Our esteemed contemporary of the "Revue du Commerce Extérieur," of Paris, publishes a remarkable article on the depression which now prevails in the United States, our neighbours, editorial, which we deem it our duty to republish. Our Parisian contemporary says, in conclusion, that "the American market has obtained such an importance that all manufacturing nations are interested in its vitality." This is quite true, for us, Canadians, amongst others. The American depression had various causes, but the chief one was that the American industry, stimulated by the McKinley Bill, enormously produced beyond the home demands, so much so that all the industrial American machinery, choked up, can only resume its working when it will have cast its over-production on the foreign markets. Here, in Canada, we are keeping a good watch.

In April, 1893, the 'American Wool and Cotton Reporter,' one of the best protectionist papers of the United States, stated:

To contend that the electoral success of one of the political parties and the failure of the other, had the effect of causing the depression to spring up in a moment, is as preposterous as to say that Paris was built in a day.

And it adds:

Do away with the cause which keeps the capital idle: extenuate the financial panic, and manufactures will resume their working.

Mr. Dolan, of Philadelphia, who is practically the father of a good many of the provisions of the McKinley Bill, said in an interview:—

"It is ridiculous to ascribe the present condition to the threatened changes in the tariff, and it is very poor tactics, from the party standpoint, to adopt a theory which will be irretrievably demolished when, the present financial cloud having passed away, there will be a general resuming of work in the manufactures that are now closed."

Those who try to-day and will again try to-morrow to disparage the United States are those who are unwilling to understand that the American market is, with respect to a certain number of our agricultural products, what the English market is with respect to another part of them: those who, under frivolous pretexts, repeatedly confuted, are seeing in reciprocity the hideous spectre of annexation; those who foretold, on the very floor of this House, that the McKinley Bill would cause no loss to our trade, that the Dominion could well do without the neighbouring market, as we would find new outlets elsewhere. Let us now, therefore, examine their prophecies by the light of facts and let us leave the disproof of their foolish assertions to men of trade and finance. I will refer the hon. members opposite to the report of the 'Chambre de Commerce du district de Montréal,' for the year 1893, pages 22, 23, 24, which read as follows:—

The merchant who has no other political ambition than the prosperity of his country, looks at things coolly and bases his argument upon figures which sometimes have a brutal eloquence which resists to any possible arguments. The politician who aims at something, is seldom at an end with arguments which are worth what they are worth, but which are sometimes used to cause chalk to pass off for cheese, with those who only see through other people's eyes. When the United States adopted the McKinley tariff, certain persons were made to believe that it was a blessing for the Dominion, that we would thereby be compelled to seek our outlets for what the United States would no more take from us. The blue-books of the parliamentary session of 1894 will give us statistics enabling us to see to what extent this expectation or this wish, was realized. On one respect, Providence favoured us by giving us a good hay harvest, which was utterly wanting in a great part of Europe. We succeeded in finding an outlet in Great Britain, and France especially, for that article, which, up to now, we exported to the United States. But we must not delude ourselves and think that it will always be so. A drought does not occur every year in Great Britain. Happily for us, there is an appearance of improvement in the condition made to us by the McKinley tariff, and a readjustment of the American tariff will partially re-open to us the doors of the United States, where we will send the surplus of our harvests, as we formerly did. We must not lose sight of the fact that our neighbours are our best customers.

We referred, a moment ago, to the eloquence of figures. Let us illustrate by this means what the McKinley tariff cost us, and whether we compensated our losses by our exports on the European markets; for, as was seen up to now and as will be seen hereafter, it is Europe which absorbs in greater part the surplus of our productions, and when I say Europe, I ought rather to say Great Britain, for the German, French and Belgian markets take but a small part of it compared with Great Britain. The following is a comparative statement of the exports of the Dominion to the United States for the years 1890 and 1892:

| Horses | $1,887,895 | $1,094,461 | $793,434 |

I will now give to the hon. the Minister of Public Works, the pleasure of dealing with him for a few moments. At a great public meeting held in Montreal, the hon. Minister stated, according to 'Le Monde,' of the 19th December last:

We know what the country wants: we are following its growth and its new requirements, and, let us say the word, we are actuated by a wise and intelligent opportunism.

The changes in the tariff, effected after an earnest inquiring into our condition, will give satisfaction to all: to the manufacturers, to the merchant, to the farmers and the workingmen. Justice to all—that is our motto.

If we are to judge, Mr. Speaker, by the numerous complaints which made themselves heard since the new revision is known; if we are to judge by the opinions expressed by the business men, through the press and especially the 'Star' in its editorial of yesterday night on coal oil; if we are to judge by the numerous and constant deputations sent to the Government, I very much fear that the "wise opportunist policy" of the hon. Minister should not satisfy a single individual, excepting, of course, the favoured monopolist. Indeed, the labouring classes, Sir, were clamouring for the abolition of combines and monopolies. Well, the new tariff still protects them. The agricultural classes, Sir, wanted the free importation of agricultural implements, of coal oil, of corn, of binding twine, and of a great number of other well known articles. Well, the new tariff, while acknowledging their just complaints, decline to comply with their so legitimate claim. Here are, therefore, the two most numerous classes of our people which should not and could not be satisfied with this new "opportunist" policy. Should they, at least, be satisfied with our financial condition and our commercial progress? No, Mr. Speaker. The Trade and Navigation Returns which are just published show that the foreign commerce of the Dominion is $10 per capita less now than under the Mackenzie rule. True, the customs duties increased nearly a dollar per head. True, the public debt increased from 126 millions to 300 millions. True, also, the interest on the debt increased from 5 to 9 millions a year. The Conservatives, who are not particular, call that a "satisfactory" result. The enormous expenditure we made for our railways, our canals, our ports, our lines of steamers, ought to have increased our trade and it has decreased. The millions expended for the last twenty years for immigration ought to have increased our exports and developed the purchase power of our people. Instead of that, the citizens of the Dominion, man for man, buy and sell less than under the Mackenzie Government. The advocates of the protective system state that our interprovincial trade has increased. Instead of that, we find that the farmers have decreased in number, which shows a decrease in production and, consequently, in exchange. They tried to subsidize a line of steamers in order to establish a trade with the West Indies; large sums of money were expended, and yet our trade was less last year than ten years ago, and we sold less to the West Indies than twenty years ago. Australia attracts the attention of our rulers, and yet, the Dominion exported there $378,000 in 1878 and $288,000 only in 1893. Our exports to Newfoundland were less last year than twenty years ago. Our imports were about the third of what they were twenty years ago. In 1873, the commerce of the Dominion with Newfoundland was $4,609,552, and in 1893 it had fallen to $3,247,903. From 1873 to 1882, our trade with Great Britain was larger than from 1883 to 1892. The people are now well informed as to the facts I have just referred to, for, while the perambulating campaign of the Government were travelling through the country to advocate the doctrines of "opportunism" instead of collecting the information they were so much in need of, the hon. leader of the Opposition went likewise travelling through the country. His political tour, in Ontario as well as in Quebec, was everywhere a triumphal one. Everywhere the people hailed in him their liberator as Thiers was that of France, everywhere the people hailed in him the future First Minister of the Dominion. And hardly had some weeks elapsed after last session when the county of Vaudreuil declined to believe any more in the wise "opportunist" policy of the hon. Minister of Public Works; and hardly some weeks before the present session, the same policy received a similar blow in the city, yet so Tory, of Winnipeg! Indeed, the Government might resign themselves, his friends might yet be weaned from their errors, for it is never too late to acknowledge one's faults and be converted, but the bewitching charm of protection is now broken. From one ocean to the other, the "opportunist" policy of the Government is known, the same as the origin of the colossal fortunes heaped up by some monopolists to the detriment of the popular classes. And when the trumpet shall sound the calling under arms, we will be ready to answer to its appeal. Under the guidance of a leader enjoying a proverbial honesty, divested by his councils, obedient to his orders, showing his aspirations and his hopes for the future, we trust that the coming electoral contest cannot but be the positive condemnation of the protective, that is the monopolist, opportunist and corrupting system which the Dominion endures the last fifteen years.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, I am sorry that I could not follow the admirable address delivered by the hon. gentleman who preceded me (Mr. Bruneau). It is not my intention at this time to trouble the House at any great length; however, on an occasion of this kind when there is a question of such magnitude affecting the interests of the people of this Dominion before the House, I do not think that I should give only a silent vote. I am glad to know that we have now a clear and distinct issue between the two political parties in this country. The Minister of Finance in his Budget speech has announced the policy of the Government to be one of protection, and the tariff as proposed to be amended shows clearly that he has carried out that feature of his policy. The question, therefore, is no longer a disputed one. The Conservative party adhere to their policy adopted fifteen years ago, and they now propose to continue that policy in the future. The Minister of Finance has stated that his party would stand by the old policy of protection which has on several occasions carried them to victory. The policy of the Liberal party as announced in the motion of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), clearly lays down the issue between the two political parties, and on that issue I think we may safely appeal to the great electorate of the Dominion of Canada. The policy that has been set forth in this amendment is one that meets with my entire approval. I do not believe in the system of protection at all; I believe that the manufacturers of this country, with the facilities that they have, with the energy, push and enterprise that they have displayed in the past, are able to hold their own with the manufacturers of any other countries in the world. Our facilities for manufacturing in Canada are unrivalled. We have everything that can contribute to a manufacturer producing his goods cheaply; in fact I believe that our manufacturers are to-day producing at a very low rate. The Minister of Railways stated to the House a few evenings ago that the manufacturers, especially of cotton and woollen goods, were able to compete with any in the world, and he further said that the cotton manufacturers in the city represented by the hon. leader of the Opposition were producing almost entirely for export to China, and that the woollen manufacturers were doing the same thing. Is that not proof positive, that if those manufacturers are able to export their goods to China and other remote markets and there meet with competitors on even terms, that they should be able to compete successfully in the home market? I do not believe that there is any question that they cannot do so. I see no reason, for instance, why the cotton manufacturers cannot produce goods as cheaply in Canada as do manufacturers in any other part of the world. He can get his raw material free of duty as he has been getting it; the freight on a carload of cotton from the Southern States to his factory, be it at Valleyfield or Cornwall or any other point in Canada, is about the same as to any part of the United States; and certainly his labour is as cheap, his facilities for receiving and transshipping his goods are as perfect as in any other country. Why then, need the manufacturers of Canada fear foreign competition in their own market? I, therefore, believe that the time has come when we should adopt a system of tariff for revenue only. There should be no privileges given by our fiscal policy to one class over another. Of course in adopting a revenue tariff there would necessarily be a little incidental protection, but that is the only protection that should be given. Our manufacturers for a number of years have enjoyed a very large protection on their goods, and they should now be able to stand alone. But, Sir, in considering the proposition of the Finance Minister we have to consider the question as he placed it before the House. He now proposes to raise a revenue of about $36,500,000 or $37,000,000, to carry on the affairs of this country for the next year, and although we may differ as to the means by which he proposes to raise that revenue—and we do differ, and differ widely on that point—yet there is a great deal to be said in reference to the large amount of money that has to be so raised. The cry has gone forth throughout the length and breadth of this Dominion that expenses should be cut down, but that cry seems not to have yet reached our Government. You could hardly find a city or a town or municipality in the country that has not, during the last year, been economizing by reducing expenses in every way and lightening the burdens of the people, and I believe it to be well that this Government should follow the example of the municipalities and endeavour to see how they can also reduce expenses. It seems to me that the enormous sum of $37,000,000 for the purpose simply of carrying on the affairs of a country with a population of 5,000,000, is altogether far beyond what ought to be necessary, and I will be able to show where there has been a very great deal of extravagance and unnecessary expenditure. Let us consider this state of facts. In the year 1878-79, the last year of the Mackenzie Government, they raised $22,500,000 and they spent about $23,500,000, so that there was a deficit in that year of about $1,000,000; but they carried on the affairs of the country for that amount. In contrast with that, our present Government last year took out of the pockets of the people $38,169,000. You will bear in mind, Mr. Speaker, that since 1878-79 we have not enlarged our domain at all; we have the same territory now to govern as we had then, and we have only about half a million more people, so that we find that in a period of fourteen years this Government have increased the charges on the people to the alarming extent of 70 per cent. During the last fourteen years this Government has taken out of the pockets of the people—over and above what would have been taken if the expenditure remained as it was in the days of the Mackenzie Administration,—not less a sum than $170,000,000. Consider this enormous amount, and then add to it the expenses that have been incurred in other ways and I ask: Is it any wonder that the people of this country feel grievously the heavy burdens that have been placed upon them. It may be said by the Government and its supporters that this amount was necessary to enlarge our canals, to erect our public buildings and to bonus our railways; but, Mr. Speaker, during that time not one solitary dollar of that $170,000,000 went to any of these purposes. We have increased the public debt during the last fourteen years by $126,000,000. If that money had been spent in enlarging our canals, building our railways, and erecting our public buildings, something might be said for it; but there has been $170,000,000 taken out of the pockets of the people more than ought to have been taken, simply to grease the wheels of the state and carry on the affairs of the Government. If that large amount of money was necessary for carrying on the affairs of the Government as they should be carried on, no person could object; but when we look over the expenditures of the Government, I think no one can deny that a very large proportion of that money has been unnecessarily and improperly spent. Take, for instance, the maintenance of the Indians, who are wards of the Government. In 1878-79 that service cost us $489,000; in 1892 it cost $956,000, an increase in fourteen years of $467,000, or 95 per cent, although everybody knows that the Indians are decreasing in number in the North-west, and that we have not so many to care for now as we had fourteen years ago. Moreover, it is well known that a large amount of this money never reaches the Indians at all. I believe that one-half of the money now expended, if properly distributed, and applied to the purposes for which it is voted by Parliament, would do far more good than the whole amount that is expended. Then, for the administration of justice, the expenditure in 1878-79 was $578,000, while in 1892-93 it was no less than $736,000, an increase of $158,000, or 28 per cent in those fourteen years. In other words, we have taken out of the pockets of the people during that time no less than $1,160,000 under that head more than would have been taken had the expenditure remained at what it was in 1878-79. Nobody will say that such a large amount is required for that service. We know that this Government for the purpose of finding places for their clients and hangers-on, have appointed deputy judges all over the province of Ontario. There is scarcely a county in that province which is not to-day provided with two judges.

Mr. MONTAGUE. How many are provided with deputy judges?

Mr. CAMPBELL. If you look at the reports, as you ought to, you will find out exactly.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Not one in five.

Mr. MULOCK. Far more than are required. There are three in some counties.

Mr. MONTAGUE. That is where there is a great deal of crime, as in the county of York.

Mr. CAMPBELL. We have a deputy judge in the county of Kent. How is this increase accounted for? Simply by extravagance—by the appointment of useless men in positions where they are not needed. I venture to say that you could dismiss every deputy judge in the province of Ontario to-day, and have the work carried on as well as it is carried on now. In fact, in the county of Kent, the senior judge, when asked by the Government if he wanted an assistant, replied that he did not—that he was able to carry on the work better alone; and yet an old hanger-on of the Government was forced on that county, and on the country, at a salary of $2,000 a year, and $200 for travelling expenses. So, you may go through the counties of Elgin, Essex, Weillington, and Bruce, and you will find the same reckless extravagance going on. Under the head of civil government, the expenditure in 1878-79 was only $861,000; last year it ran up $1,367,000, an increase of 58 per cent in the last fourteen years. Under that head alone, the Government have taken out of the pockets of the people no less than $4,193,000 more than would have been taken had the old expenditure of the Mackenzie Administration been maintained. This has been caused largely by the wanton and reckless manner in which the affairs of the Government have been conducted during that time. Under the head of legislation our expenditure in 1878-79 was $748,000; last year it had run up to $867,000, an increase of $119,000, or 16 per cent in those fourteen years, the total aggregate increase in that time being $595,000. For the protection of our fisheries in the Maritime Provinces, the province of Ontario, and the North-west, the expenditure in 1878-79 was $82,300; last year we spent for the same service no less than $482,000, an increase in those fourteen years of no less than 485 per cent. Is there any man who will justify such an increase in the expenditure for that service in so short a time? In those fourteen years we have spent no less than $3,000,000 more for that service than would have been spent had the rate of expenditure of 1878-79 been continued. The militia expenditure in 1878-79 was $618,000; last year it was $1,419,000, an increase of no less than 129 per cent. In those fourteen years the Government have taken out of the pockets of the people for that service no less than $8,900,000 more than would have been taken had the expenditure remained as it was in 1878. The expenditure under the head of superannuation has increased in the last fourteen years no less than 132 per cent—from $113,000 in 1878-79 to $263,000 last year. Now, I think that such an expenditure on the part of this Government, or any other, cannot be justly defended. You can scarcely take up a paper, you can seldom take up the Toronto 'Empire' or the Ottawa 'Daily Citizen,' without finding that some well-paid officer, who has been feeding at the public crib for many years, has just been superannuated at a very large allowance. Only the other day Mr. Vankoughnet—a gentleman who received a large salary for many years—was superannuated. There is no branch of the public service in which there is so much extravagance and so much money voted, without producing practically any result to the people. I hope the Bill to abolish superannuation brought by the hon. member for Wellington (Mr. McMullen), will receive the sanction of the House and become law. Take under the head of miscellaneous expenditure, and what do we find there? We find the same reckless extravagance and expenditure. In 1878-78 the expenditure amounted to $91,000. Last year it reached the enormous sum of $284,000, an increase of no less than 212 per cent in fourteen years. Take the North-west Mounted Police. We find that the expenditure has increased by 79 per cent. In 1878 it was $344,000; last year it was $615,000, an increase of $270,000 in the last fourteen years, or 79 per cent. I ask you, whether there can be any possible reason why this expenditure should go on increasing instead of diminishing? Is there the same necessity to-day for the North-west Mounted Police as there was fourteen years ago? The country is settled up, and there is no longer the necessity for the expenditure required fourteen years ago. It can only be by a system of reckless, wanton mismanagement that this expenditure has gone on increasing from year to year at the enormous rate it has. Take the management of our Dominion lands, and what do we find? We find the expenditure in 1878-79 was $91,000. Last year it had risen to $136,000, or an increase of $45,000 in the last fourteen years, or 48 per cent. Yet we have not as many Dominion lands now to manage as we had fourteen years ago, and one would naturally expect that the expenditure would decrease instead of increase. There are vast blocks of territory, now locked up by the Canadian Pacific Railway and other companies in the North-west, and yet we find that the expenditure went up 48 per cent in those years. Under the head of penitentiaries, we find that the expenditure has gone up from $108,000 in 1878-79 to $346,000 last year, showing an increase of $238,000. The same extravagance is going on in the Customs Department. There our expenditure has increased from $719,000 to $902,000 in the last fourteen years, being an increase of $182,000, or 25 per cent. Go on through all the different items for which public money is asked, and you will find that in nearly every one large increases have taken place. It becomes, therefore, the duty of this House to inquire carefully into these matters and see if some reduction cannot be made. In a great many of these items, as I have already said, increases have taken place where there ought to be decreases. When you consider the enormous increase in the total expenditure, is it to be wondered at that the people feel hardly the burden placed upon them by this Government? A good deal has been said as to the new tariff. The Government claim that they are lightening the burden of the people by the reductions they have made. So far as I have been able to understand the changes, while I am glad to see in some respects they are actually to be of benefit to the people, yet, take them as a whole, there is nothing to boast of. Instead of there being a deficit of $1,500,000, as the Finance Minister predicts, I believe the new tariff will yield more revenue than was collected last year. Under those circumstances, it is well this House should consider whether some permanent radical reductions should not be made, and I hope these will be made when we come into Committee of the Whole, and thus lighten the burdens of the people. I believe the time has come when the principle of protection to our manufacturers should be eliminated altogether from our tariff. I believe that any manufacturing industry which cannot stand with the protection necessarily given it by a revenue tariff, ought to go to the wall altogether and give place to some other that can. I have listened very attentively to the addresses delivered by gentlemen on the other side, notably that delivered by the Controller of Customs in a very eloquent speech, which that hon. gentleman made a few evenings ago. He claimed a great deal of credit for the old National Policy. He claimed that the National Policy was building up the manufacturing industries of this country; and he cited, as a feature of that tariff to be commended, the fact that our exports had largely increased to the old country, while they had been constantly decreasing to the United States. It seemed to me, at the time, rather a curious argument, to cite the fact that our exports had been increasing to Great Britain while they had been decreasing to the United States, as an evidence of the beneficial effects of the National Policy. Why, Sir, the reason is plain why our exports have been increasing to Great Britain. It is simply because they could not get into the United States. If the Americans were to charge 10 cents a dozen on eggs, instead of 5 cents, I venture to say that no eggs at all would go to the United States, and they would go to the country which afforded the very best market. And again, if you take any one of the articles that we have been exporting to Great Britain, and the export of which has been increasing, you will find that the increase is due, not to the fact that Great Britain is our best market, but because it was the best market under the circumstances. The Canadian people know best where they can get the most money for their goods. They do not care whether they send them to England, or to the United States, or to Spain, or Germany, or France. What they want is to send them to the country where the most money can be got in return. The reason we sent 99,000 head of cattle to Great Britain last year and only 402 head to the United States, is because we got more money for our cattle in Great Britain. If the duty had been taken off and our cattle admitted into the United States on the same terms as into England, in all probability the figures would be largely changed. Yet, notwithstanding the fact that the duties are heavy on goods going into the United States, and that no duties are charged on goods going into Great Britain, the people of Canada find that the markets of the United States are still their best markets for many things they have to sell. Take, for instance, horses. We sent only 1,946 head of horses, all told, to Great Britain last year, and, to the United States, we sent 10,606 head. An hon. gentleman stated in the House last night that the markets of the United States were flooded with horses, that there was no sale for horses over there. What, then, is Canada doing sending over 10,000 head to the United States, if the market there is glutted? The market may be glutted, and the price low, but still we can get more money by sending our horses to the United States and paying the duty than by sending them to any other country in the world. We would not send them to the United States if we could find a better market elsewhere. This is why, in spite of the enormous duty upon horses, the great majority of our horses go to the United States rather than England. Then take the item of cheese. We sent 133,559,110 pounds to Great Britain, and we sent only 163,664 pounds to the United States. Why? Because there is a duty of 5 cents a pound on cheese going into the United States, while there is no duty on cheese sent to England. I believe that if that duty were taken off, if the markets of the United States were opened to our people as well as the markets of Great Britain, we should find that a large proportion of our cheese would go to the United States; instead of seeking a market over 3,000 miles away. Take another instance—the case of wool. We did not send one solitary pound of wool to England last year, notwithstanding the fact that it is admitted to that market free. On the other hand, in sending to the United States, our wool must pay a duty of 12 cents a pound, and yet we sent to the United States, 1,167,360 pounds. The simple reason for this is that we can get more money for our wool in that market than by sending it to England. Then again, we exported of beans to the United States 273,354 bushels, and we did not send one solitary bushel to Great Britain. And this, notwithstanding that there is a duty of 40 cents a bushel on beans going into the United States, and they are admitted free to the British market. This shows either that the people of Canada do not know their own business or that the markets of the United States are the best for us and will yield us the most money. Of hay we sent to Great Britain 50,892 tons, while to the United States we sent 94,282 tons, although there was a duty of $4 a ton on hay going into the United States market, while the other market was free. What conclusion can we come to but this—that the United States market is the best market for our hay? Our export of potatoes is an example of the same kind. We sent to the free market of Great Britain 5,876 bushels, while we sent to the United States, and paid the duty on them, no less than 800,225 bushels, and we got more by sending them to that market and paying the duty than we would have got by sending them to any other market in the world. Then take our barley trade. That trade has been almost ruined during the last few years owing to the high duty placed upon that particular cereal by the American Government. Last year we sent to Great Britain 550,695 bushels of barley, and, in spite of the high duty charged, we sent 1,431,398 bushels to the United States. The duty of 30 cents a bushel upon barley could not keep us out of the United States market, because there was no other market that would pay us as well. I suppose that if the Americans were to double that duty, making it 60 cents a bushel, we should not be able to send our barley there, but should be obliged to sell it in the old country at a lower price, and then the Controller of Customs would get up and cite that fact as one of the great benefits that the National Policy was working in this country. Now, another article we find it very profitable to send to the United States is sheep. We sent 337,718 head of sheep to the United States last year. There was a duty of $1 and $1.50 on every one of the sheep sent into that country, and no duty on those sent to the old country. Yet, to the old country we sent only 14,812 head, all told. This shows clearly that our best market for that kind of product is in the United States. Now, Mr. Speaker, in my opinion the Government are greatly to blame for the way in which they have managed the affairs of this country during the last few months. I refer particularly to this fact: it is undoubtedly true that reciprocity would be a benefit to this country. I do not think that any hon. gentleman, except the hon. member for Kent, N.B. (Mr. McInerney), will dissent from that proposition. That hon. gentleman, I believe, told this House that the reciprocity treaty in force from 1854 to 1866 was a detriment to the people of this country.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) "An unmixed evil."

Mr. CAMPBELL. Exactly—"An unmixed evil," he said. I have never heard any hon. gentleman inside or outside of this House say that if we could get a renewal of the reciprocity treaty in force from 1854 to 1866, it would not be a benefit to this country. The Ministers, when they went down to Washington to negotiate a treaty a few months ago, proposed to the Americans the renewal of the old treaty, but this was rejected, and the proposition was made by the American Government to enter into a reciprocity treaty that would embrace, not only the natural products of either country, but a certain list of manufactured goods to be agreed upon. And I believe our Government is greatly to blame for neglecting that opportunity to arrange a reciprocity treaty that would be favourable to this Dominion. A short time ago an election took place in the United States, and the Democratic party was returned to power by an enormous majority, upon the distinct promise that they would eliminate from the United States tariff the protective principle, and bring about a revenue tariff. Then, in my opinion, was the opportunity of opportunities, then was the time for the Government of this country to attempt the negotiation of a treaty of reciprocity that would be fair and beneficial to the people of this country. But, instead of taking advantage of the chance offered, they did not turn a hand, they did not move a muscle toward the negotiation of a treaty. The time was opportune, and the interests of the people of Canada demanded that, if possible, an arrangement should be made which would permit our producers to the market of the United States. I am sure the people of this country would hail with joy a measure that would open up such a market for our cereal and other products. In spite of all the tariff walls that have been erected by this Government and the American Government, in spite of the enormous tariff duties levied upon their goods, the people of this country found it to be to their advantage to buy from the United States no less than $58,000,000 worth of goods last year, while in the same time we bought from England only $43,000,000 worth. Moreover, the people of the United States found it to their interest to buy from us, in spite of the enormous duties charged by their own laws, no less than $44,000,000, while England took $64,000,000 of our products. In spite of these barriers the people of this country and the people of the United States find it to their advantage to trade thus extensively together. The enormous extent of this trade proves that if these barriers were removed and trade allowed to flow freely between these two countries, marked prosperity and progress would be the happy lot of this Dominion. Situated so favourably as Canada is, and with the vast natural resources she enjoys, there is no country in this wide world that ought to make such progress as the Dominion of Canada. Yet I am sorry to say that the progress Canada has made during the past few years has been nothing at all like what she ought to have made. We were all astonished at the results of the census when we found that the beautiful province of Ontario, a province that cannot be equalled or excelled by any state in the American Union, with all the advantages it enjoyed, being right on the highway between the great west and the east, with its immense agricultural and mineral resources, with its vast rivers and lakes, affording it easy access to the American market—yet with all those advantages that province only increased its population in the last ten years by 186,000; while the little state of Michigan to the west of the province, a state that cannot be compared for a moment with the province of Ontario, increased its population by no less than 476,000 in the same period of time. Then come to the east, and you will find the city of Buffalo alone has increased its population almost as much as the whole province of Ontario did in the last ten years; and the state of New York has also increased at a very much faster rate. I say that the census has shown and demonstrated the fact that there is something radically wrong with the Government of this country, or with the fiscal policy of this country. There is only one way to bring back prosperity to this country, and that is to relieve the people of the burdens that have been imposed upon them. The great agricultural interests of the country have been hampered and depressed; our farmers have not been allowed to sell their goods in the dearest market, and they have not been allowed to buy their products in the cheapest market, and thus the candle is burning at both ends. They pay more for what they have to buy, and get less for what they have to sell. The taxes this Government has imposed upon the farmers, amounting to $170,000,000 in the last fourteen years, have fallen heavily upon them, and have depressed their condition. It is no wonder there is a cry rising up all over this Dominion for the redress of these grievances. Why, Sir, we find that the Patrons of Industry, the institution of the Grangers throughout the Dominion, and the Central Farmers' Institute, have sent petition after petition here; one petition I remember was presented bearing the names of over 20,000 farmers of the province of Ontario, asking this Government to come to their relief. The only way you can bring back prosperity to this Dominion is to commence at the fountain head and relieve the great agricultural interest of the burdens now weighing upon them. Give them an open market in which to sell their goods, give them the cheapest market in which to buy their goods. Bring back prosperity to those interests, and you will increase the products of the farm. The moment you increase the revenues of the farm, you increase the value of the land; the moment you increase the prosperity of the farmers, you bring back thousands of men who have emigrated from this country. Why is it that a million native-born Canadians are to be found in the United States? They did not leave this Canada of ours because they did not like the country, they did not leave this Canada of ours because they did not like the flag that floated over this Dominion as well as the flag that floated over a foreign land. They left this country because they had opportunities presented to them in the United States that were denied them at home; it was because they saw there a way to increase their prosperity, and thus, driven out, as it were, by the Government of this country, by the burdens that were placed upon them, they have taken up their abode in foreign lands. The only way we can arrest this movement of emigration and bring back those who have left us, is to relieve the farmers of the burdens that now press so heavily upon them. Increase the revenues that come from the farm, and you will draw back from the towns and cities those who have left the farms and settled in those centres; you will draw back from foreign countries those who have left their homes and taken up their abode under a foreign flag. By increasing the prosperity of the great agricultural interests, the whole country will feel the effects, immediately the cities and towns will prosper, and our manufacturers will be able to dispose of more goods. This you can only do by reducing these obnoxious burdens. You must at once take off those burdens, you must decrease the expenditure of this country. There is no necessity for $37,000,000 being spent every year to grease the wheels of state. There are a thousand ways in which you can reduce the expenditure. What need have we of that military college at Kingston that is costing the people of this country $75,000 a year? How many people are ever benefited by that college? Where are the students that have graduated there? We have no occasion for employing them here. If time permitted I could point out many other ways in which the burdens of the people and expenses of this country could be largely reduced. In the main Estimates presented to the House, we find a proposed vote of $200,000 to revise the voters' list. It will cost the Government of this country at least another $100,000 before that revision takes place; and I venture to say that it will cost the two parties of this country, the Conservative party and the Reform party, at least $100,000 more. There are $500,000 that you are going to take out of the pockets of the people of this country to prepare a voters' list, and you have got a better voters' list now in your own hands that has not cost the people of this country one dollar. And yet for the sake of manipulating these 215 revising barristers and their clerks, and all the paraphernalia of an election court, the Government are bound to impose the expenditure on the people. Then I may refer to the immigration policy of the Government. We find this year in the Estimates a sum of $200,000 to induce immigration to this country. Why, Sir, we cannot keep the people here that we have got. We have been spending in the last ten years three or four million dollars to induce immigrants to come here, nearly all of whom, after landing at Montreal and Quebec, find their way through Canada into another country. Why do not you make the conditions of life in this country as free, as broad and as liberal, as they can be found in any other country? Then you will not need to expend $200,000 or $300,000 a year to entice immigrants to come to this country. When we look at the privileges this beautiful Canada of ours offers to immigrants, with a virgin soil, with the wealth of minerals and of forests, there is no reason why the stream of immigration should not be diverted to this country; and it would be diverted hither if you only made the conditions of life easy, if you only made the chances of gaining a livelihood as good as they are to be found in other countries.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (No. 20) respecting the Wood Mountain and Qu'Appelle Railway Company.—(Mr. McDonald, Assinibola.)

Bill (No. 21) to incorporate the St. Clair and Erie Ship Canal Company.—(Mr. Tisdale.)

Bill (No. 22) respecting the Winnipeg and Hudson Bay Railway Company, and to change the name thereof to The Winnipeg Great Northern Railway Company.—(Mr. Ross, Lisgar.)

Bill (No. 23) respecting ordinance No. 32 of 1893, of the North-west Territories, empowering the municipality of the town of Edmonton to construct and operate a tramway.—(Mr. Davis.)

WAYS AND MEANS—THE TARIFF.

Mr. AMYOT. I rise to offer a few remarks in regard to the question of the tariff now before the House. If I were to follow the example of some of the hon. gentlemen who have preceded me, if I were to answer all the arguments that have been adduced and refer to all the facts that have been alluded to, I should be occupied during several sittings of this House, because I think the whole political history of the confederation has been touched upon. I shall endeavour as far as possible to confine myself to the question before the House. The question, and the only question now is, shall we accept the modifications of the tariff proposed? We all admit there must be a revenue; we all admit that any organized country requires money for the ordinary expenses of administration and for the salaries of the public service. The Conservative Government, since 1878, have declared: We will raise a revenue, and at the same time grant protection to home industries. The Opposition to-day have declared: We will raise a revenue without regard to home industries; that I understand to be the programme of the Opposition, in the light of the amendment proposed in this House. The amendment states that the modifications "being based upon the principle of protection and not solely upon the requirements of the public service, are inadequate to afford satisfactory relief from the burden of excessive and unfair taxation." Further, it states: "The tariff should be reduced to the needs of honest, economical, and efficient government, and should have eliminated from it the principle of protection to particular industries at the expense of the community at large, and should be imposed for revenue only." So the question before the House and the country is simplified as much as possible. The Government say: We want to maintain the principle of protection, and combine that principle with the collection of a revenue sufficient to meet the requirements of the public treasury. The Opposition answer: We will not protect home industries, we cannot do it without doing injustice to the country, we will raise the revenue without regard to home industries. In June, 1893, there was a great convention of the Grit or Liberal party, held in this city. The National Policy was then denounced, and the leader of the Opposition declared that it was a fraud and a failure. Then the hon. leader of the Opposition went on to say:

The ideal fiscal system was the British system of free trade, and it was the policy of the Liberal party to get as near that idea as the requirements of the revenue would permit. Free trade was the goal towards which they should struggle. If we could not adopt free trade in its entirety we could, at least, adopt a principle as the basis of fiscal legislation. He preferred to go to Great Britain rather than to McKinley for example. No taxation should be levied except for revenue purposes and every cent taken from the people by the tariff should go into the public treasury. Not a single dollar of taxation should be imposed upon the country for protection purposes. The Tory idea was protection, the Liberal idea was free trade, and upon that issue he was prepared to engage in battle with the ministerial lists. Reciprocity of trade was required with the United States.

And then the resolution adopted at the convention condemned the tariff because the tariff discriminated against Great Britain. That is not exactly the motion that is proposed now by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), nor is it exactly in harmony with the policy that the Liberals previously announced. If we go farther back, we find that on the 12th February, 1891, the leader of the Opposition issued a programme to the electors of the Dominion, and in that programme he said this:

The proposed reform is an absolute reciprocity, a liberty of commerce between Canada and the United States.

That is still another plank in their platform. I may say here, Mr. Speaker, that this programme of 1891, advocating reciprocity with the United States would be, to my mind, a very good move for Canada if we could obtain it. I have already said in this House and in the country, and I repeat it here tonight: We must protect ourselves against the States so long as they will protect themselves against us. The day they will open their doors to us we will open our doors to them; but have the United States thrown their doors open to our trade? For a short period after the last elections, we hoped that the United States would adopt free trade, and that we would be benefited by it, but public sentiment in that country has pressed so much upon Congress that they are returning to the old system of protection; and to-day, as in the year 1891, and as at any time since confederation, we cannot obtain reciprocity from the United States without being politically annexed to them. I for one am not ready to vote for annexation with the States. I believe that Canada has a grand future in its destiny; I believe in our resources; I believe in the public spirit of the Canadian people; I believe that we have institutions here which are dear to every one of us, and I believe that we are able to fight our battles throughout the centuries as an independent people.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Royal.

Mr. AMYOT. Yes; loyal to England so long as England will act towards us as she has done in the past. I believe in the protection of England for the Canadian flag on the seas. I believe in the army of England to protect us against any injustice from the United States. Yes, Sir, loyal to the Queen, most decidedly, as the Queen is loyal to us, and that is one of the reasons why I would not be in favour of annexation. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Mills) is surprised to hear of a Frenchman being loyal. It is the very essence of a French-Canadian to be loyal to the Queen; they have been brought up to that.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman will permit me to correct him. I did not use the word "loyal," I used the word "royal." I referred to the pamphlet that his friend has published.

Mr. AMYOT. I understood the hon. gentleman to say "loyal," but I suppose Royal belongs to the Royal family, and he has permission to do what he likes, but I am not responsible for the Royal family. Mr. Speaker, I believe that reciprocity with the United States cannot be obtained without our sacrificing our identity as a people, and therefore, for my part, I have erased that word from my programme, and, having always been a protectionist, I returned to the protective party.

Mr. BRODEUR. For how long?

Mr. AMYOT. I might answer, that so long as I see people with such little strength of mind composing the Liberal party, I will belong to the other side. We had another one of those eloquent speeches from the hon. leader of the Opposition at St. Thomas, Ont., and he said there:

I want to make a confederation of the Anglo-Saxon element.

The hon. gentleman wanted all the English-speaking people of the earth joined together, in a partnership under commercial union. It will be seen that we, therefore, have before us many programmes formulated by the Liberal party. We have free trade adopted and accepted by the chief of the Opposition, and I ask myself, how can free trade and reciprocity with the States, which means protection against the rest of the world, agree together? I never could understand that. Free trade means the free entry of goods into this country from any other country, and that cannot possibly agree with reciprocity with the United States. We have heard hon. gentlemen of the Opposition reproach the Government for discriminating against England. Well, if they had reciprocity with the United States they would have to discriminate against England, and I cannot see how they can reconcile both lines of policy. There are those who ask for the federation of the Empire, but that would not mean free trade. It would mean commercial reciprocity with England, Scotland, Ireland, and all the British possessions; and that system and reciprocity with the United States would not work together. Some gentlemen of the Liberal party ask for commercial union, others want annexation, and we have all sorts of propositions and all sorts of programmes put forward by them to allure the people. It can truthfully be said that the Liberal party in this country and in the House have accepted all the programmes, possible and impossible. They have accepted free trade, revenue tariff, commercial union, political union; they have accepted the annexationists and the federalists, and all other "ists," except the nationalists, by which I mean those who work for the good of their own country. Amongst the members of the Liberal party in this House I find all sorts of elements. I find in the ranks of the Liberal party those who want to take away the liberties of the minorities, guaranteed by the constitution in Manitoba and the North-west Territories; those who want to prevent the French language being spoken in North America; those who want to deprive the provinces of their autonomy; those who want the Government to interfere in the question of the schools of Manitoba in spite of the courts of justice; those who oppose the surplus. They are all found in the ranks of the Opposition, whose vast political programme, like a magnificent tent and flag, covers everything that is proposed. It reminds me of one of those doctors who sometimes go about with a bottle of medicine, crying out: Have you got toothache, or rheumatism, or dyspepsia, or neuralgia? Is your hair falling? Have you fever or small-pox? Here is my bottle. But one says: "I am not sick; I won't have your bottle." But the doctor says: "Do take it, because if you won't, you will be sick." The plan to recruit the army of the Opposition is very skilful. Here is one gentleman who says: "My dear chief, I want free trade; I want no barriers; I want every good thing to come freely into this country." "All right, my boy," says the leader of the Opposition, "I am your man; I have laid in a stock for you." Another comes along and says: "I am in favour of annexation; I do not see why we should pull any more with Great Britain; I want to pull with that magnificent people in the United States;" and the hon. leader of the Opposition says: "All right my boy, come along; I have got what you want." Another says: "I want Canada to be united with England per fas et nefas, to share in the glory of her fights and struggles, and her great future." "All right," he says, "come along, my boy; I have in my pocket what you want." Another comes and says: "I am in favour of a revenue tariff, and I want nothing else." "Come along, my boy; says the leader of the Opposition, "I am with you." And whoever comes, from this country or any other, with a new idea, he only needs go to the leader of the Opposition, who will tell him: "Come along, my boy; I have got what you want." If that party ever succeeds in Canada, how will it be able to redeem its pledges? Now, Mr. Speaker, the proposal of a revenue tariff, instead of the continuation of protection, is based principally upon the view that the country is not prosperous—that in the fifteen years' experience that we have had, it has proved a failure. Well, I am ready to meet the hon. gentleman on that ground. In a telegram from London, of the 7th of January, 1884, I find the following:—

The 'Financial Times' says editorially that it is satisfactory to hear that the Nova Scotian Government can announce a surplus. The Dominion also rejoices in a substantial surplus revenue. Canada seems to be the only part of the world which is not keenly suffering from the widespread depression of 1893.

This testimony, pronounced by one of the first financial papers of the world, is a testimony that cannot be refuted. Is it because we have a bad tariff that the depression felt so keenly elsewhere does not affect us? I have some other evidence. There are certain monetary institutions which are not generally misled by sentiment or affection or political bias. I refer to the banks. Let me quote a few of the remarks made by the cashier of one of those banks, La Banque du Peuple, in Montreal, before a number of the leading men in the monetary circles of that city, in March last. Mr. Bousquet said:

During the last year we have had a period of what I may call prosperity without any great inflation; the trade of the country is not growing by leaps and bounds, but is showing steady progress.

Further on he says:

It has been the custom during recent months to contrast the happy condition of the mercantile affairs in Canada with the distress which has marked all classes of trade in the United States. The record of the insolvencies sums up the contrast in a striking way; of course, we could scarcely expect to escape absolutely from the adverse influences which have wrought so much havoc among our neighbours, trading with them so largely as we do, and affected in our financial operations as we must be by the financial crisis there. Up to the present, at all events, no Canadian interest has perceptibly suffered from the crash in the United States, although, as I have already said, the business relations of the two countries are somewhat intimated and the conditions of trade in both, as a rule, run upon nearly parallel lines.

Then he refers to the enormous number of failures that had taken place in the United States, 158 national banks and 613 other financial institutions having suspended. Then he says:

But how comparatively little we have been scotched by the collapse of trade will be understood by the following figures of failures: The number of failures there was more than 50 per cent greater than last year, with liabilities of $108,000,000 in 1892 as against $382,000,000 in 1893, while in Canada the increase was only a slight fraction over 2½ per cent in number and 40 per cent in liabilities.

He then proceeds to praise our splendid banking system, which is due to the very man who proposes the present changes in the tariff, and it will be one of the greatest sources of satisfaction in his life that he brought in the law which has made our banking system perhaps the most perfect in the whole world. Mr. Bousquet continues:

For this province the trade for the year just ended has been generally prosperous, and has perhaps been more satisfactory than any for a number of years past.

Is not that prosperity? I prefer that testimony to the interested and biased testimony of political partisans, who may be very honest and sincere, but who certainly do not see things properly and clearly as they could if they were not inspired by the constant and pressing desire of seeing the leader of their party at the head of affairs. The House will pardon me if I quote at some length, but I attach a great deal of importance to the evidence of bankers, who are the best barometers of our financial condition. Mr. Bousquet goes on to say:

In looking back upon the year for the leading events which have a controlling influence on general business, we may mention, notably, the increase of the make of dairy products, the good hay crop and the unprecedented demand for its export at remunerative prices, increased activity in all branches of agriculture. These have been the first and greater factors in the general prosperity. This province, being an agricultural province, the whole community, more or less, depends on these returns, for they are the supplies of the necessities of life, that determine the movements and channel, the volume of business, and prices and profits thereon. In fact, everything farmers have raised this year has yielded profits and given good results for their labour; therefore the value of the production of the year from that source has been considerably increased and for these causes the business of the community at large and its general trade which directly depends for activity on the farmers' return has been good. The power of purchasing has been increased by the good return, and, as a natural consequence, farmers' budgets all around have been replenished. Country storekeepers have purchased very freely, and remittances from the country have been satisfactory. The sales in wholesale trade have been maintained and the volume of business has been materially over the average of last year. As a whole the situation illustrated from the balance sheets shows that returns have contributed to add something to the capital of last year.

Now, there is another portion in this paper concerning agriculture, and, as I represent a county essentially agricultural, I think it my duty to read this portion of the pamphlet, more especially as it embodies the views of the electors of my county, as far as I can judge. The paper states, that :

It must be gratifying to every one who has the interest of the farmers of the province of Quebec at heart to have learned what a splendid success has been made by cheese and butter from the province at the World's Fair. Mixed culture has been advocated since many years in this room, because it was felt that culture meant progress in business ; people live to enrich themselves and in an essentially agricultural province like ours wealth must come first from the land. The fatal mistake of our farmers of depending entirely on one crop for their living is rapidly disappearing to be replaced by the variety of products, and this year has been a year of rapid advance in the dairy industry among farmers.

I will be told, perhaps, that a banker has no business to give advice to farmers. I may be told that Mr. Bousquet, in advising the farmers to go in for mixed farming, went beyond his jurisdiction. But I am not of that opinion. I think that the day the province of Quebec gave up raising crops exclusively and took up the dairy industry—when my province began what may be called mixed farming—was a bright day for her. And I do not hesitate to say, that when the Minister of Agriculture, although he is a lawyer—which does not prevent his being an intelligent and experienced man—said to the farmers of the North-west : Do you not see that wheat-growing exclusively will not pay you, because it is grown everywhere, and will remain at low prices for a long time ? Do you not see that you should try mixed farming—I do not hesitate to say, that when the hon. Minister of Agriculture said that, he said what was perfectly right, and spoke as a true patriot, as a man who represents and understands his country and his countrymen. Mr. Bousquet applied a similar advice to the province of Quebec, and the results of mixed farming have already proved that these two gentlemen were perfectly right in their views. Mr. Bousquet said further :

There has certainly been vigour on the part of the Government or the Department of Agriculture, in fostering the necessity of improved methods in the general working of the farm to be adopted by farmers, but even the Government now would show meagre results without an active co-operation among farmers themselves. As said a well known professor whose energy, ability and devotion to the advancement of progress in agriculture makes him an authority, in answer to the question of where should the farmers look for guidance in making changes which imply progress. In reply he would say :—1st. To the agricultural societies and exhibitions which had furnished object lessons and stimulation. 2nd. To farmers' conventions, meetings of clubs and farmers' institutes, which had made the information of the leading farmers the common property of all. 3rd. To the Government experimental farms, whose experiments had a capacity of a two-fold service, " investigation for discovery and illustration for guidance."

I cannot pass this portion without reminding the House that the first gentleman who spoke of model farms in this House—the first one in Canada who suggested to the Government the propriety of establishing such farms was a Conservative. It was Mr. Gigault, who is now Deputy Minister of Agriculture in the province of Quebec. The Government accepted his idea, and it is to the Government farms that we owe the establishment in this country of the dairy industry. The Government farms opened the mind of the public to the benefits of that industry, and an inexhaustible market has been found. We have in Great Britain a market which is better for dairy products than the United States. In Great Britain there is such a dense population that her soil does not furnish enough to feed the millions of inhabitants there. They have to buy their butter and their cheese elsewhere ; and the selling of our butter and our cheese in England is worth more to the province of Quebec than reciprocity with any country in the world. It ensures the prosperity of every farmer. I shall prove in a moment our farmers in the province of Quebec pays less to-day for what they buy than they did at any other period, and at no time since Canada was discovered have they sold so profitably their products as to-day. They are, consequently, now able to give a very large price for their cows, and each cow is supposed to return from $25 to $30 clear profit. And to reap that profit the farmer has not to drive into town with his load, to spend part of his load in the same trip, but the money is brought to him in his house, and his wife has not the labour she formerly had of looking after the dairy. In this way our farmers make money and go on improving their farms ; and I can safely say that in ten years hence every farmer in the province of Quebec will be a small capitalist. He will have paid his debts to the merchants and have money deposited in the bank, and part of his load in the same trip, but the manufactures, which, when perfected with the best machinery and the most skilled labour, will be able to compete in other parts of the world and will contribute to the prosperity of the Dominion at large. But allow me, Mr. Speaker, after this digression, to complete the words of Mr. Bousquet. He says :

That this year has been a year in the good direction is undoubted, and the results are already noticeable. To the large increase of our dairy products is partly due the improvements noticeable during the last year in the general business of this province. Cheese has been an exceptionally good season, with a record of export higher than any yet recorded, and the farmers have reason to congratulate themselves. * * * Butter continues to be in favour in England, and our creameries compare favourably with those of Denmark and Ireland. There has been a foreign demand for it at remunerative prices for all we could make.

Then he speaks of the dry-goods, grocery, lumber, metal and hardware trades and says: "The general actual condition of trade is sound at bottom." This is the testimony of a man who has no interest in deceiving the people, a man who was not speaking before politicians, but dealing with the commercial community and judging of the facts according to the figures and according to the amount of money at his disposal in the institution he commands. And yet, Mr. Speaker, even after such a man has borne this testimony to the prosperity of the country, we are told that the country is not prosperous. What can we do? We cannot prevent the hon. gentlemen from saying so. They want to say that the country is not prosperous; they said so yesterday, they say so to-day, they will say so to-morrow, and, no doubt, they will go before the electors and say: Gentlemen, you are not prosperous, and you are wrong in believing that you are prosperous. Well, the majority of the people of Canada will do as they have already done; they will answer: We are prosperous; we have more money than we used to have; our farms afford us a good living and, more than that, they yield us money to send to our friends and relations in the United States to assist them to come back so that they may take farms next to us and work with us toward the same prosperity. We cannot prevent these hon. gentlemen saying the country is not prosperous. Let them go on saying so. But we know from what we see, from the testimony of the commercial institutions of the country, from the name that Canada bears in other lands that our country is prosperous. Therefore we declare to these hon. gentlemen, the reason you give against protection in the lack of prosperity in the country is not a good reason, it is not based upon facts. The second reason against the protective tariff is this: Hon. gentlemen say—and we heard it again from the hon. member for Kent, Ont. (Mr. Campbell)—the farmer pays more for what he buys by reason of the tariff. I would like the hon. gentleman to give us some figures. Would he kindly tell me what it is that costs the farmer dearer? It is all very fine to make assertions, but sometimes we must come down to proof. For my part I know that what I buy—clothing, food, and so on—costs me less than it used to do before 1878. I know that as a fact.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Double the tariff and you will pay less still.

Mr. AMYOT. The hon. gentleman does not seem yet to understand the effect of a tariff.

I will try to explain it to him in a moment. Without being a viceroy in methods of teaching, I hope to make myself understood. I have here a compilation of prices from 'The Journal of Commerce,' which shows by comparison the cost to the consumer of various goods in 1878 and in late years. I take the average prices for the year 1878, also for the year 1891 and for the year 1892. For men's thick boots, the average price in 1878 was $2.25; in 1891, $1.25; in 1892, $1.08. So I pay less for these boots; the farmer pays less; the lawyer pays less; everybody pays less. It is all very well to cry out that we pay dearer, but if when I go to buy they charge me $1.08 for an article for which in 1878 I should have paid $2.25, it is not difficult for me to come to the conclusion that there has been a reduction in price.

Now, let us take tea. Mr. Speaker, tea is consumed by the poor and the rich—by all classes—

| Tea, Japan, choicest..... | .50 | .43 | .35½ |

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The tariff reduces the price in China.

Mr. AMYOT. The tariff has got our men into the habit of going to China and Japan, and buying the tea at the cheapest possible rate and transporting it in the cheapest possible way to Canada. We have ceased to get our tea through the United States and England. We get the tea directly from the place of growth, and that is the reason why we buy it cheaper. When hon. gentlemen opposite were in power they imposed a tax upon these articles. Why? Because they are consumed by the poor as well as the rich, and so the poor were compelled to pay more in proportion to their wealth than the rich. To-day the poor man does not pay upon his tea, but the rich man pays upon his champagne and his fine wines. That is the difference between the two policies. It is all very well for us to live in the regions of philosophy, but let us sometimes get down to practical facts. I find that a less desirable kind of Japan tea cost in 1878, 36 cents, and now it costs 32 cents a pound.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). In China?

Mr. AMYOT. Chinaware should be the substance of the hon. gentleman if he insists upon sticking to his old ideas without change.

I know this, for I bought myself a certain quantity of sugar fifteen years ago for which I paid 10 and 11 cents a pound, and I get it now for 4½ cents. But I am told that I am robbed because Redpath is making millions out of that sugar. Is that so? If I pay 6 cents a pound less for sugar in consequence of his making a million, then I wish he would make two or three millions, or ten millions, and sell me sugar a little cheaper yet. I have no objections to men becoming rich, and being able to help institutions, and take shares in commercial companies, if at the same time they can sell cheaper what they manufacture. Suppose that Mr. Redpath made 1 or 2 cents profit out of the $5 or $6 I paid for his sugar, where is the harm? If he makes good sugar and sells it cheap, so cheap that nobody will buy sugar from any one else, and at the same time is able to make a little profit, I cannot see where I am impoverished by his profit. I get direct benefits from his large manufacture of sugar. That is one way of looking at a protective tariff. The fact that the manufacturer makes money does not compel me to pay an undue price for his products. While he is making money he gets experience, he improves his methods, he employs skilful men, and he gets a more extended market in which he may sell larger quantities at smaller prices, and from all this the consumer reaps a benefit also. That is one of the direct results of a protective tariff. Will anybody deny that we buy sugar cheaper now than we used to? Suppose that in the beginning of our National Policy we did pay a little higher for sugar than we could have got it from the States, was it not better to pay a little dearer a few years for the sake of establishing those manufactures in our country, than to buy goods in the States and contribute perpetually to the profits and welfare of foreign manufacturers? I think it was better to make a sacrifice for a few years in order to establish those industries in our own country, which must subsequently grow and contribute to our wealth and to the increase of our population. But we are told: You protect sugar unduly. What is the consequence to-day of the protective tariff? The consequence is that our sugar manufactures are so well established that they can stand a diminution of the protection which they received at the start. We now allow sugar to come into this country free, of a higher standard than we did before; we can do that without injuring our sugar refineries, allowing the industry to go on, and at the same time granting more favours to the public at large. Without the protective tariff established in 1878, we never could have done that. That proposition, I think, is very simple. I know I shall not convince my hon. friends of the Opposition, nor shall I try to; but I am speaking to the country and I know what the answer of the country will be on all these points. I will continue to show the reduction in prices: sugar, yellow refined, in 1878 we paid 7½ to 8¾ cents per pound; in 1891, 5½ to 6; in 1873, $4.50; in 1874, $3.50. The average of all prices in 1893 was about 2½ per cent less than in the previous year.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). My hon. friend will remember that he and his friends contended in 1878 that the prices were slaughter prices, which he now says were very high.

Mr. AMYOT. I speak of the current prices of 1878; I do not go into the question of the slaughter market. It is a very simple question. If the hon. gentleman wants me to tell him my ideas of it, I will. I take the general current prices in Canada in 1878, as I find them in the 'Journal of Commerce.'

Mr. AMYOT.

The hon. gentleman knows that when the American manufacturers saw that new industries were being started in Canada, they used to send in here all their goods at prices ridiculously low in order to choke off our own manufacturers. That was the slaughter market, and if to-day we abolished the protective tariff there are many new industries in Canada which would be choked off at once by being overwhelmed with the cheap products of the United States. The hon. gentleman knows that. It is only by affording protection to these infant industries that we can keep them alive. Let us help them a little, and later on they will be strong enough to resist all competition from the United States.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). My hon. friend will see that the prices he quotes for 1878, and the prices at which these goods were imported, were slaughter prices.

Mr. AMYOT. What would they be if they were not slaughter prices? They would be ten times dearer. I wonder what the hon. gentleman is aiming at. I gave these prices as the genuine prices, and I proved they were too high. Protection has brought them down lower, but the hon. gentleman says: You are wrong. They were slaughter prices, therefore, instead of giving $6.50 we should give $10. That would prove my thesis a little better, but I will not go so far as that, because I am not in the habit of exaggerating. Let us take gray cottons:

An hon. MEMBER. Dispense.

Mr. AMYOT. I hear the word "dispense." I will not dispense, but I will give these figures to the House. I will prove that every farmer who wants gray cotton, white sheeting, flannel, sugar and other articles can go to a store and buy them for less than he could in 1878. This is the only way to answer that stereotyped phrase used by the Opposition: The farmer pays dearer now for what he buys. I desire to prove that such is not the case, and to establish it so conclusively that any hon. gentleman who repeats that phrase will obviously be considered as a man who cannot be cured. I will proceed:

In the item of prints, of which there were none made in 1878, the present production of the Magog Print Works is about seventeen million yards per annum. The mill is, and has been since last fall, working at its fullest capacity, and has large orders ahead. During the past year large quantities of gingham—a line of goods never manufactured in the country before—were turned out. One mill alone manufactured some 80,000 pieces of these goods, to replace similar goods which were being imported, all such class of manufacture being placed in the market at prices suitable for all classes of consumers (from 5 to 15 cents per yard), and at much lower values than were being obtained in the United States. In addition to this a number of fancy textile goods, which it was then thought impossible for our Canadian mills to manufacture, have been successfully made and appreciated by the consumers, which is evidenced by the large demand for them. Remarks have been made re the Dominion Cotton Mills Company. This company is no combination; it is simply an ordinary joint stock company, doing its business on the same basis as any other company of the kind in Canada. It purchased and paid for the mill it owns, and every mill in the company is working at its fullest capacity. This one company pays out in cash in the item of wages alone about seventy thousand dollars per month, or about eight hundred and fifty thousand dollars per annum. The Valleyfield Cotton Company pays about twenty-five thousand dollars per month, or about three hundred thousand dollars per annum, and the other mills in proportion to their size. This outlay in cash is outside the enormous outlay for general supplies of all kinds required in the manufacture of the goods, giving employment to many hundreds of mechanics, machinists and other employees in the Dominion outside altogether of the mills. Regarding woollen goods, take an item such as gray flannels:—

Previous to 1878 large quantities of English flannels and blankets were being imported and for some little time afterwards. Now the market is supplied by our own mills. Our own mills employ our own citizens, and those who left us are coming back to receive employment here. Here are some more figures to show how much cheaper goods are now than they were in 1878. All wool shirts, which in 1878 cost from $9 to $10, are now sold at from $5 to $6, same weight and same quality. Fine wool and fancy shirts, which we made only in small quantities previous to 1878, all being imported, were then sold at from $12 to $15 per dozen, and now the trade is supplied by Canadian makers at from $9 to $10 per dozen for the same grade of goods, while lower lines in plain and fancy shirts and drawers, which ranged from $3.50 to $8 in 1878, are now sold at from 35 to 40 per cent lower. The reduction in the price of tweeds, etoffes, and so on, is now from 30 to 40 per cent lower than the price in 1878, while cloakings, costume cloths, coatings, and so forth, are now being made here in large quantities, which were previously brought in wholly from Europe. I will give you a resume of the value of a few of the leading lines in tweeds. In 1878, etoffes sold for 50 cents, and in 1891, for 35 cents; tweeds, 14 ounces, which sold for 70 cents in 1878, were sold for 30 cents in 1891; fine tweeds, 12 ounces, sold for $1.10 in 1878, were sold for 85 cents in 1891; fine tweeds, 9 ounces, sold for 60 cents in 1878, were sold for 45 cents in 1891; tweeds, 9 ounces, another quality, sold for 70 to 80 cents in 1878, were sold from 50 to 60 cents in 1891. Even the coal oil, for which we used to pay from 16 to 18 cents in 1878, can now be had for 11 cents a gallon. It is true that there is a duty on coal oil, but what is the effect of that duty? It has given strength to Canadian enterprise, and now the proprietors of the Canadian oil wells are able to sell their product nearly as cheaply as the American oil. I am sure that before long they will be able to produce it in Canada at the same cost as in the United States, and then we will have Canadian coal oil cheaper than we can get the American oil. In 1878 we used to pay for glass per box from $1.85 to $2.10, but now it can be purchased for $1.30; for axes, in 1878, we used to pay from $8 to $10 a dozen, but now they can be purchased at from $6 to $8. That is another instance of how the lumberman and the farmer may be protected by the National Policy. We allow the iron in free, in some cases we even give a bounty, and the consequence is that the poor man who has to work all day with his axe pays less for it than he paid under a revenue tariff. Here are some other instances of the cheapened price of agricultural implements under the protective tariff. Manure forks, which in 1878 cost $9, are now sold for $6; iron shovels and spades, which cost $6.50 in 1878, can now be had for $5; steel shovels and spades, which in 1878 cost from $10 to $10.50, are now sold for $6.50; scythes, which in 1878 cost from $10.50 to $11.50, can now be had for $7.80; hay forks, for which in 1878 we paid $6, we now pay $4.32; clippers, which in 1878 we paid $13.50 for, are now sold for $7.80, and, generally speaking, all agricultural and farming implements are cheaper to-day than they were during the Liberal regime. The Opposition, however, I have no doubt, will still go on denying this and stating that the farmer pays more than he did formerly, that he is oppressed, and that the Government make him pay for the luxuries of the rich. There is no power in the world to prevent hon. gentlemen of the Opposition saying this, but the facts are contrary to that assertion, and the real truth is that the farmer pays less for what he buys under the protective tariff than he used to pay under a revenue tariff. Now, as to the products of the farm. The member for Lotbinière (Mr. Rinfret) stated that the prices of our agricultural products were regulated by the Liverpool market. I am not ready to admit that, but let whatever he pleases regulate the price; the fact remains that the farmer sells his goods at fully as good a price as he used to, with the exception of butter and cheese, which he sells at higher prices than formerly, and which products are to him an inexhaustible source of prosperity and wealth. If I could take up the time of the House to compare the condition of the Canadian farmer with that of the farmer of the United States, I might prove that the Canadian farmer was far better off than his American brother farmer by quoting a pamphlet entitled "A Fair Comparison of the Relative Condition of the Farmers in New York State and in Ontario," made by an impartial committee from the county of Leeds. I presume that some hon. gentlemen will take up that view of the question, and will establish, that not only is the Canadian farmer to-day in a better condition than he was under a revenue tariff, but that he is even in a better condition than the farmer of the United States. Another argument which we often hear from hon. members of the Opposition is: that under the protective tariff there has been emigration from the country. It would be much more pleasant for every Canadian to have seen by the last census a larger increase of population, but we have to put to ourselves this question: Is the emigration due to the protective tariff?

Mr. CHOQUETTE. Yes.

Mr. AMYOT. The hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Choquette) says "Yes."

Mr. CHOQUETTE. You said it yourself.

Mr. AMYOT. Suppose I would have said it myself, it would have been a mistake, probably caused by my being then badly surrounded. It was another reason why I should get out of the bad company I was in. Now, Mr. Speaker, is that emigration due to the protective tariff?

Mr. CHOQUETTE. You said so yourself in 1891.

Mr. AMYOT. Did that emigration exist before the protective tariff? Yes; we have had that emigration going on since 1840. We have had it going on during the period of the reciprocity treaty with the United States—the golden age, according to hon. gentlemen of the Opposition. Emigration has been going on before the treaty, during the treaty, and after the treaty, and protection did not entirely prevent emigration, until about a year and a half ago, when the exaggeration of protection due to the McKinley Bill, and when the silver question in the States, brought about a commercial collapse and numerous failures in the neighbouring republic. What is the bearing to-day of the protective tariff on emigration from this country? It is this: when the manufacturers of the United States have ceased to be prosperous by being too inflated, when employment was not to be found in the States, our Canadians have come back, and are coming back to get work in our own factories. If we did not have a protective tariff we would have no manufactories to receive them here. But, owing to our prudence and our precautions we have built up home industries, we have got them in working order, and the prosperity of the States having ceased, we have numerous places of employment to receive our own people who are coming back from that foreign country. The emigration has not been due to the protective tariff; it has existed in spite of it. Who denies that if we had not a protective tariff the emigration would have been doubled? Our people were attracted by the fame of the States, and they left us, thinking that on putting their foot on American soil they would become millionaires. The constant assertions of some of our public men on the hustings and in the public press that the Americans were rich while we were poor, that everything was gold there, and everything lead here, formed the education of our people, and induced many of our young men to leave us and go to the States. Parents heard eloquent men on the hustings telling them: In the States everything is very fine; you have only to go there, and you will make money, and they went home and repeated the statement; the little children heard it, and as soon as they grew to be fourteen or fifteen years old they left for the States. Is that the fault of the protective tariff? If, instead of doing that, we formed the habit of saying: Our country is rich; our farmers are making money, the labourer is getting high wages; raw material is free; you can make money in Canada, where we have abundance of mines, fisheries and other natural resources—if we praised our country in that way, we would attract immigration and retain our children at home. It is due to the education that the Liberal party have given our children that hundreds of thousands of them have left for the country to the south. But now that the wrong policy of the United States, the exaggeration of a good thing, and occasionally such things as the silver question, have brought about a depression in that country, our people are coming back, and when they come they will remain with us. The cars are loaded every day with people coming back from the States, and instead of our farmers receiving money from the States to pay their debts, they are now sending money from Canada to bring their friends back. That is the real position, and hon. gentlemen know that if a census were taken to-day in the province of Quebec over two hundred thousand more population would be found there.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. AMYOT. They know it, and they will find it out at the next election. Now, another reason given why the protective tariff is not good was that the United States Government have no confidence in the Canadian Government. I could not see the bearing of that reason on the tariff. It is not our fault if the American Government have such an idea; we have no control over them. I know that the Canadian Government have done as much as they possibly could, without sacrificing the honour, the pride and the dignity of the country, to obtain reciprocity with the United States. They have gone as far as possible, and for my part I would not have approved of them had they gone further. But what has been the consequence? The refusal of the United States Government to grant us reciprocity has convinced us that we must suffice for ourselves. We have been seeking markets throughout the world, and we have succeeded in obtaining a market for our cheese and butter, and that of itself affords an abundant prosperity for our farmers. We are trying to open up other markets with Australia. For that we are ridiculed by the Opposition. We have a treaty with France, and we had the pleasing declaration this afternoon that the Government will present it to this House for ratification. We are looking for markets all over the world. But the Opposition say: Why do you not go to the States? It is your natural market. Well, in the first place, the States would not be as good a market for the farmers' cheese and butter as England. We must also remember that we cannot force the States to open their markets to us. When they are ready, we are ready; but so long as they are not ready, we will not go on our knees before them and implore. We are able to suffice for ourselves; we are able to manufacture for ourselves; we are even able to manufacture for other countries. We will find other markets; we have found some already, and we will go on in that course. We have in history the example of many small republics getting very rich by means of commerce with remote countries. Why can Canada not do the same? Our marine is one of the finest in the world; but the Opposition do not speak of our marine. Everything that contributes to the strength of our marine contributes to the strength and the commerce of the whole nation. In this way, the refusal of the United States to trade with us has had the effect of stimulating the Canadian people to suffice for themselves, and by finding new markets, to insure their prosperity, whether our neighbours wish it or not. The third objection I heard this afternoon was that we spend too much on the North-west, and last night the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Rinfret) said that we spend $8,000,000 yearly on that country. I do not see what that has to do with the tariff question; but I will say this: I beg the hon. members from Manitoba and the North-west to remember that we in the province of Quebec are rebuked on the hustings for the millions that we have spent on opening up their country, and they must not be unfair or unjust to us; they must not be too exacting in their demands. We have done a great deal for them, and we are ready to do more, because we want Canada to become an immense and powerful country. We want it to be as one nation from ocean to ocean;

we want to make every necessary sacrifice to develop that country; but they must not use that new country to oppress the minorities nor to exact too much from Canada. They must remember that even in this House, with the silent consent of the hon. leader of the Opposition, the Government is reproached with having spent millions of dollars for them. Another objection is that the combines will continue. Mr. Speaker, what country is essentially the home of the combines? The United States; and yet these hon. gentlemen, who are opposed to combines, want to have no gates between Canada and the United States. Those things do not tally. They would be sure to have combines the very day the gates would be taken away. Another reason given by the hon. member for Richelieu (Mr. Bruneau) is that our position of colonial dependence and protection have delayed our development. Is this a new platform? Is the Opposition now opposed to our colonial dependence? What do they want? Is independence their new programme? I thought they had given us enough programmes already; but now it seems it is colonial dependence which has delayed our progress. How it has done so I fail to see. I do not see how England has prevented our manufactures from being established and prospering. I do not see how she has interfered with our timber limits and mines and fisheries. The hon. member for Kent (Mr. Campbell) this afternoon, attacked protection because of our expenditure on immigration, but he ought to know that our expenditure in this respect has diminished considerably, and that now the greatest portion is borne by that powerful and admirable company, the Canadian Pacific Railway. That is the most effective immigration agency we could have; it advertises everywhere the sale of its magnificent lands at its own expense. The hon. gentleman also found fault with the protective tariff because of the useless Military College at Kingston. That is a very extraordinary reason to urge against the tariff, but he might have been less hard on the memory of the Hon. Mr. Mackenzie, who was the father of that college. I myself am of the opinion that the Military College at Kingston is not a very necessary institution. But it exists, and it is impossible to abolish suddenly, and always hard to abolish at all, an institution of that kind in which so many people have an interest. The hon. gentleman should not have been so hard on the memory of his late chief. The hon. member for Richelieu (Mr. Bruneau) spoke of Saturn eating his children. Well, Sir, the roles are now reversed, and we see the children eating their father. The hon. member for Kent is also opposed to a protective tariff, because he wants markets for our products. I find it difficult to understand the hon. gentleman. We are doing our best to find markets everywhere, and are succeeding. Yet still, these hon. gentlemen complain. Can they tell us of some market which we could have and which we are not trying to obtain? No, Mr. Speaker, they are always in the clouds and will not come down to real facts. I have read carefully the amendment proposed, and am of the opinion that it should read as follows:—We recognize that the wise protective tariff established in this country has already created numerous home manufactures and given them sufficient strength and development to enable us to reduce, in many instances, the amount of protection granted. We are of opinion that the highest interests of Canada demand the continuance of that sound fiscal policy which has done injustice to no class, and has prompted domestic and foreign trade and procured the return of prosperity to our people. And we are of opinion that the modifications proposed by the resolutions submitted are justified by the actual state of the country, and are expected and desired. According to my opinion, that should be the amendment. The mover of the amendment spoke of reducing the tariff, but he did not say on what articles it should be reduced. He should have said on what articles he would have the duty reduced. What kind of tariff does he propose? Is it a 17½ per cent tariff, as formerly? If so, then the poor will have to pay as much as the rich. The poor would not pay in proportion to their wealth, but in proportion to the amount of articles they consumed. By our protective tariff we protect everybody. We protect by the exemption of duties on the raw material. When I buy something which has passed through the customs without paying duty, I am protected. The farmer, when he buys his sugar, is protected. And when he buys his tea and coffee, and boots and linen and tweeds, he is protected. When he buys an agricultural implement, part of which has been passed through the customs without paying duty, he is protected. We protect, not only by the exemption of duties, but also by drawbacks and bonuses; and we must go on giving protection to the utmost limits required by our young industries. Everything which may be manufactured in the country must be protected, so long as it requires protection, and not be allowed to enter into competition with the same articles from other countries. It is all very fine to speak of England, but we must look to England when she was in our situation. When England was starting in the world of industry, she was protected, and it was only after a great many years—after she got skilled labour and perfect machinery—that she opened her doors to the competition of other countries, as Canada will be able also to do later on. But for the present we must go on protecting ourselves. It is owing to our fifteen years protection that many of our industries are able to enter more actively into competition than they could in the past; and consequently we are able to diminish the protection formerly given them. I do not advise frequent changes in the tariff, because that prevents commercial stability. The Government wisely notified the commercial world a year beforehand that changes might be expected. They said: Do not buy too much; be prudent; come before us and tell us your wants, and then we shall make the required changes. Of course, within the space of fifteen years the commercial aspect of the country becomes changed, and a revision of the tariff has to be made, always having protection in view. We go on like those living upon a farm, who apply the products to the wants and requirements of the soil. We go on with a system which protects the home manufacturer and yet yields enough revenue to enable us to push our country forward in the path of prosperity and development in which it has moved for the last fifteen years.

Mr. MONETTE. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, it was my good lot to reply, on that portion of the Budget, to the speech of the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot). Indeed, the gentleman who has just taken his seat spoke with such vehemence against the gods he worshipped yesterday, that most of the members who worshipped with him the gods he has just cursed went out of the House, as did several of his own friends. Well, as I am young, and as bashfulness is an attribute inherent to youth, I think that bashfulness would have nailed me down to my seat had I found that there was as numerous an audience in this House as there were when the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot) began his speech. However, notwithstanding the vehemence and importance of the remarks of the hon. gentleman, I will not reply to him first, inasmuch as there is for us, members of this side of the House, a deficiency to cover. I mean that yesterday night we had, from the hon. member for Megantic (Mr. Frechette), such an important speech that should we not reply to it, we would go before the people with very few chances of success. Indeed, the member for Megantic stated, with much pompousness, that he had made a trip to England, another to Manitoba, and still another to New York. Well, a man who went travelling so much has, of course, much information to give us on Canadian politics, and I could not reply to the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot) without previously making some remarks with respect to the speech of the hon. member for Megantic (Mr. Frechette). He began by falling into rapture over the surplus which the present Administration left in the finances of the country. He is astonished to find out that the seventeen Ministers who rule us could not swallow in totality the $37,000,000 revenue we raise. I admit it is rather astonishing, and knowing, as I do, the thirst of certain Ministers for money, I would be myself astonished did I not know that a certain number of Ministers like to feast now and then, and to satisfy their appetite by eating a bit of French and Catholic, especially in the dining-room of the House of Commons. But,

Mr. Speaker, to return to the point, it is very easy to explain how it is that there is now a surplus, while there were only deficits under the Mackenzie rule. This surplus is chiefly due to the increase in the tariff. Had Mr. Mackenzie been willing to increase the tariff as he was asked, not only would he have covered the deficit, but he certainly would have had a larger surplus than we have now. It is just like the case of a guardian who, having the care of two wards, would give to one of them $2,000 a year to spend, and only $1,000 to the other. Supposing that the one who receives $2,000 should only spend $1,200, it is plain he would remain with a surplus of $100. But should the one who only receives $1,000 be compelled to ask for an additional sum of $100 from his guardian, he would in reality have spent but $1,100, and it could not be said of him that he is more guilty than the other one, since he would spend $800 less than his brother. Well, these are correctly the circumstances in which the two Governments stood. Had the Mackenzie Government exacted as much from the people as the present Government, it is plain there would have been surpluses. Moreover, the hon. member for Megantic stated to us that, according to the Minister of Finance himself, next year will show a deficit. Therefore, the argument drawn against the Liberal party is worth nothing in itself, if it is considered that the present tariff is double that in force under the Mackenzie rule. The member for Megantic also referred to the price of certain articles we now buy cheaper than we did formerly. I remember the very sentence uttered by him when discussing on that matter. He said the Liberals used to talk about flour, but they no more talk about it, the price of flour being greatly decreased. The Liberals talk no more about it; it was their war-horse and they threw him away. It is the first time, I hear, that a bag of flour can be mistaken for a war-horse. I do not think the hon. member acquired these notions during his trip to England; so he must have acquired them 'n Manitoba. The history of Manitoba does not directly refer to that, either; and I know of but two horses which, perhaps, the member for Megantic might have mistaken for two noted bags of flour: General Middleton's horse, and the colt of the member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot). As the other observations of the member for Megantic are about identical to those of the member for Bellechasse, I will now attack the speech of the latter gentleman. I must say, Mr. Speaker, that the observations I have to make with respect to the speech of the member for Bellechasse, I will be grieved to make them, and will make them because I am compelled by circumstances. And these circumstances, I hope, will be considered by my colleague as a little more than extenuating, owing to the position the hon. member occupied and the part he played for several years in Canadian politics. He began by stating that he would not follow all the speakers who had preceded him in the discussion of this question. I quite agree with him, and I think one in his position has enough to follow each and every party without being bound, moreover, to follow all the friends of these parties. The Opposition, he said, is quite unwilling to help the infant industries of Canada. The Opposition by carrying out a tariff for revenue only would kill those industries. This is, he said, what follows from the remarks of the hon. leader of the Opposition at the Liberal convention of the 20th June last. Well, I think it is not the necessary consequence which one may draw from the Opposition platform. We would not at all kill the national industry, which existed under the revenue tariff as well as now. And, moreover, Mr. Speaker, if there is in this House a member who spoke out that opinion, it is the very member for Bellechasse, and it ill becomes him to come and speak now with such vehemence against those who remained true to either partial or unlimited reciprocity, or to a tariff for revenue only, and since these are the very views he himself held two years ago. I regret, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member for Bellechasse should not be at his seat, for I wished to recall to his memory while supporting it with quotations, what he said hardly a few years ago. Might he be forgot it, but happily the debates are taken down, and I have here the words uttered by that gentleman in this House. The House will allow me to read some of the statements of the hon. member, were it only to show that they hardly agree with what he stated to-day. As I cannot find out just now the place where the very words of the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot) are to be found, I will content myself for the present to remind the House that the hon. gentleman was one of the most relentless advocates of commercial reciprocity with the United States. He followed on that question, the hon. leader of the Opposition; he voted with us each time we asked for a tariff reform. In 1891 he supported, by his vote, an amendment moved by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). He followed us when we claimed the free importation of binding twine, although last year he altogether changed his opinion on that matter and voted against a motion reproducing, word for word, that for which he had previously voted. But what astonished me the more was the way he treated the hon. leader of the Opposition. According to him, the hon. leader of the Opposition would have in his desk a bottle for the cure of all diseases; he would have promises for those of his friends who would have unrestricted reciprocity, those who would have free trade, and those who would have a tariff for revenue only. I think if there is a man capable of resorting to such means, it is rather the member for Bellechasse than the hon. leader of the Opposition. As an evidence of this, I will quote what that very gentleman said of the hon. leader of the Opposition when he parted with the man he had followed so long. The House will remember that during the session of 1892, the hon. gentleman bade his adieus to the Opposition and paid his respects to the statesmanship of the leader under whom we consider it our duty to combat :

I must say that the leader under whom I served in the ranks of the left I found to be a real statesman. I know, and the country at large knows, his brilliant and abundant talents, his energy, his generous character, his perfect honesty, and his sincerity, and I will tell you frankly that, if I thought by leaving his ranks now I would injure his cause in any way or retard for one moment his accession to power, I would rather withdraw from politics than do it :

It is a strange way of reasoning.

But under the circumstances, when there is such a majority, what hope can he have for years ?

It is true a difference of one does not matter much, but the hon. member for Bellechasse must have had reasons to side with the hon. leader of the Opposition, and he must likewise have had some to go over to his opponents. The platform, at that time, of the hon. leader of the Opposition was unrestricted reciprocity with the United States, and now we are asking for a tariff for revenue only, with the object of setting out, later on, towards that reciprocity with the neighbouring country. In the quotation I have just made, the hon. member stated that should his leaving the ranks of the Opposition injure in any way the case of the leader of the Liberal party, he would rather withdraw from politics. To show the logic with which he acted, allow me to read the following few lines :

One of the reasons why I leave that party and go back to the party of my youth is that I find that noble leader does not receive from his party the support he deserves.

In order to show that the leader of the Opposition was worthy of a more hearty and earnest support, the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot) packed off and took to the other side of the House. The hon. gentleman exclaimed that we had long enough offered unrestricted reciprocity to the United States, that we had no business to offer it any more. But does he not remember that when three Canadian Ministers went to Washington to negotiate about a reciprocity treaty, the United States offered to put on its free list agricultural products, and that the only condition, the most important one, in fact the only one it required a great effort from the Government to grant, was to put on our free list a certain number of manufactured articles, the United States accepting all our agricultural products free of duty ? The Canadian Government declined to negotiate on that basis. Therefore the United States were then willing to fully open to us the doors of their country. It shows that the hon. member is wrong when he states that the United States decline to grant to us what we, of the Opposition, ask for. The hon. member quoted some bank reports, amongst others a certain report of Mr. Bousquet, manager of the Banque du Peuple. The hon. gentleman plainly saw himself that such an argument would not have much weight in the opinion of the House. He perceived the weakness of such an argument, for he added : I will perhaps be asked what a bank manager can know of the affairs of the agricultural class. The farmers themselves are indeed the men who can speak knowingly of these affairs and they alone have authority to speak out the evils from which they suffer as well as their needs. I have just referred to the refusal of the Canadian Government to accept the putting of agricultural products on the free list which was offered by the American Government. The hon. member for Bellechasse contends that we are compensated for that evil by the free entry of our products on the markets of Great Britain. I am astonished to hear a political man of his experience, a lawyer of his ability, setting forth such a weak argument. I can understand that the hon. member could make such a statement with a show of reason if, by opening to us the American market, that of Great Britain was closed to us, but the two things are not inconsistent, and even though the doors of the American market would have been opened to us, the doors of the English market would not have been closed to us. I repeat that the one does not preclude the other, and this is why the argument of the member for Bellechasse on that point is very weak. Farmers, he said, do not pay more than they paid some years ago, and protection does not in any way increase the price of consumable commodities. Well, I admit that the articles we consume are now cheaper than they were some years ago. It is true that progress has taken long strides and that we actually pay less for certain articles than we paid in those times. But one must never forget the relation which exists between a cause and its effects. The hon. member for Bellechasse tried, a moment ago, to ridicule the philosopher of Bothwell (Mr. Mills), as he is called. I think it is always useful to possess a little philosophy when delivering a speech in the House of Commons. Well, here is an argument that cannot be contradicted : if we impose duties which prevent the importation of a consumable commodity, it is plain that the manufacturer of such an article in Canada is thereby in a position to sell it at a price. And why ? Because the foreign competition has become impossible, or, at all events, more difficult. That argument is irrefutable, and it is not with the figures he gave us that the member for Bellechasse can demolish it. He said that we now pay for sugar 4 cents a pound, while we paid 10 cents for it formerly. But I will ask him since when did we pay but 4 cents for it, if not since we took away the duties upon that very article. And before these duties were taken away we paid for it 7 cents a pound. We took away last year duties which represented from 3 cents to 3½ cents a pound, and since there was a decrease corresponding to the duties taken away. It well shows that when we impose a duty upon any article, the price of it increases almost in a direct ratio to the duty imposed. The same reasoning applies to coal oil, shoes and agricultural implements. The hon. member for Bellechasse stated that the calfskin shoes—I remember that article, as it impressed me—are much cheaper than they were in 1878. I know that at that time, in 1878, calves became a little more plentiful in the country, but it was certainly not due to protection that the price of that leather decreased; it was rather due to the treason of the political friends of the member for Bellechasse, who are recorded in our annals as the calves of 1879. The hon. member also stated that agricultural implements are now cheaper than they were. No doubt they are, but they would be cheaper still had we not protection, which prevents or checks American competition. As far as the American market is concerned, I am not afraid to state that fact. Farmers from my county told me recently that having gone to the United States to sell horses, they declined to buy from a party of the name of Fitch, of Moore's Junction, mowers for $17 which are sold here for $50. Well, here is the advantage that was offered to these farmers. They went to the United States to sell a horse, on which they lost $30, and they found themselves in the impossibility of making an advantageous bargain on account of the exorbitant duty imposed by the Government upon agricultural implements. They were losing $23 on a single article. Here is a new fact which the member for Bellechasse cannot disprove with the figures he gave us. The hon. member set forth another argument which has indeed nothing earnest in it under the circumstances. You want no combines, said he to the Opposition, but the United States are above all a country of combines, and should you associate with them, you are sure to promote combines. Well, if I am not mistaken the combines which exist in the United States are the legitimate offspring of protection. We would have less protection here. And I know that the platform of the Democratic party, now in power in the United States, aims at a decrease of protection. Consequently, we would curtail the combines, or rather they could live no more when we would only have a revenue tariff. Mr. Speaker, I must thank the House for bearing patiently with me while I was looking for the quotations I intended to make of the speeches of the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot). I have them now and I will read them if it were only to show the truth of what I stated a moment ago. On September 3rd, 1891, the hon. member uttered the following words in this House:

They tell us—these great loyalists—that we prefer annexation. We say that those who are disloyal are those who ruin the country, those who steal from the country, those who chase away the population from this country, those are disloyal, while those who want to purify the political atmosphere and to have a natural commerce with our neighbours are loyal to the Crown and are the true citizens of the country.

The hon. member for Bellechasse comes now and states that the exodus can in no way be ascribed to protection. Now, here is what he held then:

The census returns prepared by the officials of the Government prove to us that over a million of people have left the country. And why? Is it not because they could not live here during the ten years just passed when the hon. gentlemen have been telling us: We are happy, we are prosperous, Canada is rich, Canada is increasing in wealth and in population? The contrary has been proved to us.

Further on he added:

No doubt: some of them like power, some of them like to sit near the highly-favoured Treasury benches, some of them like to have the ear of a Minister, some of them like to know when a contract will be given—not for themselves, they are too good, too pure, but for their friends; and as long as their friends surround them with millions at their disposal, they will say: We are prosperous. And that word "we" means whom? Themselves. Let the people emigrate, let the people go to the States, let the people suffer; never mind, we are prosperous, because our friends are ready, whenever we want a cheque—not for us, but for our friends—to give it. That is the prosperity they mean, for there is no other.

Now, Mr. Speaker, all that is changed, the country is prosperous, the farmers are more prosperous and richer than they ever have been. And to think that it was hardly two years and some months ago that the hon. gentleman uttered the words that I have just quoted. That is not all:

When a young country like Canada is prosperous the population increases. If in a young country like this the population decreases, it is absolute proof that the country is not prosperous. And if the country is not prosperous it must be so because the fiscal policy is wrong.

The hon. gentleman has just said the contrary, however. I continue to quote his very words:

Those who contend with us that we should have reciprocity with the United States and a wide market for our products are right, and those who support the Government who say that in order to be happy and prosperous, we should support the policy of the Government, are wrong.

Now, the hon. member for Bellechasse has just spoken against the amendment of the member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). By speaking the language we have just heard, he certainly displayed the utmost confidence in the Government he was condemning not long ago in such positive and energetic words, for it is well understood that the amendment implies a direct want of confidence vote. We have still ringing in our ears the vehement declarations we heard from that member against the present Cabinet, which is composed of the same Ministers as formerly, with the exception of two or three, who came in since that time. Here is what he said on the 23rd September, 1891. The speech I am going to quote was in connection with a motion of censure against the Government in reference to the scandals which characterized that session. Was he then urging other reasons than those for censuring the Government? No, Mr. Speaker. He censured the Government because they declined to grant an investigation into the charges preferred against the hon. the Minister of Railways, and it is in reference to that that he blamed the hon. the Minister of Justice, as well as all his other colleagues. Here is the lecture he gave him as well as the other Ministers:

We do not refuse an inquiry into French bootling, but the Government opposite refuse an inquiry into the English bootling. When it is a Frenchman you think you have a right to strike at him and to condemn French bootling, but you give English bootling protection. There are some Ministers, some high citizens who came into politics very poor and who are millionaires to-day, but that is English bootling, and you do not think of it.

Mr. AMYOT. (Translation.) Who was at the head of the Government then?

Mr. MONETTE. (Translation.) Has the hon. gentleman lost his memory?

Mr. AMYOT. (Translation.) It was not the same Government as now; the hon. gentleman must know that.

Mr. MONETTE. (Translation.) Was not the hon. First Minister of to-day a member of the Government at that time, and was he not holding the position of Minister of Justice, as he is now?

Mr. AMYOT. (Translation.) It was precisely what I complained of, for I wished him to be First Minister.

Mr. MONETTE. (Translation.) That is a childish, a very childish distinction on the part of the hon. member for Bellechasse, for he would have us to believe that he was opposing the Government simply because the present First Minister was not First Minister at that time. It is not worth refuting. The member for Bellechasse never made any distinction in favour of the Minister of Justice, as was seen, however, by the quotation I have just made. I will not detain the House any longer. I did not expect to speak on this question, and, moreover, it will be easily understood that it is rather difficult to get ready to reply to the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot), as one is never sure in whose favour he will speak. At all events, I wish to protest against the present Government, because they would not take away the duties upon agricultural implements and favour the agricultural class by opening to them the American market. True, they reduced those duties, but it is just one more reason for us to conclude that the Government are deliberately persisting in wronging that class, since they acknowledged by such a decrease the necessity in which they were to lighten a little the burden of taxes that bears on our rural populations. There are a great many articles which are put on the free list, and which ought to be imposed; there are, likewise, Mr. Speaker, a great many articles which ought to be put on the free list and which are taxed as previously by the tariff measure now before us. The proposed reduction of the taxes will not satisfy the agricultural class, who ask for the free market of the United States for their horses, their hay and their grains, and the Government will be the first to perceive it at their expense at the next general election.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell) moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

Mr. FOSTER moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and the House adjourned at 10.30 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, 5th April, 1894.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 34) respecting the Bell Telephone Company of Canada.—(Mr. White, Cardwell.)

Bill (No. 35) to amend the Act incorporating the Steam Boiler and Plate Glass Insurance Company of Canada.—(Mr. Davies, P.E.I.)

Bill (No. 36) to incorporate the Canadian Railway Accident Insurance Company.—(Sir James Grant)

Bill (No. 37) to incorporate the Duluth, Winnipeg and James' Bay Railway Company.—(Mr. Masson.)

Bill (No. 38) respecting the Ontario Loan and Debenture Company.—(Mr. Moncrieff.)

Bill (No. 39) respecting the St. Lawrence and Adirondack Railway Company.—(Mr. Baker.)

Bill (No. 40) to incorporate the Elgin and Havelock Railway Company.—(Mr. Hazen.)

Bill (No. 41) to amend the Act respecting the Clifton Suspension Bridge Company.—(Mr. Coatsworth.)

Bill (No. 42) to incorporate the Canadian Railway Fire Insurance Company.—(Sir James Grant.)

Bill (No. 43) to amend an Act respecting the Ladies of the Sacred Heart of Jesus.—(Mr. LaRivière.)

SEDITIONOUS AND UNLAWFUL ASSOCIATIONS.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 44) further to amend Chapter 10 of the Consolidated Statutes of Lower Canada, respecting seditious and unlawful associations and oaths.

Mr. EDGAR. Explain.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Does this apply to the Orange Order?

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). When the Act which this Bill is proposed to amend was originally passed, the Masonic Lodges of the province of Quebec acting under the jurisdiction of the Grand Lodge of Great Britain and Ireland were excepted from its operation. Afterwards, when the Grand Lodge of Canada was formed, Masonic Lodges of the province of Quebec, acting under its jurisdiction, were also excepted. Subsequently, however, to the consolidation of the Statutes of Lower Canada in 1865, the Grand Lodge of Quebec was formed, and this Bill is to extend the same exemptions to lodges under the jurisdiction of the Grand Lodge of Quebec as is extended to lodges under the jurisdiction of the Grand Lodges of Great Britain and Canada.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

SUPPLY CONTRACTS FOR QUEBEC CITADEL.

Mr. CHOQUETTE asked, 1. Who holds the contract for supplying provisions, groceries, merchandise, &c., to the men and officers of the Citadel of Quebec? 2. Were tenders asked for in relation to the said contract? 3. If so, who were the parties who tendered?

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). The parties holding the contracts are: for meat, James Delaney; for bread, Thos. Hetherington; potatoes, J. B. Provost; forage, Geo. Colvin; straw, M. Provost. All these contracts, with the exception of the meat contract, were given out by public tender last year, and renewed this year at the same prices, the prices and qualities having been found satisfactory. The meat contract was considered rather high; tenders were accordingly issued, and the contract given at a slightly reduced figure. The tenderers were Jas. Delaney, Tozer & Co., D. & C. Arel and J. Drolet.

REVISIONS OF THE VOTERS' LISTS.

Mr. CHARLTON asked, How many revisions of the voters' lists have been made under the provisions of the Dominion Franchise Act, since 1885? In what year have the several revisions been made? What has been the total expense incurred by the Government in connection with these revisions? Are the expenses connected with printing voters' lists in the Government Printing Bureau included in the statement of total expenses incurred?

Mr. COSTIGAN. There were three revisions of the voters' lists made since 1885. They were in the years 1886, 1889 and 1891. The expense incurred appears by the Public Accounts and Auditor General's Report for each year. The expense connected with the printing of the voters' lists in the Government Printing Bureau are included in the statements of expenditure incurred.

Mr. CHARLTON. The answer is not complete. I think the hon. Minister ought to have replied to the inquiry as to the total expenses incurred, which was particularly desired.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. That information has already been brought down.

Mr. CHARLTON. A member of the House should not be put to the trouble of going over all these things when inquiry is made. The staff of civil servants is for that purpose. I shall put the question on the Paper again.

LIEUTENANT-COLONEL LAZIER.

Mr. MULOCK asked, Has Lieut.-Col. Lazier resigned the command of the 15th Battalion or has he been retired, suspended or temporarily displaced? If he is not now in active command, who is?

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). Lieut.-Col. Lazier has been neither retired, suspended or temporarily replaced. He was granted leave of absence on the 31st of March, as he desired to go to the United States on private business. The command of the battalion devolves on the next senior officer during his temporary absence.

IMMIGRATION FROM NEWFOUNDLAND.

Mr. DAVIES asked, In what service and where is one Charles C. Carlyle employed? When were his services engaged, and for what time? What is the nature of his duties and the amount of his salary or remuneration?

Mr. DALY. He is employed in immigration service in Newfoundland. First engaged from 1st of June, 1893, for a period of three months, at a salary of $75 per month, with $2.50 per day for expenses. On the 24th October this engagement was renewed until the 30th June, 1894, at the same rate for salary and expenses. His duties consist in travelling about the country, lecturing, distributing literature, visiting farmers and people who would be likely to emigrate, writing articles on Canada for the Newfoundland newspapers, and otherwise endeavouring to promote the emigration of desirable settlers to the Dominion of Canada.

ANALYTICAL INDEX OF TARIFF.

Mr. EDGAR asked, Has a book, entitled "Analytical Index to Customs Tariff," been published under the direction of the Controller of Customs? By what authority was that book published? When was said "Analytical Index" issued? How many copies of said "Analytical Index" were ordered and printed? What was the cost to the Government of printing and publishing said book? How many of said "Analytical Index" have been issued? How many copies sold?

Mr. WALLACE. Such a work has been published by the department. 2nd. The book was published under the authority of sections 3 and 5 of the Customs Act, and sections 2 and 4 of the "Act respecting the Department of Customs and the Department of Inland Revenue," being the Act 50-51 Victoria, chapter 11. 3rd. On the 27th September, 1893. 4th. 3,550 copies were ordered and printed. 5th. The charge for printing and publishing was $1,414.77. 6th. 1,850 copies have been issued, 194 of which were sold.

THE SUPERANNUATION FUND—CONTRIBUTORS.

Mr. McMULLEN asked, The number of permanent civil servants in each department, inside and outside service, that contribute to the superannuation fund, and the gross amount of wages paid?

Mr. FOSTER. The information asked for here is of such a nature, involving a return from each department, that the hon. gentleman will have to make a motion for the return.

NEWSPAPER ADVERTISING.

Mr. MARTIN asked, Whether any Government advertisements were inserted during the year 1893 in the 'Standard' newspaper of Winnipeg, and what amounts, if any, were paid for the same?

Mr. DALY. No advertisements were inserted in the 'Standard' newspaper of Winnipeg, with the authority of the Department of the Interior, and no accounts have been paid for the same.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) That only covers one department.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The same applies to the other departments of the Government.

CHIGNECTO MARINE RAILWAY.

Mr. RIDER asked, What is the total sum paid out by the Government to date, by way of subsidy or otherwise, towards the promotion or construction of the Chignecto Marine Railway? 2. In what further sum or sums is the Government pledged towards the construction of the said work? 3. Has the work of construction been completed and the railway put into operation? If not, what remains to be done?

Mr. HAGGART. The Government have made no payment of subsidy or otherwise towards the promotion or construction of the Chignecto Marine Railway. The time for completion having expired, no further legal liability exists (54-55 Victoria, chapter 12). Time for completion, 1st July, 1893. The amount of subsidy granted was $170,602 per annum for twenty years, which ceases to be a liability. The work of construction has not been completed, neither has the railway been put in operation. The work remaining to be done consists of the completion of the basins, lifts, &c., at each terminus, several miles of track-laying, the ballasting, and some cutting.

TIMBER CULLERS, MONTREAL.

Mr. McMULLEN asked, The quantity of timber that passed through the cullers' hands and was culled each year at Montreal, for the last ten years? The amount of fees collected for each year during the same period, and the amount of wages paid to the cullers and staff at Montreal for the same time?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). It is impossible to obtain detailed information of this character in the few hours at our disposal. I shall, therefore, ask the hon. gentleman to put a notice of motion on the Order Paper, and I will endeavour to get a quick return.

MANITOBA AND N.W.T. LAND GRANTS.

Mr. CHARLTON asked, How many acres of land have been granted to railway corporations in Manitoba and the Canadian North-west Territories up to 1st January, 1894 ?

Mr. DALY. 44,242,298 acres.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS COMMITTEE.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would inquire from the Minister of Finance, on what day the Public Accounts Committee will be called together. The matter was left over until his colleagues could be consulted.

Mr. FOSTER. I would answer to my hon. friend, that Saturday and Monday are practically 'dies non.' I think we will have to call the meeting for Tuesday morning.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Very well.

THE INSOLVENCY ACT.

Mr. FLINT. I would like to ask the Government, if some steps cannot be taken by which the proposed Insolvent Act would be placed in numbers in the hands of members for submission to their constituents who are interested in that question, before the Bill comes to this House ?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Arrangements will be made for a very early distribution of the Bill to this House.

THE TEA AND COFFEE DUTIES.

Mr. EDGAR. I would like to ask the hon. Minister of Finance another question about the tea duties, in regard to which an uncertainty exists among the trade. I have read the answers that were given by him the other day to the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Kenny) and the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. McKay), and the conclusion of the last paragraph embodying, I think, what he expressed to the House, was this :

It is not the intention that the fact of transshipment shall be a bar to the entry of either tea or coffee free of duty.

So far so good ; but I would like to ask the hon. Minister if it is the intention that tea or coffee, unless placed in bond in England, shall be subject to duty ?

Mr. FOSTER. The exception which I made in the answer which the hon. gentleman has read, taken in connection with the paragraph in the tariff propositions as brought down, will give the hon. gentleman the answer to his question, and may be summarized as follows :—That tea or coffee, imported from the place of growth or production without transshipment, is free ; it may be imported in bond through London.

Mr. LAURIER. Will the hon. gentleman pardon me if I put another question. I understood, from the answer that was given the other day, that the intention of the Government was simply to keep the old law, such as it was ; that is to say, to apply the law simply to tea coming from the United States. Is that the intention, or is there to be a departure from that law ?

Mr. FOSTER. The present law will be a little wider than that.

Mr. LAURIER. To what extent ?

Mr. FOSTER. To the extent that the tea or coffee must be imported in bond or on through bill of lading.

Mr. EDGAR. Is a through bill of lading to be required in all cases ? Is that an essential or not ?

Mr. FOSTER. That will be an essential.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I understood the hon. gentleman to express himself disjunctively—"either in bond or on through bill of lading."

Mr. FOSTER. In bond and on through bill of lading.

QUESTIONS PUT BY MEMBERS.

Mr. CHARLTON. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to say a few words with regard to the privileges of the members of the House on this side in asking for information from the Government. I had a question on the Order Paper to-day which was perfectly legitimate. That question asked the Government the number of revisions that have been made of the voters' lists under the Dominion Franchise Act.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman's speech will probably elicit a reply, and lead to a general discussion, and the House knows my opinion about such discussions before the Orders of the Day. Of course, if the hon. gentleman has any question to ask the Government in reference to their further action in connection with matters of this kind, or desires to again put his question on the Order Paper, that is another thing.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. CHARLTON. In speaking to this question, Mr. Speaker, I desire to say a few words incidentally with regard to a matter that affects the privileges of the members of the Dominion House of Commons on the Liberal side. I presume that it is admitted that we have a right to make inquiries of the Government for information. The Government is the custodian of the records, and is the proper source to apply to for information. I put a question on the Order Paper which I proceeded to ask to-day—a question which in all the particulars it embraced was, in my opinion, a perfectly legitimate and proper question—with regard to the working of the Dominion Franchise Act. These inquiries were made in view of the fact that that measure will come before this House for discussion ere many days. I wished to know, authoritatively, from the Government, how many revisions of the voters' lists had been made, in what years they had been made, what had been the total expense incurred in these revisions, and whether the expenses connected with printing the voters' lists were included in that statement of the total expenses. The Minister on whom devolved the duty of answering these questions, deigned to answer the first two; but, in regard to the others, he informed me in a cavalier manner, that I had recourse to the Auditor General's Report, and could find out for myself what the expenses were. Now, I had a right to demand of the Government an authoritative statement of what those expenses were. It does not devolve upon me, or upon any other member of this House, to do the work that legitimately belongs to the staff of the House. Hon. members on the Government side of the House can avail themselves of the services of that staff in any way they choose, but if a member of the Opposition asks a question, he is told to go and hunt up the information for himself. I protest against this treatment. I wish it to be understood that I shall stand upon my rights as a member of this House. I will repeat that question, and, instead of hunting through the Auditor General's Report myself for the information, I shall expect the hon. Secretary of State to answer the question. The other day I gave notice of a motion asking for certain information with regard to exportations to the United States for the information of myself and the public. I wished to know in what lines the exports of our products to the United States were in excess of our exports to other countries. That information would help us in the discussion of trade questions. It involved, of course, considerable labour to obtain it, and the Minister of Finance told me that the Trade and Navigation Returns were open to me for inspection, and that I could go to them and get the information for myself. Now, Sir, if the members of the Opposition are to be denied all assistance from the staff of the House in obtaining information which we deem of public importance, I want to know it. Of course, we are not called upon to ask the Government whether in their opinion the question we propose to ask is an admissible question, or whether they will permit us to have this information or not. We all stand on one level here as members of the Dominion House of Commons; we have a right to all information in the possession of the Government that is not of a confidential character, or of a character that cannot, in the interest of the public, be properly made known; and I protest against the course taken by the hon. Secretary of State to-day and by the hon. Minister of Finance the other day, and when this question is reached again, if I am not permitted to move it, we will have this subject discussed in all its bearings. I will give notice of this question again, and when it is reached, we shall see if the same course will be persisted in by the Minister whose duty it was to answer it to-day.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I might say a few words on this matter to relieve the impression on the hon. gentleman's mind that there is any reluctance to give him any information that is in the possession of the Government and not in the possession of the House. I understand that the object of these questions is to obtain, in good faith, information of that character. In this case, the questions were explicitly answered by my hon. colleague the Secretary of State, with the exception of the third one, in which the hon. gentleman asked the Secretary of State to go to the Public Accounts for several years and sum up the cost of the several revisions. I submit that that information is now on the Table of the House: it is in the possession of the hon. gentleman himself; and therefore, he was not asking for information which was not as fully in his possession as ours. There is no question of the staff of the House at all. The staff of the House is not engaged in making answers to these questions, nor can they be so engaged. The hon. gentleman would be perfectly right in putting a question which involved an answer covering a great number of details that it would require time and assistance to gather. As, for instance, if it were uncertain, after the answer which had been given by the Secretary of State, as to whether the cost of the Printing Bureau had been included in the details of expenses given in the Auditor General's Report. But when that statement is answered affirmatively, the hon. gentleman knows he has under his hand in the Public Accounts and the Auditor General's accounts, not only the total statement he requires but every item in detail, and therefore he is asking for something which is already in his possession. I do not wish for a moment to curtail the privileges of members of the House, whether in Opposition or otherwise, as regards asking questions and making motions; but I submit that the right of asking questions ought not to degenerate into a mere attempt to make capital on any political question whatever. And as regards moving for papers, which the hon. gentleman has brought into the discussion, more care might, with advantage as regards the economy of the proceedings of this House, be exercised than is now. We have repeatedly on the Notice sheet motions for papers which have already been brought down and expanded in the sessional records of this House. Two or three cases of that kind occurred the last day on which we took motions. One asked for a return on a subject, every paper of which had previously been moved for and brought down and printed in the Sessional Papers over a year ago. It is only with a view of curtailing the demand for information within proper limits, that we feel at all disposed to refuse to answer a question put in that form.

Mr. LAURIER. I venture to take issue with the remarks of the First Minister. The answer received by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) from the Secretary of State was a curt answer, altogether at variance with the rules of courtesy between one side of the House and the other. It is quite possible that my hon. friend was asking for information already before the House in the Auditor General's Report, but everybody knows that that report is a very voluminous document. My hon. friend sought for the information and did not find it. Perhaps it was there, and if the Secretary of State had told him in a civil manner that he would find that information on a certain page in the Auditor General's Report, the answer would have been satisfactory. But when he said: You will find it in the Auditor General's Report, I think it is an uncivil answer which my hon. friend had good reason to resent.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I really did not suppose that was the complaint of the hon. member; and for my colleague, who is not in the House at the moment, I beg to say there was no discourtesy intended at all. The answer was that those expenses will appear in the Public Accounts and in the Auditor General's Report of this year, and there is no objection to give the hon. gentleman reference to the pages.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It is quite right for the Government, where returns are called for having reference to matters which have been already brought down in detail, to save the country the expense of making them out again. But innumerable cases will occur in which it is desirable to have an official and formal statement as to the total amount of expense incurred in any particular service, more especially in matters relating to the Franchise Act. I am tolerably well acquainted with the Public Accounts and the Auditor General's Report, and I know it would be often a matter involving much expense of time and trouble to go through the various separate sections under which the expenses are placed; and it is desirable the House and the country should know officially what the total cost of any given service may be. Therefore I think my hon. friend beside me was perfectly in his right, and the Government would have done a great deal better to have stated specifically and distinctly what the total expense in the working of the Franchise Act may be. It is not sufficient to say that somewhere or other in a document or a series of documents, covering 2,000 pages each, the requisite details will be found. Sometimes you will find them properly collated and put together, and sometimes scattered everywhere under a, b, c, &c., and whatever various forms of subdivisions the Auditor General has chosen to make. I do contend that to refer a man to a series of documents containing 2,000 pages is not altogether consonant with our practice or with the dignity of this House. We have a right, as members of this House, to ask the Government, who have a staff at their disposal, paid reasonably liberal salaries for making themselves acquainted with the details of their offices, to obtain the information required—information which it would cost members on this side many hours of labour to gather.

Mr. McMULLEN. I take the opportunity of drawing the attention of the House to a reply made to me by the hon. Minister of Finance on another important question which I put to-day. The hon. gentleman is well aware that I have a Bill before the House affecting the present superannuation system, and I want the information I asked for, and which is quite easily gathered from the documents, but which it would take any private member a long time to collect. My question was one which each department could very easily answer at a few moments' notice—the number of permanent civil servants in each department, in the inside and outside service, who contribute to the superannuation fund, and the gross amount of wages paid. I do not think that is a question the hon. gentleman should ask to put as a notice on the Paper calling for a return. Our experience in getting returns is that they are very often brought down at the dying hours of the session and possibly not before the next session. The information I asked for I require to use in connection with a Bill that will come up for second reading, and I think I am entitled to it. I do not think the staff of officers in each department would be put to much inconvenience by having to add up the number of inside and outside civil servants and the gross amount of wages paid. And I think it is unfair and discourteous to ask me to put a notice on the Paper and wait five or six weeks for a return, and possibly not get it until Parliament has risen.

Mr. MULOCK. I think it would be well for the First Minister to reconsider the conclusion at which he appears to have arrived as to the duty of the Government in dealing with questions of this kind. Take as an illustration of the view I wish to present, the question on the Notice Paper to-day out of which this discussion arose. My hon. friend here (Mr. Charlton) asked, in the public interest, for information in a succinct form as to the total amount of public money expended in connection with the putting in force of a certain statute. That information is not asked for for the benefit of any private citizen or any individual member. It is information that, through the machinery of this House, finds its way to the people who pay the bill, and I submit that the electors are entitled to know the total amount. With regard to this particular measure, it has ever been a subject of controversy whether the game was worth the candle; and now, after three revisions have taken place under the Act, is it not due to the public that, in considering the merits and demerits of the law, they should know in an authoritative way what has been the total cost? To tell my hon. friend that he may wade through volumes and thus learn the cost of this Act to the country is simply to deny to the people the information they are entitled to. If my hon. friend were to search the Public Accounts and give to the country the cost of this Act as he found it to be, his figures would not be authoritative and might be questioned. The country is entitled to know how much the Government has paid out of the public funds in connection with this measure. We might as well understand now as at any other time whether the statement of the First Minister is to be accepted as an answer. He declines to give this information for fear, as I understand him, that some members may seek to make political capital out of it. If the Government have expended such a sum of the people's money that they fear to tell the amount lest political capital may be made out of it, that of itself is sufficient reason why they should be censured by the people. But, if the expenditure is such that political capital can be made out of it, that of itself is a reason why the people should know that has taken place. I submit in the public interest, in regard to this question, and all others, where there has been a very considerable expenditure of public money in detail, and extending over a period of years, it is due to the electors that they shall have a candid, frank admission by the Government how much has been spent. In this particular case, in my opinion, the Government has been derelict in its duty. I trust that they will reconsider their decision, and that, if the question is put again, they will get back to sound constitutional ground, and will declare candidly and frankly how much has been expended.

Motion to adjourn withdrawn.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE TARIFF.

House again resumed the adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Foster:

That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go into Committee of Ways and Means; and the motion of Sir Richard Cartwright in amendment thereto.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Mr. Speaker, I noticed that when my hon. friend from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) was addressing the House upon this subject the day after the hon. the Finance Minister made his Budget speech, the Finance Minister was occupied largely with the receipt of telegrams; and I inferred from the appearance of the hon. gentleman that these telegrams were not messages congratulating him upon the success of the changes which he proposed to make in the taxation of this country. I think that if the hon. gentleman had read those messages to the House, they would have established the accuracy of the statement made by the hon. member for South Oxford, that what the hon. gentleman proposed was a maximum of disturbance with a minimum of results. I am quite sure, Sir, that the hon. the Finance Minister has so far found that the changes which he proposed to make, were not such as the country looked for at his hands. I may say, Mr. Speaker, that the Budget speeches which have been delivered in this Chamber since 1879 bear a certain family likeness to one another; they all are made up in very much the same way; and in many respects they differ very widely from the addresses, on the same subject, delivered to the House of Commons, by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. In the addresses of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, we have statements made of the expected effect of each of the changes which the Chancellor proposes. The hon. the Finance Minister has not favoured us, in his Budget speech, with a statement of the amount of revenue he expects to lose in consequence of each diminution of the duty, or of the amount he expects to gain in consequence of each increase. But, Sir, there is one feature in which the speech of the hon. the Minister of Finance differs in a very marked degree, from the speeches which have been addressed to the House upon the subject of taxation, by his predecessors in office. Sir, I remember very well, and I daresay every hon. gentleman who is now a member of the House, and who was a member of the House in 1879 will remember very well, when these radical changes in the policy of taxation were first proposed to Parliament, what a prominent feature the balance of trade was in the speech of the Finance Minister of that day, and in many of the speeches subsequently delivered by the predecessors of the present incumbent. The House was told in those days that one of the primary objects to be obtained by the alteration of the tariff, and the introduction of the policy of protection, was to correct the balance of trade. We were assured that the balance of trade was very largely against Canada, that the value of her imports far exceeded the value of her exports, and that the prime duty of the Minister of Finance was, so to tax the commerce of the country, as to produce a diminution of imports, and, as far as he could, to stimulate the exports of the country. And the year 1880 was the only year, since this confederation was established, when we found that the exports of the country exceeded the imports, the balance of exports over imports in that year being about $1,400,000. After that, the old condition of things returned, and every year since then the value placed upon imports has been in excess of the value placed upon the exports of the country. The hon. member for Kent, N.B. (Mr. McInerney), an hon. gentleman who is new to Parliament, was the only member on the Government side, on this occasion, who ventured to discuss this old and very important theme, the discussion of which formerly evoked such hearty cheers from the supporters of the Government. The hon. gentleman did not know to what extent the views of his party had undergone a change in this particular. The hon. gentleman naturally had no doubt a distinct recollection of the theories and opinions he was called upon to combat when he was actively engaged in the defence of the principles of political economy and taxation supported by us, and opposed by his present party, and he naturally supposed that his friends on the Treasury benches still entertained, with regard to this question, the opinions which they formerly enunciated and defended both in Parliament and upon the hustings. The hon. gentleman assumed that we were in debt, or paid in cash to foreign parties, with whom we conduct our trade, a sum equal, at all events, to the difference between the value placed in the Trade and Navigation Returns upon our imports, and the value put upon our exports. If the hon. gentleman had examined the papers laid before Parliament, he would have seen that the amounts of coin and bullion that were exported from year to year, by Canada, or were imported into it, were very much the same and were very nearly equal. If the difference between the value of the imports and the exports represented the mercantile indebtedness of Canada to parties abroad, then that was an indebtedness that was never paid, and since confederation, our merchants and traders have incurred liabilities which they have not met to the extent of $400,000,000. This may be a very dishonest thing, if the hon. gentleman's view is correct, it may be a very mischievous thing in its moral consequences; but so far as the pecuniary features of the transaction are concerned, if he were right, it would be very much worse for the parties who continued to trust us while we never paid them, than it would be for the people of this country who received these goods and consumed them, and gave no compensation for them. The Minister of Finance, in his Budget speech, has referred to the prosperity of the country, and one of the evidences of that prosperity which he has given us, is the large amount of importations that have taken place during recent years. Sir, it would be important to inquire when the Minister of Finance adopted this view, and when he abandoned the view that an excess in the value of importations was a calamity, which he now thinks has become a blessing. We know very well the views that were constantly proclaimed by his predecessor, and it would be curious for the House to know at what particular period the hon.

gentleman has received new light upon this question.

Mr. FOSTER. Does the hon. gentleman mean to canvass the question as to my belief at one time and my belief at another time, on the balance of trade, as expressed anywhere? Is he instituting a comparison between what he thinks my belief is now, and what the belief of somebody else was years ago?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman asks me a question. The hon. gentleman was a member of this House, and he was a supporter of a Government, and a supporter of a policy before he became a Minister of the Crown. I apprehend that if the hon. gentleman disagreed with the views of his predecessor in office, he would have stated the fact when his predecessor was enunciating the views which I have just mentioned.

Mr. FOSTER. Then you are not canvassing my views, but the views of somebody else?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). If the hon. gentleman will tell us that he never subscribed to the views put forward by his predecessor, and which were so elaborately advocated by his friend the hon. member for Kent, N.B. (Mr. McInerney), and which he so heartily cheered the other evening when those views were addressed to the House, I will be happy to hear it. Are we to understand that while he supported actively and zealously his predecessor, Sir Leonard Tilley, who did enunciate these views, the hon. gentleman himself has never entertained them?

Mr. FOSTER. You are taking something else for granted which I have not uttered.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. State what your views are.

Mr. FOSTER. I will at the proper time.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). If I have misapprehended the hon. gentleman, or have drawn an incorrect inference from his conduct as a public man in this House, doubtless he will have an opportunity to correct me; and if I have misstated the views of the hon. gentleman, I have no objection to his making a correction at the present moment. I am sure the hon. gentleman is too familiar with the views of Sir Leonard Tilley to call in question for a moment the opinions which I have just now attributed to him. That there may be no doubt on the subject, I will read a short extract from a speech addressed to the House by Sir Leonard Tilley in moving the first Budget in favour of the doctrine of protection:

By the last return which I have, and which covers the year 1877, the balance of trade against her (meaning England), is shown to be $700,000,000 a year; but the last calendar year shows that the balance in favour of the United States had reached $300,000,000 a year. I think, then, without entering into a discussion here of free trade and protection so far as it affects England and the United States, we may fairly conclude that the prosperity of the one country at this moment is caused by the large surplus in its favour, and the depression in the other by the large deficiency. Under these circumstances, it appears to me we should turn our attention to the best means of reducing the volume of our imports from all parts of the world.

Now, Sir, that was the doctrine advanced by the Minister of Finance who proposed this National Policy, which hon. gentlemen have from that hour up to this hour supported, which they still profess to support, and which, when these views were enunciated by the Minister of Finance on the floor of Parliament, was enthusiastically cheered by all those who were at the time supporting the Administration. Now, I cannot at this moment, though I shall do so later, question the accuracy of the statement that the United States, at the time when the value of their exports exceeded the value of their imports by $300,000,000, were in a highly prosperous condition; and that the people of the United Kingdom were in an extreme state of depression when their imports exceeded their exports, as they have for half a century, by nearly $700,000,000 a year. I do not know, Mr. Speaker, that I can give a better illustration of the doctrine of the balance of trade, than that which was presented nearly seventy years ago, to the Senate of the United States by a very distinguished Senator, the Hon. Daniel Webster. Mr. Webster put this case: He said that a vessel, at a period when the State of Massachusetts was more prosperous than it was at that time, received from a bank, $70,000 in specie, and sailed for the port of Mocha, on the Red Sea. The money was expended in the purchase of coffee, spices, and other products of that country. The vessel sailed from there to Amsterdam, where she sold two-thirds of her cargo for $130,000. She then sailed with the balance to the Mediterranean and sold the remaining third for $25,000 in specie, and $15,000 in Italian goods. She returned and deposited $130,000 in the bank from which the money was received. Now, the imports were $150,000, the exports were $70,000, the balance of trade was $80,000 against the country, and so, according to the contention of Sir Leonard Tilley, and which no hon. gentleman on that side has repudiated until the Minister of Finance at this moment has done so for the first time—the balance of trade was against her to the extent of $80,000, and according to that view, it was an unprofitable transaction. Now, if this vessel that sailed from the port in Massachusetts had foundered at sea, the balance of trade would have been $70,000 in favour of the country. I do not know that I could give a more apposite illustration, and I think it is one which well illustrates the knowledge which a former Finance Minister possessed and exhibited in dealing with this subject of taxation. Sir, let me call the attention of the House to a further statement. Sir Leonard Tilley said that the balance of trade in favour of the United States was $300,000,000. Why, how is that? Because a large amount of the indebtedness of the United States was held in London, Paris, Amsterdam, and Frankfort, and the same may be said with respect to the immense sums of money that have been invested in the railways of the United States, and so no inconsiderable portion of the exports of the country were required to pay interest on these foreign obligations. Under the circumstances it could not be otherwise; unless the profits of trade were very large, the balance of trade could not be otherwise than in favour, according to the hon. gentleman's contention, of the United States. Now, take the case of England. He says her business was greatly depressed, and greatly depressed because the balance of trade was $700,000,000 a year against it. In ten years that would amount to $7,000,000,000 in the ten years preceding the period of which Sir Leonard Tilley spoke. Since then the amount has become very much larger, and according to this contention the United Kingdom would at this moment be in debt to every country on the globe; her obligations would be such that it would be utterly impossible she could meet them, and no people in the full possession of their rational faculties would any longer trust her or her merchants. But the census of the United Kingdom tells a very different story. It shows there has been an increase in the wealth of the country, there has been a levelling upwards, so that a far larger number of her people who formerly were in straightened circumstances are living in comparative comfort the very reverse of what would be the necessary and logical inference from the statements made from that side of the House is shown to be the fact. We know this—that the obligations which foreign people and foreign countries owe to British capitalists are paid by the imports of those countries into the United Kingdom, and the fact that the imports exceed largely in value the exports shows that not only the mercantile transactions of the country are profitable but that the indebtedness of foreign communities to the people of the United Kingdom is indeed very great. I pass from that subject for a moment, and I wish to refer to a statement made by the Minister of Finance. The Minister has upbraided the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) for having, during a considerable portion of the time he was in public office, been met by a deficit in the public revenues. The Minister of Finance is of the opinion that it is a very important matter for the country that the Government should have a large surplus. I am inclined to dissent from that view. It would be a very convenient thing for the Administration, but it would be of doubtful utility to the public at large. There would be no inducement to economize on the part of the Administration, as there would be if the Government found difficulty in meeting the expenditure; if they were compelled to practice economy in order to make the revenue at their disposal meet the obligations which they are called upon to discharge. The hon. gentleman now takes a somewhat different position. The hon. gentleman in fact says that a surplus is a great blessing and that a debt is a very great calamity; we have bestowed on you this blessing for a very great portion of the period that we have been in charge of the government of Canada, and we are now going to take the risk of creating for the people a very considerable deficit. The hon. gentleman has informed the House in a very hesitating and doubtful manner that it might occur that, by the practice of economy, the Government might be able to meet their obligations with the revenue at their disposal. The hon. gentleman did not make that statement with such confidence as to lead one to suppose that he wished to have it regarded as a conviction. The hon. gentleman's colleague, the Minister of Railways, informed the House that it would be impossible to further economize, and that the Government had already practiced the greatest economy possible. He said he defied any hon. gentleman on this side of the House who talked in favour of economy to show any particular in which the Government could further economize. The Minister of Finance was of a different opinion; he expressed a somewhat different view, but he expressed it with a great deal of diffidence; he did not at all speak with the confidence in which his colleague spoke in the opposite direction. The Minister of Finance told the House that the expenditure last year was $36,814,052, and that he estimated the expenditure this year at $37,212,000. This is not all. There is a large expenditure on capital account, and it is quite delusive to speak of it as a special expenditure. It shows the expenditure of money on public works and undertakings, and he might undertake to distinguish with more confidence and propriety between what we call ordinary expenditure and expenditure on capital account if capital expenditure was confined to the few great undertakings that possess a real national character. I have been in this Parliament for nearly thirty years, and I have never known a year in which there was not a considerable expenditure on capital account. I do not see any more prospect, under the regime of hon. gentlemen now upon the Treasury benches, of the expenditure on capital account coming to an end, than I do of the termination of the ordinary expenditure for government. The people of this country are bound to consider not only the expenditure which the Government of the country choose to call ordinary expenditure, but they are obliged to face at some time or other these expenditures which have been differently classified, and to which I have referred. I am not speaking now on the subject of capital expenditure as the exponent of the views of any other person than myself. I say this: That I do not think it was wise, and it does not seem to me to be quite honest, that we should go on incurring very large obligations which are to be met by persons who will enter this world after we have left it. If the hon. gentleman were to undertake to pay the expenditure of government on capital account within the period of the lifetime of a generation, he would be obliged to place in the sinking fund a sum of nearly $10,000,000 a year; and until the people of Canada fully appreciate what the expenditure on capital account means, until they are called upon to consider the propriety of every such expenditure, it is not likely that we will have any very great reform in this particular. I cordially subscribe, myself, to the views expressed by the Rev. Sydney Smith: That people are entitled to incur obligations which they are prepared themselves to meet, but I decline to be governed by those who are decaying in the churchyards, rather than by those who occupy the pews. We are entitled while we are in charge of a ship to sail with her east or west or north or south, but when we are compelled to resign our command, we ought to leave others as free to judge of the direction in which to voyage as ourselves were. Perhaps you could not have a better illustration of the impropriety of large expenditures on capital account—which must be paid at some very remote period in the future, if paid at all—than the large expenditure on canals by the State of Pennsylvania just at the period when railways were first being constructed. The canals of Pennsylvania were built; railways within a very short period were erected in their immediate vicinity so as to render the canals well nigh useless; they were rendered useless because of the progress of invention and improvement, and, it seems to me, that while it is important that we should exhibit so much enterprise as is necessary to make every expenditure that can be met in a reasonable period of time, we ought to leave those who come after us free to judge of the propriety of what will best contribute to the prosperity of the country in their own day, as we claim to be in ours. There is not much in the financial policy of the United States which I would commend to the people of Canada for adoption, but there is one thing to which they have adhered with very great persistency from the first establishment of the republic, and that is: That all the obligations which they incur for necessary public improvements shall be met by the ordinary revenue of the country. The United States incurred a debt from 1812 to 1815, from 1844 to 1846, and from 1861 to 1865; but in every one of these cases they were debts incurred in war and for the purpose of maintaining their national obligation. Until we adopt a somewhat similar policy, how are we ever going to keep within reasonable limits, the obligations for interest on debts incurred by this country to persons who reside abroad? Sir Alexander T. Galt, in 1866, said: That the prosperity of Canada depended upon light burdens, upon low taxation, upon cheap production, and upon the stimulus for fair profits to the masses. That is a doctrine to which I cordially subscribe. As long as you incur large obligations for unprofitable enterprises, just so long will it be impossible to give to the people of this country that low rate of taxation to which they are entitled. We may approximate it, but we have got to change our policy in this particular before we can reach the ideal, which, it seems to me, the people of this country should aim at. The tariff of 1879, which hon. gentlemen on the Government side of the House were elected to support, was a tariff proposed in Parliament after very full inquiry and discussion outside. The hon. gentlemen, at that time, did not take the whole State into their confidence. They had a favoured few, and that favoured few were asked to judge as to what was a fair measure of taxation—not the fair measure of taxation that they should bear, but the fair measure of taxation that should be borne by the rest of the community. Every man is a free trader with regard to imports in which he himself is interested. There is no manufacturer who has ever come to this House and asked us to impose duties upon the raw material he uses in his own business. They all ask for changes in the tariff that are intended to affect somebody else. They are all interested in the management of the business of some other persons rather than in their own; and so, every proposal that was made to the hon. gentleman, every proposal which the hon. gentleman entertained was a proposal to impose burdens upon other parties in the community, upon the great mass of the population. Well, Sir, the Government intrusted the favoured few men to regulate the business of their neighbours, to determine the amount of taxation that their neighbours should bear and to adjust the tariff to suit themselves. Hon. gentlemen on that side of the House said then: We have a scientific machine, there may be here and there little blemishes, but experience will enable us to remove these; and every session these blemishes were carefully considered. They were brought to the attention of the Minister of Finance; deputations waited upon him, until at the end of fourteen years the Minister was prepared to declare that the machine had reached a state of perfection; and that it was not possible that any further improvement could be made upon it. However, after it had reached this condition, the hon.

gentlemen found that it did not always produce the results which they anticipated. They would set it at a particular notch and it was to regulate the amount of imports, but it did not accomplish that object. Then they undertook to protect the agriculturist. The agriculturist came to believe in the end that he was not protected, and he was dissatisfied, and he made representations to the Government, and those representations became so vigorous and loud that the Government undertook further inquiry. They found that the machine was no longer workable without endangering the lives of those who were in charge of it, and so inquiry began, and it began with the friends of the Administration, the manufacturers, just as the Gospel was begun in Jerusalem. And, after inquiry was made from the manufacturers, then the Minister of Finance undertook to go abroad among the Gentiles, and he sent among the farmers the Controller of Inland Revenue, and the Controller of Customs. These gentlemen held public meetings, and they discussed the subject with the farmers, and they remonstrated with those persons who pointed out to them the unreasonableness of the Government's demands, and they told the farmers how necessary it was that they should continue to bear these burdens which, under this admirable tariff machine, they had imposed upon them for a period of fifteen years. The hon. gentleman found that the people were not disposed to be conciliated in that way, and so he comes down to the House with the proposals now before us. But I can tell him that the people are fully awakened to the incubus of protection, and that they will never rest content, until they carry out and make practically operative, the views expressed in the amendment proposed by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). Now, the Minister of Finance propounded a doctrine which is novel, as a doctrine seriously defended on the floor of Parliament, and I think he is entitled to the congratulations of the House for the frankness with which he expressed his views on this question. The Minister said this:

The arrangement of a tariff and the principle which is to be adopted has two aspects. It looks to the revenue which is required in a country, and it looks as well to the general trade and development of a country. I wish at this early stage of my remarks upon this subject to say that so far as a revenue aspect is concerned, it is of infinitely less importance than the effect of the principle and the details of the tariff upon the trade and development of a country.

So, Mr. Speaker, we come here to consider the hon. gentleman's proposed plan of taxation, which is not for the purpose of raising a revenue, not for the purpose of providing the Government with the means of carrying on the affairs of the country, but for the purpose of stimulating various branches of industry—for the development of the country. Sir, I deny the principle of the hon. gentleman's aim, and I equally deny his ability to accomplish the work which he has marked out for himself. The English theory of Government is that it is a compact, in the first instance, between the members of the community and then between the community and the Crown, that their life and property and reputation shall be protected. The property belongs, and belongs absolutely, to the people. Nobody has a right to touch a dollar of it without the consent of the man to whom it belongs. It is to be taken for a public purpose, and a public purpose only. If expropriated for any other purpose, it must be with compensation. Now, the money which the Government take from the community for the purpose of carrying on the affairs of this country is money taken for a public purpose; but the money which the Government take incidentally from the people, but which they do not receive, and which is intended to go from the man who has earned it to some other man who has not, is property taken without compensation. The hon. gentleman has made the taking of that legal; he cannot make it moral. If it were taken without the sanction of the law, we know how everybody would characterize it; but when it is taken with the sanction of the law, then you have discouraged the great mass of the community who have earned that money, and you have made a present of it to the man to whom it does not rightfully belong. Let me take an instance. The hon. gentleman in his Budget speech made what he called a clerical error—he proposed to tax democrat wagons 20 per cent, and he made an oral error as well, because in his speech he said that they were to be taxed 20 per cent. Then he came down afterwards and told us that it was a clerical error—that they were to be put in another list, and were to be taxed 35 per cent. Now, what does that mean? We understand the kind of influence by which errors of that sort are corrected. An ordinary democrat wagon without taxation will cost about $40, if it is a good wagon. Thirty-five per cent on that amount is $14. There are about 30,000 of these wagons sold in the Dominion every year. Fourteen times 30,000 amounts to 420,000. Now, if those 30,000 wagons came in from the United States, the hon. gentleman would by his tariff get $420,000 of public revenue. Whether it would be a fair distribution of taxation or not would depend on his whole scheme. But that is not his object. His object is not to get money into the public treasury; that is a subordinate object in this tariff. The primary object is the development of the country, and so, from the 30,000 men who buy these wagons, the hon. gentleman collects in the year $420,000, which sum is taken from the men who earn it by their daily toil, and is given, along with the price of the wagons, to some man in Canada for the purpose of enabling him to be prosperous. I want to know if in such a transaction the hon. gentleman has not discouraged the 30,000 men to the same extent that he has encouraged the one or the ten who may be engaged in the making of these wagons? And what is true of that tax is true of every other that the hon. gentleman has imposed, not with the view of getting revenue into the treasury, but with the view of development. Sir, I would not characterize it development. I think I can find a more appropriate expression. I will say this much of the hon. gentleman's doctrine, or plan of taxation: it is wholly at variance with the doctrine of Adam Smith, and wholly at variance with the views of the greatest financial men who have controlled the public exchequer of England. You may begin with the younger Pitt, and go over the names of Huskisson, and Peel, and Gladstone. Every one of them has repudiated this doctrine of development. You may go over the speeches which they have made on subjects of finance, and you will find that every one of them has aimed at ascertaining by what process of taxation he could take from the people no more than found its way into the public treasury. Mr. Thompson, afterwards Lord Sydenham in Canada, on one occasion mentioned a case of taxation in Paris, where, in order to raise three or four millions of francs, a tax of seventy-five millions was actually paid by the people. And he points out that as one of the evils which governments and parliament are called upon to meet, and which they must overcome. Why, what is the object of such a system of taxation as that which the hon. gentleman has adopted? It is simply to levy tribute from the great mass of the people for the purpose of enriching a few men who are engaged in special trades or callings, and who are not any more entitled to the consideration and protection of the Government than those who are fleeced on their behalf. The hon. gentleman said, in his speech, that a tax of 25 or 35 per cent was no great burden. He must then be astonished at his moderation.

Mr. FOSTER. You were astonished.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). No, not at your moderation. The hon. gentleman admits that the imposition of taxes—and it is the first admission of that kind we have had from a Finance Minister on that side—increases the price. He admits that at the outset the imposition of additional burdens increases the price of the article equal or nearly equal to the amount of increased taxation. At the early period, he said, we pay very nearly the full amount; but later there is over-production, and, as a consequence, competition and a fall in prices. Now, in a free market, A gets his democratic wagon for $40. Under the hon. gentleman's tariff he will get it for $54. If he buys a foreign wagon, the Government will get the $14, but if he buys a democrat wagon, made in Canada, the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Taylor) will probably get it.

Mr. TAYLOR. The hon. gentleman has accused me of being a wagon-maker. I have no more interest in wagon-making or building than the hon. gentleman who is speaking. I have no interest in the building of wagons whatever.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I do not take back the principle I have enunciated, but I take back the application to the hon. gentleman. I am glad to make the correction. When the tax is on the foreign product and the Government gets the tax, there is protection to life and property as a compensation. That is a consideration. But when the wagon is manufactured in Canada and the money is paid to the Canadian manufacturer, what consideration does he give for the $14? What does the consumer get in exchange for the money? You have expropriated $14 of his money, and you give him absolutely nothing in exchange. So that whatever may be thought of protection as promoting the development of the country, there can be no doubt whatever as to its moral character. The hon. gentleman says that the amount of the tax taken for public purposes by the customs regulations, is $21,000,000. All those $21,000,000 are paid on foreign products. But now that the hon. gentleman admits that there is a tax paid which the Government do not receive, it would be very important that he should give us, at all events, his views as to the amount of that taxation. How much is it? There is a tax on furniture, carriages, rubber goods, boots and shoes, saddlery, harness, woollen goods, cotton goods, hardware, sugar. If any hon. gentleman will take the trouble of looking at the census and see the amount of these various articles that are produced, he can hardly come to any other conclusion, than that the amount of taxation paid by the consumers, which the Government do not receive, is far in excess of the amount paid into the public treasury. I understood the other day, that the hon. gentleman, or at least some of his colleagues, did take exception to the statement made by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). I think it is very important that a careful and full investigation should be made into that matter. I think, before this Parliament undertakes to expropriate the moneys earned by one man and make a present of it to another, you are bound to consider the magnitude of the transaction in which you are engaged; and I am satisfied that it will be found that the people are paying in this way, in consequence of the taxation imposed by the Government under that policy which the hon. gentleman characterized as a policy of development, a far larger sum than is paid into the public treasury. A large portion of the property of the great mass of the people is actually confiscated by this arrangement, in order that the hon. gentlemen may carry out this policy of development. The hon.

gentleman discussed the policy of free trade, and of protection, and of a revenue tariff. He says that no country practices free trade. I do not subscribe to that view. The hon. gentleman will find he is mistaken. There is no country in which there may not be customs dues, but a customs tax does not necessarily imply a protective tax. The hon. gentleman will not pretend to say, that a tax on tea or coffee, at any rate in Canada, would be a protective tax. It is a tax on a certain article of commerce. But, if our customs taxation is fairly imposed, if it is imposed in such a way as to take from the people $21,000,000, and no more, you have not, to any greater extent, diminished the purchasing power of the community. Suppose you took those $21,000,000 by direct tax from them, you would be diminishing their purchasing power to that extent, but not to any greater extent; and neither are they disabled to any greater extent in consequence of that $21,000,000 being taken off along with the price of the goods. The way in which their power is diminished is by the very large sums which you take from them, which do not find their way into the public treasury, but into the pockets of parties who are producing in this country articles of a similar character and which are substituted for those brought from abroad. Let me call the attention of the Minister of Finance to this fact, that, even in prosperous periods in this country—and I do not think he can seriously argue that this is a prosperous period—the real estate of Canada devoted to agriculture does not pay to the proprietor a larger sum than 3 or 4 per cent upon the investment. It must be carefully worked in order to do that. Let him take out the wages, the wear and tear of his machinery and farm implements, and make due allowance for repairs, and he has a remarkably prosperous year if he succeeds in securing a dividend of 3 or 4 per cent upon his capital. Upon money a man who receives more than 5 or 6 per cent is regarded as an usurer, but the hon. gentleman sees nothing wrong in securing to the manufacturers by his tariff—making that the principal aim of the tariff—35, 40, and even 60 per cent. Now, let me say this. If the manufacturer does not make 35, 40 or 60 per cent, if he does not make more than the additional price of his goods caused by the tariff, then his capital is yielding nothing, and his labour yields nothing to the country. Take an instance. Suppose some capitalist were to establish a hat manufactory here in Ottawa. Suppose he could manufacture hats at a profit at $1.25, while the foreign article can be brought in at $1. He asks 25 cents per hat protection and gets it. Unless the profits of his manufactory exceed 25 cents per hat, he is manufacturing at a loss to the country, and neither the capital invested nor the employees in his establishment are contributing anything whatever to the wealth of the country. If he produces at less than 25 cents per hat profit, there is an actual loss, and the country would be better off if the manufactory were closed and the people employed in it engaged in some other business. It is too clear to require further argument that, if the hon. gentleman's friends whom he is endeavouring to protect by his tariff, do not make a profit in excess of the additional cost of the goods to the consumer in consequence of the tariff, then the capital and labour are both misdirected and are impoverishing rather than contributing to the wealth of the country. Now, Sir, at the time this tariff was imposed, the excuse was made that goods were being sacrificed in this country, that Canada was being made a sacrifice market. Well, Mr. Speaker, even if that were true, it would clearly not be an injury to the people who bought the goods. It would be rather a difficult proposition to argue that the man who got $1 worth of goods for 50 cents was being bankrupted by the transaction. The only man who could possibly be injured besides the vendor would be the home-producer of a similar article—that is if the statement were an accurate statement. That statement has been made over and over again in various forms inside and outside of this House. The hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot) read to the House last evening statements showing the prices of various articles by which he intended to show that the market price of these articles in Canada, in 1878, was higher than the market price here to-day. This difference he attributed to the tariff. I would attribute it to something very different—chiefly the progress of invention. I am not going into a discussion of the causes of the depression of 1874-79. But I will say this—there was universal depression throughout the world, and if the time permitted, and it was in the interests of the House, I would undertake to analyse the causes of that depression, and I think the result would be to show clearly that the depression in Canada was largely due to the failure of the foreign lumber market. I could show, also, that when the lumber of Canada found a ready market in South American countries, in the United States and in England, the trade of Canada generally revived and that that revival had no relation whatever to any change in the tariff, that on the contrary, trade revived in spite of those changes. Further, any one who will take the trouble to examine carefully into the facts will see that the parties who failed in Canada in the period from 1874 to 1878 were mainly those of the mercantile, and not of the manufacturing class, that the failures among merchants represented $14 for every dollar represented in the failure of manufacturers. An investigation of the figures will prove that the failures of the mercantile class were seven times as numerous as among the manufacturing class, and that the amount for which they failed was fourteen times as great. Therefore, when the hon. gentleman proposed an increase in taxation, he proposed to aggravate rather than to cure the evil; he proposed an increase of the burdens of the very class of the community who had the greatest struggle to save themselves from bankruptcy. The remedy proposed was one suited for those who were whole, but the best that could be said of it was that it could have no beneficial effect upon those who were sick. We were told by Sir Leonard Tilley and others, when this tariff was first proposed, of the great prosperity of the United States. That was not a fact. The business of the United States was very much more depressed than that of Canada. Nothing could have been more marked than the great distress that existed in every town and city in the neighbouring republic. But it was the interest of the hon. gentlemen then to represent the United States as a highly prosperous country. Now, for reasons which it is not necessary at this moment to discuss, they represent the United States as being in a condition of great commercial stagnation. Well, Sir, they exaggerate the condition of to-day; they misstated the condition of 1873-78. Both periods were marked by very great distress in the United States. On both occasions commercial distress and embarrassment and confusion was aggravated by the protective tariff prevailing in that country. Gentlemen opposite, while they admit that the United States to-day are in very great commercial straits, are not willing to trace that condition to the source from which, in a large degree and primarily, it springs—the policy of protection. Lands have fallen greatly in value. I think it was the Minister of Railways who told us the other evening that wherever there is a protective tariff, there land is increasing in value. Why, Sir, the hon. gentleman has tried that system in Canada, and every loan company knows that farm lands in the province of Ontario have decreased by at least 30 per cent of their former value, and, in fact, that real estate is no longer the security for monetary investments that it was a few years ago.

Mr. COCKBURN. How about England?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I did not hear the hon. gentleman's question.

Mr. COCKBURN. I was saying that as the hon. gentleman was setting forth the depression in the value of lands in Canada as a protective country, he might favour us with his conclusions with regard to lands in the United States and England.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). In the United States they have exactly the same system. I do not mean to say, Mr. Speaker, that the depression in the value of lands in this country is wholly due to the protective system. But it is largely due to that system; and it is largely due to what I regard as the improvident extension of the railway system into districts that cannot for years to come be actually occupied with profit to the country. This is far too large a question for me to undertake the discussion of on this occasion, and the hon. gentleman will see that many features of it would not be relevant. With regard to the state of things in England—land had an artificial value in consequence of the Corn Laws, which value was lost when free trade was established. Values have been further diminished by the facilities afforded for transportation which have practically brought to the neighbourhood of the United Kingdom lands that are to-day much cheaper than those of the United Kingdom. Now, Sir, we have had a declaration by the hon. member for Kent, N.B. (Mr. McInerney), which goes to show how very far the Government are from being disposed to make any serious effort in favour of freer trade with the neighbouring republic. The hon. gentleman tells us that the reciprocity treaty of 1854, which the Government desired to have renewed so far as our altered circumstances would permit, was an unmitigated evil; and we had a declaration of that sort immediately preceding the last election from a very prominent member of the Administration. The hon. Mr. Colby, on that occasion, said:

For many years I have studied the agricultural developments from the farmers' standpoint, and I am sure the farmers of this country will endorse me when I say that free trade between Canada and the United States in agricultural products, would be the worst possible thing that could happen to the farmers at the present time.

Now, that was a declaration made by a member of the Government shortly before the last election, and whatever professions hon. gentlemen may have made, it is perfectly clear that, entertaining those views of the effect of a reciprocity treaty, however anxious the people of Canada might be to have such a treaty renewed, the hon. gentlemen upon the Treasury benches were not likely to make any very earnest or vigorous effort to secure it. Why, Sir, the hon. gentleman told us the other evening that the farmers of Canada are prosperous. How can the farmers of Canada be prosperous with the price of wheat at 55 cents a bushel, with hay taxed $4 a ton, in the only market—

Mr. FOSTER. The only market?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Well, the chief market available, with barley an unsaleable article, with beans taxed 40 cents a bushel, with the labourer out of employment, and with the retail merchant, I believe, in the majority of cases in this country, on the verge of bankruptcy? The Minister of Finance has referred to the census as affording evidence of the growth and prosperity of Canada. Why, if we were to take the products returned for each individual labourer, or the product which could be produced by each dollar invested, assuming that we did no better, notwithstanding any progress or improvement discovered in 1891 over 1881, the returns show watered stock to the extent of $114,000,000; the returns show a failure in the productive power to the extent of 40 per cent; that one dollar's worth of raw material in 1881 went into the finished product for every 60 cents that went in with the same amount of labour, into the finished product in 1891. I say that taking any number of results, the figures are utterly worthless. How could it be otherwise, when the woman who is sewing for the merchant tailor at her own home has the house in which she lives returned as capital invested in the business of the merchant tailor? That was done in the west, and I have no doubt it was done all over the country, and therefore the returns are utterly valueless for the purpose of either proving progress or the reverse in Canada. Now, Sir, I wish to call the attention of the House to this feature of our trade during the eleven years closing with 1878, and the fifteen years closing with 1893. Our imports during the period of the first eleven years were $1,062,052,375; our exports were $841,623,764. The value of our imports exceeded the value of our exports by $220,428,611. That, I take it, is a gross gain upon our commerce. That includes the cost of tariff, the cost of insurance, the payment of the parties engaged, and so on. Now, we collected upon that commerce customs duties of $132,468,684; deducting that from the gross gain, there was left $87,959,927, or $7,906,357 a year. That is a gross gain of 10 per cent upon the commerce of the country. Now, let me take the next period of fifteen years. The imports amounted to $1,572,969,520, and the exports to $1,420,414,864, a gross gain of $152,554,656. Our customs tax upon that commerce was $306,859,108, or a net loss of $154,304,452, or $10,286,000 a year, a loss equal to 10 per cent on our commerce instead of a gain, or a potential loss of 20 per cent, because I take it that if the former condition of things had continued and the same results had flowed from them there would have been a gain to the same amount as in the previous year.

Mr. FOSTER. Are you taking volume or values?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I am taking values, \$302,737,805 would be the aggregate loss upon the last fifteen years. Now, that is necessarily charged over against the consumer as an additional price to the goods, so that the community are that much worse off than they would have been if the former condition of things had continued. Then the hon. gentleman mentioned another thing as an evidence of prosperity, the increased deposits in the various savings banks. The hon. gentleman said there was, in 1878, in the savings banks, \$87,000,000, and in 1893, \$234,000,000. The hon. gentleman admitted, however, that when the interest on deposits was reduced from 4 per cent to $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent, the amount of money in the savings banks was diminished; in the Government savings bank it fell from \$43,000,000 to \$39,500,000, or \$3,500,000. Now, the hon. gentleman will admit, I have no doubt, that that is not an indication that the country was impoverished to that extent; so that the difference between deposits in the savings banks in the one period and the other would be no indication that the country had grown poorer, but it would be an indication that money had fallen in value to an extent that the interest offered upon money in the savings banks was less than the party could secure on the same money otherwise invested. Why, does any man doubt that if money could be readily and safely invested at 5 per cent, millions would be withdrawn from the savings banks within the next twelve months? Does not any one see that the fact that there are large sums in the savings banks, at low rates of interest, is an indication that money cannot be profitably employed outside, and that if you had a revival of trade and increase in the value of land, this money, which belongs to parties who have but small sums, instead of being deposited in the savings banks would be loaned to their neighbours, on real estate security. The hon. gentleman must know that the amount of money in the savings banks is, in the nature of things, no indication whatever of increased prosperity; it is an indication that the money can command but a small rate of interest, and that the people feel that other security is not of the very highest order. I may refer to other indications than those which the hon. gentleman has mentioned. I am sure he will not say that the slow growth of this country in population is an indication of prosperity. If you had a gold field discovered within one mile of this city there would be an addition to its population of one hundred thousand people within the next twelve months. If you have slow growth of population it is conclusive evidence that the country is not prosperous, or, at all events, not as relatively prosperous as the country into which that population has gone. If Canada were more prosperous than the United States, the population would flow from the United States into Canada, but it is because Canada is less prosperous than the United States, and that whatever may be the position of the United States to-day, Canada is still worse under the financial management of hon. gentlemen opposite, that the population goes from Canada across the border. Sir, there are commercial evidences also of the depression of trade and of the slow growth of the wealth of the country. Let me take the commerce of the older provinces. In Nova Scotia, before they had any trade flowing into it from the west, in 1873, the imports were \$11,000,000; in 1892, \$10,007,000—and a considerable proportion of the imports do not properly belong to Nova Scotia. Her exports in 1873 were of the value of \$7,372,000, and in 1892, \$10,900,000, but a large portion of that represents trade brought by the railways from the west. Take the hon. gentleman's own province, which is less affected by its relations with the other provinces than any one of the four provinces constituting the original federation. In 1873, the imports of New Brunswick were in the value of \$10,849,000; in 1878 they were \$8,500,000; and in 1892, \$5,267,000. Her exports in 1873 were of the value of \$6,487,000; in 1878, the year of that great depression and distress of which the hon. gentleman has spoken, they were in value, \$6,208,000; in 1892, the year of prosperity, they were of the value of \$6,183,000. So you have a gradually descending scale, and the hon. gentleman will find that the growth of commerce and industry in his province has been as stationary as the growth of population. The hon. gentleman shakes his head, indicating no, but I will call his attention to this fact, that the commerce in New Brunswick was as great twenty years ago as it is to-day.

Mr. FOSTER. That is only the foreign trade.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell.) Let me take another case. I cannot state what the exports and imports of Prince Edward Island were in 1873, for the Island was not then a member of the confederation; but in 1878 the imports were of the value of $1,293,225; and in 1892, of the value of $545,537. Nova Scotia may furnish a portion of that trade, but if so, you must diminish the apparent import of Nova Scotia by that amount. Take the exports of Prince Edward Island, which constitute a more exact test of the actual condition of the province. In 1878, in the year of great distress and depression, the exports of Prince Edward Island were of the value of $1,700,000; in 1892, the year of remarkable prosperity, they were of the value of $1,128,000, or $600,000 less, a reduction of 40 per cent. Then, if you take the province of Quebec, that has at the present time, poured in the port of Montreal, a large portion of the commerce on this side of the Rocky Mountains, at all events, the whole of the trade of the North-west and Manitoba, the province of Quebec in 1872 imported to the value of $54,281,000, this sum representing the imports of that province and Ontario in part. In 1892, when the trade in Manitoba and the North-west must be added, the imports were to the value of $56,239,000, or about $2,000,000 more than they were twenty years before. Does the hon. Finance Minister regard that as an indication of progress? The exports of the province of Quebec were of the value of $44,408,000 in 1873; $54,329,000 in 1892, less than $10,000,000 more, although no one can doubt that more than ten million dollars worth of exports from Manitoba and the North-west were included in that sum. I think those figures go a long way to discredit the contention of the Finance Minister, and to show that the hon. gentleman's contention is not well founded. Let me refer to certain other facts to which reference has been made by hon. gentlemen opposite. They have spoken of the trade of Canada with the United Kingdom as increasing, and have spoken of the trade of Canada with the United States as diminishing. I desire to say a word or two on that point. The important test is a free market, and if you have a very high tax on your trade with one country and no tax whatever upon your trade with another country, it is pretty clear that if they are anything like equal, the whole of the trade will go to the country with which you have free trade. I take it that the first test as to the comparative merits of the English and the American markets for Canada is the relative volume of trade with those two countries when there was no impediment to the exchange of natural products in either country. I take the year 1864, and I find that old Canada in that year sold in the English market of the products of the mines, the fisheries, the forests, the farm and manufacturing industries to the value of $4,728,000, and to the United States, $7,772,000 of similar products. So as regards the English market and that of the United States, when both were perfectly free, they respectively stood, as regards the Canadian market, as 47 to 77, and, in my opinion, that would be a fair representation of the trade between Canada and those two countries, if the United States were to adopt a policy similar to that adopted by the United Kingdom. If he can sell the article in the American market when it is free and after you have a tax of 25 or 30 per cent imposed upon it it is driven to another market, you then know that there is less than 25 per cent difference in the value of the two markets. It is perfectly clear that there is some difference; but if the trade were to continue in spite of that taxation, then it would be a conclusive evidence that the difference in the value would be greater than the amount of your taxation. Let me now call the attention of the House to the trade between Canada and the United States, and between Canada and Great Britain during three periods. I will take the years 1873, 1878, and 1892, and I refer the House to the value of free goods and the value of dutiable goods imported from each country. In 1873, we imported from Great Britain free goods to the value of $21,000,000 in round numbers, and in the same year from the United States we imported free goods to the value of $31,000,000; in that year we imported from Great Britain dutiable goods to the value of $47,497,000, and we imported from the United States dutiable goods to the value of $16,678,000. The House will see that there is a very great difference in the amount of dutiable goods imported from the two countries; in the first place, because Great Britain produced a larger number of the goods that we consume in this country that are dutiable, and in the second place, because the period I have mentioned was so soon after the civil war in the United States, that prices on all these products were abnormally high in that country and were consequently sent in a very small degree to a foreign market. In 1878 we imported from Great Britain of free goods to the value of $5,259,000, and from the United States free goods to the amount of $25,163,000; in that same year we imported dutiable goods from Great Britain worth $32,000,000 and from the United States to the amount of $23,424,000, a very large advance in the amount of American goods in consequence of the decrease in prices reaching more nearly the normal condition. In the year 1892 we imported from Great Britain free goods to the amount of $10,516,000, and from the United States free goods to the amount of $23,632,000, or we imported a little more than double the value of free goods from the United States than we did from Great Britain. In that same year, 1892, we imported dutiable goods from Great Britain to the value of $30,831,000, and we imported dutiable goods from the United States to the value of $29,505,000. Now, Mr. Speaker, when hon. gentlemen know the extent to which trade is hampered between this country and the neighbouring republic by the very high duties they have imposed upon our products, and the very high duties we impose upon what we receive from them—except the products of the manufacturers—they will see how very large is the trade between the two countries considering the circumstances under which it takes place; and there cannot well be a doubt, if we approximate the condition of things which exist between this country and Great Britain, that the trade of Canada would be enormously increased with the neighbouring republic, and that the products of Canada would to-day indicate a very considerable increase in the volume of trade between the two countries. Take the period of the Reciprocity Treaty—and I do not refer to the period that treaty was in operation when the war existed—take the years of peace when the war did not operate at all, and hon. gentlemen will find that the ratio of increase was out of all proportion greater than anything that has occurred during the last fifteen years. In fact, these figures go to show that if you were to omit the North-west, Manitoba and British Columbia, where there has been an increase in the population, you will find that the trade of Canada to-day, both in our exports and imports, is less a great deal than it was twenty years ago. That being so, how can hon. gentlemen opposite pretend to say that this country is prosperous? If Canada to-day—leaving out the newer sections of the country which have come into existence as a portion of the Dominion during the past twenty years—imports less and exports less than it did then, is it not an indication that there has been a large diminution in the income of the population from industrial pursuits in which they are engaged? I do not care that the hon. gentleman may refer to manufactures; he may refer to the progress of manufactures—a progress that will be shown to be illusory if there were an examination into the matter with any care—all the greater he shows the progress to be, the more does he show the absence of all progress with regard to the other classes of the population. If, including the manufactures, the provinces of Ontario, Quebec, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, and Prince Edward Island have been stationary in the aggregate, then, taking out these that the hon. gentlemen claim to be prosperous, what is the condition of the great mass that remains? Does it not show conclusively that not only has there been no progress, but that, on the contrary, there has been a very serious diminution of the income of the great mass of people. Why, Sir, I remember well, a few years ago, if a farmer managed his business badly and fell behind, there was some neighbour ready to purchase the property for his son, and the money which the hon. gentleman says is in the savings banks now, went then to pay off the indebtedness of the person who had become financially embarrassed. That condition of things does not exist to-day. The four or five hundred men who might exist in the large districts that were behind-hand, were then bought out by neighbours, and the readiness with which land was purchased kept up the price; but to-day you may put lands upon the market and you can find no bidder. Why, Sir, I venture to say that there are in many parts of this Dominion loan companies that are embarrassed by the amount of real estate they have on their hands. They are receiving rents instead of interest, and those rents do not represent in some instances 4 per cent on the money that has been loaned by the companies. And yet the hon. gentleman pretends to say that the country is prosperous. He may repeat that as much as he likes; he may impose on his friends who sit around him; but he cannot, by asseverations of that sort, impose upon the great mass of the people of this country. Each man is conscious of his own financial position, and the consolation which the hon. gentleman seeks to give by declarations of that kind, only tends to produce irritation, and destroys in the public mind the value of his testimony with regard to matters where confidence in his statements, is of very great importance. Sir, a colleague of the hon. gentleman told us during this discussion, that the Government were economical, and that it was impossible that there could be reductions in the public expenditure. Why, the civil government costs $1,367,700, and I will venture to say that any Ministry who are competent, and in earnest, could reduce that expenditure by at least $200,000 without in the smallest degree impairing the efficiency of the public service. There is $263,000 of a superannuation fund, which might be very safely abolished. There is $1,400,000 expended on militia. We expended about $600,000. Are the militia to-day any more efficient than they were fifteen years ago? I venture to say $300,000 could be saved on that expenditure without in the smallest degree diminishing the efficiency of the militia service. The Indians cost nearly $1,000,000, and, in my opinion, when it costs seven dollars to pay an Indian five, there is room for very considerable economy there. On these items, which, including the collection of revenues, represent something over $6,000,000, in my opinion a saving of from $800,000 to $1,000,000 could be effected without in the smallest degree impairing the efficiency of the public service. I have mentioned these matters because the hon. gentleman has challenged us to point out in what respect a saving in the public expenditure might be effected. There could be a saving effected in every one of those branches, and the hon. gentleman, if he were to undertake to practice economy, could also diminish the public revenues. Mr. Speaker, perhaps I err in saying that the hon. gentleman could do it. If he were confining himself to raising revenues for the public service, he could; but if he raises them for the purpose of development, in order that they may find their way, not into the public treasury, but into the pockets of the men whom he desires to encourage in the particular industries in which they are engaged, then his expenditures may be at the utmost limit of the capacity of the great mass of the people to bear. Sir, let me call the attention of the House to some of the respects in which trade has been injured by the policy of the Government. In 1873, animals and their products were exported from Canada to Great Britain to the value of $6,946,000, and to the United States to the value of $6,348,900. The United States market at that time, with the taxes which then existed, was of very nearly equal value to us to the market of the United Kingdom. Of agricultural products we sent to Great Britain $7,455,000, and to the United States $6,443,000. In regard to these also the markets of the two countries were very nearly equal, though the one was free from the impediments which existed in the case of the other. Of mineral products, we sent to Great Britain $1,000,000 worth and to the United States $4,000,000 worth—a very great difference. Of the products of the fisheries, our sales in Great Britain were $450,000 and in the United States $1,332,000. Of manufactured goods, we sold $643,000 worth in England and $1,068,000 in the United States. So that in these products, in the aggregate, the two markets were very nearly of equal value to Canada, although our trade with the one was taxed, while our trade with the other was free.

How does the matter stand to-day? In 1892 we sent $37,674,000 worth of farm products to Great Britain, and $7,271,000 worth to the United States. These two markets, which, when the one was free, and the other moderately taxed, were of almost equal value to us for certain products of the farm, stand to-day to each other as five is to one. What has made the difference? Is it because the United States market has become of no importance to us? Is it because the people of Canada would not be as well advantaged by having access to that market? Not at all. That market is as valuable to us as it ever was; it would still take our products to a larger extent than England if we stood in the same fiscal relation to the United States as we do to England. But the American Congress has adopted a policy to which it was largely driven, as a former Minister of the Crown said, by the extent to which the Government of Canada had awakened feelings of hostility. That has nearly destroyed the trade between the farmers of Canada and the people of the United States. I could name a number of articles for which the United States is still our only market; and, if you were to destroy that market altogether, the production of those articles must cease, and you must turn your attention to something else—something which might be substituted and which might yield you a competence, but which could not yield you the same profit, or else you would have engaged in its production without the necessity of the American tariff to compel you.

Mr. McNEILL. Would the hon. gentleman mention one or two of those articles in which we have a market in the United States only?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I will mention one with which I am very familiar, because I as a farmer produce it—beans. I have looked over the English Trade and Navigation Returns, and I find that England purchases all her beans from Egypt.

An hon. MEMBER. Next.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). An hon. gentleman says "next." I think the returns will show that there is to-day less barley by one-half produced in Ontario than there was in 1878, that year of calamity, as hon. gentlemen call it; and by what has that change been brought about? By your policy of exclusion. Take again the trade in horses. The hon. gentleman knows that England buys about 17,000 horses a year from abroad, and sells about the same number. Canada sold 17,000 horses to the United States in a single year. Does any person pretend to say that we could get as good a market for them in England? Again, take the case of potatoes grown in the Maritime Provinces. The United States furnishes a market for them; but does England?

Why, Sir, the list could be indefinitely extended.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Is the hon. gentleman satisfied?

Mr. McNEILL. I am satisfied in one sense—that the position is an impossible one.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) He is answered, but not convinced.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I do not expect to convince the hon. gentleman.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). To show the House to what extent the policy of taxation which has been adopted by the Government, has interfered with the direction of trade in this country, I need only call to the attention of the House the volume of our exports to Great Britain and the United States respectively. Our exports to Great Britain last year were, in round number, $55,000,000 in value, and to the United States $31,317,000—very nearly the same proportion reversed as existed between Canada and Great Britain and Canada and the United States in the year 1864, under the reciprocity treaty of 1854. If our trade with the United States had been unhampered and the total volume of trade was precisely the same as it was in 1892, we would have sold to the United States products of Canada of various sorts to the value of $55,000,000, and to the United Kingdom to the value of $31,000,000. But, if we take the percentage of increase which existed under the treaty of reciprocity, our trade with the United States during the year 1892, instead of being $31,317,000, would have been $96,250,000. The hon. gentleman will see from these figures, not only to what extent the Government have diverted the trade of this country from the channels in which it would have naturally flown, but they will also see the extent to which the trade of this country has been crippled and diminished by their policy. I need not pursue this feature of the National Policy any further. I am pleased that the hon. gentleman has, in spite of the views he entertains, felt the public pressure to such an extent as to feel impelled to make the reductions in the tariff that we have now before us for consideration. The principle which the Minister of Finance enunciates, and which he declared was the one that ought to control a Government in the preparation of a tariff, shows how very far away he is from the consideration of any sound economic principle in the imposition of taxes upon the people of this country. And, if his tariff had gone even much further than it has in the direction of reform, it would not have been acceptable to any gentleman who has given serious consideration to the subject of political economy and finance. Sir, if the hon. gentleman is right in his views, there is no guarantee whatever that those duties will not within twelve months be reimposed. If the hon. gentleman and his colleagues had an election behind instead of before them, a very small deficit would be a pretext sufficient to induce them to impose upon the country burdens as serious as any we have hitherto borne. The hon. gentleman's speech, it seems to me, is in the highest degree unsatisfactory. Let me call the attention of the House to some difference between the statement made by the hon. gentleman as to the taxation he is about to impose and the taxation he is about to remit, and a speech by a Chancellor of the Exchequer in the United Kingdom under similar circumstances. I think I have read within a few years every speech delivered upon the presentation of a Budget during this century; and, if any hon. gentleman will take the trouble to look at the Budget speeches from the time of Mr. Huskisson down to the present period, he will not find one in which the Chancellor of the Exchequer has not gone carefully into the effect of every remission and every addition of taxation upon the revenue of the coming year. What is the object of making a Budget speech to this House at all? Why, it is for the purpose of informing the House how the ways and means to meet the necessary obligations of the country are to be raised. Of that this House is the judge. This House ought to be satisfied that the reductions of the tariff will have the effect, which the hon. gentleman says they will. This House ought to be satisfied that the additions made, the increase of taxation, will yield the amount of revenue which the Finance Minister says they will. But we have no statement whatever from the Minister as to the effect of any of the reductions which he has made. We have no statements as to the effect of any of the impositions which he intends to charge upon the people of this country. Sir, the object of a Budget speech is altogether ignored. The hon. gentleman has gone into an argument in favour of the imposition of taxes for other than purposes of revenue. He has gone into a defence of what he calls the policy of development. But the hon. gentleman has not shown what he ought to have shown, the results that are to arise from each of the changes he proposes to make. If he does not know that, he ought to have obtained the necessary information from the officers of his department. I do not suppose that a Chancellor of the Exchequer in the United Kingdom works out all these questions for himself. He calls in the aid of competent men—the permanent officers of his department—to give him the benefit of their experience and enable him to apply the principle of probability to the customs, where changes in the taxation of the country are made. The hon. gentleman has done nothing of the sort. The chief object in delivering a Budget speech he has ignored. He has given us the information that certain changes are to be made; but whether we are to have an adequate remedy in those changes, or whether we are to take from the pockets of the people moneys not required for public services or to meet public necessities, the hon. gentleman has not informed us at all. Until he does so inform us, this House is not in a position to enter upon a discussion of those changes which, if the hon. gentleman had confined himself to their discussion, as a Finance Minister in the United Kingdom would have done, would have been the only questions before us for consideration. The hon. gentleman has spent the greater portion of the time in defending the National Policy; in pointing out the propriety and advantage of taking one man's money and presenting it to another, of adopting in this respect the policy which made Robin Hood in his day a hero. But Robin Hood took from those who were able to bear the separation from their wealth, and gave to those who had most need. but the hon. gentleman who is at the head of the Finance Department, has adopted a more Scriptural rule—he gives to those who have, and from those who have not he takes away even that which they have. Now, Sir, there are a number of matters that require attention and consideration. The hon. gentleman has proposed to alter the method of taxing books that are brought into this country. Sir, I have had communications from several men engaged in the trade. Let me read a single paragraph as to this proposed tax of 6 cents a pound, as it is now, instead of the 15 per cent ad valorem of the old tariff. My correspondent gives the following figures relating to different classes of books:—

|------------------------------------|---------|---------|----------------------|---------------------|
| | $ cts. | Lbs. | $ cts. | $ cts. |
| Five volumes at 14c | 0 70 | 4 | 0 10½ | 0 24 |
| Two do 28c | 0 56 | 2½ | 0 08½ | 0 16½ |
| Paper. | | | | |
| Eight volumes at 6½c | 0 52 | 3½ | 0 07½ | 0 21 |
| One volume subscription book. | 0 65 | 4½ | 0 09½ | 0 28½ |

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell).

Mr. MACLEAN (York). What does he sell that subscription book for ?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I do not know ; I suppose it will sell now for a little more than before the tax was increased. We are not discussing the profits of the dealer ; we are discussing the effect of the tax. Now, the tax under the old tariff was 15 per cent ad valorem ; the tax on these books under the proposed changes ranges from 30 to 35 per cent on all the works I have mentioned, except the subscription book, and on that the tax is 44 per cent ad valorem. Now, the hon. gentleman will see that that is a tax on knowledge, and I say that that tax is extremely objectionable in its present character. Let me take the case of another tax. I do not intend to go into many of these, but I am taking a few illustrations. The hon. gentleman has come to this House again and again and has proposed large bonuses to railways. Yet he imposes on the materials for the construction and repairing of these railways a duty of at least 30 per cent. Now, this country is very extensive, and its population, especially in the newer districts, extremely sparse. The railways extend for 15,000 miles in various directions through the country, and you have but to look at the market value of the stocks or at the half-yearly returns to see what the circumstances of the various railway companies of this country are. It is of the first consequence to this House to consider how far they are interfering with the settlement of the country by these impositions. I remember that a few years ago, the Illinois Central Railroad made a report in which it was pointed out, that the repairs of the road that year had cost a million and a quarter dollars, more by reason of the tariff than they would have cost had no such imposition taken place. I am perfectly sure of this, that the people of this country do not want to see any railway company coming into this House seeking for assistance ; they do not want to see railway companies going into the hands of receivers. The prosperity of the railway company in large degree depends upon the settlement of the country and upon the amount of freight and travel that, in consequence of that settlement, they can secure. If you impose very heavy burdens upon the appliances that are used, you increase the freight charges, you increase the charges for travel as well, and you put serious impediments in the way of settlement. What we want is to adopt in this country a policy that will secure to Canada a large influx of people, and that you cannot secure if you burden every line of travel and traffic, if you hold out to every railway company the temptation to put off necessary repairs until serious accidents take place. Now, Sir, I might refer also to the question of starch. You have a tax there that is more than 100 per cent. You have a serious tax on cotton. There is another question, and a very important one. It seems to me high time that this House should seriously consider and decide the question whether, in all cases where an honest invoice is presented, representing the actual value at which the goods have been purchased in a foreign market, that invoice should not be conclusive evidence as to the amount of tax the party may be called upon to pay on the goods. If you impose a duty of 15 or 20 per cent and leave it in the power of the Government officer to fix the value, you in fact put it in the power of the Government, through their officers, to levy a tax of 30 per cent ad valorem where you said the tax should be only 15 per cent. Let me call the attention of the House to this fact, that the practice of allowing the Government or its officers to depart from the actual invoice value of the goods arose during the period when the paper currency of the United States had a very variable value, and when sometimes the value of the goods was determined by the nominal value of the American currency. Under such circumstances there was a reason for giving to the customs officer a power which he ought not now to possess. When the reason disappeared, the power ought to have disappeared with it. I am not going to say more at this moment on the subject of the changes in the tariff. Hon. gentlemen on that side who have spoken, have complained that our proposition is not definite. Sir, that proposition is as definite as language can make it as to the principle upon which we should proceed. We have not undertaken to say what tax should be put upon this article, or upon that article, nor was ever such a proposition made in an English Parliament, except by the Government that was actually called upon to deal with the subject. In 1878 hon. gentlemen submitted to this House their financial policy. They were on this side of the House. What did they propose ? Did they propose to say what the tax should be on certain articles ? Not at all. They said they proposed to readjust the tariff, to readjust it in such a way as to encourage manufacturing and mining, and the agricultural interests of the country. And now they say they propose to do that. Is there in that declaration any statement as to whether the duties should be 20, or 30, or 40 per cent ? No, Sir ; it is as vague as language can make it. Their proposition was to be based upon the principle of reciprocity of tariff, and for what purpose ? Ultimately to secure a reciprocity of trade which hon. gentlemen on that side have since seriously argued would be a great calamity to Canada. Now, the hon. gentlemen last year proposed changes in the tariff, they said that the whole subject was under their consideration. Did they come down and tell us what the changes were to be ? Did they announce beforehand, when they went to the country in 1891, what changes they were going to make in the tariff ? Sir, I will venture to say that these

hon. gentlemen who have come down with the definite proposition that I have in my hand, will not stand to that proposition two weeks. I say the hon. gentlemen have acted for fifteen years upon the principle: These are our sentiments, but if they don't suit, they can be changed. There are strangers in this city, and have been frequenters here during the past three or four days, who are here for the very purpose of convincing the Government that these changes do not suit; and if they can speak with sufficient vigour and power, if they have behind them sufficient influence, they can convince the Government that this is not the wisest course that can be pursued. There is no doubt that the Minister of Finance will discover other clerical errors than those which he has mentioned, and other changes than those that were suggested since the Budget speech was delivered, will be suggested to us before this debate is over. Well, if hon. gentlemen who do not know their minds for forty-eight hours upon this subject, upon whom the responsibility for dealing with the subject rests, with what propriety can they still call upon us to do more than to state the general principles to which we have subscribed, which we have enunciated, and which, when the time comes, we shall give practical effect to by proposing a measure that will promote the interests of the people of Canada. Those gentlemen have promised that they would keep our people at home by their changes in the tariff, that they would give employment to the labourers, that they would build up towns and cities, and that in an incredibly short time, they would settle the wilds of the North-west with a population as numerous as that which existed in old Canada. They proposed before 1890 to fill up the whole North-west with people so numerous that their contributions to the public treasury for the sale of land would amount to $69,000,000. Well, Sir, the hon. gentlemen have had their opportunity. This country has exercised towards them great patience. They have had a trial for fifteen years—longer than any Government have ever sat in the Imperial Parliament, and what are the practical results which have flown from their administration? Why, our people have been driven abroad, the farmers are impoverished and discontented, their income has been greatly diminished, the public lands remain unsold, and the amount received into the public treasury from that source is not equal to the amount paid to the surveyors. And yet after this lamentable failure, after these impudent pretensions, these hon. gentlemen still come forward and say that they are entitled to the confidence of the people of this country. Why, Sir, a Government more helpless, more dependent upon the favouring gales that blow from without, more readily influenced by the men upon whom they depend, not merely for support, but for advice, never sat on the Treasury benches in any country where the English language is spoken or English institutions have found a foothold. Sir, the time has come when the people of this country will judge those hon. gentlemen according to their works.

An hon. MEMBER. That is what we want.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The people want them to go, but the hon. gentlemen do not go. After these long promises the Finance Minister has presented his scheme to the House. The mountain has brought forth a mouse. There has been a great fuss, and as much talk, and as much excitement, as ever there were in any of the incidents to which Artemus Ward refers. The most interesting thing in the whole case is, that these gentlemen who have cheered to the echo the denunciation of everything looking in the direction of tariff reform, who in effect declared that the higher the taxes were the cheaper every article became that they wanted to purchase, notwithstanding that declaration, are cheering now that the taxes are being taken off, the effect of which I suppose, will be to put up the price of everything that they have to buy. The merchant does not get so much for his goods; the manufacturer does not get above half what he formerly obtained. Somehow or other, this tariff that, according to the hon. gentleman's statement, compels him to sell at slaughter prices, that would drive men in ordinary circumstances, that live in a real land, and not in a fairy land, into bankruptcy, contributes to their prosperity, and the less they get the better they are off. But the farmer who is protected so well is assured that he gets better prices than he would if he had not protection, and the result is that he has lost his market for a number of things; he gets 50 cents a bushel for his wheat in the province of Ontario and about 35 in Manitoba and the North-west Territories, and for these things he ought to thank God and vote for the Administration. Well, Mr. Speaker, I do not think that is the view which is taken by a majority of the people of this country, and I will say this, that if the hon. gentleman wants this tariff to be adopted within a reasonable time or what we all think is such, he must condescend to give to the House information as to the effects of the various changes in the tariff, which, up to this moment, he has withheld from us.

Mr. BENNETT. The hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat has treated the House to a very lengthy, and I must admit, a very learned discourse on the merits of free trade and protection. The hon. gentleman also brought into the field some illustrations, for which we should be very thankful, illustrations to which I may have to refer. The hon. gentleman, in the course of a very lengthy speech, did not refer, as it should be the duty of every

hon. gentleman, to the principles and platform which would be adopted by himself and his party in the event, and I say it advisedly, of their coming into power. In fact, the hon. gentleman, as usual, had a rag on every bush and a feather for every wind. Hon. gentlemen opposite have enunciated from time to time their adherence to unrestricted reciprocity, and the policy of commercial union, and they have maintained against the Conservative party their old policy of animosity. I must congratulate the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) on the fact that he has not been so violent in his attack on the Government and in his denunciation of the Government as some hon. gentlemen opposite, and has not applied to them such terms as contract-sweaters and similar polite terms, applied to the Government by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton). However, I have only this to say in regard to the speech of the hon. member for Bothwell, that he at least has treated the House to a very learned discourse, and, no doubt, hon. members feel thankful to him for it. I have taken a few running notes of some of the points with which the hon. gentleman dealt, and I propose to deal with them in rotation. First, the hon. gentleman blamed the Conservative party for having taken up the policy now known, and known since 1878 as the National Policy. Well, my opinion is, that had those hon. gentlemen been in Opposition from 1873 to 1878, and had the Conservative party been in power, with that facility with which they now dodge from one platform to another, hon. gentlemen opposite would have taken up that policy which was afterwards adopted by the Conservative party, and has since been adhered to and carried out. At its inception, the National Policy was not laid down as a fixed and hard rule, but as one that was to be departed from, according to the times and the exigencies, and, therefore, it is only fitting and proper, after the period of time that has elapsed, to carry out important changes, I may almost say sweeping changes in regard to the tariff. The hon. gentleman referred to the fact that the Finance Minister had been the recipient of many telegrams since the announcement of the late tariff. I am glad that such is the case, because that fact shows that those telegrams have not been from the agricultural class, but must have been from the manufacturing class, and if we exclude the agricultural class, we look in vain for a class of people in the community to which hon. gentlemen opposite can appeal with any hope of success. They do not go to the manufacturers asking them for their support, because they know their policy is inimical to the interests of the manufacturers. They do not go to the labouring class, as they know their interests are in line with those of the manufacturers, but the members of the Opposition content themselves by appealing to the agricultural element of the community. It may be that hon. gentlemen opposite are consistent, and it may be they are inconsistent, and, in order to follow out the line of argument of the hon. gentleman who preceded me, I will take up the reference made by the hon. gentleman to the manufacturers of wagons in this country, and the extraordinary and abnormal prices that the purchaser has to pay by reason of the duty. If I mistake not, the hon. gentleman took an estimate of 30,000 wagons, on which there was a duty of $14 per wagon, making, in all, a duty of $420,000 paid by the people in respect of 30,000 wagons. The hon. gentleman must see at the outset that his argument is a fallacy. If $14 was the actual duty imposed in respect of wagons, then it would be clear that the local and imported article would be exactly the same price to the buyer. But I will do even better than the hon. gentleman's own argument, and will estimate the protective duty at only 10 per cent. Then it would result in a duty of $300,000 being paid by the consumers in respect of 30,000 wagons. Will the hon. gentleman for a moment declare that the manufacturers of wagons in this country are making fabulous and unprecedented profits? If so, how did it happen that in Brockville, only a few years ago, the town voted $50,000 as a cash bonus to stimulate a Canadian manufacturing concern. That proves conclusively that if there were such large profits to be made out of the industry, capitalists would have engaged in the enterprise themselves rather than have paid out the large bonus. But what follows from the argument?

An hon. MEMBER. They are all Grits too.

Mr. BENNETT. An hon. member says they are all Grits, too. Perhaps they had more confidence in the future of the country than the hon. member for Bothwell displayed. Even if there is a profit made on wagons, if the wagon is sold at $50, how is the money distributed? It would be distributed, according to the actual calculation, in about these proportions: There would first be $10 payable for the raw material entering into the manufacture of the article; next, $10 profit, and $30 would be expended on the working up of the raw material used in the manufacture. But the hon. gentleman's contention is, and it is an unfair one, that this would be taken out of the purchaser of the article. What would be the result if, instead of the article being made in the country, it should be introduced from a foreign country? The money produced by the article, and the profit obtained by the merchant, instead of being kept in this country, would have been spent in a foreign country, and the people of Brockville would not have granted a bonus of $50,000 to a large concern there. In regard to agricultural implements, and the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat I do not think referred directly to them, although they have been referred to by other speakers, hon. gentlemen opposite have affirmed that agricultural implements are only obtainable at increased prices. If, however, manufacturers are making large fortunes, how does it occur that if you travel through the province, you find, owing to the keen competition, the small establishments are going to the wall? Will the hon. gentleman deny that in Alliston thousands of dollars have been invested in agricultural implement manufacturing, and has been lost? The Jos. Hall works at Oshawa have found themselves unable to compete against the Massey-Harris Co. Why do the smaller concerns go to the wall? By producing large quantities of articles and placing them in competition with small dealers, the producers of large quantities obtain cheaper rates, and, for that reason the competition has been keen and the prices have been reduced. But the hon. gentlemen appeal to the farmers in this way: To-day there is a duty exacted on implements, and, if that duty is removed, implements can be obtained at much lower rates. In reply to that argument, we contend that as the Massey-Harris Co. have succeeded in building up a successful business in this country, so that they are offering implements as cheap as they can be purchased in the United States, it would not promote Canadian interests to make this country a slaughter market, and bring our firms into active competition with even larger concerns, so that in the end our companies would meet with undue opposition and be compelled to cease manufacturing. And with increased capital, having him in his clutches, he would not, to my mind, be very kind to him. Now, what are the prices of agricultural implements, and what are the prices of buggies, and articles of that kind in the United States? The member for Leeds (Mr. Taylor) last summer, with very commendable energy, started an expedition to portions of New York state with the view of finding out what the relative prices were of articles in that state and in the province of Ontario. A number of gentlemen, well known in their locality, were invited to participate in that excursion. There were also invited, two prominent Reformers, who, for reasons best known to themselves, declined to accompany the rest of the deputation. What was the result of that inquiry? The result may be found in the following extract from the report of a deputation composed of:

Andrew Gray, Esq., farmer and warden of the united counties of Leeds and Grenville; John Webster ex-reeve of the front of Leeds and Lansdowne; John Connor, farmer and cheese manufacturer; Alexander Atcheson, farmer, president of the South Leeds Agricultural Association; John Roddick, miller and farmer, ex-reeve of Leeds and Lansdowne (rear); Thomas Berney, agricultural implement dealer, ex-reeve of rear of Young and

Mr. BENNETT.

