a year, I am sufficiently interested to be able to talk at least intelligently on the subject. The inference to be drawn from what the last speaker said is that he desires to do away with all regulations of the department affecting the fisheries on the inland lakes and rivers, including the international waters. To do away with these regulations would be to place fishermen in Ontario in exactly the same position as that now occupied by the fishermen on the American side of the lakes. In looking at the question from a practical standpoint, we should consider whether it is going to be for the benefit of the country generally and for the benefit of the fishermen themselves that these regulations should be done away with, that is, that the close season should be done away with, and that the regulations affecting the meshes of the nets should be done away with, whether they are pound-nets, gill-nets, or seines. For my part, I hold that it would be a very great misfortune to do away with the close season. I think that the intelligent and industrious fishermen of the great lakes agree with me on that point. If the close season were done away with, fishing would be carried on to a certain extent. But the fish caught during that close season are not suitable for human food, and will not bring in the market the same returns that fish bring when caught during the proper season of the year. It does not require an expert to understand that. During the spawning season, as those know who have taken any interest in fishing, the fish are not fit for human food and should not be caught. This leaves out of the question altogether the very great injury that is being done to what ought not to be a temporary but a permanent industry, an industry that we found there and one that ought to be protected in the interests of the very fishermen on whose behalf such a pathetic plea has been made in this House. If the close season was done away with, it would certainly only be a question of time when the great lakes would be depleted of fish altogether. If these regulations are not maintained and rigidly enforced, I believe it is only a question of a few years when you will no longer be able to enjoy the toothsome trout from Lake Superior, or the sweet and wholesome whitefish, of which we now export many thousands of pounds every year. In looking over the reports of the department, we see the record of a wave that is sweeping over the country from the east to the west, by which the fisheries of the great lakes are being gradually depleted, to a very great extent. If you take the record of the fisheries of Lake Ontario, or of Lake Erie, or of Lake Huron and Georgian Bay, including that portion of Lake Huron that is in my own constituency—the North Channel—you will find that there has been a steady decrease in the catch of fish. And for one very good reason, as I believe—that the lakes have been to a very great extent overfished. When the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries made the regulation that only a certain number of pound-nets should be allowed to one individual, and he a bona fide fisherman, I quite agreed with him in that. I do not believe, Sir, that large corporations engaged in fishing should be allowed to monopolize the nets to the prejudice of the hard-working, industrious individual fisherman, but that they should be given under such regulation as would yield the most good to the greatest number engaged in the business. Now, our friends on the opposite side of the House who have spoken, say that if there was no close season, certain benefits would follow.

We may differ among ourselves as to what time the close season ought to be, as to the time when trout spawn, or when whitefish spawn; we may differ among ourselves as to the different times of spawning in the different lakes; but the principle involved is that these fish should be protected during their spawning season, whenever that season may be. I recollect being on a deputation with my hon. friend from North Essex to wait on the Minister. This was last year, and I think we had the same the year before. The first time the close season lasted forty-five days, I think from the 15th of October until the 1st of December. We believed that in these northern waters both whitefish and trout spawned later than the 15th of October and, possibly, a little later than the end of November. But we asked, in the interests of the fishermen, that that regulation should be changed so as to conform with the knowledge that had been gained, from the experience of the fishermen in the North Channel up to that time, and that the regulation be changed so as to make the close season last from the first to the last of November. The Minister, taking into consideration our representations, did make the desired change, and with this the fishermen were well pleased. We also asked for certain changes in connection with the mesh of nets. On this point the Minister met our views at least more than half-way. So the large deputation of fishermen who waited upon him, went away perfectly satisfied. But I never heard one of those practical fishermen on any one of the occasions upon which they have waited upon the Minister here ask that the close season should be done away with altogether. I repeat that the intelligent fishermen of the great lakes, the men who have invested their money in boats and nets, expect to carry on their occupation all their life, or at least as long as we are able to give them that protection that I think is necessary in the interest of the fisheries. It is true there are a number of fishermen who come from the constituency of the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Lister), and also from other constituencies bordering on those lakes that have been pretty well fished out, they come up to my constituency and apply for licenses, those licenses are usually granted, and the officials have the greatest difficulty in the world to enforce the law against these men, whom the resident fishermen and the bona fide fishermen in my constituency term "fish pirates." My hon. friend says that licenses should be done away with altogether. The license fee, as a matter of fact, is merely a nominal sum; the license that a fisherman pays for a gill-net, under which he is allowed to fish 6,000 yards, is only $15 on Lake Superior, and only $5 on the Georgian Bay. The license amounts to nothing, but it is absolutely necessary to bring a man under the supervision of the officers, and to bring him under the regulations of the department. Now, with regard to the question of nets, my hon. friend from Lambton (Mr. Lister) says that seines ought to be allowed. Other hon. gentlemen from Ontario no doubt agree with him. I can only say that I think it would be the greatest calamity that could happen to a valuable and an important industry in the district of Algoma to allow seine fishing to be carried on there. I have taken occasion to examine the report of the department for the last year to ascertain what is said on the subject by one of the officers of the department engaged in overseeing fishing in the north channel of Lake Huron and a portion of Lake Superior. Let me say that in that part of the district of Algoma we are in the unfortunate position of having a decrease in the value of our catch. This is the first year that it has occurred, but there is a decrease, and it can only be attributed to the overfishing that is taking place. I find this officer reports on page 293 of the Report of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries :

Seining is now one of the worst evils to contend with, and this season Indians and others were supplied with seines by unscrupulous dealers at Wikwemikong. Between 25 and 30 tons of whitefish were caught by means of seines in four days,—

Which means from $50 to $60 a ton in value.

—and over two-thirds of this amount were spoilt, as the men had to bring them fifteen miles and had no ice at this point in which to pack them. Seining for pickerel is also extensively carried on on the north shore of Georgian Bay during the close season. The fish are packed in ice and secreted until after the close time is over. Many Indians have fished without licenses, a few days at a time with small nets

Then he goes on to state at the end of his report that the yield of money to the fishermen in that one portion of his division was $255,619, which is a decrease of 20 per cent from last year. Now, we always consider that the great lakes, particularly Huron and Superior, were really virgin fisheries, but this year for the first time we have staring us in the face the fact that there has been a decrease in the value of the catch in Lake Huron, not attributable, let me say, to the price of fish, but attributable entirely to the fact that that portion of Lake Huron has been overfished. Now, suppose that the regulations were abolished, suppose that the fisheries were thrown open the same as they are on the south shore of Lake Huron and Lake Superior, our fishermen could do just as the Americans are doing. I think it would be a great misfortune, because our men are better off to-day than the American fishermen; our men on Lake Superior, I venture to say, are better off to-day than any fishermen on the south shore of any of the lakes or rivers. But suppose that was the case, suppose the Minister said: All right; go ahead. What would be the result? I will explain. I have in my mind an example that I saw myself, and I ask the attention of the House for a few minutes to make a practical answer to the question as to whether it is advisable to allow fishing to go on irrespective of the regulations. The Island of Isle Royale, in Lake Superior, an island 40 miles long, 15 years ago was probably the very best fishing ground in Lake Superior; fishermen caught large quantities of fish, and fish of a very large kind, more particularly what is called the black trout, that is worth probably a cent a pound more than any other fish taken out of the lake. I visited that island 10 years after the fisheries were in their prime, and what was the result? Where 150 men had formerly been engaged in fishing, there were two solitary fishermen, and they told me they could not make a living at it. Now, it is said that fish are interchangeable. It is said that there is a reciprocity between the fish of the two countries. There may be, but experience does not prove that; in fact, it is the reverse. When they could not catch enough fish to pay their expenses around the shores of Isle Royale, our Canadian fishermen, 20 miles away, were not only making a good living, but were getting rich at the business, which fact, to my mind, shows that the fish do not migrate across the lake. We know perfectly well, and all experience goes to show this fact, that fish will only travel where they get food. The fish is an intelligent creature; fish will not go into the deep waters of Lake Superior 600, 800, and 1,000 feet deep; they confine themselves to those portions of the lake where they get their food, that is, in the more shallow waters.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (No. 74) to incorporate the Ottawa Electric Company.—(Sir James Grant.)

Bill (No. 75) respecting the Chaudière Electric Light and Power Company, Limited, and to change the name thereof to the Ottawa Electric Company.—(Sir James Grant.)

Bill (No. 79) respecting the St. Catharines and Niagara Central Railway Company.—(Mr. Carpenter.)

THE SCHOOLS OF THE NORTH-WEST TERRITORIES.

House resumed further consideration of the proposed motion of Mr. Tarte for :

1. Copies of all correspondence between His Grace Archbishop Taché, of St. Boniface, and any member of the Government since last session, and in particular of the memorial recently sent to the Governor General or to the Prime Minister, respecting the Manitoba schools, and of the ordinances adopted by the Legislature of the North-west Territories in 1892, and now in force; 2. Copies of all memorials, petitions and letters addressed to the Governor General in Council, or to any Minister, asking for the disallowance of the said ordinances; 3. Of correspondence between the Lieutenant Governor of the North-west Territories or the Executive Council of the said Territories, and the Dominion Government; 4. Copies of the instructions to the Lieutenant Governor of the North-west Territories, and of communications sent to the Executive of the Territories in order to induce them to amend the ordinances of 1892.

Mr. DAVIN. Mr. Speaker, since I had the honour of addressing the House on this question, I have had an opportunity of reading carefully the speech of the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte), and the number and importance of the questions raised in that speech might well be calculated to appal one, and they astonish one when compared with the smallness of this question as it appears in the North-west; and, therefore, this evening, instead of addressing myself to this question as it affects the North-west, I am about to address myself to this question as it affects the province of Quebec and the Dominion of Canada.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. DAVIN. Some hon. members say "Hear, hear." I am glad to hear that cheer, or that intimation, whatever it may mean, from hon. members. Sir, it seems to me that this Parliament could at the present moment be occupied in no more suitable manner than in coming to a right view of the questions that are gathered round the North-west school question, and in coming to that right view dispersing the clouds of prejudice and passion that interested or ignorant persons have sought to raise about it.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Hear, hear.

Mr. DAVIN. I am sure, after we have gone into this question, that we will be able to induce even the hon. member for South Grey (Mr. Landerkin) to take a serious view of a question in this House, and that will have a certain novelty for all of us. In reading the speech of the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte) dealing with this question, I find that part of it is occupied with newspaper gossip about possible dissensions in the Cabinet of the Dominion of Canada; part of it is composed of extracts from speeches. I must say from one very violent speech, by, I am told, a Conservative, and not only a violent speech, but an ignorant speech, and extracts from newspapers also violent and equally ignorant. We are told, for instance, by the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte) that we are in the presence of a grave political situation, a national question is before us, and the storm raised by that is so strong that it is shaking confederation to its very foundations.

Mr. TARTE. I did not say that myself; I quoted from a speech.

Mr. DAVIN. I do not know whether I have the corrected 'Hansard' before me, but the hon. gentleman quoted from a speech and adopted the language.

Mr. TARTE. No, I did not; I dissented from it.

Mr. DAVIN. The hon. gentleman quoted this language:

A terrible wind is now blowing even at the very doors of the province of Quebec, and the storm is so strong, it is shaking confederation to its very foundations. I am now speaking of separate schools in the North-west.

The gentleman from whose remarks the hon. gentleman quoted was Mr. Casgrain. The hon. gentleman himself said:

No one had the right to deprive the Catholics of the North-west of separate schools.

When I interrupted the hon. member in the course of his speech and asked what his grievances were and requested him to state them, he stated positively that separate schools had ceased to exist in the North-west Territories.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. In fact they have.

Mr. DAVIN. The hon. member from L'Islet (Mr. Tarte) made that statement. The hon. gentleman further said:

If the understanding arrived at when confederation was formed can be violated by one party, then that contract is only a paper that can be torn at will.

Of course, this is most serious language, going right to the foundations of our institutions, touching the very rock on which the confederation of Canada rests, and I consider that a very grave responsibility rests on the hon. gentleman, or on any hon. member of the House, or any persons occupying a position in this country from whence they can influence public opinion, if it should be found on examination that there is no basis whatever wide enough on which to rest broad, sweeping, constitutional statements of this sort. Then the hon. gentleman stated:

The Federal Government has the right, and I will say has the duty resting upon it to disallow all laws contrary to the general interests of the Dominion.

That, again, is going to the constitutional question.

Mr. TARTE. Would my hon. friend allow me? He has just made me say: That if the understanding arrived at with confederation could be violated by one party, then that contract is only paper which could be thrown away. I never said that myself. It was my friend Mr. Casgrain who said it.

Mr. DAVIN. Do I understand the hon. member to repudiate it?

Mr. TARTE. I dissented from it in my speech.

Mr. DAVIN. What object had the hon. gentleman quoting it here unless he adopted the opinion?

Mr. TARTE. To dissent from it.

Mr. DAVIN. I am very glad to hear that my hon. friend (Mr. Tarte) resents the very violent position taken by Mr. Casgrain, but what his object was in quoting Mr. Casgrain under the circumstances, I really cannot make out. Probably it may be this—and it is a very good purpose—that he wanted to show what a very serious question this was, and that a man in Mr. Casgrain's position took this view of it. When I dealt before with this question, I showed, and I am about to show now, that Mr. Casgrain spoke upon this subject with the utmost ignorance of the merits of the question. Let me quote now from the language of the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte). He is discussing a possible division in the Cabinet, and, after quoting from 'La Minerve,' he tells us how messages were sent to Mr. Mackintosh, the Lieutenant Governor of the Territories, and how Mr. Haultain made a speech when he was passing through Winnipeg—no doubt he meant Calgary, for it was there Mr. Haultain made his speech—and then he goes on in his own language to say:

If they were not serious they were simply pursuing the same imprudent course that has characterized the policy of the Government on the school question from the beginning; that is to say, they were contributing to increase the dangerous agitation that we have to face to-day.

It is perfectly clear, therefore, that my hon. friend (Mr. Tarte) regards this agitation as a very serious and a very dangerous one, although he himself is one of the most potent causes in raising it; he himself is, in fact, a stormy petrel of it. He continues:

My hon. friend (Mr. Martin) was elected, not on the school question, but as a tariff reformer. He was elected by the votes of Liberals and Conservatives alike.

I tell the hon. gentleman that Mr. Martin was undoubtedly elected as a tariff reformer, but he was partly also elected as the embodiment of the resentment to separate schools in the province of Manitoba. The hon. member (Mr. Tarte) then entered into a very curious defence of the member for Queen's (Mr. Davies). He quotes an extract from 'Le Courrier du Canada,' headed "Laurier-Martin-Davies," and, having complained of that article, he goes on to say:

My hon. friend from Queen's (Mr. Davies) is perfectly able to take care of himself; still if he allows me I will briefly describe the law that the hon. member for Queen's passed in 1877. If I am rightly informed, the first school law in Prince Edward Island was passed in 1852, and it is natural to suppose that a school law which had existed for 25 years in a progressive province needed to be amended after so long a period of time.

Mr. DAVIN.

I will say, en passant, that, although such a length of time did not elapse between 1858, when the ordinance was passed in the North-west Territories—which I suppose, from his attitude, was perfectly satisfactory to my hon. friend—until 1892, yet in a country like the North-west Territories, a new country where we move rapidly, sufficient time had elapsed to justify some changes in our legislation. The member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte) continues:

The election of 1876 in Prince Edward Island was carried on the question of the necessity of improving the law. It was fought, not by one political party alone, but by a combination of public men belonging to both political parties. My hon. friend (Mr. Davies) succeeded at the polls and he then formed a coalition government of which he was the leader, but the majority of his colleagues were Conservatives. The law which was passed in 1877 did not change the principle of the old law; it only amended it by giving more power to the school trustees and making some other changes.

It is palpable from that language that my hon. friend (Mr. Tarte) approved of the reform, or the change that was enacted in the Prince Edward Island school law by the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies). I want it to be borne in mind by the House, and especially by the members from Quebec province, that by and by language like that of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Tarte) may be applied to the very similar changes that have been made in the school ordinance of the North-west Territories, namely, that the ordinance of 1892:

Only amended the law by giving more power to the school trustees and making some other changes.

I will show the hon. gentleman (Mr. Tarte) that the legislation which has taken place in the North-west Territories has only very slightly changed the law as it existed in 1858, which, I presume, was satisfactory to the hon. gentleman. Speaking further of the Prince Edward Island school law, the hon. member (Mr. Tarte) says:

At any rate the law was changed and there was a little friction, no doubt.

I ask the House to mark that language. I suppose that the historian, speaking a few years hence about this North-west school question will say: "There was some little friction;" and the storm that shakes confederation, the storm that is a menace to the peace of the Dominion of Canada, the storm that the hon. gentleman supposes exercises such a powerful influence on a great province; that storm will be described, as in the words of my hon. friend, "There was some little friction, no doubt." The hon. gentleman (Mr. Tarte) continues:

Archbishop McIntyre thought that the improvements he had made to his school property were to be imperilled and he applied, as I understand, for a disallowance of the law.

The very thing that an archbishop has done in regard to the North-west school ordinance of 1892.

His request was not granted and a short time afterwards His Grace and my hon. friend (Mr. Davies) came to a perfect agreement and since that time His Grace has declared himself entirely satisfied.

My hon. friend was defeated in 1879, and his position was taken by Mr. Sullivan—now, I think, Chief Justice Sullivan—who was a strong Conservative and a Roman Catholic. He remained in power for the long period of twelve years, and no amendment was made to the law.

I may say here that if, by some change in the North-west Territories, some other gentlemen were to take the place of the present executive, I can assure hon. gentlemen, from what I know of the sentiment of the North-west Territories, that there would be no change made in the law; and the historian, writing twenty or twenty-five years hence, might speak of the transactions of to-day, which are supposed to be fraught with such momentous consequences, in some such language as my hon. friend uses. My hon. friend utters a sentiment which I entirely echo. He says: "We claim no more than justice." Mr. Speaker, I am with him in favour of everything he can claim that can be labelled "justice." I do not care whether he claims for a Protestant, a Catholic, or a Hindoo; I do not care whether it is for a worshipper of Buddha or a Christian; if justice is what he claims, and if he can show me that any injustice has been done to any set of men in the North-west Territories, or for that matter in any part of Canada—for this House has jurisdiction over every part of Canada—he will find me with him. Now, this question is not, I beg to say, a question of the advantage of a religious education as compared with a secular education. That question is apt to be imported into the discussion, but there is no such question here. If there were such a question here I do not know but he would find me—probably I have been born out of due time, and am a belated man—standing side by side with those who believe that the best education is that which is shot through and through with religious teaching. If I may be allowed to say in passing, I am no enthusiast whatever for the so-called popular school system as it exists in Canada or in England, or the secular system as it exists in France; and I will give you one reason. If you go to a horticulturist, the first test you apply to ascertain whether he is a first-class horticulturist or not, is not the number of flowers of a given kind that he can produce, but the excellence he attains in given branches of his art; and, Sir, it is a singular fact that in England, in Ireland, in the States, in Canada, in France, up to the present moment the public school system has been barren of great men. If you were to put me to an examination, I do not know that I could fix on a really great man who is a product of this popular school system. I suppose there have been some, but I am not aware of them. The great men have come—whether it is the religious element that have produced the greatness or not I am not going to pause to discuss—from a system where there was kept before the child's mind, the adolescent's mind and the young man's mind, the greatest facts connected with this universe—those facts that bear so powerfully on the moral nature and the reverence of the man, that tend to give him a true intellectual perspective, that enable him to see at once how great he may be and how small, as compared with other essences in the universe, he is—that give him the idea of order, and enable him, whether he be educated in a democracy, a kingdom or an empire, but especially in a democracy, to escape from the dwarfing influences of that 'plani sequora campi'—that barren waste where every molehill exalts itself as a mountain, and every thistle waves itself as a forest tree. I say this as indicating my opinion of what an education should be. But that question does not arise here. We must sweep aside altogether the question as between a religious and a secular education. The sole question we have to discuss here is this, whether in the North-west Territories separate schools have been swept away by an ordinance passed in 1892. That is the sole question. We have not to discuss the merits of separate schools or the merits of public schools; we have not to discuss the merits of Protestant schools or the merits of Catholic schools. The sole question we have to discuss here to-night is whether by that ordinance, and whether by regulations passed in connection with it, and complementary to that ordinance, those separate schools have been swept away. The charge made by my hon. friend—the charge made, I may say, by men occupying the highest ecclesiastical positions in the country—is that the ordinance of 1892 and the regulations subsidiary to it have deprived the Catholics of rights that they had before. Now, Sir, it is very difficult for me to speak in regard to the contentions of those eminent persons in such a way as might be desirable. There is no Catholic in the Dominion of Canada who has more respect, more reverence, more admiration for the great qualities of such men as Archbishop Taché, Père Lacombe, Father Leduc, and their colleagues, than I have. I know these great ecclesiastics, and I know what lives of self-sacrifice they have led. The other day a newspaper, the 'Free Press,' of this city, published what it professed was an interview between Père Lacombe and its reporter, in which the reporter, instead of placing before Father Lacombe what I had said—that I had merely joined issue with my hon. friend from L'Islet, he saying that there was no separate schools, and I saying that the separate schools are there and have not been disturbed—the reporter asked him, “Do you think there is any truth in what Mr. Davin, the member for West Assiniboia, said?” And Father Lacombe is reported—of course, I do not believe that Father Lacombe ever said it—I know him well; he is a friend of mine; but he is reported as saying, “It is a lie.” That, of course, is a very strong statement; but you may be able to measure the depth of my reverence and admiration for the great and noble qualities of Père Lacombe when I say that even if he had said it, I would put it down to the anger of the moment, and it would not lessen my respect for that self-devoted and self-sacrificing missionary. But I cannot believe it. It is a subject on which one might make caustic remarks; but I know Père Lacombe, I know that he has laboured in the North-west Territories for forty years with the most apostolic devotion and the greatest possible self-sacrifice, and a passing ebullition of irritation like that would have no influence on the admiration and respect that I have for him. But when we come to discuss in this House the allegations made by Père Lacombe or Father Leduc, or by greater ecclesiastics than these, we stand on grounds as sacred as any church floor. This House is the temple of the nation itself; this House is the place where the affairs of this great nation, of which any church within the Dominion is only a part, are discussed, where we must discuss events that belong to its interests, to its present and to its future. Therefore, in regard to the opinions of these great personalities, I must be allowed, I must permit myself, the very same freedom that I permit myself, in discussing the opinions that fall from the Prime Minister, or that fall from the leader of the Opposition. Now, some time after that ordinance of 1892 was passed, a petition was sent down to the Dominion Government, asking that it be disallowed, and, if the Government did not see its way to disallow the ordinance, that it should give direction to Mr. Haultain, to the Executive and to the Assembly, to rescind what was objected to, in fact, directing them, as it were, to disallow their own ordinance. Now, Mr. Speaker, I must say that, looking at that, I do not see what Minister could constitutionally advise His Excellency to disallow it. I do not see what power His Excellency has, or any other Minister advising His Excellency, to send word to the executive of the North-west Territories that they should undo what they have done. We have not full provincial powers, but we have very nearly full provincial powers. My hon. friends in the Opposition, and especially my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills), have always been ready, although they have sometimes objected to the amount of money which they said was spent in the North-west Territories, and although I have sometimes had to differ with them on some question in which the North-west was deeply interested, I will say this for them, that they have always clamoured for full provincial powers to the North-west Territories. Now, as I said here some time ago, we have practically full provincial powers in the North-west Territories, with the exception of two or three details. How, then, could the Government of Canada, or His Excellency, do what was asked for by the petition? Now, suppose they did—and I am going to ask my hon. friend from Quebec to pay attention to the argument I make. Suppose it was done, suppose, when that prayer came down here, that the Prime Minister advised His Excellency to disallow the ordinance of 1892, and that it was disallowed, what would have happened? Do you suppose it would have helped separate schools, that it would have helped the cause dear to the heart of Archbishop Taché? Do you suppose it would have done anything whatever in the direction of the end that seems very dear to the hearts of hon. gentlemen from Quebec? Why, Sir, the result would have been that you would have had an agitation dead against all separate schools in the territory; the result would have been that, after putting the territories into a state of commotion for one or two years, instead of the separate schools there to-day, you would have none at all. For you have separate schools in operation there to-day, just as at any other time; you have your Catholic separate schools there to-day, just as at any other time, with a difference that I will point out by and by, not in the schools, but in the supervision of the schools.

An hon. MEMBER. In the books.

Mr. DAVIN. There is no difference in the books, as I will prove shortly. There is no difference in regard to the schools, there is no difference in regard to the management of the schools, none whatever. But, instead of having that state of things, which is practically what you have in Ontario, which is practically what you profess to desire to have if the ordinance of 1892 had been disallowed, in two or three years' time it would be impossible for you to have separate schools in the North-west Territories at all. Now, I will read to my hon. friend part of a letter that I did not intend to read just at this stage, but that probably may just as well be read now. I asked a gentleman to call on one of the schools, the principal school, the one at Calgary. I think it is called No. 1 of the Catholic schools, and I asked him to ascertain if there was any grievance. I said to him, as I say here publicly, if there is a grievance, I will take it up in Parliament for Catholics just as surely as I would take it up for Protestants.

Mr. LAURIER. Who is at the head of that school?

Mr. DAVIN. Superioress Greene. I am not going to give the name of the writer of the letter, and I will tell you why. I had intended to read the letter in extenso and to give the name, but—I will take you into my confidence—a gentleman from the North-west asked me for a purely private reason, half an hour ago, not to give the name. But I will show the letter to my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition. After saying that he had called at the school at Calgary, the writer proceeds :

The Readers are not objected to by the Roman Catholic teachers in the schools I have visited. The Sisters in the Calgary Convent pronounced them very good Readers : and Sister Greene, the mother superioress, said the history was an excellent book. She spoke quite strongly in its favour.

Then he goes on say, with regard to the Ontario Readers :

I asked the Sisters in Calgary, one by one—

Now, I want to say—and I hope there is not an hon. gentleman in this House who will not give me credit for it—that I have suffered politically for my liberality on such questions, because, after all, I belong to the west, and I am an Ontario man, and nobody could be as liberal as I have been without exciting suspicion however unfounded, and losing support which naturally belongs to me as a Protestant holding definite opinions on dogma. I wanted to know exactly whether there was a single grievance, and this was one of the means I took to find it out. The writer says :

I asked the Sisters in Calgary one by one what changes in the work had been made since the spring of 1893.

This letter is dated 3rd April, the present month. Now, this is what the sisters said :

Each said no change had been made except the substitution of the Third, Fourth and High School Readers for those previously in use, and these books, they said, were very good Readers. I asked each whether any change in the work had been caused through the action of the Legislature of the session of 1892 or 1893 ; and each said that there was no change except that of the Readers in the higher class.

Now, I call my hon. friend's particular attention to this phrase, because it focuses the situation as completely as the reply of His Grace Archbishop Taché to the Order in Council of the Dominion Government.

They said it was not what had happened, but what may happen that they feared.

That is what they said. They do not trust the powers that be. Well, if they do not trust the powers that be, and if they are afraid of the future, what is the remedy? Do you suppose that you can apply a remedy from outside—from this House? Do you suppose that you can get a fulcrum in Newfoundland, New Brunswick, Quebec, Nova Scotia, Ontario or British Columbia, to move a weight for us in the North-west Territories? Why, I tell you this, that whether such a request were made by Protestant or Catholic prelate, or by a Prime Minister, whether Conservative or Reformer, we in the North-west Territories—Catholic and Protestant—would resent it as one man. We would not stand it for a moment.

Mr. TARTE. Hear, hear.

Mr. DAVIN. The hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte) says "Hear, hear," and I am very glad to find him ready to take a larger constitutional position.

Mr. TARTE. What date is that?

Mr. DAVIN. The 3rd of April, and I will show it in confidence to the leader of the Opposition, if it be necessary. I may tell you, Sir, that I had it all prepared to pass into the hands of the reporter; and it is only because within an hour or so, I happened to have a conversation with a North-west friend, who said to me, for a purely private reason, that he would rather I did not mention the name of the writer, that I have changed my intention. But nothing can be easier than to test it, because all you have to do yourselves is to ask the Lady Superior-ess in the Calgary Convent and the various sisters, and there is not the least doubt that they will give the same opinion. And I may say that if I were not fortified by that letter at all, I dare not, if there were any grievance, stand up here in this House and make the statement I made the other night, and which I make now, that there is no practical grievance of which the Catholics in the North-west Territories have to complain. What motive could I have? I have numbers of Catholics in my constituency. And I will say now, as I have said here before, that no greater enemy of the privileges of the Catholics in the North-west can exist than the man who seeks to irritate the sentiment of the North-west by shaking before it a coercion of some sort from outside, and which sentiment will be all the more irritated because you are shaking before it a brutum fulmen, a perfect idle threat, which you could not possibly carry out. I may say this further, what I have said in private to other persons—that the Catholics of the North-west Territories are safer in the hands of the Legislative Assembly of the North-west Territories than they are in the hands of this House, and I will tell you why. The North-west Legislative Assembly represents the people of the North-west. Some of them are Catholics, and all have some Catholic constituents. There are a few French-Canadians ; there are some half-breeds—first-rate people, good people ; there are a number of English. But I will say this, that there is no part of Canada—although I know there is a sentiment different with regard to it in the minds of some—at this day, where there is so liberal a sentiment between Protestants and Catholics, between the various sects of Christians, as there is in the North-west Territories. You never hear in the North-west Territories those controversies that you hear disturbing other places; and if the Catholics will leave their case in the hands of the North-west Assembly, I think they will be treated well and fairly. But if they will not be treated well and fairly there, nowhere else will they be so treated. You cannot, by trying to raise a storm in Quebec, help them. You will only do them injury. Suppose there is a perfect misconception as to what has been done by the ordinance and the supposed regulations—if there be a perfect misconception as to what has been done, can you conceive greater folly or iniquity than to seek in a great province to stir up religious passions, and all over the Dominion increase the number and intensify the virulence of the seeds of religious and racial hatred that have already done harm enough to this Dominion. I am going to ask the House to bear with me while I call attention to a petition. The petition that I have before me is the petition of St. Albert; but of the nineteen or twenty or more petitions sent in to the Government—some from Calgary, some from Lethbridge, from the various Catholic schools—they are all practically the same, they are all in substance and in words the same, and are evidently the emanation of a single mind. In this petition—I am not going to read the whole of it—it is stated in section seven:

Another of the said regulations of the council of public instruction—

I call the attention of my hon. friend, who spoke a moment ago, to this language.

—proposes a uniform course of instruction and a uniform selection of the text books alike for all schools, whether public, Protestant, or Catholic. As to such a regulation, it is impossible that it can meet with the approval of both Protestants and Catholics. The books now prescribed, are, in many instances, of a character highly objectionable to Catholics.

Why, I have begged gentlemen interested in this question to point me out—not a text book—but a single page or extract in any of these books as objectionable. And in this petition, although they make that general statement, there is not a single iota of proof given as to these books being objectionable. The only response I ever got, in answer to repeated requests, that we should get some idea of the peccant parts of the book complained of, was this—that there was a poem in one of the books, and it dealt with an elopement, and there was a dance, and a young man came to the door, and he whipped off the bride. And, said the complainant: Do you not think that that is favouring elopements? On inquiry, it proved to be the poem of the Young Lochinvar—

Who had come out of the west

And thro' all the wide border his steed was the best.

Mr. DAVIN.

We all know what happened. He came to the door where the wedding was about to take place, and in he went, and the bridegroom stood dangling his bonnet and plume. But the father of the bride took hold of his sword, and asked the young Lochinvar whether he came in good will or hostility. And the young Lochinvar said he came to tread a measure and drink just one stoup of wine to the health of the bride. And after he had drunk to her health, and before the mother could interfere, he took hold of the young lady's hand and they trod together a measure. And as they came to the door, the charger was there—

So light to the croupe the fair lady he swung,
So light to the saddle before her he sprung,—

“She is wont, we are gone over bank, bush and scaur, They'll have fleet steeds that follow,” said young Lochinvar.

We all read that from our childhood and I have never eloped yet. We all read that, Sir. It is written by Sir Walter Scott, one of the purest and noblest writers, and I have never heard that a purely imaginative ballad like that could possibly have a bad influence. But, Sir, if that is the worst that can be pointed out in these readers, I need hardly say, even without giving you the proof I am about to give you, that we might dismiss the statement that there are passages in these books that are highly objectionable.

These text books are for the most part Protestant and are offensive to Catholics by asserting many things which Catholics have always contended contradicted the facts, by entirely ignoring, or greatly minimizing, misrepresenting or misinterpreting the part of the Catholic Church and her ministers in history and in all departments of literature and science and by propagating religious and philosophical theories which Catholics reprobate or disapprove.

Now, Sir, I think it will be admitted that after a paragraph like that, a book should be put in evidence. After a paragraph like that, at least a page should be referred to. I appeal to any candid French-Canadian about me. Let us dismiss party in an affair of this kind. I say that some book or some page or extract ought to have been put in evidence. But there is none. But, Sir, you may say more. All this is an indictment against regulations passed under the ordinance of 1892. Why, Sir, there is not a book used under the regulations, not a reader, not a history that either was not used before or has not had the approval of high authority in the Catholic Church.

No provision is made in the said ordinance for Catholic separate normal schools and the text books prescribed for use in the normal schools are open to the same objections as are herein before made to the text books prescribed for use in the ordinary schools for children.

Now, it is there implied that, prior to this, there was some right or other to a separate normal school. Why, Sir, the ordinance of 1888, which is the ordinance referred to and approved of in the petition, made no provision at all for a separate normal school, and not only that, but in 1888, at a meeting of the old board, Mr. A. E. Forget, one of the leading Catholics of that board, moved a resolution, which I will read to you by and by, in which he advocated the establishment of what—a Catholic normal school and a Protestant normal school? Not at all, but merely the establishment of a normal school for the territories, without specifying whether Catholic or Protestant. Evidently at that time the idea had not entered their heads.

The effect of the said ordinance, especially by means of the said regulation passed in pursuance thereof, is to deprive the Catholic separate schools of that character which differentiates them from public or Protestant schools, and to have them Catholic separate schools in name only, and such, it is submitted, is its obvious effect

What is a Catholic separate school? A Catholic separate school, I suppose, would be a school where only Catholics attended—

Mr. AMYOT. Oh, no.

Mr. DAVIN. I suppose a Protestant might attend a Catholic school, as a Catholic might attend a Protestant school. But a separate school would be one attended in the main by Catholics. We need not quarrel about niceties of that sort. A Catholic separate school would be one taught by a Catholic teacher, with books approved by Catholic authorities or by authorities that Catholics sanction. Well, Sir, if that be the distinguishing characteristics of a Catholic separate school, all I can tell my hon. friends is, they may lay their fears at rest, for every Catholic school in the North-west has these characteristics to-day.

For the reasons aforesaid your petitioners protest and declare concerning the said ordinance No. 22 of 1892 of the North-west Territories and the regulations of the Council of Public Instruction may in pursuance thereof:—

(a.) That the said ordinance and the said regulations prejudicially affect the rights and privileges of your petitioners and all others of Her Majesty's Catholic subjects in the Territories in relation to education.

I need hardly say that, if the facts are as I state, it would be very difficult to see how the rights and privileges of the Catholics are affected. The Catholics of the North-west Territories are as free as air. They have the same liberties that belong to their Protestant fellow citizens. They have separate schools; with regard to history, literature and reading they have special books; the pupils are taught by Catholic teachers. How, then, can their rights have been invaded? There is no use mincing the matter at all—a certain amount of rhetoric has been imported into these solemn documents which should not have a sentence or a word that would not bear the closest scrutiny.

(b.) That if the said ordinance be not disallowed or repealed or amended so as to give to the representatives of the Catholic minority the management and control of Catholic schools so far as regards their general government and discipline.

Now, that is the first—the “general government and discipline.” A change has been made to this extent—that, instead of religion being taught the whole day, if it was so desired, by a teacher in the Catholic school, a Catholic teacher teaches religion at a certain time in each day. Well, if that can be shown to be a change that destroys the rights and privileges of a portion of the community, I shall be greatly surprised.

the selecting and prescribing of text books for use therein.

I will show you by and by, and I repeat once again, there can be no complaint whatever upon the score of text books.

the inspection of schools and the granting and cancelling of teachers' certificates.

Now, as regards inspection of schools, as I pointed out the other night, a change was made. And, Mr. Speaker, a change was imperative. As the territories progress, we could not have the system that had been introduced at an early period. We could not have a system of two sets of inspectors going around the country, one set of Catholic inspectors and one set of Protestant inspectors. To begin with, we could not afford it. And, in any case, where was the sense of it? Three Protestant and one Catholic inspectors were appointed. As a fact, the change in the inspectorship had taken place before the ordinance of 1892 was passed; and, as you will see from the reply of the eminent prelate to the Order in Council, the right reverend prelate is constrained to give up the position taken in this petition. And he places himself very much in the position that, when I was a student, in the Temple and studying pleading, we used to call confession and avoidance. He practically acknowledges that the view thrust on him from the North-west Territories cannot be maintained, and he abandons really the position taken up in the petition. As to the granting and cancellation of teachers' certificates, there is no change, as I shall show the House. The Catholic section of the old board had no power over that. The provision said:

That if the said ordinance be not disallowed or repealed or amended so as to give to the representatives of the Catholic minority the management and control of Catholic schools so far as regards their general government and discipline, the selecting and prescribing of text books for use therein, the inspections of schools and the granting and cancelling of teachers' certificates, the said ordinance will cause a great disturbance of peace and harmony among Her Majesty's Protestant and Catholic subjects in the territories and in other parts of the Dominion.

I do not know whether it will cause any disturbance in other parts of the Dominion, but I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, it will not cause much disturbance among Her Majesty's subjects, Catholic and Protestant, in the North-west. There is nothing to quarrel about, there is no feud going on there, and, as I stated before, if they came into this House and heard the excited speeches we hear on this question, and are likely to hear, no person would be so amazed as the Catholics of the North-west Territories.

Mr. LAURIER. Will the hon. gentleman state by whom the petition is signed?

Mr. DAVIN. Certainly. The petition I read is signed by Vital J. Grandin, Bishop of St. Albert; J. J. M. Lestanc, O.M.I., Administrateur; R. Lacombe, Vicar-General; H. Leduc, O.M.I., Vicar-General. The head of the Executive of the North-west Territories had to reply to this, and I must ask the indulgence of the House, for it is impossible in dealing with such a question to treat it in an off-hand manner, while I glance at the reply. Mr. Haultain very properly divides the heads into the question of training and licensing of teachers, the inspection, and the text books. As to the training and licensing of teachers, what he says is this:

By subsection 6 of section 10 and section 12 of chapter 59 of the Revised Ordinances, dated 1888, the general examination of and licensing of teachers was vested in the whole Board of Education and not in the sections of the board.

That is a point I did not take up in the petition. In the petition a point is made that the present body has assumed not merely the power of the whole educational board, but of its sections, and as Mr. Haultain very properly pointed out, the power so far as licensing teachers and similar powers are concerned were vested not in the separate sections of that board, but in the whole board. The Board of Education, I may explain, was composed of five Protestants and three Roman Catholics. Section 7 of the standing orders of 1891-92 allowed each section of the Board of Education to prescribe text books on history and science—that is on controversial subjects. "The practical necessity" says Mr. Haultain:

The practical necessity for this safeguarding clause may be estimated by a reference to the action of the Board of Education and its section on the suggestion of the Rev. Father Leduc, then a member of the board.

We are furnished here with the letter of Father Leduc. On 3rd July, 1891, he wrote from Calgary, and among other things he said the following:—

There should be only one good text book on each subject for the teaching of candidates, and it should be adopted by the sections of the board, and the same text book should be used only by the board for examination.

In consequence of that, action was taken by the board at that very time. Hon. members should bear in mind that before the ordinance of 1892, the suggestion of Father Leduc was embodied in a regulation. I will read a paragraph, which contains the evidence that this had been acted on. It is as follows:—

On 3rd September, 1891, by the joint, and I may add unanimous action of the Roman Catholic and Protestant, sections of the Board of Education, prompted by the Rev. Father Leduc, a uniform course of study and a practically uniform series of text books were prescribed for all candidates for teachers' certificates.

He goes on to say:

With regard to the training of teachers, I might say that our regulations do not compel any teachers who possess equivalent qualifications to attend our normal sessions.

Mr. DEVLIN. From whom is the hon. gentleman quoting?

Mr. DAVIN. I am quoting Mr. Haultain's reply. I have necessarily from the view I have taken as to the way I should deal with this case, to be prolix. Mr. Haultain says:

Teachers are required to possess scholarship and professional skill. If any member of a religious order presents evidence of these she can obtain her certificate without attending our normal schools, but if she does not present such evidence, under our regulations she is not entitled in her religious character to anything more than any other lady who wishes to teach in a Government school and obtain a Government grant.

He adds: "This religious training cannot of itself be taken as a qualification for teaching in public schools." Further:

Our duty is to see that none but properly qualified teachers are engaged in our schools and that none but properly conducted schools receive public money, and those duties cannot be delegated to the representative of any religious body or bodies. As a matter of fact, many members of religious orders are specially and splendidly trained as teachers and our regulation will admit them without any attendance at our normal classes.

I may say here that one of the Conservative members of this House has asked me the question, whether any practical difficulty has arisen, and whether any of the sisters and ladies with vows have been rejected? No such practical difficulty, so far as I know, has arisen, and I made full inquiry. All the ladies teaching in the territories at the present moment have equivalent qualifications or have the necessary qualifications. In regard to that which is the only point, in my opinion, on which any stress can really be laid, and hon. gentlemen will remember what I said the other night about it, I may say that before I came here this session I expressed my opinion that if there were any means whatever of getting over such a difficulty, it should be surmounted, as for instance by an inspector going around to examine those ladies; but I found on inquiry that no practical difficulty has up to the present emerged and all those schools are being taught by ladies perfectly qualified. It seems that there is no difficulty in getting ladies either from France or from England who have equivalent qualification, and who can therefore come here and teach. Then he goes on to say:

At a meeting of the Board of Education held on the 25th of January, 1888,—

Mr. DEVLIN. May I ask the hon. gentleman if he did not pass a clause there?

Mr. DAVIN. I passed a clause which is in regard to further action, but I do not think it is of any importance. However, I will read it.

In further reference to the subject of uniform training of teachers, I might cite the action of the whole Board of Education under the system which in the words of the petition operated with entire harmony and to the general satisfaction of all connected with the active work of education in the territories.

That is a mere introduction. It goes on:

At the meeting of the Board of Education held on the 25th January, 1888, it was resolved:—

That in the opinion of this board it is necessary to make provisions for the instruction and training of teachers for our public schools in the science and art of teaching.

That the board feels that the appointment of a normal school principal whose duty it would be to hold normal school sessions in different parts of the country, would have the best possible results in increasing the efficiency of teachers and stimulating education;

Therefore, resolved

That His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor be requested to urge upon the Dominion Government the advisability of granting the sum of $5,000 for the next financial year for normal school purposes.

At that meeting among other members present and approving were Reverend Father Leduc and Mr. A. E. Forget.

Again, on the 3rd of September, 1891, on the motion of Mr. A. E. Forget, the Board of Education passed this resolution:

That all persons, inspectorates of Eastern and Western Assiniboia who obtained non-professional certificates at the recent examination of teachers and not holding certificates of normal training and who desire to obtain professional certificates be required to attend a normal session either at Moosomin or Regina; such normal session to commence on the reopening of the union schools after the Christmas holidays and to terminate, for third class teachers, six weeks, and for first and second class teachers, three months, from the date of commencement.

On this occasion were present and approving the Reverend Father Leduc, the Honourable Mr. Justice Rouleau and Mr. A. E. Forget, all the members of the Roman Catholic section of the board.

After passing such a resolution as that, I think it will be agreed that to take the stand in regard to this question that Mr. Forget, amongst others, does, is one of the most extraordinary things in the history of religious or educational political struggles. Now, as to inspectors. Section 5, of Ordinance 28 of 1891-92, provides for the appointment of inspectors by the Lieutenant-Governor in Council, and section 2, of the ordinance of 1892, simply re-enacts this. So that the inspecting that is objected to in the ordinance of 1892 was never objected to in the ordinance passed in the previous session. As to the text books, I read to you from the petition what was said against these text books. This is what Mr. Haultain says:

The petition states that text books not prescribed are in many instances of a character highly objectionable to Roman Catholics, that they are for the most part Protestant and are offensive to Catholics, &c. A general charge of this nature can only be met by an equal general denial or by putting the book in as evidence. No objectionable text books have been prescribed for Roman Catholic schools. Out of the large number of books prescribed for schools, teachers' examinations and normal classes, the petitioner has been unable to specify one which would support his most general and unfounded assertion. Until the passage of the ordinance of 1892, text books for Roman Catholic schools were prescribed by the Roman Catholic section of the Board of Education.

The only change of text books for these schools since 1888 was made at the last general meeting of the council of public instruction held in June, 1893. At that meeting, and with the approval of the Rev. Father Caron, a Roman Catholic member of the council, a uniform series of text books for all schools was prescribed with one exception.

At the Rev. Father Caron's request, Roman Catholic schools were allowed to use as optional text books the Roman Catholic readers in the primary classes.

The only school text books in our programme which could possibly excite controversy are the readers and histories.

In history the text book under the new regulations is Buckley & Robertson's history of England and Canada. This book was already prescribed by the Board of Education, having been considered unobjectionable by the Roman Catholic section and was in use before the late regulations and the ordinance of 1892 came into force.

The readers above the primary one are the Ontario series which were already actually used in a number of Roman Catholic schools in the territories and are allowed in the separate schools of Ontario where text books offensive to Roman Catholics are not usually prescribed.

I have thus shown that under the ordinance of 1892 and the regulations made under its authority, no right has been interfered with, no substantial departure has been made from the regulations which were established by the Roman Catholic section of the late Board of Education or by the late board with their approval.

The effect of the ordinance has not been to deprive Roman Catholic schools of that character which differentiates them from public or Protestant schools.

I am told on pretty good authority that a few years ago the ladies teaching in the Catholic school at Lethbridge requested to be allowed to use these readers before they were thought of being prescribed. Now, Sir, that was the reply sent to the Government of the Dominion, when, I suppose, the Governor General or the Secretary or State requested to have some opinion from the Executive of the North-west Territories as to what answer should be made to the petition. I have here the ordinance of 1888 and also the ordinance of 1892. By ordinance 59 of 1888, section 4, the Lieutenant-Governor is given power to appoint a Board of Education for the North-west Territories, composed of eight members, to hold office for two years and until their successors are appointed; five of whom shall be Protestants. Section 10 declares: "That it shall be the duty of the board to prescribe the duties of the secretary of the board," and section 5: "To provide for a uniform system of inspection of all schools, and to make from time to time such regulations as may be deemed necessary with respect to the duties of inspectors." You see, that as early as 1888, all this power is given to the board collectively, and here let me say, for fear I should forget: I regret that the Executive of the North-west Territories, or the Assembly, did not provide when they made their council of public instruction, that it should consist of four members of the Executive, and of two Protestants and two Catholics, who should have votes just like the four members of the Executive.

Mr. BRODEUR. That is a grievance.

Mr. DAVIN. If that be a grievance, I am with you in it.

Mr. BRODEUR. It is one of them.

Mr. DAVIN. But let me point out this: A man must be very much in want of a grievance and very ready to stir up popular passion if on a matter like that he is ready to fight and ready to excite and agitate; because, suppose that what I desire and what I think would have been a statesmanlike thing had been done, what would have been the result? The result could not fail to have been the same. But I grant you this, that it would have come with all the more authority; and besides, looking at it from a purely political standpoint, the head of the executive of the hour would feel, in going before the public in respect of any regulations the Council of Public Instruction made, that he had not the decree merely of four members of the Executive, but that he had the decree of the members of the Council of Public Instruction—the four members of the Executive and the two Protestants and the two Catholics. I grant you that; but I say that I hope that part will be remedied in the interest even of the Protestant portion of the community. In the interest of a portion of the Protestant community that might be described as ecclesiastical, or with ecclesiastical leanings, it ought to be remedied, just as in the interest of the Catholic portion of the community. But the practical result could not have failed to be precisely the same, with this difference, that there could not have been a loop or link of doubt to hang a carping criticism upon. Now, clause 10 provides that the power and duty of the board shall be:

To arrange for the proper examination, grading and licensing of teachers and the granting of certificates, which shall be of six classes, viz., first class, (two grades), second class (two grades), third class and provisional;

And for such schools as are not designated Protestants or Roman Catholics;

To take charge of all such schools organized under this or any previous ordinance and to make, from time to time, such regulations as may be deemed fit for their general government and discipline, and the carrying out of the provisions of this ordinance;

To appoint inspectors, who shall hold office during the pleasure of the board.

To select, adopt and prescribe a uniform series of text books to be used in such schools;

To cancel the certificate of a teacher upon sufficient cause.

Mr. DEVLIN. Did I understand my hon. friend to say a few moments ago, in explaining the composition of the board, that the two Catholic members had no right to vote?

Mr. DAVIN. The two Catholic and the two Protestant members outside of the Executive.

Mr. DEVLIN. The Executive only has the right to vote?

Mr. DAVIN. The Executive only.

Mr. DEVLIN. Are there any Catholics on the Executive?

Mr. DAVIN. There are no Catholics, but the hon. gentleman knows my opinion about that. If you are going to argue the matter down to a fine point, it is of course a mere accident that there are no Catholics on the Executive. The accident arises from the fact that there are certainly not more than two Catholics in the Assembly. But suppose the Catholics were to increase—and the German Catholics are increasing in a very great ratio; suppose they were to increase in such a ratio as to have a majority in the Assembly, and suppose a nervous Protestant looking into the future, might see a time when there would be four Catholics on the Executive, with two Protestants and two Catholics outside to advise and not vote. That is a fair argument, if you are going to argue the thing down to a fine point. Section 11 provides:

The Board of Education shall resolve itself into two sections, the one consisting of the Protestant, and the other of the Roman Catholic members thereof, and it shall be the duty of each section ;

To have under its control and management the schools of its section, and to make, from time to time, such regulations, as may be deemed fit, for their general government and discipline, and the carrying out of the provisions of this ordinance ;

To select and prescribe an uniform series of text books ;

To appoint inspectors, who shall hold office during the pleasure of the section appointing them ;

To cancel the certificate of a teacher upon sufficient cause.

Under that system, as I shall show you by and by, you had precisely the same text books as you have under the ordinance of 1892, with the qualification that we have already seen ; that is to say, some books that are perfectly unobjectionable and that have the sanction of the very highest Catholic authorities. Section 13 says :

Each section of the board shall have the selection of text books for the examination of teachers in history and science.

But I have already dealt with that. Now, when we come to the ordinance of 1892, you find that that ordinance and the ordinance of 1888 in regard to these matters differ very little. They differ materially only in this, that the religious teaching which under the old system might have been given in a Roman Catholic school at any time during the day, is now to be given at a certain specified time.

Mr. DEVLIN. By order of the board.

Mr. DAVIN. By order of the board. My hon. friend thinks he has a point there. Put aside the ordinance of 1892 ; go back to the board that existed before. You had the Council of Public Instruction ; you had precisely the same schools as you have to-day ; you had precisely the same teachers, precisely the same text books. The only difference is this, that you had two sets of inspectors inspecting schools, which surely was superfluous, which surely was unnecessary, and that the religious instruction is given in these separate schools at a specified hour in the day. There is no interference with the character of the teaching, no interference with the text books on those questions about which persons might be supposed to be sensitive.

Mr. BRODEUR. What about the teaching of French ?

Mr. DAVIN. That question is raised by Father Leduc, and I will come to it by and by, and I think I shall be able to show that there is no grievance there. I have already dealt with the grievance complained of about the normal school, and have shown that there is practically no grievance. There is certainly no actual grievance at the present time in regard to certified teachers. According to the regulations of 1894 we find a person holding a professional certificate of first or second class issued in Ontario or Manitoba since 1866, may receive a certificate of equal standing upon presenting a statement from the Department of Education in his own province, and so on. Persons holding certificates from other provinces of the Dominion or the British islands, and so on. And then, Sir, comes this section 5 regarding persons eligible for examination : "Persons holding certificates of educational value from institutions other than those mentioned may receive such certificates as the Council of Public Instruction may deem them entitled to." Now, as the Order in Council, to which we have the reply before us, states this very clause seems to have been provided specially to meet the case of those sisters, who would not wish to attend the normal school. The third complaint in the petition, as to the uniformity of the text books, I have practically answered. I have in my hand the articles with respect to teachers' examinations and entrance examinations to union schools, dated Regina, 3rd September, 1891 :

Subjects of examination for third class candidates, with prescribed text books. Reading—To be able to read any passage selected from the reader with proper pronunciation, expression, emphasis, inflection and force.

But I had better go at once to those points where there will be controversy :

History—To have a good general knowledge of the History of England and Canada. Text book—For all candidates—Buckley and Robertson's High School History of England and Canada. English history—Chapter 19 to 26 inclusive ; Chapters I. to VIII. inclusive. History of Literature and Poetical Selections—To be familiar with the selections prescribed for study and to have a knowledge of the life and work of the authors. Text books—For Protestant candidates—High School Reader. For Roman Catholics candidates—Metropolitan 5th Reader.

That is the regulation in 1891. Then we come to subjects of examination for second class candidates, and we find the same text books :

For all candidates—to be acquainted with the outlines of the History of English Literature, from the time of Queen Anne to the present, and to be familiar with the works prescribed for study. Text books—for all candidates—Stopford Brook's History of English Literature. Poetical selections to be prescribed.

And then we come to subjects of examination for first class candidates :

History—To be thoroughly acquainted with the History of England and Canada.

Text Book—For all candidates—Buckley and Robertson's High School History of England and Canada.

History and Literature and Poetical Selections—To have a thorough acquaintance with English Literature and its History, and to be able to give a critical analysis of a play from Shakespeare, or a work of some other author prescribed for examination.

Text Book—For all candidates—Stopford Brook's History of English Literature.

Poetical selections to be prescribed.

That is in 1891. So that when you come down to see what the text books were, there is really nothing in the regulations of 1892 to be complained of. Now, Sir, I wish to call the attention of the House to the regulations of the Board of Education for the North-west Territories, adopted on the 15th March, 1888. My hon. friend will remember that I referred to this some time ago. Here are the programme of studies and the list of the books :

Reading, the elementary course, Metropolitan Readers. History, English course, Sacred History. History of Canada, Compendium by Christian Brothers under the French rule. History of England by Lingard to the Conquest.

Now, these Readers, the Metropolitan Readers, have been changed to the Ontario Readers. And how does that happen? It has happened at the suggestion of the example set in Quebec, under no less an authority than Cardinal Tachereau himself. It has happened, I believe, at the suggestion of the example also in Ontario. There is not a single objection made to it by any one, nor was there a single objection heard concerning these regulations, or this ordinance, or anything going on in the North-west until some time last year when the apple of discord was suddenly thrown on the educational table of the territories, and it has set hon. gentlemen by the ears. What I want to point out is this: If you were to disallow that ordinance of 1892, it would throw you back into the arms of the legislation and regulations of 1891. That is admitted. You would have precisely the same regulations. You would have Catholics on the Board. But you would have the same state of things. There would not be the least difference as to the state of the schools. These schools, that are said not to exist, would be precisely the same as to-day, but instead of a Council of Public Instruction you would have a Board of Education, composed of five Protestants and three Catholics. But you would have precisely the same text books and the same regulations as you have to-day. And you must remember this, that the men who would vote the money would be the men who compose the North-west Assembly, and the Executive would probably be the same as the Executive in the North-west to-day. And the first thing that would happen, if that ordinance were disallowed, would be that they would pass another ordinance, not calling things exactly by the same name, but probably going further. Recede they certainly would not. Therefore I think there is no use whatever in asking for the disallowance, and I wish to say this, that too much credit cannot be given to Mr. Haultain, in my opinion, for his moderation. There cannot be the least doubt of that.

Mr. LANGELIER. If he had not been moderate, what would he have been?

Mr. DAVIN. He would have played the part of your friend Martin, in the North-west Territories, and could have made himself very popular by doing so. That is what he could have done, and that is what you may drive him to do.

Mr. TARTE. It is as well to know it now.

Mr. DAVIN. It is as well, when you go into this matter that you should know the temper of the North-west Territories.

Mr. TARTE. Hear, hear.

Mr. DAVIN. I will now ask the attention of the House for a short time to the reply of Mgr. Taché to the Order in Council. In this reply there is a letter from my friend, Mr. Forget—

Mr. LAURIER. Will the hon. gentleman pardon me. He stated that he would refer to the question of teaching French in the schools.

Mr. DAVIN. Yes; I intended to take it up in connection with this. With regard to the teaching of French, Mr. Speaker, there is this difference—that French is not proscribed, as my hon. friend (Mr. Tarte) seems to think, but what is proscribed is that in every school in the North-west Territories English shall be taught.

Mr. LAURIER. All right.

Mr. DAVIN. My hon. friend the leader of the Opposition says that is right, and, he could not say otherwise, for he is a man of broad views. I have read his courageous speeches made in the heart of the province of Quebec, in which he has pointed out the importance to his own race and the importance to all Canada of our French Canadian friends learning English.

Mr. LAURIER. I understand that the teaching of English is proscribed. Is the teaching of French optional or is it proscribed?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. In those districts where it is the mother tongue of the children, the bilingual readers of Ontario are used.

Mr. DAVIN. In those districts in which French is the mother tongue of the children, French is taught. English also is taught—they have the bilingual readers which are used in Ontario and for which, as you know, some newspapers have attacked Sir Oliver Mowat. There could not be a wiser course than to insist that, in every school—and if I were Premier of Quebec and dealing with educational matters I would insist upon this for every school in the province—English shall be taught. And, for that matter, if it could possibly be done, I would be very glad, for commercial reasons as well as for educational reasons, that in every school in the Dominion French should be taught also. If I may be allowed to pause for a moment in the discussion, I would like to say that I read with great pleasure the paper brought before the Women's Conference by Madame Dandurand. The writer closed with an appeal to the mothers of Canada, and the same appeal I think might fairly be made to the politicians and the would-be statesmen of Canada. Madame Dandurand appeals to the English mothers to try to understand the opinions and feelings of the French Canadian mothers and to the French Canadians to try to understand the English. She says: We are here two great races; I would like to teach my children, as I would like all the mothers of French Catholics to teach their children English and the history of Britain and all that it has done for the good of humanity. And she appeals to the English mothers to teach their children French. By this means, she says, the two great races in this Dominion will come to understand each other much better than they do. To a man who understands what great things France has done for the world, what great things French literature has done, not merely in the way of giving pleasure, but in the way of advancing science, who understands what that great country has done by the splendour of its genius, it is a painful thing to meet, as one often does, an English-speaking person who cannot speak three sentences of his own tongue grammatically, lifting eyebrows and shoulders at the mention of French. There are those who talk glibly about education and about one language and so on, and who think they know how to construct the matrix from which a great nation will emerge. I would to God they really did know what pleasure, what delight, what instruction there is in a French library. Then they would not be so ready to dogmatize as to the influence of one language; they would realize the truth of what Mr. Joly said in one of his speeches—that the man who knows two languages and has command of two literatures lives two lives. And what this lady says to the women of Canada, I would say to the politicians—let the English understand the French and the French understand the English and then we shall be on a better rail and likely to reach a better station.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Every man would be twins then.

Mr. DAVIN. I suppose that is a bi-lingual joke. However, the hon. gentleman has entered into an arena now into which I cannot follow him. Now, Mr. Speaker, on the 30th September, 1893, a circular was sent forth, for which Mr. Haultain was responsible. I do not want to read it now, for I read it the other night, and I do not want it to go twice on 'Hansard.' In that circular a concession is made to the sensitiveness of the Catholics of the North-west Territories, for which undoubtedly he will be assailed when he comes to seek re-election. Nevertheless, he has done it and I consider, knowing, as I do, the sentiments of the North-west Territories, that, instead of leaning in the direction of bigotry, Mr. Haultain and his friends have sought to do the right thing and the liberal thing. At the same time I qualify that by what I said to my hon. friend the other day, that if I had been allowed to do this, I would not have excluded those four members of the Council of Public Instruction, but would have given the two Protestants and the two Catholics votes, and yet would have had the same rules and the same action that has taken place. Now, Sir, I have in my hand—and I will proceed as rapidly as possible in my references to it—a most able document emanating from a source my reverence for which no language of mine can express—Archbishop Taché. Why, Sir, the North-west as it is to-day is a monument to his labour. He has been a pioneer of the Church of which he is an illustrious prince. And, Sir, in his reply, he practically gives up the position taken by the petitioners. What he says is practically what the nuns said when asked what they had to complain of—that there is danger for the future. Well, Sir, the danger as to the future would be there, if the ordinance of 1892 had never been passed. If there is any danger as to the future it must lie in this fact, that you have in the North-west a great majority of Protestants, and those people are supposed to have a sentiment against separate schools. If that be the case, it may be a danger to separate schools; but you are not going to get rid of it by disallowing an ordinance. That fact will remain. But if that be not so, where can the danger come from? If the sentiment be in favour of leaving things as they are and not interfering with separate schools as they are, where can the danger come from? It can come from this, from irritating the sentiment in favour of North-west autonomy, from irritating the sentiment of the people in the North-west that they will govern themselves in regard to education and other matters, and if you do that, I grant you the materials are there to raise such an agitation as cannot be put down by an Order in Council in Ottawa or any vote or legislation of this House. The eminent prelate says:

The report of the honourable committee: "This allowance will not nullify the regulations complained of." On the contrary disallowance would restore the right of modifying all such regulations and in fact abolish all regulations as well as dispositions uncongenial to the ordinance of 1888. For instance, it would abolish the office of superintendent and the power vested in its incumbent, "to make and establish rules and regulations for the conduct of schools and to institute and prescribe the duties of teachers and their classification."

Why, Sir, there is no such thing at the present moment known to legislation in the North-west as a superintendent of education. That office was abolished by the ordinance of 1893. The superintendent does not exist. Therefore, that grievance of having him in existence by legislation is one that is mistakenly resented. On page 13 I read :

The ordinance of 1892, clauses 184 and 185, provide for similar arrangement with the two following different provisions : (a.) Provided that the certificates held by the teachers of the high schools branch are approved by the superintendent of education. (b.) Provided that where union schools are established, the high school department of such school shall be non-sectarian.

Both those provisions are repealed by the ordinance of 1893. So that grievance does not exist. The ordinance of 1893 repeals several clauses of the ordinance of 1892, among others the clauses respecting certain powers being given to the superintendent, so that any action which the ordinance of 1892 provides shall be done by the superintendent, can only be done by the Council of Public Instruction. In this document it appears that the eminent prelate practically agrees with the position I have ventured to take up. He says :

The want of information is the reason why the report say, "the Committee of the Privy Council have not ascertained that any act done or regulation made by the Council of Public Instruction under the ordinance of 1888 is contrary to the right or interest of the minority in the territories." More information easily obtained would have modified some of the conclusions as expressed in the report. It is gratifying nevertheless to ascertain that even in spite of the want of complete information the committee recognizes the main reason which determined the petitioners to request His Excellency the Governor General in Council to apply a remedy both against the actual difficulties and the future dangers obviously contained in the law of 1892. The report says : "It would be seen that the real complaint of the petitioners is that the right and interest of themselves and of those who shared their opinions and interests are not likely to be appreciated and safe-guarded by the Council of Public Instruction in which they are not represented by any person fully acquainted with and showing those interests and having the right to vote.

So the eminent writer of this pamphlet practically points out as the main complaint a danger in the future, just as those ladies said to my friend when he asked what have you to complain of, they replied they had nothing to complain of at present, but they were afraid for the future. I am afraid it is not a very practical complaint, and it is not very practical to occupy the time of a practical assembly discussing a fear that has regard to the future, especially in a free community where that future depends on the action of the people, on the action of the people's representatives, on the trend of public opinion where public opinion is omnipotent. In this pamphlet we have a very extraordinary document quoted. It is a letter from an eminent judge, Mr. Justice Rouleau, in which he actually declares that the ordinance of 1892 is 'ultra vires.' The learned judge says :

For the above reasons it seems to me that the Federal Government should disallow this ordinance on the shortest possible delay and thus prevent grave injustice towards the Catholic minority.

There is again the statement, which I have proved to be utterly unfounded, that the North-west has no separate school system. We have a separate school system, the same as we have always had with the small qualifications I have stated. Again I find :

The section 83 of the said ordinance No. 22, of 1892, provides that the English language be compulsory and taught in every school.

I think myself it is not necessary I should repeat that that is an enlightened provision and in the interests of the community where the chief commercial language must be English. Further :

The section 32 of the said ordinance (1892), is in contradiction to section 14 of the North-west Territories Act in that it limits the rights of the minority more than it is limited by the said section 14. But, of course, the principal objections of the Catholics to the school ordinance is the absolute control, the choice of text books, the schools inspection, etc., by the Protestant majority. The separate schools exist now but in name, they do not exist in fact.

That can only be taken as rhetorical language. We have the regulations here from 1888 on, and you will find that the books in regard to all, outside of two subjects that might excite controversy, are the same from one year to the other, and that there can be no rational complaint in regard to the books in these controverted sections. Now, suppose some one in Calgary district were to refuse to pay his school tax, and should go before this judge, with this judgment already in his hands, I do not know how Mr. Justice Rouleau, after such a letter as that, could well refuse to non-suit the school trustees. I should like to say, that as in the motion and in the documents that deal with this question, the case of the North-west is mixed up with that of Manitoba, that I am speaking here to-night entirely on the North-west question. We too often confound them. There is no similarity between the present position of the Catholics in the North-west, and the Catholics in Manitoba. There is no analogy whatever ; there is no Act like the Act known as the Martin Act, passed in the North-west Territories. When the Manitoba school question comes up, if it does come up, I will be quite ready to express my opinion upon it, and that opinion is not very different from that expressed by the late member for Winnipeg (Mr. Macdonald) when he criticized the legislation of the Manitoba Assembly. The whole of the letter of Père Leduc that is quoted as appendix "A" ignores entirely the legislation of 1893, and it goes on as if there had been no repeal of anything that took place. I must say that it is open to the charge of being somewhat rhetorical. He says :

Under the old regime we could use this right as we thought fit and useful to the Catholics. We could agree or disagree with the Protestant section for the choice of books as thought proper. To-day we have to submit to the unjust law of the strongest

That language is very extraordinary unless it can be shown that some book was forced upon the Catholic schools that the Catholic schools did not want. No such thing can be shown. There has been no such thing ever heard of, and it is a very extraordinary thing to use this language unless it can be substantiated by an example or instance. The reverend father evidently feels that his not having such an objectionable book to bring forward, puts him in a difficult position, for he says :

I need not stop to examine the merits or demerits of such a book or author, for the simple reason that they may be changed at will by the Council of Public Instruction and replaced by authors most hostile to our conviction.

Surely this is very extraordinary again. It is something in the future. He is afraid of something that has never happened. He says : I need not point out a page in a book that is reprehensible and to be complained of, because we are in such a position that the most objectionable book can be thrust upon us. That is purely a general statement. I must say that this letter of Father Leduc concludes in a very extraordinary manner. He says :

We are sacrificed to the breath of the deplorable fanaticism which flows over our territories. Our rights are trampled upon. Our Catholic schools existing by law exist only in name.

Mr. Speaker, I reiterate what I have said. There is not a part of Canada at the present minute where the breath of fanaticism is so mild as it is in the North-west Territories ; and it is only such agitation as this that can disturb us by those religious passions that unfortunately have disturbed other provinces, and are fraught with so much evil. I quoted a resolution that was passed at a meeting when Father Caron was present. I may say that at that time, we all thought in the territories that a sort of friendly arrangement had been come to between the parties under the school law of 1892. We were all under that impression and there was nothing to give us the idea that there was not the utmost harmony, but it is just to Father Caron to say that he writes a letter, dated February, 1894—not, be it remembered, at the time, or soon after the meeting at which he was supposed to have agreed to the books—and in this letter, while he does not in a categorical manner repudiate the attitude attributed to him, he still probably repudiates it in a manner sufficiently strong. He refers to the discussion that took place, and he says :

In the course of that discussion altogether informal according to the expression of my English colleague Mr. Goggin, having expressed the idea that it would be desirable to render uniform the use of books in the schools, I said in a general way that in fact on account of our system of inspection it would be very advantageous if all the school children could use the same books.

That seems to bear out the statement that he did consent to that arrangement.

Later on in the course of my remarks Mr. Goggin, it seemed to me, wished to insinuate that Catholic books could be left aside and replaced by the Ontario Readers, and then I said that the younger the children who attend the schools, the more we do urge that the books put into their hands should be perfectly Catholic.

You will remember that these regulations that I read the last time I had the honour of addressing the House, concede the point that is suggested by the Rev. Father Caron. I am in a position to say here that the members of the Executive have said to all concerned : If you will show us some grievance, point to us some part of the book or some book that you object to—just as I myself asked—we will try to meet your views ; but there has been no book pointed out, not a page, not an extract has ever been so pointed out. Father Caron continues :

And on account of the special composition of the Council of Public Instruction, and knowledge that by the ordinance of 1892, that Council has absolute power to impose on us books of its own choice I thought proper to add, that if we were obliged to put aside the Catholic reading books, we would more willingly abandon the books used for the scholars of the Fourth degree, than to abandon the books used for younger scholars.

I have already referred to the letter of Mr. Forget. It is an able letter, as it could not fail to be coming from him. He runs over the history of education, but there is not one syllable in that letter to rebut and get rid of the position we have taken here to-night. You have the most eminent authorities that you could have to deal with this North-west question. You could not have men more authoritative than the Archbishop, than Mr. Forget, or than Father Leduc. These men are the most authoritative men you could have on the side they espouse and there is not a scintilla of evidence that any rights of the Catholics whatever have been interfered with. There is the change in regard to inspection, and, although I am a pretty liberal man, if I had been in the Council I would certainly have voted to get rid of the dual inspection. For, what kind of argument can you use in favour of a dual inspection ? Are we up there to be as though we were two people suffering from a pest—one from the scarlatina and the other from the black pest ? Are we to go on in that style, having two sets of inspectors, and two sections of the school board to regulate those inspectors? Must we not then select different school books for each section? Must we not go on and have two sections of the Council of Instruction? And must we not go on and extend the same dual system to the Dominion itself? Where are we to stop with this sort of thing? And where are you logically landed if, in a matter like this of state education, you are going to drive a plough through the community and say to one portion of the people in regard to the other: You keep apart from these. Logically this is the position you will be landed in, and you cannot escape from it—that from one point of view, one set of teachers, one set of machinery, one set of scholars must all be wrong on one or two or three great subjects; you would pour out a stream of men, with false ideas on history, false ideas on science, false ideas on philosophy, literature, sociology; educated without being enlightened. You would be producing, if you look at the matter from the Catholic standpoint, bigots with the germs of religious hatred in their breasts, or, looked at from the other standpoint, laymen with the spirit of ecclesiastics. That is a logical result of your position, and it is utterly indefensible, and no persons could occupy the responsible position occupied by men in the Legislature of the North-west Territories or the Executive Council of that Legislature without being forced to take the question in hand and say: Anyway, we will limit it as far as possible without doing injury to the rights and susceptibilities of a large portion of our people, and that is what has been done. You have now in the North-west Territories Catholics and Protestants living in harmony amongst themselves, trading together, respecting each other, meeting each other socially in the same drawing-rooms, interchanging ideas, discussing politics, with no religious rancour whatever dividing them. My hon. friends, who know the North-west well, cheer that sentiment, because it is true. That is the state of things in the North-west at the present moment, and I have not heard from the Protestants of those territories a word uttered nor a single finger raised against the liberal arrangements made to preserve to our Roman Catholic fellow citizens there all the rights and privileges which they had under the old ordinance of 1888, and the regulations which were established from that time till 1892, before the passing of the so-called objectionable ordinance. Nor have I heard from my Catholic supporters—and I have Catholic supporters in Regina, in Medicine Hat, all over my district—a single word of complaint that their rights had been infringed—that they had been in some way disfranchised, disestablished and disendowed as to their scholastic rights. Not a syllable of that kind have I heard. Indeed, until a certain time last year, not a syllable was heard from an ecclesiastic or layman or any one else about the deplorable ordinance now objected to, which turns out on examination to be not at all at fault, because the regulations and the books complained of were accepted and lived peaceably under before that ordinance was passed. I say, Sir, that a very grave responsibility attaches to any man who seeks to disturb that state of things as it exists in the North-west. It might be possible to disturb it. We are not without men there, any more than you are anywhere in the Dominion, who would be ready to foment strife. There are some men whose element is rancour, whose element is to see men of the same country fighting each other with internecine hatred. We have such men; but up to the present they have not had water enough in which to swim their ship, and if their ranks are not swelled, and we are not disturbed, the people of the North-west will go on to develop and to fill a larger place as a portion of this Dominion, uncursed by those drawbacks which cast a shadow over some of our fairest provinces. So much for the North-west, Sir. But what shall be said after I, as a North-west man, with the responsibility which attaches to my position as a member of Parliament, have spoken as I have done to-night? We have an election near at hand. I have a large number of Catholics in my constituency. Do you suppose that I would come here and make these statements if I did not want to make them in the interest of truth? What other interest could I have in making them? I could have sat here and listened quietly to what my hon. friend from L'Islet (Mr. Tarte) and others might have said. The only object I can possibly have is to force the truth on the people of Canada and on this House, because if this speech can have any effect in regard to my political position, it must be to injure me, that is, if there be the kind of power that is represented by certain remarks which I see here and there, and which I need not look at more closely. My only object must be that this House, so far as my poor testimony and my poor means of discussing a question go, shall be possessed of the truth. And you must remember that I do not use this language ill-advisedly. My language to-night is not merely that of a member of Parliament discussing a great question brought before us; it is also the language of a witness coming from the North-west Territories, and every word that I have spoken here to-night will be supported by my hon. friend from Eastern Assiniboia (Mr. McDonald), my hon. friend from Saskatchewan (Mr. Macdowall), and my hon. friend from Alberta (Mr. Davis). We are here not only to discuss this question, but we are here as witnesses. Now, if it be a serious matter from the point of view of the North-west Territories, how much more serious is it if there be no such grievance in that vast region as it has been sought to make out, that men should try to make a grievance so grave as to excite the passions of a large portion of Her Majesty's subjects in one of the greatest provinces in the Dominion of Canada? Why, I know of no position, no fame, no power that could acquit a man, in the face of his age or of posterity, who would, knowing the facts, so misrepresent them in order to influence ignorant minds, that we should see men, their violent passions aroused, expressing themselves violently, going crazy almost—about nothing whatever. I say that would be a deplorable spectacle. I say that, if the facts be as I have stated—and they are—I know of no language that could properly characterize the gravity of the course taken by any man—I do not care what his position be—whether journalist or politician, or both, who should thus misrepresent them. My hon. friend, for instance, the other night spoke with his usual eloquence and with at least his usual élan—I was going to say with his usual excitability—but that would not express my meaning and I will say with his usual verve. And it is impossible not to see—because I have quoted his language at the beginning of my speech—that my hon. friend was thoroughly convinced that a state of things existed, wholly different from what does exist. And he was naturally excited.

Mr. TARTE. I was not excited.

Mr. DAVIN. Then the hon. gentleman acted it well. There must be hundreds like that in the province of Quebec.

Mr. AMYOT. Not many.

Mr. DAVIN. There must be hundreds anyway like him. If the people of Quebec get excited about a grievance like this, that so completely disappears on analysis, why, it would remind one of what Villemessant said of the Marseillais. The people of Marseilles, said he, could get extravagantly excited upon their own saliva. I have read the history of Quebec. I know that Quebec has produced some of our most moderate statesmen—men capable of looking at a question all round. Some of the pillars of our Dominion, the ornaments of our history, and the beacons of the past, have come from Quebec. And I will never believe, unless I see it, that, in an age like this, any man or set of men, or any journalist or set of journalists, can so flare before the eyes of a great people, like the Gaulic people of Quebec, an unreal mockery of misrepresentation as to the condition of Catholics in the North-west, and so excite them and so cause them to hold meetings, and have orators, like the orator quoted by my hon. friend, making speeches to them, displaying the most glaring ignorance, not only grave, but culpable ignorance. If these gentlemen would only inform themselves of what has actually taken place, there would be no danger. My hon.

friend (Mr. Monet) laughs. I am told he is a great man on the platform. I can see him get up before a lot of patriotic French-Canadians, and tell them, in his energetic way, what a dreadful state of things exists in the North-west. And he will fling his hands to heaven, and point to the north pole, or the sun, as the case may be and call heaven and earth to witness that such a state of oppression never existed as exists up in the North-west—and it was all done by an atrocious and desperate Tory Government. Well, I do not object to men fighting hard when they fight party against party. A great Frenchman, Mr. Taine, said, describing what he saw from the gallery of the English House of Commons, that men fought there as they fight in battle, that their rhetorical blows were like these men dealt each other in battle, or on the sea in old days, when yard was locked in yard and gun-lip kissing gun. I do not object to all that, but there is a limit beyond which party strife should not go. And that limit is passed when men will excite racial or religious passions on groundless grievances or alleged grievances, stirring up hatreds that may imperil the welfare and progress of a province, or even of the whole Dominion—and doing it for the paltry purpose of trying to snatch a party victory.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. DAVIN. My hon. friends cry "Hear, hear." behind me. And it has something partly of a cheer and partly of a sigh about it. When I talked of party victory, something of a little bellicosity rose in their hearts; but when they felt how desperate it was, their cheer died away into a sigh. It reminds one of the conflicting state of mind in which William of Deloraine was:

He sighed a sigh, and prayed a prayer,
The prayer was to his Patron Saint;
The sigh was to his lady fair.

I do not say that my hon. friend sighed to his lady fair. I acquit him of that, but the sigh probably rose from the desperate suggestion I happened to make, that such speeches should snatch a party victory. But I repeat, I do hope that no man will attempt, either in print or on the platform, to discuss this question in Quebec or anywhere else, without having gone into the facts, as suggested by the feeble attempt I have made here to explain the educational condition of the North-west to them to-night. And if they do make themselves masters of the facts, I care not how vigorously they fight, if they remember this, that in all our party struggles we should bear in mind that while we may be strong party men, we should be lovers of truth and patriots before everything else.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, 19th April, 1894.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS.

Mr. BAKER moved that the First and Second Reports of the Select Standing Committee on Public Accounts be now taken into consideration.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. MULOCK moved :

That, in accordance with the resolutions adopted unanimously by the House in the sessions of 1891 and 1892, it is desirable that any witnesses called before the Select Standing Committee on Public Accounts be examined under oath or affirmation touching any matters coming before them.

He said : Mr. Speaker, in making this motion. I may remind hon. members that it comes before the House now in consequence of the reports and actions of the Public Accounts Committee. In the session of 1891 the House itself passed a resolution in the words of that which is now in your hands. But the Public Accounts Committee, or some members of it rather, believing that it would be more courteous to the committee that the recommendation should come from the committee to the House, on this occasion I preferred to waive my own view as to the rights of the House by first of all ascertaining whether the committee agreed in the course which I am now taking. Accordingly, Mr. Speaker, as you will observe, from reading the first report, I moved in the Public Accounts Committee to the effect of the motion now in your hands, that it is desirable that witnesses before that committee should be examined under oath. Unfortunately, for the sake of that motion, the majority of the members of the Public Accounts Committee did not agree with the proposition, as appears by the report on the Table. Accordingly, it becomes necessary now to ascertain whether a majority of the House favour that view. I may say, Sir, that the motion before the committee was met by many objections. One objection was that the Parliament of Canada had no jurisdiction to confer such a power upon a select standing committee. I do not know that that objection was taken with a great deal of confidence in its soundness on the part of the Minister of Railways, who first raised it, and other members of the Government. The next objection, I believe, was that raised by the hon. member for South Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale). His objection was that the Ontario Parliament did not recognize such a practice, and, although the hon. member for South Norfolk had never been able to discover anything else that was good in the record of the Ontario Government, he was able to recognize this one virtue—that they refused to allow examination on oath regarding the expenditure of public money.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. May I ask to what occasion the hon. gentleman refers ?

Mr. MULOCK. The first meeting of the Public Accounts Committee when the subject was discussed.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I think, Mr. Speaker, this is not in order, and that it would be an inconvenient mode of discussing this question. I do not think it is in order to refer to the discussions in the Public Accounts Committee. There may be different views as to what was said, and that may embarrass the discussion.

Mr. MULOCK. I think that, when the report of any committee is under discussion, anything that came before the committee respecting the subject of that report, is in order.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The point I raise, Mr. Speaker, is that it is out of order to refer to what was said during the discussion in the Committee on Public Accounts.

Mr. MULOCK. I suppose the hon. gentleman would wish that what he said and the points he took upon that occasion, which have thus far prevented this resolution being adopted, should not be known to the public.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. On the contrary, I will repeat them to-day.

Mr. MULOCK. If the hon. gentleman repeats them to-day, there can be no disadvantage in my anticipating them. At any rate, I do not wish to delay the proceedings of the House or the consideration of this question by bringing in any controversial matters, because the question is sufficiently broad and substantial to entitle it to the support of the House without bringing in any other question. But I was saying that objections have been raised to the passing of this measure. One is that the Parliament of Canada has no jurisdiction. Another is that the Ontario Government would not allow this course to be taken, and, because of its wickedness in that respect, it received, for once, the support of the hon. member for South Norfolk. That was the only point in its record that he could find to entitle it to any consideration from him. Another objection taken by a gentleman who prefers to be governed by a law four or five hundred years old—the Minister of Public Works—was that, though there was jurisdiction to examine witnesses under oath, Parliament must know the names of the witnesses and must consider in every case whether these witnesses shall or shall not be thus examined. Another objection, taken by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, is that this motion shall not be passed at all, but if there is any case sought to be made, it must, first of all, pass through the crucial test of the Public Accounts Committee, which must make the recommendation to this House to sanction further inquiry, and then this House shall proceed to consider the question. The last of the objections was that taken by the Minister of Finance, that the Public Accounts Committee is nothing but a committee of audit. That is the tenor of the argument of the hon. Minister of Finance. These are the various objections, so far as they have been given to the public; but, singular to say, though the objections were cut away one by one, the hon. gentlemen who had severally brought them forward, were still able to agree with the majority, for unknown reasons, in preventing inquiry. The first question is that of jurisdiction. Upon that point to-day there is no possible doubt. It is true that, by the British North America Act there was no jurisdiction such as is sought to be exercised to-day. That was remedied by an Imperial Act passed in the session of 1875. I may say that the question came up out of the consideration of an Act passed by this Parliament in 1873, which Act I now quote, chapter 1, Statutes of 1873, and the first section of which reads as follows:—

Whenever any witness or witnesses is or are to be examined by any committee of the Senate or House of Commons and the Senate or House of Commons shall have resolved that it is desirable that such witness or witnesses shall be examined upon oath, such witness or witnesses shall be examined on oath or affirmation, when affirmation is allowed by law—

And the Act prescribes penalties. Now, that Act was passed in order to meet the case of a contemplated inquiry into the Pacific Scandal. It was disallowed by the Imperial authorities on the ground that it exceeded the then jurisdiction of the Parliament of Canada. But subsequently the Imperial Parliament, in the session of 1875, passed an enabling Act, repealing our old section 18 of the British North America Act, and passed another Act giving full authority to the Parliament of Canada to delegate such powers, as are here sought for, to any of the committees of the House. The Parliament of Canada, in the exercise of the power so conferred on it, proceeded to legislate in that direction, and you will find the law on the subject in the Revised Statutes of Canada, chapter 11, section 21. This section is verbatim a copy of the words used in the Statutes of 1873, which were adopted in anticipation of a threatened inquiry. We must assume that the gentlemen who took part in the framing of that Act intended it to apply to the examination of witnesses whose names were not known at the time. They must certainly have contemplated making it effective; and therefore, even upon that ground alone, I think it is fair to assume that the objection taken that the witnesses must be known is wholly untenable and contrary to the spirit of this section. I need not remind hon. gentlemen who voted against this motion in the committee, that if any of them voted against it upon the understanding that the Ontario Legislature did not authorize such an inquiry under oath, my reading to them of the law of the land, as passed in the Ontario Legislature, showing that they were labouring under a mistake, may possibly cause them to change their views. The Legislature of Ontario, in 1872, Revised Statutes, chapter 5, passed the following Act:—

Any standing or select committee of the Legislative Assembly may require that facts, matters, and things, relating to the subject of inquiry—be verified or otherwise ascertained by the oral examination of witnesses, and may examine such witnesses upon oath, and for that purpose the Chairman or any member of such committee may administer the oath to any such witness.

That became the law in the province of Ontario in 1872. And I am told by the Treasurer of Ontario that, without exception, it has been their invariable practice to allow the members of the Select Standing Committee on Public Accounts in Ontario to examine witnesses on oath whenever and as often as they please. For twenty years that has been the law, and I would ask the hon. member for South Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale), who has been defending the Government because he thought there was no such law in Ontario, where he has been all this time. And I am told that such is the law also in the province of Quebec, but of that I only speak from hearsay. But we are told that the language of this statute does not contemplate the giving of general power by the House to a committee to examine witnesses, but that the committee must send to the House the names of witnesses, or that some case must be made out, before the House will at all stir in the matter. Now, it is very singular that that discovery should only be made now. What has been the view taken of the law since it has existed? We have had in this House, from time to time, the most eminent lawyers that Canada has ever known. Some of them still enjoy the professional confidence of the community, others are filling high judicial offices in the land, and from year to year both the Senate and this House have constantly evoked the power of the Act now in force. Sir, never on one occasion do I find, from the examination of the records in the Senate and in this House, that either one of these Houses asked for the names of witnesses before giving a committee authority to examine generally. On the contrary, I find that the practice of both Houses, acquiesced in by common consent, has established, as the interpretation of this Act, that the House can delegate to a committee the power to examine into all matters and to call for such witnesses as they may please, and examine them under oath or affirmation, where affirmation is allowed in lieu of oath. And I challenge any member of this House to show a single case in which names of witnesses have been submitted to the House or the Senate, in order to cause them to exercise the power conferred upon them by this Act. Just let me for a moment give to the House a few of the occasions on which the Senate and this House decided that they have the power to authorize committees to examine witnesses on oath. In 1877, the Senate passed a resolution appointing a committee to inquire into certain matters touching the length of the line of the Canadian Pacific Railway from Keewatin westward in a more southerly line, and so on. And we find that the resolution authorizes the committee—I give the exact words :

To send for persons and papers and reports, and to examine witnesses under oath.

Not one single reference to the name of a witness, but a full power of attorney to the committee to examine witnesses generally under oath. In the following session, the Senate, on the motion of Senator Girard, seconded by Mr. Reid, passed a resolution appointing a committee to inquire into certain matters regarding the approaches to the property at Fort William, and—authorized the committee to send for persons, paper and records and examine witnesses under oath, and report thereon with all convenient speed.

Again, in the same session, on motion of Hon. Mr. Macpherson, seconded by Hon. Mr. Campbell, a resolution was passed appointing a select committee to inquire into certain matters connected with Fort Frances lock, and I quote the language of the resolution :

Authorizes the committee to examine witnesses under oath and to employ a shorthand writer.

In the following year, 1879, on motion of Hon. Mr. Macpherson, seconded by Hon. Mr. Allen, resolutions were adopted—all of which, I believe, were carried—authorizing a committee to enquire into certain matters respecting the surveys on the Canadian Pacific Railway, and the committee were authorized

To take evidence under oath and to report to this House from time to time.

Again, in the session of 1880, the Senate passed a resolution, and this House confirmed it, appointing a committee to make the necessary inquiries into all the circumstances connected with the opening of tenders for parliamentary printing, the withdrawal of tenders and other matters connected with printing, and declares as follows :

Mr. MULOCK.

And it is desirable that any witnesses who may appear before them in relation to the above inquiry shall be examined under oath.

Again, I remind the House that the Senate in the session of 1890, on the inquiry into the matter of the Baie des Chaleurs Railway, referred that subject to the Select Committee on Railways, Canals and Telegraph Lines, and in the following words authorized the committee to take evidence.

To send for such persons, papers and records as may from time to time be required by said committee for the purpose of reporting evidence under oath as to any matters arising out of the examination before said committee on the Bill from the House of Commons respecting the Baie des Chaleurs Railway.

The Senate no longer than three years ago authorized their committee to examine any person they chose to summon. I do not suppose the Senate had the faintest idea who the witnesses would be, yet the Senate thought they were properly interpreting the law, both when they passed that resolution and when they proceeded to carry it out. I now come to the decisions of this House. In 1877 this House directed an inquiry to be made into matters affecting the Northern Railway, and the resolution appointing the committee authorized it to examine witnesses on oath, as follows :

It is desirable that any witness to be examined by said committee, be examined under oath.

Again, in 1877, the House referred a matter respecting Hon. Mr. Anglin to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, with power to take evidence, as follows :

It is desirable that any witness to be examined by the Select Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections on the matters which have been referred to this committee shall be examined upon oath.

Again, the House of Commons, in 1877, referred a matter respecting Mr. Norris to the Select Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections, empowering the committee to take evidence, as follows :

It is desirable that any witness should be examined by the Select Standing Committee of Privileges and Elections, to whom it has been referred to inquire and report on the allegations made against Mr. James Norris, shall be examined under oath.

Again, the House of Commons, in the same session appointed a committee to inquire into certain matters respecting Mr. Currier, and empowered the committee to examine witnesses under oath, as follows :

It is desirable that any witness to be examined by the Select Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections, to whom has been referred this inquiry into matters concerning Mr. Currier, shall be examined under oath.

Again, in 1878, this House appointed a committee to inquire into certain matters touching the North-west, and passed a resolution in the following words :

It is desirable that any witness examined before the Select Standing Committee on Public Accounts in connection with the expenditure of public money by the purveyors of the Government in the North-west, shall be examined under oath.

Again, this House, in 1880, passed the joint resolution to which I have referred respecting printing, and in that resolution declared that in their opinion,

It is desirable that any witness or witnesses who may appear before the committee in relation to the above inquiry shall be examined under oath.

Again, in 1886, a charge was made against a prominent member of this House at that time, a legal gentleman of high standing—I refer to Mr. Hector Cameron—and that charge was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and the House on that occasion empowered the committee

To send for persons, papers and records, and examine witnesses upon oath or affirmation.

Again, in 1888, it will be remembered that combinations in regard to trusts had grown to enormous and injurious proportions, and accordingly in that session this House passed a resolution appointing a select standing committee to inquire into such combinations, and it empowered the committee to take evidence under oath,

With power to send for persons, papers and records, and with power to examine persons called before them on oath.

Again, in the session of 1889, this House appointed a committee to inquire into certain alleged frauds on farmers, and it authorized that committee to take evidence under oath, "with power to send for persons, papers and records, and examine under oath or affirmation, where affirmation is allowed by law, witnesses who may appear before the said committee." Again, in the session of 1890, grave charges were made against a former member of this House, Mr. Rykert. Those charges were referred to the Select Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections for investigation, and the committee were empowered to examine witnesses under oath or affirmation, where affirmation is allowed by law.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Can you give the date of that?

Mr. MULOCK. The resolution giving power to the Committee on Public Accounts, you will find on page 253 of the Journals of the House of Commons, and the date on which it was passed is the 25th of June, 1801. The words that I read a moment ago as supposed to apply to the Rykert case, are the words applicable to this resolution. The words that the House adopted on the occasion I am last quoting, namely, the reference to the Public Accounts Committee, are as follows:—

That it is desirable that any witness called before the Select Standing Committee on Public Accounts be examined under oath or affirmation, touching any matters coming before them.

Again, Mr. Speaker, in the session of 1891, the country and the House were convulsed with charges made in regard to certain misappropriations of public money, and other high crimes, I may call them, against the liberties of the people. I refer to the charges which culminated in the McGreevy-Connolly inquiry. These charges were referred to the Select Committee on Privileges and Elections, with power to examine witnesses under oath, and the words used, which certainly seemed sufficiently effective on that occasion, were:

The committee was clothed with power to send for persons, papers and records and to examine witnesses upon oath or affirmation.

I need not remind the House how that power was exercised. Day after day, new witnesses were brought in, whose names were never dreamt of at the time the resolution was passed. Throughout these whole series of cases to which I have referred, in no one instance has this House expressed any opinion as to who should or who should not be examined. The House left it entirely at the discretion of the committee to use that power as it, in its judgment, saw best, in harmony, of course, with the law. But, Sir, the Minister of Finance has now taken this extraordinary position: He contends that the committee is practically nothing but an auditing committee. I presume that the duties of this committee are analogous to those of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts in the Imperial House of Commons, and if they are, on reference to the last edition of May's "Parliamentary Practice," page 563, you will find that the Public Accounts Committee in England possesses more power than auditing power. This is what May says:

The functions of this committee are to ascertain that the parliamentary grants for each financial year, including supplementary grants, have been applied to the objects for which Parliament ascribed them.

Now, here is where May and the Minister of Finance will agree:

And to recheck the official audit created by the Exchequer Audit Department Act.

And May then proceeds:

The committee also scrutinizes the causes which led to any excess over parliamentary grants and the application of savings, and the grant made to the naval and military departments.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this matter came up for the consideration of this House of Commons in 1891 in a more formal way than I have perhaps yet referred to. On the 19th of August, 1891, the Minister of Finance moved the House into Supply, and the member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) made a motion in amendment, and perhaps the resolution that he offered to the House, and the opinions which he expressed on it may appeal to the judgment of some hon. gentlemen on the other side. The resolution which was moved on that occasion by the hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) was in the following words :—

It is the undoubted right of the Committee on Public Accounts to investigate all circumstances connected with the payment of any of the several sums of public moneys, referred to that committee,—

Now, that is one proposition.

—and that in the course of such investigation no evidence should be refused on the ground that it may disclose improper conduct or relations on the part of a Minister of the Crown or of any other party in connection with such payment.

That is another proposition. Sir Richard Cartwright spoke as follows (page 4089, 'Hansard' of 1891) :—

Now, Sir, what I desire at present is to obtain from the House some definition or declaration of the extent of the powers and duties which that committee possesses. It is not my intention, Sir, to occupy any great portion of the time of the House, but rather to confine myself to stating briefly what I understand, for my part, after a considerable experience in the ways and working of that committee, to be its functions and its duties, and also to state briefly the reasons why I think that understanding should prevail. The House after consideration can then decide whether the motion which I propose to submit, clearly defines the functions of the committee. Now, Sir, according to my understanding of the case, in the first place, the Committee on Public Accounts is strictly and in terms a committee of investigation—an inquisitorial committee, if you choose to call it. That committee is bound from the nature of the case to ascertain whether the various sums of public money which this House places at the disposal of the Government of the day are properly and honestly expended.

I call attention especially to those words because that doctrine was acquiesced in by the First Minister.

Sir, as a corollary and sequence to that, it is, in my judgment, no barrier or answer to any proceedings taken in that committee to say that the facts which may be brought out on examination in reference to any particular item so referred to a committee, touch or do not touch the conduct of any Minister of the Crown or any member of the House. In point of fact, according to my understanding of the duties of the committee, it is their special duty, as everybody knows it is the general duty of this House, to investigate the conduct of Ministers of the Crown, and to see in particular how public moneys are expended. But it is by delegation of the House, in a special sense, the duty of the members of the Public Accounts Committee to see that the public money is properly and honestly expended; and if, in the course of that investigation, questions should arise touching the conduct of any Minister of the Crown, so far from that being a barrier to investigation, it appears to me that it is rather a special reason why that committee should proceed with the investigation and make it, if possible, more thorough and searching. I do not at all desire to contend that the Committee on Public Accounts is bound to sit in judgment on conduct of members or on the conduct of Ministers. That is not the contention. What I do assert is that they are bound to find the facts, without fear or favour, and without reference to the circumstances, whether they may or may not in any way affect a Minister of the Crown or anybody else. Having found these facts, be they good or bad, it is their duty, in my opinion, to report them to this House. Who, having those facts before them, may then take such action as to the House seems proper. * * *

It appears to me that this has become, in a special sense, the correct interpretation of the duties and powers of that committee, since, upon the same principle, we have given the powers to the Auditor General to which I have referred, who has taken off the shoulders of the committee the care of examining into the minute details of those comparatively formal inquiries, which, in other days, used to occupy a considerable portion of the time of the Committee on Public Accounts.

The hon. gentleman having so addressed the House, the resolution was submitted and the hon. First Minister, then Minister of Justice, proceeded to discuss it. I will not quote the whole of his speech; if I omit anything that is thought material, let some other hon. member quote it. On page 4091 Sir John Thompson is reported to have spoken as follows in reference to the motion made by Sir Richard Cartwright :—

Fortunately, the resolution of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) is not open to the objection that we require notice of it, because it affirms a principle which I cannot suppose it would be optional in any member of this House to deny. Now, the principle which the hon. member lays down can be best illustrated—and I beg to assure him that, in speaking thus upon it, I am advocating its passage, lest a doubt may have arisen in his mind as to the propriety of the course he asks the House to affirm—by the practice adopted by the House generally in regard to the Public Accounts Committee is that, when the report of the Auditor General is laid on the Table of the House, it is referred to that committee for the purposes of investigation. Undoubtedly, in regard to that reference or in regard to any other reference that may be made to it, that committee is a committee of investigation.

A committee of investigation, without power to investigate. They shall have the undoubted right in the abstract, but the Government will take good care that that undoubted right shall be incapable of being exercised. The hon. First Minister went on to say :

From time to time, as occasion may require, or as circumstances may be shown to the House, other items, even though they refer to past expenditure, to years that have passed away, may be referred to the committee for the same purpose. No one can deny, and certainly on this side of the House we do not pretend to deny this afternoon, that, in the investigation of any reference made to the committee by this House, it is entirely proper for the committee to hear evidence which may be adduced, no matter what consequences may ensue to any member of this House.

Then, the hon. gentleman remarked that it matters not who is affected, and so on, and puts in a saving clause before the end that the inquiries must not be fishing inquiries; that seems to be the only limitation. Well, Mr. Speaker, what became of this resolution, which the First Minister agreed to, saying that it was the undoubted right of the Committee on Public Accounts to investigate all circumstances connected with the payment of any sums of public money referred to that committee? The House unanimously adopted that resolution. Public opinion at that time made it impossible for the Government to resist such a proposition, even if they had wished to do so, which I presume they did not at that time; and what was the result of that action? When the Committee on Public Accounts met in the session of 1892, was it necessary for the minority on that committee to do what the majority are trying to compel us to do to-day—to submit to the gagging that is sought to be put upon the committee?

Mr. SPEAKER. Order.

Mr. MULOCK. Is that not in order, Mr. Speaker? Then I will use some parliamentary term; I will say that in 1892 we were not obliged to demand power to make effective our duties as members of the committee. At that time, owing to an active public opinion, it was necessary only to remind the committee that they were an investigating committee, and the committee on that occasion unanimously passed a resolution recommending to this House that Parliament should give them power to examine witnesses under oath. On the 1st of April, 1892—I read the 'Journals of the House of Commons,' page 187:

Mr. Wallace, from the Select Standing Committee on Public Accounts, presented to the House the first report of the said committee, which was read as follows:—

Your committee recommend that whenever any witness or witnesses coming before them is or are to be examined, it is desirable that such witness or witnesses shall be examined upon oath.

On motion of Mr. Wallace, seconded by Mr. Roome, this report was adopted in the following words:—

That this House do concur in the first report of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts.

There, Sir, was the fruit of the order of the House. The House in 1891 declared that the committee was not a mere auditing committee, as the hon. Minister of Finance pretends to-day, but a committee to make a substantial investigation; a committee not merely to pick up receipts and vouchers and look at the face of them, and see that the money was spent, but charged with the higher duty and the greater responsibility of ascertaining whether the moneys voted by the people's representatives had been honestly and wisely expended; and I would like to know how any such committee can discharge its duties if it is prevented from getting evidence other than that supplied by the documents themselves. Suppose that a man having a large estate went away, leaving his steward in charge, and placing with him a large sum of money, with directions to spend so much on buildings, so much on roads, and so much on canals. Suppose he came back and said to the steward, "Render me an account"; and the steward handed to him his receipts, saying, "I spent all that, and there are the accounts and receipts." Suppose the owner of the estate said to him, "You have constructed a canal from my premises to your own property, I want to know more than the amount of the expenditure; I want to know wherein I am benefited by that expenditure." If it were a public building would he not say: "I want to see whether the money was expended judiciously, not merely whether you spent so much money; I want to see that you had proper contracts and skilled workmen, that the men you employed lived up to the specifications, and that good, honest materials were put into the building; all these things are necessary before I can say, "Well done, good and faithful steward." Are we not bound in the same way to investigate the wisdom and propriety of the expenditure of public money made by the people's representatives? When we have told it to the country that vast sums of money have been wasted here and there, is not the country entitled to know something more than that the money is lost? It is all very well to say that the receipts are there showing that the moneys have been expended; but if the expenditure has been made unwisely, the country is entitled to know it, in order that it may withdraw the confidence it reposes in its stewards. And if the money has not been unwisely expended, who is going to be hurt? Would it not be rather to the credit of those intrusted with the expenditure to have it made clear that the money has been wisely expended? Take any transaction. Take the thing known in the public mind as the Curran bridge. Does the hon. gentleman say that it is not due to the country that there should be an examination under oath into the expenditure on that enterprise? And yet we are told that the Public Accounts Committee has done all that is required when they see the receipts showing that the money is irretrievably lost. Take item after item of the public accounts, and the mere voucher that the money has gone is no adequate information as to how the money was spent. The Committee on Public Accounts stand between the people and the Government, and it is the duty of the Government to strengthen the hands of the committee in order that their investigation should be thorough. You cannot find any precedent in Great Britain for the conduct of the majority of the committee. In 1871, the Imperial Parliament clothed its standing committees with certain powers. They are not hemmed in, as we are, by an Act which says that on each and every occasion the House must be asked to give this power. But the Imperial Act clothed every committee with full power to examine witnesses. If you refer to the Imperial Act of 1871, chapter 83, entitled "An Act to enable the House of Commons, and any committee thereof, to administer the oath to witnesses," you find :

The House of Commons may administer the oath to witnesses at the bar of the said House. Any committee of the House of Commons may administer the oath to witnesses examined before such committee.

A committee of the Imperial House does not require the special authority of the House, or the consent of the majority of the committee to administer the oath. The thing has not to be threshed out from day to day and to encounter all the ingenious methods of delay within the reach of the Government. But the moment a matter is before a committee in England—although, as a matter of courtesy, they may, perhaps, ask whether they shall or shall not make inquiries under oath—any member of that committee can, as a matter of legal right, demand that the witness be sworn. I have told you, Sir, the practice in Ontario. We are told what the law is in the province of Quebec. Why, then, should this House impose a practice here that is thwarting a fair investigation of public affairs, and is, at all events, an instrument to prevent a thorough investigation? Why, if the Government have no substantial objection, should they not be the first to say : Let there be light, and let all these matters appear under the noon-day sun? Take the experience of a couple of sessions ago—if the oath had not then been applied as a search light upon doings that did not appear in the vouchers and receipts, where would we have been? Take the records of the Public Accounts Committee of 1892, and what do you find? Day after day the chairman of that committee had to appear before this House, and present the report of the Public Accounts Committee. And what was that report? It was the disclosures, under oath, of certain persons, compelled to make known of how they had been guilty of breaches of trust, and maladministration. From day to day, the House and the country were shocked by disclosures of that kind, such as never before disgraced our country, and I hope never will again. But if the Government desire to stand well before the country, if they desire to have their fair fame preserved, they will be the first on this occasion to support this resolution and make the Public Accounts Committee that instrument which Parliament, in 1891, said it ought to be—an instrument qualified to control and perfectly investigate all expenditures of public money. I need not take up the time of the House further. I am perfectly satisfied there is not a citizen of Canada who does not, in his heart, believe that every possible means of investigating these facts should be placed within the reach of the people's representatives. And we are now face to face with this issue, and upon this vote the country will decide whether the Public Accounts Committee is to be stifled, or whether it is to take full power and be effective. And if the Government use their power and influence in this House to induce their supporters to vote down a proposition like this, they will have practically destroyed the usefulness of the Public Accounts Committee. The Minister of Finance says that before an investigation can take place, we must establish a prima facie case, we must satisfy him, we must satisfy his majority. I take these words out of a newspaper, this morning, which are said to be those used by the Minister of Finance :

He stated before the Public Accounts Committee in order to induce them not to allow the examination upon oath—

I am reading from the Toronto 'Globe.'

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh! oh!

Mr. MULOCK. I suppose it may be true, if it appears there. The hon. member for East Toronto (Mr. Coatsworth) seems to question the accuracy of anything that appears in the Toronto 'Globe.' The Toronto 'Globe,' perhaps, may have given him some attention on that account. The Minister of Railways (Mr. Haggart), if I understood him correctly, says this is an ingenious way to present the case. I think myself that hon. gentleman ought to be found aiding in the presentation of this case.

Mr. HAGGART. Did you refer to me as having made an ingenious statement?

Mr. MULOCK. No, I did not. The report in the 'Globe' goes on to say :

We ought not to ask the House for power to put witnesses on oath unless some members of the committee—

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman cannot discuss here anything that has occurred in committee, and which is not on record before the House. The rule laid down is as follows :—

In the case of evidence taken by a committee, as soon as the evidence is before the House it may be debated at length. But members will not be permitted to discuss the conduct or language of members of the committee, except so far as it appears on the record.

Mr. MULOCK. I accept your ruling, Sir, on that point. But, of course, the Minister will repeat the language here which he used in committee. I desire to say, in conclusion, that I trust the House will be able to make the Public Accounts Committee effective to discharge the duties for which it was created. We are annually charged with investigating the expenditure of a vast sum of money, now exceeding $36,000,000. That certainly is an amount, the expenditure of which demands an investigation at our hands. And if everything is in order, I can conceive of no more pleasurable duty which the Government could have than to charge this committee to most thoroughly probe everything to the bottom, armed at all points with every instrument necessary for the effective discharge of its duties. But, on the other hand, the Government have a different view, and say the committee shall be ineffective, and without authority, then the country will understand that they have practically dissolved the Public Accounts Committee.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat has made a long argument and has advanced many propositions. I am willing to concede that the larger portion of his speech is not only sound and its arguments unanswerable, but, as I understand it, neither here nor elsewhere have those propositions been quarrelled with or made the subject of discussion. To my mind the hon. gentleman's notion is one thing and his speech is an entirely different thing, and the larger portion of his speech has very little applicability to the resolution he moved. The hon. gentleman, in the earlier part of his speech, referred to what was supposed to have taken place before the Committee on Public Accounts. I did not think at the time that the hon. gentleman was in order. Not that I cared, as he seemed to think, and even suggested, that whether or not my views on that occasion were mentioned or ventilated in this Chamber, but, because, with all due deference, I supposed, and now suppose, that that sort of discussion might be long, and, in any event, would be unsatisfactory. It matters not what was said on the occasion when this subject came before the Committee on Public Accounts, but it matters a great deal, and is pertinent to this resolution and to this discussion what the report of that committee is. This much appears on the Journals of the House—that the subject came up before the Committee on Public Accounts on the motion of the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock), who asked the committee to agree :

That it is desirable that such witnesses as are to be examined by the Public Accounts Committee shall be examined on oath.

I moved an amendment to that resolution, and that is my reason for interposing at this early stage of the discussion. For I do not claim to have any parliamentary experience on a subject of this kind worth placing before the House, nor do I desire to attempt to instruct the House as to what ought to be or is the parliamentary method of procedure in these cases. I merely feel that it is proper and right that, having taken the responsibility of moving an amendment to the hon. gentleman's resolution, I should follow the hon. gentleman now and give such reasons as seem to me cogent for still maintaining the position I took on that occasion. My resolution was :

That whenever it shall appear desirable and necessary in the conduct of an inquiry of this committee that witnesses should be examined under oath, authority shall be asked in the House of Commons to have the testimony so taken.

Now, the point between us, the point on which the discussion must now turn is simply this: Shall we, on each and every occasion when we inquire into the public accounts, proceed with the formality of taking testimony under oath, with the employment, as will become necessary, of shorthand writers, to reduce that testimony to proper form? Or shall we pursue the (as it seems to me) business method of seeking the sanction of an oath only in cases where it is made to appear that a proper and thorough investigation of the matter before the committee can be made only in that way? All these indignant assertions, all this excitement of the hon. gentleman is beside the mark, I submit. There is no attempt to conceal anything, to shirk any inquiry or to throw obstacles in the way of investigation. There is an attempt, on the other hand, by the resolution which I presented, and which met with the approval of the majority of the committee, to proceed in due order, with regularity, and not to rush headlong into these formal inquiries where such a course would appear quite unnecessary. The hon. gentleman has not dealt with that feature of the case. He has not discussed what facts might or might not be required to show that a formal investigation is necessary. On the other hand, he called attention to-day to the fact that, when the country was convulsed and in a state of excitement, when serious charges were being made against members of the Government and members of this House, this Government quickly threw open the doors for every attempt that was being made in any way to investigate every question to the fullest extent. Out of the eighteen years that have passed since 1876, in which the public accounts have been examined by the Public Accounts Committee, only two have been mentioned, or can be mentioned, when it was considered advisable to resort to the procedure which the hon. gentleman suggests now should be made the procedure on each and every occasion for every session and for all time. It is not the idea, and it was not when we differed before in the Public Accounts Committee, that we should proceed in a loose manner or compel hon. gentlemen opposite to investigate any item of the public accounts without due solemnity and without proper safeguard. But we considered that it was in the interest of the public business, that it would be regular and businesslike and according to the almost invariable practice of that very committee, that we should not ask witnesses, Deputy Ministers and others, who might be in attendance upon that committee to be sworn upon each and every occasion when their services were required. On many occasions it would be an absurdity on the face of it. When some explanation is wanted with reference to the vouchers before the committee, which explanation involves no question of dispute, the witness should be at liberty to state the facts. There has been no case mentioned of this committee, or a majority of the committee, on a reasonable case being shown, or the slightest prima facie case being made out, having refused to ask this House for the necessary authority to take evidence upon oath. The hon. gentleman referred to the statute that first gave authority to authorize committees to take evidence under oath. That legislation itself, I think, is a very necessary element in this discussion, and should be very carefully considered. It carries on the face of it the idea that this procedure is not to be the rule, that there are occasions—and occasions which, I think, will be the exception to the practice—when, as mentioned almost in the language of the resolution of the Public Accounts—"whenever desirable" is the language of the statute—we shall ask for authority to take evidence under oath. The statute says, "Whenever any witness or witnesses is or are to be examined by any committee of the Senate or House of Commons, the Senate or House of Commons shall have resolved that it is desirable that such witness or witnesses shall be examined upon oath." Surely there is no hon. gentleman who will say that the committee should not proceed with the same caution and the same consideration with which the House of Commons itself is supposed to proceed, and that is not that on mere application shall authority be given by this House for testimony to be taken upon oath, but when it is shown to this House that it is "desirable" that such course should be followed, then the necessary authority shall be given. That is the position taken by hon. members who voted for the amendment to which I have referred. That is the position which I think is a thoroughly sound one to-day, and it would only be during a period of extraordinary excitement that the course adopted in 1892 might be adopted again. I myself think it would be far better on every occasion to follow as nearly as possible the course that the language of the statute seems to mark out. There were hon. members on that committee, I believe there are hon. gentlemen opposite, who have themselves doubts as to what is technically the correct course for this House to take when it is attempting to clothe the Committee on Public Accounts or any committee with authority under this

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER.

Act. for every member of the legal profession is aware that any faults or irregularities under that Act will make the oath absolutely worthless and of no effect.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). No effect on the witness?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. No effect on the witness in this sense, in placing him in fear of punishment in case he violates the oath—and that is, I suppose, what hon. gentlemen wish. They do not wish to put an empty form of oath to a witness which will be without effect, but they wish to put the oath, as hon. gentlemen have stated time and again, in order to caution him and make him more careful in his statements before the committee. The whole reason for administering the oath is supposed to be to arouse fear on the part of the witness as to the consequences of violating his oath; else this whole discussion is idle and of no importance whatever. I do not think there is any reasonable difference of opinion, that whatever course is ultimately adopted here in connection with the authority of that committee shall be strictly correct and regular, according to law. Well, then, I say this statute clearly provides that on particular occasions that authority shall be given to the committee, and the only difference to-day seems to be that some hon. gentleman asked that the House shall clothe that committee with general authority to take evidence under oath, no matter whether the case is a trivial one, a case that does not require formal testimony, and that on every occasion when the committee is called witnesses shall be examined on oath and the proceedings taken in a formal manner. This will prevent expedition in the transaction of business before the committee, it will impede the progress that hon. members desire to make on those occasions at the meetings, it is not the practice of that committee when it sits as an auditing body. The hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) said that while we have been given power, inquisitorial power as he called it, in dealing with the business that comes before that committee, our direct function is the auditing of accounts, and it is entirely irregular and contrary to the practice of large corporations and huge concerns all over the world that on the occasion of auditing accounts there should be this form of procedure followed and formal testimony taken under oath.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Hear, hear.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Surely the hon. gentleman does not mean to say that the practice is to go through the items of the accounts by taking testimony on each, under oath. The hon. gentleman no doubt called attention to that statement, not to challenge its accuracy, but to doubt its application to the present case.

Mr. MULOCK. I suppose the hon. gentleman is aware that great corporations are obliged to make returns under oath.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Surely the hon. gentleman is aware that the statement he has made has nothing whatever to do with the statement I have made, and that my statement is correct according to business experience, and that the accounts of large corporations are not audited by taking testimony on oath on any one of the items. It is when something wrong is suspected, which appears to require investigation, or an inquisition, as the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) would say, that resort is had to such measures, that such measures then become necessary, and only then. Therefore, I say it does not seem to me to be a subject for reasonable discussion that a large portion of the business coming before the Public Accounts Committee for investigation can be said for a moment to require formal testimony under oath; that in case after case of accounts, in the vast majority of them, no matter what circumstances may appear on the face, the majority of the committee would not desire that the testimony or examination should proceed in that manner. Why, then, because a possible case may occur, because some hon. gentleman thinks it may be necessary to resort to this procedure, should we arrive at once at the conclusion that it will be more convenient and will be absolutely necessary in the public interest that we should adopt a proceeding which is novel, and a practice which I do not believe, and the hon. gentleman did not satisfy me to the contrary, obtains in England. In the same edition of "May," from which the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) quoted, I observed this remark: That even in the case of select committees (and these were the cases to which the hon. gentleman referred to-day and not to the case of the standing committees), it is not usual to examine witnesses upon oath, except in inquiries of judicial or other special character. That is the English practice, and it is the practice even in cases of select committees of the House of Commons. I argue from that, if when it is supposed to be a special inquiry it is not the practice, why in the case of a standing committee like our Public Accounts Committee, with a vast amount of business before it, not calling for any special investigation, should we ask so extraordinary a course to be taken? But the hon. gentleman referred to a statute, and he did not refer to any other authority on the practice in England. The statute carries him a very short distance. It simply gives, in language different from our own statute, the authority to a committee to administer an oath. It does not go the length the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) wished it to go, and that is to make it obligatory on committees to take evidence under oath, or obligatory on this committee to take testimony on oath on every occasion. I have shown that it is not the custom in England; that while this statute gives committees of the English House of Commons authority to take evidence on oath, I make bold to say, although I cannot support the statement at the moment by authority, it will be found that this practice does not obtain in the House of Commons, and that the proceedings are conducted in the ordinary way only.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Both ways.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentleman may be able to show it; I doubt it, because as a matter of fact, evidence is not taken under oath in the Public Accounts Committee in England, and as I have shown even in cases heard before select committees, evidence is taken under oath but seldom. The hon. gentleman, while making many propositions with which I will not quarrel, refers to precedents. He quoted a long list of precedents from the Senate and a long list from this House, but they are all against him. It was a remarkable thing that in a period of eighteen years since we have had the authority to do this, there were only two occasions when the House of Commons deemed it necessary to give this general authority to the Public Accounts Committee; and he mentioned special circumstances calling for that course. What are the special circumstances existing now? Does he pretend that up to this stage of our proceedings a single word has been uttered, or a single hint given, that there is any wrong-doing concerning any particular account referred to the committee? Is he able to show one single line in the report of the Committee on Public Accounts that suggests that there is anything wrong, or that there is any reason to suspect wrong in connection with the accounts? I have not the slightest doubt that the majority of this House, just as the majority of the committee were ready to do and as they are ready now to do; will, when the slightest symptom of a case of that kind appears, be as eager as hon. gentlemen opposite to ask for authority to put on oath the witnesses, to ask for authority to employ shorthand writers, and to make the inquiry just as thorough and as searching, as the hon. gentleman admits the majority were ready to do in 1891-92. I say that they are equally ready to-day. I say that when some case of that kind arises, or when it is shown by a report of the committee that a suggestion has been made that an hon. member believes that there is something wrong in the accounts, they will be ready to make a full and thorough inquiry. Then is the time to ask from the House greater powers than the committee at present possess; our powers at present being the general and ordinary powers for the inquiry which we have been invited to make. I say that the precedents quoted by the hon. gentleman are all against him. The precedents refer to special cases, to select committees appointed after debate, to charges made and charges answered either in the Senate or in this House; questions that involved examinations of a most formal character; questions that involved the credibility of witnesses, and questions of facts. But, according to the papers before us to-day, according to the report of the committee now before this House, there is not even a hint that it would be in the public interest to proceed in this formal way with the investigation. No investigation has been begun, no evidence has been sought, no documents have been produced, no one has suggested in what way or in what manner that committee is impeded now through not being able to administer the oath to such witnesses as may come before it. With reference to the Ontario practice and the practice in Quebec, I think the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mulock) will admit that his references are hardly in a satisfactory state. The reference to Quebec he admitted to be on hearsay, and his reference to the practice in Ontario was not very full or very explicit.

Mr. MULOCK. I desire to say that I stated—if I did not I will state it now—that the Treasurer of the province of Ontario informed me that, for twenty years, their invariable practice has been to examine witnesses on oath before the Public Accounts Committee.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I do not challenge that statement, but it would have been better if the hon. gentleman could refer us to some documents of the Ontario Assembly, so that we might see exactly what the practice has been, and see also whether these hon. gentlemen understood each other on the point they were discussing. I am reminded that the hon. gentleman for North York (Mr. Mulock) must be wrong in his version of the conversation, because he states that the practice has obtained in Ontario for twenty years. Now, neither the Legislature of Ontario nor any Parliament in Canada, had the authority to appoint a committee to take evidence under oath previous to 1876.

Mr. LAURIER. The Ontario Act was passed in 1872.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. What does that matter when they had not authority to pass it? At all events in this case we are dealing with a statute of our own, and no lawyer in this House on one side or the other will pretend for a moment that we can go outside of that statute with safety. I would, therefore, urge caution, and I say that in proceeding in the way in which the majority of the committee suggested, we will be taking the safe course and acting in the public interest. There is no evidence now, and I am sure that it will never be possible to give any such evidence: that the majority either in the committee or in this House desires to burk or impede a full and thorough inquiry into any public account. No case has been made out that shows any desire to prevent investigation. We are at one as to what we may refer to that committee, and we are at one as to the large scope of the inquiry of that committee. We do not differ about that. We on this side encourage the most extensive inquiry.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER;

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Hear, hear.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. We have always done so.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Hear, hear.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Yes, and we are ready to continue that practice, and we are ready to clothe the committees with all necessary authority to administer the oath as in the language of that resolution that was adopted then: "whenever it shall appear desirable or necessary."

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Hear, hear.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentleman says "hear, hear." Does he not think it is right that we should clothe the committees with all that authority and power when it appears desirable or necessary?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. No, it should be a right of the committee.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentleman voted against the resolution moved and carried in this House: "that whenever it appeared desirable or necessary we should ask Parliament for this authority." We wish to deal only with reasonable men, and we believe that is a reasonable proposition. It commended itself to the majority of the committee, and I believe it will commend itself to the majority of this House. I submit that the resolution now moved by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mulock), is a very loose way of obtaining the authority of this House if it is meant to do so; and if it is merely meant to pave the way for another resolution, the hon. gentleman has not disclosed that intention. It is an exceedingly loose way, I submit, of proceeding, if it is meant to do so under statutory authority. But I wish to move an amendment, which, I think, fairly covers the ground taken in the committee and the ground which I have gone over this afternoon. I have purposely avoided referring to the hon. gentleman's position, because I have contended all through that we do not seriously differ upon the general proposition which he has laid down. It is merely a question of procedure, as to which is the best in the public interest. I have given some reasons for deeming that it is not necessary in the public interest to proceed on the lines of the hon. gentleman's resolution, and I beg to move in amendment:

That all the words after "That" in the said motion be erased, and the following inserted in lieu thereof:—

While not considering it expedient to oblige the committees of the House to examine under oath or affirmation all persons who may be examined before the committees, the House is willing to grant to any committee the authority to examine witnesses under oath or affirmation whenever it may appear that by so doing the committee may be aided in the examination of the matters coming before the committee.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman, if I grasp the real meaning of his resolution, has somewhat receded from the position he took in the Public Accounts Committee. I congratulate him upon his conversion, partial as it is, and I am in hopes that, before this matter is thoroughly threshed out, the hon. member will see the grave injustice of the position in which he places the minority in this House. In the Public Accounts Committee, the most important committee of the House, in which the hon. gentleman's party friends have, I am told, a majority of forty—

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Not as large as the majority in this House.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I understand that the numbers of the committee are 64 to 23. At any rate, in that committee, in which the Government have a controlling majority on all occasions, no member of the minority can hope to examine any part of the Public Accounts, and have the examination conducted under oath, with all the safeguards and efficiency that the oath gives, unless by favour of the majority. But, Sir, we do not come to this House asking for favours from the majority; we are not asking to be allowed to discharge our duties as public men under favour of what our opponents may give or withhold. We claim to stand here on a parity with them, to have the right and the duty of discharging the obligations which rest upon us as members of Parliament, without asking a member of the Government or the majority of the House when or how, or under what circumstances we may do it. The question before the House divides itself into two: in the first place, have we power under the Statute to give the authority that my hon. friend from North York (Mr. Mulock) asks should be given to the committee; and, in the second place, is it politic that we should grant it, if we have the power? Let us see what took place before the committee itself, in order that we may understand the exact points of difference which we are discussing. In the committee Mr. Mulock moved:

That it is desirable that such witnesses as are to be examined by the Public Accounts Committee shall be examined on oath.

Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper moved in amendment thereto:

That whenever it shall appear desirable or necessary in the conduct of any inquiry by this committee that witnesses should be examined under oath, authority be asked from the House of Commons to have the testimony so taken.

The hon. gentleman knew that in the years

1891 and 1892 the general plenary power which my hon. friend asked for, had been conceded and granted by the House without any opposition whatever. In those years, I am bold to affirm, the hon. gentlemen did not dare, and would not have dared to take the position before the country that they are taking to-day. Public opinion outside of the House compelled them to yield to the demand which was then made, that the witnesses to be examined should be examined on oath. Revelations had been made of a state of fraud existing in our public service, before which Canadian public opinion was shocked, and a determination was evinced that an inquiry into these revelations should be prosecuted in such a way that the truth would be got at; and the way in which the House determined that it should be got at, was by an inquiry under oath. The Government then granted that inquiry; they did not dare to refuse it. The inquiry, the hon. gentleman must know, was productive of good and only good; and when he talks of formalities and novel practices and the necessity of exercising caution and prudence, I ask him, why did he not advance those arguments in 1891 and 1892, and thwart the investigations which took place in the Committee on Public Accounts and the other committees of this House? The hon. gentleman knows that he dared not do it; and, therefore, I say that, so far as precedent and practice are to have any weight in controlling the opinion of this House, the overwhelming weight is in favour of our following the practice and the precedents which were so productive of good during those fateful years. But, Sir, it was not only that particular point that was in dispute. The hon. Minister of Marine has hardly put before the House the exact position of this case. After the Government resolution had been carried and the resolution of my hon. friend from North York (Mr. Mulock) had been ruled out, and the right of the committee to examine on oath was denied, and they were told that they must ask for the privilege in special cases only, my hon. friend from Lambton (Mr. Lister) brought forward a particular case, and move a resolution, as follows:—

That this committee ask the House to authorize the committee to examine D. O'Connor and the Deputy Minister of Justice under oath on accounts of D. O'Connor.

Here were accounts involving many thousands of dollars—$140,000 altogether.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. D. O'Connor's accounts?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Out of that amount Mr. O'Connor's own account was $19,800; and my learned friend from Lambton, who certainly occupies a distinguished position at the bar, thought the matter sufficiently serious to demand openly that the gentleman to whom that large amount of money had been paid during the last year for legal services, should, together with the Deputy Minister of Justice, be examined before the committee. Why, Sir, is there a man in this country who could maintain, on any possible ground, that the demand should be refused? Why is it refused? Why should Mr. O'Connor, who received $19,000 of public money last year, refuse to answer on oath a question put to him in that committee respecting that expenditure? Does not the hon. gentleman see that he is forcing suspicion to exist where it did not exist before? Does he not see that, in the nature of things, suspicion must be excited, throughout the length and breadth of this Dominion, when the people see that, when, in the Public Accounts Committee, the application is made that the man to whom this money was paid, be called and examined under oath, a brute majority rise in their places and refuse to let this man be examined on oath? And, says the Minister of Marine, this majority is going to exercise this power and the minority is to be silenced on all occasions, unless we come forward and disclose exactly what we hope to prove. Is there any more monstrous proposition? What hope could there have been in 1890-91 of eliciting the information we did elicit, if we gave in the names of the clerks beforehand, who could prove the frauds, and if we described the frauds we intended to prove? The very men we wanted would have been absent when called for. The very books required to prove our charges would have disappeared; the very evidence wanted would have vanished into thin air. The hon. gentleman talks about subjecting witnesses before that committee to some kind of humiliation. What humiliation? If I go into a court of justice, even before a police magistrate, in the smallest case, does it make any difference to him whether I am a member of Parliament or a barrister or a labouring man? Not at all; they all walk into the witness stand, and take the same oath—the same moral obligation. No matter what position a man may occupy in society—no matter whether he be a peer of the realm, or a knight, a K.C.M.G., or whether he enjoys any other honour or distinction from Her Majesty, he does not feel that he is in any way discredited when the book is put into his hand and he takes the oath. This is ridiculous. Those civil servants and others who are to be called before the Public Accounts Committee, the public men to whom public money is paid—not one of them, who has the right and proper feeling, whose conduct is right and proper, will feel humiliated by taking the oath and being called to tell all he knows. Let us look at the legal power first. My hon. friend said that it has not been proved to him that such power exists in the law in Quebec.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentleman misunderstood me. I referred to the practice in Quebec. I said that the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) spoke merely by hearsay.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.)

Mr. MULOCK. I spoke of the statute law, and I said that I understood there was a statutory provision in the province of Quebec.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The Quebec statute reads as follows:—

Every committee of the Legislative Council or Legislative Assembly, sitting in the exercise of its functions, may examine witnesses under oath on matters relating to business then before it. And for that purpose, the chairman, or any member of the committee, may administer the oath to the witness in the following form.

There is the fullest and amplest power given. Look at Ontario, a similar statute, almost in similar words, exists there. Look at Great Britain—there they went on, as the hon. gentleman said, for many years, trying to ascertain the truth in committees without examining witnesses. But after an enormous number of years' experience, they came to the conclusion that witnesses ought to be examined under oath, and they passed a law, twenty years ago, granting to all committees, in the most general terms, the power to examine under oath. Every committee appointed by the House may examine witnesses on oath. What does that show? It shows that public opinion induced their leading public men to adopt that practice which we urge this House to adopt. Long experience convinced the public men of England that, to find out the truth, you must have the sanction of an oath when witnesses are on the stand. Let us here follow the practice prevailing in England, Ontario and Quebec, and which has prevailed in the Dominion since 1891, but which, for some occult reason or another, there seems to be a desperate determination now on the part of the Government to resist. What is the reason? The Minister of Marine (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) spoke an hour in this House and for half an hour in the Committee on Public Accounts; the Minister of Finance backed him up in the committee; the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Ouimet) came forward to support him, and the Minister of Railways (Mr. Haggart)—four Ministers, by their voices and votes, opposed the administration of the oath, the other four gave a silent vote, making eight in all, denouncing this demand of the Opposition that the practice which has prevailed for years past, under which alone the truth can be ascertained, shall be ignored and voted down. What is the law? The law gives us ample power:

Whenever any witness or witnesses is or are to be examined by any committee—“Whenever”—the broadest word you could use—on every and any occasion. No broader word could be used.

Whenever any witness or witnesses is or are to be examined by any committee of the Senate or

House of Commons, and the Senate or House of Commons shall have resolved that it is desirable that such witness or witnesses shall be examined under oath, they shall be examined under oath or affirmation.

The whole meaning of that statute is plain. A committee has no power to examine under oath until it is given that power by a resolution adopted by the House. The House is now asked to adopt that resolution and give that power, and I would like to hear some reasons, other than those already advanced, to show why not. You cannot say we have no right to assume any wrong-doing in the public service, because the disclosures of 1891-92 have for ever settled that question. The hon. gentleman knows that branches of the public service reeked with fraud and corruption; that the name of Canada was brought into disgrace at home and abroad. And, though I have no doubt whatever that this has been, to an enormous extent, rectified, I have no reason to doubt that there are large expenditures paid out by the Government under circumstances which demand the strictest investigation. And I know, from my experience as a lawyer, that it is a sham and a farce to attempt such an investigation unless you examine the witnesses under oath. I remember that, a year or two ago, in the committee, a civil servant, in answer to a question I put him, made me the laughing-stock of the committee by telling me that I had been misinformed, that there was not a word of truth in the statement contained in my question, that it was only a Grit slander. And the whole committee laughed. But the following year, when my hon. friend from Lambton (Mr. Lister) had him under oath, and put the same question to him again, he admitted that in his answer the previous year he had lied. He said: I lied to the hon. member because I was not under oath. And you want us to continue the system when you have such examples before you of the evil practice of examining without oath. I am surprised at the hon. gentleman. Why, we have in the expenditures last year on the Curran bridge, an expenditure which, prima facie, is fraudulent, because the department itself, driven by the force of public opinion, appointed a committee of inquiry to go and examine into it. Supposing that $400,000 of public money was spent in the manner which it is charged publicly this has been spent. If the Committee on Public Accounts meet and send for witnesses to Montreal and examine them, without administering an oath, is it to be believed that the men who fraudulently appropriate public money to their own use will tell the truth about the case? Why, Sir, you are bringing the whole proceedings into contempt. The Public Accounts Committee will be laughed at. No man who values his reputation will undertake to prosecute an inquiry under such circumstances. Perhaps that is the reason for all this. I dare say they may obtain their ends. I think the hon. gentlemen know that the leaders on this side will not waste a month going through the form of an examination, when the power to make that form a reality is denied them. We demand that which exists in England. We ask you to follow the English practice. Are you ashamed or afraid to do it?

Mr. DALY. No, certainly not.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) We ask you to do what the English statute says may be done by any committee. We ask you almost in the very language of the English statute to pass a resolution, which you alone can do, giving the power to the Public Accounts Committee which the English statute gives to parliamentary committees.

Mr. HAGGART. Will the hon. gentleman cite one instance of a standing committee in the British House of Commons examining a witness under oath?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman asks me to cite an instance. I have no doubt whatever that there are many instances. How can I cite an instance? I am citing to the hon. gentleman that which ought to be to him conclusive—that, after hundreds of years of practice to the contrary, the Parliament of England enacted that witnesses brought before the standing committees might be examined on oath. I do not say that necessarily they shall be, but that they may be. I think I have expressed it clearly.

Mr. HAGGART. I do not think that there is any such statute as that.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) If the hon. gentleman will kindly send to me the book which he borrowed from the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock), I will consult it again. I thought it read quite plainly this morning when I was looking into this matter. It is entitled, "An Act for enabling the House of Commons and the committees thereof to administer oaths." The sections read:

The House of Commons may administer oaths to the witnesses examined at the bar of the said House.

Any committee of the House of Commons may administer an oath to the witnesses examined before such committee.

Mr. HAGGART. The hon. gentleman surely does not think that bears out his contention.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman may be a very astute lawyer, and it may be possible that I fail to appreciate some fine distinction which is apparent to him. That language seems to me as broad, as plain, and as simple as it can be, and I do not think there can be any doubt in the mind of a layman, much less of a lawyer, as to what it means. If it does not confer upon a committee of the House of Commons power to examine any witness it likes upon oath, I fail to understand the meaning of English words. I have shown the hon. gentleman what the practice is in England, I have shown him what the practice is in Ontario and in Quebec, and I appeal to the experience of the past in this Dominion to prove whether, if we have the power, it is not politic to exercise it. The question is a plain one. This is the position taken by the Government: Before we will permit you to examine a witness before the Public Accounts Committee, you must present a prima facie case of fraud or wrong-doing. Is that fair? That prima facie case of wrong-doing must be one which satisfies the majority of the committee—a party majority. Therefore, at all times, the minority on the Public Accounts Committee are not to have the right to examine a witness under oath, but they must ask that power as a favour at the hands of their party opponents. Is it conceivable that any honest man would place a minority, whose fight in this House must necessarily be an uphill one in any case, in such a position? The duties of the Opposition should be facilitated instead of being obstructed by the Government. Is it credible that any honest man inside the House or out of it would force his opponents into such an ignominious position? We now demand as a right that which you wish to retain in your own power to grant as a favour. If you refuse, it will generate a thousand suspicions where none existed before, and you will frustrate that examination into the expenditure of public moneys which it should be the duty of the Government to facilitate instead of obstructing.

Mr. WELDON. The hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) has spoken with great warmth on a matter of very considerable interest and one which, I think, can be discussed with better effect without such warmth and with more patient and deliberate study of the law. The question before the House on the motion of the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) is that we alter the present practice with regard to putting oaths to witnesses before the committees of the House. The present practice is set forth by the statute that, where it is desirable to examine a witness on oath before a committee of the House, leave shall be first had from this House to examine such witness in that manner. Let me read again that part of the Act of 1876 passed by this Parliament, which deals with this matter. The paragraph was read by the hon. member who has just taken his seat:

Whenever any witness or witnesses is or are to be examined by any committee of the Senate or House of Commons, and the Senate or House of Commons has resolved that it is desirable that such witness or witnesses shall be examined upon oath, such witness or witnesses shall be examined upon oath or affirmation, if affirmation is allowed by law; and such oath or affirmation shall be administered by the chairman or any member of any such committee.

Let me point out here, Mr. Speaker, that there is a striking contrast between the provisions of the law of Canada enacted in 1876 and the cognate provisions of the English law enacted in 1871. I will read again, to sharpen that contrast, what has already been read to the House by the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) and the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies):

The House of Commons may administer oaths to the witnesses examined at the bar of the said House.

Any committee of the House of Commons may administer an oath to the witnesses examined before each committee.

