Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, it is the desire of the government, too, that all cases shall be heard before a proper court. The words the hon. member seeks to delete, "or a justice" are standard and found in many federal statutes. Clause 11, which the hon. member seeks to amend, confers territorial jurisdiction on a magistrate or justice of the peace to hear proceedings in respect of offences under a statute. If the proposed amendment to clause 11 carries, the resulting situation would be that only a magistrate would have jurisdiction to deal with offences under the act. As a practical matter, in most areas of Canada such offences would be tried by a magistrate, in any event. However, there are certain areas in the country where a magistrate with jurisdiction is not always available and a justice of the peace would be the only person who could hear proceedings. If clause 11 were amended and the jurisdiction of the justice of the peace deleted a situation could arise where no magistrate would be available to deal with offences under the act. It should be noted, in any case, that where a justice of the peace—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order, please. Is the hon. member rising on a point of order?

Mr. Gleave: Will the minister permit a question? In what areas of Canada would a magistrate not be available?

Mr. Olson: May I answer the question after I have finished my explanation as to why we need clause 11 the way it is. May I proceed from where I left off, Mr. Speaker? It should be noted that, in any case, where a justice of the peace deals with proceedings against an accused, the provisions of the Criminal Code respecting appeals from and review of such proceedings would be applicable to safeguard the rights of the accused. At the present time there is no indication that such provisions in existing acts are producing unjust or harmful effects. Therefore, the hon. gentleman here is asking us to change normal procedures. They are procedures which have their root in the Department of Justice. This is not the proper time for the hon. gentleman to bring forward his amendment. I do not question his right to try to move the amendment; nevertheless, since it seems that he is complaining about the way courts may handle offences, his remarks ought to be addressed to the Department of Justice. For those reasons, I cannot accept the amendment.

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): All those in favour of the amendment will please say, yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): All those opposed will please say, nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): In my opinion, the nays have it.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): On division.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): I declare the motion lost, on division.

Amendment (Mr. Gleave) negatived on division.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture) moved:

That Bill C-154, an act to prevent the introduction or spreading of pests injurious to plants, as reported (with an amendment) from the Standing Committee on Agriculture, on Wednesday, January 29, 1969 be concurred in.

Motion (for concurrence) agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): When shall this bill read the third time?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): At the next sitting of the house.

CRIMINAL CODE

The house resumed from Tuesday, February 11, consideration of the motion of Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton) that Bill C-150, to amend the Criminal Code, the Parole Act, the Penitentiary Act, the Prisons and Reformatories Act and to make certain consequential amendments to the Combines Investigation Act, the Customs Tariff and the National Defence Act, be read a second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I should like to know who pulled the fuse last night. It would have been easier for me to finish my speech last night. Still, I suppose there are sneaky people in all walks of life and they may not appreciate that what some take seriously is really a matter of philosophy.

Last night I spoke about abortion, endorsing the idea that later we shall put forward an amendment which would remove the abortion section from the Criminal Code. I support the idea for these reasons: I do not believe that three months after conception the foetus is alive in the sense of being a human being. During that period an abortion ought to be treated as any other medical problem is treated. A woman seeking an abortion ought to be viewed by a doctor as he would view a woman seeking to have her tonsils out. The decision to perform the abortion rests entirely with the medical practitioner, who may or may not be willing to perform it. Of course, he may or may not be willing to take a woman's tonsils out or to remove her appendix. That is entirely up to him. The doctor, of course, must decide whether the woman seeking an abortion has a medical problem.

I wonder where our medical practitioners have obtained statistics showing that in a population of 5 million people—I presume these are people with children—half a million abortions a year can be expected. There are those who, for religious reasons, do not think the abortion section should be removed from the Criminal Code. I suggest, if they are honest members of parliament, honest with themselves and the society they live in, they will concede that their religious convictions are forcing them into a position which is out of touch with the realities in our society and which, in the final analysis, contravenes the concepts of their religion. They have an obligation to give some consideration to this matter. If they do so, I believe many of them will eventually support the removal of the abortion section.

I also spoke about the problem of homosexuality, and said the government was making a sincere effort to remove from the Criminal Code the sections concerning homosexuality and substitute the right for two consenting adults to engage in homosexual practices. This is a step that has been taken by most modern societies. Our proposals stem from the Wolfenden report in England, and the legislation in that country based on that report has served it well.

I have been asked about some statistics I used. I hasten to say I may not have been misquoted but I certainly left the wrong impression if I said that ten per cent of the population in Ottawa is made up of homosexuals. I think some sections of our population might reach that level, and I leave it up to hon. members to ascertain for themselves where that might be. However, I would like to quote several statistics because the question has been asked, is this only true of Ottawa. I would like to quote from an article by a Toronto Telegram staff reporter, entitled "Society and the Homosexual". A lot of the information contained in it is based on evidence produced by Dr. K. G. Gray, professor of Forensic Psychiatry at the University of Toronto, one of the outstanding authorities in this field. The article begins:

> Indoors, outdoors and all around the town certain citizens live with an eye on the law and a mind on sexual practices that commit them to a shadow world.
> It's the world of the homosexual.
> The Toronto Forensic Clinic—to which psychiatric cases are referred by the courts—believes there are 15,000 active male homosexuals in the metropolitan area alone, plus another 150,000 who are latent or bi-sexual.
> This deviate population is swelled by 6,000 lesbians and 30,000 other women who live outwardly heterosexual lives but are sporadic or latent homosexuals.

This is a subject that deserves some consideration. Now, I wish to quote from another part of the article where, in reference to the John Howard Society, the author wrote:

> The society told me: Depending on the size of the prison, homosexuality can run anywhere from 80 to 40 per cent.

The homosexual problem in our prisons is a very large one. Over the years I have been making recommendations that prisoners be allowed conjugal visits with their wives and families. If we were not as backward looking in our society, this is a step that we would take. Countries like Mexico allow conjugal visits in prison, not as we might allow them in Canada on the basis of a reward, but as a right. There are few things a Mexican prisoner can do that will result in his losing that right.

The question is then asked, well, what do we do for single prisoners. This is something that would have to be considered seriously, but I have no objection to prostitutes being used in prisons if this does not offend their sensitivities. Society should do something to prevent people leaving prisons as latent homosexuals. Anyone who buries his head in the sand and says that nothing can be done to cope with this problem in prisons is not aware of the families that have suffered or the broken homes that have resulted after prisoners have been released.

At the very least we should have a system whereby prisoners are let out for weekends for a number of months before their sentence is up. In that way they can adjust to living with their families again. Just imagine the problem it is for a man to leave a prison after being a homosexual for ten years or even five years, and then have to live with his wife and family. These people are not homosexual in the true sense of the word. They are bi-sexual.

Any element of society closely contained within itself, such as boys' schools, seminaries, and the navy, where men are kept in constant close proximity, sees the development of many bi-sexuals. I think we should consider this problem and be far-sighted enough to try and solve it in our penitentiaries. Under these amendments to the Criminal Code provision is being made to eliminate some of the problems encountered by persons serving penitentiary sentences. I believe this is another problem that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) should consider as the proponent of a just society, particularly if he is really interested in reclaiming those who are not normal in our present society.

Earlier today somebody asked me, why do things happen such as happened in Montreal just yesterday. The simple answer is that these things happen now because a large number of people are not able to exercise their bent in other directions. The young people leading many of the violent rebellions nowadays are the same young people we pinned all the medals on 25 years ago. They are the ones who captured the trench when no one else was willing to put his head out. They are the ones who flew airplanes and shot down a number of hostile aircraft. These are the people with whom we are now having trouble.

While there are many things in this bill that are worthwhile, I repeat that there are many things not included in it. Last night I picked up the paper and read of 15 or 20 offences in the city of Toronto which the R.C.M.P. were prosecuting. These cases involved marijuana. Marijuana is not a narcotic. There was an awful fuss when it was first put on the world narcotic list because some countries did not believe it was a narcotic. But countries that produced cocaine and heroin said that if marijuana were not included, they would not sign the international accord.

Very little research has been done on marijuana. I would venture to say that in most cases it is not as dangerous as alcohol. It is less dangerous than L.S.D., and it is probably not much more dangerous than smoking tobacco. The world looks pretty grim until one has a first cigarette and then it looks better. I know some housewives who find that the world looks pretty bad in the morning. I will not say that they should be kicked out of bed, but I do know that sometimes it is very difficult to talk to them until they have that first cup of coffee. This is also a drug. Caffein is a very serious problem now. Anyone who has a heart condition knows the effect of caffein. Marijuana also has its effects; there is no question about that, but we have done very little work on this. Yet we have the R.C.M.P. chasing the high school kids. I am told that in some of the high schools 40 per cent or 50 per cent of the children use marijuana. I have discussed this with the kids, and I am not at all sure the percentage is that high. The children can tell you who is pushing it. Yet the R.C.M.P. run around and therefore the kids who otherwise would not touch it want to try it. I tried it years ago, and in my opinion it is a very bad smoke. It tastes terrible. It has a very bitter smell, and is not worth the price.

I am told that one must smoke marijuana for a while before it tastes better. It is pretty bad. It is worse than some of the brands of cigarettes I could name. The reason many kids are taking marijuana today is that the pushers are adding heroin to it. This is being done in my riding. The pushers give the kids the cigarette and sometimes these kids do become hooked on marijuana because of the additives. This is the field to which we should be paying attention. I am not suggesting how we should handle this. But I suggest that we allow the sale of marijuana at cost. I remember a few years ago when the Indians on a reservation decided to grow about 16 acres of marijuana. It took the Mounties two weeks to get rid of that with a scythe. I am not sure why the Indians grew it. Maybe they did not know what it was. Perhaps we should encourage some farmers to grow marijuana, purify it and sell it.

I think we should examine this whole subject. It is not good enough to continue following a report of 40 or 50 years ago when by some kind of agreement marijuana was included with narcotics. There are many things which should be written into this bill. In closing, I should like to suggest that members of the house continue to bring forward private members' bills. The government is not brave; it is the individual members who must be brave. I can think back to a bill I had drafted along the lines of the Wolfenden report on the matter of homosexuality. I had to wait until there was an atmosphere of public opinion about this matter before I could introduce that bill; otherwise I would have been crucified. That time never came. There was not an opportunity to consider it. I had no intention of introducing it without some feeling. It would be necessary to have public support and interest before such a bill could be introduced.

It is necessary that there be some kind of public attention or some kind of vehicle by which members can bring forward bills in the social field. I hope that private members will continue to bring forward their ideas on such matters as wiretapping, safety factors in respect of automobiles and so on. Sometimes these things in themselves are not popular but the situation changes when the matter is discussed by the news media. I give great credit to the news media for the work they have done over the years. I remember articles which have been published over the years, particularly by papers such as the Vancouver Sun. I remember the studies the Vancouver Sun made into the matter of conjugal visits to penitentiaries, and a great deal of money was spent to obtain reports in this field. This newspaper did a great deal of work in informing the people in its area about this matter.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order. I regret to advise the hon. member that his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Continue.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Does the hon. member have the unanimous consent of the house to continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to take up too much time. I should like to say that this matter of developing ideas is very important. I am sure every member in this house has a thought or an idea about something which he considers is not right in our society. In a just society, we must not depend on one man. His environment is somewhat limited, as is everyone's environment. I would hope that hon. members would bring forward new ideas and, if they are not dogmatic in their discussion of these ideas, very shortly the public will begin to collectively bring forward new ideas. After the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) has had time to consider the position of the amendments he has made, and the argument put forward by hon. members on all sides of the house, I am sure he will bring forward regularly and periodically new amendments to the Criminal Code that will eventually make Canada one of the foremost countries in the world in respect of our treatment of our people and the creation of a just society.

[Translation]

Mr. Henri Latulippe (Compton): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to speak on the bill under consideration.

Mr. Speaker, we have not seen a bill presented in such a bad way for a long time. As a matter of fact, it contains fifteen or so various clauses which should be studied separately. They were all thrown together in the same bag to make us pass as a package deal a most important piece of legislation, since it deals, inter alia, with abortion and lotteries.

Some hon. members object to abortion, while others agree to that part of the bill related to lotteries. It is therefore quite difficult to vote on a measure made up of such unrelated matters.

That is why I ask the minister concerned to divide the bill so that every hon. member may cast a free vote.

I ask for a free vote for all hon. members, because I know very well that some members of the government are not too favourable to the adoption of this bill and would like to vote according to their own conscience. We are asking it also in the interest of the people of Canada.

The bill now before us is of the utmost importance. Some of the subjects it deals with are very important because they are related to the very substance of the nation and because human rights are at stake.

When one wants to speak about a subject as complex and serious as divorce, one must be fully aware of the facts.

• (5:50 p.m.)

If we want to get a wholesome society, its components must be wholesome too.

In my opinion, on introducing a bill such as this one, unless we take into account the very essence of life or the technical or moral sense of the bill, we cannot take an outright and sincere decision.

Once more, the society that we advocate must be wholesome, and those who legislate must be well aware of it. However, the legislation that is being considered has a very great importance whatever some hon. members may say.

It seems as if some people think that this is not important, but the survival or the disappearance of society in general is at stake.

This is what our discussion is about and we have to come to a decision. We must speak our minds, according to our conscience in the light of our Christian moral principles.

Man needs a number of specific and concrete liberties which will give him the means of controlling his destiny. These are the freedom of action, freedom to go wherever he wants, not only within his country but abroad as well to live with his fellow human beings.

It is also the freedom of thought, of expression, of writing, of publishing, of assembly, of discussion with this fellow-men, of choice of school, occupation, place of abode, work and even of mate.

Anything that is imposed in these fields affects adversely human respect and brings into society a factor of disorder. The use of these freedoms is limited not in the use of freedom by somebody else, but by the obedience of all to a common rule: respect for man.

Among the nations, some are small, others are old, weak, powerful, wise or unruly. However, each one is entitled to respect, for in its own way, it is necessary to humanity.

As in the case of individuals, Mr. Speaker, each nation aspires to a comfortable life and to expansion according to its own vocation and characteristics. To govern is to provide, to think and to act. For the government of a nation, the necessary uniformity of thought and action cannot be realized by one mind. Under certain circumstances, the government of a nation could be the responsibility of one individual. On the other hand, the right to legislate is the responsibility of several individuals.

We are, at the present time, in the process of legislating and enacting legislation which will result in serious consequences for the future of society. Legislation is the result of a considerable number of actions and reactions between the requirements of the nation and those of its citizens. It involves lengthy studies, confrontations and syntheses which must be weighed and compared. Consequences of legislation must be foreseen and this necessitates team work. Our parliamentary team must adopt legislation, look forward to the future, take decisions and stimulate the development of the entire nation.

Enacting legislation is the responsibility of experts indeed, provided they are legal experts and professionals. Evidently, the legislative body is guided by those in professional and technical fields.

Legislation must be enacted according to characteristics of environment and must reflect the image of society. In fact, society is not only a consensus of lawyers; it represents all types of organizations. In short, it represents all the fields of activities or the whole of the concentrated bodies of the country.

In modern society, the state tends to regulate and govern everything. As a tidal wave, it is invading every field of public and private activities. It goes so far as to penetrate the minds in order to influence, to compel and to destroy them. It leads the way to paralyzing and stifling legislation.

May I call it six o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I should like to confirm the business of the house for tomorrow. It is our intention to call again the matter that we are dealing with at the moment, item 40, the omnibus Criminal Code bill. I think there is a general understanding that if this should reach a culmination tomorrow the house will not expect the Minister of Justice to reply but rather that he will make a statement to the committee and perhaps during the later stages of consideration in the house.

Let me also indicate to the house that on Friday, though this is subject to further confirmation, we will call item 25, Bill C-138, an act to amend the Bretton Woods Agreement which was reported today, the evidence on which I believe is now in the hands of hon. members.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

AGREEMENT TO HOUSE DEBATE ON FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 14

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I have made a proposal, and I believe there is general agreement, with it, that the house should have an opportunity tomorrow to discuss the federal-provincial conference which was held earlier this week. Accordingly, I want to propose, if the house is agreeable, that tomorrow under government orders the Prime Minister might move a motion that the house adjourn. My suggestion is that this motion would be debatable, that all speeches except those of the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition be limited to 20 minutes, that the private members hour be suspended and that unless the motion has been disposed of earlier it shall be deemed to have been adopted at 5 p.m. If the house is agreeable perhaps an order could be made to this effect.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): I do think this is a good idea, Mr. Speaker. While the government brass were away the house made very substantial progress, so that there is now very little work left on the order paper. We might have thought the government would require a week to defend its position and sort out its various stands, but we are prepared to go ahead with this debate tomorrow.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, it is correct that there was an agreement this morning as to the general principle of this proposal, but there is one detail in the actual motion which I hope the government house leader will agree to alter. I refer to the 20 minute limit in so far as it affects the first speakers of the third and fourth parties in the house. I hope the government house leader will agree that the first speaker of the two parties in this part of the house be granted 40 minutes, while the rest would be limited to 20 minutes.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I would be quite agreeable to that suggestion, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Is the proposal submitted to the house by the President of the Privy Council, subsequently amended as to the time to be allotted to those participating in the debate, concurred in?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: It is so ordered.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

TABLING OF I.L.O. RECOMMENDATION RESPECTING AGRICULTURAL WORKERS

Hon. Bryce S. Mackasey (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I should like to table a document in English and in French. Omitting the usual remarks that go with tabling of documents, I should like to describe the document. It contains a recommendation adopted by the conference of the I.L.O. at its 52nd session last year to continue recommendation 132 concerning the improvement of conditions of life and work of tenants, share-croppers and similar categories of agricultural workers.

• (2:10 p.m.)

I also table the document from the Department of Justice commenting on whether this recommendation falls entirely within the federal field, the provincial field, or partly in both fields.

Mr. Baldwin: Why didn't you put it on the agenda?

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

CANADIAN CONSTITUTION

REFERENCE TO COMMITTEE OF PROPOSALS FOR REVISION

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Prime Minister whether the government subjects which concern the powers of parliamentary committee to examine and discuss the proposals now being put forward for constitutional revision. I ask this question particularly in view of the fact that a number of subjects which concern the powers of parliament, the relationship between the houses of parliament, and the structure of government in Canada are now being actively discussed and it would seem appropriate to provide some mechanism for these matters to be discussed and examined in parliament.

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the government would be prepared to consider this request, although perhaps after tomorrow's debate we might have a better idea of the utility of setting up such a committee. I would be prepared to consider it then, perhaps with a view to setting specific subjects of constitutional relevance in front of a committee. Once again, I think it would be untimely to put the whole constitutional question before a committee, but I believe the Leader of the Opposition is suggesting certain governmental positions. We could take them one by one. I would not be averse to such an idea at this time, but I would prefer to make a decision after we have heard the debate tomorrow.

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I have one or two related questions to address to the right hon. Prime Minister. First, would the Prime Minister consider not only setting up a parliamentary committee here, but also discussing with the premiers and prime ministers of the provinces the desirability of having parliamentary committees across the country so that when the next constitutional conference is held the premiers will speak for all sides in their legislatures, and the Prime Minister will speak for all sides in this parliament. I am not suggesting he interfere with the provinces, but I am asking whether he would consult with them about this kind of procedure for the constitutional revision.

Mr. Diefenbaker: It is not a very good principle.

Mr. Trudeau: I think I am inclined to agree with the right hon. member for Prince Albert. I would hope that this question may be raised in the various legislatures across the country. I do not think I would venture to answer the question, but I can say that if we do set up a parliamentary committee it would I suppose, deal in part with subjects which are of provincial and federal interest; the question might then arise as to whether we are interfering in provincial affairs. I hope that this would not be the interpretation and that such a committee could, if necessary, travel across the country. It is a delicate subject and might require the kind of consultation which the leader of the New Democratic party is suggesting.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

SHARED-COST PROGRAMS—CONSULTATION WITH PROVINCES BEFORE WITHDRAWAL

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, with regard to the federal-provincial conference. I ask the question for greater clarification. In view of the representations made by the premiers and the comment made by the Prime Minister, is it correct to say that it is now the intention of the federal government not to make decisions regarding withdrawal from shared-cost programs without meaningful consultation and discussion with the provinces in advance? Would this be a fair statement of the government's position?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker. On this subject we have taken the view that if yesterday the federal government had undertaken to make any such clear-cut promises it would in effect have been amending the constitution, perhaps without the legal power to do so. We do not want to take the position that the federal government spending power could be limited just by a promise made by the Prime Minister of Canada to the assembled provincial premiers. Therefore the whole question of the spending power is open for debate. It is a very important aspect of the constitution, and we have repeatedly suggested that the premiers and the prime ministers of the provinces address themselves to this question. There will be an on-going study of the question of the spending power and whether it should be limited.

Mr. Stanfield: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Does the Prime Minister regard it as a limitation on the spending power to undertake meaningful consultation before a federal decision is made, and does the answer that he gave me with regard to the withdrawal from shared cost proposals also concern the adoption of new programs? In other words, am I to understand that the government is giving no assurance that meaningful consultations would take place with the provinces before any new programs are undertaken involving action by the provinces within the field of provincial jurisdiction?

Mr. Trudeau: That is really begging the question. I repeat that as a matter of government policy we believe in consultation in all the concrete instances which were debated, especially the topic of medicare, on which there had been a great deal of consultation. For that reason I do not want to say that the government will refuse to exercise its constitutional rights to use its spending power in the ways it sees fit. I repeat, however, that as a matter of policy I believe in consultation and emphasize that the government has practised it. But I do not want to imply that the federal spending power can only be exercised after a certain form of consultation which is, say, acceptable to the provinces, to a majority of them or to all of them. The policy again is in the direction—please go ahead, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): I should like to ask the Prime Minister through you, Mr. Speaker, whether in view of the central importance in constitutional matters of the exercise of the spending power of the federal parliament, this will be one of the specific subjects which may be referred to the special committee of this parliament to be set up to consider these matters generally?

Mr. Trudeau: I would say that this might eventually be one of the specific subjects, Mr. Speaker, but it will not be one of the earlier subjects for discussion because it is not one which has as yet been studied by the continuing committee of officials, and in regard to which the provincial governments have submitted propositions. We would prefer to deal with matters which have already been studied by those concerned.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Is it then the view of the Prime Minister that a condition precedent to the consideration of these important issues by parliament is that they must first be canvassed and dealt with by experts?

Mr. Trudeau: We believe it is useful to have experts explore these subjects, delineate their specific areas and submit possible solutions to the federal and provincial governments in order that they may have an easier task in making up their minds as between various alternatives.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Following the constitutional conference which ended yesterday, does the federal government still intend to withdraw from all joint programs with the provinces, and was this question raised during the discussions?

Mr. Trudeau: Indeed this question was raised, Mr. Speaker, and I indicated that as long as the constitutional question is not dealt with and a specific definition of the spending power in this field given, it would be difficult to make any definite promises.

We want to know what joint programs should be considered under federal jurisdiction, and which ones should not.

INQUIRY AS TO POSSIBLE ABANDONMENT OF MEDICARE

Mr. David Lewis (York South): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of some of the exchanges that have taken place at the constitutional conference, would the Prime Minister be ready to give an assurance to this house that the medicare program will not be abandoned as a result of these discussions?

Mr. Woolliams: It does not matter what it costs.

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I think that the only concession the government was prepared to make on medicare—which I stated openly at the conference—was that if the ten provinces could agree among themselves that medicare should not be implemented, it would not be.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

Mr. Gérard Loiselle (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration): This is not a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, but it is vaguely related to the federal-provincial conference. I would like to ask the Prime Minister if he knows that last night, at the Montreal Forum, the House of Commons team beat the Quebec National Assembly team 8 to 1?

POSSIBLE ABANDONMENT OF NORTHUMBERLAND CAUSEWAY

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): I have a question with reference to the statement made at the conference yesterday by the premier of Prince Edward Island concerning the possible abandonment of the Northumberland Strait crossing, and the need for a full statement by the Prime Minister on the financial implications of continuing the ferry service, as compared with the cost of constructing a causeway. Would the Prime Minister be prepared to make a statement on motions explaining to the Canadian people the implications of either of these possible decisions?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Either I or one of my colleagues will make a statement on this subject in the near future.

Some hon. Members: When?

HOUSE OF COMMONS

TELEVISING OF HOUSE AND COMMITTEE PROCEEDINGS

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Lancaster): I have a question for the Prime Minister. In the light of the apparent success of the televising of the dominion-provincial conference, at least as far as some of the participants are concerned, may I ask the Prime Minister whether he is reconsidering the question of televising proceedings of the House of Commons, perhaps starting with committees?

GRAIN

WHEAT—CONSIDERATION OF TWO-PRICE SYSTEM

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): I should like to ask the Minister of Agriculture whether in view of the resolutions passed by the three western pools and also by the farm organizations in the west in favour of the two price system for wheat, reconsideration has been given to this question, having regard to his support of this proposition during the many years in which he sat on this side of the house, and the fact that it was included among undertakings given in two Liberal election campaigns.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, as the right hon. gentleman knows, the debate respecting a two price system for wheat has been going on for many years, indeed during those years when he occupied the office of Prime Minister.

Mr. Diefenbaker: No, not at all.

Mr. Olson: I have been advised of some of the resolutions that have been passed by western farm organizations recently, but not the one to which my right hon. friend referred. However, I should advise him that this government is willing to consider good ideas at any time.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege arising out of the observation on the part of the minister in regard to the continuance of propaganda in relation to a two price system, when I was Prime Minister the western farmer was properly treated.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This seems to me to be a debate between the Minister of Agriculture and the right hon. member for Prince Albert. I have to rule that there is no question of privilege.

IMMIGRATION

REFUSAL OF ENTRY TO U.S. DRAFT DODGERS—VIOLENCE AT SIR GEORGE WILLIAMS AND OTHER UNIVERSITIES

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Is the government following a policy of refusing entry and landed immigrant status to United States draft dodgers and armed forces deserters?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the policy of the government on draft dodgers, or draft evaders or resisters, or whatever term you wish to employ, is unchanged. This does not enter into consideration in the admissibility of such persons in to Canada.

Mr. Orlikow: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In light of his reply I should like to ask the minister whether he would investigate charges that are made by a large number of people who are interested in the problem, namely that Canadian immigration officers are co-operating with United States immigration officials so as to get around this policy of the government?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I think my hon. friend is referring to a different category of persons, namely military deserters. In these situations the immigration officials have certain discretion in regard to that particular group of persons, and others who have substantial obligations in their country of origin.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, and I think it is a proper one because it deals with the same problem of Americans coming into Canada. In view of the present crisis which seems to be apparent in our universities, would the government consider setting up a committee of the Senate and House of Commons to investigate the department of immigration in order to ascertain why we permit a large percentage of foreigners to come into Canada, particularly from the United States, and cause trouble in our universities, thus costing taxpayers of Canada large sums of money?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, persons who have entered Canada as students have entered the country under the regulations, and under the law and the policy of the government. In due course the estimates of this department will be before the committee, and this would be an opportunity to consider such matters. Certainly I would welcome the views of members of parliament on any such question.

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Justice.

Could he tell the house whether the police force of Montreal has communicated with his department and whether his department is ready to issue a deportation order should some of those individuals be found guilty?

Mr. Speaker: The second question is, of course, hypothetical. Could the minister answer the first one?

[English]

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, the situation is very complicated because it is not known exactly what the results of this unfortunate occurrence will be. However, I assure the house that the provisions of the regulations are broad enough to cover any possible contingency.

Mr. Woolliams: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I listened to the minister's remarks carefully. Since these disturbances are costing the country millions of dollars does the minister not agree that there is a crisis and state of urgency—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Would the hon. member please resume his seat. The hon. member is not asking a supplementary question but presenting an argument. If he has a supplementary question, would he please put it in the form of a question.

Mr. Woolliams: Yes, Mr. Speaker. Because a crisis exists does the minister not agree that we should set up a committee such as I have suggested, before there is further trouble in our universities?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, the question implies that the cause of this trouble is some imperfection in our immigration regulations. I think that is a rather oversimplified view of the problem in the universities.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I see a number of hon. members wish to ask supplementary questions. I am trying to be as fair as possible to all hon. members. I see the hon. member for Shefford wishes to ask a supplementary question. I will return to other hon. members who have already asked questions about this problem.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the minister.

Since we learned here yesterday from a provincial government's representative that according to the results of an investigation in the case, Mao followers were responsible for damages made two days ago at Sir George Williams University, does the federal government intend to open an inquiry to confirm the statement of a provincial minister regarding this movement?

[English]

Mr. MacEachen: No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, may I ask another supplementary question on this point? It has been determined that 45 out of 96 accused in the incident at Sir George Williams University were non-Canadians or foreigners. Could the minister find out exactly what is the immigration status of those 45 accused, to see if they were here as landed immigrants or students, or whether they had visitors' visas?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, we are conducting an investigation into the classification of the status of each of these persons. But it is a complicated question. When persons come to Canada as students, they must have an enrolment in university and meet their own financial obligations. It is possible in certain cases to withdraw a student's visa, but I do not think it would be desirable at this point for the immigration department to take action until the facts are clear, the identity of responsible persons known and their culpability established.

Mr. Woolliams: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Answering the supplementary questions of other hon. members the minister said the Department of Manpower and Immigration may exercise discretion. Does that discretion permit people connected with Mr. Carmichael to enter Canada and cause trouble?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question as asked is more an argument than a question. Perhaps we should go to another subject.

[Translation]

Mr. Rondeau: Mr. Speaker, I wish to put another supplementary question to the minister.

Could the minister investigate to see whether the federal government has granted scholarships to some of the foreign students arrested yesterday?

Mr. Henri Latulippe (Compton): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

In view of the riots which took place at Sir George Williams University, would the minister tell the house whether he deems it advisable to change or to put off the approaches made to China, in order to ascertain whether that communist country was involved in those acts of sabotage?

[English]

Some hon. Members: Answer.

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington): Mr. Speaker, in view of the great interest the house has displayed in the matter of foreign students in this country would the Minister of Manpower and Immigration make a report to the house on motions after he has conducted and completed a study?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to consider that when sufficient facts are known to make a meaningful report.

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, in making that statement could the Minister of Manpower and Immigration deal with another question, namely, the question of the discretion which he says his officials exercised with regard to deserters from the United States army. I understand nothing in the act or regulations covers this question and I should appreciate it if the minister could make a statement.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, as I understand it the policy and practice with respect to military deserters has been in effect for some time and has been applied in the same way as I stated some days ago. Last July a directive was issued to immigration officers which established some guidelines with respect to the exercise of that policy. I must also advise the house that quite some considerable time ago I asked my department to review the whole policy with respect to draft resisters and military deserters seeking entrance to Canada either overseas or at border points, and with respect to deserters already in Canada who seek admission as immigrants. That review is nearing completion and then this whole matter will be considered carefully. It is a very complicated and difficult matter and undoubtedly has attracted a great deal of interest because of its complexity.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Because of the government's laxity.

AGRICULTURE

P.E.I.—PHASING OUT OF EXPERIMENTAL FUR FARM

Mr. P. V. Noble (Grey-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, a week ago I asked the Minister of Agriculture to reply to a question. He said he would take it as notice. Can he reply to that question today?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I think I have a further reply in my book; it is very brief. It indicates that part of the fur farm research project will be transferred from Charlottetown to the new Greenbelt farm on the outskirts of Ottawa. There is no thought in the department of suspending or doing away with this research. Rather, it is a matter of transferring the operation to a different station where it will be possible for notes to be compared—if that is the right word—by scientists of other disciplines.

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Although the minister referred to Charlottetown, I wonder if he did not mean the fur farm project in Summerside?

Mr. Olson: Yes, that is right.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): In view of the severe unemployment existing in the area from which the fur farm is to be transferred, will arrangements be made to find alternative employment for employees presently working on the fur farm?

Mr. Olson: Mr. Speaker, I understand that only four people are employed on this research station at the present time and I understand they all have been offered alternative employment.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Could the minister indicate to what use the extensive facilities on the farm will be put, after the farm is transferred?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest the question as asked could be placed on the order paper or, if the hon. member so wishes, it could be debated at the time of adjournment.

EDUCATION

VIOLENCE AT SIR GEORGE WILLIAMS UNIVERSITY—STUDY OF CAUSES

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister relevant to questions posed to the Acting Prime Minister and the Solicitor General yesterday, in the hope that an answer or decision will be forthcoming. In view of the large federal contribution to university education, is it the government's intention to conduct an inquiry into the causes of destruction and unrest on campus, such as was witnessed at Sir George Williams University the other day?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not think this is a subject under federal jurisdiction. This matter concerns the administration of justice.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): May I rise on a point of order with your permission sir? I tried to point out that I feel this is in order. My point is—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member should indicate to the Chair what the point of order is. I hope he will not engage in a debate with the Prime Minister or the government as to whether the question is in order, and whether it should be accepted.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): What I said was in reply to the Prime Minister's comment. If you will bear with me, my point of order is that where you have a capital investment in federal funds amounting to millions and hundreds of millions of dollars across Canada, and where you have civil disorder on a grand scale, there is certainly a federal concern on grounds of peace, order and good government, as set out in section 91 of the British North America Act. It is certainly a matter for this parliament to be concerned about when we are investing millions of dollars and there is organized and widespread disorder—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Even if the hon. member convinced the Chair that it is a matter for federal jurisdiction, this would not necessarily resolve the situation. It is still within the competence and responsibility of a member of the government not to answer a question. It seems to me if the hon. member is not satisfied with the answer given to his question, perhaps the best thing would be to give the Chair notice of his intention to debate the matter at ten o'clock. It could then be debated at that time.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): May I pose a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, to the right hon. Prime Minister? In view of all the destruction and unrest, would the Prime Minister consider the involvement of the federal government? Would he consider having the Minister of Justice join with the attorneys general of the provinces to discuss this serious problem now raging across Canada? We do not want to have to face what has happened in other countries.

Mr. Trudeau: Once again, Mr. Speaker, I do not think it is a question for the Attorney General. If we were to find there had been some disturbances which were unlawful, we could not apply the law because the administration of justice is a responsibility of the provinces. The only retaliation we could make would be to cut grants which are directed to education, and this is the kind of step the Leader of the Opposition has suggested we should not take.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): I agree with that.

[Mr. Speaker.]

VETERANS AFFAIRS

DISABILITY OF DIEPPE PRISONERS DUE TO IMPRISONMENT

Mr. Jack Cullen (Sarnia): I have a question for the Minister of Veterans Affairs. Can he advise the house the results of his meeting yesterday with officers of the Dieppe Prisoners of War Association?

Hon. Jean-Eudes Dubé (Minister of Veterans Affairs): I did have a meeting yesterday with the association, Mr. Speaker, which was most informative. We agreed there seems to be good reasons for the medical officers of our department to review the files of as many Dieppe prisoners of war as possible to determine whether there is any particular pattern or type of disability common among this group of veterans which could be related to their imprisonment. The findings of this review should enable us to appraise whether or not it would be advisable to call in a certain cross-section of these prisoners of war to see—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member can give information on a matter of interest to all hon. members but he should not make a general statement unless he has the consent of the house to revert to motions.

Mr. Cullen: A supplementary question. I wonder if the Minister of Veterans Affairs would give consideration to treating the Dieppe Prisoners of War Association as a separate group, similar to the way in which Hong Kong veterans are treated?

Mr. Dubé: I do not know how much more information I am allowed to give, Mr. Speaker, but I do wish to state I will give these prisoners of war my most sympathetic attention.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. I would ask the minister whether he or his department have just completed some contractual relations with public relations firms designed to upgrade the image of his department?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): I would like to reply.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the minister would like to make his answer during the adjournment debate.

AGRICULTURE

ITEMS TO BE DISCUSSED BY PROVINCIAL MINISTERS

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Agriculture a question.

Since he announced some time ago a conference on agriculture to which provincial ministers would participate, could he indicate the main subjects to be discussed at the conference?

[English]

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): I would be happy to provide hon. members of this house and in particular members of the Standing Committee on Agriculture with copies of the proposed agenda.

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington): A supplementary question. Would the report on the cost of farm machinery be ready for this conference?

Mr. Olson: I have asked the commissioner to prepare a position paper, or we may call it an interim report, to serve as at least a basis on which the discussion can begin on that particular subject.

COMMUNICATIONS

UNITED NATIONS REPORT ON SATELLITE BROADCASTING

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): I should like to direct a question to the appropriate minister. Will he give consideration to making available, through tabling or otherwise, the report on satellite broadcasting prepared by Canadian and Swedish scientists for the United Nations committee on outer space?

Hon. Eric W. Kierans (Postmaster General): That was a joint report, Mr. Speaker, prepared by Sweden and Canada for submission to a special council of the United Nations. I will discuss with my colleagues the release of that report to the house.

REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT

REQUEST FOR LEGISLATION ESTABLISHING DEPARTMENT

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): I would like to ask the Minister of Forestry and Rural Development whether he can now give the house definite assurance with regard to the day on which the bill will be introduced respecting his new department? Is he able to give us any firm assurance in regard to time?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): Perhaps I can deal with that, Mr. Speaker. Notice will be given today for the introduction of the government reorganization bill. We expect it will be given first reading on Monday.

RESEARCH

RESPONSIBILITY FOR GOVERNMENT SCIENTIFIC PROGRAM

Mr. J. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): A question for the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker. Last Thursday the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce announced the house would have an opportunity to discuss science policy when the reorganization bill for his department is introduced. Would the Prime Minister assure the house that either in that bill or by some other means there will be a minister responsible for the co-operation of the total government scientific program?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): There is a minister responsible for that co-ordination, Mr. Speaker. It is the President of the Treasury Board. I have indicated that the government is considering making certain changes in that area, but this policy has not yet been approved by the cabinet. Therefore I cannot say when it will be brought before the house.

NATIONAL PARKS

QUEBEC—ESTABLISHMENT OF PARKS IN THE PROVINCE

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

As it seems that consultations and federal government offers to Quebec are at a standstill since October 29, 1968, would the minister find it appropriate to ask provincial representatives to come and discuss the matter in order to find a solution?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I take the hon. member's question as notice.

[English]

Mr. Jean R. Roy (Timmins): Mr. Speaker, will the Leader of the Opposition now agree with that old Liberal, Mr. Robarts, that our Prime Minister will be a very good Prime Minister?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Inquiries of the Ministry

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

IRAQ—REACTION TO CANADIAN GOVERNMENT REPRESENTATIONS—IMMIGRATION OF IRAQI JEWS

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, the first question I would ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs, is this: About eight or nine days ago I asked a question regarding the reaction of the Iraqi government to the protest of the Canadian government, or the representations made by our ambassador in reference to the slaughter of a number of Jewish and other persons in that country. What has been the reaction since that time?

Secondly, is the minister now in a position to advise whether the government is giving sympathetic consideration to the immigration to this country of Iraqi Jews who desire to leave potential oppression and come to Canada?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the message to the government of Iraq was delivered. They have made no reply, but perhaps it is significant that some of the fears that we had about further executions and trials are less now than they were at that time. Perhaps the joint representations made by Canada and many other countries have had an influence upon the government of that country. I am sure we all hope so.

This afternoon the Minister of Manpower and Immigration and I will be meeting with the Canadian Jewish Congress to discuss the question, based on the representations they have made to us, of facilitating the entry of Iraqi Jews to Canada. As I have said before, this is a very complex question, and what we have to be sure of is that the action we take is really beneficial to those unfortunate people.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I do not quite understand what the minister means by the complexity of the situation?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Would the right hon. gentleman ask his supplementary question.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is my supplementary question. What is the complexity of the situation in regard to Iraqi Jews and other refugees who endeavour to come to Canada?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, unfortunately when similar pleas were made in the past, sometimes the reaction upon the people whom the world was trying to help was most unfortunate. There was strong reaction against them in their home countries.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I regret to have to advise hon. members that we have gone beyond the time allotted for oral questions. Perhaps tomorrow less time will be spent on that day's happenings in Montreal and more on events elsewhere; and the Chair will try to protect minorities and give more time to backbenchers.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I should like now to make the weekly announcement of business. Tomorrow, as previously arranged, we will have the special discussion arising out of the federal-provincial conference. On Monday we will call the orders for third readings of Bill C-154 and Bill C-155 under the jurisdiction of my colleague the Minister of Agriculture. That will be followed with the report stage of Bill C-156, followed by Bill C-157 if the evidence is available from the agriculture committee at that time. Following these we would call the second reading of the estate tax bill, and we propose to continue with that bill at that stage, at the committee stage and the third reading stage for the balance of the week from Tuesday to Thursday. As I indicated, the government reorganization bill will be given first reading on Monday and we propose to go ahead with the second reading debate on that bill when the estate tax bill has been completed next week.

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): A question to the government house leader, Mr. Speaker. Would the minister ask for consent later this day by leave to move concurrence in the third report of the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections to enable those of us who hold dissenting views to have a chance to be heard before the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications leaves on Sunday for its tour of the Atlantic provinces?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, the business already has been called for today. I am prepared to move concurrence in the report, if that be necessary, in the near future. I think perhaps we should continue on today's program as arranged.

Mr. McGrath: May I refer this matter to the adjournment debate at ten o'clock?

• (3:00 p.m.)

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

CRIMINAL CODE

The house resumed, from Wednesday, February 12, consideration of the motion of Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton) that Bill C-150, to amend the Criminal Code, the Parole Act, the Penitentiary Act, the Prisons and Reformatories Act and to make certain consequential amendments to the Combines Investigation Act, the Customs Tariff and the National Defence Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

[Translation]

Mr. Henri Latulippe (Compton): Mr. Speaker, at the time of adjournment, yesterday, I was explaining the importance, the greatness and the existence of man. If we are to know where we are going, the importance of humanity and its components must be known.

I was saying also that we will have a just society to the extent that its components are sound. Society should not be made up solely of corrupt elements, but it should also have elements that are purified through legislation and motives which are adapted to man.

Being its absolute master and vested with powers by an absolute collective strength, a nation which is composed of absolute units recognizes only those collective forces that it uses with consummate skill to neutralize them.

The state ignores man and loathes him. For its own designs, man is a material, a thing, a number, a file and nothing more. The modern state is the enemy of man, of the human being and of the essence and existence of humanity itself.

There is no solution, in the world of the law. There are only irreconcilable inconsistencies, we must get out of this tragic and destructive dilemma; we must replace disorder by order, freedom and the recognition of every human being.

The community exists, Mr. Speaker, as long as there are individuals to make it up. The community means almost nothing if it were not for the human being.

The existence of communities is dependent upon individuals. When we say "community", it is an abstract word which does not cover every individual; we refer rather to a group of individuals.

Society must recognize the importance of every individual. Something might be done for the community, provided there are sound individuals and the legislation is consistent with natural and Christian ethics.

These values must be protected at all costs. The only proper order is that which comes from the great moral law: respect for life. According to that law, man is the beginning and the end.

There is no other method but that which stems from him to lead to him.

After a long history, humanity faces a mortal danger by accepting a degrading settlement, made possible by making legal everything which is contrary to order and to morality.

Man has become an incredible industrial giant. In our modern world, it is possible to give food and shelter to everyone. There are equal opportunities in life for everyone irrespective of his environment and his education. Then, what is the obstacle but old hatred, fears and the covetousness of the human heart?

The Canadian people must understand that situation and say with all their will power and self-control: We are going to take great strides so that we may together live through the next stage of our Canadian development. Otherwise Canadians will destroy themselves, as surely as there is a sun shining above us.

Apart from being pernicious, the provisions in this bill dealing with homosexuality and abortion will lead the nation to its own destruction.

Mr. Speaker, I should like to see the establishment of a plan or discipline that would not only lay down what is just in family and community life today, but also lead the Canadian people on the road to a clear conscience, so that all individuals and all nations may live peacefully and harmoniously.

With my whole being and with all the respect I can summon, I must thank my mother for having given birth to me. I would never have seen the light without her. I do not know of anybody who was ever born without a mother. Every human being is of great importance. The importance of a human being is unequalled and human life is priceless.

Frankly, Mr. Speaker, women as a whole are more courageous than men. They have more courage. They need it since they must live with men. We expect them to give us comfort in our bedrooms and beauty in our living-rooms.

I wish to emphasize the fact that women deserve the highest respect and are of an extreme importance. In our modern world, men advocate the idea that women are beautiful and costly toys and that if one has money, one can look after them. But we forget that most of them give the best they have. We do not expect women to play a decisive role in modern history. Women are not only endowed with intelligence but most of all, with a kindness of heart that enables them to cure the hatreds of the modern selfish world.

Somebody has to undertake the task of building a just society, otherwise man will destroy himself on account of the problems he will have created. This is not a dream. It could be something real tomorrow. Abortion will not, as by magic, make men better and generous. If man really wishes to place himself above animals, to control his lower instincts and develop his highest ideals, the state must enact laws to enable him to place himself above animals.

Mr. Speaker, bills such as the one we are now discussing are unable to insure any real amount of protection to human beings, especially where women are concerned.

It is up to the state to promote morality so as to maintain, as far as possible, a well-balanced human personality. Such is the duty of the state.

According to the theory of evolution, which every new discovery of science seems to confirm, man, with all his greatness and his drawbacks is yet a far-from-perfect creature. This means man can improve. It also means, however, that the changes towards perfection have to follow the very, very slow rhythm of evolution, the rhythm of every living being. Man is probably unable to speed up the process. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, let us not be deceived by the hope that a moral law would make men better, less selfish, less hostile, more human, more brotherly. The state would be unwelcome to release our lower instincts; this would only result in allowing a great number of individuals to indulge in turpitude thus increasing corruption and destroying society.

The duty of the state is, by setting reasonable standards, to help man realize himself and to give him every moral, social, intellectual, practical and economical support in its power.

Every man should be given the means to find the key to his inner truth, to fulfil his destiny. Thus, instead of deteriorating, he would probably improve.

Deep down, man wants to be considered as a man. This claim is nothing else but his will to be, and to be himself. He wants to build up his own world, according to his own truth, to the way he feels life and happiness on earth should be. And this is a feeling one should respect.

That kingdom is sacred, that kingdom is man itself. To build up that man, right from the beginning all the energies latent in the world have concurred. That man in front of you is like nobody else. Indeed, he thinks, he loves, he hates in his own way; he believes and he hopes; he skakes and quivers. He is the sole master of this inner recess, burning and radiant, in all his nobility and dignity. Whoever penetrates into it, man, state, law, authority, commits a major, an unatonable crime against man. All life must be exalted, protected, saved when it is in peril. There is no life, no matter how debased, no matter how low it has fallen, that does not hold within itself the resources of it own revival.

Life is not a state, it is a movement, it is action, it is a confrontation. Life is a continuous creation. It is in that creation that man seeks himself, finds himself and fulfils himself.

• (3:10 p.m.)

Mr. Speaker, if there are 3.4 billion people on earth, there are 3.4 billion different concepts of life and happiness. No power on earth can know a man, except that man himself. It would be ill-advised of the state to intervene in one's privacy and conception of life, before having fulfilled its proper role towards society. It falls to the state to ensure the national balance which will enable every individual to live without fear, without hardships, in a country overflowing with wealth, and guarantee him and his family three meals a day, a decent shelter which he can hope to own someday.

Mr. Speaker, I could say more on man's conception and his moral greatness, but I shall go on to another topic. Instead of trying to impose laws which are not its concern, laws which are not fitting and which encroach upon the rights of the individual, the state should assume its responsibilities. I therefore urge the state to fulfil its duty, and mind its own affairs.

Mr. Speaker, if we want to eliminate abortions, then let us take the necessary steps.

According to the findings of various associations—I have the figures here—86 per cent of all divorces are due, it would seem, to our diabolical system, which prevents people from having decent housing. That is where the State should intervene, not in the citizen's private life. It ought to allow all citizens to freely achieve their goals and to live comfortably in this country abounding in resources and capable of feeding half the world. However, 20 per cent of our people are left starving and living in slums.

Many wives refuse to bear children because they would not know where to accommodate them. Children would crowd their homes. Besides, some have to work to support themselves or their family, to pay their rent and their debts. In the circumstances, they do not assume the part they should play in the community.

Experience shows that 86 per cent of the abortions are directly caused by lack of money at home. Education is the responsibility of families and society but at a certain age the individual becomes responsible for his actions and each considered decision remains the responsibility of the society, the family and the individual himself.

Most of the time, Mr. Speaker, criminals are what they are because they were ill-treated when they were young by their parents, their companions or their teachers. An infamous bill seeking to allow such indecent acts is against human nature and God's commands.

I should like, Mr. Speaker, to read a letter I have received. I have been snowed under with letters from my constituents these past few days, but I shall limit myself to the one which struck me most, and I quote:

> In the context of life in society, here are the words I would flatly tell my own daughter with an itching to get an abortion.
> I would start by trying to make her change her mind, by all possible means, and especially by removing first the causes of her decision.
> I would finance adequately the period of her pregnancy, at the rate of at least $3 per day, or $90 per month. I would offer her $1,000 at the birth of her child and after that, I would give her a monthly allowance of $90 for herself and $30 for her child to the age of 10, of $60 from 10 to 20, and of $90 from 21 years of age until the end of his schooling, or until he got regular employment in the community of adults.

It is in that area, Mr. Speaker, that the State must intervene. With the value of our production having reached $68 billion last year and with this year's production reaching $72 billion, while consumption will stand at only $40 billion with a surplus of from $28 to $30 billion in warehouses, on the shelves, it should be easy to offer something to our children, to Canadians generally.

The letter goes on and I quote:

> If, after receiving all my moral support, my human and fatherly encouragement and for reasons known only to herself, she insists on having an abortion, I shall assist her to the best of my ability in obtaining for her the most modern and experienced methods used by our best obstetricians.

Mr. Speaker, such is the attitude of one father regarding his daughter if she happened to get in trouble some day. According to the letters I have received, this seems to be the general consensus. Most of my constituents use the same arguments when they ask me to speak up and voice their opinions about this infamous bill which at no time should have been submitted to this parliament.

And I quote again:

> In the case in point, I feel this would be my duty as a humane father, and I would be confident of acting under Divine guidance and according to my enlightened conscience.

Mr. Speaker, this sums up the reasoning of a head of family.

> Therefore, all abortions taking place in Canada are due to our damnable society—

Again, this is the same person speaking:

> —which is guilty of failing to educate the people decently, of denying them their right to life, freedom and the enjoyment of their property. This damnable society is Canada. The government of Canada is responsible for depriving most citizens of their personal property as guaranteed by the Creator.

Mr. Speaker, I have been a member of parliament since 1962 and I have always advocated a better distribution of personal and family income. Since 1962, the Liberal and Conservative governments turn a deaf ear whenever they were asked to raise family allowances.

I see nothing but increases in capital gains and in the interests on the millions of bonds of the federal government. One can see the increase in taxes and contributions that reduce the income of small wage earners who cannot afford to rent decent houses for their children yet to be born.

I have always made my representations politely, but I am about to make them in a firmer and somewhat angry tone and I will protest more strongly, for society ought to do what is necessary at least.

Family allowances should be raised. If they were, and should the government assume its responsibilities and proceed in an orderly way, applications for abortion would be examined in consultation with psychiatrists; a social worker, a gynaecologist, and, if necessary, a moralist and an expert in genetics should be engaged to assess the consequences of the completion of pregnancy or of abortion and prepare a file which would be submitted to the abortion committee. That is the task that the government should accomplish, that is what the bill should include.

The government should give the mother everything it can. Legislation should favour as much as possible those mothers who complete their pregnancy, whether they want an abortion or not, and those who cannot avail themselves of treatment facilities.

In particular, someway should be found to change the conditions making pregnancy undesirable. The state should provide any pregnant woman with her financial requirements. If these people enjoyed all those rights and benefits, I am sure that abortions would cause little problem. If the mother felt able to provide an education and a decent living to her child, she would not be reluctant to give him birth.

Society is made up of human beings, and nothing is nobler and greater.

The state must fulfil human functions, in accordance with public feeling. The state must give sufficient purchasing power to our families, so that they will not fear the future. Consequently, we would not have to bring over millions of immigrants. We could go on building up our society, which would develop and also be healthier. We might never witness again what happened at Sir George Williams University.

• (3:20 p.m.)

Mr. Speaker, it is in this light that I take part in the debate on this bill, which I would like to see amended.

Before concluding my remarks, Mr. Speaker, I would like to say a few words on lotteries. The bill contains many clauses and, consequently, if it is not divided, we shall not support it. However, if we can vote on each clause, then we will be able to vote freely. I ask once again the government to allow government members to vote freely so that, faced with such responsibilities, every member may vote freely, in conscience and in the best interests of society.

As far as lotteries are concerned, I agree indirectly with the principle that there must be a difference between lotteries and mere games of chance or small drawings. Certainly, nobody could ever imagine that the same legislation could apply to lotteries in which hundreds of thousand dollars are at stake and, for example, the drawing of a T.V. set for the benefit of a parochial charity. We must ensure the passage of a piece of legislation likely to solve all cases which may arise. However, there is one point of the clause which, in my opinion, should be amended.

If a province is allowed to have a lottery, I do not see why such a lottery would be illegal in another province, because the latter has not officially legalized lotteries.

Mr. Speaker, at the recent federal-provincial conference, the rights of the citizen have been claimed, especially the right for a Canadian citizen to feel at home anywhere in Canada.

The city of Montreal, for instance, legally established a lottery. Yet, it is illegal in other provinces to purchase a ticket for the Montreal lottery. I sincerely believe that we should amend this section of the bill by moving an amendment which reads as follows:

I move, seconded by Mr. Lambert:

That clause 13 of bill C-150 be amended as follows:

"That paragraph (b) of subsection (1) of section 179A be amended to read as follows:

(b) for the government of a province or for a municipality, either alone or in conjunction with the government of a province, to conduct and manage a lottery scheme, in accordance with any law enacted by the legislature of that province, for any person, in accordance with such law, to do any thing described in any of paragraphs (a) to (f) of subsection (1) or subsection (4) of section 179."

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, in accordance with standing orders, I move this amendment.

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I would like to take the proposed amendment under advisement. For the moment I would say by way of preliminary remarks that I have grave doubts about its admissibility, but I would like to study it.

[Translation]

Mr. Latulippe: Mr. Speaker, with regard to the amendment concerning lotteries, I said earlier that we supported it in part.

Mr. Speaker, if our economy was adequately controlled and properly balanced, there would be no need for these national "barbottes" to support municipalities, school boards or various religious or other organizations.

Nevertheless, Mr. Speaker, we will vote for this bill. We will vote for the legislation dealing with lotteries. Ours will be a reluctant vote because we know that it involves a national "barbotte".

We know that we could act otherwise. If we had a just society, there would be no need to adopt unjust regulations and legislation. Establishing lotteries is an injustice in a country such as Canada which has an abundance of resources and could be self-supporting. Our country is capable of guaranteeing three meals a day and a suitable income to everybody, since we do not know what to do with our products because we do not have enough consumers. We want to increase the number of consumers. Because of applied science and the work of past generations, we could do without such things. As we are living under the present system, we will probably vote in favour of lotteries.

As for the other clauses of the bill, such as the one on abortion, I have had my say on the subject.

On the subject of homosexuality, this bill deals with a most evil and indecent matter and it should be of no concern to the government.

Mr. Speaker, the state should endeavour to introduce sound regulations which are morally acceptable so that there will be an end to these indecent matters and that our nation might develop itself and rise above animality.

Mr. Speaker, there are several other things I would like to say. I will conclude by asking once again that each member vote according to his conscience as this vote is exceptionally important because it involves the essence of life itself. Abortion is one subject that strikes at the very essence of the individual, of humanity and of society as a whole. If this does not exist, there will not be any society because, I repeat it, I know of no one in this world who does not owe his life to his mother.

• (3:30 p.m.)

[English]

Mr. McIlraith: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, if argument is to be heard on whether or not the amendment is in order I should like an opportunity to make a submission along the lines that it is a type of amendment which is not properly admissible at this stage, though it could be moved at another stage of our proceedings.

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak only briefly on this bill, realizing that what we are doing at this stage is to give general consent to the proposition that this legislation be referred to a committee for investigation, study and possible amendment before further debate and third reading.

I enter this discussion with a certain amount of trepidation because it is not usual in these days for a theologian to become directly involved in questions which concern amendments to the Criminal Code. But perhaps I should not classify myself as a theologian at this late juncture. Since, however, there seems to be some basic confusion with regard to the bill before us—whether we are dealing here with what is fundamentally a theological question or with what is really a legal or political question—it is perhaps appropriate that a person who passes from time to time as a theologian should become involved.

An attempt to clarify this point was made by the N.D.P. house leader when he suggested in the course of his remarks that much of our criminal law was developed in a day and age when the influence of the church on attitudes in our society and its popularly held folkways and mores was very greatly felt. However, we have since moved into a pluralistic society in which no one denomination or religion can be said to answer for all the popularly accepted opinions of society. What we shall be called upon to do increasingly as we deal with reform of the Criminal Code is to make a clear distinction between what we mean by criminal acts and what we mean by immoral behaviour or sin, as it was more often referred to in a previous age. If you like, it is the distinction between sin and crime. This will impel many of us to consider what we mean by sin. It will also involve, particularly for those who are called upon to pass laws, whether in this parliament or another, the question of what we really mean by crime. I say in all humility that various religious bodies have spent a great deal more time during the last decade upon a re-examination of what is meant by sin in comparison with the amount of time spent by legislators, political scientists and jurists on the question of what is crime or what is anti-social behaviour.

Introducing this measure on January 23, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) said:

> This bill will, I am sure, be remembered as a high point in penal reform in Canada.

I wish that statement were accurate, Mr. Speaker. I am afraid it is not. We see here a considerable amount of tinkering with the machinery in regard to such things as detention, probation, suspended sentences and so on, but the proposals do not really come to grips with the fundamental questions—how we are to treat people who run afoul of the law and how we are to protect society from further acts of anti-social behaviour while working toward the reform of the individuals involved. To the extent that these basic questions are dealt with, they are dealt with in an extremely superficial way. The essential task remains before us.

I am glad to see the Solicitor General (Mr. McIlraith) in the house this afternoon. The aspect of the bill which I am discussing falls largely within his jurisdiction since he is responsible to the house for the administration of federal penitentiaries. There is no area of government administration in which there is a greater need of reform.

I have in mind, of course, the way in which we treat people who are sent to penitentiaries and the kind of protection we should ensure to society upon the eventual return of most of those who are incarcerated. I realize that in connection with the quotation to which I referred the minister was probably throwing out a self-congratulatory statement, disregarding the fact that no real attempt had been made to grapple with these questions, and I look forward to other opportunities of dealing with the subject in the course of subsequent debates.

I think it is unfortunate that certain provisions which could have been included in this bill have not in fact been included. I was particularly hopeful that since this legislation had been redrafted, an election having intervened, the newly appointed Minister of Justice might have included in his proposals the substance of the bill I introduced in March, 1968, having to do with the abolition of corporal punishment, which I described at the time as being a relic of the dark ages. We know that corporal punishment is not extensively applied today. We also know there is nothing about its use which makes sense either from the viewpoint of protecting society or from the viewpoint of reforming the individual concerned. It is merely another kind of social vengeance and a holdover from an earlier understanding which adds nothing to our sense of the dignity of man or his motivations.

I want to speak on three or four of the most controversial, if you like, and most important sections of these reforms to the Criminal Code. I think it is very important that these reforms are dealt with in this bill. Quite frankly, I am disappointed that to a certain extent they seem to be set as substantial as I would have appreciated.

Let me go immediately to the one that seems to provoke the most controversy and the strongest emotional feelings and to which what I said at the beginning applies, namely, whether what we are dealing with here is a crime or a sin. I refer, of course, to the provisions with respect to abortion.

There has been an interesting debate in the house, and we had a great many hearings by a committee last year, on what changes should be made and what will be acceptable to Canadians generally. But what we are faced with in the provisions included in this bill is something that will very likely satisfy almost no one. I say that because, in effect, it is an attempt to suggest that in some way we are going to legalize abortions in this country. From the minister's own speech and the speeches of other members we have come to realize that the definition that will be given to these clauses is exceedingly narrow and surely will not satisfy those who realize that here we have a tremendous social problem. In addition, it quite likely will not satisfy those who believe that any provision regarding abortion is in fact a highly sinful and, in their terms, somewhat criminal act. But more important, one of the basic reasons that the health and welfare committee spent many months examining this problem was to get at what, to me, is one of the most disturbing social problems we have today. I refer to the thousands of illegal, back-room and back-alley abortions that are being performed in the most dreadful kind of circumstances and with, from time to time, the most tragic results leading to loss of life or the almost complete destruction of health of women who must resort to this means.

I am not so naïve as to think that we can put into the law provisions that will take care of this situation. What we are dealing with is a very complex social, economic and health problem that quite naturally is not only the responsibility of this place but of the provinces, the municipalities and also the various church bodies. For us to try to solve this problem would, of course, be superficial, but if we were going to try to face the problem realistically I think we should have offered more by way of legislative reform than has been presented to us by the minister in Bill C-150. We have avoided facing some of the aspects of this problem that surely must disturb us all.

When one thinks of young girls who are viciously attacked and raped and as a result become pregnant and at the same time realizes that under the provisions of this bill there will be no assistance or hope for them, when one thinks of abnormal social or family situations in which an adolescent becomes pregnant as the result of an incestuous relationship and at the same time realizes that the bill will not deal with this particular circumstance, and when one realizes that as greater medical knowledge is obtained we can predict more or less accurately the birth of badly formed offspring and that there is nothing in the bill to deal with this situation, one does wonder just what kind of reform is being presented to us in the amendments with regard to abortion.

As I said a few minutes ago, I cannot see that the legislation will really satisfy anybody very much. If all that the minister can do is just to legalize what, as the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville (Mr. MacGuigan) said, is popularly acceptable in the law, instead of legalizing what people think the law means, which is another thing, then in my opinion we cannot call the proposed bill a reform measure. Quite frankly, I think it represents an avoidance of the issue, and this does disturb me very much.

I should like to refer to another provision that has caused considerable difficulty to some people, that popularly referred to as the legalization of homosexuality. I suggest that is not the purpose of these amendments at all. Certainly there is a fundamental misconception here. I believe the previous speaker said that the government should not be getting involved with these things, and this, of course, is exactly what the government is saying in this regard in its legislative provisions.

However, I am disturbed about the popular implications that may very well arise from these amendments. It is not only what we do that is important; equally important is what we seem to do. In this regard I think it will be necessary for the minister or for other officials, while removing from the category of crime what are considered abnormal sexual relations between consenting adults, to suggest at the same time that very serious consideration be given to the incidence of this problem and the ways in which it might be dealt with from a health point of view. I think it would be bad leadership on the part of parliament if it were to be mooted abroad that the present members of parliament had thought that they were voting in favour of encouraging or opening the door to increased homosexual or other forms of abnormal sexual behaviour. If that were to be the case, we would have done a great disservice to the people of this country.

I should like to make brief reference to the great many amendments regarding gun control and control of other weapons. In this respect I think our country has lagged much behind many other countries and parts of the world that have realized the seriousness of this problem. Perhaps we have been overly influenced by the tremendous lobby that has existed in the United States in the matter of gun control. Surely the instances of assassination of great figures during the last few years will not let us forget the importance of such regulations.

Again I feel it is not going to be enough for us merely to regulate what kind of weapons it is permissible to own, and under what circumstances. Surely, in the final analysis, weapons are controlled by men. If we prohibit certain kinds of weapons or more greatly limit their use, it would only require the imagination of man to invent some other weapon which could be used to commit a violent or anti-social act.

During this past week we have been witnessing a great increase in violent behaviour in the North American context. Both in this place and in the various committees that seek to examine the detail of what we do here we must ascertain what our response is going to be to the growing violence in the North American—perhaps I should say the western—way of life. I suggest it will not be enough to circumscribe the gun laws of this country; we must come to grips with the cause of some of the violence that is very deeply embedded in our culture.

There are also some extremely worth-while revisions touching on the relationship between drinking and driving. I am glad to see that in the revised bill there are stringent criteria for establishing the alcohol content of blood. Similar provisions in previous legislation were not realistic. Although the new provision will impose great responsibilities on law enforcement officers, it at least is beginning to attack what is a great social problem today, the drinking driver. It is simplistic to say that drink only is responsible for the deaths of 5,000 who die on our highways each year. But we do know that in a great percentage of accidents drink is involved and that there is a relationship between the alcohol the driver has consumed and his susceptibility to accidents. Yet we should not fool ourselves into thinking that simply by passing this law we shall prevent death or mutilation on our streets and highways. Frankly, I am disturbed at the cavalier attitude we have displayed to automobile manufacturers who produce motor vehicles that may not be safe. We do not know how safe they are. Also, we spend too little on enforcing high standards of safety in highway construction and in bringing about safe driving standards.

If a disease were on the rampage in North America that claimed the lives of 55,000 people annually and injured about a million others, some of them permanently, we would soon set up royal commissions and invest millions of dollars in setting up new departments to deal with that specific problem. Although we applaud the minister for adopting a new standard to be applied against drinking drivers, may I point out that the drinking driver represents only one aspect of a serious social problem which needs be dealt with now.

May I refer to another amendment contained in the bill, the one having to do with lotteries. I am surprised that in a country wishing to be identified as progressive and in a bill that seeks to bring in reforms we should take the retrograde step, a step considered by many as economically regressive, of permitting lotteries. I suppose the idea is that lotteries will benefit individuals and groups as well as governments, federal and provincial. It is thought that lotteries in some way will bring in many millions of dollars of revenue. I suspect that this amendment was included in the bill as a result of lobby pressures exerted on the minister and his department and not as a result of any widespread examination of what lotteries would do to help provincial or federal budgets. I have seen lotteries operating in other countries and seen data pertinent to lotteries, and I have yet to be convinced that lotteries benefit society or inculcate the people of the area with a desire to increase their productivity or wealth through working. Considering the social effects of lotteries, the inclusion of this amendment in the bill is ludicrous. When this amendment is debated in committee I hope we shall have an opportunity to examine the implications of lotteries in other countries. Perhaps hon. members may change their minds about the advisibility of permitting lotteries here.

It will be obvious to those who have listened to this debate or read it in Hansard that there is a wide divergence of opinion in our party on many aspects of this bill, and this is as it should be. Many of its amendments touch matters of conscience much more than they touch on political ideology, philosophy or principle. I think that hon. members on both sides of the house ought to express themselves on the bill; if they do not do so on second reading they ought to do so when the bill is in committee or when it is before the house at the third reading stage. Above all, I think they should express here what their consciences dictate, particularly on the key sections of the bill.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): That they should be able to do so was the intention of our original amendment. Although Your Honour did not accept that amendment we hope that when we come to vote hon. members will be permitted to vote according to the dictates of their consciences.

In conclusion, may I say how pleased I am to learn from the minister that shortly there will be established a new national law reform commission. May I suggest that preliminary to the establishment of that commission serious consideration should be given to the full implications of anti-social or criminal behaviour in our society. May I also suggest in all humility that the membership of that commission should not consist entirely of those whose business or profession it is to associate with the law. Many of my colleagues on this side of the house are lawyers and I have friends in other places who have dealings with the law. Nevertheless, I think public opinion in this country demands that persons representing a wide cross-section of opinion in our society should be members of such a commission. It is a little dangerous and near-sighted to limit the membership of that commission only to those who deal with or administer the law. Not only lawyers, magistrates or prison officials ought to be on the commission. The law affects all our lives and the membership of any commission concerned with recommending the revising and updating of our laws ought to be drawn from many segments of our society. Only then will it gain full respect in the minds of all Canadians.

[Translation]

Mr. J.-A. Mongrain (Trois-Rivières): Mr. Speaker, it is customary, in this house, to hear arguments for and against a great many questions. We have very often to listen to specious arguments and sometimes to speeches in which demagogy can be detected, but I think that the bill now before us provides hon. members with a better opportunity than is usually the case to resort to demagogy, since everybody agrees that this bill deals with difficult subjects.

Incidentally, I would like to congratulate the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald) who has just resumed his seat, for the serious analysis he has made of this bill. Like many others I suppose, I was wondering at times whether he was speaking as a theologian or as a politician. I would even say that when the politician was speaking, there still lingered a touch of the theologian and I congratulate him on the high standard of his remarks generally.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that a great many of those who have spoken on this bill have spoken through their hats and about things which do not exist. I would like to point out some of those remarks in order to remove any doubt which may remain in the mind of the public. Indeed if there is a topic which lends itself to ambiguity it is that very subject, inasmuch as you deal with it without having read the whole tenor of the bill or with the settled intent of discrediting its proponents in the house.

For instance some have objected to breathalizer tests being given to automobile drivers, claiming that in some cases it would interfere with the freedom of people.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that the time has come, in this country, to reduce the number of accidents due to excessive consumption of alcohol. That seems even more important than concern for the protection of freedom. If one wanted to push the argument for freedom to its bitter end, policemen would have to refrain from investigating people they suspect of having committed crimes. After all, the number of deaths, accidents and claims brought about by motorists whose ability is impaired by alcohol should not be ignored. It is high time, I think, that the state should take the necessary steps to prevent such slaughter as we have experienced, through measures as strict as those prescribed in the bill before us.

Mr. Speaker, I know that the job will not be an interesting one, that we shall often be confronted with border cases where people might not be as guilty as breath analysis would suggest, and that the proposed method probably does not take into account what a given individual can stand, for some people can drink 26 ounces of alcohol and still manage to drive their car properly, whereas others, after one glass only, are unfit to drive. Justice is not perfect, that is a well-known fact; none the less, human shortcomings being taken into account, the state ought to enforce some legislation aimed at preventing greater evil.

It is a public disgrace, Mr. Speaker, to note the number of accidents and casualties in Canada, as well as the plain waste of money, that are due to negligent drivers who more often than not are intoxicated.

Mr. Speaker, I think that a government could not have a law passed without getting some opposition, even with regard to the most rational ones. There is in this omnibus bill many cases where, evidently, we can attribute all kinds of motives and make all sorts of assumptions. There was opposition, for instance, to certain regulations provided by the bill with regard to the possession of weapons. Mr. Speaker, I think it is high time that governments take drastic measures and be more on the look-out for these foolhardy persons who bring about so many tragedies.

A few minutes ago, Mr. Speaker, it was announced under the seal of secrecy that a bomb had exploded in Montreal, in a harbour building, wounding some thirty people. It is high time that governments take the necessary steps to prevent such disorders and slaughters which are now increasing most alarmingly in Canada. I think that the regulations governing the possession of weapons and the penalties for those who are caught in such misdoings are not yet strict enough. Indeed, the public should call upon the governments to impose even more rigid control.

In many circles people have been gloating over homosexuality. They seem to imply that the government wants to encourage it but, Mr. Speaker, it is the least of our worries and I do not think that any of our members has such a predisposition or at least I am not aware of it.

• (4:00 p.m.)

Mr. Speaker, this legislation does not in any way seek to legalize homosexuality which, I admit, is a disease. Some have said: Let us rather make provisions for the treatment of homosexuals. But under what statute can we force people with a heart condition, cancer or tuberculosis to undergo treatment against their will? For some people, that is a matter of conscience. It is not the responsibility of the government to force them, but rather to prevent that they contaminate others around them.

In the proposed legislation on homosexuality, there is no intent to spread homosexuality, on the contrary. Acts of homosexuality which would cause scandal to a minor and which would lead to obscene exhibitions will still be punishable under the law. The bill aims only at correcting deficiencies in the law which, in some cases, could expose an homosexual to sentences of 10, 15 or 20 years of imprisonment, or preventing over-zealous policemen to raid private homes and bedrooms, something which is unacceptable under our democratic system. We are merely amending the law because there is precisely an aspect of it against which we cannot do anything.

Mr. Speaker, laws that we cannot enforce should not exist. It is much better to amend them than to ignore them and thus tolerate violations which, in their original form, they could not prevent.

An hon. member objected earlier to lotteries. But for how many years, Mr. Speaker, have we not been hearing cries for the toning down of the lottery legislation or requests to the federal government for the transfer of control over lotteries to the provinces? Despite the federal legislation, for many years almost every Canadian has been buying tickets for the Irish sweepstake. As far as I know, church organizations have been conducting for many years lotteries and all kinds of draws. It is about time that we put an end to such hypocrisy, and I think it is wise for the government to hand over to the provinces the control of lotteries. Provinces will legislate within the limits of their boundaries on the advisability of allowing lotteries to be held.

The love of gambling, Mr. Speaker, is something quite natural and betting and lotteries are age-old pastimes. I think that the federal legislation was shabby on that point, and that these amendments were long overdue.

I remember for instance that in 1963, in Toronto, my colleague, the former mayor of Toronto, and myself were invited by the Canadian Federation of Mayors and Municipalities to take part in their one-week convention in that city. And the mayors' federation passed, in 1963, with quite a comfortable majority, a resolution to the effect that the federal government should amend its legislation on lotteries, and transfer control thereof to the provinces. Then provinces wishing to do so will be able to make lotteries as lawful as they see fit.

I suggest it is high time that this lottery item be brought up to date.

It has been said in some places that the act did not go far enough in some respects, and I share that viewpoint. In other words, circumstances and the extent of public acceptance must be taken into account. The people must be informed about these judicial reforms instead of forcing more knowledge on them than they can assimilate. The present legislation is nevertheless a first step in the right direction and a commendable beginning.

Mr. Chairman, the most controversial aspect of this bill is probably the one about abortion. I have heard unimaginable comments of this subject. For instance, some way: My own conscience does not permit me to accept abortion.

Before proceeding further, it might be well to remember what is permissible in the clause dealing with abortion. There is no question of legalizing abortion. On the contrary, abortion will remain illegal for any person not complying with the conditions stipulated in the amendment. What are those conditions? In fact, abortion will be permitted in cases where a competent medical board, in a recognized hospital, will have sufficient grounds to decide that the mother could be in danger of death or of becoming permanently mentally deficient.

Someone said that his mother had several children. If anyone had asked her: Which one would you do without, she really would have been hard put to pick one.

Mr. Speaker, it is not a question of asking a mother to sacrifice her children, or even of allowing a young miss who has been indiscreet to procure an abortion because her pregnancy annoys her. It is a question of allowing a mother whose life or mental health is in danger to be examined by the members of a competent medical board, in a recognized hospital. We could then go by the diagnosis of that medical board.

Some people say that doctors would abuse the law, and that some of them would be more broadminded than others. Of course, Mr. Speaker, since the beginning of times some human beings have had weaknesses. Perfection is not of this world; it only exists in heaven where, I hope, the abortion problem will not crop up. Still, we must aim towards the lesser evil and accept the best possible human control which, to my mind, this bill provides.

Let us go back now to what I said a while ago when someone stated, "My conscience will not allow me to vote for this bill." Now, I ask that person by virtue of what principle he wishes to impose upon all Canadians the dictates of his conscience?

One's conscience is a personal thing. Other Canadians feel that the bill is right. Some members of the clergy feel that the bill is right, while spokesmen of certain denominations tell us it goes too far.

What is the legislator to do? Above all, he has no right to impose his religious convictions on his fellow-citizens.

Secondly, he must ask himself whether he took adequate precautions to insure that serious principles govern and condition the legislative measure.

I ask those whose conscience dictates that they vote against the bill whether they are not troubled at the thought of condemning to death the mother of children whose life, according to doctors, is endangered by her pregnancy. Will their conscience not bother them for having condemned to death both mother and child instead of choosing and saving the life of the mother whom the other children need?

It seems to me a basic moral principle not to sentence to death in advance a mother who has experienced unforeseen difficulties in pregnancy. Besides, we are forcing no one to have an abortion. Only those who will agree to it will have one with the consent of their doctor. There is not one single mother of a family who will be obliged to have an abortion. Any attempt to impose on others one's religious principles seems a little behind the times.

Mr. Speaker, I am against abortion and I shall not allow any member of my family to have an abortion even if the law made it legal. My attitude is dictated by my conscience but I cannot impose my religious principles upon the believers of other faiths or the people who do not share my views.

If some people question the value of my argument, I should like to risk an indiscretion and relate a personal experience. I should like to remind them that I have seen my wife lying on a sick bed with three doctors at her side. They told me for two weeks that with an abortion they could save her life but because of my moral principles, they did not induce abortion and I lost my wife and child. I ask those who, are bothered by their conscience if it would not have been better to save the mother rather than to sentence to death both mother and child.

In recognized hospitals, doctors will take usual precautions. That solution is a lot better than to force a woman to get an abortion from any quack abortionist.

I have the very distinct impression that upon sober reflection, one must admit that this legislation is a step in the right direction although it it not perfect and does not go far enough. It is a step in the right direction even though to the best of one's knowledge and belief, one objects to it.

I object to homosexuality, Mr. Speaker. Personally I also object to abortion. My conscience is at peace because I shall not resort to those things. However, I cannot impose the dictates of my conscience upon others, and this is what we are trying to provide.

We should be as broad-minded as possible when considering this legislation. We should display the greatest possible measure of oecumenism—I did not coin the word—and be very considerate of all beliefs. As for those who have problems with their conscience, they simply have to waive the provisions of the act and obey the voice of their conscience.

That is why, Mr. Speaker, I believe we should support this bill. By doing so, we may not attain perfection but we will at least try to choose the lesser evil which would certainly be a remarkable achievement in a society such as ours.

• (4:10 p.m.)

[English]

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, a good deal of what I would like to say on this subject has already been well said by others in the debate and I do not want to repeat what they have said. The hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis), the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis), the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather), the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow), and this afternoon the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald), have all put forward points of view about this bill that I share. I certainly will try not to repeat their remarks, but for two reasons I would like to say a little bit about the bill. One reason is that I have had some experience in the field of criminal law in a professional way, and from this I have developed some very definite impressions and opinions. The other reason that I want to speak briefly on the bill is that quite a number of my constituents have taken the trouble to write to me on various topics covered by the bill, and I think they have a right to know where their representative stands.

I support the bill as a whole and I will vote for it on second reading. In the committee I would like to seek some amendments made that I think would be improvements and also amendments at the report stage of the bill. On the whole I think the bill is an advance but not such an advance that I greet it in such lyrical terms as the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) allowed himself when he introduced the bill. But it is an advance. I think it is an advance toward a more humane system of justice. But notwithstanding that, I agree with the hon. member for Egmont that it is really only a scratching of the surface. I welcome the bill if, and only if, it is the forerunner of a more systematic revision of the Criminal Code as a whole.

In my view we in this house should adopt the words used in the United States by Mr. Justice Brennan of the Supreme Court when he said:

> We may be at the threshold of a major re-examination of the premises which underlie our system for the administration of criminal justice.

It behooves us, not only here in Canada but in the United States, to examine our system of criminal justice to see whether it is (a) a humane system and (b) whether it is or is not effective. If we look into this matter I think we can agree that we have ignored the scientific knowledge developed in the fields of penology and criminology. Up until now the opinion has been widely held that the legal system should be made by lawyers and administered by lawyers. I am a lawyer myself but I think the legal administration of law, particularly in the field of punishment, has left us with a system which just does not work, which in actual fact does not do justice, which makes it possible for organized criminals to carry on organized crime. It leaves us with punishment which is a vicious sort of punishment, punishment that is not curative, punishment that is directed at a great many of the poor, the impoverished and the inadequate who are victims of the system.

In my view it will be the proper task of this parliament, of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs in particular, and of the new independent national law reform committee to undertake nothing less than a major re-examination of our whole system. If this bill is taken as an accomplishment of law reform and we rest on our laurels with it, then I think the bill will do more harm than good. But if it stimulates an interest and concern in this field it will be worth while.

Recently, Mr. Speaker, a book has been published which I recommend to hon. members. It is called "The Crime Of Punishment," and it is by a physician and psychiatrist, Dr. Karl Menninger, who has described our system for controlling crime as ineffective, unjust and expensive. I think that somewhere else he uses an even stronger phrase about it. He says in effect that it is crime-breeding rather than crime-preventing. These are the words of a man who has studied the system that has existed in the United States, and I do not think the system here is very different. I want to make the need for major re-examination the basic thesis of my contribution to this debate, but before doing so I should like to refer to some of the highlights of the bill.

I join with the remarks of the hon. member for Egmont and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre regarding lotteries. The provision of the bill to expand lotteries and to provide the right to the government of Canada and the governments of the provinces to conduct lotteries is anti-social and a blot upon what would otherwise be a reform of the law. I hope we will take a real look at this provision in the committee. I say this not because I greatly object to gambling—I think it is a strong human instinct which cannot be supressed entirely by law—but because it gets into the field of taxation which is inequitable, unjust and retrogressive. It exploits the desire to make easy money on the part of those people who can least afford to pay. Every state which has attempted state lotteries has been forced to abandon them because of their poor results. Yet because of some popular pressure, perhaps popular ignorance, we are urged to expand the scope of lotteries.

I have no doubt that in my own constituency the majority of my constituents would say they are in favour of expanding lotteries. I do not like to take a stand perhaps different from that of many of my constituents, but in this field my conscience requires me to say that most of them have not studied the facts. Had they done so I am sure they would agree with most of us who urge that we take this provision out of the bill. We need a more equitable and just tax system. When we need a juster tax system, why should we be denied a method of approach which is intelligent and just rather than an approach which is inequitable, inexpensive and pushes costs upwards? Lotteries are, in effect, taxes which are unjust, unreasonable and unfair, and I certainly hope to get the opportunity to vote against this part of the legislation. I will vote against what I think might turn out to be a social nuisance.

Let me say a word about the moot question of abortion. We all recognize that this is a delicate subject which involves peoples' deepest religious feelings. We are discussing the sanctity of human life. All I can say is that while I respect the views of others it is my view that it would be more convenient and more humane to take abortion out of the field of criminal law. I agree with the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway that we should remove it from the sphere of criminal law altogether. If we are to have a law in respect of abortion I think the proposal in the bill is reasonable because it specifically refers to life and health, and these are intimately interconnected. I do not understand how abortion can be said to be disregard of life when we permit an operation which may save the life and basic health of one fully developed personality at the expense of a personality that has not developed.

I cannot go into all the fine refinements of theology in respect of this matter, but I know different churches take different views. The church to which I happen to belong has recognized, I think rightly, that the views it used to hold are no longer applicable in this modern age of scientific development. I go along with that view, not entirely because that is my church but because I think it is sound sense and a matter of respect of humanity.

Let me say a word about the law in respect of homosexuality. I hope the committee will study this whole question to ascertain whether the legislation we are proposing in this field is adequate. I want to say that the basic principle in respect of this matter should be that private aberrations or illnesses should not become public crimes. If they are made into public crimes they open the door to blackmail without providing a cure of the disease. They add to the human misery which can flow from this affliction.

It is my suggestion that we look into this matter to see what other jurisdictions have done about it. Perhaps something more could be done than will be done by the provisions in this bill, although in my opinion they are steps in the right direction.

I was particularly pleased to read the proposals in the bill for the expansion of the National Parole Board. I do not want to deal with this at length because it can be dealt with in detail at a later stage. I do want to emphasize that this system has worked and worked well. It has rehabilitated many people. But those responsible in this bill have worked with inadequate facilities and without a sufficient, number of trained people to carry out the functions of supervisory parole. No arguments of economy should stop us from expanding this service which has been shown to be beneficial and, incidentally, a matter of sound economy as well. We create a sort of false economy when we cut down services of that sort. We condemn people to jail for long terms at great loss to their lives and great expense to the public. If we are to extend this system of parole we must also increase the funds available to those who are doing the actual job of supervising in the field.

In the course of this debate hon. members have made reference to the inadequacies of this so-called omnibus bill and its omissions. I suppose each one of us has a list of different omissions, but in my mind the notable omission is in respect of bail. A number of studies have been made in this regard. Learned experts have referred to the wastefulness, injustices and inequities of our bail system. Why cannot our Department of Justice prepare a revision of the bail provisions of the code?

I should like to see a new definition of insanity as a defence to a criminal charge spelled out. We now have a definition that every learned psychiatrist and medical man in the world has condemned as being inadequate. Distinguished lawyers, including my former senior partner, Chief Justice McRuer, have expressed a view which I think happens to be wrong and not in accordance with the times. They have taken an over-technical approach, as lawyers sometimes do.

I do not know why we cannot in this house, rather than somewhere else, deal with hate literature. I think there are many other spheres in which there is an urgent need for change. If this is an omnibus bill, we need not one omnibus but a whole fleet of omnibuses in order to remove the inadequate laws we have in the field of criminal law and bring in up to date provisions.

At this stage I should like to refer to a point I mentioned before when I said I would like to adopt as the theme of my remarks the need for a thoroughly radical revision of the system of criminal justice. Let me quote Dr. Menninger, an eminent psychiatrist:

> It is a well known fact that relatively few offenders are caught and most of those arrested are released. Society makes a fetish of wreaking punishment as it is called on occasional captured and convicted individuals. This is supposed to control crime by deterrence. The more valid and obvious conclusion—that getting caught is thus made the unthinkable thing—is overlooked by all but the offenders. We shut our eyes to the fact that the scapegoats must go through the mill to keep the legend of punishment alive and to keep our jails and prisons, however expensive, crowded and wretched.

I could cite passage after passage from Dr. Menninger's book. He is a person who knows what he is talking about, who has studied the facts, not the facts of some ideal system of justice, not the facts of what ought to be, but the facts of what is. Such people say we are not dealing adequately with the problem of violence. The hon. member for Egmont said that we on this continent face a very serious problem in connection with violence. We shall not solve that problem by doing more of the same, by increasing the number of police officers and jails and imposing punishments of the type that have been imposed. We will have to go a great deal deeper than this if we are to solve the problem.

In the solution of the problem we shall have to use methods of scientific research which have been adopted in other fields and found to work. We shall have to say to the lawyers and to society in general: Your system has not worked. The cold war that exists between lawyers and the social workers, psychiatrists, medical men, penologists and others expert in this field must be ended; the situation must be changed.

[Mr. Brewin.]

I tell the house quite frankly that when I studied law I was taught nothing about what happens to people after they have served a term of imprisonment. I was taught what the sections of the Criminal Code contained but nothing at all about what happens to these people because of our system. Magistrates, judges and those concerned with administering our system of justice are not as such concerned with what happens afterwards to those whom they condemn even if they are personally sympathetic. They do not have to make decisions in this respect. They have to decide whether the penalty will be imprisonment for two years, three years or six months. Whether as a result of the penalty any cure will be provided, or whether it will create more criminals and promote recidivism is not part of their concern, expertise or knowledge. We have to consider this problem and ask the lawyers, who are a group with honourable principles and many great traditions, to get together with the social scientists, the medical men and psychiatrists and study and evaluate what are the consequences of our present system and how it can be improved.

I support this bill by and large, with the exceptions I have mentioned. It is a step forward. But I want to emphasize that unless it is treated by the government, this parliament and the public as merely a first step, a move toward a radical and thorough revision of our whole system, it will be inadequate and almost a waste of time. These are subjects that deal with deeply rooted feelings, prejudices and traditions. I think we must recognize that the time has come for change, for bold revision.

I hope that the law reform committee which will be set up will be a committee that will not tinker around, as lawyers have so often done, with the wording of the Criminal Code and things of that sort. I hope the committee will seek the best possible advice from people like Dr. Menninger, for example. We know that the field of psychiatry is changing. Those engaged in this field have developed new approaches and therapies which have been far more successful than the old-fashioned psychiatry practised in the past. Until we become up to date in this field we shall race constantly the type of violence, disorder and misery that now exists which has been growing and threatens our society.

[Translation]

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, the former Bill C-195 which has become, since the last elections, Bill C-150, has benefited from a wide publicity: radio, television and newspapers alike have taken up the matter. Contrarily to many bills which are often passed without the public bothering about them, this bill is popular in every class of society. We get letters from mothers and fathers who convey to us their ideas on the subject or they use the "Letters to the Editor" or other columns which are available to them in the newspapers.

I have received quite a lot of mail since this bill was introduced in the house. In addition to the personal letters which were sent to me I have a brief from the Association des bureaux médicaux des hôpitaux de la province de Québec and also a brief from the Alliance pour la vie, located in Hull, P. Q.

We have also received recommendations, and blueprints from the Association des Parents Catholiques du Québec, from the Société Saint-Jean-Baptiste in Montreal, from the Fédération des Sociétés Saint-Jean-Baptiste du Québec, from the Foyers Notre-Dame and from les Équipes Notre-Dame, from the Chapitre métropolitain des Chevaliers de Colomb, from the Chevaliers de Champlain, from the Dames Hélène de Champlain, from the Association des Puéricultrices de la Province de Québec, from the Association des Infirmières Catholiques du Canada, from the Action Nationale, from the Fraternité des Policiers de Montréal, from the Fédération des Fraternités de policiers de la Province de Québec.

Mr. Speaker, among all these briefs, all these letters, there is just one single letter in favour of the bill as proposed; if I had to speak on behalf of all those who oppose the bill as presented, I guess it would take me at least 40 hours.

Like the previous speakers, I shall be satisfied with the forty minutes at my disposal, but I shall simply point out to you, Mr. Speaker, that forty minutes for an area of 50,000 voters do not amount even to a minute for a thousand voters and that forty minutes to deal with a bill that contains more than 100 clauses is not all that much.

So I made a choice, and the first subject that I want to talk of is the one that proposes to modify the Criminal Code so as to authorize the federal and provincial governments to organize and to manage a lottery, and to deliver permits to charitable or religious organizations to agricultural fairs or exhibitions or a private citizen so that they can organize and manage a lottery.

Mr. Speaker, we can support this bill while opposing lotteries. I think our present system is useful because a few persons only have dared to use it.

And yet we remember the prohibition era in the province of Quebec, when the few innkeepers who engaged in bootlegging became millionaires. Today, because of the distribution right and left of licences or permits, the innkeepers realize that there are too many of them and that the majority of them have financial troubles.

By legalizing lotteries and by generalizing these systems, their "beneficial" effects are cancelled, if I may use that expression.

Today, the city of Montreal's voluntary tax can be advantageous. But on the day when any one, religious associations, the federal government, the provincial governments, the cities, the municipalities, agricultural exhibitions, individuals, can do the same, in short, the day when there are as many fishermen as there is fish, it will then be realized that this clause of the bill left only disillusions and numerous victims among low income people who believed, at one time, that they had found the solution to their problems.