Eastcott; John Franklin, farmer and president of the Farmers' Institute for Brockville Riding; E. G. Adams, Esq., farmer and implement dealer, ex-reeve of North Crosby, and John R. Dargavel, general merchant and township clerk for South Crosby.

The report goes on to say:

From all we could learn we found the farmers in Jefferson and St. Lawrence counties, where we visited, pay as much or more for what they have to purchase and get no more for the produce they have to sell than do farmers in the county of Leeds. We also found that they are not any more prosperous, and from all that we could gather are more heavily mortgaged than farmers in the county of Leeds. We also found that well improved farms of the very best of soil, free from broken lands, and lying within from two to ten miles of the city of Ogdensburg, as well as in other localities where we made inquiries, can be purchased much cheaper than lands of the same quality with same improvements similarly situated in the county of Leeds; that lands have depreciated in value more in the last ten years in St. Lawrence and Jefferson counties than similarly situated lands in the county of Leeds. In regard to prices we found cotton goods of all kinds will average about the same in the United States as in Canada: woollen goods of all kinds and clothings are very much higher in the States than in Canada; sugar and teas are higher in the States than in Canada, provisions about the same; agricultural machinery and binder twine are higher in the States than in Canada; wagons and buggies, considering quality, the Canadian goods are as cheap if not cheaper than the American; cheese furnishings are higher in the States than in Canada, while cheese is not so high; taxes, irrespective of school and poll taxes, are higher in the States than in Canada; western corn is very little, if any, used by the farmers in the section of country visited by us for feeding purposes, farmers using chiefly their own coarse grains.

Mr. MULOCK. Might I ask what is that document the hon. gentleman is reading from?

Mr. BENNETT. This is a document issued by a deputation from the county of Leeds which visited New York state last summer, and what I have read is taken from their report.

Mr. MULOCK. May I ask you a question?

Mr. BENNETT. Certainly.

Mr. MULOCK. Is it a fact that the agricultural implement manufacturers of Canada have been in Ottawa within the last day or two, informing the Minister of Finance that they cannot manufacture in competition with the American manufacturers, and that they will be undersold in Canada by the American manufacturers of agricultural implements?

Mr. BENNETT. I am not sufficiently in the confidence of the Finance Minister to warrant me answering that question.

Mr. MULOCK. If the Finance Minister were in the House I think he would admit that. What are they here for, if not for that purpose?

Mr. BENNETT. Perhaps the hon. gentleman knows himself whether they have been here or not.

Mr. MULOCK. I do know it.

Mr. BENNETT. Well, have they been here?

Mr. MULOCK. They have.

Mr. BENNETT. I am glad you met them, because if the hon. gentleman met them, perhaps he may have been enlightened a little, and where there is such ample room for enlightenment, it must have been a delightful task for the manufacturers.

Mr. MULOCK. I am always open to receive information.

Mr. BENNETT. Now, Mr. Speaker, is it true that the manufacturers of this country are making money to the unprecedented extent that is stated by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills)? I claim that the manufacturers of this country are not making these large fortunes, and I point to the fact that the manufacturers of agricultural implements have not succeeded, to my regret, in many towns in the province of Ontario. I regret it, for I wish that they had all succeeded as well as the Massey-Harris people. But if the statement that the manufacturers are not making so much money as is reputed by Liberal members will not be accepted from me, then I ask the hon. gentlemen opposite to accept other statements to prove it. A gentleman who is high in the ranks of the Liberal party, a gentleman who is respected and esteemed by them, and whose word will be accepted, has made this statement, and when I name the gentleman, I am sure hon. members opposite will accept it as true. He said:

The stocks of cotton manufacturers are lower than they were twelve years ago. The cotton manufacturing establishments thrived under the administration of Mr. Mackenzie. Their capacity doubled within the five years. The quantity of cotton spun and woven increased from three and a half millions to upwards of eight millions of pounds. * * * The result is that the business has for the past eight years been depressed. Large establishments are standing idle. The condition of things which it was proposed to remedy has been produced. And no man in his senses can seriously argue that the manufacturers are as well off as they were twelve years ago. The truth is the manufacturing establishments of Canada were in a healthful condition prior to the adoption of protection. * * * The truth is that no new manufacturing establishments have been called into existence under the National Policy that can be regarded as highly prosperous. They are dead.

These are the statements made by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) in a speech delivered by him in the town of Collingwood. Now, that hon. gentleman cannot blow hot and cold at the same time.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). If the hon. gentleman will look at my speech, he will see that I was speaking of the city of London, and not of any place else.

Mr. BENNETT. Well, I will ask the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) what cotton mill there is in London? Now, I have a high regard for the hon. member for Bothwell as a gentleman and as a scholar, and I will come to his assistance, and in the dilemma in which he is placed, being unable to explain his speech, I will explain it for him. This speech, you will remember, Mr. Speaker, was delivered on the 2nd of February, 1891, just prior to the general election, when the Liberal party were endeavouring to court the manufacturers, and the hon. gentleman was trying to stand on good terms with the manufacturers, by showing that they were not the bloated monopolists he afterwards called them. But, as I have said before, the hon. gentleman cannot blow hot and cold together, because here are his utterances on another occasion:

We must also consider the circumstances of those who have been the spoiled children of the State.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Hear, hear.

Mr. BENNETT. The hon. gentleman says, "Hear, hear." Which sentiment does he applaud. Whether does he choose the elephant or the monkey? You know, Mr. Speaker, that in some menageries where the stock is limited, sometimes the choice is given as to which is the elephant and which is the monkey, and the answer comes: "Whichever you choose, my little girl, you paid your money, take your choice." May I ask the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills): Is it true that the manufacturers are not flourishing, or is it true that they are flourishing? So much for the manufacturers, and when the House is in committee, with the evolution of the hon. gentleman's brain, he may conceive a third reason, and then explain in the debate whether or not the manufacturers are in a prosperous state, or whether it is the reverse. Another matter on which the hon. gentleman dwelt, and dwelt at very considerable length, was farm values in the province of Ontario. I do deny that farm values have decreased throughout Ontario. There are portions of Ontario where farm values have increased, and have increased very materially in the past few years, and I will grant also that there are places where farm values have decreased. The hon. gentleman attributes the decrease of farm values to the inroad of railways. That may be so in some places; but I assume that he means the extension of railways in the western country. But no man will contend that, with such large tracts of land being offered for sale as have been offered in the North-west at such trifling prices, and also with lands thrown open to the settlers free of charge, that it could have been expected otherwise than that there would have been a depreciation of farm lands in Ontario. Why, Sir, how is it possible that our circumstances and that our case should be different from the case of the people of other countries? The hon. gentleman knows that in the history of the United States, lands have depreciated in the east, and depreciated to a great extent on account of the western states being opened up. Another reason for the depreciation of farm lands in Ontario is this: The introduction of so much machinery on the farms has dispensed with a large amount of manual labour, and, as a result, those who have hitherto been engaged in manual farm labour have fallen into other walks of life, so that these men are to-day not buyers of land. Another reason is this, and hon. gentlemen, particularly those from the province of Ontario know it to be a fact. Go where you may in that province, you see young men going from the farm into the church and the other professions. Men who a few years ago went into farming now engage in other callings, and therefore are not active competitors for the purchase of land. The hon. gentleman says that lands have depreciated in value so much throughout the whole country, that day after day, week after week, farms are offered for sale without any purchasers being found. I can tell the hon. gentleman that a short time ago the agent of one of the largest loan companies in Toronto informed me that in the last year they had not had a single sale under mortgage; they had offered only two farms, and both of these were afterwards sold by private sale. It may be that the hon. gentleman is a philosopher; but there are more things in heaven and earth than are dreamt of in his philosophy, in the province of Ontario, at any rate. The hon. gentleman being a philosopher, does not go out into the hurlyburly of the commercial world, or read the reports of the financial companies. For instance, I will read a quotation from a report made to the Canada Land and Savings Company by Mr. George A. Cox, who is also president of the Canadian Bank of Commerce—a gentleman who has been a candidate in the interest of the Reform party on more than one occasion, a gentleman whose sympathies are with that party; one of the greatest financial men of the country. I propose to place his utterance side by side with the unproved statement of the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) that farming lands are at a discount. Mr. Cox says:

We have noticed during the last year an increasing demand for improved farms from farmers prepared to make substantial cash payments. A good deal has been said, sometimes, I fear, for political purposes, about the embarrassed condition of our farmers, with their heavily mortgaged farms and low prices for farm products. That this is true with reference to a limited number of farmers in every community no person will attempt to deny; but, in deploring this, we must not forget the infinitely larger number of prosperous and contented farmers with unencumbered and well stocked farms, with good buildings, well filled granaries, well equipped implements, and steadily accumulating deposits in the savings bank.

Now, the hon. gentleman was asked to name an article of farm produce for which the United States furnished our only market; and, thinking to head off all opposition, he at once mentioned an article which, if all the farmers in the country would raise, they would certainly produce an immense crop. That article was beans. Now, what would the hon. gentleman reduce us to? He would reduce the farming population of this country to the production of beans in order that they might deal with the United States. But if he refers to the figures he will find that in 1889-90 the price of beans was $1.33 a bushel, while, with the McKinley tariff against us, they sold at $1.43; and it is not in unkindness to him that I tell him that when his party was in power they sold at only $1.23 a bushel. The hon. gentleman says—and the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) also says in his resolution—that there must be a substantial reduction made in the duties on the necessaries of life. Now, I ask the hon. gentleman, with such a reduction, upon whom will the burden fall? Certainly not on the manufacturer, who has not the necessaries of life to sell; but on the farmer. The hon. gentleman proposes to bring the farmer of this country into competition with the farmer of the United States. What would be the result of that? The result would be, that with their large production and their large exportation, they would be shipping into Canada their surplus stocks of all kinds. The hon. gentleman knows that, without such a tariff wall as we have at present, the people of the United States would export to this country large quantities of beef and pork. Go to-day into any part of Ontario—I have seen it in this city—and you will find beef from the western part of our own Dominion brought in active competition with the beef raised in Ontario; and yet the hon. gentleman will contend that if the beef were brought from a thousand miles this side of that, the competition would not be keener. Now, what are the prices at which farm products are offered for sale in the United States to-day? I read from a paper which is an authority in the country—the “Farmers’ Sun,” the official organ of the Patrons of Industry. It says:

Good cows are selling in Milwaukee at $2.50 each; fat sheep in Kansas City for $1; good yearling colts in Missouri for $5 or $6; green cow hides in Texas for 30 cents; wheat in the state of Washington for 22 to 26 cents; mules that brought $60 one year ago, going at $30 in Missouri:—

I am sorry, for the sake of hon. gentlemen opposite, or some of them that the price has fallen—

—corn in Nebraska and Kansas too low to pay for hauling; thousands of acres of crops unharvested because the prices will not pay for the marketing, and the Pennsylvania farmers feeding their wheat to the hogs.

In the face of that immense crop in the United States, these hon. gentlemen, in their resolution—and it speaks very plainly—demand that the necessaries of life be admitted from the United States into the Dominion. Most hon. gentlemen from the province of Ontario know the district of Muskoka. Although a portion of my riding embraces some townships of that district, I can, without speaking lightly of it, say that I suppose it is not one of the best sections of the province of Ontario. I have taken from a Bracebridge paper the following clipping:—

A former resident of Muskoka, now residing in Kansas, has just written the following doleful sentences: "The general depression throughout the west is alarming. I can give you an idea of the condition of affairs existing in this country in a very few words. Wheat, the only crop I may say, yielded per acre 6½ bushels: price 40c., and poor prospects for a crop this year. With an occasional blizzard the sum of misery is reached." Fortunately matters are scarcely as bad in the very worst part of our own west. The very poorest people of Muskoka are in a condition of real comfort as compared with these sorrowful tales.

Now, what do the hon. gentlemen propose by this resolution? There can be no other explanation of words "necessaries of life" than the articles which in the main we eat; and they demand that these articles shall be admitted into Canada from a country which to-day is exporting them to all parts of the world, and that they shall be brought into active competition with the productions of the farmers of this country. From that proposition I dissent; and, for that reason among many others, I cannot see my way clear to voting for the amendment of the hon. member for South Oxford. Now, Sir, with the indulgence of the House, I propose to deal for a little time with a matter which concerns, to a very large extent, the constituency that I have the honour to represent, and which I have brought up in this House on a previous occasion; that is, the lumbering industry. I need not say anything to this House about the extent of that industry, because hon. gentlemen from the different provinces fully recognize its importance. But we who come from the province of Ontario, particularly from the section where I reside, especially recognize its importance, seeing as we have seen in the past its good effects. Now, in Ontario the timber lands are sold by the Ontario Government. And in 1885, for the first time, American speculators and lumber buyers made their appearance on the scene and intimated plainly and conclusively that they intended to purchase our limits and tow the logs over to the United States. That was the time at which the Ontario Government should have imposed duties—as they had the power to do. That was the time when they should have taken advantage of their power to impose restrictions. There were two courses open to the Ontario Government. The first was to sell, subject to the condition that all the timber should be manufactured in this country. The second was to impose a high scale of fees, allowing a rebate in the case of logs manufactured in the country. Now, with regard to the first proposition, there can be no denial that such a reservation could be made, and it would have resulted in all the logs being cut in the province of Ontario. In support of the second statement, because it is sometimes denied that the Ontario Government could have imposed restrictions by which they could have increased the dues with a rebate in the case of logs manufactured in the country. I will quote the statement of the hon. member for North Norfolk made last year in this House:

In the first place the Ontario Government have refused to make the tenure as regards Crown dues permanent; they have refused to give the limit holder a statutory rate of $1 per thousand and the assurance that this will continue for a fixed period, and the American is left ignorant as to how soon that regulation may be changed, and uncertain as to the moment at which the Ontario Government may increase the dues.

Now, what has been the result of this policy carried out since 1885 by the Ontario Government, of selling these limits without any reservation or restriction? It has been that, year after year, millions of logs have been taken out of Ontario and manufactured into lumber in the United States. When matters stood in that position, after representations had been made time and again to the Ontario Government, the Dominion Government were appealed to; and in 1886 they imposed a restriction in the form of a duty of $2 a thousand feet upon logs exported. But after that imposition of duty, the Americans still continued to take the logs out of the country, and the Dominion Government increased the duty by the further sum of $1, making it $3 per thousand feet on logs exported. The result was that for a time the shipment of logs was prevented, and the milling industry, which had been to a great extent depressed, was once more set in active operation. Through the solicitations principally, I believe, of the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), the Dominion Government, in the year 1888, removed the duty of $3 per thousand feet, and the duty on lumber going from this country to the United States was reduced from $2 to $1 per thousand feet. What has been the result of that change? The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) last year told the House that there was no depression in the Georgian Bay as regards the business of sawing lumber. To that statement I reply that if you will go to Byng Inlet—which was once a prosperous town with

1,200 to 1,500 inhabitants and several mills in existence, and which was then a perfect hive of industry—you will not find a hundred people there to-day. In Parry Sound there was a large mill employing over a hundred men, which to-day is closed. In Midland, where there were large mills also, employing hundreds of men, those mills have closed down. And all this is due to the policy of the Government in not imposing an export duty at the highest possible rate. The result of this policy has been the exportation of immense quantities of logs; and when I made the statement that last year we exported to Michigan 400,000,000 feet of logs, I made a statement that is borne out by the evidence of those interested and who ought to know. I regret that the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) is not in his place to contradict or confute or call into question any statement I may make. What do these figures I have given mean? They mean that there was last year a loss to our people of $2,400,000 in work and wages. It means that that amount of money has been spent in the United States which would have been spent in this country had the policy we desired been continued. It means that in the towing of these logs—in the towing of which Canadian tugs were not employed, but American tugs—$400,000 was paid, at the rate of $1 per thousand. The following table will show what expenditure we have lost:—

|--|-------------|
| Towing at $1 per thousand... | $ 400,000 |
| Manufacturing, piling and shipping at $2.50 per thousand... | 1,000,000 |
| Freight at $2 per thousand... | 800,000 |
| Lath and cuttings at 50 cents per thousand..... | 200,000 |
| | $2,400,000 |

When you consider that a mill which cuts ten million feet is a fair-sized mill, the result is that forty mills would have been at work last year along the north shore and Georgian Bay manufacturing these logs into lumber, were it not for the remission of this duty. These mills would have employed four thousand hands, and taking an average of three to a family there would have been twelve thousand people more in the country than are there to-day. The Minister of Finance said the other night that in the matter of coal oil duty, there would be no change this year; and he gave as a primary, and as I judge a most important reason, that the oil duty was the means of keeping within the country a large number of people who otherwise would leave it. I ask why should not the same reason apply in this matter? Why should twelve thousand people be forced to emigrate to the United States, why should they be expatriated, simply to please the hon. member for North Norfolk and the member for Russell (Mr. Edwards) and a few men who have grown richer every day by this policy? I ask any hon. gentleman whether, if to-day there were passing through the Ottawa River here, under our very eyes, this immense quantity of logs, towed to the American shore,—I ask whether there would not be on the part, not only of the men driven out of work, but of every resident in this city, an outcry against the policy which brought about such a state of things? The hon. member for Russell (Mr. Edwards), a few years ago, succeeded in bringing up a large deputation here to remonstrate and protest against the redistribution of his riding. I ask the hon. gentleman whether this policy, if it were carried out in this regard in his constituency, would not have raised a greater storm of indignation than the Redistribution Bill? I ask the Government to consider this question fairly and honestly, and seeing that the Ontario Government have denied to us every right and every assistance. I ask that they should interfere. To-day the lumbermen of this country are having their pine lumber admitted in the United States at $1 a thousand feet, whereas if this extra duty were re-imposed and $3 per thousand feet charged, these logs would be cut on this side. It is an admitted fact that to-day the lumbermen of the country are making vast sums. It is known that when the duty was $2 a thousand feet they made money; and I ask to-day that, pampered as they have been and fed as they have been, a chance should be given to the masses and not to the classes by legislation in this respect. Now, what will be the result? Under the Wilson Bill there would be a return duty of $2 per thousand feet. Now, what would that result in? That would result in this: that the American consumer would pay that $2, and not one cent would come out of the pocket of the seller in this country. I have been informed by a gentleman, one of the largest producers of lumber in eastern Ontario, that to-day 75 per cent of the cut of the Ottawa Valley is sold without restriction; there is no clause in the sales that in the event of the Wilson Bill coming into force and the duty on our lumber removed, they are to have $1 more, there is no clause that in the event of an export duty being imposed and the American buyer having to pay $2 of duty the price here is to be reduced. The simple reason for this is that the American buyers know very well that the pine forests of the United States have been exhausted, that the Americans must have the white pine lumber of Ontario, and that the price, whatever it may be, must come out of the pocket of the consumer and not out of the pocket of the seller. But it will be said, as it is frequently argued, that, with the duty removed on lumber going from this country to the United States, no export duty should be imposed by this Government for fear that the American Government, in return, would impose that two-dollar-a-thousand duty. I reiterate the statement that if the two-dollar duty is imposed, that money will come out of the pocket of the consumer and will not come out of the pockets of the seller of the lumber here. Again, it is argued that if the duty is removed the result will be that the American owners of limits will come to this country and will manufacture here. That statement I deny and I believe it can be successfully controverted. In the first place by towing the logs over to the United States there is a large saving in the freight. If the logs were cut into lumber in this country a large amount would of necessity be paid for railway freight on the lumber greatly in excess of what is paid for taking it over in the log. Further, when the logs are placed in the booms at Tawas or Saginaw, it enables the saw-mill men to sell in the form of bill-stuff. Again, in some of the Michigan cities they are large producers of salt and the refuse of the logs is used in the evaporation of the salt. Further, in the large Michigan cities they are able to sell their low grades of lumber to far better advantage than the same can be sold for from mill points and small towns along the Georgian Bay. Lastly, the local market generally is better. If anything further were necessary, I think it would be supplied by these words of the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), who has said :

Mr. BENNETT.

Why does the lumbermen on the Georgian Bay export his logs to the United States? Because it is to his advantage. Business men will figure up these things for themselves, and if you do not interfere with them, they will make that use of their property that is most conducive to their prosperity.

I regret that there are not more of the Ministers here to-night, and I thank the hon. Minister of Railways for the attention, the pressing attention, which I believe he is giving to this matter, and I trust that the opinion which I hold, an opinion which is held by thousands of people who are living in that country, and who are dependent upon this as a matter of life or death, will be heeded. What did the hon. member for Russell (Mr. Edwards) tell us last year? Inadvertently, not knowing that it might come home again, he stated that as he went through Michigan he saw in every mill Canadians. Is that right? Is it right that these men should be driven to the American side to look for employment? Under a sound policy, every one of these men would be recovered and brought home to be good citizens of this country. Hon. gentlemen opposite are ever shouting for legislation for the masses. Here is an opportunity for them to raise their voices for the masses as against the classes, and they should improve that opportunity even at the risk of offending the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), and the hon. member for Russell (Mr. Edwards). I say the people of the United States must have our lumber, and in proof of that I shall refer to a few facts. The census returns show that the Americans are pre-eminently a wooden house people.

Every man conversant with the habits of the American people knows this; no man can go into any of their towns and smaller cities without being struck with the preponderance of wooden houses. According to the census, in 1870 they used 13,000,000,000 feet of lumber; in 1880 they used 30,000,000,000, and in 1890 they used 60,000,000,000 of feet. These figures show not only that the consumption is large but that that consumption is increasing. The returns prove that these people have cut out the limits in their own country, and they are now dependent for their supply upon this side. Thousands of our people are being driven out of the country under this policy. The Americans come over here and buy these limits. Why? Because they are forced across the line by not being able to buy pine in their own country. Under what circumstances did they purchase these limits? They came here without any guarantee whatever that there would not be a peremptory export duty imposed. They did not know at what moment the Ontario Government might intervene, as the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) said they might, and impose a high tariff in respect of the dues. They did not know that this Government would be passive in this matter, as I regret to say, it has been. When they bought these limits they bought them with their eyes open, and with no guarantee attaching to them. In the town of Midland in which I live is a large mill, owned by the Emery Lumber Company. Ten thousand dollars in hard cash was offered for this mill, and the Emery people refused to take the money. That mill has not run for three years. Why did they refuse the offer? Simply because they are waiting and expecting the Government at any day to impose an export duty. What is the use of that mill to them standing there unemployed, no cutting going on? They expect that the day will come when the Government at Ottawa and the Government at Toronto will come to their senses and show due regard to the interests of the people in this matter by imposing a prohibitory duty. Then these people will have their mill in full blast, and will bring back to my town two or three hundred people who to-day are expatriated in the United States. Now, I regret that this matter has been dealt with by the Government as it has been dealt with, and I regret that some hon. gentlemen have been as disloyal to the interests of Canada in this matter as they have been. I charge the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) with having been the instigator, the aider and abettor of a great deal of this trouble. Let me quote from a Tonawanda paper one fact respecting a meeting of the North Tonawanda Lumber Association. At that meeting was a gentleman whom they called "hon." John Charlton. Probably they did not know him as well as we do. This was at the time the McKinley Bill was going into force.

That bill declared that the duty on lumber should be reduced to $1 per thousand, but, in the event of any country imposing an export duty, the duty on lumber coming into the United States from that country should be $2 per thousand. That was the action taken by the Government. Why? Because they were not prepared, they were not willing that the consumer of the lumber in the United States should be forced to pay a higher duty than $2. But the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), alive to his own interests, as he usually is, and to the results as affecting his own pocket, did what? He attended that meeting and this is what he said:

It is the addition of the log-export duty to the lumber duty our American lumbermen need to bring about.

What did that mean? That meant that if this Government, the Dominion Government, imposed as they had formerly done, a three-dollar export duty on the logs, the duty on lumber should be $5, and thus the hon. member and his friends would be able to terrify the other lumber manufacturers in Canada with the threat that the duty would be $5 instead of $2. In view of that fact, what was the result? There was no interference of the Government and the result was that the duty was left where it was originally—in the event of an export duty being imposed, the duty would be $2. Now, we ask that the Government to-day, without waiting any further, should at once put into force the Order in Council under which they have power to impose this duty of $3 or $5 on logs, and to keep within this country the millions of feet of logs that will be taken across to the United States this summer unless such intervention is made. What will be the result? The result will be practically, I admit, under the McKinley Bill, which is still in force, a return to the $2 duty. Is it fair that the people of the country should be driven out of it in order that gentlemen who are interested in that trade should grow richer? We have tried the experiment, and the experiment has proved that it will drive people out of the country. Let the lumbermen try the experiment now and see whether lumber will be depreciated in the event of the $2 duty going on. I have spoken at length on this matter, not because I believe it will interest the House to any great extent, because most of the members are not similarly interested. If the members of this House were as much interested in this subject as my constituency is, I am bound to say that not only from this Government, but from the Ontario Government, which has turned a deaf ear to us, our claims and our remonstrances would be heeded. Now, a great deal has been said by hon. gentlemen in respect to trifling duties. I can assure the Ministers, and I can assure this House, that such matters as a trifling duty on coal oil, and a trifling duty on binder twine, in my constituency, cut no figure at all. What we want is something that will affect the whole community, which will benefit the interests of all. The man who can do business prosperously, does not care about any trifling duties. Now, there is another matter which concerns that part of the province, which concerns, indeed, a large portion of the province of Ontario; I refer to what is a very old friend to the Minister of Railways and Canals, the Trent Valley Canal. Seventy years ago the Imperial Government saw that it would be to the interest of this country that there should be a connection of the magnificent water stretches which exist on the route so as to make them available from the waters of the Georgian Bay to the waters of Lake Ontario, and with that object in view surveys were commenced in 1827 and were carried out. More than that, a large amount of money was expended in building canals and locks, and both the Governments of Ontario and of the Dominion have expended large sums, amounting altogether to upwards of a million dollars. The distance that would be traversed by this amount is 197 miles from the waters of the Georgian Bay to the waters of Lake Ontario. Of that distance there will be some 57 miles of canal work and 140 miles of water-ways, which now exist and which could be utilized. There have been estimates prepared which show that the work could be completed with an expenditure of between four and five million dollars. Now, what does this communication mean? It means that while vessels to-day are forced to traverse the waters of Lake Ontario and Lake Erie, and the connecting waters by way of Welland Canal, they would pass instead by way of this Trent Valley Canal from the upper to the lower lakes. This is not only a Canadian project, but I would draw the attention of the Minister of Railways and Canals to a statement that appeared in the public prints the other day, sent out from Washington:

WASHINGTON, D.C., April 3.—A scheme is on foot here to have introduced in Congress a resolution creating a committee to confer with a like committee which it is hoped the Canadian Government will appoint, looking to the construction of a canal from Waubauskene on Georgian Bay through to Lake Ontario, entering the latter at Toronto. It is claimed that commerce is demanding a shorter route to the sea-board, from the western part of the continent. It is estimated that the canal can be built at a cost of $1,000,000 per mile, and it is also asserted that the actual distance from Toronto to the south end of the bay will not exceed sixty miles. It will be the purpose to use Lake Simcoe also. Those who are fostering the scheme claim it will save a distance from the upper lake country of upwards of eight hundred miles. The scheme will be to get both Governments interested in the matter by granting subsidies and private corporations will do the rest. It is said that Representative Fletcher, of Minnesota, will in a few days introduce the required resolution. It will provide for a canal 150 feet wide and 35 feet deep, thus taking the largest ocean steamers.

Now, when this project is having so much attention devoted to it, is it not right and proper that the Government of the day should undertake to carry into effect a project which has been before the public so long, which has been endorsed from time to time by successive Ministers of Railways and Canals, and by successive Governments? What would be the result of carrying that enterprise into effect? The day for canalling has not gone by, that has been proven by the building the Manchester Canal in England, that has also been proved in this House by the Bill of the hon. member for South Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale), providing for a canal to be built from Lake Erie across to Lake St. Clair. It is also further proved by the fact that to-day the Erie Canal, despite the fact that there are upwards of a dozen railways running almost parallel to it, carries 60 per cent of the grain and the heavy produce from the west to the city of New York. The result of opening this canal would be that there would be a canal far superior to the Erie Canal. After you pass through the waters of the Georgian Bay by way of the canal to Lake Simcoe, you then come upon a large body of water where it would not be necessary to preserve a snail-like pace, but where vessels could be moved at quick rate. Then there is a water stretch through Balsam Lake upon which a high rate of speed could be maintained. From there on to Peterborough are large bodies of water, rivers and small lakes, upon which a high rate of speed could be attained. This would mean that the railways would have an active competitor in this water route; this would mean that along these routes a trade would be worked up with the outside world in lumber, the rates would be much better, and towns like Barrie, Orillia and Peterborough, would be able to bring in Nova Scotia coal from Montreal, and thus the work would become not only of a local, but of a national importance. Now, this must be borne in mind, that all along this route there are undeveloped resources in both timber and minerals. I hope and trust that the Government will be alive to this matter. I believe that four million dollars would complete the work, and that sum at 3 per cent would only amount to $120,000 yearly. I believe it would be infinitely better for this country if there were fewer small public works undertaken, and more enterprises of this kind, projects of national importance, which would further the interests of the whole country as well as of the province of Ontario. We are told to-day that there is a project on foot to increase the depth of the canals along the St. Lawrence so that large ocean vessels can come from Montreal to Toronto. Well, I do not believe that the people of Ontario are enough interested in the fight between Montreal and Toronto as to care which will have the supremacy. Toronto has received a great deal of favour at the hands of two Governments. I can say that the people for many miles along this route will get the benefit of the expenditure, and the benefit of the communication afterwards. Mr. Speaker, I have to thank the House for the indulgence they have shown me. I have endeavoured to bring before the House and the Ministry matters of great importance to my riding. In all seriousness and in all earnestness I beg and plead the Government will apply a measure of relief in regard to the exportation of logs from this country. I plead on behalf of men driven from their homes, and now residing in Michigan, that they should be permitted once again to come back to Canada, and they can come back by the imposition by the Government of these export duties. The Government can adopt relief measure with respect to the coal oil industry, and so keep our people in the country. We ask that similar favours should be extended to us. The present system results in driving people out of the country. Let the Government adopt other measures and secure the opposite results, and if the millmen should suffer some they at all events will not suffer more than the general public have suffered in the past.

Mr. O'BRIEN. This debate has been already so prolonged and has so fully embraced every subject which under any pretext could be brought within its scope, that I do not propose to take the advantage which this motion permits to make extended observations, but I shall endeavour to confine myself as far as possible to the subjects that come properly under discussion. We have heard a great deal during this debate about the National Policy. On the one hand it has been spoken of as the source of all evils, financial as well as political. On the other hand it is eulogized as the basis of our commercial prosperity. So far as regards the speech of the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Bennett), I have only one remark to offer, and it is, that if the tariff which is now sought to be amended has produced such wonderfully good results to the country, it is a thousand pities that anybody should interfere with it. I think the truth with respect to the National Policy is to be found, as most things are to be found, not in either extreme, but somewhere between them. The National Policy was designed, as was expressed in the resolution which formed its basis when it was introduced in 1878, to secure particular objects, and those objects I think to a great extent it did accomplish. It was intended, first, to give to those industries which were springing up in this country that protection which in their infancy they required. The best authorities on these subjects admit that, under such circumstances as existed in 1873 and 1874, there is reason for giving to those industries such protection as was afforded them by the tariff introduced in 1879. It was also intended to promote the investment of capital in this country. It was to give confidence in business and financial circles where at the time very great depression existed. It was intended to give as far as possible diversity of employment to our young men, and not compel them to look abroad for that sort of employment which they could not find at home. All these objects were intended to be accomplished, and to a great extent they were accomplished by the National Policy. But time went on. Those results followed which the authorities already referred to predicted would follow. In the course of time the protected manufacturer became greedy for a little more protection. The more a man gets the more he wants, and so it went on, and one of the evils which were predicted did arise, and as observable in the various changes which have taken place in the tariff since 1878, there was a continued increase in protection, and in no single instance was protection withdrawn when once it had been granted. Instead of confining the protection as it ought to have been confined, to industries which we had natural facilities for carrying on in this country, the promoter of every little industry, it did not matter what, came to the Finance Minister and he got his protection. And so it went on until in 1887 we had a very important change, that relating to the increase of duties on iron. I always was strongly opposed to those duties, which I considered indefensible on any principle of protection, except that of furthering the interests of particular sections and different individuals, because the manufactured iron in certain stages became the raw material of the artisan in a variety of other pursuits, and the tax was one that was felt more generally probably than any tax imposed by the National Policy. This feeling of discontent with existing tariff arrangements has been growing until at last it has reached the unwilling ears of the Finance Minister. A few months ago to lay the most timid hand on that most sacred edifice, the National Policy, was deemed such an offence that expulsion from the ranks of the party was the least punishment that could be meted out, and yet to-day the Finance Minister is proposing changes which are certainly as far-reaching and as extensive as those which any hon. member at that time would have thought of proposing. The justification of the action I and others took on the matter is found in the tariff before the House; no other justification is needed, and no other need be asked for. In dealing with the tariff we are dealing with a subject which requires on many grounds the most careful consideration. It should be considered and dealt with in no party spirit, but with that consideration which our national interests demand, for this reason, as well as for other reasons, that this is the last word which this Government or this House will have to say with respect to this tariff. Whether for weal or woe, whatever is decided by the House must be the guiding star of our tariff arrangements for many years to come, assuming that the hon. gentlemen on the treasury benches remain in power. But in any case, changes in the tariff should be as few as possible, and changes should be made as seldom as possible, and it comes to this, whether we are in the future, during the years the tariff shall remain in operation, to have a policy which will inure so as to carry out the proposition which has been talked of so long, of making this a manufacturing country, or to carry out legislation tending to promote our agricultural interests. On this tariff very largely these two questions depend. We are face to face in the discussion of this tariff with some very important issues. We are face to face with a falling revenue, which it will take all the ability and ingenuity of the Finance Minister to meet. We are face to face with the lowest prices for agricultural products the world has ever known. We are face to face with a depression existing in this country, which the Finance Minister may minimize if he pleases, yet which every hon. gentleman knows to exist. The Finance Minister may have lost all idea of the value of a ten dollar bill, but there are thousands of householders who to-day count every shilling they spend. I am not going to say what the cause of this is; I am not going to discuss whether it is due to the National Policy or to anything else, but such is the condition of affairs, and the hon. gentleman may quote his Trade returns, figures from blue-books and statements from the managers of banks and loan companies, but those familiar with the affairs of the country know that not for many years have people been compelled to practice such careful economy as they are practising to-day. Now, Sir, face to face with these circumstances, face to face also with the fact that we have had a very great disappointment in the result of the last census, that we have not that population which reasonably we might expect to have, and which we ought to have; face to face with all these circumstances, this tariff requires the most careful consideration which the House is able to give to any subject. The hon. the Finance Minister in the opening of his speech told us a great deal about protection. He told us in language which left no possibility of mistake or misapprehension, that protection, pure and simple, was the policy of his Government.

Mr. McNEILL. Hear, hear.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I am glad my hon. friend echoes that sentiment, because it is just as well we should know exactly where we stand. For myself, I do not admit that between the National Policy, as established in 1878, and the policy laid down by the Finance Minister to-day and approved of by my hon. friend (Mr. McNeill) there is any connection—I won't say any connection at all—but I deny that one necessarily follows the other. The Minister of Finance left no mistake on that point. The policy of himself, of his colleagues, and of his Government is the policy of protection, pure and simple, without reserve and without qualifications. It follows, therefore, as a necessary inference that those who support his Government must be protectionists; it follows that those who, at the next general election support the cause of the Administration, must do it on the ground of protection. I quite admit that the hon. gentleman and his colleagues have a perfect right to lay down the conditions of service which those must subscribe to who enlist under their banner; but, for my part, I claim the privilege of saying that I for one do not subscribe to these conditions, and I distinctly refuse to be bound by them. The Minister of Finance goes on still further and he lays down the doctrine—or rather the inference is to be drawn from what he says—that the policy of this Government being that of protection, and as he and his colleagues claim to represent the Conservative party, therefore it follows that to be a Conservative one must be a protectionist. I deny both the premises and the conclusion. I deny it both as regards England and as regards Canada. It is perfectly true that Sir Robert Peel was charged with being a traitor when he abandoned the cause of protection, and adopted the principles of Mr. Cobden; but, it is equally true that Sir Robert Peel in that change of opinion was followed and supported by a great many of the best men of the Conservative party of that day, and it is equally true that with the death of Lord George Bentinck, a few years afterwards, the protectionist party entirely disappeared; and, further, it is equally true that Lord Salisbury and Mr. Balfour, whose authority my hon. friend (Mr. McNeill) will not dispute, hold as firmly to the doctrines of free trade as do any members of the Cobden club.

Mr. McNEILL. Lord Salisbury?

Mr. O'BRIEN. Yes, Lord Salisbury. As regards Canada, I say that it is an entirely new doctrine to assert that protectionism and Conservative principles are synonymous. It has been asserted in this House, and it is a well-known fact, that the Right Hon. Sir John Macdonald, the late leader of the Conservative party, was not a protectionist. It is perfectly well known that he only adopted the principle of protection, so far as he did adopt it, in order to carry out the principle of the National Policy, which was, as I have said before, a temporary measure to gain a temporary end. I should like to know where protectionists were when we had a tariff of 17½ and 15 per cent? Why, Sir, this doctrine is of very recent date, and I could tell the hon. the Finance Minister if he was in the House to-night, that he will find at the next general election that there are thousands of Conservatives in the Dominion of Canada who will not accept his protectionist doctrines. The Minister of Finance having laid down this basis of protection, proceeded to deal with this tariff, and what did he do? Why, Sir, we have heard in this House, time and again, we have all said it, that the high protective duties did not increase the price of the home manufactured article to the home consumer. Will any deny that that has been our doctrine? It has been asserted in this House, and out of it, time and again, ever since 1878. Well, if that is the case, why does the Minister of Finance reduce the duties, why does he falsify his own contention; why does he surrender the principle upon which his party has repeatedly gone to the country? Sir, there was truth in the statement at the time—and this, be it remembered was an essential condition of the National Policy—there was truth in the statement at the time, when there was competition among the home manufacturers, and prices were kept down to the cost of the raw material, the wages of the men employed, the profit upon the capital invested, and a reasonable compensation to the manufacturer for the enterprise that he displayed and the risk that he incurred. That was perfectly true then. That was an essential condition of the National Policy; and one of the many grounds why it has lost favour in the minds of the people of this country is, that combination among the manufacturers has entirely destroyed that competition, and to-day the price of every article manufactured in this country, speaking in general terms, is raised just as high as the tariff will permit. View it from this standpoint and you will find that the Minister of Finance has entirely abandoned his position. He is either sincere in his convictions or he has not the courage to defend them; or, he is yielding to fear what he cannot defend upon principle. If he was sincere and had the courage of his convictions, he would tell the House that these high duties were necessary for the promotion of our industries, and that they were no burden upon the consumers. He talks protection in as loud and distinct terms as he can, and then he at once sets to work to reduce the duties by his tariff. He reminds me of a general who, finding it impossible to defend his position, retreated under cover of night, leaving watch fires burning, so that his enemies might think he still held the position. That is exactly the position in which the Finance Minister is to-day. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman cannot defend his reductions on protectionist principles, because on protectionist principles they are absolutely indefensible. I can, however, defend them for the hon. gentleman, although he cannot do it for himself. I can offer some defence for them on the ground of the National Policy, because I can see that, finding—as no doubt he has found—that, under cover of these high duties, combinations have been formed which raise the price as high as the duties will permit, and putting a stop to all competition—I say that finding such to be the case, it was advisable for him to reduce these duties so as to admit of competition from abroad. If he had done that he would have acted consistently, his principles and his practices would have accorded; but he did not do that, he did not take the only ground which was open to him. Why he did not I cannot tell, but it was very much to his credit, having regard to his reputation as a debater that he did not attempt to defend his practices by the principles he laid down. Taking the tariff then as we find it to-day, it is no little satisfaction to those of us, who, following out the true principles of the National Policy, have, for some time, past been declaring that the time would come when there should be an important reduction in the high duties. It is no little satisfaction to us to be able to take these changes one by one, as they occur, and show to the House and to the country, that many of the things that we had said ought to be done have been done. True, we were read out of the party for saying that they ought to be done. We said that the specific duties, which bore so heavily on the poorer classes of consumers, especially the duties on cottons, woollens, and manufactured tools, should be abolished. The hon. gentleman has abolished them. We said that the duties on agricultural implements were too high; the hon. gentleman has reduced them. And so on all through the list. But, having gone through that list, and having taken the tariff as it stands, whether the hon. gentleman can defend it on protectionist principles, or whether he cannot, we find that it remains a manufacturers' tariff still. Hon. gentlemen have said that this is a farmers' tariff. Well, I must say that the farmers have to be thankful for small favours. Let me read to the House a list of the articles specially affecting the farmer upon which he is taxed. On threshing machines he is taxed 30 per cent; on agricultural implements, 20 per cent; on lubricating oil, 6 cents a gallon; on axle grease, 25 per cent—he does not even escape taxation on the grease that oils his wheels. On drain tiles he is taxed 20 per cent; on plaster of Paris, 15 per cent; on leather belting, 20 per cent; on harness, 30 per cent. The hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) was very triumphant the other day over a reduction of the duty on the saddles used by the cowboys in the North-west. No doubt, that was a great concession to the cowboys, and I am very glad they got the benefit of it; but, as we do not use that kind of saddles in Ontario, we find ourselves still taxed on our harness of every description at the rate of 30 per cent. Nails of all kinds are taxed 30 per cent, and, if there is one article more than another that the farmer constantly uses, it is nails; he is hardly ever without one in his pocket. On axes, scythes, and all tools of that description, he is taxed 35 per cent.

Mr. O'BRIEN.

That is a very low tariff—is it not—for an industry of the greatest importance in this country? On shovels and spades he is taxed 35 per cent; on pumps of all kinds, 30 per cent; on wire fencing, three-fourths of a cent a pound. This was one of the very items spoken of most strongly as requiring reduction, and this bountiful providence of a Government has reduced the duty one-half, leaving it still at three-fourths of a cent a pound. It happens that wire fencing is just as important to the farmers of the North-west as cedar rails are to the farmers of the older provinces. I would like to know how the protectionist farmers of Ontario would like to have a tax put upon the cedar rails that they use for their fences; yet you might as well tax the rails or posts that the farmers of Ontario use as tax the wire fencing used by the farmers of Manitoba. Of course, there is nobody interested in the manufacture of cedar rails, and so the Government do not tax them; but somebody is interested in barbed wire, and so they tax that. Pails and tubs are taxed 20 per cent; wagons, 25 per cent; buggies—this may be a clerical error—35 per cent; binder twine, 12½ per cent; horse blankets, 32½ per cent; fertilizers, 10 per cent. Now, having gone through that long list of articles, every one of which the farmer is specially interested in, let us look at the free list and see how many articles are admitted free for the great farming industry. There are horses and cattle for the improvement of stock, and ensilage corn for seed; there the free list ends! Yet we are told that this is a farmers' tariff. I can tell the hon. gentleman this is not a farmers' tariff. It is from first to last a manufacturers' tariff. It is scouted by the manufacturers, and will be scorned by the farmers, and the hon. gentleman will meet the fate which people so commonly do who try to sit on two stools at once; he will ignominiously fall to the ground between them. Now, Sir, last session, when this subject was before the House, upon a resolution moved by the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), one of the important features of our tariff was held to be the promotion of trade with Great Britain; and at many of the meetings which I have addressed on this subject, I have found that no proposal met with such approval and applause, no matter what the political complexion of the meeting was, as that proposal. I do not agree with hon. gentlemen opposite in their views on the subject of reciprocity with the United States. I differ with them, 'toto cœlo,' not only in regard to the policy they advocated last session, but also in regard to that trade. I do not pretend to belittle its importance; but I do say that the people of the United States have told us in the most unmistakable terms that they do not want our trade—that they do not value our trade; it is nothing to them, and they will do nothing whatever to secure it. Therefore, I do not attach the same importance that hon. gen-flemen opposite, at any rate, do to the promotion of that trade. I look upon England as the ultimate market for our produce, and the country with which our trade ought to be promoted; and one of the greatest objections I have to these changes in the tariff is, that they contain no hint whatever of any thing of that kind. On the contrary, in dealing with the only article which the tariff affects in that connection, they virtually destroy a very important trade now carried on with England. I allude to the trade in tea. That is a very decided objection. Now, Sir, let this tariff go. I do not consider these reductions, and I do not believe that they will be considered by the people of this country, as of value. I do not consider that any one can say that a tariff of 35 per cent is a farmer's tariff, or anything but a manufacturer's tariff. Yet the hon. gentleman has the audacity to ask us to pay $750,000 a year for a fast line of steamers, in order to promote a foreign trade. Well, I think the hon. gentleman has to learn the A B C of political economy, if he thinks he can have a foreign trade and a protective system combined. I think the attempt to establish a foreign trade with a protective policy in existence is as futile as the attempt to mix oil and water. The two things are utterly incompatible; no country has ever done it. When did England's foreign trade begin? When she cast off protection. And what is the reason of the small foreign trade of the United States to-day? Notwithstanding their 65,000,000 of people, they have no foreign sale of manufactured goods of any consequence. That is due, I believe to nothing else than the fact that they have adopted a protective system. A protective system may be a good system or a bad system. I am not now discussing that; but I do say that a foreign trade and a protective system are two things absolutely conflicting. It is possible for this country to have a great foreign trade. With our coal resources on the Pacific, with our immense coal deposits on the Atlantic coast, it is no chimerical idea to believe that across the continent of British North America lies the shortest highway between the east and the west—between China, Japan and Australia, on the one hand, and the countries of Europe on the other. I believe that Vancouver and Montreal or Halifax may occupy, relatively to the trade of the world, very much the same position as Alexandria did in the old days, and that Constantinople did at a later period. Alexandria was the half-way house between the Roman Empire and the East, Constantinople occupied the same position at a later period, and those two cities rose to surpassing importance by virtue of their foreign trade. I believe that in this country we might accomplish an immense foreign trade. We might establish here a rival even to London, as a distributor of the goods of the world between the east and the west. But that is not to be done by virtue of a system of protection. So long as we adhere to the one system, we cannot expect to realize the other; and viewing it in that light, I certainly think that the attempt to establish the one, so long as we maintain the other, will be found absolutely futile. Now, having laid down this proposition both with regard to the tariff and with regard to the possibility of foreign trade, I should like the indulgence of the House while I say a word or two concerning my own position in this matter. I was elected at the last general election, when the contest mainly turned, not upon the merits or demerits of the National Policy, but upon the merits or demerits of the policy advocated by the Opposition—commercial union or unrestricted reciprocity. To those two ideas I was just as strongly opposed then as I am now. But following out the lines of the National Policy, I say that I am justified in the course I am taking, because on several occasions I have pointed out that a change in the condition of affairs—especially the growth of combines—had so altered our condition that very important changes in the tariff were required. And the one question that now arises really is whether the changes now submitted are such as the country will accept. Upon that point I have already ventured to express my opinion. I have ventured to express the opinion that they are not such as will be acceptable to the country at large. They are not accepted by the manufacturers; they will not be accepted by the farming community. The change in some two hundred out of four hundred items, making an average reduction of five per cent, exclusive of specific duties, is a very small change indeed. And, under these circumstances, also taking into account the speech of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster)—the inference from which is that if I supported this tariff I would be committing myself to the principle of protection, which I never have accepted and do not accept; which I am satisfied is not one we ought to accept—I certainly cannot support the Government in the tariff they now suggest.

Mr. CRAIG. I had no idea of speaking to-night until a moment or two ago, when I was asked to replace some one else who intended to speak, and take the opportunity of giving my views on this question. I shall not occupy very much time, and shall confine myself particularly to the subject of the tariff and the question before us. I should not have spoken at all on this question, had it not been that last session I had the honour of being classed as a tariff reformer. I had the idea at that time that there were some parts of the tariff which might be reduced; and I took rather a prominent part in agitating that question. I therefore think it only proper that I should state my position on the question now. Last year I expressed myself perfectly satisfied with the promise made by the Government that at this session the tariff would be revised. I know that some hon. members were rather sceptical, and thought the promise was merely a convenient way of putting the evil day off. However, I had no hesitation in saying that I accepted the promise of the Government, and I did accept it unreservedly. All the members of the Opposition who spoke said that the Government had no intention of doing this, that they were not in a position to make the promised revision, that if any revision were made it would not amount to anything. They talked rather slightly of the promise made. However, the Government have now fulfilled their pledge; and throughout the speeches made by hon. gentlemen on the other side, we can plainly detect a tone of disappointment. They would have preferred that the Government had not fulfilled their promise. But when we find that the Government have not only done what we expected them to do, but more than many expected, and more than some of us wanted, the Opposition is rather disappointed. I think, however, that the country as a whole is not disappointed. The country, as a whole, including many supporters of hon. gentlemen opposite, are perfectly satisfied with the changes made. I know well that members of the Opposition will endeavour to make their own party dissatisfied with these changes. I suppose that is their business. But I believe that if the farmers were left alone carefully to consider the changes—I believe if those who support gentlemen on the other side considered these changes without reference to politics at all—they would say they were satisfied in the main; that the Government had done what is best for the country. Now, we must admit that the revision of the tariff is no easy task. I am sure the Minister of Finance has found that out by this time, though no doubt he knew it full well before he undertook the task. But in going through the country, and finding out the conflicting ideas of people, in sitting down to actually do this work, he must have found the task one which a man would not care to undertake more than once in a lifetime. If we want to see what a difficult task a revision of the tariff is, all we have to do is to cast our eyes across to the other side of the line. There we see a party elected on the principle of tariff reduction—elected by large majorities—and what has happened up to the present? A bill was introduced making large reductions. It was submitted to Congress, where many of the reductions were eliminated. It went to the Senate, where the duties were raised still higher. And I am satisfied before the bill is done with, we will find the duties there on manufactured articles higher than our duties were here before the tariff was revised at all. Besides all this, business over there has been almost paralyzed by the uncertainty that prevails in reference to these changes. I agree with the last speaker that this is a work that does not need to be done very often, and, when it is done, it ought to be well settled and done as thoroughly as possible, and then left alone for some time. Now, I think we all must admit that a revolutionary policy in a matter of this kind is bad. I think if the Finance Minister had come down with a tariff completely overturning the National Policy, we should have found business in this country paralyzed. I think even members of the Opposition, leaving politics out of the question, will admit such would be the case. If the Government had done this, they would have been open to our condemnation. What have they done? They have taken a wise course, and made, as it seems to me, a moderate revision of the tariff. They have gone carefully over the tariff as a whole, selecting those articles which they considered might be reduced to the advantage of the country and without injuring to any great extent the manufacturers, and they have made reductions in those articles. There are three classes to be considered—the farmers, the mechanics and labourers, and the manufacturers. Now, we find that the farmers have received the benefit of considerable reductions in this tariff, and we find also that the farmers have received consideration at the hands of the Government in the matter of protection. I was rather surprised to hear an hon. gentleman, a member of the Opposition, and a farmer too, state the other evening that the farmers of this country did not want any protection at all from this Government. Well, Sir, in talking with farmers I have not found such to be the case; I find that they are anxious for protection. I find there are certain articles upon which they require protection, and I am satisfied they will make no objection at all to the protection they have received with respect to them. Now, I desire to say a few words about protection as a principle. Members of the Opposition have not objected to the details of this tariff, but I find that with them the great trouble, the great reason for objection to this tariff is that the protective principle is retained. This is what they will say to the country, I suppose. They object to the protective principle, and in order to have some argument against it, they declare that the manufacturers get the benefit of the full rate of protection. Now, I deny that in toto. I deny that manufacturers get the full amount of protection. I deny that, if there is a protection of 25 per cent, the manufacturer takes advantage of that protection to the full. I am in business; I have been in business all my life, and I know something about business. I know that in many branches of manufacture it is not the case at all that the manufacturer takes advantage of the full rate of protection. And I know another thing—that very often the prices in this country are not increased by protection. Now that, no doubt, is a statement that will strike some members of the Opposition as being totally incorrect, but I am satisfied that I am speaking what is known to many business men, when I say that very often prices are not increased by protection. Then what is the benefit of protection? If manufacturers do not take advantage of the full rate of protection, why do they want so much protection? I will tell you why. Manufacturers require protection in this country because it secures to them the home market. Now, only a man in business can understand that; a man who deals with this matter only theoretically cannot understand it at all. Such a man will say: If you can manufacture these goods as in competition with the manufacturer in the United States, and if you do not wish to charge higher prices, then what do you need with protection? But we do not want to compete with the American manufacturer. We want to have this market for Canadians, not for United States manufacturers. We want Canadians to have the advantage of their home market as the Americans have the advantage of theirs. This is particularly true of the countries situated as Canada is situated. Let me put a case. Suppose an article is manufactured in the United States and in Canada, suppose that in the United States they have a duty of 35 per cent and that the Canadian duty is reduced to 15 per cent. Under these circumstances the United States manufacturers have their home market assured to them; we cannot enter their market at all, but the low duty does not keep them out of our market. They can make a good profit out of a certain amount of their goods and then sell the balance over here. Our manufacturers, not being able to enter the American market, and being subject to unfair competition in this market, are destroyed.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Why do you not adopt prohibition altogether if you do not want to trade with them?

Mr. CRAIG. I have only to repeat that it seems to me that this is an argument that cannot be answered by any member of the Opposition. I can understand the argument in favour of unrestricted reciprocity (that is if it was not necessary to have discrimination against Great Britain), for in that case the manufacturers in this country would have access to the American markets. But, if we are shut out of their markets, I do not see any reason why we should let them into ours. I heard the argument to-night that the manufacturers of this country had had protection long enough, that protection was needed only for infant industries. There may be some truth in that—there is no doubt there is some truth in that. But, after all, in these days competition is very keen and we find the manufacturers in the United States are no longer infant industries; they have advanced faster even than we have, and it as necessary that we should be protected from them to-day as it was fifteen years ago. Then I am told, with regard to the manufacturers, that the more they get the more they want. Of course those who make that statement are not manufacturers. In my opinion, and according to my observation, manufacturers do not want too high a protective duty. What is the result of too high a protection? One result is that a great many people looking at the tariff on these goods say: There must be something in that business, and so they go into it, and thus we have too much home competition. That has been the result in Canada. Though our tariff has been low compared with that of the United States, undoubtedly that result has followed in each country, and if we look across the border we see the same result there. I believe that most of the manufacturers are satisfied with moderate protection, but it must be protection that protects. I think it will be admitted by all members of this House that manufacturers are an advantage to a country. I find that cities and towns are willing to give large bonuses to get certain factories established in their midst. Why do they do this? To hear hon. gentlemen opposite, one would think that manufactures were a great disadvantage to a country; that we all ought to go back to the land and take to farming; that manufacturers were all robbers trying to steal all they could from the rest of the community. I have met many manufacturers, and I am happy to say that this is not my opinion of them. Not only are manufacturers a great advantage to a city or a town, but they are a very great advantage to the farmers as well. Farmers know this well enough. In talking politics they may convey a different impression, but we know that, as a matter of business, a farmer will give more for a farm near a manufacturing centre than for one that is miles away. He knows that if he has such a farm he can come in every Saturday and sell such things as butter and eggs without having to ship them away to some foreign country and take a lower price. He knows that he secures a higher price for everything he has to sell because he is near a manufacturing centre. And if it were not for moderate protection, these manufacturing centres in this country would be very much reduced in my opinion. Now, if this be so; if it be true that these manufacturing centres are of great advantage to the farmers, I think most farmers will have no objections to pay a little more on account of protection in order to gain these compensating advantages. I am satisfied of this, that the farmers, if they consider this question aside from general politics, are quite satisfied. I am satisfied that under the tariff now brought down by the Finance Minister they will be better off in this country than they are in any other country in the world. I am glad that the Opposition take their stand so firmly and so decidedly on the policy of no protection. I have long wanted to know exactly where they did stand; now we know. It is just as well that the country should know that, it is just as well that manufacturers of this country should know that they are entirely opposed to protection, that they do not believe in giving the manufacturers even moderate protection. It is just as well that the mechanics and workmen of this country should know that, it is just as well that the farmers should know that, so that if hon. gentlemen opposite should happen to get into power, they would have to do away with all protection, if they are consistent; they would have to take away all protection from manufacturers, and all protection from the workmen who are employed in those factories, and all protection to the farmers. If that is where they stand, it is just as well that the country should know it. The Conservative party, on the other hand, takes its stand on moderate protection to our industries, and this protection includes farmers, mechanics and manufacturers. Now, taking for granted the principle of protection we are not afraid to say that we are protectionists. The last speaker said he was not a protectionist. He said: It does not follow that a man must be out of the Conservative party because he is not a protectionist. Perhaps not, but then he is not in accord with the Conservative party of to-day. There is no doubt of that, because we take our stand on the principle of protection, we believe in protecting our home industries. Well, admitting that, how has the tariff been revised? I have been interested in seeing what the newspapers have to say about this tariff, and I am going to read selections from a paper which should have weight with hon. members on the other side of the House. It is a paper which, I believe, supports them invariably, a paper which I think is more extreme than even some regular party papers—I believe it calls itself independent. When I mention the name I think hon. members opposite will be quite satisfied to take its testimony. This paper is the Montreal 'Daily Witness,' and I am going to read the heading that appeared in this paper on 28th March, after the Finance Minister's speech was delivered:

CANADA'S NEW TARIFF.

EVERYTHING WILL BE CHEAPER.—REDUCTIONS NUMEROUS AND CONSIDERABLE.—LARGE ADDITION TO THE FREE LIST.

Farmers get the lion's share of the favours—Iron and sugar duties lower—large reductions in duties of agricultural implements—smaller reductions on woollens, cottons and furniture.

I was a little surprised when I read this paper and saw those admissions, because, while I agree with the 'Witness' on this occasion, it is almost the only time I have been able to agree with it for many years. I am going to read a little more from an editorial:

THE REVISED TARIFF.

The Dominion Government has acknowledged the error of its ways. It has changed its policy. Though it may still protest loudly that it holds by protection, it has reduced the protectionist tariff duties nearly all round, only a peculiarly favoured industry here and there being allowed to retain its old privileges unimpaired.

Then it goes on to say afterwards:

The Government has introduced tariff reform with loud declarations in favour of protection. That is as it should be. It might have maintained a full protective tariff with declarations in favour of tariff reform. It is under the necessity of apologizing to the protectionists, not to the tariff reformers. Canada has at last turned her face towards free trade. It is the first step that costs, though the step is not a very great one. * * * The farmers have received, as they badly needed, special consideration in the revision of the tariff.

Now, here is something very important:

Every farm is worth more to-day than yesterday, said a practical farmer this morning, after reading the newly revised tariff.

Then they go on, and say at the end of this article:

With lighter taxation and easier conditions for the farmers, Canada's fertile lands will more rapidly fill up, and our manufacturers will have the enlarged home markets which are their first necessity. Everything looks more hopeful for Canada now that she has turned her face towards free trade.

While I do not agree with everything in that article, I agree that material reductions have been made in favour of the farmers. In looking over the tariff, it struck me that in some cases too great reductions had been made. I suppose that is inevitable. It is impossible to frame a tariff of this kind and satisfy everybody. One great difficulty in altering a tariff is that reductions must be made that will be perhaps injurious to some branches of business. I do not know that there are many in this, but I may say here, that where the Government find on inquiry, by representations made to them, that these reductions will destroy established industries, I hope the Government will make changes in their favour. We have heard to-night a prophesy made by the hon. member for Bothwell that this great tariff will all be changed within two weeks. Well, I do not think so. I have no doubt a few changes will be made; I do not know it; I am not in the confidence of the Minister, but I may say that I hope some changes will be made. While I say that, it does not follow that I think the Government does not know its own mind. The desire of the Government is not to do what they think will be advantageous to themselves, but what they think will be for the good of the country. I do not think they have any fixed ideas with reference to any particular duty. They are not like some hon. members in a Government a great many years ago, who thought that they knew more than all the country combined, and would make no changes, although urged to do so. I believe if the Government find that some of these changes will destroy certain manufactures they will make a change. I hope they will, and I shall be very glad to know that. Now, I have a word to say on reciprocity, and I only speak of this question because some hon. members have spoken on the other side as if the members on this side were hostile to reciprocity with the United States. Speaking for myself, I may say that I am favourable to reciprocity. I have always entertained the most friendly feelings to the United States; but I am sorry to notice that while I believe the bulk of the people in the United States are friendly to Canada, some of their politicians are not. I do not know whether they assume that feeling for party purposes, perhaps they think they can get votes in a certain quarter by pursuing an unfriendly policy towards Canada. But whatever the reason, there are some politicians who take every opportunity of showing their unfriendly feeling to this country. I do not believe that is the feeling of the United States as a whole, and if I can do anything, or say anything, to promote friendly feeling between these two countries, I shall always take pleasure in doing so. I say I am in favour of a fair reciprocity, and I shall always do all I can to back up a Government that takes measures to secure reciprocity—not a reciprocity which would be one-sided, but a reciprocity which would be for the advantage, not only of that country, but of this country. I believe a reciprocity treaty of that kind might be framed which would be an advantage to both countries. We are lying so close together that if we had reciprocity in certain articles, our trade would be largely increased. I am happy to say that I agree with those hon. gentlemen opposite who say that for certain articles the United States is our natural market. I said so last year, and I say so again. There are certain things we raise in this country for which the United States is the natural market; there are other things for which Great Britain is the natural market. I want to cultivate both markets. I say again, and I wish to make it emphatic, that so far as I am concerned, I am strongly in favour of reciprocity with the United States. Now, in conclusion, let me say a word or two about the amendment of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). In voting on this question we have to vote either for the resolutions brought down by the Government, or to vote for this amendment. Now, I have looked at this amendment for a few moments and to my mind it is perfectly inconsistent. I have taken from it two ideas. The amendment states that the principle of protection must be eliminated. There is no uncertain sound about that, and I am glad of it. But I find further down something that looks rather suspicious. Hon. gentlemen opposite hope to manage by some way to get into power, and they hold out the olive branch to the manufacturers, although at the same time they declare that the principle of protection should be abolished. They use the phrase in the amendment "while not doing injustice to any class." What kind of justice do they wish to deal out to those who have large capital invested in our many industries. I presume that this ambiguous phrase is inserted in order to give them some kind of an election cry on which to go to the country. The Conservative party has sustained the principle of protection; and the Finance Minister says that is what the party stands on. Hon. gentlemen opposite way: We do not believe in protection, but at the same time no injustice must be done to any industry. That amendment is very shrewdly designed; but when carefully considered, the manufacturer and workingman are not apt to be deceived in that way, and I am glad the Liberal party have taken their stand strongly on the principle of no protection, so that this clause inserted in the amendment will not mislead any one. This tariff revision is of the utmost importance. It may take some time to ascertain how the new tariff will work. It is impossible to tell how it will affect all classes. We must have some patience. No doubt our manufacturers are afraid that some reductions made will have the most disastrous effects, but the conditions may alter from other changes made in the tariff, so that they will not have an injurious effect. For myself, while there are a few items in the tariff as brought down in which I should like to see a change, on the whole I am prepared to accept the tariff as a concession to the wishes of the country, which has spoken in no uncertain way in favour of a reduction in the tariff. I am glad the Government has had the good sense to recognize the responsibility of their position so as to make these changes, that they have been told enough to grapple with the subject, and I am satisfied that not only the members of this side of the House but members of the Opposition, if they will speak their own mind frankly and sincerely, will say that the Government have by going so far as they have done in reducing the duties, acted wisely and that they are satisfied on the whole that the tariff will be to the benefit of the country.

Mr. DAWSON. I am very glad to hear one admission made by the hon. member who has just taken his seat, that the United States is the natural market for some of our products. The prevailing opinion among hon. gentlemen opposite seems to be that the United States is not the natural market for any commodity we have to offer. But the feature of this debate which strikes me as very noticeable is that hon. gentlemen persist in discussing the tariff solely from the manufacturers' standpoint. It is apparent that their worship of the false god of protection is as fervent as ever. We had hoped when the Finance Minister was delivering his Budget that hon. gentlemen opposite had turned their backs upon their idols, but since the delivery of the Budget we have had visits from the high priests of protection, the manufacturers, combinesters and monopolists, who have been here instructing hon. gentlemen opposite. These high priests have exhorted hon. gentlemen opposite to stand firm by their faith and not turn their backs on their idols. I think they have found some of them obdurate, and have found it necessary to threaten them, they have even found it so necessary to threaten to deprive them of the fire of the gods at election time, of the sinews of war for their needs, those financial sinews which they have always found it necessary to obtain when face to face with the foe. However, they have all turned back again to the worship of the false faith, they worship protection and offer the consumers of the country as a sacrifice to the hungry god! Apparently so long as hon. gentlemen are in power we shall have to submit as patiently as we may to the extortions of the monopolists. Are these the only classes in the country who have rights? Have the farmers no rights? Have the merchants, the miners, the lumbermen, the fishermen, the professional men and the labouring men no rights? Must all be compelled by legislation to pay tribute to a privileged few in order that the principle of protection may be maintained? They have pinned their faith on the principle of protection, and are determined to sink or swim by it. It is not fair to give protection to one class and refuse it to another. What protection have the merchants of this country? The only protection they have is a knowledge of their business, and this suffices to enable them to meet keen competition in different branches of their trade. Our miners have no protection. The products of the mines must be sold in open market, and no protection is granted them. The lumbermen, with their heavily-taxed supplies, must sell the product of their labour in the open markets of the world without a shadow of protection. The fishermen have to sell the product of their labour in the open market, unprotected by any form of legislation. The professional and the labouring men—I bracket them, for both are labouring men—have to face unprotected the labour markets of the world. What protection have the farmers? Do they get one cent more for the wheat which is sold for consumption in Canada than they do for wheat sold for shipment to Liverpool? Do they obtain one cent more for beef sold for home consumption than they do for that destined for the market abroad? Do they receive any more for their hay, eggs, cheese, barley or any other commodity sold in the home market for consumption in Canada than they do when it is sold for shipment abroad? On what articles does protection benefit the farmers? Do not hon. gentlemen opposite know that the prices in the English market govern the prices here, and the farmers must be content to receive here for such articles as they sell for home consumption the same prices as are obtained for shipment abroad? There is a bid, however, made for the farmers' vote on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite by declaring emphatically that this is a farmers' tariff, that it protects them from American competition, and saves them from the danger they would run if our markets were free to American farm products. The Controller of Customs said:

It is admitted that our products, whether of minerals or cereals, are of better quality than those of the United States, and therefore command higher prices. In many instances the animals and the cereals of Canada, on account of their superior qualities, are in demand in the United States.

All admit the truth of this. At the World's Fair, Canada forced acknowledgment of this truth from a competing world. Then why fear American competition? Legislation cannot fix the value of the farm products. Our cattle are selling to-day at prices which the buyers themselves declare is just stealing them. The hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) uttered a plain truth last session, namely, that legislation cannot add to the value of farm products, but legislation can enable the farmer to produce at less cost by relieving him of taxation on what he requires. The only protection needed, and the only relief asked, is to be relieved from all unnecessary taxation, and above all to be freed from the merciless clutch of monopoly. So the farmers demand the right to buy where they wish and not to pay tribute to a few privileged manufacturers. Let me tell hon. gentlemen opposite that the people of Canada will not much longer submit to the exactions of monopolists, that the protection upon which they have pinned their faith is a false god, and will fail them in their need. However, the concessions which the Government have made, insignificant though they be, prove the strength of the movement in favour of tariff reform. Who wrung these concessions from the Government? I claim a victory for the Liberal party in every concession made that tends to lessen or equalize the burden of taxation. The Liberals advocated ad valorem instead of specific duties, and we have in the proposed tariff the abolition of specific duties on cottons and on woollens. The Liberals, led by the hon. member for South Brant

(Mr. Paterson), advocated the free admission of sugar up to No. 16 Dutch standard in colour, and the tariff resolution proposes that raw sugar up to No. 16 Dutch standard shall be admitted free. The same hon. member demanded a reduction in duty on refined sugar from 80 cents per 100 pounds to 50 cents per 100 pounds, and the Government propose to reduce the duty to 64 cents per 100 pounds. Protection on cotton was vigorously attacked by the hon. member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar), and we have a pretense at yielding on the part of the hon. gentlemen opposite, who give a reduction of less than 1 per cent, leaving the duty at an average of 24 per cent, whereas the old tariff demanded a duty equivalent to 25 per cent. Led by the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock), the Liberals demanded the abolition of the duty on binder twine, and last session, yielding to this persistent demand, hon. gentlemen opposite reduced the duty one-half; during this session they have refused to put it where it ought to be, namely, upon the free list. The Liberals demanded free barbed wire, and we have the duty upon it reduced. The Liberals demanded that light in the homes of the poor should not be taxed and that coal oil should be admitted into this country free; and we have had the removal of some restrictions which has had the effect of slightly reducing the cost of that very necessary article. The Liberals demanded the free admission of agricultural implements, and yielding to this pressure, hon. gentlemen opposite have reduced the duty from 35 to 20 per cent. For years the Liberals have advocated these and other changes in the tariff through the press, upon the platform, and upon the floor of this House; and the result is so much of relief as we have now obtained. What does this so-called tariff reform amount to? We have to-day a tariff averaging 30 per cent instead of the 35 per cent tariff which preceded it. The Government propose to exact $3 upon every $10 worth of goods imported into this country—a taxation of nearly one-third of the value of an article which any one might desire to import. The Government stand by protection, and yet they must know that it has failed. Canada is a young country with plenty of room for thousands of people throughout her broad domain. We have also been very liberal in the expenditure of our public funds; millions upon millions have been spent in the construction of railways, in the construction of canals, in the construction of docks and other public works, and yet we have almost no growth. In the North-west, we have hundreds of thousands of square miles of the most fertile land on earth to offer to intending settlers—lands rich in minerals, lands rich in timber; we have inexhaustible fisheries, we have petroleum areas there sufficient to supply the world, and yet with all this natural wealth which we have to offer intending settlers, there is in Canada almost no growth. Canada was fourteen years old when the census was taken in 1881. Youthful life-blood coursed through her veins, and we had the right to expect a vigorous growth. The census was taken ten years later, and revealed the fact that we were almost at a standstill. We found that Canada was being dwarfed in stature, and that she had no growth. There must be some cause for this, and the cause is: That we have not been giving our young country suitable diet. These gentlemen opposite have been feeding her on diet unsuited to the growth of a vigorous country like Canada. Restriction, monopoly, class legislation; none of these are suited to develop a young country like ours, and they have been the main cause of the lamentable results revealed to the world in the census of 1891. Her energies have been paralyzed by the poison of protection, and she bids fair to stand still amid the growth of the nations of the world. Has the World's Fair no lesson for hon. gentlemen opposite? Unprotected industries of Canada brought honour upon the name of Canada. Our fishermen displayed the wealth of the seas; our miners' exhibit attracted the envious gaze of the world; our lumbermen demonstrated the value of our forests, and our farmers took front rank among the nations of the earth. Where were our manufacturers? As compared with our other exhibits, they failed, and failed signally, to add lustre to the fame of Canada. After fifteen years of protection, our manufacturers demonstrated this fact: That our infant industries are infants still. Nor will they grow strong until they are subjected to that keen competition which alone can draw out the energies of the people, that competition which our unprotected industries have had to meet all along, handicapped as they were by the excesses of tariff inflicted upon them. This keen competition, and this alone will make of Canada a great manufacturing nation. We have in Canada unlimited water power. We have an industrial class unexcelled on the face of the globe, we have an inexhaustible food supply, we have all the elements that should make us succeed as a manufacturing nation. All that we require is enlarged markets, and enlarged markets we cannot have for our manufacturers unless restriction is removed from trade, unless our people are able to manufacture at such prices as will command the markets of the world. We demand a lower tariff, but we also demand enlarged markets. What effort has been made by the Government in this direction? The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce has taken a journey to Australia. How much farm produce can they take from us in Australia, and of what benefit will trade with Australia be to Canada? At a meeting of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association in Toronto, the Minister of Trade and Commerce made this declaration:

The Government had sent him to spy out the land and he had collected some valuable information. The Government were prepared to do their duty with reference to Australia and to exchange commodities on an equitable basis * * *

Mr. Bowell then gave a detailed list of United States exports to Australia, showing that in many lines the Canadian manufacturer could compete profitably with them. These items were divided as follows:—Agricultural implements, brooms and brushes, carriages, horse cars, patent medicines, chemicals, dyes, medicines, cotton goods, fish, canned salmon, cordage, canned fruit, India-rubber boots and shoes, iron castings, machinery, nails, saws, tools, scales, balances, sewing machines, engines, stationary boilers, pails, stoves, ranges, &c., wire, all other manufactures of iron, leather, boots and shoes, harness and saddles, other manufactures of leather, lime and cement, malt liquors, slate roofing, stone, manufactures of; musical instruments, organs, pianos, oil, whale or fish, kerosene, oil, lubricating; paints and painters' colours; paper, printing and wrapping; platedware; soap, toilet soap, common; tobacco, cigars, vegetables, canned; timber and manufactures of.

In agricultural implements, carriages and horse cars, and patent medicines a great trade might be done. All these could be manufactured as well in Canada as in the United States. It was the same with cotton.

Yet the same hon. gentleman had previously declared that the policy of the Liberal party meant the destruction of the industries of this country. Now, the policy of the Liberal party, as I understand it, is that of revenue tariff, and under revenue tariff there is certainly incidental protection to the manufacturers of this country, yet according to the Minister of Trade and Commerce that incidental protection to the manufacturers would not be sufficient to enable them to hold their own market; it would not enable them to compete for the trade of Canada here in our own country, although these men are able to go abroad and compete in the Australian market with the manufacturers of the whole world. The inconsistency of hon. gentlemen opposite has struck those of us on this side of the House at any rate if it has not occurred to themselves. If Canada can compete in manufactured goods with the manufacturers of other countries, as the Minister of Trade and Commerce declares they can, there is no danger or fear of the manufacturers of Canada suffering under the revenue tariff policy of the Liberals. Develop Australian trade by all means; but why have hon. gentlemen opposite, with the exception of the last speaker, belittled the advantage of the American market to us? They make much of the home market. What is the American market but an enlargement of the home market for our agricultural products? We are perfectly conversant with the requirements of that market; we know the excellence of our products; we know that they will command that market, and that a large trade in agricultural products can be built up there in the teeth of American competition. We desire that market; we want the Government to make an effort to secure it for us. What effort have they made? Mr. Wilson, in the Bill now before Congress, put many items on the free list. Some of them remain, and some of them are about to be removed. Among these was an item in which the constituency which I have the honour to represent is largely interested; that is, iron ore. Iron ore was put on the free list; but what encouragement did the Government of this country give the promoters of that bill to leave that item there? The bill went to the Senate, and there it is proposed to impose a tax of 40 cents a ton, practically a prohibitive tax upon iron ore. There are vast deposits of iron ore in the constituency from which I come, and vast sums of money have been invested in the iron mining industry there. At one time it was flourishing, and villages of miners grew up around the mouths of the different mines; but the imposition of the American duty, some years ago, killed that industry. Today those mines are silent, and the money spent in working them has been withdrawn from circulation in the country. But some hon. gentlemen opposite say, let us keep our own ore for consumption in this country. Why, Sir, there are single townships in the province of Ontario that have iron ore enough to supply the needs of the world for generations; and yet there are hon. gentlemen who say: Keep it all, we have none to spare. We on this side are accused of speaking as if we desired to destroy the industries of this country. When hon. gentlemen opposite turned their back on the British principle of free trade and adopted the policy of protection and excessive taxation which was forced upon the war-debt-ridden Americans, they made certain promises of rosy hue to this country. They promised that industrial villages would spring up all over the land and that a large industrial population would be given employment who would become consumers of our produce. In that way we were to be compensated for the sacrifice that we were asked to make. What was that sacrifice? That we would consent to an enhancement in the price of the goods we desired to purchase. This was the promise that was made. After fifteen years' trial, how does the matter stand? We find that their promises have largely failed. But I will admit that the industries of the country have increased since that policy was proposed. The benefit which manufactures are to a country may be measured chiefly by their wage-sheet. The increase in the wage-sheet of the manufacturers is the measure of the benefit that those industries are to all except the owners of them. The increase in the wage-sheet from 1881 to 1891 was $40,000,000. That was not by any means due to the policy of protection alone; but if we give hon. gentlemen opposite the credit for the whole increase, our share of that is limited to whatever profits may have acerued to us in the circulation of that sum. I think I can show that the price of the total output of the manufacturing concerns of this country has been enhanced 15 per cent—let us say 10 per cent above what would be a fair and remunerative price, above what the price would be if protection were withdrawn. Now, 10 per cent enhancement in the value of the output means that the people of this country are forced to contribute $47,000,000 every year as a bonus to the manufacturers in return for whatever benefit the increase in the wage-sheet of the manufacturer may be to them. This is the result of the bargain made with the manufacturers; we take for our share whatever profit there may be in the circulation of $40,000,000 a year—they extort from us a bonus amounting to $47,000,000 a year. I find on reference to the census returns that the output of the manufacturer in 1891 was $475,000,000, the cost of the raw materials, $256,000,000, and the wages paid, $99,000,000. The cost of the output at the factory was $355,000,000; so that they sold the output for $120,000,000 in advance of its cost. Allowing $20,000,000, which is the outside figure, for the cost of placing those goods on the market, and we find that their net earnings amounted in that year to $100,000,000. The capital of these industries, swollen by the value of buildings which are in no sense factories, but which are included to make a favourable showing for their pet policy, amounts to $354,000,000; and $100,000,000 profit means an interest on that capital of no less than 30 per cent. An average reduction of 10 per cent in the selling price would leave them an interest on the capital invested of 15 per cent, which is surely an ample return, and a sufficient guarantee that there is no danger of the factories going down, and it would save to the consumer $47,000,000 a year. Some of our industries have been more heavily protected than others, among them the iron rolling mills. Their output in 1891 sold for $1,750,000; the cost of the raw material was $575,000; the wages paid were $335,000; the cost of selling their output was $90,000; and we find that their output cost, when placed on the market, $1,000,000, yielding them a profit of $750,000, or almost 75 per cent on $1,016,000, the capital which they stated to the census enumerator they employed in their industry. Now, take the woollen industry for which our sympathy was asked. The output of our woollen mills in 1891 was sold for $8,400,000; the raw materials cost them just half that amount; the wages paid amounted to about $2,000,000; allowing 5 per cent for the cost of distribution, we find that the net earnings are left at $2,000,000, which is equivalent to 22 per cent interest on the capital invested. Half of that would have been a reasonable interest on their investment, and would have given us a reduction in the price of the goods of 12 per cent. The wall paper factories, a most heavily protected industry, sold their output in 1891 for $355,000; the raw material cost $133,700; the wages paid were less than $42,000; add for the cost of distribution 10 per cent, or $20,000, and we find that their net earnings were $160,000 over 40 per cent interest on the capital they employed, of $350,000. Our cotton manufacturers sold their output in 1891 for $8,400,000; the raw materials cost $4,200,000; the wages paid were $2,100,000; add for the cost of placing the goods on the market 5 per cent, or $300,000; and we find that the cost of their output when placed on the market was $6,600,000; showing their net earnings to have been $1,800,000, or the equivalent of 14 per cent interest on their capital invested. This may not be an excessive earning for their capital, but remember that the cost of raw cotton has been vastly reduced since that time, while there has been no corresponding reduction in the price of cotton goods. Raw cotton was sold in 1891 at $11.45 per 100 pounds. On the 28th March, 1894, it was quoted at $7.40, a difference of $4.05 per 100 pounds, equivalent to a reduction in the cost of the raw material of 35 per cent. For the three years, 1888, 1889, and 1890, the average cost of raw cotton was $10.47 per 100 pounds. The average price for the last three years was $7.94 per 100 pounds, showing a difference in the cost of the raw cotton now being used by our Canadian mills and that which they purchased in 1891, of 25 per cent. In 1891 they paid for their raw cotton $4,000,000. To-day the same quantity can be purchased for $3,000,000. Yet the price of manufactured cotton has not been reduced. The whole of this million dollars saved in the purchase of their raw material has been added to the profits of cotton mills, swelling the earnings of their capital, until these now reach no less than 22 per cent on the whole amount invested. The Minister of Finance declared that cottons to-day can be bought in Canada, taking quality and price into account, as cheaply as anywhere else in the world. This is true with reference to cottons purchased here for shipment to China. The cotton of Canadian manufacture is sold in China at what the cotton mill men declare to be marvellously low prices. We send our surplus goods to China. Some of us are familiar with the remark of the cotton-mill owner, when asked if sending his surplus to China did not so relieve the market in Canada as to have the effect of keeping up prices here. His reply was: You bet, that is where we get our blood. Selling cotton to the Chinese at marvellously low prices and recouping themselves by selling to the Canadians at protectionist prices. The wives and daughters of the electors who send hon. gentlemen here to make our laws, are forced, by the operation of those laws, to work long hours at low wages in order that the Chinese may be cheaply clad while they are compelled to pay for the cotton they help to produce much more than the price asked from the happy Celestials. The hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Haggart) said the other night that sugar was sold as cheaply to-day in Montreal as in New York. The Montreal Gazette quotes granulated every week since January at one-quarter of a cent per pound less in New York than the price in Montreal. The New York 'Tribune' agrees with the 'Gazette' as to New York prices. But why quote the New York price of sugar. It is the desire of all of us to foster as much as we can the trade with Great Britain. Let us consider therefore the price of sugar, not in New York, but in Great Britain. If we are to bring sugar into this country, let us bring it from Great Britain rather than from New York, if for no other reason than that we may in this way provide a westbound cargo for the vessels engaged in the carrying trade. As matters stand now, many of the vessels engaged in that trade are forced to make the round trip with one cargo. The shipper on this side pays on his eastbound cargo the whole cost of the trip, and this comes largely, almost entirely out of the pockets of the farmers. We should endeavour to increase the cargoes westbound, so that our vessels engaged in that carrying trade may have a cargo both ways, and the farmer by that means be relieved from the excessive charges now made on shipments of his wheat, cattle and cheese to British ports. I will read to the House a table giving the prices at the refineries to the wholesale trade, of granulated sugar, in London, New York, and Montreal :

My quotations are from the New York 'Tribune,' the Montreal 'Gazette,' and the London 'Daily Telegraph.' The 'Journal of Trade and Commerce,' Montreal, quotes one-eighth of a cent higher on February 2nd and 9th, and March 23rd. During the three months past granulated sugar was sold in Montreal at 82 $\frac{1}{2}$ cents per hundred pounds above the price in London, and 28 cents per hundred pounds above the price in New York. We consumed in 1892 345,000,000 pounds of raw sugar, and in 1893, 254,000,000 pounds, making a total of 599,000,000 pounds, or an average of 299,000,000 pounds a year. So that I am safe in saying that we consume in Canada 250,000,000 pounds of refined sugar every year. According to the quotation which I have given that sugar is sold here at an advance on the price in London, amounting to \$2,062,500, but, of course, we have to deduct the freight from London here. Deducting the freight at \$5.50 per ton—which is an outside estimate—amounting to \$697,500, we find that the sugar consumed in Canada last year was sold at an advance on the London price, freight paid to Montreal, of \$1,375,000. The refiners, when agitating for the abolition of the duty on raw sugar, declared that with the duty on sugar off, they would be able to compete with the world, that the transportation charges would be an ample protection to them. And so these changes ought to be, because they are equal to more than one-half of the whole wages which the refiners paid in 1891. We find therefore that the refiners in Canada take every year more than one and one-third million dollars unearned profits from the people of Canada. This \$1,375,000 is a direct tax on the consumers, and for what object? To keep floating an industry employing less than 2,000 men and paying less than \$750,000 a year in wages. And many of these would find employment handling the sugar, if imported into this country, for they are not all engaged inside the walls of the several refineries. \$1,375,000 have been taken from the people annually, not one cent of which found its way into the treasury, not one cent of which is available for the public works of the country or for carrying on the business of the country. Every dollar has found its way into the pockets of those happy men whose industry is in a country which protects them so well. The hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches and their predecessors have been guilty of many arbitrary acts since they came into power, and began to interfere with the natural laws of trade. Let them add one more to the list and enact legislation which will prohibit the refining of sugar in Canada. Then how shall we stand? If no sugar were refined in Canada, we should be forced to import it. Importing it in large quantities, the freight charges would be less. We could import it in full cargo at a charge of \$2 per ton less than the rate charged on small shipments. It is proposed to levy a customs duty of 64 cents per hundred pounds. Add the duty, 64 cents, and the freight 17½ cents to the London price of \$3.57, and we could lay down sugar, freight and duty paid, at \$4.38½, against \$4.40½, which is the average price at Montreal; and, having imported it, we should add to the revenue of the country \$1,600,000, instead of the pitiful \$10,335 which was derived from the duty on refined sugar imported during the past year. Moreover, we should add to the earnings of our ocean fleet \$437,000 a year, and the consumer would have the sugar at a slightly lower price than has been charged during the past year. I think that enough has been shown to prove that protection is a fraud upon the consumer, that whatever benefit the manufacturers may be by reason of the fact that they give employment to labour is wiped out by the extortion of the combines, and that the interests of the country demand that there should be no class legislation, no legislation to make the few rich at the expense of the many, that protection should cease and that the combines should be taught that it is wrong to take unearned any portion of another's wealth. The hon. Minister of Finance dilated on the fact that the Trade and Navigation Returns showed a vast increase of trade during the past year. The total trade on the basis of goods entered for consumption and exported had increased during the year by nine and one-third million of dollars. But the examination of the returns shows that the greater part of the increase is due to the increase in coin and bullion imported and exported. The exchange of coin and bullion is not trade. Trade is the exchange of commodities. The importation of coin and bullion has nothing whatever to do with trade; money is only the counter, it is only part of the machinery by which the exchange of commodities is effected. The coin and bullion imported and exported in 1893 exceeded that of 1892 by \$7,042,050. Write this off and you will find that the actual increase in our trade during the past year—the actual increase in our exports and imports—was only two and a quarter millions, instead of nine and one-third millions, as claimed by the Minister of Finance, and a part of this increase is in goods sent to Chicago during the exhibition. The increase of our imports for consumption was \$4,726,087. That is a handsome increase in our trade; but when we wipe out the increase of our imports of coin and bullion—\$4,715,670—we find that the increase of imports for consumption is only \$10,417. Nor has the increase of exports been so large as would appear from a superficial examination. The total increase of exports was \$4,600,000. Write off the increase in coin and bullion, \$2,324,000 and the actual increase is found to be \$2,276,000. The value of our exports is largely swollen, as usual, by the export of household effects removed by people leaving the country, the value of which was over \$1,357,000. The increase of our exports of natural products is not the result of legislation; it represents shipment of the product of the labour of those who gather together and fit for men's use the riches of the farm, of the forest, of the mine and of the sea; it is the result of the energy, industry and intelligence which have enabled Canadians to attain some degree of prosperity in spite of the legislative restrictions which have been enacted by hon. gentlemen opposite. It has been claimed that the trade with the United States did not increase, but that the trade with Great Britain did increase. We would hail with delight an increase of our trade with England. But what are the facts? The aggregate trade with England has increased less than one million dollars, while the trade with the United States has increased more than ten millions of dollars, a part of which is the exportation and importation of coin and bullion, amounting to six and one-half millions of dollars, showing a net increase of our trade with the United States of three and one-half millions, against a net increase of our trade with Great Britain of one million dollars. Hon. gentlemen deny that there is any discrimination in their tariff against British trade. I do not know what hon. gentlemen opposite would call "discrimination," but I do know this—that the duty levied upon the whole of our imports of British goods amounted to 22 per cent, while the duty levied upon the whole of our imports of American goods amounted to 13¼ per cent, a discrimination against England on the whole volume of trade of more than 8 per cent. Of course a large amount of our importation from the United States was of goods that are imported free of duty for the benefit of our manufacturers. Writing these off, I find that nine and a half millions of dollars was levied on thirty-two millions of dollars of imports from Britain, equivalent to 30 per cent; that seven and three-fifths millions was levied in duty upon the twenty-eight and one-half millions of dollars imported from the United States, equivalent to 27 per cent. So there is 3 per cent of a straight discrimination against our trade with Great Britain. One million dollars was taken in duty on the import from Great Britain beyond that on the same quantity from the United States. I do not know what hon. gentlemen would call "discrimination," if that is not a discrimination. And the discrimination has been so keen that it has had its effect upon trade. Trade, as I have said, is the exchange of commodities. Those to whom we sell our goods have a right to expect us to purchase from them in return. But our exports to Great Britain last year amounted to sixty-four millions, and our purchases from them amounted to forty-three millions. We exchanged with them forty-three millions of dollars worth of our goods, and we took from them in cash twenty-one millions of dollars. How was it in our trade with the United States? We sold the United States less than forty millions of dollars worth, and purchased from them fifty-eight millions of dollars worth of goods. We exchanged the whole of the products we sold to the United States for commodities of their production and left with them more than eighteen millions of dollars in cash besides. Is this developing trade with Great Britain? It is our desire to give the preference to the mother land; at least so we have proclaimed. It is of this desire that hon. gentlemen opposite boasted. They should amend their tariff. They should not discriminate against the mother country and thus deprive her of the trade she has a right to look for in return for providing us with a market for our products. England has the world to draw from. If Canada should cut off her supplies, not one person in England need go hungry. It is no special advantage to the people of the mother country to purchase the commodities we offer. England is a manufacturing nation; her output is practically illimitable, and she seeks markets in all parts of the world for her manufactured goods. It is the wish of the people of England that we should purchase from them. By purchasing from them we enable those to whom we sell our goods to earn the price of those goods, yet we find that we take millions in money from Great Britain in return for the commodities we sell, and spend that money across the line in the purchase of commodities from the United States. I have just one word to say with reference to the Franchise Act, and that word is in reply to the hon. member for South Ontario (Mr. Smith). That hon. gentleman objected to the repeal of the Franchise Act, the ground of his objection being that it might lead to the disfranchisement of Government officials. And why not? If the acceptance of an office of emolument under the Crown disqualifies a person from sitting in this House, why should not the holding of a similar office disfranchise the official? The member of Parliament may not hold an office of emolument under the Crown, because it might interfere with his independence in this House. Surely the holding of such an office might also impair the independence of the elector. We are told that there is nothing in the policy of the Liberal party to attract the young men of the country to our side. What plank in the platform of the Liberal party do the young men of Canada find fault with? Do they not believe in freedom of trade? Do they not believe in square dealings with the motherland? Do they not desire honest and economical and efficient government? Do they not disapprove of the corruption which we denounce? Do they not believe in fair play and no favour? Do they think that the Gerrymander Act is a fair one? Do they not denounce it as a wicked fraud, denounce it as two hon. gentlemen on the opposite side had courage to denounce it, the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) and the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien)? What young Canadian would tie the hands of an opponent and then boast of a victory over him? Yet this is what the Government have done time and time again in the battles they have fought with the Liberal party. Tell me not that our noble leader will fail to rally the young men of Canada to his standard; tell me not that the platform laid down by the Liberal party will fail to attract young men. Every line in it breathes with hope for Canada, breathes with faith in Canada. Every line in it is a declaration that no true Canadian desires to fatten on the products of another's labours; that it is wrong to take unearned a portion of another's wealth. Every line is a declaration of faith in Canada and faith in Canadians, faith in their intelligence and skill, faith in their honesty and industry, faith in their ability to stand up undaunted and meet like men the competition of the world. And this policy will prevail.

Mr. MACLEAN (East York) moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and the House adjourned at 11.35 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, 6th April, 1894.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 45)—from the Senate—to amend the Harbour Masters' Act.—(Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper.)

Bill (No. 46)—from the Senate—to amend the Act respecting lighthouses, buoys and beacons, and Sable Island.—(Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper.)

Bill (No. 47) to revive and amend the Act to incorporate the Brandon and South-western Railway Company.—(Mr. Davin.)

Bill (No. 48) respecting the Montreal and Ottawa Railway Company.—(Mr. Baker.)

Bill (No. 49) to incorporate the Welland Power and Supply Canal Company (Limited).—(Mr. McKay.)

Bill (No. 50) to authorize the purchase of the Yarmouth and Annapolis Railway by the Windsor and Annapolis Railway Company (Limited), and to change the name of the latter company to the Dominion Atlantic Railway Company.—(Mr. Kenny.)

Bill (No. 51) to incorporate the Northern Life Assurance Company of Canada.—(Mr. Mulock.)

Bill (No. 52) respecting the New Westminster and Burrard Inlet Telephone Company (Limited).—(Mr. Mara.)

Bill (No. 53) respecting the Calgary Irrigation Company.—(Mr. Davis.)

Bill (No. 54) to make further provision respecting grants of land to members of the Militia force on active service in the Northwest.—(Mr. Daly.)

ELECTORAL FRANCHISE ACT.

Mr. DICKEY moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 55) to amend The Electoral Franchise Act.

Some hon MEMBERS. Explain.

Mr. DICKEY. The Electoral Franchise Act introduced by the late Sir John Macdonald admitted the principle of female suffrage. In view of the approaching revision of the voters' lists, I wish to invite the opinion of the House as to the propriety of reinstating that principle in the Bill; but to a lesser extent than it was then proposed to do.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

NEWSPAPER ADVERTISING.

Mr. MARTIN asked, Whether any Government advertisements were inserted during the year 1893 in the 'Standard' newspaper, of Winnipeg, and what amounts, if any, were paid for the same?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The question was answered yesterday. It is the same answer.

REBATE ON CORN.

Mr. McMULLEN asked, The number of bushels of corn imported and ground into human food upon which a rebate of duty was made during the fiscal year 1892-93?

Mr. WALLACE. 676,764 bushels.

FLOUR FOR DEEP SEA FISHERIES.

Mr. McMULLEN asked, The number of barrels of flour imported duty free for the use of the deep sea fisheries during the fiscal year 1892-93? Also, the number of barrels of pork for the same purpose, duty free?

Mr. WALLACE. No flour or pork have been imported free of duty during the fiscal year 1892-93 for the use of the deep sea fisheries. A quantity was ex-warehoused free for ship stores, but there is no division in the statistical records that would enable a statement to be compiled showing what amount was used for the deep sea fisheries.

MONTREAL POST OFFICE.

Mr. INNES (for Mr. Landerkin), asked, 1. What was the amount of contract for placing elevators in the Montreal post office building, and who was the contractor? 2. Who were the tenderers, and what was the amount of each tender? 3. Was there any change in the original specifications? If so, what? 4. Were the tenders asked for upon a revised specification? If so, who tendered upon such revised specification? 5. What was the total cost of the alterations to the building? 6. Were there any extras?

Mr. OUMET. 1. $5,300. 2. Messrs. Miller Bros. & Toms and the Royal Electric Light Company. Royal Electric Light Company, $5,300; Miller Bros. & Toms, $5,300; Lomer & Rose, $12,400. 3. Yes; it was at first intended to construct hydraulic elevators but after investigation in the matter, it was thought more advisable to have elevators, the motive power of which would be electricity, and the specifications were changed to that effect. 4. Tenders were accordingly asked for electric elevators after the above change was made, and the tenders were received which are mentioned in reply. 5. $19,812.76. 6. There were no extras in connection with the contract for the elevators.

SPECIAL CIVIL SERVICE EXAMINATION.

Mr. EDGAR asked, What was the special reason for holding the special examination for promotion of Mr. John Graham on 16th December, 1893, as stated on page 23 of the Civil Service Examiners' Report? In what department was the said John Graham employed at the time of such examination? Were there no employees in the Accountant's branch of the Post Office Department at that time duly qualified for promotion by having passed their examination and otherwise?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Mr. Graham was formerly in the Post Office Department. He was an excellent officer, and he desired to return and was examined to enable him to qualify for a vacancy in the department. Mr. Graham was in the Auditor General's office at the time of the examination. There were employees in the Accountant's branch of the department at the time Mr. Graham was examined who were qualified for promotion.

FISHERY REGULATIONS IN ONTARIO.

Mr. LISTER asked, What, if any, changes have been made—(a.) In the close season for fishing in Lake Huron, River St. Clair, Lake St. Clair, Detroit River, and Lake Erie, for whitefish, lake trout, bass, pike, pickerel, herring and sturgeon, since the 1st of January, 1887; (b.) in the size of the mesh of seines, gill-nets, pound-nets, and trap-nets? Is it the intention of the Government to grant licenses for the present year for fishing with seines, gill-nets, pound-nets, and trap-nets, or any of them in Lake Huron, River St. Clair, Lake St. Clair, Detroit River, and Lake Erie, or any of such lakes or rivers?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Touching the close seasons, in Ontario, from 1887 down to 1893, the close season for whitefish was from the 1st of November down to 30th November in each year; for pickerel, from the 15th April to the 15th of May; for bass, from the 15th of April to the 15th May. In 1894 the only change was made in connection with the close season for bass, namely, from the 10th of May to the 30th June. There is no close season for pike, herring, or sturgeon. The mesh of seines for catching whitefish is four inches extension measure. The mesh of whitefish gill-nets, from four to five inches; hoop-nets, two and a half inches. No trap-nets are allowed. Licenses for pound-net fishing will be granted, as usual, in Lakes Huron, St. Clair, and Erie; for hoop-net fishing, in Lakes Huron and St. Clair; for gill-net fishing, in Lakes Huron and Erie. No seine fishing will be allowed in Lake Huron, the River St. Clair, Lake St. Clair, or the Detroit River.

MARINE HOSPITAL, ST. JOHN, N.B.

Mr. BOWERS asked, Has the Government closed the Marine Hospital at St. John, New Brunswick, to the admission of sick and disabled mariners? If so, are such sent to the city hospital for treatment? What was the cost per day for each patient at the Marine Hospital, including salary of officials during the last twelve months previous to closing the same? What was the cost per day since they were sent to the city hospital? Does the Government consider the present system cheaper than the former? Has the Government sold or leased the Marine Hospital and lands at St. John? Has the Government discharged the officers and officials who were employed in said building? Does the superintendent who formerly had charge receive a retiring allowance? If not, why not?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The Government did close the Marine Hospital

Sir ADOLPHE CARON.

at St. John, N.B., and the sick mariners are now sent to the public hospital of that city for treatment. The cost per day for each patient by the Marine Hospital, including the salaries of officials during the last twelve months previous to closing it amounted to 89½ cents per man. The cost per day since sent to the public hospital has been 90 cents per man. The hon. gentleman asks whether the Government considers the present system cheaper than the former one, and in answering that I can only speak at present for my department, as the subject has not come formally before the Government with a view of considering the question. I answer: That in my opinion the present system is not only cheaper but better than the former system which obtains, inasmuch as there will be no expenditure for extensive repairs and improvements as were formerly required. The Government has not sold nor leased the Marine Hospital and lands at St. John. The Government has dispensed with the services of the officers and officials who were employed in the building. The hon. gentleman also asks whether the superintendent who formerly had charge receives a retiring allowance? If not, why not? I may say that the following gratuities were included in the last Estimates and were voted by Parliament, and have been paid: the widow of Rev. James Spencer, $100; W. A. Barnes, keeper, $300; Dr. Christie, medical superintendent, $560. No retiring allowance other than these was voted.

TIGNISH BREAKWATER, P.E.I.

Mr. PERRY asked, Whether a lighthouse-keeper has been appointed at the Tignish breakwater, Prince Edward Island, instead of Isidore Gaudet, deceased? If so, who is he and what is his salary?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. No appointment has yet been made to fill the vacancy caused by the decease of the lighthouse-keeper. The subject is, however, receiving attention in the usual course.

CAPE BRETON MAIL SERVICE.

Mr. FRASER asked, What were the names of the tenderers for carrying the mails from Hawkesbury to Sydney, Cape Breton, when tenders were invited on the 15th December last? What was the amount of each tender? Why was not one or other accepted? Is the department aware that the cost of carrying the mails at present is not half what it was before the railway was built?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The tenderers for carrying the mails were F. McInnis, the amount of his tender being $6,970, and J. Morrison, for $9,000. The first tender having been withdrawn, and the second being considered too high, a temporary arrangement has been made for the service, pending further negotiations. The department is not aware that the cost of carrying the mails at present is not half what it was before the railway was built.

ISAAC'S HARBOUR, N.S.

Mr. FRASER asked, When do the Government propose to appoint a lighthouse-keeper at Isaac's Harbour, Nova Scotia? Has a recommendation been sent to the Government for the appointment of Captain Simon Griffin? If so, will the Government appoint him?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The question of the appointment of Mr. Ira L. Griffin is under consideration, and is before the Treasury Board to be dealt with. No recommendation has been made for the appointment of Captain Simon Griffin.

CUSTOMS SEIZURES.

Mr. CHARLTON asked, Were the following Crown seizures—Customs—made in the year 1891-92, as per Auditor General's annual Report for that year, page F—25, viz.: Caldecotte, Burton & Spence (Toronto), $1,084.53; Knox, Morgan & Co. (Hamilton, Ont.), $1,099.00? If such seizures were made: 1. What was the nature, character, or kind of goods thus seized from the above named parties? 2. When were the seizures made? 3. By whom were the seizures made? 4. What was the gross sum received from each party? 5. What amount was paid as expenses in each of these seizures? 6. Was any portion paid to the officials making the seizures, and if so, how much in each case? 7. How much from each seizure yet remains to the credit of the Receiver General?

Mr. WALLACE. No goods were seized in 1891-92, as referred to, but on the 30th November, 1889, invoices covering inclosures and dutiable charges for "making up" dress goods, for cartoons, gold printing, &c., of the value of $2,238.65, were seized under clauses 67 and 192 of the Customs Act, as amended. The seizures were made by special officer A. L. Watters. The gross sum received was $2,238.65. The expenses were $17.40. $703.11 was paid to the seizing officer and the same amount to the informer. From the $2,238.65 deposited, the late special agent Wolff received a commission of 5 per cent, and the officer's expenses of $17.40 have to be deducted. This left a net amount of $2,109.32, of which, in the month of February, 1890, one-third was awarded to the seizing officer and one-third to the informer. On the 3rd October, 1891, the sum of $1,084.53, being the amount deposited, less seizing officer's expenses and the amount of duty, was remitted by Order in Council to the parties, after full investigation, on the report of the Treasury Board. These remarks have reference to the Burton, Caldecotte & Co. seizure; they also apply to the Knox, Morgan & Co.

seizure, with the exceptions that the date of the seizure was August 11th, 1890, and that Thomas J. Watters was the seizing officer.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. SPROULE. Mr. Speaker, before the Orders of the Day are called, I desire to rise to a question of privilege. It will be remembered by this House that on the 3rd of this month, in speaking in the Budget debate, I read a quotation from a newspaper report of a speech said to have been delivered by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) at Jarvis, Ont., in reference to commercial union, which was as follows:—

It was simply a customs union between two or more independent states where a common tariff and excise laws were adopted, and the revenue collected, after deducting expenses of collection, was divided among the participants upon the basis of population, or any other basis that might be agreed upon, while all trade restriction between them were removed. The application of the principle between Canada and the United States would require that the two countries should have the same excise rates, and the same tariff upon imports from all other countries should be divided upon conditions hereafter to be arranged, that the customs line between the two countries from ocean to ocean should be removed, and that trade between Canada and the United States should be in every respect as free and untrammelled as trade between the different states of the American Union was at the present moment.

The hon. member for North Norfolk, interrupting me, spoke as follows:—

Mr. CHARLTON. Will the hon. gentleman allow me one word of explanation? At Jarvis, I was proceeding to define to the audience that I was addressing what constituted commercial union and what constituted reciprocity; and the statement I made, which is repeated by the hon. gentleman, was not an advocacy of commercial union, but a definition to the audience of what commercial union was.

In justice to the hon. gentleman and to place myself right with the House, I wish to read one or two more extracts from the same speech as reported in the 'Globe' of that day, the 7th November, 1887, as follows:—

Mr. Charlton dealt with the N.P., railway subsidies,—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman can hardly be considered out of order if he proposes to show that his own statement with reference to the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) is correct. He may do that as shortly as possible.

Mr. SPROULE. That was my aim in reading the extract—

—the syndicate contract and the C.P.R. construction, the gerrymander, the boodle brigade, the Franchise Act, and other leading public questions, and then passed to the consideration of the question of commercial union.

In his remarks upon the subject he declared that he was not the mouthpiece of any party and merely expressed his own views. He advocated a customs union as long ago as 1869, and had continued to advocate it since, but for obvious reasons had refrained from moving in the matter in Parliament. He depicted the advantages derived by the thirty-seven states of the American Union from unrestricted free trade between themselves. Our own interests languished because we were denied participation in the advantages flowing from this great continental Zollverein of Anglo-Saxon States. *

* * * Mr. Charlton then proceeded to meet some of the objections raised to the proposed treaty.

The report winds up by saying that Mr. Charlton's speech was listened to with the closest attention, that his remarks upon the commercial union question were enthusiastically received, and the meeting closed with cheers for the Queen, Mr. Colter, and Mr. Charlton.

Mr. CHARLTON. If this is a matter of privilege on the part of the hon. member for North Grey (Mr. Sproule), I suppose, as I am connected with the question, it is equally a matter of privilege on my part. I have not had the opportunity of examining the report of the speech of which the hon. gentleman has read an extract, or professes to have read one. I asked the hon. gentleman yesterday for the date of his extract, and he failed to furnish it. I have consequently been unable to examine the report of the speech. I have to say, however, that I repudiate the position taken by the hon. gentleman and by various other speakers on the opposite side, that the Liberal party in Canada ever committed itself to the principle or doctrine of commercial union. I stated in my remarks that individual members of that party might, on occasions, have expressed individual opinions about the question, and these opinions might or might not have been favourable to commercial union. But that, so far as the attitude of the party itself was concerned, it had taken no such position. So far as my memory goes with regard to the speech at Jarvis, I was defining to the audience on that occasion the difference between unrestricted reciprocity and commercial union.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman might say shortly whether the report of his speech is correct or not.

Mr. CHARLTON. I am unable to say. I have not examined the speech. I shall take occasion, as a matter of privilege, on Monday, to refer to it.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE TARIFF.

House again resumed the adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Foster :

Mr. SPROULE.

That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go into Committee of Ways and Means ; and the motion of Sir Richard Cartwright in amendment thereto.

Mr. MACLEAN (York). In resuming this debate, I desire to say, in the first place, that I purpose to address the House as a protectionist. As a protectionist, I am a stalwart of the stalwarts. I believe in the protectionist doctrine. I believe in the National Policy because, in the first place, it has been a good thing for this country, and I believe it will be a good thing for this country if persisted in and continued. I was sent here, as a protectionist, to support a protectionist Government. I hope, if I ever go back to my constituency again, I will go as a protectionist and a supporter of a protection Government. And, in the next place, I wish to put myself right with the House and the country as to this so-called tariff reform. I take no stock in tariff reform or tariff revision. And in regard to what is called closer trade relations with the United States, in regard to reciprocal trade with the United States, I must say that I take no stock in that at present. I regard it as a thing that is impossible of present accomplishment. But when you come, Sir, to talk about reciprocity, I believe thoroughly in a reciprocity of tariffs. I believe in meeting our American neighbours on their own basis. I believe in meeting their ad valorem 50 per cent by our 50 per cent ad valorem. I believe in meeting them dollar for dollar in the matter of specific duties—eye for eye, tooth for tooth. And I think that is the doctrine that ought to animate Canadians and ought to be lived up to by this Government in dealing with them in regard to trade matters. Being such an out-and-out protectionist, I must say, as such, and speaking for myself, I in a measure regret some of the proposed tariff changes which have been submitted to the House by the Government. I think the Minister of Finance and the other trade Ministers have paid too much attention to certain clamours that have been raised in this country. There has been a clamour raised by the farmers, or rather on behalf of the farmers, by hon. gentlemen opposite. And they have persisted in this to such an extent that they have almost persuaded the farmers to believe that they are downtrodden, imposed upon, and are making millionaires out of the manufacturers of this country. I take no stock in that clamour which has been raised also on behalf of the farmers of the North-west, but for which there may have been a slight justification. But in my part of the country the farmers are all right, they are doing well, they are getting wealthy ; and I have at least the support of the majority in some of the townships which I have the honour to represent. The Government have also paid too much attention to the clamour which has been raised by the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy). He has gone about this country talking of tariff reform, and with this tariff reform he has mixed up certain race and creed prejudices. And if I can gather anything from his speeches, it is this, that he asks the people of Canada to put him at the head of affairs as a man who, the first thing when he comes into power, will give this country a North of Ireland and Protestant tariff. That is what he is telling the people they ought to have. That is what he is telling the people this country is most in need of. But when he comes forward with this Protestant tariff of his, I want him to show the people how it is to be administered and how a revenue is to be derived from it for carrying on the affairs of this country. The Government have listened to another clamour—one which has been raised by hon. gentlemen opposite against specific duties. As a protectionist, I stand here to vindicate specific duties. They have been found to be the backbone of protection in this and every other country. Specific duties are, in the first place, for the benefit of the honest importer. In the next place, they are for the benefit of the Government, to secure the collection of the full amount of revenue which the tariff calls for. And, in the third place, they are in the interests of the manufacturers, and accomplish what it was intended to accomplish—the protection of home industries. If home industry requires protection, it does so at that time when our foreign rivals are prepared to sacrifice their products and make a slaughter market of our country. That was one of the great reasons given at the time of the introduction of the National Policy, in 1879. And I say that reason now holds good, and, as a protectionist, speaking simply for myself, I regret that the Government has seen its way to paying any attention whatever to that clamour against specific duties. Now, the National Policy, according to my mind, has been a success, and has been in the interests of the farmers. Therefore, as regards them, this clamour was unjustified; and as for the manufacturers, I wish to say that they have not accumulated great fortunes; many of them, in fact, have made no money at all. They have had what was only a fair share of what was going since the introduction of the National Policy. And I also regret that the Government, in bringing down this new tariff and in carrying out the reductions suggested, have struck a blow at some of the industries in this country—such as the great woollen industry, the iron industry, the agricultural implement industry and quite a number of small industries. And I say it is not a matter of pleasure to me to find that this has been the case. But, I do not say here, as an out-and-out protectionist, that there should not be tariff reform nor any tariff revision. In a country situated as we are situated, having so many diverse interests and having different provinces with their several requirements, I admit that the time may arrive when the Government should make some kind of revision and some kind of reduction. But I do not think that this is called for at the present time, and I can only say that, considering the disturbance that has been caused to the trade of this country, the great labour that the trade Ministers have had since last session in going up and down the country preparing for this measure, and the struggle upon which we are now entering—taking all these into consideration, it appears to me that the game of tariff revision is hardly worth the candle. Take the history of tariff revision to-day; look at it as we see it in the United States to the south of us. A year, or a year and a half ago, hon. gentlemen opposite were telling this House that, by reason of the Democratic triumph in the United States, by reason of the new Cleveland Administration coming into office, the Government of that country and the legislature of that country had a mandate to give tariff reform and to make sweeping reductions all round. But what has been the result? It is true, that the Wilson Bill has been introduced and has proceeded to the Senate. But I venture to say that there is only a slight prospect that the Wilson Bill will ever become the law of the United States. We see that the Republicans are winning all the by-elections, both for Congress and for the states. We see also that the man McKinley, who was condemned in this country, who was condemned in his own country, is the most likely man next to fill the presidential chair in the United States.

An hon. MEMBER. Supposition.

Mr. MACLEAN (York). That is a good supposition; you can hardly name a more likely one. The facts being as I have stated, we cannot but see that tariff reform is not under much way in the United States and is not likely to happen. If I could prevent it, I would not like to have it happen in this country. Now, in this discussion a number of fallacies have been brought forward, fallacies that I am tired of hearing in this House and tired of hearing in the country. Hon. gentlemen opposite have been telling us their old story of the exodus. But, whenever any man speaks to me about the exodus, I ask him one question, and to that question I have never yet had an answer. That question is: If the people are expatriating themselves from this country and going to the United States because of the incidence of our protective tariff, what have you to say when I tell you that these men, leaving this country because of a protective tariff of 30 per cent, are going to another country where there is a protective tariff of nearly 60 per cent, or almost double ours? There is another fallacy which was presented to this House by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), a sage, a man whom, I was sorry to hear, with all his knowledge and all his logic, put forward such a fallacy—that, by some legerdemain, we in Canada, we the members of this legislature, or we the dominant party in this House, can take down the American tariff wall and allow our people to enter the United States markets with their products free. I submit that that is as absurd a thing as any Canadian can state in this House. That American tariff wall was erected for a distinct and specific purpose. It was erected by a people of sixty-five millions to keep out a neighbouring people of five millions; to keep their markets for their own products and their work for their own people. And hon. gentlemen opposite, or the Queen of England, or the British Parliament, or the entire world, could not cause that wall to come down unless the American people, the people who put it up, wished to remove it. Perhaps the idea in the head of the hon. member for Bothwell is that some night, like the priests of old, he will go out before that tariff wall and, by blowing his trumpet, will cause it to fall before him. The hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) is against protection. He wishes to eliminate every vestige of protection from the tariff. He says, and so does that new tariff reformer from North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), that Canada is an agricultural country, as the latter told the people only the other day, and that the people here can have no occupation except agriculture. If so, I say that the future of the farmer of this country cannot be a progressive one. These hon. gentlemen wish to deprive the Canadian farmer of his own home market and admit free the wheat grown by our American neighbours. But they must bear in mind, that the market of the world, in which the Canadian farmer must sell his surplus is being overrun with the wheat produced in countries that can grow it much more cheaply than it can be grown in Canada. The Argentine Republic is growing wheat at a lower rate than we can grow it at. The Russian wheat and the wheat of India are sold in the markets of the world at a rate with which Canadians cannot compete. If the only prospect of the Canadian farmer is that he must remain a farmer, if the only prospect of our people is that they must remain an agricultural people, I say that there is little hope for them. But we take a different view from that taken by hon. gentlemen opposite, and we say we are able to put forward a policy that will assist our farmers and create a diversity of employment for our people. Now, in regard to this tariff Bill, it remains for me to say that while I regret some of the changes that have been made, I shall most cordially make it my business to vote against the amendment of the hon. member for South Oxford; and, when the House goes into committee on the various clauses, I, as a protectionist, will try to persuade the Government, in respect to some of the articles, to go back to the old tariff and give the protection to our industries which they had under the old National Policy, and which I think they are still entitled to. Now, just for a few moments I wish to discuss before the House, somewhat in academic fashion, the two or three ground principles which underlie the system of protection; and I hope the House will pardon me, if, while dealing with the question, I must refer rather closely to some notes which I have prepared with considerable care. History teaches us that nations and peoples in their early stages were and are either pastoral, agricultural, or seafaring. And they emerge from this rudimentary condition and move along the line of progress just in proportion as they become more diversified in their pursuits and occupations. If they have arable land, they try to diversify their agricultural, and if they have seafaring instincts, they become traders. Trade leads to manufacturing, and, instead of one or two pursuits, they come to have a diversity of occupations. The greatest nations and those highest in the scale of progress and civilization are those of greatest diversity of employment for their people, and, as a consequence, possess the widest range of resources, and, therefore, are least dependent on others. A merely pastoral or agricultural people—and that is what the members for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) and North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) say, Canadians must be—never rose to any great height in the scale of nations. Let us look at a few instances: England is at the head of civilization to-day. She has more resources, more occupations for her people, is better able to defend herself, has greater recuperative powers and more prestige to command assistance from, or impose neutrality on, rivals or neighbours than any other country. England, it is true, has remained agricultural; but she has also become the first of maritime powers, and the first in commercial and industrial pursuits; and the great nations that have approached her in the race have only been able to do so by moving along similar lines, by creating diversity of employment and developing the energies of their peoples in as many directions as possible. The United States, Germany, France, Italy and the British dependencies of Australia and Canada are illustrations in point. One of the planks in the platform of the new party in Russia is the regeneration of that country by an increased diversity of occupations for her people. Such is what the history of nations teaches us. In the study of history, we also find that nations are characterized by selfishness, beginning with the lowest form of that instinct, and rising to an enlightened selfishness in our highest civilizations, and which, disguise it as we may, is only an advanced form of that instinct of self-preservation which animates the individual and the nation in the struggle for existence. And it is this spirit of selfishness or self-preservation which instigates the desire to be self-reliant, and, therefore, suggests that diversity of employment and occupation which is characteristic of higher civilization, and which is the mark of a nation's growth and expansion. And if we apply the teaching of these observations to Canada, we find the desire for national life, for self-preservation just as strong in us as in other nations; and in a spirit of enlightened selfishness we seek to become more self-reliant and more independent of others. And, therefore, that it is our duty to create a diversity of pursuits and occupations for our people. And with that end in view, we have, following other nations, laid down the rule that we can become stronger by keeping all our work for our own people, and our own markets for our own products—in other words, in becoming protectionists. And with the exception of England every country is animated in the same way. And in observing how nations have become great, and of diversified pursuits for their people, we observe another palpable effect, namely: that many pursuits and occupations are not limited by climate or geography, but are capable of transference from one quarter of the globe to another. The most remarkable fact of this century in the way of economics is the transfer of thousands of industries from Europe to the United States of America. Our neighbours have found out that cottons can be made as well or better in Massachusetts than in Lancashire; that steam engines in Providence, R. I., as well as in Glasgow; a watch in Elgin, Ill., as in Switzerland; and that railways and all their accessories from the rail to the great steel bridge, and from the locomotive to the most luxurious passenger car can be made better on this continent than in Europe. And so with a host of things. But our neighbours saw that this transfer of industries could not be effected by mere wishing. They saw that, for a time at least, the transference could only be effected by self-denial, which means self-taxation, or as the hon. member for North Simcoe calls it, by a self-denying ordinance; or as protectionists chose to put it: these new industries, in order to be acquired, must first be encouraged and fostered; and of the various ways of encouraging new industries restriction on the importation of like articles by customs taxation is on the whole considered to be the least objectionable means to that end. And sometimes resort is had to bounties. Protectionists have never claimed that taxation had any virtue in itself, nor that it did not involve a burden and interference with liberty; but what we do hold is that taxation, when fairly applied for the purpose of creating a diversity of employment, the encouragement of home industries, and the transfer to our shores of new ones, as it has been successfully applied under our National Policy, brings about results which so far outstrip the incidental discomfiture that we gladly put up with one for the benefits of the other. And having got thus far in our study of history, namely, that nations like individuals are instigated by the law of self-preservation to strengthen themselves; that nations become great and powerful, and strong enough to resist attack and to overcome others just in proportion as they possess a diversity of pursuits and occupations for their people, and a variety of lines into which to direct the energy of their citizens; and that many lines of occupation, many lines of pursuits, many industries hitherto unknown to one country are capable of transference from another, if given reasonable encouragement by bounties or by tariff restrictions on the importation of the products of similar industries or pursuits; and having got thus far in our reasoning we proceed, by a careful consideration of the circumstances, to ascertain what pursuits and what industries can be transferred to our own country; and beginning with the simple and more easily acquired industries and the ones that may be adopted most readily in our country, we do, by a judicious selection, proceed to build up a home production in these lines equal to what we formerly obtained from abroad. And I think that as concerns a new country, one whose people are anxious to become self-reliant and sufficient for themselves—as I trust the people of this country are anxious to become—the only dispute that ought to arise between us as a people would be concerning the choice of the most suitable industries to transfer and adopt in our country, and what one we ought to transfer first and what one next, and not to dispute whether we should or should not transfer any at all; but we should not dispute even about this. The people of the United States have shown us the way. Surely, if they have been able in thirty years to build up a host of industries theretofore unknown to that country we can in like manner transfer the same industries to this country. We have all the resources they had; we have the people; we have the moral and physical force, and I trust the determination; and it only requires a little more patience and a few more years and we will have a much greater population and a much wider range of industries and a much greater diversity of occupation for our people. And I challenge hon. gentlemen opposite to deny if they dare that Canadians can do what less vigorous if more enterprising people have done alongside of them. And yet hon. gentlemen opposite in an indirect way say that we are differently situated from our neighbours; that Canada, to quote the speech of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), has no "peculiar aptitudes for a great many manufactures;" and in another place, "nor do we (Canadians) possess advantages for becoming a great manufacturing country which other nations possess, &c.," and as the member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) said the other day, we are only intended for an agricultural people. I repudiate their low estimate of our country's resources. I spurn the imputation put upon the capacity of Canadians. And having said thus much in justification of the principle of protection, I desire to examine for a few moments the ground plan of the arguments of the free trade policy. It has been the habit of many English writers on political economy, from the days of Adam Smith, Bentham, and Jas. Mill, and their successors, to imagine that trade and commerce and the wealth of nations are governed by certain so-called eternal, fixed and unalterable principles, which are as axiomatic and undeniable as are the laws of gravitation and mathematics, and the other exact sciences. And having by a process of observation and induction arrived at these so-called eternal laws, they have set them up as standards to guide nations in the regulation of wealth and happiness; although as matter of fact, the range of their observation and facts, or so-called facts, on which they based them was very narrow, limited to a small area of the world, and a short period of its history, and conditioned by phenomena that were purely local and conditioned by circumstances that were the outgrowth of purely local relations; and they subsumed these so-called eternal laws under what they called the principle of free trade and they called themselves free traders. These principles which they said governed the laws of trade were printed in books, were exploited still further by men like John Stuart Mill, and were revered, or people were asked to reverence them just as much as the laws discovered by Newton, by Kepler, by Galileo, and other men eminent in the field of physics. Not only did men like John Stuart Mill claim that their laws of trade were of this unquestionable character, but his followers claimed for them, as have Bright and Cobden the great apostles of free trade doctrine in the English Parliament, and even by the hon. member for Guysboro' and others in this House, a moral sanction and a moral force which they at bottom do not possess. It has been the practice of free traders, both in and out of this House, to assume and assert that the doctrine of protection was an iniquitous doctrine, and to quote the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), "a villainous doctrine;" that it was based on robbing the poor for the benefit of the rich; that it was unethical, and that its effect was to demoralize a nation. But as to free trade, they professed that it was by its very essence possessed of a moral nature, that it rested securely on humanitarian ideas of the highest kind, and that the regeneration of fallen man was to be effected by its application to any country howsoever situated. Now, protectionists take direct issue with such doctrines. They say in the first place that morals have nothing to do with the laws which govern trade; but they rightly hold that morals have everything to do with the conduct of an individual in relation to his fellows. They hold further that while they say there are no eternal laws and everlasting and ethical principles governing trade, they are able to find a scientific, and certainly not an immoral, reason for the application of the principle of protection in Canada; and if I am asked what is the underlying reason which induces us as a nation to take up protection, my answer is, as I have already stated it, that the life of a nation is like the life of animals and plants, and is based on the law of the survival of the fittest; life between nations, as between man, is a struggle for existence and that not in humanitarian laws—much as you may deride what I say—but in what may be called the doctrine of enlightened selfishness is the mainspring of our tariff policy to be found. History has taught us, as I said before, and is teaching all other nations to-day, that a mere shepherd people, a mere farming people, or both, is unable to hold its own against nations of more diversity of employment; and that as it is a matter of fact that some nations, older than themselves, have accumulated greater or less capital and developed other sources of wealth, they must also accumulate capital and develop their resources if they do not wish to be left in the race and sooner or later become tributary to more powerful neighbours. To depend upon one line of occupation is not enough. To depend upon neighbours for everything required is to pass into a state of vassalage and to strike a suicidal blow at their own life. Protectionists, therefore, hold that enlightened selfishness dictates to us, even at a somewhat exorbitant first cost, that we should be independent of other nations; that we should produce our own manufactures, that we should develop our own resources, that we should make our own iron, and our own clothing; and that, instead of giving our work to outsiders, and to other nations, we should keep our own work for our own people, and our own markets for our own products. There is no eternal and everlasting reason, as I have already tried to make clear, why a steam engine should be made in Birmingham or in Glasgow, and not be made in America, in Chicago, or in Toronto. As a matter of fact, the whole commercial and industrial development of this continent proves a steady, gradual, and, in the aggregate, enormous transference of industrial production from Europe to America; and if these so-called eternal laws of our friends, the free traders, were to hold good, and was their elementary law—to buy in the cheapest and sell in the dearest market—to hold good, there would never have been that transference of industrial production, which is now so characteristic of America, from older lands across sea; but this continent would have become the home of a shepherd or farming people, which the hon. members for South Oxford and North Simcoe have said was Canada's real destiny; and so, also, would the people of the United States; and this continent would have been a vast range of plantations, regarded very much in the same light that the merchants and manufacturers of Liverpool and London, and of Lancashire and of Glasgow, regarded the colonies from 1750 to 1830, covering a period that saw the rise of the great republic to the south of us from a very small beginning, but which had, as one of its main springs, a desire to be more self-reliant, more independent, and more able to produce at home what its people needed. It is this spirit of enlightened selfishness which directs nations now to adopt protection in order to make themselves strong and able to resist their rivals. And it is in their failure to have grasped the pregnant significance of the transference of industries from one country to another that has wrecked the theories of the English free trade writers and statesmen. And next, a few words as to those combinations which are said to be the outcome of protection. I deny this. There are combinations just as powerful in free trade England. Several of the metals are, or have been, controlled by European combines. The masters of the great industries of England regulate prices by an understanding among themselves: so they do all the world over. When the principle of combination is compared with the principle of competition, which our free traders say is the germ principle of the creed, I make bold to say that there has been more loss of energy, more waste of capital, more bankruptcies, more misery, resultant from over-competition than from the combination of manufacturers or of those who control the supplies of certain articles. The combination in the case of coal oil in the United States has made that article cheaper than ever it was before. It has brought the cost of production down to the lowest possible figure—to a figure that would never be possible, under limited competition—and the price to the consumer has been kept correspondingly low. If hon. gentlemen of the free trade stripe wish to see competition carried to its ultimate they have only to read Hood's "Song of the Shirt." And this undue competition can reduce the margin of subsistence of the workingman, which obtains in America, to the standard which obtains in China, and when there is a lowering of the standard of existence whether due to competition or combination, there is a corresponding lowering of the morals of the people. I do not set up the principle of combination against competition; what I say is that either principle is liable to result in abuse; but the wise statesman will try and regulate production and prevent either the extortion of monopoly or the slavery of competition.

Now, having said something on the general protectionist principle, I wish to give this House what I consider the national and patriotic reasons for protection. We Canadians are on this continent to stay. This country is ours by right of discovery, by right of conquest, by right of exploitation, by right of occupation, and by right of successful resistance of every invasion. We hold and till this soil of God by our own right hand, and by the still stronger arm of that dear mother-land which has never yet forsaken us. We believe that there is room on this great North American continent for at least two free and independent English-speaking communities, and that Canada is, must, and shall be one of these. We believe not only that it is in the interest of Canada that there should be these two free and independent powers, but we believe that it is in the interest of the continent itself; for we can conceive of nothing more of a bar to American progress than that one great crass republic should dominate the whole of North America. We believe that as the northern people, and the more hardy people, we are destined to exercise dominion over our own portion of the continent, and that we are competent to work out our own destiny as seems best to ourselves, and not as outsiders and southerners may suggest or desire. We believe that there is now in North America a continental politic and a continental diplomacy, and that Canadians must be prepared to play a part therein. And we Conservatives take a special pride in the fact that in the old chief that was, and in the new chief that is, we had and have a worthy representative in this continental diplomacy and continental politic and a match for the ablest of the diplomats of the great nations. We believe that the dominion and the sway is to us over all the country and territory lying between the great lakes and the frozen sea, and from one ocean to the other, the half of a mighty continent. In a word, we believe in Canada's right to a separate and national existence on this continent, and as Canadians we propose to achieve it, and we regard a policy of protection, of encouragement to home industries as the greatest means to that end. We believe that that system of constitutional government which has, through long ages, been developed in the mother country, and in the self-governing colonies is the best yet devised, for the reasons, amongst others, that it secures the greatest stability, the largest measure of personal, civil and religious liberty to the individual, and, at the same time, a large measure of happiness to the people, and best of all, it is still instinct with a capacity for further improvement and simplification, and even development into the requirements of that great English-tongued confederacy that is to be; and that that constitution is to be preferred which gives permanence and stability, and which is the outgrowth of time, and which is a progression, a development, and not the production of a sweep of the pen or the product of a single generation of men, forged in the heat of a revolution, and, therefore, so stereotyped and inelastic as to be unequal to the duty demanded of it. And, therefore, we propose to conserve and firmly establish on this North American continent that British constitutional system which is our most magnificent birthright, and to improve it where we can; and to make permanent here those principles of civil and religious liberty, and those ideas of justice and of the equality of all before the law which have made the glory of that polity which has become a model to all other progressive nations. And to go from the domain of politics to the domain of morals, if we appear to draw a distinction therebetween, we believe that the greatest and highest mission of the state is the formation of the character of its people. And in the way of character we believe that the strongest, the most dominant force in the world to-day is that very complex thing which we call British character. England is great and at the head of civilization, not because of her insular position, not because of her wealth, not because she is the natural emporium of the world. She is greater than other nations simply because the character of her people rises higher than does theirs. British character leads the march of civilization, has developed the highest literature, is at the head of all true sport, is brave in war, and a pattern to all others in respect for woman-kind. It is, as I have said, of a very complex nature. It is the outcome of the lives of all our forefathers, whether Briton, Saxon, Dane, Norman, or Celt, who have lived in the old land across the sea, and from whom we boast to be sprung, not less than do those that now inhabit the British Isles. British character is redolent of the noblest literature known to the civilized world, and instinct and fragrant with the lives of the millions who have gone before us, and who spoke our glorious tongue, or those other languages which have been incorporated therewith. And it should be our greatest and highest ambition to implant and foster on this American continent that character of which, we trust, we make up a part, and which is the glory of our race. The formation of character is above everything else. Our neighbours to the south started out with the same English character and English ideas of government, but, unfortunately, as we think, for them, by reason of the war with the mother land, they have since sought to move along other lines in regard to government, to build up a different and un-English character, and, for a time, they sought to create, and some of them to-day seek to create a feeling of hostility against what was their, and is our mother country, and a feeling of hostility also towards us who prefer to keep in touch with the old land.

Mr. MACLEAN (York).

Mr. DEVLIN. That would take very well in Toronto.

Mr. MACLEAN (York). And it will take well here.

Mr. DEVLIN. I rise to a point of order. The hon. gentleman is reading his speech. If the rules of the House are applied to us. I ask that they also be applied to hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. MACLEAN (York). I am not doing anything of the kind. But we Canadians, I say, seek to preserve for ourselves, and to firmly implant in this Canada of ours, and alongside of the great American republic if we must, those British ideas of constitutional government, of justice, and British character with which we are imbued, and at the same time we seek to vindicate the right of Canada to a national existence on this continent, and we think that the best means of realizing all these things is to maintain a policy of protection, of encouragement to home industries, even at some cost to ourselves, and we know that in doing this we not only attain those great ends, but we also succeed in creating a diversity of employment for our own people, of securing the transfer to our country of industries hitherto unknown to it, but for which we believe it is fitted to become the seat, of keeping our work for our own people, and our market for our own products, of developing our country in every direction, and making it self-sustaining, self-reliant, and able to accomplish what we conceive to be the true destiny of Canada, and Canadians, namely, both in ourselves and by our descendants, to dominate and enjoy the northern half of this continent.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat will, I am sure, not think it any disrespect on my part if I do not attempt to grapple with that part of his speech which consisted of a moral treatise on British character. It was well written and nicely delivered, but I would venture to suggest to him that perhaps it was more suited for a debating society than for this great inquest of the nation, where men assemble to discharge practical duties in a practical way. I admire the hon. gentleman for his honesty. There are many protectionists on that side of the House. There are many hon. gentlemen who believe the doctrine he has espoused, and advocated to-day, but they have not got the courage of their convictions; they advocate the policy outside, but they endeavour to carry out only a modified portion of it in this House. Sir, we hear of hon. gentlemen who disbelieve as much in reciprocal trade as does the hon. gentleman, going upon platforms and challenging the people to name any man who is more stalwart than they for reciprocity of trade. You see men going down to the Maritime Provinces who dare not go on a platform unless they announce themselves as champions for free trade, and yet they come up here and are willing to cheer and applaud the man who alone has the courage to stand up and express his disbelief in all the policies for reciprocal free trade, or any other free trade, and announces himself a stalwart protectionist. I admire the hon. gentleman, I thank him for his frankness, for his honesty, and for his manliness. He tells us he takes no stock in tariff reform; he does not believe in the policy of the Government, and he does not believe in the policy of the Opposition. He is forming a third party. He takes no stock in reciprocity with the States, and as far as he is concerned the farmers in his district are doing so well that they are perfectly happy and they are all getting wealthy.

Mr. MACLEAN (York). Hear, hear.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) That was just one point on which the hon. gentleman was hardly as fair as he ought to have been. He would lead the average reader of his speech in the 'Hansard' to imagine, that when he speaks of farmers, he speaks of them in the popular sense; whereas those who know the district the hon. gentleman represents and the class of people he refers to, knows that a very large portion of them are more in the nature of market gardeners than they are of farmers, living as they do in the immediate vicinity of Toronto.

Mr. MACLEAN (York). If the hon. gentleman will allow me to correct him, I will just say that in representing the townships of Scarboro' and Markham—and I would refer him to the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) for proof of what I say—I represent two of the most typical of farming townships in Ontario, and two of the wealthiest, and townships that have the best stock and best farming.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I am aware of the districts the hon. gentleman represents, but I am aware that the hon. gentleman represents a large class of well-to-do people, who might come under the term "farmer," but who would be more properly designated as market gardeners, because they reside in the immediate vicinity of Toronto, and sell a large portion of their products to the good people of that city. They are not what we understand, when speaking of the farmers of the country, we refer to those who live away from large cities and the prices of whose products are regulated by the markets of the world. I am not going to discuss the question of specific duties with the hon. gentleman, because the Government have already decided that question, and to the extent that they have gone, the Opposition cordially agree, and will go, perhaps, a little further. During the last fifteen years that the National Policy has been in force, specific duties have been one of the guises under which the people have been robbed. They have been taken out of the poor man, and have been a means whereby larger prices have been obtained for the common and coarser grades of clothing and the necessaries of life which the poor man uses, and they have militated against the poor for the benefit of the rich. Specific duties have been one of the guises by which very large sums of money, amounting in some cases to 100 per cent and 200 per cent, have been taken out of the poor man when he did not know what he was paying and when nobody but an expert with his pencil in hand could tell what the rate of duty was. Sir, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Maclean), if he has no other merit, has at least the merit of candour, and if he stands alone in the division list, if he does take a division upon his views, he may congratulate himself upon this fact: That although there are very few who would follow him into the division lobby, there are a good many among his own party who secretly believe in his views. I will not follow the hon. gentleman at any greater length. I have a few observations to make to the House upon this national stock-taking which we are engaged in, and I congratulate the House, as my hon. friend did, that at any rate, at long last, we are getting distinct issues before the people. There is, and there will be, no mistaking from this day, what the policy of the Government is, much less what that of the Opposition is. We have heard the policy of the Government enunciated by the Finance Minister, and so far as the policy of the Liberal party is concerned it has been formulated into a resolution which has been supported by gentlemen on this side of the House who have preceded me in the debate. I may just say here to those quidnuncs who object to the general discussion which has taken place upon this subject, that I think this is the proper and correct time to discuss the condition of the country and the principles which hon. gentlemen opposite intend to apply to their tariff policy. It is not the time for discussing the details of the tariff; we will discuss these at greater length when we go into committee, but it is the time for fixing and determining the principles upon which tariff reform and revision should take place. It is the time for arriving at definite and distinct principles, if they can be arrived at, and to apply them to this great object. Sir, the Finance Minister, at any rate, has not hesitated to lay down the principle upon which he goes. I want to call the attention of the House to the language of the Minister in his Budget speech. He says:

The arrangement of a tariff and the principle which is to be adopted has two aspects—it looks to the revenue which is required in a country, and it looks as well to the general trade and development of a country. I wish, at this early stage of my remarks upon this subject, to say that, so far as the revenue aspect is concerned, it is of infinitely less importance than the effect of the principle and the details of the tariff upon the trade and development of a country.

Now, Sir, I think that statement is very important. It has been heretofore vulgarly assumed that the duty of the Finance Minister was to provide ways and means for carrying on the business of the country. It has been supposed that in the levying of his tariff, his main object was to provide, without unduly burdening the people, the means to raise sufficient money to pay the civil list, to provide for the public works and defence of the country and to pay those fixed charges which the national honour is involved in discharging. But we now find that that is not the object of a Finance Minister at all. The hon. gentleman has told us that this is of infinitely less importance than the great object which he essays and which he starts out to carry into effect. He is going to become, not a moral reformer, but a business reformer all over the country, and he is going to undertake the task of developing the country at large. He is to be no fly on the wheel. He is to look around this country, select the particular businesses that appeal to his imagination or to his feelings, as those which should be first developed, and even to lend the influences of his tariff to the development of these particular industries. But at whose expense? At the expense of the great mass of the people. I want to call the special attention of the House and of the country to the fact that in the very opening of his speech the Finance Minister disavows that his main intention is to raise money to carry on the business of the country, and that, on the contrary, he avows that his intention is to interfere with the ordinary trade of the country and, as he euphemistically declared, to develop the condition of the country. This euphemism means that he is going to take money from one class of the people to build up industries in which another class is interested; that he is going to rob one class of our people for the betterment of another class. That is what "the development of the country" means, as he uses the phrase. The hon. gentleman goes further to define his principles, and he again says in his speech:

I want to state here that the Government of to-day, and the party which supports the Government of to-day, take their stand squarely and fairly upon the embodiment and upon the preservation of the principle of protection.

Well, Sir, that is clear, that is distinct. We are glad to know that we have no tariff reform which in any way interferes with the guiding and governing principle which he says underlies the tariff of the Government. He declares that they are here to develop the country by a system of protection of particular industries. That is the policy presented by the Government. It has the merit at any rate of being clearly understood, and it has the merit also of having been applied, not only in this country, but in other countries, and therefore we can see how it has stood the test of experience. Now, Sir, what is the policy presented on this side of the House? We of the Liberal party have for years contended that the principle of protection to individual industries at the expense of the country at large is a pernicious principle; that so far from developing properly and legitimately the resources of the country, it destroys and retards the proper development of these industries, and just so far as you promote one class at the expense of the other, just so far you do grievous wrong and injustice. Sir, we desire to eliminate the element of protection to particular industries. We do not desire to see the experiment attempted here of taxing the people unduly; and the hon. gentleman himself says that he is unable to form any estimate of the amount of revenue this tariff will produce. But we lay down this principle: In the first place, that protection, as an element of the tariff, should be eliminated; and, in the second place, that not a dollar should be taken out of the pockets of the taxpayers except what is required for the purposes of economical and efficient government. That, in a nutshell, is the proposition that the Opposition offer to this House, and to the country, for their approval; and if the voters' lists were to-day revised, so that the thousands of young men throughout the country who are at present disqualified, would have an opportunity of getting their names on it, and if we went before the electorate to-morrow, with the two policies as they have been defined by the Finance Minister, and by my financial leader respectively, I venture to say that instead of coming back here with a majority of sixty, such as they have to-day, hon. gentlemen opposite would find themselves in a large minority. Tariff reform and free trade principles have grown in this country during the last five years as they never grew before. The people have read and thought and studied; they have brought their reading, their thought and their study to the test of practical experience, through which they were going, and I am satisfied that thousands who never had a clear or well-defined judgment on these great questions before, are to-day not only thoroughly aroused, but thoroughly convinced that the proper mode of developing a country is to leave its trade and commerce as little hampered, and with as few legal restrictions in the way of duties or customs laws as possible. Trade and commerce, Sir, develop best when left alone the most, and the policy of the Liberal party, the policy of free traders everywhere, is, as I understand it, to leave to individual exertion the development of the different trades in which individuals are engaged; and for the Government to keep out of the matter as much as possible. Now, Sir, the two policies being before the country, let us see what we have to guide us in coming to a conclusion. We have more than one test to go by. We have the example of our neighbours to the south—a combination of forty-one or forty-two commonwealths—in which, I believe, since the year 1861 the principle of protection has been nourished, encouraged and enforced. We have, on the other hand, the example of the mother land—the land that hon. gentlemen opposite say they are so fond of, boasting of their admiration for her; but hesitating very much in following her example in those matters which have contributed so much to her commercial greatness. We have her example; and, if you will watch, Mr. Speaker, you will notice that a session of this House never goes by without some one, more or less prominent in the Conservative ranks, informing the country that the day of England's decadence has arrived—that she is going down, and that foreign nations are coming in and successfully competing with her, not only in the markets of the world, but in her own market. The hon. Finance Minister did not scruple, in order to tickle the ears of the groundlings, to give in his adhesion to this heresy; and I believe that the hon. gentleman, from his reading and experience, knew it to be a heresy. What did the hon. gentleman say? I find that in his speech, referring to this matter, he said:

To-day wares and goods which formerly were made in Great Britain alone, are now made in every quarter of the globe, and they are coming from protective countries into the markets of Great Britain to compete with what she manufactures, and throwing out of employment, in many respects, the very artizans who for generations are descended from the first industrial operatives in Great Britain.

Mr. McNEILL. Is it true?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I knew my hon. friend would chirp in his little cheer. You cannot say a word about that country which he loves so much being in her decadence and decline but the hon. gentleman is prepared to cheer.

Mr. McNEILL. I must be allowed, Mr. Speaker, to correct my hon. friend and to explain for myself. I never cheer any statement to the effect that the mother country is in her decadence and decline, because I do not believe that she is. On the contrary, I believe she is rapidly coming around to a policy of protection. But I cheer facts when I hear them properly stated, and I want to ask my hon. friend whether these are facts referred to by the hon. Finance Minister?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I have no doubt, Sir, that an individual case might be cited to show that in some particular industry, certain quantities of foreign goods have competed successfully in Great Britain. But we have to speak of the trade and commerce of Great Britain as a whole, as it exists to-day; and we have to ask ourselves whether, looking at the totality of that trade and commerce, Great Britain is being met successfully by the protective nations of the world. Sir, I cheerfully accept the challenge given. I know that my hon. friend is sincere when he says he loves the old country so much. I believe he does; but if he loves her much he loves protection more. Now, I would advise the hon. gentleman and some of his friends behind him to read a little book which was published some years back, entitled "Fifty years of National Progress in Great Britain," and they will see how far those newspaper stories representing the decadence of the trade of Great Britain are based on truth. My hon. friend, if he reads that little book, will find it more interesting than the pages of a novel, and as wonderful as a chapter in the Arabian Nights. He will find, starting from the period when Great Britain changed her policy in 1838 or 1840, that the masses of the people have been raised up to a very high standard of comfort; that wealth has accumulated in a degree unparalleled in the world's history before; and that that wealth is not concentrated in the hands of a few hundreds or thousands, but has been gradually diffused more and more every year, under the beneficent action of free trade principles, among the masses of the people. What does Mulhall say? Let me make a quotation or two for the benefit of my hon. friends on the other side:

The progress made by the United Kingdom during the last fifty years is wholly unprecedented in our annals, and has not been approached by any other nation in Europe. We may divide the whole period into two almost equal portions, the first terminating in 1860, the second coming down to 1886, and a comparison of the statistics bearing upon twelve principal points of national welfare will show that the relative progress has been as follows:

Then follows a list of statistics upon the twelve points or tests of prosperity in the different years, 1837-40, 1860 and 1886; the first being the standard, taken at one hundred in each case:

| | 1837-40. | 1860. | 1886. |
|-----------------------|----------|-------|-------|
| Population..... | 100 | 110 | 142 |
| Wealth..... | 100 | 134 | 224 |
| Trade..... | 100 | 265 | 572 |
| Shipping..... | 100 | 175 | 683 |
| Textile industry..... | 100 | 203 | 306 |
| Hardware..... | 100 | 230 | 512 |
| Mining..... | 100 | 215 | 376 |
| Steam power..... | 100 | 365 | 1,140 |
| Agriculture..... | 100 | 115 | 94 |
| Banking..... | 100 | 344 | 672 |
| Revenue..... | 100 | 134 | 173 |
| Instruction..... | 100 | 170 | 440 |
| Total..... | 1,200 | 2,460 | 5,334 |

There are the twelve great subjects, which comprise in themselves the wealth and evidence of progress in a nation; and if you can parallel Great Britain's record in respect of them in the world's history, combining all your protected countries together during the same period of time, I shall be somewhat surprised. When I speak of protected countries, I mean the old countries, and not the United States, which has been newly developed, and the value of the lands of which must have been something enormous, not created by free trade or protection. Let me just go on to the end of the paragraph:

The only item which shows a positive decline is agriculture, which is 6 per cent lower than it was fifty years ago, and in reference to population 33 per cent lower. When we proceed to study the several items in detail, we shall find some other facts of more or less importance such as these: the national debt has been reduced 7 per cent; food supply per inhabitant has improved 60 per cent; the ratio of paupers to population has declined more than one-half; the criminal records show a diminution of 71 per cent, and the result of sanitary improvements has been to lengthen the span of life by three years, say 6 per cent.

Sir, you find here that shipping has increased nearly seven-fold, trade nearly six-fold, steam power nearly twelve-fold. You find that everything has increased; you find that everything has doubled, quadrupled; and with these facts staring us in the face, hon. gentlemen come forward, like my hon. friend who has just sat down (Mr. Maclean) and say: I am not a believer in the policy which has made that country great and glorious as she is—which has made her the commercial mistress of the world with all the nations of the world bringing tribute to her; I believe in something adopted by France and Germany, and which keeps them in the comparatively stationary position they are in to-day as compared with Great Britain. What more do we find? Not only has there been an actual increase in the several divisions of actual wealth and in the totality of that wealth, but we find it has not been confined to the classes. And the great point I desire to make in connection is this: That where free trade exists, the increase of wealth is not confined to the classes, but permeates down to and through the masses of the people. On page 23 I find the following:—

We find, therefore, that the accumulations average 53 shillings yearly per inhabitant down to 1860, and 82 shillings since that date. In a word, the ordinary accumulation is 150 millions yearly, or almost half a million daily, nor does this wealth become congested among a small number of the people, on the contrary, the rich grow less rich, and more numerous every year, the poor become fewer in ratio to population.

That is the result in free trade England. Then he gives some other tables not pertinent to my subject, and winds up his statement on page 25 thus:

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.)

This shows that the affluent and middle classes have increased since 1850 no less than 270 per cent, or eight times faster than population, and just twice as fast as the aggregate earnings.

Nothing can be more conclusive. I will not read any more except the concluding section which relates to the condition of the masses:

In whatever direction we turn our eyes, to compare the present condition of the masses with what it was forty or fifty years ago, we find, with a few exceptions, the utmost reason for satisfaction. The Probate Court returns show that 31 per cent of the persons who now die belong to a class above the reach of want, against 17 per cent in 1840; that is to say, 14 per cent of our population have been lifted out of a position of indigence to one of absolute or comparative affluence. At present 15 per cent of the people of the three Kingdoms reside in houses valued at or over £20 a year, against 5 per cent in 1840, which means that 10 per cent of the population who formerly lived in poor dwellings are now in the enjoyment of comfortable, healthy habitations. The general increase of wealth has been extensive to the working classes since the depositors in savings banks and members of friendly societies numbered last year 19 million persons, whose savings amounted to 160 million sterling, or £16 per head. These accumulations since 1840 have grown fourteen times faster than population, the annual increase since 1875 having been 7 millions sterling.

Why, these results are enough to take away one's breath. And when you compare that old, effete monarchy, as she used to be called in this Canada of ours, with this young healthy, thriving and virgin nation—when you compare the stagnation, the commercial atrophy which has existed over this Canada for years past and the comparative stagnation which has marked our national record, with the brilliant record Great Britain has made, through leaps and bounds, we may well ask: Is our condition due to any inherent defect that exists in the character of our people, or is it because we have not got the right policy? Either one or the other. Either our country must be a bad country and our people a poor people, or we have not got a good policy to enable them to reach somewhere near the extraordinary degree of prosperity which has marked the people of Great Britain. Now, we have that example before us in the mother land; and, as I remarked, we have an example, on the other side, in the country to the south. We have an example of protection applied to the people in the United States; and I do not suppose there is a protectionist, in this House or out of it, who would desire a more favourable country in which to apply his favourite theory than the United States. It is not one country, as we all know. It is composed of forty-two great commonwealths, stretching from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and from the Gulf of Mexico to the Canadian boundary lines. It is a world in itself, one-half a continent, furnishing within it all the necessaries demanded by man for his life, improvement and comfort. Why, they do not require to go abroad hardly for any of the things necessary to man's existence, comfort and happiness. They possess them within themselves. They have the tropics and arctic and temperate zones. Do they want something from the north, they produce it themselves. Do they want the products of the tropics, they have them within their own borders. Do they want the grains and other articles which grow in the temperate zone, and all that man requires in the highest state of development, they have them within their own limits. If there was any country in which a protective system could be applied with the least disadvantage and the greatest benefit, that country is the United States. The trade between the forty-two States is absolutely free. Travelling from the boundary lines down to the Gulf of Mexico, and from ocean to ocean, you cannot come across a customs house or a customs officer. It is all free—free as it is in England—freer even, because there is not even a tax on anything so far as passing from state to state is concerned. What has been the result? In 1846 the Walker Tariff was adopted by the United States. That was, practically speaking, a tariff for revenue only. That remained in force from 1846 to 1861. And I venture to say that the degree of prosperity that marked that era of the history of the United States has not been surpassed, if it has ever been equalled, in that country. Sir, there was contentment, there was prosperity, there was even-handed progress. No changes were made in the tariff; the people engaged in trade and commerce went satisfied about their business. They were not told one year, as we were told in Canada: We are going to make a small revision this year, but look out for next year. They did not have peripatetic commissioners going about the country to find out how much they should uproot the existing conditions of things and establish another, so that no man engaged in trade or commerce might know what the tariff was to be. But for this number of years the tariff remained stationary and with the best results. In 1861, what took place? The people were not convinced that their policy was bad, but, driven by the necessities of a crisis because of the civil war which was just upon them, they were induced to adopt the system of protection in order to raise a large revenue. And, once protection was established, it was found difficult if not impossible to dislodge. Why? Because it is based upon selfishness, and it cannot be otherwise. My hon. friend who has just taken his seat (Mr. Maclean, York) told us that selfishness was the governing principle of the human race; that everywhere it was the governing principle of protection. Every class that was feeding and fattening at the public expense entrenched itself behind its privileges and contributed of its means to maintain and support the system by which it lived. And so it has been in Canada. Well, Sir, it went on from time to time until these colossal taskmasters (as they have been termed) of the whole people, levying tribute from every day's labour, became such a danger to the state that the people rose against the system, and a new mandate was given to the law-makers, which is now being carried out by the Democratic party. They are reversing the lines of tariff legislation on which they went for years, they are proceeding upon freer trade lines, upon revenue tariff lines, getting as near to free trade as they can, and throwing over the system of protection that has worked such injury. And what now do we find? We find hon. gentlemen opposite rising in their places and pointing to the condition of trade in the United States as a warning to the free traders of this country. If this is not their motive I do not know what their motive can be. They say to us: do you not see the terrible strife going on there, the strikes, the lock-outs, the depression in business all over the United States? Of course, all this exists. Sir, I am not here to say that it exists specially or only on account of protection. There are other causes; but we know that the system of protection has been a very large contributing cause towards such condition of affairs as we have seen at Philadelphia, Homestead and other places within the past year or two. The people there have groaned under the protective system as the people here have groaned under the exactions of a tariff based upon the same principle. And the masses who feel its exactions most severely there are the same who suffer most here—the poorer classes, the farming classes and those who cannot form combinations in order to have their particular industries “developed.” The hon. gentleman will develop an iron industry but not an agricultural industry. He will not pay a bonus for digging potatoes, but he will pay a bonus for digging and smelting iron. We see that, as a result of the application of the system of protection in the United States, the American flag has been swept off the sea. As long ago as 1856, 75 per cent of the foreign trade of the United States was carried in United States bottoms; but in 1892, after over 30 years of protection, but 15 per cent of the foreign trade of the United States was so carried. Sir, I took up a copy of the New York ‘Herald’ only yesterday. It was dated 1st April, 1894. There I read the statement that of 56,000,000 bushels of grain exported from that city of New York during the previous year, but 17,000 bushels was carried in United States bottoms. What does that show? It shows that the system under which they have lived for the last 30 odd years has swept the seas of their fleet and of their flag; has transferred to foreign bottoms the trade which they once held, and held to their own advantage, and to their own increase in wealth. I hope to show in a later stage of my remarks that the results in this country of the application of this pernicious principle have been proportionately the same. I am proud to see, and every lover of freer trade relations will be proud to see, that the party now in power in the United States are setting about to reform this state of things, and that the Bill which is now before the Senate, which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Maclean, York) predicts will not be carried—that Bill, as Mr. Voorhees explained it, will result in lessening the tax burdens of the people to the extent of $76,000,000. Sir, that is a long step in the right direction. It is not as far as the Democratic party in the House of Representatives want to go, it is not as far as I had hoped the Democratic would go, but this at least we can say, that their faces are turned toward the light, that they are travelling in the right direction. Of that $76,000,000 taken from the burdens of the people, $23,000,000 represents the reduction on woollens, and the balance is on flax, hemp, jute and cotton and on metal and other manufactures. Now, Sir, I wish to ask hon. gentlemen on the other side, who are disposed to speak and think upon these makers, this question: if the application of free trade or the revenue tariff principle as they have it in England, has produced the results I have described, and if the application of the protective system has resulted in such difficulties in the United States—and I think they will agree with me that I have not overdrawn the picture—if with every advantage in their favour—of diversity of climate and natural resources—the people of the United States were unable to progress as they had hoped to progress, as they ought to have progressed, as we believe they would have progressed; then why do hon. gentlemen seek to apply that protective principle to a country with a climate and resources such as those of Canada? Why, Sir, I should think this the worst country in the world to which to apply this system of protection, for we are a narrow country, practically in the same zone from ocean to ocean, and with similar productions in almost every part. I can imagine the possibility of such a great agglomeration of commonwealths as the United States, a country having within itself all that a nation wants, subsisting upon protection; but I cannot imagine a country like Canada succeeding under such a system. Take the eastern provinces. What protection can we have down there? We do not trade with Ontario; you cannot force trade with Ontario if you try. The hon. gentleman has undertaken to force it to some extent by carrying products at non-paying prices along the Intercolonial Railway. He has forced the coal from Nova Scotia by this means as far west as the Province of Quebec. But he cannot make a profitable trade between Ontario and the eastern provinces, because trade consists in the profitable exchange of the surplus products of two countries, while in our country these two sections produce the same things and have the same kind of farming community. The country we want to get to is the country lying to the south, not that it is our only market, but that it is one of our best markets.

Mr. MACDONALD (King's, P.E.I.) Does not the United States produce the same things as we produce?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Certainly, they produce the same things to some extent, but the hon. gentleman knows that we can produce them more cheaply and that the United States is the only market for many of the products that we have in the Maritime Provinces, and we have to send them in there whether there is a tariff or whether there is no tariff; we cannot help ourselves. Sir, we have in Canada arrived at a turning-point in our history, in my humble judgment, and I will tell you why. What have we been doing for the last three or four decades of our history? Not that I complain of it particularly, but I want to call this fact to the attention of the House and country, that we have been going on borrowing to an extent almost alarming. The Government of the Dominion have been borrowing abroad; the provinces have been borrowing abroad, the municipalities, railways, and loan companies have all been borrowing abroad, until those best able to judge calculate that at this moment we stand indebted to foreign creditors in an amount approximating eight hundred millions of dollars. More than that, during the last fifteen years that the National Policy has been in force, you have gone on carrying out that same system to an extent greater than ever before. I am not now complaining of it, because I think that in so far as borrowing is necessary to develop the undeveloped resources of a new state, it is perfectly right and proper; but I am only calling attention to the fact that to-day you stand with that indebtedness upon you. We are told now that the construction of public works has come to an end, that we have run the length of our tether, and that there is going to be no more heavy expenditures. What does that mean? It means that during the past fifteen years we have been borrowing enormously in Great Britain, to an extent of not less than three hundred millions during that period, and bringing the money here to spend it on railways, on canals, and on public works, to develop the resources of this country. Why, Sir, it would be marvellous if, during the time of the expenditure of that borrowed money, there was not a seeming and a passing prosperity in this country. Go into a small province like Cape Breton, where not less than three and a-half millions of money have been spent during the past few years in building a railway; must have not be a passing, even if it is ephemeral, prosperity during that expenditure? Go down to Nova Scotia where the Minister of Marine and the High Commissioner, his father, have spent millions upon millions of money in constructing miles of railway hither and thither, and across the country; go down where they are spending money in building this Chignecto Ship Railway, and where the Government voted money to the late member for Gloucester (Mr. Burns) to build that fraud known as the Caraquet Railway—I say that during the expenditure of these millions of money there must have been a passing prosperity in the parts of the country where it was spent. But it was for the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Railways to tell us now that that period of Canadian history is past? The Minister of Finance tells you that the period of borrowing and spending has gone by, he tells you that now we have come to the period of paying. You have danced, and now you have got to pay the piper. Let me tell you that during the next fifteen or twenty years, while you are paying the piper, you are coming under a condition of things very different from the inflation which was necessarily caused by the introduction into this country of such huge sums of money, and their expenditure in the way I have spoken of. The expenditure has ceased, there will be a reaction, but the interest has got to be paid. Any hon. gentlemen with pencil in hand can ascertain that if you owe eight hundred millions of money, and pay 4 per cent upon it—or 5 per cent, as you do in many cases—it takes nearly one-third of the total exports of Canada to pay the interest alone. At 4 per cent, the interest would amount to thirty-two millions a year, and that is the value of one-third of the real exports of Canada. During the past fifteen or twenty years that you have been borrowing, you have provided for the foreign exchange which was required, you have provided for the accruing interest upon old loans, and you have provided, to some extent for your mercantile indebtedness. An hon. gentleman whom I have in my eye now, a mercantile man of great experience, knows well that the period of borrowing having ceased, you are approaching a period when the question of providing exchange to pay your indebtedness abroad, is going to be a serious one, so serious that it will tax the best resources of this country to meet it. I say that the facts are such as to call for serious reflection from this Parliament and from this country; and that so far from persisting in the course of shackling trade and commerce, limiting trade and commerce, warping and thwarting foreign trade in which money might be made, your policy ought to be throw off the shackles which hamper trade, and make trade as free as you possibly can, so that the people may get as rich and wealthy as they ought to be. Now, notwithstanding all this, I say, and I say it with the deepest sorrow, that our hopes as to what would have taken place in Canada, have been grievously disappointed. It is a lamentable confession to have to make that our trade to-day, so far as imports are concerned, amounts to just what it did in the years 1873 and 1874, twenty years ago. If we had been a small country, with our boundary line fixed and determined, and our population increasing slowly, and no immigrants coming here from the countries of the old world, one would not have been so much surprised; but here is a new and virgin soil, here are millions upon millions of acres in the great territories of the west added to the old territory of Canada during the last twenty years, here we have had tens of thousands of immigrants brought at great expense to swell our population, and notwithstanding that, we do not seem to have imported any more during the last year or two than we did twenty years ago. It is true, I am glad to say it, that our exports during the past year have increased somewhat, increased by the added exports from Manitoba and the North-west, not that the Maritime Provinces, or the old provinces of Canada, have increased their exports at all. The hon. gentleman knows that the picture is not one calculated to inspire us with a great deal of pride in the future of Canada. It is a picture of failure, failure to a very large extent, and I regret to say that the picture of failure, and the picture of disaster, is more marked in the eastern provinces from which I come than in any other part of the Dominion. Nothing has struck me so much, concerning the present condition and future prospects of Canada, as the way in which they are spoken of by hon. gentlemen opposite and hon. gentlemen from this side. Why, Sir, we had the member from Kent (Mr. McInerney) and the hon. gentleman for St. John (Mr. Hazen) rejoicing, and quoting in proof of their rejoicing, statements from Governors in several provinces of the Dominion, to the effect that really there was no great want, and no distress in the Maritime Provinces.

Mr. McINERNEY. I wish to say to the hon. gentleman that I quoted no Governor's speech at all.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman did not quote it. I coupled the name of the hon. member for St. John who, if I mistake not, quoted not less than two, if he did not quote three or four Governor's speeches. The hon. member for St. John thanks God and takes courage because there is no actual want in the city from which he comes. Surprising, is it not, that with the natural resources of the Maritime Provinces, unequalled, I may say, in many respects in the world, with their mineral, fishing and lumber resources, with a population of hardy, honest and economical people, sprung from the best stock—surprising, is it not, that they can get bread and butter to eat? Why, Sir, the picture is one that I am ashamed an hon. member should bring before this House. Let the hon. gentleman look at the figures, as I will give them directly, and I think he will see that the time has come for considering—if he has the moral courage to do it, as some hon. gentlemen, whom I commend, on the other side have had the moral courage to do—whether we have been pursuing the right political path, and whether it is not time to turn our backs upon that path, and go in a better direction. Sir, the application of this pernicious system to Canada has resulted in producing the same effects here as followed the application of that principle in the United States. What do you see to-day? In 1879 the percentage of our sea-borne trade carried by Canadian ships was 35 per cent; in 1893 it had been reduced to 20 per cent. Of the total sea-borne trade of Canada 80 per cent to-day is carried in foreign bottoms, and yet we boast ourselves to be the fourth or fifth maritime nation in the world, a showing that should make us hang our heads with shame. The registered tonnage of Canada, which between 1873 and 1878, that terrible period which hon. gentlemen opposite are so fond of proclaiming as one of the most desolate periods of Canadian history, increased $8,000,000 in value, while during the period from 1870 down to the present time it decreased $10,000,000 in value. Therefore, so far as our shipping is concerned, the result is deplorable to whatever cause you attribute it. I know hon. gentlemen opposite are constantly saying that surely the National Policy cannot be held responsible for the decrease in shipping, and I admit certainly not for all the decrease—but if the decrease in shipping only bears the same ratio to the decreases in all other branches of trade, the determining cause must be the general policy of the country or it must be some inherent defect in the country itself. I will show that it is not an inherent defect in the country, because I will prove that during the period anterior to the introduction of this policy the Maritime Provinces progressed in a satisfactory manner, both in population and in material wealth. We have been in the confederation twenty odd years, and I am not going to single out a particular year here and there in order to show this year is better than that, as some hon. gentlemen are so fond of doing, but I take the whole period, from 1873 to 1878 the Liberal party were in power, and I take a similar period from 1889 to 1893 inclusive, and comparing one period with the other I find the aggregate trade of the three Maritime Provinces has decreased by millions. Why, looking at Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island, lying right in the lap of the fisheries, Nova Scotia with its rich mines of coal and gold and forests and mineral wealth almost unrivalled; New Brunswick with her wealth of fisheries and forests, and Prince Edward Island with its agricultural resources, considering also the careful, hard-working people who comprise their population who could do otherwise 18 or 20 years ago than predict for them a bright and brilliant future. They are a maritime people, naturally born free traders, exchanging for the wealth of the world brought to their doors, their surplus natural products, a people brought up not in penury but in hardihood, and trained to habits of industry and frugality; with such a people and such natural resources we had reason to hope that under a fair and honest system a height of prosperity would have been reached, at least equal to that attained by the people to the south. The records, however, show that from 1874 to 1878 the aggregate trade of these three provinces was considerably larger than that from 1889 to 1893. What has become of our population? If there is one test more fair than another of a nation's prosperity it is the test of population. Have we reached the greatest height and can we hope to go no higher? Is it not true that we have resources enough to maintain in competency and happiness five times the population we now possess? Is it not true that we were told we would have at least three or four times more population than we now possess, and this 25 years ago when we entered the confederation? Why, the population did increase during the first decade in a very respectable degree. I find that from 1871 to 1881 it increased 103,000 souls, but that after this protective policy was introduced which we imported from our Yankee friends to the south, from 1881 to 1891 our population increased barely 10,000 in the whole Maritime Provinces, a record which we can only read with sorrow and regret. This state of things can only be reversed when you reverse the policy which has brought it about. Between 1871 and 1881 we heard a great deal about the exodus. How many people did we lose during that period? About 5,000 a year from the Maritime Provinces. What number did we lose between 1881 and 1889? No less than 17,500 per year. Where have they gone? Have they gone to Ontario and Quebec to build up the Dominion as a whole? No, a very small number even went to the North-west Territories. These people left this country to enrich a foreign power, and the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite drove them away to a foreign land. There is no denying this fact, that we in the Maritime Provinces are getting poorer and poorer every year, and we know it. With our shipping gone, our trade diminished, our lands reduced in value 40 and in some cases even 50 per cent, with many of our wharfs and warehouses empty, and the population fleeing the country—the hearts of the best men are beginning to fail. It was not so under the old system. At that time we did not progress in any wonderful way, but we progressed substantially and steadily. But since this new system of developing the resources of the country by taxing one industry to put money into the hands of another has been introduced, the Maritime Provinces have steadily declined in prosperity, and gone back. The hon. member for St. John (Mr. Hazen) pointed to one ray of hope. He looked around the horizon and then declared that the people were not starving, for which they should thank God and take courage, and then he said, Look at the savings bank deposits! I am sick and tired of hearing of these deposits, because they are so presented as to constitute a very fallacious argument.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Does the hon. gentleman forget that the hon. member who first presented that argument was the hon. gentleman who sits beside him (Sir Richard Cartwright)?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) It is one thing to call attention to the state of the savings bank deposits as satisfactory. It is another thing to select a small increase in the savings bank deposits as conclusive evidence that the country is progressing as it ought to progress. There is not a man who comes from the Maritime Provinces but would be insulted if he were told that the state of Maine possesses more natural resources, and is a better country than New Brunswick or Nova Scotia. We talk about our $15,000,000 in the savings banks of all the Maritime Provinces. What does that amount to? The total in the savings banks for the whole Dominion is $41,000,000; the deposits in the banks in the state of Maine alone are $50,278,000. Do you want to accept the argument, that the amount in the savings banks is an indication of the wealth and prosperity of your country? Then, apply it; $50,000,000 in the state of Maine, $15,000,000 in the three Maritime Provinces; $50,000,000 in the state of Maine, and $41,000,000 in the whole Dominion of Canada. Are you prepared for that result? Will you go on the platform and tell your people that the state of Maine alone is more wealthy than all Canada, because that state has larger savings bank deposits than has the entire Dominion? Is not the argument ridiculous and absurd? Business in the Maritime Provinces is in such condition that I am not surprised that our people put their money in the savings banks. I wish they would take it out and that there was some mode of using it to develop the commercial prosperity of the country, but so stagnant have we become in many parts down there, that if a man does get a few hundred dollars, he is only too glad to hide it away in the savings banks, much like the money laid up in the napkin that bears no interest and brings no result. Hon. gentlemen opposite talk about money in the savings banks. I take up the 'American Almanac,' and I find that in the little State of New Hampshire there are $74,000,000 deposited in the savings banks, in the State of Massachusetts $369,000,000, and in the whole of the United States of America, $1,700,000,000. The hon. gentleman from Haidimand (Mr. Montague), with whom the savings bank argument is a little pet; will he work that out?

Mr. MONTAGUE. That is not bad for a country that has been ruined by protection.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I have heard the hon. gentleman tell this House, in the most doleful tones, that the people to the south of us have been ruined; he did not say it was by protection, but he said that they were far behind us in Canada. The hon. gentleman asked us: Is that the miserable country you want to deal with? He has asked us that question in this House with the most dramatic power and force. I answer: Yes, that is the country we want to trade with. We want to trade with it because they want the surplus products we have to dispose of, and we want to exchange for them certain things that we can buy there to the best advantage.

Mr. MONTAGUE. How will you get it?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I will show you.

Mr. MONTAGUE. We want to know that; it would be interesting

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) We are not going to get it by playing possum, as certain members of the Government did a few years ago. We are not going to get it by telling the people, as a certain political party opposite me told them at the last election: that negotiations had been initiated by the Government of a neighbouring country to bring about reciprocal trade with our country, when many of them knew there was no foundation for such a statement. We who come from the Maritime Provinces, know that you, the Conservatives, won your majorities in very many counties down there by that false statement which you put out. Thousands upon thousands of electors whose main hope and desire was to see a fair and honourable treaty obtained between the two countries, said: If these negotiations are under way, if they have been initiated by the United States of America, if our Government do desire to bring about a reasonable extension of the old reciprocity treaty of 1854, in Heaven's name, give the men a chance who are trying to bring this about; and they voted to put you back in power, and what did you? You sold them. You went down masquerading at Washington a year afterwards, and your whole party knew that the thing was a farce and a fraud before you even started. You came back with a report, even the accuracy of which is contradicted by the United States authorities, and to this day it is impossible for any one of us to tell what you did offer or what they did offer. The hon. gentleman asks me: How are we going to get it? I know this. I have this official piece of evidence at any rate—I care not so much whether Mr. Blaine understood Mr. Foster, or Mr. Foster understood perfectly Mr. Blaine's offer—I know this: that, embalmed in the official records of the United States reports, is a statement of the terms on which they were prepared to enter upon and negotiate a fair and honourable treaty with us. I know that they insisted in adopting as a basis the same lines which George Brown laid down in his treaty, and I know that such a treaty, honourable to both countries, would be productive alike of good to each. I know, Sir, that tens of thousands of people in this Dominion would thank God if such a treaty were negotiated to-morrow. Hon. gentlemen opposite, when they talk about this, try and turn the subject by intimating that the Liberal party desire annexation to the United States. They know that is false. They know that the Liberal party of this Dominion are just as loyal, just as desirous of maintaining our independence and maintaining our connection with Great Britain as they are, and I say it is a slander on the best half of the Canadian people, when you impugn and attack their loyalty in that regard. Then again, you try and make the people believe that we are aiming at annexation in an indirect way by proclaiming commercial union. You know that in doing that, you are dealing dishonestly. Hon. gentlemen opposite know that commercial union, in the sense in which they proclaim it to the people, has never been professed by this party either formally or in any other way. An hon. gentleman cited here—as has been cited every year in support of the statement that our party supported commercial union—some remarks I happened to make before the Board of Trade of Charlottetown some years ago.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. And in this House afterwards.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman never cited any of my remarks in this House to that effect—I challenge the Minister of Marine—

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentleman's own speech in 1888.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I will challenge the Minister of Marine to produce one sentence, or paragraph, from a speech made by me in this House or out of it, in which I avowed myself in favour of commercial union.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I will state this, so that I may not mislead the hon. gentleman. The speech I refer to is the speech in which he endeavoured to explain his speech at Charlottetown.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Yes, I am just coming to that very point. It does not require any explanation, except that the hon. gentleman who quoted it, divorced the quotation from its context and made it appear different altogether from what it was. What took place on that occasion in Charlottetown?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.)

The question of reciprocity with the United States was one that the Charlottetown Board of Trade was more interested in than any other question. The question of Liberal and Conservative, and everything else, faded into utter insignificance before the question of obtaining freer trade relations with the United States.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to ask him a question, as he is on this point of reciprocity?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Pardon me for a moment. When we met at Charlottetown, I was asked to explain the questions of reciprocity and commercial union. There were certain gentlemen at that Board of Trade meeting who desired to have trade as free between Canada and the United States as between each of the states of the Union; they wanted no customs-houses at all, and they desired at the same time to maintain the fiscal independence of Canada by having the right to fix our own tariff. I pointed out to them that such a thing as that was ridiculous, that they could not have that, that if they took down the customs-houses altogether, the tariff would have to be made uniform, and the United States would not be foolish enough to agree to take away the customs-houses altogether and allow us the right to put our tariff 20 per cent lower than theirs. No one but fools, I said, would do that. The hon. gentleman quoted me as inferentially supporting and recommending commercial union. That is not so. That debate lasted some days, and at the close of the debate before the Board of Trade I moved a resolution, which I will read to the House, and which was carried with hardly a dissenting voice. If the hon. gentleman can find any commercial union in it, or any annexation in it, or anything else in it than the policy I have understood the party with which I have the privilege to be connected always to support and advocate, namely, the freest possible trade relations consistent with our honour and dignity—if he can discover anything else but that in this resolution, then Sir, I will withdraw from my position. Here is the resolution I proposed:

That this Board warmly approves of reciprocal free trade with the United States on the broadest possible basis, including the abolition of restrictions on the coasting trade and the transfer of vessel property, and embracing the concession to the Americans of the common right with our fishermen to use our fisheries.

Sir, that is the resolution I moved; those were my sentiments and the sentiments of the gentlemen whom I was addressing; and those sentiments were voted and approved of by every man sitting at the Board without distinction of party. And still, in the face of that, my hon. friend quotes me in this House—so that it may go to many thousands of people who have never seen or heard me, and who do not know me—as having said that I was in favour of commercial union, and consequently in favour of annexation.

Mr. SPROULE. Did I misquote the hon. gentleman ?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Yes, the hon. gentleman misquoted me in the worst possible way, by quoting a part of what I said and leaving out the remainder.

Mr. MONTAGUE. If the hon. gentleman will allow me. My question is a very simple one: Having declared that he was not in favour of commercial union, I want to ask him if he is in favour of unrestricted reciprocity ?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman may think that is very clever. I tell him that I was in favour of unrestricted reciprocity.

Mr. MONTAGUE. And still in favour of it ?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I am in favour of the broadest and freest trade relations between the two countries that can be obtained consistently with the national dignity of both. I was aware, when I spoke in favour of the unrestricted reciprocity resolution—personally aware, as my hon. friends at the right and left of me know—especially aware, from a very important interview that I had with one of the very leading men in the United States—

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Blaine.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Yes, Mr. Blaine, if you will have it—an interview lasting a good many hours—I was aware that unrestricted reciprocity in the sense in which it was popularly understood, of doing away with the custom-houses altogether, never could be obtained; that there were certain articles, such as wool, on which they had a duty while we had none, that would have to be scheduled. I was perfectly aware that we were not to have a pedantic uniformity. There were certain articles which from the necessity of the case would have to be scheduled. But when these were scheduled, everything else would be opened, the honour and fiscal independence of each country would be maintained, and the right of each to maintain its tariff would remain intact; only we would have a treaty of reciprocal trade relations broader than the treaty of 1854—broader possibly than the George Brown Treaty of 1874; but not broader than we thought it desirable to have, and quite consistent with the honour and independence, fiscal and otherwise, of the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. McNEILL. Did I understand my hon. friend to say that the United States Government were willing to concede a reciprocity treaty similar to that refused to the Hon. George Brown ?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I understand the hon. gentleman to ask me whether I thought a treaty could be obtained on the lines of George Brown's treaty.

Mr. McNEILL. I wanted to know whether the hon. gentleman said there was something embalmed in the records.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I said there was something embalmed in the records; and if the hon. gentleman turns to the United States records, he will find that Mr. Blaine's report to the Senate of the United States lays down the exact lines on which he was prepared to negotiate a treaty with Canada, and he will find that those lines were as broad or broader than the lines of the treaty negotiated by Mr. Brown.

Mr. McNEILL. So much for the National Policy. What George Brown could not get we can get now.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) When interrupted a few moments ago, I was referring to the lamentable exodus which has occurred—which we all, irrespective of party, deplore; which we would all like to see stopped.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Does the hon. gentleman allude to the exodus from the United States or from Canada ?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I refer to the exodus from the Maritime Provinces. I was coming to a remark made by one of the hon. gentleman's friends that the Maritime Provinces were being repatriated, and he quoted, I think, from the St. John "Telegraph," a statement that some people have been coming back. Well, I have no doubt that the great commercial depression that has existed in the United States during the last twelve months has driven some hundreds, I hope some thousands back. I have not seen them; I have not seen anybody who has seen them. I hope that they have come; but, from what I have heard, I do not think they have come to stay, or to stay longer than the mere passing away of the commercial depression in the United States. I wish they would stay; but I do not think they will do so until something happens that will revive commerce, restore farm values, and enable people to live so that something will be left to them at the end of the year's operations. When you make this a cheap country to live in and a cheap country to produce in, I think you will repatriate it almost as quickly as you depopulated it by making it a dear country. Let us then see what the rival proposals of the two political parties are. The hon. gentleman tells us that they have reached the limit of economy in the public expenditure, that they can go no further; and they say that the high tariff is imposed, not so much to yield the necessary revenue of the country, as it is, in their euphemistic language, to develop the country. Now, I deny that national prosperity can be obtained by enriching one class at the expense of another. I say that the experience of the last fifteen years shows that, instead of promoting national development, the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite has promoted national atrophy. I say that their policy is an unjust, unfair and destructive process. The evil does not lie in the exaction of the taxes paid into the treasury, because a portion of those at least are used for the public welfare; but the evil lies in the great amount of taxes which are taken out of the pockets of the people that never go into the treasury at all. I have heard from those in whose judgment I place great confidence, that under this protective system, for every dollar taken out of the people and put into the treasury two dollars or more are taken out and go into the pocket of some favoured manufacturer. So that the amount that goes into the treasury is no gauge of the evil effects of the system; you must add to this amount twice or thrice as much which are not paid into the treasury of the people but into the treasury of the protected interests. I denounce and condemn such a system. I will not go into the question of the policy of the Government as embodied in the new tariff, as I wish to draw my remarks to a close; but I will show how it is carried out with respect to one or two articles that effect the special interests of the people in whose behalf I am particularly speaking. I supposed, when the hon. gentleman was going to reform the tariff, that the necessaries of life would have received some consideration at his hands. I suppose that kerosene oil may be called a necessary of life for a large class of people. It is not a necessary of life among the rich, it is true. The rich, in the cities, use electric light and gas and other means of lighting, but the mass of the people use coal or kerosene oil. We thought there was going to be some reduction in kerosene oil, but I find there is none at all. I find that at present, according to an invoice placed in my hands—the actual invoice of an importation of that article the other day—that on some kerosene oil, \$2,875 worth, imported into St. John, N. B., there was paid \$4,972 duty. This is not theoretic, but an actual invoice, which I hold in my hand—a certified invoice—and that is the amount of duty paid. Sir, that is an intolerable position. There is not a man here who will not, in his calmer moments, divested of party prejudice, say that an imposition of that kind is intolerable. Add the duty paid to the original cost, and it makes nearly three times as much. And that is borne by whom? By the rich people? No; they use electric light and gas. It is borne by the poor man—the artisan and workman. You have not raised a finger to lighten the burden which falls so heavily upon him in this regard. I was going to dilate upon that at some length, but will leave it until I go into committee. But I will draw the attention of the Minister representing the Maritime Provinces (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper)—the only member of the Cabinet now present—to the fact, that in the matter of fertilizers the Government are doing serious injustice to Nova Scotia. The duty on fertilizers has been reduced one-half. That reduction I approve of thoroughly, but the Government might have gone further. Why do they not reduce the duty on the raw material which enters into the manufacture of fertilizers? The hon. gentleman has taken off one-fifth of 1 per cent on sulphuric acid. This sulphuric acid, which is absolutely necessary for the production of fertilizers, is admitted into the United States free. It was $\frac{1}{2}$ cent a pound before, and now it is made four-tenths of a cent, a reduction of one-tenth of a cent, while the Government are taking 50 per cent off the duty on the fertilizer. Sir, the Government are acting unfairly and unjustly. They have reduced the duty on fertilizers, but will not go further and give the people in the Maritime Provinces, who have invested their money in the manufacture of fertilizers a chance. Why? Because, I am told, they have to protect the two factories which make sulphuric acid in the Dominion—one in the province of Quebec and the other somewhere else. I am told there are gentlemen who have influence with hon. gentlemen opposite—gentlemen who have reason to have influence—members of the Cabinet themselves, who are interested in this work. And to please them, this large industry, which is developed largely in the Maritime Provinces, is to be throttled in its inception and destroyed. I call the hon. gentleman's attention to this, as the special guardian of the Maritime Provinces.