Five years had intervened between the passage of the English Act and the passage of the Canadian Act. My hon. friend from Queen's (Mr. Davies) was not a member of this Parliament when this Act was passed, but his present leader was. So, also, was his colleague, the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills). These hon. gentlemen perhaps, can give us some light upon this discussion by saying why it was that when this question came before Parliament, this Parliament, under the leadership of Mr. Mackenzie, chose deliberately to pursue a different policy, and not to give the committees the upright and downright power of their own motion to administer the oath to witnesses, but rather chose to keep that power in the hands of this House.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) If the hon. gentleman will examine the record, he will find that this Bill was not introduced as a Government Bill, but that it was introduced by Mr. Wilmot in the Senate, and that Mr. Wilmot explained that the Bill was a verbatim copy of a Bill which had been introduced by John Hilyard Cameron many years before, and that he thought it better to follow the exact wording of the old Bill which had previously been introduced, the legality of which had been tested.

Mr. WELDON. The hon. gentleman's explanation is not satisfactory.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I can only give the explanation of Mr. Wilmot.

Mr. WELDON. Hon. members of this House must accept a degree of responsibility when it is proposed either to minimize the power of the committee or to enlarge the powers of this House and keep the control of matters within the power of the House itself. The English practice is that the committee may at its pleasure administer the oath. As the Minister of Railways has stated, it is perfectly clear that the English practice runs contrary to the frequent examination of witnesses on oath. I will read again, in support of this question, the quotation from May, at page 467:

It is not usual to take evidence on oath except in inquiries of a judicial or special character.

I take it that the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) relies more on the fairness of the committee, whatever its constitution may be, than on the fairness of this House; that is to say, he expects to get fair-play rather from the committee, divided in politics, as it may be, than from this House, divided in politics, as it may be. Now, English experience goes to show that committees have been more lax in the exercise of this power to administer oaths than the House itself. In some cases the House has gone on and instructed the committee to exercise the power which they might have exercised, but had not exercised, so that the House is more insistent in regard to the examination of witnesses on oath than the committee itself. The question was spoken to, in the main, with fairness by the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock), but it has been spoken to with singular unfairness by the hon. member for Queen's. P.E.I. (Mr. Davies). He spoke as if the vital question before the House was this: that he saw the large item of $19,000 which excited his suspicion and the suspicion of some of his fellow members on the committee, that he asked for leave to examine witnesses on oath, and got no succour and support from the committee.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I said another member did so.

Mr. WELDON. One of the hon. member's colleagues. Then why did not his colleague come to this House and say: We have our suspicions, we cannot get a fair inquiry, and we ask for the mandate of this House to order an examination on oath.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) That is what we are doing.

Mr. WELDON. No. If the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) came down from the Public Accounts Committee to this House with the statement that he could not get fair-play there, that he desired to obtain a fair investigation, and asked power to examine on oath witnesses called before that committee, whether I vote with the Government or against the Government, with hon. members on this side of the House or with hon. members on the other side of the House, if the hon. gentleman or any other hon. member came to this House and made the statement that he could not get a fair inquiry, he would have my vote and the votes of a great many others sitting on this side of the House, in favour of his proposition. His is an imaginary grievance; it is not a question of wrong, but it is one of arousing and exciting public opinion.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. WELDON. I say it deliberately. The true question is this: whether the policy of our Canadian Act is right, whether the policy of the English Act is better, or whether it is still more desirable to adopt the new and extreme policy suggested by the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock), a policy which goes far away and beyond the English policy. The question is whether the House should keep control of this matter. According to the English practice, the committee has control. The hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) favours a departure from the English Act, he favours the administration of the oath in every case of examining witnesses. If we go into the merits of this question there are grave objections to such a proceeding. It will, in my opinion, be very regrettable to adopt such a practice, and go not only beyond our own practice but also far beyond the practice of the English Parliament, as it has been shown to be.

Mr. MULOCK. Why not follow the present practice?

Mr. WELDON. What practice?

Mr. MULOCK. The practice adopted by the House in 1891 and 1892.

Mr. WELDON. In regard to that practice, for my part, speaking as a lawyer and with reserve on a matter which has been argued so little, and on one which should be argued much more carefully in this House before we come to a finding, I have had grave doubts whether under the statute we can legally act as we did in 1891 and 1892. Hon. gentlemen opposite may smile. Those were years of panic. According to my reading of the Canadian Act, we went beyond our powers when we gave an all-session permit to the Public Accounts Committee to examine on oath all witnesses that came before it. It seems to be the correct reading of the Act that Parliament has kept in its hands the power under which committees must come down to this House, name the witnesses they wish to examine on oath, and obtain permission for such examination to take place before such examination is valid. I do not think that I am bound by the precedents of 1891 and 1892. I entertain strong doubts as to whether we were within our rights when we passed those resolutions in those years of panic and excitement.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Oh.

Mr. WELDON. We are cooler and less in panic than then.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. WELDON. Hon. gentlemen may cheer as much as they like.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The panic has changed sides.

Mr. WELDON. If a committee of this House in every case are bound to examine witnesses under oath, the witnesses are not likely to fare too well as matters go at present. You may make a comparison if you please between a committee of this House and a court of justice. In a Superior Court a witness will receive a degree of protection from the judge, but he will not receive that degree of protection from a committee. The moment the chairman of the committee gave a ruling to protect a witness, that moment would be heard the blazing rhetoric of the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) denouncing the ruling as partizan and unfair, and declaring that an effort was made to burke the inquiry.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman has made a charge against me. I tell him the charge is utterly without foundation, and he knows it. The hon. gentleman has said that I accused the Chairman of Public Accounts of giving partizan rulings. The hon. gentleman knows that is an unfair charge to make.

Mr. WELDON. The hon. gentleman did not hear what I said. I said that if the motion of the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) prevailed, and if hereafter every witness coming before a committee must be examined on oath, and if a witness, who in giving similar evidence in a court of justice would receive the protection of the judge, was protected by the ruling of the chairman of the committee, no one in this House would rise with more indignant voice, to declare that partizanship had been shown, that an unfair ruling had been given and that an attempt had been made to burke the inquiry than would the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies).

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman is changing his words.

Mr. WELDON. By no means. For my own part, if this whole question came before the House, the opinion of my own mind would be to favour the middle course, not that suggested by the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock), nor that which I think is ours at the present time, nor the practice of three years ago, when the House adopted measures that were wider than the law allowed. I repeat that, in my opinion, we should adopt the middle course, and, as in England, permit the committees to exercise the power, but not under compulsion. Under these circumstances I cannot vote for the motion proposed by the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock).

Mr. LISTER. I am sure it must be very gratifying to the House to have the admission of the hon. gentleman who has just spoken that hon. gentlemen on the opposite side were in a panic in 1891.

Mr. WELDON. It were not we who were in a panic, but the country.

Mr. LISTER. The words used by the hon. gentleman were: We were in a panic in 1891. I venture to suggest that the reason why hon. gentlemen opposite refuse the power to investigate witnesses under oath is that that hon. gentleman and his friends may not again get into a panic. Let us look at this question, apart from the hair-splitting technicalities of the hon. Minister of Marine and the hon. gentleman who has just addressed the House. Let us put the question on a broader ground, upon a more comprehensive footing than these hon. gentlemen put it, and let us ask ourselves: whether the refusal to grant to this committee the power it asks is an honest refusal in the interests of getting at the truth, or whether it is done for the purpose and object of frustrating the investigation which this committee is called upon to make. The House has referred to the Public Accounts Committee, not one item, but all the public accounts of the Dominion of Canada. It has not simply referred the account of the Curran bridge, or the account of Mr. O'Connor, or any other particular account, but it has referred every account of the entire Dominion. What we ask this House to do is to authorize that committee to administer oaths to the witnesses who may be called in respect to these accounts, and the question for us, is: will the truth be better elucidated by the fact of an oath being administered, than it will by calling witnesses before that committee and examining them not under oath? It is useless for members of the Government and their supporters to say that witnesses should not be examined under oath. The facts as proved in 1891, showed that the departments of the Government had become thoroughly corrupt, and is there any man in this House to-day who will deny that the result of those investigations of 1891 was to purify the public service of Canada? Can there be any question that these investigations were beneficial in the public interests. Now, after having adopted that principle in 1891, after again confirming the practice in 1892, that power should be conferred upon that committee to make these investigations under oath, is that course less essential than it was in 1891 and 1892? I state here deliberately: that unless the House gives that committee power to administer oaths, the committee might as well dissolve, because otherwise the investigations would be the merest farce. Perhaps that is what the Minister of Marine and the hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon) would wish, but whether they do or not, I have no hesitation in affirming that the practical result of their contention is that the Public Accounts Committee would be of no value to the House or to the country.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. That is not a fair reading of the amendment.

Mr. LISTER. No; but I cannot forget the position that the hon. Minister took in the committee.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Try and forget that.

Mr. LISTER. I cannot forget the position he took on all occasions in the committee—

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Do not forget the amendment.

Mr. LISTER. I cannot forget that when the minority of the committee tried to investigate a wrong-doing, he and the majority threw every difficulty in their way. The Minister of Marine says: you must first make a charge before that committee, you may go on and examine the witnesses, not under oath, and if the evidence and testimony of the witness is not satisfactory or has a suspicious appearance, then you may apply to the House for power to examine them under oath. The hon. gentleman must know that a proceeding of that kind would involve so much time that the session of this House, were it months longer than it usually is, would not suffice to get through the examinations and investigations that may possibly take place before that committee. I hold that under a proper construction of that statute this House has power to authorize that committee to examine witnesses under oath. The contention of the Government is, that we must come to this House from time to time, that if a special case comes up (as they put it) it will be necessary to make an application to this House to receive authority to administer an oath to the witness. That means that this House, day after day, must be asked to confer power upon the committee to administer oaths to the witnesses. I contend that is not the law under the reading of the statute. I contend that the case under the consideration of the committee is an investigation into the public accounts of this country, and that this House has power by one resolution to authorize that committee to examine all the witnesses who may appear before them. It has been laid down as a fundamental principle by English writers upon constitutional law: that it is essential in the discovery of truth that a witness should be under oath. From the smallest court in this country, the magistrate's court, the small debt court, up to the highest tribunal, every witness who is called upon to give testimony is required to give it under oath. Is it to be believed that in the House of Commons, before a great committee of the House of Commons, that right is to be denied? In these little courts the witnesses are sworn, although the amount involved may be trifling, while before this committee, called upon to investigate accounts involving thousands, and tens of thousands, and hundreds of thousands of dollars, it is said by the majority that this committee shall not have power to administer an oath which the smallest court in the Dominion of Canada or the Empire has power to administer. There is no doubt that in England, up to the year 1871, it was believed, for some reason, that the House of Commons had no power to authorize its committees to administer oaths, and by referring to May's "Parliamentary Practice," page 489, it will be seen to what expedients the House resorted for the purpose of getting over that difficulty. In some instances they called justices of the peace who were members of the House to administer oaths; and they sent witnesses out to be examined before the judges. They sought to aid their inquiries by having witnesses sworn at the bar of the House of Lords and by examining witnesses under oath before joint committees of both Houses, in neither of which expedients were they supported by the Lords. It will be seen that up to 1871 the English House of Commons resorted to these expedients for the purpose of getting over the difficulty as to the examination of witnesses under oath. All this proves that witnesses were examined under oath before these committees in the years between the twelfth century and 1871. It proves that the English House of Commons, although it did not apparently possess the power to administer the oath, believed that for the elucidation of the truth it was necessary that witnesses should be sworn, and for that purpose they resorted to the expedients I have referred to. By the Confederation Act of 1867, section 18, all the powers, privileges and immunities held, enjoyed and exercised by the Parliament of Great Britain at that time were granted to the Parliament of Canada. In 1871 an Act known as the Parliamentary Oaths Act, which has been referred to by hon. gentlemen who have preceded me, was passed by the Imperial Parliament. Therefore, there can be no doubt that in 1867 the Parliament of Great Britain did not possess the power to authorize the administration of an oath, and it did not pretend to confer that power upon the Dominion Parliament. Therefore, at the time the investigations respecting the Canadian Pacific Railway were going on the Parliament of Canada was restricted to the powers which the Imperial Parliament had prior to 1867. This Parliament had not power to administer oaths to witnesses appearing before its committees, because that power did not exist in the English House until 1871. But in 1871 the Parliamentary Oaths Act was passed, which gave to the committees of the English House of Commons the power to administer oaths. That Act did not confer the same power upon Canada; but in 1871, I think, the Act was passed by the Imperial Parliament empowering this Parliament to grant the power which the English Parliament obtained in 1871. Now, the first section of the Act passed by this Parliament in 1876 reads thus:

Whenever any witness or witnesses is or are to be examined by any committee of the Senate or House of Commons, and the Senate and House of Commons shall have resolved that it is desirable that such witness or witnesses shall be examined on oath, such witness or witnesses shall be examined on oath or affirmation where affirmation is allowed by law; such oath or affirmation shall be administered by the chairman or any member of any such committee as aforesaid.

Now, Sir, by what possible rule of construction can it be held that this Parliament has not power to confer upon the Public Accounts Committee authority to examine all witnesses who may appear before it? Surely, if it has power to authorize the examination of one witness, it has power to authorize the examination of every witness who may be called before it. Then, we find in the last edition of Bourinot, page 526, that according to the writer the intention was that one resolution should cover all the cases coming before the Committee on Public Accounts, because the resolution reads thus :

That it is desirable that any witness to be examined by the committee should be examined on oath or affirmation where affirmation is allowed by law.

That is the form of the resolution as given by Bourinot, and, according to the judgment of that constitutional writer, it would appear that it was contemplated that the one resolution should cover all the witnesses who should appear before the Public Accounts Committee. It can only be argued upon the narrowest possible grounds that there is any doubt as to the right of this House to confer power upon that committee to examine witnesses under oath. The reading of the section itself irresistibly leads to the conclusion that the intention of Parliament at the time of the passing of that Act was that the committee should have that power, and now we hear that power questioned for the first time, after that construction had been applied by this Parliament. Whether the Conservative party in the House were panic-stricken or not in 1891 or in 1892, whether the statement of the hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon) is true or not, that party recognized, without question, without discussion, without argument, without objection, that that was the proper construction to put upon that section of the Act. In 1891 the motion submitted to this House was carried without opposition, and in 1892 the Chairman of the Public Accounts Committee himself reported in favour of conferring the power upon that committee to administer oaths. In the face of that, it is indeed ridiculous for hon. gentlemen opposite now to get up and say: We did not object then, we did not raise the legal question then, because, forsooth, we were panic-stricken at the developments which were taking place day after day in the Public Accounts Committee. It is all very well for the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries to get up here and say that the Government is anxious and willing to aid in the investigation of the accounts before the Public Accounts Committee. He can afford to say that here; he can afford to make it appear, so far as he can, that his object is not to burke inquiry, but that he is willing that the inquiry should take place, provided some case is submitted to the committee about which there is suspicion. Why, Mr. Speaker, how can the hon. gentleman suppose for a moment that those who are investigating the accounts know anything about them until the witnesses are examined? Their function is to investigate—to call such people as may in all probability have a knowledge of the subject before the committee, and, until those people are called, it is impossible for that committee or any member of it to have any knowledge of the facts connected with the transactions which appear in the public accounts. It is only by calling witnesses and putting them under oath and examining them that it is at all possible to ascertain whether the accounts set forth in the public accounts are accurate or not. And to say to gentlemen on this side, that before this committee will recommend the House to investigate, with power to examine under oath, you must make a charge against some particular individual, is at once to say that the members of that committee will not be able to carry out the functions and powers and duties it was intended they should discharge, when that committee was formed. Let the country understand that it will be utterly impossible for that committee to discharge its duties properly unless the power is given it to administer and examine witnesses under oath. The instance given by my hon. friend from Queen's (Mr. Davies) is only one out of many where the truth would not have been elicited had the witnesses under examination not been under the obligation of an oath to tell the truth. There can be no doubt about it, that an investigation, without the sanction of an oath, becomes a perfect farce; and I have no hesitation in saying that I would not consider that committee of any value in the public interest unless the motion now before the House, or some other, is passed giving it power to administer the oath. To argue that the largest committee in this House shall not have the power which the smallest court in Canada has, is to argue an absurdity. To argue that the highest court in the realm shall not have the power to administer the oath, because, according to the narrowest construction of the statute, some hon. gentlemen say that power is not conferred, is to my mind absurd. How wonderfully tender and solicitous these gentlemen are, lest, should we have to prosecute some witnesses for perjury, a conviction would not stand. How careful they are that not the slightest reflection should be cast on any gentleman who comes before that committee. My hon. friend is afraid it would be a reflection on Mr. O'Connor to swear him; that it would be a reflection on the Deputy Minister of Justice to swear him; and that it would be a reflection upon the officials in the different departments to swear them. Why, what he proposes to do would be a reflection on every man who has taken the oath, because he says there is a certain class in this country who are not to be sworn and every other person called before that committee is to be sworn. Can there be any fairer ground than to say that every man who goes before that committee must give his testimony under oath? Then we place every man on a footing of perfect equality. Let there be no privileged class. Whether a man be a K.C.M.G., or anything else, let all be equal before the committee. Because one gentleman may have a title of some kind, and another hold a certain position in the public service, they are entitled to no more consideration, so far as giving evidence is concerned, than the meanest inhabitant of the Dominion. Yet the first man who advances this proposition is the Minister of Marine (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper), who says, forsooth, that it would not be respectful to place certain officials of the public departments at Ottawa under oath, while it would be perfectly respectful to place other citizens of the Dominion under oath.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentleman has a remarkable imagination.

Mr. LISTER. What does the hon. gentleman say? He says: Call these witnesses, first examine them without putting them on oath, and then, if the committee thinks they are not telling the truth, let the committee ask the House to give it power to examine them under oath.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I did not say anything of the kind.

Mr. LISTER. The hon. gentleman said, moreover, that before the House can be called upon to give the power to that committee, a prima facie case must be established to show that there has been some wrong-doing.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I never said anything of the kind.

Mr. LISTER. That is the effect of it. You must show a case on suspicion; you must show suspicious circumstances. But how can we show it unless we are allowed to make proof?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I never made such a proposition.

Some hon. MEMBERS. You did.

Mr. LISTER. The hon. gentleman has taken a much milder course to-day than he took on the former occasion. His resolution is not as vigorous as it was the other day. His language is not so strong. Mr. Speaker says I must not refer to what took place in the committee, but there has been a considerable watering down since that time—a considerable weakening since the last meeting of the Public Accounts Committee. The hon. gentleman says that this committee will authorize the administration of the oath, if it sees any wrong-doing. Why, Sir, the majority in that committee is seventeen, and that majority is as blind as a bat, and only can see what the hon. Minister wishes them to see. When the hon. Minister stands up and says, Vote it down, down it goes. It is incredible that gentlemen governing this country should be found to call upon their supporters to vote down a motion which will have the effect of preventing a free investigation of the public accounts. How can they answer to the people? Will the farmers of this country catch on to your technicalities? Will they not say to you: The proper way to get at this matter is to put the witnesses under oath? One of them will say: If I have a case involving $2.50, I have to be sworn. But here is a case involving $19,000; here is the Curran bridge involving an expenditure of $300,000 or $400,000 paid for work, which, I am credibly informed, could have been done for $80,000.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. You have not reached the bridge.

Mr. LISTER. We are getting to the bridge and other public works besides.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. You are getting into a hole, I think.

Mr. LISTER. Not at all. The Minister of Public Works caused an investigation to be made into the expenditure on the Curran bridge, and the hon. gentleman must confess that the developments made in that investigation were discreditable in the extreme. There is no doubt it can be established that for work which ought to have cost $80,000, this Government has paid over $300,000, and there is considerable yet to be paid before the accounts are all settled. There are still large claims unsettled. There are other public works—there are certain matters connected with the canals of the country which demand investigation—connected with contracts let to certain contractors. There are certain matters to be investigated respecting the substitution of one set of contractors for another, and the manipulation of contracts and extras—people who tendered believing they had a certain amount of work to do, and other people who tendered knowing that amount was not to be done. And contracts transferred from one to the other. But we are told by the Minister that we must first make out a case for suspicion, and then perhaps he will courteously consent to allow us to examine witnesses under oath. We do not ask it of you as a matter of grace; we do not ask it of you as a matter of favour; but, as the hon. member for Queen's said, we ask it as a matter of right. We demand it for the proper discharge of our public duty, the duty confided to us by the people. In the discharge of our trust we are bound to demand from you every facility for the fullest investigation of the public accounts of this country. If you refuse, then I do not hesitate to say that we are relieved of the trust which we received from the people. Let the odium, the dishonour, whatever it may be, fall upon those shoulders upon which it ought to fall—the shoulders of this Government, and of the men who follow and support them in this House.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. HAGGART. Mr. Speaker, I would not have ventured to take part in a debate upon a purely legal question, but for the fact that I offered some interruptions to the speech of the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies), and questioned the soundness of some of his explanations of the statutes. I remember this question coming up in this House in 1876. I remember the debates of that time, and I remember perfectly well looking into the subject at that early day, and forming an opinion upon it. When the British North America Act of 1867 was passed by the Imperial Parliament, the power did not then exist in the British House of Commons to examine witnesses under oath. Afterwards, it was deemed advisable, that, in certain cases, witnesses before committees of this House should be examined under oath, and consequently this power, which had meantime been acquired by the British House of Commons, had to be conferred upon them. In 1871 an Act was passed by the Imperial Parliament, giving power to the House of Commons to administer the oath to witnesses who were summoned before it. In order to understand the statute that was passed in 1871, you must look into the proceedings of the committee appointed by the House for the purpose of inquiring as to the advisability of assuming this power of swearing witnesses that appeared before the House of Commons or its committees. Those who have read the history of the case, know that this was a power which existed long ago in the High Court of Parliament in England. But, as the House of Commons and the House of Lords gradually separated into two distinct bodies, the House of Commons assuming one power, and the House of Lords another, this power of administering oaths to witnesses fell into disuse in the House of Commons, and survived only in the House of Lords, whose committees continued to examine witnesses under oath when so authorized by resolution of the House. But in no case did they examine the witnesses before the committees under oath unless by distinct resolution of the House of Lords. I wish to emphasize that point particularly—that the examination of witnesses under oath by committees of the House of Commons had fallen into disuse. The examination growing out of the East and West India Bill, the examination into the state of the army and navy were carried on without this power being claimed by the House. The celebrated trial of Warren Hastings was conducted in the same way, and if ever there was a trial when one would have supposed that the House would have needed power to administer the oath, that was one. The oath was not administered by the Speaker of the House of Commons, or by any one by authority of the House of Commons or any committee of the House. The method followed generally, when it was desired to get evidence under oath, was to send the witness out to be sworn before some judge or magistrate. In 1871 an Act was passed "To enable the House of Commons, or any committee thereof, to administer oaths to witnesses." That Act reads:

Whereas it is expedient that the House of Commons and any committee thereof should have respectively the power to administer oaths to witnesses, therefore be it enacted by the Queen's Most Excellent Majesty—

And so on:

That the House of Commons may administer an oath to the witnesses examined at the bar of the said House.

Any committee of the House of Commons may administer an oath to the witnesses examined before such committee. The point on which I differed from the hon. member from Queen's was this: I contended that this did not confer the authority upon any committee of the House of Commons to examine witnesses upon oath without a distinct resolution of the House. I was pook-pooked and laughed at, and the hon. gentleman spoke in a most contemptuous style of my opinion upon this point of law and referred to the legal gentlemen around him. He said: If this does not confer upon the committees of the House the power to administer an oath, what language could confer it? I remembered perfectly well that in all the examinations before the committees of the House of Commons, including the Public Accounts Committee, the interpretation of the law for which I contended had been recognized and therefore I defied the hon. gentleman to mention one single case of a witness being examined on oath before those committees. In order to make sure whether my opinion of the enactment was correct or not, I looked into the records of the select committee upon which this Act was founded, and read the evidence given by such distinguished authorities upon parliamentary law as Sir Erskine May, and two other gentlemen who had been Speakers of the House. It was upon the report of the committee, which included the evidence of such men as these, that the Bill was founded by Mr. Gladstone. I found that the report of the committee bore out my interpretation of the law, and that committees of the House of Commons are authorized to examine witnesses upon oath only when the power is given them by the House of Commons to do so. Any one who looks at our statute of 1876 will find that it expressly states that this power shall be exercised by committees of the House of Commons when it is expressly resolved in the House of Commons that they may do so. Let me quote some of the opinions of distinguished gentlemen examined before that committee. I have here a report of the select committee appointed to inquire and report whether any further provision should be made for the examination of witnesses on oath before the House of Commons, and by whom the Witnesses House of Commons Bill was considered, and upon which they reported. I will not read the whole report, because that together with the evidence would occupy a length of time which is not perhaps at my disposal this evening, but I will read particular passages which I think refer to the Act passed in 1871. The report gives a history of the powers of the House of Commons, and states that the power of the House of Commons in regard to examining witnesses under oath had fallen into disuse, and it gives the powers of the committees to examine parties who may appear before them. It shows also the powers which were given to the several committees, and which were always taken by statute, the particular power given to examine witnesses on oath. It cites the jurisdiction of the House in controverted elections, and goes on to say :

There still remains, however, a variety of questions of the greatest moment on which the House of Commons may be called on to pronounce judgment, the consequences of which may involve property, character, privilege and personal liberty. A corporation which is said to have misused its franchises and possessions may claim to be heard by witnesses in its defence at the bar. An address to the Crown for the removal of a judge for misconduct could hardly be adopted without due inquiry, in the most solemn manner, into his guilt or innocence. Should a member of the House be accused of unworthy or dishonourable acts, the truth of the allegations must be judicially investigated, either by a select committee or a committee of the whole House. In all these, as well as in a variety of other instances, it seems natural that evidence should be taken in the most solemn manner.

Your Committee have had the advantage of learning from Mr. Speaker the opinion entertained by him of the want that now exists of the power to examine witnesses on oath, and of the expediency of seeking to obtain it by statute. In his judgment "power of examining witnesses on oath is one which the House ought to possess," and procedure by Bill would be the proper course to take for obtaining it. It does not appear to him "that any mischief could arise from the possession of that power by the House of Commons." Your Committee have so had the opportunity of examining Viscount Eversley, who declared it was to him a matter of wonder that they have never made an attempt before to pass a Bill with the object of enabling them to examine witnesses on oath.

I will now quote from Mr. May, who gave evidence before the committee, and I will subsequently quote the observations of the committee upon the Bill. Mr. May said :

I think it is quite incontestable that there are neither authority nor precedents to support any claim on the part of the House of Commons, by its own inherent rights, to administer on this at the present time ; such a power can only be given by statute.

The House of Lords had already the power to administer an oath. The committees have also power to administer an oath, and examine witnesses on oath. Notwithstanding the committees had the power to administer the oath and examine witnesses on oath, I defy hon. gentlemen opposite to cite a single case in which it has been exercised by the committees without a distinct order from the House of Lords, and I say that the Bill passed in 1891 follows the precedents of the House of Lords, and gave no more power than the House of Lords possess in the examination of witnesses under oath.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The House of Lords has always had the power.

Mr. HAGGART. Yes, it has always had the power. The House assumed the power and kept the power belonging to the old High Court of Parliament, but the power fell into disuse and never was exercised by the House of Lords. But the point I wish to make is this, that the power which was acknowledged as one vested in the old High Court of Parliament and in the House of Lords has never been exercised except by a distinct order of the House. Mr. May further said :

I assume that if it was thought fit that a statute conferring this power should be passed, the general power would be given, leaving a discretion to the House of Commons with regard to the cases to which it should be applied ; and I should say the course now adopted by the House of Lords would form a very convenient guide to this House. No committee of inquiry into matters of opinion would be empowered to administer oaths unless the House thought it a case of so judicial a character as to demand it. But I perhaps might state to the committee the cases which appear to me to be of a nature to require an oath to be administered by the House itself. The first is on complaints of breaches of privilege. An allegation is made that a certain offence has been committed against the House. It may be, as in the case of Azin Ja, a case of forgery of petitions. I will assume that there is some doubt in the matter : if the House determines that a breach of privilege has been committed on evidence and if they follow up that determination by a committal of the delinquent, I think that is a case in which if any additional authority is to be acquired an oath should be administered. Another case which I think is of much more importance is that of impeachment.

With regard to the House itself, I should leave that to the discretion of the House, on each particular occasion ; but with regard to select committees, I should advise the passing of a resolution, similar to that which the House of Lords passed in 1857, which would restrain committees from examining on oath except when expressly authorized by the House to do so.

It would be very difficult to insert every occasion on which they were to examine witnesses on oath; it would be quite sufficient to give them that power in each particular case when required.

I am quoting from the report and evidence of the committee on which the Act of 1871 was framed. This was the committee that prepared the Act in accordance with the evidence adduced before them, and I will read their conclusions:

Sir John Esmonde said: "Sir Thomas May stated that he would give a general power, by Act of Parliament, to administer oaths, either by the House itself, or by committees; as regards the House, he would leave the exercise of it to the discretion of the House, and as regards the select committees, he would advise the passing of a resolution which would regulate the administration of oaths that would be a resolution by the House. I presume after the House possessed that power, the House would by resolution, when it was necessary, direct the use of it. I imagine what you refer to must point to that.

The Right Hon. Viscount Eversley: "Then with regard to committees, is it your opinion that the House should have the power of delegating the authority to administer oaths to committees when it saw fit? A. Under certain restrictions. I think all the House of Commons should do would be to pass a bill to enable the House or its committees to examine upon oath; but I would restrict the power of the committees to examine upon oath by a standing order. The House of Lords has done something in that direction. Formerly the committees of the House of Lords examined upon oath in all cases; now they do not examine upon oath in cases where the witness is asked for an opinion, but they examine upon oath where it is necessary to bring out a fact. Private Bill Committees can examine upon oath in both Houses, but in the House of Lords a public committee has no authority to do so without a special order of the House."

Must there be a special order in each case?—Yes.

Is there any standing order of the House of Lords which defines the class of cases in which committees shall examine upon oath?—No; that is left to the discretion of the House to decide.

Mr. Bouverie:—Do I rightly understand that it is not the practice now in general committees to examine witnesses upon oath in the House of Lords?—Yes, it is not done unless the committee is specially authorized by the House; whenever there is a committee appointed upon any grave matter upon which the House thinks it right that the evidence should be taken upon oath, then at the time the committees are appointed the House gives them the power of examining witnesses upon oath, but that is an exceptional case.

That is upon motion; there is a motion made, I suppose, that the power be given, and the question was put to the House?—Yes.

The hon. gentleman speaks very flippantly in regard to this matter. He says: Oh, if the committee have not this power the persons summoned will not be guilty of perjury, the examinations before the committee will be a screaming farce, and then he appeals to the electorate outside of the House to judge on this matter. Is that a proper spirit in which to approach a matter of this kind? Is it justifiable to use such language as that when, as we see, every constitutional authority in England lays down the doctrine that even if the House has power to delegate to the committee the right to swear witnesses, that power should never be exercised until there is a reason assigned and a disclosure made to the House.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) When the British House of Commons passed the Bill after that report was presented, did they put any limitation in that Bill that the committee could only examine on oath under certain circumstances, or did they delegate a general power to the committees?

Mr. HAGGART. The hon. gentleman was not in the House when I argued that point, but I will give it again for his edification. The Bill gave no such powers to the committee that he stated, for it only enabled the Speaker, or some one else who had authority from the House, to administer the oath; the House still retaining the power to give them special authority to examine on oath in particular cases. I am speaking with a good deal of diffidence on this question in the presence of a gentleman of the legal attainments of the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies), but notwithstanding what he may think, there is not the slightest doubt in my mind as to the interpretation of the Act passed by the Imperial Legislature in reference to this question. I contend that the statute gives no general power to the committee, and May says further: That although a magistrate might have power to administer an oath, he might not have power to examine a witness on a particular case. My argument, and the argument of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davies) will be read by the legal fraternity, and perhaps they will be able to express an opinion on the question, but I am as clear as can be: that in England no power is given to a committee to examine on oath until the causes are disclosed and the order comes from the House itself. The statement was made in this House by hon. gentlemen opposite that all the witnesses before the Public Accounts Committee in England were examined on oath. I took the trouble to read the proceedings of the Public Accounts Committee of the English House of Commons from 1871 to 1893, and there is not a single case of a witness being examined on oath. Further, there is not a single case of a witness being so examined by a standing committee, except the Committee on Private Bills, to which the special power to examine on oath and to administer the oath was given by statute. In the case of select committees on special questions, the power is given direct from the House. Now, hon. gentlemen opposite, by their amendment, ask the House to give a general power to this committee to examine witnesses upon oath upon every occasion. Does the hon. gentleman put such an interpretation on the powers given by our enabling statute? That statute follows the plan which was adopted in England; that is, it requires a resolution of the House giving the reasons for granting the authority before the committee is appointed. The statute provides:

Whenever any witness or witnesses is or are to be examined by any committee of the Senate or House of Commons, and the Senate or House of Commons shall have resolved that it is desirable that such witness or witnesses shall be examined on oath, such witness or witnesses shall be examined on oath or affirmation where affirmation is allowed by law.

Will any legal gentleman in this House say that this statute can give this Parliament any powers greater than the English statute gave the Parliament of Great Britain? If it gives us greater powers than the statute of 1871 gave to the House of Commons of England, it is void and of no effect. I will ask the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) or any other legal gentleman in this House, does he think that that statute empowers this House to confer the general power upon a committee to examine witnesses upon oath after that committee is appointed? The principal argument, and perhaps the strongest one, that hon. gentlemen give in support of their position, is the proceedings of this House in 1891 and 1892. I say that those proceedings were in direct contradiction of the powers that this House possesses. This House had no such power in 1891 or 1892; but because we assumed the power is it to be said that we must always continue to assume it as if we were possessed of it? I will quote an authority to show the danger of our assuming powers which we do not possess. The following are the observations made by the committee in 1869:—

I trust, therefore, that the House of Commons, having desisted now for so great a length of time from taking any, even the most solemn, examinations on oath, it will never be proposed to recur to that measure again, as it is highly essential in this, as well as in every other part of their conduct, that the House of Commons should not appear desirous of exceeding the limits of their acknowledged authority, and of going beyond those bounds which are set to their authority by the law and constitution of the country.

That is the proper principle to follow, and I think there is no doubt that this House has not the power which the hon. gentleman, by his amendment, proposes to give to the committee. If the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Lister) says that he has a lot of charges to make against the management of the Railway Department of the Government in connection with the Curran bridge, the very statement he made here to-day that the expenditure on that work should not have exceeded $90,000 whereas, $300,000 or $400,000 was expended, would be sufficient reason for giving any committee power to examine witnesses on oath, and no House of Commons would refuse to grant such power, or, if he has anything else to charge in reference to the contracts which he talks so flippantly about, and as to which, when he comes to inquire into them, he will find nothing, or if he has any other statement of a serious character to make, the House will grant authority to the committee to examine witnesses on oath. Mr. Speaker, perhaps I have spoken on a question which I ought, not being a lawyer, to have left to the legal gentlemen in this House; but, having taken a different view of the law from that taken by the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies), I thought it was necessary to lay my view before the House.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Mr. Speaker, I have listened attentively to the speech which the hon. Minister of Railways has just addressed to the House, and I must say that my views of the proper construction of the statute of the English Parliament, as well as of the statute of our own Parliament, differs very widely from the view he has expressed. I think, Sir, that the hon. gentleman has entirely misapprehended the Imperial Act of 1871, and has undertaken to give it a construction not warranted by anything found in it. The hon. gentleman has departed very widely from a well recognized rule of the courts, namely, that where it is possible to do so we must seek for the true meaning of a statute within the statute itself; its true construction is to be found within its four corners. If there were anything ambiguous, or any doubt in the meaning of the statute, or if any portion of the language did not convey the same idea to two parties, there might be some ground for going outside of it and referring to the discussions preceding its enactment, to aid in its proper construction. But, Sir, I listened to the report which the hon. gentleman read, and what surprised me very much was the many expressions in that report which went to show that the framers of it intended that there should be no restriction placed upon the authority of the House of Commons to swear witnesses, though the House of Commons, in the exercise of its discretion, might not find it in the public interest to exercise the full measure of the authority conferred upon it in that respect. The hon. gentleman has referred to a number of the recommendations that have been made, and to many cases of inquiry, mere cases of opinion, as to which it was important that the House should be put in possession of the opinions of parties and of any information they possessed, but in which it was not necessary that witnesses should be sworn. The hon. gentleman defied any one to point out a single instance in which any one of the standing committees in the House of Commons had sworn witnesses. Well, Sir, I have not examined all the cases, but there is not one of those committees which has not the power under the provisions of this statute to so examine witnesses. There is no restriction whatever upon the authority of any one of those committees. It is a question of judgment, a question of expediency, as to how far that power shall be exercised in a particular case. The hon. gentleman also said that we could not confer upon this Legislature any greater measure of authority than the English House of Commons had conferred upon it by this Imperial statute. The hon. gentleman said that the power of the committees in England is limited, that it is only in the case of special committees, under the authority of this statute, that the power to examine witnesses upon oath can exist. Now, if that construction be correct, since we cannot have any larger power or measure of authority than they possess in England, it would be quite impossible to confer on any standing committee here the power to examine any witness upon oath. And when the hon. gentleman says that in a case such as the hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Lister) has mentioned, he would be ready to bestow the power to examine a witness upon oath, he proposes to bestow a power which he says this House cannot confer. The only way that my hon. friend from West Lambton (Mr. Lister) could have an investigation, would be by making a charge in this House against the party, and asking for a special committee, so as to bring it within the rule the hon. gentleman has mentioned. Now, the hon. gentleman has practically put himself and his colleagues out of court. That is the result of what he has stated. Then, the hon. gentleman said another thing. It is true, he says, that the statute gives to committees the power to swear witnesses, but the statute does not give the power to examine a single witness that is sworn.

Mr. HAGGART. I never said such a thing. I said, to administer the oath and examine a witness.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). He said, unless the House of Commons in England expressly confers the power upon a committee, the committee does not possess the power.

Mr. HAGGART. You entirely misunderstood me on the whole question. I said that unless the power was given by the House to investigate a particular question and instructions given to the committee to examine on oath, the committee have not the power to administer the oath and examine witnesses.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). If the House gives it the power.

Mr. HAGGART. First of all, the House gives the directions that it shall be done, and then the committee have the power of administering the oath and examining the witnesses. That is my contention.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The words of the statute are, first, that the House of Commons may administer the oath to a witness examined at the Bar of the House. The next is, "Any committee of the House of Commons may administer the oath to the witnesses examined before the said committee." Any committee can do so. Not some committee, not special committees, not standing committees—but any committee. I think the expression is broad enough to include those committees which the hon. gentleman says do not possess that power, and upon whom that power is not conferred.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell).

Mr. HAGGART. We differ in that. I do not think so.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I think the words, "any committee" are broad enough to include any committee. There are no words of limitation in the statute. Then, this statute is a remedial measure; it is intended to remove obstacles. And being a remedial measure, it must be broadly construed—construed not to defeat any object aimed at in the statute, but to accomplish everything there intended to be accomplished. If the House of Commons should, at any moment, conclude that evidence should not be taken in any other way than upon oath, the House of Commons has the power to instruct the committee to take the evidence on oath. But the committee does not derive its power from the House. Although by the law of Parliament the House has certain restraining powers on these committees, on account of their being portions of the House—and I need not detain the House by discussing these powers—the committee does not, as under the statute, derive its authority from the House. It derives its authority from the statute. There is that distinction between the Imperial statute and the statute in operation in this country. Then, let me call your attention, Sir, to another fact which has, perhaps, to some extent, misled the hon. gentleman. And that is, while it is discretionary with the committee—uninterfered with by the House of Commons—to take the evidence upon oath or otherwise, as it may think proper, yet the House of Commons has the power of directing the committee that its evidence shall be taken upon oath. And, when it gives that direction, then the discretionary power conferred by the statute upon the committee is, for the time being, in abeyance. Let me mention a case. The House of Commons, for the purpose of making a certain investigation, appointed a committee, and upon that bare appointment, nothing further being done, it would be open to the committee to swear witnesses or examine them without being sworn. But, if along with the power of appointing the committee, the House ordered that the evidence be taken by the said committee upon oath—then the committee has no discretion, but must obey the order of the House. I am referring to a case now that happened a few years after the adoption of this statute, so that the House will see that the rule in England is this, that the committee has the power to swear witnesses examined before it, just as the House has the power under the statute to swear witnesses examined at its Bar. But, in addition to that, the House may instruct the committee to take evidence upon oath; and, when such instruction is given, then the discretionary power of the committee is at an end, and it must act in obedience to the order of the House. So far, I beg to call the attention of the House to a point in which I think it is perfectly clear that the hon. gentleman was in error. Then the hon. gentleman has referred to the report in which Mr. May stated that the House ought to have a restraining power over the committee. Well, the House does exercise that restraining power in the way I have mentioned. Then the hon. gentleman said that there are certain special committees in which the witnesses are examined upon oath, but that, with regard to the standing committees of the House, they are not so examined. Well, whether you examine a witness before a committee upon oath or without being sworn, is wholly dependent upon the propriety or the expediency of your proceeding. The House of Commons in England has been governed by the experience acquired in its conduct of public business, and there they swear witnesses who appear before these committees, in cases where their experience shows that it is desirable the witness should be sworn. The hon. gentleman has referred to a great number of expedients to which the English House of Commons had recourse before it asked, by Act of Parliament, this power. The magistrates of the county of Middlesex, who were members of the House of Commons, sometimes, in their magisterial capacity, swore the witnesses of the House. But the magistrates outside did not. The judges who were occasionally appealed to for the purpose of examining the witnesses, administered the oath. The witnesses of the House of Commons were sometimes sworn at the Bar of the House of Lords; but in all these cases the House of Lords held that the proceeding was irregular, and that the oath had not any legal or binding effect upon parties sworn in this irregular manner. And so the practice of attempting to examine witnesses on oath had been abandoned a long time before this Bill was adopted. Why the Bill was adopted is shown by the report which the hon. gentleman read. And it was shown also how far they were to be examined upon oath. But, in reading the report, the hon. gentleman confounded the expediency of examining parties upon oath in certain cases with the power which the House possessed under the law, or were to possess under the law, of examining upon oath in all cases, if they were so disposed. The restriction imposed upon the House in this particular is a restriction imposed, not by the law, but by the discretion of the House. That is precisely the rule we should adopt here. When we look at our experience here, we find that it is just as necessary in certain of our standing committees to examine the witnesses upon oath as it is in England to examine upon oath before the special committees to which the hon. gentleman has referred. Take the case of 1891, of which the hon. gentleman has spoken. The hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon) said that the precedents then established were not precedents at all, that they were precedents that were established in a panic, when the House, in fact, was acting under moral coercion and were frightened into the adoption of an irregular and improper practice. But he contended that now that the excitement had passed and we were in full possession of our judgment, we should treat what was done in those two or three years as having no value whatever as precedents, and look for our precedents to the practice which prevailed at an earlier period. Why, Sir, what is the object of examining witnesses upon oath at all? Is it not because you suppose you are going to obtain from the witnesses a statement more nearly accurate than you would obtain if an oath were not administered? Is it not because experience has shown that you are likely to obtain the truth by one method which you would not be so likely to obtain if you adopted a different method? What happened in this very case during the period of panic to which the hon. member for Albert has referred? Can it be shown that what was then done had no value? Can it be shown that we adopted a foolish course in swearing witnesses? Take what was brought to light in connection with the Printing Bureau. This investigation was held before the Committee on Public Accounts. If, in that investigation, the witnesses had not been sworn, nothing would have been disclosed, and the Ministers would have remained as ignorant in regard to matters which ought to have been made known, as would members of the House. If the result sought was to arrive at truths which could not otherwise have been ascertained, does not that fact itself show the propriety of our proceeding, does it not show that what was done under these circumstances was right and proper? And how can it be otherwise than right and proper to adopt that course hereafter? But the hon. gentleman refers to committees in England. We do not look to the committees in England to learn whom we should examine and whom we should not examine. We look at the reasons which actuated them in certain cases, to see whether those reasons apply here, it does not matter whether before a permanent or a special committee; that is a matter of no consequence. You have a different constitution of society here from what you have in England; a different standard of right and wrong among certain classes of public officials. Therefore, what you can do with perfect safety in England you cannot do with perfect safety here. You are obliged to recognize facts as they are and to mould your conduct accordingly. Doing that, it appears to me perfectly clear that the course we should take here is a very different one from that which the hon. gentleman has suggested. The hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon) spoke of the construction of the statute that is in force here. The hon. gentleman spoke as if you were obliged to have a special case before the committee and special witnesses to be called before you would have any right to apply to this House for authority to examine them under oath. Why, Sir, there is nothing of the sort in the Canadian statute. What you have in the Canadian statute is the right of this House—

Whenever any witness or witnesses is or are to be examined by any other committee of the Senate or House of Commons, and the Senate or House of Commons has resolved that it is desirable that such witness or witnesses shall be examined upon oath, such witness or witnesses shall be examined upon oath or affirmation if affirmation is allowed by law; and such oath or affirmation shall be administered by the chairman or any member of any such Committee, as aforesaid.

This House is the judge. An investigation is going on, let us suppose, before the Public Accounts Committee. It is deemed desirable that witnesses should be examined upon oath, and, upon that being declared, in the words of the statute, you are entitled, if you are so disposed, to see that every witness examined before that committee is examined upon oath and renders himself liable to the law respecting perjury, if he deliberately and intentionally tells what is not the truth. This statute, as I said before, is an enabling statute, and, being such, must be liberally construed, construed so as to accomplish the end the Legislature had in view and not defeat it. Look at the inconvenience that would arise from the adoption of one view and the advantages that would follow the adoption of the other. I will read a brief extract from Mr. Wilberforce on the statutes, which shows what rule of interpretation ought to be adopted for this statute of the examination of witnesses:

In expounding remedial laws, says Lord Kenyon, C.J., it is a settled rule of construction to extend the remedy as far as the words will admit. Everything is to be done in advancement of the remedy that can be done consistently with any construction of the statute. The language of the Act is not to be strained, but, where the words are open to doubt they are to receive a construction which will advance the objects of the Act.

If these words had been open to doubt, there can be no doubt whatever of this—that the construction which says that the House may order a witness to be examined upon oath, is the construction which would best enable the House to accomplish the object it had in view. The hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries said: You may be mistaken in the view which you take; it may be you are acting outside the statute, that you have not really the powers you claim, and that these parties who are being sworn will not tell the truth, because you cannot punish them. Even supposing there were doubts—and I do not think there is any reason for doubt—about the construction of the statute, does the hon. gentleman mean to say that every witness to be examined is a profound lawyer and knows the proper construction of the statute and will not hesitate to state what is not the truth, simply because he knows beforehand the construction that a court of justice would put upon it in case he was being prosecuted for perjury? Sir, the English course is a perfectly intelligible one. The course suggested by my hon. friend from North York (Mr. Mulock), in the motion he has made, is a perfectly intelligible course. But the course which the hon. gentlemen who support the amendment propose that we shall take, is one which I am perfectly sure will lead to nothing, if this House should adopt it. What does the hon. gentleman propose to do, if the House were to adopt the amendment to the motion of the hon. member for North York? Does it confer upon the committee any power to examine witnesses upon oath? Does it withhold any power from the committee? It does nothing; it leaves everything precisely as it was before. Sir, the hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon), declared that the House was in a state of panic when it granted powers to the committee to examine witnesses on oath. If the House were in a state of panic, I think the panic was confined to hon. gentlemen opposite. The hon. gentleman, if there was a panic, must admit that some reason or cause existed for that panic. What was it that induced the Government, and the hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon), to pass without question that which they now think highly improper? The hon. gentleman's declaration simply amounts to this: we were very great sinners, we admit we were such, and when we thought public opinion called us to repentance, we acted as we thought best under the circumstances. The hon. gentleman's statement reminded me of a story told by Mark Twain of some men who were lost in the snowstorm, and who never hoped again to reach the verge of civilization. During the worst of the storm they lost their way. Then one man threw away his little whisky flask, and another his tobacco, and a third threw away a pack of cards. After the storm, they discovered they were within a few yards of an hotel. They went in, and after they had got warm the man who threw away the whisky flask went outside to hunt for it, and when he reached the spot he found there one friend looking for his cards, and another looking for his tobacco. The storm is over, said the hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon); we are not in danger any longer; our reasons for repentance are gone, and that being so, we are prepared to look at these rules, regulations and restrictions which we think would impede an investigation into the public accounts. I think the Government will find that the adoption of that rule will not only have the effect of unnecessarily prolonging the session, it will prolong the investigation before the committee, it will render the committees in some respects inefficient, and it may prevent disclosures that will be as much in the interest of the Government as the Opposition ; but, of this I am sure, there will be only one opinion formed in the public mind, that for some reason or other Ministers wish to put impediments in the way of investigation, and obstacles to an efficient inquiry into the administration of public affairs. The Government will find that they have been scarcely less hurt by the obstacles which they have created than they would have been by any exposure that might have taken place.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Mr. Speaker, I am afraid that the contribution which I shall make to this debate to-night will not add very much to the interest of the discussion, which has not only been exceedingly interesting and instructive, but which has been accompanied by more heat and passion than are satisfactory in a debate on a matter which is purely one of parliamentary practice. I attach a great deal of importance to this question in one way, and no importance to it in another. I think that as regards the settlement of a question of parliamentary practice, the question is one of great importance. It touches our relations with the outside world, and it occurs to me that in all matters in which we have to exercise our jurisdiction as regards those outside of the House, or our jurisdiction in any way affecting those outside of the House, we ought to be exceedingly cautious, and nothing can be more important than the way in which we regulate our procedure ; but that, as regards the application of any rule we shall lay down to-night, there is practically little difference between the contention on this side of the House and the practice which the other side would wish to see adopted. Let me say, Sir, if I may venture to do so—as one not claiming many years experience in this House, that the passion and heat which have been introduced into the debate are not conducive to a wise settlement of the dispute. I think that the judgment of the House is apt to be led astray by the charge on the one side that the object of the Government in resisting any particular application is guided by a desire to shirk from investigation, and that on the other side that the Opposition desire to make capital out of reluctance on the part of the Government to acquiesce in a rule which may not be considered on this side of the House to be wise, in view of parliamentary precedent and the convenience of Parliament in the future. I think I may ask the House to discuss it for the remaining moments of this debate without reference to either set of charges, and that we should consider, before we come to a vote, what after all is the sound and safe rule which we should adopt as regards our practice for the future. In endeavouring to the best of my ability to discuss it from that point of view, I purpose at the outset to state that what some of my learned friends on the opposite side of the House have put forward as being our views on this question are not our views at all. In the first place let me premise that it occurs to me that many matters which have been discussed are not necessary to be solved either by the solution offered by hon. gentlemen opposite or by the solution contended for on this side of the House ; that we can come to a safe rule of procedure without the adoption either of the interpretation for example of the English statute or perhaps of our own. I confess that as regards these questions they are somewhat obscure and somewhat difficult. I do not at all dispute, on the contrary I am inclined to agree fully with the interpretations which have been contended for by the hon. Minister of Railways, the hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon) and others who have spoken on this side as regards those statutes. But I submit to our friends opposite that we should endeavour in all matters that concern our relations with those outside of Parliament to keep safely within the limits of our authority, to endeavour to keep within rather than on the verge of the authority which English practice and English precedent seem to establish, and that all we should be jealous of, and I pledge myself to be as jealous of that as are hon. gentlemen opposite, is, that we shall assert for ourselves and for the committees of this House all powers that are necessary for a full and ample examination of all the matters which are committed to our care and to our jurisdiction. I for one in this Parliament will be content with no less, and I will accompany hon. gentlemen opposite to the very verge of the authority which seems to be vested in us by any statute, by any precedent or by any practice found in other countries, if that be necessary to the free and full exercise of our powers of investigation, and our powers of legislation here ; but provided we have those safeguards to our liberty of investigation and to our perfect thoroughness of investigation, I shall endeavour to ask the House to keep closely within the limits of the authority in so far as we are dealing with outside persons. Now, in pursuance of the remark which I offered a few moments ago as to what has not been our contention on this question, I desire to answer for a few moments the remarks of the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock), the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies), perhaps the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), and certainly the hon.

member for Lambton (Mr. Lister), because I apprehend that they have been mistaken to a very considerable extent as to what has been contended for by members of the Government, and by members of the Committee on Public Accounts, who sit upon this side of the House. I would not venture to make the contentions which some of them were endeavouring by anticipation to answer. I understand, for instance, that one hon. gentleman conceived that the contention of the Minister of Finance at some time or other—I do not know whether in committee or elsewhere—was that the Committee on Public Accounts was a mere committee of audit, for the purpose of seeing whether the expenditures which were charged had been made and whether the vouchers accorded with the items of the public accounts and of the Auditor General's Report. I do not conceive, and I do not at all claim for any friends upon this side of the House, any such construction of the powers of that committee. I agree with the interpretation of the powers of the committee which was laid down in 1891. The hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) proposed a motion then under some misapprehension, I thought, of the existing state of facts in the committee, or thinking that obstruction had been offered in the Committee on Public Accounts to a full examination of the public expenditures in so far as they might affect the conduct of a Minister of the Crown. The hon. member was under the apprehension that immunity for ministers had been contended for in the committee, and he moved a resolution in the House that it was the power and the duty of the Committee on Public Accounts to make a thorough criticism and examination of the public expenditures, notwithstanding that the conduct of a Minister of the Crown might appear to be impugned. The hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) read a passage from my speech upon that occasion, and I may say that I not only agree that the powers of the committee are not at all restricted by the fact that the conduct or integrity of a Minister of the Crown may be affected by the inquiry; but I also hold that the functions of the Public Accounts Committee are very much indeed in the line and to the extent to which they have been exercised in this Parliament. When we examine the English practice upon that question, we find that it is not only the power, but the duty, of the Committee on Public Accounts to enter into, not merely questions of audit, but questions of the good faith of the public expenditure, reasons which may be set up for the cause of the expenditure authorized by Parliament being exceeded, and so forth, within the various lines which the committees of this House have followed for some years past. In speaking to that resolution in 1891, I only made one reservation, which I will mention now, because perhaps, it may be pertinent to this discussion, and because it was passed over by my hon. friend from North York (Mr. Mulock) as irrelevant to the present question. I stated then: that while the committee were charged with the full power and the full authority to make a thorough examination of the public expenditure, yet they ought not to enter into a mere inquisitorial investigation for the purpose of conducting, what might be called for convenience, a fishing inquiry. I beg, therefore, to say that it is not the contention on the part of this side of the House that the powers of the Committee on Public Accounts and their investigations of public expenditure ought to be limited to mere audit. Another point in respect to which there was an erroneous contention on the other side of the House, and a great waste of rhetoric and force of speech, was the contention that we must in all cases have the names of the witnesses submitted whom the committee seek the authority of the House to examine. I grant all that has been said, I recognize the weight of the argument in favour of that position, but that position has not been taken up in times past in this House, and it is not one of the matters insisted on as regards the settlement of this question of practice. My hon. friends here, who have suggested that our power can only be exercised provided the names of the witnesses have been given, may be perfectly right; the question is one which I have not studied deeply enough to be confident about: but I admit, as my hon. friend from North York (Mr. Mulock) established that, that it has not been the practice of the House in times past, and, therefore, for my part, I would not be disposed to insist upon it on the present occasion, or for the future guidance of the committee. Nor would I be disposed to contend at all—and I do not think it was the contention of any one on this side of the House—that it is necessary that the committee should ask for the power before this House shall grant it. I can conceive easily a case which might be made out with regard to these very accounts of Mr. O'Connor, or with regard to any other accounts, in which the House would promptly demand, in consequence of what might have been stated in the hearing of the House, that they should be made the subject of investigation by the Committee on Public Accounts or any other committee, and therefore instantly confer upon the committee power to examine witnesses under oath. Nor would I go so far as to contend, as seemed to be supposed upon the other side of the House, that there must be a distinct charge laid in every case. Far less would I contend—in fact I am not at all willing to admit—that a prima facie case must be made out before a committee should ask, or this House should confer, the power to examine witnesses under oath. The hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Lister) spent the whole force of a very interesting speech showing how inconvenient such a practice would be;

Sir JOHN THOMPSON.

for the purpose of showing how unreasonable it would be to insist that a member desiring an investigation under oath as to certain items of public expenditure, being driven to prove a prima facie case before the power should be conferred by the House to examine witnesses under oath. The hon. member (Mr. Lister) said, with logic that can hardly be resisted, that it might be impossible for him to make out his prima facie case if he were not granted in advance the power to examine witnesses under oath. That has never been the contention on this side of the House, so far as I know, and so far as I have to speak now it is not the intention at the present moment. The contention on this side of the House is: that the power should be conferred by the House, or should be asked by the committee with regard to particular matters, and upon the statement at least of a member of the committee, or on the part of a member of the House, that for certain reasons, which he may state in the committee or in his place in the House, he deems it necessary to have an examination under oath. I understand that the ground which some members suppose we take is: That they shall make a charge of wrong doing and establish a prima facie case of fraud or wrong-doing in order to justify an examination of the accounts. I do not so consider it at all. Let me take an example, and perhaps we can best reason the case by taking an example. If, for instance, in relation to the accounts of Mr. O'Connor, the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Lister), or any other member of the committee, had said: I have reason to believe that there are overcharges in this account; or, I have reason to believe that there has not been proper supervision by the Department of Justice in the taxation of the account; or, if he had said that he had reason to believe that proper credits had not been given; or, if he had made any other such allegation with regard to an account, the committee would have asked for power to examine witnesses under oath with regard to that challenge on the part of the hon. member. If any statement like that is made in the Committee on Public Accounts or any other, if the correctness of the account is impugned by any member of the committee, I not only think that the power should be asked from this House, but I go further and say, that if the request should be refused by the committee, I as one member of the House will vote for conferring that power on the committee without the committee making the request. That is precisely the position which I contend for this evening. I see my hon. friends smile at that.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). You agree with us, that is all.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I am very glad to find that, after three or four hours' discussion, our friends opposite have come so nearly right, after all. If they had only exercised the same judgment at three o'clock this afternoon, we should have been through the debate and into business long before this. I know that my hon. friends mean, by the genial way in which they greet my observations, that I am conflicting somewhat with opinions which have been expressed elsewhere. Now, I have not had the opportunity, as they have had, of knowing what expressions have been made elsewhere, and even if I had, the rules of the House would forbid me to state what took place elsewhere. But my hon. friends must permit me to say—and the rules of the House, I am sure, permit me to say what I am told occurred elsewhere—that I am told that what occurred elsewhere is exactly in conformity with what I have said this evening. I am told—though my information is at second hand and liable to dispute—that the same opinions were expressed in the committee. But I do not dwell on that. There is no man of that committee sitting on this side of the House who has contended or will contend that it is necessary to make a prima facie case before we have the power to make an investigation which would establish a prima facie case. Let me address myself now to the question why, then, I have any objection to the passage of the resolution in its present form, and why I am disposed to support the amendment. In the first place, the resolution which is offered to the House obliges the Committee on Public Accounts to make the examination under oath. Now, I submit that that is not the English practice, and it has not been the practice of this House with regard to the Committee on Public Accounts, or any other committee of this House. Granted that it may at times be important that the largest powers should be given to a committee of the House to examine witnesses under oath, and laying aside the precedents of 1891 and 1892—which I will discuss in a moment—I ask hon. gentlemen if they can find in parliamentary history anywhere in the world the case of committees being obliged to take the examination of witnesses under oath. They cannot find one.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Yes.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. If the hon. gentleman will be good enough to mention the case that is in his mind, I think I shall be able to show him that he and I do not disagree on that point.

Mr. LISTER. Ontario and Quebec.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. No, no. My hon. friends are mistaken. They have cited statutes which confer the most general and wide powers on the committees of the legislatures of Ontario and Quebec; but is there a word in those statutes making it obligatory to examine witnesses under oath?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Does not our statute make it so?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Our statute make it so? No.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) When you grant the power, must they do so?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The hon. gentleman will see that it distinctly reserves the power to this House to grant any authority at all to examine witnesses under oath. But I am asking for a case in the world where there is a command that all witnesses shall be examined under oath.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). That is not our contention.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. My hon. friends will bear with me, and I think I shall show that if that is not their intention, it is their resolution; and, when we have come so near to an agreement as to what took place in the committee, and what ought to be the practice of this House with regard to this question, I am reminding my hon. friends that we are much nearer than they expected or than at three o'clock they supposed we were. But while I should probably be willing and ready to vote with them in their intention, one difficulty between us remains in the language of the resolution. Now, what was the argument of hon. gentlemen with regard to this question?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The words of the statute.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. There was no stronger argument, and none better pressed, or more calculated at least to leave a doubt upon one's mind, than what was said by my hon. friends opposite with regard to the wide language of the English statute. My hon. friends said, here, in dealing with this question, at the very time that power was taken first, there was a universal power conferred on the committees of the House in England just as on the House itself, to examine everybody under oath. They gather that from language which some hon. friends here thought was not susceptible to that interpretation, namely, the language which conferred on the committee power to administer an oath. But I will waive all that. I will accept for the moment, and for the sake of argument, their interpretation that that was an absolute conferring of power upon all committees of the British Parliament to examine witnesses under oath, as well as to administer the oath—because the difference is not pertinent here; and yet, if my hon. friends will look at the British practice, they will find that, possessed of the power, as the committees there may be according to their view of the British statute, that power is most sparingly exercised. I have under my hand, and I will pass it to any hon. gentleman opposite who desires to look at it, one of the latest reports of the Committee on Public Accounts of the House of Commons in England—the report for 1892—by which they will find that that committee examined some eighteen witnesses, with regard to what the committee seemed to consider improper expenditures, excessive expenditures, unauthorized expenditures; it made just as searching an investigation as our Parliament is accustomed to; and how many of these witnesses, do you suppose, were examined under oath? There is the report. There is the testimony of the eighteen witnesses. How many do you suppose were examined under oath? Not one. A select committee was appointed to examine into some other question about hospitals, and I find that nearly all the witnesses were examined under oath. Another committee, whose report is contained in the same book, examined some eight or ten witnesses with regard to a very important public inquiry, and it was a select committee too. Not one of the witnesses was examined under oath, and yet our hon. friends are so mistaken in their views of what British practice is that they ask us to adopt a resolution making it obligatory on the Committee on Public Accounts to examine all witnesses under oath, because they say that is the British practice. Thus we find that not only is it not made obligatory in the British statute but it is not followed in the British practice under the statute, which these gentlemen have argued for hours confers power to examine witnesses under oath in every case. These gentlemen have said that the statutes of Ontario and Quebec are in the same line. I repeat again that they do not make it obligatory upon the Committee on Public Accounts, or any other, to make that investigation under oath. But there is another objection which I entertain to the adoption of the resolution proposed. It is perfectly obvious that the rule which we lay down, as regards one of our committees, ought to be adopted with regard to them all. If this is a fair and proper resolution to adopt, making it obligatory to examine every witness under oath, then the Committee on Privileges and Elections ought to be under the same obligation, and so ought the Committee on Railways and Canals—

Sir JOHN THOMPSON.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Hear, hear.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON, which continually has persons appearing before it who produce plans and make assertions with regard to the fertility of some part of the country, its productiveness, the advantages of the contemplated railway, the disadvantage of the rival railway, the disadvantages under which the company stands, the unfairness to a company which has had hitherto an exceptional charter. All these proceedings, which we have from time to time in the Committee on Railways and Canals, accompanied by argument and assertion and counter-assertion, are to be wiped out by this hard and fast rule.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). No.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. This hard and fast rule, which does not exist in any Parliament in the world, which never existed in any Parliament in the world. All that is to be wiped out, and the solemn taking of testimony under oath to be established in its place. Now, my hon. friends opposite said a great deal with regard to the value of an investigation under oath. I do not wish to say one word to detract from that value. I grant that in 1891, when the power was most freely given, the investigations which took place under oath were conductive of public good. I do not admit, as the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) supposed the hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon) to state, that that power was conferred in consequence of any state of panic on the part of this House. The hon. member misapprehended the remark of my hon. friend from Albert (Mr. Weldon), which was that the public mind was in a state of panic as to scandals. But let me call attention to a fact which is quite immaterial, I grant, to the argument, but which may be instructive in examining into the question of what is meant by speaking of the state of the public mind at that time. Let me call attention to the fact that some investigations had been commenced by the Committee of Public Accounts, and a state of affairs revealed as to the condition of some of the departments, which made it perfectly obvious to the House that it was advisable to grant the committee the fullest powers in conducting the investigations. But I do not want to put the precedent alone on the ground that the committee had commenced an investigation, which we saw was leading to results that were necessary to be brought to the attention of the House and the public. Much less do I put it on the ground of the feeling of alarm in the House and in the public mind. If I were to refine on questions of that kind I would fritter away the time of the House by contending that because this or that state of feeling does not exist in this House or the country, therefore we should change our Parliamentary practice with regard to investigations of that kind. I admit that in 1891 this House adopted a resolution similar to that proposed by the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) this evening. We come now to the precedent of 1892, and we find that the House did not adopt the practice then. In 1891 the House, as I say, adopted a resolution, which amounted to an instruction to the committee that the evidence of all witnesses should be taken under oath. In 1892, if my memory serves me—and I think it is pretty accurate on this point—we simply conferred general power on the committee to examine the witnesses under oath where the committee might think it necessary.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Does the hon. gentleman think he is correct in saying we put that qualification in?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. If the hon. gentleman will correct me, I am quite willing to be corrected, as I am only speaking from memory. At any rate, I am sure that I am correct in this, that what we did in 1892 was to confer the power, as contrasted with the language of 1891, which created an obligation. My contention with regard to the action of 1891 is this: that that resolution was speedily adopted without the attention of the House being called to the question of procedure at all. The House, seeing that that inquiry was likely to result in public benefit, did not hesitate at all as to the terms upon which the power should be granted to the committee. But we come now to 1894, and the question is whether we shall follow the precedent of 1891—and I grant that it is a precedent—whether we shall practically solidify that into the practice of this Parliament, or whether we shall fall back upon what, after all, seems to be the sounder and wiser practice pursued by this Parliament at all times before this—pursued, I think, in the Provincial Parliaments before this one came into being—and which seems to be adopted in other countries, namely, the practice of granting power to a committee to examine witnesses under oath, without being too nice in the granting of that power, provided it be evident that the committee is not going on a fishing excursion, but is engaged in some practical inquiry, in relation to which some members of the committee, for reasons he states, feels that investigation under oath is necessary. Not by any means that he need make any charge of fraud or wrong or the assertion or proof of prima facie fraud, but that he will assert that on account of the extent of the claim under investigation, or on account of its extent as compared with the vote out of which it is taken, or as compared with other accounts of the same kind, or for any other reason which the ingenuity of the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Lister), I am sure, is at any time sufficient to supply, an inquiry under oath should be had. But some reason should be given—I care not to be too nice—why the account of Mr. O'Connor shall be subject to the examination of witnesses under oath, and then the House shall, at the request of the committee or without it—if the committee decline to make the request—give that committee power to examine witnesses under oath in relation to that matter. Let me take another illustration, the case of the Curran bridge, which was referred to this afternoon. The hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Lister) referred to it as a case, in respect of which it would be folly for him to make a public charge, to name the witnesses, to be required to state what he could prove with regard to it. Sir, in the interpretation which is put upon the power of this Parliament and upon the British practice and upon all the precedents we have to guide us in relation to that matter, it would be amply sufficient for the hon. member or for any hon. member to say that the expenditure had far exceeded the estimates of cost of the work, far exceeded the proper cost of the undertaking, and that other claims were outstanding. For my part, whether in the committee, or in the House, I would not hesitate upon such a statement of fact—without calling upon him to state what he could prove—to give power to examine all witnesses upon oath. I state that as illustrating the extent to which I at least would be disposed to go. Hon. gentlemen opposite take a peculiar position, and speak of it with great emphasis, that they are exercising rights, and not asking favours of the majority. Mr. Speaker, I do not consider for a moment that they should be in the position of asking any favours in order to carry on an investigation of this kind. They need ask no favours. When they state anything which calls for inquiry, and for the examination of witnesses, it is the right of the committee to call upon the House for power to examine witnesses under oath. When anything is ascertained which makes it appear that witnesses are required to attend and be examined, though it is not the English practice to administer an oath except in very rare cases, I grant, at least, that it is our duty to confer that power upon the committee at once. But there is a great difference between conferring upon the committee the power of sending for papers and for persons and of swearing witnesses, and the command which is given by this resolution that they shall examine all such persons under oath. In order to illustrate the difference between this command and the conferring of power to examine under oath, let me refer again to the report of the Committee on Public Accounts in England of 1892. The evidence of eighteen witnesses is presented, but the committee did not think it necessary, in order to arrive at the truth and the facts as to what was being done in regard to public expenditure, to swear any one of these witnesses, because they got the information they desired without it. But our hon. friends opposite think that human nature is so much more debased in Canada than it is in Great Britain, or elsewhere, that they cannot trust a witness to come before them to produce a document without putting him under oath to tell the truth. Many witnesses are brought before the committee only for the production of vouchers; or, it may be that the charge of the matter upon which he is called to testify is in some other department; still, it will be necessary to swear him. But when they have witnesses to call in relation to any matter in which it is necessary to examine formally under oath, let them ask for power in the first instance, and they shall receive it, if my vote or my influence can give it to them. Now, Sir, with regard to their being put in the position of asking favours from the majority, let me call the attention of the House to the fact that this is not the position of affairs at all; but rather they are seeking to impose their will upon the majority of the committee.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). In which you acquiesce.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. In which I do not acquiesce at all under present circumstances. They report a case in which the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Lister) has simply said, with regard to the accounts of Mr. D. O'Connor: "I move that so and so be examined under oath by this committee." He does not state what the nature of the examination is to be, what reason he has for desiring the investigation into those accounts; but hon. gentlemen seek to impose upon the majority of the committee the rule that, whatever these witnesses may say or whatever they may not be able to say, they shall say nothing unless first sworn.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman has been misinformed.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. If so, I have been misinformed by the report of the committee which is under consideration, which we have been debating all this afternoon, and which gives this as the state of facts with regard to the refusal to examine these witnesses under oath. I say that, nothing being cited, or charged, or alleged, as to the reason for scrutinizing these accounts of Mr. O'Connor—as respects which I am perfectly willing the fullest inquiry should take place—let us pursue the British practice. Let us have the witnesses called; see whether the majority of the committee are of the opinion that the oath should be administered; and, if it is the desire of the minority, on account of any statement they may make, or anybody else may make to have the investigation under oath, let them ask the power to swear, not as a favour, but as asserting a right under the practice which has prevailed heretofore in this Parliament and the Parliament of Great Britain, and then I am sure the House will not be reluctant to grant them that power. But, as I said before, to adopt this resolution is to go beyond what the hon. gentleman asked from the committee. The hon. member for Lambton asked in the committee that two gentlemen whom he named—Mr. O'Connor and another—should be summoned on a certain day and examined under oath. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) thinks I am mistaken. The report says:

Mr. Lister moved, that this committee ask the House to authorize the committee to examine D. O'Connor and the Deputy Minister of Justice under oath on accounts of D. O'Connor.

The House will see that my hon. friend from Lambton proposed, without giving a reason, without a word of explanation, that he and his friends who voted in the minority should be in a position to impose the will of the minority upon the committee, and to put the majority in the position of asking favours from the minority. And that is precisely what I object to here. Now, though I may be going back to a subject I addressed myself to before, I do not think it has been shown, nor is it contended here, that there is any necessity with regard to many of these matters of expenditure for examining witnesses under oath. As proving the utility of examining under oath we were referred to the case in 1891, when one of the witnesses declared that he had not told the truth on a previous investigation because the conduct of the inquiry was not under oath. But my hon. friend opposite will not suppose for a single moment that the House would have hesitated to confer powers to examine under oath, witnesses who appeared in relation to that matter, even before the witness in question had stated that his evidence on a former occasion had been untrue. The hon. gentleman will not suppose that the power to examine under oath would not have been granted by the House on the mere suspicion of wrong-doing, which was subsequently proved in regard to that case. Now, Sir, I have stated to the House as clearly as I am able, the reason why I dissent from the resolution which has been moved by the hon. member for North York: it asks us to lay down a practice which is new in this House, except as regards the precedent of 1891. We are to consider now whether that precedent of 1891—differing as we must all on both sides admit it did from the practice which prevailed before and which exists in English practice—shall be the law of Parliament for all time to come; because after this exhaustive debate no one can contend that the subject was not well considered and discussed;—whether we shall make that the invariable rule of Parliament for the future, or fall in with the practice, which is followed in England, as any one of the volumes of the reports of the committees of the House of Commons show, of allowing any committee which pleases to examine witnesses without oath, but giving them the power to examine under oath whenever there appears to the committee or to the House to be occasion for an examination under oath;—whether that shall be our practice, the practice we have pursued hitherto, or whether we shall start out merely under the precedent of 1891, which was established without discussion, without consideration, without the attention of Parliament being called to it, and whether, in opposition to all parliamentary practice elsewhere, we shall adopt that practice. And if we adopt that rule we are logically bound to apply the same practice to every other committee. The discussion will not end here. The moment a question dividing party arises relating to any other committee of the House, in the Railway and Canals Committee, when we have before it a Bill on which the House is divided, in the Committee of Privileges and Elections, we will have this question as fresh and vigorous as it is to-night, and a resolution will be proposed that every witness appearing before that committee shall be examined on oath; and we will not only be departing from the practice which has hitherto prevailed in Great Britain, but, as I have said, we shall be departing from the parliamentary procedure of every country in the world where parliamentary institutions exist. On the other hand, those who support this amendment lay down the rule and the principle that this House will readily grant the powers which are sought by hon. gentlemen opposite when, for the full and efficient discharge of the duties of the committee, it may appear that the exercise of those powers would aid the committee in the duties which had been assigned to them by this House. For these reasons, Mr. Speaker, and with this explanation of what I consider the limitations of our rule ought to be, or the imposition of any restrictions on the examination of witnesses under oath, I venture to think after all that the safe and sound rule will be that laid down in the amendment, that it will not, if I am right in stating the limits within which it would operate, suppress any right or power of the committee for public benefit, it will prevent confusion and introduce order, and it will keep us within the safe limits of the power which the practice and the law of Parliament have conferred upon us.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I congratulate the Minister of Justice on having taken an infinitely more rational and sensible view of the matter than any of the hon. gentlemen who preceded him. That might have been expected from the circumstances that in his time the hon. gentleman has been a judge of the land, and must know as well as we do how thoroughly right my hon. friends have been from first to last on every point of their contention. I am not going to argue this matter on a question of legal technicalities, but I have been a member of the Public Accounts Committee for thirty years, and so I have had at least as much experience on that committee, as any member of this House on either side, and I will therefore point out to the House and to the Minister of Justice, certain reasons, based on considerations of public policy, which lead me to believe that the demand that has been preferred from this side of the House forms the only safe and wise guide for the deliberations of the Committee of Public Accounts. The First Minister declared at the commencement of his speech that there was practically no difference, or at all events, a very slight difference indeed, between what he desired to do, between what he understood to be the functions of the Committee of Public Accounts, and what we on this side desire to do and what we understand to be the proper functions of that committee. I can assure the hon. gentleman that there is, as he truly said, but a slight difference between his view and our view, but there was a world wide difference between the hon. gentleman himself and several members of his Cabinet as to the construction thereof. In this case the wisdom did not lie with the majority. The hon. gentleman, however, referred to the question of precedent. He declared there was but one precedent for the position taken by my hon. friends, and that was the precedent established in 1891. I will read the motion of Mr. Wallace, Chairman of the Public Accounts, in 1892 :

The committee recommend that whenever any witness or witnesses coming before them is or are to be examined, it is desirable that such witness or witnesses shall be examined on oath.

Will the hon. gentleman compare that motion with the motion moved by the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock), and will the First Minister tell me what is the substantial difference between them? My hon. friend has moved as follows :

It is desirable that such witnesses as are to be examined by the Public Accounts Committee shall be examined on oath.

Will the hon. gentleman, whose mind is a subtle one, point out the distinction between the motion moved by Mr. Wallace and the present motion submitted by the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) ?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I grant the words are the same, and therefore there are two precedents instead of one. The only distinction appears to be that the resolution in 1892 was passed after charges were made. But I was mistaken in supposing that the language of the resolution of 1892 was as strong as it is.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. To a very great extent I agree with the First Minister, and I have no doubt that the conclusions which he laid down, and which I will now repeat, are substantially the conclusions for which we have contended and for which we are contending. The hon. gentleman stated, and I repeat his own words, and he will correct me if I misunderstood him, that he for his part did not intend to declare that any distinct charge should be preferred; that he for his part did not intend to declare that a prima facie case should be made out; that it was sufficient in his judgment that if any member of the committee in his place declared that he thought for certain reasons the witnesses he proposed to call with respect to certain inquiries should be examined on oath, that the First Minister not only would recommend the granting of the right or privilege of examination under oath, but he would be the first, if the committee refused the request, to insist on the matter being brought before the House. That is what I understood the hon. gentleman to state.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. For any reasonable reason or cause.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. With respect to the term reasonable reasons, the First Minister proceeded to explain his meaning.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. In the most liberal sense of the word.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I will go much further. I conceive that on the strongest possible grounds of public policy an hon. member, being a member of that committee—I do not even go the length the First Minister does of including any member of this House, because a member of the House, not being a member of the committee has his own remedy—rising in his place and declaring that he has what he believes to be good and sufficient reasons for desiring that the witnesses in connection with this particular inquiry should be examined under oath, should be permitted to examine witnesses on oath. I think that is a fair and proper construction to place on the duties and functions of the committee. The hon. gentleman proceeded to explain, and he gave a most liberal construction, and no doubt he was correct in saying that a man much less ingenious than the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Lister) would be able to offer bushels of good and sufficient reasons for having the witnesses connected with any particular inquiry examined under oath. But the hon. gentleman took the objection, and it was the only objection taken by him that this resolution on the part of the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) obliges the committee in all cases to examine witnesses on oath. That is a legal question that I am not going to argue now. Do I understand the hon. First Minister also to say: that it is his interpretation of the statute that we have it in our power to confer a discretionary power of examination under oath.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I do.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Under our statute.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I do.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That is a legal point on which I refer him to his legal conferees and my legal conferees, and I merely want to understand what he does contend for. As I am advised, I believe that our statute would render it imperative, if the House conferred the power at all that the committee should exercise it in all cases. However, that is a purely legal point. But, Sir, there are other circumstances and circumstances of weight, which ought, I think, to influence this House to follow the precedents of 1891 and 1892, and to follow them more particularly and especially with respect to the Committee on Public Accounts; I am not concerned with the question as to whether it is or is not advisable to extend that system to all our committees. As I understand it, most of the witnesses in the cases to which the First Minister has alluded, are called on to give expressions of opinion, which the committee are abundantly able to discount, but in the case of the Committee on Public Accounts we always examine these gentlemen, not as to questions of opinion, but as to matters of fact; that I think is a very material distinction and a very good reason why we should insist on these persons being examined under oath. Sir, there are other reasons. This committee is a committee of investigation, and of investigation into what? It is a committee of investigation into the fashion in which the affairs of the departments of Government, presided over by the gentlemen occupying the Treasury benches, have expended large sums of money. Who are the parties whom this committee is likely to examine with respect to these questions? They are mainly and first of all the officers of the department. Now, every hon. gentleman must see, every man who has held office must know of his own experience, that it is rather a hard thing to call upon officers of a department to give evidence against the administration of that department, with their chief sitting opposite to them in the committee. It is asking too much of human nature—without in the least degree imputing any impropriety to ordinary average members of the Civil Service—it is asking too much of human nature to ask an official with his chiefs confronting him, to state all that he knows and to state it exactly in the way he would state it under oath; unless he knows that what he is about to say will be put on record and will be under the sanctity of an oath. We have had abundant experience time and again as to the imperative necessity, when you are examining officers with their chiefs confronting them, of requiring these gentlemen to make statements safeguarded by an oath and further safeguarded by being put on record. In every examination having reference to the conduct of a particular department, there is no surety whatever of getting at the truth, the whole truth and nothing but the truth, unless you have every word taken down and every word under oath. The common sense of that view of the case will commend itself not merely to the First Minister, who, I do not doubt, appreciates it, but to every member of this House on either side, who knows any thing of public affairs, and it will most assuredly commend itself to the country at large with the experience of the revelations of 1891 and 1892, to guide them. It is perfectly true that this practice is to some extent a new practice. It is perfectly true that there is nothing in England in the slightest degree analogous to our Committee on Public Accounts. These two statements are perfectly correct, and if the hon. Minister had been able to produce from the English Committee of Public Accounts one case in which a member of that committee had asked that witnesses be sworn and the other members of the committee had refused to have them sworn, then, Sir, there would have been something to say for the precedents he gave. But there was not the slightest indication as far as I could learn from his statement, that the question had been raised or that any dispute had occurred, and I know enough of the practice of the English House of Commons to feel assured that if any member of the English Public Accounts Committee—had he been single and alone, on the floor of that committee—demanded that these eighteen witnesses be examined, it would have been done as a matter of course, and without any human being dreaming of opposing such demand. As I have said, all this is comparatively new. When first I had the honour of a seat in the Committee of Public Accounts our work to a very large extent was of a character which has been taken off our shoulders by the appointment of the Auditor General. Up to 1873 we had no Auditor General; that office was created, I think, in the very last year of my friend, Mr. Mackenzie's Administration. So long as there was no Auditor General, so long in practice, we were to some extent a committee of audit. But with the creation of the Auditor General that function to an enormous extent was removed from the shoulders of the committee, and its real business and function merged purely into that of a committee of investigation and inquiry. I want to show the hon. the First Minister the practical difficulties which would attend the following up of such a course as the committee have recently adopted. He knows perfectly well that this committee is one which it is not convenient to call together very often. We have now been five weeks in session, and we have not yet examined a single witness, although it is perfectly well known to members on both sides of the House that there are very important subjects of inquiry awaiting us with respect to which many witnesses must be examined. As a rule the committee is hardly called together more than once a week; it is with very great difficulty indeed that we have succeeded ever in getting it called together twice a week. I may possibly be permitted to suggest that no great desire appeared to be shown by that committee, when I myself pointed out the great inconvenience likely to arise from demanding on each separate occasion power to examine witnesses under oath; no great alacrity, I say, seems to have been shown in calling the committee together more than once a week. Hon. gentlemen opposite do not know, and we do not know how many weeks it may be our fate to spend here, but even if we stayed here until the dog days, at the average rate of proceeding we would not be able to have more than seventeen or eighteen meetings, and it is very doubtful if we would succeed in getting this number. Under these circumstances if, whenever an hon. gentleman wants to prosecute an inquiry he is obliged to go through the formalities of obtaining the leave of the committee—or of being refused by the committee, as was the case of my hon. friend—is then obliged to go to the House in order to obtain leave to have these witnesses examined. the inconvenience would be very great indeed; very great to us, very great to the witnesses, and very great to the Government themselves. I can assure the First Minister that it will tend to prolong this session beyond all due bounds, a thing that I do not want—a thing I am perfectly certain the Government do not want, either—if it can possibly be avoided. Unless this committee were prepared to sit 'de die in diem' on every day which the House sat, there would be very great difficulty indeed in carrying on the examination of witnesses with any degree of reasonable speed under the conditions that now exist. I am free to say, speaking with some knowledge of the subject, that I, for my part, have long felt that this committee was far too large. I believe that its work would be much better done if there were a much smaller number of gentlemen attached to it, and if it sat a great deal oftener than it does, and particularly when we have witnesses brought before us to examine. if the examination of these witnesses was continued, as it ought to be continued, from day to day. It is the most intolerable waste of time to bring witnesses here, let us say on Tuesday, and adjourn their examination to the next Friday, or more likely the next Tuesday. It is quite impossible to conduct any ordinary investigation to any reasonable termination under such circumstances as these. However, that is by the way. I am not at the present moment doing more than throwing out a suggestion in that direction. But what I do say—wholly and entirely apart from the legal question—is that, as a question of policy of the very broadest kind, it is in the highest degree in the interest of the country, and, I believe, in the interest of the Government themselves, that no objection should be raised to the examination of witnesses under oath in this committee. The country has not forgot, it is utterly impossible that the country can forget, what occurred in 1891 and 1892. It is utterly impossible that it can forget the proofs which were laid before this House that a very large number of the officials of the Government, including among them some men very near, indeed, to the Ministers of their respective departments, had been guilty of the grossest irregularities—had been guilty of peculation and downright fraud. And it is perfectly well known to every man who sat on that committee, as it is to every man who ever took the trouble to look at the evidence, that there would not have been the ghost of a chance of getting at the information which was then laid before the country, unless those men had been subjected to a cross-examination under oath. That is a matter that goes without saying. Under these circumstances, and bearing in mind that this is strictly a committee of investigation, it does appear to me that if we are going to make this committee a committee of any value, or use to the country, it is the merest idle formality to insist upon our going from pillar to post—first applying to the committee and then applying to the House, and wasting precious days in the attempt to get a power which, I think, our precedents and the natural common sense of the Government should give to this committee from the day it opens its sessions. Why, Sir, as has been said again and again, is any petty case involving $5, tried in any court in this country, in which the witnesses are not examined under oath? And are we to be told that a Select Committee of this House, which the law allows the House to empower to examine under oath, should not surround its proceedings with the same dignity and formality which are attached even to an examination made by a police magistrate? The thing is monstrous; and, although I am very glad to find that the First Minister has receded from the most untenable positions taken by his coadjutors—which his legal knowledge showed him at once was indefensible—although I congratulate him on having administered to them a well-deserved reprimand, still, I submit that there are strong grounds in the public interest why no objection should be taken to the power we ask for, that every witness put before this committee should be examined on oath if any member of that committee so desires. That is all we ask, and, as the hon. First Minister interprets the matter, there is certainly very little difference indeed between him and us.

FRENCH TREATY.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT asked, Under the proposed French Treaty what is the estimated loss of revenue—(a.) Upon wine? (b.) Upon dried fruit? (c.) Upon soaps? (d.) What is the total estimated loss on all articles admitted under it?

Mr. WALLACE. The total amount of duties collected upon the articles imported from France mentioned in the treaty during the past year was $172,457.48. Under the proposed French Treaty, the loss to the revenue on these importations is estimated at $86,732.62.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Is that on wine?

Mr. WALLACE. On the whole importations:

|-------------------------------|-------------|
| Wines, not sparkling..... | $35,942 40 |
| Sparkling wines..... | 41,313 30 |
| Almonds..... | 1,823 27 |
| Nuts, other than almonds..... | 4,966 91 |
| Plums and prunes..... | 118 16 |
| Soap, common..... | 2 25 |
| Soap, castile..... | 2,566 06 |

Total.....$86,732 62

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I asked what is the estimated loss on all articles?

Mr. WALLACE. This is on the articles included in the treaty. They are the articles named in the French Treaty which are imported from France. We could not make an estimate of the loss to the revenue on the articles, under the similar classification, now imported from other countries.

BROAD COVE AND ORANGEDALE RAILWAY.

Mr. FORBES (for Mr. Fraser) asked, 1. What is the total length of the proposed Broad Cove and Orangedale Railway? 2. What amount has the Government promised to give the said road per mile? 3. Do the Government propose to add to the amount promised?

Mr. HAGGART. The length of the road from Broad Cove to the Orangedale station, on the Intercolonial Railway, is 35 miles. The amount of subsidy granted by Parliament is $3,200 per mile for 25 miles. There being no application before the Government, the matter of additional subsidy has not been considered.

PIERRE FERLAND.

Mr. McMULLEN asked, When was Pierre Furlow appointed stove culler at Quebec? What is his salary, and what is the amount of fees collected for his services as culler since he was appointed?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). Pierre Ferland—not Pierre Furlow—was on 31st May, 1890, on the death of Joseph Frederick, a stove culler, reappointed from the retired list as successor to Mr. Frederick. His salary is $700 per annum. The fees collected by Pierre Ferland, from 1st July, 1890, to 31st March, 1894, amounted to $122.13.

E. DUGGAN.

Mr. McMULLEN asked, Why was E. Duggan, of the Cullers' Office, Quebec, superannuated at the age of forty years? Has any new appointment to the Cullers' Office at Quebec or Montreal been made since his superannuation?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). Mr. E. Duggan, of the Cullers' Office, Quebec, was retired dating from 1st July, 1889, along with seventeen others whose services were no longer required, with a view to better economy in the administration of the Acts respecting the culling and measuring of timber as authorized by section 32 of chapter 103 of the Revised Statutes as amended by the Act 52 Vic., chapter 18. No new appointments have been made since Mr. Duggan's superannuation, but two of the retired cullers were reappointed to replace deceased cullers.

EDOUARD PAUL HUS.

Mr. BRUNEAU asked, How many years has Edouard Paul Hus, of Ste. Anne de Sorel, been employed by the Government as lighthouse-keeper? Have complaints been laid against him, and if so, when and on what grounds? Is it the intention of the Government to inquire into the said complaints?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. That officer was appointed in 1871. No complaints have been laid against him, but a departmental inquiry is going on as to whether he has been farming out his light.

CLEANING OF RICE.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT (for Mr. O'Brien) asked, How many mills in the Dominion of Canada, as shown by the last census, are engaged in the cleaning of rice, and how many persons are employed in them?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Two mills, and seventy-five persons.

Mr. HAGGART.

MANITOBA SCHOOL QUESTION.

Mr. GUAY (for Mr. Tarte) asked, Is it the intention of the Government to advise that communication be made to the Lieutenant-Governor of Manitoba and to his responsible advisers urgently requesting that the complaints set forth by the Roman Catholics of that province before the Dominion Government in their petitions since 1890, be carefully inquired into, and that the whole subject be reviewed by the Government and the Legislative Assembly of that province in order that redress be given by such laws or amendments as may be found necessary to meet the just grievances and complaints of the said Roman Catholics?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It is the intention of the Government to make representations to the Government of Manitoba in the direction stated in the question with regard to some of the petitions which have been presented since 1890.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and the House adjourned at 11.45 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, 20th April, 1894.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND MAILS.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Mr. Speaker, before passing to the Orders of the Day, I beg to call the attention of the Government, with a view to obtaining some information on the subject, to the lamentable failure of the arrangements this spring for the transmission of the mails to and from Prince Edward Island. I would like to have some official statement from the Prime Minister or the Postmaster General or some authority as to whether there is anybody in Prince Edward Island authorized, in case the mails are detained—as they were recently for a period of ten days—to take the matter in hand and employ steam tugs or take other necessary means in order to get the mails over. A short time ago the steamer 'Stanley' was caught in the ice and was detained there for a period of ten days. Common sense would dictate that, in such cases, the postmaster at Charlottetown should at once employ boats to carry the mails across by Cape Traverse. But, as a matter of fact, nothing was done. Passengers were assembled at Pictou and a large number at the Cape, but no means of communication were provided, and the postmaster of Charlottetown seemed to be under the impression that he had no authority to do anything. Some person, the general agent of the Marine Department, or the postmaster at Charlottetown or some other person, should have authority in such cases to take the matter into his own hands and incur the trivial expense necessary to carry these mails backwards and forwards. I cannot tell the hon. gentleman the terrible inconvenience and loss which occurs to the commercial community from a delay such as this. Nothing was done until, at last, eight or ten commercial travellers got together and hired a tug and thus opened communication, though the postmaster at Charlottetown telegraphed to Ottawa for authority, evidently believing that he had no authority to act. This is a state of things that should not exist. The postmaster, or somebody else, should have authority to act without telegraphing here. I want to know officially from the Government if the responsibility rests with the postmaster at Charlottetown or with whom it does rest? Is there any officer who has ample authority in such cases to hire the necessary conveyances to carry the mails across by some other way? If we find that any such officer has authority, public opinion will see to it that he acts upon that authority.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I already told the hon. gentleman that when the department were informed that the ferry could not continue carrying the mails as it had been doing, instructions were given to employ a tug, and I am under the impression—I will not be sure—the postmaster of the Island took upon himself the responsibility, and very properly so, of sending a tug. When the matter was referred to me to sanction the action taken by the postmaster, I, of course, immediately agreed to what had been done. In a case of that kind, I take it that the postmaster would have full authority to take steps to meet the emergency, and prevent such inconvenience to the public, referring the matter afterwards to the department for approval.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I would like to add a word to what the Postmaster General has said, because, to some extent, my department is concerned. I would like to point out that, during the winter, the duty of carrying the mails devolves upon the Department of Marine. The hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies, P.E.I.), who has brought the subject up, will easily understand that the occasion to which he refers was one which could hardly have been foreseen or arranged for in advance. So far as my experience goes, there never was anything like it. We have the steamer 'Stanley,' and we have also the ice-boat service, the open-boat service; and, when the ice steamer is delayed or there is such weather that she cannot be expected to carry the mails across, the service has been opened by the capes, and the open boats have kept up the connection. Hitherto there has been no necessity for employing a tug or making any other special arrangements, because the system I speak of has worked, sometimes with inconvenience, but, on the whole, tolerably well. This year, when it became impossible for the boats to keep up the connection owing to the ice between the capes having disappeared altogether, the 'Stanley' was caught fast near one port of destination, Pictou. She was so near that she could almost be seen from land. My department, and the agent of the department, assumed that every moment we should learn that the steamer had reached port. The case, as I say, was an exceptional and extraordinary one. The inconvenience, I know, must have been very great, but when the question came up respecting a tug service, I had no authority to establish a service of that kind. The difficulty between the departments may have caused some inconvenience, but the case was an exceptional one. But when the matter was brought to the attention of the Postmaster General he promptly put on a tug and endeavoured to carry the mail expeditiously.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I am not laying any general complaint against the departments for the carriage of the mail, but hereafter I shall hold the postmaster in Charlottetown responsible, after the hon. gentleman's statement that he has the full authority of the Minister, in case of emergency, to take the necessary steps to have the mails carried over. I understand now from the Minister, and that will be communicated to the Island press, that hereafter we will know whom we can hold responsible, and the postmaster on the Island will be looked to.

REPORT.

Report of the Experimental Farms for the year 1893.—(Mr. Foster.)

SHAREHOLDERS IN THE CHARTERED BANKS.

Mr. FOSTER. I desire to lay on the Table a list of the shareholders in the chartered banks.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Does the return ordered to be made on the part of the various banks contain the amount of unclaimed deposits for a certain number of years?

Mr. FOSTER. There was a return made last year, but not this year.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE TARIFF.

Mr. FOSTER moved that the House again resolve itself into Committee of Ways and Means.

Motion agreed to, and House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Oatmeal, 50 cents per barrel.

Mr. FOSTER. I wish to make a change, of which I gave notice, and instead of, as it reads now, 50 cents per barrel, to make it 20 per cent, which will equalize the proportion, according to the millers' proposition, the same as wheat and flour are equalized. According to our present quotations it would mean about 68 cents on the oats.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Even still it is a very curious arrangement. The finished product in that case will be brought into this country at a considerably cheaper rate than the raw material. Ten bushels of oats will be subject to a tax of $1, but the barrel of oatmeal which is made out of those ten bushels of oats on the other side of the line will be admitted at 68 cents. I am not concerned particularly with the principle of protection, but it does appear to me a most extraordinary inversion of every doctrine the hon. gentleman and his friends have ever laid down that the raw material should be taxed much more highly than the finished manufactured product. I would like to understand from the hon. gentleman why 10 bushels of oats which, according to his statement, constitute the raw material, are to be taxed $1, and the barrel of oatmeal produced from those is only to be taxed 68 cents—unless it be his special desire that the oatmeal should be manufactured on the United States side instead of being manufactured here.

Mr. FOSTER. There is no danger about that. I have had a conference with the representative of the millers, and he is quite satisfied with the 20 per cent upon oatmeal. If the hon. gentleman wants to increase it, I have no objection.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am not going to move to increase anything. In the first place, I do not consider I have power to move to increase anything, constitutionally speaking. To add to the burthens of the people is a privilege reserved to the Ministers of the Crown, and most freely exercised.

Mr. FOSTER. It seems they are not exercising it sufficiently in this case.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. My pleasure and my hope is to reduce the burthens of the people, not to add to them. But I must say I think a little more explanation should be given for this departure from principle on the part of the hon. gentleman. We do not expect much from him in the way of principle, but still, if there is a principle that he and his friends are supposed to adhere to, it is the principle of letting raw material in free and taxing the finished product a little higher.

Mr. FOSTER. I must thank my hon. friend for keeping me up to the full measure of protection on these articles.

Mr. FOSTER.

Mr. McMULLEN. I look upon this as a very important matter. It is well known that oatmeal enters largely into the daily food of the poorer classes of this country. It is also well known that a man can take his oats to the mill and get them exchanged for oatmeal. Now, when you take oats to the oatmeal mill and get them exchanged you get the ordinary market price of oats, but you have to pay for the oatmeal the price that it can be laid down in this country, including a duty of 20 per cent. Now, I am of opinion that it would be better rather to reduce the duty on oats, and leave oatmeal as it was. If the hon. gentleman is bound to equalize it, I think the equalization should take place the other way, that is, by reducing the duty upon oats, and in place of 10 cents per bushel bring it down to a reasonable sum, and leave the duty on oatmeal at the price it was before. When you increase the duty you are simply increasing the price of the poor man's bread, upon which his family has to live, to the extent of the increased duty, because those who manufacture the oatmeal will add that to the price when they sell it.

Mr. McMILLAN. I think the duty on oatmeal ought not to be increased, and the duty on oats should be reduced. Mills at certain seasons of the year have got to bring oats in from the other side, they are brought in in bond, and I am convinced that we will suffer no injury from the duty being reduced upon oats, but we shall suffer injury from the duty being raised on oatmeal. One of the complaints in the province of Ontario is that the Government have reduced the duty on raw material, that we have a tax upon an article when it is taken to the mill, while we had no protection in reality upon our oats. I hope the Minister will see his way to reduce the duty upon oats, and at the same time not to raise the duty upon oatmeal.

Item agreed to.

Rice, uncleaned, unhulled or paddy, five-tenths of one cent a pound.

Mr. FOSTER. I wish to make a change in that, and reduce the duty from five-tenths of a cent to three-tenths of a cent.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. This simply means that the hon. Finance Minister proposes to continue a very odious monopoly, a monopoly for which there is no excuse whatever. For the sake of two mills employing 75 hands, he proposes to throw away many thousand dollars of revenue, and he proposes likewise to impose a very severe tax on the people, because the hon. gentleman has given notice likewise of his intention, while reducing the duty on paddy, to increase the duty on the manufactured article. For the sake of employing 75 people, or for the sake of providing for two more of his supporters who may be interested in these two paddy rice cleaning mills, the hon. gentleman proposes to inflict a tax of over $100,000, I have not got the exact details at the instant. He proposes also to add considerably to the cost of an article which is much more an article of necessity than of luxury, because rice is very largely consumed by all classes. I should be glad to learn what possible defence that hon. gentleman can make for abandoning the comparative correct principle which he had laid down, of obtaining a reasonable revenue from this article, if it is to be taxed at all, and giving no more than a moderate protection to those two little mills.

Mr. FOSTER. The proposal in the tariff was to make rice, uncleaned, five-tenths of a cent per pound, and rice, cleaned, 1 cent per pound.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). One-half cent protection?

Mr. FOSTER. One-half cent protection, as the hon. gentleman states it. I now propose, having given notice of the second proposition, to place rice, uncleaned, at three-tenths of a cent per pound, and to place cleaned rice at 1 cent and a quarter, the same as before. The result of that is that while the duty upon the cleaned rice is exactly the same as before, and as it has been for a number of years, the duty on uncleaned rice is increased from $17\frac{1}{2}$ per cent to three-tenths of a cent.

Mr. CASEY. What percentage does three-tenths of a cent per pound represent?

Mr. FOSTER. Thirty per cent, according to present quotations.

Mr. CASEY. It would amount to 23% per cent for last year.

Mr. FOSTER. According to present quotations it would be equal to 30 per cent. However, it is proposed to place it at three-tenths of a cent instead of $17\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. On 20,000,000 lbs., the normal yearly consumption, we would get out of it, at $17\frac{1}{2}$ per cent, \$35,000; three-tenths of a cent will give us, irrespective of the lowering of the duty on rice, a revenue on last year's importations of \$67,000 or \$69,000. So what I explained as my object before has been accomplished, namely, to get a larger revenue from the uncleaned rice while making the cleaned rice no higher than before.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). It is about equal to 14% per cent.

Mr. FOSTER. I thought at first it would be possible to reduce the duty on cleaned rice somewhat while at the same time the duty for revenue purposes be raised upon the uncleaned rice, but after a very thorough investigation I found that that cannot be done, and preserve the industry of rice milling in the country. Hon. gentlemen opposite may think the rice milling industry should be sacrificed. We must take into account that rice milling has been going in Canada for a number of years that capital is invested in it, that rice has to be cleaned somewhere, and if is not cleaned in this country it will be cleaned in some other country and the consumer will pay the cost of the cleaning. When the hon. gentleman says that if we put three-tenths of a cent per pound on uncleaned rice and 1 cent and a quarter on cleaned rice it is giving a very large protection, we must first find out what is involved in the matter of the expenses in cleaning rice in this country, because if there was a clear profit of 1 cent or even $\frac{1}{2}$ cent it would be, in my opinion, more than they should obtain. However, an investigation of the subject will show the committee such is not the case.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Then the work must now be done at a very large loss.

Mr. FOSTER. Uncleaned rice is brought to this country from eastern markets, and of course the freight has to be paid. The freight runs at about 35 shillings per ton. Then there is the duty to be paid. If you take 1 cent and a quarter as being the amount of protection on cleaned rice, you must also take into account that there is three-tenths of a cent to be paid on the raw material, which of course must be deducted. Then in the manufacture of rice, out of 100 pounds of uncleaned there are only sixty-four pounds of cleaned rice obtained for saleable purposes. There is an out-and-out waste, and there is also a partial waste represented by rice meal and broken rice, all of which items have to be taken into account. So it must not be thought that out of 100 pounds of uncleaned, on which the manufacturer must pay three-tenths of a cent per pound, an equivalent number of pounds of cleaned rice is obtained, and there is a considerable quantity which must be sold cheaply. Then there are all the expenses of cleaning, the capital invested and outlay made. At the end this does not leave a large protection for the rice milling industry.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman's statement shows thirty-six pounds of chaff.

Mr. FOSTER. No. I said there were sixty-four pounds of cleaned rice. There is about 4 per cent of absolute waste, and the remainder is partial waste, made up of rice meal and broken rice on which value can be obtained, but not at all equivalent to that of cleaned rice. I warn the House in dealing with this, that they must not look upon it as being 100 pounds of cleaned rice from 100 pounds of uncleaned.

Mr. CASEY. What percentage of absolute waste is there?

Mr. FOSTER. Four or five per cent.

Mr. CASEY. The rest is of some value?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, the rice meal and the broken rice are marketable either here or in other countries. Last year was an exceptional year, the importation was 24,000,000 pounds, but the average tonnage of uncleaned rice imported is about 10,000 long tons. If you take into consideration that they have to purchase at a certain season of the year, to keep their stock of raw material on hand ready for milling, and also to store their manufactured product for distribution; when you take in connection with these facts, the insurance, the cost of milling, the invested capital, and these other items, you will see that there is not a large share of profit left.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Where is the imported cleaned rice usually milled?

Mr. FOSTER. It is now being cleaned in the country of production in larger quantities than before, but it is also cleaned in England and the United States and almost every country.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I request the serious attention of the House to the facts which are now disclosed to us. In reply to a question put by me last evening on behalf of the hon. member from Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien), the hon. Minister stated that seventy-five men is the total number employed in this rice cleaning industry in Canada; and giving the Minister of Finance every possible allowance that he has claimed, the result is: that the people of Canada are now, and have for a long time back, been paying at the rate of from $2,000 to $2,500 a year for each of these seventy-five men. From $150,000 to $175,000 is the loss to the people of Canada, on the statement of the Minister of Finance himself, for the privilege of having two rice cleaning mills, one in Victoria and one in Montreal. I have called attention again and again in this House to the utter absurdity, to the signal folly, of any such provisions in our customs tariff, and I would ask no better illustration of the superlative stupidity—no other term will sufficiently describe it—of paying year in and year out for a long number of years, as the hon. Minister of Finance himself has stated, an annuity of from $150,000 to $200,000 for the purpose of maintaining seventy-five persons. Why, Sir, it would be a great deal better to board these people and their families permanently; make them annuitants at once and not charge the consuming portion of the people of this country with $175,000 or $200,000. Last year we imported 24,318,000 pounds of this uncleaned rice. The hon. gentleman does not pretend to say that there were thirty-six pounds per cent waste in that; there were four or five pounds total waste at the outside, and there were twenty-five or thirty pounds which had a certain value; probably paid its way. If I allow a total loss of 10 per cent on the conversion of the rice, which was the figure given to me by parties on whom I have reason to rely, I make ample allowance for all the absolute loss in converting the uncleaned rice into cleaned rice. Now, what is the result? We received last year $53,000 on the importation of 24,318,000 pounds, which was equivalent to about 22,000,000, making 10 per cent reduction. On that 22,000,000 the consuming population of Canada had to pay a sum equivalent to what they would have to pay on cleaned rice imported and paying the ordinary duty. The cost to them would therefore have been about $275,000 in round numbers, less $53,000 duty which we obtained. The hon. gentleman now tells us that he is going to obtain $69,000 revenue. Therefore the loss to the people of Canada under his present proposition is the difference between the tax that is charged to the people on the imported rice cleaned, and the tax that is paid, namely: the difference between $275,000 and $69,000. So that these precious mills employing seventy-five hands cost the people of Canada, under his present proposition, at least $200,000 a year, if the importation is as heavy in future as it was last year. If the importation was a little in excess the cost would be a little less than in ordinary years. But, give the Finance Minister the benefit of everything he claims, give him the benefit of all these deductions, and I say that the very lowest figure he could make out would be somewhere, according to the amount imported, from $150,000 or $175,000 up to $200,000. No better illustration could be given of the fact which I have continually insisted on: that for every dollar that goes into the Treasury under a protective tariff you may rest assured that at the very lowest calculation two, three or four dollars—sometimes a great deal more—are taken out of the pockets of the consuming population. Here is a case in point: Seventy-five men employed at an annual cost to this country for many years of $200,000 a year.

Mr. McMULLEN. It is quite clear from the statement of the Finance Minister that those interested in the cleaning of rice have loaded him up on the side of protection. They have told him tales that he has been willing to accept as facts, and he is disposed to act upon them. I would like to know from the Finance Minister what he has in the way of personal knowledge as to the actual loss on the cleaning of rice. He does not know a single thing about it. He takes the word of these men who want the duty increased, and he swallows all they say and acts upon their representations.

Mr. FOSTER. What do you take?

Mr. McMULLEN. An efficient and intelligent Finance Minister, in order to deal with these questions under a protective tariff, would need to know about the manufacture of rice, and the manufacture of iron and cotton, or anything else affected by the tariff. The hon. gentleman is at the mercy of all those people when they come to him. They load him up with their stories, which are right in the direction of what he wants himself, and he comes down to the House and recites the information he got from them. They tell him that there is a large percentage of loss in cleaning rice. They tell him how much it costs to bring the rice to this country; they tell him the expense connected with the erection of factories and the employment of men, and they wind up by representing these seventy-five men as eating up the potatoes and the wheat and all the agricultural products in the section of the country in which they work. After he gets loaded up, he comes down to the House and recites to us all the arguments he has got in favour of protection, telling us about cleaning and what it cost, and the freight and what it cost, while at the same time he knows no more as to whether he is stating actual facts or not, than he does of the kind of inhabitants that live in the moon, if any; and he expects the House to be guided by what the Finance Minister says. Now, I contend that this duty on rice is a burden on the poorer classes. The hon. Minister might have some shadow of excuse in trying to secure the production in this country of commodities of which we have the raw material, such as iron; but the idea of imposing a duty on rice, which is largely used by the poorer classes, but which we do not produce in the country, for the purpose of securing employment for some seventy-five men, is another evidence of the absurdity and the gross fraud that is practiced on the people of this country by the protective tariff.

Mr. WALLACE. The hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) says that he has information that the total loss of revenue on the 24,300,000 pounds of rice imported is 10 per cent. I have an authority here which differs entirely from the statement of the hon. gentleman. It is a pamphlet entitled "Rice: its History, Culture, Manufacture and Food Value, with Illustrations showing the value of Rice as a Substitute for Potatoes; How to Use Rice Flour," and so on, by H. B. Proctor.

Mr. McMULLEN. Who is he?

Mr. WALLACE. He is a well-known authority. He says:

The following pages, which lately appeared in "The Miller," having attracted some attention amongst those interested in the rice trade, I have been requested to revise them for publication in the form of a pamphlet.

Mr. McMULLEN. Where does he live?

Mr. WALLACE. I have not the honour of his acquaintance; but I will put his authority against that of the hon. member for South Oxford, at any rate, because he knows what he is talking about. He gives the following summary and proportions for Ngatsein rice:—Fine rice, 64 per cent; smalls, 18 per cent; meal, 15 per cent, and husk, 3 per cent. Now, the market price of uncleaned rice to-day is about 1 cent per pound, whereas the average price upon the importations of the last fiscal year was $1.22 per hundred pounds.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. In this tariff there are three descriptions of uncleaned rice—uncleaned, unhulled and paddy. I have been informed that these describe the different varieties of the same general article. Which does the hon. gentleman's quotation refer to?

Mr. WALLACE. It refers to the uncleaned and unhulled. I am informed that very little of the paddy is brought into this country; it is that which has the outside husk. The uncleaned and unhulled are imported to be cleaned in this country. On the 24,300,000 pounds imported, the revenue, at the old rate of 17½ per cent, would be about $43,000 on the values of to-day. It is true that $53,000 was collected last year on that amount, but the price has fallen from $1.22 to $1 per 100 pounds. Under the proposal now made, the revenue on the same importation would be $72,900 or an increase of exactly $30,000.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I might remind the hon. gentleman that there is such a thing as a rise in value, as well as a fall.

Mr. WALLACE. Rice is imported at one time in the year, and that time, I am told, is the present time, so that the rice would be entered at the present price. That increased revenue of $30,000 will be obtained without additional taxation to the people or increased price to the consumer. There would be this further result, that, as the rice comes down in price in other countries, as the price of the raw material is reduced, the price of the cleaned rice is, of course, reduced in proportion. The fact that a large quantity of cleaned rice has come into this country is a proof that the rice-cleaners in this country have not a control and a monopoly of the market. There is a further advantage to the Canadian people in having the rice cleaned in this country. It is cleaned better, it is more uniform; it has not to undergo, after it has been cleaned those long ocean voyages in rough packages, which make it an undesirable article for people to use.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). It is full of insects concealed in chaff, which cleaned rice has not.

Mr. WALLACE. The cleaned rice is cleaned at the mills here. All impurities and imperfections are removed, and the Canadian buyer is supplied with a pure, clean, wholesome article right from the mill, which cannot be said of the article cleaned at Burmah.

Mr. CASEY. Is there much rice from Burmah ?

Mr. WALLACE. Principally from Burmah. In the article which comes direct from the mill in Canada, the Canadian consumer gets a better, purer, and cleaner article than that brought over in vessels from those tropical countries.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The House will observe that the hon. gentleman has not in the slightest degree disproved the statement made to me, that a total loss of 10 per cent would be a fair deduction. The parties who gave me the information are as well aware as the hon. gentleman, that there are 18 per cent seconds and 14 per cent of what I believe is technically called "smalls." Their statement to me was that the value of those two percentages would be very fairly accounted for by a deduction of 10 per cent.

Mr. HASLAM. As it stands now, the duty on rice, I think, is lowered, if anything, too much, for the simple reason that a great portion of that duty is collected from a class of people from whom we have no possible means of deriving a revenue in any other way. I refer to the Chinese. They are in the country, and we cannot, under our constitution, keep them out. If you take the duty off rice, of which they are the largest consumers, you deprive the country of the only revenue we can raise from them. Under the old tariff, they paid something like $1.68 each per annum, while a white man pays about 15 cents each per annum on rice.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). They must be nearly all in Quebec, for there is where most of the rice is bought.

Mr. HASLAM. You will find that the rice travels from Quebec all over the country, as they happen to have railways in that province. The Chinese are, by all odds, the largest consumers of rice in proportion to their numbers. Owing to their habits of living there is hardly any possibility of collecting, in any other way, a revenue from them. They live chiefly on rice, and enter into competition with white men in various forms of labour; and if you regulate the duties in such a way that there is no duty, or comparatively a small duty, collected on rice, I do not think you will be giving the labour of white men a fair chance. If you take the duty off rice, you exempt the Chinese altogether from any imposts, which would not be fair to the white people, who live on other classes of food and contribute a heavy revenue to the state. If I had my way, I would like to increase the duty.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). The changes which the hon. Finance Minister now proposes calls, of necessity, for a full consideration of the question before the committee. The hon. Minister will see at once that the proposition in the original tariff resolutions was a very unwise one, or that the proposition he is now submitting is one that does not commend itself to the House. In the first place, he is taking two-tenths of a cent per pound off the raw material, if I may speak of it in that sense, and is adding 25 cents to the duty on the finished product, so that the difference he is making is 45 cents per hundred pounds between his present proposition and the one he originally submitted. I need only mention the fact to the committee, to show at once that it gives an advanced protection of 45 cents per hundred pounds on the millions of pounds of rice used; the proposition which the hon. gentleman is now submitting varies very materially indeed from what he originally proposed. There was a considerable reduction in the original proposition. There is very little difference between 17½ per cent and three-tenths cent per pound now more duty imposed upon the uncleaned rice, which we will speak of as the raw material. Whatever that difference may come to, his revenue will be benefited that much. On last year's importations it would only make a difference of some $9,000. The Finance Minister's course is consistent, from his point of view as to how a tariff should be made, in this matter in his last proposition. I suppose he has been convinced by those engaged in the cleaning of rice that it is absolutely necessary for their industry that they should have the amount of protection proposed under the amended proposition now submitted. He is consistent with the declaration of policy in his Budget speech, that his prime object in the framing of a tariff was, not to secure revenue, but to give sufficient protection to enable industries to exist in the country. It brings us face to face with the question, whether an industry which requires that amount of protection is in the best interests of the country—whether the country is willing to pay that much for it. We find there are twenty-four million pounds of uncleaned rice imported. Allowing for the reduction of waste at 10 per cent, and taking the amount at round numbers, suppose we allow four million pounds as waste.

Mr. WALLACE. The hon. gentleman should take the ascertained figures, 64 per cent of good rice.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Thirty-two per cent is uncleaned rice.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). The hon. Minister will not ask me to say that all that rice is of no value.

Mr. WALLACE. Put that at its true value. That would be a fair way—sixty-four pounds of clean rice, and the other 32 per cent is inferior at inferior prices.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). The point I want to get at is this—to see just what effect it has on the revenue. I am supposing that if the 24,000,000 pounds had been brought in as cleaned rice, and we had no mills to clean rice here, we would have the same consumption as now.

Mr. WALLACE. At 64 per cent there was 15,360 pounds cleaned.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). The hon. Commissioner must not lose sight of this fact, that this that he speaks of does go into consumption. I think I know of my own knowledge that this that he speaks of and wishes to include in the 34 and 36 per cent goes into the starch factories or into the rice flour mills and is ground into flour and sold in the market.

Mr. WALLACE. Not as rice.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Not as rice, but as rice flour.

Mr. WALLACE. A large portion of it is exported.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Some of it may be exported; but it certainly is manufactured into rice flour in this country. As to whether it all is, I cannot speak with confidence, and I suppose the Commissioner can hardly do so, unless he can point to an export of rice flour.

Mr. COCHRANE. Does a little of it go into candies?

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Candies are made out of pure sugar.

Mr. WALLACE. I can give the hon. gentleman—

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Perhaps the hon. gentleman will allow me to state the case as it appears to me and then he can explain, for we certainly have no desire on either side but to arrive at the facts. I thought that when I was allowing four millions as waste upon twenty-four millions, I was making an ample allowance. From the twenty-four millions, we had a revenue of \$53,000. If that had come in as twenty millions of pounds of cleaned rice at $1\frac{1}{4}$ cents per pound duty, you would have had a revenue of \$250,000.

Mr. WALLACE. Will the hon. gentleman allow me—

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Perhaps it would be better to let me go through with my argument and then the Minister can answer me. These being the figures, the question arises whether it is worth our while to pay \$200,000 more every year in order to have rice cleaned in our country. Shall we lose that amount of revenue when there is no corresponding advantage to the people in the reduction of price? Is what we gain worth such a heavy loss? It seems to me that that is the question that must suggest itself to the minds of those who consider this subject. I quite agree that it is true, as so often declared, that, in considering the question of protection, the amount of duty on the finished product is not the only item to be considered. Very often manufacturers in this country are spoken of as though they were hard to satisfy, and the duty of 35 or 40 per cent levied upon their finished products is pointed to as proof that these men are grasping and avaricious and it is declared that if they cannot live with that protection on, it would be better to have their works closed up, and so on. This is only part of the truth. The fact is evidently lost sight of that many manufacturers, instead of seeking unjust favours at the hands of the Government, are only asking for justice; for this protective system makes the raw material of one manufacturer which is the finished product of another dearer to the man who wishes to use it in manufacturing. The protection given is not the amount of duty on the finished product, but the difference between the duty on the raw material and the duty on the finished product. I can well understand that when you reduce agricultural implements, as you have done to 20 per cent, it is not correct to say that the Canadian manufacturer has 20 per cent protection or advantage—for protection simply means advantage. The raw material which he has to use in the manufacture of agricultural implements is also taxed and he cannot purchase it at as low a price as can his competitor in the United States. Now, with reference to this article of rice, of course it would not do to say that the manufacturers have a protection of $1\frac{1}{4}$ cents, for on their raw material they have had a duty of $17\frac{1}{2}$ per cent, or, as now proposed, three-tenths cents per pound. It is quite legitimate for the Minister to point out that the manufacturer does not get the protection which appears on the face of the figures. Besides the fact that a considerable portion of this is wasted, there is the fact that the rice manufacturer or rice cleaner with the protection of $1\frac{1}{4}$ cents per pound on his finished product must pay three-tenths cent per pound upon the raw material he uses. Notwithstanding this there is the fact that you lose every year about \$200,000 of revenue as compared with what you might secure by putting the duty of $1\frac{1}{4}$ cents per pound on the uncleaned instead of on the cleaned rice. This must be set off against the advantage you gain through cleaning the rice in this country. This is one of the items that will bring clearly before the minds of members of the committee what a waste there is, if I might use the expression, in the wealth and resources of the country, in pursuing this system, if it be pursued to the end which the Finance Minister has declared it is the fixed policy of this Government to pursue it—to retain an industry in this country by giving it just such an amount of protection as it may require to enable it to go on, whether that protection be great or small. Now, let us consider the history of the rice industry for the last few years. We find that in 1881, and from 1881 to 1887—I speak subject to correction—the duty upon rice was only 1 cent per pound instead of $1\frac{1}{4}$ cents per pound, and a quarter of a cent added to 1 cent, I may remind you. Mr. Speaker, is an increase of 25 per cent—a very considerable addition to a rate of duty. But, during these years, with the duty of 1 cent per pound, those who cleaned rice found that it was a paying business as I judge from the returns. In 1882 the importation of uncleaned rice was something like eight millions of pounds. Next year the importation was four and three-quarter millions of pounds; the next year ten millions, and, in 1885, twenty millions. In that same year—1885—only nine millions of pounds of cleaned rice came in, as against twenty millions of uncleaned. Next year, eleven and a half millions of pounds of uncleaned rice came in, and the year following fourteen millions of pounds, as against—in the latter year—eight millions of pounds of cleaned rice. In 1888, $\frac{1}{4}$ cent per pound was added to the duty, and the importation of cleaned rice fell to about two and three-quarter millions of pounds, while the importation of uncleaned rice went up to sixteen and three-quarter millions. In 1889 the import was three and a half millions of pounds of cleaned rice—of course I am giving these figures in the rough—and eighteen millions of pounds of uncleaned. In 1890 the import was two and three-quarter millions of pounds of cleaned and twenty-three millions of pounds of uncleaned. So that, when the duty was put up to $1\frac{1}{4}$ cents per pound on the cleaned rice, it was found to be almost prohibitive. But we find, if my figures are correct, that, under the duty of 1 cent per pound on the cleaned rice the difference between that duty on the finished product and the duty of $17\frac{1}{2}$ per cent on the raw material, left such a margin as to enable the business to go on and extend continually. Now, when we have a revision of the tariff, it is evident the Finance Minister sees that there has been excessive protection. He may have looked over these figures, and, if so, he has no doubt gleaned from them, as I have gleaned from them, that even viewing the tariff from his standpoint and carrying out his policy, there was not the necessity for such high protection as has been allowed from 1888 down to the present time. But now he has changed his mind; why, I do not know, for I suppose in his interviews with these men he had ascertained the facts with reference to it. I simply point out the fact that the loss to the revenue amounts to that figure, and it would be well for the Government to explain why, although from 1881 to 1887 we had a 1 cent duty, they have now found it necessary to make a distinction, and to make the alteration proposed in these two items. While I am willing to accept the figures of the Controller, he may be right, we must remember that while it works that way this year, values are changing, and it would not do to take that as a positive rule, because the values may go up and down in different years.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Rice is an article of food for the poorer classes of the population as well as those better off, and the hon. gentleman's proposed tariff subjects it to a tax of 125 per cent at least, possibly more, and that in the interest of a manufacturing establishment, which, he says, has not a profit equal to the amount of the taxation; so that the hon. gentleman proposes to maintain two establishments in the country that are actually manufacturing at a loss.

Mr. FOSTER. Would you explain how it is 125 per cent?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Looking at the importations into England, and seeing what the price of rice is, I find that the amount of taxation which the hon. gentleman proposes is $1\frac{1}{2}$ cents a pound.

Mr. FOSTER. One and a quarter cents.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Well, that would be about 100 per cent on the value of the rice. The importations into England in February were 648,000 cwts., costing £244,000 and the hon. gentleman will see that that is just about the rate of his taxation.

Mr. WALLACE. Was not that the uncleaned?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). No; I take it that it was not, because I believe that the greater portion of the rice is cleaned in the country in which it is produced. I am told that very often the rice that is brought in in the chaff, when it is landed in the country to which it is carried, is filled with vermin. I have seen myself whole handfuls of it that was practically eaten out by some insect or other, somewhat resembling the weevil in wheat. I do not say that it is not properly brought here, but it does seem to me that it is much more liable to be an imperfect article than it is if it is cleaned and hulled in the country of production. But that is a question relating to sanitary considerations rather than those that concern us at this moment. When the Minister goes on to say that these people make little or nothing upon the rice which is being imported under this enormous percentage of protection, he goes a long way, if he is accurate in his representation, in saying that the business is an unprofitable one, and one which ought not, in that respect, to be encouraged. The statement of the Minister in that respect is not borne out, it seems to me, by the statement of the hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson) who has shown from the Trade and Navigation Returns that the very large quantity of rice consumed in this country before the duties were put up to the present high figure, was rice hulled in this country; and, that being so, this very high rate of duty, it seems to me, is altogether unnecessary. An hon. gentleman who addressed the House said that this article was an article consumed mainly by the Chinese, and that as they were not large contributors to the revenue, this was an opportunity of collecting some portion of revenue from that population. But, according to the Trade and Navigation Returns, the hon. gentleman was mistaken, for, however much the Chinese may be disposed to consume rice, the numbers are so small that the rice consumed by them forms but a very small percentage of the rice that is consumed in the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. FOSTER. How much do you suppose the Chinamen are eating a month?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Let me tell the hon. gentleman that the Chinamen in Canada are very largely consuming flour. I was informed, and I believe correctly, that the steamships in the Pacific, running in connection with the Canadian Pacific Railway, carry 10,000 barrels a month to China and Japan, which is mainly consumed by the Chinese who were formerly consumers of rice; that Chinamen who have been in America and have acquired the habit of eating flour here, are continuing that habit after going back to China; that the Chinese rice fields are, in many instances, being converted into cotton fields, because the value of the cotton product is more than the value of rice; that flour is in a large degree taking the place of rice; and that if it were not for the impediments put in the way of Chinese immigration into the continent of America, which is not likely to be very formidable, this consumption would grow much more rapidly than it has done. So I could not answer the question of the hon. gentleman. I have no supposition upon the subject. But I look at the importations of rice into British Columbia, and I find they amounted to something less than 6,000,000 pounds last year, and that the importations into Quebec, which are importations for both Ontario and Quebec, amounted to nearly 19,000,000 pounds. I do not think that any portion of that found its way into British Columbia; my impression is that British Columbia, being so much nearer China, the rice consumed there was hulled in British Columbia, and was imported there, and was not transported three or four thousand miles by rail from the eastern portion of Canada. Six million pounds consumed on the Pacific coast, is a large quantity for the population, showing that more rice is being consumed there per man than is being consumed on this side of the Rocky Mountains. Nevertheless, a large portion of the rice consumed in Canada is not consumed by Chinamen, but by the white population, and the tax the hon. gentleman imposes upon it is a tax upon a necessary of life to the poorer classes of population.

Mr. MARA. The hon. member for Bothell (Mr. Mills) is right in his contention that very little of the rice that is cleaned in Quebec goes west of the Rocky Mountains, but he must also bear in mind that the Chinese relatively are increasing rapidly east of the Rocky Mountains, and that for one Chinaman found in Ontario and Quebec ten years ago, I am satisfied he will find one hundred now, and these Chinamen live almost exclusively on rice. He is wrong in stating that the Chinese now largely use flour instead of rice. The quantity of flour shipped from Vancouver to China and Japan would be as a bucket of water to the ocean, in proportion to the millions of Chinese who live upon rice exclusively. Let the hon. gentleman go into a Chinese miner's cabin in British Columbia, or let him go into a Chinese merchant's house in Victoria, and he will find that the staple article of food is rice, that they use very little bread and very little flour. My hon. friend from Vancouver is quite right in stating that this constitutes an indirect tax on the Chinese. Taking the Trade and Navigation Returns for the last year, I find that whilst the entire duty on both cleaned and uncleaned rice amounted to $97,900, British Columbia paid $43,600, or about 46 per cent of the whole. It may be said, as it was said the other day, that if British Columbia is satisfied to pay that tax, all right. We are satisfied, because it is the only way in which we can tax the Chinese. When British Columbia had the framing of its own tariff, we taxed the Chinese in this way by levying a duty of 1½ cents per pound on rice.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman will see that the tax is a tax out of which the Government receives $1 and the rice-cleaner $4.

Mr. MARA. I am quite willing to admit that there is, apparently, a great difference between the duty on the paddy, or uncleaned rice, than on the cleaned rice; but we must bear in mind that, while there was a duty of 17½ per cent last year, the rice-cleaner has to pay a tax of three-tenths of 1 cent per pound. So, whilst the duty on cleaned rice remains the same, the cleaner of rice has to pay twice as much as he was called upon to pay last year.

Mr. CASEY. The position of the Finance Minister was well described by the hon. member for Wellington (Mr. McMullen) when he said the hon. gentleman had to take the evidence of the people in the trade, when making changes in the tariff. I might also be allowed to suggest that parties asking changes for their own benefit should be examined like witnesses before the Public Accounts Committee, on oath, because the representations they make are vital to the interests of the country, for on those representations are based changes in the tariff which may involve large sums. The Minister has told the committee clearly that he is not looking after revenue in revising the tariff, but after protection. In this case he is certainly maintaining protection with a vengeance. No doubt, there is a slight moderation as regards protection, but the fact remains that the consumers will be taxed, taking last year's figures on cleaned rice, 60 per cent, not only on what is imported, but on what is purchased from the Canadian rice-millers. The quantity of cleaned rice bought from the Canadian miller can only be arrived at by assuming a certain percentage of the uncleaned, which the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) has shown good reasons to place at about 90 per cent of the value, although there is not 10 per cent of rice lost. Last year uncleaned rice paid 17½ per cent and cleaned rice 60 per cent. There was a protection to the miller simply for hulling and cleaning the rice, of 43 per cent. By the change now introduced on this second revision of the tariff, the tax on cleaned rice remains as before at 60 per cent, while the tax on uncleaned rice is placed at 23½ per cent, leaving a protection of 37 per cent to the rice-miller. I challenge the Finance Minister to state to the country that in his opinion a protective duty of 37 per cent should be imposed on one of the necessities of life. If he should make that assertion, I would be obliged to charge him with utter inconsistency, for that is the highest rate of protection given to ordinary industries under the new revision. I am excepting coal oil and some other special favourites. What does this duty amount to in solid cash? Suppose we assume the average rate of 35 per cent as being a reasonable rate of impost on imported articles, what would be the result, if, instead of rice being taxed as proposed, a uniform tax of 35 per cent were imposed on cleaned rice and paddy were allowed to come in free? Reducing the paddy by 10 per cent in value and adding it to the value of cleaned rice consumed last year, and calculating the duty on it at 35 per cent, we find the revenue would have then been $222,296, as against an actual revenue on those two items of $117,295. The revenue would thereby have gained $105,000 by the difference. On the other hand, the consumer would have saved 25 per cent, being the difference between 60 and 35 per cent. There would have been an addition to the revenue of $105,000, a saving to the consumer of 25 per cent on cleaned rice of $87,704, or a total saving of about $280,000, $105,000 of revenue to the Government, and $175,000 odd to the consumer. Thus no less than $280,000 tax is virtually paid by the country in order to maintain two mills. The hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) has pointed out how much cheaper it would be to pension off these millers. No better example of a petty tax to maintain one or two small concerns, a tax petty in its results, but odious in its character, can be found than this particular one. The cost to the country is many times as much as any possible advantage derived from the expenditure for wages or capital invested, and it would be much better for the country and the consumer if the industry were closed, rather than maintained at the present rate of protection. The hon. member for Vancouver (Mr. Haslam) has introduced a vein of humour into the discussion by pointing out that, if we relieved ourselves of the 60 per cent duty on all rice we used, we would at the same time relieve the Chinaman, who is so unpopular in British Columbia that the white population there would rather maintain the tax on themselves than the Chinaman should receive any advantage. That may be very well for British Columbia, but that feeling does not exist in other provinces. The people of the Dominion at large are not prepared to pay 60 per cent duty to prevent a few Chinamen in British Columbia obtaining their rice a little cheaper. I accepted the hon. gentleman's statement as meant for a joke, but it is no joke that the consumers of rice throughout the Dominion should be so heavily taxed to obtain what I must call a very petty industry.

Mr. HASLAM. I would like to call the hon. gentleman's attention to the fact that, as near as I can estimate the duty on rice, it comes to 15 cents per head per annum on the white man, and $1.68 on the Chinaman.

Mr. McMULLEN. Estimating that the consumption of rice in this country is 24,000,000 pounds a year—last year it was 27,000,000—at 1¼ cents per pound, there would be $300,000 protection paid. Estimating that 10 per cent is lost in cleaning, that would amount to $48,000, and, deducting that from the $300,000, you have $252,000 left. Then, on 24,000,000 pounds, three-tenths of a cent per pound, the duty would be $72,000, and that would leave $180,000. Estimating that, in order to give the rice-cleaner in Canada the absolute control of the market, say that he will sell for one-eighth of a cent per pound less than the cleaned rice could be imported for, that will deduct $30,000, and leave an amount of $150,000 per year, which is paid by the people in Canada to the manufacturers and the seventy-five men employed in cleaning rice.

Mr. DAVIN. Are these seventy-five men married?

Mr. McMULLEN. Yes, but their children are not cleaning rice, and if they were all like you they would not have any children. For the seventy-five men employed, that gives a net sum of $2,000 a year each, allowing that the rice is sold at one-eighth of a cent below what it could be imported for. Virtually, it costs the people of this country $2,000 a man to keep those seventy-five men cleaning rice.

Mr. PATERSON (Grant). I find that there were some three million odd pounds of the rice meal exported, and on this there was no loss to the cleaner of rice, because he imported at a net cost of $1.26 per hundred pounds, and for the rice meal he got $1.36 net, giving him a margin of 10 cents per hundred pounds.

Mr. WALLACE. But the rice-cleaner paid a duty of 17½ per cent on that $1.22, which made it cost to him $1.42, and, instead of there being a little margin for him, he was out of pocket on what he exported.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). That is a fair argument, you are right.

Mr. CASEY. Was there no rebate on the exportation?

Mr. FOSTER. No.

Mr. FRASER. What would be the percentage on cleaned rice at 1¼ cents per pound?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Sixty per cent on the nominal value, apparently.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The new amendment reads:

Rice, uncleaned, unhulled or paddy, three-tenths of a cent per pound and not to be less than 30 per cent ad valorem.

Item agreed to.

Rice, cleaned, 1¼ cents per pound.

Mr. FRASER. Rice is a product that enters largely into the consumption of the poorer classes of the Dominion, lumbermen, fishermen, and others. It is not only wholesome food, but it is, to some extent, cheaper than other articles of consumption. To put a duty of 60 per cent on such an article as that is beyond all reason. When the hon. member (Mr. Haslam) says that the white man pays 15 cents and the Chinaman $1.68 of this tax, he seems to have forgotten that there are fully as many white men in Canada as Chinamen. You do not compare heads when you speak about taxation, so far as the white man and the Chinaman is concerned. This Government seems to tax the very things that they ought not tax. They tax oatmeal, the food of the gods, and rice, the food of the Chinamen. It seems to me that two such articles as these, entering so largely into the food of the people should not be taxed. I see no reason for it, whatever. Do the hon. gentlemen think that the interests of all the people of Canada who use rice are to be sacrificed to the interests of seventy-five people who clean rice? Are you going to make five millions of people, less the seventy-five persons and their dependents, pay 60 per cent for the privilege of supporting these seventy-five people and their dependents? Is that not reversing the order of things? Where is the principle underlying it? It is boldly asserted that this 60 per cent protection is not for the purpose of raising a revenue, but in the interests of the few men who are cleaning rice.

Mr. CASEY. Sixty-six per cent.

Mr. FRASER. I will throw off 10 per cent of the 60 per cent, even, and make it 50 per cent.

Mr. FOSTER. Throw off 20 per cent more, and you will be nearer to it.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. No; it is 60 per cent on the cost to the consumer.

Mr. FRASER. I will make it 50 per cent, and then the Government make the five millions of people in Canada pay one-half more than the actual value of the rice, in the interests of seventy-five men in this Dominion. Is that not an outrageous state of things? If you are going to have a tariff so utterly opposed even to the principle—if such a thing as principle can exist in protection—why do you tax necessary articles of food 50 per cent, and tax other articles, not so necessary, 20 or 30 per cent? We cannot repeat too often that so far as food and clothing of our people are concerned, any Government that does not make them as cheap and as free as possible, is acting contrary to the interests of the people. I do believe that if the Minister of Finance and his friends would view this matter in the light of the whole country, they would see that such a tax as this is not only inconsistent and against the interests of the country, but also against the interests of the Government itself.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). There will be a gain of revenue here; how much is it?