There is another section of the bill that does not leave any room for doubt as regards its efficiency. It is section 16. The purpose of that amending section of the law would be to oblige the driver of a motor vehicle to submit to a breathalizer test whenever it is required by a peace officer who believes, on reasonable and probable grounds, that that person's ability to drive is impaired.

Mr. Speaker, such a procedure will facilitate the work of the peace officers and will also protect citizens against abuses or errors on the part of certain peace officers. We have all seen at one time or another automobile accidents, where policemen failed to do their duty because they were dealing with influential people. It may happen however that small folk become the victims of peace officers. I am thinking about a Quebec City carpenter, head of a family, who after spending the evening at the home of friends, where he had had a few drinks went back home in his car. Now, he saw a policeman on a street corner.

Shaken by the publicity, and in good faith knowing that one must never drive whenever one's ability is impaired by alcohol instead of asking a friend to drive him home, he asked the first policeman he saw to do so. In order to help him, the peace officer accepted to take the wheel but it was to bring him to jail. The following morning, his employer had to go to the police station to bail out his employee, who had had three bottles of beer in four hours' time.

I am also thinking about a peddler, who earned his living as a retailer. Following a minor accident in a fog, he had told the policemen that he had had two small bottles of beer in a three-hour period prior to the accident. On account of the evidence given by two policemen, the man lost his driving licence for five months. Since he earned his living as a door-to-door retail salesman, he did need his automobile, but there was no way out: he had his driving permit suspended for five months.

It is not often said, but the average honest Quebec resident thinks this is about the same all over the country. The honest Canadian citizen has had at times to deal with the police force. He wants to be protected against abuses by police officers. Again, I say that this new method, the breathalizer test, is highly regarded by my compatriots. I would vote for the clause on this subject were it not for the other repulsive clauses which are included in this bill.

In fact, that part of the bill concerning homosexuality is one among others that is disgusting. In my opinion, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) is a normal person. It is indeed unfortunate that he has been compelled to work on this and to take over this responsibility.

In my opinion, some articles published in L'Ami de Saint-Benoit-du-Lac are a good example of the ridiculous situation inherited by the minister. I quote:

> The bill on homosexuality.
> The bill which aims at "legalizing" homosexuality will be talked about for quite a while. It would be a pity if honourable members took it upon themselves to enact it in its present form.
> All the ballyhooing around that topic gives the impression to many poorly informed people, that homosexuality is a normal thing, while it is a sexual perversion: the bill does not state it, and yet it should be common knowledge. During the debate on a similar bill adopted in England, people at least were courageous enough to tell it like it is, about the scourge of homosexuality. In this country, we heard men and women say on the air—

on C.B.C.

> —that they favour the legislation, because they themselves indulge in that kind of perversion; according to them, their behaviour is quite normal: they are sick, but they do not know it.

[Mr. Godin.]

> Doctors and psychiatrists agree that this deviation may often be cured; but if you allow people to think that it is a normal way of life, it is quite possible that things will get worse, instead of getting better. If authorities would agree to say that it is a disease or an abnormal psychological condition, one cannot imagine that this sexual deviation would be encouraged to spread on a plea of "freedom", as true freedom of the individual is based upon the respect of other peoples' freedom. But human nature being what it is, we can see, with horror and dismay that those who indulge in that kind of behaviour, lead astray other people, for in general they are indifferent towards the opposite sex, if not downright hostile. Is this what they want to legalize?

And the article ends with the following words:

> "But where will it all stop?"

Mr. Speaker, I also have here a long letter from Rev. Gérard Gagnon, of the Collège Sainte-Croix in Montreal. He quotes the comments of Raymond Lacoste, a French journalist who was covering the debates when the British Parliament passed the Bill legalizing homosexuality. I quote:

> The debates have shown us the extent of this evil: from 50 to 60 million unnatural acts are committed every year! The number of sexual offences, from a mere 5,000 per year in 1939, had risen to 20,000 by 1964; at the same time, the number of violent crimes had risen from 2,900 to 23,470, and the number of criminal offences from 303,000 to over one million per year.

Raymond Lacoste continues in a humorous vein which however calls for tears rather than for smiles:

> During the debates we were treated to some "weighty" considerations. Needless to say, when the question was put the ravishing young men with made up eyes who filled the galleries expressed their boundless joy with loud cheers.
> The defenders of the "dear boys" put forward all kinds of arguments ... Mr. Wood maintained seriously that homosexuality offers no risk of illegitimate birth! And what good is it to send a homosexual to jail? Is it not like sentencing a "wolf" to a few years in a harem? (This from Mr. Absi, M.P., and it brought a roar of laughter from his colleagues).

Raymond Lacoste concluded by saying that those debates revealed that the moral fibre of British youth was in danger. There are two million homosexuals in Great Britain, which shows the depth of degradation in that country. Could it be there is something rotten in the Kingdom?

Mr. Speaker, like monkeys we are imitating England. Side by side with England, we fought Germany; side by side with England, we won the war and today, like England, we go back to Germany to borrow money. In this regard, I would like to quote an article published in the newspaper L'Action of Wednesday, May 22, 1968:

Thanks to the loan of $162 million credit will become easier to get—

And we are told about the source of this credit granted to us last year.

The first of two new bond issues has been announced last week. It is a matter of $62 million issued in Western Germany marks and it is the Deutsche Bank, a German commercial bank, which will negotiate the loan.

England and Canada, which won the war by bombing Germans, are today kneeling down before them. The conquerors bend the knee before the vanquished. It is not very clever but those are facts.

Therefore I think that the Minister of Justice should not be satisfied with imitating. Obviously, the adoption of the clause regarding homosexuality will help to reduce the number of births and if the mover of the previous bill, No. C-195, the hon. member for Mount Royal, the present Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), thought of annihilating the Canadian nation, the present Minister of Justice, after the manner of England, could improve the bill by moving an amendment promoting cannibalism.

In that connection, I should like to quote from a so-called honest newpaper reporting an event which took place in England recently.

Cannibalism had never before reached Great Britain. It is now an accomplished fact. That is at least the opinion of Scotland Yard inspectors who take their stand on actual cases. Yesterday, they found in a house in the north section of London, inhabited by—

—I will not mention whom—

—pâtés of human flesh, salted and potted leg. One foot was simmering in a pressure cooker; an eye had been thrown away in a garbage can. Two persons were arrested and examined. The preserved human flesh was sent to Scotland Yard laboratory. A report will be sent to the Home Office.

• (4:50 p.m.)

Mr. Speaker, Canada was with England against Germany; it is on its side today, to borrow from the former enemy. I think the Prime Minister should not be satisfied with imitating England. He should move an amendment immediately to legalize cannibalism in Canada. It would be a real success. There would be no mistake possible; people would be destroying themselves much faster.

Mr. Speaker, paragraph (b) of subsection (1) of new section 149A deals with another matter. It allows young people of 21 or more to commit certain acts. Now before introducing a bill limiting criminal offences to persons of 21 or over, the Minister of Justice should propose that legislation be passed to compel Canadian people to carry an identity card because in the province of Quebec, people are now exchanging and lending birth certificates. Young people act this way to sneak in liquor stores without trouble. That is why I say that as long as identity cards are not made compulsory in Canada, it will be childish to set age requirements for granting certain authorizations.

With the amendment regarding homosexuality, we can expect weddings. As there are several races in Canada, I think that the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Benson) should make a statement in order to determine, in the case of weddings between persons of the same sex, in the case of a wedding for instance between an Englishman and a Frenchman, which one of them will be considered as the breadwinner, under the income tax act.

As to the clause of the bill dealing with abortion, previous speakers have eloquently dealt with it. Among them were fathers with 10 or 12 children. I recognize most humbly that it would be useless for me to try and deal with the same subject in the same capacity.

May I quote extracts of a report from the Haut comité français de la population et de la famille entitled: "The State face to abortion". I am quoting:

First of all the reader is impressed by the firm position taken on moral grounds.

But over and beyond all those empirical arguments, public Powers are basically facing an option of a moral order.

—among those rules stands respect for human life; now, abortion is unquestionably recognized to-day as the disruption of an autonomous human life.

And the report goes on to say:

Biology catches up today with the intuitions of Christian thought, the basis of our civilization. From the very beginning the Church considered abortion as homicide and nothing allows us today to think otherwise.

"To accept abortion is to accept the destruction of a child who, according to circumstances, has from 40 to 99.5 percent chances to be born normal. Would it not be better then to wait until it is born and to do away only with those children who are actually unsound? As this very idea is indefensible, it becomes clear that the motivation is inadequate. Society is oriented in the opposite direction: the progress of civilization led us to accept of the handicapped and misfits; we help them, seek their rehabilitation, their improvement, first from the human point of view, then from the medical one. Such efforts are inconsistent with a certain kind of eugenism by way of abortion—

Still, where are the real dregs of mankind to be found? I would like, at this point, to quote Georges Bastide: "It is impossible to dissociate the biological future of the human species from its moral progress; human beings without morals would mean pitiful biological waste soon to be swept away by nature.

I would like now to quote from a bulletin that was published in an Ontario city by the Emergency Organization for the defence of children to be born:

Dear member of Parliament,

Any loyal Canadian citizen cannot help but be frightened as he realizes that Canada is rushing full steam ahead into a population crisis, or rather a depopulation crisis. In some areas of Canada, the birth rate has decreased by more than 60 per cent due to oral contraceptives. This can be proved by the population figures in a single city of Ontario, namely Listowel, reported in the Listowel Banner of November 16, 1967:

POPULATION FIGURES, LISTOWEL, ONTARIO

Year	Population	Births
1963	4,246	76

And I spare the house the rest of the table. 1967, 4,447, 27 (up to November)

Such a decline in the birth rate is noticeable throughout Canada. How then can we consider even possible to pass a bill which will legalize the murder of the small number of babies being conceived?

Let us hope that Canada will not make the same mistakes as other countries. Rumania, for instance, brought upon itself such an under population problem that a whole generation was lost. The situation has become so serious that this country, where once abortion could be procured on request has found it necessary to prohibit both abortions and contraceptives.

Once a law is passed, it is difficult to repeal it. You are asked to do your utmost to prevent its passage before it is too late.

This report is signed by the president, Mrs. Olive Héron.

Mr. Speaker, may I call it five o'clock?

Mr. Speaker: Order. Before proceeding with the consideration of private members' business, will the house allow me to revert to the amendment moved earlier today by the hon. member for Compton (Mr. Latulippe)?

The Deputy Speaker then deemed advisable to take it under consideration. Since then, we thought the matter over and I am now ready to give a ruling.

First of all, I must advise the hon. member that in order to be allowed on second reading, an amendment must not relate to particulars of the clause of the bill it seeks to amend or anticipate on those which might be moved in the standing committee that will consider the said bill.

As indicated in citation 382 of Beauchesne's Fourth Edition, a member may, at the second reading stage, move a declaratory resolution of some principle adverse to those of the bill. Such is not the case here.

Citation 381 of the same author reads as follows:

On the motion for the second reading, it is out of order to discuss the clauses of the Bill.

Similar restrictions can be found in citations 388 and 389 of the same volume.

Therefore, for the reasons I have given, with the co-operation of my colleagues, I regret to say that the amendment moved by the hon. member is out of order and unacceptable at this stage of debate on the bill.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the house that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: The hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin)—National Parks—Quebec—inquiry as to development; the hon. member for Surrey (Mr. Mather)—Post Office Department—effect of increased rates on trade papers publication; the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Gilbert)—Housing—possibility of referring task force report to committee.

It being five o'clock the house will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, public bills.

PRIVATE BILLS

CANADA TRUST COMPANY—REPORT STAGE

The house proceeded to the consideration of Bill S-6, respecting the Canada Trust Company, as reported (without amendment) from the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo) moved:

That clause 1 of the said bill be deleted.

Mr. Speaker: As hon. members may know, the Chair has some doubt whether this proposed amendment is in order. There have been informal discussions about the very interesting point of order that has arisen as a result of the proposed amendment, particularly in view of the new rules under which the house operates. I would invite hon. members who may have comments to make in connection with this amendment to argue the case.

Briefly, the objection that the Chair might have to the bill is that the amendment proposes the deletion of clause 1 of the bill. There is, of course, only one clause to the bill. Perhaps this is an indirect way of inviting hon. members to vote against the bill. That is the difficulty, a difficulty of some substance, with which the Chair is faced at the moment.

Mr. Blair: Mr. Speaker, I think you have stated the problem that arises from the amendment moved by the hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. Saltsman). I do not think it was ever contemplated by the special committee on procedure that Standing Order 75, subsection 5, would be used in a case of this type. As the house is aware, one of the effects of the new Standing Orders adopted just prior to the Christmas recess was to add what is called the report stage to the consideration of any bill, be it public or private. It was provided in Standing Order 75 that at the report stage the issue would be put immediately without debate, whether or not the bill had been amended in committee. It was also provided that only in the event an hon. member had put down a motion at least 24 hours prior to the consideration of the report stage could there be any debate whatever.

I should think that the difficulty, if there be any, about the procedure at this stage might arise from the wording of subsection 5 of Standing Order 75, which reads as follows:

If, not later than twenty-four hours prior to the consideration of a report stage, written notice is given of any motion to amend, delete, insert or restore any clause in a bill, it shall be printed on a notice paper.

It might be considered by some hon. members, as indeed it may well have been considered by the hon. member who has proposed this amendment, that the inclusion in this subsection of the word "delete" gives authority to the house at this stage to consider his motion. It is my submission that this would be an incorrect and imprudent interpretation of the new rule which all of us had hoped would commend itself to the house and facilitate the procedure in this chamber in connection with both public and private bills.

It appears to me, and it is my submission, that the motion which is now before the house offends against the Standing Orders on at least three grounds. First of all, it is, as Your Honour has pointed out, apparently in contrast to the established practice of the house with respect to amendments. Second, it is my submission that it is offensive to the common sense of members in that it asks them to vote twice on a proposition which could be decided on one vote. Third, it is my contention that this type of amendment is not only contrary to the letter of the Standing Orders but certainly contrary to the spirit of the Standing Orders as amended.

May I now refer you, Mr. Speaker, to some of the authorities, with which you are undoubtedly familiar, in support of these arguments. First of all let me refer you to the 17th edition of Erskine May's Parliamentary Practice, page 414. Here the learned author sets out the purpose of an amendment under the heading "Object of an amendment and effect on debate". He states:

The object of an amendment may be either to modify a question in such a way as to increase its acceptability, or to present to the house a different proposition as an alternative to the original question.

My first submission is that the motion to delete the only clause in a one clause bill does not present this house with an alternative to the original question.

The second citation from the same volume to which I wish to refer is to be found at page 418 and deals with the type of amendments that are declared to be inadmissible by the established practice of parliament. One of the species of inadmissible amendments is covered by this statement:

The Speaker has also ruled that an amendment that was merely an expanded negative . . . could not be proposed—

Then there are extensive references to decisions of Speakers of the British house to be found in the footnotes to page 418.

Again I submit that there can be no question about the nature of this amendment. It is in exactly the same form as the vote on the substantive issue which would arise if we were permitted to proceed with the vote at the report stage.

I wish also to refer you, Mr. Speaker, to page 550 of the same volume, where the learned author discusses the proceedings in the passing of public bills. As reported at this page the learned author states:

• (5:10 p.m.)

An amendment which is equivalent to a negative of the bill, or which would reverse the principle of the bill as agreed to on the second reading, is not admissible—

He goes on to give examples and I draw to your attention the first example cited, Mr. Speaker:

The scope of the Parliamentary Elections, . . . Bill, 1880, being restricted to the repeal of a section in a statute, an amendment which proposed the continuance and extension of that section was ruled out of order. The chairman stated that, though the committee had full power to amend, even to the extent of nullifying the provisions of a bill, they could not insert a clause reversing the principle which the bill, as read a second time, sought to affirm.

I submit the situation we have here is on all fours with the situation depicted in this example, in which an amendment seeking to remove a clause from a one clause bill was ruled out of order.

May I also refer you to Beauchesne, fourth edition, citation 202 (13), which appears at page 170. Here the learned author states:

An amendment to alter the main question, by substituting a proposition with the opposite conclusion, is not an expanded negative and may be moved.

He goes on to say in subsection 14:

An amendment which would produce the same result as if the original motion were simply negatived is out of order.

In my submission it is clear beyond doubt that the effect of a vote on this amendment would be precisely the same as the effect of the vote on the main motion. I was in error in referring Your Honour to Citation 202 (13). I ought to have referred Your Honour to subsection 14.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): But 13 is much better.

Mr. Blair: I have cited some authorities of long standing which have governed the procedures in this chamber and which, in my submission, the committee of the house had no intention of disturbing by the adoption of the important amendments to the rules immediately before the Christmas recess. I think it would be very serious if the house were to take a stand now on the scope of amendments which can be admitted different from that which has prevailed during the long history of this chamber.

I now wish to address myself to the principle of the law as opposed to the letter of the law. It is clear that the house has already voted on second reading on the very proposition we would now be confronted with if this amendment were adopted. It is also clear that on third reading the same proposition could properly be brought before the house. If hon. members who have moved and seconded this amendment find it is out of order they have the right to call for a recorded vote at the report stage. There can be no question that any new principle, new issue or new matter of substance can be placed before the house by reason of this amendment which merely negatives the main principle of the bill. We should all face the fact that one of the purposes of bringing in the important amendments to our rules was to avoid repetitious debate and to speed up procedures in this chamber. I submit also that in the case of private bills we ought to be concerned that those who bring them before this chamber are not subjected to unfair and discriminatory time-wasting when it is important that decisions be reached.

For all these reasons I submit that this amendment, having regard to all proper considerations, ought to be considered as not being within the rules and declared out of order.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I submit to my hon. friend for Grenville-Carleton that the issue is not the time we take but the correct interpretation of the rules. He suggested that there was no doubt about the position of this matter; but I would remind him that Your Honour expressed some doubt at the beginning of this hour about this matter and suggested we might discuss it so that this doubt could be resolved.

First, Mr. Speaker, may I, even if in doing so I repeat some of the citations or quotations read by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton, point out that there is in our rules a provision for bringing in amendments at the report stage. This is what my friend, the hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. Saltsman), has done under the provisions of Standing Order 75(5), which reads as follows:

If, not later than twenty-four hours prior to the consideration of a report stage, written notice is given of any motion to amend, delete, insert or restore any clause in a bill, it shall be printed on a notice paper.

My hon. friend from Waterloo has given notice of an amendment to delete clause 1 of Bill S-6. He is now claiming the right to move his motion and have it debated and voted on under other parts of Standing Order 75.

My hon. friend from Grenville-Carleton bases his entire objection to this procedure on the ground that there is only one matter before us, namely, clause 1 of Bill S-6. May I remind him that Bill S-6 contains three parts: a title, a preamble and a clause. May I also remind him that our authorities make many references to these various parts of a bill, the title, the preamble and the clauses. My hon. friend from Waterloo has not moved an amendment to one part of a bill containing one part only; he has moved an amendment touching one of three parts of the bill, namely, touching clause 1.

I confess I had no notice that the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton would raise this point of order and I have not had time to find all the authorities on this subject. May I draw to your attention, Mr. Speaker, Standing Order 78(1) of the rules which existed before last December. I believe this provision must have been carried forward to the new rules in some way. The old rules said this:

In proceedings in committee of the whole House upon bills, the preamble is first postponed—

And I draw to your attention, after some intervening lines, these significant words:

—the preamble and title to be last considered.

In other words it is not just an independent opinion of mine that there are three parts to a bill, the title, preamble and clause or clauses. Those three parts are mentioned in the old Standing Orders and in several citations. May I also say to the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton that the case he relied on most heavily was before another parliament and, as I understood, related to a public bill. This, I suggest to Your Honour, is a different kettle of fish. This is a private bill and authorities like Beauchesne make it clear that in the case of a private bill the preamble is more significant than in a public bill, be it a private bill or a private members' public bill. The preamble is something that must be proven before the bill can be proceeded with. At the moment I am not saying whether the preamble has been proven. I am saying it is an integral part of this bill separate from the clause just as the title is a separate part. To vote on only part of the total bill is not the same as taking a vote on the bill as a whole. My hon. friend contends that because this is a one-clause bill a vote on the amendment moved by the hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. Saltsman) is simply an expanded negative. I submit that would be true if there were nothing else to the bill except clause 1. However, there are three parts, the title, the preamble and the clause.

What I want to say now is perhaps a little out of sequence, but I should like to point out that the idea of an amendment to delete a clause is not only enshrined in Standing Order 75, which I quoted a moment ago, but it was put to the test yesterday. The hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar moved an amendment at the report stage yesterday when we were debating Bill C-155 to the effect that Clause 13(3) of the said bill be deleted. One could have argued that that was an expanded negative. It was just a way of voting against subclause 3 of clause 13 of that bill. No one raised that point. I believe it is in keeping with the provision in this Standing Order that it should be possible to vote at the report stage, not against the bill as a whole but for or against the deletion of a part of that bill. If it was in order to do that yesterday on the amendment moved by the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar, then I submit it is possible to do so today.

I return to the main point which is being made by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Blair). If it were true there is nothing before us at the report stage but a clause, I admit he would have a pretty strong argument about its being an expanded negative just to defeat that clause, but there is not before us just a clause. There are three parts of the bill before us, the title, the preamble and the clause.

The preamble to a private bill is not the same as in a public bill which in some cases merely states:

Her Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada, enacts as follows:

It is something which has to be proven. In this case the preamble reads as follows:

Whereas the Canada Trust Company, hereinafter called "the Corporation", has by its petition prayed that it be enacted as hereinafter set forth, and it is expedient to grant the prayer of the petition: Therefore Her Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada, enacts as follows:

That, Mr. Speaker, is a debatable proposition.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): There must be some humour which escapes me. I welcome the laughter. At least I am being listened to.

Mr. Blair: We hope the point of humour does not escape you.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): In the days when we went into Committee of the Whole on a private bill, and this is still true in the standing committee to which a private bill is referred, the preamble to a private bill is debatable. It is not just a simple phrase—"therefore be it enacted". It contains allegations. It is cited in Beauchesne that the preamble is something which must be proven. I am talking at length about the preamble of this bill not because I am arguing or debating its validity, but to emphasize the fact it has to be proven. I am trying to make the point it is a separate proposition from the clause itself. What is before us is not just a one-shot item. It has three parts, the title, preamble and clause.

I submit it should be in order to move this kind of amendment. I suppose the hon. member, instead of moving this amendment to delete clause 1, could have moved an amendment to delete the preamble. Would the same argument have been raised? If Standing Order 75 envisages debate at the report stage when amendments are put down it does not seem consistent with that decision of the house to say on a point of order that a bill with only one clause in it is not debatable at this stage. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, to consider that if this point of order raised by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton is sustained what would stop the government from bringing in one-clause bills from now on? The government is pretty good at that. They are not only good at omnibus bills. They can write an awful lot into one clause. Any bill which the government did not want debated at the report stage could be presented as a bill with only one clause.

Mr. Aiken: That is the best argument you have come up with.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): There have been such bills. Sometimes a government amending bill seems to amend two or three sections of the original bill by lumping them all into a one-clause bill. This would result in one-clause bills, although they might cover a dozen subjects, not being capable of being amended or debated at the report stage.

I welcome the word of approval I just got from my "N.D.P." friend from Parry Sound-Muskoka. That is a reference to an error made by the press a while ago which we both enjoyed. Come on over.

Denial of the right to move an amendment to a one-clause bill is opening the door to tactics by which the right of debate at the report stage could be taken away. I submit, Mr. Speaker, this is an important point. I recognize the validity of your raising the question and asking that it be discussed. I submit very strongly that we did provide for debate at the report stage, not on the bill as a whole or of a general character but on the clauses. What my friend has done has been in keeping with the rules. He is asking that the one clause be deleted. That is separate from the question whether the title or preamble carries. I realize they would not be worth much without the clause. They are separate parts from the clause itself.

If I may borrow the language used by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton, Mr. Speaker, there is no doubt at all but that this amendment is in order.

Mr. Aiken: I did not have the opportunity, Mr. Speaker, of looking up the references. I must admit I was completely against the argument of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre until he pulled the last arrow from his quiver.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The hon. member was looking at me. Perhaps it was mental telepathy.

• (5:30 p.m.)

Mr. Aiken: I really could not accept his argument that striking out the clause would not in fact be a negative. The reason is that rule 75 does not permit the amendment of the preamble or the title. It refers only to deleting a clause. His suggestion that perhaps the reverse might be true and that he might move to delete the preamble, and therefore the clause, does not follow. I could not say as a matter of realism that the rules should be applied to permit a negative vote by deleting the only clause in the bill.

However, I was quite impressed with the last suggestion made by the hon. member that refusing leave to delete the only clause would open the way to the government to introduce several subjects in one clause, and thus prevent any amendment on report stage. We have argued strongly against the introduction of many subjects in one bill. For that reason alone I would think a restricted interpretation of the actual words of the rule should be followed, and the amendment be allowed.

[Translation]

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I notice that you are asking hon. members, according to standing order 75 (10), to give a few explanations concerning the proposed amendment which seems both in order and out of order for various reasons.

I would like to indicate that keeping in mind certain arguments that have been voiced—if we were in the process of discussing a public bill, I would think that the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. Saltsman) would be quite in order for the simple reason that the procedure concerning public bills is different from that of private bills. On this subject, I do not intend to repeat the arguments put forward by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) which, in my opinion, were quite appropriate.

However, Mr. Speaker, we are now discussing a private bill and consequently, a difference must be established. If, on discussing a private bill, we had reached the first, second or third reading, the amendment could be declared out of order since this would create a precedent according to the parliamentary procedure.

On the other hand, Mr. Speaker, as we are now discussing a committee report—I have obtained legal counsel on this point—I would think, as it was mentioned a minute ago, that at the committee report stage, it may be that the amendment is in order. In parliamentary wording, this is known as a "Motion to delete".

Another argument which, in my opinion, is quite appropriate and with which I agree, Mr. Speaker, although I am not an expert in this matter, is the proposition voiced by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre who said that a bill must be distinguished as to its various parts. Hence, I do not agree with the hon. member who first voiced his opinion on this subject and who said that this amendment is equal to the bill being rejected, as a distinction must be established between the different parts of a bill, namely the title, the preamble and the several paragraphs included in it.

The amendment is intended to repeal clause 1 and, in this connection, we could refer to standing order 75 (5) and say that such a thing is possible, and I quote:

> If, not later than twenty-four hours prior to the consideration of a report stage, written notice is given of any motion to amend, delete, insert or restore any clause in a bill, it shall be printed on a notice paper.

And this is in order, Mr. Speaker, since such a situation is provided for in the Standing Orders. Therefore, this is not a precedent at the committee report stage in that respect, since it is mentioned in the Standing Orders.

Mr. Speaker, I would not like to delay this debate any further. I think your skill and your experience will enable you to take in the situation, but I wish to tell you that we appreciated it when you asked for the advice of hon. members before ruling the motion in order or out of order.

As far as we are concerned, Mr. Speaker, we wish to say, with all due respect, that we would welcome your ruling it in order, for the simple reason that the first clause, and not the preamble, is involved.

[English]

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, because we are attempting to develop the new rules to be meaningful to us, it is necessary for us to explore as much as we can all the ramifications involved in any new proposal such as this. Most of us do not have the advantage that the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Blair) had in being involved intimately in the discussions of the Special Committee on Procedure, and therefore we are at a loss to know, when he says such a thing was not contemplated in the discussions, whether there is any meaning to this.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): That is his view.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): That is his interpretation of what took place in that committee, but even if the committee did not contemplate such an eventuality as the motion to amend that is before us, this does not mean it is invalid just because the committee did not think that far ahead of itself in developing these rules.

I hope I will be pardoned, Mr. Speaker, if I read Standing Order 75(5) and place a certain construction on it that may assist you immeasurably. It says:

> If, not later than twenty-four hours prior to the consideration of a report stage, written notice is given of any motion to amend, delete, insert or restore any clause in a bill, it shall be printed on a notice paper.

I want to make the point that there is a distinction in using the word "any." I am quite sure that the procedure committee carefully selected that word to be used in the broadest possible sense.

If the committee had meant this to be restricted, to give it the meaning that the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton submitted, it would have used the word "a", and thus it would have appeared:

> —written notice is given of a motion to amend . . . insert or restore a clause in a bill—

Because the word "any" is used in both cases it is implicit that it is to be interpreted in the broadest possible way and relates to any clause in any bill. That is what is before us, a motion to delete any clause in any bill, namely, clause No. 1.

I now refer to Standing Order 75(8) which states:

When the order of the day for the consideration of a report stage is called, any amendment—

Again I underline that word any. It states "any amendment," not an amendment, or a particular amendment.

—any amendment of which notice has been given in accordance with section (5) of this order shall be open to debate and amendment.

That is what we have before us "any amendment", namely, the one to delete clause 1.

I do not want to go into the very substantial argument put forward by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) that the bill consists of more than a clause, and that the use of the word any in both those instances should lead us on to the conclusion that it is to be applied in its broadest possible sense, applied in that way particularly because what we have before us is a procedural aspect of things, namely, a report from a standing committee that considered a certain bill.

If we were following the old rules of procedure and had gone into committee of the whole to consider the bill then the bill itself would be before us. But what we have before us now is a procedural item, namely, the report stage of the bill, and we should not be and cannot be precluded from moving an amendment such as that proposed by the hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. Saltsman). The argument that this is a negative or an expanded negative does not hold water because we are at report stage. If we were in the committee of the whole considering clause 1 or any other clause and a motion were made to delete a particular clause that would be a direct negative. In all probability, you would rule it out of order without inviting discussion. In this case you have expressed a doubt.

I infer from what the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Blair) has said, that if the motion to amend is out of order there will be no debate at the report stage. In other words, there will be no opportunity for the house to deal with the report itself. You must remember that the standing committee is only an extension of the house. There would then be no opportunity to have a counterbalancing action at the report stage. In this sense, if the contention of the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton has any validity at all, and I know there is a change—

[Mr. Howard (Skeena).]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I wonder whether the hon. member is convinced that his argument to this point has been strong enough to satisfy the Chair. I might inform the hon. member that after listening to all the arguments I am in a position to express an opinion and render a decision. Perhaps to satisfy the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) I might say that I do not think he could say much more which would change my mind, because I am satisfied that the position he has adopted is probably the correct one.

I was very impressed by the arguments advanced by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton. Even though I was impressed, I was not convinced. There are considerations which the Chair cannot overlook, in particular the very words used in the standing order which indicate clearly that an hon. member may do certain things at this stage of the proceedings, one of which is to move the deletion of a clause.

If the committee did not think this provision should apply to a bill which has only one clause it seems to me that should have been spelled out in some way by words or explanations. If the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton thinks that was not what was contemplated by the committee, then that aspect should be looked into. At this time we are trying to interpret the rules to the best of our joint abilities, by putting our heads together to decide in what way these rules can be interpreted reasonably. I see no possibility of interpreting this rule in any other way than what it clearly suggests.

The hon. member has cited a number of interesting quotations from Beauchesne's and May's, but it is my understanding that the citations were based on precedents which did not occur at the same stage of consideration of a bill. That is my understanding of the citations from Beauchesne's and May's.

I should like hon. members to consider this citation from May's seventeenth edition at page 566, dealing with a report stage which is substantially the same as we have under our new rules:

Amendments are moved to the bill, not to a particular clause, and amendments to leave out a clause, series of clauses or the preamble, are moved as amendments to the bill; and no question is put for each clause standing as part of the bill.

In the committee of the whole the motion is to adopt a clause. At that stage, if an hon. member moves an amendment that the clause be deleted, it is an expanded negative. However, at the report stage there is no motion to adopt a clause and a motion to delete stands by itself; so we have an absolute motion.

What the hon. member is suggesting is not an amendment to a clause but a motion to amend or, in effect, modify the bill itself. For this reason, I respectfully suggest to the hon. member that the precedents to which he has referred are not applicable to this stage of the proceedings.

I might also say that I am worried about the possible consequence which would result from a decision that this motion is out of order. If there were three clauses to a bill and there were three motions moved by three hon. members, each one of them feeling that for good reasons the particular clauses should be deleted, the Chair would then have to rule that these three motions, having as a consequence the loss of the bill, would not be acceptable. This example would indicate that it would be very difficult to make a distinction between a motion to amend a bill which contains only one clause and a motion to amend a bill which contains two, three or more clauses. For these reasons I would be inclined to think that the motion proposed by the hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. Saltsman) should be accepted by the Chair.

I thank hon. members for their valuable contributions. If it is felt that this interpretation of the rules results in difficulties, I suggest that hon. members who take part in the deliberations of the procedure committee should give the situation further thought. Then, the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton, who plays such an important role on that committee, would be placed in a particularly strong position in advancing the views he has submitted to the house this afternoon.

In view of the proceedings with which we will be faced in a moment, is it agreed that this bill be allowed to stand for consideration?

Mr. Peters: No.

Mr. Howard: Proceed with it.

Mr. Peters: Call the bill.

Mr. Speaker: It is my understanding that the motion has been put to the house. In order to be sure that hon. members are familiar with the motion, perhaps I should repeat that the hon. member for Waterloo moved that clause 1 be deleted from the bill. Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the said motion?

Mr. Saltsman: Mr. Speaker, I felt there was sufficient controversy without raising any more about the amendment. It is very important that we have an opportunity to debate this bill. I opposed it at the committee stage and I was perhaps the only one who objected to it at that time. I am very grateful now for the opportunity of presenting my arguments to the house.

The arguments I wish to place before Your Honour are not just arguments concerning this particular company, namely the Canada Trust Company. My arguments relate to all financial institutions in this country, and whether or not they should be granted increases in their authorized capital at this time. There is no desire on our part to single out this particular company. The bill concerning this company happens to be before the house, and is therefore the one that has to be debated. Other companies who make the same request will receive the same kind of scrutiny. We intend to raise the same kind of questions in respect of companies asking for an increase in authorized capital.

Mr. Blair: Mr. Speaker, I did not raise the point of order but have spoken to it. I was quite surprised that a way was not found whereby this matter could stand over for debate. I rise now on a point of order. We are debating a bill to increase the capital of one company. I suggest, for the consideration of Your Honour, that my hon. friend is placing himself out of order immediately by saying that he does not really consider it important to speak to this measure but is speaking to the general issues. He is simply using this measure as a vehicle for the propagation of his particular views on public policy.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Don't show your annoyance.

Mr. Saltsman: Mr. Speaker, I regret that the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton misinterpreted my remarks. That is the kindest way I can put it. I think it is fairly obvious that we are definitely opposed to this bill. The point I was trying to make, and I hope the hon. member appreciates it, is that we are not singling out any particular company.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have to remind the hon. member that the point of order raised by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Blair) is well taken, particularly if the hon. member considers that this is the report stage of the proceedings. The arguments now being advanced by the hon. member could be made to the house on third reading. The proposal now before the house is not for third reading of this bill but consideration of a particular amendment.

It may be that the position taken by the hon. member is an indication that the decision of the Chair was not right. If the hon. member is now suggesting that he can, at the report stage, advance exactly the same arguments that can be put forward on second and third reading, that might be a very good argument. I emphasize that the house is now considering the amendment moved by the hon. member. I suggest to him that at the report stage the rule of relevancy has to be applied very strictly. If the hon. member wants to make a general statement, he will have to do it on third reading; he cannot do it at the report stage.

Mr. Saltsman: Mr. Speaker, I will be guided by your advice, naturally. Since this is one of the first items with which we have dealt at the report stage, it will take a little time before hon. members know the limits of debate to be set by Your Honour in respect of this type of measure.

I would like to refer to some of the evidence given to the committee because therein lies the point of our objection to this bill. Before the Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs Committee on January 21, Mr. Taylor, when speaking about the Huron and Erie Mortgage Corporation said the following, which will be found on page 995 of the Minutes of Proceedings and Evidence No. 18:

> (There is a) shortage of capital that is plaguing virtually every country in the western world—

Then he said that this shortage of capital is certainly spreading to us and is having a very severe effect on the raising of interest rates. He continued:

> I also think the fact that in both the private and public sectors in Canada we have been trying to do too much in too short a time with the capital we have. We have only so much capital to use. We have been trying to use it for all manner of productive and non-productive purposes and the demand is just tremendous.

This raises the important question of the allocation of capital. The government of Canada has been attempting to restrict its activities. We think it has restricted its activities too much. The Government has stayed out of the money markets at a time when it should have been going into them to obtain capital for the needed expansion of housing, to fight a war on poverty and do all those things that our country requires at this time.

Mr. Blair: Mr. Speaker, it is with extreme regret, but also with firm conviction, that I intervene again on a point of order. It seems to me that the hon. member could not have heard your injunction that the rules of relevancy apply at this stage of debate. He is now addressing himself to the widest questions of public policy. What the hon. member is saying has no relevance to the particular private measure before the house. I suggest again, for the consideration of all hon. members, that it is not appropriate in connection with a private bill of this type to expand the debate into the broadest issues of public policy affecting the financial policy of the country.

Mr. Saltsman: On that point of order, Mr. Speaker, I think it is quite relevant. We are considering a report from the committee. I am reading from the evidence given to the committee to indicate what the argument is. I think this is very relevant at the report stage. Naturally, you cannot raise any question without dealing with the broader implications involved. What is sought in connection with the Huron and Erie Mortgage Corporation and the Canada Trust Company involves the broad question of capital allocation. That is what we are trying to discuss at this moment. We are pointing out that an increase in authorized capital of the Canada Trust Company would inhibit the opportunity of the government to do its financing in the capital markets. This is the whole point of the argument. This company can go into the money market, because it has attained an increase in its authorized capital, and divert funds to itself, to the private sector.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Having consulted hon. members earlier today and being grateful to them for the advice they gave the Chair, I should like at this time to consult them again and ascertain whether it is the wish of hon. members that the house should suspend its sitting, in view of the fact that it is six o'clock, or whether we should adjourn. We are informed that the Deputy to His Excellency the Governor General was to be in the other place in the course of the afternoon. I would like to get the advice of hon. members on this very important point of procedure.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Speaker, it would seem to me that the hour for private members' business having expired, we could conclude that part of our business and wait for the Deputy to His Excellency the Governor General to call upon us.

Mr. Speaker: Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: The hour set aside for the consideration of private members' business has now expired.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): So what do we do now?

Mr. Aiken: Wait.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): I have the honour to inform the house that a message has been received from the Senate informing this house that the Senate has passed the following bills to which the concurrence of this house is desired: Bill S-26, an act to prohibit the advertising, sale and importation of hazardous products; Bill S-28, an act to amend the Co-Operative Credit Associations Act.

The house will now resume the business that was interrupted at five o'clock.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

CRIMINAL CODE

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton) that Bill C-150, to amend the Criminal Code, the Parole Act, the Penitentiary Act, the Prisons and Reformatories Act and to make certain consequential amendments to the Combines Investigation Act, the Customs Tariff and the National Defence Act, be read a second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

[Translation]

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, before the recess I was mentioning the adverse effects which followed the legalization of abortion in some European countries.

At this stage, I would like to quote from a publication sent to me by the Emergency Organization for the Defence of Unborn Children. It is Bulletin No. 3 and I quote:

According to the figures of the World Health Organization, the world's highest suicide rates among women between 20 and 29 years of age are found in Japan and Hungary—the two countries with the highest abortion rates.

As to the results of abortion in Japan, Dr. Nobuo Shinozaki, of the Department of Health and Welfare of Japan, stated that there are more suicides among women under 24 than ever before, and that many sexual and nervous problems are due to same.

In Japan, where abortion is available practically on request, the number of births for the last ten years was not enough to replace the parents after one generation. According to Father Anthony Zimmermann, the well known priest-demographer, there are serious indications that if the compulsive trend for abortion continues in that country, the Japanese race will become extinct.

And I continue Mr. Speaker, with the views expressed by Father J.-Alphonse Beaulieu in the readers' column of a Quebec newspaper, under the title "The conscience of our M.P.'s". I quote:

It is settled. The omnibus bill legalizing among other things abortion and homosexuality will be back before parliament at the next session. What will be the attitude of our law makers faced with this challenge to our religious beliefs?

Can we, under the plea of a "pluralistic society" introduce a legislation that clashes so fiercely with natural law and social order, and, thus, with christian conscience?

Moreover, pluralistic or not, more than 90% of our Canadian society believes in God, and this is an imperative.

How can they refer to "pluralism of beliefs" to ballyhoo, without hurting the majority, a legislation in keeping with the more than dubious opinions of a very small minority? If they are dead set on demeaning themselves in the eyes of the people by introducing such a putrid legislation, let them at least allow members to vote according to their conscience. It is illogical to oblige in order to permit . . . to command so as to let people do what they want.

Why link this measure to a vote of confidence and bind the fate of the government to such a controversial legislation?

A free vote had been accepted on the bill relating to the abolition of capital punishment. Why not a free vote on the imposition of another capital punishment: the "Slaughter of Innocents"?

If the bill is preserved as presented, the member of Parliament who is a believer will have to make the best of it and to remind himself that he is a Christian before being a member of a party. Religious beliefs are not to be traded in a multi-racial society for political ideology. In any event, compulsion is a thing of the past in our time of progress, and it must be "aborted" as soon as possible.

There is so much ado about personal freedom these days that, to say the least, this is an odd and indecent practice to order a "wholesale vote", especially after having touted "pluralism". The Humanae Vitae encyclical again points out to the legislators that they must not allow "a degradation of the moral tenets of nations through legal processes . . . through practices which are contrary to natural and divine law". Paul VI is only continuing the teachings of his predecessor, John XXIII, who had warned public authorities that the problems resulting from the trends of populations "must not be solved through methods that would be unworthy of mankind and which may be explained as a purely materialistic concept of man himself and of life" (Mater et Magistra)

Mr. Speaker, when in a country such as ours which does not know how to dispose of its overproduction, we are called upon to approve legislation which would encourage mass murder, I think it is appropriate that we should ask ourselves questions and give serious consideration to the massacres that have taken place before. Let us remember the slaying of all the first-born in the Egyptian families. In Palestine, when Christ was born, there was the total slaughter of the Holy Innocents in the hope of killing the God Child. Under Nero, there was yet another slaughter of hundreds of thousands of citizens. In Cyprus, in Greece, in Egypt, people have been slain by millions. In 1918, in Hungary, there were 30,000 people butchered in three months' time. In Russia, at about the same time, 2 million bishops, priests, army officers, police officers, middle-class people, teachers, engineers, workers, farmers, were killed in the space of 18 months while at the same time, 30 million people were starved to death because of the unrest. And for the past 18 years, a very similar kind of slaughter has cost 12 million Chinese their life.

Remembering all these facts and considering the background of the member for Mont Royal (Mr. Trudeau) who is now Prime Minister, I wonder, Mr. Speaker, if the present government, with its loathsome laws on divorce, on abortion, on homosexuality, is not simply the tool of a dreadful plot against our civilization.

On the other hand; if this is not the case let us draw the conclusion that the omnibus bill should be split so as to provide every member with the opportunity to vote according to his religious beliefs and to the voice of his conscience.

The member, on his part, has to assume his responsibilities as a Christian and remember he owes his life to a Supreme Being whom he should please rather than try to please man, even if his own future or the future of his party were to be at stake.

To conclude, Mr. Speaker, may I suggest the consequences of this bill should be considered right now. Either you decide you are going to let yourself be submerged by a wave of depravation, or you resolve to assume your responsibilities.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I will devote the few minutes at my disposal to express certain views about this bill which has been so much debated and which is so debatable.

For a few months, I have sometimes read or listened to certain speeches in this house and I have realized the attitude of the present government. I think it is normal that we support certain laws when we think they will be advantageous for the population. If we study the present bill so actively today, it is because it is very important. Many things have been said, but for my part my comments will be brief. I do not want to repeat all the figures that have been mentioned since the beginning of this debate. But when one talks of a bill that elicits so many important amendments to the Criminal Code, like the lotteries, the carrying of firearms, abortion, homosexuality and when one is asked for a blanket I wonder how we can do it conscientiously and in all fairness. How can we vote freely on subjects that are so different and so controversial.

We have asked like others for a freedom at the level of the members of Parliament. We have asked for the division of the bill and we still think that every member in the house should be free to vote according to his conscience. It is of course impossible to ask members with different mentalities to think the same way. Since this bill covers many subjects, I think one must treat each member with the utmost respect, and this respect requires that hon. members be offered or given this freedom of conscience.

Mr. Speaker, I know perfectly well that because of their commitment towards their party, several members will feel badly when the time has come to vote on this bill. They will not say they are forcing them, but they will force them just the same to find reasons for not being at variance with the right hon. Prime Minister and for not placing their party in an awkward position.

I believe opinions expressed by important newspapers, those from counsellors and the representations made here in this house, should prompt members to require that the bill be split so as not to put some of us in a position that would be embarrassing to some members.

Sure enough, this bill includes provisions we are willing to support straight off. However, the bill as a whole does not permit me to accept its present wording, for it deals with lotteries. It deals with lotteries, the carrying of firearms, as well as with a very controversial subject, namely abortion. In the case of abortion a committee of three medical practitioners will have to decide whether abortion is to be proceeded with, in order to protect any person who is seeking one.

There is a section I am far from agreeing with, it is the one dealing with homosexuality. It is well recognized that there is a mental aspect, to consider. It is recognized that homosexuals are probably sick people. Personally I would like to believe they are. Therefore we should suggest the building of certain hospitals where the government would do its utmost to provide the services of certain specialists, who could take care of such people whose behaviour, to me, is completely abnormal.

Figures up to 10 per cent have been mentioned. I dare not believe it. But the fact remains that this bill will be discussed and passed by men, in this house. I have the distinct impression that they are not half men and because I am certain that they are men, we shall be able to deal with the bill humanly, of course, but realistically. I will certainly not accept to vote on this bill blindly, especially when we know that the situation at the present time in our society is most disturbing.

There is a danger of corruption and rot in society and I think that the government should—and I would subscribe to such a measure—work so as to be able to treat homosexuals and care for them.

Reprisals are out of the question or sending them to prison. Instead of reprisals against those individuals, who are a danger for society—we must admit it, and I think that we all do—I think that it would be fairer and more useful to send them to hospital to be treated.

I think that is the measure we should support. This is a way which enables us to improve society; however far be it from me to accept this thing as natural or normal.

I know that some will say that a complete improvement of society is impossible. That is obvious, but I cannot accept the bill, because it is against my principles and my nature.

I shall dispense with statistics. Several hon. members have quoted some earlier. I shall ask simply the government and the hon. members not to turn a deaf ear to the representations that are being made, especially if one takes into account the opinions that are expressed from one end of the country to the other and the fair amount of mail that the members receive from people who are qualified and serious.

The duty must always be performed in the common interest. We must try to give our society laws which tend to help it. To ignore those representations will simply mean refusing to listen or to meet the wishes of the people.

I think that when any legislation is introduced in the house, normally there is always an important part of the population that wishes for and wants its adoption. Now, it would not be true to say that the majority of the people wants the bill passed as it is drawn up, and personally, I have proof to the contrary. I know it is not a question of the majority, when we talk of 10 per cent in relation to a particular field, and I do not think that a majority must subscribe to such a legislation. Once again, while analyzing in depth all the clauses of the bill, we must first act freely about it. In this way, we will give to parliament an opinion that will be more accurate, more sincere and more concrete.

When we dealt with the question of the death penalty, nobody objected indeed everybody was pleased I think to have a free vote, in parliament and freedom of thought according to one's conscience.

By its very nature, the bill under consideration now requires this same freedom and I am pleased to say that we are given this advantage of voting freely, according to our own conscience, on this bill. I am convinced that all hon. members, including the government members, would like to enjoy that same freedom.

Therefore we recommend and hope they may enjoy such freedom, as I am convinced they will then be able to vote according to their own beliefs and conscience much more than according to their commitment towards a party. In fact, I would scarcely understand or not understand at all the present government's attitude if they obliged members to vote according to a principle, to a party's policy.

Now Mr. Speaker, the purpose of those few comments is not to take some of the other members' time. They surely have different opinions to express, and personally I remain deeply convinced that we have the right to require and to recommend freedom to vote according to our own conscience as well as the splitting of this bill. Thus, every member, the government members as well as those from the opposition, will be able by expressing their opinion and adopting a definite position, to serve society better.

[English]

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): For many years, Mr. Speaker, we have been hearing about the studies that were being undertaken in the Department of Justice to review the Criminal Code with the intention of introducing an omnibus amending act. Therefore, I can say that I welcome the opportunity this evening of making a few comments on Bill C-150. There is undoubtedly a great deal which we can support in the numerous amendments contained in the amending bill. My only regret is that in introducing the amendments the Department of Justice has seen fit to give us half measures on occasion rather than full measures, to move forward half a step instead of a full step.

It is also regrettable that in the introduction of such an omnibus bill, covering as it does 126 pages, they omitted a number of important matters which the house has been waiting to discuss. It is obvious from the correspondence all members have received, and from the speeches made in this house on this bill, that there is a great deal of interest and concern in the section which deals with abortion.

The first speaker this evening stated hon. members should have the opportunity to vote according to their religion and conscience. I wish those who have said there should be the opportunity to vote according to their religion and conscience had added the words, and knowledge and understanding.

Before I was elected to this house in 1953 I had the privilege of spending a number of years in the British Columbia legislature. During those years as an M.L.A. it was my policy each year to visit all provincial institutions, homes for the elderly, jails, reformatories, tuberculosis hospitals and mental asylums. I would like to mention one institution which I visited. I will call it the children's home provincial institution. I wish all hon. members had the opportunity to visit these asylums and provincial institutions for children. Possibly then they would understand what I mean when I say, members should vote according to their knowledge. I am not referring to what is commonly called backward or retarded children, but to those who although they have the breath of life are vegetables. Hundreds of times over the years while visiting these institutions as a member of parliament I have seen children born of a moronic father and moronic daughter. I have seen the result of a moronic boy committing incest with a moronic sister.

In going through an institution in New Westminster I have looked down into a baby's crib and have seen what I considered to be a six or seven year old child who was nothing but skin and bone, and later discovered this child was 14 years of age. I would say this child was breathing but certainly not living. I have no hesitation in saying that not only must we consider the right to be born but we must also consider the right not to be born a vegetable that medical science can keep alive until you and I are probably long dead.

I wish that all hon. members could have met, seen and tried to talk to school girls who had been raped, and who could not take the shock. I am speaking of those who did not recover and who are spending the rest of their days in the insane asylum. Having spoken to doctors, I was told that had they had the legal right to be aborted after rape they would never have gone into mental institutions.

I seriously ask hon. members to consider these matters and honestly try to provide answers. Even this bill is not going to resolve the problem. It is a step forward but I would prophesy that there will be just as many illegal abortions when this bill becomes law as there are at present, with the same risk to the life of the woman resulting from an illegal abortion.

As I say, we should think of the right not to be born as a vegetable. We should think of protecting the life and health of a woman if, for good and sufficient reasons, she does not want to bear a child once impregnated. Surely, we will eventually come to the understanding that the question of abortion is not a matter of criminal law, but should be left to the relationship and the understanding between the woman concerned and her doctor. I am convinced we will eventually come to that position. I can only wish that were the issue we were facing this evening in making a decision on this part of the bill. Even though this amendment is only a partial step forward, let us not turn it down from a biased, non-understanding point of view. Let us think before we cast our votes on this issue.

As a member of a provincial legislature I visited provincial institutions, and since becoming a member of this House of Commons I have tried to follow a similar policy. One type of institution which I visit is the penitentiaries of Canada. Though we have many amendments before us, I want to express my regret that they do not include an amendment to wipe from our statute books the policy of corporal punishment. Canada is one of the few countries of the so-called civilized world that still retains corporal punishment on its statute books. I am not one who believes in the molly-coddling of criminals. Society has got to be protected, and we have to try and rehabilitate people from their anti-social attitudes and objectives. But there is no need to retain the barbarous system of corporal punishment.

We are to decide this issue here as members of parliament, but how many members actually know what it is all about? How many have visited the penitentiaries, looked at and handled the strap or the lash? How many of us have seen the backs and the backsides of men after they have been strapped and lashed, and are in the hospital section of the penitentiary? I have, and on more than one occasion. It is completely punitive; it is non-rehabilitative. The evidence given before the joint committee of the House of Commons and Senate some years ago was conclusive. When you give a man the lash, or the paddle you don't put him in the mood for rehabilitation. You make him antagonistic to society. You add to his antisocial behaviour. You don't assist in developing his social consciousness.

I have spoken to many of the boys in reformatories and the men in penitentiaries and they are almost unanimous, as are the guards and the officials in the penitientiaries, that corporal punishment is not rehabilitative. It is archaic and should be eliminated.

I actually know of one boy who got the paddle in a reformatory. His reaction was such that when he was released there was only one thing in his mind, and that was to get back at the one who bent him over and lacerated his backside. You know, Mr. Speaker, there are holes in the paddle and it tears the flesh. That boy was so affected that he actually had the guard who paddled him over the sights of a rifle and but for a colleague who deterred him he would have pulled the trigger. I am sorry the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) has not seen fit to remove corporal punishment from the statute books of this country.

This is a very important bill, Mr. Speaker. It goes beyond the Criminal Code because, as hon. members have undoubtedly noted, it will also amend the Parole Act, the Penitentiary Act and the Prisons and Reformatories Act. I would like to deal for a moment with the matter of probation and parole. I am glad that we are moving forward, but I am sorry that the understanding and the viewpoint of the Department of Justice are so far behind the philosophy of modern penology. We are already years behind what is taking place in other countries with respect to probation and parole on a rehabilitative basis. Even with the suggested amendments we are still going to be years behind. Unfortunately, it would appear that this matter has been tackled, by whoever it was who made the study, in a slipshod and haphazard manner. No recognition was given of a fact which I think all penologists recognize, as well as organizations interested in penology. We need one completely comprehensive act in respect of probation and parole rather than a scattered or almost piecemeal approach.

We are all happy that in recent years there have been more people let out of reformatories and penitentiaries on parole. I think it is significant that, according to the commissioner of the parole board here in Ottawa, in the last ten years, 23,943 prisoners have been released on parole. Conclusive proof that this system of parole under proper supervision is successful is the fact that of the 23,943 only 2,675 were returned to the penitentiaries. Of those, only 1,347 were returned because they had again taken up a life of crime. The others apparently had broken some of the conditions of parole. These conditions state that a paroled prisoner cannot go into a beer parlour, cannot move from town to town without permission, cannot change his job without permission, cannot buy a car without permission and other things of this nature. Some of these prisoners were returned for these reasons but of the 23,943 approximately 1,500 did return to a life of crime. This fact should indicate that we should enlarge or increase our parole system. I hope that in the not too distant future we begin to catch up with the federal policy in the United States.

A number of us had the privilege of going to the United States for a number of days as members of the joint committee of the House of Commons and Senate on Penitentiaries. The United States instituted this policy some three years ago. I refer to the fact that they began to allow prisoners out of jails before the period of parole eligibility, after prisoners had demonstrated a social attitude which convinced the guards, officers and educationalist, that they had been rehabilitated. These people are let out in the morning to go to work and come back at night and on weekends. They continue this procedure until such time as they are eligible for parole. These prisoners are able to support their own families and they pay room and board at the penitentiaries. This all takes place before they are eligible for parole. We were told when we were in Washington that this practice was so successful in the first year they hoped to more than double the number of people allowed out under the system in the second year.

It is my hope that we will go ahead with such a program and that we will have the power to do so. I hope we can proceed with this type of progressive, modern penology policy under the proposed amendments in this bill. A lot more people should be let out under supervised probation. Perhaps many should be put on this basis before they even enter reformatories or penitentiaries. If a judge and an investigating officer decide that these people have made a mistake, there is no need to put them behind bars.

There are some things about this bill in respect of paroles that I find difficulty in understanding. There is one part which deals with the Prisons and Reformatories Act. The principle sounds pretty good, but let me read one of the new policies which this bill enunciates.

> Where, in the opinion of an official designated by the Lieutenant Governor of the province in which a prisoner is confined in a place other than a penitentiary, it is necessary or desirable that the prisoner should be absent, with or without escort, for medical or humanitarian reasons or to assist in the rehabilitation of the prisoner at any time during his period of imprisonment, the absence of the prisoner may be authorized from time to time by such official for an unlimited period for medical reasons and for a period not exceeding 15 days for humanitarian reasons or to assist in the rehabilitation of the prisoner.

The principle is excellent. If the person designated by the Lieutenant Governor feels that a boy or a girl in a reformatory has adjusted, has a new sense of social conscience and is ready for rehabilitation, in order to assist in that rehabilitation the law of Canada will state that this person should be allowed to be absent from the reformatory for a period of time not exceeding 15 days. I am sure that a person is not going to be released for 15 days unless the official is pretty certain that the individual is ready for release. If the official is correct, and this is the right thing to do, why should he be allowed out for only 15 days? Following that time he will be returned to the reformatory. What kind of nonsense is that? The proposed measure states that the individual may be absent from time to time. Perhaps at the end of the 15 day period, the prisoner will be released again. Surely, that is too short a time in which to decide whether rehabilitation has taken place. If it has not the prisoner will be brought back. If rehabilitation has occurred, why put the individual back behind bars? A little more thought should have been given to matters of this nature, and I sincerely hope that some change will be made before this bill becomes law.

Before concluding I should like to stress another point. I am very fond of animals, as I think most members are, so I welcome the changes that will provide greater protection for animals and make more severe the penalties for those who are guilty of cruelty to animals. Why does the measure stop at that point? Why do we not follow the example of other countries and have something on our statute books about licencing and inspection of premises as well as the methods used in the name of scientific research? Millions and millions of animals are victimized and brutalized in the course of scientific research. Perhaps it is necessary that these animals be used, and I do not deny that, but I cannot understand why it is not possible to carry out this scientific research without this brutalization of animals.

As long as the present practice continues it remains a disgrace to this country. This has been a disgrace not only in the past but is a disgrace at the present and will be in the foreseeable future if we do not adopt a law in respect of licencing and inspection to give the government control over the use of animals for medical and scientific research. We must put something on the statute books in order that the government can make sure the best possible treatment is given to these animals. It almost passes all comprehension that whilst we are improving the act and making the penalties more severe for cruelty to pets, we completely ignore the millions of animals who are subjected to cruelty in the name of medical and scientific research. I say that millions of pets are subjected to this cruelty. We do not know what the figure is in Canada, but the figures given to the Congress of the United States indicated that over 250 million animals a year were used in medical and scientific research in that country. We should do something about this, and I hope we do.

When I speak of cruelty to animals I also ask why something is not being done about the cruelty inflicted on those who became a little wayward, broke the law, served their sentence, never got into trouble again, and yet for the rest of their lives are condemned because of their one mistake. Why in this omnibus bill is there not a provision to correct this situation? Members of all parties have over the years, particularly in the last session, spoken in favour of a provision to wipe out a criminal record, or at least keep it secret, if a person has behaved himself for a number of years. But there is not one word about that in the bill. Hundreds, if not thousands, are paying the penalty for our incompetence.

Let me give just one example. There is in the city of Vancouver a man in his early sixties who, when he was 17 years of age, made a mistake. The mistake was such that he did not go to jail, although he was found guilty. He has never been in trouble with the law since that day; he has kept out of trouble from the age of 17 to his sixties. He is a brilliant man. He has to my knowledge risen to executive position three times, and three times he has been fired. Why? Because the executive position required him to be bonded, and the bonding company said: He has a criminal record and we will not bond him. Now, he drives a taxi. This is just one example.

There is a grave responsibility on our shoulders when we become members of parliament. It is not to just follow our religion and conscience but to understand and have knowledge then, having understanding and knowledge, to do what is right on behalf of the people of Canada. We hope this bill will pass, but that it will pass in an expanded form.

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak on Bill C-150 there are a few observations I should like to make on certain aspects of it. The matter of abortion has created great interest. It has created great interest for as many years as the problem has been around, which is at least as long as recorded history. Arguments and opinions are firmly held by people both for and against this procedure. In the result, it seems to me that there are those who firmly hold that in conscience they cannot condone abortion under any circumstances because in their opinion life begins at the moment of conception, and therefore any interference with this natural process is wrong.

On the other hand, there are those who argue that the life and health of the mother is an important factor. If the life and health of the mother should be threatened, under certain circumstances the procedure of abortion should be carried out in an authorized, legal way. It seems to me that these two views, being firmly and sincerely held, are irreconcilable and that the conflict of ideas in this respect will not be solved by this bill any more than it has in the past.

In my opinion the provisions of this bill will not make abortion any easier in this country, although it may make it more available in certain parts of the country where heretofore hospitals in the area did not allow it. The laws on abortion have in the past been very obscure and so far as the medical profession is concerned have been the cause of some doubt. This bill will make the position of physicians more sharply delineated than previously.

At the present time abortions may be carried out in hospitals that allow them if the life and health of the pregnant woman are considered to be in danger. In practice this has meant that Catholic hospitals do not allow abortions, while non-Catholic hospitals have permitted them if they are carried out in accordance with their medical by-laws. The general pattern in the hospitals where therapeutic abortions are allowed is that an attending physician, in consultation with a duly qualified staff colleague, may decide whether a therapeutic abortion is to be performed.

In general, this practice seems to have worked fairly satisfactorily. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) has stated that no physician has been prosecuted for carrying out a therapeutic abortion. I think this indicates that the medical profession has discharged its duties in a responsible way. I would like to point out that hospitals have been quite strict in the application of this law. Furthermore, hospital accreditation and the attempt by the Medical Hospital Association to improve quality care in hospitals has resulted in a general change of attitude toward the problem and a tightening of regulations in respect of this procedure.

It seems to me that the bill does not in any way change existing conditions. If it does anything, it will further restrict the carrying out of a therapeutic abortion. It will in practice be much more difficult to have a panel of three doctors, apart from the attending physician, agree to a request by the attending physician to carry out a therapeutic abortion. In my opinion the reason is a very human one. The attending physician is responsible for the health of his patient for eight or nine months during her pregnancy; he becomes sympathetic toward her and her problems and is more amenable to her request for a therapeutic abortion if her condition in any way warrants it. Under the new act a panel of three doctors appointed by the hospital board will have to certify that the health of the patient of the attending physician would be endangered if the pregnancy were allowed to continue. Therefore the procedure will be considerably more cumbersome than in the past. Physicians are by nature most reluctant to agree to a therapeutic abortion, and in my opinion the indications for this procedure will lessen as time goes by.

There has been considerable concern that the provision with respect to a woman's mental health being affected might provide an avenue by which large numbers of abortions would be carried out, amounting almost to abortion by request. I certainly do not feel this will happen since there is in general little psychiatric indication for abortions even in the case of unmarried women. There has been some thought I believe in the minds of many people that the opening of what are considered more relaxed abortion laws will prevent so-called back street butchery. There is nothing in this bill that will materially change the number of abortions performed in other than recognized institutions. Most women who seek illegal abortion will not in any way be accommodated by this new bill, so that if there is any idea that the number of illegal abortions will be reduced, I believe it has no basis. It might be of some interest that the problem of abortion will likely recede in the future because with the wide dissemination of birth control knowledge and devices, the instances of unwanted pregnancies will likely diminish. In short, the bill does not really change what has been the accepted custom in the carrying out of this therapeutic procedure.

I would like to point out that the wording of the bill in this section leaves something to be desired and, unless amended, will create hardship and uneven application to many people living in remote areas. Section 237 states that this procedure can only be carried out in a hospital accredited by the Canadian Council on Hospital Accreditation. This is a quality control of a voluntary nature whereby hospitals endeavour to upgrade their standards. The hospital may not be accredited for many reasons, such as fire regulations, etc., having nothing to do with the ability to carry out this procedure. Also, many hospitals can never be accredited because they are too small or there is just not enough medical personnel to meet the requirements of the accrediting body. Yet, these same hospitals in outlying areas must care for patients, and unless the act is amended to include these hospitals hardship will exist. I believe that in these cases the minister of health, in conjunction with the College of Physicians and Surgeons of the provinces concerned, should specify where this procedure may be carried out.

The other point which I feel will cause considerable hardship is the requirement for a panel consisting of three qualified medical practitioners, together with an attending physician, which will mean that a minimum of four doctors will be involved. Many small communities do not have this number of physicians. It is expensive for patients to be moved to larger centres, and in some cases it might be quite dangerous to their lives or health. Unless the legislation is amended to allow for the variations of conditions where these anomalies may arise, hardship will develop. Here again I believe that the minister of health of the province concerned, in conjunction with the College of Physicians and Surgeons, would be the logical group to make provisions to meet these situations.

I am inclined to favour the section on homosexuality. I do not believe that homosexuality is deterred by criminal proceedings and I think that in practice homosexuality cannot be controlled in this manner. I do not believe that people with this bent are criminals in the accepted sense, and I think that homosexual acts in private between consenting adults can be accepted by our society as reasonable. In practice, society is already condoning much of what the section implies. However, I do feel that we must carefully and rigorously apply the law in the matter of homosexuality where attempts to seduce young people are involved and in any case where sexual deviation may endanger the general public. I do not think this section will materially change what is now already generally accepted by society's concensus concerning the practical approach to this problem.

With regard to the sections devoted to the problems of guns, I would say that the new provisions are designed for large cities and are not as applicable to our rural areas. It will be difficult for organizations such as junior rifle clubs to carry on their activities because, for instance, section 87 states that no one shall give ammunition to those under 17. Presumably, therefore the use of ammunition by a junior rifle club would be prohibited. It would have been wise for the department to have worked out a more suitable statute in collaboration with the National Fish and Game Federation.

According to section 94, casual sportsmen who are involved in a day's shooting can be made liable for what seems to be a very minor offence. I would like to point out also that in the case of reporting lost weapons, a weapon may be stolen for some time before the loss is noticed by the owner. I think that this section may be impractical.

I would like to make a suggestion to the minister, which I think he might agree is constructive, that a ballisticgram be made of every new firearm at the manufacturer's level with a record of its serial number. This in turn would be correlated with the serial and permit numbers of the registrant and would make it considerably easier to correlate bullets and firearms from the central registry.

I will conclude my statement with these few remarks, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. P. V. Noble (Grey-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to delay the bill, and my remarks will be brief. Nevertheless, it is my responsibility and my duty to the people I represent to put my views on the record as well as to take cognizance of the thoughts and ideas of the many people who have written me in respect of Bill C-150.

This bill contains much that is meritorious. In fact it contains one item in which I have a special interest. I introduced it to the House of Commons by way of a question to the Minister of Justice of that day. On January 27, 1966, I put the following question to the minister:

> Would the government give consideration to amending the Criminal Code so that breathalyzer tests can be made mandatory?

I pressed the government on three other occasions in 1966 to take the necessary action to bring in this legislation. The urgent need to curb drunken driving was brought home to me forcibly at that time when a whole family of five in my riding was wiped out in one accident involving a drunken driver proceeding on the wrong side of the highway. Since that time hundreds of other people have died unnecessarily at the hands of drunken drivers because this government continued to ignore the urgency of the matter, even though the Highway Safety Council provided them with figures which indicated the costly hazard of drunken drivers.

The highway casualty lists for the first half of 1968 are available and, as usual, are appalling. In six months there were 2,143 fatalities resulting from Canadian motor vehicle accidents, 83 more than for the same period of 1967. In addition to the dead, there was a multitude of injured. The number of Canadians who survived accidents but suffered harm to some degree totalled 75,713. If there were an epidemic that took 2,143 Canadian lives in six months, the country would be in a state of wild alarm. However, the 5,522 deaths due to motor vehicle accidents in 1967 were accepted with calm resignation, and a higher total for 1968 will neither cause panic nor surprise the survivors.

I know there is some resentment across the country against the breathalyzer method but apparently there is no other way of dealing with drunken drivers. I have here an editorial taken from the Free Press Weekly of January 4, 1969, entitled "Conclusive Proof" which reads:

> Britain's breathalyzer legislation is now one year old. The results: 40,000 fewer casualties and about $35 million less damage. A total of 1,152 fewer people were killed in Britain and 11,177 fewer people were seriously injured than in the previous year, despite increased vehicle registration, and despite higher alcohol sales.
> The proof is now conclusive. The breathalyzer legislation works without being a killjoy. It has merely taught Britons that one does not drink and drive. In percentage figures the breathalyzer is held responsible for a 10 per cent drop in road casualties. If the same criterion were applied to Canada we could have saved something like 400 road deaths and 10,000 injuries.
> British transport minister R. W. Marsh has said that unless there is a further drop in the casualty figures the present legislation will be made stiffer and enforced with even more vigour. This proves another point, so violently disputed by modern penologists: That deterrence is effective. In Britain, the worst time on the road was after the pubs had closed at 10 p.m. Now the casualty rate during this period has dropped by the startling figure of 33 per cent. Clearly people are deterrent from excessive drinking and then driving home by the prospect of meeting a policeman with his breathalyzer, and facing then, not only severe penalties but automatic suspension of the driver's licence.

Criminal Code

Now, I should like to deal with some of the other matters contained in the bill. I can only echo what has already been said by other members of our party, that the bill should have been presented in divided form rather than in its present omnibus form. The bill proposes a number of good amendments which, like the breathalyzer test, should have received consideration long before now. However, it also deals with controversial issues of moral and social significance which concern the consciences of most hon. members as well as those of people across the nation.

In Canada we have always taken great pride in our freedom, but people across this country are now showing deep concern about the future of this God-given right, when matters of vital importance are being decided by one man. Especially is this true when this House of Commons is deprived of a free vote on an issue that reaches to the very soul of this nation. We realize that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) rules the cabinet with a stern hand. In the matter of the bill before us he has become a virtual dictator. The outcome of this debate is, therefore, a forgone conclusion.

Nevertheless, Mr. Speaker, I wish to take this opportunity to voice my disapproval of grouping both good and bad legislation in one bill and forcing the whole issue down the throats of the people of this country. Every piece of legislation should stand or fall on its individual merits.

I do not propose at this time to go into the details of all the issues contained in the bill before us, but I would like to make a few observations about the advisability or otherwise of amending abortion and homosexuality laws. I have consulted the Oxford Universal Dictionary as to its definition of abortion, which is as follows: "the procuring of a premature delivery so as to destroy offspring." It seems to me no one would doubt that the definition to which I have referred applies to the case in hand. In other words, Mr. Speaker, this amendment seeks to broaden the law in order to destroy offspring. It appears to me that this is the thin edge of a wedge which would open the door to removing all provisions in respect of abortion from the Criminal Code.

To my mind, there is no doubt that life begins at conception. In the vocation in which I have spent 30 years of my life, I have performed hundreds of sperm checks. It is there one finds where life begins. As far as I am concerned, wanton abortion is murder. My conscience will not let me support murder. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, on this count I shall vote against the bill.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Noble: I cannot support an amendment which would condone homosexuality. My argument in this connection is that to condone it is to support it; to support it is to encourage it. For the life of me, I cannot understand how any family man can vote in favour of this amendment. In my opinion, we should be doing all we can to discourage anything which contributes to the breakdown of morality. The fact that it was the Prime Minister who devised and put forward these amendments concerning abortion and homosexuality does not, to my mind, constitute a strong argument in favour of their adoption. He is not a family man and he does not seem to understand that children do look to their parents for leadership and direction. Believe me, Mr. Speaker, most children will have mental and conscientious reservations with regard to parents who would support measures such as these.

The support of such retrograde proposals would lead to only one thing, the rapid deterioration of the moral fibre of this nation. Surely we, as members of parliament, must hold the line with respect to moral standards. We cannot justify the repudiation of our responsibilities to our young people, to older people, too, and to generations which will follow.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I really hoped to have the floor after the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch) who resumed his seat a few moments ago, because some of his statements made the blood of the members of the Ralliement créditiste boil and I was eager to give him tit for tat.

In any event, his wild remarks were annoying, to say the least. It is surprising to note the illogical attitude of certain members who will favour the abolishment of the death penalty in order to protect bandits, as well as the protection of animals, as the hon. member has just done, while supporting abortion, and consequently the destruction of thousands of innocent children.

In his speech the hon. member told us that in the course of his political career he had visited many mental institutions, many hospitals, where he had met people suffering from some kind of physical illness whom he described as "vegetables". I suggest, in turn, that there are also "vegetables" in our society and even in this house who are not physically but mentally ill. Indeed, it is not a question of blaming the physical defects, but when one hears expressed in this house principles that are devoid of all moral or religious sense, it is a sign I think, that the person concerned is not physically, but indeed mentally ill, and that he represents another variety of "vegetable" that grows in our society.

It is said that abortion would suppress not only certain physical illnesses—and I doubt even that—but also that it would have eliminated in the past, certain mentally sick people who, unfortunately, were propounding principles on which we are far from agreeing.

Mr. Speaker, in the few minutes which are alloted to me, I wish to point out how surprising it is to observe the debatable and contradictory attitude of the hon. member for Vancouver East. Before coming to the heart of the matter I would like to pass censure in this house, on the Liberal members of the province of Quebec.

We have not yet heard of them, nor of their principles, neither do we yet know their opinion on this bill. Indeed, because of the principles in which we believe in Quebec, it is very difficult for us to understand how some members who say that they too—are devoted to certain principles, can indeed remain silent and refuse to reveal their innermost thoughts on such an important bill.

I would like to tell the house, Mr. Speaker, the basic reasons which compel our group to sternly oppose a number of provisions in bill C-150 which drastically amend several sections of the Criminal Code, in particular those concerning abortion, homosexuality and lotteries.

Mr. Speaker, it is as members of the Ralliement créditiste, as Catholics, or as plain human beings and nothing more, that we intend to fight some of the amendments now proposed by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) and first introduced by the former minister of justice who is now Prime Minister.

Our position as members of the Ralliement créditiste is as follows: In the world of today, in Canada as in any other country, the mass media tend to be concentrated into the hands of a few and the philosophy of materialism—we have had a sample of it in the statement made by the hon. member from Vancouver East—and the principles of collectivism are expressed in policies also controlled by an increasingly restricted number of people. We, from the Ralliement créditiste, do not wonder when we see our movement which offers measures based on a philosophy diametrically opposed to collectivism and materialism met by silence or misinterpreted in the eyes of the people by our enemies and by the mass media they control.

Is Mr. Molotov, the former spokesman for the Soviet Union at the United Nations responsible or not for the remarks he is supposed to have made about the social credit? I do not know, but anyhow, it does not matter. He is reported to have said that the communists knew everything about the implications of the social credit philosophy, the only one they fear in the world.

Whatever else it may be, the communists understand the basic importance of linking their policies to a philosophy and their leaders, by their malevolent charges against the social credit, have demonstrated they consider it as a serious threat to their own policy and ideology.

So do the crypto communists and their cousins, the socialists, who would place their activity under the control of the state. When the founder of Social Credit, Major C. H. Douglas, undertook a public debate with the socialist the hon. prime minister knows well, Fabian Sydney Webb, after Mr. Douglas had refuted all the objections of Mr. Webb concerning the practical application of the social credit doctrine, the latter finally admitted that he did not agree with the principles of social credit because they were contrary to his own views on the ends of man. He was aware that social credit proposals, aimed towards monetary and other reforms, were rooted in christian philosophy which he rejected.

Even today, Mr. Speaker, the enemies of social credit, when they are forced to speak of it, take great care in giving the impression that social credit is nothing more than a simple monetary reform.

In the years following the First World War, Douglas insisted on stressing the fact that any political thought should be based on Christian philosophy. He said:

> We are fighting to save Christianity and those who are fighting are those who still believe in the Christian philosophy.

The Douglas philosophy, of which social credit is the political expression, is based on the conviction that there is in the world a law of rectitude, a law of divine origin which he calls the "Canon" and which St. John, the Evangelist, called "logos", that is the law.

Thanks to his intelligence and his will power, man does not have to rely solely on his instinct to discover this law and conform to it. He must seek it actively; when he discovers it and conforms to it, he achieves harmony between the universe and its Creator; when he ignores that law or trangresses it, he destroys himself. What does it teach us, this sound law which is connected with the law of nature. What does it tell us about one of the proposed amendments to Bill C-150, the amendment on abortion? It tells us that:

> The murder of an innocent person is always a murder and it is the more hateful that the victim is defenceless.

So speaks Father Paquin, a Jesuit, in his book "Morale et Médecine", which is available at the parliamentary library. The honourable members opposite could read it with profit, instead of guffawing, for it is far easier to laugh than to understand. It is easy to laugh for you have only to do as the hon. member for Quebec-East (Mr. Duquet). Since he has been sitting in this house, he did not have the intestinal fortitude to rise and to express the opinion of his constituents.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Rondeau: Nobody has the right to take a life, be it that of a foetus. Neither the mother, nor the doctor, nor the government has a right to dispose of it at will. The mother's consent and the government's are of no importance whatever and they could not lighten the immorality of a directly murderous operation. And Father Paquin, speaking about the law of nature said:

> However, such is the nature of abortion, which can be compared to foeticide; to take the foetus out of the mother's body without which it cannot survive, is the same as to inflict a fatal wound on it, as to put its life immediately, directly and surely in danger.

[Mr. Rondeau.]

> "Direct abortion remains a high misdemeanour, even when ordered for an excellent purpose: the mother's life, for instance. But even a very good purpose cannot change a morally wrong action."

For these reasons, Mr. Speaker we Creditistes cannot accept the proposed amendments to sections 195 and 237 of the Criminal Code.

What is our position now? As Christians and Catholics, we find that morals and medicine are sometimes in conflict. Medicine as a science sees only the internal natural assets: life, integrity of limbs and health—while morality, governing the whole man and his preternatural purpose, must take into account the spiritual values. It does not allow the sacrifice those values for worldly values, such as health, fancies or passions.

Medically speaking, touchstone of an action is the medical or preventive purpose.

For those who still have morals it is the ultimate goal which is the touchstone of morality. Consequently, this criterion is absolute and has nothing to do with personal feelings or even utilitarianism.

The basic human rights recognized in the world all through history have inspired a few statements, such as The Universal Declaration of Human Rights passed by the United Nations in 1948, as stated in section 3, and I quote:

> "Everyone has the right to life, liberty and security of person."

The Canadian Bill of human rights of 1960 recognizes as stated in section 1, paragraph a), that "the right of the individual to life" exists in Canada and shall be maintained.

• (9:30 p.m.)

More precisely, the Convention safeguarding human rights and fundamental liberties, signed in Rome by the members of the Council of Europe in 1950, states the following in clause 2 (1):

> The right to life of every person is protected by law. Death cannot be inflicted intentionally, except when carrying out a death sentence delivered by a Court if the offence is punishable with that penalty and by the law.

I think I have said enough, Mr. Speaker, to prove that everywhere in the world the right to life is universally recognized. We assume that, from its conception, the child is a person and that the voluntary and deliberate destruction of a foetus in the womb of the mother, or of a child at the moment of birth, constitutes a homicide, if not a murder.

A lawyer, Mr. R. Dierkens, a professor at the law faculty of the University of Ghent,

Belgium, in a book entitled "The rights on the body and the corpse of man" which can also be found at the parliamentary library—writes that any man can claim a right to the preservation and inviolability of his being. As a lawyer, he rejects the pretension of those who assume that man enters the legal world when he is born, and I quote:

> Far from being a beginning, birth ends already an important, even decisive period of man's life which begins with conception. It is fecundation which creates a person in its entirety and individuality.

Quoting Jean Rostand of the French Academy, he writes:

> From the moment when, in the fecundated egg, chromosomes of that ovule have joined those of that spermatozoon, the hereditary personality of the child is determined once and for all ... and that egg includes virtually not any man but a particular man, a person.

One must conclude therefore that since human life marks the duration of personality, the latter begins, not at the time of birth, but from the moment of conception.

Until now, our Criminal Code recognized the existence of a human being in the womb of a woman, not as part of her body but as a being distinct from its mother. An attempt on that life is condemned as a criminal act even though it is committed by the mother or with her consent.

Furthermore, at one time, the execution of pregnant women condemned to death penalty was deferred until the birth of their child.

That means that from the standpoint of natural law and human positive law, abortion has generally been disapproved in Canada and in the world.

I should now like to deal the with the law of God and of the Church. What do they say in that connection?

As catholics—and we are proud of that—we cannot accept the amendments to the Criminal Code proposed by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner), with regard to abortion.

The fifth Commandment does not distinguish between adult and fœtus. The principle of the Decalogue is absolute:

> Thou shall not kill.

All through the centuries, the precepts of the Church and its penal legislation have always condemned abortion. The Council of Elvira in 300, the Council of Ancyra in 314, the Council of Lerida in 546, the Council of Constantinople in 692, and others afterwards have all provided very severe penalties against abortion; penalties as severe as excommunication of the perpetrators and the abettors.

However, it was during this century, during the onslaughts of materialism, which, nowadays, have even invaded this house, and on account of atheism, that the teachings of the Church dealt more clearly with the subject of abortion.

In his encyclical on Christian marriage Casti Connubii (chaste union)—copies of which can be found in the Parliament library—Pope Pius XII spoke in the following terms of attempts on a child's life, that is of abortion:

> Another crime extremely serious, by which an attempt is made against the life of the child still hidden in his mother's womb, has to be mentioned. As regards medical or "therapeutic" direction—

The matter dealt with in Bill No. C-150.

> —we have already expressed the great pity we feel for the mother who, by carrying out her natural duty, is exposed to serious dangers for her health, even for her very life; but which reason could never justify the "direct murder" of an innocent? For that is the matter in point here. Whether death is administered upon the mother or upon the child, it goes against God's and nature's precept: "Thou shalt not kill!" The life of either one is equally sacred; nobody, not even the public authorities, could ever possess a right to make an attempt against it."

That is the voice of our Church. And the pope goes on in the same vein on the inviolability of human nature. His successor, Pope Pius XII, talking to midwives and referring to the nature of their profession, reassumed the teachings of Pius XI on the inviolability of human life, and I quote:

> Every human being, even the child in his mother's womb, owes immediately to God, and not to his parents to society or to human authority his right to live. Therefore, no man, no medical, eugenic, social, economic or moral counsel can produce or confer a judicially valid right to dispose directly and deliberately of an innocent human life, that is to dispose of it with a view to its intended destruction considered either as an end or as a mean to achieve an end which perhaps in itself is not at all unlawful.
> Thus, saving a mother's life, for instance, is a noble achievement, but the direct elimination of the child as a means to attain such an end is not permitted. The life of an innocent is intangible, and any direct attempt or agression against it violates the fundamental laws without which a secured life in society is not possible.

I shall now talk about respect for life. In an allocution delivered November 26, 1951 before the large families associations, Pius XII brought the matter up again and referred once more to the question of direct abortion or murder of the child before, during or after childbirth.

However justified, the distinction between the various moments of life already conceived or not yet conceived, in the light of secular or religious law, and some civil or penal effects, according to moral law, it is in all cases a serious and guilty attempt against sacred human life.

Reference is made to the mother's life in the amendments to the Criminal Code.

In the course of this address, Pope Pius XII goes back to the question: Is the child's life to be preferred to that of the mother?

At no time and under no circumstances has the Church taught that the life of the child must be preferred to that of the mother. It is erroneous to put the question in these terms: either the life of the child of the life of the mother. No! Neither the life of the mother nor that of the child can be directly destructed. In any case, there can be but one requirement: to do the utmost to save both the life of the mother and that of the child.

But it will be argued that the life of the mother, particularly the mother of several children, is comparably worth more than the life of an unborn child.

Answering this sad question is not difficult. Inviolability of the life of an innocent being does not depend on its greater or lesser value.

Besides, who is capable of judging with certainty which of the two lives is really the most valuable? Who could tell what the future has in store for this child and to what height could bring him his achievements and his perfection.

Then, Pope Pius XII goes on to discuss accidental death of a child occurring during therapeutic treatments to the mother:

At all times, we have purposely used the expression "direct attempt to the life of the child" and "direct murder". For instance, if it were a matter of saving the life of the expecting mother, without considering her pregnancy, in the case of an urgent surgical operation or therapeutic treatment, that would, accidentally result, in the unavoidable death of the embryo, in no way sought or wanted, this act could no longer be described as a direct attempt to the life of an innocent being.

In those conditions, the operation could be allowed as other similar medical interventions, bearing always in mind that it is a question of prime interest, as life would be, and that it is impossible to wait until after the child's birth or to use some other effective means.

I shall mention the letter of Canadian Bishops. More recently and more specifically in connection with the proposed amendments to the Criminal Code relating to abortion, the Canadian Catholic Conference which speaks for the Episcopate, laid down again its instructions to the Catholics of Canada in a statement issued on December 5, 1968. It is a statement reaffirming the position of the Canadian Catholic Conference on abortion, issed by the executive committee in the name of board of directors of the same Conference, and I quote:

While discussions are going on about the proposed amendment to the act on abortion, many people still wonder why the Catholic Episcopate of Canada has taken on abortion a stronger position than on the sale of contraceptives.

The difference in attitude stems from the fact that abortion involves the sacred right to life. Therefore, once again, we declare that it is not possible to consider abortion as a personal matter, as if in that case, another person's life was not at stake.

That point is already obvious in the statement made in February 1968 by the Canadian Catholic Conference. Moreover, we wish to stress here that the stand taken by the Bishops cannot be considered as a position dictated solely by reasons of a religious or theological nature. It rather results from our deep conviction that law and social customs must be greatly respectful of that most precious possession that human life is, and in this particular case they cannot be heard if we do not speak for them. This is why our appeal is addressed first to every intelligent man concerned with those prime values. However, we must remind Catholics that they——have to abide by the teaching of the Church, regardless of a legislation intended for a pluralistic society.

...still...

The Canadian legislation on abortion must respect the invaluable honor of any human life and must render each one of us more, not less, respectful of life. This is the way civilization should plan ahead.

Several people think that by changing the act we could bring about a decrease in the number of clandestine abortions and minimize their disastrous effects, but the experience of a few countries where a similar act has been adopted tends to prove that will rather be the other way around.

In its December 1967 report, the parliamentary committee on abortion acknowledged the fact that there had been insufficient studies and inquires conducted in this field. While the bill is being considered in the House of Commons, should we not make public the findings of the studies made since the parliamentary committee's statement was issued.

Owing to its complexity, we cannot expect to solve the problem of abortion through easy solutions.

The solution we are recommending is entirely different: to promote respect of human life at all stages of its development, through education and legislation which would be an education in itself; to study carefully the frequency of illicit abortions and the means to eliminate it; to stimulate medical research; to make a real effort to help mothers in difficulty, by providing them with the resources of medecine and psychiatry; to develop an understanding attitude towards unmarried mothers and their children, as well as provide a positive answer to their needs; to increase help to mental cases; to develop a more generous and more adequate social and family policy.

As far as this bill is concerned we are now asking ourselves: Whom shall we obey? Shall we obey now Caesar or in this instance the government, or God?

There is therefore a basic contradiction between the proposed amendments to bill No. C-150 regarding abortion and the philosophy from which we seek inspiration. Those who have no problem, are those who have lost their philosophy.

As to the antinomy between what the State proposes and the teachings of our Church, let me remind you what Yves de Chartres was writing to Pope Pascal II:

When empire and churchmen live peacefully, the world is well governed. When discord sets in between them, not only do small things do not grow any more but great things themselves are doomed to destruction.

What should we do when the demands of the State go against the demands made by the Church upon Christians and when the two powers to which we are subjected are giving us opposite orders?

No man can serve two masters. So we have no choice. We will not break the laws of Jesus Christ and His Church, on the pretence of respecting secular rights. It is better to obey God than men. This answer of Peter and the other apostles to those magistrates who ordered them to do illicit deeds, we must make it ours insofar as the debate on the amendments pertaining to abortion is concerned.

Mr. Speaker, before winding up my remarks, I should like to say a word on the free vote. I earnestly ask government members, the Prime Minister and the Minister of Justice to withdraw the amendment concerning abortion.

It is the duty of the government and the legislators to protect the life of the innocent by enacting laws and providing adequate penalties; all the more must they take a stand, when life is directly involved or imperilled, as is certainly the case for the unborn in his mother's womb.

• (9:50 p.m.)

We ask hon. members of all parties not to fear to assume their responsibilities, to hold fast to their convictions, if they still have any, particularly when it comes to legislation affecting morals and contrary to their previous beliefs.

I think the Prime Minister is liberal enough, in the broad sense of the word, to allow at least a free vote on this matter.

As for us, of the Ralliement Créditiste, I say again that we will fight to the end to prevent the passage of the amendments proposed by the Minister of Justice. And at this stage, I would like to point out, as many hon. members already have, that we would have been in favour of dividing this bill. In this respect, I should like to quote an article published in the 28th of January 1969 issue of Le Devoir to the effect that the Minister of Justice has already stated there is no need to divide the bill, since at the committee stage, amendments could be moved to every clause.

This is certainly not a satisfactory answer, for if the government is actually determined to put its life at stake on this bill in its present form, it will not agree to any substantial amendment to the main sections of the bill. But the sections pertaining to abortion and homosexuality are among those main amendments.

The opposition has urged that the different areas covered in this omnibus bill be divided into at least four separate bills. It is a most legitimate request. Otherwise hon. members might as well be asked at the beginning of a session to vote in bulk the legislative program contained in the Speech from the Throne. Each party should leave its members free to vote according to their conscience. We should be informed of the opinion of each legislator, and not of the leaders of the diverse political parties.

Mr. Speaker, in concluding, we regret not to be able to accept this bill tonight, at the government house leader's request, as several of our members still have many things to say. In fact, we do not think it will be passed speedily, for it is important that the population be informed of the different views expressed by members in this house, by those who declared themselves for or against and that it be aware of those who are not courageous enough to give their opinion right now, for silence gives consent and considering the importance of a bill that will have effects in the future, people could think that we accept today homosexuality as such.

Before long, like some other countries, that proceeded the way we are doing tonight, we will have to legalize homosexuality, and soon afterwards, we will also have to pass a legislation in order to legalize marriage between homosexuals. (Laughs). We know of some countries that have legalized that. Having reached a certain degree of ridicule, why should we not put such a provision in the omnibus bill, to show to the Canadian people the real purposes the government has in mind by introducing this legislation? The least we can say, if we declare homosexual people to be sick persons, is that a few years ago, the federal legislators believed homosexual people were criminals. If at that time they provided in the Criminal Code penalties for homosexuals, why should they not today, since they are inclined to think homosexuals are sick people, delete from the Criminal Code, all that concerns homosexuals? Why not remove from the Criminal Code what we considered in the past as criminal and that we now regard simply as an illness? Does the Criminal Code, for instance, provide for penalties in the case of people with T.B.? Are penalties imposed on the mentally ill? Why then should we think of legalizing the status of homosexuality which is a form of sickness?