Mr. POPE. To what Minister does the hon. gentleman refer?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I am speaking to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I did not understand the hon. gentleman to charge any Minister, any member of the Cabinet, with being interested in sulphuric acid.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I did not say the hon. gentleman was interested, but I say that I understood there is a gentleman, high in power and in the Cabinet, interested in the factories.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentleman should, in fairness, name the member of the Cabinet to whom he refers.

Mr. MULOCK. I think the remark I made at this moment misled my hon. friend from Queen's (Mr. Davies). I mentioned, in the course of his remarks about sulphuric acid, that the President of the Council (Mr. Ives) was interested. I did not mean pecuniarily. What I intended my hon. friend to understand was, that the President of the Council took a deep interest in this matter.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. No pecuniary interest?

Mr. MULOCK. No.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentleman does not wish to press this charge ?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Certainly not, neither directly nor indirectly, and if I made any charge of that kind, I absolutely withdraw it. I would be sorry to impute to any hon. gentleman, much less a member of the Cabinet, improper motives with regard to this matter. But I want specially to point out to the hon. gentleman himself, that gross injustice and wrong is done to the people he represents, and will be done in the future, with respect to both these articles. I have pointed out the policy of the Conservative party. The Liberal party offer a policy almost diametrically opposite. We say that the limit has not yet been reached with regard to economy in the expenditure for public service. I need not dilate longer upon that subject, because the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) went into it yesterday with an ability and wealth of illustration which leave no room for further comment from me. But I say, that our civil government exists, and was framed to exist on a scale of population three times as large as there is in this country. The hope and belief of all those who framed the civil list was that, instead of there being five millions of people here in 1893, there would be fifteen millions, and they went ahead on that assumption. Their assumption turned out to be absolutely false, and they have never had the moral courage or ability to retrace their steps and cut down the civil list and expenditure to the amount it ought to be. What ought it to be ? Just where it was left in 1878, plus the fixed charges which have been added. Neither the trade, nor population, nor size of the country justifies the increase in the expenditure which has taken place since then.

After Recess.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE TARIFF.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I have very few observations to make in addition to those that I made before dinner. I, at that time, was pointing out that the trade of this country is done chiefly with Great Britain and the United States ; that so far as our trade with the other nations of the world is concerned, it is infinitesimal compared with that which we do with Great Britain and the United States ; and that any policy intended to promote the welfare of Canada should chiefly have relation to these two countries. I pointed out that, so far as Great Britain is concerned, the Liberal party has a distinct, decisive and clear policy. Years ago, when the question was raised in this House by the hon. member for Bruce (Mr. McNeill), we submitted a policy to the House with regard to Great Britain. We said and believed then, what we say and believe now, that it would be in the interests of this country to enlarge as much as possible the commercial relations existing between this and the mother country, and that Great Britain had done all she could to further that end. What have we done ? We have done any amount of loud talking. Lip loyalty has been preached in and out of this House on that subject, and promises have been made by hon. gentlemen as to their intention and desire to promote freer trade with the old country. But when it came to the point—when we pointed out to them that they had maintained an unjust and unfair discrimination against British trade and asked them to remove that discrimination from the statute-book, so that our trade with the mother country should be at least placed on the same footing as that with more favoured countries, what response had we from the other side? I had the honour of moving in the House that, so far as those classes of goods are concerned which we mainly import from Great Britain, the time had come when the duties upon them should be largely reduced. But I did not find, with one or two notable exceptions, a gentleman on that side who ventured to record his vote in favour of my proposition. They were willing to go through the country and talk generally about their desire for improved trade relations with Great Britain; but when brought face to face with a practical solution and asked whether they were prepared to commit themselves to the proposition that it was desirable to remove the unjust discrimination which had existed for so many years, their party loyalty was superior to their patriotism. Rather than vote against the Government, they voted against removing the discrimination. Such members as my hon. friend from Albert (Mr. Weldon) and others whom I have in my eye, who are, in and out of season, loud and strong in the pronouncement of their allegiance to the mother country and desirous of promoting our trade relations with her, had no hesitation in voting down the resolution. And why? I will venture to say it was owing to party allegiance alone, because the resolution proceeded from the Opposition. I would ask these hon. gentlemen whether any resolution or proposition has ever emanated from their side having for its object the promotion of freer trade with the mother country? You hear speeches made by them from time to time. With what practical result? Where is the evidence? Nowhere. And I point to this fact, that when you bring these gentlemen down to what is called in this country "hard pan," when you ask them to commit themselves to a practical solution of a practical question, they shelter themselves behind their party allegiance. That is what they did then and what they will do to-day. What is our position? It is a logical, definable, and honest position. So far as trade with Great Britain is concerned, she admits everything free of duty. She opens her portals to the products of the world, no matter where they come from or under what flag. She welcomes them all, because she believes that the cheaper she can give products to her people the better for them, and the better for the country. Our policy with Great Britain therefore has been laid down in plain, distinct and unmistakable language. We wish to reduce the duties on the class of goods chiefly imported from Great Britain and to remove the discrimination which has existed for many years, unjustly, improperly, vexatiously, and ungenerously, against the mother country. These hon. gentlemen say no. The development of some special Canadian interests, they say, is of superior importance to anything else; and they will not do anything to remove the duties imposed on behalf of the special interests they desire to protect. As regards the other great country, with which we trade, what has been our policy? It has been, from the very first, to negotiate, either by a treaty agreement or carry out tariff resolutions, the removal of the restrictions which exist to-day and have existed so long. We desire to trade freely with them. We can do it in one way or the other. We have manifested this desire, not once, but on dozens of occasions. And how are we met by hon. gentlemen opposite? On every occasion by a distinct vote against our propositions, whatever they may be. We stand, therefore, with this avowal that we do not believe in exclusive trade with either the United States or Great Britain. We believe that trade between the two countries is beneficial both to us and them. Personally, I believe that all trade is beneficial to all the parties who deal in it. They would not deal in it otherwise. We trade with Great Britain and the United States because it is our interest to do so. We desire to perpetuate, extend, and enlarge commerce with both these countries. We give you our proposition, fair and square, and do not shelter ourselves behind unmeaning words. Our resolutions are there; our policy is there, clear and distinct. The whole country understands it. On the one hand, so far as Great Britain is concerned, we desire to enlarge our trade relations with her by removing the unjust restrictions placed upon the importations of goods from that country. And so far as the United States are concerned—where there is a protective tariff—we desire to enlarge our trade relations with them, either by treaty agreement or tariff resolutions, specifying the articles which shall be exchanged free. Our policy, whatever else can be charged against it, cannot be charged as indefinite. Speaking as to the special effect of trade with the United States upon the Maritime Provinces, I have never heard anything that I regretted more in this House than the remark made by the hon. member for Kent (Mr. McInerney), that he believed reciprocity with that country was an unmingled evil. I heard that remark with pain and sorrow, and believe it was forced from him through a wrong understanding of what party allegiance demanded. Sir, the true lover of his country, with a proper knowledge of its requirements would never have consented to make that public declaration and bind himself to it as a public man. What was the result of our trade relation with the United States from 1854 to 1866?

Why, Sir, if the hon. gentleman looks back over the records he will find that in 1854 when the reciprocity treaty was first agreed to between the two countries, our trade with the United States was comparatively speaking small, if I recollect rightly, from $14,000,000 to $17,000,000.

Mr. McINERNEY. Does the hon. gentleman mean to say that the trade between the United States and the provinces of Canada, both exports and imports, was of the value of $7,000,000 or $8,000,000?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I said from $14,000,000 to $17,000,000.

Mr. McINERNEY. I think it was nearly twice as much.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Before the reciprocity treaty came into operation I think I am correct in saying it—if the hon. gentleman will look at the memorandum of papers prepared in connection with the George Brown treaty he will see that the trade between Canada, including the Maritime Provinces and the old province of Canada, and the United States was under $20,000,000. I think, I am sure, I am right.

Mr. McINERNEY. It was $35,000,000 the first year of the treaty.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman is again interrupting, but I excuse him, owing to the fact that he is a young member of the House. The hon. gentleman has stated what the whole volume of trade was the first year after the treaty came into force. I agree with his statement that the treaty had not been in force a year before the totality of the trade nearly doubled. There could not be a stronger argument adduced.

Mr. McINERNEY. For the information of the hon. gentleman, and in order to put myself right, and perhaps to put the hon. gentleman right, I may state that the year before the treaty came into force the total trade between this country and the United States was $25,000,000, and the year after it was $34,000,000. So it did not double by a good deal.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I have not the figures before me, but I will accept the hon. gentleman's statement, as I assume he has read from the official figures. My recollection is, as stated in the George Brown papers, that the amount of trade between the two countries was from $17,000,000 to $20,000,000 a year before that treaty. I accept the hon. gentleman's figures, and it will be observed that they jumped $10,000,000 in the year. Yet the hon. gentleman stated in the House the other night that reciprocity of trade was an unmixed evil. Let me ask that hon. gentleman or any one else who takes the same position the hon. gentleman occupied the other night, what was the result after the treaty had been in operation a few years? I think I am correct in saying that trade advanced by leaps and bounds until the last year of the treaty it reached $80,000,000, and it remained at that figure without progression for many years, because of the restrictions which politicians on both sides of the line imposed improperly on the trade relations of the two countries. Free those trade relations from unjust and improper restrictions, and can the hon. gentleman tell me, is there anybody who can place a limit on the amount of trade that could be done between the two countries? If you want to realize the evils which prohibitions and trade restrictions produce you can in imagination segregate one of the States of the Union from the great Union compact. Take Massachusetts, Maine, Ohio or Minnesota. Segregate it; put a customs barrier around it and prevent the free interchange of trade between it and the 60,000,000 of people in the remaining States, and tell me whether commercial atrophy would not soon mark its condition? Does anybody doubt it? It is the same to-day with respect to Canada as it would be in regard to one of the States of the Union. Throw down the barriers, if you can honourably do so, which exist, permit the free interchange of the products of each country into the other and results would be obtained by both surpassing what the most sanguine believer in Canada's future hopes for. If we throw down the trade barriers between Canada and the United States you would have again repeated what you had before in the old treaty times, trade bounding up year after year, and prosperity flowing in its wake. I call attention to the fact that while Nova Scotia has a total export trade of $11,500,000 in round figures, the United States took $3,230,000, or nearly one-third. How was it with respect to the province of New Brunswick. Out of a total export of $7,253,000 the United States took $3,735,000, or over 50 per cent; of her exports taken by Great Britain all but the value of $220,000 consists of deals and deal ends. In other words, of the whole value of $7,252,000 which New Brunswick exports, if you bar deals and deal-ends, the United States, with the exception of a few hundred thousand dollars' worth, takes all. I should like to ask the hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon), than whom no one knows more the capabilities of his province, whether he would dare to put a limit to the volume of trade which might be done between that great province and the country to the south of us if those unnatural trade barriers were removed. Take the great city of St. John, situated at the mouth of one of the largest rivers of the Maritime Provinces, a city whose position, population and wealth indicate for her a great future, would the hon. gentleman dare to put a limit to the amount of trade that great port would enjoy in the very near future. I charge it that if there is commercial atrophy to-day and commercial depression greater than heretofore known, it is due to the policy which hon. gentlemen opposite have supported and which is the policy of the Conservative party of Canada. This policy would do very well for one or two of the large cities of Canada ; it does not do for the Maritime Provinces, because as I have already explained, we are shut out from trading with the upper provinces, and must trade with the people to the south. Sir, do you imagine for a moment that I desire to depreciate the enormously growing trade which we have with Great Britain. Not at all, Sir, I am one of those who desire to have two strings to my bow.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I am glad that sentiment is cheered on both sides of the House. I am glad there are some things which we can agree upon. I know, Sir, so far as Great Britain is concerned, that she is our best market for many of our products.

Mr. WELDON. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to interrupt him? I would ask him: If under the Wilson Bill New Brunswick lumber going into the American market is not free? I do not see what the hon. member's complaint is.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) He does not see what the hon. member's complaint is. My complaint is not about the Wilson Bill, but about the high tariff walls which are maintained between Canada and the United States of America. I am complaining about the policy of the Government; I am trying to deal with the practical question. I said, and I repeat now, that your policy is inimical to our best interests. I believe in throwing down the barriers which exist and which prevent the enlargement of our trade with the United States. I believe that could be accomplished with a Government in power favourable to that enlargement. I say that this Government is not favourable. I am proving that statement, and my argument has nothing whatever to do with the Wilson Bill. The question is: Would the abolition of the restrictions which prevent enlarged trade with the United States benefit largely the Maritime Provinces or would it not. My hon. friend (Mr. Weldon) almost concedes it, but he wants to throw the onus on the other party. I am satisfied that if a party had been in power favourable to enlarged trade with the United States, there was no reasonable doubt that the restriction would have been removed years ago. I charge upon the hon. gentleman the responsibility of supporting a party that is maintaining these restrictions, and I say: That above all other provinces in the Dominion, if there is commercial depression and atrophy, if the quarries of Albert County are to-day unworked, if there are tens and hundreds of houses uninhabited—

Mr. WELDON. There are not.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.)

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I saw dozens of unoccupied houses, for I passed along the hon. gentleman's county last year.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. You were going at the rate of thirty miles an hour.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) No, I was travelling along very quietly on the roadside, not in the train. I had not a special train, as the Ministers of the Crown have; I had to go in a private carriage. I say that in the hon. gentleman's own county of Albert, if there was a fair measure of free trade with the United States, the quarries which are now closed would be open, and the thousands of men who were once employed there would be re-employed, and the number of houses which are untenanted would be occupied by a thriving, and a prosperous, and a happy peasantry. The hon. gentleman himself (Mr. Weldon) knows it as well as any man in this House, and he is as much responsible as any man in this House, perhaps more so, for the continuation of a policy which has produced this state of things. Why, Sir, in one part of that county, I remember well, I was taken by one of the leading men there to a vantage ground to view the land, and the gentleman I refer to said: Mr. Davies, with the resources which this county possesses, and with the situation it has, if we had free trade with the States, this might be the seat of empire.

Mr. WELDON. Hear, hear.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman applauds the remark. What is it to-day?

Mr. DALY. The grandest country under God's sun.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Yes, the Minister of the Interior has praised it well. It is one of the grandest countries under the sun, blessed by God and cursed by man's folly. From that very spot where I stood the gentleman I speak of pointed out not less than seven quarries which, under the old reciprocity treaty, were in full operation, employing a population of over 3,000 people, and every one of these quarries are to-day closed up. The hon. member from Albert (Mr. Weldon) knows that.

Mr. WELDON. No, I do not know that. I know quite differently.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Very well, he does not know. Do I understand the hon. gentleman to deny that there are seven quarries there which formerly were in operation, giving employment to a population of 3,000 men, which are now closed?

Mr. WELDON. I know very differently. The hon. member would make it appear that Albert county had a population of quarrymen, including their families, greater by 2,000 than the entire population of the county in the time of the treaty.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman is technically correct, because some of the quarries that I speak of were situated on the other side of the river, which are not, strictly speaking, in Albert County. He is technically correct, but substantially and practically the statement that I made is true in every respect.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I make the statement that within the vision of the hill on which I stood there were seven quarries now closed, which during the time of the old reciprocity treaty were in full operation, giving employment to a population of 3,000 people.

Mr. WELDON. Would the hon gentleman look at the census returns, which can be found in the Library. He will see his figures are too large by the factor, four.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I am giving the statement of the hon. gentleman who told me there. The hon. member will not deny that it ought to be the seat of empire. He will not deny that many houses are closed up.

Mr. WELDON. The people have come back.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I was there about September, and the people must have come back since, because the houses were closed then. Will my hon. friend tell me how it is that the province of New Brunswick, with its great natural resources, has failed to develop the last ten years in anything like the proportion it developed during the previous ten years, either in population, or wealth, or prosperity of any kind. The hon. gentleman knows well that until the policy of the Government which he supports was adopted, there was a gradual, a steady, and a proper increase in the development and prosperity of that country. He knows that from the time this policy was introduced his province began to decline, and he is the last one who should rise in this House to-day and say one word in favour of the existing state of things in that community. What does this policy of the Government do with regard to the little island I have the honour to come from? The total exports from that province are $1,250,000, in round numbers, and of that the United States takes $668,000, and the rest of the world $567,000. I only quote these figures to show the deep and intense interest which the maritime people take in the extension of trade relations with the United States of America. I say this: That he is a bold man indeed who can put bounds to the extent to which that trade would be developed if the unnatural restrictions which have been imposed on it were once removed. We cannot trade with Ontario, and we cannot trade to any extent with Quebec, because our productions are very much the same as theirs; but there are many things besides what Great Britain takes from us, that the United States require, and that they will take from us at a profit to our people. Sir, we ask that the barriers be taken down if they can be; and I have expressed my belief that they can be taken down if anybody at the helm has a sincere desire to take them down. Having said that, I leave the case in the hands of the House. I am satisfied that freer and enlarged trade relations with Great Britain, and with the United States, would give our people new hopes and deeper faith in the future of this country, and would enlarge and extend our trade to an unprecedented degree. I have full faith in the natural resources of the country if they are allowed to develop themselves without unnatural restrictions being placed upon them. I believe that a fair, honest, honourable treaty with the United States would double the value of our lands within three years. I believe it would repatriate our country with those who have left it, but whose hearts have remained behind in the country they have left, and who desire to return if they can, and live in peace and contentment here. And I believe it would remove the shackles that you have placed on our commerce, destroy the system which enriches one class while impoverishing the mass of the people, restore prosperity and life where there is now atrophy and decay, and bring back new life and new hope to a depressed people.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Mr. Speaker, I am not one of those who, in this House or out of it, are accustomed to sneer at or belittle the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Davies, P.E.I.) I am ready to admit that he possesses ability, that he has distinguished himself in his province, and that he is a leading man in the Liberal party to-day. Therefore, I hope that I can say without offence that it is significant, on a question such as that now engaging the attention of this Chamber, that that hon. gentleman, in cold blood, and with the admission at the outset of his speech that he was forced to do it, has, for several hours indulged, not in any specific criticism, or any pointed argument, directed against the tariff now under consideration, but has indulged in the wildest and most extravagant manner, in toothless generalities. I am not surprised, Mr. Speaker. It would require a great deal more ability, and a great deal more parliamentary experience than even that hon. gentleman possesses, to take any other course or pursue any other line. If the hon. gentleman thinks that at this stage of the debate, extending as it has done already over many days, the best course to pursue is to indulge in that general criticism, instead of coming down to the hard stern facts of the business situation, surely the Government have nothing to complain of. The Government came before Parliament with a plan in detail; they came here to fulfil a pledge, and the Minister of Finance, after having discussed the general question, went into the particulars and placed before the House in detail the Government's proposal; and it must be gratifying to all friends of the Government to find, after the violent attacks that were made in previous sessions, in discussing the Budget, and after the extraordinary attacks that were made on the stump against various articles in the tariff, that the guns of these hon. gentlemen are all silenced to-day in this debate; and that, instead of discussing seriatim the proposals before the House—instead of discussing even the amendment of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright)—they are driven into a general discussion of the general question of free trade and protection.

Mr. McMULLEN. The time has not yet come for discussing the details.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentleman says the time has not yet come for discussing them. Why, Mr. Speaker, for years we have been discussing these questions; for years hon. gentlemen opposite have been telling us that the salvation of the country depended upon the correct solution of these questions; and now that the Government has brought down their policy clearly defined, taking their stand on the principle of protection in this House, as they have done outside, the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat, and the hon. gentlemen who have preceded him in this debate, have not had courage to explain this amendment to the resolutions—have not had the courage of the hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Gillmor) to say in a straightforward and manly fashion what they would do to carry it out, but have indulged in airy talk about the great benefits of the proposition which the hon. member for Charlotte alone fathers, but which no hon. member having authority on that side dare tell this House he would bring into force if the Opposition came into power to-morrow. To illustrate and give point to that remark, let me do the hon. member for Charlotte justice. In a convention in this very city, only a few months ago, when these hon. gentlemen were devising for the hundredth time some political scheme whereby they might, with success, march on Parliament Hill, the hon. member for Charlotte raised his voice in lamentation, and told all those Liberals together that while they talked free trade, he, ever since he had entered political life forty years ago, had entered preaching that doctrine alone in the wilderness, and then went on to say:

At that time no one could vote who had not some interest in real estate, and I was also in favour of free trade pure and simple. I have known a good many free traders since I entered politics, but both parties have tried how not to get it.

There are a great many free traders now. There is the revenue tariff free trader and the freer trade free trader, and the fair trade free trader. But I want nothing better than free untaxed trade, that is good enough for me.

And the hon. gentleman would confess that, notwithstanding that statement, he, with the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Fraser) stood almost alone in that convention as the advocate of a policy about which the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) has talked to us all day, while having to admit, as the hon. mover of the resolution has had to admit, that they do not propose to adopt it if they get the chance—the principles of free trade as it is practiced in the mother land, and as it can alone be practiced. But the hon. gentleman was discomfited by many things. There is no doubt—it has been said in this debate, and the truth of the statement cannot be denied—that we face a disappointed and a very unhappy party. Our friends on the opposite side of the House never calculated on such a programme as has been submitted by the Government, and their fire has been quenched; it is put out or drawn. The hon. gentlemen and their position reminds me a good deal of a little transaction which took place when a man who wanted to go out hunting bought a spotted dog, as he thought. After he started into the fields, a shower came on, and the spots were unfortunately washed out by the rain. Upon expostulating with the dealer, the dealer replied: Did you not get an umbrella? There was an umbrella went with that dog. And in this case, unfortunately for them, the spots have washed out, they have not an umbrella, and there they stand—a very unhappy political spectacle. The hon. gentleman who has taken his seat has many good qualities. But he has some that are not altogether valuable, and I hope he will not be offended if I tell him what they are. He has a lively imagination. He has shown to-day how far a lively imagination can carry a man who has many other good qualities. He has made many statements in this discussion, for which he has given no proof, for which he can give no proof. But in order that we may be put on our guard against any of the devices which that hon. gentleman knows so well how to practice, let me explain to this House the mode in which he often discusses the condition of public affairs. It has been unfortunately his custom, and that of his party, to decry this country on many occasions—to paint the worst features in the strongest colours, and to bring out some things in connection with his history, which might well be left alone.

On one occasion, wishing for some reason to disparage this country, he said in Toronto in 1889, speaking of the province of Manitoba, and comparing it with Dakota :

That although they had started with nearly equal population, Manitoba had only 195,000 people, while Dakota had 1,500,000.

Now the House may not be surprised to learn that when the census was taken in the United States it was found that the hon. gentleman was only a million astray with regard to Dakota—that there were all told 511,527 souls in the country, where he said there were no less than 1,500,000.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Is the hon. gentleman referring to a speech I made ?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Yes, to a speech the hon. gentleman made in Toronto, and reported in the 'Globe' in March, 1889. I have read his language, and will read it again, if the hon. gentleman desires, and I will read a little more :

A year ago he would have been a bold man who believed, after what he said about the fertility of the soil and the mildness of the climate of the North-west and Manitoba, that the territory to the south, Dakota, would fill up as quickly as Manitoba, yet although they had started with nearly an equal population, Manitoba had only 195,000, while Dakota had 1,500,000.

As I say, the hon. gentleman was a million astray, as shown by the United States census.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Will the hon. gentleman give his proof of the correctness of my statement ?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The census of the United States is my proof, as I have endeavoured to explain to the hon. gentleman. And I am quite sure the hon. gentleman is surprised, and now regrets that he made that statement. I do not wish to say that he made it of malice aforethought, with the intention to deceive. I say merely that his imagination then, as it did this afternoon, ran away with him.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Does the hon. gentleman state that the census returns from North and South Dakota show that I was wrong to the extent he states ? Has he got the census returns, and will he produce them ?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentleman can hardly expect me to proceed to the Library, but he can send there himself and obtain the census. I say that the census in 1890 shows that in Dakota the population was 511,527.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) North and South Dakota ?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I wish to point out, by way of introduction, another peculiarity of the hon. gentleman. He can give points to the chameleon in changing colours, and to Proteus in varying his shapes. There is this marked difference between the hon. gentleman and the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). The hon. member for South Oxford according to my experience, makes the same speech, embellished with the same facts, session after session, on the Budget. Whether he is advocating a revenue tariff, free trade, unrestricted reciprocity, or commercial union, his speech never varies. But the hon. member for Queens (Mr. Davies), while he can advocate with equal eloquence those different subjects, twists considerably, or is misled on every occasion by the facts connected with them. In that respect, he is not unlike his party. I would illustrate the position of that party, as it strikes me, having watched very carefully the course of this debate. There were two Irishmen in a hay mow, and the mow took fire. One of them dressed very hurriedly, and put his trousers on the wrong side before. As he dropped down, he was hailed by his friend with the exclamation : " Pat, are you kilt ? " And he answered, surveying the position of affairs : " Not kilt exactly, but badly twishted." And I say, in all seriousness, that the Opposition on this occasion seem to me as badly twisted as some of the facts they have advanced during the debate. I say in all seriousness, and I submit it to the judgment of the House and the country, that their amendment contains a chimerical policy. It is not a practical policy, it has not been explained in a practical way, and it is simply proposed in order that it may be used for various purposes. Men can be wheedled into its support, perhaps, who are ardent free traders, and, on the other hand, it can be used by those who say : you should impose such protection as the manufacturers, who attended the Liberal convention in this city, expressed their approval of. The hon. member for Queens (Mr. Davies) this afternoon, in reply to the speech of the hon. member for York (Mr. Maclean), said he could not tolerate members going to the people with one story and the House with another. That the hon. member considered a subject of annoyance and something which he deprecated. Now, I would ask him what he thinks of an hon. gentleman who would do what I am about to relate. In the days when that hon. gentleman waxed eloquent, when he held the undivided attention of this House—not by the strength of his arguments certainly, but by the evident enthusiasm and sincerity he exhibited—in 1888, this was the language he used :

Sir, we tender the people a flag of which we are not ashamed, a flag on which is inscribed unrestricted reciprocity with the United States. Hon. gentlemen know that this sentiment will find an echo in the heart of every man who has attained manhood's estate, and remember what reciprocity brought us in the past. It will find an echo in the heart of every young man who is to-day in despair undecided whether he will remain in this country or go abroad to help to build up a foreign nation. It will find an echo in the heart of the bread-winner who finds it hard enough to earn sufficient to pay his daily bread, much less to put by a little for a rainy day; and we throw this flag to the breeze confident that it will be carried by the united hands of the people of the several provinces of the Dominion to a glorious if not a speedy victory.

That was only in 1888, Mr. Speaker. Did you hear the hon. gentleman say anything like that to-day? When the hon. gentleman expatiated upon the condition of the Maritime Provinces, did he say that the panacea was unrestricted reciprocity with the United States? Does the hon. gentleman's leader advocate to-day unrestricted reciprocity with the United States in the sense in which he spoke of and advocated it in 1888? Their benches are silent with that question put to them. Now, I will tell the hon. gentleman how it is they sing so low on that key. In 1893 the hon. gentleman went down to those people down by the sea, these people who were to rally at the call of unrestricted reciprocity and help to carry to victory the banner with that inscription, and in their midst, and face to face with them, he confessed that he had different opinions from those he held in 1888, that thousands of voters are terrified by the possible prospects which would have followed its adoption. And again he said:

We have not introduced the phrase in our Ottawa platform.

Later on, discussing the same subject at Middleton, the hon. gentleman says:

I think myself we were unfortunate in the use of the phrase "unrestricted reciprocity."

It is not often we agree, Mr. Speaker, but we join hands to-day on that, and I am glad the hon. gentlemen have learned something, even though it has taken them from 1888 to 1893 to do it. The hon. gentleman made what I thought was a rather important admission. He was endeavouring to combat an argument of the hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean), who had said that in his farming constituency the farmers were doing well. That annoyed the hon. gentleman, for it was against the doctrine that they preach, and he endeavoured to grapple with the statement. After having got out of a few difficulties in meeting it, he made the very important admission that while it might be true that the farmers who happened to be near large centres or cities in Canada were doing well, the same did not apply to the bulk of the farming community in this country whose prices were fixed by foreign markets. He did not say they were fixed or changed by the effect of the National Policy, but fixed by foreign markets. But, more than that, his statement involved this admission—that the advocates of the National

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER.

Policy are right so far as they have contended that by the creation of industries and manufactures you enlarge and magnify these centres of population in our country, and that by so doing you help the farmers and agriculturists. There is nothing new in that. The hon. gentleman should not smile. We used that argument, and it was a good free trade argument in the days of Richard Cobden, who said that that was the way to assist and help the farmer to make the competition in the home market strong, to increase the centres of business and increase the number of them. And the hon. gentleman himself has confessed to-day that if you have a large business centre, there you will find successful and well-to-do farmers. The hon. gentleman then dropped back to the old line of telling us that he denounced protection in every form and shape, telling us the old story that it robbed one class to enrich another, and that the taxes under the protective tariff were so imposed that for every dollar that went into the treasury two went into the manufacturers' pockets. And last summer, if I read him aright, he declared war upon the cotton lords, the sugar barons and the iron kings. He was specific then. I did not hear him attack them individually to-day, but apparently he entertains the same feeling towards them collectively and adopts the term the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) applies to them, though he did not use it, that these manufacturers, these fellow-citizens of ours are nothing less than petty thieves. Let us see how the hon. gentleman stands for consistency on that point.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Does the hon. gentleman say I used that language?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. No; I say the arguments of the hon. gentleman induced me to believe that he accepted that opprobrious term. I hope he disclaims it, and would be glad to see him do it man-fashion, and I take his interruption as an indication that he does not regard it as justifiable language to be used with regard to so large a number of fellow-citizens. He was not always ready to declare war upon these kings, and lords, and merchant princes. There was a time when he thought things were going wrong, when he thought there was something rotten in the state of Denmark, and in 1885 you might see the hon. gentleman making love to and endeavouring to win over these cotton lords and sugar kings. Things were not very prosperous with them just then. What did he say? He said in effect: You poor people; you are losing your money; you put it in expecting to reap great profits, but just as I told you, you have been duped, and I extend to you my sympathy; and these are the hon. gentleman's exact words in 1885:

They told him, time and again, if you offer a premium to place capital in certain lines of business you will draw to those lines of business a larger amount than should legitimately go there, and the result will be that the first-comers who go into business will derive large profits, and when more money is invested in those lines of business than they will justify, and when the result is over-production, the profits will be dissipated. Those who went in first will perhaps make large fortunes, and those who go in afterwards will get nothing at all, and so it has been. And so it has followed here.

The hon. gentleman says we are at the second stage.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) No; you are at the third now.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentleman told us in 1885 that we had reached the second stage; surely we have not got back to the first.

We had two results,

Continues this wonderful political prophet—

Capital went into cotton mills and sugar mills, and at first they were making 10, 20, 30, 40 and 50 per cent, but now there has been over-production when more capital went in than the business would justify, more spindles have been put in the mills than they require, more cotton was produced than could be consumed, and the results are depression, stagnation, the next thing to ruin—no dividends—and to-day many who have invested their money in cotton mills, find that the fine promises made to them have not been kept, and while those who went in first got 40 per cent, to-day they cannot get five.

So again he said in the same year :

But I say all those branches of industry that the National Policy was specially framed to improve are depressed; they are growing weaker and weaker, and depression and gloom exists throughout the commercial centres of the Maritime Provinces.

If that be true, Mr. Speaker, how is it that he is able to tell us that these people have been enjoying the benefits of the policy that puts one dollar into the treasury while it puts two dollars into the pockets of the manufacturer. Then, again the hon. gentleman gave his curious ideas in reference to protection and free trade in the abstract. He spoke at one moment of the depressed business in the country to the south of us, and told us truly of the misfortunes that the United States unhappily had to contend with at the present time. And the next moment he told us that that country was our best market—that country ruined by protection, though starting originally with great advantages, from its enormous size, from its great population, from being self-sustaining—that this country now almost ruined by the system of protection was the very best market in the whole world for the people of Canada, and I suppose for the people of other countries.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I don't think the hon. gentleman is quoting me fairly. I said, for many things.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Take it even at that rate, but the hon. gentleman who sits next to him makes no bones about it, he said it is the very best market for the producers of this country. But the hon. gentleman says that Great Britain, the free trade country, as he calls it, though I am not ready to admit that Great Britain is now a free trade country in the sense of political economists—he says that this example of free trade is in a wonderfully thriving condition; and in order to prove the condition of that country, which causes both Liberal and Conservative statesmen to-day intense anxiety, what did he do. He went to Mulhall; and for what year did he look up the condition of Great Britain? We are considering the Great Britain of 1894, but he gave us statistics of Great Britain in 1886; and the hon. gentlemen themselves scorn and deride all suggestions that her foreign trade was being interfered with. Let him read a statement from the speech of any public man, Liberal or Conservative, in the mother land to-day, who will say for one moment that the hostile tariffs surrounding that country in every quarter of the globe have not been successful in forcing her out, step by step, from the position of vantage which she once held in the various markets of the world. What is the whole policy of the mother land to-day? Driven from the civilized markets of the world, steadily and every year finding their output to those markets decreasing, they spend millions on their navy, and millions on their army, to force their wares, and their goods, and their merchandise, into the uncivilized markets of the world, which they are endeavouring to occupy, to settle and to control, driven there by the deadly effect upon them of the tremendous competition coming from the protectionist nations in the rest of the world. The hon. gentleman himself laughs at the idea that Great Britain is the best market for most of our products. I would like the hon. gentleman to remember that almost in the very year concerning which he was quoting from Mulhall, Mr. Gladstone, who I suppose is a good judge upon the effect of economic policies, said that the United States was marvelously prosperous at that time, that its prosperity was advancing by leaps and bounds, and in productiveness and wealth was passing England at a canter. Then Bismarck, who, I suppose, knows something on this subject, said that so eminently successful had protection proved in the United States that the best thing Germany could do was to follow her example and adopt that legislation for the German Empire; and he based his iron policy upon the policy of the United States, and the results as shown by it.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Does the hon. gentleman approve of the statement that the success of the United States under protection has been so great that other countries should adopt the same policy?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I certainly say that from the very time that the citizens of the United States threw off their allegiance to England, if it had not been for protection, that country would present nothing like the condition it presents to-day. That country started with a handful of men, and they adopted a policy of protection; and one of the reasons for throwing off the yoke of the mother country was that they would not tolerate the mother country's policy which made them subservient to the manufacturers of Great Britain who wished them to remain a purely agricultural country. What says Lord Salisbury as to the result of fighting hostile tariffs within a free trade policy? Lord Salisbury, speaking at Manchester, in 1884, almost the time the hon. gentleman was referring to when he spoke of the independence of Great Britain and her contempt for these tariffs, said:

You know how the industry of this town is being cramped and fettered and confined by the growing wall of hostile tariffs, which shut you out from most of the markets of the world (hear, hear). I will not now discuss how far it may be possible for diplomacy to relieve you of that confinement. I fear that most of the offers, most of the advantages, which we might have offered to other nations of the world in return for more favourable tariffs, have been thrown away by the want of foresight of former legislators. I doubt if that evil can be retraced; but, at all events, you must consider this, that if you are being shut out by tariffs from the civilized markets of the world, the uncivilized markets have become more and more precious to you.

Then, the hon. gentleman will, perhaps, accept as an authority the statement of Mr. Courtney, recently Deputy Speaker of the House of Commons, and as good a free trader as any hon. gentleman in this House. Speaking in October, 1893, this is what he said as to the effect of these hostile tariffs:

It was possible that in the course of the commercial rivalry between this country and other nations it might come to pass that, just as the tin and copper industry of Cornwall had been beaten by foreign competition, so in the same way our supremacy in the production of coal might possibly have to pass away from us, and with the supremacy, not merely coal, but all those vast industries which had been piled up on top of it.

So I say that statesmen in England do not go about to-day as they did in times of old, vaunting their independence, and sneering at hostile tariffs, or boasting at wonderful progress as compared with the progress of foreign nations. But taking the hon. gentleman's premises to be correct, which I deny, taking it for granted that England is making all that progress that free traders think she should, how is it supported by the favourite argument of the Opposition in Canada? No one pretends that the agriculturists of Great Britain are prosperous to-day. No one denies that they are endeavouring almost continually to solve the problem of depression; but admitting the depreciation of the value of lands, how is it that Great Britain could be prosperous? Because those hon. gentlemen of the Opposition if they believe anything, believe that where you have agricultural depression and farmers in other than a prosperous condition, that nation cannot be prosperous, cannot be doing well. Hon. gentlemen have a curious way of illustrating the beauties of protection and free trade. Let me give a sample. When everything is all right in the United States and everything looks lovely, the leader of the Opposition and his friends descant in the most eloquent terms on the benefits of free trade. Even in this debate, for a moment they ran back to these results, and forgetting the condition of that country to-day, told us that their prosperity was marvellous, and that it was due to the fact that they had free trade amongst forty nations, that they had had free trade with almost a continent. But when things are looking black, when their desire is to point out the injury of protection in that country, they tell us that all the ruin and misery that is found there are due to this pernicious doctrine of protection. The hon. member for Queen's P.E.I., (Mr. Davies), in 1885, for instance, said:

The hon. gentleman should understand that there is free trade over a greater area of country in that great confederacy of nations than almost anywhere else in the world. From the Atlantic to the Pacific, and from the border line of Canada down to the Gulf of Mexico there is not a custom-house existing. The trade between one state and another is free and untrammelled, and were it not so that country could never have attained to the pitch of greatness which it has attained.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Hear, hear.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. He said their prosperity was due to free trade between these different nations, but in 1893 the hon. gentleman did not think so. He said the reverse of what I have just read. Speaking at Middleton, the hon. gentleman said:

How has it been with the United States? * * * What has been the result of the twenty years of experience of protection in that country? * * * The terrible exactions of the custom-house hamper trade and retard the wheels of commerce, and after a thorough discussion, the people have resolved to throw overboard a system which has rested upon them like an incubus, and return again to the principle of free trade.

Now, more marvellous still, I find the hon. gentleman cheers his sentiments as uttered in 1885, and cheers those uttered in 1893, though they are as contradictory and as wide asunder as the north Pole is from the south.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). It is a question of more or less.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The leader of the Opposition, speaking in Ottawa, testified to free trade being the reason for the policy prospering comparatively, in the United States and not in Canada. I could give the House, though I will not, the same contradiction of statements made by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). This simply amounts, so far as these statements and speeches prove anything, to this, that hon. gentleman opposite, when it suits their purpose, show that all the ills from which the United States citizens suffer, are due entirely to protection, and all their prosperity and wonderful progress are due to free trade. Then, the hon. gentleman told the House that protection is dying in the United States. Why should he have worked himself into a state of excitement with the hon. member for Kent (Mr. McInerney). If protection is dying, why did the hon. gentleman not give us some hope for the future here? If protection is dying, we will not have to fight their duties, for their duties will be removed; there will be no hostile tariff. But the hon. gentleman knows that protection is as lively a factor in the United States political arena to-day as it ever was in the history of the world. Hon. gentlemen opposite laugh. I refer them to the report of the majority on the Wilson Bill, and I say that every argument in regard to changes advocated by that so-called Free Trade party in the United States, and every justification put forward by them is this, and I can prove here and now, if my statement is doubted, that those industries—take coal, for instance, or glassware—which are left with a large protection, can afford a cut, because the manufacturers are to-day exporting so largely those wares to other countries and there meeting similar goods in open competition. The argument all through the report is the argument of moderate protectionists; and he would be a bold man, looking at what is taking place either in the House of Representatives or in the Senate, if he declared that free trade principles had a foothold there. Name the man who talked as does the hon. gentleman for Charlotte (Mr. Gillmor), or used arguments such as have been advanced by the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies).

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Mr. Voorhees and Mr. Wilson.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Let me give the hon. member for Queen's Mr. Wilson's language. Take the language in which Mr. Wilson submitted the report. It is not a justification for free trade duties. No man would be so ridiculous in this House, or outside of it, as to pretend that the duties in the Wilson Bill are free trade duties; that they are levied solely for the object of revenue. In fact, the revenue is entirely lost sight of; the duties remain on iron, and, speaking of iron and coal, coal being put on the free list originally, but is now back on the dutiable list, this is the language used by that gentleman:

Iron and coal are the basis of modern industry, abundance and cheapness of their supply offer in many lines of production the manufacturing supremacy of the world. While the mines of other countries are becoming exhausted and the cost of mining in consequence is increasing, we are constantly discovering and developing new sources of supply. The discovery of the immense beds of Bessemer ore in the lakes region and of foundry ores in several of the Southern States, their convenience for transportation and for the assemblage of material, the use of the steam-shovel in mining all these have so cheapened the cost of producing pig iron and steel as to take away all possibility and danger of foreign competition in almost every part of the country.

Free trade courts foreign competition; but this free trade policy, according to this gentleman, sets forth that they are only ready to remove these duties when the development of these industries, under a rigid system of protection, has been such as to enable them to meet successfully all foreign competition.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Some hon. gentlemen opposite say, no. I ask any one of them, if he would say for a moment that by striking out the iron or coal duties in our tariff either industry would be able to meet successfully competition in Canada to-day?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I merely say you are not properly construing his language.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentleman evades my question, and, when he criticises, he should be ready to answer a pointed question of that kind.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman started to make a quotation. He has made the quotation, and it does not bear out what he promised it would bear out.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentleman does not meet my question, but I am satisfied with his refusal. In speaking of coal, Mr. Wilson said:

This coal area is over three times larger than that of the rest of the world combined. The existing duty of 75 cents a ton on iron ore and on bituminous coal cannot be justified either as a protective or a revenue duty. The importations into this country are too small to add materially to our revenue, while no one contends that the cost of mining is higher in the United States, than in other countries that might seek our markets; and we have a growing export trade for coal and coke.

In addition to these so-called raw materials we have released from tariff duty certain important articles and manufactures which we have shown our capacity to produce more cheaply than any other country, such as pig copper and the important agricultural implements.

This is the argument presented: There is no danger to your manufacturing industries; you have reached the stage when you can produce more cheaply than your foreign competitors. These are reasons, if the conditions existed, that would influence us, wedded as we are to the principle of protection. Let us take another article :

In the earthenware schedule we have made substantial reductions, still leaving rates as high as were deemed necessary in the war tariff. In common window glass, where close combinations have kept the prices to consumers under a scale of duties averaging more than 100 per cent we have made a reduction of about one-half.

I might quote further, but I hesitate to weary the House. I contend that I have supported the proposition that I made. I have shown hon. gentlemen opposite, that in the tariff reform of the Democratic party of the United States, the interest and revolutionary spirit which lives in the members on the Opposition benches, finds no place. They are resolved to guard the interests of the manufacturer. They are, to the best of their ability and in express terms, working in the interests of the manufacturers of the United States, and are not abusing and villifying them. Take, for instance, President Cleveland, who is, surely, a good Democratic authority and is the champion of the Democratic party. These are his ideas, as contrasted with those enunciated by hon. gentlemen opposite. In his message to Congress in 1887 he said :

It is not proposed to entirely relieve the country of this taxation. It must be extensively continued as the source of the Government's income ; and in a readjustment of our tariff the interests of American labour engaged in manufacture should be carefully considered, as well as the preservation of our manufacturers. It may be called protection, or by any other name, but relief from the hardships and dangers of our present tariff should be devised with especial precaution against imperilling the existence of our manufacturing interests. But this existence should not mean a condition which, without regard to the public welfare or a national exigency, must always insure the realization of immense profits instead of moderately profitable profits.

He used no such language as is used by hon. members opposite, in the Maritime Provinces—Down with the cotton lords, the sugar kings and the iron princes ; cut off at once the duties under which those industries have grown and developed, under which policy they have grown in a marked and satisfactory manner. But the hon. member for Queen's told the House, after stating what protection was doing in the United States, that the Democratic party were getting as near free trade as they could. Well, now, he is in love with the movement in the Democratic party. He says they are going in the direction of free trade. The Minister of Finance proved that we have gone a great deal further, if you like to call it, in the direction of free trade—whether our conditions were such or not that is a matter for discussion—than the Democratic party have gone. The hon. gentleman, however, has no praise for us. We have gone further in the direction of the hon. gentleman's desire than have the Democratic party, but he has good words for them and nothing but bad, and, at times, violent language for us. He deplores what protection has done in the United States ; he says it swept their flag from the sea, and he speaks of the commerce of England. I will be able to establish that England has kept her flag on the seas by enormous subsidies, subsidies amounting at one time to £3,000,000 sterling a year. That was good sound protectionist doctrine and it is a doctrine that this Government proposes to adopt and to follow. The United States have not, and did not pursue this policy, but they are now, I believe, proposing to adopt it to some extent. The hon. member talks of the registered tonnage of the United States marine, but he does not tell the whole story about that. Let the hon. gentleman beside him (Mr. Charlton) tell him, for my time is short, what their inland marine amounts to, and what the traffic passing through the Sault is ; and compare it with the commerce of London and Liverpool or the Suez Canal, and the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) will learn something that he never knew before ; that is if he believed in what he told us of the comparative condition, at the present time, of the marine of England and the United States. The hon. gentleman then spoke of the decline in shipping. He knows that the National Policy had nothing to do with the decline in the ship-building industry ; he knows that as shown by the clearances in our ports of entry, inwards and outwards, our commerce has grown in a marvellous degree in every port of Canada. The hon. gentleman did not give us these figures, but they are well known, and I need not weary the House with them. I want to expose the hon. gentleman's disingenuousness, for it was nothing else, in endeavouring to draw an argument from the comparative condition of the ship-building industry. He says that the general policy of this country is responsible for the decline.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I will not allow the hon. gentleman to misrepresent me in that way. I said that it contributed to it.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Very well, the hon. gentleman says it contributed to it, and I will take it at that.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman will pardon me. I said distinctly and very clearly that I would not hold, and that no sane man would hold the National Policy responsible for the extraordinary decline in shipping ; but I said that it had contributed to it.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I accept the explanation of the hon. gentleman, but let me take him back to 1885.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Oh.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I am not astonished at the hon. gentleman being fatigued by this, but if he will allow me I will take him as gently back to 1885 as I can, and hurry down to the year 1893 again.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I hope the quotations will be more apt than the previous ones.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I hope so, too. Here is one of these quotations from the speech of the hon. gentleman :

Now it must be remembered that this industry was in the main an industry of the Maritime Provinces, an investment for the money of the people of these Provinces. The National Policy asked them to do--what? It asked them to withdraw their money from the shipping and invest it in the cotton interest, and in the sugar interest. They did so, and to-day they find themselves deceived. Instead of earning the profits they once did in their shipping, to-day they see their cotton mills are idle, their sugar refineries are idle and their money invested is making no return.

And in 1893, at the beginning of the year, the hon. gentleman took up the registered shipping and, according to his statement, he showed how it had decreased, and :

According to the figures from which the Marine Department make up the value of this shipping, gave an increase in value of $7,778,000. The National Policy came in, and this shipping stands to-day at 964,149 tons, a decrease since 1878 of 363,866 tons ; in value $11,000,000. That is a nice showing for the Maritime Provinces ; the registered shipping of the Dominion has decreased during that period over $11,000,000, three quarters of that loss belonging to the Maritime Provinces, as any one can see who looks at the figures.

It is clear, it is beyond dispute or cavil, that the hon. gentleman, in making these statements, wished to hold the National Policy responsible for it.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Oh.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I accept his disclaimer even now.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) It is no disclaimer.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I accept his disclaimer, but it is at the risk of taking away a great deal of credit from his common sense.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I stated a fact there.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I will accept his explanation as to what he stated.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) There is no explanation about it.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I will accept the hon. gentleman's statement made now, that the National Policy is, in part, responsible for the decline of the ship-building industry, and I say that no ship-builder who values his reputation, and that no person who knows anything about the industry in the Maritime Provinces, will corroborate his statement to that effect.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Does the hon. gentleman deny the accuracy of the statement I made in the quotation which he read ?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I am going to show that the hon. gentleman proved that his statements and arguments were fallacious. Listen to this language of the hon. gentleman, because it makes the point I endeavoured to make. At Middleton, in 1893, speaking to people who build ships, speaking to people who sailed them, when they were built, speaking in the province of Nova Scotia, speaking only a few months after his statement in the House of Commons, when referring to the National Policy, the hon. gentleman said :

You will be told and correctly told I have no doubt that the National Policy is not responsible for the shrinkage in the ship-building industry.

I give that to the hon. gentleman in answer to the statement which he made to-day, because I believe that statement to be correct. I do not believe the statement which he has now made to be correct, and I believe the hon. gentleman himself, in his calmer moments will see that his statement of 1893 is to be relied upon.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) What statement does the hon. gentleman say I made to-day ?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The statement that the National Policy was responsible, in part, for the decline in that business. Then the hon. gentleman slipped into another part of his story, and he discussed glibly of $800,000,000 of debts, federal, local, municipal and so on, and he rolled these $800,000,000 off and he told us that because we were rolling up these debts in the cities and the provinces and in Canada generally, something disastrous would happen. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, to remark this : He said there was what he called temporary prosperity, although we bought it at a large figure. We had prosperity, ephemeral in the Maritime Provinces, he told us, "ephemeral" was his word. Let us weigh that argument and that statement. The largest part of the hon. gentleman's speech was devoted to prove that in the Maritime Provinces our wharfs were deserted, our ship-building gone, our business depressed, and that stagnation existed generally. He says that all that was brought about by the National Policy. Year in and year out he has told us in this House, and he has told the country, that the people were ground down under the effect of the National Policy, but to-night he wishes to make the people believe that the Government have decided upon so foolish a policy as to have nothing more to do with public works ; that they have decided to be "flies on the wheel," as his own friends were from 1874 to 1878. He told us that ruin and devastation lies in our path because this ephemeral prosperity will pass away when our expenditure stops. Then, if prosperity does exist now, what becomes of his figures and of his arguments that prosperity is purely imaginary, and that the reverse of the fact is the case. The hon. gentleman, with what object I know not, announced to-night that, as the Government had made a large reduction in the tariff there could be no more public works. Now the hon. gentleman cannot be serious. The hon. gentleman should not use that argument, for the credit of his own side and his own policy. Surely, he does not admit that their proposal—which is to reduce this tariff radically and all along the line, to cut and carve and slice, regardless of the industries of the country—is going to bring about such a state of affairs. That is our case. We say, if you bring the people face to face with direct taxation, or with any other system than the one that now obtains, not only will deficit after deficit stare you in the face, but the prospects of this country will be wholly ruined! We are to stop building public works! The hon. gentleman knows that we are committed already to the largest and most splendid scheme ever put before the people of this continent. He knows, whether he gives us credit for it or not, that we have excited the admiration of the motherland for our pluck and our success in our ventures. He knows that the keen moneyed men in the United States, the representative of the people in Congress, are not only disturbed, but even annoyed, at what they call our audacity in our public policy, challenging, as it does, that commercial empire which they think their own on this continent, tapping, as it does, the trade of the Orient, which they wish kept solely and exclusively for themselves. He knows that we are pledged to that policy, and that, come what will, we propose to carry out those public works in which we are now engaged, and at the proper time to grapple with the rest, so as to bring all our schemes and plans to a successful and happy conclusion. The hon. gentleman told us of the enormous deposits in the savings banks of Maine; he compared them, if I remember aright, with the deposits in the banks of the Maritime Provinces. The hon. gentleman will correct me, if I am in error in the comparison. I ask him why he did not point out, that in the case of the savings banks in Canada, he referred to a Government bank that was not doing ordinary commercial business, and that in the case of the savings banks in the state of Maine, he referred to a commercial enterprise which dealt in stocks, bonds, and other investments. It only needs a reference of that kind to show that the hon. gentleman notwithstanding the leading position he holds in this House, should weigh more carefully the facts on which he wishes to build an argument. Take, for instance, that statement about the quarrymen. As I understood him, he stated that there were 3,000 quarrymen in the county of Albert, N.B., in the time of the reciprocity treaty.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) No, the hon. gentleman did not understand me. I said, that, standing on the vantage ground I had in Albert county, I was pointed out seven quarries, in which there had been employed 3,000 men. The hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon) corrected me, saying that the statement was ridiculous, and I said that, technically, I believed he was right, for several of those quarries were on the other side of the bay. They may not all have been in Albert county. I said that, speaking from the vantage ground I had, standing in Albert county, I was pointed them out.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentleman thought that there was only a river between his statement and the facts. But I want the hon. gentleman to remember this, in case of future reference to the subject. His statement was, that, from where he stood, on some vantage ground in Albert county, there were 3,000 men employed in those quarries in the time of the reciprocity treaty; but the census of 1861 shows that there were, all told, 96 quarrymen, instead of 3,000.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Does the hon. gentleman mean to say, as he is coming down to a question of veracity, that, in the seven quarries to which I refer, there were only 96 men employed?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentleman must not suppose that I accuse him of untruthfulness or of knowing better. I accuse him of carelessness. I said that he had made a statement for the purpose of debate and argument. I would scorn to impute to the hon. gentleman, nor have I done so to-night, a desire to mislead. I said that the hon. gentleman's imagination ran away with him in debate—I do not say it offensively—because I cannot accept the statement on which he built up his argument; and, if I am wrong, it can be shown in the proper way.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman ought to know that he is wrong. I spoke of seven quarries in sight where I was standing, some of which were in Albert county and some were not, the channel of a river dividing them.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentleman said that there were seven quarries, employing 3,000 men, and I find that there were only 96 men employed in all the quarries in Albert county.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell.) He has not said that.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Then I accept the hon. gentleman's correction of what he said. The hon. gentleman next spoke of the exodus. Now, as the hon. gentleman is head-over-ears in love with reciprocity. I want him to remember, when he deals with that problem, that it is not one that began in recent years, or even between the years 1874 and 1878. Hard as it may be to remember, and inconsistent as it may be with those bright pictures which he likes to draw of the old days of reciprocity, the truth is that the exodus began between the years 1860 and 1870; and my authority for that statement is the hon. gentleman's neighbour, the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). That hon. gentleman, in 1880, said that the exodus began to assume alarming proportions between 1860 and 1870. The same hon. gentleman is also reported to have said, in 1880, that the period of reciprocity between 1858 and 1865 was one of inflation in Canada, and of extraordinary deficits. I give that to the hon. gentleman to show him that he must not come to the sudden conclusion that everything will be secured by a renewal of that condition. I do not oppose the idea of a fair reciprocity; I never have done so. But I say, that, to my humble mind, the word sounds more ridiculous in the mouth of a free trader than it does in that of a protectionist, and I will tell you why. You cannot make a reciprocity treaty with a free trade policy, for you have nothing to deal with. England cannot make a reciprocity treaty. Liberals denounce reciprocity in every shape and form, by tariff or by treaty, as the most insidious form of the doctrine of protection. I could give the hon. gentleman good and unquestionable authorities to support that statement. But, by looking after our own interests by means of a tariff, by arranging for their protection and their prosperity for all time, we are able to make a bargain when it appears profitable to us, by mutual concessions of give and take. But adopt this amendment, and it means anything. It means sweeping down those protective duties; and then what have you to offer in return for any concession from the other side of the line, if you go to treat with them? Then the hon. gentleman referred to the negotiations in Washington, but he spoke hurriedly, and I do not pretend that I have grasped exactly what he wished to make on that point. The subject hardly concerns a discussion of the tariff at the present time. But if the hon. gentleman wished to repeat the argument that, I believe, he used before, that the Executive Government of the United States were ready to make such a treaty as hon. gentlemen opposite would have made, and that the statement and report of the Finance Minister and his colleagues were incorrect, I wish to give him what President Harrison said as to the reason why the negotiations broke off on that occasion, and the reason why Canada would have nothing of such an arrangement as was possible. President Harrison, in his message of the 3rd December, 1892, said:

The statement was officially made that favoured rates could not be given to the United States as against the mother country. This admission, which was foreseen, necessarily terminated the conference on this question.

Would the hon. gentleman have been prepared to give favoured rates against the mother country? I gather not, from the statement made by the hon. gentleman tonight, though on many other occasions I can show that they were prepared to discriminate absolutely against the mother country, and discriminate very largely. Now, the hon. gentleman referred to the subject of commercial union. I do not think that the hon. gentleman's explanation was satisfactory. He referred to statements made by him when he was charged with advocating a policy of commercial union, when he sneered, for instance, at unrestricted reciprocity, or was said to have done so.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) No.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentleman denies it, but I am only wishing to get the facts before the House. I am subject to his correction, where I have been misinformed, because I was not an eye-witness, but I am speaking from pretty good authority. For instance, he was reported in the 'Weekly Examiner,' of Charlottetown, a Conservative paper, I believe, and not friendly to him. The hon. gentleman is very fully reported; he will not deny the report, and according to this report he denounced unrestricted reciprocity in these words:

The important consequence would be that imports to the United States, instead of being carried to the great ports of the United States, would be taken to the States by way of Montreal. To this, the States, whose people are not arrant fools, would never consent, and unrestricted reciprocity, although it would suit as well as commercial union, was therefore impracticable. In discussing commercial union we should, he thought, regard it from both the Canadian and the provincial points of view, in a broad and generous spirit.

And he is reported to have gone on to give reasons for that view:

Unrestricted reciprocity would differ from commercial union in this respect, that while under it there would be perfect free trade between the two countries, each country would retain the right to form its own tariff as against the rest of the world.

Now, I want to add this to the explanations that have been given touching this meeting. A friend and political ally of the hon. gentleman, Mr. Donald Farquharson, a member of the Provincial Legislature, had moved this resolution:

Resolved, that in the interests of the people of Canada, and more particularly of this Island, this board regards the proposal of commercial union, or unrestricted trade between Canada and the United States, as of the greatest importance, and demands our hearty sympathy and co-operation.

The hon. gentleman did not read that resolution moved by a political ally of his own, but he read the amendment which was finally adopted. He neglected to tell us that three weeks intervened.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I did not neglect to tell you; I said some time intervened between the inception of the debate and the close.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Three weeks intervened between that resolution and the amendment, which was the result of a compromise between the hon. gentleman and others who work in unison with my political friends in that Island. On the day after this report, which he now questions, was published, I am informed—but will accept the hon. gentleman's denial, if he makes it—that he congratulated the editor of the 'Examiner' upon the fairness of that report.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I do not remember speaking to him at all, nor do I think the House desires me to repeat the explanation I have given. I would venture to say that the hon. gentleman is hardly exhibiting, I will not say his usual fairness, but common fairness, in making an excerpt from that speech of mine which was quoted the other day, which I fully explained to-day. I explained thoroughly about that, and the hon. gentleman, while quoting the resolution which was moved by another gentleman, in which the words "commercial union" are mentioned, fails to quote the resolution which I myself moved, and which was carried unanimously, and which was substituted for the one he read.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentleman charges me with unfairness. I do not object to the interruption, because what he has said to-day and what I am saying, will be matters of record to those who care to examine into the subject, and I think they will fail to see anything like so narrow a spirit as that. I am basing all my remarks upon the reported utterances of hon. gentlemen opposite. I accept his denial, but, when he denies it, I wish to add the facts.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I did not deny anything. I said you did not quote the resolution.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Now, when the Minister of Finance, on a previous occasion, referred to that subject, surely there can be nothing unfair in referring the hon. gentleman to that explanation. He stated:

Now I did not make use of such language as is here reported. I used that language with a very strongly pronounced and distinct qualification, which was clearly understood when I stated it. The board of trade were discussing several proposals for obtaining free trade relations with the United States. Some were in favour of commercial union, and some in favour of the scheme known as unrestricted reciprocity. A portion expressed their desire to have the freest trade relations between Canada and the United States that could be obtained, similar to the freedom of trade which existed between state and state, so that there should be no custom-houses on the border, and that not only the United States goods should be passed free, but that all goods whether they were manufactured in Canada or the United States or abroad, should be passed free. These same people wished also to retain, if possible, in the hands of Canada the right to maintain our tariff and to regulate it as we pleased. In answer to that I told them that such a scheme of unrestricted reciprocity was impracticable and impossible, that if Canada retains a tariff of 25 per cent and the United States a tariff of 35 per cent, and you have no custom-houses between the two countries, the whole of the importations will naturally come into that part of the country which has the least tariff, and that the country to the south of us which has the higher tariff would not be such arrant fools as to assent to any such arrangements.

Mr. DAVIES. Hear, hear.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentleman says now, "Hear, hear." That was the policy that he afterwards advocated in this House and asked the people of Canada to endorse. That is the policy they sent to the country during the last election, and the policy that was denounced in 1891 by the people at the polls. I think the leader of the Opposition would admit that he himself took the position that, in reference to unrestricted reciprocity, a uniformity between the two countries would not be found necessary. But on that question the hon. gentleman was reported on another occasion during that same year by a paper published on the Island, as having spoken at a Liberal picnic at Cape Traverse.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) What is that report?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. In the 'Weekly Examiner.' It says:

Mr. Davies came fully up to expectation on the question of commercial union. Without hesitating a moment as to whether a uniform tariff discriminating in favour of a foreign country and against our mother country would be right, without stopping for a moment to inquire whether the mother country would be likely to consent to such a tariff, without asking whether or not the people of the United States are willing to let Canadians share in the benefits of their protective policy, Mr. Davies declares that he is in favour of commercial union. The difficulty of making fair terms with a wealthy and powerful rival does not stay him. He is for commercial union and against unrestricted reciprocity. The States must "come in" because Mr. Davies thinks it unreasonable that they should not do so.

The editor may be wrong; the hon. gentleman says now that he was not fairly reported; but that was the way in which his arguments were understood at that time. I will only call one other witness to show that there was some reason for the hon. gentleman being so understood. He was at that time working in harmony with the hon. gentleman who sits next to him, and the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright).

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) If the hon. gentleman will allow me—this does not profess to be a report of my speech, and I may say that is a perfect travesty of what I said on that occasion.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentleman puts that on record. But what does his leader say? He is reported in the Toronto 'Mail' on the 15th of October as having spoken in Ingersoll, and according to the report this is what he said:

I am as adverse as any man can be to annexation or to resign our political independence, but I cannot shut my eyes to the facts. We have greatly misused our advantages. We have been most foolish and most wasteful in our expenditures.

No one would deny the accuracy of that report.

We have no means of satisfying the just demands of large portions of the Dominion except through such an arrangement as Commercial Union.

In 1887 the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) was reported to be in favour of commercial union, and the hon. member for Queens (Mr. Davies, P.E.I.) was reported to have spoken in favour of commercial union. That statement cannot be denied.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I do not think the hon. gentleman will say I am reported as having said so.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Yes, in the Charlottetown 'Examiner.'

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) No; the editor professes to give his own impressions of what took place at the pic-nic, but he gives no report of my speech and does not pretend to.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I can only say that the report is very long, and if the hon. gentleman wishes me to read it I shall do so; otherwise not. The hon. gentleman, however, ventured to criticise two items of the tariff. After having, as I said before, pointed out that there were many grievous burdens imposed upon the people, the hon. gentleman in his long speech referred to only two duties—that on kerosene oil and that on fertilizers. The duty on kerosene oil was one which he denounced most strongly, and he expressed surprise that his Maritime colleagues, both those acting with him and those opposed, would not agree. The hon. gentleman must know that that was a pet industry and has been a pet industry of two political parties in this country. The hon. gentleman must know that, in the good old days between 1874 and 1878, that industry enjoyed a higher protection than it has ever enjoyed since. In 1877, when the Finance Minister of that day, in the face of the fact that oil was selling at a far higher price than now, in the face of the outcry against this burden, came down to this House to propose a change, he removed the excise duty which was a burden on the industry and gave them a large protection, I think a protection of 6 cents per wine gallon. And what happened besides? In order that that industry should be allowed to live, the hon. member for South Oxford, as Finance Minister of that day, said that that protection must be left to it, and, in sweeping away the excise duty in order to let the industry live, it was necessary for him to put a tax on tea and coffee. He levied this tax, and these hon. gentlemen who tell us that protection is robbery, that protection is a sham and a fraud, these hon. gentlemen who call those interested in the industries of the country thieves and robbers, talked in this way in 1877, and gave this reason for taxing tea and coffee and for leaving the protection on almost the only article the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davies, P.E.I.) referred to in the speech I have just quoted. This is what the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), as Finance Minister, said on this subject in 1877:

The Government have carefully considered the whole question with a desire to reduce the burden of the people as much as they can and yet not utterly to wipe out of existence a Canadian industry which has grown up under protection of the law enacted by hon. gentlemen opposite.

If the hon. gentleman and his friends were unwilling to wipe out that industry how can he, while arousing sectional prejudice on the part of the Maritime Provinces against that western industry, ask us to wipe it out? Then the hon. gentleman endeavoured again to make love to the manufacturers. Having abused them at the start he changed his tactics, and, in reference to fertilizers, pointed out that the Maritime Province manufacture of this article was handicapped because the sulphuric acid was protected for the benefit of a western industry. Now, the hon. gentleman knows this: that the Maritime Provinces and the western provinces are being continually pitted against one another in that way. We have had religious cries and commercial cries, and all sorts of cries, to tear asunder the provinces, but the Government of this country, the Liberal-Conservative party has lived down these cries, has breasted every storm and has come out triumphant and successful. The National Policy is a policy of compromises. The hon. gentlemen are willing to compromise with the United States—why, in Heaven's name, are not they willing that the different provinces should compromise one with another? The hon. gentleman having again referred to reciprocity with the United States, dilated at considerable length upon the benefits of that policy. That is a subject of considerable interest, which has been discussed at great length on many occasions in this House, but I would simply like to point out this: that when the hon. gentleman takes that extreme position in reference to the benefits of reciprocity with the United States, and Canada's dependence upon them, and refers to the old reciprocity treaty, he makes ridiculous a large part of the record of the Reform party. When the Reformers were in power questions relating to the renewal of the reciprocity negotiations were put and answers were summarily given by the Prime Minister of the day that he had gone to Washington, or had sent representatives to Washington, where they were not treated very well, where there views were not entertained, that he thought that about enough to do, and told them plainly that he was not going to send to Washington again. The whole of the Canadian confederation was built upon the idea which the hon. gentleman now attacks. Confederation was built upon this idea—and I believe the idea is correct now—that beneficial as trade in certain articles with the United States would be, when that country adopted a hostile commercial policy to the British American provinces (for what reason it is not necessary now to inquire) the only thing for British subjects to do who wished to keep British institutions on this continent and maintain their independence, national and commercial, from the United States, was to band themselves together in commerce and in their institutions and their laws. And among the men who advocated that course were the late Mr. Mackenzie, the late George Brown and our own revered and respected chieftain. These men did not say that the game was up when we were treated unkindly by the United States. Those men did not say that the game was up, nor that we were shut out and ruined by the United States; those men said that valuable as that trade was, there was even a more valuable trade within our grasp if we would only quit ourselves like men and fight for it. In 1874, when George Brown went to negotiate a renewal of that treaty with our neighbours, he used no such talk as we hear now from the Opposition benches. I hold in my hand a report where he proved as conclusively as trade statistics can prove, that we had done better after the abrogation of reciprocity than we had done during that period. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) looks up with surprise, but he will find that the late George Brown appreciated as fully as any man the benefits of trade with the United States. He also proved, what has been repeated time and again on these benches, that a large portion of the statistics of trade between the United States and Canada are misleading so far as they are used by our friends opposite now, that they do not represent the trade we have with the Americans, but they represent the trade we put into the middle men's hands in the United States, a trade that seeks a common market. Take, for instance, articles about which we hear a good deal, which hon. gentlemen refers to when they are addressing the farmers; take, for instance, lumber. He said that they required our lumber, and that they must pay the taxes which they impose upon our lumber, and we find now, though the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies, P.E.I.) did not admit it to-night, that there are prospects of lumber going free into the United States, and all these terrible burdens to which he has referred, will be removed. This is what Mr. Brown stated in his report respecting this traffic:

And so it is with fish, barley, pease, wool, hides, sheep, horses and other articles of Canadian production which cannot easily be got elsewhere. The demand from the United States is good and constant, notwithstanding the custom-house barriers, and the prices keep steadily up. But in regard to wheat, flour, provisions and other articles of which the United States have a surplus as well as Canada, the effect of the duties upon them has been to send through Canadian channels direct to the Maritime Provinces, the West India Islands and Great Britain, a vast amount of products that were formerly sold to New York and Boston houses, and shipped to these same markets through American channels. Where two countries alongside of each other have each a large annual surplus of the same article, and that article is in world-wide demand, heavy duties against each other can hardly be effective. The stuff will find its way to market by some route or other.

On that text he wrote, and supported his position by a large amount of statistics. I say that is the position we assume. We do not despair when duties are levied on the other side of the line. Our neighbours did the worst they could do to us, and we have lived through it, lived to boast, lived to rejoice, lived as an astonishing and an astounding example among the nations of the world, as to the victorious manner in which we weathered the storm. I have endeavoured to follow as closely as I could the remarks of the hon. gentleman. I have not gone into several questions which I would like to have touched, because it has already taken considerable time to deal with some of the statements made by the hon. gentleman. But he did refer to a subject that I cannot pass over. He referred to the Maritime Provinces, and he seemed to challenge, not by way of proof but by reiterated statements, any man from the Maritime Provinces to stand up here in Parliament and pretend that we had anything to congratulate ourselves upon from a business standpoint. The hon. gentleman did not take the statistics of Canada as a whole, but he parcelled off the Dominion and gave us a maritime view, so to speak. I do not appreciate that style of discussing a budget of Canada; I do not think it is well to divide up the provinces in that way, if only for the reason that that tends to lengthen the debate and to bring in side issues; but I would be perfectly prepared to join issue with the hon. gentleman on that question, if he puts it before us. If there is a part of Canada where the people have reason to rejoice it is the Maritime Provinces. I have seen something of the Maritime Provinces between 1874 and 1878, and since, and I know something of the condition of business, and what business men tell me. You will find that travellers from all the large houses unite in saying that credit is better in the Maritime Provinces than almost in any other part of Canada, because there is less distrust there than in any other portion of this country. The hon. gentleman cannot make good his position. He travelled in company with Mr. Jones, formerly a member of the Liberal Government, and Mr. Jones did not say, during that trip in 1893, that the people of Nova Scotia had anything to regret; on the contrary, at Weymouth the hon. gentleman thanked Providence for a bountiful harvest, and for the general improvement and activity which had marked commercial enterprises the world over.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Oh, oh.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentleman laughs, but does he suppose the people of the Maritime Provinces believe him when he says that there is general commercial stagnation and atrophy? The hon. gentleman referred to this subject in the gloomiest way. May I venture to give the House an illustration of that trouble that sits upon the hon. gentleman's political mind? He has never seen anything good in the Maritime Provinces in the way of trade, so far as I am able to discover, since 1882, when he first came into the House of Commons; but he sees this atrophy, he sees commercial stagnation, he sees all sorts of bewildering things that no others, either friends or foes, can see. Now, Mr. Blaine, who has had several conversations, I believe, with the hon. gentleman on political subjects, had a conversation with a friend some time before he died concerning this kind of statesmen. He said they reminded him very much of an incident that occurred on a ferry boat in the New York harbour. A passenger had entered the ferry boat, carrying an extraordinary looking basket, and the owner of the basket seemed very anxious in reference to its safety. Finally a curious man came to him and said, "What have you got in that basket? Anything dangerous?" "Well," said the owner of the basket, "I have a kalamazoo." "Well, what is a kalamazoo? Is it dangerous?" "Oh, very dangerous; if it got out it would destroy every one on this boat in a minute—an exceedingly dangerous animal." "Well, what do you feed it on?" "Live snakes," was the reply. "Well, where do you get them?" "I have a brother who is addicted to delirium tremens, and whenever he sees snakes I catch them and feed the kalamazoo with them." "But," said the astonished party, "those snakes are all imaginary." "Well," replied the other, "so is my kalamazoo," and so are the views of the hon. gentleman. I will quote a few statistics. Take the exports of manufacturers of wood. In 1878 Nova Scotia exported $868,000 worth, against 1,500,000 in 1892, using round figures in both cases. The exports of home manufactures were $533,000 against $882,000 in 1892. The imports of raw cotton were 5,000 pounds in 1878, against 3,500,000 pounds in 1892. The exports of the products of the mine were $470,000 in the first year, against $618,000 in 1892. The exports of the products of the farm were $608,000, against $1,700,000. I could go on and give statistics to the House, but that is not necessary in view of the arguments used. I can show that the province of Nova Scotia is undoubtedly as prosperous as the other provinces. I hold in my hand, also a very interesting account, given in a Scotch paper of a visit of delegates from the rural districts of that country to various places in Nova Scotia, and it goes to show that wages are higher than at home, in that lovely free trade country to which the hon. gentleman so often refers, and that the comforts and necessaries of life are almost as cheap, and in some places are even cheaper and better than in Scotland itself. Take, for instance, testimonies of an undoubted kind and of a general description in regard to the results of protection. I will not weary the House by reading them; but take the directors' reports of the various banks and they show a most gratifying condition, especially in regard to the manner in which the farmers were able to meet their commercial paper and their engagements. Take the utterances of public men who do not agree with us on the trade question, when they go abroad, where they seem to imbibe a spirit of fairness. Take, for instance, the speech delivered by Mr. Ross, Minister of Education in Ontario, delivered a short time ago in London, in which he referred with great pride to the prosperity of the British colonies. Take various gentlemen who are connected with the local Governments. We have heard their utterances, not only in Parliament, but when they have gone to the money markets of London, in which they have given glowing descriptions of the condition of this country after years of the protective policy. Take the handsome tribute paid by our late Governor General in Liverpool the other day. I will not read it at length, but it was most gratifying, for that gentleman held an impartial position in our midst, and he was glad on his return, when speaking on 22nd March of the present year, to refer with pride to the condition in which he found Canada, and in which he left it. One reference alone I venture to give. Lord Derby said:

With regard to agricultural produce, he almost hesitated to form an opinion as to the competition the home farmers would have to contend with in the future. This great industry only required development. The Government, like most colonial governments, had encouraged this industry, and he believed before many years Canada would develop in a manner possibly not equal. Numer.

ically the United States was ahead, but in all that concern the essential well-being Canada would increase equally and rapidly, and will certainly be filled by a finer and hardier people. He thought these particulars would be of interest.

They are certainly of interest to the many friends Lord Derby left behind him. But take a test of prosperity suggested by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills). This was the test he applied. In 1876 he said :

If you want to find a country's prosperity, look at its importations. If we imported largely and our importations were paid for, it was an indication of marked prosperity.

That was uttered in 1876, and I suppose the hon. gentleman holds the same opinion now. Let me give the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) this test. In 1878 we imported goods to the value of $93,000,000 ; in 1893 to the value of $129,000,000, an increase of $36,000,000. The hon. gentleman knows that the character of these imports is an extraordinary feature, that instead of the great bulk of them being manufactured products, an enormous volume of our importations consisted of raw material for manufactures made in this country, and which contributed so much to its general prosperity.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Were they higher in 1893 than in 1873 ?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentleman refers to 1873 in almost bated breath. The only record you can consider is the record of the Conservative Government up to 1873, and the record of that Government, if examined, will show this, that, relatively, considering the prices of commodities, the condition of transportation facilities, there was practically a protective policy in the tariff of that time, relatively as much as there has been of protection from 1878 down. When a change occurred in the prices, in the transportation facilities, and the terrific competition arose the hon. gentleman failed to meet the almost universal appeal that went forth to raise the duties relatively and give the country that protection which it had before. That hon. gentleman failed to grapple with the issue. I will not longer trespass on the attention of the House. I simply say this, that up to the present moment the position of the Government is not only unassailed, but hon. gentlemen opposite have admitted that they do not propose to assail it until we reach another stage. But I have to point out that if we are to keep up with the progress that it has been ours to enjoy in the past, if we are to carry out the great schemes that lie in the minds of Canadians, young and old, if we are to produce anything in the future like that which the fathers of Confederation predicted and hoped we would produce, it is not by inviting foreign competition to come in here and destroy the industries that have grown up and exist under the protective policy. It is not by following the example of the mother country, even if it be free trade taking it all through, where you have statesmen of great judgment confessing their embarrassment to-day in all the commercial markets, and falling back on a means, not ours for the moment to enjoy and exercise, the means of arms and force. We are not in that position, and until we reach it, we certainly are not able to tie our hands behind our backs, as hon. gentlemen opposite profess we are able to do, and court attack from every quarter. I believe if we maintain, as this Government has pledged itself to maintain, the cardinal features of protection, if we accept the advice that is given to us by business men after careful judgment on the fame, and shape our policy according to those interests, then the result will be all that the most sanguine Canadian could desire or wish.

Mr. BORDEN. The hon. gentleman began his speech by chiding the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies), for having failed to discuss the question before the House, the Budget brought down by the hon. Finance Minister. I appeal to you, Mr. Speaker, and to this House whether the hon. Minister of Marine has set hon. members who may come after him the good example of having himself followed the course which he said should have been followed by the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies). That hon. gentleman certainly discussed the public questions of the country and those bearing on the tariff and the trade relations of the country fully, so far as they affect us in our relations with other countries. Everybody knows that when the Budget is under discussion the fullest liberty is accorded to every hon. member to discuss the condition of the country and its trade relations with other countries. This is the first time I have ever known a serious question of this kind to be approached with a scrap-book of extracts, cut out from speeches made ten or fifteen years ago, and extracts from partisan newspapers, which it was useless for my hon. friend to contradict, though he did so over and over again, because no sooner would he contradict the truth of an extract than the Minister proceeded to re-read the same extract or to quote another extract from the same paper. The speech of the hon. Minister reminded me of a story. He has treated the House to several stories, and perhaps the House will suffer me also to tell a story which, I think, illustrates the manner of the Minister's speech. Once upon a time, in a country where there was a poor congregation—it could not have been in Canada, it must have been in free trade England, and I think it was—the congregation was in want of a new set of hymn books. The old hymn books were worn out, and an enterprising member of the congregation had somewhere read an advertisement by a vendor of patent medicines, to the effect that he would supply free hymn books to any congregation provided that he would have an opportunity of inserting here and there an advertisement of his nostrums. The congregation was made happy and adopted the scheme, and on the eve of Christmas Day they were furnished with brand new hymn books, and on the next morning when the service began, the clergyman pointed to them with pride, took up the new hymn book and said it was unnecessary to read the hymn, as it was known to every member of the congregation. The congregation stood up and began to sing, never having examined the books they were to sing from, and this is what they sang:

Hark the herald angels sing
Beecham's Pills are just the thing
Peace on earth and mercy mild
Two for a man and one for a child

That is very much the style of the speech which the Minister of Marine and Fisheries has delivered to this House to-night; a speech which I do not think was up to the standard of the hon. gentleman; a speech which I do not think it was worthy a Minister of the Crown to address to an assemblage of this kind, engaged with a serious, sober question such as that of the tariff which this country has to adopt in the future. The hon. Minister alluded to the Liberal party as a disappointed party. He could not have looked amongst his own followers when he said that, for it has occurred to me, during the past eight days, that disappointment has not been on this side of the House, but amongst those on the Government benches. What about these hon. gentlemen opposite who have been declaring during the last eight or ten years, and even up to the last session of Parliament, that the National Policy, that high taxation was the means of reducing the cost of living in this country and of lowering the prices of the commodities used by the people? What are these hon. gentlemen who have been preaching that doctrine to think, when now the Minister of Finance has taken that argument out of their mouths, by stating, as he did in his Budget speech, that high duties increased the prices of the commodities used by the people? It occurs to me that there must have been considerable disappointment among hon. gentlemen who have been preaching to this House and to the people of the country on every hustings, the doctrine that high duties created lower prices. The Minister of Marine took exception to the statement made by the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) with reference to the population of Dakota. The hon. gentleman has succeeded in hunting up a number of speeches made by my hon. friend (Mr. Davies), and, by the way, I have often wondered for what object such a large number of newspapers were taken by the different departments of this Government as I see charged up in the Auditor General's Report. I find now that at any rate, so far as the Minister of Marine is concerned, this country is taxed for such a large amount, to pay subscriptions to newspapers so as to enable him to cut out extracts from the speeches of the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies).

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. You do not seem to like them.

Mr. BORDEN. I enjoy them immensely; nobody could help it. Without these extracts the speech of the Minister would have been nothing. Now, the hon. Minister has said that the member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) misstated the population of Dakota, and that he said it was one and a half millions when it was only a half million. Well, Sir, I am informed that the figures given by the hon. member (Mr. Davies) were taken from a newspaper estimate which had been made of the population—because the statement was made prior to the census of 1890—at a time when people were going into the Dakotas very rapidly and the population was filling up very fast. The estimate given by the hon. member was what was set down in the newspaper.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. It was incorrect.

Mr. BORDEN. It was incorrect. It occurs to me that my hon. friend the Minister ought not to be too strict in charging against hon. members on this side of the House a little inaccuracy of that kind. I remember a time in this House when an hon. member made some statements of what was going to happen in this country—not a statement with reference to Dakota—but as to what would happen in the North-west, and he fixed the date and year that certain wonderful things would come to pass. I find that Sir Charles Tupper, when a member of this House, in discussing the North-west, said:

When I remind the House that the land alone, according to the authority of the right hon. Minister of the Interior.

The Minister of the Interior was in it too. It was not simply Sir Charles Tupper, but Sir John Macdonald also.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Let me point out to the hon. gentleman that one statement was in favour of Canada; it was unfortunately incorrect; the other was an estimate which was incorrect, and it was against Canada.

Mr. BORDEN. Then it is no harm to tell a fib if it is in favour of Canada.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I did not say that.

Mr. BORDEN. Sir Charles Tupper then went on to say:—

When I remind the House that the land alone, according to the authority of the Right Hon. Minister of the Interior, upon the calculation which he believes to be sound, within the next ten years will give us $38,000,000 in hand, $32,000,000 to receive on mortgages within the following ten years, or a total sum of $70,000,000, it will be seen that we incur no risk. But suppose the land does not give us that, we have an authority which hon. gentlemen opposite will accept: that the customs revenue from the people who will go into the country for the next ten years will furnish the interest on $60,000,000. * * * *

I am glad the hon. gentleman has done so. I am glad his attention has been drawn to the fact that 100,000 farmers, cultivating 320 acres each, or 200,000 farmers, cultivating half that quantity each, and taking the product at only 20 bushels to the acre, instead of 27 or 30, which is the average in the North-west in favourable years, would give 640,000,000 bushels of wheat, or 50 per cent more wheat than the whole United States produces to-day. You have only to look at those figures for a single moment to see what the future of Canada is, to see what a magnificent granary for the world is placed in our Canadian North-west, and when you remember we have six belts running through that fertile country that would each give 320 acres each to 100,000 farmers, you can understand to some little degree what a magnificent future awaits us in the development of that great country.

Now I think that my hon. friend the Minister of Marine ought to be a little kind to the hon. gentleman from Prince Edward Island if he happens to make a mistake of half a million or so in quoting an estimate of the population of some foreign country.

Mr. LANDERKIN. That was only an euphemism of the Minister.

Mr. BORDEN. Now, the hon. gentleman has seen fit to charge the Liberal party with inconsistency in their policy. It is fashionable among hon. gentlemen opposite to charge this party with having no policy; but I fancy that that charge will scarcely be made again, because it is owing to the fact that the Liberal party of Canada have a policy, and that that policy is commending itself to the people of Canada, that we are here to-day to consider the resolutions which the hon. Minister of Finance has been forced to bring down in deference to the public opinion which has been created by the Liberal party. But the hon. gentleman has charged us with inconsistency. He says on one occasion we are in favour of unrestricted reciprocity, on another in favour of commercial union, on another it is a revenue tariff, and on another something else. Well, Sir, I have been a member of this House most of the time for twenty years, and during that time I have followed very closely the debates in this Chamber and have read very carefully the statements of public men with reference to the policies of the two parties, and I do not think it lies in the mouths of hon. gentlemen opposite to charge the Liberal party of Canada with inconsistency or with any material variation in their policy from the time they became a party since confederation down to the present moment. What was the position of the Liberal party in 1874? Its policy then was its policy of to-day—that the taxation of the people of Canada should be for revenue only, or for revenue chiefly; that it is wrong to take one dollar of taxes out of the pockets of the people more than is required to carry on the government of the country. That has been the main plank in the platform of the Liberal party from 1874 down to the present time. With reference to reciprocity, it was the policy of the Liberal party in 1874 to obtain reciprocity if possible: and, as the hon. Minister has shown, the late Hon. George Brown was sent to Washington for the purpose of endeavouring to negotiate a treaty of reciprocity. But the hon. gentleman says that the Liberal party have failed, and that after having failed they did not make any further attempt to obtain a reciprocity treaty, but had taken the independent position which the Government are now taking, and which he commends, of trying to build up the trade of Canada independently of trade with the United States. That is true. Nevertheless, efforts were made to obtain that reciprocity, and the hon. Minister and the House must bear in mind that the Hon. George Brown went to Washington at a time when the people of the United States were irritated against the people of Canada in respect of matters which had grown out of the war that had closed only a few years before. That irritation fortunately, has passed away, and an entirely different condition of things exists now, and has existed since the time the first offer of reciprocity was made by the Government now in power—or the pretended offer which was made in 1891. But, I say that the policy of the Liberal party has been mainly revenue tariff, though there have been times when the policy of reciprocity, which was always the policy of the Liberal party, which is their policy to-day, has been put forward more boldly and more prominently than at other times; and why should that not be so? In 1888, the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) moved certain resolutions in this House, and the moment was opportune for him to do so, and why? Because Sir Charles Tupper had received a letter from Mr. Bayard, then Secretary of State of the United States, offering to give this country a reciprocity treaty. That was a favourable moment for any party in Canada to give to the Canadian people the opportunity of expressing their opinion on the question of reciprocity, and it was at that moment that the Liberal party placed their policy of reciprocity more prominently before the people. But the attempt has been made to fasten upon this party a policy which they have never entertained as a party—the policy of commercial union with the United States. No matter how many contradictions are made, no matter how often gentlemen who have been charged with having expressed themselves in favour of commercial union deny the charge, back come the old quotations. It seems to be essential to the arguments of hon. gentlemen opposite to misrepresent their opponents, and if possible to place them in an improper light before the country. The hon. gentleman knows—he must know, because he has been in Parliament during the whole time that this discussion has gone on—that never, by any resolution, or by any speech of any of the acknowledged leaders of the Liberal party in this House, has the doctrine of commercial union been put forth as a part of the policy of the Liberal party of Canada. I am surprised that the hon. gentleman should be so persistent in making these charges. Does he not know that the late chieftain of the Conservative party, Sir John Macdonald, was prepared to enter into an arrangement for commercial union with the United States in 1869? That is a matter of history. That was perfectly proper, perfectly loyal on his part; but if any member of the Liberal party, speaking, not for the Liberal party, but for himself, happens to have made an observation that commercial union would be a good thing for this country, then at once the party is charged with disloyalty. I do not think that it lies in the mouth of hon. gentlemen opposite to charge the Liberal party with inconsistency with reference to its policy. But what shall we say of the hon. gentlemen opposite? I have just told you, that in 1869 the great leader of the Conservative party of that day was prepared to go to Washington and arrange for a common tariff between the two countries. That is a matter of history. I remember well sitting in this House in 1876, and hearing Sir Charles Tupper, when the hon. member for South Oxford had increased his tariff from 15 to 17½ per cent. in order to meet the obligations which had been left upon this country by hon. gentlemen opposite before they went out of office—I remember well Sir Charles Tupper then charging the hon. member for South Oxford with entering the thin edge of the wedge of protection. And this is the consistent party! Commercial union in 1869, a charge against the Liberal party of entering the thin edge of protection in 1876—and what happened in 1878? Because the hard times which existed all over the world, were acutely felt in Canada, as elsewhere, hon. gentlemen opposite saw an opportunity of taking advantage of their opponents and putting the Government out of power. And, although their financial critic of that day (Sir Charles Tupper) came down with a speech prepared to denounce the Mackenzie Government for increasing the tariff, at the importunate requests of the manufacturers—because he supposed the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) was going to adopt that policy, yet, when he found that the Liberal party remained true to their principles, he turned round and denounced them for not having increased the tariff; and it was then that the policy of protection was adopted by the hon. gentlemen. But, in adopting that policy, they did so very carefully and gingerly. What was the resolution moved by hon. gentlemen opposite prior to the elections of 1878? It was: That this policy, called the National Policy, of imposing higher rates of duties should be adopted—for what purpose? For the purpose of protection? Not entirely—but for the purpose of forcing the United States to come to our terms and make a reciprocity treaty with us. They dared not go to the country at that time upon any platform which did not include reciprocity. But they went to the country and carried the election; and in 1882 they became bolder. But when they came to the Maritime Provinces, even in 1882, we find Sir Charles Tupper telling the people of Prince Edward Island at Charlottetown, knowing how anxious they as well as the other Maritime Provinces were to have reciprocity—"Stick to us and our policy of high tariffs, and in two years, I promise you, you shall have what you want, reciprocity with the United States." The elections of 1887 then came. Their policy still was the National Policy, but in the Maritime Provinces there was a good spice of reciprocity thrown in, for the Government dared not go down there without some promise of reciprocity. And then we come on to the elections of 1891. What happened? Where was the National Policy then? The hon. gentlemen came down and told the country, that they had an offer of reciprocity from the United States and wanted a new House, composed of new men, to consider this question. We are a moribund House, they said, and we want a new House to take up this new boon of reciprocity which we will obtain for you. And these are the hon. gentlemen who charge the Liberal party with inconsistency! If you can find any more sudden turns, any more variegated policy, in the short space of twenty years, I would like to know where. You certainly cannot find it in the record of the Liberal party. Now, I would like, if time permitted, to discuss a little more fully what has happened. I have got up now to the year 1891, and it is just as well that we should refresh our memories as to what happened in that memorable year. We were all more or less taken by surprise at the sudden appeal to the country then. But we were certainly taken more by surprise at the question upon which the appeal was made. Why was that appeal made at that time? Why, because the gentlemen opposite, wise in their day and generation, saw that the policy which the Liberal party had put forward in 1888 was becoming popular and carrying the country. They saw us and went one better. They said: We will get the start of the Liberals and go to the country; we will go on reciprocity; we will take the wind out of their sails. And how did they do it? They did it by an outrageous abuse of their authority. They did it by misrepresentation of the grossest kind. They put forward the statement that the United States had made an offer of reciprocity to this country. They said :

Sir John Macdonald's Government not long ago made a definite proposal to the Washington authorities for a settlement of all existing differences between the two countries on a basis of an extension of the trade between the two countries. It involves partial reciprocity, the enumerated articles to include quite a number of natural products, but the proposition discards any idea of commercial union or unrestricted reciprocity. Moreover, these propositions were invited and suggested by the Washington authorities. Commissioners from Canada and Great Britain will start for Washington on 4th March, on the opening of the new Congress. The result of the Canadian elections will be known on 6th March, the day the commissioners reach Washington. In order that this Commission may have no uncertain sound, Sir John Macdonald has decided to appeal to the country and ask for judgment on these proposals of his to the Washington authorities. He does not want the endorsement of a Parliament in its last session, but the freshly expressed opinion of the people of Canada, and for this reason he has advised a dissolution.

But it turned out later on that, instead of the invitation or the suggestion coming from Washington, it came from Ottawa, and that Sir Julian Pauncefote was requested by the Ottawa Government to sound the Administration at Washington in order to see whether it would be prepared to consider a reciprocity treaty between the United States and this country. And we find, more than that, Sir, that what was agreed to—and it was agreed to on 2nd January, 1891—between Blaine on one side and Sir Julian Pauncefote on the other, was, not that any treaty should be considered, but that Mr. Blaine should receive representatives from the Government at Ottawa, and privately discuss the question of whether a basis could be laid down for an agreement of a reciprocity treaty. And this was the ground upon which the hon. gentleman, as it turned out, went to the country in 1891. But, Sir, we come now to the present time. Is this a change of policy, or is this the same policy? At any rate we have a very serious departure from the tariff which we have been told here, year in and year out, was simply the acme of perfection. And even now the Minister of Finance spent two hours and a half of the time occupied by his Budget speech in proving the absolute perfection of the National Policy, and then he spent two hours and a half in showing how completely he could tear it to pieces. Now, Sir, to return to some of the observations which the hon. Minister has made in his criticisms of my hon. friend from Prince Edward Island (Mr. Davies). He stated that that hon. gentleman had made a speech in which he had declared that the manufacturers were losing money, and that he made another speech in which he said that they were making large sums of money, and the hon. Minister claimed that these two speeches were inconsistent. I have not read the speech of the hon. gentleman from Prince Edward Island (Mr. Davies), but, so far as I could gather from the remarks of the hon. Minister, it was a speech made in 1885. In that speech, as I understand it, the hon. gentleman stated that there were three stages in the history of manufactures under protection. Beginning under the stimulus of the protective system, there would be enhanced prices and profitable returns. Then came over-production, and then it was that those engaged in these manufactures lost money, and I think there are some hon. gentlemen sitting pretty near the hon. Minister who could testify, if it were necessary, to the truth of the statement made by the hon. gentleman from Prince Edward Island (Mr. Davies). The hon. Minister says that my hon. friend from Prince Edward Island (Mr. Davies) is inconsistent, because he declares in his other speech that the manufacturers were making large sums of money. There is no inconsistency whatever. Why? Because when the hon. gentleman made the speech in which he said large sums were being made by the cotton and sugar combines, the third stage in the manufacturing industry under protection had been reached. What is that stage? It is the stage of combination of the different members of each industry in the country, and that is the stage that the hon. member from Prince Edward Island (Mr. Davies) was discussing when he said the combines were taking large sums of money out of the pockets of the people. And that is why the Liberal party object to the policy of the Government, because it helps the favoured individuals to combine together, and through that combination to take from the consumers more money for the commodities they supply than those commodities are worth, or, in other words, more than the consumers would have to pay if they were at liberty to buy elsewhere. The hon. Minister took exception to what he was pleased to call the inconsistencies of my hon. friend in what he said with regard to the United States. The hon. Minister declared that my hon. friend had stated in one breath that the United States had been injured by protection, and in the next that the American Union was a great free trade country as between the forty-two or forty-three States of the Union. I do not see any great inconsistency in that. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Davies) says, as he believes, as we all believe, that the protective principle is a vicious one, and is bound to hurt any country that adopts it. But he says that in the United States you have the least possible bad results from a bad policy, because you have within the United States forty-three different countries, as it were, all trading freely together, and containing within their own boundaries every product under the light of the sun. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that that is sound according to logic and facts, and that no exception can be taken to what my hon. friend said on that score. From what the hon. Minister said, one would suppose that the United States had always had a protective tariff. Does not the hon. gentleman know that the United States deliberately adopted a free trade or revenue tariff policy as long ago as 1845, and that the people lived under that tariff until 1861, and, further, that the greatest prosperity that that country has seen was between those two years. What drove the United States to adopt a policy of protection? Was it a desire thereby to build up industries or to tax the masses of the people in order to enrich the few? No, Sir, they had to face the war of the rebellion, and in 1861 they found themselves in debt, they found themselves obliged to raise enormous sums of money to carry on that war, and so they put up this tariff—not for protective purposes, but for the purpose of raising revenue. But we have there an illustration of how difficult it is to extricate a country from the control of the protective system, once that system has been established. Under this policy in the United States great industries grew up, great combines were started, and the power of these combines was so great that, exerted upon the Government of the country, it has forced the United States to continue that policy in operation. The hon. Minister says that protection is lively in the United States yet. Well, Sir, I agree with him. And I quite agree with him that the struggle is not yet by any means over. As I have just said, enormous interests, selfish interests, have been built up in that country which are fighting now for their very life, so that when the Government of the United States endeavours to change that policy, they find arrayed against them millions and hundreds of millions of capital which will be used in every way to thwart their efforts and to thwart the will of the people, expressed though it was with no uncertain sound in the last presidential election in 1892. I am not going into the question of the mandate of the people to President Cleveland in 1892 to carry out the policy of tariff reform—that would take too long. But I may make this observation, that in the experience of the United States we are able to see—we Liberals who are charged with everything bad, who are charged with want of admiration for British institutions—an object lesson setting forth the immense superiority of British institutions over those of the United States. Here we have means by which effect can be given almost immediately to the will of the people; there, under their extraordinary system of government, it takes a year, or a year and a half, and almost two years, before effect can be given to the will of the people. You have there a defunct House of Representatives sitting for months and legislating after they have been defeated at the polls. You have there a President actually in authority and carrying on the government of the country, months after the people have declared by an overwhelming majority that they want no more of his policy. However, that is their business, and not ours, and in that peculiar condition of things we find, no doubt, a reason why the policy of the Democratic party meets so many obstacles in being crystallized into law. Now, the hon. gentleman criticised as inconsistent a statement made by the hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies), to the effect that there had not been prosperity under the National Policy. He said: In one breath he (Mr. Davies, P.E.I.) says there has been prosperity under the National Policy, in another breath he says there is no prosperity. But "ephemereal" was the word the hon. member for Queen's used. He said there had been an ephemereal prosperity, not due to the National Policy, but as a result of the large sums of millions of money that had been spent in this country during the last few years upon public works. That was the statement made by the hon. member for Queen's, and a perfectly true and sound statement it was, one that does not require to be supported by argument. The hon. Minister says that these public works are not done yet. That looks a good deal like a note of warning for a general election. I understood the Minister of Finance to say more than once in this House, that he was about done expending money on public works. I have a speech delivered, I think, by the right hon. the First Minister in Montreal, in which he said there would be no more large expenditures on public works, and that therefore—that was the argument he used—we would be able now to cut down our expenses, and consequently to make certain reductions on the tariff. But the Minister of Marine has no idea of letting public works stop in that cavalier fashion. He always was in favour of public works, and I will say this for him, that he has fought very well for large expenditures in his own province, not always the most judicious, perhaps, but still he has got them. We have seen a short line railway which cost a million dollars, constructed in his county, which was to shorten the distance some forty miles, and after the road was built and the million of dollars spent, we found that the actual shortening was seven miles. However, we are to have more public works. Now, the hon. gentleman said that he did not oppose reciprocity, but he said it very cautiously, and I could not gather from the argument he put forward that he was very strongly in favour of reciprocity. I have no doubt that when the hon. gentleman comes down to conduct the next campaign in the Maritime Provinces, he will say that he is in favour of reciprocity. But I do not judge hon. gentlemen opposite by their words. They say on the eve of an election that they are in favour of reciprocity, but reciprocity is not in their hearts. When they go to Washington it seems to me that they take special pains to find out what the United States Government will not do, and then they insist upon that. On one occasion Sir Charles Tupper went there, after receiving a letter from Mr. Bayard, in which Mr. Bayard said that an arrangement for reciprocity between these two countries must be a full and a complete one. Subsequently a delegation of Ministers went there, went there in face of an announcement made by Mr. Blaine, made to the world—everybody knew it—that no treaty with Canada would be entered into by the United States which did not include manufactures. But the Government would not accede to any proposal to include manufactures. That policy is carried out now in this very tariff reform which the Minister of Finance has presented to this House. What do we find? We find in that an offer of reciprocity in certain natural products, but when it comes to anything like a manufactured article, when it comes to agricultural implements, in respect of which the United States are making an offer of reciprocity to this country, we find the hon. gentlemen turning their faces the other way, and utterly refusing to co-operate with the United States. We may lay it down as their fixed policy that they will not make a treaty with the United States which includes manufactured articles, knowing full well, as they do, and as their old leader, Sir John A. Macdonald, frequently stated in this House, and out of it, that it is impossible to get from the United States a treaty which does not include manufactured articles. Consequently I say it is fair to assume from the hon. gentleman's conduct, no matter what they may say with their lips, that they are opposed to the policy of reciprocity. I am sorry that the hon. member for Kent, N.B. (Mr. McInerney), is not in his place, because I think it would be a comfort to him to hear these words of mine. That hon. gentleman spoke some minutes the other night in proving to his satisfaction that this Government had done everything in their power to obtain reciprocity for this country; and then he spent about the same length of time, or more, in proving to his satisfaction that reciprocity would be an un-mixed evil to this country. Yet the hon. gentleman has left the Liberal party—or at any rate he is no longer an independent—and he is going to support the Government of hon. gentlemen opposite because they want to do a thing which he has said is the greatest evil that could happen to this country. Sir, I think almost the only article of the tariff to which the hon. Minister refers, is the article of coal oil, and in that he thought he saw an opportunity to make an attack upon the Liberal party. He said that the

Mr. BORDEN.

Liberal party was responsible for the present condition of the coal oil question. Now, Mr. Speaker, let me give you the facts with reference to coal oil. Before 1877 there was a customs duty of 15 cents per gallon and an excise duty on petroleum. In 1877 Mr. Mackenzie reduced the customs duty to 6 cents per gallon, a reduction of 9 cents, and took off the excise duty. At that time the same quality of American oil, which is now imported, was selling at 20 cents per gallon. When this change was made in the interest of the people of Canada, there was a reduction of from 15 cents down to 5, a reduction of from 90 per cent down to 30 per cent upon American coal oil. What is the case to-day? The duty upon the same quality of oil coming into Canada to-day is about 130 per cent, in some cases more, in some cases less, but in no case less than 100 per cent. But how does this operate? It operates with special hardship upon the people of the Maritime Provinces. The people of the Maritime Provinces, let me tell the Minister, if he does not know it, buy and import from the United States two and a half times more oil than the people of Ontario and Quebec per head of the population. For every gallon of coal oil per head of population imported in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec there is imported of American oil by the people of the Maritime Provinces two and one-half gallons, and two and a half times more per capita is paid by the people of the Maritime Provinces into the Treasury on coal oil than is paid by the provinces I have named. Yet the Finance Minister came down last year, and repeated it this year, with a proposition to let coal oil into Canada in tank cars, in order to make it cheaper, but when it came to Nova Scotia and New Brunswick he refused to give them the same benefit by permitting coal oil to be imported in tank steamers. It is no use to allow us to import oil in tank cars, because the distance is so great from the point of production that it costs more than if it is imported in the regular way. But if the hon. gentleman gave us the same fair play as he accords to other provinces of the Dominion, he would permit the importation of coal oil in tank steamers. I think this is a proposal which the Finance Minister might take into his favourable consideration. The Minister of Marine said there is wonderful prosperity in the Maritime Provinces, that there is no place in the world where the people have so much reason to rejoice. But the hon. gentleman failed to state upon what grounds he based that opinion. He does not spend very much of his time in the Maritime Provinces now. No doubt, in his pleasant official chair, everything in the Maritime Provinces wears a roseate hue. The hon. gentleman has had a pleasant time recently; he has been abroad and has reaped honours, no doubt well-earned; but the hon. gentleman has not been in touch lately with the people of his own province. He does not know just how things are down there. I have never been in the habit of preaching blue ruin; I believe in my country and in my province, and I hold there is not a finer country under heaven than the valley of the Cornwallis and the Annapolis; but in my business relations I cannot shut my eyes to the existing conditions. I tell the Minister of Marine that when he tells the people of the Maritime Provinces that there are no people in the world who have more reason to rejoice, he is stating what is not true, and if he would ascertain for himself from those people their present condition, he would find he had made a serious mistake. I believe there never was a time when the people were more pinched for money—I am speaking of the ordinary centres in the Maritime Provinces.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Will the hon. gentleman state where there is a similar population better off than the people of the Maritime Provinces to-day, man for man, all around—a similar population and about the same number of people?

Mr. BORDEN. Comparisons are odious. The hon. gentleman wants to obtain a comparison from me, and he will then cut it out of 'Hansard,' and it will be read to my constituents. I will not be drawn into a trap like that. I have had some experience to-night, and I will endeavour to profit by it. I am not speaking of other countries, but of my own country. There is a want of the circulating medium, the people find it difficult to pay their bills, the farmers do not get the returns they should for their crops, and land values have diminished in the province. If the hon. gentleman will look at the trade returns he will ascertain that trade has decreased, that the volume of our exports and imports is smaller, or at all events that it has not increased. He will also observe, if he goes back twenty years and compares the condition then with the condition now, that there has been no growth whatever. If the Maritime Provinces are as prosperous as the hon. gentleman states, what about the population? Where are the people? Why have not the people remained there? Why has the population in New Brunswick not increased during the last ten years? Why has the population of Prince Edward Island not increased? Why has the population of Nova Scotia only increased by 10,000 souls? If the condition is such as represented by the Minister of Marine, it is remarkable that the people, who are considered to be rather shrewd—and indeed the hon. Minister has shown it—should have left the province and not returned. They may be doing so in a few instances, owing to the distress in the United States during the winter, but they will return south in the spring. As has been suggested to me, we might make a comparison with the condition now and twenty years ago, and that is a proper comparison to make; and if the hon. Minister would consult any one conversant with the condition of affairs twenty or twenty-five years ago, he would undoubtedly be told that at all events, so far as the agricultural interests are concerned, there is not the same prosperity now as there was then, when we had free exchange of commodities with the United States. The hon. Minister talks about people of the Maritime Provinces being happy and contented and in a most fortunate position, when they are taxed for everything they eat, wear and use.

Mr. KENNY. Taxed on their tea.

Mr. BORDEN. They are going to be taxed on their tea, and I know the constituents of the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Kenny) feel very keenly on that point. They will have to pay 10 per cent duty on their tea imported from Great Britain. Surely, with 125 per cent on coal oil, 75 cents per barrel on flour, 40 cents per barrel on cornmeal and 10 per cent on tea coming from the mother country, there should be sufficient imposts? These are the people who should be the most satisfied people in the world, according to the statement of the Minister of Marine! When the Minister comes down to the Maritime Provinces and discusses this question with the people, I believe they will persuade him that they do not think as he does. I have prepared one or two calculations which I desire to bring before the Minister of Finance and the Controller of Customs, the latter of whom I notice is not in his seat. The Controller of Customs, in order to prove that the present condition of the country was all that could be desired, and that it was fairly prosperous, quoted from a speech delivered by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) in 1877, in which that hon. gentleman stated: that a very fair test of the prosperity of the country was the extent of the bank note circulation, the extent of the growth of the deposits in the chartered banks, the increase in life insurance, and the increase in the deposits in the savings banks, and the Controller quoted the Budget speech of the member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) in 1877, and proceeded to base upon that speech further inference from other calculations. He gave the bank note circulation down to date, from 1879, the period since the inception of the National Policy, he gave the deposits in the chartered banks, the increase in life insurance, but he did not give the increase in the savings bank deposits. I will supply that deficiency for him. Taking the Controller's statement, I find that the bank note circulation under the revenue tariff period, from 1868 to 1877, nine years, increased 100 per cent, or an average increase of 11 per cent a year. I find that under the National Policy protective period, from 1879 to 1894, 15 years, the bank note circulation increased 75 per cent, or an average of 5 per cent per annum, as against 11 per cent per annum during the revenue tariff period. I find that the deposits in the chartered banks during the 9 years of the revenue tariff period from 1868 to 1877, increased 130 per cent, or 14½ per cent per year, and under the 15 years of the protective policy, from 1879 to 1894, the deposits in the chartered banks increased 165 per cent, or 11 per cent per year, just 3½ per cent less than during the period of the revenue tariff. I find that life insurance increased in volume from 1872 to 1877—the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) did not go back further than 1872, but these are the figures quoted by the Controller of Customs—increased 240 per cent during these 5 years, or an average of 48 per cent per annum, while under the 15 years of the National Policy, from 1879 to 1894, life insurance increased 300 per cent, or 20 per cent per year, less than half the increase under the revenue tariff period. I find that the savings banks deposits increased in the 9 years of revenue tariff from 1868 to 1877, 400 per cent, or 44 and 4-10ths per cent per year; but under the 14 years of the National Policy period, from 1879 to 1893, they only increased 350 per cent, or 25 per cent per annum, as against 44 and 4-10ths per cent per annum under the revenue tariff period. The junior member for St. John (Mr. Hazen) referring to the rate of taxation on the people of this country says that in 1878 it was $4.37 per head, and that in 1892 it was $5.81 per head, an increase, he says, of "only" $1.44 per head, or $7.50 per family per year, and the hon. gentleman seems to think that this is a very trifling increase! Well, Sir, we would not think so very much of that increase were it not for the circumstances attending it. All of the $4.37 per head of taxation in 1878 under a revenue tariff policy, went into the treasury, and it was expended for the benefit of our people; but what happens under the policy of 1892, when the rate of taxation is alleged to be $5.81 per head? We have in the latter year a policy stated to be expressly for the protection of the industries of this country, and which by the admissions of the Finance Minister, now increases the prices of the home products to the consumers. The $5.81 taxation in 1892 does not represent one-half of the tax which is taken out of the pockets of the people under the National Policy. That tax of $5.81 went into the treasury, but what is the amount of the tax that went out of the pockets of the consumers, and into the pockets of the gentlemen who are manufacturing for the consumers? It was at least double that amount, so that for every $5 of taxation, which goes into the treasury, $10 are given to enrich manufacturers at the expense of somebody else. That is the protective principle. The Government now propose to adhere to this policy of protection, but they are going to reduce the revenue. The Minister of Finance stated—although he was contradicted by the Minister of Marine—that they were going to reduce the revenue, and therefore they could not afford, and did not intend to proceed with public works. In other words, they proposed to reduce that part of the taxation which goes into the treasury, and which being expended, and coming back to the people in the way of public works, provided it is honestly expended, might do the people some good. But, Mr. Speaker, the Government propose to retain the vicious principle of protection, which takes out of the pockets of the people taxes which no man knows the amount of, and transfers them to the pockets of other people, who are enabled by the system of legislation under which we live, to put their hands into the pockets of their neighbours. This is legislation against the masses of the people and in favour of the classes, legislation which, according to the Minister of Finance, is a policy of development. The Minister of Finance states now that high taxation increases the cost of goods. For years he and his followers have been telling us that high taxation diminished the cost of goods, and we used to ask them sometimes: if that is the case, why not put on the duties still higher, and we will get goods still cheaper? Now, I want to know from these hon. gentlemen when they were right. Were they right last year when all of them said: high taxation reduces the price, and when they compared the cost of articles of to-day with the cost of articles in 1878? They flourished these comparisons triumphantly before the House and the people, saying: Look what the National Policy has done: it has reduced the price of everything you have to consume. And now they go back upon themselves in one short year, and propose to reduce these very taxes which have been so benefiting the people. When were these gentlemen right and when wrong? Are they right now? Then, what arrant humbugs have they been from 1878 down to the present time, in going before the people and telling them that their high taxation policy has had the effect of cheapening goods. Let them take whichever horn of the dilemma they like. But they say the circumstances are changed, changed circumstances are their excuse for reducing this tariff. How have the circumstances changed since last year? Wherein has been this extraordinary change of circumstances by which that which reduced the price of goods last year increases the price of goods this year? I will tell you, Sir, wherein the changed circumstances are; they are in the fact that hon. gentlemen are in danger of being turned out of office. The changed circumstances are in the fact that the people of Canada are getting their eyes opened as a result of the sound knowledge that has been disseminated by the Liberal party throughout this country with reference to fiscal questions and political economy. The people are learning that taxation does increase the price of goods. They have learned it so effectually that they have instilled it even into the mind of the Finance Minister; and he comes down this year, abandoning all the past professions of his colleagues and his supporters, and puts them in the awkward dilemma of having to say that no longer does taxation lower, but it increases the price of goods. I have shown the hon. gentlemen their changes in policy. They have been in favour of commercial union; they have been in favour of reciprocity; they have been in favour of protection; some of them have been in favour of annexation. They have changed their policy as many times as there are days in the week. But there is one thing in regard to which these hon. gentlemen never change their policy; that is, in their desire to stick to office. They will do anything if they can only find out what the people want. Whichever way the wind is blowing, their sails are always set in that direction. No one could more readily face north by south, which is what they are doing to-day. Their tariff increases the price of goods and their tariff does not increase prices. These hon. gentlemen will do anything in order to maintain themselves in office. But they are a little too late. The people have caught on, and understand that in making these reductions in taxation, these hon. gentlemen are not sincere, and that their motive in making them is simply to endeavour to keep the votes of the people. The Finance Minister put this new tariff forward as a farmers' tariff particularly, and he laboured with a long argument to prove that the farmers have been enormously benefited by the National Policy. In his Budget speech he quoted some figures in the attempt to prove that the National Policy, by excluding animals and their products and agricultural products from this country, and reducing the imports of that class of goods, has materially helped the farmer. These are his words:—

I wish to adduce some figures to show what has been done for the agricultural interests of this country. In 1877, the people of this country consumed, of agricultural products, animals and their products: from Great Britain, $56,588 worth; from the United States, $16,066,963 worth; from other countries, $7,798 worth, making a total of $16,131,349 worth. In 1878 these imports for home consumption amounted to $15,050,930, and in 1879 to $10,420,344. The National Policy did its work, and the result was that the importation of these products fell to $4,240,849 in 1891, to $3,092,452 in 1892, and to $2,741,733 in 1893. In other words, in the three years, 1877, 1878 and 1879, there was an average annual import of these products for consumption of $13,867,541, whereas in the last three years there was an average annual import of the same materials for home consumption of $3,358,344.

Mr. CAMERON. That is the best part of your speech.

Mr. BORDEN. If the hon. gentleman who interrupts me is capable of being convinced, I will endeavour to convince him. I am quite confident of my ability to convince the Finance Minister of the utter and absolute fallaciousness of those figures. I find, in the Trade and Navigation Returns, that the total imports in 1878 were $99,327,962, and the imports for home consumption $96,300,483, leaving, as the amount entered not for home consumption, $3,027,479. I presume that the hon. gentleman based his conclusion upon these figures. But if he had taken the trouble to turn to the exports, he would have found that the total exports for that year were $72,975,988, and the total exports the produce of Canada were $67,864,880, leaving the exports not the produce of Canada at $7,111,108. Now, if the hon. gentleman will deduct from this amount of $7,111,108, the $3,027,479 worth of goods entered and not for home consumption, he will find that he has made an error in the amount entered for home consumption of $4,083,629. If the hon. gentleman will go to the year 1878, he will find, in the same way, that there is an error of $9,282,668. And if he will take the year 1879, he will find that there is an error of $6,732,825. Now, the hon. gentleman has added those three years together and made his calculation; and he says there is an average of $13,867,541 worth of animals and their products and agricultural products imported into Canada in those years, 1877, 1878, and 1879; and he says that he reduced them, by means of the National Policy, in the last three years, 1891, 1892, and 1893, to an average of $3,358,344. That is, he gave to the farmers of Canada a market of $10,500,000. But let us take the figures and look at these errors. I find that the hon. gentleman included in his calculation for the years 1877, 1878, and 1879, $20,097,122 of products which were not the products of Canada, or an average error of $6,699,709 for each of those three years. In order to make it more clear to hon. gentlemen, I submit the following statement:—

Now, I challenge the hon. gentleman to verify the figures I have given. And I ask what is to be thought of a gentleman occupying the high position of Minister of Finance, who comes down to Parliament, after carefully preparing his speech, and makes statements of that kind. I do not believe that he made these errors wilfully, but that simply he did not take the trouble of verifying the figures, so anxious was he to come to the conclusion that his National Policy has been productive of this immense advantage to the farmers of Canada. Let us go on a little further. The average error in each of these three years was $6,699,707; and we know that all these goods must have come from the United States. Taking the other side of the account, and looking to the details of the imports, to find where the mistake has arisen, what do we find? Take the year 1878. The imports of wheat in that year amounted to $6,510,131 in value, an amount almost exactly corresponding to the hon. gentleman's error. The wheat which was brought into Canada, handled by Canadian merchants, and exported at Montreal, giving work to our shipping, is included in the reductions the hon. gentleman claims credit for. In shutting out this export of $6,500,000 of wheat which came into Canada and did not enter into competition with Canadian produce at all, he therefore claims that his National Policy gave a market to that extent to our Canadian farmer. I have given $6,699,000 as accounted for out of this

Mr. BORDEN.

$13,800,000, which still leaves about four millions to be accounted for, before I get down to the sum he says he has succeeded in reducing the trade of Canada to in these particular lines—that is $3,358,000. Where do I find the explanation of that? I look up again to 1878 to find the exports and imports of Canada in these articles. I find that Canada exported to the United States barley, beans, and peas to the value of $4,401,104, and brought back, with the money that resulted from their sale, corn and cornmeal to the value of $4,153,281. Now, I think I have reduced the amount down to the point to which the hon. gentleman says the National Policy reduced it. This $6,500,000 worth of wheat, which came in and gave work to the people of Canada and put money in their pockets, this $4,000,000 worth of barley, which was profitably exported to the United States and paid for by the corn and cornmeal which Canadians wanted or they would not have purchased it—that is the profitable trade to the country which he, on this side, and McKinley on the other side, shaking hands together, have succeeded in taking from the Dominion and the United States. But the hon. gentleman is responsible for the larger part. He is responsible for the $6,510,131 worth of wheat which was exported through this country and which, by his policy, he has shut out. The hon. gentleman proposes to protect the farmers. How does he propose to protect them? Is it by making their literature cheaper. Our farmers like to read. In these days there are cheap publications of all the great works, of all the classical works, which have hitherto come into this country at a certain rate of duty. And the hon. gentleman proposes to help to develop the agricultural interests of this country by taxing this literature double what it was taxed before. And so, in this way, everything that the farmer uses is taxed from 20 to 80 per cent, and, as I have already pointed out, his flour, corn, cornmeal, and coal oil are taxed. I have pointed out already the hardships suffered by the people in the Maritime Provinces in these matters. The hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) has pointed out a special grievance with reference to fertilizers. He claims—and I repeat the claim—that the farmers of the Maritime Provinces should have every encouragement possible. The hon. gentlemen might well, therefore, reduce his tariff and make fertilizers free in order to encourage agriculture, which is severely handicapped by the want of profitable markets, and consequently low prices. But the hon. gentleman retains 10 per cent, and the manufacturers as well as the farmers complain of this. And I will tell the hon. gentleman, who seems inclined to treat this matter rather lightly, that both the farmers and the manufacturers complain that he has not put artificial fertilizers on the free list. I have had letters from manufacturers in the Maritime Provinces—which

I would read to the House if time permitted—complaining that while their profit has been reduced by taking off one-half of the protection given them, the duty on the raw materials they use has scarcely been reduced at all. And what do these manufacturers say? They say: We do not want any protection; we go with the farmers for free fertilizers, if the Government will give us free sulphuric acid. The duty has been reduced from five-tenths of a cent to four-tenths of a cent, scarcely any reduction at all. Why do not the Government abolish the duty on sulphuric acid? It is not because they get any revenue from it, for I have looked carefully over the returns and find that the revenue collected last year was a paltry $800. I ask therefore that the hon. gentleman will consider this, because it is an important question. And when the manufacturers of these fertilizers say they are willing to have free trade, in heaven's name let the hon. gentleman come down and give fair play to both the manufacturers and the farmers, by making raw material free. A special reason is suggested here to-day—and that same reason has been suggested to me in letters which I have now in my hand—that there are people behind the Cabinet, and very near the Cabinet, who have an interest in the manufactory at Capleton, and that the Government will not reduce the duty upon sulphuric acid because this manufactory at Capleton is able to make its own acid and to export it. Of course the hon. gentleman is not aware of it, but I would ask him to look into that question and ascertain why the rest of the people of this country should be taxed in order to support a small industry in a remote part of the province of Quebec. Now, Sir, I think I have got pretty well to the end, and I have no doubt that you, and the members of the House are very glad to hear me say so. One word, Sir, in conclusion. Hon. gentlemen opposite have come down now with a definite statement of their policy. They have thrown down the gauntlet and declared that they will fight it out on the question of protection or revenue tariff. We join issue with them and we are happy to have the opportunity of fighting that issue out before the people. Whether they will stick to it, or whether before the elections they will fly some new kite, as they did in 1891, I do not know. But of this I am certain, that if they will stick manfully to what they say now is their fiscal policy, and will go to the people upon that issue, Liberals need have no fear of the result. The people are beginning to understand, Mr. Speaker, what the word "protection" means. The great mass of the consumers have learned from the mouth of the Finance Minister himself, by his own admission, that taxation increases the price of commodities. Then, Sir, protection is taxation; taxation of the most obnoxious kind. Taxation means increase of the prices of commodities to the masses, the taking of the wealth of the many for the benefit of the few. It means, as we have seen in this country, the building up of monopoly; it means a blow at the liberty of the subject. And what is the policy on this side of the House? That policy is revenue tariff, a policy under which not one dollar of money shall be taken from the pockets of the people more than goes into the treasury, not more drawn into the treasury than is necessary to carry on the Government economically and honestly. Mr. Speaker, I have no hesitation, so far as I am concerned, in awaiting the issue when it shall be tried out before the people of this country.

Sir JAMES GRANT moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and the House adjourned at 12.30 a.m. (Saturday).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, 9th April, 1894.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

REPORT.

Annual Report of the Department of Postmaster General for year ending 30th June, 1893.—(Sir Adolphe Caron.)

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 56) to incorporate the Dominion Woman's Christian Temperance Union.—(Mr. Paterson, Brant.)

Bill (No. 57) to incorporate the Gleichen, Beaver Lake and Victoria Railway Company.—(Mr. Davis, Assiniboia.)

WHARF AT YAMACHICHE.

Mr. LEGRIS (Translation) asked, 1. What amount has been paid up to date, for the construction of a wharf at Yamachiche, on Lake St. Peter? 2. How many tenders were made for the construction of the said wharf? 3. To whom was the contract awarded? 4. Was the work given to the party making the lowest tender? 5. Was Mr. Thomas Lamy, of the parish of Yamachiche, employed in any way by the Government in connection with the construction of the said bridge? If so, in what capacity, what was his salary, and how much money has he received in that behalf? 6. Is it the intention of the Government to carry out further works at that locality?

Mr. OUMET (Translation). The amount paid, up to date, for the wharf in question is $1,790.20. The department received five tenders. The contract was awarded to Mr. F. A. Venette, of Three Rivers. The work was given to the lowest tenderer. Mr. Thomas Lamy was employed as superintendent of the works at $2.50 a day. $94.25 were paid to him from the 25th August to 11th September, 1893. I could not say whether further works will be carried on at that locality.

SERVICES OF J. C. BOWELL.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron) (for Mr. McMullen) asked, What was the nature of the service rendered by J. C. Bowell from 13th December to 30th June, for which he was paid $50 per month—in all $334.64, and travelling allowance $388.65? Where did he travel? How long was he travelling, and what was he allowed per day for living allowance?

Mr. WALLACE. The services rendered by Mr. J. C. Bowell during the time mentioned were those of a special preventive officer on the detective staff. His salary was at the rate of $50 per month, and he was required to travel to whatever points where questions might have arisen necessitating examination that would be allotted to him for investigation. His services were continually engaged in this way, now in one part of the country and now in another; and, after collecting information, he would proceed to Toronto in order to report to the financial inspector, under whose direction he was employed. For instance, on the 17th of December, 1892, the records show that he took a ticket from Toronto to Chicago, on the 20th from Chicago to Detroit, and on the 21st from Windsor to Toronto. He was allowed no regular allowance per day, but simply the amount of his actual expenses for board, railway fare, postage account, &c. On the 31st of May, 1893, he was removed from the detective staff and allotted duties in the financial inspector's office at headquarters in Toronto, and therefore was allowed no living expenses—simply his regular salary of $50 per month. His living expenses amounted to $1.65 per diem, or a total to the 31st of May of $278.50. His travelling expenses were $111.15.

THE MILITIA REPORT.

Mr. MULOCK asked, Why has the Militia Report not been published?

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). The report is in the hands of the printer. The delay, if any, has been in connection with the preparation of the statistical appendices.

STEAMSHIP LINE TO FRANCE.

Mr. LAURIER asked, Is it the intention of the Government to ask Parliament for a subsidy of £100,000 for the purpose of establishing a line of steamers to run between a Canadian port on one side and a French terminus port on the other, as it was understood in the negotiations which led to the commercial treaty with France?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The Finance Minister is not present, but in his absence I beg to say that I think the hon. gentleman is mistaken in supposing that it was understood in the negotiations which led to the commercial treaty with France that a subsidy of £100,000 should be asked for a line of communication between Canada and France. My reading of the negotiations is that, while that was suggested, it was declined. At any rate, it is not the intention to ask for a subsidy of £100,000 for a line between France and Canada.

C. P. R.—NORTH SHORE SECTION.

Mr. FREMONT asked, Whether the Canadian Pacific Railway have made a report or reports in relation to the works and improvements executed under the contract of 22nd December, 1891, made in pursuance of the Act intituled "An Act respecting the North Shore section of the Canadian Pacific Railway," 54-55 Victoria, chapter 11? If so, when were the said reports made, and is it the intention of the Government to lay the same before this House? 2. Did the Government send an engineer to inspect the said works and improvements? If so, at what dates, and has the said engineer sent in a report or reports; and is it the intention of the Government to lay any such reports before this House?

Mr. HAGGART. The Canadian Pacific Railway Company have made no report to the Government in relation to the works and improvements executed under the contract of the 22nd of December, 1891, in connection with the North Shore Railway. The Government have not sent an engineer to inspect the said works and improvements.

LAND GRANTS TO RAILWAYS.

Mr. CHARLTON asked, How many acres of land in Manitoba and the Canadian North-west Territories have been pledged to railway corporations under the provisions of general law, or Government regulations, and have not yet been earned and granted in consequence of railway lines to which such grants have been pledged, upon construction in sections, or entirely as the case may be, not having as yet been proceeded with or completed?

Mr. DALY. Of the 44,242,298 acres authorized by Parliament to be granted as subsidies to railway companies in Manitoba and the North-west Territories, 16,718,384 acres have not been earned, owing to the railways or portions of railways to which this area is applicable, not having yet been constructed.

Mr. CHARLTON. The 44,000,000 acres cover the entire grants ?

Mr. DALY. Yes, and the 16,700,000 acres are unearned.

THE BURLINGTON CANAL.

Mr. BAIN (Wentworth) asked, Is there any prospect that the limited scow service now provided by the Government for conveying the travelling public, during daylight only, across the Burlington Canal, where the highway intersects that work, will be replaced by a bridge or some more convenient mode of crossing the canal ? Have the Government considered the necessity of providing better accommodation for the public crossing this canal ? If so, what do they propose, and how soon do they propose giving it to the public.

Mr. OUMET. Application has been made to the department for the construction of the bridge, the estimated cost of which is $21,000 ; but no action has yet been taken, as no money has yet been voted by Parliament.

FISHING BOUNTIES.

Mr. FORBES (for Mr. Fraser) asked, Why were not the fishing bounties paid to the following fishermen in Victoria County during the past year :—George Fader, Abner Fader, Donald Carmichael, Donald McLean, Donald Morrison, Murdock McAulay, all of or near Englishtown in said county ? Is the Government aware that the fishing bounties were paid to the fishermen at said Englishtown and elsewhere in the province of Nova Scotia on the 15th of March last, on which day the local elections for the province of Nova Scotia were held ?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Geo. Fader, Abner Fader and Donald Carmichael were not paid fishing bounty as they did not fish the time required by the regulations. Donald Morrison did not fish the time nor catch the quantity of fish required by the Act and regulations thereunder. Murdock McAulay's application was rejected because the boat on which the bounty was claimed was found to be under the required length, 13 feet. Donald McLean's claim was held over pending further inquiry, as he was engaged in salmon fishing during the season. The Government is not aware that the fishing bounties were paid to the fishermen of Englishtown and elsewhere in Nova Scotia, on the 15th March last. Nearly all the Nova Scotia cheques were despatched from the department between the 6th and 15th February last, those for Victoria County on the 6th February.

I. C. R.—PASSENGER RATES.

Mr. EDGAR asked, What was the maximum rate per mile charged on the Intercolonial Railway for the carriage of passengers during the last fiscal year ? What was the minimum rate ? What was the average rate for the year per passenger per mile, irrespective of free passes ?

Mr. HAGGART. The maximum rate per mile charged for the carriage of passengers during the last fiscal year of the Intercolonial Railway is 3 cents. The minimum rate for a season ticket for 120 miles, assuming the person travelled in one direction every day, was 34-100ths of a cent per mile. The average rate per passenger per mile was 6-10ths of a cent.

FISH-WAYS IN ARGENTEUIL.

Mr. GIROUARD (Two Mountains) asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to cause fish-ways to be constructed forthwith at the several dams located on the North River, between the Ottawa River, in the county of Argenteuil, and the parish of St. Jérôme, in the county of Terrebonne ?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. A report upon this subject has been received from the local officer and is now being considered.

BEAUHARNOIS POSTMASTER.

Mr. BROWN asked, Are the Government aware that the postmaster of the town of Beauharnois resides in the city of Montreal and carries on business there as a grocer ? 2. Is the Government also aware that the said Beauharnois post office is always kept by an assistant, and that since a short period several persons have been in charge of the said post office in succession ? 3. Is it the intention of the Government to maintain such a state of things or make some more satisfactory arrangements for the proper keeping of the said post office ?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The Government are aware that the postmaster at Beauharnois resides at Montreal and carries on business there as a grocer. The Government has no knowledge of the person employed in the Beauharnois post office as assistant. The regulations of the department require all country postmasters to provide and pay their own assistants. It is not the intention of the Government to permit a continuation of the existing state of things. The postmaster will be notified that he must arrange to attend to the post office himself, and if he does not, he will be asked to resign.

SEINE FISHING LICENSES.

Mr. LISTER asked, Is it the intention of the Government to issue licenses during the present year for seine fishing in either Lake Ontario, Bay of Quinté or the River St. Lawrence ? What changes, if any, have been made since 1887 in the size of the mesh of seines, pound-nets or gill-nets?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. It is not the intention to issue licenses for seine fishing in Lake Ontario, nor the Bay of Quinté. Licenses will issue for seine fishing in that portion of the River St. Lawrence, near Montreal, where nothing but coarse fish, otherwise called poisson mou, are found. No change has been made in the law since 1887 in the size of mesh of seines, pound-nets, or herring gill-nets. Prior to 1890, the mesh for whitefish gill-nets was five inches. Since then a mesh of 4½ inches has been sanctioned.

CUSTOMS HOUSE ENTRIES AND DUES.

Mr. LANGELIER. I wish to give the Minister of Customs some information which I have received from Quebec regarding the application of the new tariff. Under the resolutions of the new tariff, it is to be applied to all entries in the customs-house from and after the 27th March. One of my constituents writes as follows:—

On the 27th of March, in the morning, I passed an entry through the customs-house of granite ware, on which I was compelled to pay the old tariff rate of 35 per cent, whereas in the new tariff the rate is only 30 per cent. At the customs-house I was told that entries passed before a certain hour on that day were to be made under the old tariff; was this done under the instructions of the Government?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. If the hon. gentleman will be kind enough to give the information the matter will be inquired into. The instructions generally were that entries were to be made under the new tariff, but subject, of course, to revision as Parliament might decide.

TRADE AND NAVIGATION RETURNS.

Mr. PRIOR. I wish to ask the Controller of Customs whether he is aware that there is a serious error—a clerical error in the Trade and Navigation Returns? In the statement of the value of exports and imports and duties for the year 1891-92, the exports and imports, upon which duties were paid in the ports of Victoria and Vancouver, B.C., are transposed. I would like, if possible, before any more books are sent out, that this error should be rectified; and in those books sent out, a little slip of erratum should be inserted.

Mr. WALLACE. I am aware there was an error in the transposition of the figures, so that Vancouver was credited with a portion of the returns of Victoria and vice versa. A correction is being prepared and sent to every one to whom the Trade and Navigation Returns are sent, and it will also be attached to all other copies of the Trade and Navigation Returns before they are sent out.

Mr. LISTER.

KINGSTON MILITARY COLLEGE.

Mr. EDGAR. When may we expect a return to the House in respect of the Kingston Military College? It is twenty days now since the order of the House issued.

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). There are a good many details in connection with the return, and it is in the course of preparation.

Mr. EDGAR. I am glad to know it is in the course of preparation, but the return can be compiled, I think, by a reference simply to the annual returns. The compilation ought not to take any time. It ought to be possible for a clerk to prepare all that return in the course of an hour; and twenty days, at all events, is liberal time.

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). Ten days.

THE COMMISSION ON THE TARIFF.

Mr. CASEY. Can the leader of the Government give us any idea when the report of the travelling commission appointed last summer to inquire into tariff matter will be laid before the House?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I cannot answer the question at the moment, but will have an answer to-morrow.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE TARIFF.

House again resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Foster:

That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go into Committee on Ways and Means; and the motion of Sir Richard Cartwright in amendment thereto.

Sir JAMES GRANT. Mr. Speaker, in view of the far-reaching nature of this subject, its intimate connection with the prosperity of this young country, and still more in view of the elaborate addresses that have been delivered on both sides by gentlemen who have grown gray in the service of their country, I approach the discussion with a very considerable degree of diffidence. But, bearing in remembrance the importance of the question and the desirability of those who have an interest in our country, expressing some opinion upon it, I have embraced this opportunity of saying, at least a few words. There is a conviction in my mind, a conviction that I have held for many a day, that, for a young country like Canada, with such vast undeveloped resources, it is absolutely necessary to the welfare of the people that its interests should be thoroughly protected. We live on the borders of a great country, a country with enormous resources behind its immense developed wealth, a country which is making extraordinary progress along the lines of modern development. We have seen the rapid advance of that country, and, if our own people are not to be left behind, it is necessary to direct their powers to the best advantage in order to compete with the remarkable manufacturing and agricultural capacity of that country. They have the climate; they have the resources. The great proportion of their people are a conglomerate from the outside world, who by their activity have raised that great republic to the exalted station that it now occupies among the nations of the earth. The infant stage of our country requires, not only a protective, but a protecting influence, and that influence was brought to bear in 1878, when, by the almost unanimous voice of the people, it was resolved that the resources of Canada and the energies and the wealth and the power of our people should no longer be laid as tribute at the feet of the great American republic. Self-preservation is the demand of an ordinary rule of nature, and, for that reason, I think it is highly necessary that our industries should be protected. And I am pleased and gratified beyond measure to know that our public men, after full and careful and thorough consideration, have undertaken the responsibility of giving to the people of Canada, by their patriotic and statesmanlike efforts, a degree of protection which, while not pressing unduly upon the people, shall conserve the energies of the people and provide for this country the conditions which are absolutely necessary to its best development. What was needed was granted unequivocally. Fifteen years have passed since our grand old chief, speaking in the Bay of Quinté district, announced to the people of this country that, after having given this subject the most mature consideration, he held it to be absolutely necessary to introduce a policy to overcome those difficulties against which the people were at that time contending. That policy was a policy of protection. And I would ask any common-sense man, if it is not manifest that, within these fifteen years, the resources of the country have been developed to a remarkable degree? Have not our industries prospered? Have not our manufacturers attained a high state of prosperity? Have not our people been happy and contented? Have not our workingmen received good wages for their labour? Will any man who has duly considered the policy and its results, tell me that the explanation given by our Finance Minister, in the remarkable Budget speech he delivered to us the other day, is not a succinct and comprehensive review of the question and one that will receive the thorough endorsement of the people of Canada from Vancouver to Halifax? In every line of industry we find the energy and activity of our people at work, and the results must be viewed with profound satisfaction. The wealth of the capitalist is given useful employment. We know perfectly well that, unless we have a well-considered and stable policy, men will not invest their money in industrial enterprises. The policy put forth by our friends on the other side of the House for many years past, has been of such a changeable character that they themselves really do not seem to know where they stand. We find the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) giving us a most imaginative picture of unrestricted reciprocity. He was followed by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), who supported the same idea. Then came the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies, P.E.I.), who desires to have what he calls the broadest treaty of reciprocity possible, consistent with the commercial and practical independence of Canada. That is a broad term; but what does it mean? What is independence to the people of this country? We know perfectly well that, if we were in an independent condition, we could not long remain so, but would quickly be absorbed by the great republic to the south of us. Then the hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson) wants the freest trade with the United States consistent with the dignity and honour and stability of both countries. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) wants—what? He wants a customs revenue. How are we to harmonize all these? Will the people of this country who desire to invest their capital here, invest it under a policy so indefinite and so shifting? Rely upon it, that this uncertainty is what has kept these hon. gentlemen in the background, as it has actually retarded the progress of the country through their influence upon those who follow them. The time has come when it is necessary for us to be certain in our actions. As Sallust has said: Think well upon what you are to do, and, when you have determined upon it, do it. That has been the course of the Conservative party for many a day in this country, and that is what has won for them the success they have enjoyed everywhere. Those who have been up and down this country for many years, as I have been, can see the results of this policy. I made a visit recently to the Pacific coast with Lord Derby, and, having been there two or three times previously, I was able to judge of the progress of the people. I was surprised at the evidences of prosperity to be seen everywhere. Cities, towns and villages were growing up on every side, and every branch of industry was flourishing. Will any hon. gentleman tell me that this is not evidence of prosperity in our country? We must consider the efforts of the people and the results of those efforts, and, when we find our country giving such evidences of progress and prosperity, we ought to feel thoroughly satisfied with the policy so judiciously adopted by the Conservative party of this country. If we wish to find positive evidence of the growth of our country, we can find it in the records of our foreign trade, especially by drawing a parallel between the records of 1878 and those of 1893. Our export and import trade last year reached the value of $247,638,629, against $172,405,545 in 1878. Is that not progress? I believe those figures do not give a full idea of the great changes that have taken place, for we know that products have changed in value. It is quite evident that in the space of fifteen years there must have been great changes in this country. We not only see it here, but we see it in other places, and the public men of Canada have got to gauge their revenue and gauge their endeavours by the progress of the age in which they live. Let past occurrences which required a different policy pass away, let us adopt a more vigorous and energetic policy for the time we live in, as our present Finance Minister has done this session. But there are other commercial enterprises on foot. We know perfectly well there is now springing up an excellent trade of an interprovincial as well as of a provincial character which must tend very materially to advance the trade and commerce of this country. We have been told very eloquently by the hon. member who moved the amendment, that after all our commercial progress has been comparatively little, in fact, insignificant. Well, do figures corroborate that statement? Very far from it. If that is so, why is it that, although in 1878 it took $29,811,834 in Dominion and bank notes to carry on the business of the country, for the year ending June 30, 1893, it took $51,921,906 to do precisely the same work? The bank discounts in 1878 took $124,888,550, while last year they took $226,000,000; and yet hon. gentlemen opposite tell us that there has been little increase in the business of this country. Are these figures proof of that statement? Very far from it. On the contrary, they prove that during fifteen years there has been unparalleled progress in almost every line of trade and commerce from one end to the other of the Dominion of Canada, and still we find this country described as if we lived in an atmosphere of indigo that rendered everything very blue. If there has been little increase in the business of the country, how is it that up to June 30, 1893, it took almost $226,000,000 to provide for this feature of the country's business? Is it not gratifying to know that this National Policy has not only increased the trade within the country, but it has increased our trade with the mother country, against whom there is now rising up a great competitive force in the neighbouring republic, and which, in itself, has made the people of Canada, who not only love their homes and their fireside, but love their mother country, put themselves to work more energetically than they have ever done before to show that they have full reliance in the power that presides over them, and on their ability to work out their own destiny. In 1878 our exports thither were valued at $45,941,539; and in 1893 their value was $64,080,493. Our imports for 1878 were $37,431,180.; in 1893 they amounted to $43,148,413. Hon. gentlemen opposite frequently tell us that the tariff bears more heavily, in the aggregate, on British goods than upon those from the United States. Is that so? If we inquire into it, what do we find? We find that nearly 40 per cent of the products of the United States imported into this country are free articles—raw materials; whereas, in Great Britain only about 25 per cent of the importations are free. Their statements are untenable. The more you examine them, the more thoroughly you look into them, the more clearly you see the falsity of the statements put forward to the people of the country by hon. gentlemen opposite. We find also other indications of a growing trade, not only with the West Indies, but also with Australia, and I was gratified, in listening to the observations which fell from the Minister of Trade and Commerce, to learn that he entertains the idea that Canada is going to do a great trade with Australia, and I am sure such is the case. When I read the magnificent address delivered by the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) in England, and more recently in Canada, on the question of trade between the colonies, which he calls preferential trade, you may depend upon it that my heart warmed towards those sentiments. It is inevitable that we must look to such a quarter for increasing our trade when we find a Chinese wall being built up between this portion of the British Empire and the United States, such that it is almost impossible for us to trade with them, unless some considerable changes are made in their tariff policy by the Wilson Bill. We know that the McKinley tariff did, and we know how we suffered under that tariff. I was very glad to learn from that speech of the hon. member for North Bruce that not only are our sister colonies beginning to recognize the importance of preferential trade with their own kith and kin, but that in Great Britain also, where there is, at the present time, a great depression in trade, that opinion is gaining ground every day. The day is not far distant when the various colonies of the British Empire will have to take into full, determined consideration, the desirability of trading with those who are willing to trade with them on the most generous, the most liberal, and the most comprehensive terms that can be agreed upon, and such as will tend to build up the power and strengthen the prestige of the British Empire. Mr. Speaker, I think this sentiment as regards intercolonial trade is equally shared by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). In his amendment he asks for an adjustment of the tariff so as to provide for freer trade with the whole world, and particularly with Great Britain and the United States. When the hon. gentleman was formulating this sentence I think he must have had one eye on the paper and the other eye on the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy). He knows the ideas of that hon. gentleman. There is a sort of magnetic influence between them, and I am sure that influence was felt when this sentence was being constructed, so as to endeavour to catch as many votes as possible in this House. I have looked over that amendment several times, but I cannot find a single word in it with reference to unrestricted reciprocity or commercial union which that hon. gentleman has, time and again, so eloquently advocated. We have been reforming our tariff. Why is it necessary to reform that tariff? We know perfectly well that we have to be up and doing in order to keep pace with the times. If that tariff was not reformed in the way that has been proposed, we would be behind the age. The hon. Minister of Finance has told this House why they reformed it. He has given to the agriculturists their farm implements at very reduced rates. As regards binder twine, oil, and such products, we know that their values have changed very materially. There has been a demand for a change and the Government has given it to the people. Why? Because the country is progressing, its works are constantly increasing, its material wealth is giving it additional prosperity, because it is possible to raise a revenue independent of any excessive taxation and sufficient to meet the requirements of the country, and for that reason the Finance Minister has adopted the progressive policy embodied in the Budget speech presented to this House. It is urged that on principle the necessaries of life should be free, and why not tea and sugar? We know that the working classes have as good a right to get commodities free as the more wealthy in the community, and for that reason those articles are made cheap for their use. We see that tendency in every direction. There is, however, one feature with respect to the tariff in regard to which I should like to see some little change, and I hope the Finance Minister will excuse me if I offer him a suggestion—I refer to the tax on books and literature. I consider in a young country like Canada, the mind has as good a right to be fed cheaply as the body. You may develop muscle by beef, but the development of mental activity requires good literature, and in a country like this Dominion, advancing to the highest standard of mental activity, with able men in the various walks of life, and in science and literature, earning for Canada a name abroad, from the high position these men are taking in the different departments of knowledge, it is right and proper that in our schools, colleges and universities, literature should be given free of taxation. I do not desire to impress too strongly on the Minister of Finance my views, but I hope that he will give this subject full and thorough consideration, and that the course he may adopt will be quite agreeable to myself and those I represent; but I must say this, I feel that Canada as a young country should obtain books free, and I trust that when the Minister has considered the matter he will place books on the free list before the tariff Bill leaves this House.

There is another question that is largely connected with our finances and revenue, to which I wish to refer. In doing so let me say that in listening to the eloquent address of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), in reply to the Budget speech, I was astounded beyond measure at his remarks, coming from a gentleman possessing such high literary attainments, a public man so well-known in Canada, a man who had distinguished himself on this side of the House many years ago, and why he left this side of the House I cannot say—I am satisfied that in the innermost recesses of his mind since the day he left his party he has never been thoroughly satisfied, for he has not had any particular success. In this country when a man belongs to a party let him consider fully and thoroughly the policy and position of that party, and when he knows he is right, let him do what is best for the good of the country, let no matters of a personal character lead him from the lines of right, for a man should not consider himself, the welfare of the country should stand higher than any other consideration. Looking at the leader of the Opposition I see an hon. gentleman who today in Canada is highly respected, who is a leader of the great French nationality of this country, that nationality which has done so much in an historic way, and in every other way, for the advancement of Canada, whether in the Conservative or the Reform ranks; and I look upon the French nationality as an integral part of this country, as one that has contributed much to the welfare and prosperity of Canada, as members of the Anglo-Saxon race, and no doubt they will unite and co-operate with us, as they have done in times past, and will stand as a phalanx, with ideas far ahead of personal considerations and will do everything in their power to advance the material interests and prosperity of this country. Again, I look at the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), that gentleman whom the late Premier, Sir John Macdonald, was in the habit of designating the Erskine May of the Reform party. I have been surprised by the arguments he has brought forward from time to time in order to substantiate theories of trade, that he knows cannot carry Canada to success. I feel that he is one of those argumentative philosophers who possess extraordinary power and ability, and is able to fill any chair in law, and occupy a prominent position on the floor of this House, and whose sentiments are always listened to with care and consideration; but at the same time I do not think that the advocacy of the policy and of the political philosophy that he has brought before this House will add much to the strength of the Reform party, which probably some day or other may occupy seats on this side of the House and obtain possession of the Treasury benches, which no doubt the hon. gentlemen opposite long to reach. I desire to refer to a great industry connected with the revenue of this country, and that is the department presided over by the worthy Minister of Marine and Fisheries. We know the fisheries constitute an important source of undeveloped wealth, and as this subject is connected with the revenue of the country and with trade and commerce, I embrace this opportunity to offer a few remarks in regard to that great department of trade. We know that in England to-day, it is a recognized fact that its mercantile marine and the seamen have greatly aided England in reaching the proud and prominent position she occupies to-day, almost more than any other industry throughout the length and breadth of the Empire. So it is in Canada; although I do not compare Canada with England, yet our 58,000 or 60,000 fishermen who occupy themselves on the great sea lines, are doing much to establish our reputation, and undoubtedly have assisted in placing Canada in the proud position she now occupies as the fourth maritime power in the world. With respect to those fisheries, whether salt or fresh, we know that a great deal remains yet to be accomplished in connection with them. I know our cod, mackerel and herring, fortunately, do not take, like some parties to the warm American waters. I do not mean that hon. gentlemen opposite desire annexation, because they have expressed a contrary opinion, and no doubt they admire British character as do hon. gentlemen on this side of the House; but at the same time I would say that the policy they are advocating cannot carry them to victory. In regard to our mercantile marine there is a great deal yet to accomplish. We know what our fishermen have done. We know that Messrs. Robin & Co., of Jersey, have acquired a fortune of millions by the exercise of intelligence and capacity in the development of the fisheries of the Lower St. Lawrence. There are opportunities for hundreds of men to utilize those magnificent fisheries, and instead of developing them to the value of $19,000,000, which is said to be their annual value at present, they could be doubled and trebled in value within a few years. We know perfectly well that we have abundant and productive fisheries. I had the pleasure of visiting the vast salmon fisheries on the Pacific coast, where the salmon are said to be of six different varieties, and where the quantity caught is perfectly marvellous. Will hon. gentlemen opposite tell me that these fisheries are not a source of revenue? Do we not know that last year, the city of New Westminster received a revenue from the fisheries alone of over a million and a half dollars. Only a short time ago, I happened to meet with a gentleman from England who had visited the Pacific coast, and informed me: the shore and deep-sea fisheries of that country, which are now perfectly undeveloped, will be yet an immense source of wealth to the Dominion of Canada. We know that our fresh water fisheries in the inland lakes and rivers are almost free to our people, and are an unlimited source of food supply. Does any one suppose that they would long remain free if we were living under the principles of free trade? Why, under such a fiscal policy it would be necessary to tax every industry, to put a direct tax upon our people, our labourers and our farmers. You could not put a stamp on your coach, you could not transact the most ordinary business affairs, without contributing to the revenue of the country, precisely the same as they have to do in England to-day. The direct taxation in England has grown to such an alarming extent, that the very best men in that country to-day are considering the desirability of making a change in their fiscal policy. We know perfectly well that the result of free trade in England has been, that foreign manufacturers are putting their goods on the market there, and that British manufacturers cannot compete with them. When Cobden and Bright introduced free trade principles in England, the world was different then from what it is now. Through the philanthropy and generosity of the English manufacturers they allowed competing manufacturers in Europe and other countries to examine their machinery, and as a consequence we find that steel rails made in continental Europe are sold in London, and have even been sent to British Columbia, as an hon. gentleman from that province told us a few days ago. The times have changed since free trade was initiated in England. European manufacturers are able to make machinery and turn out the materials just as good as are turned out in the best factories in England, and their cheap labour enables them to undersell the British manufacturer. Free trade is not a success in England, and still less could such a policy be applicable to Canada. I believe that the time is not far distant when you will find the public men of Great Britain undertaking the responsibility of making some change in their policy; perhaps such as the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) has so ably advocated both in England and in Canada. It is true that in a large country like Canada, with such enormous resources, it is impossible almost, for an individual to get, as it were, a grip of the whole subject at once; but we are learning every day, and improving in every department of our Government. During the few years that our Minister of Marine and Fisheries has been in charge of that department, it has made a remarkable advance. Within a short time a gentleman has been brought here from England. Professor Prince, recommended by Lord Kelvin, as one of the best authorities in England, and having spent many years as an active co-worker with no less a person than Professor Mackintosh, one of the greatest living authorities on fish-life. Since Professor Prince arrived in Canada what has been the consequence? Great changes have taken place in our fisheries, and still greater are in store for us. He has discovered where it was absolutely necessary to make changes in order to save the small fry, and thus add largely to the fish supply of Canada. I hope the day is not far distant when we shall have a biological station here for the observance of the life history of our fishes, the same as they have in England and other European countries, and I believe that when we have such a department a great deal more will be accomplished. Is it to be supposed that all our science is to be directed to the improvement of agriculture, or to the testing of the food supplies? We know all that science has done for the advancement of the farmer, and precisely the same application of science which has so developed the land, should be extended to the waters of Canada, abounding in valuable food supply for our people. I have no doubt that the Government will shortly take into consideration the desirability of establishing a biological station in order that we may understand how to preserve our fish, and thus perpetuate their life history. The hon. member for Prince Edward Island (Mr. Davies) told us a few nights ago that the people in his province were labouring under a species of what he called "commercial atrophy." It is very fortunate for us, that the representatives from the Maritime Provinces do not exhibit any muscular atrophy. I am aware that the men sent here from the lower provinces are men of both high intellectual and physical power; we are always glad to have them with us, and the pleasure would be keener still if some of them, like the hon. gentleman I refer to, would advocate different ideas from those which they advance on the floor of this House. Do we not know that Prince Edward Island, during the last few years, has made great strides on the road to progress. In that island to-day there are—how many I do not know—lobster fisheries more than they had a few years ago, and scientific men are now inquiring into the lobster and oyster fisheries there with a view to their preservation and greater reproductiveness. There is no reason why we should not have the same success in our fisheries here as they have had in Scotland, where, through watching the life history of the salmon, their fisheries are just as abundant to-day as they were thirty-five or forty years ago. It is a complaint we often hear that our people take more fish from Canadian waters than they can absolutely use. Only a short time ago, no less than 10,000 salmon, which could not be utilized, were dumped back into the Fraser River at one time. Is not that a wilful waste; a waste which, I trust, will be put a stop to by wise regulations of the department? There are one or two other points with reference to our fishery resources that I would wish to refer to. We have an extensive area, which, if looked after, as I have no doubt it will be in a short time, must bring an enormous revenue to this country. I refer to the fisheries from the upper end of Newfoundland, right around to Hudson's Bay, and north. What are the Americans doing in these waters? Haddock, mackerel and cod largely caught off our coast by United States fishermen. These important sources of revenue are largely neglected by our own people, many of whom prefer lobster fishery. The fact is we have only 55,000 sea fishermen, while little Scotland has just about 50,000. Our fisheries could readily be doubled. Would that not be a source of increased revenue? Grimsby and Leith fishermen now go to the cold Faroe Island, towards Iceland, and do well, and our men have fruitful waters north, with important fisheries to be developed and thus add to the revenue. Twenty-five years ago the total value of the Canadian sea fisheries amounted to six and a half million dollars, excluding Newfoundland, which was equal to four and a half million dollars. The value now is fully three times that amount. Our sea fisheries yield eighteen or nineteen million dollars, whereas British fisheries, England, Wales and Scotland, are equal to twenty-six or twenty-seven million dollars. Maximum of catch, with minimum of risk to the fisheries, should be, and certainly now is, the object of the Department of Marine and Fisheries. Hudson's Bay and its fisheries are also an additional source of revenue. Hudson's Bay is the resort of those species of the large whales most prized by whalers, namely, the "white whale," and the "bow-head." The whale "fishing" in this Canadian sea is practised mostly by the Americans. The first American vessel which went to Hudson's Bay for this purpose was the "Antelope," a barque of 340 tons—George Taber, master—in 1861. She was rewarded with a catch of 1,500 barrels of oil and 24,000 pounds of whalebone. Ever since that time one or two whalers from New England have gone to Hudson's Bay each year and returned with an average of 10,000 pounds of whalebone, besides the oil. Whalebone is now a most valuable commodity—worth $5 per pound, or $50,000 for the average catch of each ship in Hudson's Bay. No wonder that our American friends like to visit these waters. The Russian Government is said to charge a license—amounting to $700 a season—for whalers entering the White Sea, which is by no means so much of a mare clausum as Hudson's Bay. I think it is high time that the people of this country should undertake the task of adding these additional sources of wealth to our great Canadian fisheries. I find no fault with the Minister of Marine and Fisheries for not having undertaken that work before this time, because it costs a considerable sum of money, and certain explorations have yet to be made and pro-party has to be defined before these fisheries can be utilized. I believe that there is a great future before us in Canada, and notwithstanding all the gloomy forebodings the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), rely upon it, that we have nothing to fear once the resources of our country are developed. We have in Hudson's Bay a great inland sea, almost as large as the Mediterranean, a thousand miles in length by 600 miles wide, abounding in caplin; said to be the food of the cod. Only a few days ago, I also learned from a gentleman who had been up in that region that he believed there were many extensive cod fisheries there. This great Hudson Bay has no less than thirty rivers flowing into it. One of these, the Nelson, is as large as the Mississippi, and on each side of its magnificent banks there are fertile fields, and it contains fish resources of great extent. Are not all these resources destined to become of immense value in the near future? Mr. Ogilvie, who gave us an interesting description of our great northern country, in a recent number of the 'Canadian Magazine,' has told us that, in passing through the Hudson Bay country, he obtained very fine specimens of drift gold; and Professor Bell, who has probably made the most elaborate examination of that country known in history, states that there exists there very fine gold in quartz. There have also been discovered there excellent anthracite coal and lignite, and vast forests of timber, which will certainly become of great practical utility to this country. With all these resources, why should not the Hudson Bay country be developed? It would in every way benefit this country, but especially the farmers of the North-west, who find the price of wheat so low to-day that they cannot make any money out of it. Is that the fault of the Government? No, it is because the wheat supply of the world is beyond the demand of the world. With regard to Hudson Bay, we know that a few years ago a most liberal charter was granted by this Government for the construction of the Hudson Bay Railroad, because they saw the desirability of opening up that great outlet to trade. When that railroad is constructed, as I feel it will be in the near future, Winnipeg will be as near to Liverpool as Montreal is. The distance between Winnipeg and Liverpool will then be reduced 1,400 miles; and, when that is done, the price of wheat to our farmers in the North-west will be increased, for the channel in the Hudson Bay is known by the best authorities to be open for four months and a half in the year. The great valley of the Saskatchewan will also find an outlet for its products by way of Hudson Bay; and, when that route is fully opened up, the development of that great country will be certain and rapid. We know that Winnipeg was merely in its swaddling clothes when the Conservative party gave it communication with the rest of the world. It was then only Fort Garry, a small trading post. What is it to-day? A city with all the advantages of an advanced civilization, with magnificent streets, handsome buildings, and educational institutions, and the people enjoying prosperity; and yet we occasionally find the people of that city turning the cold shoulder to the Conservative party, which gave them the prosperity they enjoy to-day. Speaking of the Hudson Bay, I think Ottawa city itself will be among the first cities to tap it. A railway is now under construction, of which a hundred miles will shortly be built, which will add greatly to the future wealth of this city, because it will there reach sources of revenue and sources of industry far in excess of the most sanguine expectations of our people. Again, Toronto city has a railway to Sudbury, and along the course of the river which is marked as the terminus of that railway, I am sure the capitalists of Toronto will shortly also obtain a connection with Hudson Bay. Therefore, we catch a glimpse of the great future that great country, which is to-day almost a 'terra incognita,' is destined to have. I have full confidence that the men who have charge of the affairs of Canada, will exhibit the same progressive spirit in the future that they have exhibited in the past, and that we shall yet live to see a development of that country which will be highly creditable to the Government and will advance very materially the great interests of this Dominion. The farmers of the North-west will derive great benefit from the opening up of that route. Those farmers, I am told by some people living there, are slightly discontented and probably a little dissatisfied—why? Because they cannot get a higher price for their wheat. What have the Government to do with that? They distributed among them for seed last year 15,000 sample bags of different grains. They give them instructions how best to cultivate the soil and how to fatten their cattle—in fact, how to do everything to increase their wealth and to add to the revenue of the country.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Hear, hear.

Sir JAMES GRANT. And when that hon. gentleman says, "Hear, hear," let me tell him that one of the greatest advances in the science of agriculture ever made in Canada has been made in the last two years under the direction of Professor Robertson and the chief of the Experimental Farm at Ottawa, in reference to the food supply of animals, which gives the farmer the opportunity, during the winter, in this frozen country of ours—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Sir JAMES GRANT—frozen up in the winter, but not frozen all the year round. Some people call it a frozen country. I say it is not so. In the winter months the farmers can utilize their time by fattening their cattle and swine, by raising poultry and manufacturing butter and cheese. In these ways they can exercise their intellectual capacity in connection with the work of agriculture all the year round, instead of sitting idle three or four months in the year, as was the case formerly. What is the consequence of that? Our products, by their improvement, and their purity, and their increased worth, are commanding the very highest prices in the English market. We know that England imports about £10,000,000 worth of ham and bacon in the year; and it is not unlikely that Canada will have something to do with supplying a considerable share. What has our cheese done? It takes to-day the first rank in England. It is stated on good authority that one butcher in London realized over $1,000,000 from the sale of prime Canadian beef as best English. That is one of the reasons why I advocated strenuously the establishment of depots in Great Britain where our products will receive the proper brand, so that they will be known as products of Canada when they are offered for sale in the markets of the mother country. Mr. Liphon, of London, who has charge of the Canadian mammoth cheese, has ninety shops in different parts of London, and his retail sales of tea alone are about 275 tons a week. He has undertaken to exhibit the mammoth cheese in the various towns of England at an expense to himself of $15,000; and let me tell you that that mammoth cheese is to Canada what the pyramids are to Egypt, but considerably more nutritious. This colony of Canada has undoubtedly advanced in a most remarkable degree, and its advancement was commenced by the Conservative party. And still we are told that this Conservative party have become fossilized and are doing nothing for the farmers of this country. I would like to know where the history of Canada shows a body of men who have done more for Canada. We are told that the country is not prosperous. One of the best tests of the prosperity of the country is its credit in the eyes of the bankers of the world. Canada to-day occupies a foremost rank in the financial world, her bonds standing higher than they ever did, and her credit being unquestioned, notwithstanding all that has been said to decry her position in the London 'Economist' and by an hon. gentleman opposite. I regret that a gentleman who knows Canada so well, who has lived here since his boyhood, who thoroughly understands our position and the requirements of our people, should in this House, as the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) does, session after session, treat the people of this country to an elaborate disquisition on the ruin and decay of a colony that stands first amongst the colonies of the British Empire. I have no desire to detain the House longer, but let me say in conclusion that we should be thankful that this England of ours, which, according to an American authority, has picked up the corner lots of the world, had her eyes open to the advantages of Canada and materially aided us, through our connection with her, to gain the high position we occupy to-day. I have listened with pride and satisfaction to the observations that fell from the Minister of Finance, and certainly think that the Budget speech he has presented to this House, taken as a whole, is in itself an evidence of great advance. Associated with our worthy Controllers, who, from time to time, have gone from one part of this country to the other, he has discussed the whole question with the farmers, the labourers, the mechanics, all those concerned in the welfare of our country; and having thus gathered the sentiments of the people, he and his associates have, by their combined judgment, framed and presented to this House a budget and a tariff measure which I feel certain will be cordially endorsed by the people, as it has been already by the ablest journals of Canada in all parts of the Dominion. For my part I shall be only too happy to give to these gentlemen my most cordial and liberal support.

Mr. MARTIN. The hon. member for Ottawa (Sir James Grant), who preceded me, referred to some questions that interest the country from which I come, notably the Hudson's Bay Railway project. While that question is not very closely connected with the discussion of the financial condition of this country, I may perhaps be allowed to take this opportunity of saying a word or two regarding it, since it has been introduced. I may say that the people of Manitoba and the North-west generally have looked forward with a great deal of hope to the construction of that railway. The province of Manitoba has at various times passed legislation looking to very considerable assistance to the construction of that road. In the old days, when the monopoly of the Canadian Pacific Railway was in full force in Manitoba, it was considered that the only escape from that monopoly was the construction of this railway, and a very large amount of aid was proposed to be given it. As the years went on and the Canadian Pacific Railway monopoly was taken away, the province of Manitoba, considering its financial condition, decided that it was not in a position to give as much to the company as it had earlier intended to do. Various schemes have been proposed for the construction of the road, but I must say that the prevalent opinion in Manitoba at present is that the construction of this railway is a national work—a work which will be of greater benefit even to the North-west Territories than it could possibly be to the province of Manitoba, and for that reason the people there believe that very substantial aid should be given by the Dominion Government towards its completion. For the reasons I have mentioned I do not intend to discuss that question at any length to-day. But there is one feature perhaps to which I might refer. Unfortunately the affairs of this proposed railway—because it has never got much beyond that stage—have been in bad hands. The company, under arrangement with the Manitoba Government, were able at one time to partially construct some forty miles of the line. The result of that construction has placed the company in a very bad condition indeed, but, however bad the condition of the company may have become, the condition of all those who were unfortunate enough to have anything to do with the construction of that forty miles has been a great deal worse. In the first place, the province itself is a loser to the extent of a quarter of a million dollars. The bonds of the province—which are afloat and upon which the province is paying interest, and the principal of which they will in time have to pay—were issued to aid in the building of that line on the understanding that the Government were to have the security of the land grant voted the company by this Parliament. The Government have never got that security. They were reckless and foolish enough, relying upon the representations of the company, to hand over the bonds before receiving the security; and as is usually the case when that is done, the security has never since been got, and from all appearances is not likely to be got. Not only has the province lost this \$256,000, but other persons who were mixed up with the building of the line have been heavy losers. For instance, the steel rails which were purchased in England have never been paid for. The result is that to-day, while efforts are made from year to year to float this scheme in the financial markets of the old country, the record of the company continually comes up against them and prevents capitalists from investing their money in it. I am convinced myself that that railway will never be built and never be of any advantage to Manitoba and the North-west Territories until it is taken hold of by some responsible and reputable persons who will conduct the affairs of the railway in a business-like and honest manner, and put things in such a condition as to induce capitalists to have confidence in them. Now, Mr. Speaker, the only other point touched by the hon. gentleman who preceded me which at all interests Manitoba was the astounding statement that the city of Winnipeg had been brought to its present proud position by the efforts of the great Conservative party. I had been under the impression, Mr. Speaker, that the citizens of Winnipeg had had the honour of bringing their city to its present position; that it was their work, it was their enterprise, it was the investment of their money that had brought about the results which we see. But the hon. gentleman holds, apparently, that the citizens of Winnipeg have had nothing whatever to do with the prosperity of the city, but that that prosperity is due entirely to the care with which the Conservative party have fostered its growth. Mr. Speaker, I beg entirely to dissent from that suggestion: in fact, I have no hesitation in laying down this proposition—that whatever progress Manitoba and the North-west have made, has been made in spite of the most reckless misgovernment and most gross mistakes in connection with the management of this country on the part of the Government of Canada. At some future time, a more fitting occasion may arise, and I shall then endeavour to explain to this House on what I base the statement I make. But, to-day, we have to discuss the question of the Budget, and the time that I can properly claim will be very fully occupied with that task. Now, it is claimed by the hon. Minister of Finance and by other speakers who have followed him on that side of the House, that the changes which are proposed in the tariff are designed more especially in the interests of the agricultural classes; and, as in Manitoba we are almost entirely dependent upon and interested in those classes, it becomes of very considerable importance to my constituents to consider how far these changes have been beneficial. In the first place, the central idea of the tariff changes seems to be the reduction of the duty on agricultural implements from 35 per cent to 20 per cent. Now, if hon. gentlemen opposite think that this change is going to satisfy the people of Manitoba and the North-west Territories, they are entirely mistaken. In the first place, the 20 per cent tariff is $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent higher than that imposed by the Mackenzie Government; and, if the Mackenzie Government were in power to-day, and still had their tariff of $17\frac{1}{2}$ per cent, as a representative of the North-west I should be prepared to contend that special privileges and special consideration should be given to the farmers, and that a tariff of $17\frac{1}{2}$ per cent upon agricultural implements was altogether too high. Statements have been made by hon. gentlemen in this debate that the position of the farmers of Canada, especially of the farmers who are engaged very largely in the production of wheat, is a very precarious one. The immense quantity of wheat that is produced by foreign countries—the Argentine Republic, India, Russia, and other countries—and enters into competition with our wheat in the Liverpool market, makes it a vital question whether the prices (which hon. gentlemen opposite contend they have nothing whatever to do with) will increase or not. And, Mr. Speaker, if the price of wheat does not increase, the condition of things will be a very serious one indeed for the people of the North-west to face. And, that being the case, we have the right to appeal, and we do appeal, to this Parliament to consider most carefully our condition as affected by any burden they may find it necessary to place upon the people of Canada for the raising of the necessary revenue. Therefore, I say that a tariff of $17\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. taken as a basis of what is a fair exaction from the farming community, would not be satisfactory to the people in Manitoba and the North-west. Hon. gentlemen opposite have adopted 20 per cent as the tariff upon agricultural implements. Even taking 20 per cent as a fair exaction, it must be remembered that the agricultural implements which are included in the 20 per cent rate form a very small portion indeed of the goods which are really the raw material of the farmer in the North-west, and upon which he has to pay customs duties. Therefore, the retention of the high rates upon several articles which are just as important, and upon which the farmer pays out just as much money, condemns the Government even from their own standpoint. Now, we have heard a great deal from speakers on the other side of the House as to the prosperity of the country; and I have found since I came here—in fact, I had noticed it before I came here—that on the other side of the House it is a fashionable thing to condemn any member on this side who ventures to dispute any statement, however wild, or however far from the truth it may be, made by hon. gentlemen opposite with regard to the prosperity of Canada. However outrageous these statements may be, he is declared treasonable to Canada, disloyal to his own country, who ventures to dispute them. Now, Mr. Speaker, we all know, even hon. gentlemen opposite understand perfectly well, that that position is a nonsensical one. What we are endeavouring to do in this House, and what we are bound to do is to consider the real facts. If we are to legislate for the people of Canada we can only do it fairly and intelligently by learning the exact condition of the people. If that condition is not a prosperous one, is not a happy one, it is not changed, it is made neither better nor worse by anything that is said in this House. But, in order to understand what we are doing, and in order to deal with the questions that come before us, we must meet the facts plainly in the face. I have no hesitation in saying—I confine my remarks to that portion of the Dominion from which I come—the condition of things is a very serious one indeed, and I would like to point out that the progress of the country, even judged by the standards set up years ago by hon. gentlemen opposite in this House, has not been at all satisfactory. We have heard in this debate, statements quoted that were made years ago by the late Sir John Macdonald, and by Sir Charles Tupper, as to what the progress of that country might be expected to be. However, we have to say—and we are glad to be able to say it—that in the decade from 1881 to 1891 there has been substantial progress in Manitoba and the North-west Territories, an assertion which, unfortunately, cannot be made as to the rest of the Dominion of Canada. However, even with regard to that I desire to point out that in the decade from 1881 to 1891, a period as to which the hon. gentleman from Ottawa (Sir James Grant) falls into such ecstasy, the period during which the great Conservative party took hold, as he says—"took hold"—of Manitoba and Winnipeg and fostered their growth, the country did not show anything like the degree of prosperity which characterized it in the decade from 1871 to 1881, during one-half of which time the country was ruled by the late Hon. Alexander Mackenzie, when, according to hon. gentlemen opposite, everything was going to the dogs, and everything was wrongly done, especially with regard to that particular portion of the Dominion. Let me give you figures with regard to that. In 1871 Manitoba had a population of 18,905; in 1881 Manitoba's population was 62,260, or an increase during those ten years, five of which, as I say, had temporarily been outside the fostering care of hon. gentlemen opposite, of 247 per cent. In 1891 the population had risen to 152,506, an increase in the latter period of ten years of 145 per cent. During the Mackenzie regime the increase in ten years was 247 per cent; during the Conservative regime the increase was only 145 per cent, or a falling off of 100 per cent. But it may be said that as the number with which the country started in 1871 was comparatively small, that is scarcely a fair test. Well, we are in a position to meet the objection, because right alongside Manitoba are the North-west Territories, in which there was no census in 1871, and their existence as a factor in the statistical returns of Canada only began in 1881. How was it in the Territories? Did the Territories progress, fostered as they were in every way, millions of public money being spent there, Canada increasing its public debt enormously in order to develop that country? How does the progress of the Territories for the first ten years of their life compare with the progress of Manitoba during its first ten years of life? In 1881 the population of the Territories was 25,515; in 1891, 66,799, or an increase in the first ten years of 165 per cent compared with the increase in Manitoba in its first ten years of 247 per cent. That is about the rate at which the fostering care of this great party has been able to make that country travel, a decrease of 100 per cent in ten years, or at the rate of 10 per cent per year; that is to say, during the Mackenzie regime, which the hon. gentlemen declared to have been so disastrous in its effect upon the development of that country, the progress of the North-west Territories was just that much greater. Now, with regard to the condition of that country at the present time. Hon. gentlemen opposite present us figures purporting to prove that Canada to-day is in a prosperous condition, and I am sure there is not an individual in this House or this country who is not sorry that their statements are not true; but the figures with which they prove the very prosperous condition of Canada at the present time are figures of trade as to a period prior to the commencement of the present crisis. The returns for the year ending 30th June, 1893, barely touch that period of time when the great crisis first commenced to be felt in the United States, and therefore any consolation hon. gentlemen opposite may derive from a consideration of these figures, is entirely unfounded. What we have to do is not to look at what occurred some time ago, but to consider the situation to-day; and on that point I have a resolution that has been passed in Manitoba by the Patrons of Industry with regard to the present condition of that country. Now, it is needless for me to say anything in this House as to the position of the Patrons of Industry in Canada. It will be at once admitted that that organization, whatever its merits or demerits may be, is not a political organization in the sense of being allied to either of the two great parties in this country; but it is a political organization in so far as it deals with questions of special interest to the farmers of Canada; therefore any declaration it may make with regard to the condition of the country may be looked upon as tolerably accurate. And what does this order say with regard to the province of Manitoba and the North-west Territories? This resolution was passed some two or three weeks ago, and I may say that it is the most serious arraignment of the Government of the country which has ever been brought to my attention:

That in view of the ruinous tariff and excessive freight rates imposed on the North-west farmers, the Patrons will ask the Ottawa Government to abandon all immigration schemes, as the Order does not believe that the North-west in the present circumstances offers any inducement to settlers.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I put that forward as a plain but very strong statement of the condition of that country in the opinion of an order whose entire aim is especially to improve the condition of the farmers; and this order, after considering everything, after considering the two great evils under which the farmers labour there, have come to the conclusion that it is not advisable for the Government to spend any more money in inducing settlers to go into that country. In their view, there is no inducement for them to settle there, owing to these two evils, as they call them, a ruinous tariff and excessive freight rates. This is a more appropriate occasion to discuss the ruinous tariff than the other question, although the other question must necessarily be considered by this House. Now, are the changes that hon. gentlemen opposite propose to make in this ruinous tariff likely to satisfy the people in that country? On this point allow me to read an expression of opinion which will not be considered partisan at any rate by hon. gentlemen opposite. This statement is taken from the report of an interview with my predecessor in this House, who is, I need not say, a very warm partisan of hon. gentlemen opposite:

The changes were in the line I expected, scarcely so far-reaching, however, as I thought they would be. For instance, I thought the duty would be completely removed from binder twine and barbed wire. On agricultural implements the change was as great as I expected, though if the Wilson Bill goes through in anything like the shape in which it went to the Senate, I have no doubt we will have free trade in implements.

With these prefatory remarks I shall attempt to discuss the changes that are proposed, from the standpoint of Manitoba and the North-west. I desire to say that the question of the tariff and its effect on Manitoba has been brought to the attention of the Government by a body that is strictly non-partisan—Conservative, really, many of its members being strong Conservatives—but at all events the question was approached and considered by that body entirely as a question of trade, and not as a question of politics; the effects of the tariff on Manitoba and the North-west have been brought to the attention of the Government by the Winnipeg Board of Trade in a report or memorial which was handed to Mr. Foster and Mr. Angers on their visit to that country. There is one rather curious incident connected with it. Exception has been taken on this side of the House to the secrecy of the interviews which took place between representatives of the Government and representatives of trade interests, and it was declared on the part of the Government that it was necessary to have those interviews secret because the representatives of the different trades did not desire to disclose the particulars of their businesses to the public; but I should like to point out that while that rule was adopted with respect to the interviews of business men with the Government it was also applied to the presentation of this memorial by the Board of Trade. The excuse given by the Government is one coming from those who appeared before them, at least it is put in that way, but I should like to point out that there was no desire whatever on the part of the Winnipeg Board of Trade, to have their representations kept secret, that it was the Government alone that insisted on their being kept secret, and these representations would probably not have been disclosed to the public to-day were it not for the fact that members of the Government returning to Ottawa, taking advantage of the pledge of secrecy which they had enjoined on those who had appeared before them, came here and said the grievances presented to them in Manitoba and the North-west were very trifling and were not matters of a serious character. Of course under such a statement it was quite impossible for the Winnipeg Board of Trade, which considered it had made representations of a most serious nature, to allow the matter to remain in that position any longer, and therefore the board has given to the public its memorial. I will read the first portion of it only, as the memorial is of some length. It seems to me to place on a basis entirely non-political the effects of the tariff in that country in a very fair manner. The memorial reads :

To the Hon. GEO. E. FOSTER, M.P., Minister of Finance.

SIR,—The Council of the Board of Trade, as the result of correspondence with you on the subject of the manner in which the present Canadian customs tariff affects the settler in Manitoba and the North-west Territories, have prepared, and now beg to submit for the consideration of the Government, the following statement :—

“The Council respectfully submit that the position of Manitoba, as respects the tariff question, is quite different from that of most other parts of Canada, the following being some of the reasons therefor :—

“1. There is in this province a lack of the raw materials required in most manufactured articles.

“2. The cost of labour for manufacturing is higher here on account of the sparse settlement, and also because the settlers attracted to this province are a class less available for that purpose than in more populated centres.

“3. The cost of fuel.

“4. The cost of carriage of raw materials, and all exports.

“5. Manitoba is now, and will be for many years, almost solely an agricultural country, and as such, must come into competition with all other countries producing similar classes of produce. The price to us must be the price at the point of consumption, less the cost of carriage and handling.”

Under these circumstances the prosperity of Manitoba depends upon our producers being able to raise agricultural produce at such cost as will give them a fair margin of profit. To do this, the cost of any article required by settlers must not be enhanced by unnecessary import duties, or the combination of manufacturers.

If the fiscal policy of this country is to be determined on a basis that will secure for the fertile lands of the Prairie Province and Territories (on which the future welfare of the whole Dominion depends), the population which has been predicted for them by every statesman of Canada, by every traveller and delegate who has visited them, and by every intelligent Canadian, proud of the possibilities of his country; if it is to be determined on the lines of giving the greatest good to the greatest number, then there can be no question but that the customs import tariff, now imposed on articles absolutely necessary to the settler, must be reduced to the lowest point consistent with the revenue requirements of the Dominion.

Hon. gentlemen, I think, will see that it corresponds almost word for word with the platform of the Liberal party of Canada.

The present population of Manitoba is small when compared with the number requisite to settle the whole province, but if the province is to be populated, better inducements must be held out to settlers, for it must constantly be kept in view that the incoming of population depends entirely on how the present settlers' interests are considered and conserved. It is a fact that the present conditions are unsatisfactory as to the customs tariff and the railway transportation rates. The customs tariff on the farmer's necessaries are far too high, and the freight rates on his produce to market too heavy (notwithstanding the recent slight reductions in the latter item), to make settlers contented with their lot, and thereby constitute them a drawing power to fill up the province.

The Council respectfully submit :—

That the customs duties on goods coming into Canada should be reduced to the lowest point consistent with a revenue tariff.

That all specific rates of duty be abolished, and that all duties be levied on an ad valorem basis.