Mr. FOSTER. $30,000.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Careful calculation?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes; I have provided that the duty shall not be less than 30 per cent, so that the miller gets no advantage in the way of added protection. My hon. friend is not right in saying that this is not a matter of revenue, for we shall get $30,000 more revenue than we did under the old rate. It must be recollected that this is an established industry in the country, and we have to deal with it accordingly; but we get from this article about double the amount of duty without increasing the cost. Although it is not a matter that ought absolutely to guide us, we find that there is a large duty on rice in the United States as well. The McKinley Bill imposed 2 cents a pound on the cleaned rice, and three-quarters of a cent on the paddy. The Wilson Bill, as reported, imposes 1½ cents a pound on the cleaned rice and three-quarters of a cent on the paddy; and the retail price on the other side of the line is very much greater than it is in Canada. The duty on the cleaned rice is a high duty, but not so high as my hon. friend says.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Sixty per cent.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, about 60 per cent; but 30 per cent is paid by the manufacturer on the raw material.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Not 30 per cent out of the 60, but 30 per cent on the value of the uncleaned rice, which is not so much.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman has not quite fairly represented the matter of waste. Taking into account the value of the meal and broken rice it is as though the manufacturers were to get seventy-two pounds of cleaned rice out of a hundred pounds of uncleaned. That just about represents the waste, namely, 28 per cent. Of course, rice is a food product. My hon. friend says I do not know anything about milling rice. I do not. Neither do I know anything about making confectionery. I cannot be expected to know except from the information I have got, and I have got the best information I could. There is no doubt that rice is an article of food, but it is not an article so commonly used as to make this duty a great burden. On the total population of this country, the consumption of rice would be about four pounds per head; but one-third of the quantity consumed is taken by the Chinese of this country, which would leave about two and a half pounds per head to the white population. Suppose the duty were even a cent a pound, it would not be a killing matter. It is a good thing to declaim about theoretically, but practically no man will be weighed down by the burden. If it were an article used largely in every family, the matter would be more serious. My hon. friend opposite himself taxed rice.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. We did not lose revenue.

Mr. FOSTER. The mills have been placed here, and have been carrying on their operations ever since. The rice must be cleaned somewhere. My hon. friend opposite claims that it would be better that it should be cleaned in Burmah. I do not think the people there are quite as cleanly in their management of it as are our people. My hon. friend says he has actually seen vermin in a handful of paddy which he has had in his hands. He may now rest secure that he will not be subject to that, as no one can bring in paddy and hull and clean it here. The rice brought in is an article which, from its appearance, you would think was fit for the table; but it has the cuticle upon it, and it is that which is brushed off. So that there is something in the argument of my hon. friend that a better and cleaner quality of rice is obtained by our people milling it in Canada. The duty affords a high protection, considered in one respect, but there is a great deal to be taken off owing to waste; and, when you come to sum up the whole matter, it is an infinitesimal burden on the people.

Mr. FOSTER.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It is a burden of $150,000 or thereabouts to maintain seventy-five men, or $2,000 per head. I would like to know what the shareholders of the mills are to be assessed for election purposes. This assigns them an annuity from $150,000 to $200,000 a year. But I want to call the attention of the House to another thing. Here is the proof, if proof were wanted, of the necessity and propriety of Ministers who undertake the revision of the tariff, having their operations conducted in the open sunlight, with the press in attendance. It was very desirable that these applicants for outdoor relief, these precious poor millers, should have stated their case before the Minister; but it was at least equally desirable that other persons in the country who know something of this matter should have had the opportunity, before we came to discuss these things this afternoon, of informing their representatives and the public at large what statements are to be depended upon. The Minister and the Controller tell us that the dead loss is so much; the information I have got is that it equals the sum I have stated. Either statement may be correct; but mark the extreme difficulties that the Ministers have placed in our way, in regard to the only thing that justified their proceedings last year—the obtaining of information from these applicants for protection as to the value of their industries, and from the country as to the amount of protection they claim. A considerable portion of this discussion has been taken up by the question whether the dead loss amounts to 10 per cent or to 28 per cent. I am very strongly of opinion that while it may be true in the case of the paddy imported that there would be considerable loss, in the case of the so-called uncleaned rice the actual amount of loss is very little indeed. I do not say that the hon. gentleman is not stating what he believes, but I do not believe that he has been correctly informed. It was of great importance to the proper discussion of the tariff question in the House that these matters should not have been discussed in a hole-and-corner fashion, but publicly, with the press and others interested present, so that we might have got at the actual facts. But it is pretty certain that the only men whom the hon. gentleman consulted were the men interested in having this tax imposed. The consuming public had no representative before him.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, they had.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Nor did the Controller of Customs nor the Controller of Inland Revenue in all their pilgrimages through the country figure on any occasion as the advocates of the consumer. In every case they were the advocates of the gentlemen who desired to tax the public for their private benefit.

Mr. CASEY. Do I understand the hon. Minister to say that paddy was imported with the cuticle on?

Mr. FOSTER. The paddy must have two cuticles on.

Mr. CASEY. The Government do their best to skin him when they do get him here.

Mr. CHARLTON. I am impressed with the belief that the information the Government have received, and which has governed them in fixing the relative duties upon paddy or uncleaned rice and cleaned rice, is not reliable, and that they have been deceived. In the United States, where there is a large rice production industry to protect, I find the relative duties upon cleaned and uncleaned rice are very different from what they are in these resolutions. By the Wilson Bill, as reported by the Finance Committee of the Senate, the duty on cleaned rice is $1\frac{1}{2}$ cents per pound, the duty on rice with the hull on is 1 cent per pound, and the duty on paddy is three-quarters of a cent per pound. The difference in the duties upon paddy or unhulled rice and cleaned rice, in the Wilson Bill, is very great—a difference of nearly 50 per cent between uncleaned and clean rice, and the duty on paddy is only three-quarters of a cent per pound. The duty in our tariff of three-tenths of a cent per pound on unhulled rice as against 1 cent per pound on the same rice in the United States, where the duty upon the finished article is one-quarter of a cent more per pound than here, shows that the disproportion is very much greater here than there. If the hon. gentleman were to place the duty at eight-tenths of a cent on uncleaned rice instead of three-tenths of a cent, the proportion would be about the same as in the United States. I repeat that, in my opinion, the Government have been deceived by the representations of those interested in these rice mills. There can be no doubt that these relative proportions of duty upon cleaned rice, rice with the hull on, and paddy rice, in the United States, have been carefully considered, and other interests have been heard besides those immediately concerned in milling the rice. If there has not been a gross mistake made by the framers of the Wilson Bill, if they have not been entirely misinformed as to the relative duties proper to impose, then our Finance Minister has been misinformed and has made a gross error. In my opinion, this duty on unhulled rice, to bear the same proportion as in the Wilson Bill should be eight-tenths of a cent. We may assume that the Americans were in possession of stores of information more extensive and reliable than those at the disposal of our officials, when the relative proportions of these duties were decided upon.

Mr. WALLACE. They were protecting the uncleaned rice that they produce themselves.

Mr. CHARLTON. No, they import large quantities of rice, and they would naturally, when placing a duty upon rice, have the relative proportions of the duty properly adjusted for the protection of their own rice interests. If they put $1\frac{1}{2}$ cents on cleaned rice, they would put a corresponding duty on unhulled rice and paddy. They had a vast rice interest to protect, and secured data which was reliable, and upon the basis of that data they have fixed their rates.

Mr. FOSTER. Do they think they would get any uncleaned rice in at $1\frac{1}{4}$ cents?

Mr. CHARLTON. They import cleaned rice and raise rice.

Mr. FOSTER. The duty on uncleaned rice is prohibitory.

Mr. CHARLTON. It would not be in their assumption. They have placed $1\frac{1}{2}$ cents on cleaned rice, 1 cent on uncleaned, and three-quarters of a cent on paddy. They have adjusted these proportions, in the belief that the protection afforded by the adjustment of these duties was about fair and equal on all these different grades of rice. The hon. gentleman has made a disparity in the duties between cleaned and uncleaned which is far too great. He has acted upon the representation of those immediately interested in the matter as rice millers and given a protection far in excess of their requirements.

Item agreed to.

Rice and sago flour (2 cents per pound) and sago (20 per cent), 25 per cent ad valorem.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Two cents per pound was the old duty. What do you compute the value of that to be now?

Mr. FOSTER. The ad valorem equivalent of that was a little over 60 per cent.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I cannot see any import of sago at all. There must have been sago imported into the country.

Mr. WALLACE. It came in under the 20 per cent unenumerated.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Why raise it?

Mr. FOSTER. They are all cognate articles.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman knows he is not seeking to protect sago, as there is none produced in the country. This, I suppose, is for revenue.

Mr. FOSTER. If there is any increase, there will be an increase of revenue. Twenty-five per cent is not a very high duty. Instead of making another item, we put the whole articles together.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). The hon. gentleman loses revenue on rice and sago flour.

Mr. FOSTER. I am complained of on both sides. One hon. gentleman complains of the increase and the other of a decrease.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I say you simply diminish its consumption, and you will not get any more revenue out of a 20 per cent than a 25 per cent rule.

Item agreed to.

Wheat, 15 cents per bushel.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). It would be now proper for the Minister to state what led him to the conclusion to place certain articles in the offer of reciprocity to the United States and leave wheat and flour out of that list.

Mr. FOSTER. I thought we had pretty well exhausted that question of reciprocity. The answer is that we simply do not think it is in the best interests of Canada to allow wheat and wheat flour to come in free and be subject to the competition of the American wheat.

Mr. CHARLTON. This is another illustration, Mr. Chairman, of the fact that the Government do not wish to consider a fair offer of reciprocity with the United States at all. The hon. gentleman very readily and very frankly assigned as the reason why he did not think it would be in the interest of the country to include flour and wheat in the offer of reciprocity, that the United States might be able to sell some to us. The offer as it stands is an offer for reciprocity in Indian corn, when the hon. gentleman has a pretty good idea that it would be better to remove the duty from that in any case. But it does not include wheat or wheat flour, because the Americans might be able to sell us some. It merely proves that the Government have no desire or design to make any offer or reciprocity that comes within the range of what the Americans would be at all likely to accept.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman is inclined to be one-sided. The United States offer to us no doubt he thinks generous, being one of free wheat and free flour. The hon. gentleman might put the question as to how much wheat and wheat flour we would be likely to sell them.

Mr. CAMPBELL. We would sell them a good deal.

Mr. MARTIN. In Manitoba very frequently we might sell large quantities of wheat to the United States. It has happened for the past two years that the price of wheat has been almost steadily from 3 cents to 7 cents per bushel higher in Neche and St. Vincent than at Gretna and Emerson, the corresponding places on the Manitoba side of the line, and I am satisfied that it would very frequently occur that we would sell very large quantities of our hard wheat to the Minneapolis and Duluth millers to grind with wheat that they get further to the south. This is a matter we have to complain about all the time in Manitoba. The duty of 15 cents a bushel upon wheat is no help to us whatever, because the eastern millers are allowed to bring in any quantity of north-western hard wheat for use in their mills to mix with the soft wheat of eastern Canada so long as they export a corresponding quantity of flour. Thus the duty upon wheat, so far as Manitoba and the Territories are concerned, is simply a farce and a fraud. On the other hand, if we could have reciprocity, if the hon. gentleman would accept the offer from the United States which has been referred to, it would be a great advantage indeed to Manitoba and the Territories. We suffer from time to time from combinations among the wheat buyers, and this is often a matter of very great injury to the farmer. The wheat buyers, especially the large millers, combine to depress the price of wheat. If we had free entrance of wheat into the United States market we could overcome these combinations on the part of the local buyers, because it would be practically impossible to make a combine with the American buyers, who would be continually on hand, as circumstances might make it necessary or advisable for them to import quantities of our hard wheat.

Mr. McMILLAN (Huron). I sincerely hope that the Government will include wheat and wheat flour in the offer made to the Americans. As a farmer, I am convinced that we in Ontario derive no benefit from the duty on wheat, but that if the duty were removed a very large quantity of our wheat would go to the United States as it used to go in times past. It would be an advantage to us to have the duty on flour removed. We must raise our own wheat and sell it at the market price, and then buy our flour at the market price, which means that the protection to the millers must be paid for in the main by the farmers in Ontario. The farmers would be benefited by this change, the millers would be benefited, I believe, and all classes would reap advantage if we could get our wheat and flour into the United States free. The millers, I believe, would not object, as they have to import wheat from the United States and grind it in bond. I am convinced that the workingmen would get their bread cheaper if these articles were on the free list.

Mr. TAYLOR. I am not a farmer, like the hon. gentleman from Huron (Mr. McMillan); but I represent an agricultural district, and I know something of the wants of the farmer. I believe I voice the sentiments of the great body of farmers in Ontario when I say that they do want the duty on wheat simply to protect the home market. We all know that the American wheat ripens earlier than ours, and that it is on the market two or three weeks before the Canadian wheat. If there is a time in the year when wheat in Ontario is at a high price it is between the old and the new crops, and if we put wheat on the free list the Americans will force the wheat in and fill up the market so that every bushel of our wheat would have to be exported. My hon. friend, who is a practical farmer, and, as he says, a cattle feeder, argues now for free wheat. Yesterday he spoke in favour of putting corn and pease on the free list. But I know I voice the sentiments of the farmers of both political parties when I say that they want corn and pease, and wheat and every other cereal kept out of the country, unless we can get a corresponding advantage by having free access to the United States markets for our surplus of barley and hay.

Mr. CAMPBELL. So far as the millers of Ontario are concerned, I have not the least hesitation in saying that it would be a great advantage to them if they had the markets of the United States in which to sell their flour. And I believe the great majority of them would hold up both hands for reciprocity in this respect.

Mr. COCHRANE. Why do you want the duty on flour?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Well, I don't want the duty on flour.

Mr. COCHRANE. Because you are a Grit.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I have spoken against the duty on flour on more than one occasion. But I am speaking now about the question before the Chair, and that is, whether these two articles, wheat and wheat flour, should be included in the offer of reciprocity. Now, the Americans having made that proposition to us, it seems to me that we ought to accept it, and, speaking as a manufacturer of flour, I think I know what would benefit the trade better than the hon. gentleman from Northumberland (Mr. Cochrane), and I have no hesitation in saying that it would be a great advantage to them if reciprocity were established. So far as it being a disadvantage to the farmers is concerned, that is all moonshine.

Mr. FOSTER. Are the millers generally of your opinion?

Mr. CAMPBELL. I think they are—those that I am intimate with certainly are.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The Ontario millers are.

Mr. FOSTER. Not one in ten of them.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I think the Finance Minister is mistaken. I know that the large millers of Ontario would hail with satisfaction such an arrangement. As it is now, the great want of the milling industry of Ontario is a market. If we had access to Boston, Portland and the New England states generally, where they do not raise but little wheat and manufacture but little flour, we should have an unlimited market for our flour. We have in Ontario the red and white winter wheat, which, when mixed produce a flour peculiarly adapted for pastry, a flour that the Americans do not raise to such an extent. We could make as good flour as that made in the United States, and we could get it into these markets cheaper than the millers of the western states could. This arrangement would open up a wonderful market right at our own doors. So far as reducing the price of wheat is concerned, any person who looks at the market prices in Ontario and compares them with those in the western states will find that the prices there are fully as high as they are here. As the hon. member for Leeds stated, about harvest time, from local causes, perhaps, the price of wheat may be kept up, but the hon. gentleman forgets that at that time of the year not one farmer in ten has any wheat to sell. For my part I would be glad if the Government could see their way clear to place wheat and wheat flour in the schedule of free articles.

Mr. COCHRANE. The hon. member for Kent (Mr. Campbell) has just stated that at certain times wheat was so scarce in Ontario that not one farmer in ten had any wheat to sell. I want to say to that hon. gentleman that in my section of the country for the last two years, farmers have been feeding large quantities of wheat to hogs, because they had no market for it. He admits that at one time they received an advantage by having a duty on wheat; now, as a miller, that is just the time he has got to pay a little more to the farmers, and he wants the duty taken off so that he can supply himself from the United States with wheat, and that the Canadian farmer may not reap the advantage of the duty on wheat. As a farmer myself, I am opposed to the reduction in the duty on wheat. The hon. gentleman says that as a miller he does not want it, but it is as a politician that he does not want it, because he thinks he can make political capital out of it. Now, some years ago I went to the Government with a deputation of millers representing the whole milling industry of Ontario, and they argued strongly in favour of protection, because they said that, although we had a superior brand of flour, from the fact of the millers of the United States having a large market, they were able to make a strong brand of flour and put it into this country at a price our millers could not compete with. The Government acceded to the request, and raised the duty on flour 25 cents a barrel. Now, the hon. gentleman as a politician makes the statement that the millers do not want it.

Mr. WALLACE. The hon. member for Kent (Mr. Campbell) is a recent convert to his present opinion. I remember well when the duty on flour was 50 cents a barrel, and when there was an agitation to have that duty increased to a dollar a barrel, and the hon. member for Kent came to me and urged me to use all my influence to have the duty raised to a dollar a barrel.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I deny that statement in toto. I never spoke to you or any member of the Government about it.

Mr. WALLACE. The hon. gentleman may deny it as much as he pleases, and as often as he pleases—

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I rise to a point of order, and I think you will admit, Mr. Chairman, it is worthy of your consideration. The Controller made a statement affecting the hon. member for Kent, and the hon. member for Kent has informed the House that that statement was without foundation in fact. My point is that it is the duty of the Controller to withdraw his statement.

Mr. WALLACE. I made a statement, and the hon. gentleman contradicts me. He has no right to contradict me.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. We must first have that point of order decided.

Mr. WALLACE. I made a statement, and if the hon. member for Kent does not agree with that statement, he can get up in this House after I sit down, and repeat his statement as many times as he chooses.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). That is not on the point of order.

Mr. WALLACE. I am talking on the question I got up to speak about. I contend that I am entitled to make a statement in this House, knowing it to be true, and I again repeat that statement. Now, if the point of order is decided I will go on with my remarks.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It is merely a question as to something that transpired outside the House, it is not a question to any statement made in the House.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I understood the Controller of Customs to say that I came to him and requested him to use his influence to get the duty on flour increased from 50 cents to $1 a barrel; is that the statement?

Mr. WALLACE. That is practically the statement.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Then I give it a most emphatic denial, and I dare him to find any substantiation for it at all. I never spoke to him or any member of the Government, asking for an increase in the duty on flour; on the contrary, I have always voted against the flour duty on every occasion when I have been in the House.

Mr. COCHRANE.

Mr. INGRAM. The hon. gentleman denies that he did not come to Ottawa for the purpose of asking that the duty on flour be increased. I would ask him if the firm of Campbell, Stevens & Co., of Chatham, took any part in having the duty increased on flour?

Mr. CAMPBELL. None whatever, either by letter or by any other way.

Mr. INGRAM. The hon. gentleman says that he was never in favour of increasing the duty on flour.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Look at my votes in the House.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The hon. member for South Oxford has raised the point of order. I do not know really who is to be called to order, whether the hon. gentleman who makes the assertion or the hon. gentleman who denies the assertion. The statement in question was not made in the House, but made outside the House, and, therefore, we have nothing to do with it. We cannot decide which man is telling the truth.

Mr. LAURIER. I beg respectfully to take exception to your ruling. When a statement is made by one member and denied by another, the denial should be accepted.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The Chair has ruled on the question.

Mr. LAURIER. I take exception to the ruling of the Chairman.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. We have a right, on a question of order being raised, if we differ from your ruling, to have that matter settled by the Speaker, and I demand that that matter be settled by the Speaker. We have had it decided against us on this side often enough, I may inform you.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Allow me to suggest that we should proceed and that the question which has been raised should be decided afterwards.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. To be the first thing after dinner by way of sauce.

Mr. WALLACE. I will now offer a few further remarks to the committee. The hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) made the statement that there was wrong done to Canadian farmers by allowing wheat to be brought in from the United States, ground in bond, and an equivalent exported, so as to cancel the bond. If the hon. gentleman had read the customs regulations he would have found no such action was permitted, that no such equivalent is permitted to be exported, that sworn evidence must be adduced that the product of the imported wheat is exported and none other, in order to cancel the bond. The hon. member for Kent (Mr. Campbell) has stated that it would be a great advantage to the Canadian miller to have the United States markets for his flour. It would, however, be a great advantage to the American miller to have a Canadian market for his flour. What are the facts? Suppose a cargo of grain came from Duluth or Port Arthur. The freight rates during the past and even the present season are 2 cents cheaper per bushel to Buffalo than to Owen Sound, to the hon. gentleman's mill at Toronto Junction, as compared with a mill at Buffalo. That would be equivalent to 24 cents on each barrel of flour as an advantage which a Buffalo miller would have as compared with a miller in Toronto. Moreover, Buffalo is an important distributing point for the United States, and we have conclusive evidence that the freight rates from Buffalo to New York are less than Toronto; and, therefore, the Buffalo miller would not only have an advantage of 24 cents on each barrel of flour he manufactured, but he would have cheaper rates from Buffalo to American consuming points or American exporting points at the seaboard. These reductions would entirely drive out the Canadian miller, because I will venture to say there is not a Canadian miller making 24 cents profit per barrel on his flour, or perhaps half that amount. If, therefore, there were free trade between the two countries, the result would be simply this, that all Canadian mills now furnishing employment to our people would be driven across the line, or at all events they would be supplemented by the mills established at Buffalo, Minneapolis and other points. The Canadian miller would be turned out of his market, and the Canadian farmer who supplies the Canadian miller would also be deprived of his market or be compelled to carry on operations at a reduced profit. I do not believe you could find three millers in Canada who would be able to carry on business in Canada if we had free trade in wheat and flour. I am not aware out of eight hundred or a thousand millers in Canada that one miller would be ready to say that he wished to adopt the proposal made by the United States and have reciprocity in wheat and wheat flour. I do not know that the member for Kent (Mr. Campbell) gave his views to the Government on this question, but if he did, I am quite safe in saying that he cannot mention the name of a miller to-day who has gone to the Government and expressed the opinion that it would be beneficial for Canadian millers or for Canadian farmers that there should be free trade in wheat and wheat flour between Canada and the United States.

Mr. CHARLTON. We have had many theories advanced by the Controller of Customs. We have had, however, a statement made by a Canadian miller, not a theoretical statement, but a practical statement—

Mr. WALLACE. I have been a miller myself.

Mr. CHARLTON—that from his knowledge of the business it would be advantageous to the milling and farming interests if we had free trade in wheat and flour. With respect to this matter I want to furnish another item of practical information, not theory, to the hon. gentleman. One of the largest milling establishments in Ontario is situated in my riding; it consists of an oatmeal mill, a mill for manufacturing split pease and a very large flouring mill. I was informed by the manager of that mill not more than three months ago that if they had free access to the markets of New England for their flour, at that very time and upon that very day they could pay 5 cents a bushel more for wheat than they were able to pay then. That is practical information, that is the statement of a man thoroughly conversant with the trade, a man who said they could build up a business in the New England markets for all the products of their mill, oatmeal, split pease and wheat flour, and if they had access to those markets, they would be able to pay the farmer, not 55 cents, the price at that time, but 60 cents per bushel for his wheat. If that is the case, so far as this argument has gone the burden of proof is in favour of the removal of the duties. Hon. gentlemen may theorize all day, but facts of this kind have a direct and practical bearing on the question. The United States offer with respect to reciprocity is somewhat different from the offer contained in our proposed tariff Bill. Buckwheat, corn, cornmeal, oats, oatmeal, rye and rye flour, wheat and wheat flour are to be admitted at 20 per cent ad valorem, but each of the above products is to be admitted free of duty from any country which imposes no import duties on like products when exported from the United States. There is an offer of reciprocity, and an offer of reciprocity that I believe would be advantageous to Canada, if it were accepted; and, from all the information that has been presented to the committee during this discussion, I think we can only come to the conclusion that this offer should be accepted.

Mr. DAVIN. The statement of the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin), that it would be an advantage to Manitoba and the North-west, if there should be reciprocity in wheat, is a statement that I am not sure he could substantiate. I think that is very doubtful. My hon. friend from Eastern Assiniboia (Mr. McDonald), who is himself a farmer, has very strong views on this subject. A year or more ago I brought forward a little Bill in this House to do away with the system of allowing the millers to import wheat and grind it here and then export the product. I know that the customs regulations are as the hon. the Controller of Customs says; but is it of any advantage to Canada at present, or is it of any necessity for the millers of Ontario, that we should have that arrangement? If it be, it would be of advantage to us in Manitoba and the North-west that we should have that home market. My hon. friend from Northumberland (Mr. Cochrane) will, I am sure, agree with me in that. That arrangement was come to before Manitoba and the North-west were opened up, and the reason why it was come to originally was, because we could not produce in Canada the hard wheat that was produced in the United States, and it was necessary for the Ontario and Quebec miller that he should import the hard wheat. But now, when in our own North-west we can produce the very best "Red Fife No. 1 hard" in the world, taking prizes ahead of any wheat produced elsewhere, there is no reason whatever why the miller in Ontario or the miller in Quebec should be allowed this privilege, which is dead against the principle of the National Policy. The principle of the National Policy is to protect our native industries, to protect our farmers in regard to their products, in regard to their wheat. Here you have the North-west farmer—who certainly is the principal manufacturer up there—you have him, as he thinks anyway, handicapped by this arrangement. If there is any argument in the local market at all, our western farmer is handicapped by reason of this customs regulation. I would press it on the Finance Minister and I would press it on the Minister of Customs, whether they cannot get rid of this regulation and let our North-west and Manitoba farmers supply the hard wheat which is used by the millers of eastern Canada. Let me point out this: Suppose the flour were made from imported wheat alone, there would be no reason absolutely why we should allow the miller to import that wheat: nor is there any reason for doing so if the flour that is made from that wheat imported from the United States, is mixed with flour made from the softer wheat grown in Ontario, so as to improve the quality of the flour and enable it to obtain that quality necessary for the English market.

It being Six o'clock, the Committee rose, and the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READINGS.

Bill (No. 30) respecting the Atlantic and North-west Railway Company.—(Mr. Baker.)

Bill (No. 34) respecting the Bell Telephone Company of Canada.—(Mr. White, Cardwell.)

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (No. 76) to amend the Act to incorporate the Canada Provident Association.—(Sir James Grant.)

Bill (No. 80) to revive and amend the Act to incorporate the Rocky Mountain Railway and Coal Company.—(Mr. Davis.)

Bill (No. 84) to incorporate the Alliance of the Reformed Baptist Church of Canada, and the several churches connected therewith.—(Mr. Colter.)

Bill (No. 85) to incorporate the Boynton Bicycle Electric Railway Company.—(Mr. Gillies.)

WAYS AND MEANS—THE TARIFF.

House again in Committee of Ways and Means.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. DAVIN. When you rose at Six o'clock, Mr. Chairman, I was calling the attention of the committee to the fact that last year I moved that this House resolve itself into committee to consider the following resolution:—

That it is expedient to amend the Customs Act, 49 Victoria, chapter 32, so as to prevent the importation of wheat, maize or other grain in bond, as now provided by the 93rd section of the said Act.

I called attention on that occasion to the fact that when this clause was inserted in the Customs Act, the North-west had not been opened up and become what it is to-day, the great wheat granary, not merely for Canada, but for the world. The argument used at that time in Parliament and out of Parliament by members in the Government, by members supporting the Government, and by the 'Mail' newspaper, which was then the leading organ of the Government, in favour of this course, was this: that the arrangement could only be temporary, because the North-west would be rapidly opened up and would be able to supply sufficient hard wheat for the millers of Ontario and Quebec. Now, the North-west has been opened up, and we are able from Manitoba and the North-west to supply all the hard wheat that the millers of Ontario and Quebec can desire. Last year, at the suggestion of my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior, I withdrew the motion, he saying that the Government would consider the matter during the recess. I would now press strongly on the attention of the Finance Minister and the Controller of Customs whether they cannot in this matter meet the views of the farmers of Manitoba and the North-west. Either one of two things is true; either a great deal of wheat comes in, and therefore it would be of great advantage to the farmers of the North-west, or very little wheat comes in, which I believe to be the case, and is ground in the manner arranged for a short time ago, when it was found that the millers were evading the original arrangement. If it is a small amount, then there is a strong reason for doing away with what is an irritation to many of our people. Last year, I remember, my hon. friend from East Grey (Mr. Sproule), in dealing with the subject, used the argument that it was convenient to the western millers along the line that they should be able to bring in wheat in order to grind it in bond. I am inclined to think that the convenience of my hon. friend spoke of is not of such importance as the doing away with the inconsistency in our customs legislation and removing an irritant from the North-west.

Mr. McMULLEN. In connection with the duty upon wheat and flour, I wish to draw the attention of the House to a paragraph in the speech of the Finance Minister, a few evenings ago, on the question of reciprocity. The hon. gentleman, on that occasion, endeavoured to persuade the House and the country that this Government were only too anxious, on every opportunity, to show their disposition to treat fairly and equitably with the United States. The hon. gentleman then said :

No matter whether the indications point in a certain way or not, they know all about it, and declare that the motive and wish and desire of the Government is to prevent any enlarged trade relations with the United States.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Most assuredly.

Mr. FOSTER. How do they know ?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Because of your acts.

Mr. FOSTER. The tendency of our acts is entirely in the other direction, and every unprejudiced observer and reader will recognize it, and will see that only the perversity of hon. gentlemen opposite appears in the assertions to the contrary—that is all. They declare that we have no desire for extended trade relations, that we never had, that every effort of ours has been rather to frustrate extended trade between the two countries. That is all declamation, but it does not win any credit and does not affect the truth of the matter, or the reading of history, one iota. I tell these hon. gentlemen, who make these assertions, that they are entirely mistaken. The Government—and I think I know what has taken place—have been anxiously desirous for enlarged trade relations between this country and the United States, but they have been anxiously desirous, in doing it, that no interest of Canada should be sacrificed without a corresponding advantage.

That is the first part of his speech. I will now read another part :

When they look over the items in our tariff, as it shall have passed this House, they will find that, line after line, article after article, grade after grade, we have given them a better chance to get into our market than they have given us to get into their market. Consequently legislative reciprocity, so far as trade is concerned, shines out from the propositions that the Government put before the House to-day, in a far greater degree than it does out of the legislation which they have proposed and which is in progress through their Congress.

That plainly shows that the Minister of Finance attempted to lead the House and the country to believe that any offer in the direction of reciprocity made by the United States would be fairly and fully met by the Government of Canada. He says that, item after item, we have endeavoured to meet them in the matter of reciprocity. Why, Sir, here are two items which have been placed in the free list by the United States, and which do not appear in ours. The hon. gentleman himself admits that wheat and flour are two items now in the Wilson Bill, before the Congress of the United States, and we have the declaration of Congress that if we are prepared to allow American wheat and flour to come free into our country, the Americans, in return, will receive our wheat and flour without duty. The hon. Minister of Finance, after making the extended and somewhat heated utterances which he made the other night on this question, now comes down and proposes to put 15 cents per bushel on wheat and 75 cents per barrel on flour, and that in the face of the American offer to admit those two commodities from Canada free of duty, if we will only reciprocate in like manner. It seems to be necessary to treat the Finance Minister in the same way as the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) is said to have treated an hon. gentleman who once had a seat in this House. He said : I never took any stock in what the hon. member said, but waited to see what he did. We will have to treat the Finance Minister in the same way. While, the other night, he tried to create the impression that the Government were willing and anxious to meet the Americans fairly and fully, to-night he moves in the very opposite direction by placing this duty of 15 cents per bushel on wheat and 75 cents per barrel on flour.

Mr. SPROULE. The hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin), if I understood him correctly, contended that it would be to the advantage of the farmer in Manitoba and the North-west Territories, if the duty were taken off wheat and we had the freedom of the American market. I think that the hon. gentleman can hardly have considered the fact that to-day the farmers of Manitoba and the North-west largely supply the millers of Ontario with wheat. And were it not for the fact that there is a duty on American wheat, the Ontario millers, instead of importing from Manitoba and the North-west, would purchase a large portion of their wheat from the western states, and bring it in over the Soo line. As one interested in milling, I know, as a fact, that were it not for the duty, many of us would bring in wheat from the western states, or a considerable portion of it, instead of from Manitoba and the North-west. And every bushel of wheat brought from the western states would take the place of a bushel now grown by the farmers of Manitoba and the North-west. I cannot understand how the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin), knowing the condition of things in the west and in Ontario, can stand up in this House and say that it would be for the benefit of the western farmers if this duty were taken off wheat. Every year we find an increasing demand in Ontario for the wheat grown in the west, especially No. 1 hard, which we require to mix with the soft wheat of Ontario in order to make a class of flour largely sold here. But if we had the privilege of bringing in American wheat, we would take a considerable quantity of it instead of purchasing the Manitoba and North-west article.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Is that a patriotic thing to do ?

Mr. SPROULE. It is that kind of patriotism that touches our pockets, and the National Policy is a policy intended to apply to every part of the country, and we in Ontario are willing, as far as possible, to work into the hands of the people in that western section by taking what they raise, they in return taking our products. The hon. member for Kent (Mr. Campbell) made the statement that when an effort was put forth some years ago to induce the Minister of Finance to raise the duty on flour from 50 to 75 cents per barrel, he was not in favour of it. If that be the case—and I pause for a reply in case I should have misapprehended his statement—I would draw the hon. gentleman's attention to the fact that his firm was a member of the Millers' Association of Ontario at that time, and that when that question was brought up before the association in Toronto, and there discussed, the association passed a unanimous resolution—

Mr. CAMPBELL. The hon. gentleman is mistaken again, as he always is. I never was and am not now a member of the Millers' Association.

Mr. SPROULE. All I can say is that, if I am not mistaken, the firm of Campbell Bros. is down as members of that association. But perhaps I may be mistaken, or it may be some other men of the same name. When the Millers' Association passed that resolution unanimously, asking the Government to raise the duty from 50 cents to $1 per barrel, so as to have it proportionate to the amount of duty on wheat, there was no opposition. A delegation was appointed to come down to Ottawa, and I accompanied that delegation, and endeavoured to induce the Government to raise the duty from 50 cents to $1. They met us half way and raised it to 75 cents. In my own part of the country, many millers desired this increase. I had letters from members of the association, one of which belonged to the Plewes family—and all the members of that family that I know are Reformers—urging me to press upon the Government the importance of increasing this duty, on the ground that it was a great injustice to the millers to leave it as it was, the American millers having decided advantages over those in Canada. One substantial advantage possessed by the American miller at that time, which was urged as a reason for increasing the duty from 50 cents per barrel to $1 per barrel, was in the freight rate. It cost 35 cents a barrel to send flour from Toronto to Montreal, whereas the millers of Minneapolis, nearly 600 miles west of Toronto, could send flour from their mills to Montreal at the same rate. If the flour were taken further east, to Boston, the advantage afforded to the western miller in respect of freight rates was still greater. Without the increased duty the Canadian miller was greatly handicapped in competing in the market of the Maritime Provinces. I was not aware that any miller in Ontario did not want this increase in the duty, and this is the first time I have ever heard an Ontario miller express himself as opposed to it. If Campbell Bros. were opposed to it, I certainly never heard of it before.

Mr. TISDALE. The speech of my hon. friend from Grey (Mr. Sproule) reminds me of another argument which was presented by the Millers' Association on this subject. I wish to place their arguments on record here, for I confess that the facts they presented convinced me that the duty was not high enough. They pointed out, with a great deal of truth, I believe, that the greatest trouble with respect to the importation of American flour, was that the Americans sent in an inferior grade. Those who know anything about wheat, know that in the United States, where there is so much more wheat grown than in our country, there is a large quantity of it that is not of a grade that will make first-class flour, and the members of the Millers' Association complained that, with the low rate of duty, the American millers were able to send in here an inferior quality and place it in the market in competition with better flour. Now, I wish to say a few words with reference to the speech of the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen). The hon. gentleman, let me say, at times argues yet does not commit himself. I wish to learn definitely whether he is convinced by his own argument? Is the hon. gentleman prepared to stand up in his place in the House and say that, as things stand now, he is in favour of having the duty removed from wheat and flour? I sit down in order to give him an opportunity to reply.

Mr. McMULLEN. In my remarks I was pointing out the inconsistency of the hon. Minister of Finance. He intimated the other night that the Government were prepared to meet the United States—

Mr. TISDALE. Will the hon. gentleman answer my question ?

Mr. McMULLEN. If the hon. gentleman will keep his seat, I will try and answer him. The Finance Minister said the Government were ready to meet the United States in every possible way in order to extend the trade relations of the two countries. I am in favour of extended trade relations with the United States. I am in favour of it whether we get it by treaty or by legislative enactment in the two countries. When they meet us fairly, I am in favour of meeting them in the same spirit. If the extension of our trade relations has to commence by freeing wheat and flour, I am willing to commence in that way, and I am willing to keep on until the farmers of this country will be released from the tariff shackles they now wear.

Mr. TISDALE. The hon. gentleman has created an impression of being, if possible, still more indefinite. Moreover, he is unfair in endeavouring to misconstrue what the Finance Minister said. If there is one thing I like more than another among practical men, it is to have an open and candid statement of opinion upon the points at issue, instead of finding them trying to hide their opinions beneath a mass of words. What the Finance Minister said is that we will meet the Americans in a fair way. Does the hon. gentleman argue that it is a fair way to allow the Americans to choose certain articles, the freeing of which will undoubtedly be in their favour, and against the interests of our farmers, and expect us to remove the duties from these articles when they give us nothing in return? That is what the hon. gentleman is saying. I dare him to stand up in his place and give a plain, practical answer to my question. I wish to talk practically about this matter. For my part, I am prepared to commit myself on any and every one of these items, so that the people of the country may know where I stand. If I am wrong, I am willing to accept the adverse verdict of the people; and if I am right, I do not wish to hide what I say. Let the hon. gentleman stand up in his place like a man, like a representative of the people, and state, as it is his duty to do, exactly what he means. Is he prepared at the present time, under the present tariff conditions, to declare to the farmers of the country that he wants the Government to take the duty off wheat and flour? I know very well that if I should meet him, or if any gentleman should meet him on the platform and should accuse him of being in favour of this, he would refer us to his speech, which is so involved, so loaded with words, so unfair that he can prove anything he likes by it; he is committed to nothing. I took up no time in this House in the general tariff discussion, and I want to appeal to these hon. gentlemen opposite as good, sound Canadians—and I believe a good many of them are such—to allow us to get this tariff through, so that the people of this country may know where their business interests stand. We on this side are prepared to take the responsibility of this tariff. We know that if we are wrong the people will condemn us. Load us with the responsibility, if you call it such, and do not keep this House, day after day, and week after week, discussing these matters, with the country all this time in suspense. If the hon. gentlemen will not do this, then I say—and I say it with no desire to gain any political advantage—that they will compel many to form the opinion—which I have not formed yet, but which I must form if they continue their present policy—that they are trying to delay the tariff so as to produce, if possible, disaster and loss to the business men of the community. Let them throw the responsibility upon us; it will be so much the better for them if they are right. But I appeal to them to finish up this work so that the business interests of the country may revive. If the law is found to be a bad one, the country will punish us for it afterwards. I am a practical man; I do not pretend to be much of a politician. But as a Canadian, I beg of them—and I believe that there are gentlemen on that side who, unless some question of party management intervenes, will agree with me—to assist us in getting through this business speedily, leaving us to bear the responsibility, of which we are not afraid.

Mr. DENISON. I would like to endorse what the last speaker has said as to the desirability of getting these tariff resolutions through. With that view, I think the House ought to continue this discussion day by day and allow private members' business to stand over until we are through with the tariff discussion. I know that in places like Toronto and other large business centres the people are very anxious that the tariff should be settled one way or the other. At present they are in doubt; they do not know exactly what to do; and, therefore, all business plans are disarranged. I am satisfied it is not the wish of Opposition members to embarrass the business men of the country. Their wish would be, entirely free from politics, that the business of the country should go on successfully. But, if we have one or two days only taken up with the tariff, and the remainder of the week devoted to private members' business, the conclusion of these tariff resolutions must be delayed and the anxiety of business men prolonged. I would like to impress upon the committee, as a Toronto man, and as one knowing the feelings of the people of Toronto, the desirability of going on with this discussion day by day, if possible, and reaching a conclusion of this debate as soon as we can.

Mr. McMULLEN. I would like to say a few words in reply to the hon. member for South Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale). I am sure the hon. member is possessed of sufficient perception to enable him to understand what I said. He has tried to make the House and the country believe that I sought to evade a question put to me. I am not in the witness-box before my hon. friend, and I have the right to answer or not, as I choose; and I have answered the hon. gentleman frankly. The hon. gentleman will not deny that the Government of which he is a supporter, sent some of its members to Washington professedly for the purpose of renewing the old reciprocity treaty. Among the items made free by that old treaty were wheat and wheat flour. I am in favour of renewing that treaty, if it could be done. Is the hon. gentleman in favour of renewing it? Will he answer that question? Did the Government send its representatives to Washington without consulting the hon. gentleman? They surely must have done so. He is not in favour of the renewal of that treaty evidently, because he is not in favour of the free exchange of flour and wheat.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). He says it would ruin the farmer.

Mr. McMULLEN. Yes; the hon. gentleman says it would ruin the farmers. And yet the Government of which the hon. gentleman is a supporter went to Washington in order to negotiate a treaty of that very kind. I would be very glad if a treaty of that kind could be secured. I am willing to take it piecemeal, if I cannot do better, and am willing to begin with wheat and flour; and, when these are got, I will try to get the rest as soon as possible.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I desire to say a word in answer to the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Denison) and the hon. member for South Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale). I agree with them that the sooner you arrive at a definite basis the better; but I would like to point out to these hon. gentlemen, that this may be easily accomplished without attempting to stifle the expression of opinion from this side of the House. My suggestion is to the Finance Minister. He has a devoted following behind him, and I feel persuaded that, if he had insisted upon putting through these resolutions in the form in which they were first submitted, they would have become the law of the land amidst the enthusiastic applause of his supporters. The difficulty in the way has been that the hon. gentleman himself did not maintain his ground. If the Finance Minister has made up his mind what changes he wants and will announce to-night that he will make certain changes and no others, the whole difficulty will be got over at once. I throw out the suggestion to the Finance Minister that, if the present discussion imposes any disability upon the business interests of the country, it is within his power to remove that disability.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. member for West Toronto seems disposed to allow the Finance Minister to do about as he likes in this matter. I suppose the hon. member has some convictions as to what the tariff ought to be. If the hon. Minister of Finance will announce what the tariff is to be, then the information which the hon. gentleman says it is so very desirable should be given to the country, will be given. But the whole cause of the difficulty to which the hon. gentleman from West Toronto refers, is that the Finance Minister has not adhered to the conclusions at which he first arrived. The Finance Minister had an opportunity to consult the various interests of the country for several months. The results of his consultation are embodied in the tariff as at first presented. But since then the hon. gentleman has met with various deputations and has been induced to reconsider the proposals which he submitted to the House and to make important changes. I dare say the hon. gentleman from West Toronto will support these changes, when they are presented, as enthusiastically as he would have supported the original propositions, had they gone through as brought down. Now, I do not know whether the hon. gentleman has the most implicit confidence in the judgment of the Finance Minister—I am not questioning the Finance Minister's judgment—but I may call the hon. gentleman's attention to this fact, that hon. members on this side have opinions on this subject. They have expressed those opinions to the country, and their constituents coincide with the views they have expressed. So far as possible, they wish to have these views carried into effect. We know that the effort, so far as the House is concerned, may not be a very successful one, in fact, it may be a very unsuccessful one. But, while we may not expect to make much impression upon my hon. friend's mind, we have great hopes, so far as the country is concerned; in fact, we believe the great majority of the people in the country are with us on this question.

Mr. SPROULE. You thought that before.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I do not think my hon. friend from Grey (Mr. Sproule) ought to interrupt me. The hon. gentleman has informed the House that if it were not for the restraining effect of the law he would do that in his own interest which he thinks would be a great detriment to the country. He says the interests of his pocket are against this legislation, and, therefore, he asks us to restrain the avaricious propensities which he has so frankly expressed to the House and assist him to do what he feels is his real duty, and refrain from bringing wheat from the United States. Then, the hon. gentleman made another statement which is well worthy the attention of the House. We have contributed over $100,000,000 from the public treasury in aiding the construction of highways for commerce, and the hon. gentleman now tells us that, so far as those highways are concerned they are not to be compared with similar highways in the United States.

Mr. SPROULE. I do not wish the hon. gentleman to misrepresent me. I made no such statement. I was comparing the freight rates.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). It is of the freight rates I am speaking. The hon. gentleman says that in order to get grain to the mills in Owen Sound it costs 3 cents more than to send to Buffalo, and to Toronto Junction it costs 5 cents more. And thus he declares, the Canadian miller is handicapped to such an extent that it is not possible for him to enter into competition in a free market with the millers of the United States. I do not admit that view. I say to the hon. gentleman frankly that I believe it would be in the interests of the agricultural population if we had free trade in agricultural products, including wheat, that the farmers would be better off and the millers would be quite as well off. Does the hon. gentleman pretend to say that the millers of Ontario, if there was free interchange of those products between Canada and the United States, would not in a large degree get possession of the New England markets? An hon. member has spoken of inferior and cheap flour being introduced into those markets. Does the hon. gentleman pretend to say that the people of New England are willing to consume an inferior article? Has the hon. gentleman looked into the subject? If so, he has formed an altogether mistaken opinion, and I venture to say that if we were to establish reciprocal free trade in flour the people of Canada would at least derive as much advantage from such an exchange as the people of the United States. That arrangement would afford a great convenience to the people of both countries. But I wish to call the attention of the committee to this fact, that the Finance Minister and the hon. gentleman (Mr. Tisdale) have spoken about free trade in natural products and have enunciated the doctrine that was presented by Mr. Colby, who was defeated in the subsequent election by an overwhelming majority, which was that in the event of free interchange of agricultural products with the United States great injury would be done to this country, and yet the hon. gentleman opposite went to the country for the purpose of negotiating a treaty which was intended to accomplish those calamitous results and bring about those great evils which hon. gentlemen opposite now state would befall the people of this country. I do not subscribe to the views of hon. gentlemen opposite. I contend that those articles should go on the free list, that they are important articles to exchange. It has been asserted by hon. gentlemen opposite that the farms of Ontario are not producing wheat to the same extent as formerly. Why? Because mutual prohibitory legislation between the two countries has rendered wheat growing less profitable than it was. I declare that every statement of this kind will show the people of Canada how utterly illusory are the pretensions of hon. gentlemen opposite, that they are in favour of either a liberal or illiberal treaty of reciprocity. Not an hour goes by, scarcely a discussion is heard without some article which formerly it was declared in the interests of the people should be placed on the free list, being declared to be unsuitable for the free list. The hon. member for South Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale) must have a very extraordinary constituency if they are prepared to endorse the views enunciated to-night. The hon. gentleman accused my hon. friend from Wellington with seeking to conceal his views, and declared he was speaking ambiguously. My hon. friend was perfectly explicit in his statements. He declared himself in favour of making wheat and flour articles of free interchange between the two countries, but the hon. gentleman has expressed a very different opinion, one which no rural constituency in Ontario will endorse.

Mr. DENISON. I am afraid I have been misunderstood by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills). What I was trying to impress on the committee was the necessity of sitting from day to day until the tariff resolutions were passed, not so much that I desire in any way to stifle the speeches or exceptions taken by hon. gentlemen opposite. Possibly some of their arguments may be so convincing that they will induce the Minister of Finance to make some changes, and I should like possibly some changes myself. It is not, however, with any such desire that I made the suggestion, but simply with the object of having the tariff settled, for whether there is one change or a dozen, so long as the tariff is unsettled that fact must tend to unsettle business affairs.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). It should have been settled in the speech.

Mr. TISDALE. At the risk of wearying the committee, I wish to answer what I consider are the only arguments that have been presented by the hon. gentleman on the question before the committee. First, as to the question asked me by the hon. gentleman, I may say that it has nothing whatever to do with the item under discussion. I am prepared to accept on the general question a fair reciprocity treaty. That is all I propose to say on that point. If I may be permitted to give my views as to the manner in which the discussion should be conducted with a view to adopting the items in the tariff, I would say that the items as they are presented should be considered and passed upon. Far be it, however, for me to desire to stifle discussion. These general propositions, nevertheless, occupy much time, and such propositions, including the general question of reciprocity, can be fully discussed on resolutions that can be offered subsequently or at any time. I am not objecting to the course adopted by hon. gentlemen opposite, if they choose to insist on following it, for it is within their rights; but I ask them as business men, for I am a man of affairs, more than a politician or a debater, to take the items up in that way and pass upon them. When these items have been passed, then would be a proper time to have a full discussion on general principles, and, of course, it should be remembered that we had a long discussion before we reached the tariff, which was proper. Let us be business men, and take up these items and discuss them, and of course hon. gentlemen on this side of the House have to assume the responsibility, as they are in the majority. The hon. member for Brant (Mr. Paterson) was not. I think, quite as fair as he usually is, when he accused the Finance Minister of being able to curtail the discussion by making certain statements. The hon. gentleman, who is an older parliamentarian than I am, is doubtless well aware that the Finance Minister from day to day takes up the items. Hon. gentlemen who know all the changes that are proposed, because the Finance Minister is obliged to give notice of them, and so long as notice is given hon. gentlemen opposite have full chance to prepare their statements on the propositions, and if the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) and the Finance Minister changed places, the former, being a business man and an old parliamentarian, would pursue the course followed by the present Minister, as it is the business-like and proper way of carrying on the discussion. I am prepared to assume my share of the responsibility in regard to this matter, and my constituents and the country may judge of my action. I respect the Finance Minister, hon. gentlemen opposite respect him, and the people of the country respect him all the more for having changed, if he found sufficient reason for doing so, any proposition which he submitted to the House, especially when these were consistent with the pledges he has given. The Finance Minister said there should be a thorough revision of the tariff after the Government had consulted all interests. The hon. gentleman has consulted the different interests of the country, but there remains still a very important interest to be consulted. Under our system, which is the finest in the world, the Government takes the responsibility for the tariff: The Finance Minister brings his programme down and it is not until it is brought down to the House that in many cases he can have a chance of consulting the House in connection with it. He would make a very poor Finance Minister indeed who, in framing a whole tariff, or what is almost as difficult, remodelling it, was so strong-minded that he thought he knew all about it, and would pay no attention to the representations of the House, or the manufacturers or the farmers of the country. Why do not hon. gentlemen opposite let us proceed with this tariff, so as to relieve the business interests of the country, and then, if they think we make mistakes, let them point them out and speak on the general principle. We have not had in this country the financial difficulties which is the sad experience of other countries, but still it is a critical time for us; and at this period of the year the business men want to know the course of trade and to make their purchases, so that it is of the utmost importance that they should know what tariff law should pass this House. I do submit to hon. gentlemen opposite that as fellow-Canadians they should help us to get through with this work. It cannot prejudice their position if they assist us in expediting business, because there will be plenty of time and opportunity for them to make any onslaught they wish on the position of the Government. I hope that hon. members opposite will give me credit for not having wandered from the subject under discussion, but let me say to the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills): that we discussed the question of the sort of reciprocity hon. members opposite wanted to give the country in my riding before last election and I had the pleasure of increasing a majority which in that riding ranged from 20 to 40 ever since confederation, to something over 400, in consequence of the policy which the Liberal party were at that time advocating.

Mr. EDGAR. I do like the lectures which we have received from the last two supporters of the Government who have spoken. They propose to tell us how to discuss the tariff, and the way they suggest that we should discuss it is the way they are discussing it on the other side of the House, that is: by saying nothing at all about it. The hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) is perhaps the only member on that side of the House whom I have heard attempting to discuss the items of the tariff. Hon. gentlemen on the other side wish us to do as they are doing; they shut their eyes, open their mouths and swallow whatever the Finance Minister and the Controller of Customs drop in. The hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House were not consulted before this tariff was introduced. They did not know whether it was going to be a reduction or an increase of the protective duty, or whether the old tariff was to remain as it was; but whatever it might be, they were ready to cheer it when it came down. Whatever clerical errors were in it they were ready to cheer, and whatever changes are introduced from day to day by the Minister of Finance they are ready to cheer also. It would probably do us all good to hear a little independent criticism of the way in which we conduct our proceedings in this House, and I trust you will pardon me if I read from the Montreal 'Star' an extract which is somewhat apropos to this discussion.

Mr. FOSTER. Is this on the item of wheat?

Mr. EDGAR. Yes, this is on the item of wheat. It says:

When the Finance Minister discovers that the interests of the country demand that the duty on a certain article shall be changed from a specific duty to an ad valorem duty they sing:

So say we all of us,
So say we all of us,
So say we all.

And when the hon. gentleman discovers a clerical error, and rectifies it by restoring the specific duty in place of the newly adopted ad valorem duty again they sing in manly unison:

So say we all of us,
So say we all of us,
So say we all.

Have they no opinions about live hogs, or pork, or lard, or tallow, or beeswax of their own? They wouldn't have the presumption? They surrendered their right of private judgment on pork and beeswax when they accepted the doctrine of the "infallibility of the Government." They were not consulted in the framing of the tariff, and they do not want to be consulted about swallowing it. That a political party should be unanimous on general political principles is wonderful enough, but that they should nearly all without previous consultation have precisely the same ideas, and all make the same mistakes and all repeat them at the same time about the duties on lard compounds must strike the intelligent Chinaman as one of the most remarkable developments of western civilization.

Even if we are a little clumsy about the way in which we are discussing this tariff, yet we are trying to discuss it honestly and to do our duty by our constituents and for their benefit, so that I think these two hon. gentlemen (Mr. Tisdale and Mr. Denison) had better let us discharge our duty in this House as we think fit.

Mr. ALLAN. In my opinion there is no cereal, except barley, which it is more important we should have a market in the United States for than wheat. Having been an attentive observer of the prices of wheat in the Canadian and American markets, I know that there is often a great difference in favour of the American market, and sometimes the Detroit market gives fully 10 cents a bushel over the Essex market. Hon. gentlemen will remember that although they are large exporters of wheat in the United States, yet speculative values prevail for more than half the year, and frequently the prices are far above those of Liverpool. It is only last week that in the speculative market both in New York and Chicago prices advanced 6 or 7 cents above the shipping basis. This was at a time when any one in Canada, having wheat stored in their warehouses along our railroads, or at any shipping point, could deliver it in these markets and obtain the benefit of the high price then prevailing if we had free trade in that article of produce. Under the present condition of things we are prevented from doing that. We have in the Dominion no regular market for wheat, except we sell to the millers, and in every case we have to make a special bargain. When the quotations are given on the daily exchanges in New York or Detroit or Buffalo, dealers in wheat could very often sell "May futures" at an advance of 10 cents a bushel over the cash prices, and by keeping it in their warehouses, there would be a certain profit even after calculating interest and the charges for storage. The large premiums for carrying charges being a good profit in itself. I fully believe that in almost any year—except when we have a short crop at home—the farmers would realize for their wheat 2 or 3 cents, and sometimes 5 cents a bushel more, if we had the market of the United States at our command. How this duty on wheat affects the millers I am not prepared to say, but having been in the grain trade for 25 years, I am fully persuaded that if we had free trade in wheat and had an opportunity of selling in the New York or Detroit or Chicago markets, at times when the speculative prices are above the shipping prices, as they are to-day, it would be a great advantage to our wheat-growers. I may point out that in Chicago to-day and for some time past the price of wheat is higher than the Liverpool market. I think it is a great mistake not to meet the offer of the United States in regard to wheat and flour. I cannot understand why the Government should refuse to have free exchange in these products unless it is to keep up the delusion that they are doing something for the farmer. Outside of corn and pork, agricultural protection amounts to very little, although, as long as the Americans retain duties on wheat, flour, oats, etc., I think on the whole it is just as well for us to have duties upon them also. But if we had free trade in wheat, I firmly believe that in three years out of five the farmers of Canada would get 3 or 4 cents a bushel more for their wheat, and dealers would have more certainty in buying grain. They would know what the wheat cost at home, and they would know the prices of futures in New York and other American exchanges. There is no such market in Toronto or Montreal; you cannot in those cities or in any part of Canada sell wheat in that way. You would not be obliged to find a miller to make a bargain with, but in the markets of the United States, the sellers of wheat would have a certain profit from day to day. I think the Government should accept the proposition. For one I am a supporter of free exchange in wheat and flour.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I think the hon. member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar) hardly did justice to the argument of my two hon. friends, the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Denison) and the hon. member for South Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale), who urged expedition in the matter of dealing with this tariff. Those hon. gentlemen distinctly stated that what they urged was not at all that the discussion should be abridged, or that we should be unenlightened by the remarks of our hon. friends opposite, but that the House should from day to day hear them out of respect for the arguments they contained. The hon. gentleman, reading to us from the article in the Montreal 'Star,' was unduly attracted by the poetic passages in that article, and confined his quotation to the poetry, a circumstance we are not surprised at, considering the high reputation that the hon. gentleman has himself already acquired in this country as an author of political verse. Were it not for that taste on the part of the hon. gentleman, he would have read the rest of the article, which closes thus :

The course of the Opposition members, if less monotonous, is equally simple. It is not expected of them that they shall agree with each other so long as they agree in disagreeing with George Eulas Foster. Some of them can pitch into him for making a duty too high and some for not making it higher. This adds a pleasant variety to the debate and relieves George Eulas Foster from any doubts he might otherwise have of the wisdom of trying to frame a tariff which would be acceptable to Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition.

Mr. CASEY. This wheat tax is emphatically one of the sham taxes. It is a sham that has endured during the whole lifetime of the so-called National Policy, and that has only on very rare occasions been of the least benefit to the farmer—those occasions when the supply in Canada was not equal to the demand, and when the benefits that accrued to the farmer had to come largely out of the pockets of the labouring classes, who find it difficult enough to buy their daily bread. Now, let us look at the effect of this tax for the past year. We find that wheat to the value of $8,160 was imported into Canada, of which $3,815 worth went to British Columbia; the duty on the whole quantity being $1,359 and on British Columbia's share $698. Of flour, $127,000 worth was imported, the duty paid being $25,880; of this $71,500 worth went to British Columbia, on which the duty paid was $14,767. Of bran and mill feed, $29,600 worth was imported, paying a duty of $5,920; of this, $26,096 worth, nearly all, went to British Columbia, on which the duty paid was $5,217. On the whole, we imported $165,000 worth of wheat, flour and bran, on which the duty paid was $33,000. Of this duty British Columbia paid $20,682, or about two-thirds of the whole, although the proportion which the population of that province bears to the population of the rest of the Dominion is extremely small. I quote the figures with regard to British Columbia, merely to show that the effect of this tax is only to yield a revenue at places where the convenience of obtaining these supplies from the United States is so much greater than that of obtaining them from any part of Canada, that the consumer is almost compelled to import; and it has no effect at all on the price obtained by the Canadian farmer. It does not belong to that class of taxes which the hon. Minister of Finance in his Budget speech professed that he was going to impose—taxes for the encouragement of home industries, without regard to the revenue. This is a tax which has produced a petty revenue, which has been local in its effects, and which has not increased the profits of the Canadian producers of similar articles. It is quite unnecessary to go into figures to prove to this House that the prices of Canadian wheat and flour are ruled in Liverpool. It is quite unnecessary to tell any intelligent Canadian that through a series of many years the prices of wheat and flour of similar qualities have been uniformly higher in Detroit, Buffalo, Oswego, and New York than in corresponding points in Canada—comparing, for instance, Detroit with London, Buffalo and Oswego with Hamilton and Toronto and Montreal with New York. Whether those higher prices be due to better freight rates or not, I do not know, but at any rate they exist. There has been, therefore, no reason to fear the flooding of Canada with American grain of a higher price than that produced in Canada, and no possible benefit could accrue to the Canadian farmer except in those infrequent years when, owing to some catastrophe of the weather or something else, our crop is not sufficient for our own needs. Looking at the sectional effect of this tax, the small revenue it yields, and its uselessness to the Canadian farmer, I cannot help repeating the assertion that it is a sham tax. It is a tax to make the farmer believe that he gets something in return for the high duties he pays upon many of the necessaries of life. We all admit that the farmer is very heavily taxed on his supplies, and this is one of the attempts to make him believe that he is recouped. Fortunately for the country these attempts to humbug the farmer have led him to organize. The grangers have had their attention turned to this matter. The Patrons of Industry, organized with the object of making the voting power of the farmers felt, have had their attention drawn to it. And that has taken place, which I ventured a good many years ago to predict, namely, that after a period of yielding, on the part of the farmer, to the organized dictation of the manufacturers, the time would come when the farmers would organize and show their strength, and show that they understood the principles involved in the tariff and the small benefits they got out of it. I do not think that it is desirable that there should be a war of classes—a war of producers against consumers; of those who produce raw material against those who produce manufactured goods. It is very unfortunate that such a class of warfare should have been inaugurated, but it has been through the fault of the Government. The Government have taken a stand on the side of the manufactured products, and those who have them to sell against natural products and those who have them to sell. The reason I could easily give,—however unparliamentary it might be to state it,—in the simplest language. But it may not be unparliamentary to say that the Government have found it easier to obtain supplies for their campaigns from the small number of organized manufacturers than from the large number of unorganized farmers.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Order.

Mr. CASEY. I am stating what is well-known. I am pointing out the facts that the manufacturers, as a rule, have subscribed largely to Government election funds and that the farmers have not done so. It would be impossible to canvass the millions of farmers throughout the country, but it is an easy matter to get a few of the leading manufacturers together and arrive at an understanding with them. While that understanding with the manufacturers is arrived at privately, in Star Chamber consultations between the Government and the manufacturers—

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. We get their votes.

Mr. CASEY. You get the votes of manufacturers, yes.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. And of the farmers.

Mr. CASEY. I beg to dispute that assertion. I think that if the total vote polled for the Government at the last election were stripped of all those concerned in manufactures, or who are residents of the cities, and not farmers, the hon. gentleman would find that even at the last election he did not get the votes of the farmers, by which he means of course the majority of their votes. It is useless to deny that there are a certain number of farmers, I am sorry to say, persons living by agricultural industry, in some way or other, who might be influenced by certain reasons which the previous conferences between the Government and the manufacturers might enable the Government to offer for their consideration. I will not specify further the nature of those reasons for fear of offending your sensibilities, Mr. Chairman. A war of classes has been inaugurated by the Government. Through the stand they have taken for the privileged classes, the farmers have been compelled to organize to some extent, but they can never organize as completely as the less numerous combiner classes—such as the cordage, the cotton, the woollen and the coal oil producers. It would be utterly impossible for any farmers' association to secure a protection of over a hundred per cent on their products, such as the coal oil manufacturers have procured. It would be utterly impossible for any organization of farmers to combine and restrict their production and put up prices, because the price of their products is not fixed and never can be fixed by any tariff of ours. In the case of the manufacturers of cordage and woollen and cottons, the duties levied allow of the formation of combines. They facilitate the diminution of production and the raising of prices to the highest possible figure. The farmer cannot do that. He has been put off with sham taxes. I am quite satisfied, from what I have seen in the country, that the result of the education which has taken place among farmers has been to create a large majority among them in favour of reducing the tariff, if not in favour of absolute free trade. Of course I cannot say there is a majority in favour of absolute free trade, but there is against the present tariff policy of the Government. Whether that can be shown at the next election will depend largely on whether the farmers divide their forces in making their attack upon the Government, whether the farmers, who have all the same ends in view, insist on retaining two sets of candidates upon the same platform or not. It is quite impossible to say whether that feeling will be made fully manifest at the next election. But no doubt the farmers have begun to think and reason about these matters in a way they never did before. The coming election will be the only one of all the elections that have taken place since 1878 inclusive, if no new issue springs up, which will take place entirely or principally on the question of tariff reduction. If no new issue is mixed up with it, if the election does take place on that issue, I am satisfied that the result will be to show a complete change of feeling among the farmers.

Mr. WALLACE. Question.

Mr. CASEY. I cannot discuss the tax put on to humbug the farmers without discussing other matters in that connection. There is no desire on this side to unduly prolong the debate; we have nothing to gain by that. But what we insist on is to properly ventilate every possible view on every item of the tariff. That is what we are here for on both sides; but it happens that hon. gentlemen opposite have given up their duties in that respect and leave everything in the hands of the Government and of the interested parties who come here and ask for legislation on their behalf. There really should be, when a new tariff is introduced in this House, or a general revision of the tariff, a committee composed of gentlemen on both sides to consider its details after it has been laid on the Table by the Government. It does not necessarily follow that the Government should be bound by every opinion of that committee, but there would be this advantage, that the question of each particular item, of its judiciousness, of its propriety, of its honesty, would be debated publicly in the committee where both sides would be heard. I do not propose that the Ministers should be relieved of any portion of their responsibility; they ought to take the responsibility for making the proposals. Then a small select committee, capable of sitting quietly around a table and hearing evidence in a public way, should consider the tariff item by item before it is laid before the committee of the whole House. It is admitted that in committee of the whole House it is impossible, in the first place, to get any evidence except what the Ministers choose to submit, and they only get it second-hand from the parties interested. It is admitted also that in such a large committee the discussion cannot be as close and as practical as in the case of a few men sitting around a table. I beg to throw out the suggestion, or the proposition—perhaps I may put it in a more concrete form hereafter—that there ought to be here, as there is in the United States, a committee to consider the tariff changes before they are pronounced upon by the House, and before they are even considered before a committee of the whole House.

Mr. ROSAMOND. I do not rise for the purpose of prolonging the discussion on this question, but as the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat has referred to the manufacturers as having in some occult way contributed large sums of money for the purpose of supporting the Government, I wish, as a manufacturer, and as having had a long connection with the Manufacturers' Association, to declare that there is not a solitary word of truth in his statement. Now, we have frequently heard from members on the Opposition side of the House hints and innuendos about Red Parlours and Star Chambers. I think it would surprise these hon. gentlemen if they knew the exact sums that have been contributed for any election purposes during the last 15 years. For my part, I have been connected with the Manufacturers' Association for 15 years past, and I have no knowledge of any sums of any importance having been contributed by the Manufacturers' Association in any form whatever.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Or any unimportant sums?

Mr. ROSAMOND. Or unimportant sums except for the purpose of providing literature for distribution at the general elections. I think it is about time that these charges thrown out by members of the Opposition in such a reckless and disgraceful manner, should cease.

Mr. CASEY. I must ask that the word "disgraceful" be taken back immediately.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman must not use the word "disgraceful."

Mr. CASEY.

Mr. ROSAMOND. Well, I suppose I may be allowed to think it. However, I did not rise for the purpose of discussing any question. Hon. gentlemen opposite seem to me to be engaged in a useless discussion and doing nothing else than wasting the time of the House and the time of the country.

Mr. CASEY. The hon. gentleman says that he never contributed to election funds, and that he does not know of any money having been contributed by the Manufacturers' Association in any important sums. I understood him to say that money had been contributed for the circulation of literature. He nods assent. Well, lots of things have been done in this country that the hon. gentleman does not know, and although he may speak with perfect confidence for himself as to what he has or has not contributed, I do not think he is in a position to say what individual manufacturers or firms may have or may not have done. If he got off without paying his share, he has been treated with extreme kindness by the Government. There is one fact of which we are all cognizant, it has not been denied by anybody, that on the eve of an election it has been the custom—I do not know whether it was done the last time or not—for the manufacturers to meet one of the Sir Johns, whichever happened to be in power, in the Red Parlour, or some other convenient place, and if my hon. friend from Lanark says that no monetary questions were discussed at those conferences, I think it is only fair that he should tell the House what in the world they did discuss.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It was a question of literature.

Mr. CASEY. They met to discuss the question of literature, whether that literature would bear the impress of anybody's portrait upon each separate sheet of paper I do not know; but there must have been some object in these conferences, and they have not been always for the purpose of settling the tariff alone. But there is one thing certain, that whatever the manufacturers may have done, I know it would pay them, in many of those combines, extremely well to put up a large amount of money every five years for the purpose of maintaining the tariff in something like its present state, or to recast it into such shape as might suit them. That is a matter of business, and if they have not had their weather eye open so fully as to contribute, and thereby secure such changes as they are able to secure, I do not think they are the good business men they pretend to be.

Mr. McNEILL. Before saying a few words on the item before the committee, I want to refer to an assertion that fell from my hon. friend who has just resumed his seat. He seemed to be very much offended at my hon. friend from Lanark (Mr. Rosamond) speaking of his accusation as being disgraceful; but he does not think it at all improper to accuse the Government and to accuse members on this side of the House with being actuated by disgraceful motives. While he was upon his feet he has made use of expressions over and over again which imply nothing else. He said that this duty upon wheat is imposed simply for the purpose of hoodwinking, and misleading, and deceiving the farmers of Canada.

Mr. CASEY. Yes.

Mr. McNEILL. Then he admits that he has accused the Government of disgraceful conduct, though he is sensitive at having the term "disgraceful" applied to himself. Now, so far as this duty upon wheat is concerned, and as regards the statement that it has been imposed merely for the purpose of humbugging the farmers of Canada, I have just got this to say, that before this duty was imposed we were importing millions of dollars worth of wheat into Canada for home consumption; we were importing into this country from the United States, for home consumption, during the five years immediately preceding the introduction of the National Policy, if my memory serves me aright, some $31,000,000 or $33,000,000 worth of wheat.

Mr. CHARLTON. Did we eat it all?

Mr. McNEILL. What quantity my hon. friend consumed in those years I am not prepared to say. We were importing it for home consumption—the hon. gentleman can explain that term in any way he chooses. This was imported before the imposition of this duty which my hon. friend says was for the purpose of humbugging the farmers. Now, during the five years immediately preceding the introduction of the National Policy we are importing that amount of wheat, and during the five years immediately preceding the introduction of my hon. friend's resolution in favour of commercial union, or unrestricted reciprocity, if he prefers the term, we imported $1,100,000 worth of wheat; that is to say, that the farmers of this country, by reason of the imposition of this duty, had the benefit of the home market for their wheat to the extent of the difference between these two sums I have named, and they at least saved the freights upon that amount of wheat during those years. If that was something which was not of value to the farmers, then I should like to know what is.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I would be surprised at the extreme ignorance manifested by my hon. friend, if it were not simply a repetition of the still more extreme ignorance manifested by the Finance Minister in the course of his Budget speech, in discussing this identical question. I beg to inform the hon. gentleman who spoke last, that, if he understood in the slightest degree the entries made in the Trade and Navigation Returns, he never would have made the statement he has done. I take the case of 1878. The hon. gentleman, no doubt, following the example of the Minister of Finance, would assure us that many millions were imported and consumed by the people of this country. The mistake he has made is an extremely simple one, and I will explain it to him. It may be perfectly true, I dare say it is, that he will find that the words used are "entered for consumption," but, if he will take the trouble to turn to the table of exports, he will find that almost the entire of what was entered for consumption, was re-exported, and that the market he talks of simply meant this, that in those days we had a large and valuable trade in transitu, which we have since to a certain extent lost, that we had also an extremely valuable trade in the way of exchanging our coarse grains, which we have sold at a very high rate, for American coarse grains, which we bought at a low rate, to the great profit of our farmers and stock-raisers. The whole absurd idea that a home market of many millions was provided by the National Policy, is based entirely on utter ignorance of the terms used in the Trade and Navigation Returns for 1878.

Mr. McNEILL. I wish to say only this, that if good, solid, blustering assertion will make good the hon. gentleman's proposition, he has made it good. There was a large amount of wheat exported during those years, wheat which was grown in Canada, but what I said was that we had to pay freights upon that large amount of wheat, which we would not have had to pay, had it not been that this American wheat displaced our own.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. gentleman is entirely in error.

Mr. McNEILL. Of course.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. If he had taken the trouble, before talking on this subject, as he ought to have done, to master the details which are laid down in the Trade and Navigation Returns, and which are as accessible to that hon. gentleman as they are to anybody, he would have known that the statement I have made is literally accurate. We imported in 1878 close upon $10,000,000 worth of wheat and wheat supplies. Of that we re-exported by far the greater quantity, and the so-called home market which he talks of, is based entirely on this simple fact, that a great deal of this, under the old system that prevailed, was entered for consumption, though it was not consumed in this country at all, but was re-exported to England. The hon. gentleman, like the Minister of Finance, enters on this subject with the most superficial knowledge of the facts which he ought to be familiarly acquainted with. As my hon. friend from King's N.S. (Mr. Borden)—whom I do not see present—truly said a few nights ago, this absurd delusion that a market of many million dollars was created by the National Policy more than our farmers possessed in 1878, has no foundation in fact other than this, that, under the old system, as I have said, the words used are “entered for consumption,” and that, whereas we imported in 1878, or were supposed to have imported, ninety-one millions or thereabouts—I speak from memory—that was entered for consumption, the actual fact was that of this ninety-one millions scarcely more than seventy-eight millions, or eighty millions at the outside, were actually consumed in this country; and that we re-exported, as I have stated, a great number of millions of stuff which was put down as entered for consumption. That is, no doubt, what the hon. member for North Bruce has been talking of. Now, I will explain to that hon. gentleman exactly what took place. If the hon. gentleman will condescend to look at the Trade and Navigation Returns, signed by Mackenzie Bowell in 1878, he will find that we are said to have imported in all $93,081,000: of that there was entered for consumption $91,199,000, and, without looking further, he might have supposed that entered into consumption. But, if he will condescend to look at the general statement of exports and the abstract of the total value of goods exported from the Dominion of Canada during that year, he will find, on page 666, that we exported of agricultural products, not being the produce of Canada, to the amount of $9,272,000. Now, I think the hon. gentleman can understand, if he will apply his mind to it, that, although we might, in one form or another, have consumed ninety-one millions’ worth, still that, as we re-exported in that single article of agricultural products which were not the produce of Canada, to the amount of $9,272,000 worth, it stands to reason that the whole of that ninety-one millions was not all consumed in Canada. As to the small remainder, for which the hon. gentleman claimed credit for having provided a market, it amounted to this, that in those days we sold at handsome rates large quantities of barley, ranging in price as high as $1.25, to the people of the United States, and bought a large quantity of coarse grains in the shape of Indian corn and other articles of the same kind, to the great profit of our farmers. We have lost that trade totally. There is the gain the people of Canada have obtained.

Mr. McNEILL. Would the hon. gentleman be kind enough to inform me where he finds that item of wheat?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I will look it up and tell the hon. gentleman.

Mr. McMILLAN. If we compare the price of wheat in 1878 and 1882, we will find that wheat in New York in 1878 was $1.15 per bushel, while at the same time in Montreal it was worth $1.27. According to the

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT

Abstract and Record of 1882, we find that wheat in Montreal was worth $1.33, while in the United States it was worth $1.11, or 22 cents per bushel higher in Canada than in the United States. But, when you come to 1886, after this National Policy had been some years in existence, you will find that wheat had fallen in Montreal to 85 cents per bushel, while in the United States it was 87 cents per bushel: it had fallen, during that period of the National Policy, 48 cents in Canada, whereas it had only fallen 24 cents in the United States. It has been pointed out by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) that large quantities of wheat were brought over from the United States and were handled in Canada, and in view of that extent of the trade this could be done at a smaller percentage of profit than if the dealers had been confined to the Canadian trade. It was sheer nonsense to argue that our farmers had been benefited by the National Policy in regard to wheat prices. The price of wheat has been steadily falling in Canada during the whole period of the National Policy as compared with prices ruling in the States, and the hon. member for Essex (Mr. Allan) has shown that the price to-day was 3 or 4 cents higher in the United States than in Canada, whereas previous to the National Policy it was steadily higher in this Dominion than in the United States.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am willing to give the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) the figures from the Trade and Navigation Returns. In 1878 the exports of wheat, not the produce of Canada, were of the value of $6,254,933.

Mr. McNEILL. And we imported what?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. We imported into Canada from the United States, for home consumption, wheat to the value of about $6,500,000. Of that we exported, not the produce of Canada, the value of $6,252,000, leaving apparently about a value of a quarter of a million.

Mr. SPROULE. The hon. gentleman should have given the exports which were the products of Canada, the quantity being 3,402,000 bushels, because in addition we exported what was brought in from the other side.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. We exported 4,930,000 bushels, of the value of $5,376,000, but we exported 6,254,000 bushels of American wheat not the produce of Canada.

Mr. CASEY. Hon. members will notice, if they refer to the returns, that we imported over 4,150,000 bushels of wheat, although 9,057,000 bushels were entered for consumption. When there was no duty on wheat it was brought across the line, delivered at the elevator, entered as a matter of form and shipped out and became part of our exports. At present it cannot be entered at the customs without paying 15 cents duty ; it remains in bond and is shipped in bond. That accounts for the difference of the returns then and now.

Item agreed to.

Starch, including farina, corn starch or flour, and all preparations having the qualities of starch, one and one-half cents per pound ; the weights of the package to be in all cases included in the weight for duty.

Mr. McMULLEN. This is an item on which we should have fairly met the United States on the recommendations proposed by the Wilson Bill, which is to reduce the duty from the present rate of 2 cents to 1 cent per pound. We have in this country three starch factories. The entire consumption of starch in Canada is about 5,000,000 pounds. The duty at the present time is 2 cents per pound, and this protection on a consumption of 5,000,000 pounds represents $100,000. That amount has been divided among three factories, except the value of starch imported. The imports last year amounted to the value of $42,058.06, on which we received a duty of $14,953.66, the quantity being 736,476 pounds. Deducting that from the entire consumption, the amount received by the three factories in Canada, by way of bounty, may be placed at $85,000. Of these factories one is at Edwardsburg, another at Brantford, and the third at some other point in Ontario. Of the Edwardsburg factory, of which an hon. member of this House is managing director, I can speak with assurance. The factory has been in existence some years, and is quite capable of competing with the United States factories if we reduced the duty from 1½ cents to 1 cent. The total investment represented by the factory is about $170,000. The following is a statement of the profits for the last seven years : 1886, $34,285, or 23 per cent ; 1887, $24,111, or 16 per cent ; 1888, $24,603, or 17 per cent ; 1889, $24,736, or 17 per cent ; 1890, $39,975, or 26 per cent ; 1891, $16,117, or 10 per cent. During the year 1892, owing to the cutting of prices by the three companies, there was a loss of $4,722. In that year a combination was formed, which is in existence to-day, and for the year 1893 a profit was earned of $33,422, or 16 per cent. Accordingly the total profit of the company in six years reached $197,251, or in other words the company doubled their capital. I contend that it is nothing short than an outrage on the people to ask them to continue to pay the sums they are called upon to pay for starch, in order to build up an institution of this kind that is rolling up such enormous profits. They have as I said last year a rest account of $117,778.19, made up as follows : Reconstruction reserve account, $50,000 ; rest account, $50,000 ; contingent account, $17,778.19. In addition to that, they have paid 10 per cent on the invested capital every year during seven years, which amounts to about 70 per cent of the entire outlay, so that they have got back all their money except about 30 per cent. No one will contend that factories making this enormous amount of money require a protection of a cent and a half a pound. That protection gives, on the amount of starch consumed in Canada, $75,000 a year, to divide amongst these three factories. As I have said they are organized in a combine. There is not a pound of starch sold in Canada that is not sold by a price-list which is put in the hands of the wholesale merchant, and he is bound to sell it to the retailer at the prices set forth there. He unquestionably gets a discount on the list price, but he can sell it no higher or no lower than the price dictated to him by the manufacturers.

Mr. McLEAN (P.E.I.) If the hon. gentleman is referring to all the starch manufacturers in Canada, he is very much mistaken in saying that there are only three factories. We have eight or nine in Prince Edward Island.

Mr. McMULLEN. There are only three factories turning out corn starch in this country.

Mr. McLEAN (P.E.I.) I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon, I am not positive as to the exact number, but there are eight or nine starch factories in Prince Edward Island.

Mr. McMULLEN. These are potato starch factories. I am speaking of corn starch factories. I say that the corn starch factories at the present moment have a combine.

Mr. McLEAN (P.E.I.) Not at all ; they have no combine.

Mr. McMULLEN. I know better. I have it from the wholesale merchants that not one of them can buy starch unless he buys it with a distinct understanding that he will sell it at the list price.

Mr. McLEAN (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman may be referring to three starch factories, but if he includes the factories in Prince Edward Island, I may tell him that he does not know anything about it. They have no combination down there so far as I can learn.

Mr. McMULLEN. Are those not potato starch factories ?

Mr. McLEAN (P.E.I.) Yes.

Mr. McMULLEN. I am referring to the three corn starch factories, one at Edwardsburg, another at Brantford and another somewhere else.

Mr. McLEAN (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman should have made a distinction.

Mr. McMULLEN. There is without the slightest doubt a combine amongst these three factories. I hold in my hand the wholesale selling list for Ontario and Quebec which shows that boxes containing forty-eight pounds of No. 1, white, must be sold at 5½ cents per pound, and barrels and kegs of 200 or 100 pounds must be sold at 5 cents a pound. These are the prices which they have fixed for the wholesale merchant at which he must sell, and I contend that that same starch can be bought in the United States for a little less than half of that price, but as we see from the small amount imported last year the duty has kept out almost all foreign starch. Of course, those who manufacture starch will say: We have to pay the duty on our corn and the duty on our coal. That may be true, but at the same time I contend that it is an outrage that the people of this country should have to contribute from $75,000 to $80,000 a year to give employment to about eighty men in these three factories. Out of over $100,000 a year contributed by the people, something less than $15,000 goes into the Dominion Treasury, and the remaining $85,000 goes into the pockets of the three manufacturers. That is the feature of this pernicious protection policy that is so objectionable, because the people pay the money and the country gets no advantage of it. Not only has the Minister of Finance put a duty of 1½ cents a pound upon the starch itself, but he has also put a duty of 1½ cents a pound on the barrel which contains the starch, which, as a barrel weighs about twenty-five pounds, amounts to 37 cents. Even if hon. gentlemen opposite wish to persist in their policy they should reduce the duty from 1½ to 1 cent a pound. Any manufacturing industry which makes such a combine as I have pointed out, and which fixes a hard and fast price at which starch shall be sold to the consumer deserves no consideration at our hands. Starch can be purchased for half the money in the United States that it is sold for in Canada, and it is a gross fraud on our people to perpetuate a duty of this kind.

Mr. CHARLTON. What is the specific duty of 1½ cents a pound supposed to be equivalent to in an ad valorem duty, at the present price?

Mr. FOSTER. It would depend on the price and quality. Good quality starch at 5 cents a pound would be about 30 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. CHARLTON. It is the same as the amended duty on starch in the United States. Is there any estimate as to the effect of the present duty on the revenue?

Mr. FOSTER. There will be a slight reduction in the revenue unless more is imported.

Mr. McMULLEN. The same quality of starch that is sold by the Edwardsburg Starch Company for 5 cents a pound, you can buy in the United States in barrels at from 1¾ to 2¼ cents a pound. I challenge the managing director of that company, who is here, to contradict my statement, and I will prove it.

Item agreed to.

Seeds, viz., garden, field and other seeds for agricultural or other purposes, not otherwise provided, when in bulk or in large parcels, 10 per cent ad valorem; when put up in small papers or parcels, 25 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. McMILLAN. There is a very heavy duty that farmers are compelled to pay on clover, timothy and other seeds. Seeing that the farmers of Canada have to change their system of farming and go more into dairying, they have to purchase large quantities of seeds. They should be put on the free list.

Item agreed to.

Trees, viz., apple, cherry, peach, pear, plum and quince, of all kinds, 3 cents each.

Mr. CHARLTON. I rise to suggest to the hon. Minister of Finance whether it would not be a good idea to offer to the United States reciprocity in trees, grape vines and other shrubs. The farmers of this country are dependent to a considerable extent upon the nurseries of the United States for all kinds of nursery stock.

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis). You should raise your own trees.

Mr. CHARLTON. This a burden on the farmer, and I am sure that reciprocity in these articles, if accepted by the United States, would be very advantageous to the Canadian farmer.

Mr. FOSTER. The trouble is that even though we made an offer and the United States were to accept it as far as customs duties are concerned, the different states have license and other regulations which would make it impossible for our nurserymen to sell nursery stock in most of the states lying west and south of us.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. But there is something else to be considered in this matter. Any man who knows anything about fruit-growing knows that it is often of the very greatest benefit to change the tree, just as it is to change the seed. Fruit-growing is likely to become, in many portions of this country, a more and more important industry every year; and it appears to me, no matter what the Americans may do, that the advantage of facilitating the change of seed and trees and shrubs is so great that the interest of a small class of nurserymen ought not to be put in competition with the interest of the great mass of the farmers who may require the use of seeds or trees of new sorts. Looking at the great extent of the United States, and the great variety of fruit trees that they have introduced and acclimatized successfully, it is in the highest degree desirable that no sort of impediment should be thrown in the way of those of our farmers who desire to engage in fruit culture, in getting at the lowest rate the best kind of trees with which to experiment or to use as grafts. I may add—because I have had occasion to purchase a little from American and Canadian nurseries—that there are of necessity an immense number of varieties which can be obtained readily from the United States which cannot be obtained with anything like equal facility in Canada. Not that our people are not as enterprising or that their stock is not good, so far as it goes; but they have not the same extent of market, and are not able as a rule to provide anything like the same choice for their customers. These things are essentially the raw material of the farmers who engage in fruit culture, and, waiving any question of theory, it does appear to me that it is a great mistake to put any obstacle in the way of their obtaining them.

Mr. CHARLTON. I can corroborate what my hon. friend has said. I live in the fruit belt of Canada, and have had some experience as a farmer in fruit growing. I know that it is necessary to buy a large part of our nursery stock from the American nurseries, chiefly at Rochester, simply for the reason that we get there a better class of nursery stock. All the fruit-growing people of Canada along Lake Erie and from Hamilton, east to Niagara River, would be benefited by free access to the American market to obtain nursery stock. This would be a great boon to that producing interest, although it might affect unfavourably, to a certain extent, the nursery interest in Canada.

Mr. BOYLE. The nursery men of the Dominion have told me frequently that if unrestricted reciprocity, or free trade could be had in nursery stock between the two countries, they would not fear competition, because they produce a class of stock suited to the northern States, Dakota and Minnesota. Some years ago they did a profitable trade in those states, but no sooner had they obtained a footing there than exactions and restrictions and obstructions were put upon them by the State Legislatures. Each Canadian agent had to give a bond to the extent of $5,000 that everything he sold should be as represented; and if the thing sold, failed in any particular to meet the requirements of or conditions of sale, the bond was forfeited, suit was entered, and out of the bond a sum necessary to recoup the party who purchased the stock was taken. In the eastern states, similar restrictions prevail. It was even made necessary there that every travelling agent should be a resident and citizen of the country, and licenses were also exacted. No matter what arrangements might be made at Washington, these local restrictions would prevent trade and put reciprocity out of the question. As to the policy of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) that free admission to this country, irrespective of what the States might do, would benefit the farmers, that is a debatable question. I do not say that there might not be a great deal of good in that; but this fact remains, that the shrewd Americans have not seen things in that light, but have taken every precaution to keep Canadians out of their market.

Mr. CHARLTON. A treaty of reciprocity might be couched in such terms as to provide against any restrictions of that kind, which rendered inoperative the intention of the arrangement.

Mr. FOSTER. You could not control the different Legislatures.

Mr. CHARLTON. I think you could take a course that would secure that result, or protect ourselves by not obliging ourselves to admit American stock free of duty unless these different states placed no obstructions in the way of carrying out the treaty.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). If the rule of reciprocity were adopted, public opinion would not allow of any barriers being raised against it. I am satisfied that the interest of the agricultural population, requiring fruit and ornamental trees, would not long submit to restrictions of that sort. Of course, where any such regulations have been made, they were primarily to protect some local nurserymen, and ostensibly for the purpose of preventing people being imposed upon by not getting what they purchased. But I believe that the great majority of nurserymen, on both sides of the line, have undertaken, of late years, to sell only what they represent. In many districts, fruit trees are subject to disease. In a considerable portion of the south-western portion of Ontario, the black knot has almost entirely destroyed the cherry trees, and if these trees are to be introduced there again, they must be obtained from some other section. The same rule holds good with regard to other trees. Because they are made to produce a superior variety of fruit by artificial culture, they become more subject to disease, and changes are necessary in the course of years, just precisely as in the case of seed grain. Every agriculturist knows that if he sows one variety of wheat for a few years it degenerates and will not produce, under similar circumstances, one-half of the crop it did when first sown, and he has to get rid of it and introduce some new variety. The same rule holds good with regard to live animals. We ought not to subordinate the interests of the farmers to those of the nurserymen. In my opinion, reciprocity in this matter, while it would lead to the advantage of the agriculturist, would really be no detriment to the nurserymen, for our people will go into the United States to get the trees they require, irrespective of the tariff. If I remember rightly, the Americans proposed, both with regard to fruit trees and seeds, in 1886, to put these upon the free list, and did so for a time, although the Minister of Finance at that time refused to reciprocate.

Mr. SPROULE. There are just two reasons why, in my opinion, this proposition would not be in the interest of the farmer. In one respect, the changes of seeds might be an improvement, but any seeds coming from the American side are very unclean. If you travel through the farms in the United States and compare them with those in our western country, and see how the grain grown there is mixed with wild mustard and other deleterious weeds, you will understand why our farmers should avoid importing American seed. If they do, they invariably import things they should keep out entirely. With regard to their trees, the experience in my part of the country is this: All through that district some years ago, American fruit trees were sold, but when they came to bear fruit they were found to belong to other classes than represented. When sold as fall and winter fruit, they were found to be summer and fall. Then there is no recourse, because the nurserymen live on the other side of the line, and there is no use trying to recover from them.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. A similar kind of speech, from the American view, was made in the American House the other day.

Mr. CHARLTON. In purchasing timothy seed, or clover seed, our sources of supply would be the western States. The seeds of that character raised in the western States are remarkably pure and free from anything of a deleterious nature. You will not see the Canadian thistle in all the States of Iowa, Wisconsin, and Illinois. And the charge as made by the hon. gentleman with regard to the character of the seed and with regard to the character of the nursery stock is entirely unwarranted by the facts. The great nursery establishments about Rochester, in the state of New York, are backed by enormous capital, do a great trade throughout the western states, and have a good reputation for honourable dealing. One reason why American nursery stock has been preferred to Canadian, is because of its superior quality and because it is more likely to prove what it was recommended to be than is the other kind. The reason that is given is hardly a good one for excluding American nursery stock or American seeds. The farmer can safely be left to judge for himself in these matters. The man who is alive to his own interest will take the precaution he is always able to take in order to secure a good article. There is no doubt whatever in my mind that the granting of this application to have nursery stock on the free list would be a boon to the farmer. In our part of the country we buy new varieties of peaches, plums, grapes and apricots from American nurseries, because we will have them. They are superior kinds that have been developed in these nurseries, and the Government by providing for reciprocity in nursery stock would enable us to get these things free of duty.

Mr. SPROULE.

Mr. SPROULE. In this matter I spoke of my own knowledge. I have had experience in the purchase of American nursery stock, having planted some in my own garden. In our section of country the general experience has been that trees brought from the American side were not found true to name when they came to bear fruit.

Item agreed to.

Blackberries, gooseberries, raspberries, strawberries, cherries and currants, n.e.s., two cents per pound, the weight of the package to be included in the rate for duty.

Mr. CHARLTON. I would like to ask the hon. Minister of Finance if fruits of this class are not on the free list of the American tariff under the Wilson Bill?

Mr. FOSTER. I think they are.

Mr. CHARLTON. This is an enormous duty, particularly when the weight of the package is included.

Mr. FOSTER. It was 3 cents formerly.

Mr. CHARLTON. Then formerly it was so much worse. We import berries of this kind before our own are ready for use. Strawberries are now on the American market at a moderate price and other berries are sold early in the cities of the United States, being brought in by rail from southern points of supply, and being put on the market at prices which place them within the reach of everybody. Our own people ought to be free to supply themselves with this class of fruits before our own are ready. When our own fruits come into the market, no duty is required, for the fruits from the United States cannot compete with our own blackberries, gooseberries, raspberries and strawberries. I do not think that this is a duty that anybody requires as a protection.

Mr. FOSTER. These berries when bought early, are a sort of luxury which people can well afford to pay for.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). These fruits were put on the free list in the United States in 1884 or 1885; and it was proposed to put them on the free list here in 1886. It was pointed out at that time that from the Finance Minister's own province a very large trade was carried on with Providence, Boston and other New England cities, after the American season for these berries was over.

Item agreed to.

Apples, dried, desiccated or evaporated, dates, figs and other dried, desiccated or evaporated fruits, n.e.s., twenty-five per cent ad valorem.

Mr. CHARLTON. What specific duty is this 25 per cent on desiccated apples supposed to represent?

Mr. FOSTER. About 2½ cents per pound.

Mr. CHARLTON. Is not that more than is required? This country exports apples to the United States and all parts of the world, and we do not require a very heavy duty to protect the evaporating establishments in Canada from competition.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not think this is excessive.

Mr. CHARLTON. It means the establishment of combinations to keep up prices above what ought to be asked.

Item agreed to.

(Grapes, two cents per pound.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I would like to remind the hon. gentleman that this is equivalent to a duty of 100 per cent. It is within my own knowledge that large quantities of grapes are offered for sale at points in the United States at rates below 2 cents per pound, so that this is really a duty of over 100 per cent. I do not think that any such duty ought to be maintained.

Mr. FOSTER. It is a large duty when based upon the prices of our grapes at the height of the season. But grapes are imported at different seasons. Hothouse grapes are imported as a matter of luxury. These are purchased by the rich and this duty affords us a very tidy revenue.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What revenue do you get?

Mr. FOSTER. About $20,000.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). That shows how very largely you are interfering with the people in consumption of grapes.

Mr. FOSTER. We must interfere with the consumption of something or else have no revenue, and I do not know of a better thing to raise revenue from.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. You could make this up by raising your duty on paddy.

Mr. CHARLTON. Is it supposed that the production of grapes in the season is sufficient for the home demand?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, and more.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. There are mighty few of the expensive grapes brought in if the Trade and Navigation Returns are of any value.

Item agreed to.

Oranges, lemons and limes, in boxes of capacity not exceeding two and one-half cubic feet, twenty-five cents per box; in one-half boxes, capacity not exceeding one and one-fourth cubic feet, thirteen cents per half box; in cases and all other packages, ten cents per cubic feet holding capacity, in bulk, $1.50 for one thousand oranges, lemons or limes; in barrels not exceeding in capacity that of the one hundred and ninety-six pounds flour barrel, fifty-five cents per barrel.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The consumption of oranges, lemons and limes has grown enormously of late years and these fruits are now regarded almost as a necessity. You can scarcely regard them any longer as a luxury, and the hon. gentleman could with more propriety put a tax upon tea than he could put so very high a tax upon a fruit the consumption of which is becoming almost universal.

Mr. FOSTER. They are largely used, of course, by the rich class of people.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Yes, and by labourers.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Considering the hon. gentleman's proclivities this ought to recommend itself to him. He may see nothing good in French wines, but he ought to see something good in lemonade. It seems to me very strange that he should object to put a moderate duty upon rice which would yield sufficient revenue to enable him to make all the lemonade in the country free against the holding of the plebiscitum. I recommended that to his consideration.

Mr. FOSTER. We can still afford a glass of lemonade.

Item agreed to.

Peaches, n.o.p., one cent per pound, the weight of the package to be included in the weight for duty.

Mr. CHARLTON. I think the duty on this item is excessive in the light of the provision made in the following item. Our canning factories in Canada are dependent to a considerable extent for their peach supplies upon the orchards of Delaware and other sections of the United States. I see the duty is reduced on canned peaches to 2 cents per pound. Now, the duty of 1 cent a pound upon peaches, including the weight of the packages, is a much higher duty on the raw material than the duty on the manufactured product, and if our canning factories are to be required to pay a cent a pound upon peaches, a perishable fruit, often coming in in bad order—a hundred pounds of peaches, with the weight of the packages, will not make fifty or even forty pound of canned goods—and if they are required to pay this duty, and the duty on the succeeding item is left at 2 cents a pound, they are required to pay more duty on their raw material than on the manufactured product.

Mr. FOSTER. Peaches grow here too.

Mr. CHARLTON. But not to a sufficient extent to supply our canning factories except in an occasional year. There are three or four canning factories in my county that buy peaches extensively in the United States. I have had letters from these canners putting this point of the case strongly. Now, this interest confers more benefit on the farming population than any other manufacturing interest, in my opinion, because all these factories make extensive use of green pease, beans, tomatoes and most all kinds of fruit, and vegetables; it is an interest well deserving the consideration of the Government, if they desire to protect interests at all, and this duty is too high unless the Government make a change in the succeeding item. As these two items stand now, the duty on peaches is absurdly high in view of the protection upon canned peaches and other canned goods.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I would like to ask the hon. gentleman how it is that he has put bananas and pine apples on the free list, and that oranges and lemons are taxed. Bananas are widely used, and the hon. gentleman puts them on the free list; and he has put pine apples on the free list, although it is certainly an article of luxury to a much greater extent than oranges or lemons.

Mr. FOSTER. The importation of pine apples is very small and not widely distributed.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). And the importation of bananas is very large. As the one is put upon the free list because it is large and the other because it is very small, how is it that oranges and lemons are taxed?

Mr. FOSTER. That is easily explained. They say one banana is equal to a loaf of bread in sustenance power.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I should like to put you on that diet.

Item agreed to.

Coffee, green when not imported direct without transshipment from the country of growth and production, 10 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. FOSTER. I want to drop that item of coffee such as it is, and substitute for it, "Tea and green coffee, n.e.s., 10 cents."

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Do you strike out roasted coffee also?

Mr. FOSTER. No. The next one will be "Coffee, roasted or green, when not imported direct," dropping out the words "without transshipment from the country of growth and production," 2 cents per pound and 10 per cent ad valorem. The third item remains as it is; the fourth remains as it is; the fifth is chicory. Then we come to tea. That comes out, because we have included it above. That is not explained, of course, until I give the free tea item and coffee, which I will read to the House.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. One cannot altogether understand what the effect of these alterations will be. Now, if the hon. gentleman likes, I would not object to his taking the majority of these items and leaving some one undisposed of on which the discussion can go on, when we have satisfied ourselves as to what the real effect and bearing of the change may be. There is a considerable amount of dispute and a considerable amount of doubt in the minds of the trade, and I am not prepared, without knowing more about it, to offer an opinion as to the effect of some of these changes.

Mr. CHARLTON.

Mr. FOSTER. Then let us leave tea and green coffee n.e.s., 10 per cent., leave that as not passed.

Mr. FOSTER. I propose additions to the following items: Chicory, kiln-dried, roasted or green, 4 cents per pound. The cultivation of chicory has been undertaken in certain parts of Quebec, and as arrangements have been made in that connection it is thought best not to disturb the duty.

Item agreed to.

Cocoa paste, chocolate, &c., 4 cents per pound.

Mr. FOSTER. I gave notice to change the duty on cocoa paste and chocolate. I wish cocoa and chocolate paste to come in at a lower rate of duty, 4 cents per pound, and that chocolate and other preparations, and cocoa be placed at 25 per cent. We have largely reduced the duty on candies, and cocoa paste, and chocolate paste, are used for the coating of candies, and so I do not think it well to increase the duty. I move that the duty on cocoa paste and chocolate paste be 4 cents per pound, and that chocolate, cocoa shells and nibs, chocolate and other preparations of cocoa be 25 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Mr. FOSTER. I move the following changes in nuts:

Nuts, shelled, 5 cents per pound; almond, shelled, Brazil nuts and pecans, 3 cents per pound; nuts of all kinds, not otherwise provided for, 2 cents per pound.

Item agreed to.

Mr. FOSTER. I move that desiccated coconut be 5 cents per pound, instead of 4 cents.

Item agreed to.

Mr. FOSTER. I move that ginger and spices of all kinds, unground, be 12½ per cent instead of 15 per cent.

Committee rose and reported progress.

ADJOURNMENT—EXPORT OF WHEAT.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. McNEILL. Before the House adjourns, I will call the attention of my hon. friend (Sir Richard Cartwright) to the matter we were speaking of a short time ago. If my hon. friend will be kind enough to look at the Trade and Navigation Returns of 1877, he will find that we imported that year for home consumption, of wheat entered, 4,800,000 odd dollars' worth.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It does not follow we consumed it.

Mr. McNEILL. My hon. friend's contention is that that amount, or an amount approximate to that was exported.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I was not speaking of the year 1877 at all; I spoke of the year 1878.

Mr. McNEILL. Well, I am speaking of 1877. If my hon. friend will look at the exports, he will find that, in place of exporting, as he implied that we should have done for that year, $4,800,000 worth, we only exported $1,300,000 worth. Therefore, my hon. friend will see that, according to his own figures, according to the figures that he himself referred to, according to the returns when he himself was Finance Minister of Canada, in that one year the farmers of Canada lost the home market to the extent of about $3,500,000 in the matter of wheat.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Hand me that book, please.

Mr. McNEILL. I will hand the book to my hon. friend.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. In the first place, I was not speaking of 1877, but of 1878, which was the year he referred to.

Mr. McNEILL. I was referring to several years, and 1877 was one of them, and my hon. friend said that in these years the exports balanced the imports for home consumption.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I did not say anything of the kind.

Mr. McNEILL. You said, practically balanced the imports.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I did not.

Mr. McNEILL. I do not want to quibble with my hon. friend. We want to get at the truth, and the country wants to know the truth, and the truth is that in that year the farmers lost their home market to the extent of three and a half million dollars.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It is not the case. The hon. gentleman is wholly misinformed. If he will take the trouble to look further, and if he had taken the trouble to make inquiries of those who did know, he would have known that not only in 1878, but in 1877, it was the constant practice of our millers to import largely from the United States, to manufacture that wheat into flour, and to export it to Great Britain. And the two or three millions that he speaks of there, was wheat manufactured largely on the Welland Canal and exported as flour to Great Britain.

Mr. McNEILL. That does not touch my argument in the slightest degree, because I referred to that matter when I made my statement.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am not bound to make the hon. gentleman understand. I stated a fact, and the fact is this: That there was not a particle of correctness in his statement that the market of thirty-one millions, as he asserted, had been obtained by the farmers of Canada in consequence of the National Policy. Almost the entire amount, in the years that he referred to, was 'in transitu,' entered, it is true, for consumption, but not consumed here at all. They were for wheat re-exported as wheat to Great Britain, or they were ground by our millers into flour and exported in that shape.

Mr. McNEILL. The statement I made is: That in reference to this year, there was $3,500,000 difference, and the hon. gentleman's statement of fact to which he referred, as to the milling, is perfectly irrelevant.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. So far from being perfectly irrelevant, it is the exact state of the case, that we imported the wheat and exported it in the shape of flour, and it does not matter one straw to the argument whether it was exported as wheat or whether it was exported in the shape of flour made by our own mills and our own Canadian hands.

Mr. McNEILL. It just displaced so much of our farmers' wheat, and they had to pay the freights upon it.

Motion agreed to; and the House adjourned at 11.25 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, 23rd April, 1894.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 88) further to amend the Acts respecting the Harbour of Pictou, in Nova Scotia.—(Sir John Thompson.)

Bill (No. 89) respecting the Speaker of the Senate.—(Sir John Thompson.)

Bill (No. 90) to provide for the examination of witnesses on oath by the Senate and House of Commons.—(Mr. Mulock.)

ADULTERATION OF FOOD.

Mr. SPROULE moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 91) further to amend the Act, chapter 107, Revised Statutes of Canada, intituled: An Act respecting the Adulteration of Food, Drugs and Agricultural Fertilizers. He said: This Bill is intended to meet the cases of the adulteration of honey, or the manufacture of sugar honey which is now going on in several parts of the country, so as to include such manufacture in chapter 107 of the Act respecting the Adulteration of Food, Drugs and Agricultural Fertilizers; and to provide for the punishment of any one who manufactures honey out of sugar, glucose or molasses, or who exposes it for sale. The Bill was asked for by the Bee Keeper's Association, who have been urgently pressing for some provision of this character for several years past. It has been drawn up and approved of by them, and is one which they think will answer the purpose.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). When the article is put upon the market as a compound article of food, although it may not be injurious to health, is it the intention of the Bill to prevent the sale of such article?

Mr. SPROULE. No, that is not the intention. There is a provision in the Bill that where the article is properly labelled, it may be put upon the market for sale.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

REPORT OF THE MINISTER OF MILITIA.

Mr. CASEY. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to call the attention of the Minister of Militia to some points in connection with the bringing down of his report. It appears from the report itself, which was laid on the Table, I think, on the 20th, that the report of the departmental Architect was prepared on the 20th June; that the report of the Cartridge Factory was put in on the 18th October; that the report of the Deputy Minister was put in on 14th November; that the report of the Director of Stores was put in on the 15th November; that the General's report is dated 30th November, and the Minister's report to the Governor General is dated 15th December; and yet we have been over three months waiting for the report to be published. Of course, this delay has given rise to various rumours in regard to friction, etc., which no doubt the Minister—

Mr. SPEAKER. I hope the hon. gentleman will not introduce anything into his remarks which will provoke discussion, but merely inquire the reason why the report has been delayed.

Mr. CASEY. Certainly, if you will allow me to proceed. I merely wished to say that I have no doubt the Minister would be glad of an opportunity to speak on that matter, and explain the reasons for this long delay. There is nothing in the size of the report to indicate that there should be delay in the printing of it. Whatever other reasons for delay there may be, I should like to know them.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I think the hon. gentleman should put his question on the paper.

Mr. CASEY. I will discuss it to-morrow on motion to go into committee.

CATTLE SHIPMENTS.

Mr. MULOCK. The hon. Controller of Customs promised to give me some explanations in regard to the export of cattle. Perhaps the hon. gentleman can favour me with the figures now?

Mr. SPROULE.

Mr. WALLACE. There is a discrepancy in the returns of the Department of Agriculture and Department of Customs for the four years to which reference has been made. Last year the number of cattle exported, as shown by the Department of Customs, was larger than that shown by the Department of Agriculture, but in other years the number was smaller. I have caused an investigation to be made, in conjunction with the Minister of Agriculture, at the port of Montreal, where almost the total exportations take place, with a view to ascertain the causes of the discrepancy, and we propose to obtain the number of cattle exported by every vessel as reported to the Department of Customs and to the officers under the control of the Department of Agriculture. I, therefore, hope within a few days to be able to give the hon. gentleman full information in regard to this matter.

IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READING.

Bill (No. 35) to amend the Act to incorporate the Steam Boiler and Plate Class Insurance Company of Canada.—(Mr. Davies, P.E.I.)

GOVERNMENT DOCK AT HILTON.

Mr. LISTER asked, What was the total cost of the Government dock at Hilton, St. Joseph's Island? Who has been in charge of the dock? What, if any, salary is paid to him for services in connection with the dock? What amount has been received for wharfage fees since its construction, showing amount received in each year?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. In the absence of the Minister of Public Works, I desire to state that the total cost of the dock at Hilton was $10,460. No wharfinger has been appointed; no salary has been paid; no water fees have been collected.

TIGNISH BREAKWATER, P.E.I.

Mr. PERRY asked, Was the putting up of a weather signal at Tignish Breakwater, Prince Edward Island, let by tender? If so, was the lowest tender accepted? What is the name of the person to whom the contract was given? What is the amount of contract? If done by private contract, who was the contractor? What is the cost of the same? Who has charge of the said signal? What is the yearly cost of maintaining the same, including keeper's salary?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. If the hon. gentleman desires a more extended answer than I am able to give at this moment, I shall be very happy to furnish it. The information supplied to me is as follows: This weather signal was erected under the supervision of the director of the meteorlogical service, Mr. Carpmael. The total cost was $100. Mr. Carpmael is ill at the present time. As to whether it was erected by private agreement or by contract, I cannot state exactly. The matter was left to Mr. Carpmael to carry out, and the payment was to be made on his certificate. Mr. George Conroy is in charge, his salary being $45 a year.

PORT OF TIGNISH.

Mr. PERRY asked, What is the amount of wharfage dues collected at the port of Tignish, P.E.I., for the year 1893?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The amount of wharfage dues collected was $73.38, less commission of 25 per cent, $18.35, leaving a net amount received by the department of $55.03.

INDUSTRIES IN QUEEN'S AND SHEL-BURNE COUNTIES.

Mr. FORBES asked, What is the description of each of the industries established in the counties of Queen's and Shelburne? What are the names of the several manufacturers in the said counties respectively? What is the number of employees in each of said industries?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I must ask the hon. gentleman to obtain this information by moving for an order for a return. It will take some days to prepare it, and it would be rather too elaborate to answer the question.

JUDGES IN THE PROVINCE OF QUEBEC.

Mr. LEPINE asked, Was the Act of the Legislature of the province of Quebec, 54 Victoria, chapter 22, intituled: "Act respecting the Court of Queen's Bench, Crown Side," creating two additional judges for the said court, disallowed by the Government of Canada? If not, was it sanctioned, with the other Acts of that province, within the delay appointed? 2. Have representations been made to the Government with reference to completing the organization of the said court, in pursuance of the Act aforesaid? 3. Have the Government been informed that during the present year, and more particularly during the last term of the Court of Appeal, the number of judges sitting in the said Court of Queen's Bench was only four, and that the bar have made complaint as to the state of things? 4. Have the Government been requested to call the attention of the Government of the province of Quebec to this part of the administration of justice in the said province, or to any part thereof? Is there any report, or any recommendation, on the subject?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The Act was left to its operation, although the Government did not concur in the statement made in the preamble thereof, as to the insufficiency of the Court of Queen's Bench, as now constituted, to perform its functions, and it was expressly stated that such action was not to be taken as an expression of opinion on the part of the Dominion Government that the appointment provided for by the Act should be made. The French Canadian senior members of the Montreal bar presented a petition in that sense, and also asked that the claims of their nationality be considered in any appointments to be made.

MR. JOSHUA LEGGE'S SERVICES.

Mr. LANDERKIN asked, Was Joshua Legge an inspector of the construction of the building or repairing of lighthouses near Gananoque? If so, when? What was his salary? How long employed? Is he still inspector? If not, when was he relieved?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Joshua Legge inspected the construction of landing piers and a boathouse at Jack Straw light station, near Gananoque in 1885, and received $41.15 for his services in that capacity, being at the rate of about 5 per cent on the contract price. He was employed while the work was under construction, a period of about two months. He is no longer inspector, having been relieved when the contract was completed in the fall of 1885.

Mr. LANDERKIN asked, Was Joshua Legge employed at the Columbian Exhibition at Chicago? If so, when? In what capacity? and at what salary? How long was he so engaged?

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Joshua Legge was employed at the Columbian Exhibition at Chicago on October 17th last, to superintend the packing and arranging of the Manitoba exhibit for the then intended Antwerp Exhibition, at a salary of $3 per diem. He was engaged from the date stated to December 7th following.

Mr. LANDERKIN asked, Was Joshua Legge engaged in any other service in connection with the sale or the survey of the Thousand Islands or in any other capacity in connection therewith? If so, when? How long? and what salary did he receive?

Mr. DALY. Joshua Legge was not directly employed by the Department of Indian Affairs. He was, however, employed by Mr. Walter Beattie, P.L.S., who was engaged by the department to inspect and value some of the Thousand Islands, and the vouchers submitted by Mr. Beattie in support of his account for expenses in connection with that work show that he employed Joshua Legge from the 17th January, 1893, to 22nd March, 1893, and that he paid him for 65 days at the rate of $3 a day. The amount paid as per said voucher to Joshua Legge by Walter Beattie, viz., $195, was allowed the latter by the department as part of his expenses.

SALE OF ST. LAWRENCE RIVER ISLANDS.

Mr. LANDERKIN asked, Have the Government sold any of the islands in the St. Lawrence River? If so, when? What are the names or numbers of such islands sold, to whom sold, and what was the price received? Were any of the islands leased? If so, to whom, for how long, and at what rental? Were such sales or leases, if any, made by public or private sale? Is it the intention of the Government to dispose of any more of the islands in that river? If so, when? Will they be sold by private or public sale?

Mr. DALY. I am afraid the hon. gentleman will have to ask for a return of the House so far as the first part of his question is concerned. It is indefinite; as he does not state for what period of time he wants the information. If what the hon. gentleman wants to get at is: whether any islands have been recently sold, I can say that no islands have been recently sold since I became Minister of the Interior. Prior to that time islands were sold. As to the next part of the question: "Is it the intention of the Government to dispose of any more of the islands in that river?" the answer is: It is the intention of the Government. In reply to the next part of the question: "If so, when? Will they be sold by private or public sale?" the answer is: During the coming spring and summer, and they will be sold by private sale at the upset price.

BAY OF QUINTE—FISHING BY UNITED STATES CITIZENS.

Mr. WILSON asked, Is it the intention of the Government to prohibit citizens of the United States from taking game fish in the waters of the Bay of Quinté and Hay Bay? If not, is it the intention of the Government to charge them a license?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The practice of the department has been to permit fishing by visitors in the Bay of Quinté and Hay Bay, whether from the United States or elsewhere, when they were fishing purely for sport by hook and line, and no license fee has been charged for a license issued in such cases. I may state further to the hon. gentleman, that a practice has been reported, through the department, which shows that this privilege has been to some extent abused. That is to say: that launches or steam vessels come over from the United States side with parties on board ostensibly to engage in fishing for sport, but in reality are what are known as "pot-hunters," and who take a large quantity of fish by hook and line and by trawl behind the vessel. These fish have been taken and put upon the United States market for sale, and it is the intention of the department to devise some means of checking the practice to which I have referred, without needlessly interfering with visits from sportsmen from the States, which are very popular among the citizens of Canada in the waters mentioned.

COST OF TARIFF INQUIRY.

Mr. CASEY asked, What has been the total cost to date of the inquiry conducted by members of the Government in regard to tariff changes by means of meetings held throughout the country?

Mr. FOSTER. The cost has not been made out.

Mr. CASEY. The hon. gentleman promised to have it to-day.

Mr. FOSTER. It has not yet been made out.

MEDALS FOR VOLUNTEERS.

Mr. FRASER asked, Does the recent order of the Imperial Government respecting the issue of good conduct medals and decorations to officers and men of the volunteer force who have served twenty years, apply to Canada? Is it the intention of the Government to avail themselves of the privilege to reward officers and men as has been done in England? If so, has application been made to the English Government for an issue to Canadian volunteers?

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). The recent order of the Imperial Government respecting the issue of good conduct medals and decorations to officers and men of the volunteer force who have served twenty years does not apply to Canada. The decorations in question have been instituted for persons serving under the Volunteer Act of the United Kingdom. The provisions of that Act have nothing in common with those of the Canadian Militia Act, and therefore the regulations covering the issue of the volunteer medals do not apply to Canadian militiamen.

INSOLVENT ACT, 1875—OFFICIAL ASSIGNEES.

Mr. FAUVEL asked, What are the names of the official assignees who, acting under the Insolvent Act of 1875 and its amendments, have obtained legal discharges from all the insolvent estates placed in their hands during the period they held such office?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I will have to ask the hon. gentleman to ask for a return for that, because we have to communicate with the boards of trade and clerks of courts and other officers in all parts of the Dominion to get the information.

QUEBEC DRILL SHED—MODERN GUNS.

Mr. LAURIER asked, 1. Is it the intention of the Government to place in the drill shed at Quebec two of the modern and improved large sized guns? 2. Is the Government aware that the available space in the drill shed would be by the placing of these guns considerably curtailed?

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). Arrangements are being made for the mounting of the modern and improved large sized guns in the city of Quebec, where they will be available for drill by the artillerymen there. The site has not been decided upon.

NORTH RIVER FISHERIES.

Mr. GIROUARD (Two Mountains) asked, Whether the Government are aware that the dams constructed on the North River, in the parishes of St. Andrews and Lachute, in the county of Argenteuil, are not provided with fish-ways? Have the Government appointed inspectors or fishery overseers to see to the construction and maintenance of fish-ways on the North River? Is it the intention of the Government to provide immediately for the construction of fish-ways where required on the said North River?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The Government is aware that the dams on the North River, in the county of Argenteuil, are unprovided with fish-ways. The question of providing these fish-ways or compelling the owners of the dams to provide them, is now under the consideration of the department.

READJUSTMENT OF COUNTIES IN QUEBEC.

Mr. GUAY (for Mr. Brodeur) asked, 1. Have the Government, or any members of the Government, received a deputation from the province of Quebec asking for a readjustment of the counties in that province? If so, who were the members of said deputation, and what answer did the Government make? 2. Is it the intention of the Government to introduce, this year, a measure for the readjustment of the counties in the province of Quebec?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Brodeur), were here, I would ask him to consider the propriety of pressing this question—I mean the first part of it. I have had some conversation with members of Parliament on the subject, but I would have respectfully to decline to state what transpired at any interview I have had with members of Parliament. However, as to the second part of the question, the Government has arrived at no such intention up to the present time. If there should be any such intention arrived at in the future, the House will have ample notice of it.

PERSONATION AT CIVIL SERVICE EXAMINATIONS.

Mr. FAUVEL (for Mr. Brodeur) asked, 1. Whether the Government are aware that at the examinations for the Civil Service at Montreal, in November last, certain candidates were personated? 2. Is it true that the Government have prosecuted those who personated, without prosecuting at the same time those who were personated? 3. Is the Government aware that, at the said examinations, one Bourassa was personated? 4. Is it true that the said Bourassa has not been prosecuted for that offence, and that he is, in fact, now in the employment of the Government? Do the Government intend to prosecute Bourassa, and if not, why not?

Mr. COSTIGAN. C. O. Wilson, student, who impersonated Bourassa, a porter in the Montreal post office, and his brother, B. Wilson, who personated Rondeau, a letter-carrier in the same office, have been prosecuted and sentenced to a fine of $50 or two months' imprisonment. Bourassa, being an employee of the Post Office Department, that department has been notified of his offence. Bourassa's certificate has been cancelled, as appears in the last 'Canada Gazette.' It is the intention to proceed against all parties against whom sufficient evidence appears available to justify prosecution.

RIVER MILLE ISLES FISHERIES.

Mr. GIROUARD (Two Mountains) asked, Whether the Government are aware that the dam in River Mille Isles, at the Meunier Mills, in the parish of St. Francois de Sales and county of Laval, crosses the said river from side to side, that the said dam is not provided with a fish-way, and that it consequently prevents the fish from ascending River du Chêne and River du Nord? Have the Government received petitions from the riparian proprietors on Mille Isles River, complaining in the premises? Is it the intention of the Government to cause a fish-way to be constructed in the said dam?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The Government is aware that Meunier's dam, across the Mille Isles River, presents an obstruction to the ascent of fish. Petitions were received asking for the demolition of this dam or the construction of a fish-way. The locality was accordingly visited by an officer of the Department of Marine and Fisheries last summer, with the view of carrying out the wishes of the petitioners, but difficulties arising in connection with the ownership of the land, it was deemed advisable to delay action until this spring.

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND MILITIA.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) asked, Has the province of Prince Edward Island been re-established as a separate military district? If so, at what date was the order made, and by what name or number is the district to be known? Has any one yet been appointed as Deputy Adjutant General of such district? If so, who? If not, is it the intention of the Government to make such appointment at an early day?

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). The province of Prince Edward Island has been re-established as a separate military district. The Order in Council was passed on the 5th of February, 1894. No one has yet been appointed as Deputy Adjutant General of the district. It is the intention of the Government to make the appointment at an early day.

PRINTING OF VOTERS' LISTS.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) asked. What has been the total expenditure in connection with printing the Dominion voters' lists since the inception of the Printing Bureau up to the present time, for type, galleys, or other material or plant purchased for the setting or printing of such lists; also the total expenditure during the same period for labour in connection with the printing of such lists, and also the total additional expenditure estimated, in connection with the forthcoming revision under both the heads of new material or plant as well as labour?

Mr. COSTIGAN. The Printing Bureau was established on 2nd June, 1886. The first revision, in 1886, the printing for which was done outside, cost $180,960.43. The second revision, which was in 1889, included the reprinting of the old list, revision, purchase of plant and all expenses and cost, $124,606.94. The third revision, which took place in 1891, including the purchase of additional plant and all expenses, cost $65,680.59. The probable cost of the next revision will be in proportion to the names added and the changes made, based on the cost of the last revision.

SURVEYS OF CAPE CANSO.

Mr. FRASER asked, 1. When do the Government propose publishing Dr. Thorburn's surveys of Cape Canso? 2. Have the investigations of Messrs. Fletcher and Fari-bault been completed, and when will they be published, and how?

Mr. DALY. The map of Cape Canso has been published, the scale being 4 miles to one inch. It is being republished on a scale of one inch to one mile, in similar sized sheets, 16 sheets for one. These are not yet ready, but are being engraved. The investigations of Messrs. Fletcher and Fari-bault are being continued in Nova Scotia, and the results will be published as soon as possible.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.)

TRENT VALLEY CANAL.

Mr. HUGHES moved for:

Report of the Commission appointed to inquire into all matters concerning the Trent Valley Canal.

He said: Mr. Speaker, some years ago a commission was appointed to take evidence as to the feasibility of constructing the Trent Valley Canal. I understand that evidence has been gathered and that the commission has framed and written its report; but I find that the report has never been presented to the House, and the public have no record of what evidence has been adduced on the subject. I therefore beg to move for this report. It is not my intention at the present time to discuss the merits of the Trent Valley Canal; but I will take this opportunity of pressing on the Government, and especially on the Minister of Railways and Canals, the absolute necessity, whether the canal be constructed or not, of taking over all the waters tributary to the part of the canal already constructed. In the early days, as we are all aware, the territories adjoining the waters of the Trent Valley system were covered with forests. The forests held the water, and, as a consequence, the country along these lakes was not subjected to floods in the spring of the year, but the water passed out gradually, and there was a constant supply throughout the season. Now, all that is changed. The lumbermen have cleared the country of the forests, and the lumbermen's dams have all been taken away, except in a very few places, where there are still limits, so that now, as soon as the snow melts in the spring, or a rainfall comes in the summer, the water rushes from these lands and floods the country. We find almost annually evidence of this in the fact that the farmers along these lakes and rivers are continually presenting demands for damage by floods. And I am satisfied that all this can be obviated by the Government taking control of the waters. At present the Dominion controls all waters as far as the head of Lake Cameron up to Rosedale lock, and the Ontario Government control all the waters above. The consequence is that in the spring of the year it is the object of the Ontario Government officials to get rid of the surplus of water from their lakes by dumping it into the lakes below, and the lakes immediately below are always flooded in the spring. Then, as soon as the floods have passed away in the spring, it is the object of the Ontario Government to keep the waters back for any necessary purposes. Consequently, these lakes overflow in the spring, Cameron, Sturgeon, Pigeon, and others. And in the summer season, when water is required for navigation, and manufacturing establishments, we find these lakes are often so shallow that vessels can scarcely navigate them. Along the line of these waters, there are a large number of thriving business centres and manufacturing establishments, all of which use the water. From Trenton, up by Campbellford, Hastings, Peterboro', Lakefield, then passing on through the county of Victoria by Bobcaygeon, Lindsay, Fenelon Falls, Coboconk, and other places, there are more or less large and important industries which are forced to shut down in the summer, owing to scarcity of water. All this can be obviated by the Dominion Government assuming control of the waters at present controlled by the Ontario Government. By the erection of permanent dams in the places where the old lumberers' dams were formerly, the Government could store the water back. They could regulate it in the winter time so that no harm by the water would be done to the fields in the spring. Ample water could be stored back there for the purposes of manufacturing and navigation, and there would be no danger of the adjoining lands being flooded by the spring freshets. I do not know that it is necessary to point out anything further, and will simply urge the importance of this work on the attention of the Government. I would also urge that the three locks at present controlled by the Ontario Government should be taken over by the Dominion Government and enlarged to suit vessels plying in those waters. We have a large fleet of steamers, some twenty-five or thirty, employing several hundred hands, plying there, besides tugs engaged in hauling rafts, &c. We find that the works already constructed on the Trent Valley Canal are largely rendered useless by the fact that the largest steamers cannot get to points separated from the main lakes by the locks mentioned. I would urge the advisability of the Government taking over the three locks I have named—Young Point, Lindsay and Rosedale—and enlarging them so as to meet the requirements of vessels engaged in navigating these waters. When this report is brought down, I trust that the evidence of the commissioners will be found to bear out the desirability of constructing that canal throughout. However, until I see the report, I shall not say anything as to its further construction, but will simply urge on the Government, irrespective of the final completion of the canal as a through route, the necessity of taking cognizance of these points to which I have referred.

Mr. HAGGART. The Government have no objection to bringing down the report, and I will see that it is brought down at an early date. The department have at present under consideration the recommendation to the Government of the acquiring of that portion of the Trent Valley at present controlled by the Ontario Government; and, in order that the scheme of navigation shall be complete, it will be a necessity for the Government to acquire it. There is a great deal in the remarks of the hon. gentleman, in which he states that the Government ought to obtain control of the waters which supply the Trent River canal, in order that the water from the spring and winter freshets might be retained and distributed equally through the entire year. I have ordered the officer, in whose control the Trent River navigation is, to report upon these different reservoirs, in which the water may be retained, as soon as possible. In every other canal, notably the Rideau Canal, which has a summit level, and where water is required for navigation and manufacturing purposes, the Government have acquired all the different reservoirs or places to retain the water and distribute it throughout the year. And, in order to make the Trent River navigation complete, long before the completion of the canal, it will be necessary for the Government to obtain possession of the reservoirs of which the hon. gentleman speaks. I will have a report on the subject soon from the officers of the department, and will see that the report the hon. gentleman speaks of will be brought down as soon as possible.

Mr. EDGAR. Can the hon. gentleman give any estimate of the cost of acquiring these?

Mr. HAGGART. The cost will be very small, a few thousand dollars. Mostly the locks, which are a long way off the Trent River, are used by lumbermen only at present for floating timber down the river itself. I think the cost will be very little indeed, compared with the advantage of having water for an important work like the Trent River canal.

Mr. MULOCK. This is not the first that the House and the country have had the subject of the Trent Canal brought to their attention. But I think this is the first occasion on which the representative of the district, supposed to be served by this work, has taken the opportunity of making so modest a reference to that enterprise. I remember, a great many years ago, when the Government, without any doubt whatever, intimated to the House and the country that the canal was destined to be a great highway of communication between the northern waters and Lake Ontario. It was not, then, to be a mere local work to serve local ends and local wants—though, of course, that was an incident to it—but this great Trent Valley Canal, projected to run through eight good ridings was, if the Government was returned to power, to be 'un fait accompli' almost as soon as the election was over, and then we were to have the ocean vessels sailing up to the Georgian Bay. I think every representative of North Victoria has taken that view on every occasion in this House. But now we have the hon. member for North Victoria (Mr. Hughes) apparently preparing a place for the Government to fall. He comes out now and modestly wonders if this great work is practicable. The idea of a representative of North Victoria casting a doubt upon the practicability of this magnificent national scheme and showing such treason to his riding, such want of confidence in the predecessors of this Administration! What is there in this report? Has a little insight into it been given to the member for North Victoria that he is now trying to break the force of the Government's fall? He trusts that it will be a practicable scheme, but he will reserve further consideration until he sees the report. How long is it since this report was sent in? The previous Minister of Railways had no doubt in his mind of the practicability of it before the election of 1882, but since then the commissions have been issued, or, at least a standing commission has been appointed to consider the matter—and for how many years it has been standing nobody knows. Perhaps it is prepared at last to bring forth some fruits. This commission, it seems, has made its report long since, and what I would like to know is why the Government has not given that report to the country? Last session this matter was before the House and then we were promised the report.

Mr. HUGHES. No.

Mr. MULOCK. The hon. gentleman says "No." What, then, was the commission appointed for if not to make a report? The matter was discussed in Supply last session and we were told we were to have the report. A year has rolled by and we are now told the report is in the pigeon-holes somewhere; but it is not given to the country. This is not treating the House with candour or the country with confidence. The people of North Victoria will learn with great disappointment of the falling off on the part of their member who now wants to know if the Government will be graciously pleased to take over an additional lock or two at the cost of a few thousand dollars so as to enable the vessels that are now plying on the route to get a little further up, instead of doing as his predecessor did and asking the Government to endorse this great water-way which was going to make the head of ocean navigation in the Thunder Bay district via the Trent Valley Canal.

Mr. DAVIN. Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) has entirely misrepresented the attitude of my friend from North Victoria (Mr. Hughes). My hon. friend from North Victoria did not throw any doubt upon the construction of the work. But my hon. friend from North York does not appreciate the transition from the rough and ready methods of the former member for North Victoria to the politeness and suavity of the present representative. The polite manner of my hon. friend from North Victoria is thrown away on my hon. friend from North York. As the seconder of his motion, I desire to say that I would have nothing to do with seconding it if I thought that my hon. friend in proposing the motion had not a bona fide desire that this great work should be carried out. I know something, Sir, of the country that is interested in this work.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). This water-stretch.

Mr. DAVIN. Water-stretch—yes. I am glad my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills) remembers that. It shows that he is in the state of mind described by the poet when he speaks of the glowing visions of one's past life standing up and saying farewell. Water-stretch or no water stretch, there can be no more important work undertaken by the Minister of Railways than this which is urged upon him by my hon. friend from North Victoria. From what we know of the past administration of the Railway Department by its present responsible head, I think we may fairly entertain the most sanguine confidence that the hopes so modestly expressed by my hon. friend from North Victoria will be realized, and realized not the less soon and not the less completely because they were expressed in a thoroughly parliamentary manner. Mr. Speaker, I am glad to throw whatever little influence I possess in favour of any movement that will promote this work. For, I may tell you—if the House has the least interest in having a confession from me—that I at one time intended to run for one of the Victorias, and so I took an interest in this "water-stretch," because as Mr. Disraeli said, one must have an eye to the main chance. And it is not a matter of complaisance on my part my seconding this motion. I may say that I have made several presents of silver cups and mugs and silver knives and forks in these ridings with the same prospects, and the number of times I have stood godfather in one or other of them, I really do not know; but I daresay my hon. friend from North Victoria has some knowledge of it. I would urge the Minister to complete this work as soon as possible.

Mr. EDGAR. I think, Mr. Speaker, the question is, does the hon. gentleman stand god-father to this project?

Mr. DAVIN. As seconder of this resolution, I certainly do.

Motion agreed to.

CATTLE TRADE WITH ENGLAND.

Mr. McMULLEN moved for:

Copies of all letters, despatches and correspondence between the Government and the High Commissioner of Canada regarding the removal of the embargo on Canadian cattle entering English ports.