I claim that this bill was introduced—and this is unfortunate—by persons who perhaps wish to protect homosexuals. The mere thought of that is saddening, but we have to say it in the house. Apart from homosexuals, who could claim their freedom under Bill No. C-150?

If you want really to help those people, if you consider them to be sick, let us treat them as such, and removed from Bill No. C-150 all that deals with homosexuality.

If lawmakers associated in the past homosexuality and criminality and if they consider nowadays that homosexuality is a disease, let us introduce an amendment to the Criminal Code to remove everything that is related to homosexuality in Canada.

Mr. Speaker...

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order. I must regretfully interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired half a minute ago.

[English]

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, since there are only a few minutes to go may I call it ten o'clock?

[Mr. Rondeau.]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I just wish to confirm that tomorrow, according to the terms of the special order passed earlier today, we will be having a discussion on the federal-provincial conference.

NATIONAL PARKS—QUEBEC—CREATION OF PARKS IN THE PROVINCE

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I have already asked the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Chrétien) many questions on national parks, on the organization and development of a federal park in Quebec.

Once again, tonight, I wish to raise that matter in order to get from the minister a more precise answer. However, I have no intention to blame him too openly, because the matter before us offers reason to complain.

Mr. Speaker, while Quebec politicians speculate on the political status Quebec should have in America, the taxpayer loses every day considerable amounts of money because his leaders ignore the practical aspect of things, refuse or fail to take advantage of some federal programs which are real financial windfalls.

Such a negligence exists in several fields. Tonight, I shall restrict my remarks to one of them: federal parks. May I say right away that at the end of the fiscal year 1967-68, the central government had paid $262 million for the establishment of federal parks. Quebec got nothing of that amount, Mr. Speaker.

Why? I would like the minister to tell me why tonight.

The idea of establishing federal parks, that is maintaining large areas in their natural state for the benefit and the enjoyment of the public, originated in North America, and Canada now ranks second in the world for the number of parks.

Mr. Speaker, there are many things that could be said about that, but I must restrict my remarks because of the little time I am allowed.

• (10:00 p.m.)

Those federal parks are administered in Ottawa by the Natural Resources Branch. Under the law, namely chapter 189 of the 1952 Revised Statutes of Canada, those parks are, and I quote:

—dedicated to the people of Canada for their benefit, education and enjoyment... and shall be maintained and made use of so as to leave them unimpaired for the enjoyment of future generations.

Mr. Speaker, those tracts of land are intended to preserve picturesque sites in Canada or in Québec and to protect forests and various species of plants and animals. To allow the public to make use of that inheritance, the National Parks Branch has created camping grounds, roads, tracks, and so on.

Mr. Speaker, at the end of the fiscal year 1967-68, the federal government had spent for those national parks, as I said earlier, over $262 million. The province of Quebec did not get anything out of that sum, since it has no national park. I am almost sure that the majority of the Quebec members are not aware of that fact. Why does the province of Quebec not have a national park? This question has already been answered by the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, and I quote:

The addition to the national parks system of one or more outstanding examples of Quebec landscape would indeed be welcomed by my department. However, the establishment of new national parks is dependent upon the province concerned taking the initiative. Customarily the province invites the federal government to participate in a joint survey of potential park lands, followed by mutual agreement on a satisfactory area and subsequent action to transfer title to the lands, free of all encumbrances, from the provincial to the federal government. To date, no such invitation has been received from the Quebec provincial government.

Such a statement was made on September 25, 1967, that is, more than a year ago. What is the situation now? Since then, the federal government has spent more than $20 million and Quebec has received nothing. On September 18, 1968, the Minister of Tourism of Quebec met the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development in Ottawa to discuss that problem. Since then, officials of both governments have been studying the question and doing nothing. What will come out of those negociations? A statement should be made in a near future in this connection.

Mr. Speaker, I urge the minister not to be afraid to compromise himself, to lead the way if need be and to ask Quebec to go ahead and finally assume its responsibilities.

According to geographic and demographic criteria, we feel that Quebec should get over $60 million as recovery payment. It should already have received this amount which it has failed to collect. Ottawa should then spend approximately $6 million a year in Quebec.

These millions of dollars spent in Quebec could certainly be used effectively to eliminate some of the unemployment in the province and would no doubt favour the existence of a better balanced federalism. Mr. Speaker, I hope that our governments will soon turn in that direction.

I sincerely believe, on that score, that the Quebec government deserves a major share of the blame since it proved careless and irresponsible in not replying to the invitations of the federal government. On the other hand, I have to criticize the federal government, and especially the minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, who is content with making offers, without holding real discussions and bringing forward definite measures which would allow the province of Quebec to cease having a special status—a special status in reverse—that of an underprivileged province.

Mr. Yves Forest (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I regret that the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development is unable to be present to reply personally to the hon. member for Lotbinière, because in fact this is a very important question.

I think the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development has already told the hon. member that, several months ago, he met the minister responsible for provincial parks in Quebec who made some suggestions. A reply by the provincial authorities has not yet been received.

As was mentioned by the hon. member, I think it is up to the province to first ask for the establishment of federal parks within the limits of its jurisdiction. I do no think that the federal authorities should be blamed for neglecting to initiate projects in this field, because the federal authorities have always been prepared to receive suggestions made by all the provinces and particularly those of the province of Quebec.

As I am not an expert on this subject, I will draw to the attention of the minister the remarks made by the hon. member.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT—EFFECT OF INCREASED RATES ON TRADE PAPERS PUBLICATION

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey): Mr. Speaker, the question I should like to raise tonight is consequent on a singular question I tried to raise a few days ago during the question period. It relates to what the government intends to do about the imbalance, the injustice, and the illogic of the increase in postal rates to non-profit publications in Canada.

When I raised the question earlier it was ruled out of order and I take this opportunity of bringing the subject to the attention of the house tonight. When I raised the original question the Ottawa Citizen recorded on the front page the fact that as a result of postal rate increases to non-profit publications many of them were folding. As the headline stated, as a result of the massive postal rate increases these non-profit publications are folding up, and many others are having a hard time continuing operations. The article indicates that in some cases the increase in respect of unions, co-operatives and church organizations range up to 2,600 per cent.

This is a very serious problem which we should again consider. For many years members of this party and members of other parties in the house have urged that second class or business mail in Canada, that is publications by private or commercial firms, must pay its way. These publications should pay their share of the cost of mailing services in Canada. They should pay their fair share of the load in respect of the mail service of Canada, as the users of first-class mail have done for many years. We still hold this point of view.

When the proposals of the Postmaster General (Mr. Kierans) were before the house last fall we urged, and we urge tonight, that while rates paid by non-profit publications may be increased, these publications should not have to bear an undue, illogical burden. They should not have to pay more than their ordinary share of the increased costs of postage. I am told that union and co-operative papers, maybe the church papers, are prepared to pay an increase of up to 400 per cent or 500 per cent, but to ask that in some cases they pay an increase of 2,600 per cent or 2,700 per cent is surely unfair.

While we may admire the Postmaster General for bringing about a generally healthier situation with regard to postal rates in Canada by making the business publications pay more than they have in the past, we are right in questioning the extra load the non-profit publications will have to bear. Another question I would ask is this: In view of the protests which many members of all parties I am sure are receiving, will the government take a second look at the situation which results in the non-profit, church, union, co-operative and other association papers paying very much more than in the past, 2,000 per cent or more in some cases? Some of them may have to cease publication. Will the Government consider setting up a non-partisan committee to review their plight which results from the very severe postal rate increases?

If I had another minute or two, Mr. Speaker, I would ask one other question. If the government fails to do that, will it not consider a cabinet shuffle whereby the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Cadieux) would become the postmaster general? I understand the Minister of National Defence is in favour of keeping as they are non-profit organizations such as NATO? The Postmaster General would, I think, make an excellent defence minister because he is in favour of our withdrawing from the costly organization of NATO. I think that if this were done the non-profit publications of Canada would be in a much better position than they are at present.

Mr. Yves Forest (Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council): On behalf of the Postmaster General, I should like to reply to the question asked by the hon. member for Surrey (Mr. Mather). The answer will be somewhat similar to one which was given last Monday night, I believe, to a question asked by the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie).

The basic reason for the increases in second class mail rates is well known to hon. members. There has been no substantial increase in second class rates since 1938; unless the rates were increased, the Post Office, and therefore the Canadian taxpayer was faced with a deficit of $130 million which amounted to a subsidy by the general public to above-average users of the Post Office. The principle behind the rate increases is that of user-cost; the user pays for the service he receives. An exception has been made in the case of the publishing industry, and the total post office deficit on the handling of newspapers, magazines and periodicals will be in the order of $30 million for 1969-70.

The increases themselves are undoubtedly substantial, and had to be if any progress was to be made in reducing the deficit to bearable proportions. The amount of the increase in much less striking, however, when it is considered in dollar terms rather than in percentage terms which are misleading because of the low starting base. The average monthly magazine will be able to offset its increased mailing charge by an increase in its subscription rate of about 50 cents a year. This, surely, can be managed by an organization which is providing a valuable and well-regarded service to its readers.

As to requests for specific exception from the rate increases for particular, and worthy publications, the reason why it is not possible to meet them is obvious. Any single exception would re-open the entire field. Rather than accepting a special concession from the government, such publications will have to turn to their readers and to their supporters, in whose best interests it would be to make the necessary adjustments. In other words, those who benefit from a particular publication will have to take the responsibility for supporting it.

Proceedings on Adjournment Motion

HOUSING—POSSIBILITY OF REFERRING TASK FORCE REPORT TO COMMITTEE

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): A few days ago I asked the Minister of Transport (Mr. Hellyer) in charge of housing to refer the task force report on housing to the appropriate standing committee of the house so that the committee might examine the outrageous recommendation with respect to public housing and urban renewal.

I had three reasons for doing this. First, no standing committee of the house has ever examined the problem of housing or had an opportunity to offer any practical solutions for it. In fact, since I came here in 1965 no committee of the house has ever been called to deal with this subject, even though the opposition has made numerous requests for one to sit. Second, the composition of the task force makes one wonder as to its adequacy. When one thinks of the academics, the successful builders and the mortage men who composed this task force, one asks the question: why was no trade union representative, or representative from the Consumers Council, or representative interested in public housing, invited to join that force?

In the third place, the report of the task force on housing failed on three counts. It did not cope with the serious shortages of housing stock, more especially with the housing needs of the two-thirds of Canadian families whose incomes are less than $7,500 a year. It placed too much reliance on the private sector to supply the housing requirements, and de-emphasized the nature and the role of public housing and urban renewal. It did not indicate adequate solutions to major problems involved in buying a house, such as mortgage financing, high interest rates and the high cost of land.

Tonight, I wish to deal briefly with my criticism that the task force placed too much reliance on the private sector to supply housing requirements, and de-emphasized the nature and the role of public housing and urban renewal. When I read the recommendation in the report that the federal government initiate a thorough research program into the economic, social and psychological issues of public housing, and that until such a study had been completed and assessed no new large project should be undertaken, I was shocked. Seemingly, this conclusion was the result of the task force's examination of Toronto's Regent Park development, north and south. The report produced costs required to create those projects which were grossly inaccurate, and slandered the residents in public housing to the point of despair. To add insult to injury, it referred to public housing projects as ghettos of the poor.

It is too bad that the report failed to make a comparison between modern public housing, despite its weaknesses, and some of the appalling slums which existed before urban renewal and redevelopment. It is too bad the report failed to mention the refusal of the federal government to provide recreational facilities in public housing projects, or expose the government for its lack of interest in such matters. It is too bad the task force failed to make a study of the success of the Ontario Housing Corporation in public housing and request its president to give them the benefit of his experience in that field.

Is it any wonder City of Toronto officials thought the recommendation with regard to public housing disastrous, and that the Toronto Social Planning Council should have referred to it as kindergarten arithmetic? At a time when almost every nation has concluded that it is only through vast public housing programs that the housing needs of low income groups can be met, it is most disheartening that the task force should have attempted to discredit and disparage public housing.

This is why I asked the Minister of Transport to refer the report to a standing committee for detailed study in this regard. I regret the minister is not here tonight, but I notice that the hon. member for Toronto-Parkdale (Mr. Haidasz) is present. He knows the tremendous progress which has been made in Toronto with regard to public housing. He knows there is a long list of people waiting to get in, and I am sure his answer will show agreement with the remarks I have made.

Mr. Stanley Haidasz (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): The information available to me on this side is that the Minister of Transport (Mr. Hellyer) expects legislation concerning housing to be introduced in the House of Commons within a few weeks and referred to the appropriate standing committee for study. At that time, the committee might also wish to examine the broad range of realistic recommendations contained in the report of the task force on housing, recommendations which are designed to provide good homes at a reasonable price for all Canadians.

Motion agreed to, and the house adjourned at 10.20 p.m.

COMOX-ALBERNI, B.C.—ELECTION DECLARED VOID—NEW WRIT OF ELECTION ISSUED

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the house that I have received from the Honourable Mr. Justice J. G. Ruttan and the Honourable Mr. Justice F. C. Munroe, both of the Supreme Court of British Columbia, the two judges appointed for the trial of a petition pursuant to the Dominion Controverted Elections Act, a certificate of judgment declaring that the election in the electoral district of Comox-Alberni, British Columbia, was void.

I also have the honour to inform the house that pursuant to section 69 of the Dominion Controverted Elections Act, chapter 87, Revised Statutes of Canada, 1952, I have issued my warrant to the Chief Electoral Officer to make out a new writ of election for the said electoral district.

SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

Mr. Mark MacGuigan (Windsor-Walkerville): Mr. Speaker, I failed to catch your eye when you called for the presentation of reports by standing and special committees. I would like to ask for unanimous consent to revert to that stage so I might have the honour to present the second report of the Special Committee on Statutory Instruments.

Mr. Speaker: Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: The house considers that the hon. member has tabled the report to which he referred.

PRIVILEGES AND ELECTIONS

AGREEMENT TO PROCEED WITH MOTION FOR CONCURRENCE IN THIRD REPORT

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, there have been a number of discussions among the various groups with respect to the third report of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, which was presented to the house by the Chairman yesterday, and the motion for concurrence therein which appears on yesterday's notice paper. It has been suggested that it might meet the general convenience of the house if the matter were discussed today rather than on Monday or thereafter, which under the Standing Orders would be the first time it could be dealt with.

Therefore, I would like to make a proposal to the house which might enable us to deal with this report today without unduly inconveniencing the debate which will be taking place on the federal-provincial conference. I think there might be found to be agreement to having the motion of the hon. member for concurrence in the third report called between the hours of one and two today, that the debate on it take place during that period of time, and that if the debate be not concluded before two o'clock, it be adjourned to a future sitting of the house. I wonder whether there is general consent to that course of action being followed and, if so, I would ask that it be made an order of the house.

Inquiries of the Ministry

• (11:10 a.m.)

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, we in this party would be agreeable to this procedure, if it is arranged.

Mr. Speaker: There is a slight difficulty in that the report has not been received in its entirety at this moment. Although the last issue of the English version of the report will be in by noon today, the French version of that report will not be available. I know some hon. members have objected to the fact that there had been a motion for concurrence in a report, although the committee evidence had not been received in full. But if hon. members are satisfied, we might proceed as suggested by the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Macdonald). Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT ACT

PROTECTION OF COASTLINE AGAINST OIL LEAKAGE

Mr. Tom H. Goode (Burnaby-Richmond) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-170, to amend the Department of Transport Act.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Goode: The purpose of this bill is to bring offshore oil drilling under the control of the Department of Transport in order that the department may protect the beaches and wildlife of our coastline against massive oil leakage such as the one recently experienced on the California coast.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

HAZARDOUS SUBSTANCES

PROHIBITION OF ADVERTISING, SALE AND IMPORTATION

Hon. Otto E. Lang (for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs) moved that Bill S-26 (from the Senate), to prohibit the advertising, sale and importation of hazardous products, be now read the first time.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CO-OPERATIVE CREDIT ASSOCIATIONS ACT

PERMISSION TO SOCIETY TO BECOME FEDERALLY INCORPORATED

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance) moved that Bill S-28 (from the Senate), to amend the Co-operative Credit Associations Act, be now read the first time.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

LABOUR CONDITIONS

MEASURES TO PROVIDE EMPLOYMENT OPPORTUNITIES—RECRUITING OF STUDENTS

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance concerning the decline in employment opportunities, especially in certain parts of the country and in particular, perhaps, in connection with the reduction of recruiting activity on campuses and the decreasing prospect of students securing either temporary or permanent employment. I wonder whether we can expect the minister or one of his colleagues to make a statement at any early date outlining the measures which the government proposes to take with regard to these very serious problems.

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): I agree these are very serious problems and I should like to take the suggestion of the hon. gentleman under consideration.

Mr. H. Russell MacEwan (Central Nova): May I ask the minister—and this applies to all his cabinet colleagues—whether, when studying this matter, they would consider introducing a crash program to alleviate the heavy unemployment in the Atlantic provinces now running, I believe, at 10.1 per cent?

Mr. Benson: We always take very seriously suggestions by the hon. member.

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): In this regard, would the minister consider, too, reintroducing the federal shipbuilding subsidy which would be a great help in making employment opportunities available in the Atlantic shipyards used especially for the restoration of our fishing fleet on the east coast?

Mr. Benson: This is a matter which would have to be brought forward by the Minister of Industry, and I shall take it up with him.

Mr. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): May I ask whether the government is still considering providing some assistance to Expo, which usually hires some 2,000 students in the Montreal area?

[Translation]

Mr. Georges Valade (Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a supplementary question of the right hon. Prime Minister.

I should like to ask him what kind of assistance the government is considering to give to the city of Montreal to help them offset the high rate of unemployment which is plaguing Montreal, as well as the other Quebec regions.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I do not have anything to add to the Minister of Finance's statement, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Valade: Would the right hon. Prime Minister accept to grant direct subsidies to Man and his World, in order to fight unemployment?

Mr. Trudeau: I should like to know if the government of Quebec and the member of the opposition agree that it would be a good use of the spending power and if so, under what conditions we should use it?

Mr. Valade: May I ask the right hon. Prime Minister a further supplementary question?

Since he refuses to give assistance to alleviate unemployment, would the Prime Minister—

Mr. Trudeau: That is not what I said, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Valade: Would he say what kind of assistance is intended for Quebec?

HOUSING

IMPLEMENTATION OF TASK FORCE RECOMMENDATIONS

Mr. David Lewis (York South): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport in his capacity as minister in charge of housing and ask him whether he can now inform the house more accurately when we may expect the bill emanating from the report he tabled a couple of weeks ago.

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): I cannot say precisely when the bill will be ready, but so far everything is right on schedule and I anticipate no undue delay.

Mr. Lewis: It is difficult for hon. members to know whether the Minister is right on schedule or not. Will the Minister tell us exactly what the schedule is?

Mr. Hellyer: As has already been indicated, I am in process of preparing recommendations to the cabinet on this subject, which I hope will be dealt with shortly. As soon as the cabinet has had an opportunity to consider them, a bill will be prepared as expeditiously as a bill can be prepared.

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Inasmuch as it has been suggested that this house deals only with wheat, fish and corn, and in order to create some doubts about that proposition, may I ask when the minister will be prepared to make a statement as to the intentions of the government with regard to urban renewal schemes which have already been started? I ask this question, Mr. Speaker, because many municipalities are living in day-to-day fear about what may happen in the light of the ambiguity of recent reported statements.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Hellyer: This is a very good question, Mr. Speaker. The government will be considering its policy with respect to urban renewal at the same time as it is considering amendments to the act. An announcement will be made as soon as we have had the opportunity of reviewing our policy.

Mr. Alexander: A supplementary question, or perhaps it is a related one: In view of the fact that we have held our first national urban transportation conference, and since I know that the government will soon be making a statement on urban renewal, I am wondering whether at the same time it will consider making a statement as to the role it intends to play, or perhaps should play, in the matter of urban transportation.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, I think this statement has already been made, so far as the present is concerned.

PRIORITY FOR LOW INCOME GROUPS

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Transport. In view of the fact that the cost of living was up again last month, and that this increase falls most heavily upon the low income groups, can the minister assure the house that in this new legislation priority will be given to housing for the low income groups?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, this always has the greatest priority when we make amendments to acts and adopt policies to meet the needs of all Canadians, and in particular those with low incomes.

VIOLENT DISTURBANCES

REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATIONS BY R.C.M.P. OF MONTREAL BOMBING

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Prime Minister.

A few years ago the federal government and the R.C.M.P. launched an investigation which led to the discovery of the FLQ movement and of certain separatists responsible for bomb explosions. Now is the federal government ready to act with the same firmness and stubborness in order to find out if some Maoists, as we have heard, are responsible for this wave of terrorism which we have been experiencing in Quebec during the few last months?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I wish to say to the hon. member that the government shares his concern and that I have discussed this problem with the Solicitor General who is doing his duty in that connection.

We have naturally taken for granted that the police both of the City of Montreal and the Province of Quebec are the first responsible in the field and have been doing an excellent job. We are offering them all the co-operation they wish for.

[English]

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): May I ask the Solicitor General, by way of a supplementary question, whether the R.C.M.P. has been called to assist in the investigation of the 53 bombings in Montreal. Have they yet reported to the Solicitor General?

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, there is an arrangement between the police forces as a result of which the Montreal police or the Quebec Provincial Police, as the case may be, co-operate quite closely with the R.C.M.P. in getting any assistance and help they need. That help has been available, is available, and is being used from time to time as the occasion requires.

Mr. Paproski: Mr. Speaker, will the government not accept some responsibility for investigating organized anarchy, or must we wait until someone is killed?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION BY STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Georges Valade (Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the government house leader.

I would like to ask him whether, in view of the serious disorders which are spreading throughout Canada, particularly among students, he would be ready to call a meeting in camera of the standing committee on justice and legal affairs, in order to study this problem, together with the question of the presence of foreign agitators in Canada, and to make recommendations to the government as to what it should do to ensure order and security.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, within a few weeks this question and some related ones will be put before the standing committee on justice and legal affairs which therefore will be able to consider this at leisure.

MAINLAND CHINA—POLITICAL ACTIVITY OF DIPLOMATIC MISSION PERSONNEL

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. In view of the fact that a sizeable number of students who were involved in the sabotage and destruction at Sir George Williams University were at the time of their arrest carrying and quoting from copies of Mao Tse Tung's little red book, and in view of the recently announced statements of Lin Pao that the correct policy of communists must be to encourage upheaval in all countries, I would ask the Prime Minister if he would inform the house as to whether, in the pending negotiations with Red China on diplomatic recognition, the government is insisting that the numbers of personnel—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member can ask a question but he should not make a speech. What he is doing now is making a statement rather than asking a question.

Mr. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I am asking a direct question, and my question is simply this, whether or not in the pending negotiations with Red China the government is insisting that the numbers of personnel in any diplomatic mission in Ottawa be kept in reciprocal parity with that of the Canadian embassy in Peking, and that all such personnel from China refrain from any involvement in political activity or internal agitation with students otherwise.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

[Later:]

Mr. Thompson (Red Deer): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I submit my question was timely and pertinent. In the interest of national security and stability will you not give the Prime Minister the opportunity to answer, Mr. Speaker?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, that part of the question which is timely I will gladly answer. When we embark upon such negotiations concerning the establishment of diplomatic relations with any country we discuss the question of personnel and reciprocal arrangements. And these matters are part of the discussions going on now, or rather which have begun.

[Later:]

Mr. Thompson (Red Deer): My second supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, relates to the statement just made by the Prime Minister that negotiations are now taking place with Red China. Can the Prime Minister inform the house whether Canadian-Chinese discussions have in fact begun? Has the Chinese government replied to the invitation from Canada?

Mr. Trudeau: If the hon. member reads Hansard, Mr. Speaker, he will see that I said, "were going on now" and corrected this to "which had begun". As the Secretary of State for External Affairs indicated earlier this week, discussions have started and on-going steps will be reported in due course.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

INQUIRY AS TO SUMMER EMPLOYMENT FOR STUDENTS

Mr. Gérald Laniel (Beauharnois): I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker.

The Bell Telephone Company of Canada intends to create 1,000 summer jobs for Canadian students: Is it the intention of the federal government to set up a similar program and even perhaps consider a suggestion I made in this house with regard to the establishment of a compulsory or voluntary training service for young Canadians?

Mr. Speaker: Order.

[English]

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point or order. I have been trying to catch your eye, in the hope you would permit me to ask a question. I am not raising any objection but simply pointing a fact out.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The right hon. gentleman has caught my eye.

IMMIGRATION

ACTION TO EXCLUDE REVOLUTIONARIES

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I first brought up this matter on November 13. In the absence today of the Minister of Forestry and Rural Development, the Secretary of State and the Minister of Manpower and Immigration, I direct my question to the Prime Minister. It has to do with the necessity of the Canadian government taking action to keep out of Canada well recognized revolutionaries who are coming here and disturbing the peace in various universities and colleges. I ask, does the government intend to follow the course that was followed in the United Kingdom and also in France of keeping out individuals of communist inclination who advocate the overthrow of government by force. Secondly, in the case of students coming from foreign countries who, by their lawlessness here, undermine the rule of law, does the government intend to deport them to their own countries so that they will be able to do their work at home rather than in Canada. Their work here is to the detriment of our people.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, if the right hon. gentleman has been waiting since November for an answer to his question perhaps he ought not to have asked it on a morning when the ministers he mentioned are not in the house to answer his question.

Mr. Diefenbaker: No, no. Because of recent events I wanted an opportunity to ask my question this morning.

Mr. Trudeau: The second part of the question was dealt with by the Minister of Manpower and Immigration one or two days ago. As to the first part of the question, the right hon. gentleman knows the policy of the Canadian government; it is the same as that followed by the government of which he was the head.

Mr. Diefenbaker: No.

Mr. Trudeau: We try to prevent people who have an intention of committing criminal acts of one kind or another from entering our country. However, we have not reached the stage where we are able to read the minds of people who enter the country. We cannot exclude all people because some of them might want to speak in terms of revolution.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I ask the Prime Minister whether he is not aware that Rubin and Stokely Carmichael boasted of the way they were able to enter Canada. I would also ask him if these student revolutionaries here on sufferance whether inspired by Mao's red book or any other book, are going to be allowed to carry on their illegal if not criminal activities with impunity? Should they not be deported?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the government does not permit anyone to carry on illegal activities in Canada. In so far as our jurisdiction is concerned we are not, under the constitution, asked to administer justice for this land. It is the responsibility of the province to prosecute people who have entered here and have committed criminal acts.

Mr. Diefenbaker: For some reason the Prime Minister does not answer the question. What about officers of the Department of Manpower and Immigration, and the deportations that do take place?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Could the Prime Minister, in connection with this matter of immigration, give assurance to the house that only those who have been convicted of offences by our courts will be deported in accordance with the Immigration Act?

Mr. J. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the Prime Minister assure the house that the British tradition will be followed, which I expect the Conservatives will accept, allowing a wide range of freedom for immigration? England in the past—

An hon. Member: Let us speak for ourselves.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

[Mr. Trudeau.]

FINANCE

REQUEST FOR A CONSIDERATION OF CARTER REPORT

Mr. Henri Latulippe (Compton): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Prime Minister.

Owing to the fact that taxes have been very much discussed at the federal-provincial conference, could he tell the house whether the Carter report and its recommendations have been taken into account?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, that has been taken into account in the following way: the federal government, through the Minister of Finance and myself, has declared several times that the bill or the white paper dealing with that subject will be discussed with the provinces before being adopted by the government.

[English]

HATE LITERATURE

DISSEMINATION OF PRE-RECORDED MESSAGES BY TELEPHONE

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): My question, Mr. Speaker, is for the Solicitor General or possibly the Minister of Justice. A day ago I dialed a Toronto telephone number, 532,-4232, and listened to anti-Semitic and other forms of hate propaganda. I realize there is a Senate public bill now being considered regarding the distribution of hate propaganda. Would the minister make a statement as to whether any measures are being taken to prevent this, until the bill has been passed?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): If the hon. member would like to give me further details I will communicate them to the Attorney General of Ontario. It is within his purview to examine the facts and enforce the criminal law as it stands. The hon. member might also like to give evidence before the other place, where this matter is currently under study.

PUBLIC SERVICE

INCREASE IN SALARIES OF OFFICIALS

Mr. Lee Grills (Hastings): I would like to direct my question to the Minister of Finance. In view of the fact the government has increased the salary of the Governor of the Bank of Canada by 50 per cent from $50,000 to $75,000, has the government increased the salaries of any other government officials by a similar percentage?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question should be placed on the Order Paper.

PENSIONS

REMOVAL OF ANOMALIES IN LEGISLATION

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): I should like to direct a question, Mr. Speaker, to the Solicitor General. Is it the intention of the government to introduce legislation during this session of parliament to remove certain anomalies which exist in the pension provisions of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act?

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Solicitor General): Yes, Mr. Speaker. We hope to bring forward during this session legislation to correct some anomalies and administrative weaknesses in the R.C.M.P. legislation, armed forces pension legislation and the Public Service Superannuation Act.

Mr. MacLean: A supplementary, Mr. Speaker. I ask the Solicitor General if there are any other pension provisions which the government might improve during this session? I am thinking of the Members of Parliament Retiring Allowances Act which has serious anomalies in it.

Mr. McIlraith: I do not believe there is any provision in the legislation now being prepared relating to the Members of Parliament Retiring Allowances Act. I know that subject is of real concern and the act has many anomalies in it. Perhaps I could take the hon. member's question as a suggestion.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

PROTESTS RESPECTING DIPLOMATIC RELATIONS WITH VATICAN

Mr. P. V. Noble (Grey-Simcoe): I would like to direct a question to the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker. Would the Prime Minister tell the house to what extent he is receiving protests in respect of Canada having diplomatic relations with the Holy See, and what is the Prime Minister's attitude toward this resentment?

Mr. Speaker: I am not sure the question as asked is in order. The hon. member is asking the Prime Minister to give a policy statement. However, if hon. members feel the Prime Minister should answer the question, I have no objection.

Mr. Noble: Mr. Speaker, I am only asking for information.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I do not think I can give any useful information. There have been some protests and there has been a great deal of support.

PENITENTIARIES

SUGGESTION THAT JUDGES VISIT PENAL INSTITUTIONS

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): My question is directed to the Minister of Justice. If previous questions have any effect, our penitentiaries may be overflowing with inmates. My question relates to the press release emanating from the minister's office in connection with judges returning to school. Would the minister consider having these judges visit our penitentiaries to expand their knowledge to know just what they are sentencing people to?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is making a suggestion to the minister which I do not think can be accepted as a question.

GRAIN

WHEAT—STEPS TO COMPLETE AGREEMENT WITH RUSSIA

Mr. R. R. Southam (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): I have a question, Mr. Speaker, for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce but in his absence I will direct it to the acting minister. In view of the fact the Canadian farmers are patiently waiting for the U.S.S.R. to accept the overdue balance of 150 million bushels of wheat on the last three year contract with that country, can the minister advise what steps, if any, he or his department have taken to encourage the U.S.S.R. to finalize the balance of this important agreement?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, active steps are being taken. As the hon. member knows, negotiations are taking place. In the past it has not been considered useful to discuss publicly the steps that negotiations were taking, but I can assure the hon. member that active negotiations are being pursued.

IMMIGRATION

ASSISTANCE OF R.C.M.P. IN CHECKING APPLICANTS

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, in view of the absence today of the Minister of Manpower and Immigration I direct this question to the Solicitor General. Do the R.C.M.P. assist the immigration authorities in checking on dubious immigrants to Canada and, if so, can the minister give us an assurance that the R.C.M.P. are keeping an eye on a colleague of the notorious student leader, Danny Cohn-Bendit, who is presently in the city of Halifax attempting to foment trouble there?

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, the answer to the first part of the question is yes. As to the second part of the question, under the practice of this house I would not give any such assurance one way or the other.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): As a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, may I ask whether the role and the activities of the R.C.M.P. and other police have been investigated in regard to the events which took place at Sir George Williams University this week?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. Nystrom: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I think the Solicitor General wanted to answer my question.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

CONSULTATIONS RESPECTING PENSIONS OF RETIRED EMPLOYEES

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister without Portfolio—I refer of course to the one from the important city of Winnipeg (Mr. Richardson). My question is related to the welcome announcement just given by the Solicitor General that legislation regarding the pensions of federal superannuates is being prepared. On September 24 last the Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Richardson) said that the government was continuing to consult with the officials of the Canadian National Railways concerning the pensions of retired employees of the C.N.R. Are these consultations continuing, and is there anything to report about an increase in the pensions of retired C.N.R. employees?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, consultations are continuing but there is nothing to report at this time.

CANADIAN ECONOMY

ALLEGED ADVERSE EFFECT OF INCREASED SALARIES

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland-Colchester North): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Can the minister inform the house what the proposed increase in the salary of the Governor of the Bank of Canada does to the credibility of both the Governor and the government in their pleas to the public for fiscal restraint?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question is clearly out of order.

Mr. Coates: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, the government of Canada has been talking to the people of Canada about fiscal restraint in every possible area, yet it has increased by 50 per cent the salary of the Governor of the Bank of Canada.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Coates: The minister should be allowed to explain this to the house.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for South Western Nova.

THE SENATE

FILLING OF VACANCIES

Mr. Louis-Roland Comeau (South Western Nova): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the right hon. Prime Minister a question.

Does he intend to fill the Senate vacancies in the near future?

Mr. Speaker: I do not think that this question is urgent, and I even doubt whether it is in order.

Mr. Comeau: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker—

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I must bring to the attention of hon. members the fact that we are again running short of time, and so perhaps we might allow another member to ask a question.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

INACCURACIES IN TELEPHONE DIRECTORY

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the government house leader. I admit it is an unusual question but I do not know anyone else to whom I can address it. Can the government house leader inform us as to when the extraordinary situation relative to the phone books supplied to the Press Gallery and Members of the House of Commons will be corrected and the phone books up dated? I ask this question in view of the fact that last week we received new inserts and discovered, sir, that members of parliament who were defeated last June, and who are no longer associated with the House of Commons, are given House of Commons phone numbers, while new members were not included. This also applied to civil servants. Can we have this most fantastic situation attended to—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is government efficiency.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, as I understand it the hon. member is inquiring about defeated members of parliament and he said defeated civil servants—

Mr. Winch: I did not say defeated civil servants—

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I will inquire about them.

Mr. Winch: —and I said it was an extraordinary situation.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Champlain.

AIR TRANSPORT

INQUIRY ABOUT TRANSFER OF POINTS OF DEPARTURE

Mr. Réne Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport.

Does the shifting of Air Canada departures from Montreal to Toronto result from the delay in selecting a site for the Montreal International Airport?

[Later:]

Mr. Matte: Mr. Speaker, I am coming back to the question I have just put and I am turning it into a matter of privilege since it is extremely urgent.

In early February, an editorial was published in—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member would perhaps like to put the question again and the minister will decide whether it should be answered.

Mr. Matte: In that case, I would ask the minister whether the transfer of Air Canada departures from Montreal to Toronto stems from all this beating around the bush concerning the choice of a site for the Montreal International Airport.

Mr. Speaker: After hearing the question for the second time, I still think it unacceptable, but it might be simpler to let the minister answer.

[English]

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I must admit I did not understand the question either the first or the second time. I would be quite willing to listen once more, but I am not sure what the hon. member is referring to as being moved, or his allegation that something has moved from Montreal to Toronto. Perhaps if he would be a little more explicit I could help him.

Mr. Speaker: In view of the difficulty in this situation the minister might take note of the question when it appears in Hansard tomorrow.

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT OF AVIATION POLICY

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. In view of the concern that has been expressed by the 224 members of the Air Transport Association of Canada is it the government's intention to announce this session a consistent federal aviation policy, with special reference to a policy governing mainline and regional carriers?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, there is a policy in existence which is being implemented at the present time. In respect to regional carriers, as my hon. friend well knows, there was a considerable period when it was not possible to implement the announcements made by my predecessor but these are now in process of being implemented, and I think the situation is improving and is being well received by the industry and the travelling public. There will, of course, be further changes in due course. A number of these are under study by the government, and particularly by the Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Richardson). I do not imagine that there will be any immediate announcement, but within a reasonable length of time I have no doubt that we shall have other announcements to make to the House of Commons.

Inquiries of the Ministry

CASTLEGAR, B.C.—CONSULTATION BEFORE CHANGE IN SERVICE

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Were the municipalities involved in the operation of the Castlegar airport and other airports consulted by the Canadian Transport Commission before the decision was made to authorize B.C. Air Lines to operate local services on C.P.A.'s southern run?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think this question could easily be placed on the order paper. Perhaps if there is urgency about it, it could be discussed at the time of adjournment.

Mr. Harding: Ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

TELEVISING OF HOUSE AND COMMITTEE PROCEEDINGS

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the President of the Privy Council related to a question posed yesterday by the hon. member for Saint John-Lancaster. In view of the considerable importance and value of the broadcasting of the three constitutional conferences that have been held in the last year and a half, and the considerable difficulties encountered in reaching some kind of decision on that question with respect to this house and its committees, would the President of the Privy Council give consideration to immediate discussion and possible experimentation with such a television service, with perhaps the initial discussion taking place in the special committee on procedure?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): I will give that consideration, Mr. Speaker.

CANADA ELECTIONS ACT

REQUEST FOR REVIEW BY STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the government house leader. Noting the paucity of government orders on the order paper I wish to ask whether consideration is now being given to initiating steps for a thorough review of the Canada Elections Act by the appropriate committee?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member looks again at the notice paper he will find there is quite enough business listed on it, but it would be our intention to refer all aspects of the Canada Elections Act to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. Macquarrie: Does the minister mean the whole act?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, if we refer only the whole act this would not encompass some additional suggestions that have been made to hon. members in a recent report; so I think it would be better to have a broader reference to the committee than just the existing statute.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

ENCOURAGEMENT IN ESTABLISHING MARITIME UNION

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Finance supplementary to one asked earlier this morning regarding depressed conditions in the maritime provinces, and their need for further financial help. Would the Minister of Finance do what he can to encourage the maritime provinces in their current study of the benefits of establishing a Maritime union?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, this of course is a matter for the maritime provinces. I understand they are carrying out such discussions and I believe they have commissioned an economic study in this regard.

THE SENATE

INQUIRY AS TO ABOLITION

Mr. Henri Latulippe (Compton): Mr. Speaker, I would like to put a question to the Right Honourable Prime Minister.

I would like to ask the Right Honourable Prime Minister if he or his government thought of abolishing the Senate?

[English]

HOUSING

IMPLEMENTATION OF TASK FORCE RECOMMENDATIONS

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport, who is in charge of housing. In view of the fact that the hon. member for Parkdale informed the house last night he had been advised by the minister that legislation in respect of housing would be ready within three weeks, is it the intention of the minister to bring forth that legislation within three weeks?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Parkdale is an optimist, and so am I. Certainly everything possible will be done to prepare this legislation, but as I indicated earlier today it will take some weeks to draft it, after the government had decided on its policy. I know that my hon. friend, along with all members of the house, will give us every encouragement to move forward with this important legislation.

Mr. Stanley Haidasz (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I wish to inform the house that yesterday in answer to the question by the hon. member for Broadview I said "a few weeks", not "three weeks".

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, will the minister check with the Minister of Finance to see whether this optimism will wear off on him too?

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance is an optimist, otherwise he would not be the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Gilbert: On the question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I apologize to the hon. member for Parkdale. I thought he said "three" instead of "a few".

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

HOUSE DEBATE PROVIDED THROUGH PRE-ARRANGED MOTION TO ADJOURN

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): moved:

That this house do now adjourn.

He said:

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this debate is to permit hon. members of this House and particularly those in the opposition parties, to express their opinions about the whole process of constitutional review. Opportunity to state the position of the government was given me during the last few days. It is not my intention today to repeat what I said at that time. The importance of the conference, and of the work in which it is engaged, does require me to make a short report, however.

Those members who viewed the conference proceedings either actually, on television or through radio, are aware of the wide range of subjects which were considered, and of the even wider range of views which were expressed about those subjects. Notwithstanding the divergency of opinions, however, a considerable degree of consensus was reached as is evident in the final conference document which I have tabled today.

Obviously we did not in the three days of the conference acquire a new constitution, and no one ever suggested that that was possible. We did in those three days move a long distance toward a new Constitution.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, I should be less than frank if I did not say that I would have liked the conference to have adopted the federal proposal for an entrenched bill of rights, but I am very pleased that on many subjects we made a great deal of progress. An examination of the documents which I tabled this morning reveals that an impressive number of constitutional items were advanced an appreciable degree. The conference agreed to continue with the constitutional review, and at an accelerated pace; it was affirmed that studies of linguistic questions be undertaken by a committee of ministers; the same proposal was accepted about the item concerning the entrenchment of fundamental rights and liberties in the form of a constitutional charter; the spending power will be examined as will the question of regional disparities; the structure and role of the Senate and Supreme Court, two of the institutions of federalism, were brought into review, and so was the concept of the National Capital area, which is one of the very important institutions of federalism.

I believe this shows a remarkable degree of concensus on a large number of questions of considerable importance. There is still another aspect upon which the conference was very successful. I have in mind the opportunity it gave to the people of Canada to observe on a close and intimate basis the complexities, and the varieties, of the problems which must be taken into account in shaping the future of this vast country. The frank expressions of opinions voiced by the heads of the various provincial governments were a dramatic illustration of just how theoretical and how academic are many of the treatises which purport to explain the constitution of Canada and which purport to explain the way in which Canada is governed.

The conference was for both observers and participants an educational exercise of considerable importance. I believe we all learned much of the hopes and the complaints, the priorities and the interests, as well as the varying degrees of involvement of the several governments in Canada with this constitutional question. It permitted us all to understand better our mutual and individual problems.

[Translation]

As I say this, however, I do not intend to create an impression that our task is over. I am convinced that none of the provincial premiers want such an impression to be left. This conference established, if there were any need to establish, that all provincial governments are resolved, as is the federal government, to improving the economic opportunities of our people. It established that all provincial governments are anxious, as is the federal government, to improve the operation of our federal system. It established that all provincial governments are firm, as is this government, in a commitment to protect fundamental human rights. Of course, agreement has not been reached on the means to achieve this objective, but all heads of government have indicated their willingness to work towards a better protection of human rights. We all acknowledge that the grave difficulties we face are in part the result of oversight, in part the result of errors, but mostly because of our past inability to forecast future events. All omissions past and present were made in good faith. There has been perhaps some incapability to solve complex problems in an industrial society which is experiencing a unique type of federalism.

Nevertheless, Mr. Speaker, in the Canada of 1969 good faith and understanding, fundamental though they are to the continued development of this country, are not by themselves enough. To them must be added other ingredients: energy, discipline, a sense of urgency. The exercise in which we have engaged ourselves—making modern our constitutional framework to permit a more equitable distribution of resources and opportunities among the people of Canada—this exercise, is a complicated one. It demands of us the best that our imagination and our experience and our political skills are able to provide.

• (12 noon.)

[English]

There were some suggestions at the conference that Canadians face challenges more pressing than the reformation and redrafting of our constitution, that our energies would be better expended in seeking solutions, for instance, to current problems which require no constitutional amendment. These arguments are persuasive because they are to a large extent true. It is of little use to draft a new constitution if in the meantime financial pressures upon the many levels of government become unbearable. It is to a degree illusory to speak in terms of a bold new plan for the future if we cannot ease the intolerable conditions of poverty in which too many Canadians now live.

These arguments, I repeat, are persuasive but they are not compelling; nor do I think that they were intended to be compelling. They were intended to remind us of a very important aspect of our labours, but they were not, I believe, made in the sense that constitutional review must take second place. For if we were now to abandon the long-run for the short-run, we would have overlooked an ingredient in our lives which we dare not fail to consider. That ingredient is the future.

Even as we examine our constitution and discuss the current pressures which bear upon all levels of government, we know that there are other pressures which have scarcely been defined, let alone brought under control. The longer these pressures are allowed to continue unchecked, the more difficult will be our task to deal with them. One such difficulty which comes to mind is likely the greatest challenge to the continuation of life on this planet, the problem of environmental pollution.

Our apparent disinterest or lack of action in regard to this problem, as reflected by the widespread lack of serious study and the infrequent attempts at effective controls, may well govern the quality of life in Canada in the last three decades of this century. This challenge of pollution of our rivers and lakes, of our farmlands and forests and of the very air we breathe, cannot be met effectively in our federal state without some constitutional reform or clarification. It is important that we know which level of government is responsible and, if both, in what way they are ready to co-operate through the use of the spending power and other devices to permit these problems to be tackled properly.

I believe this is true of many other problems which are sometimes brought to the attention of this house, problems such as urban renewal of housing and urban transport. These problems cannot be dealt with properly because the present constitution is either silent or vague about the level of government which has the legal competence to tackle them. Until the constitution is brought into the 20th century in some of these respects, governments are to a large degree powerless to solve the problems either by acting alone or in co-operation with other levels of government. These are current difficulties which face Canadians and are spawned by this technological age; they could not have been foreseen 100 years ago.

Many of the subjects that we discussed, such as the spending power, which perhaps seemed theoretical to many, are at the heart of all these questions. We are very often asked, as a government, to do something about a problem that is not under federal jurisdiction. We are very often asked by some to do something which can only be done through the use of the spending power, and then we are told by others that the spending power should not be used. So it is important to clarify these issues. The examples I have given are only a few of the many reasons why there is a great, pressing need for this constitutional task to be moved forward.

Another of the reasons, and perhaps more important still, is the temper of the youth of this country. There are in Canada today more than ten million persons below the age of 25. These young people are not content to permit the future of Canada to be fettered in any fashion by the failure of governments to proceed promptly and adequately with these various tasks and with the constitutional task which lies at the bottom of any action. Forty-nine per cent of the population of Canada will not accept a relaxed and casual attitude toward these preparations for our second century.

I trust that by saying this I shall not be accused of injecting an unnecessary note of alarm or crisis or panic into an otherwise contented country. I simply say that there is an urgent need for continuing progress, that we would be misleading ourselves if we did not recognize the mood of the country. We would be misleading ourselves as well if we assumed that we are now past the most difficult part of these discussions. The most difficult parts are still to come. We the government realize it very much, and we hope that the opposition will come forward with concrete proposals which will help us in our task.

Notwithstanding these caveats, I wish to say how pleased I am with the progress made at the session of the conference which was held this week. I wish to say as well that I anticipate continued progress and at an acceptable pace. We are already setting in motion provisions for a meeting of the continuing committee of officials early in April. If there is agreement between the federal and provincial representatives of that continuing committee, I am sure we will be able to go on to the third stage of our conference in a very short period of time.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, after tabling this document which manifests the points of consensus achieved at the Constitutional Conference, I express publicly the indebtedness of the government to the officials and members of the public service of Canada who have contributed so much to this process of constitutional review. Their skillful assistance has permitted the Continuing Committee and the Conference Secretariat to contribute an immense amount of valuable and accurate material for ministerial decisions. I am sure that all members of this house join me in offering thanks to them.

[English]

The conference on the constitution is a continuing and established fact. In a period of just over 12 months it has met twice and it gives, as I said a moment ago in French, promise that it will meet more frequently in the future. Canadians will be the better for it.

Having made these general remarks, Mr. Speaker, I would prefer to sit down and listen to the opposition. Indeed, I am quite anxious to hear the opposition spokesmen on this very important subject. I hope they will not take all their time trotting out the usual clichés about failure and about zero performance. I hope they will not say on the one hand that we have been too rigid and unbending with regard to provincial demands—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Trudeau: —and on the other hand that we lack leadership and that we weaken the federal government's position in the face of the onslaught of the provinces. We expect clichés and we do not mind them but we would really like to know what the opposition parties think about the constitution.

• (12:10 p.m.)

For two years or more they have been urging that we get on with the task of constitutional reform. At various times some members have urged that a committee of the house be set up, or that there be a vast national conference of all heads of institutions in Canada, as has been suggested by other members. We would like to know now what the opposition thinks about the Canadian government's attitude and about the purpose of the conference itself. Do they believe in a total review or do they believe in a piecemeal approach? What do they think about the monarchy and about the demands concerning the monarchy that have been made by some of the provincial governments?

Mr. McGrath: You are the government. What do you think about it?

Mr. Trudeau: We have stated what we think about it. If the hon. member wants me to read the position papers of the federal government I will do it, of course, but it would be more useful if the opposition took a constructive approach. What do they think about the Supreme Court, and how do they think it should be reformed in a way acceptable to the provincial governments? How do they propose to deal with the suggestions made by some provinces concerning the appointment of judges to the Supreme Court? What do they think about the reform of the Senate about which we hear so much talk in the house? How would they deal with it? Would they abolish the Senate?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Hear, hear.

Mr. Trudeau: I would point out to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) that he is not reflecting the position taken by all the provincial governments. They do not want the abolition of the Senate; they want a Senate which would in some way reflect the provincial and regional interests in this country. What do the opposition think about this difficult problem? What do they think about the national capital, a matter on which we have made great progress?

An hon. Member: You have the mandate.

Mr. Trudeau: We have taken a position on these matters which we have developed in conjunction with our caucus. We have developed it over a period of some months and now we want to know if the opposition have different thoughts on this because we feel there is a division of opinion on this subject. For example, we have made proposals concerning the Supreme Court, and they are quite clear. We have heard from the Conservative benches suggestions for a constitutional court which would be different and apart from the Supreme Court. The Leader of the Opposition has not taken this position but apparently some members of his party from Quebec have. I would like to know the position of the opposition to use as a guideline.

What is the opposition's position on the charter of fundamental liberties which we want to put into the constitution? Do they agree with the position of some provincial premiers that there should not be such a charter and that we should leave these matters to the statute laws, or do they agree with the line of thinking which was so ably presented in the house a few years ago by the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker)?

What about linguistic rights? Here again we are in a very delicate and difficult area. There have been some taunts from the opposition on this subject but we have not yet obtained any constructive suggestions. This whole question brings us into the area of the two-nation theory which was put before the conference by the prime minister of Quebec in his brief. We know that this two-nation theory was expounded at the Montmorency conference of Conservatives a couple of years ago, and we also know that it does not mean the same thing to all members of the opposition. However, we from Quebec know that in the mouths of most of those who ran for the Conservative party in Quebec it means something quite different from what is meant by the Leader of the Opposition.

We would like to have some clarification on this subject, especially as I was told that a few days ago that eminent Conservative constitutional expert, Mr. Camp, said that at Montmorency the Conservatives hammered out a policy which is exactly the same as ours. I was very glad to hear that, but I am sure that this is not the message that got across to the province of Quebec when the Conservative candidates were speaking there last spring. This subject is all the more urgent as it was brought up again earlier this week in the brief of the province of Quebec. In that brief the Quebec Government also included provisions for a special status. We know that the New Democratic Party last year moved a non-confidence motion in the government because we did not support a special status. This is the time for the N.D.P. to state clearly what they mean provided, of course, they know what they mean.

An hon. Member: You should know because you were one of them not so long ago.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Would the Prime Minister permit a question?

Mr. Trudeau: Very gladly.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I assure him it is a helpful question. In view of the Prime Minister's desire to hear what the opposition has to say, would he stay in the house for the debate today?

Mr. Trudeau: It is usually my practice to hear the leaders of all the opposition parties in an important debate such as this and I plan to do so today with the proviso that I have to be in Quebec city by four o'clock and so will have to leave at 3 p.m. This engagement in Quebec was made last fall at the time when the constitutional conference was to have taken place in December. It was postponed through no fault or initiative of the federal government. But I can assure the hon. member that I will read Hansard if I miss any important part of the debate.

The matter I have been dealing with was brought into the conference under the heading of distribution of powers, and it is a very important next step in our constitutional debate. We will have to spell out the federal position on the distribution of powers between the federal and the provincial governments. We have not yet reached this stage although, I repeat, some of the provinces have made submissions on it, and therefore we will be anxious to hear the ideas of the opposition on this subject.

We dealt with two aspects of the distribution of powers: the aspect which one would call the spending power and the aspect concerning the taxing power, both of which are linked in a very immediate and direct sense to the whole question of regional disparities. Members of the house know of the tough debate at the conference on the spending power and know as well how we came to the conclusion that a great deal more thought must be given to the use of the spending power. It was obvious that some provinces objected to uses of the spending power which were recognized as essential by other provinces.

For example, some provinces objected to medicare because they said it was a bad use of the spending power, whereas the same provinces pressed for and urged upon us the hospital insurance scheme, which is exactly the same use of the spending power. Some of those who objected to the federal use of the spending power were the very same ones who urged us, for instance, to solve the problems of housing or pollution and in some cases to come to the aid of Expo in Montreal. Are these areas where the federal government should intervene with its use of the spending power? If so, does it mean we should only use the spending power when the provinces desire that we use it and never when we decide it is good for the country? And does this mean that the federal parliament need not exist, or can only exist as a tool of the provincial governments? We have spelled out our position on some of these issues. We are now asking the opposition to give us the guidance they think they have to offer.

I believe I have asked enough questions. We have indicated the position taken by the federal government on most of these matters in the booklet which was tabled last Friday—"The Constitution and the People of Canada." I just want to remind the opposition before I sit down that it is their duty under the parliamentary system to criticize, and we accept that criticism, generally, in a happy frame of mind. But it is also a duty of the opposition parties to provide plausible alternatives to the policies with which they have disagreed.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Lewis: Will the Prime Minister permit a question? I know it is sharp but that is because of the way in which he has taunted the opposition. May I ask the Prime Minister when he will cease to be a professor and become the leader of this house?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Trudeau: I apologize to the house if the house believes I am lecturing it. That is not my intention. I do not believe it is the role of a professor to taunt and I do not think the hon. member himself thinks it is. I do not know how he can accuse me of speaking like a professor and at the same time of taunting the opposition.

Mr. Lewis: It depends on the quality of the professor.

Mr. Trudeau: I am prepared to sit down, Mr. Speaker. I urge the leader of the New Democratic Party to give us his ideas in whatever way he desires, in a professorial tone or in his usual demagogic tone.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): He hasn't got much of an act to follow.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

An hon. Member: Let it come from the heart.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): I am afraid it has to come from the heart, Mr. Speaker. I do not think anything has happened since I came to Ottawa—and I speak with some emotion—which has discouraged me so much about the future of our country in so short a time as the speeches made by the Prime Minister.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stanfield: I am sorry if I seem to speak with some emotion. I am very disappointed. I have felt a great deal of concern during the past year about the tendency of the Prime Minister to approach certain great national problems in terms of confrontation rather than reconciliation. We have, unfortunately, seen a further example of that this morning.

It is my belief that in order to make progress, let alone solve the tremendous problems facing our country, we shall need the good will and the understanding of everybody in the country and especially of every member of this house. Whatever our contribution may be, we should be invited to make it. We should be presented with every opportunity to do so. I say in all sincerity that it is a tragedy for this country when the Prime Minister stands in this house and taunts the opposition, which is not serious in itself but serious only in the light of the subject involved.

I have always tried to approach the constitutional question with restraint and with responsibility. I have always felt strongly it ought not to be a partisan issue in the ordinary sense of the term. I have no intention of responding to the Prime Minister in kind, though I might enjoy doing so, as would my followers behind me.

In all seriousness, it is now the responsibility of those who sit in opposition to undo the damage which has been done by the Prime Minister.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Trudeau: They should have thought of that before they began interrupting me.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

[Mr. Trudeau.]

An hon. Member: Take your ball and go home.

Mr. Trudeau: Let your leader speak.

Mr. Stanfield: If the Prime Minister is suggesting he was provoked into making some thoughtless remarks which he would now like to withdraw, we would provide him with every opportunity to do so. But I was under the impression he was reading from a prepared speech.

Mr. Trudeau: I will withdraw if the questions asked during my speech are withdrawn.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Stanfield: Come, gentlemen, let us try to get things back to a point from which we can have a reasonable discussion. I say in all sincerity we are not off to a very good start. I did not come here this morning to find fault with the conference.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Stanfield: Hon. members opposite can laugh if they like. I hope any criticism I make will have some bearing on the future, not just on the past, and I hope that some of the things I say will at least be instructive to those who are prepared to listen. I believe it is my duty to talk frankly. I think it is the duty of all of us to talk frankly about these problems. I would be guilty if I were, on the one hand, to indulge in unnecessary or trifling criticism and, on the other hand, equally guilty if I were simply to gloss things over for the sake of keeping an appearance of peace in the country.

• (12:30 p.m.)

I recognize the great difficulties that are involved in the constitutional question. I do not think I have ever taken any position or said anything that was intended to deepen any difficulties in the country. I have no desire to minimize the difficulties that are involved or the difficulties that are facing the government which is charged with the responsibility of trying to ease the problem. On the other hand, it is certainly important that we recognize our difficulties and recognize them realistically. Certainly this is necessary for progress. It is no favour to the country to pretend that they do not exist. It is no favour to the country to sweep them under the rug or even to sweep them back into committees of officials. Certainly it is no favour to the country to oversimplify the problems. It would be a poor service to the country for us to do any of these things.

I think it is important to preserve confidence in our ability to solve our problems in Canada. Therefore it was pleasing to me, and I think to Canadians generally, to see the conference conclude in a spirit of cordiality between the Prime Minister of Canada and the premiers who were participating. It must have been reassuring to see the willingness of those participating to continue their work and to try to reach solutions. If the conference did not create solid confidence in our ability to solve our problems, I think it certainly left the people of Canada with the hope that they could be solved. By and large I think the people of this country are going to judge what happens now and what grows out of and develops from this conference.

Those who participated in the conference and the hundreds of thousands, indeed, probably millions, who watched the proceedings on television would probably be hard put to be very specific about what concrete progress was made by the conference. For example, the delegation from Quebec expressed disappointment that the conference was not able to give serious consideration to problems that were paramount to that delegation.

For encouragement it is necessary to rely on the fact that the conference certainly did not destroy confederation, as some perhaps feared might be the case. Most statements of position and exchanges of views were responsible, and such exchanges of views are healthy in themselves. As a result of the conference being held before television cameras there is hopefully, as the Prime Minister expressed it, a better understanding of the country and the various approaches to be taken to Canada's many problems, both long and short term, as well as a better understanding perhaps of the attitudes and motivations of people in different parts of the country.

I think we have to ask ourselves how much longer we can continue to rely upon expressions of good will by participants in these conferences, and upon such conferences concluding with what must be described as a series of generalities without seeming, to the ordinary person at least and to those of us who observed the conference, to involve very substantial progress. As somebody said, Canadians have now seen this movie on three occasions. We who speak after these conferences said much the same thing following the Confederation for Tomorrow Conference, the first federal-provincial conference of last February, and now this conference. Any agreements that were reached were very general and the more difficult problems, such as the division of powers, the problem of federal spending power and so on, were touched on but not seriously discussed with a view to reaching any conclusions. They were quickly referred, of course, back to committees for study.

The conference certainly was part of the important on-going effort to work out arrangements that will be just and acceptable to Canadians generally and which I hope will be lasting. It is hard to point to any area where concrete progress was made. It is hard to find any area in which it can be said we are really closer to agreement than we were before. There is at least one vital area, that of linguistic rights, where some ground seems to have been lost during the past year, where we seem to be somewhat farther behind than we were.

However, in spite of this the conference avoided the kind of intransigence and confrontation which would have left us fearful about the future of confederation. It avoided too the kind of confrontation that we have seen here this morning and which, frankly, leaves me fearful for the future of confederation. Various premiers, especially the prairie premiers, did not live up to advance billing as the ogres of confederation, an advance billing which at least one premier claimed—I hope he was not correct—was the result of unfair briefings by federal officials. The prairie premiers appeared before the conference as representatives of provinces with grievances and genuine problems, which they presented in a dignified and constructive way, that they related to the health of the country itself. That was the context of their presentation, instead of the narrow, parochial or petty attitude that some had unfairly attributed to them before the conference began.

The premiers stated their grievances and in the end the Prime Minister promised, I think in a joking way, that he would mend his ways. I hope it was not entirely a joke in the sense that I hope the conference really brought home to the Prime Minister and to members of the government the importance of preserving good federal-provincial relations on a day to day basis. To the extent that the Prime Minister was serious in his remark I hope he will persevere in his good intentions as expressed at that time. The opportunity that this conference gave to bring home to the government the importance of good work-aday federal-provincial relations was a very important and worth-while aspect.

There is certainly dissatisfaction in varying degrees with the constitution that has served us since 1867. Perhaps there is—and I think this might be a positive result from the conference—more agreement now than previously on the need to update the constitution. The Prime Minister said that he wanted to know whether we favoured partial, piecemeal or general reform of the constitution. I have no hesitation in saying that it is certainly our view that we want a general review of the constitution. We realize that a good many of these things hang together. On the other hand, if we can make progress in a particular area I hope we would not hold that back until the whole job was completed. But certainly it would be our view that a general review of the constitution ought to be achieved. This does not necessarily mean rewriting every word in the constitution; certainly, it means a general review. I think the conference, perhaps made the need for this widely understood in the country as a whole. This is another dividend from the conference.

It is clear that the provincial representatives who came to Ottawa this time were not impelled by the urgency to work out revisions to the constitution. They were not so much incensed at anomalies or inequities in the present constitution, the British North America Act, as they were at the way in which the federal government has been exercising the federal power and interfering in provincial financial jurisdictions. The government of Quebec, which quite obviously placed great importance upon a far-reaching review of the constitution, was very much concerned about the way the government of Canada has been operating under the present constitution. That, I think, was unfortunate. That concern proved a real stumbling block and prevented us from moving ahead with the discussion of the longer term problems in connection with the constitution.

Provincial representatives referred to a number of subjects. The federal government was accused of imposing programs involving provincial jurisdiction on the provinces without holding prior meaningful consultations with the provinces. The provincial premiers were virtually unanimous in condemning the federal government for withdrawing from certain programs after it had got the provinces involved in them. Some pretty severe words were said about the 2 per cent social development tax and the changes proposed in the succession duty and gift tax fields. At the beginning of the conference the climate was affected by the bitterness that followed the last meeting of the ministers of finance. After that meeting provincial representatives went away feeling that the government of Canada was completely insensitive to their problems and that the federal government was willing to wage political warfare against them, just as the Prime Minister seemed content to wage political warfare against us this morning.

It is clear the government of Canada went to the conference just finished with the longer term problems of the country in mind. It was thinking in terms of constitutional reform. It is also clear that the provinces came carrying with them a brief from their taxpayers whom they felt were already overburdened.

No one can object if we send to committees matters which have been dealt with at previous conferences, matters involving various institutions, our concept of federalism and matters pertaining to the Supreme Court and Senate. The Prime Minister wanted views expressed on these institutions. Personally I believe that measures taken to increase the truly federal aspect of the Senate, if that is the correct term, which would strengthen the federal nature of the country would be sympathetically received by the people. I also hope that constructive measures will be taken to involve this chamber and the other chamber in discussions relating to these matters. We should be very happy, as individuals and party spokesmen, to give the Prime Minister our views in committee on questions he has raised.

The question of regional disparity has not yet been much illuminated, I must say, by the responsible minister. It now appears he is to produce some legislation next week, at which time he will make what he has promised will be a comprehensive statement. At this time I content myself with saying that we recognize the desirability of including in the constitution some provisions relating to economic disparity. I will judge the effectiveness of this government and the measure of its good intentions by the actual programs in this regard that it brings forward. We are waiting for them impatiently.

I have said that we seem to have slipped back on the subject of human rights. I am referring to the charter of individual human rights. I regret that the conference did not reach any real agreement on this matter. I regret there was no agreement of a general nature. Surely we are not going to consider any opting-in program as a satisfactory solution in this area.

At the conference there was no serious coming to grips with problems such as the division of powers, the use of federal spending powers, and operations of provinces outside the country. I was sorry to see this last matter was not discussed seriously because I think there is a continuing danger that isolated events may escalate the heat of the current controversy. I had hoped the matter would be seriously discussed by the Prime Minister and the heads of all provincial governments with a view to reaching solutions in a rational atmosphere. It is best to discuss the matter when there is no particularly strong controversy in the air. We should not wait to discuss it until events overtake us willy-nilly and we are in the midst of a controversy.

The conference recognized that there are difficult problems facing the country in terms of living together, but it did not deal with them seriously. There was not much progress in areas involving linguistic and basic human rights. We must not hide from ourselves the importance of coming to grips with some of the many fundamental and difficult problems facing this country. We must really come to grips with them and with problems relating to federal spending powers and the general division of powers.

For two reasons I have dealt with the atmosphere in which the conference met and with the importance provincial premiers attach to their day to day and month to month dealings with government. First, the discussion of these relationships took so much time that not much time was left for an in-depth discussion of the country's constitutional problems. That was one unfortunate result of the prevailing atmosphere. Second, because of the existing atmosphere, when constitutional matters were discussed the provincial premiers could not give them their undivided attention. Short-term difficulties, if one cares to call them that, were constantly on their minds and affected their handling of subjects at the conference. Therefore they could not devote their deepest attention to questions involving constitutional matters. Certainly it is of the utmost importance to avoid this sort of atmosphere in future. In this way, when the federal government and the provinces set up machinery for consultation there can be a realistic discussion of priorities before the next federal budget is introduced and before the provincial budgets of 1970-71 are introduced. Most of the matters of short-term importance discussed during the conference can be dealt with.

I hope the Prime Minister and his colleagues will not cut existing cost-sharing programs or, on the other hand, commence new cost-sharing programs without serious and meaningful consultations with the provinces. Under the circumstances it was inevitable much time would be spent discussing the grievances of the provinces and the manner in which the federal government had exercised its spending power. I express the hope that, whatever difficulties we may have with our constitution, constitutional discussions in the future will not be hampered by feelings of distrust or bad feelings that may arise from poor federal-provincial relations in other areas. It is important that there be progress.

The government of the province of Quebec served notice that the next time it wanted serious discussion on some of the matters it considered basic. I say that these problems will not be solved by confrontation nor will they be solved if we adopt a rigid conception of the constitution. The constitution we develop must be related to Canada as it is. It is not good government to try to put Canada into some abstract conception. It is necessary and vital that any constitutional changes to be devised enable us to live and work together.

When these changes are discussed, whether it be in the house, in a committee, in the federal-provincial conference or in other places in the country, we will keep in mind the good advice given by the Premier of Nova Scotia at the conference that we have to be prepared to pay a certain price for confederation. If I have a definite idea which is divisive I will not attempt to force this idea on others. We all have to be prepared to pay a certain price for confederation. We must be prepared to make a serious and continuing effort involving genuine reconciliation and confrontation.

This is one of the reasons we are suggesting a parliamentary committee be established. There are many questions now being discussed concerning the powers of government, the powers of parliament, the relationship between the two houses of parliament, the proposal to put in writing some of the conventions which govern parliament and the government. It is important that we have genuine consultation between the government and the house and between members of the house. Participatory democracy should prevail in this area. This alone is sufficient reason for establishing a committee. It is particularly relevant because of the proposals put forward regarding the other place. We would be prepared to discuss these proposals very frankly with the Prime Minister. I have no hesitation in endorsing the general principle that the government is putting forward in connection with this reform, but I believe it would be very helpful if there were a joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons to engage in meaningful discussions regarding these reforms.

Furthermore, it is rather strange that constitutional discussion has been going on across the country, including in the provincial legislatures, but there has not been any opportunity for the parliament of Canada to confront these problems in a formal and continuing way. The Prime Minister did not expect to produce a new constitution in three days of meetings with the provincial premiers. We do not expect to get very far in producing a new constitution with only one day of discussion in this chamber. I earnestly suggest it would be very helpful to have a committee established. There should be discussions among the party house leaders as to the terms of the reference of the committee. It should not be restricted and confined to discussing only those matters previously discussed by officials. We have suggested this on numerous occasions, and I think this is an opportune time to proceed with it.

Some of us have recognized for a long time that this whole problem is exceedingly complicated and sensitive. It does not lend itself to oversimplification or sloganeering. I say this issue must be free of narrow partisanship. It does not lend itself to political one-upmanship either among federal parties or at the federal-provincial level. At this stage in Canada's history it would be very easy to arouse suspicion and resentment. It would be a very simple matter to divide this country very deeply and permanently. That is not my purpose and certainly not the purpose of the loyal opposition in this parliament.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stanfield: We would be very happy to discuss in a continuing way any matter the Prime Minister would like to refer to a committee and we would be happy to hear his views on the constitution. He is in no doubt as to where I stand regarding the constitution. He may have pretended to be in doubt during the last election campaign and again this morning. Those remarks were not made to seek enlightenment.

Mr. Trudeau: I certainly did not get any enlightenment.

Mr. Stanfield: It is more urgent now than it ever has been to face and resolve the problems of our federalism, not merely because time is running out but it is urgent also as in this last year there has been a discernable tendency away from reconciliation. Positions which were becoming flexbile have begun to grow hard, and the attitude of the Prime Minister will not make them grow softer.

We all know enough of Canada to say that if our various parts are determined to be insular and intransigent, then our future is in danger. Yet we all also believe that if there is a will to unity we can achieve a strong, distinctive and creative unity in Canada. We have a particular responsibility here. We are the parliament of all of Canada, specially charged to bring the parts of Canada together and keep each strong. If hon. members opposite want to engage in a partisan debate we would not be happy to do so but would be prepared to do so, and the blood would certainly not be on this side of the house.

• (1:00 p.m.)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stanfield: I am afraid that, as in the case of the taxpayers, it would be the blood of Canadian citizens we would really be shedding. This Canadian debate has been renewed now almost for a decade. It has returned here for a day, and a few of us will be able to express our hopes and attitudes. We as individuals and as an institution have a larger continuing responsibility. That is why we urge the government to make it possible now for members of this parliament to participate formally and over a period of time in the working out of a consensus, a consensus which we will have to work very hard on in order to achieve.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) has completed his remarks.

Mr. Stanfield: Yes.

Mr. Lewis: If he has, may I call it one o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

PRIVILEGES AND ELECTIONS

MOTION FOR CONCURRENCE IN THIRD REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Mark MacGuigan (Windsor-Walkerville): Mr. Speaker, if the house gives unanimous consent I move for Mr. Laflamme, seconded by Mr. Forest:

That the third report of the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections be now concurred in.

[Translation]

Mr. Gustave Blouin (Manicouagan): Mr. Speaker, now that the report of the standing committee on privileges and elections has been tabled in the house and that the moment of truth has come, I am indeed very happy of the evidence given before the standing committee of privileges and elections and of the report resulting from it. That report clearly indicates that the charges laid against me by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) on December 10 last, and reported on page 3734 of the official report of the Debates, were false and unfounded.

Those most serious charges—

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

[English]

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

[Translation]

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order. The hon. member for St. John's East, on a question of privilege.

[English]

The hon. member for St. John's East on a point of privilege.

Mr. McGrath: I hesitate to interrupt the hon. member but I wish to state that at no time did I make a charge against him.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): You are weaseling out now.

[Translation]

Mr. Blouin: Mr. Speaker, those most serious charges reflected not only on my personal integrity but also on my honour as a member of parliament. We can appreciate the seriousness of those charges if we read the remarks made by several other members, following the charges laid by the hon. member for St. John's East.

The hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) said, and I quote:

The present situation constitutes a dictatorial act that is dangerous to democracy and will destroy democracy.

The hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert)—that great specialist, anxious to ensure that the speaker would not make light of his remarks said, and I quote:

—there has been a deliberate omission of a resolution carried in the committee.

Would you please take note of this, Mr. Speaker.

The hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis)—I am sorry he is not here at the moment—that great defender of human rights, took upon himself the right to go still further in his accusations of dishonesty against me.

Mr. Speaker, those accusations have been made in this house. A thorough enquiry has just been made in that respect which shows clearly that those accusations were untrue and dishonest.

Did the hon. members who participated in the debate on the question of privilege raised by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) give any thought, in acting as they did, to the tremendous wrong they could do to me and to the reputation of this house? To say the least, they acted in a shameful and irresponsible way.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Blouin: They were perfectly aware, Mr. Speaker, that such dishonest statements would be spread by the whole Canadian press under big headlines.

The unfortunate thing about all this is that the present debate will not be mentioned in the newspapers, let alone come under big headlines. After all, there is nothing shameful or sensational in the present discussions and the reputation of an ordinary member is of little importance to some journalists. So, I ask of those who still have some sense of honour to make good for the wrong they have done to me by using in their newspapers as much space to publish the true facts about this matter.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Blouin: Mr. Speaker, an attack on the honour of this house was made for political and party purposes. I am anxious to see what the members who made such accusations will do to make good for the wrong they have done to me.

Let me say again that I am very happy about the evidence collected by the committee on privileges and elections. However, the behaviour of the members involved and the improper reports published by some unscrupulous journalists are a bad omen for the future.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

[English]

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, my first observation is one of regret that the government house leader was unable to agree yesterday to ask for leave of the house to move concurrence in the third report of the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections when we could have had a full debate on it at that time. Nevertheless, half a loaf is better than none and we are grateful that those of us who dissent from the third report have at least this opportunity, albeit a small one, to make some references to it.

I am also grateful that this hour has provided the hon. member for Manicougan (Mr. Blouin) with an opportunity to make a statement. I say to him sincerely that I am genuinely happy to see he has recovered, genuinely glad to see he is back in the house and able to defend himself because it was for me one of the regrettable aspects of this whole affair that it had to be conducted in the hon. member's absence, an absence caused by illness. As I say, I am glad the hon. member has now recovered and today is back here able to speak for himself.

I repeat what I said during the course of the hon. member's remarks, when I felt obliged to interrupt him, that I at no time laid a charge against him personally. Anybody who reads my question of privilege which was raised on December 10 and which can be found at page 3735 of Hansard will see that I made no personal charge against the hon. member. Perhaps it might be worth while to quote what I said:

> My question of privilege is based on the fact that the resolution adopted by the committee on November 28 was, in my view, deliberately omitted from its report to the house on November 29—

If the hon. member feels that constitutes a charge against him personally, I regret that very much. That was my feeling then, and I felt very strongly about it.

Even today there remains on the order paper a motion for concurrence in the second report of the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications. It still appears under the name of the hon. member for Manicouagan, and no motion for concurrence has been made. I found it strange, as I find it strange now, that during the interim after the report was submitted to the house concurrence was not moved. I do not blame the hon. member for Manicouagan. I think he has been very poorly used in this instance.

An hon. Member: By you.

Mr. McGrath: I think he has been very poorly used in this instance by the house leader and his colleagues. I heard no voice raised in his defence in the house when he was in hospital.

An hon. Member: You were not here.

Mr. McGrath: I heard no one get up and raise a defence for the hon. member, and I think the hon. member was badly used.

An hon. Member: Why don't you read Hansard?

Mr. McGrath: I believe now as I believed at the time that my resolution which was passed by the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications on November 28 constituted a part of the committee's second report and was in fact omitted when the report was tabled before the house.

It might be worth while to review the reason I felt obliged to move the motion in the first instance. The committee at the time was conducting, under a reference by the house, an examination into the main estimates of the Canadian Transport Commission. Several members of the committee, including myself, were examining a decision made by that commission, the effects of which was to disestablish or do away entirely with rail passenger service in an entire province, not just on a branch line. Up to that time the Canadian Transport Commission was considering the abandonment of branch lines, and the entire rail transportation system of a province cannot under any circumstances be considered a branch line. I did not move my resolution for any frivolous or mischievous reason.

An hon. Member: Oh, please!

Mr. McGrath: The hon. member who interrupts presents himself to the house as an expert on fisheries and on almost everything else. If he will control himself and listen to my contribution for a few minutes, perhaps he may understand the argument I am trying to make in a reasonable way.

The resolution was presented after an examination of the estimates and after questions put to the chairman of the commission as to why it felt obliged to make the decision in the first instance to allow Canadian National Railways to abandon rail passenger service in the province of Newfoundland and replace it with a bus service. This decision was made by the commission shortly after the June 25 election; I believe it was brought down on June 27. I leave it to hon. members to suggest the import of that date.

The whole question of the withdrawal by the C.N.R. from passenger service in Newfoundland was a matter of great concern during the election campaign. The maintaining of the service became a policy of our party. Every Conservative candidate who ran in Newfoundland had as the main plank in his platform the maintenance and upgrading of rail passenger service in Newfoundland. Consequently those of us from Newfoundland who sit on this side of the house felt then, as we do now, that we had a mandate from the people of Newfoundland to do everything possible to have this unjust decision set aside.

It was in carrying out this mandate that we availed ourselves of the first opportunity presented to us to object to the withdrawal. This first opportunity was presented during the examination of the estimates of the Canadian Transport Commission. It was with this in mind that we moved the resolution in the committee.

Hon. members will recall that preceding the reference to the committee we availed ourselves of another opportunity presented to us to debate this matter in the house. This took place during our consideration of the annual C.N. financing bill. It was at that time that the government house leader gave the undertaking that we would have an opportunity to discuss this matter in the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications and to question the president of the Canadian Transport Commission. He also undertook to provide an opportunity for us to examine the officials of Canadian National Railways when he referred the annual report of the C.N.R. to that committee.

I point these facts out in order to indicate to the house, and to the hon. member who feels obliged to defend his honour in this regard because, as he has said, he feels charges were made against him in a shameful and irresponsible way, that this is a very serious matter. We feel we are discharging our responsibilities as members of parliament for Newfoundland.

An hon. Member: Irresponsibilities.

Mr. McGrath: We feel we are discharging the solemn undertaking we gave to the people of Newfoundland during the last federal election campaign. There is nothing partisan about this. We are just fulfilling a solemn undertaking which we made, and we are continuing to do so. That is why we examined very exhaustively and intensively the estimates of the commission as well as the president and his officials. We were trying to determine what prompted this decision and why the commission felt obliged to go against the recommendations of the people of Newfoundland.

The government of Newfoundland opposed this decision in a brief presented to the commission. The Newfoundland Liberal members of this house during the last parliament opposed the decision in a brief they presented. The hon. member for Burin-Burgeo (Mr. Jamieson) can substantiate that. Those hon. members presented a brief to the commission in complete opposition to the instant withdrawal of this service. I think their recommendation was that the phase-out, if there was to be a phase-out, of the rail passenger service should take place over a period of at least five years; in other words, operate the bus system in the province concurrently with the rail system for five years and at the end of that time review the whole picture. That was a reasonable request.

I do not know why the Canadian Transport Commission felt obliged to go against popular opinion, to go against the members of parliament from Newfoundland, to go against the Newfoundland legislature, to go against the Newfoundland government, to go against the Newfoundland railway unions, to go against organized labour in Newfoundland. I believe we were entitled to have an answer to this question. It was for this reason particularly that we conducted the examination that took place in the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications which culminated in the moving of the resolution which was adopted by the committee on November 28 and was the substance of my question of privilege to the house on December 10.

I think it is worth reading into the record the third report of the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections which dealt with this matter and in respect of which a motion has been moved for concurrence.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): It is in the record.

Mr. McGrath: If the hon. member will bear with me, I will read the parts that I think are relevant to my remarks. I will read the conclusions of the committee:

> Your committee reports that the reason for the omission is that it was never moved and concurred in that the said resolution adopted by the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications be part of its second report.

I dissent from that statement. I said so in the committtee and I do so at this time. Anybody who has read the transcript of the evidence, especially volume No. 6 for November 28, given before the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications, and more particularly anybody who was present at that time, would agree with my contention that the drafting of this report omitted or gave no consideration to the substance of my resolution, to the substance of the debate which preceded it, but instead chose to confine itself to purely technical grounds. I do not accept that part of the report and I shall refer to the evidence to show why. I read from page 107 of the evidence of the committee, volume No. 6, for November 28. I quote my own remarks from that page:

> My motion is that the committee recommend to the house—

This left no doubt as to what I was trying to do.

> —that this particular decision not be implemented until this committee has had a chance to go to the Atlantic provinces.

Preceding that, at the outset of the meeting on that day, November 28, the draft version of the second report was read to the committee. It contained the recommendation to the house which is now before the house and is on today's order paper. It contained the recommendation to the house that the committee be empowered to undertake a study of transportation in the Atlantic provinces.

In asking for this power the committee had in mind requesting the permission of the house or the government—I forget the particular technicality involved—to proceed with a continuation of the aborted trip of the committee last winter. The committee was called back last winter because of a crisis in the house at the time. The committee was going to ask whether the same terms of reference could be applied in order that it could undertake a study of the transportation problems of the Atlantic provinces and in fact go to the Atlantic provinces to examine the transportation difficulties at first hand.

It was with this second report in mind that I moved my resolution at the conclusion of that day's sitting. In the preamble to my resolution I stated what I had in mind. I stated—and this is taken from the evidence as reported at page 107 of the committee's proceedings—that I clearly intended this matter to come before the house in the form of a recommendation to the house because parliament was supreme in regard to it. I clearly intended that the recommendation would be made to the house that this decision not be implemented, that is, that the buses be phased in and the trains phased out, until the committee had had an opportunity in connection with its proposed study of transportation problems in the Atlantic provinces to go to Newfoundland.

Hon. members know, and the house leader knows from his experience, that the conduct of inquiries in committee and the conduct of committees generally is less formal than proceedings in the house. Formal speeches are not made in committee; prepared speeches are not made. It is a sort of dialogue, if you like; it is a give and take. That is why I was perhaps not prudent enough or careful enough—

Mr. Anderson: Hear, hear.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Anderson) is making his usual unintelligent observation from his seat.

Mr. Anderson: Mr. Speaker, I merely agreed with the hon. member.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. McGrath: Perhaps I was neither prudent enough nor wise enough at the time to put my motion in written form. I suggest that neither was the hon. member for Manicouagan prudent or wise enough at the time to insist, as is now done in committees, that my motion be put in written form, because if that had happened perhaps this whole matter could have been cleared up. In any event, I did not do that. This is why my motion, which appears at page 108 and which forms the substance of my question of privilege, does not contain the words "recommend to the house".

But clearly the hon. member for Manicouagan must admit, as must any hon. member who was on that committee, that this was the intent of my motion. I did not move my resolution and have it adopted by the committee in order to have it hang in the air or die in limbo, where it now happens to be. I moved my motion to have it brought before the house so that parliament would have the opportunity to decide on this matter, so we would have an opportunity as members of parliament from Newfoundland to carry out our mandate in this house. I did not do it frivolously or mischievously. My resolution unfortunately did not contain the words "recommend to the house", but that was clearly the intent of my motion, that was clearly the import of my motion. I will read the motion as it appears at page 108 of Minutes of Proceedings and Evidence No. 6 of the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications:

That the Canadian Transport Commission be requested to postpone the implementation of its decision to abandon railway service in Newfoundland until such a time as the committee travel to Newfoundland to study the transportation problems of the Atlantic provinces.

Clearly any reasonable man would know what I had in mind. My motion referred directly to the recommendation of the committee, approved by the committee, that the house empower the committee to study the transportation problems of the Atlantic provinces. I submit that anybody who would hide behind technicalities is merely being the handmaiden of the house leader in this regard.

• (1:30 p.m.)

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. The hon. member has suggested that in some way I was trying to direct the chairman of the committee. He has previously said, and I presume he was sincere, that he was not accusing the chairman of misconduct. Now he says that the hon. member was hiding behind technicalities. I suggest that is unparliamentary and should be withdrawn.

Mr. McGrath: I did not accuse the hon. member for Manicouagan of hiding behind technicalities. I accused the drafters of this report of doing so. It is a natural thing to do if there is a controversial subject involved to stick to the letter of the law and ignore the spirit. That is precisely what they did. I suggest they have lost the meaning of the whole thing, as is evident from the report of the committee. The house leader took exception to what I said when I suggested they were perhaps obliging him in some way by doing this. I will refer to the first time that my suspicions were aroused. I directed a question to him on December 6 which can be found at page 3587 of Hansard. I asked the house leader what became of my resolution, why it was not in the second report now before the house. The house leader said in his reply:

I have not studied this; I am advised the resolution was passed but that it was out of order.

Surely that would arouse the suspicions of any reasonable member of the house with regard to a resolution that dealt with a controversial subject, and it would indicate that the government did not want this matter brought before the house.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. McGrath: There was an interjection at that time also.

An hon. Member: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, I have limited time only. The hon. member made his contributions in the committee and perhaps he could speak here before the debate is over. I refer to the hon. member who asked the question. He was a member of the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections so he will have knowledge of this. The house leader went on to say:

Under the circumstances I take it that it is null and has no effect, but I have not examined the question.

I say to the house leader that we requested he be called as a witness before the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections. We made our request through the usual channels. We made that request at the first meeting of the committee and we further submitted it to the steering committee at its first meeting. My recollection is that it was agreed to at that time. Yet at the last public meeting of the committee the hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Laflamme), who was the chairman of the committee, ruled that he saw no reason to call the President of the Privy Council before the committee.

An hon. Member: Rightly so.

Mr. McGrath: I think it is regrettable because it leaves this matter up in the air, and I refer again to the remarks of the house leader at page 3587 of Hansard. What prompted him to say that and on what authority did he say it? Was he suggesting that because I was not a member of the Liberal party but was a member of the opposition I had no right to move a resolution in the committee?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. McGrath: Is that what he was suggesting? That has been the conduct of the Committees ever since. Any time an opposition member moves a resolution, confusion ensues. They say, "we cannot accept it", or they use tactics that prevent the resolution from coming to a vote. Is that the way the committees are to conduct themselves? We hoped that the house leader would have found an opportunity to appear before the committee.

Mr. Cafik: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The hon. member has indicated that every time an opposition member makes a motion in a committee it is never allowed to come to a vote and is never accepted. I submit that this is simply untrue.

Mr. McGrath: My time is limited, Mr. Speaker, and I hope you will take into account the interruption of the hon. member who has risen on a pseudo point of order.

I submit that the house leader knew that this was a controversial matter because questions had been directed in the house on the first day of the present session to his colleague, the Minister of Transport (Mr. Hellyer). He knew that this was a matter of some controversy, and I submit that he manoeuvred to keep the matter from coming before the house.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. Now the hon. member is imputing motives to me when he says I manoeuvred the matter. I put it to the hon. member, is it not a fact that his colleague, the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams), acknowledged there was no necessity for me to appear before the committee?

Mr. McGrath: My colleague, the hon. member for Calgary North, does not have the authority to speak for me in this regard. He might have been expressing an opinion in the course of his examination but he certainly was not speaking for me.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Was it not agreed by the committee?

[Mr. McGrath.]

Mr. McGrath: No, it was not. If it was I withdraw agreement, but according to my recollection it was not because the subject came up at the last meeting of the committee.

An hon. Member: You had better read the minutes.

Mr. McGrath: I submit that the matter was of some urgency on November 28 because Canadian National Railways, under the authority of the Canadian Transport Commission, was to start implementing the decision to phase out the trains on December 6. The phasing in of the buses and the phasing out of the trains is now under way. My motion was urgent then but it is more urgent now. The Standing Committee on Transport and Communications is going to the Atlantic provinces on Sunday and will be visiting Newfoundland. Under its terms of reference it will be examining the transportation problems of the Atlantic provinces. Would it not have been better if this house had directed it to examine the decision of the C.N.R. and the authority given to it by the Canadian Transport Commission allowing it to phase out the passenger service?

We have heard a lot about delegated authority, but here there is to my mind a flagrant abuse of parliament. Are we to hand over the entire public transportation system and its future to the Canadian Transport Commission without allowing parliament a chance to voice its opinions thereon? Is that the way this country is to be governed? I submit to the house that public transportation built this country to what it is today, and it is still important. As a consequence, it is a matter of great concern to this house but not to a body of bureaucrats with delegated authority such as the Canadian Transport Commission.

An hon. Member: Another insult.

Mr. McGrath: If hon. members knew, as does the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo (Mr. Jamieson), how strongly the people of Newfoundland feel about this matter, if they knew how strongly the labour movement in Newfoundland feels about it, they would realize how important the rail passenger service is to the people of Newfoundland. I put it to hon. members that 57 per cent of the electorate voted against the Liberal party on June 25, and I suggest that this is one of the reasons. I point out to hon. members the experience with the buses travelling in Newfoundland this winter and the difficulties they have encountered in what has been a relatively mild winter. If hon. members knew this, they would realize the importance of the rail passenger service to Newfoundlanders. How can you move a sick person from east to west on a C.N. bus without the proper facilities over a distance of 600 miles and sometimes taking as much as 20 hours? These are the real problems that our people are worried about.

We do not want to keep our trains, however colourful they may be, for sentimental reasons. We want to hang on to our trains until such time as the system of transportation in Newfoundland is improved to the point where we can do without them. We have not arrived at that point today. All we have in Newfoundland to replace our rail service is an inadequate trans-Canada highway which was hastily built to fulfil a political promise in 1965 and today is below the standards of the trans-Canada highway in other parts of Canada. As a consequence it constitutes one of the most dangerous highways in the whole Dominion of Canada. Yet the trains have been removed and Newfoundlanders are to become totally dependent on a bus service. What would the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich do if a decision were made to abolish the railways in his province?

• (1:40 p.m.)

Mr. Anderson: A direct question has been asked. Would the hon. member allow me to reply to it.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for St. John's East has the floor.

Mr. McGrath: What would other hon. members do in such circumstances? What would the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo do if the C.N.R. were to decide to do away with the coastal service in his constituency?

Mr. Cafik: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I should like to know as a matter of information whether there is any limit to the amount of such talk that we have to endure and, second, whether the hon. member is really speaking to the motion before the house. We are not debating the problems of Newfoundland and its railway system.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: There are still a few minutes left to the hon. member for St. John's East.

Mr. McGrath: It would appear to me that hon. members opposite have now lost whatever regard they had for Newfoundland. That is understandable, bearing in mind what happened on June 25. I can understand why the hon. member does not want to hear this. But I can tell him that it is of great concern to his friend the Minister of Defence Production. It should be of great concern to everyone because the buses are not working. Having seen the buses in operation over the past two months we feel more strongly than ever that this decision should not be implemented. Parliament should live up to its responsibilities to the people of Newfoundland and see to it that our people continue to enjoy their rail transportation system as long as the total system of public transportation in Newfoundland remains inadequate as it is today.