That the Government be empowered, upon evidence given of the existence of a combine to maintain or increase prices, to lower or abolish, by Order in Council, the import duty on articles affected by such combine.

The Council maintain that the increased importation at lower rates of duty than now prevail, would tend rather to increase than diminish the revenue derived by the Dominion: many of the duties now in force are absolutely prohibitive, and, therefore, no revenue now accrues to the Government.

The Council submit that manufacturers of many lines of staple goods in Canada have formed combines, and base their prices, not on the cost of manufacture, plus a fair profit, but on the values which similar goods from abroad cost, laid down in Canada, duty paid. This being the case, the consumer pays an excessive price for his goods, and the Government does not secure a revenue, the manufacturer being the only gainer.

In addition, the council went on and named article after article which were charged enormous duties, and dealt with specific duties and also ad valorem duties, and made specific recommendations to the Government. It will be my duty to consider whether, and how far the Government have met the propositions of the council of the Winnipeg Board of Trade, taking that as a fair presentation of the case of the people of Manitoba in connection with the tariff. It is a great mistake to suppose that the agitation in connection with the customs tariff in the North-west Territories and Manitoba has been an agitation merely for the relief from duty of a few special articles, such as agricultural implements, barbed wire, and binding twine. A determined effort has been made by the hon. gentlemen opposite and their friends in the North-west to make it appear that the agitation was something of that character, but the objection to the customs duties there arises from the fact that they are taxes largely on the raw material. We find the same complaint everywhere. We find it from the manufacturer. He says: I do not object so much to the lowering of the duty upon the manufactured article, but what I object to is the high duties which you still retain upon the raw materials.

The farmer says: I object to the tariff, because it is a highly protective tariff upon these particular articles which I must necessarily buy in order to carry on the business in which I am engaged. These articles are not alone agricultural implements, binder twine, and barbed wire, but they run all through the 28 or 30 pages of customs tariff which have been enacted by this House. It therefore becomes necessary to consider the whole question of duties when we have to decide whether the proposed changes are going to alleviate the condition of the farmer. The hon. Minister of Finance has told us that the average rate of duty which he finds to be necessary to impose in order to carry out the protective policy which his Government has adopted and adhered to, is 28 4-9 per cent, and I find that on almost every important article which the farmer must buy, the duties exceed the average which the hon. gentleman has laid down under his new tariff. Therefore, so far as the agricultural interests are concerned, we have, generally speaking, a higher rate upon these articles which the farmers must buy, than the average rate of tariff which the Finance Minister is obliged to extort. In face of that, how can it be said that the changes in the tariff have been made especially for the benefit of the farmer? If the condition of the farmer is to be alleviated, there must be a substantial reduction; there must be a substantial change in the tariff so that these articles which he is obliged to purchase in order to pursue his calling will be as cheap, or cheaper if possible, to him, than to persons in other countries engaged in the same industry. Now, it is proposed to take off the duty of 20 per cent upon lumber. I may say that that proposition is received in the North-west with a great deal of satisfaction, and I hope therefore that the Government do not intend to delude the people in the North-west with regard to this change. I may at once tell the Government that if it is intended to take the duty merely off rough lumber, that the change is of no use whatever to the people of the North-west and that unless dressed lumber is included, there will be no benefit whatever to the farmers. This is the case, because under the custom of trade in Manitoba practically all the lumber, or at any rate 90 per cent of it, which would come into that country from the United States if the duty were taken off, would be dressed lumber. You can understand that in Manitoba, a sparsely-settled country, there are very few planing mills, so that the lumber has to be dressed at the United States saw-mills. Under the tariff as proposed by the Minister of Finance none of that would be free of duty; it would be still subject to the 20 per cent tariff, and it looks very much to me indeed as if the Government had designedly made the pretense that they were taking the duty off lumber, while they are practically leaving the same duty on it as before. Unfortunately our farmers in Manitoba are not in a position to come as a deputation down here to interview the Minister of Finance in connection with this matter, and if this is not an attempt to delude us, and to make us feel that we are getting something from the Government when we are really getting nothing; then I hope that the Minister of Finance will soon discover the error in this matter, if there has been one.

Mr. MCGREGOR. The dressed lumber saves them the freight.

Mr. MARTIN. Oh, yes, certainly. Now, with reference to wire nails. The Government propose to reduce the duty on wire nails from $1.50 per 100 pounds to 75 cents per 100 pounds. That, at first sight, looks like a very substantial reduction, but I do not believe that any benefit will accrue to the farmers from it. When the duty was $1.50 per 100 pounds no nails were imported into Canada, and with 75 cents per hundred pounds, no nails can be imported either. At any rate, if they are imported, the duty on them will still be abnormally high, because at the old rate of $1.50 the duty was 120 per cent on a keg of nails; an article which is in every respect the raw material for the farmer, because it is absolutely necessary that he should have them to erect his farm buildings. If our farmers in the North-west take the advice of the Minister of Agriculture and go into mixed farming and raise cattle, they will have to erect buildings for the cattle, and these nails will be more of a necessity than ever. The Government in their fostering protection for Manitoba and the North-west formerly imposed the trifling duty of 120 per cent on wire nails, and although they have now reduced it to 60 per cent it is still an enormous tariff on an article of prime necessity to the farmer. Under the old tariff the duty on cut nails was $1 per 100 pounds, or a duty of 95 per cent, and that has been reduced to 75 cents per 100 pounds, which still leaves an enormous tax of 71¼ per cent. When we consider that the average of this new highly protective tariff, according to the Finance Minister, is 28 4-9 per cent, how can the Government come before this House, and before this country, and make the pretense to the farmer that they are alleviating his condition, when an article of such prime importance as nails is left at a duty in one instance of 60 per cent and in another instance at 71¼ per cent? Another most important article for the farmers of the North-west is builders' hardware. Builders' hardware formerly had a duty of 35 per cent. Hon. gentlemen opposite in their intense desire to alleviate the burdens of their people have reduced this duty to what? To 20 per cent, no, but to 32½ per cent; that is, they have taken 2½ per cent off the duty on builders' hardware, and still they are surprised that the farmer is not in raptures with their course. Pumps, which are needed by every farmer in the North-west, formerly bore a duty of 35 per cent, that tariff has now been reduced 30 per cent. The duty on rope has been increased; the former duty was from 25 to 30 per cent, and now it is made at a uniform rate of 30 per cent; which is an extraordinary high duty on another article of raw material for the farmer. Iron and steel have been reduced. The old duty of $13 a ton on iron and steel made the rate of duty 60 per cent. Hon. gentlemen opposite, I must say, have taken a step in advance in this, and have paid some attention to the representations of the Boards of Trade and to the people of the North-west in doing away, as far as they have done away with, specific duties. I must compliment them upon that, because there is no doubt, if there is any advantage to us at all in the tariff changes, that advantage comes in so far as the Government have done away with specific duties, but on iron and steel they have still retained the specific duty, having decreased it from $13 per ton to $10 a ton. At $13 a ton, the duty amounted to 60 per cent, and at $10 a ton it amounts to a tax of 46 per cent on the immense number of articles into which iron and steel enter, which the farmer requires as his raw material. That tax of 46 per cent on articles absolutely necessary for the farmer, is very considerably more than the average rate of duty, and still the Government claim that they have alleviated the condition of the farmer. With reference to barbed wire; the tariff was 60 per cent on it at the old duty of 1½ cents a pound, and although hon. gentlemen opposite have made a reduction of one-half, they still retain the very high duty of 30 per cent on this article which every farmer must buy, and which is used in all quarters. Notwithstanding this the Government claim that the changes are made specially in the interests of the farmers. I would like to ask the hon. Finance Minister, if he thinks 20 per cent is a fair rate on agricultural implements, by what process of reasoning he comes to the conclusion that 30 per cent is a fair rate on barbed wire? Why is not 20 per cent also sufficient for barbed wire? Because there are certain protected manufacturers which the hon. gentleman, as a member of a fostering government is interested in protecting against the interests of the farmers. When we find a government devoting their energies to looking after the interests of a scattered few throughout the length and breadth of the Dominion, and forgetting or neglecting the interests of the great masses of the people, how can it be possible that the people should keep them in power? By what process of legerdemain comes it? The elections from which these gentlemen gained their power cannot be carried on in a proper and honest manner; or it is not possible that a community like Canada, in which the great mass of the people are engaged in agriculture, should place in power and retain in power a Government who look after the interests of the small class who are engaged in manufacturing, and neglect the interests of the people who really build up and make the Dominion of Canada. Mechanics' tools are reduced from 35 per cent to 30 and 25 per cent. On chopping axes the old specific duty was equivalent to about 50 per cent; it is now reduced to 35 per cent, or 7 per cent more than the average. Shovels and spades, which were formerly at from 40 to 60 per cent, are at 35 per cent. Harvest tools, which were from 47 to 83 per cent, are still at 35 per cent. All these articles that I have mentioned are referred to specially in this report of the Board of Trade as absolute necessities to the farmer; and I wish to call the attention of the House to the fact that the hon. gentleman, having adopted 20 per cent as a fair rate, imposes on the necessities of the farmer the enormous rate of 35 per cent. Binding twine is kept at 12½ per cent. I was unable to understand just what the Finance Minister meant when he said that as the Dominion Government and the Ontario Government had gone into the manufacture of binding twine, there was no longer any reason why the tariff on that article should be reduced. I do not understand that argument. It seems to me that the farmer is as much entitled to protection against a Government engaged in the business of manufacturing, as against any other person engaged in that business. The duty on binding twine, which is not only one of the prime necessities of the farmer, but one for which he is obliged to pay cash in hand, is found to be a very serious burden indeed; and the suggestion of the Finance Minister will not, it seems to me, commend itself to the farmers of the country, that having gone into the business of manufacturing, the Government, like all other manufacturers, must be protected by a high tariff. Now, I find a large number of articles on which a very low rate of taxation is imposed; and, remembering the stand taken by hon. gentlemen opposite, I have looked through this list of articles to find out on what articles used by the farmer a low rate of taxation is imposed, but I have been unable to find any. I find that the following articles are taxed at a merely nominal rate, because they are the raw materials of certain manufacturers: Dry white and red lead, orange mineral and zinc white, 5 per cent; fur skins, 15 per cent; sole leather, 10 per cent; glove leather, 10 per cent; iron and steel sheets, hoops, bands and strips, 5 per cent; plough plates, mould boards, landsides and other plates for agricultural implements, 5 per cent; boiler tubes, 7½ per cent; chains, 5 per cent; celluloid, 10 per cent; table forks, not manufactured, 10 per cent; type metal, 10 per cent; brass and copper wire, 10 per cent; composition metal, 10 per cent; nickel anodes, 10 per cent; precious stones, not manufactured, 10 per cent; hubs, spokes and felloes, 10 per cent; veneers of wood, 5 per cent. I am not finding fault with the Government for fixing low rates of duty on articles which are the raw materials of the manufacturers. I quite agree that that is a proper policy. But what I am drawing the attention of the House to is that while the manufacturers are protected to this extent—although not to the extent that they desire—the interests of the farmers are entirely overlooked. Take, for example, the free list, which contains 265 articles. I have looked through that list from beginning to end to find out how far the farmer has been considered in its preparation, and I find that out of the 265 articles there are only 18—and many of these trifling articles—in which the farmer has any interest. I will mention them: First, settlers' effects; second, horses, cattle, sheep and swine, for improvement of stock; third, anthracite coal; fourth, domestic fowls, pure bred; fifth, certain kinds of fruits; sixth, maps and charts for the blind; seventh, newspapers and magazines; eighth, tea; ninth, firewood; tenth, timber; eleventh, sawed boards, twelfth, pine clapboards; thirteenth, spruce clapboards; fourteenth, laths; fifteenth, pickets and palings; sixteenth, shingles; seventeenth, bees; eighteenth, coffee. These are the only articles I could find in the list of free goods in which the farmer has any interest at all, and in many of them his interest is very indirect indeed. This is the paltry list of articles in which the people or class, who are the mainstay of this Dominion, are given any help in this direction. Now, coming back to the question of agricultural implements, the duty on that article has been made 20 per cent. But it must be remembered that, while the large term, agricultural implements, is used, when we come to examine the tariff, it really does not include a very considerable class, and we find that on implements just as important to the farmer, which he uses just as much, the duty is not reduced, or very slightly. The main articles included within the term "agricultural implements," are still kept at high rates of duty, because the reduction only applies to the following:—hoes, harvesters, mowing machines, ploughs, and seed drills. I would like the House to understand particularly, that the reduction upon agricultural implements does not embrace all classes of those implements, but simply the five articles I have mentioned. Now I will mention some other kinds which are just as important and upon which the tariff remains at the old rate or is very slightly reduced. Portable steam engines, threshers and separators, fanning-mills, horse-powers, and the large class of other agricultural implements not included in any previously mentioned. In discussing the question of how far these duties are a relief to the people of Manitoba, the only test one can take is the customs returns for the port of Winnipeg, and that is not altogether a satisfactory test, because a very considerable amount of the goods sold and consumed in the North-west, are imported into Canada at Toronto, Montreal, and eastern points. However, with regard to agricultural implements, the test is a very good one, because there are practically no agricultural implements imported into that portion of Canada except through the port of Winnipeg. Just let us look at the amount for the last fiscal year of these different articles that came into Manitoba, and the amount of duty paid upon them:

| | Amount Imported. | Duty Paid. |
|-------------------|------------------|------------|
| Harrows..... | $ 83 | $ 29 |
| Harvesters..... | 62,743 | 21,960 |
| Mowing machines.. | 18,539 | 6,488 |
| Ploughs..... | 14,709 | 5,148 |
| Seed drills..... | 8,266 | 2,893 |
| Total..... | $104,340 | $36,518 |

That is the list of the articles on which the hon. gentleman has reduced the duty 20 per cent. Of course, the House will understand that that is no index whatever of the number of agricultural implements used in Manitoba and the North-west Territories, because a very small portion, of course, under the practically prohibitory duties of the old tariff, were imported into the country. And most of the enormous duty which hon. gentlemen opposite have been extracting from the farmers, failed to reach the revenue of the country, but went into the pocket of the manufacturers. I give these figures to show the amounts imported of these other articles upon which the duty has not been reduced and to show how slight the alleviation is after all. I have given the imports of these articles upon which the Government have reduced the duty to 20 per cent. I now come to the other articles, upon which the duty remains practically the same, or at a slight reduction.

| | Duty. | Amount Imported. | Amount of Duty. |
|--|----------|------------------|-----------------|
| Portable steam engines..... | 30 p.c. | $12,562 | $4,396 |
| Threshers and separators... | 30 p.c. | 12,894 | 4,512 |
| Fanning mills..... | 27½ p.c. | 977 | 341 |
| Horse-powers..... | 30 p.c. | 1,823 | 638 |
| All other agricultural implements, upon which the duty is 27½ p.c..... | | 25,653 | $,978 |
| Total..... | | $53,909 | $18,865 |

Showing that, upon these other articles, upon which the duty is still kept at a very high rate, there was half as much imported into Manitoba and the North-west Territories as there was of the articles reduced to 20 per cent. So that, even taking agricultural implements alone, the gross reduction is not anything like as extensive as it appears to be on its face. I may say it does seem to me most important for the people of Manitoba and the North-west Territories that the industries which have sprung up in Canada and are manufacturing agricultural implements, should be placed in a position to manufacture them as cheaply as possible. And for that reason the step taken by this Government in 1887 of putting heavy duties upon iron, which is the basis of all these agricultural implements, was a great mistake, at any rate, so far as Manitoba and the North-west Territories are concerned. And I say it is the duty of the Government, if they wish really to afford that fostering care and protection which the hon. member for Ottawa (Sir James Grant) says they have accorded to Manitoba and the North-west, to remember that Canada is not bound solely to support and foster the manufacture of iron, but must consider the position of the farmer who is obliged to use that iron. Unless the agricultural implement men can get cheap iron and materials, they are certainly not in a position to furnish their goods to the consumers at reasonable prices, and as long as a tax is placed on these implements at all, so as to exclude the foreign article, all the duties upon iron bear especially hard upon the farmers. We know, of course, that even at present the manufacturers of agricultural implements sell them in Manitoba at prices considerably below what they can be imported at from the United States. But they will certainly be unable to continue producing them as cheaply, unless the duties upon pig iron and bar iron and steel are reduced below their present enormous protective rates. The Finance Minister has been asked what he intends to do with regard to the proposition of the United States as to the admission of agricultural implements into that country free of duty, provided Canada allowed them to come in here free of duty. As you will remember, Mr. Hugh J. Macdonald, in the interview which took place with him in Manitoba, stated that he could not see how possibly the Government could refuse to meet this reciprocity offer of the American people. The Finance Minister gave no encouragement whatever when interrogated on this point. He refused to hold out to the farmers of that portion of Canada any hope whatever that, if the Wilson Bill went through with this reciprocity feature in connection with agricultural implements in it, he would consider it at all. I would like to ask, Mr. Speaker, why we have been kept here until the month of March waiting to see what the Americans are going to do with their tariff, if, when the Americans have decided to do something which is very much in the interests of Canada, the Government of Canada are not prepared to take advantage of it or to accede to it? If the Government are going to pay no attention whatever to the action of the American Congress, they might as well have called the Parliament together at the proper time in January, and gone on with the revision of the tariff. They could have done it then just as easily as now, for it would appear from the stand taken by the hon. Finance Minister upon this question that they do not intend to pay any attention whatever to what the Americans may do with regard to this very important matter. Certainly the people of Manitoba and the Territories will find it very hard indeed to satisfy themselves with the stand taken by the Government on this question. If the American people are prepared to throw their market open to the manufacturers of Canada, upon what possible pretext can the Government of Canada refuse to throw the Canadian market open to the manufacturers of the United States, especially when we consider that the farmers, particularly the farmers in Manitoba and the North-west, who use these agricultural implements to such a great extent, would be so greatly benefited by this reciprocity?

After Recess.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. Speaker, one of the most important changes that has taken place in connection with the raising of the revenue as intimated in the remarks of the Finance Minister, is the reduction of $\frac{1}{2}$ cent per pound in the excise duty on malt. I fail to see in what way that change can be expected to benefit the farming community of Canada. I think that members of this House are entitled to more complete explanation from the Minister of Finance as to the reasons that induced him—at this particular time when so much stress is laid by him upon the impossibility of granting a prohibitory law to the Dominion of Canada on account of the great loss of revenue that would result—to make a reduction in the duty upon the material for making beer more important than the reduction so much talked about, in the duty on agricultural implements. The Finance Minister told us of a change that has been made in the interests of the iron manufacturers. I refer to the increase in the bonus—or rather to the new bonus—given for the manufacture of puddled bar iron. I do not propose, Mr. Speaker, to discuss at any great length the question of bonuses to iron manufacturers, but I desire to point out that the manufacturers of iron not only have the protection afforded by a very heavy duty upon pig iron and bar iron, which form the basis of the manufacture of all the different tools and implements used by the farmers, but also receive a heavy bonus, which must be paid by all classes of the community, including the farmers. In the same portion of Canada in which the iron industry is attempted to be developed, another class of the community receive bonuses in connection with their work. I refer to the fishermen of the lower provinces. Now, not being conversant with the merits of that question, I do not propose to discuss the advisability of giving bonuses to fishermen, but I wish to point out that, while the manufacturers are encouraged by a bonus such as I have referred to, and while the fishermen of the lower provinces have a bonus, no attempt is made to do anything in that way for that class which is more important than all the others put together—the farming class of Canada. In fact, instead of their industry being encouraged by a money grant or anything of that kind, they are hampered in every way by excessive duties upon the articles which they require to use. I have to agree with the proposition of the hon. the Minister of Finance in making an offer of reciprocity to the United States in connection with barley. I may say, Mr. Speaker, that, in my opinion, there is no article more important to the farmers of the North-west than barley. Although ours is pre-eminent as a wheat-growing country, it is well known that the growing of wheat there, as in other countries, is somewhat precarious. We are subject to bad crops there from various causes like other people in other places where they grow wheat, and we are, perhaps to a certain degree peculiarly susceptible to summer frosts, which, in some seasons, injure considerably our wheat crop. With respect to barley, however, it has this great advantage over wheat, that the time required for its coming to maturity is much shorter. We can grow barley without the slightest danger of frost, and we can grow the very finest barley that can be grown, on account of our climate being dry and peculiarly fitted to the production of this grain. The reason why the farmers of Manitoba have not, in the past, gone more largely into the production of barley is the very substantial reason that when it is produced there is no profitable price for it, owing entirely to the fact that the market of the United States in the great western cities which consume immense quantities of barley, has been practically closed to the North-west farmer on account of the heavy duty which the United States have put upon that article. Therefore, if reciprocity can be brought about between Canada and the United States, in regard to barley alone, or with barley and corn combined, the people of the North-west will be very glad indeed, and will be prepared to give the Government credit for any efforts they may make in that behalf. I have referred to the fact that the reduction in agricultural implements only applies to a portion of those implements, and I have referred to the reductions that have been made upon other articles. Now, I wish to draw the attention of the House to the fact that there are a large number of articles which are as truly the raw material of the farmer as are agricultural implements, articles without which he cannot carry on his business, and which, under the propositions of the Finance Minister, are either left as they were in the original tariff, or in some very striking cases, considerably increased. The first item to which I will call your attention is coal oil. Now, as the House is well aware, no change is made in the tariff upon this most important article. During the last fiscal year the coal oil entered at the port of Winnipeg amounted, in value, to \$20,263, upon which a duty was collected of \$28,600. As has been pointed out, the duty upon coal oil amounts to something like 120 per cent. Now, I would draw the attention of the House to this fact, that while the farming industry has apparently not had sufficient influence with the Government to induce them to reduce or modify that duty of 120 per cent upon one of the prime necessities of every man, especially in the North-west, where we have but few gas works or electric light concerns, still, on the ground that if the duty upon this article were reduced, the refiners of Petrolia would be obliged to close up their works, the Government have yielded rather to the solicitations of the latter class than to the representations of the farmers. So we see that when any class in the cities are able to interest considerable numbers of members of Parliament in their favour as against the agricultural class, the interest even of the refiners has to give way. It is just as much a blow at the refining industry to reduce the duty upon one class of their products as it is on the other. So far as coal oil is concerned, which is an article of universal consumption, especially among the farming classes, no reduction could possibly be made. When we come to gas oil, which is a very important product of these refineries, we find that the influences interested in the consumption of gas oil have been sufficiently strong with the Government to induce them to reduce the duty upon that article one-half. I have to compliment some of the members of Parliament, such as the member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Cockburn) in being able to bring sufficient pressure to bear upon the Government in this respect; and I only regret that those members on the other side of the House who do not represent the city of Toronto, but who are indebted for their places in this House to the votes of the farming classes of this country, have not been as true to their constituents as the hon. member for Centre Toronto and other gentlemen representing cities in this House, have been representing their constituents in this particular matter. Another matter in which there has been a large increase of duty and in which the people of the North-west are very much interested, although it would, perhaps, be stretching a point to call it a raw material of agriculture, is still an article in which the people generally are much interested—I refer to books, periodicals, and pamphlets. Under the new tariff, a uniform duty of 6 cents per pound has been imposed upon those articles, which is a very large increase from the old duty of 15 per cent ad valorem. The reason given for the change is that expensive books, books in which the chief value consists of brain work, will, under the new tariff, bear a comparatively small duty, while the ordinary run of cheap books will bear the heavy weight of the duty, as their value consists rather in paper and other material which are used in making them up. Now, it appears to me that is an entirely wrong basis upon which to arrange the taxation, because it is, without question, a scheme by which the poor man is made to bear the heavy weight of the duty. The same objections can be brought against it as are brought, and I am glad to say have been successfully brought, against specific duties on many other articles. The result will be that the cheaper goods or reprints of English authors, which have so cheapened the standard of literature in recent days, and which are imported into Canada in such large quantities, and by which the best literature to-day is thus disseminated amongst the common people, these, I say, will be very largely increased in price by virtue of this considerable increase in the duty. I may mention that the value of books, pamphlets and periodicals imported into the North-west was, last year, \$30,559, upon which a duty was paid of \$4,585. Another article of importance is baking powder. The value imported was \$17,987, duty paid, \$3,744. In referring to these articles I have not attempted to go at all minutely into the articles used by the ordinary farmer and workingman in the North-west; I have only taken those articles on which the duty amounts to \$3,000 or \$4,000 or over. The figures I shall mention in my remarks bear very little relation to the value of the articles really used in the country, because the only figures we can consider are the imports into the port of Winnipeg, and as I pointed out before recess, in many articles a very small proportion was imported into Winnipeg, and a large proportion was sent in by wholesale merchants in Eastern Canada. However, the figures will give some idea as to the importance of the article I mention. On baking powder the duty continues at 6 cents per pound, and there has been no reduction. All the articles to which I am now referring either have not been reduced or have been considerably increased, showing that this attempt to interfere with the tariff in the interest of the farmers has been most ineffective. The next article to which I desire to refer is bicycles and tricycles. We know very well that among the poorer people, who require to go from place to place, bicycles have practically taken the place of horses. It is most important in the imposition of duties on articles of this kind that they should not bear specially heavily on the ordinary citizen. On bicycles the duty is 35 per cent; there has been no reduction. The value imported in the North-west, \$2,933, duty imposed, \$879. Another article of great importance to all classes of people in the North-west is bituminous coal. It bears a duty of 60 cents per ton, and no reduction has been made. The value of bituminous coal imported was \$59,838, duty \$9,361, or one-fourth the amount paid on agricultural implements, the figures being, agricultural implements, \$36,000; bituminous coal, \$9,300. Curtains bear a duty of 30 per cent, no reduction; value imported, \$8,649, duty paid, \$2,594. Hon. members must understand that in a country like Manitoba there are very few natural fruits, and canned goods and dried fruits are of great importance and are largely used. Currants bear a duty of 1 cent per pound, no reduction; value imported, \$9,588, duty, \$2,722. Prunes and plums bear the same duty as currants; value imported, \$11,085, duty paid, \$2,117. Raisins also bear a duty of 1 cent per pound, no reduction; value imported, \$11,768, duty paid, \$5,120. On these four articles of currants, prunes, and plums, and raisins, the value imported is almost of equal importance to the North-west, so far as the tariff is concerned, as is bituminous coal, the united duties being about \$9,000, or one-fourth of the amount collected in duties on agricultural implements, of which we have heard so much. Nuts bear duty of 3 cents per pound, no reduction; val. of imports, \$7,502, duty, \$3,513. Grapes are very largely imported into Manitoba, and they can be obtained in the Western States at a very reasonable price, but we find that they are met with the duty on the border line of 2 cents per pound, an enormous specific duty on this article which is almost a necessity in Manitoba. The total value was \$6,928, duty, \$2,470. The duties on oranges and lemons show no reduction; value imported, \$45,861, duty, \$4,313. Peaches bear a duty of 1 cent, which is a very high specific duty; the value was \$10,728, duty, \$1,987. All other kinds of green fruits bear certain duties, upon which no reduction has been made; the value imported was \$7,729, the duty was \$1,545. Window glass bears a duty of 20 per cent, no reduction; value imported, \$18,025, duty, \$3,605. It is perhaps the duty of residents in the North-west to deny that the climate is cold there, but in spite of that necessity, I, as a patriotic North-west Reformer, take the stand, that there may be occasional days when people need to wear gloves and mitts. The Government appear to have overlooked the fact, because 35 per cent is a very high duty, and it is imposed on gloves and mitts, an absolute necessity to the North-west. The value imported was \$18,569, duty collected, \$6,498. Another article of necessity is hats and caps. The duty is 30 per cent, on which there is no reduction. Felt hats were imported to the value of \$25,515, duty, \$7,654; straw to the value of \$973, duty, \$291; other kinds, value, \$6,095, duty, \$1,828. This is another case where the value of the articles aggregates about one-quarter of the value of the agricultural implements on which a reduction has been made. Firearms constitute an important article to the farmer of the North-west, because very large quantities of game are found there, and the farmers are able to replenish their tables with supplies of game. The duty on firearms is 20 per cent, no reduction has been made; the value imported was \$17,352, the duty was \$3,470. Boots and shoes bear a duty of 25 per cent, value imported, \$16,079, duty paid, \$4,019. All kinds of packages of goods bear 20 per cent, no reduction; value of goods, \$29,091, duty paid, \$5,822. Envelopes, blank books, &c., on which the duty has reached the high water market of 35 per cent, value of goods imported, \$13,529, duty paid, \$4,750. Wrapping paper, 25 per cent, value, \$1,829, duty, \$457. All other kinds of paper bear a duty of 25 per cent, no reduction; value imported, \$5,888, duty paid, \$1,472. Binding twine, there was a duty of 12½ per cent; value imported, \$86,516, actual duty paid last year, \$21,617, or two-thirds of the amount paid upon all classes of agricultural implements on which a reduction has been made. But for the purpose of this comparison, instead of putting the duty at \$21,617, I have put it down at half of that, or \$10,808, because during the year there was a reduction made of half in the rate of duty. On this particular item, as I have already pointed out, the Government have given no reduction whatever. With reference to umbrellas, parasols, &c., the high water mark duty of 35 per cent is placed upon these articles, and no reduction has been made. The amount imported last year was \$3,582, and the duty paid, \$1,253. Manufactures of wood, not otherwise described, paid a duty of 25 per cent, no reduction; the amount imported was \$37,005, and the duty paid, \$9,263; another instance in which the duty paid amounted to one-fourth of that on agricultural implements. I come now to another class of articles, which are of prime importance to us in the North-west, and upon which the Government have seen fit—I suppose as a sort of off-set to the slight reductions they have given us in other respects—to make a very considerable increase. The Finance Minister took some five hours the other night to explain the tariff changes, and I was much disappointed not to hear from him any reason whatever, why these important articles should have been so largely increased in duty. I refer to woollen fabrics and manufactures of wool. Wool fabrics, 10 cents a yard and under, bore a duty of 22½ cents in the old tariff, and the Government in its wisdom have increased that duty 7½ per cent, namely, from 22½ to 30 per cent. The amount imported last year was \$9,092, and the duty paid, \$2,045. Wool fabrics, costing over 10 cents a yard and under 14 cents, which formerly paid a duty of 25 per cent, have been increased by 5 per cent, and are now 30 per cent, the amount imported being \$6,600 worth, and the duty paid, \$1,650. Wool fabrics, costing over 14 cents a yard, formerly bore a duty of 27½ per cent, and they have been now increased to 30 per cent. I draw the attention of the House to this important article on which the duty has been increased 2½ per cent; the amount imported into Manitoba amounted to \$53,621, and the duty paid, \$14,745, or more than one-third as much duty paid upon that one article as is paid upon the agricultural implements on which the tariff is reduced. In this particular case, instead of a reduction being made, the duty has been increased. I would like to ask the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) if he considers an increase such as this the kind of tariff reform he has been talking so much about in the west? I understood from the hon. gentleman's remarks in this House that he was entirely satisfied, delighted in fact, with the changes in the tariff, and he told us that he thought that all the expectations of his constituents who are almost entirely farmers, those of them that are not Government officials—have been entirely realized. I would like to know what he thinks about this increase of duty. Woollen shawls, which under the old tariff paid 25 per cent, have the duty increased on them by the new tariff to 30 per cent. A woollen shawl is an article that every farmer's wife needs, and yet this Government in its extreme care for the farmers and their wives in the North-west have found it necessary to increase the duty on woollen shawls by 5 per cent. The amount imported was \$16,150, and the duty paid \$4,037. Another article for which there is very considerable sale is velveteen, and all kinds of cotton. Velvets have to stand an increase of duty from 20 to 30 per cent. This is another increase in duty on an article which is worn by the poorer classes of the community. The amount imported last year was \$4,783, and the duty paid, \$956. I have taken these articles: wool fabrics, wool shawls and velveteens, and the total duty paid last year was \$23,433, a duty which is to be considerably increased under the so-called reform tariff. Now, Mr. Speaker, that is more than the amount of duty that was paid last year upon harvesters, which are a large item in agricultural implements and on which the duty is increased; it is three and a half times more than the duty on mowing machines; four and a half times the duty on ploughs, seven times the duty paid on seed drills, and 60 per cent of all the duty paid on all the agricultural implements upon which there has been a reduction. We see, therefore, that while the Government with one hand have reduced the tariff on a few classes of agricultural implements from 35 to 20 per cent, with the other hand they have increased the duty upon articles which paid 60 per cent last year of the duty on the said agricultural implements. They have increased the duty in the proportion I have pointed out. On carpets this new tariff proposes to increase the duty from 25 to 30 per cent, and the amount imported into Manitoba last year was \$36,128, and the duty paid, \$9,148. Another article upon which there has been a large increase is reprints upon British copyright works. The duty was formerly 15 per cent, and now it is 6 cents per pound, and 12½ per cent. The amount imported last year was \$5,383, and duty paid, \$807; labels 15 cents a pound, and 25 per cent duty; no reduction; amount imported, \$2,110, duty paid, \$788. Advertising pamphlets, 6 cents per pound, and 20 per cent; no reduction; amount imported last year, \$4,270, duty paid \$1,796. Braces and suspenders, 35 per cent duty; no reduction; amount imported last year, \$4,413, duty paid, \$1,544. Flour, 75 cents a barrel, no reduction; amount imported, \$11,910, duty paid, \$2,653. Drain and sewer pipes, 35 per cent duty, no reduction, amount imported, \$6,573, duty paid, \$2,300. Collars and cuffs, 24 cents per dozen, and 25 per cent, no reduction, amount imported, \$1,082 worth, duty paid, \$558. Combs, 35 per cent duty, no reduction, amount imported, \$2,338, duty paid, \$818. Proprietary medicines, liquid, 50 per cent, no reduction, amount imported, \$2,771, duty paid, \$1,415. This duty is, of course, so high as to be practically prohibitory. Proprietary medicine, 25 per cent, no reduction, amount imported, \$3,886, duty paid, \$972. The figures in connection with the proprietary medicines do not show at all the amounts used in the country, because so far as American preparations are concerned, the duties are so high as to be practically prohibitory. I would point out that this is a most important matter to the people of the North-west, because on account of our sparse settlements very large numbers of our farmers have to depend almost entirely upon these proprietary medicines. They live so far away from any physician that not only does the distance make it impossible for them to secure the services of one, but besides that the expense of getting a doctor is so great that they find it impossible, unless it is absolutely necessary indeed, to call in the services of a professional man. Hence the duty upon proprietary medicines bears extremely hard upon the people of the North-west. I am very glad indeed in this particular that we have with us in our distress and our difficulties upon this subject, the newspaper press of Canada anyway. However useful that press, or a portion of it, may be to hon. gentlemen opposite in endeavouring to condone their faults and search for their virtues, if any there be, they seem to have very little influence with the Government, because they are quite unable to obtain any reduction in this enormous duty on an article which is of importance to them in connection with their business. Electric light apparatus, 25 per cent, no reduction, amount imported, \$8,224, duty paid, \$2,055. China and porcelain, 30 per cent, no reduction, amount imported, \$1,355, duty paid, \$406. Braids, cords, etc., 30 per cent, no reduction, amount imported, \$7,171, duty paid, \$2,151. Linen towels, 25 per cent, no reduction, amount imported, \$4,824, duty paid, \$1,206. Linen thread, 20 per cent, no reduction, amount imported, \$4,638, duty paid, \$927.

Rubber clothing, 35 per cent, no reduction, amount imported, $8,889, duty paid, $3,111. Other kinds of rubber manufactures, 25 per cent, no reduction, amount imported, $5,715, duty paid, $1,429. I have only taken those articles in which the quantity imported is considerable; but if I had taken the innumerable other articles of which the actual quantity imported is comparatively small, but which in the aggregate make a large sum, the totals would be very much increased. The total value of these articles was $784,792, and the duty paid, $200,314. These are articles of prime necessity to the farmer, most of them being his actual raw material for carrying on his business. In these articles, on which the duty amounts to $200,000, the duty is either the same as before or is considerably increased, while in that class of agricultural implements in which there has been a substantial reduction, the duty paid last year was only $36,000, or less than one-fifth of the amount paid on those articles which I have mentioned. I have selected a number of other articles in which there have been reductions of duty, but reductions so slight as to go a very little way towards taking the burdens off the farmers' back. On the article of rice the duty of 1¼ cents per pound is now reduced to 1 cent per pound, still an enormous ad valorem duty, the amount imported was $3,991, and the duty paid, $2,377. On the manufactures of brass, 30 per cent, reduced to 25 per cent, amount imported, $5,498, duty paid, $1,652. Clocks and clock cases, 35 per cent, now 30 per cent, amount imported, $1,585, duty paid, $554. Copper manufactures, n.e.s., 30 per cent, now 25 per cent, amount imported, $2,189, duty paid, $656. Cordage, 1¼ cents per pound, and 10 per cent, now 30 per cent, amount imported, $6,652, duty paid, $1,479. Denims, cottonades, flannellettes, tickings, &c., 2 cents per pound and 15 per cent, now 32½ per cent, amount imported, $17,099, duty paid, $5,388. Printed and dyed cottons, 32½ per cent, now 30 per cent, amount imported, $14,834, duty paid, $14,571. Shirts, $1 per dozen and 30 per cent, now below $3 per dozen, 25 per cent, above, $1 per dozen and 25 per cent, amount imported, $5,887, duty paid, $3,158. Cotton clothing, 35 per cent, now 32½ per cent, amount imported, $21,000, duty paid, $7,353. If the Government really desired to benefit the farmers, by making a reduction the advantage of which would have come home to every family of farmers in Canada, at all times of the year, they could have taken the article of cotton and woollen clothing of different kinds. But I notice that in these articles there has either been an increase or the reduction has been so small as not to make any appreciable difference. Cotton socks, 10 cents per pound, and 30 per cent, now 32½ per cent, amount imported, $1,470, duty paid, $568. Uncoloured cotton fabrics, 25 per cent, now 22½ per cent. amount imported, $5,235. duty paid, $1,308. Jugs, crocks and churns, 3 cents per gallon, now 2 cents per gallon. amount imported, $2,380, duty paid, $1,121. Cartridges, 35 per cent. now 30 per cent. amount imported, $15,550. duty paid, $5,445. The duty on this article was one-ninth that on agricultural implements. Cartridges are in actual and daily use in almost every farmer's family in Manitoba, and on these the reduction has been the mere trifle of 5 per cent. Gun wads and caps, 35 per cent. now 30 per cent. amount imported, $2,910, duty paid, $1,018. On rubber overshoes, an article which almost every one in that country wears, the duty was 35 per cent, and it has been reduced to 30 per cent, and to show what nonsense it is for hon. gentlemen opposite to talk about the impossibility of interfering with these duties on the ground that if they did so there would not be money enough to run the country with, let me state that the total quantity of overshoes imported into Manitoba in 1892 was of the value of $209, and brought to hon. gentlemen opposite the magnificent revenue of $73. Because they cannot spare $73 of revenue—which would run this country about one-fifth-hundredth part of a second—hon. gentlemen opposite insist upon the people paying 35 per cent into the pockets of the rubber manufacturers of Canada on this article of every day wear. Stoves 30 per cent. I do not wish to enlarge upon the necessity of stoves in our part of the country, as that is rather a delicate question with us, but the imports of that article in the year amounted to $2,323, the duty collected was $696. Again, the Government say it is impossible to reduce the duty because they would then have no revenue. Engines and boilers from 30 to 27½ per cent. Amount imported $2,000; duty paid, $600. I may say with regard to all these heavy articles, such as stoves, furniture, earthenware, and the like, we are forced to buy them in Eastern Canada and pay heavy freight on account of this tariff. There is a double exaction from the people. Not only is the price largely raised by the heavy tariff, but the people, instead of being able to buy from our neighbours close at hand and pay cheap freight, are obliged to buy in Eastern Canada and pay the Canadian Pacific Railway very heavy freight.

On furniture, the duty of 35 per cent was practically prohibitive, and so is the present duty of 30 per cent. Although we have to import almost every article of furniture that we use in Manitoba and the North-west Territories, the amount imported from the United States, on which the freight is comparatively cheap, was only $7,417, and the duty collected $2,602. This is a very small portion indeed of the furniture really used in the country.

Now, I have endeavoured to show, taking a hurried glance over the proposition of the Finance Minister, that while our industries in Canada are looked after in the way of their raw materials either being allowed into Canada at a low rate of duty or being placed upon the free list, the interests of the farmer are entirely neglected in that particular. I have shown that the much talked of reduction of duty on a portion only of agricultural implements from 35 to 20 per cent applies only to some and not to the whole class of agricultural implements. I have pointed out to the Government—and I hope before we get through the debate that any doubts on that score will be cleared up—that their proposed reductions are practically of no benefit to the country, and unless they include dressed lumber in the proposition to place lumber on the free list, it will be of no benefit to the North-west. Then I have taken the very considerable list of articles which are of great importance to the people, upon which the Government have not been able to make any reduction whatever. The only reform they have made in articles of this kind has been to considerably increase the duties on some matters of importance to our people. I have taken that list, and I think the House will agree with me that the articles I have mentioned are really articles which are important to the settler, and upon which the burden of taxation is felt seriously by every one engaged in agriculture. I have taken other articles which are also of importance to the people, and on which the reduction in the tariff are so slight as not to be worth mentioning. Taking all these questions into consideration, it does seem to me that the changes proposed in the tariff, however they may affect manufacturers—and we have some indications that the disturbance in that connection is very considerable indeed—furnish ample justification for the proposition of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) that the Government have succeeded in bringing about the maximum of disturbance with the minimum of relief—a proposition which has been practically endorsed by the course of events that have since taken place. I think, Mr. Speaker, that the declaration by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), that the Government had succeeded in bringing about the maximum of disturbance with the minimum of relief has been justified by the course of events since the hon. gentleman made his speech; for we have heard from industry after industry that if the Government persist in carrying out the changes that have been proposed with regard to that particular industry, it will be obliged to close down its works. But while all this disturbance has been caused, I find, after giving the subject a fair examination, that the relief afforded to those for whom the changes were supposed to be made, the farmers of the country, has been but inconsiderable. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that on the whole, the country would have been very much better off if the Government had left the tariff as it was. The only object the Government could possibly have was to satisfy the farming community; and, while they have failed in that, while of course there may be some incidental relief, they certainly have done nothing to add to the stability of manufacturing industries in this country. I was somewhat amused by the declaration of the hon. member for Ottawa (Sir James Grant), who preceded me in this debate, that he supported the great Conservative party because of the stability of its policy. I do admire the loyalty of an hon. gentleman who, in this emergency, at this time when stability is about the last thing that is looked for in the tariff; when every manufacturer is hoping that there will be stability, that the changes will not be carried out, that clerical errors may be found in every part of the tariff, can declare that he admires the policy of the Government because of its stability. No wonder that hon. gentleman would declare that while he was glad to see the Government following a certain course, he would be quite satisfied no matter what they might do. Now, the Liberal party, as I understand it, Mr. Speaker, if returned to power, will give to the people of this country not a pretense of tariff reform such as this is, but a real substantial reduction in the tariff; they will eliminate the protective principle from the customs tariff of Canada and will impose duties, not for the purpose of encouraging manufactures, but for the purpose of obtaining a revenue for the country. In answer to that, it is alleged by hon. gentlemen opposite, that they have made it impossible for any Government to carry out a policy of that kind, that they have been so reckless in their expenditure of public money, that they have so successfully increased the amount of the expenditure upon consolidated fund from 1878 up to the present time, that no matter how desirous their successors may be of reducing the taxation of this country, it will be quite impossible for them to carry out that purpose. The hon. the Finance Minister says that he anticipates a very considerable falling off in the revenue of the country, and looks for a slight deficit. He says, however, that the Government will meet the threatened deficit by endeavouring to live within its means—and this after we have been told time and time again that reduction was impossible. I notice that the Minister of Railways contends that it was quite impossible to get on with less expenditure for the various departments of the Government, but the Finance Minister says that the Government proposes to live within its means. When we look at the Estimates placed before us, we find that the amount asked for is $317,000 less than for the previous year. But we know that there will be Supplementary Estimates, which, no doubt, will fully cover this trifling reduction. The hon. Minister of Finance estimates that there will be a loss of revenue of $1,500,000 through the proposed reductions in the tariff. If that be so, Mr. Speaker, we must have what the hon. gentleman professes to consider the most complete evidence of incapacity on the part of the Government—that is to say, in the year 1894-95 we shall have a deficit. The hon. Minister of Finance pointed out that we were to have no more large expenditures on public works. In this connection I would like to draw the attention of the House to a very decided difference of opinion between the hon. Minister of Finance and the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries. The Minister of Finance is supposed to be one of the leading members of the Cabinet. Recently we heard that hon. Finance Minister make a declaration, that the Government could not propose the ratification of the French Treaty. On the other hand, Mr. Speaker, we found the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries taking a positive stand upon that question, and we find that he has been able to bring the Cabinet to his way of thinking. With regard to the expenditures upon public works we find again a positive difference of opinion between the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, and from our former experience, I suppose we may conclude that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries is more likely to have his way. What did the hon. Minister of Finance say with regard to public works?

It is fortunate that we have come pretty closely up to the limit of our capital expenditure upon great works. Three months from to-day, if our prognostications are not wrong, will see Canadian vessels passing through the Sault Ste. Marie Canal, and an uninterrupted channel of communication for Canadian and other vessels, totally within Canadian waters and Canadian territory, from the centre of this continent out to the seaboard. We have spent a large amount of money upon our general canal system and upon the Sault Ste. Marie Canal. That large expenditure will be finished by the end of this year, and what remains to do will be the deepening and widening and other improvements necessary to the St. Lawrence canals and river, which will not cost a very large sum and will not extend over a very long period of time. Therefore it is fortunate that at this particular time, we are nearing the end of the large expenditure for heavy public works and coming to a period when our revenue must more nearly approach our expenditures on Consolidated Fund account, so that we shall have to borrow less for the necessary capital expenditure which from time to time, will have to be made.

Now, I think that, in view of that statement of the hon. Minister of Finance, the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies, P.E.I.) was quite justified in stating, as he did, that the expenditure upon public works has about come to an end. But what does the Minister of Marine say about that? He repudiates the idea and brings the hon. member for Queen's to task for making any such announcement. The hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries declares that there are to be continued large expenditures upon public works. He says there is to be continued a large expenditure upon public works. I am quoting now from the speech of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries:

The hon. gentleman, with what object I know not, announced to-night that as the Government had made a large reduction in the tariff, there could be no more public works.

I do not know whether the Minister of Marine and Fisheries heard the speech of the Minister of Finance or not.

Now the hon. gentleman cannot be serious.

When the hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies) ventures to repeat in this House a statement made in the Budget speech by the Minister of Finance, the Minister of Marine and Fisheries thinks he is joking, and thinks he cannot be serious.

The hon. gentleman should not use that argument, for the credit of his own side and his own policy. Surely, he does not admit that their proposal—which is to reduce this tariff radically, and all along the line, to cut and curve and alic, regardless of the industries of the country—is going to bring about such a state of affairs. That is our case. We say if you bring the people face to face with direct taxation, or with any other system than the one that now obtains, not only will deficit after deficit stare you in the face, but the prospects of this country will be wholly ruined. We are to stop building public works. The hon. gentleman knows that we are committed already to the largest and most splendid scheme ever put before the people of this continent. He knows, whether he gives us credit for it or not, that we have excited the admiration of the mother land for our pluck and our success in our ventures. He knows that the keen moneyed men in the United States, the representative of the people in Congress, are not only disturbed, but even annoyed, at what they call our audacity in our public policy, challenging, as it does, that commercial empire which they think their own on this continent, tapping, as it does, the trade of the Orient, which they wish kept solely and exclusively for themselves. He knows that we are pledged to that policy, and that, come what will, we propose to carry out those public works in which we are now engaged, and at the proper time to grapple with the rest, so as to bring all our schemes and plans to a successful and happy conclusion.

Now I read these two extracts to point out that the Minister of Finance, in dealing with this subject of increased expenditure, and the decrease of revenue, assured us there was to be practically no more public works in Canada beyond completing those which we have already commenced, while the Minister of Marine and Fisheries says that is all a mistake, and that the Government are going to launch out into costly schemes of public works. Now, I find that the expenditure under Consolidated Fund under the Mackenzie Government, in 1878, was $23,503,178, while during the last fiscal year it was $36,814,052, or an increase in fifteen years of $13,310,894. Now, whenever propositions are made on this side of the House largely to decrease the expenditure on behalf of the Consolidated Fund, we are told that, no matter how desirous we may be of doing so, it is impossible to carry it out. I may say that in local politics in Manitoba there was no matter upon which we have had more serious controversies than upon the question of the possibility of making the administration more economical than it was. When I had the honour of a seat among the Opposition in the Local Legislature, our party claimed that the Government was being extravagantly administered; and, while I know that the Local Government was being most extravagantly administered, I am satisfied that it was nothing at all compared with the extravagance and recklessness which are displayed by the Conservative Government in the Dominion of Canada at the present time. I may say that at that time the province of Manitoba had a revenue of about $500,000, and the Opposition claimed that considerable reduction could be made in the provincial expenditure. We were told by Mr. Norquay and his Government that it was easy for us to make these statements, but we knew nothing whatever about public affairs, that we had never been in office, and we would find, if the province were ever unfortunate enough to lose their services and to call upon us, that it would be quite impossible for us to carry out any suggestion of that kind. The last session we were in the House, prior to the defeat of the Government, we moved a resolution, that, in our opinion, it was possible to make a reduction in the expenditure of $50,000 per annum. Well, the country were deluded enough, as the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. La Rivière) thinks, to dispense with the services of the Norquay Government, and to call the Opposition into office, and the very first year we were in power, instead of making a reduction of $50,000, as we had promised, out of a total expenditure of $500,000 yearly, we were able to make a reduction of $120,000. Now, Sir, I do not mention this fact for the purpose of discussing local affairs in Manitoba, with which I know you have nothing to do, but for the purpose of suggesting that, if it was possible to make so large a reduction in the local expenditure of Manitoba, there must be a still better field for reduction in this Dominion, when we find that in fifteen years the expenditure has risen from $23,500,000 to $36,500,000. Sir, what has caused the increase? Has it been caused by the increase in population? No, it has been caused simply by extravagance and mismanagement. I have to admit that there are some items which are beyond the control of the Government, and which have increased, but there are other items which have increased by reason of the recklessness of the Government, particularly in connection with the expenditures on capital account. There are items which are uncontrollable, among which I may mention the public debt, the increase in which has amounted to $2,758,000; charges of management, in which there has been an increase of $23,124. Of that I cannot say exactly that it is uncontrollable, I have no doubt a saving could be effected; however, I will give the Government the benefit of the doubt, and place it among the uncontrollable items. Another uncontrollable item is the sinking fund, in which there has been an increase of $1,049,767, and another item is the subsidies to provinces in which there has been an increase of $462,957. Now, the total increase in these four uncontrollable items, in the period of fifteen years, has amounted to $4,293,853. The total increase, as I have said, is over $13,000,000. Taking off these increases in uncontrollable items that cannot be interfered with by a Liberal Government, and we have left $9,017,041, upon which economy can be exercised, as compared with the half million upon which the Opposition in Manitoba made so large a reduction. Of course it must be admitted that as the country increases in population the cost of government must increase, although it need not be admitted that the cost of government should increase pro rata with the increase of population, for of course there are many items which should not be increased with a population of 7,000,000 as compared with 5,000,000. For instance, the cost of legislation would be very little more. If a department were properly established it would be able to conduct its affairs without any very material increase in expenditure, because the increase would simply involve additional clerical assistance, which is inexpensive. However, giving the Government credit for that, allowing there should be an increase in expenditure in proportion to the population, it is desirable to ascertain what has been the increase in population from 1878 to 1893. I have figured out the results, in this way: Taking the percentage of the census from 1871 to 1891 as showing an increase of 18 9-10 per cent, three years at that rate would give an increase of 5-67. Taking the increase from 1881 to 1891 as 11-74 per cent, twelve years at that rate would give about 8, or a total of 19 71-100 per cent, or in round figures 20 per cent. That is to say, that our population in fifteen years has increased 20 per cent. So if we are allowed the greatest possible percentage for leaway, the Government might have increased the expenditures 20 per cent, or $4,700,631, during the fifteen years. But they did increase the controllable items $9,017,041, or $4,316,410 in excess. I claim that the Liberal party of Canada should make it a plank on their platform—I admit that to a certain extent I am disappointed that I have not heard it directly proposed by the leaders of the party—that the whole of this sum of $4,000,000, which is entirely above the amount of any possible increase that should have occurred, should be saved by economical administration. I desire to allude for a moment to this increase in expenditure. The Finance Minister has pointed out that for the last five years, since 1888, there has been no practical increase in expenditure on account of the consolidated fund. The Government found it possible to prevent any augmentation of expenditure during that period; and in view of that fact, how can they justify the enormous increase that has taken place in the expenditure from 1878 to 1888? Let us see what was the expenditure? From 1878 to 1884, a period of six years, there was an increase of $7,604,000, or an increase of $1,260,000 annually. Take the next period, 1884 to 1888, four years, there was an increase of $5,610,710, or $1,400,000 per annum. I shall be very glad to hear from the Finance Minister why during the first six years it was necessary to increase the expenditure on this fund at the rate of $1,260,000 annually, and for the other four years at the rate of $1,400,000, and having brought up the expenditure to that amount, especially at the time the population had ceased to increase, the Government were enabled for the next six years, from 1888 to 1893, to keep the expenditure practically at a standstill. If it was possible to keep the expenditure at a standstill for the past six years, unless some good reason is shown to the contrary, this House must condemn the Government very severely for having increased the expenditure so very largely during the first nine years; and a Liberal Government entering power determined to carry out the principles of economy, would have a very easy task before it. I have occupied the time of the House at greater length than I had intended in discussing this question; I have not done so from a desire to occupy the time of the House, but because I felt it necessary to give very full and complete consideration to the proposals of the Finance Minister for the relief of the country. I feel satisfied from the communications I have had from that portion of Canada I represent, that any attempt made by the Government to meet the expressed desire of the people, following the attack made year after year from this side of the House, on the policy of the Government and the National Policy, which has promised to do so much for this country, whatever concessions have been made have been wrung from the Government by the Liberal party, the people of Winnipeg will feel quite justified in having for the first time departed from party allegiance and sent to this House a member of the Opposition, when they find the Government have to a limited extent listened to their appeals; but while that may be true, I am satisfied that the slight success the people have had in making their views felt on the Government, and on the members supporting it, will encourage them at the next general election, to support that party which does not pretend simply to reform the tariff in regard to a few items, but proposes to inaugurate a financial policy for Canada, not in the interest of a small section of the people, but in the interest of the great mass of the people, the agricultural community.

Mr. METCALFE. I thought the hon. members of this House were discussing a tariff for this Dominion, not one for Manitoba or any other particular province of Canada. The distinguished gentleman who has just addressed the House has shown himself to be a provincial politician and not one of the national order—a belfry politician, Mr. Speaker. He has been discussing questions for the last hour or more on a very narrow basis, and when the people come to consider his efforts and compare them with the former member from Winnipeg, I think the people of that city will come to the opinion that they made a great mistake in electing the hon. gentleman. Of course, Mr. Speaker, different minds view different sentiments in a different way, and the country may view these as correct sentiments, but I do not think the country is little enough to take such little ideas into its consideration as being favourable to the best interests of this Dominion. We expected to see a mighty man come here from Winnipeg, one cultured and refined, a man who was able to do such great deeds away up in that western country and make such a great stir in the heavy ozone there; one would expect, when he came down here to spread himself, that he would really tell us something that would benefit us. He did not do so. There was an old farmer up there somewhere near Owen Sound, a man that could double discount the member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) in common sense. That old man wrote a piece of poetry, and, of course, it is all nonsense, like the speech delivered by the hon. member.

Mr. LAURIER. Order.

Mr. METCALFE. I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon. I did not say anything about him but what is straight talk. I say there was no argument about his speech. It may be order or disorder, but I think it is disorder, if you call me to order, Mr. Speaker. I shall apologize to the member for Winnipeg, because I do not wish to offend him. Now, Mr. Speaker, would you kindly listen along with the other members of the House to this lovely piece of poetry written by this old farmer up at Owen Sound. He does not select his poetry, like the leader of the Opposition, from Shakespeare or Richard III; but he talks a good deal of nonsense all the same. I do not know the poetry off by heart, so I will have to read it. I expect before I am through that I will be able to quote some poetry that I have off by heart, as I do not want to be burdened with this bundle of papers here, because they are a sort of nuisance to me while making a little speech. This old man who wrote the poetry, does not believe in the tariff, and he thinks he should not be taxed either when he comes into the world or when he goes out of it. He takes exception to the tariff in various ways, and, so far as I am able to judge, he has better reason for the faith that is in him than has the hon. gentleman from Winnipeg (Mr. Martin). His name was Mossback. He wrote this poetry when he went home one night after hearing Sir John Thompson make a speech, and he says that neither his wife nor his children helped him.

I was once a well-off farmer; now, I'm worried and in debt,

I've got poor a-payin' taxes, but I have to pay 'em yet,

There's a tax on food and clothing, poor and scanty though they be;

But Sir John says, O! be thankful, for "ther' ain't no tax on tea!"

There's a mortgage on the homestead, an' the interest ain't all paid.

I've worked hard from early morning till the evening's dewy shade.

Wife an' me don't follow fashions, an' I don't get on a spree,

Yet I'm poor, although they tell me that "ther' ain't no tax on tea!"

In my house, there's no pianner, no rich carpets on the floor,

An' the tariff wouldn't let me me put a door-bell on the door,

That is like some of the complaints of the member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin).

An' my wife can't git a bunnet, that would be a luxuree,

But she says, "we must be thankful, for there ain't no tax on tea!"

I can't buy a bit o' cotton, but I have to pay a tax, An' they levy on my wood-pile, by a dooty on the axe;

An' the salt that's in my porridge isn't now admitted free,

But the Lord be thanked for one thing, that "ther' ain't no tax on tea!"

Once I tried to buy a picture; it was "lithographed," they said;

Twenty odd per cent o' dooty knocked that bargain in the head.

Had it been a great oil paintin' worth ten thousand, then, you see,

'Twould been "a work of art," they said, and been admitted free.

When I'm workin' on the back lot, I would often like to know

Jist how long 'twill be till sunset, or till dinner-horn will blow;

So I thought a watch I'd purchase, but the man spoke up, says he:

"Dooty's twenty-five on watches, but we get in diamonds free!"

Eight-tenths of a cent on sugar, twenty-five per cent on boots, Doesn't help my wheat or barley, or increase the price o' roots;

Dimonds will not cut my medder, though they may be nice to see,

An' my only crumbs o' comfort is, "ther' ain't no tax on tea!"

Everything a farmer uses, everything a farmer wears—

Hand-rake, cradle, scythe or pitchfork—each its load of dooty bears.

This is called "the poor man's tariff," for it keeps him poor, you see,

An' they tell him to be thankful that "ther' ain't no tax on tea!"

Once they told us that consumers didn't have the tax to pay;

That it made the things all cheaper, that it worked the other way;

An' I've thought the thing all over, an' I'm blessed if I can see,

If that's so, then, what's the reason that "ther' ain't no tax on tea!"

Wife an' I are gettin' feeble, soon we'll both be goin' where Taxes do not worrit people; "tariffs do not enter there;"

But they'll foller our poor spirits right into eternitee.

By a tax on shrouds an' coffins, to get even for the tea!

There is not much sense in that poetry, the House will see, but there is just as much sense in it as there is in the speech of the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin). That is a good piece of poetry—

Some hon. MEMBERS Hear, hear.

Mr. METCALFE. I am delighted that hon. gentlemen opposite are pleased and that they are able to laugh once in a while, because their faces have been gruesome enough lately. We all know that a certain amount of money has to be collected to provide for the administration of the affairs of this country, and the Government proposal is, to collect that money in a manner which will be in the best interests of the people at large. We believe that the tariff now proposed has been framed in the best interests of the people of the Dominion, and that it has not been framed for any special district or to help any particular province. It is a Canadian tariff, in the best interests of the people of all Canada. The hon. gentleman from Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) complained bitterly about that heavy tax which was imposed upon that prime necessity for the poor people, namely, bicycles. Now, any man who is able to buy a bicycle, ought to be able to pay a fair tax upon it. It is to a certain extent a luxury, and the object of the Government has been to tax luxuries and let free the necessities of life. The member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) tells us that the duty on bicycles is a heavy burden on the people; a statement which goes to prove that his arguments against the tariff are very weak indeed. The hon. gentleman complained about the increase of the duty on woollens, but, to my way of reading the tariff, it appears to me that the duty on woollens has been lowered.

Mr. MARTIN. Ask the Finance Minister.

Mr. METCALFE. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Martin) told us in one part of his speech that the tariff had better been left as it was, and then again he said that it was because the people of Winnipeg sent him down here that there were any tariff changes made. I do not believe that the hon. gentleman is such a great man as to cause the Government to alter the tariff. The intention of the Government was to do the best for all classes of the people; they have reformed the tariff in the interests of all classes, and they would have done so if the hon. gentleman never saw this House. I think the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) told us recently that in 1878 Sir John Macdonald was a free trader. That statement can hardly be correct, because I remember, as long ago as the early sixties, that the old flag on the windows of Sir John Macdonald's election committee rooms bore this inscription: "Protection to home manufactures and native industries," and "British connection." That was the policy of our late leader then, and his successors in office to-day have not changed in one whit. Is this Government not carrying out the policy of Sir John Macdonald, who, speaking in Toronto in 1872, said:

England has been a protectionist country for centuries, and it was only by carefully encouraging and creating a vast system of manufactures that she attained to such a protection that she could undersell and beat the world. She had then said that she would be a free trader, and coax all the other countries of the world to open their markets to her. She had been wise in that policy because by protecting her manufactures she had got ahead of the world, and could with perfect safety to herself proclaim the beauties of free trade. We did not, however, find other nations following the advice she so freely offered. They thought, as the present Government of Canada thought, that in the adjustment of their burdens it would be well to put duties upon imported goods and so frame their tariff that the duties would fall upon articles that could be profitably manufactured in the country. By adjusting the duties in this way the Government hoped that it would protect and build up in Canada manufactures like those that had been generated under a similar system of protection in the United States and long ago in England. They might set aside all the clap-trap questions that have been raised for the purpose of affecting the election contest. They who lived in the country and who had their own interests and the interests of their children to think of, should consider what was the best mode of developing the wealth of the country, how they could best stimulate the growth of large bodies of manufacturers and workmen, who, while supporting our own needs, would largely consume the produce of our farms and thus by giving home markets to both manufactures and agricultural products would make Canada independent of any foreign country. This was the question to be determined, how best to gain commercial independence, so that we should not be obliged to look at and be guided by the quotations and prices in Liverpool and London, but that we should have busy workshops where labour should be profitably employed, and where the results of a farmer's labour would find a market, and where the manufactures would give the agriculturists all the finished goods he needed in exchange for his wheat, his rye, his barley and his potatoes. That was the policy of the present Government, and that was the policy upon which he went to the country.

There has been no change in the policy of the Conservative party from that time till to-day. How different is the fidelity with which the Conservative leaders and the Conservative Ministry have clung to those principles, from the variegated policy which we have found among hon. gentlemen opposite. We have seen them take one policy one day and another policy another day, and we do not know where to find them at all. But I will return to criticise a few of the remarks made by the hon. gentleman from Winnipeg (Mr. Martin). He has told us that the growth of Manitoba and the North-west has been slow. If so, it is just because of the sentiments uttered by himself, the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), and other distinguished representatives of the Liberal party. Have they enunciated such sentiments as would lead men to go to the North-west to settle? Why, the hon. member for South

Mr. METCALFE.

Oxford's own coachman, while on the cars on his way out to Washington Territory, told me that he was going to a better country than Canada. I said, "How do you know it is?" He said, "That's what Sir Richard says." I said, "He doesn't know anything about it; you will be back again in Canada in two months." He did come back, and he told me that he was sorry that he had not done what I advised him, that was, to throw his ticket out of the window and go back to Canada. He is now at work at his old home in Kingston, and he has found out that the predictions of blue ruin made by Sir Richard were nothing but sounding brass and a tinkling cymbal, and that their only effect was to cost him the loss of his railway fare. These hon. gentlemen talk of the men who have left this country, because they have been told of the great wild and cold country in the North-west, and the attractiveness of the great republic. But many of the men who left us are glad to come back again, and many others remain only because they are not able to get back. We know that Canada is in a better condition to-day than the republic to the south. A short time ago I was over there, and I was talking in a store to a man about saddle and harness goods. He said to me, "You'll all be over here one of these days." "How do you know it," I asked him; "you have never been in Canada?" "No," he said, "but I know it from what I have read of the Mercier Club and the sentiments of Sir Richard Cartwright." I said, "There's not a man in five hundred who takes any stock in Mercier's sentiments or in Sir Richard Cartwright's sentiments, or who believes it would be better for him to come to this country." Would it not be better, Mr. Speaker, if these men would preach the doctrine that this is the greatest country on earth? Would it not be better for the hon. member for South Oxford, the leader of the Opposition, and the philosopher who sits beside him, to stand up in this House and on the public platforms of this country and teach the people, what the orators of the United States have taught the people there, that this is the greatest land that the sun shines upon? I tell you, Mr. Speaker, and the press and the country, that you will never have a country worth a cent, while you have such men as these Grit leaders at the head of affairs. While they are in opposition, they are bad enough. How much worse they would be if they were sitting in the seats of the members of the Government, preaching the same unfortunate doctrine. But I will give the hon. the leader of the Opposition, and the hon. member for South Oxford, three or four little phrases which I have committed to memory, if they will learn them; and, if they would go out and preach those to the people, they would give the people faith and hope. You are not worth a cent if you have not faith and hope. See what Moses did with hope; the walls of Jericho were blown down by faith and hope. The very time to succeed is when other people get tired. The Yankees are tired to-day. Though they may be stronger than us in numbers, their national life is not as pure, nor as progressive. If you want to see poverty, go to the Southern States. You will find men there who are saving themselves from starvation by stealing chickens. The hon. member for South Oxford might not see it; he would not want to see it. He would not see any of the tramps who are living in poverty in the States, but he would go right on until he got to Washington. We have here a Canadian nationality, fast rising into power and greatness and glory; and we are a portion, and a very significant portion, of that great empire, Great Britain, which to-day is not on the decline, as some people would say; but at no time in her history has she been so strong and powerful. I am one of those who believe, as the leader of the Liberal party in England believes, and he is the kind of leader to have, so far as national feeling goes. He could teach hon. gentlemen in the Opposition a lesson in regard to national sentiment, if they would look to him. We have in this Dominion the greatest country that the sun ever shone upon. You talk about its going back. Sir, it is not going back. It is on the contrary progressing steadily under the Conservative policy of protection and the wise administration of this Government. If the leader of the Opposition, instead of quoting from Shakespeare and giving us his own rendering of a little scene from a drama, would go right out to the country and preach the doctrine of hopefulness—if he would confess to the people candidly that he had been humming into their ears long enough that this country was not progressing and that he had now come to the conclusion that it was, although of course he believed it would progress much better if he were at the head of affairs, he would be filling a much more worthy role than he does at present. What we want in this country is a hopeful and not a despairing philosophy. We do not want hope in the next world, because we know that if we go to the right place there we will get a sure thing. But we want hope here and love of our country above everything else. We want loyal men who will stand up for her and never preach treason. If you wish to get a man who will preach loyalty, you would not seek out the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin), but you would select the right man for the right place, as our late Premier, Sir John Macdonald, had the happy gift of doing. We should be loyal first and last and all the time. And I tell you, Sir, that the men who have done the most good on this continent, or in England, or any portion of Europe are the men who have had the strongest loyalty in their hearts for their country—who felt they could achieve great things through the faith they had in the institutions of their country. I assure you, Sir, that if Canadian representative men are filled with strong, national sentiment and love for Canada, this country must prosper. The hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) told us, looking around and behind him, that there was nobody disloyal here, that no man in the Opposition ranks preached disloyalty. But the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin), when asked to deny if he had ever said that he would vote for annexation, replied that he might have said so, and most likely did. And if the hon. gentleman were in his place now, he would not deny that. But I hope the hon. gentleman is converted, and that in this Legislature, he will, at all times, manifest a better spirit so far as loyalty is concerned. We have no room in this country for annexationists. I believe that treason ranks on a par with some of the greatest evils described in the bible. We want to live under no alien flag. The flag we have is good enough. We want no flag but that which has shed so much glory and brightness, and greatness upon this beloved Dominion. If there is anything we ought to be proud of, it is that we have the protection of that great Empire, that we share in her glory, that her history is our history, and that we are a portion, and a very important portion, of the great Empire of Britain. No men should sound louder the praises of the British Empire than the men in that far-off western land, which some day must be the seat of Empire. Some will live to see that day, but many will not. In going through the land, no one can help seeing its great possibilities. The hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), says it is doubtful and enigmatic if our western country can successfully grow wheat. Sir, there is no land on the face of God's green earth better adapted for growing wheat than Manitoba and the North-west Territories. And it is an unfortunate thing for this Dominion that pamphlets are circulated throughout the length and breadth of the United States, setting forth the declarations of these gentlemen and arguing that it is doubtful whether this land can be successfully cultivated. I say this, that the North-west Territories and Manitoba are adapted for the growing of wheat and cattle, and for all the great elements of farm life, and that the people of that country have found that it is not enigmatic, but a certainty that wheat and barley and all the great cereals may be grown there, and that it is the best land for roots in the world. Sir, the country will prosper in spite of these pessimists. The country is prospering. It is unfortunate that the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin), should belittle the province in which he lives, should make any allusions that in the slightest degree belittle its resources and capabilities. I hope that the members of this House—every one of them—will at all times endeavour to do the best they can to hold up the interests of this Dominion, and not allow any one, on any occasion whatever, to speak in any way derogatory of the best interests of the country. I will just allude for a moment to something said about hats, caps and clothing. Senator Sandford at Chicago, in the World's Fair, had an exhibition of clothing and everything pertaining thereto; and it was said by excellent judges that that clothing must be improperly marked because it could not possibly be sold so low as it was marked. Yet it was marked at fair prices at which it is sold by the gentleman who brought it there. We are told that we have to pay so much taxes on these different commodities, yet we can get an article in this country much cheaper than it can be had for in the United States. I think it is very unfortunate to try and persuade the people that they are paying higher prices than they are. The people are not paying too high for any of their commodities. Clothing to the average man, is cheaper to-day in Canada, and of better quality than in the United States. Therefore I think we should endeavour to uphold this tariff and to do all that we are able to show the people that it is a fair one. While I agree with some things that have been said in some respects by gentlemen opposite, I cannot in any way agree with those who have made such an onslaught on the tariff. It has been carefully revised, all the items comprising it are being carefully considered, and it has been fairly and squarely submitted on its merits. Hon. gentlemen opposite, instead of striving to find so many holes in the tariff, should discuss it in a calmer and fairer spirit. The hon. member for Winnipeg has referred to the Hudson Bay Railway, and said that it was being improperly managed. Well, the first gentleman to recommend to the late Premier, Mr. Norquay, that $4,500,000 should be granted for twenty-five years at 4 per cent, was the present member for Winnipeg; and he is the last man on earth who ought to talk slightly of that, because he was the man who helped to place the promoter in his present unfortunate position, and gave him no chance to go to the markets of the world and get what he required to finish the road. The railway is required in Manitoba, and it ill-became the hon. member for Winnipeg to make any unkind allusion or reference to the gentleman who is promoting that railway. I do not wish to take up the time of this House to any great extent, but I would say this, in closing, of the leader of the Opposition—who is one of nature's gentlemen, as I told him long ago—that he struck the wrong line. He did not strike the right line, for if he had and moved in the right groove, and acted in concert with broadminded men, he would have accomplished a great deal more for his country than he can possibly hope to now. One of his friends told him he was a school-boy style of politician. I don't believe that man had him sized up right. He might have got in with that kind of people, but he has grown out of their class. I hope he looks at things in a brighter light. I hope he will get out of the rut of narrowness and of detraction of the people of Canada, and will remember that if he keeps looking so much at the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) while that hon. member looks so sour he will lose a lot of his smiles. My friend the leader of the Opposition is cut out by nature to do good work in this country. But the track he is travelling on is too heavy. He wants to get on a better footing so that he may be able to make a little better speed, so far as national progress is concerned. Sir, I wish he would only just whisper into the ear of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright)—as I would like to tell that hon. gentleman if he were in the House—I wish the hon. leader would only whisper through his friend's ear into his heart, if you can touch that portion of his make-up, something like this:

When things don't go to suit you
And the world seems upside down,
Don't waste your time in fretting
But drive away that frown;
Since life is oft perplexing,
'Tis much the wisest plan
To bear all trials bravely
And smile when e're you can.

That would be hard work for him. You would be pretty slick if you could get him to have a real good laugh. Then you could tell him this:

There must be something wanting,
And tho' you roll in wealth
You may miss from your casket
That precious jewel health.
And tho' you're strong and sturdy,
You may have an empty purse,
(And earth has many trials Which I consider worse).
But whether joy or sorrow
Fill up your mortal span,
'Twill make your pathway brighter
To smile when e'er you can.

Then, Mr. Speaker, let the hon. gentleman look good-natured, as he knows how to do, and get at him again. I will be sorry for him if he does not succeed—and the chances are four to one against him. He is playing no sure game when he comes to tackle that. Let him get straightened out once more for another lesson, and just say to him:

'Tis the coward who quits to misfortune;
'Tis the knave who changes each day;
'Tis the fool who wins half the battle,
Then throws all his chances away.
The time to succeed is when others,
Discouraged, show traces of tire;
For the battle is fought in the home-stretch;
And won twixt the flag and the wire.

He will understand that. But, even if you do not get him then, do not feel discouraged, but tackle him the third time. And then, I think, Mr. Speaker, he will have him pretty near right, and he will have done something for this country that will result in great good. He would not be able to make the people believe that this Government should be overthrown, but it would do good in this way, that we would not find in print these things that we now see against the best interests of this country. I hope, Mr. Speaker, that I have not tired you or the House. I hope that in the future we may go on and discuss matters pertaining to national affairs with hon. gentlemen opposite, that they will not be so pessimistic, not go on running down this country, not setting one portion of the country against another, not preaching one doctrine in one end of the country and another at another, but that they will preach the same doctrine everywhere and that doctrine: Canada the greatest country in the world; no annexation. Talk about waiting for the Americans before we make our tariff. They have not framed their tariff yet. The man who did propose a tariff for them is sick, and when he gets well he won't know his own Bill, so lacerated and torn will it be. As it is now it is neither fish, flesh, fowl nor good red herring. They do not know to-day what their tariff is to be. But this Government comes down in manly fashion and frames a tariff, and are ready to go to the people on that tariff. When they go before the electors they do not want to preach a hybrid doctrine of protection in this and free trade in that; but they will go to the country prepared to do battle fairly and squarely with hon. gentlemen opposite on every platform in the country. If the hon. leader of the Opposition comes to the Limestone City, where I live, or wherever he goes, he will find the Conservative members preaching the same doctrine, not one doctrine in Manitoba and another in Nova Scotia and another in Ontario. He will not find supporters of the Conservative policy setting class against class, or creed against creed. We all stand on the broad platform of our nationality. No man is a better Protestant on account of a declaration that his Protestantism is better than another man's Catholicism. All men ought to stand up in this country in support of brains and power and ability, and with a desire to advance the national life of our country. This Canada of ours is young, and we have many dangers to meet, and none greater than that arising from proscribing a man because of his creed or his class. Whether a man be a Jew, or Greek, or Gentile, Protestant or Catholic, if he is a good Canadian that is the man we want. Any man is good enough for me who is a good Canadian, the man who will stand up for Canada all the time preaching the doctrine of fairness and justice to all. We will never be able to advance the interests of this Canada of ours in any other way than by uniting firmly in support of our institutions. It is a grand thing for this country, after all the boasted glory and richness of the United States, to see that our credit in the markets of the world is better than the credit of the great republic to the south. And, not only that, but the people of the United States say that they are glad to think that their neighbours to the north set them a pattern, and that we in the north here possess a constitution of which any nation ought to be proud. And what man did more to support and advance this country and make it progressive than our late lamented chieftain, Sir John Macdonald? He was the Washington of Canada. He was reviled by the Grits; I have heard him called all the names they could think of. In the city in which I live, and which I represent, I have heard the most unkind things said of that great statesman by men who must now reverence his memory. They reviled him when he was alive, but they are now willing to say that they were wrong, that he was the Washington of Canada, that he was the first great, progressive statesman this country ever saw. He foresaw 30 or 40 years ago the history of this country, as we now know it to be. He said that the institutions of the United States were unfortunate, and that their social affairs and class relations would be in such a mix as to bring disaster and calamity upon that great republic. Have his prophetic words not been accomplished? Is it not being enacted there to-day? Why do we want to talk about reciprocity with these people in a way that would involve our having the same laws as they have got? Let me read to those hon. gentlemen a quotation from a celebrated man whom they are never weary of praising, Erastus Wiman:

In the splendour of her cities, in the magnitude of her public works, in the perfection of her means of communication, in the completeness of her educational institutions, in the intelligence of her people, and indeed in all that goes to make up a nation, Canada to-day occupies a position of proud pre-eminence.

Then they tell us we are going back; they tell us that we are not progressing. Sir, we are progressing, and English statesmen know we are progressing. What country in the world is more progressive than Canada? I would ask hon. gentlemen opposite, what distinguished statesmen have they among them who if the national ship was in disaster, could save her from going on the rocks and being dashed to pieces? Where is the saviour of his country who could come from the ranks of the Opposition and show transcendent statesmanship? Why, to take one of them would be like putting a man to drive a 2·10 horse who never drove anything but a 4-minute one. Let us cultivate a spirit of loyalty to Canadian institutions and British institutions, and sing God Save the Queen in the new verse, which says:

Far o'er the royal main Echoes the loyal strain,
God Save the Queen.

One great united band ;
Pray we through't every land,
God guard our empire grand,
God Save the Queen.

Mr. EDGAR. I have tried to give close attention to the discursive and rather gushing speech of the hon. gentleman who has just sat down ; but I really was not able to find any particular points in his oratory which I thought would require special answer. It did strike me that the part of his speech which was of most interest was the quotation with which he began, that admirable set of verses by his friend from Owen Sound, Farmer Mossbank, who said that the best thing he was told by the leader of the Government was that there was no tax on tea. Now, I wish the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Metcalfe) would immediately write a letter to Farmer Mossbank, and tell him that the Finance Minister has destroyed that last refuge of the hope of the farmer, because there is to be a tax on tea. Nearly every speaker on the other side has challenged us on this side to take hold of some detail, some particular fact in this new tariff, and to make our objection to it. The Finance Minister, in the first half of his speech, devoted his whole attention to advocating the principles of protection, and by doing so he challenged a discussion of the principles of protection and free trade by the House. That discussion has gone on for some days, and has been remarkable well sustained, and to-night we had the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) going somewhat into the details of this tariff. Now, to-night I also wish to leave entirely alone the question of the principles of trade, and take up some items in this tariff in connection with one branch only. There is no tax that is levied upon the people of Canada to-day which, I think, takes more money out of them, directly or indirectly, than the tax on cotton goods. Perhaps I naturally felt a little curiosity to see how cotton goods would be dealt with in the new tariff, because there are cotton goods to the value of $17,000,000 or $18,000,000 paying duty directly or indirectly. On $4,500,000 worth, the amount imported, a direct tax is paid, which goes into the revenue, and on the balance of $13,000,000 or so of goods manufactured by the cotton mills in the country, the protective system under which we have been taxed has made us, and will continue to make us, pay an enormous tax quite equal to the rate of taxation which we pay on imported goods. Now, another reason why it is of great interest to the public that they should see what the taxation is to be on cottons, is that it is perfectly well known to everybody in this House, it is perfectly well known to the Government, that the whole cotton trade of this country is in the hands of a vast combine ; a vast combine has that whole trade in its hands, has the country at its mercy, as long as the Government chooses to put in the hands of that cotton combine the right to tax the people of this country. As is perfectly well known, and not disputed, it has absorbed 88 per cent of all the cotton mills in the country ; in most lines it controls the whole production, there are only three or four small mills outside of it. As an illustration—although I have given it before, I will repeat it—of the power of that combine, and the absolute control it exerts over this trade, I will just mention how the Dominion Cotton Company, one of the combines which control eleven mills of the country, took advantage of the position in which they have been, and in which they still remain, to make enormous, excessive and unreasonable profits by way of watering the stock of their company. In September, 1892, the Dominion Cotton Company had a capital of $1,500,000. They decided to double that capital, and they made it $3,000,000. What was the other $1,500,000 required for ? Was it required for money ? Was the stock to be sold to provide money for the development of that trade ? No, Sir, not at all. They knew that they were in a position to make vastly larger dividends than they would like to show. They knew that by creating watered stock they could double their investment by a stroke of the pen, and of that $1,500,000 of new stock which they took power to issue, they issued all. But how ? They issued it to themselves. They only paid 10 per cent additional money for each one of the shares of that $1,500,000 of new capital. That $1,500,000 of stock, which they watered, represented a net clear profit of $1,350,000 on the original $1,500,000. They only paid in cash $150,000, and received stock certificates for $1,500,000 as fully paid up stock on which there is no further liability. Perhaps it may be said that that is a private transaction. If any manufacturing or business concern were expending its own capital in fair competition and making 20 or 100 per cent dividend, I would rejoice at it, but this company was not able to do that by fair competition ; it was levying its tribute under the authority of the legislation of this House, upon all men, women and children of this country, it was levying it every day of their lives, from the cradle to the grave, as the last speaker said, and it was levying an unreasonable tax. Will it be said that, perhaps, when they watered the stock, they made a mistake and miscalculated their power to extort money from Canada ? No ; they did not miscalculate. I have here a synopsis of the report of this same Dominion Cotton Company after they had watered their stock, and it shows how the company was progressing. It shows that they made no mistake, that they knew how they were taking out of the people of this country $1,350,000, which was an exceedingly profitable investment. On April 14th, 1893, a report was given of the annual meeting of the Dominion Cotton Company, held the day before in Montreal, the report being published in the 'Montreal Star.' The president read the annual report. It referred to the improvements in the company's property during the year; it stated that the earnings for the year were about 20 per cent on a capital of $3,000,000. Out of this were paid the dividends. Mr. Gault said that although it cost lots of money, the company were bound to keep its eleven mills in perfect order. The president said they were paying 20 per cent on a capital of $3,000,000. But on the last $1,500,000, the shareholders had only paid up 10 per cent, or only $150,000, and 20 per cent on $1,500,000 represented exactly 200 per cent on all the money they had paid in. So, according to their own statement, the company earned a dividend of 200 per cent on the $150,000, which they paid in to buy $1,500,000 of stock. When that state of things exists, the country have an undoubted right to know whether the Government are going to allow the people to be taxed to support combines of that kind. I have several times proved to this House that at least $13,000,000 of cottons are manufactured by the companies, and the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague) was good enough last session to supply me with the exact working expenses of all the mills, which he placed at some $8,000,000, leaving a margin for profit, as regards the selling price of $5,000,000. Supposing, however, there was not such a large profit; supposing the cost was too much to enable them to obtain that profit on their cotton goods, I desire to show how they get another profit. Remember, Mr. Speaker, the duty paid by the importers last year on all cotton goods brought into this country was a trifle over 28 per cent. Supposing there was no other profit on the $13,000,000 than that of the 28 per cent paid by the actual importers, who paid it in addition to freight and profits paid to English manufacturers of cotton goods, that would make a sum of $3,640,000 paid by the people to the combine under the protection given by the tariff. Then, again, I should like to draw attention to this fact, that the raw material of the cotton factory, the raw cotton, fell very much in price between 1890 and 1893. The price in 1890 was ten cents and two mills; in 1893 it was eight cents and six mills; it was cheaper by one cent and six mills, which on the enormous quantity imported, amounted alone to a profit of $660,000. Was that reduction in the duty on the raw material counterbalanced in any way? Were the wages of the operatives raised? No, the wages were not raised, but the dividends and the reserve funds set apart by the companies were raised. Were the prices lowered to the consumer? No; the prices were not lowered to the consumer, but the prices were raised 10 per cent and 25 per cent during those three years. Besides, the evils of the taxation that is levied on the people as the result of this combine, it also acts as an odious tyranny on the wholesale trade in the country. Every wholesale man will have to admit that he is in the hands of the combine and at their mercy in many ways, and the merchants will continue to be in the hands of the combine so long as the Government chooses to compel the people to pay this tax and prevent more freedom of importation from other countries in order to cut down the monopoly. Is it to be supposed that Canadians cannot manufacture cotton goods here as cheaply as in other countries, with all our capital invested in such establishments, with raw material quite as near to us as it is to England, with all the water power of this country, and with all the advantages of cheap labour? This is not a matter of supposition, it is a matter of positive proof from the parliamentary blue books, that Canada manufactures cotton, and can manufacture cotton goods just as cheaply as they do in Great Britain, or any other part of the world. Why, Sir, the proof of that is in this: That last year the Canadian cotton mills exported and sold in competition with all the world $371,000 worth of cotton goods. They sent to the heathen Chinese over a quarter of a million dollars worth of goods last year, and they competed in that far eastern market with England and with the United States. Yet, Sir, we are told that they cannot compete with England and the United States in their own home market. Our cotton manufacturers can sell to the Chinese a quarter million dollars worth of goods at English prices, but, under the tariff arrangement of my hon. friend opposite, they must tax Canadians $3,500,000 a year on the goods they sell them. Another portion of this same speech reported in the 'Star,' made by the president of the Dominion Cotton Mills, deals with this point. Mr. Gault is reported to have continued to say:

The most modern machinery is employed, and even if the Government should come back to the tariff which was in force during the Mackenzie regime, the company would be in a position to compete with the whole world, not even excepting England.

It did not require Mr. Gault to tell us that, because all the circumstances which I have already mentioned show that it is so, and that it must be so. That being the position of the cotton combine and the cotton trade in this country, let us see for a moment what the Government has done about it. I have gone through the new tariff and compared it as well as I could with two other standards. I have compared it first with all the importations made during last year under the different items of cotton goods.

Mr. KENNY. Would my hon. friend excuse me a moment. Has not the accuracy of the report of that speech to which he refers been denied by Mr. Gault himself?

Mr. EDGAR. I have not seen that it was. I was told so, and I looked through a number of papers to see if there was any denial of it, but I could not find any such denial. If it were denied at all, I do not know what particular part of it was denied. I surely do not imagine that he denied the 'Star' report about 20 per cent being declared as a dividend on the stock; and that to my mind is by far the most important part of his speech. Whether Mr. Gault said that Mr. Mackenzie's tariff of 17½ per cent would suit the cotton people or not, I do not know; but I am perfectly sure that when they could compete with England in the Chinese market without the 17½ per cent, or any protection at all, the country must perfectly well understand that Mr. Mackenzie's tariff would suit them admirably. Whether or not Mr. Gault denied what the 'Star' reporter said, I do not think it makes much difference. As I was saying, to try and arrive at what the results of these changes in the tariff are I compared them with two standards. I first took the imports of cotton goods last year, and I carried out the amount of the percentages of duty paid on each article; some were ad valorem, and there was not much difficulty about that, as I did not have to calculate the percentage; some were specific and ad valorem, and in order to find out what equivalent in ad valorem duty was paid, I found out how much duty was paid on the value of the goods according to the returns, and I converted it into ad valorem percentages in all cases, in order to make comparisons. That was one way. Then all the corresponding items in the old tariff that I could find I compared in that way with the new tariff. Then there were some cases in which there were no importations under the classification of the new tariff, and I compared these with the items in the old tariff. The Minister of Finance will observe, that when he himself, at the time he made his Budget speech, could not undertake to give us even an estimate of the charges, it must have taken a good deal of trouble to work out these figures, especially as the Minister of Finance has changed the names of the classification of a considerable number of articles. However, these are the results that I make out. Let us first briefly look at the items which are unchanged. I find amongst the unchanged items, cordage, cotton and unbraided cords, 30 per cent; sewing thread on spools, 25 per cent, unchanged; uncoloured cotton fabrics, unchanged; crapes, 20 per cent, unchanged; webbing, which is 20 per cent in the new tariff, must come in, I think, under the n.e.s. section of the old tariff, because I cannot find it anywhere else; that is unchanged.

Mr. FOSTER. It was 25 per cent before.

Mr. EDGAR. I make it out 20 per cent; that is not much difference. Jeans and coutils imported by corset and dress stay-makers, 25 per cent, unchanged. Curtains,

Mr EDGAR.

30 per cent before and 30 per cent now. Binding twine, 12½ per cent under the old tariff, and it is 12½ per cent under the new.

Mr. FOSTER. Binding twine is not a cotton.

Mr. EDGAR. Very well, it is not changed anyway. Now, let us see where the decreases are that have been made by the Minister of Finance. On unbleached sheetings, drills, ducks, &c., not stained, painted or printed, there was a specific duty of 1 cent per square yard and 15 per cent ad valorem under the former tariff, which, according to the importations, was 24 per cent, and that now is to be 22½ per cent. There is a reduction there of 1½ per cent, which is not a very great deal.

Mr. WALLACE. What did you say it was last year?

Mr. EDGAR. I did not say what the total was last year. I say the percentage on the importations amounted to 24 per cent.

Mr. WALLACE. That is what you say now, but last year you said it came to 50 per cent.

Mr. EDGAR. On unbleached sheetings and drills.

Mr. WALLACE. Yes.

Mr. EDGAR. No, I do not think I said anything about that last year. I have no recollection of it, and I am almost sure I said nothing about it. I only gave three special items last year, and that was not one of them.

Mr. WALLACE. It was under that item.

Mr. EDGAR. I am quite willing the hon. gentleman should interrupt me, but I made no suggestion about that last year. At any rate, I am quite prepared to stand by everything I said last year. We have here 24 per cent as the old rate and 22½ as the new rate. Gingham, plaids, dyed or coloured, were 2 cents per square yard and 15 per cent ad valorem, which produced on the importations 34 per cent. That is now down to 30 per cent. Flannellettes, ducks and drills, dyed and coloured cottonades, and so on, 2 cents per square yard and 15 per cent ad valorem, produced 31 per cent, and they are now reduced to 30 per cent. Printed or dyed fabrics, not elsewhere specified, which were 32½ per cent under the old tariff, are now 30 per cent. Clothing was 35 per cent; now it is 32½ per cent. Socks and stockings were 10 cents per pound and 30 per cent; on the importations they amounted to 42 per cent; they have been reduced to 35 per cent. I am perfectly prepared to admit that the abolition of the specific duty on socks and stockings made a substantial reduction in those glaring cases which I quoted last session to the House; but the average reduction is only from 42 to 35 per cent. Shirts were $1 a dozen and 30 per cent ad valorem, and on the importations that amounted to 47 per cent, while the new duties are these: On shirts costing less than $3 per dozen, 25 per cent, and on those over $3 per dozen, $1 per dozen and 25 per cent. The effect of that is that on those costing less than $3 per dozen there is a reduction to 25 per cent, but on shirts costing $4 per dozen, if the Controller of Customs will figure it out, he will find that there is still a duty of 50 per cent; so that I hope the hon. gentleman will not boast on the reduction on that particular item. On cottonades, I admitted that on the general classification there was a reduction from 31 to 30 per cent; but, taken by themselves, on cottonades costing 10, 12 and 15 cents per yard of 27 inches wide, the old duty would be 13, 15·30 and 18·75 cents per yard; while the new duty is 13, 15·60 and 19·50 cents per yard. So that in the large class of cottonades the reduction is entirely illusory. There are some decreases in items in which there were no importations last year, for instance, collars. The old duty was 24 cents per thousand and 30 per cent ad valorem; it is now 24 cents per thousand and 25 per cent ad valorem. I wonder if the Government are proud of that, because ladies' collars, which are now imported, costing only 24 cents per thousand, pay a duty of 125 per cent under the new tariff, whereas they paid 130 per cent before. I hope the hon. gentleman is proud of that reduction.

Mr. WALLACE. There is no such price, though.

Mr. EDGAR. I find from those engaged in the trade that there is. On lampwick there is the magnificent reduction from 30 per cent to 25 per cent. These are the reductions. Now, let us see if there have been any increases. You will be surprised to learn that in this great tariff reform there are such things as increases in the cotton duties, and I am afraid that truth compels us to refer to some of them. On cordage of all kinds, not elsewhere specified, the old rate was 1¼ cents per pound and 10 per cent ad valorem, which, on the importations of last year, was equivalent to 23 per cent. That they have raised to 30 per cent by the new tariff. On bleached sheetings, drills and ducks, etc., not stained, painted or printed, the duty was one cent per square yard and 15 per cent ad valorem, making on the importations of last year 24 per cent; that they have raised to 25 per cent. On sewing thread in hanks, the duty was 12½ per cent; they have made it 15 per cent. On other sewing threads the duty was 20 per cent; it is now 25 per cent.

Mr. WALLACE. Will the hon. gentleman permit me to tell him that he is all wrong?

Mr. EDGAR. I have no doubt my hon. friend would not say that if he did not believe it; but let me say that he is all wrong and that I am all right.

Mr. WALLACE. Cotton thread was 25 per cent, and it remains at 25 per cent. If the hon. gentleman says differently, he is deliberately misleading the House

Mr. EDGAR. I am sorry the hon. gentleman judges others by himself. I would not deliberately mislead the House, and I would be very sorry to think that anybody but the Controller would.

Mr. WALLACE. Will the hon. gentleman permit me to read the item?

Mr. EDGAR. I will not, because there are several items of sewing thread, and the hon. gentleman might read the wrong one.

Mr. WALLACE. There are only three items; one is on hanks, 12½ per cent; one on spools, 25 per cent; and elastic rubber thread, which is free.

Mr. EDGAR. My hon. friend will find that there are several items, and he will find that I am right; at any rate I will stick to it until I find out myself that I am wrong. On coloured fabrics, woven in whole or in part, or dyed or coloured, the duty was 25 per cent; it is now 30 per cent. Velvetens, cotton velvets and cotton plush, the poor man's velvet were 20 per cent; now they are put up to 30 per cent, the same rate as the silk velvets of the rich man. All other manufactures of cotton, not elsewhere specified, were 20 per cent; now they are 32½. That is not the worst of it: they are hidden away in another item, and I will show the hon. gentleman where they are hidden away. I will show the hon. gentleman where they are hidden away, and I do not believe the Minister of Finance would be a party to misleading the public, as this tariff does on the face of it, in that way. I am sure that he has been misled by the gentlemen who have made this tariff—the members of the cotton combine—who, I am sure, instigated it. He has been humbugged, and I will leave it to the House and the country to say whether he has or not been, when I read the particulars. In the old tariff, the item of all other manufactures of cotton, not elsewhere specified, is 20 per cent. I wonder if the hon. gentleman denies that there is no such item in the new tariff. But how is it covered up and hidden. Why, as I told you a little while before, cotton clothing that was 35 per cent has been reduced to 32½. But let me read you the item. Cotton clothing, and other manufactures of cotton not elsewhere specified, 32½ per cent. So, in that item, while they have taken 2½ per cent off cotton clothing, they have raised from 20 to 32½ per cent all other manufactures of cotton not elsewhere specified. And the worst of it is that in the new tariff there are a great many more articles not elsewhere specified than in the old. Whereas, in the old, forty-five different articles of cotton are specified for taxation, not one-half as many as specified in the new. I will call upon the Minister of Finance—and not upon the Controller of Customs (Mr. Wallace), because he had nothing to say in the matter—to take that item, “other manufactures of cotton not elsewhere specified” out of this class and put it down to its old 20 per cent at least. Then there are one or two more increases. Handkerchiefs, which were 25 per cent, are now 30 per cent; sewing thread in hanks, which was 12½ per cent, is now 15. Now, Sir, I do not believe that I am wrong in saying that this tariff is better for the combine than the old one, and that the new taxes placed upon the largest single class of articles taxed in this country, cotton goods, are a decided and distinct increase. Is that tariff reform? Is that what the Government have been boasting of?—keeping up high tariffs and concealing items, as I have shown, and where they pretend to make reductions, really making enormous increases. The proposed reform is absolutely illusory. Supposing my figures are all wrong, supposing I know nothing about it, supposing I had not made my calculations aright—

Mr. WALLACE. Hear, hear.

Mr. EDGAR. The Controller of Customs says, “Hear, hear.” He supposes all that, but I think there is something I can give him better than any figures I can offer to this House. I will tell you what that is. What do the cotton combine men think of it themselves? I do not have to go back to a quotation of the ‘Montreal Star’ of a year ago to show they were paying 20 per cent dividends, but I go to the Montreal Stock Exchange to-day, and I ask whether cotton stocks were very much depressed when this terrible reduction came out in the tariff. No; the cotton men knew all about it. They understood the inner working of this tariff reform. And how has it worked on the stock market? On the 27th March, the morning of the day on which the Finance Minister announced these reductions in the tariff, buyers were offering 118½ for the stock of the Montreal Cotton Company. On the 6th April, the shares of the Montreal Cotton Company were sold at 132—an increase of 13½ per cent since the announcement of this tariff, which was to reduce and bring down the profits of this combine. I hope the Controller will be satisfied now that the reductions have been very much in the interests of the consumer. Take our old friend, the Dominion Cotton Company, about which I was speaking a little while ago, whose stock was watered $1,350,000 two years ago, and which paid a dividend last year on the money paid into that watered stock of 200 per cent, as I have shown. Did that watered stock tumble down below par at the announcement of these tremendous reductions? No; on the 27th March, in the morning, it was

Mr. EDGAR.

115, and on the 6th April it was 122½—a jump of 7½ per cent, even on that water, absolutely undiluted water. I say it is a disgrace for the Government to come down before Parliament and pretend that this tariff Act is a measure of reform. There is no use arguing about it. I do not believe that the ingenuity of the Minister of Finance can find enough clerical errors in it to put it right before the people. I think he may well withdraw altogether this farce of a reduction. Let him stick to the first half of his Budget speech, and to maintain the old flag of protection, as the member for Kingston (Mr. Metcalfe) just now was picturing it, and not come down and try to throw dust in the eyes of the consumers and make them believe the taxation is reduced, when such is not the case. I have heard the answer made, and we will hear it probably again, in favour of retaining these cotton taxes, such as they are, that in past years, cotton goods were dearer in Canada than they are to-day. Sir, I admit that. But are Canadians not to have any benefit whatever from the vast improvements in machinery and the cheaper raw material? Of course, cotton goods are cheaper than they were, but it is not with what they were a few years ago that we are to compare them. I want to compare them with what they are to-day in England, and even the United States. Why, if they are as cheap here as they are in England, our importers must be born idiots when they went to England last year and bought $4,500,000 worth, and paid the freight and 28 per cent duty. Why, Sir, it is silly to talk about their being as cheap here as they ought to be. And the Minister of Finance told us the other day—somebody had humbugged him there, too—of the great excellence of Canadian cotton. He tore a piece of Canadian cotton in two, and it was beautiful, it did not dirty his sleeves. But when he tore a piece of the foreign cotton—no doubt English—it dirtied the sleeves of his coat and was a much inferior article to our Canadian cotton. What idiots our importers must have been to buy this inferior trash and pay the full English price for it, and all the freights and 28 per cent duty, when they could get such beautiful cotton at their own doors, and such cheap cotton, too. There is no sense in using that sort of argument to throw dust in the eyes of the people. I say, Sir, that whatever decreases have been made in the tariff have been more than counterbalanced by the increases that have been made. I say that the result of this tariff is simply and solely to entrench the vast cotton combine more strongly than ever in their old citadel, from which they can tyrannize over the trade of this country, and continue to extort their excessive profits from every man, woman and child in Canada.

Mr. McDONALD (Assiniboia). Mr. Speaker, I beg of this House to listen for a few minutes to my explanation of the vote which I shall give upon the amendment that has been submitted to the proposition brought down by the Finance Minister. This debate has been called in the press, and in this House, and by the people, the tariff debate. But, up to date, I have failed to hear anything about the tariff. Hon. gentlemen have been threshing out the old issues of former days. I hold, Mr. Speaker, that this is not a fair way to treat the members of this House and the country. The Finance Minister has brought down a proposition to reform the tariff. The hon. gentlemen on the opposite side do not point out wherein this tariff can be improved; they simply say: It is no good and if we were in power, we would bring down another tariff, a tariff that would make all the people of this country rich, that would improve the prices of farm products and the price of farm property. Well, Mr. Speaker, I am a farmer and I have waited here day after day for the last ten or twelve days to find out what this policy was. If the hon. gentlemen who occupies the Opposition benches have a policy that will improve the prices of my products, I ask them, in God's name, to trot it out now, so that we, the members of this House, and the people of this country may be able to see in what way our property can be improved. But up to this time they have failed to state wherein the Government's policy was a failure, and they have failed to show wherein their policy would improve the property of any farmer in this country. Last session and this session I have seen enough crocodile tears wasted on behalf of the poor farmer to float the Great Eastern. I ask the hon. leader of the Opposition to put forth his policy, to lay it side by side with the policy of the Finance Minister, so that I and every fairly intelligent farmer, and every intelligent manufacturer in this country may decide between the two policies. I am not so wedded to the Conservative party but that, if the Opposition bring down a policy which they can show will improve my property and increase the price of my products, I will be glad to support their policy. But, so far, I have heard nothing of that kind. I have heard nothing but this insane resolution brought down by the hon. member for South Oxford. I have read that resolution downwards, upwards and between the lines, and I do not see in it anything that will increase the value of the poor farmer's products, or of the poor farmer's lands. But the hon. gentleman in his speech struck one point upon which I can heartily agree with him, and, if the House will bear with me I will read that portion of the speech:

Recollect that the people of Canada, though they have in other directions important advantages, are handicapped in many ways. There is a long and costly transport intervening between us and the English market; our climate in some important respects makes farming to-day, and makes living here, more expensive than it is in England. In my judgment, human labour will always be pretty dear here, and I do not know that I regret it. I do not want to see my countrymen brought down to the level of a man, woman and half a dozen children living for eight or nine shillings sterling per week. I am glad, therefore, that labour is dear here, and likely to be dear.

Mr. Speaker, I agree with the hon. member for South Oxford, and I feel that if I were willing to support the policy, which hon. members of the Opposition have propounded here, I should be helping toward the time when my fellow-countrymen, working in manufactories or in fields, would be reduced to the position of supporting themselves and their wives and children on some such paltry pittance as eight or nine shillings a week. I do not want to see that, and so far I agree with the hon. member for South Oxford. There is one other point in the speech of the hon. member which I will take up. I know the hon. member has been looking for the last fifteen years longingly at the Treasury benches, and I believe that as ex-Finance Minister of this country he has worked his mind up to the contemplation of such mighty sums that he has come to the conclusion that the people of this country have been robbed of the enormous sum of one thousand millions of dollars. Well, Mr. Speaker, if there is any set of men in this country that have got in their pants pockets, or in their vaults this enormous sum, let us find it out. He goes on and tells us in his speech of a small number of men who have made this thousands of millions. He says: The cotton, glass, rope, cordage, sugar and woollen manufactures are the people who have taken this thousand millions of dollars. And they only employ 23,677 hands. Well, I have looked into this matter that there are only 100 men in control of the industries mentioned, but for the sake of argument let us call it 200 men—we must not stand on the question of 100 men when we are talking on a question of such an enormous sum as 1,000 millions of dollars. That would be five millions of dollars apiece. Why, Sir, is it a fact that in this Canada of ours we have 200 men, who, together are worth 1,000 millions of dollars? $5,000,000 apiece. Sir, before I came to this House I had no idea this Canada of ours had 200 men that were each worth five millions of dollars. Why, take the richest country in the world, England, along with the great United States, that has some of the richest men in the world, and I venture to say that both England and the United States, with all their great population, cannot produce 200 men who own, and control, and have stuffed down in their pockets, the magnificent sum of 1,000 million dollars. If it is a fact, and coming from the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), a gentleman who has been so long known to the people of Canada, it should be a fact, I would say to our Minister of War: Trot out your battalions and immediately bring these men forward, and let us see what we can do with this magnificent sum of 1,000 million dollars. A 1,000 million dollars would pay the national debt and leave 750 millions. Or we would say to these gentlemen: You have robbed the poor people of this country of this great sum, and now we want you to give us 2 per cent of that money per annum. That would give us 20 million dollars a year, and with that sum the Minister of Finance would not need to come down with any new scheme to raise a revenue. It would not rob these gentlemen to take 2 per cent from them, it would not take one loaf of bread from them. They would be able to pay the cotton tax, and the woollen tax, and the flour tax, under which the people of this country are labouring, according to the Opposition. The next gentleman who discussed this tariff, was, I believe, the third in command, the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton). This gentleman fought very valiantly, and he also went into figures to show the extravagance of the Government. He told us that we had gone beyond our means, he told us that we had built public works and railways and canals for a people of fifteen millions. Well, Sir, we did that, and we only increased the taxation $1.45 per head. As we have only five millions to-day, we could rest upon our oars for a number of years to come. Instead of accusing the Government of squandering money when they went so far in advance of the wants of the people as to build public works, build canals, and build railroads fit for a people of fifteen millions. I think this country should be proud of the fact that we have gone so far beyond the actual wants of the people and that we have to-day public works equal to the needs of fifteen millions. This hon. gentleman asked:

For what purpose did we spend that money on this system of canals? Perhaps they were necessary.

Only "perhaps." We people in the North-west don't like this perhaps principle. We raise wheat, we raise pork, we raise various products, and we want to get them out of that country as cheaply as possible by the enlargement of our canals and other means of communication. We hope to succeed, and I myself have no doubt that we will succeed in the near future in getting our products to market at the lowest price. This hon. gentleman from North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) failed upon the same essential point that the member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) did. He failed to tell us wherein he could improve this tariff, in what position he would place it. But he said, if you would only put us in power we will do it. I will ask this House. I will ask this country, I will ask any farmer, any manufacturer, any merchant in this country, what answer he would make to a man who came along to him and said: You don't understand your business; you do not run this business right. If you will entrust me with your business, if you will entrust me with your capital, I will make more money for you. You ask: How will you do it? Oh, you never mind, you just let me run this business for you, and I will make you rich. That is precisely the position of the hon. gentlemen who occupy the Opposition benches. They say to the people of this country, Put us on the Treasury benches and we will propound a policy that will make the farmer, the manufacturer, the merchant, the artisan, all rich. When you ask them the simple question, How will you do it? They say: Never you mind, entrust us with your capital, entrust us with your finances and we will do it. Well, Mr. Speaker, I candidly believe to-day that if these men continue in that line it will be many a day before the people of Canada will be foolish enough to trust them until they take the people into their confidence and tell them how they are going to do it. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) went on and said:

We have been expending money by bucketfuls, by millions, in connection with the Canadian Pacific Railway, while we could have adopted a scheme that would have given us that railway for half the cost incurred.

Well, I wonder if that hon. gentleman thinks that the people of fifteen years ago are all dead. I wonder if he thinks that kind of talk will go down with the members of this House, or with the people of the country. For half the cost? Well, let us see. They once had an opportunity of building the Canadian Pacific Railway. Did they build it? No. Did they offer more money than it took to build it? Yes, they did. The Hon. Alexander Mackenzie offered thirty millions of money and fifty million acres of land. He guaranteed the interest on the money needed for the construction, on 2,900 miles; guaranteed the interest to the amount of $4,000 per mile for twenty years, and failed in getting a company to build it. What was the next great offer he made? If my memory serves me aright, I think they once brought down a motion proposing to spend one million dollars per annum to build the Canadian Pacific Railway. The next great scheme they adopted was these magnificent water stretches. I ask the Minister of Finance, I ask the First Minister to-day one favour for myself. In going up over the Canadian Pacific Railway I saw on one of the rivers three boats which had been manned by the sailors of the Opposition when they sailed up into the North-west. There, is a monument erected on this hill to the late Sir George E. Cartier; I believe there is going to be another monument erected to our great chief, the late Right Hon. Sir John A. Macdonald. I ask the Government to set aside a sum of money to bring the remnants of these three boats down here, and I would like to have them painted with the words,

"Mackenzie's Folly," for the people of Canada to see. Sir, I have been surprised to think that a gentleman who has talent and ability would talk such chaff to this House. What did they do for that great work? They did little, they bought a few steel rails, they built the Neebing Hotel, and the St. Francis Locks. But when this Government took hold of that work, when the late Sir John A. Macdonald went to England and formed a great company, composed of American, German, French, and English capitalists, they took hold and built this road for $25,000,000 and 25,000,000 acres of land. They came back, and what did they do? The declaration was made by the Opposition that they could build the road for $22,500,000 and 22,500,000 acres of land. Why did they not make the offer before? Simply because it was a bogus offer. Yet hon. gentlemen come down to this House, notably the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), and declare that they could have built the road for half the money. But when the Canadian Pacific Railway Company were in financial difficulties a few years afterwards and came to this House, and asked for a loan of $30,000,000, then the white lily of the Liberal party, Mr. Blake, made his celebrated speech, to the effect that there was no necessity to have built the road on the north shore of Lake Superior for twelve years, and if Parliament loaned this money, it would be only another gift of $30,000,000. All these questions, however, have been decided, and it has been proved that the Government were correct. This fact strikes home to me as I live hundreds of miles west of Winnipeg, and I had my wheat in an elevator. I read the speech delivered by the leader of the Opposition in this House, and his declaration that the road on the north shore would not be needed for ten or twelve years. But without that road wheat was not worth the cost of taking it to market. The Liberal-Conservative party built the Canadian Pacific Railway, that party has developed the resources of this country up to this date, and the National Policy was adopted by the Liberal-Conservative party in 1879, has been the means of enabling the work of development to be carried on. The hon. gentlemen opposite declared that the National Policy had been a failure. I firmly and honestly deny that statement, but I intend to accept this reformed tariff only as an instalment good for one year, but reserve my right to ask for amendments in the Committee of the Whole. The amendment submitted by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) speaks about an economical Government. I do not desire to detain the House to-night, because I believe it costs $2,000 per hour to talk here, and it is scarcely worth that sum. But hon. gentlemen opposite have been talking economy for ten days, at a cost of $300,000, and then have not reached the point yet. They simply rise in their places and find fault with the Government, but they dare not state their policy in black and white and spread broadcast throughout the country. Let them print it, and put it side by side with the policy of the Finance Minister. If they do that, and show the people that they have a better policy than their opponents, then I firmly believe there are independent men, men who love their own pockets, who will support it. I believe that hon. gentlemen of the Opposition have no policy; that it is only a boast. The other night the hon. member for South Grey (Mr. Landerkin) spoke very eloquently and very loyally. He pointed out all the warriors of the Conservative party. He referred to the ex-Minister of War, now the Postmaster General, and spoke of the fighting qualities of that hon. gentleman. Then he referred to the present Minister of War. I thought it was a great pity the hon. gentleman did not bring out still another warrior. The hon. gentleman compared the leader of the Opposition with the First Minister and spoke of the great future before him. He spoke of his great speech at Quebec and at St. Thomas, where he expressed his desire to cement together the whole British Empire. But the member for South Grey (Mr. Landerkin) forgot a speech delivered by the leader of the Opposition, while at the same time he declared his unalterable determination to stand shoulder to shoulder with that great loyal man. I desire to refresh the memory of the hon. member for South Grey (Mr. Landerkin) a little. Why did he not trot out that great speech delivered by that hon. gentleman on historic ground, the Champ de Mars at Montreal? I ask the hon. member for South Grey (Mr. Landerkin) if he would have followed that great leader and stood on the banks of the Saskatchewan with his little musket on his shoulder and been a rebel too? Another hon. gentleman to whom I desire to refer is the hon. gentleman for South Huron (Mr. McMillan). To-day in the library I read a very patriotic speech delivered by him at Moose Creek, at which he declared there was no nation, and there were no farmers in the world, equal to the farmers of Canada. I sincerely hope the hon. gentleman was sincere and when he next addresses this House he will make the same statement he made at that meeting. I take this opportunity of saying that he addressed the farmers very nearly as well as I could myself. But in this House the hon. gentleman started out by making this magnificent statement: "There is the evidence, Mr. Speaker, that if the Opposition were in power to-day they could obtain a reciprocity treaty with the United States on fair and honourable terms." I should like to know how the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. McMillan) is able to give that assurance to the House. Whether the hon. member received that information from the President of the United States or from Congress; if he has done so, he should declare it here. But the hon. gentleman said it was the Conservatives fault that the McKinley Bill was enacted; our fault that Mr. McKinley prepared and secured the adoption of this Bill, and that the American market is our natural market for our horses, cattle, and farm products. The hon. gentleman further quoted to the House the population of Buffalo, New York, and Detroit, and gave other particulars; but he forgot to state that the Americans are our greatest competitors in the markets of the world that we have. I deny that. I charge the Opposition with that crime. Why, Sir, any speech that the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. McMillan) has made in this House is enough to cause the passage of the Bill. I am proud to know that a farmer can make such an eloquent speech; he is a credit to the farming community, to which I belong; but he should not throw opprobrium on the profession, which is the oldest profession in the world, and the only profession that God himself ever ordained, all the rest being established by man, and the hon. gentleman should not declare that the people of this country were being ruined. The hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) said that the amount was $1,000,000,000, but the member for South Huron (Mr. McMillan) saw him and went him $200,000,000 better. I am only a farmer, but I am considerable of a figurer. The hon. gentleman has told us that every man in this country has been robbed of $16 per annum by the infamous policy that the Conservative Government has pursued. I had the curiosity this evening to figure out that thing, and I based our population at 5,700,000, and I find that for one year the robbery, etc., would amount to $91,200,000, and, for fifteen years it would amount to $1,168,000,000. Then he went on to tell us that the National Policy has protected and brought into existence $265,000,000 worth of products per annum which have been manufactured in this country, and that would not have been manufactured if it had not been for the National Policy; but, in the same breath, he tells us that the people of this country paid 30 per cent more for that $265,000,000, so that that would give us the sum of $33,125,000. And that added to the $1,168,000,000, and we get a total of $1,201,125,000; so that, according to the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. McMillan) that would leave us, after paying our national debt, this magnificent sum of my hon. friend from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), namely, $1,000,000,000. Another farmer spoke here to-night; one of the greatest farmers of the country, the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin). I concede that the hon. member for Winnipeg is a greater farmer than I am, because he was able to farm the Great Northern Pacific Railway, and he farmed his province into a debt of $750,000. He even farmed more extensively than that, because he farmed some lots at Portage La Prairie, called Union Square. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Martin) found there was a little doubt about the title, but as he was Solicitor General for Manitoba it was very handy for him to smuggle a Bill through and make the title and robbery good. By that one jump, he was placed in the front rank of provincial capitalists. I give the hon. gentleman credit for one thing, and that is, that he discussed the tariff from top to bottom, but he split upon the same rock that all the rest of his party friends split upon; he failed to tell us what he would do when he became Minister of the Interior. Last winter, the member for Winnipeg was introduced to an audience in my constituency by a gentleman who said, "Lo, and behold, there is the future Minister of the Interior," by which he meant that he would take the place of my hon. friend from Selkirk (Mr. Daly) as soon as the Liberals got into power—that is, in the sweet by and by. I have not the slightest doubt in my mind that the member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) would try for that position, because to-night, when he was talking about retrenchment, he showed that there were $13,000,000 to play upon in the Dominion, and that is a large sum, compared with the paltry $500,000 that they had to play upon in the local Legislature of Manitoba—and I believe that they played upon it quite successfully, because they managed to put the province two and a half million dollars in debt, while he was Solicitor General, although he said here to-night that they saved $125,000 the first year they came into power. I have not the figures here, but I will take the hon. gentleman's statement. I noticed that during his speech he spoke about the first year, but he did not say anything about the other years, and I presume the reason was that after the first year it was all the wrong way with them. The hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) discoursed very learnedly on the Hudson's Bay Railway. I may say that the Hudson's Bay Railway is a tender spot in the heart of every man who lives in Manitoba and the North-west. The majority of the people in Manitoba and the North-west firmly believe to-day that if it had not been for the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin) we would have had the pleasure of having a competing road to carry our grain out of the country, against that great railway the Canadian Pacific Railway. Whether they are right or whether they are wrong, it is the firm belief of 90 per cent of the people of that vast country, that we have nobody to blame because the Hudson's Bay Railway is not built, except the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin). I have only a few more observations to make, Mr. Speaker. I intended to wait patiently until the leader of the Opposition should make his great speech in this debate. I challenge him to-night to announce his policy and to take the thousand and one items in the tariff and tell us if he was in power what he would do with them; so that the people of Canada may be conscientiously able to judge between the two parties. If he does not do that, I shall firmly believe that he has nothing else to offer on behalf of his party but the old policy. For the last fifteen years hon. gentlemen on the Opposition benches have been in the manufacturing business. They have been all these years manufacturing policies, and up to the present day they have never yet put the finished article on the market. They have never yet had a policy so complete that they could give it out to the people of Canada. First their policy was a revenue tariff; next, in the year 1887, in the Maritime Provinces it was one policy; on the Champ de Mars in Montreal it was another policy; in the province of Ontario it was another policy, and in the North-west and British Columbia it was another policy. They lost the elections then, and they also lost the white lily of the Liberal party—the Hon. Edward Blake. That hon. gentleman lost his grip, and if we are to judge by the number of policies the Liberal party had for the next few years they must have become utterly demoralized. They had continental free trade, commercial union and unrestricted reciprocity, and on the latter policy they fought and lost the elections of 1891. I do not wish to hurt the feelings of my brother members from Quebec or Ontario, but I must say that I do not think they are as sharp witted as we in the west. They did not understand the meaning of unrestricted reciprocity, and they very nearly gave the Liberal party a majority in these two provinces. But the people of the Maritime Provinces, sharpened as their wits was by those sea breezes, knew what unrestricted reciprocity meant; we, in Manitoba and the North-west, knew what it meant; we knew that it meant annexation, and we swept those who advocated that policy out of the country. But I am glad to say that in a few short months the scales fell from the eyes of the people of Ontario and Quebec, and when the bye-elections came they were beaten out of sight. Therefore, I say to the hon. leader of the Opposition, if he does not propound his policy and send it broadcast to the country, I shall be proud and happy to vote against the resolution of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright); and I believe that the party has the same old principles—Cartwright and discrimination against Great Britain; continental free trade and direct taxation; hostility to British interests and veiled annexation; independence, suppression and ultimate absorption into the republic. With such a policy Canada will have nothing to do, neither now nor in the future.

Mr. BECHARD moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and the House adjourned at 12 o'clock, midnight.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, 10th April, 1894.

PRAYERS.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 58) to incorporate the Lake Megantic Railway Company.—(Mr. Adams.)

Bill (No. 59) respecting the Montreal Island Belt Line Railway Company.—(Mr. Bergeron.)

Bill (No. 60) to incorporate the Cariboo Railway Company.—(Mr. Mara.)

Bill (No. 61) to amend the Railway Act.—(Mr. Maclean, York.)

Bill (No. 62) respecting the Richelieu and Ontario Navigation Company.—(Mr. Girouard, Jacques Cartier.)

REVISION OF VOTERS' LISTS.

Mr. CHARLTON asked, 1. What has been the total expense incurred by the Government in connection with the revision of the voters' lists in 1886, 1889 and 1891? 2. What was the expense incurred for such revision in each of the above-named years? 3. What amount of expense was incurred in connection with the printing of the voters' lists in 1886? 4. Are the expenses connected with printing the voters' lists in the Government Printing Bureau included in the statement of total expenses incurred? 5. What is the estimated cost of printing the voters' lists in the Government Bureau in the years that such printing has been performed in said Bureau?

Mr. COSTIGAN. In answering the questions put by the hon. gentleman a few days ago on this subject, I was not aware, until I referred to the Public Accounts and the Auditor General's Report, of the extent of the research the answer involved. I have had the research made by the department, and am able to answer the questions in detail. The total expense incurred for the three revisions was $899,423.03. With regard to the expenses incurred for 1886, 1889 and 1891, the total for each of these cannot be given without going into specific details, because the unsettled accounts had to be carried from one year to another. The expense incurred in connection with the printing of the voters' list for 1886 was $416,043.23. This is the grand total, including the payments to revisers. The expenses connected with printing the voters' lists in the Government Printing Bureau are included in the statement of total expenses. The cost of printing the voters' lists in the Government Bureau for the three years was about $28,000 for each year.

ROYAL COMMISSION ON PROHIBITION.

Mr. LANDERKIN asked, When was the Royal Commission on Prohibition issued? How many commissioners were appointed under it? Who are they? What is their salary per day? Do they receive any additional living allowance? If so, how much? What is the total cost of the Commission up to 1st March, 1894? What additional amount will it require to complete their labours?

Mr. FOSTER. The Royal Commission on Prohibition was appointed on March 14th, 1892. There are five commissioners: Sir Joseph Hickson, Mr. E. F. Clarke, Mr. J. A. Gigault, Judge H. S. McDonald, and the Rev. Joseph McLeod, D.D. They are paid $10 per day, and are allowed $4 per day for living expenses. The amount of expense paid to March, 1894, is $34,387.49.

SALE OF NEWSPAPERS, &c., ON THE I. C. R.

Mr. CHOQUETTE asked, 1. Who holds the contract for the sale of newspapers, books, &c., on the Intercolonial Railway? 2. Were tenders called for in connection with the said contract? If so, who were the parties who tendered, and what was the amount of each tender? 3. Is the right to sell books, newspapers, &c., in the stations at St. John, N.B., and Halifax, N.S., included in the contract? 4. How long has the contract existed, and when is it to terminate?

Mr. HAGGART. The Canada Railway News Agency, of which Mr. Phelan is the manager, is the contractor. 2. Yes, tenders were called for. The names of tenderers and the amounts of the tenders were: Michaud Bros., Fraserville (whole system), $2,900; J. B. Gaudière, Montreal (Lévis to Campbellton), $700; Canada Railway News Company, F. E. Phelan, Montreal (whole system), continuation of old contract. Contract was offered to Michaud Bros.; they declined to accept. Canada Railway News Company, F. E. Phelan, Montreal (whole system), $3,600. 3. The sale of books, &c., in stations at Halifax and St. John is not included in this contract. 4. The contract has existed since the 1st October, 1893. It expires, unless renewed, on the 1st October, 1894. The amount of contract is $3,600 per annum.

THE DUTY ON COTTON GOODS.

Mr. EDGAR. Before the Orders of the Day are called, Mr. Speaker, I would like to say a word of personal explanation. I think, when an hon. member of the House is corrected in figures, or statements that he makes, it is due to the House and to himself that he ought, if he finds he is wrong, make a correction from his place in the House as soon as possible. I also think that if an hon. member finds that he is not wrong, and that the gentleman who accused him of making a mistake, had done so improperly, he should take the first opportunity also of putting the hon. member right—

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. And continuing the debate.

Mr. EDGAR. I think not; I hope not. I desire to correct it as soon as possible. Now, the hon. the Controller of Customs stated last evening that I was distinctly in error. He used language which I do not like to hear hon. members use often, and he said: That I said first, that "sewing cotton thread, all others" had been under the old rate of 20 per cent, and that under the new rate they were 25 per cent. The hon. gentleman stated that while it was 25 per cent under the new rate, there had been no change, that it had been 25 per cent under the old rate, and he suggested that I was wilfully misleading the House. Very well. Sir; I have here a copy of the old tariff published in the Canadian Almanac, which I think is correct, and I find this item in it: "Thread, all cottons, n.e.s., 20 per cent." Now, not only do I find that I was correct according to the tariff, but I have here in my hand the Trade and Navigation Returns of this year, and at page 354, showing the dutiable goods imported (under figures, no doubt, given by the Department of Customs), I find these two items: First, sewing cotton thread, n.e.s., 20 per cent; the amount imported is given and also the rate of duty; all other cotton thread, n.e.s., 20 per cent, and the amount is given under the rate of duty. I think, therefore, that the hon. Controller has an opportunity of stating, and I have no doubt that he will do it frankly, that he was in error when he said that I had made a mistake. Then, on another occasion during the same speech, the Controller of Customs also contradicted me very flatly. I said: That under the new tariff, on collars the duty would still remain at 125 per cent in some cases, because there was a duty of 24 cents per dozen specific left, and 25 per cent ad valorem. I said that ladies' collars could be imported at 24 cents a dozen, and if that were so, of course there would be a hundred per cent of a specific duty, and 25 per cent ad valorem would make it amount to 125 per cent. My hon. friend contradicted me flatly and denied that collars could be imported for that price. Now, accompanied by my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills), I have to-day made careful personal inquiries from the senior member of a wholesale dry goods house in this city, through whom the information had come to me first, and he says: that although for a few years the duty has been so high as to prohibit importation, he has over and over again imported ladies' collars from England, costing a shilling a dozen, or 24 cents; and, therefore, I was strictly correct in the statement I made. If I wish to introduce new matter I could also make a similar statement about cuffs, which are 4 cents per pair and 25 cents ad valorem; I could show that these could be imported at a price of 2 shillings per dozen, which would make them also 125 per cent under the new tariff.

Mr. WALLACE. If the hon. gentleman had taken the trouble to look at the tariff instead of at the Canadian Almanac, he would have found that the articles to which he was alluding are to be found under articles 189 and 190 of the Tariff Act. The hon. gentleman referred to the fact that on cotton sewing thread in hanks the duty was raised from 12½ to 15 per cent, which was quite correct; and then going further, he said: cotton sewing thread on spools, 20 per cent. Article 190 says 25 per cent, so that I was strictly correct in calling his attention to it. If he had looked further at the Trade and Navigation Returns at page 43 he would have seen that cotton thread was imported to the amount of $324,000, and $81,000 were received by the Government as duty, making exactly 25 per cent. I am sorry that the hon. gentleman did not notify me that he was going to bring this matter up, because I would have given him further particulars.

Mr. EDGAR. A word in explanation of the remarks of the Controller of Customs. In my speech last night, before I said anything about the changes or the increases or decreases, I had given in the unchanged articles: "sewing thread on spools, 25 per cent. unchanged."

Mr. WALLACE. Not at all; the hon. gentleman did not say that. I said that.

Mr. EDGAR. My hon. friend can look at the 'Hansard' and see that I said that first.

Mr. DAVIN. Is not this altogether out of order, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. SPEAKER. It is out of order, and I would ask hon. members to remember what I said in regard to these matters on a former occasion, and, at this stage of the business of the House, to make any explanations they have to make as short and as fully to the point as possible.

MR. LAWRENCE VANKOUGHNET.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I am not sure whether the motion of the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) embraces everything asked for here, but if everything is embraced, one return will serve for both motions. I move for:

Copies of any report made to the Council by the Superintendent General of Indian Affairs which led to the removal of Lawrence Vankoughnet from the position of Deputy Superintendent General of Indian Affairs and his exclusion from the Civil Service.

Motion agreed to.

HALF-BREED LANDS IN MANITOBA.

Mr. MARTIN. I would like to move the resolution standing in my name with respect to half-breed lands. On the last occasion the Government asked this to stand. I move for:

Return showing all lands allotted to half-breeds in Manitoba for which patents have not been issued, giving along with a description of the land, the name of the allottee and the reasons why the patent has not been issued.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman to allow that to stand, and I may give the hon. member notice that we shall have to oppose the granting of this return, as its preparation will involve the expenditure of many thousands of dollars.

Motion allowed to stand.

TARIFF INVESTIGATION.

Mr. CHARLTON moved for:

Return giving report of the proceedings; and all papers connected with the tours of the Minister of Finance and other Ministers of the Crown, and the Controller of Customs and the Controller of Inland Revenue, since last session of Parliament, for the purpose of meeting deputations and making inquiries regarding the tariff, and amendments asked for, or proposed to the same.

Mr. FOSTER. If the hon. gentleman wishes to debate this motion, I think it will have to be allowed to stand. There are no reports prepared as to the tour and proceedings of the Minister of Finance or other members of the Cabinet or of the Controllers who sought information with reference to the tariff.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It was not thought worth preserving?

Mr. FOSTER. We preserve these things in our memories and we gave the House the benefit of them in the tariff recommendations brought down. I do not think the hon. gentleman was very serious in wishing to get this information.

Mr. CHARLTON. I do not think it is right for the hon. gentleman to make any charge of want of seriousness in this matter. If the hon. Minister has no information on the subject, we must allow the motion to stand.

Mr. LAURIER moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

DRAWBACKS ON CANADIAN SHIPS.

Mr. AMYOT moved for :

Copies of all Orders in Council from the origin of Confederation up to the year 1879, inclusively, respecting any drawback or bounty with respect to the building of Canadian ships, barques, or other vessels.

He said : I would also like to add :

Copies of all Orders in Council concerning the same matter in force in 1858, and amendments made thereto from that time up to Confederation.

Mr. LAURIER. That return would be more expensive than the list of the half-breeds' claims.

Mr. AMYOT. Is there any objection ?

Mr. SPEAKER. There seems to be some objection.

Mr. AMYOT. If there is no objection on the part of the Government the amendment might pass. Does the motion pass as amended ?

Mr. SPEAKER. No.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The amendment contains matter that might be debatable, and as exception has been taken to it, I will ask the hon. gentleman to reserve his motion until the House takes up opposed motions.

Motion withdrawn.

SAULT STE. MARIE CANAL.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron) moved for :

Return stating : 1st, The name and tonnage of all Canadian vessels which are engaged in Canadian trade on the upper lakes and which have passed through the Sault Ste. Marie Canal, in prosecution of their trade, since the beginning of the sailing season of 1885 ; keeping separate each year. 2. The number of tons of freight carried upwards, also the number of tons of freight carried downward, in each year. 3. The ports from which and to which each vessel in the trade sailed, in each year. 4. The number of persons employed on each vessel, each year.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I think that had better stand. It seems to be a very large order, and perhaps, after looking into it, the hon. gentleman who has the motion in charge, may be able to arrange with me a return that will meet his purpose, although perhaps not in the same language, so that we can settle it better if it stands.

Mr. MARTIN moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

Mr. CHARLTON.

RETURNS ORDERED.

Copies of all correspondence between Mr. L. Vankoughnet and the Government, or any member, or department, relating to his superannuation, and of all communications or reports to Council or the Treasury Board, or any member of the Government, relating to such superannuation, and of any Orders in Council dealing with the same.—(Mr. Mulock.)

Copies of all Orders in Council, reports, papers and correspondence relating to the dismissal of Damase St. Pierre as postmaster of St. Fortunat de Wolfeston.—(Mr. Laurier.)

Statement showing amount of receipts each month for gate money at Kingston Penitentiary between 1st January, 1887, and 1st January, 1894. Statement showing disposition of these moneys, including statement showing the amount of those moneys deposited in any banks, with the names of such banks and particulars as to whose credit such deposits were made.—(Mr. Mulock.)

Return showing the amount paid to Railways or Steamship Companies, as a bonus for bringing settlers to Manitoba or the Territories, in 1891, 1892 and 1893, and a list of settlers so brought, showing their names and locations.—(Mr. Martin.)

Return showing the nature and number of the returns ordered by this House during the past three sessions and not yet brought down, together with the reason why they have not yet been brought down.—(Mr. Landerkin.)

Copies of all petitions, letters, plans, deeds and other documents respecting the claim of the Hurons of Lorette in relation to the Seigniorship of Sillery.—(Mr. Frémont.)

Return showing the amount of timber dues collected at Quebec for each year for the last ten years. The quantity of timber culled each year, and the wages paid to cullers and staff.—(Mr. McMullen.)

Return showing the quantity of timber that passed through the cullers' hands and was culled each year at Montreal, for the last ten years. The amount of fees collected for each year during the same period, and the amount of wages paid to the cullers and staff at Montreal for the same time.—(Mr. McMullen.)

Return showing the number of permanent civil servants in each department, inside and outside service, who contribute to the superannuation fund, and the gross amount of wages paid.—(Mr. McMullen.)

Return showing the names of officials employed in connection with the Canadian exhibit at the Columbian Exposition from the province of Nova Scotia, showing their official position, amount of salaries paid and dates at which such employment ceased.—(Mr. Patterson, Colcheater.)

Statement in the form of table C in the blue-book already published on the French Treaty, for the years ending 30th June, 1892 and 1893.—(Mr. Laurier.)

REPORT.

Annual Report of the Department of Public Works for the year ending June 30, 1893.—(Mr. Ouimet.)

DAMAGE TO DIGBY PIER.

Mr. BOWERS. Before the Orders of the Day, I desire to call the attention of the Government to the following despatch:—

DIGBY, N.S., April 9.—A tremendous gale and snow storm prevailed here all last night and continues with unabated force to-day. Much damage has been done. No estimate can yet be formed of marine disasters. The Digby pier was severely shaken and portions of it were carried away by the wind and tide.

Has the attention of the Government been drawn to this matter, by any despatch, or otherwise, and do they propose to take any steps to repair the pier?

Mr. OUMET. The department has not received any communication on the subject referred to by the hon. gentleman.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE TARIFF.

House again resumed the adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Foster:

That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go into Committee of Ways and Means; and the motion of Sir Richard Cartwright in amendment thereto.

Mr. BECHARD. When the Finance Minister last session informed the House that at the next meeting of Parliament the Government would be prepared to submit a measure for the general revision of the tariff, this declaration was received with a feeling of general satisfaction, not only in this House, but in the country. Some people even thought that the hon. Minister had at last become convinced that this country has suffered long enough the pressure of high customs duties, and that he was preparing a return to the time-honoured policy of a revenue tariff. But I fear that this feeling of satisfaction, which was so generally manifested throughout the country, will soon be changed into a feeling of general dissatisfaction, for the tariff of the hon. Minister is far from responding to the hopeful expectations to which his declaration of last session gave rise. In submitting his measure, the Finance Minister told us that the Government had decided, in this revision of the tariff, to maintain the principle of protection; in other words, the Government would take care that, in the distribution of favours to be conferred by the new tariff, the manufacturer would receive the lion's share. However, notwithstanding this kind and paternal disposition on the part of the Government towards their favourite family, the hon. Minister had hardly laid his measure before Parliament, when it was assailed and denounced even by a portion of the press which supports him; and delegation after delegation, representing several manufacturing industries, literally besieged the hon. gentleman in his office, making to him representations and, doubtless, giving good advice as to the effect of his tariff on their respective industries. It is not my purpose to inquire whether those spoiled children of the Government received consolation from the Finance Minister, nor whether it was after some understanding arrived at between him and them, that he sent to this House a corrected copy of his resolutions; but, if this tariff does not satisfy the manufacturers, it can satisfy no one, for it is certainly not calculated to improve the condition of the farmer. During the last two sessions of Parliament, we heard some hon. members, friends of the Government, and representing rural districts, complain bitterly in this House that the duties imposed upon agricultural implements, binding twine and coal oil were too burdensome for the farming classes, and they clamoured for reform. Sir, it appears that the Government have heard the voice of some of those hon. members, but, at the same time, have remained deaf to the voices of the others. For, whilst the duties upon agricultural implements and binding twine have been reduced, the duty imposed upon coal oil remain untouched and is as burdensome as ever. I do not propose at this moment to review the divers items of the tariff; when the House goes into Committee of the Whole will be the proper time to do that discipline. But I would like to refer briefly to three or four of those items, and particularly to those to which the special attention of the House was called last session, because of the high duties imposed upon them. Sir, the reduction from 35 to 20 per cent upon agricultural implements, such as mowing machines, self-binding harvesters, harvesters without binders, binding attachments, reapers, sulky and walking ploughs, harrows, cultivators, seed-drills and horse-rakes is certainly something worthy of the consideration of this House. It is, as is commonly said, a step in the right direction. But I fear that the duty of 20 per cent is still sufficiently high to give to the manufacturer the absolute control of the home market; and if he does not meet any competition from the outside, it is clear that the advantage supposed to accrue to the farmer from this reduction of duty, will be simply imaginary. Bear in mind, Sir, that this duty of 20 per cent is an ad valorem duty. I have not a word to say against the adoption of the ad valorem principle, for, generally speaking, I am favourable to it, provided it is applied in a manner which does not frustrate the laudable end intended to be reached by the adoption of that principle. But I have been informed, whether correctly or incorrectly, I do not know, for I am not speaking from personal knowledge and experience—but I have been informed by commercial men that the ad valorem duty, although in itself fair and equitable, is subjected sometimes to wrongful application, and becomes an instrument of wrong in frustrating the ends of justice by the way it is applied. Let me illustrate my proposition by an example. Suppose I buy in the United States a mower for which I pay $35, whilst the same article is sold here for $50. As soon as my mower has passed the frontier line, the Canadian custom-house officer appraises the imported article, not according to the invoice price which I paid for it, but according to the price at which the similar article is sold in Canada. Sir, if that rule is applied, as I am informed it is, in the carrying out of the ad valorem principle, I say it is nothing less than a fraud perpetrated in the interest of the Canadian manufacturers, and at the expense of the Canadian consumer. If the duty of 20 per cent on agricultural implements be applied according to that rule, the position of the Canadian manufacturer will be as good, perhaps better, than it was before the reduction. Now, after a protection of 35 per cent has been given during fifteen years to those who have monopolized that industry, I think that the Government, in reducing the duty to 20 per cent, should have at least coupled that item with a clause declaring that these articles will be admitted free of duty, when imported directly from any country which is willing to reciprocate with us in the same way. Such a clause has been inserted in the Tariff Bill which passed the American House of Representatives at Washington a few weeks ago: and, Sir, it seems to me that ought to be considered an invitation to the Canadian Government and Parliament to do the same thing. Such a clause embodied in the tariff of both nations would soon bring about the free introduction of those agricultural implements between the two countries, and the result of that interchange would be very beneficial to the farmers of Canada. I may be told, however, that that free interchange would be injurious to the Canadian manufacturer, and very likely ruin his industry. Sir, I think the contrary. For, if the Canadian manufacturer is an intelligent and prudent man, as I suppose he is, he has taken, knowing that tariffs are not usually permanent, the necessary precautions to equalize the conditions of manufacturing between himself and any possible competitor, especially from the United States. In that case, he would be on a footing of equality with the American manufacturer, and, whilst the Canadian market would also be open to the American manufacturer on the other hand, the American market would be open to the Canadian manufacturer, who would find there a larger field for his operations. I said a moment ago that the reduction of duty upon agricultural implements was a step in the right direction. I regret that the Finance Minister has not made more progress in that direction, for I notice that there are duties of 30 and 35 per cent upon other articles. For instance, axes of all kinds, scythes, hay-knives, lawn-mowers, pronged forks, rakes, and other agricultural tools or implements, not elsewhere specified, are charged 35 per cent. Saddlery is charged 30 per cent. Bar iron has to pay a duty of $10 per ton, and, when we consider that bar iron can be bought in England at $20 per ton, that duty seems inordinately high, as it is nearly 46 per cent. From iron are made numbers of implements used by the farmer. It enters mainly into all the tools used by him. These tools are very soon worn out and must frequently be renewed, and every time the farmer has to purchase one, he has to pay 35 per cent for the duty, or more than one-third the value of the article he purchases. On binding twine the duty has been reduced by one-half, but it is not for me to say whether this reduction is satisfactory or not, because in the part of the country where I live, this article is not much used. I leave that point to be dealt with by other hon. members. But an article in respect of which the Government could have done something very satisfactory for the people, is coal oil. Whenever the Canadian consumer purchases coal oil, he has to pay 7½ cents per gallon more than the real value; that is to say, he has to pay only for the duty about one-half of the price which he would pay for a gallon of oil if American oil were admitted duty free. This duty falls into the category of those which are most odious to the people, for it is paid to retain a monopoly which, in return for the protection given it, manufactures an article for the Canadian public of an inferior quality. Yesterday I met a gentleman, a personal friend of mine, but a strong supporter of the Government, who complained bitterly, in the course of our conversation, that this duty had not been reduced. And he concluded by saying that, if those who monopolize that industry to-day wanted protection, they should at least give to the Canadian consumer, who pays the taxes for the purpose of helping that industry, an article not inferior in quality to the American article. Sir, this duty is principally paid by the labouring classes who live in small towns and villages, and by farmers in the rural districts; for it is well known that people living in the larger towns and cities do not make much use of petroleum, their dwellings being generally lighted either by gas or electricity. But those who monopolize that industry seem to have been more powerful with the Government to-day than those hon. members on the other side of the House who last session denounced that duty in bitter terms, and who to-day appear to have forgotten their indignation of last year. It is obvious, Mr. Speaker, that in preparing the new tariff the Government have been influenced by the same special interest which has inspired the fiscal policy of this country for the last fifteen years—the interest of the manufacturer. It is always the same policy; everything for the manufacturer, nothing for the farmer: the loaf for the manufacturer, the crumbs for the farmer. However, I have noticed in the tariff resolutions that the Government, in maintaining the protective principle in favour of the manufacturer, have manifested the pretension of also giving protection to the farmer. How is this done? Why, it is done by the imposition of duties upon imported living animals, such as horses, cattle and sheep; if those animals were imported for home consumption, I could well understand that a duty imposed upon those importations would give some chance or advantage in our own market to the farmers of Canada, but it is well known—nay, it is proved by our official reports—that we do not import those goods for home consumption, but that, on the contrary, we have a large surplus of them which we are compelled to send to foreign markets every year in order to sell them. It is true that the people of the North-west Territories import a small number of those living animals; they get them from the adjacent States, where, after paying the duty, they can procure them at lower prices than they could from Ontario. But, Sir, those who make these importations into the North-west Territories are themselves farmers; they import those animals, not for the purposes of trade, but to increase their stock, and in that case this duty of 20 per cent. instead of being a protection to them, is rather a nuisance. The same remarks apply to wheat, coarse grains, butter, cheese, hay, poultry, and potatoes, which we do not import for home consumption, but of which we have a large surplus every year to send to foreign markets. Such is about the degree of protection conferred by the tariff on the Canadian farmers. It consists in customs duties imposed on farm products which we do not import for home consumption and which consequently do not compete with our own produce in our market. It really seems as if the Government regarded the farmers as a band of children who, getting displeased or dissatisfied with the toys which have amused them for a considerable time, are easily kept quiet or contented by toys of some other kinds as soon as they are offered to them. Since the beginning of this debate we have heard hon. gentlemen opposite speaking in laudatory terms of the benefits resulting to the farmer from the National Policy. The hon. member for Megantic (Mr. Fréchette) and the hon. member for Chicoutimi (Mr. Belley) have been interesting in their speeches, particularly when they spoke of the development of the butter and cheese industries in the province of Quebec; but I would like to know what the existence of these industries has to do with the tariff, or how their development can be considered as a result of the National Policy. It is true, the hon. member for Megantic intimated that without the National Policy we could not sell our butter and cheese at remunerative prices; but the hon. member must have forgotten that we do not import butter and cheese for home consumption, but that—as in the case of the other farm products to which I have just referred—we have a large surplus of those products which we are bound to sell in foreign markets in order to derive profit from them, and that the prices which are paid for those articles in the foreign markets determine the prices for which they can be sold here. The hon. member for Megantic and the hon. member for Chicoutimi mentioned certain classes of goods which they said were sold now at lower prices than they were in 1878. They were followed by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot), who read a long list of different classes of goods which he said were sold to-day at lower prices than they were in 1878. Do those hon. members believe that these results are due to the operation of the National Policy? In that case, Sir, those hon. members ought to claim an increase of duty, for, according to their reasoning, it would be logical to say: The higher the tariff, the cheaper the goods. Bear in mind, Sir, that an over-production of goods will always cause a fall in prices. It is well known that within the last fifteen years the production of goods throughout the world has exceedingly increased, and that the quantity on the market of the world is larger to-day in proportion to the demand than it was in 1878 or any previous year. This is the reason, the obvious reason, for the fall of the prices of these goods. Hon. gentlemen proclaim in loud tones that the country is prosperous. And to prove this they say that there are large deposits of money in the banks. Sir, while that is an evidence that there is money in the country, it also may be an indication that the owners of that money have so little confidence in the actual condition of affairs that they do not dare to invest their money in any other way. I know that such is the case, at least with farmers amongst whom I live. Those of the farmers who have considerable means and who can save a little money at the end of the year, prefer loaning it at a small rate of interest, or placing it in the bank, to investing it in the purchase of farm lands, the value of which has decreased at least one-third as compared with what it was three or four years ago. This, surely, is no indication of very great prosperity, for when a country is prosperous, the price of farm lands, instead of decreasing, either maintains itself at a certain level, or increases. Mr. Speaker, I am of those who were opposed to the inauguration of the National Policy, for I regard a protective tariff as having the ill effect of restricting a nation's foreign trade, and of favouring the formation of monopolies, whose interests are antagonistic to the interests of the masses of the people. Since the introduction of the system into our country, I have continued to be hostile to it; but, Sir, my hostility does not carry me so far as to cause me to say that it has produced only ruin. We have had prosperity in this country since the introduction of the National Policy. Prosperity will exist even in spite of a protective system—it will exist at least temporarily; and, in an agricultural country like Canada, prosperity will exist to a large degree if crops are abundant and prices of farm products remunerative. I willingly admit that this country has enjoyed prosperity since the adoption of the National Policy; but I deny that that prosperity was the result of the operation of that system. For a few years after the adoption of the protective tariff, we had very great prosperity in this country, and its good effects were felt even for several years after that prosperity had begun to decline. But I repeat the National Policy had nothing to do with that prosperity, which commenced only after the great crisis from which this country had suffered for five years, and which was felt in England and the United States, in fact, throughout the whole world, as well as in Canada. But, in the fall of 1881, a revival of business took place in those countries and that revival of business was soon communicated to Canada, which has such large commercial relations with them. But at that time, Sir, the results of the National Policy were not felt. It was established in March, 1879, and it is an undeniable fact that during a year and a half after its introduction elapsed, the most severe period of the great crisis from which the country had suffered. The National Policy had not the least influence in removing the depression from which we then suffered, and it had not the least influence in bringing about the prosperity which the country enjoyed after that crisis. We well remember that in the years 1882-83 whilst crops failed in European countries, at the same time, they were very abundant on this side of the Atlantic. By the course of events, we found ourselves placed in the fortunate position of having abundant crops for sale, while, at the same time, the demand for them and the prices had considerably increased in European markets. Our farmers, therefore, sold their produce at very remunerative prices; they made great progress; they realized large sums of money; they became very prosperous, and that prosperity communicating itself to the whole country and became general. As a consequence of that prosperity, we saw the prices of farm lands advanced to a level they had never reached before. But, Sir, was that prosperity the result of the tariff? Was it the National Policy that caused the failure of crops in European countries? Was it the tariff that caused the abundant crops with which this country was blessed? Surely, Sir, no man who has the least claim to a share of common sense will assume the responsibility of uttering such an absurd proposition. I repeat that the protective system had nothing to do with that prosperity, on the contrary, that system did not fulfil the promises which were made by its promoters. Those hon. members who, like myself, had seats on the floor of this House during the year 1878, well remember. I am sure, the seductive promises made, the brilliant prospect described in the ostentatious speeches of the members of the Conservative party, then in Opposition; and I have no doubt those hon. members will remember also that celebrated resolution which was then submitted to Parliament by the leader of the Opposition of that day, the late Sir John A. Macdonald. According to the terms and the promises made in that resolution, by virtue of the operation of the protective system, a large share of wealth, and of all the good things which are attainable in this world, would soon be secured to the manufacturer, to the artisan, to the farmer, to the miner, to the fisherman, in fact, to every class and to every man in the community, and, moreover, the people of Canada would continue to live in that terrestrial paradise as long as that system was kept in operation. But, Sir, that is not all. Another good thing was to follow from that system, it would have the effect of stopping the exodus, not only was it to prevent the further emigration of our countrymen to the United States, but it was to bring back home those of them who had already emigrated. Sir, the last census shows how those promises have been fulfilled. A country which is prosperous is not abandoned by one-fifth of its children, of those who were born and lived on its soil. The hon. member for Chicoutimi (Mr. Belley), and the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot), told us that emigration commenced in the year 1844, and that it had continued gradually since that time to this day. Now, Mr. Speaker, I challenge those hon. members to show me in the census of the decades which have elapsed from 1844 to 1881, a single decade in which there has been so small an increase of population in the province of Quebec as during the last decade. The last census shows conclusively that the emigration of our countrymen to the United States has been larger during the last decade than it had ever been before. But those hon. members told us that our countrymen are returning in large numbers from the United States. I am sorry that I cannot join those hon. members in their statement. I live in a district which lies near the boundary line, and which has been decimated by emigration as much as any other district in Canada, if not more. If you ask me the number of my countrymen who return to that district, I will tell you that the number of those who return does not equal by far, even to-day the number of those who leave; and if you happen to meet some of those people, the most of them will tell you that they have come back only temporarily, and that they intend to return to the United States as soon as the crisis which now exists in that country shall have ceased. Sir, if our countrymen in the United States could have heard the ungenerous and disparaging compliment which was paid to them the other evening by the hon. member for Chicoutimi (Mr. Belley), who said they were starving in that bad country, I am sure that one million voices would have immediately raised to tell the hon. member that his statement was slanderous. Let the hon. member go to the United States, where he will receive more reliable information than he now possesses; let him go to that country, and he will find in all the towns where there are groups of our countrymen that they are organized almost as completely as if they were living in Canada, having their churches, their schools, their newspapers, celebrating their national festivals, some of them having realized considerable fortunes, whilst others have risen to civil honours, and occupy the respectable and honourable positions of aldermen, mayors, and even of members of the Legislation. I ask any man in this House, if a population living in such conditions can be properly regarded as a starving people? The hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot) told us as what he considered a good reason for supporting the National Policy, that the people of this country had approved of that policy on three successive occasions, and he ventured to assure us that on the next occasion that policy would again receive the popular support. Sir, while I may think the hon. member was right enough with regard to the last three occasions, I am not disposed to take his word with regard to the results of the next political conflict which is to take place before very long. I may add that I have but little confidence in the predictions of that hon. member, for the zig-zag conduct he has followed for a few years back gives no more weight to his prophecies than to his opinions in political matters. Now, Mr. Speaker, I will call the attention of the House to another branch of the subject. When the Controller of Customs addressed the House I noticed in his tone a certain degree of satisfaction when he declared that our trade with England had increased whilst our trade with the United States had decreased. Perhaps the hon. Minister is not the only man in this House who would be sorry to know that the volume of trade with the great country to the south of us has increased. Perhaps there are men in the country who would be sorry to ascertain that our trade with the United States is more than three-folds of the volume of our trade with the whole world, excepting Great Britain. But has our trade with the United States really decreased? It may not be without interest to look for a moment at the progress of our trade with that country, as revealed in the tables of Trade and Navigation. In 1853, the volume of our trade with the United States amounted in round numbers to $23,000,000; in 1854, the first year of the treaty—to $33,000,000,—and in 1866, the last year of the treaty—to $84,000,000. We know that immediately after the American civil war closed, the United States Congress adopted a very high tariff, but notwithstanding the effects of that restrictive measure, our trade with that country continuously increased. I find that, in 1873, the remotest year referred to in our official returns, our trade with our neighbours amounted to the sum of $89,000,000, in round numbers; in 1883, to $97,000,000; and in 1893, to $102,000,000. Now, Sir, last year, our trade with the whole world amounted to $247,638,620; in giving to England, to the United States and to the rest of the world, their respective share of that amount, you will find our trade with England, last year, amounted to $107,228,906,—with the United States to $102,144,986—and with the other parts of the world, to $31,010,289. These statistics show, that our trade with the United States is more than three-folds, our trade with the world, excepting England. Surely the statistics which are contained in the Trade and Navigation Returns are far from indicating that our trade with the United States has been decreasing. Is it not a remarkable and instructive fact, that notwithstanding the obstructions thrown in its way under the form of high tariffs imposed on both sides of the line, our trade with our neighbours is very nearly as considerable and important as is our trade with Great Britain, to which we can export our produce duty free. Supposing all obstructions to our trade with the United States were reduced or removed, who can tell the degree of expansion to which that trade would be carried? But hon. gentlemen opposite say they do not desire reciprocal trade on a free trade basis, and while they neglect that very important side of the trade question, they send delegates to other countries, even to the Antipodes, in order to develop our trade relations with distant countries. Suppose those missions were successful, what would be the result? So far as our exports are concerned treaties with those countries might increase the market for our manufacturers, but surely nothing would result to our farmers, for no one would dream that Australia could be a good market for Canadian farm produce. If it is thought we want markets for our manufacturers, I say we also want more extended markets for our farmers, who I hold constitute the most interesting class of the community, for in an essentially agricultural country like Canada a prosperous agriculture is the basis of all prosperity. We want for our farmers free access to the United States market, for to that market we send a very considerable portion of our farm products, including horses, sheep, barley, hay, poultry, potatoes, wool, and other articles I need not mention. If we refer to the tables embodied in the Trade and Navigation Returns we find that the United States is almost the only market where our farmers can obtain remunerative prices for horses, sheep, barley, hay, poultry, wool, and other products. These facts show the great importance of the American market to the Canadian farmer. The returns also show that the United States affords the best market for the products of our forests, of our mines, and of our waters, even of our manufactures. Last year the products of our mines which were exported to foreign countries were of the value of $916,664, of which the United States paid $908,504, or nearly the whole amount. The total export of our fisheries amounted to $458,552, and of that amount the United States paid us $454,244. The total amount of the products of our forests was $9,929,683, and of that amount $9,861,800 were paid by the United States. The total amount of the exports of our manufactured goods amounted to $3,381,156, and of that amount the United States paid us $2,141,255. These quotations are more than sufficient to prove the importance of the great American market, not only for our farmers but also for our lumbermen, for our fishermen, and for our miners. Sir, when I consider the great importance of our trade with the United States. I hold that every effort ought to be made by the Government of Canada to secure freer and more extended commercial relations with that country. The Controller of Customs said the other day: That the Government were prepared to have reciprocity with the United States provided a treaty could be negotiated with that country which would be consistent with our honour and with our interests. This language is too vague to mean something tangible. Hon. gentlemen opposite have seemed for some time to be favourable to reciprocity, but limited to natural products. In fact, in 1891 they appealed to the country upon that very question. They said that Parliament had been dissolved because the Government wanted to consult the people with regard to this question; pretending that overtures had been made with regard to it by the American authorities to the British Ambassador at Washington. They preached reciprocity, limited it is true; but if we could have had that reciprocity even though limited, it would have given satisfaction to the people of Canada. They preached reciprocity on every hustings and it was the fact that they preached that policy to the people which saved them from defeat. They were returned to power, but with a reduced majority; a majority very small as compared with the majority which they commanded in this House in the previous Parliament. This result showed that the doctrine of reciprocity which was preached by both parties—although not to the same extent by the Conservative as by the Liberal party—was thoroughly popular with the people. Hon. gentlemen opposite know very well that when they speak of obtaining reciprocity with the United States limited to the interchange of natural products, they are speaking of something which they cannot obtain; and that unless they are prepared to accept reciprocity with regard to a certain class of manufactured goods it is useless for them to speak any longer of reciprocity. But, Sir, the Government have neglected a very good opportunity which has been offered. At this very moment while the American Congress are revising their tariff, they have perhaps the very best opportunity which has been offered since the abrogation of the treaty of 1854. They should have sent an agent to Washington in order to ascertain what could be done for the improvement of commercial relations between both countries. But it is obvious, Sir, that hon. gentlemen opposite do not care for reciprocity under any form whatever, and that this country will never enjoy the benefit of that policy so long as this Government remains in power. It will be the privilege and the honour of the Liberal party, in the near future, I hope, to give to Canada freer and more extended commercial relations with the great country to the south of us; the most progressive nation, I do not hesitate to say, which exists on the face of the globe, and whose general prosperity is marvellous and unequalled. It is that great prosperity which attracts to that country so many people from different parts of the world, and unfortunately too, so large a number of our own countrymen. The Liberal party when in power will consider it their duty never to enact any piece of legislation which would give to any man, or to any class of men, an undue advantage over their fellow-citizens. And, Sir, it will be their privilege, their glorious privilege, to secure to our country a large measure of that unparalleled prosperity which makes the American people so great, so progressive, and so glorious amongst the nations of the earth. When that has been accomplished, the result of this new policy will be a thousand times more beneficial to the people of Canada than the brilliant promises made in 1878 which the National Policy never has realized, and never can realize. When the Liberal party accomplishes this great object, a boon will be conferred on this country for it will then be sufficiently prosperous to keep its own people at home.

Mr. PELLETIER. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, in the discussion which now occupies the attention of the House, it is interesting to see the hon. members opposite exhausting their powers against the Government and the Government standing on the defensive, standing on its own ground and stoutly resisting their attacks. In this struggle, which has lasted now several days, and which was already illustrated many a time these last years, the supposed offensive arms of the Opposition are numerous, various and even inconsistent; but they have only one object, which is to prepare clap-trap for the elections. What are, then, these supposed offensive arms displayed with such a fuss? We have heard almost all the members opposite during this debate. Some say that our manufacturers are strong enough to sustain the foreign competition and that they themselves ask for the repeal of protection. Others contend, on the contrary, that these manufacturers are the very people who impose protection. Others still, as the hon. member for Iberville (Mr. Béchard) say that protection is the principle of an utterly bad policy and that they always were against such a policy. Others, lastly, own that there is something good in protection, that it was useful and did some good. I am pleased to recall here the eloquent certificates given to protection by the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Tarte). In 1887 and 1888, after it had eight or nine years of an efficient and advantageous carrying out, the hon. member for L'Islet let the statement fall from such a vigorous and brilliant pen as his that our market was very good and our affairs prosperous; and he advised the farmers not to allow the Canadian market to be given away to foreign competition by the establishment of unrestricted reciprocity, then advocated by the Liberal party. In the face of such various opinions, it is natural that one should ask whether those people who now find such fault with protection always appreciated and judged it so unfavourably. And it is not without the utmost surprise that we read in their history, that from 1868 to 1875, most of them were protectionists without any restriction or reserve. If several members opposite, the most distinguished amongst them, would speak, they would still charm us by repeating here their eloquent speeches and pleas in favour of protection. Yet, at that time, there were less reasons to apply it than in 1878, especially against the United States, which were still suffering from the effects of their terrible war, and where the movement of affairs was not yet quite reorganized. In 1878, prior to the establishment of protection, which the Opposition now so much complain of, the hon. member for Iberville (Mr. Béchard) admitted its principle, which is recorded in the 'Hansard' for 1878, at page 1815, the following words:

Mr. Béchard moved in amendment: That Mr. Speaker do not now leave the Chair, but that it be resolved "That a large quantity of corn and oats having been imported into Canada within the last few years, this House is of opinion that the interests of Canadian farmers would be promoted by the imposition of a duty upon the importation of those products."

During the years which preceded their coming into power, in 1874, the Liberal party particularly entertained the idea of renewing the reciprocity treaty of 1854. The Conservatives had the same desire; and, in 1869 and 1871 especially, the Conservative Government had overtures made in this respect to the Government of the United States, which, however, always thought it their duty to reject such advances. Then, as now, the Liberal party declined to give any credit for such proceedings to those who had made them. Then, as now, the Liberals clamoured that if the reciprocity treaty of 1854 was not already put again in force, the fault lay with the Conservative Government, and they never failed to add the emphatic promise to renew it as soon as they would come into power. Then, as now, ascending to their saying, as usual, for all that, the Liberals seemed to be beforehand with the world. The people who remembered the large profits they had made by means of the treaty, and longed for its renewal, decided, in 1874, to try the Liberals. They said: For quite a while these people have been criticising and making promises; let us try them. And the people tried them, and after an experience of four years, the people, completely disappointed, dismissed them from office. What more had they done than the Conservatives? Nothing! What had they failed to do? Everything, except bad policy. They had not renewed the treaty of 1854. They had not thought of giving the least protection to our industries and products. But, ah! mighty deficits signalled their passing through power. The public debt had increased in a disastrous proportion, and without any compensation; and the two last years of their rule were surnamed the years of bankruptcy, famine and misery. The city of Montreal, our commercial metropolis, only to mention that, was languishing away and declining through poverty; our manufacturing establishments were solitary and noiseless; business was paralyzed by despondency and the only activity there was was on the part of the official assignees as well as the soup kitchens when the allowances of charity were distributed among the starving people of the suburbs. The Conservatives said: But since the American Government decline to renew the treaty of 1854, or make any other similar agreement, suitable to the present economical needs, then grant some protection to our industries and products so as to create an important local market from which our farmers might derive some benefit, and of which they are absolutely in need. The Mackenzie Government replied: Be patient, wait till tomorrow and you will see that in the end our policy will do wonders. At last came that morrow so anxiously looked for by all, happy morrow for the country, but unhappy one for the Liberal Government, for according to the calendar they had fallen down on the 17th September, 1878. Protection was then introduced by the new Government, who at the same time inserted in the statute of 1879, 42 Victoria, chapter 15, section 6, a public and permanent offer to the American Government to widen at any time, as far as the natural products and animals were concerned, the commercial ways between Canada and the United States on a just and profitable basis for both countries and with an equal advantage for the one and the other. That offer was recorded in the statute of 1879, and I will read to you, Mr. Speaker, the full text of it :

Any or all of the following articles, that is to say: Animals of all kinds, green fruit, hay, straw, bran, seeds of all kinds, vegetables (including potatoes and other roots), plants, trees and shrubs, coal and coke, salt, hops, wheat, peas and beans, barley, rye, oats, Indian corn, buckwheat and all other grain, flour of wheat and flour of rye, Indian meal and oatmeal, and flour or meal of any other grain, butter, cheese, fish (salted or smoked), lard, tallow, meats (fresh, salted or smoked) and lumber, may be imported into Canada free of duty, or at a less rate of duty than is provided by this act, upon proclamation of the Governor in Council, which may be issued whenever it appears to his satisfaction that similar articles from Canada may be imported into the United States free of duty, or at a rate of duty not exceeding that payable on the same under such proclamation when imported into Canada.

That offer was never withdrawn and always held good, and I hope the Government will in the future, as it was in the past, be willing to maintain it. But, on their part, the American Government were never willing to correspond to it. On the contrary, that Government even allowed the McKinley Bill to pass, a measure of defiance, a chance measure till then unknown to the business world. Since they declined to open to us the American market, nothing was more natural than to close the Canadian market to the American products, so as to keep Canada for the Canadians. The Hon. Mr. Joly de Lotbinière, the distinguished and esteemed leader of the Liberals of the province of Quebec, publicly adhered to the protective system. He did it in an open letter in which he stated the advantages of the protective system. Amongst other conclusions he drew the following one: It is better for the consumer to pay more for his flour and be able to earn money to have some, than to be able to buy it cheaper and unable to earn the necessary money to pay for it. This is how that leader of our opponents valued the advantages of protection. In the meantime, the Liberals advocated by turns and confused by commercial union involving a customs union with the United States, then unrestricted reciprocity with the United States, and lastly free trade, when their no less distinguished other leader, the Hon. Edward Blake, wrote their condemnation in his ever celebrated letter of 1891. Since the establishment of protection in 1879, three general elections have come and testified in its favour. Can it be that the people were so many times mistaken against their own interests, especially when the Liberal party were there to warn them and put them on their guard? Obviously no; they must, on the contrary, have expressed their true will, and supported what they thought was in their interest; and it is, Mr. Speaker, the best commendation of the principle of protection. If, on the other hand, we measure the distance run, the progress obtained since 1879, one does not know which is the most astonishing, of that astonishing advance or of the strange ill-will of those who refuse to admit it. In fifteen years the value and quantity of our railways were more than double; we have established strong and prosperous industries, even so strong and prosperous in the estimation of certain hon. members opposite as to be able hereafter to free American competition. Our industries have attracted to the centres the working population, and each week fabulous sums have slipped into the hands of our workmen, from which they come out to the benefit of the merchant, the food purveyor and the agricultural producer. The prosperity of the manufacturer! But it is that which guarantees and secures to the workman the stability of labour and the payment of his wages, the same as the number and easy circumstances of the consumers secure to a great extent the benefit of the agricultural producer. With the exception of the bad harvests of 1887, 1888 and 1889, due to the droughts or too frequent rains, the agricultural production has not decreased. Farms are cultivated with care and profit and increase in value. The raising of hay, in particular, has nearly doubled during these last years. The average prices of the agricultural market, during the last decade, was steady and much higher than during the decade ending in 1881. In the twenty judicial districts of the province of Quebec, I made a statement of the immovable sales made by the sheriffs during the years 1877 and 1878, namely, the two last years of the Mackenzie Government, and the two years 1892 and 1893, and the result to which I came was as follows: The immovable sales for 1877 and 1878 totalled 2,118, while the same sales for the years 1892 and 1893 only totalled 1,325, leaving for 1892-93 a decrease of 793. It will be observed that this difference is attributable to the principal districts where the conditions were not changed by new settlements. Following are the tabled details:

Well, I ask, is that an indication of depression and impoverishment, or is it not rather an evidence of improvement in business? I avail myself of the occasion to call the attention of the Government to a most important matter, in my opinion. Thousands of our compatriots are in the manufacturing centres of the United States. The depression which now bears on the people of the American Union has determined, among our compatriots there, a great coming back to Canada. They come back to us by thousands. According to an interesting estimate made by the 'Courrier de St. Hyacinthe,' 46,000 came back in 1892; 126,000 in 1893, and the anticipations lead us to believe that the arrivals of 1894 will number several hundred thousands. Local Governments have already promised their share of assistance and aid to the new-comers. In Montreal, a colonization society is organized. It is composed of men who, by their position and abilities, certainly command the public confidence, as they ought to command the confidence of the Government. Well, here is a quite gratuitous, natural and spontaneous immigration which comes to us. The Dominion Government is more interested than the Local Governments in the increase in population. I think it is their duty to take some measures in order to take advantage of this god-send which comes to us. I think it would be in the interest of the Dominion that the Government should send an agent in the manufacturing centres of the United States who would give lectures, distribute pamphlets and generally give all the information required to control the movement, direct our compatriots and induce them to come and settle upon our new lands, in the noble agricultural industry. Better settlers could not be found, for they are strong, honest, moral fellows, used to work as well as to our climate. In the province of Quebec, agriculture has undergone a capital transition, thanks to the intelligence, activity, work and devotedness of our Commissioner of Agriculture in Quebec, as well as of those who second him so well in his work. Agriculture has progressed in the province of Quebec by the teaching of good farming methods, as well as by the improvement of the soil and that of the stocks. The dairy industry, in particular, augurs to the province a future truly full of promises. Some people contend that our cheese, our butter and our cattle have nothing to do with protection. I think, on the contrary, that the numerous awards granted to our dairy industry at the Chicago Fair, as well as the unceasing complaints laid against the American cattle, show the importance of protection, since it prevents our dairy products and our cattle from being mixed up and mingled with inferior dairy products and tainted cattle which, were it not for it, would come here from the United States. The amendment which occupies the attention of this House is worded in general terms and it asks for a radical change. I will vote against it because it aims at the repealing of protection and the doing away with a necessary revenue which would then have to be replaced by another mode of taxation more direct, more onerous and less profitable to the people. I am at an ease to make that statement, as those who know me are aware, Mr. Speaker, that I would likewise vote against the policy of the Government should I think it my duty to do so. The Government have changed their fiscal policy to a certain extent. I wish they would have made some further changes which, I think, would be in the interest of the farming community. For instance, I wish they would have put on the free list agricultural implements and binding twine. We asked for those changes. The Government granted as a reduction of nearly half the duty. I think a decrease of nearly fifty per cent is not a bad beginning. I understand these tariff changes must be made gradually and with very much measure, discretion and prudence, so as to prevent too great a blow to the interests at stake. It is important to have some regard for such a consideration in order to judge of the situation equitably and fairly. The hon. members opposite are not satisfied with the changes made in the tariff. There is nothing astonishing in that; they are never satisfied with anything, and I go so far as believing that, should we accept their so-called platform, far from being satisfied, they would be capable of removing it themselves and taking the policy of the Government. Mr. Speaker, I believe in the financial policy of the present Government. I think that the Conservative party which, for such a long time, successfully presided over the destinies of the country, will faithfully persevere in its work of progress and patriotism, and I think, moreover, that should the Liberal party ever come into power, they would be compelled to accept three-fourths and a half of the Conservative policy to keep them.

After Recess.

Mr. TAYLOR. Mr. Speaker, I wish to engage the attention of the House for a short time while I make a few observations of a practical nature. I do not intend to deal with theories or with ancient history; but I will try to give to the House and the country a few plain, practical facts that practical, common-sense men can understand. In the first place, Mr. Speaker, I want to say that I am a protectionist to the fullest extent, believing as I do that for a country situated as we are, alongside of a highly protected country, it would be suicidal for us not to copy our neighbours' example, and before sitting down I will give my reasons for that conviction. I may say, Sir, that I have been a protectionist ever since I took any part in public affairs. Unlike the hon. leader of the Opposition, I have not changed the views I first entertained on this question. I find in the 'Canadian Manufacturer' of 16th March, the following:—

It is not perhaps so well known that the very first speech Mr. Laurier made in a legislative body contained a strong plea for protection. The speech is to be found in the English edition of "Wilfred Laurier on the platform," published a few years ago. The Quebec Legislature, where he delivered it, had nothing to do with such matters: but that did not prevent him from declaring that it was the duty of French Canadians to create national industries as a means of checking the exodus of population and removing other ills. He wanted to see the abundant raw material which the province possesses transmuted into factory goods by Quebec labour, and went so far as to endorse Papineau's advice that French Canada should buy nothing from Britain.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I hold the opinion that the hon. leader of the Opposition did at that time; but I want to see the raw material, not only of the province of Quebec, but of every province of the Dominion, transmuted into factory goods by Canadian labour. I intend to refer, in the first place, to a few observations made by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) in his reply to the hon. Minister of Finance. I do not intend to follow him through his weary three hours' speech, which the hon. members of this House have been in the habit of hearing for the last twelve years, with a few variations thrown in each year; but I have culled a few gems from that deliverance which I think deserve particular attention. I will pay no attention, Mr. Speaker, to his references to a corruption fund, a subsidized press, the exodus, natural increase, blue ruin, &c., &c., for with the hon. gentleman these expressions have become a sort of nightmare. He knows, as no other man in this country knows, what a corruption fund means, and he knows what a subsidized press means; because, if rumour is at all to be believed, the hon. gentleman has always been a large stockholder in both these institutions. The hon. gentleman, in that address, made use of the following language:—

Whereas the English tariff is wisely and justly so distributed that the chief burden after all falls on the shoulders of the upper and wealthy class, our tariff is arranged so that the chief burden falls on the shoulders of the needy, and the most heavily taxed man in Canada is the poor man with a large family to support.

The poor man in England, with his large family, has to pay taxes on his tea, his coffee, his sugar, his tobacco and other necessaries. With reference to the question of English tariff, I will read again from the 'Canadian Manufacturer,' as follows:—

The taxation is far from being equitably adjusted. From year to year 'The Financial Reformer,' a valuable publication issued by the advanced Liberals, denounces the whole arrangement as a fraud upon the poor. It estimates that the amount taken by the customs and excise duties from a workingman getting 20 shillings a week is from one-tenth to one-seventh of his earnings; while on incomes of a thousand pounds a year it is only one-twentieth. To understand this we have but to bear in mind that a tax of say sixpence per pound on tea, regardless of cost or quality, necessarily makes a bigger hole in the pocket of the poor than in the pocket of the rich consumer, and so with the duties on other articles of general consumption. The tobacco of the many is taxed 350 per cent, the cigars of the few from 15 to 50 per cent, with other inequalities of a like kind. It is reckoned that the direct taxes contribute 30 per cent of the revenue, the indirect 55, other sources 15.

While in Canada the poor man with his large family grows everything they consume, and pays no taxes on his tea, his coffee, his sugar or the other necessaries of life. His wearing apparel is all made in the country; consequently, he pays no taxes on that.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). Hear, hear.

Mr. TAYLOR. An hon. gentleman says 'hear, hear'; but before I sit down I think I shall be able to demonstrate that fact. The hon. member for South Oxford said further in that notable speech:—

The hon. gentleman must know, and if not, any of his friends from the rural districts can inform him, that within these ten or fourteen years the prices of our leading farm products have fallen, fallen, fallen, till they have touched to-day the lowest point known for forty years.

If this were the case, then the poor labouring man in Canada with his large family, would certainly have a cheap country to live in. But, Mr. Speaker, this statement is not for the poor labouring man, but is intended to catch the farmer for whom the hon. member for South Oxford and his friends appear to have a special regard at the present time. I am old enough to remember forty years back. Forty years ago I was a clerk in a country store, and I can well remember the prices that the farmers got at that time for their products. I remember that the farmers of the township where I then resided, the township of Lansdowne, drew their oats, in some cases to Kingston and in some cases to Brockville, a distance of from thirty to forty miles, and sold them at from 12½ cents to 15 cents a bushel; while to-day I am paying at my warehouse in Gananoque, 35 cents a bushel, and while hon. gentlemen opposite were in power, I purchased thousands of bushels of oats at 20 to 25 cents a bushel. Forty years ago, and often since, butter was sold at 12½ cents a pound; to-day it is worth 20 to 25 cents per pound. Pork, beef, mutton, butter, cheese, cattle of all kinds, sheep, pigs, apples, potatoes, vegetables, and grain of all kinds, save and except wheat and barley, are as high or higher to-day than any year during the last forty years. Animals of all kinds, with the exception of horses, are as high as they have been in any year during the last forty years; and the farmers know far better than hon. gentlemen opposite, the cause of the depreciation in wheat and horses. They know that the over-production of wheat in the world is the cause of the low prices. They know that the use of electricity, having driven horses from the street car service, has caused the depreciation in the value of horses. The farmers also know that, on the whole, they have never been so well off, never had so much money to their credit in the savings banks during the last forty years, as they have to-day. They do not require the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) to tell them whether they are poorer to-day than they were ten or forty years ago. The hon. gentleman, referring to the hon. the Minister of Finance, made this statement:

But if the hon. gentleman knows his business as he should know it, he must be aware that when he talks of one hundred and twenty or one hundred and fifty millions of additional savings, that is quite insignificant when compared with the loss to the farmers of Canada alone by reason of the huge depreciation which has taken place in the value of the farms from one end of the country to the other. Sir, I say, and I know whereof I affirm, that in the province of Ontario alone, there has been a decline equal to ten dollars an acre on every acre of cultivated land from one end of the province to the other, and I am informed by those who have larger power of obtaining information than myself, that what is true of Ontario is true of Prince Edward Island, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Quebec, and if the hon. gentleman will understand what that means, he will know that for every dollar that has gone into the savings bank, three or four dollars have gone out of the pockets of the farmers of Canada.

Now, I cannot speak for the other provinces, but the Ontario Government—which, by the way, is not a Tory Government—keeps a record of the values of farm lands in the province of Ontario. According to the census returns, we have in Ontario cultivated land under crop 10,366,281 acres; orchard 330,048 acres, making a total of 10,696,329 acres. We have also under pasturage 3,461,623 acres, making a total of 14,157,952 acres. Beside, we have in woodland and forest 6,933,746 acres, making a total of occupied land in Ontario of 21,091,698 acres. So that the hon. gentleman may not find fault with my calculation, I will leave out the pasturage and wooded lands and the forests, and simply take the number of acres under crop and orchard, amounting to 10,696,329 acres. This, the hon. gentleman says, is reduced $10 per acre, because, he says, every acre of cultivated land in the province of Ontario has suffered that decline in value. This reduction will amount to no less a sum than $106,963,290 of reduction in the value of cultivated land in that province during the last ten years. Now, let us see what Sir Oliver Mowat says on this subject. According to his report—the report of the Bureau of Industries for Ontario—the value of farm lands in 1882 was placed at $632,000,000, and the buildings at $132,000,000, making a total of $764,000,000. Then, in 1892, he took stock again. He makes the valuation for 1892 of farm lands, occupied lands, $615,000,000, and buildings, $195,000,000, making a grand total of $810,000,000, showing an increase in the value of lands and buildings in Ontario, according to Sir Oliver's valuation, of $66,000,000 in the last ten years. Put alongside that the valuation made by the hon. member for South Oxford.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). What provision does the hon. gentleman make for the 40,000 farms brought under cultivation since 1882?

Mr. TAYLOR. I am giving you Sir Oliver Mowat's book-keeping. The hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) says there has been a decrease of no less than $106,693,292. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman which statement is correct—that of Sir Oliver Mowat, who says there has been an increase in the value of $66,000,000, or that of the hon. member for South Oxford, who says there has been a decrease of $106,000,000? What confidence can the people have in any hon. gentleman, professing to be a statesman, who makes a statement such as that in reference to his country? But the hon. gentleman made some other observations, to which I purpose referring before I take up the tariff question. He said:

I believe there have been exacted from the people of Canada during the last fifteen years in real taxes paid, not into the treasury but into the pockets of the manufacturers as well, not less than $1,000,000,000, and for that I believe I shall, at the proper time and place, give adequate and substantial reasons.

Now, $1,000,000,000, extracted from the pockets of the people of this country, divided among the manufacturers of the country, will give a pretty large sum to each manufacturer. We have in the Dominion less than 1,000 persons engaged in manufacturing, who employ the labour of twenty persons and upwards in their factories. Divide $1,000,000,000 among these thousand manufacturers, and you will have $1,000,000 to each manufacturer in this country, besides the profits on his business. I ask if there is a sane man—aye, if there is a fool in this country—who would believe such a statement as that? I live in a manufacturing town with a population of four thousand and upwards. In that town we have some fifteen or twenty manufacturing establishments, each employing from twenty persons up to a hundred, and in one or two cases one hundred and fifty. And, Sir, the last assessment of this town, containing a population of four thousand—the assessment of the whole town, manufacturers and all—was a little less than $1,000,000. Why, Mr. Speaker, I do not think we have in Canada, all told, over twenty men who are worth a million dollars and upwards, and I do not know of a millionaire engaged in the business of manufacturing. But, according to the hon. gentleman's statement every one of these 1,000 manufacturers in the Dominion ought to be worth a million dollars or more. I speak for the manufacturers of my own town. If the wealth of all the twenty manufacturing establishments in my own town of Gananoque were consolidated it would not amount to half a million dollars. And what is true of the manufacturers there is equally true of the manufacturers throughout the Dominion. We collected last year in customs duties the sum of $21,000,000. The sum stated by the hon. gentleman—a thousand millions of dollars—would pay our customs duties at the same rate as those of last year for the next forty-seven years. The thousand millions of dollars that the hon. gentleman said the manufacturers of this country had extracted from the pockets of the people of this country would pay for the total imports of Canada for home consumption for the last ten years. Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to quote again from the hon. gentleman's speech. The hon. gentleman in that notable speech in reply to the hon. the Finance Minister, said:

I tell this House, and I tell the people of Canada anywhere and everywhere, that while I think Canada can maintain herself,— —he is doubtful whether she can or not—

—perhaps, with good government and a wise fiscal system, in reasonable comfort, independent of the United States, yet that great prosperity and anything like a full development of our resources can only come to us, and will only come to us, when we obtain, on fair and honourable terms, free access to the markets of North America. There are other considerations on which I will not dwell now—

And he goes on in the same strain, dealing with the condition and prospects of Canada, and then makes this remarkable statement:

The United States are a great country: they are rather a group of thirty nations than a single nation; they extend from the tropics to the Arctic zone; they extend from one ocean to the other, and so do we, but under circumstances of a very much more disadvantage. Our country consists of three or four isolated groups, separated from each other by tracts of wilderness which can only be traversed at very great cost and very great expense for freight. The portions of our country are separated from each other, and what is more, they have not any very great facility for mutual interchange. We are rather competitors, as I have often said, than customers of each other, and there is no portion of the Canadian group which has not a better market to the south of it—I am sorry to have to say it—than it has with the country which lies east or west.