He said: In bringing this matter before the House, Mr. Speaker, I desire to preface the resolution with a few remarks. This, in my humble opinion, is an exceedingly grave question for the country under present condition. We all know very well, and the records of the country prove quite clearly, that this trade in cattle with England has been a very important one to our people. We all regret that, owing to the embargo that has been imposed in England, together with other restrictions, this trade has been crippled and thus, instead of enlarging, it has been growing less. I see by the records that this trade touched the highest point in the year 1890. In that year the number of cattle shipped to Great Britain was 104,133, of a total value of $8,114,145. In 1891 the total number was 99,967; valued at $7,381,284. In 1892 the number was 93,206, and the total value, $6,920,748. In 1893 the number was 89,572, and the total value, $6,799,638. Now, by these figures it will be noticed that this very important trade has been falling off. It has not been falling off for the want of cattle, or from a lack of desire on the part of the farmers of this country to extend this trade, but it has been falling off for two causes. The first of these is the unfortunate action on the part of England in scheduling our cattle and thus enforcing their slaughter at the port of debarkation; in the second place, the trade has fallen off by the action of the steamship companies who have had the entire trade brought to their doors, and have handled it without competition. We know that owing to a desire on the part of the Dominion Government to secure for us the advantages that we occupied in the British market before the scheduling arrangement was proposed, they made a quarantine regulation against American cattle coming into Canada or passing through this country. We know that by that provision American stock were not permitted to come into our country unless they were segregated for at least ninety days; then, if they were found to be clean and free from disease, they were permitted to come in and intermix with our cattle; if not, they had to be returned. The Americans were deeply incensed over that embargo placed upon their cattle coming into Canada, and in retaliation they imposed a like quarantine regulation on cattle going from Canada into the United States. The result has been that American ports have been completely closed to us for the purpose of shipping cattle. Now, I do not for a moment challenge the desirability of the action taken by this Government in the direction of securing the removal of the embargo in England; but I do think that by passing the Order in Council scheduling cattle coming in from the United States in the very stringent and severe manner that was adopted, they have brought upon us the condition of things from which we are now suffering, by which the ports of the United States are completely closed against our shippers. We know that those who are the most interested in the cattle trade have recently complained very loudly of the extortions to which they are subjected by the steamboat owners. The price that has been extorted from them from time to time has in many instances been far in excess of the price which should be charged for the transportation of cattle from Montreal to the other side. We find on examination that the prices charged from Quebec and Montreal are in excess of those charged from Boston, New York and Portland. Now, this is a condition of things that is seriously militating against this particular trade. I am pleased that my esteemed friend from North York (Mr. Mulock) has brought in a Bill that possibly may reach the grievance to which the farmers and shippers have been subjected by the combinations that may have existed between the steamship companies. There are other causes at work that also seriously militate against this trade. When shippers are confined to the port of Montreal alone, many men who are engaged in the trade and are anxious to make money out of it, resort to scalping the contracts, or the accommodation that is given by the steamboat companies, by taking up the room and reselling it. I have been told on good authority that in some cases men have realized as much as $800 out of the re-sale of space of these steamers from Montreal to the other side. Now that is an evil that we should, if possible, reach by legislation. We do not allow people, for instance, to buy and sell railway tickets. In the interest of the railways companies, an Act has been passed forbidding a man to re-sell a railway ticket if below the ordinary rates. In many other ways we have moved in the direction of preventing monopolies of that kind. Now, I think we should move also in the direction of preventing the restriction and crippling of this trade by the extortions to which those who are engaged in it, are subjected. I do not know that all the fault lies at the doors of the steamship owners, but I do say that by narrowing the cattle trade of this country in such a way as confines it entirely and absolutely to one port like Montreal, the steamboat owners and the cattle dealers are enabled to combine for the purpose of practising extortions on the farming community, and that is an evil which should be handled vigorously by the Government of this country with the object of removing it as speedily as possible. I claim that the province of Ontario, if it is to succeed at all as an agricultural province, has got to confine its operations largely to the growth and feeding of stock, as well as to the production of butter and cheese. It is better adapted for these three things than it is to anything else. While we do grow some coarse grains, and can grow very well those that are more generally used in the feeding of stock, we are not now prepared, nor are we in a position, to compete with the prairies of the west in the production and sale of wheat. For many reasons our farms are small, our fields are limited, and they cannot compete in the raising of wheat with the extensive farms of the western states and of our own North-west. Consequently the farmers of the province of Ontario have got to turn their attention to the production of butter and cheese, and cattle, rather than to any other lines; and those who are devoting themselves to those lines, are doing better than they have been able to do by growing grain. Now, cattle is one of the most important items of the farmer. We have unquestionably the best climate on the continent of America. We produce about the best grasses that can be produced for fattening cattle, and we have a magnificent supply of pure water. These three essentials to the development of the cattle trade, we have in our province, and all we need now are facilities for transshipment of cattle, and the removal, if possible, of the embargo that has been placed upon cattle in England. I have already pointed out some of the ways in which the Government might have facilitated the transshipment of stock. The Americans are deeply interested in this very same business, and in order to retain to themselves the advantages that they enjoy in the English market, notwithstanding the fact that their stock is subject to contagious diseases to a very much greater extent than Canadian stock, they have taken every step they possibly could to facilitate the transshipment of stock from their country to England, and to the continent. The Americans have in every port in England experienced veterinaries who are ready to inspect stock when it arrives, give every assistance to shippers in regard to debarkation of the stock, and also in taking active measures to investigate any disease that may have been supposed to have arisen on board the vessel, and with which the cattle may be troubled on their arrival. This policy has proved a very desirable one. I am sorry that our Government have not considered it to be their duty to take steps in the same direction. We have no veterinary in any port of Europe, not even in England. The United States Government have not only carried out that system as regards the British Isles, but have done so in Germany. The result has been a very large and increasing trade with Germany. They have been able to unload their cattle there and carry them as far inland as Switzerland, thus doing a very important and desirable trade. I am glad to notice that we shipped to Germany during last year 1,891 cattle, of the value of $152,080. I contend that our Government should immediately move in the matter of the adoption of measures to facilitate the transportation of cattle, as has been done by the United States Government. Instead of the High Commissioner, whose appointment was largely made with the view to guarding the interests of the cattle trade and placing them under his personal attention—and no doubt he may have rendered some desirable services at certain times—the officer required in England is an experienced veterinary, who perhaps might work in connection with the High Commissioner's Department, and who would be ready at all times to furnish such assistance as the circumstances required. I know a case in which cattle were shipped to Liverpool, and on their arrival their healthy condition was challenged. One of the animals was slaughtered, and its lungs were sent to London for inspection and analysis. The shipper was kept with his cattle for twenty-four hours, not knowing whether they would be admitted or whether they would have to be thrown overboard in the ocean. Any one can imagine the excited condition of the shipper. Had the Canadian Government possessed its own experienced veterinary, he could have made an immediate inspection and the difficulty would have been overcome, and the shipper would not have been subjected to that delay and would also not have missed the market. Everything that is possible should be done to facilitate, encourage and increase the volume of our cattle shipments to England. I am sure the members of the Government in travelling through the western portion of Ontario, in order to learn what changes in the tariff would be popular, must have been struck with the very extensive and commodious bank barns fitted up entirely for the care and fattening of stock. Those are evidences of the trade which the farmers are desirous of cultivating—namely, the shipment of fat cattle in the spring. The cattle shipments from Ontario will not seriously conflict with similar shipments from the North-west. Those largely take place in October, November and December. A large number of cattle are placed in the barns and are fed during the winter on coarse grains and other foods for shipment during some period between the middle of April and the middle of July. Shipments are more desirable about 1st May than any other period. At the present time shippers are in a quandary as to what they will be able to do with their fat stock, a very large quantity of which is on hand. The best quotations for the Montreal market on the 17th of the month were 4 cents per pound live weight, while at Buffalo the rates ranged from 4.45 cents to 4.60. At the same time Buffalo is 450 miles from the ocean, whereas at Montreal our live stock can easily be shipped. It is difficult to understand the difference in value with regard to cattle at these two points. The price in Montreal should be higher than in Buffalo, but it is otherwise. I can attribute this difference to nothing but this fact, that the steamship companies impose rates in excess of the actual value of the transportation of cattle from Montreal, or at least the rates are in excess of those charged from New York, Boston or Portland. Whether the responsibility for these increased rates rests entirely with the steamship owners, or should in a measure be borne by the scalpers, who take advantage of their opportunity and procure space for cattle, I am not prepared to say. Both these evils certainly exist, and when we deal with one it would be desirable to include the other. I have in my hand a circular recently issued by the cattle men, in which they attempt to outline the grievances to which they have been subjected. I notice in that circular that our total shipments to England from 1875 to the present time were of the aggregate value of about $75,000,000. Accordingly, it is unquestionably a very important trade to this country, and it is one we should endeavour by every possible means, and by every possible legislative act to encourage. I notice, also, that the cattle trade reached its height in 1890, and I have already given to the House figures showing the trade between different periods up to 1893. With respect to the quarantine regulations between the United States and Canada, it is a matter of surprise to me that the Americans are able to ship their cattle through Canada by way of Boston and Montreal, over our railways, when we are not able to ship cattle over our railways and American roads to Boston and Portland. I am glad in the interests of the American railways that they are able to do this, because it would be unquestionably a serious blow to our two great trans-continental lines if they were prevented carrying cattle from one point to another. While it is desirable in the interests of our railways that they should be permitted to do that, it is very important that some arrangement should be come to as speedily as possible, so as to enable our people to ship their cattle either at Portland or Boston, as well as at Montreal. If such an arrangement were made I am quite sure that the extortions to which shippers are subjected to, both by the steamship companies as well as by those who "corner" the space at the port of Montreal, would be obviated, and that our exporters would not be hampered as they now are. I would like to know what effort has been made in the direction of securing this privilege, because it is a singular thing to me that the privilege should be enjoyed by the people of the western states of shipping their cattle through our country, while it is denied the shippers of Ontario to send our cattle to England through Portland and Boston. The existing arrangement is unquestionably a very serious loss to Canadians engaged in that trade. It is a well-known fact that the charges for the shipment of cattle vary very considerably, and it is a most extraordinary thing that even in many cases the steamboat companies have been unable to quote rates. It has also occurred that even when the cattle were put on board the shippers were not able to ascertain the cost of transport to the English market until the ship was out in the Atlantic Ocean. They did not know until then how much per head it would cost them to send their cattle across, and it will be easily seen what a great disadvantage shippers labour under when they are compelled in this way to conduct their business in the dark. Sometimes under this regulation they make money unexpectedly, but on the other hand, and I believe in the greater number of cases, they are obliged to suffer a very serious loss. The rates have varied from $7 a head to $17.50, so that a man shipping a large number of cattle may be put to an unexpected and enormous increase of charges for their transportation when he is not informed as to what the rates are until after the ship has sailed. Were we in such a position as to permit our cattle shippers the alternative of consigning their cattle from a United States port, if they so choose, they would not be subjected to the inconvenience and the extortion which has been their experience in the past. As I have already said, I am not prepared to assert that the entire fault rests with the steamship owners. I was under that impression until I made inquiries, but I now find that the evil rests with men who make a habit of buying out all the space upon those steamers when they arrive. They contract to load a steamer with 600 or 1,000 head of cattle, and secure all the available accommodation. I fancy that they keep a considerable number of animals on hand, and if they cannot resell the space at high rates they ship themselves. In some cases I believe the ship has been compelled to leave port without filling up her space, and the steamship owners have been obliged to compromise and in some cases lose the entire sum for which they had contracted. I know that this has happened in some cases. This condition of things should not be permitted, and some effort should be made to prevent the space being monopolized and resold by men who make a practice of doing this for the purpose of grinding money out of the cattle shippers. This cornering of space, and the consequent charging of higher rates, strikes directly at the prices paid to the farmer for his cattle, because it hampers the exportation of the animals. The system is a very great injustice, and should be done away with. I have endeavoured to place before the House the objectionable features of the present arrangement, because I am anxious that every effort should be made to encourage this important trade. I believe that the Government are lax in their efforts. They should have guarded with a strong hand the privileges that we enjoyed some years ago. Had they taken the proper care of the privileges which we enjoyed in the English market before 1890, I believe that we might have enjoyed the continuance of those privileges up to the present time. Although I have no doubt that an effort had been made to get the scheduling of our cattle removed, that effort has not succeeded. In the first instance we should have had our own men on the other side, who would lend a helping hand, give an encouraging word, and render all needed services when our cattle were being taken off the steamers. We should have our own officers there to see after the disposal of the cattle, to show that our cattle were free from disease, and we should not have been left to the inspection and criticism of English veterinarians, who in many cases. I have no doubt, are only too anxious to find fault with our cattle, and to cripple our trade. I do hope that when the papers come down, which my resolution calls for, they will show clearly that a very determined effort has been made in the direction of removing that embargo. In the meantime I am glad to know that the Bill introduced by the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) will receive the earnest and prompt consideration of this House, and I trust that it will become law, so as to remedy the unfortunate condition of things that now exist. Every encouragement possible should be given to this particular trade, which is one of the most desirable that has been adopted by our farmers in the west. I hope that our farmers will be enabled to reap all the advantages that that Bill will give them by removing the extortions to which cattle shippers are now subjected. I believe that the Bill of the hon. member (Mr. Mulock) will have the effect of facilitating a trade which we all hope to see grow and increase, but which unfortunately has not been in a progressive condition from the year 1890 to the present time.

Mr. CASEY. I am very glad that the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) has brought this matter before the House. We have a right to know why it is that we have not been able to prove the freedom of our cattle from contagious diseases to the satisfaction of the British authorities. I think it is very generally known that our cattle are very free from contagious pneumonia. If it were not so, if even a few sporadic cases had occurred throughout the country, it is quite certain that we should have had, not only those few cases, but an actual epidemic of the disease; and it would have been proven beyond all doubt that the disease was of the contagious kind. It is well known to all interested in this matter that there is a kind of pneumonia, which, although injurious to the animal it affects, is not contagious, which may arise from unsanitary conditions in the stabling on land, or from similar conditions on shipboard in the passage from this country to Europe. But this disease, even if the animal is affected by it on leaving Canada, is not of such a nature as to communicate itself to British herds. Now, it seems to me, that, during the considerable time that this matter has been under discussion, it should have been possible for the Canadian Government, aided by the Department of Agriculture here, and by the High Commissioner in England, to prove to the satisfaction of the Board of Trade there, that the only kind of pneumonia that has ever existed here is of the non-contagious kind, and thereby to retain the great privilege we formerly enjoyed of having our cattle freely admitted to all parts of the United Kingdom. I need not point out the value of that privilege. All farmers, and all who are interested in farmers, must know that it is a great privilege, and one that adds materially to the value of our stock, for shipment. Now, Sir, we are not alone in urging upon the British Government the desirability of removing this embargo. We are supported in our contentions by the Scotch farmers, and by the Scotch experts who have examined the lungs of Canadian cattle said to have been diseased. The people of Scotland and the people of the north of England want to get our stockers to feed. Of course, by importing our stockers and feeding them there, they no doubt make a profit that might be made by Canadian farmers under certain circumstances. But it is always advisable to leave open to our farmers the possibility of selling stockers to the British trade when they do not find it convenient, for lack of capital or otherwise, to fatten them at home. If they could be fattened at home, there would no doubt be more money made in this country. On the other hand, there are some who have only a few to sell, who are not in a position to stall-feed them, and to whom it would be a great privilege to sell them to graziers in Great Britain. Even in the case of those which are fat when shipped, it is a great privilege to be able to send them from the port of landing in Great Britain to other places to be sold if the price is too low at the port of entry. The Department of Agriculture undoubtedly made some effort to discover whether the contagious disease exists in any part of Canada; but those efforts cannot have been as efficient as they should have been, or the proof brought out by the inquiries and examinations made would have been sufficient to satisfy the English authorities. I must assume that the proof required was not sufficient, or that our High Commissioner, on whom rests the duty of urging this matter on the British authorities, has not done his duty. It would be a matter of far greater importance to the farmers of Canada to secure a renewal of this privilege than to secure the French treaty which the High Commissioner has been negotiating. It would even be more important to them than any possible settlement of the dispute about the Behring Sea fisheries. Those fisheries are important, no doubt, to a small part of the people of the Dominion, and it was highly necessary and proper that the question should be settled in a fair manner. But their importance to Canada as a whole will not bear any comparison whatever with the importance of this trade in live cattle, which is, although not killed, very much reduced, by the scheduling which has taken place. I say that if the High Commissioner had made himself more effective in this matter, he would have been doing a far greater service to Canada than he has done in the matters alluded to. He may have done all he knew how to do;

he may have exerted his ability to the utmost, but the fact remains that he has not been effective in securing what we wanted done. The truth is that we have no contagious pleuro-pneumonia in Canada; and we have a High Commissioner in the old country who is supposed to have given his best intelligence and his best energy to impressing that fact on the British public, and he has not succeeded in doing so. Either he has not been capable of making the best use of the proof at his disposal, or he has not given sufficient time and energy to the matter. It will be for the House and the country to decide whether or not the failure to get the embargo removed is due to the want of ability, energy, and application on the part of the High Commissioner. Of course, I do not intend for a moment to say that all the blame for that failure should rest upon him. I cannot help thinking, from the results, or the lack of results, obtained that the Government here have not sufficiently backed him up—have not considered the matter of sufficient importance. If it were possible to imagine the passage of some Order in Council in Great Britain forbidding the importation of a certain line of Canadian manufactures into that country, closing its ports against cotton or woollen or iron goods, or even imposing a moderate duty upon those articles, would we not have an agitation, an excitement, and an activity on the part of the Government and the High Commissioner that would make things exceedingly lively for the British authorities? And would they have ceased from their efforts until they obtained the same admission for those goods that was formerly enjoyed? The question needs no answer. The privileged classes can enlist the whole intelligence and activity and energy of the Government on their behalf; but I will not believe, until we have proof to the contrary, that the farmer has obtained to equal advantage the intelligence and activity of the Government in this matter. I understood my hon. friend from North Wellington to urge that there should be Canadian experts at the port of landing. I think that is an exceedingly proper suggestion. As things are now, the Scotch experts differ from the English experts as to the condition of the cattle alleged to have been affected with pleuro-pneumonia. If there had been a Canadian expert, accustomed to seeing this disease in its occasional appearances among Canadian herds, he might have been able to see the difference between the two classes of disease. No doubt English experts have been unduly nervous and agitated about the possibility of introducing the contagion into that country, on account of the great losses suffered there in past years, and it is not to be wondered at that they should take advantage of anything even remotely similar to contagious pleuro-pneumonia. But if there were authoritative experts engaged on behalf of Canada—they need not be Canadians, but should be men whose character as experts would be fully recognized in England—to assist the other experts in examining the cattle, the results might have been different. The Board of Trade should be really the tribunal before which these experts would appear as counsel for the different parties concerned—expert counsel for Canada, expert counsel for Scotland, and expert counsel for England. If that suggestion were carried out, I am sure the result would be satisfactory. Of course one cannot be positive as to what has been or what has not been done until we get the papers. We can only judge of the activity exercised by the results, until we see the actual correspondence. I have given my opinion, judging from the results, as to what energy has been shown by the Government. But when we have the correspondence, we shall be more able to estimate their action in detail. I hope there will be no delay whatever in bringing down the correspondence.

Mr. SPROULE. I would like to offer a few remarks in addition to what has already been said. Any one who has taken the trouble to read over the correspondence brought down last year or inquire into this difficulty, must, in all fairness, come to the conclusion that the Government have made every effort to have this embargo lifted. From the moment the announcement was made concerning the two cases of supposed diseased cattle that were brought over in the fall of 1892, and up to the present time, a series of efforts have been made to satisfy the demands of the Board of Agriculture in London and the British Minister of Agriculture. I can add very little to what has been said by the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) as to the importance of this matter. Its importance cannot be overestimated. The fact that the trade reached the large proportion it did in 1892, when we shipped about ninety thousand head of stockers to England, and the fact that these cattle were allowed to travel to any part of Great Britain without being slaughtered, whereas to-day every head shipped has to be slaughtered on arrival, shows the great importance of this matter to the Canadian people. In addition to that, a number of finished cattle were sent over, making an aggregate of 123,000 head in that year. It is true that for a few years there was a falling off, which falling off the hon. member for North Wellington accounts for in one way. But there is another way in which it can be accounted for, and that is that the supply was greater than the demand, and very naturally the consequent reduction in value made the trade less profitable and caused shippers to reduce their shipments. A good deal has been said here with regard to the action of the High Commissioner. But I must say, after looking over the correspondence, that, in my opinion, no man could have more zealously defended the rights of Canada and more energetically endeavoured to have the embargo raised. Every letter and telegram that he sent, from day to day, showed the live interest he took in the matter. I must say, and I think the Canadian people as a whole will come to the same conclusion, that it was almost impossible to satisfy the demands made upon the other side. When it was announced that contagious pleuro-pneumonia had been found in Canadian cattle, this Government at once issued an order for an inquiry to be made in order to trace the source from which the suspected cattle came. One of the sources was Pilot Mound in Manitoba, but the examinations by the veterinary surgeons in that part of the country, and in every part of the country where the cattle came from, which went over in the vessels 'Hurona' and 'Monkseaton,' on which the supposed disease was alleged to have broken out, disclosed the fact that no contagious disease existed in any portion of Manitoba. That, however, did not satisfy the people on the other side. They wanted still further information, which was given them from time to time. Not only were examinations made in those localities whence the cattle were taken, but also in every part of the country—which examinations disclosed the fact that there had been no contagious pleuro-pneumonia among Canadian cattle and that it had never been known to exist—but in accordance with the further contention that our quarantine regulations were not sufficient to exclude importations from the United States, it was shown that the only laxity in the quarantine regulations was with regard to bringing in cattle into Manitoba and the North-west Territories from these western states where the disease was never known to exist. To satisfy the demands of the English people, however, an embargo was put on the importation of cattle from these western states, and our regulations were changed so as absolutely to prevent the possibility of the importation of diseased cattle from the other side. And as the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) said, owing, no doubt, to some irritation among the Americans on that score, the United States Government passed an Order in Council prohibiting the export of our cattle through their country and preventing the shipment of our cattle through American ports. We have since been confronted with another difficulty arising from this cause. Being shut out from the American ports, we are confined to the port of Montreal for our cattle shipments, and the steamboat owners of the lines leaving that port, being possessed of that selfish nature which appears to characterize people when able to control any line out of which they can make money, have combined together and regulated their freight rates so as to take all the profits that might be received by the Canadian exporter or the Canadian farmer through the rise of prices on the other side, because, as soon as the market goes up there, they raise the freight rates and, as Canadians are unable to ship from any other port, they must accept the conditions imposed, no matter how unreasonable they may be. The shippers are left in the unfortunate position of not being able to decide what price they can afford to pay for cattle in the country. I know that throughout western Ontario you cannot find a buyer prepared to give you a quotation for cattle. They do not know what they may be obliged to pay for freight or what margin they can work on, taking into account the condition of the market on the other side. They are asking that the Government introduce some legislation to control the steamship companies so that they may no longer be able to impose these onerous conditions upon the shippers of cattle. It appears to be a very difficult task to control those companies, as it will be regarded as a grave matter to interfere in the making of contracts between one party and another. But it seems to me that the trade is of so much importance to the country that the Government would be quite justified by the circumstances of the case in stepping in and passing a law to compel the steamship companies to announce their freight rates so that the cattle buyers may know how to govern themselves in the buying of cattle. It seems to me that the steamship owners have been acting in this matter in a very hoggish manner, to say the least of it. Last year, when the condition of the market made it possible for the people of Canada to send over certain lines of goods at a reasonable rate of profit, the steamship owners and the railway companies combined, or, at least, agreed, to raise rates, and thus took to themselves practically all the profit and left the parties engaged in the business of export agents without reasonable compensation for the trade they carried on. Only last summer, hay was in great demand in Britain, and the market price ruled high. The Canadian hay crop had been abundant and of superior quality, and parties went into the pressing of hay for export to the English market. I know that in my part of the country several presses were brought in and extensive operations were entered upon. The people engaged in this business based their calculations upon the ruling figures in the market at the time and upon the freight rates as they then existed. But, no sooner had they commenced operations than the steamship companies put up the freight rates, if I remember well, $4 a ton, and the railway companies put up their rates $2 a ton, thus between them taking away nearly all the profits in the trade. Instead of running up into hundreds of thousands of tons, the trade was limited to a very small proportion by this move on the part of the steamship and railway companies. It would seem to be a very short-sighted policy on the part of these companies; for, if the carriage of hay at the prices quoted up to that time yielded fair returns, surely those rates would have been more profitable to them when there was a large quantity to be carried. We hold that such conduct on the part of these people would justify the Government in passing a law to prevent such interference with what might be a very important trade and one beneficial not only to the farmers, but to the country generally. Their actions in connection with the cattle trade are even worse. They will not tell the exporter what price he will be compelled to pay until after the cattle are on the vessel. Sometimes it is not until after the vessels are far down the St. Lawrence, or even on the ocean, that the first intimation is given as to what the freight rates are to be. Of course, it is clear that in offering prices for cattle, the buyers must take into consideration not only the price ruling in the market on the other side, but the freight through the accidents of the trade and the cost of carrying the cattle to Montreal, the port of shipment. They will go over this calculation very closely, and upon the margin they find they will strike the price that they pay to the farmers. But they are prevented from making that calculation by the action of the steamship owners, who decline to quote the freight rates until the cattle are in the vessel. It is easy to understand that, under these circumstances, when they buy at all, the cattle buyers must offer lower prices, because they must have a larger margin to work upon in order to save themselves from the danger of an increase in the cost of transportation. As the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) says, the trade being confined to the one port of Montreal, it is easy to control it, and the vessel owners are able to carry on their combine, or whatever you call it, and thus they can, and do, stand in the way of the trade, instead of helping the exporters to extend it and make it profitable to all concerned. I believe that every one who has given attention to the subject, will agree that, as I say, the Government will be justified in passing a law which, under other circumstances, might be regarded as arbitrary, to control the actions of these men in order to preserve to the country a trade so important as this. There are certain things that the Government might do to improve the situation. For instance, they might prevent vessel owners or steamship companies from becoming insurance companies. Sometimes the vessel owners compel a man who puts his cattle on their vessels to insure those cattle through their own agency at higher rates than could be secured in other insurance companies. This could be met by the means I suggest—by making a law, if necessary, to prevent steamship owners from acting as insurance agents. Again, the Government should compel the steamship companies to announce their freight rates some time in advance, so that exporters may have something on which to base their calculations of the price they can afford to pay for cattle. The steamship companies should give a valid written or printed contract so that the exporter may know what he is doing and what he can pay to the farmers for cattle, I think the Government should go further, and prevent the sub-letting of space, for that system may have an injurious effect upon the trade. That was proved only two years ago, when some exporters bought up all the space and sold it at advance rates to others and actually prevented some from exporting who would otherwise have carried on this business. As to the embargo on our cattle in Great Britain, I firmly believe that the Government have done all that could be done to remove the embargo, and I was pleased to notice an item in one of the papers on Saturday which seemed to hold out hope that we may have that embargo raised before long. That item is as follows:—

TORONTO, April 21.—The 'Empire's' cable correspondent says: At last there is something definite in regard to the cattle embargo. The Right Honourable Herbert Gardner, president of the Board of Agriculture, promises to announce on Monday the decision of the Government in the matter. It is believed on good authority that a conditional removal of the restrictions for six months has been agreed upon.

Well, let us earnestly hope it has been; upon what terms we do not know, but we can only hope that favourable action may develop out of the condition of things existing at the present time. The hon. member for North Wellington said that the Government ought to appoint inspectors, veterinarians, to look after Canadian cattle landed in England. That suggestion was made last spring by the Committee on Agriculture, which looked into this subject very carefully. That committee advised that veterinarians should be appointed to look after our cattle on landing, as it was intimated if, when the cattle were slaughtered, a complete absence of pleuro-pneumonia was shown, the embargo would be removed. Advice was given to the Government to have veterinarians appointed there who would look after our interests. I think I am correct in saying that these were appointed, and the hon. member for North Wellington, I think, is not correct in saying that there was no person there to look after our interest. If I remember correctly, and I read some of the correspondence that went on between the High Commissioner and the Canadian authorities here, there were four or five veterinarians appointed there to look after the interest of the Canadian farmers. Three of them were English veterinarians, and two of them, I think, were Scotch. But after the slaughtering begun, and one or two cases were brought to the notice of the Board of Agriculture, which appeared to show that pleuro-pneumonia existed, then a dispute began as to the diagnosis of the cases, and I think there was, perhaps, a little more laxity shown than was compatible with the interests at stake, in not keeping portions of the lungs under proper supervision from the time they were taken from the animals until the time they were subjected to a close microscopical inspection by the experts who were requested to do that work. I fancy there might have been a little more care exercised in that respect, so far as we can judge from the meagre information laid before us. But knowing that portions of the lungs were taken from the suspected animals, and that they were under seal and under care up to the time they were submitted to examination by the microscope, I believe the information disclosed was not by any means conclusive that contagious pleuro-pneumonia existed. The contention set up by those looking after Canadian interests was that these cases were rather of a sporadic character, or were rather cases of broncho pneumonia which might be developed in cattle taken, as many of the Canadian cattle were, from warm underground stables, or places where they were fed on distillery refuse, and then put upon vessels where they were exposed to the varying temperatures of an ocean voyage, and the knocking about on the vessel, and that this ordinary exposure itself was quite sufficient to start up pneumonia, although not of a contagious type. There seemed to be a difference of opinion between the experts who were looking after the interests of Canada and the experts who were representing the Board of Agriculture in England as to whether these cases were or were not contagious pleuro-pneumonia. But so far as any medical man can exercise a judgment on the information that was at our disposal, I think it is quite clear, as it was to the Canadian veterinarians, that these were not cases of contagious pleuro-pneumonia, but were rather cases of a sporadic character, of pneumonia, if pneumonia at all, and of a character that might arise at any time in cattle being transported from one part of the country to the other, on board vessels or in cars. Now, I believe the British Board of Agriculture were invited by our Government to send over their own veterinarians to Canada, who would be associated with veterinary surgeons of Canada, and they together should visit every part of the country and make a careful and thorough examination of the stock, in order to satisfy themselves whether pleuro-pneumonia had ever existed in this country. If I am correctly informed they refused to take advantage of that offer, which fact, to my mind, ought to be a conclusive evidence that on our part at least we had no apprehensions of any person being able to find the existence of pleuro-pneumonia in Canada, otherwise such a liberal offer as that would never have been made. I think it is to be regretted that the British authorities did not take advantage of that offer, when nothing else would satisfy them, and send over their own experts here so that we might satisfy them, if possible, that pleuro-pneumonia had never existed in the country. But at the present time I am glad to believe that there is an indication on the other side of a growing belief that pleuro-pneumonia does not exist here, because I notice that in an answer given to a deputation who interviewed the Minister of Agriculture in England and the Board of Agriculture in London, he intimated that it was pretty conclusively proven that pleuro-pneumonia did not exist in Canada, that they had under consideration the wisdom of raising this embargo, and that possibly they might decide to raise it. No doubt there was a strong influence at work on the other side to maintain this embargo, but I think that influence arose, not so much from a desire to protect English cattle from contracting a contagious disease, as from a desire, on behalf of the English farmer, to keep up the prices to a higher point than they could be kept if Canadian cattle were freely admitted. To my mind this is conclusive evidence that there is a disposition among some parties in England to introduce some form of protection there such as we have adopted in the interest of the Canadian people. It was not for the purpose of keeping out a contagious disease, because there was nothing in the correspondence that passed between the Minister of Agriculture in Canada and the British Board of Agriculture, or the High Commissioner in England, to prove that pleuro-pneumonia had ever existed here, or was likely to exist, because our quarantine regulations are such that we think it is impossible to import it into this country. Now, it is to be hoped that the negotiations that are being carried on will result in the raising of this embargo at an early date. It is very important to the Canadian farmer that it should be raised, and I am sure the Government are doing everything that can be done for the purpose of raising it. I am also sure that the High Commissioner was as zealous and as active and as energetic in his efforts to get that embargo raised as it was possible for any man to be in his position, since that unfortunate affair took place in the fall of 1892. I think that he is entitled to the thanks of the Canadian people for the efforts he has made, and for the untiring energy he has displayed in reference to that important question. Now, it will be remembered that last year a special committee was appointed to inquire into the subject and to ascertain what could be done, in addition to what had already been done, for the purpose of raising this embargo, and after that committee had gone carefully into the question, and after Professor McEachran and the Deputy Minister of Agriculture had submitted correspondence of what had taken place, what the British people wanted, and the steps that had been taken by the Canadian Government to meet all their demands, as a result of this investigation a resolution was unanimously passed by the committee to the effect that in our opinion everything had been done that could be done for the purpose of raising that embargo, and we were unable to suggest anything further that could satisfy England that no pleuro-pneumonia existed in this country. I can only say that if the Government have displayed the same energy and zeal from that time to the present, as I have reason to believe they have, I am satisfied that it will be found, when this correspondence comes down, that every thing possible has been done for the purpose of getting that embargo raised. It is unfortunate that we have been unable to satisfy either the British Board of Agriculture or the Minister of Agriculture in London that pleuro-pneumonia does not exist, and is not likely to exist in Canada. At the same time I think no blame can be attached, either to the Minister of Agriculture or the Canadian Government, for I do not think anything has been left undone by them to have this embargo raised.

Mr. INNES. I am glad that the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) has brought this matter to the attention of the House, and I hope that the Bill introduced by the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) will bring about a much needed reform in the matter of rates charged by steamship owners for transporting cattle to Great Britain. If this Bill becomes law it will prove a positive advantage to the shippers who are interested in this business. I do not propose to discuss this matter, which has been so exhaustively dealt with by the hon. member for North Wellington and by the prospective Minister of Agriculture on the Government side; I only want to call the attention of the House to a paragraph that I will read from the annual report of the Board of Trade of the city of Guelph, which city I have the honour to represent, and which will give some idea of the importance and value of this trade to the country. The report says:

The cattle trade of which this city is the acknowledged centre, has assumed proportions of a highly gratifying character, and amply justifies the wisdom of the farmers of Wellington in devoting their time and experience to raising a superior breed of animals which are so well adapted to foreign markets. From railway sources, your council are pleased to report that the shipment of live stock from this point during the past year exceeding the very large amount of $1,250,000.

Now, Sir, this large sum represents the value of cattle shipped from only one point, and although it is the most important shipping point in the province of Ontario, as well as of the Dominion, we can form some idea from these figures of the extent and value of that trade throughout that province, and throughout the country. Looking at the matter in that light, it is of the utmost importance to have the best possible arrangement arrived at in regard to the exportation of our Canadian cattle to the old country. I hope the paragraph read by the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) a few moments ago will prove true, and that in the course of a day or two we shall have the announcement made that the Chairman of the Board of Agriculture in the old country has raised the embargo. But any one who has studied the question can well understand the immense influence and pressure brought to bear in the old country to prevent the raising of that embargo, and that it will and can only be after conclusive evidence has been brought to bear on that gentleman, not only by the Minister of Agriculture here, but also by at least a section of the agricultural interest at home, that the Chairman of the Board will be induced to raise the embargo. The House will recollect that shortly after the report appeared that some Canadian cattle were infected with pleuro-pneumonia, those agriculturists in Britain who were largely interested in the business made very great efforts to bring the matter before the Chairman of the Board of Agriculture, and they were ready to and did afford conclusive evidence, not only by the examination of veterinary experts and other authorities, but also by the united testimony of the farmers who had bought the cattle that no such disease existed, and all this evidence was brought together and published by a leading newspaper in Dundee, which possesses a large circulation. In spite of that, however, the embargo has been continued up to the present time. Referring to this paragraph that has been quoted, of course the amount of money largely represents the value of fat stock. We all understand that last year there were no stockers sent from Canada, and it is very rarely indeed that a large proportion of that kind is exported from my county, because our farmers generally feed them until they become cattle of high quality, and then ship them as fully fatted stock to the old country. But we find that taking the Dominion as a whole the value of the stocker trade is very large indeed, as can be shown by the returns made from the time the trade commenced, I think in 1887, up to the year the embargo was enforced. I recollect perfectly well that in that year a gentleman who was sent out to this country by a company at Aberdeen had very great difficulty in getting stockers or a vessel in which to take them. We are all aware how after the trade had commenced it rapidly increased. Representations have been made since the embargo was in force by farmers interested in those counties in Scotland through their members of Parliament, and various deputations have at different times waited upon the Chairman of the Board of Agriculture, with the object of inducing him to raise the embargo. I had the advantage last year of travelling through several of the counties interested in this trade in the old country, and the farmers all united in stating that they much preferred Canadian cattle to any other. They said they were more docile, took to feeding as soon as they were landed, and as regards the quality of the meat, it was better than that of the cattle from Ireland or from the Continent. I brought this matter before the attention of the Select Standing Committee on Agriculture last year by a letter written by a gentleman in Aberdeenshire, who had made a study of the subject and was thoroughly acquainted with it, in which he impressed on the farmers of Canada the very great importance, and even necessity of maintaining the improvement in the breed of cattle so as to keep up the character and reputation of Scotch-fed cattle when sent to the London market. I trust that before many days have elapsed we shall have the announcement that the trade will be allowed to be carried on as it has been for years, and that the removal of the embargo will give fresh impetus to this very large and productive business, which is so essential to the prosperity of the farmers of Canada.

Mr. FEATHERSTON. I do not rise to find fault with the action of the Government, but as I have been interested in the cattle export trade for very many years I feel it to be my duty to express my views on this subject. The question of raising the embargo has been agitating the minds of the people. The reason why that embargo was imposed was due to the fact that disease existed amongst some of our cattle. The hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) has stated that it was doubtful whether the disease was pleuro-pneumonia or not. But we all know that doctors very often disagree, and I suggest to the Government that if the Minister of Agriculture were vigorously to take hold of the subject and deal with it, much good would result. I suggest this: that all Manitoba cattle, as well as cattle from other points, should be slaughtered here and shipped as dead meat to England and the Continent. We are all aware that the first cattle noticed to be diseased were cattle from Manitoba, and this is not remarkable when it is remembered that Manitoba cattle are from seven to ten days in the cars, besides having to endure an ocean voyage to some English port. I have frequently seen very many cattle from Manitoba that were not fit to ship—and besides, many of them were not allowed to be put on board. It is desirable to encourage some company to engage in the slaughtering of cattle brought from Manitoba, Ontario, and even Quebec, to be shipped as dead meat to Europe. The Americans ship live cattle and also dead meat. Everybody who is acquainted with the cattle trade is aware that shipments can be made at much lower rates as dead meat, and I am satisfied that the Government should encourage the slaughtering and shipment of dead meat as is done from Chicago. I now desire to present to the House a comparative statement of the cost of shipments of cattle dead and alive. The freight on 800 pounds of dead meat, which may be taken as an average weight of a carcase, is 14 shillings; commission, 2 shillings. Canadian railroad freight, 6 shillings; insurance, &c., 2 shillings; total, 24 shillings, or say $6. On live cattle the ocean rate is 50 shillings per head; feeding, 10 shillings; insurance, 5 shillings; payment of men in charge, 3 shillings; Canadian railroad rate, 14 shillings; commission and expenses of slaughtering in England, 20 shillings; total, 102 shillings, or about $25. Then, the commission and expense of feeding the cattle over in England amounts to 20 shillings. It may be thought that this is a pretty large sum, but, under the present restrictions our cattle have to be slaughtered within ten days after their arrival, and, as they generally remain in the lairs on an average of from six to seven days, the cost of their feed and expenses there amounts to 20 shillings, and is charged to the exporter. When the cattle are sold to a butcher in the lairs, he lets them remain there for about the time I have mentioned, because they get cooled off and are rested, and the beef is better than if they were slaughtered immediately after leaving the steamer. The expense of 20 shillings is incurred in that way, and it is a great drawback to the exporters, and a loss to the farmers, that such an amount has to be paid for the feed of cattle in England. This 20 shillings represents about $5, and, therefore, the total cost amounts to 102 shillings, or $25 per head. I used to ship a great many cattle, and I calculated that I was pretty safe when the cattle were landed in England at an average cost of $27 per head. Last fall, however, I shipped some at an average cost of only $24 per head; so that if you take the average cost at $25 per head, there will be a difference of $18 in favour of shipping the dead beef rather than the live animal. There is another question which enters into this matter. Some people say: "You lose the offal in this country; but that is worth more in England than it is here." That is true, and I estimate that loss on offal at $5 per head, so that we have remaining a net gain of $13 per head in favour of cattle shipped dead, as compared with those shipped alive. Some contend that the cattle will bring a better price if they are shipped to England alive. I admit that to be the case, if we could send the cattle into the interior of Great Britain, but when they have to be sent to the lairs in London, Liverpool, and Glasgow, and are obliged to be slaughtered there, and the dead meat has to be forwarded to the different markets, they do not sell for any more than the United States dead beef, which is slaughtered out here. A great many people believe that the beef is not as good as when the animals are shipped alive. That, however, is not the case, because I know from experience that men in the dead meat trade in England would give more for the dead beef than for the live cattle, because beef that has been kept in cold storage for several days is better suited for consumption than the flesh of animals killed on arriving in England, and used immediately after being killed. I think it is the duty of the Government to make an attempt to encourage the cattle and dead meat industry in this country. They have granted, or are attempting to grant $500,000 annually towards the carrying into effect of the French Treaty, which if done will bring French wines into competition with the grape industry of Canada, and yet our cattle trade has received no recognition in any way from the Government. It is true that inspectors have been appointed to oversee the cattle at the point of shipment, and to ensure that they go on board in a healthy condition. I am not opposed to that; I ask for it, and am in favour of it; but still, I believe that the Government should pay for these inspectors and not charge their salaries to the cattle exporters. I believe that the fee of so much per head which is charged on account of the salaries of the inspectors should be paid by the Government, and that all these obstructions on the cattle trade should be removed as far as possible. If the Government would encourage this trade, I am satisfied that it would be in the interests of the farmers of this country for them to do so. If the cattle were fattened here, our coarse grain and other agricultural products would be consumed at home. The hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) has said that we can export our hay. In my opinion it is a great mistake for any man who knows anything about farming to ship his hay from the farm, and especially so if he is only getting $5 or $6 a ton for it. If he can sell his hay occasionally at $15 a ton, it would, I have no doubt, be profitable for him to sell a limited quantity; but it is the greatest mistake in the world for a man to allow hay to leave his farm at $10 a ton, because he is depleting the farm of that amount of hay which should be consumed there and which should go to the improvement of his land. Any man who is in the habit of feeding stock regularly will find that his farm will produce twice as much per acre as the man who does not feed stock. That I know from my own experience, and the experience of my neighbours. Nothing will pay a man better than to feed all the hay and other produce he can on his farm, and by thus doing, he saves the expense and labour and the trouble of exporting his hay or grain and teaming it quite a distance, because if he feeds his cattle, he can drive them off on foot, and often realize out of one consignment, double the amount of money than he would by selling his hay and grain. The Minister of Agriculture, during his visit to the west last summer, advised the people to go into mixed farming. That is a good idea, and I would advise it myself, but the Minister should know in what way to encourage that mixed farming. He should know whether cattle-feeding would be profitable to the people or not, and he should also know whether it is an advantage to the farmer to have his cattle slaughtered and exported as dressed meat, or whether it is better to export them alive. It would be a great advantage to the farmers of this country if the Government would make some attempt to encourage a slaughtering company to take charge of this business, and send over large quantities of dead meat, as the Americans do. If this were done, we need not fear whether an embargo was placed on our cattle or not. If the Government would encourage this trade for five years, I am satisfied that the industry would become established at the expiration of that period and would be able to protect itself. It would not be like those infant industries we have been encouraging for fourteen years, and which are not yet able to sustain themselves without being spoon-fed. I am satisfied that if the Government would take this question into their serious consideration and give some assistance towards the promotion of our dead meat trade, they would confer one of the greatest boons on the country that could possibly be thought of. I may state, in conclusion, that I am not now going to find fault with the Government. I wish to give advice, and I hope that the Government will take that advice. I trust that they will seriously consider what steps can be taken to encourage a company to go into this business by giving them a bonus or something of that sort for five years. If they do that, I am satisfied that at the end of five years the business will have become of such importance to the country that it will be one of our greatest industries, and will be beneficial as well to our farmers as to those engaged in it.

Mr. McMILLAN. Mr. Speaker, as I am interested in this question, I wish to address a few remarks to the House. I heartily endorse the scheme that my hon. friend (Mr. Featherston) has proposed. I have thought upon this matter keenly for a long time, and I have come to the conclusion that we should have one or two slaughtering establishments in Canada in which a great many of our cattle could be slaughtered here and the beef exported to England. After visiting Chicago, and getting all the information I possibly could there, I am convinced that it is on account of their slaughtering so many cattle and curing the meat there, that the farmers are able to get better prices for cattle in the United States than they have been able to obtain in Canada. The beef trade is a very important trade in this country, and with very little encouragement it could be made far more important, so that if the Government wishes to give a bonus or a subsidy in any shape to assist the farmers, I am convinced that it could not go in a better direction than to encourage the establishment of one or two places where our animals could be slaughtered here. I am very much pleased with the figures given by my hon. friend (Mr. Featherston) as to the relative cost of carrying live and dead animals to the old country market. I can corroborate his statement with respect to the live animals. Last year I paid over $24 per head, and the year before it cost me $27, so that I am perfectly convinced he was within the mark when he puts the cost of exporting live animals at $25 per head. I have not studied out the question of the cost of sending dead meat to the English market, but I believe, from what I know, that the estimate given by my hon. friend from Peel (Mr. Featherston) is a very fair one. I hope the Government will take that into their serious consideration. Then, if our cattle are to be allowed to go into the British market, our Government ought to give a certificate of their freedom from tuberculosis. From a careful investigation of that question, and from my connection with those who have examined cattle with the view of ascertaining whether or not they are afflicted with this disease, I am able to state that, by testing them with the Koch lymph, it is possible to decide that question with certainty; and if the embargo is to be removed, I think the Government should apply that test to all cattle intended for shipment to the English market. All who have considered this question believe that to be an infallible test of tuberculosis; and if the Government do not adopt it, I am afraid that their neglect may be the means of having our cattle scheduled again at no very distant time. I can hardly agree with what the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) has said with respect to the steamship companies. While I am willing to give them all the blame that they deserve, I am not willing to give them any blame that does not properly belong to them. My experience is that when you insure with the steamship company that carries your stock, you get better rates than you would by insuring in an independent company. I have never applied to the companies without getting the necessary space. I have always shipped and insured with the same company, that is, Donaldson line, and I have always got all the accommodation I required. The only difficulty is that until the cattle are on the vessel, we can never learn what the freight rates are to be. I think that should not be the case; and if the Government are going to take any action at all to remedy that state of things, that action should be taken immediately, for we are within two weeks of the time when the present year's trade will begin. With regard to the inspection of cattle in the old country, I may say that last summer I crossed with a shipment, and when the cattle were landed at Glasgow there was not proper accommodation for slaughtering them, and the inspection was not what it ought to have been.

Mr. McMILLAN.

Forty or fifty animals were hung up, and, owing to the inspectors not being there, none of them could be taken down. I remained until the second morning after they were slaughtered, and they were still there. I think the Canadian Government ought to appoint inspectors at each port. Now, it is rather peculiar, after all we have been subjected to in the cattle trade, that it should be left to a private member of this House to bring in a Bill for its regulation. If the Minister of Agriculture had introduced a Bill for that purpose, he would have been able to get it passed much more speedily than a private member can. I think the Minister of Agriculture ought to use every effort to have American ports opened for the shipment of our cattle. There is no doubt that if that were done, it would be more effective in securing lower rates from the Montreal companies than all the legislation that this House could enact for that purpose. Before we were prevented from shipping our cattle from American ports, many Canadian cattle men were able to ship them from Boston at lower rates than they could obtain from Canadian lines. Therefore, I believe that the best means of bringing down the rates is to allow us to ship our cattle in bond through American ports, and I think a strong effort ought to be made to obtain that privilege. The Government have spoken of subsidizing a line of steamships to France to the amount of £100,000. That would be of no benefit whatever to the farmers of this country, because the treaty embraces no agricultural products which we could send to France. They also speak of granting a subsidy of $750,000 for a fast line of steamers between Canada and Great Britain. That will not afford any relief whatever to the farmers and other producers of Canada. If we are to be relieved, the Government can relieve us in two ways. They can pass a Bill offering a certain subsidy for the establishment of slaughter-houses on the same principle on which they are established on the other side; and they could reduce the rates, or at least fix a maximum rate, and provide that the steamship companies shall inform anybody of the rates upon application. This would do away with the uncertainty under which cattle shippers labour before leaving home. I was a member of the committee which has been spoken of by the hon. member for East Grey. We spent three days inquiring into the matter, and we came to the conclusion that the Government had done all that they could do; but I hope the Government will adopt the recommendation I make to have the test applied for tuberculosis, for I am convinced, from what I know of the province of Ontario to-day, that if that is not done, and our cattle are admitted to the British market, it will be but a short time before they are scheduled again.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. DALY. I may say, on behalf of the Government, that I have no objection to this motion; and when the papers are brought down, I think it will be found that the Government have used every possible endeavour to have the embargo removed by the British Government. As was shown in the discussion which took place in the Committee on Agriculture last session, and as has been admitted by hon. gentlemen who have taken part in the debate on this motion, the Government have used every effort to induce the British Government to view this matter in the light in which it is regarded by the Government and people of this country. One of the first objections raised by the Hon. Mr. Gardner, representing the British Government, was that the quarantine which existed in the old provinces did not exist in Manitoba, the North-west or British Columbia. When Mr. Gardner raised that difficulty, an Order in Council was passed, early last year, upon the joint recommendation of the Ministers of Agriculture (Mr. Angers) and of the Interior (Mr. Daly), and the President of the Council (Mr. Ives) having charge of the Mounted Police, establishing quarantine stations along the boundary between the United States and Canada in the North-west Territories, and establishing in addition to the quarantine which had existed for some years in Emerson, another station at Gretna. It is within the knowledge of the House that we have been getting a large number of settlers into our country from the western states, many of whom brought in their own cattle. In consequence of the representations made by the British Government with reference to this bringing of cattle into the North-west by settlers, without the cattle being subjected to the same quarantine as that established in the other provinces of the Dominion, it was ordered that in future no cattle, whether belonging to settlers or imported for other purposes, should be allowed into Canada at any point without being subjected to the ninety days' quarantine. Since the passing of that Order in Council, no cattle have been allowed into the North-west without undergoing this quarantine, whether imported by settlers as settlers' cattle, or for other purposes. I am satisfied, from the experience of people who have dealt in cattle in the western portion of Canada, that the diseases complained of have never been known to exist in the North-west Territories or Manitoba, nor have they been known to exist in the western states of the Union. The hon. member for Peel (Mr. Featherston) suggested that there should be a discrimination against the cattle of Manitoba and the North-west Territories, and that they should be slaughtered, and he based his suggestion upon the fact that one of the cattle alleged to have been found suffering from pleuro-pneumonia, and which came over to England in the 'Monkseaton,' had been traced to Pilot Mound in southern Manitoba. The Department of Agriculture, through its veterinarians, ascertained from the exporter where and when and from whom he purchased the animal; the whole history of the animal was subjected to the closest scrutiny and investigation; and the report of the officers of the department was that the animal was not diseased and that there were no diseased animals in the neighbourhood.

Mr. FEATHERSTON. The hon. gentleman did not understand me. I did not advocate the slaughter of Manitoba cattle alone, but of Ontario as well, as an advantage over shipping live cattle, in consequence of the liability of the cattle to contract disease through the hardships of the voyage.

Mr. DALY. I certainly misunderstood the hon. gentleman. I may say that in addition to the investigations of the veterinarians employed by the Department of Agriculture here, we have had in Manitoba, for a number of years, district veterinarians appointed by the Local Government, the boundaries of whose jurisdiction is coterminous with those of the different counties in the province. Every few months, investigations are made by them, and they report to the local Department of Agriculture; and it is proved by the Department of Agriculture at Ottawa and the Department of Agriculture at Winnipeg that such a thing as pleuro-pneumonia has never existed, and does not exist, in Manitoba. As to the question whether cattle should be fattened here and then shipped to Great Britain, or whether we should continue to ship stockers, that is a disputed point among gentlemen who know more about it than I do. I have heard some of them say, in the course of this debate, that the farmers of Canada should fatten their cattle and export fatted cattle to be slaughtered on the other side. On the other hand, we find hon. gentlemen in this House, as well as people outside, giving their opinion that it would be better for us to ship stockers to be fattened by the farmers of Scotland and England. I have not the knowledge or the experience to give an authoritative opinion on that feature of the case. Ever since Parliament was prorogued last year the Government has been in communication, through the High Commissioner, with the British Government, and every effort has been made by this Government to induce the authorities in Britain to remove this embargo. Not long ago, in answer to a request of the British Government, a long and exhaustive memorandum upon this subject was prepared by the Minister of Agriculture, and I think that when a copy of that memorandum is brought down to this House, hon. members and the people of the country at large will see that the Government have done everything in their power, have put forth every effort, in order to induce the Right Hon. Mr. Gardner and the British Government to look at this matter in the same light as they do. Apparently pressure has been brought to bear upon the Government in England by their Irish supporters which has prevented Mr. Gardner acting upon what appears to me to be his own individual feeling in this matter. We hope and trust that very soon the news will be flashed across that the embargo upon Canadian cattle has been removed. As to the question of freight rates, which has been discussed by hon. gentlemen who have had experience in this trade, that is a matter that, no doubt, will be considered before the Committee on Agriculture, and the views of these hon. gentlemen will be given before that committee. In conclusion, I may say that there is no objection to the passing of this motion.

Mr. O'BRIEN. Before any other hon. gentleman, rises I would like to call the attention of the Minister of Interior to the fact that he has said nothing with reference to the point raised by the hon. member for Huron (Mr. McMillan), who suggested that cattle leaving this country should be examined for tuberculosis. It seems to me that that is a matter of sufficient importance to engage the attention of the Government.

Mr. DALY. So far as tuberculosis is concerned, examinations have been made in Ontario and other provinces, and the department is of the opinion that they have safeguarded in every way the interests of the cattle dealers.

Mr. MULOCK. Will the hon. gentleman give particulars?

Mr. DALY. I cannot give particulars now.

Mr. MULOCK. The hon. gentleman has made a very broad statement. He says that the Government have caused the necessary tests to be made—if that is what we are to believe—throughout Ontario and the North-west—

Mr. DALY. I said the necessary investigations.

Mr. MULOCK. Sufficiently to meet the case? That is a very wild statement, I venture to say. That test cannot be generally effective unless it is applied to every animal in the country. My hon. friend from Huron (Mr. McMillan) proposes that the test should be applied to all animals before shipment to England, so that none would leave Canada that were not able to stand the test. I think it is unfortunate that a great department like that of Agriculture should have no mouthpiece on the floor of the people's House. That is the position we are in now; and I think the Minister of Interior will find that he has said far more than the facts will warrant in saying that this test has been sufficiently applied.

Mr. DALY.

Mr. DALY. I said nothing about tests. I said an investigation was made by the Government.

Mr. MULOCK. I ask the hon. gentleman what he means by investigation.

Mr. DALY. I tell the hon. gentleman I cannot give him particulars just now.

Mr. MULOCK. What does the hon. gentleman mean by saying that investigation sufficient to meet the case has been made?

Mr. DALY. The department through its officers has made investigation where this tuberculosis is supposed to have existed. These officers have made their reports to the Department of Agriculture, upon which reports that department will take such action as the Government think necessary in the premises.

Mr. MULOCK. Of course the hon. gentleman has to some extent qualified his statement, and I am glad he has; because it was of a misleading character, and I am only too glad to allow him to put himself right. The impression sought to be left upon this House—I will not say sought to be left upon the House, but certainly I may say the impression left upon the House—was that the Government have made the necessary investigation and that they are able to tell us in fact that there was no tuberculosis. Now, the investigation cannot be made with the eye and cannot be made by the ordinary agents of the Government. The only way this test can be made is in a scientific way, and the people have not heard of its being made in that way. The report of the Government that the condition of affairs was satisfactory, scientific tests not having been made, was not of the slightest value.

Mr. DALY. I said it was made by the Government veterinarians.

Mr. MULOCK. Then I am to understand that the Government veterinarians have made the tests?

Mr. DALY. I said investigation.

Mr. MULOCK. Well, then, will the hon. gentleman say what form the investigation took?

Mr. DALY. I have already told the hon. gentleman that I have not the detailed information at hand.

Mr. MULOCK. Then the hon. gentleman does not know whether proper tests were applied or not, and so I come back to the original position and say that he has made a statement which is absolutely misleading.

Mr. SPEAKER. Order. The hon. gentleman has no right to say that an hon. member has made misleading statements.

Mr. MULOCK. I bow to your decision, Mr. Speaker. With all respect to that decision I think I am right in saying that we are entitled to question the accuracy of a statement that is made. If it be a misleading statement which leaves the country to understand that tests have been made, when the hon. gentleman does not tell us what these tests were, that statement should not be made. There is only one test known to science at the present time, and the hon. gentleman cannot say that that test has been made; how then, can he say that veterinarians have made the necessary investigation? What does it mean? In order that there may be no mistake, I would ask, is the hon. gentleman prepared to tell the House whether the investigation by the method known as the Koch test has been made?

Mr. DALY. Yes. If the hon. gentleman will read the report of the Department of Agriculture he will find the facts stated there.

Mr. MULOCK. Very well; the hon. gentleman says that the necessary investigation by the method known as the Koch test has been made throughout Canada.

Mr. DALY. I did not say throughout Canada. I said the necessary investigation had been made by the department.

Mr. MULOCK. Where?

Mr. DALY. I will read in a few moments the report of the Department of Agriculture, if the hon. gentleman wishes. That is the only information I have and the only information I can give him.

Mr. MULOCK. I only wish to leave the debate in proper shape. It would be an unfortunate thing were the Government to assume that everything has been done that can be done, if such were not the case. It would be a very unfortunate thing if in a great question like this, by any oversight or error of judgment, any precaution should be neglected. If the hon. gentleman intended by what he said to indicate that the Government had arrived at a final conclusion after having exhausted all the means in their reach, then it is extraordinary that the public have never heard of it before. It is an amazing thing if the only scientific test possible has been applied throughout the length and breadth of this country and yet the public not know it. Therefore, I fear the hon. gentleman has spoken somewhat rashly and has overstated the case.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I hope the Government will leave no stone unturned to arrive at a solution of the difficulties that beset this trade. I understand that some of those most heavily interested in the cattle trade have withdrawn from the business in Canada owing to the difficulties attendant upon the shipment of cattle from Montreal. If it is possible by legislation to improve this condition of things, it is highly desirable indeed that the Government, if they have the power and the authority to do so, should do so at once. It is well that the investigations that are made should be thoroughly made, so that the public can be assured that there is no disease of this character in Canada, and such an assurance would go further, perhaps, to remove the embargo than anything else. It is highly desirable that a thorough, complete and searching investigation should be made in order to assure the people of Great Britain that no contagious disease exists among our cattle, and when that is fully understood by the Imperial authorities there is no doubt that the embargo will be removed, and our cattle will be allowed to go into Great Britain as formerly. No doubt this embargo entails serious losses on our cattle shippers, and makes the raising of cattle less profitable than it otherwise would be, and in order to relieve this state of things, the very closest and most thorough investigation of the whole subject should be had by the Government. There should be no delay, because the season will soon open, and delays will be fatal and ruinous to the profits of those who are engaged in the business. Therefore I wish to endorse what has been said so well in urging upon the Government to lose no time, if it is within their power and within their jurisdiction, to devise better facilities for shipping cattle at our ports, and also, if at all possible, to get the embargo in England removed. I remember at a previous session of Parliament it was stated that the High Commissioner had prevented the embargo being placed upon our cattle. It was stated that there was no disease then existing of that character, but there was great danger of an embargo being placed on our cattle, and it was only through the almost superhuman exertions, and the powerful ability and skill of the High Commissioner, that this misfortune was averted at that time. I remember that it was said later on that if a change took place in the fiscal policy of this country it would probably tend to bring about this very embargo upon our cattle with which we were threatened. I remember that was the stock and trade used by hon. gentlemen on the Government benches a few years ago. Well, we find that the embargo has actually taken place, and we are naturally prompted to ask the question how it is that if the High Commissioner was powerful enough a few years ago to prevent this embargo, his influence has so far diminished that he is no longer able to prevent it. Has his power and his influence diminished in Britain? How is it that when he was comparatively unknown in Britain he was able to prevent the scheduling of our cattle, and that now, after a long residence abroad, he has proved himself unable to prevent the British Government from placing this embargo, and that at a time when the Minister of the Interior gets up and states that there is not a single case of pleuro-pneumonia in Canada, nor has there been a single case? How is it that the Government here were not able to impress this fact upon the British authorities, so that we might have been saved the great loss that this embargo has inflicted on our farmers and cattle shippers? I do not know that the Government are deserving of censure; I won't say that; but this matter has been considered for a good while, and full information has not been brought down to the House showing what steps the Government have taken in order to avoid this loss and detriment to the cattle trade. It is very desirable that all the papers should be brought down, and that the Minister of Agriculture should be in the House so that he could inform us what steps have been taken, or that some other Minister should make himself acquainted with the means that have been employed by the Government in order to remove this difficulty and loss to our cattle shippers, and furnish information to the House that would quiet the public mind on this question. It is highly desirable that the fullest light should be thrown upon this question in order that we can convince the British Government that our cattle have no contagious disease, and that no injury to the cattle of Great Britain can arise from our cattle being allowed access to the British market. When our Government have convinced the British Government that this disease does not exist here, I think they will have no difficulty whatever in having the embargo removed.

Motion agreed to.

EXPORTS TO THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. CHARLTON moved for:

Return showing the exports to the United States for the last fiscal year, of articles the export of which to the United States exceeds in value the exports of the same to all other countries, which return shall give: 1. A detailed classification of the description of articles, commodities or wares, under the general subdivisions of products of the mines, products of the fisheries, animals and their products, agricultural products and manufactures, coming within the scope of the inquiry; 2. The value of each class of articles exported to the United States and exported to all other countries; 3. The totals of value under each general subdivision exported to the United States and exported to all other countries; 4. The grand total of values under all the general subdivisions exported to the United States and exported to all other countries.

He said: The motion which I submit to the House calls for information upon a question which will have an important bearing upon the discussion of our trade relations with the United States and with other countries. The House is aware that the legislation of Canada and the legislation of the United States as well, since the year 1867, has been of a repressive character, and this repressive legislation was so intensified by the action of the American Government in 1890 that one might almost look for a total, or almost total, obliteration of trade between these two countries. Taking into account the character of the legislation with reference to trade passed by the Legislatures both of Canada and the United States, that trade to any considerable extent does exist between these two countries, is a striking proof of the fact that the natural conditions of the two countries are highly favourable to extensive trade relations. Now, Sir, I wish to inform the House that when this motion was reached the other day, in passing over unopposed motions, I was informed by the Finance Minister that the Government would hardly grant the request made in the motion and compile the information which it calls for. I think very likely the Finance Minister will reconsider that decision, and in the anticipation that he will do so, I propose to outline the character of the information that I wish to obtain from him, or in his absence, from the Controller of Customs, or in the absence of the Controller of Customs, from some other member of the Government. The motion calls for information in regard to all articles exported from Canada to the United States in excess of the exports of the same article to all other countries in the world. Now, in view of the character of the commercial legislation of these two countries, in view of the fact that our own tariff seeks to hamper trade with the United States, of the fact that the American tariff is in the highest degree unfavourable to trade with Canada, it would seem almost an absurdity to expect that in any article our exports to the United States should be in excess of our exports in the same line to all other countries. When we come to examine the Trade and Navigation Returns they furnish a revelation of a very remarkable character as bearing upon this point. I have drawn some statistics from those returns which I will lay before the House in the fear that my hon. friend, the Minister of Finance, will not permit the authorities of the Customs Department to compile the information. I will read to the House some of the statistics I have gathered from the Trade and Navigation Returns:

as large during the last fiscal year as in 1866, and I wish now to point out the striking influence exercised by the McKinley Bill, with its additional restrictions upon our trade and upon the exports of this country. I will take eleven or twelve of the chief articles, and make a comparison between the years 1890 and 1893. The McKinley Bill went into operation in October, 1890, and the fiscal year ending 30th June, 1890, was the last fiscal year before the higher duties went in operation, and I make a comparison between that year and the fiscal year ending 30th June last. In the list of articles enumerated, we exported, in 1890, the value of $10,453,352; in 1893, we exported, of like articles, to the value of $3,624,892; or, there was a falling off of six and three-quarter millions. These figures are startling.

Having shown the effect of repressive legislation on our exports to the United States, I propose next, and very briefly, to show what has been the current of trade in lines not affected by the repressive legislation of the McKinley Bill. I propose to show what, on certain lines, in regard to which our conditions have remained unchanged or have been slightly modified, has been the character of that kind of trade. I take first, the products of the forests. There has been a slight amelioration in the American burdens imposed on the products of the forests since 1890. In that year we exported products of the forests to the value of $10,247,000. We exported, in 1893, the value of $13,859,960; an increase of $3,612,320, or 35 per cent. Of the products of the mines we exported, in 1890, the value of $3,963,257. In 1893 we exported similar products to the value of $4,756,286, or an increase of $793,023, or 20 per cent. Of wood pulp, we exported, in 1890, the value of

If we have a trade with the United States of $28,000,000 odd against $15,000,000 with the rest of the world, it is a striking proof of the assertion I have made that the natural conditions of trade between Canada and the United States are, in the highest degree, favourable, and the existence of this large trade, in articles named, between Canada and the United States, as compared with the rest of the world is proof of the assertion.

I desire next to point out the influence that has been exercised by increased restrictions on the part of the United States in their legislation with respect to our trade. I said a moment ago that repressive legislation had existed ever since 1867. The influence of that legislation has been to cripple our trade with the United States since that time. Our exports to that country are not $147,098; 1893, the value of $424,253, or an increase of $277,155, or 190 per cent increase. These figures tell their own tale. On the one hand, we find that where repressive legislation has been passed, the exports affected have shrunk very greatly; on the other hand, where the McKinley Bill has not affected the exports, the trade has gone on increasing largely during the last three years. These figures prove beyond all question that the effect of the McKinley tariff was most disastrous as regards trade with Canada; they prove, furthermore, that, notwithstanding all the restrictions imposed by the United States, we export to them of these articles $2 for every $1 we export to all other countries.

I next refer to the exports of iron ore. The quantity of iron ore shipped from the entire Dominion last year was 26,114 tons, of which 15,000 tons came from the province of Ontario. In the lake region the trade in iron ore last year amounted to about 6,000,000 long tons, and the year before it amounted to over 8,000,000 tons. This vast amount of iron ore was taken from the mines of northern Michigan and a portion of Minnesota, shipped down the lakes and transhipped at Cleveland, Ashtabula, Erie and Buffalo, for use in the furnaces of the states of Ohio, Pennsylvania and New York. We have limitless quantities of ore just as accessible as the mines from which this vast supply comes, and that business, employing a large proportion of the lake marine, that business putting into circulation $20,000,000 or $30,000,000 a year, is a business in which we share to the extent of a paltry 15,000 tons, against the volume of 8,000,000 tons in the United States. We are shut out from that business by the operation of these repressive laws, and if the duty on ore were removed, in place of these 15,000 tons, we might reasonably hope to share almost equally with the western states in that vast volume of trade—a trade which would put into circulation in Canada, in all human probability, $10,000,000, or $15,000,000 annually.

Now, with regard to stone. Our total export of stone last year amounted to $46,000 worth from the entire Dominion, of which $16,665 worth was exported from the province of Ontario. The United States last year used $27,000,000 worth of stone, and a considerable proportion of this building material was used in the cities in the great lake basin: Chicago, Milwaukee, Detroit, Toledo, Cleveland, Erie, Buffalo, all cities growing rapidly. These are cities with an aggregate population of two and a half millions, and we are totally debarred from participation in that trade in structural material with these great populous centres, because the American tariff is absolutely prohibitory with regard to the importation of quarry products into that country. We have on the north shore of Lakes Superior and Huron as fine quarries as are found upon this continent; certainly the finest quarries in the great lake basin, and with the removal of these restrictions upon the importation of structural materials into the United States, a trade of hundreds of thousands of dollars if not of millions of dollars, would be developed in quarry products in the lake region alone.

I allude to these statistics for the purpose of illustrating what I desire in the motion I have made; for the purpose of illustrating what these returns will show: That the trade between Canada and the United States cannot be strangled, that the natural conditions for that trade are so eminently favourable that trade will exist and continue to exist in large volume notwithstanding the utmost efforts of hostile legislation upon the part of Congress on the one hand and of this Parliament on the other. These figures show that with all this repressive legislation extending from 1867 down to the present moment, we export in that long list of articles I have enumerated, over $28,000,000 to the United States and less than $15,000,000 to all the rest of the world. If that is the case, Mr. Speaker, with these repressive measures that are in force, the imagination can scarcely conceive the impetus that would be given to, and the enlargement that would take place in the export trade of this country to the United States if the barriers were removed. Why, Sir, in the case of barley, these returns show that the exports have shrunk from $4,583,000 to a paltry $638,000 in three years; in eggs, from $1,793,000 to $324,000 in three years; in malt, from $149,310 to $19 in three years; and so all along the line.

It is stated by the Government that they are anxious to promote the trade of Canada with the rest of the world, and that they are very anxious to find new markets. They have sent an embassy to Australia recently; they have professed to make attempts to reach markets in the West Indies; and they have professed—I say professed, Mr. Speaker—to endeavour to obtain reciprocity with the United States. Now, if that profession is sincere, and if their efforts have been honest in that direction, we, of course, have no just ground of complaint against the Government; but I think that there is an infallible test of the sincerity of the Government, and a test which proves beyond question their insincerity in this matter. You have noticed, Mr. Speaker, and so have I, that wherever the question of reciprocity is debated in this House, the orators upon the other side strive to impress the country with the belief that it is not desirable. That is invariably the case. Whenever the Government and their supporters go upon the stump in the country while professing to be in favour of reciprocity, their whole attention and their entire efforts are directed to an attempt to convince the people whom they are addressing that reciprocity is not a desirable thing to obtain. That is what they seek to do always. They profess to be in favour of reciprocity, yet out of the same breath they betray their hostility to the measure by the course they take in belittling it and striving to prove to the country that it is undesirable and likely to be detrimental to the interests of Canada. I say that this course, which they adopt, is beyond question a proof of their insincerity with regard to reciprocity. There is a great deal said the purpose of which is to deceive the public. We have the changes rung upon the assertion that the United States will require from us preferential treatment. Well now, do we suppose, Mr. Speaker, that we can effect a reciprocity arrangement with the United States, an arrangement that would permit of free admission of the natural products of this country into the United States, without securing preferential treatment from them. At the very outset we must secure preferential treatment from the United States. We can secure reciprocity in no other way. We ask them to admit our iron ore, our structural material, our agricultural products, our animals and their produce; we ask them to admit this entire list of articles into the markets of the United States upon a preferential basis; upon the basis of a nation more favoured than other customers of the United States. We can only secure this concession upon preferential lines. We ask the United States to extend to us preferential treatment. Will the United States not say: Yes, if you will extend to us the same favour, if you will give us preferential treatment in your market we will give you preferential treatment in our market. I ask, Sir, is there anything unfair in this proposition in the abstract as laid down? If we apply to a great nation upon our borders for preferential treatment, is it reasonable for us to say: We will take preferential treatment from you, but we will grant you no preferential treatment in return. Can we expect an arrangement upon that basis? Certainly we cannot; and if we are getting preferential treatment from them, which we must get if we obtain an arrangement for the free admission of our products into their country—unless, of course, they adopt absolute free trade—it is only reasonable to say that we should give preferential treatment in return, and the only question to settle is: to what extent we should receive it and to what extent should we give it in return. Now, the position of the Government all through these reciprocity negotiations; all through the reciprocity discussions, has been a position of utter hostility. Talk about discrimination. Have we ever discriminated in favour of other nations and against Great Britain? Is there not a treaty before the House at this moment that does that very thing? Have we not done it before, and is there no probability that we can make an arrangement with the United States and afford preferential treatment in our markets to a long list of manufactured articles without interfering with England's interests. Certainly there is. We can place upon the preferential list in an arrangement with the United States, almost every article upon which a duty is paid when it is imported from that country, without interfering with the interests of Great Britain. What articles could we enumerate in that category? We could take coal oil, barbed wire, binding twine, agricultural implements, locomotives, cars, steam threshers, axes, spades, printing paper, wall paper, leather, boots and shoes, carriages, clocks, watches, glassware of a certain kind, nails, tools, safes, printing presses, manufactures of wood, certain grades of cotton goods, furniture, engines, wood machinery, saw-mill machinery, and many other articles; and place them upon the list for preferential treatment without in the slightest degree interfering with England's interest in this country. We could give the United States an ample return for all the preferential treatment we could ask for from them without interfering with England's interest in the smallest degree. We should remember that England, in all her treatment of her colonies, is not niggardly and grasping, but generous. She has always been generous in permitting us to promote our own interests in our own way, and she would never raise the slightest objection to any arrangement we proposed to make with the United States for our own great advantage, even though it were attended with slight inconvenience and loss to herself.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I should not have entered upon this question at any length to-night but for the fact that it is being dealt with at the present moment by the Conservative press. That press seeks to place the entire question upon a false basis, to misrepresent it and to mislead the public in regard to it. I have before me an editorial in the Montreal 'Gazette' of Friday, April 20, from which I will cull two or three expressions. This article says:

The governing power of the United States absolutely refuses to open the door on any terms save commercial union.

Further on it says:

We challenge them to produce a single utterance of a responsible public man in the United States favouring reciprocal trade with Canada on any other terms than a common tariff along the seaboard, regulated by the American Congress and applicable to all other countries, including Great Britain.

And further:

A few years ago Sir Richard Cartwright, Mr. Charlton, and other leaders of the Opposition expressed a willingness to accept the American conditions, and to discriminate against Britain; to-day they repudiate and disavow any such purpose.

In the Ottawa 'Citizen' of this morning I also find an editorial, in which the following statement is made :

What arrant hypocrisy it is for the Liberals to pretend that they can have any other trade arrangement with the United States by treaty than commercial union? In discussing the budget the Liberal leaders took pains to denounce commercial union. Mr. Charlton said: "The Liberal party have never formulated such a policy." If that is not the policy of the Liberal party it is at all events the only concession that could be obtained from the United States. Are the Liberals prepared then to allow the United States to impose their tariff upon us against all the world while removing the custom-houses between the two countries?

Now, Mr. Speaker, that is the gist of the charges made by the Conservative press—that we can only get reciprocity upon the basis of commercial union, that we must have a common tariff, that that tariff must be enacted by the Congress of the United States, that we must surrender our fiscal independence and our commercial autonomy and become the vassals of the United States. These are the charges which are rung and rung again. The Liberals are accused of being in favour of these things. It is asserted again and again that the Americans have never shown any indication that they would give us reciprocal trade on any other basis. By this means it is sought to deceive the people of Canada and to raise a false issue with regard to this reciprocity question. Now, Sir, this statement of the case has been explicitly denied by the president of the United States; it has been explicitly denied by the late Secretary of State of the United States, Mr. Blaine; it has been explicitly denied by a subsequent Secretary of State of the United States, General John G. Foster. And on May 31st, 1887, Hon. Thos. G. Bayard, then United States Secretary of State in Cleveland's Administration, in a letter to Sir Charles Tupper, stated that he and his Government were in favour of "a statesmanlike treatment, on a liberal and statesmanlike plan, of the entire commercial relations of the two countries, without affecting the political relations or legislative independence of either." It may be asserted without hesitation that the statement of the case made by the gentlemen on the opposite side of the House is totally destitute of truth or foundation. The truth is that the so-called commissioners from Canada went to Washington and refused to entertain propositions made on the basis of Canada placing on the free list for preferential treatment a list of manufactured goods, of course in return for the placing on the free list for preferential treatment by the United States of a long list of Canadian natural products. We do not deny, at least I do not deny, that it will be necessary to accord the United States preferential treatment for a certain list of manufactured goods in return for preferential treatment by them for a certain list of natural products and the same list of manufactured goods for which we grant them preferential treatment. That is not denied; but we do deny that commercial union is necessary or that a common tariff is necessary; we deny that our commercial autonomy is to be surrendered or our commercial independence in the slightest degree to be impaired. We assert that whatever the conditions of that reciprocity may be, it is to be in the form of a treaty, the terms of which are to be definitely fixed by the common consent of both countries; and, outside of the list of manufactured articles and natural products to be placed on the free list for preferential treatment by both countries, all other articles will be dealt with by the respective legislatures of the two countries, who will be free to impose customs duties upon them or to place them on the free list as they may please and determine. It will be remembered that last session the Minister of Finance for Canada was interviewed by a press reporter. The President's message had just been made public, and certain statements had been made in that message with regard to reciprocity negotiations with Canada. In the 'Empire' newspaper, Mr. Foster, the Minister of Finance is reported to have spoken as follows:—

I need not say that it causes surprise and regret—surprise at the nature of some of the statements made, and regret at the unfriendly tone adopted towards Canada. The statement that Canada was only prepared to offer to the United States the admission of natural products is not full enough to convey an accurate idea of what took place. The Canadian representatives asked those of the United States if they were prepared to consider an arrangement on the basis of free admission of the natural products of both countries, as in the treaty of 1854, with such enlargements and modifications as the changed conditions of the two countries made necessary.

Which enlarged conditions he afterwards said applied exclusively to natural products.

The reply was a negative. With a view, then, to clear the ground for arrangement wider than that: if such could be done, Mr. Blaine was asked as to certain conditions of a possibly wider arrangement, among others, whether the United States would insist upon a uniform tariff and would demand preferential treatment in our markets as against British and foreign goods.

The answer was that a uniform tariff would be necessary, and that too on the line of the present United States tariff and that the United States could admit of no arrangement which did not give United States goods favoured treatment as against foreign goods especially those of Great Britain, who was their chief competitor. To these propositions, the Canadian representatives declined to agree. The conference then broke off, so far as regarded the consideration of the commercial question.

This interview was brought to the attention of General Foster, the United States Secretary of State, who was present at the conferences between the Canadian commissioners and the Hon. James G. Blaine, at that time Secretary of State. General Foster took up the points of that interview, and his version was given to the press on the 12th of December. It was as follows :—

During the reciprocity conference of last winter, Mr. Blaine did not insist that in a reciprocity arrangement a uniform tariff would be necessary for both Canada and the United States, nor much less, that it should be on the lines of the present United States tariff. He did ask that the schedule should be confined to natural products, but should include an agreed list (not an unlimited list, but an agreed list) of manufactured goods, and that the reciprocity should be confined to Canada and the United States, and because of these two conditions the negotiations were fruitless.

Now, the statement made by the Government last session, contained in sessional paper 52 of volume 11, was made on the 7th March, 1893. And this statement repeats that made by Mr. Foster on the 11th of the previous December. It repeats the statement that the United States Government had required a common tariff, and had insisted that the duties should be the same in both countries. Now, Mr. Blaine, at the call of the Senate of the United States, under resolution passed on the 24th February—more than a year previous to the date of this Canadian minute—submitted to the President of the United States his version of the proceedings of the United States commissioners. And his version was dated 15th April, eleven months previous to the date of this communication made by the Finance Minister and the other Canadian Ministers. Now, Mr. Blaine was not answering this communication, but was answering a resolution of the Senate of the United States, passed a few days after the commissioners were in Washington. These negotiations took place the 10th, 11th, and 12th of February. The resolution of the United States Senate was passed on the 24th February, immediately on the close of these negotiations, asking the President of the United States to submit to the Senate a statement concerning them. The President submitted on the 20th June, 1892, Mr. Blaine's statement of April 15th, made—months before the statement of our Government on the matter—in pursuance of this resolution. Is the statement made in the 'Gazette' article, that there is no proof obtainable that the United States have shown any disposition to make a reciprocity treaty with Canada, borne out by the language of the President of the United States, when transmitting his statement? Is that borne out by the statement of Mr. Blaine, Secretary of State? On the contrary, both the statement of the President and that of the Secretary of the United States go to show that the United States expressed their willingness to negotiate a reciprocity treaty. They go to show that the United States commissioners at the outset—as Mr. Blaine has said in his letter of the 29th January, 1891—would entertain no proposition for reciprocity confined to natural products. The United States had uniformly occupied that position and made that assertion since the treaty was abrogated in 1866. We never had the slightest reason to suppose that the United States would consider for a moment the propriety of negotiating a reciprocity treaty, based upon natural products alone. Both the President and Mr. Blaine did say, however, that their Government was prepared to negotiate a reciprocity treaty which should include a list of manufactured articles. The President said, in transmitting this document of Mr. Blaine's to Congress :

Previous experiments on this line (that is on the line of reciprocity in natural products) had been unsatisfactory to this government. A treaty that should be reciprocal in fact and of mutual advantage must necessarily have embraced an important list of manufactured articles.

Not commercial union, not an unlimited list of manufactured articles, but an important list.

And have secured to the United States a free or favoured introduction of these articles into Canada as against the world. But it was not believed that the Canadian ministry was ready to propose or assent to such an arrangement.

The President concluded by saying :

It is not for this Government to argue against the announcement of Canadian official opinion. It must be accepted, however, as the statement of a condition which places an inseparable barrier in the way of the attainment of that large and beneficial intercourse and reciprocal trade which might otherwise be developed between the United States and the Dominion.

Might otherwise be developed. But for the refusal of the Canadian Commissioners to consider the basis of an arrangement that the United States was ready to consider and to form a treaty upon. Then what does Mr. Blaine say :

The commissioners were informed that the government of the United States would not be prepared to renew the treaty of 1854 nor to agree upon commercial reciprocity which should be confined to natural products alone, and that, in view of the great development of industrial interests in the United States and of the changed conditions in the commercial relations of the two countries since the treaty of 1854 was negotiated; it was regarded as of essential importance that a list of manufactured goods should be included in the schedules of articles for free or favoured exchange in any reciprocity arrangements which might be made.

And the Canadian Commissioners, according to Mr. Blaine's statement, declined to treat upon this basis. They said :

If any considerable list of manufactured goods of the United States should be admitted free into Canada, it would entail a material loss to the Dominion treasury, and if the same favours were likewise extended to the merchandise of other countries, the loss of revenue would be much greater. They felt that they would not be able to recoup these losses by other methods of taxation.

There is the case substantially. On the one hand the assertions, on the part of the Canadian Commissioners, made on the 7th March, 1893, that the United States Government required a treaty which should require a uniform duty; that it required the adoption of the United States tariff, and the breaking down of the customs line between the two countries. And, on the other hand, the statement of General Foster that such was not the case; the statement of Mr. Blaine that the proposal for negotiations was one which required the including of a list of manufactured articles which should receive preferential treatment as an offset to the request of Canada that the United States should grant the free admission of natural products into that country on the basis of preferential treatment. The statement of this fact by the President and by Mr. Blaine—a year before this Canadian statement was made by our Finance Minister—everything points to the truth of the assertion that the United States were ready at any time during President Harrison's Administration to negotiate a treaty of reciprocity with Canada, granting us preferential treatment in their market for all the natural products of our soil and requiring from us preferential treatment for a certain list of manufactures—that list afterwards to be agreed upon.

Now, Sir, what was to prevent our commissioners from entering upon negotiations on that basis, and, having ascertained how extensive it would be necessary to make that list, whether it would not be possible to select a list satisfactory to the United States which would avoid entirely discrimination against Great Britain, as I assert it would be possible to do. No, Mr. Speaker, the position of matters is very simple indeed. All the talk of the Government about being in favour of reciprocity is mere idle assertion, the Government has never shown a disposition or desire to secure reciprocity upon obtainable terms. They have systematically and upon all occasions sought to surround this question with fog. They have placed the matter, and have sought to place it, upon a false basis; they have made assertions destitute of truth, and, if the country had to rely upon the statements of the Government press, it would be entirely misinformed as to the conditions upon which the United States would be willing to treat or the conditions upon which it would be possible to treat at this moment. Sir, I repeat that this is simply a question of granting preferential trade by each country. We must, as a condition of reciprocity, ask and grant preferential treatment. We must have the privilege of exporting to the United States our horses, our swine, our wool, our vegetables, our apples, our hay, our eggs and a hundred other articles, upon a preferential basis, a basis which favours us above all other nations. We must ask for this preferential treatment. That is a condition of securing access to their market. I assert that any Government of Canada which says: We will take this preferential treatment and will give nothing in return is not seeking to obtain reciprocity, and has no reason to hope for it, and, if it professes to be able to secure reciprocity upon such terms, it is deceiving the people, and it is fair to say that that deception is one that it is aware it is practicing. We must give preferential treatment if we receive it, and, in my opinion, we can give it if we were prepared to look upon this question in the light of a fair business arrangement, and are prepared to give fair consideration for what we receive. We are not prepared to do it. The Government do not want an arrangement, having in mind the interest of its clients, who desire to keep out American competition. And as they refuse to make concessions for the purpose of securing reciprocity, they leave the vast producing interests of this Dominion, the farmers, the lumbermen, the miners, the fishermen, barred out from their natural market, and this country shrivelled and with its growth retarded by the refusal to obtain access to our natural market upon conditions reasonable and just, and obtainable for all these interests, and they do it for the sake of promoting the interests of a comparatively small number.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I shall not detain the House longer upon this motion further than to make one other remark. Having asserted that the arrangements can be made, having asserted that it can be made on reasonable terms, having asserted that it can be made on terms favourable to Canada, having asserted that it can be made on terms agreeable to Great Britain, and not detrimental to British interests, I affirm, in conclusion, that the arrangement, if it were made, is one that would be conducive to the highest interests of the entire Anglo-Saxon race. It would be the end of the bickering and jealousies and misunderstandings that exist between British America and the United States. All the questions of contention that arise between the United States and the old country originate with this colony of Great Britain, and, if this arrangement were made, so far from being detrimental to British interests, it would be in the highest degree advantageous, because it would inaugurate an era of cordiality between the two great branches of the Anglo-Saxon race. I move for:

Return showing the exports to the United States for the last fiscal year, of articles the export of which to the United States exceeds in value the export of the same to all other countries, which return shall give; 1. A detailed classification of the description of articles, commodities or wares, under the general subdivisions of products of the mines, products of the fisheries, animals and their products, agricultural products and manufactures, coming within the scope of the inquiry; 2. The value of each class of articles exported to the United States and exported to all other countries; 3. The totals of value under each general subdivision exported to the United States and exported to all other countries; 4. The grand total of values under all the general subdivisions exported to the United States and exported to all other countries.

Mr. KENNY. Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat has held out what he is pleased to term another olive branch to the United States. He has argued the case at length, and has fortified his argument with an array of figures, which it is impossible to deal with immediately, in order to show this Legislature the repressive effects of the McKinley tariff. Any one listening to the hon. gentleman would be almost forced to the conclusion that the Government of Canada was responsible for the McKinley tariff. The hon. gentleman has told us during the course of this debate, as on many previous occasions, that it is owing to the fact that the Government of this Dominion, and the members of this Parliament who support the Government, and the large majority of the people of Canada who elect these members, that it is because all these forces united do not desire closer trade relations with the United States that we have not to-day a measure of reciprocal trade with that country. The hon. gentleman is thoroughly familiar with the discussion of this question in the Congress of the United States and he must know that, while the Wilson tariff Bill was under discussion in Congress there was hardly a reference made in any clause of it which would probably or possibly have the effect of extending trade with Canada that was not met, from one side or other, with the statement that it would not do to adopt it because any concessions that would encourage Canadian trade would simply have the effect of postponing annexation. The hon. gentleman has been at some pains to repeat to-night a statement which he has made this session repeatedly, that no prominent man on that side of the House had ever identified himself with the question of commercial union. I may not refer to a previous debate, but the hon. gentleman repeated that statement to-night. Sir, I see before me my hon. friend from Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies), and he is rather involved with that question himself. He will remember, at all events, that the Halifax 'Morning Chronicle,' the leading organ of the Liberal party in the Maritime Provinces I may call it so with all due respect to the other newspapers published in the Liberal interest in the Maritime Provinces—proclaimed that the man who was not in favour of commercial union was a natural born sneak and a coward. But to deal more immediately with the utterances of the hon. member for North Norfolk, I find that on the 16th March, 1888, speaking from the place from which he spoke to-night, he made this statement:

I have attended meetings of some of these institutes, and have found in all cases the sentiment in favour of commercial union or unrestricted reciprocity—was of a most pronounced character, and I have found that this sentiment is by no means confined within party lines.

He knew no difference between the two.

There is a positive statement made by the hon. member for North Norfolk on the 16th March, 1888, in this House, in favour of commercial union, or unrestricted reciprocity; and yet he stands up to-night and says that no prominent man of the Liberal party ever advocated commercial union.

Mr. CHARLTON. Does the hon. gentleman draw any distinction between unrestricted reciprocity and commercial union?

Mr. KENNY. The hon. gentleman himself has very deftly defined the difference between commercial union and unrestricted reciprocity, and with his permission and that of the House I will now read it to him and refresh his memory. I think it was in the same debate, and he will find it on page 211 of the 'Hansard.' He thus defines commercial union or unrestricted reciprocity:

An arrangement made between two or more countries whereby they adopt a common tariff and common excise laws, abolish all customs lines between themselves, throw the revenue into one common fund, and divide it, per capita, as may be mutually agreed upon.

The hon. gentleman asked me if I had ever defined commercial union. I have defined it as a measure which was originated with the intention of leading Canada into annexation. That is my definition of it; the hon. gentleman's own definition of it I have read to him. Is it any wonder that when gentlemen occupying prominent positions in this country made use of similar language when attending banquets in Boston, and promising that Boston, if their policy was carried out, would be the entrepot of the commerce of Canada, that one of the gentlemen present said that in order that the hon. member for South Oxford, who had just spoken at that banquet, might attain his object, it would be necessary that he should become a Senator from the state of Ontario. But, Sir, I do not know whether it was on that occasion—they had so many dinners in Boston and New York and elsewhere—but it was on one of those festive occasions that the gentleman who presided proclaimed that the Liberal party of Canada, "Davies from Prince Edward Island, Mercier and Laurier from Quebec, and Cartwright in Ontario, look to us, the people of the United States, for the sign by which they were to conquer." Such is the effect which the advocacy of commercial union has had upon the minds of the statesmen of the United States. The hon. leader of the Opposition is not surprised at that result, because he knows very well that when he was attending a public meeting in Halifax, in 1890, he referred on that occasion, and he has repeated the reference in Parliament, to the opinions of Senator Sherman, and Senator Blair, and Congressman Hitt, and Congressman Butterworth. The opinions of those gentlemen are on record, those of us who have taken the trouble to read their speeches in reference to Canada, know well what their individual sentiments are. I will quote one or two expressions of opinion of Senator Sherman, who was named by the leader of the Opposition in Halifax, in this House, and who appears to be the representative of these hon. gentlemen opposite in the Senate of the United States. Senator John Sherman, of Ohio, in his place in Congress, speaking on matters connected with Canada, made use of the following language—and he did so before the leader of the Opposition made his reference to him here, and when, of course, he was thoroughly familiar with the views and the language of the gentleman whom he extolled at Halifax. Referring to Canada and the United States, Senator Sherman said :

This controlling principle of blending local and national authority—many in one—was the discovery of our fathers, and has guided the American people thus far in safety and honour, and I believe can be, and ought to be, extended to the people of Canada. With a firm conviction that this consummation most devoutly to be wished, is within the womb of destiny, and believing it is our duty to hasten its coming, I am not willing, for one, to vote for any measure, not demanded by national honour, that will tend to postpone the good time coming when the American flag will be the signal and sign of the Union of all the English-speaking people of the continent, from the Rio Grande to the Arctic Ocean.

That is the language of Senator Sherman, who was quoted by the leader of the Opposition speaking at a public meeting at Halifax, and also in this Canadian legislative assembly.

Mr. LAURIER. I never quoted that speech of Mr. Sherman. I am not responsible for what Mr. Sherman said.

Mr. KENNY. I am not aware that the hon. gentleman quoted that particular speech, but at all events he quoted Senator Sherman as the exponent of his views. But he is not much more to blame for that reference to Senator Sherman than is the hon. member for South Oxford, who told us in this British legislature, that if we wished to ascertain his views, and the views of his party, we would find them reflected in a resolution which Congressman Hitt had proposed in the Congress of the United States. I think that is the first instance on record in history where a member of a British legislature told the members of that legislature that if they wanted to ascertain his views, all they had to do was to examine a certain measure introduced in a foreign legislature.

Mr. CHARLTON. If the hon. gentleman will allow me to correct what places me in a false light, I will do it now; if not, I will do it when he closes.

Mr. CHARLTON. The hon. gentleman read an extract from page 211 "Debates," volume I. 1888, in which I define what I understood commercial union to be, and the hon. gentleman read the extract correctly. I define in that extract what commercial union is. Mr. White (Cardwell), asked this question :

I do not desire to interrupt the hon. gentleman, but perhaps he will go further and state whether that is the proposition now before the House by the hon. gentleman?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. gentleman has been told most distinctly, and it has been stated a dozen times on this side of the House, that it is not the proposition. I can add that the hon. gentleman and his followers must have been even more stupid, if that is possible, than is usually the case.

Mr. CHARLTON. I am not so uncharitable as my hon. friend. I do not accuse the hon. gentleman of stupidity, but he evidently believes that the country is stupid, and that he can mislead the people upon this question by dragging a red herring across the trail. So much for the question of commercial union arising indirectly on this question owing to the remarks made by the Minister of the Interior.

Mr. KENNY. If the hon. gentleman is satisfied, his record may rest on what he has just read; taken in conjunction with the whole of the speech which he made in that debate. I am perfectly willing he shall occupy that position. The hon. gentleman stated earlier in the same debate that the sentiment in favour of commercial union or unrestricted reciprocity was of the most pronounced character.

Mr. CHARLTON. I drew a distinction between commercial union and unrestricted reciprocity, and I have stated what that distinction was.

Mr. KENNY. The hon. gentleman will remember that during all this controversy when commercial union or unrestricted reciprocity was under discussion in one phase or another in this House, various references were made to the gentlemen with whom hon. gentlemen opposite were in correspondence and communication in the Congress of the United States, and it was not possible for us to get from hon. gentlemen opposite an accurate definition of the terms. We were finally driven, in order to ascertain what were their views, to their friends across the border. The leader of the Opposition does not seem to be satisfied with these views of Mr. Sherman, which I have quoted, but if he will read that gentleman's speeches, he will find that from first to last, in all his references to the trade relations of Canada with the United States, that the course suggested would result, and was intended to result, in the annexation of Canada to the United States. Let me give another authority. The hon. gentleman has referred to Mr. Hitt. Mr. Hitt is known to all of us who were members of the House when commercial union or unrestricted reciprocity was under discussion, for his name was frequently mentioned by hon. gentlemen opposite. Mr. Hitt spoke as follows:—

Can there be any question that it would be in the interests of our people to have free admission to that market (Canada) for the sale of American goods, to have preference in fact in that market by the establishment of the tariff against the importation from any other country.

Mr. Butterworth also frequently expressed himself on the same line. Yet the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), attempted to-night to convey the impression to the House and the country that the reason we have not a reciprocity treaty with the United States to-day is because the present Dominion Government does not favour it. The hon. gentleman must remember that every reciprocity treaty entered into with the United States was abrogated by the Government of the United States and not by the Government of Canada. The hon. gentleman has told us to-night that he is in favour of a preferential arrangement with the United States on a list of certain specified manufactured goods, and he thinks this arrangement can be accomplished without discriminating against the mother country. He may have evolved that problem in his own mind, but the ordinary commercial man of Canada, and even the ordinary politician, will find it a most difficult problem to solve, for most difficult must it be to arrive at any arrangement whereby a preference can be given to manufactured goods from the United States, and at the same time not be given to similar lines of goods from Great Britain, and yet not discriminate against the mother country. The hon. gentleman is not just to hon. members on this side of the House when he says that we are not in favour of any fair measure of reciprocity with the United States. We are not in favour of surrendering the right to make our own tariff, and our own fiscal arrangements, and we are opposed to granting that power to a foreign Legislature. Hon. gentlemen opposite in their advocacy of this measure have been accused by one of the leading organs of the United States with wearing a mask, and that the men who advocated commercial union really meant annexation. The leader of the Opposition went down to Boston in 1891, long after the general elections. The leader of the Opposition was entertained at a banquet presided over by General Collins. General Collins made use of this language:

We are done with the old world and with the old world ideas of commerce. That line which runs from the Atlantic to the Pacific, a little north of us, means nothing to separate you and me Mr. Laurier. Commerce is greater than politics. All lines of communication run north and south; the artificial barriers run between east and west. But whether the mission of the Jesuit, your mission or some one else's mission can unite the two peoples in kindred and blood, equal in civilization your great public necessities operating through Canada and the United States will leave us practically one people, with a common destiny to make out.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Hear, hear.

Mr. KENNY. Then the hon. gentleman approves of that doctrine; the hon. member for Bothwell believes that the ultimate destiny of Canada is to be annexed to the United States.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). No. That is not the declaration that the hon. gentleman made. The declaration made is that commerce is greater than politics.

Mr. KENNY. In order that there may be no misunderstanding, I will read again the concluding sentence of the quotation I have just made:

But whether the mission of the Jesuit, your mission or some one else's mission can unite the two peoples in kindred and blood, equal in civilization, your great public necessities operating through Canada and the United States, will leave us practically one people, with a common destiny to make out.

Is that the sentiment the hon. member for Bothwell approves?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). One people for what purpose? For the purpose the speaker refers to.

Mr. KENNY. In all my reading of the speeches of American statesmen in which the Munroe doctrines has been advocated. I never read one that took more strong grounds. I never heard the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) make a similar declaration till to-day, and I am rather surprised the hon. member for Bothwell should have made such an admission.

Mr. LAURIER. Is the Munroe doctrine in favour of the annexation of the continent?

Mr. KENNY. That is as I understand it.

Mr. LAURIER. No.

Mr. KENNY. Am I correct in the opinion that hon. gentlemen opposite do not believe in the Munroe doctrine? This language which I have read, however, was addressed to the leader of the Opposition by a gentleman who received him with courtesy, and who desired to say that which he supposed would be pleasant to him to hear. Governor

Russell, of Massachusetts, was at the banquet, and he made use of this language :

With existing restrictions removed or largely modified, I do not doubt great benefit will come to both countries, and Boston with her enterprise, her energy, and industry can be the commercial metropolis not only of New England, but of the great country beyond.

When Governor Russell made use of that language, of course, he had the promise ringing in his ears, made by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), that as soon as his plans, and the plans of his friends across the border were carried out, the distributing trade of Toronto, of Montreal, of Halifax, and of St. John was to be obliterated, and Boston was to be the entrepot of the commerce of Canada.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I would ask the hon. gentleman to read any statement of mine to that effect.

Mr. KENNY. Does the hon. gentleman question the accuracy of this statement ?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I undoubtedly do.

Mr. KENNY. That at a meeting in Boston—

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Read it.

Mr. KENNY. That he stated that Boston, if such an arrangement were carried out, would become the entrepot of the commerce of Canada.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I did not say that. Read it again.

Mr. KENNY. I read it before in this House, I have not the precise words at hand, but what the hon. member for South Oxford did say on that occasion is well known to every public man in Canada. It may be said : It does not concern us what these statesmen of the United States may say, and, to some extent, that would be a good argument ; but when American statesmen are named by the leaders of the Liberal party as the exponents of their views, and when the same American statesmen are treating and dealing with Canadian questions, I think it is perfectly pertinent for us to examine and inquire into the views which they express. As regards this particular dinner at Boston, the views which were expressed by General Collins and Governor Russell fade into insignificance before the language used by the hon. leader of the Opposition himself. Of course, we know how gifted an orator the hon. gentleman is, and that he excels in after dinner speaking. The hon. gentleman is reported to have made use of the following language :—

But as in the case of every dependency dependence will not last. Canada and England will have interests apart, and the day will come and must come when Canada and England will have to separate from each other,

Mr. KENNY.

That is the language of the leader of the Opposition.

I am a subject of the British Crown, but whenever it comes, that as a Canadian I have to choose between the interests of England and the interests of Canada, my whole heart is with my native land.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Hear, hear ; and your interest is against your native land.

Mr. KENNY. And the leader of the Opposition continues :

It is manifest to me that the interests of my country are identicle with the interests of the United States.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Mr. KENNY. Why did not hon. gentlemen opposite wait to applaud the whole speech ?

Mr. LAURIER. Will the hon. gentleman permit me to ask what newspaper he quotes from ?

Mr. KENNY. It is taken from a Boston paper, published at the time, and its accuracy has never been questioned until to-night.

Mr. LAURIER. I never had its accuracy put in question until to-night. The only accurate copy of the speech which was published was in the Toronto 'Globe.'

Mr. KENNY. Does the hon. gentleman say that what I have quoted here is incorrect ?

Mr. LAURIER. Mr. Speaker, I cannot undertake to say now that the report of a speech I delivered three years ago is correct or not correct. I do not believe it is correct. That is all I can say at this moment. At all events, I will be bound by the report of the Toronto 'Globe,' which was exact, and which I read.

Mr. KENNY. The hon. gentleman must remember that he occupies such a position in this country, that when speaking on international questions in which the loyalty of the people of Canada to the British Crown is concerned, every utterance of his is read with concern by his fellow-countrymen. One effect of that speech of the hon. leader of the Opposition was that Sir Oliver Mowat, I think it was he, after the speech of the leader of the Opposition was published, recognizing the effect which it would have upon the public mind of Canada, and, in order to disabuse Americans to the extent which he could, of the effect which it must have had upon their minds, is credited with the advice : That as a mere matter of party tactics, it was well not to speak so publicly upon that question. Sir, one effect of this language was that the New York 'Tribune,' which pays more attention to Canadian matters than most organs of public opinion in the United States—unless, perhaps, one or two journals which have a disloyal Canadian to write for them—one effect of such utterances upon the minds of the editors of the New York 'Tribune' was that they proclaimed that the only prominent Liberal in Canada who did not desire annexation was Sir Oliver Mowat. I will, therefore, say in all sincerity to hon. gentlemen opposite: Whether in this Legislature or out of it, on either side of the border, when they proclaim to the Canadian or to the American people that we Canadians cannot live without the Americans, and that we are ready to surrender everything to them, they are doing a very great injustice to the people of Canada, they are misleading the American people, and they are thwarting instead of advancing the cause of reciprocity.

Mr. McMULLEN. I do not think it is right that we should allow the statements made by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Kenny) to go to the country without contradiction. The hon. gentleman, and those who surround him, have for years persistently endeavoured to mystify the public mind on the questions of commercial union, unrestricted reciprocity, and extended trade relations with the United States. In 1891 they very successfully mystified the public mind on that question. They lead the people of this country to understand that they were going to enter into a treaty of extended trade relation with the United States, and, after securing the confidence of the people, they disappointed their expectations, and, from that day until this, there has never been a single change in their tariff, or a single act of theirs that has not plainly proved that they are opposed to any trade relations with the United States. It is an amazing thing to think that hon. gentlemen opposite will sit in their places night after night, and day after day, and utter statements which cannot possibly be true. The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Kenny) has stated that hon. gentlemen on this side of the House have held out another olive branch to the United States. I would like to know when the Government or its supporters have ever held out an olive branch to the United States? He wanted to know if the United States had given any evidences of their willingness to trade with Canada. I will remind him of the fact of their placing agricultural implements on the free list. Did hon. gentlemen opposite accept that olive branch? They accepted it by placing a duty of 20 per cent on agricultural implements. The United States have held out another olive branch by placing flour and wheat on the free list; have hon. gentlemen opposite accepted that? They have replied by putting 15 cents a bushel on wheat and 75 cents a barrel on flour. Every single move taken by the United States towards more extended trade with Canada has been met by this Government with an action in opposition to a more extended trade. And yet these hon. gentlemen deny such statements as that made by the hon. member for North Norfolk to-night.

Why is it that that hon. member is compelled so often to bring this question before the House? Simply because the Tory press of this country will persist in mistifying and fooling and humbugging the people. For that reason we are compelled from day to day and from week to week to reiterate the proofs which are incontestable in favour of the possibility of securing an extended trade with the United States. Yet I have no doubt that the Tory press will be found again to-morrow characterizing the statements made by the hon. member for North Norfolk as a repetition of the speeches he has delivered before. Why, Sir, consider the statement he quoted from the Montreal 'Gazette' to-night in the face of all that has been said on the floor of this House. That is a clear indication of the determination of the Tory press not to let the country know the truth in regard to the offers that have been made, but to mystify and blind the people upon this important question. That has been their aim and object in the past, and it appears to be their determination for the future. The hon. gentleman said that the Wilson Bill contained no evidences that the Americans are at all favourably inclined to establish extended trade with Canada. I cannot understand how that hon. gentleman can make such a statement. When hon. gentlemen opposite rise to speak on this question in this House, you can read in their countenances the personal interest they have in preventing any extended trade relations with the United States. I think I am correct in saying that the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat is the president or director of or is largely interested in one of the large sugar refineries of his district; and if we had extended trade relations with the United States the profits of that refinery would probably be seriously affected, and the hon. gentleman might lose his gains. He is no doubt making very considerable profits every year through the operations of the tariff, and any trade relations that might endanger the advantages he enjoys would undoubtedly be a serious stroke at his future well-being. Therefore, he is willing that the public mind should be kept in a state of ignorance with regard to the offers made by the United States on this subject. I have pointed out what the United States have done in the direction of removing the duty from eggs. Last year we heard very loud and very unanimous expressions of pride from hon. gentlemen opposite with regard to the immense trade that we were building up with Great Britain in eggs. Well, Sir, when the duty on eggs is wiped off by the Wilson Bill—although Canada, by her action, does not even deserve that—the people of this country will soon realize that the best market for our eggs is the American market. We shall then see how many thousands or hundreds of thousands will be shipped across the Atlantic. We on this side of the House are honestly and anxiously in favour of securing an outlet in the United States for many of the commodities for which the farmers of Canada want a market at the present moment. Where is the market for our horses? Where is the market for our fat cattle to-day?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. McMULLEN. Where is the market for our lambs? I would ask the hon. gentlemen who say "Oh." I would like to ask them where is the market that we used to have for our barley? Where is the market for our beans, and for many other things that I could name? But these hon. gentlemen, as long as they are in receipt of the advantages they enjoy under the existing restrictions, are willing that the farmers should fight and struggle and worry under the restrictions and extortions to which they are now subject, and be obliged to send their products to Liverpool, the slaughter market for all creation, and take any price they can get. These hon. gentlemen want to frighten the people of Canada with the idea that extended trade relations with the United States means commercial union. The hon. gentleman who last spoke said that if we entered into such relations, we must allow the United States to make our tariff. Now, that hon. gentleman is an intelligent gentleman; he has sat in this House for many years, and has heard the discussions which have taken place on this question year after year; and I am sure he has intelligence and ability enough to know that in making and reiterating that statement he is talking wide of the mark. There is not a single Reformer in this House or in this country that I know of who has ever expressed himself as favourable to the principle of commercial union with the United States. The hon. gentleman has referred to a speech made by the hon. member for North Norfolk when he was explaining to this House what commercial union meant, and he has quoted from that speech in order to prove that my hon. friend in making that statement was in favour of commercial union. Anything at all will answer the purpose, which for the moment fastens upon the members of the Opposition the charge of being commercial unionists. But I believe that the days of poisoning the public mind and blinding and mystifying the people of this country upon this question are drawing rapidly to an end. I am satisfied that the people are beginning to realize this, and that they cannot be humbugged on this question very much longer. Undoubtedly hon. gentlemen opposite have been marvelously successful at humbugging the public mind; but in the face of the quotations that have been presented to-night by the hon. member for North Norfolk, in the face of the evidences of the willingness of the United States to meet fairly the people of this country, in the face of the suggestion thrown out by Mr. Blaine to consent to a well considered list of manufactured goods along with natural products—all these facts go to show that if the Government were disposed to enter into a treaty of that kind, negotiations would at once begin which would result in extended trade relations with the United States. But our Government are not willing to do that. How could they? Touch the cotton factory? They dare not do it, because these factories are as dear to them as the apple of their eye. Touch the refineries? My hon. friend who has just taken his seat (Mr. Kenny) is too powerful a supporter of the Government to allow them to do that. Touch the cordage combine? The hon. gentleman who is associated with my hon. friend who has just taken his seat (Mr. Stairs) would certainly not allow that industry to be interfered with. So you can go through the different industries—every one has its representative in this House, or has powerful influence outside. The agricultural implement manufacturing institutions—principally that of Massey-Harris, no doubt exercise a very powerful influence on the Government. Messrs. Massey and Harris exercised such influence during the past year that they drew something like $10,000 in the way of a rebate for their supposed exportation of agricultural implements to Australia. Whether they made the proposition themselves, or whether the Government, out of the kindness of their hearts, to encourage them in that industry, suggested that they should make the demand, they got the money. All those industries have powerful influence with the Government, and as a result the Government hang on to the old policy. And they will continue to do so so long as they remain in office. They will never make a reciprocity treaty. They do not want it. I am satisfied that if Canada waits until such time as hon. gentlemen opposite will accept a treaty for improved commercial relations between Canada and the United States she will wait until the Greek kalends. Our Government do not want any such treaty. They have proved this by their past and by the emissions contained in their standing offer. Session after session we have had evidence of their determination to keep things as they are so long as they can, and until the people rise in their might and insist on having reciprocity we need expect no change. But if hon. gentlemen opposite think that the organizations throughout the country formed by the farmers are to be blinded by such statements as those made by the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat, with regard to commercial union, he is mistaken. When they come to discuss the question of trade relations with the United States they will find that the people know a good deal more about it than they did in 1891. Hon. gentlemen opposite have tried to saddle us with annexation sentiments. Well, if we have anything of that kind in our ranks we must have become infected with the disease from hon. gentlemen opposite, because it broke out in their ranks first. They were the fathers of annexation sentiment in this country, and if we have been unfortunately besmeared with the degrading sentiment, we must realize that it was from them we got it. It never originated with us. I do not know a Reformer in Canada of any importance who is an out and out annexationist. While we recognize the importance of extended trade relations with that country we do not wish to go on our knees and beg for them. We are willing to secure these relations on honourable terms. Hon. gentlemen have said that they are not responsible for the McKinley Bill. I can only say in reply that they are indirectly responsible, because had they dealt more generously, honourably and liberally with the United States on the question of interchange of trade, we would not perhaps have been subjected to the operations of the McKinley Bill. Year after year our Government have done things to provoke the United States and cause it to resent any approach to extended trade relations. Session after session they put upon our statute-books laws that evidently do not bear any desire towards relationship of a more kindly and extended character with our neighbours. As I said a few years ago, when the Americans put a fresh fruit offer in their statute, hon. gentlemen opposite waited nearly two years before they met their proposition, and were shamed into putting fresh fruit upon the free list. They have militated against the United States by discriminating in canal tolls and in many other ways, and if we would look over the whole record we will find that there is very little indeed that the United States have to thank Canada for, and that if strained relations exist between the two countries it is because there has been no desire whatever manifested on the part of Canada to have more friendly relations than now exists.

Mr. McMULLEN.

Mr. LAURIER. Before this question is put I desire to say just a few words in reply to the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Kenny). That hon. gentleman has asserted to-day, as he has done many times before, that commercial union meant unrestricted reciprocity and that unrestricted reciprocity meant annexation. The hon. gentleman thought he would fortify his position by referring to a banquet tendered to me in Boston some years ago. Strange to say, however, the hon. gentleman did not propose to state, as the main support of his contention, any words of mine, but simply the words of General Collins, from which he understood that General Collins meant that the two countries were to be united. I took no such construction from the words of General Collins, which I heard at the time; but I would ask the hon. gentleman, and any man of common sense and fair honour, whether, if I am tendered a banquet in the city of Boston or anywhere else, and I give my views, I am to be held responsible for the views of any American who sits at the same table. Because the gentleman who sits at the same board is in favour of a certain course am I to be held responsible? Because I sit alongside a man with whom I agree in politics am I supposed to agree with him in religion? I have only this to say: that if General Collins meant annexation this is the answer I give on the spot. The hon. gentleman quoted a few words from a Boston paper, and asked if I ever uttered them. I really could not remember, but I have just looked over the report of the speech I delivered, and I find that I never uttered any such words as are represented to me by the hon. gentleman.

It is also objected that the American people would not consent to such an arrangement without practically forcing us to abandon the control of our tariff and taking it in their own hands. What this objection really means it is difficult to understand, and never was yet properly defined by those who raise it. It is an appeal to the national pride of the Canadian people. I have only to say, however, that if unrestricted reciprocity were to be had only by the sacrifice, however slight, of Canada's dignity I would have none of it. But whatever may be the opinion or the dread of others, I have no such anxiety. I have no fear that the American authorities would be disposed to be overbearing because they represent over 60,000,000 whereas we represent less than 5,000,000, especially when approached with candour by men sensitive to the honour of their country, but confident that such a feeling would evoke nothing but respect from hon. members. I am fully aware that the plan of reciprocity which we would propose, each country keeping the control of its own tariff, might be at the first view liable to difficulties of a more serious nature, but difficulties, I submit, with full confidence, which might be met and successfully overcome by negotiations embodied in the treaty. Since I arrived here this morning it has been my privilege to meet several American gentlemen, and discussing the question with them, they made me another objection. Their language in substance was this:—The people on both sides of the boundary line are the same; they derive their civilization from the same source; there are between them no natural obstacle. Why does not Canada join the United States in a political union? Why do not Canadians agree to be incorporated in the American Republic? If the United States grant reciprocity to Canada, they will contribute to a higher prosperity and development instead of bringing her to us we will only put obstacles in the way of annexation. I know this argument. I know it well. I have heard it in Canada; that is to say I have heard the same premises with a totally different conclusion. There the conclusion is that reciprocity would only be the first step that would finally lead to an end in annexation. Either with those who believe that unrestricted reciprocity between the two countries would incline to annexation or with those who believe that unrestricted reciprocity would lead to annexation, I refuse to discuss. Both arguments are unjust to the people of Canada. It were unmanly to be coerced, unmanly to be cajoled into any course, whatever it might be, which the people of Canada would not otherwise adopt.

Now, Sir, that is the language which I made use of in the great city of Boston.

Mr. KENNY. At the banquet ?

Mr. LAURIER. Yes. I am quoting from the speech I delivered on that occasion. I would like the hon. gentleman to learn and believe, once for all, that whatever I say here I am prepared to repeat elsewhere, and whether I speak in Ottawa, or Quebec, or Boston I express the same opinions.

Mr. WALLACE. I think in the speech he has just delivered the hon. leader of the Opposition has rather evaded than met the question raised by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Kenny). Sir, I do not think it is a creditable thing for a political leader among the Canadian people to go to Boston and there at a public banquet use language that was, at any rate, not loyal to England.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Not as bad as to go to Ireland with pistols in your belt to fight the English Government.

Mr. WALLACE. If the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) understood the rules and courtesies of debate, he would conduct himself a little more seemly. I say, Sir, that when a Canadian subject of Her Majesty goes to a foreign city, among a people who have been unfriendly to Great Britain and uses such language as that used by the hon. leader of the Opposition on the occasion referred to, his action is one injurious to Canada. On that occasion he held out threats against Great Britain. Speaking in this hostile country he declared: If the interests of Canada and the interests of Great Britain should be at any time, as they may be, opposed to one another, then you will know where I am to be found—I will be found hostile to Britain.

Mr. McMULLEN. No.

Mr. WALLACE. Was it patriotic to suggest such a thing? Would a loyal Canadian citizen raise such an issue in a foreign and hostile country? We know that Great Britain has stood by Canada in every emergency, that she has come to the verge of war on more than one occasion in defence of Canadian interests, and I for one, say it was not courteous or loyal to Great Britain to declare in a foreign country that the time might arise—and the sooner the better apparently in the hon. gentleman's opinion—when the interests of Great Britain and the interests of Canada would be opposed to each other and the opportunity would arise to aim a blow at Great Britain. The hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) says that there is not a single act of the Conservative party in relation to this question since 1881 but shows that they are opposed to reciprocity. Look at the tariff just introduced by the Finance Minister. Let them read the clause which declares that if the United States will admit our barley, we are prepared to admit their corn into

Mr. LAURIER.

Canada. I would ask the farmers and the people of Canada if that is not a fair offer to make? Is there a single offer in the American tariff, as it went through the House of Representatives, or as it went through the Senate, or as amended at any of its stages, equivalent to this? If there be, I would like the hon. gentleman to say where it is. The other agricultural clauses are fair reciprocal propositions as between Canada and the United States; and yet the hon. gentlemen, who are always defending the interests of the United States, always standing up for the United States made the statement, which is not true—

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Order.

Mr. WALLACE. Which is incorrect.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. WALLACE. Well, if hon. gentlemen opposite are satisfied with that, I am glad to be able to please them. They are always satisfied with being incorrect, the hon. the Premier says.

Mr. LISTER. We are always satisfied with anything that comes from you.

Mr. WALLACE. Well, the people of Canada are not satisfied with anything that comes from hon. gentlemen opposite, for they have discarded them at every opportunity. The hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) says: Where is the market for the products of the farm; where is the market for eggs? The American Government has made eggs free, and the Canadian Government has done the same. We in Canada did not put a duty upon eggs until a duty was imposed upon eggs by the United States. When the hon. gentleman asks: "Where is the trade between Canada and the mother country as regards the farmer, he might find the answer to his question in the Trade and Navigation Returns. According to the figures there given, we exported last year of animals and their products, to Great Britain about twenty-seven and a half million dollars worth, and to all the other countries in the world, including the United States, only $4,277,000 worth, or less than one-sixth as much to all other countries combined as we sent to Great Britain alone.

Mr. McMULLEN. How could they send them to the United States in the face of the McKinley Bill. What is the use of talking about sending to the United States?

Mr. WALLACE. That is just about as sensible a question as I might expect the hon. member for North Wellington to ask.

Mr. McMULLEN. You cannot answer it, anyhow.

Mr. WALLACE. When we look at the figures showing the exports of agricultural products other than animals and their products, we find we sent last year to Great Britain $16,800,000, and to the United States and all other countries $5,200,000, or less than one-third the amount exported to Great Britain. When the hon. gentleman asks where is the market for our products of Canadian farms, I think he can find his question pretty fully answered by these figures.

Mr. LISTER. Where does the lumber go to ; where do the horses go to ?

Mr. WALLACE. We will let the hon. gentleman answer their questions when their turn comes. Now, I think those figures show that the best market for the Canadian farmer is the market of Great Britain. At the same time we recognize the fact that the markets of the United States are also valuable to Canadians, and the items we have put in our new tariff show that we recognize fully the value of the American market to the Canadian farmer, but we are not prepared to hand over, as some hon. gentlemen opposite have suggested, the control of our whole fiscal affairs to the United States.

Mr. McMULLEN. The old story over again.

Mr. WALLACE. And a true story every time. Those hon. gentlemen say that the present Canadian Government has never made an honest attempt to secure reciprocal trade relations with the United States. Sir, I challenge those hon. gentlemen to show me, in the history of the United States since the reciprocity treaty was abrogated 28 years ago, one effort that the American Government has made to secure a reciprocity treaty, unless coupled with the condition that there should be discrimination against Great Britain, with the necessary consequence that the Americans would have control of the tariff of both countries, and that we should abandon our position as an independent people and put ourselves under the control of the American Government. Sir, look at the history of the attempts made on the part of the Canadian Government, look at the visit of the Hon. George Brown to Washington in 1874, of Sir Charles Tupper to Washington in 1887, of our present Premier and Finance Minister, along with Mr. Bowell, when they went to Washington in 1892—all with the one result. And yet hon. gentlemen opposite say that in 1892 no honest effort was made by this Government to obtain a treaty. The President of the United States, in his Message to Congress, gives the answer to that statement. He says :

The statement was frankly made that favourable rates could not be given to the United States as against the mother country. This admission, which was foreseen, necessarily terminated the conference upon this question.

That was the position the Canadian delegates took on that visit, that there could be no discrimination against the mother country. Consequently no reciprocity treaty of that kind can be made to which the Americans will consent, unless, as they have declared all along, it will discriminate against the mother country, and I challenge hon. gentlemen opposite to produce a statement of a single American statesman, a single American leader of repute on either side of politics, who has argued that there must be a common tariff along the seaboard between the two countries.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) No.

Mr. WALLACE. Show me one American statesman who has advocated any other doctrine.

Mr. CHARLTON. Blaine, Harrison.

Mr. WALLACE. I ask the hon. gentleman to produce a single line from either of these gentlemen to contradict the challenge I have given. They cannot do it. Gentlemen opposite are anxious to-day to repudiate commercial union. Why, it is only a few years ago, during the general elections, when they went through Ontario saying to the farmers: "If you want $10 an acre more for every acre of cultivated land in this country, vote for the Reform party. If you want $30 more for every horse in Canada, vote for the Reform party." There are 22,000,000 acres of cultivated land in Canada, which, multiplied by 10, would make $220,000,000. We have over 1,000,000 horses, which, with $30 of an increase in value for each horse, would make $30,000,000 more, of $250,000,000 that these gentlemen promised to the farmers of Canada if they would vote for the Reform party. If that policy would procure so great a prosperity for the Canadian people, why do they not advocate it to-day? Why do they now repudiate that policy? Why are they all getting up and trying to apologize, trying to explain away what they have said, trying to show that they did not mean commercial union, but they meant unrestricted reciprocity, for the two, they say, are entirely distinct and dissimilar? Did the Hon. Edward Blake say there was any difference between them? Mr. Blake, with all his astuteness and ability, and his devotion to the Reform party, could not tell the difference between those two policies; he said they were one and the same. Do hon. gentlemen repudiate the Hon. Edward Blake's statement?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Certainly.

Mr. WALLACE. When did they commence to repudiate? This is the first time I have heard the hon. member for South Oxford repudiate the Hon. Edward Blake's statements.

Mr. LISTER. What did the Hon. Mr. Blake say about you?

Mr. WALLACE. I am quoting Mr. Blake's opinion of the policy of his own friends, when he was with them, before he had become hostile to them. He did not go over to the other side.

Mr. LANDERKIN. And never will.

Mr. WALLACE. Very well, if he is one of you, you must accept his evidence. You claim him as one of yourselves, then you must respect his statements. The hon. member for South Oxford says the Conservative party have not gone in for reciprocity because "in the interest of their clients the Government does not want reciprocity." Well, Sir, the clients of the Conservative party are the people of Canada, and if the reciprocity treaty that the Opposition have been advocating is diametrically opposed to the interests of the people of Canada, then you can say, in the interest of our clients, the whole of the people of Canada, the Government do not want that kind of reciprocity. Now, the hon. member for North Norfolk offers a resolution asking for returns of the exports of Canada to the United States. He has answered, I think, every question he asked, so he must be doubtful of the accuracy of his own figures.

Mr. CHARLTON. No; my list was an imperfect one.

Mr. WALLACE. He must have doubted the accuracy of his own figures, because he asked the Government to make a return of exactly the same figures.

Mr. CHARLTON. No; embracing the same thing, but more extensive, because my statement was imperfect.

Mr. WALLACE. I think he gave the returns, so far as I could follow him. I could not vouch for their accuracy, but I think he gave answers to every question to which he asked the Government to make returns. I think if we grant those returns we should also have similar returns of the business done with Great Britain under similar conditions; that is to say, that not only should we have returns of all the products exported to the United States to a larger extent than all other countries put together, but also returns of the exports to Great Britain of all the articles that we export to that country in larger quantity than we do to all other countries. I would therefore move that the following words be added at the end of paragraph 4:—

Also similar comparative statements of exports from Canada to Great Britain for the last fiscal year.

We will then have an opportunity of making a comparison between the exports from Canada to Great Britain and the exports from Canada to the United States, of those articles that we export in the larger quantities to each country respectively. I know such a statement will show what I have already said, that for the Canadian farmer the best market to-day is the market of Great Britain, whether for his animals and the produce of his animals, or whether for agricultural products. Our timber and minerals are large and growing interests. Canada has the greatest timber belt of the world to-day, and is not confined to any one market. If we sell to-day a large portion of our timber to the United States it is because the United States must have the products of our forests at whatever cost, because their own forests are becoming depleted.

Mr. GILLMOR. I must admit, Mr. Speaker, that I have not enjoyed this debate very much. Its tendency has been rather in the direction of estranging our neighbours, the people of the United States. Whatever we may say in our speeches at public dinners, and so forth, we must all admit that it is of the highest importance that the best understanding and the most cordial feelings shall exist between the kindred people of this continent. With respect to our relations as neighbours, is there any people on the face of the earth more like Canadians than the people of the United States? We sprang from the same stock. About a hundred years ago, part of the family took a different direction. It seems to me that we are trying to separate rather than come together. While there is no people so like Canadians as are Americans in their habits of thought, in their education, in their religion, a difficulty arises out of the principle of protection. There is no use talking about the two countries trading when the commercial policy prevailing is one directly opposed to free commercial intercourse. An attempt appears to be made both in the United States and Canada to keep foreign goods out of our respective countries, and we cannot come together under those circumstances and trade freely. But if the barriers were broken down between the United States and Canada, no member of this House can imagine the increase of trade that would take place. We can produce ten times as much surplus products as we do to-day, if we had a market in which to sell them. But hon. gentlemen opposite do not want to do this trading. Do not hon. gentlemen opposite know that if we buy the products of another country we will pay for them from the products of our own country. I have been for twenty years in this Parliament, and scarcely any question comes up for consideration, except trade. We have been fighting about the National Policy. Let us look to the mother country. There they have no trouble on trade questions. There for nearly fifty years no such trouble has prevailed, and yet the great nations on the continent have been endeavouring to see how they could take advantage of each other, and have been talking about reciprocity, while the queen of nations has not been bothering about it, and yet she has been doing almost more trade than all other nations put together. We have already been here for a considerable period this session, considering nothing but trade and tariff. Four or five weeks we have been talking on the tariff, endeavouring to anticipate what they are going to do on the other side of the line, and how we are going to meet them in regard to some little barley and corn. If you want their corn, why do you not take it? If you want any product of the United States, throw down the barriers and let them come in. What nonsense is this talk about the trade question. If you want an example in trade matters, look to the mother country. For centuries she occupied the same miserable position as that occupied by Canada and the United States to-day. You may talk about our natural resources, about our advantages, our climate, and so on, and our lumber supplies to the world, but none of these can be developed under a protective system. It is impossible to develop them under such a system, and impossible that Canada can make progress. If any one could find anything more mischievous as regards the mode of raising a revenue than the plan of which the hon. gentlemen in this House have been talking for five weeks, I should like some one to suggest it. Of all ridiculous efforts to raise a revenue, there is none so foolish as that based on the principle of protection, for it is a misleading system, and one full of deception. With respect to our trade with the United States, there is no country whose markets are so important to Canada as are the markets of the United States, notwithstanding the fact that they produce similar articles to those produced here. Has it never occurred to any one that two peoples, with similar taste and resources, are about the best customers that can be obtained to help one another. I want to trade with all the world, but we can, at an early day, obtain half, for we can get in articles from all the world, and we are sure to pay for them from what we produce, but if you want Canada to arouse itself from its lethargy, open her ports to the trade of the world, and raise revenue on common sense principles. You cannot raise trade by this miserable squabble about ad valorem and specific duties.

Mr. LANDERKIN. This is a very important question, and requires serious consideration. This discussion has diverged a little from the principle of reciprocity. I think the hon. member for Halifax, I believe he is the senior member, made that diversion by referring to a speech made by the leader of the Opposition at Boston. In that speech, if I am correctly informed, because I did not hear the hon. gentleman, he stated that the leader of the Opposition had enunciated sentiments disloyal to England. The leader of the Opposition read the report of the speech and showed that he made no statement that was disloyal, but, on the contrary, that his expressions were loyal to England. I am glad the hon. Premier is present to-night, for I wish to call his attention to a speech delivered by the hon. member for Halifax when the hon. First Minister was absent in Paris. Does the First Minister know the hon. member for Halifax was found on one occasion, not in the house of his friends, but of his enemies? He delivered a speech, which was delivered in consequence of another speech delivered by that eminent man, the Controller of Customs.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman should confine himself to the subject before the House.

Mr. LANDERKIN. It is necessary, in order to convey the full import and importance of the words used by the hon. member for Halifax that I refer to this matter en passant. The hon. gentleman on that occasion stated that he was going to vote one way.

Mr. SPEAKER. Order.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I thought that perhaps, owing to the multifarious matters of business coming before the First Minister, he would not be able to read all the speeches delivered by that hon. gentleman, and if I read short extracts I would be pardoned by the House. The hon. gentleman on that occasion—

Mr. SPEAKER. Order.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I thought I might be permitted to discuss matters that occurred last session in the House when the hon. member referred to matters that had transpired in Boston.

Mr. LISTER. I move the adjournment of the House.

Mr. SPEAKER. I would just draw the attention of the House to this matter. Of course the adjournment of the House may be moved, but no member of the House, can, under a motion to adjourn the House, do that which is not in order of itself. You cannot pursue a course upon a motion to adjourn the House that would be out of order in the ordinary course of the debate.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Very good, we will not take up these extraneous matters. They were necessary to point a moral and adorn a tale, but I will have to leave them unsaid, and probably I can get a private interview with the Premier and tell him what occurred. I will not be able to refer to the speech of the Controller of Customs when he was going to stab Canada in her vital parts in the back; when he threatened that he and his friends, if a certain measure were passed in the old country, would become disloyal to Her Glorious Majesty. I am glad to hear the Controller of Customs to-night, after what I heard from him last session. I am glad to know to-night that he is truly loyal, that he has come back again and given up his treasonable designs on the Empire. I welcome him back as a good Canadian and a loyal Briton. But I do not know what the hon. gentleman will be next year. It is very likely that treason bold and bloody will take hold of his soul—

Mr. SPEAKER. Order.

Mr. LANDERKIN,—and he will go marching on again against the Empire. He speaks of the loyalty the Government manifest towards Great Britain by their policy. He says they will not discriminate against Great Britain. Why, it is only the other day, in what the Premier was pleased to call the "little French treaty," they stated they were going to discriminate against the mother country, and I believe if the Premier asks for the vote of the Controller of Customs, notwithstanding his utterances to-night, he will be found a rebel against the mother country when that question comes up. The hon. Controller quoted from the Trade and Navigation Returns; but the other day he showed us there was a clerical error in these returns, and I take hold of that book with fear and trembling, because what may be laid down as a fact there to-day, may prove a fallacy to-morrow. He told us about the market in England, and I suppose that Canada should fall down and worship the Controller of Customs because he secured that market. Why I believe we had that market before the hon. Controller of Customs was born, and so long as wisdom rules in the councils of the Empire we will have that market long after he has passed away and when he is deeply mourned and regretted by the nation. I have not the slightest doubt about that, Mr. Speaker. The hon. gentleman amends this resolution. He has devoted a great deal of attention to political economy, and he knows that for the last fifty years our products have been admitted free into the British market. Yet, he wants to contrast the policy of Great Britain with the policy of a nation whose policy was described by the Democratic party at the last election as a policy as fraudulent as policy could be, a policy hedged in, and hampered, and built in by a high protective tariff. Anybody can understand that this is a very peculiar amendment to move under the circumstances. The Controller knows that our products all enter Great Britain free. He knows that we are driven out of the United States by a policy similar to our own, and he knows well that in a matter of this kind it is impossible to have an accurate estimate, because the circumstances are so widely different and the policies that prevail in the two countries are so different. We on this side of the House take Great Britain for our model; we want our tariff framed on the British model, not on the United States model; and we do not believe in those gentlemen talking about loyalty who in their fiscal policy will discriminate against the mother land, and imitate the policy of those who are opposed to the mother land and opposed to us. We believe in our country, we have faith in our country; we want a policy put forward in this country that will develop our industries, give freedom to trade, break down restrictions, and give every man an equal chance in the race for life. That is what we contend for. We on this side of the House have never admitted the principle that any foreign power or any foreign potentate shall frame our tariff. Our Government have been going to Washington by deputation after deputation, but they now tell us, that they stop when they come to discrimination against Great Britain, because they are so loyal. Nevertheless they did not stop at discrimination in the case of France the other day. In their treaties they discriminated against the mother country, not only in favour of France, but in favour of Spain. Yet the Controller of Customs reads us a lecture about loyalty. Well, if he subscribes to this treaty, if he subscribes to a policy of that kind, we know how much reliance is to be placed upon his loyalty. I am very sorry, Mr. Speaker, that I was not allowed to pursue the other lines of thought that I had mapped out for myself, so that I would have an opportunity of showing what divergent and what alternating policies these hon. gentlemen have. At the time the Controller of Customs did diverge on that former occasion, I believe he was not satisfied with his position as Controller of Her Majesty's Customs of Canada. I believe he aspired to a higher position, and it may have been that that set his treason to work.

Mr. SPEAKER. Order.

Mr. LAURIER. What is the point of order?

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member must not impute dishonourable motives to a member for his actions in this House.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That is not dishonourable. I think my hon. friend was very unfairly dealt with in this decision.

Mr. MULOCK. I think the minority in this House have some rights, and I think Mr. Speaker has been too ready to call to order.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. You never hear him call the other side to order.

Mr. SPEAKER. If the hon. member thinks I have ruled improperly he knows what his remedy is. He can appeal to the House.

Mr. MULOCK. We will have to do it.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I do not think the Controller of Customs meant to march on the mother land. Perhaps it is not treasonable. I do not think he would have gone very far in it anyway, and I will not impute it to him. If I might be allowed to say: his policy was a vacillating one. It was not a positive policy. He had one policy one session and another policy another session. One session he was not so loyal and the next session he became very loyal. Under the circumstances, I hope that this motion will pass, and I hope that all the information that can be derived from it will be given in the return asked for by the hon. member (Mr. Charlton).

Amendment agreed to; and main motion, as amended, agreed to.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and the House adjourned at 11.05 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, 24th April, 1894.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS COMMITTEE.

Mr. BAKER moved that the third report of the Select Standing Committee on Public Accounts be now taken into consideration.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. AMYOT. We have not seen the report, and I should like it to be printed before we are called upon to deal with it.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I think we should have an opportunity to read the report before this motion is made, for it is impossible to follow the text as read at the Table. I think the hon. gentleman (Mr. Baker) would do well to ask that the report be taken into consideration to-morrow, so that hon. members may be able to be in possession of the record of the whole proceedings, as there seems to have been a contest. As to the fourth report of the committee, also presented to-day, giving power to examine witnesses and employ a shorthand writer, there can be no controversy with regard to its adoption. I move that this report be taken into consideration to-morrow, and it be made the first order of the day.

Mr. LAURIER. The hon. First Minister will see that he has adduced a strong argument in favour of the motion made a few days ago, that the committee should be empowered to summon witnesses and examine them under oath, because under the present procedure there will be on every occasion a great loss of time and the progress of the proceedings will be much impeded thereby.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I do not arrive at that conclusion. At all events, it is too late to discuss that now.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. BAKER moved that the fourth report of the Select Standing Committee on Public Accounts be now concurred in, and the committee have power to examine under oath or affirmation such witnesses as appear before them in connection with the inquiry mentioned in resolutions 1 and 2 of the said report, and also that the committee be empowered to employ a shorthand writer to take down the evidence of such witnesses.

Motion agreed to.

DETECTIVE CORPORATIONS AND MERCANTILE AGENCIES.

Mr. SPROULE moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 92) respecting Detective Corporations and Mercantile Agencies.

Mr. CASEY. Explain.

Mr. SPROULE. Mr. Speaker, the object of the Bill is for the purpose of compelling all those engaged as private detectives, or detective agencies, or mercantile corporations to become incorporated; first, by filing a certificate with the names and objects of the corporation of parties with the Secretary of State, and then within thirty days after the filing of that certificate to execute a bond in the sum of $10,000 and two sureties for each member of the firm, the aggregate of which would amount to $10,000, for the due performance of their duties. It also provides for the winding up of any such company, in the event of them ceasing to do business either by a failure to renew that bond every five years, or they can cease to operate by a two-thirds vote of their own association. It provides also that no persons shall engage in this work unless they are first registered under the provisions of this Act. It also provides that mercantile agents shall deliver to every person whose name may appear in their report a schedule somewhat similar to that left by the census enumerators, which they may fill up and deliver after reasonable time to the agents of the company. These shall be collected once a year and then filed in a book kept by the mercantile agency for that purpose. Under this provision it is not compulsory on persons to fill up that schedule, but they may do so or make such explanations as they may think it wise to make with reference to their own standing or business. It also provides that commercial agencies shall not be allowed to act as collecting agencies, but shall confine their business to that purpose for which they are incorporated.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

THE SALARY OF THE GOVERNOR GENERAL.

Mr. MULOCK moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 93) to fix the salary of the Governor General.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Explain.

Mr. MULOCK. Mr. Speaker, in answer to the request of some hon. gentlemen that I should explain this Bill, I beg to state that the salary of the Governor General is referred to in section 105 of the British North America Act in the following words:—

Unless altered by the Parliament of Canada, the salary of the Governor General shall be £10,000 sterling, money of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, payable out of the consolidated revenue fund of Canada, and the same shall form a third charge thereon.

It will thus appear from this clause that the sum of £10,000 a year attached to this office was not in the spirit of this Act a fixed and unalterable sum, but simply a sum named at the commencement of confederation and apparently intended to be revised from time to time, inasmuch as it is only declared to be the salary until the amount is altered by the Parliament of Canada. Last session I moved for a return, I have a copy of it in my hand now, showing some—and I hope all—of the expenses in connection with this office from the date of confederation down to the 30th of June, 1892. Perhaps it is only necessary for me to give the total of these figures to show that the time has arrived—in fact, I venture to say has long since passed—for Parliament to address its attention to this question, in order to see whether an unnecessary expenditure of public money was not being made upon this office. And, Sir, I venture to say, that he is the best friend of the office in question who points out abuses in order to their removal. Such at all events is the spirit in which I take the liberty of introducing this Bill to the House. In justification of the course which I have pursued, let me say, that from the official return now in my hand, it appears that there has been expended the following sums out of the public money of Canada upon this office during the period I have alluded to, namely, from confederation to the 30th of June, 1892, in payment of the Governor Generals' salaries the sum of $1,216,666.05, being the amount assigned to it under the Confederation Act; in payment of Governor Generals' travelling expenses, the sum of $145,903.45; in payment of salaries to the Governor Generals' secretaries' office, the sum of $270,350.14; in payment of contingencies, Governor Generals' Secretaries' office, the sum of $217,426.60; in payment of rent (I presume of a residence before the acquisition of Rideau Hall), $7,854; purchase of domain (being, I presume, the purchase of Rideau Hall), $82,000; additions, alterations, repairs, and maintenance in respect of Rideau

Hall, $547,143.45; in payment for furniture, $118,853.01; gardens and grounds (I suppose that is for wages of servants and expenses of that kind on the grounds), $94,349.86; fuel and light, $151,371.10. That, I believe, includes the annual grant of $8,000 a year to the Governor General for fuel and light, which seems to me practically a gratuity and addition to his salary for which I fail to find any justification. These sums make altogether an amount of $2,851,917.66, or an annual expenditure of $114,076.70, being about $65,000 a year in excess of the £10,000 sterling attached to the office at the time of its creation in 1867. No Government is specially blameworthy or entitled to special credit in respect of the administration of the expenses of this office. I find nothing to the credit of the Reform administration in that respect; but I venture to say that the expenses have grown to an unreasonable amount. In this view I invited the attention of the House a year ago to a motion which I submitted in Supply, in the hope that the Government would see fit to revise the whole system before the new Governor General accepted office. It would have been a most opportune time, I think, for Parliament to have dealt with this question, when one Governor General was going out and before his successor was appointed. Now, we are in this position: a new Governor General has been appointed, and it might fairly be said that with the practice of twenty-five years before him it would be unfair to have such a change as I propose take effect during the incumbency of the present Governor General. I feel the force of that objection; and, therefore, my Bill contemplates a substantial reduction all along the line, to take effect on the expiration of the term of office of the present incumbent. That is the direction in which my Bill moves.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved:

That Government Orders have precedence on Thursdays, for the remainder of the session, after Questions to be put by Members.