Ontario has a bus system and a railway system. Quebec has the same. Every other province can have a bus system and a railway system. Why set this precedent in Newfoundland? Does the president of the Canadian Transport Commision want to do away with the railways in British Columbia? He is obviously a very powerful man. Does he want to do away with the railway system on Prince Edward Island? It was with such fears in mind that we felt obliged to conduct a debate on this question, to carry out an investigation in the transport committee and to move the resolution which was moved on November 28. We felt strongly about it then and we feel even more strongly about it now in the light of our experience of the operation of Canadian National buses in Newfoundland in the past two months.

In view of the importance of the subject matter, in view of the outcome of the debate which took place in the committee, and in the light of the background I have tried to outline, I find I cannot support the third report of the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections. I cannot support the conclusions reached in the report. If I were to do so I would be supporting the thesis that from now on every time a resolution is adopted by a committee there has to be a further resolution calling for the original resolution to be presented to the house. To me, this does not make sense. When a committee adopts a resolution it is obviously instructing the officers of the committee to incorporate it in the committee report and to place it before the house without any further specific instruction. This, it seems to me, would be the logical course to follow. I do not know why the government should be worrying about it now. We have begun to operate under the new rules and this being the case the government will never again be defeated in committee. From now on they are in a position to slip new members on to these committees without submitting a motion for the formal approval of the house.

An hon. Member: So can you.

Mr. McGrath: But whom does this advantage? It is really to the advantage of the government. They were defeated in committee on November 28, notwithstanding their majority on the committee and in the house. But it will never happen again. In future, when a committee meets without a majority of government members present the whip will merely note the absentees, go to the clerk's office, have the names of the absentees removed from the list of committee members, and replace them by hon. members who are able to be present. So everyone on the other side of the house will be happy. What a farce the committee system of this house has become! If they continue in this way committees will become merely rubber-stamps for the government party.

Mr. Deachman: You agreed with it.

Mr. McGrath: Important as my resolution is to the people of Newfoundland, there is a principle at stake here involving the way in which committees of the house are to conduct themselves during the remaining years of this parliament. This is a matter of real concern. I submit that my resolution is of historic significance in this regard because that was the last time a member of the opposition will ever get a resolution through in committee.

Before I conclude, Mr. Speaker, I repeat what I said to the hon. member for Manicouagan. I believe he was poorly used in this affair. I levelled no charge against him personally; I was sorry he was absent from the house due to illness when this matter was under discussion. As to his friend, the hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Laflamme), the chairman of the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections, I compliment him on the way in which he conducted himself in the committee. I compliment him on the way in which he conducted the committee, although I disagree with his report. If we had more committee chairmen like him there might be some hope for the committee system even under the new rules.

[Translation]

Mr. Yves Forest (Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, like the hon. member who has just resumed his seat, I sat on the committee on privileges and elections and I attended three or four sittings devoted to the study of the matter raised by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath).

It is obvious that today the hon. member has not impressed the members of this house any more than he impressed the members of the committee on privileges and elections.

I should like to point out, Mr. Speaker, that the committee on privileges and elections sat at the request of the hon. member and that its terms of reference, which he had himself suggested and which were approved by the house on December 10 last, were clear and precise.

The question was simply and solely to determine the reason, valid or not, why a certain resolution which had been passed by the committee on transport, on November 28 last, had not been included in the second report which was adopted at the beginning of the sitting and which was tabled in the house the next day, that is on November 29.

Now, the terms of reference of the committee on privileges and elections required that it merely determine whether the normal, regular, legal procedure had been followed in that instance.

Now, as well in the committee as in this house, the arguments of the member were completely off-base. The committee of privileges and elections was not supposed to discuss or deny the importance or urgency of the matter brought up in the resolution of the member at the end of the sitting of the committee on transports; nor was it supposed to interpret the intention or the professed intention of the hon. member who presented the resolution. In any event, the member is no rookie; he has been sitting here for several years and he should be expected to know the rules.

Now, the committee on privileges and elections sat and heard the chairman and the secretary of the committee, as well as the law clerk and parliamentary counsel of the House of Commons, Mr. Ollivier. After having heard those witnesses, the committee readily came to a conclusion, which was obvious to almost all the members of the committee, except two, that there was no question of privilege, and that said resolution had been omitted in the report merely because to include it, it would have been necessary to make a proposal to that effect, and this was not done. The committee, after having heard the witnesses, reached that obvious conclusion.

In this particular instance, the regular, normal and legal procedure based on an immemorial practice was followed, and our friends across the way can only blame themselves if they do not know the procedure, or did not know what they were supposed to do in the committee. Surely it was not the responsibility of the chairman to tell them what they had to do. But what is even more amazing is that subsequently they did not even bother to ask the chairman or some other person about what was to be done. All they did was to blame the chairman of the committee, who had only done his duty in presiding the committee meeting.

On December 10, charges and innuendoes were made against the integrity and efficiency of the chairman by the use of terms—and I refer the hon. member to the official record in Hansard—such as "deliberate omission", "reprehensible conduct", "hanky-panky", etc. Now, as the hon. member has not brought forward any evidence to support his charges, I believe he should resign, according to the practice in this house, or at least withdraw his words, instead of merely congratulating the hon. member—who was really ill—on his recovery. In fact, I think he should set an example for other members who, on that occasion, went a bit too far and were too hasty in their assertions, without knowing the main issue.

Mr. Speaker, we have before us a motion for concurrence of the committee's report, a matter that involved no difficulty whatever and as the report is short, logical and precise, it should receive the approval of this house.

The hon. member did not deal with procedure in his argument, but he availed himself of that opportunity to talk about the importance attached to that question by the Newfoundland people. Obviously, the chairman of the committee, the hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Laflamme), has ably presided over the meetings of the committee and brought the discussion into its true perspective, according to the terms of reference proposed, for if we had gone off on that side-issue, we could easily have replied to the hon. member that if the question was of such interest to him, nothing prevented him, as well as the other members of his group, to appeal from the decision of the Canadian Transport Commission.

Or, if they were interested that much, why did they not refer again the question to the committee on transport which had hearings on the following days? However, I do not intend to discuss this matter further since the report of the committee did not deal with that point. But if we had engaged in such discussions, we could have given some very easy answers.

Speaking of the report, the hon. member hinted at some undue pressure. Now, the chairman and the secretary of the committee gave clear evidence before the committee that they had never met anybody, that the report had been tabled, according to the rule, on the chairman's desk, that they had not been subject to any pressure on the part of the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Macdonald)—whom moreover they have never met about that subject—nor on the part of anybody else, and that the proceedings had been carried on as usual, as they have been carried on for several years, in any committee.

A while ago the hon. member also talked about the President of the Privy Council. Indeed, there was some talk that he should appear before the committee, as suggested earlier, but that request had been withdrawn by the honourable member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) who admitted, after Mr. Ollivier told him that it was he who had informed the President of the Privy Council, that he doubted that the resolution was in order.

When the President of the Privy Council made a speech on December 6 and 10, he made quite clear that he had not looped into the matter, but that he had been informed of the irregularity and of the illegality of this resolution, and it was indeed.

The President of the Privy Council did not testify; not because he had something to hide, but only because all the members of the committee had agreed, at a certain time, that, following the evidence of Mr. Ollivier, it was useless to hear the President of sthe Privy Council. And even then, it would have been outside the scope of the terms of reference, because those events happened long after the question of privilege mentioned by the honourable member had been raised.

Well, Mr. Speaker, I think the problem was very simple. The committee on privileges and elections had to decide whether the regular and normal procedure had been observed. Following the evidence given, all the members of the committee except two ruled that there was no question of privilege, that the regular procedure had been observed, that the president of the committee had performed his duty, and that, consequently, he was in no way to blame in all this. I hope that the honourable members who attacked him will withdraw their remarks.

Mr. Speaker, it is a very simple question that was discussed in committee, and I suggest that the motion for concurrence of the report of the committee should be agreed to by the house.

[English]

Mr. John L. Skoberg (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, I would have thought that members on the government side of the house would be considerate enough to give members of every party in the house an opportunity to speak. It has been very apparent that they want to take up the time of the house to tell their version of what happened. It is only fair that the opposition should have equal time.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacGuigan: There will be another day.

Mr. Skoberg: It is apparent from the noise on the opposite side of the house that some hon. members are not aware of the facts. It appears that the hon. member for Manicouagan (Mr. Blouin), the former chairman of the committee on transport and communications, took an unfair advantage. I was particularly surprised at his attitude to this issue. The hon. member referred to a statement made by one of my colleagues, the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis), who had pointed out that if there was nothing wrong in what had been done the government members of the committee on privileges and elections would be able to show that that was so and the matter could be cleared up. If there is nothing to hide, why would any member be concerned whether or not the motion was passed at the time?

I am very surprised that the hon. member has taken issue with statements that appear in Hansard for that particular day. In all fairness I think we should look a little further at the transcript of evidence that is before us. The chairman of the committee was not present when a statement was made about the intent of the motion that had been moved by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath). As reported on page 107 of the committee report the hon. member for St. John's East said:

> My motion is that the decision of the C.T.C. allowing C.N. to abandon rail passenger service in Newfoundland—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order. It being two o'clock, pursuant to special order made earlier this day the proceedings now before the house must be interrupted. The house will now resume the business which was interrupted at one p.m.

[Mr. Forest.]

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

HOUSE DEBATE PROVIDED THROUGH PRE-ARRANGED MOTION TO ADJOURN

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Trudeau that this house do now adjourn.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): The hon. member for York South.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, in view of the fact that many members may think that the bells will ring at two o'clock as usual following lunch hour, and in view of the fact that the Prime Minister is not here and also other hon. members, I wonder whether we could have the bells rung for a few minutes to remind hon. members that the house is in session?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): I think hon. members are agreed to this.

And the house bells having been duly rung:

• (2:00 p.m.)

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry the Prime Minister has not been able to return to the chamber yet.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): He said he would be here.

Mr. Lewis: I was going to say this morning, and I unhesitatingly say this afternoon, that it is a pleasure to congratulate the Prime Minister on the way in which he handled the constitutional conference, as its chairman. I extend these congratulations without reservation despite his inappropriately partisan performance this morning. If the Prime Minister wanted to show his backbenchers he is capable of political partisanship he should have left that for another occasion and another subject. He could not have chosen a more inappropriate subject on which to show his excellence in that field of endeavour. In view of the comment he made to me I say to him—and he promised to read my comments if he was not here to listen to them—that I received a lecture from him about the constitution and a lesson in demagoguery which many of us will not be able to excel.

Nor will that performance of the Prime Minister change my intention, supported by my colleagues in caucus this morning when we discussed this issue, to express my party's general position and hopes on some of the more important aspects before us under the heading of constitutional revision. Obviously I cannot cover them all. Let me say this, however, in replying to the Prime Minister. He challenged opposition parties to give answers to questions. I see the Prime Minister has just entered the chamber. Probably he had as hasty a lunch as I had, and I can understand his being a few minutes late. He challenged the opposition to give answers to questions. I say, Mr. Speaker, that the government of Canada, which includes the Prime Minister and other ministers, has refused until now to give answers about the most important constitutional problem before this country. If the Prime Minister points to the paper which was tabled just before the conference, let me say this. That paper dealt with the structures of government and with some important structural problems; it dealt with bilingualism, which is important, and with the entrenchment of human rights, which is also important. But it did not deal with what the Prime Minister himself said was the most pressing problem, namely, the division of power, the extent of the federal spending power, and the like. I say it does not lie well in his mouth to taunt members of the opposition and say they ought to give answers to these problems when, so far as the public is concerned and so far as the members of this parliament are concerned, we have not heard even the suggestion of an answer from him.

At the conference which concluded on Wednesday and which I observed with interest throughout he did not suggest any answer to the problem of spending powers. He simply said to the provincial representatives, "You tell us what they should be and how you want them reduced, increased, confined or limited." At no point did he give an answer.

Mr. Trudeau: Would the hon. member permit a question? Does he not remember that it was three of the provinces which during the last month themselves demanded that the subject be put on the agenda although it had not been dealt with by the continuing committee of officials and therefore was not expected to be a subject of discussion between the governments?

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I agree. I agree on both parts of the right hon. gentleman's question. I agree with the implication of his question that he did not understand the problem enough to put it on the agenda, and he had to be asked by the provincial premiers to do so. I agree that because it was put on at the last minute no one expected it to be discussed. I say the partisan job he did this morning was not only unbecoming of him but thoroughly unfair. It was unfair of him to ask members of the opposition to provide blueprints for the constitution in a one-day debate when, with the assistance of a continuing committee and a large staff which has increased by more than 100 per cent, he has not yet found it possible to answer these important questions himself.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Lewis: I also say, in reply to the Prime Minister's unbecoming taunt, that these matters would have been discussed in depth had he and his predecessor agreed to the appointment of a parliamentary committee for which members of the opposition have asked for four or five years. No one speaking for 20, 30 or 40 minutes in any debate can make satisfactory suggestions as to what the constitution should be like. No one has sufficient knowledge at his fingertips to assist the Prime Minister in the way he suggests we ought to assist him.

Mr. Stanfield: He would not listen, anyway.

Mr. Lewis: If a committee had been established and had met in the course of the last two or three years many of these subjects would have been discussed in depth and many suggestions would have come from both sides of the house. I am glad the Prime Minister has now agreed to the establishment of such a parliamentary committee. I express the hope the Leader of the Opposition expressed, that the terms of reference will not be restricted only to those subjects on which the continuing committee has already reported, as the Prime Minister suggested the other day would happen. If that is the case, again we will not have the opportunity to discuss partition of powers, the extent of federal spending power and all the other basic social and economic questions about which the constitution must be concerned. That is where the kind of discussion the Prime Minister rightly wants could have taken place earlier and will take place if the reference to the committee is not too restrictive.

Dominion-Provincial Conference

The reason I suggested that the Prime Minister should consider discussing with provincial premiers the establishment of similar committees in the provincial legislatures is that you obviously cannot involve all the people of Canada in detailed discussions of the constitution. However, you should involve their elected representatives in the various levels of government in order that they may present their ideas and exchange views as to what our country should be now and in the future. It is obvious that if it is left to governments only to discuss these matters, the federal government and the ten provincial governments, which are in the seats of power, will hesitate to change the constitution. They will not readily agree to reduce their power. Members of parliament and members of provincial legislatures have not had the unavoidably corrupting influence of the actual exercise of powers. They should participate in the discussion so that the purposes for which the power is to be used will be properly decided.

I suggest that the Prime Minister, I am sure with the best intentions, somewhat exaggerated the contents of the conference which concluded Wednesday. I hasten to add it was a very useful conference. The major achievement of the conference was twofold. First, on the question of language rights, ground which has been lost since February, 1968, was regained. At least, it was regained to a useful extent. More important, as both the Prime Minister and Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) correctly underline, is the fact that the conference ended in a mood of determination to continue this work at an accelerated pace. This alone made the three-day conference extremely important and valuable to the future of our country.

It is an exaggeration to say that the consensus which the right hon. Prime Minister tabled this morning contained any real agreement among the governments on any of the issues covered in that consensus. The fact is the consensus consists of decisions to refer every single matter to a committee, either a continuing committee, a committee of ministers or a subcommittee. When more concrete resolutions were brought forward which the officials wanted the conference to accept in principle, such as the desirability of entrenchment against the infringement of human rights, these resolutions were objected to and watered down.

I do not say this in criticism of the Prime Minister or of any of the provincial premiers.

[Mr. Lewis.]

In view of the loss in co-operative climate since February, 1968, it would have been unrealistic to expect firm agreement, even in principle, on matters of great concern to everyone at the conference. I emphasize the fact that on the real problems in depth discussion and confrontation have not yet taken place. They are in the future. The difficulties are by no means behind us. They are ahead of us. I am sure the Prime Minister will readily agree that is the case.

I am not discouraged by the fact that Canada has problems and conflicts. History shows any country without problems is probably dead, and one without conflict is probably dying. Progress is made from the solution of problems and conflicts which continually present themselves in society. I do not expect that at any stage of human development a plateau will be reached where there will be no problems and no conflicts. That is inconceivable.

Every member of this house, I am sure, wants this country to resolve our present problems and conflicts so that we may reach a higher plateau for the endeavour of our people. A total review of the constitution is essential in order to meet our needs today and in the future. We reject the notion of a piece-meal patch-up here and there, which would not take into account the development of a modernized industrialized society. The development of our society is becoming increasingly urbanized, and new problems arise for the overwhelming majority of our population, even those who are wealthy, and particularly for the poor and near-poor.

Our position, Mr. Speaker, is unequivocal. After some years of study and discussion there should be a new constitution which would strengthen and not weaken the capacities and powers of the Canadian government and parliament to care for all the people of Canada. It must strengthen and not weaken the federal government and the federal parliament to enable them to establish minimum and equal standards across Canada in income, public services, educational opportunities, health and welfare, decent housing, clean air, and unpolluted water for Canadians in every part of this country regardless of their background and origin.

I have stated this national objective in uninspiring and simple words. This national objective will not be achieved by reducing the federal spending power. The attitude of the Prime Minister regarding the Canadian constitutional position has been a concern of mine for some years. I say this in order to exchange views, Mr. Speaker. He invited hon. members to tell him how that spending power should be limited. We are worried that the policy and intention of this government may be to compartmentalize the powers in the present constitution and to carry over the compartmentalization of those powers into the new constitution, thereby reducing the capacity of the federal government to be a strong central government in the meaningful sense of that term, reducing the capacity of the federal government and parliament to use their spending power in order to assist the people in every region of Canada to achieve minimum national standards in all the areas I have mentioned and many others I have failed to mention.

In this context one cannot avoid being distressed at the rather flippant and callous attitude of the federal government in saying to the provinces, "If you want money, go ahead and tax yourself." There are at least four and probably five provinces in this country that cannot tax their people any more, and could not get any more out of increased taxes because they do not have the base on which to tax. You cannot get taxes out of people with an average income of just about 50 per cent of the average per capita income across Canada, or very close to 50 per cent, which is the case in all the Atlantic provinces.

Premier Smallwood, in one of his delightful interventions at the conference, pointed out that he already taxes the people of his province in certain areas—sale taxes, gasoline taxes, and one other which for the moment I cannot recall—at a rate higher than the rate in the richest province of Canada, Ontario. So to say to at least half of our provinces, "Go ahead and tax yourself," is really to utter unattractive nonsense. Surely it cannot arouse the enthusiasm of the people in those provinces about a federation, a kind of federalism that tells them to do what they cannot possibly do and therefore condemns them to a standard of living, to a standard of services, a standard of opportunity and a condition of life that must fall below that of the average in Canada.

I am not suggesting that the Prime Minister and his government intend that. I am not suggesting that for one moment. I am aware of their intentions in the realm of regional planning and regional development. We probably may disagree with the particular plan they have in mind. It would be unfair if I did not recognize that they had that in mind, but that does not negate the harm done to the unity of the country by the flippant and callous remark, "Go ahead and tax yourselves."

In the same context and the same way I do not think it helps the future of this country and the strength of confederation for the federal government to insist that the Medical Care Act contains a provision which limits it to five years, and to indicate to every province and, indeed, to the people of the country that when it suits the federal government's purposes it will withdraw from present joint programs.

Mr. Trudeau: You voted for that act.

Mr. Lewis: Of course I voted for it. Mr. Speaker, I have voted in the years I have been in parliament and my colleagues who have been here longer have voted many times for many unsatisfactory pieces of legislation produced by the right hon. gentleman and his predecessors because we were determined to get at least a little if we could not get all that was necessary. So of course we voted for it, and we would vote for it again if it were presented to us because we believe in the necessity of medicare across Canada, and even with that limitation it was better to have the statute than not to have it.

I think the provincial governments are not wrong when they plead with the federal government that its unilateral withdrawal from present joint programs should be abandoned, and that the federal government should carry on the work it has done in those spheres in which it has so far participated.

Having said that we believe in a stronger federal government and parliament, I hasten to add that we are fully aware, my colleagues and I, that the size of our country, and the diversity of its people also make necessary stronger provincial governments, and that it is impossible to run this country, whether it is a medicare plan, a housing plan or anything else that is involved, all from Ottawa. We believe that it is necessary to decentralize the choice of policies in many instances, and certainly to decentralize the administration and the carrying out of policies through the provinces and indeed through the municipal governments within the provinces. It was because of our realization that a modern society requires a strong central government, and that a country like ours also requires strong provincial governments, that we developed the attitude toward our constitution and constitutional arrangements which called for a flexibility in the constitution and in the constitutional arrangements. Our policies called for a readiness on the part of Ottawa and on the part of the provincial governments to enter into different arrangements and different agreements with Quebec, in particular, if this is necessary in order to make progress and, indeed, with other provinces if the situation makes that kind of solution desirable.

I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that we do not withdraw from that position. I realize that some members of my party, in the last election and at other times, have expressed themselves in terms that go beyond those I have just stated. We have differences of opinion in our party, as the Prime Minister has in his and as the Leader of the Opposition has in his, and it is as true for a party as for a country that a party that has no differences of opinion is dead and that if it has no internal conflict it is dying. But we do not retreat as a party from the position we have put to the Canadian people, the position that if you insist that in every case every province must be treated in exactly the same way the result may well be immobility for Canada. The result may well be in certain instances an impossibility for the country to go forward.

If you have nine provinces willing to enter into a joint plan with Ottawa and one province which for good reasons does not wish to do so, we say that in that situation it would be to immobilize Canada to refuse to make the kind of flexible arrangement which that situation would require. I remind the house that this is what we did with the Canada Pension Plan. We have a Canada Pension Plan and we have a Quebec pension plan. Every Canadian is covered by a pension plan and no one in Canada is hurt. Unless we had been prepared to make that kind of arrangement no Canadian would have been covered by a pension plan, which certainly would have been a thoroughly undesirable result.

I want to go to another point which has been mentioned neither in the paper which the federal government tabled nor in any of the remarks of the premiers at the conference that ended last Wednesday. Without entering into an ideological controversy, I think it is recognized that in a modern society it is impossible to run things without a great deal of just, viable and conscientious planning by all levels of government. It is impossible to run Canada if only the federal government plans its affairs, and if every provincial government plans its affairs without relationship to the plans of the other levels of government.

I suggest that one of the urgent needs in the new constitution is for us to establish, right in the document, consultative and planning machinery that would take in all 11 governments in Canada. I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, it is impossible for the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) to carry through a meaningful fiscal policy in this country when half of the revenues are collected and half of the total expenditures are made by the provincial governments and the municipal governments across Canada. It is impossible for the governor of the Bank of Canada to have a useful monetary policy with the support of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) if every level of government, without relationship one to the other, is able to go to the market as it pleases, when it pleases and without knowing what the total effect on the monetary policy is or may be at any given time.

I think the next step forward as a federation interested in serving our people is a constitutional provision for permanent machinery for consultation and planning in respect of the economy and services to our country. On occasion, agreement will not be reached and I appreciate that. The constitution will have to make provision for the results of possible disagreements, but very often—I hope most often—agreement would be reached and every section of Canada would therefore fit into a national plan, with national purposes and national objectives.

Our party is determined that Canada should be a nation which speaks to the world in two official languages but with only one voice. We support the position that the constitution must guarantee this indespensable character of the country in the community of nations. But to say that, I suggest, is not enough. Our new constitution will also have to provide a viable solution to the real problem in respect of the part which provincial governments may play in areas of international concern which fall within their provincial jurisdictions. It is not enough merely to insist that Canada must have a voice somewhere.

If the organization deals with matters concerning labour, as the I.L.O. does, or matters concerning education, urban renewal, housing and the like—matters which are either exclusively at the moment, and may continue to be, within provincial jurisdiction, or concurrently within federal-provincial jurisdiction—then, we must find ways of having the provinces directly represented at conferences where these subjects are discussed. They must participate in the decisions and go back home to implement the conclusions of such conferences within the spheres of their jurisdictions.

Therefore, I say there are two parts to the solution of the problem of international affairs, whatever the precise details may be. One is to define the establishment of Canada as one nation in a community of nations, and the other is to find a useful part for the provinces to play in international exchanges which concern matters within their jurisdictions—

Mr. Peters: And within the Canadian framework.

Mr. Lewis: And within the Canadian framework.

I want to say that as far as reform of the Senate is concerned, we are still of the opinion that there should only be an elected parliament in this country and that no part of it should be appointed. When the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the government white paper urge that members of the Senate should be appointed by the provinces as well as by the federal government, and thus make the Senate more representative of the provinces, I am left rather unimpressed. What this proposal will mean is that Senators, instead of being appointed by one government and, therefore, if they feel any responsibility at all to a government will feel that responsibility to one, they will be appointed by 11 governments. There will be little claques of senators, each claque representing a particular government and a particular point of view. There is no sense in that.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): And none of them responsible to the people.

Mr. Lewis: There will be none of them responsible to the people, and we see no sense in that. We still feel that the Senate ought not to be part of our parliamentary system. If there is going to be one, and I am not qualifying my personal position that there is no need for the Senate in Canada, then we ought to find some way of electing its members so they will be responsible to the people rather than merely to the governments that appointed them.

Mr. Trudeau: May I ask the hon. member a question? Does he realize that this proposition of the federal government, which he says has no sense, was supported by all ten provincial governments?

Mr. Lewis: I realize that, Mr. Speaker, and I would have been surprised had they not supported it because the proposal gives them a chance to make a few more appointments, and every government likes that. It may well be that, as a result of an agreement between the federal government and the governments of the ten provinces, some such amendment to the constitution should be made. I do not think such an amendment would destroy our country, but let me say this: If that is done it will be, in my opinion, and I am using strong language knowing the meaning of the word, a betrayal of democracy. If the Senate is given even more powers than it now has, as is also suggested in the white paper, this is what will happen.

I do not think I need to say very much more. Many members of my party have made similar statements and I made my position quite clear at the time the resolution which preceded the official languages bill was introduced. I said that we favour this piece of legislation. However, there are two points I should like to make which have arisen since the introduction of that resolution and the bill. The first and most important is that there is a great need for explanation and clarification across Canada as to the meaning, the import and the implications of the introduction of the official languages act within the federal sphere. There is need not only for explanation and clarification but also for assurance that no one now in the federal service who has given many years of service to Canada will suffer as a result of the introduction of this act.

Again, the situation has not been helped by the hasty action which has been taken in certain spheres in Ottawa. As the result of the introduction of bilingualism into the civil service, some people were victimized. I think the introduction of bilingualism in Canada must be made without arousing new prejudices, without increasing the differences that exist, and without calling forth further resentment. It is extremely important, and I am sure members of the government will agree, that this ought to be done without loss of time. We must clarify what the act is intended to do, its implications, and cease any more actions by any agency of government which makes the lack of one of the official languages a disadvantage to senior civil servants.

Again, I do not think I need to spend more than a few seconds in reiterating our support of the notion of a charter of human rights and our support of the entrenchment of such a charter in the constitution of Canada. We can see no harm in it, and I can see no logic in most of the articles I have read and the speeches I have heard against it. Many members of my profession, when I am not in parliament, oppose the idea of entrenchment and are tied to the old-fashioned notion of the supremacy of parliament. They contend it must not be interfered with, and I disagree with them. I agree with the Prime Minister, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) and all my colleagues, particularly the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin) who has spoken and written about this a great deal, that there are basic human rights which no legislature ought to be able to touch. I agree that such rights should be entrenched in the constitution of our country so that they cannot be abridged either by the federal parliament or a provincial legislature.

I have tried in my remarks, as the first speaker for my colleagues and my party, to deal with some of the basic problems that face us. I repeat what I said, that the problem of the division of power and the use of federal spending power has hardly been touched by the conference. It has, if I remember correctly, not yet been touched by the continuing committee. Therefore, the really vexing conflicts in this country still remain to be confronted, let alone solved. But I have great confidence that we will in the end succeed. We will succeed, particularly, if we set for ourselves some common national goals and objectives, if we become more concerned about what a particular power will be used for and less concerned about who will wield it.

Anyone who knows Canada cannot doubt its potential greatness. I detest nationalism when it is chauvinistic, narrow, bigoted and believes in its superiority over others. But I believe in a nationalism which seeks greatness based on respect of others as well as respect of self. In one sense the nation state is to the world community what the family unit is to the nation. In that sense, I am proud to be a member of this country and a Canadian nationalist who resents control exercised over our destiny by multi-national corporations abroad.

Mr. Lewis: One of the constitutional objectives ought to be to regain control of our economy and our economic destiny in this country. In this sense, also, all of us want to see Canada achieve its full potential of great social and cultural work and play a part in the painful and anxious search for world peace and equality of conditions among all nations. Therefore, it is our belief that we cannot escape the need for a total review and revision of the fundamentals of our constitution. We cannot escape a stronger central government in Canada playing its full role in the attempts to solve the new urban problems which affect the quality of life of most Canadians.

No doubt it will take time, but if we succeed in finding such national objectives as I have indicated, national objectives of value and of meaning to all our people, the time and effort will not only preserve Canada as one federal nation but will strengthen and heighten its human achievements at home and its place in the world. I humbly say, Mr. Speaker, that I know of no task which more justly demands our dedicated attention.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, it is rather difficult, as was mentioned by the previous speaker, to analyze and bring about conclusions on the discussions which took place during the federal-provincial conference.

We should like to make some constructive suggestions but in the few minutes available to us, it is rather difficult to attempt to rectify a situation or a constitution which we all wish to see modified, and to make all the necessary suggestions.

At this time when everyone wants to amend the constitution—this situation has prevailed now for a few years—within the provincial and federal governments, unfortunately bombs are exploding in Montreal, Ottawa and Toronto.

This leads us to ask ourselves whether Canada would not, unfortunately, be late in its desire to amend the constitution and bring about solutions to the problems facing our young people, our provincial governments, our municipalities and our school boards? At the present time, are our public bodies patient enough to wait for solutions to problems which date back many years and which unfortunately we have been too slow to rectify?

I should like to make a side comment concerning a study on taxation and the problem around which the attention was particularly centered during the federal-provincial conference. After three days of conference on the theme of the new constitution for Canada, the financial and fiscal issue was the main topic in the newspapers and on television and radio. In spite of the importance of the taxation question, what strikes us most is the total omission, concerted so to say, of the Carter report, which included the conclusions of the recent royal commission of inquiry on taxation.

Public opinion had to let that Commission's report fall into oblivion even at the federal-provincial conference, where the taxation issue enjoyed all the publicity it could get. In fact, that question calls for the attention of all public administrators who are all fighting against a lack of funds.

The six volumes of the Carter commission's report contain 2,600 pages of closely printed text. The cost of such an inquiry was estimated at $3 million and was paid through public funds; this represents about $1,385 for each page of the report.

Why must we, two years after the submission of that commission's report, bring all that question up again in another form, namely the sharing of powers between the different governments as to taxation and taxes, while not even one of the commission's recommendations has been implemented up to now by the federal government.

That federal-provincial conference received much publicity before it began and had thus raised great expectations about an early solution. The conference is over, and unfortunately, the Canadian people wonder what problem it may actually have solved.

After the conference, an honourable senator who sat with me in this house for many years wondered what benefit this conference might have brought forth. It is illusory, he said, to suggest that this conference, or any other for that matter, did solve the problem of the constitution.

Hon. John Turner (Minister of Justice): What senator?

Mr. Rondeau: The Speaker of the Senate.

I asked him then if he believed that this conference had brought about any good results. "Yes", he answered me, "it will have given Canadians, thanks to television, an opportunity to see what happened at the conference and to become aware of the problems we knew existed before those meetings were held."

The TV coverage of the meetings of the conference enabled all Canadians to become aware of our constitutional problems. In this regard, an honourable member asked the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) yesterday whether he intended shortly to televise the debates of this house, because that would enable all Canadians to see what is going on in the House of Commons. Unfortunately, those who have been in the house for several years agree with a senator that nothing much was accomplished at federal-provincial conferences, apart from acquainted the public with problems that administrators already know about.

We all knew and we still know that our problems are ever increasing and becoming more and more serious. In the meantime, the bad feeling subsists and the Canadian people rightly ask themselves the following question: Will the governments, whether Liberal or Conservative, which have allowed, for the past hundred years, the constitutional problems to arise in our country be able to correct them?

Some reforms are necessary, we agree but before going ahead, we should seek the causes of the present unrest and realize the mistakes made in the past regarding the constitution. In fact, every year, governments make a mess of it. How do we know that what we want to reform today will be more respected tomorrow?

In my opinion, the basic flaw in our present constitution is the division of powers among the provinces even though those powers are clearly defined in the constitution. But once again money is the source of trouble. Still, we were supposed to pay much more attention to the question of languages at the last federal-provincial conference.

I noticed that during the three days of the conference, the representatives of all the provinces spoke the same language with the federal government: the dollar language.

All provincial representatives spoke of the money problem and, yet, there is talk of bilingualism and biculturalism. The formalists know their responsibilities in matters of road construction and health, because the constitution allots the money to federal government. This government was given the means to assume provincial responsibilities, while the provinces were given only the responsibilities.

So long as the Canadian constitution will not allow the provinces to assume financially the responsibilities assigned to them, so long as we are at grips with the constitutional problem, so long as there is a quarrel between the ten provinces and the federal government, the provinces will have nothing but responsibilities while the federal government will have the money.

Nothing during the last federal-provincial conference allows us to hope that the Canadian government will be able to do something to enable the provinces to achieve their own aspirations.

On the second day of the conference, while attending the discussions I heard the Ontario premier, Mr. Robarts, refer to what the Alberta premier, the hon. Mr. Strom, had said the day before, that is, that the Bank of Canada should be used to achieve the economic development of the provinces.

That was a suggestion from the premier of Alberta, and the premier of Ontario took it up, giving the Prime Minister of Canada to understand that it might not be a bad thing to look more carefully into the suggestion of the premier of Alberta.

Then, the premier of British Columbia pointed out that the governor of the Bank of Canada, Mr. Rasminsky had already stated that nothing in the policy of the Bank of Canada prevented an assistance to the provinces, but that, on the other hand, the present government's policy was not in keeping with the wishes of the premier of British Columbia, as was suggested by the premier of Ontario, after the statement by his Alberta colleague.

It is easy to speak of taxation and reform, but as long as the provinces remain in an economic bottle-neck, that is in a financial ghetto, as long as the provinces are compelled to build bridges, hospitals and schools because the federal government does not assume its financial responsibilities, they will have to pay the interests on the costs of four bridges, five highways, four or five hospitals, and we shall not get out of this jam, financial and economic, we shall be fettered by this strait-jacket. That is how the provincial representatives see things. This is so true that at the last federal-provincial conference, all the provinces found a common language, the language of the dollar. Eleven governments, including ten provincial governments, were trying to "stretch" the buck, to "lengthen" it, and unfortunately, so far the federal government has not put forward concrete solutions in the financial field.

The hon. Eric Kierans, a former Revenue Minister in the Quebec government, said on May 7th 1964 and I quote:

> Quebec wants Ottawa to make its financial policies more adaptable.

Mr. Turner: That was long ago!

Mr. Rondeau: The Minister of Justice says "That was long ago". Well, we have been awaiting reforms from the federal government for a long time and they are not forthcoming. In fact, what the Postmaster General said when he was the Quebec Minister of Revenue still holds true today and reform is just as urgent as in 1964.

He said, in a statement reported in Le Devoir of May 7, 1964:

> "It cannot be otherwise, when a province implements a development program such as ours and finances its increased expenses mainly by way of borrowings.
> The policy of the Bank of Canada in respect of Quebec's needs should be designed in such a way that the terms of credit—

Nothing has changed, and yet that was said long ago!

> —would be made much more flexible to reduce the cost of our borrowings".

When we look, for example, at one single item, housing for 1969, we see that the CMHC mortgage interest rate is 9⅜ per cent. Well, in that field also the federal government has put the provinces and housing in a financial dead end, so that the present Minister of Transport (Mr. Hellyer) had to study for months to try to deal with the housing problem. However, the 12 per cent tax has not been withdrawn, and this has given a deadly blow to construction in all provinces and paralysed residential housing development.

Mr. Speaker, the centralizing tax policy of the federal government is no solution for the monetary problem faced by the provinces in 1969. As far as constitutional problems are concerned, the Ralliement créditiste suggests that the constitution of Canada should be the property of Canada and that it could be amended by Canadians and not by others.

At the federal level, Canadians should be able to feel at home everywhere in Canada, which implies that both official languages be recognized throughout Canada.

Economically, the federal government should withdraw from fields over which it has no jurisdiction. In accordance with the present constitution, it should hand over to the provinces the powers of taxation which rightly belong to them, that is personal income tax corporation income tax and estate taxes. The provinces would then be able to assume their responsibilities and to build a society to their image.

Federal government action in fields which are the responsibility of the provinces has become impossible and is the source of constant conflicts.

The Ralliement créditiste favours negotiations between the federal government and provincial governments, with a view to drafting the basic documents which will be used to set up a new constitution.

This morning, the Prime Minister asked us to make suggestions. But we have been making suggestions for a long time now, only not many of them have been put into practice. Here is what the chamber of commerce of the province of Quebec is suggesting, as an answer to our constitutional problems.

It is federalism which offers to French Canadians the best opportunities to organize their economic life. However, the kind of federalism we have known until now should be changed:

(a) the constitution of Canada (the British North America Act) should be amended or redrafted in order to clearly define responsibilities at every level of government, to allow every level of government to levy taxes according to its needs and to provide for a machinery which would prevent efficiently trespasses of jurisdictions—

From various governments.

(b) Taxation policies of federal as well as of provincial governments should be reached only after consultations, these should take place at the official level and on a permanent basis.

However, at the last federal-provincial conference, the right hon. Prime Minister was the target of several attacks, because the federal government had interfered on several occasions in the affairs of the provinces, through implementation of several of its programs.

• (3:00 p.m.)

And I go on with the statement of the chamber of commerce of the province of Quebec.

(c) Monetary and tariff policies of the federal government must be set up in consultation with the provinces and those consultations must be official and permanent.

Here is also what the chamber of commerce of the province of Quebec states, and I consider this to be a lever to bring about our economic expansion, from the federal and provincial point of view, regarding the responsibilities, and I quote:

(d) The Bank of Canada should facilitate the financing of the provinces and, through the latter, the financing of municipalities and school boards.

Then, after the Creditists have made their views known for several years in the house or outside—the chamber of commerce finally came out with one of the main recommendations Creditists have never stopped making, namely to use the Bank of Canada to relieve financially the provincial governments, municipalities, school boards or the various public bodies. And I go on:

4. French Canadians must be convinced that their self-achievement depends basically on their leadership in all fields of economic and social life.

5. English-speaking people in Canada must show that they accept fully French-speaking Canadians as partners and not hamper their access to executive positions, either in the public or in the private sector of the economy and administration of the country. It is mainly a question of attitude which manifests itself in concrete everyday actions at the government or corporate level, regarding spending policies, professional services, promotion, advertising and so on.

Mr. Speaker, that is what the Chamber of Commerce thinks about our constitutional problems today. For years everyone has been blaming, and rightly so, the central government, the federal government, because of its centralization, because it intrudes, too often, unfortunately, without consultations, in provincial matters.

But, in time, more than one villain may be discovered. We can also blame some provincial governments, like the Quebec government, for instance, who enter into agreements, and then, afterwards, cry for autonomy. Quebec needs money, probably more than all the other provinces. However, it still allows the federal government to levy taxes, and then hopes that they will be handed back by Ottawa.

The provincial governments of Quebec and of the other provinces, have, since July 17, 1947, according to chapter 58 of the revised Statutes of Canada, signed agreements, and I quote:

Dominion-provincial tax rental agreements:
An act to authorize the government of Canada to enter into agreements with the governments of the provinces pursuant to which, in return for compensation, the provinces agree to refrain from levying certain taxes for a limited period.

That act was approved on July 17, 1947. At the time, it was a rental of provincial taxation powers to the federal government. That rental by the provinces of their own fields of taxation to the federal government has been renewed from then on.

It is strange to note on November 4 and 5, 1968, there was another federal-provincial conference in Ottawa. The Minister of Finance, (Mr. Benson) asked the provincial delegates for a five-year renewal of the authorization to levy taxes for the provinces.

It is a well known fact that the agreements referred to were lapsing on December 31, 1968. We thought that the Quebec government would oppose the renewal of the agreements, since, for twenty years, the two traditional political parties had been vying with one another to obtain from Ottawa the return to "la belle province" of her tax fields.

Therefore, we could expect that our officials at the conference would oppose the rental of these tax fields for another five-year term, but, oddly enough, what happened was just the opposite.

On November 6, 1968, the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier) asked the Minister of Finance whether he had obtained unanimous consent from the provincial delegations on income tax collection for another five-year period. The minister's reply, to be found on page 2484 of the official report, was as follows:

No one disagreed.

That is, opposed the renewal of the agreements.

Now, on the one hand, the federal government took over tax fields that belonged to the provinces, the provinces having agreed to rent them for a while. On the other hand, now that the federal government has taken over such tax fields, the provinces would like to receive the amounts collected in the form of taxes.

We believe that conflicts between the federal and provincial governments concerning taxation powers will not be solved before some time. Therefore, it is incumbent on the federal government to settle the problem, since it has now sole jurisdiction in financial matters.

Provinces can levy taxes only in accordance with the constitution, while the federal government has the right and duty to make available to the provinces the money they need to insure their own development.

I have here yesterday's issue of Le Droit, and strange enough, on the first page, one can read:

Cry of distress from the Maritimes.

[Mr. Rondeau.]

On the right of the first page, there is also:

$10 million for Tunisia.

While the provinces beg for assistance from Ottawa, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) offers millions to Tunisia. Assistance is still being given to foreign countries, to Tunisia, as has always been done. Last year, we made loans under the assistance program to developing countries in the amount of $163 million. On the other hand, the government says it is unable to help the provinces which are now facing an economic problem.

Créditistes have for a long time denounced the federal government's lack of foresight in money matters. Our opponents always answer us: But money must be found somewhere. Here is what Social Credit has always advocated because there are several ways to govern a country and to put money into circulation. I quote:

—there may be differences of opinion about the order of priority, but we shall not dwell on them. There are two or three main methods which could be briefly mentioned.

In his testimony before the banking and commerce committee in 1939, Mr. Graham Towers, former governor of the Bank of Canada, made the following statement:

A government may find money in three ways: by taxation, by borrowing people's savings or by combined action through a vast monetary policy, namely by loans which create additional funds.

• (3:10 p.m.)

I should now like to quote a proposal about government financing.

The procedure today, when the government needs more money to meet its expenses than the taxes collected is to borrow it from the people, from chartered banks or finally in New York. Loans obtained from chartered banks are exactly the kind of borrowings referred to by Mr. Towers which "create additional money".

Let us not forget also the fantastic amount borrowed abroad to be used for the development of our natural resources.

It is still a mystery for many who wonder: How come a country, such as Canada which has tremendous natural resources and manpower is compelled to borrow foreign capital to develop those resources and make them available to its citizens? It is still a greater mystery to note that provincial and municipal governments, in order to build roads, schools and other public utilities, must go on foreign markets to obtain the funds required to carry out their projects in Canada.

But the greatest mystery still, is to see a sovereign government, our own Canadian government, which has the unique and exclusive authority to regulate, control and issue money, handing over such sovereign prerogatives to profit making private institutions, and then ask them—those banking institutions, its own creatures—for the money required for the general benefit of the country. This is beyond understanding!

Créditistes state that before borrowing from private banks and from outside the country, the government should first of all get from the Bank of Canada the money it needs from time to time, in addition to the tax revenues, to help finance Canadian development, particularly in the public sector. Why, in fact, should Canada borrow from chartered banks and afterwards tax the people to pays for the interests, while it could obtain the funds (without interest) from the Bank of Canada, which is a public institution established by parliament to regulate and control the circulation of money and credit in Canada?

In his report to the Twentieth Century Fund on economic problems in the United States, Stuart Chase, on page 105 of the book "Where Is the Money Coming From" quotes the National Resources Planning Board as follows:

The day when the charges on the federal debt will become oppressive, we shall have to think seriously of creating through a modern banking system and our Treasury institutions a debt free from interest.

On the same page, Stuart Chase adds:

If the government borrowed only from its own central bank, without interest, there would be no interest charges at all. There would be capital redemption and the principle that too much money must not be introduced in the system would be safe.

This is exactly what Créditistes have been claiming for several years. A study of the history of Canada over the last century, reveals that new borrowings do not help pay off the debt. It must nevertheless be paid back. Interest rates must be reduced. This could only be done by replacing gradually our interest-bearing indebtedness by some money obtained at the "cost price" from the Bank of Canada.

These are, Mr. Speaker, concrete solutions to the economic problems of the provinces and the country, for which we would like to hold our constitution responsible, that constitution that we have been hacking up today, for the purpose of making the dollars more elastic, of allocating them among the provinces.

I have in hand another article which shows beyond doubt that Canada is not faced with an economic problem, in view of its wealth, but rather with a financial problem.

I also have a newspaper clipping which shows the kind of prosperity that not only Canada, but also several other countries of the world, would enjoy were the riches more evenly distributed.

The author is referring to the spending done by different governments throughout the world, following the 1939-1945 war.

[English]

Every family could be provided with a $24,000 house and $8,000 worth of furniture, plus a cash bonus of $40,000 throughout the whole of Great Britain, U.S.A., Russia, Canada, Australia, Ireland, France and Belgium.

I continue:

In addition, every city of over 200,000 people in all those countries, could be given cash grants of $50 million for libraries, $50 million for schools, and another $50 million for hospitals, had the money spent by these countries for military purposes between 1939 and 1946 been devoted instead to community and private development.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, if, during the war, we were able, and other countries were able, to spend an average of $24,000 for the war, we could have given a $24,000 house to each citizen in all those countries.

We could have given $40,000 in cash to some citizens of those countries. We could also have given $8,000 worth of furniture to each one of them. We have spent that much during the war. There are statistics to prove it.

Today, because this is no longer wartime, the provinces are divided, there is disagreement between them, they are like ten dogs fighting for a bone. There is fighting around the taxation platter.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that there is no solution, even if we were to change our constitution. Even if we achieve those reforms seriously, even if we do not allow the provinces to discharge economically their responsabilities, as clearly stated in the constitution, we will keep quarrelling, and having federal-provincial conferences without getting more results than what we had this week.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to end my comments with an explanation of the economy. I borrow it from a president of the United States who has been considered—and rightly so—as one of the greatest: Abraham Lincoln. He said, and I quote:

• (3:20 p.m.)

[English]

Money is the creature of law, and the creation of the original issue of money should be maintained as an exclusive monopoly of the government. The monetary needs of increasing numbers of people advancing towards higher standards of living can and should be met by the government. Such needs can be served by issuing national currency and credit through the operation of a national banking system. The circulation of a medium of exchange issued and backed by the government can be properly regulated and redundancy of issue avoided by withdrawing from circulation such amounts as may be necessary, by taxation and otherwise.

Government, possessing the power to create and issue currency and credit as money and enjoying the right to withdraw both currency and credit from circulation by taxation and otherwise, need not and should not borrow capital at interest as the means of financing government and public enterprise.

The government should create issue, and circulate all the currency and credit needed to satisfy the spending power of the government and the buying power of the consumers. The privilege of creating and issuing money is not only the supreme prerogative of the government, but it is the government's greatest creative opportunity.

By adoption of these principles the financing of all public enterprise, the maintenance of stable government and ordered progress, and the conduct of the Treasury will become matters of practical administration. The people can and will be furnished with a currency as safe as their own government. Money will cease to be the master, and become the servant of humanity. Democracy will rise superior to the money power.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, money will always be the prime concern of our governments, so long as they will not accept their responsibilities, for the constitution—and it is clearly stated—allows the provinces to assume their responsibilities. We are in favour of a study of our constitution, but we should first ask ourselves why the constitution has been so badly mishandled until now.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

[English]

Mr. Mark MacGuigan (Windsor-Walkerville): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to contribute to the debate touching a matter of such basic importance to our country. We are talking about the fundamental law of the land. People do not realize generally how important the constitution is in the lives of our citizens. As an observer at the recent conference, I was struck by the fact that even some at that conference did not understand the relationships existing between certain subjects under discussion and constitutional problems.

There are two ways of looking at the constitution. To illustrate my meaning I can do no better than repeat what Aristotle, the first philosopher to define a constitution, said. He first defined a constitution as the organization of a state in respect of its offices, and especially in respect of that particular office which is supreme in all issues. That was a juridical definition on the basis of which the Greeks, and later many others, devised classifications of constitutions falling into three good and three bad forms. Again in his "Politics" Aristotle gave us another definition of a constitution, when he said that a constitution is the way of life of a citizen body.

This, it seems to me, is the most profound meaning of a constitution. That is the meaning of our constitution, and it is most necessary for our people to realize this today.

It is true, of course, that in some quarters of this country people are dissatisfied with the juridical concept of our constitution. But it seems to me that the dissatisfaction of some of our people goes beyond that. Some people feel that the constitution, which was originally made in 1867 and drafted in legal or juridical language, does not respond to the desires and aspirations of minority groups in Canada today. Not only the French Canadian group but many other minority groups in this country look forward to the enshrinement of their basic rights in a bill of rights.

In a booklet, "The Constitution and the People of Canada", which was released last week, the federal government has outlined proposals for a new constitution. I do not propose to read all the objectives set out on page 48. The first of those is:

To establish for Canada a federal system of government based on democratic principles.

If you like, you can call that democratic federalism. Federalism does not mean, as some seem to think, that the central government is all-supreme and that our orientation in all federal matters must be in the direction of Ottawa. Federalism is not the same as centralism, nor is it the same as the sum total of provincial rights or regional needs and aspirations. Federalism involves a balance between the central needs of our people and the various needs of the regions. The constitution drafted in 1867 struck that balance imprecisely when defining positions as between one government and another. Obviously, there is a considerable overlap in the exercise of federal and provincial powers. For example, the federal power under section 91, subsection 27, of the British North America Act with respect to criminal laws and procedures is very, very broad, and has been so interpreted by the courts. This power touches on matters considered by the provinces as coming within their jurisdiction. Of course, even broader is the general power to legislate with respect to the peace, order and good government of Canada. Similarly, section 92, subsection 13, vests the right to legislate with respect to property and civil rights in the provinces. That language might encompass practically every matter with which a provincial or federal legislature might be asked to deal. There are conflicts built into the constitution which cannot always be solved judicially. When they are not direct conflicts, the courts have held the view they result from concurring powers. Until the constitution is reformed, both jurisdictions must be allowed to exercise the powers which are validly theirs.

• (3:30 p.m.)

On this point I did not quite understand the position of the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis). Unlike the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield), whose suggestions were not concrete but of a general nature, and unlike the propositions of the speaker for the Creditiste Party which although concrete were irrelevant, the suggestions of the hon. member for York South fell somewhere in between. His propositions apparently are more concrete and less irrelevant than those of the two other opposition spokesmen. Today, I understood him to say he does not want the spending power of the federal government limited. Dealing with the same subject last Thursday in this house, he supported the provincial requests for "bread", and stated the time had come for placing at the head of the constitutional discussions the role of the spending power of the federal government. Was this subject to be placed on the agenda merely so that the provinces could be told the federal government would not make any changes in the spending power or was it to be put on the agenda with the possibility of some genuine give-and-take? I understand it is this give-and-take attitude to which the hon. member now objects. Perhaps what he means is that the equalization payments should be increased. In this sense he would want the spending power freely used, and in other senses not used.

If this is his meaning I would submit the question of equalization payments is not a constitutional question. Does he propose to write into the constitution a criteria of equalization payments which, I submit, according to the experience of the last 20 years in Canada would surely become a new rigidity which we would desire to get out of the constitution.

Section 91 (1A) of the British North America Act gives to the federal government power over public property. The money which the federal government collects is public property and it is entitled to spend it as it wishes. An issue arises where the legislation is not a mere spending enactment, as it is for example in the Family Allowances Act, but is an exercise of the taxing power or combined taxation and a scheme of disbursements, such as the Unemployment and Social Insurance Act of 1935 which was found to be unconstitutional by the Privy Council.

If the federal government does not use its taxing power in a specified way, it does not fall afoul of the rules which the court has laid down for its use. In general, the federal government is entitled to spend as much money as it desires for whatever purpose it desires, even should that purpose be provincial. This is not only the judicial interpretation; it is the practice of governments of Canada, a practice which has been objected to in various instances by the provinces, but which has been accepted as a general use of valid federal power. Some provincial spokesmen at the constitutional conference did not understand this. Spending power was treated by them as if it were an unconstitutional intrusion. Some premiers suggested a new constitution is not necessary, that we should live up to the present one. The truth is that it is being lived up to. The present constitution gives this vast power to the federal government. If the provinces want to see the federal government use its spending power in a different manner, a constitutional arrangement will have to be made to restrict the exercise of that power.

A more serious problem, Mr. Speaker, arose at this conference respecting the provincial approach to the constitution. The province of Quebec, from a cultural point of view, sometimes makes claims that it in effect is the national state for people who live in that area. In economic terms, the Premier of Ontario made a similar assertion, that the province of Ontario is an entity for all purposes, and that when citizens of Ontario pay taxes to the federal government somehow this money should be credited to the government of Ontario. I submit this is entirely wrong.

Under a federal government citizens are citizens not only of the particular province in which they live, but citizens of the country as a whole. It is as citizens of Canada that they pay these taxes to the government of Canada. No province has the right to a fiscal equivalent when they do not take advantage of a federal program which may be offered to them. It is not possible to go beyond federalism in this way, and escape its bounds. Federalism cannot be restricted entirely to its provincial dimensions or entirely to its federal dimensions. Perhaps the balance in the constitution is not satisfactory. If not there should be concrete proposals to change it.

But while it is not possible to go beyond federalism in the economic realm, there is one way to go beyond it. That is with respect to the proposal of the federal government for the entrenchment of certain basic human rights in this country, political, legal, egalitarian, and not least of all linguistic. From discussions at the conference it would appear the provinces have almost reached agreement regarding the entrenchment of the political rights of citizens in this country. They are willing to go beyond federalism, beyond the jurisdictional divisions between the federal and provincial governments, to guarantee to the citizens of this country certain rights which no government, national or international, would be able to take away from them. It is my hope that in the continuing discussions of the constitutional committee this opening toward the possibility of entrenchment of some human rights will be pursued. There appears to be more disagreement in the other areas of legal and egalitarian rights. It may be the government will have to consider an opting-in formula which would allow certain provinces to join with the federal government in a bill of rights applicable to their district.

On the linguistic question, I am unable to see the validity of any of the arguments which have been made against the official languages bill. Section 133 of the British North America Act provides very specific guarantees for the use of the English and the French languages, but it does not limit the use of the English or French languages to those situations set out in the section. There is no tradition of judicial interpretation any more than there are words in section 133 that would suggest there is to be a limitation on the use of either language. If it were desired legislatively to expand the use of any language beyond the bounds of the guarantees in section 133 there would be no constitutional difficulty. Similarly, with respect to section 91(1), where again there is a language guarantee, the guarantee appears to be no broader than that in section 133 because that in section 133 is the only guarantee which could be incorporated in section 91(1).

But despite the fact that I believe the linguistic rights bill to be fully constitutional, I think we must applaud the restraint of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) in agreeing to negotiate with the provinces on this subject, and in not pressing this issue. People's deepest fears are often revealed not so much in the arguments they make but in the fact that they make arguments. There is no doubt that there is a certain uneasiness among many of our fellow citizens about the effects which an official languages bill, and other bills of that kind, might have on them. It is well for us to proceed slowly in this area, and to seek ways whereby these people can constantly be given reassurance. The federal government has no intention of acting precipitously in a way that would deprive people of rights that they have, even though it is interested in expanding the rights which some of our other fellow citizens may have.

With respect to the problem of employment, this might be an area where we could establish the office of a linguistic ombudsman who would be concerned with all cases where people felt, rightly or wrongly, that their right to employment might be infringed by the actions of their superiors. This might give a feeling of security to the little man who faced the prospect, in his mind, of losing his job.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, and with respect to the constitutional committee, it seems to me that it ill becomes members of the opposition to charge the government with failure to produce at this point a more complete statement of the positions which it adopts. The federal government is acting in accordance with the plan it proposed at last year's conference, to proceed step by step to deal with certain problems, and then with others, a plan being followed as well by the continuing committee of officials discussing this matter at many meetings during the year. We have before us in this house a set of proposals which have been made by the federal government which cover many of the problems that have to be dealt with in re-examining or in redeveloping the constitution which this country will need for the next 100 or 200 years.

When I think of how the constitutional committee will function, I am somewhat concerned that it will not be aided by the imprecise notions of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) on this subject, or the irrelevancies of the spokesman for the Creditiste Party, or indeed by what I feel to be the anti-federal rigidities of the spokesman for the New Democratic party. And yet, with the consideration by the committee of concrete proposals by the government of Canada, I am hopeful—

Mr. Lewis: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. MacGuigan: Not at the moment.

Mr. Lewis: It is merely about what you have said now—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member who has the floor has indicated that he will not accept a question at this time.

Mr. MacGuigan: Well, Mr. Speaker, since I get the gist of the hon. member's question, and it is about the language I used, I will take the question now.

Mr. Lewis: Did I hear the hon. member say I was susceptible to anti-federal rigidities?

Mr. MacGuigan: Yes, that is the phrase I used. I consider the hon. member's centralist position to be anti-federal because it does not give the balance required. Indeed, I was listening very closely to him.

Mr. Lewis: I wish the hon. member had heard as well as listened.

Mr. MacGuigan: In conclusion, I would say that despite these concerns and reservations about the functioning of this committee, I am pleased that members of this house will have an opportunity to express themselves in the committee during its deliberations. I know there is no member of this house, from whatever party he may be, who will not put his country above his party or himself on questions of this kind.

[Translation]

Mr. Georges Valade (Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, it is obvious that in the few minutes allowed to members of the house to discuss such an important subject as the constitutional reform, it will not be possible to reach a consensus.

However, I think we have an opportunity to make a few concrete suggestions in answer to the invitation given this morning by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) in his brief statement.

Before I came to the house today, Mr. Speaker, I read the proceedings of the debates on confederation. I refer to the volume reporting the debates of the 3rd session of the 8th parliament in 1865. On page 53, there is a statement made by the hon. Mr. Currie. I should point out that this dates back to 1865. This volume contains also the speech made by hon. Mr. Brown, and I quote:

"On a survey of the whole case, I do think that there is no doubt as to the high advantages that would result from a union of all the colonies, provided that terms of union could be found just to all the contracting parties, and so framed as to secure harmony in the future administration of affairs. But it were wrong to conceal for a moment that the whole merit of the scheme of union may be completely marred by the character of its details."

Mr. Speaker this statement was made over a hundred years ago and it illustrates plainly that those who were busy outlining a new constitution foresaw that serious problems would arise, and that every province should be aware of its responsibilities within Canada.

Mr. Speaker, I would now like to revert briefly to the remarks made this morning by the right hon. Prime Minister.

I regret deeply the tone and the attitude of the Prime Minister, when he spoke of such a vital and important question as the revision of the constitution through the constitutional Conference. At one point, the Prime Minister, speaking of some provincial responsibilities, said, among other things, that the provinces could not shoulder the financial burden of air pollution control.

If the Prime Minister wanted to illustrate the dangers of air pollution he certainly has proven to the house that air pollution during the discussions is not less prejudicial.

The Prime Minister—I am sorry he is not here at the moment,—has been, to say the very least, pretentious, arrogant and insulting to the members of the house. Surely, Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister, whose main plank in his political platform was Canadian unity, could have been expected to act this morning in a more responsible manner.

The Prime Minister said that he was anxious to hear the members of the opposition and then announced in the same breath that he had to leave for Quebec and meet "Le Bonhomme Carnaval" and other V.I.P's participating in that celebration. I understand of course that the Prime Minister has obligations, but in my opinion, when for the first time in history the House had to discuss a question as important as the new constitution, the Prime Minister might have made a point to delay his departure.

I know he has explained, but he is still away. We expected more this morning from the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) than the provocative and cynical argument he presented. The Prime Minister has asked the opposition to bring forth points of view and make suggestions, but he refused to accept those suggestions even before the invitation. He has been reported in news comments and communiques to the effect that he would not accept the establishment of a house committee to study the constitution. How can the opposition discharge its duties, and how can opposition members make concrete suggestions to the government, when the Prime Minister tells the country through the medium of the press that he is not ready to accept opposition suggestions? This is just another way by which the Prime Minister imposes his view on this parliament and the country as a whole.

We have read the manifesto distributed by the Liberal party, during the last election about the just society. I believe the Prime Minister should have read this manifesto before stating this morning that he will not consider the acceptability of a house committee on the constitution. I suggest the Prime Minister should read paragraph E of this manifesto which was distributed throughout the country. It has the picture of the Prime Minister on the front with the words "For Canada; the just society" Let me read what paragraph E states in part:

> Parliament's procedures must be reformed. Greater importance must be given to parliamentary committees so that members of parliament may play a more effective role in our legislative process.

That is a quotation from the main manifesto, the vademecum or biblical literature that the Liberal organization sent out through the country during the last election. The election is now over. It is difficult to understand the members of the Liberal cabinet and Liberal members across the way because I do not believe the government has any intention of living up to the promises made to the people of this country during the election campaign.

And now, Mr. Speaker, I feel it is imperative to say a few words about the climate that prevailed at the constitutional conference and also in the House of Commons this morning.

At the Conference held this week, the Prime Minister was in the driver's seat; the provinces had to follow his lead in the debate; and he would not accept from them any position, any decision nor any recommendation that was contrary to his own views.

In fact, to my way of thinking, this was not a constitutional conference in which the elected representatives of the people were taking part, but rather a meeting between the premiers of the different provinces of Canada.

And we all know that the premiers are after all no more than the representatives of political parties. By no means do I wish to question the qualifications, the integrity or the objectivity of any of them, but I merely want to mention that there were at that conference table elected party representatives, so that the opposition of each of the participating provinces was excluded.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that so important a conference does not concern only the parties in power in the provinces, but that it must certainly concern also the opposition parties, whichever they are. The same applies both to the federal government and the provincial governments.

After the statement of the Prime Minister, we heard—and I felt most proud of it—the comments full of dignity made by the leader of the Progressive Conservative party, who surely taught the Prime Minister a bit of wisdom by tackling this matter with restraint, with objectivity and with all the earnestness required by a question as essential as the constitutional conference.

What astonished me and every other hon. member—and I think this applies to all opposition parties—was the request made by the Prime Minister, not to the government members who are responsible for the administration, but to opposition members, to express, publicly or otherwise, their views on the Senate, on monarchy and on the government's proposed constitution. He asked whether opposition members agreed with the provincial premiers. What is the attitude of the opposition on linguistic rights? What are their suggestions? What is the position the Progressive Conservative opposition on the two-nation policy?

The Prime Minister was then asking the opposition to outline his administrative program.

I am greatly surprised at this attitude on the part of the Prime Minister, because ever since he has been sitting in this house as Prime Minister as well as Minister of Justice, he has never asked opposition parties for suggestions regarding the organization or the preparation of the agenda of the constitutional conference.

It is only after the conference has practically fizzled out that the Prime Minister, in an attempt to conceal the few positive effects obtained, appeals to the opposition.

But among the questions asked by the Prime Minister, some cast doubts upon the sincerity and the concern of the Progressive Conservative party about the affairs of the country.

I was especially surprised when the Prime Minister suggested that the opposition should speak out, for example for or against monarchy. He undoubtedly forgot that not so very long ago, the young Liberals of a certain Ontario riding, the name of which I forget, had passed—some government members remember it—a resolution to abolish monarchy in Canada. It must be admitted that the resolution was defeated.

This was not an initiative of the Conservative party, but one that originated from young Liberals of an Ontario riding. When the Prime Minister asked his question this morning, I wonder if he was not putting it to the young Liberals rather than to the Conservative party. This was a roundabout way of imputing to the opposition attitudes which do not square with the facts. He also tried to place the opposition in an ambiguous position when he accused the Progressive Conservatives of promoting the two Nation theory. It was highly wise or clever of him to speak in English on that occasion.

• (4:00 p.m.)

[English]

I think I should repeat what the Prime Minister said this morning. He said the opposition should say whether two nations form one Canada, because we know that "nations" means one thing in French and something different in English. What the Prime Minister did not say this morning was that during the last election campaign he was trying to convince the people we were attempting to divide this country by preaching for two nations because what we were actually doing was preaching for two Canadas. I think the argument was dishonest at that time and is no more honest now when it is brought into the house in this way.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, on this side, we have always been true to our principles. On the occasion of the Montmorency conference, to which the Prime Minister has referred this morning, indeed, we spoke about two nations, but we did so exactly in the same sense as the Prime Minister, the Progressive Conservative party has never preached division by advocating two Canadas. And if I stress the point, it is due to the fact that, like many other people, I had to refute the fallacious argument, the false propaganda to that effect that was spread across the country during the last election.

Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister also asked the opposition this morning to define its position on the linguistic question, and he then explained his own approach, as he had done at the constitutional conference, and I quote:

> Those who believe that we want to impose the French language throughout the country are mistaken. What we want is to set up bilingual regional districts.

However, Speaker, if we refer to the brief entitled: "For a just society in Canada." We find this at paragraph 6, under the heading "bilingualism".

> From now on, every citizen will be able to resort to one or the other languages to deal with the federal administration.

Mr. Speaker, no specific details are given in this brief regarding the bilingual districts the Prime Minister referred to this morning and those he referred to at the Conference.

So, we must ask ourselves whether the Prime Minister is really playing a political game or whether he is in earnest when he wants to settle the linguistic problems of Canada.

That problem has certainly not been solved. We have confidence in the goodwill and the good faith of our Canadian fellow-citizens; we are well aware that, when that question will be submitted to bodies whose task it will be to define a policy, that language provision will surely receive the support of the Canadian people, with a view to building a united Canada.

Mr. Speaker, the constitutional conference held this week has been, in my opinion, less productive than the two previous ones. In fact, I think that the conference which has most contributed to develop a sound basis for the drafting of a new constitution was, not the one which took place this week, nor the previous one held in February 1968, but that convened by the premier of Ontario (Mr. Robarts) in November 1967.

At this last conference, the premiers were not obliged to comply with instructions or imperatives, as required by the Prime Minister, but it was attended by representatives who were discussing together their needs and their problems and were endeavouring to put forward solutions.

Of course, if one refers to the constitutional conference in February 1968, when the present Prime Minister was Minister of Justice, it is obvious that that conference was perhaps more of an electoral manoeuvre than anything else, since it allowed the Minister of Justice to become the pretender the then prime minister's crown and to set forth some electoral arguments on TV. But, Mr. Speaker, it is a matter of disappointment to see that after discussions that lasted for three days, the last constitutional conference did not make it possible to make fair decisions in order to enable provinces to discharge the responsibilities assigned to them by the Canadian constitution.

Of course, the dilettantism shown by the present Prime Minister has been one of the main obstacles to the success of this constitutional Conference. Almost all observers are unanimous, except of course some premiers whose political allegiance was stronger than the constitutional argument and who became the admirers of the Prime Minister.

On the whole, it can be said that this conference did not bring any solution to the most pressing and most urgent problems of our country. At first we expected the linguistic issue to be the main concern of the delegates but we quickly realized that the provinces had more pressing needs and that it was the monetary and financial problem. The question was whether the central government would keep its control over the powers and rights of the provinces, or whether it would realize that the provinces had their own needs and that they are faced with tragic situations.

We only need to read to-day and yesterday's papers to realize how tragic is the unemployment situation in the province of Quebec. We know that 40 per cent of the Canadian unemployed are found in that province.

At the present time the province of Quebec is faced with financial problems as serious as those of the Maritimes. In Quebec the unemployment rate reaches 8.9 per cent while it is over 10 per cent in the Maritimes. The province of Quebec should have not been made the centre of attention in this conference because it came to request from this federal government and to put before it the same problems which other provinces have stressed for so long. But the federal government turned a deaf ear.

This morning, the right hon. Prime Minister put questions to the members of the opposition and requested directions on a possible approach; may I too ask the right hon. Prime Minister some questions to which I invite him to reply.

[Mr. Valade.]

We should like the government and the right hon. Prime Minister to tell us whether future federal-provincial conferences will have the same structure as the last one? Are premiers only and members of elected political parties to be invited?

We want to know if the right hon. Prime Minister intends to always keep the upper hand?

We would like the Prime Minister and the present government to tell us whether they intend to control and to further intrude—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order, please. I regret I have to interrupt the hon. member but the time allocated to him has expired.

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Does the hon. member for Lotbinière wish to rise on a point of order?

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, I would like to remind the house that the present debate was initiated by the right hon. Prime Minister. It is a very important and interesting debate. However, the time set aside for discussions was very short indeed. We could only listen to seven or eight hon. members, I would therefore express the wish that we might pursue.

I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Rodrigue):

> That this house will not adjourn at five (5) o'clock, pursuant to standing order, but that the debate will continue until six (6) o'clock.

In case this motion should be out of order or should not meet with unanimous approval, I would like Mr. Speaker, to ask the leader of the government to make some suggestions.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order, please. The hon. member has risen on a point of order. May I remind him that it is out of order to move a motion of this kind at this stage?

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, with the permission of the house, I could end my remarks in a few minutes.

Some hon. Members: No, no.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order, please. Unfortunately, we do not have the unanimous consent of the house.

• (4:10 p.m.)

[English]

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, those of us who have been in the house today, particularly on the government side of the house, welcome this debate in parliament on some of the fundamental issues relating to the constitution and the legal underpinning of Canada. I subscribe to the view that the elected representatives of the people should have an opportunity to pronounce themselves on these issues from time to time to Parliament assembled.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has said that he will consider the appropriateness of a committee to study this issue. It is true that in recent years federal-provincial conferences, either among heads of government or among various ministers of the Crown, ministers of finance, attorneys general, ministers of health and so on, have constituted what has been called by some commentators a third or fourth level of government. When these conferences are televised to the people, there is almost an atmosphere of the Athenian city state. I believe, therefore, that it becomes incumbent upon the representatives of the people to ensure that they are not bypassed, and that they fulfil their mandate to their electors.

Last week it appeared that the federal and provincial governments were approaching each other in a spirit of confrontation. I think the achievement of the conference was that it ended in a spirit of limited concensus and on a basis of universal personal goodwill among the participants at the conference. That in itself is no mean achievement.

The federal government went into the three day sessions with two main attitudes; the first was an attitude of urgency. We felt that there should be impressed upon the provincial governments, and indeed upon the Canadian people, a renewed sense of urgency for a total review of the Canadian constitution. We believe that this is just as necessary now as it was last February or as it was in November, 1967 at the "Confederation for Tomorrow Conference" sponsored by Premier Robarts. We felt that the threat of separate status, special status or separatism was just as great now as it was then; that the scepticism of many Quebeckers toward the option of confederation was just as pronounced now as it was then. We felt that the sense of responsibility that was apparent last year among the English speaking majority of Canada to accept a consensus on language and on constitutional issues, after the last election which gave the present government and Prime Minister a majority in parliament, seemed to have changed into a state of complacency which had diluted that sense of urgency which we thought should be restored. We also believed that the federal impulse or thrust in the country, and particularly the federal thrust in Quebec, should retain the initiative and that this was paramount if the special status or independentist solutions in Quebec were to be finally quelled and defeated before public opinion or in polls. This could only be done if the federalists in Canada and in Quebec could show progress in moving toward a new Canada which was as meaningful to French Canadians as it was to English Canadians, a Canada in which equal access to the services of the government, particularly the federal government, in either language, was guaranteed in the law and hopefully within the constitution. Within the ambit of that objective, I think that the conference showed some significant movement and I think added to the federal thrust in the province of Quebec. So, within that scope and ambit the conference accomplished its purpose.

The other attitude with which we entered the conference was one of flexibility. It had become apparent that whereas the federal government had on its agenda the matters of fundamental rights, objectives of the constitution, language, and the revision of some of the federal institutions of government, the provinces were interested in some of the more immediate problems, particularly fiscal. We had made up our minds to allow a discussion of the fiscal issues, preferably under the umbrella of the constitution, and so we opened up for discussion the federal spending power and the provincial taxing power within the general context of the division of powers under articles 91 and 92 of the constitution. It is true, and the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield), has pointed it out, that we were more interested in the medium and long term solutions to the problems facing Canada—and they are not insurmountable problems by any means.

It seemed to us that the root of the fiscal situation in terms of tax revenue and in terms of spending obligations lies fundamentally in a review of the division of the sources of revenue and the division of the responsibility for spending the money obtained.

The provinces went into the conference with money on their minds. The Atlantic provinces came to it with, to my way of thinking, quite a justifiable interest in eliminating regional disparity, the gap between the rich and the poorer provinces of Canada. The province of Nova Scotia particularly, wanted the principle of the elimination of disparity and the narrowing of the gap in regional equality enshrined in the constitution. We are moving toward a discussion of that point of view. Within that ambit also, considerable progress was made and, I think, considerable satisfaction given to the premiers of the four Atlantic provinces.

Finally, on the provinces' minds was a feeling that there had been insufficient consultation on the part of the federal government in its initiation of some shared cost programs and in its withdrawal from others. I will not go into the merits of that; the Prime Minister has dealt with it and we dealt with it at the conference. I want to say that the arguments came forth strong and clear, and without going into them, I would just remind the provinces that participatory federalism—a term used by Premier Robarts—is a two way street. Certainly, those provinces with a larger fiscal leverage than the others should be expected to have it operate in reciprocal ways, if this principle is to be followed.

I think that the constitutional conference saw a frank and very useful discussion of the constitutional review process and of some of the major issues involved in that review. I concede that any analysis of what was achieved at the conference made from such close proximity in time can only be rather subjective. I may say, however, that a real degree of movement in the process of constitutional review was achieved and a number of matters were designated as having priority. Talks are now to continue and to commence at the ministerial rather than merely the official level. All the governments agreed that ministers should now be responsible for a closer supervision of the course of discussion, and to my mind that denotes progress. I think also there was a general feeling that the constitutional review had to proceed at an accelerated pace. This feeling came both from the provinces which do not feel that major changes are needed to the constitution now but that we should build on the base which already exists, and from the provinces which feel we should entirely rewrite the constitution. This desire to advance the process will, I believe, make detailed discussion easier and enable us to show some real progress in a number of key areas.

[Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton.]

I wish to talk briefly about bilingualism or language as it was dealt with at the conference. Because of the attitude of the four western provinces toward the official languages bill, Bill C-120, a good deal of attention was focused on this subject. There was also a briefer discussion about the possibility of entrenching certain language guarantees in the constitution. We stated that the government was committed in principle to the bill. We believe that equal access in certain regions of the country to federal services of government is essential to national unity and that Canadians are entitled to use their own language and to feel at home in all parts of Canada. We hope this would contribute to the greater mobility of French-speaking Canadians across the country.

We believe that law is necessary in order to convert symbolism into reality. Many provinces feel that because of the goodwill which is now apparent in Canada, and the progress which has been made, an official languages bill would, by its enactment, make progress more difficult. I should like to say that rights can only be recognized by law, and no amount of goodwill can substitute for that. So, we hope we shall be able to proceed with the bill. I believe the bill when enacted will be evidence of good faith on the part of the English-speaking majority in Canada and of the French-speaking majority in Quebec.

I shall not repeat the constitutional arguments because they were made ably in this house earlier this afternoon by the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville (Mr. MacGuigan). We believe this bill does not constitute an amendment to the British North America Act with regard to the use or extension of the French or English languages. It does not offend section 133, because that is not a limiting section; if it were it would limit the extension of the English language as well, and that would be an absurdity.

It was agreed at the conference in connection with the official languages bill that I should meet with the attorneys-general of those provinces which wanted to discuss the constitutionality of the measure, or certain sections of it. We have been in touch with those attorneys-general and on Monday in Victoria at 11 a.m. I shall meet the attorneys-general of the four western provinces.

An hon. Member: Pretty cold out there.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Premier Bennett assures me there are tulips growing there and that the unaccustomed snow has disappeared.

An hon. Member: It might warm up.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Well, it is true that Premier Bennett is back there. In any event, I shall be meeting with the attorneys-general, Sterling Lyon of Manitoba, R. Peterson of British Columbia, D. V. Heald of Saskatchewan, and Edgar J. Gerhart of Alberta in the Empress Hotel on Monday morning. I shall attempt to allay some of their fears about the constitutional aspects of the bill, and some of their fears about the effects of the bill. I am going out there committed in principle but flexible as to changes in detail they may have in mind in terms of phraseology, and so on.

I told the conference that the effect of the bill on the life of the average Canadian living in the four western provinces had been exaggerated. I think its effect on the everyday lives of English-speaking Canadians there will, in practice, be fairly limited. Our officials discussed with the attorneys-general of the other provinces the possibility of a meeting. The attorneys-general of the Atlantic provinces and of Ontario have indicated that they see no urgency about meeting with me at the present stage. I am arranging, however, to visit Quebec City in about ten days' time to discuss with the Prime Minister of the Province of Quebec the aspects of the bill which cause him difficulty. When our discussions have been completed I shall, of course, be reporting to the government and I hope we shall be in a position then to proceed with the bill on second reading at an early date.

Mr. Stanfield: May I ask the minister a question? Could he, on his return, make a report to the house?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): By all means. I think the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) understands the position we take. If we fail to reconcile our differences over the constitutional aspects of the bill, the discussions are without prejudice and the government has reserved its right to proceed with the bill in the House of Commons. If it is challenged by the provinces in a provincial court of appeal, we shall resist that challenge and I suppose our recourse will then be to the Supreme Court of Canada to which the measure would be submitted under section 55 of the Supreme Court Act. Hopefully, this may be avoided.

[Translation]

Despite a certain agitation in some provinces with an English-speaking majority, the good will which has been steadily growing in the last few years, is an overwhelming proof of the new tolerance and of the new desire to grant rights to French-speaking minorities.

At this stage of our history it would be ironical and even tragical, if the province of Quebec, where all minority rights have always been respected, refused at this time to support our bill. I was very happy to get in principle, the support of Mr. Bertrand during the Conference. He made a few reservations about what he called the terms of the bill, that is the bilingual districts. I have not quite understood his argument yet.

In the province of Quebec, a few political reasons will make it somewhat difficult to reconciliate a certain priority of the French language in Quebec with the equality of the rights of the English minority there, but I do not think that this attitude—if it should materialize—will prevent the inclusion in the federal law of a guarantee for the rights of the English speaking minority. Even if a certain priority is granted to the French language in Quebec, there will be no conflict as to the principle of equality of the official languages in the federal legislation.

I hope that no discussion concerning the importance of the French language in Quebec will be detrimental to the adoption of the principle that has already been accepted in Quebec since Confederation, that is the equality of both languages.

[English]

On the question of language rights entrenched in the constitution, the conference, as I have said, agreed that the matter should be considered in the light of section 133 of the British North America Act. This provision, as hon. members know, is the one which provides for the use of the French and English languages in connection with federal and Quebec institutions and the publishing in both languages of acts of parliament and of the Quebec legislature. I think it is fair to say that the goodwill displayed by all of the provinces, even by those which appeared disinclined to entrench language rights at the present time, was most encouraging. I would hope that proceeding from an analysis of section 133, and the recommendations of the B and B Commission, the ministerial committee will be able to define the issues and reach some tentative agreement which can be placed before a subsequent meeting of prime ministers and premiers.

I expect the same will be true in the field of human rights, the entrenchment of which is also to be the subject of, discussion at the ministerial level. I think it would be fair to say that the entrenchment of political rights in the constitution would meet with but little opposition from the provinces; that is, if I have interpreted the statements made at the conference correctly. If one is to judge by the statements made, the main areas of difficulty and disagreement are those concerned with legal rights, egalitarian rights and economic rights.

I think it would be unwise and unrealistic to expect in this or in any other subject matter which has been moved from the official level to the ministerial level for discussion, that rapid progress can be achieved. I see extensive consideration being given to all aspects of these matters, and it is right that this should be so because we are dealing with a fundamental document that concerns our lives as Canadians. This being so, I certainly hope that ministers will be able to report progress in the definition of issues, and perhaps some consensus, to the Prime Minister and the premiers when next they meet.

I am not going to deal again—

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order, I regret to interrupt the hon. minister but his time has expired.

[English]

Does the house give unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I will just take two minutes, Mr. Speaker. I want to give the other hon. member the opportunity to speak if I can. I am not going to deal with the Supreme Court of Canada. I hope it was clear from the conference that there is quite a difference in view that must be reconciled between the federal government and the province of Quebec.

We foresee many long months of discussion and negotiation, but the second session of the constitutional conference left me with a feeling of movement, with a feeling that the provinces are now concerned with constitutional review, and that they will work with us, despite the differences in approach to various subject matters, to make this review successful and meaningful. I think that all those present at the conference were conscious of our 100 years of living together and developing together. They were also conscious of the necessity for our examining the basic law in this country with a view to ensuring that it meets the needs of the future.

I think one of the best aspects of the conference was the educative value of the conference to the people of Canada. I do not know how many school children were allowed by their teachers to watch the three days of sessions, but I would say they would have learned more in three days about Canada, its various interests, conflicts and differences, than they would ever learn by reading textbooks for three years. They heard differences of opinion; they heard differences in approach; they saw differences in need. But I believe that the children of Canada saw no difference in motive. I am sure that they are shrewd enough to understand that the motive of everybody there was to fulfil the common expectations and hopes of those of us who live in the northern half of this limitless continent, with all the blessings of nature that it has received. If our children have not come to realize that we are the most fortunate cluster of people on the face of the globe, then they really did not understand the conference.

[Translation]

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I should like—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Does the hon. member for Lotbinière wish to ask a question?

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, under standing order 6 (5) (a), I should like to move, seconded by the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Rodrigue):

That the sitting continues until six o'clock today in order to carry on the present debate.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): The motion of the hon. member for Lotbinière is in accordance with the provisions of standing order 6(5) (a).

Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): All those opposed to the said motion will please rise.

And more than 10 members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): I declare the motion lost.

[English]

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, since there are only about 20 minutes left and I should like to give another hon. member an opportunity of contributing to this debate, I shall try to make my remarks very brief.

This is a subject in which, despite the natural tendencies for the members of this house to be partisan—and I think it is proper for us to be so on many occasions—we all endeavour to be non-partisan because the future of Canada is clearly involved when we discuss our constitution. I need hardly say that we in this party are willing and anxious to play our part as a constructive opposition in the building of a new constitution which we think is essential to the future of Canada.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) asked the question: Where do you in the opposition stand on the question of a review of the constitution? Do you want total review, or do you want something less than that? We in this party are quite clear in our answer to that question: we want total review. That does not mean, of course, total change. It does not mean that we have to jettison everything we now have. But in the sense that we do want to look at the whole picture and not at part of the picture, we stand for total review.

Sometimes people downgrade the importance of constitutional discussion. They say that we should be worried about bread and butter issues. No issue is more deeply concerned with bread and butter matters than a constitution, even though it is often framed in legalistic terms. It not only defines the powers and responsibilities of government but determines whether government can function effectively and do the tasks which the people elected them as servants of the people to do. Therefore, the constitution, which is the fundamental law governing and directing all the other activities of governments, is a matter of supreme importance.

Another matter that I think we must never forget is that a constitution has educational and should have inspirational value. It should be a document of which Canadians can be proud, to which they can look as a succinct statement of their aspirations and purposes in the formulation of a federation. While I do not for a minute doubt that the Fathers of Confederation and the drafters of the British North America Act, which is our present constitution as amended, did an excellent job in 1867, the fact remains that the constitution then drafted, even though since amended, is now antiquated, inadequate, obsolete and uninspiring. I think I could justify each one of those adjectives.

For this reason it is necessary for us to look at the constitution from beginning to end in order to make it an expression of Canadian thinking and of Canadian partnership, if I may use that expression, which is appropriate to the present time.

One aspect that was discussed at the constitutional conference was the entrenchment of a charter of human rights in our constitution. I want to bring the enthusiastic support of this party to that proposition. There are basic political rights that should be protected by parliament and by legislatures. It is no good saying that we can depend on commonsense, that we can depend upon our parliament and legislatures. The plain fact of the matter is that we are human beings, and under the stress of certain emergencies parliament and legislatures sometimes do foolish things. I do not have time to go into them but they are things which, though well intentioned, may cut into the basic human rights of individuals. There is no reason in the world why we should be afraid of the sober second thoughts resulting from any examination the Supreme Court might make of the fundamental law laid down in the constitution. Therefore, I most earnestly hope that those governments which perhaps have misunderstood the purpose of this charter of human rights, as constitutionally entrenched, will take a second look at the matter and agree that all Canadians should be protected by such a charter, which ought to be part of their constitution.

We take a similar view with regard to language rights. Those rights are set out in the report of the Royal Commission on Bilingualism and Biculturalism. The proposed amendment to the British North America Act which would enlarge and clarify basic language rights is an act of simple justice. It should be included in our constitution, and we give it our full support.

The time has come for me, in this part of my speech, to talk of the most important issue confronting any federation, the question of the distribution of powers and resources between the central and local or provincial governments. We must review that. In the case of Canada, this review must include a review of spending powers. The federal government repeatedly has intruded into spheres that ought to come under provincial jurisdiction. A times, it has seemed that the central government has exercised excessive power, and it might be beneficial if this matter were examined. It seems to me that the basic task which confronts the continuing committee, this parliament and all those concerned about this matter, is a review of the main functions of government, and what government can do as the servant of the people, about housing, pollution, health and the 101 other things with which governments deal. We must review those functions and determine whether those functions are most effectively carried out at the federal or provincial level or in co-operation between the two levels.

Some aspects of government obviously come under one heading. Defence, obviously, comes under the federal government, and is an aspect of international affairs. Most, if not all, aspects of international affairs come under the federal government. The field of education, in a bilingual country like this, may come under other levels of government. Some aspects of our national life will come under the domination of a variety of powers and governments. All these government activities must be reviewed and looked at. But the rub will come when it is found that there are different points of view in different parts of the country in respect of this matter. I think there are excellent historical and other reasons why a province like Quebec, representing a special culture, a distinct language and different background, should want a degree of decentralization in order to control certain aspects of its own life which do not come into play in the rest of Canada. We must evolve a constitution which respects the right of the people in Quebec to say, "We want to protect our own culture and rights by having legislative jurisdiction over certain social matters." But at the same time we do not want to deprive the other provinces of the opportunity to work together on a national scale in order to carry out some purposes they may think are important.

It is for these reasons that we in this party have spoken about a special status for Quebec. It is not that we want special privileges for one province, namely, Quebec. Rather, we put forward our views because we recognize there are different requirements and needs in different parts of the country. We are not dogmatic. We do not contend we have all the answers.

I suggest that the rub will come when we get down to cases and talk about the distribution of powers and distribution of money. It is high time we got on with the job. I agree with what the Prime Minister said this morning, that delegation of responsibility or power, whether from the federal to provincial or provincial to federal governments, is not the answer. Nevertheless the concept of delegation must be examined. Rights or powers that can be acquired by delegation and then withdrawn are not good enough. Such a system does not work. Any system of delegation must be flexible if it is to meet our needs. Above all we must avoid rigidity, since with rigidity our federation will not work.

In this party we do not stand for any hard and fast solutions. I do not know whether the Prime Minister was being rhetorical when he asked us to explain our beliefs to him in this relatively short debate. We have ideas. We have looked into the matter and feel we can contribute to the solution of our problems. But we are not giving out any hard and fast solutions at present.

I submit that there is an urgent need to set up this parliamentary committee which has been mentioned. I, for one, have been urging the establishment of this committee as long as I have been a member of the house. I corresponded with the former prime minister and talked to him about it. He was always in favour of it, but the time was never opportune. He agreed it was a suitable idea, and good that Members of Parliament should discuss among themselves in committee these problems; he also said the committee should be set up at a timely moment. I say that no moment is more timely than the present. Specific issues could be referred to that committee, and discussions with all levels of government could be held.

I conclude by saying that I believe nowhere is the duty of discussing changes to our constitution greater than it is in parliament. This parliament is a representative body of Canadians and there is no other equally representative body of Canadians. Not only are we representative in the sense we are elected to represent our people; but we come from every region, from every background and profession, and from every social level, as it were. If we, in this chamber cannot, through our committee, work out a real contribution to our country's constitutional problems, I wonder who can. Where can those problems be worked out? It is wrong to say you could work out problems in watertight compartments, or in caucus only. Of course, you could tackle it that way, but we think that those discussions should take place here, where members of our committee could make constructive suggestions. I am not saying we must agree with each other; it is unlikely that we shall agree. But I am sure that if we disagree, as we are bound to, we shall disagree on a higher level, as it were, than others in this country could. We could disagree having available to us a great deal of knowledge which may not be available to others.

Confederation was forged by ordinary, elected members, similar to those in this chamber. They were the ones, and not the academics, the scholars, civil servants or bureaucrats in the London colonial office, who worked out our constitution. It is our job, whether we are in opposition or in government, to contribute to this process of constitution making. I therefore hope the government will set up the committee as quickly as possible and give it a large measure of responsibility in this matter.

Mr. Stan Schumacher (Palliser): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to participate in this debate on our nation's constitution. I was surprised and disappointed to hear the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) say that he did not think the position of the party to which I have the honour to belong in respect of the monarchy was clear. I submit he cannot point to a single policy of this party that would have the effect of removing or weakening that institution.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Schumacher: This position can be contrasted with the actions of his government in downgrading the monarchy at every opportunity. For example, I am referring to matters such as omitting all reference to the monarchy in the throne speech, stopping ceremonial salutes to the royal family and to the Prime Minister's statement that he does not believe in attacking symbols important to other people. What other meaning can be attached to that statement than that the symbols of the monarchy are completely unimportant to him.

With respect to the Prime Minister's comment about two nations, I wonder whether he has now forgotten ordering the withdrawal of a Liberal party advertisement at Calgary, an advertisement which accused this party of supporting a two nation policy. That was last June.

The first point that springs to my mind in this debate has to do with the procedure for amending our constitution. Over the past several years there has been a great deal of effort spent on attempting to arrive at a method of changing our constitution. In spite of all this effort, no agreement has been reached. Surely, the basic ingredient of any constitution, if it is to be a living document, is an amending procedure. Until this problem is solved, how are we going to achieve a new constitution even if all other points are agreed upon? Surely, no one would be so short-sighted as to accept a constitution which, no matter how perfect it might be now, would be frozen forever more?