These are the statements of the hon. gentleman occupying a seat in this House. What will be thought of them by people outside of the House when they come to read them? What are the considerations that the hon. gentleman will not refer to? Can it be possible that he is here acting as an emigration or an annexation agent for the United States? Let an immigration agent for the United States take the speech made by the hon. gentleman, have it printed and distributed in foreign countries, through France, England, Germany and other countries from which Canada expects to receive immigrants, and let an agent go from Canada to one of these countries, and, meeting an intending emigrant, present to him the advantages of coming to Canada. What will be the first word that the intending emigrant will answer? He will point the agent to a speech made by an hon. member of this House, and say: Canada is not the place for me to go to, when, alongside of it I can find a nation—no, not a nation, but thirty nations in one—with every facility for transport, for cheap trade and comfort—in fact, a perfect paradise. If I go to Canada, in order to get from one province or group of provinces to another I must pack a mule train or adopt some other expensive and inconvenient mode of travel, and I must traverse long distances through wildernesses, perhaps in danger of being eaten by wild animals or scalped by Indians. I will not go to your country, but I will go to the United States, where they have every facility for transport and for trade. The hon. gentleman says we have no facility for mutual intercourse and exchange. Why, Mr. Speaker, where is our great trans-continental railway, running from the Atlantic to the Pacific? Where is our great canal system, which is without an equal in the world? Where are all our railway systems and waterways? Yet the hon. gentleman says to the intending emigrant in a foreign country: Do not go to Canada, because you cannot get from one province to the other without travelling through great tracts of wildernesses.

An hon. MEMBER. On snowshoes.

Mr. TAYLOR. Yes; on snowshoes. Then, Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman finds fault with Canada because we are not receiving more immigrants. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, and I ask the House and the country, how can we get immigrants to the country when an hon. gentleman, occupying the position of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), paints our country in such colours as these I have just referred to. And he goes further. The hon. gentleman makes another statement. He says:

The development of wheat-raising in the North-west, for some considerable time to come, must be regarded as very problematical.

What does that mean? Why, Sir, he tells the people of older countries that wheat-raising in the North-west is and must be regarded as very doubtful. Why, Mr. Speaker, do we not all know that in the North-west, ever since that country was broken up for wheat, we have produced more bushels of wheat to the acre, and more bushels of wheat to each immigrant we have there, and wheat of a better quality than has been produced in any other country under the sun. And yet the hon. gentleman says to the intending immigrant that the question of wheat-growing in Manitoba and the North-west is doubtful. Now, Mr. Speaker, let me read the closing of the hon. gentleman's wonderful speech:

And now, Sir, these hon. gentlemen challenge us—these consistent mortals, who are shocked at our inconsistency—demand our policy, and in especial they demand mine. Sir, they shall have it. I announced it years ago; my policy from first to last, ever since this infamous system was put on the statute-book, has been to do away with protection—how, I did not care. If free trade would do it, I was for that; if continental free trade or reciprocity with the United States would do it, I was for that; if a revenue tariff would do it, I was for that. Always and at all times, from the time I was Finance Minister until the present hour, I have set my face like a flint against recognizing in any shape or way the tyranny of protection. Sir, they demand our policy. Well, Sir, they shall have our policy, and here I believe I speak for my hon. friends beside me: our policy is death to protection and war to the knife to corruption. Sir, we strike, and we will strike, for liberty and freedom from this system of protective taxation; and I tell the hon. gentlemen that we will not rest until the slavery that they have imposed upon us has become a thing of the past, and until Canadians are free, as Canadians ought to be—free to buy and sell, free to make the most they can of the opportunities God has given them. And, Sir, that the hon. gentlemen may have their question answered I move:

—And he moved the resolution now before the House. Before I deal with the last quotation that I have read from the hon. gentleman's speech, I will read a quotation from another hon. gentleman, who also criticised the Budget, the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills); because he and the hon. gentleman from South Oxford agree on certain lines in respect to protection. The hon. member for Bothwell, in his speech, said:

An ordinary democrat wagon without taxation will cost about $40, if it is a good wagon. Thirty-five per cent on that amount is $14. There are about 30,000 of these wagons sold in the Dominion every year. Fourteen times 30,000 amounts to 420,000. Now, if those 30,000 wagons came in from the United States, the hon. gentleman would by his tariff get $420,000 of public revenue. Whether it would be a fair distribution of taxation or not would depend upon his whole scheme. But that is not his object. His object is not to get money into the public treasury; that is a subordinate object in this tariff. The primary object is the development of the country, and so, from the 30,000 men who buy these wagons, the hon. gentleman collects in the year $420,000, which sum is taken from the men who earn it by their daily toil, and is given, along with the price of the wagons, to some man in Canada for the purpose of enabling him to be prosperous. I want to know if in such a transaction the hon. gentleman has not discouraged the 30,000 men to the same extent that he has encouraged the one or the ten who may be engaged in the making of those wagons? And what is true of that tax is true of every other that the hon. gentleman has imposed.

Further on in his remarks he deals with the wagon question again :

Now, in a free market, A gets his democratic wagon for $40. Under the hon. gentleman's tariff he will get it for $54. If he buys a foreign wagon, the Government will get the $14, but if he buys a democratic wagon, made in Canada, the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Taylor) will probably get it.

Mr. TAYLOR. The hon. gentleman has accused me of being a wagon-maker. I have no more interest in wagon-making or building than the hon. gentleman who is speaking. I have no interest in the building of wagons whatever.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I do not take back the principle I have enunciated, but I take back the application to the hon. gentleman. I am glad to make the correction. When the tax is on the foreign product and the Government gets the tax, there is protection to life and property as a compensation. That is a consideration. But when the wagon is manufactured in Canada and the money is paid to the Canadian manufacturer, what consideration does he give for the $14? What does the consumer get in exchange for the money? You have expropriated $14 of his money, and you give him absolutely nothing in exchange. So that whatever may be thought of protection as promoting the development of the country, there can be no doubt whatever as to its moral character.

Now, I propose for a short time to discuss protection, and see how the principle as laid down by the hon. member for Bothwell and the hon. member for South Oxford will work out. They agree that the last vestige of protection must be removed. Then I ask, Mr. Speaker, how are we going to raise a revenue? It cannot be collected on any article which we can produce, or manufacture, or grow, in this country; and our revenue must be collected on foreign goods, tea, sugar, coffee, raw cottons, &c., because if you have a revenue tariff of 17½ per cent, or any other rate, on a democrat wagon, or any other article, the home manufacturer is protected to the amount of the taxation. So that if A should buy his wagon in a foreign market at $40 and import it under a revenue tariff of, say, 17½ per cent, it would cost him $47. Then the home manufacturer would be protected to the extent of $7 on that democrat wagon under a revenue tariff of 17½ per cent. Now, in order to remove, as the hon. gentleman proposes, the last vestige of protection, you must admit every article into this country free of taxation, and you must raise your taxes by direct taxation, and only on goods that you cannot grow or produce in this country. If you remove the last vestige of protection, the home manufacturer will have protection just to the extent of the duty you levy on the article he produces, whether it be 5 per cent or 10 per cent. If it is 10 per cent, the manufacturer of a hundred dollar article has protection to the extent of $10. Buy in the cheapest market and pay no duties except on articles which we can grow or manufacture in the country, and on these, and these alone, or else by direct taxation must the revenue be raised. If the revenue of this country has got to be raised by direct taxation, the farmers are the first who will feel it. But in order to prove that protection does not increase the price to the consumer, if he will purchase in the home market, I will ask the hon. member for Bothwell, who says that what is true of the tax on a democrat wagon is true on every other article on which a tax has been imposed, how that problem will work out? By the present tariff a tax has been imposed on wheat of 15 cents a bushel, on flour of 75 cents per barrel, on meat of 2 and 3 cents a pound, and on some meat 25 per cent ad valorem; on butter, 4 cents per pound, on cheese, 3 cents per pound, on oats, 10 cents a bushel, tomatoes, 20 cents a bushel and 10 per cent; strawberries, blackberries, gooseberries, &c., 2 cents per pound, and so on through the whole list of articles produced by the farmer, the gardener, the stock-raiser and the cheese manufacturer in this country—every article they produce is protected by a tax of from 30 to 50 per cent. I ask the farmers of this country, if it would benefit them to have the duty removed off these articles I have mentioned, if you allow the American farmer to come in here and compete with them for the home market, and not allow the Canadian farmer to go into their market with his goods? I ask if that would be a benefit to the Canadian farmer, to have products of the same kind come in here to compete with theirs? Therefore, I ask, Is the proposition laid down by the hon. gentlemen opposite correct when they say that what is true of one article is equally true of all the others? For example, let us take barley, or flour, or a pound of butter, or a bushel of oats, or a quart of berries, or a barrel of apples, if you like. A wants a barrel of flour; the duty is 75 cents per barrel; he can buy flour in the United States for $2 a barrel, so that when he gets his flour into Canada it has cost him $2.75. But if he had gone to a Canadian miller, would he have had to pay $2.75 for it? If so, and the Canadian had purchased his wheat at the same price as the United States miller, then the 75 cents would have gone into the pocket of the Canadian miller. But such is not the case. A could have purchased his barrel of flour from the Canadian miller at $2, the same price as he paid the American miller, and thus have patronized and employed home labour and have left his money in Canada. But if the Canadian miller can get the raw product, the wheat, at the same price as the American miller, he can sell the manufactured article at the same price as the American miller. If A came to the Canadian miller to purchase a barrel of flour, he would have paid $2 for it. B, who went to the United States to buy a barrel of flour, would pay 75 cents into the treasury; but I ask hon. gentlemen opposite if the man who paid $2 to the Canadian miller would have paid 75 cents into the pockets of the Canadian manufacturer? Buying at home gives labour to our home employees; but if you go over to the United States and buy there, you give employment to the labour of that country. What is true of the barrel of flour is true of every other article on which there is a tax imposed, even on the democrat wagons, because a democrat wagon or any other article can be produced in this country as cheaply as in the United States, if we have the raw material as cheap as they have it. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) says there is sold every year in Canada 30,000 democrat wagons. I ask him, where are those built? In Canada. And by whom? By our own people. It will take one man fifteen days to build each one of those wagons. What does that mean? Giving employment in this country to 1,500 people the year round. Those 1,500 men represent a population of 7,500 souls. I ask the farmers, is it for their benefit to have those 7,500 living in this country, making wagons, and they, the farmers, feeding those people? That means to the farmers a home market in every town and village throughout the country where those wagons are built, and like the barrel of flour, the democrat wagon can be produced, and is being produced to-day in Canada, of better quality than the same article is being produced and built in the United States. The duty is simply for the purpose of protecting the home market, for the employment of our own people in our country. What did the delegation of farmers who left my county and visited the United States last year say on this point? They made some reference to the subject, and I think, when hon. gentlemen hear the names of the gentlemen who composed that deputation, there is not a farmer in the united counties of Leeds and Grenville who will dispute a word they say. What did they say:

We, the delegates selected, whose names I hereto annex, met as agreed at Brockville on the 4th day of July and proceeded to Ogdensburg, and spent three days driving through the different portions of the best farming and dairying sections in St. Lawrence and Jefferson counties in the State of New York, stopped at farm houses, talked with farmers and cheese manufacturers, visited a number of stores, obtaining samples of goods and prices also, visited harness shops, agricultural implement dealers, carriage dealers, blacksmiths' shops, &c., &c., in order to carry out the instructions contained in your letter. We embody in this our report to you, several interviews we had with some of the men with whom we talked. From all we could learn we found that farmers in Jefferson and St. Lawrence counties, where we visited, pay as much or more for what they have to purchase, and get no more for the produce they have to sell, than do farmers in the county of Leeds. We also found that they are not any more prosperous and from all we could gather are more heavily mortgaged, than farmers in the county of Leeds. We also found that well improved farms with the very best of soils, free from broken lands and lying within from two to ten miles of the city of Ogdensburg, as well as other localities where we made inquiries, can be purchased much cheaper than land of the same quality, with the same improvements similarly situated in the county of Leeds; that lands have depreciated in value more in the last ten years in St. Lawrence and Jefferson counties, than similarly situated lands in the county of Leeds. We found that cotton goods of all kinds will average about the same in the United States as in Canada; woollen goods of all kinds and clothings are very much higher in the States than in Canada; sugar and teas are higher in the States than in Canada; provisions about the same; agricultural machinery and binder twine are higher in the States than in Canada; wagons and buggies, considering quality, the Canadian goods are as cheap if not cheaper than the American; cheese furnishings are higher in the States than in Canada, while cheese is not so high, taxes irrespective of school and poll taxes, are higher in the States than in Canada.

The delegates gave a detailed list of the prices of the various articles on the Canadian side and on the American side, and I will quote one or two examples:

IMPLEMENTS.

| Canadian Prices. | | American Prices. | |
|---|----------------|---|----------------|
| Best binders | $100 to $110 | Best binders. | $120 to $135 |
| Reapers | 60 to 65 | Reapers | 60 to 65 |
| Mowers | 40 to 45 | Mowers | 45 to 48 |
| Horse rakes | 22 | Horse rakes | 25 |
| Seeders | 48 | Seeders | 50 |
| 10-hoe drill | 60 | 10-hoe drill | 65 |
| Randall disk harrow | 22 | Randall disk harrow | 28 |
| General purpose plough, Frost & Wood pattern, or the Wilkinson | 13 | General purpose plough, Frost & Wood pattern, or the Wilkinson | 16 |
| Binder twine, standard | 0 9½c. | Binder twine, standard | 0 11 c. |
| Binder twine, manilla | 0 10½c. | Binder twine, manilla | 0 12½c. |
| | | Last year's prices for binder twine were | 12 & 13c. |

The prices of machinery are quoted for cash in both markets and qualities are equal.

That is what the gentlemen stated, and they published interviews which they had with farmers in different places through some of the best farming sections of St. Lawrence and Jefferson counties. The report is subscribed to by Andrew Gray, Esq., farmer and warden of the united counties of Leeds and Grenville; John A. Webster, Esq., farmer, reeve of the front of Leeds and Lansdowne; John Connor, farmer and cheese manufacturer; Alexander Atcheson, farmer, president of the South Leeds Agricultural Association; John Roddick, miller and farmer, ex-reeve of Leeds and Lansdowne (rear); Thomas Berney, agricultural implement dealer, ex-reeve of rear of Young and Eascott; John Franklin, farmer and president of the Farmers' Institute for Brockville Riding; E. G. Adams, Esq., farmer and implement dealer, ex-reeve of North Crosby, and John R. Dargavel, general merchant and township clerk for South Crosby. That is the testimony given by eight or nine disinterested witnesses, who visited stores, &c., on the American side of the line, and on their return made their report, and no hon. gentleman in this House, and no gentleman outside of it, can dispute successfully the facts therein stated. Let us take a reaper. The farmer can purchase one in Canada of the best quality for $110. For a reaper of the same quality in the United States the farmer has to pay $125. But suppose we take the statement of the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) in regard to the wagon, and for argument's sake we say that the Canadians could purchase as good a reaper in the United States for $90 as he could in Canada for $110. The duty or tax, or whatever you wish to call it, is 20 per cent, and the freight will be $2. So the farmer would have to pay $18 of duty and $2 freight, which would bring the cost of the American machine in Canada up to $110. It is true that the $18 has gone into the public revenue, but the $90 of Canadian money is lost to this country; just as soon as that machine is worn out Canada is $90 the poorer. But the loss does not stop there. It will take one man 30 days, or 30 men one day, to build that machine in Canada. If the machine is built in the United States the employment for these men will no longer exist in this country; besides the men building the machine at the factory, see all the other labour, the benefit of which we are deprived of: the man who mines the iron at the mine, the moulder who moulds the iron, the machinist who fits up the machine, the lumberman who cuts up the lumber and saws it at his mill to put into that perfect piece of machinery, the paint manufacturer who manufactures the paint, the painter who paints the machine, the man who makes the fittings for that machine—all these men are deprived of their work, and the industry is transplanted to the south of the line. Let us consider what that would mean to the farmers of this country. A small army of men are engaged in the manufacture of these implements in almost every province of the Dominion; the farmers of Canada are supplying these men with food, and let me ask: will it be profitable to the farmers of this country to compel these workmen to emigrate to the United States? Then the question comes down to a practical issue: if we can get our machines made in this country out of our raw material, and made and sold as cheaply as the American farmer gets his machine, why in the world should we adopt such a policy as to lower our tariff down to what my hon. friend says it ought to be lowered to, namely: to the last vestige of protection? Why in the name of common sense should we drive every manufacturer and every labourer in this country to work in the United States, or elsewhere, a result which would be inevitable if the policy advocated by the Liberal party were adopted? The hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) says that there are 367,000 people, mostly heads of families, employed in one branch or other of the industries of this country. This means, at five to a family, that there are 1,835,000 souls depending on one branch or the other of the manufacturing industries, which produce goods in Canada for use by our own people. Does it not mean an immense thing to the farmers of Canada that they have the opportunity to supply with their products this great multitude of Canadians? Would it be a benefit to the Canadian farmer to have all these people driven out of the country, as they would be, were we not producing our own iron, our own coal, our own coal oil, our own sugar, our own cottons, our own woollens, our own agricultural implements, our own boots and shoes, and in fact every article that we manufacture? If these 1,800,000 people were to be deprived of the protection that they have to-day they would simply have to go to the United States or some other foreign country. If, according to hon. gentlemen opposite, the last vestige of protection were to be removed, this multitude of people would have to disappear with it, and wherein would it be a gain to our farmers if they were obliged to send their products after them? What benefit, I ask, would it be to the farmer of this country if he had to take his wheat, his flour, his butter, his cheese, his vegetables, his poultry, in fact everything he produces, to a brother farmer, and ask him to purchase from him, when the brother farmer had a full and ample supply of the same goods to dispose of himself? Mr. Speaker, I ask: do the farmers of this country not know their own business? Why was a delegation of farmers here a few days ago waiting upon the Government to ask them—what? Asking them to change the ad valorem duty and to raise it to a specific duty on their pork. This was the request of a deputation of farmers who knew their own business best.

They stated that pork and beef-raising, together with the dairying industry, is their line of manufacture, and that they want this industry, as well as everything they grow and produce, protected, not by ad valorem, but by a specific duty. They made this request, not for the purpose of raising the price to the consumer, but in order to keep the home market for themselves. These farmers were honest enough to say: We do not care what protection you put on any other manufactured articles; keep the article that we manufacture properly protected, and at the same time keep the other manufactures properly protected also, because local competition will keep the prices low enough. And the farmers, on almost every article they do produce, are protected in the same way. When farm products are taxed from 30 to 50 per cent, because there is from 30 to 50 per cent tax—if you call it a tax—on the farm produce of the country, then labouring men of this country have a right to the same protection on their labour. The labouring men of Canada are not complaining of the duty on farm products, although I see that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Lepine) who represents the labouring men of Montreal, has a notice on the Paper, asking the Government to take the tax off butter and cheese, and eggs, and pork, and these things. I believe that it is done simply because the labourers say: If the farmers of the country want the protection removed from the articles that the workingmen of Montreal are protected on, then let the Government take the protection off the articles which we are consuming, and which are raised by the farmers of this country. A few years ago, Mr. Speaker, I moved a resolution in this House asking the Government to place a duty on pork. A year previous to my moving that resolution Canada had imported from the United States over $12,000,000 worth of pork and beef, and the products thereof, for the use of the people of this country. The Government placed a duty on pork and beef, and the farmers of this country have developed that branch of their industry to such an extent that last year, not only did they produce enough pork to supply the wants of our people, but they had also some for export as well, and they have kept that $12,000,000 at home which a few years ago were sent to the United States to purchase these products. The farmers of this country know their own business. They know that they do not want the American beef, the American pork, the bogus American butter, oleomargarine, the American cheese, American fruit, vegetables, corn, &c., to come into this country free of duty. They can produce enough in Canada now to fully supply the wants of our home market, and they want the American products kept out. As I said before, they want a duty on these products, not for the purpose of raising the price to the consumers, but simply to keep out of this market similar products to theirs, and of which there is a surplus, and more than a surplus, in the United States. I received a letter to-day from a farmer, who, I may say, is president of one of the Patron lodges in my own county. I may say that I think the Patrons discuss these questions thoroughly at the present day, because they are pretty well enlightened by their paper, called the 'Farmer's Sun,' which is a reprint of the local paper published by my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills), or his organ

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). No.

Mr. TAYLOR. The hon. gentleman gets the credit of its being his organ. At all events it is the Liberal organ of western Ontario, and the organ of the Patrons of Industry is a reprint of it.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I have got no organ.

Mr. TAYLOR. Well, you get credit for having a local organ, as I get the credit of having one in my town.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). But my hon. friend did not admit that.

Mr. TAYLOR. Well, I admit it now. But I say that the official organ of the Patrons of Industry gives the Government no credit for the reduction that they have made in the taxation; therefore I fancy it is a Grit organ simply, with a new headline calling it the Patrons' official organ. Here is the letter I have received:

SOUTH LAKE, April 9, 1894.

DEAR MR. TAYLOR,—I take the present opportunity to drop you a line to let you know something about the feeling of the farmers in this locality with reference to the new tariff. They are quite well satisfied with everything except pork, which has been reduced from 2 cents per pound to 25 per cent. If we farmers are well protected in our natural products, we would not exact too close a protection on other things, such as machinery, &c., as it does not affect us so much. The majority of farmers in this country are provided with necessary machinery required. We do not require to buy implements or such like every year. So it would not affect us very much, as machinery will last for years if taken care of. We do not want to monopolize the whole prerogative at too much of a sacrifice to other branches of industry.

(Signed) JOHN BIRMINGHAM.

What the farmers desire is to have the duty on pork placed at 3 cents a pound. On the same line, the president of one of the Patrons' lodges in my county writes to me that they are perfectly well satisfied with the tariff, except that they want the duty on pork increased. They do not care what the duty is on machinery and other articles, so long as they themselves are properly protected. Mr. Speaker, I have my own views on the tariff. I am strongly in favour of protection to all our native industries, agriculture, manufacturing, mining, fishing, &c. In the beginning of February last I was requested to meet with the Patrons of Industry of my county and give them my views on the tariff. I embodied my views in a letter which I read to them on that occasion, and I am safe in saying that among the three or four hundred farmers present nine out of ten approved of the views I expressed. Those were my views then, and they are my views now. I asked them to give me any suggestions that occurred to them, so that I might press these views on the Government when they came to make any changes in the tariff. I will read to you, Mr. Speaker, the letter which I read at that meeting :

I have read over carefully the United States Wilson Bill as it is now before the Senate and beg to offer a few suggestions as to what I think we should do in respect to the revision of our tariff. One thing should be borne in mind—we should as far as possible copy the Americans, that is, to legislate for our own country and people. The whole tone of their tariff is to protect the industries of the United States, they have not lowered the tariff on any line on which they fear competition and have only placed on the free list such articles as they need for raw material, food or articles of which they have a large surplus and on which they do not fear competition.

Therefore, in that respect, I hope our Government will copy them—in many respects we are different to them and on some lines require a higher rate of protection than they do. Our market is limited and our raw material has to be imported, while they have a larger market and have the raw material at hand.

On cotton and woollen goods, as I take it from their proposed tariff, they are higher on many lines than we are, and they have both specific and ad valorem duties.

We should make as large a free list as we can in raw materials for our manufactures, at the same time not admit raw material free where we have or can produce it in this country.

Iron and steel is the principal raw material for most of our manufacturers, therefore, I do not think as these are being produced in the country, that the tariff on them should be lowered. There are some grades of iron and steel, such as Norway and Swedes iron and high grade of steel, that are not made in the country, these should be placed on the free list, but the others should be kept as they are, in order to develop our iron and steel industries, and, in my opinion, one thing which has prevented a more rapid development of them, is the fact that scrap iron has been allowed to be imported at a low rate of duty, this should be increased about $4 per ton over the present duty, this will act as a further bounty to the iron and steel producers, and then leave the duty as it is on manufactured iron in order to protect the rolling-mill men; if not sufficient, increase it a little, but I think as it is will be ample, and I find that all the manufacturers of goods of which iron and steel are the raw materials prefer to have the duties remain as they are on iron and steel, viz. : $12 and $13 per ton, than to have them lowered and than reduce the tariff on their manufactured product.

I find also with all classes who have supported the National Policy, they are pretty generally satisfied with the tariff as it stands, and from all I could gather from the meetings held by the controllers this was the case, save and except on agricultural implements, barb wire, binder twine and coal oil.

If the Wilson Bill passes I would meet them on agricultural implements, but you want to guard against them, applying section 6, page 92, of the Wilson Bill to our goods being sent into their country. Make our tariff read : Ploughs, tooth and disc harrows, harvesters, reapers, drills, mowers, horse rakes, cultivators, threshing machines and cotton gins—Free. Provided, that if any or each of these articles is imported from any country which imposes a duty, or by local or trade mark laws prevents the free importation and sale of any of each of the aforesaid articles exported from Canada, then the duty on such articles coming from such country into Canada shall be the same as it was prior to the passing of this Act.

Then in order to place agricultural implement manufacturers on as good footing in regard to raw material as the American manufacturers and in order to enable them to sell these articles as low to our farmers as the American manufacturers can to their people, I would give them on all the iron and steel, cotton, drilling, &c., made in Canada, which entered into the manufacture of these articles, a bonus equal to the duty on the iron, steel and cotton, the same as if they had imported it—but I would only pay such bonus when the raw material was a Canadian product. That is, I would not allow them to import their iron, steel, cotton, &c., then give a bonus equal to the duty, but would give the bonus for selling our own raw material. This will help our iron, steel, and cotton industries, and at same time will be a great boon to the farmers, particularly in the North-west.

As to barb wire this I would put down to 12½ per cent same as the binder twine, leaving binder twine where it is.

As to coal oil, if American oil for fuel and refining purposes could be admitted free without injuring our Canadian industry, I would do so, but if it was likely to prove disastrous to our Canadian industry, leave it as it is, as the grievance in the older provinces has been met by the price being reduced as it is to 12½ cents per gallon, but I would compel the oil men to see that the North-west and eastern provinces were likewise supplied at reasonable rates.

As to breadstuffs and farinaceous substances, see American Tariff under this head, page 29 of the Wilson Bill, article 189.

What benefit is it to us to have the articles here named on the free list conditionally with them, they want us to take their corn, and what do they take as an equivalent ?

I would make ours read, buckwheat, corn or maize, cornmeal, oats, oatmeal, rye, rye flour, wheat, wheat flour, potatoes, peas, beans, barley, barley meal, bran, shorts, hay,—free; provided each of the above products shall be admitted free of duty only from any country which imposes no import duty on any of the above named articles when exported from Canada to said country.

This, I think, would be a fair exchange—let them take our potatoes, barley and hay in exchange for their corn. Corn is as much used for food for animals as hay is; therefore, I think we should include hay as well as barley in the list of bread-stuffs.

I have discussed this phase of it with many of our farmers, both Grit and Tory, and they all agree that this would be fair, and if we cannot get this, stay as we are. All agree don't take their corn unless they take our hay and barley.

As to meats of all kinds, I would let them stay as they are, except that I would strike out the pork which is now admitted at 1½ cents per pound, and make it all 3 cents. This will also benefit the farmers, who are now producing pork in such large quantities, and I don't think it will be much of a tax on the lumbermen, and this is one thing that came out prominent at the meetings held by the controllers—keep the duty on pork and make it all 3 cents per pound.

As to fruits—I would keep the duties where they are.

Salt—I would leave it as it is as not to injure our Canadian industry.

I would place lumber on the free list same as they have, as well as what we have on now.

In general, I say make as large a free list as we can for raw material and necessaries of life. Tax luxuries all you like. Protect all our industries in such a way as we can retain our own trade and give employment to our own people, not only in good times but in times of depression like the present. Local competition will keep the prices low enough, in fact, leave our tariff as it is on all manufacturing lines except those I have mentioned, and I think our friends will, in both town and country, be satisfied, and more than our friends among the manufacturers and workmen, and if you reduce it to 5 per cent you will not please our opponents.

Besides, if the Tariff is lowered on many of our manufactures we will injure them, and the workmen will be the ones that will have to suffer by having to work for lower wages in order to enable the manufacturers to compete with foreign goods, and at the present time, owing to the depressive state of affairs in the United States, many of our manufacturers find it impossible to compete successfully—so that in some lines increased protection should be given.

Now, these were the views I entertained then, that I have always entertained, and that I entertain now in reference to the tariff question. The hon. the Finance Minister in his Budget speech has voiced the same view—that it is the intention of the Government to give ample protection to all our industries, agricultural, manufacturing, &c., to enable them to successfully compete, in the home market, with the foreign product. In the resolutions which he has laid on the Table, owing to the depressed state of affairs prevailing in the United States, I don't think that, in all lines, he has done this; and no doubt, when we go into committee, some changes will have to be made on pork and on some other lines, which, like pork, nothing but specific duties will properly protect in times of depression or when goods must be sold at slaughter prices, as they are being sold to-day in the United States. Therefore, when we get into committee, I hope and expect to see the duty changed on pork from ad valorem to specific, as well as on some other articles on which I do not think the present resolutions properly protect the home market. The hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), in that speech which he delivered in reply to the Minister of Finance, laid down his platform, and that platform is to wipe out the last vestige of protection. Well, Mr. Speaker, I have laid down my platform, which is protection to all our industries, agricultural, manufacturing and others. Now, I will make this proposition to the hon. member for South Oxford. If he will have 8,000 copies of that wonderful speech of his printed, from which I have quoted, I will have 8,000 copies printed of the speech I have just delivered. We will jointly employ some person to address a copy of each speech to each elector in the South Riding of Leeds. And the South Riding of Leeds, is a constituency composed of one town with a population of 4,000, two incorporated villages with a population of about 1,000 each, and eight townships, thoroughly settled by wealthy, prosperous, well-to-do farmers. The eight townships have a total voting population of between 6,000 and 7,000, and the constituency, being equally divided between Liberals and Conservatives, has always been considered a doubtful one. Now, we will send a copy of each speech to each elector in that constituency. That is the only electioneering we shall do—simply leave the arguments on each side to the intelligence of the electors. I will resign my seat, the hon. gentleman will resign his, and we will leave the verdict to the intelligent electors of that riding, without any canvassing on either side. And if I am not returned by a very large majority, I will retire from public life, and admit that the people of this country are not in favour of protection to our home industries—be they agricultural, manufacturing, or otherwise.

Mr. FORBES. Will you make the same offer with reference to South Oxford?

Mr. TAYLOR. South Leeds is not a Tory hive, but a doubtful constituency, whereas South Oxford is a Grit hive; but I would not be afraid to extend the challenge and let us run the same day for both constituencies. I have always been a practical man, and I believe this will be a practical solution of the question—leaving it to the intelligent electors of this country to say whether they want the last vestige of protection removed, or whether they want protection to their pork, to the produce raised on their farms, and to the labour of the country, so that our farmers may have a chance to feed that labour. With this invitation to the hon. gentleman I shall conclude my remarks, thanking you, Mr. Speaker, and the House for your very patient hearing.

Mr. CASEY. The hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat, has certainly proposed a very novel form of tournament. He is not satisfied with the party platform laid down by his leaders, and has laid before us a platform which he declares to be his own. He wishes the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), to resign his seat, in which case the hon. gentleman will resign his own, and they will fight the matter out under certain very peculiar conditions. I think, in view of the fact that the hon. member did not very largely increase his majority on the last election in the county of South Leeds, that he would be perhaps rash in carrying out that proposal.

Mr. TAYLOR. It was only 106.

Mr. CASEY. But there was a reduction as compared with the previous election, even without the eight thousand speeches of the hon. member for South Oxford, which the hon. gentleman now proposes to circulate in that county. The hon. gentleman says he has always been a consistent protectionist. I am very sorry he did not, like his distinguished leader, see the errors in time. It may be perhaps because the Finance Minister did see his errors—his clerical errors—in time, that the hon. member for South Leeds is now so very warm a protectionist, although he denies having any connection with that democrat wagon that went through the error with a load of starch, which my hon. friend from North Grey (Mr. Lauderkin) alluded to. I certainly understood that the hon. member for South Leeds (Mr. Taylor), had an interest in the manufacture, if not of wagons, of certain parts of them, such as wheels, hubs, spokes, &c. I am sorry he is not here to say to what extent that report is true. But I must pass from the hon. gentleman's remarks rather rapidly, because it will take all the time I wish to occupy to go through my own notes. I must call attention, however, to one or two new points in political economy mentioned by that hon. gentleman. He has laid it down as a principle that whenever you buy a thing in a foreign country you lose the money you pay for it. He gave the example of a reaping machine that could be bought for $90 in the States, but which costs $100 in Canada; and he said that notwithstanding the difference in price, there was a gain to Canada in purchasing the machine on this side, because in the other case the $90 were lost to us and went to the United States. If that is the way the hon. gentleman makes bargains in his own business, I am astonished at the success he seems to have made of it. If he pays out $90 in business without getting at least $90 worth in exchange, he is not the man I take him for. I do not believe that the people of Canada pay out their money without getting a return, and it is certainly an absolutely new principle in political economy that money sent out of the country to buy money's worth is lost to us. Another new contribution on his part to the science of political economy is his advocacy of a tax to keep out certain articles of which we produce a surplus for export to foreign countries. This is just about the same thing as if he should propose means to prevent water from running up hill, to prevent anything from acting in a way in which it could not possibly act. The notion of putting a protective duty upon an article of which we produce a surplus, or rather the imposing of a tax on such an article with the idea that it can possibly be a protection, is about the silliest it is possible to conceive. The tax upon that of which we produce a surplus is of the kind described by my hon. friend for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) as a sham tax. If I recollect well, when the hon. gentleman spoke, he made the statement that there were taxes for revenue and taxes for development—usually called by our friends opposite protective taxes and “sham taxes”—and, as the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Taylor) made allusion to my friend from Bothwell's (Mr. Mills) speech and did not seem to understand the hon. gentleman's language, I would like to call attention to the words he quoted from the speech of the hon. member from Bothwell:

And what is true of that tax is true of every other that the hon. gentleman has imposed, not with the view of getting revenue into the treasury, but with the view of development. □

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). He stopped at the word “imposed.”

Mr. CASEY. Yes; the hon. gentleman stopped at the word “imposed,” leaving it to be imagined that my friend from Bothwell alluded to all taxes under the National Policy. Such was evidently not his intention, as he could not mean to refer to sham taxes such as those on wheat, butter, cheese, cattle, and other items of which we export a surplus. So much for the remarks of my hon. friend from Leeds (Mr. Taylor). As for my own remarks, I shall imitate the regulation preacher by taking a text. That text is so long that assuredly, I shall not trouble the House by reading it before I begin. My text is the speech of the hon. Minister of Finance at length, and at large, wherever I can pick a gem or find a clerical error on which to descant. Perhaps I had better put the sermon under a few heads. If I lose any of my heads, or if I lose my own head, in attempting to look after the heads of my discourse, I shall have to beg the indulgence of the House. The first I shall refer to is the question: What is the issue between the parties in this House? The Minister of Finance in the course of his speech was very anxious that the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) should give him a definite statement of the Liberal policy on the trade question. Several hon. gentlemen on that side of the House, even after the speech of the hon. member for South Oxford, which they had evidently not read—and it was equally evident that they had not read the resolution which he proposed—repeated the demand that a specific statement of the Liberal policy should be given. I hope that the Minister of Finance at least, not to speak of his followers who did not exercise their minds enough to read up the issue they were discussing, is no longer in doubt as to what the policy of this side of the House is. It is put fairly and distinctly in the amendment moved by the hon. member for South Oxford. The issue is a direct one between the policy of maintaining a tariff for revenue purposes only, and the policy of maintaining a tariff with a view rather to the development of certain industries than to the raising of revenues for the country. It is not necessary to read the whole of the resolution in question, but I must call attention to one portion of it :

That, to that end, the tariff should be reduced to the needs of honest, economical and efficient government, should have eliminated from it the principle of protection to particular industries at the expense of the community at large, and should be imposed for revenue only :

That it should be so adjusted as to make free, or bear as lightly as possible upon, the necessities of life, and to promote freer trade with the whole world, particularly with Great Britain and the United States.

This policy is the policy of our side of the House. The policy of the hon. Minister of Finance on the other hand, as he has told us, is one of protection with incidental revenue as opposed to one for revenue without regard to protection. What he desires to secure through the tariff is protection. That secured, he does not object to make a certain revenue out of the tariff. He said in the early part of his speech :

I wish, at this early stage of my remarks upon this subject, to say that, so far as the revenue aspect is concerned, it is of infinitely less importance than the effect of the principle and the details of the tariff upon the trade and development of a country.

And then a little further on :

The principles of a tariff have nothing to do in this year 1893-94 with the amount of money which is required for the country's expenditure ; and the fact that thirty-eight millions of dollars are raised under it is neither an argument for its support nor an argument for its condemnation.

That is a clear declaration that it does not matter how much money you raise by the tariff, how much money you make the people pay, so long as you secure what he calls development or protection for certain industries. That seems to me to be a strange declaration of policy, but it is, at all events, clear and unmistakable. He makes it a little stronger by saying :

So that the principal aspect in which the tariff is to be viewed is as to its effect upon the trade and development of the country.

And further on towards the end of his remarks, he declares specifically :

I want to state here that the Government of to-day, and the party which supports the Government of to-day, take their stand squarely and fairly upon the embodiment and upon the preservation of the principle of protection in the tariff, the degree of that protection to be according to the circumstances of industry and the conditions of business and of trade at the present time.

Now, Sir, the issue is clear : it is an issue between a tariff for the sake of protection and treating the revenue question as one of slight account, and a tariff framed for the purpose of revenue and taking no account of protection at all, but which would necessarily involve a certain amount of incidental protection as long as the tariff was levied upon articles which could be manufactured in the country. Now, Sir, that brings me to the second head—what is protection ? The hon. Finance Minister has defined that for us. He says :

The third method is that which all great countries at the present time, with the exception of Great Britain, have adopted and have in practice and that is the protective system, in which a list of articles is selected and upon which imposts are placed with the design, not only of raising a revenue, but of protecting the country in its various interests, in its labour and in its general development.

Selecting a list of articles for the purpose of protecting them at the expense of the rest of the community is, then, protection, for the Minister has been frank enough at least to admit that protection can only exist at the expense of the unprotected part of the community. He says :

Another objection that has been made to the National Policy and to the protective principle in it, is : that the cost of many manufactured goods has been enhanced to the consumer on account of the rates imposed. Now, Sir, I grant that argument at once to a certain extent. I say that in the initial years of a National Policy with a protective principle in it, it will have the effect of enhancing the cost of goods, and that at the first the cost of goods will be very closely up to the measure of the protection which was given. If it does not have that effect why should it ever be adopted at all, and what is the good of it ?

That is what we have been arguing for many years, ever since protection was first introduced, that the protective system did enhance the cost of the protected goods and enhanced it very nearly up to the amount of duty imposed. That argument was resisted and denied continuously through all the debates we have had upon the subject ; it has even been resisted and denied during the present debate and after the Finance Minister has made the frank confession which I have just read. The hon. Minister, however, proceeds to modify that confession by urging that, although in the initial stages of a protective tariff it may have that effect, internal competition ultimately takes the place of external competition and reduces the price to as low a rate as it would have been if the duty had not been imposed. We are often charged with theoretical treatment of trade subjects. Now, Sir, that is a purely theoretical, a purely 'doctrinaire' way of treating the question of protection. It sounds very fine in theory, but it does not work out in practice. When this internal competition reaches a certain point, those who are competing with each other, instead of continuing to cut each other's throats, join together and reduce their product to such a point that they can take the full advantage of the customs tax imposed, and pool the profits. That is what has been done in the woollen trade, what has been done in the cotton trade, what has been done in the sugar trade, what is being rapidly done in the agricultural implement trade, and what will be done in every trade in the country where competition reaches such a point as to threaten the profits secured by the high protective tax. Internal competition can never reduce the prices materially, because that result will be prevented by consolidation, whether that consists in a combine, or in the purchase by the large concerns of their smaller rivals. But, apart from this question of competition, apart from the consideration of the effects of combines, I must ask the Minister, if the prices are lower, no matter by what process, under a protective tariff, why is it that the protection cannot, after a certain time, be taken away? If, as urged by hon. gentlemen opposite, prices are now as low in Canada as they would be if there were no protection, why can they not safely eliminate the whole of the protective principle from the tariff? For, if their contention is true, their friends, the manufacturers, would lose nothing by such a course. The hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Taylor) has told us to-night how many things were made cheaper in Canada under the National Policy than they are in the United States, and sold cheaper. If that be the case, surely we need no protection. But we do not find that the Government, in this matter, more than others, carries out the logical sequence of its theory. The hon. Minister of Finance says that the sacrifice, which he admits is demanded from the consumer of Canada by his protective taxes, is necessary to obtain for ourselves a "vantage ground," even though we have to pay for it at first, in order that these industries may be developed, and in order that we may grow up to be a progressive and self-dependent people. Now, it does not seem to result from the history of protection in this country, that we are growing any more progressive or self-dependent than we were before, if these industries which have been protected, still ask that that protection be continued. We cannot call ourselves a progressive people, when we are compelled, on the confession of the Minister of Finance, to pay a bonus to our manufacturers to keep them alive. That is not a sign of progress, that is not a sign of self-dependence; it is a sign that our industries are in the same sickly condition they were supposed to be in in 1879, when this cure-all tariff was introduced. But, Sir, apart from the merits and virtues of the tariff, the Minister claims that it has been endorsed and re-endorsed by the people of this country as a protective tariff, that the National Policy, as introduced in 1878, was a protective tariff, that it was endorsed by the people in 1878 as protective in principle, and has been re-endorsed on that ground in every election since. Sir, I venture to dispute all these points. When the attention of the House was first called to what afterwards became the National Policy, by Sir John Macdonald, in the session of 1878, he did not lay it down to us as a scheme of protection at all; he spoke of it as a readjustment of the tariff, that was to develop increased prosperity in nearly every industry in the country, that was to encourage and develop an active interprovincial trade, "and, moving, as it ought to do, in the direction of a reciprocity of tariff with our neighbours, so far as the varied interests of Canada may demand, will greatly tend to secure for this country eventually a reciprocity of trade." That was what the National Policy proposed in 1878, not a policy of protection for protection's sake, but a policy of reciprocity of tariff, for the sake of getting reciprocity of trade. Most of us can remember the heated debates that went on, not only in this House, but throughout the country. We were told that the Yankees taxed our goods so much, and let us reciprocate by putting an equal tax on their goods. What for? For the sake of protection? No, but in order that we might have something to offer them in order to obtain reciprocity. Reciprocity was held out as the goal of the National Policy from beginning to end; and it was the idea of obtaining reciprocity from the United States by means of a high tariff, that induced the electors to support that policy. The electors in 1878 did not consciously vote for a protective tariff for the sake of protection—at least they did not all do it, in any part of the country. I believe, in the Maritime Provinces especially, the idea of reciprocity with the United States as the ultimate goal of the sacrifice we would have to make in the meantime, was the principal thing that carried the elections. That was the principle of legislation proposed by Sir John A. Macdonald in 1878, reciprocity of tariff for the sake of obtaining reciprocity of trade. Now, let us come to the next election, in 1882. Does any member of this House believe that was decided purely on tariff lines, that it was a full and unbiassed re-endorsation of the principle of protection? Some hon. member says, "Yes." Hon. gentlemen will recollect that in the election of 1882 the Government relied on certain other forces than protection. We had a reconstruction of the constituencies of the country, called by us the gerrymander, called by hon. gentlemen opposite by names much less appropriate. The constituencies of Ontario at least were cut and clipped and reunited in such a way that in many counties minorities would elect a majority of members. In the county of Middlesex, with a large majority of Reformers, only one Reformer was returned out of four members. I am not going to enter into the details of the gerrymander measure, but all hon. members are familiar with the fact that the constituencies were so arranged that minorities in many places elected majorities of representatives. Then there was the Canadian Pacific Railway, which had just got under full headway of construction. It was a vast engine of political support to the Government at that time, not only in the way of direct cash support, which I do not doubt was given, but in the way of influence exercised, not only in the North-west, but in Ontario and Quebec. Besides, we had still lingering in the country the effects of the great boom in the North-west, credit for which was given to the enterprising exploits of the Government. It was thought the country had entered upon an era of great prosperity, because a large amount of borrowed money was being spent, and spent where it would do the most good. The gerrymander and the Canadian Pacific Railway had infinitely more to do with the carrying of the election for the Conservative party in 1882 than had the National Policy, which had developed into a protection policy. I must admit that although the hon. gentlemen proposing the National Policy did not propose it as a protective tariff, yet when the Government came to frame the tariff they framed it as a protective one, retaining the principle of protection, but not giving effect to the other ideas embodied in the original text of the National Policy. Coming to the election of 1887, what influences had the Government in that year to enable them to remain in power besides the tariff? They had still the gerrymander, the effect of which was not worn out then, and is not worn out yet. The Canadian Pacific Railway was still at the back of the Government, as in 1882. Enormous and rich combines of manufacturers had been formed, and they were also at the back of the Government. Contractors had begun to make large profits, which enabled them to subscribe funds very freely to the Government, of which we had some little insight during the investigation of 1891. The Postmaster General could tell the House something about that matter, as we have seen so many receipts with his name attached, about the pouring of large sums of money, which the contractors had abstracted from the coffers of the country, into the coffers of the party for election purposes. These poor fellows who poured that money so freely into the Government coffers for election funds, what did they realize? Confinement in jail for a certain number of months, from which they were only rescued by doctors' certificates, that their lives were in danger from the punishment they were undergoing. Those men were allowed to take money out of the public treasury, that they might hand it back again to the party treasury. These men were punished, but those who took the money and used it for election purposes, those who took the people's money with which to corrupt the people, have not been shut up in jail. I am not saying they should be shut up, for such an assertion, I am afraid, would be unparliamentary; but if one side is blamable the other side is blamable also, whatever the legal consequences may be. The contractors and combines have been leeches used to extract the blood, or, at least the circulating medium of the country, from the public treasury, and subsequently they have been placed on a dish by the Government, sprinkled with salt, and compelled to disgorge what they had extracted from the public treasury, for the benefit of the party, and by frequently gorging and disgorging a large amount of money was transferred from the public treasury to private election funds. That system reached its full development in the elections of 1887, and with that, and the other influences to which I have referred, the Government were more indebted than to the principle of protection. The elections of 1887 were carried more by those influences than by the hold which protection had on the opinions of the people. To come down to 1891. No doubt the Finance Minister will claim that those elections were a victory for the principle of protection. But if the hon. gentleman will remember the official notice of the dissolution of the House and the causes of it, which appeared in the party organs in identically the same words on the same day, he will remember they were to the effect, not that the Government desired to appear before the people as advocates of protection, but they desired to secure a reciprocity treaty with the United States, and they wished to secure the endorsement of the people before they entered upon those negotiations. The official notice which appeared in the 'Empire' and Montreal 'Gazette' was in these terms:

It is understood that the Dominion Government has through Her Majesty's representative made certain propositions to the United States for entering upon negotiations looking to the extension of our commerce with that country. These propositions have been submitted to the President for consideration, and the Canadian Government is of the opinion that, if these negotiations are to result in a treaty, it should be ratified by the Parliament of Canada, and it is expedient that the Government should be able to deal with a Parliament fresh from the people rather than with a moribund House.

In fact, they ask from the country permission to go to Washington and secure a reciprocity treaty with the United States. The Minute of Council on which the communication to

Her Majesty's Government is based contains many points, the principal of which were that this Government wished to secure the renewal of the treaty of 1854, with modifications, and the reconsideration of the treaty of 1855 about the fisheries, and so on. That was referred to by the Government organs afterwards as a reason why there should be dissolution and why the Government should appeal to the country. They proposed to conclude a treaty of reciprocity in similar terms to that of 1854, which was a treaty in natural products. How is it that to-day they are trying to make us believe that reciprocity in natural products would prove such a deadly injury to the farmer? Why is it that my hon. friend from Leeds (Mr. Taylor) should read a letter containing within it the whole theory of protection, to prove that our farmers would be ruined if they had to meet competition from the farmers of the United States? Does it not seem inconsistent that the Government which proposed reciprocity in natural products in 1891, should now urge that such a course would be ruinous to our farmers? They cannot be sincere in both; then, which time were they sincere? If they believe that competition with the United States will hurt our farmers, why were they then willing to make a treaty to secure that competition? We do not find any suggestion from them to secure reciprocity in manufactured articles; oh, no; that would hurt somebody's darling, but the farmer is nobody's darling, and a little reciprocity and the consequent competition would not injure him, and it would be all right for the Government so long as they could make it a cry to go to the country on. The Government in 1891 went to the country with the cry, that they required the authority from a new Parliament to conclude a treaty of reciprocity, and they added to it the additional cry of the old man and the old flag. They preached loyalty. They made some people believe, and they tried to make a great many more believe, that reciprocity with the United States, if it included manufactured goods, would be a very disloyal thing, while, at the same time, they were asking authority from the people to conclude a treaty in natural products. It was utterly disloyal, according to them, to admit manufactured goods into this country free, but it was perfectly proper and perfectly loyal to admit agricultural products free. Now, Sir, with this mixed programme of loyalty and partial reciprocity, they appealed to the electorate, and between the two cries and the personal popularity of Sir John A. Macdonald, they succeeded in maintaining their seats on the Treasury benches but it was a very close shave. It was the cry of reciprocity in the Maritime Provinces, as members from these provinces can testify, which largely secured them their majority there. It was the cry of reciprocity that secured them thousands of votes throughout Ontario and Quebec, for every farmer wanted reciprocity of some kind. The Conservative farmers said that they would rather have a reciprocity treaty negotiated by their own old man than by my friend from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). They said: Give the old Conservative leader a chance; let us see what he can do; he has been lucky in everything he has undertaken, let us see if he will not be lucky in the reciprocity treaty also. This was the line of reasoning which at that election prevented a great many Conservatives from voting against the protective tariff, which they utterly disliked. The Government were returned with a narrow majority and with a mandate to secure reciprocity. Instead of making any serious efforts to secure reciprocity—because nobody could pretend that the make-believe farce which took place during the session of 1891 was a real attempt to secure reciprocity—they dropped the idea of reciprocity altogether. That cry had served its purpose, and the Government went on adding protection to protection, and adding tax to tax; so that, although a protectionist Government was returned to power in that election, they were returned under false pretences, and not by the votes of people who desired a continuance of protection. We have seen in some degree what a protectionist tariff is, and now let us inquire for a moment how a protectionist tariff is made. The first one, we know, was made by a committee of experts: one or two imported from the United States, and one of them the President of the Manufacturers' Association in Canada. They took to Yankee methods in making up the original protective tariff of 1879. Since that time the tariff has been revised and revised, and remade over and over again, and it is interesting to see how these changes took place. The tariff was originally made, and has since been revised, by a process which comes to this: that the parties interested in a protective tax have had from the first the making of a tariff to suit themselves. There have been conferences between the experts and the manufacturers, between the Government and the manufacturers, between individual members of the Government and the manufacturers, and there have been delegations sent to Ottawa to see the Government. The whole affair has been put together by those interested in securing increased value for their products, and all that the Government have had to do with it has been to carry out the orders of those to whom they have really transferred the fiscal legislation of this country. As to the present tariff, it is impossible to say upon what principle it has been based. The Minister of Finance was very witty in reference to attempts to steal the clothes of the Opposition, and he said that the coat of the Opposition was at present like Joseph's coat of many colours, so variegated was it. Well, Sir, you will remember that Joseph was sold into captivity to some commercial travellers for the sake of that same coat, and I do not know but that the Government would be willing to sell the people of this country into captivity, if they could get a coat that fitted them as well as poor Joseph's coat fitted him. Their talk of variegation in the policy of the Opposition is really something amusing when you compare it with the tariff they have placed before us. The Minister of Finance says :

It has not been possible to proceed upon any fixed rule of uniformity in framing the present tariff. The tariff which was made in 1878 was a practical tariff and the tariff of this session must also have that feature, if possible, of being a practical tariff. Neither has the Government found it possible to adopt any hard and fast rules with reference to the vexed question of specific and ad valorem duties ; some condemn specific duties entirely and others find them suitable to certain lines. I think the truth lies between the two extremes.

The poor gentleman is quite at sea among the multitude of advisers. He has evidently proceeded on no principle whatever in what he calls the revision of the tariff. He has listened, first to one, then to the other ; he has put in an ad valorem stripe in the tariff coat here, a specific stripe there, a mixed stripe of both combined in another place, until the whole thing is a sort of crazy quilt, of such a pattern as might be made of rags and pickings, picked up at the back door of a tailor's shop. There is no principle whatever underlying the present revision of the tariff. That revision has been made, as the original tariff and other revisions were made, at the instance of parties interested. Even clerical errors seem to have crept into it at the instance of those parties. That fact is emphasized by the constant flow of delegations to Ottawa since the policy was announced. The Minister can hardly go out of the door of this House, and pass down the lobby, without being chased by a delegation, as a strange cat in a village is chased by the dogs from the adjacent houses. There is no rest for a Minister who is revising a protectionist tariff on mixed principles. He has to listen to Tom, Dick, and Harry. He makes a change for the sake of Tom, which he has to modify for the sake of Dick, which he has to remodify for the sake of Harry. He did tell us that he started out with one principle, after all ; that was the principle of reducing the duties on raw materials, while giving protection to the finished product. This, the only principle he professed to have in his revision of the tariff, he has by no means carried out. The only kinds of raw material which are made free or reduced are those produced by the farmer. I will call attention to that later on. Let me refer to one glaring instance in which that principle is not carried out ; I refer to the duties on pig iron, as compared with the duties on various forms of manufactures from iron. For instance, he has reduced the duties on some classes of agricultural implements ; he could not see his way to reduce them on all. It was quite right to reduce the duty on binders, but it would not do to reduce the duties on separators or threshing engines, or fanning mills. I do not see where the moral distinction lies between a duty on fanning mills, and a duty on binders ; and the hon. Minister has not taken, and will not take, the trouble to explain where this distinction arises. It is quite probable that the committee of manufacturers who arranged these duties for him could explain it better than he could. Again, the duty on puddled bar and rolled bar iron has been reduced $3 a ton, while at the same time the duty on pig iron, and the bounty on pig iron, the basis of all those manufactures, have been kept at the same figures, and the duty on scrap, which has been used to some extent for the same purpose as pig iron, is increased slightly for the present, and is to be still further increased next year. Now, I certainly have no objections to the reductions he has made on the manufactures referred to. But I quite agree with the principle that if you reduce the protection on the manufactured article you ought to reduce the duty on the raw materials also. The proprietors of a certain rolling mill in Hamilton seem to have been of the same opinion. They figured out that their protection had been reduced $3 a ton while the price of their raw material (scrap iron) was going to be increased one or two dollars a ton, and that, therefore, they must reduce wages. They gave notice of such reduction, and the consequence was that 300 men went out on strike for a time, but finally returned and accepted the reduced wages. That has been one effect of the tariff—to reduce wages in the city of Hamilton. I see an hon. gentleman shaking his head ; but that is the report in the newspapers, the only source of information that I have. As to the present duty on pig iron, it was imposed in 1887 by Sir Charles Tupper, then Finance Minister, and what reasons did he give for proposing it ? First, in general terms, that iron was a very important industry everywhere—in most countries the most important of manufacturing interests ; and, secondly, that we had great facilities for that industry in many parts of Canada. He said :

England possesses coal and iron ore to an almost illimitable extent ; but the House will perhaps be surprised to learn that even England, with all its ore and all its coal, imports from Spain, a thousand miles away, more ore than is required to manufacture the entire production of steel in England. The United States possess almost unlimited quantities of iron ore and coal ; but they have no such advantage as Canada enjoys.

He said further :

In the county of Pictou, iron, coal and limestone are found in the closest proximity ; within a radius of ten miles there is everything necessary to build up a great and successful industry ; and this mineral wealth is found on the seaboard so that the products of the industry can be cheaply transported by water to the head of Lake Superior if required. All descriptions of iron ore are found in this county, so that when we are told by persons engaged in the iron founding industries that they require other iron to mix with Londonderry iron, because, it is too good, that they require to import Scotch pig iron, the answer is that we possess within our own borders every variety of iron ore, so that any mixture desired can be made.

Then he gave a long list of percentages and metallurgical details. Here we have the then Finance Minister laying down the proposition that while Canada has the greatest facilities in the world, as he put it, for the production of pig iron, therefore the pig iron in Canada required special encouragement. That is a remarkable argument, to say the least of it. I had always supposed that when an industry was in difficulties, and its natural facilities were not very great, it required special assistance and protection; but Sir Charles Tupper laid it down that because our facilities for making pig iron were great, he was bound to protect that industry above all others. But he did not stop with the county of Pictou. By the by, I believe that in the county of Pictou the iron industry has developed to some extent. With such vast natural advantages, and with a bounty of $2 a ton, and a protective duty of $4 a ton, it would be a wonderful thing if it had not. I am glad to know, too, that all the profit from this industry does not go outside of the House of Commons, but that at least one member of this House, one of the hon. members from Halifax (Mr. Stairs), is understood to be the president of the company, and, I believe, they have a bonding arrangement with some large syndicate in the United States, which is expected to buy them out at enormous profit. It is good that protection should begin at home, and that we do not forget the members of this House in scattering its benefits broadcast. But it was not only in Pictou that we were to produce vast quantities of iron. Referring to charcoal iron, he says:

The time is not long since when charcoal iron was one of the most important industries in Ontario and Quebec.

It was not long since in 1887, but it was so long ago then that it was long before anybody dreamed of putting a protective tax upon pig iron. It was when pig iron came in at a purely revenue duty, if any at all, that this industry was prosperous:

I have no hesitation in saying that if the protection we have given to cotton and woollen and all other industries of Canada be applied to iron to-morrow, it will show what the past history of Canada has shown, that these charcoal iron industries will be again in full blast, and that in Ontario and Quebec they will become most essential and important industries to-morrow as they were in days gone by.

That word "to-morrow"—it has been a long to-morrow since then, and the charcoal industries have not yet come into full blast:

Every person knows that charcoal iron is the most valuable product of iron. Every person knows the increase of value of charcoal iron; every person knows that the great difficulty is the cost of producing it, but no country in the world has such a field for the production of charcoal iron as the provinces of Ontario and Quebec. * * *

Vivify, give protection to the iron industry, as you have given it to cotton, woollen and everything else, and what will be the result? It will be, that when a man goes into the forest to make farm in Ontario or Quebec, the most valuable products under his hand will be that which he has to spend all his labour and capital now in wasting.

He refers to the supposed fact that they would make charcoal out of the wood they now burn, and that the charcoal would be used in making charcoal iron. He referred also to the great iron deposits within sight from the towers of this building. But he does not refer to the fact that these were in full process of development before the National Policy came into force, and that it was after that policy was inaugurated that they closed down. In 1876-77 the tremendous deposits of iron ore at Ironsides, only a few miles from here, were in full process of development, and the company working them had the contract to supply car wheels for the Government railways in India. But the National Policy, which was to vivify all our industries, closed this up. Now, after reading the glowing language of Sir Charles Tupper—and Sir Charles Tupper could be very glowing when he had the glow on—it is rather disheartening to think that the charcoal iron industry has no existence to-day in the Dominion. Sir Charles went into a long calculation as to the number of men to whom it would give employment. Twenty thousand men he considers would be given employment as the result of this tax, which with their families meant an increased population of 100,000. The hon. gentleman went on to refer to Carleton, N.B. He said:

Now, charcoal iron from bog iron ore was formerly an important industry both in Ontario and in Quebec, and charcoal iron was also made in Carleton, New Brunswick, where to-day, under a policy of fostering this industry in the same way, as the cotton and woollen and other industries have been fostered, that blast furnace in Carleton would again be lighted up and would be the foundation of a new and extensive industry in the province of New Brunswick.

The hon. member for Carleton, N.B., (Mr. Colter) informs me that he has not been able to find this blast furnace anywhere in his constituency and has not heard of one since the National Policy came into force. Let us look to the grand result which has flowed from Sir Charles Tupper's bounty and tax on pig iron. The number of tons on which bounty was paid in 1887 was 39,800, and in 1893, 30,500. So that seven years of this fostering care—first Tupperian and then Fostering—of the pig iron industry, has led, to an increase, “with a minus sign”—to use the Finance Minister’s expression—of 8,300 tons. That is a specimen of the results of our protective tax. It has not encouraged and cannot encourage the healthy production of pig iron. Every industry, fostered for a while, pampered for a while, by a protective duty, becomes hidebound, and after extracting more or less from the public treasury to keep it alive, finally dies or flickers out, and then gets rehabilitated again just as the pig iron industry has been doing during these years of the National Policy. It has died out and started again from time to time, and now we have a fine little museum of our products in the entrance of this building, which I hope is the nucleus of a museum representing all the industries of Canada—agricultural as well as manufacturing. I hope we shall find out there before the end of the session, specimens of grain, butter, cheese, as well as the iron and steel produced in Nova Scotia. That is only one instance of how the protective tariff affects one particular interest. But I wish to call your attention to the general effect of a protective tariff on all industries. Whatever may be the direct effect of the tax in raising prices, the fact that every article one man uses as a raw material is the finished product of some other industry causes a general increase in the cost of production. Let us take the figures in the census bulletin as to capital invested, value produced, and so forth. In 1871 the capital invested in Canadian manufactures was given as $77,964,000, in 1881 it was $158,776,000; and in 1891, $329,189,000. Now, the value of products in those three years respectively were $221,617,000, $299,740,000, $447,224,000. Compare the capital invested with the value of the products and we find that in 1871 it only required $35 worth of capital invested to produce $100 worth of finished product. In 1881 it required—after the poison of protection had taken some effect—$53 of capital to produce $100 worth of products fit for market. In 1891, after protection had time to bear full fruit, it required $73 capital invested to produce $100 worth of marketable finished products. That does not look as if protection added to the prosperity even of the manufacturers, when twice as much capital is now required to produce a dollar’s worth of goods as was required twenty years ago. In the census bulletin itself I find the same problem worked out the other way. The census bulletin points out that in 1871, each dollar invested produced $2.85 worth of finished product. In 1881 it produced only $1.89 worth, and in 1891 the investment of a dollar only produced $1.36 worth of products. So that the general effect of protection has been an increased cost of production, and the special effect with regard to one particular item, where you would think it would have the best results, has been to reduce the production of the article. Now, I must hurry through, because I find I am taking a great deal more time than I had intended. But I wish to refer briefly to one or two points. The hon. Minister has given us a statement of the increased production of goods of all kinds in 1891, over other years. We find that in 1891 the amount produced was $475,455,000, against $309,376,000 in 1881. Now, Sir, take the hon. gentleman’s own estimate of the average rate of duty on dutiable goods at 28½ per cent. All these manufactures are dutiable goods, and the Finance Minister has admitted that manufacturers will keep the price up as near as possible to the amount allowed by the duty. The fact of our importing such large quantities proves that our own production is not sufficient to meet the requirements of our own market, therefore the protective duties on these goods will have full effect. Therefore, as between 1878, when there was a duty of 17½ per cent, and 1891, when there was a duty of 28½ per cent, we find an increase of 11 per cent in the cost to the consumers of these goods, as compared with what the cost would have been under the former tariff, representing a total increased price, on the goods manufactured, of $54,300,000. That is a direct logical deduction from the figures given, and the admissions made by the hon. the Finance Minister. The question of coal oil is one which has been pretty well discussed, but which should be still further emphasized in the interests of the consumer. If there is any tax more indefensible than another in the whole range of the tariff, I think it is the tax upon coal oil. If there was anything impressed on the minds of the Controllers, who were sent throughout the country to control public opinion with respect to changes in the tariff—for they did not seem to be ready to accept public opinion—it should have been that the public wanted the duty on coal oil removed. The Minister of Finance seeks to get out of the difficulty by abusing the retailer. He says that the present high prices of coal oil are not due to the fact that the manufacturer gets more than 100 per cent protection, but to the fact that the retailer charges an exorbitant profit. I shall leave him to settle that point with the retailers of coal oil, who are a pretty numerous class throughout the country. Whatever may be the short-comings of the retailer, the fact remains that the duty is more than the cost of the oil, that the Canadian producer has a protection of more than 100 per cent of the price of American oil, as was shown by invoices read in this House. We had some poetry read in this debate, setting forth that there was no tax on tea and coffee, the lament of the poor farmer, who, though he was taxed on everything else from birth to death, had the satisfaction of knowing that there was no tax on tea. I do not think my hon. friend from Kingston (Mr. Metcalfe) can rejoice in that any longer, because it certainly appears we are going to have a duty on all teas not imported direct. We have been getting our tea through Great Britain ever since tea was first brought here. But now it appears, from the speech of the Finance Minister, that tea, imported through Great Britain is to pay a tax of 10 per cent. I am afraid my hon. friend from Kingston cannot say any longer that there is no tax on tea. I notice by despatches from London that the importers have waited upon Sir Charles Tupper to remonstrate with him upon this feature of the tariff. When that gentleman puts his finger in the tariff pie he may prove as powerful in deciding its form as the Finance Minister himself. The proposal to tax tea, except when it is brought direct looks like an attempt to compel us to import our tea by way of the steamers and land carriage of the Canadian Pacific Railway. It seems to be another sop of that great corporation which has already become almost too great for the good of the country. I cannot leave iron without calling attention to the peculiar arrangement with regard to the bounties proposed by the Finance Minister, that if any company is organized to make pig iron at any time within five years from the time the Budget speech was delivered, if it was only one day short of the five years, that company would secure the bounty of $2 a ton on their iron for five years from the date of starting. Now, that will amount to this: that companies that are organized during that five year period and begin the manufacture of pig iron, will be able to defy all competition, kill out all competitors, and obtain this bounty of $2 a ton. It seems to me this is intended to provide for the possibility of a combine of all the iron companies operating towards the end of the five years, under a new name, so that they may obtain an extension of the $2 a ton bounty for five years more without the possibility of competition. But when we come to the farmers, we are told that everything grand has been done for them. I do agree with that view myself. I rather think that in the words of Scripture, the farmer may be compared with one of the tribes of Israel of whom the Scripture says: Issachar is a strong ass bowing down between two burdens, the burdens of high taxation and low prices, and he will be a much more egregious ass than I think he is, if he will put up with it much longer. In fact it is the farmers' effort to free themselves from these taxes, as shown by their organizations of Patrons of Industry, Grangers, and so on, that has compelled the Government to make these changes. The Government have made these changes for fear of losing the support of the farming community, although they pretend to have made them out of love for the farmer. Now, the hon. Minister's references to the farmer are not very extensive, but he claims great credit for the fact that agricultural exports have largely increased. Now, that argument is quite beneath his position. He knows, supposing the farmer to be protected by any tax that exists, that no protective duty can increase the exportation of agricultural produce. The exporting industries which depend, either upon mining, lumbering or agriculture, have grown up, not by the help of protection, but in spite of it. I call attention to the fact that all the exports which have largely increased since 1878 up to the present time, are the products of industries not assisted by protective duties. In 1878 the total exports of products of mines, fisheries, forests, animals and their products, and agricultural, amounted to $47,554,000; the total exports of manufactures were $17,780,000, or 36 per cent of the total exports. In 1893 the exports of those natural products which I have mentioned, came to $71,575,000, an increase of $24,000,000 over those of 1878; while exports of manufactures had only increased from $17,780,000 to $24,035,000, or only 32 per cent of the total. It must be noted that of these twenty-four millions, $19,900,000 were exports of wood, including lumber, square timber, and other things which should be looked upon as products of the forest. Now, although there was an expansion in manufactures between those two periods, I must call attention to the fact that in 1878 we exported $24,460,000 of manufactured goods, as against $24,035,000 last year. In 1886 those exports fell to $18,000,000, or nearly to the point at which they were in 1878. Now, the wealth of a country is measured principally by what she can export and get in return. I maintain that on the face of this table it is the unprotected industries, the industries for which nothing is done by protection—while some of them, such as mining and lumber, are greatly hampered by it—which have increased the wealth of the country during the last fifteen years, and not those industries which we have been at such care and trouble and expense to maintain. In regard to the farmers' side of the question, I shall try to express myself more in detail when we go into committee. It is out of the question to do anything, with the details of the tariff in this preliminary debate—unless one has the same length of time for preparation, and the same assistance in preparation, as the Finance Minister has had. But speaking of the change from specific to ad valorem, and from mixed to ad valorem duties, I must say that we who are not in the various trades cannot pretend to judge, and I do not think the Finance Minister himself can pretend to judge, whether a reduction is really effected by these changes, or if a reduction, to what extent. He professed to think that the total reduction of duties caused by the changes he proposes would amount to about a million and a half dollars. Now, nobody outside the various trades can tell just how much protection is derived by them from specific duties. Nobody outside those trades knows how much it costs to procure a particular article, and therefore nobody else can tell what amount of protection 2 cents a pound or $10 a ton, or whatever it may be, affords them. The Finance Minister has no doubt got his figures from those in the trade, because nobody else could give them to him; and I think he will find as a result of this tariff that he will not lose a million and a half of revenue, but that on the whole the changes made will not amount to a general reduction of the tariff charges, and may amount, for ought we know to the contrary, to an increase in those charges. I hope that he will not follow out the suggestion he appeared to be making when he dropped a few words about the coming elections, and that he will not bring on the next election until we have had a chance to prove this tariff by its practical working, so that we may be able to pronounce upon it. I know it is quite customary, after bringing a new system like this into effect, to do as was done in 1887, go to the country immediately, and take a verdict on it before the people have had time to find out what it amounts to. It seems to me it would be much more reasonable to have an appeal to the people before the tariff was made rather than after. It is not the time to lock the stable door after the horse—I won't say is stolen, because that might sound offensive, but after the horse has gone out to take a walk in the pasture. It is better to get directions from the people as to how the tariff should be made than to go to them with the tariff ready made and to tell them: This is going to reduce your taxes to the extent of a million and a half, therefore we want you to vote for us. Neither the Government nor the people know how that tariff is going to work. The manufacturers do know, and they have had no doubt an opportunity to see that they will not lose very much by the transaction. But whenever the elections do come, sooner or later, I am satisfied that the Liberal party of Canada do not want any fairer or squarer issue on which to go to the country, they do not want an issue on which they can gain more votes than that now presented by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), the straight issue of a revenue tariff with the proceeds economically spent, as against a tariff chiefly for protective purposes. We are quite willing to go to the country on that issue, and are not afraid of the result.

Mr. BOYD. As one of the younger members of the House, I may perhaps be pardoned if I do not follow the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat, closely in the remarks he has made. Coming, as I do, from one of the younger provinces, my remarks will be chiefly confined to matters of interest in that particular locality. I may say at the outset that I wish to join with other members of this side of the House in paying tribute to the Finance Minister, also to the Government for the able manner in which they have undertaken the revision of the tariff, and also for the speedy manner in which they have laid it before Parliament. I may also say that I think the members of the House have not been very gracious to the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) in their congratulations addressed to him. I think he really deserves more from them than he has received, considering the very poor subject and the very inferior client he has had to fight for. I will not enter so deeply into the subject of this debate in all its bearings as some hon. members have done, since many of the members from the Atlantic to the Pacific have already discussed it in detail, but I shall confine myself more particularly to the western country from which I come, and for which this subject has a very deep interest. The hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies), in the course of his remarks referred to the progress made by North and South Dakota, and he drew an unfavourable comparison between the province of Manitoba and those states. He was immediately brought to task by the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries, and since that time I have taken some pains to obtain statistics, and I will endeavour to show that the settlement in Manitoba and the North-west has been greater proportionately than the settlement in North and South Dakota for the last six years. The population of Manitoba has increased during five years from 1886 to 1891 by 43,866, equal to 40 per cent during that period. The population of North and South Dakota during 1890 was 511,527 according to United States census. It was 415,263 in 1885 by the state census, or an increase during the five years of 86,264, or a little over 23 per cent, about one-half as large a percentage of increase as that shown by Manitoba. The increase of population in the state of Minnesota from 1885 to 1890, was 16 per cent; of Kansas, 12 per cent; of Wisconsin, 7 1-5 per cent; of Michigan, 13 per cent; of Manitoba, 40 per cent; of the North-west Territories, 164 per cent, from 1880 to 1890, and of British Columbia, 87 per cent from 1880 to 1890. Therefore, hon. gentlemen will see that the percentage of increase in population in Manitoba, North-west Territories and British Columbia was greater than that of any of the states in the western portion of the United States. I think that is very conclusive evidence that our country is making progress, that the people are coming into it as rapidly as they are flowing into any states of the Union that lie alongside of it. Another point that is frequently lost sight of by hon. members is the fact that until 1886 we had no railway through our own territory. All our immigrants had to pass through the United States, and it was not until the spring of 1886 that we had a transcontinental railway, and in that year we had the first opportunity afforded of caring for our immigrants as they needed to be cared for. I know very well from experience the great difficulties with which our immigrants had to contend with in passing through the United States. After a depression in the United States, it has always been noted that immigration flows into the country in increased volume, and after the present depression there will, no doubt, be a greater immigration into Manitoba and the North-west than has occurred for a number of years. That increased flow of immigration followed the last depression in the United States, but during that time when we might have taken advantage of the great flow of immigration, had our trans-continental railway been opened—and had our party remained in power it would have been opened—the Opposition unfortunately got into power, the building of the road ceased, and that caused us to lose our share of that great immigration that we should have participated in. A similar flow of immigration, I expect, will follow the great depression now existing in the United States and other countries, but we will be in a position to take advantage of it. The items of the tariff that most affect the people in Manitoba and the North-west are those with respect to agricultural implements, binding twine, barbed wire and lumber. Those, I think, are of more importance and deeper interest to the people of that country than any other articles in the schedule. The hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin), has taken much trouble to prove the amount of money the people of Manitoba are paying on trifling matters. I venture to say that as far as the farmers are concerned the duty and total cost on nails to the average farmer would not amount to $1.50 per annum; and yet the hon. gentleman would lead us to suppose that it was a matter of very great import, and a great many other articles he mentioned would not involve the expenditure of a larger sum. Regarding agricultural implements much has been said in this House. The price of those articles has very largely decreased during the last few years. In 1884-85 no less than $275 or $285 was paid for a very inferior binder, and we did not hear so much complaint then as we do now when the farmer is paying $140. The binder for which that large sum was paid at that time would not be accepted as a present by the farmer of to-day if he was compelled to use it, and to-day for $140 the farmer can purchase a binder better worth $600 than that for which he paid $275 sometime ago would be worth $25. And yet hon. gentlemen opposite declare that we are not making any progress, and that heavy burdens are being imposed on those articles. That reduction in price also applies, I may say, to all other implements used on the farm. The great complaint we have to make in the western country, and it is the cause of a great deal of the agitation regarding the cost of implements, is the great difference in price charged to the people of the western country and to the people of eastern Ontario. The hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Taylor), has told us here to-night that these binders can be bought in Ontario for $110—for the best binder. It takes $13 to carry a binder to Manitoba, and yet the cheapest that we can buy one of the best for there is $140, thus taxing us $17 more than the Ontario farmer. That is a cause of complaint amongst the farmers of that country, and there is no reason why the retailers up there ought not to sell them cheaper. I may say, Sir, that low as the price of wheat is, notwithstanding that it has fallen 50, aye 100 per cent, for we used to get 80 and 85 cents and as high as 90 cents for it, and to-day it is selling for 40 cents; notwithstanding all that, you can buy for 100 bushels of wheat, more agricultural implements, more clothing for the farmers, more of his needs, than you could purchase for the same 100 bushels of wheat five or ten years ago. Sir, the National Policy has had its effect in that respect, too.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Mr. BOYD. Some hon. gentlemen opposite smile. Let me tell them that all the time this has been going on, while the price of wheat has been dropping, and dropping, and dropping, the agricultural implements have also yearly come down in price, and during this time they have been made in our own country, our own people have been paid for their work, our own money has been kept on this side of the line, and our own artisans have got the fruits of it. The earnings have been deposited in our banks, and our banks have sent the money to our north-western country. I can tell hon. gentlemen opposite, that in Manitoba and the North-west you can obtain money at more reasonable rates for legitimate business than you can get it in any western state of the union. I wish to state further, that there are banks in the province of Quebec which sent their money up to Manitoba, and, not being able to get sufficient circulation for it there, they are over lending it in Dakota to enable the farmers of that state to carry on their business, and to tide over their difficulties. That may be news for the members of the Opposition in this House. The leader of the Opposition knows very well that it is largely by the deposits in the banks that money is procured, and that is the money that they generally use when they lend it to the public. I referred a few moments ago to the agitation that has prevailed in the North-west with reference to agricultural implements, and the other articles I have mentioned. Let me point out that the cause of that agitation during the past year has been largely attributable to the very low price of wheat. There is no denying the fact that the agitation is not caused by any feeling in regard to the Conservative party, or the policy of the Reform party, or the policy of the Third party, or the fourth party, but that it is on account of the low price of wheat.

An hon. MEMBER. Hear, hear.

Mr. BOYD. An hon. member opposite says, "hear, hear." I can assure him that his Liberal party friends in that country have taken advantage of the low price of wheat, and, since the price has fallen to 40 cents, we see the political demagogue cut loose, travelling over the country, and telling the people that the low price is all the fault of the wicked Government at Ottawa. They tell the farmer: Just let the Liberal party into power and we will increase the price of your wheat and your general prosperity. I have listened to this debate for the last eight or ten days, and I have yet to hear from members of the Opposition the announcement of any policy that would raise the price of wheat even the nineteenth part of one cent per bushel. If Liberal members in this House have any policy which would increase the price of wheat, they ought to let it be known at once, for it would give some encouragement to their friends who are working in their interest in the North-west. I believe, Sir, that after the changes which have been made in the tariff, the people will settle down to their daily avocations, and the Liberal agitators up there will have to hunt up another job. I wish to make my own position perfectly clear to the House, and to the Government with regard to the duty on agricultural implements, binder twine, and such articles. In 1891, when I contested the constituency of Marquette, I stated that I would use my utmost endeavours to have the duty on binder twine, barbed wire, coal oil, agricultural implements and lumber, reduced to the lowest possible point. I claim that I have consistently adhered to that. My first act after coming to the House last session was to wait upon the Minister of Finance and upon the Government, and to lay the case of the people of the North-west plainly and candidly before them. I explained to them the position of that lumber combine, as far as I knew; I also explained to them the injurious influences of the middleman and retailer of these articles, and that during last session the Minister of Finance said that while we might not get all that we wanted, he hoped to be able to satisfy us when they had an opportunity of properly revising the tariff. At that time he reduced the duty on binder twine by 50 per cent, and also made a very reasonable reduction on coal oil. The effect of the agitation in connection with these matters, and the information that we gained here in regard to them, has had the effect of lowering the price of binder twine from 16 and 17 cents down to 10½ cents a pound in the province of Manitoba. It was not the reduction of the duty that made that great cut in price, but it was the information that I and other members of Parliament gained in this House, and which went to prove that the best binder twine had been supplied to the middle men, free on board the cars in Montreal, for 8 and 9 cents a pound, and notwithstanding that it cost only five-sevenths of a cent a pound to transport it into that country, yet the farmer was charged 16 and 17 cents a pound for it. That information was spread throughout the North-west, and then the prices were reduced. I may state that I heard very little complaints about binder twine last year, when it sold for 10½ cents per pound. Formerly, we used to pay for coal oil, 40 and 45 cents a gallon, but we ascertained here that it was delivered in Manitoba for 18 cents a gallon, and the result was that when I left the North-west we were getting coal oil at places 100 and 150 miles west of Winnipeg, for 25 cents a gallon. I wish that the Government could have seen their way to make a greater reduction in the duty on coal oil, but, as I say, it has been proven that it is the middleman who has had the greater portion of the profit; and it is the middleman to a very great extent, not only in Manitoba but throughout all Canada, who has the best of it, it is the middleman who, I think, requires a little looking after by the Government. I repeat again, that I wish the Government might have been able to make some reductions on coal oil, but, so far as the province of Manitoba is concerned, we are not the ones to injure an industry such as that coal oil industry has been; an industry that has been fostered not alone by the Conservative Government, but also by the Liberals when they were in power. I trust that arrangements may yet be made by the Government whereby a further reduction will take place with reference to that article. The hon. member for Winnipeg took occasion in his remarks to criticize somewhat severely the hon. Minister of Agriculture for the views he expressed to the farmers of Manitoba on the subject of mixed farming. Now, I consider that the advice the hon. Minister gave on that occasion was very proper and timely. No farmer in this country can expect to make a success of farming if he conducts it as many of the people of that country have done in years past. A great deal of the trouble among the farmers there has been caused by the indiscriminate growing of one particular class of grain. I know quite a number who have been in the habit of going up there in the spring, putting in their crop, doing their summer fallowing, reaping their crop, drawing it to market and selling it, and then leaving one man in charge of their horses and going east to spend the winter. Any man who knows anything of farming will easily see that that is not the way to make a success of it; and during the last few years, when the price of wheat has fallen, only those who have gone into mixed farming have made a success of it. And what applies to farmers, in my opinion, applies to a nation. What our opponents are asking us to do is to go into wheat and hay and oat farming, or something of that kind. What we propose is that the country should adopt a system of mixed farming, and do anything and everything to build up any industry that the country is capable of maintaining, thus giving employment to our own people and keeping our own money within our own borders. Some of our opponents have sneered at the idea of giving any protection to the farmers. I take exception to that position, because I know that the protection which has been given to the farmers has been decidedly beneficial to them. There is no question that the protection of 75c. a barrel on flour has been of great advantage to the people of Canada, more particularly the people of the North-west. It is a well known fact that from the time of the threshing of our crop to the closing of navigation our farmers get a better price for their wheat by from 5 to 7 cents a bushel than at any other time of the year. The reason of that is that the eastern millers wish to secure a supply of our hard wheat to mix with the eastern soft wheat, and during the time they are competing with exporters for their supply a better price is procured by our farmers. With regard to the protection on meats, until within the past year or so the people of the North-west imported meat from the United States; and Armour is still sending a great deal of meat into that country. But since the great fall in the price of wheat many of our farmers have been turning their attention to the raising of pork. The result is that to-day we have two or three meat curing establishments in Winnipeg, and two or three throughout the province; so that our own people are now supplying nearly all the cured meat, such as hams and bacon, that the province requires. In fact, they are supplying British Columbia with a portion of the meat required by the people of that province for their shipping and other trades. Yet hon. gentlemen tell us that that protection is of no use. I may say that before I left to attend this session, a number of the farmers pressed me most earnestly under no circumstances to allow this meat industry to be interfered with. The same remarks apply to our butter industry. We are working up a very large butter trade with British Columbia; the protection we receive is sufficient to pay the freight from Manitoba to British Columbia, thus placing us on a footing of equality with the Washington Territory and California butter-makers, and a number of our farmers are making a very good business of that butter trade. The protection on meat helps us in another way. I understand that efforts are being made to send mutton from Australia into the British Columbia market, and should the duty be removed and that mutton be allowed to come in free, it will have a very serious effect on the trade that our people have been endeavouring to work up in the past two or three years. Therefore, I hope the Government will not permit any reduction to be made in the duty on mutton. There are a number of these matters in which the people of Manitoba are deeply interested; and as they will come before the House in committee, I will take occasion to discuss them more fully then. If it were not for the very active part that I have taken in connection with the reductions as they apply to that province, I would not have wearied the House by speaking, because I know that there is very little that is new to be said on this question by any man, especially by one who is new to the House; and I know that unless a man has something new to say, he can scarcely hope to hold the attention of the House at all. But I did not wish to give a silent vote on this matter. I wished to place myself squarely before the House and the country in regard to it. I feel satisfied that the changes which have been made in the tariff will be very beneficial to the country, and will be acceptable to the people. So far as I am concerned, although I represent a large constituency, comprising forty thousand people, I have yet to receive from them the first complaint regarding any changes in the tariff, and they are a class of people who have no hesitation in letting you know if they think there is anything at all wrong. Therefore, while I hoped the changes would be greater, I must say, so far as the Government is concerned, that I am prepared to give the Finance Minister credit for having carried out the intention he expressed last session, when he said he intended going thoroughly into this matter, making all the changes possible in the interests of the Dominion. For my part, I believe I speak the sentiments of the people of that country when I say we do not want a tariff made particularly for Manitoba. I do not think that is the proper spirit which should animate any man coming to this House. I do not think that any member of this House should say: I want a tariff for Manitoba, or Quebec, or Nova Scotia. If the Government would let me lay down a tariff for Manitoba, I could frame one decidedly in our interest, but it would not be in the interests of the whole Dominion. What should animate every Canadian is the desire to help in making laws that will be in the interests of the whole Dominion. I shall take occasion, when the House goes into committee, to ask the Government to do something with regard to increasing the duty on pork. I think they have made a slight mistake in that measure, but I feel satisfied it is a clerical error and that it will be made right. I thank you, Mr. Speaker, and the House for the attention you have given me.

Mr. FAUVEL. At this late hour it is not my intention to make a long speech. I do not intend going into figures, uninteresting both to the hearers and the speaker. My principal object to-night is to say a few words on the subject of free trade. I have just returned from the old country, and when I saw its prosperity, its manufactures of different kinds, its tall chimneys in the midland counties, its cotton factories at Manchester, I was lost in wonder, and asked myself: Is it in free trade England that such manufacturing expansion has taken place? I am glad to notice in the last papers, that although there has been stagnation in trade, mainly owing to the depression in the United States, the fiscal returns to the 31st March last show a large increase of trade in England. Is England prospering under free trade? I say yes, it is. And I say that all countries that take hold of free trade should prosper as well as England. The population of England in 1841—five years prior to free trade—was 15,914,000. In 1891—fifty years later—it had nearly doubled. It was 29,000,000. Free trade in England commenced with the abolition of the Corn Laws in 1846. Who were the promoters of free trade in England? Were they the farmers? Were they the labourers? No, they were the manufacturers. Richard Cobden was a cotton printer; John Bright was a carpet manufacturer. They had every interest to be protectionists, but they had sufficient foresight to see that free trade would bring prosperity to their country. In 1850, four years after free trade, her exports of home products and manufactures amounted to £71,000,000 and her imports to £100,000,000. In 1875, twenty-five years later, her exports were £255,600,000 and her imports £375,000,000. In 1892 her exports amounted to £291,460,644 and her imports to £423,822,178, making a total of both exports and imports, £715,352,822. This expansion of trade is unexampled. What are the causes that led to this expansion of trade? They were, first, the adoption of free trade by Great Britain; second, the California and Australia gold discoveries; and, third, steam communication, railways and telegraphs. The measure by which Sir Robert Peel introduced the great change to free trade in Great Britain was marked by four general principles:

First, to remove from the tariff all prohibitions of foreign import, among the chief of which was agricultural live stock.

Second, to place hundreds of articles of the nature of raw materials of manufacture on a footing of entire freedom from customs duties,

Third, to reduce the duties on foreign manufactures which came into competition with home manufactures.

Fourth, to repeal the Corn Laws.

All these measures had the appearance of a liberal concession to foreign trade rather than to any advantage to home industries, which undoubtedly, was the reason that free trade was so long resisted. The immediate effects in increasing the public revenue, even the customs revenue, which seemed endangered by the repeal of so many duties, in reviving British trade and manufactures, and imparting new life to agriculture itself, was so great that the free trade policy was speedily carried up to its highest point of triumph. The successful influence of so successful an illustration of free trade on other nations has not been realized to any great extent. It was not enough that Great Britain could say to her neighbours, that free trade had worked, not only for herself, but for them. The retort of the protected interests in the different countries was, that what was good for England might not be good for them. But it must be admitted that it argues a great deal for the power of free trade, that, in the face of no reciprocal treaties with other countries, England has been able to open an effective market in her ports for foreign produce to an extent that forty years ago would have been deemed fabulous, whilst, at the same time, circulating her own commodities in all parts of the world. There can be no question that free trade has been the leading spring of the remarkable expansion of international commerce. The policy of the Liberal party to-day is not exactly free trade, I admit, but it is a commencement towards that end. In this respect it is like the policy of the Corn Laws in England. That was the commencement of free trade in that country; and to-day our asking for free trade in the way of reciprocity with our neighbours is really the beginning of what was done in England in 1846, when Sir Robert Peel brought forward his favourite Bill. But people may turn round and ask: How are you to recoup yourself for the loss of revenue. How does England recoup herself? She has a large army and a national debt on which it takes £6,000,000 sterling to pay the interest on every year. Her army costs £15,000,000 and her navy £11,000,000 sterling? How are taxes raised in England in order to furnish revenue? They bear heavily on the richer classes. There is the income tax of 8 pence on the pound, and the carriage tax. A man who rolls in his four-wheeled carriage, the man who has emblazoned on that carriage his coat-of-arms, the gentleman who places his coat-of-arms on his silver spoons, has to pay taxes. There are taxes on gold, plate, spirits and tobacco. Those are the sole articles from which England, in a great measure, derives revenue to keep her large army and navy, not only to protect England, but also to protect Canada. The Canadian tariff has been revised, Mr. Speaker, that I admit—changed from 22½ per cent to 25 per cent, from 25 to 30 and so to 32½ per cent. What does 32½ per cent represent? Not 32½ per cent; it represents 60 per cent rather. The wholesale purchaser of these goods adds the duty to the price and his profit to that. Then the retailer must make his profit of from 25 to 30 per cent on the whole price of the goods, including the 32½ per cent duty; so that the consumer is really paying 60 and 70 per cent on these goods, even where there has been a reduction in the duty. Deputations are coming to Ottawa and the hotel-keepers are doing a good business. The Liberal party should receive the dividend from the hotel-keepers of Ottawa for prolonging this discussion. No doubt the hotel-keepers of Ottawa would be pleased to see a revision of the tariff every year. You see the iron manufacturer, you see the clothing manufacturer, and many others coming here to expostulate with the Government. And yet we hear from the Treasury benches that everybody is satisfied with his tariff. Now, I will read an article, Mr. Speaker, from the 'Shareholder,' of Montreal. This is not a newspaper subsidized by the Government or by any other political party; it has no politics. I read from the issue of Friday, 6th April:—

TARIFF ISSUES.

The preparation of a tariff which will prove acceptable to all classes of the community, is a result which no Finance Minister has yet succeeded in reaching, and in no case is that more palpable than in the instance now before the Dominion Parliament. The discussion of the revised tariff drags heavily at times, and is likely to be drawn out to considerable length. In that discussion the salient points are apparently neglected, the aim of those taking part being not so much to remedy the defects as to make speeches of a political character, which will be reported, printed and distributed at the expense of the country. Were the disputants to settle down to the discussion in a sober, straight-forward, patriotic manner some good might result from the protracted discussion, but the members of the House fail to realize that what the country really wants is a levelling of the irregularities which mar the new tariff and make it obnoxious to those who look upon it, not from a political standpoint, but from one which springs from a higher motive, that is, from an honest desire to do the greatest good to the greatest number. That such is not the object of the present tariff is clear to the close observer. Tariff revision was promised and tariff revision has been given, but that revision is not of a nature to impress the consumers of the country that that justice had been rendered to them which they had a right to expect. The manufacturers are not satisfied either, and already their rapacity is bearing fruit, the reduction in the duty on finished goods having been already made the excuse for a reduction in wages. This, notwithstanding that large additions of raw material have been added to the free list to compensate the manufacturer for the reduction of duty. Committees and sections of our boards of trade have been in session day after day giving close attention to the changes and unravelling the effects which these will have upon the business of the country. In dealing with the tariff changes in last week's 'Shareholder' special attention was called to the changes in the rates affecting dress goods, the manufacture of which is not carried on in this country, on which there is an increase averaging twenty per cent, especially on low priced goods. This and other similar hardships have since received the attention of the dry goods section of both the Montreal and Toronto boards of trade, and resolutions have been adopted calling for modifications. What, we ask, have the women of Canada done to incur that antipathy of the Government, and why should their slender and hard-earned shillings be made the object of special attack? The change in this respect affects every woman in the country. We will, no doubt, be told that the object is to obtain an increased revenue to make up for the loss likely to arise from the large additions of raw materials to the free list for the benefit of the highly protected manufacturers of the country. We are told by those competent to form an accurate estimate that the business in dress goods furnishes fully one-fourth of the whole of that of the importing houses. The bulk of the imports by Canadian houses consists of the lowest grades, and now, if the new rate is persisted in, we are assured that cheaper grades will have to be manufactured in order to meet the advance in the duties. Although the duty is increased the price must remain the same. This calls for a lower grade, as the dealer must meet the popular price. He cannot increase the price and, therefore, he must supply an inferior article. Sales are effected by the price, and the women of the country are unwilling to go beyond a given figure. Why tax the women and children for the benefit of dyers who cannot dye? The general effect of the tariff is to grind those of the labouring classes who are unwilling to put up with other goods vastly inferior to those manufactured in other countries. Revision of the revised tariff is loudly called for, and unless the consumers' wants are heeded the consumers will strike when their turn comes.

Mr. Speaker, that is the effect of this tariff revision upon the country according to the 'Shareholder.' According to the 'Gazette' and 'Empire,' of course, it is quite different—everybody is satisfied. We on this side of the House are taunted with having no policy. Well, I think we have one now. The Liberals always had a policy, but the Conservative party did not understand it. Our policy was formulated at Ottawa on the 20th of June. Fifteen hundred delegates representing the backbone of this country marched down to this capital, and in convention on that broiling day in June, formulated a policy which will be carried at the next general election, which I hope is not far distant. There are two species of humanity in this world—the men who think for themselves, and the men who allow others to think for them. The Liberals think for themselves. What were the causes that led to the retention in power of hon. gentlemen opposite? Everybody knows perfectly well—in 1882, gerrymander; in 1887, the Franchise Act; in 1891, the promise of a liberal reciprocity treaty with the United States.

An hon. MEMBER. And boodle.

Mr. FAUVEL. Oh, of course there was no boodle. That reciprocity treaty with the United States is what we were wishing for. The Liberal party wanted it as well as the Conservative party. We want it to-day, and the Conservative party wants it, and the country demands it. Everybody in Canada wants reciprocity with the United States, the people of the Maritime Provinces in particular, for they have the United States markets at their very door. But the Conservatives tell us it is impossible that we can have reciprocity with the United States. Well, one part of our platform declares for reciprocity, and I hope the country will not be long without it. The census was a great disappointment to this country. We were paying for 800,000 people to come into the country—not that alone, but to go into the North-west. All our immigrants are brought here for the North-west. If I go to the hon. Minister of the Interior and ask him for assistance to bring immigrants to the county of Bonaventure he will say: No; it is all for the North-west. I think it would be better policy to fill up the old parts of the country and then allow those who preferred to seek new homes to go to the North-west. The immigrant should be allowed to choose where he shall settle in Canada. Protection will not exist long in this country; and, Mr. Speaker, manufactures can thrive in this country without protection. Montreal to-day is the centre of the manufacturing interest of Canada, and I say that Montreal is badly situated as a manufacturing centre. What do we see in England? When, in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, the Flemish operatives came to England and settled there, they settled at Leicester, Norwich, London and Nottingham. As soon as the steam engine was discovered, the centres of the manufacturing industries were all taken to the coal beds of England; and the time will yet come when Moncton will be the Manchester, and New Glasgow the Birmingham of Canada. These are the places where the manufacturers of Canada will be situated in the future, because they are on the spot for their fuel, they will not have to pay \$3 and \$4 a ton for hauling coal a distance of six or seven hundred miles. Sir, the policy of the Liberal party is just as much calculated for the development of this country as that of the Conservative party, and even a great deal more, as the event will prove. Shall we have reciprocity with the United States? I was surprised to hear an hon. member from the Maritime Provinces say a few evenings ago that the reciprocity treaty from 1864 to 1866 was of no material benefit to this country. The hon. member from Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies), proved that trade during that time had increased to a great extent. I know that myself, because I remember that we were very well satisfied in our fisheries on the Gulf to see the Americans fishing in our waters; and I would be quite willing tomorrow, although I am interested in the fisheries, to allow the Americans to come and fish with us in our waters, provided we had their market in which to sell our products. I will say a few words on the tariff as it affects fishermen. We have heard hon. gentlemen from the North-west speak from the farmers' standpoint, and I will say a few words about the fishermen. We find that the tariff places on the free list lines, twines and nets; but in respect to cordage, in which fishermen are greatly interested, there has been an increase of at least $\frac{7}{8}$ of a cent a pound. I do not see the junior member for Halifax (Mr. Stairs) here; if he were, I would tell him that when he goes back to meet his fishing constituents in Halifax he will not meet with a pleasant reception, on account of this increase in cordage. There are a great many fishermen in the neighbourhood of Halifax. The hon. senior member for Halifax (Mr. Kenny), who is now smiling at me, knows that this is a serious matter for the fishermen. We have to pay 3 cents per pound on cordage for the benefit of the Consumers' Cordage Combine. On that item alone a large amount of money is invested in the fisheries. Fishermen must have cordage for their sails, cordage for their warps, cordage for their anchors, and so on, and yet the tax on that article has been increased. There has been a slight reduction on sail cloth, but no relief in pork, flour and lard, on which the fishermen have to depend so largely for food; in respect to these articles we derive no benefit from the revised tariff. Waterproof clothing still remains at the old duty of 35 per cent, so that the fishermen derive no benefit from that article, either, under the revised tariff. Then there is the article of coal oil. Last session we heard the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) speak about coal oil, and he was in a great way because the Government would not reduce the duty upon that article. Well, coal oil has not been reduced, but the hon. member seems to be quite satisfied with the tariff. For our part, we are not satisfied with coal oil. That is an essential article of domestic use all over the country, and the people of the Maritime Provinces, who now have to bring their oil from Petrolia, would be a great deal better off if they could get coal oil at a lower rate. The barrels which come down from Petrolia are very often half empty; if we could bring in coal oil in tanks, we would save a great deal. I am confident that when we get into committee something will be done to repair, in some measure, the breach the Finance Minister has made in his promise, repeated on more than one occasion. I hope he will give us free trade, in cordage especially, and on coal oil and on cotton goods. Then I think the Government should reduce the duty on bituminous coal, which is so largely used by the railways. The Canadian Pacific Railway is the only railway that pays any dividends, whereas the Grand Trunk Railway, the pioneer railway of Canada is not so prosperous; its shares are very low in the London markets. Other railways in the country, owing to snow in winter, are running at a great disadvantage as compared with railways to the south of us; and I think if the Government would take off the duty on bituminous coal they would effect a great saving, not only to the railways, but to all parties interested in the carrying trade of the country. When the House goes into committee on the tariff I shall have something more to say.

Mr. GIROUARD (Two Mountains). (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Fauvel), who has just preceded me, stated it would be a very easy matter to obtain reciprocity with the United States; so he would much like having free trade with that country. He refrained, however, from saying how he would manage to obtain such a treaty. I do not know what benefit we could derive from it, for if we look into the statistics we find that in 1892—I am referring to the trade in live animals—the Dominion exported $7,748,949 worth of cattle, while during the same year the United States exported $35,099,095 worth of them. The following table is a comparative statement of our exports and those of the United States, with respect to pork, bacon and wheat, for the year 1892:

| | Canada. | United States. |
|------------|-----------|----------------|
| Pork..... | $ 7,866 | $ 4,822,295 |
| Bacon..... | 1,094,205 | 39,334,933 |
| Wheat..... | 6,947,851 | 161,399,132 |

Therefore, we find by these figures that not only have the United States no need of our products, but that they export enormous quantities of them, so that free trade with the United States would be of no benefit to us in this respect. I congratulate the hon. the Minister of Finance upon having so promptly brought to the notice of the country the financial policy of the Government; I congratulate him especially upon the changes he made in the tariff, inasmuch as these changes, while they are in favour of all classes and industries generally, specially favour in several respects the agricultural class, to which I am happy to belong. Notwithstanding the numerous changes made in the tariff, I am pleased to see that it still preserves its protective features, for the protective system is the policy approved of and accepted by the people. Introduced in 1878, the protective system was ratified at the general elections of 1882, 1887 and 1891, and the by-elections which were held since the last general election only offered new evidences of the leanings of the Canadian people towards this system. For my part, when I ran in the county of Two Mountains in February, 1892, it was the question brought into discussion. I ran as a protectionist, reserving, however, my liberty of action on the other measures relating to the policy of the Government then in power, and the large majority which brought me here only served to confirm the belief which the Canadian people have in the policy of the Government in this respect. In my opinion, protection is the only policy capable of giving to our young country the incentive and impulse which it needs for the development of its natural and industrial resources. If we study the history of the principal nations of Europe, it will be seen that they only began to grow and prosper from the moment they undertook to protect themselves and establish within themselves the industries they felt the want of. The history of England and France is there to give us a convincing proof of this, and without looking further, if we throw a glance at the neighbouring country, we find that if the United States were able to develop their industry, their agriculture and their commerce in such a rapid way, it was due to the protective system they adopted and to which they have adhered now for many years. In perusing a political pamphlet of former times, I found it is something very interesting. It was a speech delivered by the late leader of the Opposition, the Hon. Mr. Blake, in January, 1887, at Malvern. That gentleman was so disgusted with the policy of the Opposition that he renounced the direction of the Liberal party and withdrew into private life. I think this speech was already referred to in this House, but, in my opinion, it cannot be too often quoted. Here is what that gentleman stated on that occasion:

No man, I care not how convinced an advocate of free trade for Canada he may be, has yet suggested—no man, I believe, can suggest—a practicable plan whereby our great revenue needs can be not otherwise than by the imposition of very high duties on goods similar to those we make or can make within our bounds. I invite the most ardent free trader in public life to present a plausible solution to this problem. I have not believed it soluble in my day, and any chance of its solution, if any there were, has been destroyed by the vast increase of our yearly charge and by the other conditions that have been created. The thing is removed from the domain of practical politics.

An interesting pamphlet, edited in Montreal and entitled: "Protection system, or the necessity of a reform of the Canadian tariff," by C. Beausoleil, editor of 'Le Nouveau Monde,' also fell into my hands yesterday. Here is what I find in this pamphlet, very well written indeed, and giving the fullest demonstration of the necessity of adopting the protective system:

We think we have sufficiently demonstrated that the establishment of a strong industry would result in an increase of production and in making us independent of foreign peoples, in furnishing profitable work to a great many Canadians who would remain in the country instead of emigrating, in increasing consequently the consumption and creating a strong demand for all the products of our soil and farms and giving them more value.

I could quote the whole pamphlet for I find it interesting and it is a real plea in favour of protection. Let us compare the condition of the Canadian industry in 1881 and in 1891 and it will be easy to come to the conclusion that the country is progressing. In 1881, we had 49,923 industrial establishments employing 254,935 operatives and paying wages to the amount of $59,429,002 yearly, while in 1891, the number of industrial establishments had increased to 75,768 giving work to 367,865 employees and paying wages to the amount of $99,762,441, which makes in ten years an increase of 25,845 industrial establishments, 112,930 operatives and $40,343,439 wages paid. Moreover, in 1891, the value of products manufactured in the country having been $175,445,705, if we deduct from it the cost of the raw material, $255,983,219, there is left a balance or surplus of $219,462,486 which remained in the country and was distributed in the shape of salaries to workingmen, building of mills, constructions, purchase of plant, maintenance and other contingent expenses—so many things which remain in the country and contribute to its wealth. And from 1891 to 1894, this increase has been steady. Now, I am of opinion that the establishment of these various industries created by the protective system favour in a most material and direct way the farming community with the prosperity of which I am closely connected as it forms the majority of the voters in my county. The fact is, if we have manufactures, if the Government help to their establishment, these manufactures want operatives for their working, and these operatives, these labourers, taken among such of our citizens as have no liking for agricultural work, form so many families who work in our factories and mills, remain in the country, buy here the provisions they want and constitute a profitable market for the products of our soil, provisions, butter, cheese, eggs, grains, fruits and meats. Experience is there to show that where manufactures are established, the surrounding country becomes prosperous, because it has at its door an easy market for its products. It is indisputable that for the exportation of our goods, our natural market is Great Britain, not the United States. Our butter, our meats, our cheese are exclusively sold in Great Britain. According to the official statistics, 95 per cent of these products are sent to Great Britain and 5 per cent are sold in the foreign countries and the United States. I will in a moment give the official figures in connection with such exports for the years elapsed between 1889 and 1893. I am happy to see that the new tariff is favourable to the farming community. Thus the customs duties are reduced upon manufactured stuffs such as cloths, carpets, oil-cloths, ready-made clothes, agricultural machinery, tools and implements, axes, shovels, pickaxes, rakes, mowers and reapers. All these articles are used by our farmers. There is a new reduction of duties upon sugar. It will be remembered, Mr. Speaker, that the duties upon tea and coffee were already taken away. I have just heard an hon. member coming from Manitoba or the Northwest state that he approved of the proposed tariff. Well, at the last session, when he spoke on the same question, he stated he would only support the Government under condition that changes should be made to the tariff then in force. The Government were true in their word and that hon. gentleman is now satisfied. I have just said that the Government favour the farming community by the changes made in the tariff. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, it is shown by the reduction of the duties upon the articles referred to by me. But that is not all. The Government favoured them in past years. Thus, in 1892, they lost on their revenue the large sum of $3,064,462 of taxes by the reduction of duties upon sugar only. A sure indication of the prosperous condition and the easy circumstances of a people is to be found in the quantity of tea and sugar they consume. Well, statistics give as the consumption by our people, before the repeal of duties upon sugar, a quantity of forty pounds per head of the population. Since the taking away of those duties the consumption has increased from forty pounds to seventy pounds and a half per head. That shows, therefore, a large increase, since it nearly doubled in the space of a single year. As just stated by me, Mr. Speaker, not only does the new tariff favour the farming community, but also the poor classes, and that, by the repeal of duties on articles of prime necessity or by the lowering of such duties. Here is the confirmation of my words. A few days ago I read the following in the 'Evening Journal,' of Ottawa, under date of April 3rd, instant :

Montreal Dry Goods Association wants the Government to abandon the increased duty on dress goods, and raise the lowered duty on ready-made clothing.

In other words, the Government having increased the tax on well-to-do people and lessened the tax on the working classes, the Montreal Dry Goods Association wants the Government to go back on its action.

Let the Government stick to the charges. It has done well for the people.

Mr. Speaker, it is not to be denied that in the last few years there was some embarrassment and uneasiness in the country, and more particularly among the farming community. But all right thinking men who are not actuated by the passions of partisanship cannot help acknowledging that this uneasiness, this embarrassment was in no respect due either to the policy of the Government, or their inaction, or even to the tariff, but entirely to the bad harvests which followed in consecutive order during three or four years. Let us hope that good harvests will bring back easy times everywhere, which will not suit our opponents, as they will then have nothing more to say against the Government. The Government made many endeavours to promote the best interests and the advancement of agriculture as well as the diffusion of agricultural science. The establishment of experimental and model farms, the free distribution of reports of the officers of the various departments of experimental farms, the free delivery of samples of prize seeds, much contributed to improve the farming methods of our rural populations and to add thereby to the prosperity of the agricultural class. That policy acquainted the farmer with new discoveries, caused him to appreciate and love the more his condition, and thereby set him moving forward on the road to advancement and progress, especially as regards the dairy industry. It is interesting, Mr. Speaker, to note the steady and rapid progression of that important branch of the farming industry. Here is a statement relating to our export trade in butter and cheese during these last years. Of course, I am not referring to the home consumption, as it escapes all control. I am only referring to exports in foreign countries. Let us first take butter. In 1889 our exports amounted to 1,780,765 pounds, of the value of $331,958. In 1890, 1,951,585; value, $340,131. In 1891, 3,768,101; value, $602,175. In 1892, 5,736,696; value, $1,056,058. In 1893 our exports still increased, and they reached in that year 7,036,013 pounds, giving $1,296,814. Let us now take cheese. In 1889 we exported 88,534,887 pounds of cheese, which gave $8,915,684. In 1890, 94,260,187; value, $9,372,212. In 1891, 106,202,140; value, $9,508,800. In 1892, 118,270,052; value, $11,652,412. And last year our exports increased to the largest figure they had ever reached, viz., 133,946,365 pounds, giving as value $13,407,470. Moreover, the World's Fair at Chicago made us known to the whole world. In point of agriculture the Dominion made an advantageous figure at that great competition of all the peoples, as shown by the prizes it took. The fact is, it was awarded the great majority of these prizes allotted to cheese; and out of 2,721 prizes awarded to the Canadian exhibitors, 1,016 were awarded to the Agricultural Department. Canada, Mr. Speaker, is a fine country. It enjoys all climates, and one has only to run through it in one way or another to experience every temperature. We can make of our country one of the most powerful in the world. Its area is considerable, and several countries of Europe could be included in but one of its provinces. Its soil is magnificent and productive; it is run through by large rivers and sheets of water, a great number of which are navigable. Its mineral and forest wealth is inexhaustible. Its water powers are powerful, and everything seems to show,

Mr. GIROUARD (Two Mountains).

Mr. Speaker, that Providence intended to make Canada a prosperous country called upon to hold a high rank amongst the new and young nations which divide an important part of the world. The Conservative party to which I am pleased and honoured to belong added to the gifts of nature by their progressive policy in the building of canals which carry navigation up to our inland waters. They it were who promoted the building of those railways which intersect the provinces in every direction. They it were who built this Canadian Pacific Railway, which is one of the finest railways in the world, and which is the cause that one can almost say that the two great oceans of the world meet. Thanks to those railways, we are at the door of our natural market, Great Britain, and, moreover, we are at the door of China, Japan, India and Australia. A time will come, Mr. Speaker, when our Pacific Railway will be the necessary route, the principal way of communication between Europe and China. Now the Government are forming immigration most particularly in order to give up to farming our vast and fertile lands. We see with the greatest pleasure those of our compatriots who had left the country, thinking they would find, if not a fortune, at least easy circumstances in the neighbouring country, we see, I say, those compatriots coming back to us undeceived and almost disheartened, returning, under the protection of our patriotic Government, to the calm and prosperous life they had deserted for the deceptive allurements of the prosperity of the American trade and industries. They had gone lured by anticipations held out to them of an easy gain and wealth rapidly acquired. But now reality compels them to come back to their native land. I hope the Government yielding to the representations often made to them by several deputations of the representations of the province of Quebec will favour in a still more direct and special way the coming back of our compatriots, by sending agents in the Canadian centres of the United States to make known to them the progress we have made and the advantages which their native country offers to them. I will now draw my remarks to a close, Mr. Speaker, by stating that I think it my duty, in the interest of the voters of my county, as well as in the general interest of the whole country, to vote against the proposed amendment and for the motion of the hon. the Minister of Finance.

Mr. COCKBURN moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not see the leader of the Opposition in his seat, but I hope we may be able to reach the end of the debate to-morrow evening, about midnight. Could the Chief Whip of the Opposition make any statement in regard to that matter?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Chief Whip of the Government and I have been trying to make arrangements, but perhaps our plans may miscarry. We will try and meet the wishes of the House as far as possible.

Mr. FOSTER. I think we should try to get a vote to-morrow night, even though we have to sit late.

Mr. FOSTER moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and the House adjourned at 12.10 a.m. (Wednesday).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, 11th April, 1894.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 63) respecting the Guelph Junction Railway Company.—(Mr. Henderson.)

Bill (No. 64) respecting the Medicine Hat Railway and Coal Company.—(Mr. Ross, Lisgar.)

Bill (No. 65) to confirm an agreement between the Ottawa City Passenger Railway Company and the Ottawa Electric Street Railway Company, and an agreement between the said companies and the Corporation of the city of Ottawa, and to unite the said companies under the name of the Ottawa Electric Railway Company.—(Mr. Robillard.)

Bill (No. 66) to empower the Niagara Falls Suspension Bridge Company to issue debentures, and for other purposes.—(Mr. Lowell.)

Bill (No. 67) to incorporate the Niagara Falls Electric Railway Bridge Company.—(Mr. Taylor.)

Bill (No. 68) respecting the Montreal Park and Island Railway Company.—(Mr. Taylor.)

THE BOYNTON BICYCLE ELECTRIC RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. GILLIES moved that that portion of the report of the Committee on Standing Orders, referring to the petition of the Boynton Bicycle Electric Railway Company be referred back to the said committee for further consideration.

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis). With reference to that portion of the report of the Select Standing Committee on Standing Orders, to which this motion refers, I beg to say that I can hardly see what use it would be to send it back to the committee for further consideration, unless there was some further light thrown regarding the notices that were not given. For the information of the House, I may say that this petition prays for the passing of an Act to incorporate the Boynton Bicycle Electric Railway Company, and to authorize the construction of this electric railway from Winnipeg to Louisburg, N.S., via Toronto, Ottawa, Montreal and St. John, N.B. The notice was published in the Winnipeg and Louisburg papers and in the 'Canada Gazette'; whereas we know, Mr. Speaker, that Rule 51 requires that in such cases the notice shall be published in each county affected by the railway or through which the railway is intended to run. This may be an expensive form of notice, but still, this is a long railway, and, if it is a bona fide company, it must expect to meet the expense of fulfilling the rule. On 30th January, the date of the first appearance of the notice in the 'Canada Gazette,' a circular was sent to the party whose name was appended to the notice, of which this is a copy :

Re Application of the Boynton Bicycle Electric Ry. Co.

EXTRACTS FROM RULES RESPECTING THE PUBLICATION OF NOTICE.

51. All applications for Private Bills shall require a Notice CLEARLY AND DISTINCTLY SPECIFYING THE NATURE AND OBJECT OF THE APPLICATION, which shall be inserted (a) in the Canada Gazette, and (b) in one newspaper published in each County, District or Territory affected by the proposed measure, or if there be no newspaper published therein, then in the next nearest locality in which a newspaper is published. All such notices shall be over the signature and address of the applicants, or of their solicitors, and shall be published at least once a week, for a period of two months (9 weekly insertions), during the interval of time between the close of the last preceding session and the consideration of the Petition by the Committee on Standing Orders. In the Provinces of Quebec and Manitoba the Notices shall be published both in English and in French. If the application be for power to erect a Toll-Bridge the Notices shall also state the proposed rates of toll, the nature of the structure, the extent of the privilege, the height of the arches, the interval between the piers and the dimensions of the draw (if any).

These are all set forth with full instructions.

Marked copies of all newspapers containing the first and last insertions of such Notice shall be sent to the Clerk of the House endorsed "Private Bill Notice," to be filed in the Standing Orders Committee Room.

And there are other instructions with regard to notice to be given. This circular was sent, as I have said, on the 30th of January; still no notice was taken of it, and no notice was published in any of the papers in certain cities through which this road is intended to extend, judging from what appears in the petition. I may say further that the committee were unanimous in their decision. So, if there is nothing more than what has come before the committee, I see very little use of sending this report back. The Standing Orders Committee may err in some of their decisions, but their erring is usually in favour of legislation, rather than against, in a large number of instances.

Mr. GILLIES. Mr. Speaker, I have every respect, indeed, for the judgment and parliamentary knowledge of the Committee on Standing Orders. I was not aware until late yesterday evening that there was any objection to the petition I presented to the House, praying for leave to introduce this Act, which petition is now before the Standing Orders Committee. I may bring to the notice of the House certain facts, and, I hope that when I state them the motion will be carried and this part of the report of the Committee on Standing Orders referred back to the committee for reconsideration. Since I was before the committee this morning, I have received further information as to greater publicity having been given to this application, which was not within my knowledge when I was before the committee. I can show that such wide publicity has been given to this notice as, I think, will satisfy the committee and the House that the rules have been substantially complied with. I may say, Mr. Speaker, that the notice was published in the 'Canada Gazette,' in the 'North Sydney Herald,' in the Manitoba 'Free Press,' in the St. Boniface 'Le Manitoba,' and the 'Eastern Journal'—four newspapers besides the 'Canada Gazette.' That, together with the further publicity that has been given to the project outside of the technical notices, I think will abundantly convince the Committee on Standing Orders that the notice contemplated and intended by the rule has been given. I simply ask that the House will carry this motion.

Motion agreed to, and report referred back to the Committee on Standing Orders.

GOVERNMENT LIABILITY FOR LABOUR.

Mr. McLENNAN moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 69) respecting the liability of the Government and public companies for labour used in the construction of public works. He said: This Bill is intended to protect labouring men on Government works and works conducted by companies, making the Government and companies responsible for the payment of the labour of the men employed thereon. The Bill will explain itself when it is printed.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis).

RAILWAY RETURN TICKETS.

Mr. McLENNAN moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 70) respecting the sale of railway return fare tickets. He said: Railway companies issue first class return tickets from stations where they do not issue second class return tickets, therefore discriminating against a class of people who cannot afford to buy first class tickets. It is a discrimination against farmers and labouring men who want to go to market, who want to visit cities, who may want to come here and see the Experimental Farm, and who may find it necessary to travel for other purposes. At stations where they issue first class they cannot get second class return tickets, and so they have to purchase a single fare ticket each way. This amounts to about as much as the return first class ticket. I think it is only fair that they should have the same privilege as the purchaser of a first class ticket, with a proportionate reduction. The Bill does not commit the company to inconvenience in any way: it only requires them to sell second class return tickets where they sell first class return tickets, and only on trains where they carry both first and second class passengers. The Bill is intended to remove a discrimination against those who can least afford to pay the rates that are charged for second class tickets.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

REPORT.

Report of the Department of Marine and Fisheries (first half) for the fiscal year ending 30th June, 1893.—(Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper.)

ELECTRIC LIGHT COMPANIES.

Mr. COCKBURN asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to introduce a Bill this session for the regulation and inspection of Electric Light Companies?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). Such is the intention of the Government.

THE SOUTH-EASTERN RAILWAY CO.

Mr. LAVERGNE asked, 1. Is the Government informed that the section of the South-eastern Railway, from the town of Drummondville to St. Guillaume Station, in the county of Drummond, has ceased to be operated since about two months? 2. Has the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, which is operating the South-eastern Railway system, the right to cease operating any part of it? 3. Is the Government aware that the municipalities in the section so abandoned have subscribed large amounts for the construction of the said railway, and that, namely the parish of St. Germain de Grant-ham, which is now entirely deprived of railroad communication, has alone subscribed thirty thousand dollars towards helping the construction of the said railway? 4. If the trustees and bondholders of the South-eastern Railway Company are unable to continue the operation of said road, and if the Canadian Pacific Railway Company is under no obligation to do so, is it the Government's intention to grant any help towards improving the said road, rebuilding the bridge at Yamaska, and by doing so making it possible for the interested companies to resume the operation of all the sections of said road?

Mr. HAGGART. The Government has been informed that the section of the South-eastern Railway from Drummondville to St. Guillaume station is not being operated. 2. As to whether the Canadian Pacific Railway Company have a right to cease operating this section of the road, depends on the nature of the agreement with the South-eastern Railway Company. 3. The Government is aware that the municipalities in the sections through which the road passes subscribed towards its construction, but is not aware that the parish of St. Germain de Grantham subscribed $30,000 towards its construction. 4. The question of granting a subsidy to this section of road is one that will be considered among other applications for railway subsidies when the question of granting railway subsidies is under the consideration of the Government.

INSPECTION OF ELECTRICITY METERS

Mr. MACLEAN (York) asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to introduce legislation for the inspection of meters used in measuring electricity for light and other purposes similar to the law regarding gas meters?

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). It is the intention of the Government to introduce legislation for the inspection of meters used in measuring electricity for light, and not for other purposes.

CREED OF CIVIL SERVICE EMPLOYEES.

Mr. McNEILL asked, Do the Government intend bringing down at an early day this session the return ordered by this House on the 6th February, 1893, showing the creed or church of each person employed in the Civil Service of Canada? If not, why not?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The return will be ready in a very few days.

RATES ON SUBSIDIZED STEAMERS.

Mr. FAUVEL asked, Is it the intention of the Government to insist that steamers subsidized by Government grants and running in conjunction with trains worked by the Department of Railways, shall carry passengers and freight at the same rate per mile as is charged by the railways operated by the Government?

Mr. HAGGART. No such arrangements or conditions are included in any contract made with subsidized steamers.

UNIFORMED CUSTOMS OFFICERS.

Mr. GRIEVE asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to put the officers of the Customs in uniform? Have any uniforms or parts of uniforms been purchased? If so, what was the cost?

Mr. WALLACE. It is intended to uniform certain officers of Customs whose duties bring them into direct and constant contact with the public at the frontier, as in the examination of passengers' baggage on railway passenger trains entering Canada, and at ferry landings. Experience has shown that often serious and vexatious altercations would be avoided if the officer's identity as a customs official were clear. The answer to the last question is, Yes, $111.69.

INDEX TO THE CUSTOMS STATUTES.

Mr. GRIEVE asked, Whether it is the intention of the Controller of Customs to publish an index to the Customs Statutes?

Mr. WALLACE. It is intended to publish an index to the Customs Statutes in connection with the republishing of the statutes themselves, the supply of which is exhausted. The work was under way last year, but owing to not being sufficiently advanced for publication until shortly before the opening of this Parliament, the work was held over in view of the possibility that some sections might require to be amended during the present session.

DUTIES ON FISHING NETS.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Before the Orders of the Day are called, I desire to ask the Finance Minister whether the collectors throughout the Dominion are acting under instructions in collecting duties prescribed by the resolutions which the hon. gentleman proposes to move in committee, and I wish to call his attention specially to the question of fishing nets. The collectors in the Maritime Provinces are charging—I have a telegram under my hand from one of the large importers—30 per cent. Under the old tariff fishing nets were free, and I am unable to find under what provision it is proposed that fishing nets should be charged duty. I observe on page 19 of the tariff resolutions that hammock and lawn tennis nets and others, not already specified, are charged 30 per cent ad valorem. That is the duty which the collector at Weymouth is charging; and I want to know if the department construes that clause to which I have referred as including ordinary fishing nets, which have hitherto been admitted free.

Mr. FOSTER. With respect to those resolutions, the customs officers have been acting under them from the time they were brought down, but always with the further instruction that all entries made from the time they were introduced until the enactment of the Act finally, are subject to amendment. With respect to the particular matter to which the hon. gentleman has called attention, I am not aware how the officers have ruled in regard to it, but it was the intention of the Government to keep fishing nets as before.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) That is free.

PAPERS REGARDING PENITENTIARIES.

Mr. BORDEN. I desire to ask the Government when the papers respecting alleged irregularities at Kingston and British Columbia penitentiaries will be brought down?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I cannot state precisely. The papers are very voluminous indeed, and they will be brought down as soon as possible.

THE TARIFF INQUIRY.

Mr. CASEY. I desire to remind the Finance Minister of his promise to bring down at an early date papers relating to the Commission of Inquiry respecting the tariff, and I desire to inquire when they will be brought down?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. At the time I was not aware whether the return had been moved for or not; I presumed it had been. Yesterday it was moved for, and the motion was allowed to stand on the suggestion of the Finance Minister that no such report had been made.

Mr. CASEY. Then the commission has not reported at all?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. No.

DUTIES ON MAPLE SUGAR.

Mr. RIDER. Some days ago I inquired whether maple sugar would be classified as raw or as refined sugar, and the Finance Minister did not give me a definite answer. I desire to obtain this information, as it concerns a very important industry in the part of the country from which I come.

Mr. FOSTER. Under the resolutions as at present drawn, I see no other way in which maple sugar can be classified except according to its colour.

Mr. RIDER. That is as refined sugar?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That means it will be taxed.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.)

Mr. FOSTER. That is if it goes above No. 16.

Mr. RIDER. Do I understand that it will be classified as refined sugar? I understand that even refined sugar under No. 16 is subject to duty.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. RIDER. Is that the case?

Mr. FOSTER. If it is classified as refined sugar, it will have to pay the refined sugar duty, 64-100ths of a cent.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Is it, or is it not to be so classified?

Mr. FOSTER. I am not giving an interpretation just now.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. gentleman should be able to interpret his own resolution, and answer such a simple question as, whether the authorities consider maple sugar is refined sugar or not.

Mr. FOSTER. The interpretation, no doubt, lies with the customs. Maple sugar so far as it has been discussed in connection with the customs tariff has never come up as a matter by itself. I think it will be classed as refined sugar and be liable to a duty of 64-100ths of a cent.

Mr. RIDER. I think the Finance Minister is treating the matter too lightly. This is a matter of considerable importance to my constituents.

Mr. SPEAKER. Order. The hon. gentleman cannot make a speech.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE TARIFF.

House resumed the adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Foster:

That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go into Committee of Ways and Means; and the motion off, Sir Richard Cartwright in amendment thereto.

Mr. COCKBURN. Mr. Speaker, if any question seems to have been discussed during the last few years until human nature can scarcely support it any longer, it seems to be this everlasting question of the tariff. My only apology for rising at this late hour to say a few words on this question is my wish to direct the attention of the House briefly to one or two points, which I think are of importance, but to which perhaps sufficient attention has not been directed by hon. gentlemen who have preceded me. I am free to confess that I had fondly hoped that owing to the united efforts of the moderate men on both sides of this House, some tariff might have been devised which would for the future have secured a resting-place for our manufacturing and productive interests so that they might feel that this interminable change must be a thing of the past, and that those who have invested money in our industries might have some assurance that they would have a fair chance of securing a revenue from the investment made before any change occurred to destroy such chance. But while I looked, perhaps, too fondly towards such a hope or towards such co-operation on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite, I must say that I did not look for their aid through any thin pretext of pure patriotism, but I thought as they had ran the gamut of every possible change, political and commercial, they might be driven as a last resource to find such a refuge with the great party to which I have the honour to belong. It seems, however, that such is not the case, and that after a lengthened labour during last summer the party, after a forty-eight hours' labour, by a grand Caesarian operation was delivered of a child known under the name of Free Trade. We have had various bantlings brought before us of the party opposite. Now, however, they offer a clear, definite policy. They demand free trade, pure, simple and unadulterated, and the hon. member from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) has told the House that if there is the vestige of a trace of protection left in any tariff, he would obliterate it. The cool demand is made to us to hand over to those hon. gentlemen the virtual control of the $353,000,000 invested in our manufactures. They are to be left free to be dealt with by hon. gentlemen opposite according to their own sweet will. It becomes us, therefore, as guardians of the interests of the people and those to whom the commercial welfare of the country has been entrusted to look carefully into the antecedents of the hon. gentlemen who have made such a demand, and see if they are worthy of the confidence they ask, and worthy of being entrusted with the management of the affairs of the country in future. It becomes our duty, therefore, to briefly review the history of the Reform party. After that it would be but right that we should inquire what has been the history of protection and free trade so far as applicable to Great Britain; and lastly, whether the circumstances under which free trade was adopted by Great Britain are so analogous to these prevalent in Canada that we would be justified in agreeing to the proposal made by hon. gentlemen opposite, to sweep away at one blow our whole Conservative National Policy system. I cannot but remember that during the regime of Mr. Mackenzie his Government reduced the tariff on not one single item, except coal oil, and the only reduction they made on that article was to bring it down to the point at which it now stands in the tariff before the House. Wonderful changes must have come over the views of the leading members of the Liberal party when we find them ready to adopt a policy such as is now proposed by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright); for Mr. Mackenzie, their great leader, when he raised the tariff from 15 to 17½ per cent was particularly cautious to state: that he did it with the understanding that in making this increase due precaution would be taken to give such incidental protection to the industries of the country as could possibly be given. His words were:

As long as the revenue has to be raised by a duty upon imports it should be raised by placing a duty upon articles that we ourselves can produce.

That was the policy of his Government, but the policy of the present would-be Government is to collect revenue by duties placed upon articles which we cannot produce in Canada; and it is the only possible method, says the gallant knight of South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), of removing every vestige of protection out of the tariff and to still raise a revenue. Such then were the views of Mr. Mackenzie in 1877. Ten years later, we find the leader of the same party, Mr. Blake, state:

The high rate of taxation must be maintained and the manufacturers have nothing whatever to fear.

Mr. Blake was careful to tell us at the same time, that these views were also entertained by his colleague, the member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). Well, Sir, I find that these views are variously held by different members of the Liberal party. I find the member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar) giving us his views in the following words:—

The manufacturers have nothing to fear. The policy of the Liberal party is not confiscation, and in the event of their accession to power, nothing would be hastily done. It was not proposed to do away with protection at a blow; the change will be gradual. He entirely approved of the statement of Mr. David A. Wells who declared in a recent article: that the duty on manufactured goods should not be lowered too precipitately and that nothing should be done to upset trade.

This again is a different programme altogether from the programme as announced in the amendment proposed by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), now before the House. The philosophic member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) is always careful in choosing his language, but still he said:

I admit we have established industries in this country and we ought make any changes so as to cause as little disturbance as possible.

He was evidently not in favour of this radical policy of eradicating every trace of protection to native industries, for he tells us that he is going to proceed on lines that will cause as little disturbance as possible, and he follows the hon. member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar), who a few months previously said: "That these duties on manufactured goods must not be lowered too precipitately and that nothing whatever should be done to upset trade." These are the views held by two leading members of the Liberal party. I find at the same time, that the party has adopted various other views so far as the National Policy is concerned. They advocated commercial and continental union, but the dearest child of all seems to have been unrestricted reciprocity. As the genial member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) told us: It was an unhappy cognomen to give to that child; it ought to have been differently baptized. It has been felt, as he tells us, to be a bugbear, so to speak, in the way of the success of his party. It was felt by loyal men that unrestricted reciprocity would bring about a condition of things that would not be accepted, and so the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) was driven to the extremity of telling us plainly and distinctly that it would discriminate against Great Britain. He told us this as reported in the 'Hansard' of 1891, again in the 'Hansard' of 1892; and again in the House in 1892, he said that every such treaty must necessarily involve discrimination against Great Britain. But the same hon. gentleman when giving an account of unrestricted reciprocity at a meeting held at St. John's, N.B., on the 24th of August, 1893, tells us:

He showed the absurdity of the Cabinet Ministers' visit to Washington to try to arrange a treaty, and that they knew before they went that they would not get what they asked for. He knew from personal interviews with the late J. G. Blaine, that an amicable treaty could be arranged and that would not discriminate against Great Britain.

I leave the hon. gentleman from Queen's (Mr. Davies) to make his own peace with his own assertions, viz.: The assertion in 1891 as reported in 'Hansard,' the assertion again in 1892 as reported in 'Hansard,' his assertion again in February, 1893, as reported in 'Hansard,' and his assertion in August, 1893, as reported in the account of the meeting at St. John's, which I have quoted to the House. Well, Sir, when members of the Liberal party holding such various views come to us and ask us to hand them over the commercial destinies of this country, ask us to intrust to their keeping the management of $353,000,000 of capital, ask us to allow them to deal with the future welfare of a million and a quarter persons interested in manufactures, ask us to permit them to deal also with wages, amounting to some $100,000,000 a year, when they ask us for proofs of such unlimited confidence in their ability and integrity, we surely have a right to inquire into their past history, so that we may have some assurance as to what will be their future. I think we have seen from the opinions I have quoted that they are not in a position to come to this House and claim any vote of confidence in such a policy, inasmuch as they themselves seem to be altogether at sea as to what their policy really is. A more important point, however, is to deal with the question of the history of protection. That is a question which must stand by itself, and so, also, must the question of free trade, irrespective of the parties who come here and demand to be intrusted with the carrying out of the principles of free trade. I desire to draw the attention of the House to the fact that the history of protection has indeed been most remarkable. Fifty years ago the question seemed to have been solved. Great Britain had adopted free trade; the United States was apparently following closely in her wake; the whole civilized world, as was expected by Cobden and Bright, seemed also to be willing to take the same step. But, Sir, fifty years afterwards what do we find? We find that every civilized nation, with the exception of Great Britain herself, has found it necessary to adopt a system of protection. Only a year or so ago the last English colony felt that, in spite of its reverence for the mother land and its desire to adopt her fiscal system, it was obliged to fall back on the system of protection. What has been the history of the world during those fifty years? It has been a time when education has been disseminated widely among the people, when political discussion has been rife, when every means have been taken to instruct the people as to their rights and duties as citizens, when universities have been founded, when lecturers and writers everywhere have been developing their economic views. No period of the world has ever seen so much intellectual activity, and we see that as a result every nation in the civilized world has found it necessary to adopt the system of protection. I hold, therefore, that it is but right that those gentlemen who claim superiority for the free trade policy should assume the onus of proof. I know that my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills) will be perfectly able to prove by most careful syllogisms that he is correct in proclaiming the doctrine of free trade. Against that I can only bring the greater facts of the last fifty years, and ask him to acknowledge that the whole race has been wiser than any one man. The consensus of enlightened opinion is so strongly in favour of the protective system of government that I do not yet despair of seeing my hon. friend, with all his philosophy, enrolled on this side of the House, so far at least as regards the acceptance of our commercial policy. Now, I should like to draw the attention of the House for a few moments to the true history of free trade. We have been taught to believe that England was apparently on her last legs, that by the system of protection she had been reduced to the uttermost beggary with her manufacturing system broken down, when, in the hour of her distress and destitution, there descended from heaven two men who straightway removed the disabilities under which Great Britain at that time was labouring, and she then entered on her grand career of the last fifty years. Such is the popular notion with reference to Cobden and Bright and the Anti-Corn Law League. What are the facts? The facts are simply these, that for nearly three centuries wages had been at a comparative standstill in England. The strictest protective system had been observed—so strict, indeed, that even her colonies had not been allowed to build ships, and no machinery had been allowed to be expected from Great Britain. Everything was kept within Great Britain itself. A more exclusive system of protection, a stricter monopoly amounting to prohibition had never existed and never can exist again. But, with the invention of the steam engine, she found her supplies so far exceeding her demands that she was driven by the demand made by her workmen for higher wages, to devise some means by which those higher wages could be obtained. It never entered the mind of Cobden or Bright to run counter to the system of protection as it is understood to-day. What they did was to lead the attack against an odious tax which had been put upon the people—a tax which simply increased the revenues of the aristocratic landlords, an odious tax which made bread dear to the poor man. As we were told yesterday by the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Boyd), the leaders in that demand, Cobden and Bright, were themselves manufacturers. Their position was entirely different from the position of hon. gentlemen opposite to-day. Here we find no Cobden and Bright, themselves manufacturers, demanding their own freedom and relief from all burdens. The attack to-day is being led against the manufacturers. I suppose that it would scarcely appear possible to some members of this House that such was the case; but if you will allow me to quote from the English 'Hansard' of 8th February, 1842, column 60, page 133, you will find that the Marquis of Lansdowne presented a petition from the woollen manufacturers of England asking that all duties be abolished, including their own, but especially the corn laws, and in the same volume 60, at page 137, you will find Lord Brougham declaring that prior to that time he had laid upon the Table a petition from persons authorized by all the great manufacturing bodies of England, praying for the repeal of every duty levied under the pretense of protection. Such are the very words of Lord Brougham. The fight was not simply a fight against the manufacturers; it was a fight made by the manufacturers who wished to have cheap bread, in order, selfishly, no doubt, that they might not be compelled to raise the wages of the workmen. They said to the workmen: If we do not give you the coin, we give you the money's worth, and what does it matter to you? At that time England, by means of the system of protection that she had long enjoyed, had so absolutely secured the markets against all competitors, that it made no iota of difference to her whether or not every law and every duty levied under the pretense of protection were repealed.

To sum up, Sir, we may say that at the time when England adopted free trade as her fiscal system she was indeed the workshop of the world.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). No.

Mr. COCKBURN. Of raw material she herself had none; but she had her coal and iron and the invention of the steam engine, and she had kept her own machinery to herself. She had had a protection of over a generation and a half. She had had a qualified protection for over 300 years.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). And made no progress under it.

Mr. COCKBURN. I will admit, with my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills), that the progress she had made at that time did not correspond with the progress she made later. But she was then preparing the road by which she has since achieved such unparalleled prosperity. The tariff at that time had ceased to give any protection to her manufacturing interests. She no longer required such protection. The one bugbear that stood in the way was this duty on corn, which was simply a tax, making food dearer, just as a tax imposed on sugar makes sugar dearer. The whole crusade of 1840 was for free food. Repeal of the corn laws meant an increase of real wages. Repeal of tariff in manufacturing meant nothing. Protection, in our modern sense, is never mentioned in any of Cobden's free trade speeches. But just let us put ourselves in the position of England at that time, and ask ourselves how we should have acted. At that time the sole limit of work was human strength. Even the children were not spared in the sacrifice to Moloch. Shorter hours of labour were scorned by Cobden and Bright as absurdities. As late as 1880, Bonamy Price, a great authority on political economy on the Liberal side, declared that shorter hours are a repudiation of the doctrine of free trade. Let us look at the position which was held by England when she adopted free trade, and see if we have anything in Canada analogous to it, which would justify us in following her example. Now, Mr. Speaker, suppose England had been in Canada's position—not a small island girt by the sea, but half of a great continent—suppose she had had an unlimited supply of raw material at hand; suppose she had had all the facilities for a great internal commerce, with huge lakes and a canal and railway system, such as we possess, opening up to her a vast internal commerce; suppose immigrants were pouring into her land; suppose wages were going higher and higher, and she had a supply from her own soil of cheap food beyond all her possible wants; suppose her labourers were spending freely their higher wages, and thus becoming great consumers of her products: suppose she had a people along her border, separated by an invisible line—a people of 70,000,000 of the brightest, most active, energetic and pushing that the world has ever seen—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order: oh, oh.

Mr. COCKBURN. I have no hesitation in saying so, but I do not for a moment say that they are superior, in any way, to our own countrymen. But I ask you, suppose England had had these 70,000,000 people on her borders: suppose cheap freights had brought every country close to her very doors, because you can now carry freight from Liverpool to Montreal as cheap as you can carry the same goods from Montreal to Toronto; suppose England had had those cheap freights bringing everything to her very door, annihilating, as the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) said the other night, distance, so to speak; suppose these 70,000,000 people and all the European countries had had the machinery of Great Britain and equally skilled labour, and an industrial system equal to hers; suppose these countries had the command of immense capital, and that money for investment in manufactures was to be had there even cheaper than in England—for recollect, Sir, that the assessed wealth of the United States at this hour, according to Mr. Mulhall, is $65,000,000,000: suppose that those countries had had labour 30 or 40 per cent cheaper than England, and suppose the manufacturers of England, with their $353,000,000,000 embarked in their enterprises, were crying out against any change—do you imagine that, with these facts existing and with that condition of things, if Cobden had then called upon England to take that plunge into free trade, she would for one moment have been so foolish as to entertain the idea? No, Sir, not if the whole angelic hosts of Grits or Reformers, from the earliest times—from heaven or from earth—had gone on their knees at that time, would she have committed the atrocious folly of sacrificing all her interests to a mere whim or fad. I have shown you what was the position of England when she embarked on the policy of free trade. I have shown you the immense resources she had. I have shown you that she had the command virtually of every market, and that it made not an iota of difference to her if you swept away every duty under heaven. She had the absolute command, and owing to her policy for 300 years she was then able to maintain that command. And when that tariff was swept away, that did not alter in one iota the position of Richard Cobden or John Bright, as manufacturers, able to compete with the cheap labour of the continent. But we in Canada are very differently situated. My hon. friend (Mr. Mills) is apt to be carried away by his sophistical turn of mind—by mere syllogisms or a mere fad. I point to the rest of the world, and I ask, in view of what has been done by all other civilized nations in the last fifty years, are you prepared to take the ground that the only sensible country in the world is England, and that all the others are fools? I might also draw your attention to the fact that during those fifteen years in which we have had the National Policy, our progress has indeed been rapid. I cannot understand what our friends can want. With wages rising, with prices of manufactured goods falling, with lessening hours of labour—what on earth more do they want for the workingman than what we are offering? But I am told, forsooth, look at our Canadian farmers. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) says their farm lands have fallen 25 to 30 per cent. Well, I reply, look at English farms. They have fallen 50 per cent. The hon. gentleman says yes, but the English farms had been raised to an abnormal price through the corn laws of two generations ago, and they have been reduced in value because they have been brought nearer to the point of distribution, and to the points in which these great corn crops are raised. Well, have we not been brought nearer to the point of distribution—to the point of supply? What has the Canadian Pacific Railway done? What have we given $60,000,000 for except to bring us into closer union with those points, and surely the law that applies to England must also apply to us? But I could take the hon. gentleman to the United States, where one-third of the farmers are but tenants at will. I could point him to the North-west. If it has happened that farms in Ontario have fallen 20 to 25 per cent, we must not look at this matter simply from the point of view of Ontario. We must not look at it simply from the point of view of Prince Edward Island or Nova Scotia; we must look at it as we find it throughout the whole mighty Dominion of Canada, and ask ourselves whether our total wealth has not immensely increased, whether our assets are not much greater, by reason of our having opened up these millions of acres of the finest wheat lands in the world. Sir, they say that wheat is only 55 cents. As if, forsooth, they would try to impose upon the farmer and lead him to believe that, if they were only in office, by some god-like power, or fiat, or word of command, they would cause wheat to rise to 60, 80 cents, or a dollar. Why, Sir, they know as well as we do that the price of wheat is not settled by us; that it is determined by supplies from Russia, India, the Argentine Republic. The hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) tells us that in the Argentine Republic they have a hundred millions of bushels ready to ship, to England at 60 cents. They say that the price of land has fallen. I will show them land within fifteen miles of the city of London for which you cannot get any more than for lands fifteen miles from the city of Toronto. Are we so situated that the laws that govern the rest of the human race are to have no effect with us? Are we to have millions of acres opened up in India, Russia, the Argentine Republic and the great North-west and not find the prices of our farm products fall?

Mr. COCKBURN.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). That is what your friend said in 1878.

Mr. COCKBURN. No, Sir. Our friends prophesied magnificent results from their policy, and the day will come when their prophecies will all be fulfilled. Sir Charles Tupper's 640,000,000 bushels, the product of the North-west will come. They have not come yet, but they will come in time. And, if gentlemen opposite only would have more confidence in their country, if they could see these 640,000,000 bushels, as I see them coming, in my mind's eye, they would have a warmer place in the hearts of their countrymen than they have now.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) How many trains a day would you require to haul that?

Mr. COCKBURN. When it comes, we will run the trains. Then comes this plaintive cry of the farmer, who of late has become the object of anxious solicitude to both parties in this House. The poor farmer; the depressed farmer; the farmer who is overloaded with taxation. The poor farmer now is changing his loan from 7 per cent to 5 per cent. That poor farmer is keeping in his garner the fruits of the last two years of his labour, a thing that very few merchants would dare to attempt. That poor farmer—thousands of them—are holding the last year's crop. Why? Because they are speculating in it in a manner, and they think that, owing to European complications or other causes, instead of 55 cents a bushel they will get 85 cents or a dollar. I am told that these men are suffering almost past human endurance, but these men in Ontario last year, with $106,000,000 borrowed from the loan companies, were in default only 2 per cent; whereas, twelve years before, shortly after gentlemen opposite had left power, they were in default nearly 9 per cent. To hear hon. gentlemen talk, one would think that the community was divided into two great classes, the producers and the consumers. They tell us: Here are your cotton operatives, numbering six thousand; here are your glass makers, numbering five thousand; here are your mill hands, numbering four thousand, and so on; and they say; What are these to four and a half or five millions of people. They run through the whole list of operatives, and take them, class by class, and demand of us: What are these people to the whole population of the Dominion? If you add these four thousand and five thousand and fifteen thousand together, and so on through the test, you will find you are approaching very close to the five millions of consumers. Hon. gentlemen opposite have tried to draw a false line which would place every man upon one side or the other, making him either a producer or a consumer. Why, Sir, these operatives are the very men who are freely spending their money; they are the men who are our great consumers. And here I would like to say a word or two for our manufacturers, who seem nowadays to be forgotten in this intense new-born love for the farmer. Our manufacturers and their operatives number 367,000 souls, representing probably nearly one million and a quarter of population. Their wages are over $100,000,000; they are working a capital of $353,000,000; they have products of some $475,000,000, and profits of $90,000,000. The products of these manufacturers are equal to the products of the farmer, and I think these people entitled to equal consideration with the farmers. Perhaps, for certain reasons, I should say they are entitled to more consideration, because they produce wealth more readily, and the possibilities of production with them are illimitable. Sir, let me draw your attention to the fact that the value of the cotton raised in the United States last year, as it left the field, was $300,000,000, and the same cotton, when it left the mill was worth $1,750,000,000. This shows how vast is the wealth that may be accumulated by manufacturers when duly directed. Now, Mr. Speaker, I should like, before resuming my seat, to say a word or two with reference to some of the misstatements which were made by gentlemen opposite, and which have not been corrected—at least not during my attendance in the House. I was astonished to hear the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) say, with reference to the debt of Canada:

It is equal, I believe, to the debt with which the United States emerged from their great and desperate civil war.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Oh, no.

Mr. COCKBURN. These are his words as reported in 'Hansard,' and I do not wonder that my honest friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills) on hearing them is astonished, and says: "Oh, no." I find from the American official returns that the debt of the United States in 1865 was $2,756,000,000, making an average for the population of that time of $73.25 per head. And I find our own debt to be $241,681,000, an average of $49.50 per head—or, as the hon. member for South Oxford puts it, $50 per head. The total is $241,000,000, which is less than the deposits in the banks and loan companies, and less by $8,000,000 than the amount carried as life insurance. I was the more astonished to find the hon. member for South Oxford pay so much attention to these matters when I found how little he seemed to regard figures. In fact, this seems to be a falling with hon. gentlemen opposite. When they get hold of a few thousands, they do not hesitate to run them up into the millions. I was rather astonished to hear the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) declare that savings bank deposits were rather an evidence, not of wealth, but of our inability to know what to do with our money—an evidence of poverty of intellect, if not poverty of purse. Our genial friend from Prince Edward Island (Mr. Davies) was kind enough to inform us that the savings bank deposits in the single state of Maine were greater than the deposits of the savings banks of the whole Dominion of Canada. Well, I do not wish to dwell long on the point made by the hon. member for Bothwell, but I will confront him with the declaration made by his friend the hon. member for South Oxford, in making his Budget speech in 1877, when he had all responsibility of a Finance Minister on his shoulders, and speaking under a strict sense, I suppose, of official responsibility. He said :

The banks do undoubtedly afford us certain standards by which we may estimate with tolerable precision the increased volume of business throughout the country. These standards are usually considered reliable signs of the advance of the population in wealth. What are those signs? Increased circulation.

That we have.

Increase of bank deposits.

That we have.

Increase in deposits in Government savings banks.

That we have.

These deposits in savings banks are specially valuable.

My hon. friend from Bothwell thinks they are not.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman is aware that, in consequence of the reduction in the rate of interest by $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent, the deposits in the savings banks were diminished by \$3,600,000. Now, does the hon. gentleman think that the country was that much poorer?

Mr. COCKBURN. I understand the question to be, that there had been a decrease in the deposits.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Yes.

Mr. COCKBURN. There had been also a decrease in the rate of interest.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Yes.

Mr. COCKBURN. And some money, I understand, was withdrawn and transferred to the chartered banks, who are paying—

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). We do not know.

Mr. COCKBURN. I know. I am a bank director, and I speak of what I know. I am not talking simple official platitudes. I say that I went to the Government myself, and strongly objected to their entering into this competition with the banks; I did not consider it to be their sphere. I said: You are offering 4 per cent for money, and you are forcing the banks to offer the same, and the result is that we are obliged to charge merchants and manufacturers a larger amount for our discounts, and by that means you are impeding the progress of the country, and putting a burden on commerce. They lowered the rate from 4 to $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent, and immediately some people withdrew their money from the savings banks and put it into the chartered banks, because some of the chartered banks were offering a half per cent more. A good many people who have their little savings in those banks, think a great deal of a half per cent, and the banks were very wide awake and opened savings departments to catch all those men who had withdrawn their money from the Government banks. They put that money back into the banking interest of the country, transferring it merely from the Government Savings Bank account.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman has not answered my question. My question is, whether the diminution in the amount of the savings banks deposits is a certain evidence of a diminished prosperity, or a diminution of the wealth of the country?

Mr. COCKBURN. If there were a diminution in the deposits in the chartered banks of the country, and a diminution at the same time in the others, I would say that the money was less.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Then, I infer from the hon. gentleman's statement, that these are the only two ways in which people can properly invest their money, and this money could not have been invested in any other form.

Mr. COCKBURN. By no means; I do not see how such an inference could be drawn from my remarks. However, I was reading a portion of the speech of the hon. member for South Oxford, where he states that these deposits are a specially valuable indication. Now, I was a little surprised that my hon. friend from Queen's (P.E.I.) should have taken it upon himself to say that the deposits in the savings banks in the state of Maine were greater than the deposits in the whole Dominion of Canada. I may say, although I do not accuse my hon. friend of any disingenuity, I think there was a slight quibble in his statement, if I may use so unparliamentary a term. I think he is president of a bank in Prince Edward Island, and he ought to know, surely, that there is not the slightest analogy between the savings banks of the United States and the savings banks of Canada. The savings banks of Canada are institutions provided by the Government to receive, up to a certain small sum, the savings of working-men and other classes. The Government instituted these to encourage thrift, and because it was felt at the same time that the moneys this class of people possessed, might be locked up in old stockings, or old drawers, or hidden away, whereas they might be put into banks and used to oil the wheels of commerce. Our savings banks are not dealing in money; they are not discounting; they give but a moderate rate of interest. Now, savings banks in the United States are for another purpose. My hon. friend ought to have told us yesterday, in all honesty and sincerity, that there was no analogy. Taking the report of the Controller of the Currency, he says that in Maine there are deposits to the amount of $33,000,307. That is true, but, if he had only looked at the preceding page, showing the liabilities and resources, he would have seen what the bank does with this money. It has loans on real estate, for instance; it has loans on collateral security and other real estate; it has large discounts to merchants; it has United States bonds; it has city, county, municipal and other bonds, amounting to seventeen millions; it has railroad bonds and stock, fifteen millions; other bank stocks, three millions; other kinds of bonds and stocks, four millions; it has got real estate, so much. Surely, my hon. friend must confess that there is not the slightest analogy between what we understand by a post office savings bank, or a Government savings bank, in Canada, and a bank which is just run like any other bank, except that it has not got the power of issuing notes. I hope I have shed some little enlightenment on the mind of the hon. member for Prince Edward Island, and that in future, when he turns up the Controller's report, he will look at both sides of the account and know how the bank stands. So much for two misstatements. There is another misstatement I should like to deal with, and that is, that Canada lost, as we are told by the gallant knight from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), $500,000,000 from 1860 to 1880, being at the rate of $25,000,000 a year. Now it was a source of extreme pleasure to learn that so immense were our resources, so fabulously rich had we become, that during the last fifteen years we were able to throw away, not $25,000,000 a year, but no less a sum than $66,000,000 a year. It is consoling to us to feel that we live in such a country where we are able to throw away millions at a time and not feel the loss, and perhaps it may have been this unlimited confidence on the part of the hon. member from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), as to this competency which led him to make a remark which I should like to quote, and to inquire why he had not redeemed his promise. The statement is indeed an extraordinary one, and here it is. In June, 1891, in the Budget debate the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) used these most extraordinary words:

In Ontario to-day we had 22,000,000 acres of land under cultivation. It is not a matter of opinion that if the policy of unrestricted reciprocity with the United States was carried out, each acre would be worth $10 more, or $220,000,000 of gain in wealth in land in Ontario alone.

The hon. gentleman further stated:

We had in Ontario about 1,250,000 horses. Unrestricted reciprocity would make each horse worth $30 more, or a total gain of $37,500,000.

I ask in the name of common sense why did this hon. gentleman ever abandon the policy called unrestricted reciprocity, when by a mere stroke of his pen he could thus make us fabulously wealthy? If he had only adhered to unrestricted reciprocity, every horse would have been worth $30 more, and every acre of land would have possessed an additional value of $10. In fact the hon. gentleman could add to our wealth by millions by a stroke of gigantic financial genius, and he had such unbounded confidence in the resources of the country, that he said: "What matter is that? In the last fifteen years the Government have thrown away a thousand millions, and during twenty years previous have thrown away other $500,000,000. We will go in now for free trade." The $220,000,000, or the $237,000,000 would have been a godsend to us, obtained as it would have been by a mere stroke of the pen, as that sum would have paid the whole of our national debt. We would have risen in the morning free of debt by the adoption of this policy. I ask if it is yet too late for the hon. gentleman to accomplish that great boon? Will the hon. gentleman not come and save us in this, what he calls, the dire hour of our distress, and by a mere stroke of the pen, a mere act of the government, add $37,000,000 to the value of our horses alone, and wipe out the national debt, so that we will be happy ever afterwards? Then the hon. gentleman tells us that we have also an adverse balance of trade of $300,000,000. Why, the absurdities that are perpetrated in this House by some hon. gentlemen are past belief. Does any one imagine that if we had an adverse balance of trade of $300,000,000 our stocks would be quoted in the London market at the highest value of all colonial stocks? Does any one imagine that if we had an adverse balance of trade of $300,000,000, there would have been offered for our last loan $300 for every $100 we wanted? That statement is on a par with another remark made by the hon. member for South Oxford when the Finance Minister drew attention to our largely increasing exports. "Surely you do not consider $4,000,000 worth of bullion a very desirable or very valuable asset." I think that when bank after bank in the United States was tottering, when 598 monetary institutions suspended, with liabilities of $170,295,000, when men, apparently in the most solvent condition were at once reduced to poverty, we in Canada were able to come to their aid with $4,000,000 of gold, we may all rest assured that if our banks favoured the United States financial institutions with that sum in their dire hour of need, our banks got a fair return for every dollar they advanced, and no asset was more productive at that time than the $4,000,000 sent over to our neighbours. I may be asked, What are your views as to the tariff itself? It may be said, You have told us you consider it inadvisable for us to attempt a system of free trade, which however suitable to England is unsuitable to Canada; what, however, are your views with respect to the tariff which is now before the House? I have no hesitation in stating my views. I recollect about a year ago an hon. gentleman ruled me out of the party in his newspaper for ten days for daring to express the views that I thought the tariff needed reform. Luckily some leading members of the Government expressed similar views, and I was released from duress vile, and once more admitted to the company of the faithful, for which I felt duly thankful. It appears to me that the one great fault in the tariff is apparently the non-fixity of its character. I think above all things it is important that changes made in our fiscal system must be gradual, and I feel, rightly or wrongly, that the opinion has gone abroad that this tariff is not a tariff to remain in force for the next fifteen or twenty years, but is a tariff which almost one-half of the members of this House are trying their best to change, alter or modify. So long as this feeling exists, it will be a very difficult matter to induce capitalists to come to our aid, to help in developing our resources. The reductions proposed I am unable to speak of, as I have not had time to reduce the ad valorem to specific duties, and calculate the effect. It is unfortunate for the Government that at such a time as this the change has to be made from ad valorem to specific duties, for when goods are so low in price, the duties according to their value must be correspondingly low. And there is accordingly for the time being, only temporarily, I hope, a stronger strain put upon our manufacturer, and he has not the same protection which otherwise I should like to see him have. If I might say a word for Ontario—although I do not wish to speak from a sectional point of view, and have always taken the ground that we must look at the Dominion as a whole—I should like to see some considerable modifications in the duty upon bituminous coal. I think that we have in Ontario a pretty heavy burden to meet in this respect, inasmuch as out of the $961,893 duty paid on bituminous coal that we import into Canada, we have no less a sum to pay in Ontario in the shape of duty, than $901,966. I think that considering the difficulties under which our manufacturers now labour, considering also the changes that have taken place with reference to the raw material, considering that their protection has been reduced, while perhaps no corresponding reduction has been made in the raw material; it would be well worthy the consideration of the Government to consider fully if some material change cannot be made in the duty on this article. I cannot by any means call the tariff perfect as a whole, but the principle which underlies it is one which commends itself to me and therefore I have no hesitation whatever in giving my vote in favour of the tariff, as opposed to the principle of absolute free trade announced in the amendment of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). I feel this: That lower priced labour could compete with our labour, whether that lower priced labour is in the form of imported goods or imported Chinamen. My desire has been to see grow up in this country a race of workmen worthy of the position of freemen. We are at present trying in this country, the experiment, whether under God's favour, with the blessings of religion and education and free government and unbounded resources, we can have a country where every man will be born to the possibility that he can rise to a life of culture, and not be condemned from his birth to a life of unending, mechanical toil or hopeless drudgery for the mere comforts and necessities of existence. That is the prayer of our party. That is the reason why we desire to give such full protection to labour. That is the reason why we desire to see, if possible, this country a cheap country to live in and a country in which every man will find sufficient for the comforts and culture of life. I hope that our friends of the Liberal party may take a broader and more patriotic view of the situation and join hands in securing such comforts as the necessities of modern civilization demand for our workingmen.

Mr. CHRISTIE. Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to occupy the House at any great length as this question has been very fully discussed, and I have no wish to prolong the debate. I simply desire to say a word, merely to show where I stand with reference to this matter. It gives me pleasure to see that the policy of tariff reform so long advocated by Liberals on this side of the House is now beginning to bear fruit. Wherever we look, from one end of the Dominion to the other, we see a strong public sentiment growing up in favour of tariff reform; the people are revolting against the class legislation under the National Policy, notably among the Patrons of Industry, and even in this House. I believe that the action taken by the hon. Minister of Finance is a complete justification of the contention of the Liberal party. It does look as if the Finance Minister has taken a new departure and as if he had taken a first step in the direction of reform. It is true the step is very short, but even these trivial reductions of duty which have been made would have been a benefit had they not been coupled with corresponding increases, so that the net results of all these increases and decreases will, I fear, be to leave the country a little more heavily burdened, or in about the same position as before. We find by looking at the press that even merchants are amazed to find that they have to pay more duty on their goods under the new tariff than under the old. Taking the whole tariff I feel confident that it will be woe-fully disappointing to the great mass of consumers, and especially to the farmers who have been looking for relief and looking for a substantial reduction in the duties all along the line. What the farmers have asked for again and again, is that the prime necessities of life, articles which are essential to their comfort and to the carrying on of their operations, should be placed upon the free list, and everything else reduced to a fair revenue tariff. Articles such as coal oil, corn, cordage, binder twine, books, agricultural implements and things of that kind should be free. It appears to me perfectly monstrous that an article so indispensable as coal oil should be taxed 80 or 100 per cent. I see by the Montreal 'Star' that the tax on coal oil is even 200 per cent. Be that as it may, the 'Star' denounces the tariff on account of the excessively high duty on coal oil and books. It is quite evident that this proposed tariff has not been framed in the interest of the farmers and consumers, but in the interest of the protected classes. In no sense can it be considered to be a poor man's tariff, because it taxes the poor man's bread, his clothing, his light, and his books and nearly everything else he requires. I believe that it is perfectly futile to cover the defects and deformities of this tariff by blowing the trumpet of the National Policy. The people know by experience that the National Policy has signally failed to bring them that wealth and prosperity which was promised for it. They know that it has not been a blessing, but a curse to the country. They know that the country was never more depressed than it is to-day, notwithstanding all that has been said to the contrary. Now, I do not say that the National Policy is wholly responsible for the depression and hard times or for all the evils from which the country is suffering, but I do say that it has largely contributed to that depression, it has contributed to the depression of property. It has reduced the prices of some articles of farm produce, it has increased the exodus of our people, and has built up and fostered many combines and monopolies which have preyed upon our people to the full extent, or nearly the full extent, of our protective duty. I cannot state the exact amount taken from the pockets of the people in this way, some high authorities say $20,000,000 annually. Now the remedy proposed by the hon. Finance Minister appears to me to be quite inadequate—cutting off a de-cayed and mouldering branch here and another there. We all know that the whole tree is corrupt, and a corrupt tree cannot bring forth good fruit. The principle of the National Policy is vicious, morally wrong, and what is morally wrong can never be made right by any amount of pruning and trimming. The only remedy is free trade—as near to free trade as the requirements of our revenue will permit. We know that when we had free trade with the United States, even in natural products, our country prospered, our trade with the United States increased with a bound of ten millions in one year, and during the short period the treaty was in force our trade was trebled or quadrupled in volume. We know, notwithstanding what has been said this afternoon, that Great Britain, before she adopted the policy of free trade, was in a most deplorable condition, but that when she adopted that policy her trade took a great bound. Great Britain took a bound of prosperity, and has continued to flourish ever since, as she never did under protection, and as none of the surrounding nations of Europe has prospered, and has been able to compete in the markets of the world against her rivals from all quarters. Now, we should follow the good example set by the mother country. But that is not sufficient. We should also adopt a policy of economy and retrenchment. It is vain to hope for prosperity as long as we spend $37,000,000 or $38,000,000 annually, and so long as we go on rolling up the Dominion debt at railway speed, as we have been doing during the past few years. Since the time of the Mackenzie administration the public debt has been increased upwards of one hundred million of dollars. This course, if continued, must involve disaster. We should cut down our expenditure to the very lowest point compatible with the efficient carrying on of public works. I do not mean that this should be stinted in any way or that necessary expenditure should be cut down, but that we should only spend what is really necessary. In that way I think we could save millions of dollars annually without any detriment to the efficiency of the public service. If that were done, we might expect to enter upon a period of prosperity and wealth, such as we have not had since the National Policy was adopted.

Mr. NORTHRUP. At this stage of the debate, it might well be thought that nothing any member can possibly contribute will be interesting, instructive or profitable, or in any way contribute to a settlement of the vexed questions now before this House. But, Sir, as the debate has progressed, as day has succeeded day and speech has followed speech, it has become more and more apparent that hon. gentlemen opposite are either entirely ignorant of, or wilfully misrepresent, the principles upon which the National Policy is founded. They either ignore or misrepresent the aims, the objects, and the achievements of that policy, and also the lessons which are written, that all men may read, on the pages of the history of every civilized country with regard to the results of protection. It might seem strange that, after this subject has been before the country for so many years, hon. gentlemen opposite would misunderstand or misrepresent—I hope not the latter—the very end of this National Policy. We have heard again and again the terms “National Policy” and “protection” used as if they were synonymous, and therefore convertible terms. We know perfectly well that the would-be astronomer might as well speak of the solar system as composed of this world and the sun, or the would-be historian of the endless reiterations and maledictions and never-to-be-fulfilled prophecies of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) as voicing the sentiments of the people, as for a political economist to speak of the National Policy and protection as being one and the same thing. The principle underlying the National Policy is that properly expressed by the first word of the term, for it is indeed and in truth a national policy. And the sooner hon. gentlemen opposite understand that gentlemen on this side are not wedded to this or that tariff because it is presented to the House by a Conservative Government—the sooner they understand that we are not wedded to any one tariff, but believe that the rose, by any other name, will smell as sweet, the sooner they recognize that we are attached to the National Policy because we understand—as we hope the country will understand—that underlying this policy are great national principles, on which alone the future prosperity and success of the country can be assured—the sooner they recognize these facts, the better it will be for hon. gentlemen opposite. Now, we have heard statements made again and again on the floor of this House, which hon. gentlemen on this side find it hard to believe are made in good faith. We have heard it said, for example, with regard to this question, that a Canadian is as good as any other man, that he can hold his own in competition with the people on the other side of the border or on the other side of the great waters. Of course he can. Nobody recognizes that more fully than we on this side. But because a Canadian can hold his own against one man or two or even three men, it does not follow that, unarmed and unprotected, he can hold his own against the protected, well armed forces of the United States or Great Britain. Why, hon. gentlemen opposite speak of this subject of protection as if there was but one possible protection known to legislatures—that protection afforded by customs tariff. Now, if the truth were known, I venture to say that it would be found that every hon. gentleman opposite is, in truth and deed, as much a protectionist as any hon. gentleman on this side, the only difference being that they do not know the fact, and we do. They point to the mother land as an illustration of all that is glorious and beneficent in the way of free trade. Surely there is no hon. gentleman, representing any constituency in this country, who does not know perfectly well that the manufactures of the mother land are to-day protected just as much—aye, in many respects, more than the manufactures of Canada.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Hear, hear.

Mr. NORTHROP. These gentlemen smile derisively, but it can be practically proved that the manufactures of the mother country are protected in many respects even more than those of Canada. It is because hon. gentlemen opposite allow the notion to fill their minds that the only possible protection to be had is that arising from a customs tariff, that they have been misled. Let us consider the diverse ways in which protection may be given, so that we may see how it has worked in England in past years. Hon. gentlemen fully recognize that a customs tariff may be an effectual means of protection. But there are other means equally effective—means which are available in the mother land, but of which we are unfortunately deprived of in this country. Take, for example, the question of interest on capital. We all know that the rate of interest in the mother land is very much lower than here—from 1½ to 3 per cent there, while here 6 per cent and 7 per cent is paid. In this one item it will be seen that a man, seeking to establish a factory in this country is handicapped at the very outset, as compared with his competitor in the old country, by the difference of interest between 3 per cent and 7 per cent. There are many other ways in which the manufacturers of the old country enjoy a protection which is lacking to us in this country, and it is because the manufacturers of the old country are so protected to-day, and because the manufactures of all other countries are protected, that we here seek to establish a principle, not novel or original by any means, but a principle which is in force at present all over the civilized world, with one single apparent exception, so far as its customs tariff is concerned, and that exception is the mother land. England attained her commercial supremacy under a policy of protection far and beyond anything dreamed of in this country, and only abandoned that policy, in the matter of customs, when the circumstances showed that she enjoyed ample protection in other ways, and could afford to offer to other countries—because her supremacy did not require the protection of a customs tariff—that illusory advantage of free trade, in the hope that they—thinking perhaps that protection depended alone on a customs tariff—would accept the invitation and reciprocate in like manner. Let me take one single industry as an illustration, to avoid indulging in generalities. Let me take the woollen industry, respecting which we hear a great deal in this country. I think I can convince this House that the woollen manufacturers of the mother land are protected to as high a degree as those of Canada under the tariff now before the House. We know that the first step to be taken by any one wishing to engage in the business of manufacturing is to obtain the money to start his business. If he is a resident of the old country, he can obtain this capital at rates of interest varying from $1\frac{1}{2}$ to 3 per cent, whereas in this country he has to pay 6 or 7 per cent. A careful estimate of the cost of building, machinery fittings, and steam and water piping, shows that a mill costing in England \$100,000 will cost in Canada \$160,000. Here we have at once a vast difference in the interest payable by the manufacturer in this country and that payable by his competitor in the old country, and also a considerable difference in cost, operating as a protection to the English manufacturer. We have there a difference in the first cost of the mill and a large difference in the amount of interest, which must be made good to the Canadian manufacturer, if he is to have the advantage, which hon. gentlemen desire he should enjoy, of meeting on fair and equal ground his rival in the mother land. Having obtained his money, and built his mill, and equipped it, he has to purchase his supplies, such as dyes, oils, fittings, soap, &c., and these will cost fully 25 per cent more in Canada than in England. Then he has to lay in his store of fuel and light. We all know that the cost of fuel is 50 per cent less in England than here, while, owing to a milder climate, about 20 per cent less is required. We have in Canada a winter, which happily they know nothing of in the mother land, and therefore the expense in this country is increased by the climatic disadvantage of the severity of our winters. Then when we come to the question of labour, wages are fully 40 to 60 per cent—some say 70 per cent—higher in Canada than in England, with a greater difference as compared with Germany, France, &c., owing to the longer hours of labour in these countries. There again is another instance in which protection is incidentally given by the circumstances and the position of manufacturers in the mother land, which is not enjoyed by ours. Then there is the wear and tear and depreciation of plant, which every manufacturer must take cognizance of. That is estimated at 5 per cent per annum, and as a mill costing \$100,000 in England would cost \$160,000 here, we have again a considerable discrepancy in the cost of wear and tear in favour of the English manufacturer. Then a large amount of the raw material necessary to carry on his business is close at hand to the English mill-owner. He can order his supplies in the morning and have them at his mill by night, while our mill-owners, being distant from their supplies, are obliged to carry much larger stocks, which means a further considerable outlay in interest. There again we have an item in which incidental protection is given to the manufacture in the mother land. Then the custom, I believe, in the woollen trade is to sell on eight months' time, so that here again we have a loss in interest to the manufacturer in this country much greater than is suffered by his rival in the mother land. Then, too, there are the freight charges, which are higher here than in England. So I might go through item after item of cost imposed on the manufacturer in this country from which the English manufacturer is either free, or which is much less expensive than it is in Canada. It may be said that our raw materials are allowed in free, but unfortunately, in many respects that free admission is merely theoretical. I have here a list of various items used by woollen manufacturers, and necessary for the production of their goods, on which a duty is imposed. In that respect again there is a protection in favour of the manufacturer in the old country. I have a list here, two pages long, but will not worry the House with reading it. Under the head of acids, belting, dyes and chemicals, oils, and many other articles, there are some fifty items on which the manufacturer of woollen goods in this country is compelled to pay duty. I think, therefore, that while a Canadian is the equal of any other man, if he meets him in a fair field and no favour, I have also shown that if our tariff were reduced, as required by the amendment of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), if no protection of any kind were to be given our manufacturers, they would be of all men most miserable, because of all in the civilized world, they alone would be unprotected. But we often hear it said that the duties imposed in favour of manufacturers operate against the farming interest. Such an opinion could only be entertained by one who had taken a careless glance at the subject. Sir, all our various industries in this country are so interwoven and entwined with one another that it is impossible to strike one without wounding all. It is unnecessary here to keep the time of the House, but I would give one remarkable example. I am sure that the hon. gentleman must be aware and must admit that where a large manufactory is established—say a cotton mill or a woollen mill or any other large manufacturing establishment—the inevitable result is to supply a home market for the farmers of that vicinity, to increase the prices obtained by the farmers for their products, and, consequently, to increase the value of their lands. Hon. gentlemen opposite are very fond of bewailing, not only in this House, but throughout the country, the woes of the unfortunate individual whom they describe as the consumer. It is very easy to conjure with words; it is a very simple matter to take a term which has an ordinary acceptation and apply it in a way never intended, and not usually understood, and reach results, by arguments absolutely logical, which could not be reached if the word were used with its ordinary meaning. Who is the consumer, Sir? I venture to say, taking the term "consumer" in the only sense which can be attached to it as used by gentlemen opposite, there is no such man in Canada, nor can any such be found in any civilized land. And if it be possible to find such a man, then the sooner he is got rid of the better. Let us consider who this consumer is and try to ascertain his nature and character. As the term is used by hon. gentlemen opposite, the consumer is one supposed to be always desiring to buy, but never having anything to sell; always looking for bargains and desirous that bargains should be floating about on every hand, for he is never going to part with anything and is always going to acquire something. He is not a producer and has no interest in any process of production. He is not a man even living on invested capital, because even had he inherited his wealth it must be disposed of in some form of investment, and in whatever form it might be invested, he must from the nature of those investments be desirous of large prices for some articles upon the sale of which the security of his capital and the payment of his dividends depend. He is looking for bargains in every line and on every hand. Sir, what possible state of affairs would suit the desires of this so-called consumer? Would it not be a state of national bankruptcy in which every man was desirous of selling, because he had to sell, in which every man who had goods was desirous of converting them into cash, because he simply must have the cash. When trade was paralyzed, manufacturing at a standstill, agriculture in a state of ruin, no reward to be gained by labour, this consumer would be in the height of paradise, because bargains in every line would be within his grasp. Is it worth the attention of this House or the time and effort of the people to legislate in the interests of such a class, if there be such a class? I think, on the contrary, it will be found that every man in the country, no matter what his calling may be, is interested in the success of this country, in the prosperity of every branch of industry in this country, whether the manufacturing, the agricultural, the commercial, or the professional branches. But, Sir, they tell us also, that this consumer of whom we have heard so much should have the right to buy in the cheapest market and sell in the dearest—and probably there is no phrase that falls more glibly from the lips of hon. gentlemen, no sentiment more welcome to their hearts than this, of buying in the cheapest market and selling in the dearest. Now, if the House will pardon me for a moment, I will ask their indulgence while we consider the meaning of these terms—buying in the cheapest market and selling in the dearest.

Mr. NORTHROP.

In the first place, I think it must be recognized that, as the phrase is put, it is considered of equal importance whether a man buys or sells—in the eyes of these hon. gentlemen the buyer and seller stand on the same plane. But is it not manifest that the buyer is a man who can buy when he will, while the seller, from force of circumstances, is often compelled to sell whether he will or not? With the buyer action is voluntary; if he cannot get what he wants in one place he can get it in another; if he cannot get what he wants now he can await the better opportunity. But the seller, as a rule, must take what he can get for his goods. It seems to me that if we were to apply the rule to the case of any business man, we would see the fallacy of this maxim about always being able to buy in the cheapest market and sell in the dearest. Take, for example, a business man in any line, I care not what. He has in his possession an output which he can dispose of upon certain terms in the home market. But the opportunity is offered to him to sell abroad at a far higher figure than he can obtain in the home market. And so he sells his output to a foreign purchaser. He has done a thing which gentlemen opposite consider it desirable to do, having sold in the dearest market. But, with his next season's output, he comes back to his home market and finds it in the possession of his rivals. His former customers, not being able to buy from him have been obliged to buy elsewhere. So far as he is concerned the market upon which he had depended for his business is a thing of the past. Though, in the single transaction abroad he made money, yet, looking at it as a business transaction it is found to be most unfortunate. And the same rule that applies to individuals will apply to nations. The great thing is not to make money in one transaction, but to have such a current of trade flowing from those of every occupation throughout the country that for every man there shall be steady employment and an honest day's wage for an honest day's toil. And I venture to say that if the effect of buying in the cheapest market and selling in the dearest is to deprive home labour of due compensation for its exertion, it will be found by the nation that the cheapest market is in the end, the dearest that can possibly be found. It is assumed as an element of the policy supported by hon. gentlemen opposite that the labourer in any line is dependent only on the business carried on by that particular line, and thus they fail to give weight to the fact, which I have already pointed out, that every line of business and industry is so interwoven with the others that you cannot possibly strike one without wounding all. We have illustrations in the histories of other lands that show that the duty devolving upon politicians with regard to the tariff is the same as that devolving upon the business man with regard to his business—that is so to regulate the tariff or the business that those interested may have steady occupation from the beginning to the end of the year. And, though it may happen that goods can be produced at a cheaper rate elsewhere than they can be produced here, it does not necessarily follow that it is in the interest of our people to prefer the goods of a foreign land to the neglect of those produced at greater expense here. We have a striking example of that in the case of Denmark. The skill of the Danish people in the production of woven goods is well known and they trust to that skill for the supply of their own wants, though they could purchase the goods cheaper from British looms. But they know that they have their long Danish winters in which they have no other means of occupying the time and they spend what would otherwise be idle time in the manufacture of these knitted and woven goods, thus maintaining an industry in the country, and furnishing employment and wages for their labour instead of sending their money to a foreign land. If hon. gentlemen will consider for a moment whether it is better to purchase in Canada or in some foreign country, it seems to me that the point is so clear that only one conclusion is possible. If we desire to buy our manufactured goods abroad, we must send abroad our products, mining, manufacturing, or agricultural. Take, for instance, agricultural products. A man desires to buy a certain amount of goods manufactured abroad. To do so he must send out his agricultural products. These are bulky and the cost of transportation is great, and the unfortunate Canadian must pay the cost of transportation to the British manufacturers. Would it not be better, instead of sending these agricultural products out of the country, paying freight and exchanging them for manufactured goods in the manufacture of which British artisans had been maintained and through them the multitude of local tradesmen, manufacturers and farmers, to the benefit of that country—would it not be better, I say, for our people to manufacture at home, consume their agricultural products at home by distribution among those engaged in manufactures here and spend the money among themselves instead of sending it to be expended in another country? Although it might seem at first glance that these principles were so clear that no man for a moment would question them, hon. gentlemen opposite have called them in question. They seem to have set up a standard of their own—I venture to say, a standard of their own, because there is no civilized country in the world whose whole fiscal system is not founded on protection. I do not intend to occupy the time of this House with discussing the particular system that has been referred to. We are aware that in Great Britain, for centuries and centuries, a system of protection was maintained such as has never been seen in any other land; and it was only when, through the effects of this system of protection, it became necessary for the British people to obtain free agricultural products for the artisan and mechanics in their mills, when they had attained the supremacy of the manufacturing world, that they threw down the barriers, knowing well that they could hold their own against all competition. But I would like to call the attention of the House to this fact, that in the very country which is referred to as the free trade country, the very country in which Parliament admitted the products of the soil free in order to furnish food to their working classes, still, if one will look beneath the surface of that measure, it will be evident that it was just as much a protective measure as any protective measure we have on the Statute-book of this country. The circumstances of the two countries are entirely diverse. The duty placed on breadstuffs in this country, is a protective duty, but in the old country, where they cannot raise sufficient breadstuffs to feed their artisans, it was just as much a protection there to the manufacturers to put their breadstuffs on the free list, as it is in this country, owing to its entirely opposite conditions, to put a duty on these same breadstuffs. Perhaps, it would not be out of place to take a cursory glance at the several countries of Europe, because hon. gentlemen opposite taunt us in this House with having discovered an original idea. They say: Your idea, even if it seems at first sight to be plausible is one that has been tried and found wanting, and repudiated, in every civilized country on the face of the earth. If we look to the country which is so dear to many hon. gentlemen opposite, if we look to old France, we find there a protectionist country. They have tried both systems. In the old days of Louis XIV. they tried the protectionist policy, and it worked well, but after a short time the teachings of Adam Smith began to penetrate into France, and that country resolved to try what was an approximation to free trade. But it did not work well and they returned to the old policy. We know, too, that under the last empire of Napoleon III., there was nothing which contributed more to render his return to Paris impossible after the battle of Sedan, than the commercial difficulties which had arisen in consequence of the concessions he had made to England by the free trade tariff—so called between France and Great Britain. We know also, that, when the empire became a thing of the past, and when the republic entered upon the stage and the people of France were burdened with the most prodigious debt that had ever cursed any land, when even their best friends supposed that she could never recover herself, that she could never again be prosperous under such a load, still we remember how France, with that chivalry which is characteristic of the race, went to work, paid off the debt year by year, by at once adopting a protective policy, which they have continued up to the present day. If we look to the great empire alongside France, if we look to Prussia, as far back as the days of the great Frederick, we learn that he was a protectionist—as his great biographer, Carlisle, said, no man was ever less of a free trader than Frederick—he instituted a system of protection which continued for a time, and the country prospered. Even under the great Napoleonic wars, which devastated large portions of the kingdom, still, from the very fact that British goods were kept out, manufactures flourished in the Kingdom of Prussia, and the country prospered. After a while the people were inclined to throw down the barrier, and they gave free trade a trial. But with what result? With the result that in 1819 the king appointed a commission to investigate the causes of the depression that existed in the Kingdom of Prussia, and they reported in favour of an immediate return to a protective tariff, which was at once done. It is well known that a moderate protective tariff was the cause that led to the adoption of the Zollverein, under which the country prospered so much, the objects of which were defined to be :

A prudent and well constructed tariff of duties to protect and encourage German manufactures, to exclude by duties the foreign producer from the German market, and to extend the importation of the products of their industry to foreign markets.