Mr. LAURIER. Mr. Speaker, I had hoped that the hon. gentleman would not put that motion, and I still hope that he will not press it to-day. It is true, we are now in the fifth week of the session, and I grant readily that this is about the usual period when the Government have been allowed to take one of the days reserved for private members; but the hon. gentleman is aware, and the House is also aware, that out of those five weeks three weeks have been taken by the Government. No opposition was offered on this side of the House to the Government's proposition, because the subject of the reform of the tariff was one of such absorbing interest that everybody thought it would be only fair that Government business should have priority for the purpose of having that question thoroughly discussed. Three weeks have been thus taken away from the days reserved to private members for their own business. I submit that if the Government now take one of the three days in each week reserved for the business of private members, it will be most likely impossible for many of the measures on the Order paper to be reached during the present session. There are no less than five pages of debatable motions on the Order paper, and no less than twenty-six public Bills introduced by private members which have already reached the stage of the second reading. Among these there are several measures of very great importance; for instance, a Bill to repeal the Franchise Act, a Bill to amend the Franchise Act, a Bill to extend the ballot to the North-west Territories, a Bill to disfranchise voters who have taken bribes, a Bill respecting ocean freight rates on cattle, and other Bills of equally primary importance; and if the Government take Thursday from private members, I submit that most of these Bills will not reach their second reading this session, and a great deal of important legislation to the country will not take place. Now, I notice that the Government have not introduced any Bill in regard to the Franchise Act this year, nor have they expressed any intention to introduce such legislation, though we were promised last year and the year before last that the Government would introduce a very substantial measure—not to abolish the Franchise Act, I am sorry to say, but to amend it and make it more workable. Up to the present time the Government have done nothing in that respect. There are two Bills on the Order paper dealing with the Franchise Act, and if these are to afford the only opportunities we shall have of dealing with that important subject, I do hope that the Government will not press the motion which they have introduced to-day.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I am perfectly conscious of the advantage which the House and the country have obtained by the debate in regard to the tariff having been carried on from day to day without the business of private members being interposed. In consideration of that, we have deferred this motion a week longer than otherwise would have been done, and we only make it now in view of the very limited progress which has been made in forwarding the business of the session. While it is true that the Government has had to some extent the advantage of having the tariff discussion continued in the manner the hon. gentleman describes, it must be remembered that we are not asking for this additional day for our own business in the sense that private members would have it but for public business of great importance; and I am sure that I need say little to the House with regard to the importance of despatch being used, especially in the consideration of the tariff amendments. We have the further fact that the estimates have not yet been considered at all, and some Government measures are yet to come down, which we have delayed bringing down because it was hopeless to undertake the despatch of them until better progress was made with the consideration of the items of the tariff. But these will be brought down within the next few days, I hope. There will be a measure with regard to the Franchise Act, which will afford ample opportunity for the discussion of that question, and hon. members will perceive that the two Bills relating to that Act which are on the Order paper only contain provisions which the House has discussed and well considered before, and therefore I shall be disposed to give every opportunity for the moving of those Bills. One cannot foresee that their consideration will occupy a very great deal of time. However, Mr. Speaker, in view of the crowded state of the paper for public Bills and Orders, I would be quite willing to meet the views of the House generally by adding to my motion the proposition that the Orders for Thursday be the Orders for Wednesday, so that the House will have all of Mondays for the consideration of notices of motion, and all of Wednesdays for the consideration of public Bills and Orders, and in that way, the two days of the week will be fairly divided between the two classes of business, giving Tuesdays, Thursdays and Fridays for the despatch of Government business. And if it will further meet the wishes of the House, I will agree that this should go into force after Thursday next, so as to give such part of next Thursday, as may be available for public Bills and Orders without Government business interfering. I think we might meet the convenience of the House and the wishes on both sides by this arrangement, which will enable us to make as much despatch as possible in the matter of the changes in the tariff, which affect so widely the conditions of the commerce of the country.

Mr. LAURIER. We will accept the suggestion of the hon. gentleman.

Mr. SPEAKER. Government Orders will have precedence on and after Thursday, the 3rd of May, after questions put by members, and the Order for Thursdays shall be made the Order on Wednesdays on and after the 2nd of May.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. All this week will be as usual.

Motion agreed to.

INQUIRIES FOR RETURNS.

Mr. GIBSON. I would like to inquire when we may expect the papers down with relation to the Curran bridge, which were ordered four weeks ago?

Mr. HAGGART. We will have them down for the committee on Friday.

Mr. MULOCK. I also desire to inquire when we may expect the papers, ordered about a month ago, respecting the Kingston Penitentiary and the British Columbia Penitentiary?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I think they will be ready to-morrow. They have been copied some time, but require to be read over.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE TARIFF.

Mr. FOSTER moved that the House again resolve itself into Committee of Ways and Means.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Before that motion is put, I desire, in the interest of the furtherance of public business, to submit a proposition to the House. It is perfectly plain to me, and I think it is perfectly plain to every member of this House who happens to have a seat on the Public Accounts Committee, that, without impugning the recent decision of that committee of the House, it would have greatly facilitated the progress of public business, had the practice which prevailed in 1891 and 1892 been concurred in. However, I am not at present going back over the record with respect to those matters. I am rather desirous, for the credit of that committee and for the comfort and convenience of the House, of suggesting what, I hope, may prove a reasonable modus vivendi, by which we can give effect to the spirit of the statement made by the First Minister, in relation to this matter on a recent occasion. And I am the more desirous of doing that, because it is perfectly plain to me and others that the spirit of his remarks are still wholly misconceived by certain of his colleagues. As I understand the case, what that committee decided, with respect to the proposition of my hon. friend from North York (Mr. Mulock), was that they were not prepared to allow all witnesses going before that committee to be examined on oath. Without accepting that as being a wise decision, I acquiesce in it. When my hon. friend, on a subsequent occasion, moved in this House in the same direction, the Minister of Marine (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) moved that:

The House is willing to grant to any committee the authority to examine witnesses under oath or affirmation, whenever it may appear that by so doing the committee may be aided in the examination of the matters coming before it.

Subsequently to that the Prime Minister in his speech, in which, as I observed at the time, I was disposed in a great measure to concur, laid down this proposition:

It was not by any means necessary that a member should make a charge of fraud or wrong, or the assertion or proof of prima facie fraud, but that he will assert that, on account of the extent of the claim under investigation.

That was, in the Minister's judgment, one sufficient reason.

Or on account of its extent, as compared with the vote out of which it is taken.

That, in his opinion, was another sufficient reason—

Or as compared with any other account of the same kind.

That was a third sufficient reason, and he went on to say:

Or for any other reason, which the ingenuity of the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Lister), I am sure, is at any time sufficient to supply, an inquiry under oath should be had.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. That is not a further reason.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That was the fourth reason suggested by the hon. gentleman, but it was open, I thought, to the objection of vagueness, and we should be inclined to demur to it as not sufficiently explicit, whereas the other three were. Then the hon. gentleman went on to say:

But some reason should be given—I care not to be too nice—why the account of Mr. O'Connor shall be subjected to the examination of witnesses under oath. And then the House shall, at the request of the committee or without it, if the committee declined to make the request, give that committee power to examine witnesses under oath in relation to that matter.

He went on further to say:

For my part, whether in the committee or the House, I would not hesitate, on such a statement of fact—

That the expenditure exceeded the estimated cost of the work—

Without calling upon him to state what he could prove—to give power to examine all witnesses upon oath. I state that, as illustrating the extent to which I, at least, would be disposed to go.

It is becoming perfectly obvious that a very great portion of the time of the Committee of Public Accounts, and consequently a very large part of the time of this House, is apt to be taken up in very unprofitable wrangling, first in the committee, and afterwards in this House, when the subject in dispute is referred to us, unless we can agree together on some kind of definition as to what form of words shall be a sufficient reason and should constitute an instruction, in point of fact, to the committee to examine witnesses upon oath. Now, I am not disposed on the present occasion, in view of the recent decision of the House, to press the matter, nor do I suppose I would be justified in pushing it to the limit to which the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) pushed it the other day, and which, as I have said, I believe to be the wiser course. I am willing enough to acquiesce in what I then understood to be the contention of the First Minister, to wit, that first of all a member of the committee should be at the pains of making a reasonable examination into the accounts and vouchers produced with respect to a particular item, but that, if after having made such examination, he should rise in his place and on his responsibility make the statement that it was desirable in the public interest, or that he believed it desirable in the public interest, or that he was convinced—if you will have it so—that it was desirable in the public interest that witnesses should be examined on oath with respect to any expenditure that he had examined—or the accounts and vouchers with reference to which he had examined—if the member will take that responsibility, the very least that could be done, if you will give effect to the spirit of the First Minister's contention, is, in such case, to allow the witnesses to be examined on oath as a matter of course. I am not asking for what my hon. friend contended, or even for what my hon. friend from Lambton (Mr. Lister) contended, which was that when he named witnesses in a special case they should be allowed to be examined on oath. Now, Sir, it appears to me that we shall surround the proceedings of the Committee on Public Accounts with every imaginable safeguard which any reasonable man can ask for, if we insist, or if the majority of the committee insist, that before any gentleman in that committee asks for an examination of witnesses under oath, he shall first carefully examine the accounts and vouchers produced. And, in view of what the First Minister has contended, if the member rises in his place in that committee and states on his responsibility that he has examined these accounts and that he believes that the ends of justice and the public interest require that witnesses should be examined under oath, then, in all conscience, that ought to be a sufficient justification and a sufficient warrant for the committee to require at once that witnesses be so examined. It must be recognized, Sir, that a very considerable responsibility is thus assumed; but it is indispensably necessary, in my judgment, that this definition shall be given, unless the entire mornings of the committee are to be devoted to a petty wrangle—which does not conduce to our dignity or to the dignity of the proceedings of the House at large—as to what particular form of words the demand shall be made in. And it is still less desirable that, when the majority rule one way and the minority another, a long discussion should forthwith ensue in this House for the purpose of ascertaining whether, in that particular instance, the majority's or the minority's view should be maintained. Extreme inconveniences are certain to arise, unless, as I have said, some reasonable definition be laid down; and there can be no doubt whatever that the country and the press will, under such circumstances, inevitably draw the inference that all this trouble would not be gone to, that all this difficulty would not be thrown in the way of investigation, unless some particular Minister or some particular official was anxious to avoid investigation if he could. Now, Sir, in the present instance, nearly six weeks have passed since this House met, and yet not one single witness has been examined. As I have said, Sir, if the proposal—which I think is a reasonable and fair one, which is very far indeed from going to the length to which I think the committee ought to go, or the length my hon. friend proposed it should go—is to be accepted, the time of the committee and the time of this House will be saved to a great extent. Sir, there is another reason why I would urge this very strongly upon the consideration of the First Minister. Who form the majority of the committee? Why, Sir, the private members on either side being about equal in numbers, it will be seen that in the great majority of cases in which investigation on oath was refused, the men who refused it were the Ministers of the Crown, the chiefs of the spending departments whose accounts were being then investigated by the Public Accounts Committee. Now, Sir, I have said before, and I repeat, that I believe it is a mistake, I believe it is contrary to the spirit of the Public Accounts Committee and the object for which it is formed, that a large number of Ministers should have seats there. I admit the wisdom and propriety of allowing Ministers to be heard before the Public Accounts Committee when the expenditures of their several departments are under consideration by the committee. That can be done, I think, and done in accordance with our rules, but I do say that it cannot but strike the public at large as a very unfair and a very improper thing that we should bring up questions for investigation into the spending departments, and that, again and again, investigation should be refused by a majority composed, as I have said, of the chiefs of these very spending departments. I do not wish to repeat too much what I said before as to the extreme desirability, when you are examining the officials of a particular department when their chiefs are in presence, of requiring these witnesses to be sworn. I think, Sir, that everybody must see for himself that it is asking far too much of these officials to expect them to give a very full account of the transactions, maybe reflecting upon their official chief, when that chief is in presence, unless they are virtually compelled to do it, and they can only be compelled to do it if their answers are taken down and if they are examined under oath. Sir, as I have said, I do not at all desire to prolong this discussion; but I do desire to lay before the House what I believe to be a reasonable compromise on this question, a proposal which goes not to the length to which I think it ought to go, not to the length to which we proposed to go, but which carries out in effect and in reality the spirit of the remarks made by the First Minister on the recent occasion to which I have referred. And, in order that we may obtain an authoritative decision on the matter, I beg to move :

That Mr. Speaker do not now leave the Chair, but that all the words after "That" be left out and it be resolved: "Whenever any member of the Committee on Public Accounts shall declare in his place in the said committee that he has examined the papers and vouchers submitted in respect of any item referred to the said committee, and that he is convinced that it is necessary in the public interest that all witnesses examined in reference to the said item should be examined upon oath, it shall be an instruction to the said committee to cause such witnesses to be so examined."

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Mr. Speaker, I accept entirely the suggestion for a modus vivendi which the hon. member for South Oxford made, and, when he embodies it in a resolution, I hope to have the privilege of voting for that resolution. But the resolution moved by the hon. gentleman does not express what the hon. gentleman's speech expressed as the proposition which he would submit to the House, which he said would not go to the length he would desire, but would go to a reasonable length in order to meet the views and wishes of gentlemen on both sides of the House. Now, I adhere to every word he read from my observation made a few evenings ago; but the hon. gentleman will do me the justice to remember, and to admit, that I stated to the House my views of what was our power and what was our practice, except as regards the two precedents of 1891 and 1892, and also what was the English practice, namely, that this power should be called for and should be exercised by the committee in individual cases. The proposition which I laid down to the House was that whenever it were made to appear, in such classes of cases as I described in the extract which the hon. member did me the honour to quote, that it was desirable that witnesses should be examined under oath, I thought that the committee would at once ask power from this House, and that this House would grant that power, would grant that power even though the committee had not asked for it, if it were made to appear that such a case existed. But what the hon. gentleman proposes here is not merely to embody that principle in a resolution for the removal of doubt, for the removal of vagueness, for the removal of differences of opinion which he thought might exist between some hon. members on this side of the House, but he proposes that it shall be an instruction to that committee forthwith to examine those witnesses under oath. What I do assent to, and what the hon. gentleman, if I understand him correctly, proposed in the observations with which he prefaced his resolution, is this: that in any such case as I have stated if a member of the committee should state upon his honour, or upon his responsibility as a member of the committee, or as a member of the House, or otherwise, that he had carefully examined an account and that he had reason to believe that the public interest required that there should be an examination under oath, that should be acquiesced in as being a case for examination under oath. Now, I agree that although my statement of the other evening does not go that length—at least I think it does not—I would be willing, for the purpose of arriving at a clear understanding in regard to the question, to agree that that ought to be sufficient for the committee to act upon and come to this House for the power to examine witnesses under oath. But again I have to make this objection, which I made to the resolution which was moved the other day, that this in an instruction to the committee which makes it obligatory upon the committee in all such cases to examine under oath. It may well be that it is sufficient, and I agree that it should be sufficient, to induce the committee to come here and ask the power, nay, more, that it should be sufficient for us to confer power on the committee, if the case seemed to the House a proper one; but I do object to a sweeping regulation as regards all subjects, and as regards the committee being bound in advance by an instruction of this House to examine witnesses under oath, without the House knowing beforehand what the subject of the investigation is to be.

Mr. LAURIER. Then there is but one conclusion to be drawn from the conduct of the Government with regard to inquiries before the Public Accounts Committee, and that conclusion is this: that while they profess to be favourable to the inquiry, they are determined to do everything possible to put obstacles in the way of it. There is no other conclusion to be arrived at. My hon. friend proposed the other day to make it a rule that whenever it appeared desirable that an inquiry should take place under oath then the inquiry should take place under oath before the Public Accounts Committee, and the committee was to determine when it is desirable that such inquiry should take place. My hon. friend from South Oxford proposes a rule for the guidance of the committee and the guidance of the House, and that rule is this: that whenever a member declares from his place in the committee that he has examined the vouchers of the expenditure under investigation before the committee, and that he believes an inquiry should take place under oath, such inquiry should take place under oath, and to this proposition the First Minister assents; he assents to the principle, but denies the principle in practice. Now, what will be the effect of the rule proposed by the hon. gentleman? The hon. gentleman proposes that upon every application the committee shall come back to the House for information, for guidance and direction. The practical effect will be what took place to-day before the Committee on Public Accounts, as we have it in the third report of the committee, where a long wrangle took place after the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) had affirmed that he had looked into the Behring Sea accounts, and that there was reason to investigate that account. The motion was denied, and a report was made to the House, and we have to wait until to-morrow in order to have the evidence. And so it will go on from day to day, and investigation cannot take place. We are in the sixth week of the session, and it has not yet been possible to examine a single witness before the committee. So I say that there is only one conclusion to be derived from the attitude of the Government. They profess to be in favour of this inquiry, but they put forward obstacle after obstacle in order to prevent these witnesses being examined under oath. Therefore I have to protest against the interpretation given by the hon. gentleman. If his interpretation prevails in this House, as I am afraid it will prevail, then let it be well understood that while they profess to be in favour of the inquiry, they do everything possible to prevent it.

Mr. CASEY. In discussing this matter hitherto there has been far too much talk about precedent, about the precedents of this House and the precedents of the British House. As for that matter, the precedents of this House are entirely in favour of the course urged from our side of the Chamber. But I think too much has been said about precedent in connection with this matter. This is a question with which the House has full power to deal, according to its wishes, at the present moment, no matter what the precedents may or may not have been. I think it is time that we looked at the matter from a common-sense point of view. What is the object of the Public Accounts Committee? It is a committee of inquiry. By whom is the inquiry likely to be instituted? By the supporters of the Government? Certainly not, Mr. Speaker. By members of the Government? Certainly not. It is the only court of justice open to the Opposition, or supposed to be open to the Opposition, where they can enforce an inquiry into that which the Government or their friends wish to keep a secret and to conceal. It is a tribunal on which the Government has a majority, on which, as has been already pointed out, the very members of the Government themselves often constitute a majority when a vote is taken. Before any tribunal appointed to give justice to a minority appealing to it, the right of initiating an inquiry, the right to have an inquiry conducted under the sanction of an oath, should certainly rest with the minority rather than with the majority. For that reason I am inclined to think that the amendment of my hon. friend from South Oxford does not go far enough, and that the only safe principle to guide inquiries before the committee, is that the administration of the oath should be a matter of course in every investigation carried on before that committee. A great deal has been said about fishing inquiries, and so on. Let us compare this great anxiety to prevent fishing inquiries with the liberal use of the oath allowed in the courts of justice of the smallest description throughout the country in all sorts of proceedings, where a magistrate must examine on oath every witness heard before him, in deciding a matter, perhaps of a few dollars, in deciding a question whether a man was drunk and disorderly over night, in all such cases the oath must be administered according to law. A writ is not held to have been duly served without an affidavit to prove that it has been served. A deed or lease is of no use without an affidavit as to its execution. A man cannot even get his name on the voters' list under our much-beloved Franchise Act without subscribing to a solemn declaration, to which the penalties of perjury are attached, to the effect that he is qualified as a voter. If the oath is not only allowed, but enforced, and required in matters of such comparatively minor importance, what pretense of reason is there for saying that the oath should not be administered when it is a question of ascertaining whether the moneys of the country have been properly and honestly spent? The Public Accounts Committee is the great audit of the nation. The Auditor General is bound by technicalities. He is bound to pay money if cheques are in proper form, and drawn against the proper appropriation. It is the Public Accounts Committee alone that can decide whether a cheque has been drawn for an honest purpose, whether the money has been properly used, whether the will of Parliament has been carried out in the expenditure of the money voted. It is monstrous to pretend that there is any reason for not administering the oath in cases of an inquiry of such importance. It is absurd to pretend that there is any reason against administering the oath in these cases, and yet administering it in the smallest petty-fogging lawsuit that can come before a rural justice of the peace. The only reason that can exist is the one alleged by my hon. friend and leader who has just spoken—that there is something to conceal, or there would not be such anxiety to prevent inquiry. I remember, when a boy, seeing another boy searched on the charge of having stolen a jack-knife from one of his play-fellows. He submitted to the inquiry, which was not under oath, until a certain pocket was reached, when he said: "You must not look in there." They asked why. His reply was: "Cos de jack-knife's in there." There is a jack-knife somewhere that the Premier and his friends do not wish us to find. We must be getting pretty near the pocket in which it is concealed, or there would not be such an attempt to prevent a search. In what position does the Prime Minister stand in regard to this question? In the hon. gentleman's speech the other night, he admitted everything claimed on this side of the House; to-day, he says he adheres to what he said then. He agreed with the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) as to the proper steps that should be taken before the oath was administered. He did not agree that the committee should be empowered to carry on the inquiry when these reasons are given in the committee, but he did agree that when such reasons were given either in the committee or on the floor of the House, the committee should be authorized to make the inquiry under oath. He agreed with the hon. member for South Oxford as to the reasons for administering the oath; he differed from him only in the attempt to postpone inquiries as much as possible by referring the subject-matter to this House and back again. His position is utterly illogical. It is the same as that in which the hon. gentleman found himself during the investigations of 1891-92. At the beginning of those investigations he professed himself anxious to promote the fullest inquiries into anything that might appear to be improper on the part of any persons concerned, no matter how high their position might be. After the awful revelations in the committee in 1891 the hon. gentleman became more cautious, more prudent, as was said the other night by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. Finding that that sort of inquiries led to awful revelations, the hon. gentleman came to a dead stand on the question of charges made against the Minister of Railways and Canals, in connection with some contract work, and he refused point blank an inquiry into that affair. The hon. gentleman is now similarly departing from the logical consequence of what he not only formerly, but latterly, admitted. The hon. gentleman admits the propriety of investigating on oath under certain circumstances; but he wishes to handicap the inquiry with all possible measures of delay and hindrance. Is it to be concluded, as the hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon) stated a few nights ago, that if it is only when the Government are in a state of panic they are willing to grant free and full investigation? If it is, it is to be hoped they will soon be in a panic again, in order that the interests of the country may be served. But when the First Minister comes before this House with such a judicial manner, and such an appearance of intention to arrive at a modus vivendi, as it has been called, we do not expect such propositions. We are led, moreover, to come to the conclusion that this is only a cloak for obtaining the end in view, to effect delay and present every possible obstruction to the inquiry.

Mr. LISTER. I take the liberty of saying that the position taken by the First Minister to-day is exceedingly gratifying, I am sure, to the Opposition, because it bears out the contention they made at the committee to-day, that all that it was necessary on the part of an hon. member to do was to state that he had examined the books and vouchers, and was of opinion, in the public interest, that the investigations should take place under oath. That was the position taken by hon. gentlemen on this side of the House in the committee to-day, but an opposite position was taken by the hon. Finance Minister and his colleagues and supporters in this House.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The hon. gentleman cannot refer to the proceedings of the committee.

Mr. LISTER. It is contended on the other side of the House that before witnesses can be examined on oath, a member of the committee must first rise and state that a certain account is erroneous in some particular, either there has been an overcharge or there has been a misapplication by a public servant. The proposition before the House is, as is contended in the resolution of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), that all that is necessary is for an hon. member to state that these accounts have been examined, and in his opinion, an investigation on oath is necessary. If that rule is to be adopted by this House, and the First Minister has agreed that it shall be the rule in future, I ask him what possible purpose can be served by compelling the committee to come back to this House and ask it to give the committee power to administer the oath? If a rule is to be adopted, it should be an inflexible one, and to apply to all cases coming before the Public Accounts Committee—a statement by an hon. member that, in his judgment, witnesses should be examined under oath, and that he has examined the accounts and vouchers. If, on a statement of that kind an hon. member has a right to ask that witnesses be examined under oath, because that would be the conclusion arrived at, what purpose can be served by the committee coming back to this House and asking authority to swear the witnesses, if the House agrees upon a right of conceding that all witnesses, on a statement of that kind being made, should be examined on oath? The natural result of that would be that these investigations will be delayed. This matter will come up before the Public Accounts Committee, it is pitched from that into the House of Commons; a motion is made here that witnesses shall be examined under oath before the committee, it comes back again to the committee, the motion is made there to examine witnesses under oath, and the result of this meaningless procedure is that the investigation will be delayed, in all probability, for two weeks. The position I take is this: If the leader of the Government and the leader of the Opposition agree that that shall be the rule, then, that being the rule, in a case coming within the rule, the committee ought not be obliged to come back to the House for authority to administer the oath.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Discussion seems to be unnecessary at any length, because, practically, the leaders on both sides agree, but the trouble is that the rank and file of the leader of the Government will not support him. We stand in this position. We have the leader of the Government and the leader of the Opposition, and all the Opposition on one side, together with the member for Cornwall (Mr. Bergin), but outside the leader of the Government and the member for Cornwall we have a solid phalanx on that side of the House against us. I am quite sure that a little reflection will show the First Minister the necessity of agreeing to this resolution. We have on the Table of the House a recital of the facts which took place before the Public Accounts Committee, and a recital of the facts in exact conformity to those which the hon. leader of the Government declared would be essential and ample to justify the committee—to “compel” the committee, to use his own language—to take examination on oath; but, notwithstanding that the plan he suggested has been carried out exactly, we find almost every one of his supporters opposed to oaths being administered. What are the facts, as shown by this report:

Mr. McMullen states that having examined the expenditure in re the Behring Sea Arbitration as set out in the Auditor General's Report on Appropriation Accounts, he is satisfied that it is desirable in the public interest to examine Mr. Joseph Pope and other witnesses on oath with respect thereto, and he moves accordingly that Joseph Pope and other witnesses be subpoenaed to be examined before this committee re Behring Sea Arbitration, and that authority be asked from the House to examine them under oath.

That motion was negatived.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I understand that resolution failed to carry because the fact was that the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) did not make the assertion which is stated there, and the hon. member (Mr. Davies) has read, not what the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) said, but what the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davies) moved in the committee.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Oh, no. The hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) moved a resolution, and afterwards I made the suggestion that the statement which he made in moving the resolution should be to the extent that they are here embodied in the resolution. My hon. friend from North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) said: “I accept Mr. Davies' suggestion.” It was then written out, and he formally moved it with that preamble in it. That complies with every condition that the right hon. the First Minister laid down the other day as desirable or essential before you can move a resolution to have a witness examined under oath. What more could the Opposition do? We carried out every suggestion which the leader of the Government made, and some of his friends had the sense to see that the majority were going against the First Minister, and stated that they would not follow the majority. I must not refer to what took place in the committee, it is true, but it came out inadvertently.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It is all over now.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Yes, it is all over now. I point-out to the right hon. gentleman the unfair and unjust position in which the Opposition are placed. They first make a motion in which he does not agree. He lays down the lines on which the motion should be drawn, and they adopt those lines, and use his own very language. Notwithstanding that, almost every one of his colleagues say that they will not accept it, and they negatived this resolution. One would almost imagine that there is something wrong about these Behring Sea accounts. We have two or three times tried to get the witnesses examined with respect to them, and, notwithstanding that we adopt the suggestion of the First Minister as to how we should proceed, the right hon. gentleman's colleagues vote down the resolution. My hon. friend (Sir Richard Cartwright) now says: We will submit the matter to the First Minister in a general resolution, and say that whenever the conditions he alleges ought to be complied with are complied with, then the committee should take the course of allowing the witnesses to be examined under oath. There is not a bit of distinction between the plan of my hon. friend (Sir Richard Cartwright) and the plan of the leader of the Government, except that my hon. friend's plan, if adopted, would prevent us coming back from the committee to this House, day after day, and would, if carried, form a general instruction to the committee, almost embodying a portion of the First Minister's speech. What more could be required? If the hon. the First Minister votes this down, I am very much afraid that an hon. gentleman sitting not very far from his elbow, will, on the very next occasion, exercise his astute mind in finding some means to get around the resolution again, and we will be brought a fourth time to the House to know if it is possible, on any condition under heaven to examine a witness under oath.

Mr. FOSTER. You got one to-day.

Mr. MONTAGUE. You got one in spite of yourself.

Mr. LISTER. I gave reason for it.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman (Mr. Lister) gave reasons. He complied with an additional condition which the Minister of Finance imported into the matter in order to get his resolutions through. But we do not wish to be obliged, in every case, not only to carry out what the First Minister said should be the law and the policy on the subject, but also to add something which the Minister of Finance, or one of his friends, say should be added to it. It may be that in every case a member of the committee cannot make the declaration which my hon. friend (Mr. Lister) did; that from an experience of thirty years at the bar he was able to say that the taxation seems to be very loose with respect to this account; and, after he had made his statement, the witnesses were allowed to be examined under oath. The Behring Sea accounts have not been taxed at all, and no such statement can be made with reference to them. The hon. gentleman who moved in the matter found by the Public Accounts, that large sums of money were paid for living allowances at the rate of $10 per day to a large number of gentlemen, running from $1,700 or $1,800 each for clerks in the public service. He thought, rightly or wrongly, that that was enormously large.

Mr. COATSWORTH. He did not say so in committee.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) He did not give in detail every reason he had for desiring this.

Mr. COATSWORTH. He did not give any reason at all.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) He did give his expression of opinion in the words of the resolution which I have read.

Mr. COATSWORTH. That gives no reason.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. member is in direct variance with his leader.

Mr. COATSWORTH. Not at all.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman had better listen to what his leader said, and take his instructions from him. The leader of the Government has laid this down, and he has stated to-day that he agrees in substance with every word of the resolution proposed by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), but he thinks it is not desirable to give general instructions to the committee.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. If the hon. gentleman will allow me, I said that the proposition made in his speech by the hon. member for South Oxford went somewhat further than my observations and my offer of the other day, but that I would be willing to accept it as a modus vivendi, as it was very desirable to arrive at a modus vivendi on the subject; but I said that the resolution went further.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) It went further in that it instructed the committee in every case to examine witnesses under oath, while the hon. gentleman thought that the committee should ask for instruction from the House in every case. But we find members, like the hon. member for East Toronto (Mr. Coatsworth), rising up and repudiating what the First Minister said. If the hon. First Minister will only come up to the Public Accounts Committee for one day, I think a modus vivendi will be arrived at which will facilitate the transaction of public business. I think it is time that this sort of thing should be put a stop to. Surely the hon. leader of the Government has sufficient authority over his followers to induce them in a matter involving public policy to accept his declaration and let the business of the country be carried on without from day to day throwing difficulties in the way and preventing us making examinations that we have a right to make.

Mr. WELDON. I would like to ask the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) whether he will venture to say that the motion made by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), which he has seconded, is, in his judgment, within our powers under the statute—whether he thinks that a resolution of this House can give us the power to do what he proposes we should undertake to do in this respect.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I think the hon. gentleman has my answer in the remarks I made the other day on the motion made by the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock), that in all cases where the Public Accounts Committee requested that witnesses should be examined on oath, instructions should be given to so examine them, and it seems to me that the statute says that whenever the committee deems it desirable—

Mr. WELDON. The House.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Whenever the House thinks it desirable it shall grant the necessary authority.

Mr. WELDON. The motion of the hon. member for South Oxford is that this House shall now give an anticipatory mandate to the Public Accounts Committee that whenever in the future a certain statement is made by a single member of that committee with reference to an unnamed item—the correctness of the statement being assumed—the examination in reference to that item shall be made under oath. I ask the hon. member again frankly—he has read the statute, and is perfectly familiar with its terms—whether we have power under that statute to give any such anticipatory mandate as that?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Certainly.

Mr. WELDON. I will again read the motion of the hon. member for South Oxford :

That all the words after "That" be left out, and it be resolved : That whenever any member of the Committee on Public Accounts shall declare in his place in the said committee that he has examined the papers and vouchers submitted in respect of any item referred to the said committee, and that he is convinced that it is necessary in the public interest that all witnesses examined in reference to the said item, should be examined upon oath, it—

That is, that statement by that member in that regard——it shall be an instruction to the said committee to cause such witnesses to be so examined.

We are asked to substitute for the particular and express words of the statute a very different thing, and I venture to stake what little reputation I have on the assertion that this motion is an attempt, by means of a resolution of this House, to alter an Act of the Parliament of Canada. I may remind the House that under the common law in the mother country the House of Commons had no such power. It obtained that power by the express terms of an Act, and therefore we must read that Act strictly. This is an amendment to the common law. Let me read again the section of the Act, on which the whole question turns :

Whenever any witness or witnesses is or are to be examined by any committee of the Senate or House of Commons, and the Senate and House of Commons shall have resolved that it is desirable that such witness or witnesses shall be examined on oath, such witness or witnesses shall be examined on oath or affirmation where affirmation is allowed by law.

The statute clearly contemplates that the committee shall come here in each individual case and ask leave. Nothing is plainer than that.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Do you consider that a penal statute to be construed with the utmost rigour in every case ?

Mr. WELDON. No ; but this is an alteration of the common law.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman says this is an alteration of the common law, and therefore the statute must be construed strictly. I do not think that is the rule. I think we are to look at the object of the statute, and this is not a penal statute, but a remedial statute, and a remedial statute is not to be construed strictly, but liberally. It is to be construed in contemplation of the end in view, which is to have witnesses examined on oath in such a way as to facilitate the public business. The hon. gentleman has referred to the provision of the statute, and reads it as though it were necessary to indicate the particular witness and the specific object about which the witness is to be examined. I do not so read the statute. I do not think there is anything in it that will warrant us in so reading it. The beginning of the section is : "Whenever any witness or witnesses is or are to be examined." Suppose we leave out the word "witness" and read it : "Whenever any witnesses are to be examined." When are they to be examined ? That is for this House to determine ; the power is placed here. And if the House determines that the witnesses shall be examined on the representation of any one member affirming that he believes the public interest would be thereby promoted, it is competent for this House to proceed on that line. That is what we propose, and I ask the attention of the First Minister to this fact. We have moved for a large number of papers. The whole committee has not undertaken to examine those papers. It would be quite impossible for that to be done ; we would not get through the business of the session in twelve months if it were attempted. Certain members have moved for different papers, and no doubt they will devote their attention to examining the contents of those accounts and vouchers. That having been done, who is most competent to say whether it is desirable that witnesses should be examined on oath in reference to them or not ? The whole committee who have never looked at those accounts, who do not know what their contents are or what the difficulties are in the way of ascertaining the facts, or the member who has examined the accounts and stated his views to the committee ? The object and intention is that the members of the committee shall trust to the individual judgment of each other so far as to accept the conclusion to which the individual member has come, and to act upon his suggestion. The hon. Minister of Justice in the discussion of this subject has expressed that as his view. To-day, he says, that instead of laying down a general proposition, we should make an application in each individual case. There is no difference of opinion between the Minister of Justice and hon. gentlemen on this side, so far as the Minister of Justice has expressed any opinion on that fact, that if an individual member of the committee expresses the opinion, after examining that account, that the public interests would be promoted by examining the witnesses on oath, then such an examination should take place. If that is the proper view, what is the object of taking a vote at all in the committee on the subject ? The committee ought to proceed as a matter of course. And if they are to proceed as a matter of course, it would be a matter of great convenience that the general proposition proposed by my hon. friend from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), should be adopted, instead of requiring that a separate application should, in every case, be made to the House to instruct the committee to take the evidence under oath. Such a course can only delay public business, interfere with the investigations in the committee, and greatly protract this session. The line of policy marked out by the resolution of my hon. friend from South Oxford is strictly that indicated by the Minister of Justice as the one that ought to be adopted by this House, and its adoption would greatly facilitate public convenience and the despatch of business.

Mr. MULOCK. The hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon) has stated that, in his opinion, the spirit of the Act does not enable the House to grant an anticipatory order to examine under oath. If that be the spirit of the Act, it has only been discovered since this session, and has not been the previous interpretation of the Act in other sessions. In every application previously made to Parliament to examine witnesses, Parliament has proceeded upon the very opposite lines. In no case has Parliament first of all inquired into the merits. In no case has Parliament apparently had the slightest knowledge of the facts or merits of the case. But on the strength of statements, probably made in the course of debate or argument—and I think in most cases without argument at all—the Senate, and the House in harmony with the Senate has invariably passed resolutions declaring that it was advisable in such and such matters to examine the witnesses on oath. In no one instance until now has the point been taken that the House should first decide on the merits of the application. The Act would be a dead letter if the House were, in the first instance, to pronounce upon the merits.

Mr. WELDON. We do not argue that.

Mr. MULOCK. My hon. friend says the House has not power to anticipate. I think he will admit that this House has the power to instruct the Public Accounts Committee to examine on oath every witness that appears before it. A certain matter is referred to the committee. That matter is the public accounts for the year. Every item in connection with these accounts is as special a subject of reference to the committee as if it had been specially designated in the reference—as if every item into which the committee is appointed to inquire were specially named and designated. It must not be imagined, because the public accounts for the year are referred in bulk to the committee, that each item is any the less a subject of special reference. Take the references to the Privileges and Elections Committee. That committee has not a number of cases before it at once, and it generally happens that only one particular subject is referred to it at a time, so that the order of the House reads that, with regard to that particular matter, it is desirable that all the witnesses should be examined under oath. What does the House know about the merits in such a reference? Another matter of reference, a short time ago, by this House to a committee, was the subject of frauds on farmers, in which the motion to refer that subject to a committee was made by the former hon. member for Hamilton, and the House resolved that all the witnesses should be examined under oath. In authorizing one of these committees to examine under oath, the House could prescribe some limit if it chose. If any member is afraid that such power would be abused, let him propose some limitation to it. For instance, with regard to the Public Accounts Committee, to which there are hundreds of different subjects referred, the House might decide that in the case of some of the subjects, an examination should be had under oath, but that with regard to others such an examination need not be held. It must be borne in mind that the subject of reference to the Public Accounts Committee are separate and divisible. It is true they embrace all the expenditure of the year, but it is equally true that they are wholly independent of each other in one respect. My hon. friend will see that if my argument is not sound, you have not power now to authorize the examination of witnesses in any one transaction alone. You must either treat the reference to the Public Accounts Committee as separate and divisible, under different heads, or else you cannot make the order at all. We have to-day resolved that all witnesses in respect of one item of expenditure, namely, the Curran Bridge, shall be examined under oath, yet that is not the whole thing referred to the committee for the year. We have references about hundreds of other things, so that we really do exercise discrimination. The fact is that the First Minister speaks fair words, but unfortunately, when he is away, there are so many other law-makers in the Public Accounts Committee, that his law does not go beyond this House. We have one view presented by the Minister of Finance, another by the Minister of Marine, another by the Minister of Public Works, and another by the Secretary of State, who, I must say, is always very fair, but to-day seems trying to agree with them all. And of course we have the view of the Minister of Railways and Canals. These gentlemen will not agree to be governed by the First Minister. In fact it looks as if we would have to dissolve the committee and remove from it the members who seem to have formed themselves into a sort of insurrectionary band. I wonder if the spirit of old number eight has been transported by the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Ouimet) into the Public Accounts Committee. If so, the argument of my hon. friend from South Oxford is very well advised, and shows what we ought to do in the premises—that is, reconstruct the committee and put into it gentlemen who will recognize discipline and good advice. At present the difference between the proposition of the First Minister and the proposition of the hon. member for South Oxford is simply this: If we had a committee who would obey the First Minister, there would perhaps be no difference ; but inasmuch as the committee will not recognize his authority, the view of the First Minister is negatived, not because of his attitude, but because of the contumacy of his supposed followers. So that we have the issue now between us—a practical scheme to get over the difficulty and an impracticable one. In other words, an effective scheme in theory, but ineffective in practice, namely, the one suggested by the First Minister, and a practical scheme. In my view the law warrants the resolution proposed by my hon. friend from South Oxford, and the public interest demands it. It is idle to go on wasting time before the Public Accounts Committee, as we must inevitably do, if a special application for this power has to be made on every occasion, and if, when that application is made, nine members of the Government give each a different view of the law.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell).

Mr. McNEILL. I just wish to say a word in explanation of the vote I shall give in connection with this resolution. If there had been any evidence at all adduced, or any attempt at all made to show that there was a likelihood of evidence being adduced, when application was made to this House for leave to examine witnesses on oath, of that leave being refused by the House, I should have been much inclined to support the proposition of hon. gentlemen opposite, provided it was in the power of this House to pursue the course they propose. But, as there has been no allegation whatever, during the whole course either of this debate or the debate that took place on the former resolution, to the effect that there has been any difficulty in obtaining leave from this House to examine witnesses upon oath when leave was asked of the House, I cannot see why we should run the risk of straining the constitution in order to do what does not appear to be at all necessary. All that hon. gentlemen have been able to say is that some delay may be caused by their being obliged to come to this House to ask for power to examine witnesses under oath. Now, it seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that all the powers they require to examine any witness before this committee they might have obtained long ago if they had only come here and asked for them. If they had asked for leave to examine Mr. Joseph Pope upon oath as to his accounts they would have had that leave, and, so far from there being any evidence that this House has ever withheld the power they asked, the evidence is all the other way—it goes to show that the House seems to have been inclined rather to exceed its powers in that respect, if we may judge from its actions in 1891 and 1892. Under these circumstances, Mr. Speaker, I shall certainly vote against this resolution, and I am very much inclined to think that the resolution is rather for the country than for this House. I am very much inclined to think that this resolution is nothing more than a little kite-flying ; in fact, that it is for the purpose of making a little electioneering capital. If hon. gentlemen opposite really wanted to arrive at what they say they want to arrive at—that is to say, to examine on oath in reference to matters before the committee—they could obtain all the powers at any time by simply coming to this House and asking for those powers.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) They have asked.

Mr. McNEILL. Speaking on this subject before, my hon. friend from Prince Edward Island (Mr. Davies) who is interrupting me now, said that he was very anxious on behalf of the committee. He thought there was something derogatory to the committee in requiring them to come here and ask for these powers. He said he did not come here as a supplicant, and he did not wish to appear as a supplicant and he demanded certain powers for the committee. But the resolution he supported at that time was a resolution to compel the committee, whether they liked it or not, to examine every witness upon oath. That was a strange way to stand up for the rights of the committee—to impose upon them an obligation never heard of before in the Legislature of any civilized country in the world. If hon. gentlemen wish to investigate the public accounts, I say again, if they wish to arrive at the truth with regard to the items that come before them, they have the amplest means of doing so. There is no obstacle whatever thrown in their way. This House is ready, as the Prime Minister has said, and as all the speeches of other members on the subject have shown, to give any proper power with respect to the examination of witnesses if hon. gentlemen will come before the House and say that they have good reason to believe, on the examination of certain items, that it would be in the public interest to have witnesses examined under oath. So far as I can see, having listened to this discussion on both occasions as carefully as I could, there is nothing in this motion except an attempt to make political capital.

Mr. MULLOCK. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to ask him a question before he sits down ? I know he is a great admirer of British precedent ; I would like to ask his opinion as to the merits of the Imperial Act of 1871.

Mr. McNEILL. So far as the Imperial Act of 1871 is concerned, it is something very different indeed from what is proposed here. Hon. gentlemen opposite, in this resolution, propose that any member of the committee shall have the power to dictate to the committee whether a witness shall be examined under oath or not. The Imperial Act of 1871 gives power to the committee as a whole to examine under oath such witnesses as it sees fit. These two things are entirely different, and the position of the hon. gentleman who has asked me the question reminds me of the course that was pursued by another gentleman on his side, my hon. friend from Prince Edward Island (Mr. Davies), when this resolution was before the House in another form. The hon. gentleman from Prince Edward Island then stated that the resolution authorized a practice identical with the British practice. My hon. friend from Prince Edward Island knows perfectly well that the British practice gives power to the committee to examine witnesses under oath, while the proposition which the hon. gentleman supported with such energy and with such vigorous declamation was a proposition that the committee should have no power in the matter.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) No, no.

Mr. McNEILL. Yes; it was to the effect that the committee must examine every witness under oath. I can only say, Mr. Speaker, that, if such a resolution were carried, the committee would be without power, and would be obliged to examine every witness under oath. And yet my hon. friend told us that that was the English practice.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I would like to ask my hon. friend, who seems desirous of arriving at a just conclusion, what he has to say about the action of the committee in refusing Mr. McMullen's application to examine Mr. Pope under oath.

Mr. McNEILL. I was not present, and I am not going to take my hon. friend's ex-parte statement of what occurred.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) But there is the report.

An hon. MEMBER. You would not believe him under oath.

Mr. McNEILL. Yes; I would take my hon. friend's statement on oath. But, I am sorry to say, I would not be willing to accept his statements with regard to political matters in this House. He is inclined to be a little imaginative at times.

Mr. EDGAR. I rise to a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I would like to ask if, the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies, P.E.I.) having made a statement of fact, the hon. gentleman is not bound to accept it at once?

Mr. McNEILL. The question is whether I am bound to accept the hon. gentleman's ex-parte statement of what passed in the committee.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I read from the report on the Table.

Mr. McNEILL. My hon. friend did not read, Mr. Speaker, when he addressed me. However, I will await your ruling, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. McNEILL.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I think my hon. friend has not finished his remarks, but sat down in consequence of being under the impression that there was a point of order to be settled.

Mr. McNEILL. I have nothing further to say, except what I was about to say when I was interrupted—and I am obliged to my right hon. friend the Prime Minister for giving me the opportunity to repeat it—that there is no material grievance, so far as hon. gentlemen opposite are concerned, that I have been able to discover. They may examine witnesses under oath if they wish to do so; all they have to do is to come here and state their wish to examine witnesses under oath and give a reason for it.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. If the House would indulge me for a moment, I would like to make a proposition on this subject which may shorten discussion; for I take it for granted that, above all, the desire of the House is to deal in a business way with a matter purely of business. Misunderstandings have arisen as to what we contend for in the committee and contend for in this House, and the result of doctrines which are laid down in the House or in the committee. Now, it seems to me that there is a difficulty in arriving at what I hoped was a practical proposition on the part of the member for South Oxford as to a modus vivendi on that subject this afternoon, and a difficulty we find whenever we approach the subject, and that is that what they contend for in support of their resolution is somewhat different, in our view, from that which is contained in the resolution itself. While I was able to agree, as I thought, with what the hon. gentleman desired to propose, I was startled to find, when his resolution was read at the Table, that it went a good deal farther. Another difficulty in settling the matter by resolution, even if we could agree upon its terms, is the difficulty of deciding what cases come within it after all, and we shall have, I fear, disputes renewed from day to day in the committee as to the practical application of a rule which is laid down at this Table. I think a further difficulty is that presented by the hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon) to-day, as to the construction of our statute, which is not in the line of the English statute upon the subject, and, therefore, leads us, to some extent, into a different line of practice from that which prevails in the British House of Commons. I submit now, and that is my only excuse for speaking a second time on this question, that this has become a vexed question—but is after all a mere matter of business capable of business adjustment—we should agree not to treat it as a matter of politics by a resolution of this kind, or indeed of any kind, in going into Committee of Supply or Committee of Ways and Means, but we should agree to pass an Act which shall remove this subject from the political arena altogether. If that should be assented to by the hon. gentlemen opposite who have studied the question, I would agree on the part of the Government to facilitate the passage of such an Act at this session, in fact, that it shall be enacted in time for practical application to the operations of this committee before many days shall pass. I have no objection to state generally the terms which I think the Act ought to contain. I think that while it ought to contain the provisions of our present statute which enable the House to instruct the committee to examine witnesses under oath, at the same time it should go as far as the British Act in conferring powers on the committees themselves, all committees of the House of Commons and of the Senate, to examine witnesses under oath whenever they consider a case made out for it; and we can have then but little difficulty in agreeing as to what should be a sufficient case. If that be acceptable to hon. gentlemen opposite, I think it would be the best way to solve the question. I am told the hon. member for North York has introduced a Bill to that effect. The Bill is not yet distributed, and, therefore, I have not been able to see it; but I would agree to expedite the passage of that Bill, or to substitute a Government Bill immediately, and thus remove the question from the arena of dispute.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. So far as I am concerned, I think the proposition is a reasonable one, and if my hon. friends beside me agree, I will consent to withdraw the motion I have made.

Mr. LAURIER. The great contention between the two sides has always been this: On this side we have contended that the committee should be at once clothed with power to examine witnesses under oath; the other side have contended that the committee should have the general power, but they should not have power to examine under oath on every occasion where they saw fit. Now, the proposition of the First Minister is to give such power at once to the committee, and I think we cannot ask for more than that.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Might I be allowed to ask that the hon. gentleman should make it a part of the general settlement, so that business might be facilitated, that the third report of the Public Accounts Committee should be referred back to that committee, and that they should go on with the examination of these witnesses. It seems a pity that the whole subject should be brought up to-morrow and debated again on the report of the committee. If we desire to proceed with the public business, surely it is desirable, after what has fallen from the Minister, that he should agree that the action of the majority of that committee should be reversed, and that we should be allowed to examine these witnesses. I do not think there ought to be any more difficulty about it; and as the leader of the Opposition has accepted the suggestion of the leader of the Government, and a modus vivendi has been found, let us make the modus vivendi cover the case now before the committee; otherwise we shall have the whole of this matter threshed out again to-morrow on this report coming up again. I suggest to the hon. gentleman whether it would not be well, as there is really now, after all said and done, but the minutest point of difference between the parties, that the Government should agree to allow these witnesses to be examined to-morrow.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The hon. gentleman will give me a little time to consider the proposition.

Mr. MULLOCK. With reference to the suggestion of the First Minister that the Government should take charge of the Bill I introduced, I should be pleased to have the Government to do so. I may say that it is on the line of the English Act, with the exception that the English Act of 1871 does not give power to the House of Lords to examine witnesses under oath, for some reason I am not acquainted with. But the Bill I have introduced, which is now in the printer's hands, does propose to give this power to committees both of the Senate and of the House of Commons. The Bill has advanced the first stage now, and if the Government will put it on Government Orders, we can move it to-morrow and get the Bill through this week, at all events through this House.

Amendment (Sir Richard Cartwright) withdrawn.

House again resolved itself into Committee of Ways and Means.

(In the Committee.)

Albumenized and other papers chemically prepared for photographers' use, 35 per cent ad valorem.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Albumenized paper have been raised from 25 per cent to 35 per cent. Why should that be done?

Mr. FOSTER. All photographic papers were 35 per cent with the exception of albumenized paper, which was 25 per cent. What we wish to do is to get them all on one list, because they are all of a cognate kind, and there is no reason why one should not bear the same duty as another.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. This is a very high duty. While I would not go the length of saying that it is indispensable to human comfort, nevertheless photography is being largely used for many purposes of general utility, and this will prove a very high tax to impose, and probably a smaller amount of duty would bring in a larger revenue.

Mr. FOSTER. This is the duty which all the varieties of chemical papers bear.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. You are now compounding the duties. I do not know what proportion the albumenized papers bear to the other papers manufactured for photographic use. The increase, which is equivalent to 40 per cent, being from 25 to 35, is hardly warranted, and it is desirable to encourage that art a little, rather than penalize it, as you are now doing.

Mr. FOSTER. We are not doing that.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. If about one-half of the papers used by photographers are albumenized and the other half what are called chemically prepared, and you raise one class 10 per cent, that is equivalent to a rise all round of about 5 per cent.

Mr. FLINT. How many establishments are there in Canada which manufacture these papers for photography, and also what proportion of these papers is imported?

Mr. FOSTER. This paper is manufactured in several places, including Montreal and Toronto.

Mr. FLINT. I am personally aware that the duties, even under the old tariff, have been complained of with considerable warmth by photographers generally, as being to a certain degree a restriction upon their opportunity to make fair profits. I do not know whether the Government has received representations from the consumers or not, but photography is entering so largely into uses and purposes which ten or fifteen years ago were never dreamed of, that it should be as little restricted as possible. I think the Finance Minister might consider the desirability of reducing this item in the interests of the consuming class. Have representations been made by practical photographers as to the effect of this tariff on their business?

Mr. FOSTER. The facts of the case are simply these. When we came to revise the items of photographic papers we found they all came in at 35 per cent, with the exception of albumenized paper, which was 25 per cent. This class is, however, a small item among all the papers used. We considered there was no reason why they should not be made uniform at 35 per cent, and we, therefore, prepared this uniform list. I may add, that the tariff has been before the country four weeks, and I have not received any communications from the photographic establishments protesting against the duty.

Mr. AMYOT. If there is an article that should be taxed it is one of this class, as it is a luxury. When we come to the item of photographs, we will find the duty is much less. It must be remembered that the albumenized paper is the raw material of the photographer. If you tax it highly, you should also tax equally high this material used in other countries and brought in here as the finished article. I do not object to albumenized paper being taxed 35 per cent, but the Government should tax equally the paper when it comes in as the perfected work of photographers living in other countries. When we reach that item of photographs I shall ask that the duty be raised so as to protect our own photographers. There are being received in Canada from the United States large numbers of photographs, which are given away as premiums and gifts in connection with publications. These works could be produced in Canada by our own photographers, if sufficient protection were afforded them.

Mr. FOSTER.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think the hon. gentleman is in error in supposing that this article is one of luxury exclusively. On the contrary, photographs are being more largely introduced and are being more exclusively used for scientific and mechanical purposes, and there is good reason for not imposing excessive duties on the raw material used for scientific purposes. The Minister has not stated what was the gross amount of other papers used, but he simply stated that there was more albumenized used. In preparing the tariff the hon. gentleman should have ascertained the percentage as between albumenized and chemical papers.

Mr. FOSTER. That we could not do, because all except albumenized are grouped together under one head and charged 25 per cent. The Trade and Navigation Returns do not show a distinction.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That was precisely one of the reasons why the hon. gentleman took a year to consider these matters, and expressly desired to gather all information. I can tell the hon. gentleman the individual opinions of some photographers—I do not think they have a trades union as yet, although they will arrive at it in the process of time—and the general opinion expressed is that already very heavy duties are imposed on the photographer's raw material. Perhaps the hon. gentleman can state the number of photographers in the country?

Mr. FOSTER. There are a number of them; their name is legion.

Mr. CASEY. I have had a great deal to do with practical photographers, and I am aware that the tariff imposed under the old tariff was found to be burdensome, and now it is proposed to level up the duty to the highest mark of the old tariff instead of placing it at the lower notch. The Minister of Finance apparently does not know whether the quantity of albumenized paper used is greater than that called in this item other chemically prepared papers, and yet he has proceeded on the assumption that the albumenized paper is used in excess of the other. In photographic studios, with which I am familiar, albumenized paper is used in excess of all other kinds, and is the staple article. Fancy papers are being introduced, but they have not yet come into general use.

All that is necessary in order to utilize albumenized paper is to make it sensitive by the application of the silver solution. About $10,000 worth of albumenized paper was imported last year, on which the duty of 25 per cent was imposed. If the same quantity is imported the 10 per cent will be an additional burden of $1,000 on the photographers. Photography is much more largely employed than it used to be, and the illustrated daily paper has become almost as regular a publication as the illustrated monthly used to be. With cheap raw material and improved processes of manufacture such as are coming into use from day to day, we can have our daily papers cheap and well illustrated by photo-lithography, or other processes of printing from the photograph. When the Minister of Finance promised a general reduction of the tariff the correct principle would have been to level down and not to level up. There is no doubt that the largest quantity of paper used by photographers is of the ordinary albumenized paper, and I think the Minister should have levelled down the tariff on this to a 25 per cent limit.

Mr. AMYOT. Could the hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) give us some details about these photographic pictures taken for scientific purposes in Canada?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I simply state that there are a great many scientific processes for which photographs are coming into use.

Mr. AMYOT. Have you got the details?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I have not. I refer my hon. friend to the hon. member for Elgin (Mr. Casey), who may perhaps have them. It is well enough known that always and in all cases in connection with architecture and ship building, and a great many miscellaneous pursuits, photography is now being largely used. It is also useful—although I do not suppose that would matter very much to the hon. gentleman—if he were desirous of engaging in astronomical pursuits; it is very valuable astronomically.

Mr. AMYOT. Not in Canada.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. We hear that Canada is progressing, and I should like to see some proofs of it. Possibly a careful analysis of the sun spots might furnish the Minister of Finance with much better reasons than he has heretofore advanced for the diminished prices of products. The interests of photographers are not altogether so slight as may be supposed. According to the census, there were about 1,278, most of them heads of families, engaged in that occupation; so that, judging from the extreme consideration shown to seventy-five men engaged in the not so intellectual occupation of cleaning husks of rice, who were thought by the Finance Minister worthy of $150,000 a year from the people at large; I think that 1,278 photographers have a better right to be considered than seventy-five rice-cleaners.

Mr. AMYOT. I still contend that in this country photography is not employed in the preparation of one out of a thousand scientific pursuits. Photography in our country is a matter of luxury. I happen to know something about that as an amateur.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am bound to say that some of these kodaks might be discouraged.

Mr. CASEY. I would ask the Finance Minister if any one has asked for this change? I think he should be in a position to tell the House to what extent the industry of producing albumenized paper exists in Canada, how many people are employed in it, and how much good this extra 10 per cent will do them.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think I may certainly plead without the slightest suspicion of any self-interest in this matter, because most of the photographs to which my hon. friend has referred, so far as they affected me, have been most confounded bad likenesses.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Casey) will find that the paper from which albumenized paper is made has a duty of 25 per cent. It is an anomaly that the process of albumenizing from the paper shall have no higher duty than the raw material. Ten per cent is not a high protection in that regard. It was to give a slight protection to those who are preparing the albumenized paper in this country that the duty was put on, and I stated that it was prepared in Montreal and Toronto, and I think in other cities.

Mr. CASEY. I asked as to the extent of this industry.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not know how many men are employed in it. It is not an independent industry in itself, but is carried on in connection with other processes of manufacture.

Mr. CASEY. The hon. gentleman should be in possession of this information before he makes any change. He says this tax should be put on because the raw material is 25 per cent. It would be quite as easy for him to reduce the duty on the paper imported for making photographic albumenized paper, as to reduce the duty in other directions. We have many provisions in the tariff, some of them made by Order in Council; that raw material imported for certain purposes shall be free. Why was not that applied here? Here are two raw materials: the paper is the raw material of the albumenizer, and the albumenized paper is the raw material of the photographer. If he wanted to encourage the albumenizer, he could do so as well by reducing the duty on the paper as the mode which he has adopted.

Item agreed to.

Books, printed, periodicals and pamphlets, n.e.s., not being foreign reprints of British copy-right works nor blank account books, nor copy books, nor books to be written or drawn upon, nor bibles, prayer-books, psalm and hymn-books, 6 cents per pound.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. This appears to me about as objectionable a device for raising a revenue as could well be placed before us. So far as I can understand it, the effect will be to penalize the introduction of a very considerable number of cheap prints of various kinds which are being circulated among the people. It will disturb the whole trade. It makes it exceedingly inconvenient for a book-seller who imports a large quantity of books to divide the duty, as he must divide it, over the various books which are imported together; and, altogether, I must say that it is open to very nearly every objection which lies against putting specific duties in place of ad valorem duties. It is quite absurd to say that we are going to admit valuable works cheaper in this fashion than works of less value, because, as a matter of fact, an immense number of the best classics in our language are nowadays published in an extremely cheap form, and it is desirable that they should be circulated as widely as possible among our people. I am also informed by gentlemen who are more conversant with that particular subject than I am, that this will be a very objectionable tax in the case of a large number of books which are imported for Sunday school libraries and similar purposes, and certainly no obstacle should be placed in the way of those persons who are devoting themselves to the moral improvement of children in these ways. For myself, I should be glad to see this whole item put on the free list. I believe that a tax on literature in a country like ours is one of the most wasteful and unprofitable that could be imposed, and I believe that the prevailing density of apprehension on economic subjects is largely due to the heavy tax on useful literature which has been maintained by hon. gentlemen opposite and their predecessors.

Mr. FOSTER. This does not operate on campaign literature.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It does, because you tax the best kind of campaign literature. However, I do not propose to import any campaign literature, and I do not suppose the hon. gentleman would be disposed to do so; I do not think he could find any that would be of much service to him. But be that as it may, I am told that this tax of 6 cents a pound will in a great many cases have the effect of increasing the duty 100 or 150 or 200 per cent over the present figure. I am told that instead of the comparatively reasonable duty of 15 per cent, this tax will in many cases amount to 45 or 50 or 60 per cent, while, on the other hand, those books which are of the nature of luxuries, and which do deserve to be taxed, if any books at all are to be taxed, will come in at an extremely low rate. If I want to get a very valuable edition of the English poets, or any of those publications which are emphatically editions de luxe, I shall be able to get them in at 2 or 3 per cent, instead of 15 per cent, as under the old tariff; but if I wish to get any books which are printed in a cheap form, no matter how excellent or valuable they may be, I shall have to pay 40 or 50 or 60 per cent.

Mr. O'BRIEN. With all respect to the hon. gentleman who has just spoken, I think that if there is any case in which a specific duty is admissible, it is in this case, and I entirely support the Minister of Finance in the change he has made. A book is composed of two parts. There is the material part—the printing, paper, book-binding, and so on. I am not saying whether the rate of 6 cents a pound is too high or too low; but that may be a proper subject of taxation. The other component part of the book is its literary merit. If you impose an ad valorem duty, you tax that part as well as the other, because you cannot separate the value of the literary part from the value of the material part; but, by the specific duty, you confine the tax largely to the material part. Some people no doubt bring in editions de luxe as articles of luxury; but there are a great many who require to purchase high-priced books to assist them in the pursuits of life, and I think it would be exceedingly hard if they were obliged to pay a heavy tax on those books. In regard to the cheap class of books of which the hon. gentleman speaks, they are so cheap that they can easily bear this taxation, if any books at all can bear it. As to whether books should be taxed at all or not is another question. It must be remembered that books have not a commercial value like other commodities; they do not depend on the same law of supply and demand. A book has its value altogether irrespective of supply and demand. Sometimes a book is high priced because few people want it, and only a small number want it and only a small number are printed, and it would be very unfair to compel a man who wants a book of that kind to pay a high ad valorem duty upon it. Therefore, I think the principle of the specific duty is a good one. At first sight it struck me very much as it has done the hon. member for South Oxford; but on second thought I concluded that the hon. Minister of Finance had successfully solved the difficulty. As to whether 6 cents a pound is too high a duty or not, I do not express an opinion. I accept the specific duty in this case as an exceptional application of it, as I am opposed to specific duties from a protective point of view. My hon. friend from East York (Mr. Maclean) advocated specific duties the other day most strongly as a protectionist; but this is not a specific duty in the ordinary sense. I think it is a method of taxing the material part of a book and letting the literary part come in free.

Mr. CASEY. The hon. Minister of Finance, in proposing this tax to the House, stated some things which I think are not generally known. One of them was this:

Then again, there is the aspect of the printers of the country towards the book publishing interest to be considered. The book publishing interest in Canada does not occupy the position that it did many years ago. The large book houses which were then scattered in almost every considerable city, doing business in their special way, have largely gone out of the business, and it has taken other channels of distribution.

It does not say much for the National Policy if the large publishing houses which were situated in every considerable city, have had to go out of business. However, let us look at the new channels of distribution. The hon. gentleman said:

It has taken other channels of distribution, most widely among which is that of the subscription sale and the distribution of books by means of agents through the towns, villages and rural portions of the country.

Now, I was not aware that the book-peddling trade—the book-peddling nuisance, if I may fairly describe it—had assumed such proportions as the hon. Minister seems to have found it has taken. If it be true that the book-peddling nuisance has driven old-established firms out of the business, I think it should be the aim of the Government to reinstate these old-established and legitimate firms and discountenance as much as possible the operations of the book-peddler, whose book is made up largely of trashy bindings and illustrations, for which a very fancy price is charged. It is well known that the price of any book got up in subscription form is very largely greater than that of the same book if published upon the old and legitimate system. Let us see whether the changes proposed in the tariff will have that effect. The hon. Minister says that the book duty hitherto has been an ad valorem duty, and that has been complained of on the ground of principle. But he does not say what the principle is on which this duty was complained of. Perhaps he may be able to explain that later on. He says:

After considering the matter carefully, the decision has been arrived at to change the duty, and to make it a pound duty rather than an ad valorem at first sight that might seem to defeat the object of those who seek relief for the reading public who take scientific, philosophical and educational works, because these books are not printed in this country, and cannot be printed here, and it might be thought that the system would bear more heavily on that class and more lightly on a class of books of a more ephemeral, including current literature, put up in paper covers or more lightly put together than books of the other class. But the test shows that it is not so.

And he goes on to point out:

If you take a subscription book bound, which sells at $5, its weight will probably be four pounds.

The hon. gentleman appears to have had a consultation with the book-peddling people and ascertained the weight of their five dollar books.

Adding an ad valorem duty of 15 per cent, as at present, the duty would be 45 cents. It is proposed to make the duty a pound duty, 6 cents per pound. The duty on such book would be 24 cents instead of 45 cents. If you come down to current and light literature, large quantities of which are sent into this country, and which have not expensive bindings, and whose price is almost nominal, such a book coming here would weigh half a pound or three-quarters of a pound, and the invoice price would be a few cents per pound. The ad valorem duty is almost nothing; the pound duty will be considerable.

That is to say, the duty he proposes is distinctly intended to bear more heavily on the cheap literature which comes into the country than on the higher-priced literature. But, as the hon. gentleman has spoken of a principle, I think that we should consider this matter as a question of principle. He has himself admitted that, in the woollen and cotton tariff, the specific duty does bear most heavily and with unfair weight on the cheaper classes of goods, and he has, therefore, changed the tariff from a specific to an ad valorem duty. But when we come to books, he takes the other side and charges a specific instead of an ad valorem duty, in order that the duty may weigh more heavily on the cheaper class of books. Where is the principle on which he made this change—the principle he alluded to in the earlier part of the quotation I have made? He follows one principle with regard to cheap woollens and cotton and applies another to books. If there is anything that should be lightly taxed, it is the cheap books that come into the country. They are as much a necessity in civilized life as cheap woollens and cottons. Children cannot obtain their education without them; and after obtaining their school education, they cannot become intelligent adults without cheap literature. The price of every book of a cheap class published in the country will be raised by this duty as well as the price of the books imported. The Finance Minister tries to get around this by alluding to this cheap literature as being of an ephemeral character, lightly put together, and of such a nature as will weigh half a pound or a quarter of a pound per book. I had an object lesson in that matter yesterday. I was shown by a large dealer of books in this city an almost complete edition of Walter Scott's poems, printed in good style, on good paper, nicely bound, published in England, and which he was selling at 17 cents per book. Of course that book cost him less when he bought it.

Mr. FOSTER. Did he say how much it cost?

Mr. CASEY. No, but it was something less than 17 cents. He paid somewhere about 2 cents per book duty, certainly something under 3 cents, which would have been the tax had the book cost 20 cents. Now, that book weighs seventeen ounces, and he is charged 6 cents a pound on it. I do not know whether that additional ounce would carry the whole half-pound tax with it or not. When a book weighs seventeen ounces, what would the cost be?

Mr. FOSTER. Six cents a pound.

Mr. CASEY. Well, somewhere between 6 cents and 7 cents a book. There is an instance of a book, a celebrated standard English classic. He has Goldsmith, Milton and all the other classical English poets on his shelves, which he could afford to sell at 17 cents a book, on which he used to pay a duty of 2 cents, and now he will have to pay over 6 cents. That is the kind of literature the hon. Minister speaks of as ephemeral and says should be excluded by a specific tax. I say that the effect of this exclusion of cheap but good English literature, English reprints of the classical modern poets, and so on, will not only tend to give undue prominence to the Canadian producer of similar articles, but will give a great advantage to the subscription men—the book-peddlers, who, the Finance Minister says, have already got control of the book publishing interest. Now, Sir, I submit that this tariff discourages cheap literature of a good kind, gives undue advantages to the book-peddling fiend, and will result in shutting out our people from a great source of enjoyment, instruction and amusement furnished now by cheap English editions of the standard authors. As to the argument about distribution from the post office it amounts to nothing. These books are imported in bulk, and the duty might be collected at the point where the books are imported, and the postmaster would have nothing to do with assessing the duty upon them.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

sion, agree with me upon the question of specific duties upon this class of books. This item must be considered in conjunction with an item further on, which provides for the admission free of electrotypes and moulds for books. If these items are carried, as I have no doubt they will be, the result will be the creation of a large book industry in this country. At the present time all our cheap literature comes from outside countries. But if the protection proposed here is given and book plates are admitted free, as proposed, and if there is a slight modification in our postal laws, such as is likely to be decided upon, we shall have a book publishing industry in this country that will give employment to a large number of men, particularly pressmen, and there will be used a very large amount of Canadian paper; and there is no country so well adapted to produce paper as this Canada of ours. Surely we ought to print books for Canada upon Canadian paper. It is a matter of fact that 60 per cent of the cost of books such as are affected by this duty is the price of paper alone. If this measure is carried, the printers will be well satisfied, as they have petitioned the Government on this line. The result of this change will be that the pressmen, the paper-makers, the book-binders and the jobbers will control a large trade which hitherto has gone outside the country.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I am sorry that I cannot altogether agree with the hon. gentleman who has just preceded me. This item of the tariff reads:

Books printed, periodicals and pamphlets, n.e.s., not being foreign reprint of British copyright works, nor blank account books, not copy books, nor books to be written or drawn upon, nor bibles, prayer-books, psalm and hymn books, 6 cents per pound.

Thus, only the first three classes, printed books, periodicals and pamphlets, are charged 6 cents a pound, while the others are not. If we refer then to page 23, where the free list is given, we find this item:

Books, not being printed or reprinted in Canada, which are included in the curriculum of any university or incorporated college in Canada; books specially imported for the bona fide use of incorporated Mechanics Institutes, Public Free Libraries, and University and College Libraries, not more than two copies of each book; and books, bound or unbound, which have been printed and manufactured more than twenty years.

But the books given as prizes in the schools are to be taxed 6 cents a pound. I have had representations made to me to this effect—that this 6 cents a pound will put a very heavy tax on these books, which are simply intended to encourage the pupils in schools and which should not be made a source of revenue, especially in this case. Further, the books that go to our schools in the province of Quebec are French books, which are printed in large quantities in France, and, therefore, are sold at a very low price. My hon. friend who has just preceded me (Mr. Maclean) speaks of manufacturing books in Canada. That would be very good for the books of another kind, books that could be bought generally by men of science or educated men, for these books have a value aside from the cost of mechanical production. But these other books are printed in France in large quantities, and very many of them contain engravings, the production of which costs very little for a large edition, but which would be expensive if printed in a limited edition. These books will cost, say, 10 cents or 15 cents each, and could not be manufactured here for anything like that price. Therefore, I would call the attention of the hon. Minister of Finance to this item—I had no opportunity of speaking with him or with his colleagues about it—in the hope that he may perhaps modify the item, even if he does not think it proper to put this class of books on the free list.

Mr. FOSTER. Have you any idea how much that 10-cent book would weigh?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I can hardly say; but do I understand that the duty means 6 cents a pound on every book of a pound or less?

Mr. FOSTER. No; it is at the rate of 6 cents per pound. A book weighing four ounces would pay one-quarter of 6 cents.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I should think that one of these books would weigh five or six ounces. They generally have a rather heavy cover of pasteboard, covered with paper. I do not urge the hon. gentleman to put this class of books on the free list if he thinks that they should bear a tax; but I think the tax might be reduced. About the other matter, of course, I do not think I should speak now, because there will be some change in the item, perhaps. Then there is the item about books not printed or written in Canada, and which are included in the curriculum of a university in Canada. That would give us books free for universities and colleges, provided there is a curriculum, as is the case of the universities of Ontario, for example. But in our colleges in the province of Quebec there is no list of books stated in this way, and these books, I am afraid, would not be admitted free, as they are for the universities of Ontario. In the province of Quebec these books would be free for the largest institutions, but not for the colleges. I think there is a discrimination which might be avoided by a very few words.

Mr. LAURIER. I can corroborate every word which has fallen from the lips of the hon. member for Three Rivers (Sir Hector Langevin). A statement has been placed in my hands showing that school books used in the province of Quebec, which are now admitted at a duty of 15 per cent, according to the new tariff, would be subjected to a duty of not less than 35 per cent. I am not surprised that the hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean) should be in favour of this item, because he prefers a specific duty to an ad valorem duty. Of all the forms a specific duty can take, this is one of the worst, because it falls on that class of books which is mostly largely used by the people, both those which are the cheapest and those that are the best.

Mr. MACLEAN (York). The great bulk of those books will be just as cheap under the new duty as before.

Mr. LAURIER. That is quite impossible. To-day in all the book stores of the city of Ottawa you can buy an edition of Macaulay's History of England in five volumes, for $1.50, 30 cents a volume, well printed, pretty fairly bound, and of good material. This is as cheap as it is possible to make them. Now, take a class of books like that, which are read by the poorer classes, which are circulated among the people by thousands, and take the same book published in a much more valuable form, as a luxury, a book worth at least 75 cents to $1 per volume, and yet both editions are taxed equally 6 cents a pound. You will see, therefore, how far away from the mark is the hon. member for East York when he says this duty will not fall more heavily upon the poorer classes.

Mr. MACLEAN (York). The great bulk of the books will be just as cheap.

Mr. LAURIER. I contend, on the contrary, that this very item will be a tax upon the knowledge of the people, upon the dissemination of instruction, one of the most obnoxious of all duties that can be imposed. The hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) said this afternoon that there was a difference between the material of the book and the contents of the book, that is to say, its literary value. Well, everybody knows that the literary value of a book adds very little, generally speaking, to the number of volumes that are sold; but it is the merit of the author which induces a larger sale. Take books upon the same subject written by two different authors. They may cost exactly the same to produce, but the fame of one author will give a sale of one thousand to his book, whereas the other book will have only a sale of one hundred. This is the reason why I cannot admit the argument of the member for Muskoka. Take a book like Macaulay, or Shakespeare, or Byron, or Scott, or any of the classical authors, which are now produced at the cheapest rate possible; when you tax them by the pound instead of ad valorem, the result is what I have stated, that it becomes a tax upon the dissemination of instruction. School books of great literary value now used in the province of Quebec are subject to a duty of 15 per cent, but when they are taxed by the pound the duty will be no less than 35 per cent. I am afraid the hon. gentleman could not have contemplated such a state of things when he framed his tariff, he could not have contemplated such consequences as I now represent. In face of such consequences I think he will be induced to come down a little, and bring back the tariff to what it formerly was, that is, to 15 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. LANGELEIR. I am quite sure the Government did not consult their supporters from the province of Quebec, especially those who speak the French language, when they adopted this item of the tariff. From information that I have in my hand, and which has also been given to the leader of the Opposition, I conclude that this new duty will be a very heavy tax on all those who use the French language in the province of Quebec or elsewhere in Canada. It was stated a few moments ago by the member for East York (Mr. Maclean) that the same books would be printed in this country, and that the almost prohibitive duty which would result from a tax of 6 cents a pound, would encourage the publication of the same books in this country. That may be true for English books, which have a very large constituency among the English population of Canada, of whom there are nearly 4,000,000, while there is only about 1,000,000 of French-speaking people. One can easily understand that an English edition could be published in Canada, which would pay the publishers very well, whereas the same book could not be published in French for the want of a sufficiently large constituency. One result of the tariff in its present shape will be that a class of books, which I am going to mention from a statement in my hand, will not be published in this country any more than they have been in the past, and the French population will have to pay a very onerous duty, from which the English population will be exempt, because books printed in English, having a larger circulation, of course can be produced and sold much more cheaply. The books I am going to mention, whether the duty is 30, 40, or 50 per cent, will have to be imported, and the duty will have to be paid by those who read French books. The English population will be in a better position. I do not say that this unfair incidence was intended; I am quite sure that the Government did not know the practical result which this tariff was going to have on the French portion of the population of this country. I will read a statement which has been put into my hands by a very important firm of booksellers in the city of Quebec, Messrs. Forgues & Wiseman, who are dealers in French books:

The books upon which the proposed tariff will impose excessive duties, are prize books. For instance, we sell here, after having paid the duty of 15 per cent, insurance, freight, and made a reasonable profit, volumes of the 4th Series at 95 cents, but the new tariff will compel us to sell them at $1.20; being an increase of 30 per cent on the present selling price, or equivalent to a total duty of 52 per cent. This is a class of books which are very largely imported into the province of Quebec to be distributed as prizes in the French schools all over the province.

Mr. FOSTER. Have you the weight?

Mr. LANGELEIR. I do not know the weight, but these gentlemen have made the calculation. I am reading from their statement. The Dictionary of Mgr. Paul Guérin, a most complete and irreproachable work from a religious point of view, sells at 50 cents a copy. The new tariff will increase the price to 62½ cents, being an increase of 25 per cent, a total duty of 40 per cent. The price of the Grammaire de Claude Augé, the last work approved by the Council of Public Instruction, and which has been adopted by our principal colleges and educational institutions, will be increased in price as follows:—Elementary grammar, present price, $1.25; $1.50 under the new tariff; increase, 20 per cent, a total duty of 35 per cent. The middle-class grammar: Present price, $2; $2.40 under the new tariff; increase 20 per cent, total duty, 35 per cent. Superior course grammar: Present price, $4; $4.80 under the new tariff; increase, 20 per cent, total duty, 35 per cent. Then the paper goes on to say that there is no objection to the present tariff, so far as regards scientific works, or works relating to French contemporary literature, the duty on which, under the new tariff, will be as formerly, in fact, perhaps a little lower than at present; but on these school works which have a large circulation, the duty will be enormously increased, as the House will see from the particulars I have read. The French population of the province of Quebec will be called upon to pay 35 per cent for their school books, while the population of the country speaking the English language would only be obliged to pay 15 per cent, because, I suppose, 6 cents per pound duty is supposed not to exceed the rate under the old tariff. It has been stated that it was not supposed to increase the present duty on school books. I am sure, therefore, that when the Finance Minister talks over this subject with his colleagues of the province of Quebec, he will see the propriety of changing the tariff in regard to French school books to be used in the province of Quebec. As a member of the Council of Public Instruction, I have had to examine a great many of the school books, very many of which are imported from France. We find it impossible to publish them in this country as cheaply as we can import them, and if the duty were raised to 50 per cent, that would not act as a prohibition, especially in regard to such books as Augé's grammar, which is an excellent work, full of wood-cuts. The gentlemen to whom I have referred have the books to which reference has been made, and have arrived at the conclusion that the new duty on them will be equal to 35 per cent ad valorem, instead of 15 per cent, as is now being paid. I think when the Government examine the matter more closely, they will find it desirable to alter the tariff so as to do justice to French books used in the province of Quebec.

Mr. COCKBURN. I regret that the Government have not seen fit to make books free. In England, all books are free, as they are also in Austria, France and Germany. Even in China and in Mexico they are also free. Italy, I believe, imposes a duty, but it is on binding only; so does Denmark, Sweden and Norway. Spain is the only country which, I think, levies a duty on books. There the duty is imposed according to weight, and it is found to be the plan most advantageous. The United States has a duty on books, but, so far as I recollect, there are large exemptions, which apply to books required for schools, colleges, universities, literary, scientific and similar institutions, and also all books published in foreign languages. New Zealand also has a duty on books, but it applies only to blank books and ledgers, on which 15 per cent is levied, but all printed books calculated to increase the knowledge of the people are admitted free. It seems strange that we should adopt measures to circulate newspapers throughout the length and breadth of the land at large public cost as a means of disseminating knowledge, but that when books are brought in a heavy charge is levied. With respect to the change proposed by the Government, I think it is a fairer system than that already in force, inasmuch as it is a protection simply on the paper, not on the brains embodied in the work. If a revenue must be raised in this direction, there is no reason why it should not be raised on paper as well as on any other commodity. I hope on reviewing the position the Government may yet see its way to give us free books in this Dominion at no distant day.

Mr. CASEY. I agree heartily with the first part of the speech delivered by the hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Cockburn), but I do not understand how he can reconcile the two portions of his speech. In the first part he expressed the opinion that books should be free, and he adopted the position which we might expect him to occupy from his training in connection with literature. But in the closing portion of his remarks he mentioned that a revenue might as well be raised on paper as on anything else, and he indicated that the present tariff was based on the paper, not on the brains necessary to produce the books. Evidently, he does not know that the Finance Minister considers this is not a question of revenue, but one of protection, and if he desires to raise a revenue he should not place a protective tax on the article, but a revenue tax. It is admitted that the hon. gentleman is proposing a tax for the purpose of securing protection to home industry, and not for raising revenue. It has, however, been clearly shown that cheap books printed abroad will not only be taxed as regards the paper, but also in regard to the brains. The fact cannot be denied that the nature of the tax is such as to impose heavy burdens on cheap, good books imported from abroad, and, at the same time, a comparatively light tax on handsome books and Christmas editions, compared with the prices at which they are sold. Public school books, as well as the books of college curriculums, should be admitted free. In the province of Ontario, nearly all the books used in public schools are made at home, but still there are some books used in the public schools and many in the high schools which are not made in Canada. I think that Sunday school books for libraries, and books for public school libraries, ought certainly to be admitted free. I have lost track of some of the classes of books specified under this item. I cannot find mentioned anywhere else copy books and books to be written or drawn upon, which are here named as excluded from this tax. Do they come in as "Printed matter, n.e.s."?

Mr. FOSTER. If they are not described anywhere else, that would include them.

Mr. CASEY. But they are not printed matter; they are blank. I wish to know what rate is levied on these. I cannot wonder that the Finance Minister seems puzzled to find an item in these resolutions. The fact that this very item of books appears under the heading of "Animals and Agricultural Products," would show how carelessly they are drawn. I supposed that the Finance Minister should know these things before he brought down the resolutions to the House. I am waiting for an answer to my question.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman had better finish his speech. He does not expect me to pop up every time he asks a question. It is not parliamentary.

Mr. CASEY. It is not parliamentary for the Minister not to know what he intends to enact, and he is apparently quite lost in his own tariff, trying to find that item.

Mr. FOSTER. I am not irretrievably lost.

Mr. CASEY. I will sit down if the hon. gentleman wishes to answer.

Mr. FOSTER. You had better get through with what you have to say.

Mr. CASEY. Well, if he wants to find the item, I will finish my remarks while he looks for it. The Minister stated that the ad valorem duty on reading books was objected to on principle, but he has not explained what principle makes the ad valorem duty objectionable on printed books and what principle makes it proper in regard to blank books. He has given a long-winded argument about subscription books and so on, but that does not involve a principle. I would ask the hon. gentleman on what principle he puts an ad valorem duty on blank books, and this duty of 6 cents a pound on reading books, and I would also ask him on whose request was this change made?

Mr. HAZEN. I wish to ask the Finance Minister: In the administration of this Act what books are included within the term "periodicals"? Does it include the "Nineteenth Century," or the "Review of Reviews," or "Harper's Magazine," or works of that class; because if it does, it would be most vexatious, not on account of the amount involved, but every time a subscriber receives a copy he would have to go to the customs-house.

Mr. FOSTER. They are on the free list.

Mr. HAZEN. I did not see them on the free list.

Mr. CASEY. The word "periodical" is specially mentioned in this item as dutiable.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I would like to add my voice to that of the hon. member for Toronto Centre (Mr. Cockburn) in pleading for the total abolition of this duty, if it is at all possible. I think it is one of the most odious taxes in the whole list, and it involves peculiar hardship upon a very large class of literary, and deserving but poor men. I see by the Trade and Navigation Returns last year that the sum of over $100,000 was paid in duty upon books alone. Now, there is a large class of gentlemen in this community who receive very limited and small incomes—I refer to clergymen of different denominations, Roman Catholic as well as Protestant—who are bound to keep themselves abreast of the very best thought of the age, and in order to do so, they have to read the latest theological works on the different subjects on which they preach. The hon. gentleman admits free of duty, books that have been printed for more than twenty years, but the books to which I refer have been printed within the last year or two and of course come within the tariff which is now being enacted. By the time this tax is paid, together with the postage, which of itself is a pretty large tax, it amounts to a very heavy drain on the slender purses of these people. If this tax came out of the pockets of the well-to-do classes I do not suppose there would be so much to be said against it, although a tax on knowledge is always odious to an English-speaking and literary people; but I plead for the large class of men, numbering thousands, all through this Dominion, who find it to bear very heavily upon them. I have received letters from a large number of them, in which they ask me to mention the matter to the Finance Minister and to plead their case. I think the hon. Minister should amend his tariff to allow this large class of people to bring their books in free of duty. The average income of these gentlemen is very small—I believe a good deal under $1,000—and the smaller the income the greater the hardship of having to pay this tax is. I do think that if the Minister consulted the best feeling of the members on both sides of the House he would find a preponderating voice in favour of the abolition of this tax altogether.

Mr. CHRISTIE. I heartily endorse the remarks made by the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat. I would be greatly in favour of seeing books put on the free list. I do not know any greater benefit that could be conferred on our people than to give them the privilege of getting good, cheap books. Indeed, to my mind it is perfectly monstrous to tax school books, especially Sabbath school books. I do hope the hon. Finance Minister will see his way clear to place these at least upon the free list.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I do not think the revenue derived from the tax on books will be so very large that it is a matter of vital consequence to the Finance Minister to retain it. In my opinion it would give a very great impetus to the general diffusion of knowledge, if this tax were removed altogether. There are a very large number of the works of authors of very great eminence of which cheap editions have been published, which would find a very wide circulation in this country if there were no impediment in the way of a tax upon them. There are the works of Lord Macaulay, of Scott, of Dickens, of Kingsley, of Tennyson and of a great many others, of which cheap editions are published, which would be circulated very widely in this country to the very great advantage of the community, because these works would to a very large degree supersede the literature of a trashy character from which the public do not derive anything like equal advantage. Then, the persons of literary taste are rapidly increasing in number, whose income is not at all in proportion to their needs in this respect. Of course, the more widely knowledge is diffused, and the larger the number of persons who enter into the various professions, the smaller must be the average income which the professional or literary man receives, except those engaged in writing works of a high character, whose income is made considerable by the wide circulation of their works. But these people of literary taste have in most cases small incomes, and they are anxious that the money which they can spare for the purchase of books should go as far as possible. Then, there is the special class which my hon. friend from Queen's (Mr. Davies) mentions—the clergy. The clergy of this country are obliged, if they are to retain their influence at all, to keep abreast with their age, and to meet the various problems of doubt and difficulty which suggest themselves to the great mass of their congregations. They are obliged to study closely in order to do that. Their income in a great number of cases is very limited, and the works they require which are of special importance to them are those which have appeared in recent times. There are very few books published more than 20 years that are addressed to the solution of the modern problems and the questions of doubt and difficulty of our day. A large number of questions have been raised in the interest of secularists, which profound thinkers on the religious side of thought are endeavouring adequately to answer. Their works have not a very wide circulation, as they are all copyrighted books, and they are necessarily pretty high in price. None of them are published in this country; the authors do not reside here; they could not well be published here. Those who are especially interested in reading them are not sufficiently numerous to make it worth while to any publisher to undertake to make an arrangement with the authors for their publication here, and so they are necessarily foreign productions, published in Germany, in France and in England. In order that these may be made accessible to our clergy, it is important that the duty upon them should be put at a low figure. I will mention two works of this kind that have recently appeared. Take Professor Sayce's book on the "Higher Criticism." It is not a large book, but it is a comparatively dear one.

Mr. FOSTER. How dear?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). $2.50 or $3.

Mr. FOSTER. How much would it weigh?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I suppose it would weigh a pound and a half; I do not know; I have not weighed it. Then there is Professor Sandys' book on "Inspiration"—a book addressed to the modern agnostic.

Mr. DALY. What is the price of that?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Four dollars, I think. What the weight is I cannot say. But any duty at all on these books is an additional impediment in the way of their wide circulation. It is perhaps one of the happiest laws of our intellectual existence that the knowledge obtained by specialists who devote themselves to the investigation of these subjects ultimately finds its way through the common channels of public opinion down to those in the humblest walks of life. In this way the standard of attainment is raised. The advantages of reading are not confined to those who undertake to master these subjects, but extend to the whole community, and the hon. gentleman, by the tax on works of this nature is not only doing parties, whose duty and whose interest it is to read them, an injury, but through them the whole public suffer in consequence of taxation of this kind.

Mr. SCRIVER. The hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) and the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), when appealing to the Finance Minister on behalf of a very large and influential part of this community might, I thought, very well have said something in behalf of another class, whose responsibilities are perhaps not so important and yet whose vocation has very great responsibilities. I allude to the class of teachers. There is not a member of this House, who perhaps does not know as well as I, how slender their incomes are. Slender as are the incomes of clergymen, inadequate as those incomes are to enable them, in many instances, to support their families in the positions they fill in the community, the incomes of teachers are still more slender. And not only are we all aware of the inadequacy of the remuneration which teachers receive for their services, but we are also, all of us, perhaps painfully aware that the qualifications of many of these teachers are not what they ought to be, and they ought to be encouraged, by every legitimate means in the power of this House, to improve themselves in the qualifications they need for instructing those placed under them. And I thought I would not be doing justice to my own feelings in this matter, if I were to allow the occasion to pass without making an appeal in behalf of that very large and important class.

Mr. EDGAR. I think, from all points of view, this is an objectionable tax. In the old form, the tax was objectionable, and in its new form it is more so. I have a letter from a country dealer, who sells books as well as drugs, and he says that at Christmas time he often sells a thousand pounds of cheap illustrated board books, the cost of which is about 20 cents per pound. The old tariff would, therefore, be 3 cents per pound, while the new tariff would be 6 cents, just a hundred per cent increase on that class of books. I think that is rather a hard measure, but I cannot see why knowledge should be taxed at all in this way. It is no doubt supposed to be a protection for Canadian publishers or the Government would not propose it. The Government will go any length, they say, to carry out the principle of protection, and this is carrying out that principle. I contend that it is a mistake, in the interests of the publishers of Canadian literature. If you give the Canadian people every facility to import their literature, that will cultivate their taste for books, and they will buy far more from their own publishers than if you shut out literature by means of this sort. I would point out to the Minister of Justice that the proper changes in the Canadian copyright law will do infinitely more for the Canadian publisher than putting a tax on the importation of books. If Canadian publishers are only to be allowed to reprint British copyrighted books, as is proposed under the suspended statute of 1889, they will get far more advantage than even the Government contemplate conferring upon them by this tax. And while I believe that the Minister of Justice has taken strong and proper ground in dealing with the British Government on the question of the allowance of that legislation. still, I think, further steps should be taken by this Parliament. I should like to see this Government throw off this tax on knowledge, and this Parliament insist upon our Canadian legislation of 1889 being brought into force, so as to give our publishers the legitimate, proper and fair privileges given them in that Act. That Act passed in 1889 is hung up by Downing Street. Canadians cannot obtain the same privileges that the American publishers do with regard to reprints of British works. That Act would give a fair, reasonable and proper protection and assistance to Canadian publishers.

Mr. FOSTER. I wish to say a few words mainly in reply to the various criticisms—just and not at all immoderate criticisms, to my mind—which have been made upon this duty. In the first place, I do not think we ought to view this, as though we were now, for the first time, putting a tax upon books, and consequently be open to the imputation of bringing in a new tax upon knowledge. I think probably more may be said with reference to that catch phrase than there is very much weight in. A tax on knowledge is not, by any means, synonymous with a tax on books. There are a hundred other things as necessary to the pursuit of knowledge as books, upon which taxes are levied in all countries where taxes are collected. With the sentiment that knowledge should go as free in its methods of distribution as possible, I have of course every sympathy. Other things being equal, I should like to see books free in this country, and I hope the time may come when we shall see books free in this country. But at present the Government cannot see its way to make them free. There is $113,000 revenue which books give to us, and which we are not in a position to forego at present. On the other hand, we have a class of deserving people in this country—hard working people distributed over every part of our country—who pursue an industry which is an old, honourable and most useful one. Those are the makers of paper, the makers of books, the publishers of books, and the typesetters, the printers of books. This duty has in it two elements. In the first place, it is necessary for revenue, and I do not see how we are able to do without it at present. In the second place, it may be made the means of making larger the industry of which I have spoken, and the only thing that the Government has had in view, in arranging the tax, is to make it as light as possible upon the conveyance of knowledge, and yet be more effective to protect the line of books which can be produced in this country. Those are the two first points I would like to have kept in mind. There are difficulties in the way of making any tax upon books equitable all over the range. You may make a percentage ad valorem or a specific duty, and any member can get up in this House and instance a line of books so great is the variety—the variety in the size of the editions called for, the variety in binding, the variety in weights, and the like—in which the tax appears to bear too heavily. There is no tax which you can invent with reference to books, but what special instances can be brought to show that it seems to act unfairly. So we must expect to meet instances in which the tax can be shown to work, as it would seem at first sight, inequitably. But let us look at the matter and see whether we do not get a maximum of advantage out of the tax as it is at present. Now, if there is an objection in any hon. gentleman's mind to a tax upon knowledge, I believe the tax upon knowledge by this arrangement of book duties will be less than the tax imposed upon knowledge by the ad valorem rate of duty. I touched upon that in my presentation of the Budget, and it has been brought out by several gentlemen in this discussion, and I do not wish to enlarge upon it now, except to show the advantages of a specific duty. In the first place, we must take into consideration what has been done in the way of freeing certain classes of books entirely. It was found impossible to free all books, but it was found possible to free some. While the tax is heavier on some classes of books, and while we can cite instances in which it is heavier than under the ad valorem tax, let us look at the other side of the question as well, and see what we have done under the present proposition in reference to freeing books. I have received letters from a great many people, including some of the best educators and most thoughtful men we have in Canada, who have been very warm in their praises of what has been done. The most of them would like to see free books, still, they say this is a step in the right direction. First, take account of the poor man's books. This duty is in the direct line of cheapening these books. We have made it easier for all the great institutions of learning in this country to fill their libraries with what is really the stock-in-trade of the students and thinkers of our country, free of any tax whatever. Then, it seems to me, if there is any deserving class in this country, it is the students, and if there is any class of persons who feel the tax upon books as a heavy tax, and one levied upon slim pockets, that class is made up of the students. Where you have one rich man's son passing through college, you have a dozen poor men's sons putting themselves through or being put through on slender means, who practise close economy, and to whom twenty or thirty or fifty cents in the price of a book is an important consideration. Students' books, if included in the curricula of the colleges, are free of duty, and, consequently, the students of this country coming from the homes in all parts of the country, and most of them poor boys, pass through the universities and colleges free from any burdens because of the book tax. Further, all books not in the language of this country, English or French, are admitted free. This is a boon to the people speaking other languages who are coming to our country, and who are amongst us in such small numbers that it is impossible for them to have books in their own language published in this country. There are also the several extensions of the free list which have been mentioned before, I need not particularize. The clergymen are spoken of. I sympathize with them. Unless we put books on the free list entirely, can any one tell me how we are to allow clergymen's books to come in free, and tax others. It seems impossible to do it. But by this tax we have lightened the burden upon the clergymen of the country. These men do not buy the trashy books; they do not buy the ten cent novels. They buy a class of literature which is solid, which, as a rule, is issued in small editions, and, consequently, not printed in this country; books the price of which is fairly heavy, many of them being high-priced works. On all that class of books, the duty of six cents per pound levels the price down. My hon. friend Mr. Mills (Bothwell) cited an instance to show the enormity of the tax on books, and that very instance shows the favourable working of this duty. He cited Sayce's Higher Criticism, which costs $2.50. At 15 per cent, the duty would be 37½ cents. That book weighs one and a half pounds, and, at the rate of 6 cents per pound, would be charged 9 cents duty. The person who bought that book, requiring it as an arsenal of fact and argument to be used in the war against the socialistic and free-thinking tendencies of the day, would save 28½ cents duty under this clause. The hon. gentleman cited another book at a price of $4, a thoughtful man's book; not a rich man's book. The duty under the old rate would have been 60 cents. But at the pound rate—

Mr. CASEY. But he did not know what it weighed.

Mr. FOSTER. Suppose it weighed two pounds—

Mr. CASEY. Suppose it weighed five pounds.

Mr. FOSTER—there would be a saving of 48 cents. Suppose it weighs four pounds, and it is not supposable that it would weigh so much, there would still be a saving of 30 cents on that book alone. Take the class of book used by the artisan, mechanic, engineer, school-teacher, clergyman—the thoughtful working-classes of this country through and through—and in every case it will be found that this duty weighs far less heavily upon them than did the ad valorem duty of 15 per cent. Take the cheap reprint of a good work, and if you weigh it and calculate the duty under respective rates, you will find that, on the average, the present duty is about the same, or perhaps a little less.

Mr. CASEY. By no means.

Mr. FOSTER. Though I have no doubt the hon. gentleman knows a great deal about this question, yet I must say that the case is as I state it. Then, there is a class of books upon which the duty is heavier. There is the class mentioned by my hon. friend opposite (Sir Hector Langevin), that used for prizes in schools. Another gentleman mentioned the class of Christmas prize books. It is true that upon this class of books the duty is higher. Take the case of the grammar cited by my hon. friend (Mr. Langelier). That book would cost 10½ cents under the old duty. Under this duty it will have to be sold at 12 cents; but the rise in the price of the individual book is only 1½ cents. As these books are printed at such a cheap rate in France, the pound duty, if you take it on a percentage basis, is higher than the old rate, and gives rise to the argument of my hon. friend that consideration should be had for the purchasers of these books. But, if you count the rise on the individual book, you will find that the change is very little. Take the Christmas prize book, a class of books brought in here and sold by the ton every Christmas. I am inclined to think that the next generation would be better off if not a single pound of books of this very cheap class were sold and distributed. Hon. gentlemen have looked at these books at Christmas time, possibly. They are very cheap, have heavy covers, and the prints in them are very cheap, and, in most cases, most atrociously executed. I do not think that in the training of the artistic taste of the future generation, these books will play a very useful or a very important part. But for a holiday Christmas book, which is really something artistic and has merit in it, I have the statements of the best book-sellers of this country to the effect that the 6 cents per pound duty will not raise the price materially on that class of books. But where you take a rough and heavily bound book, with an immense board cover, which is almost all material and has almost no thought or art in it, there, of course, the pound duty makes the rate appear abnormally high on a percentage basis. Then there is the class of trashy books, novels and the like of that, costing 5 cents, 10 cents, 25 cents, three for a quarter—on these books the duty will be higher under this 6 cents per pound than it was under the 15 per cent rate. Whether it will raise the price is quite another question, because the price of these books in most cases is a sort of mechanical price, they are marked and are sold at that price, and it is possible that the consuming public, though such a thing is not devoutly to be wished for, will not pay any more for them in the end. But if the 6 cents per pound duty does cause that class of books to be sold higher than at present that will be rather a gain than otherwise. Those books are not very elevating in tendency, they are a sort of bad luxury, or an amusement; they are not bought by the very poor, and they are not bought by the solid middle class of the country. They are books for amusement, are sensational, and the like of that, and this duty will be higher on that class of books. Now, take the Sunday school books. Is there any way by which we could except Sunday school books without sweeping the whole duty from books entirely? They are selected from catalogues, and the Sunday school superintendent selects out of their catalogues to make up his library. But there is this about Sunday school libraries, and I think any superintendent of a Sunday school that has had to do with buying them is well aware that those books are printed very cheaply, and they are sold at high nominal prices. To the men who buy them in the gross, large discounts are given, the prices on them are marked, and my private opinion is that the Sunday school will not pay much more for that class of books than they do to-day, but possibly the profits of some people will be somewhat cut down. If you take Sunday school books of a fair grade through and through the 6 cents per pound duty will not make a very great difference as compared with the 15 per cent. You can find instances where books will be increased 100 per cent in consequence of the weight, and yet where the total amount of duty will not be over a cent, or a cent and a half, or two cents, on account of the extreme cheapness of the books. Now, what does this duty do with reference to the business of this country? Take the cases where there is a tax upon paper, upon the binding, upon the material that is in the book, this tax in that way bears the heaviest upon either a class of books which are read for amusement mainly or a class of books which have a sufficiently large circulation to enable them to be printed in this country. Why should they not be printed in this country? The printers' rates in this country are as low as they are in most other great countries, and lower than they are in the United States. We make our own paper, our publishers are enterprising, and where an edition cannot be economically set up in type in this country and published here, we have allowed that the plates shall be brought in. So there is every inducement given to publishing certain classes of books, and in that way the paper-maker is helped, and the publisher is helped, the binder is helped, and the printer is helped. These are classes of books upon which this duty throws that business, so far as it can be done, into the hands of our own printers, our own publishers and our own binders. Taking all these things into consideration, though you may pick out here and there instances in which you may say that the 6 cents per pound duty is a tax which bears inequitably, yet take it altogether, looking over the whole field, though I did not start out with any strong preconceived idea in favour of the pound duty, the more I looked into it the more I felt that it was the best duty, if you were to have any duty upon books, that we could possibly select. Not leaving out of account the fact that whilst we are putting this duty upon certain books, we are letting in a large class of books for a very deserving part of our people free, if we look at the question on all sides, I think we will come to the conclusion that this is about as good a duty as we could put upon books.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am not going to detain the House by travelling over the lengthy argument the hon. gentleman has made to show that this is at the same time a very valuable tax because it will keep out trashy books, and an equally valuable tax because it won't raise the price of good books. It does not appear to me that there is much coherence in his argument. But I want to point out this to the House. The hon. gentleman tells us he cannot afford to lose $113,000 of duty which is imposed on books brought into this country. Now, I say that our tariff, among its many barbarous stupidities, contains very few more barbarous stupidities than this same duty on books, and I say also that the plea of the hon. gentleman that he cannot afford to spare that $113,000, after the examples we have had of the reckless folly with which he deals with public revenue, when it comes to a question of protecting some little miserable trumpety industry in which some one of his own supporters is interested, and which is probably taxed for his corruption fund, is about the best proof that can be given of the utter iniquity which this whole scheme is conducted. Look at the duty which we were considering the other evening, the duty on rice, for the benefit of 75 people employed in two mills. I would like to know who are the shareholders in those mills, I would like to know what political wires they can bring to bear. The hon. gentleman did not hesitate, and has not hesitated for a dozen years back, to tax the people of Canada $150,000 to $200,000 a year for these abominable trumpety mills, but when it comes to a question of granting information to the whole country, when it comes to a question of benefiting the whole community by sweeping off a tax which he says brings him in $113,000, he can spare $200,000 of the people's money for the benefit of a couple of his supporters, employing the number of hands that I have spoken of, but he cannot spare $100,000 for the benefit of 6,000 teachers, for the benefit of 10,000 clerical persons—which I think is the number given us in the census returns—for the general benefit of the whole people, for the purposes of diffusing information. Verily these gentlemen love the darkness and hate the light, and therefore it is that they cannot afford to lose this $100,000.

Mr. CASEY. The hon. Minister says that a tax on books is not synonymous with a tax on knowledge. In one sense it is, in another it is not. You can tax knowledge without taxing books, but you cannot tax books without taxing knowledge. All knowledge is not acquired from books, although a large amount of it is; but you cannot tax books or literature of any kind without taxing knowledge at the same time. So the statement that this tariff imposes an increased tax on knowledge is perfectly true. The Finance Minister says there are a large number of people engaged in the publishing business in Canada, and they might as well publish the books we now import, and further that a large number of printers are employed by these publishing houses. The hon. gentleman, however, stated in his Budget speech that fewer people are now engaged in the publishing business in Canada than formerly. The hon. gentleman did not give a reason why the publishing business had fallen off, but I suppose it is due to the protective policy, which the hon. gentleman has upheld. While the hon. gentleman in his Budget speech made the number of those engaged in the publishing business appear to be small, he now represents the number as large, and he proposes to give them increased protection. Then the hon. gentleman proceeded to say that whether ad valorem or specific duties were imposed, special cases of unfairness could always be shown. We have shown many cases of unfairness in connection with the imposition of specific duties, but the Finance Minister has not yet produced a single case in which the ad valorem system has proved unfair to the trade of the country. The hon. gentleman also, in his efforts to prove that he sought to benefit the poor man, has mentioned that college books have been placed on the free list and also the books of college and university libraries, and he has called attention to the fact that most of the students are comparatively poor. That is very true. But a boy must pass through the public school and the high school before entering college. Why should he not have his books free all through, as well as men at college? If the majority of the students at our colleges and universities are not rich—and I am glad to know it—still more, the majority of those who attend our public and high schools are not the children of rich parents. And why not give them books free? The hon. gentleman says, how could you import books for clergymen free while you tax books of the same class imported for other people? And the hon. gentleman made a similar remark in regard to school teachers. I answer that question by asking another: How can you admit silk for corset-making free when you tax silk imported for other uses? Yet that is what is done by Order in Council under the existing tariff. There are dozens of instances where the materials are admitted free for special purposes. Why should we not adopt the same course in regard to clergymen and school teachers? There is only one remedy and that is for the clergy and teachers to form a combine and send delegates to have a confidential interview with the Finance Minister and see what they can accomplish. I asked the Minister an important question, and it was this: Was any request received from the trade for the change proposed; if so, from whom did the request come? When the hon. gentleman proposes a duty which is intended to increase the production of cheap books in Canada, he should tell the House where the demand comes from, the parties whom it is going to protect and how it will increase their protection. That is the duty of the hon. gentleman as an upright and honest Minister of Finance, and I hope he will make this statement before the close of the debate. The hon. gentleman took the whole line of cheap books and called them all trash. A very good edition of Shakespeare's dramatic works can be obtained in England for one shilling. Does the hon. gentleman pretend that such a work is trash? He then proceeded to speak about trashy novels that were sold three for a quarter, and said we would be better without them. I do not think it is the business of the Finance Minister to decide whether the people will be better without certain books or not. It is not his duty to watch over the literary tastes of the people and endeavour to alter their tastes by means of customs duties. Not even the Controller of Customs has the right to control our desires in that respect; he is not controller of manners or tastes, although he may be of customs. The Minister has declared that the middle class do not use such books. We know, however, that many do so, and that there is a demand that must be supplied. Suppose you excluded these cheap books, with what are you going to replace them? Certainly not by books of the superior class. The tastes of the people will remain the same, and they will be supplied by cheap and trashy Canadian reprints in place of the trashy productions which we now import. The only difference is, that we will pay from 50 to 100 per cent more for those trashy Canadian reprints than for the imported books. The Finance Minister wishes to retain the manufacturing of these books in the hands of Canadian publishers. Even under the degree of protection afforded, 15 per cent, Canadian works have been particularly poor and trashy, and they will be worse under a monopoly. The hon. gentleman has further declared that it is desirable to employ the printers, and that printers' wages are as low here as elsewhere. The printers will not be much pleased to hear that statement from the Finance Minister, to be told that their wages are as low here as elsewhere. I do not think the working printers wish the change in the tariff. It is not in their interests, but in the interests of the printing offices. The Finance Minister admits in his statement that some books will be increased 100 per cent in value. This change involves increased taxation of 50 per cent in most cases, and even 100 per cent. in favour of the publisher. The hon. gentleman should return to the principle of ad valorem duties, where he would have plain sailing, and under which he could tax every article according to its value. There is one item not yet clear. The hon. member for St. John (Mr. Hazen), asked the Finance Minister in regard to periodicals, and appears to be satisfied they were on the free list. I have looked carefully over the free list and periodicals are not there.

Mr. HAZEN. Yes, they are; and I will give them to you. I call my hon. friend's attention to page 26, where he will find that the following are mentioned as on the free list:—"Newspapers, and quarterly, monthly and semi-monthly magazines and weekly literary papers, unbound."

Mr. CASEY. I want a definition of periodicals then, because they are specially mentioned in the item before us. Is not a magazine a periodical?

Mr. HAZEN. Whether it is a periodical or not it is expressly exempted.

Mr. CASEY. The word "periodical" is specially mentioned in this item, and I have no doubt that it will lead to a good deal of confusion amongst customs officers, and some may decide that a magazine is a periodical, and some may not.

Item agreed to.

British copyright works, reprints of, six cents per pound and in addition thereto, twelve and one-half per cent ad valorem until March 27th, 1895, and thereafter six cents per pound.

Mr. EDGAR. I would like to ask the Minister of Justice if he has communicated to the English Government yet the fact that he proposes after next year to take off the authors' royalty?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Yes; the communication was made fully a month ago.

Mr. EDGAR. And is there any reply?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. No, not yet.

Mr. FOSTER. I wish to amend that item. Instead of having a fixed date, I wish to substitute the words "until the end of the next session of Parliament."

Item agreed to.

Maps and charts 20 per cent ad valorem.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It does appear to me that maps and charts might very properly be put in the free list. They are most essential aids to knowledge, and it does seem an absurdity to have a separate item for such articles as these.

Mr. FOSTER. Maps and charts are made in Canada, and the duty is a small one. Globes were formerly included in this item, but they have been transferred to the free list. Admiralty charts are free.

Mr. CASEY.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I cannot conceive a justification for the tax on maps and charts.

Item agreed to.

Paintings, prints, engravings, drawings, building plans, photographs and pictures, n.e.s., twenty per cent ad valorem.

Mr. CASEY. On what principle does the Minister put a high tax on books which are an absolute necessity, while he puts a low tax on these items which are comparatively luxuries?

Mr. FOSTER. They are more artistic.

Mr. CASEY. They are luxuries.

Mr. FOSTER. Art is not a luxury; art is a necessity to any great people.

Mr. CASEY. Works of art of this kind are a luxury to most people in Canada, and therefore the Minister puts them at a low rate of duty, while he puts a high duty on books. That is quite consistent with his policy.

Mr. FOSTER. Not at all. Look at the next item of playing cards, and you will see the high duty put on these pictorial arrangements.

Item agreed to.

Paper hangings or wall paper in rolls, 35 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. FOSTER. With reference to this item I wish to propose the motion, of which I gave notice last Friday. After looking still more carefully into this matter I find that it will be impossible under a 35 per cent duty, taking into account the circumstances and prices upon the other side, for these papers to be made in this country at that protection. The old protection was a great deal higher. I propose to put in the place of that two items. The first will be wall paper, not including borders, printed on plain, ungrounded papers, and coloured with any material except bronze, gold or glitter, 35 per cent, thus keeping the cheapest class of papers at the same rate as proposed here. The other class, which are in the old tariff put at from 4 cents to 15 cents per roll, I wish to place at 1½ cents per roll and 25 per cent, which I think will keep the manufacture of them in this country. The duty, as I propose it here, is a very large reduction on the old duty, and yet not so large as to put the industry out of existence.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Before the amendment is carried, I want to call the hon. gentleman's attention to some statements which I have received from paper dealers in respect to this proposed change. I hold in my hand a letter from some of these gentlemen, inclosing samples of their goods, which it is proposed to tax, in which the writers say:

The fact is there is no ungrounded paper imported into Canada at all. All that is used is made in Canada.

They inclose a sample of ungrounded Canadian paper, which costs 3¼ cents per roll of seven yards, and say :

This grade of paper is not imported at all, in fact, is not made in the United States, and therefore this part of the proposed tariff which reduces the duty to 35 per cent simply amounts to nothing at all, as we could buy no goods which could be admitted under that clause.

They send me a sample, which is endorsed : "Grounded paper, lowest grade of American manufacture, costing 3 cents per roll of seven yards." They say that the duty under the proposed change, 1½ cents per roll, and 25 per cent is equal to 2¼ cents, or a total of 5¼ cents per roll, amounting to 75 per cent, as near as possible. Of course, on the higher and more expensive grades, the proposed duty would not bear so heavily ; but upon the cheapest grades of grounded paper imported from the United States, and very largely used, indeed, by the poorer classes throughout Canada, it seems to me that this is going to be a burdensome tax. I ask the hon. gentleman if these statements are correct. They are signed by three different paper importers.

Mr. FOSTER. Not having looked into that, I cannot say whether they are actually correct or not ; but I have no hesitation at all in saying that at the present prices of American papers, the duties we impose, when reduced to the equivalent of ad valorem, do run up pretty high—in some cases to 60 or 65 per cent. That, however, is owing to this curious fact, but still a fact, that if you take the grades of English paper and compare them with the same grades of paper made here, even where the stock of the paper made here is better than the English paper, you find that our prices range, on the whole, lower than the English prices. So that the competition of our paper-makers is not with the English makers. If it were a protection of 25 per cent would be sufficient, but it is with the United States makers. In the United States there is an immense combination, with a very large capital, which has, for the last three years, been trying to fight out and destroy all the independent paper-makers in the United States. In order to do that, they have demoralized prices to such an extent during the last three or three and a half years that surplus and pushed stocks have been sent to this country at prices at which they cannot at all be manufactured here. If the prices in the United States were normal, the protection of 35 per cent would be quite sufficient to hold the market ; but, under present conditions it is not. They can send over here a paper of a cheap quality at about 2 1-10 cents a roll, and the cheapest paper that our people can put against that cost 3 or 3½ cents a roll. Of course, outside of the demoralized prices, our market is limited, and the same rolls and patterns which, in the United States would run for a very large market, have to run here for a very small market, and consequently, the cost of patterns has to be distributed over a small output. Quite a large number of men are engaged in the industry.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. How many ?

Mr. FOSTER. There are, I think, three factories making wall paper. They make about six million rolls of paper annually.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Of what value ?

Mr. FOSTER. To make that they use about 1,600 tons of raw paper, which is about the output of three mills.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. They must be very small mills.

Mr. FOSTER. Three fair mills. For every $100,000 of merchandise they pay about $44,000 in wages. The factory in Toronto has an output of $80,000 per year, and employs forty or fifty hands, paying $20,000 per year in wages.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Are these forty or fifty hands chiefly women and children ?

Mr. FOSTER. No ; all men, consequently with families depending upon them. The other mills have an output of about $200,000 and employ a proportionate number of hands. Watson's mill employs an average of 65 ; the other, an average of 60—about 165 hands employed.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I would just like to call the attention of the Minister of Finance to what that statement implies. Here is a total product of not quite $300,000. Here is a total employment of 160 or 165 people. The hon. gentleman is not content with 35 per cent for these gentlemen's benefit, but he wants to make it range from 35 up to 100 per cent, according to his own statement. But take the minimum 35 per cent, and, speaking roughly, that would represent a cost to the consumer of $100,000 per year, for the maintenance of 165 hands. It is a very good sample of the remarkable wisdom and soundness of the political economy of which the hon. gentleman is the exponent. The consuming population of Canada are taxed to the tune of $100,000 per year at the minimum rate, and in this case the tax may range, according to the quality of the paper made, up to 100 per cent.

Mr. FOSTER. No.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Yes ; I am taking the hon. gentleman's own statement. He stated that the quality which they made at the 3 cents could be sold here at 2 cents. On that 2 cents there would be 25 per cent and 1½ cents per roll. That makes a tax of 100 per cent on the cost value of the article. But I am willing to put it at the lower figure of 35 per cent. There you have a loss to the consuming population of Canada, according to his own statement, of 35 per cent on their output of $280,000, and the value you get is the employment of, at the outside, 165 hands, whose wages, according to the statement he made us, would amount roughly to $60,000 or $70,000.

Mr. FOSTER. More than that.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Not a bit. The hon. gentleman said $20,000 for the first one, which gave a result of $80,000 product. And at that rate $60,000 would be ample allowance for the other.

Mr. FOSTER. Forty-four thousand dollars for each $100,000 of output.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. You said that, but it did not follow from the other statement, because the statement that was made with respect to the Toronto factories was that an output of $80,000 employed forty or fifty hands, to whom $20,000 were paid in wages. If that be the case, the other factories, with the product of $200,000, must pay a great deal more than the Toronto one did. But be that as it may, the point I want to call the attention of the committee to is simply this: that whenever you come to analyse any of these statements, you find a monstrous loss to the consuming population of Canada for perfectly trivial employment given to a small number of people. This is a very fair sample of the way these tariffs operate all round, to the huge loss of the consuming population in comparison with the revenue derived. I do not know what revenue the hon. gentleman derives from the amount imported. What was the revenue on the amount imported under the very high tariff that prevailed before?

Mr. FOSTER. Ninety-five thousand dollars on last year's importations at last year's duty.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The net result is this, that we got into the Treasury $95,000, but the public of Canada had to pay a tax at the very least of $190,000. And, judging by the statement of my hon. friend and the natural effect of the alteration he is now proposing, they will probably have to pay to the tune of $250,000, including what goes into the manufacturers' and into the general treasury. So here is another proof, if proof were wanted, of the perfect correctness of the statement often made on this side of the House, that the inevitable operation of these protective duties is to take two or three dollars out of the public at large for one that goes into the national treasury. We have proved that often enough, but it is as well to get into the tariff, whenever an illustration of the kind occurs, to show how it works. The Minister is perfectly right in one part of his contention, which is this: That the nature of the goods is such that in our limited market it is a gross mistake to foster these petty industries, for the simple reason that we cannot possibly, with our narrow and limited market, manufacture these goods at all as cheaply as they can be manufactured in the larger market. That is a well known economic fact, which everybody who looks into these matters will fully understand and appreciate, and it is one of the very strongest grounds that can be urged against the folly of attempting to nationalize or encourage these little trumpery industries, which, although they may not take more than a few cents per family, collectively amount to a very large burden on the people.

Mr. FOSTER. Taking last year's importations and the duties raised on them, although you may point out special instances where in the case of exceedingly and abnormally low priced articles, the duties were very high, yet even with the high duties of last year the average rate upon the imported article was 55 per cent.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It was more nearly 70 per cent.

Mr. FOSTER. We have brought down that protection this year until, on the same importations, at the present rates, it will come to about 38 per cent. So that that is a large reduction, and brings it down to a fraction over 35 per cent, which will not be objected to. It is true you will find a range of prices in which the protection runs up to between 60 and 70 per cent, but that is an abnormally low price and an extreme instance of the incidents of protection. On the whole, the present proposed duties on the imports of last year will be about 38 per cent. Now, if you were to take English papers—where there is a normal price, where there is not this demoralization of prices—they could not come into competition with our own papers, under a duty of 25 per cent, such is the difference between the two. Take the range of prices of our own product in embossed papers, embossed borders, and in bronzes, and the range of British prices was in all cases over and above our own—in some cases very much above. And when we take the papers and compare them, although you may, according to your taste, like the British better in some respects, the substance of the paper, the ground of the paper, is quite equal in ours to the British article.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). In that 38 per cent do you include the low-priced paper?

Mr. FOSTER. The lower and the higher—the whole of it.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I would point this out, that where you lump a quantity of these papers together—as, for instance, white paper, granite paper and hand-made—under your old tax, although the collective duty might only amount to 65 per cent, there were, it is well known, numerous cases in which the duty on the British article so taxed amounted to a great deal more.

Mr. FOSTER. I stated that.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Amounted to 100 and 120 per cent, and cases have been stated to me where it ranged to 150 per cent.

Mr. WALLACE. It will not under this new arrangement.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. In that respect this new arrangement is better. It provides for a duty half specific and half ad valorem. But even so, it will in many cases, on these cheaper qualities of wall paper amount, as my hon. friend has stated, to 60 or 70 or even 75 per cent. And, in the case of the paper which the hon. gentleman says is brought in at demoralized prices, it would amount to 100 per cent. The hon. gentleman stated that paper could be brought in at a little over 2 cents a roll.

Mr. FOSTER. At 2¼ cents at present quotation.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. gentleman is imposing a tax of 25 per cent and 1½ cents a roll. If he will add the 25 per cent to the 1½ cents per roll he will find that the duty is, as nearly as possible, 100 per cent.

Mr. FOSTER. Yet the burden is not an excessive burden. Suppose this paper comes in at 2¼ cents a roll and the duty calculated by my hon. friend is collected upon it, the price of the paper per roll is still very cheap, and, as the number of rolls required for an ordinary small house is not large, it will be seen that the incidence of the duty is still not heavy, as it bears upon the people. We must take into account, and the hon. gentleman would be obliged to take into account if he were in my place, that an industry has been established, and it is an industry that employs not only boys and girls and women, but mainly men with families.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It employs many women and children, if I am properly informed.

Mr. FOSTER. I believe they are nearly all men, and they must be men of considerable skill, particularly those employed as designers and so on.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. There is another point worth considering. The hon. gentleman was just now descanting on the desirability of promoting the artistic sense in our people and giving as many cheap forms of beauty as possible. There are very few things in which it is more desirable for the comfort of our people and for the promotion of good taste among them to allow them to clothe their walls with reasonably pleasant and reasonably artistic qualities of paper. And, if the hon. gentleman has paid any attention at all to the progress of art in that respect, he must be aware that it is now possible, at a comparatively low rate, to obtain extremely pretty, and, I might say beautiful designs in paper, which go very far toward making the rooms of the poorest of the population cheerful and bright. We ought, as far as we can, to encourage that taste and not to mulct it by heavy duties. Were this an indigenous industry in this country, if there was a reasonable hope that perfection would be attained, something might be said in favour of this proposal. But, I am certain that in so very limited a market as ours, from the nature of the case, it is useless to expect that our wall paper manufacturers can attain, except at enormous cost, to anything like the perfection which is reached in this class of manufacture in great communities like those of Great Britain or the United States.

Mr. FOSTER. I would like my hon. friend to examine the work of our Canadian wall paper men. At the time of the inception of the National Policy there was one small factory in Canada. Now there are three and they supply all parts of the Dominion. If the hon. gentleman will look at the designs produced then and compare them with those produced now, he will see that there has been a very great advance in the artistic qualities which he so highly appreciates and of which he has spoken so nicely to-night. It is something, moreover, for a country to have its own distinctive art embodied in the homes of the people. If the hon. gentleman had seen the beautiful designs of the most chaste description with the maple leaf arranged most artistically upon a nice background, a thoroughly Canadian sentiment breathing from every leaf, I am sure that he would feel that this element was worth something.

Mr. McMULLEN. I have no doubt, from the description of the artistic designs as given by the hon. gentleman that he will be decorating his new mansion with Canadian paper.

Mr. FOSTER. I have got it in.

Mr. McMULLEN. That is all right. Did I understand the hon. gentleman to say that the value of paper produced in Canada was about $300,000 a year?

Mr. COCKBURN (Toronto). Six millions of rolls a year.

Mr. McMULLEN. I would like to know from the hon. the Finance Minister if the committee understood him aright that the value of the paper manufactured in Canada is about $300,000 a year.

Mr. FOSTER. That is what I said.

Mr. McMULLEN. And we import?

Mr. FOSTER. About $175,000 worth.

Mr. McMULLEN. Now, that is about $475,000 worth of wall paper used in this country in a year. The protective duty upon wall paper averages about 50 per cent, or, say, in all, a tax of $250,000. Of that $95,000 went into the Dominion Treasury, while the balance has been divided amongst the three factories. Now, the hon. Finance Minister says that they employed about 165 men, so that the tax divided amongst the factories would represent almost $1,000 a year for each man employed. Of course these men do not get that amount of wages. No doubt, they get a reasonable wage and the manufacturer takes the rest. In order to load up the Minister the right way, the gentlemen on presenting the claims of these factories tell him about the demoralization existing in the trade in the United States. He is told that for three years past they have been cutting one another's throats there, selling paper at very low prices, and that if our duties here were reduced, they would send in their goods and demoralize the trade here. They have told the Minister that prices have been exceedingly low, that he must keep out this cheap paper, and that the people of this country must pay double the amount they could buy their paper for under the demoralization that exists in the United States. They want this tariff kept up until a combination is formed in the United States, and, when they have every assurance that the prices there will be kept high, the manufacturers here will be willing to consider whether they will enter into competition with the manufacturer of the United States or not. But they warn the Minister that if the people should be allowed to buy their wall paper at a cheap rate it would be ruinous to the factories here. The Minister made a statement to us the other night on the very same line in regard to rice. I suppose when he consulted the manufacturers of agricultural machinery, and they were pressing their case before him, undoubtedly they loaded him up in the same direction. They told him there was demoralization in the agricultural implement industry in the United States, and if he did not put on 20 per cent duty to protect Canadian manufacturers these cheap implements would be brought over from the United States and sold in Canada to the detriment of Canadian manufacturers. And so it is along the whole line. The Minister's ears are open to the arguments of these people, and he accepts them, and comes here and tells the committee all the advantages that the people are going to reap by the adoption of a policy of this kind. Now, this plainly shows the robbery and injustice to which the people of this country are subjected under the operation of this pernicious, yes, I say this cursed tariff, because it militates against the people's interest and robs them right and left. They are robbed for the sake of keeping up three paper factories.

Mr. McMULLEN.

and when the poor man buys a few yards of paper to decorate his little room he has got to pay 50 or 60 per cent for the purpose of keeping up these three paper factories. We heard the same arguments in connection with a print factory at Magog. It was kept up for several years. At first they commenced with a duty of 25 per cent, then it was raised to 27 per cent and to 30 per cent. The duty was kept up in order to shut out prints from other countries, and to give this factory a monopoly; but after all the taxes to which the people were subjected for the benefit of this factory, I understand that it is standing still.

Mr. FOSTER. You are very much mistaken.

Mr. McMULLEN. It was some time ago, it may have started again. All this shows the gross injustice and the robbery to which the people of this country are subjected under a tariff of this kind. The tariff upon books is the worst, and this paper duty come next to it. Unquestionably the duty on books is indefensible, at least on certain classes of books, and this duty on paper is next to the worst, because it imposes a heavy tax on the poorer classes of the population who desire to buy a little paper to decorate their rooms.

Mr. BOYLE. The speech of the hon. gentleman who has just sat down, as well as that of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) in his first remarks on this question, proceeded upon the old fallacy that the duty is invariably added to the price, and the consumer has to pay it. The argument which is adduced in support of this proposition is that a certain amount of paper is imported on which duty is paid, and that in consequence the wall papers manufactured in this country are made as much higher to the consumer as the price of manufacture with the duty added. Now, I wish to say that in this particular instance that is not the case. The papers which are largely manufactured in this country are ungrounded, and are sold at a very low figure. If the hon. gentleman will take the trouble to consult the prices he will find that the average price of the output of Canadian mills is just 5 cents per roll, even with the stiff protection they have. This is the price they are able to get for their output. How does this work? It works this way: Probably one-half of the output of all these mills, or what is equivalent to one-half, is a very cheap class of paper sold at 3 and 4 cents per roll, and this paper is sold so cheaply that if there was no duty at all, the Canadian manufacturer would command this market. I say, therefore, that the contention of hon. gentlemen opposite that the consumers are mulcted to the extent of $150,000 or $160,000, is altogether unfounded. On the other hand, when they take into consideration the amount of labour employed, the raw paper, or unprinted paper, if I may so call it, has not been taken into account at all. That is also manufactured in this country, and gives employment to a certain number of hands. Then there is the staining, the colouring and the materials that go into it, to be taken into account. While I regret that the Minister of Finance does not see his way clear to allow the duty to remain as it stood in the first instance, I believe his arguments in favour of the change are good and irrefutable. At the same time I did not wish the wild statements made on the other side to go to the country unchallenged.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I wish to say to the hon. gentleman that the information which I received and laid before the House at an early stage of this debate was to the effect that none of what is called ungrounded paper is manufactured in the United States at all, and therefore, putting 25 per cent upon that class of goods is simply a blind. There is no such class of goods imported from the States, there is no such class of goods made in the States. The lowest grade of United States paper that is manufactured, a sample of which has been forwarded to me, costs 3 cents per roll, and comes under the proposed tariff of 25 per cent and 1½ cents specific duty, and the result of that will be that on the lowest grade of paper imported from the United States, and which is used by the poorer classes of the people, at least 75 per cent duty will be charged. Therefore, I say that the tariff in that respect, in that it taxes the poor man's paper very much more than it taxes the rich man's paper, is vicious, unjust, and therefore indefensible.

Mr. BOYLE. The hon. gentleman did not quite understand my argument. I stated that ungrounded papers were not imported. I do not know whether they are made in the United States or not, but they are made in England. But they are made so cheaply in this country that they would not be imported even if there was no duty. They are bulky and heavy. In any case the duty is only 35 per cent on rolls. However, the hon. gentleman's statement goes to bear out my argument that ungrounded papers are not imported into this country at all. If there is any advantage in it at all, the Canadian manufacturers have full control of the market, irrespective of the duties. He says that grounded paper can be bought in the United States as low as 3 cents per roll. I am not aware of any paper that can be bought as low as that; but assuming that is true, our Canadian manufacturers are turning out paper as low as 3 cents per roll, and paper just as good as that brought in and sold for 3 cents.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) These prices are certified to by three very large importers in the Maritime Provinces.

Mr. BOYLE. I do not question that. In regard to the manufacture of raw paper I have in my hands a circular from Barber & Ellis, stating that they supply 600 tons of raw paper per annum for the manufacture of wall paper.

Mr. GIBSON. I must disagree with my hon. friend from Monck (Mr. Boyle) when he claims that the duty on paper does not raise the cost of the paper to the consumer. I have in my hand now an invoice of paper imported from Buffalo on the 5th February last, containing 250 rolls, at $2.48½ per 100 rolls, the cost of which was $6.21. The Government does not accept a 35 per cent duty upon that paper, but put their own valuation upon it, and charge it at the rate of 3 cents per roll, and the duty in that case amounted to $7.50. In another invoice there were 150 rolls, at $3.19½ per 100 rolls, the cost of which was $4.79, and the duty upon which was $4.50. Then on 14 rolls of borders the cost amounted in all to $1.77, and the duty of $1.32. On all the invoices the cost was $12.67, and the duty paid thereon $13.32, over 100 per cent, according to the valuation put by the Government upon papers imported from the United States. If you take the Trade and Navigation Returns you will find that as regards this class of paper which enters largely into the poorer class of dwellings it is a misnomer to say that the Government have been only charging 30 or 40 per cent, as has been mentioned by the hon. member for Monck (Mr. Boyle), because on comparing the Trade and Navigation Returns I find the total value of rolls over 3 cents per roll was $35,000, on which was paid the duty of $21,000, or equal to 60 per cent, while paper costing 3 cents per roll the total value was $44,760, on which a duty was paid of $30,750, or a duty of 70 per cent all round. I hope the Government, for the sake of maintaining one or two small factories in the Dominion, will not act unjustly. Many years will elapse before our manufacturers of wall paper will be able to compete with the United States manufacturers, for the reasons given by the Finance Minister, and I think it is hardly fair in the interests of the people, simply for the sake of maintaining one hundred or one hundred and fifty men, to impose a duty equal to 100 per cent on paper which goes into the dwellings of the poor. I therefore hope the Finance Minister will leave the duty as suggested, at 35 per cent all round.

Mr. COCKBURN. The hon. gentleman has possibly succeeded in showing that the late tariff was rather burdensome in certain respects. If so, the Government are entitled to credit for their efforts to make it a more moderate one. We are turning out 6,000,000 rolls a year of wall paper, and using 1,600 tons of paper and 567 tons of colouring matter. I quite admit that the duty ad valorem imposed at present is a heavy one compared with that on the higher classes of paper, but hon. gentlemen have the same opportunity of making a like comparison as regards manufactures of cotton, woollen and other materials. We are not able to make the finer classes of paper at first, and we cannot expect to do so for several years. We have to creep before we can walk, and when we have acquired the necessary skill and capital, we shall then be able to make finer grades. At the present time on the poorer classes of paper there is a heavy duty charged. But we have to take into consideration that if we are to give encouragement to this industry at home, we have also to consider whether the encouragement is such as will enable the manufacturers to withstand the white blank and cheap gilt competition. The brown blank foreign papers are sold in Canada at less than cost by large manufacturers in the United States, for the reason that they look for their profit to the finer classes of goods, and that they will make profits not only from the quality, but also as regards new styles. They are thus able to sell at lower prices than our manufacturers can at present do, and, therefore, I hold it is the duty of the Government to protect the industry. As we have now lower class cotton much cheaper than in England, in a few years, with the help of protection, we will have wall paper as cheap in Canada as in England, and I trust every effort will be made to see that this large, important and growing industry will prosper, and that no blow will be dealt by the Government at its success.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. We have been engaged in fostering an industry which is not in the slightest degree an indigenous industry, and on which, if the statements of the Finance Minister are to be believed, the people of this country have during the last fourteen years expended not less than $1,500,000.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Besides the annual charge of $150,000 a year, which remained. That is the kind of political economy which the hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Cockburn) is preaching to-night. From the time there was a small factory here, which I believe was when the blessed National Policy was introduced, the duty had been considerably over 100 per cent. In the course of two or three years three factories developed, but they have remained stationary as regards their development and the number of men at work. I am speaking from memory with regard to a discussion that took place some years ago. Under the late tariff this industry was taxing the consuming population of Canada about $150,000 a year. It is true that the money does not all go into the pockets of those people, for the simple reason that they are obliged to manufacture at a greater cost than the same manufactures can be carried on where there is a large market, but the fact remains that for fourteen or fifteen years we have been paying an immense annual sum for these factories. I believe it is an underestimate that during these fourteen years the people have paid no less than $1,500,000 independent of the present annual outlay of $150,000. If the hon. gentleman will compute the rate of interest on that sum, he will ascertain that the people of Canada are paying in that way a larger amount than the total sum of wages paid. We are well aware that the manufacturers charge up to the last notch, especially when there is a small number of manufacturers who can easily form a combine; they will charge the highest possible price, provided they can undersell the price of the imported article, plus the duty, and thus secure the market to themselves. That is the practice, and I do not particularly blame them for so acting. It is a natural and inevitable result of such a system as we work under here, but in calculating the total cost to the country you have to take into consideration not only the annual loss but the loss incurred during fourteen to fifteen years in building up this starving industry.

Mr. WALLACE. The hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), has been making very elaborate calculations of the enormous tax imposed upon the people of Canada during the last fourteen years in this connection. If the hon. gentleman had taken the trouble to have inquired closely into the matter, he would have found this duty had only been in existence four years, since 1890, not fourteen years.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What was the duty before?

Mr. WALLACE. Thirty-five per cent.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That was heavy enough in all conscience.

Mr. WALLACE. There is no doubt that some very cheap paper has been brought in from the United States, but that is the case under exceptional circumstances. The National Wall Paper Company of the United States, with a capital of $48,000,000, has made a determined effort to crush out every paper industry in that country not in their combination, and to dictate prices. In pursuance of that policy, they have cut down the prices of some kinds of paper to a very low point indeed. In addition to selling the paper at a very low rate, they have made a special bargain with all the dealers to the effect that if they deal exclusively with them they will give a further rebate at the end of the year of 20 per cent, thereby bringing the price of paper down to the low figures that have been quoted. That paper has been sold below cost price; it has been sold under exceptional circumstances, and therefore it is not a fair estimate of the value of the wall paper. On this cheaper kind of paper used by the poor man, 35 per cent is now charged, and we have samples of it here which show that it is a good heavy serviceable paper, with artistic patterns. It is sold in this country at from 2¾ cents to 3 cents a roll. I think that is a pretty low rate for a good quality of paper, and that the poor man has no very great reason to complain. On that paper there is now charged under the new tariff, a duty of 35 per cent exactly.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman knows that there is none of that kind of paper made in the United States.

Mr. WALLACE. What is the difference whether it is made in the United States or not, when it is made in England and Germany? That quality of paper is sold in England at about 2½ cents per roll, and in Canada it is sold at 3 cents. This 35 per cent will protect the market for our Canadian manufacturers, although they do not exact the full amount of protection afforded to them on that article. I say that those who buy a cheap paper in this country get a good, strong, serviceable article, more cheaply than they do for the same weight of paper in the United States.

Mr. FORBES. What is the good of the duty, then?