My second point is whether what the nation witnessed earlier this week was not just so much window dressing, or a vehicle to titillate the Prime Minister's (Mr. Trudeau) academic propensities. In other words, to put it bluntly, do we really need a new constitution?

Our constitution is the product of several hundreds of years of experience and I submit should only be dismantled or changed with care. The present debate in the country on the subject of our constitution seems to be based to a large extent on the principle that it should be changed for the sake of change, and that after we change the constitution many of our problems will be solved. As a result, a great many expectations have been raised which cannot be satisfied by a new constitution, even if it were written by that person often referred to by the Prime Minister as the "Holy Ghost" himself. To my mind, the Prime Minister is using this entire constitutional question as a smokescreen to cover his government's lack of executive action in meeting the real problems of today.

No one has successfully demonstrated, as far as I am concerned, that the present constitution is holding up social advances. I would like someone to name one social change that could not be achieved because of our present constitution. It is also well to remember that this country fought two world wars and a world depression which resulted in vast social changes under our present constitution. How can it be said to be inflexible?

In this connection, during World War II the provinces turned over their entire tax sources to the federal government under a tax rental agreement. The provinces were able to operate on that basis, allowing the country to participate in the war. Our constitution is only as inflexible as the parties to it. It has been the attitude of the federal government over the past few years which has made the constitution appear inflexible and worse than it really is. What is lacking today is political consensus between the federal and provincial governments, and no amount of fine draftsmanship or high flown phrases will cure that problem.

I am opposed to entrenching civil rights in a written constitution because then we would have a transfer of policy roles from the legislative branch of our government to the judicial. I submit that our courts are not equipped for this role and in many instances the United States Supreme Court has demonstrated the weakness of this theory. Some countries seem to have shown a propensity to change their constitutions with regularity once the first step has been taken. Examples which come to mind quickly are Venezuela, Greece and France. These examples demonstrate, I think, evidence of national disintegration rather than virility.

In summary, Mr. Speaker, I would say the problems facing the nation today, irrespective of the efforts of the continuing constitutional conference, are and remain, inflation, housing, Indian affairs, agricultural marketing and regional economic disparity. No amount of constitutional manipulation will produce the political consensus necessary for the solution of these problems.

It is refreshing to hear the Prime Minister say there will be no more medicare programs. What I cannot understand is, if he recognizes this program to be a mistake, why he persists in perpetuating it.

In my opinion, if the federal government would put its own constitutional and fiscal houses in order, the pressures would be reduced. Then, real progress could be made in first determining how we want to amend our constitution and, secondly, in determining what changes are really necessary for the prosperity and happiness of our citizens.

[Translation]

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière) Mr. Speaker, we are no longer Frenchmen from France, nor Englishmen from England. We are Canadians living in Canada, and we are proud to do so. Canada, as such, is 100 years old. But long before 1867, the territory now known as Canada was peopled by Frenchmen coming from France and, soon after, by Anglo-Saxons.

Slowly, a cultural and linguistic duality grew, committing the two founding peoples to a perpetual duality, unless one or the other disappeared. In this regard, it seems that the English element does not want to disappear, no more than the French element. The new Canadians, who left their country of origin to settle in Canada, must also be taken into account.

The duality of a country such as Canada manifests itself through the respect of the two elements, the French and the English.

After 100 years of confederation, Mr. Speaker, Canada must face the vital necessity, the moral obligation, of taking stock of itself, and finding its place in the modern world behind which we often trail.

From here on, we must shape Canada as we want it and not as it would be imposed upon us; not by starting everything from scratch, by rejecting the past, but in an essentially positive perspective, turned towards the future, towards progress.

The past no longer belongs to us and the present is fleeting. We must build the future of this country, of our fellow-citizens and our own, because the future and the economic progress of our fellow-citizens alone can gratify our needs and our hopes. Mr. Speaker, may I call it four o'clock?

An hon. Member: It is five o'clock.

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, may I point out that it is "four" o'clock?

At five o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, February 17, 1969

The house met at 2 p.m.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

STATEMENT BY MINISTER ON FIVE DAY DELIVERY

Hon. Eric W. Kierans (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make on motions a short statement on a subject in which a great many members have expressed an interest. As of today the five day post office delivery week and the new method of sortation and delivery known as single mail processing go into effect.

As hon. members know, there have been in recent weeks continuous discussions between the unions and departmental officials over these steps. Differences between the two sides have been essentially resolved. According to the latest information available to me there will be no strike, no work stoppage, and no work to rule organized by the unions.

[Translation]

The new system will make it possible to save $13 million. It will also result in the abolition of 2,084 jobs. In spite of that, there will be no lay-offs. All those concerned will be kept in the service either by eliminating supernumerary or temporary employment, or by transfers, or by filling vacancies already existing.

There is in that conflict a point about which I am still concerned. A number of the grievances come not only from a disagreement but from more or less wilful misunderstandings. Although it has been asserted that postmen would have to eat cold meals along their route, the department has always intended, and that has now been accepted, to provide postmen, according to their choice, with free transportation home, to the post-office or to another place along their route. Moreover, we have abolished the old rule stipulating that postmen cannot be assigned to an itinerary in the neighbourhood where they live. That measure will therefore enable postmen who wish it to have lunch at home.

• (2:10 p.m.)

[English]

As a result of such misunderstanding it has become apparent that, given the department's size—there are some 48,000 post office employees spread coast to coast among about 8,000 localities—a comprehensive and accurate system of internal information between employees and management is urgently needed. This problem, I can assure hon. members, is being given serious and urgent study.

In conclusion I would like to say a word of praise to both the officials of the department and to the employees, in particular to the employees who have displayed a sense of pride in public service. I believe this represents a significant step forward in the improvement of labour-management relations from the low point described by Mr. Justice Montpetit in his report of two years ago, and continues the improvement described by Judge Montpetit in his review published last week.

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): I should like to say, Mr. Speaker, that I am appreciative of the courtesy shown by the minister in making available to me the text of the remarks he has just made. I cannot in all candour say I am blinded by the brilliance or overcome by the novelty of the statement which has been made. I would look upon it as a hopeful expression of things to come; and a hope that certain other things will not come.

For many weeks I have had the feeling that this so-called single mail processing and the partial five day week were not sufficiently prepared by the minister; otherwise, there would not have been the threats, anxiety and disquiet which have pervaded the Canadian public as a result of statements made by the representatives of some of the workers. We are somewhat disturbed by the fact that the country has been divided into a state where some are on six deliveries and some on five. It will be quite a process to sort out, and provide equitable, fair and efficient postal service to all Canadians.

I note the minister's reference to savings of $13 million, and his reiteration that there will be no reduction in the number of jobs. This is a point on which certain very interested people disagree with him. If he can accomplish a saving of $13 million, keep the mail moving as rapidly as before the five day service was introduced, and avoid any lay-offs, it will be one of the greatest examples of eating one's cake and having it, too, that mankind has seen for very many years.

I wish the hon. gentleman well, I hope no unduly disturbing meaning should be read into the expression "differences between two sides have been essentially resolved". The reports I read in the press from parties concerned and from representatives of the workers cause me to give that word "essentially" a good deal of emotional loading, to use a literary expression. It is extremely important that in the face of drastic increases in rates there should be no diminution in service. If as a result of changes which have been only partially planned and arranged, the Canadian people suffer a diminution in service, I am sure the minister will hear about it.

So often has it happened in the past, especially in the instance of the last general strike, that at ministerial and departmental levels there seemed to have been no adequate preparation. Here we have drastic changes which do not appear to have been adequately arranged and discussed before implementation. I can only hope the optimism the minister has expressed will be borne out in the event.

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, like the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie) I noticed the qualification in the minister's statement that the differences have essentially been resolved. The fact, as I am sure the minister knows, is that a large number of the employees affected are still not satisfied, and that the unions are quite convinced that the differences have not been resolved to the satisfaction of the employees of the post office.

Let me say to the minister that, as I have watched his performance on this question over the weeks, it has seemed to me that he carried his decision through in a rather ruthless way, in a way with which an employer concerned with profit making rather than with service to the Canadian people is usually associated. The minister should have learned by now that if he is going to make this kind of change the unions and employees should be consulted before he makes up his mind, instead of making up his mind, announcing the policy and then trying to persuade the unions to accept it.

When the minister says he has heard that there will not be any strikes, slowdowns or work to rule, let me tell him that this is not the result of anything that he has done, but the sole result of the sense of responsibility of the leaders of these unions that are giving essential service to the Canadian people. It is no thanks to him that there is no interruption of mail delivery at the present time.

It seems to me that when the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey) this morning assured the representatives of the Canadian Labour Congress, as he has assured this house on previous occasions, that he believes in the principle of the Freedman report that we will not have any changes in work load or work function without consultation and without the unions having some say, this is one government undertaking of great importance where that principle could and should have been introduced by the minister himself.

I share the hopes of the hon. member for Hillsborough that the minister's optimism will be realized, and I merely make two brief comments in conclusion. I understand there has been an increase in the rates for rural postal boxes, and there has been an immense increase in the rates for non-profit publications, to which objection has been taken right across the country and again voiced this morning. While the minister may be able to save some money—though this still remains to be seen—I suggest to him that his performance in all these areas has made a good many of us very leery about the kind of operation he is now heading.

[Translation]

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, several reports have been coming to us for some time to the effect that postal employees are considering the possibility of a work stoppage because of misunderstandings with the Post Office Department.

In view of that situation, Mr. Speaker, and having now looked into the minister's statement, I shall make three comments.

First of all, the new regulations have been inadequately explained by the department to the public as well as to the employees themselves.

Then, the new work programs are inadequately prepared. That is why we are facing an urgent situation, partly due to those new regulations.

Moreover, I would like to comment briefly on the lack of harmony in labour-management relations on the levels of information and of dialogue.

According to the Postmaster General (Mr. Kierans), such dissatisfaction on the part of postal employees is due to the lack of information given by the department about the new regulations and their implications.

I do not want to discuss now the value of the regulations, though I still object to some of them, especially at the rural level, but it is a fact that social communications and objective information between the management of the Post Office Department and the employees have been broken off for too long for unknown reasons.

Mr. Speaker, not only would it be advisable but it would also be important that the department consider setting up an efficient service directed by experts in social relations and information. Such a service could be operated according to the well-known and efficient method of "social animation" for employees as well as for management.

In the labour world, Mr. Speaker, what strikes us every day are the conflicts between management and labour. Several facts indicate how the harmonious relations between both parties have deteriorated.

In this connection the department should set the example and show the way to more harmonious relations by allowing the workers to be more than mere numbers or slaves and the employer to be more humane.

Moreover, working conditions and standards, wages, labour contracts should be the subject of free discussion, under the leadership of a special social animation service, the responsibility of which would be to promote to the maximum the establishment of harmonious relations between management and labour, while giving complete, objective and accurate information to employees, in order that they may be in a position to understand better their own working conditions and to get on well among themselves.

With all the available means of social communication, Mr. Speaker, the present conditions are unacceptable. And the most responsible party in those circumstances is the Post Office Department which is still operated according to out-of-date administrative concepts which tend to keep at a minimum contacts and even discussions, between management and labour.

In my opinion, those administrative concepts are outmoded, and the department would certainly do well if it innovated in the field of information and dialogue with its employees. The minister tried to tell us today that there is really no danger of a strike or work stoppage, but we remain convinced that there is such a risk. At the moment, the Post Office employees multiply their meetings, and rightly so.

Mr. Speaker, we hope the minister will take the necessary steps to prevent another conflict, because considering the evasive statement that he has just made, we still do not know what practical measures he proposes to take.

STANDARD OF AUTOMOBILE SERVICE CONTRACT

Question No. 1,203—Mr. Robinson:

1. Did the Department of National Health and Welfare ever have a study made on the possible harmful effects on human and animal health following the use of (a) pesticides, insecticides and fungicides, etc.? (b) following excessive use of chemical fertilizers for plants, vegetables, pastures, etc.?

[Translation]

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): 1. (a) Yes; (b) No.

2. The Food and Drug Directorate has underway an extensive program of research on pesticides, including insecticides and fungicides. Certain insecticides containing phosphorus have been shown to produce skeletal abnormalities in chicken and duck embryos, but the amounts required to produce this effect are much higher than those found in foods sold in Canada. Other studies showed that small amounts of organochlorine insecticides are present in the body fat of Canadians. The levels of these substances are similar to those found in other countries and are not considered to be hazardous to health. Investigations are underway on the breakdown of insecticides and fungicides in plants used for food. Breakdown products have been detected, but the small amounts present do not pose a health hazard to the public.

The Food and Drug Directorate also carries out extensive monitoring of the Canadian food supply for pesticide residues. The results have shown that normal use of pesticides does not result in the presence of residues in foods in amounts which are considered a hazard to health.

1. How many workers in Canada earn less than $3,000 per year?

2. How many workers in Canada earn between $3,000 and $4,000?

3. What measures has the government taken, or does it intend to take, to deal with the problem of poverty in Canada?

4. Does the government intend to set up a commission to make an exhaustive study of the problem of poverty in Canada, and to suggest to the House ways of correcting the present situation and, if not, for what reason?

Return tabled.

Return tabled.

EMPLOYMENT FOR STUDENTS

Question No. 880—Mr. Marchand (Kamloops-Cariboo):

2. How much money is being granted for studying causes and methods of preventing war?

3. Are the federal government computers suitable for processing peace research data?

Return tabled.

Inquiries of the Ministry

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

CANADIAN CONSTITUTION

REFERENCE TO COMMITTEE OF PROPOSALS FOR REVISION

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Prime Minister, but before doing so, I would say I am pleased to see him back after what must have been a very pleasant weekend, and the realization that the report attributed to one of his colleagues that somebody disliked him proved to be quite unfounded.

I would ask the Prime Minister whether he has reached any decision regarding the establishment of a parliamentary committee respecting the question of constitutional reform.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): On the congratulations of the Leader of the Opposition, Mr. Speaker, I want to thank him very much. I told the people in Quebec I believe in federal-provincial co-operation. They were down here at the first part of the week, and I was in Quebec for the balance which is a good way of co-operating. The carnival will go on; it has not finished.

An hon. Member: Which one, here or down there?

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, that is the one I am referring to.

I have not reached a decision about setting up any parliamentary committee. I must say that my first reaction on hearing the speeches on Friday and reading Hansard for that day was not one that led me to believe that we would have a great deal to gain from listening to the views of members of the other parties as to the constitution, but I am willing to re-assess this.

Mr. Stanfield: As a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Prime Minister whether he thinks it might not be useful for the government house leader to confer with the other house leaders with a view to reaching some more precise formulation for this question?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I will say that I undertake to discuss the matter with the government house leader, and in fact I intend to discuss it in cabinet this week. I repeat that I am not averse to the idea. I do know that the committees of the house are extremely busy, and I am not therefore sure if it would be conducive to much more work in the other committees if we were to set up a committee on the constitution. As I have said, at this stage of the game there seems to be a great deal of indecision in the constitutional theories of some of the members of the house.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): As a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker: In coming to a decision on this would not the Prime Minister bear in mind that the issues need to be made simple and precise, free from the power conflicts and struggles between the federal and the provincial governments, that the right hon. gentleman and his colleagues have failed dismally to do this, and that a parliamentary committee could not make a worse mess than the government?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I suggest to the hon. member that the question he is asking is quite out of order.

OCCUPATIONAL TRAINING

SCHEFFERVILLE, QUE.—DELAYS IN PROGRAM FOR CHIMO INDIANS

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. I tried to give him notice of it a little while ago but was unable to reach him. Is he aware of the delays which have taken place in approving some adult educational programs for Chimo Indians in Schefferville, Quebec, resulting in a loss of pay for the trainees and, if so, what action is the minister taking to remedy the situation?

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I am familiar with this particular case. It is one where the department, under the regulations, is not able to approve training allowances because the courses had commenced before the proper authorization had been received, as required under the regulations.

Mr. Lewis: Would the minister undertake to look into the situation and to see whether the regulations could be made to apply, as I understand they could, so that the trainees would be paid for a full period of 16 weeks instead of a shorter period?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I would be happy to look at the case again, but from what study I have made of it I have discovered that the regulations have been applied in the proper way.

[Mr. Trudeau.]

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, as a further supplementary question may I ask the minister whether it is the policy of his department that any educational up-grading should not go beyond the eighth grade, in the case I am now referring to affecting the Chimo Indians in Schefferville? I am informed that this has been the case.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I would like to investigate that particular point.

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): As a supplementary question, do I understand the minister's answer to be that the trainees are not receiving pay because the school course was started without proper authorization?

Mr. MacEachen: That is the answer.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Then I would ask the minister whether the instructors are a volunteer staff, or are receiving their pay?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, the staff as such is not in the employ of the Department of Manpower and Immigration. In the normal case the department purchases these courses from the provincial departments of education, and in some cases from private organizations. In this case the courses had commenced before the necessary authorization had been given by the provincial department of education. As to the status of the teachers involved, it is not in issue at this point. It is a question of training allowances for those persons who had been in the courses before they were authorized.

Mr. Lewis: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I am sure the minister would not wish to mislead the house. He said the course had been started before the department of education had approved of it. Would he be good enough to look into that, because my information is that the department of education approved of it last November, and that any of the difficulties that arose—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest that this is not a point of order, but rather that it is a point of debate between hon. members.

Mr. Lewis: With respect, Mr. Speaker, I did rise on a point of order to make sure the minister was not saying something in answer to a question which I am quite certain was wrong.

Mr. Speaker: It is still not a point of order.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

MAINLAND CHINA—DISCUSSIONS IN SWEDEN AS TO RECOGNITION

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In connection with the questions asked last week, is the hon. gentleman now in a position to report progress in the discussions between our diplomats in Sweden and their counterparts of the People's Republic of China?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): No, Mr. Speaker, I have no further developments to report at the present time.

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): As a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, will the minister tell the house whether he has instructed Canada's representatives to suggest, during their discussions with the representatives of Peking, payment of the 13 million 1949 dollars spent by the Canadian government for the seven ships seized by the Peking regime at the time of its take-over in that country?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I think all these negotiations will be facilitated if we have an exchange of diplomats, which is what we are trying to bring about.

[Translation]

[Later:]

Mr. Henri Latulippe (Compton): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of External Affairs.

Would he tell us where the negotiations with Communist China now stand and advise us of the substance of the talks and of the decisions taken up to now with regard to that country.

[English]

Mr. Sharp: The hon. gentleman may not have been in the house when I answered a similar question a few moments ago. I have nothing further to report to the house.

POSSIBILITY OF VISIT TO CANADA OF PRESIDENT NIXON

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. As every postwar United States president has first conferred with the Prime Minister of Canada before conferring with other heads of states, and as President Nixon has announced meetings with the heads of state of five European countries, and Australia, and there has been no forthcoming announcement of any meeting with Canada, has—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Would the hon. member ask the question.

Mr. Hees: I am just giving a little background, Mr. Speaker. Has the Secretary of State for External Affairs been in touch with his opposite number in the State Department to find out the reason for this apparent downgrading of Canada's importance in the eyes of the American government?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. gentleman and all members of the house that we have been in touch with the United States administration about a meeting between the President of the United States and the Prime Minister of Canada. I am sure this will be arranged at a time that does justice both to our country and to the Prime Minister.

Mr. Hees: I have a supplementary question following that non-answer. Has the Secretary of State for External Affairs investigated with the State Department the story coming out of Washington during the weekend that the apparent coolness of the United States government toward Canada is due to the lukewarm attitude of this government in respect of our participation in NATO and NORAD?

Mr. Sharp: There is no substance in that. The President of the United States is most anxious to meet our esteemed and respected Prime Minister. If I may say so, I think there has never been a time when there has been greater respect in the United States for this country.

Mr. Hees: Is the President simply putting off the visit as long as possible?

HARBOURING OF DESERTERS IN CONTRAVENTION OF ALLIANCE AGREEMENTS

Mr. Jack McIntosh (Swift Current-Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question?

Mr. Speaker: I suggest to the hon. member that perhaps we should go on to another question. We would seem to be getting away from the type of question that should be asked and answered at this time. Do I understand that the hon. member has a supplementary?

Mr. McIntosh: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Perhaps my question should be addressed to the Minister of National Defence, but in his absence maybe the Secretary of State for External Affairs could answer it. Are there any provisions in Canada's collective alliance agreements which prohibit Canada's harbouring deserters from nations associated with Canada in such alliances?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question as asked by the hon. member cannot be in order. He is asking for information interpreting agreements or treaties between countries. It seems to me this is not the type of question which should be answered now.

Mr. McIntosh: With all deference to you, Mr. Speaker, I just asked whether there are any provisions in the agreements. I do not have copies of the agreements. Perhaps the Postmaster General could tell us, if the Secretary of State for External Affairs cannot.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as you have said this is a question which requires interpretation of a statute. I will take the question as notice, but perhaps it would be better if the hon. gentleman were to place it on the order paper.

Mr. McIntosh: Have any discussions been held on this question between the authorities of the United States and Canada?

Mr. Sharp: I will have to take notice of that.

VIOLENT DISTURBANCES

QUEBEC—EXPRESSION OF SUPPORT BY UNION

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Justice, I shall put my question to the Prime Minister.

Since a labor leader stated in Quebec yesterday that he and his group backed strongly those perpetrating acts of violence in Quebec, or who intended to indulge in violence, is it the intention of the government to carry out an inquiry in this connection?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, while the Minister of Justice is in Vancouver for the purpose of carrying on the discussions on the Constitution undertaken last week with the provincial Ministers of Justice, my reply to the hon. member is that this matter, as many others, comes under the administration of justice and does not, therefore, fall under our jurisdiction, unless we are asked by the province to intervene. I know that the hon. member is a strong supporter of provincial autonomy and surely he does not want us to act in any way that would run counter to such autonomy.

DRUGS

L.S.D.—INVESTIGATION BY R.C.M.P. INTO ILLEGAL IMPORTATION

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Solicitor General. Could he tell the house whether the R.C.M.P. has been able to clarify the situation with regard to the smashing of an international drug ring wherein great quantities of l.s.d. were coming into Canada, and is there anything further he can tell us beyond what he did not tell the hon. member for Palliser some ten days ago?

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Solicitor General): No, Mr. Speaker, I am not able to give the hon. member information at the moment, but I will look at the question to see if something can be given at a later stage.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): As a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, would the minister look into the question and advise whether the drug was being manufactured in Canada in Canadian government laboratories, and in particular was any employee of the government involved in its manufacture on behalf of the ring?

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, I shall be very glad to look into that matter.

LEGISLATION TO PROVIDE REPAYMENT OF OVERCHARGES

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, on Friday, February 7 I addressed a question to the Prime Minister. I have been led to believe that by now an answer might be forthcoming. My question related to reports that a number of drug firms in the United States are making payments of $120 million to cover overcharges that had resulted in excess profits. I asked whether the government of Canada is studying this matter and whether legislation might be brought in to make it possible for Canada to require similar action.

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the action to which the hon. member refers is action being taken in the United States pursuant to section 4 of the United States Clayton Act. We have no counterpart of such a law in our own Combines Investigation Act and no such action would be possible in Canada. As the hon. member knows, the question of combines, monopolies and competition policy generally is before the Economic Council of Canada for advice. When we receive a report from the council we will study it and bring in a revised combines act to the house.

Mr. Baldwin: Then you will have a white paper going back again to the Economic Council.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Has the minister been in touch with the officials in the United States who are dealing with this matter, to see whether they have any information to help us ascertain whether the same overcharging is taking place in Canada.

Mr. Basford: As my predecessor explained in January 1968, the Director of Investigation and Research under the Combines Investigation Act had been in touch at that time with the officials of the anti-trust section of the United States department of justice, who advised him at that time there was no evidence in the United States which indicated there had been offences committed in Canada under our law.

TRANSPORT

REPRESENTATIVE OF TRANSPORT COMMISSION AT MARITIMES COMMITTEE SITTINGS

Mr. Louis-Roland Comeau (South Western Nova): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport, or in his absence the acting minister. In light of the fact that the Canadian Transport Commission has not sent a representative to attend the hearings of the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications, which committee is beginning a tour of Atlantic Canada in Fredericton today, and in light of the fact that the chairman has requested that a representative be sent, can the minister assure the house that the Canadian Transport Commission will be represented at the remaining hearings to be held in the maritimes?

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

NIAMEY—CONFRONTATION BETWEEN DELEGATIONS

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs regarding the French-speaking countries conference in Niamey. There have been reports of a confrontation between members of the federal and provincial delegations and I would like to ask the minister whether a previous understanding could have prevented that situation and whether any thought was effectively given to that?

[English]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Before the delegation went to Niamey there were conversations between the governments of Quebec and of Canada and also with other provinces, and an agreement was reached concerning the composition of the Canadian delegation. I believe these arrangements are in the best interests of all concerned. I hope they will be carried through in an amicable fashion and be worthy of our country.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a supplementary question.

I thank the minister for his answer. Now could he tell us whether he considers the federal delegation as the head delegation, or—

Mr. Speaker: I do not think the question is acceptable as put. The hon. member is asking the minister for an opinion and in this sense I do not think his question is in order.

[English]

TRANSPORT

DELAY IN MOVEMENT OF CANADIAN NATIONAL BOX CARS

Mr. Paul St. Pierre (Coast Chilcotin): Mr. Speaker, this question is for the Minister of Transport or in his absence the minister representing him today. It is in relation to rail movement to the west coast of lumber, pulp and products other than wheat. Can the minister advise the house what action is being taken to expedite the movement of several hundred C.N.R. box cars which reportedly are sidetracked on the Jasper-Prince Rupert line, thereby causing a delay which is resulting in serious dislocation and even possible layoffs in several coastal industries.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Transport is due to be in the house tomorrow.

REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT

FRED—PLAN FOR WESTERN NEWFOUNDLAND

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Forestry and Rural Development. Could the minister advise when he expects to sign an agreement with the province of Newfoundland on a proposed $305 million FRED program as announced three times in the past six months by the premier of Newfoundland.

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Forestry and Rural Development): I did not catch the figure, but I think this will be signed very shortly.

IMMIGRATION

ADMISSION OF KNOWN PROFESSIONAL AGITATORS

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, this question is for the Minister of Immigration. In view of the fact that there appears to be overlapping jurisdiction with regard to this particular problem, could the minister advise whether it is the intention of the government to hold an early conference which would include the Minister of Immigration, the Minister of Justice and the attorneys general of the respective provinces in order to decide what will be the future immigration policy regarding the admission to Canada of known professional agitators.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): The policy of the government in this regard is under continuous review. It has been stated a number of times in the house. At the present time it is not proposed to alter the policy.

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a supplementary question.

Would the Minister of Manpower and Immigration tell us if the City of Montreal has lodged a complaint concerning the presence in our Quebec universities of Mr. Karl Dutrich-Wolff, president of the socialist students of West Germany, who describes himself as a professional agitator? According to Section 19A of the Immigration Act, I think the minister would be justified in investigating the presence—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member has made representations to the minister instead of putting a question to him.

[English]

[Later:]

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): With Your Honour's permission, may I rephrase my question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration of a few moments ago? Has the minister received any representation respecting the presence in Montreal of Karl Dutrich-Wolff, president of the socialist students of West Germany?

Mr. Speaker: I suggest that even as rephrased the question is not in order. The hon. member simply asked whether representations had been received. I wonder whether he would not like to return at the time of adjournment to discuss the matter.

Mr. J. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Would the minister tell the house how he distinguishes in principle between a draft dodger and a deserter?

Mr. Speaker: The distinguished member's question is out of order.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

PROGRAMS TO IMPROVE POSITION OF WELFARE RECIPIENTS

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the wide publicity given to the weekend statement of a respected Toronto economist, that the establishment has no interest in the poor and is not going to do anything for them, will the minister make an early statement concerning what programs are in prospect to transform the poor from welfare recipients into participating citizens.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have the impression the question as asked is not in order. The hon. member is suggesting what the minister's statement should be if he were to make a statement. I would think for this reason the question should not be answered.

Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

ALLEGED DISCRIMINATION AGAINST RURAL BOX HOLDERS

Mr. George Muir (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Postmaster General. Considering the unusually large volume of protests alleging discrimination against rural box holders and the recently announced increased charges, would the minister give serious consideration to eliminating this extra cost to the box holders concerned?

Hon. Eric W. Kierans (Postmaster General): We are evaluating the cost of the lock box and attempting to gain a revenue commensurate with it. Rural residents have the option of receiving their mail free, as does everybody else by calling for it at a general delivery wicket. Those who choose a lock box service are asking for an additional service and are expected to pay for it.

REQUEST FOR REDUCTION IN DELIVERY TIMES

Mr. Robert P. Kaplan (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Postmaster General. In view of the fact that most mail deliveries within Toronto and Montreal in the last few weeks have been taking two days, and the further fact that the Toronto and Montreal stock exchanges rely on the mail and require settlement of accounts within three days, and are finding it difficult because of the mail delays to comply with the rules of their exchanges, can the minister assure the house that it is the intention in his modernization of the post office to reduce delivery times to one day?

Hon. Eric W. Kierans (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, the bulk of the mail is delivered in one day between Montreal and Toronto, but there are occasions when it is not. I spent all day Friday in Toronto precisely to investigate conditions there. I may say, with respect to the latter point made by the hon. member, that the sorting out of accounts between Montreal and Toronto stockbrokers does not depend primarily on the mail. However I recognize the problem he raised. We are doing everything we can to improve service.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I wonder if the Postmaster General could explain, to some of us whose education is rather limited, what the difference is between the word "sortation" and the word "sorting".

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This question should be placed on the order paper.

[Translation]

MINISTERS REFUSAL TO MEET FEMALE EMPLOYEES

Mr. Georges Valade (Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Postmaster General.

Can he tell us why he has refused to grant an interview to 500 casual female employees from his department who wanted to discuss their job difficulties?

Hon. Eric W. Kierans (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of such a request.

[English]

UNITED NATIONS

PARTICIPATION IN COMMITTEE TO END BIAFRA-NIGERIA CONFLICT

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Will the government, as a member of the United Nations, work toward the formation of the 19 member committee which Dr. Azikiwe suggested would be a useful instrument for the ending of the Nigeria-Biafra war?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): We do not yet have the details of Dr. Azikiwe's proposals, but from the initial report that has appeared in the papers and on other media they appear to be worthy of close scrutiny. Undoubtedly both the federal Nigerian government and the Ojukwu regime will be considering his suggestions in the light of their respective positions, and of the particular respect in which Dr. Azikiwe has been held in the past. I know I have been personally very interested, but as I said on at least one previous occasion it is not mediators that we lack, it is agreement on certain fundamental questions on which the two regimes have not yet been able to agree.

NATIONAL SECURITY

INQUIRY AS TO REPORT OF ROYAL COMMISSION

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the right hon. Prime Minister if he can give the house an indication of when the report of the commission on security will be tabled, either expurgated or otherwise. I ask this question, since it has been asked a number of times for some six months.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I believe the Leader of the Opposition is exaggerating when he says the question has been asked for some six months, but I do recognize that we will have to take a position on this matter before the six months are up. I will report to the house in due course.

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Surely the government has taken a position. The question now is: How is the expurgated version coming along? Surely we are entitled to have this.

SPORTS

REQUEST FOR EARLY REPORT BY TASK FORCE

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Is he in a position to tell the house when the task force on sports is expected to report, whether this report will be made public, and whether the government intends to send the report when received to a committee of the house.

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I expect the report to come to the government some time next month, that is the month of March, when it will be for the government to decide whether it will be made public.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

ALLEGED INJUSTICES RESULTING FROM INVESTIGATIONS TO REVEAL FRAUD

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): I have a question for the Minister of Labour. Can he tell the house what action his department has taken to eliminate the many injustices now being caused to people who would receive unemployment insurance benefits, brought about by the crackdown to eliminate fraud and enforce the regulations?

Hon. Bryce S. Mackasey (Minister of Labour): The only people in Canada who have anything to fear from the crackdown are those who intend to defraud the government and the Unemployment Insurance Commission.

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Speaker, I would like to say that I have received quite a number of—

[Mr. Stanfield.]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member cannot say anything; he can only ask.

Mr. Lundrigan: I would like to ask the minister if he could tell the house whether the people who are making representations to a number of hon. members, including myself, are in actual fact dishonest, and whether—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member's supplementary question is argumentative.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

REQUEST THAT BILLS BE PRINTED IN GREATER NUMBERS

Mr. Stan Schumacher (Palliser): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the President of the Privy Council. In order that interested members of the public can participate more fully in our democratic processes on an informed basis, can the minister give the house some assurance as to the printing in the future of larger numbers of important public bills, such as the omnibus bill amending the Criminal Code, the bills amending the Estate Tax Act, and the official languages bill, so that a wider distribution of these bills can be made to members of the public who are interested.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): It is a little difficult to decide in each case which bill will be of wide interest and will require a larger distribution, but I am prepared to speak to the responsible officials in the house on this matter.

IMMIGRATION

TIMING OF DISTINCTION BETWEEN DESERTERS AND DRAFT DODGERS

Mr. J. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): My question is for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In view of his statement made to the house last Thursday, and of the recent problems of U.S. students at the border, would he inform the house when his department first made the distinction between deserters and draft dodgers.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question as put cannot be asked at this time.

CANADIAN YOUTH PARLIAMENT

REQUEST FOR RECONVENING OF AD HOC COMMITTEE

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): My question is for the right hon. Prime Minister. Now that the Ontario government has revealed its support for a Canadian youth parliament, will the government of Canada give leadership in establishing this project as a means of providing a positive outlet for youth protests and aspirations?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question as asked would be an excellent resolution to be placed on the order paper.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question?

Mr. Speaker: A supplementary resolution?

Mr. Dinsdale: To put it in a more direct and positive form, would the right hon. gentleman authorize the reconvening of the ad hoc committee on this subject which has been in recess for some two years?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have no reason to reconsider the decision we made in the negative, and which I announced when I answered this question earlier in this session.

CANADA LABOUR (SAFETY) CODE

REGULATIONS APPLICABLE THROUGHOUT CANADA

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Labour. In view of the passing of regulations made under the Canada Labour (Safety) Code respecting safety in the Cape Breton Development Corporation coal mines, may I ask the minister whether it is the intention of the government to introduce a series of regulations industry by industry or whether there are to be general regulations under the Canada Labour (Safety) Code applicable across Canada?

Hon. Bryce S. Mackasey (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the policy of the department is to introduce regulations in whatever manner will make the code applicable at the earliest possible moment. In the case of the mines, we concentrated on the complicated regulations needed to make the code operative in that particular area. As the hon. member has indicated, they are now in full operation in that important industry. We are now proceeding from industry to industry, preparing regulations.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): May I ask whether regulations affecting any other industry have yet been passed?

Mr. Mackasey: In due course, Mr. Speaker.

WOMEN

INFORMATION RESPECTING PRESENTATION OF REPORT

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): I have a question for the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker. While trying to ascertain who might answer this question I was directed to the Secretary of State, but apparently I am supposed to ask the Prime Minister, not particularly because the question deals with women as such but because reports of royal commissions go to the Prime Minister. Can the right hon. gentleman tell us when the report of the Royal Commission on the Status of Women will be available?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I am always interested in that type of question, Mr. Speaker, so I have already made inquiries. I understand there is quite a lot of work remaining to be done, so perhaps we should not expect this report until much later in the year.

Mr. Alexander: Since there has been some suggestion that this report will be swept under the rug, can the Prime Minister give the house his assurance that it will be treated in the same way as all reports are treated when they come before the right hon. gentleman?

Mr. Hees: I presume that means it will be swept under the rug.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Alexander: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I did not follow the exchange between the Prime Minister and my hon. friend, but I believe the Prime Minister wanted to answer my question and I would hope, Mr. Speaker, you would allow him to give us his views.

Mr. Speaker: It was my understanding that the question had been answered.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Trudeau: I wanted to give an answer to the hon. member in the affirmative, but I bowed to the knowledge of a member of a former Conservative government.

NORTHWEST TERRITORIES

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT RESPECTING SELF-GOVERNMENT

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to whoever is running the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. What happened to the proposition respecting self-government in the Northwest Territories? Is any announcement to be made about it?

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): It is obvious nobody is running the department today.

IMMIGRATION

REFUSAL TO ADMIT ALLEGED DRAFT DODGERS

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, on February 11 I asked the Minister of Manpower and Immigration a question concerning the directions given to immigration officers at the border with respect to United States draft dodgers, and the parliamentary secretary took my question as notice. Is the minister prepared to answer today?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, as I recollect it, the question asked by the hon. member had to do with the impersonation by a number of students at the border. These students appeared at the border with copies of a passport and documents pertaining to one particular person, and posed as military deserters. In accordance with the discretion which may be exercised by immigration officers in these cases, the entry of these persons was refused. It was a hoax, of course. It was not a very meaningful test of regulations, especially as those persons were very eager, at least early in the interview, to volunteer that they were just recently in the American forces.

Mr. Peters: The circumstances are, of course, as the minister has outlined them. But my question was: Would there be an investigation into the allegation that the officials apparently had a prearranged method set up to dispose of cases of this kind? There was also the fact that the Canadian officers got in touch directly with the United States officials, something which appears to be contrary to the provisions of the Immigration Act.

Mr. MacEachen: I asked for a report, and I examined it. Then I concluded that the officers had behaved properly and in accordance with the regulations. The action they took in advising their United States counterparts is one which I understand is routine at the border.

AGRICULTURE

PREVENTION OF INTRODUCTION OR SPREAD OF PLANT PESTS

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture) moved that Bill C-154, to prevent the introduction or spreading of pests injurious to plants be read the third time and passed.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

AGRICULTURE

COMPENSATION FOR CONTAMINATION BY PESTICIDE RESIDUE

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture) moved that Bill C-155, to provide compensation to farmers whose agricultural products are contaminated by pesticide residue, and to provide for appeals from compensation awards, be read the third time and passed.

Mr. H. W. Danforth (Kent-Essex): Mr. Speaker, I rise to make a few observations on the third reading of this measure because it represents somewhat of a departure from the type of agricultural bills we have had before us recently. It seems to me it is a forerunner of other bills of this sort which may be coming before the house. I believe there is an intent on the part of the government to deal with changing conditions we are likely to meet in both agriculture and the chemical industry in the years ahead.

In the main, Mr. Speaker, I believe the intent of the bill is good. The government appears to recognize that instances are likely to arise, perhaps with more frequency in the future than in the past, when claims for compensation will be made, and that a basis is necessary for determining the method by which compensation should be paid. While I think the intent of the bill is good, I am a little disappointed that some of the amendments we moved when we were dealing with the substance of the bill clause by clause in the committee stage were not accepted. We believe that those amendments were sound and would have improved the bill, but under the circumstances we must bow to the will of the committee.

In the result, I feel that the regulations that will be prescribed under the bill and also the clauses of the bill are going to make the legislation too cumbersome to implement. Some clauses are going to work to the detriment of both the agricultural and the chemical industries. However, we are fortunate that the bill is a forerunner of future bills, and that after a trial period the weaknesses will be apparent to the government of the day and it will be brought back for amendment.

The provisions of the bill relate to agricultural products that may become contaminated through no fault of the producer or, indeed, through no fault of the chemical company, which may be located some miles away. An example of such contamination is that alleged to have occurred in the Dunnville area. As we become more skilled in detecting contamination, perhaps attempts will be made to curtail the sale of products grown in areas where it is felt there may be contamination.

One major complaint about the substance of this bill is that although the government department concerned is protected to the fullest extent under the terms of the bill, the same is not true of chemical companies and primary producers. Under the terms of the bill government inspectors will be permitted to confiscate contaminated produce of a farm or farms, in return paying what the government feels to be adequate compensation. However, if a contrary opinion as to the assessed value of such products is voiced by the injured party, an appeal can be made to an assessor appointed by the government. As has been pointed out, it is true that the assessor may be a member of the Supreme Court or a superior court. It is also true that the proceedings are not to be considered court proceedings. Once an assessor has made a ruling in a given case, under the clauses of the bill there is no recourse to any other court by way of appeal or review.

I am very much concerned about this. As we are all aware, many decisions made by judges are appealed. Consequently, this is one respect in which I feel the bill is weak. Once a decision has been made by a government appointed assessor and that decision is upheld, the bill specifically provides there is no appeal or review of such decision, whether the party concerned is a farmer, a co-operative or a chemical company. I contend that this is contrary to the rights of individuals and corporations in Canada, and on this score I am uneasy about the bill.

Another point that gives me very grave concern is the kind of terminology found in such bills as this one and the series of similar bills coming before us. Although the terminology may have been handed down through the years, we are now legislating for the future, especially in regard to matters where the advancement of science plays such a tremendous part in our progress. Therefore I do not think we should be subjected to such terminology as "subject to such regulations as may from time to time be prescribed by the Governor in Council", or "subject to such conditions as may from time to time be prescribed". Phrases of this kind are found in bills of this type. As legislators we are being asked to pass a piece of legislation and to make it the law of the land when at the same time we are not sure what regulations will be prescribed.

This is why I am uneasy about this bill. Although some bills that come before us are merely amending bills, as a result of our investigation and study of such bills in committee we have found that in many instances guidelines that were set out in former bills have been removed. More and more the scope and intent of such bills are being left entirely to the interpretation of those who draft the regulations, who in turn adopt such methods as they deem appropriate. I feel that we as legislators are often in the dark as to the true intent of bills that are put before us.

Therefore I take this opportunity, on behalf of the great industries of agriculture and chemistry which have become so closely allied, to protest to the house about two facets of this bill that are going to play an increasingly important part as time goes on. First, it seems to me there is absolutely no room in this bill for appealing or reviewing a decision that has been made by the government, which is only one party to an action. Second, it seems to me, in the main, that in passing legislation of this type we as legislators are signing what is commonly known as a blank cheque. In other words, we are leaving entirely to the department the responsibility of drafting such regulations and providing such conditions as may from time to time seem expedient. Perhaps it is necessary to pass bills in this fashion, but I have grave doubts as to the consequences of this practice. Anyone who has been engaged in these two industries knows how indefinite such regulations can be and how much is left to interpretation.

In the committee stage the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) assured us that even under the terms of the bill it would be possible to appeal directly to the minister. But, Mr. Speaker, we have had a great deal of experience in this regard and we know how ineffective such an appeal can be when directed to a minister. We know how much time can elapse before such an appeal reaches a minister's desk. We know there is also a further delay between the time the appeal reaches his desk and the time he is in a position to make a decision. So, although the intentions of the bill may be good, and I feel they are, and although we on this side are prepared to allow the bill to pass, we still have grave reservations about how it will apply to the industries we are concerned about.

[Translation]

Mr. C.-A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, before this bill is passed, I would like to add a few words to complete the comments I made at the sitting of the committee.

First, I must say that we certainly are in favour of the bill, although it is not perfect for it is difficult to demand absolute perfection.

Mr. Speaker, we are afraid that we are a little confused insofar as compensations are concerned. As a matter of fact, the minister has implied that, as provided for in the law, there is nothing definite in the bill. Under the former bills, which provided for the payment of a fixed amount for the loss of each animal, if the flesh was still fit for consumption, or if the animal no longer had any commercial value, it was still possible to get some compensation. But in the present case, nothing is fixed. It will all depend upon the regulations which the minister or his officials will draw up in favour of the farmers.

Two groups are concerned in the present case: the manufacturers and the farmers who use those pesticides.

Mr. Speaker, we have been told what amounts the minister intends to allow as compensation for the losses suffered by farmers. They represent an increase which in my view should be more liberal. I am glad that a compensation of $200 for a pure-bred milch-cow and $129 for a cross-bred cow.

However, there is a point which concerns me constantly and on which I drew the minister's attention in committee. It is the difference between cross-bred milch-cows and pure-bred cows.

In my district, we have cross-bred dairy herds—

[Mr. Danforth.]

[English]

Mr. Olson: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, while I do not wish to interfere with the hon. member's right to carry on the kind of discussion he has carried on with respect to compensation paid for loss of animals, I think he will agree with me that his remarks apply specifically to Bill C-156 and not to C-155.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: These last minutes, I had some doubt as to the relevance of the remarks of the hon. member for Roberval, and I was trying to find in the bill the clauses on compensation for loss of animals.

I believe that the point raised by the Minister of Agriculture is well taken and that the present remarks of the hon. member for Roberval rather relate to Bill C-157 entitled "An act to regulate products used for the control of pests and the organic functions of plants and animals".

In my opinion, Bill C-155 now before the house deals more specifically with agricultural products contaminated by pesticides and I do not think, therefore, that the hon. member's comments really referred to the bill under consideration.

Mr. Gauthier: Thank you for those remarks, Mr. Speaker. Even if this bill is related to agricultural products damaged by pesticides, I thought that herds could also be affected and that the bill concerned cattle also. So, I will keep my remarks until we debate the bill on animal contagious diseases.

As for Bill C-155 in respect of crops and farmers' property, our only complaint is that the department will be the only decision-making agency on the amount of compensation. That is why I brought the matter to the attention of the committee and I bring it again to the minister's attention. In fact, I realize that since the beginning of this session every time such a subject is brought forward it is referred to the department which will later assess the amount of indemnity.

It is hoped that the regulations that the Minister of Agriculture—who is conversant with the subject—as well as his officers intend to present to us will benefit the farmers. Since an act must be promulgated in respect of the future what will happen with regard to further changes? The minister is not infallible, nor is he eternal. Should a less qualified Minister of Agriculture replace him and should the present officers who are very competent and trustworthy be replaced by other people, then we should have to pass an act establishing a standard basic price in order to get away from temporary regulations that may be modified overnight. At this time, that is what I fear most as to the bills on agriculture that we have been discussing. In my opinion, that procedure is being applied to every bill, and that is why I am worried.

When we talk with farmers they ask us: What will be the amounts of compensation in the future? As we are not aware of what they will be, as we are left completely in the dark, we can only answer: We have to wait, it is the minister who makes regulations. Well, if the minister wants to take that chance, he is the one who will have to account for his actions to the people. I think he is old enough to take his own responsibility and he will have to do it alone if he does not want to share it with the committee and the house. Then, we will say to the people: the law has been made thus. The majority has won and we have given the minister and his officials all the latitude needed to determine what compensation you may or may not receive according to what happens in agriculture.

• (3:30 p.m.)

[English]

Mr. Ross Whicher (Bruce): I would like to speak on this bill, Mr. Speaker, because I had the opportunity of attending the committee while it was discussed. I want to join in the view expressed not only by many members present but also by the expert witnesses who appeared before the committee. I have enjoyed the speeches by two members of the opposition this afternoon. I realize that one who has had long experience in the field of opposition naturally has to say something against a bill regardless of whether it is good or bad.

This bill is something new as far as the Department of Agriculture is concerned. I would think that members who wish to be somewhat critical should nevertheless congratulate the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) for bringing it in. This is something that has never happened before in Canada. It was not possible for the government to pay to a farmer any sum of money he might be justified in receiving. If a pesticide firm or a farmer's neighbour made an error in the spreading of pesticide, the farmer affected could sue the pesticide firm or his neighbour. If the damage arose through no fault of the farmer, his neighbour or the pesticide firm, the farmer could not be compensated for his loss.

In this bill the government provides compensation to farmers whose agricultural products are contaminated by pesticide residue, as well as for appeals from compensation awards. The Minister of Agriculture and the government deserve credit for this. A great deal more could be done but this is a step in the right direction. The Canadian farmer with substantial losses will now have the opportunity to receive compensation from the government. The minister should be congratulated rather than criticized.

The hon. member for Kent-Essex (Mr. Danforth), although very mild in his criticism, was critical that the regulations had not been drawn up and the amount of compensation had not been decided. I point out that no regulations are written before a bill is passed by parliament. After the bill is passed the regulations will be drawn up by the Minister of Agriculture. The hon. member also suggested there was no provision for a review which would be fair to the farmer concerned. There are 264 members of this house including the Speaker, all of whom represent constituencies. If one of our constituents feels he is not getting a fair deal it will be up to us to look after his interests.

This is new legislation. I understand the Department of Agriculture has estimated the cost to be $100,000. This bill is very important to anyone who suffers a loss through no fault of his own, of his neighbour or of the pesticide manufacturer.

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, I am going to disappoint the hon. member for Bruce (Mr. Whicher). He complained that it is almost a reflex action for members of the opposition to be critical of any legislation put forward by the government. Even before the hon. member made that suggestion, I had it in my notes to congratulate the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) for bringing in this legislation. I think the hon. member for Bruce is a bit unfair in his criticism. My colleague who spoke on this matter this afternoon extended congratulations in regard to this bill breaking a new trail in the field of agricultural legislation.

Action to deal with the problem of pesticides is long overdue. This bill is just the beginning in an area which is going to become to an increasing extent the responsibility of the government. The use of pesticides in agriculture is a fairly recent occurrence. I can see protests arising about problems of pollution, not only food pollution and other damage of that kind, but general soil pollution. This will be a major concern to governments that have responsibilities in these matters.

The only complaint I am going to make this afternoon is in reference to clause 13, subclause 3, of the bill. I think it goes too far in dealing with this matter, at least at this stage of development. It reads as follows:

> The decision of the Assessor on any appeal brought pursuant to this Part is final and conclusive and not subject to appeal or to review by any court.

The very fact that we are moving into a new area of control gives rise to criticism against the rather arbitrary conclusiveness of this part of the bill. It is going to be difficult to anticpiate all the eventualities that will arise from the problem of pesticide poisoning and pollution. From the standpoint of bureaucratic efficiency I know that such a provision in an act, particularly a new act, is neat and tidy, but it is hardly in keeping with the support of individual rights and liberties that has been espoused by the government both inside and outside the House of Commons. The present government, which is proposing this arbitrary subclause, is supposed to be anchored to the principle of the just society. In the light of this, when we are moving into an unexplored area of government control and participation I would think we should do nothing to limit, circumscribe or curtail the individual's recourse to justice.

I was particularly taken with a phrase used by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) during the constitutional conference last week. In putting forward his thesis in support of a Bill of Rights the hon. gentleman used the phrase that there must be protection from the bureaucratic agencies that are spawned by government. I think that here is a prime example of what the Prime Minister was talking about. Under this bill there is the right of appeal to an assessor, but once that appeal has been made and the decision has been handed down the door to further recourse to justice is closed. I advise the minister at this stage that he might review clause 13(3) in the light of the comments that have been made this afternoon.

My hon. friend who opened the debate this afternoon said that there is a probability or a possibility of a resort to the minister. But even this is not sufficient protection for the individual. As this is a new bill, described by the hon. member for Bruce as exploring new problem areas that are becoming of public concern, I suggest that we should keep the door of recourse to the courts open at this stage. This would give proof that the government is interested in more than lip service to propaganda phrases such as the just society, and in curtailing arbitrary decisions by the bureaucracies spawned by government in the complexities of public life today.

There is one other point I would like to make. If parliament approves this aspect of the bill which I am discussing, it will become a precedent for other arbitrary decisions of this kind. In other words, if I may use the Prime Minister's phrase, it will spawn precedents aplenty that will more and more put final decisions on justice into the hands of the bureaucrats, out of the hands of ministers, out of the hands of parliament and in particular out of the hands of the courts. Because we are breaking new ground with this bill I think the minister would want to get it established in the right way. I trust that even at this late stage he will keep the final recourse to justice in the courts open for our farmers.

Mr. Rod Thomson (Battleford-Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, I have been quite critical of some other pieces of legislation that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) has introduced and I would not like to see him bring in a bill with which I agree without offering him my congratulations, and I do so now.

I also think we should give consideration to some of the comments of the last speaker. As a farmer in a rural area I will certainly be willing to act as an interested advocate for any farmer or manufacturer who has troubles in regard to matters of this kind. It has been suggested that since this is new ground we should be a little wary. At the same time I wish the minister well in his administration and I hope there will not be too many claims against the Crown.

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I think this legislation is a step in the right direction and I intend to vote for the bill. However, there are one or two points I would like to mention.

Some time ago the people in my area had a problem. I do not know whether it is specifically related to pesticides. I mentioned it to the minister the other day and promised to send him more information on it. I presume that information is now on its way to him through the mail.

Recently a number of colts in the Trail area died of chronic lead poisoning which was traced to the forage on three different farms. I presume it might have developed through the use of pesticides over a period of time or might have arisen from some other source of contamination; I just do not know. The authorities are investigating the problem and I presume their reports will be issued within the next month or so. The health authorities have assured the people of the area that public health is not in jeopardy.

This bill deals only with pesticides, and it is possible that the loss suffered by the farmers in my area may be traced to some other source. The loss of animals such as these is quite a blow to small farmers. Sometimes it is very difficult to find the source of contamination. The point I am trying to make this afternoon is that when examples of contamination arise with respect to any type of farm product anywhere in the country it seems to me there should be some kind of co-ordinated attack upon the problem. The health authorities would certainly have to enter the picture.

So far as the particular situation about which I am speaking is concerned, the provincial health services, Cominco officials at the Trail smelter, and officials of the B.C. Department of Agriculture, the federal Department of Agriculture and of the Food and Drug Directorate are interested in the problem. They want to find out how the lead contamination got into the forage and are following every lead they possibly can. I believe that a co-ordinated program should be laid out by the authorities of the federal and provincial departments of government in respect of pesticide poisoning or contamination from pollutants whether in the air or water.

While the bill covers loss to farmers from the use of pesticides, which naturally should come under the Department of Agriculture, there may be other causes of loss which should be investigated. I would appreciate it very much if the minister in the months ahead, if not now, would give some thought to this matter and consider having the officials of his department look into the possibility of tracking down all types of soil pollutants which in turn might get into forage. These pollutants might be detrimental in terms of loss of income to the farmers and in other ways to members of the public who might use the product concerned.

I thought I would mention this point because I feel that over the years we have to a very large degree neglected co-ordination of the facilities which could be used to track down and probably eliminate a good many of these problems before they become too severe. I leave these thoughts with the minister. I certainly commend the department for bringing in this legislation.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I cannot say I am wildly enthusiastic about this bill; I am not dancing for joy in the aisles. I believe it has some useful purpose. I should like to say to the hon. member for Bruce (Mr. Whicher), to whose speech I listened with some interest, that he will be surprised to know to what extent and how frequently we in Her Majesty's loyal opposition seek to say to the government that we approve of its legislative proposals. We are looking for ways and means to praise the government and for an opportunity to say that measures which they bring up to some extent at least meet the problems of the country. Unfortunately, however, try as hard as we do and as often as we do the government keeps denying us the opportunity to make statements of that kind. So when we have a bill of this kind which has, to use a term in the bill, a residue of good we are inclined to praise it. This is the reason some of my colleagues both in this party and the party to the left are probably a little louder in their praise than might normally be the case.

There are some pitfalls in this legislation which I should like to draw to the attention of the minister in good faith because this is a new principle and a matter in respect of which we are breaking new ground. I have every confidence that the minister and his competent officials will keep the matter under study. While very large powers are given to the government, the minister and the assessors to act by regulation, I believe that if the minister feels changes are needed he will come back to the house so that the matter may be discussed in the light of experience and development. It is for this reason I bring some of these matters to the attention of the minister.

I feel that the farmer, to an unconscionably large degree, has been placed in the hands of the government, the minister and the officials. I say this after an examination of the various clauses in the bill. I believe this is important because the minister is breaking new ground. I had some experience in farming in the Peace River country above the 55th parallel during the previous Liberal government when a farmer was obliged to have a substantial income in addition to his income from his farming operations in order to make a go of things. Fortunately, I was engaged in the practice of law and made sufficient income to prop up my income as a farmer. I rather think that under the present government we are heading for the same situation. If it should happen that the constituents in my area I feel I could do better at home, then I will go back to farming buoyed up, in view of what the Minister of Finance is doing in respect of the estate tax, by the knowledge that I will have ample income from my law practice to keep the farm going.

Mr. Kierans: Are you asking for an opinion?

Mr. Baldwin: I do not think so. I do not believe the minister is an entirely unprejudiced witness under such conditions. In the Peace River country we raise a lot of cantaloupes and cucumbers. We even raise a lot of corn. My familiarity with hybrid corn has done me a lot of good in dealing with this government. I remember one year when we farmed at the foot of a hill in a valley in the Peace River country. In the spring, after about 18 acres of corn had been planted a heavy rainfall caused water to run down the hill. The corn was damaged. I learned later that the damage was caused by the residue from pesticide which had been used by the farmers over the hill. The crop was ruined.

When I read Rachel Carson's book "Silent Spring" later, I was interested in it for this reason. There are variations of the damage caused. A number of years ago a very large school of fish in the middle of the Pacific Ocean was found after examination to have absorbed certain pesticides which had caused the fish to die. In the world in which we are now living it is difficult to say where we are going, so I believe this could be very important legislation.

The legislation compels the farmer, in order to secure compensation, to throw himself entirely on the mercy of the government. In order for him to be eligible there must be a letter received by the Minister of Agriculture from the Minister of National Health and Welfare confirming that an inspection of an agricultural product of that farmer made under the Food and Drugs Act has disclosed the presence of pesticide residue and that the sale of that product would be contrary to that act or the regulations made thereunder. Having in mind how slowly the processes of government work and having in mind that the farmer must secure this certificate from the Minister of National Health and Welfare, we can see the many problems which might arise. We might wonder how promptly the Minister of National Health and Welfare would act in making his report. The minister must also be satisfied that the pesticide residue in or upon the product is not present because of any fault of the farmer. That is a unilateral decision the minister will make. I am not saying that this or any other minister may not make the decision properly but we know these will be decisions made in the field.

Mr. Olson: Technical problems.

Mr. Baldwin: I have been engaged in fighting technical problems for a great many years. I know how difficult it will be for a farmer faced with this problem when the damages may well run into thousands of dollars. This alone is reason enough why we should make sure we give the farmer all the protection we possibly can.

• (4:00 p.m.)

We then find that the next hurdle the farmer has to overcome is that he may be compelled by the minister to start proceedings in court to recover what the minister feels may be his lawful damages, or the minister may in turn request the farmer to assign his claim to the minister. I have had a lot of experience with cases of this type under the workmen's compensation act. They involve the individual in a great deal of difficulty. He comes into contact with government red tape at its worst. Yet this is another condition precedent to the farmer being eligible to receive some compensation. I do not quarrel with those clauses to the extent of saying they should not be there, but I am pointing out these things to indicate the problems with which the farmer will have to contend in trying to become eligible for compensation.

Now we come to the final stage to which reference has been made by my colleagues and by members of the New Democratic Party, namely, the question of appeals. I do not know where the government found the term "assessor". I think it goes back to the old admiralty courts. The assessors under the bill are judges of the Exchequer Court or the superior courts of the provinces. They act in a judicial capacity but they also act as persona designata under the terms of the legislation and are governed by its terms. Without in any way saying that these assessors will not give to the decision of each case a clear, fair and independent judgment, they are in close connection and consultation with the government by the fact that they are entitled to promulgate rules in conjunction with the government. They can only award compensation in two instances; in other words, there can only be an appeal in two instances, one of which is if the amount awarded is less than the maximum amount of compensation prescribed under the act.

I suggest that the minister keep a close watch on what develops with regard to proceedings under the assessors and take up the very sensible point made by the hon. member for Kent-Essex (Mr. Danforth), the first spokesman for our party, concerning the possibility of appeal. The judges are judges of the Exchequer Court or a superior court and they decide in terms of thousands of dollars when they are acting in a civil capacity. When they are acting as judges of the Exchequer Court they make decisions under the provisions of the Patent Act, the Trade Marks Act, the Income Tax Act, as the case may be, and their decisions are subject to appeal. The fact that they have been lawyers and have become judges does not guarantee certainty that their decisions will be sound and proper.

Having in mind all the safeguards with which the government has surrounded this legislation, I suggest to the minister that it would not be unreasonable to hope that he might be prepared to consider, after having had an opportunity to observe the proceedings that take place, the right to an appeal from the assessor under certain conditions to another tribunal which would, of course, be the appellate tribunal of each province. The appeal might be only on matters of law. I am quite convinced that there will be challenges from time to time on questions of jurisdiction, and if the assessor is going to be the sole judge, the person who can finally, completely and solely determine the law as it is applied to the case of a particular farmer, farmers should have the right to appeal. I think the average farmer is left in a situation where, on seeing what is going to happen, he will shrug his shoulders and pass it by. I am talking from my experience as a member of the bar and as a farmer. I know what these people feel with regard to these problems in the law courts. I therefore suggest to the minister that it would not be a bad idea to consider the provision of an appeal.

I also ask the minister to keep a close eye on the matter of costs. There is a provision in the bill that costs can be awarded against the farmer. I would think that in most of these cases it should be a simple enough issue for the farmer to bring the case himself, to act as his own counsel, to plead the facts and to ask for compensation. I would hope this would be done. In a case where the assessor determined that the minister had not exercised his discretion properly in withholding the compensation asked for I would hope that costs could be awarded against the minister. I would like to think that even if this bill does provide for such costs being awarded—and we cannot do anything about it now—the minister would be very vigilant in determining any costs against the farmer where an appeal is made to an assessor. The bill should have the broadest and most equitable interpretation in order to bring to farmers, in this new approach in our relations with the agricultural industry, the fairness and justice to which they are entitled.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, it was not my intention to take part in this debate but having looked at the bill in the context of what we heard last week about the enshrinement of a bill of rights in the constitution and then taking a closer look at this bill I find that this is one of the worst violations of human rights that we possibly can have. This is one of those bills where the purpose is generally laudable but where clause after clause represents a violation of rights. The minister can shake his head but I will point out to him quite a few areas in which there is an even greater denigration of the rights of the individual than under many other acts.

First of all, let us look at clause 3(2) under which compensation will not be paid unless the minister is satisfied of "the presence of pesticide residue and that the sale of that product would be contrary to that act", or unless he "is satisfied that the pesticide residue in or upon the product is not present because of any fault of the farmer, his employee or agent, or of a previous owner of the land on which the product was grown." Does this mean that the purchaser of land is going to have to take a certificate of indemnity from his vendor to the effect that no pesticides have been used on the land, that they have not been used improperly, and if they are subsequently found to have been used improperly that there shall be indemnity to the purchaser? I am sure the minister has not even thought of that point.

Mr. Olson: Mr. Speaker, we have thought about that point very carefully.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): The net result is that the minister has ridden roughshod over the rights of a purchaser of land. At no time has the question ever been considered that a purchaser of land shall be held accountable for the negligent acts of a previous owner.

• (4:10 p.m.)

Remember, under this clause it is the negligent acts of the previous owner that penalize the present owner of the land. Yet the minister says this is perfectly all right. Any solicitor worth his salt will tell you that he will have to require from the vendor of land a certificate or undertaking of indemnity with regard to the proper use of pesticides. That is the first right that I think is being infringed upon.

Second, there is power in this bill for the making of regulations but there is not one word about the publication of those regulations. The minister can say all he wants, but I will take him through the testimony of the government officials at the time of the hearings on the anti-dumping bill to prove my point. If the minister wants to find out about this, he need only look at the Regulations Act in which there is a provision that empowers the Governor in Council to suspend the publication of any regulation. He does not have to publish if he does not want to do so. So why was this provision not included in the bill?

The government saw the point as a result of the hearings regarding the anti-dumping legislation and provided that the regulations made by the anti-dumping tribunal and by the government should be tabled by the minister and then spelled out in the act. Why was not this done with regard to this act?

Mr. Olson: They will be printed in the Canada Gazette.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): There is provision in the Regulations Act for this not to be done. The minister can deny it all he wants and insist that he is right, but there is in the Regulations Act a provision which empowers the Governor in Council to eliminate or set aside publication.

Mr. Olson: Well, this will not be done.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): This minister just sits there and says it will not be, but he will not be permanent in that position. We cannot be guaranteed that he or his successors will not find the occasion when it shall be expedient not to publish the regulations. All I say is that a provision for publication should be included in the bill. There have been many occasions recently when more and more we have been insisting, and we will keep on insisting, that regulations be published. It would not cost the Crown any more. It is just the approach of the government to which we take exception. Again, it is big government versus the individual, and it is the individual who is adversely affected.

The minister, when he sat on this side of the house, would have been the first to join me in taking the stand that I am taking this afternoon. I am only reasserting what I have said for I do not know how many times. Certainly I must have, 20 or 30 times over the past few years, taken exception to bills wherein there has been the power to make general regulations and no statutory provision whereby those regulations had to be published. If the minister can give us an undertaking that the Attorney General will bring in an amendment to the Regulations Act forcing the publication of the regulations or the tabling of them in the house, as they should be, I will be prepared to accept it. But it will be an undertaking by this minister.

Mr. Olson: This minister undertakes that the regulations applicable to this act will be published.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): All right. We will see how far that binds the minister's successors. Let us consider clause 5. Again this will be a judgment decision by the minister, because clause 5 says:

> No payment of compensation shall be made to a farmer pursuant to this act in respect of a loss occasioned to him by reason of pesticide residue in or upon an agricultural product until the farmer has taken any steps that the minister deems necessary
> (a) to reduce the loss occasioned to him by reason of such pesticide residue, and
> (b) to pursue any action that the farmer may have in law against
> (i) the manufacturer of the pesticide causing the residue in or upon the product, or
> (ii) any person whose act or omission resulted in or contributed to the presence of the pesticide residue in or upon the product.

Now we see the intent of this measure. No loss will be payable unless the minister first of all deems in his judgment, whether reasonably or unreasonably, that the farmer has taken steps to reduce the loss because of the pesticide, even though the loss may be occasioned by the use of pesticide by a previous owner of the land. The farmer must take steps against reducing the loss. He is forced to take action in a court against the distributor of the pesticide. There is no indication as to what kind of a lawsuit he must bring. There is no indication of what action at law he will have to bring forward, or what shall be the burden of proof with regard to any loss.

This measure will force the farmer to look into the requirements of registration of pesticide used by a previous owner of the land, about which he may have no knowledge. Yet the minister says he will not pay any compensation unless the farmer has taken the steps that the minister deems necessary to reduce the loss, or has taken action against the manufacturer. What sort of thing is the government giving on one hand and putting out both hands to take back? Rights! Again, this is the iron heel of bureaucracy on the neck of the poor farmer.

The farmer may have to sue not only the manufacturer of the pesticide but the hired man of the previous owner whose act of omission or commission was responsible for the misuse of the pesticide. I ask the minister to be fair in this regard. I trust the minister will never be in the position of having to face such a provision as this if he is a poor farmer caught in the meshes of this act.

Let us look at clause 7, which says:

> An inspector may at any reasonable time
> (a) enter any place or premises in which he reasonably believes there is any agricultural product, pesticide or thing that will enable him to carry out any investigation that may be required by the minister for the purposes of paragraph (b) of subsection (2) of section 3, and may open any container or package found therein or examine anything found therein that the inspector has reason to believe will assist him in such investigation, and take samples thereof, and—

The inspector may do all sorts of things. He does not need a search warrant or writ of assistance. He needs nothing. But in this day and age, when the police are seeking marijuana, hashish, l.s.d. or what have you, they must have a writ of assistance. A writ of assistance must be issued to an R.C.M.P. constable before he can enter a place where drugs are being distributed. Which is worse, a pesticide or narcotics? Which is worse, pesticides or drugs of the kind that are so popular today?

The powers given an inspector under this bill are more than those given to a policeman searching for narcotics. An inspector can look for pesticides without receiving the permission of anyone; he does this merely on his own judgment, at a reasonable time. I suppose that is anywhere between six o'clock in the morning and midnight. He can visit a farm at any reasonable time. You have only to read clause 7 to see what the inspector can do. He can take samples of the commodities. He may require any person in such place or premises to produce for inspection or for the purpose of obtaining copies thereof or extracts therefrom, any books, shipping bills, bills of lading, documents containing mixing instructions, or other documents or papers, and so on. Yet it is said there is no trampling on rights here. The inspector walks in and on his own judgment says that he wants this and that. Why does he not require the same sort of authority that a policeman must obtain when he is going after something that is much more noxious?

We are looking for pesticides here. I admit that they can do harm. But gracious me, they are nothing compared with narcotics. Yet the hands of the police are tied when dealing with narcotics. I will have something to say to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) about the Food and Drugs Act in regard to these matters. Why in matters of, shall we say, routine administration for the purposes of the Department of Agriculture do we give these absolute powers to representatives of the minister?

I now come to the point raised by my colleague the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) and others with regard to appeals against compensation awarded. I admit that the judges will come from the Exchequer Court and the superior courts, but I do not agree that the finding of the assessor should be final and not subject to appeal. I have raised questions about compensation, the question of law, the ownership of land, the nature of a certificate of indemnification, whether there is any notice, the degree of responsibility on the purchaser of land to determine whether there should or should not be pesticide used in connection with his farming operations. I have raised the question of the publication of regulations and why a farmer should be held responsible for ascertaining that a pesticides manufacturer has complied with all the regulations regarding the registration of the pesticide. Under this bill the farmer is the one who is responsible.

Under this bill all the burden is on the farmer; there is no burden whatsoever on the minister. The minister says he will pay compensation in respect of any product on which there is a residue of pesticide, subject to several conditions. The list of conditions that follows is both arms long. The minister has covered himself all round.

• (4:20 p.m.)

Mr. Olson: I do not think the hon. member has read Bill C-157 or he would not make assertions of that kind,

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): The minister has every opportunity to reply. I wish he would be advised by his legal officers. This is Bill C-155, not C-157. Why Bill C-157?

Mr. Olson: Because that is the pest control protection bill.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): It is pesticide residue compensation I am talking about, Bill C-155.

An hon. Member: The minister is confused.

Mr. Olson: No, the minister is not confused. It is the member speaking who is confused.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): The minister, by his intervention, is trying to confuse the issue. We are dealing with the pesticide residue compensation bill, and that is what I was talking about—pesticide residue. The minister has every opportunity to speak. He has been bobbing up and down in his place like a jack-in-the-box. I do not have the right of reply beyond this point and I wish to make my case.

The minister has made many interventions. Perhaps he has exhausted his right to speak—he did not rise on a point of order or seek to ask a question; he just stood up and made an assertion. Nevertheless, I have shown how in this year of 1969, with the government insisting we are moving into a just society, when we are seeking to enshrine a bill of human rights in the constitution, we are getting legislation of the type before us which from the point of view of a lawyer is wholly abhorrent. The minister or his advisors should read the proceedings of the annual meetings of the various law societies of the provinces or of the Canadian Bar Association. They would find that time and time again protests are made against excessive use of delegated powers this use of assessors or boards whose decisions are final and not subject to appeal.

I am not in the position to advance an amendment at this moment, but in my opinion this is terribly deficient legislation. In fact, I am prepared to vote against it on these grounds. It is a complete fraud because the burden is entirely on the farmer and the conditions imposed are all in favour of the minister. He has not taken a chance, not one chance, and the burden imposed on farmers is beyond all reason.

I hope, therefore, that further consideration will be given to this legislation. If the wording of some of these provisions cannot be amended by regulation we shall have to watch the situation most carefully because powers are granted here to inspectors which are not given to the police even for narcotic control. I suppose the minister will try to tell us that pesticide residues are worse than narcotics. The conditions imposed on farmers are almost impossible for them to fulfil. They will be the luckiest people in the world if they succeed against the department. This recalls the situation in some provinces where there is some kind of unsatisfied judgment fund. Motorists are told it is for their protection, but try recovering money from it. It is all right getting a judgment, but one almost has to take the province to court and fight the case all over again when it comes to collecting the amount awarded. As I say, I find this a most unsatisfactory piece of legislation from a legal point of view.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I notice the Minister of Agriculture is anxious to speak but I must advise him he does not have the right of reply on third reading. If it is the unanimous wish of the house he may be allowed to speak.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I am willing to join in giving unanimous consent that the minister be heard, but I should like to speak, whether before or after the minister does not matter.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Would the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) like to speak now?

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The generosity of the minister overwhelms me. Perhaps I may recall the stance which was taken with respect to this bill by the hon. member for Kent-Essex (Mr. Danforth). I believe I can say that he reflected the views of members of this party. We feel this is, in the main, a good piece of legislation and most of its provisions are acceptable to us.

However, as hon. members are fully aware, the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Gleave) did move a couple of amendments at the report stage and one of them had to do with the very point about which the hon. member for Kent-Essex was most critical, namely, that in subclause 3 of clause 13 of the bill the right of appeal to another court is specifically denied in the legislation. We still feel it was a mistake for that subclause to have been included and we regret that the amendment moved by the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar was defeated. It was moved on Wednesday, February 12, as reported in Hansard at page 5445, and it was voted on that afternoon, the vote being recorded at pages 5448 and 5449. The amendment was defeated by a vote of 101 to 68.

I find myself wondering whether supporters of the Progressive Conservative party will not try a further amendment. Perhaps at the end of the debate which is taking place this afternoon the house might reconsider the question, and if any hon. members to my right would like my assistance I would be glad to draft for them a motion that the bill be not now read a third time but that it be referred back for the purpose of reconsidering clause 13, subclause 3 thereof. One should never give up. The fact that we were beaten at the report stage does not make it automatic that we will be beaten again at this stage.

I am aware of the fact that there are times when we advise people to stay away from lawyers and from the courts. There are times when it is better to get matters settled outside of the courts, or to get things settled in an atmosphere that is removed from the technicalities of the law. But I think that this case has to be looked at a little more closely. What we have here is legislation under which certain people—and I am thinking particularly of farmers in so far as they are covered by this legislation—can apply for compensation. To whom can the farmers apply? They apply to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson); they apply to the government.

Regulations in this matter are to be worked out, and we have been assured by the hon. member for Bruce (Mr. Whicher) that it will not be long before we see these regulations. I found that an interesting comment in view of the fact that on the orders of the day this afternoon I asked the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey) when we will get the regulations made pursuant to the Canada Labour (Safety) Code. Do you know, Mr. Speaker, when we passed that bill? The then minister of labour urged us to get it through so that he could get the regulations passed, and that was in December, 1966, over two years ago. So the regulations do not always come immediately after the bill has been passed.

In any event, here is the picture. Under regulations that will be laid down the farmer will apply to the minister—to the government—for compensation. The minister, or the Department of Agriculture, will make a determination and an award. A farmer who is not satisfied has, according to the law, the right of appeal to an assessor. The assessor will be a judge of the Exchequer Court of Canada or one of the superior courts of the provinces. But he will deal with the matter as an individual on a separate appointment or assignment, not in a court following the usual court procedures.

In my opinion the farmer will feel that he is up against the same old brick wall. He applied to the minister for compensation. He was turned down or was given less compensation than he thought he was entitled to. The matter was then reviewed by an individual who happened to be a judge but who was given the assignment of assessor under an order in council passed by the government. The farmer who is aggrieved, who feels that he has not been given fair compensation, will feel that it is the same old story, that he is up against the government and has got himself involved in legalistic matters. There may well be cases where a farmer will feel that as a citizen of a free country he should have the right to take his appeal one step further, namely to a court of law.

I also note that the only matter that an assessor can consider and review when awards are either made or not made by the government is the amount of the compensation. Reading this legislation I see all sorts of legalistic technicalities. It seems to me that there is every chance in the world of there being fine points of law on which a case can turn. For a farmer to be told that he cannot get past (a) the minister and (b) the assessor, that he cannot get to the courts of the land, is a denial of a basic principle of justice as we know it in this country.

So I urge the minister to reconsider this matter. I heard what he said in response to the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Gleave) the other day, and I have read again what he said in Hansard. The debate was very short. The point made by the minister was that these assessors would be judges. That was supposed to satisfy the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar. But I would make the point that they are judges wearing another hat. They are judges appointed by order in council to be assessors to review whether or not the minister who is responsible for their appointment has made the right decision as to the amount of compensation.

The minister's defence, to my mind, is not even plausible. I think that the clause in the bill that denies the right to a farmer to take his appeal to a court is not in keeping with the kind of legislation we should have. As a matter of fact, I think that the very title of the bill is misleading. It reads: "An act to provide compensation to farmers whose agricultural products are contaminated by pesticide residue, and to provide for appeals from compensation awards." On reading that it is quite natural to assume that an appeal would be made to the courts. But this is denied by subclause 3 of clause 13, and I think this is a mistake.

Since the minister has indicated that he is going to speak I hope he will deal further with this matter and give positive assurance that the regulations will not take as long to come as the regulations relating to the Canada Labour (Safety) Code. We have been assured that they will be published. But I hope that the minister will deal more effectively than he has with the denial of the right of a farmer to take an appeal to a court of the land.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent to hear the minister at this stage?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Olson: Mr. Speaker, I will try to deal with some of the questions that have been raised in the debate. First, I think it should be drawn to the attention of the house as clearly as it is possible to do so that this bill is a new departure in legislation. It provides, in the first instance, the Minister of Agriculture with authority from this house to pay compensation to a farmer who has suffered a loss through no fault of his own as a result of the use of pesticides. Never before has statutory authority to do this been provided to the Minister of Agriculture.

Second, the bill provides a procedure for making an appeal against any decision that the minister may make as to the amount of compensation. Therefore I think it is in the context of those two fundamental purposes of the bill that we should consider all of the clauses and regulations that flow from those two principles.

The hon. member for Kent-Essex (Mr. Danforth) hoped that the government would demonstrate a willingness to amend the bill on the basis of experience, keeping in mind conditions that may exist from time to time. I am sure the hon. member will agree with me that this government has demonstrated by the very fact that it has brought in this bill a willingness to give authority and then to establish procedures for bringing about a greater measure of justice in cases where people are caught in situations that have arisen through no fault of their own.

The hon. member also mentioned that the government is protected under the provisions of the act whereas the farmer and indeed the manufacturer are not. This bill, as I read it, Mr. Speaker, in no way deals with the manufacture of pesticides. That matter is provided for under another bill. As the hon. member for Kent-Essex (Mr. Danforth) knows, Bill C-155 deals with compensation. It deals with rules of procedure and legal authority under which compensation can be paid after a farmer has applied for compensation. I think it cannot be overemphasized that the farmer now has the right to make application for compensation, which is something he never had before. The bill goes further. He has the right to appeal the amount of compensation awarded. This, also, is a right he never had before.

The hon. member raised the question of detentions with respect to products or chemicals. Under the provisions of this act there will be no detentions. They may be ordered under the authority of another bill to come before the house, namely, Bill C-157.

Although under this law the farmer or plaintiff has no right of appeal; neither may the minister appeal the decision of the assessor. As has been said over and over again, the assessor, under clause 11 of the bill must be a person designated from the Exchequer Court of Canada or the superior courts of the provinces.

In arguing points of principle the hon. member for Kent-Essex tried to argue both sides of the case and he seemed to take contradictory positions. For example, he argued that there should be sufficient flexibility within the provisions of this bill to permit the Department of Agriculture and all assessors to deal fairly and justly with cases. Then he argued that there should be far more specific matters written into the bill. That would take away from the flexibility he was advocating two minutes earlier. I agree with him that in this departure in our law we need flexibility. We will need flexibility on the basis of experience to bring in amendments to the regulations if the regulations are insufficient to provide justice. Above all, the provisions of the bill must be flexible.

The hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier) at one point talked of animal carcasses which had been condemned because they contained residues of pesticides. I agree that compensation would be paid under the provisions of this bill. I must apologize for interrupting him, since at the specific moment I rose on the point of order he was talking about maximums that were to be raised or increased with respect to compensation to be paid on any one animal. That matter is dealt with in Bill C-156. We intend to prescribe these maximums by order in council instead of having them fixed, as they are now, in the statute.

I agree with the hon. member for Bruce (Mr. Whicher). He said that this is the first time a farmer has had the right to appeal. To give him that right was one of the major purposes in bringing forward this legislation.

The hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale) referred to clause 13(3). He pointed out that the decision of the assessor on any appeal brought pursuant to that part of the bill is final and conclusive. The hon. member for Edmonton West, (Mr. Lambert), the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) and others made a great deal of to-do about this subclause. That subclause has not been introduced for the purpose of denying anyone any fundamental right. What must be borne in mind is that before a farmer can in fact make an application for compensation his product must have been condemned under the Food and Drugs Act by an inspector working for the requisite department. It seems to me it is easier and better for a farmer to bring an appeal to an assessor and to have that appeal final, because all the procedures involved will be less expensive, I suggest, and simpler for the farmer to proceed under. The contention that has been made that here we have a case of the government fully protecting itself in the matter of an appeal and leaving the onus on the farmer in all cases is just not credible. That is because the limited purposes of the act are to provide an authority which will enable compensation to be paid to farmers whose produce has been condemned.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Well, that is what the minister says.

Mr. Olson: I see the hon. member for Edmonton West raises an objection. I suppose one could go through an act and pick out methodically those sections that are inserted to make sure that public funds are adequately protected, or that any department of government will spend public moneys in a certain way. Under this legislation it is necessary for us to know that, within reason, necessary action is being taken and that a matter will be referred to assessors who, as has been pointed out a dozen times today, will be competent to listen to evidence and judge whether the minister's decision with respect to the amount of compensation is fair or not fair.

Mr. Dinsdale: Would the minister permit a question? Why does he insist that the bill shall exclude the right of appeal to the courts, on the ground particularly that such a right would involve great expense for farmers? In most cases that right would not be used frivolously. Why does the minister not leave the door of final appeal to the courts open to the farmer?

Mr. Olson: The matter works both ways. The department or the minister cannot appeal from the assessor.

Mr. Dinsdale: But what about the individual? What about his rights?

Mr. Olson: We take the position that at some point the decision should be final. That point is spelled out in clause 13(3).

Mr. Dinsdale: That is what we are complaining about. This is the just society.

Mr. Olson: The hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Harding) referred to colts in his constituency that were affected and wondered whether the problem is being looked into. The entire matter involves the co-ordination of activities of several departments of government which are responsible for pollution and contamination. We are working on that problem with others who are involved. At present there does not seem to be any hazard to human health. The matter the hon. member raised does not come under this legislation in any case because what he referred to is not produce that has been condemned for sale. Therefore there can be no compensation under the provisions of this bill.

The hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) had a good deal to say about certain legal aspects of the bill and I do not want to argue with him on the finer legal points. He said that the members of his party would like to find ways to compliment the government for bringing in good legislation. He went on to say that they could not find many such opportunities. I hope he is not suffering from some kind of narrow or tunnel vision, because there have certainly been a great number of opportunities during the session to compliment the government. If he is unable to recognize those opportunities, that is his problem and not mine.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Name two.

Mr. Olson: The hon. member also raised the matter of the technical competence of personnel in determining whether a farmer has taken every possible action to reduce his amount of loss. It is fair to suggest to him that if we set up another route of appeal to determine whether pesticides in fact were present, or how they got where they are, it would be tantamount to setting up another technical committee to do exactly the same kind of work that will have been done by technicians in the Department of Agriculture and many other competent people in this field who have been called upon to examine the situation. With regard to the assignment to the minister of the farmer's right to sue the manufacturer, I cannot agree with him in that respect. That was included in order to make payment sooner than if we were to wait for the farmer himself to exhaust all of the possibilities of reducing the loss or indeed taking action which may be the responsibility of others.

[Mr. Dinsdale.]

I would also advise hon. members that we do conduct a co-ordinated attack in conjunction with the Food and Drug Directorate, the Department of Agriculture and provincial authorities in order to solve problems of pullution and contamination. At this stage we do not feel that a set procedure would be applicable as pollution and contamination may vary greatly. For the information of hon. members there is also an interdepartmental committee on pesticides whose main function is co-ordination of effort.

I do not intend to go very much further, Mr. Speaker. I am giving this explanation because all of the clauses in the bill were discussed in the standing committee. I would like to say to the hon. member for Edmonton West that in so far as the right of inspectors to enter premises to take samples is concerned there is no right under this act for an inspector to do so unless a farmer applies for compensation. The inspector then has this right because this bill deals with compensation.

He also mentioned the publishing of regulations. He said he has asked 20 or 30 times during the course of several other debates that it be mandatory for the government to publish regulations. This is a matter to be taken up with other departments. The Regulations Act requires publication in the Canada Gazette of any regulation affecting the rights and duties of a citizen and the penalties they may incur. If the hon. member has any argument with that interpretation I suggest he take it up with the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner).

The regulations under this act will be published. It is necessary to have sufficient authority under the act. When public funds are being used it is necessary that all reasonable action be taken so that there will not be fraudulent practices. Public interest in the national treasury must be properly protected.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): May I ask the minister a question at this point? I have not the right to speak a second time. Under clause 7 there is no restriction that the inspection must be limited to the land of the farmer who applies for compensation. The inspector may move into adjoining land or other premises. To that extent I say this goes farther than the power of the police under the Narcotics Act.

Mr. Olson: That, Mr. Speaker, is not the intention of the government. I do not want to argue with the legal competence of my hon. friend in this respect. There is no intention that it shall be used indiscriminately or to abuse any citizen. With the exception of this bill, no citizen of Canada has any right to compensation for a product withheld from the market due to pesticide residue under the Food and Drugs Act. This bill at least provides the authority to the department to pay.

The hon. member for Peace River dealt with the fact that the farmer is obliged to reduce the loss occasioned to him to whatever extent possible and to pursue any action he may have in law against the manufacturer or any other person. It may be necessary for the farmer to wash, trim or sort farm products in order to reduce his loss. That is why this provision is included in this bill. We must be satisfied that the farmer has done everything within reason to keep the loss as low as possible.

I repeat what I said at the outset, Mr. Speaker, that this bill is a step forward in providing authority to the Minister of Agriculture to pay compensation out of the public treasury to a farmer who has had his products condemned or withheld from sale by another department in pursuit of their activities to reduce the human health hazard. There is a right to appeal decisions that have been made. That has not been provided in any other act previously. We have taken a long step forward to provide a higher measure of justice to a farmer who has had his product withheld from sale through no fault of his own.

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): I had not originally intended to enter this debate, Mr. Speaker, until I read the curious provisions in part II of this measure dealing with compensation appeals. I suggest to the minister that they be scrapped and provision made for an appeal to an Exchequer Court judge or Supreme or Superior Court judge. Many people in this country feel that judges should not be subjected to criticism because of outside duties. However, by calling them assessors in this case this criticism would be justified. A farmer should have the right to carry his grievance as high as possible. The provisions regarding compensation appeals cover everything in regard to the appointing of assessors with the exception of saying that the judge concerned shall wear overalls under his judicial robes to make the farmer feel at home when he appears before an assessment tribunal.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the house that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: The hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Matte)—Post Office—inquiry as to closing of post offices; the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather)—Principle of accessibility of reports and studies undertaken for the government by outside professional groups; the hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. Saltsman)—Veterans Affairs—Feasibility study of guaranteed annual income.

It being five o'clock the house will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, notices of motions, public bills.

NOTICES OF MOTIONS

EXPROPRIATION ACT

SUGGESTED PROVISION OF GREATER PROTECTION FOR CITIZENS

On the order:

Mr. Thompson (Red Deer)—That, in the opinion of this house, the government should give consideration to amending the provisions of the Expropriation Act (R.S.C. 1952, c. 106) with a view to giving greater protection to citizens against arbitrary interference with their property rights by departments of the federal government, and to the establishment of more suitable procedures for the transfer of title and possession of land expropriated under the authority of this act.

Mr. G. W. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the hon. member for Red Deer I have been asked to speak to this notice of motion and to ask that it be withdrawn from the order paper in view of the fact that a similar motion was debated last fall and also because of the announced intention of the Minister of Justice to introduce a new expropriation law in the near future.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Order discharged and motion withdrawn.

SUGGESTED REFERENCE OF SUBJECT TO STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants) moved:

That the question of housing in Canada, including public housing, expropriation practices affecting older homes, financing of home building, the drawing up of a national code of minimum housing standards, and transport services for residential areas, be referred to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs, in order that the said committee may consider and report upon all aspects of national housing policies and their administration.

He said: Mr. Speaker, there is considerable interest in the housing problems of this country. There are several reasons for this. One is that the problems have certainly not disappeared and possibly have become aggravated since we met here for the opening of parliament in September last year. Second, the Minister of Transport (Mr. Hellyer) has placed a public document before us which, while contentious in certain aspects, is certainly written in a refreshing kind of English and tends to present the problems rather well.

I wish to deal with particular aspects of my motion, and I shall try to get through my contribution as quickly as possible so that other hon. members may have an opportunity to take part in the debate. Furthermore, since the Minister of Transport has promised legislation within a short while it will not particularly grieve me if my motion is talked out or even if it is defeated. In any event it provides a useful vehicle for the next 57 minutes or so to have a go at housing problems.

One great deficiency in the report of the task force on housing concerns the problems of those in the lower income brackets. The report is very weak in this area. To compound the weakness, the minister has frozen public housing programs until new measures can be introduced, and so what is a bad problem can only become worse. During the debate we had on housing on November 12 last I pointed out some of the problems relating to the need for housing of those with low incomes. As recorded at page 2661 of Hansard for that date I quoted G. Roland Hennessy, Assistant Executive Director of the Federation of Catholic Charities in Montreal, as saying that in 1946 27 per cent of the population of Montreal was destitute and in 1966 the count was 33.3 per cent.

Mr. Hennessy said today 38 per cent live in "poverty, privation and misery" and 50 per cent suffer unbearable financial hardships.

[Mr. Deputy Speaker.]

The minister's freeze on public housing will be no solace to the people of Montreal who are in that plight.

With respect to the great city of Toronto Robert B. Bradley of the Young Men's Christian Association has written:

In metro Toronto we have a waiting list of approximately 13,340 bona fide applications representing some 26,000 children desperately in need of instant housing they can afford.

From the other great metropolis of Canada we have another staggering statistic pointing to the need for action and, as we know, Toronto is the only city in Canada that has made fairly substantial use of National Housing Act policies and national funds to do something about the plight of the poor. Therefore I think the minister's freeze is a great error and is not calculated to give assurance to those who need better housing in the so-called just society.

My motion also refers to the need for drawing up a national code of minimum housing standards. Here I borrow from the example of my own city of Halifax where ordinance 50 has been in effect since 1958, dealing with minimum standards for housing accommodation. Just before coming to the chamber to take part in this debate I called Bill Clancy, the information officer for the city of Halifax. He in turn contacted G. B. Jefferson, the building inspector, and they have provided me with information which I think will be of interest to hon. members.