But, Sir, they fell from grace. In 1864, following the example set by France, which had lately made a commercial treaty with Great Britain, they proceeded to readjust the duties in Prussia, with the inevitable result that for fifteen years, from 1864 to 1879, the manufacturers of that country were depressed and almost starved out. Then again the Government inquired into the subject, with the unfailing result that they once more adopted a protective tariff under which Prussia has prospered from that time till to-day. Then, in the Empire of Russia, if we go away back to the years prior to the wars of Napoleon, we find that country was under a protective tariff, and during those wars, when British goods were prohibited from entering into Russia, the country was able to undergo the great strain to which it was subjected. But after the close of the war they again abandoned the principle of protection and fell into the ways of free trade, with the inevitable result that, owing to the failure of the system, protection was again restored in 1822. So high was their protective tariff that they were obliged to modify it somewhat, and in 1869 they reduced their duties to 35 per cent all round. I might also mention that Sweden and Denmark are protectionist countries. Now, let us look to the great republic to the south of us. Hon. gentlemen taunted us at the beginning of this debate, that we were forgetting the teachings of the mother land and were now adopting those of the republic at the south of us. Well, I think I have shown that the great republic can hardly claim to be the teacher of the world with respect to protectionist doctrines. But there is generally a germ of truth in almost any reiterated statement, and there was a germ of truth in that statement, in this sense, that after they were first introduced, for fifty years the United States enjoyed the benefits of protective duties, and I fancy in that respect we in Canada will be found ready and willing to follow their example. I do not refer to either the Republican policy or to the Democratic policy, but to the National Policy, which was maintained in that country for generations. As early as their very first Congress, the second Bill assented to by General Washington contained this preamble :

It was necessary, for the support of the Government, for the discharge of the debt of the United States, and the encouragement and protection of manufactures, that duties should be laid.

And so satisfactory was the result, that the duties were increased from time to time—in 1790, and after the war, in 1814 and 1816. In 1824 there was a strong protective tariff. So satisfactory was that tariff that the duties were raised again in 1828, and in 1831 speakers throughout that country pointed to the fact, that there never had been such years of plenty and prosperity in the United States as since the adoption of their most highly protective tariff of 1824. But people are inclined to be restless, and the unfortunate divisions between the north and south arose. Concessions were made, not by any means free trade or a revenue tariff, but still a somewhat less protective tariff was adopted in 1833. The country soon found that its industries began to languish, and in 1842 they again returned to a higher protection. In only two instances, in 1846 and 1857, has the principle of free trade been adopted by the United States, and even then only imperfectly. Now, Sir, it is a singular fact that, if we examine the history of the United States, as hon. gentlemen opposite are constantly asking us to do, if we examine the history of the American republics on this continent, we find but one country, not only on this continent, but throughout the civilized world, which has placed in its constitution a provision that a custom duty shall not be levied for the purpose of protecting the trade and manufactures of the country; and it was most fitting that the only country permitted by Heaven to adopt such a clause in its constitution, the only country that recognized such a principle, which means the destruction of the manufactures of the country, which means the impoverishing of the agricultural class, which means the degradation of the labour of the country—I say it was most fitting that such a clause should be found in the constitution of the Slave States on the other side of the line. Article 1 of section 8 of their constitution stated :

Nor shall any duties or taxes, on importations from foreign nations, be laid to promote or foster any branch of industry.

But, Sir, not only in Europe and on this continent, do we find the protectionist principle everywhere in vogue, but, if we turn our eyes to the southern seas, to the Australian colonies, with whom we are endeavouring to work up a system of reciprocal trade, we find the same lesson taught by their commercial history. It is only a short time ago that the Australian colonies were pointed to with pride by free trade writers as presenting an embodiment of free trade principles. An attempt was made to induce those English colonies to accept, loyally, free trade principles. But it was found, in course of time, that one little colony, only one, was sufficiently enterprising, and sufficiently sagacious to cast aside those free trade principles and adopt the principle of protection. And what were the results? Victoria, among all the Australian provinces, has large manufactures within itself. And not only have its manufactories prospered, but, as you all know, to-day all the other colonies of Australia, without exception, now turn their eyes or have already turned their eyes to the adoption of the protective principle and protective duties, simply because they find it impossible for the manufacturer and the farmer to live in face of the competition of Victoria. No less a free trade writer than Sir Charles Dilke, in his "Problems of Greater Britain," speaking on this subject, says:

The view taken in Australia generally of the proceedings at this Victorian election of 1889, is that intercolonial free trade would now indeed suit the Victorians, who by protection have placed their own manufactures in a flourishing condition. Intercolonial free trade would mean that Victorian soap, candles, rope, biscuits, and other articles, would obtain an excellent market.

Later on—and this is the opinion of a free trader and not of a protectionist—Sir Charles admits he is a free trader, but frankly acknowledges the fact. He says:

It cannot, on the other hand, I think, be denied that the effect of the Victorian protective system has been to enable the colony to supply its wants with a better class of Victorian goods. Only a few years ago, while the local manufacturers made all the kitchen and cottage furniture, the furniture of the wealthy was imported. Now the local manufacturers are beginning to hold their own in a better class of goods, in all cases where the goods are of a kind for which there can be obtained a reasonably large colonial sale. Victoria appears to be doing an increasing trade with South Australia, and in the latter colony the protectionist agitation is not an agitation against the cheap labour of Europe, but an agitation for protection against protectionist Victoria.

And so we find that precisely the experience this country had between 1873 and 1878 has been the history of our neighbours under the southern cross. We found then that the high protection enjoyed by the United States on our borders resulted in the American manufacturers flooding our markets with their goods, and the various colonies in Australia have found that one single protectionist colony was able to drive from the market all other manufacturers, and that by the competition of that protective colony they have all been driven, perforce, to adopt the doctrine of protection. It is not my intention longer to occupy the time of the House, but I desire to call the attention of the hon. gentlemen opposite to one question, not being an original idea on my part, a question to which their attention has been frequently called before, but the force of which has not been so keenly appreciated as to prevent hon. members again reminding them of a duty that devolves on them, as well as on members on this side of the House. The keynote to what I would say to hon. gentlemen opposite will be found in the word with which I started my remarks, the first word of the phrase, National Policy—National—and that this is truly a National Policy, and, while I am sure we on this side of the House are quite willing to admit that differences of opinion, temperament, education, and environment, will naturally lead men to take different views of the same subject, I am sure I have the right to appeal to hon. gentlemen and to trust that they, as well as we, believe in maintaining a truly National Policy, whatever meaning may be attached to the word National, as regards the customs tariff, and that when the tariff which is now before the House comes to be considered in committee, when the various items are discussed, they will rise above provincialism, which has, in many quarters, been the curse of this country. I ask hon. gentlemen opposite to join with us on this side of the House in remembering that we are legislating for a great Dominion, a Dominion whose possibilities are beyond belief, and I ask them to join with us, whatever their views may be on the different items of the tariff, in testing those views by what I believe to be the crucial test, the infallible touchstone, whether or not this idea or that idea will promote and maintain the development of this national idea. I believe if hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House will come to the consideration of this tariff with that idea uppermost in their minds, regardless of sectional, racial, or provincial views, determined to do their duty as representatives in this great conference of the nation, determined to govern the country, not as Nova Scotians, Quebecers, or as Ontario men, or as inhabitants specially of any other province, I have sufficient confidence in the people of this country, in the honesty, integrity, and ability of the members of this House, to believe that when this tariff passes into law, as in one shape or another, it must pass into law soon, it will prove to be one worthy of the representatives of a great country, worthy of a people who recognize the fact that there is a glorious future before them, and are prepared, even if sometimes it may be by sacrifice, to work out the future destined for them.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE TARIFF.

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. Speaker, in resuming the discussion on the question of the tariff, I propose in the first place to consider, but very briefly indeed, the financial position of the country. This is the proper occasion for this House to deal with the question of the finances of Canada, and while I do not at all despair of the future of our country, and while I do not at all desire to speak in any but the most hopeful strain of our possibilities; yet, Sir, I would but ill discharge the duty which I think I owe as a representative of the people if I did not raise my voice and draw attention to what I consider to be our somewhat unfortunate financial standing at this moment. We have, Sir, I think, reached a position where the tax production has perhaps come to an end. I think it will puzzle the Minister of Finance who has charge of our finances to devise any further scheme by which he can raise from the people of this country any further sum than has been extracted from them under the present existing tariff. I do not think I misinterpret the language of the Finance Minister—at all events, I express my own conviction—when I say that it appears to me that we are approaching an era of deficits. I shall be very much astonished indeed if the end of this financial year does not find the balance on the wrong side of the ledger, while for the year to come I do not think that matters are very much calculated to improve. Now, Sir, we have heard over and over again what the total debt, known as the net debt, of this Dominion is, and every person who takes any interest in the position of this country is perfectly familiar with what our per capita debt is. It is undoubtedly an enormously large debt. It has increased in a ratio which, when we look back upon it, ought to be, and I think is, alarming to every well-wisher of his country. I do not desire at the moment at all to question whether the creation of that debt has been wise or foolish; I am dealing now simply with the hard facts of the case. Our debt at confederation was $75,000,000; ten years afterwards it had increased $33,000,000; at the end of the next decade that had swollen to $227,000,000, and now, as we know, it has reached to nearly $242,000,000. Our net taxes have increased from $11,000,000 at the time of confederation, to $17,000,000 at the expiration of the first ten years; that became $27,000,000 in 1887, and it has reached the figure of $29,000,000 odd in 1893. Our per capita debt has increased in the like ratio. But with these figures we are all familiar, and perhaps their full meaning does not strike us. I must confess that I am not able to realize the full meaning of the figures by simply stating that the net debt of Canada is so many hundred millions, or the per capita debt so much; but I think I have been able in some measure to realize our position when I compare our debt, not merely with that of the great nation to the south of us, with which the comparison is so frequently made, but with the debt of the mother country, which we know is enormous—a debt incurred for carrying on wars which were probably necessary. When I compare the debt of Great Britain with the debt of Canada—and we have had no wars or anything to occasion an enormous increase in our public debt—I am astounded to find that the annual charge for the debt of Great Britain is only 31 per cent of its revenue, while the debt of Canada absorbs no less than 41 per cent of its revenue. Now, that is not an unfair comparison. It has been stated over and over again by hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House—Sir Alexander Gait long, long ago made the declaration—that the prosperity of Canada depended upon its being a country comparatively free from debt; yet we find that what are called our fixed charges, over which we have no control—irrespective of our subsidies to the provinces or the obligations we have undertaken with respect to our railways—consume $41 out of every $100 which the people of this country pay into the revenue, and in that I am not including the income derived from our post office service or other sources, for which compensation is given, but I am dealing simply with the income derived from our customs and excise taxation. Those fixed charges are, of course, made up, not only of interest on debt, but of that portion which we have to apply under our arrangement in connection with the sinking fund—$41 in Canada, $31 in Great Britain. When we look to the other side of the line, what do we find? We find that the debt there is practically wiped out. The debt of the United States is now only $12 and a trifle per capita, and that debt does not require more of the revenue of the country than 7 per cent, while the debt of Canada requires 41 per cent. Now, Sir, in relation to that debt we have had very great advantages—advantages for which neither party have any particular right to claim credit. Our interest charges for 1868 were 4.51 per cent; in 1877 they had fallen to 3.47 per cent, and in 1892 to 2.88 per cent. So that there has been a reduction in the interest charges on our debt of about 38 per cent, and, notwithstanding that reduction, we have still to bear the enormous burden of setting aside 41 per cent of our revenue to provide for our public debt. Now, credit has been taken, no doubt by both parties when in office, for the reduction of the interest charges. But every fair-minded man will, I think, admit that no party can claim any great credit for that reduction. Interest has been going down the world over, and we have had the advantage of it; but it has, I think, practically reached its lowest figure. Well, the hon. gentleman who opened this discussion has very fairly and very candidly told the House that it would need the exercise of the very greatest economy on the part of the Government to make both ends meet. Our public works, he says, are nearly all completed. But, Sir, there will always be more or less public works to be carried on in a country like this, and it will need the very greatest caution indeed, whoever is charged with the administration of our affairs, to see that our expenditure in connection with public works is not so large as to injure and endanger the financial stability of the country. I cannot help, therefore, in my opening observations drawing attention to this. It seems to me a matter of enormous consequence, that we should now realize, after all our expenditure, our present position. I doubt very much if this House or this country would have incurred the enormous debt which the building of the Canadian Pacific Railway involved, proud as we are of that great enterprise, if we had not been assured by the authorities that sufficient would be realized from the sale of our lands in the North-west to recoup the people of Canada for that expenditure. I doubt very much if it would have been wise in us to incur that expenditure if we had not also been promised, on a calculation deliberately made—accepted, at all events, on this side of the House as reliable—that our population in Manitoba and the North-west would before this period have reached the neighbourhood of 600,000 or 700,000. But we know now that, unless there is an increase of the population in that country in the near future, Canada has practically come to a standstill. Therefore it is that, in discharging what I believe to be my duty, and without any desire at all to depreciate our resources or to look at the blue side of things, I feel that we must now realize exactly what our financial standing is. But, Sir, the more important subject of discussion is of course the question of the tariff. The tariff amendments which, after a year's incubation, have at last been announced to the House and the country—which the Government frankly enough confessed that they were incompetent to devise until they had come in contact with each and every section and each and every interest in the country that was affected by the tariff—we have now before us, and we are called upon to approve or disapprove of them. Some criticism has been directed, in the course of the debate, to the gentlemen who have not agreed with the tariff changes, because they had not exactly specified in what respect they thought those changes were unwise. I think it was the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries who, in the course of his reply to my hon. friend from Prince Edward Island (Mr. Davies), said that really the wind had been taken out of the sails of those who were opposed to the tariff, by the salutary and satisfactory amendments that had been made, and that there was nothing substantial to be said against them. Well, Sir, I believe that the changes in the tariff number more than 300; I have not calculated them myself, but I understand that to be the case, and with regard to each and every one of those changes, when the resolutions are in committee, an opportunity will, of course, be afforded of criticising them in detail. At present it seems to me impossible to do more than speak, as far as we can speak, of the scheme of those amendments, and to realize so far as we can what they mean, and in that way, to determine whether we approve or disapprove of them. Now, Sir, what do these tariff amendments mean? If I have grasped their meaning at all, I would venture to say—and, in fact, it is not seriously questioned—that the tariff is still to be regarded as a tariff in the interest of the manufacturing classes. That is the keynote of the changes which have been made—that the tariff is still a protective tariff, and that those changes are in the interest, not of the great consuming masses, but of those who are recognized as the protected classes. Now, I desire to be very accurate in this statement, and, in order to show that I do not misinterpret the hon. gentleman who proposed the resolution with reference to these changes, I will read what he says on that subject :

The prime object in view has been to cheapen the cost of manufactures in this country, to cheapen the cost at which the goods issue from the factory itself.

Two ways have been adopted for cheapening the cost of goods, one by lowering the duty upon raw material, and the other by transferring raw materials from the dutiable to the free list. It has been found in the course of the work that we had pretty well exploited that division of the subject already, and that in this country almost all the great staples for manufacturing were already on the free list, in contradistinction to our neighbours to the south, where they are to-day fighting over the vexed question as to whether or not wool, a great staple for a large industry, in that country and an article of enormous consumption, shall bear a tax of 11 or 12 cents per pound or be placed on the free list.

Again he says :

The duties which have been placed on different articles have been regulated according to the vigour and development of the industry itself, according to the condition of the competition outside, according to the advantages that home production has, for various reasons, in our home market, and by reason of the methods of business in some cases as well.

It is impossible to read this language, coming from the financial authority of the Government, and to question at all that the changes have been made, deliberately and designedly made,—I will deal afterwards with whether it is the wisest amendment or not—in the interests of the manufacturing classes, and that the tariff may be well called a manufacturers' tariff, whether the Government is to be designated as a manufacturers' Government or not. And on the question of protection, the hon. the Finance Minister is equally explicit. He defines in his own way, the different methods by which a tariff can be raised and the objects of a tariff. There is, first, what he calls a purely revenue tariff. Secondly, the tariff for revenue, which affords incidental protection. And thirdly, the tariff for protection, which gives an incidental revenue. And again the Government deliberately adopted the latter of the three as the tariff which they think is best in the interests of this country. Having, therefore, justified, so far as I have gone, the statement that this tariff is a tariff from the manufacturers' point of view and in the interest of manufacturers, and not in the interest of the remaining portion of the community—be they more or be they less than the manufacturing classes—I think I may also add that the tariff has, in some respects, been amended and amended, I am bound to say, in the interests of the community at large. To a very large extent, though not altogether, the plan of specific duties has been got rid of. These duties still remain here and there. They remain where they ought to be abolished, I think, but in a number of cases the tariff has been amended by abolishing specific and substituting therefor ad valorem duties. Now, the ad valorem duty has this advantage, that we know, and the country will be able at once to know, what the tax is. A specific duty, as we have found from practical experience, years after the duty had been imposed, sometimes is a burden running up beyond a hundred per cent. I do not think the House ever realized—certainly, speaking for myself, I never realized—that we were at any time imposing a duty of anything like the figure which I have mentioned. We know, therefore, when we have an ad valorem duty of 25, or 30, or 35 per cent what that tariff is. The country will be able to appreciate it; there will be no means of hoodwinking the people as to the burden they are called upon to bear, and as to the incidence of that burden. Speaking of the tariff as a whole, I think I may characterize it as an ad valorem tariff of from 30 to 35 per cent. There are duties of less than that, indeed there may occasionally be duties of more, and the bulk of them may perhaps be more properly spoken of as duties of 30 per cent. But I think I am not stating it unfairly—and I have no desire to state it unfairly—when I say that the tariff may be characterized as one of from 30 to 35 per cent. Now, Sir, the tariff has also some other characteristics. It certainly does not discriminate in favour of Great Britain. We on this side of the House have been in the habit of boasting of our desire—and we boasted of it particularly in 1876, and up to 1879—to increase our trade with the mother country, and our desire to adjust our tariff so that we should not, at all events, discriminate in favour of the United States. But, Sir, we know from last year's discussion that when that question was brought prominently—as I venture to bring it prominently—to the attention of the House, the Ministerial spokesman justified the discrimination against Great Britain which he could not deny, by saying that it was necessary to impose the duties which were imposed upon imports from Britain in order to raise a revenue, and because the imports from Britain consisted very largely of luxuries and of articles which were used by the rich and which, therefore, formed more proper subjects of taxation. Now, I will specially draw the attention of the House to a subject which has already been referred to, the discrimination in reference to the importation of tea. We have been importing tea from another country to the extent of 7,000,000 pounds out of the 17,000,000 or 18,000,000 of pounds which we have been importing altogether. By this tariff that trade is to be destroyed so far as Great Britain is concerned—the trade is to be forced into another channel, or, if it continues in its present course, it is to bear a tax of 10 per cent. We are always complaining that the embargo on our cattle is not taken off; we are always agitating and corresponding and demanding to know why it is that the British Government have scheduled our cattle. We feel that there is no justification for it. But, Sir, at the moment when we are pressing England to remove that embargo and to give to our exporters of cattle the enormous benefit to be gained through that removal, we are proposing a tariff which is to cut off a portion of the trade which has existed between us and the mother country. And, Sir, on the other hand, the tariff does not favour any idea of reciprocity with the United States. The United States has not offered us much, it is true; they have not proposed a great deal in the Wilson Bill or in the Bill which is now before the Senate. But, whatever proposition has been made, we put a counter proposition which does not meet it and which prevents the possibility of any reciprocal relation between us and the other side. They offered us free trade in agricultural implements. That would be a great boon to the people of this country, and particularly to those of the North-west. At first, in the Wilson Bill, agricultural implements were put on the free list. In the Senate Bill—we do not know how it will emerge from the conference of the two Houses—at the instance of the agricultural implement manufacturers, it was declared that so far as Canada is concerned (for that is practically what it means) if there is to be free trade, there must be free trade either way; that is reciprocity. We answer with a 20 per cent tariff. They proposed to put wheat and flour on the free list. We answer that by leaving our tariff on these articles as it was, but we suggest that we are willing to exchange barley for corn. I am not at this moment doing more than just pointing out what I venture to think are the characteristics of the tariff. Summarizing them briefly, am I wrong in saying that, in the first place, it is a manufacturers' tariff; in the second place, it is a highly protective tariff; in the third place, it is as far as it goes a discriminating tariff against the mother country, and, in the fourth place, it holds out no hope of enlarged trade between us and the United States. These, I think, may be said to be the characteristics of the tariff. But the great question after all, Sir, is whether the foundation principle upon which this tariff is built, namely, protection, or what is called the National Policy, is to be perpetuated, or is to be changed. Now, Sir, I think we have heard the last word on the subject of the tariff from the present occupants of the Treasury benches. That we have not heard the last word from the country goes, I think, without saying. It is unfortunate, very unfortunate I think, that this question of the changes of the tariff could not have been postponed until after the next election when it would have been known what the people had determined to do. Every one will admit that nothing can be worse for business and industry than the constant changing of and tinkering with our tariff, our fiscal policy. It is inevitable now, however. But we know that, after a year's deliberation, after every care has been taken by the Ministry to ascertain the feelings of their supporters and what the country are prepared to accept, we have this tariff which I think we may know and realize as the last word from the Ministry and from the gentlemen who endorse them. Now, I desire to say that, so far as that matter is concerned, I take issue with the Government on this question of the tariff and upon the policy that underlies the changes that have been proposed. We have had fifteen years' experience of the protective policy. We have had the benefit of the knowledge of the condition of affairs which the census has given us, and we ought now to be prepared, if we are ever to be prepared, to determine whether this scheme of protection for Canada is in the best interests of the country or whether the policy of free trade—or freer trade to say at least of it—would not be wiser in the interests of this Dominion. And, as there is no mistake about the Government's position and policy—for the Finance Minister himself speaks of it in these words:

That, so far as this Government is concerned, its policy is historical, it is definite, it is undoubted. So, I think, Sir it is well that there should be no mistake as to the view which those who are opposed to this policy take; so that the people of the country, who are now alive to the great importance of the fiscal problem and have taken an enormous interest in the question during the last few months, when the proper time comes—as come it must before many months longer—may be prepared to say which is the policy that they prefer to accept. There is one thing that all this discussion has evolved. We have now a frank admission, not from all the hon. gentlemen who spoke, it is true, but we have a frank admission from the financial authority of the Government that a protective policy, at all events, in its first stages, enhances and increases prices; and there is nowhere—and I have read the speech over and over again with the greatest possible care—any statement made by the hon. Minister of Finance that within the fifteen years past prices have come down. There is a guarded expression that prices tend to decrease, that that has been the experience of other countries; but the hon. the Finance Minister has not ventured to say, and I think the hon. gentleman could not honestly have said, that that has been our experience since the introduction of the National Policy in 1879. I do not mean to say that the prices are not less now than they were in 1873, that is not the question; what I mean to say is that with regard to the fall of prices all the world over—that is what we have to look at—prices have not come down under the system which has prevailed for the last fifteen years. Now, if prices have not come down, what advantages have accrued to this country from the adoption of this National Policy? We are told there has been a buoyant revenue; not that the Finance Minister puts that down in terms to the fiscal policy that has prevailed, but inferentially he places to the credit of this policy that there has been a buoyant revenue. Undoubtedly the people have paid large sums in taxes from year to year, and the taxes have been steadily increasing. Up to this time the people have been able to pay, and I only trust that my prediction, uttered in the earlier part of my observations, may not be true, and that the time has not arrived when the people will cease to be able to pay. But, Sir, is that a reason of the National Policy? Why, how has it been elsewhere? I have been astonished to read in the Government organs from time to time, I have been astonished to hear statements made, as to the decadence of England under free trade. It has become a popular argument on the Conservative side in politics, so strong is their desire to uphold the policy, to represent the old mother land itself as unwise in adhering to free trade and as actually in a state of decadence. Now, if that be so it is a serious reason for us to pause before we make the change from the present 30 or 35 per cent system to a freer trade system. But what are the facts in regard to that? Why, Sir, from 1879 to 1893, the debt of Great Britain decreased no less than 13 per cent, decreased from seven hundred and forty-four million—I will not trouble the House with the odd figures—to six hundred and sixty-eight millions. During the same period the debt of Canada increased 69 per cent. But that, after all, one may say, was a matter of administration. Let me take something that is more definite and certain. In the 'Financial Abstract,' which is furnished yearly by the English officials, we have very good means of determining how England prospers or how England goes back, because her statistics are more accurate, perhaps, than those of any other country. Let us take the return with reference to the income tax between the years 1881 and 1891, or 1892, and I take 1892 because it is the last year for which they have returns. I find there has been an increase during that period, of property upon which the income tax is paid, of from five hundred and four millions to five hundred and ninety-seven millions, or 18 per cent. So this country that is going to the dogs under free trade, with all the adverse conditions, and they have not been few, or have not been matters of small moment—with all the adverse conditions that have existed during that period, we find there has been an increase in the property upon which the income tax is assessed, of 18 per cent. Well, Sir, what am I to compare with that? What matter is there here which offers a fair subject of comparison? I know of no other except the returns we have with reference to the condition of the farmers in the province of Ontario. Since 1882, that is for the same period of 10 years, we have had a Bureau of Industries in Ontario furnishing returns of the value of the farms, of farm buildings, of farm implements, and those things which go to make up the wealth of the farmer. What is the result? Now, I do not think it will be disputed that among the wealthiest people of the Dominion, are the farmers of Ontario. They are those, we are told, who have prospered most; certain their average condition is as good as that of any other class of the community. Well, we find from 1882 to 1892 their increase, according to these returns, is only 11 per cent. So, while the English free traders have been getting poor to the tune of 18 per cent during those ten years, the Canadian protectionists have been getting rich to the extent of 11 per cent. That is the result on this basis. Now, let me take our trade as to which the Finance Minister has incidentally taken credit for the National Policy. I am glad to see that comparing the five years before the change of policy, from 1876 to 1880, with the last five years—and I do not think any person will doubt the fairness of that comparison—there has been an increase in Canadian domestic trade alone of $23,549,015, or 33 per cent. It would be most extraordinary if there was not an increase. Why, Sir, during that period the whole North-west has been added, over a million acres of land in Manitoba have been cultivated during that time; and it would have been a most extraordinary result, a most curious ending, if our trade had not increased. But I am glad to say it has increased to that extent, and taking the average for the five years I have mentioned, it was $69,692,000. It has swollen in our best years—because the two last years have been our best years—to $93,000,000, or an increase of 33 per cent. But how much of that goes to the credit of the National Policy, how much goes to the credit of the present fiscal system? I have analysed it, and let us see what it is. In the produce of the forest, including lumber—which is curiously enough, in our statistical book, classed under the head of manufactures, in one sense, perhaps, correctly enough—there has been an average increase of nearly six millions. Will any hon. gentleman on this side of the House pretend to say that the lumber industry has received any benefit from the protective system? Do not we all know that it has injured, and certainly has not promoted, the industry with which I am dealing; and yet the increase in that is nearly $6,000,000. Our fisheries have increased by $2,413,000, that being the average increase. The average increase in animals and their products and in agricultural products has gone up nearly $10,000,000, from $33,844,000 to $43,690,000. I shall have occasion, before I have done, to deal with the question whether the agriculture of the country can be said to be prospering, and whether agricultural interests have been assisted by the protective policy; in the meantime I pass it by, and I come to our manufacturing exports. If the hon. Finance Minister had been able to point to an enormous increase in manufactured goods, there would have been some result from this National Policy; but of the total of $23,549,000, deducting household effects, which I do not suppose hon. gentlemen want to claim credit for as being due to the National Policy, the average increase in manufacturing exports is less than one and a half million dollars—to be exact, $1,446,000. That is the result so far as the manufacturing industry of the country has gone. What has been the trade of Great Britain during this period? How has her trade progressed? We know perfectly well; we have heard it in speech after speech that every effort has been made to close the ports of almost every country against the manufactured goods of Great Britain. The United States has raised a tariff which one would have thought was almost prohibitory, and yet we are astonished to find that England's largest exports are to the United States. Germany, France, Russia and Canada have been raising their tariffs and endeavouring to keep out British goods. With what result? With the result that, notwithstanding all I have said, the increase during this period has been an increase of 12 per cent. It has not been a retrogression, it has not been an enormous increase, but taking into account the diminution in values—because I am speaking in money—the increase is substantial. It is an increase in manufactured goods of 12 per cent as compared with the paltry million and a half by which Canada has been increasing her exports. But if this policy is good and is wise, surely there is no country where we can see its beneficial results so clearly demonstrated as in the United States. With their enormous natural resources, with practically free trade through the greatest half of the continent, with their enormous population, if the United States are able to show a large increase in their output of manufactured goods as compared with the mother country, there would be some ground, as I have said, and as I repeat, to pause in our determination with respect to any change in this tariff. But what is the result? I suppose of all the articles that are manufactured, the United States have greater advantages in cotton goods than in almost anything else. The raw material is produced in their own country, the carriage is saved; they have their own home market; and, looking at the exports of cotton goods, everybody must admit that there has been time enough to develop that industry in the United States. Looking at the exports, what do I find? I find that the exports of cotton goods from Great Britain is in the ratio, stating it in millions, of $297,000,000, taking an average of the last five years, as compared with $12,000,000 from the United States. In cotton goods you cannot speak of it as a ratio; there were $98,000,000 from Great Britain—I am speaking in dollars—and not one million from the United States. On metals, machinery and telegraph wire, the exports were of the value of $215,000,000 from Great Britain and $22,000,000 from the United States. Taking the aggregate of the trade, the figures are as follows: In exports of cotton goods, Great Britain, as compared with the United States, stands as 97 is to 3; of woollen goods, as 99.6 to 0.4; of metals, as 91 is to 9. Those are the results of protection in the United States, and hon. members at the same time see the results of free trade in Great Britain. But if there is anything at all in which the United States ought to have been able to compete with Great Britain, it is in the iron industry. It is a fact most hon. members know that in recent years the United States has overtaken Great Britain in the iron industry. Her manufacture of iron was larger. Now, if the manufacture was greater in the United States than in Great Britain there can be no ground, pretense or reason for the goods of the United States being dearer than those of Great Britain. The figures are as follows: In 1893 the production of iron in Great Britain was 6,829,841 tons, in the United States 7,124,502 tons, and it had been much larger. It was 9,000,000 in 1892; 8,000,000 in 1891; 9,000,000 in 1890. As I said before, if this policy is what is claimed for it, if the policy of protection, while at first it enhances prices and cost in the end tends downwards, that end ought surely to have been reached in the United States before this time. But taking an article in which the United States deals very largely, steel rails, let me give the House the different prices, and when the House remembers the output is larger in the United States than in Great Britain, to what can the difference in cost be attributed? The price of steel rails in Great Britain last year and this year is $19.86 a ton; the price of steel rails in the United States up to quite a recent period, though I think it is less now, but I give the last quotation in 1893, was $28.12, or $8.26 per ton more than in the mother country.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). What is the price to-day?

Mr. McCARTHY. To-day I think the price is $24.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). It is $20.

Mr. McCARTHY. I have not seen any quotation at that figure. The last quotation I have seen is $24, and that figure was given in a statement made by Mr. Johnson in Congress. I read from an official return, prepared by the journal 'Iron and Steel.' Let us take these figures and compare them. Let us look at the prices of steel rails, and for comparison calculate the additional cost to the people of that country in this item alone. Steel rails have varied in price as follows : In 1883, they were $37.75 a ton ; in 1884, $30 a ton ; in 1885, $28 a ton ; in 1886, $34 a ton ; in 1887, $37 a ton ; in 1888, $29 a ton ; in 1889, $29 a ton ; in 1890, $31 a ton ; in 1891, $29.92 a ton ; in 1892, $30 a ton, and in 1893, $28.12 a ton ; always some $7 or $8 or $9, and sometimes more, than the price of the same article in England. Now, Sir, after all the great question is : Is the price enhanced or is it not ? It boots not to tell us that our trade is buoyant ; it does not satisfy a practical man to be told that the deposits in the savings and other banks have increased ; it does not answer any argument to be told that our trade is growing when we realize that the growth of that trade is not due in any sense or shape or form to the National Policy. And, if none of these benefits flow, if nothing of this kind is to be put down to the credit side of this particular fiscal policy, what are we to say with regard to the cost ? The hon. Minister of Railways and Canals has made no bones about it, for he told us that goods were not only better but that they were cheaper in Canada. He is more cautious, and if he will pardon me for saying so, his colleagues who knew more about what he was talking about did not venture to say that at all. The hon. Minister of Finance said that the tendency was towards a decrease in price, but nowhere in his speech will it be found that he pretended to say that prices had decreased. That, Sir, is a simple question of fact, and I suppose that we will all have to settle it for ourselves, and the electors of this country will have to settle it for themselves. Speaking for myself, and from all the information I have been able to get, I venture the assertion here upon the floor of Parliament, that prices have not decreased. I venture the assertion on the floor of Parliament : that substantially and practically the prices of the goods which are manufactured in Canada are as high as the tariff will permit them to be. I venture the assertion : that there is no reason for keeping up the tariff unless for that object, because if those goods are better and cheaper in Canada than we can import them, the Canadian people are not fools enough to buy the imported article and to leave the home article on the shelves and counters unpurchased. Therefore, it is almost unnecessary, it seems to me, to discuss with any degree of seriousness this question, or this supposed question, of the price of goods. Let me, however, use such information as is open to me. We have had these changes proposed, and no one will pretend that they have been of a very radical description. No one will pretend that these changes are such as ought to have alarmed the manufacturers of this country, when it is remembered that, with, the exception of agricultural implement makers, the tariff is still 30 or 35 per cent. But let us see what the manufacturers say. They have been interviewed by the press, and their statements have been published. I have no doubt that if the Minister of Finance would tell us what statements have been made to him in secret we would have a very full and complete view of the manufacturers with regard to it ; but judging just from what has been made public, let us see what they do say. I will take two or three of them, and if the House will pardon me, I will trouble hon. gentlemen with an extract from their statements. Mr. George Brush, proprietor of the Eagle Foundry, declared :

That the revision was an abomination, and that it was not a reduction but an increase in the wrong direction. He considered the raising of the tariff on boiler tubes of wrought-iron or steel an iniquitous proceeding. These tubes are the most important part in the construction of a boiler, and are not made in this country at all. The result will be to throw the entire trade into the hands of American manufacturers, who already have sufficient opportunity to compete. Mr. John A. Pillow, of the Pillow-Hersey Company, manufacturers of bolts, nuts, bar iron, drawn wire, &c., says : "The change in the iron duties will have a bad effect, because Canadian manufacturers will be compelled to compete with the extraordinarily low prices prevailing in the United States at present. Cut nails and railway spikes would be the principal articles affected. Prices will have to be reduced, but to what extent he was not prepared to say, because he had not sufficient time to study the changes in detail. The change of duty will probably result in the manufacturers being compelled to use puddled bars instead of scrap iron."

They say that prices will have to be reduced. Then, Sir, it is because the tariff has been reduced, and it is to the extent the tariff has been reduced, says this gentleman, will prices have to be reduced. Mr. McBride, the manager of the Massey-Harris agricultural implement makers, said :

We expected a reduction both of the duties on implements and the materials entering into their manufacture, especially pig iron and steel. Pig iron is still left at the old rate of $4 per ton. This means that there cannot be any reduction in cost so far as gray iron and malleable iron castings enter into manufacture. As for bar iron, we notice there has been a reduction of $3 per ton, but comparatively little bar iron is used in the manufacture of our goods. The reduction on steel is confined to sheets thinner than 17-wire gauge. This will not make any difference in the manufacture of implements, as such material is not used. The new tariff, as outlined, will assist in finding a market for American manufacturers, but so far as can be seen at present, it will not assist Canadian manufacturers to reduce the cost of manufacturing to any appreciable extent.

Will the reduction actually lessen the cost of farming implements in Manitoba and the Territories?

That remains to be seen. Unless there are reductions in raw materials other than those outlined, I do not see any possibility of reduction in prices, as our prices are now fully 35 per cent lower than Americans charge for their implements in this country. It has been the policy of the Massey-Harris Company to reduce their prices year after year in proportion to their savings in the purchase of large quantities of raw materials, &c. We were in hopes that when the tariff was tampered with such reductions would be made on raw material as to enable us to reduce our price, and thereby give the general farming community the benefit.

Now, Sir, we have the cotton manufacturers, and Mr. A. F. Gault, the president of the Dominion Cotton Mills, says :

He was disappointed at the action of the Government in regard to gray and white cottons. The new duties were down to within 5 per cent of the Cartwright tariff. On the whole, he thought that Mr. Foster had taken great pains and made a fair tariff, which would satisfy the country. Cotton manufacturers would do their best and try to pull through without shutting down their mills. "Low-priced woollens are largely imported from England," said Mr. Gault, "and our woollen mills will have to close up or go into the manufacture of finer grades. The change in the duty on undyed material will benefit a Toronto firm which has gone into that business."

The cotton manufacturers will do their best, said Mr. Gault. Poor fellows! That would rather seem to say that the cotton manufacturers will have to reduce prices on account of the tariff, and if I prove that they have to reduce prices on account of the tariff I think I establish pretty fairly that their prices are up as far as the tariff will permit. Then, with reference to the sugar industry, the refiners say :

Sugar refiners say that they have got decidedly the worst of the tariff changes, although they never took from the consumer the full amount of the duty. The average net price of extra granulated for 1892 in the United States was $4.48 per 100 lbs., and in Canada was $4.29; for 1893, it was in the United States $4.98, and in Canada $4.93. The result of decreasing the duty from 80 cents to 64 cents will be the importation of German and other European bounty-fed sugars to compete with Canadian refined. Raising the colour standard from 14 to 16 will lead to the introduction of another class of cheap raw sugars, which will also displace some of the Canadian product. The competition between Canadian refiners is keen enough already, and these tariff changes will intensify it for the benefit of the consumer. On the other hand the heavy duty on the machinery required for refining, all of which has to be imported, remains unchanged. The refiners are, therefore, hit all round. They say that the changes must lead to further economy, cutting down of expenses and possibly reducing of wages. Neither the St. Lawrence nor the Canada Sugar Refining Companies has made any change in quotations.

Mr. MacMaster, speaking of wages, said :

There might be a reduction owing to the tariff changes.

Mr. G. J. Crowdy, of the firm of James Hutton & Co., hardware agents, said :

The duties on the high grades of steel appear to have been left unchanged. The principal charge is on the low grades. The change from specific to ad valorem duties will benefit the importer and consequently the consumer. It will enable the English steel to compete again.

I need not trouble the House any further with reference to sugar. Nor need I refer to wall-paper, for I dare say that hon. gentlemen know that the wall-paper people are by no means pleased with the change from specific to ad valorem. Now, Sir, if these statements are true at all—and I do not think we have any right to assume that these gentlemen have not made a fair representation of their business—is it open to argument that they have not been charging the full extent the tariff permits? I have some evidence here, which I will venture to give to the House, which goes to establish that very clearly. I asked two of the leading wholesale merchants in Toronto to give me a statement as to the relative cost of goods made in Canada and purchased at the factory, and the cost of similar goods purchased or purchasable in England or Scotland, and I will give the House the figures, with the difference in cost :

| Articles. | Price at Canadian mills. | Price in England or Scotland. | Difference. |
|---------------------------------|--------------------------|-------------------------------|-------------|
| | $ cts. | $ cts. p. c. | |
| 34 to 36-inch dyed silesia..... | 0 06 | 0 04½ | 33 |
| 40-inch printed do | 0 08½ | 0 06 | 45 |
| Oxford shirtings | 0 07½ | 0 05 | 45 |
| Prints..... | 0 06½ | 0 05 | 35 |

| Flannellettes..... | 0 08 | 0 06 | 33 |
| Averages..... | 0 45½ | 0 32½ | 41 |

Mr. BOYLE. The old tariff was 32½ per cent.

Mr. McCARTHY. I am not speaking of silesias only, but of cotton goods generally, on which the old tariff was specific and ad valorem.

Mr. BOYLE. No, Sir.

Mr. McCARTHY. Well, I am only giving the figures which I got from merchants in whom I have the fullest confidence. I obtained them from two sources.

Mr. WALLACE. The hon. gentleman is quoting the 32½ per cent class.

Mr. McCARTHY. I am quoting these articles. I do not carry the tariff in my head. All I can say is, that these are the statements which have been given to me.

Mr. BOYLE. Somebody has misled the hon. gentleman.

Mr. McCARTHY. The hon. gentleman may say so. All I can say is that I have had these statements from gentlemen in the city of Toronto in whom I place the highest trust, and who, I am satisfied, would not deliberately deceive me. I have a similar statement from similar sources with reference to woolen goods, which is as follows:—

| Articles. | Cost at Canadian mills. | Cost in England or Scotland. | Difference. |
|--|-------------------------|------------------------------|-------------|
| | $ cts. | $ cts. | |
| Tweeds, $\frac{3}{4}$ -yard wide | 0 25 | 0 19 | 31 |
| do another kind | 0 50 | 0 32 | 53 |
| do do | 0 60 | 0 42 | 42 |
| do do | 0 65 | 0 54 | 20 |
| Serge, 27-inch | 0 18 | 0 09 | 100 |
| do 54 do | 1 40 | 1 05 | 33 |
| Ladies' box-cloth, 54-inch | 0 80 | 0 64 | 25 |
| Tweed ulstering, 54 do | 0 65 | 0 60 | 8 |
| Wove overcoat lining, 54-inch | 0 70 | 0 56 | 25 |
| Average | | | 32 |

Here are some articles, of which I give the prices at the Canadian mills and the prices at the American mills, with the difference:

| Articles. | Cost at Canadian mills. | Cost at American mills. | Difference. |
|--------------------------|-------------------------|-------------------------|-------------|
| | $ cts. | $ cts. | |
| Wool carpet | 0 65 | 0 47 $\frac{1}{2}$ | 36·8 |
| Union do | 0 26 | 0 13 $\frac{1}{2}$ | 40 |
| Another kind | 0 91 | 0 66 | 38 |
| Table oilcloth | 2 10 | 1 75 | 20 |
| Low grade blankets | 0 25 | 0 16 | 56 |

These are figures with reference to the actual cost of these goods under the late tariff. But, Sir, it always seemed to me an extraordinary thing that gentlemen should pretend that it was necessary to keep up a 35 or 40 per cent tariff and at the same time claim that the cost of goods was less here than in the foreign market. The tariff is imposed, not for revenue purposes—that is frankly admitted; it is a tariff for protective purposes, which incidentally gives us a revenue. Well, Sir, the height of that tariff can only be justified or maintained or defended on the ground that it is essential, in order to keep the home market for the

Mr. McCARTHY.

Canadian manufacturer. So, Sir, I will assume that the price under the old tariff has been in the neighbourhood of what I have mentioned, and that the price under the new tariff will be just as high as the tariff permits. What is the result of it all? We have had the returns from the census trotted out again. They formed a table in the Finance Minister's Budget speech of last year, and they are repeated this year. We have to take these returns and make the best of them, and I propose to deal with them and just see what they amount to. In the first place, we were told that the increased number of employees in the decade was 112,000. We were told that the total number of those engaged in manufacturing industries was 367,000. When the further census returns came down, we were astonished to find that instead of 367,000 people being occupied in manufacturing pursuits, there were but 320,000, and the difference is explained in the preface to the last volume of the census which has been issued, in this way. Many of those who are employed by the manufacturers are merely temporarily employed, and although they are returned as having been more or less engaged in these pursuits, they cannot be classed as belonging to any particular grade of operatives. But leaving that for the moment—and it is not an unreasonable explanation—let us see what this really amounts to. Is there an hon. gentleman in this House, on either side, who accepts that number of 112,000 as the legitimate increase in ten years? Is there any one of us who has had occasion to examine the census returns, who is not perfectly satisfied that whatever the cause may be—and the cause is not very far to seek—these returns for 1891, as compared with 1881, are enormously swollen. We know why that is the case. We know that the officials were paid for making the returns with reference to manufacturing establishments in 1891, and thus encouraged to make them, whereas the same officials got nothing for these returns in 1881. And I happen to know—and I daresay it is in all our experience—that many places and industries have been returned as manufacturing establishments, coming under the head of manufacturing industries, which have no pretension to the same, and which, if it were only known, would cover the return with well deserved ridicule. Wherever I have gone I had only to read that return to invoke from the people I have addressed—and I have addressed a number of meetings during Parliamentary recess—the most derisive laughter. There was not any place that I went to, and where I just read from an official return of the number of manufacturing establishments—

Mr. MONTAGUE. Has the hon. gentleman compared it with the schedules used in other countries in taking the census?

Mr. McCARTHY. I have.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Was the comparison favourable to Canada ?

Mr. McCARTHY. I do not know exactly what the hon. gentleman means by the comparison.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The hon. gentleman objects to the number of industries mentioned in the census, and the number of those who are called employees of those industries. What I asked is whether, in the taking of the census in other countries, those same industries are not included, and whether even other industries are not included, which are not comprised in the Canadian census ?

Mr. McCARTHY. I think the hon. gentleman must have misunderstood me.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Not at all.

Mr. McCARTHY. If the hon. gentleman will allow me, I was speaking of the census of 1881 as compared with that of 1891. I was asking, as a fact, whether there had been an increase and whether we could rely upon the figures of the census. The object of a census is to enable us to see how we are getting on, and if the census had been taken in 1881 in the same accurate way, and if the same inducements had been held out to the officials taking that census as were held out to those who took the census of 1891, there would be no reason, so far as I know, from discrediting—however valueless for other purposes—the comparison I have instituted.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Is there any difference between the schedules of 1881 and 1891 ?

Mr. McCARTHY. There is no difference in the scheme. Surely the hon. gentleman must understand what I say. He must know perfectly well that those figures do not accurately represent but vastly exaggerate the numbers in connection with manufacturing interests in the different communities. Why, in my own town of Barrie, there are put down 62 industrial establishments with 196 employees, and I declare you could not find 10, in the ordinary acceptance of the term. Milliners and dress-makers are included.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Why should you not include these ?

Mr. McCARTHY. Would the hon. gentleman not mind interrupting ? He is there, no doubt, to speak. He will have the opportunity to reply. He is the spokesman of the party, and has a good opportunity allowed him. I say that, compared with 1881, the census returns of 1891 are practically valueless. That is all I say, and it is not unnatural. You pay a man for making a return and he will be careful to omit nothing. But if he is not paid, it is quite possible he will not take the trouble of making the inquiry. And some curious results we have in the census. For instance, in Stratford there is an increase of 61 establishments and 1,515 employees, and the whole increase in the population is 1,262. So that although 1,500 people are engaged in the manufacturing industries there more than were engaged in 1881, the population has actually decreased by nearly 300. In St. Mary's, a place where I had the honour of addressing a meeting. I found there was an increase of 9 establishments, according to the official document, and an increase of 17 employees, but the increase in the population was one. So that these 17 men had apparently driven 16 away, and one alone had taken the place of the others who had gone. In Port Hope the increase of employees was 56, and the decrease in the population 543. In Ingersoll the increase in the official document of employees was one, and the decrease in population 127. In Strathroy there is an increase of 26 in the census, and a decrease of 511 in the population. But take London, where there has been a considerable increase of population, and take Kingston, where there has also been an increase of population. The official document shows an increase of 1,199 in the number of employees in Kingston, and 1,128 in London, and an increase of 214 manufacturing establishments in Kingston and 433 in London. There is no use in my wrangling with the hon. gentlemen. The people of Kingston know if that increase exists. I had the honour of addressing a meeting there, and when I mentioned these figures it was merely to bring a laugh and to show that the people placed no value in them. Let us see now what is the result of it all. I take the occupations of the people, and these are more likely to be accurate than are the returns of the manufacturing industries. No doubt each man has returned his own occupation. The manufacturers have returned—I do not know with that care—the number of people employed by them. I see it is not stated in our census, as in the American table, "the average number of employees," but it is stated "the number of employees." Whether that is by design or accident I am not prepared to say. But taking the number, what do we find ? We find in the agricultural, mining and fishing classes there are 790,210, or 47·6 per cent of the total number of people who have occupations in this country. We find those engaged in trade and transportation number 186,695, or 11·2 per cent ; those engaged in domestic and personal service, 246,183, or 14·9 per cent ; those engaged in professional avocations, 63,280, or 3·8 per cent, and those who are classed amongst the non-producers, 52,986, or 3·2 per cent. We thus account for 81·7 per cent of the people of this country, none of whom are to be attributed to the manufacturing industries. There remain, however, a balance of the manufacturing industries of somewhere near 19 per cent. But, Sir, from that number we have to take a very considerable proportion. I do not think that any hon. gentleman will claim that carpenters and joiners—though they may be manufacturers; I am not finding fault with the classification—are to be counted among those whose employment in Canada is dependent upon the National Policy. In considering this question of the fiscal policy these classes must be excluded, as also must the saw and planing-mill men, the ship and boat builders, the coopers, the boot makers, the marble and stone cutters, the masons, the painters and glaziers, the plasterers, the blacksmiths, the dressmakers and people of that kind. We do not have any more blacksmiths by reason of the National Policy. If we had a revenue tariff no man would think of crossing the border to get his horse shod by an American blacksmith. No man thinks of going across the line to employ people in any of the industries that I have named. We had these people with us before the National Policy came in, and we will have them long after it becomes a thing of the past. Well, deducting these—and I do deduct them—from the 19 per cent, from the 320,000 which are put down to manufacture and mechanical industries, we have a balance of 144,000, which is somewhere about 8 or 9 per cent. I think that is too much, but 8 or 9 per cent is certainly the outside number that can be put down properly or fairly as those engaged in manufacturing industries that are dependent in any shape or form upon the National Policy. This is not 8 per cent of the total population, but 8 per cent of those who have occupations. Now, Sir, let us see whether these figures are borne out, because I have endeavoured to test them in other ways. I have taken the number of employees in the following industries—cotton mills, woollen mills, agricultural implements, rolling mills, foundries, sugar refineries, cabinet and furniture shops, and boot and shoe manufactories. The number engaged in these industries in 1881 was 48,077, and the number in 1891 was 60,037, an increase of 24 per cent. The output of these industries in 1881 was $59,162,000, and in 1891 the amount was $86,000,000. These are the principal industries that we must put down to the credit of the so-called National Policy. So we have an increase of 24 per cent in these during the decade. And now let me compare that with the table which the Finance Minister has given us where the total increase of the number employed is 44 per cent, being from 259,000 to 367,000, or 112,000. I have here a table taken partly from answers given in the House last session and partly supplied by Mr. Johnson, the Dominion statistician, the tables being ready, but not yet published:

| Articles. | Employees. | | Increase. | Product. | |

Increase of hands, 24.8% : increase of product, 45.3%.

Now, if that is not a fair citation from these returns I do not know what can be, and the result is that, while the increase in number of people employed in the occupations of the country generally was 44 per cent, the increase in these occupations affected by the National Policy was only 24 per cent.

Mr. TAYLOR. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman one question. I know he does not want to misrepresent the case. Did I understand him to say that he had taken from the list of the occupations affected by the National Policy that of the blacksmiths?

Mr. McCARTHY.

Mr. McCARTHY. I have deducted the blacksmiths from the 320,000 who, according to the census are engaged in manufacturing and mechanical employments. No doubt blacksmiths are included in some of these industries affected by the National Policy. But it is impossible to be very precise or accurate in such general statements as these.

Mr. TAYLOR. I just want to say that I know of two industries in the town of Gananoque, each employing forty men, who are blacksmiths, and who were engaged there since the National Policy came into force—that is in the industry of carriage building. They are all put down as blacksmiths.

Mr. McCARTHY. No doubt there are such cases. In such statements as I am making, it is impossible to do more than approximate. I have taken these classes because I think that the far and away the greater proportion of them are not engaged in occupations that are in any way due to the National Policy. Deductions would have to be made on either side, and these, I think, will balance each other.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. There are the butchers and bakers whom you did not mention.

Mr. McCARTHY. I may not have read them, but they are included in the figures I have given—there are 20,000 of the classes named by the hon. gentleman. Now, we are told that the effect of the change of policy would be to drive out not merely the 112,000 I have referred to, but the 320,000 employed in manufacturing and mechanical pursuits. That is the argument that has been used in the campaign which the Ministers carried on during the summer, and that argument has been more or less used during this debate. I have only to state, Sir, with regard to that—and every hon. gentleman can judge for himself whether my estimates are correct—that I believe the figures I have given will show that the number dependent upon the National Policy in the sense referred to by hon. gentlemen does not exceed 3 per cent of the people who have occupations. Call it 10 per cent—and that will take in the forty men working as blacksmiths in the carriage industries in Gananoque—and let us see what is the practical meaning of it all. Let us see what it costs the consuming classes of this country to keep this 10 per cent of people employed here in Canada—for surely that is the practical way of looking at it. The Finance Minister admits that there is a tendency in a protective policy to increase the price of protected articles. He states that later there is a tendency to reduction, but this, so far, I think, has not been realized here. The hon. gentleman from East York (Mr. Maclean), who gave the House an essay on protection, also tells us very candidly that there are disadvantages, that there are disagreeable incidents to this protective system. His argument is that the advantages outweigh the disadvantages. I want to look at it from the same practical point of view. If we can afford to subsidize these manufacturers and their employees, and if the result of that is beneficial to us all, why let us continue the policy; but if, on the contrary, the advantages far outweigh the disadvantages, if it can be demonstrated to almost a mathematical certainty that the consuming masses of this country suffer more disadvantages than advantages, then let us change the policy. I have enumerated some of those consuming masses. An hon. gentleman who preceded me this evening thought the consumer was a man who did nothing but consume. But, Sir, the consuming people of this country, in the sense in which the term is used, are those who are just as actively engaged in their respective walks of life, and are bound to work as hard, as the manufacturing classes, and what they are beginning to realize is that they have got to pay for the support of the latter and they cannot much longer afford to do it. Now, what is the result of all this policy? We are told that the output of these manufacturing industries is something incredible, that four hundred and seventy-five millions per annum is the actual output according to the census returns. Well, if that is the figure of all those engaged in mechanical and industrial pursuits, and if the deduction which I have mentioned is proper to be made, we must correspondingly reduce the output. As I have already indicated, for the purpose of testing my figures, I take the increase in the output of those leading industries, and the increase of this output during that period is 45 per cent. Among those industries are cottons, woollens, agricultural implements, rolling mills, foundries, sugar, cabinet furniture, boots and shoes. Now, the total increase in the output according to the census returns is no less than 53 per cent. It is quite evident, therefore, that the whole of that figure cannot be attributable to the National Policy, and if it cannot be attributable to the National Policy, to what else is it fair to attribute it? Now, last session I took a great deal of trouble to analyze the table of 1881 which we have. I divided the industries which are shown in that table into those which are dependent upon the policy of protection more or less, because we have had these industries long before there was any thought of protection in this country in the sense in which we understand the term now. But, putting it down in that way, I arrive at the conclusion that the product of those who are dependent in the sense I have spoken of, amounts to one hundred and sixty-five million dollars out of the total of that period. Adding to that one hundred and sixty-five millions the 45 per cent which the figures I have mentioned with regard to these leading industries, show, and we have a total output of two hundred and forty-one millions. Now, the practical question which I desire to impress upon the House is this: If there are two hundred and forty-one million dollars worth of goods manufactured in Canada, and if these manufactures are dependent upon the National Policy, how much of that two hundred and forty-one millions are the people of this country paying more than they would under a system of free trade? That is the disadvantage which all admit is attributable to the National Policy. The advantages are, the increase of population, the diversification of industries, and the home market for the farmer.

I have stated about the figure to which I attribute any increase of population, and I now come to the disadvantages. Well, according to these figures with which I have already troubled the House, and if the tariff itself does not woefully mislead us, it is not too much to say that the increase in the prices of these goods has been, is, and will continue to be, under the changed tariff, in the neighbourhood of 35 per cent. Now, it is only fair to say that it does not apply to all of them. For instance, I have made a calculation that that increase does not apply to sugar, because the sugar is enhanced in price to the people of this country to the extent of about 10 per cent as compared with the English sugar. But, speaking of the bulk of the manufactured goods in Canada, and I speak after giving the subject the very best consideration in my power, and after making every inquiry, the enhanced cost to the people of this country is not short of 35 per cent, and sometimes it has been much more. I gave illustrations in woollen goods, and I gave illustrations in cotton goods; and I judge the bulk from these illustrations. So that, according to the statement I made last session, a statement which I understand the hon. member for South Oxford substantially corroborates this session—and the statement was made. I think, by the hon. member for Prince Edward Island (Mr. Davies)—it is not too much to put down that for twenty million dollars we pay into the Treasury, the people of this country are paying fifty or sixty million dollars more into the pockets of the manufacturers. Now, I do not want to be misunderstood as saying that the manufacturers are pocketing these enormous profits; I do not want to be understood that these fifty million dollars are being transferred from the pockets of the consumers to the pockets of the manufacturers as pure profit. I accept the statement made by the hon. gentleman who preceded me this evening, that our manufacturers cannot manufacture at the same cost they can in other countries. My hon. friend from East Hastings (Mr. Northrup) pictured to us to-night, evidently from figures furnished to him by authority, the position of the woollen manufacturer. First, there was the increased cost of the capital; secondly, there was the increased cost added to the machinery of no less than 90 per cent, $100,000 to $160,000; then there was the increased cost of the raw material, and of having to store it; these were the various and enormous disadvantages under which he told us the manufacturers of this country labour. All the same, what boots it to the consumer why it is, if in fact and in truth the people of this country are being bled to the extent of more than two and a half dollars for every one dollar which they pay into the treasury? Now, that these are important matters no one will doubt. I have no desire here to injure any manufacturer. On the contrary, my anxiety and hope will be that with the start they have had, with the fifteen years during which they have enjoyed protection, they will be able to prosper when this tariff is changed, as I am confident it is going to be changed, and that before very long. But we have, and we may as well realize it, an enormous force to contend with here. I was astonished on reading a work the other day to find it stated by a competent authority that protection would never have been changed in England if it had not been for the Irish famine. If it had not been that the people were starving, and, therefore, could be aroused on the question of the increased cost of the means of subsistence, such was the strength of the manufacturing industries, and of those forces gathered around them, that the policy would not have been changed. And we have the same battle to fight here. It is a contest which is perhaps not so formidable as on the other side of the line, but still there is this formidable element that the consuming people have to fight. What has happened since this change was proposed, only a fortnight ago? The railway trains have been borne down with deputations of manufacturers coming here to protest against these decreases proposed, light as they are, and I do not know what is yet in store in committee; while the 48 per cent of the population, comprising farmers, miners, and fishermen, have no organization, no means of appearing here before the Cabinet Ministers to plead their cause. It is true they were interviewed in the summer; but what was the motive of those interviews? They were asked whether they wanted protection on corn, ham, pork, oats, and wheat. They were not asked the question, whether they desired to pay protective prices on the particular goods they consumed. They were told that they were not expected to make free trade speeches or go into the general question, but they were asked whether they wanted protection on their own particular industry. Naturally, each man said, I want protection. Some of them tried to say, but they were choked off, that they would rather have no protection, but free trade markets all round, but they were told that was not the subject of investigation and discussion by and between them and the Controllers, that the question was: Do you want protection against American corn, pork and wheat? So the bulk of the people, 50 per cent if you add the domestic classes and the professional classes, have no organization which can appeal to the Ministers to change the tariff, while the voices of the manufacturers are heard in the land. I am glad to observe that at last the farmers, at all events, have been aroused, that at last they have taken to themselves, throughout the province from which I come, the duty of organizing in their own interests, and I mistake if most of the farmers in this country are not to-day studying political economy, and with the results which will be evident at the coming elections. No other possible way was open. The Finance Minister was astonished. He said that for years the charge had been wrung through the country that the tariff was legalized robbery. But the hon. gentleman pointed to the result of the elections in 1881, in 1887, and in 1891, and said, How is it possible that the people would again return the Government if legalized robbery was being perpetrated. It was a fair argument, and an argument which has to be met and which I am not afraid to answer. The answer is a plain one. Of all the people in Canada, of all the people I know, I think the Ontario farmer is probably the best party man. He is not very anxious to find out exactly his position or his rights, but he is anxious to see that his party is up and the other party down, and the man on the concession lines is as proud of his party allegiance as the Duke of Devonshire was to belong to the Whigs, or the Marquis of Salisbury is to belong to the Tories. But endurance has ceased to be a virtue. They have realized at last that the interests of one class of the community were all paramount, and were commending and controlling the destinies of the country, and they have not failed, as I firmly believe, to grasp the necessity of looking after their own interests, and I hope in that I am not going to be mistaken. Let me read to the House the view of some farmers of the North-west who have sent me from the constituency of the hon. Minister of the Interior, the resolutions of a meeting held on April 6th. The letter is from Mr. D. S. Wilson, and is addressed to myself. It is as follows:—

BRANDON, MAN., April 6th, 1894.

DEAR SIR,—A committee which was appointed to attend to the matter by the farmers of Brandon County met yesterday and adopted the enclosed resolution, and I was instructed to forward it to you and request you to see that it was brought up in the House of Commons. A copy of the resolution has been sent to the Hon. T. M. Daly.

I have the honour to be, sir,
Your obedient servant,
(Signed) D. F. WILSON.

DALTON MCCARTHY Esq.,
House of Commons,
Ottawa.

(Resolution.)

BRANDON, MAN., April 6th, 1894.

FARMERS MEETING.

At a meeting of the Executive of the Farmers' Association of Brandon County, held in the City Hall, Brandon, on Thursday, April 6th, Mr. John Leech in the chair, the following resolution was adopted:—

Moved by Samuel Honnor, seconded by W. Postlewaite, that we a committee of the Farmers' Association of the county of Brandon, who memorialized the Federal Government a year ago for alterations in the tariff to aid the development of agriculture in the Canadian North-west, express with great regret our feeling of dissatisfaction with the insufficiency of the reductions recently made.

We feel that with the increase of competition in our natural markets from countries that can produce with greater facility than we can, agriculture must become an absolute failure in this country unless the restrictions that affect the cost of production and transport to our natural markets are greatly reduced.

We therefore repeat for the earnest consideration of the representatives of the people in Parliament the spirit of our memorial of a year ago.

1st. That the abolition of the duty on lumber be complete and embrace all kinds of dressed material: a removal of duties on rough lumber alone which cannot be imported under any circumstances will be of no benefit whatever to the county.

2nd. With the duties reduced on raw materials and the American markets thrown open we feel the Canadian manufacturers of agricultural implements are in position to compete even handed at home, as they have always been abroad without further protection. Further trade restrictions in their interests is only continuing the unbearable burdens on the struggling settlers of the North-west and the agriculturists of the whole of Canada which must speedily end in complete disaster.

3rd. We regret that the duties on coal oil and binding twine remain as before; two articles of extensive consumption in the North-west, and we are fully convinced that the benefits arising to the country through their production are in no way commensurate to the loss entailed upon the many consumers.

4th. That as the representatives of the Government, the Hon. Messrs. Foster and Angers when in the North-west last year strongly recommended the farmers to go into mixed farming; we do not think it consistent with their advice that there should be any duty on fence wire, which is one of the essentials to mixed farming.

We therefore protest against the insufficiency of the modification already announced and repeat the spirit of our former memorial: that the duties on coal oil, binding twine, fence wire and dressed lumber be entirely abolished, and that those on farm implements be reduced to at least 10 per cent. This we feel to make agriculture even moderately profitable in this country must be done, and nothing else can give satisfaction to the settlers of the Canadian North-west. We also feel that everything that can be done should be done by the Government to reduce the extortionate railway rates to and from this country which are heavily discriminating against the successful settlement and development of our great North-west.

(Signed) D. F. WILSON, Sec'y.

That, Sir, is the view of the farmers in a constituency represented here by a Minister of the Crown.

Mr. DALY. Good Grits, too.

Mr. MCCARTHY. The hon. gentleman says "good Grits." I do not know whether they are good Grits or good Tories, but I suppose they have a right to express their sentiments and to protest against the changes that are proposed to be made. This subject is one which I cannot hope to cover in the time that I would be warranted in occupying the attention of the House. I can only say, that I have gone through separately, as well as in the aggregate, these various industries, and if I may be allowed to trespass just for a few moments longer, let me give them in detail, and then we will be able as well to realize as in the aggregate, the result of these particular industries. With regard to my old favourite the cotton industries; it forms a ready illustration, because as we know the raw material is free. Of all the manufacturing industries in this country they stand I think the best chance of manufacturing at a low cost. What is the result of the cotton industries of this country, and what is its value to us? The output is said to be $8,451,724. If my figures are right that the enhanced cost of this output is at the rate of 35 per cent; we have of that $8,451,724 to pay the sum of $2,197,447. Now, what is the corresponding benefit, because if they cannot be justified in detail they cannot be justified at all. My constituents want to know what benefit they get from the cotton industries of this country. They want to know where are their large markets, and where their increased prices come in? The Government says: I must try and tell them that they must not be narrow, they must remember this great broad Dominion, they must remember that they are citizens of Canada and not merely of the North Riding of Simcoe, and if they find that these industries are promoting results of a beneficial character elsewhere they ought to be satisfied even if they cost them a little. They naturally ask: what does it cost them? I find it costs them $2,197,447, and what is the benefit? We are told: Oh, the wages that are paid. Let us see how much that is. The wages amount to $2,102,000, so that we are paying over $2,197,000 in order that the cotton manufacturers may pay their employees $2,102,000; in other words we are paying the whole cost of the establishment. That is what it comes to, and we get nothing for it. On the same product of cotton goods, at a 17½ per cent tariff there would be over $1,000,000 coming into the treasury, but nothing comes into the treasury now. Raw material is free, raw material is still to be made more free if possible; the duty is to be piled upon the manufactured article. The raw material goes to the benefit of the manufacturers; the increased duty enhances the price to the consumers, but say hon. gentlemen: we have taken the tax off sugar, we have taken the tax off bill stamps, we have taken the tax off tea. That is the argument of the Government. Why, Sir, the figures I have already mentioned show that the taxes have not been taken off. They have been shifted. We do not pay it on sugar, or on tea, or on bill stamps, but our taxes are all the same, and they have been increasing. We are paying the tax and we are paying an additional price as well, and I have shown ample, we pay more in additional prices than the total amount paid out to the employees, according to the returns which the manufacturers made. Let me give the House the woollen industries on the same basis. It is not disputed that the woollen industries charge the full figure of 35 per cent. It is justified on the ground stated by my hon. friend from East Hastings (Mr. Northrup) this afternoon: that they cannot possibly get on at less, and we have been told that the result of the change from specific to ad valorem (the tariff still being 35 per cent), that several of these woollen industries will have to close. The result of our protection to the woollen industries is that the wages come to $1,941,000, and the additional cost to the people amounts to $2,194,000; and you take it through the whole of these different industries and you get no more satisfaction. Then, Sir, see the enormous possibility of doing injustice. Take even the manufacturing industries. On what ground can the Minister of Finance justify leaving the agricultural implement manufacturer with only 20 per cent protection, with a large portion of his raw material subject to a duty of from 40 to 50 per cent, when the adjoining manufacturer gets his raw material free and has a protection of 35 per cent. On what ground can you justify giving the raw material free to one class of manufacturer, and putting the raw material of the farmer at a duty bearing from 20 to 35 per cent. It cannot be justified. With every intention on the part of the Government to do what is fair and right, it is impossible for them to do so, because the raw product to one man is the finished article of the other man. Its very injustice calls upon this House for redress. There is no morality, says the hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean), in the protective system. Morality is out of the question, he says, and I quite agree with him. It is an enlightened selfishness, that is the key note of such a policy. An enlightened selfishness; well, I do not know whether those who are suffering from this selfishness very much appreciate that kind of thing.

Mr. MACLEAN (York). They voted for it.

Mr. McCARTHY. Well, they will not do it another time I am inclined to think.

Mr. MACLEAN (York). Yes, they will.

Mr. McCARTHY. Perhaps so, we will see; there is no use prophesying but we will see. All I can say is, that as far as I can see, the man who can justify the inequalities necessarily incident to this protective system cannot be actuated by any sense of morality, as the hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean) tell us. That hon. gentleman sweeps away with a wave of his tongue all the political economy of the age. He utterly repudiates and laughs to scorn, from Adam Smith to John Stuart Mill, these ignorant, short-sighted, benighted men; these men whose teachings are to be found in every college of the country, in every course, in every curriculum. We are told by the hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean), not in a breeze of enthusiasm, but in a cold-blooded, deliberate document read and prepared for the House, that these men did not know what they were talking about, were treating of the subject when the world was very young and under conditions which were so small and so limited that their conclusions were lame and impotent. Well, it may be so. I have had the honour of living in the same city as the hon. member for many years. I have known and heard of him, and undoubtedly he has a reputation; but I declare to you, Sir, I never heard that he had a reputation which entitled him to slay, at one foul breath, all the political economists of the century. It is, I think the gem of the debate. We have had a very long debate and perhaps not a very interesting or a very great one; but of all the subjects dealt with, I think this one, dealt with by the hon. member for East York, and his manner of dealing with it, deserves the special attention of the House and of the country. That this hon. gentleman should undertake, in this summary way, to dispose of all that we have been taught, all we have been brought up to believe in, all we have ever recognized as correct political economy, is, to me, a marvel, to say the least of it.

Mr. MACLEAN (York). You did the same, years ago.

Mr. McCARTHY. Now, Sir, in the former discussions on this subject, which took place years and years ago, there was one extract from this writer on political economy, the late Mr. J. Stuart Mill, who is not to be heard—this is the last time he is to be mentioned in this House—an extract which we were very fond of quoting. I will read it again, although, in doing so, I shall perhaps incur the censure of the hon. member for East York:

The only case in which, on mere principles of political economy, protecting duties can be defensible, is when they are imposed temporarily (especially in a young and rising nation) in hopes of naturalizing a foreign industry, in itself perfectly suitable to the circumstances of the country. The superiority of one country over another in a branch of production often only arises from having begun it sooner. There may be no inherent advantage on one part or disadvantage on the other, but only a present superiority of acquired skill and experience. A country which has this skill and experience yet to acquire may in other respects be better adapted to the production than those which were earlier in the field: and besides, it is a remark of Mr. Rae, that nothing has a greater tendency to promote improvements in any branch of production than its trial under a new set of conditions. But it cannot be expected that individuals should at their own risk, or rather to their certain loss, introduce a new manufacture, and bear the burden of carrying it on until the producers have been educated up to the level of those with whom the processes are traditional. A protective duty, continued for a reasonable time, will sometimes be of the least inconvenient mode in which the nation can tax itself for the support of such an experiment. But the protectionism should be confined to cases in which there is good ground of assurance that the industry which it fosters will after a time be able to dispense with it; nor should the domestic producers ever be allowed to expect that it will be continued to them beyond the time necessary for a fair trial of what they are capable of accomplishing.

Mr. MACLEAN (York). It is a question of time alone.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). And during that time there is a loss.

Mr. FERGUSON (Leeds). What is twelve years in the lifetime of a nation?

Mr. McCARTHY. Well, I am going to answer each question put to me, and I will answer my hon. friend from Leeds first. What is twelve years in the life of a nation? I ask the hon. gentleman what in the world has the lifetime of a nation to do with it? You establish a business, you give a man capital, you give him an opportunity of acquiring skill and employing men; he manufactures and prospers, and dies. What has that to do with the lifetime of a nation?

Mr. FERGUSON (Leeds). A great deal to do with it. A nation is only an aggregate of the individuals.

Mr. McCARTHY. If you have enabled that man to acquire skill, if you have enabled him to surround himself with competent assistance, surely you have done all you can be expected to do. You talk of a manufacturer inheriting these things. He does nothing of the kind; he becomes a manufacturer because he has served his apprenticeship to it; and no person would pretend to say, anywhere except in politics, that more than a few short years would be necessary for any industry to establish itself so as to be able to compete with the other industries of the world. I put it to my hon. friend, What does he say of the United States? It has been proved to-night that they have had protection for a hundred years, except in one or two solitary industries, and have had enormous wealth and mechanical skill; and what is the result? Why, in the industry that has been the most prosperous in that country—the steel rail industry—they have been charging, up to this moment, $8 a ton more than free trade manufacturers.

Mr. HAGGART. They are selling them in Belgium and England to-day.

Mr. McCARTHY. I do not say that they are not selling them in Belgium and England to-day, whatever that very intelligent observation means. I wonder if it is true that the hon. gentleman is speaking without his coach. I see the gentleman sitting near him who coached him for the great Budget speech that he delivered, but who, we are told, was terribly mortified at the poor delivery. It fell far short of the rehearsal; and the proof positive of it was that the hon. gentleman had introduced quotations from Shakespeare, which was possible; also quotations from Sir Walter Scott, which I could even credit; but it was added that he also quoted from the Bible, and that was taken as proof positive that the hon. and reverend doctor, who sits near him, was the creator of the speech. So, Sir, when the hon. gentleman interrupts again, let him do it with a little more intelligence, because no person contended that England was not selling steel rails, or Belgium either.

Mr. HAGGART. The hon. gentleman mistook my observation altogether. I say that the United States manufacturers in Alabama are selling them in Belgium and England.

Mr. McCARTHY. The hon. gentleman may have meant that, but I think the House will agree with me that he did not say it. I have given the hon. gentleman the prices of steel rails in the United States in the year 1893, quoting from the official returns; I have given the prices in England; and I have shown the difference between the two; and I want to know how it is possible that in the largest industry in the United States—an industry in which their production has outstripped the production of the mother country itself—they are not able to compete with the mother country.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). Perhaps the hon. gentleman will allow me to state that the price of steel rails in England is £3 15s. per ton at the mills, while steel rails from Pittsburgh can be laid down in Montreal at $20 per ton.

Mr. McCARTHY. The hon. gentleman says so, and I am quite willing to suppose that he is speaking by the book. But I will refer to a debate that took place in Congress on the 10th of last January on this subject, and I will give the figures then mentioned.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). That is not an authority.

Mr. McCARTHY. This is the Statistical Abstract of the United States for the year 1893, sixteenth number. I do not know where you are to get better authority. I find here that the average price of domestic pig iron, rolled bar iron, iron, and steel rails, per ton of 2,240 pounds, cut nails, per keg, for each year from 1850 to 1893, furnished by the American Steel Association, is $28.12, and, as the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White) says, the price in England was £3 15s.—I find that, in a discussion which took place in Congress on the tariff, Mr. Johnson, of Ohio, who complained of the reductions not being greater, said on this steel question:

Mr. McCARTHY.

Take steel rails, of which I happen to know something, as I am a manufacturer of steel rails. I appeal to the Democrats of the House to join me in putting steel rails on the free list. The present duty on steel rails is $13.44 per ton, which is estimated to be equivalent to 50.44 per cent ad valorem. The committee have reduced this to 25 per cent. This seems like a great reduction. But it is only nominal, for 25 per cent is all the steel rail trust want. It is as good to them as 1,000 per cent, for it is practically a prohibitory duty.

Steel can be made here as cheaply as anywhere else in the world, and would not now be imported, save in exceptional cases, even if there were no duty; while the tendency of invention and improvement is in favour of the United States as against Europe. The steel made into rails in this country is from native ore. What pig metal, billets and blooms are imported are used entirely in other iron and steel manufactures. Now it costs less than $2 a ton to make steel rails from blooms, including straightening and punching. On to-day's market steel blooms are selling at less than $17; steel rails should, therefore, not bring over $19. They did fall nearly to that price a few weeks ago, during a temporary break in the steel rail pool. But that pool was quickly reorganized, and the price of steel rails was put up, and is now maintained at $24 a ton; so that by virtue of the duty which keeps out foreign rails, the pool is compelling the users of steel rails to pay them 25 per cent more than a fair price.

Mr. DALZELL. Does the gentleman speak now from the attitude of a steel rail manufacturer?

Mr. JOHNSON of Ohio. I do. Our mill makes about one-thirtieth of all that are produced in the United States.

This new steel rail pool is composed of seven manufacturers, headed by Carnegie, who absolutely control the product of more than one-half of the rolled steel produced in the United States, and who have combined together to pay other large manufacturers heavy annual sums to close their works, discharge their men, and make no steel.

Now, observe, the 25 per cent duty of the committee's bill is just as good to the steel rail pool as the greater nominal duty of the existing law, and will enable the pool to keep the price up to the highest point that they deem safe.

And so on dealing with that question.

Mr. DALZELL. Is the gentleman a party to the steel rail trust?

Mr. JOHNSON of Ohio. I am not; but whether I am or not would make no difference. Outside of this Hall, as a steel manufacturer, I might be perfectly willing to enter a trust, but I will not defend trusts here.

Then he goes on, after some discussion, and he produces the trust document which exists among these seven manufacturers, and by which the price is put up to $24, or 25 per cent beyond what he says is the fair cost of the manufactured goods. But I was not dealing with that part of the subject so much. I was drawn to it by the contradiction of the hon. gentleman. What I point out is that the experience of it all is that the price of these articles do not decrease, and that is exactly what was pointed out by the author of the book which I was reading from a moment ago. The experience everywhere is—and it is against this I desire to warn the House and the country—that the manufacturers do not decrease the prices. Why, look at the Wilson Bill, as modified in the Senate. These protected manufacturers in the United States, protected by a tariff of from 35 to 40 per cent—these manufacturing establishments, established for nearly a century, are crying out in the most piteous way as if they were absolutely ruined. Who has ever heard of a manufacturer saying that he had too much protection or being willing that the protection afforded him should be reduced? So that when Professor Fawcett, whose book I am reading from, makes this statement, we can all accept it:

There is no one more ready than I am to recognize the high authority of Mr. Mill as an economist, and I will at once admit that the arguments which he advances in favour of the imposition of protection in a young country would be conclusive if there were a reasonable probability that the conditions under which he supposes that such a protective duty could be imposed would ever be realized. It will be observed in the passage above quoted that he is most careful to explain that protection can only be justified as a temporary expedient; and every word which he says in support of protection rests on the supposition, that when an industry has been fairly established the protective duty will be at once voluntarily surrendered by those who are interested in the particular industry. It is, however, incontestably shown by what has happened in the United States and other countries where protection has been long established, that it is absolutely impossible to impose a protective duty under the stipulations on which Mr. Mill so emphatically insists.

Now, this was written in a series of lectures delivered at Cambridge in 1878, fourteen years ago; and its truth is incontestably shown by what has happened in the United States and other countries highly protected.

Whatever professions may be made by those who first asked for protection that it is only required for a limited period and that it is only needed to enable an industry to tide over the obstacles which may beset its first establishment, it is invariably found that when an industry has once been called into existence, those who are interested in it, whether as employers or employed, instead of showing any willingness as time goes on to surrender protection, cling to the security and aid which they suppose it gives their trade with increasing tenacity.

Every word of that written fourteen years ago is verified by what has been seen on the other side and is being confirmed and corroborated by what we are seeing around us to-day. Now, I have been taunted here by the hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean) that this country is only fit for a pastoral country, that I have placed the intelligence of Canadians at the lowest possible ebb, that I have denied their ability to compete as manufacturers, and that I have scorned the possibility of this becoming a manufacturing country. Sir, I have not hesitated, after giving the matter the fullest consideration, to state publicly elsewhere, and I am certainly not going to fail to state here the conclusion to which I have arrived on that subject. Sir, I believe Canada is an agricultural country; I believe, Sir, the great industry and the natural industry of this country is agriculture; and, if we looked at the question simply from a business point of view, and cast our eye over our great Dominion, with its scattered population, its enormous territory, its abundant resources, I think it will be clear to us that what we ought to do is to promote the natural industry of the country, instead of fettering it and crippling it. I deny, Sir, that within a reasonable time we can reasonably hope to become a great manufacturing country. Hon. gentlemen sneer at that. But is it not a fact? What is the possibility? A market of five millions of people, or, as the hon. member for South Oxford very correctly described it the other evening, not a market of five millions, but, on account of the enormous distances that separate different portions of our people, a market of not more than three and a half millions, is all that we can hope for. Is there a man in this House who expects that we shall be able to create manufactures in this country that can go beyond our borders and hold their own with the established industries of England, of the United States, and other lands? Is there even a possibility that that can be accomplished? We will have manufacturing industries; we will have towns and villages dependent upon our agricultural country, and we will have those industries which are the reasonable and proper growth of the surroundings to which I have referred. And, Sir, the attempt that we are making to establish manufacturing industries with the view of selling to our own people at an enhanced price, is, to my mind, the maddest project that any country ever engaged in. I say that, Sir, with the full knowledge of responsibility in that I had something to do with establishing the National Policy; I say that, with the full knowledge of responsibility that I did, in good faith, adopt the principles of protection in the early part of my political career. But, Sir, when I consider the whole position, when I consider what the farmers have accomplished, and are accomplishing without the aid of protection—

Mr. MULOCK. In spite of it.

Mr. McCARTHY. And in spite of it, as the hon. gentleman says; when I consider how the towns have grown to the extent that the country behind them can give them support, and that everything else is a mere fictitious growth which cannot long endure, and which must end in disaster—when I consider this, I hold that we ought to retrace our steps; we ought to give the farmers a chance, and not fetter them, hamper them, and destroy their resources as we have been doing in the vain hope of establishing sound industries by artificial means. I give hon. gentlemen who surround me every credit for candour in entertaining their beliefs, and I trust they will give me credit for the same in the views I hold. I do not say we can have no towns. Let me give an example. What town is growing better to-day than Winnipeg? It has passed the period of depression incident to its boom, and it now grows just as the country behind it grows; and will anybody say that the progress of Winnipeg is in any way due to manufacturing industries? What are our country towns throughout the whole Dominion dependent upon? How far do they grow, and where do they stop? They go on until they have attained sufficient development for the country upon which they are dependent, and you cannot force them beyond that. I do not mean to say that if you are successful in establishing in any particular locality a number of industries, you do not promote the prosperity of that locality. Just as the railway works in St. Thomas have increased the growth of St. Thomas in ten years, just as the works established at Stratford by the Grand Trunk Railway have helped the growth of Stratford; but these places grow to the point required by the country behind them, plus these special industries, and then stop, and you cannot put them beyond that. But what we have been doing is not with the hope—because we never had the hope, I suppose—that we should enable our cotton manufacturers, for instance, to compete in the open market. True, there is a little export of cotton to China. We do not know at what price it is exported. We do not know that it is sold at the same price as to the home consumer. We do not know that when Americans export to our country, they sell to us cheaper than to the home consumer, and, perhaps our export of cotton goods is made upon the same basis. The whole market of Canada consumes about $8,000,000 worth of cotton made at home, and about $3,000,000 or $4,000,000 worth made outside. We import, if my memory serves me right, somewhere about half as much as we manufacture, and it is on that import that we pay the 28 per cent duty to which the hon. Minister of Finance refers. The hon. Minister knows perfectly well that the kind that is imported is the kind upon which the lowest duty is charged, and that the kind upon which the high duty is charged is practically prohibited by the duty, and is not imported at all. So, I do not mean to say that we cannot have manufacturing industries. If I read these words correctly, we are bound to have them as we had them in 1871; and as they grew from 1871 to 1881, possibly under exceptional conditions with regard to the United States, so we will have them without a protective tariff, and we would then have them without burdening the mass of consumers of this country in the way they have been burdened for the last fifteen years.

Mr. MASSON. Mr. Speaker, I must certainly apologize for rising at this late hour, and at so late a period in the debate, to take part in what I think, notwithstanding the opinion of my hon. friend who has just sat down, has been an interesting discussion. I will promise the House this, that I will not detain hon. members long, and I will try to confine myself very closely to the remarks that have fallen from the hon. gentleman. I have no prepared essay, or even the material for one, to give to the House. I have taken a few notes of the hon. gentleman's speech, and to the points I have noted I will confine my remarks. I was pleased to hear the hon. gentleman state in his opening remarks that he had faith in the future of the country. But I was sorry when he closed his speech by decrying his country, by telling us that we need never hope that this country will be a manufacturing country, that we need never hope that this country will ever be anything else but an agricultural country. The sequel of these remarks can only be this: That, like every other purely agricultural country, we must remain a poor country. Never in the history of the world has there been a country devoted entirely to agriculture but it was a poor country. The people of such countries have been the hewers of wood and the drawers of water for the richer nations around them. They have sold in the cheapest market, and they have bought in the dearest; they had to send all their produce outside, and to bring in from outside everything they required. The whole benefit of mixed industry and the fostering of manufactures in a country is in this—that it brings the producer and the consumer nearer together, and the nearer these two can be brought together the better it is for both. Now, with the mixed industries of agriculture and manufacture that we have in this country, there is the benefit that the product of each is largely consumed in the country. In this connection, I would just refer to a remark that was made by the late speaker a little further on. He referred to the exports of this country in manufactured goods as compared with the exports of manufactured goods from England, saying that, while in England the increase of manufactured goods had been 12 or 13 per cent, in this country we had only increased a paltry one million and a half. Well, now, the hon. gentleman was a little ingenious in the way he put that. Lawyer-like, I am afraid he tries to make a strong case out of a weak one, and in this case he has resorted to rather an ingenious statement. Now, he takes the ratio in one case, and he puts the paltry one million and a half in the other. If it was proper to give the ratio of increase in Great Britain, why did he not give the ratio of increase here? Why, this paltry one and a half millions of increase in the products of manufactures in Canada was no less than 25 per cent, small as it was. But that is not the point that I think is of most importance. Let us remember that we have only been exporting a few years under this policy, fifteen years, perhaps thirteen years more correctly, or even less, so far as many of our manufactures are concerned. But during this short time we have increased our manufactures very materially; and, if we did not export a pound, we have increased them to such an extent that we largely supply the home market in many articles. Take the hon. gentleman's pet article of cotton. Why, the manufacture of cotton alone has increased to such an extent as to be now nearly double the large import that we used to make of cotton. So that, in considering the increase of our manufactures, we have to take account of the increase, not only of export, but of the output from the factories, whether that is consumed at home or exported. Now, the hon. gentleman, after having expressed his faith in the future of the country, became suddenly a prophet of evil, and declared that, in his belief, the balance of the next fiscal year would be on the wrong side. Well, I do not know that the hon. gentleman is much of an authority on matters of finance, or in the details of the tariff and their practical working out; therefore, I will not pursue that subject further. He next took up the subject of the public debt, which he told us was alarming. Now, the hon. gentleman to-night did not question the justice or the reasonableness of any of the expenditures which caused that debt. He has, on many other occasions, defended one and all these expenditures, and his silence on the subject to-night must be taken as a direct admission that he approves of every one of them. Well, in a new country, developing its resources, it is absolutely necessary to borrow money to do it. Had we not incurred this debt we never would have had the great public works and other improvements which we now possess, and which the hon. gentleman does not question, and never did question. He only threw out a slight hint to-night against the Canadian Pacific Railway; I do not know that he intended even to question the propriety of assisting the Canadian Pacific Railway, though, perhaps, his speech may be read in that way. Do the people of Canada, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, even in the province of Prince Edward Island, question the reasonableness of that expenditure? I think that enterprise is one that every Canadian should be, and every Canadian is, to-day proud of. But the hon. gentleman told us, that during these various years the taxes had increased from eleven millions to seventeen millions, to twenty-eight millions, to twenty-nine millions, and so on; while, he said, the debt of Great Britain had decreased. Well, now, that also is a very unfair comparison. We are a young country developing our resources as rapidly as our means will allow, pushing forward great public enterprises, and it is unfair to compare our increase of debt with that of England, an old country, in the time of peace, but most of whose debt was incurred in wars from time to time. War means an addition to the income tax; it is intended to meet the debt in a few years; so that, notwithstanding her long wars, the income tax of England, imposed from time to time, has kept down her war debts. That is the most direct tax that any nation can adopt. England resorted to it originally for war purposes, and she now continues it for other purposes. The hon. gentleman also made another unfair comparison, when he said that the ratio of the percentage of taxes was 31 per cent in England and 41 per cent here. He told us candidly enough that that includes a sinking fund in Canada, but he did not tell us that there is no such a thing as a sinking fund in England; therefore, it is quite unfair to make such a comparison. He made a reference to the Federal debt of the United States, but, as that subject has been frequently referred to before, and the argument which he used has been so often refuted, I will not occupy the time of the House in referring to it. It is very unfair to compare the federal debt of the United States with the debt of Canada; in the United States the debts incurred by the several states were never embraced in the federal debt, while our federal debt does include the debts of the old provinces. Another point the hon. gentleman referred to requires notice. He had to admit that this country was prospering, because the interest was reduced; but, said he, the interest was reduced the world over and we come in for our share. Is that strictly true? Have interests reduced very much in England? Have they reduced in England at anything like the rate they have in this country? Interests were always low in England, far back of the time the hon. gentleman was speaking of, and they are much the same to-day. But every farmer and every mechanic in the country knows that interest in Canada is a great deal lower than it was when the National Policy was introduced. How does the rate of interest in the United States compare with the rate of interest in Canada to-day? Has the rate decreased in the United States, as to farmers who are paying 10 per cent on time for their reapers and threshing machines, while our farmers would grumble at 6 per cent, and especially when they were asked 7 per cent on the second and third year. But farmers of the United States, when they ask for time on a similar class of machines, are obliged to pay 8, 9, and even 10 per cent. Yet the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) says no credit is to be given to the National Policy and no faith is to be placed in the prosperity of the country because the rate of interest has decreased here. There is no test of the prosperity of a nation or an individual so true as the rate of interest paid. If a private individual is in good circumstances, even when the rate of interest is high, he can obtain money at a cheaper rate than can other individuals in less fortunate circumstances. The credit of the country had an important bearing on the interest it pays, and the same reasoning applies to localities. But the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) addressed his principal argument to the changes in the new tariff. He told the House there were some 300 changes, and he asked what did they mean? He declared that they meant that the tariff is purely a manufacturers' tariff. If so, the hon. gentleman differs from the press of the country, the general feeling expressed by it being that this is a farmers' tariff. The hon. gentleman also declared that this is a manufacturers' tariff, and that the requirements of the consuming population had not been considered, and he threw out the suggestion, that it might possibly be a manufacturers' Government. What change has the hon. gentleman pointed out as showing that this is a manufacturers' tariff? The hon. gentleman admitted that specific duties had been taken off in many cases, and that where there were both specific and ad valorem duties imposed, the ad valorem duties had been allowed to remain, or a very small percentage of increase given. On the whole, taking the tariff as regards manufactured articles, any person who has gone into particulars, which I do not suppose has been done by the hon. gentleman, although he made a statement which he should not have made without careful consideration, must arrive at the conclusion that the chances are all, or nearly all, against the manufacturers. How about the position of the farmer? Are these changes all against the farmer's interest, or are any of them against him? If any of the changes are of that character, they are very few. The hon. gentleman has declared that the reduction in the tariff, as regards agricultural implements, is not sufficient. Is that reduction in favour of the farmer? It is, provided he can obtain agricultural implements any cheaper. I doubt very much whether the change will have that effect. I doubt very much whether the duty increased the price of agricultural implements one iota. My reason for doubting it is, that the only country with which we compete in agricultural implements, is the United States, and I know that implements were bought by Ontario farmers cheaper than by farmers in western New York. I, therefore, doubt very much whether, in Ontario at least, there will be any marked reduction. But the reduction was made, not for the farmers of Ontario, but for the benefit of the farmers in the North-west, and they probably will receive the full advantage of the reduction. If so, it is a change in favour of the farmer. Is the change in duty on salt in favour of the manufacturer and against the farmer. No. But I will not occupy the time of the House by passing these duties in review. At a later stage they will be dealt with in detail. According to my reading of the tariff and my estimation of its effect, it will prove to be a tariff favourable to the farmers. My belief is that it will be favourably received by the farmers, and that, in framing it, the Government have given the farmers their best consideration, and that the results of the operation of the tariff will prove beneficial, on the whole, to the farming community. The hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) agreed with the change proposed in many cases from specific to ad valorem duties. He alleged that the old tariff was on the whole one of specific duties, while the new tariff is on the whole one of ad valorem duties. There are one or two items in which the farmers are interested, where specific duties would be better, and at the proper time, when the items come before the committee, I will refer to them. The hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) afterwards proceeded with his second objection, namely, that this tariff discriminated against Great Britain. This argument, like all other arguments presented by the hon. gentleman, was copied almost verbatim from speeches to which we have listened from members of the Opposition during a number of years, during eight years in my case, and much longer in the case of the hon. gentleman. I do not think, however, that any hon. member ever put forward the statement so emphatically as it was presented by the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), and I will read a speech delivered by him outside of the House, in which he dealt with the same subject, when speaking in my constituency. The hon. gentleman said:

Why should we tax articles from Great Britain at a higher rate than those from the United States? Yet the loyal Canadians have put a tariff upon the statute-book which imposes a higher duty upon goods coming from England than on goods from the United States.

So strongly was that statement made that many farmers went away thinking there were two lists in the tariff, and that goods coming from the United States were charged at a certain rate, and those from Great Britain at a higher rate. The hon. gentleman did not want any farmers to go away with any other impression, for he added the following:—

The country which is prepared to stand by us receives this gratitude at our hands, the gratitude of loyal Canadians exemplified by placing a higher tariff on her goods than on those of the American.

That was a very emphatic statement. It was a condensed statement of what the leader of the Opposition and his followers have advanced before this country; but they have done it in a much fairer way, accompanying it with a statement showing how they arrived at that conclusion, showing by the total importation from the respective countries, that the dutiable imports were, on an average, higher in the case of Great Britain, not that one article was taxed higher. While their arguments and their deductions bear truth on their face, still we do not agree with them, nor has the country ever taken any particular stock in them. They know equally well—they do not require to be told in this House or anywhere else—that the imports from the United States are not the high manufactured articles, the luxuries, that come from England; and especially do they know very well that one of the largest revenue producing imports from Great Britain is spirits and such things. I think therefore that the hon. gentleman's statement that the present tariff discriminates against Great Britain is not worthy of his ability in setting forth a case. He should at least tell how he arrived at that statement, and not allow people to pass from his hearing, believing that there were actually two sets of duty. The hon. gentleman waxes eloquent over the English tea trade, and he tells us that in that one particular we discriminate against Great Britain. The tariff in force last summer and which he abused, discriminated in favour of Great Britain as against every other country not producing tea, and the change in this tariff only places Great Britain on a par with other countries; so that when he was abusing the tariff as discriminating against Great Britain, instead of there being items in that tariff that discriminated against Great Britain there were in it, and are to-day in it, items that discriminate in favour of Great Britain. The hon. gentleman then alluded to the embargo on our cattle and he would leave this House to understand that this embargo was brought about because Canada has discriminated against the mother country. The connection in which he makes the remarks, if not the remarks themselves, would warrant persons in coming to the conclusion that he intended it to go forth that the scheduling of the Canadian cattle was by reason of discrimination against Great Britain. He asked the question: How could we, while asking to have that embargo removed, discriminate against the tea trade of Great Britain. I think that every reader who has studied the question at all—perhaps the hon. gentleman has not—will agree with me when I say that the cause of that embargo is the fact that the English agriculturists are seeking protection. They are seeking to be protected in the most drastic manner possible against Canadian cattle by demanding that Canadian cattle shall be kept out of their country altogether. It is the existing distress amongst the agricultural classes of England that has roused them to fight for their interests and demand all the protection that they can get. Yes, the free trade farmers of Great Britain are to-day clamouring for more protection. Only a few days ago they had deputations waiting on the authorities, asking not only that the scheduling should continue against Canada, but that the cattle from every other country would be scheduled as well. The hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) then told us that our Government have slightly treated the offers made by the Wilson Bill as it goes to the Senate. Let me ask him: Are any offers made in that Bill which are not for the benefit of the Americans and for their benefit solely? Is it any very great benefit to Canadians that the Americans propose to open their markets for our pork, the United States being a country which produces and exports more pork than all the rest of the world.

Mr. McCARTHY. It does not offer that.

Mr. MASSON. Yes, the Bill did as brought down. Is it any great benefit to us that they should open their markets to our wheat and other grains, when they are exporting year after year far more of those products than Canada produces altogether. Even with our North-west as at present opened up, the Americans are exporting to-day twice as much wheat as we produce. The hon. gentleman says that we treated the American people slightly because we have offered to allow their corn free, if they do the same with regard to our barley. Let me remind him that our offer is not one sided, while every one of their offers to us is in favour of themselves. The free importation of corn would be a disadvantage to the farming class of Canada. I know that there is a difference of opinion as to that, but the understanding is that it would be a disadvantage to a large proportion of our farmers. We offer the United States free corn, provided they give us free barley. Free corn coming into our market would be an advantage to them, and our barley going free into their market would be an advantage to us. We are willing to give and take in our offers, while their offers to us in the matter of reciprocity have been, from the first, one-sided. There was another expression of the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) which struck me as rather remarkable and inconsistent on his part. He said: It is a pity that this revision of the tariff had not been postponed until the people had pronounced upon it. If my recollection is not very far wrong, the hon. gentleman on the floor of this House only last session declared, that the Government was afraid to bring down their tariff changes, and that they were derelict in their duty because they did not bring them down. He told the people of the country during his campaign last summer that the Government were only dallying with the people in sending their commissioners around, and he created some laughter in his references to the hon. gentlemen who were seeking information, just, as he said, to put the farmers off. How inconsistent is the hon. gentleman. Last session he blamed the Government for not bringing down their tariff changes; this summer he blamed them for making inquiries from the people, and now he blames them for making changes in the tariff before appealing to the people of the country. The hon. gentleman is as hard to please as members of the Opposition. If things are put off the Government is to blame; if things are brought before the House the Government is to blame; if they move to the right the Government is to blame; if they move to the left the Government is to blame; and I think we may fairly come to the conclusion that the hon. gentleman is "agin the Government." The hon. gentleman then goes on to assume that it is a settled question that the price of articles is increased to the full amount of the duty, and he went at some detail into figures which fall far short of proving any such contention. His quotation of the prices of cotton and woollen goods in England did not prove that the full advantage of the duty was taken; far from it, because there would always be the expense of transport, and the expense of handling, although the figures he gave did not come up to much more than the ad valorem duty, leaving the specific duty out of the calculation altogether. He dwelt with particular emphasis on the idea that woollen tweeds—I think he calls them tweeds, but most people would call them shoddy—purchased in England at 9 pence a yard were actually 100 per cent dearer in Canada. Now, when specific duties were put on these articles by weight, I think that it was the intention to keep out that shoddy. It was considered, whether rightly or wrongly, that the shoddy was no benefit to the farmer, and that he was only throwing away his money by purchasing it. But the hon. gentleman says that because the price was 100 per cent dearer in Canada than it was in England this 9-penny stuff, that the woollen manufacturers were taking the full benefit of the duty. However, the hon. gentleman had to face the fact, and he admitted it frankly, that the prices of many things had been reduced. But here he falls back upon what I admit to be the true criterion: he asks if prices have relatively come down? Are they lower in this country than in other countries? As compared with former prices, the prices are now lower in cotton and woollen goods, the two articles commented on, as compared with the prices in Great Britain at the time of the introduction of the National Policy. The fall in price has been greater in Canada than in Great Britain. Therefore the National Policy has been carrying out the intention of its founders in decreasing the relative prices of manufactured goods, while at the same time it has increased relatively to the farmers the prices of their grain. For instance, the price of wheat, as I have stated before in this House, was at the time of the introduction of the National Policy from 57 to 70 cents below the price in Liverpool, while now it is not more than 20 cents or 25 cents below. Our price used to be 20 cents or so below the New York price; now the two are on a par. Although the prices of grains have fallen, they have not fallen in Canada as much as they have in other countries. Relatively they are higher in Canada. Therefore, from both points of view, the outcome of the National Policy has been that manufactured goods have not increased in price, or if so, only temporarily, domestic competition having had the effect of reducing the price to a lower point than before; and, on the other hand, the increase of our home market has raised the prices of farm products. The hon. gentleman quoted from a very good authority on political economy, John Stuart Mill, who, however, wrote entirely from a free trade standpoint, as being the height of excellence; but even in that quotation it is stated that in a young country which is seeking to develop its industries, protection is justifiable for a short time. That was certainly a very great admission for a writer like John Stuart Mill to make, and it is no wonder that that admission has been quoted by protectionists so often. But what the hon. gentleman contends is that the time has now arrived for removing the protection. A few short years, he said, would be enough. The question was asked him, what was twelve years in the life of a nation, and the hon. gentleman asked in reply what has that to do with it? He said these things were not hereditary. Why, the very quotation he had just read stated that a new country, where manufacturers had to train their employees, could not compete against an old country where they were not only trained, but where their instincts in these matters were hereditary. So that there is something in the admission of John Stuart Mill, that those trades and the ability to do the work of those trades, are hereditary. But the hon. gentleman says that Canada should have reached that stage by this time—that twelve years of application of protection ought to be sufficient, and that now it should be wiped away. If I learn anything from the hon. gentleman's speech from beginning to end, it is that he thoroughly endorses the doctrine of the Opposition in favour of wiping out every vestige of protection; for that is his position. What country in the world ever succeeded in establishing its industries in twelve years? England took hundreds of years; the United States has taken a hundred years; France, Germany and other countries have taken a still longer time, and they are still standing by the principle of protection. The hon. gentleman tries to make sport of the statement of the hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean) by saying that he was wiping away by one fell stroke all the writings of John Stuart Mill and the other great political economists. Well, the hon. member for East York is not alone in that. Every civilized nation in the world (England only excepted) has done the same thing. They have all wiped away with one stroke the doctrines of John Stuart Mill and the other free traders. The hon. gentleman then quoted from a number of manufacturers—for what purpose I know not. He tried to show that they were not satisfied with the changes. The Massey-Harris Company he quoted as saying that they could not make their goods any cheaper. That was not in the line of the hon. gentleman's argument, and for what purpose he quoted it I do not know. The Massey-Harris Company had reduced their prices year by year, which I believe all honest manufacturers do, especially where there is competition such as there has been in agricultural implements. Increased production also tends to reduce prices. The example has been frequently given, of a man working at his bench and turning out in a week a dozen articles of a certain class. He sells that dozen for $12, on which, counting his own time as worth $1 a day, he makes only $1 each. The next year he increases his establishment and gets a little better machinery, so that, instead of turning out one dozen, he turns out two dozen a week and sells them at a reduction, but makes more money. He brings in improved machinery, which enables him to turn out ten dozen a week, which he sells at half the price of the others, and makes double the money, making less on each article, but more on his whole output. He increases his establishment until he is turning them out by the thousands, and instead of making a dollar on each, he makes only 10 cents on each, but he is making his millions. That is the way the consumer in the country gets the benefit of fostering an industry so as to enable it to produce a larger output; and when the consumer is getting that benefit in the way of lower prices, he is indirectly reaping an advantage from the policy that was framed to protect the manufacturers. But the hon. gentleman asks why cannot the United States, that have been protected so long, compete against England. The first answer I will give is that they do compete against England in very many articles, and in the matter of iron, on which the hon. gentleman dwelt at some length, they have been for some time competing with the English manufacturer and that competition is growing. But why do they not sell in their home market as cheaply as the iron could be laid down there from England, at the cut prices which England would give to get in there? The hon. gentleman read an article which gave the answer to that, in which it was said that there was a pool that controlled the price. The other reply is that it is not part of the American policy that American labour should compete with the cheap labour of Great Britain. Their tariff is intended to prevent the products of the cheap labour of Great Britain and Europe coming into their market. If they did, the price of labour in the United States would go down. And we hear the cry raised, even in free trade England, against the competition of the cheap labour of Belgium and other European countries. Therefore if the American manufacturers do not compete in the home market and sell as cheaply as they do in England, it is because they are paying much higher for their labour and consequently ask more for their iron, but their output is so great that they can afford to throw their extra production into the markets of England in competition with English goods.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The protection on iron is in excess of the whole amount of wages in the United States.

Mr. MASSON. That statement, I suppose, is about on a par with the hon. gentleman's statement to which I was just going to refer, that in the case of the cotton industry, the people paid the whole cost of running the machines and gave all the profits to the manufacturer. I think it would tax the ingenuity of the hon. gentleman to figure that out very closely. Further, the hon. gentleman says that the question for us to consider is what are the benefits and what are the disadvantages, and he says that so far the burden has far overrun the advantages, and the consuming classes are suffering in consequence. Now, that is so closely on a par with the statement made by the hon. gentleman in this House last session, in which he went into an example of that kind, and which he repeated in my constituency this summer, that I will read from the report of his speech on that occasion. He was speaking to the farmers, and he told them they received some benefit from the National Policy. He said, that but for it there would be about $12,000,000 worth of grain brought into the country. That has been the case before and would be again, and that would drive out of the country twelve million dollars worth of grain, which would go out at a loss. I will give the hon. gentleman's words :

What do you gain by keeping the twelve millions of American produce out of your markets? On twelve millions worth you would have to send to a foreign market, you would lose ten per cent.

What does it amount to. It comes, you farmers, to $1.70 per head, and what are you paying to save that loss? The benefit of keeping the Americans out of your market is that you gain $1.70 a head.

Then he went on to tell them that they were paying through the nose for it, and he proceeded to enlarge upon the subject. He told them there were 730,000 farmers, and that 12 per cent on $12,000,000—the amount of grain that would have to seek a foreign market—only amounted to $1.70 per head. He admits that the introduction of that grain would lower our market 10 per cent. But does he imagine that that 10 per cent would only be upon the amount exported. Does he mean to say that the miller in this country will pay a higher price than was given for that exported. The miller will buy as cheap as he can, and the decrease would not be on the $12,000,000 grain brought in but upon the $400,000,000 worth, being the value of the grain product of Canada according to the hon. gentleman. So that the loss of 10 per cent instead of being only $1,200,000 would be $40,000,000—a tidy little sum for the farmers to lose these hard times. But that is not all. The hon. gentleman takes his $400,000,000 from statistical returns no doubt. But what about the cheese, pork, and beef, and the other articles on which the farmer would lose directly if flooded with Armour's beef and pork and other American articles. So that, adding to the farmers' loss on grain what they would lose on their cheese, butter, pork, beef, and other articles, the amount would be so great that the farmers would be very glad to save it. Now, the hon. gentleman admits that protection dies hard. He says that free trade would not have been obtained in England but for the Irish famine. Perhaps the hon. gentleman has, at some former time, considered the cause of that Irish famine. Perhaps he will recollect that shortly prior to that, the tariff wall between England and Ireland had been broken down by the Union. Five millions of Ireland's operatives had to succumb to the competition of English manufacturers. These men were, one after the other, dismissed from service and the factories were shut down. They then betook themselves to agriculture, as the hon. gentleman would have Canadian manufacturers do to-day. Then rents went up, the competition in land was a benefit to the landlord, the famine in the potato crop capped the climax, and those who had not sought refuge in other countries were dying by thousands of famine. It was just the tariff changes that started the trouble. These changes put them out of employment, made them resort entirely to agriculture, and when agriculture failed they had to starve.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Then we should have protection among the provinces according to that view.

Mr. FOSTER. That is a non sequitur.

Mr. MASSON. But the hon. gentleman says the farmers have submitted to all these things because they were not interested. I suppose the hon. gentleman speaks his honest belief. I know he never took any very active part in many constituencies among the farmers. He made some nice speeches occasionally in large centres where very large audiences could be had. But I do not know that he ever went about outside his own constituency, or very much even there, or that he ever had very much opportunity to ascertain what interest the farmers took in these matters. In all the constituencies that I have ever visited, meeting the farmers, I found them very much interested; and I know that we can trace our changes in the various elections to changes in the farmer vote. This is true of constituency after constituency. And what causes the change? The farmers have these matters explained to them; and they get enlightened on the subject and they change in favour of protection. And in the last general elections, and in the bye-elections that followed, I can assure the hon. gentlemen, the farmers did take a very active interest in the duty on pork and meats. One complaint of the hon. gentleman against protection was, that it could not be fair. He said that it was impossible to have a fair protective system, that one man's raw material was another's finished product, and that, therefore, one man would get his raw material free and the other had to take his with the duty; consequently it was impossible to have fairness. It may be that that would be one of the difficulties the hon. gentleman would have to overcome if he were framing a tariff. I have no doubt the Minister of Finance thoroughly understands the difficulties that arise in this connection. And how far has he succeeded in overcoming them? I believe the manufacturers, as a rule, will be satisfied that the Finance Minister has overcome this difficulty. He has certainly overcome it in a different way from that adopted in the tariff Bill in the United States. In that Bill they started with duties on raw material and went on higher and higher, piling up a perfect pyramid of duties, the higher the protection on raw material, the higher being protective duties on the articles produced from it, amounting at last almost to prohibition on many articles. In the tariff we are now discussing, another method has been adopted—that of lowering the duty all round, placing it on an ad valorem basis and giving an advantage to the manufacturers using partly manufactured goods, to enable them to compete in the finished article. In some cases we had arrangements made under which special articles might be imported free for manufacturing purposes, and, in the iron schedule, one of these difficulties was met by the granting of a bounty as a means of giving a protection or benefit to the manufacturer of articles that enter largely, as raw material, into other articles. Now, Mr. Speaker, I have followed, in about the order adopted by the hon. gentleman, the various subjects to which he spoke. I left out the long dissertation he gave on the census returns. I think the question of the census returns and the application of their lessons to the population and the increase of prosperity of the country has been threshed out so frequently that I shall not attempt to say anything on the subject. It would be useless at this late period of the debate to analyze the census returns. Much time as the hon. gentleman took up, I do not think he gave the House any real light on the subject. It matters not what the census returns may be; the question whether this country is prospering or not, is best answered by the people themselves. Here in this House, and throughout the length and breadth of the land, we have had repeated by hon. gentlemen opposite, and by the hon. member who has just taken his seat, the statement that the country was going to the dogs; that the farmers were poor and tax-ridden. Well, now, I appeal to the farmers themselves to say whether they are as poor, whether they are as highly mortgaged as they were; whether they pay the interest they used to pay; whether they are not paying off their mortgages; whether they are not increasing the size of their farms and of their barns; whether they are not improving their houses both inside and out; whether they are not better dressed; whether they do not live more comfortably than they did twenty years ago? These are questions the farmers can answer for themselves. Great changes have come over them in the markets for grain, there can be no doubt. They used to have all their money come into their hands near the end of the year. All the money received in the course of twelve months would come in within one month, and thus they had a large sum in hand at one time. But there were store bills to be met, and interest on mortgages and taxes to pay, and, in many cases, though the sum received in hand was large, they soon found a way of disposing of it. But, having paid off these things, very often they were able to lay by a tidy sum, and this they did though they had to stint themselves for the rest of the year. In those days, no doubt, many farmers laid by money who do not lay it by to-day. The money came to them in large sums, and they were tempted to deposit it although they and their wives and sons and daughters suffered the deprivation of many things they would like to have had, until the next crop was sold. Now their money comes in in spring and summer and fall and winter, from various industries in which they are engaged, from their cattle, sheep, pork and many other sources from which they formerly did not expect to receive any revenue except at one particular season of the year. Their cheese and butter and other things are a constant source of supply. So, all things considered, the farmer actually receives more cash now than he did in the time the hon. gentleman refers to, and, if they do not reap the benefit by having money in the bank, they reap the benefit by better living, better clothing, better furniture in their houses. No person who knew the country twenty years ago can drive through to-day without seeing that there has been a vast change for the better. As to the artisans and the employees of manufacturers, we leave them to answer for themselves. They know they are better off, even if they have to pay a little more for some things they buy from the farmer. They are ready to pay these increased prices, because they have, not only better wages, but steadier wages. That is the great matter with the working classes—to have steady wages. High wages they wish for, but, whatever the wages may be, they must be steady. Therefore, I think the hon. gentleman's statements regarding the country cannot be borne out by the fact. I thank you, Mr. Speaker, and I thank the House for the hearing you have given me, and I apologize for having taken up so much time.

Mr. EDWARDS. Mr. Speaker, I can promise that, if the remarks I have to address to the House have no other merit, they will at least be brief. The hon. gentleman who has just spoken, in closing his remarks, tried to show that the country was prosperous. Sir, I will not undertake to say that the country is not in some measure prosperous, neither will I undertake to say that under high protection this country may not be prosperous, nor will I undertake to say that at all times under free trade would this country be prosperous; but I will undertake to say that under a system of free trade this country would be more uniformly prosperous than under a protective system. I think the House will agree with me that the speech made by the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) was not at all answered by the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat; however, I have taken notes of a few of the remarks made by the hon. gentleman, to which I will briefly refer. In the beginning of his speech he said that the member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) had wound up his speech by decrying his country. How did he decry his country? He decried his country, if at all, by simply saying that this country was fundamentally an agricultural country. I also say that this country is fundamentally an agricultural country. It is first of all an agricultural country; next in importance comes the product of its forest; next its fisheries, and next its mines. But while I say this I do not deny that this country may be to a fair extent a manufacturing country under existing conditions. In considering a question of this kind we have to take into account our geographical conditions, and our climatic conditions, and the fact that this country extends for 4,000 miles along the northern border of the great republic to the south of us, is, in my opinion, to some extent against us. Why is it against us? Because we have not got the market to the south of us in which to sell our manufactures. Mr. Speaker, I have some knowledge of this country and its capabilities, and I will say this, and say it fearlessly, that if I were a manufacturer of anything that can be produced in this country I would fear nobody to the south of us, if I had that market in which to sell; but with the restricted market that we have, it is ridiculous to say that we can ever become a great manufacturing country. It is true, as the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) said, that we will have a certain number of manufactures, that the home market will support a certain number of manufacturing industries. Now, it is not the manufactures that are natural to the country that we complain of, it is the manufactures that are not natural to the country, and have to be artificially supported. The very worst kind of protection is that which brings about such a condition of things as that the raw material from other countries is imported into this country free of duty, while a high protection is placed upon the manufactured article, giving to those engaged in those industries the market to themselves, and enabling them to fleece the producers of the natural resources of the country. The hon. member for North Grey (Mr. Masson) said that a country that was essentially an agricultural country always remained a poor country, and that the people were hewers of wood and drawers of water for the richer classes. Now, Sir, I want to know where, if a country was a poor one under those conditions, would he get his richer classes? That is exactly the case in Canada. The producers of the natural resources of the country are hewers of wood and drawers of water, supporting in our midst manufactures that never should have existed in Canada. I would ask him, where is the wealth of Canada if it is not among the agricultural classes? If he will study the statistics and look at the wealth of the farmers, the value of the farms and the belongings thereto, he will find that the farmers of Canada possess the largest share of the wealth of this country, but it is distributed among a great many, while we have a few manufacturers who are fattening at the expense of the farmers. The hon. member for Grey (Mr. Masson) said that the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) had not shown that the manufacturers' interests were in any way improved by the revised tariff that has been laid before the House. Well, if the speech made the other evening by the hon. member for North Ontario (Mr. Edgar) is correct, and I believe it is correct, he has conclusively shown that the interests of the cotton combine have been very much improved by the revised tariff, and I think it will also be shown on investigation that the sugar interests of this country have been improved by the new tariff, taking into account the molasses and syrups, and other products of this industry. Now, Sir, to show the importance of the agricultural interests of Canada, I will quote from the statistics of 1893. The exports of the farms of 1893 amounted to $53,785,989, showing conclusively that the farmer above all others contributed largely to the prosperity and to the wealth of this country. What is the farmer's position. The products of the farm are sold in foreign countries in competition with the products of the world. But is that all? Before the farmer exports, he first feeds the people of this country, feeds even these very manufacturers of whom we complain, and then he contributes more to the exports of the country to pay foreign indebtedness and for our imports from abroad than do all other classes put together.

Mr. EDWARDS.

His wheat, barley, coarse grains, cheese, butter, beef, in fact all his products, I say, are sold in the markets of the world and in competition with those of other countries. Has the farmer any protection?

Mr. CAMERON. Yes.

Mr. EDWARDS. I deny that he has any protection on any article whatever except pork.

Mr. CAMERON. And on butter.

Mr. EDWARDS. He has not one cent of protection on butter.

Mr. CAMERON. He has 4 cents a pound.

Mr. EDWARDS. No. The Canadian farmer produces a surplus of butter, as also does the United States farmer, and his butter is sold in the foreign markets. Can it be contended for a moment that he has any protection? No. It is a snare, a delusion and an insult to the intelligence of the farmers to say that they have any protection.

Mr. CAMERON. He is protected by the duty on butter.

Mr. EDWARDS. He has no protection on butter, or on his wheat, or his cheese, on nothing but one article; that is pork, and that is a very doubtful protection indeed. It is more a packers' protection than a farmers' protection. How does the farmer supply his wants? He buys his supplies under two conditions: First, he pays duties on the articles imported and not manufactured in this country; second, he pays a higher tribute to certain manufacturers on articles the raw material of which is imported free of duty, and high protection is placed on the manufactured articles. Is that justice to the great producing classes of this country? No. I would forgive ignorant men who know no better and believe in a policy of protection: but, judging the subject from my standpoint and honest belief, if I voted for any such principle, I would feel that I was committing a high crime as against the great producing classes of the people. I desire now only to refer simply to the question of cotton and sugar, because they are more readily understood by the people generally. It would pay the farmers and the consuming classes better to give $400 a year to each person engaged in those industries and close them up. We would be better off in two ways: First, we would get our necessaries in those lines cheaper; and, second, a large amount which now goes into the pockets of the manufacturers would go into the public Treasury. I will not pretend to say that protection on wheat and some other articles may not have local effect. That may be quite true. I can understand how, under protection, wheat grown in the west and sent to the east, under the greater competition for freight on the other side of the line, can be taken more cheaply by that route than by the Canadian route, and the result, under those conditions, would be that eastern buyers and consumers would pay higher prices, but the farmers who produce the wheat do not get one cent additional for it. What is our next largest item of exports? It is the exports of the forest, amounting in value to $27,669,134 for 1893. I should like any hon. gentleman opposite to show me by what means the lumber industry is in any way protected. It is not protected. The lumbermen occupy precisely the same position as do the farmers. Next to the farmers they contribute more to the public Treasury than do any other classes. How is the lumberman treated? The material he exports is sold in the markets of the world in competition with the products of other countries. How does he buy? Exactly as the farmer, and the lumberman has no protection. The same remark applies to the fisheries and to our mines. I will not say it applies as fully to them, but in a very marked degree it applies to them. The total exports of these four classes of products amounted in 1893 to the value of $95,538,063. What are the exports of our manufactures? They amounted in 1893 to $6,374,375. Yet it is pretended by hon. gentlemen opposite, that by the establishment of manufacturing industries here, the value of farmers' products is thereby enhanced. I deny any such proposition. Just so long as we have a surplus to export, our prices are fixed by the prices obtained in the foreign markets, and not by anything sold in our own markets. The Finance Minister, in his Budget speech, referred to the benefits of the tariff as regards labour. I claim that this question of labour is the foundation of the whole matter. I deny in toto that the condition of the labourer can be improved by any system of protection. Trade is nothing more or less than the exchange of the products of labour. Labour is the foundation of all wealth, and each country has resources that are natural to it, and the people of each country are best employed in producing what is natural to the country, and exchanging their surplus products with other countries. Let us take, for instance, the manufactures of cotton and of sugar. Can it be pretended for one moment that the labour engaged in these industries receives any higher wages because of protection? Not at all. Can any system of protection keep out labour from any part of the world? Not at all. The price of labour is fixed, as is the price of any other commodity, by the law of supply and demand. If there are two men wanting employment and only one employer, the employer will fix the rate of wages; if only one man needs employment and there are two employers to engage him, then the labourer fixes the rate of wages. It is simple nonsense to say that under any system of protection the price of labour is enhanced one single fraction, and I firmly and honestly believe that there is no class in the world that is injured so greatly by protection as is the labouring class. Now, if a man is a producer and an exporter through the instru-mentality of his labour, and his surplus products are sold in the markets of the world, how can he be enriched by placing a duty on the articles which he buys and which are imported into this country. It is preposterous, it is ridiculous to contend that, and it is time that every protectionist should wipe out of his mind the nonsensical idea that protection enhances the price of labour. While I claim that this country is first an agricultural country, next a lumbering country, next a fishing country, and next a mining country, I also claim that a certain number, and a very large number of legitimate manufactures could be maintained here. But they can only be maintained as the agricultural industry, and the lumber industry, and the other industries that are natural to the country are prosperous. It is my firm belief that under free trade the development of our natural resources would be far greater than they are to-day, and consequently I believe that we could maintain a great many more manufactures than we have at the present time. If in 1878 the system had not been changed, and had we continued as we then were under a revenue tariff, I believe that the development of Canada would be far greater by this time. It is much easier to build up a protective system than it is to remove it, and that difficulty is perhaps being found out now. Free trader as I am, and much as I am opposed to protection, I would not remove very suddenly even our present protective system.

Mr. CAMERON. Hear, hear.

Mr. EDWARDS. I will tell the hon. gentleman why I would not do so. It is because that in 1878 the people of this country committed themselves to a policy of protection, and under that system certain industries have been built up and large investments have taken place, investments that to-day are perhaps depending upon our banks, and in which many individuals in this country have sunk all that they possess. As I understand the position of the two political parties in this country it is this: The Conservative party adheres firmly to the principle of protection and nail their flag to the mast on that principle. We on this side of the House advocate the principle of free trade, but considering the conditions of the country, considering the industries that have been built up under this system of protection, we do not—I do not at least, and I am speaking for myself now—I do not believe that it would be well with a scratch of the pen to wipe out these industries and to bring upon this country immediate commercial disaster. I believe that the people of this country are tired of protection, and that they desire to have that system wiped out just as soon as they can, but I do not think it would be right for any party to say that they will do away with it at once. But, Mr. Speaker, I do say that we should wipe it out just as quickly as we can. It is my honest conviction that no class in the country is satisfied with the present tariff. I know that a large number of the manufacturers are dissatisfied with it; I do not believe that the farmers are satisfied, I do not believe that the consuming masses of the people are satisfied with it, and I do think that under this tariff a very grave wrong has been done the commercial classes. I believe that when large imports have been brought into the country and duties paid, it was a very unfair thing to reduce materially the tariff on these goods. It is my opinion that it should be done by a sliding scale. I do not believe that it should be done suddenly, although I do believe that in the best interests of the country it should be done as rapidly as possible. Now, if a change had not taken place in the minds of the people with regard to this fiscal system, would we have among us to-day the Patrons of Industry? I think we would not. What are both the Conservative and the Liberal Patrons of Industry claiming now? They are contending for precisely the same thing that the Liberal party of this country have been contending for for many years. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that the consuming masses of this country, those who develop its natural resources and produce its wealth, will never be satisfied until the change has been brought about, and until we finally arrive at what I consider the best condition of things not only for this country, but for all other countries in the world, that of free trade.

Mr. CARGILL. Mr. Speaker, at this late hour of the evening and at this stage of the debate, I could not possibly expect to give to the House very much new matter on this question. I do not propose following in the line of any of the speakers who have preceded me. I just want to narrate a few facts from a business point of view, and to give you a few of the observations which I have taken while carrying on my own business for a number of years past. It is very unfortunate from a layman's point of view that we have so many legal gentlemen in this House. These gentlemen are supposed to be able to fill any position in the country. I am very sorry that I did not become a lawyer myself. However, they are liable to change their minds. The hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) was some years ago a very zealous advocate of the National Policy; but his peculiar training in the legal profession has caused him to change. In taking up cases for clients, if they have not a very good case, these legal gentlemen sometimes persuade their client to give it up; but if they are offered a pretty good fee for their services, the client may succeed in inducing them to take hold of the case and prosecute it in their behalf. In that way a client can enlist the services of almost any solicitor in the country. Although they have not a very strong opinion as to the probability of their succeeding in the case, they will at least undertake it, and before they get through prosecuting it in the court, they persuade themselves that their client was right after all. The hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), a very able lawyer, and a gentleman for whom I have the greatest respect, has been a success in his particular sphere in life; but as a politician I am afraid he will never be able to succeed. Now, why has this change come across the hon. gentleman? I think probably the fee necessary to retain him in fealty to his political friends has not been sufficient, and for that reason he has seen fit to leave the party. I have no doubt in my mind that if he had received what he was in quest of, he would still be a strong Conservative and as strong a supporter and advocate of the National Policy as he was in 1878. Now, Mr. Speaker, the history of protection, not only in this country, but in all other countries, has been pretty fully gone into, and at this late stage in the debate I can scarcely ask the House to listen to any remarks that I may make upon it. However, I have not risen to-night for the purpose of edifying or instructing those who are here, but for the purpose of talking to my constituents in East Bruce. That appears to be the practice of the representatives who have come here. But I am an exception to the general rule; and I hope that the House will be kind enough to listen to me until I get through, because I do not very often ask for this privilege. Now, I have always been a zealous advocate and supporter of the National Policy from its inception. I as firmly believe in that policy to-day as I did in 1878. I believe it has developed the national resources of this country and built up various manufacturing industries throughout the country. I have no reason to change my mind with regard to that policy, although I believe that the circumstances of a country change and that the legislation in the interest of the country necessarily has to keep pace with its changed circumstances. For that reason I can see nothing wrong or improper in the Government attempting to revise the tariff. I commend the Government for the revision that they have made. I commend them for the way in which they have acquired information to enable them to arrive at proper conclusions as to the changes necessary in the interest of the country. They have put themselves to a great deal of expense and inconvenience in going throughout the length and breadth of the country in order to acquire this information. Although the proposition was ridiculed last session by our opponents, I am satisfied that they feel to-day as we do, that it was the best course that could possibly be pursued. Having acquired that information, I believe that the Government have brought down a revision of the tariff which will result beneficially to all classes of the community, and commend itself to the people at large. Therefore, I think that it deserves not only the hearty support of every supporter of the Government, but that it will be in accord with the sentiments of many of the gentlemen occupying seats on the Opposition benches. Now, we had a reciprocity treaty with the United States from 1854 to 1866. Canada was well satisfied with that treaty; while the United States was not, and they brought about an abrogation of it. Frequent attempts have been made since then to bring about a renewal of this treaty. The authorities at Washington have been approached by both Canadian political parties, at different times, for the negotiation of a reciprocity treaty or to obtain a renewal of the reciprocity treaty which existed from 1854 to 1866. From 1873 to 1878 we had the Reform party in power in this country. Since they relinquished power in 1878, they have been in the habit of making certain charges against the present Government for not bringing about certain reforms which, they say, are necessary. It is wonderful to me that, during those five years when they were in power, when they did not carry on any public work in the country, when they were not handicapped by large expenditures of public money, when they had no large contracts on hand, they did not see their way to making those reforms. They were interested chiefly in connecting water stretches and building important lines of road for the purpose of ultimately getting the produce out of Manitoba and the North-west to the East. I have often thought, if their scheme had been carried into effect, what an admirable one it would have been. How would they carry out the millions of bushels of grain produced in that immense country during the winter season? I presume they would have put the trains on skates and in this way got them over these water stretches. That is the only way I can conceive of by which they could transport produce during the winter season. Now, when the National Policy was being advocated, previous to 1878, our opponents, the Reformers, took a great deal of exception to it. I remember that in connection with my own business, the lumber industry, it was predicted by the Reformers that it would ruin that industry. Well, as you, Mr. Speaker, are a practical lumberman, I think you will bear me out in my assertion that at no time in the history of this country previous to 1878 have the lumber interests been so profitable to those engaged in them as it has been subsequently. Consequently the predictions of the hon. gentlemen as to that industry were fallacious. I might say that they predicted, as a duty was being imposed upon saws, axes, rubber belting and everything necessary for carrying on the manufacture of lumber, and as no protection was afforded lumbermen, that industry would necessarily be ruined. Now, the outcome of the whole thing is that to-day we are buying our axes, saws and rubber belting, and all supplies required for the manufacture of lumber, at a good deal lower rates than we did previous to 1878. That was brought about by the establishment of some industries in this country which grew up under the fostering care of the National Policy, and produced largely the articles at home which we formerly imported from the United States; and to-day we all know very well that these things are purchased 50 per cent cheaper than they were in 1878. Now, I think that the thanks of this House are due to the Government for their courage. The Opposition predicted that the Government dare not revise the tariff, because they were dependent upon the votes of the manufacturers in this country. Therefore, I think the thanks of the people of this country are due to the Finance Minister for the very courageous step which the Government have taken in bringing about a reduction of the tariff. We all know that when the Government announced last year that they intended going round the country and obtaining this information, how the proposition was ridiculed by our opponents, especially by the hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Pater-son). I was very much amused at the way in which he minimized the efforts of the Government to get at the real facts by going round and interviewing the different manufacturers, and in which he pointed out the time it would take to obtain all these details. He did it very nicely, as he always does, for he makes a very nice speech whenever he gets on his feet. I consider that this revision of the tariff is certainly in the interest of the farmer, because all the protection previously afforded him has been retained. If the reduction in other duties, as hon. gentlemen opposite have always contended, would be in the interest of the farmer, then I claim that besides all the reductions made, the farmer has the advantage of the protection which he previously had. Therefore, I say that the change is certainly in the interests of the farmer. Now, I think I might refer briefly to the hon. gentleman who had the privilege of leading the great Reform party of this country for years, who was certainly an ornament to the party, and an able debater and orator—I refer to the Hon. Edward Blake. I think if he had a seat in this House to-day, we would be entitled to his support on this revision of the tariff. Mr. Speaker, you will remember that Hon. Edward Blake went about the country addressing the people, and had large meetings in different sections of the country. You will remember that he stated that the requirements of this country were of such an extensive character that no material reduction could take place in the tariff, and, consequently, the manufacturers had nothing to fear if they reposed their confidence in him and his colleagues and placed them on the Treasury benches, which he hoped they would do, which he expected they would do in a few days. He not only said he was voicing the sentiments of his party, but he took the privilege of specially coupling with his statement the name of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). He said that his opponents were so fond of quoting that hon. gentleman as being hostile to the National Policy that he specially included the hon. member for South Oxford. Now, I think the revision of the tariff made to-day is all the reduction that can possibly be made while still affording sufficient revenue to meet the requirements of the country. Consequently, I say that we are just in line with the policy advocated by Hon. Edward Blake in 1887. One year later, the hon. member for South Oxford introduced his resolution in this House in favour of commercial union or unrestricted reciprocity. Now, in 1887 the Hon. Edward Blake pledged himself to the people of this country that if they entrusted him with a seat on the Treasury benches, no material change would take place in the tariff; and when, one year thereafter, he, as leader of the party—as he was at that time, I think—permitted his party to come down with a resolution in favour of unrestricted reciprocity, thus wiping out, as I hold, all the manufacturing interests of this country, I do not think it was a very commendable procedure. Hon. gentlemen opposite have made very many promises at different times. I must confess that I have very little confidence in their fulfilling any promises they give to the people of this country. Now, they say we have stolen their clothes. Well, if we have stolen their clothes, the gentlemen should appreciate their own uniform. And, as we have reduced the tariff considerably, in accordance, as they say, with their policy, and that at their instance, I do not see why they should remain away from us any longer, why they should not commend us for what we have done, join hands with us and assist us in carrying on the affairs of this country, and let us live more harmoniously together than we have done in the past. Now, I think, Mr. Speaker, that, taking into consideration the radical change that has been made in the tariff of this country, considering the systematic way in which it has been done, very little confusion has taken place in the affairs of the country. I do not know that in Canada to-day business has been retarded at all. At least no disturbance has been perceptible to me. For my part, I have been going on in my usual way and doing business as comfortably and as profitably, and as much of it, as I did before there was any word of reducing the tariff. Now, I consider that, when you take this into consideration and compare it with the state of things which exists and which has existed for some time past in the United States in anticipation of the revision of the tariff, the people of Canada have great reason to be joyful over the little commotion which has been caused in this country. I hope that, under the present tariff, our people will go on and prosper as they have been doing. Now, hon. gentlemen opposite deny that they have ever advocated unrestricted reciprocity. They go in for free trade. A little while ago it was freer trade. I have a letter here, published in the 'Week,' which is an independent paper. It is a criticism of several letters written to the 'Globe' by the Hon. James Young. I believe they were written at the request of the Reform party. Mr. Young was formerly a very prominent Reformer, but when his friends took to the fad of commercial union and unrestricted reciprocity, like Hon. Edward Blake, he could not follow them any further, and cut himself loose from his party. Now, if the House will pardon me, I will just read that letter:

Mr. Young is a prominent Reformer, who, like most of the business men of his party, was too intelligent to accept the policy of unrestricted reciprocity or commercial union, into which the wily Mr. Wiman entrapped the coterie of lawyers who control the organization and policy of their party: Messrs. Laurier, Cartwright, Davies, Edgar, etc. For several years these gentlemen advocated, on the floor of Parliament, on the platform and through the press, this policy of American birth and tendency, and assiduously contended that the salvation and prosperity of the Dominion depended upon its adoption. They hoped that they, as its prophets, would be entrusted with its inauguration. Unfortunately for themselves, it was found, as the discussion on the question proceeded, that the disadvantages which they had overlooked outweighed all the advantages which they could claim. The anticipated favour and support which they looked for failed to materialize, and its promoters would willingly have consented that their policy and their speeches should be forgotten or forgiven. Something new in the shape of a party policy had to be found. Warned by their previous failure, the leaders shunned the responsibility of the formation of a new platform, and summoned a mass convention of the faithful, to be held at Ottawa, to accept without discussion the resolutions which the machine should prepare for them. There was no reference to commercial union or unrestricted reciprocity. These questions were quietly shelved, and the leaders were condemned to submit to the tacit disapproval of their advocacy of a policy of which their party had become ashamed. The platform of the party on commercial questions was embodied in the following resolutions:

(1.) A revenue tariff restricted to the needs of honest, economical and efficient government, and so arranged as to promote freer trade with the whole world, more particularly with Great Britain and the United States.

(2.) Negotiations for a reciprocity treaty to be entered into with the United States, including a well-considered list of manufactures, said treaty to receive the assent of Her Majesty's Government, without whose approval no treaty can be made.

The first resolution is vague enough, in the "go-as-you-please" order, that would admit of the assent of thousands who differ very materially in their opinions as to what a "revenue tariff" really means. The words, "more particularly Great Britain," in the first resolution, and all the words after "manufactures" in the second resolution, convey a direct rebuke to those Reform leaders, who had for some years previously been constantly depreciating the value of our trade with the mother country and maintaining not only our right but our duty to legislate without any regard to our colonial position.

In order to show that complete harmony and agreement have been established between the machine and the commercial section of the party, Hon. Mr. Young, one of the leading dissentients from its former policy, appears to have been invited to write a series of letters, addressed to the 'Globe,' on the subject of "Canada's Best Policy," and this he has done at great length and with some ability.

All through these letters Mr. Young appears to feel keenly the inconsistency of his position. He takes repeated pains to clear himself from all participation in the former errors of his leaders. In one place he writes: "Six years ago, in a series of letters to the 'Globe,' I endeavoured, in my humble way, (how humble, like Uriah Heap, these Grits are!) to give no uncertain sound on these questions, and I need scarcely say I continue firmly opposed to commercial union, etc." When Mr. Young attempts to relieve his leaders from all responsibility for the advocacy of this policy, his method would be laughable if it were not so disingenuous. Speaking of the adoption of the Ottawa platform, Mr. Young says: "Its unanimous adoption proves, as did the discussion on the subject, that the Liberal party is entirely opposed to commercial union advocated by Mr. Goldwin Smith and others, or, indeed, to any other relations with our neighbours inconsistent with our present connection with Great Britain," etc. Does Mr. Young imagine that the people forget that not Mr. Goldwin Smith, but the leaders of his party, Laurier of Quebec, Davies of Prince Edward Island, Fielding of Nova Scotia, Cartwright, Mowat, Mills, Charlton, Edgar, Paterson, Mulock, McMullen, and many others of Ontario were the active promoters and agitators of this policy? Has Mr. Young been authorized to announce that this policy has been definitely abandoned? It can hardly be disputed that the adoption of this policy would be more far-reaching in its effects on our political and commercial relations than any political measure which has been proposed since confederation. Mr. Young emphatically condemns this policy. With what consistency can he now appeal to the people for their support and confidence in those men who, by his own admission, erred so greatly on this important question? If their judgment was so misplaced then, what has transpired to show that their judgment is sounder now? If they were insincere in their advocacy of commercial union, what assurance can he give as to their sincerity in their new policy?"

I will not detain the House by reading this at any greater length. I have got about half through it, but I will not continue, because I think the House is becoming impatient. Sir, the Opposition are always contending for an economical administration of the affairs of this country. That question has often been discussed in this House, and on many occasions I have had the pleasure of listening to comparisons made between the expenditures in the different departments under the Mackenzie regime and those now made under the present Government, and the results have been in favour of the present Government. Taking into consideration the increased population, the increased developments of the country, the increased postal facilities that are necessary in this country, I think that the balance is very much in favour of the Conservative party. When our opponents speak of economising, we must remember that at the Interprovincial Conference they pledged themselves to subsidize the different provinces, which means an annual increased expenditure of one million and a half of money. Now, that is certainly not in the direction of economy. In the matter of letting contracts for public buildings, I know of no better system, no more economical system, that could be adopted by any Administration, than that which is pursued by the present Government. All contracts are advertised for and given to the lowest tender. There was a public building erected in the county town which I have the honour to represent, and I do not know that there were any extras in connection with that building. I know that there was good value rendered for the expenditure, and I never heard a single charge made against the Government in connection with the erection of that building. Now, it has been said that the present Government, owing to the reduction that has been made in the tariff, will have to economise. I am very much in favour of economy myself, and I deem it a good characteristic on the part of any Government; still, I would say that necessary expenditures undertaken in the interest of the country, such as the subsidizing of steamers for the purpose of transporting freight at reduced rates, or any means which will facilitate transport and bring about reduced rates for the carriage of the agricultural products of this country to the best markets of the world, will have my hearty support. Now, I believe that the farmers of this country have been protected quite as much as the manufacturers. Everything which they produce and which formerly came into this country in competition with their products, is protected by a duty, which has certainly resulted beneficially to the interests of the farmer. All the Government have done is to afford similar protection to the manufacturers. I suppose many hon. gentlemen here have had an opportunity in their various constituencies to vote upon bonuses given to parties who proposed to go into their towns and cities and erect some kind of manufacturing industry. I know that, in the town of Walkerton, bonuses have been given, and both Conservatives and Reformers have supported the bonus system. They have done so because they expected to derive some benefit from the erection of that industry in their midst, because it would afford employment to a great many people; because it will increase the population of the city or town, and create a demand for agricultural products : because the business of the merchants will increase, and there will be an increase in the consuming classes of the town, the mechanics and the artisans. The prosperity of the town keeps pace with the prosperity of the country. The hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) said that if he confined his view to that phase of the matter, and without taking a broad liberal view, he might be adjudged to be selfish, and he informed hon. gentlemen on this side of the House that they did not take a liberal view, but rather a narrow and contracted view. I believe any manufacturing industry established in Toronto benefits me, although I am 150 miles away, and I would like to see increased growth of manufacturing industries not only in Toronto, but in Brantford, Hamilton, Kingston, in every city in Ontario, and the more we have the greater prosperity we enjoy, and the greater benefits will result to the agriculturists of this country owing to the increased demand for their products. A good deal is said about the reduction in the value of agricultural products. I admit that in the single article of wheat there has been a material reduction. However, that has taken place all over the world, and I know of no period in the world's history when wheat has been cheaper in Great Britain than it is to-day. Many countries raise a surplus of wheat. We in Canada raise a surplus, and of course at times the European market is glutted, and consequently the price falls, but when we take into consideration the purchasing power of a dollar, the farmer to-day, notwithstanding the reduction in the value of his products, occupies a better position relatively so far as the necessaries of life are concerned, not only as regards the implements he uses, but everything he requires for the household, than what he occupied previous to 1878. There has been no such material reduction in the price of agricultural products as has taken place in the necessary articles which the farmer uses, both in his household and on the farm. I contend that before hon. gentlemen opposite can make out the National Policy as being injurious to the agriculturists they must show that while the price of agricultural products is low, the farmer is at the same time paying much more for everything he uses in his house and for the implements with which to cultivate his farm than prior to 1878. Then I would admit that a case has been made out against the National Policy; but until that is done, I claim that no case has been made out against that policy. The hon. gentleman who preceded me admitted that financially speaking there was no class better off than the agriculturists. I agree with him. I believe that if you take the county of Bruce to-day the farmers, man for man, are better off financially than are the manufacturers in that county. The hon. member for North Simcoe

Mr. CARGILL.

(Mr. McCarthy), has also declared that agriculture has not proved successful, because of protection. I know farmers in my county who are well off, and I also know farmers settled on adjoining lots who are poorly off. Is that the fault of the Government? Has the Government anything to do with that? One man has probably equally as good land as the other. One man has succeeded in obtaining a competency and has raised his family, educated, and clothed them, and is living comfortably, with a house that is a perfect palace, barns of extensive proportions, sheds filled with cattle and every comfort that any one could desire. On the adjoining farm held by a man who settled at about the same time, there is nothing but cause for complaint, the occupant blames the Government for everything and attributes his failure to an imaginary cause. If a farmer succeeds, all farmers who are equally industrious should succeed also, but we will find that in the same business one man makes a success and another a failure of it. The Government has nothing to do with that. With respect to the expenditure and the National Policy hon. gentlemen opposite assert that all the capital invested has been lost. Who have lost it? Has it been the original investor? Even if the capital invested in cotton factories and other industries is now lying idle, the original investor has been injured, and the factories have passed into the hands of new corporations who are carrying them on with success and are furnishing cotton equal to that produced anywhere in the world. The hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), stated that some of the manufacturers had made fortunes. In my experience the manufacturers who have made money are the exception, and I believe they are men who acquired their wealth previous to the adoption of protection. It is a very easy matter for a man who has sufficient capital to carry on a business. I do not give a man much credit for business capacity who has plenty of capital in the bank, but to men who go into business with a limited capital I say they deserve credit. Take two men who go into business, one with sufficient capital and the other with limited capital which is perhaps just sufficient money for establishing his plant. In order to carry on his business and to procure raw material he has to go to the bank and get accommodation and borrow capital. Now, the man who was running business on his own capital, if he makes 6 or 7 or 8 per cent interest on his investment, at the end of the year has made a little money, but the man who has to go to the bank and borrow money at 6 or 7 or 8 per cent will not have anything at the end of the year. You can therefore readily understand how difficult it is for a new country, or for new manufacturers starting up, to compete with older established concerns which have any amount of wealth at their back. Under protection

Great Britain accumulated wealth, and her people amassed fortunes. When Great Britain declared in favour of free trade, it was in the interest of Great Britain to do so, because she had arrived at that state of perfection in the art of manufacturing that she could compete against the world; and it was to her benefit to declare in favour of free trade in order that she might get cheap breadstuffs to feed her people. I believe that it will be found in the history of the United States that that country will stand by protection until she gets such a population that she will not have sufficient breadstuffs to supply the wants of her people. I believe that then the United States will follow in the wake of Great Britain, and declare in favour of free trade; but never will our neighbours have free trade until they have reached that stage in their history. Now, Mr. Speaker, in conclusion I thank you, and I thank the House cordially for the attentive manner which you have listened to my remarks. I do not often trouble the House in the way of making speeches; that is not my forte, for I am a better hand at rolling saw logs. I will say, however, that I am very much obliged to the members present for the attentive hearing they have given me, and I hope and trust that the revised tariff brought down by the Government will be satisfactory to the people of this country, as I believe it is. I am quite sure that I can go home now and be well received by my farming friends up in Bruce. I have had several letters from my constituents congratulating the Government on the admirable revision of the tariff which they have made, and stating how satisfactory it is to the agricultural interests. I feel very much relieved now because last summer I felt somewhat depressed. The excitement of that northern country in favour of a reduction in the tariff or free trade, rather brought about a kind of depressed feeling on me until some of the greater lights in connection with the Government of this country made their appearance in the county of Bruce and explained the policy of the Government and the position of affairs to the people, after which I settled down and made up my mind that the country was pretty safe for a few years longer. The hon. member for South Grey (Mr. Landerkin), whom I have in my eye just now, in company with his friends came up there and he headed a procession from Durham to the town of Walkerton, a distance of some twenty-four or twenty-five miles, I think. It was an immense procession; they had all the bands from the intervening towns between Durham and Walkerton, and all the gray horses mounted with the farmers' sons along the route, and I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that when they arrived in the town they presented a very formidable appearance.

Mr. LANDERKIN. You felt the country was safe then?

Mr. CARGILL. I began to shake in my boots. I attended their meeting and had the pleasure of listening to Mr. Laurier, who made a very fine speech, and to the other gentlemen who accompanied him. I listened with a very great deal of pleasure to what they said, although I did not believe it all, and I remember that the hon. member from South Grey (Mr. Landerkin) announced that the demonstration was what he called a circus, and that next week would arrive what usually follows a circus, I forget what you call it.

An hon. MEMBER. A menagerie.

Mr. CARGILL. I did not think it was a menagerie he said.

An hon. MEMBER. A side show.

Mr. CARGILL. Yes; he said the circus had arrived in town and that the side show would make its appearance the following week. I can assure Mr. Speaker and hon. gentlemen that I had a great deal of pleasure in attending upon the side show, and in my opinion the hon. gentlemen who took part in the side show acquitted themselves much more creditably than the participants in the circus. They made promises there to the people, which they have carried into effect, because no promises are ever made by this Government that are not carried into effect. I feel that these promises, and the deeds following on them, will entirely satisfy the people of Bruce so that I have no apprehension about the result of the next election, come when it may.

Mr. SUTHERLAND moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

Mr. DALY moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and the House adjourned at 1.30 a.m. (Thursday).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, 12th April, 1894.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

THE FAST ATLANTIC SERVICE.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT asked, 1. Will the terminal point of the proposed fast Atlantic service be in England or in France? 2. If the terminal point be in England will the line call at any French port?

Mr. FOSTER. 1. The terminal point will be in England. 2. It is intended that there shall be a service to a French port.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. By the same line?

Mr. FOSTER. The same line or a cross line.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Can you not tell which?

Mr. FOSTER. No.

BOUNTY UPON FRENCH BUILT SHIPS.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT asked, What is the bounty now paid per ton and per voyage upon French built ships?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Bounties are only payable to vessels engaged in the long sea trade, which was defined to be a navigation to the south beyond the 30th degree of latitude north; to the north beyond the 15th degree of longitude, meridian of Paris; to the east beyond the 44th degree of longitude. Coasting was defined as navigation within the above limits and between French ports only. Bounties on long sea voyages were given at the rate of 1*l.* 50*c.* (1*s.* 2½*d.*) per ton per 1,000 miles for the first year of the ship's service, and an annually decreasing scale of payments for the following years, the decrease being 7½*c.* (¾*d.*) per ton for wooden ships, and 5*c.* (½*d.*) per ton for iron ships. Half bounties only were given to foreign-built ships registered as French. A second form of bounty was that conceded for the building of ships at the rate of 60*f.* (£2 8*s.*) per gross ton for iron and steel ships, and 20*f.* (16*s.*) per gross ton for wooden ships above 200 tons burthen. The new law which altered the incidence of the bounties was put in force on January 30th, 1893, and enacted that the bounty on building should be raised for steam or sailing ships of iron and steel to 65*f.* (£2 12*s.*) per gross ton, and for wooden ships of over 150 tons burthen, to 40*f.* (£1 12*s.*) per gross ton. The navigation bounty was reduced from 1*l.* 50*c.* (1*s.* 2½*d.*) to 1*l.* 10*c.* (10½*d.*) for steamers, with an annual decrease of 6*c.* (6-10*d.*) per ton for wooden ships, and 4*c.* (4-10*d.*) for iron and steel ships. For sailing vessels the bounty was raised to 1*l.* 70*c.* (1*s.* 4¾*d.*), with an annual decrease of 8*c.* (8-10*d.*) for wooden ships, and 6*c.* (6-10*d.*) for iron and steel ships. But a new feature was introduced which was quite an innovation. It was enacted that there should be two sorts of coasting in future, one including vessels trading from port to port locally, another comprising all voyages inside the limits of long course were to be called international coasting, that is, voyages between French and Algerian and foreign ports, and voyages between foreign ports provided the distance run in each case exceeded 120 miles. To international coasters a bounty of three-fourths the amount of the ordinary premium was granted.

TARIFF AMENDMENTS.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT asked, Do the Government intend to propose any amendments to the tariff now before the House?

Mr. FOSTER. I may say to the hon. gentleman that that matter is under consideration.

FLOODING OF LAND AT WEST RIDEAU LAKE.

Mr. DAWSON asked, 1. Has the Government, or any member of the Government, received any petitions, letters, or other communications from certain residents of the township of Bedford, in the electoral district of Addington, in reference to the flooding of their lands by the waters of West Rideau Lake, caused by a dam constructed by order of the Government at the foot of said lake ? 2. What action has been taken in the matter ?

Mr. HAGGART. The Government have received communications from certain residents of the township of Bedford in reference to the flooding of their lands, alleged to have been caused by a Government dam at the foot of West Rideau Lake. The Superintending Engineer is under instructions to personally examine into these claims upon the ground at an early date.

COMPENSATION TO THOS. SWEETMAN.

Mr. DAWSON asked, 1. Has the question of compensation to Mr. Sweetman, of Fermoy, for damages done to lot 26 in the seventh concession of Bedford, been under the consideration of the Council ? 2. What action has been taken ? 3. Has he received compensation yet ? 4. If so, when was he paid, and how much ? 5. If not yet paid, why not ?

Mr. HAGGART. The question of compensation to Mr. Thomas Sweetman for damages to lot 26, in concession No. 27, Bedford, has been under consideration. It is proposed to ask Parliament to vote $220 in the Supplementary Estimates for 1893-94 in discharge of the claim. He has not yet received any compensation. It was not paid because he refused to accept the sum of $220 when offered him, and afterwards when he intimated his readiness to accept, there was no appropriation available.

EXPORTATION OF LIVE CATTLE.

Mr. MULOCK asked, What was the total number and value of live cattle exported to the United Kingdom in the calendar years 1890, 1891, 1892, and 1893 ?

Mr. WALLACE. In 1890 there were 104,133 live cattle exported to the United Kingdom, of the value of $8,114,145 ; in 1891, 99,967, of the value of $7,381,284 ; in 1892, 93,206, of the value of $6,920,748 ; in 1893, 89,572, of the value of $6,799,638, or a total during the four years of 386,878, of the value of $29,215,815.

AMERICAN SWINE.

Mr. FEATHERSTON asked, Has the Government issued an order admitting American swine in bond for slaughter purposes ? If so, have they to comply with quarantine regulations as now in force when imported for breeding purposes ?

Mr. FOSTER. Swine may be imported for slaughter, in bond, under the provisions of an Order in Council, passed in 1880, and an Order passed in 1883, being chapter 9 of the Consolidated Orders in Council of Canada. Swine imported for slaughter in bond have not to comply with the quarantine regulations in force relating to animals for breeding purposes, but the regulations are special, having for their object to secure complete isolation until they enter the slaughter-houses, from which they are not allowed to be removed alive. Such slaughter-houses are required to be distinct from those in which Canadian swine are slaughtered.

THE NORTH-WEST SCHOOL QUESTION.

Mr. BRUNEAU (for Mr. Tarte) asked, Whether the Government or any of its members have, since the opening of Parliament, conferred with Lieutenant-Governor Mackintosh and Mr. Haukain, with reference to the school question and to the recommendations made to the Executive of the Territories by the Dominion Cabinet ? Have the Government received from Lieutenant-Governor Mackintosh a favourable answer as to the said recommendations ?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The answer to the first branch of the question is Yes, and to the second branch, we have not received any answer from the Lieutenant-Governor of the Territories to the recommendations made by the Order in Council.

REVISING BARRISTER FOR QUEEN'S.

Mr. FORBES asked, Is the Government aware that the revising barrister for the county of Queen's, in Nova Scotia, is now a resident of Alabama, in the United States of America ? Does the Government propose to appoint a successor to said officer as revising barrister ?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The answer to both questions is, Yes.

REVISING OFFICER FOR SHELBURNE COUNTY.

Mr. FORBES asked, Will the present revising barrister for Shelburne County, Nova Scotia, act as revising officer at the ensuing revision of the electoral lists, for the county of Queen's ?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. That matter will be considered.

POSTMASTER OF HULL.

Mr. LANGELIER asked, 1. What is the name of the postmaster of the city of Hull, in the province of Quebec ? 2. What are the names of the persons whom he gave as his sureties when he was appointed, and of his sureties each year since that date ?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. James H. Kerr is postmaster of the city of Hull. The postmaster was appointed on 1st January, 1879; his bond is dated 17th February, 1879; the sureties were Charles E. Graham and William Washburne. No change was made until 12th July, 1886, when a new bond was given, in which Alfred Rochon was substituted as surety in place of William Washburne. No other change has been made. The present sureties are Charles E. Graham and Alfred Rochon.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. CHARLTON. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to read a brief letter from a firm whose reputation has been impugned or injured by an action instituted in this House, in which I took the initial step. The letter is from Caldecott, Burton & Spence, Toronto.

Mr. SPEAKER. I warn the hon. gentleman that if he intends to read a letter referring to any proceedings in Parliament, he will be out of order.

Mr. CHARLTON. It does not refer to any proceedings in Parliament, but to a matter charged against those gentlemen, which may have been referred to in Parliament.

Mr. SPEAKER. If it was referred to in Parliament, and the hon. gentleman proposes to refer to the proceedings which have taken place in this House, he will be entirely out of order.

Mr. CHARLTON. I submit the letter.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman may take the responsibility of reading it, if he chooses, on the ruling I have given. If it does not refer to matters that have taken place in Parliament, the hon. gentleman may read the letter, with the indulgence of the House; but if it refers to any matters in Parliament, he will be entirely out of order.

Mr. CHARLTON. This is entirely an unpolitical matter, and as a mere matter of business fairness I submit the letter to be read.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The point is this, as I see the matter: Are the Orders of the Day to be interrupted by persons outside of this House being permitted to make observations by letter referring to matters which do not relate to the proceedings in the House? If the communication does relate to the proceedings in the House, the hon. gentleman is out of order; the hon. gentleman has avowed that it does not relate to such proceedings, and therefore there is no necessity to allow it to be read.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to make a suggestion to the Finance Minister.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON.

I understand from a recent answer he has given that divers amendments to the tariff are under consideration. It would be a very great convenience, not only to members of this House, but to the trade, if it were possible for the Government, when we go into committee, to state generally the several amendments which they propose to introduce. I should like to know from the Finance Minister if he thinks he can do that. The Opposition and the trade generally would be very much aided in the discussion, and it would tend to shorten the debate if the several amendments that are proposed to be introduced were stated collectively when we go into committee.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman has sprung his suggestion very suddenly upon me, but I will assure him that every possible consideration will be given to the trade in the way in which he suggests, and it is their due. As far as possible, the hon. gentleman's suggestion will be followed. I do not wish him, however, to take for granted that there are to be any or many amendments to the resolutions already brought down.

Mr. FRASER. I desire to ask the Finance Minister if the statement showing the old tariff and the amended tariff in columns will be brought down at an early date?

Mr. FOSTER. They are nearly printed, I think. They may be ready for us to-morrow.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE TARIFF.

House resumed the adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Foster:

That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go into Committee of Ways and Means; and the motion of Sir Richard Cartwright in amendment thereto.

Mr. LAURIER. Mr. Speaker, I do not rise on this occasion with the hope nor even with the intention of affording anything new to the discussion which has taken place in this House for some two weeks past. My object is simply to review the arguments which have been offered from this side of the House against the policy of the Government, and in this respect, perhaps I might rest content with the effort of an hon. gentleman who does not belong to the Opposition (Mr. McCarthy), who, in what I consider one of the most remarkable speeches ever delivered in Parliament since I have been here, has exposed what is, perhaps, the fullest, the most detailed and the most comprehensive arraignment of the policy which has been pursued by the Government for the last fifteen years. With regard to the debate so far as it has gone up to the present moment, I may be allowed to remark, that to the extent that it has been participated in by members and supporters of the Government, it has been characteristic that one and all have expressed their unbounded satisfaction with the proposed amendments to the tariff. It may not be uncharitable to suppose, and perhaps to say, that, if there had been no amendments whatever, the satisfaction of the supporters of the Government would have been just the same, because all their arguments—we have all heard them—were in support of the tariff as it existed and as if it had not been amended at all. At all events, there is this satisfaction; and to the members of Her Majesty's loyal Opposition it is a satisfaction which might be termed pride: that at last, after many efforts and many assaults, the Government have been forced to capitulate, forced to come down from their position of hide-bound protection, forced to yield to the determined protests and remonstrances of a long-outraged people. Whether the amendments proposed to the tariff, whether the concessions offered by the Government, are sufficient or insufficient to meet the just expectations of the people, is the question which at present is the issue before this House and before the country. Whether the measure of relief offered by the Government, if indeed I may use such a dignified expression as "measure of relief"—is adequate or not adequate, is a question which may be held to depend very largely upon the views entertained by those who offered it as to the necessity of any reform at all; and, judged by that rule, it must be found upon examination that the measure presented by the Government is stamped with the stamp of inadequacy and insufficiency. Why, Sir, it is within the recollection of every one here, that the whole of the speech of my friend the Finance Minister, wherein he introduced his amendments to the tariff, was in favour of the proposition that there was no necessity, and no need for any reform at all. He told us that the formation of the tariff was perfect in itself, that this country was enjoying an unbounded measure of prosperity, and that this was all due to the principle underlying the tariff, that is to say, the principle of protection. For three hours, at least, the hon. gentleman piled up facts upon facts with the object of making us believe that the country is prosperous; for three hours, at least, he wrestled, desperately wrestled, with facts and logic, with the same end in view. Why, Sir, you heard the hon. gentleman driven to the expedient of giving it as an evidence of prosperity, that during the last fifteen years which the country has been under a protective regime, the finances of the country balanced year after year by surpluses which now aggregate the enormous sum of $20,000,000. This fact, which I do not hesitate to say to the hon. gentleman, is nothing short of a disgrace and a shame for the Administration, was treated by him as a boast. I assert that such a condition of things is a shame and a disgrace to any Government. In England the aim and the purpose of the Chancellor of the Exchequer is so to calculate the expense and the expenditure as to make them balance evenly, and the reputation of the Chancellor of the Exchequer would be lost for ever if, year after year, his calculations were found to be wrong. If, instead of having just the revenue which is wanted to meet the expenditure, it was found that there was such a discrepancy in his calculations as exists in Canada, the reputation of the Chancellor of the Exchequer would, I repeat, be lost for ever, unless he were able to show that the discrepancy arose from a sudden disturbance in the condition of business. What is the truth about these surpluses? Twenty millions of dollars, says the Finance Minister. The truth is, that these surpluses represent $20,000,000 of unjust taxation, which have been wrung by the Government from the consumers of the country; twenty millions of dollars which would have been left in the pockets of the people for the purpose of their own business, for instance, to be applied to the redemption of the mortgages with which the country has been plastered during that term of years. What is the truth about these surpluses? If it is an evidence of prosperity that we should have surpluses, why, in the name of common sense, is the hon. gentleman to-day proposing a reduction of duty, which places him, as he says himself, in the face of a deficit? The truth is, that if the hon. gentleman is now reducing the duty, it is because the people have seen the true inwardness of these surpluses; it is because the people are in earnest; it is because they are determined to be relieved of a system of taxation which indeed produces surpluses in the pockets of the Government, but which takes millions of money out of their own pockets. But, Sir, even while my hon. friend was indulging in these loud boastings, which constituted—and I say it without offence—the main part of his speech; even at the moment while he was exhibiting for the admiring gaze of his friends these glowing pictures of prosperity, it was evident that his vision was haunted by a pursuing shadow. Even at the moment while he was making use of his extravagant language in encomiums of the National Policy, the thought must have struck him, that it was, after all, a singular thing that one million of Canadians had deserted this land of plenty. The thought must have struck him, because he paused in his laudatory refrain to notice that fact. He tried to explain it away anyhow or somehow, and the explanation which he gives, I commend to both friend and foe; I commend it, not on account of its novelty, because there was no novelty in it. We have often heard it before: we have heard it since. The explanation was that if, after all, one million of Canadians have deserted this land of plenty, this prosperous country of ours, it was not because their native land, which God had made fertile, had been made barren for them by a vicious policy; it was because the Grits were decrying the country. But, Mr. Speaker, I submit that if the Grits have been decrying the country for the last fifteen years, the Tories have not been mute dogs by any means. They were extolling the National Policy to the skies. And yet, in spite of all their assertions, the people rather believed the Grits, who were decrying the country, than the Tories, who were proclaiming the country to be prosperous. If I notice an argument of this kind, it is not for the purpose of giving any answer to it. It is simply to notice the great compliment paid by my hon. friend to the policy of the Liberal party. If my hon. friend and his friends beside him are sincere, if they believe that the country was as prosperous as they say it was, and if they believe at the same time, that, prosperous as the country was, the people believed the Grits who said it was not prosperous, what a tribute that is to the hold that the Liberal party have upon the people of this country. Why, Sir, I do not wonder that the hon. gentlemen opposite trembled in their boots at the idea of the fate that would come to them if only we could meet them at the polls on fair terms, free from the gags of the Gerrymander Act, and the gags of the Franchise Act, with the people in such a position as to be able to give their opinions at the polls as they have them in their minds and hearts. Let me come to the speech of my hon. friend, after this digression. There was but one logical conclusion to that speech; it was to maintain in its entirety the National Policy, which had done so much, as my hon. friend claimed, to promote the prosperity of the country. And yet, strange to say, after having extolled for three hours the National Policy and the principle of protection, my hon. friend concluded by announcing that the Government had determined to lay sacrilegious hands upon that sacred ark; though, it is true, my hon. friend proceeded at once to give an excuse for such a sacrilege. The excuse was that since 1878 the conditions of trade had somewhat changed, and it was to meet the new conditions now existing that the amendments were offered. But, Sir, I am within the judgment of every man in this House when I assert that in not a single instance, so far as any particular item was concerned, did he say anything which would support his contention that the change was necessitated by the altered conditions of trade. No, Sir; that is not the true spirit which has moved my hon. friend in making these changes. It was not because he was convinced that the conditions of trade had changed; but, as the fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom, the fear of the people may be the beginning of some wisdom on the part of my hon. friend. It was simply because he had the fear of the people before his eyes that he determined to do something to alleviate their discontent. But, Sir, my hon. friend was between fear and fear—fear of the people on the one side, and fear of the monopolists on the other side. Tossed to and fro by those two conflicting influences, thrown on one side and then on the other—on one side to reduce the tariff, and on the other side to maintain and even increase it—between those two conflicting influences my hon. friend was not able to come to a decision to propose a substantial measure. He simply proposes a mere perfunctory measure, in which there is not enough to disturb, but not enough to afford to the people the measure of relief which they had reason to expect at the hands of the Government. But, Sir, I suppose it will be said by hon. gentlemen on the other side, what else are we to expect from the Opposition? We could not expect that they would be satisfied; and they are naturally playing their own role in expressing their dissatisfaction. I will presume, for the moment, Mr. Speaker,—though, perhaps I shall not be pardoned for taking such a liberty—to speak not as a member of the Opposition, but I will endeavour to place myself in the position of those who, in 1878, were of opinion that a change was necessary, and that protection should be given a trial. Placing myself in that position, I say that if there were, in 1878, reasons for trying the system of protection, there are now overwhelming reasons why the policy then adopted should be abolished—not changed or altered, more or less partially, but abolished in toto, and the principle thereof wholly rooted out of the tariff. My hon. friend, in the course of his speech, stated that the conditions of trade had changed since 1878; but, so far as I remember, he specified no such conditions in his comments on the alterations. But I will point out an alteration which has taken place since 1878 in the trade and production of the country—an alteration of the greatest consequence, which, in my judgment at least, is nothing short of an absolute revolution in the history of political economy. I refer to the enormous decline which has taken place in the price of wheat, and in the price of all cereals and agricultural products, since 1878. In 1878, and for some time afterwards, the price of wheat was about $1.20 a bushel. Of course, there were fluctuations and variations, the price being sometimes above and sometimes below that figure, but never very far from it. What is the price of wheat to-day? About 55 cents a bushel. There have been jumps up and down, but from year to year the price has shown a steady decline until it has reached that low figure. Nor is it certain that it has yet touched bottom, though there may be reason to suppose that for some years to come the present value will remain the standard value. Now, before I proceed any further I must remind the hon. gentlemen on the other side that one of their objects in adopting the protective system in 1878 was to increase the price of wheat, and the price of cereals generally. It was contended at that time that the cultivation of wheat was not profitable, even at the price which then ruled; and it was their boast that by the adoption of protection the price would be increased to the producers. It is true, Mr. Speaker, that hon. gentlemen opposite have chosen to forget that page of history; but, if they forget it, it only proves that, apart from their other failures, they are afflicted also with a very deficient memory; and you will find a deficiency of memory, even in quarters where you might least expect it. There is my hon. friend from West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) whose brilliant gifts we all admire. It is sad to reflect that those eminent gifts of his are marred by an absolute want of memory. The hon. gentleman looks at me with astonishment. I was no less astonished when I read the other day in the Montreal Star, an interview with him, in the course of which he makes use of the following language:—

In that year we never did what Sir Richard Cartwright on Friday night accused us of doing—say that by duties we could raise the price of wheat in a depressed market.

Why, it is true that in 1878 my hon. friend from Western Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) was not a member of this House, but he was then, as he is to-day, a distinguished member of his party. He defended its cause with pen and tongue; he defended it in the press and on the hustings. He was even a candidate, though an unfortunate one, in 1878. The position the hon. gentleman then took he has since forgotten. He has forgotten the arguments which, I will not say he made use of, but which certainly he must have heard in the mouths of his friends. Has he forgotten that at that time it was predicted—probably by himself—that if we had a protective system, the land would be dotted with tall chimneys, there would be labour for the sons and daughters of Canada, and not only that, but for the large immigration which would pour into our land from abroad? And that the increase of labour would be mand an increased production of food, and that the price of wheat would be increased accordingly. If my hon. friend has forgotten these arguments, I must conclude that, as it is natural to man to readily believe what he desires, it may be natural for him also to forget what is unpleasant. Why, Sir, I had the curiosity some few days ago to look over the debates which took place at that time, and I found a speech delivered then by a gentleman who represented one of the Hurons (Mr. Farrow), who repeated the story told year after year in 1876, 1877 and 1878, that the price of wheat would be increased by protection and diminished by free trade. And this sentence I found in one of his speeches:

The following figures would show the relative prices obtained under protection and free trade. From 1849 to 1861—a free trade period comparatively—the farmer obtained $1.20 per bushel for his wheat; from 1862 to 1874, a period under protection, he got an average of $1.37 per bushel.

That was given as an evidence that if we had protection, the price of wheat would be increased. Well, shortly after the adoption of the National Policy, the price of wheat jumped from $1.20 to $1.40 per bushel. In those days Mr. Rufus Stephenson represented the county of Kent, but has been taken since to his reward—and in saying that, do not imagine that I say he has been taken to another world. On the contrary, he has received the reward which very often awaits a good supporter of the Government. He has been provided with a good berth in the Civil Service. But Mr. Stephenson, finding that the price of wheat had jumped from $1.20 to $1.40, gave that as an evidence that the National Policy had increased the price. And in one famous speech which he delivered in the province of Ontario, looking back to what he had predicted and at the existing facts, he imagined that he had been more a prophet than he intended, more of a political economist than he supposed; and in a moment of exultant triumph, he exclaimed: I am going to vote for the Government which has brought up the price of wheat to $1.40. Now, if Mr. Stephenson had not been taken to his reward, if he were still a member of this House, with a parity of knowledge he would have to say: I am going to vote against the Government which has lowered the price of wheat to 55 cents. I doubt very much that he would do so. Perhaps, like the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), he would rather take refuge against his former record in the vacuum of his memory. But what is the cause of this decline in the price of wheat? In the days of old, when Imperial Rome had a population of four million souls, when it held sway over the whole then known universe, when it was not only the political, but the commercial centre of the world, it drew its food supply from the lands washed by the basin of the Mediterranean, from Spain, Egypt, Sicily and even that part of Africa now known as Tunisia and Algeria—lands which have long ago ceased to be wheat-growing countries. In the present day, England is the great commercial centre of the world, and like Rome she cannot produce wheat enough for her own consumption. She has to import it from abroad, and for many years, apart from what she got from her own territory, what she wanted was obtained from the continent of North America. But of late years, with the facilities of transportation, to these former sources of supply have been added others—chiefly the vast plains of southern Russia, the numerous valleys of India, and even the valley of the Plata River in South America. Now, having so many sources to draw from, it is not perhaps surprising that wheat should have reached in England a lower price than at any period known to history. And at last we have the acknowledgment—we had it even yesterday from the hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Cockburn)—that the price of wheat in Canada is regulated by the demand in England. How often have I heard that proposition contested in the days of old by the advocates of the National Policy? How often have I heard it stated that the Government would not be flies on the wheel, but would by their policy, increase the price of wheat to the consumers. Now, at last they are forced to acknowledge that all their pretensions were pretensions only, that it is not in their power to increase the price of wheat, that the price is regulated by the demand in the English market. What is true of wheat is also true of all other agricultural products, with the exception, perhaps, of cheese and butter. What is the conclusion we must arrive at? It is this, that to-day the price of wheat and other cereals has been decreased to the farmer almost one-half, and that his profit has been decreased to one-half what it was in 1878. Such being the case with regard to the position of the farmer, his income being diminished by more than one-half, how is it with what he has to buy? Hon. gentlemen opposite are strong in denial, but they will not longer deny, that the primary object of protection was to increase the price of commodities—to increase the profits to the manufacturers on the articles the farmer has to buy. It is true that the farmer was promised that he would be recouped, even if he had to pay a little more for his commodities, by the increased price of wheat. But such has not been the case, the tariff has not increased the price of wheat and other cereals, because Canada produces a surplus of agricultural products, and the price is regulated by the English market. Not so, however, with manufactured goods. Though I admit that the price of manufactured goods, even in this country, must be the price in England, still to this must always be added the cost of transportation, which is unavoidable, and the amount of duty which is avoidable.

Mr. FOSTER. All avoidable?

Mr. LAURIER. Yes, when it is raised, as you gentlemen are raising it, not for revenue, but simply to favour special interests.

Mr. FOSTER. Then it is not all avoidable.

Mr. LAURIER. But a protection tariff is avoidable. Of course there is a limit, and that is the necessity of the revenue. That, however, is not the limit set by the hon. gentleman. But we are told also that the prices of manufactured goods are being decreased. I have no hesitation in admitting that the prices of manufactured goods have decreased; but, even in the lines in which they have most decreased, the cost of transportation and the amount of the duty cause them to be, as I have stated, from 30 to 40 per cent more than the price of these goods in England. Now, Sir, if the tariff had operated the same all round; if it had affected the prices of agricultural products and manufacturing products alike; if it had either increased or decreased the prices of both, the position of the farmer would be better than it is. But, it is not so, as I have already said. The produce of the farmer has been driven to the lowest point, but what he has to buy is sold to him at an increased price as compared with the price in England. What is the lesson to be deduced from this state of things. It is this: (and this is the proposition we rely upon on this side of the House) as the price of agricultural products has been reduced to the lowest point, it should be the aim of the tariff to reduce the prices of manufactured goods also to the lowest point. The farmer is bound by his circumstances to sell in the freest and cheapest market; so also ought he to be privileged to buy in the cheapest market consistent only with the imposition of such duties as are necessary for raising the revenue of the country. That is the proposition on which we stand, and it is a proposition perfectly fair, perfectly just, perfectly equitable—so fair, so just, so reasonable and so equitable, that the Government dare not attack it openly. And yet they cannot adopt it. Why? Because they are chained and yoked to a system which is the reverse of just and fair and equitable. Why, Sir, I will take the policy of my hon. friend the Minister of Finance as set forth by himself. He said there were three methods of raising revenue:

One is to have simple free trade, under which you have no customs imposts at all, the revenue necessary for the country being raised by direct taxation.

We had supposed up to the time the hon. gentleman spoke that this was the English system. We supposed this upon the authority of Sir Robert Peel, Richard Cobden, Bright and Gladstone. But, my hon. friend says, all these authorities are in error, that they have not free trade in England—that they have what he calls a revenue tariff. I shall not discuss that with my hon. friend. I shall accept the opinion of the English people that they have free trade. But, whatever system they have in England, whether it is free trade or revenue tariff, my hon. friend and the Government will have none of it. And why? They give us reasons. One of their reasons is that England is going down all the time under such a system. The hon. Minister of Marine and Finance gave his reasons. I hope his opinions are not shared by all the gentlemen on the other side, but, if they agree with him, I do not wonder that they say we should not imitate the example of England. He gave his reasons in plain language. He told us that the British nation under free trade is no longer able to compete with the civilized nations of Europe, but that she is driven to spend millions upon her army and her navy in order to force her trade upon unwilling savages in the uncivilized countries of the world.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. LAURIER. Yes; here is the language used by the hon. gentleman:

Driven from the civilized markets of the world, steadily and every year finding their output to those markets decreasing, they spend millions on their navy, and millions on their army, to force their wares, and their goods, and their merchandise, into the uncivilized markets of the world.

Sir, I never yet heard the fair name of the great nation so slandered and insulted. At least I never heard the name of England so insulted by a man of English blood. The charge was not new to me; I had read it in the pages of continental pamphleteers; but I am sure we were not prepared to hear it from the mouth of a man of English blood. And such a man! A Conservative; a Tory; a member of the Imperial Federation League; a member of the Canadian Privy Council; an aspirant, perhaps, to the British Privy Council; a K.C.M.G., and a preacher of loyalty in season and out of season! And is this really the estimate of hon. gentlemen on the other side, is this really what they believe to be the commercial condition of England? Do they really believe, as stated by the hon. Minister, that England is no longer able to hold her own with the civilized nations of the earth? Do they believe that the soldiers and the sailors of England, whose banners bear the proud inscriptions of Malplaquet and Ramilles, Aboukir and Trafalgar, the soldiers who once met the steel of the most famous troops of the world, under the greatest general of modern times, perhaps the greatest general of all times, are now employed in forcing upon helpless barbarians the wares and products of Sheffield and Manchester. It is a slander. There was a time indeed when England, then having a high tariff, found closed against her trade, by the power of Napoleon, the harbours of France, Spain, Italy, Belgium, Holland, and even of a part of Germany. These harbours she opened by the strength of her arms. And the hon. gentleman would tell us now that the great nation whose motto in the modern world seems to have been borrowed from that of the ancient Romans—"Debellare superbos"—must retire before the competition of other nations and use her army and her navy to force an undesired trade upon helpless savages and inferior races. I say that to-day England is armed to fight the hostile tariffs of Europe. She has a weapon more potent by far than the weapons of her most valiant warriors. That weapon is the principle of freedom of trade, which enables her to manufacture at a cheaper rate than any nation in the world, and to overcome all the difficulties that are placed in her way. The hon. gentleman spoke of Prince Bismarck and said that Bismarck, having the choice between the English system and the American system, chose the American system of protection. So he did, and a great service he rendered to his country in doing so! Look at Germany to-day, torn by the factions of Socialism, which is the direct outcome of protection. It is true, I admit, that some industries in England have at times been injured by the hostility of foreign tariffs. But the injury aimed at England redounded with ten-fold force upon the nations which inflicted it. You have spoken of Bismarck. Yes; we have greater Bismarcks and smaller Bismarcks in this world. Prince Bismarck wanted to create for Germany a national industry, a special industry, that of beet-root sugar. He commenced to do what was done by gentlemen opposite—he placed an enormous customs duty on foreign sugar; and, not satisfied with that, he induced the German Parliament to vote considerable export bounties upon German sugar. And thus, one day, the English market was flooded with German sugar, which was sold there at a price lower than the English refiners could produce it for. There was naturally some commotion among the English refiners. They went to see the Government and represented that it was impossible for them to compete with the German refiners, fed as these were by bounties. If the Government in England had been composed of the school of hon. gentlemen opposite they would have said: What! German sugar coming to England! Englishmen are too patriotic to eat German sugar. England for the Englishmen! We will have none of it! But they said nothing of the kind. On the contrary, they said: Well, if the German Government is willing to tax the German people in order to supply the British people with sugar at a cheaper rate than it can be produced for here, we cannot see that it is a very great injury to the English people. If the Germans are foolish enough to prefer such an arrangement, why should we complain? The refiners were not daunted. They purchased all the German sugar that was in the market, they converted it into jam, into jelly and into preserves, which they sent back to the Germans at an increased profit; and it has been proved that there were more people employed in England in producing jams, jelly and preserves than there had been in refining sugar. The hon. gentleman tells us that he wants neither a revenue tariff nor a free trade policy, but that he wants a protective tariff. Let me again quote his language:

The other and third method is the protective tariff, by which you select a certain list of articles and place upon them certain rates of impost with a view to raising a certain amount of money for the services of the country, but more especially with this view, that whilst you raise the amount of money that is necessary for the country, you shall stimulate the development of the resources of the country, you shall make its industrial life broad and diversified, and progressive.