Mr. WALLACE. It is to protect the market for the Canadian manufacturer, and for the Canadian workmen. Hon. gentlemen opposite say, what is the good of this protection of 35 per cent? Let me point out that there is a duty on the blank paper itself of 25 per cent, so that the protection on the manufactured wall paper is only 10 per cent in addition. It is not an exorbitant protection to wall manufacturers, for colouring, and for procuring the patterns and all the other expenses they are obliged to incur. I may also add that they pay $96,000 per annum in wages.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) If the statements of the Controller of Customs are correct, then the proposed amendment to the tariff is wholly unjustifiable. He says that this 35 per cent duty was placed in order to protect the Canadian manufacturer, and he tells us that it has had that effect. I think all parties were satisfied with the proposition made by the hon. gentleman to put a duty of 35 per cent on, but he forgets that the Finance Minister has changed his mind, and that he has confined the 35 per cent protection to a class of paper that is not made in the United States at all. He has changed his tariff with regard to the lowest class of wall paper that is imported from the United States from 35 per cent ad valorem to a specific duty of 1½ cents and 25 per cent, which makes a duty of 75 per cent on the lowest grade of paper. I want to call the attention of the Finance Minister to a state of facts which, if they exist, form a very great wrong. Wall paper importers in the Maritime provinces made importations this spring in accordance with the proposed tariff which the hon. gentleman laid before this House, namely, at the rate of 35 per cent ad valorem. Although they imported at that rate, and disposed of their stock on the assumption that that was all the duty they had to pay; they are now told that they will be obliged to pay according to the higher or changed duties. That is a great injustice, if true. I will read to the hon. gentleman a letter which I received from three large importers:

21st of April.—We have been passing our entries subject to amendment for the past three weeks, during which time we have received almost the whole of our stock, and as our business is done entirely in the spring, we have sold a large portion of these goods based on the 35 per cent tariff. We have been informed this morning that we will be obliged to pay the amended duty on all the goods we have received since the Budget was read. We will therefore be subjected to a very serious loss. It might be said that we should not have imported anything pending changes in the tariff, but it was impossible for us to do otherwise, as at the time the tariff is finally settled, the whole season for these goods would be over.

I hope that the Minister of Finance will see that no such injustice is perpetrated on any class of the community. He proposed his new tariff of 35 per cent, and they imported and sold their goods on that assumption; but, as he afterwards changed his mind and doubled or trebled the rate, it would be a monstrous injustice to make these people pay the higher rate after they had disposed of the goods. I would like to know what the Minister of Finance has to say on that?

Mr. FOSTER. What I have to say is what I have to say in every such case: That when a tariff proposition is brought down, it is always subject to amendment; that from that time until the law is made certain every person who enters his goods enters them subject to amendments of the tariff, and that these gentlemen will have to be under the same rule as all others.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am not fond of invoking the authority of the Governor in Council, and I have often taken objection to giving so much power to the Treasury Board; but if ever there was a case in which that reserved power could be justly exercised, it is in just such a case as my hon. friend (Mr. Davies) has referred to. The necessity for it, of course, ought to be very limited. In this case, our Government, after a year's consideration, comes down with a set of tariff proposals, and they ought to be prepared to stand by them. Unfortunately, the Government appears not to know its own mind for even the length of time between one day and the other. I say most distinctly and emphatically that, as a matter of justice and right, the Finance Minister ought, in such cases as those mentioned,—reasonable proof having been given—use the reserve power which, under his system the Treasury Board possesses. If he has not the power, I think it would be quite proper that he should get that power for such cases. I have seen in bygone times a very great number of extraordinary proceedings taken by the Government where their friends were concerned. When Sir Leonard Tilley's tariff was brought down, we have known that by one stroke a great many thousand dollars were put into the pockets of importers. It may be in the memory of some of the older members of this House that Sir Leonard Tilley, to my astonishment, and I think to the astonishment of every man who had any acquaintance with affairs, went the extreme length of supplying money to the banks to enable them to help the importers to take a large quantity of goods out of bond and escape his own tariff. That was the proceeding of one of the hon. gentleman's predecessors, which I remember stigmatising as it richly deserved, on the floor of this House. I can recollect also that the late Sir Francis Hincks made what he called restitution to a number of tea importers who had been caught with tea in their hands on which they had paid duty; and, if I remember rightly, for I speak simply from recollection, he caused the tea duties which they had paid to be refunded—a very extraordinary proceeding, but with perhaps more to justify it than the proceeding of Sir Leonard Tilley. Now, the case presented by the hon. gentleman does deserve special action or special legislation on the part of the Government. It is owing to their own mistake, or to ignorance of business on the part of the Finance Minister in bringing down one proposition and then abandoning it, that he has got these people into the scrape.

Mr. HAZEN. A representation similar to that made by the hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies) has reached me from a firm of dealers in wall paper in my constituency. They represent that they had taken their paper out of the custom-house at the rate of 35 per cent, and, expecting no amendment, had sold it at a fair profit on that rate of duty; and now they are called upon to pay the increased rate. It does seem to me that this is a case where some redress ought to be given to people placed in that position, because they naturally supposed that after a very careful inquiry had been made by the Government throughout the length and breadth of the country, the tariff embodied the mature deliberation of the Cabinet, and that they were safe in acting on that tariff. Of course, it may be said—and what the hon. Finance Minister says is very true—that the law has always been the same in that respect, and that the people who take their goods out of the custom-house before the law is passed do so subject to its being amended, and take their chances. It might also be said that in making sales they could guard themselves against the contingency of any amendment by providing for an increased price in case of an increase of duty; but I am perfectly satisfied that that is not the case with regard to wall paper. This season of the year, when people are making repairs and changes in their houses, as everybody knows, is the time when paper-hangings are mostly disposed of. When taken out of the custom-house, they are sold, not to retail merchants in different parts of the country, but in small quantities to individuals; and it would be utterly impossible for the dealers to make an arrangement to increase the price if the tariff should be increased or to lower the price if the tariff should be lowered. They would have to be sold, not subject to amendment, but at a fixed price at the time of the sale. That being the case, I think the Treasury Board might well act on the suggestion made by the hon. member for South Oxford. I feel that an injustice will be done to those parties who have paid this rate of duty if they do not do so.

Mr. McMULLEN. The Controller of Customs stated a few moments ago that a Canadian factory was supplying good paper at 2¼ cents a roll. Will he state what factory that is?

Mr. WALLACE. The price is 2.93 for good strong papers of which I have samples here. The factory is that of Watson in Montreal. There are two factories in Montreal—McArthur's and Watson's. They state that that is their selling price of the article.

Mr. McMULLEN. The hon. gentleman has made the statement to the House that Canadian paper is sold at 2¼ cents or 2.93 cents a roll. I have it from a man in the trade that there is no paper sold at any such price. No doubt the hon. gentleman has got these samples from the manufacturers; as I said before, they have loaded him up in the right way. He is right in the midst of people who are interested in protection.

Mr. WALLACE. Does the hon. gentleman say that the manufacturer who made that statement and submitted these samples has stated a falsehood?

Mr. McMULLEN. I say that there is no paper of Canadian manufacture sold in Canada at 2¼ cents a roll.

Some hon. MEMBERS. How do you know?

Mr. McMULLEN. Because I have been told by a man in this House, who is in that business, and who is a reliable man. The hon. Controller takes these statements from those people, and he supposes that the prices marked are the prices at which they sell; but he knows nothing at all with regard to the accuracy of these statements; he is in entire ignorance whether they are correct or not. He is surrounded by people anxious to keep up the system of protection as thickly as flies around a sugar cask in summer time; he hears nothing but protection; it is on his right and on his left, and then he comes to the House and submits the story that they have told him. All this goes to show that hon. gentlemen opposite are ever ready to get up and advocate the cause of the manufacturing classes: but there is not one single minister or controller who has a word to say on behalf of the consumer, who has to bear the burden and pay the piper.

Mr. WALLACE. The hon. gentleman professes to tell what has occurred in my office day by day. He could only obtain that knowledge by prowling around the keyhole of the door, and I suppose he is quite equal to that.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. WALLACE. He says further that the man who has given me the statement about the price of this paper has stated a falsehood. The man is a responsible manufacturer, and I have no doubt he will supply any one in the quantities he sells at the prices he has quoted here. In contradiction of that statement, we have that of the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen), who states that somebody told him—he will not even give his authority, because he has no authority that would be worth a moment's consideration. The gentleman who supplies those samples and quotes those prices is a responsible man, and I am quite satisfied that the prices he has given me are those he quotes to the wholesale trade throughout the country, notwithstanding the statement of a gentleman who does not know anything about it.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I would point out to the House that, if the statement be correct, that these rolls are supplied at 2·9, a little less than 3 cents, there is a clear case of a protection of 75 per cent, because this is to be protected, as I understand, by 1½ cents per roll.

Mr. WALLACE. Not at all, only the 35 per cent. I might tell the hon. gentleman that the sample of English paper, which hon. gentlemen can see for themselves, is not of as good a quality as that quoted at 2·33.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). They can make their fortunes selling it in England.

Mr. WALLACE. The English paper is not as good a quality at 2·33 as our Canadian paper at 2·9.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Then, of course, our paper will go to England and drive the dearer and inferior quality out of the market there. But I wish to go back to the statement made by the hon. member for South Oxford, and the answer of the Finance Minister to that statement. The Minister of Finance has over and over again this evening appealed to the sympathy of the committee for some regard to the vested interests of the manufacturers, and the hon. gentleman is proposing, on the cheaper varieties of paper, a tax of 75 per cent by way of expressing that regard. The hon.

gentleman, of course, would admit that these parties could manufacture the paper in the free market and sell it at a fair price, provided Canada was not a sacrifice market. That we have been told over and over again. We have been told that we can make this paper cheaper here than they are making it elsewhere, and the hon. gentleman, in confirmation of that statement, brings forward samples of paper produced in England and the United States and also in the Canadian market. My hon. friend from Queen's (Mr. Davies) called the attention of the Minister of Finance to the fact that people who import paper and who sell in the only season of the year in which paper is called for—the spring season—have sold their paper with the duty added, which the tariff he brought down imposed upon it. The hon. gentleman now proposes a tariff ranging as high at least as 75 per cent, instead of 35 per cent, as in the tariff he introduced. That is, he asks from those people, who have sold with a fair profit added, 40 per cent in addition to what has already been paid. So that if they were selling at a profit of 35 per cent, which would be a very high profit indeed, but say a profit of 25 per cent, the ordinary charge made, they would have to hand over to the hon. gentleman, as an additional tax under his reconsidered tariff, the 25 per cent profit which they have charged their customers and 15 per cent more. And, the hon. gentleman says that is perfectly right. They ought to have known their business; they ought to have known that the Government could change the tariff, and ought to have added a sufficient amount to their profits to enable them to have paid any additional sum which the Government proposed. That is, they ought to have known what the Minister did not know—what was not simply in the Minister's mind but in the minds of the Minister's masters—in order that they might be enabled to protect themselves against possible loss. For the manufacturer, for the employer of labour in these manufacturing establishments, the hon. gentleman has every consideration. He has any amount of sympathy, and is ready to impose burdens in their behalf. He is ready to levy tribute on the consumer in order to give expression to that sympathy for these men. But for the importers, for the men the importers employ, for the men whom the ordinary paper merchant employ—and they are a hundredfold more numerous than those employed in the factories—the hon. gentleman has no sympathy at all. They are not entitled to any consideration at his hands. I believe that the manufacturer ought to have every consideration, every protection which every other member of the community receives. His life and property should be made secure to him. The law, for his protection, should be extended to him. I would not place him in any inferior position. But I say he ought not to be under the special guardianship of the Government, and enjoy advantages at the expense of all the rest of the community, while the importers and the consumers should be in the position in which the hon. gentleman has placed them by these alterations in the tariff. The only remedy that exists in the way of repairing the injustice which, the hon. gentleman thinks, may, without any serious consideration, be inflicted upon these people, would be in the way suggested by the hon. member for South Oxford. But what kind of a way is it to deal with the taxation of this country, when men are placed in the position in which the tariff of the hon. gentleman has placed these parties. I predicted, at an early period of the session, that the tariff proposed by the hon. gentleman, and cheered by his friends, was not the tariff which he would ask us to adopt. And although we are not half way through it, yet what has happened so far has abundantly proved the statement that I then made. And I have no doubt whatever that we shall have further changes proposed. It just shows the House how much value is to be attached to all the serious considerations which the hon. gentleman gave the tariff that he submitted to us, and which he now thinks ought not to be adopted, and would not be fair to the community if they were adopted.

Mr. BROWN. While accepting, with all due respect, the statement made by the Controller of Customs, the prices quoted by him and those quoted by the same firms to their customers do not agree. The prices quoted to me two months ago were 7 and 8 cents per double roll for their common paper by that firm. They had not any single rolls at those prices. They seem to have two sets of prices—one for the Controller of Customs and one for their customers.

Mr. McMULLEN. The hon. the Controller of Customs challenged the statement that I made. Now, my statement has been verified by the experience of the hon. gentleman who sits behind me (Mr. Brown) within two months past. The hon. gentleman made rather an uncourteous allusion to me, saying that I was peeping through a keyhole. The hon. gentleman is only a keyhole Minister yet. What information he gets from the Cabinet is by listening or peeping through the keyhole, and he has been so long accustomed to that way of proceeding that he thinks he is entitled to make that charge against others, as if they were capable of occupying that very humiliating position. Well, I have not got as low as the hon. gentleman. I suppose he does as he accuses me of doing and makes quite a job of it. I fancy that while the Cabinet is in session, he must look like a crow looking into a bottle, as he tries to gather what information he can. The hon. gentleman has been loaded up by the manufacturers and he comes here and unloads the statements they have made, and we have to listen from day to day and from night to night to these statements about the peculiar conditions under which these people produce these various commodities. And, as I stated with regard to the Finance Minister, he does not know a single thing about it. He is not cognizant of the circumstances attending these manufactures, and neither is the Controller of Customs. He talks about manufactures, but he is loaded up the wrong way.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell).

Item agreed to.

Paper, tarred, 20 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. FOSTER. That is 25 per cent.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. You are raising that.

Mr. FOSTER. We are lowering it as compared with what it was.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It was 20 per cent. I think it is a mistake to increase it.

Mr. FOSTER. I trust the hon. gentleman will be just and will consider this matter before he makes that remark. Tarred paper was formerly one-half cent per pound, which was pretty well up to 35 per cent—

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. About 32 per cent.

Mr. FOSTER. It was first reduced to 20 per cent according to this item. But my hon. friend will see that that is below the protection that is put on the material of which this paper is made. The duty on the pulp-stock of which it is made is 25 per cent, and 20 per cent is not a protection, but the contrary; and, in common fairness, the duty should be made 25 per cent.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. This tarred paper is an article, I am informed, which is very largely consumed in Manitoba and the North-west, particularly by those who are just entering the country as settlers; and I must say it appears to me very indiscreet and foolish to tax tar paper which is so largely used by those settlers. Instead of taxing this material, sound policy would dictate that it should be made free, at least for the use of settlers. It is a great hardship that an article of this kind, which is of so extraordinary value in so cold a country, in fact almost indispensable in erecting the kind of buildings the settlers have to use should cost 25 per cent more by reason of this duty.

Mr. FOSTER. But this is no protection.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. But it is a very heavy tax upon the settlers. I do not see my hon. friend from Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) in his place. He could speak upon the subject with more knowledge than I possess. Still, I have made a good many trips across the prairie, and I have observed that a large quantity of this article is used by the settlers, and I must say it is a very ill-advised step to impose this duty.

Mr. O'BRIEN. Tarr'd paper is a matter of absolute necessity in many parts of the country. In my section it has come into very common use, particularly among those who cannot afford to put up the best class of buildings. You might as well tax the shingles or the lumber they use. In the North-west it is in universal use. This is one of the worst features of the tariff.

Item agreed to.

Acid, acetic and pyroligneous, n.e.s., and vinegar, a specific duty of 15 cents for each gallon of any strength not exceeding the strength of proof and for each degree of strength in excess of the strength of proof shall be held to be equal to six per cent of absolute acid and in all cases the strength shall be determined in such manner as is established by the Governor in Council.

Mr. FOSTER. That is 2 cents instead of 1 cent additional.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. One cent; I have it here.

Mr. FOSTER. The proposition of which I gave notice is to make the duty 2 cents instead of 1 cent for the additional degree of strength. The protection on vinegar is the same as before; but the House will remember that we intend to add to the excise duty on vinegar, and, in order to make the duty equivalent on the higher grade of acetic acid, so far as vinegar is made from that, we have to put 2 cents duty on each additional degree, instead of 1 cent. Otherwise, when you come to acetic acid with a strength of 96 degrees, at which strength it is brought in, and from a gallon of it will be made a very large quantity of vinegar—a vinegar which will come into competition with good vinegar—there would be no protection at all. While this high duty is imposed upon the acetic acid as a protection against a spurious grade of vinegar, the House will see by looking at the next item, that both the acetic and pyroligneous have been greatly reduced for all manufacturing purposes, in which it is very largely used.

Item agreed to.

All medicinal preparations, including patent and proprietary preparations, tinctures, pills, powders, troches or lozenges, syrups, cordials, bitters, anodynes, tonics, plasters, liniments, salves, ointments, pastes, drops, waters, essences, oils (all liquids, 50 per cent; all other, 25 per cent); and all chemical, pharmaceutical or officinal preparations or medicines, not otherwise provided for; all liquids, 50 per cent ad valorem, and all other, twenty-five per cent ad valorem.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, after the word "oils," in the fourth line, strike out the comms, so that the word may not apply to oils except those that are medicinally prepared.

Mr. BORDEN. I did not observe one item that is passed. Perhaps you will permit me to go back to it—the item of sulphuric acid. I observe that the duty has been reduced from half a cent to four-tenths of a cent per pound. I would like to call the attention of the Minister to the fact that this acid is used very largely in the manufacture of fertilizers, and the present tariff proposes to reduce the duty on fertilizers from 20 per cent to 10 per cent. While the reduction of the duty upon acid, which is one of the principal raw materials entering into the manufacture of fertilizers—

Mr. FOSTER. Not the principal one.

Mr. BORDEN. I am informed it is one of the most extensive—is only reduced one-tenth of one cent per pound. I have had some letters from manufacturers of these fertilizers in the Maritime Provinces to the effect that it will be impossible for them to continue the manufacture unless a reduction is made in the duty upon acid commensurate with the reduction made upon fertilizers. A letter which I have from a manufacturer in Nova Scotia states that they will be perfectly prepared to continue the manufacture of these fertilizers and would be glad if the Government would make both fertilizers and acid free. The hon. gentleman is retaining this high duty, it is believed, for the purpose of protecting the manufacturer of acids in one or two places, I believe one place in the province of Quebec and one place in the province of Ontario. It cannot be for the purpose of revenue, as the amount of revenue collected last year was only some $700 or $800. Now, I desire to ask the hon. gentleman to reduce this duty materially, commensurate with the reduction which he has made upon the manufactured article, although I myself think that he should make both the fertilizer and the acid free. The hon. gentleman manifested a moment ago his assent to the proposition to take the duty altogether off acids. I would like to know whether he is in earnest in reference to that, and whether he is willing that the duty should be removed entirely from sulphuric acid, as is demanded by the manufacturers of fertilizers in the Maritime Provinces.

Mr. FOSTER. When we come to the item of fertilizer, I think I will be able to satisfy my hon. friend that no injustice is done even on his basis. He has stated to the House that these gentlemen would be willing to undertake the manufacture and distribution of fertilizers provided that the whole were made free, no duty upon fertilizers and no duty upon sulphuric acids. Now, with this 10 per cent on fertilizers, and with this duty on sulphuric acid, and taking the quantity of sulphuric acid that goes into the compound with every other material they use, free, they have a protection on the outcome of some 2 or 3 per cent, so that they are just that much better off than they would be under free trade.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I will read a communication I received from Windsor, N.S., where this manufacture is carried on to some extent :

Sulphuric acid, which enters largely into the manufacture of fertilizers, paid hitherto a duty of half a cent per pound. The proposed duty is four-tenths of one cent per pound, only one-tenth of a cent less. The duty upon imported fertilizers has hitherto been 20 per cent ad valorem, and the proposed duty is 10 per cent ad valorem. The reduction of duty (only one-tenth of a cent) upon sulphuric acid avails but little to the manufacturer here as against 50 per cent reduction upon the imported article. What the manufacturers complain of is not the reduction of the duty upon imported fertilizers, but that the Government have placed them at a disadvantage by continuing the high tax upon sulphuric acid, which is to a certain extent, the raw material of their manufacture. They ask that sulphuric acid, for the purpose of fertilizers, be admitted duty free.

Do I understand the hon. gentleman is willing to concede that demand ?

Mr. FOSTER. No.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Then it is just a question of fact whether they are at the disadvantage they allege, or not. He goes on :

Otherwise they cannot compete with the imported article made in the United States, with sulphuric acid admitted into that country duty free.

Mr. FOSTER. Then according to that statement they cannot compete on the basis of free trade ?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) He says they can compete, if you take these statements to be correct. This manufacturer says he can compete if you admit sulphuric acid duty free, and he is willing to have fertilizers free.

Mr. FOSTER. Very well, he is now in a better position than he would be.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) He ought to know his own business best.

Mr. FOSTER. I saw a gentleman who knows the business.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) You mean a gentleman from Halifax ?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I saw him, too, and read to him the substance of this letter with which he agreed, so far as I understood him.

Mr. FOSTER. They all want protection.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) He does not want protection, but he wants his raw material admitted free. If the manufactured article is admitted at a very low rate, he does not want to have a high duty maintained upon his raw material. I told him if he wanted protection, he had come to the wrong quarter to get support, because I was the very man who would like to see fertilizers made duty free. But, I said, if I can give you any assistance by reducing the duty still further upon fertilizers, and get your raw material made duty free also, I should be most happy to assist you ; and it is in the hope that I am rendering that assistance that I am reading this letter to the hon. gentleman now. The writer goes on to say :

I understand the reason why the duty is retained on the acid is that there are two factories (one in London, Ont., and the other in Capleton, Quebec) in this country making the article. The Government must look at the thing in a practical way. Our fertilizer manufacturers say that the continuance of the duty on the acid will practically close up their factories, coupled with the reduction of duty upon the imported article ; that the amount of capital and labour connected with the fertilizer business is as ten to one compared with the acid business. Our Maritime Provinces manufacturing, notwithstanding the high duty, have always found it more profitable to get their acids from abroad, but with the reduction of the duty upon imported fertilizers they will have to go under unless they can get cheap acid. From small beginnings our factories, notably the one in Windsor, have grown into important branches of commerce in which a large amount of money has been invested. To have this industry ruthlessly destroyed, unnecessarily by the Government, will be too bad, and this ostensibly to profit two small concerns making a certain line of goods. This is protection with a vengeance.

Of course, I cannot say how far the statements of this gentleman are correct. I have no practical knowledge of the business whatever, and I give the statements for what they are worth. The writer is a gentleman whose name I will be glad to give to the Minister if he wishes it. Inclosed in the letter he sends me correspondence in a Windsor paper in which the argument is thoroughly thrashed out, and figures are given, which I will not detain the House by repeating ; because if the hon. gentleman has made up his mind not to give them what they think is fair play in the matter, it is not worth while to pursue the argument much further. It seems to me that the Finance Minister might have admitted acids free for the purpose of making fertilizers, and as the manufacturers buy acids in the United States and will continue to buy them there, no harm would be done to our manufacturers.

Mr. FOSTER. They do not.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The manufacturers do so almost entirely. I should like to see fertilizers admitted duty free, and also the raw material, and if the statement made here is correct, that the effect is to reduce the duty on fertilizers and to impose a higher duty on the acids, a heavy blow will be struck at that industry.

Mr. BORDEN. I have here the letter on which I based my statement :

Sulphuric acid (Chamber 50 per cent), New York, \$7 to \$8 per 2,000 pounds ; duty, $\frac{1}{4}$ of 1 cent per pound ; say twelve carboys at \$2 each, \$24 ; 30 per cent duty, \$7.20. Same acid from Great Britain per 2,240 pounds, \$5.60 ; same duty.

| | |
|---|---------|
| Acid which we use from reason already stated, New York, 2,000 pounds..... | $14 00 |
| Duty, $\frac{1}{4}$ of 1 cent..... | 8 00 |
| Twelve carboys, $2 each on package, 30 per cent..... | 7 20 |
| Freight per ton..... | 1 00 |
| | $30 20 |

Delivered at Windsor, against the acid from Capleton delivered at Windsor, per 2,000 pounds, $36.

The West Indies use large quantities of fertilizers which market we should like to reach, and could, provided we bought our acid as cheaply as the United States manufacturers do. As the matter now stands, this market is now prohibited to us. We claim that if we get sulphuric acid, duty free, we do not want any protection on superphosphates, and can do a much larger business, giving the farmer cheaper goods and increasing, to a large extent, the products of the soil, which means increased wealth to the whole community. We fail to see the justice of this revision of the tariff as contemplated.

It is on this ground I based my claim, and I hold it is in the interest of the agriculturists and is at the same time all that these particular manufacturers ask. I desire further to inquire if the Finance Minister intends to include in the item now before the House all legitimate medicines used in the sick chamber ; if so, whether he is aware that he is increasing the duty from 20 per cent under the old tariff to 25 and 50 per cent ? I find in the Trade and Navigation Returns that the duty on glycerine was 20 per cent ; for the future it will be 50 per cent.

Mr. WALLACE. No, it will be in the same classification as before. It will come under the similitude class, it being similar to vaseline, and the duty will be 20 per cent.

Mr. BORDEN. Under what class will come chloride of iron ?

Mr. WALLACE. Twenty per cent.

Mr. BORDEN. The hon. gentleman's customs-house officers at Halifax are charging 50 per cent on it to-day.

Mr. WALLACE. If they are doing so, the matter will have to be amended and corrected.

Mr. BORDEN. It is obvious that the tariff is not clear to the hon. gentleman's own officers. Under this change medicines which were formerly in the not-otherwise-provided class, have been added to the clause or are included in the clause now under discussion, and it is contended that an enormous number of medicines used by regular practitioners have been increased by this provision from 20 to 25 per cent on solids and from 20 to 50 per cent on liquids. I think this is a question of sufficient importance for the Finance Minister to be able to give the committee specific information as to the particular reasons why this transfer has been made from the not-otherwise-provided class. Under that class last year there were imported drugs and other substances of the value of $228,220, paying a duty of $45,000. Under this clause that duty would be enormously increased. What increase of revenue does the Finance Minister expect to obtain by this change ?

Mr. FOSTER. I do not calculate to receive any increase whatever.

Mr. BORDEN. Then what is the object of making the change ? The hon. gentleman includes with patent and proprietary medicines most of the drugs and official remedies used in the practice of medicine, and increases them to 25 and 50 per cent. How does the hon. gentleman do that, and at the same time expect not to obtain any increase of revenue ? It is evident the hon. gentleman does not know the effect of this change, and has not given it that attention which it deserves.

Mr. WALLACE. Drugmen of experience have expressed satisfaction with the new classification, which has hitherto not been very clear and has caused contention between importers and the Customs Department, and has also resulted in various classifications being made at different ports. Under the new classification and wording these disagreements will disappear and there will be uniformity at all ports ; at the same time we do not expect an increase in the revenue. Men of long experience in the drug business have expressed their entire satisfaction with the change, which they would not have done if it had not been satisfactory to them, to the retail drug trade and to the medical men.

Mr. BORDEN. The hon. gentleman has removed a large class of articles which came in under the 20 per cent list and placed them under higher duties.

Mr. WALLACE. Name an article.

Mr. BORDEN. The hon. gentleman will find that last year drugs imported under the heading, "other drugs not provided for" were of the value of $228,000, and the hon. gentleman proposes to surmount his difficulties by taking the articles from that classification and increasing the duty to 25 per cent on solids and 50 per cent on liquids. Why should he charge 50 per cent upon liquids and 25 per cent upon solids ?

Mr. WALLACE. We have asked you to name one of these articles which you refer to.

Mr. BORDEN. I name calomel as one.

Mr. WALLACE. Calomel is a drug and will come in at 20 per cent as before.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Are all these mentioned in this class medicinal preparations?

Mr. WALLACE. Yes.

Mr. BORDEN. I will read the clause of a letter referring to this, that I have received from perhaps the largest drug firm in the city of Halifax.

It seems to us that the Customs officials for the purpose of putting an end to disputes and protests and saving themselves further trouble in construing the tariff on medicines, have taken the heroic course of applying the patent medicine duties to all medicines whatsoever. It was not perhaps meant to apply these duties to such drugs and medicines as calomel, castor oil, creosote, and camphor, but the new tariff, as worded, undoubtedly does include all of these and a host of others, and already the collector here is demanding 25 per cent duty on mercurial ointment and 50 per cent on liquor ferri. If this tariff becomes law as introduced we shall be left to the discretions and rulings of the department for any abatement of such claims. We think that the duties of 25 and 50 per cent ought to apply only to secret and patent medicines, and that the right way to avoid doubts and disputes as to the meaning of the tariff is to make the definition perfectly clear by limiting it to such medicines the composition of which is kept secret or the name of which is patented. All the well known patent medicines are examples of the former and antipyrine and lactopeptine of the latter class.

Could the hon. gentleman tell what is the duty on antipyrine and lactopeptine under this tariff?

Mr. WALLACE. The articles that the hon. gentleman names were the ones that we had the greatest difficulty in classifying before, and we will have to give departmental rulings that will be carefully considered, because you cannot draw the line at a moment's notice on these articles. We will give the ruling, and instructions will be sent to all the ports so that the matter will be uniform.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Under this clause will such an article as quinine be taxed 50 per cent?

Mr. WALLACE. It cannot be taxed 50 per cent because it is not a liquid. At all events, quinine is free. Articles of that kind not on the free list are 20 per cent.

Mr. SPROULE. Lacto peptine is a proprietary medicine, and it would plainly come under a specific duty.

Mr. BORDEN. What about pepsin?

Mr. SPROULE. That is not a proprietary medicine.

Mr. STAIRS. This matter ought to be considered more carefully by the Controller of Customs and the Minister of Finance. I believe that the language in this resolution is much broader than they intended, and when the Controller comes to give the departmental decisions to which he has just referred, he will find that under the language of the clause he will have to put a great many staple drugs in at 25 per cent for solids and 50 per cent for liquids; drugs of the class described by the hon. member for King's (Mr. Borden). It would be almost better if they could drop some of the words in that resolution which make it so broad. I feel confident that it is not the intention of Parliament to put a tax of 50 per cent on ordinary liquid drugs. It may be all right in the case of patent medicines which contain a great deal of alcohol that they should pay a pretty high duty, but it is not desirable by any means that staple drugs should pay either 25 or 50 per cent. I would suggest to the Finance Minister that he should give this matter a little more consideration and see if he cannot drop out some of these words which make the language of the resolution so very broad.

Mr. FOSTER. We have been looking into this thing, and as the Controller of Customs says, some of the best druggists that we have in the Dominion, who were consulted when the item was made out, with whom we had very full conversation with reference to it, and from whom we took suggestions, have stated since the tariff was published that they are satisfied with it. We have heard from the same gentleman who wrote to the hon. member (Mr. Borden), but I am inclined to think that when the free list is completed it will be found that there will not be any difficulty in this case. I would suggest that we would let the clause pass for the present; we will not lose sight of it, and we will take it up again. We have written especially to other druggists to get their opinion in regard to it.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The better way is to reserve it.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The Controller has stated that the department would fix the amount of taxation on these different drugs. That is not a proper thing. Parliament should fix the rate of taxation and the Government can make regulations carrying into effect the decision of Parliament. I do not think it is a proper thing at all to leave a Minister to determine what tax any particular article shall bear.

Mr. BORDEN. The Controller of Customs pointed out that one of the advantages of this change in the tariff was that he was going to take out of the range of doubt a very large number of drugs about which the department had a great deal of difficulty. Now he proposes a plan by which he will only get into further difficulty in regard to them. I am not quite satisfied with regard to glycerine. Will the hon. gentleman tell me exactly what the rate of duty on glycerine is, because these people seem to be under the impression that it is 50 per cent?

Mr. WALLACE. It is 20 per cent, the same as vaseline, under the similitude clause. Vaseline and glycerine will come under the same classification, at 35 per cent.

Mr. STAIRS. I do not see how the hon. Controller can put glycerine in the same category as vaseline, as there is a great difference between the two.

Mr. WALLACE. I may be mistaken. I will make further inquiry.

Mr. BORDEN. The hon. gentleman told me first that glycerine belonged to the same class as vaseline—this hon. gentleman who has given so much careful investigation to drugs—then that the duty was 20 per cent, next that it was 35 per cent, and now he does not know what it is. So that it is very likely that the druggists in Halifax know more about their business than the Controller, and when they state that they are being charged to-day at the rate of 50 per cent on glycerine, they are probably stating a fact. Last year we were paying $10,000 in duty on glycerine alone, which was equal to 20 per cent on the value of the glycerine imported; and this would mean that on the same importation next year the duty collected, instead of being $10,000, would be $25,000. This, I think, shows at once that, so far as this branch of the tariff is concerned, at any rate, the hon. gentlemen have not made the investigation that they ought to have made. I am perfectly certain, from the information that I have received, that the effect of this change in the tariff will be to increase the duty on the sick man's medicine from 20 per cent up to a point ranging from 25 to 50 per cent. It is carrying the system of taxation or protection or development, or whatever they choose to call it, to rather an extreme point, when they attack the sick man in his bed, and double the taxation on his remedies.

Mr. FOSTER. It is the doctor who attacks the sick man in his bed.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What the hon. gentleman wants to do is to discourage the indiscriminate use of medicine, which is quite in accord with the grandmotherly regards that runs through this whole tariff.

Mr. WALLACE. Without looking into the matter, I thought glycerine was in the same classification as vaseline, and would pay 35 per cent. I find that glycerine is now in the unenumerated list of drugs at 20 per cent, and it remains in the same classification, and at the same rate.

Mr. BORDEN. I understood the hon. gentleman to say that tincture of iron was at 20 per cent. Is that correct?

Mr. WALLACE. I misunderstood the hon. gentleman. Tinctures have always been at 50 per cent. The reason was perhaps that given by the hon. member for Halifax, that in articles of that kind there is a great deal of alcohol.

Mr. BORDEN. Before this item is passed, I might read a suggestion which is made by these druggists, who have given a good deal of attention to the subject. It is that these words should be added to this resolution:

Composed of two or more ingredients compounded together by art of the apothecary, but not to apply to definite chemical substances or compounds, unmixed.

Committee rose and reported progress.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 12 o'clock (midnight).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, 25th April, 1894.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call the attention of the House at this early stage of its proceedings to a matter which I humbly think affects the privileges of the House. First of all, as a basis of what I have to say upon the subject, I would call the attention of the House to a portion of the proceedings on Monday last on a motion made by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) for certain papers relating to trade and commerce between the United States and Canada. In the course of the debate on that motion, and near its close, there was an occasion on which Mr. Speaker thought it his duty to call to order a member who was addressing the House. I do not wish to enter into the particulars of the discussion with which that debate concluded, but in order to explain what I wish to say to the House, it is my duty to refer to one portion of it. The hon. member for Grey (Mr. Lauderkin) was discussing the motion of the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), and Mr. Speaker, as will be seen by column 1866 of 'Hansard,' thought it necessary to suggest that that hon. member should confine himself to the subject before the House. The hon. member (Mr. Lauderkin) seemed to entertain a different opinion, and Mr. Speaker found it necessary on two occasions afterwards to call him to order; but to give the hon. gentleman (Mr. Landerkin) greater freedom of discussion, a motion was made to adjourn the House. That was, of course, under the practice of this House, out of order; first of all, because the hon. member for Grey (Mr. Landerkin) had the floor, and no member could intervene with a motion to adjourn the House while he was addressing the House; but more particularly, because in accordance with the well established rule and usage of Parliament it would have been quite impossible to entertain a motion to adjourn the House and thereby enable an hon. member to have greater freedom of discussion than he would have in debating the question which was before the House at the time the adjournment of the House was moved. If an hon. member were, for example, not confining himself to the question before the House at that time, to make a motion to adjourn the House, that would not put him in order. For these reasons: for the reason at all events that the adjournment of the House being moved would not give greater latitude to the hon. gentleman, that motion was ruled out of order. I refrain from quoting the subsequent debate in order not to dwell too much upon the particular features of that discussion, because I do not base what I am going to say and what I am going to do upon the details of that discussion alone. On two subsequent occasions Mr. Speaker found it his duty to call the hon. gentleman to order, more especially at one part of the debate in which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Landerkin) was not only not discussing the question before the House; not only referring to a past matter of a different character altogether and entirely irrelevant to the matter under discussion, but in which he appeared to impute treasonable motives and dispositions to a member of this House. I have said, and I beg to repeat, that I do not wish to enter again into the details of that discussion. I merely recite briefly the substance of what took place upon that occasion for the purpose of introducing what I desire to say now. On the following day a publication was made in this city commenting upon the incidents which I have mentioned as having occurred in this House on Monday evening. I think I have a duty to the House, and I think there is a duty on the part of the House in relation to the authority of Mr. Speaker—I think it my duty at any rate to call the attention of the House to that publication as being a gross breach of the privileges of this House. I beg to say that the publication I refer to was made in a paper called the Ottawa 'Free Press,' on Tuesday evening, April 24th, and it goes the length of imputing to the Speaker of this House the grossest partisanship in connection with his ruling on the Monday evening previous. The article which I refer to, and which, in order to conform to the precedents established in this House I will have to ask to have read at the Table; is this:

Sir JOHN THOMPSON.

It is evident from the proceedings in the House of Commons yesterday evening that the Reformers need not expect fair or even decent treatment from the present Speaker. The Ministers have, it seems, decided not only to use their partisan majority to prevent inquiry by parliamentary committees, but they propose to utilize a subservient presiding officer to burk free discussion in Parliament. The gag is to be applied whenever a Liberal member says anything, even in self-defence, which is calculated to disturb the sensitive nerves of the Thompsonian ministers. Since the present session began Speaker White has gone out of his way to prove himself before all things a Tory partisan, and the Reformers should recognize that fact and govern themselves accordingly. If the House of Commons is to be transformed into a bear garden upon the partisan Speaker must rest the responsibility. His conduct in rushing to the rescue of the Controller of Customs last night, after the latter had made himself as offensive as he could, ought to be fully discussed when the House is in committee passing the salary of its Speaker. It is only a few days since Speaker White appeared as principal orator at the convention of North Renfrew Tories called to nominate a candidate for the Ontario Assembly. Fancy "the first commoner" of Canada acting as a partisan heeler in a local election campaign.

The proceedings referred to were the proceedings of Monday, the comment which I believe to be a breach of the privileges of this House occurred last night, and my motion is made at the earliest time it could possibly be made. All authorities writing on the privileges of Parliament declare that it is a breach of the privileges of the House, unfairly to attack and unfairly to ascribe motives to any member of the House. The House has already, on at least two occasions, treated as grave breaches of privilege attacks which were made on its members. On one occasion, it will be in the memory of those at all acquainted with the proceedings of the House, an officer who was believed to have been the writer of an article aspersing members of the House, was called to the bar here, and it having been established that he was the author of the article in question, or the responsible publisher of the paper in which the article appeared, he was, by resolution passed by the House, I believe unanimously, dismissed at the bar of this House from his office. On a subsequent occasion, I dare say it will be in the memory of most of the members of this House here to-day, a member of the House published in a newspaper appearing in a distant part of the country, an attack which impugned the motives and assailed the conduct of a number of members of the House, and upon that occasion the House passed a resolution declaring that it was a false, scandalous and malicious libel, and an interference with the authority and jurisdiction of the House itself. Those precedents—if I am right in the opinion I have formed on this subject—followed the English practice pretty closely as regards procedure in matters of this kind. But the precedents are abundant, in the action of the House of Commons in Great Britain, whose example we attempt to follow, for treating as matters of high contempt and disregard of the privileges of this House, an attack on the conduct and motives of its members. But if that be, as I contend, the well-settled law and practice of Parliament with regard to its members how much more is it a breach of the privileges of the House and a contempt of its authority, that the head of the House should be assailed in language of the grossest character, such as that to which I have called attention, which not only assails the conduct of Mr. Speaker as to fairness and impartiality, but attacks him in the vilest language that the editor could inscribe upon his pages. I think, Sir, there is nothing connected with the institution of Parliament itself, whether in this country or in the mother land, which has contributed more largely to the dignity, the authority and the public respect for Parliament than the absolute unity of both parties in Parliament to sustain the authority and the dignity of the head of the House. There is nothing more striking to those who study parliamentary institutions than to see how public men in the Parliament of Great Britain, for example, rally to the support of the Chair the instant the decision of the Chair has been pronounced. Nobody supposes that the head of the House of Commons, whether in Great Britain or elsewhere, is infallible. It is but human that he should err sometimes; but it is absolutely forbidden by the law of Parliament, and absolutely unknown in the practice of Parliament, that his motives should be assailed, or that impropriety and partisanship should be attributed to him as the causes from which his decision has sprung. That, I think, Sir, is dictated, not merely by a sense of courtesy on the part of both sides of the House, but with a view to self-preservation—with a view to the fact that without the sustenance of the authority of the Chair and the dignity of the head of the House, it is absolutely impossible that free discussion shall be carried on at all, or that parliamentary institutions shall continue to receive the respect of the public. Nothing can possibly prevent the lapsing of a House, such as this, into disorder and disregard of the rules of debate, and disregard of the amenities which ought to prevail between members of the House in their debates—nothing can save from destruction the safeguards for preserving the rights of the House and its members unless the authority of the Chair is implicitly obeyed and implicitly respected. Now, Sir, I am of opinion—and I only express it here for the purpose of waiving a contention which I might make on this question—that Mr. Speaker's decision on that occasion was absolutely unassailable. But I do not rest the proposition which I intend now to make to the House on the question whether the decision of Mr. Speaker was right or wrong. The constitution of this Parliament provides ample redress whenever Mr. Speaker is wrong. The constitution of this House provides that whenever Mr. Speaker is wrong we shall have the decision in our own hands. It is not that a member shall rise and attack the decision of the Chair; it is not that we shall asperse the motives of Mr. Speaker; but it is that a vote of this House shall be taken as to whether Mr. Speaker is right or whether he is wrong. But the thing which is absolutely forbidden, on the principle of the self-preservation of Parliament, is that Mr. Speaker's decision shall be disobeyed, or that the motives which induced him to come to that decision shall be regarded or stigmatized as partisan either here or in any other part of the country. I feel, therefore, Mr. Speaker, that when an attack of that kind is made upon the head of the House, when the most diabolical partisanship is attributed to him, and when other instances are pretending to be referred to as indicating and corroborating his partisanship, I feel that that is not only insulting to the head of the House, but is particularly insulting to the House itself. It is derogatory to its dignity, and is calculated to impair its usefulness. Affecting as I believe it does the privileges of the House of Commons, it is amply within the power of this House to deal with the offender who so violates its authority and jurisdiction. But on this occasion, and on such occasions it would be my own inclination—and perhaps I am warranted in thinking that it would be more suitable to the inclination of Mr. Speaker himself—that the House should not search for opportunities to visit with punishment the man who so betrays the liberty of the press and degrades the authority of this House. It is not so important that that should be done as that the House itself should express its opinion upon conduct of that kind. The public opinion of this country is not so easily influenced that a wanton partisan attack shall destroy the character of any man, much less that of the Speaker of this House; but when a ruling by the Chair is declared to have been wrong and corrupt, and when motives of partisanship are attributed to Mr. Speaker, I think the House owes it to itself to express its own opinion on the matter, and that is what I propose that the House shall do this afternoon. That is of the more importance, and indeed the rules which preserve the order and dignity and decorum of this House are of the more importance, because it is impossible for Mr. Speaker to vindicate himself on occasions of this kind. Mr. Speaker's position in the Chair is one of such dignity, his position is one of such authority and of such a judicial character, as regards the bearing which he there manifests to each side of the House, that it is impossible that, either on the floor of the House, from the place where he sits, or at a public meeting, or elsewhere, he shall have the opportunities of self-vindication which are ours as public men. We can defend ourselves here against aspersions. We can defend ourselves before the public, and, if we please, in the press; but Mr. Speaker has to consider at all times the dignity due to his office, and he has to leave therefore in the hands of this House, necessarily from his high position, his vindication from an attack of this character. I think that the House should not be slow, on this occasion, to give that vindication. I beg to ask, therefore, before making a motion on the subject, that the article I refer to shall be read by the Clerk of the House.

The Clerk of the House read the article, which appeared in the 'Free Press,' of Ottawa, on the 24th of April, 1894, and which was quoted by the Right Honourable the First Minister (page 1960).

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I shall proceed to read the general terms of the authority under which I am calling the attention of this House to the question this afternoon. On page 240 of Dr. Bourinot's book, this appears :

Any scandalous and libellous reflections on the proceedings of the House is a high breach of the privileges of Parliament. So, libels or reflections upon members individually have also been considered as breaches of privilege which may be censured or punished by the House; but it is distinctly laid down by all the authorities: To constitute a breach of privilege such libels must concern the character or conduct of members in that capacity. Aspersions against the conduct of members as magistrates or officers in the army or navy, or as counsel, or employers of labour, or in private life, are within the cognizance of the courts, and are not fit subjects for complaint to the House.

I have but to repeat that aspersions upon the character of the Speaker of the House itself, are infinitely more derogatory to the dignity of the House, and call with infinitely louder force for the censure of the House, than aspersions upon the conduct and methods of individual members of the House. I therefore beg to move :

That the article published in the Ottawa 'Free Press' dated the 24th April, 1894, is a scandalous, false and malicious libel upon the honour, character and integrity of the Speaker of this House and a contempt of the privileges and the constitutional authority of this House.

Mr. LAURIER. I am disposed, to a very large extent, to agree with the principles which have been laid down by the right hon. the First Minister, as to the necessity of upholding the honour of the head of the House. In this I would indeed go further than he has gone, and I would add that it is equally imperative to do everything that should be done in order to preserve the dignity of the House by maintaining the character of its individual members,

Sir JOHN THOMPSON.

when attacked in the press. I am not sure, however, that I am ready to subscribe to the whole doctrine which has been laid down in the motion before the House. A part of the article which is incriminated refers, not to Mr. Speaker White, but to Mr. Peter White, a member of the House of Commons, who was, in his private capacity, at a public meeting, taking a certain part therein. As to the language of the article, in so far as the action of Mr. Peter White at that public meeting is concerned, I do not believe that the motion before us can apply to that at all. Of course, I will go as far as anybody in maintaining the privileges and the character of Mr. Speaker in the discharge of his duties when in the House. I will say more. The First Minister stated, a few moments ago, that it is impossible to expect that a Speaker, in the discharge of the duties he has to perform—no matter who may fill that position—will not sometimes commit an error. But even if he should commit an error—if I, for instance, would be disposed to believe that Mr. Speaker had given a wrong decision and thought the matter of any moment at all, I would take the action suggested by the Prime Minister of calling the attention of the House to it, and endeavour to have redress at the hands of the House. But if the matter were a mere trifling one, such as Mr. Speaker has often to dispose of, even if my judgment differed from that of Mr. Speaker, I would still give him all the respect which his position calls for. I say that the motion goes too far in impugning the whole article, because the article incriminated applies not only to the Speaker of the House—and so far as it does, I have at this moment nothing to say—but it applies also to Mr. White, a member of the House and of the Conservative party, who took part in the proceedings of a Conservative meeting, and so far I think the censure moved now cannot apply. Now, with regard to the other part which affects the character of the Speaker as Speaker, I have only this to say: I believe that the House would not be called upon to dispose of this matter at this time, that the Prime Minister would not have the painful duty—for a painful duty it must be to move censure upon a newspaper—if, in the past, the House had taken more care of its own dignity. But, I am sorry to say and the facts will be in the remembrance of hon. gentlemen of this House—that, though upon some occasions the House has taken cognizance of injuries and insults to some of its members, yet, upon other occasions the House has shown a singular leniency in the case of similar insults that have been proffered under different circumstances. It will be within the recollection of every member of this House that, upon a certain occasion a gentleman who had held a distinguished position in this Parliament, and, who had previously held a distinguished position in the Legislature of his own province—the late Mr. Vail—was bitterly and wantonly assailed and insulted in the columns of a newspaper—if I remember well in the 'Mail' newspaper in the city of Toronto—and, though the matter was brought to the notice of the House, no action was taken upon it. There is a still more flagrant example. A distinguished member of this House, the late Mr. Huntington, was insulted upon the very floor of this Chamber; and, though the House took action upon the matter and brought the offender to the bar of the House, yet it refused to pass censure upon him: If, upon these occasions, the House had done its duty and passed sentence upon these offenders and had thus asserted its own dignity, I believe that the painful duty which the Prime Minister is called upon to perform would not be required of him to-day. If the press generally had been taught this lesson—that no insult offered to any member of this House, whether high or low, would pass unnoticed, the press would have been more careful in its comments. But I believe it is within the knowledge of every one, that articles as offensive to some members of the House as this may be are daily scribbled and published in the newspapers, and no notice is taken of them. Therefore, I think this motion goes too far to have the absolute concurrence of the whole House. If the hon. gentleman would confine his motion to the attack upon Mr. Speaker as Mr. Speaker, I would be disposed to view it in a different light from that in which I now view it.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I am unable to agree with the hon. gentleman in the distinction which he would draw as between the closing portion of the article and the other parts of it, because, as the hon. gentleman will see upon careful perusal, the attack as to the meeting is made to fortify the charge against Mr. Speaker, as Mr. Speaker, as another proof of the Speaker's partisanship and another reason why neither the public nor the House shall feel any confidence in the Speaker's fairness.

Motion agreed to, on division.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS.

Mr. LAURIER. Before you pass to the item of introduction of Bills, Mr. Speaker, I would like to call the attention of the right hon. leader of the House to the fact that it was understood yesterday that we were to take up to-day the third report of the Committee on Public Accounts.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I quite agree with the hon. gentleman and think the matter should be brought up at once.

Mr. LAURIER moved :

That the third report of the Select Standing Committee on Public Accounts be now taken into consideration.

Motion agreed to.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I hope, Mr. Speaker, that, acting in the spirit in which this subject was considered on the last occasion, the House will occupy but a very short portion of the present sitting in considering the matter. An understanding across the floor of the House was then reached that the points which had been in difference between hon. members in the committee and in this House should be settled, and the modus vivendi as it was called was to be in the form of a Bill. The Prime Minister stated the general lines of that proposed measure, and those lines met with the general acceptance of this House. I think it would be idle and a waste of time to further fight out any of the questions that have formed the subjects of discussion hitherto; but, acting on that expression of opinion which seemed almost unanimous, I propose, as a solution of the present questions in connection with the subject, that this House should pass a resolution which I shall move. I trust that the resolution will meet the views of all who are interested in either this special report or the general question; and, without further discussion or argument, but merely alluding to the arguments that have already taken place and the amendment proposed, I would move :

That this House having evinced a desire that the law and practice of Parliament respecting the examination of witnesses before committees should be amended in order to give power to the committees of this House to examine witnesses under oath: therefore the Standing Committee on Public Accounts be authorized to examine under oath Joseph Pope and other witnesses respecting the Behring Sea Arbitration accounts.

Mr. LAURIER. Mr. Speaker, it is a recognized mathematical truth that the shortest route between two points is a straight line. My hon. friend, instead of taking the direct route prefers to take the crooked one. However, I do not care how we reach the goal, provided we get to it, and therefore, I have only to offer him my congratulations upon his gracious surrender on this point, and to say that I accept the motion.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I am sorry it is a crooked path that leads towards the hon. gentleman's views.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman has imitated Colonel Crockett's coon, he has come down.

Mr. MULOCK. He only came down after firing, not before it.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The Minister of Marine and Fisheries has made a confession and got absolution, and I would suggest that the Minister of Finance do likewise.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. This is an unexpected way of receiving the motion, considering that the proposition is virtually what hon. gentlemen opposite made yesterday afternoon. What we propose to do now is done in consequence of the agreement practically arrived at by the House, that the law should be amended, and that the House now agrees to apply the principle of the amendment to current proceedings. The House does that, not as a surrender, not as a coming down at all, but in vindication of that principle for which we have contended all along, that we could give no general authority to examine witnesses to the committee, and did not do so, but will proceed to do so in a particular case.

Mr. LANDERKIN. The hon. gentlemen told us it was against the constitution and they could not do it. How have they amended the constitution since?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon, I never said so.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I beg his pardon, he was not at the committee, but his colleagues were at the committee.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The question of legality was only as to giving general powers, or giving general directions to the committee, and not in particular cases.

Mr. LANDERKIN. But I want to draw the First Minister's attention to it so that he will see that the constitution is amended, in order that there may be no difficulty hereafter.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The hon. gentleman cannot tell me what took place upstairs.

Motion agreed to.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 94) to amend the Winding-up Act, Chapter 129 Revised Statutes.—(Mr. Stairs.)

TIGNISH BREAKWATER.

Mr. YEO (for Mr. Perry) asked, Was the putting up of a weather signal at Tignish Breakwater, Prince Edward Island, let by tender? If so, was the lowest tender accepted? What is the name of the person to whom the contract was given? What is the amount of contract? If done by private contract, who was the contractor? What is the cost of the same? Who has charge of the said signal? What is the yearly cost of maintaining the same, including keeper's salary?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. After Mr. Stupart, an officer of the meteorological service, had visited Tignish, the contract was given to Mr. Gallant, he having been recommended to the inspector as the only man who would do the work satisfactorily. The cost of erecting the signal-mast was $100. Mr. George Conroy is the officer in charge of signal-mast—salary, $45 per annum.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON.

FAST STEAMSHIP SERVICE.

Mr. LAURIER asked, 1. When and with whom was the contract made of which the Minister of Public Works spoke on Monday last as follows:—

The Government have resolved to ask Parliament, as has been announced, to ratify a contract that has been made with a firm for a fast service between a Canadian port and an English port?

2. What are the conditions of that contract?
3. Is it the intention of the Government to lay such contract at once on the Table of the House?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The words which the hon. gentleman has quoted, refer no doubt to some negotiations which took place with Mr. Huddart, of Australia, on the subject of an improved steam service on the Atlantic. The expression which is quoted might seem to imply that a formal contract had been entered into. All that can be said on the subject is that the correspondence contains what may be considered a provisional agreement, and that will be produced when the Bill on that subject is brought before Parliament, or at an earlier day if the House asks for it. I may say that the negotiations on that subject are not entirely concluded, and it will be more satisfactory that the correspondence should not be brought down until the measure relating to that service is introduced.

INQUIRIES—APPOINTMENT OF STENOGRAPHER.

Mr. LANDERKIN asked, Was a secretary appointed to the members of the Cabinet, or to the Controllers, who visited various parts of the Dominion during the recess as to the tariff changes? If so, what is his name? Was he a stenographer? Did he take notes of the proceedings in whole or in part of said meetings? Were type-written copies of said notes made?

Mr. FOSTER. I have to answer the first of that series of questions, in the negative, and of course that answer being in the negative, the other questions drop.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Was there no stenographer? The question is not dropped until it is answered.

Mr. FOSTER. I submit that I answered the question fairly.

Mr. LANDERKIN. You said it dropped.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman might address the Speaker.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Mr. Speaker, I am not satisfied. No answer has been given to the question, and unless we get an answer, I am not going to be satisfied.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman must know that under the rules of the House no discussion can take place.

FISHING WITH GILL-NETS.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (for Mr. Lister) asked, Is there any regulation as to the size of the mesh for gill-nets? If so, what is it? Will such regulation continue in force during the present season?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The conditions in the fishery licenses for Ontario are, that whitefish and salmon-trout gill-nets shall have meshes of four and a half inches extension measure; herring gill-nets, three inches; sturgeon gill-nets, twelve inches. They will be enforced during the present season.

LIMITS IN SHELL RIVER DISTRICT.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (for Mr. Lister) asked, Has the Government been paid all rent owing by the firm of Shields, Haggert & Company, for limits 14, 15, 15a, 23, 25 and 25a, Shell River district? If so, when was the amount paid? What amount was paid? What, if any, amount was paid for interest on arrears of rent, and when?

Mr. DALY. 1. Not all the rent. 2. As already stated, all the rent has not been paid. 3. $2,179.06. 4. The amount mentioned included interest on arrears. Limits 25 and 25a have been fully paid for, principal and interest, up to 31st March, 1886, and the remainder up to 1st January, 1887. The ownership of this property was for several years in litigation, and the parties to this litigation applied from time to time to the Department of Interior to be permitted to postpone payment until the matters in dispute had been settled. Finally the interests of all the parties were sold by order of the court, subject to the amounts due to the Crown, the purchaser being Mr. Alexander Ferguson, of Ottawa, who has paid $5,000 on account, and intimates his readiness to pay the balance of about $2,000 as soon as he can complete the title to the property.

GOVERNMENT DOCK AT HILTON.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (for Mr. Lister) asked, When was the Government dock at Hilton completed? Did the Government acquire the title to the property before constructing such dock? If not, was any agreement in writing entered into with the owners of the land which entitles the Government to insist on a conveyance of the same? Has an application been made to the owners of the land to convey such land to the Government? Was such application in writing? When was it made? What reply was given to such application?

Mr. OUMET. The portion of the dock constructed by the Government was completed on November 30th, 1887. The Hilton wharf was private property, but strong representations were made to the department by a petition of December 27th, 1884, that, owing to difficulty in navigation by night in the River Ste. Marie, steamers going to Sault Ste. Marie had to lay over night at Eilton; that the wharf at that place was too limited in extent to afford sufficient shelter to those boats, and that the anchorage was not good, the water in the vicinity being deep, and rocks dangerous. The private owners were not in a position, and did not need to extend their wharf for their business, especially as they did not charge anything for vessels lying at the dock. The rest of the question must be answered in the negative.

BRAE HARBOUR, P. E. I.

Mr. YEO asked, Has any work been done to the pier or breakwater at Brae Harbour, Prince County, Prince Edward Island, since April, 1893? If so, what is the nature of the work? Was it let by public or private contract? What was the cost? Who performed the work, and what was paid for inspecting said work?

Mr. OUMET. The amount of $100, authorized in October last for repairs to Brae Harbour, has been expended this spring, under the foremanship of A. McKinnon. No returns have yet reached the department. The work consisted in placing fender piles for the protection of the breakwaters from running ice.

TARIFF INQUIRIES.

Mr. CASEY asked, What has been the total cost to date of the inquiry conducted by members of the Government in regard to tariff changes, by means of meetings held throughout the country?

Mr. FOSTER. The inquiries into the tariff were conducted by the Ministers or the Controllers, and the secretary of one or the other was with the Ministers at the places where inquiries were carried on. So no special expenses were incurred; they were simply the travelling expenses of the Ministers and the secretary. The cost has not been totalled up, and it is not usual to give the travelling expenses of Ministers, which are paid out of the contingencies of the department.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Whose secretary was Mr. Payne?

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Payne was secretary of the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. LAVERGNE asked, Whether the Government are aware that the great majority of the ratepayers of the province of Quebec are in favour of a total repeal of the duties on coal oil, or for a reduction of 50 per cent at the least?

Mr. FOSTER. As I do not know all the ratepayers, or even a majority of them, in the province of Quebec, I am obliged to answer that question in the negative.

Mr. LAVERGNE asked, Are the Government aware that all the farmers of the Province of Quebec are in favour of the complete removal of the duties on farm implements and on Indian corn?

Mr. FOSTER. The same answer as the preceding one.

Mr. LAVERGNE asked, What places in the province of Quebec and in the province of Ontario did the Controller of Inland Revenue visit, since the last session of Parliament, with a view to inquire into the expediency of making alterations in the tariff of Customs, and with a view to the legislation proposed to be carried out, this session, in that behalf?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). The Controller of Inland Revenue visited the following places in the province of Ontario during the past recess in connection with the inquiries re tariff changes:—Cornwall, Lindsay, Markham, Markdale, St. Catharines, Chatham, Barrie, Belleville, Napanee, Gananoque. He did not visit any places in the province of Quebec.

Mr. LAVERGNE asked, What places in the province of Quebec and in the province of Ontario did the Minister of Agriculture visit, since the last session of Parliament, in order to inquire into the expediency of making alterations in the Customs tariff, and with a view to the legislation proposed to be effected in that behalf during the present session?

Mr. FOSTER. During the summer the Minister of Agriculture, accompanied by the Finance Minister and the Controller of Customs, visited Montreal and Quebec, Toronto and Hamilton, where inquiries were made in relation to the question of amending the tariff.

Mr. LAVERGNE asked, What places in the province of Quebec and in the province of Ontario did the Controller of Customs visit, since last session, with a view to inquire into the expediency of making alterations in the tariff of Customs, and with a view to the proposed legislation in that behalf during the present session?

Mr. WALLACE. Cornwall, Lindsay, Markham, Markdale, St. Catharines, Chatham, Barrie, Belleville, Napanee.

Mr. LAVERGNE asked, What places in the province of Quebec and in the province of Ontario did the Minister of Finance visit, since the last session of Parliament, with a view to inquire into the expediency of making alterations in the tariff of Customs, and with a view to the legislation proposed in that behalf during this session?

Mr. FOSTER. Montreal and Quebec City, in the province of Quebec, and Hamilton and Toronto in the province of Ontario.

COLLECTORS OF CUSTOMS ON THE FRONTIER.

Mr. EDGAR asked, Are the collectors of customs on the frontier of the United States permitted to engage in the buying and selling, or otherwise dealing in farm or dairy produce, either for themselves or as agents for others?

Mr. WALLACE. Not if their salary is $1,000, or over. As regards a collector having a salary less than $1,000 per annum, selling or otherwise dealing in farm or dairy produce, the only case that has been brought to my attention or the attention of the department, was one where such transactions appeared to conflict with his duties as an officer of the Customs Department, and I directed that he should desist carrying on such business.

Mr. EDGAR. At what place?

Mr. WALLACE. At Potton, in the province of Quebec.

INDUSTRIES IN GUYSBORO'.

Mr. FRASER asked, What is the description of each of the industries established in the county of Guysboro'? What are the names of the several manufacturers in the said county? What is the number of employees in each of said industries?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I will have to ask the hon. gentleman to move for a return for that.

Mr. FRASER. It is so small it will only take a few words to answer.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I do not think that anything the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fraser) is connected with could be at all small.

INDUSTRIES IN NORTH YORK.

Mr. MULOCK. I would remind the Finance Minister that a return ordered last session showing the industries and occupations of those engaged in the various municipalities in the riding of North York, has not yet been brought down.

Mr. FOSTER. I will make a note of that.

ST. ANDREW'S RAPIDS, MANITOBA.

Mr. MARTIN moved for:

Orders in Council, correspondence, instructions to officers of the Department of Public Works, and reports of such officers respecting the improvement of St. Andrew's Rapids in the Red River of the North.

He said: This motion is for the purpose of getting information, and also in order to bring before the House for its consideration, a very important matter affecting the city of Winnipeg. For many years the improvement of the navigation of the Red River has been discussed in the province of Manitoba. The question has always been before the people at the time of an election, and invariably the Government candidate has promised to secure from the Government an appropriation for the purpose of carrying out this improvement. The Red River, as the House is aware, runs in a northerly direction, and a portion of it connects the province of Manitoba through which it passes with Lake Winnipeg. The natural resources of Lake Winnipeg are very considerable. Along the shores of that lake are found large deposits of very fine building stone, and there is also a very large supply of timber suitable for firewood. One of the questions which has engaged the consideration of the people of Manitoba, and of those generally interested in the province, is the question of fuel supply. On account of our long winters that question is a most important one. Unfortunately there is no supply of fuel close to the city of Winnipeg, and at present this firewood has to be brought in, either from the country to the east by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, or from the country around Portage la Prairie, south of the Assiniboia River, which is heavily timbered, and from which the fuel is brought to Winnipeg on the newly constructed Northern Pacific Railway. Advantage has been taken of almost every visit that our province has received from members of this Government to lay before them the importance of this question, and I may say that very strong promises have been made by Ministers of the Crown on behalf of the Government that this question would receive serious consideration, that engineers would be sent to report upon the practicability of the proposed expenditure, and also make estimates as to its probable cost. However, all these promises have ended in smoke, and so far as the people of the province know, no genuine effort has been made by the Government to give this question any consideration, and no report that has amounted to anything has been made by any officer of the Government. The city of Winnipeg has taken this matter up specially. The board of trade of the city has considered it and dealt with it from time to time, and so also has the city council. The estimate of, I think, the city engineer of Winnipeg is, that the river could be properly improved for an expenditure of about half a million dollars, and it is considered that the saving to the people of Winnipeg on the item of firewood alone would be enormous, in comparison with this comparatively small expenditure. Firewood could be brought from the shores of Lake Winnipeg, in vessels, to the city of Winnipeg and sold for fully $2, and perhaps $3, a cord less than it is now sold. We have to pay in the city of Winnipeg varying prices for firewood, but at no time does the price go lower than from $5 to $6 a cord for soft wood, not hard wood. The expenses, therefore, of the ordinary householder, the poor man, for fuel, is a very large item indeed, and our people are very much interested in this question on that account. If a reasonable expenditure could make this river navigable from the city of Winnipeg to the lake it would be a great boon for the poorer people in connection with firewood alone. But, Mr. Speaker, it is not only in connection with firewood that it would be an advantage to the city of Winnipeg and to the province generally, because there are many industries which could be developed in connection with Lake Winnipeg which are now undeveloped on account of this serious obstruction to navigation. The obstruction consists in rapids in the parish of St. Andrew's, through which the Red River passes. The United States Government have spent very considerable sums of money in improving the navigation of the Red River south of the national boundary, but so far as I am aware, no money whatever has been spent by the Dominion Government in improving the navigation of this river within the province of Manitoba, except possibly in the way of dredging at the mouth of the river; but of that I am not very sure. We find, Mr. Speaker, that other provinces of the confederation have been able to obtain from the Dominion Government the expenditure of large sums of public money because their representatives in this House have insisted upon the province receiving a fair share, and in some instances what appears to us a very unfair share. It has always seemed strange to the people of Manitoba, which has sent almost steadily an almost united contingent supporting the Government of the day, that these members have been unable to obtain for that province the expenditure of any money whatever for public purposes. I know that it is contended that the expenditure in connection with the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway should be charged largely to the province of Manitoba; but I dispute that proposition entirely. The great expenditure for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway through the mountains in British Columbia was of no benefit whatever to the province of Manitoba. The expenditure on that portion of the railway which connects Winnipeg with Lake Superior, was of great advantage to the province of Manitoba; but if the House will consider the large quantity of public lands situated in the province of Manitoba, which really and justly belonged to that province, which were taken and handed over to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company as a portion of their bonus, I think that so far as the construction of that railway is concerned the province has furnished as much as should fairly be chargeable to it in connection with the cost of that great national highway. If we lay aside the question of the money spent on that work, there has been little or no public money spent in the province of Manitoba by the great Department of Public Works, which has had such apparently inexhaustible supplies of public money for expenditure in other provinces. I may say that in Lake Winnipeg there are very large deposits of excellent iron ore, which it has been found impossible so far to develop very largely on account of this obstruction to navigation. Several times arrangements have been completed for having the iron ore taken to points in the United States to be smelted; but in every instance those arrangements have fallen through on account of the impossibility of the iron ore bearing the expense of being freighted by rail from Selkirk, at the foot of Lake Winnipeg, to Winnipeg in order to be taken in barges down the Red River. Under these circumstances, and in view of the frequent promises made to the people of the city of Winnipeg by Ministers of the Crown—not referring at all to the very frequent promises made by candidates in elections in that city—I do think that it is time for the Department of Public Works and the Government generally, to let us know whether they have any intention whatever of dealing with this question. The proposed expenditure, when compared with similar expenditures which have been made in other provinces of the Dominion, is a very small one. It is admitted on all hands that the province of Manitoba has at the present time a very hard row to hoe. The people of that province are to-day placed in unfortunate circumstances. Apart from disputed questions as to the effect of the tariff and the effect of railway rates, the very low prices which are now obtainable for the products of the country, as to which there is no dispute, alone show what an unfortunate position they are placed in; and, therefore, if the Government have any intention whatever of carrying on any expenditure of this kind, which they have from time to time promised to the people there through members of the Government, the present is a most opportune time for them to put into execution those promises. I may say, so far as political matters are concerned, that no promises or suggestions whatever that might be made to the city of Winnipeg by future candidates in the Government interest in regard to this work, would have any effect whatever upon the electors. Year after year and election after election we have trusted to the principle that it is well to have a friend at court; but the people of Winnipeg have found to their sorrow that the friend at court had apparently no influence whatever in these matters. Apparently, the Government were so sure of the support of the members from

Mr. MARTIN.

Winnipeg, and from the constituency of Lisgar, in which this proposed improvement would be situated that they have been able to refuse to carry out their promises. Whether the Government have or have not made any inquiries into this question is not known to our people. While we have had promise after promise that the matter would be looked into, and that as soon as these preliminary inquiries were made the Government would give a definite and final answer, stating what they were prepared to do, we have never received any decisive report or answer from the Government as to what the cost of the improvement would be, or whether they really intended to carry it out or not. For these reasons I have brought the matter before the House.

Mr. OUIMET. Several petitions have been received asking for the improvement of the navigation of Red River at the St. Andrew's Rapids. In answer to these petitions the department gave instructions to their resident engineer, Mr. Gouin, to make a survey and to prepare estimates of the probable cost of the improvement. In 1891 a report was received from that gentleman estimating the cost of constructing two locks and two dams at $635,125. That report, having been placed before the chief engineer, the latter considered that the estimate was too low, and that it would cost $922,000 to carry out the proposed work. Under these circumstances, the department has as yet been unable to find a means of undertaking the improvement. It will be a matter of consideration for the department and the Government to ascertain whether it will be worth the amount of money to be spent to execute the improvement, and if that be found the case, as soon as the country can place at the disposal of the department the amount required to execute the work in question, it will be duly attended to. In the meantime, all these petitions and reports will be placed on the Table at the request of the hon. gentleman.

Mr. MARTIN. Has the hon. Minister any report other than Mr. Gouin's, as to the necessity of there being two locks?

Mr. OUIMET. On the 26th January, 1892, Mr. Hugh John Macdonald, then member for Winnipeg, transmitted to the department a letter from Mr. H. B. Ruttan, city engineer of Winnipeg, in which Mr. Ruttan stated that the estimate of the engineer of the department was too high, and that the work could be done for $500,000. The difference of opinion between Mr. Ruttan's estimate and that of the chief engineer is as to the works necessary to make the improvement adequate for the requirements of navigation in order to open navigation up to Winnipeg. The report of Mr. Ruttan will also be placed before the House.

Motion agreed to.

TIMBER LICENSES.

Mr. CHARLTON moved for :

Statement of all timber licenses granted since 1st January, 1888, showing the date of each grant, the location, the area of the same, the name of the grantee, the bonus, if any, paid upon the same, whether disposed of :—(a.) At public auction duly advertised, where the public were invited to compete ; (b.) At auction where only applicants for the berth or limit were invited to bid ; (c.) By private application ; (d.) If in neither of the ways above mentioned, then stating in what way disposal and grant was made.

Also a summary statement giving total area granted, and total amount of bonuses received.

He said : I shall ask leave to amend this order, by inserting after subsection (d), an additional subsection as follows :—

The length of public notice given in each case when limits are sold, either at public auction or by other form of public competition.

The object, of course, of this amendment is to ascertain whether the Government, in giving notice of sale, have given what would be considered a fair length of notice. The sale of timber limits, to be made advantageously, must, in my opinion, be by public auction, and that after ample notice has been given. A short notice will, of course, prevent intending purchasers, who are not previously apprised of the intention to sell, from making a thorough examination of the property. It is unnecessary to say that timber limits are invariably in the wilderness, not easy of access, and if the first intimation to be given intending purchasers be conveyed by the public notice, it requires a little time on the part of intending purchasers to make their preparations for examination. Men familiar with the lumber trade are perfectly well aware that any public notice, short of three or four months, is utterly insufficient. The object of this motion is to ascertain whether the Government, in giving notice, has given the length of time necessary for making examinations sufficient for intending buyers.

We had a very loose system of managing the timber resources of the Dominion up to 1886. Up to February, 1885, according to the return brought down then, there had been 25,300 square miles of timber lands placed under license. These had been placed, without bonuses having been received in any case. The price was $5 per square mile ; the licenses were placed upon private application ; no tenders invited, and there was no public sale. It was found by return brought down in 1885 that seventeen members of this House and senators had made private applications, in their own behalf, and had received limits at $5 a square mile ; that seven members of the Local Legislature, friends of the Government, had made application in their own names, and had received limits ; that thirty-four applications of members of Parliament for their friends had been made, and that upon these eighty-three licenses had been granted to friends of these members of this House and the Senate ; that twenty-eight applications had been made by members of this House, which were unsuccessful for the reason that some others were ahead and had got the properties under previous application ; and that 102 prominent friends of the Government, in various parts of the Dominion had secured timber limits upon their own application. This was not only a great but a gigantic abuse. If these 25,300 square miles of timber limits granted in this way were valued, it would show a waste of many millions of dollars of the public resources. Fortunately the most valuable licenses were in the disputed territory, and when the title of Ontario to that territory was confirmed the licenses granted in this manner, in disregard of the public interest, lapsed, and these great areas, placed under license by this Government at $5 a square mile, are held under reserve by the Government of Ontario, and unquestionably, in due time, will bring bonuses of many millions of dollars. I allude to these facts, by way of retrospect, to point out the necessity for dealing upon business principles with interests of this kind. The Government is the custodian of the public interest, the timber interests of the Dominion are public property, and it is the duty of the Government, whether in its own behalf or as the guardians of wards, to secure as large a price as it can from the sale of these properties and to take all means that would be dictated by good business principles for the purpose of securing such prices. We have heard it stated that a month is considered sufficient notice. It is not sufficient notice in any case whatever. No property which the Government may intend to bring in the market should be brought into the market at such a short notice. Due notice of the sale of timber limits is not less than four months. The Ontario Government may be justly criticised with regard to some of their sales for not having given such notice. I think that a notice of three months is quite insufficient, although their sales have been very successful. At the last sale in Toronto, one timber berth of 36 square miles brought $32,500 in the township of Morgan. If that berth had been offered for sale by tender it would not have brought one-half that sum. When men meet together in public competition to bid against each other, it is invariably the rule that the prices are relatively high, in many cases double what the same men would have paid if bidding separately, and submitting written tenders. In moving for these returns, and in asking to put in this addition to the motion, I do it for the purpose of ascertaining whether the Government, in the past, has given due notice, and has adopted the course of competition favoured by practical business-men in the lumber trade as likely to secure as high a price as they ought to have received; and to urge that if, in the future, the Government sell properties of any considerable value, unless there be some special reasons for haste, as, for instance, the limits being burnt over, due notice shall be given, and the whole world invited to compete, and invited in sufficient time to enable every person who desires to be a purchaser to examine the property before the sale is held.

Mr. EDWARDS. Mr. Speaker, my only object in rising to speak upon this matter is to endeavour to impress upon the Government the desirability of giving sufficient time for examination in case of selling timber limits, both in the interests of the public, and in the interests of the lumbermen themselves. In a general way timber limits have become very valuable. To-day, the examination of these properties is made with very much more accuracy than was the case some years ago. For this reason, it is desirable that ample time shall be given to examine any timber limits that are put upon the market for sale. As to the time that it is desirable to give, that altogether depends upon the area that is offered. In some instances, three or four months might be sufficient; but, in a great many cases, six months would be required. It is desirable that the limits should be travelled closely in order to ascertain their real value; and one month is certainly not sufficient time in which to examine any timber limit. In my opinion, as a lumberman, one having had a good deal of experience in matters of this kind, in no instance should the time allowed for examination be less than four or five months; and, as I have said, in a great many instances, it should be six months, or even more. Now, as to the method of selling, I certainly agree that timber limits should be put up at public auction, and not sold by tender. My reason for so saying is this: If the principle of selling by tender is admitted, an individual knowing all the conditions of the limit, and the value of it, may ask that it be put up for sale; then, if tenders are asked for, the lumbermen generally, knowing nothing as to the value of the property, pay no attention whatever to the requests for tenders. The consequence would be that the individual knowing the value of the property, might put in his tender for a very small sum, and secure the limit. I am speaking of a matter of which I have personal knowledge, for within the last few years I have received a great many requests for tenders, and in no instance have I known anything about the property offered, nor in any instance did I consider it in my interest to examine the property. I am sure that the same may be said of lumbermen generally, and I am equally sure that, under this system, limits are acquired by individuals who know the value of the property, at prices very much less than would be paid were the limits sold by public auction. Entirely apart from that, I myself have attended a good many public auctions, where timber limits were sold, and in a great many cases, I have bid for limits far higher prices than I would have offered by tender. For these reasons, Mr. Speaker, I hope that in the interest of the public, and that in the interest of the lumbermen generally, the system of selling by public auction will be adopted, and that in no case will less than three or four months' notice be given, and that, in many cases, a much longer time may be allowed.

Mr. DALY. There is no objection to the motion of the hon. gentleman. I may say for the information of the House, that the Department of the Interior has sold the timber over which it has jurisdiction in Manitoba and the North-west Territories, and in the railway belt in British Columbia by public competition—that is by public tender, and not by auction sale, it having been the opinion of the officers of the department, in contradistinction to the views of the hon. gentleman who has last spoken, that better prices could be got by tender than by public auction. Ample notice has been given in every case—three, four or five months, according to the location of the limits, and the means afforded for people to go and examine them—and notice has been given by advertisements in the newspapers, not only in the locality of the limit, not only in the province in which it is situated, but in the newspapers in other parts of the Dominion as well. In addition to that, circulars are sent to all the lumbermen in Canada and the United States, whose addresses are known to the department, and I think we know them all pretty well. That is evidenced by what the hon. member for Russell (Mr. Edwards) has said, that he has received numbers of these notices. He says that in no instance has he sought to purchase any limits of which he has had notice. I have no doubt the reason is that he has all the timber limits in this part of the country he wants, and he does not require any in Manitoba and the North-west, or on the line of the C.P.R. in British Columbia.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Have there been sales at public auction?

Mr. DALY. There have been no sales at public auction since 17th February, 1885. The regulations of the department have been that all licenses to cut timber shall be disposed of by public competition, and only tenders have been received.

Mr. CHARLTON. No public sales, then?

Mr. DALY. Not that I am aware of. I am very glad the hon. gentleman has drawn the attention of the House to this matter by his motion, because I am satisfied that when the papers come down the House will find that the Government have got the best prices for the timber, that they received a number of tenders, and in almost every instance, proper notice has been given, and in every way the interest of the public has been safeguarded. I am glad that he added clause "e" to the motion, in order that we may furnish to the hon. gentleman the notice that has been given. The hon. gentleman recalls the fact that I stated in the House the other night, in the debate on the motion of the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), as to the sale of Indian timber, that a month's notice had been given. I was in error when I said that, because ample notice has been given by the Department of Interior when they have sold timber.

Mr. CHARLTON. What does the hon. gentleman consider ample notice?

Mr. DALY. Three to four month's notice, according to location of the berth, giving ample time to people to examine the berths and obtain all the information they require.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). When the hon. gentleman brings down this return, will he bring down the price at which the limits have been sold, so that we may see precisely what value has been put upon them, and the amount that is agreed to be paid for them?

Mr. DALY. I think the return calls for that.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I have not got the special knowledge on this subject which my hon. friend possesses, but I think, as hon. gentlemen opposite are not unfrequently fond of quoting the example of the Ontario Government, they would do well to imitate their practice in this respect. If I am not misinformed, all their sales of timber, which have been eminently successful, which have realized very large sums of money, so large that I believe the trade on some occasions thought they had paid a great deal too much—all these sales have been conducted at public auction. I am told that in the opinion of those who have had experience in these matters, the sums realized have been sometimes in excess of the true value. I think the Minister would do well to make a careful inquiry into the practice of the Ontario Government, and at least to make the experiment of seeing what can be done with those lands by putting them up at public auction.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I do not think this motion for the return calls for the amount of bonus that is paid, which I suppose is the amount of cash actually received. It is desirable that we should have the actual sum at which the timber limits have been sold, because it will give us an opportunity of comparing the prices received by the Government under this system, with the price received by the Ontario Government under the system of sales by public auction. The hon. gentleman called this a sale by public competition, as if this were the only public competition which could exist. I would rather be inclined to call a sale by public auction, where there are bidders competing with each other, a sale by public competition, than a sale by private tender; because, while each party is tendering for a reserve or for a timber limit, there is no competition in the ordinary sense of the word, there is no rivalry whatever between one bidder and the other, each is bidding what he thinks will secure to him the reserve at the lowest figure at which he is likely to obtain it. That is the rule upon which he proceeds, and that must always be the case where you have a sale without one man knowing what the other is offering for the property. I think it would be of use to the committee, it would certainly be of use to the House, to have this information, and we can then form a judgment upon the system which the hon. gentleman has adopted to the exclusion of sales at public auction.

Mr. DALY. There is no objection to that information being brought down. I will be glad to give the fullest information. I understood the latter end of the motion would include that.

Mr. CHARLTON. By way of explanation I may say that this motion calls for a statement of all timber licenses granted since the 1st of January, showing the date of each grant, location, area, the name of the grantee, and the bonus paid, if any. Now, I suppose these licenses are granted subject to certain uniform conditions as to the payment of Crown dues, and whatever sum is paid to the licensees is termed a bonus in Ontario. I suppose that is the case here, and if that is the case, the resolution calls for this information.

Mr. BRYSON. I have but one observation to make with reference to what has fallen from the hon. gentleman who made this motion. It is well to remember that the circumstances under which the province of Ontario advertise their timber berths and those under the Department of Interior advertise their timber berths, are not the same. The province of Ontario, like the province of Quebec, have infrequent sales, perhaps once in two or three years, when a very large territory indeed is advertised; whereas in the case of the Department of Interior, as many practical lumbermen know, the limits advertised are in remote sections, and very often in very poor districts. The department adopted the practice of sending out slips to the lumbermen of this country, indicating the territory, the size, the location, and the time of sale. Any other mode would be a very expensive process indeed, and I think that the system the department has been acting upon for the last two years has certainly been in the public interest. Prior to that time, it is true, that limits were obtained by application; and the hon. member who introduced this motion might have gone a little further back than the period which he mentioned, to the time when the hon. member for Bothwell was Minister of Interior, and when he, on application, gave timber berths to an hon. gentleman who had a seat in this House, because, as they said, it was the custom. I think that if this return went to the country making it appear that the Conservative party alone had adopted this principle, it would not be what the hon. member for North Norfolk desired to do. The hon. member for Russell (Mr. Edwards) is of the opinion that these districts should be sold by public auction. Now, those of us who are acquainted with the hon. gentleman, will say that may be his theory, but in practice he himself has adopted a course quite the reverse. I know from my own observations that that hon. gentleman has purchased repeatedly by private sale, as he had a perfect right to do, and that in no case have three or four months been offered to him, but he has had a refusal possibly of 35 or 40 days. On the same basis he has resold timber berths in the Ottawa valley at prices which, if they had been sold by public auction, would not have realized as much as they did at private sale. All things considered, I believe the principle adopted by the Department of Interior, is a thoroughly correct one, not only in the interests of the lumbermen, but in the interests of the country.

Mr. EDWARDS. By way of explanation I desire to say that I have never bought or sold a property of the Crown by private contract.

Motion agreed to.

OWNERSHIP OF McCORMICK'S ISLAND.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell) moved for :

Correspondence between the Department of Indian Affairs and a certain band of Indians, as to their claim to the ownership of McCormick's Islands and the Point Pelee.

Mr. DALY. The correspondence is so voluminous that it would cost an enormous sum to bring down the return asked. But if it will suit the hon. gentleman's purpose I will place desk room and all the papers connected with the subject at his disposal. The correspondence runs over a great many years.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I will see what papers might be published.

Mr. DALY. If the hon. gentleman will name the day, I will be glad to furnish him with the papers.

Motion agreed to.

TIMBER ON INDIAN RESERVES.

tion of the timber on Indian reserves. Also, copies of all reports and valuations of any officer or employee of the Government, in connection with the timber on such reserves.

Mr. DALY. I will have to ask the hon. gentleman to allow that to stand. It is so very indefinite it covers apparently from confederation up to date. In any event I cannot consent to the latter portion of the motion, because it calls for confidential information in the department, which cannot be given to the public in the interest of the Indians themselves.

Mr. DEVLIN. Very well ; let it stand if the hon. gentleman wishes.

Mr. SPEAKER. The question is before the House. It cannot stand.

Mr. LAURIER moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

DISMISSAL OF TIMOTHY McQUEEN.

Mr. CAMPBELL moved for :

Copies of all telegrams, letters, petitions, Orders in Council, and all correspondence relating to the dismissal of Timothy McQueen as fishery overseer in the county of Kent, Ontario.

He said : I move for these papers in order to call the attention of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to the very great injustice he has done to a very worthy officer of the department, Mr. Timothy McQueen. Mr. McQueen was appointed overseer of the fisheries in the River Thames in the year 1874, and he has been a most faithful officer of the department from that time. No complaints have been made against him, except one, which was made two years ago, and, after a thorough investigation, the head of the department reported that he was satisfied that there were no grounds for the complaint. Therefore, it was a very great surprise to most people there when they learned that this faithful old officer had been summarily dismissed. I placed on the Order paper a question which was asked on the 29th of March, as to the reason why the department had dispensed with the services of this officer, and the reply of the Minister was :

The services of Timothy McQueen, overseer, Kent County, Ont., were dispensed with for failing to prevent illegal fishing in his district and for assisting in a meeting called to protest against the action of the Department of Marine and Fisheries ; seining in the River Thames having been prohibited.

I communicated with Mr. McQueen as to the correctness of this statement, and, in justice to him I have to say that he gives a very different version of the matter from what has been given by the Minister. As to his preventing illegal fishing in the River Thames, no evidence, so far as I know, has ever been brought forward to sustain this charge; and, in the second place, with regard to inducing a number of fishermen to attend a meeting to protest against the department issuing an order to prevent seining in the river, I think Mr. McQueen has clearly shown by evidence that can hardly be contradicted that this charge could not be sustained. He forwarded to the department a petition, which read as follows:—

We, the undersigned fishermen of the River Thames, county of Kent, hereby positively state that at no time were we approached by Mr. Timothy McQueen, the fishing inspector, to protest or give in a protest or to attend a meeting for protesting against the action of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries prohibiting seining in the Thames River.

Dated the 2nd day of November, 1893.

This petition is signed by Robert Jubenville, William King, Albert Williams, George McKingley, George Hurst, John Hurst, Thomas F. Merritt, Francis St. Amour, Bernard Daly, Theresa Jubenville, William Duquette, John M. Glasco, Christopher Farrell, William Fielder, Reuben Fielder, Peter Antaya, Joseph Antaya, William Trudel. I believe that these are all the fishermen engaged in that business along the Thames, and the Minister will see that they declare, in the most emphatic language, that Mr. McQueen did not at any time approach or ask or induce them in any way to attend a meeting to protest against the action of the department; so that I think that charge cannot be justified by the evidence. After Mr. McQueen had been notified suddenly that his services as fishery overseer had been dispensed with, he naturally inquired for the reason, and the reason was given as set forth by the Minister here. He then demanded, as any man naturally would, an investigation into the charges which were brought against him. He writes to the department on the 20th of October, acknowledging the receipt of their communication of the 13th October, stating the reasons for his suspension as fishery overseer, and asking that an investigation as to the truthfulness of the charges made against him, should, in all fairness to him, be instituted. The department, believing that that was a reasonable request, instructed the overseer, Mr. Kerr, to examine into the truthfulness of these charges, and I find that the department communicated with Mr. McQueen, under the date of the 10th of March, 1894, as follows:—

Having further reference to your letter of 22nd November last, transmitting a petition which you claimed to be a complete answer to the charges brought against you in your capacity of fishery overseer, I am to state that Overseer Kerr was instructed by this department to make a full investigation into the matter, in order to enable you to meet these charges in the best way you could. This has been done, and Mr. Kerr reports that he notified you to meet him in Chatham on the 25th January last. On his arrival he sent for you, when you refused to produce any evidence or statement in writing or otherwise. Mr. Kerr then proposed to meet you again on the following Saturday, so as to give you a chance of having your witnesses on hand; but this he says you also refused to do.

Under these circumstances the department deems it unadvisable to take further action in the matter.

To this Mr. McQueen answered as follows:—

In reply to your letter of the 10th instant, and numbered 149, 94, I beg to state that I met Mr. Kerr at Chatham, on the 25th January last, to investigate the charges preferred by him against me as overseer on the Thames River. He asked me "to prove the charges preferred against you are not true."

This was a very strange position for any person to take—to ask a man who had been dismissed to prove that the evidence brought against him by the department was not true. It was a very singular position for him to take. In reply, Mr. McQueen very naturally says:

In reply, I said no; you have preferred charges against me, and I call on you to produce your witnesses to sustain them.

That is the position taken by Mr. McQueen. He goes on to say:

Mr. Kerr had no evidence to offer, but, he said, you voted against the Government last election.

There was the sufficient reason for his dismissal. Mr. McQueen, very naturally, replied:

I replied, it was none of his business how I voted, and it was a piece of effrontery on his part to ask me such a question. He also asked me if I had not asked Mr. James Hamilton, a fisherman, to attend a meeting at Chatham. I said no, and I defy you to prove any of the charges preferred against me. I have been an officer of the department for twenty years on the Thames River, appointed in 1874, and I defy the strictest scrutiny into my conduct for the last twenty years. This closed the interview with Mr. Kerr. I feel I have been harshly and most unjustly dealt with by the department in being condemned and dismissed on charges irregularly preferred and which no attempt was made to substantiate, and I close the correspondence by repeating the assurance that the charges on which I was dismissed from my position as overseer are absolutely without foundation.

Now, I consider that the allegations made against Mr. McQueen have been fully proven to be untrue in the petition sent down here by the fishermen. There is no doubt but that when the inspector went there to investigate the matter, he took a wrong position by asking Mr. McQueen to prove that the charges made against him were not true. He knew very well that the charges could not be sustained, and that the only way to dismiss Mr. McQueen was by trying to make out that he had voted against the Government candidate in the last election. I do not believe that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) will take the stand that every officer in the department should be compelled to support the Government candidate. If that is the position he takes, the sooner we know it the better. I believe those men are free and independent electors, who have a perfect right to vote for whom they please, and I think it was a piece of impudence on the part of the inspector to ask such questions of Mr. McQueen. I believe that was the only charge they could bring against him—the charge of not having supported the Government candidate. The alleged reason that he induced the fishermen to meet and protest against the action of the department has been proved untrue. I believe the Minister has been wrongfully informed on the question, and has done a very great injustice to this officer, who has been so long in the department and against whom no charges have been brought for the twenty years that he has been in the service. Such a man should not be summarily dismissed without good and sufficient reason, and I contend that the evidence, as I have it in my hand—there may be other letters that I have not, but these are the principal ones—clearly proves that the reasons for the dismissal of this officer were entirely unfounded. And I think that the Minister of Marine would only be doing justice to an old and faithful servant by ordering his reinstatement. My object in moving for these papers has been to call the special attention of the Minister of Marine to the circumstance; and I have no doubt that if he will look into the matter, he will find that he has done very great injustice to a very worthy officer of the department. I trust that, at an early day, he will do everything to redress the wrong he has done.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I think it was well that the hon. gentleman, in moving for these papers, ventilated the grievance of Mr. McQueen, because when the papers are brought down the hon. gentleman will find that it will be impossible to give so much prominence to the so-called grievance. The hon. gentleman has endeavoured to lead the House to believe, as no doubt he has been informed, that this officer was harshly dealt with, because he informed the inspector of my department that his political proclivities were opposed to the Government. I hope the hon. gentleman will believe me when I say that, up to this moment, I had every reason to believe that Mr. McQueen was a supporter of the Government. Friends of the Government have pleaded his case with me, and urged upon my attention many of the considerations to which the hon. gentleman has referred. And I think the hon. gentleman knows that Mr. McQueen's politics were adverse to him in the past, and he will not deny now that he always regarded Mr. McQueen as a friend of the Government. I am certainly guilty of no intentional harshness to this man. I believe that in dismissing him from office I did my duty. His record was most unsatisfactory. A report of the responsible officer was brought to my attention, and I brought that report to the attention of the Government, with the result that Mr. McQueen's services were dispensed with. Friends of his and Mr. McQueen himself urged upon me that this man had not been given a formal investigation. That is, in one sense, a natural complaint perhaps for officers to make; but with a lot of these petty officers, whose salaries are small and duties not very important, it would be a very expensive and questionable proceeding to institute in every case a formal inquiry, and no hon. gentleman would suggest that course. I had the report of the responsible officer, whose duty it is to inspect this division, and who made certain charges. Nevertheless, Mr. McQueen having pressed his long service and his innocence of the charges against him, I directed the officer to proceed to Chatham and give Mr. McQueen the opportunity of being fully heard. The hon. gentleman gives his version as to what occurred on that occasion. I hope it is unnecessary for me to say that that is not the report made to me, and I do not credit the statement that Mr. Kerr proceeded to discuss the subject in the way Mr. McQueen now avers. The papers will show that having given Mr. McQueen the opportunity of being fully heard, in order to report back to me so that I could decide whether the subject should be reconsidered and brought again before the Government, Mr. McQueen refused point-blank to say anything to right his case in any way whatever before that officer.

Mr. CAMPBELL. He asked the inspector to prove the charge.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. He undertook to fence with the officer sent there, and to direct the manner in which the investigation was to take place. And the papers will show that Mr. McQueen refused point-blank to open his case or to state his grievances before the inspector; but called upon the inspector to justify his report and his charges. There was a difference between Mr. McQueen and the inspector.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). What were the charges?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Neglect of his duties and failure to support the regulations of the department to this extent: A meeting was called to protest against the action of the department, which meeting was attended by fishermen and others, who were induced or encouraged to go there and protest against the course taken by the department. This officer of the department took part in bringing about this meeting, a thing that could not be tolerated, and was not tolerated for a moment. Another charge is that his division was not attended to by himself and that his services were comparatively useless. The papers, of course, will be brought down.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Of course we shall be able to consider the case better when the papers come down, and it is to be hoped the hon. gentleman will bring them down at an early day. But the hon. Minister can well understand that in a rural district, where fishing operations are carried on, the fishery officer is also a member of the community knowing the circumstances in which the fishermen are placed; and it would not be a very extraordinary proceeding on his part if he undertook to direct and control a meeting, knowing what the feelings of the people were, and perhaps himself holding the opinion that the regulations had been hastily made or that they were not in the interest of the department itself. An officer of the department might take part in such a meeting in perfect good faith, feeling that a mistake had been made by the overseer or the party who had induced the Minister to make the changes in the regulations which had been made. I do not think the imputation of insubordination should rest upon an officer who had done what the hon. gentleman says was done by Mr. McQueen in this case; and, unless the papers disclose something more than the hon. gentleman has stated, it seems to me that the department has acted with harshness.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I take issue with the hon. gentleman on that point. According to my experience we have extreme difficulty in the administration of these laws. In the first place, in many districts we have to deal with a class in the community who are not very well off. There is a general feeling among them—

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). They have to go to the river for their breakfast.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Yes, and for their dinner, and for their living; they depend largely upon what they get out of the sea or out of the lake. The difficulties with which the department have to contend must be apparent to those who will consider the matter. The feeling of the people is against the department in every way. Even some magistrates will try to avoid their duty in cases of infraction of the fishery laws; and, when compelled to act, will, even in the most flagrant cases—such, for instance, as the use of dynamite, destroying not only the fisheries, but the breeding grounds of the fish—impose the lowest possible penalty. Under these circumstances, if the department has not the sympathy or the apparent sympathy of its own officers, it is impossible to enforce the law, and it would not do to retain such an officer in the service of the department for a single day. If the officer finds the responsibilities too great or his duties unpleasant, he can get rid of his responsibility and of any duty he considers odious by giving up his place. It would be a waste of money to retain officers who do not endeavour to encourage the community to live up to the regulations, by obtaining the best information he can with reference to them from the department, seeking to understand the ground of the department's action and explaining it to the people, and encouraging the opinion that the department does not wish to harass the fishermen in any way.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Was a charge brought against this man?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I acted on the report of the inspector.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Eighteen months ago a charge was brought against Mr. McQueen and thoroughly investigated by the department. It was shown that the charge was untrue and Mr. McQueen was confirmed in his office.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentleman does not refer to that in his motion.

Mr. McMULLEN. This appears to me to be a matter of considerable importance. I have had the opportunity of going over some of the papers connected with this case. This gentleman was a very old servant of the department, having served it for about twenty years. There seems to have been a determined effort to bring about his dismissal. About eighteen months ago complaints were lodged against him to the effect that he was not performing his duties properly. But he was able to make such explanations to the Minister as to relieve himself of the charges for the time being. But apparently the effort against him has been renewed, and this time successfully. While I quite agree that he should have been willing to present his evidence to show that the charges were false, it appears that he has been much irritated by the continuous efforts made by certain people to bring about his dismissal by making charges that evidently were foundationless. It is true that the Minister sent an officer to take evidence, and this officer called upon Mr. McQueen to prove that the charges against him were untrue. In my opinion they should first have called upon the party who made the charges to substantiate them and then have called upon Mr. McQueen for his defence. This would have been only just, and, as they were dealing with a man who had been twenty years in the service of the department, they should have treated him at least with justice.

RETURNS ORDERED.

Petitions from the Indians of the Saugeen reserve claiming the exclusive right of fishing in French Bay, Lake Huron, of all answers to the same, and of all departmental orders in reference to that subject.—(Mr. Laurier.)

Communications in the form of letters, petitions and reports, from 1st April, 1887, to 1st March, 1894, between the Government and Mr. J. B. Many, or the municipal council of St. Luc, in the county of St. Jean, in relation to the construction of a swing bridge on the Chambly Canal, opposite the south-east end of St. Thérèse Island, in the Richelieu River.—(Mr. Béchard.)

Papers, letters, petitions and reports sent to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, from 1st October, 1893, to this date, respecting the dismissal of I. B. Chevalier, of Iberville, from the post of fishery overseer; and of any communication sent from the Government to the said I. B. Chevalier.—(Mr. Béchard.)

Return giving the amount paid out of the Six Nation Indians' Fund (by way of gift or loan) to individual members, from the year 1886 to date, stating in each case:—the name of the person; the fact of whether gift or loan; the date when paid; the amount; the reason for the gift or loan; the authority for such gift or loan; the conditions on which loan was made; the provisions for repayment; the amount repaid.—(Mr. Paterson, Brant.)

Return showing:—1. The total number of depositors in the Dominion and Post Office Savings Banks. 2. The number of said depositors having deposits of $1,000 or upwards and the total amount held by them. 3. The number having deposits of $500 and over, not exceeding $1,000, and the total amount held by them. 4. The number of depositors having deposits of less than $500 and the total amount held by them. 5. The number of depositors not residing in Canada and the total amount held by them.—(Sir Richard Cartwright.)

Return giving a description of each of the industries established in the counties of Queen's and Shelburne, as reported in the census returns of 1891; also showing the names of the several manufacturers engaged in the said industries respectively, and showing the number of employees in each of said industries.—(Mr. Forbes.)

Return showing a description of each of the industries established in the county of Lunenburg, as reported in the census of 1891; also showing the names of the several manufacturers engaged in the said industries respectively, also showing the number of employees in each of said industries.—(Mr. Forbes.)

Copies of all complaints made by one Etienne Tremblay, since 1st November, 1893, against Joseph Placide Rocheleau, postmaster of Pauline, in the county of Rouville, P.Q.; and of the report of the post office inspector who inquired into the said complaint, or of any other official charged with such inquiry.—(Mr. Fréchette.)

Return of all correspondence, circulars, agreements, reports or any other papers leading up to registration of The Canadian Mutual Aid or Canadian Mutual Life Association; together with all reports, correspondence, agreements, circulars or other papers from the time of registration up to the present, including all matters in connection with the amalgamation with the Massachusetts Benefit Association of Boston.—(Mr. Sproule.)

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

Mr. McMULLEN.

After Recess.

IN COMMITTEE.—THIRD READING.

Bill (No. 37) to incorporate the Duluth, Nepigon and James Bay Railway Company.—(Mr. Masson.)

THE SCHOOLS OF MANITOBA AND THE N.W. T.

House resumed the further consideration of the proposed motion of Mr. Tarte (pages 159, 1600).

Mr. BRODEUR. In resuming the debate upon the important questions we have now to examine, I feel obliged to ask the indulgence of this House if I permit myself to address you, Mr. Speaker, in a language with which I am not very familiar. It is my duty to address the House in English in order to be understood by all those who don't know the French language, and who are to a certain extent, prejudiced against the rights of the minority and against the position that some French and Catholic members take upon this question. I want also to answer if possible, the charges and misrepresentations which have been made against the Catholics of the North-west and against the French Liberal members of this House, by the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin). It is very much to be regretted that the hon. member for Assiniboia did not think fit to address the House with calmness, and to discuss this question in a spirit indicating a desire to secure the welfare of the country at large. I regret to say that instead of giving us an example of calmness, he thought fit to abuse some of our fellow-citizens who differ with him upon the subject. I will refer especially to the attacks which the hon. member made upon the Hon. Mr. Casgrain, Attorney General of the province of Quebec. I am not a political friend of Mr. Casgrain, but I think that the hon. member for Assiniboia made a great mistake the other day when he attacked so violently his political friend in the province of Quebec, Attorney General Casgrain. Mr. Casgrain may differ in opinion with him upon this subject, but we must believe that he is sincere in the expression of his opinion, and consequently it was unfair on the part of the hon. member to attack him in the violent manner he did in the course of the debate. I take occasion also to tell the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) that he was entirely mistaken when he stated that the Catholics of the North-west had no grievances and that those men who in the province of Quebec wanted some legislation passed in order to overthrow the legislation enacted by the North-west Legislature adopted this action simply for the sake of party. I most emphatically deny that those in the province of Quebec who are now trying to have remedies applied to the legislation adopted by the North-west Legislature are raising an unfounded agitation. We do not desire to make any false agitation ; we only claim what is just and fair, and we have the right to express our opinions and to ask that our opinions be respected. We are willing to respect the opinions expressed by the hon. member, we are willing to think he is sincere in his statement ; but at the same time if he wants us to admit his sincerity we have the right to claim that the same respect be shown to our opinions as we are willing to show to his opinions. I desire to say at the outset that my object in taking part in this debate is not to embarrass the Government or to make a case against the Government. These questions must be discussed with calmness and in a spirit of fairness and justice. Last year I had occasion to speak on the Manitoba school question, which was a burning question, as the North-west question is a burning question to-day, and I then declared that I would be ready to vote against the motion moved by the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte), if the Government were willing and would promise to intervene if the Supreme Court declared they had the right to intervene. Instead of receiving at that time an answer, to which I was entitled, the Government refused to reply, but the Postmaster General subsequently did so, only stating, however, that if justice was not rendered to the Catholics of Manitoba by the Government, then it would be time for me to vote against the Government. On this particular question of North-west schools I do not desire to embarrass the Government, but I desire to show that the North-west Catholics have grievances, that they have been ill-treated by the North-west Legislature, and that they have not received from the Dominion Government the fair treatment to which they were entitled. The hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) in the course of his speech said that the Catholics of the North-west and the French Canadians of the Territories had no grievances against the ordinance of 1892. I must say that my hon. friend is entirely in error in taking that position and in making that declaration. I will prove in a moment that the Catholics have received from the North-west Legislature the most grievous treatment that could be received by a minority from a Legislature. We must discuss the subject at some length in order to thoroughly understand the question and see what has been the position of the Catholics in the past and what is the position given to them under the ordinance of 1892. We remember that when confederation was established the North-west Territories did not form part of it. They were not comprised in Canada, but they were the property of the Imperial Government. In 1869 legislative measures were adopted by the Dominion Government to bring those territories under the control of the Dominion. Then the Government sent an officer to take possession of the North-west, but the manner in which action was taken led the people of that country to become suspicious, and they to a certain extent protested against the Dominion Government taking possession of the North-west Territories. The Government—not only the Canadian Government, but the Imperial Government—sent for Archbishop Taché, who was then in Rome, in order to reconcile the French Canadians and half-breeds to the new condition of affairs. The Archbishop went to the Territories, and there he succeeded in pacifying the French Canadians and the half-breeds. At the same time a delegation was sent to Ottawa, which brought a Bill of rights, setting forth that the people of the North-west were willing to enter into confederation, provided that the Catholics were accorded the right of separate schools and would not be compelled to pay for the maintenance of public or Protestant schools ; and also that the French Canadians be accorded the right to use the French language in courts of justice and in the Legislature. The Bill of rights, section 7, reads as follows : “That the schools be separate and the moneys of public schools be divided between the different religious denominations according to their population.” In section 16 of the same Bill of rights, it was provided that both the French and English language be official in the Legislature and in the courts. The Dominion Government at that time agreed that the North-west should be included in confederation and become part of the Dominion on the conditions I have read, that is to say, that the Catholics should have the right of having separate schools, and that French Canadians should have the right to use French in courts of justice and in the Legislature. It is very much to be regretted that no law was then passed embodying those conditions respecting the schools and the French language ; but at all events the pact was entered into between the Federal Government, the French Canadians and the Catholics of the North-west, and so far no departure has been made from that arrangement which was then made. In 1875 or 1876 the Mackenzie Government regularly organized the North-west Territories and passed the North-west Territories Act. That Act is embodied in the Revised Statutes of Canada, and in clause 14 of that Act there is this provision concerning schools :

The Lieutenant-Governor in Council shall pass all necessary ordinances in respect to education ; but it shall therein always be provided, that a majority of the ratepayers of any district or portion of the Territories, or of any less portion or subdivision thereof, by whatever name the same is known, may establish such schools therein as they think fit, and make the necessary assessment and collection of rates therefor ; and also, that the minority of the ratepayers therein, whether Protestant or Roman Catholic, may establish separate schools therein, and in such case, the ratepayers establishing such Protestant or Roman Catholic separate schools, shall be liable only to assessments of such rate as they impose upon themselves in respect thereof.

We see, therefore, that the separate schools were guaranteed to the Catholics of the North-west, and by a subsequent clause of the same Act it is provided that the French language should be official. It is very important to remark that this law has been passed under a Liberal Government. It was under a Liberal Government that separate schools were established in Ontario; it was also under a Liberal Government that the separate schools have been recognized by the law in the Territories, and it was also under a Liberal Government that the French language has been recognized. It will be found also that the 93rd clause of the British North America Act was embodied in the powers conferred upon the Legislature of the North-west. That 93rd section relates to education, and it provides:

In and for each province, the Legislature may exclusively make laws in relation to education, subject and according to the following provisions:—

“1. Nothing in any such law shall prejudicially affect any right or privilege with respect to denominational schools which any class of persons have, by law, in the province at the Union.

“2. All the powers, privileges and duties at the Union, by law conferred and imposed in Upper Canada on the separate schools and school trustees of the Queen's Roman Catholic subjects, shall be and the same are hereby extended to the dissentient schools of the Queen's Protestant and Roman Catholic subjects in Quebec.

“3. Where, in any province, a system of dissentient or separate schools exists, by law, at the Union, or is thereafter established by the Legislature of the province, an appeal shall lie to the Governor General in Council from any Act or decision of any provincial authority, affecting any right or privilege of the Protestant or Roman Catholic minority of the Queen's subjects, in relation to education.

“4. In case any such provincial law, as from time to time seems to the Governor General in Council requisite for the due execution of the provisions of this section is not made, or in case any decision of the Governor General in Council on any appeal under this section is not duly executed by the proper provincial authority in that behalf, then and in every such case, and as far only as the circumstances of each case require, the Parliament of Canada may make remedial laws for the due execution of the provisions of this section, and of any decision of the Governor General in Council under this section.”

In the 13th clause of the North-west Territories Act, the 93rd section of the British North America Act is declared to form part of the North-west Territories Act. The 13th clause is as follows:—

The Lieutenant Governor in Council shall have such powers to make ordinances for the government of the North-west Territories as the Governor in Council, from time to time, confers upon him; but such powers shall not, at any time, be in excess of those conferred by the 92nd and 93rd sections of “The British North America Act, 1867,” upon the legislatures of the several provinces of Canada.

No such ordinance shall be so made which is inconsistent with or alters or repeals any provision of any Act of the Parliament of Canada in force in the Territories.

Therefore the Legislature of the North-west is controlled by the Federal Parliament concerning any law with reference to separate schools. The Federal Parliament established separate schools in the North-west, and at the same time it gave power to the North-west Legislature to make rules; but it provided that these ordinances passed by the Legislatures should be in conformity and should not be in excess of the powers given by the British North America Act to the Provincial Legislatures. Consequently the Assembly of the North-west Territories have not the right to abolish separate schools, either directly or indirectly, nor have they the right to abolish the French language, either directly or indirectly. These powers belong to the Federal Parliament, and consequently if the Legislature encroaches upon the rights of the Catholics in the matter of the separate schools, or in relation to the usage of the French language, their Acts in this respect are entirely unconstitutional, and should be disallowed by the Federal Government. Under the 17th section of the North-west Territories Act the power of the Federal Government to disallow those Acts is absolute. That section reads as follows:—

An authentic copy of every ordinance shall be transmitted by mail to the Secretary of State within thirty days after its passing; and, if the Governor in Council, at any time within one year after its receipt by the Secretary of State, thinks fit to disallow the ordinance, such disallowance, when signified by the Secretary of State to the Lieutenant Governor, shall annul the ordinance from and after the date of such signification; and all ordinances so made, and all Orders in Council disallowing any ordinances so made, shall be laid before both Houses of Parliament as soon as conveniently may be after the making and enactment thereof, respectively.

It will be seen from this that the Federal Government has the right to disallow or to veto all the ordinances which have been passed by the Legislature of the North-west Territories. There is no limit to the exercise of that power by this Government. They may exercise that power on all the ordinances passed by the Provincial Legislature, whether they are legal or not, or whether they are constitutional or not. If they are unconstitutional it is undoubtedly the duty of the Government to disallow them; but even suppose they were not unconstitutional, yet if in their effect they encroach upon rights which have been guaranteed when the North-west Territories entered into the Dominion of Canada, I contend that it is the duty of the Government to intervene and to veto these Acts. From the year 1875 the Provincial Legislature of the North-west Territories has passed several Acts concerning education, all of which have been embodied in the revised ordinances of 1888. According to these ordinances of 1888 I see that the Legislature established a Board of Education composed of five Protestants and three Catholics, but at the same time the law provided for the formation of two sections of that Board of Education. One section was composed of the three Catholics and the other section was composed of the five Protestants. It also provided in these revised ordinances of 1888 that the Catholic section of the Board of Education should have the control over the Catholic and separate schools of the North-west Territories, should have the maintenance of those separate schools, and should have the right to choose the books used in those schools. The Catholic section of the Board of Education had the right to appoint inspectors for their own schools, to establish normal schools, and to appoint examiners for licensing teachers.

Mr. DAVIN. Will the hon. gentleman point out where the right is given to any one section to found a normal school?

Mr. BRODEUR. Some time after the law was passed, a motion was adopted by the Board of Education to establish normal schools in the North-west, and the teaching in those normal schools was under the control of the Catholics when the teachers attending them were Catholics, and under the control of Protestants when the teachers were Protestants. I will prove that in a moment, I think, to the satisfaction of my hon. friend. The regulations in the revised ordinance of 1888 were almost identical with the regulations which we had in the province of Quebec. In Quebec we have a board of education composed of Catholics and Protestants, there being a Catholic section and a Protestant section; and each section has control over the choice of books, over its normal schools, over its inspectors and over its examiners. When the North-west was established, the Board of Education there was modelled after the Board of Education in Quebec. The intention was to place the Catholic minority in the North-west Territories in the same position as that in which we have placed the Protestant minority in the province of Quebec; the Catholics in the North-west were to have the same rights as have been enjoyed by the Protestants of the province of Quebec—rights which have never been encroached upon by the Catholics of that province. Well, after a few years, what do we find? Since a few years everything has been done by those who control the Government of the North-west to destroy the rights of the Catholics in that country. The proof of this I find in a letter which was written on the 20th of November, 1889, by Archbishop Grandin to Cardinal Taschereau. I find that important letter embodied in a question put some years ago by my hon. friend from Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot):

This fanaticism is an epidemic and has spread from the reserves to certain centres of civilization. Our schools are hunted down. It is a crime for us to take advantage of the educational laws to procure assistance from the Government. Our reports are studied: they are found fault with, in order to more especially be able to accuse us and deprive us of that assistance which is ours by right. Although in the minority, we might be able, nevertheless, to send two representatives to the House, but they have succeeded in making this a thing impossible for us. I again charge the Dominion Government, who in marking out the electoral districts have divided up the two French centres in such a manner that it is impossible for us to secure representation.

So we see that even after the passage of the ordinance of 1888 the majority in the North-west Legislature were working to destroy the rights of the minority, and now they have put into execution their purpose mentioned in the letter of Archbishop Grandin, by the ordinance of 1892, of which I will give a synopsis. We remember that in 1888 the Catholics had the control of their own schools; they had the control of the choice of books used in those schools; they could regulate the teaching in them, and they could have French teaching during the whole course. My hon. friend from West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) asserted the other day that the teaching of French stands in the same position to-day as it did in 1888. I deny that assertion entirely. My hon. friend is quite mistaken. I will prove conclusively that the law has been disregarded in the North-west in order virtually to destroy the use of the French language. Now, what are the changes which have been made by the ordinance of 1892? They abolish the Board of Education as it was in 1888. Instead of having five Protestants and three Catholics on the board, they declare that the Board of Education shall be composed of the members of the Executive Council, who are, as we know, all Protestants, and of two Catholics and two Protestants, who, however, are to have no right to vote. Consequently, the Catholic schools, which were under the control of the Catholics in 1888, are, by the ordinance of 1892, put under the control of a Protestant board, because the two Catholics on that board have no right to vote. Suppose that the North-west Legislature should to-day amend the law so as to give the two Catholics the right to vote, that would not be sufficient; we have the right to have five Protestants and three Catholics on the board, as we had before; we have the right to have two sections of the board, and to have control of our own schools. What we ask is only that the Catholics and the French-Canadians should be put on the same footing as they were under the ordinance of 1888. By the ordinance of 1892, the choice of books, instead of being in the hands of the Catholics, as it was under the ordinance of 1888, has been put under the control of the Protestant Board of Education; the inspectors, instead of being appointed by the Catholics to visit the Catholic schools, are to-day named and appointed by a Protestant board; the examiners, who, under the ordinance of 1888, were appointed by the Catholic section, are now entirely under the control of a Protestant board; and—what is very much more important, although it was denied the other night by the hon. member for West Assiniboia, and has also been denied by the Prime Minister—the right to educate the children in French in the Catholic separate schools is now denied; it is only permitted in the case of small children, of five, six or seven years old, who were raised by French-Canadian parents, and did not know a single word of English. But when those children reach the age of 7 or 8, teaching in the French tongue is prohibited, and they must be instructed in the English language alone. The papers have not yet been brought down, and I would certainly not have gone into all these details, if the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) had not thought fit to go into them. I know it would have been very much better to wait until all the papers are brought down before expressing our views on the question. But as the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) has seen proper not to wait, but to express immediately his opinion and raise prejudices, if possible, against the French-Canadians and Catholics of the North-west Territories, I felt it my duty to follow him on that ground and to prove if possible that the French-Canadians are ill-treated and suffer many grievances. We know that the Government has been petitioned to veto that Act. Petitions have been sent in by Archbishop Taché, Archbishop Grandin, and other eminent clergymen of the North-west and many laymen, asking for the disallowance of that legislation. But I exceedingly regret that the Government, instead of disallowing that Act, instead of vetoing it, refused to act with fairness and justice. The Government, as Archbishop Taché has said, was entirely inaccurate and unjust in the answer it gave. In its answer the Government had recourse to false pretensions and subterfuges, as has been asserted by Father Leduc, in order that the rights of the Catholics might be set aside. Those expressions are not mine, but are the words used by eminent clergymen of the North-west. They were used by bishops and archbishops, and I regret to say that some Ministers, who some time ago were proud to follow the advice of the bishops, will not now follow their advice, but have recourse, as has been said, by Archbishop Taché and Father Leduc, to false pretenses and subterfuges in order to prevent Catholics from enjoying their rights. It is very much to be regretted that the Government, after having received those petitions, after having conferred with the leader of the North-west Legislature, did not see fit to send its statement to Archbishop Taché or Archbishop Grandin in order that we might know if the view of the case presented by it were true or not. No, the Government were not bold enough to send its answer to the clergymen of the North-west in order to learn what reply they would make. My hon. friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) says that there are no grievances. I would ask him if it is not a grievance that the Catholics, who had previously the right to control their own schools, have not now that right? That right is denied to them by the ordinance of 1892. My hon. friend will not refuse to admit that in 1888 the Catholics had the control of their own schools. They were then in the same position in the North-west as the Protestants occupy in the province of Quebec, but by the ordinance of 1892, which the hon. member for Assiniboia supports, and which is supported by the Government, the Catholics in the North-west are deprived of the right to control their own schools. The Catholic section of the Board of Education has, by that ordinance, been abolished. Why prevent Catholics from having the right to control their own schools? Why not give them the same rights in the North-west as we are proud to give the Protestants in Quebec? Why treat the Catholics in the North-west differently from the treatment we are proud to give the Protestants of Quebec? I see here in this House many Protestant members from the province of Quebec. They know what the Government of that province has paid for Protestant education; they know that the Protestant minority have always been well treated by the Catholic majority there; they know that it never entered our minds to encroach upon the rights of Protestants granted by the constitution. Well, those same rights, which we are proud to give the Protestant minority of Quebec, are denied to us in the North-west. But although our Catholic friends in the North-west are ill-treated, we are not going to raise war. We are not going to say, as was said the other night by my hon. friend (Mr. Davin), that we will not submit to the laws of the country. No, we shall make a constitutional agitation. We will come before this Parliament containing a majority of Protestants, and I claim that our friends from Ontario will follow the example, the noble example, that has been given by their leader in the Legislature of that province, Sir Oliver Mowat. We hope that we shall be treated in the same spirit as has characterized the treatment of the Catholics of Ontario by the Protestant Liberal leader there. I do not think it will be denied that we have a grievance, when we see the Legislature of the North-west abolishing the Catholic section of the Board of Education. What would happen if, to-morrow, we were to abolish the Protestant section of the Board of Education in the province of Quebec, and we were to put the Protestant schools under control of the bishops, or of the Catholic section of the Board of Education? There would be an uproar throughout the Dominion of Canada, and we would see many indignant persons coming to this House and asking the disallowance of that Act; and I know that the Government would veto that Act, as it would be its duty to do.

Mr. DAVIN. My hon. friend appeals to me. I stated the other night, and I state now, that the Catholic schools exist to-day as they existed in 1888.

Mr. BRODEUR. Suppose, as I have said, that we should abolish the Protestant section of the Board of Education in the province of Quebec. Will my hon. friend say that the Protestants of Quebec would still have their separate schools? What do we mean when we speak of separate schools, Mr. Speaker? Do we not mean the right to control of the schools, to employ the inspectors to choose the books? I have a declaration from Sir Oliver Mowat, made in 1889, when there was an attempt to overthrow the rights of the Catholics of Ontario of choosing the books for their schools, that the effect of such a law was virtually to abolish the separate schools. It is said, Mr. Speaker, that no change has been made concerning the choice of books since the ordinance of 1892 was passed. I think I have proven that prior to the passing of that ordinance the Catholics had the right to choose the books for their own schools. But now we see that the choice of books is in the hands of the Board of Education, which is entirely Protestant—for, though there are two Roman Catholics on that Board of Education, their influence counts for nothing, as they have no right to vote. After the ordinance of 1892 was passed, the books for these separate schools of the North-west Territories were changed. I do not think my hon. friend will deny that assertion. Instead of the Catholic readers which were formerly used, they have readers which are in use in the Protestant schools in Ontario. That is a very important fact, and the existence of that fact is a very serious grievance. My hon. friend (Mr. Davin) shakes his head. Does the hon. gentleman mean that this is not a grievance? Suppose that to-morrow we should prescribe none but Catholic books for the Protestant schools in the North-west, would not that be a grievance to the Protestants there?

Mr. DAVIN. Those books are acceptable to the Catholics of the North-west; therefore, there is no grievance.

Mr. BRODEUR. They are acceptable to the Catholics? However, we see the contrary declared in the petition which has been put in the hands of the Government. That petition is signed by Bishop Grandin, who must know something about the matter; it is signed by Archbishop Taché, who must know something about it; by Father Leduc, who must know something about it. Here is what those eminent clergymen say about these books:

The text books are for the most part Protestant, and are offensive to Catholics, by asserting many things which Catholics have always contended contradicted the facts, by entirely ignoring, or greatly minimizing, misrepresenting or misinterpreting the part of the Catholic church and her ministers in history and in all departments of literature and science, and by propagating religious and philosophical theories which Catholics reprobate or disapprove.

Are these books accepted by the Catholics of the North-west? Are they accepted by the Catholic clergy of the North-west? My hon. friend says they are. Here is a petition signed by Archbishop Taché, Bishop Grandin, and other clergymen, who declare that they are not acceptable to the Catholics of the North-west. My hon. friend says that the books which are used in the separate schools in the North-west have been approved by high authority in the Catholic church. I think that is the expression made use of by my hon. friend. I do not know to what the hon. gentleman alludes, but I suppose that his statement is based upon the rumour spread by interested persons, that Father Caron has given his consent to the using of these books. If my hon. friend relies upon the authority of Father Caron, I can tell him that he has been entirely misinformed. I have here a letter from Father Caron, dated the 24th of February, 1894, in which he says:

In answer to your letter asking me if it be true, as affirmed by some, that as a representative of the Catholics in the Council of Public Instruction I have given my assent to the choice of Ontario readers as reading books in our Catholic schools in the North-west, I am glad to say that such is not the case. I said, at the informal meeting we had:—If we were obliged to put aside the Catholic reading books we would more willingly abandon the books used for the scholars of the fourth degree than the books used for younger scholars.

Well, we see that Father Caron has never given his assent to the use of these Ontario readers in the Catholic separate schools of the North-west; on the contrary, he protested as strongly as possible against the introduction of those books. Now, it is surprising that in that same meeting they claim to have passed a resolution, though no minutes were kept, that the Ontario readers should be used in the Catholic schools. I said a moment ago that the Government had to pronounce itself upon that part of the complaint of the Catholics in the North-west, but instead of giving a straight answer, instead of listening to the petitions signed by these great men, he took the position of affirming that the assertions made by the bishops in that petition were entirely false; and the Minister of Public Works, who boasted some time ago that he was always proud to follow the advice of the bishops, has approved of that course on the part of the Government because he still remains a member of the Government. But how does he treat the question now? Archbishop Taché, on that point writes:

As to the selection of text books for pupils in the schools, it was altogether in the hands of the section: the respective members had only to agree among themselves.

All these rights are taken away from the Catholics and no choice whatever is left to them in the selection of books. Decidedly, I disagree with the Committee when they affirm: "The Committee cannot say that the complaint of the petitioners in this respect is well founded."

To support their views on the subject the Committee have thought proper to cite the following: "Mr. Haultain remarks that the Council of Public Instruction was but following the example of the Roman Catholic Committee of the Council of Public Instruction of the province of Quebec, which, he says, has ceased to use these 'Metropolitan readers'."

I confess I was not prepared for such logic. The Catholic Committee of Quebec replaced the Metropolitan readers by another series of Catholic readers; therefore, it is said that the Catholics of the North-west ought to be satisfied that the right they had to the selection of books for the schools has been taken from their hands and given to others who select the books they choose.

I admit that the value of such an argument is beyond my comprehension.

It is very surprising to find that although Archbishop Taché says they are using in the Catholic schools, books which misinterpret and misrepresent the Catholic religion, the Government say, Well, it is true that the North-west Council has abolished the use of the Metropolitan readers, but they have been replaced by others, as has been done in the province of Quebec. It is true that in the province of Quebec the Catholic section of the Board of Education has replaced the Metropolitan readers by others, but not by Protestant readers, as was done by the North-west Legislature, and approved by this Government; but they replaced those Metropolitan readers by other Catholic readers; consequently when the Government affirm that these gentlemen in the North-west have done no more than the Catholic section of the Board of Education in Quebec, I say they affirm what is entirely false and cannot be sustained.

Mr. DAVIN. But they are not Protestant readers.

Mr. BRODEUR. The Ontario readers?

Mr. DAVIN. No; they are used in the separate schools of Ontario.

Mr. BRODEUR.

Mr. BRODEUR. I beg your pardon. I think that Archbishop Taché knows as well as my hon. friend, and he says in his petition that these text books, for the most part Protestant, are offensive to Catholics. It may be true, that in some sections of Ontario the separate schools use these Ontario readers, but that is no reason why we should impose them upon the Catholics of the North-west. I know that the Ontario Government desires to assimilate as much as possible the use of text books in all the schools of the province, and it may be that in some sections the Catholics use those readers, but as I say, that is no reason why we should impose upon the North-west Catholics the use of these Protestant books.

Mr. DAVIN. I rise to state that I think the hon. gentleman ought not to make in this House a statement that they are Protestant readers unless he can put the reader before the House, as might easily be done, and say that this is a Protestant reader, and that there is an objectionable passage in it.

Mr. BRODEUR. Well, I have not taken the trouble to read all the readers which are used in the North-west Territories; I do not know if my hon. friend has read them, but I think I have the same right he has to make assertions. He asserted the other day that these readers were Catholic. I assert now that they are Protestant, and if my hon. friend wants to prove his assertion, he must himself begin by reading the readers to the House.

Mr. DAVIN. The hon. gentleman asks me to prove a negative, and that, by logicians, is considered not the proper thing to do.

Mr. BRODEUR. The other day the hon. gentleman said that he had asked a friend if he had any complaint to make against the readers in the North-west, and this friend told him that there was an objectionable poem in one of the readers which contained an account of an elopement. Well, says the hon. member for Assiniboia, I read that poem when I was young, and I never eloped. I think, Mr. Speaker, if my hon. friend had read that poem he would not be in the same domestic position that he is now. I think it would have been much better for him if he had not read that poem in his youth, as the consequence for him might have been, perhaps, an unhappy marriage. Now, even admitting that the readers employed in the North-west Territories are not Protestant readers, I say that the North-west Legislature has made a change in the regulation which puts the choice of books in the hands of a Protestant board, in the hands of men who are not friends of the Catholic religion. Now, I say there is a grievance in that act alone. They may be using good books now, or to-morrow, or one year hence, and this board may then change these books and select books that are entirely Protestant. Now, the rights of the Catholics have also been encroached upon in respect to the nomination of inspectors. The Catholic section previously had the right to appoint inspectors for their own schools, as the Protestant section had the right to appoint their inspectors for the Protestant schools. That right which was enjoyed by the Catholics under the ordinance of 1888, has been taken from them, and inspectors are appointed by the Protestant Board of Education. The Government instead of giving a direct answer to the complaint of the Catholics on that point have misled them, according to the expression used by Archbishop Taché, and have evaded the question, according to Father Leduc. Here is what Archbishop Taché says :

I deeply regret to have to say that this observation of the Government upon a comparison of the duties prescribed for inspectors of schools in the ordinance of 1888 and that of 1892 "it will be seen that they are practically the same," is misleading and cannot but convey an unfair idea of the rights of which the Catholics are deprived.

Now, what was the objection of the Catholics? It was that they had enjoyed the right to appoint their own inspectors and they had been deprived of that right. Father Leduc said :

The report of the Committee of the Privy Council eludes deliberately the question and gives a conclusion the greater part of which is outside of the subject of the petitions. We complain that the ordinance of 1892 deprives us, Catholics, of the right of appointing our inspectors for our Catholic schools, a right granted by the ordinance of 1888. This ordinance conferred on the Catholic section of the Board of Education the power to appoint its inspectors. It is this right that we claim in our petitions. Protestant inspectors, owing to their religious education, their prejudices, their opposition to the Catholic school system, cannot generally inspire us with any confidence. We protest in our petitions against that violation of the right that we have to govern our schools and appoint our inspectors, as we acknowledge the same right to the Protestant schools. I regret to be obliged to state that the decision of the Privy Council, in the case in question, has not at all for its object the true complaint of the petitioners. Let them not tell us: "Out of four inspectors you have one Catholic." If we have him to-day we may not have him to-morrow. At all events, he cannot inspect but the schools of one district, all the schools of the other districts being outside his jurisdiction.

The Catholics of the North-west had originally the right to appoint inspectors. Now their schools may be inspected by men who are entirely enemies of Catholic institutions. The same course has been followed in regard to the examiners. Originally they were appointed by the Catholic section, but now the examiners are appointed by the Protestant Board of Education. Here is what Archbishop Taché says :

The report of the Committee says: "Although the formation of the Board of Examiners is different under the present law, the Committee of the Privy Council are unable to ascertain that the Board of Public Instruction has in any way altered or restricted the mode and manner of examining teachers."

I am forced to say that such an assertion cannot convey a fair and exact idea of the condition imposed upon Catholic schools by the ordinance of 1892; the unfairness is due to the non-consideration of the privileges conferred by the Act of 1888.

Under the old ordinance, it was enacted as follows: "one half of the Board of Examiners shall be nominated by each section of the Board of Education." The Catholic section had therefore the right of nominating one half of the examiners.

The law said also: "Each section of the board shall have the selection of text books for the examination of teachers in history and science." Now all this is altered, and the selection is in the hands of the Protestants.

I now come to normal schools. It has been asserted that if there was a normal school previously to the ordinance of 1892 it was unsectarian. That assertion is not correct, and it is not in accordance with the facts which have been established. Here is the resolution which has been referred to :

At the meeting of the Board of Education held on the 25th January, 1888, it was resolved:—

That in the opinion of this board it is necessary to make provisions for the instruction and training of teachers for our public schools in the science and art of teaching.

That the board feels that the appointment of a normal school principal, whose duty it would be to hold normal school sessions in different parts of the country, would have the best possible results in increasing the efficiency of teachers and stimulating education :

Therefore, resolved

That His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor be requested to urge upon the Dominion Government the advisability of granting the sum of $5,000 for the next financial year for normal school purposes.

It does not mean there was going to be only one normal school; it does not convey the idea that Catholics shall be obliged to attend a normal school frequented by Protestants. It is declared in that motion that $5,000 should be asked from the Government for normal school purposes. What has happened? The Government instead of answering the question directly and recognizing the right of Catholics, has evaded the question and falsely represented the position. This is not a small charge made against Ministers. I have charged them with having recourse to false pretenses. The Government says :

It appears to the Committee that prior to the ordinance of 1892 normal schools had been sanctioned by the Board of Education without objection, and that an uniform framing of teachers had been adopted by and with the approval of both sections of the board.

The hon. member for Assinibolia (Mr. Davin) said there was only one normal school and the rules for Protestants and Catholics were the same. The regulations of the Board of Education say the contrary :

Page 3.—“The following books are prescribed for the use of candidates for third class certificates : by the Protestant section : Ontario Public School English grammar, &c., &c. ; by the Roman Catholic section : as published and amended by adding, &c.

“45. The subjects of examinations for first class certificates shall be such and such, for schools under the control of the Protestant section ; or such and such, for the schools under the control of the Roman Catholic section.”

Undoubtedly all these regulations were kept out, says Archbishop Taché, of the reach of the Committee, when they say :

“There is nothing to indicate that there was to be one normal school for the Protestant teachers and another for Roman Catholic teachers, but rather the one normal school for all.”

I desire the Government to answer that charge, and I desire to learn if they are ready to assert, after what has been said by Archbishop Taché and Father Leduc, that there was only one normal school in the North-west. Father Leduc says :

Under the false pretense that at least two members of the Catholic section of the Board of Education have, in January, 1888, given their assent pure and simple to the future establishment of only one normal school, we are invited to remain quiet, to accept the new ordinance, to be satisfied with Protestant normal schools, even for the sisters, who would have to leave their convents to go to and mix with the teachers or candidates of both sexes, of all denominations, of every age, on the benches at Regina or elsewhere, and to receive from the lips of a Grand Master of Free Masonry the pedagogical teaching, free from all tinge of Catholicism, but possibly saturated with materialism and with all the errors which the Catholic church rejects and condemns.

That is to say that the sisters should be compelled to be taught by men who, as described by Father Leduc, occupy the same position in the Orange lodges as does the Controller of Customs. The gravest charge which I have to make against these ordinances is concerning the teaching of French, and I am glad to see the Prime Minister now in his seat, because I want to prove to him that he was entirely mistaken the other night when he conveyed the idea that the French language was permissive during the whole course in the separate schools of the North-west Territories. The following occurred during the debate as reported in ‘Hansard’ :—

Mr. LAURIER. Will the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) pardon me. He stated that he would refer to the question of teaching French in the schools.

Mr. DAVIN. Yes ; I intended to take it up in connection with this. With regard to the teaching of French, Mr. Speaker, there is this difference--that French is not proscribed, as my hon. friend (Mr. Tarte) seems to think, but what is prescribed is that in every school in the North-west Territories English shall be taught.

Mr. BRODEUR.

Mr. LAURIER. All right.

Mr. DAVIN. My hon. friend, the leader of the Opposition, says that is right, and he could not say otherwise, for he is a man of broad views. I have read his courageous speeches made in the heart of the province of Quebec, in which he has pointed out the importance to his own race and the importance to all Canada of our French Canadian friends learning English.

Mr. LAURIER. I understand that the teaching of English is prescribed. Is the teaching of French optional or is it proscribed ?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. In those districts where it is the mother tongue of the children the bi-lingual readers of Ontario are used.

Mr. DAVIN. In those districts in which French is the mother tongue of the children, French is taught. English also is taught--they have the bi-lingual readers which are used in Ontario.

Both the Prime Minister and the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) asserted that in the separate schools the French language is permitted, and can be employed during the whole course. It is true that according to the ordinance of 1888, French was permissive and could be used in the separate schools. That law provided that a primary course of English should be taught, but French was permissive during the whole course, and the French-Canadians in the North-west had a right to be educated in French. What is the position of the French-Canadians in the North-west to-day in respect to this ? The ordinance of 1892 provide :

That all schools shall be taught in the English language and instruction will be given in the following branches. * * * It shall be permissible for the trustees of any school to cause the primary course to be taught in the French language.

It will be seen from this that according to the ordinance of 1888, the French language could be used in the separate schools during the whole course, but according to the ordinance of 1892 French is only permissible for small children of five, six, seven or eight years old. It therefore cannot be denied that our French-Canadian people have been deprived of the rights which they had under the ordinance of 1888. Let us see how they changed the law in this respect. The ordinance of 1888 read as follows :—

All schools shall be taught and instruction given in the following branches.

Now they have changed that in the ordinance of 1892 to read as follows :—

All schools shall be taught in the English language and instruction will be given in the following branches.

It cannot be denied from this that the teaching of French in the North-west is not now in the same position as it was by the ordinance of 1888. The Prime Minister was then entirely mistaken the other night when he conveyed the idea that the French-Candians in the North-west Territories were in the same position as the French-Canadians in the province of Ontario. Let us see how the Catholics are treated in that great province which is governed by a Liberal Premier. In Ontario the French language is not the official language, but notwithstanding that they can teach French in the separate schools during the whole course. On the other hand, in the North-west Territories where French is the official language the French-Canadians have not the right to be taught in French. We have also a great grievance in the provision of the present ordinance regarding the examination of teachers. Here is what Father Leduc reports in reference to that in an interview which he had with the Secretary of the Council of Public Instruction :

I.—FOR THE EXAMINATION.