In the years between 1961 and 1968 there were 2,909 violations under ordinance 50 where the city building inspector required that repairs be done. All these were carried out with the exception of 173 cases where the homeowners had to be taken to court before they would repair their property. The ordinance is a pretty wide, encompassing one. It deals with light, plumbing, room space, outlets, stoves and ranges and that sort of thing. I am told by Mr. Clancy that of the 2,909 violations where repairs were ordered they were mostly structural repairs.

The reason I dwell at some length on the need for minimum standards is fairly obvious. We cannot go out holus-bolus, level all the old housing stock in Canada and then expect everyone to have a roof over his or her head. A minimum housing standard is one of the ways to ensure that even older homes are kept up to a reasonable standard so that the need for housing does not become worse. I know that this has worked reasonably well in my own city even though Halifax, like other places, also has a housing shortage.

Some of the points about ordinance 50 may be of interest to hon. members. When the inspector of buildings determines that there are reasonable grounds to conclude that there has been a violation of the provisions of the ordinance he gives written notice to the owner or occupant of the building concerned requiring certain action to be carried out within 180 days, and if they do not do it then court action follows. Perhaps members would be interested in one particular section of the ordinance. I will put section 4 on the record:

The owner of every dwelling shall maintain the same and every part thereof in a state of good repair. For the purposes of this section "a state of good repair" shall mean:

1. That the roof is so maintained as not to leak and all water from the roof is drained and conveyed therefrom so as not to cause wet floors, walls or ceilings or to cause a nuisance to adjacent buildings, or not to overflow upon abutting or adjoining property.

2. That all walls, foundations, basements, cellars, steps, floors, ceilings, stairways, stairwells and railings are maintained in a good and safe condition to the satisfaction of the inspector of buildings.

3 That the exterior is maintained in a clean and tidy state to the satisfaction of the inspector of buildings.

So I suggest that from one standpoint at least the setting of minimum standards for buildings is one useful step that could be undertaken. I realize that our parliamentary jurisdiction in this field is probably limited, but at least through our great Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation we can work with the municipalities in an effort to bring about improvement in housing by encouraging the use of such ordinances.

Another point I should like to make concerns the cost of homes. I believe we have been deficient, federally speaking, in not taking advantage of research to bring about new techniques in mass production or other modern methods in an effort to bring down the cost of housing. We know that incredible steps were taken in research by the United States and Russian space teams in respect of insulating the ships they have hurled into outer space so that the very cold temperatures on the outside would not affect the constant temperature on the inside. Someone told me it is possible to insulate so that a cup of coffee can be kept at about the same temperature for 500 years. If we are capable of that kind of research and that kind of product we should be able to come up with equally good answers in respect of lowering the cost of housing for the citizens of Canada.

The removal of the sales tax is old hat so far as reducing the cost of homes is concerned but yet is an important element.

I should like to dwell for a moment on mortgage interest rates. The figures are incredible when one looks at the cost of carrying a mortgage. I have taken the example of a $20,000 mortgage and have looked at it from the standpoint of a 20-year payment period and a 35-year payment period. I arrived at both the monthly rate at 6 per cent and at 9½ per cent and the total amount paid. Let us take first of all a 20-year mortgage in the amount of $20,000. At 6 per cent the monthly payment is $142.44 or a total payment, including principal and interest, over the 20 years of $34,185.60. In other words, the principal payment is $20,000 and the interest payment is $14,185.60. But at today's interest rate of around 9½ per cent on a $20,000 mortgage for a 20-year period the monthly payment would be $184.05, the total payment would be $44,172, the repayment of principal would be $20,000 and the interest payment would be $24,174.

I now move to a 35-year period because of the flirtation of the task force led by the Minister of Transport with a long-term mortgage of that type. For a period of 35 years the monthly payment at a rate of interest of 6 per cent is $113.06. The total repaid over the 35-year period, assuming one lives that long, would be $47,485.20. In other words, $20,000 would be paid in principal and $27,485.20 would be paid in interest. All those payments were at the 6 per cent level. It has been some time since a home owner in this country could finance a home at 6 per cent. Let us see what happens when the interest is 9½ per cent. On a $20,000 mortgage paid back at 9½ per cent interest over a period of 35 years the monthly payment is $161.57. The total payment would be $67,859.40. In other words, $20,000 would be paid back in principal and $47,859.40 would be paid in interest.

This type of financing, this type of burden, is really at the heart of some of the recommendations in the task force report. We in this parliament cannot blind ourselves to the need of coming to grips somehow with the problem of high interest rates. I have one suggestion in this field which might at the same time solve the problem of the interest rate and the problem faced by superannuated civil servants. I believe that the government now pays 4 per cent on the money it borrows from the superannuation fund. If it paid 6 per cent or 7 per cent there would be sufficient money to pay more to the superannuated civil servants and the government could provide money for housing at a cheaper interest rate. That may seem like a very simple solution but I believe it at least merits some consideration by the members of the House of Commons.

There is a final point in respect of urban transportation with which I should like to deal, but I said I would keep well within my allotted time and therefore I shall thank the house for its consideration and listen with interest to the views of other hon. members.

Mr. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, I congratulate the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave) for placing before us a motion of a heterogeneous nature which really affects half a dozen standing committees of this house in its implications. It deals with responsibilities related to three levels of government and perhaps even four if one considers transportation in an urban centre such as metro Montreal or metro Toronto. In view of the shortness of the period in which this matter has been brought up for debate I apologize to hon. members for a rather sketchy and unprepared presentation on a subject which could really be headed: Problems affecting at present over 70 per cent of Canadians and by 1980 well over 80 per cent.

A number of provincial and municipal laws are involved in this motion. Even the most simple of the topics touched upon in this motion, that relating to the building code, is of no easy and ready solution if analysed in more detail. A minimum national standard code on a national basis is of course a desirable thing provided the framework or structure of a remote region is not used for determining the evaluating standards in a city. In other words, a national code which would settle for the lowest common denominator certainly would not go a long way in meeting the question before us. I believe it should be a code which would take into consideration, for instance, the number of fires which take place in dwellings in rural areas and which would permit the municipalities who wish to do so to enforce higher standards in the light of their experience and local requirements. Within that compass a national code would make considerable sense, but the question of enforcement would have to be met.

[Mr. McCleave.]

A question might be asked concerning whether the municipalities would be prepared to spend the money necessary to hire inspectors at their respective salaries. As an example I might mention that in the city I come from there are 50 housing inspectors employed to maintain what is considered to be a sound housing standard. This is a considerable expense which is paid for by the citizens in that area. Therefore I am saying that one can, of course, advocate national codes but these various factors must be kept in mind. I ask, what will be the minimum common denominator? Will the municipalities be willing and in a position to accept the additional burden? There are solutions to these problems, of course, and policies which can be implemented to reach this goal, but they are probably long-range policies.

• (5:20 p.m.)

Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation could insist, which it has not in the past, that before granting loans for urban renewal, sewers and other projects the municipality making the application must apply those standards which conform to whatever the federal government has laid down in a national code. There are, therefore, ways of implementing this policy at the federal level.

When it comes to the question of granting loans to applicants throughout the country, probably the best way to do it would be to introductive incentives through the loan arrangements of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. There are many solutions to the problem. In the long run I would be inclined to think that such a policy would produce satisfactory results. Of course, Mr. Speaker, this is just one of many ways to approach the problem.

I am giving these examples only to outline the complexity of the matter and to illustrate how the various levels of government and decision-making in other places are affected. A national code such as is raised in this motion is perhaps the least difficult of all measures to administer. The most difficult, I suggest, is the question of housing. This is a most bedevilling and complex issue when contrasted with the one I have been discussing.

When thinking about the problem, how to plan for the future and how to proceed in order to meet requests in the field of housing, I cannot help arriving at the conclusion that priorities being what they are, resources being what they are, and considering the trend established in the past, there will have to be a point, which we hope will be reached in the very near future, when a national housing policy must very strongly favour those Canadians who have limited earnings, let us say up to $5,000 a year. I think we will have to first meet the demand from this sector of the Canadian public.

Let us consider the figures made available by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics. The figure of 170,000 dwelling units a year reflects, in the vast majority of cases, housing for middle and higher income groups. My understanding is that in any given year perhaps only 2 per cent of the total number of dwelling units represents public housing. Therefore if we continue a policy of housing centring around 170,000 or 200,000 dwelling units a year, such a policy will continue to meet the demand of those who by and large, with sacrifice of course, can afford the down payment and the further payments required to buy a home. But it will not meet the demand of those on limited incomes.

I should like to give the house an example. In metropolitan Toronto alone there are over 13,000 people on the waiting list for public housing. These people are waiting for the type of house they can afford. They cannot afford those on the market at the present time. This list consists of a variety of segments of the population, amongst whom are a great many mothers who are the breadwinners for their families. This figure of 13,000 is a considerable one and is the cause of grave concern.

While the policy of providing public housing through Central Mortgage and Housing, the provincial agency which derives funds from it, and the municipal government, has been as active as it could be, as the years go by the problem does not seem to resolve itself and in fact seems to be getting ahead of us. Therefore it commands enormous attention. In addition there is the question of large urban centres. Here I am speaking of the larger Canadian city in which every year a larger or smaller number of migrants and immigrants settle, depending upon the conditions which exist at the time. The nature of migration and immigration is such that in the vast majority of cases these people have limited reserves and funds and are usually searching for employment. They are people for whom I think our society has to make provision, at least in the initial stage, for adequate housing upon settlement. In the larger cities this is becoming a real problem.

With regard to housing as defined briefly here by the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave), one cannot of course ignore the question of urban renewal, its implications, and everything that has been written on the subject in recent times. I urge the Minister of Transport (Mr. Hellyer) to continue to strengthen the policy of urban renewal because we have learned techniques, through experience in the past, which are extremely useful.

Perhaps one might be prone to condemn what has been done so far in certain areas, but in the final analysis one has to say that if errors have been made, it is these which have helped us to arrive at certain conclusions this year. It was necessary and indispensible for us to have had this experience. Therefore, urban renewal as we have seen it in Canada so far has had a highly desirable effect. It was the best possible policy available to those interested in housing in the light of the historic experience in this country, and it was the best possible way of resolving the problem in an urban centre. Certainly, there are ways of improving upon that policy. This is the approach to take. I do not think the answer lies in the dispersal of public housing in the community. It lies probably in a combination of approaches because what has been done in the past has proven to be useful and the new ideas which have emerged could also prove extremely useful to Canadians today and to future generations.

Inadvertently one shifts back and forth, as I have been doing, touching upon urban renewal and public housing because there is a tendency to mix the two. Urban renewal sometimes includes public housing, sometimes it does not. Urban renewal has brought about new houses in areas where public housing was needed, and therefore the two are not always synonymous. What I am saying in essence is that it is desirable to continue our urban renewal policies because the planners in our cities, such as Hamilton, Toronto, Montreal or other large centers, are now in a position to submit plans and make proposals which reflect refinements and techniques which are the result of past experience. There is a certain sophistication in Canadian urban renewal techniques of which we can be extremely proud. We can only be proud of them because we have learned from our experience in our cities through the years. This is the attitude we should take in order to build upon the achievements of the past.

It is with these thoughts in mind that I would urge the minister to continue the urban renewal policies, with the innovations required, and to give all possible financial and other assistance to the public housing endeavours in our major Canadian centres. These endeavours should be encouraged and stimulated because public housing is in the greatest demand. I am inclined to think that the trend toward greater demand for public housing will not diminish. I think it will increase through the years for a number of sociological reasons which are, perhaps, beyond the scope of this particular motion. The motion involves a number of provincial acts. For instance, if one were to consider Ontario, there is a provincial act which has implications both for housing and for transportation in a metropolis. I am referring here to the assessment act, as it is known in Ontario. This act as presently drafted could be termed a rurally oriented assessment act for a number of reasons. At present it penalizes the home owner who endeavours to improve the quality of his house. Except for a coat of paint, anything that a property owner in Ontario does to his house makes him liable to reassessment and to an increase in taxes. How can one expect the maintenance of quality houses or the improvement of the stock of housing available in any community in this province if the initiative of the individual owner is stifled in this manner? It is a form of what I may call private enterprise urban renewal which should be actively encouraged. By that I mean the encouragement of the initiative of the individual owner who tries to improve his house. Such measures will, I am sure, discourage future urban renewal projects unless the respective provincial acts are reviewed and changed in the light of the needs of our large cities. The assessment act is a typical example.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo): In rising to support the motion of the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave), I would like to make a point about the importance of the examination of some of the recommendations that have come to us regarding housing. I think it is most important that this matter be referred to the committee and that we have the benefit of the views of people with wide municipal experience such as, the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia), and the hon. member for York West (Mr. Givens). I think when members who have had this type of experience have examined the report of the task force they will find the report wanting.

I find it difficult to understand how someone like the Minister of Transport (Mr. Hellyer), who is obviously looking for a place in history, was able to come in with such as "nothing" report. As a matter of fact, it is a very damaging report to the future of housing in this country. Perhaps, this is not the way the minister feels. Perhaps he feels that he has accomplished a great deal with his task force. However, I for one cannot avoid the feeling that he started out with a preconceived notion and ended up with a preconceived notion; that the dialogue was just a facade and in many ways a fooling of the public who participated. Had he started out with an open mind, had he truly consulted people with experience in this field, and had he been willing to listen, his report undoubtedly would have been different. He seems to be doing everything the wrong way and taking all the wrong attitudes.

First of all, let us look at the question of mortgage money. Apparently, the minister's solution is for the government not to raise funds but to throw the whole responsibility for the availability of funds on the shoulders of the private lenders, even to the extent of reducing whatever protection exists in the interest rate at the moment. I suggest that such a proposition would be disastrous to the future of housing in this country and would remove the only lever that the federal government has for ensuring that its responsibilities for housing can be discharged. This is the only instrument at the minister's disposal for making some of the changes that he wants to make. Let us consider one of the changes that he has discussed, namely the question of a national building code.

It is obvious that the multiplicity of building codes across Canada has frustrated the best efforts of people who are trying to cope with the housing shortage. Something has to be done in terms of land use, construction costs and all the other things which come under a building code. How can the minister gain acceptance of a standard building code applicable across this country, having regard to the special difficulty of doing so under our federal constitution? I suggest there is one way in which we could do this. Instead of directing responsibility for raising mortgage money back to the private institutions, as he seems to be doing, he might step up the government's program to attract money to the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation under the N.H.A. In other words, he would have the opportunity of saying, in effect: We shall not make N.H.A. money available in any area which does not conform to a national code.

This is the one way open to him if he wants to break through the multiplicity of nonsense codes which presently exist across the country. If the minister does not know why these codes have come into being, somebody should tell him. They exist, not because the municipalities do not want a national code or because they do not recognize the logic of establishing such a code. They exist with certain objectives in mind. Some of them are perverse. They were created deliberately to ensure that certain kinds of housing activity do not take place. Unless the minister is prepared to break down this determination on the part of some municipalities to restrict the type of housing built in their areas, his whole effort will come to nothing and the desire to establish a national building code is bound to be frustrated. Of course, everyone who has been associated with municipal work knows how heavy are the burdens imposed. One can even understand why municipalities have gone to the extent of creating codes almost impossible to comply with. Some municipalities around Toronto insist, for example, that only houses costing more than a certain sum can be built.

The reason is obvious. They want to strike a balance between revenue from industrial, commercial and residential assessments. A municipality which fails to do this finds itself in grave difficulties. Most municipalities count on revenue from industrial and commercial assessments to help them underwrite the cost of residential construction. A municipality which gives no consideration to these questions may easily find itself a bedroom town. The revenue from industrial and commercial assessments goes elsewhere, and it is left with the burden of providing schools, social services, sanitation and so on for its resident population. The minister should be prepared to deal with this situation, not by bludgeoning the municipalities but by offering alternatives to the present system.

This is one suggestion which I should like to offer, one which could perhaps be placed before a committee for examination. A way has to be found of collecting at least some of the revenue from commercial and industrial assessments at the federal level. It could then be redistributed across this country on a more equitable basis. This would make it possible to get to the root of some of the difficulties faced by parts of this nation.

It is obvious that difficulties arise when all the industries are in one place and all the houses are somewhere else. Then again, there are depressed areas which nevertheless have to bear the cost of education and social services for a population a considerable part of which will ultimately choose to leave the area to seek employment elsewhere. Plainly, the federal government lacks the power to collect industrial and commercial assessments as is done presently by the provinces. But it could be done in a different way. It could be done through a special tax on corporations, the proceeds from which would be redistributed across the country. The argument might be advanced that the provinces would not be amenable to such a suggestion. Mr. Speaker, in Canada as a whole there is one province which has a special concern about its culture and its language. That province might find it difficult to accept such a proposition as I have advanced.

By and large, however, I believe the English speaking provinces would be willing to listen to a proposal of this kind, as they have in the past been ready to listen to propositions relating to federal aid to particular areas. There does not seem to be much difficulty as far as English speaking Canada is concerned. To my mind, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) does a disservice in this regard when he says that every province must be treated in the same way. In doing so, he is refusing to recognize that every province is not exactly the same as the others. Each has its own difficulties, its own hang-ups, if you like.

These are approaches which should be explored. I am not suggesting that the proposal just outlined is the only answer. I am not even sure the provinces would accept an answer of that kind. What I am suggesting is that these ideas should go to a committee where they could be aired and discussed by hon. members experienced in municipal affairs who would also give us the benefit of their own ideas and get us on the road to making good the shortage of public housing in Canada.

My feeling about the approach taken by the Minister of Transport is that it is not useful in the least. I am surprised, for instance, that the government has neglected to avail itself of the services of the hon. member for York West (Mr. Givens), a former mayor of the City of Toronto. I can remember that a couple of years ago the hon. member for York West, out of his long experience of municipal government, made a suggestion that urban transportation might be provided free of charge. There was not much of a response to this idea, yet I think it was a very good one. Ideas like that should be discussed. We tend to subsidize almost every kind of transportation except urban transportation. The number of cars crowding our highways create a vast handicap in the development of our society, yet we constantly look the other way. And when suggestions such as that put forward by a former mayor of Toronto are advanced they are largely ignored; it is even difficult to find a forum in which they can be adequately discussed.

I cannot understand why the Minister of Transport should have taken such a short-sighted position with regard to the raising of mortgage money. No one is asking that the government be given special advantages in connection with the raising of mortgage monies to be lent out again to the people, but surely we should not say that the government ought to be placed at a disadvantage, as the minister appears to be doing. After all, if the trust companies and the banks can go out and borrow from the public why should the government not be able to do so? Why should it be less worthy of this kind of trust than are the financial institutions of this nation?

There are some advantages in a government going to the money market. First of all, governments are usually able to borrow funds at a lower rate of interest because of public confidence. Secondly, their mark-up would be less than that of present financial institutions. Thirdly, by having access to these funds they could set the conditions under which the funds are lent.

The hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia) made what I thought was an excellent observation. He pointed out that at the moment much of the money that is being lent by private mortgage companies goes for high priced housing, that almost none of it goes for low cost housing. Anybody who argues that the federal government should not be able to make such vast sums of money available because it might lay down conditions, should ask himself why people are prepared to accept the conditions laid down by private lenders. Do they think that they are more trustworthy than their own government, or more intelligent than the elected representatives of the people? In those areas in which the government has become involved in housing it has at least started to act in the public interest in a way that the private lenders either will not or are not able to act.

Therefore, I think that if the minister gives up this opportunity to assemble funds to be used under the direction of the government, he really gives up the opportunity, first of all, to influence the direction of housing in this country and therefore dooms his own proposals. Secondly, he gives up the right that I think the government has of making some value judgments about which groups in our society need the most help at any given time.

Another point that should be examined is mobility. The Minister of Transport has made a virtual fetish of home ownership. He has consigned all those who rent to the status of second class citizens with his snide little comment about vertical filing boxes, as though anybody who lived in an apartment was to be frowned upon, as though there were something wrong with somebody who did not own his own house or piece of land. How shortsighted can this minister be! In light of the evidence today one cannot help but realize we are living in an increasingly mobile society, one which will become not less mobile but more mobile. Rigid home ownership for many of our people is an inhibition to this mobility. If there is any single thing in this country preventing movement of workers from depressed areas to areas that offer more opportunity it is the emphasis that is placed on home ownership. These people are locked in, as though somebody had put them behind bars.

In his report, the minister referred to the high cost of transfer fees, legal fees and realty fees. Often the transfer fees exceed the capital increase in the property. The high cost of fees seriously interferes wih people moving from one area to another or from one kind of residence to another.

There is another kind of mobility. For example, why should a person live in one house all his life? Surely, the needs of the young married couple are altogether different from the needs of the family of five or six. Surely, those needs change again when the children grow up and leave the homes of their parents. Needs change throughout one's life. Therefore, why retard economic mobility, and also this social mobility that is so obviously required? For this reason I find it very difficult to understand the kind of propositions that are put forth in the report of the task force, and this is why I believe the house should unanimously approve the resolution that has been introduced by the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave) as a worth-while contribution to the examination of housing problems in Canada.

Mr. Barney Danson (York North): Mr. Speaker, it appears I have very little time in which to deal with a subject that is of considerable interest to all of us. However, I think those of us who have spoken can all be grateful for the opportunity to talk about urban problems. I wish to compliment the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave) for introducing this subject. He has shown his usual consideration and thoughtfulness by recognizing that the report of the task force has been submitted and that it contains many recommendations of merit.

The hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. Saltsman) made some severe criitcisms of the minister. I concede that one can look at the report and find much missing or reasons to be discouraged because we have not moved sufficiently fast. But let us bear in mind what has happened. I think we are very fortunate indeed to have a report of this kind before the members of the house and the people of this country at this time. Considering the very limited period of time the task force was at work, I think it has come up with a fairly comprehensive document that is authoritative. Many people say there is nothing new in it, but I say there are many things that are new as well as many things that we knew before. The report is comprehensive and, coming from such a group, it is also authoritative. We are fortunate that the study was not given to a royal commission because it might have dragged on for years.

As the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants properly pointed out, the report does fall short in certain areas, particularly that relating to public housing. This is true also of student housing, but perhaps properly so. The intention when the task force began its work was to bring in a report containing recommendations that could be implemented in time for the 1970 building season. I feel it is an amazing feat to have the report at this time. There are many things particularly good about it. First, it sets the proper climate; it establishes the proper priorities and challenges the private sector to do its job; and it sets a target of a minimum of one million homes in five years.

In the limited time at my disposal, I will deal with but one point in detail, namely, financing. If I may be so bold, I should like to refer to my own submission to the task force which deals with mortgage funds. I will not quote it verbatim. I suggested an infusion of large amounts of money that are now in low yield investments into the mortgage market. I am talking particularly of funds that belong to the older people in our society, who have been through the depression and who guard their money very jealously, and rightly so. I can understand their concern about this. Their money is deposited in trust companies or banks where they make a 4 per cent return. If they were to make 5 per cent they would become nervous; they would think it unsafe and would rather bury it in the ground than take a chance.

I suggest, in keeping with some of the recommendations of the report, that a crown corporation be established to channel these funds, along with perhaps funds from the superannuation fund of the federal government about which the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) speaks, into the mortgage market. The need to give these people a much better return on their investment and a much better pension is one of the priorities that we must face in this house.

The fact is that when we guarantee this money to private lenders, mortgage companies, trust companies, insurance companies and so on, we should be able to guarantee the investments of our most senior and beloved citizens. According to estimates I have made, there are probably 100,000 elderly people in Canada with $10,000 tucked away. This would realize $1 billion, sufficient to provide 50,000 $20,000 mortgages. It might also be reasonable to assume that there are 10,000 people with $50,000 tucked away, and this would produce another half a billion dollars. Perhaps we have enough there for 75,000 mortgages of $20,000. If all the complaints we have heard about the estate tax are valid it would appear that another 10,000 people each have $100,000 tucked way. That makes another $1 billion. There is enough money put away in safe investments to provide 125,000 mortgages of $20,000. Perhaps we could bring this money into the mortgage market, guarantee its safety, and use it as leverage. It could be introduced into the market at a point or two below the current mortgage rate. To compensate those bringing the money forward, the profit on this money could be made deductible from taxes. Perhaps qualifying provisions permitting the deduction of such profits from taxes could be made similar to the provision contained in the old age security legislation which spells out those who are eligible to take advantage of certain parts of that legislation.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hour for the consideration of private members' business having expired, I do now leave the chair, to resume it at 8 p.m.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

AGRICULTURE

COMPENSATION FOR CONTAMINATION BY PESTICIDE RESIDUE

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Olson for the third reading of Bill C-155, to provide compensation to farmers whose agricultural products are contaminated by pesticide residue, and to provide for appeals from compensation awards.

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, at the moment before five o'clock I was making a speech on a bill to provide compensation to farmers whose agricultural products are contaminated by pesticide residue and to provide for appeals from compensation awards. A short fraction of time later I was speaking on a housing resolution I had placed on the order paper some time ago. Since then we have all been treated to a series of slides by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Hellyer) in charge of housing. If I spoke about them I would be out of order. I will return to the business of pesticide compensation.

I wish to make as succinctly as I can two points regarding this bill because several other bills hinge upon the provision that we are being asked to enact in this particular measure. First, with regard to the compensation appeal, I object to the suggestion that judges of the Exchequer Court of Canada, the Superior or Supreme court of the provinces, be appointed assessors under this particular measure. Before stopping at five o'clock, I stated I presumed it was the intention of the minister to ask these judges to garb themselves in overalls under their judicial robes so they would appeal more to the people appearing before them, the farmers of Canada. I object to the principle enshrined in part two of this bill. As a lawyer, I feel this is a wrong principle. I think when judges of the court are asked to stray outside their jurisdiction and assume other titles, such as commissioner or royal commissioner, this makes it difficult for themselves and their courts.

Any farmer in Canada seeking compensation for damage from pesticides would be much happier if he could appeal from the Minister of Agriculture and the departmental officials to a court rather than appeal to somebody called an assessor. I suggest he would much rather hear the words "Here come de judge" rather than "Here comes the assessor".

Looking through this portion of the bill which brings me to my feet, I am confirmed in my decision to resist it. I shall argue as eloquently as I can with the minister and the government that this particular portion be changed and that other acts be changed as well. Other acts hinge on what we are being asked to pass now. It is wrong for the government to have the right to set a maximum amount of compensation for the farmer who suffered damage from pesticides. The farmer should be entitled to seek damages first from the minister, then if he is not satisfied, from an impartial authority. It is wrong to set a ceiling on compensation.

The minister would serve the purposes of the act and the farmers of Canada much better if he would agree to strike out most of part II covering the compensation appeal and substitute the words that the farmer would have a right to appeal on a question of law, a question of fact, or both. This would be an appeal to the Exchequer Court of Canada or provincial judges acting in their stead. In that way, the farmer would feel he had at least been given his day in court.

I must confess I had not studied the particular sections until today. I was horrified when I did study them. The minister should hearken to voices such as my own who regard this type of approach to the law of Canada as an anathema. According to clause 13, an appeal may be made to an assessor who may then refer the matter back to the minister for such further action as the assessor may direct. The assessor, who would be a judge of the Exchequer, Superior or Supreme Court, would become functus, his job would be discharged.

There is nothing to say that the minister must accept what the assessor has directed at that particular point. There is nothing to say, and in fact I think the law would point the other way, that the farmer if aggrieved in respect of what the minister did at that point could carry the case any further. Of course, this is a point in the law which any dozen lawyers could interpret in a dozen different ways; but I believe a lawyer would say, in looking at this, that the danger would be once the assessor had made up his mind, although the minister would be either free to accept or reject the recommendation, that the applicant had no further course for relief. This is the reason I say that the minister and the government, dedicated as they are to lip service to a just society, whatever that may be, should take a fresh look at this matter. Many other acts are involved in this. I hope that the minister and the government will decide that these many paragraphs should be replaced by a simply expressed right to appeal to a judge of the Exchequer Court of Canada, the Superior Court of Quebec or the supreme courts of the other provinces not only in respect of questions of law but also questions of fact. I hope the minister will harken to this appeal.

Mr. George Muir (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I think it is a good thing that the lawyers in this house are taking a look at the fine print in this bill. As a practical farmer, I find it is rather unfortunate that legislation of this kind, designed primarily to assist the farmer who through no fault of his own finds his product unsaleable because of pesticide residue, is so hemmed in whith details. The conditions laid down by the minister and the officials of his department will make it extremely difficult for the farmer to benefit from this legislation.

Mr. Olson: This bill is made for farmers, not lawyers.

Mr. Muir (Lisgar): Then, I think it should be in simpler terms because farm people like simple language. We like to have things spelled out and not left to regulations. The intent of the bill is good, but the denial to the farmers of the right to seek recourse from a decision of the minister, except by an assessor appointed by the minister whose decision is final, makes one wonder whether the whole intent of the bill is destroyed by its interference with the rights and privileges of a citizen to seek justice in a court of law.

Indeed, it does not seem to be simple justice that a farmer must explore almost every other avenue of compensation for crop loss before he can turn to the government for assistance. We might take, for example, a farmer who bought a farm in good faith from someone who obviously either had contaminated it himself or had allowed it to be contaminated by someone working for him before he sold it. Surely, in such a situation the minister would not expect the farmer to seek compensation from someone who has long since given up his interest in the property. This could cause years of anguish to the new owner by reason of prolonged court action. If the intent of the bill is to assist the farmer, would it not be in the best interests of the farmer and the general public that the farmer be assisted as much as possible? This would be especially true if the residue had been placed on his crop or on his land other than through his own negligence.

With these very brief words, may I conclude by saying I hope the minister will take a broader view of this legislation in order that it may be made not only workable but worth while.

Mr. Jack McIntosh (Swift Current-Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, I rise to take part in this debate particularly with regard to clause 13(3) wherein it is stated that the decision of the assessor on any appeal brought pursuant to this part is final and conclusive and not subject to appeal to or review by any court. I am quite sure this is not the minister's wording. The wording must have originated with the officials of the department. I am wondering why the minister, being a farmer, would have agreed to this wording. Under Canadian law there are very few acts in respect of which an appeal cannot be made to our courts. This is a principle of British justice to which the people of Canada are entitled. I understand there is one provision in connection with income tax which is contrary to the principles of British justice because according to it one is guilty before he goes to court and must prove his innocence. I do not think the minister wishes to impose such a provision upon the farmer. Therefore, I wonder why this provision is included in the bill.

There is another act with which I have been involved under which there is no right of appeal to the courts, although I believe there should be. I have in mind the Pension Act. We have courts to decide these questions. I question why the minister has included this clause in the bill, particularly when he has retained for himself under clause 5(2) the right to appeal to the courts where he deems it necessary. The minister may require, as a condition for the payment of any compensation to a farmer under this act, the consent of that farmer for the minister to pursue on his behalf any legal action against any manufacturer or persons referred to in paragraph (b) of subclause (1). I ask the minister whether he can explain to the farmers and the members of this house why he precludes the farmers from recourse to the courts while he wishes this right for himself. There is the provision in clause 15 to the effect that, subject to the approval of the Governor in Council, the assessor may make such rules respecting the conduct of appeals and the procedure for the bringing of appeals as he deems necessary to enable him to discharge his duties under this act.

If the assessor is to appoint the judges, then it is conceivable there could be 200 sets of rules because I am informed there are over 200 judges in the Dominion of Canada. In the event that one judge differs from another which opinion would be applicable? I am quite sure this situation does arise in a number of cases, otherwise there would not be the safeguards there are under our judicial system. A similar situation would exist if all members of this house or all members of one party could not agree. When we have British justice in our courts, why do the officials deny the farmers of Canada their rights? I think this is a very dangerous piece of legislation; it just adds to the other dangers we have. If the bill is passed, we will be shirking our responsibility as members and shifting the onus to somebody else. We will, in fact be passing the buck to somebody else.

• (8:20 p.m.)

I would like to say something about the qualifications of the assessors, Mr. Speaker. The minister says they will all be judges. I agree with the two hon. members who preceded me; I do not think this is a task that should be imposed upon the judges of Canada. I am quite sure that our legal organizations would frown upon this type of legislation which places Canada's judges in the position where they could be charged with being adherents of political patronage. I do not blame the present government, because it could happen if we were in government—which will not be very long.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Olson: You won't live that long.

Mr. McIntosh: It is quite easy to see that some hon. members opposite have not got their ears to the ground. I do not understand why the minister insists upon having part II included in the bill. The hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave) has already mentioned this point. It seems very devious to me that the minister will not give the farmers the right to appeal to the courts. The minister wants to retain this right unto himself. As I say, our judges will be put in a very bad position. Once a person is appointed to a judgeship, we assume that he is above political pressure. If our judges are asked to take on such a task as this, they will be subject to political pressure or political criticism. I do not think the minister wants to place our judges in this position.

I hope the minister will agree to withdraw this part of the bill. It is hypothetical whether any appeal cases will be brought before our courts. If the assessor is a good, qualified man, I doubt that the farmers will dispute his decision. However, as a precaution, and just in case a farmer does dispute the assessor's decision, I think that under our judicial system, under our just society as some hon. members say, the farmer should have the right to appeal to the courts. This is the part of the bill to which I object. In some of our acts, the accused or the defendant is not given the right of appeal to the courts. I say that we, as members of this house, are shirking our responsibility if we do not give our farmers the right to appeal in this instance.

I would therefore ask the minister to consider withdrawing clause 13(3) from the bill. I do not understand what advantage the minister will have by leaving the clause in the bill, except that it will give more power to some bureaucrats—and I think they have too much already.

Mr. Woolliams: That is exactly what the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said.

Mr. McIntosh: Well, why doesn't he practise what he preaches? I ask the minister to reconsider this clause of the bill. Unless he can come up with a good reason for the clause being in the bill, he should be prepared to withdraw it. The minister should allow the farmers the privileges for which he is asking in the bill.

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak very briefly on this bill because there is one part of it with which I cannot agree. Also, I do not believe the farmers of this country agree with that part of the bill to which I take exception. I think we are all in favour of the principle of Bill C-155, entitled "An act to provide compensation to farmers whose agricultural products are contaminated by pesticide residue, and to provide for appeals from compensation awards."

That all sounds very good until you start reading the fine print. When you do, you find that if this bill is passed it will operate in such a way that if it is believed a farmer's crop has become contaminated, the minister may, and will, appoint an inspector to inspect the crop and see whether it has in truth become contaminated. If the inspector decides that it has become contaminated, he will advise the producer of the crop of the compensation the government will pay him for that crop. The farmer will not be allowed to move or sell his crop, but must destroy it. If the farmer agrees with the compensation suggested by the inspector, there is no problem.

Mr. Olson: That will be the situation in 99 per cent of the cases.

Mr. Hees: But if the farmer does not agree with the compensation that is suggested, and feels it is unfair—and this may easily be the situation in many cases—the government will appoint an assessor to judge the case. I should like to read clause 13 of the bill, which will apply in this situation:

> Upon the hearing of an appeal brought pursuant to this part, the assessor may
> (a) confirm the decision of the minister,
> (b) subject to any maximum amount of compensation prescribed pursuant to this act and applicable to the loss in respect of which the appeal is brought, vary the decision of the minister, or
> (c) refer to matter back to the minister for such further action as the assessor may direct.
> (2) In any proceedings under this part costs may be awarded to or against the minister.
> (3) The decision of the assessor on any appeal brought pursuant to this part is final and conclusive and not subject to appeal to or review by any court.

That is the part to which I, on behalf of the farmers whom I represent, object. I think it is eminently unfair. This clause says that, in fact, the minister will be the investigator and the judge; there will be no appeal from the decision of the assessor. Let us remember that the assessor will be appointed by the minister. If the assessor, appointed by the minister, makes a recommendation for settlement with which the farmer concerned does not agree, there is, according to this bill, no appeal from that decision. Therefore, the government has the complete and final say in this regard. As has been said in the debate this evening, under British justice there is always an appeal.

I believe that in this case an appeal must be allowed. This is why I appeal to the minister. In fairness to the producers of this country whose crops may become contaminated, in cases where the assessor's decision does not meet with the approval or agreement of the farmer or producer—that is, if he thinks the decision is not fair and equitable—the farmer or producer should be given the right to appeal the decision to the courts and have the matter decided there. As far as I am aware, in every other case appeals may be lodged and decisions handed down in this way.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I had hoped the minister would say something about the debate that has taken place on this bill.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have to remind the hon. member that we are on third reading and the minister has no right to reply.

• (8:30 p.m.)

Mr. Woolliams: That may be true, Mr. Speaker, and I am quite appreciative of the new rules. I would like to say something about the new rules because they are the subject of my complaint. If the minister wanted to make a change now he could get unanimous consent of the house to do so. However, if the new rules are going to operate in this way, then we are fenced in. This is what really happens, with the greatest respect, and I do not want to go into that side of it. In answer to your direction, I want to say that we have first reading and second reading. Then, a bill goes to a standing committee.

We must remember that government members are going to approve these bills. Members in the opposition have a certain responsibility here—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have to remind the hon. member of the rule under which we are operating. I am also informed that the minister has already obtained unanimous consent and has replied. He has already spoken once more than he should under the rules. I am not disputing the point of order raised by the hon. member, but this having been said perhaps we can get on with the bill itself.

Mr. Olson: Mr. Speaker, on the point of order that has been raised I would draw Your Honour's attention to Hansard for February 12, page 5445 where an amendment was moved by the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Gleave) that clause 13(3) be deleted. A decision on that amendment was taken by the house as recorded at page 5447 of Hansard. I am not insisting that this be done but I am pointing out that a decision relating to clause 13(3) was taken by the house a few days ago, negativing a motion by a member to delete that subclause from the bill. It is certainly not within my competence to revive a matter that has been decided by the house.

Mr. Woolliams: That is the very point I am going to make. Certainly, that is exactly what happens. The minister has just proven my point that government members stand up and approve of these things and under the new rules it is very difficult for the opposition to attack. Under the former rules, when a bill went to the committee of the whole house it could be attacked.

Some of us on this side of the house have a sense of responsibility: I would ask the minister to reconsider his position. Knowing him personally, and knowing his responsibility to the farmers, I know that he does not want to fence them in. Years ago farmers did not use the kind of chemicals that are now spread on plants. They used sawdust with a poison mix spread around the boundaries of their farms. Now, chemicals are sprayed on the grain itself.

Under this bill if an assessor is appointed and fixes compensation, there can be no appeal against his decision. Not too long ago I was pleased when I heard the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) say that the cabinet was going to run the country and not the civil servants. I notice that the minister applauds. I point out to him that this legislation is giving the power to civil servants, to men who may not want it, and this is directly contrary to the suggestion made by the Prime Minister.

Clause 13(3) says:

> The decision of the Assessor on any appeal brought pursuant to this Part is final and conclusive and not subject to appeal to or review by any court.

This clause takes away the civil rights of farmers and producers. Government supporters will have to tell the people in the rural areas that they approve of this. As one of my colleagues pointed out today, under this bill a person purchasing land would have to get a certificate saying that the land is clear. To me, that is carrying the law a long way. It is contrary to what we have done in the past. I know the minister has spoken twice in this debate but I would like to hear other members of the government tell us why this right of appeal is being taken away.

Mr. Olson: It has not been taken away.

Mr. Woolliams: The minister says it has not been taken away. It is very clear from clause 13(3) that it has. I was not a member of the standing committee. I cannot attend the meetings of all committees. That is one of the problems under the new rules. These new rules are now being tested here, and they are also being tested by public opinion. Clause 13(3) says that there shall be no appeal to any court. If that is not clear, and does not mean what I have said, then I cannot read English.

One of my colleagues asks what is the motive behind this. The motive is straight dictatorship, to take away the civil rights of the producers and the people of Canada.

Mr. Hees: In the new just society.

Mr. Woolliams: The trend of late has been for parliament to pass legislation giving the Governor in Council the right to pass orders in council, and the orders in council are so very far-reaching that really the law is made by bureaucrats and not by parliament. I am not criticizing members of the public service because if they are given the responsibility they must act as they see fit. But I am shocked that the minister introduces such legislation and tries to ram it through under the new rules.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I did not want to interrupt my colleague from Calgary North. There is something that Your Honour will have to take under consideration. It is the point of order raised briefly by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) that there having been an amendment put forward at the reporting stage and it having been negatived, it is then impossible for members of the house on third reading to refer to the same principal and put forward an amendment with an instruction to refer the matter back to the committee.

I would put it to Your Honour that what the minister is arguing is completely false. First of all, an amendment can be put forward in the standing committee and negatived by that committee. It is then open to any member of the house, including a minister of the Crown, to put forward a similar amendment, and even in identical terms, at the report stage. There can then be debate and a decision taken by the house. I would put it to you that there is nothing in the new rules which would inhibit Your Honour from accepting discussion at third reading as we have, and as took place much earlier today in extenso, on this particular point.

Your Honour cannot prejudge the remarks of an hon. member because he may finish his remarks by moving an amendment, which is permissible under third reading, that the bill be not now read a third time but be referred back to the standing committee with certain directions touching directly on the clause which had been subject of amendment at the report stage. So, I maintain that the point of order advanced by the minister in attempting, shall we say, to influence the debate or the remarks made by my colleague from Calgary North, was not in order. I may be arguing what is already understood, but I want to make the point perfectly clear that it is our view that we can move such amendments within the terms of reference for amendments on third reading, and that in leading up to such amendments remarks can be made dealing with the subject dealt with at the report stage.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, it is only if Your Honour is going to make a ruling on that point that I want to take time to speak on it.

Mr. Speaker: The point is that I have no intention of making a ruling.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Then I am satisfied, Mr. Speaker. May I just state that I agree with the point made by the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert), and will so argue if the point of order is raised seriously and Your Honour has to rule on it.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: On division.

Motion agreed to, bill read the third time and passed.

ANIMAL CONTAGIOUS DISEASES ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING COMPENSATION, APPEALS, ETC.—REPORT STAGE

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture) moved that Bill C-156, to amend the Animal Contagious Diseases Act, as reported (without amendment) from the Standing Committee on Agriculture on Thursday, February 13, 1969, be concurred in.

Motion (for concurrence) agreed to.

PEST CONTROL

REGULATION OF PRODUCTS USED IN CONTROL PROCEDURE—REPORT STAGE

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture) moved that Bill C-157, to regulate products used for the control of pests and the organic functions of plants and animals, as reported (with an amendment) from the Standing Committee on Agriculture on Wednesday, February 12, 1969, be concurred in.

Motion (for concurrence) agreed to.

INCOME TAX ACT AND ESTATE TAX ACT

The house resumed from Thursday, February 6, consideration of the motion of Mr. Benson for the second reading and reference to a Committee of the Whole of Bill C-165, to amend the Income Tax Act and the Estate Tax Act, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Saltsman (page 5191).

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, in addressing myself to the amendment, I want to put some emphasis on how it will affect the farmers of this nation and, I suppose, also small businesses. The small business man operates much the same way as the farmer in that he tries to gather together and hold enough capital to operate an enterprise on an individual or a family basis. I will not quote the percentages because I think they have been quoted adequately by the speakers who have preceded me, but in looking at the tax rates proposed in this bill it seems to me that the amount which will be demanded in estate taxes from the family farm business will be such that it will be difficult for those farm businesses to continue.

Certainly, this proposed taxation measure is of real benefit to the wife, and so it should be. In the family farm business particularly, the wife has contributed substantially to whatever estate there is at the time of the husband's death. But the point that I am really concerned about is whether or not this type of farm can continue to exist on the Canadian scene. If we are not particularly concerned with who controls the farming resources, and particularly the land of this nation, perhaps we do not need to be concerned about the estate tax structure. But if we do have some ideas as to the type of farm we want, which I happen to have, then we do need to be concerned about the type of estate taxes we have, the manner in which they are applied and whether or not they will permit a certain type of farm structure to continue. The land resources of this nation, including livestock if you like, will be farmed whether they are farmed by a family farm type operation, which has been the practice until now, or whether they are operated by a corporate structure. Somebody will still produce corn, flax, rapeseed, wheat, soya bean, sugar beets and potatoes. But I happen to think that we will have a better structure if the ownership of our land resources is maintained under individual control. If individual control of the land is continued, I believe it will allow for more competition. I do not think there is a more competitive structure in the nation today than in the farm sector, unless it is in the fisheries, as has been pointed out by some members of the house. In the farm industry, there is a type of competition which our society finds desirable. If we want to continue this system we will have to have a tax structure which will enable this type of operation to continue.

The weakness of the estate tax which is proposed under the bill, and which also existed under the old act, is the fact that it is imposed at the very time of the greatest weakness in this type of business, namely, when it is being transferred from one generation to the next. This is the time when the government says: "We want a bite out of it". I suspect this is also true of the small businesses, although I have no special knowledge in that area. At this time the generation that is leaving the farm is trying to take enough out of it to retire or to satisfy some other member or members of the family.

[Mr. Gleave.]

At the same time, the son or the son-in-law who is taking over must find capital to replace whatever had been taken out by the father or the mother who had retired. What is to be done in cases like this? The government wants to raise money, and certainly it has to do so. But what is to be done in terms of preserving the structure of our farms? The recently appointed president of the Canada Grains Council says we should promote the commercial farm, not out of disregard for the litle farmers but out of regard for the industry as a whole. The commercial farmers, he says, will form the base of Canadian agriculture. I have a high regard for the president of the Canada Grains Council, Mr. Runciman of the United Grain Growers. I have known him for a number of years. The government must have a high regard for him, too, because they have just appointed him to what I am sure they consider to be a key post in the affairs of western Canada.

I would say to the minister through you, Mr. Speaker, that I am thinking in terms of the commercial structures which he himself has in mind in the range between $50,000 and $200,000, which represents the capitalization one finds in most of our operating farms in western Canada today: one should not collect any estate tax at all if it is intended that farms of this type should continue. When an estate reaches a figure over and above the optimum amount needed to run the size of farm the minister wants, the revenue department can probably collect estate tax without endangering the structure which is thought desirable. But up to that point, no estate tax should be collected. I say to the minister that this principle has in part been recognized already, since provision is made for deferring settlement for a certain period of time. This is permitted simply because the minister realizes that the period during which ownership changes is a time of greatest weakness in the structure. The people coming in cannot immediately pay the tax. For this reason, the government allows payment to be deferred over a period of so many years. I would point out, Mr. Speaker, that during these years the occupant of a farm will be taking operating capital out of the undertaking in order to pay the tax which the government demands. During all this time his standard of living will be reduced and only a bare minimum will be spent on operating equipment.

In my opinion, we should collect no tax from a tenant as long as a farm stays in direct tenure within a family. If a son or a son-in-law takes over, do not collect any tax. Let it rest in abeyance, or do not levy it at all. Once a farm goes out of the tenure of a family, then collect all the tax that is due. You see, Mr. Speaker, if we want family farms to continue, if we want individual ownership of farms to continue, it will be necessary to develop a tax system which encourages their continuation. Otherwise, they will disappear.

The margin of return to a farmer-operator is simply not sufficient to allow for paying of estate tax and at the same time to maintain the operating capital that is needed. Figures can be found everywhere to support this contention. I shall not even bother to quote them because they can be obtained from so many sources, and have been published by so many economists. I say it is in the interests of the Canadian people to consider an approach of this kind. The Canadian people are getting the benefit of cheap food. An hour's work in the manufacturing industry today will buy more pork, or more beef or more bread than it used to buy. I put the figures on record during a previous debate, and I shall not repeat them now. The consumer is getting a good bargain and it is therefore in the interests of the Canadian people to see that the present type of farm structure continues. They are getting a bonus every year.

The arrangement I have suggested would also prove of advantage in deterring rapidly escalating land values. It would encourage a farmer to hold on to his land. If he placed it on the market he would immediately lose his advantage. The advantage to the operating farmer would be to continue operating his land from one generation to the next. Today, the advantage to the farmer lies in selling his land. We should be developing real social objectives as far as farming and agriculture are concerned. We ought to decide on the kind of farms we want, and then develop tax laws and estate tax laws in particular which will encourage farms of that kind to continue. I do not think anyone is wise enough to be able to say arbitrarily that a farm ought to be of this size, or that size, but we can determine broadly what we believe to be a desirable objective and then work out the kind of tax laws which would encourage farms of that type.

The farmer is already in a poor bargaining position as compared with other sectors of society. He does not possess the bargaining power of the professional groups, or of large scale industry or of the labour unions. He is willing to go into the market place and bargain his capital and labour. I say: consider the value of this group of people to the economy and ask yourselves whether the type of taxation upon which you decide, the estate tax particularly, encourages them to continue.

Let me give the house an example. A man in my constituency wrote to me about a gift he had made to his son. I think he had six quarter sections of land. He wanted his son to continue on the farm with him, so he gave him a quarter section and placed a certain value on it. But the estate tax people came along and said the land was worth more. In the end, the farmer had to find about $400 in order to give his son a quarter section and get him started. I would have no objection, supposing he had given his son a few thousand dollars, to the estate tax collectors taking a certain share of it. I hold no brief for the withholding of tax on large amounts of money passed from father to son—possibly because I was not given any such amounts myself.

Someone in our group stated the proposition that if a young man or woman of decent education and reasonable intelligence received a windfall in the form of so many thousand dollars, he or she should pay tax on it. I am not arguing for the individual but for a structure in our society that is of value. I am not taking a moral stand; I do not think morality has very much to do with this. But I do not think that if a farmer whose farming operation is not making him particularly rich decides to give his son a start in farming he should be asked to pay society for the privilege.

In the area where I live and farm young men are leaving the farms, not staying on the farms. It is good farming area, well developed with good sized farms. But unless we provide some incentive and make it worth while, these young men will not stay. We are insisting on burdening them with a load of debt so that they find themselves working for the next 10 to 20 years in order to pay interest at 8 or 9 per cent on 25 or 30 per cent of present farm values. If they have any brains they will say that the game is not worth the candle. Therefore, I ask the minister to see whether he can persuade not only himself but those who advise him that the matters I have referred to this evening should receive some consideration.

Mr. Paul St. Pierre (Coast Chilcotin): Mr. Speaker, the two constants of mankind are supposed to be death and taxes. The minister has contrived to get them both in the one bill for our consideration tonight. Estate tax is what we call it, but what we are really dealing with here is a capital gains tax because an estate is capital; it is stored labour. It differs from other capital gains taxes only in the time of its collection. It is collected after the owner's death from his heirs. To my mind this should be one of the most fair forms of capital gains tax, and it is this broad statement that I should like to expand a little later in my remarks.

The bill itself, of course, is not simple. Very few things involving government or law are simple any more. I suppose we might as well face this complexity as one of the burdens of modern society; there is no point in our lamenting the fact. Some of us may look with some regret to days not long ago when there were simple wills. I can recall one in my riding of Coast Chilcotin which was written with a pencil on one sheet of store newspaper. A rancher left his ranch to his sons to be divided equally between them. The instructions on the sheet of paper were very simple. The eldest son was to draw the line dividing the ranch in half and the younger son was to have first choice of the halves. It worked very well.

Another example occurs to me and I recommend it for study to the minister's staff. This was the case of an Indian who had died leaving all his wordly goods to one of two sons. The will was to be decided in this way. These were the instructions. The two sons were to take their best saddle horses and there was to be a race. The son whose horse was last across the finish line would inherit the entire estate. You may be able to anticipate, Mr. Speaker, what happened: the two sons got on their horses but neither man would move from the starting line. Fortunately there was an old Indian in the village and they called on him to break the stalemate. He looked the situation over and gave some brief instructions. The race was won; one horse came in first, one came in last, and the estate was settled according to the will. The minister has such experts on his staff that I am not going to tell him what the solution was, except that the old Indian solved the problem with two words. He was not a politician but a man very brief in speech.

In this bill as first presented there were provisions with which I strongly disagreed. The bill, in my opinion, did not reflect some of the realities of life that affect small businesses—farms, ranches, to name a few. I noticed that many of us made complaints about the bill. As a matter of fact, the other day the minister said that slightly more than 100 complaints from government members had been received, and as I recall it the opposition parties also contributed eight. So, members on all sides of the house were concerned about the bill. Speaking for myself and for several others, there were three points to which we took strong exception. One of these concerned the sudden burden placed upon small estates closely held, of which ranches and farms are a typical example. The sudden impact of even moderate estate taxes could be very damaging to such holdings.

It is true that even under the present act it is possible to arrange time payments. The minister says that only about 40 people in the last decade asked for such arrangements to be made and this makes me very doubtful that many people were aware of this provision. In any event, time payments should have been made a matter of right for estates of this nature, which are closely held and which may find it simply impossible to raise estate taxes quickly. The minister has now seen fit to change this section of the act and a five year period in which to make six payments is now to be permitted as a matter of right under the revised bill.

There was another objectionable feature to the minds of many of us, and it was this: Since there are major differences between this new estate tax and the present one, a great many people are going to have to rewrite their wills in order to adapt them to the new legislation. I congratulate the minister for bringing in the changes. They will permit executors, after August 31 next, to elect whether they wish to pay estate taxes under the new or old acts.

The third complaint many hon. members raised was that, in its original form, the bill would have imposed estate taxes on all estates over $20,000. The philosophy behind this part of the measure escapes me. We are told that estate taxes have two purposes, to raise money for the government and to prevent the pyramiding of family wealth from generation to generation. That is all very fine, but how an estate worth $21,000, by any stretch of the imagination represents the foundation of a family's dynastic fortune, escapes me. I should be surprised if the money the government collects from estates of between $25,000 and $35,000 equals the amount spent on collection.

I commend the minister for changing his mind and for introducing a floor of $50,000, below which no estate will be taxed. I wish I could be satisfied with the $50,000 floor, but I cannot be. For many years the basic exemption level has been $50,000. For several years now we have been suffering from an inflation which has eroded the value of our dollar. This legislation ought to recognize that inflation has greatly diminished the value of our dollar. In large part, the dollar has lost its value because many levels of government for many years have indulged in irresponsible spending policies.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. St. Pierre: Governments are responsible for the inflation from which we suffer. Although the minister has established $50,000 as the floor below which estate taxes will not be collected, I should have preferred to see a floor of $100,000 established. The present floor, however, is a vast improvement over the $20,000 floor.

There are, of course, some excellent features in the new legislation. The elimination of estate tax on estates passing from spouses to widows or widowers should strike most hon. members as eminently fair. If we accept the proposition that wives contribute to the accumulation of a family's capital wealth, surely it was wrong for the government to intervene previously and collect estate taxes on the death of one of the partners. Indeed, one wonders why that provision was retained so long in the old law. Possibly it represented a hangover from the Victorian idea and I hesitate to use the words, that women were inferior. That, I think, was a delusion to which later generations have not subscribed.

In the bill are new increased exemptions for minor children and for totally dependent invalid children. There is a new exemption of $10,000 for the adult child. Formerly, tax was levied with respect to such adult children.

I listened to several critics of the bill. Several suggested it should be withdrawn and studied again. I find their attitude difficult to understand. Surely, hardly any hon. member of the house will claim this bill is not a considerable improvement over the old legislation. It is much fairer.

I was interested in the remarks of the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Gleave) and I have figures in my possession which support many of his contentions. The figures were produced by the British Columbia Department of Agriculture as a result of a selective survey of British Columbia ranches. They show how low are the earnings of ranches that many would consider extremely valuable. For instance, the survey has figures for ranches valued at between $50,000 and $100,000 and shows returns on capital for the years 1965, 1966 and 1967.

An hon. Member: Those are not ranches.

Mr. St. Pierre: The figures shown as returns on capital are —1.2 per cent, —0.4 per cent and —0.12 per cent respectively. On ranches valued over $100,000 and under $180,000—

Mr. Benjamin: What is your yardstick for value?

Mr. St. Pierre: That is the point I am coming to. Ranches valued at over $100,000 in the three years I have referred to made a profit on capital of 1.2 per cent, then 1.5 per cent and then 2.28 per cent. For ranches valued at $180,000 there is no calculation for 1965. The 1966 profit is shown as 4.1 per cent and the 1967 profit as 5.06 per cent.

An hon. Member: And how much of that was deeded?

Mr. St. Pierre: It is clear that if any rancher had sold his ranch at its valued price and invested the money in government bonds, surely one of our safest investments, which pay 6.5 per cent or more he could have drawn an income at no risk to himself, without having to do any work, much greater than the annual income he has been earning for the last several years.

Mr. Benjamin: But they are private enterprisers, are they not?

Mr. St. Pierre: Most ranchers are private enterprises. They believe in private enterprise; but then so do most people, I find.

Mr. Benjamin: Why do ranchers not sell their ranches, then?

Mr. St. Pierre: Because they like ranching, and because they are more optimistic than are hon. members of the N.D.P. They believe better days are ahead.

Mr. Peters: The last few weeks have done nothing to foster that optimism.

Mr. St. Pierre: I should like to show why a ranch valued at $100,000 ostensibly should return only $1,200, $1,500 or $2,280 as profit on invested capital. The answer lies in the fact that the figures respecting value are entirely illusory. The ranches in question are not worth $100,000. What has happened is that some fortunate rancher has recently sold his ranch at a totally inflated price, and other ranchers near him are listed as being equally valuable. That value figure has no basis in reality. It is a figure on a piece of paper. The man who collects estate taxes refers to the figure on that piece of paper in his calculations, to the misfortunate of many ranchers. That is why I was particularly interested in the comments of the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar. He spoke of farms that were approximately as valuable as the ranches I have mentioned. From his remarks, I judge that farmers in his area find themselves in the same sort of situation as ranchers in my area.

I now wish to speak about the new estate tax being applied to a $100,000 estate. I wish to take the case in which the tax bears most heavily, the case where the estate is left outright by a widower to one son, and not to two or three. Under the present law that son will pay $10,200 in estate tax. Under the proposed law he would pay $13,200, an increase of $3,000, which is considerable and which threatens the existence of the family farm.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. St. Pierre: However, if this $3,000 increase is paid out over five years, that will mean that $600 a year extra per year will be paid. This is considerably less than some of the gloom and doom people have suggested would have to be paid. I doubt that many hundred thousand dollar ranches will go under for the sake of a six hundred dollar per year payment. A point was raised by a member of the Ralliement Creditiste. It is a different philosophic question but one, with which I think we should deal. The province of Alberta has already taken a stand on this matter. The question is, does the state have a proper right to collect estate taxes?

Estates are capital. They are savings and profit put aside by men who during their lifetime paid a tax on their incomes. Is it right for the state to take a second bite of the fruit of that man's labour when he dies? The hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Dumont) summed up the position of his party at page 5192 of Hansard. I quote:

> Mr. Speaker, I should like, first of all, to point out to the Minister of Finance that we, of the Ralliement Creditiste, are opposed to any tax at all in Canada, and that the very fact of levying a tax on private estates discourages private enterprise. That is why we say that the Minister of Finance should seek another formula.

It seems the state not only has the right to impose estate taxes, but in my opinion it has a duty. The alternative is very clear. Unless estate taxes are used to prevent the pyramiding of family wealth, then it must follow we are going to move increasingly into a hereditary aristocracy of wealth in this country. It will not be basically from a titled aristocracy. It will gain power in the nation's political affairs by virtue of birth rather than by virtue of individual worth. I am convinced that this or any other form of class system is bad for Canada.

Canada has not suffered from the lack of a Rockefeller or Dupont family, and I am very sure we have not suffered from the lack of the Krupp family of Germany. I ask those members of the Ralliement Creditiste who oppose this bill on the basic principle that estate taxes are wrong if they are prepared to add to the power which already exists in an aristocracy of wealth in this nation. If so, why not go the next logical step and have hereditary lords in this country? Perhaps they would prefer to have the Senate seats hereditary. I cannot be convinced this would be good for Canada.

In closing, Mr. Speaker I would say this is generally good legislation for Canada. The original weak points have been largely eliminated. It has been vastly improved and is more just than the present estate tax legislation. For these reasons, I have no hesitation in supporting it.

GOVERNMENT ORGANIZATION

AUTHORIZATION FOR THE ESTABLISHMENT OF A DEPARTMENT OF FISHERIES AND FORESTRY, AND OTHER NEW DEPARTMENTS

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Could I have the consent of the house for a moment to revert to motions to make a procedural change which I think is generally agreeable to the house?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): There have been certain discussions, Mr. Speaker, about the government reorganization bill which was introduced on first reading today. I think there is general agreement it would be preferable to deal with the bill in committee of the whole, rather than refer it to any standing committee. It has been suggested, pursuant to standing order 74 (2), that it would be necessary to make a special order of the house in this regard. Without prejudice to any views or debate which may take place on the interpretation of that order, I would like to propose the following order to deal with the reorganization bill:

That an order be made, that upon second reading of the bill entitled "An act respecting the organization of the Government of Canada and matters relating or incidental thereto" the said bill stand referred to the committee of the whole house.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): We are in agreement with the purport of the order but I wish to register a strong objection to the interpretation being placed on standing order 74(2). The rules were designed to work but at the present time the interpretation is not permitting them to work. Before going on the order paper, every order will have to be designated as to which committee it will go. It is not the design of this standing order that a bill shall be left in the house after it has been viewed and the house, as a result of consultation, shall decide to which committee it will go. It is not the purpose of the rule that the posting shall include to which committee it will go.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, for the second time tonight I shall resist the temptation to make remarks on a point of order. May I simply say we agree to the procedure being asked for this evening. Unlike my immediate friend, I see nothing wrong with it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

INCOME TAX ACT AND ESTATE TAX ACT

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Benson for the second reading and reference to a Committee of the Whole of Bill C-165, to amend the Income Tax Act and the Estate Tax Act, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Saltsman (page 5191).

Mr. Jack McIntosh (Swift Current-Maple Creek): I may say at the outset, that this bill has been misnamed by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson). As one prominent Canadian businessman has suggested, it should be entitled a bill for the distribution of private property. I would go further than that. I believe this bill should be known simply as the liquidation bill, because if these infamous proposals of the minister become law they will surely lead to the liquidation of a large group of ordinary Canadians who believe in individual enterprise, just as Joseph Stalin's purge did in the Soviet Union 35 years ago.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. McIntosh: I hear some comments from the other side of the house. After listening to one of their members speak a few moments ago, and judging by their actions in the house tonight, they are complimenting what he said. I want to refer to an article written by the hon. member's colleague. I understand he is an ex-journalist. Not long ago an article appeared in one of the local papers and the question was asked—

An hon. Member: Who wrote the article?

Mr. McIntosh: I am not quite sure. The author was Pat Carney. I think this author was very favourable to the Minister of Finance.

An hon. Member: I didn't think she was.

• (9:30 p.m.)

Mr. McIntosh: I understand it is an F.P. publication. The member was asked by this staff reporter:

What do you think of Finance Minister Benson's proposals?

The hon. member's reply was:

"I just don't buy them," said St. Pierre. He picked up a sheet listing the assets and returns of some 500 ranches in 1967. They show an average return on capital invested of 0.85 per cent.

That is not the story he was trying to tell us in this house tonight. But he also added at that time—

Mr. St. Pierre: Mr. Speaker,—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order. The hon. member for Coast Chilcotin on a point of order.

Mr. McIntosh: I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, I did not hear your remark.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): The hon. member for Coast Chilcotin on a point of order.

Mr. St. Pierre: I am asking the hon. member if he will permit a question.

Mr. McIntosh: Yes.

Mr. St. Pierre: Does the hon. member know whether those remarks were made before or after the changes made in the bill by the minister?

Mr. McIntosh: It doesn't matter whether they were made before or after.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. McIntosh: Well, to me it doesn't matter. If you want to listen to the hon. member he can tell you why he changed his mind. He certainly did not tell us tonight. So far as I am concerned, the only change the minister made in the bill since he introduced it last October resulted from the pressure of you backbenchers opposite—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. McIntosh: Particularly you backbenchers from urban areas. It seems odd that your rural members were not clapping. You told the Minister that if he allowed the bill to go through as he introduced it in October, 1968, you would not be back here next time.

Mr. Benson: Sheer nonsense.

Mr. McIntosh: The minister knows that, and I know it.

An hon. Member: We are all united.

Mr. McIntosh: Good. The minister introduced two amendments. By the first, he extended the term of payment. The main one out of which backbenchers opposite got such a kick was the one raising the exemption ceiling to $50,000. He said that no estate of $50,000 or under would be taxed. Had he left the ceiling at $20,000 every householder in every city in the country would have been taxed. This is a discriminatory type of legislation. Why does he tax some who have an estate of $51,000 to the tune of $31,000 when those who have a $50,000 estate are not taxed at all? If a person has an estate of $51,000 he is taxable on $31,000 of that. The minister will not deny that.

Mr. Benson: Not more than $500.

Mr. McIntosh: I have not come to that point yet. There are lots of things about this bill that backbenchers opposite do not know, and that the minister will have to explain to them. This is a very discriminatory tax, and I think we can prove it. At least out west, we can certainly prove it. That is why I was surprised to hear the hon. member for Coast Chilcotin (Mr. St. Pierre) say what he did tonight about his ranchers. However, he talked out of the other side of his mouth to these reporters. On that occasion he said:

"I'm worried that the estate tax is going to accelerate the sale of these ranches to foreigners.

He wasn't worried tonight.

People just won't have the money to pay the estate taxes. But nobody here will concede this."

He accepted that fact tonight. He said that this is not an estate tax, it is a capital gains tax. I am quite sure he will have a lot of difficulty telling the ranchers in his riding that they have not paid income tax on every cent they have invested in their ranches. The same thing applies to small businesses. He will have a difficult time telling the owners of small businesses that they have not paid income tax on their assets. The hon. member went to great lengths to explain statistics:

"What nobody here in Ottawa seems to understand is that a $100,000 or $200,000 ranch can be a very marginal operation in the west."

This statement is quite true.

[Translation]

Mr. Mongrain: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order.

The Deputy Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order. The hon. member for Trois-Rivières has raised a point of order.

[English]

Mr. Mongrain: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I would ask the hon. member to identify the paper from which he is quoting. I did not hear his answer very well the last time. I would like to know from which paper he is quoting now.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order. The hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek.

Mr. McIntosh: The Barnyard News, if that helps, of the 32nd of December.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. McIntosh: You asked for it. Some time ago, in a speech to a gathering of Liberals in London, the Minister of Finance said he was aware that a special burden had been imposed on the owners of family farms and on the owners of small businesses. Not long afterwards I asked him a question in this house to find out what he meant by "special burden", and why he imposed it on farmers, on small ranchers and on small businessmen. There must be a reason for it. I am sure it is not an economic reason. I hope he will explain it later.

I was also interested tonight in the statement made on behalf of the New Democratic party. The hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Gleave) said that he was not arguing for the individual when he stated that these farms should be left intact. This is not the story we hear from them out west. He went on to speak very much like a Conservative member. Maybe we have been getting through to him.

Mr. Benson: Birds of a feather.

Mr. McIntosh: When he was speaking the hon. member for Huron (Mr. McKinley) made the remark that the N.D.P. have lost their best base of operations, and that Trudeau and his Liberals have taken over.

Mr. Gleave: I am flattered that I caught you both in the same net.

Mr. McIntosh: You did not catch us in your net. You are beginning to see the light since you came down here. These tax proposals sound the death knell of the economic family unit in this country whether that unit be a farm, a construction company or a corner grocery store.

Mr. Whicher: Are you still quoting?

Mr. McIntosh: If you want to speak you had better go back to your seat. You haven't learned the rules yet. What is the hon. member's constituency?

Mr. Whicher: Don't get mixed up.

Mr. McIntosh: You should go back to your seat if you want to speak in this house.

Mr. Whicher: I am sorry if I disturbed you.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order, please. The hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek has the floor.

Mr. McIntosh: As I said, Mr. Speaker, the minister's tax proposals sound the death knell of the family farm in this country, and also of the small construction company, and of the corner grocery store.

An hon. Member: And the Conservative party?

Mr. McIntosh: That remains to be seen. When the minister first announced these changes back on October 22, 1968, he so swaddled them in candy floss that many of us were misled into believing that they were really great tax concessions, an improvement, a reform. We admit this. At that time, the minister assured us he was not bringing in these changes simply to raise more revenue. He just wanted to make some modest changes that would correct injustices but still yield about the same amount of revenue for the federal treasury.

• (9:40 p.m.)

On October 22 the minister said, as reported at page 1685 of Hansard:

> I propose that the loss of revenue arising from this long awaited reform of the exemption structure be made up by raising the rates on the rest of the estate—
> It is difficult to predict accurately the revenue effects of changes in estate taxes but I have aimed at maintaining the same total over-all revenue—

In other words, the minister did not intend this measure as a revenue-producing measure but rather as a measure to correct inequity and injustice which he believed existed in the old act. I said "he believed" but I am not quite sure what he believed. If my figures are correct, the minister could not possibly have brought forward these proposals as an economic measure. The revenue to which he referred amounts to a mere pittance by today's standards of federal budgeting. In comparison with total federal revenue, the proportion of that revenue raised by estate and gift taxation is equally small.

In his budget speech the minister forecast total budgetary revenues amounting to between $10 billion and $11 billion, and revenue from estate taxes amounting to $110 million. According to my calculation, the estate taxes provide just a shade over one per cent of total revenue, a rate borne out over the past five years according to budget paper figures. But that is not the end of the story. We must remember that 75 per cent of the revenue collected federally by estate taxation goes to the provinces. So, the figure the minister is actually concerned with, as the federal minister charged with running the federal government shop, is only somewhere in the neighbourhood of $30 million. An amount of $30 million, in a budget with a total revenues of more than $10 billion, is not an item which should cause the minister the concern, work and argument already involved in trying to foist this tax upon the Canadian taxpayer.

It is interesting that, in respect of the provinces, in his speech the minister said:

> We recognize the special interest of the provinces in this field of taxation but believe that parliament should keep a share in it for its indirect benefits in the enforcing of the Income Tax Act as well as its direct benefits in revenue.

Recognizing the particular interest of the provinces in this field, it is strange the minister did not consult them before making such a drastic change; or perhaps he did and did not like what he heard from them. According to the Toronto Telegram of December 18, Saskatchewan's Premier Thatcher said:

> We made the strongest possible representations to Ottawa not to proceed with these changes.

Mr. Thatcher then went on to say that his government would bring in legislation to rebate to the people concerned the 75 per cent of estate tax revenue received from Ottawa. This has already been done in the province of Alberta. There is a strong probability that it will be done in the province of Manitoba. Other provinces, in recent years, have shown every indication of getting out of this unpalatable field of taxation. But the minister and his colleagues in the cabinet cling ghoulishly to death duties as a source of revenue, or so they say. So, we come back once again to the big question mark; why the radical changes in the estate and gift tax set-up? This is what the people are asking.

Mr. Benson: Ask the widows.

Mr. McIntosh: The minister has been evasive about this particular budget proposal. He slid past the various points and implications in respect of the changes in his budget speech, preferring to make much of the concession to the spouse of a deceased which he just mentioned a moment ago. Since that time in his public statements, he has been equally obscure and on occasion has deliberately muddied the water by referring to examples culled from past experience rather than by giving examples based on application of the new tax regulations.

Mr. Benson: Oh, no.

Mr. McIntosh: This is what the people of Canada want to know. On January 16 before an audience of Liberals in London, Ontario, we find the minister again muddying the waters. At that time he said the amount of $200 million, not the 110 million of his budget speech, was vital to his budget and that if it was not forthcoming he would have to put another one per cent on the so-called social development tax. In one breath the income is vital and in the next it is negligible except to correct an inequity.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order, please. The hon. member for Trois-Rivières (Mr. Mongrain) on a point of order.

Mr. Mongrain: Mr. Speaker, I have always been told members should not read their speeches. I wonder whether the hon. member is reading from the same—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order.

Mr. McIntosh: Mr. Speaker, in answer to the hon. member who interrupted, may I say that perhaps he does not have any manners but he certainly has no political sense. Many of us know that he sat for years as an Independent member because no party would have him. I am surprised that the Liberals have taken him now.

In the same speech, the minister said that the forced sale of a farm or family business had seldom occurred in connection with payment of estate taxes. This may well be true, but this was in the past. It was before the Benson thumbscrew was applied, as I believe it is being applied now. Again, at the same meeting the minister said:

> I should remind you that the vast majority of Canadians have not, and will not now, pay any estate tax.

This certainly may be true, now that they have raised the exemption to $50,000, for certain classes of people only. This is class, or discriminatory, legislation and cannot do justice to all Canadians. It is directed toward the urban centres and is introduced for a political purpose. What the minister neglected to explain was that his new regulations dropped the floor for taxable estates down to $20,000.

This is still the floor. Who is he trying to kid by saying that the vast majority of Canadians will not now be taxable? The minister has steadfastly refused to explain the real purpose of this tax. On the basis of his own statements and his own figures it cannot be an economic measure. I presume even this government would not be fatuous enough to bring in a piece of legislation without any purpose whatever. If, then, we presume the proposals to have a purpose—and we have seen that this purpose cannot be justified in economic terms—we are driven to the conclusion that this measure is not indeed an economic measure but a social measure. We ask why. Maybe the New Democratic party members should ask why. It is my belief that it is a social measure and a social measure of a revolutionary kind.

I believe that if this parliament adopts these tax and gift tax resolutions, Canada will see the disappearance within a short time of that great segment of her people who still seek to live by individual initiative and individual enterprise. I am not alone in this belief. A host of newspaper editorial writers, commentators and tax experts have made the same prediction. Premier Thatcher said this "outrageous" measure meant the "end of the family farm". We in western Canada believe that. The members of the N.D.P. party in western Canada believe that. They pleaded with the minister not to impose this tax.

Mr. William Purdy, president of the Canadian Construction Association, was reported in the Ottawa Journal of January 22 as saying that the estate tax as proposed "will make it virtually impossible for family-owned construction firms to be passed on to the next generation". He pointed out that of 17,000 construction companies in Canada fewer than 200 were public companies, and that family firms did more than 90 per cent of the annual construction business in Canada. In an article generally favourable to the minister and the minister's works, Pat Carney wrote in the Ottawa Journal of January 21:

> —the children will pay for mom's exemption—

At another point this article reads:

> —the bugs in the new system centre around the fact that the happy family unit envisaged by Benson may not reflect the facts of life.

• (9:50 p.m.)

Make no mistake about it, this powerful weapon for social change is aimed directly at a whole class and there will be few, if any, family economic units that it will miss.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question? Does the hon. member believe in equality of opportunity, and if so, would he not agree that all estates, other than those left to one's spouse, should perhaps in terms of equity be taxed at the 100 per cent level?

Mr. Woolliams: No. That is the Regina manifesto.

Mr. McIntosh: No, Mr. Speaker. If one wants to get into an argument about taxation, I believe that the fairest method of taxation is income tax. There may be some branches of that tax which go too far. But that certainly does not apply to this type of taxation. The members of the party to which the hon. member belongs do not believe in what he has said, though they may spout it from time to time on the election platform. The hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar rose tonight and bemoaned the fact that this government was trying to tax the people he represents. This is where the shoe pinches. You N.D.P.'ers preach one thing and practice another.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. McIntosh: The Saint John Telegraph-Journal of December 4 points out editorially:

> With today's less valuable dollar, the reduction—down to a floor of $20,000—will extend the tax to almost anyone who has a small home and a modest insurance program, or a store or a business, or virtually any farm capable of providing even a simple living.

As hon. members know, December 4 was before the minister brought in this $50,000 gimmick to pacify his backbenchers. This was the purpose of it. I am sure the minister does not believe this is fair taxation. The social implications of this measure, the necessity of gathering even the smallest of independent Canadian fish in the net, explains the otherwise inexplicable matter of lowering the level at which an estate becomes taxable. I do not know how the minister decided on this tax. In western Canada, as a Liberal member said a few moments ago, we have seen farmers leave farms valued at $100,000. Some of those estates valued at more than $100,000 may have been left because of climatic conditions or other circumstances; so how can you assess an estate at $100,000, when it has no liquid assets? There has to be some other formula arrived at.

This type of social regimentation is in the Liberal tradition. This is the type of socialistic state planning of my hon. friends in the N.D.P., which the former prime minister bought by the package from one of his advisers; I think it was Tom Kent. This is the type of Liberal, bureaucratic control about which we heard something a short time ago when we were dealing with the agricultural bill. It is the type of Liberal, bureaucratic control sought by the erstwhile minister of national health and welfare when he brought in social security cards and social security numbers. This was done for a purpose; it is all part of the over-all picture.

To the Liberal ministerial mind, to the minds of the mandarins of the civil service, to the minds of the army of soulless Ottawa bureaucrats, no Canadian must be allowed to stand in the way of state planning, state guidance and state administration. The aim is to render every Canadian capable of being controlled by a central computer. This is why we have numbers. Therefore, the ordinary Canadian must be registered, concentrated, made subject to control and allowed no leeway for individual enterprise or individual initiative. That is the aim of this measure; and it is an aim that will be achieved in a frighteningly few years if this type of measure passes the house.

The same sort of group of small, independently minded citizens stood in the way of the Soviet state machine in the early thirties. Hon. members opposite laughed a few moments ago when I mentioned the Soviet regime of the early thirties. Stalin's solution was collectivism, transportation or murder. We are softer and more subtle. But the end result will be the same, the death of a class. I referred to this earlier.

The hallmark of Liberal legislation has always been its absence of humanity. Liberal ministers and senior civil servants have over the years become almost indistinguishable. They have never considered Canadian citizens as human as human beings but only as economic and social units. To realize this, one has only to recall the recommendations made some years ago by the high priest of Liberal theorists, Walter Gordon, when he sought to solve the problems of Cape Breton. His solution was simple, move the people to Upper Canada.

The same sort of philosophy is apparent today. One has but to examine the government's attitude to farmers both east and west to realize the callous disregard they have for people and their obsession with the abstract and the theoretical. One excellent example of this is their present approach to the hard-hit east coast fishing industry. We heard about this problem just a few days ago. What was the government's answer to the plea to save this basic Canadian industry? The Liberals' answer was: Let it die. My colleagues from Newfoundland will verify this fact. The answer of the government was: Let it go by default, and put the people on some form of government subsistence. This is the Liberals' answer to these problems.

The Liberals say: Don't bother about things like human dignity or a man's desire to fend for himself and his family. It is much easier from a social planner's point of view to have everyone's name on a list, numbered and carded for a computer. It is more efficient to issue a series of identical cheques at regular intervals than to find ways of assisting people to look after themselves and to compete with their fellows on an equal footing.

The same sort of soulless, technological approach lies behind the minister's estate tax proposals. Family economic units are a nuisance. Scattered groups of independently-minded Canadians are a nuisance. They foul up the bureaucrats and are not adaptable to smooth, business-machine processing. The attitude of the Liberal party is: Get rid of them, wipe them out, regiment them along with their brothers in the huge, industrialized, urban centres.

I realize that these measures will hit the various pockets of individual enterprise left in urban centres just as hard as they will hit Canada's agricultural community, but at the moment my chief concern is with the impact they will have on rural Canada. To my mind, these tax proposals which set out new tax minimums and higher accelerated rates of taxation must be assessed as part of the whole system of applying federal estate taxes. They are bad enough of themselves, but when applied on valuation figures arbitrarily set by the taxing authority, with an accompanying demand for quick payment they could prove disastrous.

We all know something of the punitive and unrealistic figures arrived a by federal government evaluators. Not only do they seldom take cognizance of local market conditions and local valuation practice, but they take no recognition whatsoever of the low points in regional economic cycles such as we had two years ago in western Canada and again last year. In western Canada, the past season and the general condition of the world market for agricultural produce almost guarantee that anyone selling a farm there today will have to do so at a ruinous price, a sacrifice—if indeed it can be sold at all. Judging by past practice, the federal estate tax valuation figures will take no notice of these conditions and that could mean the extinction of many rural enterprises.

I, for one, do not accept at face value the minister's bland assurances that no Canadian heir will suffer under these new proposals. If they are to be as he has said, if they are to be applied as he has said, then common sense indicates that many, many new taxpayers will be gathered into his tax net and many, many Canadians will be subject to an unjust and confiscatory tax bite.

Many of the criticisms that can be made about this legislation have been made, and well made, by previous speakers. Heaven alone knows, there is enough room for an army of critics here. However, I do not want to labour my opposition to this measure much longer. There is only one further point I wish to make. It concerns the warning given in the introduction of the new tax proposals of very ominous things to come. I believe it is fair to say that the minister's proposals are simply feelers for more sweeping tax "reforms" to come; a trial balloon, a toe in the water. If this be so, it is my conviction that the minister's manner of introducing so-called reforms is entirely unsuitable, and that he is the last person to handle such a monumental task.

• (10:00 p.m.)

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I regret very much that I have to interrupt the hon. member.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the house under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

PRINCIPLE OF ACCESSIBILITY OF REPORTS AND STUDIES UNDERTAKEN FOR THE GOVERNMENT BY OUTSIDE PROFESSIONAL GROUPS

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, the principle that I wish to discuss on the adjournment debate has to do with the availability of government information. The particular issue is that in these days when government is becoming more and more sophisticated and many studies from outside sources will have to be called for it is important to parliament that the results of these studies be made available to us. One of the examples that comes to mind is the rather famous case of the Winnipeg overhaul base. As the member for Fundy-Royal, I have not a clue as to whether the overhaul base should be in Winnipeg or Montreal, and it does not really matter to me in which spot it is. In trying to assess the proper location for this site, the government called for an independent study by management consultants which produced what is known as the Thompson report. The difficulty is that the results of this report were never made available to the very people who were expected to pass judgment on the government's decision to phase out the base. Just as such a situation took place in Winnipeg, so too did it take place in almost every area. In fact what led me to this question is the fact that a great deal more reliance is going to be placed by the government on outside experts to give the government the benefit of their information. I, myself, prefer the system in Sweden which has worked very well for some decades where all information, unless it has to do with the fundamental issue of the safety and security of the state, is a matter of public record. I think it is known by text writers on the subject as the goldfish bowl principle, which is a rather descriptive term to use. In Sweden any information from reports or studies is automatically published, unless the safety of the state is involved.

I want to have the assurance of the administration that, if they cannot go as far as the Swedish reform, at least if studies are asked for by experts independent of the government the results of such studies will be made available to parliament.

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I apologise for the tardiness. I understood that I was to answer a question by the second speaker on the list. Unfortunately, I only had the benefit of rereading the initial question asked by the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather) and I assume he has reiterated his position.

Generally speaking, reports asked for by the government are commissioned on one of two main bases: Either with a view to publication—that is being made public—or with a view to non-publication. There are a number of instances in which investigations are sought, in which proposals are asked for or information is sought, which it would not be in the public interest to disclose.

Proceedings on Adjournment Motion

Further, there are a number of people, experts of one kind or another from whom advice is sought on a confidential basis and it has been found that these people are prepared to be more frank in expressing their views and opinions when they know that the advice is private rather than to be made public. As a consequence of this, in each case an initial determination is made as to whether the report or the investigation commissioned is for purposes of publication or for the internal use of the government.

On this basis, reports are made public either by mass publication or by tabling in the house in response to a request, if there is one, or through release. An example of the kind of report which was prepared with a view to publication is the recent report of the task force on housing. On the other hand, the report of the commission which inquired into security questions was not prepared with a view to publication as such and consequently it will not be published in its original form.

I think the hon. gentleman will understand that there are basically two categories, and that failure to publish is not motivated by a desire to withhold information from the public domain, but by a wish to secure the best possible range of opinions and views from the person or persons commissioned to carry out the survey or inquiry and to make recommendations.

VETERANS AFFAIRS—FEASABILITY STUDY OF GUARANTEED ANNUAL INCOME

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo): First, I should like to thank the minister for his courtesy in appearing tonight to reply to the question I raised the other day concerning the feasibility of a guaranteed annual income for veterans. I raised this question particularly since the committee on Veterans Affairs is to examine the Woods report, at which time it will deal with benefits to veterans and the situation facing them at this time.

The idea of a guaranteed annual income is one which is increasingly advocated nowadays. Strangely enough it seems to be supported by both right wing and left wing elements in our society. It is supported by the right wing because its administrative ease is attractive and because of a desire to co-ordinate welfare programs which have become an administrative hodge-podge. We on the left regard it as a simple, elementary form of justice for those who are unable to take care of themselves for whatever reason, or who have been left behind in the competitive rat race of our society.

Thus, both from an administrative point of view and from a humanitarian point of view the idea of a guaranteed annual income is one which in my opinion will become a feature of every western society. I hope we can introduce it for our veterans and in particular for veterans of the first world war. The tragedy of the situation might be this—that the idea of a guaranteed income will be accepted, but accepted too late to be of assistance to veterans of the first world war, and, perhaps, of the second world war also. I suggest its application to veterans at this point not because I believe veterans should, in this context, be singled out for special treatment, but because if a guaranteed annual income is brought in it is likely to be brought in by stages. The first stage would be either an income for everyone at a very low level, or an income at a higher level for specific groups. In looking over the statistics and information relating to veterans in this country, it seems to me we could probably implement such a program without its being too heavy a cost at the moment, giving us the chance to make a start on a guaranteed annual income for everybody.

In the evidence given before the committee it was pointed out that at least 25 to 30 per cent of all veterans in the first world war are now receiving one kind of assistance or another from the department. That figure is quite close to half our first world war veterans. Since we are already bearing the cost in large measure, it seems to me it would be far preferable to extend the guaranteed annual income if only to ensure that some veterans who cannot qualify now would qualify under such program.

Our present legislation is helpful. I think we in Canada can be reasonably pleased at having legislation that is much better than legislation of some other countries in terms of looking after our veterans. But this is not to say that the legislation cannot be improved or that there are not veterans who are suffering unduly at this time.

Recently all members of the house have been receiving letters from Dieppe veterans. The situation was put rather well in a letter I received from one of my constituents. He said:

> After being liberated we were so elated with the thought of freedom that upon being discharged we did not submit all of our physical complaints as we thought this would delay matters. I hope you can visualize the situation. Now that we are older, these seemingly trivial aches and pains have turned into serious complaints—a direct result, we believe, of our incarceration. When we seek medical attention we are told, "Sorry there is nothing showing on your record".

That is one of the great defects, if not the major defect, of the present legislation. Either because some veterans were not aware of disabilities they might have had or because they were anxious to leave the service for one reason or another, they were not able to establish a claim. Later on when their problems developed it became very difficult for the department to ascertain whether these problems were attributable to war service. I imagine it is a very difficult situation for the people who administer the act.

I feel quite sympathetic to the Dieppe veterans. I have always felt that in some ways they got a terribly raw deal. I was never convinced that the raid was essential, and I sometimes wonder to what extent it was a deliberate sacrifice on the part of the military in order to quieten the cry for a second front. However, I am pleased that the minister is in the house, and I hope he has had a chance to examine the question I posed to him and that he will provide an answer to the question.

Hon. Jean-Eudes Dubé (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, first of all I wish to express my appreciation to the hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. Saltsman) for his remarks on behalf of the veterans of Canada, especially his comments about the feasibility of a guaranteed income for veterans. As he knows, the Woods report which will be referred to the House of Commons committee on veterans affairs deals with disability pensions and with the Canadian Pension Commission. These matters will, of course, be coming up for study at that time, and I do not wish to anticipate the debate.

Perhaps the hon. member knows, if he does not, then this is an occasion for me to underline the fact, that many if not most of our veterans at the present time do enjoy a guaranteed annual income. Provision for that guarantee is made in the War Veterans Allowance Act which has been in existence since 1930. Of course, I should point out that that act does not apply to most veterans, but only to those who are in dire need. Fortunately, the great majority of the veterans in this country are in no need of having their income supplemented. They are doing very well on their own in our economy. Perhaps the hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. Saltsman) will be interested to know that a quarter of all family heads in Canada earning between $4,000 and $5,000, the average income, are veterans. In fact, more than a quarter are veterans. The hon. member may be surprised to learn that in the higher income levels the percentage of veterans earning those incomes increases. Of those earning $10,000 a year, more than 50 per cent are veterans. So, it is with pride that we underline the fact that most of our veterans have adjusted to our society very well and are doing very well on their own.

However, in the case of veterans who cannot find employment in the market perhaps because of disability for which they are receiving pension, the War Veterans Allowance Act will apply. They may receive slightly over $4,000 in income.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The motion to adjourn the house is now deemed to have been adopted.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 10.17 p.m.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REPORT ON TUNIS COMMITTEE, AND ON MINISTERIAL COMMITTEE OF O.E.C.D., IN PARIS

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I have just returned from attending the first meeting of the Canada-Tunisia Joint Committee in Tunis and the annual meeting of the Ministerial Council of the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development in Paris.

I would like to table first of all the communique of the Canada-Tunisia Joint Committee which, as I said, met in Tunis from February 10 to 12. It was decided to establish this Committee at the end of President Bourguiba's visit to Canada in May 1968. Its purpose was to reflect Canada's growing interest in its relations with the French-speaking countries of Africa in all fields.

The warm welcome which Tunisia gave to the Canadian delegation is an indication of the friendly relations between the two countries and of the favourable climate which exists for strengthening and expanding them in the future.

As a result of this meeting, Canada envisages increasing its program of economic and technical aid to Tunisia. In the year 1969-70 this aid could exceed a total of $10 million, of which $7 million would be for new initiatives, $5 million for loans on economic projects and $2 million for gifts under the expanded program of technical co-operation. In addition, we will be continuing to extend food aid to Tunisia.

In order to establish a framework which would facilitate expansion of our programs, we suggested to the Tunisians the conclusion of an agreement on economic and technical co-operation. To that end, we submitted a draft text to be subsequently approved by the two governments.

We also discussed the possibility of concluding a trade agreement. We submitted a draft agreement to the Tunisian government in that respect. Canada intends to do the same with respect to several other African countries during the forthcoming months.

We hope of course that our aid program will pave the way for an increase in our export sales in the future.

I had an opportunity to meet with many of the Canadians working in Tunisia—there are more than 100 at present—and to see for myself one of the main activities in which we are involved, that is the children's hospital in Tunis. We have good reasons for being proud of what has been done and what is being done now by Canadians in Tunisia.

I should also like to table the communique issued at the conclusion of the meeting of the O.E.C.D. Ministerial Council which took place in Paris on February 13 and 14. This was the regular annual meeting of the ministers of O.E.C.D. countries, to review major economic trends and developments, during the past year and prospects for the months ahead.