Sir, this sounds very well, and as a mere assemblage of words it can hardly be excelled. If the object of the hon. gentleman is to develop the industries of the country by a policy which will give favour to no one and which will hinder no one, I am with him with all my heart, but that is not the policy of the hon. gentleman. He wants to develop the industries of the country, but in what way? By increasing the cost of commodities, by compelling the people to purchase at a higher price at home than they could obtain the same goods elsewhere. Well, I admit that with such a system he might develop special industries, but I assert that he will stifle the growth of the country. What has been the experience of our north-west country? Surely no one will pretend that Manitoba and the North-west Territories have realized that amount of prosperity which was expected for them at one time. It was expected that in the year 1894 Manitoba and the North-west Territories would have a population of 600,000 souls at least, and you know what a beggarly number were found there at the last census. More than that, you have developed the east at the expense of the west. Why is it that the growth of that country has been stunted? It is simply because in order to favour certain industries in the east you have prevented the people in that country from acquiring their goods at as cheap a rate as they could get them under a freer system of trade. But there is another objection to the system of the hon. gentleman, and perhaps a more serious objection in a certain way. One of the most serious objections to the protective system followed by the hon. gentleman is this: that it induces the investment of capital in industries which are not congenial to the soil, which cannot stand by themselves, which have to be supported at all times out of the taxes of the people. I can point out to the hon. gentleman a number of instances of that kind; I will only take one or two. Take, for instance, the coal oil industry. Coal oil is taxed in this country $7\frac{1}{2}$ cents a gallon. Last year we imported \$430,000 worth, and we paid just as much in duty as the value of the goods, that is to say, we paid a duty of 100 per cent. Well, as a revenue tariff, this would be outrageous; in fact, if the duty were decreased by one-half or two-thirds, we would have more revenue than we have now on coal oil. This is not, therefore, a revenue tariff, it has been imposed altogether for protection, and for nothing else. Even yet, though there is a duty of 100 per cent on that article, that is not all. Other obstacles have been put in the way of the importation of coal oil, amounting to as much, perhaps, as the present tariff. It is calculated upon good authority, that the protection afforded to coal oil is 200 per cent, at least. Well, Sir, it is a fact well known, that Canadian oil cannot be produced as cheaply as American oil. But what has been the effect of all this? Why, that by the protection which has been given against foreign oil, you have induced the investment in the oil regions of a million dollars in capital, and now it is said that you cannot remove that protection because that capital will be wiped out. That may be true, but if it be true that Canadian coal oil cannot maintain itself against American competition without protection, I say it is all the more an evidence of the pernicious effect of a protective system; the pernicious effect is this, that you cannot remove the protection without, to some extent, endangering a large portion of the capital of the country. Well, I admit that is always a grave issue, and a thing which has to be carefully considered. I am clear upon one thing, and that is that such protection, such taxation as this, is unjust; but, at the same time, I am also free to say that, though the tariff in this respect has to be reformed, it has to be reformed cautiously, so as to effect the minimum of injury, and, if possible, no injury at all. I would not be the man to say, much as I deprecate the protective system, much as I believe it to be injurious to the well-being of the country—I would not be the man to say that it should be wiped out at one fell swoop.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. LAURIER. I am surprised at these exclamations. I say that protection should not be removed at one fell swoop; but the difference between the hon. gentleman and myself is that they are not prepared to remove it even at a gradual swoop. I would have no fault to find with these amendments to the tariff so far as they go; I would have no fault to find if the Government did not tell us that they are going to maintain the principle of protection. If they were proposing gradually to remove or abolish the principle of protection, I would be with them, but that is not their policy. As the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) knows very well, this is not a system of scientific protection, it is protection without any science in it at all. What I say about coal oil I also say about the iron duty. How many years is it now? Six or seven years, since the iron duties were remodelled, remodelled to be increased by 50, 60 and sometimes 100 per cent. Now, with what object? With the object of developing in this country the manufacture of pig iron and of bar iron. No one has forgotten, I am sure, the great flourish of trumpets with which those duties were heralded into the world; no one has forgotten, I am sure, the language of Sir John A. Macdonald and Sir Charles Tupper on that occasion. We know how Sir Charles Tupper rolled figures off his tongue, but he never rolled them off as he did on that occasion. Why, we almost heard the roar of the smelting furnaces, we almost smelt the smoke of the charcoal that was to be used in them. There were to be 200,000 men employed in that industry. Well, after six or seven years, what has been the result? The same company who received that amount of protection are again coming to the Government, and, like Oliver Twist, they are asking for more. It has only whetted their appetite. If you increase the tariff, as I hope it will not be increased, the consequence will be that in a few days, in a few years, you will have more capital invested in this industry, and you will not be able to remove that protection, because they will come here and say: Don't touch us; if you do, you will wipe away all the capital we invested in these industries. Now, I want to prevent these consequences to ourselves. I say that a system is false which can produce such results as these. But that is not all. There is something worse than all that in a protective tariff. We charge upon the protective tariff—and no one knows it better than the hon. the Minister of Finance—that it is base and degrading. Under such a system the Government deliver themselves into the hands of masters who are stronger than they, and who hold them fast in submission; and whenever the Government make some attempt at rebellion, immediately their masters take them by the throat and force them back into bondage; and then when they have been forced back into bondage, covered with confusion and shame, they would have the people believe that their attempts at freedom were not genuine, not sincere, but mere "clerical errors." Clerical error, forsooth? I tell the hon. gentleman that the country sees through the phrase, and will not accept the base explanation and the fruitless humiliation. Clerical error! Was it a clerical error which induced the hon. gentleman some few days ago to reduce the duty on democratic wagons from 35 per cent to 25 per cent? That reduction in the duty was proposed in a moment, not of weakness, but of fairness; but immediately he heard the crack of the ministerial whip over his head the Finance Minister was forced into the humiliating condition of coming back and placing again on the farmers' shoulders the duty which he intended to remove. Was it a clerical error also in regard to tea, I want to know, or what is it? The hon. gentleman the other day brought down his tariff respecting tea in such a mild and unobtrusive manner that no one noticed the departure from the old policy. For the last twenty years tea and coffee have been free, with the exception that when imported from the United States they have been subject to a duty of 10 per cent, and from the manner in which the hon. gentleman made the announcement I, for my part, supposed he was re-enacting the old policy without any change. But what are the facts? As the tariff is now constituted, it is intended to levy a tax of 10 per cent on the tea and coffee which comes from England. For what object, I want to know? According to the figures of last year's importations, such a duty collected on tea and coffee would yield a revenue of over \$140,000. Is that the object, or is it not? We have been told by some of the ministerial organs that the object is not to levy a duty on tea coming from England, but that the object is simply to build up a trade with the east, to import our tea direct from China and Japan. I want to know. I ask the Finance Minister, or any man in his senses, what object can we in this country have in destroying an industry only to build up another, to prevent a man from bringing in tea from England and compel him to buy it in China or Japan. What object can we have in compelling our tea to be purchased in the east or rather the west. I very much suspect that there is a nigger in the fence, and that he will be discovered. The Finance Minister has taken some pride, and I do not blame him, for he has been showered with compliments, for having removed specific duties. I do not think, however, he deserves all of them. I confess that the hon. gentleman has removed the most iniquitous duties, the infamous duties upon woollen and cotton goods; but the hon. gentleman has still left in the tariff that iniquity called a specific duty. He has, moreover, introduced in the tariff some of specific duties, which he passed over very gently, but which I suspect will press with the greatest weight on the consuming class. There was a duty on syrup last year of $1\frac{1}{2}$ cents per gallon on the lower grade, which is worth 10 cents a gallon, this duty amounting to about 15 per cent. Now the duty on syrup is placed at $\frac{1}{2}$ a cent per pound, not per gallon. I want to know what is the reason that has induced the Government to change the specific duty from gallon to pound? What is concealed underneath? In a gallon there are 14 pounds, and at $\frac{1}{2}$ a cent per pound the duty will be equal to 7 cents per gallon, and on syrup worth 10 cents per gallon this will be equivalent to a duty of 70 per cent, which the poorer classes of the consumers will have to pay. So I say that though we are removing a good deal of the anomaly connected with the specific duties, yet there is a great deal yet to be removed, and which I hope will be removed before we have concluded the revision of this tariff. But I am asked perhaps, what is your own policy on all these matters, what is the policy of the Liberal party? The policy of the Liberal party is not free trade absolutely, as in England, I am sorry to say. This is the ideal, this is the goal which we will reach some day, a long time perhaps, but towards which we are turning our eyes and are directed at the present time. But while we must for a good many years still continue to levy revenue by customs duties, I say even at this moment while levying duties from customs, it is possible to do so upon the principle of freedom of trade. I challenge, we challenge, as completely and absolutely false and vicious, the principle adopted by hon. gentlemen opposite, that duties should be levied, not for revenue, but simply to favour special interests. Our policy is to levy duties, not for special interests, but for the general good of the community. I say this, that under such a tariff even manufacturers will have a better field than under the present system. When manufacturers know that duties are imposed for revenue and are not therefore raised on revenue at the caprice of the Government, and are not liable to be removed from one day to another, they will have a stability in business which they have not under the policy pursued to-day. Take, for example, the agricultural implement manufacturer. He has his protective duty; he knows what it is. He knows what the cost of production will be, but a man comes to the Finance Minister and says: Mr. Finance Minister, I want to establish a special industry, to develop a great trade, and I desire to have a duty on a certain article. We all know the ordinary phrases used. I will employ so many hands, give increased employment, develop the resources of the country. The result may be that the duty is increased, and 40, 50, or 100 industries are thereby placed in jeopardy. When we have a tariff for revenue only there will be, as I have said, a security which does not exist at the present moment under the policy of the hon. gentlemen opposite. I desire to refer for a short time to the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), who the other day in his speech fired a shot at me, by asserting that once upon a time as a young man I had been a protectionist. Well, I am always averse to discussing my own personal opinions or my personal affairs on the floor of Parliament, but I have too much respect for the words of the hon. member not to give an answer to which he is entitled at my hands. Let me say at once that I am somewhat surprised to see the hon. gentleman in his present position. Only a few months ago my hon. friend announced to the world that he was entering into a crusade in favour of tariff reform, his object being to secure scientific protection. Has he found it? The hon. gentleman did not tell us so the other day, he found protection, but no science in changing the tariff. The hon. gentleman only shows after all that a man may be great in learning in certain directions, but his heart may fail him when he comes to carry out his projects. The hon. gentleman also shows that a man may be good at preaching and poor at practising. He is the Peter the Hermit of the new crusade. Peter the Hermit aroused the whole of Western Europe against the east, and raised an army to accompany him to rescue the holy sepulchre. But he weakened before he reached the goal. After leaving the confines of Europe, when his army was in straightened circumstances, and suffering from famine, he lost his head, he grew faint at heart, and deserted the camp and sought a hiding-place. The crusaders followed him and brought him back to camp, and made him swear not to desert the cause he had preached. Shall we not bring the hon. gentleman back into camp and make him swear he will not again offend? I am afraid, however, we shall have to perform the duty without him. The hon. gentleman has made the charge against me, that in my young days I was a protectionist, a charge as to which I have to offer neither denial, nor defence, nor justification. If it be a crime as you advance in life to think and reflect, and by thought and reflection to review the ideas of younger age, and to substitute for the inexperienced views of youth the more calm and more deliberate opinions of mature age, I have to plead guilty of many crimes of that kind; because apart from political economy many are the subjects as to which I do not hold now the views which I held twenty-five years ago; and if I had to commence my career anew, in the light of the experience which I have acquired many I hope are the mistakes I would avoid. I have to say to my hon. friend from West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), that if in this respect he has been more fortunate than I have been, I do not envy his good fortune at all, but I hold that I have not grown older in vain, and that I am wiser to-day than I was twenty-five years ago. If I wanted to justify myself there are the most illustrious names of the world that would come to my lips: the name of Robert Peel, the name of Gladstone, and what more could I want. But, Sir, I do not stand upon this ground at all. I stand upon the ground of principle and the condition of the country. What is it that is wanted to-day in Canada to develop Canada as she ought to be developed? It is population and nothing else. There have been a series of letters published in the London 'Times,' which perhaps members of this House have all seen, but there is a sentence to which I shall specially call their attention. Speaking of Canada it says:

Her equipment for internal development is excellent, and the greatest want she has is lack of population.

Population is our greatest lack; what we want is population. And, Sir, when I consider that once I was a protectionist in my younger days, and when I consider that during a decade from 1871 to 1881 under a revenue tariff the increase of population in Canada was 13 per cent, and that during the decade from 1881 to 1891 under a protective tariff, this increase of population fell down from 13 to 9 per cent; I also remember the famous words of Victor Hugo when he said: The absurd man is he who never changes; and I leave it to gentlemen on the other side of the House to remain protectionist in the face of these facts.

Mr. DAVIN. My hon. friend has not met my charge.

Mr. DEVLEN. Your charge is discharged.

Mr. LAURIER. Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman also stated that in 1872—

Mr. DAVIN. Mr. Speaker, may I rise to order?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. DAVIN. I am in perfect order. The hon. gentleman professed to state a charge that I made against him. If he will permit me to say so—of course it was unintentional on his part—he has not stated my charge, and I think it is in perfect order that I should say what the charge was. The charge was not that in the course of twenty years he changed his mind; but that a few years after proclaiming himself a protectionist and in favour of a number of other things, he went into Mr. Mackenzie's Government and was as silent as that desk.

Mr. LANDERKIN. It would be a blessed thing if you could get into some place like that.

Mr. LAURIER. Well, Sir, I am sorry to say that there is not anything more to the charge as amended, than as it was preferred before. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) stated that in 1872, the Liberals of Lower Canada while they were assembled in Montreal laid down a platform and adopted as a basis of that platform the policy of protection. I deny the charge in toto. I deny the charge wholly. I am sure my hon. friend has not gone into the records. He must have it from the pickings of newspapers in Lower Canada, but he never found it among the real facts. On the contrary, the Liberals of the district of Quebec have always been in favour of free trade, and as far back as 1847 the Liberal Association, which at that time was presided over by a gentleman who left an honoured name among us, Hon. René Caron, afterwards Lieutenant Governor of Quebec, issued a manifesto in which I read this:

What the firmness and wisdom of the Liberal party have accomplished with regard to these matters, as well as the admission of the responsibility of the executive advisers, must be for all Liberals an indication of what they will be able to achieve through a more active organization and a more vigorous expression of public opinion in favour of these reforms now required by the present condition of affairs.

And the third article of the manifesto was this:

Free trade with all the world and the free navigation of the St. Lawrence.

This manifesto was issued by the Liberals of Quebec, who were of the school of Mr. Lafontaine. I am free to admit that in the district of Montreal the ideas of Mr. Papineau prevailed, and there was a marked tendency in favour of protection, and in so far as I am concerned, I admit that I have been brought up in the school of Mr. Papineau, but time and again for twenty years at least I have declared in Lower Canada that I was a disciple of Mr. Lafontaine. Why should I not hear the whole truth as to this. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) accuses me of having changed my views upon protection. He said a moment ago that I wrote protection in the newspaper 'Le Defricheur.' I never wrote a word about protection in 'Le Defricheur,' but I made a speech once, I remember, in 1871 in the Legislature of Quebec. That was the only speech which I ever made upon that question in which I brought up the views held by Mr. Papineau and which I had derived from him; and I am surprised, I must say, that the loyal gentlemen who support the Government should reproach me for not now holding the views which I held then. Sir, it is a well-known fact in Lower Canada, and to those who know anything of the history of Canada: that Mr. Papineau, prior to the rebellion of 1837, laid down as his doctrine that we should buy nothing from England. And when I spoke in the Legislature of Quebec, coming flush with youth and victory, I stated that at that time there was as much reason to adhere to the policy of Mr. Papineau as in the year 1837. But, Mr. Speaker, what did I find? When I went to the facts I found that Mr. Papineau had not introduced that doctrine for any reason of political economy, but simply for political reasons to fight the British Government and to force them to give us that protection for our liberties which we required, or else to force the country into independence. Shall I read the resolution moved at the famous meeting held on the 7th of May, 1837: a resolution which was not moved by a Frenchman, but by an Englishman, Dr. Wilfred Nelson. It was as follows:—

That the measure of Lord John Russell, which takes away from the Assembly all control over the revenue, is a flagrant violation of all the rights granted to Lower Canada by the capitulation and the treaty.

That the Government which can adopt such violent measures and thus destroy right, by force and violence, is a contemptible Government unworthy of respect and even of allegiance.

That the people of Lower Canada will refrain as much as possible from the consumption of imported articles, and will make use of products manufactured in the country so as to deprive the Government of the revenue which it is its hope to obtain by collecting the duties imposed on foreign goods.

Now, Sir, that was a political object as I said, and not an object of political economy, and now that we have obtained all the liberties which we were striving for then, I leave it to gentlemen on the other side of the House to pursue the policy of buying nothing from England, a policy which to-day they are pursuing with a vengeance. Hitherto their policy has been, not to buy anything from England; and their defence has been: that they applied this policy only to such goods as we produced in this country in order to force their production here. But to-day they have gone a step further, and when they tax tea, it is not for the purpose of promoting the growth of that article. This is the defence which I have to make on that point. Now, Sir, I have only this more to say: Speaking here in the maturity of my years and in the maturity of my convictions, formed, as I hope, by deep reflection and thought, I say this—and in saying it I am voicing the sentiments of all the Liberals in this country—that whatever may be our future relations with England—whether we remain as we are to-day, or whether the bond between us becomes closer or looser—it shall always be our aim and purpose to cultivate and maintain and promote, not only the most friendly sentiments, but also the most ample business relations with the great nation which, notwithstanding all that may be said by hon. gentlemen opposite to the contrary, is to-day by all odds the foremost commercial power that the world has ever seen.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Speaker, I am aware that the House is exceedingly anxious to divide upon the question which is now before it; and, upon that account, it is against my own wish that I am intruding in the debate, and I only arise, Sir, because the member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy)—who I regret to see is not now in his seat—seemed last night when he made his speech upon the resolutions before the House, to look longingly towards me that he might be not entirely neglected or passed over in the debate. Before I begin to deal with some of the remarks which were made by him, I wish to say a word or two as to the hon. leader of the Opposition, who has just taken his seat. I regret that I was unable to be present during the whole of his speech, and that, in consequence, I shall be able to refer to his closing remarks only. I have no hesitation in saying that my hon. friend from Western Assiniboia (Mr. Davin, does not require any defence at my hands; nor have I any desire to mingle in the little disputes in which that hon. gentleman may be engaged with the leader of the Opposition or any of the gentlemen who sit around him. I only enter into this dispute for a moment to say to the leader of the Opposition that when he announced that his speech in 1871 was the only speech in which he had advocated protection in the Dominion of Canada, he had, to say the least of it, an exceedingly bad memory. The hon. gentleman was in this House in the year 1876, and if he will go to the 'Hansard' of that year, he will find that he was a protectionist still, notwithstanding the fact that from 1871 to 1876 he had five years of maturer light and investigation, notwithstanding that the question had then been fully and voluminously discussed, inside and outside of Parliament. Let me, for the edification of the hon. gentleman, quote the speech he then delivered, and place it against the contentions which he has made in this House this afternoon:

What my hon. friend has said as to my protective proclivities is perfectly true, and I do not deny that I have been a protectionist, which I am still. It is asserted by many, and assumed by others, that free trade is a Liberal principle, and protection a Conservative principle. I beg to dissent from this doctrine. If I were in Great Britain—

It appears this, his geographical position, has now changed—

If I were in Great Britain I would avow free trade; but I am a Canadian, born and resident here, and I think that we require protection. I consider, however, that the present tariff affords sufficient protection.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The hon. gentlemen opposite grab at a very small straw when they are sinking. I ask the hon. gentlemen to cheer when I have done. He continues:

It may be said that this was not the real object in view; but I care little for the motive—I only regard the results. We have at the present time a 17½ per cent tariff, which is protection for Canadian manufacturer against foreign competition. But that is not all. Against the English competitor he has the difference of freight in his favour, and against the American competitor he has the difference in the price of labour.

Why, Sir, the hon. gentleman is surely in sympathy with this Administration. But that is not all:

We have within ourselves the ability to create an industry. If it be shown that we cannot maintain it, unless by legislation either in the way of premium or prohibitory tariff, then I should be ready to take that into consideration.

Sir, I do not hear the cheers of hon. gentlemen opposite. The only difference between the hon. gentleman who leads the forces on the other side of the House and we so-called selfish restrictionists on this side is that we are protectionists while he is a trade prohibitionist. Now, Mr. Speaker, I am exceedingly sorry, as I said before, that the member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) is not in his place this afternoon, because I have a few words to say to him with regard to some statements he made, and particularly with regard to some gratuitous insolence that he saw fit to offer to a member of the Cabinet as well as to my humble self, who happened to be sitting beside him. I must say, Sir, that, however delighted hon. gentlemen opposite may have been with the remarks which the hon. member for North Simcoe made in the House last evening, the members on this side were not at all disappointed. Neither we nor the country were hanging in breathless expectation on the words which that hon. gentleman was to utter. The day has long gone by when the member for North Simcoe might be regarded as an independent member of this House. Last year when I was saying a few words to him in connection with a resolution which he had placed on the Notice paper, I took occasion to note a speech which he had once made against the genial member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), whom he had described as balancing himself upon a pole only waiting to fall into the arms of hon. gentlemen opposite, and I ventured to predict in my humble way that the fate, if I may be permitted to use the word, of the hon. member for South Oxford, would be the fate of the member for North Simcoe. I fancy, Sir, that as you and the country peruse his speech of last evening, you will find that the fatal fall has taken place, and that the member for North Simcoe, instead of being an independent of this House, is a member of Her Majesty's loyal Opposition, endeavouring to let no opportunity pass of bringing injury and destruction to the Conservative Administration of this country. Examine the hon. gentleman's speech from beginning to end, and I defy any gentleman, in this Chamber or out of it, to show one single line or sentence that is the judgment of a fair-minded, independent man with regard to a Government against whose members he has not a personal and individual hostility. What is the fact? Instead of being the judgment of an independent, unbiassed, impartial man, his utterances here last night were but the echoes of his own disappointed hopes and ambitions. Well I do not object to the hon. gentleman's position in any particular regard. He has a perfect right to move from this side of the House to that; he has a perfect right to adopt this platform or that; he has an undoubted right to change his position just as often as he likes, and I am bound to say that he is making splendid use of that liberty. But what I do object to is that the hon. gentleman should pose as an independent statesman or public man, and that his judgment should be taken as an independent judgment against this or any other Government. I know that the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) objects to being told that he has joined the hon. gentlemen opposite. Only a few months ago, he said he detested hon. gentlemen opposite, and when one of the members of this House, a short time ago, chaffed the hon. gentleman with having joined the party opposite, he was modest enough to say, "No; but the party of hon. gentlemen opposite have joined me." And then, when my hon. friend said to him: But what are you going to do with the present leader of the Opposition—the brilliant and scholarly gentleman whom we have just listened to? Oh, he said, he was never anything but a makeshift. And when asked: What will you do then with the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), who is in the direct line of the leadership of that party? He said: We will dismiss Sir Charles Tupper and send him to England as the representative of the Canadian Government.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Would the hon. gentleman give us his authority? It is a matter of some interest to me.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Let the hon. gentleman possess his happy soul in patience. The hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) cannot have the appointment made just now, but he will attend to it as quickly as possible. Now, I may say to the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), that we have no objection whatever to his occupying the position he does—a position of sympathy with hon. gentlemen opposite. But I do not fancy that there is very much love between them. I do not imagine, for instance, that there can be very much love between the genial member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) and the intellectual member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy). Both have too large, selfish ambitions of their own. But this I will say, that the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) is an undoubted addition to the combination of statesmen who sit on the other side of the House, endeavouring to attract public attention and public confidence. Heaven knows, Sir, they have tried everything in this country to gather crowds around them and gain support. For instance, Sir, last year, down in the city of Montreal, they wished to get a great demonstration together for the purpose of listening to the views on the new trade policy which they had just then adopted. And in order to gather the forces together, I think in Sohmer Park, they had the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) advertised; they had the leader of the Opposition advertised; they had the philosophical gentleman who sits beside him (Mr. Mills) advertised; they had the Liberal whip (Mr. Sutherland) advertised, besides a large number of local politicians in the province of Quebec, and then, in addition to that, they had a little programme of sports. There was to be a married women's race; there was to be a boys' race; there was to be a barrel of water race; there was to be a potato race; and there was to be a blindman's race, the contestants in which it was understood would be the confiding partisans who follow these individuals with no explanation of their policy. And now, I submit that in addition to this splendid array of talent and entertainment, it only requires the addition of the most celebrated political acrobat of this decade to draw a crowd and afford amusement for almost any portion of the population. I have waited thus far to make a personal explanation, hoping that the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) would be in his place, because what I say behind his back I am exceedingly anxious to say to his face. Last light, gratuitously, as I have said, the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) offered an insult to a Minister of the Crown in the person of the Minister of Railways and Canals. I am not here to defend the Minister of Railways and Canals, he needs no defence from any one in this House or out of this House. As the administrator of a great public department, he has made a record, Sir, which will go down in the annals of Canadian administration as unsurpassed, if equalled. But when the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) endeavours to cast a personal slur at the Minister of Railways and Canals—when he charged that I had been called on, or that I had been honoured with the request to assist the hon. Minister in the construction of the speech he made, the hon. gentleman made a statement for which he had not the slightest foundation, and a statement which no gentleman should have made in this House without serious consideration, and a statement in which there was not even a modicum of truth. But, Sir, men who live in glass houses should not throw stones. There are other men in this country who have been assisted in preparing their speeches. There are men of no less importance than the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) himself, and I have the evidence in my possession this afternoon that is no great credit to him. Sir, the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), a few years ago, made a series of speeches in the province of Ontario, and among those speeches he made one in the county of Haldimand, whose good people I have the honour to represent in this House. He made a speech there, and the hon. gentleman had had some little assistance in preparing the notes for that speech from an individual who has since attained considerable celebrity in rather an un-Canadian quarter, in connection with the public life of this country. I have here in my hands the notes of that speech. They are in the handwriting of the celebrated Edward Farrer. Apparently they were not sufficiently complete, and, so in Mr. McCarthy's own handwriting, they are completed, forming a happy union of effect, and if you examine these notes and read the speech in the 'Mail' as published at the time you will find the hon. gentleman faithfully followed the lead given him by Edward Farrer, who was then editor of the Toronto 'Mail.' The man who regards it as his duty to advise the people of the United States to put on the screws against Canada and bring Canada to her knees. Now, last year, in speaking to the motion which the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) made in this House, I had occasion to say something with regard to the different positions which that gentleman had taken upon the trade question. I quite agree with the leader of the Opposition, that a man has a perfect right to change his opinions as his thought matures and his judgment ripens. But what I want to show is that the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) not only changed his opinions as his judgment matured or ripened, but, within the short space of a year, he has radically changed his position upon the trade question, as evidenced by his speech in this House last night. Last year he laid down certain principles by which he declared that he should be guided. In a speech made just before he came to the House, he declared that he was a National Policy man. He said, addressing his supporters: We are all National Policy men, and it is not so much a matter of policy which has driven me from the ranks, but the question of a personal dispute between myself and some of the members of the Government, and between me and the party organ which supports the Government. I showed then that that was the hon. gentleman's record all the years back to 1876. I showed then that in 1882, after he had had time to examine the effects of the National Policy, he declared that it was a wonderful success in this country. But let us examine for a moment or so the various positions which he has taken during the past year. Speaking at Orangeville only this past summer, the hon. member for North Simcoe said he was not going to entirely abolish protection, but that he thought that the manufacturers would be able to get along with the protection that was afforded by a revenue tariff. Speaking in Toronto, he said: Are you going to admit the Yankees to this market? and he answered no, because the Yankees will not admit us to their market, and, therefore, I am opposed to admitting them to ours. Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask hon. gentlemen to put these statements beside the statements which he made here last night. One was that he would absolutely destroy protection in this country, and, next, he condemned the Government because in this tariff, he said, there was no hope held out of closer trade relations with the people of the United States. Sir, it appears to me that the hon. gentleman is suffering from a sort of political melancholia. This is a disease one of the symptoms of which is a complete distaste and aversion to everything that one loved when in health, and I fancy the hon. gentleman's political disease has been that sort of political melancholia which makes him now go back upon everything he thought right when he was upon this side of the House. And so, last night, when he made his speech, he was no longer a National Policy man, no longer even a revenue tariff man, but he held the principle of protection in any form to be a monstrous principle, and the policy of this Government to be a monstrous policy, to use the very language which he employed in addressing the House. So much for the hon. gentleman's change with regard to this question during the past year. Now, Sir, I want to look for a moment at an extraordinary proposition which the hon. gentleman made in this House last night. In the first place, last year's resolution upon the trade question moved by the member for North Simcoe, contained this clause :

That the Government should forthwith reduce the duties upon articles which are enumerated in our customs list.

Not one moment's delay should be allowed. The Government asked for time to inquire into all the circumstances and to be fully informed as to the views and opinions, the wants and desires and interests of the people. But the member for North Simcoe said : No ; we must condemn this Government because they had not done this, without a moment's reflection and without a moment's preparation for the task. What did he say last night ? His announcement to the House last night was, that this Government should not have touched the tariff until after the general election had been held and the people of this country permitted to voice their sentiments upon it. Was any position of a public man in this country ever so ridiculous ? Sir, the hon. gentleman mistook the character of this Government and this party. We are not anxious to go to the country under false pretenses. We are not anxious to go to the country with indefinite, hazy promises, such as hon. gentlemen opposite make when they discuss these questions with the electorate of Canada, when they offer a different policy for every section of the Dominion. We want one policy for the whole Dominion. Even an opponent of the Government will not contradict my statement, when I say that the Government has taken a manly stand. They have come down to this House two years before the general election with their pronounced policy. They declare that they will protect the industries of this country in a fair manner, but that they will continue that protection no longer, if it should be put to improper use ; and they say they will reduce, as far as lies in their power, the taxes upon the necessaries of life. And they submit that policy to the people of this country and ask the people, in their good judgment, to say whether they are right or whether they are wrong. I ask the member for North Simcoe to say whether the policy of the Government, whether the stand taken by the Government has not been a manly stand, such as the people of this country would expect from a Government having confidence in their own policy and believing that it was the best policy to be pursued in the interest of the whole Dominion of Canada ? The member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) has declared in this House, that we will not be here after the next election. He has declared that this is the last word we shall hear upon the tariff from the members of the present Government. I tell him, Sir, that the country has passed judgment upon many a political leader such as he, and that judgment has been adverse to their political ambitions and aspirations. And I tell him also, that the members of this party have no hesitation in saying that they believe they ought to enjoy the confidence of the people of this country, as they believe they do enjoy that confidence and will enjoy it after the election is over. In one part of the province of Ontario the member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) said the party will never trust the present leader of the present Conservative Administration. I tell him once more that he is wrong ; I tell him that the ranks that were solid behind the old chieftain who is gone, are solid now behind the new chieftain who fills his place. And I tell him still further, that, when the voice of the whole people speaks in the next election, it will be found that the men of Ontario, who are said to be recreant to the leader, will send a message to the members of our party in the little province by the sea, that they have helped to carry to victory the standard of a great Nova Scotian, just as the men of Nova Scotia have often helped in other days to carry to victory the standard of the leader whose home was in the province of Ontario. But, Sir, coming down to some of the particular questions with which the hon. gentleman dealt last night, I wish to say something in connection with the preface to his remarks upon the trade question. The preface to these remarks dealt with the debt of Canada. Surely, Sir, the hon. gentleman is being contaminated, if I may be allowed to use such an expression, by his associations. Surely he has borrowed the blue goggles that are worn by my hon. friend from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), because, as he looks around upon the country and its prospects, everything wears that bluish, or bilious, or greenish, tint, that is demonstrative of political ill-health, and ill-temper. Now, I ask the hon. members of this House to read the hon. gentleman's speech ; as many of them listened to it, they will be able to follow me as I deal with its statements. I say, in the first place, that the hon. gentleman, while he gave a gratuitous advertisement of the debt of Canada—so fondly advertised by the member for South Oxford, whose splendid descriptions of that public debt are copied by the politicians of the United States, who use them to enthuse any one that happens to be Anglophobic in his tendencies on the other side of the line—the hon. member for North Simcoe, while he gave a gratuitous advertisement of the public debt of Canada, I say did not point out one single item composing the increase of that debt which he condemned. If he had done so, the members of this House would have called to mind a time when, with feelings of pride, the member for North Simcoe supported those very increases of public debt to which he might have referred. Sir, the public debt has been so thoroughly and so often discussed in this House that I do not desire to go into its details, but to pass along in comment upon the position which he took. He says if we had known the burdens that are now falling upon us, we would have hesitated to make the grand improvements that were made in our endeavours to nationalize the Dominion of Canada. Sir, is there a man in this House who, at this day will dare to stand up and say that we made a mistake when we burdened ourselves with a paltry million and a half for the purchase of that great empire of the prairies? Is there a man in this House will say, in common sense, and in his right mind, that he would undo the work we performed in connection with that great national highway, which has been the grandest achievement that any people of five millions have ever performed in the progressive history of the world? Does the hon. gentleman say that he would undo the work which we have done in connection with our canals, or the dredging of our harbours, or our rivers? No constituency has received more advantages in these respects than the constituency of the hon. gentleman who made the attack upon the public debt last night. Will the hon. gentleman say that we should not have given assistance to railways to open up various portions of the country? Is it a wise policy for this Government? Let me answer it by saying that it is regarded by municipalities sometimes, indeed, often, as a wise policy to burden themselves with a heavy weight of direct taxation for the purpose of placing themselves as closely as possible within reach of the great consuming markets of the world. And that has been the policy of this Government—to lend its assistance to every portion of the country by placing it as closely as possible to the great consuming millions to whom we must sell the products of our Canadian farms. But I fancy the hon. gentleman will offer no objection to the railway bonuses which have helped to increase the public debt, and which have effected the development to which I refer, for the hon. gentleman's section of country, as usual, got the lion's share; the hon. gentleman's constituency got twice as much per mile as any other constituency, or any other section of country within the boundary of the Dominion of Canada. Now, then, the hon. gentleman has pointed us to the United States, and has asked us to make a comparison between our debts and theirs. I am not going to weary the House with figures, but I want to mention two or three facts which the hon. gentleman carefully hid from this House when he made the comparisons between their debt and ours; and we wept, metaphorically speaking, when he spoke of that comparison. He said: Why, they have very little public debt, and we have a very large public debt. I tell him that the two cannot be compared at all. I tell him that we have done work that the Federal Government of the United States never dreamed of doing.

Mr. MONTAGUE.

I tell him that we have given large subsidies to the provinces, which have saved the mass of the people in those provinces from direct taxation, and the Federal Government of the United States never did anything of the kind, their State Governments by direct taxation paying their expenditures. I tell him that this Government have digged our canals; but, on the other side of the line it is the State Governments, by direct taxation of the people, which have done those works. I tell him that we have bonused railways to an enormous extent for the development of Canada. but, on the other side of the line that has been done by the various State Governments. So the hon. gentleman could have had no sentiment of fairness when he made that comparison. Why, Sir, had the Federal Government here failed to do these things, and pursued the American system, we should now have no debt, but a large surplus in the Treasury. But what is the fact at the present time? I might mention also that in the United States objection is being made to our Canadian railways. Why? Because they say that the Canadian railways are able to carry freight cheaper. And why are they able to carry freight cheaper? Because they are not held down with a bonded indebtedness, the bonded indebtedness of railways on the other side of the line being double that of the railways of Canada. The Federal Government of this country has endeavoured to assist the construction of railways in order that the people may have better access to the markets of other countries. Now, I want to tell the hon. member for North Simcoe, who has been talking generalities, that there is no more contemptible—I use the word, of course, in its political and not in its personal sense—there is no more contemptible manner of attacking the policy of a Government “or its conduct in administration” than by assertions or innuendos, or leaving inferences to be drawn, as when details are not presented by the man who is making the innuendo, or allowing the inference to be drawn. What was the object of the hon. gentleman? His object undoubtedly was to have it go before the country as coming from an independent member of this House, that this country had arrived at a position of alarm, financially. His word, I think, was that “we were in an exceedingly unfortunate financial position.” Now, he could not have selected a more inappropriate time for the utterance of such a sentiment. He selected a time when Canada has been held up by the statesmen of other lands as being the only solid rock that has stood the storm of commercial catastrophe “sweeping over the world.” He selected the time when we are complimented everywhere, even in the columns of the ‘Globe,’ which echoes the sentiments of the hon. member for South Oxford, who never was charged anywhere with painting a too silvery and roseate condition of Canada and its people. Even the 'Globe,' pointing the finger of scorn to the grand sixty-million market, to which my hon. friend bids us turn our eyes—even the 'Globe' says they are having serious trouble over there, the banks are being ruined, great commercial institutions are collapsing the whole financial world of the United States is in a sort of chaos, but it adds: "As regards Canada, our last bank failure is so long ago that it requires an old inhabitant to remember it." Yet this is the time which the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) selected to say that we are in a distressing financial position. Why, Sir, last year in the city of Chicago there was held what might be called a congress of the nations of the world. There were gathered in competition civilized and barbarous nations. I ask the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) to investigate the facts, and he will find that Canadians should be proud of the position that Canada, blue ruin Canada, to which the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) so often refers, occupied amongst the civilized nation represented in that great gathering in Jackson Park, that it was the only one of those of civilized nations whose trade was not decreasing, it was the only one of those nations whose revenue was not diminishing, even while its taxation was being reduced, as it was being reduced in the Dominion of Canada under the rule of hon. gentlemen who now occupy the Treasury benches. Sir, I think in view of these facts it was an exceedingly unfortunate time for the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) to say we are in exceedingly difficulty financial position. There is even better evidence than this, and I use it because the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) dealt with it last night. He took the greatest pains to show to this House that the rate of interest on our public debt had not decreased through any good management or the high standing that Canada occupies in the money market of the world, but that it had decreased simply because there had been a decrease all over and we could not avoid participating somewhat in that decrease so far as the debt of Canada was concerned. Sir, what is the fact? The fact is this, that Canada's credit stands higher than the credit of any other colony that owes allegiance to the British Crown. Not only that, but Canada's credit stands second to the credit of Great Britain herself; and not only so, but we have decreased our rate of interest at a greater rate than has the mother land herself. I give the hon. gentleman the figures, as he may wish them. In the past four years English consols, instead of yielding as they did in 1878, £3-2-6, in 1892 yielded £2-17-6, a reduction of 8 per cent in fourteen years. Canada in 1879 paid as a rate of interest 4-06 per cent, in 1893 she paid 3-26 per cent, or a reduction of 21 per cent in the same fourteen years to which I have referred. Another evidence to me that the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) had borrowed the blue glasses that are worn by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) is the fact that breathing the atmosphere with which he is now surrounded, breathing that somewhat billous atmosphere which so permeates the ranks of hon. gentlemen opposite, he saw in the misty and hazy distance one of those creatures that disturbed the slumber of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) when he was in power—a deficit, and so he warned the House that he saw in the distance a deficit, and he warned the Finance Minister that he had better take care because this deficit was coming. Let me say to him this, that the Finance Minister thoroughly understands his work, that notwithstanding an occasional sneer that may be hurled across the House in regard to my hon. friend being a poor successor to the great man whom he has followed, he thoroughly understands his position, and he has guarded against future difficulty. What is the fact? The announcement has been made by the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy): You are reducing taxation and a deficit must follow. But that is not the experience of this side of the House. In 1882, I think, the duty was taken off tea; but the revenue bounded up in a very short time. In 1891, $3,000,000 in duties was taken off sugar. The Minister of Finance acknowledged that there must be a decrease in revenue; but after one year's decrease in revenue, the improved condition of the people enabled them to purchase more, and the result was that the revenue bounded up again. What is the position at the present time? The Minister of Finance has now reduced the duties to such an extent as to cause a probable decrease of revenue to the extent of $1,600,000, and the Toronto 'Mail' declares that the sum will be nearer $4,000,000 than $1,600,000. But the hon. gentleman has taken pains to say to this House: If there is a deficit, I am not going to meet it by borrowing funds, as was done by hon. gentlemen opposite, borrowing money, not for the construction of public works, but to pay for the ordinary running expenses of the Government of Canada. I am not going to adopt the policy which hon. gentlemen opposite adopted on another occasion, of taking the duty from one necessary of life and putting a duty three times as high on another necessary, that bore still more heavily on the people, namely 5 and 6 cents on two varieties of tea that were imported here. The Finance Minister has come down to the House in a manly, straightforward, statesmanlike manner, and has said: The revenue must fall, but this Government will exercise the most rigid economy, and when the year rolls round I hope to see that Canada has again adjusted the balance and the revenue meets the expenditure even with these duties removed. That is the spirit in which the Finance Minister has met the House, and the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), instead of meeting it with carping criticism should have received the Finance Minister's statement in a frank, manly way, when he spoke on the tariff changes in this Chamber. The Government might have adopted another policy. They might have adopted the policy of raising their revenues from duties on raw material. That was a policy also adopted by hon. gentlemen opposite. Those hon. gentlemen had a sort of trinity of policies: first, taxation of raw material, which was destructive to the industries of Canada; second, taxation of those articles which were upon every table in the land; and third, when those two did not produce sufficient revenue, borrow a little money to pay the ordinary expenditure in the years that have passed. The Minister of Finance has discarded these three policies as being, although perhaps expedient for the Liberals, not wise in the interests of Canada, and he has taken the course to which I have referred. I desire to say a word or two as to one class of raw material which hon. gentlemen opposite taxed. When those hon. gentlemen were in power they placed a high specific duty upon sugar—and I only mention it because it was referred by the hon. member from North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy)—and in his admirable speeches throughout the province of Ontario, and I am glad to say that every part of the province he visited, he described it as the garden of Canada, the leader of the Opposition declared that there was a curse, and an iniquity was being perpetrated on the people of this country in consequence of the sugar duties that had been levied by this Government. I pass by the fact that the hon. gentleman stated it twice, and neither time hit the proper percentage, because it made no difference with the calculation which the hon. gentleman made. But I state this as a fact: that if there is one line of policy which they followed when they were in power, and one article which these gentlemen never should mention before the electors of this country, it is the article of sugar and the sugar industries. What was their position? They placed a high duty upon each and every pound of raw material or raw sugar that came into Canada. What was the result? I do not need to conjecture; I do not need to suppose nor to reason from the facts of the case. When their friends were behind them, when Mr. Workman, of Montreal, and Mr. Devlin and others were behind them, Mr. Jones, of Halifax, as well, they stood up in their seats and declared that the policy of those men, by taxing at a higher rate the raw material which entered into the refining of sugar, than the refined material itself, had closed up every refinery in the land, and had driven thousands—I use the word "thousands," as used by these men—of hands out of employment in the Dominion of Canada. What was the price of sugar in these days? I need not refer to it. What are the facts when at the present time raw sugar has been made free? Millions of dollars have been invested in this industry, thousands of men are engaged to-day in earning a livelihood for their families and paying for the value of their homes. It is the pride of the Dominion of Canada at the present time; and what is the result so far as the people of Canada are concerned? Three or four millions of dollars of taxation has been removed from their shoulders, and instead of the people of this country being burdened down by the price of sugar complained of by the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) last night; while the average price of sugar delivered in New York last year was $5.17 per 100 pounds, the Canadian sugar made by Canadian hands, employing profitably Canadian capital, was delivered in Montreal, not at $5.17, but at $4.93 per 100 pounds. Sir, there is a difference between the two policies; the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite and the policy of this Government, and I ask the members of this House as I ask the people of this country to apply a calm and impartial judgment to it, and I have no hesitation in saying that I have no fear as to what that judgment will be when the proper time comes.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Speaker, when you left the Chair at dinner time I had just dealt with the policy of the Liberal party—with which policy the member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) seemed to have expressed his agreement—in connection with one of the great industries of Canada. I come now to discuss, Sir, for a very few moments, not the assertions which have been made by the hon. gentleman, but some of the omissions; glaring omissions, it seemed to me, having regard to the position which he occupies as the leader of a party, having regard to the place which he aspires to in Canadian public life. I say that under these circumstances they were very glaring omissions. During a speech of about two hours to which this House listened very patiently, to which this House listened, I fancy, rather expectantly, the hon. gentleman failed to propound in any one particular a policy of tariff, or a system of raising the revenue which is necessary for Canada. I ask hon. gentlemen to read that speech over carefully, and they will find that the member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), during the two hours he occupied the attention of the House, did not inform us as to one single tenet of the policy which he would carry out if he were in control of the affairs of Canada. Although he swept away the revenue with a master stroke, he neglected to provide any substitute or to tell us in what manner he would produce sufficient revenue for the needs of Canada. He failed to do, as hon. gentlemen opposite are very fond of doing, in generalities; he failed to point out not only where he would raise a revenue, but he failed also to point out one single item of expenditure from which he could relieve the people of this country. Such being the case, we must take it that the hon. gentleman agrees with the expenditure which is now being made by Canada, as absolutely necessary for the requirements of the public service. I fancy that the hon. gentleman thinks it is not sufficient for the needs of Canada to perform the duties which as a colony of Great Britain she ought to perform. These gentlemen who are tariff reformers, whether they sit on the Opposition side of the House or whether they pretend to sit upon the cross benches, are very fond of saying what they would do in regard to the fiscal system; but at the same time they are very fond of loading up the necessities of the revenue by schemes and fads of their own. The leader of the Opposition is distinctly pledged, not to a reduction of expenditure, but, as he answered to the Minister of Railways the other night, and as he answered to myself in the session of 1891, he was prepared to load the expenditure by an increase of many millions of dollars in accordance with the agreement which he made with Mr. Mercier as to the Quebec resolutions. My hon. friend from North Simcoe, who with one bold stroke of a master statesman's pen is to slash and cut and hew away the revenue of Canada—not caring, as the theorists never care, for the necessities either of the present or the future—has also provided a scheme whereby the expenditure is not to be decreased, but whereby it is to be increased. I did not notice it in the speeches which the hon. gentleman delivered to the poor, burdened farmers of the province of Ontario, but I did notice it in an after-dinner speech which he delivered, not when he was looking for votes, but when he was hob-nobbing with the great and the wealthy and the loyal in the old land across the seas. There, speaking at the dinner table, he said he was ashamed, as a Canadian—his policy was the very opposite—that we did not help to support the navy and the army of Great Britain. And so, this gentleman, who would sweep away the revenue of Canada at a single stroke, wishes to load up the expenditure of Canada, not with additional subsidies to Mr. Mercier and his various friends in the different provinces, but with additional burdens for the purpose of helping to pay the navy and army expenses of the Empire to which we belong. I remarked to the hon. gentleman that in two hours he had not told us one single word as to what his system would be. Hero as he may be, he was not so heroic as the

hon. leader of the Opposition. The hon. leader of the Opposition this afternoon recognized the position he was in, and made an effort to explain what his system was. Was it free trade? Oh, yes, in the dim and distant and hazy future; and I think that when he uttered the words he was praying to Heaven that the time might never come. Nevertheless, that was his policy. But the hon. member for North Simcoe, while indulging in a large amount of fault-finding with the policy of this Government, did not deign to take into his confidence this House—composed as it is of 215 of the chosen representatives of Canada, charged with the management of its public affairs;—he did not deign to take this House into his confidence to the extent of one single word as to the system which he intended to adopt should he lead a party successfully to power. Possibly the hon. gentleman thought no such necessity would ever arise, and I am bound to think that his judgment was correct for once. However, Sir, I want to show, by a simple and homely illustration, the position the hon. gentleman has taken. He says to the Canadian people: You are living in a miserable hovel, the rain is falling upon you, you are shivering in the cold; and yet he takes his axe and hammers down the hovel, but fails to erect even a single board or canvas under which the people of this country are to be protected from the storms. Now, Sir, what is the hon. gentleman's policy? Is it absolute free trade? I do not hear him answer. Perhaps it is absolute free trade in the dim and distant future. He has not given us even the satisfaction of reading a resolution of his. Last year he gave us a wonderful resolution. It was a resolution which, as I said then, put to shame the man of many resolutions, the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). But this year he has not even told us whether or not he is going to vote for the resolution of the hon. member for South Oxford. He has left us entirely in the dark. While doing this, he read a lecture to my hon. friend from East York (Mr. Maclean) as to certain arguments which that hon. gentleman had been presenting to this House. It seems that recently the hon. member for North Simcoe has been reading some books upon trade questions, and, like the students whom he mentioned as just having graduated from college, he has apparently imbibed these model policies. The only difficulty which the hon. gentleman will probably experience will be to find a model country to which to apply a model policy. But I fancy that when he criticised, as he did in unmeasured and not too kindly terms, the hon. member for East York, the hon. gentleman was forgetful that the very authorities which he was quoting on his side saw better in other days, and went back on practice upon the statements which he was quoting for the edification of the House. But, Sir, he is not the only free trade prophet that has arisen; nor is the hon. leader of the Opposition the only free trade prophet that has arisen. I remember reading a prophecy of Cobden, delivered when England had carried the measure of free trade which she possesses, to the effect that in less than a quarter of a century, every civilized country under the sun would have adopted the same policy as England. Sir, fifty years ago it looked as if the nations of the world were going to adopt free trade; but, as the hon. gentleman for East York said, the theory is one way, and the practice the other, and, instead of the nations of the world adopting free trade, we have, with the exception of Great Britain, a solid phalanx of protected nations, who have adopted protection as the best method of serving the interests of their people. Now, Sir, the policy which my hon. friend is advocating, if he has any policy, must be one thing or the other. As he has not told us, let me ask him again, what is his system? Is he an absolute free trader? My hon. friend is silent. Evidently he is not an absolute free trader. But supposing he is an absolute free trader, what does that mean? It means certainly that no duty shall be charged against any import that comes to Canada. Now, what is the result of that? There is only one result, Sir, and that result is direct taxation to the extent of twenty or twenty-one millions of dollars to supplement the other items of our revenue. Does he advocate the English system? Once more I pause for a reply. Will he throw down the bars upon our great manufacturing industries, and tax only eight or nine articles which are the necessaries of life?—and I pause once more and ask the hon. gentleman whether that is his system; because, having read all those books recently, he must have some system fixed in his mind. Now, Sir, supposing that my hon. friend adopts the English system, what is the result? The result is, supposing that he taxes the necessaries of life to the extent of $8,000,000, then he has a balance of from $12,000,000 to $13,000,000 to raise. How shall it be raised? I ask the hon. gentleman to say whether I am wrong in stating that there is only one way—by some form of direct taxation on the people of this country; and I ask my hon. friend here and now whether in any of his addresses in his campaign throughout the province of Ontario, he dared mention direct taxation to the people of that province. And yet in saying that he would sweep away our tariff with a sweep of his hand, he is leading up, as sure as death and taxes come to us all, to direct taxation. Now, then, if he is not in favour of any system, is he in favour of the system these gentlemen adopted between 1874 and 1879. I think I heard an inkling of it in his speech—I think he mentioned the mystic number, 17½. Seventeen and a half per cent was the duty placed by hon. gentlemen opposite. Has the hon. gentleman come down now to a 17½ per cent basis. Once more I pause for a reply. I desire to know whether he has adopted the old programme of hon. gentlemen opposite. But the hon. gentleman, I fancy does not care to reply. Perhaps he has read so many of his books that he has not exactly classified his knowledge, and consequently has exactly made up his mind as to just how the details of his system may be carried out. Let me tell him this, that should he adopt the policy of 1878, taking the imports of last year, the dutiable imports, which amounted to $69,000,000, and deducting from that amount the necessaries of life, which he says ought to be free, you have $61,000,000 of imports upon which to raise a revenue. At 17½ per cent you would raise about $11,500,000, and you would have a deficit, to be raised by direct taxation, of $9,000,000 or $10,000,000. But, supposing the hon. gentleman says: No, we will not adopt the 17½ per cent, but will put just sufficient on for revenue and nothing more. Where does the hon. gentleman find himself then? He finds himself raising from $20,000,000 to $21,000,000 upon $61,000,000 of imports, and he will be compelled to place a duty on these of 32 per cent, which is 4 per cent higher than the tariff against which he made a two hours' speech last night. Now, I have presented to the hon. gentleman the alternative. He must take one of these ways in which to produce a revenue for Canada, and until he does so, he is not entitled to the confidence of the House or the country, who want a definite plan laid before them, and no hazy will-o'-the-wisp for which to vote and follow. I come next to the statement of the hon. gentleman—a positive statement—that this tariff brought down by the Government is a manufacturers' tariff. But in the very same breath he complimented—no, Sir, he did not compliment, for it is not in his heart to compliment this Government upon anything—but he allowed himself to say that specific duties, the bane of the consumer, had been taken off very largely, notwithstanding it was a manufacturers' tariff. And then, notwithstanding his statement that it was a manufacturers' tariff, he grew gleeful when he said that the railway trains were full of manufacturers who were coming down to kick, because the Government were cutting their throat. Now, Sir, these statements cannot all be true. In what sense is this a manufacturers' tariff? It is a manufacturers' tariff in the sense that it encourages manufacturing, that it increases the home market, and employs our own men and women in our Canadian workshops. It is not a manufacturers' tariff in the sense that this party or Government is under the control of one or a dozen or a hundred manufacturers. Sir, the statement which was made by the hon. gentleman last year, that the manufacturers would not let this Government revise this tariff, is a statement not worthy of a gentleman so distinguished as he is, who has sat in this House for the last twenty years. So far as I know, the policy of this Government is a policy which has regard to the interests of no particular class in this community. So far as I know this Government, it is one which is not controlled by the manufacturers or any set of manufacturers, but which endeavours to legislate, in the interest of the general public, for Canadians upon a Canadian plan. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman sneers at agricultural protection. In that respect he differs somewhat from hon. gentlemen opposite. They do not outwardly sneer very much at agricultural protection. They touch it with a pole just as long as they can possibly get, when they discuss the tariff before the electors of this country, because they are disturbed by unpleasant memories upon this very question. They remember the farmers of this country knocking at the doors of Parliament, to the extent of 100,000, asking that the market of Canada be given to them, when these gentlemen were in power. They remember that their Finance Minister absolutely refused to do that, and they remember too that the effect of his refusal was that many a hundred, many a thousand farmers, assisted to sweep them out of power in 1878. Sir, sneering at the question of agricultural protection just reminds me of an incident which happened two or three years ago in connection with our legislation. We had at that time an offer upon the statute-book, which declared that when the United States were willing to give us free trade in certain large classes of products, we would do the same thing as regards similar products. The United States selected such articles as were advantageous to themselves. They took the duty off just the articles they wanted them off, and none other. Our Government felt bound, as a matter of international courtesy—though they knew it was injurious to Canada—to take the duty off those articles. What was the result? Almost every Liberal in the Niagara peninsula signed a petition asking for Heaven's sake that these things be put back again upon the dutiable list, in order that the agricultural protection should not be taken away from the people of that country. There is still a more recent event. Last year, when the French treaty was discussed, as I, among others, represent a section interested partly in the growing of grapes and making of wine, I went with a deputation and waited upon the Minister of Finance to urge that in any ratification or discussion of that treaty, the interests of the fruit growers and the wine growers should not be left out of the question. We were all Conservatives there! It was a secret conclave to advise the Minister of Finance!! Sir, it was the very opposite. I see opposite me the smiling faces of good Liberals who were occupying cosy corners in the Finance Minister's room, and who said to him: Look here, Sir, this is an important matter in the section of the country from which we come, and we ask you to very carefully consider it because it is a very important industry. In other words, they sneer at agricultural protection, but at the same time they know in their hearts that the farmers of this country want it, and if to-morrow—and I make the statement without fear of successful contradiction—this Government should take off the duty on agricultural produce, what would be the result? There would be a noise among the farmers, there is no doubt about that, but there would be an outcry among the hon. gentlemen opposite as well. But there would be a noise among hon. gentlemen opposite; there would be a shaking of the dry bones, and immediately the telegraph wires would bear many messages, and the next day the newspapers of the Liberal kin would tell the farmers of Canada: We are your friends; these fellows have cut off your agricultural protection and consequently are not worthy of your support. I ask hon. gentlemen opposite whether that is not the case? I ask hon. gentlemen opposite whether they are prepared to cut off the agricultural protection which the farmers enjoy at the present time? But the hon. gentlemen are silent.

Mr. EDWARDS. I will answer for myself. I am prepared to vote for the removal of the delusive snare and pretense that is offered to the farmers of this country.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I am very glad, indeed, to see the smiling member for Russell rise in his place, and I congratulate him upon the hearty applause with which his sentiment was received. I tell the hon. gentleman that I knew he was not in favour of it. I remember perfectly well, when in 1891 or 1892, the Minister of Finance discovered that there were about thirty million pounds of American wheat coming in here, produced so cheaply on the other side of the line that it could be brought over here, the small duties which Canadians had against it paid and the material thrown upon the market to undersell the Canadian producer, and when he proposed, as this party backed him up in doing, to stop this, I remember these men took sides with the lumbermen as against the farmers, and opposed the duties by their votes.

Mr. EDWARDS. May I be allowed to answer the question? On the occasion to which the hon. member refers I never opened my lips with regard to the matter, but took this ground—that if that small measure of protection was a protection to the farmer, I was quite willing that they should have it. But, Mr. Speaker, I have never believed, nor do I believe now, that it is a protection to the farmer. It is a protection to the packers and not to the farmers.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I think the hon. gentleman is like the individual in the old song: "He's sorry that he spoke." The hon. gentleman seems, by his explanation, to be convinced that he would have been wiser to have kept his lips closed now.

Mr. EDWARDS. Not a bit of it.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I am quite willing to allow the hon. gentleman to speak, because he is doing my work much better than I can do it myself. However, the fact is as I have stated—these hon. gentlemen, while telling about what they will do in removing protection, are very silent with regard to the protective duties that now rest upon the foreign products that would compete with those of our farmers. The hon. gentleman says he never opened his lips against it. Well, Sir, I will take his word for that. I do not remember the facts in detail; but I have no doubt he is telling us the truth. But his hon. leader opened his lips about this question, and the hon. gentleman is supposed to follow his leader's lead, and not to lead his leader. My hon. friend shakes his head and says he does not follow his leader. Well, he is to be excused for his regard for his personal safety in not following his leader through those labyrinthine paths which he sometimes traverses. But let me say that, down at Abbotsford in the province of Quebec, the hon. gentleman's leader did condemn agricultural protection. And why? Because it seems to have been in the opinion of my hon. friend a silly business, such as my hon. friend has described. My hon. friend nods, showing that he does not follow his leader, that he does not even know what his leader said. But the hon. leader of the Opposition, speaking at Abbotsford in the province of Quebec, said: We voted against these increased duties upon flour and pork. And for what reason? Because they are intended to and will increase the prices to the consumer, and are of advantage to the farmers of Manitoba and of Ontario. Now, Sir, I leave the question of agricultural protection, but before doing so I give the member for North Simcoe the opportunity of saying whether he is in favour of removing these duties. That is a question he ought to answer. He represents an agricultural constituency, a constituency deeply interested in the home market of Canada, and the very first thing he should do in this House is to say just exactly what his position is, in order that his electors in North Simcoe may know whether it is to their interest to support him as a member of this House or not. But the hon. gentleman chooses to be silent. The hon. gentleman did not mention this subject in his speech, except that he said that the necessaries of life ought to be free. Among the necessaries of life are these very articles that are protected to a large extent by the agricultural protection to which I have referred. And I infer—and if I am drawing a wrong inference my hon. friend will correct me here and now—that he is in favour of withdrawing these duties entirely and of going back to the one-sided tariff in agricultural matters which the Liberals had in 1872. Now, Sir, passing by that (as the hon. gentleman does not answer) I tell him that, in another sense this is not a manufacturer's tariff, for the reason that it reduces duty wherever it can which bore upon the consumer. And I tell the hon. gentleman this—that when he said this was the last touch this Government would give to the National Policy, in other words that they would never remodel it again, that no one can expect any more relief than has been given in this act—I tell the hon. gentleman that he is wrong. If I know anything of the Government's policy, if I know anything of the minds of the members of the Government, the Government will remodel the National Policy whenever the circumstances call for it. For instance, if industries are thoroughly established and protection need no longer be afforded, the Government will act as it has acted in the present case, and as it has acted before. And if the hon. gentleman can show that combines have been formed in order to increase prices, this Government will legislate just as it is legislating now, the policy of the Government being: No combines, but cheap production by home labour and the conservation of the interest of our Canadian artisan. I was rather amused to note how sweetly the hon. gentleman spoke on this country being a pastoral country, a wholly agricultural country. There was one gentleman who agreed with him—the late lamented James G. Blaine, who was never charged with being a very great friend of Canada. When Mr. Blaine was approached on the question of reciprocity, he said to our plenipotentiaries: Yes; we are anxious to supply you with manufactured goods, and we are willing that you shall be a prosperous, happy, quiet, agricultural community. That was Mr. Blaine's answer, and now the hon. member for Simcoe agrees with this statement and says that we must be a great agricultural country and have no varied industries. I prefer to take the position taken by the leader of the Opposition in 1876, when he said: We must have a national industry, and I go for protecting that national industry in the Parliament of Canada in order that we may become, not a wholly agricultural people, but a people of varied industries and great prosperity, as no purely agricultural people. The hon. gentleman neglected to state that the interests of the manufacturer and the interests of the farmer are so closely interwoven that no distinction can be drawn between them. I see the hon. gentleman has been reading the statistics of America. Did he ever read the census statistics of the United States, showing the mutual inter-dependence of the farming, manufacturing and artisan classes? As he may have looked over it in his extensive reading, I shall give him the statement as prepared by Mr. Dodge, the statistician of the United States. It is a statement as to the value of lands in purely agricultural, in partly industrial, and in largely industrial sections of country. The statement is this, as the hon. gentlemen will find from the official records. He divides the country into four sections. The population of the first one was 18 per cent agricultural, and the land there was worth $38 per acre. In the second, there was 42 per cent agricultural, and the land there was worth $30.55 per acre. In the third, 58 per cent was agricultural, and the land there was worth $13.53. In the fourth, 77 per cent of the population was agricultural, and the value of the land was $5.18 per acre, showing, as I think this House will agree unanimously, if they express their candid opinion upon it, that the interests of the agricultural producers and the interests of the industrial consumers are interdependent and closely connected with each other. Now, what is the next fault which the hon. gentleman finds with the tariff which has been brought down by this Government? He says we have not met the United States in friendly terms. He is exceedingly anxious now to meet the United States, though last year in Toronto he said, We don't want the Yankees, they won't give us their markets, and we won't give them ours. Now, I tell the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), as I tell every hon. gentleman on the opposite side of the House, that it is impossible to show in the records of history that we have ever failed to deal fairly and squarely with the American people. We have looked upon them as a neighbour. We have wished that we should regard one another as the two great daughters of the one mother, going together hand in hand, in prosperity, in happiness, and in wealth upon this continent of America. We have made proposal after proposal, with which I do not wish to deal at any great length to-night, and the hon. gentleman will not find in all the history of the past a record of a single instance where we have not agreed to deal honourably and have kept our agreement, and to meet them with proper concessions. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), whom I respect exceedingly, on account of the amount of study he has given to all these great questions, argued the other day in this style: This Government was to be condemned. Why? Because there was a tax upon the agricultural produce that went into the markets of the United States. Now, my hon. friend must know that such an argument is not based upon any sound foundation. This Government has nothing to do with that. My hon. friend knows just as well as I do, and a great deal better, that this Government does not place a duty upon products that go into the United States. It is the Government of the United States, as the hon. gentleman knows, who does that, and I only explain it to him because he seems to have forgotten it, not, I am sure, because he did not know it. The hon. gentleman smiles and shakes his head. His answer would be, no doubt, But you have refused to get reciprocity. That would be his answer, but I tell the hon. gentleman that he has no foundation for that statement. I tell him further that the Government of Canada, of which he was afterwards a member, once made a trial, and I ask the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) whether he is prepared to-night to make a more liberal proposal to the people of the United States than the Hon. George Brown did in 1874? That was as fair a proposal as any plenipotentiary ever made to the plenipotentiary of another country; it was a proposal which gave us free trade in agricultural produce, in the produce of the mine, of the forest and of the seas. It included a large number of manufactures of leather, of wood, of cotton, &c. In addition to that, we agreed to spend millions of dollars to deepen our canals for their use; we offered to construct another canal that, after they had completed a link, would have given them an uninterrupted waterway from New York to the very base of the prairies. In addition to that, George Brown, as the representative of our Government, offered to yield up the rights which we had under the Fishery Commission then sitting at Halifax, and which afterwards gave us $5,000,000 in gold. Now, was that not a fair and honourable offer? But what came of it? It was hung up in the Senate of the United States, and never even referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. And what was done afterwards? I have gone through the pages of the 'Hansard,' and these men who stand here and weep by the mouth as to the value of reciprocity, in all the years in which they were in power after the Hon. George Brown failed at Washington, have only twenty lines upon the 'Hansard' itself in regard to reciprocity. And what are those twenty lines? An announcement from the leader that: We have made no new proposals; we have made our proposals, and they have been rejected, and when the United States wish to make a proposal we are willing to consider it. That is the record of hon. gentlemen opposite on the question of reciprocity. Now, what have the United States offered us?—because my hon. friend weeps that we have not met them in a proper spirit. Well, they have said to us—no, they have not said to us, they are thinking about saying to us—for the Bill is not yet passed, we hope in some respects it will pass, but the hon. gentleman knows as well as I do that it has not yet passed. But one of the expected provisions of that Bill is that they will offer us free trade in wheat, in flour, in provisions, in corn, in pork, in butter and in meats—just the things, I am bound to say, that we do not want to come in here, and giving us nothing that we want to send over there, and the hon. gentleman weeps that we have not accepted this offer upon the part of the United States. Now, what does this tariff do that has been brought down by the Government? It makes a tariff offer according to a principle that I am bound to say I would be willing to extend as far as possible, namely, that if you will give us a market for this article we will give you a market for another article. We want mutual advantage, we do not want it at all on your side, and we are not selfish enough to ask it all on our side; but if you will let our barley go into your markets we will let your corn come into our markets. That is a fair and honourable exchange. I do not think the Government will confine itself to that particular item, but they will go all through the list, and will deal in a straightforward and honourable way, only asking that we get some advantage, only asking that we shall retain control of our own tariff, only asking that we shall not be required to do anything that will disturb the cordial relations which exist between this country and the old land from which we come. Now, the hon. gentleman complains that we have not reciprocated in the offer that they seem to be intending to make, that we shall have reciprocity in agricultural implements. Sir, I do not know the minds of the Government on this question, having had no consultation with the Minister of Finance upon it, nor with any other member; but I will say to him that while they, by a tariff, would offer us the free introduction of agricultural implements into their markets, in reality, by vexatious patent laws, they would absolutely shut us out of that market. Do hon. gentlemen question that statement? Let me say that away back in the early '80's before the Canadian Pacific Railway was constructed, when the first Canadian agricultural implements were sent into the province of Manitoba, the bonded car passing through one of the states of the North-west of the United States was seized. Why? Because it was said those agricultural implements were patented in the state of Minnesota, and consequently they did not desire to allow them to go through on the lines of railway in the United States. It was settled on the plea that it was a bonded car and they had no right to interfere with it. But these patents would prevent our agricultural implement manufacturers to a large extent enjoying any of the advantages of reciprocity intended to be given us in connection with the reduction of rates. But there is another instance, which the hon. member for Monck (Mr. Boyle) will remember very well, because he had a great deal to do with it. It will be remembered that two or three years in connection with the statutory offer we removed the duty from seedlings and various other stock raised in nurseries. What did we find? We found this, and I ask the fruit growers of the Niagara district to bear me out in the assertion, that there was no advantage to the consumers so to speak on the other hand, but on the other hand we found that while we were admitting American stock absolutely free, many states had a law placing exactions on agents, one even preventing foreign agents from working, and another state demanding a cash deposit with respect to certain technicalities, the effect of which was to prevent our people selling stock in the markets of the United States. My hon. friend from Monck (Mr. Boyle), I think, went to the extent of introducing a bill with the object of securing for our people fair play in connection with this one-sided business which was then being transacted. The policy of Canada, as I have stated it on that question, and my hon. friend knows it very well, is a policy of friendship to the United States, but also a policy which demands our rights and insists on the maintenance of those rights, with the war ships of England to back them if necessary, but we ask nothing more than our rights in dealing with our neighbours. In the next place, the hon. gentleman says, We do not discriminate in favour of Great Britain. We do not claim to do so. Great Britain makes her own tariff. We make our own tariff. Great Britain does not ask us to discriminate in connection with her exports to us. In the next breath the hon. gentleman says that we do not make any special arrangements with the United States. How does the hon. gentleman expect we are to discriminate in favour of the United States and in favour of Great Britain too? It is a double-barrelled shot-gun, each barrel loaded a different way. If we were to throw down the barriers against Great Britain we would annoy the United States, whereas if we were to give wide and special privileges to the people of the United States we must annoy Great Britain. We may do the one or the other, but the hon. gentleman knows from the books he has been reading that it is impossible to do both. In the next place, I desire to say that we do not discriminate against Great Britain. Hon. gentlemen opposite have been arguing that we do discriminate against Great Britain. What is discrimination? It is placing a higher duty against Great Britain than against any other country. Can the hon. gentleman point to one item in the tariff which makes an exception as against Great Britain. That is discrimination; nothing else is discrimination. The hon. gentleman from Bothwell (Mr. Mills) smiles. I know his argument as well as I knew the pictures which hung on the walls in the home of my childhood, I have heard it so often. He says that on certain classes of goods imported from Great Britain we charge more on them because we are importing raw material from the United States and the manufactured products from Great Britain, and therefore there is discrimination against Great Britain, because the rate of duty upon the manufactured goods coming from Great Britain is higher than the average upon goods coming from the United States, because their exportations are largely raw material.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). That is not the argument.

Mr. MONTAGUE. It is so very close to it that there may be a distinction without a difference.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). No.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Admitting that is discrimination, I will give the hon. gentleman figures—or rather I will ask him to look them up, or perhaps he knows them—figures which will satisfy him that when his Government was in power they discriminated three times as much against Great Britain as we do today. It is just as nonsensical to say that we discriminate against Great Britain as it is to assert that Great Britain discriminates against the country from which it obtains its raisins or its cocoa. It has one system. In that system it happens that duties are paid on the products of one particular country. We have another system. It happens under it that we get a large quantity of raw material from the United States, but while there is an apparent discrimination, there is no real discrimination to the extent of one millionth part of a cent in one single item of the customs tariff of Canada. Passing by that question, I come to the statement which the hon. gentleman made, and he grew merry over it, that the National Policy had produced no industry in this Dominion. Such was the statement made by the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy). Then how did he arrive at it? He first grew merry at the schedules. He told the House that milliners, dress makers, boot and shoe makers, harness makers, blacksmiths, and all those industries were included in the schedules and named manufactures. The hon. gentleman, while intending to be entirely honest, was rather disingenuous, I think. I venture to ask the hon. gentleman a very humble question. I said to him, "Does the hon. gentleman know that the same course is followed in other countries? Does he not know that the men must be scheduled somewhere? Does he not know that in Great Britain, his model, not only manufacturers of boots and shoes, coats and pants, are included, but the men who split kindling wood and sell it on the streets are called manufacturers, and are so included in the schedules?" Having grown very merry at this system, what did the hon. gentleman do? He immediately began, with that skilful handling of the question that a great lawyer always possesses, to diagnose in a manner which we physicians call by exclusion, and he immediately excluded the greater portion of the people who are engaged in the industries of the country. First, he says bakers are not manufacturers. That is pretty hard on the hon. member for South Brant

(Mr. Paterson), who is not only a manufacturer, but is also a member of a manufacturers' combine, and the hon. member from South Brant (Mr. Paterson), in his splendid works, which have grown two hundred or four hundred per cent since the National Policy came into operation, works which the hon. member is doubling this year under the policy of this Conservative Administration, employs a great many bakers, who are as much artisans as are men in machine shops or in any other industrial establishment. Then he excludes coopers. Of course the making of barrels in the hon. gentleman's mind is not combined with any other industry. Next, he strikes off blacksmiths, who, according to the hon. gentleman's knowledge of the industry, have nothing to do except to shoe horses. The hon. gentleman should know that in the rolling mills and the great foundries and the machine shops there are thousands of blacksmiths, who are kept in this country by the National Policy; and yet he excludes them from the list. The fact is this, that some years ago many of those men were engaged at the country cross roads in the pursuit of their avocation. Sir, the hon. gentleman has forgotten to take note of the progress of time and industry. In the course of progress the industrial trades have changed and manufactures have changed. It becomes a question whether these men—because the article they produce is being produced so much cheaper in the factories of another country—It should be driven to other lands, and the products of other lands come in here, or whether they should go to the factories and take their places there as the artisans of the industries of this country. Our policy says: let them take their place in the army of the workingmen of this country, the policy of my hon. friend says: let them go, and let us bring in the finished product for the people of Canada. The hon. gentleman grew merry once more, and he said: the export of manufactures has been a trivial thing: he forgot, of course, the consumption of the home market. That did not amount to anything in his great mind, but he said that our export of manufactures was exceedingly trivial, and then he made an ingenious comparison. He compared the percentage in Great Britain with the absolute increase in Canada, and that was very much to our disadvantage, because they had increased their exports 12 per cent in Great Britain, and the increase was only $1,000,000 or so in Canada. The hon. gentleman found that the percentage business did not work, because in England it was about 12 per cent, and in Canada it was about 100 per cent. The hon. gentleman prepared to give us what suited his argument exactly; but, Sir, are these not the carpings of a man who wants to criticise; are these not the breathings of a man who would not be satisfied anyway; and are these not the wallings of a man whose business it is to be dissatisfied?

Let him go to the facts of the case, and if he wants the results of the operation of the National Policy let him take the truth itself as it is given in the imports of raw material. And more than that let him not go to 1881, but let him go to 1879, because we do not propose allowing the tariff of hon. gentlemen opposite to have the credit of the increase between 1879 and 1881. Now, Sir, what are the facts? The hon. gentleman knows them very well, having quoted them many a time. Let me give figures to this House which indicate what have been the true facts regarding the National Policy in regard to industries. I take first raw sugar. We imported in 1878, 19,000,000 pounds; in 1881 we imported 125,000,000 pounds, and in 1893 we imported 252,000,000 pounds, and the increase between 19,000,000 pounds and 252,000,000 pounds is the measure of the occupation and employment that has been given to the people of this country. Well, Sir, in 1878 we imported cotton and waste to the extent of 8,000,000 pounds; in 1881 we imported cotton and waste to the extent of 16,000,000 pounds, and in 1893 we imported 41,000,000 pounds, and once more the increase between 8,000,000 and 41,000,000 pounds is the measure of good that the National Policy has done to the woollen industries of this country. Of crude rubber we imported 458,000 pounds in 1878; 597,000 pounds in 1881, and 1,543,000 pounds in 1893. Of wool we imported 6,000,000 in 1878; 8,000,000 in 1881, and 10,000,000 pounds in 1893. Pig iron has doubled in import, as well as increased largely in home production. I say that this is the true test of the impetus that has been given to our industrial life by the National Policy, and the hon. gentleman (Mr. McCarthy) may exclude a set of employees here and a set of employees there, but he cannot get away from the fact that the true test is: that to-day we bring in five and six times the amount of raw material to be made up by the hands of Canadian men and women than we did in 1878. Now, Sir, one or two more remarks, and I am done. First, the hon. gentleman (Mr. McCarthy) said in this House last night: the manufacturers are not such bad fellows.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I would ask the hon. gentleman whether he has under his hand now the estimated amount of wool produced in the country in each of these periods, and whether it is not a fact that a very much larger quantity was produced at the earlier period than at the later period to which he referred?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I may say to the hon. gentleman that I have not the figures he refers to, nor do I know exactly as to his statement with regard to it. The hon. gentleman (Mr. McCarthy) said last night: the manufacturers are not keeping this money that they are overcharging the people of the country. The member for South Oxford

Mr. MONTAGUE.

(Sir Richard Cartwright) has divided the manufacturers into minor thieves and major thieves, but the member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) said: Oh, no, they are not loaded down with wealth, and they don't make any more money, perhaps, than they would under another system. It is all right to say that in this House, but the hon. gentleman does not say that when he is out in the country. The hon. gentleman tells the farmers of the country that when a manufacturer gives an item here or there for a charity or for another purpose: Oh, that is your money and mine. I only mention the fact to call attention to the different tones of the hon. gentleman when he comes before those who are perhaps better able to judge. Now, Sir, I intend to deal only very generally with the question of prices, because I have not had time to go into his calculations. But let me say this: that the very first man to say the prices would be reduced under the National Policy was the member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). In 1879, when this question was up he called the attention of the House to the fact that the manufacturers would be in worse straits under the new policy than under the old, and he gave as his reason that home competition would be more severe than competition from abroad. The member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson) went out to Uxbridge and he told the people: we are worse off than ever, because new industries will start and the consequence is we will be driven from our own market. But, Sir, the member for Quebec West (Mr. Laurier), the distinguished leader of the Opposition, only the other day made a speech at Newmarket, and what was that speech? My hon. friend from Quebec County (Mr. Fremont) will be able to say whether I am right in regard to the facts in connection with Quebec East. The leader of the Opposition said this: the manufacturers do not want this policy, and he substantiated his statement and backed it up by a recital of these facts: that in his constituency there were a large number of boot and shoe manufacturers, and that the effect of the tariff has been that there are too many of these shoe manufacturers, and their prices are not nearly so good as if they had no protection at all. And he called a friend who was on the platform to him, and he said: You are just in the same boat namely, the agricultural implement manufacturer, who was his friend and who sat with him on the platform presiding, I think, over the meeting which the leader of the Opposition addressed. Now, Sir, the fact is, that the hon. gentleman (Mr. McCarthy) last night tactfully admitted that home production had decreased the price. He did not say so directly, but he said: of course, there are exceptions to every rule. If the hon. gentleman had gone into the figures he would have found that that statement applied with equal truth to every industry in this country. With regard to the very class of agricultural implements upon which he spoke, the binder that seven years ago cost $210 cost last year in the Dominion of Canada only $110 to the farmers, and so with regard to the many articles which have been produced in Canada under the National Policy. But as hon. gentlemen who sit beside me may perhaps deal with this question in detail, I leave it for their consideration, and pass to the consideration of one other item, and then I have done. I pass to the consideration of the statement made by the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), which to my mind was the highest compliment the farmers of the province of Ontario have received for years. In order to show the progress of England, he said: that this England that is decaying, between the years 1881 and 1892, has increased the incomes upon which the income tax is levied to the extent of 18 per cent, and then what did he compare it with in Canada? Generous heart; he compared it with the poor farmers of the province of Ontario. He said not a word with regard to the merchants or the bankers or the capitalists of this country. I am glad to say that he spoke of the farmers of the province of Ontario as among the wealthiest of the farmers of Canada; and he will not deny that no better or happier or more prosperous class of farmers exist in the world. He said to them: I compare you with the capitalists and merchants and bankers of England; and what was the result? They had increased their wealth, he said, 11 per cent, while those capitalists and merchants and bankers had increased their wealth only 18 per cent. Not a bad compliment, I think, to the farmers of the province of Ontario. Now, Sir, I have gone very much further and detained the House at much greater length than I had intended. I wish to say, in conclusion, that, so far as the members on this side of the House are concerned, and I believe as far as the people of this country are concerned, they have confidence in this Government, because it has carried out its promises—its promises to investigate the facts, to relieve the people of the burden of taxation wherever possible, and to take away undue protection wherever it existed—in short, to legislate in the interest of the greatest number of the Canadian people.

Mr. FRASER. Mr. Speaker, I am sure that this House cannot have failed to notice the great contrast between the speech delivered by the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) last night and that just delivered by the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague) in reply. The hon. member for Haldimand was smarting under an assumed insult. He felt that the hon. member for North Simcoe had made a statement that he ought not to have made in regard to himself and the hon. Minister of Railways. If I understood the hon. member for North Simcoe, he simply stated that the Minister of Railways, like all distinguished men in older countries—and why should we not have the same practice here?—found it necessary to have the benefit of clergy, and had a private chaplain; and I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that no man needed a chaplain more than the hon. Minister of Railways, and no man was better able to give spiritual advice in the direction in which it was required by the hon. Minister of Railways than the hon. member for Haldimand; and the cheers that went up from the supporters of the Government showed, not appreciation of the hon. member for Haldimand at all, but the bitter feeling that ran through them all at the fact that the hon. member for North Simcoe had stood at last on firm ground on the subject of the tariff and that the loss to them of the brains of the Conservative party was a very serious loss indeed. The hon. gentleman represented that the hon. member for North Simcoe had left the Conservative party because he had felt affronted by it in some way. Well, I think there is authority to the contrary. I am reading from the Toronto 'Evening News', where I find that a member of the Government did not think so at a meeting of the stockholders of the 'Empire' newspaper, held about the 10th of March last. At that meeting some remarks were made about the paper, when the Hon. Mr. Patterson came to the rescue:

At this juncture Mr. Patterson intervened in the defence of the Government. He said the Government had not authorized the stupid article attacking Mr. McCarthy and intimating to that gentleman that the Conservative leaders wanted no more of him. An administration would be foolish thus to injure itself. It was the policy of the Government to draw the people to it, and not to drive them away.

Did that look as if the hon. member for North Simcoe had left the Conservative party because he could not get a position from the party? I am not here as the apologist of the hon. member for North Simcoe. In Ontario, I take it, he can take care of himself. In Ontario, I take it, he is as well known as the hon. gentleman who last addressed this House; and if the hon. member thinks that by pointing to him as a reader—as a man who is studying the question he proposes to speak upon—he is going to bring contempt upon him, he is very much mistaken. It would be well for the hon. member himself to learn the first principles of political economy before he finds fault with any man for studying the subject. Of course, it was a strange thing for him to think that any man had to study political economy. Oh, no, there is no principle in it; there is nothing in it at all. The hon. gentleman sought to show that the hon. member for North Simcoe was not able to prepare a speech for himself. The hon. gentleman is absent—I am sorry for it. He expressed regret that the hon. member for North Simcoe was out of the House when he spoke; but he evidently thinks that he is so great a man that he can leave the Chamber while I am speaking. I would be glad to get the notes of that speech from him. How did he get them? I will tell you how he got them. Mr. Farrer, who he says prepared the speech, was the man who prepared all documents for the Conservative party. He was the soul of the Conservative party, so far as getting literature for it was concerned.

Mr. LANDERKIN. And the brains, too.

Mr. FRASER. He was called the brains. Perhaps he could use the pen better than the hon. member for North Simcoe, being a newspaper man, and so, at the dictation of the Conservative party, he made up a speech of the worst character against the French of Quebec, while at the same time they were asking for the support of the French people. Mr. Farrer was the man of all others who not only prepared that speech, but who prepared also the facts for Protestant electors and the facts for the Catholic electors. He was the man who was ready on all occasions. Now, I will tell you how that speech came into the possession of the hon. member for Haldimand. It was in this way: He saw that it was a good speech, and not being able to prepare one himself, he took it, and he has been using it ever since. If he produced it here you would find in it the germs of his speech of to-night and of all his other speeches. I do not think it fair of him, now that he has used it with advantage before the public, to bring it up now against the hon. member for North Simcoe. At times the hon. gentleman was prophetic; at other times he was interrogative. Oh, he wanted so many questions answered. One time he spoke about backing the Government up, and how the people would again rally to their support. Brave man, was he not? He had to gerrymander his own constituency and handicap his opponent to the number of three or four hundred votes before he would dare to meet him. He can easily talk about having men at his back. Now, let us come to two or three matters of which the hon. gentleman spoke. He said that protection was to be kept up no longer than the time when it was found that an improper use was being made of it, and therefore the tariff has been modified. Has there been an improper use made of the various items in which changes have been made? The argument is irresistible that every change made in the tariff has been made because there has been an improper use made of the protection which it gave. There is no getting away from that argument. Now, I will give the hon. gentleman one instance of an improper use made of the tariff, and yet no change has been made. We have a glass factory in the town of New Glasgow. We were making glass, but the Montreal glass factory were making glass too. And they found that they did not want competition. And what did they do? They came down to New Glasgow where we had two hundred hands employed; they bought out every article of manufacture—all the raw material, all the moulds, and they said: We will work this factory for you part of the year, and we will pay you 8 per cent on the capital you have invested in the business. They then closed the factory, and from that day to this, have not opened it, but have continued to pay the shareholders 8 per cent on their money—and they only run the factory in Montreal. There is an instance in which an improper use is made of a combine, and there is a chance for the Finance Minister to do something. But no, there is no likelihood of his interfering. My hon. friend seems to think that when he says manufactured articles are cheaper in Canada than in the United States, he has made a good point. Now, this strikes me, as it would any ordinary, common-sense man. If you can buy manufactured articles in Canada cheaper than you can in the United States, would it not be a good thing for us to be able to send our goods there? And why do you require a duty when you can manufacture cheaper here than they can in the United States? In one breath, the hon. gentleman says the article is cheaper here, and in the next he says it is absolutely necessary to keep the American article out altogether. Does it not seem extraordinary that we cannot trade with a people who are unable to manufacture articles as cheaply as we do. In ordinary business, a merchant in one town is not afraid to send his goods to another town to enter into competition with a rival who has to sell dearer. That does not happen in ordinary business, and it is somewhat remarkable that it should happen in our relations with the country to the south of us. What the Government have done, said the hon. gentleman, is to so arrange that we only pay duties on the articles we need least. Now, I have prepared a little statement of my own, which I shall read to the House in order to show the way that taxation is imposed in this country. House furniture and hardware is taxed 32½ per cent, but we are solaced with the fact that broom corn and ice comes into the country free. Shovels and spades are taxed 35 per cent, but the man who uses the shovel and the spade has the great satisfaction of knowing that he can obtain arsenic free of duty. When he is almost driven to death with paying 35 per cent, he has the consolation of knowing that he can buy arsenic free. Cordage for fishermen pays 30 per cent, but locust bean meal, tortoise shells, bees and leeches come into the country free. Is not that a consolation for the poor farmer? Of course, bees come in free in order that there may be honey made, so that the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Hazen) can make a little extra taffy for the Finance Minister. Binder twine pays 12½ per cent, but then precious stones and cochineal come in free, in order that the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) and others like myself, who are fond of fun, may paint the town red. Coal oil comes in at 200 per cent, but then aux vomica, beans, sausage skins uncleaned, catgut, fossils, and rags come in free. The rags for the poor man after he has paid his 35 per cent on all these articles, come in free. Again, agricultural implements pay 25 per cent, but the farmer has the profound satisfaction of knowing that tartar emetic and grease are free. It will indeed be a great satisfaction to the poor man, after he has paid his 35, 30, 27½, and 40 per cent on articles of daily use, which he must have, to feel that he can go to sleep with the heavenly satisfaction of knowing that at least sausage skins and uncleaned rags are free. That is the tariff of hon. gentlemen opposite. Now, these things, by contrast, show exactly the character of the tariff. Everybody knows that it is not designed in the interests of the consumer. Everybody knows that it is designed in the interests of men who are using it for their personal advantage. Everybody knows that just as you shift the duty from one article, there is an advance on the other side, on some other article. The hon. gentleman who spoke, gave great credit to the hon. Finance Minister, because, when he took $3,000,000 off sugar, he was still able to have as large a revenue as before. Is it not a brilliant feat to reduce the duty on one article and put it on another? Is it not a stroke of genius that when you have to raise $24,000,000 you continue to raise it by changing the duties from one article to another. What statesmanship is there in that? It is just as easy to make the duty 35 or 30, as 40 per cent. It simply consists in writing down the figures 30 in place of 40, and so on. If that is statesmanship, then I admit that the hon. gentlemen opposite are statesmen. We have heard a good deal about this tariff, but there is one thing which strikes me as very peculiar in hon. gentlemen opposite. I am not able to understand it, but perhaps hon. gentlemen opposite may be able to explain it. How is it that whenever any change is made hon. gentlemen opposite cheered. They cheered when the duty was taken off sugar; they cheered when the duty was put upon something else. They cheered when the tariff was high; they cheered when the tariff was low. They cheered when the Finance Minister came down and said he was going to take a million and a half dollars off the taxation of the country. They cheered when the clerical errors were discovered. They will cheer no matter what change is made. Why, the only consistent gentleman on the other side is the hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean), for he manfully said that, rotten as was the principle of protection—and I give him credit for standing by it—you should not touch it at all. He has an able assistant in the hon. member for Inverness (Mr. Cameron), who warned the Government that if they took one single brick out, the whole structure will come tumbling down.

Mr. CAMERON. Did they take one away?

Mr. FRASER. They have taken more than one, and the hon. gentleman is their most servile supporter. He cheered when his brick was taken away, and he will cheer when every brick is taken away. He will stand on the ruins of the building, when every brick is gone, and will still cheer. He cheers every time. Now, does it not strike any one that the argument of the hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean) is the only consistent argument from the protectionist's point of view. If protection is to be maintained in the tariff, any change made should be in that direction if it be changed at all. The hon. gentleman says, and says with candour, that it should not be changed at all. And in that he is consistent. But I fear that, even although they have broken his heart by taking away something from his darling protective system, he will be found with the Government just the same as if they had not touched the holy thing he worshipped. Have the Government attempted to reform the tariff on the line they have said? Let us see for a moment. The hon. gentlemen opposite are very fond of referring to speeches made upon various occasions by gentlemen on this side of the House. Now, I will not reply in kind. I will not speak, for example, about the speeches of the hon. Finance Minister. Last year he spoke about the farmer not being taxed at all. We all remember his beautifully-rounded periods, as he spoke of the farmer's wife collecting the wool of the sheep and taking it to the nearest stream to wash it, then drying it upon the sward and taking it home and combing, spinning, and weaving it, and making it into clothing for the family. And the farmer going to the woods to get his firewood free. And so the farmer was free from taxation.

An hon. MEMBER. And the water was free.

Mr. FRASER. And the water was free. Yes, water was free to the farmer. And they cheered the hon. gentleman to the echo. The men who represent the manufacturing districts, and the men who represent the agricultural districts cheered together. And, this year, when the Finance Minister came down and said the Government were very sympathetic for the farmer, these same gentlemen cheered again. The farmer, who last session was all right, has sympathy thrown at him this year. But the cheers come from gentlemen opposite on all occasions. The hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Cockburn) had given his views previously upon this great question. Like the statesman that he is, he spoke about industries that ought to receive protection and those that ought not to receive it. He said that if an industry was flourishing, it should get protection; if not, cut it down, for it cumbereth the ground. This, no doubt, was an application of the well-known text of scripture: To him that hath shall be given; and from him that hath not shall be taken away, even that what he hath. But, Mr. Speaker, when the hon. gentleman came to address the House upon the changes made in the tariff, with that true devotion to his party which never swerves, he was found the strongest, the ablest, and withal, the most cheerful supporter of the Government. I might reply in kind by going all over the list of hon. gentlemen opposite. But would that be an answer? The hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague) says: that the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), once upon a time had a speech prepared for him by somebody else. And gentlemen opposite cheered him to the echo, evidently thinking the hon. member for Simcoe had been answered. Suppose the hon. member for Haldimand had said anything about the tariff that was worth answering, would it be an answer to say that he himself had taken a hand in preparing a paper for somebody else, that he had looked for higher game and had prepared a paper for the Queen, which was to be distributed among the Indians in his constituency. It would be a far better answer than that given by the hon. gentleman to my hon. friend from North Simcoe, because the speech prepared for the hon. member for Simcoe was a speech to be delivered to intelligent people, while this fraud practised upon the poor red man was unworthy the dignity of a man. Still this would be no answer to anything the hon. gentleman said. The question before us is: Is the tariff made upon lines in the interest of the people? I was rather amused at one of the hon. gentlemen, I have forgotten which, who spoke about the glories of protection. By the way, Mr. Speaker, it will be noticed that every speech made by hon. gentlemen opposite was a speech for the old tariff. They seemed like the minister of whom I once heard, who had lost the text for his sermon. He was obliged to find another text, but, whatever the text, he had to preach the sermon as he had prepared it. Hon. gentlemen opposite seem to have been like the hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean)—they thought there would be no change made. The hon. member for East York in the paper of which he is the editor, and which does him credit, gave out from time to time that there would be no change. It was considered that he was a power behind the throne and knew what would happen. And when the changes come in, we find that they are neither in the interests of protection nor are they in the interests of the masses. As to the contention that this is a tariff for protection, I have prepared a little statement about a matter of which I know something to illustrate this point. I am sorry the Minister of Finance is not here. I would be glad to give him these memoranda. Take, for example, ferro-manganese. The old duty was $2 per ton. The material is largely used in the manufacture of iron; 75 per cent of it is iron and it is worth in bond $52 per ton. The present duty is 10 per cent, equal to over $5 per ton, or an advance in the duty of 150 per cent. And when I tell hon. gentlemen that two manufactories of ferro-manganese supply the whole of the United States and two supply the whole of Britain, he cannot but agree with me when I say that not until we are a nation of twenty or thirty millions can we have a manufactory of this material in Canada. So the tariff, in place of running on protective lines is a mere hotch-potch. Now, take iron and steel bridges. They formerly paid a duty of $25 per ton but not less than 35 per cent. Now the duty is 30 per cent. The finished girder, plate and lattice work bridges bring $40 per ton. Thus the present duty is equal to $12 per ton, or less than one-half of the old duty, and foreign bridges came in even under the old duty. The hon. member for Haldimand stated that the Government policy was to take off the protective duty if an improper use was made of it. Was an improper use made of it by the bridge-makers in Canada that the Government reduced the duty to less than one-half what it was before? I can find only one explanation for this change, and that is that the Curran bridge scandal has raised such a cry against bridges that they are determined to bring down the price so that such a thing may never occur again. The duty on fish-plates is reduced one-half. By the former duty the Government led the iron and steel makers to put in heavy and expensive plant for the production of their goods. The duty on the bars from which fish-plates are manufactured is $10 per ton. In converting a ton of three bars into fish-plates $3 worth of labour is employed. And, although the raw material pays a duty of $10, the finished article has a protective duty of only $6. This, no doubt, is on the line of protection. Now, for myself, I do not for a moment think there should be any special legislation in favour of the manufacture of iron or of anything else. The hon. Finance Minister said there was only one pure free trader in this House, the hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Gillmor). He was mistaken. There are more here, and there are more in the country. Let there be no misunderstanding about the position of the Liberal party upon this question. The hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague) thought he was making a point against the leader of the Opposition when he spoke about free trade being far in the future. Yes, I regret to say that it is. Evil of all kinds, and selfishness of all kinds, are not easily rooted out. On account of the hardness of the Israelites' heart they were allowed to practice polygamy; and on account of the ignorance and selfishness of many of the people of Canada, we shall have protection as long as selfishness can govern. Refined selfishness was the proper description given of this system by the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy). Now, let us see whether this proposed tariff is in the interest of the majority of the people. For example, the duty on dress goods largely used in this country, has been raised. I will give you a quotation. An importer paid $800 more in Montreal for those goods the day after the tariff was brought down than he would have paid the day before. He paid $11 more on $125 worth of goods, and he paid $8 more on $90 worth of goods. To be specific, goods costing 10 cents per yard and under, paid 22½ per cent under the old tariff. Goods costing 10 cents and under 14 cents, paid 25 per cent; and goods costing 14 cents and overpaid 27½ per cent. In 1893 the duty upon these articles was $1,011,000, the duty under the new tariff upon these same goods will be just $115,000 more than it was under the old tariff. It is in the interest of the people of Canada, is it not? Our wives and daughters and sisters and mothers who buy dresses, will have to pay, or we will have to pay for them, $115,000 more for their dresses the next year. And still it is a great thing! There is one article alone. The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Kenny) knows about tea as well as I do. I venture to say that in the next two years there will not be a cargo of tea taken directly to Halifax by water from China, or Japan, or Ceylon. Everybody knows about the tea business. They know, for example, that the first crop is gathered in May, the next crop six weeks after, and the next crop six weeks after that. They know there are men in China, Japan, and Ceylon who are busily picking up this tea, and they are in direct communication every day with London. They sometimes make or lose fortunes by single purchases of tea. Now, with all the communication we have between Halifax and London every day, we get such quantities of tea as we want direct from London. For example, the importer in Halifax will order a cargo of tea, and it might be discovered by the time it reached Halifax that they do not want the tea, and he would have to suffer; whereas those who do business in the great centre of all business, London, understand it so well that they can treat directly with these men who want to purchase. But we have taken a great deal of tea from London. Now, despite my hon. friends opposite, who do not think that all trade is exchange, I will venture the old-fashioned remark that when we buy tea in London we send them something for it. No man goes over from Halifax with $10,000 or $20,000 in his pocket to purchase tea; some other articles are sent there to pay for the tea. But the Government are going to destroy that particular trade, they are going to do this, unless you can find other channels by which exchange can be made for other articles. But where is the sense of it anyway? In whose interest is this tea business? Who is going to benefit? Is it going to benefit the Canadian Pacific Railway? Is it made in the interest of Montreal? The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Kenny) represents what we think is about as good a city as can be found anywhere, for its size, and yet here is a blow struck directly at the business of that city, and with no reason whatever except some reason that the country cannot see, in favour of somebody who is going to get the advantage of that 10 per cent. Does the country get the advantage of it? Not at all. For, besides the carriage by the longer direction, and subject to all other incidents, every bit of tea that comes from Great Britain pays 10 per cent more. And yet this is a tariff in the interest of a free breakfast table! Now, the hon. member for St. John was pleased to speak about the lower provinces, and particularly St. John, N. B., and the great state of prosperity that St. John was enjoying. Sir, while the echoes of his sonorous voice were still ringing in this Chamber, and he thought he had shown to the satisfaction of himself and his friends that the province of New Brunswick was in a remarkably flourishing condition, a property owned by Daniel & Boyd—the Mr. Boyd who was a Senator during all the years of this National Policy, and afterwards became a Governor, grown out of his connection, and rightly so, for I am not finding any fault with his advancement—that property that was bought after the fire in St. John in 1876 at a cash price of $66,000, situated in one of the best streets of the city, was sold, while the hon. gentleman was talking of the prosperity in St. John, for the sum of $20,000, or less than one-third of what it cost in 1876. That is prosperity for you. And a street railway in the city of St. John that cost about $500,000 was sold the other day for $90,000, or nearly one-sixth of the original value. Is there enterprise in St. John, or have values changed? I thought that any man from the province of New Brunswick would hesitate to talk about prosperity after the shameful disclosure made by the census. But when you have pinned your faith to that which is not right, when you have pinned your faith to an error, you must support that error in every way against all facts, and that is what the hon. gentleman is doing. Now, I ask you, Can there be prosperity in a country where property sells at one-third what it cost in 1876? And when I mention the fact that that property was sold for actually one-third less, I suppose there are some hon. gentlemen opposite who will say I am running down my country. That is the answer. Blue ruin, and I am running down my country. Am I? When men were crying peace, peace, and when there was no peace, was the prophet wrong when he raised his voice against that kind of teaching? When the facts show that property in this Dominion in place of increasing in value, as it ought to increase, has gone down, I ask you: Are those men the true friends of the country who give an untrue version of the facts, or is it the men who set the facts before this House and before the country? How can you advance the value of any property by taxing the people? Although the census has been referred to again and again, I will venture to speak of it in so far only as one matter is concerned, and that is the North-west. Last year there was a good deal said about the new policy that was going to be inaugurated with the advent of the hon. gentleman from Selkirk (Mr. Daly) as Minister of the Interior. He was the man who was going to change the whole current of affairs and carry out a vigorous policy that was to fill the North-west. The Minister's report is brought down to the House, and after a year's experience, the hon. gentleman has to admit that not so many people have entered that country last year as in the previous year. But the hon. Minister has a consolation, for he says that the people who go there now are better than those who went there before, and he states, as an example, that immigration has largely decreased from Great Britain and Ontario, but has increased from Dakota, and he says, in effect, that the people of Ontario and Great Britain are not as good settlers for the North-west as from Dakota; in other words, that our shameful neighbours across the line, those bad Yankees are better people to go into Manitoba than the people of Ontario and Great Britain. Let me read what the hon. gentleman says:

There were from Great Britain and Ireland only 524 homesteaders, as against 841 for the previous year, a decrease of 317; and from Continental Europe 698, as opposed to 817, a falling off of 119; making a total falling off of homesteaders from the European side of the Atlantic of 436. From the province of Ontario alone there was also a falling off of 731 homesteaders, which in itself more than makes up the total deficiency for the year. There is one feature of this portion of our statistical information which is highly encouraging, and that is the rapid and marked increase of homestead entries obtained by people from the United States, the number of which rose from 513 for 1892, to 818 for 1893, or an increase of 305.

It is a matter of congratulation, according to the hon. gentleman, that there was a falling off in immigrants from Ontario of 731, but an increase from Dakota of 305. And then the character of the men who go out there is better. I am satisfied that the only safety and hope that this country possesses is in the peopling of the great North-west, and that we can never recover the ground we have lost, or be able to meet the interest and fixed charges on our large debt except by peopling that country. Manufactures may be increased by millions, but if there are not people to purchase them, they are worthless. You may fill every store in Ottawa with manufactured goods, but if you have not farmers to purchase them, of what use are they? This Government has been moving in the direction of declaring that you can make a country great by manufacturing. Common sense would have dictated that you can make a country great only by filling it with people, and that when sufficient capital and skill would have engaged in manufacturing to supply the demands of the people for clothing and other necessaries. What is the country better if manufactories are established, unless there are people in the country to purchase the goods? It is true we are not exporting them. Hon. gentlemen opposite point to the fact that there is a home market for the manufacturer and a home market for the farmer, but between them we do not keep even the home market. In spite of all that has been done to foster the manufacturing industries by unnatural means, we are importing largely. How else, in fact, could we meet our collections and raise the revenue, and is it not a primary truth in political economy that if we import articles it is because our people need them, and having more than enough of certain products we are willing to exchange them with other people who have more of what they want, and so the bargain proceeds. Did any one ever hear of a political economist who wanted to sell in his own country and no where else? Yet that is the policy of the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague). I would venture to suggest that he should buy a primer on political economy, which would cost him 5 cents, and learn something in that regard. He taunted the hon. gentleman from North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) with studying the subject. It would require very little study on the part of that hon. gentleman to answer the hon. gentleman from Haldimand (Mr. Montague) on the trade question. When will men recognize the fact that trade is the exchange of that which men produce? I cannot emphasize too strongly the remarks of the hon. member for Russell (Mr. Edwards), that in this country we have been going backwards. We have recognized that capital is the only wealth. It is worthless; it never existed until labour made it, and it will not continue to exist unless labour supports it. Labour is the creator of everything, and hon. gentlemen opposite are worshipping the creature more than the creator, following in a direct line the ancients, who, in spiritual matters, sought to worship the creature. If we are going to succeed in this country, we must get down to the solid ground, that is labour, not protected, because it asks for no protection, for labour is no mean creature that knocks at the door of Parliament asking that it may be protected. All labour asks is to get a fair return for what it does, is recognized as the true source of wealth, so can the country prosper. But when labour has accumulated capital, capital with that selfishness that characterizes it comes forward and asks to obtain the support of the Government to make more capital. Our shores are free to the labour of every nation except the Chinese, but we meet the people of the world with a tariff wall of 30 or 35 per cent. We stop every vessel and every train at the frontier. Labourers may come in of every race, except the Chinese—and that exception is only made in the interest of British Columbia—and compete with our labour, while the products are taxed 30 and 35 per cent. Can you build up a country by that policy? No. We must increase the population of our country. The lower provinces of this Dominion have increased only 2 or 3 per cent during ten years. We cannot repeat too often this fact in order to awaken the people and the Government to the fallacious methods they have been pursuing. But even so far as protection is concerned, I am bound to say that we have been working upon an insecure basis. There is more than one hon. member who has made large outlays, having been carried away in the swim, and by observing prosperity all around him, and who imagined that by building ginger-bread houses in little villages prosperity would be secured, and who finds to-day that protection has ruined him and not given him the return he hoped to secure. You can do that even with protection. Why? Because men forget. Do you think that soldiers fight best who know that ten times their number are behind them, ready to come to their assistance? No. Those men fight best who feel, and feel truly, that with them alone lies the victory against the army they are opposing. So, protection takes away from men the skill and the energy and the impetus that is giving by having to come into competition with other men everywhere. I believe that protection is not only wrong in principle, but that it is degrading to the manhood of Canada. It raises up a number of men who think they cannot live unless the Government feeds them. Everything like self-confidence is broken down, and, coming here begging and begging and depending upon their 35 or 40 per cent protection, they feel there is no danger. So it is with such combines as I have named, and the result is, that these men are not making the money which men in similar lines of business are making in a free trade country. The hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague) said that England was the only nation in the world that had free trade. Well, I have been here for four sessions, and I leave it to hon. gentlemen opposite, and to hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, if the loud cry, if the shout, if the clapping of hands, if the jumping up and flinging their hats in the air by hon. gentlemen opposite, was not always when the name of Great Britain was mentioned? Now, they tell us: She is the only nation in the world that lives under the worse than abject folly of having free trade. As they state, she has to send her soldiers at the point of the bayonet to carry the goods of England into the barbarous countries of the world. Well, she can only send a little cotton to the people of Africa, because that is about all they need in the way of clothing, and they won't purchase anything else. When these hon. gentlemen are praising England, as being the greatest country in the world, I want them to think for a moment on that free trade which has made her great. England, the mother of nations, the leader of the world, the country that receives in interest alone some two hundred millions of contributions from the world universal, before a dollar comes in return for any manufactures which she sends abroad. England that goes to every country in the world for her raw material, manufactures it and sends it back to the very country which produced it, and makes them pay whatever price she wishes. O, England! according to the Conservative party in this country, you are benighted and degraded and far behind bright, cheery, wise, and stately-protected Canada. Why, Mr. Speaker, to hear hon. gentlemen opposite talk of England and her greatness at one time, and of her decadence at another, one would think they should stop to think for a moment. Every one admits that England is great in her free trade, and I cannot help feeling the force of the remark made by the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), when he said, that it was passing strange that hon. gentlemen on that side of the House should have thought—not only thought, but should have with cheers received the statement—that England was going to the bad. Do they hope to make England protectionist? I appeal to hon. gentlemen opposite to know if their whole arguments have not been that they want trade with Great Britain. We want to send her our surplus products; we want to send her our animals, our cheese, and everything we can sell there to the best advantage, but yet these hon. gentlemen would make her a protectionist country. Do they want England to be like the United States? Do they want her to shut out our products from her markets by a system of protection? Hon. gentlemen opposite must understand the great truth about that mother of nations, opening her ports to the whole civilized world, putting every country under heaven under contribution to her by lending money, carrying not only her own merchandise but the merchandise of every other nation, sending not only freedom and intelligence, but her manufactured articles as well, into every nook and corner of the globe, standing, as she does, the mother of nations and the mother of commerce; hon. gentlemen opposite need to learn what has made her thus great. I can put her against the United States and Germany and France, with their protection, and I claim that the man who believes with the English people, that free trade is her glory and her wealth, is the truly worthy descendant of that noble race from which we sprung. Fancy that great little island; first she fought the world, then she took the world captive by her manufactures, and yet hon. gentlemen opposite clothe themselves with the wretched garments of American protection and claim to be the only loyal citizens of Great Britain. They take their protection from the United States, and they take the old flag from Great Britain, and, through the combined effort of trading upon the sympathy and upon the loyalty of the people of Canada, by waving that flag and through getting contributions from the wretched system they imported from the United States, by these two methods they join together the high sentiment of the country and the baser element that they have purchased. Let me for a moment call attention to the increased tax on books. Literature has now to pay a duty by the pound weight. That is something new. There is only one man I have ever read about that that tariff would suit, and that was Baird of Gartsherrie. He was not a man of very much education, and having built a fine house, he wanted a library; and so he went to a Glasgow bookseller and said: Send me two tons of books, and if two tons does not do, send me two and a half. And, when the bookseller asked him if he would have them bound in Morocco, he replied with an emphasis which it would not be parliamentary to use: "Na, I will not have them bound in Morocco; I'll have them bound in Glasgow." The Finance Minister's new duty on books would suit Baird of Gartsherrie, because he bought his learning by the ton. Suppose, for example, a dealer imports 500 books in one box; he has got to weigh every one of these books to find what the price will be. He must weigh every one separately, and he must make a calculation as to its weight before he knows the price he can sell it for. Then, the books that we need most pay the highest duty. Sunday school library books are especially severely dealt with in this new tariff. A London bookseller, who has been investigating the effects of the change, took five Sunday school books of a total value of 70 cents, and under the old duty at 15 per cent, the tax would be 10½ cents. The books weighed four pounds, and at 6 cents a pound the duty will be 24 cents, or an increase of 150 per cent, on Sabbath school books. On two books, costing 56 cents, the old duty was 8½ cents. They weighed two pounds three-quarters, and the duty under the new rate is 16¼ cents, an increase of nearly 100 per cent. As far as I am concerned, I have only one opinion on this matter, and that is that books should be free. Believing, as I do, that the necessaries of life should be free, so I believe that the necessaries for the intellect should be free. I believe that every child born in this country, should get every book that he needs without a single cent of duty. Fancy a Government that increases the duty on books and taxes them by the pound, which

at the same time takes $300,000 in duty off malt, to intoxicate the people of Canada. That is a pretty Government for you, is it not? Three hundred thousand dollars of malt duties thrown off in order to satisfy the brewers, and 6 cents a pound put upon books in order that the people may not get intelligence. Ignorance is the mother of devotion; and hon. gentlemen would like very well that our people should not be a reading people, and so they tax books. They have made a small contribution to the ultra religious element—so I suppose they think—by making Bibles free; but much as I prize that book, there are other books that the people of this country ought to read, and therefore I believe that all books should be free. It is a policy that cannot be justified for a moment—decreasing the duty on what intoxicates while increasing it on what enlightens. That is not only wrong in principle, but wrong in morals. Are the Government going to encourage the people to drink more beer and read fewer books? Do they think they will have more force in this country if they have cheaper liquor and dearer literature? Do they want at election times to have the opportunity of purchasing liquor at a lower rate, while leaving the people in a condition not to understand the questions of the day, but in a condition to receive the stimulants? Both of these things are wrong. The hon. member for Haldimand spoke of direct taxation. Now, I am not afraid of direct taxation. The hon. gentleman would seem to think that there is a charmed way by which we get our revenue. He would lead the country to suppose that in the way in which we get our revenue the people do not pay at all. Does not the veriest child understand that the taxes we raise come from the people? How else can you get taxes? I admit that the method of imposing them may be a matter of discussion; but as to the source, it is always one and the same, in whatever way you impose them. I have made a little calculation here which may be of a matter of surprise to some hon. gentlemen opposite, as it was to me. Now, I believe that we ought to tax what men have, and not what they need; I believe that we should tax wealth, and not consumption. Believing that, let us see. The wealth of the United States is about $1,000 a head, or in all $65,000,000,000. I take it that the people of Canada are worth as much as the people of the United States—$1,000 per head of our population. Now, if you put one-half of 1 per cent of taxation upon the wealth of Canada, you will get nearly $2,000,000 more than you get from all the duties which are levied at the rate of 30 to 35 per cent. Now, I ask any man, which is the more economical method of taxation? Would not the same people pay it? Not all. The man that had a farm worth, with everything on it, $4,000, would at that rate pay $20 a year; but a man who was worth $200,000 or half a million, like the hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Cockburn) would pay more, and he should pay more. I went too low—I will say a million.

Mr. COCKBURN. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to thank him for the kind revelation that he has made to me; but there is nothing in it.

Mr. FRASER. I will take any other hon. gentleman. I only mentioned the hon. member for Centre Toronto, because, being on terms of the closest friendship and intimacy with him, I felt that I could fairly take his case as an illustration; and I believe that his devotion to the country would be equal to the payment of the necessary charge that would be made upon him.

Mr. COCKBURN. Tell me how you would collect it?

Mr. FRASER. Collect it! The hon. gentleman would pay it as soon as the bill was presented. There would be no difficulty in collecting it, because every honest man is willing to pay his taxes. I am only saying this to show that the bugbear of direct taxation is not a bugbear at all. Now, I am not advocating the imposition of direct taxation. It took a long time to destroy slavery, and it will take the people of this country a long time to understand the advantage of direct over indirect taxation. But I say, so far as that question is concerned that direct taxation has no terrors for myself at all. If the principle is right that we should tax what we have and not what we need, that we should tax wealth and not what we consume, then that principle, fairly applied in Canada, would give us a larger revenue at the low rate I have named than we have to-day. Now, what farmer in Canada worth $4,000 does not now pay into the revenue at least five times as much as he would pay under that system? Is there a farmer in Canada worth $4,000 who does not pay $100 into the revenue every year, unless he gets his wife, as the Finance Minister said, to make his clothing, and gets his wood and water free, and gets nothing else? Now, I believe that that is the correct method of taxation; I believe that under the present system the people are being robbed and do not know it. It is easy to put 25 per cent here and 25 per cent there; but every time a man goes into a store to buy anything, he has to pay that duty just as truly as if the tax collector came around to collect it from him; and if hon. gentlemen opposite were honest and had the interests of the country at heart, they would consider the question, because they know that the less you take from the people, the better off they are. Now, the hon. member for Haldimand said that the tariff had given universal satisfaction. I will only read two extracts out of a hundred which I could read to show that it has not given satisfaction. My first extract is from the Ottawa 'Citizen,' April 2, 1894:

There is one bad feature of the tariff which has not been reformed. The duty on stereotype plates ranges from 90 to 160 per cent. There is neither sense nor reason in this extravagant impost, which strikes newspapers all over the country for the sake of concerns employing a few dozen men in Toronto.

That is not a Grit paper or a paper that wants to attack the Government; that is the Ottawa 'Citizen,' the organ of the Government in this city. It says that there is neither sense nor reason in this particular item; I suppose that its devotion to the Government will not allow it to cull out, as it might, a large number of other items. The Montreal 'Star,' discussing the tariff, asks: What is the reason that the duties have been increased upon tapestry carpets, velveteens, woollen dress goods, cordage, and other articles of general use, and says that "The increase of taxation was certainly not the errand upon which the country desired Mr. Foster to go," and it adds, "That even the dropping of a paltry percentage of an enormous duty has about it more of the appearance of pretense than of honest purpose." That is a Government organ too. I take these two as samples. Does not everybody know that there is no intention at all on the part of the Finance Minister, of having that deficit of \$1,500,000? I can imagine him coming down next year and saying that although he had reduced the taxation and expected less revenue, he had got as much as ever. The hon. Finance Minister says we must stop building railways; the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries says we must build more. Between them there seems to be very little concord. The hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague) spoke of this side of the House as a combination, as a troupe. I thought that was not kind; I thought it was not even smart, to use a common expression. The hon. gentleman did not prove it, however. I might reply in kind. I might say that the Government is composed of very strange elements. I might say that it is one of the strangest combinations in the world. After having attempted to reform the Government, they tried to reform the tariff. Mr. Chapleau was sent to Spencerwood. Sir Hector Langevin was dismissed. Mr. Chapleau was metaphorically kicked up stairs, because, I suppose, the position at Spencerwood is more honourable than one on the Treasury benches. And then, when the new elements came into the Cabinet, we were told to congratulate ourselves on the reform of the Government. It reminds me of a story that was told by that very witty man, Lord Bute. When Pitt left the Ministry and Fox remained, one of the friends of the Government spoke to Lord Bute about the great improvement. Lord Bute said it reminded him of a circumstance that occurred at the time of the gunpowder plot. The Lord Chamberlain was sent to find out how many barrels of gunpowder were under the building. He returned and made a report, which he considered a very satisfactory one. He found twenty-five barrels and removed ten, and reported that the building was, in consequence, perfectly safe. That is the way in which our Dominion Cabinet was reformed, and the country made safe. Talk about combinations; if the hon. gentleman had spoken in the way he did about the leader of the Opposition, and those who follow him, I would not have replied in kind. He said truly that gentlemen who live in glass houses should not throw stones. The policy of the Opposition has been uniform in the direction of decreasing the taxation of the country by any and every method by which they could accomplish that end. Have hon. gentlemen opposite been consistent? Let the hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean) reply. I leave my hon. friend to settle the question of consistency with that hon. gentleman, one of the most devoted followers of the Government. There is one note that seems to prevail amid all the discordant arguments of hon. gentlemen opposite. Like followers of Mahomet, each gentleman that cheered and spoke seemed to be repeating: Great is the Finance Minister, and great is his prophet the Controller. The Controller said that what we had here was a Conservative protective policy. That is what he called it. I thought its friends believed protection was a principle. Now, fancy a Conservative protective principle. There was a man who set himself up to be a political economist in the United States, and he wrote a work on American political economy—and everybody laughed at him. But the Controller of Customs knows so much about political economy that he calls this system: "A Conservative protective policy." I suppose he imagines there must be other protective policies as well as Conservative ones. No doubt he believes that there is a Government protective policy and an East York protective policy. But the hon. gentleman spoke more truly than he thought. It is a Conservative protective policy, because it is the only policy by which the Conservatives can hope to maintain themselves in power, no matter what may be the disadvantage to the country. Fancy a man in this city, where books can be had, even though there be a duty on them, in which he can read something of political economy, talking about the "Conservative protective policy." And that man is the Controller of Customs. I think the country is beginning to understand, as it never understood before, this great question. I take it that the speech delivered by the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) is one that will be thought out and acted upon in this country. It takes men a long time to find out the effect of a policy, but once they do find out that they have been deluded, they will turn on and rend those who designed and perpetuated the fraud. We have been going on for fifteen years under this policy, and our country is becoming depopulated. The hon. gentleman spoke of the thousands who are at work in our factories. Where are the thousands that were born in the country? Where are the thousands that have come into the country? We have, by our policy, been sending them out by the thousand, and they have to-day a society in the city of Quebec called a repatriation society. Somebody in the city of Quebec wants an office, some individuals want to have the spending of Government money, and they actually ask the Government to spend money to bring back from the United States the Canadians whom our policy drove away. The National Policy sent them away, and we are asked to allow the people to be bled by an expenditure for the purpose of bringing them back. Several gentlemen came to interview the Government. There was a doctor and a president, and a Senator, and a Member of Parliament, who wished to have the president sent on a trip to the United States to try and bring these people back. Did you ever hear of such a thing? Men move about in this world according as their interests impel them. If they go to the United States, it is to better their condition. They may not succeed in doing so; but if they do not, they will come back of their own accord. Make this a country in which men can live upon the least possible amount by paying taxes out of what they actually earn, and you will make it a country into which people will come. Why have we not an immigration from England? Did you ever hear, Sir, such a statement as that made by the Minister of the Interior who reports that only four hundred homesteads were taken up by immigrants from Great Britain in the North-west last year. Fancy spending millions and tens of millions of dollars to people that country, and then having only some four hundred people settling there from Great Britain. Hon. gentlemen opposite may say that that is not the fault of the National Policy. If not, to what is it to be attributed? Is the country not a good country to live in? Is it not a country in which a man can live and make money? Is not the soil rich? Are not all the advantages there which an agriculturist can require? Why then do men not go into that country? Simply because the conditions of things in Canada are such that they can better themselves by going elsewhere. And we have been spending thousands of dollars on offices in London and Edinburgh and Liverpool, with the result of bringing in but four hundred homesteaders to Canada during last year. We have a High Commissioner in England, on whom we spend \$20,000, and yet we see this poor result. What else is going to benefit us but lowering of our tariff. I wish to emphasize what was said by the hon. member for North Simcoe, that this country is, in the first place, an agricultural country. Take the province from which I come, and see how it stands. Hon. gentlemen opposite say that we ought not to trade with the United States. I will take some of the articles in which we are particularly interested in the lower provinces. For example, we exported 177,000 tons of gypsum last year, and every ton went to the United States. We exported 31,728 tons of building freestone, and all except 100 tons went to the United States. We exported 1,668,125 pounds of mackerel, and 1,570,310 went to the United States, and paid one cent per pound duty. We exported 346,460 pounds of halibut, which is subject to the same duty, and every pound of it went to the United States. Of fresh herring, we exported 16,175,000 pounds, and it all paid a duty of one-quarter cent per pound to be admitted to the American market. We exported of smoked herring, 4,568,953 pounds, and, notwithstanding a duty of $\frac{3}{4}$ cents per pound, 3,253,055 pounds went to the United States. We exported 1,229,533 pounds of fresh salmon, and 1,144,891 pounds went to the United States, paying a duty of 1 cent per pound. We exported of fresh cod, 161,652 pounds, of which over 150,000 pounds went to the United States, paying a duty of $\frac{1}{4}$ cent per pound. With the exception of dried codfish, the greater part of which went elsewhere, the great bulk of all these articles went to the United States. We exported 1,112,833 bushels of potatoes, and, notwithstanding a duty of 25 per cent, two-thirds of the whole quantity, or 800,225 bushels were exported to the neighbouring republic. Of coal we exported 1,006,126 tons, and 852,703 tons, or four-fifths of the whole, went to the United States.

Mr. KENNY. Does my hon. friend mean to say that four-fifths part of all the coal produced in Nova Scotia went to the United States?

Mr. FRASER. I say that of the coal exported to foreign countries, four-fifths went to the United States and paid 75 cents per ton duty. And yet gentlemen opposite say this is not a country to trade with. At one time gentlemen opposite want reciprocity; at the next they say that the United States is not a country to trade with, because articles there are higher there than they are here. At one moment they say we must have a duty to keep certain articles out, and the next moment they declare that goods are cheaper and can be made cheaper in Canada than in the United States, therefore there will be no importations. Oh, the philanthropy of gentlemen opposite! Everybody but the person interested is the object of their sympathy and every person interested in them and they in him can get the benefit of the tariff. The tariff is to be made without regard to the consumer and in the interests of the producer and you are going to make a country great and prosperous in that way. No, you cannot do it. The figures I have given show the condition of the export trade in the lower provinces. Does any man in his senses think that a maritime country like the lower provinces can fail to be benefited by trade with the United States? We have, in Nova Scotia, the most intelligent fishermen in the world. The Government thought they were going to instruct these men by bringing in some persons from Scotland or Norway. But they found that the native fishermen knew more about their business than the imported men did. Our fishermen can build their own boats, large and small. And if we were allowed to trade freely with our natural market, we could build ships, man them with our hardy sailors and carry on a trade that would be beneficial to them and their whole province. A ship starting out from a Nova Scotia port would reach the United States in two or three days and deliver her cargo there and could easily find a return cargo making a profitable trip both ways. But the Government attempt to make the goods go over a thousand miles of railway and expect thereby that they are going to make the country prosperous. You cannot do it. Natural trade is not only dear to the people as their existence, but it is the only profitable trade, and I am sure that the policy now carried out under the hon. Controller of Customs is not a beneficial one to Canada or likely to make Canada what it ought to be. The hon. member for Haldimand when he spoke with gusto about the result of the election. I know nothing about the result of the election. I am not a prophet, and I am not going to prophesy about a matter of that kind. I know how the elections ought to go; I know how I believe they will go. The fact that the Government has had to capitulate and has had to bring down the semblance at least of tariff reform is an indication that they are going to be defeated. They are doing what they can to make it appear, as the Finance Minister has said so tenderly and so sympathetically, that they are trying to improve the condition of the farmer. They hope, no doubt, to get the farmer's vote. But fifteen years' experience has convinced the farmer that he has not been protected. Fifteen years' experience has shown him that, if he is going to advance as he ought to advance in this country, the shackles of trade must be broken. We on this side believe that the unshackling of trade would be in the interests of this country. The leader we followed before believed it, as our leader does to-day. Our leader believed and proclaimed it in the darkest days of the history of Canada, when every change in the tariff made in the interests of manufacturers was hailed with shouts and the country was made to believe that through the efforts of hon. gentlemen, it was prosperous. It is beginning to be understood now, as our leaders have said, that you cannot make a country prosperous by taxing it. The capitulation of the Minister of Finance is the best proof that the Government regard tremblingly the approach.

of an election and the changes they make are with the hope of convincing the taxpayers of this country that they are trying to relieve their burdens. But, it will not advantage them. The farmers are being instructed, notably through the efforts in certain quarters of the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) and his lieutenant, the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien). No sneering of gentlemen opposite at the member for North Simcoe is going to stop the tide of instruction that he is giving the people. Gentlemen opposite mistake the temper of this country if they think that by cheering in the Legislature they are going to drown the voice of reason among the people. The fact that the farmers are banding themselves together is the greatest possible protest against the methods followed by the Government. When men band themselves together for the purpose of helping one another what is the explanation? Why do men form societies to assist one another in sickness and to relieve their families in case of their death? Because, in this country, as in others, we have a state of things existing under which the man who works is denied a fair return for his labour. The fact that the farmers are banding themselves together is proof that they feel that they are denied the proper return for their labour by this tariff. And when the day of reckoning comes, as come it must, it will be remembered that only when driven by fear of the rising tide of public opinion did the Government yield and then they conceded only what they could not withhold. The people will distrust them, for they will see that this tariff reform is but an attempt to hoodwink them and they will fear, and justly fear, that if the Government is given a majority again they will recall the concessions that were extorted from them through the fear of public opinion. It has run long enough. Convinced I am, at least, that this is not such a reduction, either as was promised or as was hoped for, and believing that the Opposition will move in the direction, not only of opposing it, but of setting the matter fully before the electorate of this country, I have confidence that when it is all explained the subterfuges to which, in the dying moments of this Parliament, the Government found themselves forced to resort, will not be found effective in the direction that they expect. I believe it will be found that the people once having got information, and a taste of freer trade, small though that taste may be, they will see to it that men are returned to power who will give them not only fuller trade, but complete freedom, so far as possible under a revenue basis. Then we shall have no more census returns showing an increase of only 2½ per cent in the province of New Brunswick, but that province will bud and blossom as the rose. We shall have no more instances like that of the property of the late Senator Boyd selling for $20,000, which cost $66,000. In contrast with that state of things we shall have such activity in that province, and in all the lower provinces, and all over Canada, as will give an impetus to every trade which is natural to Canada, and the trade that is not natural to Canada, which can only live by the assisted efforts of the Parliament of Canada is worthless, and never can succeed in making a nation great.

Mr. KENNY. I have listened, and I am sure that hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House have listened, with pleasure to the very cheerful speech of my learned friend from Guysboro' (Mr. Fraser). I noticed that my hon. friend, in the early part of his address, found fault with the Government—at least so I understood him—for not giving sufficient protection to certain iron industries in this country.

Mr. FRASER. No; let me correct the hon. member. What I said was that it was not a protective tariff, and I showed it by that example.

Mr. KENNY. My hon. friend, then, was dealing with general principles?

Mr. FRASER. Precisely.

Mr. KENNY. But when he applied the argument to the existing tariff, as I understood him, he found fault with the Government for not having given sufficient protection to certain interests.

Mr. FRASER. Not at all.

Mr. KENNY. I am sure that the discussion which took place last night when the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) called special attention to the condition of the iron industry of the United States was a most valuable addition to the debate, for the reason that it elicited the fact that the price of iron in the United States is now as cheap as it is in Europe, and so cheap that even from the State of Alabama, which is some distance from the Atlantic coast, iron has been shipped to England and Belgium. My hon. friend who has just taken his seat knows full well the history of the iron industry of the United States, and he knows further, that when the American people applied protection to the iron industry of their country it was in recognition of the fact that the iron industry is the basis of all manufacturing industries in every country, and with the knowledge that England had attained her manufacturing supremacy in iron, as in everything else, under a protective tariff. Let me tell my hon. friend—or rather let me remind him, for I will not pretend to give him information—that after England had had 40 years of protection for her iron industries, the duty on pig iron in that country was £6 10s. a ton. I think that in Canada we are fully warranted in adopting a protective policy for the development of our iron industries, when we see that it was only under a system of protection that this industry was developed in England, and has been developed so wonderfully in the United States. I think it is a logical conclusion, it is a just inference, that if the policy of protection has resulted in the development of the iron industries so successfully in England and in the United States, so we may expect it will in Canada. My hon. friend has told us that at all events we are to have no deficit. That is exceedingly gratifying to hear, because last night the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) indulged in melancholy eloquence in portraying the terrible condition of the finances of this country, and the certainty that a deficit awaited us. I am glad to hear from my more cheerful friend from Guysboro' that there is no possibility of a deficit. In noticing some of the points raised by my hon. friend, let me say to him that there is one point on which I agree with him, and that is in reference to the proposed change in the duty on teas. I hope sincerely that the tariff will be so adjusted that we may be able to continue to purchase tea in bond in London as we have been doing for so many years. My hon. friend, like the hon. gentleman who leads the Liberal party in the Maritime Provinces, has endeavoured to show that commercial atrophy, failure and stagnation, prevail in the Maritime Provinces, and especially in the city of St. John. My hon. friend from Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies), in order to emphasize his assertion of the decay and stagnation of commerce in the Maritime Provinces, referred to the condition of shipping in those provinces. This is not the first time the hon. gentleman has blamed the policy of the Government of Canada for the diminution which has taken place in the shipping interests of the Maritime Provinces. He has made that statement across the House more than once. It has not only been not proved, but it has been disproved, and yet he repeats the statement. Mr. Speaker, I do not know what parliamentary term can be applied to an hon. gentleman who continues to make in this House a statement which, I say, is not only incapable of proof, but which has been disproved. I know what we would term it out of doors. Let me refer to the remarkable roles which the leaders of the party opposite play in this House. I have previously alluded to the fact that the hon. member from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright seems to be told off to abuse, belittle and decry Canada. His neighbour, the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), afterwards rises to praise and magnify the United States. He is the most pronounced advocate of the Monroe doctrine I have ever listened to on either side of the border. Then the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) has been delegated to do what, I will do him the justice to say, I think must be an uncongenial task, to belittle and decry the Maritime Provinces. The hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) grew eloquent when he was describing what he called the stagnation, failure, decay and commercial atrophy of the Maritime Provinces. In support of that statement he pointed to the fact that the tonnage of the Maritime Provinces, owned and registered there, is less than it was twenty odd years ago. He made the same comparison with the United States as an argument against protection, and pointed out that the tonnage of the United States engaged in the foreign trade is also less than it was in 1856. Every man who is familiar with the shipping of the United States and of Maritime Provinces knows that he was referring to wooden sailing ships.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman has said I made a statement of the shipping of the United States. I only did so, in this way: I said that many years ago the foreign carrying trade of the United States was carried in United States bottoms, and that to-day out of, I think, 56,000,000 bushels of grain shipped from New York alone, only 17,000,000 bushels were carried in American bottoms, and all the rest was carried in foreign bottoms. I said the same effect followed in Canada, because of the total quantity of our seaboard freight carried from Canada, 80 per cent was now carried in foreign bottoms, and in 1878 35 per cent was carried in Canadian bottoms.

Mr. KENNY. That is exactly what the hon. gentleman did say.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Is it true?

Mr. KENNY. The hon. gentleman's inferences are all wrong. The statement is correct, but it is misapplied and disingenuously used. The hon. gentleman's contention is, that because the United States have adopted a protective policy, as a consequence the shipping of that country has diminished, that is the wooded sailing ships. Will the hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Gillmor) who I see before me, rise in his place and tell the House that the decrease in the wooded sailing shipping of the United States and of Canada is, in his opinion, due to the policy of this Government or due to the policy of the United States?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) It contributed largely.

Mr. KENNY. The hon. gentleman previously stated that it contributed considerably. I give due consideration to the hon. gentleman's statements, believing him to be the leader who has been told off to specially belittle and decry the provinces by the sea, but it was a work of supererogation on his part, because it has been admirably persisted in also ever since I came here by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright); but as the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) has assume that role, let me say to him that the policy of this Government, and the hon. gentleman ought to know it, has not contributed in the slightest to the reduction of the wooden sailing tonnage of Canada. The same argument will apply as regards the condition of the same class of tonnage in the United States. In order that the House may thoroughly appreciate the question, with which hon. gentlemen residing in the western provinces may not be familiar, and in order to remove from their minds the unfavourable impression produced by the statement of the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) as regards the state of the Maritime Provinces, I have taken some pains to inform myself as to the condition of the wooden shipping of the world. I find on referring to Lloyd's statement, which is an undoubted authority in all matters connected with shipping, that for the years 1890 to 1893 the tonnage of wooden sailing ships was reduced 690,000 tons, and the tonnage of iron and steel vessels increased during the same period by 2,870,474 tons. So the hon. gentleman was not treating his fellow-countrymen of the Maritime Provinces fairly when he rose in this House and, with the full responsibility of his utterances as the leader of his party in the Maritime Provinces, endeavoured to convey to hon. members and to the country the impression that the reduction of the shipping in these provinces was due to the policy of the Government. The hon. gentleman knew full well that it is due entirely to influences which neither the Government of the United States nor the Government of Canada could possibly control, that it is due to the fact that steam as a motive power in displacing sail, and further that sailing ships constructed of wood have been displaced by those built of iron and of steel. Let me point out to the hon. gentleman that in 1875—and I think that was the year to which the hon. member for Queen's referred—there were under construction in England 132 steam vessels and 317 sailing vessels, that the tonnage of the steam vessels was 158,531 and of the sailing vessels 157,643, or nearly, as regards tonnage, an equal amount. In 1893 there were under construction 252 steam vessels, of an aggregate of 533,201 tons, and 74 sailing vessels with a tonnage of 83,359 tons. So, in 1875, the tonnage under construction was equally divided between steam and sail, whereas in 1893 the proportion of steam vessels was as 6 to 1. Further, let me tell the hon. gentleman, that the average size of vessels built in 1892 is two and a half times that of vessels built nineteen years ago, and that where as in 1875 there were no steel vessels built in England, that to-day not only have wooden sailing vessels been replaced by steam, but as a matter of fact iron has been supplanted by steel. The hon. gentleman was wrong when he stated that the decrease in the tonnage of the Maritime Provinces was due in any way to the policy of this Government or to the condition of the people of the Maritime Provinces. He was doing the people of these provinces an injustice when he endeavoured to create that opinion in this House. But the hon. gentleman went on and in a glow of free trade eloquence, he told us that the tonnage of the United Kingdom had immensely increased. That is true, and it is for this reason: They build what we have never built in the Maritime Provinces, they built not only steamers, but steel and iron sailing ships as well. Looking at the shipbuilding trade of the United Kingdom, I find that in 1881 there were 611 vessels of 1,000,000 tons under construction, and in 1893 there were 326 vessels of 616,500 tons. The fact is, that unfortunately there has been over-production in ship-building as in many other things, and as a consequence our shipping has become most unprofitable to us, and no portion of the Dominion of Canada has suffered so much in this respect as the city of St. John. The city of St. John was the largest ship-building centre in the Dominion; not only ship-building but ship-owning. The wooden sailing ships which were built there were of a higher class than those built in any other part of Canada, and these vessels were a most valuable industry in their building, and valuable subsequently as property, because these vessels sailed on every sea, and their earning came back to enrich the community in which they were owned and in which they had been built. There is depression prevailing throughout the world, unprecedented in magnitude and duration, and no man knows the universality of that depression better than the ship-owner, because if he cannot employ his ship in the Atlantic, he will sail her into the Pacific or Indian ocean; but to-day there is no country in the world to which he can sail his ship and earn a fair remuneration. In fact he is happy if he can make sufficient to pay the running expenses of his ships. As St. John was the largest ship-owning centre in the Maritime Provinces, or for that matter in the Dominion of Canada, as a consequence when ship-building decreased in value, when it became not only unremunerative but a positive tax to its owners, the city of St. John naturally felt the result severely. I believe that as far as the city of St. John is concerned, there is no city in the Maritime Provinces where there is more energy and more vigour displayed by its people.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Hear, hear.

Mr. KENNY. The hon. gentleman says "hear, hear." When he was making his speech why had he not a kind word to say for that community?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I did.

Mr. KENNY. The hon. gentleman praised it geographically and he could not help that, for he cannot control geography; but there was no necessity for him to attempt to create the impression in this Legislature, that commercial atrophy and stagnation and decay prevailed in St. John. Even if the depression which prevails throughout the world—a depression which is unparalleled—had reached the Maritime Provinces, he might have remembered that at all events if he could not say a kind word for those provinces, he need not have decried and belittled them in this Parliament. In taking that course and in making that argument he attempts, I do not know how far he succeeds, to make hon. gentlemen on both sides of this House believe that Mr. Fielding and Mr. Blair misstated the condition of affairs in their provinces when they made the statements which were given by my hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Hazen). The hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) smiles. Does he consider himself a better authority on the condition of the people of the province of Nova Scotia than Mr. Fielding is?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) No.

Mr. KENNY. Does he agree with Mr. Fielding as to the condition of the people in that province.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I think so.

Mr. KENNY. Certainly not. Compare the speech of the hon. gentleman with the remarks of Mr. Fielding as to the condition of the people in the province of Nova Scotia, and you will find a wide difference between the two. The hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) told us: While after all you have in Canada a certain amount of prosperity it is only ephemeral. Now, in the good old days between 1874 and 1878 to which these hon. gentlemen opposite are so fond of referring, when the Grits ruled in Canada, and when wages were 75 cents a day, and flour was $8 and $9 a barrel; in these good old days there was no prosperity; not even ephemeral prosperity. I can tell the hon. gentleman that as far as the people of the Maritime Provinces are concerned we would sooner have some prosperity, ephemeral though it be, than the terrible condition of things which prevailed in Canada during the years of Grit rule.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Does the hon. gentleman want to make the Grits responsible for the price of flour?

Mr. KENNY. I simply wish to remind hon. gentlemen opposite that their standard of prosperity for Canada seems to be the condition of things which prevailed under Grit rule from 1874 to 1878, and I wish to point out to those gentlemen that to-day all the necessaries and many of the luxuries of life are cheaper than they were in the halcyon Grit period and the wages are a great deal higher. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Davies) in the course of his argument said: You have by your policy secured in Canada a certain progress and development, but it has been at the cost of the masses of the people. It is a slight satisfaction to know that the hon. gentleman does recognize that there has been development and progress, whatever the cost be that he sets it down to. My hon. friend from King's (Mr. Borden), had also some unfavourable references to make to the people of his own province, and he was asked across the floor of the House to name a country in the world where the people are any better off to-day than they are in the province of Nova Scotia. My hon. friend recognizing the difficulty of the task imposed upon him—and I hope having a disinclination to run down his province unnecessarily—refused the challenge, and was not able to point out a single part of the world where the inhabitants are better off than are the people of Nova Scotia. Let me tell my hon. friend from Queen's (Mr. Davies), who has depreciated and belittled Nova Scotia in this Legislature: that not very long ago in Halifax, in a gathering of business men, a gentleman who differs from me politically, made the statement that there were no people in the Dominion of Canada as well off to-day as the people of that province. I went further: I said to my friend, "If you will just extend that expression of opinion and say that there are not 5,000,000 people in the world to-day who as a whole are better off than the people of Canada, I will agree with you." And when hon. gentlemen opposite decry the Dominion, my answer is that taking the people of Canada as a whole they are better off than they were under Grit rule and that we have had progress and development under the present policy. They admit the progress and development; it is too palpable to be denied. You have only to walk along the streets of our cities to recognize the fact that the general condition of our population is infinitely better than it was fifteen or sixteen years ago, and it is positively imposing on the good nature of the members of this House to attempt to convey the impression that our people as a whole are not better off than they were at that time. The condition of the leading politicians opposite may not be so pleasant; but the condition of the people as a whole is infinitely more satisfactory. Now, my hon. friend from Queen's, Prince Edward Island (Mr. Davies) told us—and I always listen attentively to all he has to say—that in looking to the commerce and trade of our country it is not fair to take an isolated year, but you should take a number of years. I do not know that he very fully carried out that suggestion himself. I am inclined to think that in order to draw a comparison between the present and what he considers the more favourable condition of trade under the Grit regime, he took a certain isolated year.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) No; I took the last five years.

Mr. KENNY. Very well ; I have followed the hon. gentleman's advice. I have taken the trouble to compare the condition of trade between 1875 and 1878 with the condition between 1890 and 1893, with the following results, and I take 1875 because I think it was the first year in which Prince Edward Island was included in the general returns. I find that the total imports of Canada in 1875-78 were \$408,690,378, and in 1890-93 were \$498,306,216, or an increase of \$89,614,838. That does not indicate a condition of commercial atrophy. The imports for home consumption were : in 1875-78, \$401,851,935, and in 1890-93, \$464,794,681, an increase of \$62,942,746. The increase in the exports for the same period was \$113,641,698. The exports, the produce of Canada for the same period, were : in 1875-78, \$278,221,606 ; in 1890-93, \$379,195,822, an increase of \$100,974,000. In regard to these I could not follow the hon. gentleman for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) who I understood made the difference \$20,000,000. From these figures it will be found that the total increase of the aggregate trade in the latter period 1890-1893 over the former 1875-1878 is \$203,257,536. So that we have not been marking time nor standing still, but have enjoyed a fair increase in our trade. But the hon. gentleman says that that condition of things will not apply to the Maritime Provinces, for he claimed that the aggregate trade of the Maritime Provinces had declined. The hon. gentleman I believe is correct in that. I think that whilst the exports of the Maritime Provinces have increased the imports have decreased—largely due, as the hon. gentleman must know to the fact that now we manufacture many of the goods which we formerly imported. If he will turn back to the imports of raw cotton in 1878 in the province of Nova Scotia, he will find that they amounted to I think some 5,000 pounds, where as now they are, I think, about 4,000,000 pounds, and consequently the imports have declined, having been displaced by the goods manufactured at St. John, Windsor and Halifax, besides which many of the imported goods consumed in the Maritime Provinces pay tribute at the port of Montreal and Quebec, and even as far west as Toronto. These cities now compete with the cities of St. John and Halifax in the supply of imported goods, very much, I regret to say, to the detriment of the importers of those two cities. As regards the trade of my own province, I have compared the condition of things in the two periods I am referring to and I find that the total value of the exports from Nova Scotia in 1875-78 was \$29,456,512, and in 1890-93, \$41,011,427, or an increase of 35 per cent. These were the exports to foreign countries, having, of course, nothing to do with the interprovincial trade. Now, the total imports of Nova Scotia, from 1875 to 1878, amounted to \$38,005,800, and from 1890 to 1893, they amounted to \$38,464,135. The imports are greater during the former period by \$418,335, thus showing a decrease in the imports of $1\frac{1}{4}$ per cent, against an increase in the exports of 35 per cent. The hon. gentleman had not so many unpleasant things to say about Halifax as he had about St. John ; and I think we owe our comparative immunity to the fact that St. John sends three Conservatives here, and Halifax only two. When speaking about St. John and pointing out its present position, he might have added the fact that now there are two railway systems running into that city, that they are beginning to export grain, and that there is every chance of the community reviving from the depression caused by the fact that their great industry of wooden ship building has been supplanted by steam and steel sail tonnage. As regards the condition of Nova Scotia, the Government savings banks show that in 1880 the deposits there amounted to \$3,016,355, and in 1893, \$8,333,546 and there is a still more gratifying increase in the positions of the chartered banks of Halifax. In 1880 the paid-up capital was \$3,500,000, the circulation was \$1,387,514, the deposits payable on demand \$1,461,616, and the deposits bearing interest \$2,799,535. Compare that with the condition of these institutions on the 30th June, 1893. The paid-up capital was \$4,300,000; the reserves in those banks amounted to \$2,020,000; the circulation had increased in those thirteen years 200 per cent, amounting to \$3,526,212; the deposits, payable on demand, had increased 150 per cent, or \$3,741,653; and the interest bearing deposits had increased 400 per cent, amounting to \$10,573,117. I admit that, in common with the rest of the world, we in Canada are experiencing serious commercial depression to-day—and in the Maritime Provinces perhaps to a greater extent than in the upper provinces, for this reason, that confederation has inured very much more to the advantage of Ontario and Quebec than to the advantage of the smaller provinces.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Hear, hear.

Mr. KENNY. I suppose that is the reason why the hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I., cheered the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) when he insolently referred to us as the shreds and patches of this Dominion. The hon. gentleman shakes his head.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman is rather unjust ; I do not know whether he intends to be unfair. He said that I cheered the sentiment which he puts in the mouth of my hon. friend from South Oxford. I did not cheer it ; never heard him say it. What I cheered was the remark of the hon. gentleman that confederation had resulted more beneficially to the provinces of Ontario and Quebec than to the Maritime Provinces.

Mr. KENNY. The hon. gentleman has sat in this House when the hon. member for South Oxford gratuitously insulted every man who came from the Maritime Provinces.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) No.

Mr. KENNY. The hon. gentleman himself was making a speech in this House when there was an interruption across the floor, and the hon. member for South Oxford said that the people of the Maritime Provinces had offered to sell themselves to Mr. Blake, but Mr. Blake was too honest to buy them. At that very moment the hon. gentleman sat alongside the hon. member for South Oxford, and he had not the manliness to contradict him. Since I have been in this House, there never has been a session when the people of the Maritime Provinces have not had offensive things said to them needlessly by the hon. member for South Oxford, and yet the hon. gentleman tells us that he never heard of the epithet "shreds and patches." It is true that it was not first applied in this House. I might excuse the hon. member for South Oxford if he had, in the annoyance of political disappointment, forgotten ordinary courtesies for the moment, but when that gentleman sat down, and in the quiet of his own study, penned the lines that the men who came from the Maritime Provinces came to boodle in this House, for themselves or for their constituents, I say he made a statement which I pronounced, and as it has come again I repeat, is slanderous, calumnious, and diabolically false. And yet the hon. gentleman thinks that that is quite an innocent expression.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I did not say so: I made no remark about it.

Mr. KENNY. The hon. gentleman said nothing about it. He certainly never expressed dissent or disapproval. Reference was made by the hon. member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar), who, I regret, is not in his place, in reference to the cotton industry, but as there is a possibility of his being in his seat, and as I do not wish to make those references in his absence, I will meanwhile refer to the fact that the leader of the Opposition, during the course of the speech which he made this afternoon, made the statement that the people of Manitoba are taxed for the benefit of the manufacturers in the eastern provinces. The hon. gentleman is an adept in sewing little seeds of sectional dissention throughout the country. He will pardon me for saying so, but I almost think it is a part of his political platform. The hon. gentleman went down to Halifax in 1890, and at a public meeting there he told the people of Halifax that they were being terribly taxed for the benefit of the farmers of Ontario and Manitoba. But when he came to the provinces of Manitoba and Ontario—and I do not think it is becoming in the leader of a great party and in the ordinary acceptance of the terms, I do not think it can be called good statesmanship or a patriotic course—he said to the people there, and he reported it here to-day, that they are taxed in order that the eastern portion of the Dominion may be benefited. That is the sectional strife policy which these hon. gentlemen preach up and down the country. Reference was made by my hon. friend from West Ontario (Mr. Edgar) to the cotton industries of Canada, and his attack was quite in accord with the cruel war which the hon. gentlemen opposite wage against their fellow countrymen who are engaged in manufacturing enterprises in this country. I desire just to say one or two words in defence of those men who earn their living and who have their capital invested in these manufacturing enterprises. I find, Mr. Speaker, that the investments in factories in this Dominion amount to $353,000,000, they have 367,000 people employed, whose wages amount to $100,000,000 a year, and the output of these establishments is valued at $475,000,000. My hon. friend from West Ontario (Mr. Edgar), in referring the other evening to the condition of the cotton factories of this Dominion made the statement, if I took his figures down correctly, that the goods manufactured in Canada last year amounted to some $14,000,000. He also made the statement that Mr. A. F. Gault, the President of the Dominion Cotton Manufacturing Company, had stated at a public meeting that the 17½ per cent tariff of the Mackenzie Government was all the protection they required. At the time I questioned the accuracy of that report of Mr. Gault's statement, across the House. The following day I received unsolicited the following telegram from Mr. Gault. It is dated Montreal, 10th April, 1894, and is addressed to myself, and reads:

With reference to statement made yesterday in the House by Mr. Edgar in which my name is mentioned, I have to say that the statement attributed to me, as having been made last year, that the cotton industry could be maintained under the Mackenzie tariff, was contradicted by me in the press the following day, and that contradiction I now affirm. Mr. Edgar is also wrong in his figures as to the output of the Canadian companies, the whole product of the Dominion being under $9,000,000. The dividend paid by the Dominion Company is 8 per cent; by the Montreal Company 8 per cent. The Canadian Coloured Company pays no dividend.

(Signed,) A. F. GAULT.

I recognize that my hon. friend from West Ontario (Mr. Edgar) made this statement with no intention to deceive the House, that he had been misinformed. But, I think, as the statement was made publicly, the correction should be equally public. I am a little surprised that the hon. gentleman repeated this year his reference of last year to the Dominion Cotton Company, for this reason that last year the position of that company was explained by me in the House. And the hon. gentleman went on to repeat again that this company had watered their stock, that it was originally a company having stock of $1,500,000 capital, and that they had watered that stock to the extent of $1,500,000. When the hon. gentleman told us that the Dominion Company had increased their capital from $1,500,000 to $3,000,000, he should have told us also that the increased stock was represented by eleven mills, which are said to have cost, etc., their original shareholders between $3,000,000 and $4,000,000. The property of the Dominion Company is estimated to be worth $5,000,000, and I say that, under these circumstances, and when the fact is known that they have issued bonds and found the cash to pay for these eleven new mills, no one is warranted to-day in saying that its capital of $3,000,000 has been watered to the extent of $1,500,000. The hon. gentleman also referred to certain prices of cotton goods, and endeavoured to convey the impression to the House that these so-called cotton lords have been making fabulous profits. I believe that on both sides of this House there must be hon. gentlemen who, like myself, have owned stock in these companies, and I think—nay, I am sure—that their personal experience has been very similar to my own. As a matter of fact, for ten years these cotton mills paid no dividend with the exception of one or two mills. That was our experience, certainly, in the east. I do not believe we ever had a dividend from the investment we made, and I can only say that, so far as I am personally concerned, and I fear I am not exceptional. I lost 75 per cent of the investment I made in cotton mills. These cotton mills were unremunerative, and many would be closed to-day if they had not been acquired and worked by the Dominion Cotton Company. When we invested our money in these mills it was certainly with the expectation of a return from the investment, and also largely from a desire to find employment for the people in the community in which we lived. To the extent that the mills have furnished employment our wishes have been attained, and, though we have lost our money, numbers of men and women are employed in them who, but for the existence of the factories would be working in Lowell, and enriching the cities of the United States. The hon. gentlemen opposite therefore are wrong, and it is not fair for them to say that the people who have invested their money in cotton have made very large returns. I expressed the opinion last year, when this matter was under discussion in this House that from first to last the men who invested their money in cotton mills have not received 2½ per cent per annum on their investment. I know that such a statement was made recently in Montreal by one of the most enthusiastic supporters of hon. gentlemen opposite, a gentleman who is well known in that community as one of the most prominent Grits in it. I say he made a statement that since he put his money into cotton mills he has not had 2½ per cent per annum on his investment. Those of us who have given this matter any attention and particularly those who have had any personal relations with the cotton mills or with the trade realize this: that the goods which are made in in Canada are made of the best American quality, and that they are better than the ordinary run of goods which are manufactured largely in Lancashire. My hon. friend from western Ontario was very much mistaken when he questioned the accuracy of the statement made by the hon. Finance Minister in reference to the amount of filling which is put in the goods manufactured in England. The hon. member for North Simcoe made a comparison of prices last year between English and Canadian goods, and as he was good enough to name the authorities from which he had gathered his information, I was able to examine them for myself. And the result of my examination was this: that while in Canada, from 1878 down to 1891, cotton goods had declined 24 per cent, in England, during the same period they had declined only 18 per cent. Therefore, prices have relatively declined more in Canada than in England. I think it would be impossible for any one, unless he had the goods actually before him, to institute such a comparison as the hon. member for North Simcoe has made. He has told us that you can buy silesias at a certain price in Canada, and you can buy them in England at a certain price. Well, that is quite possible, but there may be a great difference in the relative values of the two goods, and unless one had the goods before him, in fact unless they were examined by an expert, you could not institute any fair comparison. Then my hon. friend from West Ontario also said that the changes in the tariff have resulted beneficially to the cotton manufacturers, and in proof of it he made the statement that the stock of the Dominion Cotton Company and the stock of the Montreal Cotton Company had advanced, I think one of them, two points, and the other, two or three points, a day or two after the tariff had been announced. I find that on 5th April the Montreal Cotton Company was quoted at about 130, and the Dominion Cotton Company was quoted at about 122, and the Coloured Cotton Company was quoted at 62½ or 37½ below par. And so my hon. friend argues that the tariff has not been lowered because the price of these stocks has advanced a few points. In order to institute a fair comparison I would ask my hon. friend from West Ontario to ascertain for himself if the price of the Montreal Cotton Company's stock twelve months ago was not 140, whereas to-day it is 130. I am told just now that it subsequently went up to 156, and declined again, and it is down now to 130. The stock of the Dominion Cotton Company, twelve months ago, was 131, to-day it is 122. Twelve months ago the stock of the Coloured Cotton Company was 100, it is now down to 62½. Therefore, the proposed tariff has had no very great effect, and therefore the argument of my hon. friend from West Ontario cannot be sustained, if the figures which I have now submitted to the House are accurate, and I believe them to be. At all events, they show this fact, that if the stock of the Dominion Cotton Company is selling in Montreal to-day on the open market at 122, it is positive evidence that the Montreal people who buy it know very well that the stock was never watered, as they never would pay any such price for watered stock. As I have made these corrections, I trust that my hon. friend from West Ontario, when this matter comes up again and we are discussing details in committee, will do these companies, will do himself, the justice to correct the errors into which he has been misled. Now, Mr. Speaker, having dealt with these items of the tariff very hurriedly, as the hour is late and the House is impatient for a division, time will not permit to go into the general question, I shall have an opportunity of doing so when we get into committee, I shall conclude with saying I cannot conscientiously vote for the amendment proposed by the hon. member for South Oxford.

Mr. RIDER. I have listened with a great deal of attention to the remarks of the hon. member who has just taken his seat (Mr. Kenny); in fact, I always listen to that hon. gentleman with great interest, expecting to hear from him something useful when important questions are being discussed, and, Sir, there must be something woefully wrong with the new customs tariff, as the hon. member resumes his seat without defending a single item therein. The discussion which has been occupying the time of this House for a number of days past, and the serious attention of the country as well, proves conclusively the importance of the subject at issue, which I propose to treat for a short time from an agricultural standpoint. Hon. gentlemen on the opposite side of the House who never falter in protestation of loyalty to their country when election time comes around have evinced a strange desire to shun the question which is before the House at the present time, and that is the amended tariff. The farmers of this country had reason to expect some important modifications in their favour. I for one feel that the future prosperity of this country depends largely on the agricultural interests. We have now had an experience of fifteen years under the National Policy, and we are called at the present time to a sort of crystal wedding, a renewal of their union with the old idol of protection by a high tariff. Now, Sir, I felt that after all the time which had been consumed by the Government in studying the various interests of the country, the farmers at least would receive some practical benefit from this revision. I followed the Finance Minister carefully in the remarks he made in introducing the amended tariff, and my attention was particularly called to the only two items which he was pleased to place upon the free list. That I may do the hon. gentleman no injustice, I will quote his words:

But there is one item made free which deserves special mention, and the object of which is to afford a healthy amusement at a cheap rate to a large and deserving class of our population. Curling stones have been made free. Dogs have been added to other fowls that come in free for breeding purposes.

Now, I think the farmers of this country will wonder how the hon. Finance Minister comes to class dogs with fowls. But they will wonder none the less at his lack of knowledge upon matters of great interest to farmers of the province of Quebec, when so very important an item as maple sugar has been omitted from the tariff schedule altogether, and which up to the present moment the hon. gentleman does not know himself how to classify. Maple sugar is an item of considerable importance to the farmers of the Eastern Townships, who have for a number of years been following a line of mixed farming, and this is an important product at a season of the year when but little else can be done, and deserves due attention. I shall have occasion to refer to this item later on, showing its importance. Sir, some members of the Government have been advising the farmers in other parts of the country to adopt mixed farming. I understand that the Minister of Public Works, speaking to an audience of farmers in the county of Two Mountains, who had reason to complain of the loss of the United States market for their horses, told them that they must change their avocation, and if they could not sell their horses in Canada keep them and turn their attention to the cultivation of strawberries. Such advice is poor consolation for a deserving class of our people. Sir, owing to the lateness of the hour I do not intend to occupy any considerable portion of the time of the House, but there are some items which I consider very important to the electors of the county which I have the honour to represent, and which we expected to see fairly treated by the Government when they came to finally adopt their amended tariff. I will refer to the item of coal oil. This article, it seems, has borne for a number of years, a very high rate of duty. According to the Trade and Navigation Returns, we imported the past year 5,980,183 gallons, upon which a customs duty was paid amounting to over \$500,000. But what do we find when we look at the exports of coal oil? The total exports from Canada for the last year was only 1,111 gallons, valued at \$100, showing conclusively the consumption of this country requires the importation of nearly 600,000,000 gallons more than the refiners are able to turn out, and I would like to know how we can impose a more direct and onerous tax than the one that is levied upon this article. Last session, the Minister of Finance was pleased to take this item into consideration, and the country was led to believe, at the time, a change had been made that would be for the general benefit; but that advantage, if any, had no effect whatever in the rural districts, that suffer the most, and which should have relief by placing coal oil upon the free list. There is a feature in connection with the storage of kerosene to which I would like to call the attention of the Finance Minister, and that is the system of storing coal oil in tanks. At the present time no permission is granted for storing except in the barrels in which the oil is imported. This entails great loss, and to obviate loss merchants are compelled to use tanks. I trust the Finance Minister will see his way clear to arrange so as to permit the storage of oil in tanks by allowing it to be emptied out of the barrel in which it is imported. Another very important item to the agricultural interests is corn. The duty, $7\frac{1}{2}$ cents per bushel, was placed upon corn under the pretense of affording protection to the farmers, but it seems the farmers desired no such kind of protection. The question then came up, whether the duty was really placed upon Indian corn as a protective measure. If so, why did the Government secretly legislate to remove the duty in favour of the distillers, by granting a rebate of duty paid on corn when imported to be manufactured into liquors for export; and why, when this question was brought to the attention of the House, the privilege granted to distillers was flatly refused farmers and others importing corn for stock-raising purposes? It is very evident that the duty placed upon corn, an article largely used by our farmers, was not imposed for the purpose of protecting the farmer. Our natural conditions will not admit of the successful raising of corn. It is an article on which farmers largely depend for feeding purposes, and to the farmer it is as much raw material as is cotton and wool to the manufacturer, and should be placed upon the free list. If a farmer can, from a dollar's worth of corn, produce a dollar and a quarter's worth of beef, pork, butter or cheese, I fail to see why he should not have the same privilege as regards obtaining the raw material as is enjoyed by manufacturers. I think there should be no contention between classes, except it be the patriotic one of how best to serve the country. I fail to understand why the manufacturer is not interested in the welfare of the farmer. The permanent success of this country depends more upon agriculture than on any other industry; and when we consider the extent of the exports of manufacturers we see at once that the manufacturers depend upon the people of this country for their consumers. I believe that, considering our geographical position, free trade on a broad and reciprocal basis between Canada and the United States is desirable. The natural avenues of trade between the two countries, are largely from the north to the south. We find the products of the Maritime Provinces trending southward to the New England states. When we reach Ontario we find that, notwithstanding there is a duty on coal, Ontario manufacturers have to depend for their coal supply on the Alleghany region. As we go further west, we have products which find a ready market to the south and vice versa. It cannot, therefore, be in the interest of this country, or in the interest of the United States that the natural avenues of trade should be restricted by artificial barriers. We have evidence of the skill, ability and courage of our Canadian farmers by laurels won at Chicago in competition with the world. But what benefit is this if our farmers are compelled to pay more for every article which enters into their business than is necessary. Indian corn, kerosene oil, fence wire, nails, tools, agricultural machinery, and so forth, are as much raw material to the farmer in the prosecution of his business as are articles which are admitted free on behalf of the manufacturers. The American market is our main and only natural market for many articles, notably barley, the total export of which from Canada last year was 2,040,648 bushels, and of this 1,431,378 bushels found a market in the United States, notwithstanding the high import duty in that country. Of beans we exported a total of 276,955 bushels, and of that we sent to the United States 273,900 bushels. Our total export of potatoes amounted to 1,112,838 bushels, and of this we sent to the United States 800,225 bushels. We exported of poultry \$99,467 worth, and of this total export the United States took \$83,500. Our total export of eggs amounted to \$868,007, and of this the United States took \$324,355. Our total export of maple sugar was 738,514 pounds, and of this we sent to the United States 718,615 pounds. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, this latter article is really an important item of our export. It is an article produced by the farmers at a time of the year when they cannot profitably be engaged in any other pursuit, and it is an article, the price for which, depends more upon the demand as a luxury than for domestic use, nearly all of our export trade going into the United States. Of hay, our total exports amounted to \$1,452,872 worth and of that the United States took \$854,958. Wool is an article which is admitted into our country free of duty. The manufacturers have all the advantage of going to the cheapest and best markets of the world for their supply. There is no import duty placed upon wool which would in any way protect the farmer, and therefore the class of wool which our farmers can best afford to raise is that which finds its best market in the United States. Of wool, we exported, 1,168,834 pounds, and of that the United States took 1,146,766 pounds. Now, in regard to coal. We find that the total exports of coal was to the value of \$3,357,185, and of this the United States took \$2,982,656 worth. Of horses our total export was \$1,588,007, and of this we sent to the markets of the United States to the value of \$1,250,189. Sheep, total export, \$1,288,540 worth, and of this we sent to the United States \$1,129,499. Swine, total export \$146,000 worth, and of this amount we sent to the United States \$130,092. The foregoing statements of many of our exports show the necessity and good to be derived in extending to the utmost our trade relation with our neighbours to the south. Now, Mr. Speaker, let me give you a little idea of the extent of the exports of our manufactures; not with the idea of belittling at all the manufacturing industries of this country, because I believe we should encourage manufacturing as much as possible. I believe, Sir, that the natural wealth of this country should be manufactured at home and sent out of the country in its finished condition. The timber in our forests, the mines hidden in the recesses of the earth, and all of our natural products should be sent out of the country in a finished state as far as possible. But what are the results at the present time? The exports from this country consist very largely of raw material. From our mines we exported to the world at large to the value of \$5,329,890, and of this total export we sent to the United States \$4,756,890 worth. From our fisheries we sent in total exports to the value of \$8,743,050, and of this we sent to the United States \$3,503,904. Of the products of our forests, our total exports were \$26,359,910, and of this we sent to the United States \$13,859,960 worth. From the products of the farm, that is animals and their products, and agricultural produce, we sent of total exports to all the world \$53,785,989 all told. Now, Mr. Speaker, when we consider that the larger portion of the exports from our forests was in the shape of lumber in its cheapest condition, largely logs with the bark on, we can see that we must be losing a large amount of the entire advantage which would accrue from the manufacture of this native product in our own country. If we had a fair trade policy between Canada and the United States, they being our natural purchasers for all of these articles, the saving of freight would compel the finishing of that product at the place of production. With reference to the export of manufactured goods we exported during the past year agricultural implements to the extent of \$462,253, only. Yet in order to protect this comparatively small industry as considered from its export, the farming community, the great industry of this country, will be taxed to the extent of thousands of dollars by the duty on their implements which amounts to from 20 to 35 per cent. These implements are something that the farmer has got to have. The farmer is obliged to send his surplus products into the markets of the world, there to compete with the products of other countries, and why would it not be in the interests of the agricultural industry of the country that the farmers should have the best market in which to sell as well as to purchase their goods. At the present time, according to the rate of duty established by this country, every consumer, be he farmer or mechanic, who is expending \$300 a year, be it for machinery or for the necessaries of life is virtually paying \$100 of that amount in the shape of taxes. In regard to refined sugar we are always told in years past that the duty on sugar was really in the interests of the country, that it cost the consumer nothing, that protection was not a tax, and that sugar could be bought as cheap here as in any other country. But when the hon. Minister of Finance a few sessions ago removed the duty on refined sugar he claimed that he had relieved the people of this country from a burden of three and a half million dollars. It seems, however, that there is to remain on that most necessary commodity, a tax of 64 cents per 100 pounds. Now, how can this be justified? The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, the hon. leader of the Senate, speaking upon the question of the day, took occasion to say:

I have under my hand a statement showing that we exported between 5,000,000 and 6,000,000 pounds of sugar to the United States and Newfoundland last year, and I also have letters from the refiners at Halifax showing that they exported some 10,000 barrels of sugar to Boston alone, and from the Redpath refinery showing that they sent over 5,000 barrels to the market of Chicago in the previous year, paying the freight upon the whole of it, and paying six-tenths of a cent per pound upon it, and underselling the United States refiners who were getting two cents per pound bounty on all sugar grown in the country—even maple sugar—and were allowed all sugar free under 16.

Then, the hon. gentleman goes on to give a comparative table showing the ruling prices of sugar in New York and Montreal at different dates throughout the year. I will give the first date for each month:

Weekly Prices, New York and Montreal, Granulated Sugar for Year 1892.

| Date. | New York, Net per lb. | Montreal, Net per lb. |
|--------------|--------------------------|--------------------------|
| Jan. 8..... | 4 00 | 4.30 |
| Feb. 5..... | 3.92 | 4.33 |
| Mar. 4..... | 3.92 | 4.33 |
| April 1..... | 4.29 | 4.39 |
| May 6..... | 4.23 | 4.39 |
| June 3..... | 4.23 | 4.39 |
| July 1..... | 4.23 | 4.14 |
| Aug. 5..... | 4.23 | 4.08 |
| Sept. 2..... | 4.50 | 4.26 |
| Oct. 7..... | 4.72 | 4.30 |
| Nov. 4..... | 4.72 | 4.39 |
| Dec. 2..... | 3.50 | 4.39 |

Now, I find by computation that the average price for the year in both places was about the same, that is 4.30 cents. Now, if the sugar refiners of this country can ship sugar to the United States in such large quantities as stated, and pay the freight and the duty, which amounts to at least one cent per pound, I fail to see why they cannot give us sugar here at a lower rate. It seems from this statement that the sugar refiners are sending their sugar to the United States market and selling it there at least 1 cent per pound less than they are selling it here in the home market. This is a kind of class legislation which should not prevail in this or any other country. Now, Mr. Speaker, time and time again we here it stated that the breakfast table is practically free, that is to say, that the people have no taxes whatever to pay on the necessaries of life. Now, I have made a careful computation, taking only the articles which we are obliged to import, which we cannot produce owing to our climatic and other conditions, and I find that on the following articles, which are used largely for the so-called breakfast table, we pay duty to the amount named :

|------------------------------------|---------------------|
| Baking Powder and Soda | $ 34,986 70 |
| Yeast | 12,522 92 |
| Mustard | 17,350 15 |
| Spices | 28,827 14 |
| Rice | 99,096 96 |
| Tapioca and Arrow Root | 6,697 62 |
| Macaroni and Vermicelle | 3,237 64 |
| Currants | 53,630 31 |
| Figs | 9,227 92 |
| Prunes | 12,592 97 |
| Dates | 9,537 69 |
| Raisins | 126,553 21 |
| Tea | 8,861 00 |
| Coffee | 9,654 99 |
| Sugar | 10,335 91 |
| Molasses | 61,821 64 |
| Salt | 15,306 19 |
| Bags the salt comes in | 2,834 25 |
| White Granite and China Ware | 149,244 24 |
| Table Cutlery "N.E.S." | 71,009 69 |
| Total | $743,319 14 |

And this list does not embrace nearly all the articles so used. In regard to fertilizers, I was glad to see that the Government had decided to reduce the duty by one-half, the duty being placed at 10 per cent; yet this rate, applied to the cost of fertilizers, amounts to from $1.25 to $4 per ton. This is an article of great importance to the farmers of Canada, and I wish to point out the difference between the policy adopted by this Government in regard to that important article and the policy of the McKinley tariff, of which we have heard so much as being the most exorbitant tariff upon the face of the earth. I find under the McKinley tariff all kinds of fertilizers for increasing the fertility and productiveness of the soil are admitted into the United States duty free from all countries; and I have heard no good reason yet advanced why the farmers of this country should not receive equal consideration by having fertilizers free. We should remember that the United States market is the best and only foreign market for our barley, and according to the prices ruling in New York to-day 100 pounds of Canadian barley will purchase 160 pounds of corn. It is a well-known fact that corn is worth more per pound than barley for feeding purposes. Therefore, if we had no artificial restrictions on our trade, and could have a fair exchange of commodities between the two countries, it would be in the interest of the people of both countries. It would enable the people of Canada to produce that which they are best fitted to produce by nature and ability. The United States is beyond doubt our best market in which to sell our barley, beans, potatoes, pork, poultry, eggs, maple sugar, hay, wool, coal, horses, sheep and swine. But as regards the English market, although our beef, butter, cheese and pork are admitted there free, the same privilege is granted to the producers of all other countries; and I should like to know how the Canadian farmer can profitably compete even in the British market if he is handicapped by being obliged to pay a greater amount on those articles which constitute his raw material. For instance, Indian corn largely used in the production of beef and pork is taxed 7½ cents a bushel, virtually 15 per cent. The following table shows the taxes our farmers have to pay on their raw material :

|------------------------------|--------------|
| Indian Corn | 15 per cent. |
| Kerosene | 120 do |
| Nails | 75 do |
| Fence wire | 60 do |
| Fertilizers | 10 do |
| Farming tools | 35 do |
| Carriages | 30 do |
| Agricultural machinery | 25 do |

Making an average tax of 46 per cent, which the Canadian farmer has to pay on those articles, over and above what similar articles cost his brother farmer in the United States, and which are as much his raw material as cotton and wool are the raw material of the manufacturers. But, so far as I understand the methods of the administration of this country, the schedule which is known as the tariff schedule is very little understood or appreciated by the people. This schedule is continually changed by secret legislation—by Orders in Council and rulings in the department, so that it is almost impossible to tell what rate of duty really the importer is obliged to pay. Very often we see rulings which will enable manufacturers to bring in certain lines of machinery duty free. Mining machinery of all kinds is allowed into this country duty free, also salt, twines, &c., for the use of the Maritime Provinces in addition to a bounty of $160,000 yearly paid to the fishermen of those provinces. A rebate of 90 per cent of the duty is allowed on corn when kiln-dried to be used for human food, which is also for the benefit of the Maritime fishermen. Where, then, is there any protection to the farmer in the duty of 7½ cents per bushel on corn? The farmers all through the country ask for the removal of this duty, and surely they are the best judges whether it is in their interest or not. But did you ever hear of an Order in Council or a ruling that enabled a carpenter to bring in free any tools which he requires in the prosecution of his business. I believe that the freest system possible of trade should be adopted. I believe, judging by the history of the past, it is not the policy of this Government to foster trade with the United States. I believe that a system of fair reciprocity would be the best possible arrangement which could be consummated between the two countries, as it would enable the people of both countries to work at that for which they are the best fitted by nature and the natural conditions of their country. The Government is in duty bound to show that they are disposed to reciprocate in the tariff changes now going on in Washington, and thus inaugurate a policy of conciliation and enable the two countries to come together for the purpose of removing these artificial barriers to trade. With your permission, Mr. Speaker, I would like to explain what will be the tendency of reciprocity. In view of women franchise, naturally the ladies wish to post themselves on political matters. The following is a graphic description of the explanation:—

“Pray tell me,” she said as they stood together
By the garden gate in the bright spring weather—“Pray tell me, and tell me without verbosity,
What is meant by the system of reciprocity?”

“Tis a system arranged between two nations
For the fostering of friendly trade relations,
A system of mutual interchanging
Which Laurier has a long time been arranging.

“You don't understand my explanation?
Then I will give you an illustration:
I kiss you thus—this is not audacity—
And you kiss me back, and that's reciprocity.”

She kissed him back, and a flush as tender
And soft as the sunset's dying splendour
Stole over her face as she giggled sweetly, Tis a system that takes my heart completely.”

I believe that reciprocity in trade with the world would take the hearts of the farmers just as completely and enable our people to make the best use of their natural wealth. In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, let me thank you and the hon. gentlemen present for the kind attention accorded to me while thus briefly expressing my views on the important subject now before the House.

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). The hon. member for Guysboro' (Mr. Fraser) introduced my name into this debate in connection with an article which appeared in the Toronto 'Evening News.' Now, I make it my invariable rule never to interfere with the members of the press. I always recognize the fact that the individual is unable to cope with journalistic enterprise, and therefore I have not noticed that article hitherto. When the little meeting of private gentlemen, who were with me that night, unanimously contradicted the statement of that journal, I thought that would have been sufficient for any gentleman in this House. But as it is not, I now rise to say that the report in that paper is an invention made out of whole cloth. Nothing of the kind ever occurred directly or indirectly, and I am not responsible for one word printed in the Toronto 'Evening News' with reference to the private meeting which it describes.

Mr. PRIOR. I trust that hon. gentlemen will pardon one who holds the humble position that I do in this House, if I take up the time of the House at this late period of the debate and of the night, and I promise that my remarks shall be short. We have heard speeches from hon. gentlemen representing constituencies in every province and in every section of the country; and these speeches have given forcible and able voice to arguments of every description for and against protection and free trade. We have been asked, Sir, to believe, on the one hand, that Canada is in a prosperous and flourishing condition; that trade is good; that her people are contented and happy, and that only under a policy of protection can she continue in her successful career. We have also, on the other hand, been asked to believe that Canada is at a standstill; that her treasury is depleted; that her trade is stagnant; that the manufacturers of the country have been making colossal fortunes at the expense of the farmer and mechanic; that misery and starvation are found throughout the land, and that the only panacea for this pitiable state of affairs is the inauguration of a free trade policy. Sir, I have listened to these arguments with great interest, and I may say, with great respect. The gladiators in this political arena have hurled defiance of each other across the floor of the House, and have called upon their henchmen to stand firm in their principles and by their party. I was proud that I belonged to Canada, when I heard the magnificent speeches made by hon. gentlemen on the floor of this House. Sir, after these champions have exhausted themselves in expatiating upon the graces and beauties of their lady loves, it would be presumptuous in me to think of saying anything new or anything even that would interest hon. gentlemen here to-night. But I do think that it is right, upon an occasion of this kind—an occasion which, I may say, I consider one of the most momentous that has occurred for a long time—that every hon. gentleman should rise in his place and, in a few words, state what his convictions are in regard to the trade policy of this country. I can honestly say, after listening attentively to the arguments that have been presented, that I am to-night, if possible, more than ever an out-and-out protectionist. In my humble opinion, not one single argument has been presented by gentlemen opposite that should convince me in the slightest degree that the affairs of this country would be in a better condition under a free trade policy than under the policy we have at the present time. Not one argument have hon. gentlemen opposite made use of that has not been combatted, aye, simply pulverized by the speakers on this side. I have the honour to represent a constituency in the province of British Columbia, and I have not the slightest doubt in my own mind that if it was not for this policy under which we are fortunately carrying on the affairs of the country, there would be hardly a trader, hardly a manufacturer, hardly a mechanic who would be making the decent living he is making at the present time. I may be wrong, but this is my firm conviction—and not only is it my firm conviction, but it seems to have been the conviction of the people of British Columbia, if we may judge by the result of the elections for the last fifteen years. I noticed one thing with regard to what some gentlemen opposite have said during this debate, and that is, that they have argued solely as to how the tariff affected certain interests and certain localities; losing sight of the fact that we must have only one tariff, and that it must do for the whole country, and, therefore, necessarily there must be a large measure of give and take between the different provinces. Sir, I am proud to say that the average British Columbian is a large-minded and liberal-minded man. It may be that the vastness and grandeur of the country in which he lives, impresses him and expands his ideas. But, be that as it may, though he thinks that his first duty to himself and his family is to look after his own individual success, still he knows he is called upon to do more, he knows that if we are to build up this country and make a nation of it such as we have a right to expect it will become, he and every other man in Canada must help his fellow citizens and all must stand together from one coast to the other. It may be that under a protective, and equally under a free trade or any other tariff some individual, or some one industry may suffer. There is no tariff that can be framed by the ablest statesman that ever lived or by the man with the most experience in such matters that can give exactly equal rights and advantages to each individual and each industry in a country of this size. Hon. gentlemen perhaps know that the people of British Columbia pay large sums into the Treasury in the way of customs and other duties. But, though they pay these large duties, do hon. gentlemen opposite think that British Columbians believe they would be better off under a free trade policy? No, Sir, not for one single moment. Though they pay about three times as much per head as the Ontario man, still all they ask is that they should have a proper and equitable return made to them in the shape of useful and necessary public works and subsidies. They know that in a new country like this; a country of great possibilities; aye, of great certainties, before the country can take its proper position industries must be built up and fostered and the natural resources of the country now lying dormant at our doors must be made use of. Sir, do hon. gentlemen opposite believe that in a new country like British Columbia, if it were not for the protective policy, we could carry on and build up the industries we have. At the present time we have large iron works and shops that are struggling along for a bare existence. It is all they can do to pay a dividend on the capital invested. We have sash and door factories; we have rice mills where the rice brought from China is cleaned and prepared for the consumer; we have spice mills, chemical works, vinegar works, breweries, and many other smaller industries which in the aggregate employ large numbers of men who are earning good wages, though the proprietors cannot manage to make more than a decent profit. But, suppose, the protection which they have was taken from them, what would be the consequence? Every one of these industries, so far as I know, I am sure would be forced to close up. The influx of goods from the American side would fill the market, and, instead of our own people being engaged in manufacturing these goods, these men who are now happy and have steady work would be out of employment and, in a short time would be wanting the necessaries of life. Sir, hon. gentlemen on either side of this House have paid great attention to the farmers of this country. Now, there is nobody has a greater respect for the farmer than I have, no one better aware of the fact that the farmers are a large majority in the country. But surely, other men should be protected as well as the farmer. If you do away with the industries of the cities and towns, what becomes of the home market for the produce of the farm? The home trade is, by a long way, better for the farmer than the export trade. The farmer of British Columbia particularly must be a protectionist. At the present time the prices of many of his products are kept down and ruled by the prices of the same articles brought from the North-west and Manitoba. But if you were to open the country under free trade, the British Columbia farmer would be literally swamped by the products brought across from the American side. Even at the present time large quantities of these products are brought across—the duty being paid upon them—and sold at prices at which the British Columbia farmer could not make an honest living. If it were not for protection, not 25 per cent of the traders and manufacturers of that province would be in business. I said at the beginning of my remarks that it would be presumptuous in me to take up the time of the House in trying to voice arguments that have been put forward by abler men than myself, but still I think I was right in rising and giving utterance to my convictions. I may say that I am rather sorry the Government have seen fit to make such large reductions on some articles in the new tariff. However, it is not a subject that I can deal with here, and I shall have a good chance to return to it when we get into committee. I cannot say that trade is prosperous in British Columbia, nor indeed in Canada. But is it prosperous anywhere in the world? Is it prosperous in free trade countries, any more than in countries under protection? There is a general stagnation of trade all over the world, and it is due to causes that I do not think the ablest and most experienced financier can explain any better than I can myself. If we look to the south of us, we find that trade there is also slack; it is more than that, it is simply in a deplorable condition. In a weak moment the voters of the United States gave up their allegiance to the policy that had made them the envy of the world, and now look at them. Go into the manufacturing towns in the States and see the condition of affairs. It is simply financial chaos from one end of the country to the other. You see silent looms, extinguished forges; you meet with ruined merchants; you hear of the crash of falling fortunes that men are losing from day to day. But, most pitiable of all is to see the large army of unemployed with their wives and families, tramping through the silent streets of the cities. Sir, Mr. Joseph Buchanan, of New York, has published a somewhat elaborate paper, showing the numbers of unemployed in the States. He puts the number of adult males in the United States at 13,000,000, of which 6,000,000 are employed in agricultural pursuits, and 1,000,000 are proprietors of various establishments, thus leaving 6,000,000 wage-earners. Of these 6,000,000 he says there are at the present time 2,390,000 out of work. Is that not a most deplorable state of things? Workingmen all over the world are slow to learn, but in the end we generally find that their judgment is correct. Like Artemus Ward, I do not care to prophesy unless I know, but I will venture for once to say that the first opportunity the people of the United States have of pronouncing their opinion upon free trade at the polls, the party now in power will be swept out by a wind of popular disfavour compared to which a Dakota blizzard would be a zephyr. Sir, I ask this House, I ask the people of Canada, to take warning by them and to stick to a good thing when they know they have got it. In conclusion, I may be allowed to tell a little story, and, as it has a moral, I will tell it with a purpose. Hon. gentlemen from the Maritime Provinces may perhaps have heard it, as I am told the incident took place somewhere in their country. It seems there was a very hot election being waged in some portion of the Maritime Provinces and at a certain meeting the feeling rose to fever heat, and there was a great deal of excitement among those present. One candidate got up and made a magnificent speech, and was cheered to the echo. When the other candidate came forward in a trembling state of excitement, he looked around on the sea of faces, gesticulated, and grabbed at his throat, but he could get nothing out. At last he managed to blurt out: "Boys, it's all here, but I can't get it out." Well, Sir, the moral of that story is, that that candidate was elected. Now, British Columbia members come from a long distance, and they have not the privilege, as you all know, of being able to run down to their homes every week or two; and, therefore, they naturally get a little irritable and a little impatient as the days go by to see the end of the session. Well, Sir, I trust that hon. gentlemen who are thinking, after this debate is over, of making two or three hours' speeches, will imitate the man who could not get it out, and they will not only do us a good turn, but they will also make their own election sure.