Before 1892, the candidates could pass their examinations in French. The examination papers were translated in this language, and twice I have been charged myself with this translation.

On Thursday last, the 22nd instant, I was at Regina. In order not to assert anything but perfectly certain, I went to see Mr. James Brown, the secretary of the Council of Public Instruction, and I put to him officially the following questions :

Q.—Under the ordinance of 1888, could the candidates pass their examinations in French ?

A.—Yes.

Q.—Were the examination papers translated in French ?

A.—You know it well ; you have translated them yourself.

Q.—Under the ordinance of 1892, by which we are governed to-day, can the candidates still pass their examinations in French ?

A.—I do not see that they can do it.

Q.—If the candidates did write their examinations in French, would these examinations be recognized in the Council of Public Instruction ?

A.—No.

Therefore it is evident that the French language is abolished for the examinations.

My hon. friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) wanted us to point out to him some grievance, and asked us to show him in what respect the position of the Catholics had been changed under the ordinance of 1892 from what it was under the ordinance of 1888. Here is an assertion made concerning the teaching of French in separate schools. Previously we had the right in the separate schools to teach French, but now it is denied. Under the ordinance of 1888 French-Canadians could pass their examination for teaching in the French language, but now, as you will find by the assertion of the secretary of the Council for Public Instruction, they cannot do so. If the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) does not find any grievances in all the facts I have brought before this House, then I must say that he is a very difficult man to satisfy. Let us now see what the Government should have done with regard to this ordinance of 1892. Were they entitled to allow these Acts or was it not their sacred duty to come to the rescue of the Catholic minority in the North-west Territories and give them the right of controlling their own schools ? My hon. friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) has said: You are not deprived of your schools; you have your separate schools. No, we have no separate schools now in the North-west. The right of having separate schools is the right of controlling our schools, choosing our books, appointing our inspectors, and appointing our examiners. All these rights are now denied by the ordinance of 1892; and consequently we have no longer separate schools in the North-west. It is said that separate schools are abolished in Manitoba; but by the contention of my hon. friend, they are not abolished, because a law was not passed explicitly declaring the separate schools to be abolished. It is true, there was no such law passed; but laws have been passed by which the separate schools have been virtually abolished. Now, Mr. Speaker, what was the right and duty of the Government? The right of the Government, the duty of the Government, was to disallow that Act. I have quoted section 17 of the North-west Territories Act, which formally declares that the Government has the right to veto all Acts of the Legislature of the North-west when it thinks fit. Well, is not the law concerning these schools a law which should have been disallowed? I say yes, it should have been disallowed, for two reasons: because it was unconstitutional, and because it was virtually killing the good harmony which existed until that time in the Dominion of Canada. Why has the power of veto been placed in the hands of the Government? It is for the Government to see that the constitution as contained in the British North America Act of 1867 shall be well established. Mr. Casgrain, the Attorney General of Quebec, speaking in Montreal some time ago, said :

The Federal Government had the right, and I say it was its duty to veto all laws contrary to the general interests of the Dominion.

That law was certainly against the general interests of the Dominion, because it is the duty of this Government to see that all sections of the country are in harmony, and that no section is ill treated; and when a minority is ill treated, as I have proven the minority in the North-west to have been in regard to their schools, by the ordinance of 1892, it is the duty of the Government to exercise its power of disallowance. But the Government said in its report that it would have been useless to disallow or veto that Act. Archbishop Taché answers the Government in the following way:—

The minority of the North-west have petitioned for the disallowance of the ordinance of 1892, because it deprives them of most of the rights they enjoyed by the ordinance of 1888, and because as they say: The said ordinance, inasmuch as it places in the hands of non-Catholics the absolute control and management of Catholic separate schools to such an extent that such persons are enabled, as they have actually done, to obliterate almost wholly the distinction between Catholic and other schools.

To this complaint, made in such a general way, the committee answer:—It would appear from the facts that the disallowance of the ordinance in question will not meet the complaints alleged in the petitions, otherwise than by restoring the Board of Education which had control of the schools of the territories before the ordinance of 1893 was passed, because in other respects, the law and regulations concerning education in the territories were not materially different before the ordinance of 1892 was passed from what they now are, in so far as the points mentioned in the petition are concerned. Disallowance would not nullify any of the regulations complained of.

This assertion of the Committee is perhaps construed cleverly enough to catch the assent of those unaware of the change which has taken place, but the same assertion, in spite of its restriction, does not stand before the real comprehension of the facts and their consequences. The committee says: Disallowance will not nullify any of the regulations complained of. On the contrary, disallowance would restore the right of modifying all such regulations, and in fact abolish all regulations as well as dispositions uncongenial to the ordinance of 1888. For instance, it would abolish the office of superintendent and the power invested in its incumbent to make and establish rules and regulations for the conduct of schools and to institute and to prescribe the duties of teachers, and their classification.

So we see that the ordinance could have been disallowed; and if it had been disallowed, the Catholics of the North-west would have had restored to them the rights of which they were deprived. If the Government want another authority, I will cite the authority of a member of this House, whom I do not see in his seat, but who, I think, will express here at a future day the opinion which he has expressed in his paper. The hon. member for Provencher (Mr. La-Rivière), in his paper 'Le Manitoba,' makes a charge against the Government which I hope they will take cognizance of. We are not accustomed to find charges brought against the Government by that hon. gentleman. This is what he said in his paper:

That ordinance, No. 22, 1892, "c'est ballon d'essai," the success of which was to determine the fate of the minority, might have burst at Ottawa if the Federal Government had willed it; but it has refused its protection to the weak. Is it then decided in Ottawa that it will tolerate the violation of the rights, natural and acquired, of those who are not numerous enough nor audacious enough to constitute a dangerous element?

This is what has been said by a staunch friend of the Government. He asserts that the Government had not the courage to disallow that Act, and yielded to the influence of some fanatics who control them. I may cite also on that question the authority of a man who is pre-eminent in the councils of the Conservative party in the province of Quebec; I mean the Hon. Thomas Chapais, a member of the Conservative Government of the province of Quebec, who is also the son-in-law of the hon. member for Three Rivers (Sir Hector Langevin); and I should think that what he has declared in his paper is an echo of the sentiments of that hon. member. Mr. Chapais, in his paper, says:

We said the other day that on the question of the North-west schools the Federal Government had the power to veto, that the circumstances justified the disallowance, and that if the right of disallowance could not be used to protect the minorities, it must be abolished, because it should have been resorted to in this particular instance.

Well, we have the opinion of eminent men that this ordinance should be disallowed. The law is very plain. The section I have cited says plainly that the Government has the right to veto any Act passed by the Legislature of the North-west. Why, then, did not the Government take, concerning the North-west legislation, the position it took concerning the Manitoba schools. We know that last year the Government said: We cannot interfere with the Manitoba schools until the Supreme Court gives its decision upon our right of interference. The Government took this ground because, in 1891, a law was passed providing that, before dealing with the power of disallowance, the Government should ask from the Supreme Court, and, if necessary, from the Privy Council in England, whether it had the right to interfere. Well, the Government thought fit last year, before exercising any jurisdiction in the matter of the Manitoba schools, to send the question to the Supreme Court. Why should it not do the same thing in the matter of the North-west legislation? Why should it not refer also the questions of fact which appear in the petitions from the Catholics of the North-west? Why did it not refer to the Supreme Court those questions of fact in order to see whether the Government should exercise its right of disallowance or not? No, Mr. Speaker, instead of doing that, the Government passed immediate judgment on that question. The Government refused to disallow that Act, and consequently the Catholics of the North-west are now deprived of the rights they formerly enjoyed. I do not mean to say that the Government took the right course in referring the Manitoba question last year to the courts. On the contrary, I say that the Government should have disallowed the Manitoba Act, which is as unjust as the North-west Act; but I say that if the Government last year thought fit to refer the Manitoba Act to the courts, they should have done the same thing with reference to the North-west ordinance. Of one thing we are certain, and that is that all this agitation concerning the schools was started by the Conservative party. I do not see now in his seat the gentleman who was the first to raise in this country the cry against separate schools. I do not see in his seat the hon. member for East Durham (Mr. Craig), who is responsible for all that agitation raised in 1889 against separate schools in Ontario, Manitoba, and the North-west. That hon. gentleman was the first who tried to abolish indirectly separate schools in this country. This I will prove by reading the motion made by him in 1889 in the Provincial Legislature of Ontario, of which he was then a member :

The English tongue is the language of the province of Ontario; and no system of public instruction, which does not insure that in every school aided by provincial funds, or supported in whole or in part by local taxation, the teachers employed are capable of imparting instruction in the English tongue—and that every pupil is instructed in it—and does not recognize and act upon the recognition that the English language is to be the language of such schools and require that the books in use in them, except those employed in giving religious instruction when and where such instruction is permitted by law, shall be approved of by the department having charge of educational affairs,—is satisfactory to this House.

That hon. gentleman is one of the best friends of the Government, one of the best friends of the Cabinet Ministers from the province of Quebec. Well, what happened then? Had Sir Oliver Mowat been as deficient in courage as the members of this Government, the separate schools of Ontario would have been virtually abolished. But what happened was this. In reply to that motion, Sir Oliver Mowat said :

If that motion was confined to public schools he would have no objection to it; as far as the separate schools were concerned, he was not prepared to admit that the Legislature had the authority to prescribe what text books should be used in separate schools. The Legislature was bound by the British North America Act, and he was not prepared to say that that Act gave them the power referred to. As would be well known to the House, there never had been any jurisdiction admitted to be exercised by the Legislature over the text books of the separate schools. Attempts have been made to get them to use voluntarily the text books of the separate schools, but as to imposing those text books upon them he was not prepared to say that the House had jurisdiction to that extent, and he should not advise the House to that effect. He cites then 93rd section British North America Act.

The Hon. Mr. Hardy also said :

That if any attempt was made to legislate concerning the text books, those affected would appeal to the Privy Council at Ottawa, which would undoubtedly sustain them.

We see, therefore, that the agitation to abolish the separate schools was raised by the member for East Durham (Mr. Craig), and we see also that the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague) has admitted that the declaration of war against the separate schools in Ontario, made by the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), had been prepared by Mr. Farrar, who was then in the employ of the Government, making its campaign literature. It is evident, therefore, that if separate schools have been abolished in the North-west Territories and Manitoba, the agitation for their abolition was started by the Conservative party. And we know that last night one of the Conservative members in the Ontario Legislature attempted once more to deprive Catholics of their rights in Ontario, and in this attempt obtained the solid support of the Conservative party in that House. It will, perhaps, be replied that in Manitoba it was the Liberals who abolished the separate schools. Yes, Mr. Speaker, it is very much to be regretted that men who call themselves Liberals have thought fit to abolish separate schools in Manitoba, and the use of the French language. But there is one thing in that connection which affords me great pleasure, and that is that when the Manitoba Government proclaimed that policy, all the Catholic Liberals in Manitoba rose as one man to protest against it. And those who had portfolios in that Government resigned their positions. Do we see the same thing to-day in the Federal Government? Do we see the French-Canadian members of the Cabinet resigning their seats when they find the Government of which they are members abolishing separate schools in the North-west? No; there is no danger. It is true that Martin, the Liberal, has abolished separate schools in Manitoba; but the French members of the Manitoba Government resigned when that was done. Here we see the Federal Government virtually abolishing the separate schools of the North-west, and, at the same time, we see the French-Canadian members keeping their seats in the Cabinet, and, consequently, approving what the Government has done. Mr. Speaker, I shall not add more to this discussion except to cite the conclusions to which Archbishop Taché has come after having examined the conduct of the Government :

Meanwhile the seed of fanaticism and religious persecution is planted in the plains of the North-west; it is carefully cultivated at Regina, surrounded and protected by parliamentary enactments and official cares. The obnoxious seed has already obtained the proportion of a large tree. By order from Ottawa it could have been eradicated; but no, it is allowed to grow under the simple advice to cut off its longest stems, if thought to exceed proper dimensions, to graft on its coarse trunk some better shoots, from which could be gathered fruits less offensive to the taste of individuals and less dangerous to society.

I have read the report with a deep feeling of surprise and pain; it may be perhaps considered as a clever piece of pleading against Catholic interests—

French members of the Cabinet may take cognizance of the charge of the archbishop.

—but I regret excessively to be prevented from considering it as a complete statement of the case or an impartial judgment of the same. No one was condescending enough to inform the Venerable Bishop Grandin, or those who represented him or any of the representatives of the Catholic population, of what the chief of the Executive at Regina had communicated to Ottawa; documents and views which have been all accepted, without challenge and without giving to the interested parties the least chance of refuting them.

What says Father Leduc ?

The Committee of the Privy Council has the greatest sympathy for us. It extremely regrets that the ordinance of 1892 has been the involuntary (?) cause of dissatisfaction and alarms. The ordinance is maintained. With it and under the cover of legality, they will be able to increase, to multiply the difficulties and obstacles to hinder our Catholic schools to work; they will impose on us new regulations more tyrannical, more impracticable than ever; the good will of the past of the members of the Council of Public Instruction and of the Legislature is a proof, at least probable, of their future good will.

The Committee of the Privy Council commends us to the mercy, to the generosity of the avowed enemies of our religious institutions, of our schools, of our convents. They have shown their dispositions (?) and now they are requested to amend either the ordinance or the regulations of the Council of Public Instruction in order to remedy our grievances and our alarms, if any.

Is this truly what we had a right to expect? Could such a decision satisfy the request of the petitioners? Does it conform to justice? Is this a specimen of the boasted "British Fair Play?"

We are sacrificed to the breath of the deplorable fanaticism which blows over our Territories; our rights are trampled upon; our Catholic schools existing by law, exist only in name.

It might have been otherwise; the Government at Ottawa has not willed it.

Now, Mr. Speaker, here is the position made by the Government for the Catholics of the North-west. Eminent clergymen come to us and declare that the Government should have maintained the rights of the Catholics of the North-west, that it should have prevented the injustice caused by the ordinance of 1892; but, instead of listening to the spirit of justice and fair play, they have listened, as has been stated by one of these eminent men, only to a few fanatics who control the Government. Is it not to be deplored that in this country the French-Canadians and Catholics should be treated as they have been? In the province of Quebec, where we have a majority, we have treated the Protestants with justice. They have no complaint to make against us. Why should they not give us in Manitoba and the North-west the same rights that we give to the Protestant minority in Quebec? We see that the Liberal party was the first to establish the separate schools in the North-west. We see that the Liberal party, at the instance of the Hon. Mr. Scott, the present leader of the Opposition in the Senate, established separate schools in Ontario. We see that, if we depended on the good-will of the Conservative party, the Catholic schools of Ontario and in the North-west would be entirely abolished. On one side we see the Liberal party disposed to be just to the minority, and on the other the Conservative party which has always been unjust to the Catholics. I will ask my hon. friends on this side who come from Ontario to be just to the Catholics of the North-west, as their great leader in provincial politics is just to the Catholics in this province. We hope that they will help us restore to the Catholics of the North-west the rights of which they have been deprived, and I trust the Liberal party will continue to be just, as it has always been, to the minority.

Mr. MACDOWALL. Mr. Speaker, I do not often trouble the House, but, on a question so directly affecting the interests of the North-west, I think I may venture to trespass upon your time for a few minutes. The hon. gentleman from Rouville (Mr. Brodeur) has made an appeal to the Liberal members from Ontario to support the Catholics in the North-west. I do not see how they are to give that support in this case, for I understand that the motion under discussion is simply a motion for papers which are likely to be brought down. So far as the question is concerned, as it presents itself to the people of the North-west, my hon. friend from West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) has already fully discussed this question, and the only matter raised by the hon. member for Rouville has been the question whether separate schools still exist in the North-west or not. Section 14 of the North-west Territories Act, which has not been abolished, provides:

The ratepayers establishing such Protestant or Roman Catholic separate schools shall be liable only to assessments of such rates as they impose upon themselves in respect thereof.

It also provides fully for the maintenance of separate schools in the North-west. That clause, which was introduced, I believe, in the year 1876, has never been altered. It governs the school question, as regards separate schools in the North-west to-day, as it did in 1876, and the conditions under which separate schools are governed in the North-west are practically the same to-day as they were then. The hon. member for Rouville said that my hon. friend from West Assiniboia had endeavoured to raise prejudices against the Catholics by his speech. I think, viewing the speech from an independent point, the hon. gentleman endeavoured to his very utmost to do away with prejudices. The whole spirit of the people of the North-west is to put down all prejudices against forms of religion. We believe in civil and religious liberty to all mankind, in the fullest sense of the word. We who are Protestants believe that our Roman Catholic friends should have the fullest and freest liberty in regard to their schools, with regard to their Church, and with regard to their religion. When I look at the Ordinance of the North-west Government, although I am myself a Protestant, yet having many friends among the Roman Catholics, I can only look upon it as a protection of the Roman Catholics in respect of the maintenance of separate schools in the North-west. We know that of late years an agitation has been started in this House by the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) and those who follow him, directed against separate schools in the North-west. This has doubtless caused some irritation in the country. I believe that the Ordinance passed by the North-west Government will probably be the means of removing this irritation, and if it removes this irritation without removing separate schools, I think those who wish to maintain separate schools in the North-west should be the first to applaud it and the last to decry it. The hon. member for Rouville said that the majority in the North-west were trying to destroy the minority. I do not think that I need dwell very long on that subject, because he evidently is not acquainted with the people of the North-west, he evidently is not acquainted with the spirit that rules the majority, by whom I suppose he means the Protestants; for they have no desire whatever to impede in any way the action of the Roman Catholics with regard to their religion. I know that in the district I represent, whenever Roman Catholics desire to erect a church or erect a school, they find no more willing subscribers than among their Protestant friends, and that itself is the best evidence that the Protestant majority of the North-west do not wish to take any unfair advantage of the Roman Catholic minority. Now, with regard to the normal school teaching, the hon. member read a resolution that was passed at a meeting of the Board of Education held on the 25th January, 1888, and he stopped there; he forgot to read a copy of the resolution that was passed on the 3rd September, 1891, and which was quoted by my hon. friend from West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin). It was moved by Mr. A. E. Forget, who is himself a Roman Catholic, and it reads as follows:—

Mr. BRODEUR.

That all persons, inspectorates of Eastern and Western Assiniboia who obtained non-professional certificates at the recent examination of teachers and not holding certificates of normal training and who desire to obtain professional certificates be required to attend a normal session either at Moosomin or Regina; such normal session to commence on the reopening of the union schools after the Christmas holidays and to terminate, for third class teachers, six weeks and for first and second class teachers, three months from the date of commencement.

Therefore, the first motion towards requiring the teachers to pass an examination and obtain a certificate at the normal schools, was moved by one of the representatives of the Roman Catholic Church in the North-west Territories. As regards these normal schools, I may say that they are peripatetic. It is not provided in that Ordinance that they should be peripatetic, but it is the policy of the Government of the North-west that wherever it is in the public interest, that is to say, wherever there are a sufficient number of candidates in any one of the small sections of the North-west, a normal school shall be held and an examination of candidates shall take place, and certificates shall be issued. At the same time, teachers may be employed in the North-west who have certificates from any province in Canada, or from any other country in the world where a certificate is granted. It is not necessary that they should have certificates granted by the normal schools of the North-west Territories. In the future, teachers applying for certificates must pass an examination before the normal schools, but these normal schools move about from point to point, so as to make it as easy as possible for the candidates to attend them. With regard to the books that are used, the hon. member for Rouville said that the new regulation with regard to books practically abolished separate schools. The information that I have received concerning books from some of the ladies who teach in Roman Catholic schools in the North-west, is simply this, that they were put to the expense of buying a new set of books, and the new set of books are just as good as the old set were; and I consider that the ladies are perhaps the best judges as to those books. With regard to the attack on the Government for refusing to exercise their veto power against this Ordinance, I may say that the leader of the Opposition and the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) cannot support the contention of the hon. member for Rouville, because it is clearly laid down in the Acts establishing the constitution of the North-west, that the North-west Assembly has power, within the Acts, to regulate their schools, and if this Ordinance is within the power of these Acts, it would be certainly out of the question for the Government here to veto the Ordinance, I do not think the hon. member for Rouville has proved that the Ordinance was ultra vires, and if it is intra vires I do not see how he could expect the Government to veto it. I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, and I can assure the House, that the people of the North-west do not wish full provincial powers at present. They wish for certain powers for their own good government and the good government of their territory, and they consider that one of the most important matters for them is the matter of affecting their schools and affecting their education. They desire that the regulations concerning this matter should be carried out in a manner that will be fair to every religious denomination and fair to every man, whatever language he speaks. But they would one and all resent any action by the Government in Ottawa that would interfere with the powers that are given to their Legislature in the North-west. Therefore, I myself cannot agree with the hon. member for Rouville, and I must support the Government in declining to exercise that veto. We hear in this House that a great many petitions have been sent down to the Government concerning the North-west schools. There are only four members representing the North-west Territories, and yet I, for one, who represent more than one-third of the whole area of the territory, have not had a single complaint made to me with regard to this Ordinance. I believe that in my district there are more Roman Catholics than in any other district in the North-west Territories. I am personally a friend of a great many of them, and I am certain that if any great hardship had been done to them, I should have heard it, and I should have been asked to take action as their representative in this House. But no mention has ever been made to me of any grievance. I have raised the question once or twice, and as far as I can find out, the only fear they have is not with regard to what has taken place, but rather with regard to what might take place; and what might take place is this, that the normal schools might not remain peripatetic, and some of the ladies who belong to these orders and who cannot stay at hotels and other places of public entertainment, might be debarred from attending these normal schools. But the custom in the Territories is now established, and that custom is to make the normal school peripatetic, so that wherever there is a sufficient number of candidates, a normal school shall be held, and an examination shall be had of all the teachers. I think myself that this is a good thing for the North-west; it is a good thing to have a uniform system so far as you can, without interfering with religious prejudices. I do not believe we ought to interfere unnecessarily with the religious prejudices of our neighbours, however free we ourselves may be from these prejudices, because while from our point of view they may appear to be prejudices, from their point of view they may not appear to be so. But the Ordinance so far as it goes does not interfere with these prejudices in the least. It allows liberty to all. It provides for a uniform system of education. Every teacher must pass an examination and be proved to be fit to teach the young. The inspectors of schools must be fit to inspect schools; and with respect to those inspectors, whom the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Brodeur) called the enemies of Catholic institutions, I may say one of them was Rev. Father Gillies, who only resigned his position the other day. That is one of the most direct proofs in refutation of the statement that the inspectors are the enemies of separate schools in the North-west Territories. I will conclude the few remarks I have to offer by endeavouring to impress on the House the fact that the people of the North-west, even though the majority may be Protestants, have no idea, have no wish, have not the slightest desire in any way to impede the good work that may be done by the minority, they have no desire to interfere with their religion in any way whatever, and I believe that the minority if they appeal to the Protestant majority in the North-west will always find ready and willing helpers to assist them in their good work.

Mr. LEGRIS. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, the motion now before you creates too strong an interest to let it pass without my taking the liberty to offer a few remarks before this House should agree to it. We have already heard some hon. gentlemen opposite dealing with this question. They did it, intending to defend the action of the Cabinet, and the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) specially endeavoured to show that the stand taken by the Government was one which should command the approval of the people of Canada. He also undertook to persuade this House that the Catholics of Manitoba and the North-west Territories had no grievances; that the Ordinance of 1892 made no change whatever in the position of the Catholics in those territories, that they did not change the position of the Catholic and French people in that country, that the state of affairs now is just the same as that which existed previous to the Ordinance of 1892. On the other hand, the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Brodeur), showed in a plain and victorious way that there were considerable grievances from the Catholic and French people in the North-west Territories. He evidenced his statement by quoting from the law and competent authorities, and the testimonials of bishops and archbishops, and other leading men belonging to the Catholic clergy of the North-west; he showed, I say, that the Catholic people were ill-treated, since they took away from them, if not immediately, at least in a sure way and in a near future, schools to which they had a right, and the teaching and use of a language to which they had likewise an indisputable right. The hon. member for Saskatchewan (Mr. Macdowall), who has just replied to the statements of my hon. friend the member for Rouville (Mr. Brodeur), repeated the statement of his colleague, the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), namely, that the Catholics had no reason to complain. I am astonished, Mr. Speaker, to find that, for want of argument, they should always persist in saying that the Catholic people of those territories have no grievances, and that their position is now the same as before the adoption of the Ordinance of 1892. If it were truly so, if, as contended, the position were not changed, why then, I ask, should they have passed that Ordinance? And, as for that, a single fact shows that it is not so, and that the contention of these members is unfounded. The control—and that has been admitted—now belongs to the members of the Executive Council, who, every one of them, are Protestants. I grant that, for form's sake, and in order to give some means of defence to those who would try to justify such a measure, it was enacted that this Board, at first composed of the members of the Executive Council, should also include two additional Catholic members and two Protestant members. But they hastened to add that these four representatives taken outside of the Executive Council should have no right to vote. So they were only appointed, and this provision was simply made in order to give them a right to make appointments pro forma, and not for the protection of the rights of the Catholics in those territories. It is also plain that by such a change the educational interests were handed over to a Protestant Board. Even though they should state over and over again that the position is not changed, that the state of affairs as regards the schools is the same as before, it is true for all that that the Catholic schools are entirely under the control of a Protestant Board, and that, some day or other, when the pill will have been swallowed, as common people say, the laws will be strictly carried out, and the Catholics will then have what is in store for them. For my part, if I deem it my duty to offer presently a few remarks, it is not that I hope that the Catholics of Manitoba or those of the North-west will be given back their free schools. I verily believe that, through the weakness of the men now in power, through their want of energy, through the want of courage of those who represent the Catholic element in the Cabinet, I verily believe, I say, that the schools in those territories and in Manitoba are abolished and will remain so. But while I have that feeling, while I do not hope that the Government could remove the evil done, while I have no hope that they could cause that to be given back to the Catholics which they allowed to be taken away from them through such guilty weakness, I think it is well, nevertheless, that the responsibilities should be settled. If the claim for disallowance was not pressed with such urgency with respect to the law affecting the schools of the province of Manitoba, as with respect to the Ordinances coming from the North-west Territories, we know, and the country at large now knows the reason why. It was because promises had been made and because these people to whom they were made reposed too much confidence in the present Government. These promises had been accepted and certain Ministers, amongst others the hon. the First Minister (Sir John Thompson) had misled the leaders of the Catholic people in Manitoba, and led them to believe that means would be taken, without, however, injuring the Government, whereby justice would be done the Catholics. We find a sure evidence of the suggestion I am now making in the letter of His Grace Archbishop Taché, dated August 20th, 1892, from which I quote the following extract:—

That the intention of the legislature, in passing the Manitoba Act was to guarantee to us our separate schools, I have not the shadow of a doubt. It is for that reason that, even after the decision of the Privy Council, I say that the constitution is shamefully violated and that if a remedy is not applied to the evil, the federal power will have one more iniquity, one more shame to its credit.

Sir John Thompson has pledged himself officially and publicly; others did likewise, privately but solemnly. Let all do their duty. Let the press and people support them, they will make themselves greater; but we could be the more weak for our papers having cried out loudly should these cries, like so many others, end by a servile submission to the will of our opponents.

It is plain that, in order to let the election pass away, the Ministers, putting aside all dignity, all scruple, made to His Grace Archbishop Taché, who was claiming the disallowance of the school laws of the province of Manitoba—it is plain, I say, that the Ministers made promises of every kind so as to let the election time pass away and avoid the protest which they would certainly have received, had they not resorted to such subterfuges. The evidence of such promises having been made is to be found in the report of the hon. the Minister of Justice, dated March 21st, 1891, in which it is stated:

If the legal controversy should result in the decision of the Court of Queen's Bench being sustained, the time will come for Your Excellency to consider the petitions which have been presented by and on behalf of the Roman Catholics of Manitoba.

This is taken from a report signed by the hon. the First Minister, then as now Minister of Justice and speaking on behalf of the Government. He then gave to His Grace Archbishop Taché the official guarantee that should not the courts do justice to the minority, should they not give back to the Catholics the rights taken away from them by the school laws of Manitoba, the time would come when the petitions of the Catholics would have to be considered. It is plain, Mr. Speaker, to any man willing to understand what that means, it is plain that the Government thereby promised to remove the evil done by those laws. As for the North-west school law, the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Brodeur) quoted from it fully enough to dispense me with repeating what he himself stated. I think it proper, however, to quote a letter from Archbishop Taché, addressed from St. Boniface to the hon. the First Minister under date January 2, 1894. His Grace writes as follows:—

ST. BONIFACE, 2nd January, 1894.

RIGHT HONOURABLE AND DEAR SIR JOHN.—Your telegram was received last night and I hasten this morning to answer both by telegram and letter.

I have not a copy of the full text of the regulations made under the Ordinance No. 22, A.D., 1892. I see the utility of that document to show an instance of what can be done in virtue of the Ordinance itself, so I write and telegraph to Regina to obtain what you desire.

Permit me to state that such regulations are but an instance of what can be done. Even if such regulations had been delayed, it would prove nothing in favor of the Ordinance, though the regulations themselves add to the conviction of the danger contained in the Ordinance. The fact is that, on the strength of the said ordinance, the Catholics are altogether in the hands of the open adversaries of their schools, and if the Ordinance is allowed to go on, it is merely and simply the sacrificing of the rights, privileges and practice of the Catholic population, and that even in communities exclusively French and Catholic.

The dangers of the Ordinance of which we complain are so obvious, that at first we thought it was unnecessary to petition for its disallowance and that the government would prevent its coming into force. It seemed impossible that the Ordinance would escape its notice.

Now that we have petitioned, let us hope that we have not done so in vain. The Catholics are weak in the North-west and that but increases the obligation of the government to protect them.

With the most profound respect and esteem,
I remain your obedient servant,

† ALEX., Arch. of St. Boniface,
O.M.I.

Two days later, that is to say on the 4th January, he wrote to the hon. the First Minister a new letter worded as follows:—

ST. BONIFACE, 4th January, 1894.

RIGHT HONOURABLE AND DEAR SIR JOHN.—I herewith inclose three documents I secured and they are marked A, B, C. You will easily perceive therein that no French or even Catholic book can be used in the schools of the North-west above the second standard.

You will also observe that all teachers, nuns as well as others, are obliged to pass the prescribed professional examination after a session in the normal school. This is actually in vigour and the Council of Public Instruction has the power to do still worse.

I therefore strongly urge the disallowance of the school Ordinance of the North-west Territories, enacted in 1892, and No. 22 also of the amendments to the said Ordinance passed in 1893, and No. 23.

May I be allowed to add that this trouble in the North-west is the result of what has happened in Manitoba. The delay is increasing the difficulties and adding to the injustice perpetrated against the Catholics and French who have been the pioneers in this country. What a disgrace to Canada if this injustice is allowed to go on without being checked.

With much respect and esteem,
Your obedient servant,

† ALEX., Arch. of Saint Boniface,
O.M.I.

Mr. LEGRIS.

This, it seems to me, is a new evidence that does away with the unfounded and all gratuitous statement of the hon. members for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) and Saskatchewan (Mr. Macdowall). And I think that every Catholic in this House and even every hon. member who will choose to consider this matter calmly and do justice to whom it is due, will acknowledge that the testimony of Bishop Taché, in this case, has surely more weight and is far more plausible than that of the hon. members I have just referred to. Now, following are the conclusions to which Bishop Taché comes, after writing the two letters I have just mentioned:

CONCLUSIONS.—Meanwhile the seed of fanaticism and religious persecution is planted in the plains of the North-west; it is carefully cultivated at Regina, surrounded and protected by parliamentary enactments and official cares. The obnoxious seed has already obtained the proportion of a large tree. By order from Ottawa, it could have been eradicated; but no, it is allowed to grow under the simple advice to cut off its longest stems, if thought to exceed proper dimensions, to graft on its coarse trunk some better shoots, from which could be gathered fruits less offensive to the taste of individuals and less dangerous to society.

I have read the report with a deep feeling of surprise and pain; it may be perhaps considered as a clever piece of pleading against Catholic interests, but I regret excessively to be prevented from considering it as a complete statement of the case or an impartial judgment of the same. The report is largely a mere endorsement of Mr. Haultain's views, though it does not require the well known ability of the members of the committee to ascertain that the memorial of Mr. Haultain can, in great measure, be easily refuted by the very text of the two Ordinances spoken of.

I easily understand that at a distance, without full practical knowledge of the details and the working of the two school systems, some errors could have found their way in the report, in spite of the best will; but what I cannot understand is that the Catholics have been kept in complete ignorance of Mr. Haultain's assertions against their petitions. No one was condescending enough to inform the Venerable Bishop Grandin or those who represented him, or any of the representatives of the Catholic population, of what the chief of the executive at Regina had communicated to Ottawa; documents and views which have been all accepted without challenge, and without giving to the interested parties the least chance of refuting them.

This is how the religious authorities in the North-west Territories were dealt with, these very authorities which were made to consent to a reference of the Manitoba school question to the courts, while disallowance was still within the time allowed. I repeat what I have already stated, that I do not think the Government are willing—and were they willing, the task would be made much more difficult to remedy the evil done to the Catholics of Manitoba and the North-west Territories. I consider they have been greatly wanting in their duty when they declined to disallow the Manitoba school law, as they were wanting in their duty when they declined to allow the North-west Ordinances relating to schools passed in 1892. The Government ought to have disallowed those laws. They ought to have done so for their own autonomy; they ought to have done so through deference to vested rights. They ought to have done so in pursuance of the conditions under which those provinces came into the Dominion. They ought to have done so for the protection of minorities. The right of disallowance was specially conferred for the protection of minorities, in whatever part of the Dominion they happen to be. Not only have they got the right, but it is their duty to protect the weak against the strong. Suppose, Mr. Speaker, that the very laws which are complained of in Manitoba and the North-west should have been enacted by the Government of the province of Quebec; suppose that the Catholics of that province, who are in a great majority—the non-Catholics being only 13 per cent of the whole population of that province—suppose, I say, that those very laws should compel the Protestants to send their children to schools which are altogether under the control of Catholics, what would we see? There would be a general concourse of feeling among the whole Protestant population of the Dominion, who would complain of the federal executive power should it not disallow such laws, and they would be right. I have a good mind that the federal power would not hesitate to disallow such laws if ever they should be passed? Why, then, not give the same measure of protection, why not do justice to the Catholic minority, that justice which they would hasten to grant to the Protestant minority, should it ever so happen? Why should the Government not have done the same justice to the Catholics of Manitoba that should be granted to the Protestants, if the same thing should ever be done against them in the province of Quebec? I find, Mr. Speaker, by the last census, that the total population of the North-west Territories numbers 66,799 souls; of that number, 13,008 are Catholics, and 53,791 non-Catholics, which gives a proportion of 20 per cent of Catholics. In Manitoba, out of a population of 152,506, there are 20,571 Catholics and 131,935 non-Catholics, or 13 per cent of Catholics. The aggregate population of both the North-west Territories and Manitoba amounts to 219,305. Out of that figure there are 33,579 Catholics and 185,726 non-Catholics, or 15 per cent of Catholics. In the province of Quebec, there are only about 13 per cent of Protestants, out of the whole population. Well, suppose the same case should happen—and I am happy to be in a position to loudly proclaim that it will never happen—the Catholics would favourably look upon the disallowance of such a legislation. Why, therefore, deny the Catholics that same justice which they would feel satisfied should be granted to their separate brethren? For, after all, we have a right to live in this country, to enjoy that liberty which the constitution secures to us to practise our religion, liberty granted to our separate brethren. That liberty we wish them to enjoy, as we ourselves wish to keep and hand down to our descendants. For many years since and before confederation, one political party always held much sway in the province of Quebec, by contending and succeeding by the use of every possible means in its power in having it believed that it had all to itself the monopoly of good principles. The Conservative party went on incessantly repeating that they were the only good party, the only party in which one could hope to go to heaven. On the contrary, the Liberal party, or all those who belonged to it, were condemned before judgment; they could hope for nothing else but hell for their lot. That notion was cleverly worked upon so as to benefit the party which was instilling it into the minds of our people. To reach their end, the leaders had at their devotion a powerful press, supported by all the advantages flowing from a long enjoyment of a power cleverly speculated upon, and other still more influential means. That idea was advocated, was engraved in the minds of the people to such an extent that even now, notwithstanding the reaction that took place, there are to be found in the province of Quebec worthy citizens who earnestly believe the Conservative party is synonymous with a Catholic party, and that outside of that party a French Canadian cannot cast a vote according to his conscience. It is through this erroneous conviction of the superiority and excellence of the Conservative party that the Catholics did not rise up sooner and call in due time for the disallowance of the Manitoba school law. There were so many who believed that the Conservative party was a sufficient guarantee to tranquillize every conscience. Now that the facts are before us, now that we know what we are to believe—and I for one, who was for many years a member of that party, who was somewhat concerned in the political contests in the county I now represent—I know what political machine we made with that catchword. I know that such an opinion as I have just stated played a great part. I was in rather close connection with the Conservative voters and leaders of my county, and if I make such a statement, it is because I feel it is true. I am quite convinced that these popular fallacies, supported by too strong sympathies in certain quarters, much contributed to cause it to be suffered that the party now in power should not disallow the laws which deprived the Catholics of Manitoba of their separate schools. It was a very common popular sentiment that one could not be a good citizen, have any love for his country and practise his religion outside of the Conservative party, a sentiment which they try to utilize somewhat, even now, when an opportunity offers. In order to substantiate that statement, and disprove it at the same time, I will mention that in 1877, in consequence of some complaints laid in Rome, the Pope sent here an envoy to settle these difficulties. That high dignitary was Monseigneur Conroy, who arrived here in the month of August, 1877. Some time after his arrival the bishops of the province of Quebec wrote a collective letter, in which they said :

There exists no pontifical act condemning any political party whatever.

A few days later, Monseigneur Conroy, being in Montreal, and answering an address from the citizens, which was presented to him under the portico of the parochial church, used the following language :

Do not suffer yourselves to be led away by those who, openly or by indirect ways, want you to deviate from the doctrine which your bishops are teaching to you, nor by those who, through an excessive religious or political zeal, would like to put into force, against persons or parties, condemnations which were never passed.

But the Conservative party did not submit at once. They had gained such influence by taking advantage of the Catholic prejudices of that idea that they were the only good party, that they alone had sound political and religious principles, that they stopped for a little while, but the same tactics went on. On the 13th September, 1881, another voice, that of the papal authority, made itself heard again. Cardinal Simeoni, in a letter addressed to His Grace the Archbishop of Quebec, said :

The Catholic church, in condemning Liberalism, does not intend to aim at each and every political party which happens to be qualified by the name of Liberal, since the decisions of the church relate to certain errors adverse to the Catholic doctrine, and not to any special political party, and consequently those persons are wrong who, without any other reason, state that one of the political parties in Canada is condemned by the church.

But it was not a very easy thing to put a stop to that evil. Therefore, the same tactics were continued by politicians, and they continued to have it believed that the Liberals were repudiated by the Church. As I have already stated, I think, there are still men to be found who use the same argument in order to deceive the people. And as late as the 10th January last, one of the members of the Government, the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Ouimet), speaking at a meeting held at St. Jérôme, uttered the following words, according to the report of a paper which will not be suspected of a want of sympathy for the Conservative party, since it is 'La Minerve' :

With a Prime Minister like Sir John Thompson, this question is in good hands. Sir John is known for his talents, for his spirit of fair-play and his broad views, and he will do, I am sure, anything that is possible to do justice to every one, according to his right.

Moreover, what is the use of such an agitation as the Liberals are trying to raise on this question? Have we not to guide us in this matter, in which religion is specially interested, our bishops and the leaders of the Church? The Protestants, the great majority among them at least, wish for peace and harmony. Why stir them up against us by an ill-timed agitation?

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that not very long ago, the hon. Minister pretended not to be so fearful. He affected bravery, for instance, when he took his sword and went to war; it is true he was not so courageous, when he came back before the others. Why should he tell us not to stir up the Protestants against us by an ill-timed agitation? I am at a loss how to express my feeling of surprise at such words as these. Here is a man, a minister, who tells us that we should follow the advice of the leaders of the church as to the school question in Manitoba and the North-west Territories. Why did he not himself follow that advice? Why did he allow separate schools to be abolished there? Why did he allow a gross injustice to be perpetrated against a large portion of the people? Why did he allow the minority to be ill-treated? Why was he not the first to protest, be the strong and courageous man, against the unfair action of the majority towards the minority? He chose to keep silent, and he would have every one keep silent like him; he wishes us not to say a word; he wishes every one to submit to the new order of things—in a word, he would like us to take the stand he once described in a sentence which will remain famous, a sentence which we all remember: 'A quat pattes les Canayens.' The hon. Minister advises the Catholics of the province of Quebec not to raise any ill-timed agitation, and he adds that with respect to a religious question such as this, we have to guide us the advice of the bishops and the leaders of the church. Why did he not himself follow the advice of the bishops? Instead of advising us to lower ourselves before the exacting demands of the fanatics of this country; to submit silently to the humiliation which he himself has accepted and which will remain on his name, he tells us we are wrong in stirring up any ill-timed agitation. At the last general election, we were met by such arguments as these on the hustings. In my county, the gentleman against whom I was running had nothing else to answer when I charged the Government with being unwilling to disallow the unjust Manitoba school law, they answered me that the time was not out yet; that the matter was in good hands, and that I had no right to lay a charge against the Government when they were still within the time allowed to do it. Well, that contention can no more be supported now, the time for the disallowance of the Manitoba laws and the North-west Ordinances has elapsed, and the hon. Minister who advised us not to raise any ill-timed agitation must have known then that he himself would submit to the humiliation which his own colleagues in the Government would cause him to suffer, and he wished to prepare the people of the province to submit to it likewise. Well, I ask, have the Conservative party, for a good many years, the right to contend that they have a monopoly of sound political and religious principles? I say no. I say that, on the contrary, the party which tolerated such unjust deeds as we complain of should deserve at least to lose the support of the French-Canadian and Catholic Conservative members of the province of Quebec, and that of the other Catholics of the Dominion, as well as that of all the fair-minded men of this country. As an evidence of that statement, I will have only to recall the fact that it is the Conservative party who, in 1870, used Bishop Taché to pacify the Manitoba half-breeds, and induced them afterwards to come into the Dominion. Those who have studied a little the history of the troubles of 1870, and who are aware of what happened during the investigation of 1874, know perfectly well the treatment, to be regretted, that was inflicted on the men whom the Government used to pacify the half-breeds and cause them to consent to their coming into the Dominion. Two Conservative Ministers went so far as to deny what he had said under oath and have him pass for a perjurer. In 1871, a law was passed in New Brunswick purporting to abolish the Catholic schools in that province. Complaints were made asking for the disallowance of the law. It is well to observe that the Conservative party, then in power, found means to evade the question and refuse the disallowance. Those people are wrong indeed who try to throw on the Mackenzie Government the responsibility of that refusal. Such a gross error cannot bear careful examination. Indeed, it is a certain fact that the law establishing free schools in New Brunswick was passed in 1871. It was received at the Department of the Secretary of State on the 19th June, 1871. Well, after the 19th June, 1872, it was impossible for any Government to disallow that law. It is well known that the Mackenzie Government only came into power on the 7th November, 1873, that is to say, about a year and a half after the time allowed for the disallowance of the law had elapsed. Is not the Conservative party, that good party which has, all to itself, the monopoly of good principles, of religious principles, that party of honest men and order, responsible for the rebellion of the half-breeds in 1885, rebellion caused by a bad administration of the affairs of the North-west? It is also responsible for the Manitoba laws of 1890 abolishing the Catholic schools. It is equally responsible for the evil done by the Ordinances passed by the Government of the North-west Territories in 1892. That good party is now supported by a newspaper, the only French paper that openly undertook to defend the Government as to that question of the North-west schools, and that paper is 'La Minerve.' It had the humiliation of being disposed by a letter which does justice on the statements set forth for the purpose of whitewashing the Government. Here is the letter in question:

ST. BONIFACE, 19th February, 1894.

MR. EDITOR:

I have just read the editorials published by 'La Minerve' in connection with the North-west schools. Presently, I must be satisfied with asserting that not only are its information incomplete, but that it is contrary to truth. I beg the friends of justice not to allow themselves to be prejudiced by these editorials or others of the same kind, but wait, before forming an opinion till they have before them the counterpart which will soon be put before the eyes of the public. As my name was mentioned in all this and as I have a particular knowledge of the facts, having been during six years a member of the Board of Education of the North-west Territory, you will please not be astonished if I take the respectful liberty to address you these lines with a report that they be published in your paper.

H. LEDUC, PRIEST, O.M.I.

It is still the same party which, through a want of energy, so freely sympathizes with the Orangemen and the association known as the P.P.A. I know that, not very long ago, in the province of Quebec, they firmly believed that that party was the only one, as I already stated, that could lead to heaven, and now we see the Prime Minister and several members of the Government who belong to such associations rely on insidious persecutions against the Catholics to keep them in power. To show the odiousness of such associations, I may be allowed, Mr. Speaker, to quote from the platform of the association called the P.P.A. platform, lately set out by that association:

We deem it dangerous to appoint to or select for civil, political or military duties in this country, people who owe allegiance to any foreign king, sovereign or ecclesiastical power, or men whose religion requires that in any conflict between Church and State, the Church should prevail.

'La Minerve,' of the 28th of March last, plainly states that the P.P.A. was organized to drive the Catholics from power and from all official positions. Well, it is that good Conservative party that sympathizes so well with such associations as I have referred to. It is that good Conservative party that now sympathizes so well with that association I have just mentioned. Not a single Minister dared raise his voice against it, while the Liberal leaders strongly denounced it. It is likewise well known that Orangemen are dictating their will to the present Government. To show how the Orange Association sympathizes with the Catholics and is courteous with them, I will read a resolution passed by the Boyne Orange Lodge, at a meeting held in Montreal on the 18th April, 1892, a resolution which was published by several papers in Quebec and Ontario. Here is what it says :

Resolved that, whereas we think the time has arrived for the Orangemen to speak more plainly and make known to the world their belief, with respect to the Roman Catholic church ; we herein register the fact that our firm conviction is that the said Roman Catholic Church can in no way be considered as a branch of the Christian Church and that we believe the Romish Pope is one and the same with the Anti-Christ of the Scriptures.

I think the hon. members of the province of Quebec, who are constantly endeavouring to have their constituents believe that the Conservative is the party of the Catholic religion, will have some difficulty in explaining the sympathy which exists between their leader, the present First Minister, and those associations which show such good feelings towards us. To show the sympathy that exists between the Ministers and those gentlemen, I may be allowed to quote from a speech delivered by Mr. Samuel Hughes, at the meeting of the Grand Orange Lodge of Ontario, at Chatham, in the early days of March last, a speech which was published in several papers :

I am happy to state that the year just elapsed has been extremely satisfactory to the Orangemen, both in Canada and Great Britain.

It is but just that the Orangemen should express their profound gratitude to whom it is due for the marked success with which they came out of the settlement of some of the big difficulties between Protestantism and Catholicism in Canada, since the last annual meeting of this most illustrious Grand Lodge. Let us congratulate ourselves upon the fact that the school law passed by the Government of the North-west Territories has received the assent of the Governor General in Council ; it will prevent the repetition of many a religious quarrel as the one we are now witnessing in Ontario, in the new parts of our great Dominion.

These words are from an hon. member of this House, and one of the most distinguished members of the Orange sect. And among what political party do we find such feelings ?

Mr. FRECHETTE. Hear, hear.

Mr. LEGRIS. (Translation.) I hear an hon. French Canadian and Catholic member say : Hear, hear. He knows as well as I do that it is among his own party. He knows perfectly well that it is in his party that are to be found the mischievous elements that are steadily working against our Catholic fellow-countrymen in Manitoba.

Mr. FRECHETTE. (Translation.) Will the hon. gentleman allow me to ask him whether Mr. Dawson was a Catholic last year ?

Mr. LEGRIS. (Translation.) Mr. Dawson, last year, was the very member who proposed a motion of censure against the hon. Controller of Customs (Mr. Wallace), when this latter gentleman, notwithstanding his infirmities, wished to declare war against England, should she do justice to the Catholics of Ireland by granting Home Rule to them. I think it is the same Mr. Dawson whom the hon. member referred to. I will now quote from a speech delivered at Toronto, on the 2nd April, 1893, by a member who was for a long time one of the leaders of the Conservative party, and who was then acting under instructions and following the advice of the very leader of that party, Sir John A. Macdonald. Mr. McCarthy, in answer to those who charged him with raising a race and creed war, said :

Mr. LEGRIS.

It ill becomes you to blame me, for I undertook that crusade in 1886, at the request of Sir John A. Macdonald and the Dominion Government, in which were then champions of the rights of French Canadians and Catholics, of the name of Sir John Thompson, Sir Adolphe Caron, Sir Hector Langevin and others. * * * * It was all perfect as long as I battled for my party, as I faithfully did up to 1887. At that time, in accordance with the wishes and desires of Sir John A. Macdonald, I announced in the county of Haldimand that the French influence had to be broken down.

Now, is it any wonder that we should see such uneasiness, and the minds disturbed to such an extent all over the country ? And I look on that agitation as an earnest one. However, those who are not blinded by any party spirit are conscious of what duty requires of them. I hope those members who so forcibly spoke out their mind in the press will not allow themselves to be led blindfolded by that very party spirit to the extent of forgetting the good disposition they showed in some papers. To show the uneasiness which prevails in the minds of the people, I will quote, Mr. Speaker, a paper which no one will suspect of any want of devotedness to the Conservative party. I refer to the 'Trifuvien.' That paper complains very severely of the position made to the Catholic minority. On the 12th January last, the 'Trifuvien' refers to the "outburst of fanaticism which we are witnessing. The French minorities have nothing more to lose ; they took all away from them, their language, their schools, all which relates to traditions as well as to family." They take all away from the minority—their language, their schools, and those who represent them in the Government keep silent. The only thing that remains to them is their right to sit on the Treasury benches. If ever they renounce it, it will be because it was taken away from them. Then they will have to comply. Meanwhile, whatever humiliations, whatever injustice, whatever persecution their compatriots are subjected to, they will let things take their course, in order not to lose the only thing to which they cling. In the month of February last, another paper, which again no one will suspect of any want of sympathy with and faithfulness to the Conservative party, the 'Evénement,' of Quebec, said :

Our political sky is becoming alarmingly dark. Heavy clouds are rolling up on the horizon. In many parts of the country, secret murmurs are instinctively finding their way out. Newspapers and men, heretofore known for their attachment and devotedness to the Conservative cause, are not concealing their dissatisfaction and a general feeling of uneasiness seems to prevail.

It is no use to delude ourselves, we are on the eve of a serious political storm.

A few days later, the same paper published over the signature of a member of this House (Mr. Joncas), who, nevertheless, is very faithful to the Government, the following lines :

We have allowed ourselves long enough to be humiliated, we have long enough yielded to compromises, in the hope that our good-will would be taken into account.

It is expedient that our opponents, our enemies should learn and understand that we do not intend to yield any longer to the unjust exigencies of a handful of fanatics and to the persecution systematically organized against us without any other motive than the hatred of our nationality and our religion.

Let our leaders display their energy, let them not shrink even from the painful necessity of severing certain political ties, should it become necessary.

They have a duty to perform, and however painful it may be, they should not shrink from its performance.

The same member of this House wrote in his paper, on the 20th February, 1894, that the Government could and should disallow Mr. Haultain's ordinance. Here is what he said :

Not only have the Government a right, but they are moreover in duty bound to protect the minorities, either Protestant or Catholic, in the various provinces of the Dominion.

In this emergency, the Ottawa Ministers had only to protect the weak against an unfair and aggressive majority. The performance of that duty was within the law and they should not have shrunk from it.

Will it also be said that they wished to avoid a greater evil, that they feared too great an outburst of fanaticism and grave complications ?

If through a fear of stirring up a tyrannical majority in any province of the Dominion, the central power shrinks and declines to protect the minority then it avers its inability and owns that it is not strong enough to rule.

The French Canadian people of this Dominion are loyal, peaceful and respectful of the laws of the land.

For the sake of peace, for the preservation of the harmony necessary to the good working of our political institutions, we have heretofore consented to many a compromise and made many a concession.

Of what use was our good-will to us ? To what have our frequent back-downs led us ?

Our enemies are more intolerant, bolder and more daring than ever.

In the face of such a state of affairs, what is to be done by our representatives in the Ottawa Cabinet ?

Unite in the first place, and then all of them exert themselves to cause our rights to be respected by their colleagues.

Unfortunately—why conceal it any longer ?—there are dissensions, as there always were for all that, among the French Canadian Conservative leaders at Ottawa, and even with respect to that North-west school question, so full of serious consequences for the future of our race, they could not pull together.

Who can tell whether a common and energetic action on their part would not have compelled the majority to do justice to the Catholics of those remote provinces ?

Ah ! They are guilty indeed the public men who, only considering their narrow selfish interests, sacrifice those whom they were intrusted to defend. They assume a very great responsibility, these power-thirsty men ; but the day of retribution shall come and it shall be a terrible one for those who betrayed the trust put in them.

The hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Joncas) further stated in his paper :

The wave of fanaticism is rising rapidly and it threatens to bear down all that opposes its course.

Further on, he again states :

Our representatives in the Federal Cabinet seem powerless to resist it.

And in concluding that series of editorials, he said :

If our Federal Ministers are unable to obtain justice for us, they ought to resign.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that a member who perceives the weakness of the Federal Ministers and observes that they have not courage enough to resign, should be the first to tell them to do so and withdraw his support from them by his vote.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Would the hon. member tell us what Governor Royal said about it ? He is out of a job now.

Mr. LEGRIS. (Translation.) We heard, last summer, a member of the Government speak out his mind in very strong language with respect to this school question, at a meeting held in Montreal, and in the presence of his colleagues in the Ministry. Here are the words of the Hon. Mr. Casgrain :

A terrible wind is now blowing even at the very doors of the province of Quebec ; and the storm is so strong that it is shaking confederation to its very foundations. I am now taking up the question of separate schools in the North-west.

Confederation was the result of a compromise. In order to protect our fellow-countrymen, who had carried the seed of civilization to the North-west, we stipulated that they should always have the right to separate schools. Now, I contend that no one has the right to do indirectly what the law forbids to do directly. No one had the right to deprive the Catholics of the North-west of their separate schools. The Hon. Mr. Haultain, the Premier of the North-west Territories, understood that perfectly well. That is why he went in a roundabout way.

This last sentence answers the statements of the hon. members for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) and Saskatchewan (Mr. Macdowall). They both say that nothing has been changed, that the position of the Catholics is the same as before, and yet the Attorney General of the province of Manitoba, who is one of their political friends, declares in the presence of three or four of his colleagues, members of the Manitoba Government, that no one can do indirectly what the law forbids to do directly. The ordinances of 1802 may not have abolished separate schools in the North-west, but they are so made that these schools are actually abolished. At all events, the latter cannot work freely under the legislation as it is. I will continue, Mr. Speaker, to read from the speech of Mr. Casgrain :

The question put to the Federal Government was, whether the law should be disallowed. We have the right to insist that the protection given our countrymen shall be respected. If the understanding arrived at when confederation was formed can be violated by one party, then that contract is only a paper which can be torn at will. The Federal Government has the right, and I will say has the duty, to disallow all laws contrary to the general interests of the Dominion. Speaking for myself, I say that fanaticism has long enough had its way. We have had enough of the McCarthys, O'Briens and of the P.P.A., which wanted to ostracise everything that is Catholic. We are citizens and useful citizens of this country. I can claim to be moderate on these questions. I fought the Riel agitation. But when it comes to decide the question whether Catholics have rights in this country, I say that it is time to be up and doing. I appeal to all moderate men, irrespective of creed. Fanatics are not the majority in this country ; and if, to prove it, it is necessary to make a coup d'état let it be made. The man who will make it shall have the united support of the province of Quebec. If, to succeed, it becomes necessary to call around our flag all moderate men, we will do it and we will again go over the work of confederation. If we allow the sacred rights of our countrymen to be violated, we will vainly work for the progress of this province.

Very likely Attorney General Casgrain received an admonition from his colleagues, for, after having intended a coup d'état, he was satisfied with a coup d'éclat. My answer to this is that it is preposterous, it is the general expression of opinion, and no doubt he must have said a coup d'état. I think it my duty, Mr. Speaker, to record my protest against that part of the speech in which the Attorney General talks about again going over the work of confederation. There is no necessity to again go over the work of confederation. The federal power is provided with the necessary authority to protect the minority, to defend those who need its protection. If, as stated by the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Joncas) in his paper 'L'Événement,' if it should happen, I say, that the Ministers have not minds strong enough to cause justice to be done to oppressed minorities, there is a very simple means which is in the power of the deputation, and if the members themselves should not have sufficient courage to intimate to the Ministers, when they failed in their duty, that they should give up their position in order to be replaced by cleverer and more courageous men, then, I say, the time is near when the people will take their cause in their own hands, do justice on all those who betrayed their confidence, and set forth a final protest stronger and more energetic than the one expressed by a certain member of this House. I will now briefly quote from an editorial published, on the 1st of March last, by another Conservative paper 'Le Courrier du Canada,' and in which the following was stated in reference to Mr. Casgrain's speech :

We are the more happy to applaud those vigorous and manly declarations because they respond to the feeling that our readers have found in the columns of 'Le Courrier du Canada' during the last few days. Mr. Casgrain exclaimed at a certain moment that if the central power is unable to protect the minorities, the guarantee contained in the right of disallowance is nothing less but worthless paper.

This is exactly our opinion. We said the other day that as to that question of the schools of the North-west, the Federal Government had the power to disallow, that the circumstances justified disallowance, and that if the right of disallowance cannot be used to protect minorities, it is not worth much. We congratulate the Attorney General on the energy and frankness with which he has developed this idea that the central power is bound to protect the opposed minorities, if the future of this confederation is going to be assured."

Well, if there is such unanimous approval of and such unanimous statements as to the right of disallowance as well as the duty to disallow these laws to which our attention is now called, what is to be said of the Government who thus failed in their duty? What is to be thought of the members who are willing to excuse and support by their vote the existing state of affairs? For this question has more than an ordinary importance ; it ought to take lead of all the others. It is vastly superior to trade or financial matters. A life or death principle, for a considerable portion of the citizens of this Dominion, is at stake, and it seems to me such injustice as those perpetrated against the Catholics should be met by a unanimous protest from all the members of the province of Manitoba who represent counties where the majority is composed of French-Canadians and Catholics. There ought to be but one voice to protest against the inertness and indifference of the French Ministers, and against the inaction of the Government in such a solemn circumstance. It is impossible not to perceive that the Tory party, now triumphant, reject us, spurn us, and grind us down. The French Ministers are powerless to check the destructive course of fanaticism and intolerance. Blinded by party spirit and an insatiable thirst for power, they remain unmoved, calm spectators of the sacrilegious spoliation of the rights of a whole race. Their hands are not strong enough to hold up and fast the flag of liberty, justice and right which Lafontaine and Cartier unfurled all over the country. Well, our duty is plainly marked out. We should unite under the command of a courageous man. If it is conceded that those who are now in power are men of no capacity, where shall we find a leader worthy of ruling the Dominion of Canada? When shall we find a man who may, to the extent to which it is possible, redeem the wrongs and the disastrous results of an inert Administration which, for some years past, had not sufficient energy to manage the affairs of the country? That man is already found, and as for us, Liberals, we have no choice to make. Our opponents in this House cannot deny that we have in our leader a man whom the country admires, and who would have sufficient power and energy to do justice to the victims of persecution, who would have sufficient courage and strength of will to efficiently protect the minority, to put things in the normal state in which they ought to be and in which they ought to remain. That leader, enjoying the respect and esteem of every one, has the necessary energy to protect, at all times and in any case, our rights and privileges and do justice to all.

Mr. TAYLOR moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and the House adjourned at 11.40 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, 26th April, 1894.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved:

That when Mr. Speaker leaves the chair at six o'clock this day, the House stand adjourned until to-morrow at three o'clock.

Mr. O'BRIEN. While that subject is before the House, I would like to suggest to the Government, as this day week is a holiday, whether it would not suit the convenience of many members of the House to adjourn over Friday. This is going to be a very long session, and many would like to have a day or two at home. There will be very little business done on Friday at any rate, and an adjournment over that day would give members three or four days at home.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I think the hon. gentleman will find that a very large number of the members of the House are compelled perforce to remain here, and they do not want the holidays of the House extended beyond those which already exist. I regret very much that Fridays have come to be largely dies non, for reasons which I need not go into now. That is deeply to be regretted, because, in my opinion, it lengthens the term of the session at least two weeks, and I am very strongly opposed to increasing the length of the session if it can be avoided. I know that it would be a great convenience to hon. gentlemen who can do so, to be able to go home for a few days; but I think the convenience of the majority should be considered, and the convenience of those from the outlying portions of the Dominion who are compelled to remain should not be lost sight of entirely. It is too much to ask to adjourn over Friday for no reason in the world. We could get through with a certain amount of business, surely.

Motion agreed to.

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND RAILWAY.

Mr. YEO asked, Has a petition been received by the Department of Railways and Canals from the inhabitants of Durar Road, Prince County, P.E.I., asking that a flag station be established at that place? If so, is it the intention to comply with the request of the petitioners?

Mr. HAGGART. There is no record in the department of any petition from any such place.

Mr. WOOD (Westmoreland) asked, What were the receipts from passengers and freight, for year ending 30th June last, at Memramcook and College Bridge stations, on the Intercolonial Railway? What number of carloads of freight were received and despatched from each station?

Mr. HAGGART. I am unable to answer the question in full, as the information as to the number of carloads has not reached the department, but—

| | |
|--|------------|
| The receipts for passengers at Memramcook for the year ended 30th of June, 1893, are.. . . . | $1,395 30 |
| The receipts for freight at Memramcook are..... | 4,584 83 |
| Total. | $5,980 13 |

| | |
|---|------------|
| The receipts for passengers at College Bridge are | $1,334 80 |
| The receipts for freight at College Bridge are..... | 915 63 |
| Total..... | $2,250 43 |

|---|-------|
| Tons of freight received at and despatched from Menramcook | 2,182 |
| Tons of freight received at and despatched from College Bridge..... | 472 |

I would ask that the question be allowed to stand until I can give the complete answer.

FIRE AT STRATFORD.

Mr. GRIEVE asked, Whether the Government have been informed of the destructive fire on Friday morning last at the public buildings in the city of Stratford during the employment of local workmen on the roof? Whether the work of replacing the slate roof of that building by an iron roof was done by public tender? If not, on what principle and at what price the contract was awarded? What were the dates of the giving of the contract, the commencement of the work under it, and the length of time that the men had been employed when the fire took place?

Mr. OUMET. The Government have been informed of the destructive fire. The work of replacing the slate roof was not done by public tender. The party who has the work was recommended as a most reliable roofer, and the price he asked, $675, being considered reasonable by the department, was accepted on the 5th October, 1893. The work was commenced as soon as weather permitted.

MMINEGASH BREAKWATER, P.E.I.

Mr. PERRY asked, Has any work been done to the Miminegash breakwater, Prince Edward Island, during the winter 1894? If so, what is the nature of the work? Was the work let by tender? Who was the contractor? How much was paid for inspection, and to whom paid? What is the amount paid or to be paid for said work? Have the Government paid, or do they intend paying, for dredging Miminegash harbour during the winter 1894?

Mr. OUMET. No work was done on this breakwater during the winter of 1894. The department is not aware that any dredging was done in that harbour during the same winter.

BUFFALO BREEDING.

Mr. DAVIN asked, Whether the Government intend to establish a buffalo-breeding ranch at Fort Smith on Great Slave Lake, or Fort Vermillion on Peace River?

Mr. DALY. It is not proposed to establish a buffalo-breeding ranch at Fort Smith on Great Slave River, or Fort Vermillion on Peace River; but a Bill, which is to be introduced in the Senate, contains provisions for the protection of the buffalo and other fur-bearing animals in those portions of the North-west Territories of Canada which are not included within the provisional districts of Assinibola, Alberta and Saskatchewan. Such Bill will also apply to the district of Keewatin. Among other things, it contains a provision forbidding absolutely the killing of buffalo for a period of five years.

Mr. HAGGART.

NORTH-WEST MOUNTED POLICE— MEDALS AND SCRIP.

Mr. DAVIN asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to satisfy the claims of the officers, non-commissioned officers and men of the North-west Mounted Police Force, and of the volunteers attached to the said North-west Mounted Police, for an issue of medals and scrip on the same basis as that on which medals and scrip have been granted to the Militia of Canada?

Mr. IVES. One hundred and seventy members of the force received medals under the provision of the Order in Council authorizing the giving of medals to such members of the force as were actually under fire. The Government have not the intention to issue medals to other members of the force, or to issue scrip to any portion of the force.

EXAMINATION OF CANADIAN CATTLE.

Mr. SMITH (Ontario) asked, Is it the intention of the Government to arrange for the presence of veterinary surgeons representing Canada at the examination of the lungs of Canadian cattle slaughtered at the port of debarkation in Great Britain; the President of the Board of Agriculture of Great Britain having stated in the Imperial House of Commons that the removal of the embargo on Canadian cattle will depend upon the result of the examinations of such cattle to be made during the next few days?

Mr. FOSTER. The Minister of Agriculture last year cabled to Sir Charles Tupper to obtain permission to have Canadian representatives present at the examination of lungs of Canadian animals slaughtered at the port of debarkation, and was informed by him in reply that the Board of Agriculture declined to consent to the carrying out of such an arrangement. One reason given was that if the board granted this application from Canada, they could not refuse similar applications from others, which would surely be made. Sir Charles received the assurance that in case of any question arising, relating to disease found in lungs of Canadian animals, he would be immediately communicated with, and such undertaking has been carried out. The High Commissioner, authorized by the Minister of Agriculture, employed Mr. William Hunting, F.R.C.V.S., to represent Canada in any examination of lungs that might take place. It is considered the arrangement is satisfactory, and that it is not advisable to press this point further.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would ask the Minister of Finance whether the Government have received any information as to the intention of the British Government with reference to our cattle? I am aware, and probably he is, that the shippers in Montreal are alleged to despair of obtaining any remission at present. I would be glad to know if the Government are in a position to give any information on the subject other than what the Minister of Finance has stated in reply to the hon. gentleman.

Mr. FOSTER. I suppose the hon. gentleman has seen what is current in the papers. That information, so far as I know, is correct, namely, that Mr. Gardner has undertaken to have examined the lungs of animals coming from Canada, to be slaughtered for the sake of experiment; and that when he is convinced by the reports of his officers that the cattle are healthy, he will make known his final decision with reference to the entrance of cattle from Canada, and we entertain the hope, of course, that if the specimens are healthy, the schedule will be removed.

Mr. McMULLEN. Has the hon. Minister any assurance that the examination will be confined to the first or second shipments, because if the examination is to go on according as each shipment arrives, the season may be over before Mr. Gardner comes to a decision.

Mr. FOSTER. The examination, no doubt, will commence with the first shipment, and will proceed until the Minister of Agriculture is convinced that Canadian cattle are healthy.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am unwilling to delay the House unnecessarily, but I am bound to say that I am advised by gentlemen connected with the trade that they fear there is very little chance of anything being done, under these circumstances, by the British Government, at least during the bulk of the season. That, I am sorry to say, is their conviction, and I was in hopes the Government might have some better information.

Mr. FOSTER. I hope that fear will prove unfounded.

Mr. McMULLEN. If we had the assurance that the British Minister of Agriculture contemplated removing the embargo, it would be very much in the interest of cattle owners if the Government were to buy sample lots of cattle from different sections for immediate shipment by the first steamer. The expenditure which this would entail would certainly be made in a good cause, for it is highly desirable the British market should be open to our cattle as early as possible. If the examination of these lots from different points showed no trace of disease, that probably might be accepted as establishing beyond all reasonable doubt that the disease does not exist in Canada.

Mr. FOSTER. The desirability of having the question tested as soon as possible has been fully represented to the British Government, and that Government is quite aware of our desire. I scarcely think the suggestion of my hon. friend would meet the case. Specimen shipments sent by our Government to the other side, would scarcely be taken as the best subjects for a test examination. The shipments would have to be in the natural course of trade, and it would scarcely fill the bill if we were to make our own selections.

Mr. LANDERKIN. When will the report of the Minister of Trade and Commerce be brought down?

Mr. FOSTER. I will inquire.

Mr. LANDERKIN. When will the report of the Solicitor General be brought down?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Some time after it is made.

SCHOOLS IN MANITOBA AND THE NORTH-WEST TERRITORIES.

House resumed further consideration of the proposed motion of Mr. Tarte (pages 159, 1600, 1992).

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I feel that it is due to the House, considering the great interest manifested in this question by the discussion we have had here during several days, that I should express myself briefly upon the points brought out. There is reasonableness in the desire of hon. gentlemen to know the views of the Government, in so far as they can with propriety be expressed on a question of great importance like this, even as a mere motion to bring down the papers. At the same time, I beg to say, in a preliminary way, that in my judgment it is better that the question, at the present time, should be very sparingly discussed; and, as far as I am concerned, I beg to intimate to the House, at the outset, that I do not intend to enter upon any exhaustive discussion of it to-day, nor even to make what I would consider, myself, a full defence of the position of the Government. The reason for that is perfectly obvious. To a great extent the question, in so far at least as it relates to the North-west, is one under consideration; and at this stage what may be incautiously said with regard to it may affect seriously the result of the consideration which the subject is receiving. As members of the House have become already aware, through the press and through the observations in this House, the Government have made a request to the Lieutenant Governor of the Territories to convey to the Legislature of the Territories the great desire felt by His Excellency and his advisers—and, I am sure, very widely shared in this country—that the Legislature of the North-west Territories should reconsider the whole subject of education, with a view to giving redress to any grievances which exist there, and with a view likewise to giving any safeguards which are needed in order to make any portion of the people feel that their rights are well safeguarded and preserved. If, therefore, at the present time, members of the Government especially, should enter upon an elaborate discussion of the question, or upon a review of all that has transpired in this debate, we might find that the position of one side or the other had been seriously prejudiced by that course. For example, if we committed ourselves to opposition to the Ordinance of the Territories we might find that no serious grievances existed worthy of being made the basis of a complaint to the Legislature; on the other hand, if we warmly espoused the statement of grievances that has already been made, we might raise a feeling of resentment among the people of the Territories on the ground that we had, to a great extent, prejudged the case before the complaints could have been considered by the legislature. For these reasons, I trust that the House will make allowance, in considering the observations which I am about to make, for the want of an elaborate and full statement with regard to these various complaints, and that the public, in so far as they may deem my observations worthy of consideration, will recognize the fact that we hold in reserve much that, under other circumstances, we would desire to say in view of the deep interest that is manifested in the country upon this question. I shall endeavour to arrange what I shall say as not to carry on a direct discussion of the merits of what are alleged to be grievances in the North-west Territories on the subject of education, but what I shall say will be in the direction of laying before the House the reasons which have influenced the Government in coming to the conclusion not to disallow the Ordinance of the Territories of 1892. However, before discussing the matter of the Territories and the Ordinance of 1892, I desire to say a few words on the subject of the educational question in Manitoba, because the hon. gentleman who moved the resolution which we are discussing introduced that subject in the early part of his remarks, and strongly challenged the position of the Government and my own position in relation to it. I need speak but briefly upon this subject, because the whole question was elaborately discussed last year at a time when we sustained the combined assault of the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte) and the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), based upon absolutely opposite and irreconcilable views as to what ought to be done. Any one who cares to turn up the record of that discussion will find the answer I have to make in regard to the remarks of the hon. gentlemen about my position and the position of the Government now. Our position was assailed on the ground, so far as the hon. member for L'Islet was concerned, that we ought to have disallowed the Manitoba legislation which was complained of, and on the ground, so far as the hon. member for North Simcoe was concerned, that we ought to have refused redress before the application for redress was heard. As to the subject referred to by the hon. member for L'Islet in the opening of his speech—the reference of the legal question to the Supreme Court of Canada, and the report I presented to His Excellency more than three years ago, these points were fully discussed last year, and I could say nothing more in defence or explanation than could be said by reading the report of the observations I made to the House last session. I shall not read my speech of that time, because I do not desire to fill the columns of 'Hansard' of this year by a repetition of what appears in 'Hansard' of last year. But, briefly, as regards my own position and as regards the language of my report, which the hon. member has again challenged as being a direct promise—a promise which, if I understood him rightly, he said no person who understood the English language could misunderstand—a promise that remedial legislation would be given here if the litigation contesting the validity of the Act should fail. I have a few words to say. I explained that subject fully to the House last session, and at that time I read my report. I have only to repeat now what I said then, and what was not then challenged in the discussion, much less shown to be erroneous, that the report contained no promise whatever either upon the subject of remedial legislation or upon any other subject. In that connection, I wish to observe that it has been said in many places, that as the report which I made and to which I am referring had a reference to redress by way of remedial legislation, it has been the cause of commotion, disturbance, expectation and disappointment in the province of Manitoba. In one place it was said by a gentleman in the province of Manitoba, a gentleman whose professional attainments certainly enabled him to know better, that what I had done was to put on record on behalf of the Government a very distinct promise that a law would be passed to give redress to the minority there. Mr. Speaker, both of these contentions are directly contrary to the fact. It is not in the least degree correct to say that my statement in that report, to the effect that the time might come when remedial legislation would have to be considered, induced expectation, induced agitation, and resulted in petitions being sent here, for the fact is that the report was a report upon petitions for that very redress, and in that report I merely indicated, as I was bound to do, what course, in my opinion, might properly be followed by the Executive at Ottawa as regards these very petitions and that very agitation for redress. There were at that time before Council, and referred to me for report, two different classes of petitions, the one asking for disallowance of the legislation, and the other asking for remedial legislation. And if any hon. gentleman cares to turn to that report he will see that what the report says is in substance this: That, as regards the petitions for disallowance on the ground that the Act was beyond the competence of the Provincial Legislature, it was unnecessary to take proceedings by way of disallowance, because if the contention that the Act was ultra vires were sound that contention would be established in litigation, which was then in progress, the decision of the courts would finally dispose of that point. But with regard to the other class of petitions, the petitions asking for remedial legislation, I said that when the litigation was ended, if it should not end satisfactorily to the petitioners, the time would come when His Excellency in Council would have to take those petitions into consideration. That, Sir, was simply an indication that it was unnecessary to consider these petitions then. The House is well aware—and I shall refer to this but briefly—that the time did come when the petitions for remedial legislation had to be taken into consideration. The litigation had resulted in a decision by the highest court of appeal adverse to the petitioners, so that the time came when we were bound to take those petitions into consideration. Having taken them into consideration, we found important legal questions involved which we thought it necessary to refer to the courts under the statute providing for the reference of such questions. The proceedings on that reference are still in progress. The results, so far as the Supreme Court of Canada is concerned, are that the majority of the court has negatived the right of the petitioners to make an appeal under the circumstances, and has negatived the power of the Governor General in Council to entertain the appeal for remedial legislation at all. What can be meant by the assertion which has been made upon that subject that, notwithstanding that decision, if it should stand unreversed, or if it should be confirmed on appeal, the responsibility of the Government will still remain as to remedial legislation, I have never been able to understand. If the courts should decide eventually that there is no jurisdiction on the part of the Government to entertain the appeal for redress—that the petitioners have no case for such appeal, and that this Parliament would, therefore, not have power to pass a remedial statute giving redress to the petitioners, it is impossible for me to understand how there can be any further responsibility upon the Government in the matter. I only say that by the way, because the information I have is that a considerable body of the petitioners, representing the religious minority in the province of Manitoba, have taken steps to appeal to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council on that subject, and, therefore, I forbear to discuss that feature of the question further. I come now to the question of the Territories, and let me call the attention of the House briefly to an analysis of what the complaints were, and what the requests were on behalf of the minority for redress under the Ordinance of 1892 in the Territories. Now, in order that the House may appreciate the various steps that were taken to investigate the complaints of the minority, let me premise that the Ordinance itself was passed, I think, on the very last day of December, 1892, that it was late in the month of October, 1893, before the first complaint came to my knowledge, or to that of my colleagues, so far as I can tell, and that the first petition on the subject only reached Ottawa pretty late in the month of November, 1893. So that when the subject came to be a matter for practical investigation, the time at our disposal within which disallowance would be possible, was very brief, and was not made brief by any want of diligence on the part of the Government here. The complaints are of two kinds. First, there is a complaint that harm has actually been done by the Ordinance of 1892 and regulations made under it. So far those complaints, of course, relate to the past, but there is likewise a very strongly urged complaint that the safeguards for the future, which the supporters of Roman Catholic separate schools had in the Territories, are removed by the provisions of the Ordinance itself; so that there is alleged to be a case of grievance as regards what has already been done, and apprehension as regards the future. Now, I desire to call the attention of the House to this principle, the correctness of which I am sure no member of the House, on reflection, will dispute, and that is that what had been done by way of regulation in the Territories, whether before or after 1892, was absolutely beyond the power of the Executive here to redress by way of disallowance. When we come to state what the particular complaints made by the petitioners were, the House will perceive that several of them arose from educational regulations made in the Territories before the Ordinance of 1892 was ever written at all, and what I wish to impress upon the House at this moment is that as regards those regulations, the disallowance of the Ordinance of 1892 would have had, as a matter of course, no effect whatever, and that the grievances, if there be grievances, would have remained precisely the same after disallowance had taken effect, except, of course, as to the power of the Board of Education to alter matters, but that I will discuss by itself. But I wish to go a step further, and to say that as regards the regulations made under the Ordinance of 1892 itself, if those regulations were found to inflict a grievance upon the petitioners, that grievance would not be removed, those regulations would not be nullified, by the disallowance of the Ordinance. It is well established, it is clearly written in the British North America Act, as regards disallowance in the provinces, and the same principle would undoubtedly prevail as regards the Territories, that disallowance takes effect from the moment of its being proclaimed, gazetted or announced to the Legislature; and, therefore, it follows that what has been done under the disallowed Act in the meantime remains in full force and vigour. If the statute disallowed, or the Ordinance disallowed, has been void as being ultra vires, of course everything is null and void from the beginning; but if the statute or Ordinance had effect, that which has been done under it, while its life and vigour remains, until the moment of disallowance, remained still in full force and in effect, and is beyond the reach of the Executive here. Now, the first series of complaints relate to grievances which are said to exist by reason of certain regulations in the Territories. I do not propose to deny that those exist. We have here hon. gentlemen representing the Territories; they have as good a constitutional right as any man in this House to say whether complaints are rife there, because they represent immediately the people of the Territories, they have their confidence now, and they are responsible to them for any misstatement which they may make with regard to the state of affairs in their constituencies; we have statements made by these gentlemen, that they have never heard a complaint until they came to listen to the debates in this House during the present session, or until they read of those grievances in the press published in other provinces. I do not intend to discuss that question. I appreciate very highly that statement by these gentlemen, but I do remonstrate strongly against assertions which have been made here, and I admit made upon pretty high authority elsewhere, that separate schools have practically ceased to exist in the Territories, that they exist only in name, that they have been subjected to a stroke of paralysis, and that they have no force or vigour any longer. When we find it stated by responsible gentlemen whose word has the confidence of this House, and who are well qualified to speak upon the subject, that separate schools exist there still, receive their public aid still, have religion taught in them still, and that as regards those schools, not a complaint has been made by the parents of one child attending them, and that those parents, controlling those schools, supporting those schools, sending their children to those schools, are really unaware from experience that the Ordinance of 1892 was passed, I venture to think that those who make such strong assertions as to the non-existence, as to the destruction, as to the paralysis, of separate schools in the Territories, have been misled, either by the zeal with which they advocate their opinions, or by information received elsewhere which is not strictly exact. The first complaint which has been made relating to the past is one with regard to the normal training required of teachers in the Territories, and it is a complaint which has been strongly pressed in this debate; it is an assertion that no person is qualified under the Ordinance of 1892, to teach in the Territories unless, besides having educational qualification, they have passed a term at a normal school in the Territories, and that therefore persons whose profession is religion, and who live in communities, are not able to conform to that regulation. That regulation, if it had that scope, would indeed be very severe and a disaster to the children, at least to the female children attending the separate schools in the Territories, because it would prevent the best qualified teachers who are instructing Catholic girls there or elsewhere from teaching in the separate schools. But, Mr. Speaker, let us see, before we condemn, what the exact scope of that regulation is. When we find exactly what it is, it may constitute a grievance into which the Legislature of the Territories will be well disposed to inquire, and will be justified in redressing, but we shall only lessen the weight of our request that the grievances shall be investigated, if the people of the Territories, who know best about these matters, and watch them, find in the discussion of the question that we are exaggerating and over-stating the effects of the regulation itself. In the first place this regulation with respect to normal schools qualification does not apply to teachers at present authorized to teach, and even as regards those who may ask hereafter authority by certificate to teach in the Territories, there are certain limitations to the rule. One of them is a limitation to this effect, and it is alleged it has been inserted out of consideration for the position of those who are not able from their calling and engagements to attend the sessions of the normal schools, namely, that if they possess equivalent qualifications, certificates that show that they are not only persons of education, up to the standard established in the Territories, but that they have likewise acquired the art of teaching, their certificates shall be accepted as equivalent, and they shall not only be exempt from attendance at the normal schools, but they shall likewise be exempt even from examination, and shall receive certificates accordingly. There is a further exemption, on behalf of those who have obtained such certificates in the province of Ontario and the province of Manitoba, and I am told it is under the consideration of the Council of Public Instruction there now whether the same principle shall not be established as regards the province of Quebec. But let me call attention to the fact that while this complaint has been made the subject of strong animadversion against the Government for refusing to disallow the Ordinance of 1892, that regulation was by no means made in, by, or under the Ordinance of 1892. In the year 1891, at a meeting held on 2nd September of that year, of the whole Board of Education of the Territories, comprising the Catholic Separate School Board and the Public School Board likewise, five Catholics and three Protestants, certain proceedings took place with regard to normal schools which I will presently read. I quote meantime from the report made by the Executive Council of the Territories upon that subject, and I will refer in a moment to some proofs that the statement is well founded :

Sir JOHN THOMPSON.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON.

With regard to the training of teachers I might say that our regulations do not compel any teacher who possesses equivalent qualifications to attend our normal sessions. Teachers are required to possess scholarship and professional skill. If any member of a religious order presents evidence of these she can obtain her certificate without attending our normal schools, but if she does not present such evidence, under our regulations she is not entitled in her religious character to anything more than any other lady who wishes to teach in a Government school and obtain a Government grant. Our duty is to see that none but properly qualified teachers are engaged in our schools and that none but properly conducted schools receive public money, and those duties cannot be delegated to the representatives of any religious body or bodies. As a matter of fact, many members of religious orders are specially and splendidly trained as teachers, and our regulations will admit them without any attendance at our normal classes. No member of any religious order teaching in the Territories to-day is affected by the normal school regulation, but, for the future, members of religious orders, of communities wishing to engage as teachers in schools drawing public money in the Territories, must conform to the regulations of which they have had full notice.

Mr. LAURIER. Will the hon. gentleman state the document from which he is quoting ?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It is the reply of the Executive of the North-west Territories to the petitions. It is dated 4th January, 1894. When we look back we find that the normal system of training was established under the Ordinance of 1888. The regulations which made it compulsory, and which are referred to in the document I have just read, were passed in 1891, fifteen months before the Ordinance of 1892. It is curious to look back at the history of normal school training, because there one will find it begins by a request on the part of the whole Board of Education to the Governor in Council to ask this Parliament for a grant to establish a normal school, which shall sit at certain places, and then when the grant was obtained the system was established and adopted, tentatively, it is true, but established and adopted unanimously by the Board of Education, by its Protestant and Roman Catholic members, and that the chief resolution connected with it was adopted on the motion of one of the Roman Catholic members of the board, no doubt in recognition of the great advantages, especially in a country of that kind, of having teachers not only qualified as regards the possession of learning, but qualified as regards the art of instruction itself. Let me read the proceedings of the Board of Education, and when I speak of the Board of Education I beg hon. members to observe that I speak of the united boards under the old system and not the present Council of Public Instruction, as it is styled, and as it is established under the Ordinance of 1892. Of a meeting of the Board of Education, in September, 1891 (page 21), these observations occur in the report :

The action taken last year by the board with reference to normal training, although tentative in its character, was attended with such results in Eastern Assiniboia as to warrant more decided action.

The board has, therefore, decided that, for the future, all persons who hold non-professional certificates, and desire to teach school in the inspectorial districts of Eastern and Western Assiniboia, must receive adequate normal training, either at Moosomin or Regina.

The board earnestly desires to extend similar advantages to all other inspectorates under its jurisdiction, but the schools in these inspectorates are so few and so widely scattered, that the same course is out of the question.

To meet the difficulty, the board would respectfully submit a proposition made by it to the authorities at Ottawa, in January, 1888, in the following terms, namely :—

That in the opinion of this board it is necessary to make provision for the instruction and training of teachers for our public schools in the science and art of teaching ;

That the board feels that the appointment of a normal school principal, whose duty it would be to hold normal school sessions in different parts of the country, would have the best possible results in increasing the efficiency of teachers and stimulating education.

Therefore resolved :

That His Honour the Lieutenant Governor be requested to urge upon the Dominion Government the advisability of granting the sum of five thousand dollars for the next financial year for normal school purposes.

In the event of this suggestion receiving the approval of your Honour and being adopted, the board would further suggest that it be empowered to secure the services of a competent person to fill the position of normal school instructor, and also to make provision for the holding of normal sessions at Lethbridge, Calgary, Edmonton and Prince Albert, and at such other places as may, from time to time, appear to require them.

In 1891 that resolution was unanimously passed by the board, and the system which had been in force, tentatively only before that, was then established. I am not by any means making this statement with a view of minimizing what has been said in reference to the inconvenience as regards certain classes of candidates, attending these schools. I am making the statement for the purpose of showing first of all, what the scope of the regulation complained of is, and secondly for the purpose of showing that the regulation is one which existed before the Ordinance of 1892 was passed. Let me say by way of explanation and by way of caution, that the passage which I have just read (necessitating, for example, that no person shall be qualified who does not attend the normal school) is merely a rough statement of the matter in the report of the proceedings of the board. When we come to look at the language of the regulation itself (also made before 1892), we find the exceptions which I have already mentioned as regards the possession of equivalent qualifications being acceptable. Then there is another complaint made to the effect:

That there is imposed a uniform course of instruction and a uniform selection of text books for all schools, Protestant and Catholic.

I am reading from one of the principal petitions which was presented for disallowance, and the expression appears in many places else. Now, Mr. Speaker, under the Ordinance of 1888, the Board of Education, which had control of education generally in the Territories, divided itself into two parts. That is to say, the division took place after certain business relating to specified matters which, under the Ordinance, came under the control of the board as a whole, had been disposed of. The board divided into these two branches, and thereafter one of the things intrusted to each branch was the selection of the school books which should be prescribed, by the one section for the Catholic separate schools and by the other section for the public schools of the Territories. What I wish to show the House is: That as regards the prescription of school books—which I grant is a matter vital to the operation of separate schools—this matter of the school books to be prescribed was settled by the Roman Catholic division of the Board of Education before the law of 1892 was passed, and it has not been disturbed and has not been unsettled since, excepting in two or three particulars which I will mention presently and which the House will see do not affect the point that I am now taking. The principal point which I make with regard to that is this: that it cannot be said with accuracy—as one hon. member asserted last night, but surely under a misapprehension of the facts—that the present Council of Public Instruction had thrust Protestant books upon the Catholic schools; nor can it be truly said that the Council of Public Instruction has withdrawn (in any sense which would make it a grievance so far as we see) any Catholic book that was permitted then, for in the case which I shall come to presently, the book was withdrawn as a favour to the Roman Catholic minority; or instead of calling it a favour, I would say, withdrawn as a step in the direction of meeting their wishes and their views. Since the objectionable Ordinance was passed, there has been no change with regard to school books except the changes that I shall refer to now. There was a meeting of the Council of Public Instruction soon after the passage of the Ordinance in 1892. There was a careful consideration and discussion as to what should be done with regard to the school books. There is a list of books prescribed. The House will readily understand that there are only two or three—four at the utmost—points upon which there is likely to be disagreement between the separate schools and the public schools as regards the books that should be used. That would be, as I recall at the moment, as to books referring to history, literature and science; and with regard to all those matters the books that should be used were agreed upon. Subsequently to that meeting, and on the 30th of September, 1893, a circular was issued by the Secretary of the Council of Public Instruction, and in that circular is to be found the only change which was, up to that time, made as regards school books prescribed for the Roman Catholic separate schools. I ask the attention of the House to it, for the House will perceive that that circular has not thrust Protestant books upon the separate schools, nor has it withdrawn any Roman Catholic book which was desired to be retained. There is on record a statement of the Executive of the Territories to the effect that the changes it has made were with the approval of the Roman Catholic advisory members of the board, and that they were made in the direction of what was believed to be the interest and desire of the Roman Catholic minority of the Territories. The changes mentioned in the circular are these:

Sir JOHN THOMPSON.

The regulations of the Council of Public Instruction mailed to all schools on or about 16th August last, govern all examinations held under the direction of the Council.

The following readers are authorized for use in Roman Catholic schools in standards I and II, and become compulsory after 1st January, 1894, viz.:—

The Dominion series (Sadler's Catholic Readers), parts I. and II., and the Second Reader; or the Ontario Readers, parts I., II., and the Second Reader.

Then comes the passage which I had in my mind when I answered the hon. leader of the Opposition the other evening, and which, I think, I accurately stated in the interruption I made for the purpose of answering him, although an hon. gentleman who spoke last night seemed to be under the impression that I had misled the hon. leader of the Opposition. The passage I will read. Although it does not immediately relate to this part of the subject, I read it now so as not to refer to it again :

In schooldistricts, where French is the vernacular, the school trustees may, upon obtaining the consent of an inspector in writing, use the Ontario series of Bilingual Readers, parts I., II., and the Second Reader, instead of the Dominion series or the Ontario Readers.

In all standards above the second the Ontario Readers are prescribed after 1st January, 1894.

The House will remember that what I am specially directing attention to is what has been done to constitute a case of complaint under the Ordinance of 1892. Now, I turn to the explanations given by the Executive authorities of the Territories, for the purpose of showing the House that what has been done has not been done with any view of creating irritation, causing complaint, or limiting, in any way, the free action of the separate school teachers. Mr. Haultain, in his answer to the petitions, says :

The only change of text books for these schools since 1888 was made at the last general meeting of the Council of Public Instruction held in June, 1893. At that meeting, and with the approval of the Rev. Father Caron, a Roman Catholic member of the council, a uniform series of text books for all schools was prescribed, with one exception.

At the Rev. Father Caron's request, Roman Catholic schools were allowed to use as optional text books the Roman Catholic Readers in the primary classes.

The only school text books in our programme which could possibly excite controversy, are the readers and histories.

In history, the text book, under the new regulations, is Buckley & Robertson's History of England and Canada. This book was already prescribed by the Board of Education, having been considered unobjectionable by the Roman Catholic section, and was in use before the late regulations and the Ordinance of 1892 came into force.

I ought to say here that in a letter which has been published and circulated through the House, the Rev. Father Caron denies that he was properly understood as assenting to the uniform class of text books prescribed for teachers' examinations; and, therefore, I do not wish to press unduly the statement I have read from this document to the effect that he was an assenting party. It is enough for my argument that nothing was done by way of abridgment of the rights which existed before the Ordinance of 1892 was passed, and that is the object I have in view. Now, Mr. Haultain has made a further statement which bears on this subject, and to which I will call the attention of the House. This is dated the 12th January, 1894 :

In my previous communication of the 4th January inst., I stated that the only change of text books for these (Roman Catholic) schools since 1888 was made at last general meeting of the Council of Public Instruction held in June, 1893. At that meeting, and with the approval of the Rev. Father Caron, the Roman Catholic member of the council, a uniform series of text books was prescribed with one exception.

Instead of using the word "prescribed," I should have said "determined upon." As a matter of fact the only changes in text books for Roman Catholic schools actually made by the Council of Public Instruction are the changes set forth in the explanatory circular of the 30th September, 1893, the copy of which is hereto attached.

That is the circular of which I have read the principal part to the House. He continues :

I have already referred to changes in text books prescribed for examinations for teachers' certificates, and in this letter deal only with the question of school text books.

The changes indicated in the circular of the 30th September are the only changes in Roman Catholic school text books which have been made since 1888. The effect of that circular is : (1) To strike from the list of books for Roman Catholic schools the Metropolitan series of Readers ; (2) to prescribe for all standards above standard 2 the Ontario readers ; (3) to continue for standards 1 and 2 the Dominion series of Readers, the text books already in use under the regulations of the Roman Catholic section of the Board of Education, the Ontario Readers being only made optional in these standards ; and (4) to allow the Ontario Bilingual Readers to be used in French-speaking districts under the conditions set forth in the circular.

I have said that no school book was struck off which the Council supposed the Catholics desired to retain, and that none had been put on which was deemed by them objectionable. Let me read, in confirmation of that, a little further :

In abolishing the Metropolitan series of Readers, the example of the Roman Catholic Committee of the Council of Public Instruction of the province of Quebec was followed. At a sitting of that body held on the 20th May, 1892, His Eminence Cardinal Taschereau in the chair, among the books struck from the list of books approved for use in the Roman Catholic schools in the province of Quebec were the Metropolitan 1st, 2nd, 3rd and 4th Readers.

My previous communication has sufficiently stated the unobjectionable character of the Ontario readers.

Therefore, let me turn back to his first letter for the purpose of seeing what he says about those readers. The statement he made, which I have not under my hand at the moment, but I remember sufficiently as to detail, is that the Ontario readers were selected because they are prescribed for the Roman Catholic separate schools in the province of Ontario ; and I think the House was made fully aware last night of the opinion entertained by at least some members of the House, that the most admirable system, and the system they would desire to have regarded as a standard, is the Ontario system of separate school education. If the Ontario system is so admirable and satisfactory, I think it can hardly be said that the readers prescribed for the separate schools in Ontario are objectionable for the separate schools in the North-west. In looking for the passage to which I was just referring, I have come upon the authority I referred to a moment ago, as regards the proceedings of the Board of Education with reference to normal training, and I find that on the 3rd of September, 1891, Mr. A. E. Forget, one of the Roman Catholic members of the board, moved this resolution :

That all persons in the inspectorates of Eastern and Western Assiniboia who obtained non-professional certificates, at the recent examination of teachers, not holding certificates of normal training—

Those may be roughly described as interim certificates merely, not qualifying a person to be regarded as a professional teacher.

—and who desire to obtain professional certificates, be required to attend a normal session, either at Moosomin or Regina, such normal session to commence on the reopening of the Union schools after the Christmas holidays, and to terminate, for third class teachers six weeks, and for first and second class teachers, three months from the date of commencement.

On this occasion were present and approving the Rev. Father Leduc, the Hon. Mr. Justice Rouleau and Mr. A. E. Forget, all members of the Roman Catholic section of the board.

Now, there is another branch of the subject which I have to touch upon briefly. That is the prescribing of text books for teachers' examinations, and I admit that that subject was dealt with to some extent under the Ordinance of 1892. The House will observe, when I come to show what the proceedings since the Ordinance of 1892 were, how unimportant were the changes that were made as to these text books. I must mention how these changes came to be made. In 1891, although the Roman Catholic section of the Board of Education had the right to prescribe the books to be studied by the teachers, and which would be the basis of their examination, the members of that section did not so treat the subject, for the reason that it was the opinion of at least one, and probably all the members of the Roman Catholic section of the board, that it would be more satisfactory if there could be, as regards teachers, a uniform set of text books. And on the 3rd of July, 1891, the Rev. Father Leduc—although the matter was one entirely within the competency of his own section of the board, addressed the secretary of the whole board thus :

At the next meeting of the Board of Education I wish to have the following subjects submitted to discussion, namely:—1. Certificates to priests and ministers. 2. Certificates for strictly elementary schools. 3. Blank forms for school returns, and so on. 4. A very clear programme of all the subjects on which candidates are to pass their examination, to be framed, printed and distributed to inspectors. 5. Only one good text book on each subject for teachers candidates, to be adopted by the sections of the board, and the same text books only to be used by the board of examiners.

At the meeting which followed that letter, that programme, which Father Leduc proposed, was adopted. The result was a uniform set of text books for the use of teachers of all classes, and the text books which were adopted, in the debatable subjects of history, literature and science, were books supposed to be unobjectionable to the teachers of any of the classes, whether Protestant or Roman Catholic. Therefore, I think, I need say very little more on that branch of the subject. But let me refer—and I must apologize for the disorder of my remarks, the material being somewhat diffuse, and many references being required—let me refer again, for the purpose of proving what I have said as regards the scope of the regulations with regard to normal school training, to the regulations themselves. If the House will look at the regulations of 1891 and 1893 they will find this set forth: The adoption, in the first place, on the motion of Mr. Forget, of the regulation which I have stated, and then a careful selection of all books which can be agreed upon, and which have been agreed upon, as unobjectionable, for teachers' examinations. And then they will find the regulations which permit equivalent qualifications to be accepted by way of dispensing with the attendance at normal schools in the case of those who do not desire, and who do not need to attend. So much for the objection that a uniform system of class books has been adopted for all classes of schools, and that objectionable books have been introduced into the syllabus. Now I come to what is said as to the effect of disallowing the Ordinance of 1892. I have endeavoured to divide the subject into two branches. First, to show what the complaints are as to existing regulations, and I think I have proved that, as regards each one of these, the complaint is founded, not on the Ordinance of 1892 or anything done under it, but on what was done by virtue of the Ordinance of 1888. I beg to say that, as regards the Ordinance of 1888, we have not, as far as I can remember, received a remonstrance or complaint as to its provisions, or anything done under it. On the contrary, we have the statement contained in the petition of His Lordship Bishop Grandin of St. Boniface, that the system established under the Ordinance of 1888 worked with perfect harmony. I shall, to be exact, quote the passage, because I may have inadvertently overstated it. The passage to which I refer is this :

The system indicated above for the management of the schools operated with entire harmony, to the general satisfaction of all connected with the active work of education in the Territories.

So that we had no reason to suppose that anything objectionable existed in the Ordinance of 1888, or that anything objectionable had occurred in the regulations which were made under it. But it is said that by the operation of the Ordinance of 1892, whether anything objectionable as regards Roman Catholic separate schools had been done previously or not, the Roman Catholic minority were rendered powerless to remedy anything which they thought wrong in the regulations which existed before. It is said that while disallowance could not have nullified the regulations which existed before, it would have restored to the separate schools control by the Catholic section of the Board of Education, and that the Catholics would therefore have been able to get redress against any regulations which were objectionable. So strongly was that pressed upon us, that it does seem to me it was carried to the length of admitting that there was no cause of complaint as to what had been done, down to the passage of the Ordinance of 1892. The matter was pressed to this length—I telegraphed to one of the petitioners, to the most eminent of them, to send to us, who were then earnestly investigating the complaints which were made in the petitions for disallowance, asking him to send as soon as possible the text of the regulations which the petitioners complained of as having been made under the Ordinance of 1892. The reply which I received is contained in the pamphlets from which most of the members here have read and which will doubtless be produced in this House as part of the return to this order. The reply was in the form of two letters the contention of which was that there was a want of safeguards for the future and that the Ordinance of 1892 removed the power from the hands of the Roman Catholics to redress their own wrongs and grievances by their own action in the Board of Education. I am sure that these letters, which were thus published and which, I think, were read in the course of this debate, indicated pretty strongly, not that there was any regulation with regard to which any practical grievance had arisen in the past, but that the principal grievance was want of security as to what might happen in the future. Now, let me state my contention on the subject, with the greatest possible respect for those who have differed from it so strongly, and who have based their opinions upon the remonstrance of His Grace of St. Boniface against the Order in Council declining to disallow. As regards safeguards for the future, my contention is that, inasmuch as there was a practical admission that no complaint was to be made as regards the text of the regulations under the Ordinance of 1892, or before 1892 there was nothing requiring urgency or haste, and we were bound to treat the Legislature of the North-west Territories precisely as it is the practice to treat the Legislatures of the various provinces. One of the regulations which has been adopted as regards the reviewing of provincial legislation—adopted with assent of both parties, because followed by both parties—is this, there shall be no disallowance, even where there appears to be reason for disallowance, of an Act 'intra vires,' as we considered this to be, until the Legislature has had an opportunity to repeal or modify the legislation which is objected to. In practice, except in cases calling for expedition, we have always adopted the course of informing the Legislature of the cause of complaint and requesting repeal or modification. I am happy to say that, generally speaking, these representations have been acted on; and, when it was found that the principal cause of complaint against the Ordinance of 1892 was as regards safeguards for the future of the separate schools, and not a contention that they had been abolished, our duty obviously was to treat the Legislature of the Territories as we would treat the Legislature of a province and to call its attention to the complaints which had been made and ask them to review the whole subject and give redress, if redress were fairly called for. Now, Mr. Speaker, in a comparison of the correspondence which is in the hands of most hon. members in advance of this return being brought down—because I admit that we have been carrying on this debate to a great extent on the basis of documents that are being asked for, but most of which hon. members have in their hands—one cannot help seeing that in almost every step of the inquiry we are met by a controversy as to what the facts are. On one side it is alleged: You have practically abolished the separate schools; on the other, the separate schools are in the same vigour as ever, and are just as efficient and make as strong demand upon the treasury as ever. On one side it is asserted, you have made regulations under the Ordinance of 1892 which are injurious to the separate schools; on the other it is alleged, we have made no regulations of the kind. Then there is the demand that the regulations objected to shall be produced, and in answer to that we find the response: We produce such as have been made; but do not look there for our grievances, because our grievances may arise in the future. Assertions are made on one side and denied on the other as to the carrying out of regulations with regard to normal school training; the examination of teachers, the thrusting of Protestant books upon the Catholic pupils, the withdrawal of Catholic books. Upon every one of these points there is a positive disagreement as to the facts. Surely the onus lay upon those who raised the objections; and, although we would not let the question turn upon the rule as to the burden of proof, where there was time for inquiry, let me call attention to the fact that not until the end of October did I receive the letter complaining of the Ordinance, and not until November did we receive a petition, eleven months having elapsed since it was passed and ten months after it was received here. There was certainly no time for an examination into controverted facts. There was barely time to investigate what appeared on the subject in half a dozen volumes of ordinances and half a dozen regulations, and there was certainly no time then to await an answer, if the answer could have been made satisfactorily—as I shall admit for the sake of argument it could—by His Grace of St. Boniface, in response to the reply which had come from the Executive of the Territories, and from which I have quoted. Therefore, it seemed to me plainly the obligation of the Governor in Council to decline to disallow under these circumstances. Let me call attention especially to the differences which exist, as to disallowance, between an ordinance of the North-west Territories and the statute of a province. If a year is allowed to elapse without the disallowance of the statute of a province, that statute being within the provincial powers—and that is practically admitted here, except for the statement of Mr. Justice Rouleau which I shall not discuss—that statute becomes law and is beyond the reach of any power but the legislature which enacted it. But, as regards an Ordinance of the North-west Territories, it must be remembered that this Parliament has control of the Territories in a fuller and more absolute sense than it has control of the provinces. We have a limitation upon our power with regard to the provinces; we can only exercise our jurisdiction within a limited sphere. But from day to day everything that happens within the Territories is within the jurisdiction of this Parliament, no matter what the Legislature of the Territories may do with regard to it. So, instead of being limited to the immediate exercise of the power of disallowance, as in the case of provincial statutes, we have the power from day to day, and from year to year, to correct any substantial grievances found to exist there, if the Legislature should turn—though I am sure it would not—a deaf ear to those complaints. Therefore, in view of the limited time for investigation, in view of the plenary powers which this Parliament has with regard to the Territories, I felt there was no just and proper call for the exercise of the strong power of disallowance with regard to this Ordinance. Now, in discussing another question, namely, the question as to religious instruction in the Catholic schools, it seems to me that, barring the apprehension which exists in the minds of the petitioners as to what may be done in the future, the Ordinance itself had not made such a decided change in the matter of religious instruction as to call for the exercise of the power of disallowance. The comments which have been made upon our minute of Council on the subject, are to this effect: that there is no religious test applied to the teachers, there are no means of ascertaining whether a teacher is qualified to teach religion, and that the morning prayer with which the schools were formerly opened, has been abolished, and the time at the close of the day in which religious instruction may be given to the children, is likewise curtailed. Now, as regards the qualification of the teacher to give religious instruction, there remains what I venture to think is the most vital principle with regard to separate schools, the pivotal point on which the whole system of separate schools turns in any country, and that is, the domestic control by the trustees of the section, or of the district, as they are termed there. The separate school supporters are controlling their separate schools, assessing themselves for their schools, receiving public aid for their schools, electing trustees who shall govern them, and no teacher can cross the threshold of a school-house door, unless under engagement with the trustees of the district; and if, therefore, teachers in Roman Catholic separate schools are not qualified to teach religion, or are not willing to do it, it is the fault of the people themselves, with whom ample powers of local government are still left by the provisions of this Ordinance. I might extend my remarks upon that subject to the question of the French language. There is much in this Ordinance and the regulations which have been made under it, to excite the susceptibility of those who are strongly attached to that language; but I submit to the calm judgment of this House that there was not sufficient to warrant this Government in disallowing it, so far as our information at present goes. We have the provision, I admit, that the instruction which shall be given in all classes of schools there, public and separate, shall be given in the English tongue, and I am sure that anybody who realizes at all the advantages of education, would be delighted if, in every school in this country, French could be taught also. It would be an acquisition and an accomplishment, but if any duty at all rests upon the state in regard to French-speaking children and with regard to English-speaking children alike, in a country like this, surely it is that at least they shall receive an English education. The views which have been expressed in the past by some of my hon. friends on the other side of the House in the province of Quebec, are broad and liberal as they are true, viz., that in a mixed population like ours, with the great body of the population of the Dominion of Canada speaking English, it is the plain interest of the children of the French-speaking population that they shall learn English; and if we English-speaking people can learn French too, we shall praise God for it. But, Mr. Speaker, French is not abolished in the schools. There is the provision which I read from the regulation of 1893 for the teaching by Bilingual Readers of those in the primary classes where French is the vernacular in order that they may be trained to learn the English tongue and to acquire the English education which is provided for them. But it is remarkable that, while petitions came from almost every Roman Catholic school district in the Territories, against the Ordinance of 1892, alleging many things against it by way of mistake—as to regulations which existed before the Ordinance of 1892 was passed—alleging all that could be urged against the Ordinance, the complaint that the teaching of the French language was interfered with unduly, is not to be found in any one of the petitions on the file—with one exception, in a letter of His Grace the Archbishop of St. Boniface, transmitting petitions. His Grace mentions that subject as one that would be well deserving the attention of the Council. But it seems not to have been thought of until the last moment, and then it was only put in by way of supplement. I may mention, however, before I leave that branch of the subject, what the provisions are, and what may be stated in their favour or in their excuse, because it is but fair that we should consider both sides. Whether I concur in the answer, with regard to the abridgment of religious instruction, I do not say at the present moment, but I presume it will be admitted that in some districts it will be found convenient by Protestant parents to send their children to the separate schools, in some instances they may have no strong objections to that course. Out of deference to their interest and convenience, especially in sparsely-settled districts, it is provided that the morning prayer at the opening of the school shall be optional. The school hours are from 9 o'clock until some time early in the afternoon, and then from recess on to 4 o'clock; and while in the Ordinance of 1888 it is provided that religious instruction may be given during the last hour, all that can be alleged against the Ordinance of 1892 as to that is that religious instruction shall be given but half an hour, out of consideration to the interest of children whose parents dissent from the religious teaching of the school. Now, I beg to call the attention of the House to one branch of the subject which appears to me to be of great importance in considering what reasons the Government had for doing what they did. The prayers of these petitions, without, I think, a single exception, are in the alternative; they ask that this Ordinance shall be disallowed, or that the Legislature of the Territories shall be commanded to repeal or to amend it. Now, Sir, finding that under the circumstances which I have mentioned, as regards many of the complaints, they did not arise under the Ordinance of 1892 at all, and, therefore, did not call for disallowance, we turned our attention to the alternative, which, as I have just stated, was a prayer that the Legislature of the Territories be commanded to repeal or amend the Ordinance. It was not in our power to command the Legislature to repeal its Ordinance, not within our constitutional authority, and nothing would have made it more certain that representations in behalf of redress would be spurned, than that we should adopt the language of command which we had no right to use. But we did practically what the petitioners asked us to do, only we did it in terms that we thought would be more effective, that is to say, we presented in the name of His Excellency the Governor General of this country, and his Executive, an earnest request that the Legislature of the Territories should re-examine the whole subject, should inquire not only into the complaints that grievances which existed, but into the complaints that grievances might arise, and should make any amendment to the Ordinance which was necessary to remove the grievances that exist and the alarm with regard to the future. I think that in making that application to the Territories to give redress, we were complying, if not literally, at least in spirit with the second prayer of the petitioners that the Legislature of the Territories should be ordered to give redress. We were doing it to the extent of our limited authority, and what right has any one, then, to make the aspersion against us that in doing that, in complying to the fullest extent of our power and authority with that prayer, we were simply handing the minority over to their enemies, who had shown themselves hostile and aggressive already? We were not doing so, Sir, but we were appealing to the Legislature of the Territories, as we would appeal to the Legislature of a province; and we were doing more, we were appealing to a body which was perfectly conscious that the exercise of its legislative functions with respect to this question was all the time under the watchful eye of a Parliament which had ample jurisdiction to give redress, if such were denied by the Legislature. A question was asked last night by one of the hon. members who debated this subject very earnestly, it was this: Why, when we had referred the question of the validity and so forth of the Manitoba Act to the Supreme Court of Canada, we had not followed the same course with respect to this Ordinance? Well, Sir, in the first place, I say that this was not requested, by the petitioners or on their behalf, and I doubt exceedingly that it would give them anything like the redress they demand. The contention has hardly been put forward seriously that this Ordinance is ultra vires of the Legislature. If it were so, if the minority should desire that the question should go before the courts, there is abundant opportunity yet of sending it there; but doubting exceedingly that the Ordinance is beyond the power of the Legislature of the Territories, and doubting the desirability of putting the petitioners to the expense of a course of litigation in the Supreme Court on a question on which we entertain ourselves a strong opinion, by referring that question to the courts by the way of giving them redress, we should have been giving them a stone when they asked for bread.

Mr. LAURIER. Hear, hear.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I beg to distinguish for the benefit of the hon. gentleman who has been good enough to give me the first cheer I have received from him in the course of my remarks, the difference between this case and the case of Manitoba. This case rests certainly on a different principle, because the question there with respect to the validity of the statute admitted of such very great doubts, nay, of such confidence as regards the opinion that the statute was ultra vires of the Legislature, that we found the whole bench of the Supreme Court judges deciding that the Act was invalid. When that decision had been reached by that body, although it was subsequently reversed by the appellate tribunal, it showed there was ample ground for submitting the validity of the Act to that tribunal. Furthermore, the subject was of such doubt and uncertainty as regards the scope of the constitution that the House of Commons voted the money for carrying on the litigation, which, perhaps, the House would have been unwilling to do under the circumstances which surround this particular Ordinance, as the case did not seem to be so strong, and especially after the result of the litigation in the other case which was sent for adjudication. There were some questions raised in the course of the debate which perhaps it will hardly be necessary I should say much about, and which were hardly put forward with seriousness, but which have attracted some attention from the press. It was said: Here is a strange and suspicious circumstance: there must have been strong differences of opinion on the part of the members of the Executive at Ottawa, because we find these petitions referred to a sub-committee of the Council, consisting of three gentlemen, whose names were mentioned, and it is quite certain they must have fought like cat and dog, because they made no report and the subject had to be dealt with by the whole Council. All that supposition is founded on a singular misconception of the course of procedure in the Privy Council from day to day. Matters which come up concerning any particular department of the Government are referred to the Minister at the head of that department for his report, and in the great majority of cases, matters are decided on the report of the head of the department. The petitions which were presented in this case hardly referred to a question of law, and therefore did not come particularly under my care, nor did they fall particularly under the care of any other department, and so there being no particular Minister who had charge of the subject, no Minister of Education, for example, no Minister particularly in charge of the revision of the work of the

Sir JOHN THOMPSON.

Legislature, they were referred for convenience to a sub-committee, and that sub-committee made. It is said, no report on them, because they could not agree. The sub-committee made four reports on them, all of which were approved by His Excellency. It may be a matter of form, it may be a matter of routine, and it may be unimportant as to what was contained in their reports. So it was with respect to the reference to the committee itself. The committee examined the petitions, considered the questions raised in them and the requests embodied in each of them; and the committee recommended, as a Minister would have done, if they had been referred to him, as each batch of petitions came in, that they be transmitted to the Lieutenant-Governor of the Territories with a request for the observations of the Executive upon them; and when the observations of the Executive were received, the whole subject was taken up by Council itself, and the reference to the committee was cancelled, because the subject was one so difficult as to require the consideration of every member of the Council. The matter was no longer considered as a matter of routine, but as a subject that required the consideration of every member of Council. I perhaps ought not to have troubled the House by referring to that subject at all, because it is so utterly unimportant, and because every one who is acquainted with the working and proceedings in Council knows that there can be no disagreement unknown to the public immediately. When this Order in Council was passed everybody knows, who knows anything of procedure in a body like that, that the conclusions arrived at received the unanimous sanction of every member of that body. I grant that in the consideration of almost every question which can arise from day to day in such a body there are various shades of difference between members gathered together to discuss questions whether political or commercial, but the course always followed as regards matters coming before the advisers of the Executive authority of this country is simply this: that if these differences of opinion are as to mere matters of detail, mere matters as to whether it is advisable to do what shall be done in this or in that way, generally speaking the opinions can be harmonized, but if it involves a question of principle and members of the Council are irreconcilably divided the public within a very few hours hear of the circumstance through the retirement of the dissenting member or members. But with respect to this question it stands precisely on the same footing as other questions, and as regards any one of the fifty Orders in Council which are in this batch of papers under my hand, that unanimity was arrived at before advice was submitted to His Excellency for confirmation. I beg to say that while I have detained the House so long, I have spoken under the restraint of a strong desire to refrain from saying anything in the discussion which would affect the future settlement of the question, or which would minimize in any way the weight of the considerations which ought to be taken into account by the authorities of the territories, who will have to deal with the subject presently. And, Sir, begging the House to consider the circumstances which I have mentioned, under which this question of disallowance came before us, with regard to time, with regard to the plenary powers of this Parliament over everything that transpires in the territories, with regard to the obviously mistaken views of the petitioners as to regulations which existed before the Ordinance of 1892 was passed, and as to the character of the regulations which were adopted after the Ordinance had passed, and as to the absence of urgency, I think the House will be disposed to agree that after all we came to the safe and wiser conclusion, although it has created, I admit, considerable irritation on the part of those who had formed expectations of a more speedy, decisive, and heroic remedy being given to the petitioners.

Mr. LAURIER. Mr. Speaker, the question before the House at this moment does not, in any way, involve any censure or any approval of the conduct of the Government with regard to their decision on the Northwest school question. The motion is simply that the Government will please to bring down the petitions of the Roman Catholic minority of the territories, and the Orders in Council passed upon them by the Government. This debate has been a very extended one, and it has, to a large extent, anticipated the debate which must take place later on when the papers have been brought down. The right hon. gentleman has at length vindicated his course out of the documents in his possession, but not in the possession of the House. In so far as I will refer to the broader question, it is, at the present time, this: The Roman Catholic minority complain that by the legislation of the Assembly and of the Executive, they are in fact deprived of their schools to which they are entitled under the law of the land. They assert that although the name of "separate" school has been retained, that although they still apparently have the fact, yet, in reality, they have been deprived of all separate schools, and that their schools have been made public schools just as the other schools of the territories are. The answer of Mr. Haultain, or of the Executive, as I understand it, is, that this complaint has no foundation in fact, although new regulations have been made, in point of fact they do not abridge any of the rights of the Roman Catholic minority to which they are entitled. The right hon. gentleman has largely justified this pretension of Mr. Haultain, and there remains the simple question as to where the truth lies. On the one hand, you have the Roman Catholic minority contending that they are deprived of their rights, and this contention is supported by some of the most eminent men of the territories, among others, the Archbishop of St. Boniface and Mgr. Grandin, Bishop of the Northwest Territories. On the other hand we have the contention of Mr. Haultain that the complaint is altogether unfounded in fact. It is obvious that, at this moment, it is impossible for the House to pass any judgment upon the action taken by the Government, and, for my part, not having an opportunity yet of delving into the mass of documents which the right hon. gentleman had the advantage of, it is impossible, at this moment, to pass any judgment, and so I refrain from passing any opinion upon the conduct of the Government, reserving that right until such a time as I have had an opportunity of looking thoroughly into the documents which I suppose will be brought down before the House. There is one point, however, in which I am disposed to agree at once with the right hon. the Premier. Whatever may be the contention, on the one side or on the other, I agree that there was no cause whatever for a reference of this question to the Supreme Court. It is a mere question of fact on which each one can pass his judgment when the papers have been placed before us. I agree with the hon. gentleman that there was no case for a reference to the Supreme Court, but one of the reasons which he gave was not a good reason, judged by his own record. One of his reasons was that such a reference had not been asked for by the petitioners, that they were asking bread, and this would only give them stone. I would remind the hon. gentleman that he has somewhat altered his mind since last year.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It turned out that we had not the power to give them bread.

Mr. LAURIER. Last year the hon. gentleman had the power to refer a somewhat similar question to the Supreme Court, and he did not refer it then for the reason that it had been asked by the suppliants, because they were against it. He gave them a stone on that occasion, when they were asking for bread. This year, there is no occasion, however, for a reference. I am very glad that the hon. gentleman takes this course, and I am very glad also to know that this year the Government will not attempt to shield their responsibility behind the opinion of the Supreme Court, but that the Executive of the Dominion, which is responsible upon all such occasions, shall come up to the expectations of the public and give a decision themselves. I only wish that the hon. gentleman last year had done the same thing as he does now. I only wish that the Government last year had embraced the responsibility which rests upon them and discharged the duty which they owed to those who made application to them. This year again, the people of Manitoba are to be given another stone, instead of the bread for which they are asking, because if I have not mistaken the hon. gentleman's remarks, he told us that the decision which was given by the Supreme Court with regard to the power of this Government to interfere in the Manitoba school question was now to be brought to the Privy Council, and that certain Roman Catholics in the province of Manitoba were now taking steps to bring that question before the Privy Council. I want to know what have the Catholics of Manitoba to do with that question. This cannot be called a litigation as between party and party. This question upon which the Supreme Court passed judgment was not a litigation between any classes of Her Majesty's subjects. It was simply an opinion which was asked by the Government of Canada for their own guidance, and when the decision has been given, why in the name of common sense should other parties now step in in order to have a decision over that decision. I suspect very much that there is something that the hon. gentleman has not told us about. I cannot conceive how any parties outside the Government can be brought in now, to refer to the Privy Council an opinion given by the Supreme Court upon the application of the Government of Canada.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. If the hon. gentleman will permit me, I will tell him that by the statute under which it was referred to the Supreme Court, it is distinctly provided that the parties concerned shall be notified, and that the matter shall proceed as between parties, and therefore if the minority has not the right to appeal, nobody has.

Mr. LAURIER. I do not contend that the Supreme Court judgment may not be taken to another tribunal, but what I do not understand is that the parties who were adverse to a reference to the Supreme Court should now go to the Privy Council. I always understood that what the Roman Catholic minority of Manitoba wanted, was to have the powers conferred on the Government by section 93 of the British North America Act applied in their own case; and that the Executive should give a decision upon their petition. Therefore, I do not think that it is at all proper now that the matter should be pushed any further. I will not again discuss this North-west school question at the present time; it comes up only casually. I have only this remark to make to the hon. gentleman: that the longer this question is kept before the public the worse it is for the good of Canada. It is a question on which there should be an immediate and speedy answer. It has been dragged from tribunal to tribunal, and if it is again to be dragged to another tribunal, what will be the consequence? The consequence will be that passion will be inflamed; and when a decision is reached the difficulties of the Government will be ten times greater than they are at the present time—difficulties which it may be beyond the power of anybody to counteract.

Mr. LAURIER.

Mr. DEVLIN. Mr. Speaker, following the example of my leader, I do not propose to enter into a discussion of this subject at this moment, but rather to ask whether all the papers intended to be laid upon the Table have been laid upon it to-day? The motion asks for correspondence with any member of the Government, and, as important correspondence is said to have passed between the hon. Minister of Public Works and Mgr. Taché on this subject, I venture to hope that that also will be laid on the Table. There was something in the statement made by the Prime Minister to-day, however, which amazed me. That was when he accepted almost implicitly the version of the hon. member for West Assinibola (Mr. Davin) and of his colleagues in the representation of the North-west Territories, and seemed, all through his remarks, to throw doubt on the statements of those who thought proper to champion the case of the Catholics who claim to be affected by the ordinance in question. The right hon. gentleman said that it was proper in matters of this kind to take the advice of the representatives from the North-west Territories, and that he had listened with a great deal of interest to the opinions expressed by the hon. member for West Assinibola as well as by the hon. member for Saskatchewan (Mr. Macdowall). But, Sir, it is well known also—the Prime Minister admitted it—that in regard to this difficulty he has received very important documents from gentlemen who, I venture to say, are far better acquainted with the question than the gentleman who would play schoolmaster to the Catholics of the North-west, the hon. member for West Assinibola, or than the hon. member for Saskatchewan. It is well known that the hon. member for West Assinibola generally speaks in a dual capacity, although he is a single man. He speaks on certain occasions as an individual, having his own private convictions; on other occasions he speaks as the representative of Assinibola. It was no doubt in the latter capacity that he spoke here the other day. He had an eye to the majority of the electors of his constituency; and, although in that speech he said that the people in the North-west were actuated by broad, generous and noble sentiments, he seemed to fear that same majority, if he took any other position than the one he did take. You will remember that that very expression of his, that the people were most liberal-minded, most generous, in fact, broad-minded, was followed a moment afterwards, by the remark that because Mr. Haultain had made a certain concession to the Catholics it was quite probable that he would pay dearly for it at the next election. They were generous and broad-minded, but Mr. Haultain had been asked to do a certain act of justice to the Catholics, which would be so severely resented by that generous and kind majority that he would suffer at the next election. The hon. Prime Minister said to-day that disallowance would have no effect. He is a high constitutional authority, and of course his statement must carry weight. He protested against the assertion that separate schools exist in the North-west only in name. Archbishop Taché, who thoroughly understands the schools of the North-west, Mgr. Grandin, who also thoroughly understands them, and Father Leduc, who has spent many years of his life in the North-west, always identifying himself with his schools, affirm that separate schools do not exist to-day in the North-west otherwise than in name—that they do not exist in fact. These gentlemen will no doubt be consoled by the reply given to their statements by the Prime Minister of the country. The Prime Minister said that it would be useless to discuss this question until the Legislature of the North-west had been heard from, and that, as it was possible slight inconveniences might exist, that Legislature had been invited to look into the matter, and had been also cordially invited to give their reply. Well, Sir, here is the passage to which the hon. gentleman refers :

They feel confident that any suggestion having His Excellency's authority would be given all proper consideration by the Assembly and by the council ; and they advise—

Bear in mind, not by the Legislature, but by the Executive Committee of the North-west Council——that communication be made to the Lieut.-Governor of the North-west Territories, urgently requesting that the complaint set forth by the petitioners be carefully inquired into, and the whole subject be reviewed by the Executive Committee of the North-west Assembly.

That advice was tendered, not a day ago, but weeks ago—if I mistake not, over a month ago. In all his long and able oration delivered here to-day, the Prime Minister never said one word as to any hope he had received from that Executive Committee that the advice tendered by the Executive Committee of this House would be considered. He has not even said whether the matter would come before the Local Legislature for consideration. He said also that in his opinion, as far as he could judge, there were little grievances in regard to the regulations of 1892. I have in my hands a letter addressed by Rev. Father Leduc to His Grace the Archbishop of Manitoba in which he states the grievances :

A petition made in the name of His Lordship Bishop Grandin, of St. Albert, 17 others, made by the trustees of the Catholic schools of the North-west Territories, and another drawn by Your Grace, has been addressed to His Excellency the Governor General in Council. All these petitions expressed the grave subject of complaint of the Catholics with regard to the last school ordinance in the North-west Territories.

I quote this in order to give an idea of the number of petitions sent to the Government. Further on, he says :

We read in the report of the Committee of the Privy Council: Upon a comparison of the duties prescribed for inspectors of schools in the ordinance of 1888 and that of 1892, as amended, it will be seen that they are practically the same.

And Father Leduc adds :

The report of the Committee of the Privy Council eludes deliberately the question, and gives a conclusion the great part of which is outside of the subject of the petitions. We complain that the Ordinance of 1892 deprives us Catholics of the right of appointing our inspectors for our Catholic schools, a right granted by the Ordinance of 1888.

This is an important matter. The other day, when speaking upon this subject, the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) said that the rights of Catholics were in less danger in the hands of the Legislature of the North-west Territories than in the hands of this House. He said that the Catholics were represented on the Board of Education ; but when we look into the matter, we find that the Executive Board is composed of four members, not one of whom is a Catholic. It is true there are four advisers attached to it—two Protestants and two Catholics—but they have not the right to vote. They can give advice when consulted, or when they feel so disposed, but they cannot back up their advice by their votes. I put it in all fairness to the House. Here is a Protestant board, composed of four members, who, in all probability have no sympathy with us whatever in matters which we hold dear, and by which we are bound to stand, no matter what may be said in the North-west or on the floor of this House. Is it likely that the Catholics of the North-west can have any confidence in a board of this kind, composed of four Protestants, with entire jurisdiction over Catholic interests ? The hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) said that the agitation now existing in Canada was entirely due to gentlemen from the province of Quebec. He attributed a good deal of it to the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte). It is not my province to defend that hon. gentleman, who is well able to look after himself in the press, on the platform, and in this House. But I say that this agitation is not due to the Catholics of Quebec. Who was it that, in 1886, went into the province of Ontario and declared, before a large audience, that the great enemy of confederation was the French element in Canada ? It was the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McOCarthy), then in full sympathy with the Conservative party, president of the Conservative union of the province of Ontario, and who was specially sent by Sir John Macdonald into that constituency to preach this very doctrine, namely, that although we might admire certain French-Canadians as individuals, yet, as a body politic, the French-Canadians were a great danger to confederation. The speech in which these words are found was delivered at Barrie. It was the note that sounded the war cry which, from that day to this, has been waged against French-Canadians and Catholics; and that speech was circulated by means of Conservative associations and by the Conservative press in almost every part of Ontario. Is it not a fact that the very element of which I now speak has become so strong, that even the Prime Minister has to give it representation in the Cabinet? I ask, would the Controller of Customs to-day be a member of the Government because of his mental qualifications? or because of any acts of statesmanship he has rendered to the country? Would that gentleman occupy the position he does, if it were not for the fact that he has, as Grand Master of the Orangemen, uttered strong and hard, but cruel words against the Catholics and French-Canadians? I have already in this House stated that all this was due largely to a mean spirit. Perhaps I use strong language, but I have to speak out the truth. I believe that as long as this state of affairs prevails that it cannot bring peace to any community or province, and can only be due to a mean spirit. I charge that the Controller of Customs has been acting with his fellow member from North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) in exciting this warfare. What happened the night before last in the Ontario Legislature? The hon. member for L'Islet is not a member of that Legislature, he is not connected with the party which took such a strange position in the Ontario Legislature the other night. Yet we find that there already inroads are being made on rights dear to the Catholics. We find there that war has been declared against the Catholics of Ontario—and declared by whom? By the leader of the Ontario Government? No; the leader of the Ontario Government has a proud record in this respect. Every time he found that the Catholics were assailed—whether in 1887 or 1890—he said: "The Catholics are in the minority, and they depend on the spirit of justice of the Protestant majority for the respect due to their rights." He said: I know that the Protestant majority in Ontario is strong, and that it might be possible to create prejudice among them, but justice is on the side of the Catholics, and I stand by them in their demands. And, Mr. Speaker, the majority of Ontario stood, I am proud to say, by the Liberal Government, and swept away the forces of the Conservative party. There is a movement—and I mention this in reply to the charge made that the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte) has been largely instrumental in exciting this warfare—there is a very serious movement going on in different parts of the Dominion against the Catholic minority. We know not exactly at times where it is. It is secret; it is insidious; it is mean. I refer to the Protestant Protective Association. Is that association throwing in its support with the Liberals? No, Sir, it is heart and soul in sympathy with the Conservative party, which to-day has taken as its platform the destruction of the Catholic schools of Ontario. Did that movement originate in Quebec? No, it comes from Ontario. It was imported across the line separating that province from the great country to the south. It is doing its contemptible, mean work in Ontario. The aim of that movement, which the First Minister has not denounced, either in this House or on any platform, although the subject has been frequently brought to his notice, is to take from the poor Catholic labourer the right to earn his living, and from the Catholic parent the right to educate his child as he thinks proper, and in the schools guaranteed to him by the constitution. Hon. members find it strange that we bring this question before this House, but let them consider the injustices to which we are subjected. Has any attack ever been made in the province of Quebec upon the rights of the Protestant minority in that province? No, Sir. But every attack, every injustice has been directed—against whom? Against the Catholics in some portion or another of the Dominion. You never hear, and you never will hear, of an attack being made on the Protestant minority of the province of Quebec, or of any other province where such minority happens to exist. I think, Sir, that I have shown that the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte) did not start this agitation. The laws of the country guaranteed to us long ago the right of having our separate schools both in Manitoba and in the provinces of the North-west. Of course there has been a great deal of discussion over a statute which none of the lawyers seem able to understand. It has two sections, six lines in all, I believe, and it has gone from court to court, from the courts in this country to the Privy Council in England, and still none of the lawyers seem to be able to explain it. This, however, ought to be clear, that whatever rights the Protestant minority or the Roman Catholic minority are entitled to by the provisions of that Act ought to be respected. Still, the rights of the Catholics in Manitoba have been swept away, and those rights in the North-west are assailed, menaced and damaged. In proof of that one need not go further than this—to point out that 75 per cent of the Catholic schools in the North-west Territories are under the inspection of Protestant gentlemen. Very little was said by the Prime Minister about the difficulty which arises with respect to the French language in the North-west. The right hon. gentleman says he must take a broad view of the question; he must take a generous view of the question. He says the French people must understand that it is wise, in this country, to educate their children in the English language; that the English language should be their language. But suppose the French-Canadian holds dear the language he has learned in childhood; suppose the French-Canadian thinks—and very justly too—that the French language is the better language of the two, and prefers that it shall be his own language and that of his children, and suppose he is living in a community where those who speak that language are the majority, is he bound to take this advice, to bring up his children to speak English, because, forsooth, it is given by the Prime Minister of Canada. Sir, there are others to speak upon this question, including some gentlemen from the province of Quebec, so I shall not deal longer with this portion of the subject. We have here to-day a memorial of the Archbishop upon this school question. Moreover, we are promised very important papers which are to be laid upon the Table. No doubt the Minister of Public Works will also lay upon the Table important communications which he has received—if I am correctly informed—from the Archbishop of Manitoba. I am satisfied that from all these sources we shall be able to arrive at a just conclusion, and that that conclusion will not be the one at which the Prime Minister of this country has arrived, namely, that there is little or no grievance in the North-west. I feel confident that after studying those papers we shall be able to tell the Archbishop of Manitoba, Mgr. Grandin and others who have taken part in establishing these schools, to whom the schools are dear, that they have not been “misled by zeal,” to use the words of the Prime Minister, that they have not been mistaken, but that their grievances have been shown to be well founded. The Ordinances of 1888 provide that the Lieutenant-Governor in Council may appoint and constitute a board of education composed of eight members, and three shall be Roman Catholics. The three Catholic members have the right to vote. The Ordinance of 1892, of which complaint is made, provides that the members of the Executive Committee and two Protestants and two Roman Catholics shall constitute a Council of Public Instruction. The appointed members shall have no vote. And yet we are told this is not a grievance. Under the Ordinance of 1888, any question on which there is an equality of votes shall be deemed to be negatived. So that the three Catholics, with the help of one single Protestant, could negative all hostile regulations. Under the Ordinance of 1892 the Catholics have no vote against hostile regulations. Under the Ordinance of 1888 important powers were granted to the Roman Catholics, as follows: To determine all appeals from the decisions of inspectors of schools and make such orders thereon as may be required. To-day they have no such power. To provide for an uniform system of inspection of all schools and to make such regulations as may be deemed necessary with respect to the duties of inspectors. To-day the Catholics have no power in that respect. To arrange for the proper examination, grading and licensing of teachers and the granting of certificates. To-day they have no authority in these matters, and yet we are told they have no grievance. To make regulations for the general government and discipline of the schools. To-day they have no authority in that respect. If the Catholic teacher, carrying out what he may properly consider a conscientious duty should undertake to do what we do in this House of Commons, begin the labours of the day by consecrating them to God by a prayer, that Catholic teacher would be breaking a regulation. In other words, the law declares that the labours of the day in the school shall not be consecrated to God, as is the rule in Catholic schools. In 1888 they had the right to appoint inspectors; to-day they have no power to do so. Yet we are told there is no grievance. In 1888 they had the right to select and prescribe text books. To-day they have no such power. In 1888 they had the power to cancel the certificate of a teacher; to-day they cannot do so. Under the Ordinance of 1888 it is provided that the Board of Education shall resolve itself into two sections, the one consisting of the Protestant and the other of the Roman Catholic members thereof. To-day there is no such division. Under the Ordinance of 1892 it was the duty of each section (Catholic as well as Protestant, and exclusively) to have under its control and management the schools of its section. The Catholics have no power of control or management of their schools to-day. To make such regulations as may be deemed necessary for their general government and discipline. To-day there is no such power. And so I could go on, Mr. Speaker, quoting many more instances showing that every power and right the Catholics had in the control of their schools have been taken away. And yet they are told that they have no right to complain of their grievances. I do not wish to detain the House by going into this question at length, as an opportunity will be afforded later of discussing it more fully. Before closing, I desire to refer to one point in the speech of the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin). He had donned his war paint for this speech, and throwing his arms about, he warned us: If you touch this Ordinance you will arouse the people of the North-west. Then, coming back to his senses, he spoke in the highest terms of the venerable archbishop, expressing his confidence in and admiration for him, and declared that one had but to look about the North-west to see Archbishop Taché's monument. It is true that Manitoba and the North-west, as they stand to-day, are a monument to the archbishop. He has undertaken labours and made sacrifices such as stand to the credit of but few men in this country. He went up there, not to amass a fortune, not to make a great name for himself, but simply to consecrate his life, his great talents and his bodily strength to the glory of his God and the protection and guardianship of the flock confided to his care. Sir, the great monument of his work is to be seen in the Catholic schools which he was able to establish all over the North-west. The monument which Archbishop Taché erected for himself, and the one to which he clings with the most tenacity, are the very schools of which we are speaking to-day. He suffered much, he sacrificed much, he laboured hard, in order to build up these schools. These schools are his monument, and now the enemy lays his hands upon it. I tell hon. members, you have attacked that monument, you have laid destructive hands upon it, you have taken much of it away in the North-west Territories as you have taken it all away in Manitoba, and you still profess to have admiration for the man who, when you were in trouble up there, when you were threatened by a rising of the half-breeds and the Indians, came to your rescue and defended your property as far as he could. Your expression of gratitude to the grand and venerable prelate consists in your laying destructive hands upon this noble monument which, by years of hard labour, he has built for himself and his people in the North-west.