The O.E.C.D. provides an important forum for joint consultation among the countries of Western Europe, North America and Japan over the whole range of economic policy matters, including finance and external aid. Economic conditions in these key countries have a determining influence on the growth of the world economy as a whole. Thus, the importance of close co-operation in economic and monetary policies among them cannot be over-emphasized.

The agenda for the recent meeting covered three main topics. As for the economic policy, reference was made in particular to the interdependence between international commercial and financial activities, and the need to avoid disturbances likely to affect the expansion of trade. I drew the attention of the delegates to the welcome increase in the export of capital from Europe, from which Canada has benefited in recent months.

The second topic dealt with was problems of the modern society. The O.E.C.D. will be examining in detail some of the implications for economic policy arising from the rapid rate of technological progress in the industrialized world. In this connection, the delegates' attention was drawn more particularly to the growth of multinational corporations. I indicated that the questions raised by the operations of such corporations are, for Canada, of particular importance and suggested that O.E.C.D. should seek to develop internationally recognized ways and means of reconciling the various interests involved.

The third topic covered was Relations with Developing Countries, where O.E.C.D. countries also have a major role to play. I assured Canada's support for the proposed scheme of tariff preferences for the developing world and indicated the importance we attach to achieving an improvement in both the volume and the conditions of aid granted by industrialized countries.

Mr. Speaker, may I table the texts to which I referred?

[English]

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I must first of all express surprise that my good friend the minister has not been his usual courteous self in supplying a copy of the remarks he proposed to make. I am sure that this was simply an oversight on his part and that it will be corrected on another occasion.

• (2:10 p.m.)

I listened with great interest to the minister's comments on two quite separate matters; one of which related to relations between Canada and Tunisia, the prospect of the development of growing friendship there, and of assistance by Canada to that country. I am sure that this is something of which all Canadians would approve. This should be, of course, part of an integrated program on the part of Canada to assist in the development of so-called underdeveloped countries, particularly where we have some role to play, perhaps because of some cultural or traditional association.

With regard to O.E.C.D., again an organization of great importance to Canada, I was interested to note the emphasis that the minister placed upon the importance that Canada attached to assisting trading opportunities of underdeveloped countries. I too believe that this is of the very greatest importance. It is perhaps equal in importance to any technical or monetary assistance that might be directly offered to assist underdeveloped countries. I assure the minister and also the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) that his government would have the full support of this party in regard to efforts made to improve trading opportunities for underdeveloped countries, in terms of their trading with the developed countries of the world.

I should just like to take this opportunity, while expressing approval, as I have, of the matters I have mentioned, again to emphasize the importance of Canada's taking a leading part in achieving further monetary reform, which makes it possible for the kind of increased trade to which the minister refers to continue to develop, and not be hampered from time to time by serious crises.

I am a little disappointed that the government of Canada, representing as it does a country with perhaps more, or at the very least as much interest in this matter as any other country of the world, is not playing a more aggressive part in the achievement of additional international monetary reform leading to increased stability.

Secondly, when we think in terms of trade I believe we should be thinking of our future options as a country. I hope that the minister and his associates will not be content simply to attend meetings such as these and to play an active part in such meetings, but that the government of Canada will accept its responsibility in terms of looking ahead to the future possible trading patterns with which Canada will be faced, and the various options that may be open to this country. For example, we should ask ourselves quite seriously whether we can continue simply to rely upon multilateral trading relations, or to what extent we might rely upon them, or to what extent we have to resort to initiatives to explore new trading patterns and possibilities.

I hope that the minister and his associates will be giving these problems—monetary reform, future trading patterns, and the future of Canada in connection with both—their very closest attention.

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I have a brief comment to make. First, may I congratulate the minister for his part in the discussions in Tunisia. I think all hon. members realize the importance of good Canadian relations with all nations, and particularly with Francophone nations. We can play a useful role in nations speaking the French language. On behalf of my colleagues, may I say how delighted we are to hear the minister's report in that direction.

I also noted his comments about the O.E.C.D., and I should like to make brief comments on the points that have been raised. After studying the question of external aid, it is my impression that the problem of trade and monetary arrangements may be of less importance than the problem of larger grants in aid and, particularly, soft loans to certain countries to enable them to develop their economies to the point where they can exchange goods with the rest of the world on a proper basis.

I do not wish to sound bitter, but my only regret, which is shared by other hon. members of the house, is that to date Canada's external aid has equalled only about one half of 1 per cent of our gross national product. That includes both grants and loans, soft and hard.

I was also interested in the minister's comment showing that members of the O.E.C.D. were concerned about the role of multinational corporations in the world. As the minister knows, the members of my party share that concern. We have definite views about the undesirability of having multinational corporations control such a large part of the economy of this country. I hope the interesting ideas the minister aired may persuade his colleague the Prime Minister, to do something about the Watkins report very soon.

[Translation]

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, like the two previous speakers, I am pleased with the agreement that has just been signed between Canada and Tunisia. We can only but approve any agreement which promotes the economic, industrial or cultural development of our country. If, at the same time, we can also assist a country like Tunisia, we are delighted.

However, we wish to stress again the fact that if it is possible to help other countries by some financial means or others, we should not turn a deaf ear to similar requests from our own under-developed areas.

The minister states in his report that from the political and economic viewpoints, he stressed the interdependence between international policies on finance and trade and the need to avoid disturbances likely to affect the development of world trade.

Since there is more and more talk of monetary reform, perhaps we should advise the minister to get help from a member of the Ralliement Créditiste next time there is such a meeting, so that the he will be better prepared to discuss those matters.

COMMUNICATIONS

TABLING OF UNITED NATIONS REPORT ON SATELLITE BROADCASTING

Hon. Eric W. Kierans (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, last Thursday the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie) asked if I would release a copy of the report on satellite broadcasting prepared by Canadian and Swedish scientists for the United Nations committee on outer space. This study was prepared for the committee and has to do with the peaceful uses of outer space. I have checked with Sweden and the United Nations and, pursuant to section 2 of standing order 41, am happy to table two copies of the report in English and in French. I should like to express my pride in the work done by Canadian members of this committee, and particularly by those of the new Department of Communications.

ORAL QUESTIONS

NIAMEY—FINANCIAL SUPPORT FOR AGENCY OF FRANCOPHONE NATIONS

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. I suppose I might ask him whether "Colonel Blimp" will be offered equal time in Niger? What I would really like to know is whether the Secretary of State for External Affairs has been instructed to offer financial support to the proposed technical cultural agency for the Francophone nations, as reported in the press?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker; as a matter of general principle, without committing any amount and of course always subject to approval by parliament, we have given the Secretary of State authority to indicate that Canada would be willing to participate in the financing of the secretariat of this French commonwealth of nations.

Mr. Stanfield: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is it correct to assume from the Prime Minister's reply that there has been no authorization as to any particular amount? Is the Prime Minister not able to inform the house as to what amount the federal government might be contributing, or what amount the provinces of Canada might be contributing?

Mr. Trudeau: We did give him general guide lines. I would not want to say what they were, in the hope he would be able to stay on the lower side of any contribution rather than on the higher side. His instructions are linked with a proposal that part of the amount forthcoming from Canada might be paid by whatever provinces wish to contribute to such an organization.

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Has there been any consultation with the provinces concerned with respect to this matter?

Mr. Trudeau: We did invite the provinces, Mr. Speaker, to send delegates to be part of the Canadian delegation. They knew the subjects on the agenda, and I would suppose they would have instructions from their governments as to whether they wished to participate financially or not. I know of one province which so desires. I cannot speak for the others.

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a question to the Prime Minister.

I should like to ask him whether singer Pauline Julien is attending the Niamey conference at the invitation of the federal government or of the Quebec government?

Mr. Speaker: I have doubts as to whether the hon. member's question is in order.

NIAMEY—CONFRONTATION BETWEEN DELEGATIONS

Hon. Martial Asselin (Charlevoix): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member wishes to ask a supplementary question, although the first one was out of order. I will nevertheless recognize the hon. member.

Mr. Asselin: I thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Yesterday, the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin) asked a question concerning the possible confrontation at the Niamey conference between the federal and provincial delegations, and I would like to ask the Prime Minister whether there is only one Canadian delegation including New Brunswick, Ontario and the federal government, or if there is also a Quebec delegation represented by Minister Masse?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): As far as I understand the arrangements agreed upon between the Quebec government and the federal government, Mr. Speaker, Quebec as well as other provinces is sending delegates to Niamey and all these delegates make up the Canadian delegation. I think that a certain Quebec minister prefers to use the words "Canadian representation", and I do not think it is necessary to quibble over the words, but over the substance. The principle is established and if a vote is taken there will be only one vote registered on behalf of the Canadian delegation.

Mr. Asselin: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a supplementary question.

Does the Prime Minister mean to say that there is at Niamey only one Canadian delegation made up of representatives from Quebec, Ontario, New Brunswick and the federal government?

Mr. Trudeau: I repeat, Mr. Speaker, that the provincial delegates form a group that I call a delegation, although a Quebec minister prefers to call it "Canadian representation". I believe that, if there is to be some expression of opinion, there will be only one vote, in the name of the Canadian delegation and not for each province.

NIAMEY—PAYMENT OF TRANSPORTATION EXPENSES

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a supplementary question to the Prime Minister.

I would like to ask him whether hotel and transportation expenses for the Canadian delegation or the provinces taken as a whole are borne by the federal government or whether each province has to defray its own expenses?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, when the Canadian government sets up a delegation and appoints delegates it is in the habit of defraying the expenses of the delegates. We have in effect offered the provinces to defray the expenses of their delegates, but the province of Quebec, which has vast resources, chose to defray the expenses of its own delegates.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

YELLOWKNIFE, N.W.T.—ALLEGED DEGRADING REGULATIONS IN AKAITCHO HALL

Mr. David Lewis (York South): I have a question, Mr. Speaker, to direct to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development of which I have given him notice.

I would like to ask him whether he is aware of the degrading regulations being enforced in a hostel called Akaitcho Hall in Yellowknife, a hostel which is under the jurisdiction of his department, which regulations call for the informing of every detail of the behaviour of people who live in this hostel? If he is aware of this, can he inform the house whether those regulations were promulgated and are enforced by the authority of his department?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. member for sending me notice of his question a few hours prior to the question period. I made inquiries and I shall be able to report to the house this Thursday, but I wish to tell the hon. member that apparently those regulations are the work of the students themselves. I am not aware of the nature of the regulations, but I ordered a report to be made, and as soon as this report is received, I shall pass it on to the house. If those regulations are absurd, the hon. member may rest assured that they will not be implemented.

[English]

Mr. Lewis: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In his reply the minister stated that these regulations were drawn up by the students. Will there be an investigation into all aspects of the regulations, such as the refusal to let Indians attending the school visit their homes, and the regulation permitting the holding of hands, and no more, between the two sexes? Could the minister look into these childish regulations and inform the house on Thursday exactly what they are about?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: It is my intention, Mr. Speaker.

TRANSPORT

ATTENDANCE OF MINISTER AT MARITIMES COMMITTEE SITTINGS

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Lancaster): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. With the successful opening of the Transport Committee maritime hearings in Fredericton yesterday, can the minister answer my question of last week as to when he will be making his appearance in that area, on the line of the visits that he made to various points where the housing task force met?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): I am looking forward to it with great interest, Mr. Speaker. It is very high on my list of things to do, and if I can arrange with my hon. friend a date when he will be there to greet me, perhaps we can work it out satisfactorily.

Mr. Bell: Can the minister give us some notice as to when he is going to be appearing, so that we can prepare ourselves? For example will he be appearing in Halifax tomorrow?

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, the last time I went down there, just as I arrived my hon. friend left. Perhaps I was over-sensitive to the situation, but I am sure we can now work out something mutually satisfactory for the next time.

Mr. Bell: As a further supplementary—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I wonder if the minister and the hon. member might make their own arrangements.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

IMMIGRATION

ADMISSION OF KNOWN PROFESSIONAL AGITATORS

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the greatly increased frequency of disruptive activities in the past few days, such as the bomb explosion in the Montreal Stock Exchange and the great amount of damage done to Sir George Williams University, is the government giving reconsideration to its open-door policy covering the entry into Canada of people like Stokely Carmichael and other agitators who openly urge the overthrow of the government by force, which agitation has an effect on activities of this kind?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this kind of problem is under observation and surveillance by the government. We start with the proposition, with which I think the hon. member agrees, that we prefer a free society and free speech. If, however, the situation deteriorates to the point where people come in for seditious purposes then, of course we will have to be much more severe towards that kind of activity than we have been in the past. For the time being we remain, on balance, prepared to give the benefit of the doubt in favour of free speech.

Mr. Hees: Could the Prime Minister give the house some idea of how long the bombings and disruptive activities will have to continue before he thinks it is a serious matter?

STUDENT UNREST

VANDALISM PROMPTED BY OUTSIDE POLITICAL FORCES

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Would the minister say whether his department has received information confirming the assertion of the Minister of Transport in Toronto over the weekend that student unrest and vandalism in Canada may be prompted by political forces from outside Canada.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): No, Mr. Speaker. I received no representation on that point.

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I have a further supplementary question for the Prime Minister. Has he taken any steps to stop the agitation developed by C.B.C. crews which go about the country?

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, in view of the statement of the Minister of Transport I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he would consider the suggestion in respect of setting up a special committee of the Senate and perhaps the House of Commons to discuss the problem with the students, the professors and administrators of the universities to make sure that this does not happen again in some other university.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I hardly see that we would be in a position to address our inquiry to the educational institutions. I repeat our position, as stated previously, that in so far as this is a matter for the police it is under provincial jurisdiction, and in so far as it is a matter concerning education it is under provincial jurisdiction also. Only when the problem becomes a matter concerning sedition in Canada, including the security aspects, would we intervene on our own. Until this happens we are of course co-operating with the provinces in every area in which they ask us to do so, either by way of exchange of information or in respect of control of explosive materials.

To answer the question about the C.B.C., I have no knowledge of these happenings but if any incidents are brought to my attention I will certainly discuss them with the minister.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I would ask the Prime Minister to review the press releases which came out of Halifax last summer during the time of the disturbances there, in which the crews were very much involved by creating disturbances themselves.

PUBLIC SERVICE

COMPENSATION FOR FAILURE TO RECEIVE RETROACTIVE PAY ACCORDING TO CONTRACT

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct this question to the President of the Treasury Board. In view of the complaint by Claude Edwards, the President of the Public Service Alliance to the effect that some 1100 public employees did not receive their retroactive pay in 1968 according to the terms of their contract, will the government give consideration to the request for compensation in view of the extra income tax they will have to pay by reason of receiving this money in 1969?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, because of the progression of labour agreements, and the subsequent adjustments in pay which need to be calculated arising out of those labour agreements there will be a number of public servants in Canada who will have received pay adjustments prior to the coming into effect of the new tax. I think it would be rather difficult to try to distinguish between those who, on some basis, might be entitled to retroactive pay before the tax, and those who would not. Perhaps now we should rely on the physical date of the payment, in view of the fact that the government did put forward a substantial effort and did fairly well in getting as many as possible processed before the date.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): In the cases where it is clear that the fault is not that of the employees will the government take another look at the possibility of meeting their requests?

Mr. Drury: I do not think there was any fault at all. It was just one of the ineluctable facts of life.

VIOLENT DISTURBANCES

SUGGESTED AMENDMENT TO CONTROL SALE AND STORAGE OF BOMBS

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct to the Prime Minister a question which relates to supplementary questions asked a few moments ago. As a committee including members of the R.C.M.P., the Montreal police and the provincial police is now investigating into the explosion of bombs in Quebec last week, does the Prime Minister feel that the Criminal Code should be so amended as to provide for a more severe control of the handling, sale and storage of bombs throughout Canada?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not think it is a matter of amending the Criminal Code, which is severe enough. It is rather a matter of being able to apply and administer it, and that would mean constant police action.

EXTERNAL AID

TUNISIA—STATUS OF ASSISTANCE PROGRAM

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce with reference to the statements he made on motions. Is the aid, which he announced is to be extended to Tunisia, part of our general external aid program administered by the Department of External Affairs or is it a separate program to be operated by the Department of Trade and Commerce?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): It is part of the general effort, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Harkness: If that is the case, is it included in the budget of the external aid office of the Department of External Affairs, or will an additional $10 million need to be voted to meet this commitment?

Mr. Pepin: So far as loans are concerned, I repeated the announcement made by Mr. Chevrier when he went to Tunisia of about $3 million worth of soft loans. As instructed by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, I added an amount of $5 million for further soft loans and I understand this is in the present budget of the Department of External Affairs.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

Mr. J.-A. Mongrain (Trois-Rivières): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance.

Is he aware that one of the old stalwarts of Social Credit, Hon. E. C. Manning, has just abjured the creditist faith to embrace a more orthodox financial doctrine by accepting to serve as a director of the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce?

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, may I put a supplementary question?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question as put by the hon. member for Trois-Rivières has been considered by the Chair, and there cannot be a supplementary question.

[English]

NORTHWEST TERRITORIES

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT RESPECTING SELF-GOVERNMENT

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct this question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Yesterday I asked when the minister would be in a position to announce the self-government plans for the Northwest Territories.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, my cabinet colleagues have not approved as yet the new policy in respect of the constitutional status of the Northwest Territories. I hope to be in a position to announce it within a few weeks.

I wish to point out to the hon. member that I was absent from the house yesterday because it was my day off. In fact, for a month now I have not been absent from the house even once when my presence was required.

[English]

Mr. Howard (Skeena): I have a supplementary question, but as a prelude I might point out that people do not wait for the rotation system of the Prime Minister; they are concerned about dealing with things when they occur. Before the minister leaves again, I should like to ask my question. Surely we are not to conclude from what he just said, and in the light of his statement, that he would announce this early in February that his policy and submission are so bad that even the cabinet has refused to accept it.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question obviously is out of order.

NATURAL RESOURCES

INQUIRY AS TO WITHDRAWAL OF FEDERAL PROJECTS

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Acting Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. It arises from inquiries I have received, and which I am sure many other members who have conservation projects in their ridings have received.

Can the minister advise the house whether the federal government has withdrawn its share of conservation projects in various provinces?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Acting Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, there is no question of the federal government's having withdrawn its share. Of course there are continuing discussions about which projects are in fact approved, which are not, and at what stage various projects have been approved. I take it these discussions will continue.

Mr. Hales: Will the minister advise the house when the various provinces might be advised as to the forthcoming share of the federal government?

Mr. Lang (Saskatoon-Humboldt): The provinces are kept informed at all times, Mr. Speaker.

FORESTRY

MOBILE WATER BOMBERS TO CONTROL FOREST FIRES

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I am not certain whether I should direct my question to the Minister of Transport or the Minister of National Defence, but since they are both in the house perhaps the responsible minister will answer. Is it the intention of the federal government to establish a highly mobile national reserve fleet of water bombers which would be kept in readiness for use in various areas in the provinces of Canada experiencing extreme fire hazards?

Mr. Speaker: I should think this question might be placed on the order paper. If there is urgency, which is not apparent to the chair, it could be discussed at the time of adjournment.

[Mr. Howard (Skeena).]

Mr. Crouse: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Let me point out that most of the provincial legislatures are sitting at the present time, and if the federal government anticipates such a move this information would be most helpful to provincial government plans.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

REPORTED LOCKING OF WASHROOM FACILITIES

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I have what might be described as a basic question for the Postmaster General. In reference to his comment about making the post office a more happy place, will he investigate the report of the locking of washroom facilities for letter carriers, and bring about an open door policy?

Hon. Eric W. Kierans (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I do not think there is any question of this having occurred, but I am having an investigation made of it.

NEGOTIATIONS AS TO DEFINITION OF TRAVEL TIME

Mr. Mac T. McCutcheon (Lambton-Kent): Mr. Speaker, would the minister say whether it is the position of the government that the question of travelling on paid time or on the workers' time at lunch is considered to be negotiable?

Hon. Eric W. Kierans (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I have explained to the unions on several occasions that if they do not like the present position of the department they can always make the situation the subject of a grievance.

ALLEGED DELAYS IN INTERPROVINCIAL DELIVERIES

Mr. R. R. Southam (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I have an urgent question for the Postmaster General. In light of the fact that under the new postal delivery schedules, more particularly in rural areas, there are delays of up to five days in delivering mail across provincial boundaries, can the minister say what steps he or his officials are taking to rectify this peculiar and serious problem?

Hon. Eric W. Kierans (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I do not think the existence of provincial boundaries has anything to do with the delay of mail. If the hon. member has more precise information and will tell me exactly what boundaries he has reference to, I will be glad to look into the situation.

Mr. Southam: I am sorry if the minister has not already received a communication from me, but I am thinking of the eastern boundary of Saskatchewan in respect of which there have been definite instances where it took five days to get mail delivery five miles across the boundary.

COMMUNICATIONS

REQUEST FOR REPORT ON SATELLITE STUDIES

Mr. Ed Schreyer (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, having had a week to consider the matter will the Postmaster General now indicate to the house whether he will table the white paper setting forth the form of the organization of the proposed domestic space communications satellite corporation, before the legislation is introduced?

Hon. Eric W. Kierans (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is referring to the McIntosh report. That was an internal report prepared for the department. However, as I said I will get the opinion of my colleague as to whether or not this should be released.

[Later:]

Mr. Schreyer: Mr. Speaker, since the McIntosh report is an interdepartmental working paper, can the minister say whether or not he will table any document, material or policy of the government having to do with the domestic space communications satellite corporation before he introduces the legislation?

Mr. Kierans: I will take that question under advisement, Mr. Speaker.

GRAIN

VANCOUVER—MOVEMENT THROUGH USE OF U.S. DIESELS

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, in view of the continuing reports that the grain situation at Vancouver will not correct itself until late in April or May, will the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce indicate whether during his discussions with the railway companies recently he indicated an attempt had been made to obtain diesel units from United States railway companies to alleviate the situation?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, when I was in Vancouver a week and some days ago the railway companies accepted targets above the targets they had accepted with the transportation committee on November 15. These new targets are 300 box cars a day for the C.N.R. and 301 for the C.P.R.

I have now in my hand a report as to what happened last week. There is an improvement. The C.N.R. for two days has gone above the rates of the accepted target. They are doing pretty well. The C.P.R. is not doing as well, but I was on the telephone this morning to ask them to do better. I have a full report here on the situation of unloading in Vancouver, which I would be glad to show to my hon. friend, and I have received—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Korchinski: In view of the reports I am receiving, that there are still elevator points which have not delivered any grain since last fall, would the minister consider discussions with the railway companies to the end that more power might be obtained from United States transportation systems?

Mr. Pepin: As my hon. friend knows, I receive representations on this subject every day, which I duly pass on to the railway companies, asking them to do as well as they can to remedy special situations.

NATIONAL SECURITY

DEVELOPMENT OF ATOMIC WEAPONS BY PRIVATE ORGANIZATIONS

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister a question which he might regard as one which might appropriately be answered at some future day, on motions. In view of the concern of the government of Canada about proliferation in the use of atomic weapons by states, is it the view of the government that there is any imminent danger of atomic weapons being developed by private organizations, gangs or groups within society? If there is any such concern, will the Prime Minister say whether the government of Canada is taking any initiative in international terms with a view to preventing such developments, or controlling them if they occur? I am not asking for any breach of security, but if the government has such concern, are steps being taken?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It is evident from the way the Leader of the Opposition has asked the question that he agrees with the Chair that this is a question of very wide scope, which normally would be answered by way of a statement on motions. That is my suggestion to the hon. member.

[Later:]

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I am not sure whether the Prime Minister undertook to make such a statement.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I did not undertake to make such a statement, Mr. Speaker, but I will discuss the matter with the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

EXHIBITIONS

MAN AND HIS WORLD—REQUEST FOR ASSISTANCE PLAN

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I would like to put a question to the Minister of Finance.

In view of the proposal for co-operation from the government of Quebec as regards the financing of Man and His World, could the minister inform the house of the federal government's decision in that connection?

[English]

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Not at this point, Mr. Speaker, but the offer was to finance it with our money.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

REQUEST THAT BILLS BE PRINTED IN GREATER NUMBERS

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): Yesterday, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Palliser asked me whether or not I could give some assurance to the house as to the printing in the future of larger supplies of important public bills, so that a wider distribution of such bills could be made to members of the public who are interested. I should like to inform the house that I have had discussions with responsible officers of the house and that a system will be instituted which we hope will have the effect of anticipating, to a greater extent, the need for wider distribution of certain bills, and therefore the need of endeavouring to have on hand a reasonably larger supply of them. While I am sure that this system cannot be perfect for obvious reasons, I am sure it will improve considerably the situation pointed out by the hon. member.

[Mr. Speaker.]

TRANSPORT

REPRESENTATIVE OF TRANSPORT COMMISSION AT MARITIMES COMMITTEE SITTINGS

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, my question to the Minister of Transport is similar to a question asked yesterday by the hon. member for South West Nova, who is on his way to Halifax now to join the transport committee's hearings. Will the Canadian Transport Commission be represented at those hearings?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): The answer is yes, Mr. Speaker. I understand that an officer of the Canadian Transport Commission joined the committee yesterday at Fredericton, and will continue the tour with them.

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Lancaster): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the minister also consider sending on this trip the Minister without Portfolio, who is ready, able and willing to go?

NATIONAL CAPITAL

SUGGESTION BY DOMINION-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE TO INCLUDE OTTAWA AND HULL

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I could address a question to the Prime Minister. Having in mind the decision of the federal-provincial conference calling for the development both in the Ottawa and Hull area of a truly national Canadian capital, could the Prime Minister indicate at this time what study is being made or what action is being taken on this important project?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I would like to suggest that the scope of the hon. member's question is very wide and that it would probably require a long answer which should be given by way of a statement on motions. However if the Prime Minister wishes he may give a short answer to the question.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I could make the answer short. We did have meetings last week. Apart from the constitutional conference Premier Robarts, Premier Bertrand and myself had certain private meetings with a view to studying the federal government's desire to expand some of its works on the Hull side of the river. Certain agreements were reached before the conference, and further consultation is going on.

Inquiries of the Ministry

AIRPORTS

SECOND SITE TO SERVE SOUTHERN ONTARIO

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. I was wondering whether the minister could advise the house whether the federal-provincial committee has been established to pursue the selection of alternative sites for a second airport to service the southern Ontario region and, if it has been selected, could the minister advise what is the federal participation?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): Not yet, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Alexander: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that the minister had so much opposition in the Malton expansion, can he say whether the government intends to hold public hearings in order to get the views of the public from the areas which will be affected, so that we shall have a participatory democracy?

Mr. Hellyer: It is certainly a good suggestion, and one which will be taken into consideration. My hon. friend will appreciate that the kind of area we would seek is one which would affect very few persons; otherwise it would not meet the criteria that, I am sure, would be set down at the outset.

FISHERIES

PRICE SUPPORT ON ATLANTIC SALT COD

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): I have a question for the Minister of Fisheries. Can he say whether, in fact, the province of Newfoundland has made representations to his office for price support for the 1968 Atlantic salt cod fishermen?

Mr. Speaker: It is not in order to ask simply whether a request has been made or a representation submitted to the minister.

Mr. Lundrigan: May I rephrase my question and ask the minister whether as a result of representations made by other bodies the department is in a position to say whether they are going to advance any price support to the fishermen for the 1968 catch.

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, the department is considering representations made by the federation.

TRANSPORT

DISCRIMINATORY REDUCTIONS IN EXPRESS ASSOCIATION RATES

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct my question to the Minister of Transport. Will he investigate the circumstances surrounding the fact that in Saskatchewan the Express Transportation Association has set new rates allowing higher rates to be charged at points in Saskatchewan than at points farther west, such as Edmonton and Vancouver, for moving the same product?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member has made a submission to the minister and now he has to assume it will be looked into.

[Translation]

AIR CANADA

DISCONTINUANCE OF SERVICE FROM TROIS-RIVIÈRES

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I would like to put a question to the Minister of Transport.

Could the minister tell us whether it is true that Air Canada is about to discontinue its service at its base in Trois-Rivières?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That question should be put on the order paper.

[English]

IMMIGRATION

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT OF POLICY ON ADMISSION OF FOREIGN STUDENTS

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Will the minister confirm Canada's policies with regard to the entry into Canada of foreign students, in order to allay fears expressed by the ex-prime minister of Bermuda that Canada may exclude all foreign students from the country—a policy very discriminatory and regressive?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): There has been no change in the policy with respect to the admission of students to Canada. We are naturally observing the situation in Montreal, and if any action is indicated following these hearings it will be taken.

Inquiries of the Ministry

VIOLENT DISTURBANCES

REQUEST FOR COLLECTION OF INFORMATION TO DISCLOSE COMMON CAUSE

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question on the same topic which I wish to direct to the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that the Prime Minister has refused to set up a committee to investigate violence in general, would he consider setting up a committee strictly for the collection of information on the subject of violence to see if there is any common denominator across the country?

[Later:]

Mr. Yewchuk: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I think the Prime Minister wanted to answer the question I asked him a few minutes ago, if he were given the opportunity.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I thought it was addressed to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration, and that he might have some ideas on it. I do not see why we should set up a committee to investigate violence, as the hon. member suggests. If we do, it would be said we are setting up committees to deal with everything, but that they do not report, and so on. I think we have the situation under observation and there are committees of the cabinet which are looking into it.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

EXPLOSION IN REGINA RECRUITING CENTRE

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): My question is for the Minister of National Defence. Has the cause of the explosion last Saturday morning in the Canadian armed forces recruiting centre in Regina been determined?

Hon. Léo Cadieux (Minister of National Defence): We are still investigating the incident. It is now suspected that it was a commercial gas explosion, but the provincial police, the city authorities and authorities at the base are investigating the problem. We hope to have a report quite soon.

NATO—WITHHOLDING OF FUNDS UNTIL COMPLETION OF REVIEW

Hon. Léo Cadieux (Minister of National Defence): While I am on my feet may I be allowed to answer a question which was raised on February 5 by the hon. member for Selkirk. I would like to reassure him that no public funds have been allocated for the construction of permanent buildings for Canadian forces bases in Europe.

RURAL DEVELOPMENT

ARDA—EXPENDITURES IN YEAR 1966-67

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, in view of the absence of the Minister of Forestry and Rural Development, I should like to put my question to the Prime Minister who had much to say about regional disparities during the last election campaign as well as at the last federal-provincial conference.

Can he assure us that expenditures in 1966-67 under ARDA, of which $16 million were allocated to the province of Ontario and $20 million to the nine other provinces—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

TRANSPORT

NEWFOUNDLAND—FURTHER ABANDONMENT OF RAIL LINE SERVICE

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. Can the minister say whether applications have been received to abandon two further rail line services in the province of Newfoundland?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): I will have to refer the hon. gentleman's question to the Canadian Transport Commission.

Mr. Lundrigan: I have a supplementary question. May I ask the minister, in view of the fact that the committee is now travelling through that particular part of the country, whether he would make an effort to urge the transport commission to set aside its decision. I am thinking of the minister's good health as well as that of Mr. Pickersgill.

PUBLIC SERVICE

SUPERANNUATED FEDERAL EMPLOYEES—REQUEST FOR INCREASED PENSIONS

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the President of the Treasury Board based on information which was placed in Hansard yesterday in reply to a question of mine on the order paper. In view of the fact that since this session began in September more than 600 retired civil servants have died without getting the pension increases that were recommended two years ago, could the minister say how much longer we will have to wait before this matter is dealt with.

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): I cannot give a precise date.

Mr. Baldwin: When the government changes.

AIRPORTS

QUEBEC—LOCATION OF INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Transport.

Can he tell us exactly when the decision on the site of the new international airport will be made known to the public?

[English]

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): Every day we are getting a day closer to the decision.

Mr. MacEwan: You will go down in history for that statement.

Mr. Hellyer: I hope it will not be too long delayed.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a supplementary question.

Could the Minister of Transport give us the reason for the delay in announcing this decision?

Hon. Martial Asselin (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a supplementary question.

Will the Minister of Transport, before he makes his decision, take heed of the representations of the government of Quebec about the site of the new airport?

Mr. Speaker: The question was put, a moment ago, in exactly the same way.

Mr. Asselin: May I put it in another way, Mr. Speaker?

Will the Minister of Transport meet again with other representatives of the government of Quebec to discuss the site of this new airport?

[English]

Mr. Hellyer: There have been continuous consultations, Mr. Speaker, and as I indicated to the house earlier, and as you so kindly pointed out, we certainly are interested in the views of the Province of Quebec. These views, along with all other considerations, will be taken into account before a final decision is reached.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

INCOME TAX ACT AND ESTATE TAX ACT

The house resumed, from Monday, February 17, consideration of the motion of Mr. Benson that Bill C-165, to amend the Income Tax Act and the Estate Tax Act, be read the second time and referred to a Committee of the Whole, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Saltsman (p. 5191).

Mr. W. C. Scott (Victoria-Haliburton): Mr. Speaker, the minister has made much of the fact that he has agreed to changes in his original proposal in regard to estate taxation. But these changes were minor modifications only. There is no basic difference between the legislation we are considering today and the original measure outlined by the minister almost four months ago. He set out then to destroy any accumulation of private capital that remained in this country. His intent is still the same. All he did was change the load in the murder weapon. It may take the family farm and small private Canadian business a little longer to die under the new arrangement, but they are just as surely doomed to extinction now as they were when the minister passed sentence on them back last October.

There is one aspect of the minister's behaviour in this whole affair which I must confess I am at a loss to understand. I refer to the atmosphere of deception and trickery in which he has cloaked all his announcements and explanations. Nothing could be more devious than the way in which he has sought to confuse the public and convince Canadians that he has really done them a great favour by the latest changes in his proposal.

The minister implied, although he was careful not to spell it out, that Canadians would now enjoy an estate tax exemption of $50,000 instead of the originally announced $20,000. When we read the fine print, however, we see that what he did was leave the old exemption of $20,000 unchanged. He merely raised the tax floor to $50,000. What this means is that if a man dies leaving an estate of $50,000 he is exempt from the estate tax. But if he is unfortunate enough to have been $1,000 more successful and to have left an estate of $51,000, his estate will be liable to taxation and the exemption will be only $20,000. In other words, it would be liable to the new punitive tax rates on a sum of $31,000.

Anyone who knows the value of real estate in the province of Ontario today, and who appreciates the inflated value of everything, thanks to the Liberal 60-cent dollar, knows very well that a prosperous family farm or a thriving small business will more than likely be well within the minister's taxing grasp. All he has done by setting the arbitrary figure of $50,000 is to assure that those family farms, small businesses and other family concerns which are efficient and most valuable to the economy will be hardest hit.

The minister has succeeded very neatly in penalizing efficiency. He has hit the very bracket of private business which contributes most to the national economy. The marginal farm, the ineffective manager, the part-time enterprise that needs either moonlighting or other outside assistance to stay alive, have been placed in a preferred position. For the time being at least they will escape the tax axe, if they carry the Benson seal of inefficiency. But the family farm operated by a trained and dedicated farmer will be desperately hard hit. The grocery store, the garage, the local automobile or farm machinery outlet, or any other type of rural Ontario family enterprise which is effectively run as a family business, will get the full cut.

If the minister is sincere in his explanation of this tax, why is he risking the ruin of a large and lively section of our national economy for the sake of a paltry $30 million in revenue? And $30 million is a paltry amount of tax money to those who can shrug off underestimates in national budgeting running into thousands of millions. It is a paltry amount to a minister who countenances an increase of more than $1 billion in national spending in one year while at the same time preaching austerity and restraint in spending.

In a speech some time ago at London the minister said there had been very few cases of businesses or family farms having to be sold to meet taxation. What he failed to mention was that this has been true in the past; it was only true in the days before the coming into effect of his new proposals. He also failed to mention that the actual sale of family businesses or farms would normally take place before the death of the owner, though the chief motive for selling out would still be the menace of the estate tax.

In the Montreal Gazette of January 29 the highly respected financial writer, John Meyer, touches on this point. He wrote as follows:

> The exemption of all estates up to $100,000 would cost the government, according to some estimates, only $12 million in revenue while permitting large savings in processing. Such an exemption would relieve many of the small business and farm difficulties raised by the present taxing process. It would substantially relieve the forced sales which are a particular objection to estate taxation generally. That advantage could be achieved at quite a small cost if Mr. Benson would be prepared to recognize it. Mr. Benson, however, says the experience of the finance department indicated that forced sales after death to meet taxes are limited. No doubt this is true. What neither Mr. Benson or the finance department can possibly know is the number of sales made in advance of death. The tax consultants and professional executors could have told him if given the chance.

No, Mr. Speaker, the minister has not really changed anything. He has juggled some figures and reworded a few press releases but he has kept intact the punitive quality of his legislation. Private enterprise and private initiative are to be discouraged. The minister has made them an offence and he has provided penalties which are harsh, discriminatory and destructive.

The message of this government—this government of the just society, publicly pledged to the support of individual rights and freedom—as broadcast by the Minister of Finance is clear. It is: Get out of the field of private endeavour. Sell your store, sell your business, sell your farm. Move to the city and get a job where we can keep our eye on you and deduct our taxes at source. Become part of the regimented mass and do not foul up our computers with individual initiative. Or, as one of my constituents put it the other day: Sell off all your holdings now, blow the proceeds in high living in Florida and Europe and return broke to live the rest of your lives on welfare.

Before I finish my remarks, Mr. Speaker, I would like to say something about one of the most arbitrary and unjust aspects of this taxation. As a matter of fact, it is an aspect that is part of all federal taxation. This is the fact that the federal authority levies taxes upon individual Canadians and individual Canadian enterprises at its own valuation.

I am sure there are very few members in this house who have not learned first hand of examples of this inequity. The federal valuation is too often made at long range and without any regard to local valuation or the effect of temporary or long-term economic recession on those local valuations. Under the proposed estate tax scheme it will be quite possible for families sincerely to believe that they are well under the taxation floor only to find that an arbitrary federal valuation places them not only in a taxable bracket but well up in it. This has happened in the past and is even more likely to happen under this proposed scheme. Then just watch the forced sale of farms and businesses to meet estate taxes.

If the minister and the government majority succeed in making this dangerous and destructive measure law, then I suggest that some means of fair and equitable valuation of estates for taxation purposes be evolved. This, at least, would be one gesture of fairness and decency in a taxation scheme that, as it now stands, lacks both.

Mr. George Muir (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I think that most members, like myself, find it rather hard to believe that the finance minister has had, to use his own words, very few protests in regard to the proposed changes in the estate tax legislation. In view of the tremendous number of letters that have been received by most members from all across the country, the taxpayers of Canada must either be unaware of the minister's presence in the house or feel that his attitude is so stubborn and inflexible that it would be useless for them to appeal either to his good nature or to his good judgment.

Personally, I cannot recall a single issue that has brought forth such a volume of mail from my constituents. I know too that many other members have received the same tidal wave of protest. The remarkable thing about all this mail is that it comes from individuals who are concerned and is not part of an organized effort. Surely even the minister of a government as arrogant and as far removed from the thinking of the people as this one cannot long remain totally unaware of the massive resistance to this measure that continues to grow daily from coast to coast.

I want to be fair to the minister. By exempting an inheritance between spouses from taxation he has recognized the contribution both partners in a marriage make toward building a common estate. But what he fails to recognize is that the one main incentive for such a partnership is the creation of something tangible to pass on to their offspring. This legislation makes it virtually impossible to pass on a viable family economic unit intact to the heirs without involving them in an undue amount of debt.

I am concerned about the effect of this negative and destructive tax on the Canadian economy and the Canadian society as a whole. Representing a rural riding as I do, I am particularly concerned about its effect on Canada's agricultural community, the independent rural businessmen and farmers. In the past it has been difficult enough to establish sons on the family farm. The minister in a speech to a Liberal meeting admitted that the estate tax places a burden on the transfer of family farms and businesses between generations, but he suggested the burden is not a heavy one.

He went on to say that an estate tax does place a special burden on estates in which the major assets are not liquid, which is almost always the case when a farm or business is owned and operated as a family enterprise. The burden, he said, is only significant where the business is to be carried on by the children, or has not been sold at the time of death of the chief shareholder. In other words, he has admitted that the tax is going to make it difficult to continue small family enterprises. He has further admitted it by changing his original proposals in two ways: first, estates under $50,000 will be tax exempt and, second, instalment payments of the tax will be allowed up to five years. Even with these changes he does not grapple with the situation in which the taxes are levied on the basis of an arbitrary valuation of the property, or where such valuations do not bear any resemblance to local market conditions or take into account regional economic cycles.

Let me give an illustration. A farm in Manitoba which could have been sold for $250 an acre last year would, because of the surplus grain situation, shortage of cash and high interest rates, be hard to sell at the present time at any price. It is not unlikely that any family farm in western Canada could be greatly over valuated under those conditions and have to be sacrificed at a valuation far below that placed upon it by the federal tax authorities.

Inflated costs, particularly of machinery and equipment, have placed all but the smallest farm enterprise well over the $50,000 valuation. With inflation still rampant the minister has caught a huge number of small family businesses and farm enterprises in a tax net originally designed to catch only the very largest. In fact, he has left the largest estates virtually untouched and hit out hard at the smaller ones. This is in line with other actions of this government such as the preferred position given people with higher incomes in the application of the new 2 per cent social development tax.

Nor does the exemption up to $50,000 do much to change the situation. A more realistic exemption base under present inflated conditions would be $100,000. The fact that the tax exemption for estates over $50,000 still remains at $20,000 simply proves that the minister has not taken the time or trouble to study the serious effects the application of the tax will have on our free enterprise system. One does not have to be an economist to realize that all this will lead to the phasing out of the family enterprise and the emergence of corporate groups. It means the extinction of the family farm, and inevitably of Canada's agricultural communities.

The Western Producer had this to say in a recent editorial:

> It is almost incredible that the government that has had so much to say about the "just society" should introduce such punitive legislation. It seems to us there could be no quicker way to destroy the family farm and to hasten the day when land resources will be controlled by huge corporations.

When one considers that 75 per cent of estate taxes collected by the federal government goes to the provinces, I say it is just as incredible that discussions were not held with the provinces before imposition of the tax. This is particularly so since the federal share amounts to approximately one per cent of the federal budget. Of this amount it is estimated the government would lose $12 million if all estates below $100,000 were exempt, as my hon. friend from Victoria-Haliburton noted. At the same time there would be a considerable saving in not having to process the greater number of estates involved. One wonders, under these conditions, if this new estate tax set-up is being brought in not as an economic measure but rather as a social measure.

Surely this levelling off in the distribution of wealth need not reach down to penalize thrifty, independent businessmen and farmers who, in a lifetime, use their earnings to build modest estates for themselves and their families. It is of interest to read what the Ontario Economic Council had to say in its report just prior to the estate tax changes announced as part of the current budget. I quote from that part of the report which is most apt:

> Those responsible for guiding the course of our nation's development need only to look to history to find proof that nearly every past civilization has hastened its ruin through dissipation of capital by taxation.

One has only to read the history of the Roman empire to see what economic oppression of the individual farmer and businessman can do to hasten this ruin. There the small farmers and small businessmen were driven from their holdings to become faceless parts of an urban mob that contributed nothing and demanded everything.

In a country such as Canada that is hungry for capital and counts capital as one of its largest imports, one would think the formation and development of private capital within the country would be the government's foremost aim. Among 14 countries surveyed by the Ontario Economic Council, Canada was found to levy the highest percentage of tax on capital. It was ahead of the United States and Great Britain by a wide margin; it was even ahead of socialist Sweden. Canada was third of ten nations in the percentage of total government revenue raised by death duties and gift taxation. Great Britain was first at 3 per cent; the U.S. was next with 2.6 per cent and Canada was third with 1.8 per cent. West Germany, last with 0.1 per cent, had the lowest rate of estate tax but showed the highest rate of economic growth. That may be significant.

One other aspect of the proposed estate tax worth nothing is the supposed concession to wives contained in the new regulations. The Canadian Tax Foundation dismissed this point by saying it was simply "a carrot dangled before wives" that could and probably would lead to unexpected tax pitfalls. The truth of the matter is that it is no concession at all. It is simply a deferral of taxation. And when the tax bite comes later it will be that much sharper and deeper. This deferred tax only means eventual taxation at higher rates.

This is far more a social measure than an economic one. When one considers how little revenue will be forthcoming and when one further considers that the minister did not bother to consult the provinces about a matter that so intimately concerned them, one is forced to conclude his objective was something other than revenue raising.

In the Hamilton Spectator, as quoted in the Winnipeg Tribune of January 11, the editorial writer notes:

> Not only does its underlying motive appear to be directed more towards a theoretical political aim than to a fiscal need, but the measure could radically change the character and purpose of Canadian business.

The editorial concludes:

> Surplus capital essential to Canadian ownership and to industrial expansion in this country is being increasingly diverted into government coffers. In the years to come these estate tax measures will change the economic and social structure of Canada.

May I also quote an article in the same issue of the Winnipeg Tribune:

Mr. Benson's basic assumption in the draft law is that a man has really no right to direct how his savings are to be used after his death. In Mr. Benson's philosophy a man's life earnings become the property of the government and anything he disposes of by will is allowed only by government benevolence.

With all that I agree, Mr. Speaker. But perhaps the editorial writer laid the blame in the wrong place. I do not believe this is the philosophy of the Minister of Finance. I think that this is the basic philosophy of the so-called "just society". He had no choice except to do his master's bidding. As the Winnipeg Tribune writer put it:

This is, of course, arrant statism and authoritarianism at its worst.

That is not a bad description of this "just society" we are supposed to be enjoying.

I return to the point I made earlier about the family unit and the motivation of the family partnership. On this point and on the whole question of the direction in which the Prime Minister's "just society" is leading us, I recommend most highly to hon. members that they read an article in the Winnipeg Free Press of December 2, 1968, by Shaun Herron. In part he says:

—the impulse to prosper and provide, to "do the best one can for one's family", this we have approved, this we preach, this we applaud. And, of course, what a man makes is his. He pays his taxes on it—and today they are heavy—but what he has left after taxes is the fruit of his work, skill, foresight, and enterprise. It is his, earned and paid for by blood, sweat, toil and taxes—

Has it occurred to Mr. Trudeau that when he forces men, who can, who will, and who want to work hard, to ask "why work?" he has begun the creation of a "just" society in which all men are equally grey, equally poor, equally idle and equally ill? Is this what the Liberal caucus intended?

After that, Mr. Speaker, there is little to add. I simply say that the proposed new estate tax system is unjust, unnecessary and unrewarding. If it has been conceived as an economic measure it will do harm to the economy, not good; it will cause far-reaching economic disaster and will remain a monument to the negative and the destructive. If it is advanced as a social measure in disguise, then I believe it to be unwarranted and exceedingly dangerous to all those beliefs and institutions on which our country has been built and which have enabled it to prosper.

I hope that the minister and the government will consider dropping this tax on death, particularly since it applies to moderate family enterprises. I am speaking of independent businessmen and farmers who have contributed so much to our basic philosophy of freedom and who, if allowed to survive, will remain the backbone of our free enterprise system.

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak on this estate tax measure I wish to say that this problem has been debated long and inconclusively by many people. No doubt governments need money; the public purse must be filled in as many ways as possible. But the amount of tax that needs to be raised depends on the spending habits of the government and the demands of society for social programs and money to carry out those programs.

Any single tax measure in a taxation system is introduced as a result of many social, economic and other factors of long standing. It is considered that an undue concentration of wealth resulting from a complete absence of transfer taxes tends to destroy the incentive that makes the economy viable. On the other hand, too severe an imposition of transfer taxes has the same effect; it reduces the national urge to save and build. It can be argued with a reasonable degree of righteousness that it is socially desirable to introduce estate taxes which will prevent the build-up of large units of economic family wealth. It is argued that such accumulated units of wealth do not serve the interests of society generally and ought not to be allowed to remain intact.

The bulk of tax revenue comes from taxation of income and consumption. Transfer taxes, or estate taxes, are levied nationally on accumulations of capital. As such they naturally influence the behaviour of the individual bearing the brunt of this tax. The citizens who are most directly concerned about this problem and who have been very vocal in their objections are farmers and small businessmen. They have been so vocal that the Minister of Finance has seen fit to change the provisions of the estate tax regulations. As a result some relief has been given to these people.

• (3:30 p.m.)

The imposition of the estate tax on larger estates has meant that on the death of the Canadian investor there has been a movement to sell many businesses to foreign firms, especially to United States firms. In a country which is continually worried about the substantial foreign capital investment and which must rely for a high degree of capital inflow either on the savings of its own people or on foreign investment, tax policies that encourage the sale of businesses to foreign investors should be seriously considered by the nation as a whole in the light of whether or not the estate tax is a good tax.

The recent statement of the three prairie premiers in which they urged that the fiscal policy of the federal government should take priority over the language question at the Federal-provincial conference last week indicates the very great concern of these premiers and of many people in Canada that the strains of our nation's fiscal problems could well contribute to our break-up and the fragmentation of the political life of the country. These same premiers have signified their intention of remitting the provinces' portion of the estate tax to estates, which indicates their feeling that the estate tax needs radical revision.

The estate tax falls upon the family of the entrepreneur whose enterprise has created the capital while his family has had to undergo social and economic restrictions. It might be socially desirable that all income and revenue should revert to the Crown on the death of the entrepreneur but such an attitude would, I am sure, prevent or seriously discourage enterprise by individual entrepreneurs.

In a report of the Ontario Economic Council, of 14 countries examined Canada emerged with the highest general capital taxes, including death taxes, gift and property taxes, surpassing the United States and Great Britain. It is significant that Germany had a low estate tax and a high rate of economic growth compared with Britain where there was a high death tax rate and very low economic growth. The study asks: "Are our estate tax laws designed to chastise or to welcome investors and job creators?" In my opinion the rather violent reaction engendered by the minister's estate tax formula is generally the result of the inflationary period through which we have passed and which we will likely continue to experience for a number of the years.

The minister has stated that 95 per cent of Canadians will not be involved in estate tax. I suggest that the percentage will be much less than he has forecast and that in the future many more people will be involved inasmuch as once this legislation is on the statute books it will not be changed for a number of years. Even with the proviso that estates of $50,000 or less will not be taxed, in the near future many more estates will be taxed and the numbers will grow in volume even though the real value remains constant owing to the inflationary change.

Indeed, unless most farms and small businesses have capital of over $50,000 they will not provide for their owners any reasonable degree of standard of living. The capitalization on western farms, in order to return the owner $5,000 or $6,000 a year even including the operator's wages, needs to be in the order of $60,000 to $100,000. The general philosophy of the farmer and small businessman in his earlier years was to save money out of his income to build up his business so he would have more to retire on or to pass on to his family. In recent years the Canadian economic climate has not been directed at all toward the building up of savings for the farmer and small businessman to pay off their obligations. We have become a very consumptive type of society in which we are projecting a philosophy that everyone is entitled to consume without the corresponding proviso that he should produce.

Regardless of the perhaps basic philosophy that all personal resources should return to the estate on the individual's death, I believe we are overlooking one very important factor that has not received much consideration or debate by our people. It has been said by many that automation will replace many people in the manufacture of the products we consume, but a recent study by the Economic Council of Canada in its fifth annual review would indicate that we are moving steadily into an economy that is becoming increasingly service-oriented. A service-oriented economy is a difficult area in which to establish a high level of efficiency. For instance, in the United States last year the health service field was considered to be the third largest industry, with the projection that it would become the largest industry within a few years.

The service field is an area where it is increasingly difficult to carry out an efficient operation. The Canadian Economic Council's analysis of changes in the growth pattern of the Canadian economy discloses a really amazing trend. In the period from 1946 to 1966 Canada experienced an enormous expansion and diversification of industrial activity, but the more striking fact is that all the employment growth took place in the service industries. While the shares of the goods producing and service producing sections have remained approximately constant in value of output—each section accounting for roughly 50 per cent throughout the period—the shares in terms of employment have changed places.

In 1946 the goods producing industries accounted for about 60 per cent of total employment; in 1966 the service producing industries accounted for about 60 per cent. In the goods producing industries real output expanded about 5 per cent annually while employment did not expand at all, so that the real growth was about 5 per cent annually per worker. In the service industries real output expanded more than 4 per cent annually but employment grew almost as fast and the growth rate of output per worker was only about 1 per cent annually.

In western Europe the service industries account for only about 35 per cent of the employment as opposed to 60 per cent in Canada. This creates a marked imbalance in growth rates between the economies of Canada and western Europe and if carried forward could result in difficulties for our economy. This means that we must look increasingly for greater efficiency in our economy.

I believe it is becoming more and more important that the small individual entrepreneur be encouraged to remain and increase his stake in the economic growth of the country, and that our society would be sadly lacking if it attempted to dispense with these people. Management is very important in our economy. Indeed, management is just as important as labour, and unless the two are very closely joined labour is unable to progress without good management. The fact that farm management has increased its efficiency faster than any other part of our economy in the past two decades indicates that the individual farmer is as efficient as his large industrial counterpart. Indeed, an analysis of the position of the Soviet Union shows that relatively many more people are needed to work in agriculture in that country than in North America to produce the food needed to feed the country. The Economic Council suggests that larger farms, new technology, better inputs and research in agriculture are necessary to raise productivity in food production, processing and distribution.

It is my contention, Mr. Speaker, that the estate tax will work to discourage individual initiative and saving, at least in the lower strata of those who will be paying the state taxes. Consider the man of 50, either a small businessman or farmer, who has been moderately successful. He sees an opportunity to expand but realizes that perhaps he should decide that the accumulation of wealth is not worth the worry, the saving and the reducing of his standard of living so that he may expand his business. So he remains at his present economic level, takes a trip to Hawaii or does some other spending in a consumptive way. Yet in the 50-70 age group are often found many of the best managers in our economy. We are the poorer if these entrepreneurs suddenly decide that work, worry and striving only bring trouble with the income tax department or with estate tax in the event of his death. I believe we cannot stress too strongly that the individual entrepreneur is a very important part of our financial picture and contributes greatly to our economic efficiency as a society. The estate tax in its present form is retrogressive.

It is well known that there is another aspect of this tax that is not quite realized. It is an expensive tax to collect from the government's point of view and it is costly to the estate to present its case. In many smaller estates where the tax revenue is small the cost of collecting is greater than the tax received by the treasury. To present its side of the case the estate in turn has to hire expensive accountants, lawyers, etc., all of whom must be paid. This further reduces the value of the estate and is eventually a loss to the whole community and country.

It is a tax where there are many grey areas, where inspectors far removed from the scene of the estate often over value. Indeed, it is very difficult to evaluate much property in small communities where real estate may sell very infrequently and land values may vary by 50 per cent in a year, or in a mile. The estate tax often attempts to tax goodwill in a business when it is advantageous to the tax department. But the breakdown value may be much less and the heirs to the estate may choose to cease business or, if possible, sell the business. To sell to another Canadian only increases his estate problems on his death, and the logical choice is to sell to foreign capital, usually American.

I do not believe it is by accident that the three prairie provinces are the ones that are in the process of rebating the federal portion of the estate tax revenues. The prairies do not want to accept any measure which might slow their resource development. They have no basic concern about the origins of capital that will pour into those provinces for the development of petroleum, mineral and other resources. The economic nationalism to be found in the east is foreign to the prairies. The contrast between the free trading west and the protectionist east is as old as confederation itself. It has been lessened somewhat by the tariff reductions since the end of the war, but much difference of thought lies between those who live by the exploitation of resources and those who manufacture.

We must consider this tax in our federal approach to the constitutional issue. The economic forces in Canada tend to divide rather than unite. In its approach to the estate tax the federal government is pursuing a policy that is basically not in keeping with the aims and aspirations of the western provinces and the fundamental pull of the economic forces under which they operate.

This bill is largely a reform of the existing estate tax law. It is too bad that in his wisdom the minister did not increase the exemption in line with the rapid rise of inflation to a position where the application of estate taxes would have some relation in real money to what the levels were 15 or 20 years ago. It is my contention that the tax starts too low and is graduated too steeply. I would hope the minister would consider this and make the appropriate changes in the bill before it is finally passed.

Mr. D. Gordon Blair (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, we are engaged in a discussion about two of the most sombre facts of existence—death and taxes. Such a discussion is sombre enough in itself but this one has been rendered all the more difficult, and I might even say more horrendous, by the vast degree of exaggeration and misrepresentation which have characterized discussion of the government's proposal. One would think from the remarks we have heard this afternoon that even the beneficient parts of the proposal would be opposed by members of the opposition parties. For example, the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Muir) can only be said to have damned with faint praise the proposal that bequests and gifts to widows be exempt, and I would like to see how he and his colleagues will vote on that.

We suggest that the changes which are proposed by the bill are in the national interest and will not bear heavily on any significant section of the Canadian economy. I speak on this bill as one who represents a constituency which can be said to be approximately 50 per cent rural and 50 per cent urban. There is no question in my mind that the urban dwellers in Canada approve wholeheartedly the changes which are proposed.

We live in a society which all of us like to believe can be described as one where a large degree of equality of opportunity prevails. We live in a society where all of us would like to believe that it is the worth of the individual, his effort and his own competence which will lead him to success in life. We live in a society where most people like to believe that a man is judged by what he is, not who he is, not whose son he is.

When I hear some of the comments that are made by hon. members opposite I wonder whether they are opposing this bill or are opposing estate taxes and succession duties as such. This is not at all clear from many things that have been said. I do not think that the people of this country require public men to apologize for the fact that taxes are levied on estates. The time has long since gone when this was a discussible or debatable proposition.

Certainly there is no strong determining mood in this country to confiscate wealth or to confiscate estates, but I think it is the feeling of the great majority of Canadians that we should not live in a society where large blocks of inherited wealth are passed on from generation to generation to the detriment of many people who are not in the fortunate position of sharing in that inherited wealth, and none of us who support this bill, nor public men who through the years have supported estate taxes and succession duties, need apologize for the position that has been taken.

The essential parts of the present proposal have been described many times in this chamber. On the one hand, the government has proposed that bequests and gifts of all kinds to wives and, indeed, to husbands should be tax exempt and, on the other hand, the government has proposed that to make good the loss of revenue that has occurred there be adjustments elsewhere in the tax structure.

It is significant for all of us here to realize that we are not the only country which is giving consideration to changes in tax policy. For example, as we all know there has recently been a change in the administration in the United States. Last week it was announced in the New York Times that serious thought is being given by the treasury department in the United States to the adoption of the very types of proposals which have been made to us in this parliament, that gifts and bequests to wives be exempted from taxation and that as a countervailing measure there be a stiffer rate of tax on gifts inter vivos and a higher rate throughout the estate tax structure. Incidentally, with reference to a table produced, I think, by the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Ritchie) or perhaps it was the hon. member for Lisgar, that there is very little difference in the incidence of estate tax in the United States and in Canada in percentage terms, and it would be very hard for anybody to say that the American economy is stagnant and has been made so by estate taxes.

I think I am not unique in this chamber in having participated in a large number of discussions with my constituents about the incidence of the new estate tax. As I said a moment ago, there is no question that the changes have been widely accepted in the urban part of my constituency where the predominant interest is that of the public service, but because of the exaggerated and inflammatory discussion about the consequences of this tax which appeared in certain farm newspapers I found to my very great surprise that some farmers in my constituency had become inordinately alarmed about what would happen if this tax measure were passed. I thought it might be of some interest to hon. members if I were to relate some of the things I have said to my constituents which bear upon the concern expressed in rural Canada about the incidence and implications of this tax.

One thing which struck me immediately was that many farmers spoke as if this was the first time estate taxes or succession duties had been applied in this country. As we know, of course, this is not so. I cannot speak for all the provinces but in the province of Ontario succession duties or inheritance taxes have been collected by the provincial government since 1892. Everybody here knows that the dominant interest of government in the estate tax or succession duty field has been provincial. It was not until 1941 that the federal government entered the succession duty and estate tax field. This was done at that time as part of a series of wartime tax agreements under which the provinces in effect rented certain of their taxing jurisdiction to the federal government.

In the discussion which has taken place on this measure it has frequently been said by spokesmen on this side of the house that the provincial interest in estate taxes remains predominant. In the province of Ontario approximately 75 per cent of the taxes paid on death go to the provincial government and only 25 per cent go to the federal government. This is a fact which seems to be greatly overlooked by many critics, particularly critics on the other side of the house who I think might support the present provincial government.

I have before me a table I have prepared showing the comparative incidence of Ontario succession duties, the present estate tax and the proposed estate tax. It is based upon what, from the standpoint of the new estate tax, is the most difficult assumption, namely, a father leaving the whole of his estate to only one adult son. This corresponds with the case put by so many farmers that they intend in one way or another to pass the whole of their estate to one son so that the farm can be carried on in the farm family.

If the estate is valued at $50,000 no Ontario succession duty tax is paid, no tax is payable under the present estate tax and no tax is payable under the proposed estate tax. If the estate is valued at $100,000 the Ontario succession duty amounts to $7,910, the present estate tax amounts to $5,100 and the proposed estate tax amounts to $6,600. If the estate is valued at $150,000 the Ontario succession duty would amount to $13,950, the present estate tax would amount to $10,700 and the proposed estate tax would amount to $13,350. If the estate is valued at $200,000 the Ontario succession duty would take 20,348, the present estate tax would take $16,800 and the proposed estate tax would take $21,600.

These figures lead all of us to certain important conclusions. The first is that many farmers in this province obviously are unaware of the nature of their estate tax liability. It is clear that many people with whom I have spoken personally were completely unaware of the fact that for estates up to $100,000 under the present and proposed estate tax more money would be taken by the Ontario succession duty than by the federal estate tax.

Another thing which I found extraordinary, and which we all must recognize as a fact, is that many farmers in my constituency, and I have no doubt elsewhere in the country, were completely unaware of the total level of their liability for their estate. Let me, for example, quote again the incidence of tax on an estate of $100,000. The Ontario succession duty would amount to $7,900, the present estate tax would amount to $5,100, and the net tax would be $13,000. Under the proposed estate tax it would be increased by $1,500.

Many people with whom I spoke felt that for the first time they were to be taxed under this proposal when in fact they were already taxed at a high level and the added tax is relatively small. The discussion on this matter in the province of Ontario has been complicated by the fact that many people have been unaware of the present provision in the federal Estate Tax Act which is being carried forward that a tax credit of 50 per cent is given to the taxpayer in recognition of the fact that he has to pay Ontario succession duty. I, and I am sure other hon. members, have seen Ontario publications which have recited what was alleged to be the tax payable under this proposal in this province but which have failed to take into account the fact that the tax is reduced by 50 per cent by reason of the fact that Ontario succession duty is payable.

I should say that the figures I have quoted are net figures making allowance for the 50 per cent tax credit. I have found that the initial concern of farmers in my constituency, and I believe in eastern Ontario, about the proposed tax changes has been to an almost complete extent allayed and removed as a result of further study and consideration. The attempt which some people have made, whether intentionally or not—someone has said intentionally; I hope that is not so but it could be—to portray this tax as if it were a new imposition completely different in kind and character from anything farmers or businessmen have ever experienced before has been dissipated, I think, by the knowledge which has come from greater study of this measure.

It is my belief that no farmer who in any way could be described as an average farmer in this province is put in a perilous position by the tax change. It is my considered opinion that this tax will not have any of the horrendous effects which have been ascribed to it. The headlines which have appeared in farm newspapers to the effect that the new estate tax will doom the family farm are simply untrue and cannot be substantiated by the facts. In fact, I would go so far as to say that the making of this change in estate tax law will produce an unintended benefit for many farmers and businessmen.

I repeat again that a large number of people were simply unaware of the fact that they were exposed to a very substantial degree of taxation under the existing law. They now realize what their existing tax liabilities were, and many of them for the first time are turning their attention to ways and means of reorganizing their affairs in order to lessen the incidence and burden of taxation. I need not tell hon. members that there are many ways in which farmers in particular can reorganize their farm business to their own advantage and in such a fashion as to lessen the incidence of taxation. I say in answer to those concerned about the incidence of estate tax that this change to a considerable extent will be beneficial to many farmers.

Although no one welcomes tax changes, it is easier to live with them when we can see, as we do here, that the main change will provide a beneficial relief to widows from the burden of estate tax. It is much easier then to take into account the upward adjustments in the tax structure elsewhere. Bearing in mind, as I have been trying to point out by these few remarks, that the upward adjustment in the tax structure applicable in this province is not likely to create any appreciable extra tax liability, I suggest that this measure should command our support and should be adopted.

Hon. Hugh John Flemming (Carleton-Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to try to summarize in detail the proposals of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) as embodied in these two bills, but I hope to be able to persuade him to consider the lack of encouragement or in fact the actual discouragement that these two bills will offer to the ambitious people whose efforts in connection with the general economic activity of Canada are most important.

I do not believe it is reasonable to compare the value of estates in this year of our Lord, 1969, with those that existed 15 or 20 years ago because there has been an increase in valuations which has been brought about to quite a large extent by the inflationary activities of which the present government and its predecessor in office have been guilty. I offer as proof of this statement the fact that within the last few days the government, through the minister, has placed estimates before the house calling for expenditures of $11,500 million, an increase of almost 10 per cent over last year. Presumably the government has to make a choice between cutting expenditures and increasing taxes. It would appear that it has decided it is easier to increase taxes. I do not agree with this decision. The argument may have been advanced, and I do not say it was not advanced by the minister, that there should be a combination of both. I do not believe that the need for balanced budgets should come about as the result of increases in taxation.

The previous speaker laboured hard—no doubt as a lawyer he has had bad cases before and has tried to make good cases of them—to put across the idea that this is not a new tax. The thing he avoided telling the house was that it is an increase in taxation.

Mr. Benson: Oh, no.

Mr. Flemming: Yes, it is an increase in taxation. The minister will have an opportunity to speak in rebuttal. He may pick out isolated instances to prove his point, but this is not the case in respect of small estates.

Mr. Benson: It is over all.

Mr. Flemming: The minister is including estates up to $2 million, $3 million or $4 million, but how many of them are there in Canada? There is no use in the minister trying to pull the wool over my eyes because I have checked this point and I am confident that what I am saying is correct. If the minister intends to try to convince the people otherwise, that is something he will have to undertake in time.

There is one point on which I think the minister will agree. I refer to the need for dampening the forces of inflation, which calls for reductions in spending. Instead, the government has apparently initiated policies which have had the effect of pouring oil and fanning the fires of inflation to the complete frustration of the objective I have just suggested. The government has never ceased to add to the already overly large public service. A real tightening of the belt by anyone in a position to contribute to the success of a policy of restraint and restriction has apparently never been considered. At least, there have been no results. One has only to check his incoming mail to see this. Every day one receives a great number of calls for additions to the public services.

I do not suggest that public services should be reduced, but when there is need for additional public servants people could be transferred. Instead, we experience more and more spending such as the interior decoration at a cost of $100,000 per room about which we have heard. There is more and more disregard by the government of the taxpayers who will in the final analysis be asked to pay the shot. There is more and more indifference to the general danger of inflation than ever before. This government inherited, and apparently it intends to continue it, a policy of spend and spend and tax and tax with the hope that it will be elected and elected again. Perhaps this is not absolutely strange. It was put in operation in the country to the south a good many years ago. But I say to the house that it is still not a policy that leads to the general progress of any country.

The estate tax is divided so that 75 per cent goes to the provinces by various means. This continues to be government policy and it is recorded at page 1685 of Hansard in the minister's speech. I believe the total estimated revenue from this source is $200 million, of which the federal government will retain $50 million. I point out that this amount represents increased taxation for the purpose of making up the loss incurred by establishing total exemption of estates passing from husband to wife and vice-versa.

This brings one to consider another point. The previous speaker went to some length and took great care to try to convince us that this was a most desirable thing. I suggest there is room for argument here. I think this change in attitude deserves more thought than the minister and the government have apparently given it. In the case of a small business or a farm which suddenly becomes the responsibility of a wife owing to the death of her husband the wife suffers hardship in trying to manage the farm or business herself or to secure adequate help to conduct the business with a succession duty liability of up to 50 per cent of the value. I know that 50 per cent is applicable only to extreme cases and probably does not apply to many farms, but nevertheless this possibility exists. Here is a woman who at the death of her husband has no one to lean on unless she has a son or sons. There is a succession duty liability facing the property and it is only deferred for an uncertain period. Suppose she has sons who are faced with this financial liability and responsibility. I ask the minister, how enthusiastic will such people be to take over the property and manage it, whether it be a farm or small business?

The minister has had a lot of experience in business and he knows that this happens. He must know it by virtue of his experience because even I know it with my limited experience. I will tell you what happens, Mr. Speaker. The widow sells the property or the business at a sacrifice price. So I take exception to the conclusion drawn by the previous speaker that this is a wonderful measure for the widow. I submit that she would be better off if her husband gave her a life income from the property and then at her death it went to her children. That would be much better.

Mr. Blair: Mr. Speaker, would my hon. friend permit a question? Is it not a fact that under the new arrangements a similar provision could be made to give the widow an income as opposed to capital?

Mr. Flemming: I believe there is a qualification that if this is incorporated in the will or if a new will is made this may be brought about, but it would not mean the full estate unless she gets the full estate.

In my opinion the great disadvantage of this measure will become apparent if that same widow is advised to sell her property to a competitor or to an outside interest that has no wish to continue the business as such and closes it down. I suggest to the minister that this will aggravate the unemployment problem and the maintaining of maximum employment at all times. I say it is an important consideration in the life of this or any country to have its citizens working hand in hand with the government to provide maximum employment. No one would disagree with that.

In the morning's issue of the Montreal Gazette we read the following headline: "Regional Disparity To Be All-out Focus Of Incentives Act". In my opinion the very use of the word "incentives" means that the government is conscious of the need for soliciting at all times the utmost co-operation from the business sector in the country. The article mentions the minister, and it also contains the following statement:

> Under this system, federal and provincial governments would agree on one or more towns in an underdeveloped area and provide incentive programs to encourage industrial growth there.

[Mr. Flemming.]

Again I draw the minister's attention to the use of the word "incentive". I do not think that any free society or any country or government can get along nearly as well without the utmost co-operation of business and all concerned as they can with it, and I would like to think that this is the attitude and the opinion of the government and the minister.

We find that the Minister of Forestry and Rural Development (Mr. Marchand) will introduce new incentives, but at the same time the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) in the bill now under discussion lessens and in some cases eliminates old incentives. So one minister will bring them in and another will take them out. This government giveth and taketh away, almost in one breath.

Last week a federal-provincial conference was held and was broadcast throughout Canada. I was able to watch and listen owing to special circumstances. I saw the Minister of Finance sitting in the front seat alongside the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), and I know that he is familiar with what took place on the day that I will mention now. I was impressed with many aspects of the conference, but I do not mind saying what particularly aroused my interest. It was the tenacious insistence by the premier of Manitoba on the interest of the taxpayer and on a discussion the following morning of the taxation burdens imposed by all levels of government, federal, provincial and municipal, upon the taxpayer. This was complied with by the Prime Minister and the subject was discussed. My point is that of all the people attending the conference, with the exception of the premier of Ontario the premier of Manitoba was the only man who mentioned the following day that gentleman who in my judgment is the forgotten man—the taxpayer. I remember his words. He said: said:

> Let us examine the effects of all taxation upon the man who pays, no matter what level of government imposes the tax.

That is what was done, and this is what impressed me. In my opinion, in this legislation the federal government is completely ignoring its effect upon the taxpayer. It appears that I was not the only one impressed. I was interested to read an article in the Globe and Mail of February 12 written by Mr. Scott Young in which he went to great pains to elaborate on the number of congratulatory messages which had been received by the premier. There were 45. One of these, apparently received through a secretary from an admirer in Chatham, Ontario, read:

● (4:20 p.m.)

We watched your premier on television. We're 100 per cent behind him. He is being firm and strong for the benefit of Canada, especially on the taxes deal.

So I was not the only one to be impressed by the premier of Manitoba.

Let us consider the response so far as the premier of Ontario is concerned. First of all, he said that medicare was a fraud. Right?

Mr. Benson: How did you vote?

Mr. Flemming: The minister asked how I voted. Possibly it is a good question. I voted for the principle but I did not vote to apply it when we have a $750 million deficit brought about by the actions of this government. We voted for the principle of the bill but we did not vote for its application without knowing where the money is coming from.

I have had experience on both sides of the house. The opposition does not govern. If we were governing I could give some of the answers. As things stand, people do not vote against the principle of doing something, but they do not agree with everything the government does to bring it about, at any unsuitable time, without money—

Mr. Benson: You voted on every clause, including the date.

Mr. Flemming: I do not blame the minister for trying to wriggle out, because I think he should try to do so.

The premier of Ontario described the medicare measure as being Machiavellian. I should like to read to the house the meaning of that word as given by the Globe and Mail in its report of the conference that day, because I think it will be of interest to the government and to the Minister of Finance in particular. It says:

Niccolo Machiavelli, who died in 1527, was a Florentine statesman and author of a treatise on politics known as The Prince. The aim of his book was to show that rulers may resort to any treachery and artifice to uphold their arbitrary powers. Although there has been some controversy over the interpretation of his works, his name is frequently used as an epithet or synonym for an unscrupulous politician and the term Machiavellian to describe political cunning and diplomatic intrigue.

Nobody interrupted or contradicted the premier of Ontario when he applied that label to the introduction of the medicare bill.

Mr. Benson: I did.

Mr. Flemming: The minister says he did and I certainly take his word for it, though I did not hear him. I did hear him say that Ontario members had voted for it.

Mr. Benson: That is right.

Mr. Flemming: And the chances are they will answer for it; they will not be here in the next parliament.

Mr. Benson: It is you who will not be here.

Mr. Flemming: I would be glad to have the minister come down and run in New Brunswick if that is the way he feels about it.

Mr. Baldwin: He will have too much trouble in his own riding next time.

Mr. Flemming: He will not be here.

This government is, without question, the greatest government for irresponsibility that the country has ever seen. In June of 1966 the 10 per cent tax reduction they had allowed was reimposed. Early in January, after they had been defeated in the house, they wiggled around and got a 3 per cent tax put on. The government had been defeated on the 5 per cent proposal. Then they put on the 3 per cent tax. Now they are putting on a 2 per cent tax. It will be confirmed; there is no question about that.

Let me remind the minister that the 2 per cent tax imposes a great burden on many people. I have particularly in mind families where the man and his wife are both working. It is quite within the realm of possibility that their combined income is $12,000 a year, upon which the 2 per cent tax would amount to some $20 a month. I assume the minister has received letters to the effect that these people do not know how the extra money will be raised, taking into account all their expenses and so on. They are making an extraordinary effort to balance their budgets and they do not know where the money for this tax will come from. But the 2 per cent has been imposed, and apparently the provinces do not like it.

So far as the federal-provincial conference is concerned, I shall conclude by expressing the hope that the committees which have been set up can agree on worth-while recommendations to be presented to the next meeting. I hope something may be done about the prevention and eventual elimination of duplication of activity as between federal and provincial governments. There is a lot of duplication at present; there is no doubt about that. There are places where co-operative activity is a logical course. Since the provinces are anxious to co-operate with the federal government I think they should be encouraged in this regard.

I am one who believes quite firmly that no country can operate without a strong central government. We in this great country of Canada must have a strong central government. I would just as soon not have the government which is sitting opposite at the present time, but I still believe that a strong central government is a necessity.

I have talked about the 2 per cent surtax. I have talked a little about indirect taxation which is really a spur to inflation. Before the minister concludes this debate I think he should tell the house what he proposes to do about the high cost of living, because that is really the product of inflation. Is the government taking steps to stimulate economic expansion? Is it taking steps to increase productivity? These are questions which I direct to the minister. I am not asking for the views of hon. members behind me to my right. Inflation is a deadly and disastrous thing. It creates a vicious, never-ending circle of higher prices and higher living costs unless kept within due bounds. Under no circumstances should increases in price ever exceed increases in productivity. It should be the aim of governments, unless there is a special economic situation existing such as excessive unemployment, to maintain the purchasing power of the people.

I intend to read an editorial along these lines which appeared in the Toronto Telegram of January 25. It reads in part as follows:

As taxes and inflation soar, as the Ottawa government piles cost on cost in its annual operations, Canadians pursue a massive indifference.

If we think Benson and company will stop at a social development tax, take a look at his quiet but incisive inroads into tax recommendations of the Carter report.

Farther down in the same column the article states:

Business Week, in an otherwise buoyant report on the Canadian economy in 1969, offered the staggering information that Canadians earning middle management salaries, that is in the $10,000 to $25,000 bracket, are taxed at a 25 per cent greater rate in Canada than in the United States. Here as in the U.S., many of these income earners are men on their way up, moving into higher incomes.

[Mr. Flemming.]

• (4:30 p.m.)

In the second column, under the heading "Hoodwinked" appears this statement:

The fact is we have been hoodwinked by successive finance ministers for a very long time and we have let ourselves believe they have performed well on our behalf. In late February, 1968, only a year ago, former Finance Minister Mitchell Sharp said this: "We are going to have to cut back or cut out a number of things we have been doing . . . this government is determined to keep its own finances in order—"

I do not have the same opinion of the previous finance minister as his former colleague, Miss LaMarsh; I have a high opinion of him. However, he was not successful in what he wanted to do. I am one of those who believe that he did make an effort. I am not saying that the present Minister of Finance has not made an effort, but neither minister has been very successful. They were unable to persuade the free spenders and people who were irresponsible—some of our friends here are probably good examples—and as a result they were voted down. The article continues:

In simplified form, Friedman says that fiscal and monetary policies, the chief weapons against recession and inflation, have been consistently misused. Too much emphasis is placed on changes in taxes and federal spending by North American governments, local as well as federal. The tool to be emphasized is not the hammer blow of more taxes, but the increase in the money supply.

People do not ordinarily vote for something they do not agree with. I do not say that an excessive increase in the money supply should always be avoided but it should be approached very carefully. I am convinced that the Minister of Finance agrees with me.

My last quotation in this series is taken from the Globe and Mail for January 30. Under the heading "Viewpoint" there is a report by Mr. I. H. Asper, a Winnipeg lawyer.

Mr. Benson: Yes, I am aware of him.

Mr. Flemming: No doubt the minister's recollection of him is favourable. The article says:

The finance department disputes the suggestion that estate taxes are a larger factor in the break-up of family businesses and in foreign takeover of Canadian industry. Mr. Benson argues that he has evidence to the contrary.

If such evidence is available it should be made public in order to end this protracted debate. Such evidence apparently was not available to the late Grant Glassco when in the 1956 royal commission on Canada's economic prospects he reported that several factors "including our succession duty system, tend positively to discourage ownership of companies by Canadians."

I wonder what the minister thinks of that statement.

> Mr. Glassco also warned that "concern as to the amount of succession duty and fear of inability to obtain these funds . . . has been one of the major factors in the transfer of ownership of many Canadian private businesses to foreign control."

That is exactly what I have been saying in these remarks. The widow who is left with a small business and no one to manage it has no recourse but to sell it. Although I know my plea will be unsuccessful, I suggest to the minister that this cloud is not entirely silver-lined, that there are some aspects of the matter he should take a second look at. The article goes on:

> Perhaps Mr. Glassco was in error, but it must be more than coincidental that the same conclusion was reached in a 1968 study by the Ontario Economic Council after the researchers actually interviewed the people who had sold their businesses to foreigners.

I now return to my argument relative to the principle of an increase in the estate tax. Having denied that there is anything wrong with the act I should like to congratulate the minister for persuading the government to change the statutory exemption of $20,000 to $50,000. However, I do not consider this figure high enough. In view of the large dose of inflation we have received since this government assumed office, and perhaps even before that, I believe the figure should be raised to at least $75,000. With the old ceiling of $60,000 this would represent an increase of 25 per cent. I submit that the value of small estates has risen much more than that.

I recall to mind one gentleman in my own business who operates five trailer trucks and hauls lumber to the United States for my company. Each one of these machines costs over $50,000. If you were to ask this man whether he is liable to succession duty, he would reply: "Oh, no, I don't have that kind of money". But his widow would soon find out whether he is liable to succession duty.

Mr. Crouse: His trucks would go.

Mr. Flemming: Yes, she would not know what to do with them. However, my point is that all is not sunshine or a bed of roses in this provision in regard to total exemption on gifts from husband to wife. I am not going to worry about the case of the widower, but certainly it is not all sunshine for the widow.

I regret any increase in tax—and may I tell the member who spoke before me that this is what it is—because it is an attack upon the spirit of thrift, upon the desire on the part of some Canadians, I hope many, to accumulate an estate. Surely the accumulation of an estate is the right of any member of a free society, and for a great variety of reasons it may be most necessary to pass on one's heritage to one's family.

May I draw to your attention, Mr. Speaker, that no one tries to accumulate an estate for his own use. One builds an estate so that those who come after will have some assurance of future development. In addition, employment opportunities may be created. I know of many sons who developed their fathers' businesses and enlarged them ten times because these businesses were given to them on the death of the fathers. The establishment of an estate means that the sons and daughters may start out in life with the opportunity of receiving an education and the chance of establishing themselves.

It is the right of every citizen in a free nation to use his abilities, mental and physical, as a means to ensure to his dependants an opportunity to take a step up in the economic scale. Is there anything wrong with that? Will the minister and this government, in their frantic search for funds to continue a spending spree that is destroying the credit and economy of this country, deprive fellow Canadians of their right to pass on a reasonable portion of the accumulated wealth of their lifetimes, having paid income tax year after year, to members of their own families? Although the minister will say that he is not denying them this right, he is nevertheless increasing taxes and this is what I object to. This tax should not be increased because too many people are affected. Too many people will be discouraged by the increase. The government should be encouraging these people and assisting them. I should like to hear the minister's answer to this question before he closes this debate. If the answer is in the affirmative, then we have no choice but to face the facts.

I wonder whether the government introduces measures of this type purely because of economic considerations; or do ideological considerations influence it in introducing them?

Mr. Baldwin: This is the thin end of the wedge.

Mr. Flemming: I am against this legislation because it penalizes thrift at a time when the indirect tax of government created inflation has eaten into fixed incomes and because it will remove the incentive to save. Certainly there is a case for reducing estate tax rates in a country where taxation is becoming the highest in the free world. The government has not made out a case for increasing the tax rate, and I ask the minister to consider increasing the exemption level to $75,000. Unless action is taken the estate tax will hasten the liquidation of small businesses and farm properties. That fact is clearly set out in studies prepared for the Ontario Economic Council, which has said:

> The most predominant reason (for sale) was the fact the business would have had to be sold to meet estate taxes and succession duties—

I acknowledge that the minister has improved this legislation by bringing in a provision permitting succession duties to be paid over six years. This may help some businesses to survive, but the majority will not survive notwithstanding that provision. You see, Mr. Speaker, the lady who inherits a business will not be able to manage it. You may think credit is scarce; I can tell you that staff capable of exercising management responsibilities is even scarcer. What will the woman who is left a small farm or business do? She has to meet death duties and other expenses. I am convinced that by virtue of his profession the minister has run across situations that come under this heading. On this subject he said on January 17, as reported in the Globe and Mail:

> The estate tax does place a burden on the transfer of family businesses between generations but I have satisfied myself that the burden is not undue.

With respect, I am satisfied that the minister is wrong in his conclusion. The estate tax is often the straw that tips the scale in favour of the sale of the business. The estate tax reduces the amount of money available for investment and penalizes enterprise. That is not to the government's advantage. The greatest contribution to inflation has been made by government spending which by stimulating inflation has reduced the purchasing power of the dollar by as much as 20 per cent in five years.

The minister has changed the floor below which estate tax will not be levied from $20,000 to $50,000. Otherwise the rates remain the same. I think I am correct in that statement. If I am not correct I hope the minister will correct me. The bill also contains new exemptions for children, which are welcome. A feature of the estate tax legislation is a provision allowing for the valuation of estates by the minister. I do not know under what machinery estates will be valued; I presume that machinery has not changed.

We live in a democracy, Mr. Speaker, and our laws must take into account the rights of individuals. In framing laws legislators must make certain they do not transgress individual rights and do not abuse the concept of equity. The estate tax, as it is now proposed, is an abuse of that concept. Moreover, it is economically unsound and socially unwise. It is destructive of individual rights and abusive of our social structure.

In concluding may I say that I appreciate the attention the house has been willing to give me. I ask the minister to give all the attention to my remarks that he thinks they deserve.

Mr. William Knowles (Norfolk-Haldimand): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak in this debate chiefly because a flood of correspondence has come to me from the people of my riding complaining about and opposing the changes in the estate tax introduced by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson).

Notwithstanding the suggestions of hon. members opposite, I wish to make it abundantly clear that I am not opposed to taxing accumulations of great wealth, but I do not want to see small economic units such as small farms and small businesses taxed out of existence. Small farms and businesses are the backbone of this nation and of the rural area I have the honour to represent.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Knowles (Norfolk-Haldimand): Our small farms and businesses provide an income for many persons. The owners of small businesses have an incentive to work hard and prosper.

Actually, the new estate tax proposals were contained in the October budget speech of the Minister of Finance. I well recall that night and the thunder of applause which swept this chamber as the minister announced that estates could pass from husband to wife without taxation. Although the estate tax amendments were mentioned in the speech the public did not become aware of the proposals until a number of months had elapsed. It takes time for public opinion to become aroused. The full impact of the proposals took some time to reach the public, and they caused a great deal of anxiety and grief. The confusion following the introduction of this legislation is exemplified by the fact that lawyers could not advise their clients on how to draw wills in a way most advantageous to them. The best advice any lawyer could give a client was, "Do not die before the new proposals become law."

As I said, it takes time for the public to become aware of proposals put before this house. It took time for public opinion to make itself felt with respect to proposed rule 16A. If public opinion had not been aroused, that rule undoubtedly would have been incorporated in the Standing Orders of the house. It was an aroused public opinion that made the minister change the proposed legislation. Although the changes do not go far enough and are minor, they are heartily welcome.

I represent a tobacco growing area in Ontario. To indicate how vigorously some of my constituents have protested the new legislation may I be permitted to read some correspondence I received from small businessmen and farmers in my area. May I first read a letter dated January 27. The writer is a tobacco farmer.

The tobacco farm industry in our area was developed by all members of the family working long hours with no pay to establish a living. These are small businesses in which sons and daughters contributed, in many cases without pay,—

The new proposed estate tax law would mean many of these farms would have to be sold to obtain money to pay the estate tax. There are no liquid assets available, only land, equipment and buildings, and each year 90 per cent of the farmers borrow money from banks to finance the high cost of producing the crop. This is a risk crop in which hail or frost can wipe out your earnings for that year and affect your financial position for future or present commitments.

Forced farm sales to raise cash means low prices because most of the farms sell here on low cash down payments with one-quarter crop payments to pay off the balance over many years. For example a $200,000 farm—

You may think this is an exaggeration but it is not.

—$10,000 down and one-quarter crop payments until balance is paid off. Farms do not sell for $200,000 cash. The one-quarter crop payment works well since in years of loss by hail or frost the owner has only to pay off one-quarter of whatever he sells in that crop year. The new proposed estate tax would put the family farm out of business.

The question is asked, how can he sell the farm to raise the $40,000 cash, plus or minus, required to pay the estate tax and still provide for the other terms in the will? Another question asked is:

What does a son or sons now do for a living after the farm has been sold?

Their means of livelihood is gone. This is the vocation for which they are trained.

Add previous estate planning and amount of labour by sons in farm now dissolved, what steps to take, to insure retaining the farm in the family and providing a living—

He concludes by saying:

Please note income tax has been paid over the years on income from the business. It would be much better to pay a higher rate of income tax each year rather than a large lump sum payment which could wipe out the business as suggested by the new estate tax law.

If I may infringe upon the time of the house, Mr. Speaker, I would like to read the comments of a small businessman. My previous example was a farmer. I quote:

We, the people with a small business, founded in 1843—

That is when the business was founded.

—are frightened about having the hard work of three generations fold up. Under your proposed revision of the succession duties it would be necessary for our sons to forfeit the family business.

We now receive only a modest interest on money invested so that the increased succession duties would make it impossible for our sons to carry on. Fifty-four people employed by us who now pay income taxes would be unemployed.

There are many family businesses operating in the same manner. The letter goes on to say:

Woudn't you be killing the goose that lays the golden egg?

I will quote from one more letter. It shows the despair that fills the hearts and minds of many farmers in my area. It reads:

—at 48 years of age I find myself in a dilemma. When my father passes away I will have to purchase the farm I feel I have already helped pay for. The question I would like answered is this: Where does this leave my teenaged son, will he have to purchase this farm again from my estate? Do you suggest we just give up farming?

These are the feelings of some people in my area. It is these protests I wish to draw to the attention of the minister. Last Saturday a meeting was called by the directors of the Ontario Flue Cured Tobacco Growers Marketing Board for the farmers in the two adjoining townships. One hundred and fifty farmers from this small area attended this meeting on a bright, sunny afternoon. They were concerned about the problem of estate taxes. Of the 150 in attendance at the meeting 75 per cent were newcomers to Canada. They had come to Canada from various homelands in central Europe which had been taken over by the communists and turned into collective farms. Perhaps it was exaggerated, but the feeling was that what these people had once lost in a revolution would again be lost through taxation.

Mr. Benson: That is nonsense.

Mr. Knowles (Norfolk-Haldimand): The result of the discussion at the meeting is that responsible representation is required in this house. I tried to allay their fears somewhat by pointing out that the minister was not really a bogeyman, and that there are ways and means by which estate planning would help ease the burden of estate taxes. The feeling of the farmers in that room was that the proposed estate tax was a negation of the free enterprise theory. They came to this country to earn their living. They do not want handouts from the government. A forced sale is not their idea of fair play in a country like Canada. They felt that an economic unit would be destroyed which would produce wealth for themselves and their sons. They felt there was a contradiction. On the one hand, the Department of Agriculture, through the Farm Credit Corporation, provides farm improvement loans so that farmers may borrow money to increase and enlarge their economic units.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the house that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles)—Health and Welfare—Manitoba—optometric and chiropractic services in medicare plan; the hon. member for Regina East (Mr. Burton)—Transport—discriminatory reductions in express association rates; the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Harding)—Air Transport—Castlegar, B.C.—consultation before change in service.

It being five o'clock the house will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on todays' order paper, namely, public bills, private bills, notices of motions.

[Mr. Knowles (Norfolk-Haldimand).]