Mr. FOSTER. Before the House divides on this question, I wish to lay on the table of the House, before we go into committee, some additional resolutions. A number of them are Orders in Council which have had effect during the last year, and some of them for a longer period, and it is proposed to put them in the enactment under the free list. Another is the amended package laws, and the resolutions with reference to malt and vinegar, and some additional resolutions which are in amendment of a few items on the first eight pages of the resolutions, as they have been laid on the Table of the House. They are not very numerous, but are somewhat important. They are as follows:

- Meats, N. E. S., two cents per pound.
- Live hogs, one and one-half cents per pound.
- Lard, lard compound, and cottolene, two cents per pound.
- Condensed milk, three cents per pound.
- Rice, cleaned, one and one-quarter cents per pound.
- Chicory, four cents per pound.
- Cocoa paste and chocolate and other preparations of cocoa, twenty-five per cent.
- Cocoa nut, desiccated, sweetened or not, five cents per pound.

Resolved, That it is expedient to repeal so much of the Inland Revenue Act and amending Acts as determines the Excise duties to be levied upon Malt and Vinegar, and to provide that on and after the 28th March the Excise duties thereon shall be as follows:—

- Malt, one and one-half cents per pound.
 - Vinegar, eight cents per proof gallon.
- That the value of all bottles, flasks, jars, demijohns, carboys, casks, hogsheads, pipes, barrels, and all other vessels or packages, manufactured of tin, iron, lead, zinc, glass or any other material, and capable of holding liquids—and all packages in which goods are commonly placed for home consumption, including cases in which bottled spirits, wines or malt liquors or other liquids are contained,

—and every package being the first receptacle or covering inclosing goods for purpose of sale, shall in all cases not otherwise provided for, in which they contain goods subject to an ad valorem duty or a specific and ad valorem duty be taken and held to be a part of the fair market value of such goods for duty, and shall be charged with the same rate of ad valorem duty as is to be levied and collected on the goods they contain; and when they contain goods subject to a specific duty only, such packages shall be charged with a duty of customs of twenty per cent ad valorem, to be computed upon their original fair market value; and all or any of the above packages described as capable of holding liquids, when containing goods exempt from duty under this Act, shall be charged with a duty of twenty per centum ad valorem, provided the contents thereof are not of such a nature that the destruction of the package becomes necessary in order to release the goods,—and all other packages containing free goods and being the first receptacles or inner coverings inclosing goods for the purpose of sale, shall be dutiable at the same rate as if imported empty; but all packages not hereinbefore specified, and not herein specially charged with or declared liable to duty under regulations, and being the usual and ordinary packages in which goods are packed for exportation, according to the general usage and custom of trade, shall be free of duty.

Provided further, that all special packages or coverings unlike those in which such goods as they contain are usually packed for home consumption, and all such packages or coverings as are apparently designed for use other than in the importation of the goods they contain, shall be subject to the same rates of duty as they would be if imported empty or separate from their contents.

Brass cups, being rough blanks, for the manufacture of paper shells or cartridges, when imported by manufacturers of brass and paper shells and cartridges, for use in their own factories.

Brass, iron or steel rolled, round wire rods under half an inch in diameter, and rolled copper rods one inch or under in diameter, when imported by wire manufacturers for use in making wire in their own factories.

Calcareous tufa, when imported for use in the manufacture of indurated fibreware or sulphite fibre, and for no other purpose.

Crucible sheet steel, eleven to sixteen gauge, 2½ to 18 inches wide, when imported by manufacturers of mower and reaper knives, for the manufacture of such knives, in their own factories.

Copper rollers, for use in calico printing, when imported by calico printers for use in their factories in the printing of calicoes and for no other purpose (such rollers not being manufactured in Canada).

Elastic rubber thread, for the manufacture of elastic webbing, when imported by the manufacturers of elastic rubber webbing, to be used for that purpose only, in their own factories.

Felloes of hickory wood, rough sawn to shape only, or rough sawn and bent to shape, not planed, smoothed or otherwise manufactured, when imported by manufacturers of carriages and cart wheels, to be used in the manufacture of such articles in their own factories only.

Fish skins and fish offal, when imported by manufacturers of glue, for use in their own factories.

Mr. FOSTER.

Grease, rough, the refuse of animal fat, for the manufacture of soap and oils only.

Gum Chicle or Sappato Gum in a crude state.

Hatters' bands (not cords), bindings, tips and sides, hat sweats and linings, both tips and sides, when imported by hat and cap manufacturers only, for use in their factories for the manufacture of hats and caps.

Hemp paper, made on four cylinder machines and calendered to between .006 and .008 inch thickness for the manufacture of shot shells, primers for the manufacture of shot shells and cartridges; and felt board sized and hydraulic pressed and covered with paper or uncovered for the manufacture of gun wads when such articles are imported by the manufacturers of shot shells, cartridges and gun wads, to be used for these purposes only in their own factories, until such times as the said articles are manufactured in Canada: Provided always that the said articles when imported, shall be entered only at such port or ports as may be named by the Controller of Customs, and at no other place; samples of such articles to be furnished to the collector of said port or ports by the Customs Department for the guidance of the officer when accepting free entries of such materials.

Molasses, second process, or molasses derived from the manufacture of "molasses sugar," testing by polariscope less than 35 degrees, when imported by manufacturers of blacking, for use in their own factories in the manufacture of blacking, conditional that the importers shall in addition to making oath at the time of entry that such molasses is imported for such use and will not be used for any other purpose cause such molasses to be at once mixed in a proper tank made for the purpose with at least one-fifth of the quantity thereof of cod, or other oil, whereby such molasses may be rendered unfit for any other use, such mixing to be done in the presence of a Customs officer at the expense of the importer, and under such further regulations as may from time to time be considered necessary in the interest and protection of the revenue, and that until such mixing is done and duly certified in the face of the entry thereof by such Customs officer the entry shall be held to be incomplete and the molasses subject to the usual rate of duty as when imported for any other purpose.

Horse hair, not further manufactured than simply cleaned and dipped or dyed, imported for use in the manufacture of horse hair cloths.

Lastings, mohair cloth, or other manufactures of cloth, when imported by manufacturers of buttons for use in their own factories, and woven or made in patterns of such size, shape or form, or cut in such manner as to be fit for covering buttons, exclusively—these conditions to be ascertained by special examination by the proper officers of Customs, and so certified on the face of each entry.

Ole-ostearine and degrass, when imported by manufacturers of leather, for use in the manufacture of leather in their factories.

Platinum and black oxide of copper, for use in the manufacture of chlorate.

Potash, chlorate of, not further prepared than ground, and free from admixture with any other substance.

Rolled iron tubes not welded, under 1½ inch in diameter, angle iron, 9 and 10 gauge, not over 1½ inch wide, iron tubing, lacquered or brass covered, not over 1½ inch diameter, all of which are to be cut to lengths for the manufacture of bedsteads, and to be used for no other purpose; when imported for the manufacturers of iron bedsteads to be used for these purposes only in their own factories, until such time as any of the said articles are manufactured in Canada.

Sawdust of the following woods: amaranth, cocoboral, boxwood, cherry, chestnut, walnut, gumwood, mahogany, pitch pine, rosewood, sandal-wood, sycamore, Spanish cedar, oak, hickory, whitewood, African teak, black heart ebony, lignum vitæ, red cedar, redwood, satinwood, white ash, persimmon and dogwood.

Square reeds and raw-hide centres, textile leather or rubber heads, thumbs and tips, and steel, iron or nickel caps for whip ends, when imported by whip manufacturers, for use in the manufacture of whips in their own factories.

Steel for the manufacture of hammers, augers and auger bits, when imported by the manufacturers of such articles for use in their own factories only.

Steel of numbers 24 and 17 gauge, in sheets 63 inches long and from 18 inches to 32 inches wide for the manufacture of tubular bow sockets, when imported by the manufacturers of such articles, for use in their own factories only.

Steel strip and flat steel wire, when imported into Canada by manufacturers of buckthorns, plain strip fencing, and safety barb wire fencing, for use in their own factories in the manufacture thereof.

Steel wire, Bessemer soft drawn spring, of numbers 10, 12 and 13 gauge, respectively, and Homo steel spring wire of numbers 11 and 12 gauge, respectively, when imported by manufacturers of wire mattresses, to be used in their own factories in the manufacture of such articles.

Typewriters, tablets with movable fixtures, and musical instruments, when imported by and for the use of schools for the blind, and being and remaining the sole property of the governing bodies of said schools and not of private individuals, the above particulars to be verified by special affidavit on each entry when presented.

Yarn spun from the hair of the alpaca or angora goat, when imported by the manufacturers of braids for use exclusively in their factories in the manufacture of such braids only, under such regulations as may be adopted by the Controller of Customs.

Provided that with respect to goods imported for manufacturing purposes that are admissible under this Act for any specific purposes, at a lower rate of duty than would otherwise be chargeable, or exempt from duty, the importer claiming such exemption from duty, or proportionate exemption from duty, shall make and subscribe to the following affidavit or affirmation before the Collector of Customs at the Port of Entry:—

I, (1) the undersigned, importer of the (2) mentioned in this entry do solemnly (3) that such (4) are imported by me for the manufacture of (5) in my own factory, situated at (6) and that no portion of the same will be used for any other purpose or disposed of until so manufactured.

(1) Name of importer.

(2) Name of the goods or articles.

(3) Swear or affirm.

(4) Name of the goods or articles.

(5) Name of the goods to be manufactured.

(6) Name of the place, county and province.

Amendment negatived, and House resolved itself into Committee of Ways and Means.

Committee rose and reported progress.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and the House adjourned at 1.35 a.m. (Friday).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, 13th April, 1894.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

REPORT.

Annual Report of the Commissioner of the North-west Mounted Police, for 1893.—(Mr. Ives.)

WAYS AND MEANS—THE TARIFF.

House again resolved itself into Committee of Ways and Means.

(In the Committee.)

On resolution (page 247) ; see also amended resolutions (page 1322).

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Are these verbatim et literatim what we had before, or are they changes ?

Mr. FOSTER. The idea was to consolidate all these different classes. There are some omissions which I will explain as I proceed, but nothing material.

Mr. FOSTER.

(f) The expression "proof" or "proof spirits," when applied to wines or wine spirits of any kind, means spirits of a strength equal to that of pure ethyl alcohol compounded with distilled water in such proportions that the resultant mixture shall at a temperature of sixty degrees Fahrenheit have a specific gravity of 0.9198 as compared with that of distilled water at the same temperature.

Mr. FOSTER. In the second line strike out, "Wine spirits of any kind," and make it read, "wine or spirits."

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Is that precisely the old formula ?

Mr. FOSTER. It is the old formula, except that the figures are a little changed to bring it up to the most exact definition. The Deputy Minister of Trade and Commerce has made a thorough study of the subject.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Is the formula used a copy of the United States formula ?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, it is almost the same, except as regards the last figures.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Does the hon. gentleman mean to say that the scientific authorities have not yet ascertained what the standard should be ?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, it is practically the same.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Do I understand the scientific men submit this as the exact scientific result ?

Mr. FOSTER. As the nearest possible, for practical use.

Mr. LAURIER. Would it not be preferable to have the same standard as the United States, as the difference is so small ?

Mr. FOSTER. I do not think it makes any difference. I have taken the recommendation of the Deputy Minister with respect to this matter, and he is an expert.

Mr. CASEY. Would it not be more simple if, instead of adopting this process of testing for proof and then increasing or reducing the quantity for duty according to the figures, to exact at once the duty on the alcohol contained in the liquor. This could be done by using Sykes's hydrometer, and taxing the liquor according to the quantity of spirit contained in the liquor ? This could be done according to a graduated scale, an increase being made for every 1 per cent or 5 per cent. Has the Finance Minister considered this point ?

Mr. FOSTER. I do not know any better way than that proposed. There must be a standard, and the liquor must be taxed according to the strength of proof, and this is the definition of that standard. This system is adopted by the excise departments of all countries.

Mr. CASEY. Sykes's hydrometer is to be used for ascertaining whether the liquor is of proof. Let the tax be so much for liquor of proof standard; when this has been ascertained a judgment has to be arrived at as to how much it is below or above the standard adopted before the duty can be determined. My proposition is that instead of having an artificial standard for proof, and ascertaining how much the liquor is below or above proof, you should begin with Sykes's hydrometer and ascertain exactly the percentage of alcohol in the liquor, and tax it according to that percentage of strength, without reference to the standard of proof. Let the tax be so much per gallon for liquor of a certain strength and an increased amount as the strength advances, 1, 2, or 5 per cent. This, I submit, would be a better way of ascertaining in a direct manner the taxable percentage of alcohol in the liquor, namely, beginning with the hydrometer and imposing a tax in proportion to the quantity of alcohol.

Mr. FOSTER. That is exactly what is done. The subsection must be read in connection with section 12; one gives a definition of proof, and after that the liquor is graded up or down, according to Sykes's hydrometer.

Mr. CASEY. I submit, however, that the system proposed is a roundabout way of doing the work. Instead of reducing the number of gallons up or down to a proof standard and fixing an estimated number of gallons to be taxed according to the percentage of alcohol, the department should begin with the hydrometer at the lowest percentage, and tax the actual number of gallons according to each percentage ascertained.

Mr. FOSTER. The trouble is to find out the percentage of alcohol.

Mr. CASEY. That would be ascertained, as now, by the hydrometer.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The Minister has told us how this compared with the American standard. Does he know how it compares with the English standard? What is the present English standard for proof?

Mr. FOSTER. I think it is the same but I am not certain.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Perhaps the Controller of Inland Revenue would know.

Mr. WOOD. My impression is that it is the same, but I will inquire.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It is obvious that there would be a great convenience for many reasons in having either the English standard or the American standard. We import a good deal from England, not much, I think, from the United States, and if there is any material difference I would suggest that the English standard should be employed. I have been informed by some gentlemen in the trade that that would be in their opinion a very desirable thing and it seems a reasonable proposition, especially as the Minister knows that almost all the brandy, whisky and gin we import, substantially comes from England.

Mr. FOSTER. How should I know that?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. You have lately been making such proficiency in the study of these matters in connection with the French Treaty and other subjects, that I presume, as other hon. gentlemen have done, you have acquired a great deal of new light on these particular questions.

Mr. FOSTER. I will try and obtain the information.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Does this make any difference of any moment in the amount of tax which would be levied?

Mr. FOSTER. No, it does not, as I am informed; it is practically the same.

(g) The expression "gauge," when applied to metal sheets or plates or to wire, means the thickness as determined by Stubbs's Standard Gauge.

Mr. CHARLTON. How do you determine the thickness of sheets, and so forth? Are there any other gauges besides Stubbs's?

Mr. FOSTER. There are, but this is the English standard and the one we have always used.

(i) The expression "sheet," when applied to metals, means a plate or sheet more than three-sixteenths of an inch in thickness.

Mr. CHARLTON. Upon what basis is the distinction made between plates and sheets?

Mr. FOSTER. It is an arbitrary distinction the same as has been used always.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) This first section repeals a large number of statutes, including chapter 33, respecting the duties of Customs. In that statute there are contained certain provisions with respect to the importation of fish and other products of the fisheries. There is a proviso in section 3 of that Act regulating the imports of fish and fish products in Newfoundland and the United States, to the effect that a proclamation of the Governor in Council may, under certain conditions, be issued with reference to reciprocity in these articles with the United States.

Mr. FOSTER. All that is necessary with reference to that, remains in the statute. It is exactly the same as before. That section is word for word re-enacted under section 3.

2. That the expressions mentioned in section two of "The Customs Act," as amended by section two of "The Customs Amendment Act, 1888," whenever they occur herein, or in any Act relating to the Customs, unless the context otherwise requires, have the meaning assigned to them respectively by the said sections two; and any power conferred upon the Governor in Council by "The Customs Act" to transfer dutiable goods to the list of goods which may be imported free of duty, is not hereby abrogated or impaired.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I would recommend to the Government to re-enact these statutes in full. It is a clumsy way of making regulations to refer men back to the Revised Statutes, and for the general convenience of the trade and for our own convenience I think that these should be extended and put in here.

Mr. FOSTER. I had that thought at first, but, when I came to look into it, I found that there were two Acts which are complete in themselves, and this simply draws attention to the second section of the Customs Act of 1888.

Mr. CHARLTON. We ought to know what these powers of the Governor in Council are.

Mr. FOSTER. They are the same as before.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) It is the latter part of the section to which my hon. friend refers:

And any power conferred upon the Governor in Council by the Customs Act to transfer dutiable goods to the list of goods which may be imported free of duty, is not hereby abrogated or impaired.

Mr. FOSTER. That does not change any of the existing powers.

Mr. CHARLTON. But the question is, how great were those powers. It seems to me, from the application that has been made of them in the past, that the powers of the Governor in Council in this respect are unlimited. I think we had better have them defined.

Mr. FOSTER. Section 245 of the Customs Act gives the powers of the Governor General in Council, which are very extensive, covering a great many subjects. I find the following, in subsection "L":—

For transferring to the list of goods which may be imported into Canada free of duty, any or all articles (whether natural products or products of manufactures) used as materials in Canadian manufactures; and any such materials transferred to the free list by such Order in Council, shall be free of duty of customs for the time therein appointed for that purpose.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I think that is a power that ought not to exist. This House has the control of the taxation, and this House ought to determine, after very careful consideration, what the taxation shall be. If the Government find that a tax is mischievous or oppressive, then it can submit the matter to Parliament. The business of the Government is to administer; what they are to administer it is for this House to determine. To say that a Government shall take into consideration whether a particular article is a raw material of some manufacturing enterprise or not, is, it seems to me, an indefensible proposition. Take the one case that we have frequently considered—the case of iron. That is a raw material in almost every manufacture. The Government do not propose to put that on the free list; and if they will not do so in that particular case, why should they do so in any other case? Why should they be judges in any other matter, any more than in that one? Now, Sir, this is a question upon which this House is pronouncing judgment. This House has, at the instance of the Ministers, refused, over and over again, to put iron on the free list, simply because it is the raw material of a great many manufactures. Why should we give to the Government the power of doing that with regard to any other manufactured product, which may be the raw material of some other manufacture? It seems to me that this is a power no Government ought to possess. It is handing over to the Administration of the day the legislative power of Parliament.

Mr. CHARLTON. In the exercise of this power, I find that the Government have made very extensive use of it. I find that in 1885 there was an Order in Council putting crucible steel on the free list; also one putting on the free list lastings and mohair cloth. There was in 1886 one putting hatters' bands, bindings, tips and sides and linings on the free list; another putting on the free list steel strip for buckthorns and plain strip fencing; another putting on the free list wire rope; another putting on the free list twisted brass and copper wire; another putting on the free list yarn spun from the hair of alpaca or angora goats; another, in November, 1888, putting on the free list, felloes of hickory wood; another in December, 1888, putting on the free list, homo spring steel wire, smaller than No. 9, and not smaller than No. 15, for the use of manufacturers of mattresses. In July, 1887, an Order in Council was passed putting sweat leathers on the free list; another in the same year putting on the free list, square reeds, raw-hide centres, textile leather or rubber heads, thumbs and tips, and steel, iron or nickel caps or whip ends; another, in November of the same year, putting on the free list copper rollers for use in calico printing; another, in 1888, putting on the free list steel of No. 12 gauge, and to No. 30 gauge; another, in the same year, putting on the free list yarns of wool and worsted, for the use of manufacturers; another, in the same year, putting on the free list jute yarn, cotton yarn finer than No. 40, and wire of iron or steel, galvanized or tinned, or coppered, or not, of No. 16 gauge, or smaller. These are very extensive changes, which were made without consulting Parliament, and with Parliament left in entire ignorance of them; and, looking at the extensive use which the Governor in Council has made of this power—more extensive, I believe, than Parliament intended or should warrant—it seems to me that the Government have usurped the functions of Parliament to a large extent. Deputations come down here asking for very important changes, and here are fifteen Orders in Council under which the Government granted privileges and concessions that ought to have been granted only by Parliament, and after full discussion. I think, therefore, this is a power that we should abridge, if not remove entirely. We have had a little too much of Government by Orders in Councils in this country. The intention of Parliament in placing this power in the hands of the Government may have been good; but it is so liable to abuse and has been abused to such an extent that I think it should be taken from the Government.

Mr. CASEY. I must endorse in the strongest way the position taken by my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills). I think this is a power that should not be delegated, that cannot be constitutionally delegated by Parliament to any committee of the House, whether that committee be called Her Majesty's Privy Council or not. The power is nominally a power to relieve certain things from taxation; the exercise of that power, of course, causes a loss to the revenue; and that revenue must be made up in some other way. This power, nominally to relieve from taxation, is really a power to tax the people, or to transfer the incidence of taxation from certain classes of the people to certain other classes. The point made by my hon. friend from North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) is also extremely good—that there is very much greater danger of abuse when this power is left in the hands of the Government than when that tariff is discussed in the House. We see enough of the caucusing and cabaling that goes on in the making of a tariff, when the tariff is discussed in the House, and we can easily imagine how much further that sort of thing would go when nobody has to be consulted in the Cabinet except the Finance Minister. The fact that one man's finished product is another man's raw material makes it impossible to disturb the existing system of tariff in any one particular, without disturbing the whole list of other manufactures, and affecting the interests of a great number of persons other than those who ask to have the changes made. The principle of putting raw material on the free list, as explained in this authority delegated by the House, simply leaves to the discretion of the Minister to decide how far a certain manufactured article ought to be regarded as a raw material or a finished product. Having that power in his hands, and with delegations from the larger combines and the principal manufacturers waiting upon him, it goes without saying that the weaker must go to the wall. The large manufacturer, who wants to import free the manufactured or half-manufactured article produced by some smaller manufacturers in the country, can get it put on the free list to the disturbance, or perhaps ruin, of the smaller manufacturers. The same remark applies in the case of those who have only raw products to sell—the farmers, miners and lumberers of Canada. Their interests must be made and always have been made under a protective tariff subordinate to the manufacturing interests, in the exercise of this power, as has been shown in the cases cited by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton). The protection given to these classes is illusory, if we allow tariff tinkering to go on in the Council Chamber. In the interests of these classes especially I urge that we should renounce our unconstitutional proceeding of past years, which has nothing but the precedent set by ourselves in its favour, and give to this House the sole power of amending the tariff.

Mr. GIBSON. I wish to say a few words with reference to an importation of necessary plates for the construction and repairs of vessels. One ship-builder in the town of Port Dalhousie wrote me to say that he was obliged to pay a higher rate of duty for the plates he imported for the construction and repairs of vessels, which he had to make during the winter, than was charged those engaged in the same business in the city of Hamilton. He wrote the Government on several occasions, and I laid the matter before the Controller of Customs shortly before Christmas. He promised to answer the question, but I am sorry to say, although I have asked once or twice for a reply he has not yet given it. And I am also aware that the wholesale merchants in Hamilton were enabled to get steel plates cheaper, even to sell them again, than the ship-builders in the town of Port Dalhousie. This is a matter of importance. The Government should not take advantage of their opportunities to deal unfairly with those politically opposed to them, and in another way with their friends. The House should not allow this power to be retained by the Government. I regret having to bring up this matter, but in all fairness to the gentleman who made the complaint, the Controller should have answered this complaint some months ago. This is just one of the inequalities our friends suffer at the hands of the Government. I understand also that wire for the purpose of manufacturing is to be admitted free. Certain smaller manufacturers, who are obliged to buy the wire from the wholesale dealer, will have to pay the duty. It simply puts the larger manufacturer in a position to crowd out the smaller ones.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not understand what the hon. gentleman has been driving at. I did not catch the first part of his address. The impression that I have got from what I heard is this, that there were two parties engaged in importing some kind of material, one of whom got it in at a certain rate and the other got it at a lesser rate, and the second party got it in at the lesser rate because he was favoured by the Government. If that is what the hon. gentleman meant to say, I think he ought to be a little more explicit and give more reasons. That is a power the Government has not got. The Government has no power to grade duties.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) They have the power of rebate.

Mr. FOSTER. They have the power either of putting a thing on the free list or letting the party pay the duty at which Parliament says it will come in, and this is in pursuance of the authority given us. But what the hon. gentleman said is that there were two importers, one of whom got his material at a certain rate and the other got it at a lesser rate, and he complains of the action of the Government with reference to the second party. I would ask the hon. gentleman to state explicitly his grievance.

Mr. GIBSON. I repeat what I said before, for the benefit of the Minister of Finance. The complaint made to me was made by Muir Bros., of Port Dalhousie, and it was to the effect that on the necessary plates which they imported for the construction and repairs of vessels in the town of Port Dalhousie, they were charged a higher rate of duty than the ship-builders in the city of Hamilton.

Mr. FOSTER. Both were charged duties.

Mr. GIBSON. Yes; but the duties for the same material were different in Hamilton to those in Port Dalhousie. Then, in addition to that, I understand that there is a firm in Hamilton—I do not think it is necessary for me to give the name in the House, but I will give it to the Minister if he wishes privately—which was allowed to import plates for the same purpose at a lesser rate than the firm in Port Dalhousie, and the latter wrote to me in the month of December stating their grievance on this point. I came down to Ottawa—I had business here of a private nature—and I called upon the Government. Mr. Bowell had not returned from the west, but I wrote to him when I got home. He arrived a day or two after I left Ottawa, and he referred the matter to the Controller of Customs. From that day to this, I have never had any reply about the complaint of Muir Bros. I do not wish to place the Government in an unfair position before the country, but am stating the facts as I received them. I have not the letter of Muir Bros., because I gave it to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, but I took the trouble, a week or two ago, to have an exact copy sent to me. I did not think the matter was coming up this afternoon or I would have had the letter here to read to the House, bearing out what I say.

Mr. FOSTER. Then, I have just this to say: that the hon. gentleman is talking about a thing which is not germane to the subject under discussion.

Mr. LAURIER. It may be.

Mr. FOSTER. No; the principle involved is whether the Government shall have the power, which the Act gives it now, to put certain articles for the use of manufacturers on the free list. But the trouble in the case my hon. friend has cited, if there is any trouble, is that there has been a different ruling at one port from that given at another. But he ought not to draw the Government into that. He ought not to blame the Government for that, unless he can show to the House that the Government favoured one person or establishment as against another. With three or four hundred ports, and appraisers and customs officers at each, it occasionally happens—indeed frequently happens—that different rulings are given upon the same article. And the Government has a Board of Appraisers through which they try to make uniform the different rulings. That is a different matter from saying that the Government is showing favour by giving a lower rate of duty to one than to another.

Mr. GIBSON. I want to point out this case to the hon. gentleman. Suppose there is some large undertaking in the way of ship-building, say, in the city of Hamilton. A gentleman furnishes plans and specifications and prepares a model for construction. The contract for building the vessel is awarded, let us say, to some friend of the Government. That friend of the Government comes down to Ottawa, and, through his influence with the Government, gets the material put upon the free list, a thing which the others who tendered could not have done, and which they did not count upon. I wish to point out that such a power ought not to be left in the hands of the Government.

Mr. EDGAR. I would like to ask the Minister, if it is intended that this clause we are considering in the new resolutions, shall cover subsection "M." as well as subsection "L," the former relating to the amount of drawbacks?

Mr. FOSTER. No; this refers to transferring dutiable goods to the free list.

Mr. EDGAR. From the way my hon. friend here describes his grievance, I think it is very likely not to be a case of revaluation, but a case of getting drawbacks under subsection "M" of the old Act, and I would like to know if that section is going to stand?

Mr. FOSTER. I think my hon. friend is wrong in imputing to the Government any such action with reference to drawbacks. If the Government should, upon the application of any one from any city, grant a drawback, they must grant the same drawback to all others under similar conditions.

Mr. EDGAR. If it is applied for.

Mr. FOSTER. Does the hon. gentleman mean to say that it has ever been refused? Do not let us have charges upon mere supposition. Is there any case where a drawback has been allowed to persons applying for it, and afterwards refused to others under similar conditions?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I understand that there is a broad distinction between these two. Subsection "L" provides:

For transferring to the list of goods which may be imported into Canada free of duty, any or all articles (whether natural products or products of manufactures) used as materials in Canadian manufactures; and any such materials transferred to the free list by such Order in Council shall be free of duty of customs for the time therein appointed for that purpose.

Now, I understand that is a general section and that the hon. gentleman could not, under proper construction of it, transfer to the free list certain goods when imported by A, while at the same time this same class of goods was left dutiable if imported by B. We will discuss whether the policy of allowing that section to remain is a wise one or not. But the section "M" to which my hon. friend refers, is worded differently, and it provides that the Government may grant:

A drawback of the whole or part of the duty upon paid on articles which have been used in Canadian manufactures, or for granting a specific sum in lieu of any such drawback.

Now, that, I take it, means that on application by the party, the Government may grant this to A, and yet not grant it to B—in fact, B may know nothing at all about it. I think, if the hon. Minister makes inquiry in the proper quarter, he will find that it has been done; at any rate, I have been so informed. A short time ago there was published in one of the leading papers of the Dominion a list of articles to which Orders in Council applied under subsection "L," and I regret that my hon. friend from North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), who referred to the list just now, did not give it completely. If he had read it completely, it would not be necessary for me to go through it now. I desire to call the attention of the House to this list, and to some remarks the Minister of Agriculture made upon this very power which the Governor in Council exercises, as well as to the effect of the exercise of that power. When we see what has been the result, we can judge whether it is proper to continue this power or not. Hon. gentlemen will see that they are now passing a most important clause, vesting in the Governor in Council power which I humbly believe ought to be retained and controlled absolutely by the Parliament of the Dominion. Hon. gentlemen well know that we on this side of the House believe that raw materials for manufacture should, as far as possible, be admitted duty free. We do not object to such extension of the free list in itself; what we are questioning now is the policy of Parliament delegating to a committee, whether the Privy Council or any other, a discretion which, many believe, should devolve upon and be exercised by Parliament itself and by Parliament alone. The hon. gentleman will see, by the book published by the Customs Department about a year ago, that a large number of Orders in Council were given under subsection "L"—relating to the placing of articles under the free list, and if my information is correct, they did not give the Orders in Council under subsection "M," which provides for the granting of drawbacks. The action under subsection "L" is general, but, if I construe the Act aright, the Governor in Council has power, under subsection "M," to grant drawbacks to A or to B, and I understand that they have exercised that power in a great many instances, and that the Orders in Council have not been published at all. Some, I happen to know from personal knowledge, but no doubt there are very many others of which I have no knowledge. Thus we cannot tell whether the Government have exercised their discretion under subsection "M" properly or not. No person can tell until the Orders in Council are brought down, and the special facts upon which the exercise of that discretion took place is made known to individual members. We give up our powers, which we should reserve to ourselves, to men who act in secret, and whether they act impartially or partially we do not know. It is stated that the action under this clause does not depend upon the merits of the case, but upon the persistence of the applicant and the political influence he can bring to bear. I do not know whether that is the case; but, if it is so, this is manifestly a very dangerous condition of affairs, and one to which the attention of Parliament ought to be invited at the earliest moment. I do not desire to take up the time of the House, but let me call attention to some special features of the list quoted by my hon. friend from North Norfolk. The list is given in the work published by the Customs Department. I will quote from the examination of that book made by the correspondent of the Toronto 'Globe' and published by him some months ago:

Crucible sheet steel, when imported by manufacturers of mower and reaper knives, free.

Mohair cloth, lastings or other manufactures of cloth, when imported by manufacturers of buttons for use in their factories, free.

Hatters' bands, bindings, tips, sides and linings, when imported by hat and cap manufacturers only for use in their factories, free.

Steel strip, when imported into Canada by manufacturers of buckthorn and plain strip fencing, free.

Brass cups for the use of manufacturers of brass and paper shells, free.

Yarn for the use of manufacturers of braid, free.

Fish skins and fish offal for the use of manufacturers of glue, free.

I wish to call the attention of the House to the fact that they do not admit these articles free when imported for the purpose of manufacture, but when imported for the purpose of a particular style and class of manufacture, and that these Orders in Council on their face appear to have been made at the instance and on the application of parties interested in a particular form of manufacture, and they are admitted free only when used for that particular class of manufacture.

Square reeds and raw-hide centres, textile leather or rubber heads and steel, iron or nickel caps for the use of whip manufacturers, free.

Copper rollers for calico printing, free.

Elastic rubber thread for the manufacture of elastic webbing, free.

Rolled iron tubes for the manufacture of bedsteads, free.

Second process molasses for use in the manufacture of blacking, free.

Hemp paper, primers and felt board for the manufacture of shells, cartridges and gun wads, free.

Felloes of hickory wood for the manufacture of carriage and cart wheels, free.

Gum chicle or sappato gum, when imported for the purpose of manufacture, free.

That is general—that is the first one that I have seen that is general.

Grease for the use of manufacturers of soap and oils, free.

Paper in the use of manufacture of cartridges, free.

Chlorate of potash imported for manufacturing purposes, only.

Platinum and black oxide of copper for use in the manufacture of chlorate, free.

Steel for tubular bow sockets when imported by manufacturers, free.

Steel for hammers, augers and auger bits, when imported by manufacturers for their use, free.

Alum cake used by manufacturers of paper, free.

Plant for the use of manufacturers of sulphuric acid, free.

Brass and copper wire for the use of manufacturers of boots and shoes, free.

Tagging metal used in the manufacture of corsets, free.

German silver for manufacturing purposes, free.

Jute cloth when used for manufacturing purposes, free.

Steel and iron used in the manufacture of chopping axes, scythes, &c., rebate.

That is the only one, I think, contained in the book where the Order in Council granting a rebate is given. Now, I am of the opinion—I may be incorrect—that the Government have not properly construed the power which Parliament placed in their hands. I do not think that the proper construction of subsection "L" gives the Government the right of discrimination to say, for instance, that an article imported for the manufacture of corsets, when imported for that special purpose, shall be free, but when imported for the purpose of manufacturing something else, shall pay duty. I submit as a proposition of law that Parliament delegated no such power to the Government, and that in exercising that power from time to time in favour of those who applied to them, or limiting the exercise of it to the applicant who may want it for a special purpose, they were not properly carrying out the general power which Parliament gave. Now, I submit this point to the House, that Parliament only went this far: they said, There may be certain articles required for manufacturing purposes in Canada, and we will delegate to the Government the right, when they are so required for any or all manufacturing purposes, to admit them free. But I do not think Parliament ever intended to give the Government power to discriminate, to exercise a whim or a caprice, fairly or unfairly, to say to the manufacturers of one class of goods: We will admit this free for your special purpose, but we will not admit the same article free for your neighbour's purpose, although he is engaged in manufacturing, too. Therefore, I challenge the legality of the Orders in Council so far as that point is concerned. Then I submit to the House, Is it a fair power to give to any Government or to any committee? Hon. gentlemen know that members of the Government are influenced by human passions and human feelings. It is said they have a desire to maintain themselves in power, and there is no better engine for maintaining themselves in power than an improper exercise of the powers which they contend is contained in that clause, and which I say is not contained in it to the extent of their contention. They can give and retake, take or withhold, just as they please. Is it possible that Parliament, sent here to determine what the tariff of the country should be, has said: We will not determine the tariff, we will not determine what it ought to be, but we will give to certain gentlemen sitting in secret conclave power to say to A: We will give this remission to you, but we will withhold it from B; to the west we will give it, to the east we will not give it? A large number of men who may have the ear of the Government will get it; other men who may not be on the inside track may not get it. Now, as regards section "M," I think it is open to a more serious objection, because, in the first place, for some reason or other, the Government have withheld the Orders in Council that they have made under section "M." There is no living being outside the Government who knows to what extent, or in whose favour, the power granted in section "M" has been exercised, who has got the benefit of the drawbacks under that, what classes of people, and to what extent. The Customs authorities do not give the information.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.)

Mr. FOSTER. Did you ever read it in the Auditor General's Report?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I have not seen it there. If the hon. gentleman says that all the Orders in Council giving drawbacks are there it will save me the necessity of putting a Notice on the Order Paper which I have prepared.

Mr. FOSTER. The payments and to whom.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) But I want the Orders in Council, which I think the hon. gentleman might have published along with the other Orders in Council. Now, when this matter came up in the Senate last year the Minister of Agriculture made a statement to show the extent to which that power had been exercised, and he said that between 1879 and 1883 the value of the goods admitted under Orders in Council for use in the manufactures of Canada was $8,240,000 a year, and from 1889 to 1892 it was $13,167,000. I mention these figures to show to the hon. gentleman what a very important matter we have under consideration just now. It is not a trivial matter at all. The Government are granting Orders in Council by the statement of the Minister of Agriculture—

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Will you be kind enough to read that again?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I will read the hon. gentleman's words as I have got them down here:

The value of the imports admitted free for use in the manufactures of Canada from 1879 to 1882, was $8,240,000 a year, and from 1889 to 1892, $13,167,000.

I am reading from information which I derive from a memorandum, or letter, sent by the local correspondent of the 'Globe' to his newspaper.

Mr. FOSTER. Was that admitted by Order in Council?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. Before this free list?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I understood it to be so. But let me read what the Minister said:

There has thus been a constantly growing amount of goods entering into our own manufacturing, brought in without duty. Again and again we have said to the manufacturers, we will enlarge the free list for the articles you need, so that you may be able to produce cheaper and cheaper and thus supply the consumer at the least possible cost.

I understand the hon. gentleman here refers to goods which we admitted under Orders in Council.

Mr. FOSTER. Oh, no.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) If I am wrong, I stand corrected. I have no other information; but I certainly understood the Minister of Agriculture to mean that the value of the goods which were imported under these Orders in Council was so much; perhaps I am wrong. But be that as it may, there is no doubt whatever from the Order in Council that it must be a large amount indeed, and I would invite the attention of the Minister to the several considerations which have been advanced as to whether it is desirable to continue this enormous power, and to vest in the Government for the time being a discretionary power which may be exercised to the public detriment.

Mr. WALLACE. With respect to the charge made by the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Gibson), that some letters written by him were not answered, I may say that I had a long correspondence with Muir Bros. themselves with respect to the case he brought up. It was not under an Order in Council, but an Act of Parliament, item 977: "Iron or steel beams, sheets, plates, angles and knees for iron or composite ships or vessels." I sent an officer there to fully investigate the matter, with the result that it was found Muir Bros. were not entitled to a free entry.

Mr. EDGAR. Are not those goods on the free list?

Mr. WALLACE. They were not entitled to free entry because the ships building or repairing were neither iron nor composite ships, and therefore these goods were not entitled to free entry under the Act of Parliament.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What kind of vessels were they?

Mr. WALLACE. Wooden vessels.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON I think the remarks of the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) call for further discussion, and I quite agree with him that the subject should be very carefully considered, but on two or three points he will find, on reconsideration of the subject himself, that he is mistaken in the view he has put forward. In the first place, with respect to the argument presented to the Minister of Agriculture, if I remember it rightly, as I recognize it from the quotations which the hon. gentleman read, the Minister was speaking, not of the value of goods imported under the Order in Council placing them on the free list, but he was referring to the fact that, taking those in connection with dutiable goods at former times, which had been put on the free list under the policy of the present Administration, taxation to that amount had been saved annually to the people of this country, but that goods to any such amount imported under the power conferred in subsection "L" would be an entirely different matter.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Under subsection "M."

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Under subsections "M" and "L." I would be perfectly within the mark in saying that not one-tenth would be the value of all the goods imported and drawbacks given under those sections, nor one-twentieth, as my colleague mentions. I think the first point to be settled is, whether it is desirable, as a matter of principle, that these powers should exist or not. I think that has been well established. The subject has been fully discussed in this House from time to time with the view of having, as new inventions arise and new industries are established, some means of applying the free list principle to articles which enter into the manufacture of others. In fact, the admitted policy of both sides of the House time and again has been to make a liberal free list so far as regards what can be called raw material, and that raw material can only be regulated from time to time as new appliances are invented and new machinery comes into play, making the component parts of which other manufactures consist. In order to show that the question has been well recognized in times past, let me call attention to some clauses of the Act of 1877, because this is not a provision merely dating from the date of the Revised Statutes, but dates at all events as far back as that year, and I have not had opportunity of observing how much further back the same provision has existed. Section 11 of the Customs Act of 1877 provides :

For transferring to the list of goods which may be imported into Canada free of duty, any or all articles (whether natural products or products of manufactures) used as materials in Canadian manufactures; and for granting a drawback of the whole or part of the duty paid on such articles which may have been used in Canadian manufactures; and any such materials transferred to the free list by such Order in Council shall be free of duty of customs from the time therein appointed for that purpose.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). That is very different from the concluding part of section "L."

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. No, I do not observe the difference. What is the difference?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman transferred the goods from the free list to the dutiable list.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. For the time.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Under that section, the Government could place certain articles on the free list, and after importations had been made, they could restore the duty, so that the rule that applied to one importer would not apply to another.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The hon. gentleman now is claiming that our present Act is more limited.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). No, it gives greater power.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Inasmuch as the Governor in Council may limit the time for which those articles should be on the free list. I can assure the hon. gentleman of this, that in no case has any change been made in that regard, and I think he will find that during the last ten years not a limitation has been made, and in no case had an article been restored to the list of dutiable goods except by Act of Parliament. The distinction drawn by the hon. gentleman between the Act of 1877 and the present Act has not the least materiality. The hon. gentleman will see that I was perfectly correct in stating, and that was the reason I referred to the Act of 1877, that the principle of having such power vested in the Governor in Council, was to give facilities for the decision of matters of that kind, and such principle has always been recognized in this Parliament. That principle has been recognized in every other country, I think, and certainly it is very much more liberally exercised in the United States than in this country. Let me call attention to the Act of 1888, in the Consolidated Statutes of that year. In that consolidation sections "L" and "M" read :

(L) For transferring to the list of goods which may be imported into Canada free of duty, any or all articles (whether natural products or products of manufactures) used as materials in Canadian manufactures; and any such materials transferred to the free list by such Order in Council shall be free of duty of customs for the time therein appointed for that purpose.

(M) For granting a drawback of the whole or part of the duty paid on articles which have been used in Canadian manufactures, or for granting of a certain specific sum in lieu of any such drawback.

As regards the complaint that this is done in secret, I can assure the hon. gentleman that every Order in Council, under section "L," which places dutiable articles on the free list, is published in the 'Canada Gazette.'

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I stated that all Orders in Council were collected and published by the Customs Department under section "L." But the reference I made was to Orders in Council under section "M."

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. As regards section "L," we both agree that publicity is always given to these Orders in Council, and the objection of the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Gibson), that this power could be exercised so that one manufacturer could be given advantage over another, has no foundation, because the orders are published in the 'Canada Gazette.' Let me refer to the Orders in Council under subsection "M." There is a general Order in Council on this subject, and that is an Order which makes regulations that must be conformed to by persons who desire those drawbacks. That has been published. By its regulations are made as to the way manufacturers may get a drawback on goods which have entered into the manufacture of other articles; that is done departmentally, without Order in Council.

Mr. CASEY. How does the hon. gentleman mean that it is done departmentally?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. That it is done by the Department of Customs.

Mr. CASEY. Does the hon. gentleman mean to say that the department has power to determine whether a manufacturer shall receive a rebate or not?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Every application is considered. The Order in Council establishes the provisions which have to be observed in order to entitle a manufacturer to a rebate, and to establish the proportion of the rebate which he shall receive, if a rebate of the whole amount is not to be allowed. Then the department deals with every individual case. Just as with respect to articles re-exported after being imported, Orders in Council have laid down regulations that have to be conformed to by applicants, but every individual case is dealt with, not by Order in Council, but is treated departmentally, or by the Treasury Board. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) says that is wrong and that injury is done to the trade, and the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) has presented the view that we have exceeded our powers under subsection "L" in deciding that the importation free of those goods shall be restricted to certain uses in the country. I think that both views are subject to correction if the hon. members will refer to the main sections of which those are subsections. By looking at it, it is found to be a section giving the Governor General in Council power to make regulations as to all these subjects. Hon. gentlemen will see that to carry out the principle which is embodied in these two sections, it is obviously necessary to restrict the use which shall be made of these articles so transferred to the free list. The principle is this: that those enter into the manufacture of other articles more finished, or more highly finished, or adapted to some different purpose from that which they were capable of when introduced in the raw state. Clearly, it must be confined to the purpose of the manufacture. If we do not restrict in some way articles which may be put on the free list, they may never be used in Canadian manufactures at all; they may be used in the condition in which they are imported.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Does the hon. gentleman contend that an article of iron which may be used in the manufacture of agricultural implements, could be by Order in Council admitted free of duty, and that the same article, when used in the manufacture of wagons would not be entitled to a similar privilege?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Oh, no; what I am arguing is this: that the article of iron or steel intended to be imported under the provisions of this subsection for use in an agricultural implement, unless the importation is limited to its use in that implement—

Mr. CASEY. In a particular kind of implement?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Any kind of implement, if the Order in Council says so, unless the importation is limited to its use in that implement, may be converted into use in a wagon or may be used for some other purpose.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). That is not what it says.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. To do anything else would be to go against what it says, because used as materials in Canadian manufactures; it is not "used for that purpose."

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). It says, "articles used as materials in Canadian manufactures;" it is not "used for that purpose."

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. You must put them on the free list before they can be imported, and you must put them on the free list with some restriction as to their being used in Canadian manufactures, or the purpose of the section will be defeated entirely.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Not at all.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. You establish a protection as regards iron and steel. You may authorize the introduction into the country, free of duty, any given article made of steel, but, if you do not restrict the use of that article, it might be used for any other purpose for which steel is imported, and the purpose of the section be defeated. You take any one example of an article so put on the free list for the purpose of being used in Canadian manufacture, you will find that, if put on the free list indiscriminately, it might be used for any other purpose and never go into Canadian manufacture at all; it may be used in the very form it comes into the country, and still it comes under the free list. I contend that it is not only contrary to the spirit, and contrary to the words of the subsection, but the whole matter is free from doubt, when we look at the main section and see that the duty of the Governor in Council is to make regulations on this subject. Obviously, we must make the regulations so clear that there shall be no opportunity of the articles being imported not for use in Canadian manufactures, but for use in the state in which it comes into the country.

Mr. CASEY. In what form is the decision of the department in regard to rebates put in force? Is it by departmental order?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I think it is; but the returns are given every year in the Auditor General's Report of what rebates are made, and the hon. gentleman will see that the power has been very sparingly used as regards drawbacks. I think that one of the best vindications of the propriety of having this policy on the statute-book is: that, in the course of so many years that it has been there, there has been no complaint of an injustice as between one applicant and the other.

Mr. CASEY. That has been secret.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It has not been secret. It has been published in the blue-books and distributed to every member of this House.

Mr. CASEY. I am speaking of the rebates and drawbacks.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. These are published every year in the accounts of the country. They are payments made at the Treasury, are public, and are subject to audit every year.

Mr. CASEY. That is, simply the names and the amounts. The articles on which the rebates are given are secret.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. What difference does that make?

Mr. CASEY. We want to know on what articles the rebate is given.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. If the hon. gentleman asks for information, he will get it. It can be inquired into before the Public Accounts Committee.

Mr. LAURIER. If I understand the right hon. gentleman, the Orders in Council are not public.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The hon. gentleman did not hear me when I said that there was no Order in Council on the subject, except the one establishing the regulation on which these rebates are paid.

Mr. LAURIER. I think there are Orders in Council granting rebates. I think I can show to the hon. gentleman an Order in Council which reads this way:

Certified extract of a report of a Committee of the Honourable the Privy Council, approved by His Excellency the Governor General in Council, on the 13th April, 1893.

Customs:

That the terms of the Order in Council of the 28th June, 1886, granting drawback to the Weland Vale Manufacturing Company, of St. Catharines, Ontario, at rates as prescribed therein, upon iron and steel used in the manufacture of axes and tools exported by them be repealed, and that the rates as follows be substituted therefor. * * * * *

This recommendation is made in view of the increased duty upon iron and steel ($13 per ton of 2,000 lbs.) which is being collected under the existing tariff, and which is largely in excess of the duty (17½ per cent) exacted under the tariff in force when the original Order in Council was framed and approved of. * * * * *

This Order in Council grants a rebate for a special purpose. Has it been published?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Possibly there may be and there may not be, but I am speaking of the general rule which is this: that under this section we have established a series of regulations as to the restrictions on drawbacks, and the mode in which they are to be given and the proof which is to be given, and the proportion which is to be repaid.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). That seems to be a special Order in Council.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It would seem so on the face of it, although it is rash to speak of anything one sees for the first time. This, however, simply establishes that right, in view of the changed conditions as to iron and steel for that purpose.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). And for one firm only.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. For one firm only. Instead, therefore, of this being dealt with under the general Order in Council, it is dealt with under a special order. There may be other such cases. Any Order in Council dealing with any similar case will be produced when asked for. But is the argument this: That a power to act under Order in Council ought not to be granted lest it might be abused? Surely, before the power is taken away, evidence should be presented to show that it has been abused. Granted, that it is exercised in secret—I am assuming that in the case the hon. gentleman puts in my hands. Surely, if the hon. gentlemen have not asked for the Order in Council and have not shown that any case of abuse exists, then there is no case made out as regards any abuse of the power. The general Order in Council on the subject is open to the public, so that every manufacturer knows under what regulation he can get a rebate.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Would that regulation not be unfair to every other establishment engaged in the same business?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I do not know that it is.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Would not every other be paying the ordinary duty imposed by the statute, while those to whom the Order in Council refers would be getting in their material free of duty? That is the expressed provision.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I think the hon. gentleman will see, when he reads it, that it is not. Every case that comes forward is the case of an individual applicant. The cases come one by one; no two men apply together.

Mr. CASEY. That is just the trouble.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Every man who has a demand to make brings his own demand; in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred, this is dealt with by an Order in Council, and these Orders in Council are not published. Every man looks after his own rights. But I will show why this is a special case. It is not a case simply of a rebate under subsection "M" of duties paid on articles which enter into manufactures, but a case setting forth what rebate should be allowed in view of the fact that the finished article has been exported from the country. The regulations made on that subject were made by Order in Council of the 28th of June, 1886; and it was claimed, as regards this particular applicant, that we had not fixed a fair price, because the price of iron and steel had been affected by the legislation of Parliament. For that reason, an Order in Council appeared to be necessary.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Would not that be a reason for adopting a general Order in Council? You do not undertake to apply a particular rule to the case of each individual?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. No doubt; but it only happened that there was one application to deal with at the time.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Admitting that, would not that be a reason why the Government should adopt a general rule or not touch the matter?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Very likely. Granted that there are a hundred Orders in Councils that might be improved; but show us a case in which there is an abuse.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I submit that that would be an abuse—if you adopt a rule applicable to one individual, or firm, or company, and to nobody else, and putting them in a more favourable position for the exportation of their product than you put any others.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. No other applied.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). But surely that is not a reason for legislating specially in the interest of this one. The hon. gentleman is exercising the power that has been conferred on the Government by Parliament. How has that power been exercised? Has it been exercised in accordance with the policy of legislation? Not at all. This is not a general declaration of a rule applicable to everybody. It is an order making a rule applicable to particular parties, whom it puts in a different position from any other class of the community, and in a more advantageous position. Now, I do not think that the section bears the construction which the right hon. gentleman puts upon it. Look at the very first words of the section:

The Governor in Council may, from time to time, and in the manner hereinafter provided, in addition to the other purposes and matters in this Act mentioned, make regulations for or relating to the following purposes and matters.

Now, what are those regulations to be? Every one of these subsections gives a power to adopt a general regulation. There is no power granted to the Government by this statute to say that John Smith or Thomas Brown shall have special regulations made in his behalf. If you are to exercise a power at all, it is to be exercised generally. There is no rule of legal construction better established than that. Let me take a case with which the hon. gentleman must be familiar, because it was brought before the courts at his instance: The case in which the city of Toronto undertook to impose special water rates on the Government—higher rates than those imposed upon other parties. What did the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council hold in that case? That the council, while it had the power to make the water rates higher or lower, could not make a different rate for the Dominion Government from the rate it made for any other person in the city of Toronto. While the Government may make a general rule or regulation, they have no power under any provision of this section to make a special rule or regulation.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I grant that.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Under subsection "L," the Government have power to make regulations for the purpose of transferring to the list of goods which may be imported into Canada free of duty. To transfer what?

Any or all articles used as materials in Canadian manufactures.

"Any or all articles" does not mean so much of any article. If the Government choose to think that the article of piping requires to be put on the free list, they can put it there. But they cannot put it there for the purpose of being used by A, B or C, or in the factory of X, Y or Z. If they make it free at all, it must be made free generally. It must be generally transferred from the tax list to the free list. Why, look at the wording of the section:

For transferring to the list of goods, which may be imported into Canada free of duty, any or all articles.

Steel is an article and iron is an article;

but steel for a particular purpose is not an article within the meaning of this subsection, and that being so, it is clear that the Government have to come to Parliament to have articles imported for a specific purpose put upon the free list, for they have not the power of putting a particular article used for a specific purpose on the free list. They must put the article on that list for all purposes, or leave it where Parliament left it.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Will the hon. gentleman let me give him an illustration? Suppose we desire to admit free of duty silk for the manufacture of umbrellas, would the hon. gentleman say that we are bound to put silk on the free list, irrespective of what it is used for?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I think so, under this section:

Used as materials in Canadian manufactures, and any such materials transferred to the free list by such Order in Council, shall be free of duty of customs for the time therein appointed for that purpose.

Now, I hold that the Government ought not to possess such power.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I would like to make an explanation. I said that that power had not been exercised in the sense of putting a thing on the free list and off again. The only way in which that power has been exercised is by saying, as we have done in many Orders in Council, that they should remain on the free list until the next meeting of Parliament.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Let me give an instance. You have under the Customs Act, a heavy duty on steel rails, and on various materials imported by the railway companies. Have those duties always been collected to the full amount?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Always where we thought, as a matter of law, the duties applied to the article.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I understood, in some instances, the Government admitted those articles with a remission of duty or free of duty.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Only in some cases where we thought that they were exempt under the law in view of the charter and other circumstances.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I was about to point out that this is a power the Government ought not to possess. Even if you give the power to the Administration, in my opinion when that power is exercised it ought to be regarded as exhausted by its exercise. But when you give the power to put on the free list or take off the free list and restore to the dutiable, you give the widest power of legislation possible—just as wide as the power of Parliament itself.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell).

And the discretion is as large as the discretion possessed by Parliament.

Mr. CASEY. I understood the First Minister to say that articles were only put on the free list until the next session of Parliament.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I was correcting a remark I made before. I said that the power of limiting the time that articles should remain on the free list had only been exercised in that way. I said at first that we had not used that power, and I wished to correct that observation by saying that we had used it and had limited the operation of the Order in Council until Parliament should sit.

Mr. CASEY. In the Order of Council relating to the Welland Vale Company, which the Minister read, we find that one Order in Council had been passed to put articles on the free list for the special use of that company.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. That is under subsection "M," relating to the drawback.

Mr. CASEY. In that case a drawback was granted and then withdrawn, or the terms were changed by a subsequent Order in Council. So that there, with regard to rebates, we have the Government legislating and imposing taxation under subsection "M." They seem also to have exercised the power of first putting articles on the free list and then replacing them on the duty list at the former rate of taxation.

Mr. FOSTER. No.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I will explain what the position of that Order in Council is, as I understand it. A particular manufacturer applied to the Treasury for payment of a drawback, to which he conceived he was entitled, under subsection "M," and the original Order in Council bearing on that subject, established the regulations under which the drawback might be paid. They came in afterwards, and said that they were aggrieved as regards the amount which had been repaid as drawback, because the values which had been taken as the standard of duty were not correct values, and that Order in Council was passed to correct and adjust that claim.

Mr. LAURIER. It was not correct.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It was to correct an error.

Mr. CASEY. A clerical error.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. No; their contention was that we were wrong in computing values, and the Order in Council was passed with the view of correcting that. The ground of their pretension or grievance was that the new duty on iron affected the prices contained therein. Let me say at once that that Order in Council was not passed under powers given in subsection "M."

The powers given under that subsection had been applied to their case. The drawback had been offered them under the Order in Council passed under subsection "M." They came in and said that was not a fair amount. Their contention might have been well or ill-founded, but the Order we are discussing now was dealing with a claim of theirs not passed under subsection "M" at all.

Mr. CASEY. The hon. gentleman says that the application in all these cases of rebate was individual. It seems to me very unsound in principle and utterly unconstitutional to allow the Cabinet—even as a whole—to deal with individual cases of this kind. It gives them the power to favour one party at the expense of another. The Welland Vale Company asked for a rebate and got it, although there seems to have been some difficulty about the details afterwards. At all events, they got relief of some kind. We are not told whether any other company applied for a similar rebate or not, or whether any company knew that the Welland Vale Company had got the rebate. In fact, we are aware that no other company had any means of knowing that the Welland Vale Company got a rebate, until this Order in Council was brought down to Parliament. There was no notice given at the time that the rebate would be granted. The whole transaction was secret until this Order in Council was laid before Parliament, months later. Supposing it were known that this company had got a rebate, and supposing half a dozen other companies had made similar application. The Government were not compelled, as I understand the hon. gentleman, by anything in the Act or Order in Council regulating the granting of a rebate, to give it to the other applicants. They could say this man had a good case, and the other had a bad case, and decide according to their personal views on the subject—or rather the Cabinet do not decide on it at all, since the Minister has told us that it is left to the Department of Customs—meaning, of course, the Minister and the other half Minister who now runs that department. They have it in their power to decide, in each individual case, whether a rebate will be granted or not, and whether a case has been made out or not. That, Sir, opens a wider door to all sorts of irregularities, and—I may put it frankly—for corruption and favouritism, than any other enactment in our statutes. There is no use in saying that until we establish an actual abuse we should not complain of the granting of this power. Anything that puts it in the power of Ministers to create an abuse should be wiped off the statute-book at once. Ministers are only men, Ministers have been found—I am not alluding to the present Ministers or to any Ministers in particular; I put it in the most general terms—doing things that were corrupt; doing things so corrupt that they have had to leave the Government of which they formed a part. Ministers have been found taking money from contractors and using it for election purposes. Are not the same temptations likely to meet them when dealing with individual manufacturers asking for favours? When the Welland Vale Company came before the Ministers, they were backed by political influence, cash and such arguments as they could bring besides. It was not to be expected that the Government should give an absolutely impartial decision in that matter. Persistence itself would count for something and would be apt to win the day under ordinary circumstances. As to the use or abuse of the power of putting things on the free list, the hon. gentleman asks if the Government can put silk for some particular manufacture on the free list without making it free for others. I say undoubtedly, that, under the terms of the clause, that is not the power he has. He has the power to put an article on the free list if imported to be used as a raw material of manufacture. But he has no power to say that a certain article shall only be imported free for use as a raw material in a certain manufacture. The hon. gentleman has mentioned silks. Let us go to the hardware list and take the instance of bolts and screws. These are the raw materials of nearly every manufacturer of agricultural implements. They are used besides in many other trades (such, for instance, as house-building) which are as much manufactures and as much a means of producing wealth as the manufacture of agricultural implements. Now, under the clause, the Minister has the power to say that all bolts and screws shall come into Canada free, but I contend that he has not the power to say that bolts and screws for use in the manufacture of threshing machines and agricultural implements shall come in free, and that if imported for us in other manufactures they shall be taxed. It is bad enough that the Government should have the power of changing our system of taxation even in a general way. But it is simply outrageous and beyond the intention of Parliament that they should have power to declare that an article imported for the use of one manufacture shall be free, while, if imported for the use of some other manufacture, it shall be taxed. This discussion has come upon many members of the House as a surprise and I think it will surprise a good many in the country. I am a pretty old member of Parliament, but I confess I did not understand how completely this provision of the old Customs Act undermines the privileges of this House and all the people represented in this House. I hope the result of the discussion will be to remove that power utterly, because I cannot imagine any modification of it that would make it harmless. And at all events, the whole discussion and the misunderstandings that have arisen during it show the force of the original point urged by my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills), that all these subsections of the old Customs Act which it is proposed to leave standing, should have been copied into this Act and re-enacted so that the House might have had before it the points it was discussing. Even in this House there is difficulty in going back to the old Customs Act to learn what the law was. How much greater will that difficulty be for a customs officer handling the new tariff, and having to refer to revised statutes partly repealed?

Mr. LAURIER. Mr. Chairman, this case of the Welland Vale Manufacturing Company, which came up for discussion a moment ago, is, in my estimation, a perfect illustration of the danger which must arise from the latitude given to the Government in altering the tariff to suit their own convenience, even if their intentions are unimpeachable. The Prime Minister stated a moment ago, and this appears by the Order in Council which I have now in my hand, that in 1886 an Order in Council was passed providing generally for a rate of rebate to be given to manufacturers under certain circumstances. It was open to the Welland Vale Company and to all other manufacturers in 1886, or any subsequent year, to come to the Government and ask for the rebate provided by the Order in Council. Up to the time that the Order in Council was passed the duty on iron and steel was 17½ per cent. In 1887 the duties were altered, and, instead of an ad valorem duty, a specific duty of $13 per ton was imposed, which, if I am correctly informed, amounts to about 50 per cent. Even after that Act was passed increasing the duties, the Order in Council still remained, and it was open for manufacturers to take advantage of it, and come to the Government and ask for a rebate. Probably, though I do not know the fact, several manufacturers came and asked for this rebate. Now, what took place? In 1893, five years after the new duties came into force, one firm of manufacturers, the Welland Vale Manufacturing Company come before the Government and say: We ask for a rebate. The Government tell them: There is the rebate that you have under the Order in Council of 1886. They say: We ask for a larger rebate. The duties on iron have been increased from 17½ per cent to 50 per cent, and we ask for a rebate based upon these increased duties. And an Order in Council is passed, not for manufacturers generally, but for that one firm, the Welland Vale Company, giving them a special advantage because of this Act of 1887, which, when it was passed, was supposed to apply to all manufacturers equally. Now, Sir, suppose there had been two manufacturers at that time side by side, the Welland Vale Company, and another. One firm comes to the Government and says: You have passed a law which is really injurious to the trade; and we ask for a larger rebate. Under ordinary circumstances, they would be entitled only to the rebates which should apply to all. But a special Order in Council is made for that firm, and for no other. It is not a general order. Can there be a justification for such a case as that? Was I not justified a moment ago in saying that such an Order in Council gives the Government power to discriminate?

Mr. WALLACE. Not a bit.

Mr. LAURIER. If it does not, then the hon. gentleman has proceeded in a manner which is not at all defensible. If the Order in Council which was passed in 1886 was general and applied to all manufacturers, why was the order passed in 1893 applied to one firm only, and not to all firms? Why was there a departure made in 1893 from the principle of 1886? Now, will the hon. gentleman pretend that under the Order in Council of 1893 all manufacturers could have been treated in just the same way? Not at all. Under the Order in Council of 1886 all manufacturers had only to make their application to the department in order to get a rebate. Not so under the order of 1893, under which no one could come to the department except the Welland Vale firm to have a rebate.

Mr. FOSTER. Did any other company apply and not get it?

Mr. LAURIER. I am not aware of that, I hope not. But I say this as a complete answer to the hon. gentleman's observation, that in 1886 you made an Order in Council which entitled the manufacturers to come to the department and not come before the Government; in 1893 you made a different Order in Council under which, if a manufacturer wanted to have the same privilege, he could not go to the department but he had to come to the Government and have it discussed by the Council before he could get it. So that in 1886 you made a general law; in 1893 the Government made one special law for one firm only. I am informed that this Order in Council never was published anywhere, and no other manufacturer was aware of it, or could take advantage of it and be treated as other manufacturers were treated.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The hon. gentleman is arguing the propriety of continuing the power given to the Government, on a particular case which has no reference to that power at all, otherwise than as being simply an individual case which occurred under that power. Now, what is the power which has been all along upon our statute-book which we are discussing the propriety of continuing to-day? It is the power of making a regulation as to the terms on which a drawback shall be given. I agree perfectly with what was said by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), that that regulation must apply to all. Now, what are we discussing? We are discussing the state of facts which arose under an Order in Council applying to all manufacturers as to the rate of drawback to which they should be entitled under the circumstances, namely, that they should prove the amount of duty which they paid before they could get back the drawback of 90 per cent. One day one manufacturing company came and stated: You have passed that Order in Council applying to everybody, you have addressed it to the Department of Customs for administration; but we have a grievance, and we ask that our claim be considered by the Governor in Council. Now, is it possible that an individual claim under these circumstances can be refused a hearing, or be refused redress, on the ground that every other manufacturer must be heard at the same time? Why, this class of cases constitutes the principal business of the Governor in Council every day they meet, namely, that under some statute, under some general Order in Council, somebody claims that he has not received the full amount of favour which he is entitled to.

Mr. LAURIER. Was this a special grievance?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It does appear to be a special grievance.

Mr. LAURIER. No, it was a general grievance.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It was a grievance stated by this company alone in relation to their goods, and when the hon. gentleman says that it was a general grievance, he is merely assuming that there may have been other cases which were not dealt with.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The grounds on which the Governor in Council granted the concession, were general grounds.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. But would apply generally to all persons manufacturing in the same line. Now, show us, or give us an opportunity to inquire, whether there was any other person on the same footing, and entitled to the same consideration as this company, whose complaint has been disregarded. But upon a mere suspicion that there may have been others, without an allegation that there were others, it is proposed that the power that existed all along shall not exist any more.

Mr. LAURIER. The hon. gentleman will see there is an immense difference. He will not contend that when complaint is made by any individual of a grievance which is not special to himself, but which applies to all others of the same class, the Government should have the right to make a law for himself alone. The law should be as universal as it was previously, and it should be published. If the Order in Council of 1893 had been made in the same terms as that of 1886, the case would be different. This shows the great danger there is in clothing the Governor in Council with the power of legislation, with doing what Parliament alone should do, the Government claiming to themselves a delegation of powers from Parliament which should be exercised by Parliament alone. It amounts to this, that the Government may alter the tariff from day to day and from year to year, if they choose, without any reference to the law as laid down by Parliament.

Mr. WALLACE. The leader of the Opposition says that the rule should be made universal and that it should be published. That is just what the Government has done. On the 25th July, 1888, they passed an Order in Council governing drawbacks on the exportation of imported goods, providing exactly what the leader of the Opposition says should be done. The section is as follows:—

Section 1. The manufacturer of any article wholly manufactured in this Dominion out of materials imported into it, and upon which any duty of customs has been paid, may, unless otherwise provided, upon the exportation of the said manufactured article, be entitled to a drawback equal to 90 per cent of the duties that shall have been paid upon such quantity of the raw or duty-paid material as shall have entered into and been consumed in the production of the manufactured article to be exported.

That was published to the world. Every manufacturer in Canada knows that. Then it provides still further certain safeguards for the Government:

Section 2. To entitle himself to the drawback, the manufacturer shall make due entry of the manufactured article for exportation, and deliver to the collector of the port where such entry is made, a statement showing the marks and numbers of the packages,—the designation of the contents of such package,—the quantity of the manufactured article,—the place where manufactured,—the quantity of the raw and duty-paid materials entering into the composition of the said manufactured articles.

Afterwards, when he exports the manufactured article and makes a claim for a drawback, he shall furnish the bills of lading, and the prices at which the goods have been exported. Every safeguard that the Government may require, is provided. Then when he does that he comes to the Government and asks them for a refund, as the law provides, of 90 per cent of the duties that he has actually paid. If the duty is increased on iron, he asks for the increase of his refund; and the Governor in Council passes that order saying, Yes, you have paid the increased duty, instead of $6 or $10 per ton on iron, as the case may be, you have paid $13 per ton on iron, or you have paid $12 on steel, or whatever the duty may be, and you get 90 per cent of the amount you have actually paid, returned to you. That is the general rule, and the special rule is the proof that he gives of the quantity of materials that he uses in the manufacture of his article. For instance, Massey-Harris send binders to Australia, and they come to the Government for a refund. They prove to the Government that they have paid duties to the amount of $3.30, say, on one binder. There are the whole particulars, every pound of iron, what it is used for, the description of the article, and the actual duty paid upon it. Further than that, the Government requires that it shall be proved that the articles are not produced in this country, and then they receive 90 per cent of a refund, or in that case, $2.97 on each article, because that is the amount of duty they have paid to the customs on the materials that are used in that one binder.

Mr. EDGAR. Not a special Order in Council?

Mr. WALLACE. The leader of the Opposition has read the Order in Council.

Mr. EDGAR. The hon. gentleman is dealing altogether with the Massey-Harris Company. Did that firm obtain rebates to the amount of $10,000 under a separate Order in Council applicable to them or under the general regulation?

Mr. WALLACE. The Massey-Harris Company proceeded to prove to the Government the value of the materials used, say for example on a seven-foot binder, and the quantities of the material they brought into this country, and on which they paid duty, and a general Order in Council for them was passed. An Order in Council is not required for every exportation.

Mr. EDGAR. Was that Order in Council published?

Mr. WALLACE. No.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Then there was not an order passed at that time?

Mr. WALLACE. An Order in Council is passed for each firm. Take a manufacturing firm exporting binders. They come to the Government and submit a statement giving all the particulars and prices, and the Government examine into the matter, and grant them under a general Order in Council for implements of that kind exported, a drawback, say of nine-tenths. They lay down the basis. When the firm come to make a claim, it does not pass before Council, but they produce all the proofs before the department, including proof of the export of the article, its destination and full particulars, and upon that they receive by departmental order the refund. The Order in Council for the Massey-Harris Company passed in the first instance fixed the basis and the amount to which they were entitled on every mower or reaper of certain sizes. Of course the articles are of different sizes and of different qualities as regards materials used, and a different amount is paid. After the Order in Council is passed with respect to particular articles, the manufacturers are paid under that order on submitting full proofs to the department, as the general and particular Order in Council may require.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Then the First Minister was wrong in his explanation?

Mr. CASEY. The First Minister said the matter was controlled in the department and only one general Order in Council was passed. Now it is stated that an Order in Council is required for each trade and each particular class of goods exported, and that the departmental orders refer to particular Orders in Council. One or other of the Ministers is correct, probably the Minister of Customs, as he is perhaps better acquainted with the work.

Mr. LAURIER. The explanation given by the Controller of Customs confirms, if anything more were wanted, what I stated a few moments ago. The hon. First Minister has referred to the Order in Council passed in 1888. At that time the duty was 17½ per cent, on which a rebate was granted. In 1893 a special Order in Council was passed.

Mr. WALLACE. No.

Mr. LAURIER. Let me read to the hon. gentleman.

Mr. WALLACE. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will allow me to explain. The general Order in Council was passed in 1888. A special Order is passed for each particular case, and on the manufacturer furnishing proofs of the quantity and values of the materials used, he obtains a refund.

Mr. LAURIER. According to the duty in force in 1888, 90 per cent of rebate was to be given. In 1893 the following Order in Council was passed:—

That the terms of the Orders in Council of the 28th June, 1886, granting drawback to the Welland Vale Manufacturing Company, of St. Catharines, Ont., at rates as prescribed therein upon iron and steel used in the manufacture of axes and tools exported by them, be repealed, and that the rates as follows be substituted therefor:—

This recommendation is made in view of the increased duty on iron and steel ($13 per ton of 2,000 lbs.), which is being collected under the existing tariff, and which is largely in excess of the duty (17½ per cent) exacted under the tariff in force when the original Order in Council was framed and approved of.

The reason given for this action is that there has been a change in the tariff, because the tariff is no longer 17½ per cent, but $13 per ton of 2,000 pounds. That is the reason why a departure was made, because a general law had been passed which applied to all manufacturers. Yet here is an Order in Council departing from the previous order, which applied to all manufacturers equally and this order is made to apply to one firm only. This is a departure from the general principle. Why was this special Order in Council passed? I am told, I do not know how far it is correct, that a firm in Quebec accidentally learned that the department had made this change.

Mr. WALLACE. There is no such change made in the regulation. There was no change made in the principle.

Mr. LAURIER. I do not know whether to believe the Controller of Customs or the Governor General in Council, for the Order in Council reads:

This recommendation is made in view of the increased duty upon iron and steel ($13 per ton of 2,000 lbs.) which is being collected under the existing tariff and which is largely in excess of the duty (17½ per cent) exacted under the tariff in force when the original Order in Council was framed and approved of.

This Order in Council was issued because there was a change in the law and it provided a new rate of rebate because the change of duty had taken place. This is not a general regulation, but a special one, and it is liable to be abused.

Mr. WALLACE. Under the general rule a firm would be entitled to a drawback equal to 90 per cent of the duties paid on such quantities.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) From what is the hon. gentleman quoting?

Mr. WALLACE. From the general Order in Council. If Parliament changes the duties, then the manufacturer is entitled to come to the Government and ask for an increased rebate in proportion to the increased rate of duty. Parliament had reduced the amount of duty on iron from $13 to $10 per ton, and the amount of the refund would be consequently reduced.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) But you did not act upon that general order.

Mr. WALLACE. We certainly did, to the very letter.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) You made a new order, because that would not permit you.

Mr. WALLACE. The reason they did not apply before was, I presume, because they had not exported articles the year previously, or they would have been entitled to rebates then. They applied for a rebate the moment they exported these articles, and they were entitled to it.

Mr. GIBSON. That is the reason I make a complaint with regard to the case of my friends from Port Dalhousie. According to the Controller, the Welland Vale people got a rebate of 90 per cent up to 1893, and now he gives them a rebate at so much per dozen, which amounts to more than they got before. He gives as an excuse that there has been an increase in the duty upon iron. It is well known that our friends in Port Dalhousie and our friends in St. Catharines occupy two different positions politically in this country, and so the St. Catharines people were favoured by the fostering care of the Government with a duty of $2 per dozen and 20 per cent on their manufactured goods; and, when the Welland Vale people saw fit to send anything out of the country, they got this special rebate given to them by an Order in Council which was never published; thus giving them an unfair advantage over the whole of the manufacturers employed in this particular industry. That was one of the reasons why I make this complaint to the House. I wish to refer to the matter on which the hon. the Controller of Customs differed from me, with respect to the duties paid upon the iron. He states that my friends, the Messrs. Muir, were not entitled to the same amount of duty as that given to people who were engaged in the manufacturing of iron or composite vessels. I would like to know—if the Controller knows anything about ship-building—how they can strengthen wooden vessels with iron beams and girders, and not make them composite vessels? They come directly under the class of composite vessels.

Mr. WALLACE. I think I am correct in saying that, in the case of Muir Bros., it was "plates," not "beams."

Mr. GIBSON. The plates that were put into these vessels were for the purpose of strengthening the vessels, and in consequence of these plates being in the vessels, they are composite vessels. If the hon. gentleman knows anything at all about what he is talking on, he will know that. I happen to know something about it myself, because I learned the profession in my younger days. I complain of the unfairness shown to my read a letter which will bear out my complaint. If the House will allow me, I will read a letter which will bear out my complaint. The Minister of Finance said that I have no grievance, because of the fact that each and every individual pays duty. At the time I was only speaking from memory, and I had not this letter by me; but I find now, that there were some entries made free of duty. From this letter we will see that the Controller of Customs has not dealt as fairly with my friends as he did with the people in Toronto; because I find there is a discrimination in favour of the people there, who are engaged in the same business in Toronto as my friends are in Port Dalhousie. The letter was dated December the 7th, and it says:

DEAR SIR,—When Mr. Spillette was collector at this port we imported some steel plates for use in strengthening wooden vessels, and we were charged by him 17 per cent. Shortly after Mr. Clark was appointed, we imported some more, same class of goods and for same purpose, and he charged us 30 per cent. We then wrote to Customs House, Toronto, asking if there had been any change in the duty on steel plates. He said: No, not in the last ten years. We wrote Mr. Robinson, ship-builder, Hamilton, and instructed him to go to the Customs House there and see what they would charge him for same class of steel for same purpose, and they told him that they would enter them for 12½ per cent. Last winter, Messrs. Adam Hope & Co. imported about thirty or forty tons for Messrs. A. E. D. Mackey & Sons, for strengthening propellers "St. Magnus" and "Lake Michigan." They entered them at the bridge and they were allowed free of duty. We have written to every one in authority that we know, to find out how it was that a merchant could import free what a ship-builder could not, but could not get any satisfactory answer. Will you kindly look the matter up for us and oblige.

This is the first opportunity I have had of bringing this matter before the House, and I might say that if our friends are to be dealt with in the matter of giving rebates to the manufacturers of agricultural implements, right in the same section of country and within half a mile of each other on the Welland Canal, how is it that the Government will insist upon a greater duty being paid by them than they do in Toronto? And, at the same time that they are allowing steel or iron vessels to come into the country free, they are depriving our Canadian carpenters, whom they pretend to have so much feeling for, of work and driving the business of strengthening vessels over to Buffalo, when it ought to be done on the line of the Welland Canal, where we have good docks for such work.

Mr. CHARLTON. I wish to refer to another branch of this subject, if we are through with the discussion of the question of drawbacks. The Order in Council that I referred to a short time ago, permitted the importation, free of duty of numerous articles for manufacturing purposes. I suppose I am right in assuming that these were articles to be used in the production of goods to be consumed in Canada. Now, if that is the case, Mr. Chairman, I wish to point out what I deem to be in the system an unfavourable discrimination and an injustice that would be visited upon a certain class of manufacturers. The large manufacturer, whose operations were upon a scale of sufficient importance to warrant him in making importations direct, would be able to take advantage of this Order in Council permitting the importation of the articles used by him in the production of his goods. But the smaller manufacturer, whose business was not of sufficient volume to warrant him in making direct importations, would, I apprehend, be unable to avail himself of this provision of the Order in Council. The small manufacturer, in purchasing this article from the importer, who had paid the duty, would be obliged to pay a higher price than his competitor whose business was so large as to enable him to import direct. Consequently, the provisions of this Order in Council would be of a character to necessarily discriminate against the small manufacturing establishments of this country. The system is unjust in that respect. It is that view of the case to which I desire to call the attention of the Minister of Justice. It is one of the inevitable incidents of the system that it will discriminate in favour of the larger manufacturer who can avail himself of the provisions of the Order in Council permitting him to import his materials free of duty, and discriminate against the smaller manufacturer, whose operations are not large enough to permit him to import and who is compelled to purchase from those who import in the regular way.

Mr. WALLACE. In reply to the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Gibson), I would say that in the late tariff there is no 17½ per cent item, nor any 30 per cent item that could apply to iron of that kind. It is a question whether it would come in under item 977 of the free list as being used in the manufacture of iron or composite ships. I must admit that we have not the special knowledge that the hon. gentleman has of the character or classification of such ships; but we have availed ourselves of the technical knowledge of the Department of Marine, and we have their decision that the vessels in which these materials were used were not either iron or composite; and, therefore, under the law they were not entitled to that free entry. If the hon. gentleman will permit me to have that letter, I will see that the whole of the facts are given to him in writing, so that he may satisfy his friends.

Mr. BORDEN. I desire to refer for a single moment to the question of the rebate on iron and steel entered for the manufacture of axes. I understood the hon. First Minister to say that no case of grievance or hardship had been quoted. Now, it so happens that only yesterday I received a letter from a manufacturer of axes in the Maritime Provinces asking for information on this point. In that letter he says that he understands that an Order in Council was passed during last recess, remitting the duty on iron and steel used in the manufacture of axes, and he desires to know the facts. Now, it seems to me that the Government ought to publish—

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. These are published—every one.

Mr. BORDEN. The special Order in Council which has been read here?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It does not come under that.

Mr. WALLACE. That refers to a refund for exportation.

Mr. BORDEN. Did I not understand that this Order in Council was not published?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Every Order in Council making regulations is published, but an Order in Council granting a refund on steel used in the manufacture of axes for exportation would not be published.

Mr. BORDEN. This man is an exporter of axes. I understand that he has exported some to the State of Maine.

Mr. WALLACE. If he has exported them, he is entitled to a refund under these conditions.

Mr. BORDEN. But the conditions have been effectually changed by the Order in Council which has been read to-day by the leader of the Opposition.

Mr. WALLACE. In what way?

Mr. BORDEN. In the way that was read, by an enormous increase in the refund of duty.

Mr. WALLACE. The law says that he will be entitled to a refund on the amount that he has paid.

Mr. BORDEN. At any rate, this particular Order in Council, which was read by the leader of the Opposition, has never been published anywhere.

Mr. WALLACE. The general Order in Council was published.

Mr. BORDEN. But this particular one was not, and I contend that in a matter of this kind the Government should not have power to make secret regulations. Any regulations that they make should be published to the world.

Mr. WALLACE. There is no secret regulation about it. If Parliament calls for any Order in Council, with a statement of the amounts paid and the conditions under which they were paid, they will be furnished at once.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Before we leave this item I desire to re-state shortly the point which I took, and which has been somewhat departed from in the discussion. There are two distinct classes provided for in the Customs Act. There is one provision for a rebate on goods used in Canadian manufactures, and the Government may make regulations providing the terms and manner in which that rebate shall be given. Those regulations must be general; they cannot discriminate. If they do, they will, in my opinion, be illegal. But Parliament has also decreed that, in addition to the list of free goods in the Act of Customs, the Government may from time to time add to that list. They may do it when they arrive at a certain conclusion, the conclusion being that a certain article is used in Canadian manufactures. Now, I submit to the hon. Minister of Justice that a regulation made under subsection "L" is made only as and when the Government determine that the article is used in Canadian manufactures generally. When they so determine, they can make a regulation transferring that article to the free list absolutely. They cannot transfer it to the free list as regards the Massey-Harris Company or any other company. Nor can they transfer it to the free list for the purpose of having it manufactured in a particular way. For instance, all these Orders in Council which I read when I introduced the subject, say that specific articles shall be transferred to the free list if and when they are manufactured in a certain way. Those Orders in Council are utterly illegal. You may have the right under subsection "M" to grant a drawback on articles manufactured in Canada; but under subsection "L" you have only the right to determine whether an article shall be transferred holus bolus to the free list or not. So that, if you exercise properly the power which the law gives you, there can under no circumstances be unfair discrimination between man and man, between interest and interest, or between class and class; and I respectfully submit to the hon. Minister of Justice that the Orders in Council have heretofore been made on a wrong construction of the power conceded to Parliament to the Governor in Council. I do not think that Parliament would have conceded to the Governor in Council a power as large as that which the Government have attempted to exercise, and which may be used under certain possible circumstances to the advantage of one man and the disadvantage of another. Is it possible to conceive that Parliament itself would adopt a tariff granting a special advantage to one firm? That is incredible. Is it possible that Parliament can delegate that which it would not dare to exercise itself, to be exercised in secret by the Governor in Council? That is still more incredible. Parliament would not do it, and has not in my opinion done it; and the Governor in Council, in undertaking to exercise such powers, has not only dealt unjustly, but has gone right in the teeth of the Act.

Mr. LANDERKIN. A few sessions ago, on examining the Orders in Council, I discovered that the Government had granted a rebate on corn imported by distillers for the purpose of making liquor to be afterwards exported, and I asked the House to grant a similar rebate to farmers and others who imported corn to fatten stock for exportation. That request was denied. Now, in looking into this matter, it seems to me one of the most vicious systems that can possibly arise. I do not know anything that tends to greater demoralization than this very system. I do not see why the Government, charged to administer justice fairly and impartially among all classes of the community, should single out an industry here and there to be granted a rebate or reduction of taxes, as was shown to have been done by the Order in Council read by the hon. leader of the Opposition. Parliament should not delegate its rights to the Government, nor should the Government ask Parliament to grant them rights calculated, if misused, to do such great injury and injustice to the people in this country. Of course, I do not suppose that this Government will wilfully do it, because their record is such as leads people to have confidence in them; but under other circumstances this thing might be abused. We have protected the manufacturers by a high tariff; we have given them the home market; and, after we have done that, the Government, in addition, give them a rebate of the duty on those articles which become their raw material.

It being Six o'clock, the Committee rose, and the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE TARIFF.

House again in Committee of Ways and Means.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. MARTIN. It appears to me that this clause requires some further discussion and consideration, because the hon. Minister of Justice has taken one view of the law—a view upon which the Government has acted in issuing these Orders in Council—while hon. gentlemen on this side of the House lay down the proposition very broadly that that interpretation is entirely illegal. It does seem to me a matter of very serious importance for the House to consider whether all these Orders in Council, by which very large sums of money have been prevented from reaching the public treasury, are, or are not illegal. The clause, it appears to me, is very clear, indeed :

For transferring to the list of goods which may be imported into Canada free of duty, any or all articles (whether natural products or products of manufactures) used as materials in Canadian manufacture.

Surely that is a definition of the kind of articles to be admitted free. There are two points to that definition : 1. They may be manufactures or natural products ; 2. They must be such articles as are used in Canadian manufactures. And, to show that these words are a mere definition of the kind of articles, and not a provision as to what these articles shall be used for, read the second part of the clause :

And any such articles transferred to the free list by such Order in Council, shall be free of duty of customs for the time therein appointed for that purpose.

That is, not that they are to be free of duty, if used in manufacture, but they are to be absolutely free to all persons. It is very clear, indeed, that the words, "used as materials in Canadian manufactures" are to define the kind of articles, and not to give power to the Government to place any restrictions upon the imports of these articles, once the articles are placed on the free list. The first part of the clause shows clearly that that is what it means. But if there can be any doubt, the second part of the clause removes that doubt, and shows that, once placed upon the free list, they are to be on the free list without restriction or qualification. But, Mr. Chairman, not only has the Government taken the power which the statute has not given them, but they have gone very much further indeed. They have not only said that these articles are to be brought in for the purpose of being used in manufactures in Canada, but they have undertaken to discriminate between manufactures. They do not simply say : If you import a certain article for the purpose of using it as a raw material in manufactures, it shall be free ; but they say : If you import that article in order to manufacture one particular thing, it shall be free. Take a case, say that mentioned by the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) : Mohair, imported for the purpose of making buttons. Now, it does seem to me we are entitled to have from the Minister of Finance or the Minister of Justice the legal authority for the Government passing an Order in Council such as that referred to, by which mohair is allowed to be imported free, provided a particular manufacturer makes buttons of it. Of course, we have not the information before us that we may judge as to what particular stripe or colour the manufacturer who makes buttons in Canada is. But, certainly the use that has been made of this power intensifies the argument used here against the continuance of this system. Of course, Mr. Chairman, the real objection to the power is the unconstitutionality of this Legislature delegating its powers in that way. It seems to me an unconstitutional and improper delegation of the powers of the House, and it allows the Government to make this still more than it is, in a general way, a purely manufacturers' tariff. What we complain of on this side of the House is that the Government, instead of merely being the collectors of the revenue, by means of the customs duties, it is brought into such close relation with the manufacturing industries of the country that it is enabled to give to some manufactures advantages as against the rest of the community, and that naturally the Government will expect the manufacturers to give some returns for these favours. It has been well said that protection and corruption always go hand in hand. It does seem to me, Mr. Chairman, that we are really entitled to a further explanation from the Minister of Justice. I understood him to lay down the law distinctly and clearly that the Government had the right, under this clause, to pass these Orders in Council. If that be so, it would be very easy, indeed, to put in words which will remove all doubt as to the meaning of the clause. If the section had read that these articles might be imported free "for the purpose of being used as materials in manufactures," it would be clear. But, when the words are, "used as materials in Canadian manufactures," it seems to me that the Government have only power to put them on the free list, and, when put on the free list, they may be used for any purpose whatever. This is not a light matter : it is a matter involving very large sums of money, and the question whether there is power in the Government of the day to dispose arbitrarily, and without appeal, of large sums of money which belong to the people, is a matter, it seems to me, which requires most careful consideration. I think we are entitled to further explanations from the Ministers.

Mr. LANGELIER. Before the clause is disposed of, I would like to call the attention of the Government to the inconvenience of the existence of this power in the hands of the Government—inconvenience not only to the people generally, but to the Government itself. I can best illustrate this by a case which came before the public of Quebec. I can speak more freely, because I have no charge to make against the Government. A company was formed in the city of Quebec about a year ago to carry on an industry in the canning of a certain kind of fish called sardine, that is caught below Quebec. It was considered very important that the olive oil, which is used in large quantities for the canning of that fish should be admitted free of duty. As usual—I do not say it was anything extraordinary under the circumstances—the directors applied to a supporter of the Government to obtain that remission of duty. It will be so in all such cases. It will never occur to anybody asking for a remission of duty to apply to a member of the Opposition. But if the thing was not to be granted as a favour, it should be granted just as freely on the request of a member of the Opposition as on the request of a supporter of the Government. On the occasion in question, the directors applied to a supporter of the Government, a member of this House. I state the case as it has been published in the papers of Quebec, a great deal of correspondence on the subject having appeared. It is alleged that the report from this hon. gentleman was that the Government would most probably grant the remission of duty on olive oil. This was very natural under the circumstances, because it was a new industry, and the olive oil unquestionably was a raw material of great importance to the industry. Just at the time the demand was pending, a friend of the member of this House went to the manager of the company and asked him how much his company proposed to give to that member to obtain the remission of duty. The manager of the company was rather startled when he heard such a proposal. He said: "We always intended to reward him in a suitable and proper manner—in such a way as not to offend the feelings of the gentleman, and not to injure his position as a member of Parliament, but simply as people who have some sense of propriety would think of doing. What do you suppose he would think of wanting?" The man, who professed all the time to be the emissary of the member of the House, said he would expect $5,000. The manager was more startled still. He said: "Five thousand dollars? You must be joking. The whole remission of duty would not be worth $5,000 to us; we would prefer paying the duty to obtaining its remission on such conditions," and he refused point-blank to have anything to do with the man. The same man went to him three times, though he did not say that he was charged to do so. He finally came down a little in his demand; he asked the manager to place paid-up shares in the company, which were at par, in the names of trustees, who would hold them for the benefit of the member; but the manager of the company refused point-blank to do so. Finally the man said to him: "You will not obtain that remission of duty unless you give something; what I am asking is the last word." I must say, to the credit of the Government, that the remission of the duty was granted, and very properly granted, without a cent being given. But I mention this fact to show the great danger to which that power exposes the Government and their supporters. For instance, if the remission had not been granted, everybody in Quebec, friends as well as opponents of the Government, would have believed that it was because the company would not pay the $5,000 or something near $5,000 for the favour; but, very fortunately for the Government and for public morality, it was made known publicly that the remission had been granted without any improper means being adopted to secure it, and the public now know all about it. It was by mere accident that the matter was discovered; and I know that some friends of the Government, seeing the damage that was likely to result to them from the rumours that were flying about the streets of Quebec, came to Ottawa to interview them. I think no case could be mentioned to show more strongly the danger of this power being left in the hands of the Government than this case, the facts of which are known all through Quebec, and have been the subject of discussion in the papers for some time past.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think the statement made by my hon. friend should not be allowed to pass without some notice from the Government. There is no doubt that such powers are extremely susceptible of abuse. Every man who has any experience in business affairs knows that the Government, without being accomplices, are very much at the mercy of friends of theirs, who come to them for favours. My hon. friend has shown, what is pretty well known in business circles, that very frequently, while the Government may be perfectly innocent, influential supporters of theirs are asked to use their influence, and do use their influence, to obtain such favours as this clause enables the Government to grant. I do think that, if the power is to be continued, far greater safeguards should be thrown around it than now exists.

Mr. CHARLTON. I wish to refer to one little matter which has come under my notice. We have a duty on Indian corn, imposed ostensibly for the purpose of affording a little protection to farmers in the corn belt of Canada. On the 12th of June, 1890, an Order in Council was passed permitting the payment of a rebate of 90 per cent of the duty imposed upon corn imported into Canada when the corn was kiln-dried and used for human food. The quantity of corn imported under that provision is said to have been about 676,000 bushels. I am informed that it is customary in the Maritime Provinces to put corn into a large bin and run through the bin a single pipe conveying steam, and to let the steam pass through for twenty-four or thirty-six hours, or whatever the length of time may be. That does not kiln-dry the corn at all; it has no effect whatever upon it; but steam having passed through the bin, it is held that the corn has been kiln-dried. Then it is ground up and used for feeding to cattle and hogs. It has been customary to allow the rebate of duty on corn dried in this way. That is an example of the advantage taken of this power which is placed in the hands of the Government.

It is open to all kinds of abuse and favouritism, and I think the Government ought not to insist on retaining any longer a power so dangerous. They are, as my hon. friend says, at the mercy of unscrupulous subordinates, whose conduct cannot be thoroughly watched, and who are tempted to make use of the influence they have with the Government to secure sums of money from the parties receiving favours. The whole thing is subversive of the independence of Parliament. This House should carefully arrange the scale of duties and the details of the tariff, and no change in those details should be permitted except after full discussion in this House, and this House should not delegate to the Governor in Council its own functions with regard to the management of the fiscal system of the country. I think the charge made by my hon. friend from Quebec Centre (Mr. Langellier) deserves some notice at the hands of the Government.

Mr. EDGAR. I would like to ask the Minister of Finance if he intends to include in the free list he is here proposing, the Orders in Council which are in force to-day placing goods on the free list for the purpose of manufacture. It is a very extraordinary thing if we are legislating to put on the free list fifteen or twenty distinct articles which are only free when used in certain manufactures, while we are going to leave I do not know how many other articles free by means of Orders in Council. Is the hon. gentleman going to include in the free list the Order in Council making certain articles free?

Mr. FOSTER. If the hon. gentleman will look at the Votes and Proceedings which he has before him he will see they are included.

Mr. EDGAR. I do not see where.

Mr. FOSTER. In the notices of motion I gave last.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Are we to understand that these notices of motion include the various articles which up to this date have been made free under Order in Council?

Mr. FOSTER. The first resolution I laid on the Table included some of those on the free list, and those others I think include nearly all that are intended to be perpetuated.

Mr. EDGAR. Here we are legislating to place these articles on the free list. Parliament meets every session, and it would not hurt us if we were called upon to legislate respecting particular articles which circumstances show ought to be put on the free list. It seems to be exceedingly unnecessary to delegate to the Government this power to legislate. The only possible excuse the Government can present is that between the two sessions some great occasion of urgency might arise, some very important industry that was not known to be in process of incubation while the House was in session showed within the next few months before the next session has arrived to be in such a position of maturity that it would perish unless the Government had power to legislate in its favour as to certain manufactured articles. The Government is asking this committee to confirm a very vicious and improper principle of legislation by Order in Council simply for that very exceptional and unusual case. Even if there were some argument in favour of stretching a point for such an exceptional case, the power of the Government should be restricted so that no article would be placed on the free list until the end of the next session. The committee should not be asked to go further. What is the reason that the Government require power to give special legislation for four, five or fifteen years when the House will meet within a few months.

Mr. INGRAM. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) has made the charge that the Government have favoured their friends in regard to granting a rebate on kiln-dried corn.

Mr. CHARLTON. I made no such charge.

Mr. INGRAM. I inferred from the hon. gentleman's statement that he charged that corn which had not been properly kiln-dried had been granted a rebate. I happen to have some experience of this matter. We have a corn mill in St. Thomas, and I am aware that it had to comply with the law before it was granted a rebate. I had to come to Ottawa on two or three different occasions, and an officer of the department visited St. Thomas to investigate whether the corn was properly kiln-dried or not. I do not see, therefore, that the Government favoured their friends and allowed a rebate when the law had not been complied with.

Mr. CHARLTON. I did not charge that the Government had favoured their friends. The charge I made was that under the Order in Council with respect to kiln-dried corn, permitting a rebate of 90 per cent, in many places the intention of the Order in Council was evaded and corn was used after being placed in the bin with a steam-pipe passing through it for one or two days. I do not say that was done at St. Thomas or that any one was connected with such fraud. I said there were rumours of that kind abroad, and I am inclined to believe that in certain sections these rumours are not without foundation.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) If the law was being complied with, why had the hon. gentleman to visit Ottawa on one or two occasions?

Mr. INGRAM. I desire to say—

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Denison.) I think the discussion has taken too wide a range.

Mr. CHARLTON. I move that these words be added:

Provided, however, that all Orders in Council relating to any matters in connection with Customs whereby any ruling or decision is made for remission of duty or rebate of duty or any matter connected with the Customs Department, and acted upon, shall be published in the 'Canada Gazette' the week following the passage of such order.

That will obviate, if such abuses exist, the issuing of secret Orders in Council, and will allow the public to understand what has been done.

Mr. FOSTER. Has the hon. gentleman reflected what the three or four last words would bring about? The customs rules and acts upon ten thousand different matters in the course of the year. A very large number of the Orders in Council pass every year with respect to matters not in any way connected with rebates. What is the hon. gentleman's object in desiring to have all those printed?

Mr. CHARLTON. My object is this. The Welland Vale Iron Company secured the passage of an Order in Council bearing materially on the interests of that company and granting it certain rebates and advantages of which the trade was ignorant. The object of the motion is to prevent a recurrence of any such action; it is to prevent the Government acting in any matter and concealing their action from the public. The object is to provide that the Government shall show their hands and put their action with respect to rebates and duties on record in the 'Canada Gazette.'

Mr. LAURIER. The answer given by the Finance Minister to the hon. member from North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) must convince him that this amendment does not go far enough. If there are ten thousand orders passed under such a law—

Mr. FOSTER. I did not say so. The motion requires that everything that the customs does by Order in Council shall be published.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It would include payment made to a clerk for day wages.

Mr. LAURIER. It is evident that the amendment does not go far enough, for it would wipe out the power of the Government to legislate under this section.

Mr. CHARLTON. I moved this motion under the supposition that the Government would force the passage of this section, and they would retain the power, to which we object, to deal with these questions by Order in Council. Possibly my motion should have been preceded by a motion denying this power to the Government, and if that motion had been lost, the present motion would then have followed.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I suggest to the Finance Minister that there should be a limitation to those matters that have been dealt with by Order in Council by which certain articles have been transferred to the free list.

Mr. FOSTER. That is a different matter.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). They should be put on the free list now, if it is proper for Parliament to do it, because the power that the Government exercises is but a delegated power, and its exercise can only be justified on the ground of extreme necessity. The Government is proposing to reserve this power with regard to acts actually accomplished. Let these articles be put upon the free list by this schedule which is to become part of the Act.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend was not here when I explained that such is the intention, and you will find in the Votes and Proceedings that last night I gave notice for this.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. gentleman did not state that that covered everything admitted free by Order in Council.

Mr. FOSTER. I think it covers everything now free by Order in Council that we intend to remain.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. But not in the future.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). There of course remains the objection against the retention of this power. At most there are but eight months elapsing between the close of one session and the beginning of another, and the necessity in this particular case cannot exist.

Mr. FOSTER. The objection I made to the motion was that every single act of the Customs Department which requires an Order in Council, would if it were carried into effect, have to be published in the 'Gazette.' I do not see that there is any objection to having the Orders in Council under which transfers or drawbacks are made published. If it were limited in that respect I would see no objection to it.

Mr. CHARLTON. I see no objection to amend it.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I would ask the First Minister: Does he concur in the construction which the legal men on this side of the House placed on subsection "L" of the Customs Act?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. That is to say that we have to admit them free for all purposes if we think they ought to be admitted free for one?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Yes.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. On the contrary, I think that would be a violation of the section. I thought I gave reasons for dissenting from that opinion this afternoon.

Mr. MARTIN. I understood the First Minister to give as a reason: that if the construction, we on this side of the House put on it, were the true one, it would be very unfair and very unreasonable. I have never understood that to be conclusive in discussing the legal effect of an Act of Parliament. It is a question for the Legislature to consider when they are enacting a particular clause, whether the effect of it will be reasonable or fair or otherwise; but if a section plainly means a certain thing, then the fact that the working out of it is unfair, has no effect whatever upon the legal interpretation to be put upon the clause. I would be very sorry indeed to think that the Minister of Justice, without giving any better reason for it than that, should undertake to lay down the principle: that because he says so, it must be the meaning of the section. The section says "articles used as material in Canadian manufacture." It does not say: "articles for the purpose of being used as material in Canadian manufactures." The latter part of the section reads: "and any such materials transferred to the free list by such Order in Council shall be free of duty." It does not say that they shall be free of duty for the purpose of making buttons, or any other particular article. But if they are of a particular kind as are defined in the first part of the clause, and if the Government exercises the power given to them they become free of duty to every person. That is the contention we make on this side of the House. The hon. the First Minister says: that he thought he had fully answered that argument this afternoon, and the only reason he gave was, that that construction would lead to unfairness and to this condition of affairs: That if mohair were allowed into the country free, it might be sold as that, and not necessarily made into buttons. It seems to me that that is not an argument on the legal point. We are not discussing the original Customs Act, as to whether we should change or modify it, but we are discussing as to what it really does mean, and what power the Government have under this particular subsection "L." Unless the Minister of Justice has some better argument to offer than he has already offered, I think the House will come to the conclusion that hon. gentlemen opposite have been remitting duty in favour of manufacturing friends of theirs, without any authority whatever under the law and the statutes of this land, and that large sums of money have been lost to the country and placed in the pockets of these manufacturers without any authority whatever, except the strained construction placed upon the Act. that hon. gentlemen opposite might have an opportunity of befriending friends of theirs who are engaged in these particular manufactures.

Mr. FOSTER. With reference to this amendment, if the hon. gentleman wishes a vote on it, of course it is so wide that we cannot accept it; but when we go into committee again. I will make some provision in the direction he aims at.

Mr. CHARLTON. I will change it.

Mr. EDGAR. I wish to move an amendment of a different character. Objection has been taken on this side of the House that there has not been sufficient publication of the number of changes made in the tariff. Another objection has been taken such as has just been repeated by the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin): that the Government has been incorrectly interpreting the language of the statute and exceeding their powers under that clause. I go further than that and object to the principle of the clause altogether. It was introduced, I think first, into our Legislature in 1877, but I contend that that does not make it any better, and as the Minister of Finance has announced that he will put into our new free list all the articles that have been made free under Order in Council, then we have a clean sheet to begin upon; and if between this and the next session of Parliament any extraordinary case arises I think the Minister can ask it to stand over to be dealt with when the House meets. Instead of asking us to debate a principle which nobody can justify of delegating legislative powers to a Cabinet Council, I would prefer to raise the issue on that question and I move:

That the word "not" and the words "or impaired," in the last line, at the end of section 2, be struck out.

Then if the amendment is adopted the section will read:

And any power conferred upon the Governor in Council by the "Customs Act" to transfer dutiable goods to the list of goods which may be imported free of duty, is hereby abrogated.

Amendment negatived.

Mr. McMULLEN. It appears to me rather singular that, notwithstanding the very clear and distinct manner in which the peculiarities of this clause have been pointed out to the hon. First Minister by the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Martin), as well as by other legal gentlemen on this side of the House, the hon. First Minister will persist in sitting still and making no reply whatever. If the Government are going to commence the business of this session by treating the Opposition in this manner, I can tell them that they are not going to make very rapid progress in passing this or any other item. It is discourtesy to the Opposition, after the manner in which they have shown the peculiarities of this clause, that no lawyer on the other side of the House, neither the First Minister nor the Solicitor General, has got up to explain the points that have been raised. I do not for a moment pretend to be able to discuss the legal bearing of this clause; I wished to leave that to the gentlemen of legal talent and education on this side of the House. But from the general application of the principle, I hold that it is highly desirable that it should be abrogated. We should not leave in the hands of the Government the power to confer favours in this way. As my hon. friend from West Ontario (Mr. Edgar) has pointed out, not more than eight months can elapse between one session of Parliament and another, and any cases that may arise in the recess may very well be allowed to stand until Parliament meets, when they can be dealt with. If we are going to leave a clause of this kind on the statute-book, which will virtually bring every manufacturer in the country on his knees to ask the Government for favours, we shall be doing something very imprudent, and be placing the Government in an improper position. It is our duty not to allow this clause to pass until the Government give some satisfactory explanation why they persist in retaining it, or else admit that they have misconstrued it in the past. We will forgive them their past sins if they will admit that, and try to do what is right in the future.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant.) I was on the point of asking the question put by the hon. member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar) with reference to the articles that have been made free in the Orders in Council. I listened to the answer of the hon. Finance Minister, who, if I understood him aright, said that the Government proposed to transfer to the free list in these resolutions almost all the articles that had been made free by Orders in Council. I understood that there were some exceptions. I would ask him if those exceptions are such as have been fixed for a short time, and will soon expire, or does he propose to rescind the Orders in Council relating to items which are not included here?

Mr. FOSTER. I think I stated, but the hon. gentleman did not probably hear me, that all those which it was intended should be operative were to be transferred to the list.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant.) How do those that are not transferred become inoperative?

Mr. FOSTER. They become inoperative by the fact that at the end of the session of Parliament they will not be operative. I mean to say that we transferred to the free list most of the articles made free by Orders in Council.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant.) The hon. gentleman qualifies again by the word most.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Will the hon. gentleman submit to the House a list of the articles that he does not transfer to the free list, and the reason for not transferring them so that the House will know that there are certain articles which will still come in free under Orders in Council?

Mr. McMULLEN.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not say so. What I meant to say, if the hon. gentleman did not understand me, was that what we proposed to remain free should be put upon the free list.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant.) The hon. gentleman does not understand me, though I think I understand him. There are certain things made free by Orders in Council, and a certain number of these are to be transferred to the free list by these resolutions. In addition to those there are certain other articles made free by Orders in Council. Does he intend that they shall remain free, or does he intend to terminate the effect of those Orders in Council?

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman ought to be able to answer that for himself.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Everything will be taxed under this tariff, except what is specified to be free; and therefore anything that is not named in the free list will come in under duty.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Then, do I understand that the hon. Minister of Justice states, as the legal effect of this Act, when passed, that it terminates all Orders in Council?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Yes, terminates everything in the way of taxation or exemption excepting the orders that are reserved in force by these resolutions. There are, for instance, certain interpreting Orders in Council, but all that are not named here as being reserved, will lapse on the passage of these resolutions.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Do we understand distinctly that every Order in Council granting a remission of duties is terminated the moment this Act comes into force?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Unless it is reserved here.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I understood the First Minister to say that those reserved here were only interpreting orders. I am speaking of orders that grant a remission of duties. Are these now terminated?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. I think I can make this point clear. This Act, when passed, will make some articles dutiable and others non-dutiable there will be no others.

Mr. MARTIN. Under subsection "L," certain goods have been made free heretofore. Does this Act effect these in any way?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Yes; it repeals everything of the kind; but, by expressed words it continues in force the powers given to the Government in the Customs Act, and that is what we have been debating all the afternoon—whether those powers shall be continued in the future. But, as regards the past, everything that has been done will lapse.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I do not understand the hon. gentleman's reasoning. He may be referring to clause 2. Certainly, the resolution now before us does not propose to repeal the existing Orders in Council.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The effect of subsection 22 is to continue the powers which were exercisable by the Governor in Council. But as we go on, the hon. gentleman will see that all the past is repealed, both as to the statutes imposing duties on customs, and as to Orders in Council.

Mr. MARTIN. The Minister says that as we go on we will see it all repealed. I see no clause in these resolutions that repeals any portion of the Customs Act with regard to free goods.

Mr. FOSTER. When the hon. gentleman, in the course of time, gets to the end of the free list, he will know what it means.

Mr. MARTIN. There are two ways of making a free list. There is the list made by Parliament, and that is the way it ought to be done, and there is another hon. gentlemen make in Council under a separate Act of Parliament. Now, because we happen to deal with the subject of free goods in one Act of Parliament, that does not affect the other Act.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. There are goods specified in relation to which there is a duty charged; there are goods free; and there are goods not elsewhere specified, which are taxed at a certain rate.

Mr. MARTIN. They are taxed under this Act, but under another Act they will be made free.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. No.

Mr. LAURIER. The hon. gentleman stated this afternoon a hypothetical case with regard to silk. If silk, used in the manufacture of umbrellas had been put on the free list by Order in Council, and if this silk is taxed under the new tariff, what would be its position under the Order in Council?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The exemption would lapse, and it would be taxed as silk.

Mr. LAURIER. Then a new Order in Council would have to be passed.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Yes.

Mr. LAURIER. That may be, but we have doubts as to the authority under which this is done.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. That will be made perfectly clear as we progress.

On subsection 3,

That the whole or part of the duties hereby imposed upon fish and other products of the fisheries may be remitted as respects either the United States or the Island of Newfoundland, or both, upon the proclamation of the Governor in Council, which may be issued whenever it appears to his satisfaction that the Governments of the United States and the Island of Newfoundland, or of either of them, have made changes in their tariffs of duties imposed upon articles imported from Canada in reduction or repeal of the duties in force in the said countries respectively.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Any alteration in this?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. No change.

Subsection 4,

4. That whenever it appears to the satisfaction of the Governor in Council that the Governments of France and Spain, or either of them, have made changes in their tariff of duties imposed upon articles imported from Canada, in reduction or repeal of the duties now in force in the said countries, he may by proclamation, order the whole or part of the duty of thirty per centum ad valorem hereby imposed upon wines imported into Canada to be remitted as respects importations from the said countries, or from that one of the said countries by the Government of which such change in its tariff of duties has been made as aforesaid.

Mr. EDGAR. This, I think, is an exact copy of section 11 of the Consolidated Statutes as to France and Spain. So that the Government is proposing fresh legislation to the House to enable them to discriminate in favour of France and Spain, or either of them, against the whole world in the matter of wines imported into Canada. If I can make head or tail of anything in the English language, I think that that is the undoubted meaning of this clause. I am not at all finding fault, but I want it to be clearly understood where we stand. I would like to understand from the Government what they really mean by this clause. I do not think it can possibly be construed as proposing to put these wines either on the free list for the world, or at a reduced tariff for the world. My recollection of the standing offer of the United States is that in case they place certain articles of produce on the free list—in case they admitted them free from Canada—we shall place them on our free list. That is not discrimination. But here we say we shall, as respects those countries, or any of them, reduce the duties, or throw them off altogether, which is clear discrimination. I would like to understand that clause.

Mr. FOSTER. I think the hon. gentleman understands it pretty well. He has given a pretty good explanation of it himself.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Equal reciprocity and equal discrimination.

Mr. FOSTER. If he asks whether or not I agree with his interpretation, I may say that I do, in the main. It has been on the statutes for a number of years. The object of it was, of course, to use this, if possible, as a leverage for bettering the trade relations with these two countries.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell.) Why not depend on the home industry?

Mr. FOSTER. As the article of wine is one in which both countries are specially interested, so far as its export is concerned, it is an offer of reciprocity, whereby we give them an advantage in the admission of those articles into this country provided they give us corresponding advantage in the entry into their market of articles we wish to export. So it may be said, that whilst it is to give an advantage to their exports of wine, it is primarily designed to give an advantage to the export of goods from Canada to these countries.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell.) That is discrimination.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman says it is discrimination. If he interprets discrimination as being a bargain between two countries whereby each gives an advantage to the other,—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. FOSTER. That may be discrimination in that respect. It is not, however, discrimination against any of the most favoured nation countries, because they would not be on the same plane with these.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That is a very doubtful point. The hon. gentleman has perhaps forgotten that that point has been discussed in this House more than once, and unless my memory is wholly at fault, the Minister of Justice himself delivered an opinion on that subject, which I concurred in, as I understood it, at any rate. It was to the effect that the most-favoured nation clause did not apply where reciprocity took place between two countries. Now, it appears to me, while I do not object to the clause, that it clearly and distinctly lays down the proposition that you may discriminate, and discriminate to any extent, in the case of reciprocity.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell.) It seems to me that this section does not admit quite of the construction put upon it by the Minister of Finance. All it says is that:

On subsection 4.—

That whenever it appears to the satisfaction of the Governor in Council that the Governments of France and Spain, or either of them, have made changes in their tariff of duties imposed upon articles imported from Canada, in reduction or repeal of the duties now in force in the said countries, he may by a proclamation order the whole or part of the duty, and so on.

Now, the hon. gentleman proposes that we shall take off specifically the duties on wines imported from other countries. That will be discrimination on our part against any other country that would undertake to export to Canada, and it would be a discrimination, according to the arguments we have heard, against the grape growers and wine growers of Canada. The hon. gentleman does not take that class into consideration at all. Under this proposition the hon. gentleman will be equally bound, though this reduction is not a reduction in favour of Canada simply, but a reduction applying to all Christendom. The hon. gentleman does not specify any particular article. It might be fish, and fish only; it might be flour. It might be one article or two or three upon which the reduction would take place, and the reduction might give to the people of Canada no advantage whatever. I think that the hon. gentleman, before he insists upon a clause of this sort being put in the Customs Act, ought to be able to point out to the House what particular articles he is seeking to have introduced into the markets of France and of Spain, and to which this particular section is to apply. We are left wholly in the dark with regard to this. If I remember rightly when this matter was dealt with by the House before, there was nothing said on the subject. We did undertake to petition the Imperial Government to take Canada out from under the provisions of the most favoured nation clause. We did that on the very last day of a particular session. I think my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition and myself were here, also the hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Sutherland), and, so far as I recollect, no other representatives of the Opposition were present at that time. I think the House is entitled to know from the Minister of Finance, as he has considered the subject, what he has in his mind with regard to it; what he expects or desires that Canada should export to Spain or to France. Up to this moment, we have no information on the subject. Why should we go on to declare that we are going to do a certain thing upon the happenings of a certain contingency, and at the same time not know as a Parliament what that particular thing is? The hon. gentleman proposes to accomplish something; he has in his mind something at which he aims by this amendment. But what he has in view when he proposes this section is something of which this House has no information. Surely this House is not going to legislate in that sort of fashion. We ought to know what the hon. gentleman's proposition is. When we know what he is proposing, his friends sitting around him will have an opportunity of saying whether they concur in his judgment. He has not given them that opportunity as yet. And he is not giving the Opposition an opportunity to concur with him. That would be a matter of great delight to members on this side, for it would be a novel sensation, should the hon. gentleman introduce a measure in which we can concur.

Mr. LAURIER. I do not see the use of this section, so far as France is concerned, as we have a treaty with France about to be ratified. I see that the clause so far as Spain is concerned is useful and right. But I do not see the object of keeping it so far as France is concerned. There need be no standing offer, since the standing offer whatever it was has been accepted by both countries.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The hon. gentleman will see that, while we propose to ratify the French Treaty, as was announced in the House a little while ago, and while it is true that, if that treaty is ratified there is no object in maintaining the statutory offer, still the treaty is to be ratified by the two parties. I suppose action will not be taken in the French Chamber until action has been taken here. The statutory offer will become obsolete if the treaty is ratified by both countries.

Mr. LAURIER. Am I to understand that the hon. gentleman expects the treaty will not be ratified?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. No; but the statutory offer should remain, in case it should not be superseded by the ratification of the treaty.

Mr. LAURIER. Precaution upon precaution.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). While the hon. gentleman mentions the specific article to be imported, he does not mention what Canada is to get.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Before we act we will see what these countries are prepared to give.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). But, before the offer can have any reason, the hon. gentleman must have in his mind the object of wishing to find a market either in France or Spain for something we desire to sell. What are these things for which the hon. gentleman expects to find a favourable market in either of these countries? There is not a thing said here as to what Canada expects to sell and upon what France or Spain is to deal favourably with in her laws of taxation.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Whatever we may be able to export to these countries at the time the offer may be accepted or the negotiations take place in pursuance of the offer.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I am afraid I have not made myself understood. The House of Commons is the original party on our side of this transaction. Now, the hon. gentleman asks the House of Commons to delegate to the Government certain power for a purpose, and yet he declines to tell the House what that purpose is. He has left the House in the dark on that subject. Surely the House itself could not act in this way, unless it knew what advantage France or Spain was bestowing, and not a single article is mentioned here. When we made the standing offer to the United States, which stood on our statute-book for years, we mentioned specifically certain articles. Nothing is mentioned here that we are to sell, and only one thing mentioned that we are to receive.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. We specify the article to be received, because it is a principal article of export of these countries. It is true, as the hon. gentleman says, that we are asking the House to delegate certain powers to the Government, but these powers are simply to negotiate. It would be a lamentable result, after passing such a clause as this, if, for the omission of a certain article, our powers were nullified.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). This is not power to negotiate, but power to proclaim a certain condition of things to be the law.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I fear the quantity of articles we are able to export under the provisions of the minimum tariff will form so insignificant an addition to what we now export that the matter need not trouble the House or the Government very much. After the statement made by the hon. gentleman, I begin to entertain doubts whether the French Treaty is likely to be consummated by the French Chamber. I am sorry that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, who is presumably better informed on these matters, is not here to give us some explanations.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) It strikes me as extraordinary, after having agreed to a commercial treaty between the two countries, and it having been signed by the plenipotentiaries, and the Minister having declared his intention of asking the House to ratify it, that instead of bringing in a measure to ratify the treaty and so conclude our commercial relations with France, he should bring in a clause which supposes that the treaty will not be carried into operation at all. What would be the effect in any person's mind outside, of reading the legislation now proposed? They will say: Why, the plenipotentiaries representing Canada have agreed upon a treaty, the French representatives have agreed to that treaty, and the Prime Minister has stated it is his intention to carry it out; that treaty covers the whole commercial relations between the two countries, but instead of proposing legislation having the object of carrying out that treaty, he proposes legislation in the directly opposite direction, and based upon a supposition of a state of facts exactly opposite of what he tells us does exist. Surely the hon. gentleman is not serious in saying he is going to carry out the treaty, when at the same time he asks us to enact a clause relating to a state of facts utterly inconsistent with the existence of the treaty.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The hon. gentleman seems to think the two things are contradictory because they present an alternative. Now, we propose that Parliament shall ratify the treaty, we will bring forward legislation with that view, and in case Parliament should not adopt it, or that the treaty should not be ratified on the other side, we propose to continue a standing offer, which is not now adopted for the first time, and therefore does not present an inconsistency with the French treaty. It has been on the statute-book something like twenty years, and will present an alternative if, by any mischance, the present negotiations should not be ratified.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Would it not be more consistent with our dignity if the hon. gentleman acted upon the assumption that the act of his plenipotentiaries will be carried out, he having pledged himself to that effect, and not act upon an exactly contrary assumption?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It would if this were a new clause.

On subsection 8,

That on imported Indian corn, to be kiln-dried and ground into meal for human food, or ground into meal and kiln-dried for such use, under such regulations as are made by the Governor in Council, there may be allowed a drawback of ninety per cent of the duty paid.

Mr. CHARLTON. I have spoken briefly in reference to this matter in connection with the general question of Orders in Council. I am unable to see why, a regulation having been adopted that would permit the introduction of so large a quantity of corn as 576,000 bushels, that regulation should not be further extended so to give to feeders of stock the advantages of cheaper food, as well as to human beings who use corn for food. Of course my hon. friend is well aware that corn is the cheapest of all grains for fattening purposes, for feeding either cattle or swine. The western producers of corn and pork have a decided advantage over Canadian producers for the reason that they grow corn at so cheap a rate. While the duty upon corn may perhaps be held to confer some benefit upon the belt of counties along Lake Erie which produce corn in considerable quantity, my own experience as a resident of one of those counties enables me to say without hesitation that the corn duty has probably conferred no benefit upon the corn growers of that region. There is only a small surplus raised for export, if any surplus at all, in those counties, and the duty in so far as it is intended to serve as a protection to the corn growing interest in those counties, is practically of no consequence, and produces no practical results. That being the case, there being no interest to be benefited by the duty, and so large an interest being engaged in fattening of beef and of swine that would be benefited by cheapening the cost of this grain, it strikes me that, even in the light of the interest of the farmers of this country, the imposition of the duty is not a desirable line of policy. The effect of introducing corn into Canada is not to cheapen other coarse grains, it is to enable the farmer to displace a given amount of barley, or a given amount of oats or pease, to sell these at a relatively higher price, and replace them with corn bought at a lower price; and in the mere matter of exchange between corn and the other grains, a large profit is realized. But if he has no grain to sell and has to buy corn to feed, of course the duty is a serious burden. I was making a calculation in 1880 when the question of the duty upon corn was under consideration in the House, and speaking from memory, my estimate was that if corn had been admitted that year free of duty the profit to the Canadian farmer in the exchange of 56 pounds of oats at market rates for 56 pounds of corn at importation cost would be 20 cents, if of 56 pounds of barley, 38 cents, if of 56 pounds of rye, 30 cents, and of 56 pounds of peas for 56 pounds of corn, 20 cents. That is the practical result to a greater or less extent of importing American corn into Canada and releasing a corresponding quantity of other coarse grains, so far as the farmer is concerned. If he has coarse grain to sell, if he can sell his oats at 34 cents, peas at 60 cents, and buy corn at 50 cents, and a given number of pounds of corn cost less than a given number of pounds of peas or of oats, I do not think that the retention of the duty upon corn is a wise policy for the Government to pursue. I speak from the farmers' standpoint, and I speak as a representative of a riding that belongs to the corn belt. I think my constituents who raise corn in large quantities, care nothing for this duty, and do not feel they are benefited by it. I know that the farmers further north where corn is not raised, feel that the burden placed upon them by the imposition of the duties on corn, is a serious one, that it places them at a disadvantage for fattening cattle for the English market, and in fattening swine. I seriously question whether this arrangement had not better be changed by the issuing, not of an Order in Council, but a mandate of this House that corn imported into Canada shall be free, whether it is kiln-dried, or intended for human food, or for any other purpose.

Mr. McMULLEN. There is an important point in connection with the question raised by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton). I know a person who is largely engaged in the milling business, and also is an exporter of coarse grain, and he went to the Maritime Provinces for the purpose of seeking an outlet for those coarse grains, and found when he got there that the corn that is imported there, presumably to be ground into human food, is largely used for feeding cattle. When we come to realize the fact, from the answer given by the Minister of Customs, that 67,676 bushels of corn are ground for human food, on which a rebate is allowed of 90 per cent of duty, and that, in addition, there is a large quantity of cornmeal shipped into the Maritime Provinces, we must come to the conclusion that an enormous quantity of corn is consumed there. I am satisfied, however, that it is not all used for human food. If this injustice has been done under the operation of the present statute, the Government should amend it and make it more stringent. From its wording it appears stringent, but I am certain its terms are evaded. I have a letter under my hand from a person cognizant of the fact, who states that at some mills a steam-pipe or two are run through the corn bin, and the corn was then pretended to be dried, and it was ground and sold for human food. But really it was sold to feed cattle and hogs. If that evasion of the law prevails to any great extent, the Act should be amended to meet such cases. The hon. member for Elgin (Mr. Ingram) stated that he had a great deal of difficulty in obtaining a rebate for a mill entitled to a rebate to the extent of 90 per cent on corn ground for human food. No doubt, the Government are very anxious to make an impression on the people of that district where they grow corn, for they are, of course, anxious to have the law very strictly applied so as to be protected against corn coming in from elsewhere and being ground for animal food. If the hon. gentleman will visit the Maritime Provinces, I assure him, on undoubted authority, that he will find a very different condition of affairs, that the law is to a very large extent set aside, and that a very large quantity of the corn imported is used for feeding cattle and comes into direct competition with coarse grains from the western portion of the Dominion. The object of the National Policy was supposed to be to keep Canada for the Canadians, but, when it suits hon. gentlemen opposite to adopt some other policy, they do not hesitate to desert it. I would advise the Minister of Customs to look closely into the application of the law in the Maritime Provinces, and, if he does so, he will find the result I have indicated.

Mr. WALLACE. I have looked into the question very thoroughly. The Department sent one of its most efficient officers there, and he investigated the whole matter. There was only one small irregularity discovered, and it appeared that the corn millers in the Maritime Provinces were complying with the law. The statements made by several hon. gentlemen, that kiln-drying is only a farce, is not correct, as the departmental investigation shows. It was evident that the millers in the Maritime Provinces are acting in accordance with the law and are complying with it in every respect, except, as I say, in one slight instance, which involved a small penalty.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). How can the Government tell what is done with the corn after it is ground?

Mr. WALLACE. They cannot, of course, follow it all over, but we can do what the law requires, obtain the affidavits of the corn miller. That is obtained in every case.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Is an affidavit from the purchaser taken as to the use to which he will put the corn?

Mr. CHRISTIE. I am confident that it would greatly benefit the farmers in my section, if corn was put on the free list. Farmers use corn very largely for feeding and fattening purposes, and it is also used by milkmen. Many of the farmers send their milk to the city, and they find corn is the best food they can use. At a public meeting held in my county the farmers unanimously resolved that it would be in their interest to have corn put on the free list, and they asked me to do what little I could to bring about that result.

Mr. McMILLAN. I have always been in favour of free corn, and it is a question which I have looked into very carefully. It has always been argued that, if corn came in free, it would injure the farmers in the sale of their coarse grain, but, from all investigation made, and even from a report laid before the House to show the beneficial effects of the National Policy on agricultural interests, I am convinced that the farmers in no part of the country would suffer if corn was allowed to come in free. The farmers are now compelled in a great measure to change the system of farming, to abandon the raising of crops for export, and I consider it is the duty of the Government to give them every advantage possible, and I know of no greater advantage that could be conferred both on dairymen and those who feed cattle and hogs, than to admit corn free. It has been stated by the hon. member from North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), that we can sell our coarse grains and obtain a larger quantity of food for the same money. I was present a year ago when a delegation from western Canada, I think from the Patrons of Industry, interviewed the Government and when the First Minister asked the question whether it was considered desirable to admit corn free, if the United States would not admit our barley free, the answer was at once given: Let us have free corn, whether the United States admit our barley or not. I am convinced, from what I know of agriculture, and I have made it the study of my life, that free corn is one of the benefits that the Government should confer on the farmers of the Dominion.

Mr. MCGREGOR. I belong to a corn county, and I, too, say, give us free corn; but there should be certain conditions attached to the concession. When our farmers cross the river, they meet with a duty of $4 per ton on hay, also a very high tariff on barley and other products, and, while we in Essex county can grow thousands of bushels of corn, and can grow it with greater advantage than any county in Canada, yet we feel that it would be unfair to our farmers to allow the Americans to come over with their cheap corn and enter it in competition against our corn. We want an exchange of products and are prepared to make an exchange, nothing more and nothing less. We want free trade as nearly as possible. We feel satisfied that, if we allow the American corn to come in, we will get over with our hay, barley and oats and other grains and products we raise. We are prepared to exchange on a free trade basis. Let the Americans come over here, and we will go over there.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I simply desire to say a word or two as to the grinding of corn, as I have had a good deal of experience in the business, and I understand the process. As regards the millers of Ontario—and I am not now interested in the business, but I was engaged in it for a number of years—I know that in kiln-drying corn for human food they comply with the law in every respect. I do not believe any of the cornmeal made in Ontario and sent to the Maritime Provinces is used for anything else than human food, because the expense of manufacturing it and the manner in which it is prepared makes the meal too expensive to use for anything else than human food. At the same time I do not know how well that law is complied with down in the Maritime Provinces. I only wish to speak for the millers in Ontario and I can assure the Controller of Customs that they are honest men and comply with the law.

Mr. INGRAM. Mr. Chairman, as you have heard from Essex and Kent and also from Elgin, I might say on behalf of my county, that I am opposed to taking the duty off corn, the same as are the hon. members from Essex (Mr. McGregor) and Kent (Mr. Campbell). I understand that my hon. friend from North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) is in favour of taking the duty off corn, while the representative of the next county to his is opposed to it. I think the majority of the counties in the west where corn is grown are in favour of retaining the duty, and how the hon. gentleman (Mr. Charlton) is against it, I cannot understand.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I am like my hon. friends. I am a property holder in a corn district, and my impression is as it has always been: That free corn would be—I do not say a special advantage to the particular district in which it is grown—but it would be a very great advantage, I have no doubt whatever, in the feeding of stock all over the country. I looked into this question some years ago, and I am satisfied that the farmers who live in districts where pease are grown could sell their pea crop for very much more than the corn and so they would have upon the sale of their pea crop and the purchase of corn for fattening purposes a very substantial gain. I think the experience of every farmer in the corn-growing district is that it does not pay to raise corn for sale on the market. I have no doubt whatever that the farmers, whom my friends from South Essex (Mr. Allan) and North Essex (Mr. McGregor), represent who sell their corn to Hiram Walker & Sons, are getting a better price in consequence of the tax that is upon corn than they otherwise would get, and so far they are substantial gainers. But every bushel of corn that is fed to the cattle of Essex or Kent or Elgin, is not in any way affected by the duty that the Government put on corn. If you could put a tax on corn that would raise the price of it, say 25 cents a bushel, so that it would be more profitable to the farmer for the moment to sell his corn for cash than to convert it into beef or pork, why, you would put an end to the industry of the production of beef and pork, because the exchange of corn for cash would be more profitable. But in the case of all the corn that is converted into animal flesh for the purpose of human food, no tax that the Government could impose would increase its fattening properties in the smallest degree, and therefore cannot add a mill to the value of the corn that is so used. It can only be for corn put upon the market, and every farmer who is conducting his farm upon scientific principles, and with a view of making the most of his opportunities, will certainly not put his corn on the market to sell it as such; he will convert it into pork and beef and in that form sell it. There is no doubt whatever, as to what my hon. friend from North Essex (Mr. McGregor) says: That the duty on corn might furnish a lever to the Government in case they were negotiating with the United States and they could say: If you will take the duty off barley we will take the duty off corn; but my impression is Mr. Chairman, that the reduction of the American duties, or changes in the American tariff, will never be brought about in that way. The Government in 1878 told the people of this country, that it was in this manner that it would bring Congress to its knees and force Congress to give to the people of this country a reciprocity treaty. Fifteen years have gone by and that resolution has accomplished nothing. If we had retained our revenue tariff; if we could have shown the American people that we could prosper under a low system of taxation in spite of all the impediments they put in our way; we would have done more to break down the delusive and illusive theory which they have adopted, and which hon. gentlemen opposite have copied, than could have been done in any other way. There is no way in my opinion in which we would do so much to promote commerce on this continent, and a healthy competitive industry among our population, as by throwing each man on his own resources, and by showing to our neighbours across the border that it is possible to prosper under a free system, no matter what impediments may be offered.

On subsection 9,

That any person who, without lawful excuse, the proof of which shall be on the person accused, sends or brings into Canada, or who, being in Canada, has in his possession, any bill-heading or other paper appearing to be a heading or blank capable of being filled up and used as an invoice, and bearing any certificate purporting to show, or which may be used to show, that the invoice which may be made from such bill-heading or blank is correct or authentic, is guilty of a misdemeanour and liable to a penalty of five hundred dollars, and to imprisonment for a term not exceeding twelve months, in the discretion of the court, and the goods entered under any invoice made from any such bill-heading or blank shall be forfeited.

Mr. MARTIN. I would ask the Minister of Justice if this change is found in the Criminal Code?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. No.

Mr. MARTIN. I would suggest to the Minister that it should also be there. The system is often adopted of having the same clause in different statutes. The hon. Minister has prepared a criminal code which is supposed popularly to contain all the criminal law of Canada, and I would suggest that it would be very advisable that it should really contain all the law. This, of course, is a serious crime, and it is intended to be dealt with as such, and a lawyer looking to see if such a crime existed in the statutes would naturally look to the Criminal Code, and not finding it there he might easily be led astray. I would suggest to the hon. gentleman the advisability of including it in the code.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I will look at that, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) No one would ever suppose that a clause of this kind would be found in this Act. It seems to me that it is entirely out of place, and that it is more applicable to the Customs Act than to an Act regulating the duties of Customs.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Nearly all the sections we have been passing belong really to the Customs Act.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Yes, and this one more particularly than the others.

On subsection 10,

That the export of deer, wild turkeys, quail, partridge, prairie fowl and woodcock in the carcase or parts thereof, is hereby declared unlawful and prohibited; and any person exporting or attempting to export any such article shall for each such offence, incur a penalty of one hundred dollars, and the article so attempted to be exported shall be forfeited, and may, on reasonable cause of suspicion of intention to export the same, be seized by any officer of the Customs, and, if such intention is proved, shall be dealt with as for breach of the Customs laws; Provided, that this section shall not apply to the export, under such regulations as are made by the Governor in Council, of any carcase or part thereof of any deer raised or bred by any person, company or association of persons upon his or their own lands.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Why put in these words. "under such regulations as are made by the Governor in Council"?

Mr. FOSTER. There must be some regulation.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. It is only to guard against abuse.

On subsection 11.

That regulations respecting the manner in which molasses and syrups shall be sampled and tested for the purpose of determining the classes to which they belong with reference to the duty chargeable thereon shall be made by the Controller of Customs; and the instruments and appliances necessary for such determination shall be designated by him and supplied to such officers as are by him charged with the duty of sampling and testing such molasses and syrups; and the decision of any officer (to whom is so assigned the testing of such articles) as to the duties to which they are subject under the tariff shall be final and conclusive, unless upon appeal to the Commissioner of Customs within thirty days of the rendering of such decision, such decision is, with the approval of the Controller, changed; and the decision of the Commissioner with such approval shall be final.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Do you want that power under the new Act?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). These regulations ought to be made and submitted to us. While you are authorized or required to publish the Orders in Council, you are not required to publish the regulations. How are we to know what the laws are?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. We will include that in the amendment.

Mr. WALLACE. The regulations or rulings of the Department of Customs are always printed and sent to every collector.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The public ought to know.

Mr. WALLACE. We furnish them also to every Board of Trade.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). That is not enough. They should be as widely known as the statutes themselves, where the regulations are to be the law of procedure, as they are here.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Under the new regulations, syrups are to be of a uniform price. Where would the testing come in? Where is the necessity for power to test syrups? How do you test now as between what you would pronounce molasses, and syrup? Syrups of all kinds are here mentioned. It does not matter what tests you apply to them as long as they are syrups.

but you are taking power here to test syrup as well as molasses. Of course, as to molasses, you describe that the test shall be by polariscope.

Mr. WALLACE. It applies to molasses more than to syrup. It is not needed for syrup.

2. Resolved, That it is expedient to cancel all Orders in Council and all departmental regulations contrary to or inconsistent with any of the provisions of the foregoing resolution or of the schedule thereto.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Would it not be better to make that read, "all Orders in Council and all departmental regulations under subsection" so-and-so of the Customs Act, because it does not follow that Orders in Council are necessarily inconsistent. There may be some difficulty in saying whether they are inconsistent or not; we want to put the matter at rest. You might say all Orders in Council, or all regulations made pursuant to the Customs Act, or any section of the Act, stating what section they are made under.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. We will come back to that resolution.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Would that repeal the Order in Council that the leader of the Opposition read this afternoon, such as the one referring to the Welland Vale establishment?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Yes.

Committee rose and reported progress.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and the House adjourned at 10.15 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, 16th April, 1894.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

REPRESENTATION OF GLOUCESTER.

Mr. SPEAKER. I have the honour to inform the House that I have received a notification of a vacancy having occurred in the representation of the Electoral District of Gloucester, N.B., by the appointment of Kennedy F. Burns, Esquire, to the Senate of the Dominion of Canada. In conformity with chapter 13, section 8, of the Revised Statutes, I have issued my warrant to the

Mr. PATERSON (Brant).

Clerk of the Crown in Chancery to make out a new writ of election for the said electoral district.

N. W. T. ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. DAVIN moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 86) further to amend the Act respecting the North-west Territories.

Mr. LAURIER. Explain.

Mr. DAVIN. The first clause of the Bill provides that the judge who has tried a case shall not sit in banco when the appeal is discussed. The second clause repeals sections 59 and 60, and the object is to get rid of the doubt as to the power of the court to fix the fees of registrars, sheriffs, counsel, and others. The third section repeals section 64, and substitutes a clause identical with it, but with an addition providing a form of oath for magistrates to take. There is no form of oath provided at present by statute.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READINGS.

Bill (No. 20) respecting the Wood Mountain and Qu'Appelle Railway Company.—(Mr. McDonald, East Assiniboia.)

Bill (No. 25) respecting the Canada and Michigan Tunnel Company.—(Mr. Montague.)

Bill (No. 29) to again revive and further amend the Act to incorporate the Lindsay, Bobcaygeon and Pontypool Railway Company.—(Mr. Fairbairn.)

NEWFOUNDLAND FISHING LICENSES.

Mr. KAULBACH asked, Has the Government received any information regarding the suits instituted through the Department of Justice to recover the license fees exacted by the Government of Newfoundland from Canadian fishermen during the seasons of 1890-91? If so, and favourable, when may the fishermen expect their claims to be settled?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. A test suit was entered at the instance of the Dominion Government on behalf of the fishermen to recover the license fees exacted by the Government of Newfoundland from Canadian fishermen during one of the seasons mentioned, and the right of the plaintiff to recover was upheld by the decision of the Supreme Court of Newfoundland. Under these circumstances it is expected that the claims of the fishermen will be settled without much further delay.

Mr. KAULBACH asked, Has the Government requested the fishermen of the Maritime Provinces, through the Customs officials of their respective ports, to file their claims for refund of the license fee exacted from them by the Newfoundland Government during the seasons of 1890-91 ?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. That request was made some time ago.

GEOLOGICAL SURVEY OF LUNENBURG COUNTY.

Mr. KAULBACH asked, Is it the intention of the Government to authorize a geological survey of the county of Lunenburg, N.S., during the coming season, recent prospecting having given evidence of the existence of coal and iron deposits ?

Mr. DALY. There are no coal deposits in Lunenburg County. There may be some of iron ore. The Government survey has been in progress for some years in the southwestern counties of Nova Scotia, and it is proposed to continue the survey next year into Lunenburg County. Partial examinations over the greater part of the county have already been made in previous years by Dr. Selwyn and other members of the survey.

FISH EXPORTS TO CUBA AND PORTO RICO.

Mr. KAULBACH asked, Is the Government aware that, owing to the operation of the Norway-Spanish Treaty which came into effect the first of this year, Canadian exporters of fish are being placed at a serious disadvantage in the markets of Cuba and Porto Rico ? Is it the intention of the Government to make further treaty arrangements with Spain which will retain those markets to Canadian fishermen ? Failing this, is it the intention of the Government to allow an export bounty on all fish shipped to these islands sufficient to enable them to retain the market ?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The subject of negotiations with regard to arrangements in view of the conditions of those markets is under consideration.

MONTREAL STREET LETTER BOX CONTRACT.

Mr. McMULLEN asked, Does Patrick Kennedy, member of the Legislative Assembly of the province of Quebec, hold a contract from the Dominion Government for the collection of mail matter from the letter boxes, Montreal ? When was the contract entered into ? Were tenders asked ? Was his the lowest tender ? Has the contract been awarded the lowest tenderer ? If so, at what price, and what is the annual amount paid him for the services performed ?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The contractor for the street-letter box service in Montreal is Patrick Kennedy, master carter. The contract was entered into on the 1st of September, 1891. Tenders were not asked as Mr. Kennedy's previous contract was renewed for a further term. The amount paid last year for this service was $4,658.14.

FITZROY-GALETTA MAIL SERVICE.

Mr. McMULLEN asked, Whether a contract has been entered into for carrying the mails from Fitzroy to Galetta ? Were tenders asked for by advertisement ? How many tenders were sent in ? The name and amount asked by each tenderer ? Which of the tenders was accepted ? If the lowest was not accepted, why not ?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. A contract has been made for the service between Fitzroy and Galetta. Tenders were invited by advertisement. Three tenders were received : H. Kedey, $148 ; J. McMillan, $150 ; and W. A. Sheriff, $160. The lowest tender was that of Mr. Kedey.

Mr. McMULLEN. Was it accepted ?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Certainly.

Mr. W. H. CLUFF.

Mr. DEVLIN (for Mr. Campbell) asked, Has Mr. W. H. Cluff, alderman of the city of Ottawa, ever been employed at the post office in Ottawa ? If so, when was he appointed, and has he been dismissed ? If so, for what reason was he dismissed ?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Mr. Cluff was in the private service of the postmaster of Ottawa for many years, and remained in the service of the department when the Ottawa post office was made a city or staff office on the 1st of July, 1867. Mr. Cluff resigned on the 19th of November, 1869.

MONTREAL DRILL HALL.

Mr. ROBILLARD (for Mr. Lépine) asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to cause the drill hall at Montreal to be paved this year ?

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron). The matter is under consideration, and will be dealt with when the Supplementary Estimates are brought down.

RETURNS ORDERED.

1. Copy of Order in Council appointing Théophile Sabourin fishery overseer for the Division of the Lake of Two Mountains and Isle Perrot ; 2. Of the Order in Council appointing Julien Monpetit fishery overseer for the same division ; 3. Of all instructions and orders issued by the Fisheries Department to the said overseers. 4. Of the reports of the two said overseers for the years 1891, 1892.—(Mr. Harwood.)

Copies of report of engineer who inspected Rives aux Roseaux, River aux Rats and River La Seine, in the Electoral District of Provencher.—(Mr. LaRivière.)

Return showing the amount of money that has been paid out of the funds of the Six Nation Indians for the payment of debts incurred by individual members thereof since the year 1886, and giving (1st) The names of the several persons who incurred the debts with the separate amounts, the date or dates when incurred, and the proportion thereof that has been paid; (2nd) The names of the creditors to whom the payments were made, the dates when paid, with the total sum paid to each of such creditors; and stating in each case the authority given for incurring the debt, the authority for payment of the same, and whether such amounts have been repaid to the fund in whole or in part out of the annuities of the individuals on whose account the payments were made, and whether such was the condition on which such payments were authorized.—(Mr. Paterson, Brant.)

Copies of all Orders in Council in force in Canada (provinces of Lower Canada and Upper Canada) in 1858, concerning any drawback or bounty with respect to the building of Canadian ships, barques and other vessels; and also all Orders in Council amending the same, or concerning the same from 1858 up to the beginning of the Confederation.—(Mr. Amyot.)

Return showing: 1. The names of all officials employed in connection with the Canadian exhibit at the Columbian Exposition held in Chicago last year, together with the salary paid to each and the term of service of each in connection with the said exhibit, and the province to which each of said officials or employees belonged. 2. The total sum paid to officials and employees in connection with the Canadian exhibit at the Columbian Exposition. 3. The total amount of travelling expenses allowed to officials and employees connected with the Canadian exhibit. 4. The cost of buildings erected for and in connection with the Canadian exhibit. 5. Amount of incidental expenses and cost of maintenance of the Canadian department of the Columbian Exposition not included in the above divisions or items. 6. The total cost incurred in connection with the Canadian exhibit at the Columbian Exposition.—(Mr. Charlton.)

Copies of all Orders in Council, departmental orders or other authority by which drawbacks or rebates or specific sums in lieu thereof, have been granted under subsection M, section 245 of the Customs Act.—(Mr. Casey.)

Copies of all advertisements inviting tenders for the construction of sections 1 and 2 of the Soulanges Canal; also copies of specifications connected with said work, copies of extensions of said specifications and tenders with estimated quantities and work to be done according to engineer's estimate; also, copies of all tenders, copies of contracts let, of correspondence which took place between the contractors tendering for this work and the contractor to whom the contracts were awarded and the Department of Railways and Canals in the matter, copies of all reports of engineers since the letting of the contract.—(Mr. Tarte.)

• Return of the receipts and expenditures to dates of 10th April, 1894, and 10th April, 1893.—(Sir Richard Cartwright.)

Mr. PATTERSON (Huron).

HALF-BREED LAND GRANTS IN MANITOBA.

Mr. MARTIN moved for:

Return showing all lands allotted to half-breeds in Manitoba for which patents have not been issued, giving along with a description of the land, the name of the allottee and the reasons why the patent has not been issued.

He said: Mr. Speaker, when this motion came up before, the First Minister stated that the return asked for would cost some thousands of dollars to prepare. I think the hon. Minister's information with regard to that point is entirely astray; I cannot see how the return can possibly cost more than perhaps ten or twelve dollars. Of course, I do not know where the hon. gentleman got his information on the subject, but, presumably, he got it from the hon. Minister of the Interior. If the Minister of the Interior states that the return asked for in this motion would cost thousands of dollars, or a thousand dollars, or even a hundred dollars, I must say the hon. Minister can know very little about the department over which he presides. The object of the motion, I may say, is to get information as to the land undisposed of which was granted by Act of Parliament to the half-breeds of the province of Manitoba. The House will remember that when Manitoba came into Confederation, the half-breeds of that province were unsettled. There had previously been a great deal of trouble among them which had come among the French half-breeds, at least, to the point of incipient rebellion. The half-breeds were settled with on the basis of a grant of land. A commission was appointed which investigated and judged individually the claims of individuals to the grant. Each half-breed was entitled to 240 acres of land. The commission sat, claims were disposed of, and the land allotted. Over twenty years have elapsed since then, Mr. Speaker, and, naturally, in the course of time, the bulk of this land has been patented, either to the allottees or their assignees. There is, however, a very considerable portion of the land which has never been disposed of under these half-breed grants. It is mainly for the purpose of getting information with regard to the quantity of this land remaining undisposed of that I move this motion. Another object is to bring to the attention of the House the conduct of the Department of the Interior in connection with these grants. I may say, at the outset, that it is patent to every one who has anything to do with this matter, that the granting of this large tract of land to these half-breeds was a very great error of judgment on the part of the Dominion. However, that is past, and gone, and there is no particular object in discussing it now. What any one who is at all conversant with the circumstances might have known would come to pass, has come to pass in this case. Instead of this land being an advantage to the half-breeds and of being made a home for them, in almost every case the only advantage of the grant has been derived by speculators who purchased the land, or the right to the land, from the half-breeds, these purchases having been made for very small sums of money. I fancy there is scarcely a case in which the half-breed or his family are actually resident on the land that was granted to him, presumably for that purpose. However, the object I had more particularly in mind in bringing the matter before this House, is this: There is a considerable quantity of this land which is undisposed of, and lying unused, to the great disadvantage of the province at large, and to the advantage of no one in particular; and I claim that, for this state of affairs, the administration of this land grant by the Department of the Interior is entirely to blame. It was provided by statute of Manitoba that these lands could not be taxed until the half-breeds had attained the age of eighteen years. But, of course, as the date at which the half-breeds were entitled to land was the 15th of July, 1870, since which time almost twenty-four years have elapsed, all those who were entitled to participate in this grant, have passed the age of eighteen years, and therefore, for the past five or six years, all the land has been subject to taxation. I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that a very considerable portion of these lands are of no great value. Especially by reason of the depression that now exists and has existed for several years in the value of all kinds of lands in the province of Manitoba, it has naturally happened that very many of these parcels have been sold for taxes. Now, it is certainly not a proper course for the Department of the Interior or for the Dominion Parliament, or its executors to work in such a way as to hamper the provincial authorities in the administration of any law that they may properly pass for provincial purposes. And it is assumed by the legislation of all the provinces of Canada that it is necessary, in order to protect the municipalities in the collection of taxes levied by them to provide that lands may be sold for taxes; and, that, as I say, has been done with regard to a number of these parcels of half-breed lands. Now, Mr. Speaker, the Department of the Interior takes this stand—they say they will not recognize a tax-sale deed. I may say that they are not asked to recognize a tax-sale deed, but what they are asked to do, and what they are expected to do in connection with these grants is to deal with the matter and dispose of it so far as they are concerned. As it is now, the fee still remaining in the Dominion Government, although the right to the land has passed away from the Dominion Government and is vested in the person to whom each parcel has been located, the fact that the Department of the Interior refuses to issue the patent to any person whatever, keeps the title in a state in which it cannot be dealt with. I say that is very detrimental to the interest of the province at large, it prevents the municipalities from collecting their taxes from those lands, it prevents them from being occupied by settlers, and they lie there a waste tract. I ask the Minister of the Interior to explain to this House what advantage it is to Canada to decline to deal with this subject, what advantage it is to the Dominion of Canada to say: We refuse to deal with these matters, we refuse to issue patents to these lands. I may say that in some instances the department claims that the patentee is dead, that they do not know anything about his whereabouts. Well, if the department has information that the half-breed is dead, it is a very simple thing indeed to issue the patent to the legal representative of the half-breed, as has been done in hundreds of cases already. I think, in 1876, in the time of the Mackenzie Government, an Order in Council was passed with regard to these lands with the object of preventing speculation in the land. That Order in Council provided that a patent was not to be issued to the assignee, but that the patent was to be issued to the original half-breed. The Department of Interior have interpreted that Order in Council to extend very much further than it was ever intended to go, or than its terms will bear. They have held that they will refuse to issue a patent to a half-breed unless they get a request from that half-breed for the issue of the patent. Well, the House can easily see that where the half-breed has disposed of his land, he will not make any request to the department for the issue of the patent unless he is paid again for that request. That is the very natural position that the half-breed has taken with regard to this matter, and thus the action of the department has had the effect of creating a great deal of annoyance to those persons who have paid for the land, who have purchased from the half-breeds, for, generally speaking, the transfers have been very numerous, perhaps eight or ten, the last purchaser having had no knowledge as to the original dealings with the half-breed, and being simply dependent upon the chain of title as it existed in the registry office. But after having paid his money, and done everything that his legal adviser would suggest, when he desires to perfect his title and is ready to take possession of the land and settle upon it, he finds himself blocked by the action of the department, who take the stand that they will not issue the patent to this assignee because the original half-breed has not asked for it. I may say that I brought this question myself before the Department of Interior. The matter was referred to the Department of Justice, and the Department of Justice had no hesitation whatever in overruling the action of the Department of the Interior with regard to the stand they had taken. But I am sorry to say, that in spite of that precedent the Department of the Interior have gone on in their old course of refusing to issue these patents. Not only have they done that, but they have adopted the course to which I have also alluded, of refusing to issue patents where the lands have been sold for taxes. Now, Mr. Speaker, we claim in Manitoba that the department should issue the patent. They do not own the land, they are not even trustees of the land; as a matter of law the title has entirely passed out of their hands by Act of Parliament, and it is their duty to issue these patents either to the original half-breed, or, if that half-breed be dead, then to his legal representatives or to the assignee of the half-breed. We do not care to whom the department issue the patent as long as it is not issued, as I am sorry to say it has been in a number of cases, to some person who has no shadow of claim or title to it whatever. If they do not adopt that course, but if they are careful to issue the patent to some one who either is now, or has been at some time, entitled to the land, then the laws of Manitoba are quite sufficient to deal with the land after that. But the course they are taking now has the effect, as I say, of tying up considerable portions of land in the province of Manitoba, and preventing the settlers from taking possession of those lands and cultivating them and making improvements, for fear their title might never be recognized by the department. They are preventing municipalities from collecting the taxes, and you can see how harshly their policy works in some cases. As you are aware, one of the great difficulties in Manitoba is the question of schools. Settlement is so scattered there that in many portions of the province it is a very difficult thing indeed to collect enough money to run a school. Then when the department comes in and holds up eight or ten sections in a particular school district by refusing to issue a title, they make it practically impossible for the settler to get a school, and in that way they much discourage settlement in that province. I may say that the facts which I am now bringing before the House with regard to the treatment of that province by the Department of the Interior, are only a sample of the manner in which that department has administered the public lands in the province of Manitoba. They have been administered in what I may call an official way. The department lay down a particular rule; they do not know themselves why, or for what reason, they have adopted that particular rule, but having once adopted it, no consideration of public policy, no arguments however strong, seem to have the slightest effect upon them. They have taken a particular stand, and no matter how much that stand may be against the interest of the settler, no matter how prejudicial it may be to the interest of the province, they rigidly adhere to it in spite of all argument. For that reason I have laid this matter before the House. It is perhaps not a matter of very wide importance, but so far as it affects particular neighbourhoods, and especially those neighbourhoods which lie along the Assinibola River and the Red River in the province of Manitoba, it is a matter of considerable importance. I am quite satisfied that the Minister of Justice has been entirely misled when he said the return would be an expensive one. I do not think a return, giving this information, could cost very much, when it is remembered that almost all these lands have been disposed of, and this return only refers to a small remnant of them, the House will see that it cannot possibly cost very much to give the information I ask for. I do not desire any detailed statement as to the reason why the patent has not been issued, but simply the name of locatee, the description of the land, and, in brief, the reason why the patent has not been issued, as, for instance, that it has not been applied for, or that the department does not know whether the half-breed is living, or any short reason of that kind.

Mr. DALY. In answer to the hon. gentleman, I may say that there is no objection to the return asked for being brought down. When the Minister of Justice stated the other day that it would cost thousands of dollars, he was speaking without knowledge of the actual facts, and the motion was allowed to stand in order to obtain the necessary information, and that I might be informed as to what was required. I find that even as it is, the preparation of the return will require the services of a clerk for the period of three weeks or a month, but in view of the fact that the information is required by hon. gentlemen opposite, there is no objection to the return being prepared. The hon. gentleman has made a great deal out of nothing. Only 229 claims remain unpatented, out of 6,000 claims for half-breed land, and so the House will understand that there is very little of which to complain. The hon. gentleman is not speaking on behalf of any settlers whatever. There are no settlers affected in this way, or in regard to any matter in connection with this question; but there are a number of speculators in Winnipeg who have tax-deeds for those lands, and they met me in Winnipeg and I discussed the matter with them, and I have been able to meet some of their requirements, and if the hon. gentleman had come to me, I could have told him that an Order in Council was passed in October of last year, which meets a number of their wants.

Mr. MARTIN. I was quite aware of the Order in Council.

Mr. DALY. As regards these tax sales, the Department of the Interior has acted on the advice of the Department of Justice, and acting on that advice, we refused to accept any tax-sale deeds. Of course, that advice may not be so good as the advice of the hon. gentleman, but as Minister of the Interior, I am bound to act on the advice of the Minister of Justice, who is the law officer of the Crown. As to the gratuitous statements of the hon. gentleman about the conduct of the Department of the Interior, I let them pass without reply. The administration of the Department of the Interior, so far as I am concerned, speaks for itself.

Motion agreed to.

TIMBER SALES FROM INDIAN RESERVES.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell) moved :

That in the opinion of this House, the sale of timber from any Indian reserve in any other manner than by public auction after due public notice, would be highly unsatisfactory to the country, and detrimental to the interests of the Indian bands having a beneficial interest therein.

He said : The Government are aware that difficulty occurred in one instance covered by the terms of the resolution, in which certain charges were preferred against a member of this House, that he acquired, through the instrumentality of the Department of the Interior, a few years ago, an Indian reservation at far less than its market value, and which he was able to sell at an advance of about $60,000. I believe the department has since that time acted upon the rule indicated in this resolution, a rule which, I think, is of very great importance to have clearly enunciated in Parliament, accepted by the Administration, and one from which it should be fully understood the Government will not depart. There are reservations in the province of Ontario upon which timber is found of very great value, and which should not be permitted to be acquired unless by public advertisement and sale at public auction. I think the rule is a sound one. I have no charge to make against the Administration in recent times with a view to supporting the rule, and I trust it is one that the Government are prepared to accept, for it is one that ought to be embodied in legislation, and strictly observed. The Administration, or at all events the Superintendent General of Indian Affairs, acts as trustee to the Indians, who are wards of the Government, and it is of very great importance that whatever rights or interests they possess in any reservation or any timber thereon should be strictly guarded against importunities of parties who may seek to acquire them in any other way than by sale at public auction, at which all parties who may desire to purchase may have an opportunity of offering what they consider fair remuneration for the timber. I trust the motion will not be opposed, but will be acquiesced in, and when the rule is so laid down, it will no doubt save the department trouble, and protect the interests of the Indians whose rights will be affected.

Mr. DALY. In answer to the hon. gentleman, I may state that, as he may be aware, as far back as September, 1888, by Order in Council, the sales of timber belonging to the Indians were prohibited except as follows :—

The berths or limits when surveyed and set off, and all new berths or limits in surveyed territory, shall be explored and valued, and then offered for sale by public auction at the upset price fixed by such valuation, at such time and place, and on such condition and by such officer, as the Superintendent General of Indian Affairs shall direct, by public notice for that purpose and shall be sold to the highest bidder for cash at the time of sale.

The regulations were amended by Order in Council dated November 10, as follows :—

Section 3. The berths or limits when surveyed and set off, and all new berths or limits in surveyed territory, shall be explored and valued, and then offered for sale by public auction at the upset price fixed by such valuation or by tender, at such time and on such conditions as the Superintendent General of Indian Affairs shall direct by public notice for that purpose ; but in the event of berths or limits being offered for sale by tender, the Superintendent General of Indian Affairs shall not be bound to accept the highest or any tender should he deem it in the interest of the Indians owning the timber to do otherwise.

The change that was made was to enable the department to sell by public competition, either at public sale or by tender. The reason for the change was that it was thought that it was in the interest of the Indians that we should have the two modes of dealing with the sale of their timber. In sales by public auction, only those who found themselves greatly interested would attend the locality at which the sale was to take place, and many people might be deterred from going on account of the difficulty and expense of reaching the place of sale. As a great deal of interest is taken by those interested in lumber in this country in purchasing what remains of the timber, it was thought that a better price could be obtained for the timber on Indian reserves by admitting of public competition by tender, as persons living at a long distance—not only from Ottawa, but from the reserve on which the timber was to be sold—would be enabled to make an offer for it. It was solely for that reason that the change was made. The Government would be agreeable to this motion passing if the hon. gentleman would allow the word "auction" to be struck out after the word "public," and the word "competition" inserted in its place.

Mr. CHARLTON. What length of time has the sale to be advertised ?

Mr. DALY. For a month, as far as I can understand, in the newspapers published in the locality where the reserve is situated. No sale has taken place for some time.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). It is just to prevent an arrangement like that which the hon. gentleman has mentioned as being provided for in the last Order in Council adopted, that I proposed this resolution. I think that it is not in the interests of the Indians that sales should be made by private tender at all. I think that the timber for lumbering purposes upon an Indian reserve should be sold in no other way than by public auction after proper advertising. I do not believe that an adequate price can be obtained in the way that the hon. gentleman suggests, and I am satisfied that it will always lead to suspicion, and that suspicion may, in many cases, even where the Minister himself may not be aware, prove to be well founded upon investigation. I have in my mind a reservation about which parties have written to me that many, many lumbermen have applied to the Indian chief with a view of having the timber on his reservation put upon the market, and the chief has declined to have that done. It seems to me that the proposal of the hon. gentleman to change the mode of selling the timber upon a reservation is one that is calculated to secure sales to private parties who may possess influence with officers of the department, and which would certainly not be in the interest of the Indian population. The experience of the Ontario Government shows that an adequate price can be obtained at a sale by public auction. Does the hon. gentleman suppose for a moment that in the case of a reservation containing $200,000 or $300,000 worth of timber parties interested would not be present to bid themselves or employ others capable of properly representing their interests to bid for them? It does seem to me that if the Indian Department is to have its affairs conducted without suspicion, and if the Indian interests are to be duly protected, then there ought to be no sale upon tender as the hon. gentleman suggests, and as his last Order in Council proposes. There is but one adequate and proper way of making a sale, and that is by proper advertisement and by public auction. The declaration on the part of this House—upon whom ultimately the responsibility rests—that these sales shall be made in no other way, will protect the department against importunities, and will protect the interests of the Indians against sacrifices such as those that took place a few years ago. Why, the hon. gentleman has before him what happened previous to the adoption of the Order in Council of 1888. He knows to what extent Indian interests were sacrificed in a sale that was made to certain parties in this city when they immediately parted with what the Government had sold to them at an advance of $60,000, money which should have gone to the Indians and not to the speculators. If the sales had been by public auction after due advertising there could be no ground of complaint; but a sale in any other way will certainly be a ground of suspicion always, and a just ground of complaint in many cases.

Mr. McNEILL. I dare say that what the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mills) has said, may in certain cases be very correct. But from personal knowledge in reference to Indian lands in my own constituency I can safely say that the rule he has laid down would not be universally applicable. I do not think it would work well in my own constituency for example. I know that some years ago we had an auction sale of Indian lands there, and the lands sold at that time brought a reasonable price; but there were a good many detached parcels of land which could not be disposed of by the plan of public auction.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I referred to the timber.

Mr. McNEILL. I am speaking of the timber also. There are small detached quantities of timber on rocky lands which are, so far as the lands are concerned, valueless. The timber is of considerable value to the settlers in that locality, but if these small parcels of timber which, sold sometimes for $60 or less were put up for public auction the cost of the sale would amount to more than the price realized. It is a very great benefit to the settlers to be able to purchase these small lots of timber upon these isolated rocky lands, and in this respect I do not believe that it would be at all possible for the system proposed by my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills) to be carried out.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. The object which the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) has in view would not be best served by the adoption of his resolution. His object is a very commendable one: it is to protect the rights of those for whom we are trustees in regard to valuable portions of their property; but experience has proved that a strict, hard and fast rule, that these properties shall only be disposed of by public auction, has led to the withdrawal of some of these properties from sale on account of our being convinced that a sacrifice would result if that course were persisted in. As regards the timber licenses of the Dominion—taking that as an illustration—experience has proved that in some cases the parties who will attend at an auction sale—if an auction sale must be resorted to—can in a very few minutes combine to prevent any competition at all. Cases have actually occurred in which the auctions went off entirely without the department being willing to effect a sale, and in which a liberal price was afterwards obtained through tenders being invited. I would not, therefore—and I hope the House will not—agree to this proposal to adopt any strict rule as regards either course. In some cases it may be very necessary to adopt the rule as regards public auction, and in other cases it would be much better to advertise liberally for tenders.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Would the hon. gentleman allow me to ask him a question? Does he think that in any one of the older settled provinces, from Manitoba eastward, there is a single Indian reservation having timber only fit for lumbering, that could not be best sold by public auction?

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. Yes, I do think so. I think it could be sold in some instances better by inviting tenders, and for the reason I have given, that in every case of the sale of timber lands by public auction there is at least the danger of a combination to prevent an increase of price by public competition.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The Ontario Government have managed to get very much more than the Indian Department in that way.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. I agree with the hon. gentleman this far, that, generally speaking, that is very much the best way of disposing of such properties; but we ought to have it in our power, without the instruction of the House to the contrary, to resort to the system of tender where we think there might be a combination, or where there is actually a combination, to prevent competition at the auction sale.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). That may be a reason for withdrawal.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. But the Indians may desire the sale to take place, and it may be to their advantage that it should take place. In that case, although I admit that it is a rare case, they should have the benefit of a sale by tender. Sale by tender has been found to defeat, utterly, the possibility of a combination, because tenderers come from abroad who would not attend an auction sale, or, if they did, they would be induced by those whose interest it was to get the lands at a low price, and divide them between them, to frustrate the sale by means of a combination. As the hon. gentleman declined to accept the proposition of my hon. colleague, I beg to move:

That all the words after "That" in the main motion be erased and the following inserted instead thereof: "in the opinion of this House, the sale of timber from any Indian reserve in any other manner than by public competition after due public notice, would be highly unsatisfactory to the country, and detrimental to the interests of the Indian bands having a beneficial interest therein."

Mr. LISTER. The objection raised by the hon. Minister of Justice is that if the department were bound to sell those limits by public auction, those who attended the auction might combine and thus prevent a larger sum being obtained than would otherwise be obtained. The difficulty he apprehends might be overcome by adopting the course pursued by the courts in regard to chancery sale of lands. An upset price is fixed, which is secret; a public auction is then called, and, if the bids are not equal to the upset price, the property is withdrawn from sale, and tenders are invited for the purchase of it. There is no doubt a great deal of truth in the statement made by the hon. member for Bothwell, that, in connection with these sales of timber on Indian lands, a great deal of suspicion has heretofore attached, perhaps not to the heads of the departments, but to those under the heads, as to their bona fides, so far as the Indians are concerned. The history of these matters, for ten years past, at all events, has proved that many valuable tracts of lands and timber limits belonging to the Indians throughout the North-west Territories and Manitoba, as well as in the province of Ontario, have been sold at merely nominal prices. The recognized figure for many years was $5 per square mile, whereas, in the province of Ontario, at any rate, timber limits have brought many hundreds of dollars per square mile. The sale of these timber limits became such a disgrace that in 1888 the Department of the Interior caused an Order in Council to be passed for the purpose of securing better prices for the limits to be sold thereafter. I am not aware that since that time any timber on Indian lands has been sold; but certainly, up to that time, the administration of the affairs of that department was scandalous in the extreme. The instance given by my hon. friend from Bothwell of one valuable timber limit being sold at the nominal price of $5 per square mile, and immediately after being disposed of by the purchasers at an advance of $60,000, and the fact that one of those interested in that transaction was a member of the House of Commons, lent additional strength to the charge that improper influences had been brought to bear on the officials of the department for the purpose of getting a fortune at a cost of almost nothing. Now, I think that if the plan adopted by the courts in the administration of trust property and estates which it is necessary for the courts to sell, were followed in this case, there could be no difficulty whatever. As my hon. friend says, there is no pressing necessity for the speedy sale of the lands, and, until the department are thoroughly satisfied that they are getting a price which the property is fairly worth, they are not bound to sell, and should not sell, in the interest of the wards of the Government. In the practical working of the sale by auction of timber limits, by the Provincial Government, no difficulties of the kind suggested by the hon. First Minister have ever arisen. The fact is that in all the sales, that have taken place in that province, at all events for the past eight or ten years, there has been the liveliest and keenest competition, and there is no question that the province receives, by means of public auction, the very highest prices obtainable for those limits. It is highly desirable, I think, in the interest of the Government, as well as in the interest of the Indians of the country, that there should be no suspicion whatever that the Indians are being robbed to the extent of one farthing, but every proceeding taken by the Government should show, beyond any peradventure, that they have done the very best they could in the interest of the Indians who are confided to their care.

Mr. DAVIN. I quite agree with my hon. and learned friend that it is highly desirable that no suspicion whatever should attach to the means by which these timber limits are disposed of. But I cannot agree with the reasoning of my hon. friend. He states that the best course would be to put these timber limits up at auction, and, if the department failed to get a satisfactory price by auction, then they should be withdrawn, and tenders invited.

Mr. LISTER. A reserve price should be put on them, after investigation by the Government.

Mr. DAVIN. I understood my hon. friend to say that a reserve price should be placed upon them. But what I point out is this, that having placed a reserve price and failed to get the reserve price at auction, he has recourse to tenders. Surely if we can get the adequate price, under the system of calling for tenders, which we cannot get by auction, the more logical course would be to call for tenders in the first instance.

Mr. LISTER. The courts do not think so.

Mr. DAVIN. The courts are not infallible. My hon. friend is well aware that, under orders of the courts, lands have been sold at ridiculously low figures. We have had in the North-west experience of the two systems. A few years ago, when Mr. Dewdney occupied the position of Minister of the Interior, the Passpasschase Reserve was put up for sale at auction. It is an exceedingly valuable reserve, south of Edmonton. A railway was about to pass through it, and a river—I am not sure whether there are not two rivers—passes through it. An auction was advertised, and the choicest lands on this Indian reserve, contiguous to a prospective railway, and close to a river, did not sell, if I remember rightly, for more than $5 an acre. At all events, the very highest figure was ridiculously short of what those choice sections should have fetched.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Lands or timber.

Mr. DAVIN. I am speaking of lands, and am only referring to the method. We have the experience of those men who have been accustomed, in the North-west, to supply the Government with supplies for the Mounted Police and Indians. What is their experience of the tender system? I know men in the North-west who were very eager to supply the Indians and the Police, but who actually do not think it worth their while to tender, so low and so fine has the system of buying and selling by tender brought things. I see, therefore, no force whatever in the argument of my hon. friend. In the first place, from the very nature of his argument, he stamps the system of selling these timber limits by tender as the better course, only he would have it the ultimate recourse. And in the second place, we know by experience in the sale of lands and other matters in the North-west how very effective the system of calling for tenders is.

Mr. LANGELIER. I can speak of the experience we have had of the two systems in the province of Quebec. Until 1872, the Commissioner of Crown Lands in that province was at liberty to dispose of timber lands by private sale. The result was that the finest timber limits of the province of Quebec were sold for a mere trifle. Some of the finest timber limits on the Gatineau and Ottawa rivers were sold as low as 50 cents a square mile, whereas to-day they could not be got for $100, and in some cases $1,000 a square mile. That system was the subject of a great fight between the Liberals and the Conservatives in that province. From confederation to 1872, the Liberal party were continually asking that the timber limits be sold at public auction, in order to give every one a chance, whether he supported or opposed the Government. The Conservative party resisted this movement to the last moment; but, at last, after the scandals of 1872, even the Conservative party had to give in and submit a law to the Quebec Legislature compelling the Commissioner of Crown Lands to sell timber limits at public auction. It was proved successfully that over a million dollars public money had been lost through the disposal of timber limits at private sale. It was found out that some of the Cabinet Ministers were interested in some of the finest timber limits that had been sold—not in their own names, of course, but in the names of other parties with whom they were in partnership. Since the system of public auction has been followed, we have never heard a word of complaint, nor has there been the slightest inconvenience experienced. I was Commissioner of Crown Lands myself in the province of Quebec for a year. During that time we sold public lands, and never had the slightest trouble in discovering whether there was a combine among the parties attending the sale. In the first place, before the sale is made, the Commissioner of Crown Lands sends an inspector to visit the lands or timber and fix an upset price. No bid under that price is accepted. And even then, if it be found that there are combinations among the parties attending the sale, the Commissioner has the power to withdraw the lots. In one case, some two years ago, he withdrew half the lots put up for auction on this account. I do not see why we should follow here the old system too long followed in the province of Quebec, and which was the cause of our finest timber limits being sacrificed to favourites of the Government.

Mr. CASEY. It seems extremely absurd to speak of sale by tender as being sale by public competition. There is no publicity at all about a sale by tender except the advertisements calling for the tenders. There can be no public competition unless one of the parties to the competition knows what the other is doing. That is the only kind of public competition there can be, and to speak of a sale of timber by tender as being carried on by public competition is a thoroughly improper use of language and conveys an idea of what does not really exist. Now, Sir, my friend the Minister of the Interior made two very inconsistent statements. He said that he was afraid enough people could not be got to attend an auction because they would not come from a distance. And, when asked about advertisements for tenders, he said that they were published in the locality of the reserve.

Mr. DALY. Not at all; I said nothing of the kind. The hon. gentleman asked how many times they were inserted.

Mr. CASEY. I heard the hon. gentleman say that some advertisement was published in the neighbourhood of the reservation.

Mr. DALY. No; the hon. gentleman did not understand me. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) asked me how long the advertisements appeared and where. That was as to public auction, because we have had no occasion, up to the present time, to advertise for tenders.

Mr. CASEY. Then, these advertisements for public auction were inserted in papers near the reservations. No wonder, under these circumstances, that people would not come from a distance—they did not see the advertisements. The Minister of Justice says that, even if purchasers did come to the public auction, they might combine and agree not to go above a certain figure. A remedy for that has been pointed out, a remedy that exists in every auction—simply to withdraw the timber from sale. Let it be understood in advance, that, if any combination can be traced, the timber will not be sold. If this is done, the combination must break, for these men are very anxious to get the timber, and, if the backbone of the Government is sufficiently strong to cause them to withdraw the limit from sale until a sufficient price to fairly represent the value is offered, the combination must break at once. It has been proved in evidence before this House that even tenderers may combine. We have had tenders put in by persons who were in collusion with one another, some of the tenders being put in in the name of purely imaginary persons. This was in connection with public works. Why cannot the same collusion as between existing persons and as regarding imaginary persons, the same hallucination, be used in the purchase of timber? It would seem that hon. gentlemen opposite are so used to seeing that sort of thing done that they have grown to look upon it as an evil—if it be an evil in their eyes—which cannot be got rid of. The great argument, the strongest argument in favour of sale by public auction is the experience of the province of Ontario, coupled with that of the province of Quebec, which has just been given by my friend from that province (Mr. Langelier), who preceded me. The Government of Ontario have adopted the principle of full investigation beforehand and of exercising their full powers of reserve bids and withdrawal from sale. The record of their sales has been one of constantly increasing prices, and the prices they have obtained within the last twenty years are far in excess of any obtained by this Government for any timber they have sold. The lumbermen of the country are all aware of the value of existing tracts of timber on Indian reservations. If not, they will undoubtedly make themselves aware of their value intimately and in detail, if they get notice that those limits are to be sold. And, if they will take the trouble to either go themselves or to send an efficient person to inspect these limits, they will come or send an efficient person to represent them at the auction. On these two grounds, therefore, I must declare my adherence to the terms of the original motion, as embodying the only system of selling timber lands which can be looked upon as honest and free from collusion, and as calculated to obtain the highest price for the property offered.

Mr. BRYSON. Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to enter into any lengthened discussion of this question, but merely to express, as briefly as possible, the views I hold as the result of my own experience and observation with regard to the sale of timber berths. The hon. member who introduced this motion, states that all limits belonging to the Indian reserves should be sold by public auction. Well, Sir, there is a great deal to be said in behalf of their being offered for sale by public auction; but, in my humble judgment, the proper way is to offer them by public competition, and my reasons for saying so are these: Within the last few months we have had timber limits offered for sale by public auction in this city. A very large number of lumbermen were present. In the case of one or two berths that were offered for sale, they were knocked down to the highest bidder, but the supposed buyer afterwards refused to take them. Then they were offered to the second bidder, who declined to take them. The result was that two of these berths were put up twice, and, as a matter of fact, did not realize, within several thousands of dollars, what they were knocked down for in the first place. The statement has been made that the Provincial Government of Ontario sell their timber lands by public auction. It might be stated, with equal truth, that the province has sold timber berths by tender. In the province of Ontario, within the last few years, certain timber lands that were partially burned, have been thus sold. When fires occurred in the spring of the year, they were advertised during the summer, and an upset price fixed of so much per thousand feet over and above the Crown dues. It has been found by the Government of Ontario, I understand, to be a good method to fix a certain period within which the burned timber must be removed; and, on certain occasions, to my own knowledge, this term has been extended from time to time. Where it is advertised that only one or two years shall be allowed for the removal of the standing timber in the burnt district, the fact may debar certain persons from competing, particularly when they find that friends of the Government are allowed an extension of the time for three, or four, or five years. I recollect a timber sale in the province of Ontario, where certain berths were sold, and the following day, when the money was to be paid, the purchaser was not in a position to meet the requirements, and the berth was thrown back on the hands of the Government. Let me state, also, what I know of the experience of the province of Quebec. The hon. gentleman who has been Commissioner of Crown Lands for that province (Mr. Langelier), has told you how admirably the system has worked. I quite agree that during his term it may have worked very well. But I would ask him to reflect what was the result of the sale a few years ago, when several members of Parliament and others formed a combine and purchased a large number of timber berths at Grand Lake Victoria. These berths were thrown back on the hands of the Government, showing that there had been unfair competition against the lumbermen, that those in the combine had outbid the lumbermen. The result was that a year ago last December these berths were again advertised for sale; and, as a matter of fact, some were sold for a little over one-eighth of what they had originally been sold for. I believe that a fair, honest and legitimate way is to offer the limits by public competition, and, if by public auction, with a reserve bid in the hands of the Minister, after having first explored the territory and having sent a practical man, in whom the country has confidence, to make a proper estimate of the value of the limit. Then let the Government place a value on the standing timber, reserving the Crown dues and stumpage upon this timber, and holding this reserve within their hands privately. If the tenders by public competition are not up to what the Government expect to receive, then they can decline to sell, because they are not bound to accept any tender unless they know that they are actually receiving the value of the timber according to the estimate in the hands of the Government. I have no hesitation in voting with the leader of the Government for his amendment, that the limits should be sold by public competition, for, from my own personal knowledge and observation, I believe that a much larger sum of money will be realized from a timber berth by that system than by any other that can be adopted.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I think it is a pity that the First Minister should not accede to the proposition of the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills). I think the difficulties he anticipated have been shown not to exist by hon. gentlemen who have spoken from this side. His difficulty seems to be that there might be collusion on the part of the buyers at a public auction, a combination formed, and that the full value would not be realized; but I think it has been pointed out that the same danger would exist in asking for tenders. It is true they might ask for tenders and not be bound to accept the lowest or any tender. But if sold by public auction, why should not the values be ascertained by the Government in the first place, and then, if they found the offers did not come up to that point, they need not necessarily press the sale at that particular time.

Sir JOHN THOMPSON: Then you do not sell. The object is to effect a sale, and if you try both by auction and by tenders you are very likely to effect a sale.