RETURNS ORDERED.

Copies of all Orders in Council and departmental orders now in force in the province of Ontario, concerning fisheries therein, and of all petitions received by the department with regard to the same.—(Mr. McGregor.)

Copies of all telegrams, letters, petitions, Orders in Council, and all correspondence relating to the dismissal of Timothy McQueen as fishery overseer in the county of Kent, Ontario.—(Mr. Campbell.)

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and the House adjourned at 5.50 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, 27th April, 1894.

PRAYERS.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

EXAMINATION ON OATH.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved:

That the Order for the second reading of Bill (No. 96) to provide for the examination of witness on oath by the Senate and the House of Commons, be transferred from Public Bills and Orders to Government Orders.

Motion agreed to.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE TARIFF.

House again resolved itself into Committee on Ways and Means.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. FOSTER. Shall we take up the item of tea and coffee, which was allowed to stand at the request of my hon. friend?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Very well. I would ask the hon. gentleman to give us a history of the several changes; and, if possible, the reasons which have presented themselves to his mind in favour of these changes. I understand that two resolutions are to be rescinded:—

Coffee, green, when not imported direct without transshipment from the country of growth and production, 10 per cent ad valorem.

And a similar resolution with regard to tea and one resolution to be substituted:—

Tea and green coffee, n.e.s., 10 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes; there is a further resolution, of which notice has been given:

Tea and green coffee imported direct from the country of growth and production. This item shall include tea and coffee purchased in bond in any country where tea and coffee are subject to customs duty, provided there be satisfactory proof that the tea and coffee so purchased in bond is such as might be entered for home consumption in the country where the same is purchased.

The effect will be this: Tea and green coffee, when imported direct from the country of growth and production, will come in free. It will allow also the purchase in London of tea which comes into that city, is put into bond, is there inspected under the supervision of customs officers, and is blended while in bond. Such of it as is found by the inspectors to be fit to be entered for consumption in Great Britain under their laws and regulations, can be imported into Canada free. A certain part of the tea which comes to London is found not to be fit to be entered for consumption under their Foods and Drugs Act. Such tea is marked by the inspecting officers as fit for export only, and the penalty is supposed to be re-export to the country from which it came. But, of course, a great deal of it is not returned to the country of production. That class of tea which would not be admitted to the British market for home consumption would be discriminated against here.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Judging from the record of importations hitherto, what teas does the hon. gentleman expect will bear this tax?

Mr. FOSTER. No teas that—

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman states the negative; I want a positive statement of the countries from which the taxable teas will come.

Mr. FOSTER. All other countries except those in the schedule I have mentioned.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Which are they?

Mr. FOSTER. Those in which a customs duty is not levied upon tea and in which teas are not entered in bond, inspected in bond, blended in bond, and satisfactory certificates of the quality and purity of the goods given.

Mr. GILLMOR. Will the Finance Minister explain about coffee?

Mr. FOSTER. Green coffee is in the same category. The green coffee which does not come direct from the country of growth or production is subject to the duty.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I am informed that most of the Java coffee which is imported into Canada is bought in Amsterdam and Rotterdam. Can the Minister tell me under what circumstances coffee will come in free from duty?

Mr. FOSTER. I am not sure that most of it is bought in Holland. My information from the importers would lead me to believe that it is not the case, that most of it comes from Holland, but that a great deal of Java coffee is brought direct, that is on through bills of lading. A large proportion of coffee consumed in Canada comes in from Venezuela or the West Indies, and, of course, will come direct. But, if coffee is bought on the continent, for instance in Holland, it would not come in under this clause.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Holland does not impose a duty on coffee coming into that country?

Mr. FOSTER. No.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Do not I understand that under this schedule coffee imported from Holland would come into Canada free?

Mr. FOSTER. No; it would not come in free.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I have a letter from a large importer stating that the great bulk of the Java coffee is imported from Holland. The reason why I ask the question particularly is that at the present time they cannot get an answer, yes or no, from the custom-house authorities. This, of course, is a great disadvantage to the trade.

Mr. FOSTER. There is no trouble in giving an answer; the answer is that coffee bought in Holland does not come under this clause.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The proposition then is this: If a country puts a duty on tea or coffee, though it may not be the country of production, and tea or coffee is imported into that country in bond, then it may be taken out of bond and imported into this country free of duty. But, in the case of a country that has imposed no tax upon tea or coffee, into which there is no necessity of importing it in bond, then tea or coffee purchased in that country and imported into Canada, though exactly the same in every other respect as the other, will be taxed. Now, I would like to call the attention of the committee to this, to bring up the question of the propriety of imposing this tax. If the hon. gentleman thought that tea and coffee were proper subjects of taxation, that would be a subject fairly before this committee for consideration. But the hon. gentleman does not make that proposition. He undertakes to subordinate the collection of revenue to the policy of development, which he has told us at the outset should be the primary object to be kept in view by the Minister of Finance. Keeping in view that object they seek to induce parties to import direct from the country of production by offering exemption from taxation. Then the hon. gentleman found that he could not do that, the feeling among the English importers was too strong for him, and he was obliged to abandon the plan. If tea and coffee are objects of taxation in England, they are imported there in bond, and so he makes this amendment to include tea and coffee in the free list when imported from England, but tea and coffee imported from any country where there is no tax upon them, are to be taxed here. Now, let me call the attention of the committee to the way in which this will work. We have wholesale merchants in Canada who are engaged in the importation of these articles. Some of them have had their business connections established for years, not with London, not in the country of production, but with Holland, and they import the coffee we will say, from Rotterdam and Amsterdam, as my hon. friend from North Oxford has stated. Now, that being the case, why should they have their business ruined? Why are we legislating here with the view of destroying the established business of a certain class of merchants in Canada, in order to carry out a policy of this sort? The hon. gentleman is not legislating to get a revenue in this matter at all, that is not his object; he is legislating to force trade into particular channels. He has been obliged to abandon that policy to the extent of the English trade, and he retains it as against Holland, when by doing so he may ruin the business of some men who are as much deserving of the consideration of this House as any men in the whole community. I say that the whole system is monstrous. There is a heartless indifference to the civil rights of those portions of the population at whom a deadly blow is aimed by the course which the hon. gentleman now proposes to take. I say the proposition is a most unjust one, it is one that I would not undertake to characterize in this House as I think it ought to be characterized; and this committee will do a great injustice to certain mercantile men in this country if they support this proposition. I would like any hon. gentleman to answer me this question: If Mr. Smith, a wholesale merchant, is importing his tea or coffee from Amsterdam, and has been for a quarter of a century, and Mr. Jones is importing his from London, why should Mr. Jones be allowed to bring his in free and Mr. Smith be obliged to pay the tax that the hon. gentleman proposes to impose by this tariff? Is there any justification for it? Is it the business of this House to interfere between parties in this way? A man's business connections are established, he cannot change them in an hour, he may not be able to change them at all; and the result of the hon. gentleman's proposition may be to ruin him, simply because he is obliged to pay a tax from which four or five competitors are wholly exempt. I say this is bad enough when you undertake to discriminate in favour of the producer of an article against the consumer, but when you undertake to discriminate in favour of one trader in the country as against another trader, as you do here, both of whom have their business connections established, you do a great injustice, and one that this House ought not to allow itself for one moment to perpetrate.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The point raised by my hon. friend from Bothwell certainly requires our serious consideration, and in view of the numerous alterations that have been made from time to time in this particular duty, I hope that the Minister of Finance will be prepared to explain to us whether my hon. friend's contention is correct, and if it be correct, on what principle he proposes to ask us to do what I am bound to say appears to me to be a very unreasonable and unfair thing, that is, to interfere with the established custom of trade.

Mr. FRASER. I would like to ask the Minister of Finance if tea and coffee imported into London in bond can be tested according to the methods in use there, before they are sold? If tea testers go to the bonded warehouse and there make the test? Otherwise, no tea that is not tested can be imported. The point may be raised that the tea was not tested according to the methods used in London, and consequently it cannot be imported.

Mr. FOSTER. Teas are inspected there.

Mr. FRASER. But can they be inspected in bond? That is what I want to know.

Mr. FOSTER. They are inspected in bond.

Mr. FRASER. By the tea testers?

Mr. FOSTER. Under a provision of the customs.

Mr. FRASER. But that is not the tea testing to which I refer. Those in the tea trade know that in London they have tea testers, and these testers practically control the purchasers, because they regulate the prices by saying what tea is worth. What I want to find out is whether these tea testers in London are permitted to test tea in bond before it is taken out, because if not, you will not know whether the tea in bond is such tea as could be sold in England.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell).

Mr. WELSH. I think the remarks made by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) are very well taken. Suppose that in England they were to abolish the duty on tea and put it on the free list, what position would we be in then when importing it from England? We would be liable to the 10 per cent duty, without any doubt. I think this is an obstruction to trade. London is the largest tea market in the world. When a merchant goes to London and wants to buy Assam tea, or Ceylon tea, or China tea, or Japan tea, he gets a sample of every tea in the world laid before him in ten minutes, and he can make a selection. It is the best market in which to purchase, for I have had a good deal of experience in it, and I think this 10 per cent is simply like a turnpike gate on a public highway. Referring to the question of the hon. member for Guysboro' (Mr. Fraser), I think they do test all teas in bond. But I do not see the necessity of this 10 per cent on tea. I think this clause ought to be struck out, and tea should be put on the free list, as it was before.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I wish to call the hon. gentleman's attention to another thing, because the committee ought not to be satisfied with a statement as to what the intention is. We ought to know that the intention is a rational one, and the Minister ought to point out to us upon what grounds this distinction can be made. As the hon. member who has just spoken has remarked, if the duty were taken off tea in England, so that the bonding of tea would be an unnecessary proceeding, and that tea was not in bond, the hon. gentleman would have to impose a tax, and whether he would impose a tax on tea or not, would depend, not upon any public rational policy here, but upon the mere accident of whether tea happened to be taxed or untaxed in another country. The hon. gentleman, in his answer to my hon. friend from North Oxford (Mr. Sutherland), says there would be a tax on green coffee imported from Amsterdam or Rotterdam, but if Holland should put coffee on the list of taxed articles so that green coffee imported into Holland would be imported in bond, if the intention was to re-export it, then the hon. gentleman would at once be obliged to put his green coffee brought from Holland upon the free list. If it is proposed to take the article off the free list and put it on the taxed list, then the hon. gentleman would have to take it off the taxed list here and put it on the free list. It is proposed to adopt the tariff in this way. The hon. gentleman started with the idea that he would as far as possible force the trade of this country into particular channels. He has been compelled on account of influence brought to bear on the department from London, to abandon in a large degree that position, and he has abandoned it so far that he ought to abandon it altogether, and there is no rational ground, so far as I can see, and the hon. gentleman has made no defence yet of the proposition upon which this attempt to impose a tax on a mere fragment of the trade should be continued, why this tax should strike at one importer and not touch another importer should be imposed. The whole proposition, as it stands, is a monstrous one, and one in which the hon. gentleman should not persist.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) could no doubt find a great many reasons against any propositions made to tax an article or to levy and impose duty on an article if he chose to deal in imaginations and suppositions. A very strong case was made out on the ground that Great Britain had no tea or coffee tax. In that case the discrimination would be made against Great Britain, and the hon. gentleman would argue in that case that a tax would be levied on tea coming from Great Britain, which is a very large tea market. That might be the case, provided there was no tax on tea, and provided in the near future there was no tax on tea. But we have practical questions to deal with, without making long-winded speeches on the suppositions as to what would happen if the tax on tea in Great Britain were removed. If I read past history and the present condition of Great Britain aright, there is no great possibility of the tax being removed in the near future.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I did not say there was.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman waxed very indignant on the ground that it was suppose to interfere with one man's business, that Mr. Smith's business, for instance, would be affected, but the tariff would not interfere with Mr. A.'s business. It so happened that Mr. Smith imports in a certain way, and it happened that the other importer imported in a different way. If the item in the tariff passes, the fact that the tariff presses severely on one man's business and not on another's business is simply because one man does and the other does not conform to the general principles that underlie the item. The hon. gentleman was very indignant because Mr. Smith should be interfered with, while Mr. A. was left alone, and he went so far as to lay down as a general principle that Parliament had no right, that in fact it was an outrageous act for Parliament, by fiscal regulation, to interfere with a man's business.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). No, I did not say that.

Mr. FOSTER. I have heard the hon. gentleman myself say that if he and his party got into power they would certainly remove every vestige of protection from the tariff schedules, as they exist to-day, and the hon. gentleman who has just left the Chamber (Mr. Laurier) has stated as a cardinal principle of his policy, the removal of the iron duties immediately. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) should not wax so indignant when the hon. gentleman is prepared suddenly and immediately to interfere with an industry involving millions of capital and thousands of workpeople, and yet complain because, in the course of importing tea and coffee, Mr. Smith takes a certain route, while Mr. A. takes another route, and a difference may arise in consequence. I think the main principle to be taken into account is, whether we are placing a tax on tea to the consumer of this country or not. I say we are not. If there is any truth in general principles, if three-quarters of the tea or nine-tenths consumed in Canada comes by direct importation or through London to this country without the imposition of any tax, the duty on the other one-tenth or two-tenths, coming in an indirect manner, and on which the importers have to pay 10 per cent, is not paid by the consumer. A person will import in an indirect manner only because in that market he gains an advantage more than equivalent to the 10 per cent, and it is certain that this impost will not have to be paid by the consumer either on his tea or coffee. Coffee comes here from foreign countries. Java coffee comes direct to this country, or is shipped here in bond; it is so imported here to-day. Jamaica coffee, which is of excellent quality, and Trinidad coffee also, come direct. Then there is the Venezuela coffee, which forms a large proportion of the total crop, comes here free as well, comes either direct or by way of London. So that on either or on both of those articles, it cannot be contended for a moment that the consumer in this country will pay any tax. The other point to be considered is the development of the trade of Canada. Within the last few years an important step has been taken in advance in the way of direct importation of tea and coffee. Other things being equal, it is desirable that the people of Canada should conduct their own trade in that way, instead of paying indirect charges and costs due to indirect methods of importation. Within the last few years a great change has taken place in that respect. Under the Administration of which the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) was a member for a short time, the tea trade almost abandoned this country, so far as the wholesale trade was concerned. It will come back; it is now a large and important trade and has a vast amount of capital invested in it as well. The other principle that underlies this trade is that as far as possible direct importations should be the rule, and the business should be carried on by our own people, with the least accumulation of costs and charges during the transit. These are two matters which I think are clear and are to be relied upon. When we take them into consideration, I do not think it is so monstrous and outrageous an item in the tariff as has been alleged by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills). The hon. gentleman must keep cool over the matter and not allow himself to become excited.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. Finance Minister has spoken about long-winded speeches. Who has made the long-winded speech on this occasion?

Mr. FOSTER. Neither of us. I was not competing with you this time.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman has avoided altogether the objection I have made. I will not discuss whether the consumer would get tea, under the argument of the hon. gentleman, as cheap as if the amendment I suggested was adopted. We were not discussing as to the terms upon which the consumer might get his tea. The question was whether the hon. gentleman had the right to discriminate between one importer and another, and perhaps ruin the business of one importer and not another. I referred to the fact that if Great Britain took off the tax on tea, the hon. gentleman's argument, so far as London is concerned, would break down, that the article would no longer be imported from London free of duty. They are better informed on trade questions in England than to make a change in the tariff in that way on speculation; but the question was not as to the probability of such a change, but as to the impropriety of the course which the hon. gentleman was taking, and which, if certain things were to happen, would become glaringly apparent. Whether it would happen or not, it was quite pertinent as an illustration to my argument. But I call the hon. gentleman's attention to this fact, that there are large importations of green coffee from Holland, where no tax is imposed. The tariff of the hon. gentleman may ruin the business of a merchant who has for years been engaged in trading between this country and Holland. Let me suppose that a man in Canada is a member of a house in Amsterdam, or that he is in partnership in a house there which may have lasted for a quarter of a century when it is impossible that his arrangements could be broken up; that person importing to Holland in the first instance and from Holland to this country, will be heavily taxed, while if he were connected with a London house he would have his article free under exactly the same circumstances. That, I contend, is a most unjust arrangement. I am not now complaining with regard to its effect upon the consumer; I am pointing out this: That one man is discriminated against as compared with another engaged in precisely the same business. If the Finance Minister were to propose to levy an excise duty on one distiller, and to permit another to manufacture his goods free; does he suppose that the man who was taxed would not come here and complain; does he suppose that his friends behind him could not see the injustice of an arrangement of that sort? Even under a protective tariff, it is supposed at all events, that those engaged in the same business would stand upon a footing of equality, but under this arrangement the hon. gentleman does not permit persons to stand upon an equal footing in this particular business. He says: If you import directly from the country of production your article shall come in free, but he has been compelled to modify that so far as the larger portion of the imports—those from England is concerned. His whole policy in that respect has, therefore, absolutely broken down. The effect of this will not be to produce revenue or to alter the direction of trade in any large degree. The course which has been taken will simply be to ruin a few men interested in houses long established.

Mr. McMULLEN. This is unquestionably a very important matter and we ought to discuss thoroughly the resolution before the House before we pass it. We remember that last year when the Minister of Finance made his Budget speech, he boasted very loudly that the people of Canada were getting a free breakfast table, but this new tariff of his will impose a tax upon tea brought from England. It cannot be denied that very often you can buy tea in England cheaper than at the point of growth. London is the greatest tea market in the world and largely controls prices, so that very often the merchant can buy considerably better in London, of the kind and quality of tea used in Canada, than he can buy in the country of production. There is no other place in the world where the business of tea blending is more largely carried on than in London. You may take certain classes of tea from the country of growth and relatively speaking they may be cheap enough, but to meet the tastes of the consumers of Canada, you must buy in the London market to which we have been long accustomed. I am afraid that the proposal of the Minister will not meet that taste.

Mr. FOSTER. This is the very thing that does meet it.

Mr. McMULLEN. The Minister knows that the blending of tea is not pursued at the place of production to the same extent as in London.

Mr. FOSTER. It is done in London and that comes in free.

Mr. McMULLEN. But it must be blended in bond in London, and teas are taken out of bond and blended.

Mr. FOSTER. They are blended in bond.

Mr. McMULLEN. They have not been in the habit of blending in bond.

Mr. FOSTER. How else could they be blended than in bond ?

Mr. McMULLEN. They might be taken out and blended afterwards.

Mr. FOSTER. And pay sixpence a pound duty in England ? They would have to pay sixpence per pound if they are taken out of bond.

Mr. McMULLEN. Will the hon. gentleman deny the fact that at certain times tea is cheaper in London than at the point of growth ?

Mr. FOSTER. And we get it at the cheaper rate under this tariff.

Mr. McMULLEN. The wholesale merchant in London does not always keep his tea in bond until it is sold.

Mr. FOSTER. All the tea that goes to a foreign country is kept in bond. Would any man in London, if he wanted to sell tea to Canada, take it out of bond, pay sixpence a pound duty and then sell it to a Canadian importer ?

Mr. McMULLEN. That would depend upon the tea crop in foreign countries. The tea crop varies the same as the wheat crop.

Mr. FOSTER. And that would make it all the worse if he took it out of bond and paid sixpence a pound duty.

Mr. McMULLEN. There is another thing which the Minister of Finance should consider. On every occasion on which we on this side of the House point to the restricted conditions of our markets as far as the United States and other countries are concerned, we are reminded by hon. gentlemen opposite that we have a free British market. Now, at the very time that the Government are making a very vigorous effort I hope to get the embargo removed off our cattle, what consistency is there in their imposing duties on British trade with this country, and in hampering British trade ?

Mr. FOSTER. Will you show the House where there is any duty on tea ?

Mr. McMULLEN. Will the Minister deny that a very important deputation of English tea traders waited upon the High Commissioner to urge upon him that he should exercise his influence and cable to the Government of this country to prevent this duty ?

Mr. FOSTER. Do you mean to prevent the present proposition ?

Mr. McMULLEN. The deputation remonstrated with the High Commissioner against the proposition that the Government made with regard to the duty on tea.

Mr. FOSTER. Do you refer to this present proposition ?

Mr. McMULLEN. You are not going to corner me.

Mr. FOSTER. Nor is the hon. gentleman going to corner me either. This is not the proposition that the deputation waited on Sir Charles Tupper with reference to.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Sir Charles Tupper issued his orders and the Government obeyed them.

Mr. FOSTER. We can discuss that question at some other time.

Mr. McMULLEN. The hon. gentleman will admit that a deputation of influential British merchants did wait on Sir Charles Tupper.

Mr. FOSTER. In prehistoric times.

Mr. McMULLEN. And that they urged upon him certain changes in the direction of meeting British trade. If this duty were imposed for the purpose of collecting a revenue there could not be very much objection to it, but it is quite clear that it is for the sole purpose of cultivating a trade with China in the interest of some particular person or corporation. Who is it that is going to benefit by the people of Canada being put to this inconvenience by this new duty ? The consequence is that a market will have to be found at the place of production largely, and we are detracting from the British market. The same privileges are not accorded to English dealers as to foreign dealers by this tariff proposal. I believe that we should not have thrown even the slightest obstacle in the way of cultivating most kindly relations with England, especially at this very time, when we are trying to get the embargo removed from our cattle.

Mr. FRASER. Would the Minister, for example, consider that good tea in bond taken out and mixed with inferior tea could be imported into Canada because part of the mixture had been in bond ?

Mr. FOSTER. The whole thing would depend as to whether after the mixture was made, it passed for export. That is, was of such a kind that would be admitted into English consumption.

Mr. FRASER. Then any teas that would sell in England could be imported into this country duty free, whatever the mixture was ?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Bought in bond ?

Mr. FRASER. Any mixed tea that would sell in England could be imported here ?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. FRASER. How is the test to be made and to be known ? I would consider the test of the bond a clear test. You can take the tea out of bond and bring it here. But what mode will the Minister have of certifying that a mixture made in London should not be sold here ?

Mr. FOSTER. It refers to teas already blended or mixed in bond under the supervision of the customs officers.

Mr. FRASER. I understand then, that no teas can be imported free into this country unless they are mixed and blended before being taken out of bond?

Mr. FOSTER. Certainly, in bond.

Mr. FRASER. It is known in the trade that teas are taken out of bond in England and mixed together, not in bond at all, and sold subject to the tests made by the tea tasters in England. Would such mixtures be allowed to come into this country?

Mr. FOSTER. No. Would there be any possibility of such teas coming into this country? Would the English importer take tea out of bond, pay the duty, mix it, and then propose to sell it to the Canadian importer?

Mr. FRASER. Why not, as well as before?

Mr. FOSTER. I do not think he could compete with the Canadian importer.

Mr. FRASER. Suppose he mixed it with inferior teas?

Mr. FOSTER. It would not come in then.

Mr. FRASER. This is simply a method of stopping a trade in one place and putting it into another, and is just in keeping with the whole policy of the Government. It explains to me particularly what was done in Montreal the other day, when the tea merchants insisted that the tariff should remain as it was at first. They wanted Montreal to become a second London, so that they could control the whole trade in Canada. There seems to be something back of this indicating that some parties are going to benefit by this change. Is it nothing to destroy a whole trade with another country?

Mr. O'BRIEN. I would like to ask the Finance Minister what will become of his scheme if the Americans should put a duty on tea?

Mr. FOSTER. Tea from the United States would come under the general clause.

Mr. O'BRIEN. Then the whole object of our policy would be lost. I think it is a great pity that the hon. gentleman did not leave the item of tea as it was in the old tariff. Everybody understood that, and we were not dependent on what other countries might do. The duty as now arranged is satisfactory to the London merchants, as appears from a paragraph which I saw in the London 'Times' the other day stating that they had had an interview with Sir Charles Tupper in which they suggested the arrangement that now seems to have been carried out.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think the Minister of Finance would do well to tell us, what he has not told us hitherto, why he disturbs the former arrangement that we subsisted under for four or five years. He has not yet given us any specific reason, so far as I have observed, for that alteration.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I was thinking of asking the same question. I would like the hon. Minister to state whether it is from motives of revenue or otherwise that the change has been made. The old tariff was well understood. Last year we imported about 18,000,000 pounds of tea, of which about half a million pounds came from the United States; of coffee we imported about three and a half million pounds, of which about a quarter of a million came from the United States. The duty was not large, being about $8,000 on tea and $3,000 or $4,000 on coffee. If the object of the Minister in making this change is to secure more revenue, I would ask him how much he expects the revenue to be increased by it? Taking that into consideration, we shall no doubt be able to judge about what amount of diversion of trade may be expected, and whether it would be wise for the sake of that diversion of trade to make this change.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not calculate that there will be any increase of revenue. The whole tendency of the item, if it be passed, will be to stimulate direct importations. We do not make the change at all with the idea of getting an increased revenue.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the use of disturbing the well-understood arrangements of the trade for so very trifling a matter as now appears likely to result? If the hon. gentleman had succeeded in putting a stop to the trade from London, which amounts to about one-half of the total importation of tea, whether his movement is a good one or a bad one, it would have been at any rate an effective movement. But so far as I have been able to understand the hon. gentleman, and presuming that the hon. gentleman understands himself—which, bearing in mind the various turns and twists he has given to these resolutions, is a little open to doubt—so far as he has complied with the instructions of Sir Charles Tupper, the effect will be to influence the tea trade to the extent of only a few thousand pounds. Do I understand that he is not going to disturb the London trade at all? Is that his position?

Mr. FOSTER. Almost so.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Then why disturb the customs which prevail in the entire tea and coffee trade? I do not suppose that my hon. friend's correspondents have a chance of organizing a deputation of the Amsterdam trade to go and interview Sir Charles Tupper on this matter, but, practically, that would be their only chance of getting satisfaction. So far as I understand the case, it does appear to me that the hon. gentleman is making a considerable disturbance for no practical purpose whatever. We are not to get revenue; we are not to divert the English trade, which I grant would be a matter of considerable importance to the Canadian Pacific Railway or to other parties; but the hon. gentleman introduces changes which are subject to disturbing influences in the event of other countries taking off tea duties or lessening them, and the practical result, according to him, will be almost nil.

Item agreed to.

Paraffine wax, 2 cents per pound; paraffine wax candles, 4 cents per pound.

Mr. FOSTER. The former duty was 5 cents, and it is now reduced to 4 cents, which makes 20¼ per cent ad valorem.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. gentleman will find that the ad valorem duty is much higher on some grades.

Mr. FOSTER. I form my judgment from the returns of last year, which took in all grades. The total amount brought was 8,351 pounds, and the average duty would be 20¾ cents.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Although I am glad to see the duties reduced, still, as there are many grades brought in, the duty will be much higher on the lower grades. Can the Minister give the extreme, so to speak, of low grade paraffine candles?

Mr. FOSTER. From 12 to 28 cents.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. In the one case the specific duty would amount to one-third of the value of the article, which is close on to 35 per cent. You would have a variation from 14 to 35 per cent.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). More than that.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I dare say. It would be three times as heavy on the low grade as on the high grade, and the low grade is more likely to be used.

Item agreed to.

British gum, dextrine, sizing cream and enamel sizing, 10 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. FOSTER. British gum dressing, sizing cream and enamel sizing; 500,000 pounds imported, at the value of $20,000. The duty was 1 cent per pound, and the unit value was a little more than 4 cents, so that the ad valorem duty on that under the old tariff would be 25 per cent, and it has been reduced to 10 per cent.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). What manufacture is that used in?

Mr. FOSTER. In paper, and, I think, some textiles. It is a raw material.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Then, of course, you reduce the tax on the finished article?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, I think we have.

Item agreed to.

Lubricating oils, n.e.s., and axle grease, 25 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. FOSTER. The value imported was $10,000.

Mr. WALLACE. There are many different values in axle grease, and only the highest priced was brought in under that duty. The average was about 4 cents a pound.

Item agreed to.

Barrels, containing petroleum or its produce or any mixture of which petroleum forms a part, when such contents are chargeable with a specific duty, 20 cents each.

Mr. MARTIN. I would like to ask if there is to be any change in the working of the regulations in connection with the importation of coal oil in tanks?

Mr. FOSTER. We have allowed oil itself to stand, and will discuss that question in discussing the duty on oil.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Would the hon. gentleman indicate in any way when they will probably come up? They will require some discussion.

Mr. FOSTER. Not later than Tuesday.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. We will arrange, then, that they should come up on Tuesday.

Mr. FOSTER. Very well.

Item agreed to.

Linseed or flaxseed oil, raw or boiled, lard oil, neatsfoot oil, and sesame seed oil, 20 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. FOSTER. Linseed and flaxseed oil were formerly 1¼ cents per pound; lard oil and neatsfoot oil were formerly 20 per cent. These are all joined in one item at 20 per cent.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). You have wiped out the duty on the barrels.

Mr. WALLACE. As the duty is charged on an ad valorem basis, the barrel is charged as part of the invoice price under the general package clause.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the ad valorem equivalent of the 1¼ cents per pound on linseed and flaxseed oil?

Mr. FOSTER. About 30 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Olive oil, prepared for salad purposes, 30 per cent ad valorem.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I do not suppose this is a matter of great importance; still, I do not see what objection the Government has to people eating salad.

Mr. FOSTER. There is no prohibition of eating salad in this country. But, if one has such bad taste as to mix oil with his salad it is but fair that he should pay for it. The hon. gentleman must take this item as part of the whole. Olive oil, for other than food purposes, that is for manufacturing purposes, is made free, and the only olive oil on which we now have a duty is that which comes in prepared as salad oil.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. You are adding to that duty.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). No doubt the Minister wants to have the oil prepared here.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not care ; this is for revenue.

Item agreed to.

Vaseline, and all similar preparations of petroleum, for toilet, medicinal or other purposes, 35 per cent ad valorem.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. How does that compare with the former duty ?

Mr. FOSTER. This is a reduction on vaseline. Formerly there was specific duty on vaseline, and similar preparations, 4 cents in bulk per pound, which would be equal to an ad valorem duty of 45¼ per cent, and on vaseline in bottles or other packages not over one pound in weight, 6 cents per pound. A very small importation, indeed, came in under that. Placing all vaseline at 35 per cent is a large reduction.

Mr. RIDER. Does the hon. gentleman mean to say that the same duty is to be charged on vaseline in bulk as on vaseline when put up in bottles ? This would not seem to be in accordance with the principle followed in the case of olive oil.

Mr. FOSTER. This is a duty of 35 per cent on bottles and all. The duty on the vaseline in bulk would be considerably less than on that put up in bottles. There is thus an advantage in favour of those who put it up in this country.

Item agreed to.

Blacking, shoe, and shoemakers' ink, and shoe, harness and leather dressing, and harness soap, 25 per cent ad valorem.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. This is a reduction of 5 per cent. I have no objection to the reduction. But, as we are under a paternal government could you not issue a ukase to reduce the price of blacking shoes ?

Mr. FOSTER. Don't be hard on the boot-blacks.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It would really be a benefit to the industry, for more people would have their shoes blacked.

Item agreed to.

Paints and colours, ground in spirits, and all spirits, varnishes, and lacquers, $1 per gallon.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What revenue does that particular item yield ?

Mr. FOSTER. Very little—almost nothing. It was put in, and has been kept there for the purpose of preventing possible frauds by the mixing of a little colour with the spirits, bringing them in and afterwards dissolving the compound, and selling the spirits.

Mr. FOSTER.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Does not the hon. gentleman think it would be punishment enough for one to drink in his liquor what had been mixed with paint ?

Mr. FOSTER. No ; it is perfectly potable.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Have you tried it ?

Mr. FOSTER. No.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Well, unless some of the hon. gentleman's colleagues can back him in that statement I think we ought to have the evidence from more competent authority.

Mr. FOSTER. The Minister of Trade and Commerce will vouch for that.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I doubt if he is any better authority.

Item agreed to.

Varnishes, lacquers, japans, japan-driers, liquid-driers, and oil finish, n.e.s., 20 cents per gallon and 20 per cent ad valorem.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. This is a mixed duty. I take it for granted that in this case, as in others, there is a considerable difference in the values of these articles. But about what ad valorem duty does this represent ? What is the average value ?

Mr. WALLACE. The average is about $1.79.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the range of value ?

Mr. WALLACE. From $1.40 to $2.25.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Speaking roughly, then, this duty is about 35 per cent ?

Mr. WALLACE. The duty under the former tariff was 36 per cent on the average.

Mr. FOSTER. This will be lower ?

Mr. WALLACE. Yes—a reduction of about 5 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Paris green, dry, 10 per cent ad valorem.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Unless there is some rather strong reason against it, I think that, in the interest of the farmer, this article ought to be allowed to be imported free. It is a matter of very considerable importance to the farmers in many localities to be allowed to use Paris green for the destruction of insects, and more particularly of the potato bug, which has been a serious nuisance, as the hon. gentleman, no doubt, knows, over a large part of Canada.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Since the present Government came in.

Mr. FOSTER. No ; we have been exterminating the pest since we came in.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. If that has been the object, I can answer, from my own experience, that the hon. gentleman's success has been very small. Unless there is some good reason to be given, it is scarcely fair to tax an article which is so largely used for the preservation of the farmers' crops—and increasingly largely used, I am told. It is scarcely fair to tax that without some serious reason for it. What is the amount of revenue derived from that tax?

Mr. WALLACE. Three thousand six hundred dollars. It is nearly all made in this country.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) In the Maritime Provinces it is nearly all imported.

Mr. WALLACE. Not at all. There is not 10 or 20 per cent of it imported.

Item agreed to.

Putty, 15 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. DENISON. I do not know as this is the proper item upon which to make the remark that I wish to make. But I wish to say that dry putty, when used in polishing granite, comes in free, but dry putty when used in polishing glass, from some mistake, I suppose, has been paying a duty of 20 per cent. If putty is free for polishing granite, surely it might be free for polishing glass.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend will see that the substance used for polishing granite is made free this year that formerly was dutiable, which—but when we come to that item on the free list, we will take into consideration what my hon. friend said.

Mr. STAIRS. I want to draw the attention of the Minister of Finance to the rate of duty imposed on putty. I understand 15 per cent gives no protection whatever to the manufacturers of this country. The duty on the linseed oil, even at the reduced rate, on the amount that is required to make a hundred weight of putty, is just about the same as a 15 per cent duty on the putty itself. If it is proposed to continue the policy of protection, I do not think we should put the manufacturers of putty at a positive disadvantage.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. But the hon. gentleman forgets that we make linseed oil here, and we have been told repeatedly, though I am not sure by the hon. gentleman, that where we manufacture for ourselves, the duty imposed does not add at all to the cost to the consumer; so it is clear that on this principle he would have no grievance.

Item agreed to.

Earthenware and stoneware, 2 cents per gallon of holding capacity.

Mr. FOSTER. I want to add to that "brick for building, and paving brick." This will include brick used for paving streets, a sort of vitrified brick.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Is there any real utility in this tax at all? What is the importation of brick for building and paving purposes supposed to amount to, and how much are we likely to import, so far as the Minister can guess, by the introduction of this duty?

Mr. FOSTER. This is a sort of amplification for the sake of clearness. Paving brick came in the same as brick for building, at 20 per cent. The quantity imported amounted to $14,000 worth.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Does the hon. gentleman expect that paving brick will be manufactured in this country, by the imposition of this tariff?

Mr. WALLACE. It is being made in several places now. It is vitrified brick, very hard, and is pronounced a great success. The manufacture has been started in two places, by Taylor Bros., of Toronto, and one firm are making it very largely at Mimico.

Item agreed to.

Drain tiles, not glazed, 30 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. McMILLAN. I think drain tiles ought to be placed upon the free list. All along the frontier in Ontario the land requires draining very much. There is nothing in the province of Ontario to-day that the land wants more than draining, and tiles are the principal item in draining. There are only $110 worth of tiles imported into this country, paying $20 of duty. Therefore, the duty can be no object with the Government, and as these tiles are a necessity in the province of Ontario, I hope the Minister of Finance will put this item on the free list.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. There is no doubt that my hon. friend is perfectly right. Every man who owns land in Ontario, or, I suppose, anywhere in the Dominion, knows that it is of great importance in an enormous number of localities to encourage tile draining as much as we possibly can. I think this is one more of those cases in which in the interest of the farmer—and we have been told this is a farmer's tariff—this class of articles should be made free. They confer a benefit of a high degree, and I am told that in some cases they have doubled and trebled, and even quadrupled, the average producing quality of the land. I think my hon. friend's request is founded on good sense, and is especially applicable to the state of facts in a great number of districts along the frontier of Ontario. As a rule, the cost of conveying these tiles any distance is so great that it forms of itself quite a sufficient protection to any local manufactures that may exist.

Mr. FOSTER. I agree with what my hon. friend has said as to the utility of these articles. I suppose it is true, however, on the other hand, that these unglazed drain tiles, being made all over the country in almost every brick yard, are not enhanced in cost by the duty which is put upon them. They are made locally and distributed locally, and the breakage attending their importation from a foreign country would largely tend against their importation.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Take the case of a man living near the Detroit or St. Clair River; if there is no tile manufactory established within fifteen or twenty miles of him, it would be a great convenience to have tiles brought by water to his own immediate locality. They are a heavy article.

Mr. McMILLAN. Where I live, although some description of tiles is made within four or five miles of our residence, we find it better to go twenty-five or thirty miles for them in order to get a better quality of the article. Therefore, considering the very small amount of revenue that is derived from this duty, and the great importance of drainage in many parts of the country, I think this duty should be struck off altogether.

Mr. FOSTER. We will consider the matter.

Item agreed to.

Glass carboys and demijohns, empty or filled, bottles and decanters, flasks and phials, glass jars and glass balls, and cut, pressed or moulded glass tableware, 30 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. FRASER. What is the result of the change generally, taking the items altogether?

Mr. FOSTER. It is equivalent all round to about 8 per cent.

Item agreed to.

Insulators of all kinds, and lamps, including arc and incandescent; lamp-chimneys, side-lights and head-lights, lamps, gas-light and electric-light shades, and globes—for lanterns, lamps, electric lights and gas lights, 30 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. MULOCK. Will the hon. gentleman explain what changes are to be made with regard to insulators?

Mr. FOSTER. A number of items were grouped together, and a uniform duty of 30 per cent has been imposed.

Mr. MULOCK. Does the hon. gentleman not think that 30 per cent is a heavy duty on lamps and lamp chimneys? These are not luxuries.

Mr. FOSTER. Some are luxuries, and some are not.

Mr. MULOCK. What factories are making lamp chimneys in this country?

Mr. FOSTER. Thirty per cent is not a high duty on glass.

Mr. MULOCK. It is a good deal for a poor man to pay when he does not receive an article worth the money. How many factories in Canada are making lamp chimneys?

Mr. WALLACE. There are two or three in Hamilton, several in Montreal, and one at Port Colborne, but I think the Port Colborne one has been burnt down.

Mr. FOSTER.

Mr. MULOCK. I presume it is reasonable to assume that all those have an understanding that, helped by this tariff, every man shall pay 30 per cent more for his lamp and lamp chimneys than he otherwise would have to pay. The Minister says lamps and lamp chimneys are luxuries?

Mr. FOSTER. No. I said some are and some are not.

Mr. MULOCK. You are now taxing all lamps and lamp chimneys. Some of those taxed are certainly necessary. They are necessary for the lighting of poor men's houses. I appeal to the Minister of Finance on behalf of this class of the people, whether it is reasonable to maintain a duty of 30 per cent on lamp and lamp chimneys, used in every household in the land? It means that for every dollar the poor man expends for a lamp chimney, he only receives 70 cents in value, in other words that he has to pay $1.30 for every dollar's worth of property. I appeal to the Minister to reconsider this item. The Government are taxing the oil, and giving it high protection, and they are now proposing to impose a heavy duty on lamps and lamp chimneys. This system will affect all households unless they are to remain in darkness. The hon. Minister says there are lamps and lamps, that some lamps are luxuries and some are necessities. Surely he could form a scheme by which to separate the luxuries from the necessities.

Mr. FOSTER. It would be pretty difficult in this case.

Mr. MULOCK. Then I ask the hon. Minister to reduce the duty.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not think we can do that. We get a large revenue from these articles.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. How much?

Mr. FOSTER. These items are scattered throughout the tariff. From two or three items which I now see, we obtained last year about $7,000. It is true that we propose a duty of 30 per cent, but as it is an ad valorem duty, the cheaper article will have less duty to pay. I do not think, for the sake of simplicity we can undertake to make a distinction, and in fact it would be impossible to distinguish between lamps that are luxuries and lamps that are necessities.

Mr. MULOCK. There is another way of dealing with this matter, and that is to lower the duty. The total value of entries at the customs-house for lamps and similar articles last year was $63,000, and the Minister says about $8,000 was collected on lamps and lamp chimneys.

Mr. FOSTER. I did not say. I said they were distributed under different items.

Mr. MULOCK. According to the Trade and Navigation Returns, $63,000 in duties were collected on lamps, lamp chimneys, gas lamps and a miscellaneous lot of things. We cannot tell from this return what amount of lamp chimneys were imported.

Mr. WALLACE. There are scarcely any lamp chimneys imported.

Mr. MULOCK. Then the manufacturers in Canada supply the people of Canada, and in view of our experience it is reasonable to assume that the manufacturers have charged pretty nearly the 30 per cent duty extra. This 30 per cent is the initial increase on the cost of the article, and when it passes through the hands of the wholesale and retail merchant there will probably be nearly 50 per cent added to the price to the consumer. There are probably a million households in Canada, and it is reasonable to assume that of that million, 800,000 households have to pay tribute under this one item. If the Minister was only thinking of the revenue in this matter he could tell us in a moment what would be the effect on revenue if there were no duty on lamp chimneys. We are told by the Controller of Customs that practically no lamp chimneys are imported. Therefore, it is not a matter of revenue, and if it is not a matter of revenue it must be a duty put on for the benefit of these two or three factories, which enables them to have a corner on lamp chimneys, and to take 30 per cent or thereabouts out of the pockets of every consumer. I ask the Minister, is he prepared to reconsider this item in that light, or does he at once say that he has no regard for the masses of the people?

Mr. FOSTER. I do not take the issue at that.

Mr. FRASER. The Controller of Customs says that there were very few lamp chimneys imported last year. We can then see how our glass factory stands in New Glasgow, for we have been closed up for five years, because the men in Montreal came down, bought out our manufactured goods and moulds, and paid us 8 per cent on our capital, without our doing any work.

Mr. FOSTER. Are you a stockholder there?

Mr. FRASER. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. How much do you get now?

Mr. FRASER. Eight per cent on my money; but that does not influence me, for I say that a policy which permits that is an iniquitous system. Hon. gentlemen opposite might take another view of it because they were making money, but I do not. The system is wrong.

Mr. SPROULE. You ought to be punished under the combines law.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. This is a very important matter and it is worth while to consider for a few moments. We have understood from the Government that if there was one thing which they were determined to put down it was these villainous combines, and here is a case in point. I understood from the Finance Minister that whenever a case of a combine was established, whenever it was clear that factories were closed, and the workmen put out of employment, as my hon. friend (Mr. Fraser) states in his place was the case, that the Government were prepared to give relief to the people by reducing the duty. Here is an opportunity for implementing their promise. In face of the declaration of my hon. friend (Mr. Fraser), are they prepared to reduce the duty so that in future this combination, which he has shown to exist, and which closes factories, and pays a dividend to the capitalists concerned, but leaves the workmen out in the cold, are the Government now prepared to implement their previous promises by reducing the duty?

Mr. FOSTER. I have reduced the duty.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. No, no. There is a reduction of 5 per cent in one case, but that does not account for the other cases, and taking these items generally there is a very considerable increase all round. Here is distinct evidence of the operation of a combine, contrary to the interests of the country, I venture to say, which shuts up factories, which deprives men of work, and which pays certain wealthy proprietors 8 per cent.

Mr. FOSTER. Like my hon. friend (Mr. Fraser) over there.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I fancy that the political engagements of my hon. friend (Mr. Fraser) takes his 8 per cent, and a good deal more, too, so that he does not count; but the other fellows retain their 8 per cent, and unless in the shape of subscriptions to hon. gentlemen opposite I do not think they are taxed at all. However that may be, this is a case in point, and I want to know: Will the Minister, having this distinct and clear evidence, which he does not refute, implement his former promises and reduce the duty in this case? What is he going to do?

Mr. FOSTER. I think we will have to have some legislation introduced which will enable us to deal with combinesters like my hon. friend opposite, who agrees to shut up his factory, take 8 per cent, and let the poor labourers go.

Mr. FRASER. I am a shareholder in that company, and if I get the opportunity I am ready to take out of it any money I put in that business. It was the work of the directors, and I got my 8 per cent, and accepted it. But I come here and I say distinctly that it is an iniquitous thing that I should get 8 per cent—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Mr. FRASER. It is an iniquitous thing that I should get 8 per cent on money when there is no work done. It is iniquitous when that 8 per cent is put on the price of the article made in Montreal over and above its regular value. The men that manufacture the article in Montreal sell it to the people in this country, and we import none. They first put the price of the raw material, then the wages of the men, then their profits, and added to that is the 8 per cent paid to the New Glasgow Company, and the people of this country have to pay it. Is that fair? Is the policy right which encourages that? Is my argument going to be met by hon. gentlemen opposite by saying I am a shareholder, and I accepted that? Is that an answer to my statement? I know hon. gentlemen opposite are surprised at what I say, because I do not suppose that any of them would feel as I do on the question under the circumstances.

Mr. GILLMOR. You will vote to reduce the tariff on these goods?

Mr. FRASER. Yes; I will vote to reduce the tariff right down.

Mr. WALLACE. Are there not any other glass works in New Glasgow?

Mr. FRASER. There are two small concerns where they make a few bottles. There are the Lamont Brothers, and Humphrey & Company, who were in the glass factory and who being put out of employment now make a few bottles. The New Glasgow factory has been closed for five years, and consequently it has depreciated in value. I am not blaming the Government for that, only in so far as they have a tariff policy that permits it. I say that a tariff that enables the Montreal men to do that is not a good tariff, and I am going to raise my voice against it. The 8 per cent on the money that is invested is not so much after all, when you consider that the factory has been closed for five years and has depreciated, so that the original value is about gone. This policy has enabled the Montreal men to put a tax on the people of this country to pay that 8 per cent for five years, and to so reduce the original stock, or rather what answers to the stock there, as to make it almost not worth 40 or 50 per cent at the outside. So that, although I have got my 8 per cent, I have been losing all the time, because my original capital has shrunk.

Mr. FLINT. I think the request made by the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock), that lamp chimneys should be placed upon the same foot as common and colourless window glass, at 20 per cent, is a reasonable request. Lamp chimneys are one of the largest articles of consumption by the people. The fact that no lamp chimneys, comparatively speaking, are imported into Canada, it seems to me gives an additional weight to the request. It shows conclusively that on an article most extensively manufactured in the United States and Great Britain the tariff is sufficiently high to prevent importations; and the additional facts cited by the hon. member for Guysboro' (Mr. Fraser), in regard to the combination which exists in this country, and which must inevitably take much more out of the consuming portion of the people than it has a right to take, are a further reason why ordinary lamp chimneys should be placed on the same footing as common and colourless window glasses.

Mr. MULOCK. The hon. Minister will also observe that the freight and insurance on this class of goods amount to a very considerable protection, for, they being perishable, easily broken, and bulky, considerable loss must occur in transshipment. These circumstances alone make it very difficult for an outsider to lay down goods advantageously in Canada. When you add to these things the duty, you see what an enormous protection you are giving to this combination, and how enormously you are increasing the cost of lamp chimneys to the consuming public. I have made a calculation which I will give to the Minister for his information. Owing to the duty of 30 per cent, the wholesaler in purchasing lamp chimneys from the manufacturer must add 30 per cent to the cost. In selling to the retailer he adds a profit of say 20 per cent, that is 6 cents on 30 cents. Therefore, the protection enhances the cost to the retailer by 36 per cent; the retailer puts his profit, say at the same rate of 20 per cent, upon the article, which means an addition of 7 cents. In other words, the original protection has grown to 43 per cent which the consumer has to pay in the shape of extra price for his lamp glass. Is that reasonable, humane or proper? In my opinion, it is an outrage on the masses of the people. The Minister and his colleagues may turn a deaf ear, but they will have to account for this later on. It is an absolutely indefensible transaction. Their system has destroyed industries, it has destroyed values, it has turned men out of employment, it has wasted property. The tariff has been abused, and, with this abuse staring the Minister in the face, he does not even give consideration to it.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—

With every feature of a knave complete,
If it be honest, 'tis a devilish cheat.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I suppose this is a part of the policy of development. The hon. gentleman is not proposing this for revenue, because that is a subordinate object of the Government in this tariff; the taxes are imposed for the purposes of development, and, according to the statement of the hon. member for Guysboro' (Mr. Fraser), they have developed in one of the expected ways the manufacture of glass in his constituency, as well as in other portions of the Dominion. Of course, this goes to show many of the advantages that are to be derived from the policy of the Government. But I remember a measure which the hon. Controller of Customs pressed upon the attention of the House a few years ago. It went to a committee, where it was carefully considered, and it attached the character of a crime to combinations of this sort. The measure then went to the Senate, where it underwent modifications, and the teeth which the hon. gentleman had inserted in it were withdrawn, so that when it came back to this House it wore a less formidable aspect than it did when it left here. The hon. gentleman, however, accepted the measure, which, according to the views of the hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon), was passed during a panic in the House, when the hon. gentlemen opposite were afraid to assert what their convictions were, and voted in accordance with what they thought were their interests. Now, the hon. Minister of Finance, by his policy of development, has defeated the object the hon. Controller of Customs then had in view. The Controller of Customs is of opinion, in spite of his devotion to protection, that combines are not very good things, that they did serious mischief, that they enhanced prices unduly; and now the hon. gentleman has a practical illustration of a combine. He finds a large number of manufacturing institutions closed, the labourers in them thrown out of employment, and the property degenerating in value. In this matter he is supporting the policy which continues this state of things. Of course, the country will in time come to understand what the Finance Minister meant by his policy of development. As long as the subject was described as protection, there was confusion in the public mind between the question of revenue and the question of development. But now, since the hon. gentleman has gone into a careful analysis of the difference this session, and has pointed out that the collection of revenue was, in all these matters, a subordinate consideration, and that the really important point was development, and now that we see in what direction the development has taken place by high taxes, the public will understand the policy of the Administration better than they ever understood it before. In fact, I see an hon. gentleman over there giving his attention to this, and I am perfectly sure he understands the matter now better than he ever understood it before. When he advocated these high taxes, he did not intend to close up a glass factory in Guysboro' and another portion of the constituency, and to concentrate the production of these particular articles at a certain point and at that point only. When the hon. gentleman voted for high taxes, he did not intend to put an end to a cordage factory in Quebec and another in Whitby, but intended to stimulate institutions of that kind all over the country. But the Minister shows now, how this policy of development is just as likely to work in the one direction as in the other. It may stimulate the direction of capital towards investment in enterprises that would, under ordinary circumstances, be unprofitable. To give, by high taxes, a profit to the new institutions called into existence, is one phase of the question only, which hon. gentlemen on the other side have seen; but now when we see that the effect is to close up a large number of institutions and to pay dividends to the proprietors of capital invested in others which are lying idle, and throw a large number of employees out of employment, depriving them of their wages, we are confronted with another phase of the policy of development. That is the phase to which the attention of the House and the country has been called, and which it is most important to carefully consider, and it is one, I have no doubt, whether the House will consider it or not, that the country will carefully consider between this time and the next election, whenever that may be.

Mr. McKAY. I hope the hon. Minister of Finance and the Controller of Customs will not change their policy with reference to this item of duty. There has been a good deal of misplaced sympathy with the poor people who buy these articles. Everybody must admit that the manufacture of that article in this country has resulted in cheapening the prices very much indeed. The average duty paid by a householder in this country would be so small that nobody would feel it in the very slightest degree. A great deal has been said by hon. gentlemen opposite about the combine in this industry. I do not know that there is such a thing as a combine, but I know that all the glass manufacturers are the political friends of these hon. gentlemen, and if they make a combine, it is made by the supporters of hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). How are our political friends enabled to do this great mischief? Will the hon. gentleman explain?

Mr. SPROULE. This discussion brings up one very important phase of this question, which should not be overlooked. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) has drawn our attention to an Act passed a few years ago, which I hold in my hands. It reads as follows:—

Every person who conspires, combines, agrees or arranges with any other person, or with any railway, steamship, steamboat or transportation company, unlawfully—

To unduly limit the facilities for transporting, producing, manufacturing, supplying, storing or dealing in any article or commodity which may be a subject of trade or commerce; or—

To restrain or injure trade or commerce in relation to any such article or commodity; or—

To unduly prevent, limit or lessen the manufacture or production of any such article or commodity, or to unreasonably enhance the price thereof; or—

Is guilty of a misdemeanour and liable on conviction, to a penalty not exceeding four thousand dollars and not less than two hundred dollars, or to imprisonment for any term not exceeding two years.

It would be the duty of some member of this House to draw the attention of the Attorney General for Nova Scotia to the hon. member for Guysboro' (Mr. Fraser), who admits that he is connected with a combine, that he has shared in the profits, and has accepted them without remonstrance. And I presume that this admission, were it not that the privileges of this House protect him, would make him liable to conviction under this Act. And notwithstanding the privileges of this Parliament, I do not know that he is liable under this Act.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. He could plead that the Finance Minister and his colleagues were accomplices before the fact, and ought to be punished at least to as high a degree.

Mr. McMULLEN. The hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. McKay), said that this particular industry did not extract from the consumer any very considerable amount in the way of increased prices. But when we come to consider the amount extracted from the consumers of lamp glass, rice, starch and all those different articles, if the collector of taxes went to their doors every now and then and demanded the taxation in these different commodities, they would find that they amounted to a considerable sum at the end of the year. We have in this Dominion nearly five million of a population, or about a million householders, estimating five to a household. Allowing to each householder, as his consumption of lamp glass, one dollar's worth in the year—and any one will admit that that is not an extravagant estimate of the amount expended by a farmer in his stables and otherwise—we find that on an average the tax would amount to $300,000 a year, or 30 per cent. Where does that go? Not a brass farthing goes into the Treasury, because the Controller of Customs says that there is almost no duty collected on lamp glass. Where then does it go? It goes into the pockets of the men who manufacture lamp glass. That is their protection, and that explains why they were able to close the New Glasgow factory and pay dividends to its proprietor. The Government should show some consideration for the poorer classes, and more particularly the farming class who use lamp glasses so largely. These people have no electric light, no gas light as in the city; they must use coal oil and they must use lamp glasses. They are taxed heavily on the coal oil to encourage the production of that commodity in this country, and then you tax them heavily upon their lamp glasses. When you admit glass at a duty of 20 per cent, you ought to reduce the duty on lamp glasses. A reduction of 10 per cent might be made in this duty on lamp glasses and still ample protection be given to the manufacturer.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). There would still be $150,000 of tribute.

Mr. McMULLEN. I believe there would be even more than that, and, at 30 per cent, the tribute amounts to $300,000. As my hon. friend from North York (Mr. Mulock) has pointed out, the heavy freight upon lamp glasses, owing to their bulk and the breakages, are in themselves a large protection to the Canadian manufacturer. With a tariff duty of 30 per cent, the whole protection amounts to 40 per cent, or even more. Those engaged in the lamp glass business in this country are reaping a rich harvest. They have the benefit of duties amounting to $300,000, of which the Controller admits very little goes into the Dominion treasury. And yet this combine is to be continued in its present state and they are to go on reaping the harvest which they are now reaping at the expense of the people.

Mr. WELDON. I wish the Finance Minister would take into consideration the suggestion that lamps and lamp chimneys should be transferred from this item to the next—that is, that they should be reduced from 30 per cent to 20 per cent. I think it is safe to say that out of every thousand lamps that are used, nine hundred are used by the poorer classes—lamps costing something less than a dollar. If the fact be, as I gather from the discussion, that those who enjoy this high protection have taken an undue advantage of it and formed a combine, I think it is fair and right for us who are moderate protectionists to take advantage of our control of the tariff to tell these gentlemen that they must not destroy internal competition. Therefore, I hope the Finance Minister will agree to put lamps and lamp chimneys in the lower list.

Mr. GIBSON. I would like to say a word in reply to the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. McKay). He did not state quite accurately the case regarding the owners of the glass factory in the city he represents. I happen to know, as a matter of fact, that the gentleman who organized the glass factory, and who probably was instrumental in getting this rate of duty put on the schedule, was a friend of the hon. gentleman from Hamilton himself. At one time he was a good Liberal, but 35 per cent protection on his manufactured goods made him a very strong supporter of the hon. gentleman. He was able in a very short time to retire from the business with $100,000 profit made by this factory. It may be quite correct, as the hon. member for Hamilton says, that the factory is now in the hands of the Grits, but the wrong-doing, if any, was through the instrumentality of a supporter of the hon. gentleman.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) referred to the statute and read a clause under which he thinks prosecution to prevent the continuance of the combine should take place. The hon. gentleman will see that the use of the words "unreasonably" and "unduly" in that statute render the statute itself nugatory, so that it is practically inoperative to-day. The hon. gentleman will see that it is to the Minister he ought to have appealed and not to the statute. He has the question now before him. He could not depend upon the courts to enforce a statute that is so exceedingly defective; but he can enforce the necessary regulation himself by voting for the reduction of the duties. That is a simpler way, a more efficient and less expensive way than the one which he suggests—that of an expensive prosecution which, after all, might not accomplish the object which he professes to have in view. The hon. gentleman from Hamilton spoke of certain parties who were Reformers previously, and who, my hon. friends here say, have since transferred their allegiance to that side of the House. And he has given the reason—the potency of this increase in the tariff. Why, Sir, the statement reminds me of the story of Hans Breitmann. The northern army—the Dutch brigade—were unable to defeat their enemies on the opposite side of the river. But when they learned that there was lager among the enemy, they fought with redoubled vigour, and were able to establish themselves on the other side of the river. The hon. gentleman knows precisely how to take a certain class of Reformers from this party to that through the instrumentality of the Finance Minister. But the Finance Minister will find that there are certain friends that are hurt as well as opponents that are helped and—if we are to regard the subject from that standpoint—the hon. gentleman will have as much to gain from the reduction of the tariff, as he is likely to gain from its increase.

Mr. McKAY. I would like to say a word in reply to the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Gibson), as he has not stated the facts altogether correctly. When I spoke of the owners of the glass works in Hamilton, it was in order to deal with the question of the combine which they had been accused of making. The hon. member for Lincoln referred to a gentleman connected with the business many years ago, who retired from the business completely, and left it in the hands of the gentlemen to whom I have referred. The gentleman to whom the hon. member for Lincoln refers was not a party to the combine, but the combine was made long after he went out, and by the friends of hon. gentlemen opposite. But I hold that the political complexion of the owners of these factories should not be considered. What we are looking after is to protect the men who are working in these factories from being brought into competition with the cheap glass—

Mr. MULOCK. The cheap labour of the United States.

Mr. McKAY. No; of Germany, Belgium, and other countries where the workers in the glass factories are paid one or two shillings a day. I am a protectionist, and that is what we want to protect our people against, and that is what I shall endeavour to do as long as I have a seat in this House.

Mr. GIBSON. I do not wish to misrepresent the hon. member for Hamilton in any way, but he referred to the gentlemen who now control the glass works as friends of the Liberal party. No doubt they are friends of the Liberal party—I do not say they are not. When the question of a factory is up for consideration, whether it gives employment to many or to few, hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House are ready to defend the action of the Government in maintaining a high rate of duty. But he forgets about the thousands of people that have to pay for these articles. Now, we were accused the other night by the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague) that we even had the audacity as Liberals to accompany farmers' delegates when they came to Ottawa to interview the Government regarding the wine duties. Well, I do not think it was a very heinous crime to commit, because we find that when a manufacturer comes down he does not require the assistance of the Liberals, he is simply shown all the courtesies of the House, and given a seat in the gallery, and every little attention that can be shown him is given him by the members of the Government. And they never ask the Liberals to accompany them when they want to have their duties maintained. Even though our friends in Hamilton are engaged in this business, as Liberals we are in favour of a reduction in all duties, and are trying to do more for the people of Canada and the citizens of Hamilton who have to buy taxed goods, when we ask the Minister of Finance to put all duties down as low as possible.

Mr. MULOCK. The senior member for Hamilton says that we maintain this tariff to protect Canadian labour. Can he explain to the House how this excludes competition? Are not foreign artisans free to come to Canada in competition with the Canadian artisan?

Mr. McKAY. Let them come to Canada.

Mr. MULOCK. Then where is the protection for the home artisan? If protection in Canada has such an effect on labour, if it enhances the value of labour in Canada, as the hon. gentleman says, how is it that in Germany, which is one of the highest protected countries in the world, the artisans receive only a shilling a day? Another question I would put to him. He spoke of this manufacturing interest being entitled to credit for a reduction in the cost of lamp chimneys—coming back to the question under consideration. Could he tell us how the price compares in Canada and the states to-day, or between Canada and any other country?

Mr. McKAY. I can only say that the price of lamp chimneys is very much cheaper to-day than it was some years ago before the factory was started. The cheapness of lamp chimneys to-day is due to the fact that they are manufactured in this country. I think the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) put his figures all together too high when he spoke about a dollar a year being expended in lamp chimneys by every family in this country. That would be putting the consumption of lamp chimneys at an enormous figure. I do not think the average consumption of lamp chimneys in any ordinary household, exceeds one dozen per year, and the price ranges from 30 cents to 60 cents per dozen. That is the price at which you can buy them in any store in this city. I think that at least 25 per cent of the people in cities and towns do not use lamp chimneys at all, they use gas or electric light.

Mr. FRASER. Do I understand the hon. gentleman to say that an ordinary family use only a dozen chimneys per year?

Mr. McKAY. I do not think they would use more than that.

Mr. FRASER. Then a farmer who has five or six rooms in his house, would only use two chimneys for each room in a year. All I can say is, I do not think the chimneys are washed at all in that case. The lamps must be left burning all the time, or people must have some method of lighting them without taking off the chimney. The experience of every person who keeps house is that lamp chimneys are broken almost every day. People in cities and towns, perhaps, do not use as many lamp chimneys, but we poor mortals who have to use them altogether, know that not only when the chimney is being cleaned, but even when it is burning, it frequently breaks to pieces, to the great satisfaction and joy of heart of the maker of lamp chimneys.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Is that the fault of the tariff?

Mr. FRASER. I do not blame the tariff for it, but I blame the makers of the tariff for not knowing how easily they do break.

Mr. FOSTER. That is the kind of lamp chimney you make down in your county.

Mr. FRASER. All I have to say is that the Montreal firm bought them at cash prices, and were very glad to get them.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. My hon. friend made them too well.

Mr. MULOCK.

Mr. FRASER. I have nothing to do with that matter. In answer to the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule), I want to say that being only a stockholder in that company, and everything being controlled by the directors, I do not think I can be prosecuted under that Act.

Mr. SPROULE. Did he oppose it when it was contemplated?

Mr. FRASER. I acquiesced in it. If an hon. gentleman happens to have stock in a company, and that company has protection, must his mouth be kept shut? A man would have to leave the world, almost, on that principle.

An hon. MEMBER. That argument has been frequently used from the Liberal side.

Mr. FOSTER. How much was that stock watered?

Mr. FRASER. It was not watered at all, but to get clear of it, I will give the hon. gentleman the benefit of the five years' lease and the 8 per cent upon it, and I will sell it to him at par. But that is no argument at all. The question before the committee depends upon its intrinsic qualities. It is ridiculous to say that twelve lamp chimneys per year would represent the use of an average family in Canada. Multiply the number of families in Canada by the number of chimneys, and you will find that they use four or five times that number. I would not object to 30 per cent duty on glass if it was necessary, and the Government got the revenue. I want to say distinctly that it is on that ground that I have anything to say against this tax. The poor should pay as well as the rich; the tariff should be so arranged that every man should pay in proportion to his wealth. In this case the 30 per cent goes into the pockets of the manufacturers, and not a dollar into the revenue. If the 30 per cent found its way into the revenue of this country, I would not object to it. I would not object to 50 per cent if the revenue of this country got the whole benefit of the duty and it was levied on universal principles. But I am opposed to any system that diverts the earnings of the people, by a channel made by the Government, into the pockets of one or two manufacturers. I include that 8 per cent, if it is wrong, 8 per cent is not too much for money.

Mr. FOSTER. Six per cent is a plenty.

Mr. FRASER. The hon. gentleman talks about 6 per cent, with his 30, and 40, and 50 per cent tariff. I care not what duty is paid upon goods if our revenue only gets the advantage of it. We must have revenue.

Mr. McNEILL. It is quite clear to my mind at least that where combines are proved to exist for the purpose of running up prices of goods, it is the duty of the Government to strike at such combines by making a reduction in the duty. We endeavoured some years ago to get at them in another way, but it did not seem to be very successful. As regards this particular item of glass, I am not sufficiently informed to be able to say whether the combine has unduly enhanced the price. I hope, however, the Government will thoroughly investigate the matter, and if they find it has done so and is doing so, I trust they will reduce the duty as has been proposed. But I wish to make this observation on the general question of glass in connection with the general question of protection, that if hon. gentlemen opposite had wished to select any special article which would more than another show the advantage of the protective system as compared with free trade, and the utter fallacy of the statement which hon. gentlemen opposite have made to the effect that protection always increased the price of goods, they could not have selected any better article than this item of glass. If hon. gentlemen will consider that in free trade England the glass industry has been crippled from the fact that under protective tariffs the price of glass has been so reduced in other countries that English manufacturers are not able to compete in their own market with foreign glass, which has come in for years past, they will see that all the arguments which have been advanced as to protection necessarily increasing the price of commodities are utterly fallacious and disproved by cold facts. Because every one who is acquainted with the circumstances knows that for many years past Germany and Belgium have been sending glass goods into England and successfully competing with English glass manufacturers in their own market. If the inevitable consequence of protection is to increase the price of commodities, and the inevitable consequence of free trade as compared with protection is to reduce the price, I should like hon. gentlemen opposite to show how under a protective tariff the price of glass has become lower than under free trade in England.

Mr. MULOCK. We cannot teach you that.

Mr. McNEILL. It has been so for years past; it was so twenty-one years ago, before I left the mother country. German and Belgian glass was offered for sale on the English market at lower rates than that produced in England. It is notorious that there is a large importation of foreign glass into the English market, and that English manufactured glass has been largely displaced in the home market by the competition of these products of production; and it is not so only in regard to glass, but we know perfectly well the same remark applies in regard to other products of protective countries. We are aware that the protected silks of France have driven out English silk manufactures, except silk thread. We know that the protected sugar has reduced the price of sugar in England to such an extent that the sugar refiner has been almost driven out.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It is not so, but the output has greatly increased.

Mr. McNEILL. The hon. gentleman may say so if he chooses.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I know it.

Mr. McNEILL. There is this fact, that if that be so, free trade England found it necessary to send a plenipotentiary to a conference of Europe to endeavour to induce the people of these countries, which were protecting their sugar to that extent, to reduce their protection and to withdraw their bounties. We know very well that the English Government did their utmost to induce foreign countries to do away with the bounty system altogether, and so far went back on the system of free trade as to say that this idea of buying goods in the cheapest market being always the best thing possible for the people of the country who consume the goods was fallacious.

Mr. GILLMOR. Hear, hear.

Mr. McNEILL. They did so. They said that the sugar industry was being destroyed in England, and because of that they had a convention called and sent a plenipotentiary there.

Mr. MULOCK. The cheap sugar of France developed a greater industry in England.

Mr. McNEILL. I am not speaking at this moment of what other results may have followed.

Mr. MULOCK. Sugar became the raw material of other industries.

Mr. McNEILL. Hon. gentlemen opposite may go off to another subject if they please. If they will look at the speech delivered by the gentleman who represented England at that convention on the continent, delivered on his return to Greenock, they will find he said this: that if the same course was pursued by foreign countries with reference to other industries, England would find one industry after another closed, and the manufacturing industry of the country would be altogether destroyed. That was the statement made by the member of the House of Commons who represented England at the conference which was called together for the express purpose of endeavouring to induce foreign countries to abolish the bounties.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Does the hon. gentleman mean to say that the English Government has shown the smallest disposition to tax sugar whether it had bounties paid on it or not, because if he does, I should like him to show us in the English tariff one line indicating the slightest disposition on the part of the English Government to do so. It is quite true, I believe, that certain sugar industries in England did suffer from the bounties paid; but it was equally true, and it was shown over and over again, that the result of the matter was to give employment to ten or twelve persons for every one thrown out of employment by the closing up of the sugar industry. The action of Germany and France in taxing their subjects very heavily for the purpose of encouraging an export trade in sugar was well taken advantage of by English manufacturers, and a very large and important trade in sugar-made goods was established, giving much more employment than the sugar manufacturing industry. By that change the English people benefited very largely indeed. The hon. gentleman's argument as to the question in hand, glass, means this: that those countries to which he has referred having great natural advantages for the production of glass are able to manufacture it more cheaply than England or Canada, it will be greatly to our advantage to exchange for glass made in those countries articles which we can manufacture cheaper than they, and thereby make a profit in the exchange. There is not much to be said in regard to the glass industry. I have no objection to this industry being continued in this country on reasonable terms, on the same terms as other industries of a similar kind, but I have very great objection to large sums being annually taken from the pockets of the people of Canada to support an industry which only gives employment to 200 or 300 hands. I say that the tax on people is vastly in excess of any benefit derived from the employment of those workmen. This is another illustration of the fact so often brought up in the course of these discussions, and which I hope will be brought thoroughly to the attention of the people of Canada: that there are enumerable cases in which hundreds of thousands of dollars of taxes are taken out of the people, without a one-hundredth part of them going into the treasury of this country. When I stated, as I have repeatedly stated and as I state here again: that the actual taxes under this protective tariff levied upon the people are to be measured by $60,000,000 or $70,000,000 a year, of which about $20,000,000 goes to the public treasury; it is to such things as this I refer. Just such iniquitous exactions as this crop up whenever you come to search into any item of this tariff. Here is one illustration of an article which brings a revenue of perhaps $10,000 a year, and for which the people are taxed $300,000. We had another illustration in the case of rice, another in the case of wall-paper, and so it goes on all through, until probably out of all these items that are put before us, you will not find one out of five or six hundred items on which a tariff is imposed, and a protective element introduced, for $1 that goes into the treasury, two, three, four, five, or it may be one hundred dollars are not taken out of the people of Canada.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). This is a tariff of development.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Yes, and the inwardness of it is developing very fast. I know something about the success that has attended glass manufactures in Canada. I was requested myself some years ago to take an interest in a glass factory in the town of Napanee. A very worthy man was induced by the false representations held out by the Government of that day and the Finance Minister of that day, to put all his capital I believe into that undertaking. He unfortunately put close on $100,000 in that business, and a couple of years ago the whole plant and the whole establishment on which this $100,000 had been spent, was sold for between two and three thousand dollars. This is another instance of the way in which this policy of development, this policy of promoting native industries, has worked in practice, when men were found fools enough to believe the absurd promises held out by hon. gentlemen opposite and their friends.

Mr. McNEILL. I just wish to say, that I said nothing in the world about England imposing a duty upon sugar, and my hon. friend (Sir Richard Cartwright) knows that. I made a specific statement to the effect that the statements and arguments of hon. gentlemen opposite, that protection always enhanced the value of goods, were proved to be fallacious by the facts; the facts being that protection in Germany on glass, in France on silk, and in France and Germany and other countries on sugar, had reduced the price of all these goods, and that England had competition.

Item agreed to.

Committee rose, and it being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

ST. CLAIR AND ERIE SHIP CANAL.

Mr. SPROULE (for Mr. Tisdale) moved that the House resolve itself into committee on Bill (No. 21) to incorporate the St. Clair and Erie Ship Canal Company.

Mr. MULOCK. There are one or two points in this Bill that I wish to invite the attention of the House to. I am sorry that the promoter of the Bill is not present, for I would be glad if he could agree with the suggestions I am about to make.

Mr. FOSTER. Why not wait until the promoter of the Bill is here?

Mr. MULOCK. I will mention the few points that I have to refer to. I do not wish any hon. gentleman to think that I am opposed to the Bill; on the contrary, it is an enterprise that I should like to see succeed. I wish to suggest a couple of clauses to guard the rights of individuals, but I do not think they are sufficiently serious to cause of delay in the passage of the Bill if it is desired to put it through now. Clause 42 of the Bill says :

If any action or suit is brought or commenced against any person or the company for anything done in pursuance of this Act, or in the execution of the powers and authorities, or of the orders and directions hereinbefore given or granted, such action or suit shall be brought or commenced within twelve calendar months next after the act committed, or in case there is a continuation of damage, then within twelve calendar months next after the doing or committing such damage shall cease, and not otherwise.

I would draw the attention of the House to the difference between that proposition and the existing laws regarding railways and similar corporations. I understand the law to be this : that a cause of action arising by reason of the construction of a work need not be brought within twelve months, but an action can be brought within the ordinary time allowed as in other cases. But in regard to causes of action arising out of the operation of railways the Limitations Act does apply. In that case, and for a very proper reason, suitors are obliged to bring their actions within a shorter period. For example, suppose a passenger on a railway claims to have sustained some damage which entitles him in his judgment to bring action against a railway, it is of importance to the railway that it shall have timely notice of the cause of action, so that it may make inquiry into it in due time, and thus prevent frauds. Under the same principle if a person claims to sustain damage by reason of loss of goods shipped by a railway, the law with reference to the limitation of actions applies, and the action must be begun in one year. So that there is quite a distinction between limiting the cause of action in reference to something arising out of the construction of the work and something arising out of its operation. That was the position of the law with regard to railways ; and what I propose is that section 42 should be amended so that it will apply to causes of action arising out of the operation of the railway. The other clause which I wish to see amended is clause 11, or clause 11a, the amended clause which provides for a scheme of compensation to landowners for damages occasioned in connection with expropriation for the construction of the canal ; but, inasmuch as it is probable that causes of action will arise later in connection with the maintenance of the canal, the clause also provides for compensation after the canal is constructed—if it happens that some person owning land on the site of the canal is damaged by its operation—as, for example, a farmer who wishes to drain his lands, and who is unable to drain them by reason of the canal interrupting the natural drainage. That is a cause of action that he does not discover until the canal is constructed ; yet it is quite as serious a cause of action as one that happens in connection with the construction of the canal ; but the remedy offered in that case is very different, and I think a very objectionable one. Under the scheme proposed, the farmer is obliged to appear before the Railway Committee of the Privy Council, or to have his case brought there and inquired into and reported upon. I know it is said that there are no costs awarded in such cases ; but that does not meet the case. If a farmer wants to drain his land, he has first of all to get some lawyer to tell him what the law is, and to tell him whether his remedy has to be secured at Ottawa or elsewhere. Having learned that it is at Ottawa, what has he to do ? He does not know what this dignified tribunal, the Railway Committee of the Privy Council is, and he has to consult a lawyer on that point. Then, he has to have his case taken before the Railway Committee in some way. He may have to send lawyers and witnesses to Ottawa in order to move the Council ; and, with this formidable prospect before him, perhaps in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred he will either forego his right altogether or settle his claim at a rate wholly insufficient to compensate him. The objection I take to this clause is equally applicable to the Railway Act. I think it is neither practical nor just that the humblest citizen in the Dominion of Canada should be compelled to come to Ottawa and have his case disposed of there, though he may live two or three thousand miles away from Ottawa ; and yet that is the law under the Railway Act, and it has been imported into this canal project. I suggest that the tribunal, instead of being the Railway Committee of the Privy Council, should be a neutral local authority, say an engineer appointed by the county court judge. I would be very sorry to see the Bill delayed, but I think it should be amended in these two points.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). I regret that the mover of the Bill, the hon. member for South Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale), is not here to-night, because I know that he feels very anxious to have the Bill passed in its present shape, as it left the committee. As to the first objection raised by the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock), that the period of limitation should refer to the operation and not the construction of the canal, I think there is something in it, but I would prefer that the mover of the Bill should be present during its discussion. As to the second objection raised by the hon. member, that, of course, is a very wide departure from the present practice. It would leave nothing to the Governor in Council at all.

Mr. MULOCK. They have plenty to do now.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). The departure is so wide that I would not, as a member of that committee, be prepared to assent to it, inasmuch as it is a matter for the Government to consider. On the whole, I would suggest that the Bill lie over until the hon. member for South Norfolk, who is promoting it, is able to be present.

Mr. SPROULE. I would suggest that the hon. member for North York should give notice of these amendments, and at the third reading, if the House thought desirable, they could be introduced.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I have a very strong opinion as to the Bill undertaking to provide redress for those who may be injured in the construction of the canal in regard to insufficient drainage facilities, or in whose way in regard to drainage impediments may be put by the construction of the canal. I suppose that these matters could be as well discussed in committee; but in my opinion, while Parliament, in granting a franchise to the canal company, may and does impose limitations and conditions, it cannot, after the company is incorporated and in operation, undertake to limit, as is proposed, the remedy which other parties may have against the company. Once the company is incorporated it becomes an artificial person, and in law it stands in the same relation to the community as any other person. Let us suppose for a moment that in the incorporation of a railway company we undertook to grant the company immunity against the construction of waterways through the railway. We permit them to put impediments in the way of natural drainage and to interfere with the powers of the Local Government with reference to artificial drainage. I do not think we have any such power. I do not see on what ground it can be claimed. I think it is wholly at variance with the principles laid down by the judicial committee in the Parsons case, where it was held that this Parliament cannot relieve a corporation from the liabilities it might owe, as a person, under the laws of the province where it carried on its corporate operations. By this Bill, as framed, you provide that the canal company, when incorporated, shall stand in a certain relation to persons, with the drainage of whose lands it interferes, and you provide a remedy for those persons. Although you have no jurisdiction whatever, although you stand, in so far as their lands are concerned, in no legal relation whatever to those persons, you propose that they, instead of being allowed to have recourse against this corporation, to the laws of the province, under the authority of which they hold property, shall go before the Railway Committee of the Privy Council to have their grievances redressed. I submit that this House has no such power. It cannot do anything of that sort. It may provide, and it ought to provide, limitations to the franchises in the canal company. It ought to see that, in the exercise of those franchises, the company shall be subject to the same liabilities that an ordinary person would be. If it cost A, B or C more to drain his land in consequence of this, the additional burden that would be imposed on him ought to be borne by this corporation. He ought not to be put in a worse position by this corporation than he otherwise would be in. So far you have the right to guard him, and so far it is your duty to guard him. But what his remedy shall be against the railway corporation, how it shall be enforced, is for the Local Legislature, having jurisdiction over the subject of property and civil rights, having jurisdiction over the constitution of the courts of civil procedure, to provide. Otherwise you could provide that every railway corporation in this country should have all claims made by it and all liabilities which it may incur, tried by the Railway Committee of the Privy Council. I do not think we have any such power, and if we bear in mind this principle, that every corporation we create is an artificial person, which, when it is once created, is subject to the same jurisdiction that any other person would be in like circumstances, we have the simple principle of constitutional law applicable to the case. And I think that we ought not to legislate in such a way as to invite conflict and to impose upon persons the duty of going before the courts for the purpose of having their rights redressed and their remedies secured to them. I submit this matter to the attention of the Minister of Justice, with a view to his consideration of the subject before this Bill proceeds beyond the committee of this House.

Mr. MCGREGOR. I hope the committee will see their way clear to allow this Bill to pass this stage, and let the amendments be made at the third reading. The promoters of the Bill are anxious to go forward as quickly as possible with the scheme they are arranging for. It is a very large amount for which they are financing, and we hope there will be no impediment as far as this House is concerned. The amount expended is very large, and we know now that this scheme is one of the necessities of that great waterway, because the tonnage of the great lakes is increasing very rapidly—at least from 50 to 75 per cent yearly. This route will shorten the distance a great deal. Not only will this be the case, but a boat will draw much more water going that way than over the old Limekiln Crossing, and this route will take from the Detroit River a large portion of the danger of navigation between Chicago, Duluth and the eastern ports. As has been suggested, I hope the committee will see their way clear to allow the amendments to be placed in this Bill at the third reading, if they are then found necessary. We have talked the matter over pretty carefully. The promoters of the Bill, the reeves of the different townships interested, and the wardens of the county have consulted together, and fully understand each other, so that I hope the Bill will be allowed to pass this stage.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I do not think there should be any objection to the second reading of the Bill now, and to holding over the amendments that have been proposed by the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) for consideration on the third reading. I know that the promoter of the Bill is very anxious to get it through, as he has made arrangements under it, and I may say that the people of that part of the country are exceedingly anxious that the Bill should be put through. It is a very important work to that part of the country, and the people there would not like to see any obstructions thrown in the way. At the same time, the points that have been raised might well be considered. I do not think there will be any objection at all to the first amendment suggested by the hon. member for North York, and as for the second amendment that he proposed, namely, to refer the matter to a local engineer, approved of by the judges of the county, an independent body, if that will meet the wishes of the promoters of the Bill, I am sure it would be far more acceptable to the people than referring the matter to the Privy Council. What they fear is that a reference to the Privy Council will entail a good deal of expense in case of any alteration required in the drainage system. In the Bill as now proposed, as it passed through the Railway Committee, a clause is inserted providing that the company will meet the wishes of the people, so far as the present drains are concerned. The question then arises as to the future drains, or present drains which may have to be enlarged. The Railway Committee thought that the authorizing of those constructions and the deciding as to who should bear the expense, should lie with the Railway Committee of the Privy Council. The reeve and delegates who were down here would prefer that the power should rest with the local authorities. In their opinion it would be more easy and less expensive to obtain in this way any redress which they might require than by going to Ottawa. I think therefore that the House might go into committee and pass the Bill, and leave the amendments to be considered on the third reading when the promoter is present. I am sorry he is not here to-night, as he can explain the provisions of the Bill more fully than any other member of the House. I hope that no delay will be made in the passing of the Bill, as it is a very important measure, and I trust the House will pass it with all convenient speed.

Mr. MARTIN. I think the hon. Controller of Inland Revenue (Mr. Wood) is somewhat under misapprehension with regard to the provisions regarding the Railway Committee of the Privy Council. The changing of that provision in this Act would not take anything from that committee. In fact, this is altogether an unusual provision to have in a railway Act.

The hon. gentleman is quite well aware that the ordinary course in regard to matters of that kind is to refer them to arbitration. As I understood in the committee, when this matter was being discussed, the idea of the promoter of the Bill was that it would be less expensive to come before the Railway Committee, where no costs were involved and where there is no appeal, than to go through the ordinary channels of arbitration. The proposition now made is something in the same direction—to take away these matters from the ordinary process of arbitration involving appeal after appeal; but, instead of having them come to Ottawa, to have them go before some local authority. So I would suggest that the hon. gentleman should reconsider the matter. I think he will see there is no reason why a Minister or a member of the Railway Committee should interpose objections if the parties are agreed upon the point; as it is not taking away any jurisdiction that the committee has previously enjoyed.

Mr. ALLAN. I am sorry that this clause relating to drainage was not discussed in the presence of the delegates from the counties of Essex and Kent, who came down to represent their localities with regard to this matter. It is considered of the very first importance—even of greater importance than the construction of the canal itself, and everybody is in favour of the canal—to provide safe-guards in reference to drainage. These townships have been to vast expense in connection with these drainage works. The township of Mersea alone has expended a quarter of a million dollars for drainage; and four townships have constructed a drainage system which runs very near to where this canal is projected to run, at a cost of $180,000. So, while I am very anxious that the Bill should proceed to a second reading, and that it should not be obstructed in any way, still I think it is a matter of importance that the legal gentlemen of the House should see, before the final passage of the Bill, that the people of that section have their rights in the matter of drainage amply secured.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I think perhaps, in view of the unusual provisions, it would be more satisfactory to have the Bill stand over until the mover is here.

Mr. MULOCK. Would not the suggestion of the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) be a wise one?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I do not think so. The committee in the meantime would have to pass the Bill as it is, giving what the hon. gentleman has explained to be the unusual provisions as to arbitration; and I do not see why that should be done under the circumstances.

Mr. MULOCK. There was a controversy in committee. One hon. gentleman pretended that the language of the Bill followed the language of the Railway Act, and limited the causes of action to those arising after the operation, but another hon. gentleman said that there was a decision the other way. I did not look up the law.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. There is no occasion for hurry.

Mr. EDGAR. No doubt some conclusion will be arrived at satisfactory to all parties. But I do not know if the Government understand just what this undertaking is. It is the construction of a canal only thirteen miles in length, practically cutting off the Detroit River. If I understand the case aright, there is a fall of four and a half feet from the level of Lake St. Clair at one end of the thirteen miles, down to Lake Erie at the other end. I am not an engineer, but I think I know enough of these matters to believe that if this ditch is dug there will be a force of water which will make a passage large enough to divert the course of the largest river. There is a question beyond the drainage of the farms; there is the question of the drainage of the upper lakes, and the international question of diverting the Detroit River from its present course to this thirteen mile cut. I may be wrong; but it seems to me that these are questions which will arise and which the Government ought to look into.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Speaker, that matter is fully understood by the promoters of the canal, and the fears of my hon friend (Mr. Edgar) who sits beside me may be dismissed at once. The promoters would, of course, provide a guard-lock to keep back the waters of Lake St. Clair; for, if they did not, they would have the whole of Lake St. Clair flowing over their canal. They would have to build a guard-lock and a lift-lock. There is only four and a half feet of rise from Lake Erie to Lake St. Clair, and a lift-lock will have to be provided on the Lake Erie level to overcome this rise. To suppose that no provision would be made by the builders of the canal to protect it from the waters of Lake St. Clair would be preposterous; that will be one of the first cares of the constructors of the canal. The water must be under control of those who have the canal in charge. It would not be a canal at all if the waters were allowed to flow through without control. It would simply be a ditch and would be of no service.

An hon. MEMBER. But if the dam should burst?

Mr. GIBSON. If the dam should burst they can repair it. There was one point I spoke about when this matter was up for discussion. I understand that this canal is to be built on the course of the present creek. I thought at the time that provision should be made for the drainage of that country.

Mr. MULOCK.

The present means of taking away the water will be destroyed by this canal. No doubt it is intended that the canal shall provide for carrying off the water carried by the present drainage system. But the water carried by extensions of the present drainage system as well as the draining of lands not now drained should also be provided for.

Mr. MCGREGOR. We have arranged all that. We have arranged to take care of all the water.

Motion agreed to, and House resolved itself into committee.

Committee rose and reported progress.

IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READINGS.

Bill (No. 26) respecting the Ottawa Gas Company.—(Mr. Robillard.)

Bill (No. 28) respecting the Ontario Mutual Life Assurance Company.—(Mr. Bowman.)

Bill (No. 56) to incorporate the Dominion Woman's Christian Temperance Union.—(Mr. Scriver.)

WAYS AND MEANS—THE TARIFF.

House again resolved itself into Committee on Ways and Means.

(In the Committee.)

Common and colourless window glass; and plain, coloured, stained or tinted or muffled glass in sheets, 20 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. MULOCK. What industry is the hon. gentleman trying to protect by the duty? Is this duty for revenue purposes or for protection purposes?

Mr. FOSTER. For revenue purposes.

Item agreed to.

Plate glass in panes of over 70 square feet each, 9 cents per square foot; and when bevelled, 2 cents per square foot additional.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I observe in a preceding paragraph that rough rolled plate glass is taxed 25 per cent. What I would like to know from the hon. Minister is whether there is any genuine manufactory of plate glass in this country?

Mr. FOSTER. There is not.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Is this rolled plate glass brought in here and finished?

Mr. FOSTER. The plate glass is brought in and bevelled here.

Item agreed to.

Spectacles and eye-glasses, 30 per cent ad valorem.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I do not speak on my own account solely, inasmuch as the Finance Minister requires spectacles as well as myself; but I do think that spectacles and eye-glasses, which are equivalent in a certain sense to wooden legs to those who are forced to use them, ought to be admitted free. The price of a really good pair of spectacles or eye-glasses in this country is exorbitant and the duty upon them is a serious consideration. I regret to observe that among a large number of the children in our schools, either from the decision of the faculty, or increasing failures of eyesight, very little children are wearing glasses, and the practice is increasing much faster than I like to see it. There are very strong reasons for making this duty low or for abolishing it altogether. If the hon. gentleman will consult any oculist of repute, he will learn, if he does not know already, that great injury to the sight arises from the use of indifferent glasses; and it is becoming more and more the opinion of oculists that it is extremely important that people should wear eye-glasses that are carefully adjusted to their sight. Thirty per cent is a very serious duty, and really good eye-glasses are not going to be made in this country for many a long day.

Mr. FOSTER. The duty is levied to a very large extent on the fine rims such as my hon. friend wears.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Then let the glasses come in free and tax the rims.

Mr. FOSTER. Thirty per cent is not a heavy duty upon a low-priced article.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Eye-glasses rest upon the same footing as artificial limbs, by supplying defective sight just as the others supply defective limbs.

Item agreed to.

Spectacle and eye-glass frames, parts of, 20 per cent ad valorem.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I would reverse that and make the rims 30 per cent and then cut the duty on the glasses down to 10 per cent or abolish it altogether.

Item agreed to.

Cement, including Portland or Roman, and hydraulic or water lime, 40 cents per barrel, including duty on the barrel.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). What does that tax amount to?

Mr. FOSTER. On the average importation, $1.64 a barrel.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It appears to me that this duty of 40 cents per barrel on cement, including Portland or Roman, and hydraulic or water lime, discriminates enormously against the inferior quality. If I remember rightly these expensive cements range from $2.50 to $3 and $4 a barrel, while water lime is sold for something like 80 cents or 90 cents a barrel. To tax the one 10 per cent and the other 50 is not a very square action. A good water lime cement is an excellent article and can be advantageously manufactured here. Portland and Roman cements are three or four times the price; yet they are all placed at the same figure.

Mr. FOSTER. The average rate of duty on the water lime was 24¼ per cent.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The price of water lime runs from 40 to 50 cents a barrel, while the higher grade cements vary from $2 to $4. I believe that at the present time water lime cement of good quality is 90 cents, and high class cements from $2 upwards.

Mr. FOSTER. There does not appear to have been any quantity of water cements imported.

Mr. GIBSON. The duty on Portland cement is 16 per cent, while that on water lime is 45 per cent. There are manufactures of Portland cement at Owen Sound, Deseronto, and Hull. Why does the water lime manufacturer require 45 per cent protection while the Portland cement manufacturer only requires 16? The usual price of Portland cement is from $2.50 to $3 in Montreal; the last quantity which I bought was at $2.50. In all fairness, the Portland cement manufacturer should have as much protection as the water lime manufacturer. Moreover, I object to the system of levying the duty by the barrel.

Mr. STAIRS. There seems to be a slight misunderstanding as to the ad valorem duties. According to the Trade and Navigation Returns, the duty on Portland cement was 16 per cent. My recollection of the value of that cement was 6 shillings per barrel at the port where the duty was paid.

Mr. EDGAR. The price would be $2.

Mr. STAIRS. Again, it appears from the Trade and Navigation Returns that no water lime cement was imported, or a very small quantity.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The value of water lime ranges from 80 to 90 cents, and it is taxed 40 cents, and that is equivalent to a duty of 40 or 50 per cent.

Mr. GIBSON. I am not dealing with the Trade and Navigation Returns, but I am speaking from my experience. I paid 35 per cent on several thousand barrels of water lime, manufactured in Thorold, which I exported to Michigan in connection with the construction of the American end of the tunnel. It was better than any cement I could purchase in the United States, and as it is such a superior article, there is little need for our manufacturers to receive, at the hands of this Government 40 or 45 per cent protection. I am speaking from my experience, and I use from 8,000 to 10,000 barrels of cement yearly, and I use more water lime than Portland.

Mr. WALLACE. Where is this Portland cement manufactured?

Mr. GIBSON. At Owen Sound.

Mr. WALLACE. The Owen Sound manufacturers are perfectly satisfied with the duty, so I do not know why the hon. gentleman should be dissatisfied.

Mr. GIBSON. I am only showing the inconsistency of the tariff. On one article of cement there is 44 per cent protection, and on another, 20 per cent. Besides, the principle of taxing it at so much per barrel is entirely wrong. In regard to water lime, its importation is practically prohibited. The Government should reduce the proposed duty on water lime.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It is very curious that every time the Commissioner of Customs or some other Minister rises he tells us that the manufacturer does not want any alteration and is satisfied. It is not their business to tell us that this tariff is to be framed simply and solely on the basis as to whether manufacturers are satisfied or dissatisfied. We are here to consider the tariff in the interests of millions of consumers, and it is on their account I protest against these duties. Although I have not had such an extensive experience with cements as my hon. friend, I have had to pay for hundreds of barrels of water lime cement, which is very useful and desirable in the construction of houses and in regard to cellars, and it is not desirable that a prohibitory duty should be placed on it. It is perfectly clear that as the Canadian manufacturers can make water lime cement cheaper and of better quality without protection than any water lime cement in the United States, it is not in the interests of the consumers, nor is it a satisfactory answer to say that our manufacturers are satisfied, because all American water lime is prohibited. I dare say they are, but the Canadian consumers have certain rights.

Mr. SPROULE. It seems to me that the arguments of hon. gentlemen opposite are not very consistent, and have not very much force, because if the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Gibson) is correct when he says that it paid him to take Canadian water lime to the United States and pay 35 per cent duty, it evidently shows that the Canadian article was much better than the American. If we get the Canadian product of such fine quality at 90 cents a barrel, and it is much better than the other, I do not see that we would benefit very much by lowering the duty. I do not think any one can show that the Canadian is very much injured if he can get a superior quality at a lower price than on the other side. If the quality of Canadian lime is so good and the price is so low no Canadian is injured by it. With regard to Portland cement there is this difference: Portland cement will be used in a great many cases where water lime would do, but where Portland cement is much better. The quality of Portland cement we have in Canada is generally considered very good and there is not much danger of the Portland cement coming into competition with it.

Mr. WALLACE.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. There are manufactories at Thorold, where my hon. friend (Mr. Gibson) can get a very excellent article of lime, but our frontier happens to be 3,000 miles long and in close contiguity to the American frontier all along the line. There are a great many places in which it is a heavy tax to the Canadian consumer to have to pay the price at Thorold plus an enormous sum for freight several hundred miles, when by going across the border, he could get a fair quality at a very moderate rate.

Mr. GIBSON. The hon. gentleman did not seem to understand the point I raised. I said that they did not require this high protection as they were manufacturing an article of such excellent quality. I would not pay money out of my pocket for freight and 35 per cent duty to the American Government for an article I could get in the States for less money or for the same amount. After I had tried the American cement I considered that I was justified in going to the expense of exporting the Canadian cement I required and paying the American duty. What I said was that they did not require this large amount of protection, because if a barrel of American water lime is laid alongside a barrel of Thorold water lime, and the man knows his business, and they both can be bought for the same price, the man will prefer the Thorold lime to the American.

Mr. SPROULE. The Canadian cannot be injured, then.

Mr. GIBSON. Then what do you want the protection for?

Mr. EDGAR. The Controller of Customs, with a frankness for which we are very much more indebted to him on this side of the House than his colleagues are, told us that this duty was all right on Portland cement because the manufacturers were perfectly satisfied with it. It is very nice for the Controller of Customs to let us into the Cabinet secrets although he is not himself in the Cabinet. He tells us that as long as the manufacturers are satisfied we ought all be satisfied. Let us apply that argument to this case. He says the manufacturers of Portland cement, the expensive article, are satisfied with a duty of 40 cents a barrel; then let the Government decide that the manufacturers of the cheaper article, the water lime, should be satisfied with a proportionate protection. They have the officers to figure out what that would be exactly, as there is a little dispute whether the protection on the cheap article is twice or three times what it is on the dear article. As they proposed this duty because the cement manufacturers are satisfied, then the others ought to be satisfied with a duty that would work out the same ad valorem.

Mr. WALLACE. In answer to the member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar), I may say: my statement was in reply to the member for Lincoln (Mr. Gibson), whose argument was that the Portland cement manufacturers should have higher protection than they have now.

Mr. EDGAR. No.

Mr. WALLACE. He said that as the water lime men had 40 cents a barrel the others should have the same average protection.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. No.

Mr. WALLACE. And I said: that these men had made no representations to the Government that they required an increased amount of protection, and that they were apparently producing large quantities and supplying nearly the whole of the Dominion.

Mr. GIBSON. I wish to correct the hon. the Controller. I do not think he would misrepresent me, but he must have misunderstood me. What I said was: that I thought the way of placing the duty at so much a barrel was fair to the Portland cement people, but I thought that if you got the relative values on a proper footing and placed a duty of 20 cents on the water lime and 40 cents on the Portland cement, you would strike the thing about right.

Mr. RIDER. I do not see ordinary building lime mentioned on the list. It is quite an important industry in some parts of Quebec, and I would like to know what the duty on it is?

Mr. FOSTER. It is not mentioned in the schedule, and so would come under unenumerated articles.

Item agreed to.

Grindstones not mounted and not less than 12 inches in diameter, $1.75 per ton.

Mr. GIBSON. Could the Minister of Finance tell me where there are any grindstones made in Canada?

Mr. FOSTER. In New Brunswick.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Have we not our nose to a maritime grindstone at present? This whole tariff is a grindstone of the very worst description.

Mr. SPROULE. There are grindstones made in the county of Simcoe.

Item agreed to.

India-rubber boots and shoes, with tops or uppers of cloth or of material other than rubber, 30 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. MULOCK. I think this is too high a rate of duty. I would be very sorry to discredit our manufacturers; but, notwithstanding this high duty, it is conceded that it has not caused them to produce as finished an article as the American article.

Mr. FOSTER. They make a good article.

Mr. MULOCK. If you go into any establishment where the two classes of goods are sold, the merchant will always tell you that the American article is superior. So that if the high protection of 30 per cent causes careless manufacture, then it is time that the manufacturers should be put more on their mettle.

Mr. FOSTER. They will be 5 per cent more careful now.

Mr. MULOCK. That is not enough. I would suggest that this duty of 30 per cent be reduced. Rubber goods are poor men's goods; I may very correctly say that rubber shoes are required in every walk of life. I should think I ought to get a little reduction for that.

Mr. FOSTER. You ought to get 5 per cent extra for that.

Mr. SPROULE. The 30 per cent is only upon boots and shoes topped with cloth. Those of pure rubber have only 25 per cent.

Mr. MARTIN. This item is a most important one for us in the North-west. I think the hon. member for North York puts the thing altogether too mildly when he says that 30 per cent is too high a duty; it seems to me that it is an enormous duty. Hon. gentlemen opposite have selected certain articles on which to reduce the taxes for the purpose of pacifying the people of the North-west. For that purpose they could not select a better article than boots and shoes made of rubber, because every person in the North-west has to buy one or two pairs of rubber shoes in the year. My hon. friend is quite correct in saying that those of Canadian manufacture do not compare with the American. On Canadian-made boots we have to pay heavy freight rates in addition to the protective price, and, as these goods are rather heavy, the freight rates are considerable. There are few items on which the protective duties bear so heavily as rubber boots, and boots and shoes generally. I hope the manufacturers are satisfied, because I can say that the people are very much dissatisfied with this duty. I suppose the Government are entitled to some credit for reducing it from 35 to 30 per cent; but it is merely an indication of what they ought to do. If 20 per cent is a fair rate for prime necessities, such as agricultural implements, then I think it ought to be sufficient for rubber boots and shoes.

Mr. SPROULE. I have no doubt at all this is a heavy grievance for Manitoba, because I see in the Trade and Navigation Returns, that Manitoba imported last year $129 worth.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The duty was so heavy that it operated as a prohibitive duty, and compelled my hon. friend's constituents to pay 35 per cent on every India-rubber used in that country.

Mr. MACDOWALL. I do not know that this is a very important matter in the North-west. No doubt some rubber boots and shoes are used there as well as other forms of foot gear, and it is very desirable that we should buy these things as cheaply as possible. But as the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) has observed, the amount imported is not very large, and the Canadian manufactured goods suits us very well. So that after all, I think it is in the interest of the North-west not to devote so much time to small matters such as rubber boots and shoes, which do not bear very heavily on our people, and to give our attention to other and larger matters, such as nails.

Mr. WILSON. I entirely repudiate the statement of the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) as to the quality of Canadian rubber boots and shoes. After an experience of thirty years, I can say that they wear quite as well as those made in the United States.

Mr. MULOCK. What about the finish?

Mr. WILSON. The goods worn by the poor people are finished quite as well as the American goods of the same description. And so far as the price is concerned, these articles were never cheaper in my recollection. Our manufacturers are not taking advantage of the duty, but are perfectly satisfied if they net 5 cents a pair profit, and that is cutting things very fine. It requires a very large business to make anything at that rate.

Mr. FLINT. I admit that of late years there has been improvement, but up to a very recent period it was very generally conceded that the American goods were the better.

Mr. WILSON. That is because some people always prefer a thing that comes from some other country.

Mr. FLINT. They like what gives them the best satisfaction for their money. The fact that in the Maritime Provinces we import very largely the American goods, notwithstanding the duty, is a proof that we find these goods a necessity, and feel that even in paying the additional price, we are getting value for our money. Although we do not presume to be able to influence the Government, yet I feel bound, in the interests of the fishermen of the Maritime provinces to impress on it the desirability of making a considerable reduction in the tariff on these necessary articles. The reduction they have made of 5 per cent is practically nothing.

Mr. MARTIN. The hon. member for Saskatchewan (Mr. Macdowall) rebukes me for paying attention to such a small matter as rubber boots and shoes in view of the enormities of the tariff—he did not put it exactly in that way, but that is the inference—in larger matters. It would be fair for me to criticise him for having neglected matters both large and small. Had he been here the whole session, he would hardly have made the statement that I was confining my attention to boots and shoes. My criticism of the tariff has been a very general one, and I do not think it is proper to neglect the question of boots and shoes. And I do not agree with the hon. gentleman that this is a small matter in Manitoba and the North-west. The hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) points out, with a great deal of joy, that we in Manitoba only imported $129 worth, but, as the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) has pointed out, that is because the duty is so thoroughly protective. Although the North-west has paid a heavy tax on their boots and shoes, every dollar has gone, not into the coffers of the Government, but into the pockets of this gentleman with whom the Finance Minister seems to have such intimate acquaintance.

Mr. SPROULE. What I said was merely in answer to the statement of the hon. gentleman that they were importing large quantities.

Mr. MARTIN. I said we were using large quantities. In Manitoba and the North-west, where we have snow upon the ground six or seven months of the year, we certainly use more rubber boots and shoes than are used in British Columbia. Yet in British Columbia, where I fancy the eastern Canadian article cannot be brought on account of the freight rates, the amount imported was $27,116 worth, and the duty collected $6,733. Now, British Columbia has a much smaller population than Manitoba and the territories, and a very different climate, and consequently the boots and shoes made with cloth partly and with rubber, such as the item we are discussing, are not required to anything like the extent they are in our country. Hon. gentlemen opposite take a great deal of credit, because they reduce the duty on a few agricultural implements. Well, the duty on ploughs collected was $1,000 less than the amount collected in British Columbia on these overshoes, and I can safely say that every plough that goes into Manitoba from foreign countries is entered in the Manitoba customs returns. In the matter of agricultural implements, our customs returns show completely what the imports are and the tax collected. But in the matter of India-rubber overshoes a considerable amount of the American goods used in Manitoba and the North-west have been imported at Toronto and Montreal and do not appear in our customs returns at all. I have no doubt that we use twice as many of these overshoes as they do in British Columbia; and if that be the case, we paid last year $10,000 duty upon these, or twice as much duty as we paid upon ploughs which the hon. gentleman would admit to be a very important item. The duty upon self-binders the last year—

Mr. FOSTER. Question.

Mr. MARTIN. The hon. member for Saskatchewan (Mr. Macdowall) attempted to show that this was an insignificant item. Now, the items to which he refers were no doubt such items as self-binders. The amount of duty paid in Manitoba upon self-binders was $21,000, and if my calculation is correct, we must have paid, not into the coffers of the Government, but into the pockets of the manufacturers, fully $10,000 in the way of duty upon this insignificant item, fully half as much as we paid upon self-binders. I do not know how the hon. gentleman looks at it; in fact, I do not know much about his particular portion of the North-west, but I am satisfied that the people of Manitoba generally feel it a great burden to have to pay 50 or 60 cents a piece more for their overshoes than they ought to do on account of this tariff, and it would be a great relief to them to be able to save that $10,000 instead of handing it over to these manufacturers.

Mr. MULOCK. I wish to correct a remark that fell from the hon. member for Lennox (Mr. Wilson). In comparing the quality of Canadian and American rubber goods, I wish to say that the testimony I have received from time to time from dealers, has been that American was a better finished article, and I spoke of the quality—that was the character of the article I had in my mind. I do not know what the hon. gentleman's experience may be; of course, I speak with much deference before him, but I repeat that I have received that testimony, I may say, from almost every dealer with whom I have had any conversation, and I have spoken to a great many.

Item agreed to.

India-rubber clothing and clothing made waterproof with india-rubber, 35 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. FLINT. The hon. gentleman seems to have endeavoured to make just as little reduction as he could. This item is a very large one in our imports, amounting in value to nearly $300,000, and the duty is about $100,000. I think that a more substantial reduction than this would not only have relieved the consumers to a large extent, but would have given the Government a larger revenue in consequence of increased importation; while at the same time those who desire protection would have received incidentally an adequate protection by a duty of at least 25 per cent. I think this is one of the errors in this whole tariff, that in no case where large consuming classes are concerned, has there been a real, substantial and generous reduction so that the people could receive the benefit of it. The interests of one class have been looked to almost solely, and the reduction has been made merely to the ear, so that the Government and its friends could say there had been a reduction, while at the same time the consumers have received no substantial advantage.

Committee rose and reported progress.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and the House adjourned at 9.50 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, 30th April, 1894.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 95)—(from the Senate)—respecting public harbours.—(Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper.)

SEIGNIORY OF SAINT LOUIS.

Mr. DALY moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 97) respecting the Seignior of Saint Louis. He said: This Bill provides that the Governor General in Council may, upon such conditions as may be deemed expedient, accept from the censitaires 75 per cent of the arrears of rent due up to the 11th of November, 1892. It appears that the rents have been in arrears for thirty or forty years on this reserve, and efforts have been made to collect them, but owing to the resistance on the part of the censitaires to pay rents owing to the title of the seignior being in dispute as between the Indians and the Quebec Government, such efforts were not successful, so an arrangement was made to pay 75 per cent. The question was laid before the Caughnawaga band, and they agreed to accept this amount on condition that it was paid in cash. On referring the matter to the Department of Justice, we were advised that it would be necessary to have legislation to confirm any such arrangement. Action was brought against one Pinsoneault, to recover the amount of rent due, he being one of the censitaires. That suit has been going on for a long time, and is still pending, and we have not been able to get judgment. The censitaires were induced to appear before a notary, and thus we have the names of all those who are in arrears and the amount owing by each, and also their agreement to pay 75 per cent. The total amount in arrears is about $7,000, and by the acceptance of the compromise we shall not only receive the 75 per cent of the whole amount outstanding, but, upon our accepting this settlement on behalf of the Indians, the censitaires agree to pay their rents hereafter in full.

Mr. LAURIER. Is Pinsoneault a party to this agreement?

Mr. DALY. Yes.

Mr. LAURIER. No doubt this Bill is the result of a great deal of correspondence between the censitaires and the Government. Will the hon. gentleman say whether that correspondence will be laid on the Table?

Mr. DALY. There is no objection to that.

Mr. MULOCK. Including the opinion of the department?

Mr. DALY. Yes.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

MEMRAMCOOK AND COLLEGE BRIDGE.

Mr. WOOD (Westmoreland) asked, What were the receipts from passengers and freight, for year ending 30th June last, at Memramcook and College Bridge stations, on the Intercolonial railway? What number of carloads of freight was received and dispatched from each station?

Mr. HAGGART. The receipts from passengers and freight for the year ended 30th of June, 1893, at the stations named, were as follows:—At Memramcook station: passengers, $1,395.30; freight, $4,584.83; total, $5,980.13. At College Bridge station: passengers, $1,334.80; freight, $915.63; total, $2,250.43. The number of carloads of freight discharged and despatched from each of these stations was—At Memramcook station; carloads discharged, 36; carloads despatched, 87; total, 123. At College Bridge station: carloads discharged, 8; carloads despatched, 2; total, 10.

MR. JNO. C. BOURINOT.

Mr. FRASER asked, Are the Government aware that Mr. Jno. C. Bourinot, Collector of Customs at Port Hawkesbury, N.S., is the proprietor and editor of the 'Eastern Journal,' a Conservative newspaper published at Port Hawkesbury, Inverness county?

Mr. WALLACE. The Government are not aware that Mr. John C. Bourinot, Collector of Customs at Port Hawkesbury, N. S., is the proprietor and editor of the 'Eastern Journal.' However, the collector's salary is only $600 per annum, and, consequently, he is not debarred by section 14 of the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act from engaging in other employment, provided it is of such a nature that it does not conflict with his duties as collector.

POSTMASTER OF ST. URBAIN DE CHATEAUGUAY.

Mr. SCRIVER (for Mr. Brown, Chateauguay) asked, 1. Are the Government aware that complaints have recently been made against the postmaster of St. Urbain de Chateauguay? 2. If so, what is the nature of those complaints, and by whom made?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The Government is aware that complaints have recently been made against the postmaster of St. Urbain. These complaints are to the effect: That the postmaster is not trustworthy; that a parcel was delivered open to the housekeeper of the complainant; that letters and papers addressed to the complainant had been delivered to others; that unsuitable persons are allowed to take part in the duties of the post office. On receipt of these complaints, an investigation was ordered, the result of which has been to show that the post office is well managed, and that the postmaster enjoyed the respect and confidence of the neighbourhood.

THE GOVERNMENT STEAMER 'DRUID.'

Mr. CHOQUETTE asked, What has been the outlay for repairs and maintenance of the Government steamer 'Druid,' employed in the Grosse Isle quarantine service, during the year 1893, and from the 1st January, 1894, up to this date?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The outlay for repairs and maintenance of the Government steamer 'Druid,' employed in the Grosse Isle quarantine service during the year 1893, that is to say, the calendar year, was $10,622.63; and from the 1st of January, 1894, up to this date, $6,019.88. Out of this latter sum $5,000 has been paid on account of the contract with Carriere, Lainé's contract for repairs to the new engines.

MAIL SERVICE IN OTTAWA COUNTY.

Mr. GRIEVE (for Mr. Devlin) asked, Have any complaints been received by the Government in regard to the mail service between Lascelles and Wakefield, in the county of Ottawa? If so, what was the nature of such complaints and by whom made? Have any reports by officers of the Post Office Department been made with respect to this mail service? Have any letters been received advising the Government not to interfere with present arrangements, and if so, from whom? Are the Government aware that under present regulations it takes two and one-half days, on certain occasions, in transmitting mail matters a distance of nine miles? Has the postmaster General carried out during recess the promise made last session to consider the demands sent to the department for better mail service in the county of Ottawa? If so, what and where were the improvements made?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. 1. Yes, from the inhabitants of the township of Masham and the Lascelles Association, P.I., complaining of the present mode of serving the post offices at Rupert and Lascelles, and asking that these offices be served daily from North Wakefield. 2. Yes. 3. No. 4. No points being specified, this question cannot be answered. 5. Since last session, at the request of J. M. MacDougall, Q.C., the following improvements have been made in the mail service in Ottawa County: New post offices have been established at Glen Gordon, service weekly; North Low, tri-weekly; Martindale, tri-weekly; Inlet, tri-weekly; Deschenes Mills, semi-daily; South Branch, tri-weekly. The service on the Ottawa and Gatineau Valley Railway has been extended to Wright, giving the post offices at Low, Kazabazua, Aylwin and Wright a semi-daily service instead of a daily service by stage. Venosta has been given a daily service from the railway, instead of a weekly one by stage. Wilson's Corners has been given a semi-weekly mail, and a semi-weekly service has been established between Chenneville and Duhamel.

TARIFF INQUIRIES.

Mr. LANDERKIN asked, Was a stenographer with the Ministers or Controllers who visited the various parts of the Dominion during recess as to tariff changes? If so, what was his name? Did he take notes of the proceedings in whole or in part of said meetings? Were type-written copies of said notes made?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. At each of the conferences held by Ministers or Controllers, one of the secretaries of the Ministers or Controllers was present and took notes in part of the meetings. Type-written copies of the notes were made. The names of the secretaries, one or other of whom at various times so acted, were Mr. Payne, secretary of the Minister of Trade and Commerce; Mr. Gerin, secretary of the Minister of Agriculture, and Mr. Winter, secretary of the Controller of Inland Revenue.

PREVENTIVE OFFICER AT WOODSTOCK, N.B.

Mr. DAVIES asked, What is the name of the custom-house officer at the custom-house on the frontier between Houlton, Me., and Woodstock, N.B.? Is it known to the Customs Department that such officer is the keeper of a bar-room built alongside the frontier line, where liquor is sold wholesale and retail? Is it known to the Customs Department that such officer has access to the liquor stored in bond in the building adjoining his bar-room? What, if any, are the conditions and restrictions under which liquor may be removed by such customs officer from the bonded warehouse to the bar-room?

Mr. WALLACE. 1. We have a preventive officer only at that point; his name is Charles Campbell. 2. No, he was appointed on the distinct understanding that he would give his undivided attention to customs business. 3. The department has no knowledge of a bonded warehouse being in existence there, and having wired to the collector at Woodstock, N.B., under whose jurisdiction this office is placed, stating the alleged occupation of this officer, he replies: "Statement about preventive officer Charles Campbell is false in every particular, and no warehouse owner has access to any warehouse. Will write particulars."

CIVIL SERVICE EXAMINATIONS.

Mr. SOMERVILLE asked, What are the names of the candidates who went up for examination at the recent Civil Service examinations at Montreal, who have been disqualified for irregularities; giving the nature of irregularity in each case? What are the names of the scrutineers at said examinations, and is the Government aware that the scrutineers accepted bribes for overlooking irregularities?

Mr. COSTIGAN. 1. Edwin A. Morse, G. U. Rondeau, J. A. Forbes, Alphonse Bourassa, Rudolph T. Germain. The offence proved against each of these men is that of being impersonated by persons whom they employed for the purpose. 2. J. A. Desilets and Joseph A. Beaulieu. Desilets acknowledged that he received money from Rondeau to keep silence. Beaulieu did not appear when called upon for evidence.

BRITISH SEALERS IN BEHRING SEA.

Mr. DAVIES (for Sir Richard Cartwright) asked, Whether the Government have received a copy of the following resolutions stated to have been passed by the Legislature of British Columbia on or about the 11th day of April last:—

On the motion of the Honourable Mr. Turner, seconded by Mr. Horne, it was Resolved,—

Whereas by a Convention between the United States and Great Britain, dated 18th April, 1892, it was, amongst other things, provided:—

"That if the result of the Arbitration be to affirm the right of British sealers to take seals in Behring Sea within the bounds claimed by the United States under its purchase from Russia, then compensation shall be made by the United States to Great Britain (for the use of her subjects) for abstaining from the exercise of that right during the pendency of the Arbitration, upon the basis of such a regulated and limited catch or catches as, in the opinion of the Arbitrators, might have been taken without an undue diminution of the seal herds," such amount "to be promptly paid;"

And whereas the result of such Arbitration was to affirm such legal rights as pertaining to British subjects;

And whereas no such compensation has been awarded:

Be it Resolved, That this House ventures to express the hope that the Royal assent will not be given to the Bill now before the Imperial Parliament for giving legal effect to the Behring Sea Arbitration, unless the following claims be previously acknowledged and placed in course for settlement by the Government of the United States, namely:—

1. That British Columbian sealers be compensated in respect to vessels which have been seized;

2. That British Columbian sealers be compensated for illegal exclusion from Behring Sea during the years 1891, 1892 and 1893.

And that a copy of this Resolution be telegraphed at once to the Secretary of State for Canada with a request that he telegraph it to the Imperial Government.

(a) Whether any such basis of catch of seals as is above referred to was arrived at? (b) What steps, if any, have been taken to secure prompt payment of the several claims above enumerated? (c) Whether, pending action on the part of the United States, the Government of Great Britain is prepared to make any compensation to parties aggrieved?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. 1. The Government has received and transmitted to Her Majesty's Government a copy of the resolution of the Legislature of British Columbia, dated 11th April. 2. (a) No basis of catch as above referred to has been arrived at. It was at one time thought that such claims under the modus vivendi for 1892 and 1893 might, with advantage, be pressed. When the subject came up for discussion before the tribunal at Paris it was found inexpedient, under the terms of the convention, to advance these claims against the United States. A number of these claims have, however, been filed with the Canadian Government by the parties interested. They will be further consulted as to the basis and means for substantiating them for the purpose of being submitted for the consideration of Her Majesty's Government. The claims under the modus vivendi of 1891 are included in this category, but differ from the others inasmuch as Great Britain has already awarded the sealers a sum of $100,000 in respect to losses for that year. This amount has been paid. (b) Every step which it was possible for the Canadian Government to take has been taken periodically since 1886, to press for the payment of the claims of the sealers to compensation for losses through the seizure of their vessels. Her Majesty's Government have informed the Canadian Government that Her Majesty's ambassador at Washington was instructed that the discussion of the terms of the convention with regard to the settlement of damages, should proceed pari passu with the discussions of the arrangements for giving effect to the award. (c) The Government is not aware that any suggestion has been made to Her Majesty's Government that they were prepared to make any compensation pending action on the part of the United States.

CHARLES E. HICKEY.

Mr. SOMERVILLE asked, Is it the intention of the Government to permit Charles E. Hickey, Superintendent of the Williamsburg Canal, who is paid a salary of $1,800 per annum, to continue to practice his profession as a doctor of medicine?

Mr. HAGGART. Charles E. Hickey has been instructed that so long as he is Superintendent of the Williamsburg Canal he will not be allowed to practice his profession as a doctor of medicine.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.)

THE GEOLOGICAL MUSEUM.

Sir JAMES GRANT asked, Is it the intention of the Government to proceed with the erection of a new Geological Museum this season?

Mr. OUIMET. It is not the intention of the Government to proceed at present with the erection of a new Geological Museum.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS COMMITTEE.

Mr. LAURIER. Before the Orders of the Day are proceeded with, I beg to move:

That Mr. Martin be substituted for Mr. Charlton as a member of the Committee on Public Accounts.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). The session has become well advanced now, and probably there will not be a great many days left for private members. Some years ago a rule was adopted that when notices of motion were called, if the party was not present and prepared to proceed, the motion was allowed to drop, and in this way an opportunity was given to members who had motions on the paper and who were prepared to proceed. Hitherto this session the First Minister has been very kind in this regard, and hon. members cannot have failed to have noticed it, and nothing in the way of favouritism has taken place, because when an hon. member requested that the motion standing in his name be allowed to stand the request has been acceded to. But when the rule was adopted, it was that a motion should only be allowed to stand at the request of the Government and generally on the ground that the Ministers were not able at the moment to discuss the questions involved. I suggest whether so much leniency having been shown to all members of the House hitherto, whether it would not be better to adhere more closely to the rule, so that injustice may not be done to those having notices of motion on the paper and who are ready to proceed with them.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I am glad the hon. gentleman has mentioned the subject, because it helps me to make the statement I had intended to make when notices of motions were proceeded with, that the Government will not be at liberty after to-day to assent to requests that notices of motion be allowed to stand. But some hon. gentlemen have relied on that courtesy being extended to them to-day, and so I will in these instances ask that the motions be allowed to stand.

DEEPENING OF THE ST. LAWRENCE RIVER AND CANALS.

Mr. DENISON moved :

That whereas the canal now in course of construction by the Government of the Dominion, at Sault Ste. Marie, is to have a depth of twenty feet, which is the depth of navigable water from Port Arthur to Port Colborne, it is, in the opinion of this House, expedient that the same policy should be adopted as regards the St. Lawrence and that the Soulanges Canal now being constructed, together with the other St. Lawrence canals and the channel of the river, where necessary, should be deepened to a uniform depth of twenty feet.

He said : Mr. Speaker, as I have already on previous occasions brought this subject before the House, I do not intend to occupy much time to-day. I bring it up, not so much in the expectation of securing its adoption, as the object of keeping it before the attention of the House and Government, and with a desire to impress on the House and the country the necessity of starting on a new canal policy. We have in the past been working on a policy of a 14-foot channel, a policy adopted twenty-five or thirty years ago ; and it is unnecessary for me to point out to the House how times have changed since then, and how, if I may use the term, absurd it is that we should now be pursuing the same policy as when this country was almost in its infancy. What we should now do is to inaugurate a new policy, and in my view we should start that new policy with the Soulanges Canal on the St. Lawrence. Before going further into this question, I desire to refer very briefly to the report of the Canal Commission, which was adopted in 1871, now twenty-three years ago. Some of the arguments used then apply with equal force now. Referring to the commercial aspects of the question, the Commissioners point out the necessity of having deeper canals by which to carry grain and other products of the western prairies, or as the Commission term them : "The country which extends from the Alleghanies in the east to the Rocky Mountains on the west," and they speak of the great resources of the country and of the desirability of having so eligible a route for shipping those products. The Commissioners speak of the St. Lawrence route as follows :—

Though the St. Lawrence route has never yet received anything like the amount of traffic which it should by virtue of its superior facilities ; yet it is surprising that it has even done as much as it has when we consider the formidable nature of the opposition it has had to contend against. The trade that should naturally have sought it, just as the river seeks the sea, has been wooed away from it by the enterprising communities, deeply interested in the prosperity of American canals and railways. The very want of a uniform system in its canals, no doubt has also operated to retard the development of the St. Lawrence navigation to a very large extent. Yet despite all the disadvantages under which it has laboured, it has done an amount of business, which is of itself a guarantee of what might be accomplished under more auspicious circumstances.

Those remarks apply equally to-day as they did twenty-three years ago. The vessels used on the upper lakes were of a much smaller class than they are now, and on that account it is obviously necessary that measures should be taken to deepen the channel. The report goes on to show the growth of the intercolonial trade that depends on cheap transport, as follows :—

The growth of intercolonial trade depends on cheap transit, since the merchandise passing between the Maritime Provinces and Ontario must be of bulky character, requiring large vessels and rapid despatch to be really profitable. When a propeller can go direct with a cargo of coal, or other produce of the eastern provinces, to Kingston and Toronto, and there get a return freight of flour, barley and other western produce, intercolonial trade will have entered on a new era.

Although we had the canals deepened, including the Welland, we have only secured a depth of 14 feet. Still the trade that we look for by the deepening to 14 feet has never accrued to the country, principally on account of one canal being only 10 feet. Then the report goes on to deal with the question of navigation, and they insist upon it, that one uniform size of lock and canal throughout, including the Welland and Sault Ste. Marie canals, should be adopted. That is exactly what I wish to impress upon the House now. We have plenty of water from the town of Port Arthur to Sault Ste. Marie. At Sault Ste. Marie we are just building, I may say have completed, a canal of 20 feet, and from that point clear away to Port Colborne there is sufficient depth of water for floating a vessel of, I believe, 20 feet. We are at the present time spending a large amount of money on the Soulanges Canal, and if that canal were made 20 feet deep, our entire canal system could, bit by bit, be completed to that depth, as the country could afford it, and as our resources would allow. It is not to be supposed that we should expect to deepen our canal system all at once, but it could be done by degrees and so would not bear so heavy a burden on the country. Experience has shown that 14 feet is too shallow, and I think I am safe in saying, on account of the depth of the Welland Canal, that there are two or three hundred vessels in the upper lakes which cannot now find an outlet to Lake Ontario. With the exception probably of Suez and Panama, I know of no place in the world where the necessity exists for having a deep channel as it does in Canada. I do not know if I can even except Suez, because a vessel could go around by the Cape of Good Hope, and so avoid transshipment, and it is much the same in the case of the Panama Canal, because ships can go around Cape Horn as they do now, without transshipment. But, if it would pay in a place like Suez to spend $75,000,000 for the purpose of shortening the distance and saving transshipment, how much better would it pay to have this outlet for ocean-going vessels from our great inland seas, and not have them cribbed and confined as they are now. Vessels can ply in the interior drawing 20 feet of water, but when they come down to Port Colborne they are met with 14 feet, and when they get down to Lake Ontario there is only 10 feet at present. If we had our canals deepened as I now propose, when the work was completed it would bring Winnipeg practically within 400 miles of the sea, as vessels could come up as far as Port Arthur. It would permit all the ports on Lake Ontario to be practically seaports, and while it accomplishes all this, I contend that it would not interfere at all with the prosperity of Montreal, but that it would, on the contrary, increase it. Large sums of money have been spent in the Maritime Provinces and in the west on railway construction, and while the money required for deepening the canals would be expended at first in the older provinces of Ontario and Quebec, yet the expenditure would be more in the interests of the Maritime Provinces and of our great western country, than it would be in the interest of these two provinces I have mentioned. The reason for my contention is this: The coal of Nova Scotia could come in large ships past Montreal, and unload at the wharfs of Hamilton, Port Hope, Toronto, and elsewhere, and the wheat and flour from the great west could be brought down to the Maritime Provinces as a return cargo. When I last brought this question up in the House, it was said that the project would cost $80,000,000 or $100,000,000. That, Mr. Speaker, I think, is a very outside estimate, because Mr. Corthell, an eminent engineer of Chicago, tells us that the St. Lawrence canals could be deepened for $27,000,000, and the Welland Canal for $40,000,000, or a total of $67,000,000. I might mention that this is less than the sum that was spent by the city of Manchester in building a thirty-five-mile canal to make that town a seaport, and if it is in the interest of a town of one million inhabitants to spend $75,000,000 in constructing a waterway 26 feet deep for the purpose of carrying ocean vessels to their doors, surely it ought to be in the interest of a great nation like Canada, with the vast possibilities we have here, to spend $67,000,000 to open up this great interior country, and bring ocean vessels into the heart of the continent. I was also told on a former occasion that it would take a very large amount of money to deepen Lake St. Louis. I examined, in the department, the reports of the United States engineer officers who have taken the depths of the St. Lawrence River, and I have taken some of their measurements from Cornwall down. I have noted all the depths of 20 to 22 feet, and under, and taken a few where it was over that. Commencing at Cornwall, going down, the depth begins at 24 feet, and then runs to 22 feet, 25 feet, 20 feet, 22 feet again, 60 feet, showing the extreme depth, and 24 feet down to Highlander shoal. There is nothing less there than 20 feet. At this shoal on one side of the river there is 30 feet, just opposite to it 20 feet, and then 29 feet, and opposite 16 feet. Then, in the centre of the channel the depths are 20 feet, 23 feet, and 63 feet, which carries you into Lake St. Francis. There are varying depths in Lake St. Francis in the neighbourhood of 60 feet, or thereabouts, and then it shallows to 29 feet off Coteau Landing. After leaving the slope of the bank at Cascade Point, where the river Ottawa joins the St. Lawrence, it runs from 10 to 38 feet; 32 feet, 16 feet on one side and 23 on the opposite, and 57 feet. Then you meet the Beauharnois Canal channel, and at that point there is about 68 feet in depth. Then the depths are 41 feet, 22 feet, 24 feet, 30 feet, 50 feet, 29 feet, and then comes the shoal for about half or three-quarters of a mile, over which there are varying depths which I took, as follows:—9 feet deep on one side and 13 on the other; I suppose an average depth of 11 feet. Then there are 14 feet, 21 feet, 19 feet on one side and 22 feet on the other, or an average probably of 20 feet, and then when you leave the shoal there is 27 feet near Lachine. I think we have convincing evidence in this that the only place where there would be any trouble would be in this shoal near Lachine Point. The least depth there is from 9 to 13 feet, part of it being from 21 to 28 feet deep, so that I am sure very little dredging would give the necessary depth. Now, Mr. Speaker, I will quote from a work by Mr. William Kingsford, published in 1865, nearly thirty years ago, which throws some light upon this question. In this work the writer says:

On the other hand, freights from New York to Liverpool are always less than freights from Montreal to Liverpool; as a whole it results that it is more profitable to ship from New York. While the navigation is kept at the present limit, the relative cost will be maintained, and the system will be unchanged. The reason is evident. New York, from the imperfections of the St. Lawrence, is the importing market for the West, and consequently there are numerous vessels to bear away the produce delivered for export. In Montreal the number of vessels is limited. In the former case vessels seek for freights, and competition induces cheapness. In the latter the freight seeks vessels, and high prices are maintained.

This argument, if it is correct, tends to show that the larger we make the port of Montreal, the cheaper the rates will be, as the result of competition. While at one time the people of Montreal were, I believe, somewhat disposed to oppose the deepening of the St. Lawrence, I hope and believe that that feeling has passed away; because there is little doubt in my mind that with a great channel carrying vessels past its doors, Montreal would become a great Atlantic port, rivalling New York. I hold in my hand a copy of the 'Engineering Review' of January 20, 1894, which contains an article in reference to the Manchester Ship Canal, from which I wish to read a short extract :

The physical and engineering features of the Manchester Ship Canal have been described so often and in such detail that we do not propose to repeat the particulars here at any length. The minimum width on the bottom is 120 feet, but between Barton and the terminus, a distance of $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles, the width on the bottom is increased to 170 feet. The depth throughout is 26 feet, but the sills of the locks are put in at a depth of 28 feet, so as to allow of further deepening should that be required.

I wish to point out the foresight shown in putting the sills at a depth of 28 feet, with the view of the possibility of the canal being deepened at some future day to that figure. I do that with the object of calling to the attention of the House the necessity of having the locks on our new canal at Soulanges constructed at a depth of 20 feet, so that we could deepen it to that extent at some future day at a comparatively small cost. We have been told that the Beauharnois Canal, being only a 9-foot canal, it would cost so much to deepen and enlarge the locks to 14 feet, that it is cheaper and better to build a new Beauharnois Canal at Soulanges. If there is anything in that argument, it will apply in the same way if at some future day we wish to increase the depth to 20 feet ; and we may have to spend at least twice the amount we are spending now on the Soulanges Canal to get the extra depth. The Manchester Canal is purely a local enterprise, which, as I mentioned before, cost, including the purchase of the Bridgewater Canal, some £15,000,000 sterling. In 1869 the Chicago 'Tribune' said that the tonnage of the great lakes was ten millions greater than the combined entrances and clearances of all the seaports of the United States, and three millions greater than the combined entrances and clearances of Liverpool and London. I mention that to show the enormous dimensions to which that trade has grown. We have the people of Brandon petitioning in favour of this canal. The people of Port Arthur are also in favour of it. I would like to read an extract from the Toronto 'Globe' of the 5th of June, 1893, as follows :—

It may be said that Welland Canal has already cost this country nearly $24,000,000, and that the cost of a greater work forbids its being undertaken. There can be no gainsaying that the question of cost is all-important, but when a certain purpose is held in view and is not attained, the efforts employed, no matter how extensive and meritorious, have been partially wasted. This is very much the position with regard to the Welland Canal. It was intended to connect Ontario with the upper lake traffic. This it has done to but a small extent. It would have been the truer economy to have expended a large sum and consummated the purpose for which the canal was undertaken, than to have spent the considerable and yet inadequate one that has only succeeded in making people inquire whether the canal is not to a large extent a failure.

The reason assigned for this is, as is well known, that every year vessels have to be lightened in order to pass through the canal. I would like also to read from the Toronto 'World' of the 10th of June, 1893, in regard to the deepening of the canal, as follows :—

The project will cost many millions, but it is a project upon which the interested countries can well afford to spend millions. People who are able to build four or five transcontinental railways can surely afford to develop a waterway stretching half way across the continent. The project of course will have its opponents. The great trunk railways, in which so many millions have been invested, will oppose the development of so gigantic a competitor for their business. The cities of New York, Baltimore and Philadelphia will naturally oppose a scheme whose realization would result in the building up of Montreal at the expense of those places. But the more opposition that arises from this quarter, the more will the necessity of the project become evident.

The 'World' then gives a quotation from Mr. J. J. Hill, who is, I believe, the president of the Great Northern Railway. He says :

I see no reason why the commerce that now seeks an outlet at Baltimore, Philadelphia, New York and Boston should not be divided, certainly equally divided, between these cities and a city on the St. Lawrence River. I see no reason why the city of Montreal should not be the commercial rival of the city of New York to an extent that is far beyond anything that most of us would think possible. The improvement of the great continental waterways would certainly, if carried to an extent that would permit ocean ships to interchange their cargoes at Montreal with the largest ships now on the lakes, make Montreal the largest shipping port on the continent.

Then they go on to say :

The Canadian North-west is greatly interested in the question. So are the people of Ontario and Quebec.

I just wish to make one more reference before I close, and that is from a pamphlet called "For Canada—Transportation, the Problem," in which the writer says :

The more the country north-west of us develops, the more do the conditions under which we have struggled with New York for trade, change in our favour, in fact, the situation is reversed. Heretofore, it has been a question of the dead weight of grain drifting northward instead of in a straight line to the more central and larger New York market ; now, it is a question of the more northerly grain drifting southward, instead of travelling along its more direct route via our river.

Until we have the river deepened, the grain will continue to drift southward, I contend. He says again :

In the main, now that the North-west country is opening up, the only rival to New York must be Montreal. The dead weight of grain raised in the Central States may easily travel in a straight line east to the seaboard, but wheat raised in the North-west will not drift south-east on its journey to northern Europe, unless forced into that eccentric line through the insanity of the people possessing the more direct and the cheaper route.

I have nothing more to say, except to urge upon the House once more the necessity of inaugurating a new canal policy. I want a practical policy instead of the one adopted twenty years ago, of 14 feet depth of water. The amount of grain has increased and the size of the ships has increased four or five-fold. A 300-ton vessel was formerly the largest navigating the upper lakes, but now they run from 1,000 up to 3,000 tons.

Mr. McKAY. I am glad the hon. gentleman has brought up this question. It is one of vital importance to the country, as everything which tends to facilitate and cheapen transportation is of vital importance. We have one of the greatest waterways in the world, one on which already large sums have been expended. No matter whether this money was judiciously expended or not, it must be admitted that the work met the requirements of the time, as regards the commerce and the size of the vessels then in vogue. But the trade of the country has grown to such an extent, and the vessels used in transport have increased in size to such an extent, that it is now necessary, in order to compete with other countries—with the United States and their means of water communication—that we should keep up with the times. At present we have an uninterrupted water communication between the great inland lakes and the ocean—some thousand of miles. The only barrier is the depth of the water and the size of the locks on the Welland and St. Lawrence River canals. If these were enlarged, as advocated by hon. gentlemen, that barrier would be removed. We could then not only do business with the Maritime Provinces, we could not only enlarge our marine in connection with that trade, but we could increase our business with any country we desired. We could have the coal and the pig iron of the Maritime Provinces brought up to the manufacturing centres of the older province—Toronto, Hamilton, and other places—where they do not reach at present. And the vessels which will carry those products may get return cargoes from the west of flour and other goods. That would tend to establish an interprovincial trade, and lead us to look upon ourselves, not as Nova Scotians or New Brunswickers, or Prince Edward Islanders, or in any provincial light of that kind, but would make us realize more

Mr. DENISON.