PUBLIC BILLS

NATIONAL CAPITAL

ESTABLISHMENT OF PLANNING BOARD

Mr. Lloyd Francis (Ottawa West) moved second reading and reference to the Standing Committee on regional development of Bill C-20, to establish a National Capital Region Planning Board.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to introduce Bill C-20 entitled: "An Act to establish a National Capital Region Planning Board".

Last week, for instance, the future of Canada's provincial capital was settled at the federal-provincial conference. It was proposed to create a capital unequaled in the whole world, a capital made up of the twin cities of Ottawa and Hull, a bilingual capital, the capital of a federal state.

This bill is intended to establish for this region a planning board, which is under discussion at the present time and which has not been determined as yet. It is in the spirit of what the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said last week that I introduce this bill this afternoon.

• (5:00 p.m.)

[English]

Mr. Speaker, this afternoon I present a bill which is designed to call attention to something which is absolutely essential if we are going to build the kind of national capital we have in mind. Last week at the federal-provincial conference a tripartite committee was established of federal officials and provincial officials of Quebec and Ontario to carry forward a series of technical discussions.

Our Canadian national capital, such as it is apparently agreed we will create, will be one without parallel in any other part of the world. It will be a national capital with part in the province of Quebec, with its primary use of the French language, with its own educational institutions, with its own code of property and civil law, and part in the province of Ontario with a different code of property and civil law, with a different educational system and with the primary use of the English language. There is no question that the task of combining the cities of Ottawa and Hull into a functioning federal capital will be a great challenge to Canadians and one which will be the subject of many discussions before it is completed.

I think it is particularly appropriate at this stage that we should have a debate in this place to concern ourselves with some of the absolutely fundamental things that must be decided before we can proceed to build the capital we all want to see. My bill this afternoon calls attention to only one aspect of the problem, that is, the creation of a planning board which will include part of the province of Quebec and part of the province of Ontario within the spirit with which there was general agreement at the federal-provincial conference.

The problems are very complex, Mr. Speaker, and I would like to outline some general features of them. First, there is the problem of resolving the conflicts over land use and traffic arteries. At this stage the province of Ontario has created a regional municipality of Ottawa-Carleton. This has brought a measure of rationalization to the Ontario side of this region which was long overdue. We certainly anticipate that on the Quebec side the 30-odd municipalities involved in the area which seems to be under discussion can be unified through some type of parallel legislation, and there is every evidence that this is under close examination by the Quebec authorities. Then the problem will be to bring together the planners of one side of the river and the planners of the other side of the river.

We are aware of the delicate constitutional problems and do not wish in any respect to minimize them, but surely the very first step must be to bring together in some kind of advisory board representatives of the province of Quebec, the province of Ontario, the federal government and the municipalities concerned. It will be essential, in my opinion, that there be an informal and advisory function at least in the beginning, no more than that, in order that the parties may get to know each other, in order that they can hire the necessary staff to serve the purposes they have in mind, in order to resolve some absolutely essential priorities.

I can think of the new bridges that certainly have to be built over the Ottawa River, but there has been a serious question in my mind whether a bridge for public transit purposes should not have a prior claim over a bridge designed to serve private automobiles. My colleague, the hon. member for Hull (Mr. Isabelle), who I hope will be speaking in this debate, certainly has some very interesting proposals in the field of public transportation, and I am sure these will be examined by the appropriate authorities in the near future.

But, Mr. Speaker, the task of bringing them together is only the first challenge. The second challenge is to somehow, in some kind of orderly way that makes sense, bring a degree of supervision over these functions and a co-ordination of them. This I hope will be the task of the National Capital Commission which was created by act of this parliament and which functions sometimes, I may say, with doubtful constitutional jurisdiction in the area which it considers its primary responsibility, that is, the planning of land use in the national capital region and, if I may say so, the constitutional problem with respect to property and civil rights makes its task not a very easy one. Somehow the role of the National Capital Commission has to be fitted into the planning authority that we propose to create. I am not at all sure that my proposal of 11 members, with the chairman from the N.C.C., five from Ontario and five from Quebec, is the precise answer. I offer it merely as a suggestion of the kind of formula that may be discussed and decided. The numbers might be varied, but I think it would be a useful principle if the chairman of such a planning board were a member of the National Capital Commission because the National Capital Commission is almost the sole agency in a position to look at the whole region in order to take the large view, in order to make the kind of suggestions that we hope will be observed by the municipalities and the provinces.

This is the season of the year when many things begin to stir in our very beautiful national capital region, a region which I think is one of the most beautiful in the world. It is going through the late stages of winter and very soon we will see the springtime. Problems debated in this house in previous years in springtime have followed a very regular and not particularly brilliant pattern.

I see my hon. friend, the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard), in his seat on the other side of the house. For the last four or five years I have followed his springtime incursions into the pothole problem. He looks into his files and pulls out the problem of the condition of Ottawa streets and potholes, and usually he has a television presentation on this matter. Then there is the suggestion that members of this house could do a better job of running municipalities. That has very frequently been mentioned by hon. members who have not had experience in running municipalities, at least according to their background as given in the Parliamentary Guide. May I suggest at this time that we try to rise a little bit above the location of the Union Station and the potholes.

Mr. Peters: It is pretty hard if you drive over the darn things.

Mr. Francis: We hear that record every spring. The hon. member should make a good record of it, bring it out every spring and let it run.

Mr. Peters: We have to go through this every year.

Mr. Francis: I think that the question of the planning of traffic arteries is one of the things that should go before a planning board and should have high priority. There is no question that the city of Ottawa needs a new road to the airport. We do not need any major examination or any consulting firm to tell us that something has to be done about this. It is very obvious. It is equally obvious that there are major problems on the Hull side of the river. The peak hour traffic problems in this whole area are very bad.

But we have to ask ourselves even more fundamental questions than these relatively simple ones. We have to ask ourselves what kind of community are we going to create? What is the role of public transportation in this community? What is the role of private transportation? What incentives are going to be provided to move people in the way that we want to move them, to create the densities in the core of the national capital region that some of the planners want to create? I ask hon. members, please do not give us this spring the usual tirade about how much better members of this house could run the city, and how bad the potholes are.

I suggest it is time that hon. members looked at the larger problem of the creation of a national capital region, at the problem of creating instruments for long-term planning, at the problem of federal and provincial cooperation, at the problem of creating the mood in which the spirit, shall I say, which seemed to exude from last week's federal-provincial conference in this area can be carried forward into something very much more concrete.

I hope hon. members will feel as I do that the first priority of the new federal capital that we are building will be the creation of a planning authority within the spirit of a bilingual national capital with two cities, two provinces, two languages, varying education laws and the rest of it. This is Canada; this is the capital we are apparently resolved to create. Let us build the very necessary instruments in order that it may be carried out.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, after listening to the almost poetic dissertation of the hon. member who sponsored this bill it is somewhat awkward to have to refer to some factual situations. All this bill does is prove the old adage that you cannot tell a book by its cover, because while the title of the bill sounds fine and is well phrased, and while the introductory remarks of the sponsor were nice to listen to, it really would not matter one bit whether we passed the bill because it would not accomplish anything. There is no power in the bill; there is no authority to do anything. No money is to be authorized and there would be no opportunity for whoever happens to be on this board to do anything except exist.

I must give credit to my colleague the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) because there is something in the bill he has pointed out which I would not have noticed. Even the construction of clause 1 is incorrect in a grammatical sense because it does not compare properly with the clause as it appears in the French language. Therefore there is an element of criticism even in regard to the draftsmanship of the bill. This does not worry me because the bill is worthless. It is fine to provide a vehicle by which the member who is the sponsor of the bill can say what should be done and might be done, but in terms of the fundamental essence of doing anything it is just a piece of paper. I am sure the hon. member realizes this. I am not objecting at all to his using this opportunity to say what he thinks should be done. I am just saying that the bill itself if it were put into effect would be meaningless. The hon. member knows this and in fact said so in the explanatory notes.

I was interested in the hon. member's reference to those, presumably including myself who have had no experience in respect of city councils and municipalities. I could not help but recall that the hon. member was a member of the board of control of the city of Ottawa at one time. Obviously he should have used the vast experience he gained in running or misrunning, whatever the case may be, municipalities in drafting his bill so that it would make some sense, have some import and have some value and authority. This simply proves he is a great talker but not much of a doer when it comes to trying to do things.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

An hon. Member: You don't like that.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): My friends may be able to dish it out but they cannot take it in return; that is fairly obvious. The sponsor of the bill said himself that the bill was designed simply to call attention to a problem. In other words, the bill is a vehicle by which to make a speech, but I do not disagree that he should use this opportunity because this in part is what parliament is all about. Inasmuch as he has no authority to do anything in a substantive way to deal with these matters, certainly he should take this opportunity. I simply point out that by his own designation the bill seeks to deal with only one aspect of the over-all problem, that is, a planning board. If the house were to pass the bill and it became the law of the nation even that one aspect would not be dealt with because the planning board which the hon. member conceives would not have any money with which to do anything. It would be a body that had no money or authority to engage in anything except the carrying on of conversation about something.

The hon. member spoke of our record of saying the same thing spring after spring after spring and year after year after year, but I regret to say, although the hon. gentleman really does not want me to say this, that our capital city gets worse year after year after year. There does not seem to be any sign of improvement. So far as I am concerned Ottawa is not just another municipality among the surrounding Ontario municipalities or the municipalities in the province of Quebec. The city of Ottawa and the surrounding municipalities are just as much my capital as they are the capital of the hon. member who sponsored the bill or those who live in the area. Ottawa is regarded as the capital city just as much by people who live in British Columbia as it is by those who live in this city and area.

But that is not the way the hon. member's friends and colleagues in city hall think about it. That is not the way certain controllers and city officials think about it. Every time in the past anyone has raised the subject of dealing with the national capital area in a manner other than that in which it is being dealt at the moment, who has raised the greatest obstacles, the greatest hue and cry? The opposition does not come from the members of Parliament who look upon Ottawa as their capital city. The opposition and the great fuss come from the petty politicians in the municipalities who do not want to see their power and authority interfered with.

The streets of Ottawa are bloody awful. This situation existed long before I became a member of parliament and long before many others were elected to the House of Commons. From reading old newspapers one can discover that it has existed for a long time. Whenever questions are raised about the potholes or anything else people like Controller Heit immediately get up on their horse and say, "Give us some money, we will fix it, but we do not want your interference". They want the people from British Columbia and elsewhere to give them tax money so they can pour it into their coffers, but they do not want to give us any overriding authority in respect of co-ordination or planning.

Back of the people in these municipalities to some extent are the authorities in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) did a great disservice to the concept that the member who sponsored this bill talked about, that of developing a national capital region of which all the people of Canada could be proud. When the present Solicitor General (Mr. McIlraith), who is a member from the Ottawa area, was Minister of Public Works he spent a great deal of time and effort in dealing with the provincial governments of Quebec and Ontario and the municipalities in the area in an effort to reach an agreeable solution in respect of our national capital area. We all know how conciliatory, gentle and hard-working the Solicitor General was when he was charged with this responsibility. He almost brought his efforts to fruition, and we were on the verge of having something concrete. The Prime Minister, however, out of ignorance or for some other reason, perhaps not knowing what the then Minister of Public Works tried to do, shunted him from that position into the position of Solicitor General. All the work he had done and all the efforts he had made were pushed to one side.

We do not hear a whisper from the present Minister of Public Works (Mr. Laing), or whoever is responsible for the National Capital Commission about what is or is not being done. After 10 or 12 years of talking in the House of Commons something might have been accomplished had the Solicitor General been allowed to continue his work toward the worth-while goal of establishing this area as the national capital, something other than just another municipality in the province of Ontario, in the province of Quebec or both.

We all feel proud of our national capital. The people of British Columbia and people in other parts of Canada would be pleased, I am sure to have part of the tax dollars they pay to the federal government used to develop this area into an aesthetic and beautiful national capital. I am sure they would be pleased to have this area developed into something far better than it is at the moment so far as its physical aspects are concerned.

The people in other parts of the country should be able to feel that this is the national capital rather than just a city in the province of Ontario like all other cities in terms of structure. They look upon the national capital as being something better than that and perhaps a place for which they could have an emotional attachment.

We had almost reached the stage of starting to create such an area and might be well on the road had the Solicitor General been left in his position as Minister of Public Works. Perhaps the Prime Minister did not know what was taking place, or perhaps he saw fit to remove him from the position of Minister of Public Works in order to have someone else there who would have to start off from scratch. For whatever reason, this is regrettable.

The potholes are bad in the city of Ottawa. The situation is allowed to continue without regard while we talk about it. The hon. member who sponsored the bill will just have to be content to listen to us talk about the situation. He knows the potholes are bad. Perhaps he knows it better than I because he lives in this area and probably travels more often over a greater number of the streets.

Mr. Peters: Maybe he thinks they are good.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Perhaps he thinks they are good, but I think he was really putting up a front in the hope of getting some endorsation for his bill. If it had any real meaning or was designed to establish something concrete rather than simply being a vehicle for the making of a speech, as the hon. member did, perhaps he would receive some support. I do not see much point in endorsing a bill which appears to have no function other than to provide a mechanism whereby people can get up and make speeches.

We are not opposed to the bill, and if it comes to a vote I will not vote against it. I will not vote for it but I will let it pass. I think it is meaningless in the true sense and will not come to anything. If the hon. member's experience on city council was worth while and if the government considered his experience of some value, perhaps the member might have put his message across and the government might have introduced a bill containing full authorization and authority to move ahead in this direction. Without that support this is just another private member's bill which will likely have the same fate as other private members' bills.

It is fine to talk about some of the ideals about which we are all concerned, but in the meantime we are making no contribution and the potholes in the city of Ottawa are just as bad if not worse than they were last year. This is primarily so because the councillors sit in their seats at meetings unable to see beyond the boundaries of the municipalities and realize that this is the national capital of Canada.

Most people think in terms of this area as just another municipality in the province of Ontario. That is not good enough. It is too bad the hon. member is not back on the council in order that he might have some influence there because he does not appear to have a great deal with the government here.

[Translation]

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, it would seem at least in theory that this bill, as much as all other public bills, is a logical piece of legislation.

However, if one analyses the present situation one realizes that this bill cannot be discussed in this house for the simple reason that such consideration appears to me to be unconstitutional in view of the fact that the area under discussion is part of the Quebec territory. We all know to what extent the Province of Quebec is now more than ever, jealous of its rights, privileges and prerogatives, and all the more so of its territory.

This is particularly true in the wake of experiences as disastrous for the Province of Quebec as that of Labrador, when following the intervention of the federal government, Quebec lost one-third of its territory. Thus we are faced with the fact that, even though we could admit that it would be very nice to plan and organize a national capital area in this manner, we cannot proceed until the Province of Quebec has dealt with the situation and expressed its views. In other words, the matter cannot be discussed unless the position of Quebec is known.

• (5:30 p.m.)

I should also like to point out the situation that exists in Ottawa, the capital of Canada. The way French Canadians are treated in that unilingual city, capital of a bilingual country, has often being experienced. It would take too long at this point to enumerate all the frustrations of which the French Canadians in Ottawa have been the victims, as well as those from the outside who have visited their national capital. Suffice it to recall the statements of the former mayor, Miss Charlotte Whitton, which truly reflected the unilingualism of Ottawa. Instead of tackling the problems of the federal district, it would be better, in a country which claims to be bilingual, to show at least in the national capital a will to respect in fact the requirements of bilingualism.

The leader of the Ralliement Créditiste (Mr. Caouette) recalled an incident that occurred last fall in which a member of our party was involved and where once again, the unilingualism of the Ottawa police force was revealed. In fact, a French-speaking Canadian cannot do business effectively in his mother tongue in Ottawa.

I recognize that the federal government has made a real effort, with some results I must say, to improve the situation in all the territory and buildings which fall within its jurisdiction. But there is a real problem when it comes to the city as a whole. It seems to me we should forget about other projects until that absolutely abnormal, not to say paradoxical, situation has been corrected, of which Quebec is is well aware. Every Quebecer knows what the situation is really like in Ottawa.

On the other hand, Quebecers know full well that the city has been given considerable help, which was only logical since it is the capital. But they also know that the other shore of the river was neglected and that the central government developed the south shore of the Ottawa river to the detriment of Quebecers. Now, on studying the situation, one realizes that by introducing a bill dealing with planning, the construction of roads, the development of land and even the building of offices for the federal district, we are not tackling the real problem.

That is why I am coming back to my first argument. In theory at least, here is a bill in no way devoid of common sense and which it might be quite normal to pass in any country under normal conditions. However, we are all aware—and if not, just remember the federal-provincial conference which took place last week—of the very serious problems facing Canada. There are many things to settle before we tackle this particular point. Had this bill been introduced after Quebec had adopted a clear-cut position about its territory, and after the government of Ontario had done the same regarding the city of Ottawa and considering the mutual attitude of these province, we might have been in a better position to discuss such a bill.

I therefore oppose Bill No. C-20 and I hope my arguments will lead other hon. members to do the same.

Mr. Gaston Isabelle (Hull): Mr. Speaker, I am always glad to take the floor on matters pertaining to the national capital area, especially when the Quebec side is concerned.

I shall not assume the part of the devil's advocate and to criticize, as some previous speakers have done, the structure of government for the past few years.

Neither shall I shun the problem. Bilingualism is a current topic in the federal capital as well as other problems which I consider sometimes quite superficial. A good number of people in the national capital area, are French-speaking and I do agree with these who contend that the federal government has quite often ignored them, and that Quebec has always neglected this area of the Ottawa valley.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Isabelle: Recently a report was submitted which I qualified and which I still qualify as irresponsible. It is the Dorion report which simply advocates thieving, and, to my mind, any report that advocates thieving is an irresponsible one. It advocates that the lands of the National Capital Commission on the Quebec side be returned to the provincial government. We know, however, that before 1958, all the lands in the National Capital area were bought by private contract. Since 1958, only one per cent of all the lands of the National Capital Commission have been expropriated according to the Expropriation Act which was enacted by parliament in 1958.

I understand my friend, the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Francis) who did not want to introduce a bill whose application would reflect his whole attitude, but who just wanted to create a kind of incentive in order to arouse the people of the national capital area and to tell them: It is about time that you should consult each other and that the representatives of areas located a quarter of a mile away be invited to discuss the planning on the Ottawa side as well as on the Hull side so that this economic unit which nobody wanted to recognize, neither in Quebec nor anywhere else, be recognized.

This is why, today, when it is a question of building a bridge, on the Ontario side, a road is built that does not reach it, because the building of the bridge was not expected then and, on the Quebec side, a road is built which also does not reach the bridge. So, there are two roads that lead to the river, and the bridge is five miles below.

That is why my hon. friend from Ottawa West wishes to create a certain atmosphere that will make possible the establishment of a planning board. To me, the planning board is important. Some may say: The National Capital Commission is capable of planning under the law. That is right. However, when the general planning was done, nobody thought of consulting the municipalities concerned. A highway was built, expropriation of land took place often without consultation with the municipalities that were unable to do any planning.

It has been said that large sums of money were granted to Ottawa. That is true. The city of Hull got almost nothing. That is equally true. The Hull area is complaining because it did not get any money from the central government and Ottawa is complaining because although it was given money it did not have the opportunity to do any planning. They are no better off, one way or the other.

That is why we should seek a way of planning without changing the constitution for it may be taken as a fact that the Quebec territory will remain within the provincial jurisdiction of Quebec and that the Ontario territory will remain within the jurisdiction of that province.

However, this does not mean that because of the jurisdictions to which the territories located on both sides of the river are subjected, we should let the people fend for themselves, as has been the case for so long. It is about time that we should wake up and find the means to come to an agreement so as to avoid discriminating between the citizens living on this side or that side of the river.

It is about time that we should find the means to solve the transportation problem within the national capital not by setting up two, four or six transportation companies but a single transportation company subsidized and administered by the federal government. It is the only government in the area which is able to do something. It is the only one which can bring something to fruition instead of letting the people in the hands of a second-rate company as can be found in the area.

It is about time that the federal government, because of the site of its main buildings, of its planning and of the number of people it employs in the federal capital, should take its responsibilities with regard to transportation. I advocated the establishment of a means of transportation. I do not suggest that it is the best solution; however, I think that it is a valid suggestion and that it should be taken into consideration in the framework of a system which would cover the whole area of the national capital.

The National Capital Commission has been mentioned by everyone. If the Commission had not carried out some works on one side of the river or the other, even though it consulted no one, I do not think the present situation on the Quebec side or on the Ontario side would prevail. At any rate the National Capital Commission has become an economic power. It administers an estate worth about $100 million, half of which has been acquired during the past five years.

In my opinion, we could look for some way of joining forces and doing some planning so that this land may become more profitable. It has been said that the city of Ottawa is badly managed and that this region is not like others. I do not know of any elected body which, if it does not give satisfactory service, is not replaced by another when election day comes around.

With regard to particular problems arising at particular times of the year, one has only to have worked for a city, as a mayor, a controller, an alderman, or what have you, to be well aware of the difficulties facing Canadian municipalities today, including Ottawa and Hull.

I wanted to say also that this region is not like any other. It is true. There is not other region in Canada where a provincial frontier borders on the national capital. The Hull area has however always been neglected by all.

Somebody mentioned a while ago that it is only since the Liberals took office in 1960 that it has been disregarded. The city, the region of Hull does not exist since 1960 only; it exists since 1854, and it has always been forgotten due to the good offices of the Quebec government which said: We cannot do anything in Hull because it is close to Ottawa. On the other hand, Ottawa said: We cannot do anything for Hull because it is not under our jurisdiction. The provincial government does not allow us to do anything.

Then, at the expense of the citizens, efforts were made to settle constitutional problems that are basically practical problems.

Can it be imagined that if one travels in the east-west direction, a single fare is required whereas a double fare must be paid for every trip in the north-south direction. Is that fair? However, that situation was never discussed at the level of the provincial governments. There never was any willingness to meet in order to discuss a problem, which could have restored equality among the population of the Ottawa-Hull area.

Further than that, let us talk about this famous sales tax. In fact, I hope the agreement between Quebec and Ontario will be challenged. People from Hull who come to Ottawa to buy goods must pay 13 per cent; that is 5 per cent when they pay by cheque at the store and 8 per cent when Quebec charges a special duty, as it is currently done. This practice brings in many thousands of dollars. Am I going to be deluded into believing that it is fair that people of that area be treated as second class citizens, within such an economic area as that of Ottawa-Hull? Let us think it over, let us ask ourselves whether or not the basic principle of the bill introduced by the hon. member for Ottawa West is valid.

What it advocates, I think, is a mere dialogue between the Quebec and the Ontario areas, so that they can both benefit of the economic advantage of their territory, rather than discriminate against the people.

I will be asked to give examples. When I see Quebec leaders taking part in a federal-provincial conference in Ottawa, a quarter of a mile from their own province, and stay in Ottawa hotels, nobody will make me believe that they are sincere. I will not be deluded into believing that it is fair to insist that the people of the Hull area be penalized when they purchase in Ottawa, when they come and sit in state in Ottawa as kings or princes. To use a popular expression, I am fed up with the situation these Canadian citizens have had to put up with for so many years.

Today, the leaders of Quebec, like Nero, are looking at the city and at the province from atop the provincial legislature building, and like Nero they are saying: "Burn, Rome, burn", or if we transpose: "Burn, Quebec, burn". As for me, I would say that first of all we are going to save the Hull area, and that by way of a referendum we are ready to approve all the means the federal government will see fit to provide us with in order to make of the Ottawa-Hull area a bicultural and bilingual entity and a single economical entity, which will ensure that everybody in the area gets the same treatment.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

[English]

Mr. D. Gordon Blair (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, the bill which has been brought forward by the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Francis) is a valuable means of rivetting the attention of this house and indeed the attention of the whole country upon the problems of the Ottawa area.

As one who came to Ottawa to live some 18 or 19 years ago, I believe that the discussions as to the relationship between the municipalities in this area and the federal government have not always been of a proper order, nor have they been carried on, in my opinion, in a proper manner. In my view there has been far too much recrimination, too much of one authority blaming the other, too much confusion and inaction resulting from conflicts between municipalities, provincial governments and the federal government. I say that the worse thing any of us could do in this chamber at the present time would be to perpetuate the nonsense implicit in this ancient manner of talking about our capital.

We are faced here with a problem of immense magnitude. In this area at the present time there are perhaps less than 400,000 people. It is estimated that some time after 1980 there will be over a million people in the area. Unless all the government agencies and other authorities concerned take the necessary steps to look ahead and plan for the future we shall indeed be faced with grave problems. Indeed, our capital may well develop in a way which is altogether different from the needs and desires of the citizens. This is why I commend the hon. member for Ottawa West for initiating this discussion. We should be grateful to any hon. members of this house who bring forward matters relating to the future of this area for our consideration.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Hear, hear.

Mr. Blair: I pause at this point, though perhaps I am entirely out of order—something which would not be exactly new in the history of this chamber—to comment on a remark made by the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) when he suggested that no one should make a proposal here unless it could immediately take practical effect.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): I said no such thing.

Mr. Blair: I noted while the hon. member was speaking that he has nine or ten bills of his own on the order paper. I wonder whether he would apply the same reasoning to them.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Absolutely, but stick to the facts.

Mr. Blair: We must be prepared to consider a number of varying ideas as to how this capital area might be organized. In doing so, we cannot blind our eyes to the difficulties which exist, some of which were exemplified by the remarks of the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Matte). There is inherently a great problem about organizing a viable structure for this capital region and planning its development when the necessary measures must embrace two provinces and countless municipalities on both sides of the provincial boundary. It is my belief that for the future we must proceed in an orderly way with certain specific objectives in mind. In my opinion we must collectively, all the governments concerned, take steps to avoid the conflict between jurisdictions that has been the curse of government in this area.

• (5:50 p.m.)

Up until now the federal government, though it is the largest property owner and has the largest stake in the development of this area, has not been able effectively to participate in the government of the area or in its planning. As some hon. members have pointed out, a very significant contribution has been made to planning in the national capital area by the National Capital Commission. But this has been accomplished by the Commission buying land and developing it as it thought best for the area.

Neither the federal government nor any of its agencies, such as the National Capital Commission, has had jurisdiction or authority to plan or to participate in the control of planning in this area. Many of us who are interested in this problem noted with feelings of shame and disgust the unedifying controversy over building heights in this city which arose three or four months ago. In my opinion, this is example No. 1 of the present unsatisfactory and conflicting planning authorities in the capital area. If that is not enough to convince the residents of this area and the government of Canada that something better has to be worked out, then I do not know where we can find a better example. I am hopeful that in the life of this parliament tremendous progress will be made in the development and planning of this capital area. First of all, I think it is proper for me to call the attention of hon. members to the important discussion that took place at the federal-provincial conference last week at which time the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Trudeau), speaking at the afternoon meeting on February 12, was able to report immense progress in the tripartite study being carried on by the provinces of Ontario and Quebec and the government of Canada. All participants in the conference agreed to a resolution which I think it is proper to record here:

1. The Constitutional Conference is agreed that the cities of Ottawa and Hull are the core of the Canadian capital area.

2. No changes be made to provincial boundaries or to the constitutional responsibilities of the governments concerned.

3. The boundaries of the Canadian capital area are to be established by agreement of the governments concerned.

4. In line with the aforementioned objectives, steps must be taken so that the two official languages and the cultural values common to all Canadians are recognized by all governments concerned in these two cities and in the capital region in general so that all Canadians may have a feeling of pride of and participation in and attachment to their capital.

5. That the Study Committee on the Canadian capital continue its work giving particular importance to the following:

(a) the definition of suburban areas which would eventually constitute, along with the cities of Ottawa and Hull, the Canadian capital regions;

(b) a study of the administration and the financing of the tripartite organization.

In my judgment, there lies the hope for the future; a determined, sincere and honest attempt by the three major governments involved to evolve a mechanism for future government and planning.

In conclusion, might I suggest that we as members of this parliament should be able to play a significant part in the future discussions which should take place. I hope that in the life of this parliament the project that has been often mentioned of creating a joint committee of the other house and of this house to consider the national capital region and its many problems will materialize. I think there would be widespread support from all members for the creation of such a committee. It would, if nothing else, serve this nation well by informing everybody of the importance of the national capital area, of the interest that all Canadians have in it, and of the problems that will have to be solved if it is to develop in a way of which all Canadians approve.

May I call it six o'clock?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order. The hour appointed for the consideration of private members' business having expired, I do now leave the chair to resume the same at eight p.m.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

INCOME TAX ACT AND ESTATE TAX ACT

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Benson that Bill C-165, to amend the Income Tax Act and the Estate Tax Act, be read the second time and referred to a committee of the whole, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Saltsman (p. 5191).

Mr. William Knowles (Norfolk-Haldimand): Mr. Speaker, at five o'clock before the debate was adjourned I was talking about what a number of farmers had said at a meeting. They were very much opposed to the imposition of the new estate tax. I also spoke of contradictions inherent in government policy. On the one hand, through farm improvement loans and the Farm Credit Corporation, the government enables farmers and small businessmen to accumulate property and small businesses; on the other hand, through the medium of estate taxes, the government sees to it that small farms or businesses are dismantled or divided up.

As a result of pressure from members of the opposition, government backbenchers and public opinion, the minister changed the exemption level from $20,000 to $50,000, where it had previously been. We must, of course, give the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) credit for increasing the exemption level. Nevertheless, the impression the government seeks to leave is misleading. From my reading of the bill it appears that, in certain cases, the exemption level is still only $20,000. I believe my colleague has already dealt with this aspect of the problem.

About 10 or 15 years ago $50,000 was considered an appropriate floor for the exemption. Inflation, of course, has inflated farm values, and in our present inflated economy $50,000 is a totally inadequate and unrealistic exemption floor. I do not think any farmer or businessman objects to paying taxes on the increased value of his holdings, if the value of those holdings has been increased by his own efforts. When the value of those holdings is inflated and he has to pay tax on that inflated value, he has reason to complain.

A farmer in my constituency wrote these words, which I quote:

> I, and perhaps the majority of farmers, are still opposed to the new proposed tax, because I do not feel that a $50,000 exemption will be adequate in the very near future.
> I understand that by 1980 there will be only 35,000 farmers in operation. Therefore this would mean that the present owners, will have to increase in size, increasing their net worth by two or three times. This would make the proposed exemption very unnoticeable.

We also give the Minister of Finance full credit for allowing estate tax to be paid over six years. That provision will bring relief to some. Yet, it will still be difficult for widows and children inheriting small farms or businesses worth $200,000 or more to pay inheritance taxes.

In the bill there is what may be called a once in a lifetime exemption of $10,000 which applies to a son who inherits farm property and continues farming after his parents' death. That exemption will make it easier for the farmer to pass his farm to his son; it will make it easier for the family farm to survive. But, again, in today's inflated economy that exemption of $10,000 is far from adequate. I urge the minister to consider increasing that $10,000 to a more realistic figure, more in keeping with today's inflated economy.

Another tool which will assist our farmers and businessmen in estate planning is the measure providing for tax free gifts. Under the old legislation a father could pass on to a son $4,000 per year. Now, he can pass on only $2,000. We feel this is a step in the wrong direction, just as leaving the exemption floor at $50,000 and the exemption in the once in a lifetime gift provision at $10,000, are moves in the wrong direction. I submit that that $2,000 exemption ought to be increased to $6,000. By using the tools of estate planning, farmers will be able to pass to their sons parts of their property. Their sons will take an interest in the operation of the farm and will be imbued with a desire to make the enterprise succeed. I urge the Minister of Finance to re-examine the whole question of exemptions.

The one saving factor in this entire estate tax matter is that, if a farmer or small businessman uses the tools of estate planning he can gradually divest himself of his interest in the venture and pass it to his children. If he is deprived of the use of these tools, the small business or small farm will founder.

In conclusion, I wish to say this: In view of today's inflated economy, exemptions should be brought up to more realistic levels. Tools permitting the planning of estates ought to be made more useful. A farmer ought to be able to increase the size of gifts to his son because those gifts may take the form of property. The Minister of Finance ought to consider these matters before this bill becomes law. With proper estate planning, the small farm or small business could be enabled to survive.

I will conclude by reading from a letter from a constituent that expresses my sentiments. It reads in part:

> The point in question is this. Are you trying to penalize me for working and for trying to make myself and my family comfortable? Since when has initiative, ambition and drive become something to be frowned upon? I don't like work. No one likes work. But I like the better things in life and work makes this possible.
> If this proposed estate tax is passed in Parliament and if the present trend of taxation continues there will be no reason or hope for me to try to advance. When I find that I am spending more money than I have, I stop spending. I suggest that the government stretch the dollar rather than collect it... Although this letter contains my opinions it also represents the attitudes of any Southern Ontario farmer or small businessman—

• (8:10 p.m.)

These are the sentiments that I leave with this house and especially the Minister of Finance. I ask him to take a realistic look at the exemptions and figures which he has placed in the bill in the light of today's inflated values.

[Mr. Knowles (Norfolk-Haldimand).]

Mr. Norman A. Cafik (Ontario): I take great pleasure, Mr. Speaker, in addressing myself to this debate on the estate tax. There are a number of views I would like to put forward in the hope they may be of some value.

With respect to this tax, there has been a great deal of confusion in Canada, and there still is confusion here in the house as to the implications. Before suggesting any recommendations, I would like to spend a moment or two and elaborate upon the real meaning of this tax. When the proposals were originally put forward I must say frankly that I did not agree with them in total. At that time I felt that no estate under $50,000 should be taxed. Since that time many hon. members have suggested the exemption should be $100,000. However, I think they are wrong. I do not believe the average working man in Canada would accept a $100,000 exemption or minimum upon which taxes would be paid. Taxes not only have to be just, but they must appear to be just. I think many people in Canada would feel $100,000 would be far too high to give any pretence of justice.

The previous speaker suggested that taxing estates of $50,000 would be completely unrealistic. I would point out that if a man wishes to leave his farm to his children, $50,000 could be left to his wife as a gift which would not be taxable, and $50,000 could be left to his children which would not be taxable because of the floor in the taxation plan. In effect, such a farmer could leave $100,000 without any tax being paid, $50,000 tax free to his wife and $50,000 tax free to his children. In addition, there would be an exemption of $10,000 if left to one child. In that case $110,000 would be tax free. If the same principle were applied to an estate with a $100,000 minimum, no estate tax would be paid on estates far in excess of $100,000. I do not think that would be fair or just.

As a newcomer to this house, I feel that the changes put forward are very important. They show that parliament and democracy are really working. The people of Canada and hon. members from both sides of the house made recommendations. I think it is a great thing that some of these recommendations have been accepted. Another change is the right to a time payment plan. It is important that people be given the opportunity to pay estate taxes over a period of time. The new legislation allows, as a matter of right, six years in which to make payment.

An hon. Member: Five years.

Mr. Cafik: I treat six equal instalments as six years.

An hon. Member: The law states it is five years.

Mr. Cafik: In view of the complexity of the estate tax, a period of time is allowed to choose whether exemptions will be claimed under the old or the new Estates Tax Act. The estates of persons who die between now and August 1, 1969, can claim whichever exemption is the most favourable. This is a step forward in settling some of the confusion which has arisen as a result of these estate tax changes.

I have a recommendation to suggest which I feel would be worth while, particularly in my riding of Ontario. This area is 50 per cent rural. It is very close to metropolitan Toronto. As a consequence, the value of land has increased very sharply in the last few years. Some of these farmers wish to continue farming and their children wish to continue farming. Under the present legislation, their farms would be assessed at real estate value rather than at farm value and there could be an excessive estate tax payable.

I suggest that the farm be assessed at both real estate and farm value. If the beneficiary of the estate guarantees that he or she intends to continue farming, then the estate tax should be payable at the farm value. If the farm is later sold the estate tax would become payable as originally assessed, at the real estate value plus interest. This would give farmers the right to continue farming in areas of great increases in values of land. I think this plan is workable. It may sound complicated from an administrative standpoint, but I do not believe this. At the time of the death and the assessment of the property, the government could put a lien on the property for the difference in estate tax payable as between farm and real estate values. This lien would be held until such time as the property is sold. Such a practice would be a step toward helping farmers in my particular area.

Looking at the new proposals in detail, I am impressed with the social implications of this new estate tax. It is a step in the right direction to recognize the principle that both a husband and wife contribute to the value of an estate and, consequently, not to tax the estate when left by a husband to a wife or vice versa. From a social standpoint this legislation is welcome.

Another point which is most important, is that this legislation bears in mind the amount of work which the estate has to do and then taxes accordingly. This is being done by allowing an exemption of $10,000 per adult child, plus an exemption for non-adult children of $1,000 per year between the ages of 1 and 26. Under this principle, a child is entitled to exemptions up to $35,000. In the past the exemption was $10,000, and in the case of a wholly dependent infirm child it was $15,000.

I think it is also important to recognize that this tax takes into consideration the dependency of an infirm child where the estate must take care of that child. In this case, the exemption can be a maximum of $70,000, whereas in the past it was only $15,000. This is a great step forward in social legislation.

What about the negative views that have been expressed? First of all, the argument has been put forward by some on the opposition side that a person has earned his money so there should be no tax on it whatsoever, and that, in particular, there should be no such thing as estate tax. I do not think that is a valid point. If we carried that practice through for a number of years we would end up with the wealth of the nation amassed in the hands of far too few people. Therefore, the principle of estate tax is valid. It is the details of the tax that we have to discuss.

Then there is the opposition view—I do not know if anyone here holds it—that in terms of estate tax we should confiscate all money left after a person dies. This view is also invalid. We have to find a happy medium whereby we can redistribute the wealth and at the same time recognize it is important that people have incentives to earn money and to save it. This kind of legislation recognizes the needs of both levels.

Let us look at the implications of the estate tax in practice. I think I pointed out earlier that many people seem to feel that estate tax is a new kind of tax in Canada. Estate tax was first introduced in 1892 in the province of Ontario and has existed there ever since. Estate tax on the federal level was introduced in 1941. Some people think that all estate taxes come to the federal government.

According to my information 75 per cent of the money raised in estate taxes goes to the provinces, with the remaining 25 per cent to the federal government. On an annual basis, the income to the federal government amounts to roughly $100 million. According to my information, it is not the intention through this legislation to increase the revenue of the federal government but simply to achieve some of the worthwhile social objectives of which I spoke earlier.

If estate tax were abolished and the same amount of revenue were to be raised from the same group who presently pay estate tax, roughly 5 per cent of those who die, it would require an increase in income tax of 15 per cent. On the other hand, if the federal government were to raise this $100 million by dividing the load equally among all tax payers it would mean the social development tax would be increased from 2 per cent to 3 per cent. I do not think there is any justification for either of those two approaches, and I believe that the approach in this legislation is the ideal one.

Mr. Woolliams: How is it all Grits think the same?

Mr. Cafik: I guess we are all smart. Now, turning to the chart outlining the amounts of tax payable, I find one category where an estate is left outright to a widow and on her death divided equally among the children. I understand the vast majority of Canadians leave estates in this category. To my surprise, I find that under the new rate the estate tax on a $60,000 estate increases from $2,600 to $4,800 where there is one child, and where there are two children from $2,600 to $3,000. There is one other category where there is an increase, an estate of $80,000 with one child, but the increase is hardly worth mentioning, from $8,332 to $8,700. The rates are lower in every other instance. I cannot see the justification for the difference in these two categories, except that it must be the mathematical application of a formula which happens to work out that way. I would hope some adjustment could be made with respect to those two categories.

In other categories where an estate if left to a stranger the new rate is much higher, and substantially higher in many categories. I have no particular objection to this because I think our primary concern is to protect the estates left to children and wives.

[Mr. Cafik.]

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I wish to say this legislation is good. I have reservations with respect to the two categories of estates that I mentioned, and I think something might be done to solve the situation. If an exception were made in these two categories I do not think the revenue loss would be very great. I also think consideration should be given to a new formula for assessing the value of farm land along the lines I have suggested. With no other reservations, I have no hesitation in supporting this legislation which is a step forward in the over-all plan of tax reform.

[Translation]

Mr. Henri Latulippe (Compton): Mr. Speaker, after listening to the speeches on the estate tax, I am pleased, in turn, to say a few words.

I should like to give my point of view on the new rules concerning the proposed amendments to the Estate Tax Act. I shall not go into details, because several hon. members have done so.

Briefly, I would like to say that corporations do not die but individuals do. The law under consideration affects individuals, the small corporations, the small companies whose president holds almost all the shares. When the president of such a small company dies, it is subject to the same laws and regulations as the individual, including the Estate Tax Act. Mr. Speaker, under that act and its regulations, we will continue to undermine private enterprise and free enterprise.

Mr. Speaker, free enterprise will no longer exist in a few years, for even if the bill contains some desirable tax exemptions, such exemptions are not considerable if one realizes that $100,000 are not worth today what that same amount was worth 50 years ago. In fact, a $100,000 or $200,000 estate is negligible today, since money is valueless now.

I was saying that corporations do not die. The large corporations that operate with the help of millions of dollars cannot be taxed, and since they will never die, in consequence, they will never pay. Once again, the small estates, the small businessmen will pay the piper, will be thrown in the street, in short will disappear to leave only the large corporations and state organizations which can enjoy privileges denied to small companies.

It is basically unfair, in my opinion, to tax individuals more than corporations. There is no honest or serious reason to treat instruments better than individuals who use them, consequently to treat corporations better than individuals.

Mr. Speaker, under this legislation, corporations should pay as much estate taxes as individuals. The mere fact that they are organized in a corporation does not entitle individuals to privileges, at the expense of isolated people in our society which collects taxes for its administration.

• (8:30 p.m.)

If it is impossible to tax the estates of corporations, since corporations do not die, there is no logical reason to tax the estates of individuals. We wait until their real or financial property are transferred to their heirs, who will pay taxes as individuals. That is the principle in application.

If indeed, circumstances have favored the establishment of practices contrary to principles, there is no reason why we should maintain the same mistakes, the same lapses.

In the particular case at issue, regarding the tax on individuals' estates, we must make inquiries, charge for assessment of property inherited, deduct taxes owed to the government by the one who died, and that is all.

No succession duties are levied on corporations, but a last inspection and collection of taxes is made from citizens after they die.

I know, Mr. Speaker, that I am bringing forward arguments that may astonish some hon. members or the minister, but it is always the same thing. When the government extracts money from individuals, it is almost always in an unfair way, while that same government grants exclusive privileges to the big multimillionaire corporations. That is the situation that must be set right again.

The minister did not enter the picture; he did nothing so that small and large corporations would be treated on an equal footing in connection with succession duties. Small corporations are doomed to disappear and large companies will be allowed to go tax free.

My whole argument proves once again that I wish to respect the true principles of social life, that I am in favour of private enterprise at all levels, particularly at the level of the individual and the family, for death involves enough difficulties already without the government or the income tax people unduly complicating the settlement of the estate or the inheritance to the survivors.

The large millionaire or multi-millionaire corporations do not die. They are well protected at the death of their main shareholders. The securities they own are transmitted to their heirs very often without the inspectors noticing it. The corporation itself does not die, and it is not taxed. Why do we still protect the instrument more than the individual?

Nobody, Mr. Speaker, can carry his estate or his money to Heaven. It is for the living to distribute his estate, not for the government. The government is not more than Heaven, and Heaven does not claim a part of the estate of individuals. Why then do governments place a heavier tax on individuals than on corporations? There is no logical reason to justify the passing of this law: It can only be explained by absurdity.

Mr. Speaker, the bill now before us certainly contains some improvements, but it is unfair even though it only takes a part of their property when it taxes the poor. This is a kind of injustice all hon. members should recognize.

I, with some other members of the Progressive Conservative party, am among those who do not support this legislation. I have listened to them; some were right; but not a single one of them I think has pointed out the situation as clearly as I am doing now: it is a question of taxing the little man and the big man. We must be fair in this world, otherwise we are bound to see all kinds of atrocities, such as the ones we have witnessed recently.

In fact, we notice dissatisfaction throughout our beautiful country, when it would be so easy to do justice. It would be enough to tax everyone equally, according to one taxing formula. It would be sufficient to exact lower duties from small farmers or industrialists leaving estates of $200,000 or $300,000, which is not worth much today, when our money is worthless.

Mr. Speaker, I attempted to sum up in a few words the conclusions I drew after listening to the remarks of other hon. members on this bill. I therefore urge the minister to amend, and even withdraw his estate tax bill, because the taxpayer has always paid taxes during his lifetime. In fact, they are not satisfied to tax once those who have accumulated savings; those people are taxed a second, a third and even a fourth time; this is nonsense, and again the small man will be wiped out, although he has as much right to live as the big man. Mr. Speaker, one has to crawl before one can run. To have the right to live and breathe, one is born a baby, and then one grows into an adult, and any adult Canadian has the right to make a living.

Canadians who made some money should be able to distribute it among their heirs, who would then further the economy of the country. The government has no business taking all the people's money away from them to spend it on its own.

Citizens are honest and clever enough to spend their money as they see fit and to run their industries and to keep working their lands, if they want to. If the proposed amendments were adopted, they would result in the disappearance of several industries. As a matter of fact, several small businesses will be driven to bankruptcy.

Mr. Speaker, we would be wrong to adopt such a bill. Once more, let us try and make justice prevail: let us tax the big ones as much as the small ones.

It was said a short while ago that this would bring in $200 million of which half would go to the Canadian government. In my opinion, the hon. member who quoted those figures is making a mistake. If the federal government receives $100 million and gives 75 per cent of this amount to the provinces, it will be left not with $100 million but with $25 million. I suggest that it is not worth it to destroy companies and private enterprise for $100 million. The government should therefore withdraw from this field and leave estate taxes to the provinces.

• (8:40 p.m.)

[English]

Mr. Rod Thomson (Battleford-Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to belabour this subject at great length, but I do have an item I wish to draw to the attention of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson). The other evening the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Schreyer) suggested that, as he interpreted the schedule presented by the minister, the effective tax rate was closer to the rate for $100,000 estate than it was to the rate for the $50,000 estate. We in this group hope the minister will make a statement on this aspect, perhaps in replying to the amendment if he does not wish to close the debate. We might change our point of view if we had a statement from the minister clarifying this particular item. Let me suggest that the tables are not as clear as they might have been. Perhaps some of the responsibility for the lack of understanding lies on this side as well on the other side of this house. I, for one, would appreciate the minister explaining these tables again. Perhaps he would clarify them for me.

Let me emphasize an item referred to this evening by the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Cafik). I refer to the arbitrary assessment by estate tax people who come out into the country and make assessments. I know of a case which involved four houses in a small prairie town. They were assessed at a value more in line with city values. The people involved were not lawyers but farmers who had inherited this property. While there may be appeal procedures available, these people felt they had as much chance of changing the assessment as stopping the sun from rising in the morning. Their feeling was similar to the feeling I have when I argue with the Postmaster General (Mr. Kierans).

When assessors on behalf of the income tax department or in respect of estate taxes come into an area they try to find out what property has sold for in the same area. They might discover that a quarter section of land was sold at one price and another quarter section at another price. This method of arriving at a value does not necessarily bear any relationship to the productive value or the overall value of a farm. I may be that someone was willing to pay a high price to obtain a quarter section or a half section in order to put together an economic unit. I feel that this practice should be corrected because it has caused a great deal of trouble and confusion in the settlement of estates. I have received many letters about this particular problem and I sometimes wonder whether I should not go into the estate planning business. I am not a lawyer, but I have learned quite a bit since I began discussing this matter and listening to speeches here.

When I receive a letter from a man who is well into his seventies asking me what he should do about his property, I wonder, as a member of parliament responsible to his constituent, whether I should act on his behalf or bring the situation to the attention of the Minister of Finance. As a member of the opposition, I have a tendency to protect the individual.

This brings me to another point. It is unfortunate there is not more estate planning done. We have many provisions under the old act and the proposed act which, if properly used, would help many people settle their estates in a much more effective manner. The result would be less taxes paid. I am not sure that this is a responsibility of government, but since the government does thereby collect a greater amount of money than it might otherwise collect, it acts unfairly in situations which are the result of a misunderstanding or lack of knowledge of the law. In view of this fact, I think the government should bear some responsibility.

If one of my constituents does not understand this particular measure and has not planned his estate accordingly, I as a member of parliament, explain it to him. If I did not do so I would feel I had neglected my responsibility. Some time ago I was invited to attend a meeting in the country to explain this particular legislation to the people of the area. I accepted the invitation, but in the meantime the Minister of Finance changed the base rate from $20,000 to $50,000. I am glad I did not attend that meeting. If this legislation is passed in its present form, I may attend such a meeting at a future date.

Let me come back to my original point. We, on this side of the house, feel there is more doubt or confusion as to the effective tax rate for the lower schedule than for the higher schedule. This was referred to by the hon. member for Selkirk. Perhaps the Minister of Finance could clarify this situation. If we are wrong in this idea we will be glad to admit it. If the Minister of Finance has a different view, we should like to see a printed statement clarifying this situation.

Mr. Cliff Downey (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to speak at any length this evening on the estate tax bill. If the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) has taken the trouble to read the mail which has poured into his office during the past weeks from businessmen and farmers across the nation he must be aware of the situation, and nothing I could say at this point would be of great assistance. Some hope was held out briefly a while ago when the minister announced the $50,000 exemption, but when we read the fine print we discovered that by the time an estate reaches $75,000 we are considering a $20,000 exemption.

At this time I think I can be of no more service than to read several excerpts from some of the local papers in my area which reflect the opinion of people out that way. Let me quote from the Wainwright Star-Chronicle as follows:

> It doesn't take much of a farm these days to be worth $100,000, including everything. And those who operate this size of a farm are having a hard time to keep going. Thousands of them at this very moment are finding every cent of income is committed to paying bills—and there never seems to be enough to pay them all.

• (8:50 p.m.)

> A cash reserve is non-existent under these circumstances.
> Almost three quarters of Canada's farmers have a taxable income of less than $4,000 a year; one in four has a taxable income between $4,000 and $10,000. Not much opportunity to build up cash reserves there, especially in the last few years. Yet the heirs of the farmer who leaves a farm valued at $100,000 must raise $17,400 to pay the estate tax on it. The same applies to many other types of small business enterprises, whose operators have a lot of money tied up in the enterprise, but have little ready cash and low net earnings.
> If the farm is valued at $200,000—again not an unusually high figure these days—the heirs would have to raise $51,000 to pay the tax.
> It is almost incredible that the government that has had so much to say about the "Just Society" should introduce such punitive legislation. It seems to us there could be no quicker way to destroy the family farm, and to hasten the day when land resources will be controlled by huge corporations.

The following is another excerpt from another prairie publication which reads:

> It seems strange to me that in these times when so much emphasis is being put on maintaining family farms and family units both by the government and farm organizations that we would be faced with such a bill as the new estate tax proposal. We seem to be trying to make the tail wag the dog and this never works for very long. It looks like a pretty short term outlook to me. Commercial agriculture just can't stand estate taxes; farmers and ranchers have been having enough of a struggle as it is to keep in business and the proposed tax would mean every generation would have to start all over again and everyone knows this is impossible in agriculture. It isn't an in-and-outers game but a business that takes years to build. If you can't turn your business over to your heirs there really isn't much point in having a business at all. If the proposed bill is approved by Parliament a guy with a ranch might as well sell out rather than try to build an outfit to pass along to his sons because it looks to me like he will just be putting them in debt for the rest of their lives and when and if they do ever own the thing they won't be able to pass it on to their sons anyway. Just looking at the thing from a farmer's viewpoint it seems to me some very careful thought and consideration better be put into this estate tax bill before they ever consider approving it. This can do more harm to agriculture than anything I know of. Agriculture has to have continuity and this idea of a double taxation surely is the wrong approach.

In the past, the people of Canada have been led to believe that the Liberal party of Canada was representative of the businessmen and of the farmers of the nation, just as we know that the Conservative party has been representative of them. In my opinion, and not only in my opinion but also in the opinions of tens of thousands of Canadians today, the Minister of Finance is aligning himself solidly with the socialist doctrine that all wealth belongs to the state. He is accepting one of the proposals in the Carter Commission report that has been advocated for so long by our friends in the New Democratic Party.

The hon. member for Coast Chilcotin (Mr. St. Pierre), when he spoke yesterday, deplored amassed wealth and referred to the Rockefellers, the Krupps and the Duponts. He would have us believe that the new estate tax proposals would remedy all this and that all wealth would be equalized. Absolutely the opposite is the case. We are working on an entirely different group of people here. I remind you that the estate tax affects only 50 per cent of the real wealth of the nation, whereas it used to tax 54 per cent. On estates in the million dollar class, the reduction, in estate tax has been 4 per cent. We might go on to look at the equity of the social development tax, according to which a man who has an income of $4,000 to $8,000 is being taxed at the same rate as the man who makes $1 million. Certainly, there is nothing here that would indicate that the minister is doing something to distribute the real wealth of the country.

I must congratulate the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Cafik) on his suggestion with regard to the assessment of land because, as I see it, this is one of the real inequalities. He mentioned that there should be one taxation rate on real estate and he gave an example of the way in which the encroachment of cities pushes up land values. He thought it would be a good idea to assess land on the basis of farm values. I would certainly go along with this suggestion. In my area a great many farms may be valued at $100,000 according to present inflated land values but in actual fact the net return on them may be less than $2,500 a year. This was the figure given by the Economic Council of Canada as being at the poverty level.

These people cannot keep a property of this kind and pay these estate taxes. If we allow the discontinuance of farming that will have an effect on the employment situation. If farmers who are forced off the farm are employable, someone else will be out of a job.

[Mr. Downey.]

We have only to look at some of the provinces today to realize that in at least one of them the unemployment figure is reaching over 10 per cent.

So the real problem as I see it is the inflated property values. If we are to accept the estate taxes as proposed by the minister, then let us assess property in line with the production capacity of the property. In my area it may take 30 acres of land to support a cow for a year. At current market prices which are artificially high because of the pressures brought to bear by many factors—and I would use as examples hobby farmers, foreign corporations and Hutterite colonies—the value of the land is vastly over-rated. In my area the land to support one cow for a year would cost possibly $1,200. In a typical cow-calf operation $25 per unit is a decent profit, and this is on a well run outfit. So, here we would have an operation on land valued at $120,000 which would only return the operator an income of from $2,000 to $3,000.

• (9:00 p.m.)

The farmer who owns the land may have paid only five dollars or ten dollars an acre for it but in the eyes of the estate tax people he is a wealthy individual. If we are to have estate taxes, then let us have assessments related to profits. I beg the minister to reappraise his position.

In this connection I would quote from an article which appeared in the Globe and Mail:

> The department's statisticians have ignored the fact that if one owes, say, $50,000 in estate tax, unless he sells assets to pay the tax he will have to pay it with after-income tax dollars, so it may come closer to $60,000 in actual cost.

We can readily understand that a man with a family and an income around $4,000 would have great difficulty in paying a $50,000 or $60,000 estate tax bill with after-tax dollars.

I think the hon. member for Battleford-Kindersley (Mr. Thomson) said, something about the minister remembering something which had gone before. I can only say that the hon. member for Battleford-Kindersley is probably also hoping that the farmers in his constituency do not remember the stand of his party with regard to the Carter report and the taxation of capital.

In closing, I should like to quote from a report of the Ontario Economic Council:

> Those responsible for guiding the course of our nation's development need only look to history to find proof that nearly every past civilization has hastened its ruin through its dissipation of capital through taxation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mark Smerchanski (Provencher): We have heard much in this chamber tonight about views which newspapers and some tax experts have expressed with regard to this estate tax. Frankly, I think nothing has been so badly misrepresented in the newspapers as the proposed new estate tax. It is obvious that neither the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) nor the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) have done their homework on this subject. They are not in a position to give the true facts about the proposed new tax.

What is the position, Mr. Speaker? Previously an estate of $60,000 was taxed. Under the proposed new tax there is no estate tax levied when property passes between a man and his wife, whether it is worth $100,000 or $200,000 or even a million dollars. This is a move in the right direction. I agree with my hon. friends who say that members of the opposition do not understand the implications of the new tax. We hear much about the destruction of family farms. We hear criticism on the ground that this proposal will destroy small businesses. This proposed estate tax will definitely help the family farm and will definitely help small business enterprises.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Smerchanski: We have recently concluded a week of federal-provincial meetings during which the provinces were asking for a higher percentage of the tax dollar. I would point out that the provinces take 75 per cent of every dollar collected in estate duty by the federal government. Yet, members of the opposition tell us that the federal government is being unrealistic. I suggest they go into a corner with a pencil and paper in order to figure out the exact implications of the new tax which is being presented.

I hear it said that small corporations are being taxed unfairly when compared with the large corporations. If there is any difference between the tax percentages applied to small businesses as opposed to large businesses, I do not understand the type of argument the opposition is using in this connection.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Smerchanski: We also hear criticism on the grounds that a family farm cannot be sold to an only son who wishes to carry on. We are told that previously the exemption in connection with a gift was $4,000. Now, it is argued, it will only be $2,000. The fact of the matter is that since there is to be no tax on transfers between a man and his wife, a husband and a wife will, together, be able to give the child $4,000 as was the case previously. To say anything else is simply untrue. Yet the right hon. member for Prince Albert made statements in Montreal before Christmas and after Christmas, as well as in one of the provinces only last Friday, misrepresenting the position. For a man of his calibre and standing to misquote the facts is something with which I cannot live. If members of the opposition feel this is playing politics let them carry on in the same way, because they are going to destroy themselves and we shall not have to help them.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Smerchanski: The proposed new tax in its modified form is far better and more equitable than the estate tax of previous years. We were told tonight that small businesses and small corporations would be taxed out of existence. That is simply not the case. If we sit down and think out the implications of this proposed legislation, we shall find it is far better than the old estate tax. On the one hand, we have large corporations paying better than 50 per cent of their profits to the federal government.

• (9:10 p.m.)

An hon. Member: Fifty-two per cent.

Mr. Smerchanski: Yes, that is right. Then, when they declare dividends the tax on those dividends amounts to anywhere from 10 to 20 per cent. So, if you analyse the situation the average corporation pays something between 60 to 70 per cent of their net profits in taxes. No matter how you slice it, it ends up as a tax bait to the federal government. Hon. members opposite say that there is a hardship placed on a small business or family farm under the new proposed estate tax; but I recommend they do their homework because this is not the case under the proposed legislation.

We hear much today about federal-provincial relations. We hear of the constant approach made by the provinces for a larger percentage of the tax dollar. I will wager before all members of this house that 75 per cent of every estate tax dollar collected by the federal government goes to the provinces.

It might be advisable to have the members of the opposition suggest to the Minister of Finance how to divide the remaining 25 per cent of the federal share of the proposed estate tax; this indeed would be a very interesting experiment in financing.

It is suggested that the owner of the small family farm cannot plan for the future if unfortunately, he dies and an estate tax is levied. This bill is one of the most outstanding pieces of legislation that has come before the house because it provides for fair and equitable distribution, and hon. members cannot deny it.

I heard one member say that if an estate were worth $100,000 the estate might be called on to pay $50,000 in tax. Either the member who made that statement is completely irresponsible or he does not know what he is talking about.

Mr. Groos: Both.

Mr. Smerchanski: It might well be both. Coming from such an irresponsible group as this opposition, it might well be both. Let us suppose an estate is worth $100,000, and that tax is levied at $50,000. If there were one child exempted at $4,000 a year, with 12 years of proper estate planning no estate tax would be due on that $100,000 estate. If there happened to be two children the period would be reduced to 6.2 years. If there are three children it is reduced to 4.2 years. So to say that there are no provisions for estate planning in this legislation is simply not true.

Members of the opposition have been going across the country quoting what they allege to be newspaper opinions and newspaper polls. I suggest that before they refer to polls conducted by newspapers they do their own homework and find out exactly what they are talking about in terms of dollars and cents. To do otherwise is to fly a kite, to gamble in spiritualism, instead of understanding the true facts of the situation.

From the standpoint of dollars and cents, the proposed estate tax is equitable. With regard to estate tax planning, after August 1, 1969 one can opt either to take the old rates or the new rates. This too is fair and equitable. Being given the option to pay the tax over six years is a fantastic improvement over the previous provision. This is a move in the right direction. I only wish all members of the house would do their homework, understand the implications of the new estate tax and tell their constituents the truth about the new estate tax. If that were so they would find that their constituents were pleased and delighted with the new legislation that is before us tonight.

The proposed legislation that is before us tonight is not going to affect adversely the family farm. It is not going to put the small business enterprises of this country out of business. It is going to help them. It is going to encourage and enable small family farms and business enterprises to pass on their operations to the children of the family and will levy far lower estate taxes than would be the case under the old estate tax legislation.

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, in discussing the estate tax bill I think we must keep in mind several things that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) has in mind. I suggest that as a result of the original budget proposals the Minister of Finance is introducing very shortly, so we are told, a tax reform bill to cover not only this particular type of tax but other forms of taxation. Some of this taxation may be new; some may be old and due for revision.

In discussing this estate tax bill, we must keep one eye on the bill and one eye on other areas the particular bill touches. I believe the government was flying a trial balloon when it first introduced its tax measures early in the fall. It was testing public reaction on two fronts. First, they were testing the reaction to the imposition of estate taxes. These would include taxes on every form of inheritance. Secondly, they were testing the public's reaction to the imposition of a capital gains tax. In this connection I wish to suggest some changes to the legislation which the minister may not wish to accept at the moment but which he and his officials may consider when planning tax reforms.

• (9:20 p.m.)

When this measure was introduced we were told that monetary considerations influenced the government in introducing it. The Minister of Finance said that the provinces needed money and he was thinking of the provinces. Where else could he find this type of money except in the field of estate taxes? The minister made similar remarks inside and outside the house on a number of occasions.

Figures presented during the federal-provincial conference show that the federal government keeps only 24 per cent of all estate taxes levied. The figures show that in 1967 all estate taxes amounted to $217 million. Answering the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) the other day, the minister said that as the result of exemptions spouses will benefit from, there will be a reduction in the amount of estate tax collected of $45 million. I think that is correct, is it not?

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, that is the total reduction for all governments.

Mr. Korchinski: The total amount of estate tax collected will be reduced from $217 million to about $170 million, on the basis of 1967 figures. Since the federal government retains only about 24 per cent of all estate taxes collected, it will benefit to the extent of between $42 million and $43 million. In other words, so far as the federal government is concerned, not too much money is involved. If the government were really concerned about the plight of the provinces, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) would not have made a statement at the federal-provincial conference to the effect that if the provinces want more money they should collect it themselves.

Some provinces have indicated they prefer not to collect estate taxes. Alberta has gone out of the business of collecting estate taxes and Saskatchewan has indicated that it, too, will go out of that business. The governments of those provinces consider it is important for wealth to accumulate in family farms or businesses. The few millions of dollars the federal government may lose in estate taxes that are not collected would soon be made up in the form of income taxes when these businesses prosper. I submit the government ought to increase the exemption level from $50,000 to more than $100,000. The hon. member for Coast Chilcotin (Mr. St. Pierre) last night said he favoured the $100,000 figure. I support him in that.

If the figures that have been quoted are correct, I submit that the government will collect less than half the $40 million odd it now collects from estates worth less than $100,000. All the government has to do if it wishes to make up the difference is spend less on expensive art centres and on repairs to ships like the Bonaventure.

I submit that the government's deep seated reason for introducing this estate tax measure is to be found in the Prime Ministers' basic philosophy. We must understand the direction in which this country is heading; and in order to understand that we must understand the people who are formulating the philosophy and implementing the policies of this country. On various occasions the Prime Minister has flirted with the socialists. It is no secret that he studied and, at times, was impressed with the communist ideology. I need say no more on that point except that this ideology may have been in the Prime Minister's mind when he allowed the Minister of Finance to introduce the type of budget that was last introduced. It was evident, surely, that by lowering the exemption floor under estate tax legislation to $20,000, every property would be taxed and every property owner touched by the tax. An attempt was made to implement part of the Carter Commission report, or so it seems. Members of the N.D.P. blessed that attempt.

• (9:30 p.m.)

During the last election campaign members of the N.D.P. preached across this country that the Carter report was the greatest thing going and ought to be implemented in its entirety. I was therefore pleased last night to hear the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Gleave) change his tune. I imagine he did so because of letters written to him and others of his party protesting the estate tax. Members of the N.D.P. treated the Carter Commission report as a full fledged issue, particularly in urban areas. The N.D.P. went far and wide and uttered in every speech, "We have to soak the filthy rich. We must take the money away from those big corporations. There are bad cats and good cats. We have to get the bad ones." They convinced many people in the rural areas that implementation of the recommendations in the Carter Commission report would be important and necessary for their survival. Only then would they find their Utopia. An attempt was made last fall by the Minister of Finance to implement some of these recommendations. The "filthy rich" were not attacked and huge corporation profits were not suddenly drained. Instead, every householder, farmer and small businessman was affected.

The N.D.P. repeatedly urged acceptance of these proposals made in the Carter report. I want to quote from this report. It is important that Canadians should know that this is what the N.D.P. had urged. I quote from page 70, volume 3 of the report:

> Gifts and inheritances obviously add to the economic power of the recipient. We therefore recommend that, with the major exception of transfers between members of a family unit and with a number of relatively minor exceptions, they should be treated as income for tax purposes.

At page 477 the report reads:

> Taxation should be levied in the most neutral manner possible. However, this does not mean that if a taxpayer elects to place his resources in such a way that they are not readily realizable, he should secure a tax preference over other taxpayers with liquid assets. The tax system should, of course, provide for an orderly realization subject to the securing of debts to the Crown and the payment of appropriate interest. As long as tax can be readily computed there seems little excuse for the failure by taxpayers to make provision for such taxes and will apply to their estates.

The New Democratic Party members failed to mention in their speeches that this proposal affects the farmer and the city dweller as well. It might be of interest to people in urban areas to see how the recommendations of the Carter Commission might have affected them. I quote from an article in the Toronto Telegram of January 31, written by Eric Dowd:

> Almost any house in Metro is now worth at least $20,000, said a Queen's Park official.
> The average Metro price is about $30,000—
> For most people it would have meant taking out a mortgage to pay off the new tax,—

The article reads, in part:

> The province is under some pressure to raise this exemption. A select committee of the Legislature urged last year the exemption be raised to $90,000.
> It felt a $75,000 estate is not a "rich man's estate"—

I think this is the crux of the whole matter. The minister realized this report could be dynamite. It would have affected every householder in Toronto. His own riding would have been affected and it would have been "bye bye Benson". It was not the rural areas which concerned the minister. As he stated, it was representations from the urban areas in Toronto from which you have a flood of Liberal members. These are the people who changed his mind. The Carter Commission proposals at that time would have affected every householder. The minister realized how dangerous this was and changed his mind. There is one commendable feature in the estate tax proposals and that is the exemption for spouses. This is a provision with which everyone would agree. For this I congratulate the minister. I am sorry the congratulations have to stop at that point. From that point on, the minister has made it a lot tougher on small businesses.

What did the minister do with regard to the $20,000 exemption? He introduced a tax system that was most iniquitous and after a period of incubation said, "No dice, we don't tax any more; we put things back to where they were." But he did not do this. The point made earlier by a spokesman of the N.D.P. is well taken. What the minister has in fact done has been to tax those estates below $100,000 at a higher rate. According to this table, on an estate of $60,000 with one child under the present law the tax would be $2,600. Under the proposed law the tax would be $4,800. Once estates reach a higher level and people are in a better position to pay more tax, the minister makes it easier by reducing their tax.

On an estate of $100,000 the tax under the present law is $15,160 and under the proposal law it is $13,200. Estates valued at $60,000 will be subject to a higher rate of tax than previously. It has been made easy for the millionaire. We save him something like $70,000 or $80,000. Under the present law an estate of $1 million paid $511,000. Under the proposed change it will pay $434,000. This is what the minister is doing for the millionaire.

• (9:40 p.m.)

Mr. Benson: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, since the hon. member is quoting from the tables might we not get permission of the house to have the total tables printed in Hansard along with the hon. member's speech?

Mr. Korchinski: I am sure I don't mind. As a matter of fact it might prove the point I am making, that from $100,000 on these proposals make it a lot easier to pay your taxes. As a matter of fact, the tax was a lot higher previously than it will be now.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am not sure whether the minister's point of order was by way of formal request or interjection. If the minister wishes to table these documents he needs the consent of the house. I am not sure really what his intention was.

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member was quoting from tables I had given him. I was going to ask unanimous consent of the house to have the total tables printed in Hansard along with his speech so that all can see what the figures are.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Korchinski: What the minister does not realize is that according to these tax tables he is making it harder for those who are struggling, those who are setting up business and reaching the point where it may be a paying proposition. At that juncture, the minister jumps in and apparently imposes a heavier tax. If he believes that the scattering of estates is conducive to the economic improvement of the country then perhaps he should continue in this course.

Last night the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent) suggested that the estate tax should be 100 per cent, except in cases involving spouses. To me that spells communism.

Although $100,000 sounds like a lot of money, it is only the paper value of many estates. Owning property is no assurance of a better life. In fact it can be a lot rougher and less rewarding than working for a wage. This is the case with many farmers. Most farms are essentially a father and son enterprise passed on from generation to generation. A farmer's assets are all tied up in one parcel.

It does not take much of a farm these days to be worth $100,000, but many farms worth that do not earn enough for the farmer to pay income tax. This is indicative of the type of money made on an operation of that size. It is indicative of the type of poverty that exists, despite a book value of that size.

We have spent considerable time in parliament passing legislation to set up economic farm units. This session we passed an amendment to the Farm Credit Act, making it possible to advance loans up to $100,000. Amendments to the Farm Machinery Syndicates Act, to provide $45,000 loans, are presently before the standing committee. In the ten years since it was established, the Farm Credit Corporation has been authorized to make loans of $27,500; this ceiling was later increased to $55,000, and only this year increased again to $100,000. These high book values are caused by inflation, by rising costs of machinery and higher taxes. If a farmer is to continue to have an economic unit he must stay with the game; in other words, he must continue to borrow.

On paper the value of a farm looks like a fantastic amount of money. The hon. member for Coast Chilcotin (Mr. St.-Pierre) last night showed that he understands the problem very well, when he quoted figures to show the type of investment that in some cases gives a return of less than 1 per cent on capital. This is what is really happening in the farming industry.

The Saskatchewan Association of Rural Municipalities sent a letter to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) in which they said the following:

> Because of high land values and large land holdings which successful farming operations require, farm estates attract high estate taxes but have no liquid assets readily available to pay them. We cannot see how our national well being could be served by the breaking up of production units to pay estate taxes.

An editorial in the Western Producer of February 13 contained the following:

> —thousands of farmers nearing retirement have sizeable estates when their value is based on inflated prices of land, which may have doubled in the past ten years. But while the book value of the farm has increased, its earning power has actually diminished, to the point that returns are completely out of proportion to the book value of the land. The situation has been aggravated by rising costs of production and shrinking or static prices for farm products.
>
> The problem then, is one of acute shortage of cash. On the books, the farmer appears to be a wealthy man, in terms of what he owns; but in actual fact he may be living close to the poverty line.
> Frozen assets don't pay debts, nor will they provide for the ready cash needs that arise when an estate passes from one generation to the next—such as estate tax.

The Manitoba Co-operator had a very interesting article which read in part:

• (9:50 p.m.)

> It has been calculated by one source that a section farm in Manitoba with a modest machinery and livestock inventory would be subject to about $26,700 taxes on inheritance. Now tell us where a son inheriting such an estate, and intending to remain in farming, is going to get that amount to pay off the government.
> In most cases he will be faced with selling off some of the land—probably resulting in an uneconomic unit—or borrowing at the current exhorbitant interest rates and trying to survive in an industry that is already sorely beset by problems.

Despite the protestations of the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Smerchanski) I think that pretty well illustrates that the farming community has an understanding of the situation. I believe it is unfair that this type of industry which is so depressed should be treated in a manner which would seem to indicate that the bureaucracy here in Ottawa believes there is money to be made. What are we creating by this attitude? What are we doing to all the communities that are struggling for survival? What will happen to all these little service stations and garages? A garage owner does not have to have very much to reach the figure of $50,000. There might be a few automobile parts, a building and a lot of junk outside in the yard.

Many of these small businesses go broke. We might ask ourselves, what we are doing in respect of these little grocery stores and so on? All these people ask for is an opportunity to operate a small business or farm, economically if possible, so that they will be independent. What should the government role be in this regard? The government should make it possible for them to operate these businesses. Instead, the government with one hand is reaching in their pockets, and with the other hand is forcing them to split up these economic units. The Farm Credit Corporation provides money for the setting up of the economic unit and then the government turns around and introduces legislation which in effect says that the economic unit must be split up. Where can the money come from? These people do not have money lying around. In the farm industry, as in business, there is always room for improvement. Therefore, the money is continually tied up.

The trouble with estate taxes is that they destroy incentive. What small businessman will spend money to improve and expand his operation if by doing so he is subjecting his property, and his heirs, to a crippling tax payable on his death? Surely, this encourages economic stagnation, rather than stimulating this growth which Canada badly needs. I think whatever may be said of Premier Thatcher in Saskatchewan, he fairly well understands the situation. For this I give him full marks. I believe he is well aware of the need for capital in that province. I think he has indicated his government is quite prepared to quit levying estate taxes. These are some of his comments as reported in the Leader Post of January 31, 1961:

> The government of Saskatchewan adheres to its basic position that estate taxes in these times of inflated land values, will work a particular hardship on farmers.
> The $50,000 limit is all right, but as far as I can see he hasn't changed his rates which we describe as savage.
> I welcome the proposal to allow payments on estate tax over a period of six years.

This is fine, except that I wonder why interest must be collected on the balance owing. Even if estate taxes are necessary, why must interest be collected? All the government need do is wait six years and everything will be balanced. There is no need to apply interest on top of an inequitable tax. I am sure the minister might wish to look at that. The estate tax is not like the income tax under which, if there are arrears, another tax payment is due in the following year. This is a once in a lifetime situation. If we are to make payment of the tax as easy as possible, then surely it is not essential that interest be collected. The minister will receive the same amount of revenue in the end.

In the next minute or two, before concluding, I should like to suggest that the government should consider dropping out of the estate tax field entirely. However, if the government feels it must remain in this field I believe it should consider the fact that many of these values are inflated and, therefore, the exemption should be increased to $100,000. As reported in the Toronto Telegram for February 11, 1969 the President of the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce is quoted as saying:

> Reducing exemptions in estate taxes would run counter to other government policies and could weaken Canada.

The article with reference to the President of the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce states:

> His criticism of the inheritance-tax changes was part of an attack on Government tax and welfare policies which, he claimed, promote inflation and reduce the individual's incentive to work.
>
> People in banking are familiar with the struggles of small businesses to build up assets. It is a slow, laborious process.
> Small businesses, often they are family businesses, do much for the strength of Canada. Why should they be put in jeopardy when the owner passes on?
> It would be "tragic" if Canadians lost their initiative because of Government policies.

I simply want to say that the government should not heed pleas like those we heard last night from the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent). We heard that all inheritances other than those of a spouse, should be taxed 100 per cent. I say that is communism. At the present rate, even though it is 50 per cent, I say to the government we are half way toward communism.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson), probably as acting house leader, whether we will be carrying on tomorrow with this item. The house leader suggested, I think last Thursday, that we should deal with this bill on Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday of this week. I assume this will be the order of business.

Mr. Benson: Yes. The intention is to carry on with this bill through the second reading stage, the committee stage and the third reading stage.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the house under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

HEALTH AND WELFARE—MANITOBA—OPTOMETRIC AND CHIROPRACTIC SERVICES IN MEDICARE PLAN

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, on Monday January 27 as recorded at page 4829 of Hansard and on Monday February 3 as recorded at page 5046 of Hansard I asked questions about the inclusion of optometric and other paramedical services within the provisions of the various provincial medicare plans. In particular, I asked whether the federal government intended to honour its commitments to share in these plans in keeping with the amendment made to section 4 of the Medical Care Act in 1966.

When I asked my question on January 27 the answer of the minister was that he did not think there was yet sufficient consensus for this to be done. When I asked my question on February 3, with particular reference to Manitoba, the minister said categorically that the federal government was not going to share in the cost of optometric and chiropractic services being included by Manitoba in its medicare plan. One does not like to use the word "betrayal" very often, but I am afraid that is the word which applies in this case.

In 1966 when we were adopting the Medical Care Act we insisted through a very long debate that there be a provision written into the act whereby other services could be added such as optometry. In due course, an amendment was made. As a matter of fact, it was made by the government, the terms of which are quite clear, namely that there can be other services. The wording appears in subsection (3) of section 4 of the Medical Care Act which says in part "in the application of this act a plan established by any of the legislatures of a province", and I stop there to emphasize the words "a province" because that is the key phrase. It was not necessary to have a number of provinces; rather if any one province sought additional services this could be arranged by agreement between that province and the federal government.

Lest there was any misunderstanding about that interpretation questions were put to the minister by several of us, notably by one T. C. Douglas, who will be coming here in a couple of days as the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands. He was then the member for Burnaby-Coquitlam. His question appears on pages 10764 and 10765 of Hansard for December 6, 1966. Let me read the part of his question which had reference to the amendment to which I just referred. This is it:

> I take it this means that the governor in council, on the recommendation of the minister, can extend paramedical services in a plan in a particular province even though other provinces have not asked for a similar extension. In other words the minister would be free, under this amendment, to accede to the request of a particular province that wanted to add to the services which are provided under this legislation, and it would not have to wait until a majority or a specified number of provinces, indicated their desire to have these paramedical services included.

The question was clear. The emphasis was on "a province", by itself. A little later on the same page the then Minister of National Health and Welfare, the present Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. MacEachen) was equally clear when he said this:

> Mr. Chairman, I think the construction the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam has put on the proposed amendment is correct, namely, that it would be possible for one or any number of provinces to admit any health services. I want to assure the committee that the amendment proposed is not a pious wish.

A week or so later the office of the Prime Minister, then Mr. Pearson, wrote to the President of the Manitoba Optometric Society, Mr. Roy Brown of Virden, Manitoba, and spelled it out to him that the amendment which had been passed to this bill made it possible for an agreement, and I quote, "between the federal government and a provincial government, to bring under the plan, at a later date, additional health services, including optometric services".

Thus it is in the act, that it can be done if one province requests it. The Minister of National Health and Welfare at the time made it clear that it was not necessary to wait for a number of provinces, a majority, a consensus or anything of that sort. In fact, the word "consensus" was not mentioned. The government is now refusing to honor its commitment.

The two provinces that are already in the plan, British Columbia and Saskatchewan, found that they had to include optometry. The doctors cannot handle the load. Manitoba, after assessing the situation carefully, is faced with the fact that it too has to include optometry in the plan, yet the federal government still says it is not going to share in this cost.

This is a repetition of what was done to the provinces under the hospitalization scheme in respect of mental health services and tuberculosis. The provinces were left in the position where they had to carry their own costs despite the fact that we were being given a piece of legislation that was supposed to be all inclusive. I submit this is quite unfair, and a clear case of the government breaking its commitment when it does not now include these other services which provinces like British Columbia, Manitoba and Saskatchewan are requesting, not to mention New Brunswick and perhaps one or two others.

In light of the commitment made by the former Minister of National Health and Welfare, and in the light of what is stated in the act, I call upon the government not to take the negative position it is now taking. The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) said the other day that he would put the emphasis on getting all of the provinces in. Mr. Speaker, you do not get all the provinces in by not keeping the word of the government, and I call for that word to be kept.

Mr. Robert Stanbury (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) advises me that the possibility of including the services of other health professionals, including optometrists, under the Medical Care Act has been discussed at various federal-provincial conferences of ministers of health. The view of the federal government is that we should not yet consider extending benefits when all provinces have not yet made clear their intentions regarding participation in the medical care plan.

This is not in any way a breach of commitment. Our present efforts are directed toward obtaining for all Canadians the benefits of the Medical Care Act. The difficulty with determining the extent of provincial requests for the inclusion of optometry lies in the fact that some provinces which might unofficially support its inclusion officially oppose in one form or another the Medical Care Act itself. However, some of the provinces certainly have indicated interest in the inclusion of optometry under the plan. It would seem likely that this inclusion might be expected to be speedily accomplished once all provinces have indicated their intentions with regard to the basic package under the Medical Care Act, which was passed almost unanimously with support from all parties in this house.

TRANSPORT—DISCRIMINATORY REDUCTIONS IN EXPRESS ASSOCIATION RATES

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, on Wednesday, February 12 I addressed the following question to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Hellyer):

> Will the minister undertake to investigate recent rate reductions by the Express Transport Association in western Canada which appear to discriminate against Regina and Saskatoon.

Tonight I am disappointed that I do not see in the house either the Minister of Transport, the Minister without Portfolio with special responsibilities in the field of transport, or the Minister without Portfolio, the hon. member for Saskatoon-Humboldt (Mr. Lang) who has a special interest in this subject. I presume that the parliamentary secretary to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Forest) will answer the question and probably slough off any responsibility for this particular matter.

The Express Transport Association is an independent body acting on behalf of Algoma Centre Railway, Northern Alberta Railway, Ontario Northland Railway, Railway Express Agency Incorporated, Canadian National Railways and Canadian Pacific Railway. In December, the Express Transport Association and its member companies introduced freight rate reductions on bulk and individual shipments from Toronto and Montreal to western Canadian cities including Winnipeg, Calgary, Edmonton and Vancouver, but not including Regina and Saskatoon. The rate reductions which were introduced amounted to from 13 per cent to 28 per cent depending on the type of shipment. For example, to quote some of the effects of these new rates, a 200 pound shipment from Montreal to Swift Current can be shipped to Winnipeg and then reshipped to its destination for $13.45. However, if the same order were to be shipped to Regina and then shipped to Swift Current the cost would be $16.82, a difference of 25 per cent which is incomprehensible and can only be classified as discrimination against Regina and Saskatoon, as distribution points in western Canada.

In addition, it might also be noted that the same 200 pound article can be shipped to Alberta cities, that is Calgary and Edmonton, for $11, which is $2.90 or 25 per cent less than it would cost to ship the same goods to Regina alone. I can only conclude that this is discrimination not only against Regina and Saskatoon, but against the Province of Saskatchewan.

• (10:10 p.m.)

Protests were entered by the Regina Chamber of Commerce, the Saskatoon Board of Trade, the Saskatchewan Chamber of Commerce, my colleagues, the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Gleave) and the hon. member for Regina Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin) and myself. I understand there were other protests as well. On the basis of the early acknowledgement of these protests there was some cause for hope. We waited until February 7, when a decision was reached, but that decision was disturbing, as quoted in the Leader Post of February 10:

> Rail express rate reductions already granted to other major cities in western Canada will not be given to Regina and Saskatoon, the Express Transport Association of Canada announced Friday.
> G. A. Shaw, general manager of E.T.A., said in a telegram to Regina Chamber of Commerce and Saskatoon Board of Trade that carriers are not prepared to reduce rates to Regina and Saskatoon in shipping from Toronto and Montreal.

In addition, I myself received an acknowledgement of my protest regarding action taken by the Express Transport Association in the following words:

> The question of including Regina and Saskatoon in our existing list was given serious consideration by member companies. However, I regret to advise that we are not prepared to add them to our listing at the present time.

Further protests were sent by the Regina Chamber of Commerce, the Saskatchewan Chamber of Commerce and other bodies. In addition, I added my word of protest in a letter dated February 14. In my letter, I stated:

> I must say I find this action most disappointing and disturbing. For my own part I cannot condone this type of discrimination against Regina and Saskatoon and I assure you I do not intend to remain silent on the question. It is this type of action on the part of railway companies which has resulted all too often in a loss of favour among the public.
> Furthermore, I must say that I was disturbed by the cavalier attitude in your letter to myself and in other pronouncements on this subject. At no time have I seen a rationale or explanation of the new rate structure as it affects Regina and Saskatoon.
> I would point out to you that while the transportation legislation approved by parliament in 1967 gives the railways more freedom of action in rate setting, it is now incumbent upon the railways to exercise some responsibility in the use of discretionary powers. Should the railways continue policies which have an effect such as is the case with Regina and Saskatoon in this instance, it will soon bring pressure to place more restrictions on railway rate making power.

I would urge the government to intervene to put an end to this discrimination and make it clear to the railways that this type of discriminatory practice and policy will, if continued, result in a reconsideration of the powers allowed to railways under the legislation passed in 1967.

Mr. Yves Forest (Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council): On behalf of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Hellyer), who cannot be here tonight, I wish to inform the hon. member for Regina East (Mr. Burton) that the rate reductions referred to were made by the Express Transport Association, effective November 11, 1968, and are applicable to shipments weighing 101 pounds up to 10,000 pounds. The justification given by the Express Transport Association is set out in the following telegram sent by its manager on February 14, 1969 to the Regina Chamber of Commerce and the Saskatoon Board of Trade:

> Please refer to exchange of correspondence in respect to Express Transport Association rates between Montreal, Toronto, western Canada. These rates are an experiment to attempt to attract long haul traffic not presently handled by express carriers. For this reason the number of points were kept to a minimum; the rates as well as the results are under review to determine whether they will be continued, extended, modified or cancelled. In the meantime it is not the intention to add any further points to the tariff.

The matter is currently being looked into by the Canadian Transport Commission and as soon as the Minister of Transport has received a report from that body he will be glad to make the house aware of its contents.

AIR TRANSPORT—CASTLEGAR, B.C.—CONSULTATION BEFORE CHANGE IN SERVICE

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, last Friday I directed the following question to the Minister of Transport, as reported at page 5522 of Hansard:

> Were the municipalities involved in the operation of the Castlegar airport and other airports consulted by the Canadian Transport Commission before the decision was made to authorize B.C. Air Lines to operate local services on C.P.A.'s southern run?

Then, Your Honour suggested that if there were some urgency about the question it could be discussed at the time of adjournment. The matter is not only urgent, it is of vital importance to my area and I have therefore taken this opportunity to expand on this very important problem.

It seems to me that when any major change in the transportation facilities affecting an area is contemplated, then it is just plain commonsense that the people of the area affected be consulted as to the advisability of the proposed changes. I understand that the municipalities of the area were never consulted about these changes or given an opportunity to express their views on the proposed changes in service.

Transportation services are vital to the growth of all areas. A cutback in any type of transportation service can do great harm to a district unless other forms of transport are substituted. Today, air transport is growing rapidly. There is expansion everywhere, for air travel is coming into its own. However, in the proposed schedule for travel and facilities as outlined for the Castlegar airport by the air transport commission, there is every indication of the present service being drastically curtailed. The schedule certainly was not drafted with a view to giving better service to an area with over 70,000 in population and which is expanding rapidly.

When the Canadian Pacific Railway closed out its passenger service over the Kettle Valley railway it indicated that it would provide good passenger service by air. There was really an obligation on Canadian Pacific and it did provide a fairly good service to the area. C.P.A. used a DC-6 which carried 84 passengers. It made two trips daily to Vancouver. It gave our district direct service to Calgary. This aircraft was able to carry express and freight where needed in fairly substantial amounts. The number of passengers leaving the Castlegar airport was on the increase, and sometimes the DC-6 had a full complement of passengers. This C.P.A. service provided meals to the passengers on the Vancouver and Calgary runs. This necessitated, of course, a very fine stewardess service on this C.P.A. run.

Now the air transport commission has offered our area an inferior service as far as I am concerned. We are to have service from B.C. Air Lines which will use 18-passenger planes. They will make three return trips per day to Vancouver and two trips to Cranbrook. We will lose our through service to Calgary. I understand there is no meal service, and of course there are no stewardesses on board. The carrying capacity out of Castlegar will never be able to meet the passenger demand. There will be lengthy waiting periods at Cranbrook for P.W.A. flights to Calgary.

[Mr. Harding.]

In addition to this, P.W.A. flights to Cranbrook will bypass the Castlegar airstrip with the Boeing 737, 95-passenger plane. The smaller 18-passenger planes are extremely limited in the amount of freight and express which can be handled. It is expected that they can provide a more continuous service to the airport than the larger planes, although the increased percentage of landings might well be disputed.

On the whole, the picture of air transport from Castlegar would seem to have been adversely affected by this move. Even the limousine service from the Castlegar airport will be affected. Now, limousine service runs to Nelson, Trail and Castlegar, and this service caters to a DC-6 capable of carrying 84 passengers. What kind of service will be provided for an 18-passenger plane which is partially loaded before ever reaching Castlegar? The answer is obvious; the limousine service will have to cease, and the air carrier service will receive another black eye.

Even the airport committee has been bypassed by the commission. Plans were in the offing to increase the capacity of the airport to handle 100 passengers at a time. An expenditure of $150,000 was planned. This expansion will most likely have to be cancelled.

• (10:20 p.m.)

Time does not permit me to give all the details or background of the need for increased service; we do not want decreased service. These few remarks should show the need for immediate action and review by the Department of Transport. It is much easier to prevent a foolish error than to correct it once it has been made.

I urge that the transport department hold an immediate and complete review of the situation. May I suggest to the Minister of Transport that the following points should be given prompt attention. First, a formal hearing in the area concerning the proposed changes should be held. Second, a check on the carrying capacity of the aircraft to be used by the proposed carrier should be carried out. This point relates to both passengers and express. We should see if the capacity is inadequate. Third, there should be an examination of retrogression of service, of the lack of direct access to Calgary, of extended waiting periods at Cranbrook for aircraft to the east, and so on. Fourth, there ought to be an examination of the feasibility of limousine service at these centres. Will such service, which is dependent in part on passengers from 18-seat aircraft, be feasible? Fifth, the loss of revenue to Castlegar Airport because of proposed changes should be investigated. And, sixth, there should be a study of the drastic economic effects resulting from the fact that over 70,000 citizens of the area in question do not have adequate air transportation.

I urge the Department of Transport to look into this problem without delay. I trust that the local municipalities will have an opportunity to give their views on this all important matter of air transportation.

Mr. Yves Forest (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Transport reports that the Canadian Transport Commission gave public notice of the application of B.C. Airlines to operate local services on Canadian Pacific Airlines' southern route. The municipalities were notified in this manner and could have sent representations to the Commission for examination. The Minister of Transport is investigating further the points raised by the hon. member and will report his findings later.

Mr. Speaker: The motion to adjourn the house is deemed to have been adopted. The house stands adjourned until two o'clock tomorrow afternoon.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 10.20 p.m.
